When neither assimilation nor accommodation policies proved effective, state and local legislatures began to clamp down on these dissenters. In the early twentieth century local officials began routinely denying Roman Catholics their school charters, Jehovah's Witnesses their preaching permits, Eastern Orthodox their canonical freedoms, Jews and Adventists their Sabbath accommodations. As state courts and legislatures turned an increasingly blind eye to their plight, religious dissenters began to turn to the federal courts for relief, often supported by new or nonreligious groups.

In the landmark cases of Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940) and Everson v. Board of Education (1947), the United States Supreme Court applied the First Amendment religion clauses to state and local governments. In its early application of the free exercise clause, the Court set out to protect the rights of newly emergent religious groups against recalcitrant local officials. Jehovah's Witnesses, the Court held repeatedly, could not be denied licenses to preach, parade, or pamphleteer just because they were unpopular. Public school students could not be compelled to salute the flag or recite the pledge if they were conscientiously opposed. Other parties, with scruples of conscience, could not be forced to swear oaths before receiving citizenship status, property tax exemptions, state bureaucratic positions, or social welfare benefits.

In its early application of the establishment clause, the Court sought to outlaw state patronage of public religion altogether, particularly in the schools. On the one hand, the Court banned religion from public schools. Public schools could not offer prayers or moments of silence, could not read Scripture or religious texts, could not house Bibles or prayerbooks, could not teach theology or creationism (see CREATION SCIENCE), could not display Decalogues or crèches, could not use the services or facilities of religious bodies. On the other hand, the Court removed religious schools from state support. States could not provide salary and service supplements to religious schools, could not reimburse them for administering standardized tests, could not lend them state-prescribed textbooks, supplies, films, or counseling services, could not allow tax deductions or credits for religious school tuition.

In Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971) the Court held further that every federal or state law and policy would survive constitutional scrutiny only if it had: (1) a secular purpose; (2) a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion; and (3) minimal entanglement between church and state. This test rendered the establishment clause a formidable obstacle to many traditional forms of state patronage of public Protestant religion. Legislatures and courts alike used this new test to outlaw all manner of government subsidies for religious charities, social services, and mission works, government use of religious services, facilities, and publications, government protections of Sundays and Holy Days, government enforcement of blasphemy and sacrilege laws, government participation in religious rituals and religious displays. It often did not take lawsuits to effectuate these reforms. Particularly local governments, sensitive to the political and fiscal costs of constitutional litigation, often voluntarily ended their prayers, removed their Decalogues, and closed their coffers to religion long before any case was filed against them. Although federal and state cases at the end of the twentieth century began to relax some of these holdings, they remained the basic law.

These strong constitutional challenges, together with the rapid liberalization of their theologies and defection from their churches, drove many Protestants from active political life and learning in the postWorld War II period. Whereas individual luminaries such as REINHOLD and H.RICHARD NIEBUHR charted provocative new political pathways, American Protestants did not develop an authentic political model and program on the order of Roman Catholicism after the Second Vatican Council. Some Protestants repeated old political formulas, and often nostalgically recounted Protestant progress and prowess in American history. Other Protestants focused their attention on single political issues—PRAYER in public schools, the eradication of ABORTION, the protection of the traditional family—often mobilizing ample political support for these causes. However, a comprehensive Protestant political platform, faithful to the cardinal convictions of historical Protestantism and responsive to the needs of an intensely pluralistic polity, did not emerge.

A notable exception to the recent pattern of Protestant political quietism in America was the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT of the 1950s and 1960s, led by the Baptist preacher MARTIN LUTHER KING JR., that helped to bring greater political and civil equality to African Americans in a series of landmark statutes and cases. Another exception was the rise of the MORAL MAJORITY and Christian Coalition in the 1980s and early 1990s led by JERRY FALWELL, PAT ROBERTSON, and others—a broad political and cultural campaign to revitalize public religion, restore families, reform schools, reclaim unsafe neighborhoods, and support faith-based charities (see CHRISTIAN RIGHT). A still further exception has been the very recent coalition of Protestant and other religious and academic groups that have led campaigns for the greater protection of international religious freedom. Whether these movements are signposts for a vibrant new Protestant political mission and ministry remains to be seen.

See also Church and State, Overview; Democracy; Human Rights; Political Parties; Political Theology

References and Further Reading

- Ehler, Sidney Z., and John B.Morrall. Church and State Through the Centuries: A Collection of Historic Documents with Commentaries. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1954.
- Fowler, Robert Booth, Allen D.Hertzke, and Laura R.Olsen. Religion and Politics in America: Faith, Culture, and Strategic Choices. 2nd edition. Boulder/New York/Oxford: Westview Press, 1999.
- Friedman, Robert. The Theology of Anabaptism. Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 1973.
- Hutson, James H., ed. Religion and the New Republic: Faith in the Founding of America. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2000.
- Klaassen, Walter. Anabaptism in Outline: Selected Primary Sources. Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 1981.
- LeCler, Joseph. Toleration and the Reformation. Translated by T.L.Westow. 4 vols. New York: Association Press, 1960.
- Marty, Martin E. Religion and Republic: The American Circumstance. Boston: Beacon Press, 1987.
- McLoughlin, William C. New England Dissent, 1630–1833. 2 vols. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1971.

- Noll, Mark A. One Nation Under God? Christian Faith and Political Action in America. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988.
- O'Donovan, Joan Lockwood. Theology of Law and Authority in the English Reformation. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1991.
- Skinner, Quentin. The Foundations of Modern Political Thought. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978.
- Stokes, Anson P. Church and State in the United States. 3 vols. New York: Harper and Bros., 1950.
- Tinder, Glenn. The Political Meaning of Christianity: The Prophetic Stance. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991.
- Walzer, Michael. The Revolution of the Saints: Study in the Origins of Radical Politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1965.
- West, John G. Jr. The Politics of Revelation and Reason: Religion and Civic Life in the New Nation. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1996.
- Witte, John. Law and Protestantism: The Legal Teachings of the Lutheran Reformation. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- . Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment. Boulder/New York/Oxford: Westview Press, 2000.
- Wuthnow, Robert, ed. The Encyclopedia of Politics and Religion. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly, Inc., 1998–.

JOHN WITTE

POLITY

Polity is the structure and form of governance of an organization or community, including its constitution, assignments and limitations of powers, offices, lines of AUTHORITY and amenability, and procedures of membership, participation, and representation. Like its companion term “POLITICS,” polity derives from the Greek politeia, referring to the governance and citizenship of the polis, the city or state.

One of the structures central to polity and political practices in the Greek polis was the ekklesia, the public assembly of citizens meeting to address and resolve issues of the common good. That Christians took the name ekklesia for their own assemblies is surely no coincidence. Like the original ekklesia, Christian assemblies were called together (kaleo, the Greek verb “to call,” is the root of ekklesia), responding to the summons of witness and service in Christ’s name. They were public, inclusive of everyone who sought to participate. They aimed at the common good of their own community and of the human community whose greatest well-being would be realized in the Reign of God.

Protestantism itself has been as much a movement for reform in polity as in DOCTRINE. Much of the “protest” in Protestant groups has focused on structures of authority and governance in the churches. Just as Protestant disputes over church teachings have regularly been couched as a search for the original and pure truth of the Word of God, so Protestant struggles over polity have been framed as a striving to achieve an original and unadulterated form of Christian community. If “Scripture alone” (a central claim of the REFORMATION) contained everything necessary for SALVATION, then “Scripture alone” ought to be the basis for church order. In contrast with Roman Catholicism, in which polity can be authentic only in continuity with the church's practices across the centuries, the test of Protestant polity has generally been its discontinuity with previous (corrupted) practice as it seeks to embody the original or "primitive" New Testament church.

Protestantism's break with Roman Catholic continuity, and its impulse to create new COVENANT communities, is captured in its language about polity. With the exception of the Anglican communion, most Protestant groups have avoided the term "canon law" for their written polity because of its overtones of organic legal tradition and precedent. They have chosen to speak either of church law and church order, in the sense of a constitution binding people together in covenant (typical of Reformed traditions), or of CHURCH DISCIPLINE, referring to the disciplined, common practices of seeking growth in the Christian life and sanctioning those who do not remain faithful (typical of Methodist and Pietist traditions). For example, the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH USA titles its polity book The Book of Order, and the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH titles its The Book of Discipline.

The Protestant instinct to distrust existing forms and seek the original church polity in Scripture has produced far less unity than diversity, dispute, and schism. The hundreds of church groups that fall under the general label of Protestant are explicit testimony to a lack of consensus about what the original polity is. More than 250 distinct denominations that are not part of Orthodox (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN) or Roman Catholic traditions persist in the UNITED STATES alone, and the impulse to generate entirely new ecclesial forms based on fresh readings of scripture continues to thrive. The flourishing of newly organized independent congregations, particularly those appealing to the Holy Spirit as guide and guardian of their communal life, virtually explodes comprehensive categories such as Protestantism. The denominations grouped under the canopy of Protestantism themselves appear to indicate that independent congregations seek to supersede with appeal to Scripture and Spirit.

For much of Protestantism, however, denominations continue to represent forms of polity consistent across multiple congregations. Denominations are literally the name (denominators) of various traditions of church teaching and polity. Many denominations bear in their name an explicit claim about their polity or the political reasons for their organization (e.g., Episcopal, Presbyterian, Covenant, Congregational, United). Denominations also demonstrate that polity is a creature of social context. This, too, is embodied in such names as AMERICAN BAPTIST, Swedish Covenant, AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL, and Korean Presbyterian.

The extent to which polity is embedded in national, ethnic, and local cultures has been a major source of controversy in Protestantism. The language, symbols, norms, and assumptions evident in church polity and its practice are inevitably shaped to a greater or lesser extent by the societies from which churches draw their participants. CLERGY Authority, for example, often mirrors wider cultural assumptions about GENDER roles, such as paternal dominance, or parallels other social positions, such as tribal chief or village patriarch.

Polity is also affected by the context of religious freedom in particular societies, the degree of regulation by the state, and the presence and degree of dominance of a national church. Because the rise of Protestantism was coincident with the emergence of modern nation-states, some Protestant churches (e.g., CHURCH of ENGLAND, Church of Sweden) have functioned as national bodies with parish systems embracing the entire territory of the nation. Other Protestant churches have had to struggle for freedom to assemble for worship and governance of their own affairs, placing themselves in a separatist or sectarian position.

The diversity of Protestant churches makes generalizations about polity almost impossible. However, one continuum that may be useful in comprehending polity is the dynamic of authority, ranging from congregational, where most or all powers reside in the self-constituted local church congregation, to connectional, where significant powers in ministry and mission reside in regional judicatories, such as SYNODS or CONFERENCES, and/or in offices of oversight, such as executive presbyter, superintendent, or bishop. Even within such a continuum, forms of governance may differ greatly. Connectional assemblies are constituted variously by delegates, representatives, or messengers from local church congregations and the body of clergy, and have varying degrees of power to mandate actions by congregations. Bishops have diverse roles as legislators, administrators, and sacramental figures, with varying powers over assignment of clergy and connectional mission.

Given the diversity of polities and the enormous range of local and connectional practices that make up the distinct organizational culture of congregations and denominations, polity generally embraces five essential elements:

1. A common discipline for church membership.
2. A common discipline for congregational or local church ministry and mission.
3. A procedure for testing the call; assessing the preparation; authorizing, commissioning, or ordaining; and placing pastors, ministers, and others set apart for leadership of the community.
4. Organization of ministry and mission shared by congregations of a region or carried forward nationally or internationally.
5. A constitution, structures, and procedures governing the work of the denomination as an association or connectional organization, including its offices and forms of participation and representation.

Protestant congregations independent of any denominational affiliation must tend to the first three of these essential elements of polity, and often develop commitments in the fourth area as well. Thus these elements largely embrace the life and work of Protestant churches and merit further exploration.

Disciplines of Church Membership

At its most basic, local level, polity begins with the criteria for initiating and sustaining church membership (see also ECCLESIASTICAL ORDINANCES). Many of the reform movements involved in Protestantism began as efforts to address four disciplines of membership. Differences and disputes over these disciplines have accounted for numerous schisms and enduring controversies.

First of these is the understanding of BAPTISM, including questions of the appropriateness of infant baptism, proper preparation for initiation into the Christian life, and the standard of doctrine and practice required for adult or believer baptism. Positions on such questions are rooted in a sacramental theology of the nature of God's GRACE and the balance of divine initiative and human response. But theological stances are inseparable from practical ecclesiological understandings of the formation of Christian community or, in polity terms, how the church members constitute the church. For national churches that understand themselves as comprehensive of the population, infant baptism symbolizes God's grace over the whole of human life and the breadth of the church to include all persons. For sectarian churches of Anabaptist character (see ANABAPTISM), baptism symbolizes the particularity of Christian faith and its acceptance by adult believers who then constitute the congregation of the faithful.

Second, for churches that practice infant baptism, adult CONFIRMATION of the vows taken on one's behalf before the age of conscious decision is a second significant discipline of membership. Again, the criteria for readiness and participation in a rite of confirmation present both theological issues of divine and human agency and practical issues of catechesis. Whereas administration of the baptismal sacrament is for most churches an act normally reserved to the ordained, catechesis is more widely the responsibility of lay as well as ordained officers.

Third, for all baptized members of churches, particularly adult believers, every church needs to provide the means to sustain faithful living and grow in the Christian life. These means, which are widely called "spiritual disciplines," include participation in public WORSHIP and the SACRAMENTS, PRAYER, Bible study, fasting, and giving to the poor. For many groups expressive of Pietist or Puritan movements beginning in the seventeenth century (see PIETISM; PURITANISM), these means have constituted a rule of life to which persons have been held accountable through membership in small groups within the larger church (ecclesiola in ecclesia). The relationship of these collegia or societies to the parishes of national churches stirred bitter polity disputes for groups such as the seventeenth-century Pietists of northern GERMANY or the eighteenth-century English Methodists (see METHODISM). Some separated from the national church and its pastors or priests on the grounds that their group life was not supported by the parish or that the pastor or priest did not meet the standard of belief and holy living expected of members of the movement. Such movements were under constant challenge as to whose ecclesiastical authority they recognized and to whom they were answerable. Most became independent churches in nations outside the sway of European national churches.

Fourth, every church discipline needs to create procedures for calling baptized persons to account for their behavior and sanctioning them in appropriate and effective ways. Pastors and priests, as well as boards of lay persons designated to uphold congregational discipline, seek means of confronting persons whose actions do not accord with Christian practice or morality as the church understands it, to call them back into the community with appropriate repentance and amends, or, in intractable cases, to expel them. Understandably, many disputes arise in such situations, particularly when sanctions are considered too harsh or ineffective. Moreover, churches may have to decide whether the scope of discipline extends only to behavior in the church or to members' lives in the wider community. They may have to determine whether to seek civil support from a local magistrate or to invoke civil laws that might affect the member's citizenship (in serious cases, such as sexual misconduct or financial malfeasance).

Many branches of Protestantism have become less stringent in examining members' lives than they were in founding generations. Whereas most Protestant denominations make provision for bringing formal charges against a church member and conducting a trial that might result in expulsion, such procedures are rarely invoked. Informal sanctions through which other members may convey disapproval or exclusion are not uncommon, however.

Discipline of Congregations

Every local church congregation must have structures for governing its own affairs. Protestant churches, grounded in teachings of “the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS,” commonly assume a significant role for LAITY. Although the scope of local control varies among denominations, governing bodies of congregations have some degree of authority in four basic areas.

First, they carry out functions related to the disciplines of church membership described earlier, such as electing persons into membership, affirming their confirmation, or stating expectations for participation and growth in Christian life. They examine church rolls, seek out inactive members, and authorize removal of persons who no longer desire membership.

Second, local church governing bodies create and manage forms of ministry and mission and provide the staff, volunteer or paid, to support those ministries. Oversight of personnel decisions and policies is usually the domain of lay committees in some form of consultation with the pastor or priest, who in many traditions is understood as head of staff or even chief executive officer. A lay committee, in many churches chaired by the priest or pastor, nominates persons to assume administration of programs and resources as volunteers, and provides training and support for those persons in their ministries.

Third, every local church congregation must manage its financial resources, raising the funds needed to operate and expending money in accord with the expectations and desires of the members. Although customs and standards for raising and handling money differ widely across Protestantism, each church also must account for the uses of its money. Regular audits, multiple signatures on checks, secure means of making bank deposits, and public financial statements are among the rules often stated in church law to prevent malfeasance and ensure trust among church members.

Fourth, most local church congregations also must manage tangible properties, such as land and buildings. Every church has a board or committee specifically charged with purchasing, maintaining, renovating, or expanding church facilities under the guidance of the church’s governing body. Church law normally is at pains to require accountable management of properties and sound legal practices, such as proper deeds and contracts.

Protestant churches vary in their understanding of the control of church property, however. In more connectional polities, all property is held by deed in trust for the denomination so that if a congregation becomes inactive, then its buildings revert to a denominational judicatory. The trust clause also prevents a congregation from voting to take its property and leave its denomination. Major renovations, expansions, or purchases must be approved by a denominational body. In less-connectional churches, local property remains in the hands of local trustees or governing boards. Whatever the polity, however, churches generally expect that their facilities will be used for PREACHING, teaching, or ministry in accord with their own doctrines and traditions. Churches with congregational polities are self-constituted as congregations. They normally write their own constitution and by-laws, create and elect their own officers and governing bodies, employ their own pastor and staff, and own their own property. They take full responsibility for the four areas of congregational discipline described earlier.

Churches with connectional polities normally devise a framework of congregational discipline for all the local churches of the denomination to follow. Although local practice may vary, of course, a common terminology along with common designation of governing bodies and assignment of powers and duties is established in the book of order or discipline. Church law mandates structures and procedures that establish a local church congregation as an organization within the framework of civil law, including election of officers and corporate ownership of property. In the United States, many congregations are registered with the state as not-for-profit corporations to protect individual officers from liability in civil suits and to limit property taxes.

Ministry

Protestant churches advocate the ministry of the whole people of God. They provide for lay participation and leadership in varied ministries, both local and denominational, and expect members to extend Christian witness and service into everyday life in their workplaces, homes, schools, civic involvement, commerce, and other activities. Most Protestant efforts to advance christian EDUCATION, social services, and MISSIONS have been organized and governed by associations composed of and largely led by lay persons (see MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS; VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES).

Protestantism has also expected that the whole people of God will be able to discern spiritual gifts of persons to be set apart for authorized or ordained offices in the church. For this discernment the churches turn to Scripture, church traditions, and current statements of qualifications and preparation affirmed in church law. Yet the nature and practice of ordained offices has been the source of sharp controversies and lasting divisions in Protestantism.

Three church offices to which the New Testament letters refer have provoked immense debate in Protestantism about the translation of their Greek names, not to mention their function. The Greek presbyteros has been variously translated into English as “presbyter,” “priest,” or “elder.” Each of these terms expresses authorization to guide and administer the church. Yet Protestants differ in their understanding of the office as lay or clergy. For the more presbyteral and congregational churches of Reformed traditions, the elder is an office in the local church to which lay persons are ordained. Elders constitute church governing bodies and participate in administration of the sacraments. The pastor is differentiated from these elders (“ruling elders” in the Presbyterian Church USA) with election by a presbytery to ordination for the Word and sacraments (“teaching elder” in the Presbyterian Church USA). For the more connectional and episcopal churches of Anglican (see ANGLICANISM) and Methodist traditions, the elder or priest is an office to which persons are ordained to serve as clergy, with specific and usually exclusive authorization to preach the Word, administer the sacraments, and guide the order and administration of the church.

The Greek diakonos has been translated as “deacon” or “diaconate” (see DEACONESS, DEACON). Extending the work of Stephen and others described in the New Testament, deacons are commonly expected to lead the service of the Christian community to those in need of help, especially the poor and sick, as well as to assist the presbyter, priest, or elders in worship and sacrament. In the more presbyteral and congregational churches of Reformed Protestantism, the diaconate is considered a lay office to which persons are ordained for service. Depending on the polity, deacons (usually organized as a group or board) may exercise significant authority in assisting pastoral offices, governing the congregation, and even calling or dismissing a pastor. In more connectional and episcopal churches, the diaconate has been a far less consistent office than the priesthood. In Anglican and Methodist traditions, ordination to deacon has been understood to be a step of preparation for ordination as elder or priest. Provision for the diaconate as a permanent clergy office is becoming more common, with many persons ordained as deacons to serve as educators, musicians, social service workers, or social action organizers.

Of the three church offices, the episkopos has led to perhaps the sharpest divisions among Protestant churches. Coming into English as bishop, overseer, or superintendent, the term has been understood as everything from a description of a pastoral function to a specific and permanent ordained office with a significant role in church governance (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY). For many Protestants, the episcopal function of oversight applies mainly to the pastor's duties. Many churches find support for this stance in New Testament descriptions of the episcopate, and a number of local church pastors have taken the title of "bishop" and sought ordination from their congregation to capture this comprehensive pastoral role.

Reformed Protestants typically absorb the oversight function into pastoral or supervisory offices, but do not adopt the title of bishop even for roles of regional or judicatory ministers overseeing the work of pastors and congregations. They argue that Protestantism arose partly in resistance to the hierarchical power of episcopal office to control the churches and to influence civil polity.

Still other Protestant churches, such as Lutheran (see LUTHERANISM) and Methodist bodies, use the title of bishop for offices of preaching and administration in a region or judicatory. They elect bishops, often for life, to ordain priests, pastors, or elders; to be a pastor to pastors (pastor pastorum), either to appoint or to oversee the call of pastors and priests to their congregations; and to encourage local churches to work together in connectional endeavors. To this understanding of the office, the Anglican communion of Protestantism adds liturgical functions such as the bishop's role in confirming new members into the church and a more symbolic place of bishop as head of the church in a diocese, ritualized by ordination into the episcopacy. The continuity of bishops with the episcopacy of the early church, termed the "apostolic succession," is a central historical and theological claim undergirding the authority of the office and legitimizing episcopal ordinations. Yet this, too, may be understood either literally as a tangible, continuous historical chain or figuratively as a succession to the roles and practices of apostolic office.

Protestant polities institute offices of ministry, including definitions of their scope and limitations of powers, their duties and responsibilities, and the standards of conduct expected of persons holding these offices. Polities also provide means of testing the call of persons to ordained ministries and define the steps by which persons may seek ordination. The twentieth century brought an increasing emphasis on formal education of clergy and other church leaders. In company with rising standards in parallel fields such as law, medicine, social work, and teaching, many churches have insisted on advanced preparation for ministry such as a professional master's degree (usually the Master of Divinity). This trend, too, has brought controversy among Protestants. For many churches, the test of call is seen in the fruits of the person's ministry as evidence of the Spirit. Education is considered secondary, irrelevant, or even deceitful if it leads a person to cease teaching the doctrines of the home church.

As educational standards have changed, so in general have expectations of personal conduct and emotional maturity. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the standards for ministerial conduct focused on avoidance of tobacco and alcohol and insistence on behavior governed by good manners and proper decorum. Late in the twentieth century, attention shifted, particularly in Western societies, to questions of SEXUALITY. By the 1990s, many Protestant churches had adopted statements of church law defining sexual harassment and abuse, child abuse, and sexual misconduct of clergy, along with procedures and remedies for addressing such behavior and its consequences. Psychological testing became a standard step in ordination processes, along with criminal background checks.

Governance of clergy matters, like the profession itself, has been assumed in many Protestant churches to be a male domain. Since the 1950s, however, several Protestant bodies, including the United Methodist Church, the Presbyterian Church USA, the EPISCOPAL CHURCH, the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST, and the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA, have provided for ordination of WOMEN to pastoral offices (see WOMEN CLERGY). The actual place of women in ministry continues to be shaped, whatever formal polity may say, by local church attitudes and acceptance by male clergy peers. Many Protestant churches, like Roman Catholicism and Orthodoxy, reject ordination of women based on interpretation of scripture and TRADITION.

Many churches have similarly been caught up in debates over the ordination of homosexual persons (see HOMOSEXUALITY). In some cases, churches have formally banned such persons from ordained ministry, but then have struggled to state in clear legal definitions exactly what behaviors they are excluding. A few Protestant churches, such as the United Church of Christ, have chosen to leave sexuality issues to the discernment of regular ordination processes, at least in principle accepting persons of whatever sexuality who demonstrate gifts for ministry.

Just as Protestant polities have provided for discipline of church members, including in worst cases their exclusion from the church, so polities include standards of discipline of clergy and procedures for their removal from ministry. Malfeasance, misconduct, ineffectiveness, or teachings inconsistent with the doctrines of a particular church, all may be grounds for discipline or removal, though the latter two are difficult to prove. Church law must define offenses carefully and set up fair procedures through which a person may be charged, examined, and disciplined with opportunity for self-defense, explanation, and growth in mutual understanding within the Christian community.

Organization for Mission

Protestantism has exhibited a strong missionary impulse throughout its history. Many Protestant churches themselves are the offspring of missions planted by Christians from another country or continent, and in turn, most sponsor mission work beyond their own land or region. Mission, like ministry, is a broadranging term that eludes definition. Certainly for Protestants, it has included not only preaching and teaching of Christian faith, but also education, health care, economic development, social justice, and advocacy for the powerless. In some cases, mission has stirred churches to political action (see POLITICS; POLITICAL PARTIES).

Church law and discipline organizes, authorizes, and controls mission work. In churches with congregational polity, authorization of mission may be a relatively simple matter of building consensus and support to undertake certain initiatives in ministry. Authorization may expand to include forms of cooperation with other congregations, sharing financial and human resources, building a school or health clinic together, or pooling money to support the salary of a missionary.

In churches with connectional polities, the governance of missions may be considerably more complex. A DENOMINATION may require a self-incorporated body to act as a board of trustees overseeing multiple properties or managing endowments and cash flows in the hundreds of millions of dollars. Denominations with a longer heritage of mission work will bear responsibility for many different institutions, such as schools, hospitals, or homes, that have been built up over generations and continue to seek effective ministry. Some denominations have hundreds or even thousands of persons commissioned to do mission work, laboring under the administration and oversight of persons authorized through church polity.

In general, the principles of polity governing church mission are designed to build and maintain trust: trust between the many church members who give time and money to mission efforts and the persons carrying out and administering that mission; trust between institutions and congregations in different parts of the world trying to support and learn from each other; and trust in a more fiduciary sense of properly managing, distributing, and preserving the considerable resources that the churches pour into mission work and have accumulated over time. To strengthen and enhance that trust, most churches authorize oversight bodies that include lay persons and clergy, to work with paid staff. These bodies may be regional, national, or international in scope. Churches mandate regular detailed reporting on mission activities to congregations and donors. Denominational mission is usually amenable and accountable to the highest governing body of the denomination, such as a general council, synod, assembly, or conference, which alone can authorize administrative units for mission, define their duties and powers, and structure procedures for their accountability.

Constituting Denominations

All Protestant churches, congregational or denominational, are self-constituted. Having broken away from the organic continuity of Roman Catholicism or Orthodoxy, they have had to constitute themselves as independent entities with a name and constitutive elements such as members, councils, synods, or conferences. Normally Protestant churches have a written constitution and procedural by-laws delineating their governing bodies, assigning, limiting, and balancing powers, and providing for amendment.

For Protestant churches organized as denominations, particularly the more connectional churches, their constitutions embody a covenant of association and cooperation expressing some degree of unity in organization and purpose. These constitutions define the bodies with powers to govern denominational ministry and mission and constitute those bodies through forms of representation and delegation. They balance the powers of various entities, such as regional or general assemblies and local churches, clergy, and laity, as well as administrative offices and the assemblies that create and authorize them.

Protestant constitutions provide for the basic legislative, executive, and judicial functions of government, but do so in various ways depending on tradition and social location. For example, in more democratic societies, the churches expect and depend on governance through assemblies composed of persons who bring the assumptions and experience of citizens accustomed to the work of town councils, school boards, and other manifestations of public life. Such assemblies may be open to all or may be representative, that is, democratic or republican in nature. Their powers may be balanced by the administrative or episcopal authority of bishops and judicatory officials, who may also be organized as a council or legislative house with certain oversight responsibilities.

To these dynamics must be added the influential model of business corporations, growing throughout the twentieth century, that advocates executive entre-preneurialism and control, with assemblies functioning more like stockholder meetings. This is manifested in Protestant congregations that understand the pastor to be chief executive officer, in some cases even holding church property as proprietor, as well as in Protestant churches that give executives or bishops the major responsibility in management and initiative of mission. The tension between this commercial corporate model and the democratic political model is as evident in the churches as it is in societies more generally.

Protestant churches have wrestled continually with constitutional issues of participation. In Western societies granting universal suffrage, for example, churches likewise have moved from male assemblies to governing bodies composed of both women and men. Language inclusive of both genders has replaced the male pronouns and terms of earlier generations in many books of church order. Yet, although women usually exhibit higher levels of participation in church activities, in many churches men continue to hold the majority of offices and to predominate in assemblies. Churches have also struggled over the balance of lay and clergy authority in denominational matters. Normally clergy have powers at least equal to those of laity, even though the latter vastly outnumber the former. This reflects traditional deference to clergy office, historically pertaining especially to matters of ordination and clergy discipline.

Protestant denominations vary in their constitutional self-definitions as entities. Some name the denomination itself as a corporate entity, thus making it capable of owning property and functioning as a unit in civil law. Others specifically disclaim the existence of the denomination as a corporate entity to avoid liability in civil actions. In these polities, all property and legal functions are the responsibility of regional or missional units, and the denomination exists as a common tradition only.

In summary, Protestant churches elude generalization in terms of denominational organization and in polity. Yet for the most part, their forms of governance address the five elements discussed here, which together constitute what is usually encompassed by the term “polity.” Any movement toward greater unity among Protestants, or among Protestants, Roman Catholics, Orthodox, or other branches of Christianity, will have to seek reconciliation of differences within these five elements.

References and Further Reading

- Braaten, Carl E., ed. The New Church Debate: Issues Facing American Lutheranism. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1983.
- Doe, Norman. Canon Law in the Anglican Communion: A Worldwide Perspective. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Frank, Thomas Edward. Polity, Practice, and the Mission of The United Methodist Church. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 2002.
- Gray, Joan S., and Joyce C. Tucker. Presbyterian Polity for Church Officers. 3rd ed. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1999.
- Johnson, Daniel L., and Charles Hambrick-Stowe, eds. Theology and Identity: Traditions, Movements, and Polity in the United Church of Christ. Cleveland, OH: United Church Press, 1990.
- Long, Edward Leroy, Jr. Patterns of Polity: Varieties of Church Governance. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim Press, 2001.
- Maring, Norman H., and Winthrop S. Hudson. A Baptist Manual of Polity and Practice. Rev. ed. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1991.
- Miller, Donald E. Reinventing American Protestantism: Christianity in the New Millennium. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.
- Schenck, Robert L. Constitutions of American Denominations. Buffalo, NY: William S. Hein, 1984.
- THOMAS EDWARD FRANK

POLYGAMY

See Plural Marriage

PORVOO

See Ecumenical Agreements

POSTCOLONIALISM

The era of European imperialism introduced significant populations around the world to Protestant theologies, institutions, and social networks, and the establishment of an extensive Protestant missionary infrastructure in colonial territories converted millions of people to Western forms of Christianity. Although many embraced the religion of the colonizers, others rebelled against the imposition of foreign religions. In the twentieth century, as independence movements forced imperial governments out of AFRICA, Asia, and the Americas, Protestants in former colonial territories rallied around postcolonial ideologies to build a viable Christianity that was free from the taint of imperial violence and that spoke to indigenous needs and historical experiences.

Postcolonial Theory and Practice

The historical notion of postcolonialism is rooted in the belief that societies victimized by colonialism—be it directly or indirectly political, economic, or cultural—actively challenge imperial paradigms of power. This is crucial, to be certain that hegemonic colonial power is not replicated informally after independence. Postcolonialism therefore seeks to engage the historical and contemporary experiences of colonial subjects to forge an understanding of the suffering wrought by imperialism, rather than provide a glorified, Eurocentric narrative of imperial history. Because of its diffuse and universal character, postcolonialism is understood and expressed differently throughout the formerly colonized world. For most postcolonial theorists, however, a difficult balance must be struck: Eurocentrism must be rejected, yet the native CULTURE should not be glorified unduly. Instead, a hybrid culture, one that recognizes the interdependence of both cultures in the postcolonial world, yet breaks down the unequal power structures developed through imperialism, is the goal. In the case of Protestantism, postcolonialism has been expressed communally and theologically by activists eager to maintain their faith but also conscious of its colonial, and often violent, experience in their societies.

Many Protestants in areas largely converted by missionaries in the colonial era have looked to reinterpret the BIBLE in ways that resonate with indigenous cultural values, and that divorce the text from the Eurocentrism expressed by many mission organizations. A move toward vernacular hermeneutics, in which translations of the Bible refer to and make comparisons between biblical practices and indigenous traditions, have been useful for maintaining interest in Christianity independent of its association with the colonial powers (see BIBLE TRANSLATION). In tandem with this are postcolonial readings of the Bible that seek out instances of imperial oppression in the text and then analyze them against modern lived experiences of the disenfranchised. In this way Protestants may find inspiration to resolve remnant problems of imperial decadence, patriarchal oppression, economic disparity, and other social ills attributed to the trauma of empire. At the same time, postcolonial theologians also interrogate biblical interpretations and hermeneutics that have been promoted by theologians from the imperial Metropole. By this act postcolonial readers of Christianity's most sacred text can challenge biblical justifications for imperialism, as well as wrestle with the violence of the Bible.

Theologians have not only theorized a postcolonial Protestantism. Communal practice has been integral in developing Christian hybridity, too. In many countries of postcolonial Africa, for example, there has been a strong emphasis on indigenous Protestant churches independent from the missions of the West. Often referred to as AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES (AIC), these institutions largely reject Western missionary attempts to expel native traditions. Instead they fuse indigenous ideas about the spirit world with literal interpretations of the Bible to create theologies that, for their adherents, feel more African and more historically in touch with the biblical era at the same time. AIC believers often see traditional African practices—such as FAITH HEALING, polygamy (see PLURAL MARRIAGE), and appeals to nature through PRAYER—legitimated in biblical events. AICs have been very successful in countries such as Kenya and NIGERIA, where Western missionaries worked to divorce people from their cultural heritage and embrace Westernization during the colonial period. Literal readings of the Bible appear to AIC believers to confirm cultural norms such as exorcisms and prayers for rain. Also, whereas Western missionaries usually rejected traditional African spirits as mere figments of the imagination, AIC Christians often interpret them as existing evil forces. In this way AIC believers often separate themselves from others in their societies, distinguishing themselves by clothing, diet, and even living in separate communities. Aladura Christians in Nigeria, Zionists in Southern Africa, and Kimbanguists in Zaire are but a few of the AICs that emerged as a postcolonial reaction against Western missionaries.

One of the most dramatic postcolonial movements of Protestantism to emerge was LIBERATION THEOLOGY. Working both independently and in concert with Catholics, Protestant liberation theologians in newly independent nations throughout the world sought to create theological frameworks that were historically localized and that emphasized social justice. Focusing on the commonplace and how the sacred and profane were experienced jointly in everyday life, liberation theologians read Christianity as a blueprint for social revolution. By interpreting the message of Jesus as a call for the deliverance of the poor and oppressed, they rejected ideas of spiritual transcendence and promoted ethnic and class equality within a contemporary social framework. Rejecting European Protestant ideals of INDIVIDUALISM and capitalism, liberation theologians emphasized wide-scale social movements and solidarity among oppressed peoples, merging a hermeneutical belief in the triumph of the subjugated with a strong commitment to overturning the remnants of the tyrannical colonial social order in favor of indigenous expressions of religion and AUTHORITY.

Liberation Theology and Postcolonialism

Liberation theology developed in LATIN AMERICA as a response to the desperate conditions of poverty spawned by the economic policies of the independent populist governments. As rural communities saw their economic power collapse in the face of rapid INDUSTRIALIZATION and import substitution programs, widespread social movements against the establishment emerged that called for more egalitarian distribution of wealth and power. In MEXICO, Argentina, BRAZIL, and other nations, Protestant and Catholic CLERGY and lay people established theologies glorifying the triumphant social justice message of Jesus, often merging ideologies of Marxism and social revolution formulated by theologians such as Uruguay's Emilio Castro of the Methodist Church and the Brazilian Ecumenical activist Rubem Alves. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s liberation theologians in Latin America such as Julio de Santa Ana and José Míguez Bonino inspired Protestants not only in their own societies, but throughout the world, to reject Christian leaders who claimed that earthly suffering was just. Instead, they and their followers sought to fight for social equality in the name of Christianity, and they hoped to complete the anti-imperial struggle by toppling corrupt postindependence governments.

Perhaps the most potent postcolonial Liberation Theology movement to come out of the Protestant tradition came from SOUTH AFRICA. The South African Contextual Theology Movement had a tremendous impact on world attitudes toward the racist legal system of Apartheid, and transformed theological ideals among millions of Christians. Protestants of many sects, as well as Roman Catholics, worked together to formulate Christian arguments against the Apartheid system. Inspired by the Anglican monk TREVOR HUDDLESTON'S Naught For Your Comfort (1955), white and black South Africans spent the 1960s and 1970s developing Christian-based strategies for overthrowing institutionalized racism. One of the most charismatic and effective Anglican voices against Apartheid belonged to archbishop DESMOND TUTU (1931–). As the first black dean of Johannesburg's Anglican Cathedral, Tutu worked with like-minded reformers to draw international attention to the plight of black South Africans, calling for an international boycott of South African coal in 1980, which resulted in the government seizing his passport. Tutu's message, however, could not be contained, and he won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1984.

Tutu's compatriot, the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in Zuid Afrika minister ALAN BOESAK, was also instrumental in the development of South African liberation theology. After years of pressure the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES (WARC) revoked the membership of Afrikaner churches supportive of Apartheid in 1982. Boesak had led the campaign against them, and developed a theology, adopted by the WARC, that declared the racism of Apartheid a Christian HERESY. For the next four years Boesak developed a new CONFESSION of faith for South Africans. Finally published in 1986, the Belhar Confession explicitly tied the message of Christian redemption to the unity and equality of all people regardless of race, declaring that "the credibility of [Christianity] is seriously affected and its beneficial work obstructed when it is proclaimed in a land which professes to be Christian, but in which the enforced separation of people on a racial basis promotes and perpetuates alienation, hatred and enmity.... Therefore, we reject any ideology which would legitimate forms of injustice and any doctrine which is unwilling to resist such an ideology in the name of the gospel.” With this confession Protestant South Africans were armed with a theological weapon with which to challenge the Apartheid machine.

A year earlier, in 1985, over thirty lay and ordained Protestants connected to the Institute for Contextual Theology in Johannesburg drafted another document that grounded the anti-Apartheid movement in Protestant resistance. The Kairos Document rejected Afrikaner claims that Apartheid was legitimated by the Bible, and also decried calls for nonviolent resistance by white South African churches living outside the context of the violent state oppression of black communities. Declaring the Kairos, or “moment of truth,” had arrived, the 156 signatories representing over twenty denominations called for the church to actively oppose the regime and not to interfere with civil disobedience against it. Declaring that “God sides with the oppressed,” the Kairos Document created a theology in which active participation of Christians in the anti-Apartheid movement was a religious duty. In this way, the church was to “move beyond a mere ‘ambulance ministry’ to a ministry of involvement and participation.”

With the end of Apartheid in 1994, the National Unity government led by Nelson Mandela established the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Convened in 1996 and directed by Desmond Tutu, contextual theologians worked with other activists to heal the deep wounds festering at every level of South African society by the Apartheid system. The Commission was shaped by a strong belief in the redemptive quality of repentance by perpetrators of human rights crimes committed, with the ultimate goal of widespread forgiveness among the repatriated victims, and social unification throughout South African society. From the outset, Tutu called on all South Africans—Christians, Jews, Muslims, Hindus, and others—to participate in the Commission, using the redemptive language of liberation theology and its emphasis on spiritual equality and social justice to motivate skeptics and supporters alike. As the Commission’s investigations and subsequent amnesties continued on into the new century, the impact of South African contextual theology garnered accolades around the world.

Another postcolonial liberation theology movement rooted in Protestant thought emerged among the Palestinians, the Sabeel Ecumenical Liberation Theology movement. Based in Jerusalem and founded in 1989, the Sabeel movement emerged from the Intifada against Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. By highlighting the life of Jesus under Roman occupation and the message of justice and reconciliation in the Christian message, the Sabeel movement combined grassroots action with a fiercely anti-imperialist message of nonviolent resistance to Israeli oppression of Palestinians. With members from the Palestinian Protestant, Catholic, Latin, and Orthodox Christian communities in its ranks, Sabeel’s liberation theology sought to challenge Christian Zionist rhetoric that the State of Israel was proof of the End Times and Second Coming of Jesus. In response, Sabeel’s theological understanding of Jesus promoted the ideals of equality and social justice inherent in Jesus’s message, but rejected the idea that Jesus could be defined as either Jew or Gentile. Instead Sabeel’s Christian vision stressed the importance of securing a peaceful resolution to the Israel-Palestine conflict that protected the human rights of all people in the Holy Land and that preached the Gospel of Jesus parallel to the Palestinian struggle.

Conclusion

The case of Sabeel is instructive for understanding the way postcolonial theory has influenced Protestant readings of the Bible. Colonial settler movements often used the story of the Exodus as inspiration for their political and economic displacement of indigenous populations. The Zionist movement is the most obvious case, but European expansion into the Americas, AUSTRALIA, and Southern Africa provide other examples of this rhetoric. However, for the Palestinians and other groups marginalized by such interpretations, the story of the Exodus can also be read from the perspective of the Egyptians, as Sabeel's founder, the Palestinian Episcopal Minister Naim Ateek, has argued. In this way the destruction of the Egyptians in the wake of the glory of the Israelites may serve as a reminder of the dispossession and violence of the colonial encounter. By reading the Bible as a story of imperial conquest and liberation simultaneously and employing postcolonial theories of power and hybridity, Protestants in the postcolonial world—both in the former empires and their metropolitan centers—may be able to reconcile their beliefs in a compassionate, redemptive deity, and their lived experience of colonial displacement and trauma, often justified by colonial theologians.

References and Further Reading

- Hastings, Adrian. The Church in Africa: 1450–1950. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994.
- Isichei, Elizabeth. A History of Christianity in Africa from Antiquity to the Present. London: SPCK, 1995.
- Smith, Christian. The Emergence of Liberation Theology: Social Religion and Social Movement Theory. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Sugirtharajah, R.S. The Bible and the Third World: Precolonial, Colonial and Postcolonial Encounters. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Young, Robert J.C. Postcolonialism: An Historical Introduction. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 2001.

NANCY L.STOCKDALE

POSTMODERNITY

The term postmodernity, and its related expression postmodernism, require as their definitional counterpoint the terms modernity and modernism, respectively. Before definitions are provided, however, it is necessary to make some important and salutary distinctions. Following Marshall Berman, we need to distinguish between modernity, modernization, and MODERNISM. Modernity is a periodization, referring generally to the time after the classical age, the time of industrialization, or the time after the demise of traditional societies (each of these is of course related in more or less complex ways to the others). Modernization, by contrast, refers to the process(es) whereby the transition is made from a premodern to a modern society or culture. Modernism, on the other hand, is the aesthetic ideology and its affiliated movements associated with the onset of modernity. Each of these terms has its postmodern counterpart. Thus postmodernity refers to the period after the age of the modern, postmodernism is the aesthetic ideology related to this newly emergent period, and the processes of modernization have in principle to be completed in order for postmodernity to emerge. Sometimes conflated with these is the term poststructuralism. Poststructuralism, however, usually designates a specifically philosophical position that transcends or negates its complement, structuralism (i.e., the theory whose basic principle, associated with the thought of Ferdinand de Saussure, Roman Jakobson, and Claude Lévi-Strauss, is that consciousness has a structure whose basic form is that of the code), so that poststructuralism is the theory that undermines or problematizes the notion that consciousness, and the production of meaning that constitutes its raison d'être, functions as a code or assemblage of codes. As such poststructuralism has nothing necessarily to do with postmodernism or postmodernity, though they are lumped together in many taxonomies of postmodernism, so that an exemplary poststructuralist thinker like Jacques Derrida is often (and sometimes misleadingly) called a postmodernist. (It should also be noted that poststructuralism, though it happens to refer to a grouping of mainly French thinkers, is in fact an American invention: the designation is not typically used in France, and even when it is, it is usually made clear that the term is borrowed from the United States.)

The term “modernism,” signifying an aesthetic movement, was first used by the Nicaraguan poet Rubén Darío, who referred in 1890 to a modernismo in a “declaration of cultural independence” from Spain (Anderson 1998:3). The term postmodernismo was first used in 1934 by the Spanish literary historian Frederico de Onís, who used it to refer to a conservative tendency within modernism itself, which favored irony and privileged textual detail, in contrast to an untramodernismo, which represented a radical tendency within modernism, which according to de Onís, quickly supplanted the ornamentalizing and ultimately trivial postmodernismo through the creation of a “rigorously contemporary poetry” (4).

It took another two decades for the term and its cognates to appear in anglophone circles. In 1954 the historian Arnold Toynbee published the eighth volume of his Study of History, in which he used the term the “post-modern age” to designate the period that began with the Franco-Prussian War (1870). Toynbee identified this age with the decline of the middle class and the concomitant rise of the proletariat, and also with the emergence outside the West of intellectual elites who would use resources afforded by modernity itself in order to challenge the West. Toynbee cited as examples of this challenge Meiji Japan, Bolshevik Russia, Turkey under Mustapha Kemal, and Maoist China (6).

Three years before the publication of Toynbee’s volume, in 1951, the American poet Charles Olson wrote to his friend and fellow poet Robert Creeley and declared that “the first half of the twentieth century [was] the marshalling yard on which the the modern was turned to what we have, the post-modern or post-West” (7). As Perry Anderson points out in his illuminating conspectus of the the notion of the postmodern (to which this article is much indebted), Olson’s “aesthetic theory was linked to a prophetic history, with an agenda allying poetic innovation with political revolution in the classic tradition of the avant-gardes of Europe” (12). Olson’s legacy, focused as it was on the need for a literature divested of its humanistic impulses, became dormant until the early 1970s. In the 1970s the notion of a postmodern resurfaced in the journal boundary 2 and in the writings of the literary theorist Ihab Hassan. The term now started to have the resonance currently associated with it, that is, a complex and heterogeneous amalgam containing a number of key indicators and themes: the critique of previous systems of rationality and especially of the project of the ENLIGHTENMENT, the possibility of a politics not constituted by liberal (and hence modern) notions of the political subject, and the emergence of radically new and different standpoints for the constitution of knowledges. The two most important theorists of these developments have been the late JeanFrançois Lyotard (1924–1998) and Fredric Jameson (1934–).

The Analysis of Postmodernity: Lyotard and Jameson

Lyotard's book The Postmodern Condition (originally published in 1979) described the postmodern not simply as an object of attention for literary theorists but as a problem posed for the legitimation of knowledge stemming from the collapse of the so-called "grand narratives" (MARXISM, Enlightenment rationality, Christianity, etc.). These "grand narratives," many embodying the myths that shaped modernity, and involving such notions as truth, reason, and progress have, in Lyotard's eyes, been displaced by a situation, typical of postindustrial societies, in which knowledge is no longer warranted by an overarching system of generally accepted norms and principles, but is instead validated in some way by a plethora of not always commensurable "language games" (a notion Lyotard borrowed from Ludwig Wittgenstein, 1889–1951). Truth is operationalized in this new epoch and reduced to "performativity" because language game is legitimated by its own "little narrative" and has no applicability outside the sphere of that particular little narrative. Lyotard also believes that postmodern social relations reflect this epochal shift: our interactions are now marked by contingency, temporal limits, and an essential revisability. Nothing in postmodernity possesses any finality, and all totalities and totalizations have effectively been discredited by the uncontainable heterogeneity of language games. The Postmodern Condition quickly acquired a notoriety out of all proportion to its actual intellectual merits. Many commentators, and later Lyotard himself, regarded it as a hodge-podge of ideas not very coherently put together. In fact, it was quickly pointed out that Lyotard had violated his own thesis of the demise of grand narratives by providing what looked suspiciously like a grand narrative (namely, the one regarding the emergence of the postmodern condition).

Fredric Jameson wrote the foreword to the English edition of The Postmodern Condition, and it is perhaps ironic that he should be a leading contemporary proponent of one of the grand narratives alleged by Lyotard to be discredited by postmodernity, namely, Marxism. Two essays in his collection The Cultural Turn (1998) are important for any understanding of Jameson's theses concerning postmodernity and postmodernism. "Postmodernism and Consumer Society" defines postmodernism as "a periodizing concept whose function is to correlate the emergence of new formal features in culture with the emergence of a new type of social life and a new economic order—what is often euphemistically called modernization, post-industrial or consumer society, the society of the media or the spectacle, or multinational capitalism" (Jameson 1998:3). Postmodernity on this Marxist account is thus the "cultural logic" of "late capitalism."

Jameson views the postmodern cultural logic as being marked by a number of distinctive features: pastiche replaces modernist parody, the subject of bourgeois individualism has died or else is now known never to have existed as the subject it is purported to be; nostalgia is its operative mode; reality collapses into images; and time is decomposed into a series of perpetual presents. The other essay from The Cultural Turn that is of interest to us, “Theories of the Post-modern,” identifies a number of positions that can be taken with regard to this new cultural logic. One, which generally welcomes the new term, can be identified with the work of Ihab Hassan, and celebrates postmodernism from an antimodernist standpoint (22); another position, which also uses the new term, apotheosizes modernism in order to displace an “unacceptable” postmodernism (the cultural conservative Hilton Kramer). Yet another, while using modernism to dethrone this unacceptable postmodernism, nevertheless does so from a generally left perspective (Jürgen Habermas, who also uses the new term). Jameson also identifies two other positions on postmodernism: one, that of Jean-François Lyotard, which sees postmodernism as an offshoot of high modernism (albeit with one key difference, namely, that for Lyotard, postmodernism does not succeed high modernism, but precedes a new and revitalized high modernism for which it is paving the way); the second, identified with the work of the Italian architectural historian Manfredo Tafuri, is anti-postmodernist without seeing anything of positive value in high modernism itself (on the contrary, for Tafuri, postmodernism simply reexpresses certain baneful tendencies already to be found in high modernism).

Jameson’s many writings on postmodernism analyze its many dimensions. As a cultural logic the postmodern subtends all forms of present-day cultural production—architecture, art, film and other visual media, literature, music, philosophy, politics, and religion. Each (and he has written illuminatingly on all of these) is seen by him as an amalgam of cultural symptoms, to be deciphered (“transcoded” is Jameson’s preferred term) by the appropriately deployed Marxist hermeneutical apparatus. The symptoms are historicized, a process that renders visible the sharpened or blunted political impulses contained within them. It is common in less well-informed circles to fault Jameson for being himself a postmodernist. This is simply not the case; if anything he is its most intractable critic: what he wants to do is present a phenomenology of it as a cultural object, to register the full range of its characters, and to provide a political critique of it. However, because he insists that thought be historicized, the very intellectual instruments used by him and others to analyze postmodernism are inflected by its widely ramifying cultural logic, and the thought that has postmodernism as its object, if properly constituted, must have a metatheory of this inflection. This gives Jameson’s critique of postmodernity a subtlety lacking in other similar critiques (for example, the trenchant critique provided by Terry Eagleton in his The Illusions of Postmodernism [1996]).

There are other accounts and critiques of postmodernity (David Harvey’s The Condition of Postmodernity [1990] being notable among these), but none has the quality of a definitive intellectual intervention that marks the work of Lyotard and Jameson. The fact of the matter is, the intellectual agendas and especially the theoretical armatures developed by Jameson have provided the terms of reference for much of the subsequent discussion of the postmodern and its appurtenances.

Theology and Postmodernity

Theologians have sought to respond to the intellectual agendas and conceptual frameworks devised by theorists of postmodernity. Two main strands of this theological response can be identified. One is affiliated with an appropriation of the writings of Derrida and his followers (but also of Martin Heidegger), and has two wings: (1) an atheological approach, exemplified by the work of Mark C. Taylor and others published primarily in Taylor's University of Chicago Press "Religion and Postmodernism" series; and (2) a resolutely theological approach, identified with such figures as Jean-Luc Marion, using the deconstruction of the Heideggerian-Derridean metaphysics of being to furnish a new framework that seeks to think "godhood" without recourse to the categories of being. The other main approach is the "radical orthodoxy" school of British theology, whose more prominent members include John Milbank, Catherine Pickstock, Graham Ward, Gerard Loughlin, and Phillip Blond. Several exponents of radical orthodoxy use the Heideggerian-Derridean critique of the metaphysics of being, but radical orthodoxy's paradigm relies on very much more than this critique (which it shares with those theologians influenced by Heidegger and Derrida such as Jean-Luc Marion). Radical orthodoxy also happens to have a wider-angled critique of the secular order; its exponents derive their philosophical inspiration not just from Heidegger, Derrida, and Emmanuel Levinas, but also Thomas Aquinas, Giambattista Vico, and Friedrich Jacobi, among others, and they also take their approach into other domains such as political theology and theological metaethics. Radical orthodoxy is also more concerned with the quest for a new basis for postsecular theological reason, a concern obviously not shared by the postmodern atheologians and one less explicitly evident in the thought of theologians whose focal point is (almost exclusively) the Heideggerian-Derridean critique of the metaphysics of being. It is perhaps too early to make more than a provisional assessment of the significance of the post-modern theologies and atheologies—a great deal will depend on the trajectory taken by postmodernity and the retrieval of those traditions, banished in the name of a "skeptical" modernity, it now makes possible. Postmodernity will not last for ever, and its successor dispensation will proffer other and alternative conditions for theological reflection. Postmodernity is closely (some would say exclusively) bound up with the character of the so-called advanced societies, and a great deal will hinge on the course taken by these societies and the relation they have to societies not currently functioning as vehicles of postmodernity. The societies outside the purview of the postmodern constitute postmodernity's "outside," and one senses that what comes after the postmodern will depend crucially on the transformations brought about by this ubiquitous "outside" and the images of thought generated by it and its as yet unknown sequelae. Another consideration in deciding what may come after postmodernity must be the propensity within the intellectual elites of advanced industrial societies to declare, as rapidly as possible, the supersession of a previous "post," so that one now hears declarations of the emergence of a "post-postmodernity." This haste is to be resisted: complex issues and powerfully entrenched practical and intellectual movements constitute the core of phenomena like modernity and postmodernity. The stakes in these issues must be ascertained, and the trajectories of these movements analyzed, before they can be consigned to the past of a present that seems to find its future in endless recyclings of the past and its images—a symptom of the postmodern that seemingly has pervaded the very attempts to reflect on it.

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Perry. The Origins of Postmodernity. London: Verso, 1998.
- Berman, Marshall. All That is Solid Melts into Air: The Experience of Modernity. London: Verso, 1993.
- Blond, Phillip, ed. Post-Secular Philosophy: Between Philosophy and Theology. London: Routledge, 1998.
- Eagleton, Terry. The Illusions of Postmodernism. Oxford: Basil Blackwell Publishers, 1996.
- Harvey, David. The Condition of Postmodernity: An Enquiry into the Origins of Cultural Change. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1990.
- Jameson, Fredric. Postmodernism, or, the Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism. Durham: Duke University Press, 1991.
- Jameson, Fredric. The Cultural Turn: Selected Writings on Postmodernism, 1983–1998. London: Verso, 1998.
- Liotard, Jean-François. The Postmodern Condition: A Report on Knowledge. Translated by Geoff Bennington and Brian Massumi. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1984.
- Milbank, John, Catherine Pickstock, and Graham Ward, eds. Radical Orthodoxy: A New Theology. London: Routledge, 1999.
- Sim, Stuart, ed. The Routledge Critical Dictionary of Postmodern Thought. London: Routledge, 1999.

KENNETH SURIN

PRAETORIUS, MICHAEL (1571–1621)

German composer. Praetorius was born at Creutzburg an der Werra, GERMANY, February 15, 1571, and died February 15, 1621 at Wolfenbüttel. He was among the most versatile musicians of his day and is also notable for his theoretical writings. He produced over one thousand settings of Protestant hymns, many of which were published in a nine-volume collection, Musae Sioniae, 1605 (four volumes of miscellaneous hymn settings, two volumes of liturgically ordered works for from two to seven voices, and three volumes of liturgically ordered simple four-part harmonizations).

A notable feature of his works is the inclusion of congregational settings within his polychoral motets. His most ambitious works based on Protestant chorales (published in Polyhymnia cauduceatrix et panegyrica [1619]) display a mature assimilation of Venetian polychoral techniques. Three collections from 1611 contain his settings of Latin LITURGY and include four substantial organ hymn settings that present each cantus firmus in the pedals. In his comprehensive work on church music, Syntagma musicum I (1615), he published a unique account by Johann Walter (a colleague of his father at the Latin school at Torgau) about Walter's collaboration with MARTIN LUTHER and Luther's proposed musical reforms. Syntagma musicum II (1619) (dealing with instruments) contains particularly valuable and detailed information on the organ. Praetorius's prefaces to his musical collections are particularly sensitive to the exigencies of church performance, and give detailed instructions on their practical adaptation to a variety of performing forces, as well as much information of liturgical interest.

See also Hymns and Hymnals

Further Reading and Listening

Blume, Friedrich. Protestant Church Music: A History. London: Gollancz, 1975.
McCreesh, Paul, conductor, and Gabrieli Consort. Michael Praetorius: Lutheran Mass for Christmas morning: as it might have been celebrated around 1620. Hamburg: Archiv Produktion, 1994 (439 250–2 Archiv Produktion).

WILLIAM FLYNN

PRAYER

Protestant practices of prayer vary from one tradition to another, but Protestants can agree that prayer is a means of communication with God. God is addressed in words spoken or sung by individuals or communities, and a word from God is awaited in silent meditation. Protestants might further agree that Christian prayer should be informed by the Word of God and that it is inspired by the Holy Spirit. For some Protestants, such as JOHN WESLEY (1703–1791), prayer has been considered a third means of GRACE after BAPTISM and the LORD'S SUPPER.

Protestants have believed that prayer should be addressed only to God, not to SAINTS or to Mary (see MARY, VIRGIN). Forms of invocation of the saints practiced in the Middle Ages were suppressed in the REFORMATION. Protestants have also emphasized the high priestly mediation of Christ ("our only mediator and advocate") before the throne of God, where he pleads the merits of his atoning sacrifice on behalf of his brothers and sisters, as in the Epistle to the Hebrews. More informal or pietistic prayer may be addressed to Jesus rather than to God the Father. Less frequently in Protestant practice, prayer may be addressed to the Holy Spirit, but the Holy Spirit is more usually understood to be the enabler of prayer, according to Romans 8:26–27. In the last third of the twentieth century, liberal Protestants have striven to find ways of making the names and images of God in prayer more GENDER-inclusive by exploring other names and images in the biblical record and liturgical tradition (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM).

Prayer may be done with others or alone. Prayer with others occurs in the CHURCH or liturgical assembly, in the family or household, or in prayer meetings. This article first treats prayer in public WORSHIP, then household prayer, and finally individual prayer.

Public Worship

Protestant public worship, like all Christian worship, includes such elements of prayer as adoration and praise, confession of SIN, intercession and supplication, and thanksgiving. Adoration and praise has been expressed in Protestant worship, especially in canticles and hymns sung by the congregation. A CONFESSION of sins became a part of Protestant worship by transforming the celebrant's preparatory prayers in the sacristy or at the foot of the ALTAR before the celebration of mass into a congregational act. Lutheran, Reformed, Anglican, and Methodist liturgies have included prayers of confession said by the congregation followed by an absolution or declaration of grace given by the minister. The lack of a practice of individual confession and sacramental absolution in Protestantism have raised these prayers of confession to a position of high regard in Protestant piety. Intercession and supplication achieved an important role in Protestant worship in the general pastoral prayers in which concerns for all human need were voiced by the preacher. The antecedent of the pastoral prayer is the intercessions offered from the pulpit in the medieval preaching office of Prone in conjunction with parish announcements. MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) revised the Great Litany, which is pure supplication, and it has had a place in Lutheran prayer and in the Anglican BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER through the translation of THOMAS CRANMER (1489–1556), archbishop of Canterbury (1534–1553). Thanksgiving for God's goodness has also had a place in Protestant prayer. Except for Lutherans, who focused on the Words of Institution as an act of consecration, Protestant Reformation celebrations of the Lord's Supper included new prayers of thanksgivings. There has been a prodigious production of new eucharistic prayers in the last third of the twentieth century in Episcopal, Lutheran, Presbyterian, and United Methodist worship books.

In addition to Sunday morning worship in word and sacrament, the church has had daily prayer services since the fourth century. In his German Mass and Order of Service (1526), Luther laid the groundwork for replacing the daily masses (unless there were communicants) with forms of morning and evening prayer based on the historic Roman and monastic prayer offices (Matins and Vespers). These services included psalms, an office hymn, Scripture readings, a gospel canticle (Benedictus or Te Deum at Matins, Magnificat or Nunc dimittis at Vespers), and various forms of prayer (collects, litanies, suffrages). Because PREACHING was included in all Lutheran public worship, the sermon eventually overshadowed the elements of praise and prayer that had characterized the traditional prayer offices. During the Age of ENLIGHTENMENT these daily prayer offices fell out of use. They were revived in the nineteenth century by Theodore Kliefoth (1818–1895) in northern GERMANY and WILHELM LÖHE (1808–1872) in southern Germany, especially for use in the DEACONESS mother houses. Their use in congregations has remained occasional (e.g., on retreats) or seasonal (e.g., during Advent and Lent) more than daily.

In the Edwardian ancestors of The Book of Common Prayer (1549 and 1552), Cranmer followed the Lutheran model of combining Matins and Lauds into one office of Morning Prayer and Vespers and Compline into one office of Evening Prayer. Cranmer provided a course of psalmody in which the entire psalter was recited in one month rather than choosing psalms appropriate to the time of the day. The old offices of Prime and Compline had included prayers of confession and absolution, and Cranmer prefixed Morning and Evening Prayer with a penitential rite, drawing inspiration from the Church Orders of Cologne and Strassburg prepared by MARTIN BUCER (1539, 1543). Over the course of four centuries many composers have provided fine musical settings of the psalms and canticles. Morning and Evening Prayer has served as the living heart of Anglican worship and devotion for four centuries.

The Anglican priest, JOHN WESLEY, expected his Methodist followers to attend worship in their parish church, their class meetings being supplementary to this (see METHODISM, METHODISM, ENGLAND). He provided an abridged form of the prayer offices in his Sunday Service (1784) for Methodists in America. In both America and Britain, Morning and Evening Prayer fell into disuse as a regular practice. The Methodist practice of spontaneous prayer in the class meetings was blended in America with the Puritan patterns of lay leadership in prayer, extempore prayer, and weekday prayer meetings. The prayer meetings were less formal than Sunday worship and were often layled. Methodists, like Episcopalians, preferred kneeling for prayer, but usually knelt facing the pew rather than the table or pulpit.

The major controversy over prayer in Protestantism has been between the use of written prayers and extempore prayer. Those traditions known as "FREE CHURCH" really mean free of the obligatory use of prayer books. Anabaptist communities in the sixteenth century practiced spontaneous prayer as well as periods of silent meditation (see ANABAPTISM). Anabaptist practice influenced both English Puritans (those within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND who sought a more thorough Reformation along Reformed lines) and Separatists who encountered Anabaptist practice in their expatriate communities in THE NETHERLANDS.

If the earlier Reformation traditions were content to have worship that did not conflict with Scripture as the "sole rule and norm" of faith and practice, the Puritans required worship and prayer that was completely biblical, although agreement on what the Bible required was not easy to achieve (see PURITANISM). Should the Lord's Prayer be recited as a text or does it serve as a model for prayer? Speaking in TONGUES (glossolalia) is clearly allowed in I Corinthians 14, but the Puritans were not interested in that practice. They were agreed, however, that decisions about worship and prayer should be made at the lowest ecclesiastical level, the congregation. This allowed prayers to be more relevant to local need than fixed forms in a prayer book, although printed prayers could be used if the congregation so decided. Because the real concerns of real people should be paramount in prayer, however, extempore prayer ("from the heart") was preferred to written prayers. In typical Puritan practice, following the "directions" given by the apostle in I Timothy 2:1, public worship began with thanksgiving and intercession led by the pastor, teacher, and others while all stood for prayer with the arms lifted above their heads in the manner enjoined in I Timothy 2:8. Prayer concerns could be written down on notes, but the prayers had to be extemporaneous. Until the eighteenth century not even the Lord's Prayer was recited in Puritan worship in Boston.

Puritan practice also influenced the Presbyterians (see PRESBYTERIANISM). In the Reformed tradition emanating from Geneva, prayers were read by the pastors from the pulpit with the people following the words in their hearts. The Presbyterian Westminster Directory of Public Worship (1645) prescribed an outline of the content of public prayer but not the exact wording. Because the Directory encouraged extempore rather than written prayers, public prayers came to reflect the personality and interests of the preacher and local interests.

In the Reformed/Presbyterian tradition, public praying was done by ministers. Puritans and Separatists not only permitted lay prophesying and praying, but encouraged it. BAPTISTS detested “hireling ministers,” although they had their nonstipendiary pastors. Puritans and Baptists also held Sunday night weekday prayer meetings that ministers did not always attend.

Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF) had no clergy at all. Contemporary reports from the seventeenth century indicate that Quaker meetings were anything but quiet. Quaker WOMEN were allowed to prophesy and pray in public meetings as well as men, and this often created a public furor. In Quaker worship set forms were entirely eschewed lest the Spirit be quenched; however, as Quaker worship quieted down in the eighteenth century, the discipline of not praying audibly without the “motion of the Spirit” was adopted by the Society of Friends. Quaker prayer, more than other forms of Protestant prayer, includes a silent waiting on God.

Emerging from the frontier revival tradition, and infused with the experience of African American worship, Pentecostal practice moved in the direction of ecstatic utterance rather than a silent waiting on God (see PENTECOSTALISM). Although prayer may be led by a minister, other worshipers freely enter into prayer as the Spirit gives them utterance, often in the ecstatic speech of glossolalia. In both African American and Pentecostal worship, worshipers feel free to voice their “Amens,” “Yes, Jesus,” “Praise the Lord,” “Halleluia,” and often accompany oral prayer with the physical prayer of raising one or both arms in the air. Prayer for healing with the laying on of hands is often a part of Pentecostal worship, but may also be witnessed in Anglican worship.

Household Devotions

Martin Luther provided a foundation for household prayer in his Small Catechism (1529). The appendix to the Catechism includes little morning and evening offices and meal graces (see CATECHISMS). In both his Little Prayer Book (Betbüchlein) of 1522 and in the Catechisms, Luther sets out the Lord’s Prayer as the model of all Christian praying as well as a text to be recited upon getting out of bed in the morning, at meals, and before retiring, along with the Apostles’ Creed in the morning and evening, and optionally a hymn based on the Ten Commandments in the morning. Luther himself provided simple morning and evening prayers in the Catechism and revised the monastic meal graces with their psalmody for use in the household. As hymnody developed for evangelical worship in the congregation, it was also brought into the home. Many hymns written during the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries were actually intended for use in households and were sung by families in their devotions before they were incorporated into liturgical services. One noteworthy example is “Now thank we all our God” by Martin Rinkhart (1586–1649), which has been called the Protestant Te Deum. The Reformed also cultivated household devotions, although the exact forms of prayer are unknown. Psalm singing was done in the household as in the church, often in more elaborate musical arrangements than those used in public worship.

Private Prayer

Anglican spirituality also assumes that private and corporate prayer need each other (see ANGLICANISM). The private devotions of Bishop LANCELOT ANDREWES (1555–1626) assumes that LITURGY shapes the prayer of the private closet. The masterpiece of the poet and country priest GEORGE HERBERT (1593–1633), The Temple, portrays the spiritual journey of the individual within sacred space from the “church porch” to the gates of heaven.

Edification literature has provided material for both household and individual devotions since the middle of the sixteenth century, but these books tended to loosen the ties between household prayer and the corporate prayer of the church by providing prayers for various life situations and spiritual conditions. Some of these prayer books became encyclopedic. One of the classic prayer book traditions that grew out of PIETISM is the Moravian Daily Texts, still used worldwide. Under the leadership of Count NIKOLAUS VON ZINZENDORF (1700–1760), Moravians developed a tradition of daily texts or “Watchwords” (Losungen) for each day of the year (see MORAVIAN CHURCH). Originally chosen by Zinzendorf, since 1788 the “watchwords” have been drawn by lot from a collection of several thousand suitable texts. In the twentieth century devotional booklets for use by families and individuals have been published in serial form in mass quantity. One successful example is The Upper Room, published every two months by the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH since 1935. Its format of a brief Scripture text, meditation, and brief prayer has served as a model for devotional booklets published by other denominations.

Finally, we not only have the teachings of great Protestant reformers and teachers on prayer, but a record of their personal prayers that shows the relationship between prayer and belief. Luther’s prayers express a simple trust in a loving heavenly Father, whereas JOHN CALVIN’S prayers display a regenerating moral energy in response to the will of a majestic God. Toward the end of the sixteenth century the mysticism represented by Bernard of Clairvaux and Johann Tauler was integrated with Lutheran thinking in Philip Nicolai’s Mirror of Joy (1598), JOHANN ARNDT’S True Christianity (1606–1609), JOHANN GERHARD’S Sacred Meditations (1606), and, in the eighteenth century, in the hymns and prayers of the Reformed poet Gerhard Tersteegen (1697–1769). A more rational relationship with God is evident in JOHN DONNE’S Devotions Upon Emergent Occasions (1624) and Lancelot Andrewes’s Private Devotions (published posthumously in 1675), whereas a spiritual self-discipline is found in the prayers in JOHN BUNYAN (1628–1688) and in WILLIAM LAW’S A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1729). A sturdy willingness to engage God in the concerns of life is evident in the prayers of SØREN KIERKEGAARD (1813–1855) and JOHN BAILLIE’S A Diary of Private Prayer (1949). Confidence in the power of prayer to change life and events was affirmed in their books on prayer by George A. Buttrick (1942) and Frank C. Laubach (1946).

See also Hymns and Hymnals

References and Further Reading

- Althaus, Paul. Forschung zur evangelischen Gebetsliteratur. Hildesheim, Germany: 1966.
- Buttrick, George A. Prayer. New York and Nashville, TN: Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1942.
- Gallen, John, ed. Christians at Prayer. Notre Dame, IN: UND Press, 1977.
- Heiler, Friedrich. Prayer: History and Psychology of Religion. Translated and edited by Samuel McComb. New York: Oxford University Press, 1932, 1958.
- Laubach, Frank C. Prayer. The Mightiest Force in the World. Westwood, NJ: Fleming Revell, 1946.
- Senn, Frank C., ed. Protestant Spiritual Traditions. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1986.
- White, James F. Protestant Worship: Traditions in Transition. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1989.

FRANK C.SENN

PREACHING

The Continental Reformation

Jesus came preaching the Gospel (Mark 1:14). Nothing is more characteristic of Protestantism that its strong emphasis upon preaching—the oral proclamation of the Good News. Though a quite diverse movement, one thing has united Protestantism through the ages—a conviction that Christ is vividly present in preaching. The Reformation did not make preaching an important aspect of Christian life—it already was. The contribution of the reformers was to champion two particular sorts of preaching: expository and catechetical. Although the preaching of sermons has been a distinctive means of Christian communication from the beginning of the church, the REFORMATION made preaching the theological foundation of the CHURCH, the human result of a God who speaks. Although reformer PHILIPP MELANCHTHON admitted that he was not much of a preacher himself, in the 1530 AUGSBURG CONFESSION (Art. 7) he defines the church for Lutherans as “the congregation of the saints in which the Gospel is rightly preached and the sacraments are rightly administered.” Shortly thereafter, JOHN CALVIN proclaimed in the INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION that “where the word is heard with reverence and the sacraments are not neglected there we discover... an appearance of the Church” (IV.1.10). These statements typify the Protestant inclination to make preaching a principal mark of the faithful church. Faith comes as an auditory phenomenon (MARTIN LUTHER loved to quote Romans 10:17). The church is dependent on the freedom of the Word that gives rise to the church and also is the church’s most severe critic. Thus Luther called the church building a Mundhaus (mouth-house).

A pastor is, for Luther, minister verbi divini (servant of the Word of God). For all of the reformers, preaching is the primary ministerial function. In his introduction to his 1526 German Mass, Luther described the round of services at Wittenberg. Three services were held every Sunday with sermons from the Epistles for the earliest service, from the Gospel at the main morning service, and from the Old Testament at Vespers. It was Luther's practice to preach through an entire book of the BIBLE in successive sermons, Sunday after Sunday. At the Monday and Tuesday services, the sermons were expositions on parts of the CATECHISM, the Decalogue, the Creed, the SACRAMENTS, or the Lord's Prayer. The morning midweek service on Wednesday contained a sermon always from the Gospel of Matthew. Thursday and Friday sermons were on the Epistles. At Vespers on Saturday, the Gospel of John was preached. Luther urged similar disciplines on those congregations that were under his influence.

Whereas medieval preachers tended to look for a fourfold meaning of scripture (the literal, allegorical, moral, and eschatological meanings), Luther (who had a doctorate in biblical interpretation) claimed to be bound only by the plain sense of the text and the text's disclosure of Christ. Lutheran sermons tended to see Christ at the heart of all scripture, looking for a christological meaning in almost every text. Theologically, every Lutheran sermon attempted to stress law and Gospel as the principal means of presenting the Gospel. Hearing the law is a prelude to reception of the Gospel word of GRACE and forgiveness, through the power of the Holy Spirit. The basic theological content of the Lutheran sermon is the forgiveness of sins because even the saved do not cease sinning; we are all simul Justus et Peccator.

Luther's preaching style tended to be expository, paraphrasing a biblical text, interspersed with commentary that included theological and moral observations. He shared his own personality in his preaching, often showing a quaint, mundane style that was lively and engaging. His sermons usually followed a predictable structure: a brief introduction and contextualization of the biblical text; an exposition of the text in which Luther expounded what he believed to be the "kernel" or "point," the Herzpunkt of the passage; and, finally, suggestions for putting the text into practice in daily life. While on exile in Wartburg Castle, Luther wrote his Postil Sermons to give Reformation preachers copious examples of biblically based preaching. He published the first of these postils, a collection of Advent and Christmas sermons, in 1522. The postils were quite influential for generations of Lutheran preachers. Approximately 2,000 of Luther's sermons were published, many in edited and condensed form.

The other key reformers were also committed preachers, although none equaled the style and power of Luther. Biblical exposition was the engine driving most Protestant preaching. HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, inspired by the example of Chrysostom, preached through the Gospel of Matthew, verse by verse, lectio continua, commenting on subjects as diverse as superstition, military service, clerical CELIBACY, and, of course, JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH. Zwingli's sermons tended to be dry and intellectual. It took HEINRICH BULLINGER, the successor of Zwingli in Zurich, just over fifteen years to preach through the entire Bible, verse by verse. JOHANNES OECOLAMPADIUS, also inspired by the Chrysostom, pioneered grammatical-historical exegesis, or explanation, abandoning the allegorical exegesis that had been so popular with medieval preachers. John Calvin preached daily and twice on Sundays, interpreting biblical texts extemporaneously, holding a Bible in his hand. Calvin's sermons often began with PRAYER, specifically a prayer for the inspiration of the Holy Spirit who makes the preacher's words the Word of God for the congregation, followed by a brief recapitulation of the previous sermon, then a consideration of the biblical text, followed by an application of the meaning of the text to the present context, then an exhortation for the congregation to obey the text, closing with a prayer that summarized the main points of the sermon. The sermons in Calvin's extant fourteen volumes of published sermons show Calvin to be a preacher with a deep knowledge of the Bible, particularly the nuances of the original biblical language, a clear communicator who eschews verbal ornamentation and who rarely illustrates a given point. Calvin's sermons today sound distant and abstract, though he was known as a comforting, pastoral preacher. MARTIN BUCER, although an equally committed expository preacher, was noted for his rambling, long-winded style.

Nearly all Protestant preachers saw the catechism as a valid basis for sermons, particularly sermons at weekday services that focused on the instruction of the LAITY. Johannes Zwick devised a series of catechetical sermons for children that cover a wide range of theological topics. In their interest in catechesis, they had medieval precedents, but their zeal to educate the laity in the most complex of DOCTRINES was one of their most notable contributions to the history of preaching—a zeal that does not seem to have continued in many contemporary Protestant congregations.

Protestant preachers in the hinterland were urged to use sermons that were written by the masters, to memorize them if they could and, if they could not, to read them aloud from the pulpit. Many volumes of sermons were printed throughout the Reformation. Among the most popular was a book of sermons for specific pastoral occasions written by Urbanus Rhegius of Augsburg. On many occasions, the scholarly leaders of the Reformation lamented the sorry state of preaching among their followers. Luther repeatedly stressed the need for educated preachers. Schools were founded to train Protestant clergy, but rarely did these schools specifically concern themselves with homiletical training. Zwingli organized regular meetings (Prophezei) for his fellow Protestant CLERGY in Zurich in which scripture was read and explained for the purpose of use in sermons. Most of the reformers seemed to assume that if a pastor mastered the art of biblical interpretation and theological exposition, then the ability to preach would naturally follow. Yet a Protestant, Andreas Gerhard Hyperius, published the first real textbook on homiletics in 1533. Impressed as they were with the general ignorance of the laity, early Protestant preachers tended to see a sermon primarily as an occasion to instruct and to correct rather than to convert or to inspire.

In the sixteenth century, it was not unusual for a sermon to last for as long as three hours. Luther was opposed to long sermons, saying that he was always concerned about the limitations of "little Hans and little Else." He pioneered in the art of simple, vernacular, direct discourse in preaching, enlivened with charming illustrations from daily life. Luther left us these directives for a good sermon:

First of all, a good preacher must be able to teach correctly and in an orderly manner. Second, he must have a good head. Third, he must be able to speak well. Fourth, he should have a good voice, and, fifth, a good memory. Sixth, he must know when to stop. Seventh, he must know his stuff and keep at it. Eighth, he must be willing to risk body and soul, property and honor. Ninth, he must let everyone vex and ridicule him.

Protestants tended to stress that "the preaching of the Word of God is the Word of God," an extremely high view of preaching indeed. Luther and Zwingli had quite different notions of just how preaching was the Word of God for the church, mainly having to do with their different doctrines of the Holy Spirit. Rejecting the spiritual enthusiasts (Schwärmer) who presumed that the Spirit was the immediate gift to each believer independent of the means of Word or Sacrament, Luther linked the Spirit to the Word. Zwingli rejected the Lutheran binding of Word and Spirit, insisting that preaching was a simple human witness to Christ that helped the believer to seek the true, inner Word of God that can be given only by the Spirit. Zwingli distinguished between the “external word of God” (i.e., human preaching) and the “internal word of God” (i.e., self-communication of the Holy Spirit).

Calvin appeared to take a somewhat mediating position between Luther and Zwingli on the issue of preaching as the Word of God. Calvin taught that although preachers are human, God graciously elects to use preaching, through God’s gift of the Holy Spirit, to address congregations (Institutes 4.1.5). Through the Holy Spirit, God’s Word accomplishes what God’s word promises, effecting that which it proclaims. Preaching empowered by the Holy Spirit, admitted Calvin, is a double-edged sword, provoking among hearers both acceptance and rejection, according to God’s election. Through preaching, Christ is present in and rules over the church. Preachers succeed at communicating the Word of God to their listeners only because God graciously wills that God’s Word be spoken here, now, through them.

Whereas Luther was intent on restoring the sermon to its rightful, historic position within the Sunday mass (a position that had been lost in the Middle Ages), Zwingli and Calvin tended toward a separation of preaching from the mass in their adoption of a simple preaching service (Pronaus). Luther’s purified mass embodied his conviction that Word and Sacrament are inseparable means of God’s self-communication, although later Protestants have tended, in practice if not in theology, to exalt the sermon as the supreme means of grace.

Zwingli’s radical views (compared with those of Luther or Calvin) did not go far enough, said the Anabaptists of the so-called Radical Reformation. The Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) tended to be as suspicious of preaching as a corrupted human practice, as they were suspicious of the mass. Their worship stressed informal teaching, prayer, and mutual exhortation rather than contrived sermons, with many worshippers taking an active role in impromptu speaking. The Anabaptists considered careful composition of new sermons a sign of sinful pride. Their proclamation consisted of the public reading of sermons from the past combined with extemporaneous exhortation to the congregation by any member who was so moved by the Holy Spirit.

Europe

Although the centrality of expository and catechetical preaching was slow to impact the English Reformation, when the power of the crown got behind the Reformation during the reign of Edward VII, preaching became a principal means of bringing the English into the Protestant realm of thought. Archbishop THOMAS CRANMER’S The Book of Homilies, a collection of elegantly stated topical sermons, were to be read to their congregations by less well-trained clergy. The Baroque period gave rise to some distinctively English contributions to homiletics. LANCELOT ANDREWES and JOHN DONNE became the ecclesiastical counterparts to Shakespeare in their masterful literary sermons that were indebted to the classical rhetorical tradition.

In Germany, FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER'S sermons attempted to counter the rationalism and skepticism of an age in which DEISM was on the rise. PIETISM, of the sort that influenced Schleiermacher, took Protestant preaching away from its historical concerns with doctrinal and biblical exposition, focusing pietistic preaching on inward religious experience. This development ushered in a great revival in England with the preaching of JOHN WESLEY and in the North American colonies with the preaching of GEORGE WHITEFIELD. On Whitefield's 1739 trip to America, his dramatic, extemporaneous preaching fanned into flame the Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS). Along with Puritans (see PURITANISM) like JONATHAN EDWARDS, whose preaching in Northampton, Massachusetts elicited "Surprising Conversions," Whitefield preached a distinctly American mix of pietism and CALVINISM that stressed Christianity as an experiential faith.

Nineteenth-century EVANGELICALISM tended to be centered on proclamations that linked the inner CONVERSION of the individual believer with the conversion of society. Scotland's THOMAS CHALMERS not only established a church in the slums of Glasgow, but also preached through the Gospel of John while organizing social work among the poor of the city. CHARLES HADDON SPURGEON spoke directly to the common people, stressing God's power to transform individual lives. One of the nineteenth-century's greatest preachers, Spurgeon was a careful biblical preacher who, like most of that century's preachers, generally ignored the troubling questions being raised by the fledgling field of historical-critical biblical study (see HIGHER CRITICISM).

North America

Evangelicalism in America changed forever the nature of Protestant preaching. CHARLES G. FINNEY (1792–1875) was full of evangelistic zeal for the religious needs of a growing nation. Finney was impatient with the historic Protestant concerns for both expository and catechetical preaching, finding such preaching ill-suited to his great invention—the frontier REVIVAL. Among his innovations were the anxious bench, the inquiry room, and the protracted meeting. Finney preached dramatic, personal conversion mixed with calls for the abolition of SLAVERY and the practice of TEMPERANCE, that is, a mix of personal and social transformation that became typical of American Protestant preaching well in to the twentieth century. Finney's stirring call for conversion undermined the earlier Calvinism of preachers like Whitefield. In planning a protracted meeting, in using an array of means to beckon sinners to repentance and conversion, Finney's "new measures for revivals" side-stepped Calvinistic notions of double PREDESTINATION in a new stress on SALVATION as dependent on the decision of the repentant sinner rather than the eternal decree of a God who predestines some to salvation and some to damnation. Finney's sermons were carefully reasoned arguments in which the Bible was presented as a sort of legal contract where God clearly set out what was required for salvation and what was expected of humanity. The preacher, in Finney's sermons, was a lawyer persuading a guilty client to confess and thus to be vindicated.

DWIGHT L. MOODY (1837–1899) and BILLY SUNDAY (1862–1935), lay heirs of Finney, perfected the citywide revival meeting and emotional, transformative preaching that tended to take one biblical text and use it for the purpose of emotional conviction of the listeners. Moody sounded like a businessman making a sales pitch, keeping things short, simple, and interspersed with sentimental, homely anecdotes. Moody presented a good product to a self-interested customer. The goal of his preaching was to “get the customer to sign on the dotted line”—a small card given to those who wished to make personal commitments to Christ. Potentially divisive doctrinal issues like the sacraments or predestination were avoided rather than expounded on by evangelists like Moody. The Gospel message tended to be limited to a word that causes dramatic change in the listeners. Ex-baseball player Billy Sunday was America’s first Protestant evangelist celebrity. He made preaching into mass entertainment, a style that was to be developed in later twentieth-century television preachers.

Preachers in predominately African-American churches, overwhelmingly Protestant in their traditions, tended to be heavily influenced by the fervent preaching of the Great Awakening, when great numbers of African-American slaves were converted to the religion of their white masters (see AFRICAN AMERICAN PROTESTANTISM). The chanted sermon, a distinctively African-American style of preaching, has its roots in the Second Great Awakening. A number of scholars have also pointed to African musical and speech pattern elements, the dialogical, responsive relationship between preacher and congregation, and the “hum” in African-American homiletical styles as distinctly African-American contributions to the practice of preaching that persist into the present. Theologically, African-American preachers participated in the great theological movements of American Protestantism, while also stressing themes of exodus and deliverance, hope, and redemptive suffering, thus contextualizing their sermons to the particular challenges of being black in America (see BLACK THEOLOGY).

In the 1960s, many Americans who had known nothing of the vital African-American preaching tradition were introduced to it through the preaching of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. in his “I Have a Dream” speech at the March on Washington (August 1963) and heard in that speech a call to become a more righteous nation.

By the beginning of the twentieth century, HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK led a wing of American Protestantism into liberalism (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). Fosdick’s radio sermons were immensely popular. His straightforward language, everyday life illustrations, and unchecked optimism became characteristics of what could be called the “American school” of preaching that dominated mainline Protestant preaching until the later half of the century. In an a July 1928 article in Harper’s Magazine titled “What Is the Matter With Preaching?,” Fosdick charged that too much preaching (and by preaching he meant Protestant preaching) had lost touch with the real concerns of real people. Fosdick championed what he called “life-situation” or “problem-centered” preaching, in which every sermon began not with a biblical text, but rather with some current human dilemma or concern, then moved toward an engaging address of that concern based on both biblical and secular materials. Whereas the Protestant Evangelicals and fundamentalists tended to see the modern world, with its domination by the thought of science, as a threat and regularly preached against it, Fosdick sought conciliatory accommodation with modernity in his sermons, sermons that tended to quote from learned contemporary secular authorities on various matters far more than citing Scripture.

The Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) laid great emphasis upon preaching in the context of the mass, thus leading to a renewal of preaching in Catholicism and blurring one of the characteristics that Protestants had thought of as distinctively their own (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS TO). Vatican II led to a widespread ecumenical rediscovery of the centrality of preaching, particularly biblically based preaching, that enervated many Protestant preachers and congregations. Many Protestant preachers discovered the lectionary as a resource for preaching after the Vatican II revision of the Catholic lectionary. Numerous preaching resources, interpretative materials keyed to the lectionary, were published. There were now more biblical preaching aids available to Protestant and Catholic preachers than at any time in the history of the church.

Contemporary Challenges

Protestant preaching at the beginning of the twenty-first century is building on its vital past and is continuing to wrestle with some of its historic challenges. Much of Protestantism, particularly that with its roots in reformers such as Calvin and Zwingli, continues to struggle with the severance of Word from Sacrament. Perhaps the continental reformers never intended to make BAPTISM and the Eucharist (LORD'S SUPPER) subservient to preaching, but that was the practical result of their reformation of Christian worship. Protestant Pietists and Evangelicals tended to stress personal experience of the Gospel through preaching, prayer, and personal devotional exercises as more important than acts of public, corporate worship. Finney advised his crusade planners to avoid potentially divisive and unproductive liturgical and doctrinal issues and to concentrate exclusively on the sermon and its response. ENLIGHTENMENT thought elevated words over symbols. For all of these reasons and others, Protestantism became noted for its elevation of the sermon as the supreme act of worship. Such elevation is biblically, as well as historically, theologically, and anthropologically, indefensible. There is a growing ecumenical consensus that the Eucharist is the normative shape for Sunday morning worship; word and table belong together. As the sermon is the preached Word, the Eucharist is the enacted Word. The revelation of God is not limited to the sermon or even to the reading of Scripture. Therefore, for many Protestant congregations, the restoration of a proper linkage between Word and sacrament is a pressing need.

Protestant preachers, from the beginning, offered commentary on extra-ecclesial events. Luther developed a theology of "two kingdoms," the one of God and the other of humanity, each with separate, Godordained responsibilities. Yet he did not shrink from offering strong words (and, alas, often terribly misguided advice) to the secular authorities on how to manage their side of the equation. Reformers like Zwingli and Calvin saw themselves as having Godgiven responsibilities for the care and maintenance of civil order through their preaching. English preachers like Cranmer and Donne thought it their duty to provide theological support for the authority of the crown. The Great Awakenings, as well as the frontier revivals in America, unleashed a great wave of social reform among Protestant preachers in such national political issues as slavery, temperance, immigration, and organized labor. Finney seamlessly interwove concern for the salvation of souls with radical social reform. In the twentieth century, great preachers like Fosdick and REINHOLD and H.RICHARD NIEBUHR were also political activists. Thus the joint vocation of preacher and prophet is a time-honored Protestant tradition. A few generations ago, politically charged preaching was the province of more liberal Protestant preachers, who saw themselves as heirs of WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH and Reinhold Niebuhr. They saw themselves as continuing the project of christianizing America, applying Christian judgments to social issues, usually from the political left. Today, many of the most politicized of Protestant clergy seem to be political conservatives, Christians on the political right.

Although African-American preachers continue to exercise the African-American church's historic office of the prophetic preacher that was so well embodied in such preachers as Martin Luther King, Jr., or the Harlem Congressman and pastor Adam Clayton Powell, so-called "prophetic preaching" seems to be on the wane among Protestants. Perhaps the issues that ought to be addressed seem less clear. Perhaps preachers feel that parochial congregational concerns are more pressing on their homiletical attention than larger political and social matters. Perhaps many Protestants have lost that old Protestant optimism that America is a basically Christian country whose preachers have both the vocation and the means to make it even more Christian.

Protestants also placed WOMEN in the pulpit. Although women sometimes preached among the Methodists, and women played a large role in some Pentecostal churches in the early part of the last century, women began to be ordained in large numbers by Protestant churches only in the last quarter of the twentieth century (see WOMEN CLERGY). The presence of women in the pulpit is itself a prophetic witness against conventional social arrangements, as well as against the infidelity of the church itself in not recognizing the spiritual gifts of women. Various theologies of liberation, a Catholic gift to some Protestant theologians, and WOMANIST and FEMINIST THEOLOGIES, would-be successors to the prophetic tradition, appear to have failed to capture the imagination of Protestant preachers and their congregations. The challenge for any prophetic preacher is to have not only the sense of pastoral authority and the God-given obligation to speak out on controversial issues (commodities that seem in short supply among many Protestant pastors today), but also the challenge of speaking a peculiarly, specifically Christian word to controversial social and political issues. Protestant theology today is not known for its self-confidence and coherence, or for its energy and zeal, so perhaps a renewal of Protestant prophetic preaching awaits a renewal of Protestant theology. Or perhaps Protestant theology languishes because it awaits a revival of Protestant proclamation. Historically, in the story of Protestant Christianity, theology and proclamation ascend on mutually rising tides.

The various Awakenings that so determined American religious life were distinctly Protestant phenomena. They ensured that an evangelical, missionary approach to preaching would typify the American homiletics. The purpose of preaching is more than to edify believers, to nurture those already within the fold; it is also to reach out, to convict, and to win unbelievers to the Gospel. Preachers like Finney, Sunday, and Moody pioneered preaching with this dominating evangelistic intent; BILLY GRAHAM perfected it for the twentieth century. Graham's first big evangelistic "crusade" was in Los Angeles in 1949. Electronic amplification meant that his voice could easily accommodate crowds of more than 100,000. His “Hour of Decision” radio ministry demonstrated the adaptability of a simple, direct evangelistic appeal. Through his preaching, well over one million people were said to have made a “decision for Christ.” Most of today’s “televangelists” owe their ministries to Graham’s half-century of much-praised preaching (see TELEVANGELISM; MASS MEDIA). His simple, oft-repeated message, designed to culminate in a decision by the hearer to be converted to the Gospel, became the dominant form for Protestant preaching in the more conservative and evangelical churches.

Protestant preaching is biblically based preaching. Although Protestantism was in great part a rediscovery of the centrality and freedom of Scripture for the church and against the church, Protestant preaching has also been a long struggle over just how the preaching is to be biblical. Is “biblical preaching” limited to verse-by-verse exposition of Scripture—a rather wooden form of preaching that does not seem congruent with the rather dramatic, narrative, literary form of Scripture itself? Or does biblical preaching mean that the sermon’s message, shape, form, and intention be congruent with the message, shape, form, and intention of Scripture? In the late twentieth century, Protestant preachers like Fred Craddock and Eugene Lowry rediscovered the essentially narrative shape and purpose of Scripture, the predominance of narrative over abstract propositions in the way that the Bible presents the truth of the Gospel. This rediscovery, embraced by many preachers in the mainline, more liberal Protestant denominations, called into question some historic Protestant methods of proclamation. Rather than being the explication of a set of abstract ideas and principles with an exhortation to live better lives, preaching, among the practitioners of narrative preaching, was seen as a story, a movement of a drama through time, something that is experienced rather than explained. Inductive preaching is a mode of proclamation linked with narrative preaching. Inductive preachers stress that a sermon is not only what the preacher is saying, but also what and how the listeners are hearing. A sermon consists not simply in the correct assertion of right thoughts, but also in the listener’s faithful embrace of the Christian life. Is narrative preaching just another form of the old Protestant pietistic concern with the individual’s inner life, a forsaking of the historic Protestant concern with doctrine, theology, and faithful thinking, or does it represent a more creative, more truly biblical way of thinking? At present there seems to be some critical questioning of the enthusiasm for narrative and inductive preaching that perhaps signals a return to historic Protestant concerns about the theological content of preaching, a realization that faithful biblical preaching requires a mix of interpretive and homiletical strategies that are as rich as the mix of communicative forms with the Bible itself.

Fosdick once spoke of preaching as “counseling on a group scale.” His therapeutic approach to preaching fit well with the new twentieth-century American orthodoxy: psychology. Many Protestant preachers, building on their pietistic background, refashioned Christian proclamation into a form of pastoral care. Preaching became a means whereby people received helpful psychological advice, personal care, and support. NORMAN VINCENT PEALE’S “power of positive thinking” was embraced by millions as a creative, caring approach to contemporary human dilemmas, but was condemned by others as mere popular psychological platitudes with only a thin Christian veneer. California pastor Robert Schuller, although nurtured in the conservative Reformed tradition, packaged his preaching into a television format designed for maximum appeal to, as he once said, “the unchurched who...are not at all prepared to listen to someone with God talk,” preachers who are obsessed with sin and guilt delivered in “scolding sermons from angry pulpits.” Television preachers like Schuller enthusiastically embraced technology, making their sermons a mirror of American cultural values. They have frequently argued that television is a neutral medium, that the medium does not force an alteration of the message, and that Jesus would have undoubtedly used television rather than the pulpit had it been available to him. Yet their sermons tend to be more influenced by the communicative techniques and the mass entertainment values of television than they may know. In their preaching, the religion of the self-sacrificial, suffering love of the cross tends to be transformed into just another sensible, practical strategy for personal success. Although Schuller’s messages (he refuses to use the word “sermon” to describe his preaching) are seen on television by millions, perhaps more listeners than to any other preacher in history, his message seems to be mostly about mental health and self-esteem and only incidentally about the Gospel of Jesus Christ—a perfect theological justification for a North American culture of abundance.

Luther’s focus on reaching the common people through simple speech, along with Finney’s conviction that acceptance of the Gospel is the result of well-planned homiletical strategies, appear to have produced theologically questionable fruits. The result has been a homiletic that elevates a concern for the feelings in and response of the listener over concerns about the theological and biblical content of the sermon, combined with a focus on the presentation of the messenger rather than the divine source of the message. As contemporary Protestant preachers attempt to be faithful to the evangelical thrust of the Gospel all around the world, as they attempt to speak a Word that can be accepted by those who have not yet heard, they will continue to struggle with issues of biblical fidelity. Graham’s evangelistic preaching for decision, and Schuller’s preaching as entertainment meant to help people with their problems, provide the antecedents for much of the preaching in the so-called “MEGA-CHURCHES” that were the late twentieth century’s most dramatic contribution to Protestant ECCLESIOLOGY. In these churches, vast congregations gather to hear a Gospel proclaimed unashamedly in a decidedly contemporary, secularized idiom, often augmented by slick technological sounds and images. The traditional vocabulary of Christianity, along with the historic images of the faith like the cross and sacraments, are downplayed or even ignored by many mega-church preachers. Whereas most of these preachers think of themselves as within the evangelical tradition, their preaching sometimes seems more indebted to the “therapeutic life-situation” preaching of the liberal Fosdick than to the “come down to the altar and be saved” EVANGELISM of Graham. Cut off from the well-springs of the liturgy of the church, devoid of orthodox Christian vocabulary, and without explicit ties to creed, denominational tradition, or sustained, extensive dialogue with Scripture—traditional Protestant means of keeping a sermon grounded in the historic Christian faith—these preachers face a great challenge. When does their preaching drift from proclamation of the Gospel into pop-psychological therapy or right-wing political advocacy? How does a preacher utilize the media of the consumer culture without having his or her message tainted or irrevocably diverted by those media? When the listener’s alleged ability or inability to accept the message becomes the criterion for what is said in a sermon, Protestant preachers are right to be troubled by the possibility that they may have jettisoned their historic homiletical birthright for that which is merely therapeutic, merely moral, or merely entertaining—a Word that cannot be heard as well elsewhere by more congenial means than a sermon.

These challenges and others will continue to perplex the homiletical tradition known as Protestant. At this juncture in the history of the Reformation, it is not known whether Protestantism will continue as a set of distinct homiletical practices or whether it shall eventually come full circle and merge into some new assimilation of the Catholic tradition. Yet the experience of Protestant preaching affirms that the Word of God is infinitely resourceful, indomitable, and a fire inextinguishable, that this Word of God is sharper than a double-edged sword, and that the church, reformed and ever reforming, is bound to be the recipient of even greater Gospel-induced reformations. Although empires wax and wane, and all of our human aspirations come to dust, the Word of the Lord is forever.

References and Further Reading

- Crocker, Lionel. Harry Emerson Fosdick's Art of Preaching; An Anthology. Springfield, IL: Thomas, 1971.
- Davies, Horton. Worship and Theology in England from Cranmer to Hooper, 1534–1603. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1970.
- Fant, Clyde F. Twenty Centuries of Great Preaching. 13 vols. Waco, TX: Word Books, 1971.
- Hunter, Edwina, and David Farmer. And Blessed Is She: Sermons by Women. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1994.
- Leith, John H. “Calvin’s Doctrine of the Proclamation of the Word and Its Significance for Today.” In John Calvin and the Church: A Prism of Reform. Edited by Timothy George. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1990. 206–229.
- Lischer, Richard. The Company of Preachers: Wisdom on Preaching, Augustine to the Present. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2002.
- . The Preacher King: Martin Luther King Jr. and the Word that Moved America, New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- McNeill, John T., ed. John Calvin. Institutes of the Christian Religion. Translated by Ford Lewis Battles. 2 vols. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960.
- Meuser, Fred W. Luther the Preacher. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1983.
- Miller, R.M. Harry Emerson Fosdick: Preacher, Pastor, Prophet. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Old, Hughes Oliphant, The Reading and Preaching of the Scriptures in the Worship of the Christian Church: Vol 4. The Age of the Reformation. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2002.
- Parker, T.H.L. Calvin's Preaching. Edinburgh, UK: T. & T. Clark, 1992.
- Willimon, William H. Pastor: The Theology and Practice of Ordained Leadership. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 2002.
- Willimon, William H., and R.Lischer, eds. Concise Encyclopedia of Preaching. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1995.

WILLIAM H. WILLIMON

PREDESTINATION

The word predestination comes from the Latin “praedestinatio,” meaning “a determining before-hand.” Theologically the term primarily refers to God’s ELECTION or choice of those who will receive SALVATION, although it has also been used for aspects of providence. “Single” predestination applies the word only to God’s gracious choice of those who will be saved, attributing reprobation to causes in the damned themselves. “Double” predestination refers to God’s free choice to save some and God’s free choice to damn others. To some, predestination is based on God’s foreknowledge of people’s merit or faith, whereas to others predestination is a choice solely within God’s will.

The doctrine of predestination has been a subject of contention throughout the history of the church, and particularly within Protestantism. Churches of the Reformed tradition are known for concern with this DOCTRINE more than any other.

Pre-Reformation

The Greek verb “προορίζω”, meaning “to decide upon beforehand” or “to predetermine,” appears in the New Testament, particularly in Romans 8:29–30, and Ephesians 1:5 and 11. This was translated in the Vulgate as “praedestinare” and into English by the verb “to predestine.” These texts present an apparent conflict with passages like I Timothy 2:4, which proclaim God’s desire that all be saved.

In the early Church predestination was interpreted as God’s foreknowledge of people’s good works. The earliest exception was the fourth-century theologian Athanasius. In his “Second Oration against the Arians,” Athanasius supported his argument for the eternal divinity of the Word with Paul’s claim that those who will be saved are predestined in Christ and by Christ.

More influentially, in the fifth century, Augustine made predestination the defense of the primacy of God’s GRACE in salvation. The Pelagians insisted that people were able to obey God and live holy lives. Augustine believed that this made salvation depend on human works. In Augustine’s understanding, humanity is weakened by SIN, unable to seek salvation or persevere in holiness without God’s gracious intervention. Predestination is God’s free gracious choice to save some, but not others, from the mass of guilty humanity. All are guilty, so condemnation of the nonelect is just.

These views were immediately controversial and rarely fully accepted. However, Augustine’s general influence and clarity of argument ensured that these views were never fully abandoned. “Semipelagians” in European monastic circles soon argued that neither Pelagian reliance on works nor Augustinian reliance on grace was sufficient. Salvation required both effort at holiness and grace. The Council of Orange (529) formally rejected semipelagianism, affirming Augustine’s teaching on predestination and grace but softening its harder edges by rejecting predestination to evil or damnation.

By the thirteenth century the consensus view was a type of single predestination. According to Thomas Aquinas, God predestined individuals to receive grace. Empowered by grace they would do good works, which would be meritorious. God foreknew their works and merit, thus predestining them to glory. In the fourteenth century alternate views arose, with Peter Aureol teaching general election to life and Gregory of Rimini teaching double predestination.

Lutheran

For the first Lutheran and Reformed theologians, predestination affirmed God's grace as the source of salvation and gave assurance to believers. In his preface to Romans, MARTIN LUTHER wrote that faith and forgiveness, as well as their absence, proceed from God's eternal predestination (see LUTHERANISM). In The Bondage of the Will (1525) Luther taught that God's will is twofold. Scripture shows God working for people's salvation; however, in a hidden mysterious sense, God works out the damnation of the rest. Still, Luther did not develop a prominent doctrine of double predestination.

In the Loci Communes of 1521, Luther's colleague PHILIPP MELANCHTHON held a fairly strong doctrine of predestination, but by the 1543 edition his view had softened: Although Christ is the cause of our election and JUSTIFICATION, the Gospel offers salvation to all. Finally he moved explicitly away from double predestination: the idea that God's decree caused damnation implied human passivity, removing ethical responsibility. One must participate in justification, at least by accepting the promise, a view that came to be known as "synergism."

The GNESIO (or "true") LUTHERANS of the next generation sought to follow Luther's position, opposing the synergism of the "Philippists" who followed Melanchthon. The Formula of Concord of 1577 settled the debate, distinguishing clearly between predestination and mere foreknowledge. The Formula attributed salvation to predestination, but argued that damnation was justice for people's own sins.

Since the REFORMATION, the Lutheran Churches have not been immune from change or controversy on this topic. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries Lutheran ORTHODOXY taught that predestination was based on God's foreknowledge of those who would respond to the gospel with persevering faith. In 1877 in the United States, LUTHERAN CHURCH-MISSOURI SYNOD theologian C.W.F. Walther pointed out that this was in conflict with the Formula of Concord because it placed a cause of election in human beings. The ensuing controversy divided the Missouri Synod from other American Lutheran Churches, a division that has not healed although the conflict has passed.

Reformed: Sixteenth Century

The Zurich reformer HULDRYCH ZWINGLI also taught predestination in opposition to meritorious works. In his Commentary on True and False Religion (1525) he linked predestination to providence, with providence as the "mother" of predestination. God's providence directs all things; within the category of all things, God's providence predestines those who will be saved. Election is from God's goodness, apart from any actions of those elected. Zwingli's focus was on election to life, although God's will also plays a role toward the damned. Faith proceeds out of election, and those with faith have good evidence of their election.

Genevan reformer JOHN CALVIN is the name most associated with predestination (see CALVINISM). For Calvin predestination is God's choice of some for eternal life and God's choice of others for damnation. He believed that the plain teaching of scripture, and the obvious implications of that teaching, led to double predestination. His pastoral sensibility led him to frame it differently than did Zwingli. In the authoritative 1559 edition of his INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION, Calvin did not treat predestination as a part of providence. Instead he added it to the discussion of justification and faith. In this position the doctrine assures the worried believer that salvation depends solely on God's gracious choice, not on personal holiness. If one is in Christ, responding to Word and Sacrament with faith in obedience, then one is surely elect. It was, to Calvin himself, a terrifying mystery, acknowledged as part of revelation but not to be explored. The reasons are hidden in the secret counsel of God. The doctrine can, however, be of benefit. It explains why not all hear the Gospel and fewer still respond in faith. It also should keep believers trusting in God's grace alone, humbly glorifying God.

Calvin's teaching on predestination gave rise to significant controversy during his life. Even HEINRICH BULLINGER, Zwingli's successor at Zurich, objected to the double decree as presented by Calvin, believing that this made God the author of sin. Bullinger favored the view that election was by grace but reprobation was by justice.

Peter Martyr Vermigli took another distinctive approach to predestination among the sixteenth-century Reformed theologians. With similarities to Gregory of Rimini, Vermigli taught that election is in the eternal will, not the foreknowledge, of God and is exclusively to eternal life. Reprobation also is in the eternal will of God, but actual condemnation is worked out in time as justice for human sin.

THEODORE BEZA, Calvin's successor in Geneva, looked more closely into the order of the divine decrees than Calvin had, arguing that the decree to save some and damn others was logically before the Fall, a position known as "supralapsarianism." In some works Beza linked predestination to providence, portraying all of salvation history as the outworking of God's decrees. However, in more systematic works such as his Confession de la foi chrétienne (1559), predestination is not presented as part of providence, but rather as part of the assurance of salvation. Taking Beza's work as a whole, predestination is not the organizing principle it was once thought to be.

Reformed: Post-Reformation

In Reformed theology after the sixteenth century there was a shift toward an "infralapsarian" view. In infralapsarianism, God's decree predestining the elect to salvation logically follows after the Fall, removing the implication that God intended sin. In DUTCH REFORMED CHURCHES this teaching is found in the Canons of the Synod of Dort (1618–1619) (see DORT, CANONS OF).

The Synod of Dort was primarily concerned with the teachings of JACOBUS ARMINIUS, a Dutch theologian who argued that predestination by divine decree is inconsistent with God's grace and human freedom. Arminius taught that predestination is God's foreknowledge of those who will believe and persevere in faith. The Synod decided against ARMINIANISM, affirming predestination as a decree of God's will to salvation and reprobation. The Arminians were nevertheless able to form churches after 1625.

In the nineteenth century, ABRAHAM KUYPER sought to renew Calvinism in the NETHERLANDS and elsewhere. Although he saw predestination as a central Reformed doctrine, he did not emphasize it, being more concerned with God's common grace working in the world. Some of the Dutch Churches abroad have held the doctrine firmly, although they have also faced problems. The CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH IN NORTH AMERICA faced protests against the doctrine of reprobation, both in the writings of Harold Dekker of Calvin Theological Seminary in 1962 and in an official grievance by missionary theologian Harry R. Boer in 1977. In both cases the church maintained its traditional doctrinal stance. The most tragic misuse of the doctrine of predestination was in the South African Church, where from the mid-nineteenth century to the late twentieth it was used to give credence to white racial superiority and apartheid.

In ENGLAND, double predestination was affirmed in the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION of 1646, long the doctrinal standard of Presbyterians in SCOTLAND and America (see PRESBYTERIANISM). The Westminster Confession placed the double decree of predestination in the doctrine of God as the first expression of the decrees by which God governs all things, much as Zwingli had done.

In the UNITED STATES a number of forces, including REVIVALS and the ENLIGHTENMENT, have led to a general decline of predestinarian teaching in the Reformed tradition. In the early nineteenth century, under the leadership of WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING, the Congregationalists of New England suffered the loss of their liberal party (which became the AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION), partly out of the liberals' objections to predestination (see CONGREGATIONALISM). Presbyterians have been reshaped by Arminianism structurally and theologically. The 1810 birth of the CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was attributed in part to the Arminianism of revivalistic ministers who were forced out of the larger Presbyterian Church. The split between Old School and New School Presbyterians in 1837 was also influenced by the New School's embrace of revivalistic methods. These seemed to assume Arminian doctrinal positions, and in CHARLES FINNEY and other leaders Arminianism was explicit. Presbyterian confessions still teach predestination, but the doctrine is not prominent in the churches. It has been officially softened or removed in some cases. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church developed its own confession to avoid Westminster's predestinarian teaching, and in 1903 the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE U.S.A. added a moderating "declaratory statement" to the Westminster Confession.

Some major Reformed theologians since the Reformation have defended the doctrine, and some have adapted it. American JONATHAN EDWARDS in Freedom of the Will (1754) defended predestination against Wesleyan Arminianism, and Charles Hodge did the same in response to the Arminianism of the Second Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS). FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER rooted predestination in God's good pleasure rather than foreknowledge, but he held to a universal predestination to life and none to reprobation. KARL BARTH saw election as the sum of the gospel, but did not view predestination as a pair of opposite choices, to life or to damnation. Drawing on Athanasius he argued that Christ is both the elect human being, and the electing God. Because he taught that all people find themselves elect in Christ, Barth has been accused of UNIVERSALISM, although he denied this was a necessary conclusion.

Anglican

In England theologians taught predestination as early as during the reign of HENRY VIII. The THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES (1571) proclaim a mild doctrine of single predestination, and the Lambeth Articles (1595) approved double predestination by God's will, not foreknowledge. At the end of the sixteenth century Anglican theologians such as RICHARD HOOKER and Puritans such as WILLIAM PERKINS taught predestination, although with some differences (see ANGLICANISM; PURITANISM). Perkins denied that predestination was at all based on foreknowledge. Hooker claimed that, although this is true of election, reprobation is based on foreknowledge of people's rejection of God's gracious offer. In the reign of James I, the High Church party, under the leadership of WILLIAM LAUD, supported Arminianism in their struggle against the Calvinists. They argued that predestination, despite its presence in the Thirty-Nine Articles, was contrary to the free promise of the Gospel as embodied in the LITURGY. After the 1626 York House Conference they were able to ban the teaching of predestination, first at Cambridge and then throughout England, and to place Arminians in most bishoprics.

The EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the United States in the nineteenth century tolerated both predestinarian and Arminian interpretations of the Thirty-nine Articles. In the latter part of the century the dominant view was "ecclesiastical election," by which God elects individuals to the visible church but salvation is still subject to human free will.

Wesleyan

Anglican priest JOHN WESLEY was a convinced Arminian, believing that Calvinist predestination was a blasphemous teaching portraying God as unjust, arbitrary, and in fact worse than the DEVIL (see WESLEYANISM). Throughout his remarkably successful evangelistic and organizational career Wesley engaged in a public struggle against the doctrine. His 1739 sermon "Free Grace" was the first of several written works on the subject, and his steady teaching against predestination led to an acrimonious public parting with his friend and colleague, the Calvinist GEORGE WHITEFIELD. The influence of METHODISM in the United States has contributed to the pervasive assumption of Arminian views there.

References and Further Reading

Armstrong, Brian G. Calvinism and the Amyraut Heresy: Protestant Scholasticism and Humanism in Seventeenth-Century France. Madison: The University of Wisconsin Press, 1969.

- Baker, Frank. "Whitefield's Break with the Wesleys." Church Quarterly 3 (1970):103–113.
- Bray, John S. Theodore Beza's Doctrine of Predestination. Nieuwkoop, The Netherlands: B.De Graaf, 1975.
- Busch, Edward. "The Predestinarian Controversy 100 Years Later." Currents in Theology and Mission 9 no. 3 (1982): 132–148.
- James, Frank A. III. Peter Martyr Vermigli and Predestination: The Augustinian Inheritance of an Italian Reformer. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1998.
- Kendall, R.R. Calvin and English Calvinism to 1649. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Klooster, Fred H. Calvin's Doctrine of Predestination. 2nd ed. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1977.
- Muller, Richard A. Christ and the Decree: Christology and Predestination in Reformed Theology from Calvin to Perkins. Durham, NC: The Labyrinth Press, 1986.
- . God, Creation, and Providence in the Thought of Jacob Arminius: Sources and Directions of Scholastic Protestantism in the Era of Early Orthodoxy. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1991.

GARY NEAL HANSEN

PRE-RAPHAELITES

Pre-Raphaelitism was a mid- and late-Victorian movement in ART and poetry. The seven young men of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood (P.R.B.) sought to restore to British painting sincerity, high purpose, and earnest scrutiny of visible facts. After the P.R.B. disbanded, a second group of Pre-Raphaelite artists coalesced around Dante Gabriel Rossetti. The artistic agenda of this second phase of Pre-Raphaelitism was distinct from the earlier project and led to the Aesthetic Movement in British art and LITERATURE of the 1880s and 1890s.

The Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood

The P.R.B. was formed in London in 1848 with Rossetti, John Everett Millais, and William Holman Hunt as founding members and central figures. Rossetti (poet and painter), although lacking the artistic training and proficiency of Millais and Hunt, through genius and force of personality became the natural leader of the brotherhood. Hunt was the theoretician of the group and invented their detailed, glowing painting technique. Millais was a brilliant painter who commanded virtuoso technical skill. The brotherhood was completed by Thomas Woolner (sculptor), James Collinson (painter), F.G.Stephens (painter and later art critic), and William Michael Rossetti (art and literary critic and the memoirist of the movement). Other close associates were the painters Ford Madox Brown, Walter Deverell, and Charles Allston Collins, and Rossetti's sister, the poet CHRISTINA ROSSETTI.

In 1850 the P.R.B. established a journal, The Germ: Thoughts toward Nature in Poetry, Literature, and Art, as an organ to expound its views. The Germ contained treatises on art, short stories, critical reviews, and a substantial body of verse, most notably by Rossetti, Christina Rossetti, and Coventry Patmore. Although it survived for only four issues, it set themes and motifs characteristic of later Pre-Raphaelite poetry.

Early Paintings

The Pre-Raphaelite visual style was instantly recognizable, with its clarity of outline, vivid coloration, and natural lighting effects brought to bear on historical, literary, or religious subjects. The P.R.B. shared the conviction that English painting was feeble, conventional, and stagnant, mainly through its reliance on academic conventions codified in the time of Raphael, hence their self-characterization as “Pre-Raphaelite.” Rejecting Joshua Reynolds (calling him “Sir Sloshua”) and the Royal Academy, they sought to reestablish an earlier artistic spirit of individuality and freedom. Their canvases were heavily symbolic and moralistic, minutely detailed yet at the same time suggestive of spiritual meanings beyond exterior realities.

The earliest paintings were exhibited anonymously, signed only with the mysterious signature “P.R.B.,” and were notable for deliberate archaism and medieval flavor, presented with scrupulous fidelity to fact. Hunt’s Rienzi Vowing to Obtain Justice for the Death of His Brother (1849), Millais’s Lorenzo and Isabella (1849), and Rossetti’s The Girlhood of Mary Virgin (1848–1849) were greeted with critical favor. In 1850 and 1851, however, the meaning of the secret signature became generally known, and the P.R.B. came under serious attack, particularly for their unconventional representation of religious subjects. Charles Dickens led the bitter criticism, calling Millais’s Christ in the House of His Parents (1850) “mean, odious, repulsive, and revolting.” The crisis passed when, in 1851, famous art critic John Ruskin wrote two letters to The Times supporting the P.R.B.’s artistic practice.

Pre-Raphaelite paintings evince Protestant influences of both evangelical and High Anglican flavors. The P.R.B. certainly attempted to develop a new style of religious art for the contemporary age, one that was modern, historically accurate, and—some would argue—distinctly Protestant in its use of figural methods as described by Ruskin in Modern Painters. In their subject matter and typological figural mode, many of the paintings and poems also showed the influence of the OXFORD MOVEMENT and its sacramentalism and ritualism. Various Pre-Raphaelite paintings make pictorial references to ANGLICO-CATHOLICISM and its newly introduced Catholic rituals and ornaments, particularly Rossetti’s The Girlhood of Mary Virgin and Ecce Ancilla Domini! (1849–1850), Collinson’s The Renunciation of St. Elizabeth of Hungary (1850), Millais’s Christ in the House of His Parents, Collins’s Convent Thoughts (1850–51), and Hunt’s The Light of the World (1851–1853). In poetry, the influence is evident as well: Rossetti gathered early versions of his poems, including “The Blessed Damozel,” “Ave,” and “My Sister’s Sleep,” titling the manuscript collection Songs of the Art Catholic (1847). Rossetti, however, made use of religious symbolism without having any definite spiritual commitment himself.

By 1853 internal differences had broken up the P.R.B. Millais eventually joined the establishment that the P.R.B. opposed, becoming a member of the Royal Academy and its president, and later a baronet. Hunt throughout his life remained committed to the laborious method and spiritual intent of the P.R.B. In 1854 he made the first of three journeys to the Holy Land to paint biblical events with strict historical and geographic accuracy. The paintings produced, most notably The Scapegoat (1854), baffled Hunt's English audiences. The verdict that The Scapegoat's symbolism was incomprehensible, that it particularly failed to impress on viewers a correspondence between the scapegoat and Christ, signaled the failure of the P.R.B.'s attempt to revitalize in mid-nineteenth-century ENGLAND a sacramental religious art.

Later Pre-Raphaelites

Pre-Raphaelitism continued to develop, with a new set of artists forming around Rossetti, including William Morris, Edward Burne-Jones, Arthur Hughes, Algernon Charles Swinburne, and Richard Watson Dixon. The soft-edge painting of this second group differed dramatically from the style of Hunt and Millais between 1848 and 1858. This second generation turned away from both the moral earnestness and the careful exactitude of the first period, taking their inspiration from art rather than from NATURE.

Rossetti's own style changed, with his symbolism becoming more private and esoteric, and his paintings more enigmatic. His wife, poet and painter Elizabeth Siddal, whom he had envisioned as Beatrice to his Dante, had been his early muse. After her death in 1862 Rossetti depicted a new and influential ideal of female beauty—a large and loosely dressed woman, with full and red fleshy lips, masses of hair, and soulful eyes—an embodiment of a secular religion of beauty and spiritualized femininity.

The Pre-Raphaelite movement enjoyed successes in poetry with Morris's The Defence of Guenevere (1858), Christina Rossetti's Goblin Market and Other Poems (1862) and The Prince's Progress and Other Poems (1866), and Swinburne's Poems and Ballads (1866). Finally, and only after he had the unique manuscript of his compositions exhumed from Siddal's grave, Rossetti published Poems (1870), which included his important sonnet sequence, The House of Life. However, this poetic achievement was blighted by "The Fleshly School" controversy, which began in 1871 when Robert Buchanan accused Rossetti and fellow PreRaphaelite poets of lewd sensuality. Rossetti suffered a breakdown from which his recovery was only partial, although he continued to write and paint, especially pictures of his new muse, Morris's wife Jane.

Pre-Raphaelitism continued to confront prevailing aesthetic norms in various aspects of Victorian life. The "Arts and Crafts Movement" was inspired by Morris and the firm he founded in 1861 with various other Pre-Raphaelites. Valuing craftsmanship and design, they provided architecture, furniture, fabrics, tiles, wallpaper, stained glass, church decoration, book design, and illustration to meet a purified, more medieval, aesthetic. Morris, always prodigiously energetic, continued to write prolifically in a variety of genres; he also ardently supported Socialism and was a founder of the Socialist League (1884). Rossetti turned toward Aestheticism and the "art for art's sake" movement, which valued intensity in the experience of art. Although the original impulse of Pre-Raphaelitism was diffused, to the end the movement retained an opposition to convention and to mainstream bourgeois Victorian culture.

See also Aesthetics; Architecture, Church

References and Further Reading

- Bentley, D.M.R. "The Pre-Raphaelites and the Oxford Movement." Dalhousie Review 57 (1977):525–539.
- Marsh, Jan. Dante Gabriel Rossetti: Painter and Poet. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1999.
- Prettejohn, Elizabeth. The Art of the Pre-Raphaelites. London: Tate Publishing, 2000.
- Rossetti, Dante Gabriel. The Correspondence of Dante Gabriel Rossetti. Edited by William E.Fredeman. 9 vols. Woodbridge, UK: Boydell and Brewer, 2002–.
- Sambrook, James, ed. Pre-Raphaelitism: A Collection of Critical Essays. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974.
- Sussman, Herbert. Fact into Figure: Typology in Carlyle, Ruskin, and the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1979.
- Wood, Christopher. The Pre-Raphaelites. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1981.

MARY ARSENEAU

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH U.S.A.

The Presbyterian Church in the United States of America (PCUSA) identifies itself with the one, holy, catholic, apostolic church, and accepts the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures as its "rule of faith and life" as well as the Apostles and Nicene (325) creeds of the early church. It traces its origins especially to JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) of Geneva. Calvin's influence spread, especially through his INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION (1536) to FRANCE, Holland, GERMANY, HUNGARY, and to the British Isles under the leadership of JOHN KNOX (1513–1572) of SCOTLAND. During the Puritan Revolution (1642–1660), Presbyterians, Anglicans, and Congregationalists produced the WESTMINSTER CONFSSION OF FAITH, the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, and a Directory for the Public Worship of God. The leaders of the various churches could not resolve issues of church POLITY, as indicated by their denominational titles. Presbyterians adopted the offices of CLERGY and lay elders (presbyters) and DEACONS, who preached, taught, governed, and cared for the welfare of congregations. Numerous Scots along with Presbyterians from Northern Ireland began to emigrate to America, many to settle in the middle colonies in the eighteenth century.

Early History in America

There they founded churches and the first PRESBYTERY in Philadelphia (1706) under the leadership of Irishman Francis Makemie (c. 1658–1708). This body grew into a Synod (1716) under clergy and lay elders. The SYNOD adopted the Westminster doctrinal standards in 1729 with reservations about its Erastian references. To build an indigenous leadership, William Tennent Sr. (1673–1746), another Irishman, began to educate his sons and others at a "log college," which later became the College of New Jersey (1747) and Princeton University. Influenced by GEORGE WHITEFIELD, Tennent and his two sons, William and GILBERT (1703–1758), stimulated the Great AWAKENING, joined by JONATHAN EDWARDS and SAMUEL DAVIES (1723–1761). Awakening “enthusiasm” caused a “New Side-Old Side” division in 1740. The Old Side accused the New Siders of stirring up uncontrolled emotionalism. In 1758 the two Sides reunited, agreeing to preserve in religious matters a balance between ardor and order. They formed the Synod of New York and Philadelphia with ninety-four ministers and approximately 200 congregations. United, Presbyterians joined the British in fighting the French and Indian War on the Frontier.

Presbyterians were alienated from the mother country during the debate over American political rights in the 1760s and 1770s. Led by JOHN WITHERSPOON (1723–1794), called from Scotland to the presidency of Princeton College, Presbyterians in general supported the American Revolution. Witherspoon was the only clergyman to sign the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE (1776). Numerous clergy and LAITY provided leadership during the conflict, including ELIAS BOUDINOT (1740–1821), a Philadelphian who served as president of the UNITED STATES (1782–1783) as well as presided over the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY. With his SCOTTISH COMMON SENSE REALISM, Witherspoon made a profound impact on his student, JAMES MADISON, an Episcopalian, who became a chief architect of the United States Constitution (1788–1789) and the BILL OF RIGHTS (1791) with its First Amendment, guaranteeing religious and civil rights and defining church-state relations in the new nation. Presbyterian clergy and elders organized the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, which met for the first time in Philadelphia in 1789. The commissioners adopted the Westminster creedal standards and developed a Directory for Worship and a Form of Government and Discipline based on “general principles” of the PCUSA. These affirmed that “God alone” is the “Lord of Conscience,” that “Truth is in order to goodness,” that all church pronouncements are only “ministerial and declarative” and do not bind the conscience or impair civil rights. These statements, among others, still guide the denomination.

Western Migration and Expansion

Along with other Christians, Presbyterians pressed westward. With Congregationalists, such as TIMOTHY DWIGHT, they entered a Plan of Union (1801) to plant churches across the nation. They also cooperated with others to form VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES—educational societies (e.g., to publish and distribute Bibles, tracts, and to form SUNDAY SCHOOLS), reforming societies (e.g., to promote peace, TEMPERANCE, and to oppose SLAVERY or to colonize freed slaves in AFRICA), and home and foreign missions (e.g., the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS). Influenced by CAMP MEETING revivals under James McGready, some Presbyterians in Kentucky formed the CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (1810), modifying strict standards for the ordination of ministers and doctrine with Arminian overtones (see ARMINIANISM). New York revivalist CHARLES GRANDISON FINNEY (1792–1875) promoted “New Measures” (e.g., “protracted meetings” and “anxious benches”), offensive to the more conservative. Finney helped cause a division between New School (NS) and Old School (OS) Presbyterians (1838) who thought “Presbygationalists,” as they were called, had diluted Calvinist doctrine, low-ered qualifications for ministers, and promoted the antislavery cause (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). African-American Presbyterian Samuel Cornish (1795–1858), pastor of the First Black Presbyterian Church in New York, promoted that cause in his Freedom's Journal, the first Black American periodical.

In the meantime the PCUSA founded theological SEMINARIES, such as Princeton (1812), Union, Virginia (1812), and Union, New York (1835); produced national leaders, for example, John Holt Rice (1771–1831), Archibald Alexander (1772–1851), and LYMAN BEECHER (1775–1863); and prominent theologians, for example, James Henley Thornwell (1812–1862), Henry Boynton Smith (1815–1877), and Charles Hodge (1797–1878), whose Systematic Theology (3 vols., 1872–1873) was widely used. Believing in a well-educated citizenry, Presbyterians promoted public education, along with a few private schools, assisted by William McGuffey (1800–1873) through his widely used MCGUFFEY READERS. They also planted numerous institutions of HIGHER EDUCATION, colleges and universities for women and men.

Tension and Division

Increasingly the PCUSA had to deal the national debate over slavery, which intensified after the passage of the Compromise of 1850 and the Fugitive Slave Law. These laws prompted Beecher's daughter HARRIET BEECHER STOWE to write Uncle Tom's Cabin (1851), a widely read novel that brought greater attention to the situation. In 1858 the NS in the South withdrew from its party, and in 1861 the OS, South and North, split over issues such as state sovereignty, slavery, and the responsibilities of the church in public affairs. Under the presidency of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, the nation fought a bloody fratricidal conflict. After the CIVIL WAR hostilities, the PCUSA failed to heal the church's divisions. Southerners organized the Presbyterian Church in the United States (PCUS) (1865), holding among other things to the "spirituality of the Church." In the North the OS and NS reunited in 1870. It could not establish fraternal relations with the PCUS until later in the century. In the meantime the denomination continued to plant churches, even in Alaska, under the leadership of such leaders as SHELDON JACKSON. In 1870 the PCUSA numbered 446,564 members, 4,526 churches, and 4,238 ministers.

To help meet its responsibilities, the PCUSA established church boards, which had headquarters in Philadelphia and New York. Church officials, under the General Assembly, continued to meet the pastoral, educational, and mission needs of members. Presbyterians, many in the middle and upper classes, had to deal with the growth of an industrialized and urbanized society with its inequalities and injustices. They did so by proclaiming a "Social Creed," to awaken the conscience, and by supporting institutions, such as the Labor Temple in New York, which championed the cause of working people. The PCUSA also helped found the Federal Council of Churches (1908), an ecumenical body concerned about such matters (see ECUMENISM). Presbyterians had to deal with the rising women's rights movement, led by ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, who grew up Presbyterian. The PCUSA sponsored women's organizations and over the years admitted women to the diaconate in the 1890s, the eldership (1930), and finally to the ordained ministry (1954) (see WOMEN CLERGY). Presbyterians also had to deal with racism, the legacy of slavery. Supreme Court justice, elder John Marshall Harlan, showed the way by being the lone dissenter in the “separate-but-equal” Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) decision. The PCUSA developed special denominational programs for African Americans, and supported the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT of MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. in the 1950s and 1960s.

With regard to War the PCUSA officially supported armed conflict on “just and necessary” occasions. Presbyterians were divided over the Spanish-American War, but generally supported as “just” World War I, World War II, and the Korean War. They were divided again over the Vietnam War. Presbyterian presidents WOODROW WILSON (1856–1925) and Dwight D. Eisenhower (1890–1969), and Secretary of State John Foster Dulles (1888–1959) gave national leadership during many of these years. The PCUSA supported the League of Nations and the United Nations Organization (UNO). Because of worldwide MISSIONS work, Presbyterians helped to establish self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating churches in various regions of the world. After World War II the denomination redefined its role as a “partner in obedience” with these new bodies to transcend the paternalism of the early mission enterprises. In these efforts, elder ROBERT E. SPEER (1867–1947) provided executive leadership and ecumenical vision.

Modern Times

After the Civil War the PCUSA faced with other Christians the intellectual ferment of the times, including DARWINISM, HIGHER CRITICISM, and calls for confessional revisions. Some proposed new confessional standards to replace the Westminster documents, but only managed amendments that emphasized the work of the “Holy Spirit” and the “Love of God and Missions” (1903), which reflected the interests of the DENOMINATION at the time. Some prominent Presbyterians, including revivalist BILLY SUNDAY and politician WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN, opposed evolution. The PCUSA continued to affirm Christian belief in a Creator, the uniqueness of human life, and underscored that in the struggle for human existence might does not make right. The denomination dealt with the critical study of the BIBLE, during the HERESY trial of Charles Briggs (1841–1913) over the authorship of the biblical books. In this connection they faced the controversy between FUNDAMENTALISM and MODERNISM, not only over the “inerrancy” of Scripture (see BIBLICAL INERRANCY), but doctrines, such as the “virgin birth” of Jesus, “miracles,” the “substitutionary atonement,” and the “bodily resurrection” of Christ. Led by moderates such as Speer and HENRY SLOANE COFFIN (1877–1954), the PCUSA affirmed the Westminster doctrinal statements of the denomination and allowed presbyteries to decide on a case by case basis what were “essential and necessary” articles of faith. This did not satisfy conservatives, such as biblical scholar J. GRESHAM MACHEN (1881–1937). He was further angered by the mission board that seemed to support the liberalism of prize-winning novelist Pearl S. Buck, a teacher under the board in the 1930s. Machen withdrew to form the Orthodox Presbyterian Church in 1936.

During this latter period, Presbyterian theologians began to draw insight from European thinkers, such as KARL BARTH, EMIL BRUNNER, and others, including Americans REINHOLD NIEBUHR and H. RICHARD NIEBUHR, whose works shaped the NEO-ORTHODOXY MOVEMENT. This theological renewal also led them to draw more insight from theologians of the Ancient and Reformation churches. With assistance of these sources the PCUSA adopted a Book of Confessions (1967), which included the familiar Apostles and Nicene Creeds, together with the Reformation's HELVETIC CONFESSION (1566), HEIDELBERG CATECHISM (1563), the Westminster Confession and Short Catechism, and BARMEN DECLARATION (1934) of the German Confessing Church, and a new Confession of 1967. The latter was based on the theme of reconciliation found in II Corinthians 5:18f. The PCUSA spoke in an ecumenical spirit, while emphasizing the need for the reconciling love of Christ to help deal with contemporary issues such as relations among nations and races, between rich and poor, and within the family. The PCUSA has continued to wrestle with these issues especially with regard to conflicts over MARRIAGE, HOMOSEXUALITY, same-sex marriages, and ABORTION.

During the early part of the nineteenth century, with a new taste for the past, the PCUSA began to revisit its liturgical legacy and its WORSHIP needs. For example, Charles W. Baird (1828–1888) published Eutaxia, or the Presbyterian Liturgies: Historical Sketches (1855), which explored the worship ideas and practices of Calvin and Knox before the rise of PURITANISM in the seventeenth century. Clergymen Louis Benson (1855–1930) and Henry Van Dyke, assisted by laity, organized the Church Service Society (1897) to enhance public and private worship. Despite some resistance the PCUSA recommended a Book of Common Worship (1906) for “voluntary use” only. The liturgical movement grew. This earlier volume was revised and adopted officially by the church. Recently the denomination adopted a new Directory for Worship and the Book of Common Worship (1933), a rich historical, ecumenical, and liturgical treasure for use by clergy and laity. Benson published The Hymnal (1895), which set the model for later volumes, and deepening Presbyterian praise leading to the Presbyterian Hymnal, Hymns, Psalms, and Spiritual Songs (1990) representing the praise of the whole Christian family.

Ecumenism and International Connection

Over many decades the PCUSA has been engaged in the ecumenical movement beginning in the nineteenth century. Historian PHILIP SCHAFF (1819–1893) gave impetus to this cause with the publication of Creeds of Christendom (3 vols., 1877) and through his efforts in organizing the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES (1876) and the Evangelical Alliance (1870), which led to cooperation among all Protestants. The PCUSA helped shaped these organizations as well at the Federal Council of Churches (1908), the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (1950), the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (1948), and the CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION (COCU, c. 1960) embracing Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and Congregationalists among others. In addition to Speer, JOHN A. MACKAY (1889–1983), HENRY P. VAN DUSEN (1897–1975), and EUGENE CARSON BLAKE (1897–1975) gave support and leadership to these efforts. Blake served as general secretary of the World Council of Churches (1966–1972). The PCUSA joined with the United Presbyterian Church of North America (1854) to form the United Presbyterian Church in the United States of America (1954). It reunited with many Cumberland Presbyterians in 1906, and with the PCUS in 1983, healing the Civil War wound. The Rev. J.Randolph Taylor (1930–2002), a southern Presbyterian, took the leadership in this reunion and presided over the PCUSA as its first moderator in 1982–1983.

The PCUSA moved its headquarters to Louisville, Kentucky. During recent years the church elected its first black moderator, Edler Hawkins (1908–1977) in 1964; its first woman moderator, Lois Stair (1923–1981) in 1972; and its first Korean moderator, Syngman Rhee (1931–) in 2001. It carries on dialogue and cooperates not only with other Protestants worldwide, but with Roman, Orthodox, and Evangelical churches, Jews, Muslims, and other religions (see DIALOGUE, INTER-CONFESSIONAL). The PCUSA has been emphasizing the denomination's responsibilities for peacemaking throughout the world, and keeps an office at the United Nations Organization in New York City. Because of the aging American population and other reasons, the PCUSA has been losing membership. In 2000 the denomination counted 2,525,330 members, 11,178 churches, and 21,065 ministers. In 1984 the denomination added the Scots Confessions (1560) to its Book of Confessions, along with the Westminster Larger Catechism, and in 1991 a Brief Statement of Faith. In the latter, Presbyterians continued to express belief in the Scriptures, the triune God, and the conviction that in life and death Presbyterians belong to God and commit to God's love, the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the communion of the Holy Spirit.

References and Further Reading

- Armstrong, Maurice W., Lefferts A.Loetscher, and Charles S. Anderson, eds. The Presbyterian Enterprise. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1956.
- The Book of Confessions*. Louisville, KY: Office of the General Assembly, 1991.
- Boyd, Lois A., and R.Douglass Brackenridge. Presbyterian Woman in America. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1983.
- Coalter, M.J., John W.Mulder, and Louis B.Weeks, eds. The Presbyterian Presence, The Twentieth Century Experience. 7 vols. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1990–1992.
- Loetscher, Lefferts. The Broadening Church. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1954.
- Murray, Andrew E. Presbyterian and the Negro—A History. Philadelphia: Presbyterian Historical Society, 1966.
- Smylie, James H. A Brief History of Presbyterians. Louisville, KY: Geneva Press, 1996.
- Sweet, William Warren. The Presbyterian 1783–1840, A Collection of Source Materials. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1936.
- Trinterud, Leonard. The Forming of an American Tradition. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1949.

JAMES H.SMYLIE

PRESBYTERIANISM

Presbyterianism emerged during the REFORMATION, a protest beginning in the fifteenth century against Roman Catholicism. The word derives from the Greek for elder (presbuteros). Presbyterians were associated with the Reformed Movement, as distinguished from Lutherans and Anabaptists, mainly on the European continent, and from Anglicans, or Episcopalians, and Congregationalists who emerged in the British Isles. It also spread in the following centuries to North America and to much of the rest of the world to form a global Presbyterian and Reformed family. This religious movement also influenced educational, economic, political, and cultural shifts that emerged at the time of the Reformation. The Reform Family Worldwide (1999), compiled and edited by Jean-Jacques Bauswein and Lukas Visser, provides a detailed overview of this subject.

Presbyterianism was influenced mainly by French-Genevan JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564), through his biblical commentaries, the INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION (1st ed. 1536), essays, and correspondence. His influence spread to FRANCE, GERMANY, HUNGARY, NETHERLANDS, and other places where Protestantism is found. These Christians adopted the BIBLE as the rule of faith and life, asserted a PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS, with simpler forms of WORSHIP, involving the preaching of the Word, the SACRAMENTS OF BAPTISM, (child and adult), and the LORD'S SUPPER. They accepted the Apostles and Nicene Creeds as well as regional doctrinal statements such as the BELGIC CONFESSION (1561), HEIDELBERG CATECHISM (1563), HELVETIC CONFESSION (1566), and later, the Dutch decrees of the Synod of Dort (1610) (see DORT, CANONS OF). This latter favored a view of unconditional ELECTION over JACOBUS ARMINIUS'S view that humans may resist God's grace (see ARMINIANISM). The Reformed adopted a nonhierarchical form of church government, with General Assemblies, SYNODS, Presbyteries, and Sessions, composed of elders—clergy and lay, who preached, taught, and exercised CHURCH DISCIPLINE—along with DEACONS who cared for the welfare of congregations. Hungarians, it should be noted, developed an office of bishops-in-presbytery. Now most Presbyterian churches admit WOMEN to all these offices. Further the Reformed contributed to the rise of public and theological EDUCATION, DEMOCRACY and representative government, and a middle class, INDUSTRIALIZATION, and capitalism. It also contributes to women's rights.

Presbyterianism in the British Isles

The Reformation in Britain was often marked by turmoil and bloodshed in its earliest years beginning with John Wycliffe (c. 1330–1384) and lasting to the end of the seventeenth century. MARTIN LUTHER'S influence was felt in Britain, but HENRY VIII, interested in ENGLAND'S independence from Rome, took reform in his own direction. THOMAS CRANMER (1489–1556) sympathized with Reformed influences.

In the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES (1536–1563), adopted under ELIZABETH I (1533–1603), Anglicans attempted to restate ORTHODOXY with Catholic, Calvinist, and Anabaptist elements. In the meantime SCOTLAND fell under Genevan influence also. JOHN KNOX (c. 1514–1571) composed a Scottish Confession (1560) and encouraged Reformation in Scotland. Scots, such as ANDREW MELVILLE (1545–1622), continued reform. The Reformation ebbed and flowed during the age of the Stuarts, whose reigns were interrupted by the bloody Puritan Revolution under OLIVER CROMWELL (1599–1658). During this period the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY (1643–1648) was called. Scots joined Anglicans, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Erastians to revise the Thirty-nine Articles. Instead they produced a Directory of Church Government (1644), A Directory of Public Worship (1645), and the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION with the Larger and Shorter Catechisms (1647). The church government tended toward Presbyterianism, and the worship was simple. Presbyterians were Psalm singers, but they were and still are influenced by dissenter ISAAC WATTS (1674–1748), who believed Psalms should be modernized with a Christian focus and that believers could sing hymns of human composition (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS).

The doctrinal statements drew on Augustine Scholastics as well as Calvin. They acknowledged God sovereign, a sovereignty as manifested in the “light of nature,” the works of creation and providence, and also emphasized the Bible as the inspired rule for Christian faith and life. They went on to confess God as Trinity, as “wise and holy” in “decrees” and the “COVENANT” made with Adam and all human beings. They confessed human sinfulness, and also God’s work of forgiveness, SANCTIFICATION, and SALVATION through Christ’s ATONEMENT. They recognize that Christians become members of Christ’s body, the CHURCH, through the rite of baptism and are nurtured at the Lord’s Supper. Much of these doctrinal statements are devoted to the life of Christians as citizens and civil magistrates in council with one another. Christians look forward to the resurrection and the KINGDOM OF GOD. The Shorter Catechism’s first question and answer underscores the purpose of human life:

Q 1. What is the chief end of man?

A 1. Man’s chief end is to glorify God and enjoy him forever.

These documents still shape Presbyterianism.

The Assembly could not resolve all questions, especially about PREDESTINATION, which was raised by Arminians, and about church POLITY. These contentions remained and were carried on after the restoration of the Stuarts. With the bloodless GLORIOUS REVOLUTION (1688), William III and Mary of Holland established a Bill of Rights and Settlement, which curbed royal power and brought Scotland and IRELAND under English control with limited TOLERATION.

After 1689, Presbyterianism in England remained in some disarray, at first because of debates over relations with Congregationalists and Unitarians (see UNITARIAN, UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION). Later, however, Congregationalists joined with Scottish settlers in north England to form an autonomous Presbyterian Church in 1836. Other such Presbyterian bodies organized, eventually to unite in the Presbyterian Church of England (PCE) in 1876, uniting those who were English, Welsh, Scottish, and Irish by birth. The denomination produced noted scholars such as John Oman (1860–1939). In 1972 the PCE united with other Congregationalists to form the United Reformed Church, embracing most of their members. In 1980 the Reformed Association of Churches of Christ joined this body, which confesses the Apostles and Nicene Creeds, a Statement of Faith adopted at the union in 1972. It ordains women as elders, and numbers approximately 102,600 members. It has been unable recently to keep up its ecumenical concerns to unite with other bodies. The Presbyterian Church of Wales was originally known for its Calvinistic Methodist connection in 1894. It has nearly 53,900 members and close ties to the Reformed family.

The established CHURCH OF SCOTLAND remained in place when England and Scotland united in 1707, although the Westminster Parliament allowed patrons to name ministerial candidates to churches. This act caused a number of eighteenth-century divisions, Seceders and Covenanters, who opposed patron control and oath taking. Presbyterians suffered a major split over patronage in 1843, resulting in the Free Church of Scotland. Over the years denominations were drawn together. In 1929 the FREE CHURCH reunited with the Church of Scotland under Declaratory Articles that defined the new body as both national and free. The church worship is guided by a Book of Common Order, which emphasizes the reading and interpretation of Scripture, singing, especially Psalms, and which encourages celebration of the Lord's Supper on a monthly basis. It accepts the Apostles and Nicene Creeds, and the Westminster Standards. During the early days of Reform, Scots rejected the episcopal office, but instituted superintendents, ministers, exhorters, and readers. The polity was not fixed, and the church is now governed by a General Assembly and presbyteries, with pastors, elders, and deacons, including women ordained to all offices (see WOMEN CLERGY). During the eighteenth century, layman ROBERT RAIKES (1735–1811) started SUNDAY SCHOOLS, which spread throughout Protestantism. The church promoted MISSIONS worldwide with enthusiasm, DAVID LIVINGSTONE and ROBERT MOFFAT being only two examples of Scottish international reach. Intellectual ferment gave rise to SCOTTISH COMMON SENSE REALISM. DAVID HUME'S experimental philosophy stimulated skepticism, Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations (1776) advanced industrial capitalism, whereas W.ROBERTSON SMITH helped introduce biblical criticism in the nineteenth century. All had Presbyterian backgrounds. In 2000 the Church of Scotland numbered approximately 1,220,000 members.

Although Roman Catholicism dominated Ireland, Presbyterian ministers founded churches under William and Mary, especially in ULSTER, where they organized an Irish Presbytery (1642). Growing in number, mainly in the North, they were able to organize the Presbyterian Church in Ireland (PCI), confessing the Apostles and Nicene Creeds and Westminster Standards in 1840. Early in the eighteenth century some Presbyterians, dissenting from English rule, began to support home rule in cooperation with Catholics. Because Ireland was divided in 1922 into the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland, Ulster Scots Presbyterians and other Protestants have grown anxious about violence involving attempts to unite north and south. Many, however, have attempted to develop common interests among all Christians. The PCI numbers about 308,000 members and cooperates with other Presbyterians in a BRITISH COUNCIL OF CHURCHES founded in 1942.

Presbyterians in North America

During British exploration and colonization of the New World, Presbyterian immigrants began to settle and grow in number (see COLONIALISM). Anglicans and Congregationalists settled first, in Virginia and New England, beginning in the seventeenth century, thus bringing the Reformed movements to the colonies. Presbyterians arrived in force in the eighteenth century, settling mainly in the Middle and Southern colonies. Most were Scotch-Irish. Under the leadership of Francis Makemie (1658–1708) they organized the first Presbytery (1706) and then a Synod (1716), so steady was the migration. They began to develop an indigenous leadership, especially at a log college presided over by William Tennent (1673–1746), finally located in Princeton, New Jersey. The Synod divided, 1741–1758, during the Great AWAKENING, led by JONATHAN EDWARDS (1703–1758) and SAMUEL DAVIES (1723–1761), over the nature of CONVERSION and pastoral leadership. Later, Scot JOHN WITHERSPOON, called to the presidency of the College of New Jersey (later Princeton University), gave leadership to the American Revolution (1776) as the only clergyman to sign the Declaration of Independence. He trained a number of laymen who engaged in writing the American Constitution adopted in 1788. The Synod organized the General Assembly of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH in the United States of America (PCUSA) in 1787–1789 with Witherspoon presiding and John Rodgers (1727–1811) as first moderator. The denomination adopted an American Directory of Worship, the Westminster Standards, and adopted a Form of Government and Discipline, rejecting the establishments of the British Isles. Presbyterians have lived under these documents, with modifications, for over two centuries. During this period they had to deal with ecclesial, national, and international challenges.

As Americans pressed westward, Presbyterianism grew. Presbyterians experienced conflicts within for various reasons. In 1810 some left the denomination to form the CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, differing with others over ordination requirements for frontier ministry and over ARMINIAN sympathies. This division was partially healed in 1906. The Old School (OS)—New School (NS) divided over a Plan of Union (1801), encouraging Presbyterian-Congregationalist cooperation. The Old School held that New Schoolers, many in northern states, were too liberal theologically and were opposed to SLAVERY. After the CIVIL WAR, OS and NS were able to reunite in 1870. Southerners organized the Presbyterian Church in the United States (PCUS) to champion the “spirituality of the church,” opposing entanglement in civil affairs. In 1858 Scottish immigrants from the covenanter tradition organized the United Presbyterian Church of North America, which joined resources with the PCUSA in 1958. Finally with the diminishing of racism and sectionalism, the PCUSA and the PCUS reunited in 1983. Korean Presbyterians, it should be noted, have a sizable presence in the United States and have been organizing their own denominations.

Although these various entities differed on some points, they shared some basic agreements. With regard to worship, directories focused on biblical PREACHING, free and liturgical PRAYER, with the baptism of infants and adults, and with celebrating the Lord’s Supper at times on a monthly basis. In the liturgical revival of the nineteenth century, the PCUSA began to use a Book of Common Worship (1906) for voluntary use. Enlarged in 1993, it is more ecumenical in character and uses inclusive language.

Whereas in the Old World, Presbyterians first sang metered Psalms, often ISAAC WATTS paraphrases, they now may also sing hymns of various contemporary poets and musicians. With regard to DOCTRINE, these denominations affirmed the Apostles and Nicene Creeds and the Westminster Standards. However, in 1967 PCUSA adopted a Book of Confessions that, in addition to those mentioned, now includes the SCOTS CONFESSION, Heidelberg Catechism, Second Helvetic Confession, BARMAN DECLARATION of the German CONFESSING CHURCH, a Confession of 1967, and an added Brief Statement of Faith in 1983. Presbyterianism is governed by a General Assembly with Synods and Presbyteries. All offices are open to women, and more and more of them exercise leadership in the denomination, It carries on a global mission in cooperation with Reformed and other Christians. It has been deeply involved in seeking economic justice and civil rights for women and racial minorities world-wide. The PCUSA numbers about 3,644,000 members with about 12,700 congregations. In recent years its membership has aged. It has been losing membership, and has been disrupted with debates over human SEXUALITY and confessing the faith in the twenty-first century.

Because of differences over liberalism involving evolution, HIGHER CRITICISM, and FUNDAMENTALISM, J. GRESHAM MACHEN led an exodus from the PCUSA in the 1930s. In 1973 some conservative bodies, joined by adherents of the PCUS, formed the Presbyterian Church in America. It focuses on ancient ORTHODOXY and the Westminster Standards, and does not ordain women. It numbers nearly 278,000 members.

Although French Catholics first explored and began to settle CANADA, the English took over the area in 1763, and French Protestant (HUGUENOT) immigrants also began to settle there. Immigrants from Scotland and Ireland, joined later by Loyalists from the United States, organized Presbyterianism, shaped by conflicts inherited from the Old World. Secessionists who opposed the patronage laws were among the first to organize in 1817. The Church of Scotland soon founded a Synod in 1833, whereas the Free Church organized in 1843. Then in 1875 these bodies came together to form the Presbyterian Church of Canada in time to meet continuing mission challenges of the west. Neo-Orthodox in theology in recent years, the church affirms the Apostles and Nicene Creeds along with the Heidelberg Catechism, Helvetic Creed, and Westminster Standards. It ordains women to all offices of the denomination. It is the largest Presbyterian body in Canada, with about 267,000 members. Like other denominations it is declining in membership, attributed in part to lack of interest by younger Canadians. In 1925 about 70 percent of its members merged with Congregationalists and Methodists in the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA, preserving much of the Presbyterian tradition.

Presbyterians of the PCUSA and PCUS, among others, began to converge on MEXICO when it gained independence as a nation from Spain in 1857, beginning a postcolonial life. The educator Melinda Rankin (1811–1888) of the PCUSA crossed the border and helped prepare indigenous pastors and leaders, such as Arcadio Morales (1850–1888), for young churches. The mission spread rapidly and by 1883, through much cooperation, converts were able to organize the National Presbyterian Church in Mexico (NPCM) in 1901. Reconstruction of Mexico after the Revolution (1917) stimulated indigenization of Presbyterianism, although conservative Christians grew in numbers. The NPCM adheres to the Westminster Standards, Confession of Dort, Belgic Confession of 1561, and the Heidelberg Catechism. It is a multilingual community. Women engage in much church work, but are not ordained.

Presbyterianism Worldwide

The Reformed tradition spread globally, from Albania to ZIMBABWE, through European and American colonization and missionary endeavors on a world frontier, beginning in earnest in the eighteenth century. Missionary efforts often went hand in hand with explorers, traders, and settlers to spread the Gospel, especially in connection with the growth of the British Empire. Missionaries carried on their work through VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES, for example, the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (ABCFM) founded in 1810, and by denominational boards and agencies of various denominations led by clergy and laity. American Presbyterian layman Robert E. Speer (1867–1947) emerged as a world statesman. These leaders engaged not only in EVANGELISM and conversion but also in education, founding schools at every level, including seminaries, building hospitals, and engaging in other works of PHILANTHROPY and nation-building. This effort by various Presbyterian denominations caused some confusion among indigenous populations. Therefore, even before the postcolonial age, indigenous ecumenical endeavors and theologies emerged in various countries. Furthermore, Presbyterian emphasis on the priesthood of all believers, an educated ministry and membership, and participation in church governance fostered education, DEMOCRACY, and HUMAN RIGHTS along with economic ferment in host countries. Bauswein and Vischer demonstrate how widespread this development was. An early study Rethinking Missions (1932), edited and written by WILLIAM ERNEST HOCKING, aided by laymen Speer and Methodist JOHN R. MOTT, underscored the breadth of this development.

Reformed Christians began to evangelize in the Middle East in the middle of the eighteenth century. They found ancient Eastern Orthodox churches there and aimed to reform them, a purpose the Orthodox did not always appreciate (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN). The ABCFM sent Congregationalists to the area in the early nineteenth century. They were followed by Presbyterians. American Henry H. Jessup (1823–1910) went to Syria where he helped to establish what is now the University of Beirut; his ministry reached all the way to Iran. He spent over fifty-three years in the area, became a missionary statesman, and was offered a diplomatic post by President Chester Arthur, a position he did not take. The UPCNA missionaries built the largest Presbyterian presence in Egypt, beginning with an attempt to revitalize the Coptic church there in 1854. They organized the first Presbyterian Church in Cairo in 1863, and started educational and medical institutions in later years. In 1858 the Coptic Evangelical Church-Synod of the Nile became independent. It holds the Apostles and the Westminster Standards, and claims about 300,000 members. It ordains women to all church offices, and it works for better relations with the Coptic Christians.

Dutch Reformed colonists settled in SOUTH AFRICA as early as 1652 and began to dominate the area. They were followed by English-speaking Presbyterians of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, which founded a mission in 1829. In 1897 mission stations around the country founded the Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa, integrated now with about 90,000 adherents living under the Apostles Creed. Scot Robert Moffat took the Gospel north into Rhodesia, now called Zimbabwe. The Presbyterian Church of Africa, an all-black denomination, was started under the leadership of Pamboni Mzimba in 1898. The denomination now claims 927,000 members. It lives under the Apostle's Creed and the Westminster Standards, and ordains women to all offices of the church.

Central Africa was colonized first by FRANCE and then by Belgium, which exploited its resources. PCUS missionaries began to found churches there in 1891 whose influence spread through the Kasai. In the first decade of the twentieth century missionaries William H. Sheppard, an African American, and William M. Morrison won Congolese hearts and minds by protesting the brutal exploitation of Africans by King Leopold. They exposed his company's injustices to natives for not making their rubber quotas. The Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa founded a Synod in 1955, subscribes to the Apostles Creed and Westminster Standards, and ordains women to all church offices. It claims 1,250,000 members, is a member of the Church of Christ in Zaire, and is deeply concerned about civil rights not only in Central Africa but elsewhere. The Presbyterian Church of NIGERIA began in 1846 under the leadership of freed slaves from Jamaica sent out by the Church of Scotland. Later, missionary MARY SLESSOR (1848–1915) carried on work as a teacher, preacher, and health provider—and promoted reform in this Muslim country. Through her work, along with that of others, the church grew and became autonomous in 1954. It accepts the Apostles and Nicene Creeds and the Westminster Standards, and ordains women to all offices of the church. It has almost 124,000 members and is engaged in extended medical work throughout the country. It should be noted that freed American slaves sent out by the AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY in 1822 helped found LIBERIA and assisted in building a Presbyterian Church there. There is a strong Reformed place in countries such as Ghana and Cameroon.

Presbyterians also traveled down under to Oceania and built churches in AUSTRALIA and NEW ZEALAND as well as INDONESIA. Although the Dutch touched base in the area in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, Scottish Presbyterians and Congregationalists settled there early in the nineteenth century. In 1840 Presbyterians established the Synod of Australia connected with the Church of Scotland. Even though they experienced disagreements over the years, they were able to unite as the Presbyterian Church in Australia in 1901. In 1977 many went into the UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA with Methodists, holding to a presbyterial structure. The denomination holds to a range of Reformed Confessions as well as JOHN WESLEY Sermons as its affirmation of faith. It has a membership of about 1,386,000. About 70,000 adherents continue in the Presbyterian Church in Australia.

British settlement of New Zealand began as early as 1814. By 1840 Presbyterians were able to form congregations as Scots of various denominations continued to move down under. They were able to unite in 1901. The Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa, New Zealand adheres to the Apostles Creed, Westminster Standards, and a New Zealand Statement of Faith. Australian and New Zealand Presbyterians carry on a number of ministries in a variety of indigenous languages.

Portuguese Roman Catholics planted Christianity in South America. Later Calvin himself sent pastors to BRAZIL to serve Huguenot settlers encouraged by the French government to move there. Later Reformed and Presbyterian missionaries planted churches in various countries on the continent, for example, Argentina, Chile, and Peru. When the Brazilian government broadened its religious toleration in the nineteenth century, Scot Robert Reid Kalley (1809–1882), a Presbyterian physician, founded a congregation in 1858. A year later Ashbel Green Simonton of the PCUS arrived in Rio de Janeiro to spread the Word and organized a presbytery in 1865. The PCUSA missionaries joined this effort and, together with the PCUS, built the strong Presbyterian Church of Brazil (PCB) in the 1880s. Others with a sense of Brazilian enterprise organized an indigenous Independent Presbyterian Church (IPCB) in 1903 under the leadership of Eduardo Pereira. The PCB adheres to the Apostles Creed and Westminster Standards. It has approximately 480,000 members, with no women officers. The IPCB also adheres to the Apostles Creed and Westminster Standards and ordains women ministers. A number of ethnic churches have emerged. Over the years Brazilians have strengthened bonds of the Reformed family in the nation. JOHN A. MACKAY, another Scot who had studied in Spain, served as educator in Peru. There is still a Peruvian Presbyterian presence.

Presbyterians also spread to Asian lands, such as, CHINA, KOREA, and JAPAN. Although Christianity had been planted in the area earlier by Roman Catholics, Scottish missionaries arrived in China as early as 1807. They were followed by other Presbyterians from Britain and the United States who translated the Bible and spread the Gospel (see BIBLE TRANSLATION). They believed, as did other Christians, that if China could be won to Christianity, the whole world would be converted. By 1906 Presbyterian churches, joined by the Reformed Church in America, formed a Council of Presbyterian Churches. By 1927 this body, in a spirit of cooperation, joined other Christians to form the Church of Christ in China. Western interest in China and the Chinese was stirred by author Pearl S. Buck, a missionary educator of the PCUSA. Her novel The Good Earth (1931) awakened the world to the struggles of Chinese peasants. The Church of Christ centers its attention on the Bible, and adheres to the person and work of Christ and the Apostles Creed. It holds to the Presbyterian form of government. After the repression of churches under the Peoples Republic of China, Presbyterians in the postcolonial and postdenominational age cooperate with the China Christian Council and affirm the Three-Self Formula popularized by Presbyterian John L. Nevius (1829–1893), that is, the call to build self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating churches to serve the whole Christian community (see POST-COLONIALISM).

Presbyterianism has grown fastest over the years in Korea, often ruled by its neighbors through the centuries. Jesuits first planted the Gospel in Korea in the eighteenth century and were persecuted. Later a layman, Suh Sang-Yoon, was converted in 1876 while in Manchuria by Scottish missionaries, and helped to translate the New Testament in Korean. He brought it home and formed a small Christian community. PCUSA missionaries, Horace Allen, a physician, and Horace G. and Lilius Underwood, also a physician, arrived with others to evangelize, establish schools and seminaries, and offer medical care. They began to build the Korean church. In a Revival Movement of 1907, led by Presbyterian Sun-Joo Kim (1869–1935), Presbyterianism spread with the use of the Three-Self Formula. The Korean Presbyterians seemed to flourish in difficult times under Japanese domination and Korea's authoritarian governments, protesting such oppression in a Theological Declaration (1973). Although Korean Presbyterianism is divided into a bewildering number of denominations, there are four large bodies. The Presbyterian Church of Korea (Hap Dong) numbers around 2,160,000 members, the Presbyterian Church of Korea (Dong Hap) records 2,095,300 adherents, the Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea (Ki Jang) has 326,000 supporters, and the Presbyterian Church in Korea (Kc Shin), ministers to 363,000 Koreans. Some of these bodies are more liberal than others; some are fundamentalists. Most hold to the Apostles Creed and Westminster Standards, and the largest ordain women to all offices of the church. Korean Presbyterians have spread across the world to build congregations and denominations, to carry on EVANGELISM, and to make contributions to their adopted countries. For example, Syngman Rhee, with roots in North Korea, served as moderator of PCUSA in 1999. He encourages and works for the unification of North and South Korea, and for contacts with other Christians of the area. Presbyterian missionaries established churches in Japan, and many converts belong to the United Church of Christ in Japan (Kyodan), founded in 1941. Presbyterians motivated Toyohiko Kogawa, noted Japanese reformer.

The Dutch also planted the Reformed tradition in INDIA as early as the seventeenth century. In the nineteenth century Scottish Presbyterians sent Alexander Duff (1806–1878) to India. He and others began to established churches, schools, and hospitals. Presbyterians tended to identify with untouchables, challenge the caste system, and tried to impart a sense of dignity to India's masses. Later American Presbyterians, such as layman Sam Higginbotton (1874–1959), and the PCUSA mission introduced modern agricultural methods to Indians and founded Allahbad University (1932). His wife, Liliias, cared for India's lepers. Over the years Presbyterians joined other Protestant denominations to form the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA (1947) and the CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA (1970). The Presbyterian Church of India (PCI), in Northeast India, began under Welch mission efforts in 1841. The first presbytery was organized in 1867, followed by a Synod formed in 1896 and a General Assembly. This is the largest such body in the area. The church allows Synods much freedom. The PCI adheres to the Apostles Creed and Westminster Confession, and ordains women as ministers. It carries on a multilingual mission and counts almost 798,000 members. Presbyterianism has been at work in Pakistan as early as 1849 in Lahore.

As already indicated, the ecclesiastical bodies mentioned here represent only a few of the larger Presbyterian bodies founded by the British and North Americans, and more recently by mission efforts of younger churches. They do not embrace the accomplishments of the larger Reformed family. Over centuries these efforts have shaped the worldwide community of independent bodies of diverse ETHNICITY. They have given rise to cultural revivals in various parts of the world and to indigenous theologies and programs. As also suggested, Presbyterians have had their differences and divisions, although they have continued to confess belief in the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic church, and they have cooperated, mended divisions, and still seek the unity of the whole Christian community. In 1875 they joined other Reformed bodies to organize the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES throughout the world holding to the Presbyterian system (WARC), headquartered first in Knox's Scotland, now in Calvin's Geneva. American Presbyterian PHILIP SCHAFF (1819–1893), born in SWITZERLAND, played a leading role in founding this body. In 1970 WARC merged with the International Congregational Council to found WARC (Presbyterian and Congregational), with 211 denominational affiliates, and numbering an estimated 70,000,000 members.

Presbyterians have also fostered ecumenical endeavors in their own countries, such as the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and Churches Uniting in Christ in the USA, and world conferences, such as the EDINBURGH MISSION CONFERENCE (1910) and the LAUSANNE CONFERENCE (1927) to promote theological consensus among Christians. They were present at the founding of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (1948) in Geneva, often led by Presbyterians, such as Scot JOSEPH H. Oldham (1874–1969) and American EuGENE CARSON BLAKE (1906–1985). They have promoted INTERCONFESSIONAL DIALOGUE, not only with other Protestants but also with Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches, and built bridges to non-Christians, Jews, Muslims, and others, while still holding to the transforming power of Christ. They have also supported the CHURCH WORLD SERVICE, the United Nations, and defended human rights as a witness to Christian life as well as faith.

See also Anabaptism; Anglicanism; Congregationalism; Lutheranism; Methodism

References and Further Reading

- Agbiti, J.Kofi. West African Church History, 1886–1991. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1991. [passim M414A264]
- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide, A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B.Eerdmans, 1999.
- Benedetto, Robert, Darrell L.Guder, and Donald K.McKim. Historical Dictionary of Reformed Churches. Landham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 1999. [Especially Bibliography, 359–482, and appendices.]
- Bolan, C.Gordon, Jeremy Goring, H.L.Short, and Roger Thomas. The English Presbyterians, from Elizabethan Puritanism to Modern Unitarianism. Boston: Beacon Press, 1996.
- Brooke, Peter. Ulster Presbyterianism: The Historical Perspective, 1610–1970. 2nd ed. Belfast, Northern Ireland: Athol Book, 1994.
- Brown, Arthur Judson. One Hundred Years: A History of the Foreign Missionary Work of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. New York: Fleming H.Revell, 1936.
- Brown, G.Thompson. Earthen Vessels and Transcendent Power: American Presbyterians in China, 1837–1952. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1997.
- . Not by Might: A Century of Presbyterians in Korea. Atlanta, GA: General Assembly Mission Board, Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), 1984.
- Coalter, Milton J., John Mulder, and Louis B.Weeks, eds. The Presbyterian Experience. 7 vols. Louisville, KY: John Knox, 1991–1995.
- Drury, Clifford M., ed. Four Hundred Years of World Presbyterianism. San Francisco: Privately published, 1961. [Microfilm]
- Elder, Earl E. Vindicating A Vision: The Story of the American Mission in Egypt, 1854–1954. Philadelphia, PA: United Presbyterian Board of Publication, 1958.
- Isichei, Elizabeth. A History of Christianity in Africa. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B.Eerdmans, 1995.
- Moir, John S. Enduring Witness: A History of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. Toronto, Canada: Presbyterian Publications, 1975.
- Pierson, Paul E. A Younger Church in Search of Maturity: Presbyterianism in Brazil from 1910 to 1959. San Antonio, TX: Trinity University, 1973.
- Scrimgeour, Robert J. Some Scots Were Here: A History of the Presbyterian Church in South Australia, 1839–1977. Adelaide, Australia: Lutheran Publishing House, 1994.
- Singh, D.V., ed. History of Christianity in India. 6 vols. Bangalore: Church History Association of India, 1982–.

Smylie, James H. A Brief History of Presbyterians. Louisville, KY: Geneva Press, 1996.

——, ed. “American Presbyterians in India/Pakistan, 150 Years.” Journal of Presbyterian History 62 no. 3 (Fall 1984):198–281.

Thompson, Ernest Trice. Presbyterians in the South. 3 vols. Richmond, VA: John Knox, 1963–1973.

JAMES H.SMYLIE

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH GOVERNMENT

The theological premise that the will of God must be sought in community is the foundation of Presbyterian POLITY. With historical roots in the Scottish reformation, PRESBYTERIANISM has developed a form of government distinctly different from episcopal and congregational polities. LAITY and CLERGY together make decisions under this polity. Different levels of governing bodies interact to create mutual accountability. At its best, Presbyterian government allows the delicate balance between the wisdom of the community and the prophetic voice of the individual to work together toward discerning the will of God. When this balance has not been maintained, however, Presbyterian polity has been particularly susceptible to schism and denominationalism.

The origins of polity in Presbyterian churches, like their THEOLOGY, lie in the Scottish Reformation of JOHN KNOX, and before that, in JOHN CALVIN’S Geneva. From these sources Presbyterians derived the ordained offices of their polity, as well as their hierarchical structure of governing bodies. The adoption of the WESTMINSTER CONFSSION of Faith in the seventeenth century as the sole confessional standard of Presbyterian denominations until the mid-twentieth century brought to these churches a tension between the ORTHODOXY of the community and the individual right of conscience. Ongoing disputes as to the degree of adherence to the Westminster Confession required of ordained offices, particularly in the Presbyterian denominations in the UNITED STATES, reflected this tension, and deeply shaped the balance of AUTHORITY within the Presbyterian form of government.

Theologically, Presbyterian polity rests on a Reformed concern that leaving decision making in the church to individual church leaders, particularly in a hierarchical structure, has the potential to corrupt the CHURCH, given humanity’s fallen nature. On the other hand, with the bywords “all things decently and in order,” Presbyterians, consistent with their Reformed roots, place a high priority on orderly governance. Presbyterians thus believe that decisions made in community reflect God’s covenant with humanity, and that seeking to discern God’s will in this way imitates the communion of the triune God.

Presbyterians recognize the ordained offices of DEACON, elder, and minister of Word and Sacrament, tracing the roots of each to the New Testament church. Deacons do not have specific governing responsibilities but rather carry out ministry to persons in need or distress. Both elders (in some traditions called “ruling elders”) and ministers (in some traditions called “teaching elders”) are presbyters (from the Greek word presbuteros or elder) responsible for the government of the church at all levels. At all levels above the congregation, elders and ministers are typically represented in as equal a number as possible in all decision-making bodies.

Governing Bodies

Although hierarchical in appearance, governing bodies in Presbyterian denominations have a more complex interrelationship. Sessions, consisting of elders elected for a term and the minister or ministers serving a congregation, govern individual congregations. Presbyteries oversee the work of local congregations and carry out mission within their bounds. Synods and general assemblies (some Presbyterian denominations have both; other smaller denominations either call their highest governing body a SYNOD or have a general assembly without synods) care for the broader mission of the church and resolve disputes as to DOCTRINE and practice.

Deacons and elders are elected and ordained by local congregations. Ministers are ordained only by the presbyteries. The reservation of these rights to congregations and presbyteries serves as a check on what could otherwise become the dominating power of a general assembly (or in some Presbyterian denominations, the SYNOD) to control the church. In addition, all powers not specifically delegated to other bodies are reserved to the presbyteries.

A core component of Presbyterian polity is expressed in the Westminster Confession of Faith: "God alone is Lord of the conscience, and hath left it free from the doctrines and commandments of men which are in anything contrary to his Word, or beside it, in matters of faith or worship." Thus, although the elders on a session are elected by the congregation, and members of higher governing bodies are elected by lower governing bodies, Presbyterian polity is not a representative DEMOCRACY. Rather, members of governing bodies are commissioned to seek God's will in their decision making. This obligation to faithfully seek the will of God can allow a fruitful tension between the prophetic voice of the individual and the collective wisdom of the community. However, when a persistent minority concludes that the majority has not found God's will, the high value placed on individual conscience tends to lead to schism, as evidenced by the fractious history of Presbyterian denominations both in SCOTLAND and the United States.

Presbyterian polity differs from episcopal polity in its distrust of vesting power in individual religious leaders, particularly bishops, and by relationships between its various levels of governing bodies that are based on mutual accountability, rather than a hierarchical structure. On the other hand, Presbyterian polity rejects the autonomy vested in local congregations under congregational polities based on the view that the lack of mutual accountability between different levels of church government makes each more likely to err.

Presbyterian polity has been troubled in recent years by conflicting tendencies toward more hierarchical vesting of power in national governing bodies and a local tendency toward CONGREGATIONALISM. This tension is compounded by growing consumerism among church members, which makes obtaining commitments to lay leadership difficult on a consistent basis. On the other hand, in a period of community breakdown and resulting alienation, Presbyterian polity offers a model of community decision making in which the will of God is sought together, and the body of Christ built up and renewed.

See also Bishop and Episcopacy

References and Further Reading

Chapman, William E. History and Theology in the Book of Order: Blood on Every Page. Louisville, KY: Witherspoon Press, 1999.

Gray, Joan S., and Joyce C. Tucker. Presbyterian Polity for Church Officers. 3rd ed. Louisville, KY: Geneva Press, 1999.

Loetscher, Lefferts A. A Brief History of the Presbyterians. 4th ed. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1983.

JAMES A. WILSON

PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS

Although formulated for a narrower historical range, the title of Hans von Campenhausen's magisterial study, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries, describes a definitive tension in the larger Christian tradition. Priest and prophet, apostle and charismatically endowed congregation, duly called pastor and energized LAITY confront one another uneasily in the church's sources and history, commonly contending over leadership, sometimes coming together in mission and service. The phrase "priesthood of all believers," historically associated with MARTIN LUTHER and the REFORMATION, arises from the side of spiritual power. It has been used as a critical principle over against perceived clerical domination; positively, to describe the vocations of the faithful in everyday life. In Protestantism the priesthood of all believers has been invoked for more democratic forms of church governance.

The Sources

Appealing to a prior authority of the Scripture, Protestant theories of the priesthood of all believers have emerged out of conversation with the Old and New Testaments. Whatever the disclaimers, though, TRADITION has also played a significant part in the discussion.

In the Old Testament, priesthood is generally associated with rituals of sacrifice. So, for example, in Leviticus and Numbers, priestly codes are spelled out, defining both the quality and quantity of the appropriate sacrifices in circumstances that demand them. The priests' office derives its authority from this sacrificial service, which is understood to maintain the community's standing in relation to the divine COVENANT.

Embedded deeply within the Old Testament narrative, however, lies a trenchant critique of priestly claims, predating the emergence of the sacrificial cultus and accompanying it. As the definitive priest, responsible for prescribing ritual by mediating God's law, Moses is also the original prophet, setting standards for its authenticity (Numbers 12:6–8). Also a priest, Samuel has a standing defined by the spiritual power with which he has been endowed—he is a charismatic judge, overseeing the legitimate functions of authority in the community (I Samuel 8:10–22). Later prophets, like Hosea and Amos, evidence greater distance from the priestly cultus. “I hate, I despise your festivals...” God says in the hearing of Amos, “Even though you offer me your burnt offerings and grain offerings, I will not accept them” (5:21). If the priest's authority is defined by association with sacrifice, the prophet's arises exclusively out of the divine word, with which he has been entrusted as speaker.

With the distinction in forms of authority, the prophets also set out a different standard for the covenant community. The ritual cleanliness required for sacrifice gets replaced by justice and righteousness, defined in terms of particular forms of service—to the widow, the alien, and the poor, for example. It is in this sense that the people of Israel are spoken of as a “nation of priests” or a “priestly kingdom” (Exodus 19:2). God has made covenant with Israel for the sake of the other nations of the world, a theme struck resoundingly in the books of Ruth, Jonah, and Isaiah.

Apocalyptically charged, shaped by Christ's death and resurrection, the New Testament emerges out of the prophetic tradition of ministry and radicalizes it accordingly. The tension between official authority and spiritual power is tipped so decisively in favor of an outpouring that offices survive only at the margins, in emergent forms. There are several factors in this tipping.

One factor is historical origins. Identified with Nazareth in Galilee, Jesus comes from the Diaspora, where the normative form of WORSHIP was not sacrifice but the PREACHING and teaching services of the synagogue. The Gospels report various visits to the temple in Jerusalem, where the rituals of sacrifice continued to be practiced, but they are fraught with conflict—whether in the report of a child prodigy confounding the elders (Luke 2:41–52), more spectacularly in an onslaught on the money changers and temple profiteers (Matthew 21:12–17), or in the quiet prophecy before the passion, “Do you see these great buildings? Not one stone will be left upon another” (Mark 13:2).

A second factor involves Jesus's mission. Baptized by John, Jesus from the beginning identifies himself with sinners in need of renewal and promises the transcending of such moral overhaul in a BAPTISM of the Spirit (Luke 3:15–22). He travels through the countryside as a wandering rabbi, gathering adherents—twelve disciples, formally identified as such, and untold others, including among them women who take a critical role in the narrative, crucially identified with the passion and the resurrection. Breaking moral and GENDER boundaries, Jesus presses at the geographic borders of the sacred as well, reaching out to those excluded by ETHNICITY: among the tax collectors and prostitutes there are also Roman soldiers (as well as their terrorist counterpart, zealots), Syro-phoenicians, and Samaritans.

However, the decisive factor in this tipping from the official is the cross and the resurrection. For the community that he gathered, the death of Jesus was a disaster of such proportions that not even the Easter accounts could negate it. “We had hoped he would be the redemption of Israel,” Cleopas and his companion say, speaking in the past perfect without knowing the identity of the one to whom they speak (Luke 24:21). Jesus appears as both the crucified and the risen one, bearing the marks of his death even as he appears from beyond it.

The sacrificial tradition of Israel plays a critical part in the church's interpretation of the death of Jesus. Although the terminology is different, the conceptuality of the sacrificial tradition serves as a container for the Christ hymn of Philippians 2:5–11, one of the earliest Christian creeds: "he emptied himself, taking on the form of a servant, becoming obedient unto death, even death on a cross." Speaking specifically against Israel's sacrificial cultus, the Letter to the Hebrews describes Jesus's sacrifice as "once for all" (Hebrews 7:27), the ultimate fulfillment, and therefore completion and end. In effect the death of Jesus is the final manifestation of his own words, familiar from the prophetic tradition but now enacted, "I desire mercy, not sacrifice" (Matthew 9:13).

Once Jesus's cross has torn open the temple curtain (Mark 15:38), the resurrection follows as apocalyptic outpouring. Manifesting him as Lord, God in the flesh (Romans 1:4), Easter also reveals a new condition of life, in which the gifts of the end time—forgiveness of sins, deliverance from death and its allied powers—are present realities. As such, the resurrection places every earthly power, whether official or unofficial, in question, and turns loose a divine flood in the everyday.

The Apostle Paul declares the negation, most emphatically in I Corinthians 15. Risen from the dead, Christ is presently undermining "every ruler, and every authority and power," and will complete this mission when death itself is suborned (vss. 23–25). A present reality among believers, this hope delayed the development of offices in the Christian community for virtually a century. "Call no man on earth your father," Jesus is quoted as saying, "you have one father, who is in heaven" (Matthew 23:9). The apostles, so important in the Gospel accounts and in the early mission of the church, are told in the midst of self-promotion that the first will be last (Mark 9:35) and exposed again and again in the narratives for their foolishness. Peter can only be "the rock" (Matthew 16:13–28) when he is also identified as three times the betrayer. In fact, the office of apostle is so closely associated with Jesus's historic presence that it is restricted to the first generation. Thus Paul describes himself as the "least of the apostles" or "afterbirth" (I Corinthians 15:8).

Given the political necessities of communal life—such as "waiting on tables," in Acts—some official function would be demanded, no matter how powerful the critique. In fact, the two congregations that appear in the New Testament—in Jerusalem and Corinth—both show some movement in this direction. In Jerusalem, Luke, considered the author of both the Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles, is particularly concerned to show the divine origin of the apostolate and describes the election of deacons, called to other forms of service while the apostles preach. Confronted by the claims of Corinthians who believe that the resurrection has carried them beyond all earthly limits, Paul is at some pains to move beyond a merely personal to a more public authority. In the Pastoral Epistles, toward the end of the New Testament period, three offices are developing: with the deacons there are also bishops and presbyters. However, as Ernst Schweizer observed conclusively, "there is no theory of church order in the New Testament." Jesus's lordship leaves every human office in shards, which have value only in their connection with him.

Terminating the sacrificial, undermining the official, with the cross the resurrection of Jesus is also an outpouring. In Luke's account this happens at Pentecost. The Spirit of the risen Christ, sent to the church after his ascension into heaven, breaks out in wind and flame. In the process the ethnic and linguistic borders that have divided the human community are blown, burned away like so many leaves—“they all heard the word, each in his own language” (Acts 2:8). With this, through the apostolic preaching, the Spirit assaults a host of other impediments, be they economic, social, political, or immunological. Christ’s resurrection has released the Spirit of life in a world previously under the uncontested control of death.

In a passage beloved of various Protestant traditions, Paul defines “GRACE” or charis in the Greek, in terms of the resurrection: “the wages of sin is death but the free gift of grace is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Romans 6:23). As the power of the resurrection, grace manifests itself in the life of the believer as well as the larger community in the shape of particular gifts, given for service—charis—at the same time that it carries those so possessed by the Spirit beyond death, also producing charismata, specific endowments given for service in the mundane relations of everyday. So endowed, those graced by the Spirit of the risen Christ become charismatic—the Spirit has invested its particular gifts, whether prophecy or administration or otherwise, in the continuing reclamation of a rebellious world that was begun in Christ’s death.

Not surprisingly, given deep rootage in the prophetic tradition, in Paul’s language the Spirit’s outpouring results in a reorientation of the language of sacrifice. “Present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God,” he writes when he turns to the earthly dimensions of grace, “which is your spiritual worship” (Romans 12:1–2). Justifying the godless, the triune God turns sacrifice away from ritual qualification and appeasement, taking hold of the body—the self in all of its concrete dimensions and relationships—to make believers useful to the divine purpose of the Creator, in the creation and with other creatures. The self-seeking, heaven-storming, religious person, intent on gaining control over the powers of death, in being released from such bondage is turned back to the creation in the confidence that bringing in the new creation, the Holy Spirit can make even such a creature some earthly good.

Whether in Luke’s historicizing account or Paul’s more theological treatment, their vision of the out-pouring opened by Christ’s death and resurrection is shared by all the New Testament. “All authority, in heaven and earth, has been given to me,” Jesus says in Matthew 28:19–20. On this basis the community is called to “go and make disciples of all nations” by baptizing and preaching. When the work is complete, in the authority and power of the risen Christ, the whole creation—in Ephesians and Colossians, the whole cosmos—will have been restored. Then, according to Revelation 21, there will be no temple, neither any church. Both ecclesiastical authority and spiritual power will have been transcended by the presence of God.

Given the historic tension between ecclesiastical office and spiritual authority, it is to be expected that even having been overwhelmed in the defining events of the New Testament, the official side would reassert itself soon. The lack of a comprehensive theory of church order left an opening to be filled; the disorder of the Pauline congregations, seemingly in constant conflict, and the press of community maintenance combined with other factors to move the church in this direction. So in the post-Apostolic fathers, as traditionally named, what began in the later reaches of the New Testament continues to develop. Ignatius of Antioch, for example, reflecting regional theories of leadership, can make the presence of the bishop, or someone appointed by him, necessary to the gathering of the church.

Ignatius's employment of local Antiochene tradition points to the ongoing influence of nonbiblical, nontheological factors in the development of church order. The various traditions within the Christian faith—Orthodox, Catholic, or Protestant—commonly appeal to the Scripture for ratification of a particular theory, whether for official authority or spiritual power. In fact the appeal is generally cloaked in terms of necessity with claims to the eternally proper or only correct form, although communal leadership, no matter what the scale, is also a political matter. Thus transient factors such as traditional leadership patterns, local circumstance, and current need have a dramatic way of affecting what is said to be eternal.

The office of BISHOP becomes particularly strategic with the growth of the church, the bishops being effectively senior pastors in larger parishes, served in turn by presbyters or priests and deacons. Occasionally, there is a minority voice from the other side—Tertullian, in North Africa, for example—and the laity may retain the power of election in various communities, as they did with such legendary bishops as Ambrose and Augustine. By the second century, however, the New Testament balance has changed, ecclesiastical office claiming the ascendancy.

Two events are critical in subsequent developments of church order. One is the Constantinian and Theodosian settlement, in the fourth century, in which Christianity became established as the religion of the Roman Empire. As it joined the state, sharing the coercive power necessary to maintaining a common order, the church bureaucratized its ministry. The bishop is now a regional official, on par with a magistrate, enforcing ORTHODOXY, overseeing a staff of ministers. Another signal event is the fall of Rome and the later loss to militant Islam of safe passage through the Mediterranean. With public life atomized, reduced to its smallest components, the local bishop and under him the parish priest became the local embodiment of the church.

The office that benefited most significantly from these developments is the papacy. Into the fifth century the bishop of Rome is one office holder among others, advancing the same ultimate claims for himself as bishops in Alexandria, Antioch, or Constantinople. However, a series of dramatically powerful popes—Leo I, Gregory I, and later Gregory VII, with or without the theorizing of Pope Damasus and Gelasius—consolidated the powers of the Roman bishop-ric, making it the one workable international office in early medieval Europe. Thirteenth-century figures like Innocent III and Boniface VIII completed the process, describing the papacy in sacerdotal terms as the physical embodiment of Christ's rule on earth. Such a sacerdotalism makes any talk of a tension between ecclesiastical authority and spiritual power an abstraction.

Luther and the Reformation

Traditionally Protestants have told the story of the Reformation as a narrative of biblical recovery—Luther leading the way back to the Scripture. In fact, there is an element of truth to the old account. With a newly minted doctorate Luther was a professor of biblical studies, working his way particularly through the Psalms and Paul's letters, especially to the Romans. Sometime late in the teens of the sixteenth century, the date perennially disputed, Luther came to what for the later Middle Ages was an unusual way of reading the texts, in terms of their apocalyptic meaning, with a particular emphasis on the cross. The result was an exegetical revolution.

Revolutions, no matter how radical, are generally not driven by exegesis alone. A maelstrom of historic causes gathered around his early protest, swirling, accelerating, propelling his initial complaints into a protest as wide as Northern Europe. Some of the factors were regional, particularly a long-standing hostility to Mediterranean dominance. Other were socioeconomic, the most important being population growth and a developing cash economy that combined to force migration from farm to city. A powerful Moslem military threat, sporadic outbursts of plague, and a pervasive disgust with public morality all fed a profound sense of the nearness of the end times.

In this mix Luther's appeal to the priesthood of all believers proved catalytic. As he himself worked with it, the argument moved in both of the directions set classically in the New Testament. Initially it was a critique of an ECCLESIOLOGY dominated by office, restoring what von Campenhausen called the "spiritual power" side of the tension, even if such language would be strange to Luther. As such, the critique did not develop into a full-blown doctrine of church governance in either Luther or the Lutheran confessions, definitive for the church that still bears his name. With its critical edge, however, the priesthood of believers was also linked to what has been called "the doctrine of vocation," which for Luther specified the place of Christian service.

In the view of Luther as well as the humanist reformers gathered around Erasmus—HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, JOHANNES OECOLAMPADIUS, MARTIN BUCER, and others—the medieval papacy was predicated on the sacrifice of the mass (see LORD'S SUPPER). This dogma, officially defined by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215, held that in presenting the transubstantiated elements of the sacrament—the bread and wine having become the actual historic body and blood of Jesus of Nazareth—the priest performing the sacramental action was effectively re-presenting Christ's sacrifice to God. Just as the authority of the Old Testament priesthood derived from the sacrificial act, the authority of the pope as sacerdos, physically embodying Christ on earth, derived from the sacrament. Through the bishops, the papacy controlled both those who administered the sacrament, legitimizing ordination, and those allowed to participate and therefore benefit, through the sacrament of communion. The cutting edge of papal authority was in excommunication, exclusion from the sacrament or in its greater form, membership in the larger community.

The Upper Rhine reformers, students of Erasmus concentrated in Southwest GERMANY and SWITZERLAND, attacked this theory of authorization of the papacy by denying the connection between the historic body of Christ and his Eucharistic presence, in the elements. So doing, they set footings for much of modern Protestantism, in which the sacrament has historically been interpreted as a memorial meal.

Luther went a different direction. Reaching back into the prophetic tradition of the Old Testament as interpreted in the New, he argued that the means of Christ's presence is God's word, whether in its preached or sacramental form. As the vehicle or means of God's presence, the word is at the same time God's power at work in the human community to affect the divine purposes. Thus "priesthood" and "sacrifice" have both been reoriented—instead of humankind's service to God, they are exercised in proclamation of the word that bespeaks God's presence in Christ for the restoration of the creation. Instead of simply communicating information, which must then be understood by reason and applied by the will, the word in its preached and sacramental forms actually accomplishes God's intentions among the faithful for the larger world.

Early on in what became the Reformation, Luther did not spell out some of the more radical consequences of his interpretation. However, as the papal bureaucracy moved to quell what was becoming a major uprising in Germany, Luther became more and more specific about the implications. Two of the great treatises of 1520, The Babylonian Captivity of the Church and To the German Nobility, set benchmarks in his critique of the medieval church. "Therefore," he writes in the former, analyzing the medieval sacramental system, "I can have mass every day. For I can set before me the word of God." Then, having broken the papal sacramental lock on God's grace, he called on the German nobility to put its hands to the reformation of the church. Because the means of God's activity in the human community is the word, it can be both held over and against those who claim it and spoken by all who hear it. "The Word of God is incomparably superior to the church," he can write.

As the Wittenberg reform unfolded, Luther continued to use the concept of the priesthood of all believers critically. So, for example, in The Right and Power of a Christian Congregation or Community to Judge all Teaching and to Call, Appoint and Dismiss Teachers, Established and Proved from Scripture, he argued that the word's authorization of the community gives it a basis to challenge unfaithful CLERGY. Similarly, in Concerning the Ministry, Luther wrote to a congregation of Hussites who were without a properly ordained pastor that given the presence of the word, they could elect one of their own, setting that person aside for preaching and the administration of the SACRAMENTS.

As tellingly as he brought the critique, however, Luther did not develop the priesthood of all believers into a formal DOCTRINE or theory of church order. Neither did the Lutheran confessors. The concept of the priesthood of believers is altogether absent from the AUGSBURG CONFESSION, an absence lamented by some—including Regin Prenter, a critically important interpreter in twentieth-century Luther studies—and rejoiced in by others, such as Arthur Carl Piepkorn, seeking to establish a more official theory of ministry in American Lutheranism. The Formula of Concord of 1577 in its tenth article identifies circumstances that require resistance to the impositions of ecclesiastical authority, but again with little more than passing reference.

There have been attempts, among both European and American Lutherans, to develop Luther's and other confessional statements into a theory of church order, some of them emphasizing office, others the congregation. However, as Edgar Carlson, a Swedish-American Luther scholar of a prior generation argued, the sources themselves rest with a dialectic: God's continuing presence in the word requires a human office set aside for its speaking but limits the authority of the office to the speaking, whether in preaching or the sacraments; God's word establishes the congregation that therefore has a right to word and sacrament but at the same time limits the authority of the congregation accordingly. It is von Campenhausen's tension, both ecclesiastical authority and spiritual power being constitutive of the church and its ministry.

The priesthood of all believers takes a more positive turn in the doctrine of VOCATION. Luther did not directly employ the Pauline progression of grace and graces, charis, charism, charismata, although he followed the same down-to-earth movement of grace in everyday life. So in On Christian Liberty, the third of the great treatises of 1520, he argued a dialectic: “The Christian is the perfectly free lord of all, subject to none”; just so, the Christian is also “the perfectly dutiful servant of all, subject to all.” In the contemporaneous Sermon on Two Kinds of Righteousness, another classical source, he spoke of Christ’s righteousness being realized in a provisional but nevertheless actual righteousness of the believer, realized in everyday service. In later essays of the 1520s, particularly On Monastic Vows and Concerning Married Life, he located this service in the vocations or callings of the daily round—the formative relations of work and family, citizenship, and the life of the Christian community. Providing a platform for a relentless critique of either clericalism or congregationalism, the priesthood of all believers is realized in service of the word and the neighbor.

Later Protestantism

In the Reformation and after, the Lutheran willingness to leave church order in a dialectic proved an invitation to others seeking more precise definition. Protestant reformers were in general more careful, filling out more complete theories, although when Europeans began immigrating to America, the priesthood of believers found fresh and compelling grounds.

Losing significant allegiances in South, West, and even Northern Germany toward the end of the Reformation and later in the Thirty Years War, LUTHERANISM maintained its hold in Eastern Germany and the Scandinavian countries. The Peace of Augsburg in 1555, followed by the Peace of Westphalia in 1648, ratified a relationship already developing in the Reformation, whereby political officials provided a rudimentary structure for the church. Generally, actual governance of the church fell to consistories, gathering of pastors under the leadership of a superintendent who in function, though with rare exceptions not in title, replaced the bishops (see CONSISTORY). In the Scandinavian folk churches, citizenship and church membership came together. The priesthood of all believers became a rallying cry for various renewal movements that swept the nations, seeking to activate or “awaken” fidelity in the citizenry.

JOHN CALVIN was not one to rely on chance. Considering himself to be completing what Luther began, he resolved the Lutheran dialectic into a theory of church order intended to transform Geneva into the “beacon on the hill” of Jesus’s Sermon on the Mount. For this purpose he took over the language of the Pastoral Epistles, although without the title “bishop” so compromised by late medieval Catholicism. The pastors, the elders, and the deacons worked together in a system of check and balance, each of them theoretically subject to “the glorious company”—the assembled laity who as object of ministry also had the power of a vote. Although eventually contained in FRANCE, Calvin’s homeland and first objective, CALVINISM spread to Western and Northern Germany and with some roots in ENGLAND, eventually established itself in SCOTLAND.

That which was predictable in Europe became unpredictable in America. In the old European order, established churches could rely on the states’ coercive powers, just as the early church following the Constantinian settlement. Where they were established by the state, Protestant churches accepted definitions of ministry focused on office, although as Sidney Earl Mead, longtime dean of American church historians pointed out, in the United States the churches surrendered access to coercion. Initially the surrender was geographically enforced—dissenters, like ROGER WILLIAMS, simply moved, finding an open frontier. The disestablishment clause of the constitution made the geographical reality legal as well. Those churches that had relied on coercion in Europe were forced in America to accept persuasion as the means to the desired end: voluntary association.

Even on the western side of the Atlantic, established European churches did not always surrender easily. There were attempts to replicate the old patterns, some of them—such as folk church Lutheranism—proving surprisingly enduring. Generally, however, the communities of faith best prepared for religious freedom were those that in Europe had already had some experience with supporting themselves through appeal. The various renewal movements that had moved through the state churches, the dissenters and heirs of the radical Reformation, had learned through hard experience how to survive as minorities, dependent on appeal, and they put the experience to good use. It did not take long for previously established churches to follow their lead, adopting the anxious bench, the crusade, and other paraphernalia calculated to move the will to acceptance of God's proffered grace.

The priesthood of all believers was conceptually made to order for the American situation. In historic churches that had defined themselves and their ministry top-down, it had been a critical principle. In churches building themselves bottom-up, seeking adherents, the priesthood of all believers became a de facto necessity of church order. So, for example, High Church Episcopalians, deriving the authenticity of the church through the succession of the bishops, were soon forced to put candidates up for popular vote, thereby emplacing in practice another form of authorization. The clergy learned quickly to adapt. As ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE noticed in a famous observation, "everywhere in America where one expects to meet a priest, one finds a politician"—a pastor who had learned the power of the annual meeting, and therefore the necessity of getting along with the congregation.

Denominationalism and congregationalism are two important consequences. Neither has European, not to speak of earlier roots in the life of the church; both are adaptations to voluntary association. The DENOMINATION bands congregations of similar background and purpose in a common effort; congregationalism gives the priesthood of all believers a political form, so that those who have joined the congregation have the last word in its governance. No matter what form the theory of ecclesiastical authority may take, power—be it spiritual or otherwise—tells the tale.

References and Further Reading

- Brunotte, Wilhelm. Das Geistliche Amt bei Luther. Berlin, Germany: Lutherisches Verlagshaus, 1959.
- Campanhausen, Hans von. Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1969.
- Carlson, Edgar. "The Doctrine of the Ministry in the Confessions." The Lutheran Quarterly XV no. 2 (May 1963): 118–131.
- Eastwood, C. Cyril. The Priesthood of All Believers. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1962.
- . "Luther's Conception of the Church." The Scottish Journal of Theology 11 (1958):22–36.

- Ebeling, Gerhard. "The Protestant Idea of the Priesthood." In The Word of God and Tradition: Historical Studies Interpreting the Divisions of Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1964.
- Haendler, Gert. Luther on Ministerial Office and Congregational Function. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1981.
- Kasemann, Ernst. "Ministry and Community in the New Testament." In Essays on New Testament Themes. London: SCM Press, 1964.
- Mead, Sidney Earl. The Lively Experiment The Shaping of Christianity in America. New York: Harper & Row, 1963.
- Piepkorn, Arthur Carl. Profiles in Belief. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978.
- Prenter, Regin. Das Bekenntnis von Augsburg: eine Auslegung. Erlangen, Germany: Martin-Luther Verlag, 1980.
- Schweizer, Eduard. Church Order in the New Testament. London: SCM Press, 1961.
- von Rad, Gerhard. The Theology of the Old Testament. New York: 1962.
- Wingren, Gustaf. Luther on Vocation. Philadelphia, PA: Muhlenberg Press, 1957.

JAMES ARNE NESTINGEN

PRIESTLEY, JOSEPH (1733–1804)

English theologian and scientist. Priestley was born on March 13, 1733, a few miles southwest of Leeds, where his father was a Yorkshire weaver at Fieldhead in the parish of Birstall. His mother died when he was seven and shortly afterward he was adopted by an aunt, Sarah Keighley, at Heckmondwike. He attended various schools nearby and at an early age began to learn Greek, Latin, and then Hebrew. His proficiency at these and other languages led his aunt to abandon her intention to place him in commerce. His family having had a long history of DISSENT, Priestley was unable to proceed to either of the English universities. Accordingly, in 1752 he began studies at a new Dissenting Academy at Daventry. Here Priestley began studies in science, encouraged by a local Dissenting minister who was well versed in Newtonian science and philosophy. He encountered modern chemistry in the influential Elementa Chymiae of Boerhaave. He also read widely in THEOLOGY and began a long career of writing. A manuscript from this period, Institutes of Natural and Revealed Religion, although actually published seventeen years later, signaled a growing interest in natural theology. At Daventry he encountered Hartley's Observations on Man, which became crucially important for introducing him to the philosophical ideas of JOHN LOCKE and extending his early grasp of the science of ISAAC NEWTON.

In 1755 Priestley left Daventry to become assistant minister at Needham Market in Suffolk. Three years later he moved to Nantwich in Cheshire, an important center for the extraction of salt, serving the church there and opening a school where pupils could learn science as well as the more conventional subjects. In 1761 he accepted the post of tutor at the famous Warrington Academy, and a year later married Mary Wilkinson, sister of the future iron-master John Wilkinson. During this period he wrote books ranging from Rudiments of English Grammar and a Chart of Biography to The History and Present State of Electricity. This last volume appeared just after his election as FRS (Fellow in the Royal Society). By now he had become ordained and in 1767 became minister of Mill Hill Chapel in Leeds. More books poured from his pen during the six years in his native Yorkshire, some thirty in all, and his lively interest in science led to the invention of “soda water” (in which carbon dioxide is dissolved in water under pressure).

In 1767 he accepted an invitation from the Earl of Shelburne to become his librarian, and to act as tutor to his two sons, chiefly at Bowood House, near Calne in Wiltshire. Offering in effect part-time employment in a congenial place, the post left him ample time for scientific research (as had been the Earl’s intention). For another six years Priestley labored intensively in his laboratory, developing techniques for manipulating some of the gases that were being discovered by him and others, and obtaining a highly reactive gas that kindled glowing splints, which we know as oxygen but which he could never recognize as such. By now he was clearly one of Europe’s leading chemists.

His final, and longest, appointment in England saw him again as a minister, to the New Meeting congregation in Birmingham. Here he met many leading men of science (in the famous Lunar Society), and developed not only his science but also his political ideas. A series of broadsides against the establishment, including the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, brought him into disrepute and, in 1791, a crowd burned down several chapels and Priestley’s own house in the notorious “Church and King” riots. Forced to flee to London, Priestley found himself so unpopular that, in 1794, he emigrated to America, where he died on February 6, 1804.

Theologically Priestley moved from the most conservative to the most liberal form of Christianity. Turning from the strict CALVINISM of his youth, he had accepted Arianism by the 1750s, and by 1767 enthusiastically embraced SOCINIANISM, the thought of Laelio So. His rejection of the Trinity stemmed partly from his reading of scripture (where the actual term is not used), partly from his expressed desire to secure the CONVERSION of Jews and Muslims, and probably from his inherited tradition of radical dissent in which Unitarianism had often been an element of differentiation from the hated Established Church. His views were so extreme—and so clear—that he even opposed orthodox Dissenters, and in his final years was sadly despised by unbelievers and by orthodox Christians. His theology accepted the AUTHORITY of scripture, provided it be interpreted by rational means, but rejected Calvinist ideas of ATONEMENT and double PREDESTINATION.

Politically he detested SLAVERY, sympathized with the French Revolution, and expressed his views without inhibition. However, the revolution he sought was primarily in the mind, for he believed that rational thought would inevitably lead to reform in state and church. So in education the function of teacher was to eliminate prejudices and myths. His science, theology, and politics were inextricably linked by this fundamental belief. One such error in his sight was the notion of “spirit.” Opposing a theological dualism he denied spirits, which in chemistry (he thought) had exerted a retarding effect. Inert matter, with its attractions and repulsions, was the object of his concern.

Priestley did not believe in “arbitrary” divine interventions in either personal SALVATION or the natural world, which was grounded in God’s own creativity. Hence arose the laws of NATURE, so facts rather than hypotheses were the goal of science. Above all he wanted to establish a system of nature. His refusal to recognize the existence of oxygen was partly at least attributed to his mistrust of hypothetical schemes, like those invented by his rival Antoine Lavoisier. His devotion to the old idea of phlogiston was far from unusual at that time. To his many enemies he was wrong in all three areas: politics, theology, and chemistry. To posterity he was a most gifted man of science and a notable warrior for ENLIGHTENMENT Rationalism.

References and Further Reading

- Brooke, J.H. "'A sower went forth': Joseph Priestley and the Ministry of Reform." [Paper presented at the Third BOC Priestley Conference of the Royal Society of Chemistry, 1983, London.]
- Gibbs, W. Joseph Priestley, Adventurer in Science and Champion of Truth. New York: Nelson, 1965.
- "Joseph Priestley." Commemorative Issue of Enlightenment and Dissent no. 2 (1983).
- Kieft, L., and R.R.Willeford, eds. Joseph Priestley, Scientist, Theologian and Metaphysician. Lewisburg, PA: Bucknell University Press, 1980.

COLIN A.RUSSELL

PRIMITIVE BAPTIST

Primitive Baptist is a general term referring to Baptist churches that have roots in the antission movement of the antebellum era in the UNITED STATES, specifically those churches that interpret Calvinist doctrine to require opposition to missionary means (including MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS, Bible and tract societies, and the like) to spread the gospel. "Primitive" in this context comes from the nineteenth-century usage of the term, meaning "original," and carrying with it the connotation of restoring the ancient faith of Christians dating back to apostolic times from the corruption of modern innovations. Primitive Baptist churches are scattered throughout the United States, and a few exist overseas, although the bulk of their strength is in the Southeast and Appalachian regions. Primitive Baptist churches represent the decentralized, small-scale, traditionalist world of rural Protestantism.

Origins of Primitive Baptists

From their early days the BAPTISTS practiced a congregationalist system and BAPTISM by immersion, the two beliefs that have characterized virtually all Baptists through their history. However, very few doctrines have united what historically has been a disputatious tradition that has spread by division. Primitive Baptists emerged from one of these splits. In the 1820s in North Carolina, the Kehukee Association of Baptists became a leading advocate for the "Hard-shell" or "Old School" Baptists, those known for their strict adherence to Calvinist doctrines of limited ATONEMENT. They made known their opposition to the entire benevolent project of mission societies that were beginning to become prominent in American Protestantism.

In the fall of 1832, Baptists in Baltimore county, Maryland, called a meeting at the Black Rock Church. Attendees included Old School Baptists from all over the young country. The “Black Rock address” of 1832 set the agenda for the theology and practice of Primitive Baptists very largely down to the present day. In the doctrinal polemic the Primitive brethren explained their opposition to tract societies, SUNDAY SCHOOLS, BIBLE SOCIETIES, missions organizations, SEMINARIES, and protracted meetings (REVIVALS). All were contrary to God’s sovereign will; all encouraged the expansion of man’s wisdom and the diminution of God’s sover-eignty. The difference, as they saw it, came down to this: missionary Baptists “declare the gospel to be a system of means; these means it appears they believe to be of human contrivance.... But we believe the gospel dispensation to embrace a system of faith and obedience.” Those who honestly reflected on biblical commands “must be, like us, convinced that this religion must remain unchangeably the same at this day, as we find it delivered in the New Testament.... And if persons who would pass for preachers, will come to us, bringing the messages of men, &c., a gospel which they have learned in the schools, instead of that gospel which Christ himself commits unto his servants, and which is not learned of men, they must not be surprised that we cannot acknowledge them as ministers of Christ.”

Primitive Baptist Theology and Structure

The Primitives uphold the total depravity of natural man; personal and unconditional ELECTION; special atonement; irresistible GRACE; and preservation of the SAINTS. Primitive Baptists historically have eschewed larger denominational structures above the level of associations, that is, groupings of churches in local areas that meet annually for fellowship. DENOMINATIONS were seen as human contrivances that lacked any justification from the New Testament. In the twentieth century, however, groups such as the Progressive Primitive Baptists and the NATIONAL PRIMITIVE BAPTIST CONVENTION (the black Primitive Baptists) accepted into their organizations Sunday schools, denominational organizations, and a paid CLERGY.

Although in agreement on opposition to “means,” Primitive Baptists have been just as susceptible to schism as were other groups. Theological and social controversies—over issues as serious as the exact province of PREDESTINATION, and as seemingly trivial as the advent of indoor plumbing to the simple and spare meeting houses that characterize Primitive Baptist CHURCH ARCHITECTURE—have wracked Primitive Baptists virtually from their origins. After World War II, Primitive Baptists have gone into some decline, largely because of the exodus of population from the rural and Appalachian South where the Primitives historically were at their strongest. Nevertheless some contemporary Primitives have shown a greater ability than their predecessors to adopt to some of the mechanisms of modernity, including websites and radio broadcasts.

Primitive Baptist Practices

Aside from their theological insistence on predestinarian views of SALVATION and their opposition to organized and monied organizations to win CONVERSION from others, Primitive Baptists are best known for carrying on older traditions of WORSHIP; indeed, the most conservative Primitive Baptist churches are virtual time capsules of Baptist church practice from the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century. Historically, most Primitive Baptist churches have been pastored by lay elders, men (never WOMEN) who feel called to preach and have no expectation of making a living doing it. Primitive Baptist sermons, especially those in Appalachia, are usually long and chanted in a high-pitched, rhythmic, nasal-sounding whine, punctuated by grunts of “ha” as the preacher catches his breath between long and poetic discourses on the nature and sovereignty of God and the “sweet hope” of salvation. Most Primitive Baptists oppose instrumental church music, believing that nowhere in the New Testament are believers commanded to play instruments in sacred worship, and that instrumentalists call attention to themselves and thus draw proper focus away from the sovereignty of God. Generally, the more conservative the church, the more likely that church is to sing in the time-honored way with extremely slow tempos, a DEACON or elder lining out the hymn, and mournful minor keys being predominant. Primitive Baptists also typically practice foot-washing (see FEET, WASHING OF) as an ordinance. Although the Primitives see it as an ancient “landmark,” in fact the practice seems to have arisen mostly in the early twentieth century, as the Primitives sought to distinguish themselves more from mainline missionary Baptist practice. Washing feet often climaxes services, as the brethren and sisters tearfully bond over the powerfully affecting ritual.

Primitive Baptists carry out the faith once delivered to the saints, in highly decentralized organizations that uphold TRADITION over innovation, a stalwart trust in the sovereignty of God over the inroads of new theologies or SCIENCE, and what they see as a simple apostolic form of Christianity over hyperorganized and efficient church organizations.

See also Baptists, United States; Calvinism; Congregationalism

References and Further Reading

- Brackney, William. The Baptists. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1988.
- Crowley, John G. Primitive Baptists of the Wiregrass South. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1998.
- Dorgan, Howard. Giving Glory to God in Appalachia. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1988.
- Lambert, Cecil Byron. The Rise of the Antimission Baptists: Sources and Leaders, 1800–1840. New York: Arno Press, 1980.
- “Primitive Baptist Net.” <http://www.pb.net/> (Accessed May 20, 2002).

PAUL HARVEY

PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH

The Primitive Methodist Church's roots lie in an early nineteenth-century English revival movement led by Methodist lay leaders HUGH BOURNE and William Clowes, who espoused CAMP MEETING revivalism as promoted by Methodist revivalist Lorenzo Dow (see REVIVALS). An 1807 camp meeting held at Mow Cop in Northern Staffordshire became the rallying point of the movement. In 1812, after its leaders were rejected by the more staid English Wesleyan Methodist Connexion (see METHODISM, ENGLAND), they organized The Primitive Methodist Connexion popularly known as "Camp Meeting Methodists" or "Ranters." The church's advocacy for the laity and its simplicity of worship made it an attractive home for the struggling members of the rising British working class, some of whom became leaders of the British labor movement. By century's end it was the second largest Methodist body in England. The British Primitive Methodists united with the British Wesleyan Methodist Church in 1932.

In 1829 the Primitive Methodist church had sent missionaries to the UNITED STATES. Churches were founded across the country, but only in the northeastern part, among coal miners of Pennsylvania, in any significant concentration. The mission churches organized as the American Primitive Methodist Church in 1840. "American" later was dropped from the name. In 1889 the several conferences united under a common general conference, and in 1975 both the annual and the general conferences were united as the Primitive Methodist Church in the United States of America. The church has missions in Spain and Guatemala. It is affiliated with the National Association of Evangelicals and as a WESLEYAN HOLINESS body associates with The Christian Holiness Partnership.

See also Wesleyan Holiness Movement; Methodism; Revivals Holiness Movement

References and Further Reading

Acornley, John H. A History of the Primitive Methodist Church in the United States of America from Its Origin and The Landing of the First Missionaries in 1929 to the Present Time. Fall River, MA: B.R.Acornley, 1909.

Kendall, H.B. The Origin and History of the Primitive Methodist Church. London: Edward Dalton, n.d.

Werner, J.S. The Primitive Methodist Connexion: Its Background and Early History. Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 1984.

MELVIN E. DIETER

PROCESS THEOLOGY

Process theology depends on philosophies that have replaced the substance categories, dominant in the Western tradition, with events and processes. There are both scientific and philosophic reasons for this shift, and process theologians believe there are also theological advantages. Although it can include theologies influenced by GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH HEGEL and Henri Bergson, the term refers chiefly to those influenced by WILLIAM JAMES, John Dewey, C.S. Peirce, Alfred North Whitehead, and CHARLES HARTSHORNE. Of these, Whitehead and Hartshorne have been most important for theologians.

Distinctive Teachings

Process theology claims to recover a more biblical understanding of God from the overlay of Greek philosophy in the tradition. Traditional THEOLOGY depicts God as ideal substance. It thereby accents God's immutability, denying that God is genuinely affected by human joy and sorrow. Process theology argues, in contrast, that God, as love, is perfectly responsive to every occurrence.

Traditional theology has emphasized God's allcontrolling power. Because of the arbitrary rendering of El Shaddai as God Almighty, many Christians suppose that such omnipotence is a biblical teaching. Process theology points out that this denies that human beings have any power at all. Instead of explaining the history of the interaction between God and creatures characteristic of the biblical story, this doctrine implies that God unilaterally determines all that occurs, including human responses to divine calls. Some back away from this implication, affirming that God freely limits the exercise of divine power so as to leave decisions to human beings. Process theologians argue, instead, that the true nature of divine power is persuasive, empowering, and liberating rather than controlling, and that this is the kind of power revealed in Jesus and celebrated by Paul, when he speaks of divine power as manifest in the "weakness" of Christ crucified (cf. I Corinthians 2:21–25).

The doctrine of God's all-controlling power raises doubts about God's goodness. If God causes or allows the terrible events of history, it is hard to believe that God is good. Process theologians hold that, if we understand God's power as it is revealed in Jesus, the goodness of God is clear. God is working in all situations for the good of creatures, calling people to join in this work, and empowering them to do so.

Substance thinking teaches that relations are external to the things that are related. That is, these things would be just what they are even if their relationships were different. Process thinkers teach, instead, that relations largely constitute the events that make up the world. This is the doctrine of internal relations. God is internal to creaturely experiences, and creatures are internal to the divine experience. The latter is the doctrine of panentheism—all in God. Its clearest biblical expression is in Paul's speech at the Areopogus: in God "we live, and move, and have our being" (Acts 17:28). This differs from pantheism, which affirms that God and the world are the same reality viewed in two ways.

Process theology affirms the classical doctrine that God was in Jesus, participating in constituting Jesus's existence. God is in all humans in this way. Its Christological task is to clarify what is distinctive about the way God was in Jesus and what was accomplished through his life, death, and resurrection.

The doctrine of internal relations also applies to relations among God's people. We humans are deeply formed by our natural environment and especially by the human communities in which we live. We become persons only in community and are truly "members one of another" (Ephesians 4:25).

Because so much of the natural and social sciences, especially economics, is based on substance thinking, which excludes these constitutive relations, process theologians try to reformulate these sciences and the policies that follow from them. They believe that Christian thinking should be informed by what can be learned from others and should, in turn, challenge others to consider different interpretations of their data.

Criticism and Influence

Criticism comes from diverse directions. The philosophy employed by process theologians is metaphysical or speculative at a time when many believe that such philosophy is outdated. It affirms the independent reality of the nonhuman world at a time when many limit reality to the sphere of human experience or human language. Process theology overrides disciplinary boundaries at a time when many believe that theology should be a self-contained academic discipline largely independent of other sources of knowledge and should respect their independence. Process theology engages in extensive revision of the TRADITION at a time when many take that tradition as normative. Process theology denies that God's power is the sort that can determine what happens, when many believe that only such controlling power can evoke our worship.

The adoption of this philosophic view leaves much of theological importance open. There are Roman Catholic, Unitarian, and Jewish process theologians who formulate the beliefs of their respective traditions in ways influenced by process thought. Much of Western process thought resembles insights attained by Buddhists more than two thousand years ago, and today there are Buddhists who find this thought useful.

Nevertheless, process theology has been largely Protestant. This is partly by historical chance. Much of it developed out of the sociohistorical school that flourished at the University of Chicago Divinity School from the end of the nineteenth century to World War II. Henry Nelson Wieman, Bernard Meland, Bernard Loomer, and Daniel Day Williams were among the early shapers of process theology there. It retained a foothold at Chicago, but it has also spread, largely through Chicago graduates, to other seminaries and graduate schools. Quite independently of Chicago, Norman Pittenger made a large contribution to the literature and influence of the school. Among Catholics, the major center for the study of process theology has been the University of Leuven. It has attracted significant attention in East Asia and AUSTRALIA as well.

References and Further Reading

- Cobb, John B., Jr. and David Ray Griffin. Process Theology: An Introductory Exposition. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1976.
- Hartshorne, Charles. Omnipotence and Other Theological Mistakes. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1984.
- Ogden, Schubert. The Reality of God and Other Essays. New York: Harper & Row, 1963.
- Suchocki, Marjorie. God Christ Church: A Practical Guide to Process Theology. New Rev. ed. New York: Crossroad, 1993.
- Williams, Daniel Day. The Spirit and the Forms of Love. New York: Harper & Row, 1968.

JOHN B. COBB, JR.

PROGRESSIVE NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION

The Progressive National Baptist Convention (PNBC) emerged in 1961 from a break with the parent body, the NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION U.S.A., Incorporated (NBCI), over two principle points: tenure of convention officers and strategies for civil rights. Headquartered in Washington, D.C. the convention has almost 2,000 churches in some forty-six states and the District of Columbia. The membership of approximately 1.8 million is mainly northeastern and urban, far less strong in Southern and rural areas. It has missions in at least two west African countries, LIBERIA and NIGERIA, as well as the Caribbean nation of Haiti. The Baptist Progress is the official organ of the convention, published on a bimonthly basis; the convention owns no publishing press. Its motto, some-what revised from the original, is “Unity, Service, Fellowship, and Peace.”

There are a few white congregations holding dual alignments with the PNBC but far more black Baptist churches dually aligned with predominantly white bodies, such as the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION and the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES. Officers serve for two years, but the president of the convention has a term limit of eight years, resulting in a more frequent turnover of presidents than in other black Baptist groups. The PNBC has boards and commissions typical of Baptist conventions, including those for pensions, civil rights, foreign MISSIONS, WOMEN, and youth. The convention is organized in four major geographic regions: the East, Midwest, South, and Southwest.

Founded in 1895, the National Baptist Convention U.S.A. has had relatively few convention presidents, given that these officers tended to serve long terms. Early in the 1950s some Baptists had grown increasingly concerned about such long tenures. Joseph Harrison Jackson, a Chicago pastor, was elected in 1953 in part with the promise that he would serve a limited number of terms. However, in 1956 Jackson refused to stand down for reelection, insisting that a convention rule limiting presidential terms had been enacted in an irregular fashion. The courts agreed. In addition to the issue of tenure, some convention members believed that the NBC should be more aggressively involved in the direct action, mass demonstrations approach to civil rights. Jackson had supported the Montgomery Bus Boycott and was a lifelong supporter of the NAACP and civil rights, although he believed that continued mass demonstrations and acts of civil disobedience adversely affected race relations. Rather, Jackson placed greater emphasis on the pursuit of civil rights through the courts and legislatures and eco-nomic development of the black community. His philosophical opponents backed the Reverend Gardner Taylor, a prominent Brooklyn pastor in his electoral challenge to Jackson in 1960. Jackson succeeded in outmaneuvering his opponents in the convention meeting and secured the federal court’s decision that the group that had “elected” Taylor was indeed a nonofficial meeting. After another defeat in 1961, this one supervised by the courts, the Taylor faction conceded to Jackson but the latter proceeded to eliminate Taylor’s allies from their convention offices.

At that point the Reverend L.Venchael Booth, who for years had voiced need for the formation of a “progressive” convention, issued a call for interested Baptists to assemble at his Zion Baptist Church in Cincinnati, Ohio in November 1961. At least thirty-three Baptists from fourteen states answered the call and formed the PNBC. Along with Taylor and Booth the new group included MARTIN LUTHER KING JR., Martin Luther King Sr., Ralph Abernathy, and Benjamin Mays. T.M.Chambers served as the first convention president until 1967, when Gardner Taylor succeeded him. Over the years the group sought to live up to its “progressive” title by being more directly involved in the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT, taking public stances against the Vietnam War, giving support to the black power movement, and fostering job training, education, and support for the black family. Interestingly it has taken no official, convention-wide position regarding women’s ordination (see WOMEN CLERGY).

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, decades after the civil rights movement and the subsequent defeat of Jackson as NBC president, the two Baptist groups have had no serious, continuous, public conversations regarding a reunion. Although the PNBC held steady and growing membership strength, it appeared unlikely to command the majority of African American Baptists’ allegiance, although many churches were dually aligned with the PNBC and one of the other black groups.

References and Further Reading

- Bruce, M.C. “National Baptists.” In Dictionary of Christianity in America. Edited by Daniel G.Reid, et al., 794–795. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1990.
- Fitts, Leroy. “Baptists.” In Encyclopedia of African-American Culture and History, edited by Jack Salzman, David Lionel Smith, and Cornel West. vol. 1, 255–261. New York: Simon & Shuster Macmillan, 1996.
- Lincoln, C.Eric, and Lawrence H.Mamiya. The Black Church in the African American Experience. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1990.
- Mamiya, Lawrence H. “Progressive National Baptist Convention, Inc.” In Encyclopedia of African and African-American Religions, edited by Stephen D.Glazier, 248–250. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Newsome, Clarence G. “A Synoptic Survey of the History of African American Baptists.” In Directory of African American Religious Bodies. 2nd ed. Edited by Wardell J.Payne, 20–31. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1995.

SANDY DWAYNE MARTIN

PROSTITUTION

Prostitution is often described, somewhat jokingly, as the “world’s oldest profession,” and there have certainly been individuals who traded sex for money in most of the world’s cultures. Recently historians have questioned the appropriateness of labeling all exchanges of sex for money as “prostitution”—a word that was devised in the commercial economy of Western cultures in the nineteenth century—and have encouraged greater attention to the context of such exchanges. In the era of imperialism, for example, although European authorities generally labeled the relationships between European men and indigenous women “prostitution,” they were often understood differently by indigenous people, who saw them as temporary MARRIAGE or concubinage, both practices that were respectable forms of sexual relationships to them. Whether labeled “prostitution” or not, however, Protestant CLERGY and lay people have generally opposed the trading of sex for money, along with all other forms of sexual relationships other than monogamous marriage.

The Middle Ages and the Reformation

Christian opinion about prostitution during the Middle Ages was more tolerant. During the late Middle Ages, many cities and towns throughout Europe opened official municipal houses of prostitution or designated certain parts of the city as places in which selling sex would be permitted. Generally this was done with little recorded discussion, but sometimes authorities justified their actions, usually with reference to St. Augustine, who regarded prostitution as a necessary evil that protected honorable girls and women from the uncontrollable lusts of young men. Prostitutes—or at least those who lived in municipal brothels—were integrated fairly well into urban society, appearing as a group at city festivals and publicly welcoming visiting dignitaries; in some cities brothels were owned by bishops.

The integration of prostitutes into urban society was never complete, however, and during the later fifteenth century many cities, particularly in northern Europe, began to restrict prostitutes’ movements and appearance more sharply, requiring them to wear clothing that distinguished them from “honorable” women and to stay in the brothel at all times. This process of marginalization culminated in the closing of official brothels. During the period from 1520 to 1590 almost all cities in GERMANY closed their municipal brothels, sometimes quietly and sometimes with great fanfare and proclamations against “whoredom” (Hurerei) and “procuring” (Kuppelei). In ENGLAND the Bankside brothels, the only legal and protected brothels in the country, were closed by royal statute in 1546. Until very recently scholars linked this wave of closings to fears about syphilis, which first entered Europe in 1493, and to the Protestant REFORMATION. Intensive study of city records has shown that leaders were much more concerned about moral issues than about disease, however. Although Protestants may have been more harsh in their criticism of brothels, both Protestants and Catholics in central and northern Europe increasingly regarded prostitutes as worse than other criminals because they seduced other citizens from the life of moral order that authorities regarded as essential to a godly city.

The language used by reformers about prostitutes was often very harsh. MARTIN LUTHER called them “stinking, syphilitic, scabby, seedy, and nasty” tools of the DEVIL and accused them of bewitching students and other unmarried men; he shared the common sixteenth-century opinion that women were more sexual than men and so regarded prostitutes as responsible for their own situation. Luther and many other reformers also used the word “whore” metaphorically to describe their religious opponents; English anti-Catholic writers in the 1680s were particularly vituperative, terming the Catholic Church “a foul, filthy, old withered harlot...the great Strumpet of all Strumpets, the Mother of Whoredom.”

Women charged with prostitution were most often so poor that punishment by fine was impossible, so they were imprisoned, punished corporally, and then banished; by the seventeenth century in England this banishment occasionally included deportation to the colonies. By contrast, Catholic cities in southern Europe generally favored regulation over suppression, although they did support the establishment of conventlike institutions (often termed “Magdalene houses”) for women who wished to give up prostitution.

The closing of municipal brothels and the increasingly harsh punishments did not, of course, end prostitution, and the religious wars brought about by the Reformation may have actually led to an increase in the number of women—and occasionally men—who made their living at least in part by selling sex. By the seventeenth century some Protestant cities followed the example of Catholic cities such as Florence and Venice and either permitted prostitution or did not enforce laws against it. In Amsterdam houses termed speelhuizen combined dancing, nightlife, and the sale of sex; they were the favorite haunts of the thousands of sailors from the East and West India companies who came to Amsterdam every summer.

Similar establishments could be found in Protestant colonial cities such as New York, where large numbers of soldiers and sailors provided a steady customer base and official prohibitions were enforced only sporadically. In the Asian and African regions of the Dutch and British Empire, the number of European women was very small, and most trading of sex for money involved indigenous women, which was generally tolerated by colonial authorities.

Moral Reform Movements

Such tolerance (or indifference) came under increasing attack in the middle of the eighteenth century, when Protestant evangelicals in both Europe and colonial areas began a series of reform campaigns that lasted more than a century, designed to eradicate or lessen “vice” and convince people to lead more moral lives. Reforming prostitutes was an important part of these campaigns because their moral salvation and personal redemption were emblematic of those of all sinners, and their activities a symbol of the moral disintegration of society, the worst of the “social evils.” Clergymen such as the Presbyterian minister Ezra Stiles Ely of New York and politicians such as the British prime minister WILLIAM GLADSTONE ventured into poor neighborhoods in search of “fallen” women to “rescue.” Their aims were shaped by a different attitude toward female sexuality than that prevalent in the sixteenth century; although non-white and working-class white women might still have strong sexual drives, middle-class women were supposed to be pure and asexual, and even lower-class women might not be responsible for their own abject situation. Thus most prostitutes merited sympathy rather than punishment and were often portrayed in the pamphlets and speeches of reformers as the innocent victims of male seducers.

Reformers organized groups such as the London Society for the Rescue of Young Women and Children and the New York Magdalene Society; first in London and other cities around Britain, and then in New York and Philadelphia, they opened hospitals or smaller refuges and asylums for penitent prostitutes. These reform institutions sought to bring women to physical and moral health and provide them with occupational training that would allow them to support themselves once they left the hospital; religious instruction was a major part of daily life in such asylums.

Attempts at encouraging women to reform voluntarily were accompanied in the middle of the nineteenth century by coercive measures; in an effort to combat venereal disease, prostitutes in many parts of Europe were required to be examined regularly by government doctors and forced to enter special locked prison hospitals if they were found to be infected. In 1864 Britain went further than this and passed a series of “Contagious Diseases Acts,” through which women in the port cities of Britain who were simply suspected of being prostitutes could be arrested and sent to a lock hospital. Men who frequented prostitutes were not detained or examined, however, so such measures were completely ineffectual against venereal disease. The unfairness of these laws was recognized by many reformers, most prominently JOSEPHINE BUTLER—the wife of a clergyman—who founded the Ladies National Association for the Repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts. This group held prayer meetings, sent petitions to Parliament, and applied continual pressure; in the 1880s it was successful in having the Contagious Diseases Acts repealed and the age of consent raised from twelve to sixteen.

Along with efforts at reforming prostitutes and repealing unfair laws, Protestant evangelical reformers also sought to end prostitution by preventing young women from becoming prostitutes in the first place. In Britain, for example, there were over one hundred local Ladies Associations for the Care of Friendless Girls by the 1880s, which sought to provide occupational training (usually in household service) and moral instruction to young working-class women. This double purpose continued among such groups into the twentieth century; an advertisement in the English magazine Punch in 1926 for the London Female Guardian Society for the Rescue of Young Women and Girls pled “for help to maintain its large family of young girls rescued from the danger of the streets” and noted, “the Society’s chief aim [is] to lead them to Christ for true reformation.”

Another aim of moral reformers was the encouragement of male chastity and the end of the sexual double standard. Prostitution, they argued, would never be ended unless men could be convinced to restrain themselves. Organizations such as the White Cross Army, the Church of England Purity Society, and the National Vigilance Association in England, and the Seventh Commandment Society and Female Moral Reform Society in the UNITED STATES, worked to hold men to a higher moral standard and demanded punishment for men who frequented prostitutes or had other “licentious habits.” They argued—usually not very successfully—that such men were to be excluded from respectable society and kept out of public office. As in Butler’s National Association, middle- and upper-class women were often prominent leaders in these groups; their experiences in such groups and in those involved in other social reforms such as abolition and prison improvement often provided them important skills for their later work in women’s rights groups (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF).

Reformers often conceived of their efforts at moral reform in the cities of Europe and North America as missionary work, and they also carried their moral campaigns into the mission fields of Asia, AFRICA, the Pacific, and AUSTRALIA. Male and female missionaries in Hawaii, for example, discouraged traditional dancing and dress styles (the muu-muu was a missionary invention), and labeled as “prostitution” any relations between indigenous women and American or European men in which goods or money were exchanged. Missionaries in many areas objected to company and government policies that allowed only unmarried men to serve as colonial officials, employees, and soldiers, arguing that these encouraged prostitution; such objections were largely ineffective in lifting the marriage ban, although European companies and governments often came to favor long-term concubinage over short-term prostitution in imperial settings. These policies changed once more European women were allowed in the colonies in the early to mid-twentieth century and marriage became permissible and possible for a larger share of the European male population. At this point prostitution reemerged as the most common type of sexual relationship between European men and indigenous women, although again Protestant clergy both in the colonies and in the home countries decried this.

Protestant opinion about prostitution—as about so much else—became more diverse after the First World War. Conservative Protestants tended to view prostitution as a moral issue and encouraged the reform of prostitutes and their customers, whereas liberals and later those influenced by LIBERATION THEOLOGY and FEMINIST THEOLOGY viewed it more as an issue of ECONOMICS and the exploitation of women. These two views both influenced government policies toward prostitution in countries that were predominantly Protestant; they generally restricted prostitution along with other activities judged harmful to morality (such as pornography) to certain districts, but enforced these restrictions—which targeted the women involved rather than their customers—only sporadically and selectively.

References and Further Reading

- Bartley, Paula. Prostitution: Prevention and Reform in England, 1860–1914. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Brock, Rita Nakashima, and Susan Brooks Thistlethwaite. Casting Stones: Prostitution and Liberation in Asia and the United States. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1996.
- Hobson, Barbara Meil. Uneasy Virtue: The Politics of Prostitution and the American Reform Tradition. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Jolly, Margaret, and Martha MacIntyre, eds. Family and Gender in the Pacific: Domestic Contradictions and the Colonial Impact. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Nash, Stanley D. Prostitution in Great Britain, 1485–1901. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1994.
- Roper, Lyndal. “Discipline and Respectability: Prostitution and the Reformation in Augsburg.” History Workshop 19 (1985):3–28.
- Schuster, Beata. Die freien Frauen: Dirnen und Frauenhäuser im 15. und 16. Jahrhundert (Free Women: Whores and Brothels in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries). Frankfurt, Germany: Campus, 1995.
- Whiteaker, Larry. Seduction, Prostitution, and Moral Reform in New York, 1830–1860. New York: Garland, 1997.

MERRY E. WIESNER-HANKS

PROTESTANT ETHIC

See Ethics

PRUSSIAN UNION

During the preparations for the festivities surrounding the 300th anniversary of the posting of MARTIN LUTHER'S theses on October 31, 1517, the Prussian king Friedrich Wilhelm III proclaimed on September 27, 1817 that he desired a "truly religious unity" of the two Protestant faiths in his country (Lutheran and Calvinist/Reformed). On the forthcoming Reformation day, Lutherans and Reformed Christians were to celebrate the LORD'S SUPPER together. This notion was on one hand the realization of a long-held wish of the Hohenzollern dynasty, who had reigned as Reformed Christians over a predominantly Lutheran populace. At the same time, PIETISM, ENLIGHTENMENT, and revival movements (see REVIVALS) had erased many of the confessional discrepancies in Protestantism to the extent that such distinctions appeared meaningless to most contemporaries. The unions that had been established in a number of German territories provided the evidence—for example, in Nassau, Baden, and in the Palatinate. Finally the political and administrative reconfiguration of Prussia after the Vienna Congress (1815) increased Prussia's role, where unified church authorities were integrated in the eight Prussian provinces (Brandenburg, Pomerania, Western Prussia, Eastern Prussia, Saxony, Silesia, Westphalia, and the Rhineland).

The idea of imification met with approval in the churches, particularly in the West. It was the king who held up its implementation because he tried starting in 1822 to impose a uniform LITURGY on this new church. Confessional Lutheran groups, however, voiced their opposition, because—as did for example FRIEDRICH W.SCHLEIERMACHER—they were not ready to tolerate the absolutist intervention of the crown into church matters. As the king increased his pressure in 1830, some resolute Lutherans (the so-called Old-Lutherans) decided to split off in Silesia and later in Pomerania; many of them later emigrated to AUSTRALIA and the UNITED STATES. Although the king declared in 1834 that he wished only for an administrative union, the limits on the imposition of a confessional union (consensus union) were rather fluid.

Even though the successor to the throne, Friedrich Wilhelm IV, initially gave the impression in 1840 that he wanted to dissolve the union, it continued to exist and won increasing approval in Prussia. Although it experienced only limited opposition in Prussia from small groups of confessional Lutherans, Lutherans in other states—especially in Hannover, Mecklenburg, Saxony, and Bavaria—attacked it vigorously and uncompromisingly. Objections in theology, church polity, and massive political opposition to the hegemony of Prussia blended together. Bismarck took such sentiment into account insofar as he did not incorporate the Lutheran churches of the areas Prussia annexed in 1864 and 1866 (among them Schleswig-Holstein, Hesse-Kassel, and Hannover) into the Council of the Prussian Church. The Prussian Union was limited to the eight old provinces (see above). From then on it was called the Evangelical Church of the Old Prussian Union (Altpreuussische Union or APU).

The dispute surrounding the union order of worship, especially the reaction that it entailed in 1817, blocked the expansion of a church constitution. Restorative forces within the APU worked toward that same goal in the 1850s. In 1835 the Church Order of Rhineland Westphalia may have been introduced and combined the Presbyterian-synodal expansion of the congregation with consistorial supervision; however, a church constitution existed in the provinces of the APU beginning only in 1876. This constitution organized the church along the same lines all the way to the general synod. Confessional differences continued to play a role in German Protestantism, but they were increasingly overcome by the comprehensively effective actions of the church leadership, as well as by the activities of the Inner and Foreign Mission that focused on all of German Protestantism, and especially, around the turn of the century, by an expanding sense of a national Protestant mentality.

The strength of the Prussian Union became visible in 1918. The fall of the House of Hohenzollern and the end of the sovereign church regiment was in way an end of the APU. It gave itself a new constitution in 1922 and in May 1933 concluded a treaty with the State of Prussia. In the church elections of May 23, 1933 the “Germanic” Christians emerged overwhelmingly victorious—just as in most German territorial churches—and they took over the leading committees. The controversy between churches that ensued was especially bitter in the APU. In addition to Berlin, the church provinces of Brandenburg, Rhineland, and Westphalia were at the center of an intense dispute and under growing pressure by the Nazi government. The first confessional synod of the new APU took place on May 29, 1934 in Barmen, just two days before the confessional synod of the German Evangelical Church that would adopt in the same town the famous Theological Declaration. The twelfth and last confessional synod of the APU was held on October 16–17 in Breslau.

At the end of World War II, the Church of the APU lost about one third of its territory with the loss of East and West Prussia, large parts of Pomerania and Silesia to POLAND and the Soviet Union. Confessional Lutherans inside and outside of the APU now pressed for a dissolution of the Union and for confessionally constituted churches. That did not happen. However, individual church provinces—starting with Rhineland and Westphalia—split off from the Evangelischen Ober Kirchenrat (EOK) in Berlin and organized autonomous regionally organized churches, although there existed great hesitancy to sacrifice the unity of the APU. A special general synod legitimized this development in February 1951.

Because the German Democratic Republic (East Germany) did not recognize the decisions of that synod and raised objections to the use of the word “Prussia” in the name of the church, the APU renamed itself the Evangelical Churches of the Union (Evangelische Kirchen der Union or EKU) after 1953. In principle, with this name, the limitation to the formerly Prussian areas was lifted and hence the Evangelical Churches of Anhalt joined the EKU in 1960. Pressure from the GDR did not lead to a separation, but it did result in a breakdown into an Eastern and Western region. This arrangement was in place until January 1, 1992.

Currently, a process of integration of the EKU is taking place with the churches that cooperated with the Arnoldshain Conference. This conference was formed in 1967 as an organization that encompasses those churches that do not belong to the United Evangelical-Lutheran Church (Vereinigte Evangelisch-Lutherische Kirche Deutschlands or VELKD). Once the merger of the EKU and the Arnoldshain Conference succeeds as planned in the summer of 2003, only the church in Oldenburg and Württemberg will belong to neither the VELKD or UEK within the Evangelical Church of Germany (EKD).

References and Further Reading

Gerhard Goeters, J.F., and Joachim Rogge, eds. Die Geschichte der Evangelischen Kirche der Union. 3 vols. Leipzig, Germany: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1992–1999.

MARTIN GRESCHAT

PUBLISHING

Before the invention of the printing press in the fifteenth century, religious publishing was a tedious business. From the advent of Christianity to the Middle Ages, the audience for published material was very small. Literacy rates rose significantly between the first and the fourteenth centuries, but the financial means that allowed individuals to own manuscripts did not accompany this rise in literacy. Even by the fourteenth century, European society was so deeply divided by economics and education that reading and owning manuscripts was the province primarily of a wealthy elite class and the church. Those manuscripts owned by the church were transmitted primarily through the work of monastic communities, whose task was primarily preservation. The reproduction of manuscripts in these communities was performed by hand, with members copying and recopying one manuscript after another.

The invention of the printing press brought the new profession of publishing. Not only was it now possible to produce more copies of manuscripts than ever before, but there was also demand for people to run these presses. Close on the heels of the introduction of the press was the Protestant REFORMATION, and one of the first books to be published on the press was MARTIN LUTHER'S translation of the BIBLE. Although before the late sixteenth century the church controlled its congregations by controlling manuscripts and the language in which those texts were written, suddenly there was a proliferation of books written in the language of the people. Because the literacy rate had been increasing, some peasants for the first time could read a copy of the Bible that they owned in a language that they could understand. In many ways, then, publishing and the rise of Protestantism go hand in hand.

By the seventeenth century, Protestant publishing in England was flourishing. Sermons, pamphlets, devotional manuals, essays, and didactic works were the mainstays of publishers during these years. Patronage was still the primary manner in which an author could advance his or her career, so publishers that were devoted to producing particular kinds of books had not yet developed as a distinct private industry. Even though the new publishing industry now made religion books available to a wider audience, the audience consisted primarily—as it had a century earlier—of CLERGY. The colonial experiment in the New World helped broaden the audience for the books, but most of those living in the colonies had brought their books with them from ENGLAND. It was not until the eighteenth century and Benjamin Franklin’s introduction of the printing industry to the colonies that publishing began to flourish on American soil.

By 1792, religious publishing had experienced both a decline and a revival. Printing presses in the eighteenth century were occupied more with producing political and social pamphlets than with devotional manuals. In addition, writers like Richard Steele, Joseph Addison, and SAMUEL JOHNSON were instrumental in producing some of the first newspapers in the English world, the Tatler and The Spectator. Such papers reported gossip and attracted a large readership in local taverns and pubs, but they contained little religious content. The papers were moralistic and didactic, but they approached morality from the standpoint of philosophy rather than religion. In general, religion in the eighteenth century found itself in decline and was replaced by an emphasis on classical LITERATURE and humanistic values. Even though religion publishing and religion experienced a decline in the eighteenth century, by century’s end JOHN BUNYAN’S PILGRIM’S PROGRESS had gone through 160 editions.

Publishing in the New World

In the colonies, Franklin’s printing presses focused on producing newspapers (the first published in the American colonies in Philadelphia), books of moral instruction, and political pamphlets. The bookstalls of the cities were also flooded with revolutionary essays and pamphlets, such as Thomas Paine’s “The Rights of Man” and “Common Sense.” At the same time, Puritans had access to a number of readers that they had published and used to teach their children about their faith (see PURITANISM). Children would learn their alphabet by reading verses like “In Adam’s fall, we sinned all.”

Succeeding generations of American seekers have sought to reshape their faith to incorporate or reflect the cultural forces of the times. By the nineteenth century, the desire of European immigrants to hold onto their indigenous religions as safe havens in a new world resulted in the rise of American denominationalism. During these years, religious publishing was a largely sectarian enterprise, with church-owned presses like the Methodist Book Concern (founded in 1789 and later known as the United Methodist Publishing and Abingdon Press), Augsburg (founded in 1848), and Broadman House (then a trade division of the Sunday School Board of the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION, founded in 1898) publishing devotional books, curriculum resources, and hymnals for a niche audience of clergy and LAITY.

By the 1960s, many Americans had become disenchanted with traditional institutional religious authority, turning away from what they perceived as rigid authoritarianism and moving toward religious expressions that fostered introspection, individuality, and creativity. Trade publishers like Macmillan, Bobbs-Merrill, Harper & Row, and New Directions began to release titles that appealed to disaffected churchgoers. Macmillan scored big with Harvey Cox's The Secular City (1965), while Bobbs-Merrill released Thomas Altizer's The Death of God in 1966. New Directions, the preeminent publisher of the modernist poetry of Ezra Pound and William Carlos Williams, poured out a steady stream of Thomas Merton's protest writings, Zen poems and essays, while Harper & Row published the writings of Dorothy Day, as well as Sam Keen's celebratory paean to the body and its role in Christian faith and worship, To a Dancing God (1965).

After the religious and spiritual ferment of the 1960s, Americans seemed to go through much of the 1970s and 1980s seeking not so much spiritual renewal as individual gratification, with unparalleled consumption of material goods and a focus on the self (the so-called "me generation"). A turn from Godcenteredness to self-centeredness and individual experience in religion could be seen during this period in movements as diverse as LIBERATION THEOLOGY and the JESUS MOVEMENT in the 1970s. The self-help and recovery movements of the 1980s eventually became a significant influence on religion publishing through such titles as The Road Less Traveled by M.Scott Peck and When Bad Things Happen to Good People by Harold Kushner.

One of the great surprises of religious publishing in the 1970s was the growth of evangelical Christian publishing. Driven by the popularity of new forms of Christianity among young people, publishers like Tyndale House and Zondervan began to publish books to appeal to this new generation. Tyndale's Living Bible (1971) sold three million copies in its first year, and Zondervan hit the jackpot with Hal Lindsey's apocalyptic thriller The Late Great Planet Earth (1972).

In 1984, Robert Bellah and colleagues published Habits of the Heart, a now-classic book that acknowledged the problems and promises of INDIVIDUALISM for society and religion. That same year, Harvard theologian Harvey Cox's Religion in the Secular City: Toward a Postmodern Theology surveyed the resurgence of religion in CULTURE and predicted that religious grassroots movements like political FUNDAMENTALISM and liberation theology would shape the religion of the 1990s and beyond. Bellah's and Cox's books played a pivotal role in gauging the spiritual temperament of America by opening new conversations about the role of religion and spirituality in American life.

Contemporary Trends

The baby boomers who were formed by the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s today constitute the largest segment of book-buying consumers, and as they enter middle age and begin to confront their own mortality, their spiritual search has intensified. If religion appeared to be absent or marginal in the 1970s and 1980s, it has returned to the American landscape in the 1990s with a vengeance. Popular culture is filled with references to religion and spirituality, from the reverential depiction of angels on prime-time television ("Touched by an Angel") to the quirky lyrics of Joan Osbourne's pop song "What If God Was One of Us?" Polls in 1997 indicated that 96 percent of Americans believed in God or a universal spirit. But how does such a statistic translate into practice? How are Americans religious in the early twenty-first century? Where do they find their religion, and how are their religious questions shaped? Is there an "American religion," and, if so, what is it?

In his The Index of Leading Spiritual Indicators (1996), researcher George Barna characterized 1990s religion in America as “a personalized, customized form of faith views which meet personal needs, minimize rules and absolutes, and which bear little resemblance to the pure form of any of the world’s major religions.” The syncretism, relativism, and individualism that Barna points to reflect the central ways Americans reinvented their religion in the 1990s, and the striking commercial success of trade books about spiritual and religious topics, may be both the clearest indicator and the most central facilitator of that approach to religion.

Who could have guessed that a simple and sentimental little inspirational book called Chicken Soup for the Soul would sell millions of copies in trade bookstores and spawn a whole series of books for various kinds of “souls,” including women, teenagers, Christians, and so on (not to mention a rash of book titles with the word “soul,” many having only the most tenuous connection to anything spiritual)? Who could have known that a biography of God, written by journalist-turned-academic Jack Miles, would win the Pulitzer Prize? The enormous popularity of books like these, which thirty years ago likely would have been published (if at all) by a sectarian religious publisher or an academic press and found only small audiences, reflects not only the unexpected resurgence of religion in American culture, but also the transformation of the trade publishing of religion.

The success of Jack Miles’s God: A Biography, Harold Bloom’s Omens of Millennium, and Walter Wangerin’s The Book of God provided a signpost for the way things will be in commercial publishing about religion. Not only are people finding religion in its various forms a fascinating topic, they are also engaged in their own varied quests to fill the spiritual void that rampant consumerism and greed have left in their personal lives. The success of books like Kathleen Norris’s The Cloister Walk, the Jesus Seminar’s The Five Gospels, and Karen Armstrong’s A History of God, demonstrated the publishing industry’s new willingness to release books that popularized esoteric subjects like monastic disciplines and New Testament theology.

Of course, as Protestant religion publishing has been reshaped by our history, over the past thirty years it has also examined that history through a number of key books. The most popular and comprehensive may be Sydney Ahlstrom’s monumental A Religious History of the American People (1972), which after more than thirty years is still in print. Edwin Gaustad’s A Religious History of America, first published in 1966 and now in its third edition, is still in print and selling steadily. The dean of American church historians, Martin Marty, recently completed the third volume of an anticipated four-volume work, Modern American Religion, and brought his study of American religious history into the 1960s. And in 1992, cultural critic Harold Bloom declared in The American Religion: The Emergence of a Post-Christian Nation that American religion was a kind of gnosticism, a religious system emphasizing the possession of secret knowledge and practices of religious exclusivism.

Challenges and Possibilities

American Protestants have been reinventing their religion since the Puritans first built their “city upon a hill” in the New World, and that process continues into this new millennium. The religion publishing industry continues to experience exciting successes and dismal failures. The success of evangelical Protestant publishers with fiction and Bible translations has been mirrored by the disappointing performances of denominational publishers' with trade books. Just as the printing press offered a new technology for publishers to use to disseminate writings more widely, so has the advent of the Internet and electronic books provided the same opportunities for religion publishers in the twenty-first century. More and more readers will now have an opportunity to read books that are readily available in a variety of affordable formats. How such technology will affect American Protestant publishing over the next fifty years is anyone's guess. One thing is certain—the floodgates have opened, and books will continue to play a leading role in shaping the uniquely American Protestant religious quest.

See also Best Sellers in America, Religious; Bible Translation; Mass Media; Periodicals, Protestant

References and Further Reading

- Ahlstrom, Sidney. A Religious History of the American People. New Haven, CT: London, 1972.
 Aue, Pamela Willwerth, and Henry L. Carrigan, Jr., eds. What Inspirational Literature Do I Read Next? Detroit, MI: Gale, 2000.
 Carrigan, Henry L. Jr. "Reinventing American Religion." Publishers Weekly, 245: no. 11 (1998).
 Gaustad, Edwin. A Religious History of America. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1966.
 Herberg, Will. Protestant, Catholic, Jew. New York: Double-day, 1955.

HENRY L. CARRIGAN, JR.

PUFENDORF, SAMUEL (1632–1694)

German Lutheran philosopher. Pufendorf was born in Saxony in 1632, the son of a Lutheran minister, and was originally bound for the ministry himself. He pursued an education in THEOLOGY at the University of Leipzig, a center of Lutheran learning, but eventually he abandoned the study of theology in order to study law. He was a professor at the universities of Heidelberg (1661) and Lund (1670).

Pufendorf is famous for his contribution to the philosophy of moral, civil, and NATURAL LAW, and for his arguments regarding the relationship between church and state. In his treatise The Whole Duty of Man According to the Law of Nature (1673), Pufendorf argued that moral law was the result of revelation, civil law was the jurisdiction of the state, and natural law was necessary for the functioning of society. God wills each individual to live a social life, which is the moral obligation of all humans.

In Of the Nature and Qualification of Religion in Reference to Civil Society (1687) Pufendorf argued for religious tolerance. He concluded that by making religion a private matter rather than a public one, societies will achieve religious tolerance. Pufendorf originally wrote the treatise as a reaction to Louis XIV's oppression of the French HUGUENOTS. Later the treatise influenced debates elsewhere regarding the separation of church and state.

See also Church and State, Overview; Enlightenment; Toleration

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Brett, Thomas. A Review of the Lutheran Principles: Shewing How They Differ from the Church of England, and that Baron Puffendorf's Essay for Uniting of Protestants, was not Design'd to Procure an Union Between the Lutherans and the Church of England, as is Insinuated in the Title of the Late Edition of that Book. In a Letter to a Friend.... London: Henry Clements, 1714.
- Pufendorf, Samuel. Gesammelte Werke. Schmidt, Wilhelm, ed. 5 vols. Berlin: Akademie, 1996–1999.
- Pufendorf, Samuel von. The Whole Duty of Man According to the Law of Nature. Translated by Andrew Tooke and edited by Ian Hunter and David Saunders. Indianapolis, IN: Liberty Fund, 2002.
- . Of the Nature and Qualification of Religion in Reference to Civil Society. Translated by Jodocus Crull and edited by Simone Zurbuchen. Indianapolis, IN: Liberty Fund, 2002.
- The Morality of the Fallen Man: Samuel Pufendorf on Natural Law*. Saastamoinen, Kari Helsinki: SHS, 1995.
- Zurbuchen, Simone. "From Denominationalism to Enlightenment: Pufendorf, Le Clerc, and Thomasius on Toleration." In Religious Toleration, 191–209. New York: St Martin's Press, 1999.

JAY LAUGHLIN

HENRY PURCELL (1659–1695)

English composer. Working in England's politically and religiously tumultuous seventeenth century, Henry Purcell is considered among the greatest English composers. Purcell was born into a family of court musicians in London in 1659, just after the restoration of the monarch and the reestablishment of ANGLICANISM. As a boy he sang as a chorister in the King's Chapel Royal, and later studied composition with John Blow and Christopher Gibbons.

In 1677 Purcell began his lifelong career as a composer and musician for church and court when he was appointed to write pieces for the violins of Charles II's court. He became organist at Westminster Abbey in 1679 and at the Chapel Royal in 1682. While serving the court, Purcell wrote dozens of church anthems, the Service in B-flat minor, the Burial Service, and Te Deum.

In 1685 a Catholic king, James II, ascended the English throne. Purcell and other musicians serving the Anglican Church met with hardship as a result. Although Purcell did not lose his position, the Chapel Royal's status was greatly diminished. His career hardly benefited when Anglican-friendly William and Mary claimed the throne in 1689. Their court lacked a focus on music and Purcell was forced to supplement his income by writing more music for the theater. His operas include Dido and Aeneas and The Fairy-Queen. Purcell died in London in 1695 and was buried in a plot near the organ at Westminster Cathedral.

Purcell's compositional style developed within the context of great political and religious change in England. Charles II's Anglican sympathies and devotion to the French music he encountered during his exile spurred a reinvigoration in church music upon his return in 1660. The new king's support of church music stood in direct contrast to the period of decline under OLIVER CROMWELL'S rule. Under Charles II, Purcell and his contemporaries brought back some older forms of polyphonic, or many-voiced music. However, they also experimented with dramatic solo vocal lines in their music for the church.

Purcell's particular contribution to this experimentation came in the form of word painting, or pictorialisms. Purcell used a variety of musical gestures to dramatize individual words of the text. His anthems, including O Give Thanks unto the Lord and Blessed are They that Fear the Lord, exemplify his ability to vivify hymn texts through music. His devotional songs include emotional settings of penitential texts and solo versions of the traditional form of biblical dialogue. Purcell's innovative settings of English texts, both for church and theater, have made him renown among composers working in the English language.

See also Hymns and Hymnals; Music, English Church

References and Further Reading

Holman, Peter, and Robert Thompson. "Henry Purcell." In New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians. 2nd ed. Edited by Stanley Sadie. Vol. 20, 604–630. London: Macmillan Publishers Limited, 2001.

Van Tassel, Eric. "Music for the Church." In Purcell Companion. Edited by Michael Burden, 101–199. Portland: Amadeus Press, 1994.

Zimmerman, Franklin B. Henry Purcell: A Guide to Research. New York: Garland, 1989.

JENNIFER GRABER

PURITANISM

Any description of the Puritan movement must begin by acknowledging that in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century England, the very word puritan was a term of abuse that contemporaries applied indiscriminately to anyone who was critical of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND or, even more indiscriminately, to persons of a certain temperament. London stage plays of the late sixteenth century caricatured the "puritan" as ridiculously overzealous and yet hypocritical. Politically, the monarchy and church treated the term as synonymous with sedition and schism, a strategy based on the assumption that any challenge to the authority of the officers of the church (the bishops) was also a challenge to the authority of the monarchy. None of these contexts tells us much about the real thing. Not until the early seventeenth century did some English men and women begin to use the word in a positive sense, although “the godly” was probably a more prevalent self-reference. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, puritanism came to stand for mental narrowness and a moral authoritarianism. Again, none of these uses of the term informs us about Puritanism as a religious movement in its own time and place, except that it was always controversial.

Puritanism was a movement of religious reform that arose within the Church of England during the reign of ELIZABETH I (1558–1603). Summoning Christians to intensify their level of religious practice, and calling also for changes in worship and church government, the movement could not avoid becoming entangled in politics in a country where, as a consequence of the REFORMATION, the head of the civil state was also head of a single, comprehensive state church. Never supported by Elizabeth or her successors James I (1603–1635) and Charles I (1625–1649), the movement unexpectedly came into power in the early 1640s after Parliament asserted its authority and its army defeated the king in a CIVIL WAR (1643–1645). This moment of triumph was short-lived because the moderates and conservatives who dominated Parliament were alienated by the ascendancy of left-wing puritanism in the army under the leadership of OLIVER CROMWELL. The radicals had their way with the execution of Charles I in 1649, and a Commonwealth was established with Cromwell as its head (1653–1658). After Cromwell’s death and the restoration of Charles II to the throne in 1660, the new government enacted stringent rules of “conformity” that thousands of clergy and lay people could not accept. Leaving the Church for good, these “Nonconformists” or “Dissenters” (see NONCONFORMITY, DISSENT) practiced their faith under conditions of great difficulty. The presence of Puritans in America began in the 1620s and 1630s, when a significant number of emigrants founded the colonies of Plymouth, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Haven in New England. There they were able to implement distinctive patterns of ministry, worship, and church organization and to maintain these patterns well beyond the close of the seventeenth century. Beginning with a common parent and continuing to share many of the same ideas, Puritanism in America enjoyed a hegemony that puritans in England never achieved.

Like many other reformers, Puritans did not agree among themselves on means and ends. The movement encompassed a spectrum that ranged from radicals impatient with the “corruptions” of the church to conservatives who preferred unity and order to schism or sectarianism. During the reign of Elizabeth I, some reformers agitated for replacing the office of bishop, or episcopacy, with a ministry of equals, and for transforming the rituals of worship in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER by eliminating all “remnants” of Catholic practice. Such Puritans were influenced by the example of Reformed churches in GERMANY, SWITZERLAND, FRANCE, and the NETHERLANDS. Leaders of the Reformed tradition—JOHN CALVIN but also HEINRICH BULLINGER, MARTIN BUCER (who came to ENGLAND in 1549 and taught briefly at Cambridge University), and THEODORE BEZA—provided the core ideas that were publicized in the 1560s and 1570s by a small group of English clergy, some of whom had encountered the Reformed model during their years as exiles on the Continent during the reign of Mary Tudor (1553–1558). These ideas included the following: (1) that the “lawful” form of church government was prescribed in the New Testament, which contained rules that must be followed exactly; (2) that Catholic forms of worship were “idolatrous” violations of the Second Commandment, and that Protestant worship should eliminate all vestiges of Catholicism; (3) that the proper relationship between CHURCH AND STATE was not to allow one to dominate the other, as the monarchy in England did the church, but to regard them as constituting two distinctive realms or kingdoms, the first spiritual, the other temporal, each independent of each other yet conjoined under God; and (4) that the visible church should be a purified, ethical community that administered the SACRAMENTS of BAPTISM and the LORD'S SUPPER only to persons who could demonstrate their worthiness. "Forward" reformers in England, chief among them THOMAS CARTWRIGHT and John Field, brought most of these ideas together in a manifesto that others within the movement regarded as too extreme, An Admonition to the Parliament (1572).

Everyone within the movement agreed, however, on the imperative to elevate the quality of the ministry and to demand much more of the LAITY. From a puritan perspective the average English person was too ignorant and uncaring to qualify as a "real" Christian. Nor were the mass of the CLERGY considered much better. The founding of Emmanuel College, Cambridge (1584) was undertaken expressly to train a different kind of minister for the church, men devoted to PREACHING and to practicing a rigorously disciplined lifestyle. Another aspect of the puritan program was to address such problems as poverty, drunkenness, violence, unrestrained sexuality, and illiteracy. This concern for "social discipline" was in keeping with a widely held principle—vigorously renewed in the second phase of the Protestant Reformation and, in the wake of the Council of Trent, within the Catholic COUNTER-REFORMATION—that the church was responsible for supervising the moral and social health of a Christian society. Puritanism thus became a factor in the social life of English communities as reformers, often with the support of local magistrates or notables, encouraged the regulation of social behavior, stricter observance of the Sabbath (Sunday), or SABBATARIANISM, more schooling to promote literacy, and better care of the disabled and disadvantaged.

Puritanism as a Devotional Movement

The deeper goal was to bring about a deeper, more systematic piety among lay people and clergy, a piety expressed in practices such as prayer, meditation, attending sermons, reading the BIBLE and other "godly" books, maintaining an orderly household, and, above all, constant, routinized self-examination. The ministers who described this piety insisted that religious practices were useless if they were performed only mechanically, out of a sense of obligation. Anyone who did so was a hypocrite or formalist, someone trapped in the externals of religion. The true Christian was someone whose "heart"—the spiritual center of the self—was stirred up to seek after Christ. Self-examination taught the fundamental lesson that humans were sinners entirely without merit, and that SALVATION was solely theirs thanks to divine mercy. Self-examination also taught the imperative of repentance: the true Christian mourned with a broken heart the condition of being a sinner. Only then was it possible to respond in faith to the gospel promise of free GRACE, a promise conveyed through preaching. By about 1600 or 1610, a handful of preacher-theologians, most notably WILLIAM PERKINS (1558–1602), who taught at Cambridge, had expanded this description of the spiritual life into a well-rehearsed “practical divinity,” a description of what the would-be Christian must do to experience his or her election, that was widely reiterated by a “spiritual brotherhood” of like-minded ministers within the church.

Preaching was the principal means of propagating this way of life, but preaching was seconded by a lively market in printed books. One important publication was a translation of the Bible that became known as the “Geneva Bible” (1560) because most of the work on it was done by English clergy in exile on the Continent during the reign of Mary Tudor. (Not until the publication in 1611 of the “King James version” was the Geneva Bible replaced, at least for official purposes.) Another of great significance, although too bulky and expensive for most persons to own, was JOHN FOXE’S deeply anti-Catholic and apocalyptic retelling of the history of the Christian church, and especially the most recent century of English history, The Acts and Monuments or Book of Martyrs (1559). By the early seventeenth century, manuals or guides on how to be a true Christian were being frequently reprinted in response to reader demand; among the more popular or influential was Arthur Dent’s The Plain Mans Pathway to Heaven (1610) and Richard Rogers’s Seven Treatises.

The theological framework of these manuals was broadly Calvinist, although always a CALVINISM tilted toward the practical divinity. During the reigns of Elizabeth and James I, much of the church leadership shared with the reformers the concept of an all-sovereign God who determined which of humankind were destined to be saved; whether God also elected others to a state of reprobation (damnation) was more controversial. That is, the Church of England officially supported certain aspects of Calvinism. A wide spectrum of clergy followed St. Augustine in always rejecting Pelagianism, or salvation through works-righteousness. Yet differences also emerged; for example, William Perkins has been termed a “hyper-Calvinist” for his emphasis on double predestination; that is, God decided that much of humankind was “reprobate” and others were of the elect without regard in either instance to their actions in the world. Nonetheless, the order of salvation endorsed in sermons and manuals encompassed a voluntarism that the clergy justified on the basis of certain scholastic or philosophical truisms, and also on their own role as means of grace, intermediaries between Christ and humankind who pleaded with sinners to acknowledge and accept the gospel promise. For some of the clergy, this voluntarism was linked to an idiom of a “COVENANT” between God and humankind, with faith and repentance as conditions to be fulfilled on the part of humans in response to the promise of free grace (see COVENANT THEOLOGY).

A Movement Beset by Tensions

This description of the “practical divinity” poses anew the question as to what was distinctive about Puritanism. The anti-Catholicism of Foxe’s Book of Martyrs was the meat and drink of popular Protestantism in early seventeenth-century England. Many Puritans who taught or practiced the order of salvation accepted some version of episcopal church government; William Perkins conformed to the rules of the church. Nor were “forward” Puritans committed to the “Presbyterian” form of church government that most of the Reformed churches on the Continent had adopted (see PRESBYTERIANISM, PRESBYTERY, CHURCH GOVERNMENT). Although a substantial number of clergy and laity were uncomfortable with Catholic “remnants,” an undisciplined clergy, and the “mixed” or unpurified nature of church membership, the Puritan movement of the early seventeenth century cannot be neatly summarized, in part because it contained an incipient radicalism and a de facto “CONGREGATIONALISM” that grew up within Puritan-controlled towns and parishes, especially in the counties of Essex and Suffolk. Any movement founded on a vision of the “true” church, and wielding also the categories of “unlawful” and “idolatrous,” was bound to spawn purists who rejected any accommodation with the “corruptions” of the Church of England. A leading example of this purism was “Separatism,” or secession from the Church of England on the grounds that, having violated the law of God, it was no longer a true church. The most important of the early Separatists was the clergyman ROBERT BROWNE, who laid out this argument in a brief, illicitly published pamphlet entitled Reformation without Tarying for Anie (1582). Other Separatists followed him in denouncing the church as untrue and in acting out of “conscience” to form independent congregations in which they experimented with covenants and lay-centered governance. Facing heavy fines, imprisonment, or execution, most of the Separatists moved to the Netherlands. One such group of exiles, originating as a congregation in Yorkshire under the leadership of JOHN ROBINSON, settled in Amsterdam and afterward in Leiden (1609); some of this group sailed on the Mayflower in 1620 and founded the colony of Plymouth in New England.

Those clergy who rejected schism and remained within the church faced another set of tensions. Should they work vigorously to exclude the ignorant and the scandalous in their parishes from the sacraments of baptism and the Lord’s Supper? To attempt such a process of discipline in local churches was to risk arousing anger and conflict within a town or parish. Yet to accept everyone was to admit pollution into the church. No less perplexing was the dilemma of whether to practice some aspects of nonconformity, as in refusing to wear the vestments of a priest or omitting the sign of the cross in the service of baptism, irregularities that appealed to many members of the spiritual brotherhood. The fundamental tension, present within the Reformed tradition but exacerbated in the English context, was theological, whether to understand the visible church as comprehensive or as selective. Every puritan-minded minister also faced the moral dilemma of whether schism was preferable to conformity.

When the authority of the crown collapsed in the early 1640s and Parliament assumed control of the church, these tensions made it impossible for the reformers to agree on how to reorganize the church. At the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY, a gathering of English and Scottish clergy commissioned in 1643 by Parliament to prepare a new scheme of church order, the great majority favored some version of presbyterianism. A minority insisted that the true apostolic model was “independency” or congregationalism, that is, a church order centered on the authority of each autonomous (and selective) congregation. The Assembly did, however, prepare the widely acknowledged WESTMINSTER CONFESSION and a CATECHISM. As this debate was taking place, thousands of lay men and women, together with some clergy, were rethinking the relationship between Scripture and the Holy Spirit, the place of the “law” in the order of salvation, the timing of the coming kingdom, and the proper basis for church and state. Out of this period of confusion and innovation emerged three enduring religious communities in England, each with puritanism as its parent: the Independents or Congregationalists; the BAPTISTS, who repudiated infant baptism and who, like the Independents, favored the autonomy of local congregations; and the SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, or Quakers, a group that began to take shape in the early 1650s and that rejected all external “forms” (ministry, sacraments, instituted church) in favor of an indwelling of the Holy Spirit. Not surprisingly, these groups challenged the authority of the civil state over the church. Certain radicals such as JOHN MILTON, Oliver Cromwell, and ROGER WILLIAMS (who published in England even though he lived in New England) began to argue for a wider liberty of conscience and the toleration of Jews and Protestants.

This extraordinary period came to an end in 1660 with the restoration of the monarchy. The 1662 Act of Conformity forced those clergy and laity who still wanted to pursue the puritan program to leave the Church of England and to practice their faith under conditions that sometimes approached those of persecution. Many Nonconformists, and especially Quakers, were jailed; all were excluded from major institutions such as Parliament and the universities. Slowly, the several groups of Nonconformists built up a system of alternative institutions: first and foremost, churches, congregations, or societies, but also educational and charitable institutions, together with systems of publishing. During this period the Baptist lay minister JOHN BUNYAN wrote the greatest masterpiece of Puritan prose, The Pilgrim's Progress from This World, to That Which Is to Come (Pt. 1, 1678; Pt. 2, 1684). At the beginning of the reign of William III, who overthrew James II in the “Glorious Revolution” of 1688, moderates on both sides proposed that the church find ways of accommodating the presbyterian and congregational wings of Nonconformity. For political and other reasons, no such accommodation occurred. Nor were the Presbyterians and Congregationalists able to overcome their own differences and combine into a single denomination, in part because some of the Presbyterians were turning away from Reformed orthodoxy as defined by the Westminster Confession. This liberalizing trend is one sign that the Puritanism of the late sixteenth century was winding down. However, a more important sign is that by the mid-1690s Nonconformists no longer aspired to reform the entire Church of England. That is, they gave up on their historical goal of attaining comprehensiveness. A movement dedicated to transforming a national church had given way to denominations or sects and to an acceptance of pluralism in place of uniformity.

Puritanism in New England

The chief motive behind the migration to New England in the 1630s of some 15,000 English men and women was their wish to worship as they pleased, although many may have also hoped to improve their economic situation. The emigrants, most of whom came as families, included a large contingent of clergy whose authority helped to ensure that the colonists were spared most of the confusion that undermined the English movement in the 1640s and 1650s. Compared to the situation in England, Puritanism in New England may seem remarkably coherent, as in certain respects it was. Yet no culture is static or completely homogeneous, and so change and conflict also figure in the New World side of the story.

The emigrants experimented in various ways with how to reorganize church, ministry, and worship. By 1636 a normative pattern was taking shape, a pattern described in a document drafted and approved by a “synod” of ministers that met in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1646 and 1648 and subsequently approved by individual churches and the Massachusetts civil government. Published in 1649 in Cambridge and London under the title A Platform of Church Discipline Gathered Out of the Word of God, but familiarly known as the CAMBRIDGE PLATFORM, this document defined the true church as covenanted and selective in its membership; declared that such membership was confined to “visible saints,” that is, adults who could make a profession of the “work of grace,” together with their children; asserted that each congregation was autonomous—hence, “Congregationalism”; democratized the structure of church government by specifying that the “power of the keys” (Matthew 18:17) rested with the entire congregation (although the right to vote on church affairs was limited to men); and provided a new basis for church and state, the “two-kingdom” theory that was favored within the Reformed tradition.

The Platform was at once radical and moderate, uncompromising and flexible. Although it seemed firmly to reject the idea of the visible church as comprehensive in favor of a highly selective standard for admitting members, in several places it urged that congregations exercise the “judgment of charity.” Empowering the laity in a manner akin to the experiments of the Separatists, it also insisted that God had man-dated a clerical “office” with privileges and powers unique to those who were called to this vocation. Moreover, although it affirmed the autonomy of each congregation, it also permitted interchurch synods and sanctioned a role for the civil magistrates as guardians of church order.

The flexibility of the Platform and the new-found hegemony of puritan practices, however, did not prevent radical critics from attacking the new church order. Roger Williams, an ordained clergyman in the Church of England who emigrated in 1631 and was briefly attached to the church in Salem, felt that the “Congregational Way” erred in sanctioning a religious role for the civil magistrate and, Separatist-like, accused the emigrants of not fully renouncing the corruptions of the Church of England. Williams was banished from the colony in 1635, and moved to unclaimed territory to the south that became the town of Providence in a new colony, Rhode Island. The most dramatic reliving of old tensions was a controversy that arose in 1636 and 1637 over matters of doctrine, style, Biblical interpretation, and church membership. The majority of the ministers were dismayed to find themselves being criticized as “legal preachers” and “popish factors” (i.e., claiming too much authority) by some of the laity. Especially outspoken was ANNE HUTCHINSON, an articulate, self-confident woman member of the Boston church in her early forties, whose father had been a nonconformist clergyman in the Church of England and whose husband was a substantial merchant. The ministers were further dismayed to discover that their colleague JOHN COTTON, a minister in the Boston church and a man of great personal authority, was questioning some aspects of their preaching. Together, Cotton and Anne Hutchinson complained that the other ministers were resting assurance of salvation on evidence that tilted in the direction of “SANCTIFICATION,” or “works.” Rhetoric quickly overtook reality. The majority riposted by equating Hutchinson and her followers with ANTINOMIANISM and by warning that social and religious order would be turned “upside down” if WOMEN were allowed to assert themselves in public, as Hutchinson seemed to be doing. Cotton eventually yielded to the pressure put on him to disavow Anne Hutchinson and to cease criticizing his colleagues. Hutchinson, who asserted a role as prophetess and veered off into murky waters, theologically, was banished from the colony in 1638. A number of persons, most of them members of the Boston church, were also banished or penalized in other ways.

Historians continue to debate whether John Cotton and the “legal” preachers, of whom the most important were Thomas Shepard, THOMAS HOOKER, Richard Mather, and Peter Bulkeley, were at odds with each other or out of step with Reformed ORTHODOXY. Regardless of any such differences, the Westminster Shorter Catechism became the catechism of choice among the colonists by the end of the seventeenth century, and the clergy affirmed the Westminster Confession (technically in its “congregational” version, known as the Savoy Declaration of 1658) as their doctrinal standard.

Uniformity, Change, and Identity

The “Congregational Way” fulfilled the longstanding ambition of the Puritan movement to restore the apostolic model of the church, in their eyes the only “lawful” system of church governance. Christian primitivism—that is, the goal of eliminating all “humane inventions” and restoring the purity of the “first times”—also shaped the earliest compilations of “laws and liberties” (1641; 1648) in Massachusetts and New Haven. The rules and practices that governed civil society were consistent in other ways with the Puritan program. The colonists substituted numbers for the customary “pagan” names of the months and days of the calendar, eliminated all of the holidays and feast days of the traditional liturgical calendar, restricted the sale of alcohol, and required families to teach their children to read. More unusual, even unexpected, was the restricting of freemanship, a legal status that entitled those admitted to it to vote in civil affairs, to men who were church members. In the two colonies (Massachusetts and New Haven) where this law was enacted, its purpose was to protect the churches from unwarranted intrusions, not of giving the churches authority over civil affairs. Simultaneously, although informally, the colonists resolved to exclude the clergy from holding civil office, a means of safeguarding the civil state from undue influences. Yet the underlying assumption was that the two “kingdoms,” the one “spiritual,” the other “temporal,” constituted a harmonious whole grounded on the principle that God wanted both forms of government to enforce the moral law and defend truth against heresy. Yet the extent to which everyday life was regulated by a strict moral code or families by patriarchy is often exaggerated, as it was by Nathaniel Hawthorne in The Scarlet Letter (1850).

The consolidating of this social and religious system was abetted by institutions that dated back to the beginnings of settlement. In 1636 a group of ministers initiated the founding of a college, shortly to be named Harvard after a minister who died in 1638 and left half of his estate to the new institution. Its leading purpose was to provide a ministry fully literate in the classical languages and in the “arts” of thinking and writing, as then understood, to take the place of the men who emigrated in the 1630s. Because it was also assumed that truth—that is, a Reformed Protestant understanding of God’s Word—was clearly revealed to anyone who honestly sought it, differences of opinion were regarded as inappropriate, possibly subversive of good order, and potentially as sins against the divine will. The well-being of the godly commonwealth depended, therefore, on preventing any such differences of opinion, which the magistrates and ministers likened to infectious disease. The colonists acknowledged a “liberty of conscience” that could be exercised privately, aside from civil obligations. Otherwise, they assumed that the civil state was responsible for suppressing religious dissent.

The colonists’ policy of uniformity was put to the test in the 1640s, when it attracted the attention of English radicals, but more severely so in the late 1650s when the first Quaker missionaries arrived in Massachusetts, and again in the 1660s when a small group of Congregationalists renounced infant baptism and organized a Baptist church (1665). Whippings, fines, and imprisonment proved ineffective; and the execution of four Quakers in Massachusetts between 1659 and 1661 led the English government to order that no more such executions take place. When the civil government in Massachusetts was reorganized in 1691 on the basis of a charter granted by William III in place of the original charter of the Massachusetts Bay Company, the crown mandated a certain measure of toleration.

Meanwhile the Congregational system had been evolving in several respects. The Cambridge Platform left unresolved a question that eventually had to be addressed: were the children of a parent who had been baptized as an infant entitled to the sacrament themselves? Strictly speaking the answer was no because baptism belonged only to the children of persons who qualified for membership on the basis of describing the work of grace. In the 1630s and 1640s, the original system worked well enough to incorporate at least half, and perhaps closer to three-quarters, of the colonists and their children within the church. However, as those children came of age and had families of their own, a much smaller percentage of them came forward as adults to offer the customary testimony. Were all those who were simply members by virtue of their baptism entitled to remain as members, and to pass the privilege of membership on to the next generation? First in 1657, then in 1662, two councils of ministers answered this question affirmatively. In authorizing what was later nicknamed the “half-way covenant,” they ended up creating two categories of visible saints: “full” members, entitled to vote in church affairs and participate in the Lord’s Supper, and members in the “external” covenant, entitled mainly to have their children baptized. Schisms and ongoing conflict followed upon the decisions of 1662, for some congregations and a handful of ministers resisted any deviation from the original rules, labeling them “humane inventions.” Gradually the second category of members surpassed the first in size. As this happened, the Congregational Way became a hybrid: selective or gathered in one respect, but very nearly a parish church system in another. Moreover, local practice varied from one town to the next, with towns and churches in the Connecticut River Valley always a little out of step with those along the coast.

From the beginning, the Puritan colonists puzzled over the meaning of their venture across the Atlantic. The framework of Christian primitivism served them well in some respects. Another framework was providence, a framework the colonists shared with most other Christians of their day. The answer to a great many questions (e.g., why safe passage across the Atlantic, why that drought or storm or illness) was the intention (and attention) of a God who watched over and arranged every event in human life. Discerning the signs of God’s providence, and deciphering their significance, was an ongoing challenge that engaged the ministers, the civil leaders, and a great many ordinary people.

Most of these people also assumed that the colonists had entered into a national covenant with God, a sequel to the great prototype in Deuteronomy. A covenanted people were obligated to obey God's rules and persist in holiness; if they faltered, then God was sure to indicate his anger. As early as the late 1630s, the ministers were beginning to warn that the colonists were losing some of their fervor, and by the 1660s and 1670s these warnings had coalesced in a sermon form known as the JEREMIAD. INCREASE MATHER, a second-generation colonist and longtime minister in Boston, became perhaps the most persistent preacher of jeremiads. He was also drawn to APOCALYPTICISM, or the expectation that the final events foretold in Revelation were beginning to occur. It has often been suggested that the Puritans in New England were millenarians who thought of themselves as distinctively "chosen" and their land as the site of the New Jerusalem of the end times, although the prevailing world view was closer to primitivism and providentialism (see MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISM).

Well into the eighteenth century the "Congregational Way" remained the dominant system of church government in the New England colonies, and the "practical divinity" that can be traced back to William Perkins reigned as well. Given these continuities, and given the thorough implementing in New England of the Reformed program with respect to worship, doctrine, ministry, church and state, sacred space, and time, dating the "end" of Puritanism in New England is almost an artificial exercise. Yet the hegemony of Puritanism in New England can easily mislead historians and interpreters in the twenty-first century into exaggerating its importance. Much of the intellectual baggage of the colonists, together with the social rules they employed about such matters as property distribution, child rearing, and inheritance, drew on far more complex sources: custom, humanism, and the English common law, to name but three. Separating out these influences from those that originated within the Puritan movement of the late sixteenth century is crucial, as is recognizing that Puritanism modified its tone or coloring in response to changing historical circumstances and in its multiple local settings.

Puritanism and Modernity

In the twentieth century, Puritanism attracted a great deal of attention as a likely source of MODERNITY. The German social theorist MAX WEBER advanced the most influential argument in this regard. He proposed that Protestants, but especially the Puritans, had transformed the "other-worldly asceticism" of the Catholic system as practiced by monastics into a "this-worldly asceticism," that is, a disciplined approach to time and work that drew its energy from anxieties about being one of the elect. In turn, this "work ethic," or making work normative and regular, had been a critical agent in the making of capitalism, which incorporated this self-discipline and transmuted it into an unrelenting urge to work and therefore to acquire. The American sociologist Robert Merton complemented Weber's broad argument by proposing that English Puritans had played a distinctive role in the scientific revolution of the seventeenth century (see NATURE). More recently, social historians of early modern England have proposed that Puritans took the lead in suppressing the communal and morally extravagant modes of "traditional popular culture" with a proto-middle-class culture of discipline centered on the FAMILY and the individual (see INDIVIDUALISM). Historians of Puritanism in America have followed a different path in suggesting that the movement served as a source of democracy. The equivalent argument among British historians, now generally rejected, is that Puritans advocated the authority of Parliament and “the people” over against the authority of the monarchy. To this day, Puritanism is an irresistible “x” that historians, social theorists, and cultural critics interpret in light of the ever-changing shape of modernity.

References and Further Reading

- Bozeman, Theodore Dwight. To Live Ancient Lives: The Primitivist Dimension in Puritanism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.
- Collinson, Patrick. The Elizabethan Puritan Movement. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968.
- . The Religion of Protestants: The Church in English Society 1559–1625. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- Foster, Stephen. The Long Argument: English Puritanism and the Shaping of New England Culture, 1570–1700. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.
- Gura, Philip. A Glimpse of Zion’s Glory: Puritan Radicalism in New England, 1620–1660. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1983.
- Hall, David D. Worlds of Wonder, Days of Judgment: Popular Religious Belief in Early New England. New York: Knopf, 1989.
- Hambrick-Stowe, Charles. The Practice of Piety: Puritan Devotional Disciplines in Seventeenth-Century New England. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1982.
- Hill, Christopher. The World Turned Upside Down: Radical Ideas during the English Revolution. New York: Viking Press, 1972.
- Lake, Peter. Moderate Puritans and the Elizabethan Church. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982.
- Lamont, William. Godly Rule: Politics and Religion, 1603–1660. London: Macmillan, 1969.
- Watts, Michael R. The Dissenters: From the Reformation to the French Revolution. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1978.
- Weber, Max. The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism. Translated by Talcott Parsons. London: Allen & Unwin, 1930.

DAVID D.HALL

PUSEY, EDWARD BOUVERIE (1800–1882)

English scholar and church leader. Pusey was born August 22, 1800 and died September 16, 1882. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church (Oxford) and was elected a fellow of Oriel College in 1823. Urged by his teachers to become versed with the new intellectual movements coming out of GERMANY so that they might be refuted, he studied at Göttingen, Berlin, and Bonn between 1825 and 1827. There he encountered

J.G.Eichhorn and FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER, and established friendships with FRIEDRICH THOLUCK and JOHANN AUGUST NEANDER.

During this period Pusey, expressing sympathy with some of the German religious trends, published An Historical Enquiry into the Probable Causes of the Rational Character lately Predominant in the Theology of Germany (1827). He was later to repudiate this sympathetic account and become an archcritic of the ENLIGHTENMENT theologies. As a result of his scholarship he was appointed Regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford and canon of Christ Church. He was ordained to the priesthood in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND in 1828.

Pusey's religious and political sympathies moved to the right as liberal criticism of the religious establishment grew, and by 1832 he had become convinced that the Church of England was being threatened by the growing liberal agenda. In 1833 he formally associated himself with the OXFORD MOVEMENT and its defense of the traditional tenets of the church. His first contribution to the Tracts for the Times—Tract XVIII (“Thoughts on the Benefits of the System of Fasting”)—was signed with his initials (EBP). Pusey's signature to what had been theretofore anonymous publications associated both Pusey with the movement and the movement with Pusey. His academic and social standing gave status to the fledgling movement, which frequently came to be labeled “Puseyism.”

During 1836 he published a series of tracts on BAPTISM that appealed to early church teachings and emphasized the seriousness of postbaptismal sins. His interest in SIN and GRACE led him to be an advocate of priestly CONFESSION. His interest in the early church also led him to organize the republication of much of the literature in the Library of the Fathers. Also during the late 1830s he served as an important apologist for the Oxford Movement and published his Letter to the Bishop of Oxford (1839).

After 1841, and JOHN HENRY NEWMAN'S withdrawal from active participation in the movement on account of the negative reactions toward Tract XC, Pusey became its most important leader. In 1843 he published The Holy Eucharist: A Comfort to the Penitent, which emphasized the doctrine of the real presence. The vice chancellor of Oxford and six faculty of divinity condemned the sermon as heretical (see HERESY), and he was suspended from the university pulpit for two years. The harshness and questionable legality of the decision, however, earned Pusey a large degree of public sympathy.

With Newman's secession to Rome in 1845, Pusey's leadership assumed even more importance and he gave the Catholic revival within ANGLICANISM new themes. One was the focus on parish ministry. He underwrote the rebuilding of St. Saviour's, Leeds, as a memorial to his wife, and this church became a ministerial model for later Catholic-revival parishes. He participated (and financially supported) the move to reestablish religious orders within Anglicanism. He continued to emphasize the importance of priestly confession. Although not a Ritualist himself, he strongly defended the movement among members of the Catholic revival to restore traditional ritual and ceremony in Anglican worship. Finally in the decade of the 1860s he worked to advance the cause of reunion with Rome. He argued that popular devotions and beliefs, not official doctrines, separated the two churches. The First Vatican Council and its definition of papal infallibility disappointed him profoundly.

Throughout the latter decades of his career Pusey actively assumed the role of defender of the traditional teachings of the Church of England against liberal threats. He attacked the attempt by men such as BENJAMIN JOWETT to reform (and declericize) the education at Oxford; he criticized the publication of Essays and Reviews (1860) and its advocacy of an historical critical approach to the BIBLE; he vigorously supported the retention of the Athanasian Creed in the Anglican BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER; he defended the belief in eternal punishment; and he fought those who wished to reconceptualize the miracles of the gospels to make Christianity more palatable to modern science.

Pusey died September 16, 1882 and was buried in the nave of Christ Church (Oxford). His library (purchased by followers of his) became the foundation of Pusey House in Oxford, an institution that continues to be a memorial and study center dedicated to his principles.

See also Anglo-Catholicism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Pusey, E.B. Selections from the Writings of Edward Bouverie Pusey. London: Rivingtons, 1885.
———. The Church of England a Portion of Christ's Holy Catholic Church: and a Means of Restoring Visible Unity. New York: Appleton, 1979.

Secondary Sources:

Butler, Perry, ed. Pusey Rediscovered. London: SPCK, 1983.
Forrester, David. Young Doctor Pusey. London: Mowbrays, 1989.
Liddon, H.P. The Life of Edward Bouverie Pusey. 4 vols. London: Longman, Green, 1893–1897.
Prestige, Leonard. Pusey. London: Philip Allen, 1933.
Rowell, Geoffrey. The Vision Glorious: Themes and Personalities of the Catholic Revival in Anglicanism. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

ROBERT BRUCE MULLIN

Q

QUAKERS

See Friends, Society of; Society of Friends in North America

This page intentionally left blank.

R

RADE, MARTIN (1857–1940)

German theologian. Rade was born at Rennersdorf/ Oberlausitz April 4, 1857, and died at Frankfurt/Main April 9, 1940. His father was a Lutheran pastor, and he studied THEOLOGY in Leipzig, a stronghold of LUTHERANISM. His most important theological teacher was ADOLF VON HARNACK. After a brief tenure as a private tutor he became a pastor in Schoenbach/Oberlausitz in 1882, serving there for ten years. From 1892 to 1899 Rade served as minister at the Paulskirche in Frankfurt/Main.

While he was serving in his first parish, Rade also began to work as a journalist. In 1886 he founded the journal Christliche Welt together with theologians Wilhelm Bornemann, Paul Drews, and Friedrich Loofs. Until 1931 he remained editor and publisher of this magazine, which represented the voice of “culture Protestantism” (Kulturprotestantismus) in GERMANY. Rade supported the politics of national liberals. As did his brother-in-law FRIEDRICH NAUMANN, Rade later became a liberal theologian and politician. Theological and political liberalism were decisive for his religious engagement.

To devote himself to publishing the Christliche Welt, Rade left his parish in 1898 and began to teach at the University of Marburg. Marburg became the center of his political and journalistic work.

As a liberal theologian Rade supported the Evangelisch-sozialer Kongreß, which was founded in 1890. In various controversies with conservative church leaders he afforded critical voices the opportunity to publish in his journal.

Early on Rade supported the demands for a democratic Germany. After 1918 he supported the Weimar republic. Together with other liberal theologians he was active in the liberal Deutsche Demokratische Partei.

After 1933 Rade did not belong to the “CONFESSING CHURCH” (Bekennende Kirche). Despite his distance from National Socialism and his personally courageous support of individual persecuted Jews, Rade did not perceive the unjust character of the Nazi regime.

See also Cultural Protestantism; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Barth, Karl, Martin Rade, and Christoph Schwobel. Ein Brief-wechsel. Gütersloh, Germany:

Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1981.

Rade, Martin. Ausgewählte Schriften. Edited by Christoph Schwoebel. 3 vols. Gütersloh, Germany:

Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1983–1988.

———. Glaubenslehre. Gotha, Germany: F.A.Perthes, 1924–1927.

———. Die Stellung des Christentums zum Geschlechtsleben. Tübingen, Germany: J.C.B.Mohr (P.Siebeck), 1910.

Secondary Sources:

Nagel, Anne Ch. Martin Rade—Theologe und Politiker des Sozialen Protestantismus. Eine politische Biographie. Gütersloh, Germany: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1996.

Rathje, Johannes. Die Welt des Freien Protestantismus. Ein Beitrag zur deutsch-evangelischen Geistesgeschichte. Dargestellt am Leben und Werk von Martin Rade. Stuttgart, Germany: Klotz, 1952.

NORBERT FRIEDRICH

RADIO EVANGELISM

See Mass Media

RAGAZ, LEONHARD (1868–1945)

Swiss theologian. Ragaz was born to Bartholome and Luzia Ragaz, a farming family, in Tamins in the Grisons of SWITZERLAND on July 28, 1868. Familiar with economic hardship, and marked by his rural mountain community's cooperative movement and common ownership of the surrounding forests and meadows, Ragaz early embraced democratic socialism. After theological study in Basel, Jena, and Berlin, and ordination in 1890, he served three different congregations of the Swiss Reformed Church. The plight of the poor, problems related to alcoholism, peace, and—as a result of his marriage to Clara Nadig—WOMEN'S rights claimed much of his energy alongside PREACHING. In 1908 he was called to the University of Zurich to teach systematic and practical theology. He resigned from that position in 1921, moved to the city's workers' district, and attempted to establish a settlement house there. He sided with the strikers in the highly political Swiss strikes of 1903, 1912, and 1918. A card-carrying socialist, he fought the Bolshevik and Nazi ideologies, and engaged in efforts to bring their victims into Switzerland. Ragaz died December 6, 1945.

At the heart of his religious socialism was the theology of the "KINGDOM OF GOD." For Ragaz this kingdom was a vision of the Christian revolution. The recovery of New Testament ESCHATOLOGY and its teaching of God's present and coming reign caused Ragaz to renounce the individual-focused faith of culture Protestantism. Interpreting Jesus's death and resurrection as events of a revolution that both judges the world and propels it toward its own coming resurrection, Ragaz preached a double hope: one that awaits the great change at the end of time and one that expects and works for change even now in the present. He saw such latter changes in renewal movements like democracy and socialism, and in the work for peace and women's rights while never identifying them with God's kingdom.

See also Cultural Protestantism; Socialism, Christian; Theology

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Signs of the Kingdom. A Ragaz Reader. Edited and translated by Paul Bock. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1984.

Ragaz, Leonard. Israel, Judaism, and Christianity. London: V. Gollancz, 1947.

———. Von Christus zu Marx, von Marx zu Christus: ein Beitrag. Wernigerode am Harz, Germany: H.Harder, 1929.

———. Eingriffe ins Zeitgeschehen: Reich Gottes und Politik. Texte von 1900–1945. Luzern, Switzerland: Edition Exodus. 1995.

MARTIN RUMSCHEIDT

RAIKES, ROBERT (1735–1811)

English social reformer. Born in Gloucester, ENGLAND on September 14, 1735, Robert Raikes was the son of a printer who founded a local newspaper. Succeeding to the editorship of the paper after his father's death in 1757, Raikes became known for his local benevolence. In 1768, for example, he appealed in the paper for reform of abuses in the local jail's treatment of prisoners, gaining the notice of leading English philanthropists in the process. His initiative, his access to the press, and the attention he had received set the stage for his most notable achievement, the creation of four small schools to educate poor children of Gloucester, the first of which opened in July 1780. In November 1783, his newspaper mentioned the success of these schools, attracting considerable attention and encouraging similar initiatives elsewhere. Thus, Robert Raikes became known as the creator of the SUNDAY SCHOOL.

However, Raikes cannot be credited with originating educational programs for children. There is an extensive history of Christian initiative in this respect, especially programs under evangelical sponsorship in the mid-eighteenth century. But Raikes drew together several previously disparate themes: the necessity of basic Christian education for children, the possibilities inherent in education for poor children, and the role of independent, lay-led programs to supplement the churches. Initially Sunday schools functioned as ecumenical agencies (see ECUMENISM). But by the midnineteenth century, they became aligned with denominational programs and were subject to CLERGY oversight. Raikes found support for his own work from influential Anglican bishops. He retired from business in 1802 and died in Gloucester on April 5, 1811.

See also Education, Overview; Denomination

References and Further Reading

- Booth, Frank. Robert Raikes of Gloucester. National Christian Education Council, 1980.
- Cliff, Philip B. The Rise and Development of the Sunday School Movement in England, 1780–1980. National Christian Education Council, 1986.
- Laqueur, Thomas W. Religion and Respectability: Sunday Schools and Working Class Culture, 1780–1850. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1976.

WILLIAM SACHS

RAMABAI, PANDITA (1858–1922)

Indian educator and Christian activist. Ramabai was born April 23, 1858 in rural INDIA and died April 5, 1922 in Kedgaon, India. The daughter of an aging Hindu holy man and his young second wife, Ramabai learned from her parents to read and write. From her father she gained remarkable familiarity with Hindu sacred texts. The family's religious pilgrimages took them across India. By 1881 Ramabai alone had survived the poverty and famines that decimated her family.

In 1878 Ramabai had come to fame in Calcutta where the faculty of the University of Calcutta recognized her abilities by bestowing on her the coveted titles, Pandita and Sarasvati, distinctions generally not attained by WOMEN. She began her lifelong agitation for social reform, especially as it pertained to Indian women. An ardent champion of female education, Ramabai testified on behalf of Indian women before a British Commission in 1883. Shortly thereafter she sailed for ENGLAND. There, under the auspices of an Anglo-Catholic religious order (see ANGLO-CATHOLICISM), she converted to Christianity. In 1886 she arrived in the UNITED STATES, intent on studying education and raising support to accomplish her dream of educating high-caste Hindu widows.

Between 1886 and 1888 Ramabai traveled in the United States, often under the auspices of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. In December 1887 Edward Everett Hale chaired a large meeting in Boston's Channing Hall at which a Ramabai Association was formed. PHILLIPS BROOKS, George A. Gordon, FRANCES WILLARD, and Mary Hemenway joined him on its board. The Association pledged the support of leading American Protestants in the task of creating a residential school in Bombay for high-caste Hindu widows. Over the next ten years Ramabai more than fulfilled this dream. Her efforts for social change soon assumed a distinctive Christian cast and drew larger numbers of evangelically minded Protestants to her support. Within a decade she had established two institutions, the larger of which housed nearly 2,000 widows and orphans in a community she called "Mukti," or "Salvation." She maintained close ties to American and British Protestants and welcomed various missionaries to assist in her efforts. She undertook a translation of the BIBLE into colloquial Marathi, with study notes included to enable Indian women to work as village evangelists.

For two decades, Ramabai captured the hearts of American Protestants. She affiliated with no American DENOMINATIONS, but most of them supported her. She carried on her work as an Indian venture in which missionaries could be partners, although Indians retained control. A TEMPERANCE advocate and ardent supporter of the "uplifting" of India's women, she seized a critical moment and has been recognized since as a precursor of feminism whose efforts inspired not only Anglo-American Protestants but also the builders of modern India.

See also Bible Translation; Education, Overview

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Ramabai, Pandita. The High-Caste Hindu Woman. Philadelphia, PA: JB Rodgers, 1888.

———. A Testimony of Our Inexhaustible Treasure. Kedgaon, India: Pandita Ramabai Mukti Mission, 1992.

Ramabai, Pandita, and Shamsundar Manohar Adhav. Pandita Ramabai. Madras, India: Christian Literature Society, 1979.

Ramabai, Pandita, and Meera Kosambi. Pandita Ramabai Through Her Own Words: Selected Works. New Delhi, India; New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

———. Pandita Ramabai's American Encounter: The Peoples of the United States (1889). Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2003.

Secondary Source:

Adhav, Shamsundar Manohar. Pandita Ramabai. Madras, India: Christian Literature Society, 1979.

EDITH BLUMHOFER

RAMSEY, ARTHUR MICHAEL (1904–1988)

Archbishop of Canterbury. A biblical theologian, archbishop, and keen ecumenist, Ramsey saw the need for the church to hold together the extremes of catholic sacramental TRADITION and reformed concern for scriptural AUTHORITY.

Arthur Michael Ramsey was born November 14, 1904 in Cambridge, ENGLAND and died April 25, 1988 in Oxford. He was brought up within a Congregationalist heritage, of Anglo-Catholic formation, and educated at CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY. Ramsey was ordained in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND in 1928. He served in parochial ministry and lectured in THEOLOGY at the universities of Lincoln and Durham. In 1950 he was appointed Regius professor of divinity at Cambridge. Two years later he was elevated to bishop of Durham, and archbishop of York. He was archbishop of CANTERBURY from 1961 to 1974.

Despite a liberal political instinct, Ramsey was theologically conservative, and maintained that gospel truth is recognized through the CHURCH and sacramental participation. This ignored the contribution of theologians outside ecclesiastical structures. Ramsey would have struggled to engage with later feminist and liberation theologians. Influenced by KARL BARTH'S commentary on the book of Romans, his most significant work, The Gospel and the Catholic Church, stresses the cross as the starting point for theological truth, with the BIBLE as the living word that opens the heart to Christ's living presence. Reading FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE, Ramsey became increasingly unimpressed by Protestantism's lack of creational and incarnational appreciation in its focus on a gulf between God and the world.

Once at Canterbury, Ramsey established dialogue, declarations, and papers with Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic Churches. By conviction a disestablishmentarian, he worked, unsuccessfully, toward reunification with the Methodist church, and closer ties with LUTHERANISM. Criticized by liberals for not being radical enough, and by fundamentalists for encouraging Catholic rites and ritual, Ramsey would have been gladdened by the increased engagement by Protestants with the ascetical tradition (such as retreats), and by Catholics with biblical theology. His primacy was made difficult by his producing reactionary defenses of ORTHODOXY, poor administration, and disinterest in the appointment of bishops.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Dialogue, Interconfessional; Ecumenism; Fundamentalism; Methodism, England; Orthodoxy, Eastern; Neo-Orthodoxy

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Ramsey, Arthur Michael. The Gospel and the Catholic Church. London: Longmans, Green and Co., 1936.

Secondary Sources:

Chadwick, Owen. Michael Ramsey: A Life. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1990.

Gill, Robin, and Lorna Kendall, eds. Michael Ramsey as Theologian. London: Darton, Longman and Todd, 1995.

JAMES CHAPMAN

RAPTURE

The term “rapture” comes from the Latin raptus or rapio, denoting “caught up.” This derives from St. Paul’s description of the Second Advent: “For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up [harpagesometha] together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord” (I Thessalonians 4:16–17, King James Version). Now although this “catching away” was understood throughout most of the history of the church as referring to what would happen to the people of God at the return of Christ, during the nineteenth century a more specific understanding was formulated whereby the rapture of the church by Christ was distinguished from the second coming of Christ with the church. This development itself produced a variety of eschatological scenarios associated with whether the rapture would occur before, during, or after the tribulational period understood to precede the second coming and millennial reign of Christ.

The Rapture as Distinct from the Second Advent

The emergence to prominence of the specific notion of the rapture from the more general doctrine of the second coming must be understood against developments in eschatological ideas during the seventeenth through nineteenth centuries. Given developments in the new world, the amillennial view of Augustine dominant during the Middle Ages was gradually displaced initially by a growing acceptance of a postmillennialism (of not necessarily 1,000 literal years) thought to be ushered in by the church. However, the FRENCH REVOLUTION and the Second Great AWAKENING and associated REVIVALS at the turn of the nineteenth century precipitated a more apocalyptic perspective resulting in British and American mid-century Millenarian movements like MORMONISM, SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISM, Irvingism (followers of Edward Irving), and PLYMOUTH BRETHERNISM. The RESTORATIONISM of these groups led to a literalistic and futuristic reading of biblical prophecies, especially Revelation chapters 6–19, and a retrieval of what might be called the historic premillennialism of the early (pre-Constantinian) church whereby the second advent would inaugurate the 1,000-year reign of Christ.

This set of premillennialist ideas were forged into a system known as DISPENSATIONALISM by JOHN NELSON DARBY (1800–1882). Central features of Darby’s dispensationalism included a distinction between scriptures addressed to and regarding the two ages of Israel (the former preceding Christ and the future millennium) and scriptures regarding the parenthetical age of the church (present) and addressed to the church. This dispensationalist reading of the BIBLE concluded that the future literal millennial reign of God would fulfill all the prophecies concerning the “Day of the Lord” made to Israel; that there would be a transition period between this present age of the church and the future millennium of about seven years (derived from various interpretations of the frequent references to three and a half years made in the books of Daniel and Revelation); that this transitional period would be one of “great tribulation” (Matthew 24:21) upon the earth; and that the church would be removed or raptured secretly and suddenly (see also I Corinthians 15:52 and Matthew 24:40–41), thereby releasing the tribulational forces and inaugurating this “hour of temptation” (Revelation 3:10, KJV). In this way, it was thought, the scriptural teachings regarding the imminent return of Christ on the one hand and the Second Advent as preceded by signs on the other could be reconciled. The former referred to the secret rapture for the church and the latter to the second coming of the Messiah with the church.

Theological Perspectives and Debates

Darby’s dispensationalism in general and pretribulationist rapture theory in particular gained a following across large segments of conservative North American Protestantism through the Bible Conference movement of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The publication of the widely distributed SCOFIELD REFERENCE BIBLE (1909, improved edition 1917) both popularized and further solidified this pretribulationist and premillennialist ESCHATOLOGY. By the mid-twentieth century, however, sufficient questions had been raised about the pretribulationist theory to result in a variety of premillennialist scenarios.

Posttribulationists, for example, called attention to the many scriptural texts that indicated the church would endure rather than be exempt from persecution, thus questioning the function of the rapture to preserve the saints. Further, they were unconvinced that the two-stage return of Christ—for the Church first and then with the Church—could be sustained exegetically, thus affirming the historic premillennialist understanding of a single Second Advent. Finally, and perhaps more subtly decisive, posttribulationists are neither staunch dispensationalists nor biblical literalists.

Midtribulationism, by far the minority of the three positions, describes the attempt of those who responded to the posttribulationist questions by distinguishing between a “milder” tribulational period during the first half of the seven years and the more “wrathful” tribulational period during the last three and a half years. Whereas the church will endure the tribulation, she will be saved “from the wrath to come” (I Thessalonians 1:10; cf. I Thessalonians 5:9) at the sounding of the seventh trumpet (Revelation 11:15–19). Finally, the partial-rapture view is advocated by those who wish to acknowledge the call of the New Testament texts to vigilance and faithfulness. Those like the five virgins with oil in their lamps (Matthew 25:1–13) will be taken whereas the rest will be saved, but only through enduring the tribulation.

See also Millenarians and Millennialism

References and Further Reading

- Gundry, Robert H. The Church and the Tribulation. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1973.
- Ladd, George Eldon. The Blessed Hope: A Biblical Study of the Second Advent and the Rapture. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1956.
- Prosser, Peter E. Dispensationalist Eschatology and Its Influence on American and British Religious Movements. Lewiston, NY: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1999.
- Reiter, Richard R., Paul D. Feinberg, Gleason L. Archer, and Douglas J. Moo. The Rapture: Pre-, Mid-, or Post-Tribulation? Grand Rapids, MI: Academic Books/Zondervan Publishing House, 1984.
- Sandeen, Ernest R. The Roots of Fundamentalism: British and American Millenarianism, 1800–1930. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, 1970.
- Walvoord, John F. The Rapture Question. Rev. and enlarged. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1979.
- AMOS YONG

RAUSCHENBUSCH, WALTER (1861–1918)

The leading exponent of the American social gospel movement. Rauschenbusch was admired for the clarity and passion of his speaking and writing. Considered a social prophet in church circles, he was known to the public through books, magazine, and newspaper articles in which his social and religious thought appeared. Rauschenbusch both contributed to and was swept along by the multifaceted Progressive movement of the early twentieth century. Like many progressives, his views were informed by a mild form of socialism, belief in progress in history, the importance of democratic freedom, and American MANIFEST DESTINY. He believed the KINGDOM OF GOD would come in America if the church could be motivated to join the social movement already underway in society.

Rauschenbusch, who spent part of his childhood and his high school years in GERMANY, was fluent in German and English. He was born October 4, 1861 to August and Caroline Rauschenbusch in Rochester, New York, where his father had joined the German department at Rochester Theological Seminary (RTS) after serving as a German Baptist missionary to the Missouri frontier. They eventually returned to Germany. A graduate of the Free Academy of Gütersloh, Germany (1884), the University of Rochester (1884), and RTS (1886), he later returned to Europe four times to visit relatives, for independent study in Germany, and to observe the effects of social Christianity in ENGLAND. In 1893 he married Pauline Rother, a German Baptist born in Silesia. They had five children.

Rauschenbusch served as the pastor of a German-speaking Baptist immigrant congregation on the edge of “Hell’s Kitchen” in New York City for eleven years before becoming a professor of the New Testament in the German Department at RTS in 1897. While still a pastor he published German translations of gospel hymns with IRA D. SANKEY (1840–1908) and a life of Jesus in German. A move to the English Department of the seminary in 1902 as professor of church history marked the beginning of his remarkable career as a social prophet to American Protestants. Although dozens of pastors and professors were associated with the Social Gospel, Rauschenbusch attracted a national following as a platform speaker, lecturer, and writer after the publication of Christianity and the Social Crisis in 1907. After that he crisscrossed the country speaking at public forums, in college, seminary, and YMCA lecture series, and at Baptist and ecumenical church gatherings. Among his favorite topics were “The New Evangelism,” “What About the Woman?” and “The Freedom of Spiritual Religion.”

In addition to Christianity and the Social Crisis, he wrote seven other books in English. The best known were Christianizing the Social Order (1912); The Social Principles of Jesus (1916), written as a study book for the YMCA; and A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917). A Theology for the Social Gospel, his only sustained engagement with theological reflection, is an important link in the development of modern American theology and social ethics.

As the young pastor of an immigrant congregation, Rauschenbusch was deeply disturbed by the traumatic effect of city life on the poor, and the sudden economic fluctuations and social unrest marked by the labor problems, riots, strikes, and boycotts of the late 1880s. Many of his views about the church and social issues were formed at that time through his study of writers such as the Christian economist Richard Ely (1854–1943), the social theorist Henry George, the utopian visionary Edward Bellamy, and English social Christians like FREDERICK D. MAURICE (1805–1872) and Frederick W. Robertson. He refers to German theologians like FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834) and ALBRECHT RITSCHL (1822–1889) in his later writing, but his approach to “the social question” and theology was shaped by the American context of his ministry, Anglo-American social Christianity, and the theology of HORACE BUSHNELL (1802–1876).

Rauschenbusch was a founding member of The Brotherhood of the Kingdom, a group of Social Gospel leaders who met annually from 1893 to about 1912 for study, discussion of position papers, prayer, and communion. The goal of his ministry was the same as the stated purpose of the brotherhood, to reestablish the idea of the Kingdom of God in the thought of the church and to assist in its practical realization in the world. This meant using every available means of communication to influence and change public opinion.

Rauschenbusch continued to write and speak until a year before his death from cancer at the age of fiftyseven. As Europe moved toward war in 1914, there were growing allegations that he was a German sympathizer. The loneliness he had experienced as a young pastor stricken by serious hearing loss returned to haunt his final years. When he died, Social Gospel and seminary colleagues set aside political and theological disagreements and acknowledged him as the most influential figure in the development of the social gospel in America. Harry F. Ward (1873–1966), a Methodist social gospeler, predicted that future leaders of religion would continue to find guidance and inspiration in his writing.

The Social Gospel, a Movement and a Theology

Theologians are usually associated with a school of theology, but the Social Gospel is both a movement and a theology. A leading propagandist for the movement, Rauschenbusch had an extensive network of people across the country who corresponded with him, received copies of his books, and invited him to speak. Although many social gospelers published books with a similar combination of social and religious thought, only those by Rauschenbusch continue to move and impress readers. With the exception of A Theology for the Social Gospel, his theological convictions were rarely stated directly, a characteristic that made it possible for him to address several audiences simultaneously.

Although social gospel theology was one of several new theologies written to defend the credibility of Christian beliefs seriously challenged by DARWINISM and biblical criticism, social gospelers always gave priority to social problems and social ethics. In his quest for a new synthesis, Rauschenbusch incorporated theories from Bushnell about moral law, language, and the progressive unfolding of truth with social theory, popular science, and political economy. Emboldened by a belief that revelation is always mediated through personal contact between God's spirit and the human spirit, he was highly selective in his use of the BIBLE, drawing most often on the Old Testament prophets and the life and ministry of Jesus for inspiration. He regarded parts of the Bible as outmoded, even harmful to modern moral principles.

The theme of unity and social cooperation pervades Rauschenbusch's thought. He had observed the reactionary response of doctrinal denominations like the Baptists to social and intellectual change, and was convinced that theological conflict and competition between denominations worked against God's Kingdom on earth. Because he believed that metaphysical issues and the language of orthodox theology were also divisive, he expressed himself in noncreedal, nondoctrinal language. For similar reasons he participated in ecumenical organizations like the EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE and the Federal Council of Churches.

In the first paragraph of A Theology for the Social Gospel, Rauschenbusch writes that the church needs a theology large enough to match the social gospel and vital enough to back it. He was well aware of the difficulty of consolidating "the old faith" with the new aim of social salvation, but felt constrained to respond to a growing chorus of detractors who said the social gospel had no theology. His use of the term "social gospel" was ambiguous. His earlier books appealed to an amorphous Protestant public associated with American manifest destiny, and relied on phrases like the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, slogans with religious overtones also frequently used by politicians.

A Theology for the Social Gospel, written originally for a Yale University lecture series, reflects the knowledge of a professor of New Testament and church history. In each chapter Rauschenbusch contrasted old and new theology, describing differing interpretations of doctrines like sin, salvation, eschatology, and atonement. He critiqued old ways of thinking, then offered a new social approach to each doctrine. Saying that the social gospel had already become orthodox, he clearly believed theology was behind the times.

Christianity and the Social Crisis, written during a period of Protestant cultural hegemony, challenged readers to recognize and respond to the changing social order. Rauschenbusch urged Christians to recover the social purpose of Jesus's ministry and make it their own. He argued that the Kingdom would come if Christians accepted their social responsibility. Otherwise, society could regress or worse, fall into social chaos, a powerful argument at a time when early twentieth-century optimism was tempered by constant fear of social disorder.

In Christianizing the Social Order, Rauschenbusch claimed that God was acting through a social awakening already underway to create a new social order that would fulfill the highest ideals of democratic freedom. Describing family, church, education, and politics as already Christianized, he urged Christians to give their attention to the economic order, which he regarded as the primary source of social unrest and individual moral failure. He outlined the ways Christians could contribute to or even hasten the coming Kingdom, consigning women to "the home" while calling men to social amelioration in the world of business and politics.

Always alert to the impact of religious language and ideas, Rauschenbusch chose his words carefully, more like an evangelist than a classical theologian. He was critical of the negative impact of older theologies on both church and culture. In 1894 he presented a paper to a Baptist congress in which he explained that using language inappropriate to the age to represent God would retard progress. He almost always referred to God as Father, a familial reference to the love, justice, and brotherhood that characterize the Kingdom of God, but deplored references to God as Judge as too individualistic to inspire and undergird modern social faith.

Rauschenbusch prized the freedom of American democracy because he considered freedom essential to moral development. He evaluated the social maturity of nations, historical periods, religions, and social groups according to the extent to which they were capable of living a moral life in an immoral society. Although his ideal was a society in which moral maturity for all was a possibility, he never expected social perfection due to the fluctuating nature of society. He regularly cited the freedom of American women as a sign of progress, but gave limited support to women's suffrage, saying that women lacked the moral maturity needed to participate in politics.

Legacy to American Protestantism

Walter Rauschenbusch longed for a faith to give unity to the whole of life, and found it in the Kingdom of God. It was the grand overarching vision through which he saw his own work as unifying theology and ethics, sacred and secular, church and state. He used the phrase to signify God's coming Kingdom on earth, the importance of doing God's will, personal union with Christ and God, unity in the church, nation, and world. It was important to him that Jesus introduced the Kingdom idea to his followers, died for the Kingdom, and instructed his followers to sacrifice themselves for it.

During his lifetime some critics regarded his theology as heretical. By the 1920s, early fundamentalists declared him an enemy of the church and orthodoxy. Yet as the most kindly, collegial apologist of the Social Gospel, Rauschenbusch played a major role in the restoration of historic Protestant concern for civic order and justice in American denominations. Never before in American church history had so many pastors, professors, and church members been caught up in the social issues, politics, and practical reform measures of their time.

Rauschenbusch participated in limited civic reform in Rochester, but his primary social ministry was his work as a scholar seeking social change by changing minds. His understanding of the potential of human nature for goodness and the reality of social change was overly optimistic. Scientific theories of social evolution widely accepted at the time led him to believe there would be far less need for government and laws to protect people from each other as capitalism was gradually replaced by a cooperative social order. In the meantime, he challenged the churches to replace the old individual motive with the new social motive essential to moral and social progress. In his gradualist, noninterventionist understanding of progress there would always be a place for religion as the source and safeguard of moral progress in society.

A moralist at heart, the legacy of Rauschenbusch to Protestantism is mixed. The ethicist and theologian REINHOLD NIEBUHR (1892–1971) was an articulate critic of Rauschenbusch’s optimism about human nature, history, and social progress; yet without Rauschenbusch it is unlikely that Niebuhr would have written a book like Moral Man in Immoral Society. While Rauschenbusch undoubtedly laid foundations for a Christian social ethic, in their haste to attack his theology, his critics often fail to notice the extent to which his social ethic incorporated nineteenth-century popular science, psychology, and biological dualism.

Rauschenbusch’s political agenda was far more conservative than his theology due to his belief that by the early twentieth century, laissez-faire capitalism had been contained, making the moral development and maturity of the American people a real possibility. He opposed the use of legislation as an instrument of social change, holding that a new law should represent an existing consensus of public opinion. He objected to the Sherman antitrust law, saying it worked against the law of progress by association. He opposed any idea or action that interfered with the potential of every individual for moral development through the use of the faculty of moral sense. In the final analysis his social ethic depended on a utopian vision of a society in which, as he liked to say, “good men can be good.”

Walter Rauschenbusch, first-generation American, social theorist, and theologian, laid the foundations for a pragmatic theological ethic based on a rational view of the world. The power of his vision was matched by his ability to express his concern about the future of church and society through engaging writing and speaking. A seminary professor who never lost touch with church people, Rauschenbusch addressed the public at a moment in history when church and state came together around a very Protestant belief in American manifest destiny.

See also Baptist: Biblical Interpretation; Church and State; Manifest Destiny; Social Gospel.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Hudson, Winthrop S., ed. Walter Rauschenbusch, Selected Writings. New York: Paulist Press, 1984.

- Rauschenbusch, Walter. Christianity and the Social Crisis. New York: Macmillan, 1907.
———. Christianizing the Social Order. New York: Macmillan, 1912.
———. The Social Principles of Jesus. New York: Association Press, 1916.
———. A Theology for the Social Gospel. New York: Macmillan, 1917.

Secondary Sources:

- Fishburn, Janet Forsythe. The Fatherhood of God and the Victorian Family: The Social Gospel in America. New York: Fortress Press, 1981.
Handy, Robert T., ed. The Social Gospel in America: Gladden, Ely, Rauschenbusch. New York: Oxford University Press, 1966.
Jaehn, Klaus Juergen. Walter Rauschenbusch. The Formative Years. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1976.
Minus, Paul M. Walter Rauschenbusch. American Reformer. New York: Macmillan, 1988.

JANET F.FISHBURN

REFORMATION

The Reformation of the sixteenth century with deep medieval roots and variegated fruits affected every aspect of early modern life. Its evangelical sprouts not only hardened into many of the contemporary branches of Protestantism, but also intertwined with the growth of early modern Catholicism. The taxonomy of the Reformation focuses on the reformers with the supposition that without them there would have been no Reformation. At the same time, to carry our garden image a bit further, it is clear that any analysis of growth must take into account the soil and environment.

Interpretations of the Reformation

How one sees the Reformation depends on one's commitment and vantage point. Interpretations now range far beyond the stock church-historical categories of "magisterial" (led by academics—magistri—and supported by magistrates: Anglican, Lutheran, Calvinist); "radical" (or "left wing," dissidents and Anabaptist movements); and "Catholic" (in pre-ecumenical days, "Counter") Reformations. Political and social historians have provided a multitude of new perspectives informed by political history, Marxism, psychology, sociology, and anthropology. Older interpretations formulated by the great German scholars Leopold von Ranke (1795–1886), ERNST TROELTSCH (1865–1923), and KARL HOLL (1866–1926) were, in one way or another, efforts to relate the modern German identity and state to the Reformation. For Ranke, the Reformation was a unique epoch of history bracketed by MARTIN LUTHER'S "Ninety-Five Theses" (1517) and the "Religious Peace" of the Diet of Augsburg (1555). Troeltsch, on the other hand, viewed the magisterial Reformation, especially in its Lutheran form, as the last gasp of the Middle Ages. For Troeltsch, the break from the unified, authoritarian medieval culture and the initiation of the modern world came with the Calvinist, but even more so the Anabaptist decoupling of CHURCH AND STATE, and in the quest for individual freedom of conscience and faith. Holl strove to refute Troeltsch's position by concentrated research on Luther's theology and ETHics as key to the integration of German CULTURE.

Marxist historians, informed by Friedrich Engels' (1820–1895) study of the Peasants' War (1524–1525), interpreted the Reformation as an early bourgeois revolution against feudalism that facilitated the next stage of social formation, capitalism. The Marxist interpretive model stimulated social-historical interests that have greatly increased knowledge of the social, economic, and theological bases of the Reformation. Informed by constructs such as “social disciplining,” “CONFESSIONALIZATION,” and “popular religion,” there has been a growing sense that “the Reformation” consists of a number of messily inter-twining movements with such labels as “princes' Reformation,” “urban Reformation,” “communal Reformation,” and “peoples' Reformation” that extend back to medieval renewal movements and into the early modern period. While the debate over the plurality of Reformations and their interpretations shows no sign of slackening, some scholars remind us that there would not have been a Reformation without reformers. The reformers themselves were driven by the question that Luther posed in a 1524 letter to Strasbourg, “What makes a person a Christian?”

In continuity with the early church, the reformers sought answers to this question in the praxis of the worshipping community: “lex orandi, lex credendi.” Hence, although the Reformation is traditionally dated from Luther's posting of the “Ninety-Five Theses,” it is important to remember that this formal academic disputation focused on the sacrament of penance and its associated issues of justification, indulgences, purgatory, and ecclesiastical authority. Sharply put, the Reformation began with a focus on the central pastoral praxis of the church. Luther and his colleagues brought THEOLOGY out of the academic closet with vernacular sermons and devotional writings addressed to the fundamental issues of the religious life: the need for God's love and acceptance, personal anxiety before DEATH, and guidance in life.

A constant Reformation refrain was the recovery of biblical PREACHING and pastoral theology. The reformers benefited in this task by the works of their humanist predecessors and contemporaries such as Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples (c. 1460–1536) and Desiderius Erasmus (1469–1536). The former promoted a unified reading of Scripture by a spiritual, christological vision in his biblical prefaces, Pauline commentaries, Psalm comparisons, and French lectionary and homilies. The latter promoted textual advances in biblical understanding by his edited version of the Greek New Testament (first edition in 1516), as well as hermeneutical perspectives in his many other writings. Preachers now became translators, and translators became preachers. The conviction that theology serves proclamation is succinctly expressed in Erasmus' rendering of the opening verses of the Gospel of John: “In the beginning was the sermon.”

The Reformation in Germany

The theological and pastoral problem that plagued Luther was whether SALVATION is achieved or received. The medieval scholastic answer, that it is both, did not resolve the issue for him, because the necessity of even the smallest human contribution to salvation threw the burden of proof back on the person. Luther's teaching responsibilities at the recently founded (1502) University of Wittenberg, as well as his own quest for certainty of salvation, led him to intensive study of the BIBLE. Here he discovered that righteousness before God is not what the sinner achieves, but rather what the sinner receives as a free gift from God. Thus salvation is no longer the goal of life, but rather the foundation of life. Luther reversed the medieval piety of achievement: Good works do not make the sinner acceptable to God, but rather God's acceptance of the sinner prompts good works.

The Reformation motif of FAITH active in love energized innovative approaches to a broad range of early modern social issues including reform of social welfare, literacy and public EDUCATION, and political issues of AUTHORITY and the right to resistance. The reformers rejection of mandatory clerical CELIBACY not only struck at church authority, but also "civil"-ized the clergy in the sense that they became citizens with homes, families, and a stake in civil responsibilities. Scholars such as MAX WEBER noted that this liberation from "otherworldly asceticism" released human energy and material resources for this-worldly activities.

While Luther referred to the early evangelical movement in Wittenberg as "our theology," fissures among erstwhile colleagues began appearing by the early 1520s. ANDREAS BODENSTEIN VON KARLSTADT (1486–1541), sometimes referred to as the forerunner of PURITANISM, insisted that evangelical insights must be instituted without tarrying for anyone. One effect of this, paralleled in other centers of reform such as Zurich, was an outbreak of ICONOCLASM during efforts to sweep out the old faith. Luther's response was that to coerce people into Gospel perspectives by forced reform was only to revert back to a religion of laws, and thus undermine the insight that JUSTIFICATION is a free gift.

Tensions and conflicts between the German reformers escalated in relation to the Peasants' War (1524–1525) as THOMAS MÜNTZER (c. 1490–1525) joined the late phase of the war with the rallying cry that "the godless have no right to live." The extremely volatile mix of late medieval APOCALYPTICISM, oppressive social and economic conditions, coupled with the Reformation motifs of the "freedom of the Christian" and theological critiques of canon law and papal authority fueled the peasants' social and religious expectations but horribly misfired at their disastrous defeat at Frankenhausen in 1525.

The Emperor Charles V's (1500–1558) military preoccupations with FRANCE (the Habsburg-Valois Wars, 1521–1559) and the Ottoman Empire (Sultan Süleyman I the Magnificent, r. 1520–1566) continually frustrated Charles's efforts to eliminate the Reformation movements in his realm apart from his hereditary lands, the Low Countries. Charles needed the support of the Protestant princes (the pejorative term "Protestant" arose from the protest by evangelical princes against imposition of the EDICT OF WORMS outlawing the evangelical movement at the 1529 DIET OF SPEYER) in his military campaigns. The Protestant princes presented an irenic confession of their faith to the Emperor at the 1530 Diet of Augsburg. Composed by Luther's colleague, PHILIPP MELANCHTHON (1497–1560), the AUGSBURG CONFESSION did not sway the Catholic Emperor to rescind the Edict of Worms, but it did become the foundational document for Lutheran churches up to today (see LUTHERANISM).

The rejection of the Augsburg Confession led the Protestants to form a military alliance, the SCHMALKALDIC LEAGUE, that managed to protect the Protestant movement until its defeat by imperial forces in 1547. By this time, however, the evangelicals had gained sufficient strength that a series of settlements led finally to their TOLERATION in the 1555 Peace of Augsburg.

The Reformation in Switzerland

The Reform movement in SWITZERLAND under the leadership of HULDRYCH ZWINGLI (1484–1531) proceeded along roughly parallel lines in Zurich, and then under the leadership of JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) in Geneva. Unlike Luther, these Reformers lacked the protection of a benevolent and supportive prince and thus had to develop and implement their movements in cooperation (and tension) with their respective town councils.

Influenced by Humanism, Zwingli's intensive biblical study and preaching led to his 1518 appointment by the city government to the major preaching post in Zurich. His commitment to the Reformation principle, sola scriptura, was evident immediately. His sermons, no longer based upon the church's lectionary, methodically expounded book after biblical book. By 1525 he had established "prophesyings," weekly Bible studies for the Zurich CLERGY and advanced students. A similar practice was established in Geneva in 1536 under Calvin and GUILLAUME FAREL. All of life, personal and communal, was to be normed by Scripture.

Controversy, however, soon erupted on multiple fronts. At home, Zwingli and his colleagues found themselves in a double-fronted conflict with those who wanted to halt reforms and those who wanted to expand and radicalize them. The former were led by Hugo, the bishop of Constance, whose diocese included Zurich; the latter were led by CONRAD GREBEL (1498–1526), the reputed founder of ANABAPTISM. The Anabaptists (i.e., "re-baptists"), in applying biblical norms to faith and life, understood BAPTISM to be contingent on a mature confession of faith rather than a sacrament administered to infants who neither understood nor evidenced a Christian life. The Anabaptist confession of faith, the SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION (1527), also rejected what most of their contemporaries assumed were normal obligations of citizenship: oaths, tithes, and military service.

Added to these challenges facing Zwingli was the years-long dispute with Luther over the correct interpretation of the LORD'S SUPPER. The German Lutheran prince, PHILIP OF HESSE, hoping for a united Protestant front, brought Luther and Zwingli to the negotiating table in Marburg in 1529. At the MARBURG COLLOQUY, the Lutherans and Zwinglians agreed on 14 of 15 articles. They repudiated TRANSUBSTANTIATION and the belief that the mass is a sacrifice for the living and the dead, and they insisted on communion in both kinds. The two evangelical parties however remained apart on whether the Lord's Supper is primarily an act of thanksgiving for the Gospel (Zwingli's symbolic and memorial view) or a concrete offer of the Gospel (Luther's sacramental emphasis on Christ's real presence). The differing Protestant theologies of the Eucharist continued to divide the church despite Calvin's later ecumenical efforts informed by his own emphasis on the gift character of the sacrament. Calvin did achieve agreement with Zwingli's successor, HEINRICH BULLINGER (1504–1575). In 1549 they signed the Consensus Tigurinus, but by this time many second-generation Lutherans suspected that this was more Zwinglian than Lutheran.

Unable to achieve recognition at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, Zurich was vulnerable to Catholic pressures. In 1531 the Zurich forces were routed at the Second Battle of Kappel, during which Zwingli was killed. The consequent political resolution that divided Switzerland by confessional allegiance foreshadowed the fate of Europe. In 1555 the Peace of Augsburg ratified confessional divisions with the faith of the ruler. This arrangement was later summarized by the motto cuius regio, eius religio, “whose reign, his religion.”

At the time of Zwingli’s death, Geneva had not yet adopted the Reformation and neither had its future reformer John Calvin, who was just completing his legal studies in France. Sometime in 1533–1534, Calvin experienced his so-called “unexpected CONVERSION.” Trained in law and imbued with humanist learning, Calvin echoed Luther’s fundamental understanding of salvation. In his INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION, Calvin described justification by faith in terms of God’s acquittal of the guilty sinner.

In early 1535 Calvin sought refuge in Basel from the intensifying persecution of Protestants in his native France. Here he completed and published the first edition of his Institutes, prefaced by a masterful appeal to Francis I for a fair hearing of the evangelical faith. Calvin then settled his affairs in France and set out for the free imperial city of Strasbourg, where he hoped to settle down to a life of evangelical scholarship. Forced to detour through Geneva, Calvin was confronted by his compatriot, Guillaume Farel (1489–1565), who had been preaching reform in Geneva since 1532. Only months before Calvin’s arrival in July 1536, Geneva had finally achieved independence, with the aid of its neighbor Bern, from the Duchy of Savoy and its imposed Episcopal rule. The citizens voted to adopt the Reformation and to expel all clergy who disagreed. Faced by the enormous task of institutionalizing reform in Geneva, Farel made it clear in no uncertain terms to Calvin that God had sent Calvin to Geneva for precisely this task. Furthermore, he told Calvin that to shirk this duty would incur his damnation; thus Calvin stayed!

The reforming colleagues’ emphasis on CHURCH DISCIPLINE and authority soon alienated the Geneva council and many of its citizens. Exiled in 1539, Calvin now finally made it to Strasbourg, where he spent the next years learning about institutional reform and church organization from that city’s reformer, MARTIN BUCER (1491–1551). Here, too, he married. Geneva, now concerned about faltering reform, appealed to Calvin to return. Not without misgivings, but with the promise that he could develop a reformed order for the church, Calvin returned in 1541. Within six weeks of his return, Calvin completed and submitted to the magistrates of Geneva his Ecclesiastical Ordinances. Soon ratified, the Ordinances organized the Genevan church according to four categories of ministry: doctors, pastors, deacons, and elders. The doctors were to maintain doctrinal purity through theological study and instruction. Pastors were responsible for preaching, administering the SACRAMENTS, and admonishing the people. Deacons were responsible for the supervision of poor relief and the hospitals. Elders, laymen, were responsible for maintaining discipline within the community. The institutional organ for church discipline was the CONSISTORY, a kind of ecclesiastical court that included the pastors and elders. The Consistory was a bone of contention through most of Calvin’s career in Geneva due to its supervision of public morality and its power to excommunicate.

Challenges to Calvin's authority came not just from those who resented what they considered meddling by the Consistory. Two doctrinal debates threatened to unravel the fabric of "the most perfect school of Christ," as Scottish reformer JOHN KNOX called Geneva. The first of these was a sharp public attack on Calvin's doctrine of PREDESTINATION by Jerome Bolsec, who claimed that it was unbiblical. The charge that the Genevan reformers were unclear about a point of Scripture was not a narrow theological challenge, because the reform movement rested on popular confidence in its biblical basis. Calvin's response was to reiterate that PREDESTINATION is an expression of unconditional GRACE: God chooses the sinner, not vice versa. Bolsec himself was banished from Geneva for life.

The second controversy was the trial and execution of MICHAEL SERVETUS (c. 1511–1553) for his denial of the DOCTRINE of the Trinity (see ANTI-TRINITARIANISM). Already notorious throughout Europe for his written attacks on the Trinity, Servetus escaped execution in France (where the Catholics had to be satisfied with burning him in effigy) and ended up in Geneva, where the Protestants did the "honor." From a political perspective, the Genevans were in a bind if they did not try and execute Servetus, because the city had gained a reputation as the haven for heretics, but the operative motive was theological. It was this to which the Genevan schoolmaster exiled by Calvin, SEBASTIAN CAS-TELLIO, responded when he wrote: "To burn a heretic is not to defend a doctrine, but to kill a person." Castellio's 1554 Concerning Heretics, Whether They Are to be Persecuted is one of the most well-known early modern pleas for religious toleration.

Calvin's Protestant contemporaries did not view Geneva as a vengeful theocracy; large numbers of religious refugees flocked to Geneva. Thousands of refugees came from nearly every province in France as well as from ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, Holland, ITALY, Spain, GERMANY, POLAND, and Bohemia. When they returned home, they took CALVINISM with them.

The Reformation in France

Once Calvin's leadership was established in Geneva, he and the French exiles living there directed an effective evangelization program toward France. Although French evangelicals were called "HUGUENOTS," these Calvinists preferred the term "Reformed." By 1567, more than 100 pastors sent from Geneva were organizing Reformed congregations patterned on the Geneva church. In 1559 the first national SYNOD of the Reformed church in France met in Paris. Calvin himself provided the first draft of its CONFESSION of faith, the GALLICAN CONFESSION. It was modified at the Synod of La Rochelle in 1571 and continues to inform French Reformed churches to this day.

As in England, the crown played a major role in the course of the Reformation in France. Until the late 1520s, reform-minded humanists and reformers found shelter under Francis I's enthusiasm for Renaissance humanism. But the Gallican tradition of "one king, one law, one faith," plus the crown's considerable power over the church guaranteed by the Concordat of Bologna (1516), precluded state endorsement of Reformation ideas. By 1516, Francis I had everything that HENRY VIII broke with the church to get. Thus as Reformation ideas began to take root not only in the “middle class,” but also in the nobles of the Bourbon (next in line for the throne after the ruling Valois) and Montmorency houses, the crown began a policy of persecution designed to root out Protestantism.

The resulting civil strife prompted the crown’s call for a public Protestant-Catholic debate. Any hope that the COLLOQUY OF POISSY (1561) would contribute to peace was dashed when THEODORE BEZA (1519–1605), Calvin’s heir apparent in Geneva and leader of the Huguenot delegation, unequivocally rejected transubstantiation in his opening address. To Beza and his colleagues, the Catholic belief that the Mass was the community’s supreme good work of offering and receiving the corporeal Christ was no more than idolatry and rejection of the gospel. The Catholic rage against such blasphemy was not merely a reaction to theological disputation, but also reflected the offenses visited on their faith by a generation of iconoclasts who had desecrated churches and holy objects including the consecrated sacramental bread.

The crown’s effort to overcome the failure at Poissy by an Edict of Toleration (January 1562) lasted barely two months before armed attacks on Huguenot congregations occurred, and the country sank into decades of barbarity fueled by religious hatred. The most infamous event in the French Wars of Religion was the St. Bartholomew’s Day Massacre (August 24, 1572), when thousands of Huguenots were massacred in a frenzy of state terrorism. A generation later, weary of bloodshed and assassinations, the Protestant Bourbon, Henry of Navarre, became king as Henry IV, converted to Catholicism (“Paris is worth a Mass”), and set forth a policy of limited toleration in the EDICT OF NANTES (1598) that lasted until its revocation by Louis XIV in 1685.

The Reformation in England

Henry VIII, whose drive for a male heir, among other things, prompted his break with Rome, informed the traditional view of the English Reformation as an act of state. Indeed, the top-down imposition of ECCLESIOLOGY continued in his heirs: Protestantism with Edward VI, Catholicism with Mary Tudor, and Protestantism with ELIZABETH I. Yet, without gainsaying the significant roles of the various Tudors, the Reformation in England benefited from a residual Lollard anticlericalism, humanist interest in reform, and Continental Reformation influences spread by young CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY scholars, pamphlets, BIBLE TRANSLATIONS, the return of English students studying in the centers of Switzerland, and then the influx of Protestant refugees fleeing the 1548 AUGSBURG INTERIM imposed by Charles V after his victory over Protestant forces. Later, of course, with the accession of Elizabeth I (1558), the Marian exiles returned from such Protestant centers as Frankfurt and Geneva and began to radicalize reforms in England in the direction of Puritanism.

Translations of the Bible into English were significant means of introducing Reformation ideas. WILLIAM TYNDALE (c. 1494–1536), one of the most influential translators, carried out most of his work in exile on the Continent. His translation of the New Testament (first printed in 1525) used Luther's translation and included many of the prefaces to Luther's Bible. MILES COVERDALE (1488–1568) assisted Tyndale in translating the Old Testament, and was responsible for the first complete English translation of the Bible (1535). Largely through the influence of THOMAS CROMWELL (c. 1485–1540), Henry VIII's chief minister in state and church, and Archbishop THOMAS CRANMER (1489–1556), the king was persuaded to put the Bible in all the churches.

Theological ideas, both home-grown and imported, were not however the source for the English break with Rome, but rather the king's "great matter." Henry's marriage to his brother's widow, Catherine of Aragon, arranged to continue the alliance with Spain, necessitated a papal dispensation because Leviticus 18:6–18 prohibited marriages within close relationships. The only child to survive from the marriage was Mary Tudor. Henry wanted a male heir and hoped that Anne Boleyn would do the honors. He appealed to Pope Clement VII for an annulment on the biblical basis that one should not marry a brother's widow (Leviticus 20:21). Henry's demand put Clement in an ecclesiastical and political bind. If he granted an annulment, then he would undermine papal authority by reversing a previous pope's action. The political problem was that Clement was virtually a prisoner of the emperor Charles V (the Sack of Rome, 1527), who as Catherine's nephew was adamantly opposed to Henry's plan to divorce her. Henry's solution, after a very long and convoluted process, was to get satisfaction through the English court. To free himself from papal interference, Henry declared himself and his successors head of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND (Act of Supremacy, 1534). Henry wanted Rome, but not Catholicism, out of his realm. Hence the Act of Six Articles (1539) reaffirmed pre-Reformation ORTHODOXY.

Reformation theology—oriented to the Swiss Reformed—came to the fore during the reign of the child king, Edward VI (1547–1553). Cranmer provided the Prayer Book (1549, revised 1552) and a statement of faith, the Forty-Two Articles (revised to the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES under Elizabeth). The tide was reversed with the accession of the ardent Roman Catholic Mary to the throne (1553–1558). Ironically, her efforts to restore Catholicism strengthened Protestant resolve. Her marriage to Philip of Spain linked her faith to foreign influence; her efforts to restore church properties alienated their present owners; her persecution of Protestants created the host of martyrs celebrated by JOHN FOXE'S martyrology (see ACTS AND MONUMENTS); and through the flight of hundreds of leading Protestants, she exposed English Protestants to Continental theology that they eagerly brought back on her death.

The pendulum of reform swung to the middle with Elizabeth whose long reign (1558–1603) facilitated the establishment of English Protestantism. Elizabeth's via media retained traditional VESTMENTS and liturgy now in English with sermon and prayers informed by a Reformed COVENANT theology and normed by the Thirty-Nine Articles. The theology of Eucharist, a perennial focal point of dispute, denied transubstantiation on the one hand and Zwinglian symbolism on the other while remaining open to a range of Lutheran and Calvinist interpretations. The Scriptures were affirmed to be the source and norm of faith, and the Creeds were accepted as expressions of Scripture. As "Supreme Governor" of the church (1559 Act of Supremacy), Elizabeth proceeded to appoint moderate clergy who conformed to her program. Significant support came from such apologists as JOHN JEWEL (1522–1571; Apology for the Anglican Church) and

RICHARD HOOKER (c. 1554–1600; Treatise on the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity). Elizabeth resolved the challenge from Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots, with her French Catholic connection, by executing Mary in 1587, and destroying the Spanish Armada in 1588. The challenge from Calvinists of varying persuasions was a continual bother with “Presbyterians” rejecting Episcopal polity and “Puritans” striving to purify the church of all vestiges of Catholicism (see PURITANISM). Elizabeth charted a course between Catholicism and Calvinism, because the former denied her legitimacy and the latter rejected the episcopacy she believed supported monarchy. To rule the Church of England through her bishops, Elizabeth had to reject the decentralized polity of European Reformed churches and of Scottish PRESBYTERIANISM. Her successor, James I, agreed with his succinct phrase: “No bishop, no king.”

Scandinavia and Eastern Europe

Humanism and Catholic reform movements prepared the ground for the introduction of the Reformation in DENMARK, which at that time included NORWAY, ICELAND, a number of provinces in present-day SWEDEN, and the associated duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, where the Danish king was duke. Lutheran influences were evident in Schleswig already in the early 1520s, and King Christian III (r. 1534–1559) officially established the Lutheran Reformation in Denmark in 1537. The king’s own evangelical commitment may have begun when he saw Luther at the Diet of Worms; he later married a Lutheran; corresponded extensively with Luther, Melancthon, and JOHANNES BUGHENHAGEN (1485–1558) on theological subjects; and provided economic support to the Wittenberg reformers. Christian appointed Luther’s colleague Bugenhagen, known as the “Reformer of the North” for his introduction of the Wittenberg reforms throughout northern German cities and his native Pomerania, to lead the reform of the Danish church. Stationed in Copenhagen from 1537–1539, Bugenhagen led the reorganization of the church, ordaining seven new Lutheran bishops, thus ending apostolic succession, and reforming the University of Copenhagen according to the model of the University of Wittenberg. Influential Danish theologians, such as the bishops Peder Palladius, HANS TAUSEN, and Niels Palladius, were trained at Wittenberg. In 1538 the Augsburg Confession was made the theological foundational document of the Danish church.

Luther’s theology was brought to Sweden and FINLAND by OLAUS PETRI and his brother LAURENTIUS, both of whom had studied in Wittenberg. The Swedish king Gustavus Vasa (r. 1523–1560) established the Reformation there in 1527. One consequence in Finland was the sending of Finnish students to Wittenberg, the most famous of these being MICHAEL AGRICOLA (c. 1510–1557). Agricola is known as the father of written Finnish through his prayer book (1544) and New Testament translation (1548). In Eastern Europe, the Reformation was established in Prussia and Livonia but remained a minority movement in other areas.

Early Modern Catholicism

Well before Luther came on the scene, reform movements found personal expression in corporate devotional movements such as the Beguines and Beghards (twelfth century), the Brethren of the Common Life or Devotio Moderna (late fourteenth century), and institutional expression in the conciliar movement (fourteenth century on) that called for reform of the church “in head and members.” By the eve of the Reformation, Catholics, Humanists, and theologians were exploring and translating the Bible, preachers (e.g., Girolamo Savonarola, d. 1498) were endeavoring to instill piety and ethics, and confraternities and oratories provided vehicles for lay spirituality and CHARITY. The continuation of medieval monastic reforming movements may be seen in the person and work of Ignatius Loyola (1491–1556), whose interest centered on the promotion of pastoral and mission work rather than the reform of doctrine.

On the other hand, the late medieval papacy’s antipathy toward conciliarism was a major factor in Roman foot-dragging in response to repeated Protestant calls since 1520 for a council to deal with the issues raised by the Reformation. When the council finally began in 1546 in Trent, a generation of strife had hardened positions. By the eve of the Council, various mediating efforts (e.g., Cardinal Contarini and Philipp Melanchthon at the COLLOQUY OF REGENSBURG in 1541) had been rejected by both sides as unacceptable compromises of the “truth.”

The Council of Trent, meeting in three distinct assemblies (1545–1547, 1551–1552, and 1561–1563), focused on both the moral, spiritual, and educational renewal of the Catholic Church and the refutation of Protestantism. The latter goal found expression in the Council’s repudiation of sola Scriptura by the elevation of TRADITION to an equal source of revelation; the supplementation of sola gratia with human cooperation; and reaffirmation of the seven sacraments and the doctrine of transubstantiation. Papal authority, although not officially established in the modern sense until Vatican I (1870), was reaffirmed at the conclusion of the Council of Trent by the papal bull Benedictus Deus that reserved authentic interpretation of conciliar decrees to the pope.

References and Further Reading

- Brady, Thomas A. Jr., Heiko A. Oberman, and James D. Tracy, eds. Handbook of European History 1400–1600. Late Middle Ages, Renaissance and Reformation. 2 vols. Leiden, The Netherlands: E.J.Brill, 1994.
- Cameron, Euan. The European Reformation. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1991.
- Dickens, A.G., and John M. Tonkin with Kenneth Powell. The Reformation in Historical Thought. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Dixon, C. Scott, ed. The German Reformation: The Essential Readings. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 1999.
- Edwards, Mark U. Jr. Printing, Propaganda, and Martin Luther. Berkeley, CA: University Of California Press, 1994.
- Gordon, Bruce, ed. Protestant History and Identity in Sixteenth-Century Europe. 2 vols. Aldershot, UK: Scholar Press, 1996.

- Greengrass, Mark. The Longman Companion to the European Reformation c. 1500–1618. London: Longman, 1998.
- Gregory, Brad S. Salvation at Stake: Christian Martyrdom in Early Modern Europe. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Hillerbrand, Hans J., editor-in-chief. The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Reformation. 4 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Lindberg, Carter. The European Reformations. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 1996.
- , ed. The Reformation Theologians. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 2001.
- O'Malley, John W. Trent and All That: Renaming Catholicism in the Early Modern Era. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.
- Muller, Richard A. The Unaccommodated Calvin: Studies in the Foundation of a Theological Tradition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Pettegree, Andrew, ed. The Reformation World. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Wiesner, Merry E. Women and Gender in Early Modern Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Williams, George H. The Radical Reformation, 3rd ed. Kirksville, MO: Sixteenth Century Journal Publishers, 1992.

CARTER LINDBERG

REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA

The Reformed Church in America (RCA) is a Protestant denomination with roots in the Reformed Church in THE NETHERLANDS. It is presbyterian in church government (see PRESBYTERY, CHURCH GOVERNMENT) and holds as standards of faith the ecumenical creeds, the BELGIC CONFESSION, the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, and the CANONS OF DORT. Currently there are 300,000 baptized and confirmed members and 950 churches in the UNITED STATES and CANADA.

Origins

The Reformed Church is the state church of the Netherlands and was shaped by the THEOLOGY and practices of JOHN CALVIN in Geneva in the sixteenth century. In the 1620s the Dutch West India Trading Company established a community in New Amsterdam (Manhattan). People emigrated primarily for economic reasons, but the Classis of Amsterdam wanted to establish a religious presence there. The RCA officially began in April 1628 when the Rev. Jonas Michaelius arrived in Manhattan and held the first communion service. The Dutch settlers had previously attended worship services led by krankenbezoekers [visitors of the sick] who held the office of deacon and were authorized to lead WORSHIP and read Dutch sermons.

The Reformed Protestant Dutch Church (RPDC), as it was called until 1867, grew slowly where Dutch immigrants settled in Manhattan, Long Island, New Jersey, along the Hudson River to Albany, and west along the Mohawk River. Worship services were held in Dutch, which meant that few non-Dutch people joined, and that children who spoke more English than Dutch often left for English-speaking churches. The British took over New Netherlands in 1664 but allowed Dutch churches and CULTURE to continue.

The Classis of Amsterdam supervised the Reformed churches and expected ministers to be trained and ordained in the Netherlands. It assumed the right to make most decisions concerning the colonial churches. New initiatives were rare because letters traveled slowly over the ocean. A rift developed in the eighteenth century between those who wanted to develop an independent American body called a Coetus, and those of the Conferentie group who preferred a minimal structure that would submit most decisions to Amsterdam. The conflict was complicated by the fact that the Coetus advocated contemporary religious practices such as revivalism (see REVIVALS), and the Conferentie opposed such innovations and preferred formal piety and worship. Theodorus Frelinghuysen was a pastor and a controversial advocate of revival in the 1720s and 1730s. He stirred his congregations in central New Jersey to conflict as much as to piety. He also became a strong advocate of the Coetus after two of his sons drowned en route from education and ordination in the Netherlands.

Dutch Reformed congregations also disagreed about the Revolutionary War. Some pastors and clergy emphasized Romans 13 and the need to obey the current government. Others insisted on the need for liberty. Rev. John Henry Livingston helped unite the factions by drafting a new constitution in 1792 that made the RPDC into a DENOMINATION separate from Amsterdam. In 1784 he had been chosen to offer formal theological education at what would become New Brunswick Theological Seminary. The church had already founded Queens (Rutgers) College.

During the nineteenth century the Reformed Church cooperated with other Protestant denominations in missions and benevolent societies. The RPDC became Americanized, although the Dutch influence continued. Because the Reformed Church required such extensive education for CLERGY, it never had enough ministers and did not experience growth on the frontier as did the BAPTISTS and Methodists (see METHODISM, NORTH AMERICA).

In the Netherlands during the 1830s some pietist Reformed Church members criticized the state church and eventually separated from it. The ensuing conflict as well as poverty sparked a desire to emigrate. Rev. Albertus Van Raalte led a group to Holland, Michigan in 1847 and Rev. Hendrik Scholte led a group to Pella, Iowa. The RPDC gave financial aid to Van Raalte and invited the new Dutch congregations to join the denomination, which they did. As more immigrants arrived during the next few decades a number of them decided that the Reformed Church was too Americanized because it used hymns in addition to Psalms, and permitted Freemasons to be church members (see FREEMASONRY). Schisms in 1857 and 1882 resulted in the formation of the CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH in North America.

The eastern branch of the RCA was larger until the middle of the twentieth century when many congregations lost members because of suburbanization. Dutch immigrants and their children settled in western Michigan, Chicago, Wisconsin, and northwest Iowa. The RCA formed a college and seminary in Holland, Michigan and two colleges in Iowa. It started a number of new churches in Florida, Colorado, and California. Conflicts occasionally arose because the churches in the East tended to be more ecumenical and Americanized whereas those in the Midwest emphasized piety, purity, and ethnic identity (see ETHNICITY). The RCA considered merger with the Reformed Church in the United States (German) in 1893, with Northern Presbyterian groups in 1930 and 1949, and with the Presbyterian Church in the United States (Southern) in 1969 (see PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH U.S.A.). All failed, largely because of midwestern resistance. The RCA was a founding member of the Federal Council of Churches in 1908, the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1948, and the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1950.

The RCA established MISSIONS in CHINA, JAPAN, INDIA, Arabia, MEXICO, and AFRICA. Its most notable missionaries were Samuel Zwemer in Arabia and Dr. Ida Scudder in India. Missions were both evangelistic and institutional, and the RCA helped to build schools and hospitals in the belief that missions should affect the whole person and not simply the soul.

References and Further Reading

- Balmer, Randall. A Perfect Babel of Confusion: Dutch Religion and English Culture in the Middle Colonies. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Bratt, James. Dutch Calvinism in Modern America. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1984.
- DeJong, Gerald. The Dutch Reformed Church in the American Colonies. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1978.
- Harmelink, Herman III. Ecumenism and the Reformed Church. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1968.

LYNN JAPINGA

REFORMED THEOLOGY

See Theology

REGENSBURG COLLOQUY

The Regensburg Colloquy of 1541 was a discussion between Protestant and Catholic theologians convened by Emperor Charles V in conjunction with the Diet of the Holy Roman Empire. Charles's quest for political and religious unity within the empire matched the theological agendas of moderate theologians on both sides, such as MARTIN BUCER of Strasbourg. At an earlier colloquy at Worms at the end of 1540, Bucer and reform-minded Catholic Johann Gropper of Cologne had drawn up a set of compromise articles, which now served as basis for the Regensburg discussions. Two other major participants in the discussion, Protestant PHILIPP MELANCHTHON and Catholic John Eck, were skeptical of what they saw as the utopian proposals of their colleagues. The imperial chancellor Granvella and other important political figures were also present at the discussion, whereas behind the scenes stood the papal legate Gasparo Contarini, charged with protecting papal interests but also sympathetic to evangelical doctrine.

After initial rejection of the Worms article on JUSTIFICATION by both Eck and Melancthon, a slightly altered formula found acceptance from both sides. In this theory of “double justification,” inherent righteousness of the individual believer is essential, but initial and final justification both depend on the imputed righteousness of Christ received by FAITH. Further agreement proved elusive, however. The discussion of ECCLESIOLOGY broke down over the question whether councils can err, and a fatal impasse arose over the Eucharist (see LORD’S SUPPER). Gropper and his Catholic colleague Pflug were ready to compromise, but Contarini insisted on the term “TRANSUBSTANTIATION” to avoid Protestant evasiveness. This marked the effective end of any hope of reunion, though discussion continued on the sacrament of penance. The emperor and Granvella tried unsuccessfully to bring the theologians to a partial agreement, based on the sixteen articles on which agreement had been reached. In July, both the Catholic and Protestant Estates rejected the Regensburg Book as a whole. Even the colloquy’s major achievement, the compromise on justification, did not in the end find favor with either Rome or Wittenberg. Although religious colloquies continued to be held during the 1540s and 1550s, none of them came close to reaching agreement.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Martin Bucers Deutsche Schriften, Vol. 9.1, Religionsge-spräche, 1539–1541. Gütersloh, Germany: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1995.

Secondary Source:

Matheson, Peter. Cardinal Contarini at Regensburg. London: Oxford University Press, 1972.

EDWIN TAIT

REIMARUS, HERMANN SAMUEL (1694–1768)

German biblical scholar. Reimarus was born in Hamburg on December 22, 1694, and died there March 3, 1768. He studied philosophy, THEOLOGY, and philology at Jena in 1714 and Wittenberg in 1716, where he completed a postdoctoral thesis and became an outside lecturer in philosophy in 1719. Appointed headmaster at Wismar (1723) and Hamburg (1727), Reimarus was professor of Hebrew and Oriental Languages at the Akademisches Gymnasium of Hamburg. He was strongly influenced by his teacher at Hamburg, who was also his father-in-law, the important classical philologist J.A.Fabircius, who was responsible for Reimarus’s meticulous research methods.

Reimarus also influenced the rather rationalistic philosophy of GOTTFRIED WILHELM LEIBNIZ and CHRISTIAN WOLFF. Reimarus acquired an excellent knowledge in oriental studies, mainly through self-education.

A research trip at the end of his studies led him to Holland and ENGLAND where he first encountered the works of the English Deists (see DEISM) such as MATTHEW TINDAL, JOHN TOLAND, and Thomas Morgan who were critical with regard to the BIBLE and revelation. This explains why Reimarus was, on the one hand, a convinced representative and committed vindicator of the concept of “natural religion” solely based on reason, and why, on the other hand, he became a tough-minded critic of any kind of belief based on revelation (as exemplified in the Old and New Testament Scriptures). Reimarus’s rejection of any kind of revealed religion was not disclosed to the public until his death. Rather, he was known to be an acknowledged thinker and scholar who spoke up for a natural and reasonable religion by emphasizing its fundamental importance with regard to moral behavior and human existence as such.

This conviction is echoed throughout one of his works, entitled Die vornehmsten Wahrheiten der natürlichen Religion (The Noblest Truths of Natural Religion) (1791; reprint 1985), first published in 1754 and reprinted several times. To his contemporaries, this study represented an excellent description and successful vindication of all those religious truths that could be accounted for by reason alone. Just two years later, an essay on logic, entitled Die Vernunftlehre (The Doctrine of Reason) (1790; reprint 1979) followed. His devout, yet rationally based attitude manifests itself in another work written in 1760 (1798; reprint 1982), which contained several treatises on animal instinct and was clearly dominated by a scientific yet theological discourse that relied heavily on the concept of a divine world order ruled by wise Providence.

Soon after 1735, however, Reimarus secretly drafted the first outline of a work that he would constantly remodel throughout the years that followed and finally leave behind in a state ready for publication. The first rendition was entitled Gedancken von der Freyheit eines vernünftigen Gottesdienstes; the final version was Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes (Apology or Defense of the Reasonable Worshipers of God). The entire work—from which Lessing, without disclosing the author’s name, culled certain parts between 1774 and 1778 that were critical of the concept of revelation and published them as “Anonymous Fragments”—went unprinted until 1972! The fact that Reimarus, even at an early age, had already turned his back on the then dominant, explicitly theological methods of biblical exegesis and hermeneutics has been verified by Peter Stemmer in his study.

In his Apologie Reimarus now took radical logical steps. His plea to practice a “Toleration of the Deists”—thus the title of the first fragment published by Lessing in 1774 and taken from an early rendition of Apologie—is connected to a devastating historical critique of the foundational testimonies of both JUDAISM and Christianity: on the one hand, the narrative of the Exodus, especially of “The Israelites’ [miraculous] procession through the Red Sea”; and on the other, the narratives concerning the resurrection of Jesus crucified. By means of intricate meticulousness and expert historical criticism, Reimarus deconstructed these biblical testimonies and shattered their credibility. Especially in Von dem Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger—the last of the fragments that Lessing ascribed to the “Anonymous Author of Wolfenbüttel” (it was not until 1814 that Reimarus’s authorship was publicized)—the Christian creed was interpreted as a cunning deception and intentional web of lies on the disciples' part. This work may be considered a prelude to the research on the life of Jesus (see JESUS, LIVES OF) that dominated the nineteenth century.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Schmidt-Biggemann, Wilhelm. H.S.R. Handschriftenverzeichnis und Bibliographie. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979.

Secondary Sources:

Löttsch, Frieder. Was ist "Ökologie"? H.S.R. Ein Beitrag zur Geistesgeschichte des 18. Jahrhunderts. Cologne, Germany/Vienna, Austria: Böhlau, 1987.

———. H.S.R. (1694), ein "bekannter Unbekannter" der Aufklärung in Hamburg. Vorträge gehalten auf der Tagung der Joachim-Jungius-Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften Hamburg am 12. und 13. Oktober 1972. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1973.

Stemmer, Peter. Weissagung und Kritik. Eine Studie zur Hermeneutik bei H.S.R. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1983.

Wolfgang, Walter, and Ludwig Borinski, eds. Logik im Zeitalter der Aufklärung. Studien zur "Vernunftlehre" von H.S.R. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1980.

ARNO SCHILSON

REINDORF, CARL CHRISTIAN (1834–1917)

Ghanaian clergy. Reindorf was a first-generation Ghanaian Protestant pastor and historian who worked for the BASEL MISSION in the Gold Coast (now Ghana). His parents were traders from Accra, Ghana who had a Danish background. He was a product of the Basel Mission school at Christiansborg, Osu, and Abokobi (after 1854). He became a teacher, church organizer, and a pastor under the auspices of the Basel Mission church in Ghana. The training that Reindorf received from the Mission, which emphasized the use of the mother tongue in mission work, as well as the influence of his colleague J.G.Christaller, enabled him to publish the important book The History of the Gold Coast and Asante originally in Ga language and later translated into English by the author and published in SWITZERLAND. This book has been acknowledged as ground breaking for the use of oral history; Reindorf interviewed more than 200 people in writing his work. This achievement made Reindorf the first African to publish a remarkably substantial and systematic history that conforms to standard Western academic tradition. His experience with the Basel Mission's characteristic style of integrated mission helped him to see Christian mission as holistic, involving such aspects as church organizing, language learning, EDUCATION, industrial training, and agriculture.

Reindorf was a man of varied achievements; his peers described him as “very gifted,” and he was respected for his deep spirituality, particularly his gift of healing. He was able to assert himself as an independent thinker even if he had to differ from the Mission whenever the need arose. Reindorf’s students displayed self-confidence and clear self-consciousness as African Christians who saw it as their task to contribute to the religion and intellectual tradition of their society.

See also Africa; Missions; Missionary Organizations

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Reindorf, Carl Christian. The History of the Gold Coast and Asante (1895, 1966).

Reindorf, C.D. Remembering Rev. Carl Reindorf (1984).

Secondary Sources:

Jenkins, Paul, ed. The Recovery of the West African Past: African Pastors and African History in the Nineteenth Century, C.C.Reindorf and Samuel Johnson. Basel, Germany: Basler Afrika Bibliographien, 1998.

Jenkins, Raymond. “Gold Coast Historians and Their Pursuit of the Gold Coast Pasts, 1882–1918” (Ph.D. dissertation, University of Birmingham, 1985).

CEPHAS N.OMENYO

REMONSTRANTS

After theologian JACOBUS ARMINIUS died in 1609, the defense of his views against misrepresentations by professors Sibbrandus Lubertus and FRANZ GOMAR was taken up by Johannes Uytenbogaert. With the support of forty-four Arminian CLERGY (see ARMINIANISM) of the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH, and after consultation with Holland’s official chief legal advisor Johan van Oldenbarnevelt, in 1610 Uytenbogaert presented a “Remonstrance” to the States of Holland and West Friesland (the provincial parliament) to obtain continued protective toleration within the Reformed Church for the Arminian theological position, which was summarized in five points contained in the document. A reply by anti-Arminian opponents—called the “Contra-Remonstrance”—followed at the Hague Conference in 1611. The two parties in the ongoing conflict between the Arminians and the adherents of Gomar’s rigid interpretation of THEODORE BEZA’S reduction of CALVINISM thus acquired their names. Eventually, the Arminian clergy and their followers would be known as the Remonstrant Brotherhood, forming a separate DENOMINATION that continues to exist.

Enjoying the support of factions of Holland’s urban leaders, the Arminians requested a national synod that was expected to supervise and adjudicate the theological dispute. The Arminians also suggested that the BELGIC CONFESSIO and the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM should be subjected to biblical critique and, where necessary, modified.

Such a synod was opposed by the GOMARIANS, who wanted the authority of the government subordinate to that of the clergy and who attributed the binding AUTHORITY of Scriptural revelation to the Confession and Catechism. The jurist Hugo Grotius went to ENGLAND to explain the controversy from an Arminian point of view. Contra-Remonstrants, however, spread rumors that Remonstrants were more than sympathetic to SOCINIANISM. Despite the Arminian agreement with the principles by which a king could properly be superior to the bishops, the rumors reached King James I of England who intervened against the appointment of Conrad Vorstius, nominated to be successor to Arminius, ultimately preventing him from taking up his duties in Leiden. The traditional balance in Leiden's theology faculty was restored when the Arminian Simon Episcopius was appointed professor in 1612, as successor to Gomar. Episcopius continued the public disputes with the Gomarian Johannes Polyander.

In 1618 Prince Maurits, hired by the States General to lead the army in the war against Spain, used military force to eject Arminians from city governments throughout the country, replacing them with Gomarians willing to support his coup, and maneuvering himself into a position of control over his former employer, Parliament. This coup ensured a return to war with Spain, as desired by many Calvinistic refugees from the southern Low Countries. Military victory might enable them to return. Arminians had been associated with the politics of peace, which would have left boundaries as they were when the war was interrupted by the Twelve Years' Truce in 1609. Arminian politics represented a logical outcome of their view of the role of choice in personal acceptance of the means of GRACE. (If choice were involved, Catholics might be converted through peaceful contact and education, best furthered by expanded trade.) Van Oldenbarnevelt was tried on trumped-up charges of treason and executed. Rombout Hoogerbeets, Hugo Grotius, and others were sentenced to life imprisonment. Uytenbogaert fled to Antwerp. Remonstrant ministers were removed from their duties. Assured of dominance, the Gomarians then called for a national synod, the Synod of Dordrecht (Dort), to which foreign observers from other Reformed countries including England were invited. The Remonstrant clergy were summoned to appear and were treated as if accused before an ecclesiastical court, which in 1619 found them guilty of HERESY. They were dismissed from the Reformed Church and banished. Laws suppressing DISSENT were passed by Parliament, marking the end to Holland's famed TOLERATION.

Exile and Return

In exile the Remonstrant clergy immediately organized their brotherhood, secretly sending pastors on brief visits to care for Arminian congregations that continued to exist despite persecution. The most famous was Passchier de Fyne who often narrowly escaped capture, even preaching while on ice skates. Some congregations lacking pastors formed collegial meetings. The meeting at Warmond later moved to nearby Rijnsburg, where people who attended were known as the Rijnsburger Collegiants. Spinoza and other thinkers were attracted to the undogmatic and egalitarian gatherings in which all were allowed to "prophesy."

After the death of Prince Maurits in 1625, his brother Frederik Hendrik succeeded him. Toleration was revived and exiled Remonstrants returned. The Remonstrant Seminary was established in Amsterdam in 1634; Episcopius became its first professor, well known for his Institutiones Theologicae. He continued Erasmus's philological emphasis in exegesis. This approach was to be a characteristic of Remonstrant biblical study, seen also in the works of Grotius and C.P. Tiele (nineteenth century). After Episcopius's death (1643), Etienne de Courcelles (Steven Curcellaeus) became the Remonstrant professor. A friend and translator of Descartes, Curcellaeus developed further Episcopius's tendency to emphasize the role of reason in assessing revelation. From 1668 to 1712 the Remonstrant professor was Philippus van Limborch. His friendship and influence among the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS is well known. From a Remonstrant perspective, Van Limborch championed toleration in various writings. He was author of a widely read study of the Inquisition, Historia Inquisitionis cui subjungitur Liber Sententiarum Inquisitionis Tholosonae ab anno Christi 1307 ad annum 1323. This was based on a manuscript made available to Van Limborch by his Rotterdam friend, the Quaker Benjamin Furly (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF). Through this contact Van Limborch's ideas must have reached WILLIAM PENN, a guest of Furly's. Both Van Limborch and Furly were friends and hosts of JOHN LOCKE during his exile in Holland. Locke acknowledged Van Limborch's influence on his ideas on religious toleration. Van Limborch's involvement in the liberal Mennonite Galenus Abraham de Haan's projects to coordinate relief, both material and diplomatic, to MENNONITES persecuted in SWITZERLAND and the Palatinate is indicated by Van Limborch's inclusion of a letter (February 14, 1660) from the city of Rotterdam to the city of Bern. This letter, arguing for toleration of Protestant dissenters, appears in Van Limborch's monumental third edition (1704) of collected letters of contemporary theologians Praestantium ac Eruditorum Virorum Epistolae Ecclesiasticae et Theologicae (by Uytenbogaert, Vorstius, Vossius, Grotius, Episcopius, Barlaeus, et al.). Van Limborch's theological works, translated as Christian Theology, became a standard text for the CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Similar to Van Limborch's publication of source materials contributing to a history beyond the official Reformed point of view (or contrary Catholic versions) was Gerard Brandt's four-volume History of the Reformation, also published in English. Brandt supported his narrative, which demonstrated that the Remonstrants represented the continuation of a broadly tolerant stream that had existed from the beginnings of the Dutch Reformation, with numerous original documents published in extenso. This dominated English views of the Dutch Revolt until the works of John Motley in the nineteenth century.

Later Developments

During the eighteenth century, Remonstrants were significant in ENLIGHTENMENT societies for social improvement, natural science research, contemporary literature, and drama. At mid-century, Remonstrant theologian Cornelis Nozeman, also an important ornithologist, was one of the last who needed to write against Dutch Reformed antagonists, in defense of toleration. Toleration was becoming a generally accepted enlightened social virtue. When the Dutch Reformed Church lost its privileged status in 1795, Remonstrants participated in the new democratic government of the Batavian Republic. Membership dwindled, however, and the organization contemplated abolishing its seminary under the influence of rationalism. In the nineteenth-century romantic reaction, the oratory of preacher and professor Abraham des Amorie van der Hoeven attracted new converts. His students Martinus Cohen Stuart and Johannes Tideman were notable for abolitionist activity and historical research, respectively. Tideman, professor from 1855 to 1872, applied the modern historical research methods of the period to a study of the origins of the Remonstrant Brotherhood De Stichting der Remonstranse Broederschap, 1619–1634. Tide-man was succeeded by C.P.Tiele, who oversaw the move of the seminary to Leiden. Tiele was not only Remonstrant professor; he also became the first Dutch professor of comparative religion. His broad comparative and contextual approach was augmented by association with the Dutch Reformed professor Abraham Kuenen, a pioneer in the application of historical criticism to Old Testament studies. The Remonstrants, having been associated with the Enlightenment in the eighteenth century, became adherents of nineteenth-century MODERNISM, the combination of historical, contextual study of the BIBLE and religion generally, with a belief in scientific progress.

WOMEN were welcomed into the Remonstrant clergy in 1921, having been allowed to preach since 1915 (see WOMEN CLERGY). Also in 1921 Professor G.J.Heering reconceived the task of the CHURCH in his paper “The Church as Social Conscience.” Like many others reacting to the scientific progress embodied in the First World War, he wanted to move the church beyond late romantic INDIVIDUALISM with its characteristic emphasis on personal experience. Typically, the Remonstrant Brotherhood continued to debate the question of whether the church should be society’s conscience for the next sixty years and longer, without arriving at any conclusion for fear of infringing on its principle of not allowing dogma to become binding on individual conscience. After the Second World War, the Remonstrant Brotherhood, despite steadily decreasing membership, reached out to ever-expanding international contacts through the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and With CONGREGATIONALISTS and UNITARIANS. Church leaders including Professors H.J.Heering and G.J.Hoenderdaal developed an emphasis on church and secular social and moral issues such as nuclear disarmament and ethical aid to developing countries, as well as the concern for liturgical art in contemporary society.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, Remonstrants were experiencing declining membership (c. 7,000) in a society that has adopted many of its principles of toleration. Although Arminian emphasis on personal responsibility underlay support for ending SLAVERY in the nineteenth century (a condition that could be justified as part of God’s predestined plan), in the twentieth century Arminian responsibility was a basis for involvement with existentialist philosophy. However, Dutch society was largely secular, with secularized Calvinist PREDESTINATION theory justifying the Dutch status quo. The selection of government officials predominantly by co-optation leads to general apathy.

References and Further Reading

Bangs, Carl. “Regents and Remonstrants in Amsterdam.” In het Spoor van Arminius. Nieuwkoop, Netherlands: Uitgeverij Heuff, 1975.

- Brandt, Gerard. The History of the Reformation and Other Ecclesiastical Transactions in and about the Low Countries From the Beginning of the Eighth Century, Down to the Famous Synod of Dort Translated by John Chamberlayne. 4 vols. from the Dutch of 1671–1704. New York: AMS Press, 1979.
- Calder, Frederick. Memoirs of Simon Episcopus. London, 1838.
- Colie, Rosalie. Light and Enlightenment: A Study of the Cambridge Platonists and the Dutch Arminians. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1957.
- Harrison, A.W. Arminianism. London: Duckworth, 1937.
- Hoenderdaal, G.J., and P.M.Luca. Staat in de Vrijheid, De Geschiedenis van de Remonstranten. Zutphen, Netherlands: Walburg, 1982.
- van Holk, L.J. "From Arminius to Arminianism in Dutch Theology." In Man's Faith and Freedom: The Theological Influence of Jacobus Arminius, edited by G.O.McCulloh. New York and Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1962.

JEREMY DUPERTUIS BANGS

RESTITUTION, EDICT OF

Issued by the Holy Roman Emperor Ferdinand II in March 1629 the Edict of Restitution sought to reestablish the religious and territorial settlement achieved by the Peace of Augsburg some seventy-five years earlier in 1555. The declaration came after the opening decade of bitter fighting in the Thirty Years' War (1618–1648). Bolstered by a series of military and diplomatic gains, the Catholic imperial government saw an opportunity to fortify Catholicism and weaken significantly the Protestant position. The Edict aimed at a general realignment of the religious and political balance in the German world. The specific goal was the return of church lands that Protestants, principally Lutherans, had seized from Catholics during the preceding three-quarters of a century. The Edict also meant to strengthen the political position of Catholic ecclesiastical princes and bar the practice of CALVINISM, whose followers were a growing presence within the empire. Yet the measure was difficult to enforce and provoked considerable opposition. Accordingly the emperor was obliged to suspend the Edict by 1635 and eventually abandoned the initiative completely.

Ferdinand initially claimed to be doing no more than reinstating the status quo of 1555 and insisting on proper observance of imperial law. Protestants had illegally usurped, according to the emperor's interpretation, land belonging to Catholic archbishoprics, bishoprics, monasteries, and endowments. The property, which these Catholic entities had possessed as of the Treaty of Passau of 1552, the moment stipulated by the Peace of Augsburg, must be returned to them. In addition prelates who had left the Catholic Church could not continue to hold imperial church lands. Finally ecclesiastical rulers would have the same rights as secular princes in compelling confessional uniformity among their subjects. As imperial commissioners set out to enforce the Edict, it quickly became the most contentious political issue in Germany.

The decree caused enormous disruption, especially in northern and central Germany. Implementation meant adjustment of borders and threatened Protestant princes who had prospered from the confiscation of ecclesiastical possessions. A number of bishoprics and perhaps 500 former monasteries or similar church properties were affected. The duke of Württemberg stood to lose land that had once belonged to fourteen large monasteries and thirty-six convents. The duke of Wolfenbüttel, to take another example, held considerable property from the bishopric of Hildesheim as well as from thirteen former convents. The electors of Brandenburg and Saxony were also decidedly ill-disposed toward the new arrangement. Although both governments had secularized ecclesiastical assets long before 1552, they feared that their position might nonetheless be jeopardized by the Catholics' uncompromising stand and the possibility of additional legislation. Experiences elsewhere, particularly in the cities, suggested that imperial commissioners were exceeding the terms of the Edict and reclaiming church lands confiscated by Lutherans before the Peace of Augsburg.

The free imperial cities were understandably alarmed. Many found themselves required to return properties secularized before 1552. More serious was the situation for cities that had been Catholic at the time of the Augsburg settlement. By the seventeenth century some had, at best, a handful of Catholics within their walls. Lutheran Magdeburg, for instance, had technically been Catholic in 1552. By 1628 Catholics numbered no more than a few hundred of the city's 30,000 inhabitants. One small monastery remained in Catholic hands, whereas the city government had confiscated the cathedral and other churches. Dortmund had only thirty Catholics and all the churches were Protestant.

If, furthermore, the Peace of Augsburg's principle of cujus regio, ejus religio (roughly, "he who rules, his is the religion") and the right of the territorial princes to impose religious uniformity on their subjects were maintained, and expanded to include ecclesiastical principalities, Protestants residing in lands restored to Catholic authorities would soon find themselves forced to conform or emigrate. In short the Edict of Restitution menaced property rights that dated to mid-sixteenth century, and earlier in some cases. Furthermore, it meant the reduction of political and social clout among the Protestant feudal nobles and urban burghers. The Edict caused unease even among some Catholics. The elector Maximilian of Bavaria, who had his own political aspirations, had reservations regarding the increase in land and power that the Edict promised the imperial Habsburg family.

In all of this the commissioners and other officials executed the Edict in heavy-handed and unpleasant fashion. The emperor stood ready to deploy soldiers toward installation of a Catholic bishop at the Lutheran town of Magdeburg. Even Augsburg, long a Lutheran stronghold and, equally important, a free imperial city with a time-honored tradition of municipal self-governance, to include religious affairs with the arrival of the REFORMATION, was obliged to submit to Ferdinand's will. It was situated in the center of a Catholic bishopric and had been officially Catholic in 1552. Thus Lutheran worship was forbidden, the pastors were expelled, and thousands of Protestant towns-people sought refuge elsewhere.

Ultimately Swedish entrance into the war with a formidable army under the command of King Gus-TAVUS ADOLPHUS altered the dynamics of the conflict and frustrated the emperor's plans. To meet the new challenge Ferdinand needed broad military and political support. Although papal diplomats and William Lamormaini, the emperor's Jesuit confessor, opposed any compromise on the Edict, Ferdinand had little choice. In 1635 imperial officials suspended enforcement and by the 1640s, in the negotiations leading to the Peace of Westphalia of 1648, abrogated the Edict. The entire project was, in retrospect, ill-fated. Apart from obvious military and political obstacles, confessional identity among Protestants had set deep roots and was not amenable to the facile transformations implicit in the Edict. The endeavor to return church lands and, more broadly, recatholicize Protestant regions proved impossible.

See also Adolphus, Gustavus; Calvinism; Lutheranism, Germany; Reformation

References and Further Reading

Bireley, Robert. Religion and Politics in the Age of the Counterreformation: Emperor Ferdinand II, William Lamormaini, S.J., and the Formation of Imperial Policy. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981.

Lundorp, Michael Caspar, ed. Acta publica (Frankfurt, 1668). vol. 3, 1048–1054. [Text of the edict]

Parker, Geoffrey. The Thirty Years' War. London and New York: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1984.

Wedgwood, C.V. The Thirty Years War. London: Jonathan Cape, 1938.

RAYMOND A. MENTZER

RESTORATIONISM

Restorationism is an often overlooked and yet foundational concept in the religious world. Synonymous with primitivism, restorationism as manifested in BIBLE-based movements seeks to restore in present society a perceived ideal based on biblical times. Restorationism assumes a departure from the original ideal; therefore, the original must be brought about anew. This is different from a reformation, which seeks to change or reform an institution already present. For restorationists, the original is no longer present; therefore, the need to restore, to bring it into being again. Because of this aspect restorationists usually consider themselves out of step with classical Protestantism. Nevertheless traces of restorationism can be found throughout Protestantism as well.

Restorationism has been a motivating concept throughout the centuries in many Bible-related movements that appear quite different from each other. Under the broad category designated “Christianity,” the initial impulse of restorationism manifested between differing bodies may not be immediately obvious. For Mormons, restorationism seeks to restore the office and AUTHORITY of the original apostles. For Pentecostal and Holiness traditions, restorationism seeks to restore the New Testament gifts and power of the Holy Spirit. For Anabaptists, restorationism appears as a focus on New Testament lifestyle and piety. For Churches of Christ, restorationism seeks to recreate the apostolic pattern of New Testament church organization and member initiation. These, and other differences, come about as each group focuses on one aspect or another in need of restoration. Yet the central defining characteristic throughout these differing expressions of restorationism judges the present times by standards of the past and not vice versa.

Restorationism can be further defined and clarified as it is seen in contrast with FUNDAMENTALISM. These two systems of belief in particular have many similarities; yet there are major differences that must not be confused or overlooked. Fundamentalism seeks to remake the political and social world according to a combination of origins, traditions, and present-day CULTURE. Restorationism seeks to remake the personal and communal world strictly from origins. Fundamentalism is present and future oriented, whereas restorationism re-creates the past in the present. Changes from the original are often perceived as developments by fundamentalists and departures by restorationists. One may say that fundamentalism is preoccupied with modernity, or MODERNISM, and as such uses current means—for example, social and political structures—to create society according to its own design. Restorationism sees modernity as a hindrance, or at best as offering no help. Yet both in a sense are seeking to change society, one by working directly on society, and the other by changing individuals who will then make up the society that is changed. Ultimately restorationism seeks to recover an accurate perception of the “original” and use that model to restore a foundational, primeval ideal.

See also Anabaptism; Christian Churches, Churches of Christ; Holiness Movement; Mormonism; Pentecostalism

References and Further Reading

Hughes, Richard T., ed. The Primitive Church in the Modern World. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

Wentz, Richard E. Religion in the New World: The Shaping of Religious Traditions in the United States. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1990.

DAVID L.LITTLE

RÉVEIL

The word réveil (awakening) is used to describe a French-speaking evangelical movement that began in SWITZERLAND in the early nineteenth century. With Pietist and Moravian roots, but also significantly influenced by British Evangelicals like Thomas Erskine and Robert Haldane, those identified with the réveil rejected much of the rationalism of the ENLIGHTENMENT and embraced many of the attitudes of the romantic movement. In their emphasis on spiritual experience (particularly that of CONVERSION) and a recovery of REFORMATION dogma they were reverting to the Augustinian worldview to which the Enlightenment had taken exception.

In the aftermath of the FRENCH REVOLUTION, the Genevan Church had effectively muted any public expression of distinctively Protestant dogma, preferring a conservative system of morality that shunned any sort of “enthusiasm.” Although many of the early protagonists of the réveil were not separatists by choice, they found themselves effectively silenced or excluded by the Genevan establishment. Candidates for the ministry like Henri Louis Empaytaz, Henri Pyt, and Émile Guers established the petite église at Bourg-de-Four in 1817, and although some ordained ministers, who were sympathetic to the réveil, retained their positions, others like Ami Bost and the Rochat brothers in the canton of Vaud chose to secede. Another such seceder was Henri Abraham César Malan whose Église du Témoignage in Geneva attracted a considerable following. A typical product of the Swiss movement was the missionary Samuel Gobat, who later became the second Anglican bishop of Jerusalem.

When in 1830 ministers like Louis Gaussen and JEAN HENRI MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ established the Société Évangélique (with its services at the Oratoire and its École de Théologie) the "neo-Protestant" ecclesiastical authorities suspended them from the ministry. The continuing reluctance of the establishment to accommodate the réveil (which was stigmatized as foreign, fanatic, and exclusive), and the hostility of radical politicians led others who were associated with the movement, like Alexandre Vinet, to advocate more strongly the separation of CHURCH AND STATE. With the political upheavals of the 1840s, the réveil, encouraged by the example of Scottish secessionists in 1843, found institutional expression in the Églises Évangéliques Libres in Geneva and Vaud.

The response among French Protestants to the réveil varied. Thanks to the enthusiasm of JOHANN FRIEDRICH OBERLIN, the respected pastor from Alsace, many Protestants in the Midi welcomed the establishment of Bible and Tract Societies (see BIBLE SOCIETIES). In several parishes the consistories (see CONSISTORY) were prepared to cooperate and harness the enthusiasm and dedication of evangelists like Félix Neff and of pastors like Frédéric and Adolphe Monod, although elsewhere there was opposition to the perceived separatist tendencies of the movement. In the seminary at Montauban there were a number of sympathetic professors, and the activities of the English Methodist missionary Charles Cook gave the réveil further impetus. In Paris the movement gained support both among Lutherans and in the Reformed Church and for a while the réveil was associated with the salons of Madame de Stael's daughter, the Duchesse de Broglie, whose husband was a minister in the government from 1830. Indeed in the early 1840s when the Protestant François Guizot was the effective head of the government, a wave of optimism characterized the outlook of many supporters of the réveil in FRANCE. By 1850, however, the exclusive tendencies latent in the movement, aggravated by the extreme position taken by separatists like Comte Agénor de Gasparin and Frédéric Monod, led to a break with the traditional Protestant churches and the establishment of the Églises libres françaises.

The réveil must not be treated in isolation from the flowering evangelical movement in English-speaking countries or its contemporary counterpart, the German Erweckung associated with the BASEL MISSION (founded in 1815) and with men like FRIEDRICH AUGUST THOLUCK OF HALLE. There was an international dimension to nineteenth-century EVANGELICALISM and part of the strength of the réveil lay in its links with the wider movement.

References and Further Reading

- Dubief, H. "Reflexions sur quelques aspects du premier Réveil et sur le milieu où il se forma." Bulletin de la Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme Français. cxiv (1968):373-402.
- Fatio, O., ed. Genève Protestante en 1831. Geneva: Labor et Fides, 1983.
- Maurly, Leon. Le Réveil religieux dans les Églises réformées de Genève et en France. Paris: Fischbacher, 1892.

Robert, Daniel. Les Églises Réformées en France (1800–1830). Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1961.

Stunt, Timothy C.F. From Awakening to Secession: Radical Evangelicals in Switzerland and Britain 1815–35. Edinburgh: T. & T.Clark, 2000.

Wemyss, Alice. Histoire du Réveil 1790–1849. Paris: Les Bergers et les Mages, 1977.

TIMOTHY C.F.STUNT

REVIVALS

Religious revivals are periods of religious fervor characterized by repentance among Christians and numerous conversions. MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN laid the groundwork for revivals by teaching JUSTIFICATION by FAITH and by calling for ongoing reform in the CHURCH. By the seventeenth century many Christians believed that the REFORMATION had bogged down in formalism, doctrinal disputes, and political controversy. In response, Lutheran Pietists such as PHILIPP JAKOB SPENER and AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE promoted individual CONVERSION, Bible study, and social reform. One of Francke's students, Count NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON ZINZENDORF, organized refugees from Moravia into a Pietist Christian community (see PIETISM). Traveling bands of Moravians spread the doctrine and experience of conversion throughout Europe and America (see MORAVIAN CHURCH).

Meanwhile English-speaking Calvinists increasingly called for a pure church of converted "saints." Like the Pietists, these Puritans gathered the most fervent believers into household religious meetings (see PURITANISM). They preached against the evils in church and society and called for a "revival of religion." In SCOTLAND, Calvinist clergymen held outdoor communion festivals that drew hundreds of participants and produced numerous conversions.

These religious precedents combined with cultural changes like the industrial revolution, the expansion of international trade, and the ENLIGHTENMENT to produce the full flowering of revivals in the eighteenth century. Revivals proved to be a popular alternative to the economic insecurity, vice, and rationalism of the era. Taking advantage of new methods of communication and transportation, an international network of Calvinists, Methodists, and Pietists spread the stories, beliefs, and methods of revival (see CALVINISM; METHODISM). With the encouragement of Moravian missionaries, Anglican clergyman JOHN WESLEY experienced his own "new birth" in 1738. He preached revival to the common people of ENGLAND and formed them into Methodist religious societies. Other revival participants like CHARLES WESLEY, John Newton, and ISAAC WATTS wrote HYMNS that transformed Protestant WORSHIP in this era. In the American colonies a dramatic period of revival, later called the First Great AWAKENING, began around 1720. The high point came in 1740 when English Calvinist GEORGE WHITEFIELD toured the colonies and preached to massive crowds. Congregationalist minister JONATHAN EDWARDS provided a key theological defense of the movement.

Later Revivals

Beginning at the turn of the nineteenth century a new wave of revivals called the Second Great Awakening transformed the UNITED STATES. On the frontier Americans gathered for religious CAMP MEETINGS. One of the most famous of these took place at an 1801 communion festival in Cane Ridge, Kentucky. Thousands of participants experienced conversion and many displayed behaviors like fits of shouting, muscle jerks, and falling. Culturally marginalized individuals like slaves, WOMEN, and children spontaneously preached to the crowds. This camp meeting tradition heightened the emotional element in revivals and revealed their democratizing potential.

Similar frontier and urban revivals between 1800 and 1850 contributed to the dramatic growth of the Methodist and Baptist denominations in America and led to the founding of numerous new denominations and sects. This period also saw the large-scale Christianization of the African American population. Slaves and free blacks created their own version of revivalism that emphasized the liberating power of the Christian message.

Presbyterian clergyman CHARLES GRANDISON FINNEY aroused controversy with the use of “new measures” in his revival meetings in upstate New York in the 1830s. Finney allowed women to pray in mixed gatherings, called on sinners by name to repent, and called seekers forward to sit on the “anxious bench.” Finney also taught Arminian and holiness doctrines (see ARMINIANISM; HOLINESS MOVEMENT) and claimed that a revival was “not a miracle” but the result of correct application of God’s appointed means. Converts in these revivals led campaigns against alcohol, slavery, PROSTITUTION, and other vices. They established MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS, homes for the poor, hospitals, and colleges. This period of revivalism came to a close with the 1857–1858 Businessmen’s Revival.

In the 1880s DWIGHT L. MOODY and his musical partner IRA SANKEY led revival meetings in Britain and North America. This era saw the publication of numerous new “gospel songs,” which functioned as the music of revivalism for the next seventy-five years. These revivals also produced social service agencies like WILLIAM BOOTH’S SALVATION ARMY in England and rescue missions in American cities. Others converted through organizations like the Student Volunteer Movement and the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE devoted themselves to foreign MISSIONS.

Contemporary Expressions

The twentieth century saw the globalization of revivals. Word of the Welsh revival of 1903–1904 spread throughout the world, sparking revivals in KOREA, CHINA, SOUTH AFRICA, INDIA, Scandinavia, and the United States. Participants in the Welsh revival influenced the Pentecostal revival of 1906–1909 that spread around the world from its center in the AZUSA STREET MISSION in Los Angeles. The East African Revival of 1933–1935 spread to Rwanda (formerly Ruanda), Uganda, Kenya, Tanzania, and Burundi under the leadership of Simeoni Nsibambi and Blasio Kigozi. Between 1965 and 1970 massive revivals broke out in INDONESIA. In LATIN AMERICA, evangelical and Pentecostal revivals doubled the number of Protestants between 1970 and 1990.

Indigenous leadership increasingly characterized revivals in AFRICA, Asia, and Latin America.

Beginning with his highly publicized Los Angeles Crusade of 1949, BILLY GRAHAM became an international leader in EVANGELISM and revival. In the late 1960s and early 1970s the Jesus People movement combined the hippie youth culture with revival (see JESUS MOVEMENT). At the same time the charismatic movement brought the Pentecostal experiences of Holy Spirit baptism, healing, and speaking in TONGUES to millions of Protestants and Roman Catholics around the world. The resulting revivals of the 1970s led to the widespread acceptance of praise choruses and more exuberant styles of worship.

Influences

Although the causes and impact of revivals have been much disputed, several patterns have emerged. First, revivals have produced both renewal and schism in the Christian churches. Second, social and economic instability enhance receptivity to revivals, and help explain their appeal among the middle and lower rungs of society. Third, revival converts often establish educational, social service, and missionary organizations that transform society. Fourth, revivals have significant yet complex political consequences. Finally, although key innovations took place in North America, revivals have most often been international in origin and scope.

References and Further Reading

- Blumhofer, Edith, and Randall Balmer, eds. Modern Christian Revivals. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.
- Carwardine, Richard. Trans-atlantic Revivalism. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1978.
- Hatch, Nathan. The Democratization of American Christianity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.
- McLouglin, William G. Revivals, Awakenings, and Reform. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.
- Orr, J. Edwin. The Flaming Tongue: The Impact of Twentieth Century Revivals. Chicago: Moody Press, 1973.
- Riss, Richard M. A Survey of Twentieth-Century Revival Movements in North America. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 1988.
- Ward, William R. The Protestant Evangelical Awakening. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

THOMAS E. BERGLER

RICHARDSON, HENRY HOBSON (1838–1886)

American architect. Born in Louisiana of well-to-do parents, Richardson was educated at Harvard and the Ecole des Beaux-Arts in Paris. He returned to the United States in 1865, practicing first in New York before relocating his office and family to Brookline, Massachusetts, in 1874, where he remained until his death.

Although Richardson's work was predominantly secular, institutional, and domestic, his Trinity Church in Boston remains an outstanding contribution to nine-teenth-century Protestant architecture. Completed in 1878, following three earlier, more conventional, churches (also in Massachusetts), it immediately established Richardson as an architect of exceptional power and sophistication. The exterior is essentially southern French Romanesque (a style admired by Richardson), while the tower draws freely upon Salamanca's former cathedral. The overall effect is not eclectic pastiche, but, with its pervasive rockfaced cladding, is of genuine monumentality. The large, cruciform interior consciously fuses Romanesque liturgical space (with comprehensive polychrome decoration) with both the historic "auditorium" tradition of New England Protestantism and the famed oratorical skills of Trinity's first incumbent, PHILLIPS BROOKS. Richardson's other potential masterpiece—his 1883 competition design for an Episcopal cathedral at Albany, New York, again in the Romanesque style—was, unfortunately, deemed too complex and expensive to secure the commission.

In retrospect, it is clear that both Richardson's religious outlook and his architecture were shaped by his Unitarian roots (his mother was the granddaughter of chemist JOSEPH PRIESTLEY, 1733–1804), his membership of Boston's Unitarian elite, and the normative transcendentalism of his own professional and social circle. If Ruskin's strong impact ("all art must be based on truth"), and the architect's own formative encounters with the Romanesque are also taken into account, then what one contemporary called Richardson's "power to appreciate the value both of ancient forms consecrated by persisting sentiment and of practical modern needs, and to put one without violence to the service of the other" becomes both convincing and self-evident.

References and Further Reading

Hitchcock, H.R. 1966. The Architecture of Henry Hobson Richardson and His Times. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1966.

Meister, M., ed. H.H.Richardson: The Architect, His Peers and Their Era. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1999.

Van Rensselaer. Henry Hobson Richardson and His Works. New York: Dover, 1969

GRAHAM A.K.HOWES

RICHER, EDMOND (1559–1631)

French political theorist. Richer was born September 15, 1559 at Chesley, near Chaours, FRANCE and died November 29, 1631 at Paris. A student at the College du Cardinal Lemoine in the University of Paris and at the Sorbonne, he received the doctorate in THEOLOGY around 1592, became (1595) grand master and principal of the College du Cardinal Lemoine, and then syndic of the Parisian theology faculty. That position he held until 1612 when he was forced out of office by the hostility of the papal nuncio the cardinal du Perron to the views expressed in his celebrated Libellus de ecclesiastica et politica potestate (1611). Having in earlier years been a supporter of the Catholic Ligue and an admirer of Cardinal Bellarmine's high papalist views, he later rallied to the cause of Henri IV and emerged as a proponent both of the divine right of the French monarchy and of Gallican views.

While making common cause with the politique Gallicans of the Parlement de Paris, Richer's central aim was to reinvigorate the theological heart of the Gallican tradition by reviving the knowledge of the great conciliarist doctors of Paris and by promulgating, among other things, their advocacy of the jurisdictional subordination of the pope to general council. He realized that aim through an extensive array of editions, treatises, and works of compilation, notably the Libellus of 1611, his influential 1606 edition of the works of Jean Gerson (d. 1429), and his reprinting of the conciliarist tracts of Jean de Paris (d. 1306), Pierre d'Ailly (d. 1420), Jacques Almain (d. 1505), and John Mair (d. 1550). Herein—as disseminator to future generations of the old tradition of conciliarist constitutionalism in the church, rather than as the alleged (if shadowy) precursor of far more radical and supposedly heterodox views smacking of what in the eighteenth century was labeled as richerisme, multitudinism, presbyterianisme, and parochisme—lies his historical significance.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Richer, Edmond. Joannes Gersonii... Opera omnia. 2 vols. Paris: 1606.

———. Apologia pro Joanno Gersonii, pro ecclesiae et concilii generalis auctoritate. [n.p.], 1607; Lyons: 1676.

———. Libellus de ecclesiastica et politica potestate (1611). Printed in Melchior Goldast, Monarchia S. Romani Imperii. vol. 3, 797–806. Frankfurt: 1611–1613.

———. Defensio libelli de ecclesiastica et politica potestate. 2 vols. Cologne: 1701.

Secondary Sources:

Cottret, Monique. “Edmond Richer (1559–1631): La politique et le sacre.” In L'état baroque: Regards sur la pensée politique de la France au première XVIIe siècle, edited by Henry Mechoulin, 159–177. Paris: 1985.

Oakley, Francis. “Bronze-Age Conciliarism: Edmond Richer's Encounters with Cajetan and Bellarmine.” History of Political Thought 20 (1999):65–86.

Preclin, E. “Edmond Richer (1559–1631): Sa vie, son oeuvre et le Richerisme.” Revue d'histoire moderne 5 (1930):241–269, 321–336.

Puyol, Edmond. Edmond Richer: Etude historique et critique sur la renovation du Gallicanisme au commencement du XVIIe siècle. 2 vols. Paris:1876.

FRANCIS OAKLEY

RITSCHL, ALBRECHT BENJAMIN (1822–1889)

German theologian. Ritschl was born in Berlin on March 3, 1822. His father was a Protestant theologian as well as the Pomeranian general superintendent of the Prussian regional church with the title of bishop. After studying in Bonn, HALLE, Heidelberg, and Tübingen, Ritschl received his doctorate and qualified to teach at a university. He became a lecturer in church history in 1864 and later in systematic theology at the University of Bonn. In 1865 he was appointed professor of systematic theology in Göttingen and eventually known as the most important scholar of systematic theology in Protestant GERMANY in the last third of the nineteenth century. He died on March 20, 1889 in Göttingen.

Development of Thought

Ritschl's THEOLOGY takes as its starting point the branch of scholarship known as Vermittlungstheologie, or mediating theology. After a short-lived turn toward the speculative theology of Richard Rothe, Ritschl joined the school of thought from Tübingen dominated by FERDINAND CHRISTIAN BAUR. This school combined strict criticism of historical sources with the interpretation of church history formulated by the German philosopher GEORG W.F. HEGEL, which understood history in terms of a dialectically unfolding process of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis. The systematic clarity of this approach impressed Ritschl, but it also caused him to grow less convinced of its treatment of source materials. In the second edition of his study Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche (Origins of the Early Catholic Church, 1857), Ritschl broke with Baur. From then on he advocated a more sober positivism based on close readings of texts.

The principal work that made Ritschl well known and famous initiated a turning point in theology when it was published from 1870 to 1874 in three volumes under the title Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung (The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, 3d edition, 1889, English translation 1966). In 1875 an abbreviated synopsis of the larger work was published as Unterricht in der christlichen Religion (Instruction in the Christian Religion). Given the realities of the industrial age and the overwhelming power of SCIENCE and technology, Ritschl wanted to safeguard the irreducibility of the individual and especially the religious experience of the individual.

The theological concept that Ritschl formulated to this end began with the knowledge and experience found in a community of believers, the basis of which is the revelation of God. Ritschl sought to raise what is in the BIBLE to a truth attested to by history. His attempt to support this approach by turning to IMMANUEL KANT'S theory of cognition convinced few, however, and Ritschl's students felt obliged to look for other solutions. By following this path, however, Ritschl could exclude any natural theology.

Ritschl described the love of God as the content of Christian revelation and argued that this love seeks to find a form as the self-revelation of God. SIN hampers movement toward this goal and so must be eliminated, which, according to Ritschl, occurs by doing the work of Christ. Although Ritschl uses common theological terminology, his approach does not refer to traditional CHRISTOLOGY or soteriology. Christ communicates to a community of believers because God is love. They know from this that God forgives sins and confers a state of peace. In this respect Ritschl's theology focuses strictly on Christ, although in doing so, it is a more intellectually sober position that leaves no room for religious emotion. It makes no sense, then, to speak of the Catholic church mediating SALVATION. According to Ritschl the forgiveness of sins and reconciliation with God supply all the information needed to assure a congregation.

This knowledge offers a devout community the possession of a special value. Behind it is the notion that in contrast to the natural sciences, religion concerns not judgments of fact but judgments of value. The value of a religion rests in the extent to which it promotes morality, and the religion of greatest value is the one that enables the greatest morality. That such a statement holds true only for Christianity was a central message in Ritschl's theology.

He demonstrated this contention as follows: Reconciliation with God brings one a freedom understood as independence and detachment from the world. Christ is thus not bound to the laws of rational logic, but stands in spiritual contrast to them. This is precisely the fundamental condition that allows the individual to develop as a moral person.

Concern for the Kingdom

In addition to the notion of individual, subjective growth, Ritschl's theology included a notion of the whole. True morality endures only in service, and for Ritschl this meant that Christ participates in establishing the KINGDOM OF GOD in the world. In this respect, Ritschl broadened the doctrines of JUSTIFICATION and reconciliation to include an ethical imperative.

His theological program, like an ellipsis, had two focal points. Forgiveness of sin and reconciliation with God form one, and the kingdom of God understood as an ethical imperative forms the other. For Ritschl it is essential that ethics have no specific Christian content. What matters most is living up to the demands of the everyday in the place in which one is situated: family, profession, country.

Ritschl insisted on this notion of the Christian's relationship to the world with enormous sobriety and emphasized its distinction from Catholicism and PIETISM. Catholicism falsely identified the kingdom of God with the CHURCH; Pietism divided in a fateful way the kingdom of God from the world. From 1880 to 1886 Ritschl composed a massive three-volume Geschichte des Pietismus (History of Pietism). The work—parts of which are so rich in their use of source materials that no other work has yet surpassed them—sets out to prove that Pietism constituted not a further development of the REFORMATION but an eruption of late-medieval Catholic mysticism into Protestantism.

Assessment

Ritschl's theology had an enormous impact for two reasons. On the one hand Ritschl focused little on fundamental concepts in theology; on the other hand his theology represented not only a cognitive theoretical approach but also a study in positivism—a method that corresponded well to the conscious selfunderstanding of the period. Ritschl conceived and developed a combination of religious transcendence and strict fulfillment of duty that to a great degree met the expectations of the Protestant bourgeoisie in late 19th century Germany.

It was no coincidence that this theology dominated Germany and affected instruction in the schools through World War I. Ritschl influenced not only various representatives of systematic theology—for example, Wilhelm Herrmann, MARTIN RADE, and ERNST TROELTSCH—but also church historians and interpreters such as Julius Wellhausen and ADOLF VON HARNACK.

References and Further Reading

Jodock, Darrell, ed. Ritschl in Retrospect. History, Community, Science. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1995.

Kuhlmann, Helga. Die theologische Ethik Albrecht Ritschls. Munich, Germany: Kaiser, 1992.

Schäfer, Rolf. Ritschl: Grundlinien eines fast verschollenen Systems. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr, 1968.

MARTIN GRESCHAT

ROBERTS, GRANVILLE ORAL (1918–)

American evangelist. Roberts was born on January 24, 1918, in Pontotoc County, Oklahoma. Reared in the parsonage of a Pentecostal minister (see PENTECOSTALISM) he experienced the hardships of poverty during the Depression era. At age seventeen Roberts collapsed on the basketball court. Diagnosed with tuberculosis he spent five months in convalescence. He claimed complete healing when attending a service conducted by George Moncey. He entered the ministry in 1935, having been ordained by the Pentecostal Holiness Church. For eleven years he pastored churches in Oklahoma. By 1946 he was serving one of his DENOMINATION'S largest churches, teaching classes at Southwest Bible College and taking coursework at Phillips University.

In 1947 he abruptly changed course. Influenced by the recent success of evangelist William Branham, Roberts resigned his pastorate and launched an interdenominational healing and evangelistic ministry (see FAITH HEALING). He set up headquarters in Tulsa, Oklahoma, started a magazine titled Healing Waters, published a book, If You Need Healing, Do These Things, and began a weekly radio broadcast. He began crisscrossing the UNITED STATES, holding tent REVIVALS on the outskirts of America's largest cities. Thousands attended every meeting with scores claiming healing in every crusade.

He helped found the FULL GOSPEL BUSINESS MEN'S ASSOCIATION in 1951. The Association's impact, together with Roberts's ecumenical crusades, laid much of the groundwork for the Charismatic Movement that burst on mainline North American Christianity in the 1970s. With three hundred crusades behind him, he returned to Tulsa to start a university in 1967. Oral Roberts University gained full accreditation within six years and had over 4,000 students at the turn of the century.

Roberts's move to establish a medical school proved to be the most controversial decision of his ministry. The City of Faith Medical and Research Center failed to gain financial solvency, closing within ten years of its 1981 opening.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Roberts, Oral. God is a Good God; Believe It and Come Alive. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill, 1960.
- . The Baptism with the Holy Spirit: and the Value of Speaking in Tongues Today. Tulsa, OK: 1964.
- . The Call: An Autobiography. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1972.
- . The Miracles of Christ and What They Mean to You for All Your Needs in the Now. Tulsa, OK: Pinoak Pub., 1975.
- . 3 Most Important Steps to Your Better Health and Miracle Living. Tulsa, OK: Oral Roberts Evangelistic Assn., 1976.
- . How to Get Through Your Struggles: or, You Can Walk on the Stormy Waters of Your Life. Tulsa, OK: Oral Roberts Evangelistic Assn., 1977.
- . Don't Give Up!: Jesus Will Give You That Miracle You Need. Tulsa, OK: Oral Roberts Evangelistic Assn., 1980.
- . God Still Heals Today: and Here's How He Heals You. Tulsa, OK: O.Roberts, 1984.
- . How I Learned Jesus Was Not Poor. Altamonte Springs, FL: Creation House, 1989.
- . Expect a Miracle: My Life and Ministry; An Autobiography. Nashville, TN: T.Nelson, 1995.

Secondary Sources:

- Harrell, David Edwin. Oral Roberts: An American Life. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985.
- Robinson, Wayne A. Oral: The Warm Intimate Unauthorized Portrait of a Man of God. Los Angeles: Acton House, 1976.

D.WILLIAM FAUPEL

ROBERTSON, FREDERICK WILLIAM (1816–1853)

English clergyman. Robertson was born in London on February 3, 1816, and died in Brighton, Sussex, ENGLAND, on August 15, 1853. He received his B.A. in 1840 and his M.A. in 1841, both from Brasenose College, Oxford. After a rather undistinguished six years of ministry Robertson became minister at Trinity Chapel, Brighton, and made Trinity Chapel one of the most famous churches in England by his PREACHING. At Brighton he helped establish the WorkingMan's Institute, which was a library, reading room, and cultural center.

Robertson was a brilliant BIBLE expositor and an outstanding pastoral preacher. Although he believed that Jesus Christ was divine, he stressed his humanity in sermons such as "The Sympathy of Christ," "The Loneliness of Christ," and "The Sinlessness of Christ." He was sympathetic to Christian Socialism as was illustrated in his sermons "The Message of the Church to Men of Wealth" and "Christ's Moral Judgment Respecting Inheritance." Robertson insisted that Christianity is the revelation of the love of God and a demand of our love by God. Christianity is the revelation of forgiveness and a requirement that we should forgive each other.

Robertson was very effective in telling biblical stories. Sermons such as "Jacob's Wrestling," "Triumph Over Hindrances—Zaccheus," and "The Doubt of Thomas" were vivid in detail and undoubtedly captured the hearers' attention. Thus he observed about Thomas: "The faith of Thomas was not merely satisfaction about a fact; it was trust in a person."

See also Christology; Socialism, Christian

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Robertson, Frederick W. Sermons Preached at Brighton. New York and London: Harper & Brothers, Publishers, n.d.

———. Sermons and Outlines on the Seven Words. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1953.

———. Sermons by Frederick W. Robertson. London, New York: J.M.Dent & Co., E.P.Dutton & Co., 1906, 1909.

Secondary Sources:

Blackwood, James Russell. The Soul of Frederick W. Robertson, the Brighton Preacher. New York and London: Harper & Brothers, 1947.

Brooke, Stopford Augustus, ed. Life and Letters of Frederick W. Robertson. 2 vols. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co., 1891.

Henson, Henley. Robertson of Brighton, 1816–1853. London: Smith, Elder, 1916.

DONALD S. ARMENTROUT

ROBERTSON, PAT (1930–)

American evangelist. Marion Gordon Robertson (known as Pat) was born on March 22, 1930, in Lexington, Virginia, the son of Absalom Willis Robertson and Josephine Ragland Willis. Robertson's father was an attorney who served terms in the Senate of Virginia, the U.S. House of Representatives, and in the U.S. Senate.

Robertson graduated from Washington and Lee University summa cum laude and in 1955 received a law degree from Yale University. After a series of disappointing career moves, Robertson underwent a religious conversion, including a tongues-speaking experience, and enrolled in the conservative Biblical Seminary in New York City. After a brief period of ministering in the slums, Robertson purchased a run-down UHF television station in Portsmouth, Virginia, to which he gave the grandiose name "the Christian Broadcasting Network." By the mid-1960s CBN had a solid core of supporters and in 1966 the station began broadcasting a program hosted by Robertson, the "700 Club." That show became one of the longest-running television programs in the history of the industry. Robertson's network was unashamedly religious, although it also promoted a conservative political and economic agenda.

The expansion of CBN was an unbroken success story. In 1979 a newly constructed headquarters building housed two state-of-the-art television studios and recording facilities. A year earlier Robertson unveiled plans to build a graduate university; the opening of Regents University (originally called CBN University) vastly expanded the reach of Robertson's ministry. At the end of the twentieth century Regents was the most prestigious education institution associated with the Pentecostal/charismatic movement. In 1988 CBN took the name "The Family Channel" and the network became one of the nation's leading cable systems. The prosperity of the ministry's television enterprise threatened its tax-exempt status and in 1997 it was sold, producing large endowments for Regents and the ministry.

Robertson was a natural to lead the political awakening of American evangelicals in the 1970s. Well-known to and trusted by the millions of Americans who had embraced the Pentecostal/charismatic movement, he was also equipped by upbringing and education to discuss political and economic issues. He became one of the most visible leaders of the religious right in the last quarter of the twentieth century. In 1988 Robertson entered the primaries as a Republican candidate for the presidency and surprised many by winning the Iowa caucus. After his presidential campaign faltered, he placed his brand on the conservative political agenda by founding the Christian Coalition of America.

Robertson is the author of ten books, several of them best-sellers. His ministry is presently housed on a 700-acre complex in Virginia Beach, Virginia. The elegant Williamsburg-style buildings symbolize the success and patriotism of Pat Robertson. In addition to its educational activities, the ministry has a major presence on television in America and in about fifty other countries, and through Operation Blessing International is one of the largest private relief organizations in America. The ministry's annual budget exceeds $200 million and CBN employs about one thousand people.

See also Pentecostalism; Evangelicalism; Televangelism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Robertson, Pat, and Jamie Buckingham. Shout It From the Housetops. Plainfield, N.J.: Logos International, 1972. <http://www.cbn.com/>

Secondary Source:

Harrell, David Edwin, Jr. Pat Robertson: A Personal, Political and Religious Portrait. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987.

DAVID EDWIN HARRELL JR.

ROBINSON, HENRY WHEELER (1872–1945)

English biblical scholar. Robinson was an Old Testament scholar, theologian, English Baptist clergyman, historian, and educator. Born in Northampton, ENGLAND, February 7, 1872, he and his mother lived with his mother's uncle. He left school at an early age and worked in the leather business.

He became associated with College Street Baptist Church where he was baptized in 1888. Attracted to the Christian ministry he began attending Regent's Park College in London. A year later he moved to Edinburgh University where he graduated in 1895. He completed his university studies at Mansfield College, Oxford with a concentration in Old Testament studies.

Brief pastorates at Baptist churches in Pitlochry and Coventry led to a call to be a tutor at Rawdon Baptist College. His lectures attracted considerable attention as did his books, in particular Deuteronomy and Joshua (1907) and The Religious Ideas of the Old Testament (1913).

In 1920 Robinson was appointed principal of Regent's College, a post he held until 1942. His career blossomed with the new responsibilities. He became a member of the London Society for the Study of Religion and a major figure in the Society for Old Testament Study. He participated in the planning and editing of the "The Library of Constructive Theology." He wrote The Christian Experience of the Holy Spirit (1928). He was active in the Baptist Historical Society, serving as president, and he published important books in Baptist history, including The Life and Faith of the Baptists (1927).

The great achievement of his career was his role in moving Regent's College from London to Oxford. In Oxford he became a well-known theological lecturer and a reader in biblical criticism. In 1937 he became the chairman of the board of the faculty of theology, the first Free Churchman so honored. Robinson died May 12, 1945.

See also Baptists

References and Further Reading

Payne, E.A. Henry Wheeler Robinson. 1946.

JOHN PIPER

ROBINSON, JOHN ARTHUR THOMAS (1575 OR 1576–1625)

English Separatist and Pilgrim pastor. Robinson was born in Sturton-le-Steeple, Nottinghamshire. He entered Corpus Christi College, CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY, in 1592, was awarded a B. A. in 1596 and an M. A. in 1599; in 1598 he became a fellow of the college but resigned his fellowship in 1604 and married Bridget White. At Cambridge, the CALVINISM of WILLIAM PERKINS (1558–1602) influenced him. Early in 1604 he was appointed curate of St. Andrews, Norwich, although he had already disclosed his Puritan sympathies (see PURITANISM) by denouncing church courts and unlearned ministers; no later than 1606 he was suspended for his dissident views. Robinson joined the Separatist circle of English nonconformist JOHN SMYTH (1554–1612) and affiliated with the Separatist congregation gathered in Scrooby, Nottinghamshire, which included William Brewster (1566–1644) and William Bradford (1590–1657), both later leaders of the Plymouth colonists in New England. Troubled by the local ecclesiastical courts, the Scrooby group moved to the NETHERLANDS, settling in Amsterdam in August, 1608, where they chose Robinson their pastor and came in contact with English Separatists led by Francis Johnson and Henry Ainsworth (1571–1622). By April 1609 they had moved to Leiden.

Robinson's 1610 treatise A Justification of Separation proves him by then a Separatist who believed that the CHURCH OF ENGLAND was so corrupt that the godly should no longer remain within it. Identifying with the earlier Separatist tradition of Henry Barrow, he argued that a true visible CHURCH was a disciplined community of gathered SAINTS, covenanted together for mutual edification (see COVENANT). But he modified his Separatism, probably as a result of contact with such non-Separatist Congregationalists as WILLIAM AMES (1576–1633) and Henry Jacob, to the extent of allowing that one could have spiritual fellowship with godly persons within the Church of England and even hear sermons in its parish churches. When Smyth rejected infant BAPTISM, Robinson defended it against him and other Baptists. Robinson also attacked Smyth for denying original SIN, and in 1624 he defended PREDESTINATION against the Baptist John Murton; earlier, in 1613, he had assisted the Dutch Calvinists' assault upon ARMINIANISM by publicly debating Simon Episcopius (1583–1643).

In 1620 part of Robinson's Leiden congregation left for Plymouth in New England, and though he planned eventually to join them, he died before doing so, though his wife and children later settled in New England. His reported exhortation to the departing Pilgrims that “the Lord had more truth and light yet to break forth out of his holy word,” has been taken to indicate the tolerant tenor of his thought, but he remained a committed Separatist and Calvinist.

References and Further Reading

Ashton, R., ed. The Works of John Robinson. 3 vols. London: John Snow, 1851.

Brachlow, Stephen. The Communion of Saints: Radical Puritan and Separatist Ecclesiology 1570–1625. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Burgess, W.H. The Pastor of the Pilgrims: A Biography of John Robinson. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Howe, 1920

George, Timothy. John Robinson and the English Separatist Tradition. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1982

DEWEY D. WALLACE, JR.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM

See Catholic Reactions to Protestantism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions

ROMANIA

The modern state of Romania in southeastern Europe emerged after the 1920 Treaty of Trianon at the end of the First World War. The vast majority of those living in the provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia belong to the Eastern Orthodox Church. In Transylvania and counties to the west of the Carpathian mountains, Romanians mostly adhere to EASTERN ORTHODOXY or the Greek Catholic Church. The German and Hungarian communities of Transylvania belong to a range of churches, including the Lutheran, Reformed, and Unitarian churches. Many German and Hungarian communities in Transylvania have remained faithful to Protestantism since the middle decades of the sixteenth century.

The Reformation in Transylvania

At the beginning of the sixteenth century Transylvania and the lands between the river Tisza and the Carpathians were part of the Hungarian kingdom. In 1526 the armies of Sultan Suleiman “the magnificent” won a decisive victory at the battle of Mohács over the Hungarian king, Louis II. The Ottomans were able to consolidate control over southern and central HUNGARY during the middle decades of the sixteenth century. The remainder of the medieval Hungarian kingdom was divided in two. To the north and west, the Habsburgs became kings of Royal Hungary, which stretched from the Adriatic coast to the mountains of modern Slovakia. To the east native nobles were elected as princes over Transylvania proper and the Hungarian Partium beyond the river Tisza. This Transylvanian principality had a diet of three estates: the Hungarian nobility, the German towns, and Szekler people.

REFORMATION ideas spread first to the German or Saxon towns during the 1540s. Johannes Honter gained acceptance for Lutheran reforms from the urban magistrates of Braşov (Kronstadt), and Braşov's example was quickly followed in other Saxon towns. The fledgling Transylvanian state authorities took advantage of growing support for reform to bring all church property under princely control in 1556. Having bolstered his position, Prince János Zsigmond Zápolyai then accepted the diet's demand for the legal recognition of Protestantism, and in 1557 the Saxon towns received approval for the free practice of LUTHERANISM. Although communication linkages with GERMANY helped establish loyalty to Lutheranism in the German-speaking community, Hungarian speakers were also at first influenced by Lutheran PREACHING.

However, from the late 1550s Hungarian nobles and towns moved to embrace Reformed religion. Debates were held between German and Hungarian clergy over understanding of the SACRAMENTS, and especially the Eucharist, or LORD'S SUPPER. Reformed or Calvinist clergy could not agree with Lutherans that Christ was "really present" in the sacrament, and their statements on DOCTRINE argued that the Eucharist was merely a sign and pledge of SALVATION by faith. In 1564 the diet recognized two Protestant churches in Transylvania, one for Germans and the other for Hungarians. The doctrine of the emerging Reformed Church was clearly established by a CONFESSION drawn up by Péter Méliusz Juhász at Debrecen in 1567, and Reformed clergy also recognized the Second HELVETIC CONFESSION.

Transylvanian Protestantism split again in the 1560s over understanding of the doctrine of the Trinity. FERENC DÁVID led a group of anti-Trinitarian clergy, whose message that "God is one" received some support from prince János Zsigmond Zápolyai. In 1568 the diet met at Turda (Torda) and reached the remarkably tolerant decision to devolve to ministers the responsibility of preaching the word of God "according to their understanding of it." The diet described FAITH as a gift from God that could not be compelled against conscience. Legal status was therefore granted to the Catholic, Lutheran, Reformed, and anti-Trinitarian (or Unitarian) churches, and ownership of church buildings was decided by the majority in each parish (see UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION).

By the 1570s the Catholic Church had virtually ceased to exist in many areas. German-speaking towns remained Lutheran, whereas the Reformed and Unitarian churches were dominated by Hungarian speakers. Although a sense of linguistic and ethnic community may have made some contribution to the outcome of the Reformation in this region, the role of the socially privileged elite of nobles and urban magistrates was generally decisive in establishing the form of religion in each locality. The Romanian peasantry in Transylvania remained mostly Orthodox, although attempts were made by both the Lutheran and Reformed churches to stimulate reform, and a Romanian Reformed Church was established in southwestern Transylvania in the seventeenth century.

Support for ANTI-TRINITARIANISM in Transylvania was badly disrupted by internal divisions. Some anti-Trinitarians moved toward non-adorantism of Christ in the 1570s, despite a 1572 law preventing any further religious innovation. Although outlawed, a minority, so-called Sabbatarian strain of anti-Trinitarianism, which denied the divinity of Christ and adopted Mosaic laws, persisted in eastern Transylvania into the seventeenth century (see SABBATARIANISM). In the 1620s the range of legal religions expanded still further with princely approval for a settlement of Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM).

The Protestant Churches

The Lutheran, Reformed, and Unitarian churches each adopted a hierarchical form of government, governed by superintendents who were confirmed in their offices by the prince. All the Protestant churches recognized the importance of improving the standards of the CLERGY and made efforts to develop their EDUCATION. Local schools were established in many towns, and in the early seventeenth century a princely academy was established at the capital, Alba Iulia (Gyulafehérvár). However, because the principality did not have a university of its own, many Protestant student ministers were sent abroad to foreign universities. Saxon Lutherans attended German universities, particularly Wittenberg. Reformed students traveled to Heidelberg university toward the end of the sixteenth century, and later to Dutch universities and to ENGLAND.

Protestant ideas spread throughout Transylvania through preaching and printed literature (see PUBLISHING). Printing presses were established in major towns, producing Protestant creeds, statements of doctrine, sermons, CATECHISMS, school books, and HYMNALS. The first complete translation of the BIBLE into Hungarian was available from 1590 thanks to the work of Gáspár Károlyi, minister at Vizsoly in northeastern Hungary (see BIBLE TRANSLATION). In the early seventeenth century Reformed clergy were inspired by contact with western Calvinist centers, and especially the Dutch Republic and England, to produce practical theological literature for their communities. These so-called Puritan clergy aimed to improve popular piety and moral discipline and also supported the development of presbyteries to enforce higher standards of morality (see PURITANISM). Although the formation of presbyteries received some support, the traditional form of church government by a clergy hierarchy was upheld by a national SYNOD at Satu Mare (Szatmár) in 1646. At the beginning of the eighteenth century Pietist Lutheran clergy also appealed for moral discipline and spiritual renewal (see PIETISM).

From 1568 the legal freedoms of the Protestant churches in the Transylvanian principality were clearly established. However, the Habsburg kings of Royal Hungary sought to restore Catholicism across Hungary and to gain control over Transylvania. Attempts in 1604 by Rudolf II to close down the Lutheran church in Košice (Kassa) in Upper Hungary provided one of the sparks of rebellion against Counter-Reformation in the region. A Reformed noble, István Bocskai, led his forces to victory over Habsburg armies in eastern Hungary. By February 1605 Bocskai had been elected as the first of a series of Calvinist princes in Transylvania. Under these princes Transylvania remained largely unaffected by the COUNTER-REFORMATION in the seventeenth century. Princes Gábor Bethlen and György I Rákóczi intervened in the Thirty Years' War against the Habsburgs, claiming that they were defending Hungarian constitutional freedoms and Protestant liberties. They supported Protestant nobles in Royal Hungary who complained that church buildings were being seized by Catholics. This period of Transylvanian autonomy under Calvinist princes saw the Reformed Church become in effect the public church of the principality. However, Reformed-dominated Transylvania was gravely weakened by the attempted invasion of POLAND by György II Rákóczi in the late 1650s, with a subsequent loss of territory to the Ottomans.

Protestantism in Habsburg Transylvania

Toward the end of the seventeenth century the Habsburgs extended their territory at the expense of the Ottomans. In 1686 the Transylvanian diet appealed to Leopold I for protection and in 1691 agreed to the Diploma of Leopold I, which brought the principality under Habsburg sovereignty. This Diploma maintained the privileges of the Lutheran, Reformed, and Unitarian churches. Although the Habsburg court supported Catholic interests, the Protestant churches retained their legal privileges throughout the eighteenth century. The old political and religious order came under increasing challenge in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, with the rise in Hungarian and Romanian nationalist politics. The continuing inequalities that Protestants faced in Hungary formed part of their agenda for reform, and the inequalities facing Transylvania's Romanians, both Orthodox and Greek Catholic, formed part of their reform proposals.

Hungarian-speaking Protestants in Transylvania enthusiastically supported the 1848 revolution in Hungary, and the declaration of Hungarian independence in April 1849 took place at the Reformed college chapel in Debrecen, announced by the Lutheran Lajos Kossuth. After the 1848 revolution had been crushed Habsburg rule was restored, but by the 1867 Compromise, Transylvania was returned within the governmental structures of Hungary. In 1881 the Reformed Church held its first national synod at Debrecen, including clergy from Transylvania. This synod was able to lay down the foundations of a national church, with a synod to meet every tenth year to decide on church laws, and a council that represented the church between these synods. The late nineteenth century saw increased educational and publishing activity from all the Protestant churches, and concern for domestic mission from the 1880s in the face of some decline in church numbers.

In 1895 the Hungarian parliament passed a law declaring the free practice of religion. The full benefit of these laws was offered to the traditional churches: Catholic, Calvinist, Lutheran, Unitarian, Jewish, and Orthodox. These churches and their schools could all gain state subsidies, their clergy were offered a minimum salary, and their religious teachers were given a state salary. A second category of religions, including a Baptist Church that had emerged in the nineteenth century, enjoyed full legal freedoms but could not claim state subsidies (see BAPTISTS, EUROPE). Finally small tolerated denominations were allowed to function under rights of free association.

Protestantism in Twentieth-Century Romania

After Hungary's defeat in the First World War, Hungarian territory was reduced by two-thirds by the 1920 Trianon peace treaty. Transylvania and parts of eastern Hungary to the west of the Carpathian mountains were brought within the Romanian state. The Hungarian minority complained of mistreatment by the Bucharest government and sought to overturn the terms of the Trianon peace treaty. The churches provided key means of expressing the identity of the ethnic minority communities in Romania. The Lutheran Church had long been closely linked with the German community, and the Reformed, Unitarian, and Catholic churches played a similar role for the Hungarian minority. Militant NATIONALISM increased in the interwar period, and none of the Christian churches had a distinguished role in opposing the rise of fascism and ANTI-SEMITISM in Romania in the 1930s (see JUDAISM). During the Second World War both Romania and Hungary were allied to the fascist powers, partly aiming to secure German support for rival territorial claims. In 1940 Hungary temporarily regained control over northern Transylvania as part of their agreement with Germany. In 1944 Romania switched to join the Allies, and the Trianon border was restored at the end of the Second World War.

In the postwar period the churches found themselves increasingly marginalized under the new Communist regime (see COMMUNISM). This was particularly the case for the churches of ethnic minorities, including the Protestant churches. By far the largest Protestant church, the Reformed Church had around 700 ministers in Romania, supported by around 12,000 active presbyters. However, the ability of these clergy and presbyters to carry out their functions was increasingly restricted by the government. In 1949 new laws required all churches to be registered with the Department of Cults, which gained administrative and financial control over the churches. In 1950 the small communities of BAPTISTS, Pentecostals (see PENTECOSTALISM), and SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS were forced to unite into a Federation of Protestant Cults. The larger Protestant churches were forced to accept a united seminary college, which was attended by Reformed, Lutheran, and Unitarian students at Cluj (Kolozsvár) and by Lutheran students in Sibiu (Hermannstadt). The state restricted the numbers of students who could attend these colleges, and as a result by 1989 there were 70 unfilled parishes in the Transylvanian Reformed province alone.

After the 1956 Hungarian Revolution the churches of the Hungarian minority in Transylvania came under particular oppression from the Bucharest regime. Some clergy, students, and teachers were imprisoned, connections between the churches and foreign countries were cut, publishing activity curtailed, and no Bibles could be produced. The Protestant church hierarchies were emasculated by state officials, and the appointment of parish ministers was influenced by the state. Ministers who were deemed to be beyond official control could face forced retirement or arrest. Opposition to a move to a remote village enforced on the Timișoara (Temesvár) Reformed minister, László Tőkés, became one of the sparks of the revolutionary movement that ended the dictatorship of Nicolae Ceaușescu in 1989.

In the period after the downfall of the Ceaușescu regime, the Orthodox Church has come to dominate the public culture of the Romanian state. Overall 85 percent of the Romanian population are claimed to belong to the Eastern Orthodox Church. The largest Protestant church remains the Reformed Church with between 800,000 and 900,000 members. The Unitarian church has around 80,000 members in 140 churches, mostly located in eastern Transylvania. There are also around 30,000 Hungarian Lutherans. However, the rapid decline of the German community in Romania from 800,000 to a very few thousand has meant the reduction of the Lutheran Church to small numbers of active congregations. In addition there are perhaps up to 100,000 other Protestants across Romania, including both Hungarian and Romanian-speaking Baptists and Pentecostals. The churches have again become a prime means of expressing the identity of ethnic minorities in Romania, which has invited suspicion and hostility from Romanian nationalist politicians. Efforts to regain church property have been slow, but vacant parishes have received new ministers, contact has been reestablished with Western Protestants, and some new schools have opened. The historic Protestant churches of Transylvania face many challenges in post-Communist Romanian society, including competition from some new Protestant groups.

References and Further Reading

- Binder, Ludwig. Grundlagen und Formen der Toleranz in Siebenbürgen bis zur Mitte des 17. Jahrhunderts. Cologne, Germany/Vienna, Austria: Böhlau, 1976.
- Dán, Róbert, and Antal Pirnát, eds. Antitrinitarianism in the Second Half of the Sixteenth Century. Budapest, Hungary: Akadémiai kiadó, 1982.
- Evans, Robert. "Calvinism in East Central Europe: Hungary and her Neighbours." In International Calvinism, 1541–1715. Edited by Menna Prestwich. Oxford, UK: Clarendon, 1985.
- Murdock, Graeme. Calvinism on the Frontier, 1600–1660. International Calvinism and the Reformed Church in Hungary and Transylvania. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 2000.
- Révész, Imre, ed. History of the Hungarian Reformed Church. Translated by George Knight. Washington, D.C.: Hungarian Federation of America, 1956.
- Wilbur, Earl. A History of Unitarianism in Transylvania, England and America. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1952.

GRAEME MURDOCK

ROMANTICISM

European Romanticism has been described in many ways, ranging from a narrowly defined historical period to metaphors of a “boiling” or “fermentationpoint” producing a fundamental change of state. For some we are still in a Romantic age; for others, a post-Romantic one. For those involved, however, one strikingly common characteristic was a feeling of loss. In many poets, this longing—at once personal and cultural—for something lost, unattainable, or incomplete, was an obsession amounting to a personal reinvention. In both the Immortality Ode and the autobiographical Prelude WILLIAM WORDSWORTH displays nostalgia for a state of childhood ecstasy that cannot quite be recalled or re-created, but remains liminal, just beyond the threshold of consciousness. Similarly SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE’S Ancient Mariner is haunted by the idea of a state of innocence that is the more desirable because unrecoverable. John Keats’s

Odes hanker after health as much psychological as physical. Even Lord Byron's mockery has a hint of whistling in the dark. Perhaps most startling of all is WILLIAM BLAKE'S discovery that to recapture the prophetic sense of meaning in current events, he has to invent a completely new mythology of history.

Above all, what had been lost was religion. Not in the popular evangelical sense of a relationship with a personal God, but rather a general and collective world picture in which there was no boundary between the sacred and the secular, in which supernatural or divine power was everywhere apprehended through type, symbol, and sacrament. Although in their own idiosyncratic ways, Blake, Wordsworth, and Coleridge were devout Protestants, unlike their predecessors; to be devout, they had to be idiosyncratic. The union of personal piety and collective sensibility of the Metaphysical poets was no longer viable. If, as some claim, this progressive separation of the sacred and the secular began with the REFORMATION, the conflicts of the sixteenth century still belonged to a world where religious belief was an instinctive part of life. In contrast, however much the newer forms of eighteenth-century religious revival may have differed, they had in common a perceived sense of loss—often expressed in the new Evangelical terminology as “a sense of sin.”

In the first enthusiasm for the French Revolution, the language of politics merged with that of religious revival. Hailing the dawn of this new age, Richard Price (1723–1791), a nonconformist preacher (see NONCONFORMITY), saw political and spiritual freedom as inseparable:

Be encouraged, all ye friends of freedom, and writers in its defence! The times are auspicious. Your labors have not been in vain. Behold kingdoms, admonished by you, starting from sleep, breaking their fetters, and claiming justice from their oppressors! Behold, the light you have struck out, after setting AMERICA free, reflected to FRANCE, and there kindled into a blaze, that lays despotism in ashes, and warms and illuminates EUROPE! (Price 1789:49)

Echoes of Acts 12:7 and 16:23–33 are obvious, as is Christian's release from Despair in JOHN BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS, and CHARLES WESLEY'S famous lines on conversion from “And can it be”:

Long my imprisoned spirit lay
Fast bound in sin and nature's night;
Thine eye diffused a quickening ray—
I woke, the dungeon flamed with light;
My chains fell off, my heart was free,
I rose, went forth, and followed Thee.

However, political disillusion, after 1793 and the Terror, only increased hunger for revolution that was spiritual and aesthetic.

In FRANCE and GERMANY, ravaged by Revolutionary and Napoleonic wars, immediate exhilaration was counterbalanced both by loss and a quest not just for new religious experience, but to reinvent religion rather than accept established forms. Paradoxically the conservative Catholicism of R.F.A.de Chateaubriand (1768–1848) draws him into a quite new romantic religious synthesis in The Genius of Christianity (1802): “What particularly distinguishes Christian eloquence from the eloquence of the Greeks and the Romans is, in the words of La Bruyère, that evangelical sadness which is the soul of it, that majestic melancholy on which it feeds” (his italics) (Chateaubriand 1856:438). Novalis (Friedrich Von Hardenberg 1772–1801) invokes “the infinite sadness of religion.” FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834) has a similar sense of what he calls a “holy sadness” in religious feeling “which accompanies every joy and pain” (Schleiermacher, 1988:217). All sought a quite new relationship with a past where, it was felt, such a loss had not yet occurred. W.H.Wackenroder (1773–1798) turned back to the Italian Renaissance as an imaginary golden age for his Confessions from the Heart of an Art-Loving Friar (1797). Novalis turned to the seventeenth-century world of JAKOB BÖHME, and beyond that other-worldly mysteries of Gnosticism and Neoplatonism, but nevertheless proclaimed that “true religion” had not yet arrived (Forstman 1977:47–63). This attempt to return to a unified world picture made a deep impression on his friend Friedrich Schlegel (1772–1829), who was with him when he died at the age of 29. Partly under his posthumous influence, Schlegel and his wife converted to Catholicism in 1808. “If only because it is so ancient,” wrote Dorothea Schlegel, “I prefer Catholicism. Nothing new is of any use” (Eichner, 1970:106–111). Schleiermacher and the Schlegels shared a distaste for contemporary LUTHERANISM, and the evangelical Protestantism of his Speeches on Religion almost amounts to a re-created Romantic Christianity of his own.

The background to this almost universal desire to reinvent religion lies both in the general temper of eighteenth-century DEISM and, more specifically, in new near-Eastern scholarship. In 1791 the former aristocrat Constantin-François Chasseboeuf de Volney (1757–1820) presented the Revolutionary French National Assembly with a monograph entitled Les Ruines, ou méditation sur les revolutions des empires. Despite its gothic-sounding title, it was less a “meditation” than a polemic on the origins of religion—particularly Christianity. Not merely all IndoEuropean and Semitic religion, Volney argued, but even astrology could be traced back to ancient Egypt at least 17,000 years ago. All supernatural and revealed religions were nothing more than the misplaced products of primitive nature-worship, time, and the accidents of historical diffusion. The gods of ancient Egypt, through the Aryans, had been eventually reduced by the sixth century B.C. in Persia to a single deity. This new syncretistic monotheism was then appropriated by the Israelites during their Babylonian and Persian captivities, transmitted to the Christians, and thence in the sixth century A.D. to the Arabs. To any historian the conclusion was clear: “Jews, Christians, Mahometans, howsoever lofty may be your pretensions, you are in your spiritual and immaterial system, only the blundering followers of Zoroaster” (Volney, 1881:83).

Following ENLIGHTENMENT assumptions, Volney attributed miracles to imagination, gods to forces of nature, and moral codes to natural law and self-love (14–15:93). His dazzling erudition, ranging from Hindu cosmology to the esoteric doctrines of the Essenes (83–5), together with his revolutionary and anticlerical bias, made for immediate popularity. At least three English and one Welsh translation appeared by 1800 (eleven by 1822) and extensive summaries appeared in radical magazines. Both Shelley's Queen Mab and Ozymandias show his influence, as does Blake's Marriage of Heaven and Hell. In 1817 Mary Shelley gave the Ruins further mythopoeic status by making the Monster read it in Frankenstein.

Worse even than Volney's refusal to separate Christianity from other near-Eastern religions, was the claim for pre-Biblical texts 17,000 years old—contrary to Archbishop Ussher's date of 4004 B.C. for the Creation—and that the Old Testament was not the earliest writing. Many still assumed that Hebrew was the oldest language—containing elements of the original unfallen Adamic speech where words stood in an essential rather than a contingent relationship to what they described (Aarsleff, 1982:58–60). Thus J.G. Herder (1744–1783), in his Spirit of Hebrew Poetry (1782), took it for granted that Hebrew poetry “expresses the earliest perceptions, the simplest forms, by which the human soul expressed its thoughts, the most uncorrupted affections that bound and guided it.”

Yet, for all its ICONOCLASM, there is a “gothick,” even mystical, quality to The Ruins that often seems to prelude a new religion than demolish old ones. This suggestion (never quite substantiated) that readers, far from passing from superstition into the light of Reason, were to be initiated into the mysteries of a new age, differentiated Volney from other Enlightenment skeptics and points toward the more psychological questioning of later critics, such as Schleiermacher and LUDWIG FEUERBACH. Comte's transformation of Volney's key to all mythologies into a positivist religion of humanity was, as GEORGE ELIOT saw, not a perversion but a logical extension of qualities implicit in The Ruins.

Thus even as Christianity's historical origins were challenged, many of its central ideas were being reappropriated. Biblical typology was recycled as poetic “symbolism.” Blake supports his radical and antinomian ideas with a personal mythology, which includes “conversations” with the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1793). Coleridge and Wordsworth, although more orthodox Protestants, both attach greater importance to personal experience than to either “evidences” of Christianity (such as arguments from design) or history. Despite obvious philosophic differences, all use reconstituted religious imagery in their poetry. Shelley, who was expelled from Oxford University for writing The Necessity of Atheism, nevertheless uses in Mont Blanc a range of language previously belonging to religion to describe nature as a vast organic process now inseparable from the psychology of the perceiver, concluding with:

And what were thou, and earth, and stars, and sea,
If to the human mind's imaginings
Silence and solitude were vacancy? (142–4)

Similarly, the posthumous Defence of Poetry subsumes both Jesus and the Old Testament prophets into Shelley's tradition of poets “as the unacknowledged legislators of mankind.”

In Germany the “Jena” Romantics, centering around the Schlegel brothers in the late 1790s, which included Fichte, Hölderlin, Hegel, Novalis, Schleiermacher, and Schelling, explicitly cast religion in aesthetic terms. “Belief in God,” insists the young Schleiermacher, “depends on the direction of the imagination” (Schleiermacher 1988:138). A similar secular blending of the aesthetic and religious lay at the heart of Friedrich Schlegel’s strategy for creating a theoretical basis for Romanticism itself:

Feeling that is aware of itself becomes spirit; spirit is inner conviviality, and soul, hidden amiability. But the real vital power of inner beauty and perfection is temperament. One can have a little spirit without having any soul, and a good deal of soul without much temperament. But the instinct for moral greatness which we call temperament needs only to learn to speak to have spirit. It needs only to move and love to become all soul; and if it is mature, it has a feeling for everything. Spirit is like a music of thoughts; where soul is, there feelings too have outline and form, noble proportions, and charming coloration. (Schlegel 1991:69)

Here “spirit” (Geist) has a secular force never achieved by its feebler English equivalent, and with Hegel the word was to infuse history with an extraordinary religious dynamic.

Significantly, the full implications of the radical subjectivity of the English romantics come to fruition only in Schleiermacher, who disproves the cliché that French Romanticism was radical, but German conservative. His On religion: Speeches to its Cultured Despisers (1799) challenged not merely the dominant Kantian philosophy, but also his own circle of Romantic friends (the “cultured despisers”). Whereas Volney’s historical and evolutionary theory of the origins of religion shows little sense of interpretational problems, Schleiermacher saw that the problems lay less in the history than on our relationship to it. For him there is an almost infinite range of possible interpretation. Hermeneutics was less a matter of a “correct” understanding of the past, still less of decoding a fixed and universally valid content, but of a much subtler and less determinate process of bringing author and reader into a relationship that made understanding and interpretation possible. No simple key would unlock the Scriptures, no formula bared a final transhistorical meaning; for the true reader “understanding is an unending task.”

What was clear for British, French, and German romantics alike was that although religion was essential for any wholeness of life, there was no return to a collective age of faith. For all their backward glances to a mythical and timeless middle ages, they are firmly historical, recognizing that belief could now only be personal, internalized, and subjective—to the point where it is often difficult to distinguish in practice between orthodoxy, pantheism, and naturalism. In this sense Chateaubriand is often as “Protestant” as Blake, Coleridge, Schleiermacher, Shelley, or Wordsworth. “I must create my own system, or be enslaved by another’s,” wrote Blake. There remained a yawning gulf between the immediacy of personal experience and that acquired on trust from other authorities—the difference between what Newman (one of the last true romantics) was to call “real” and merely “notional” assent. For Schleiermacher such authority was ultimately fatal to true religious experience:

What one commonly calls belief, accepting what another person has done, wanting to ponder and empathize with what someone else has thought and felt, is a hard and unworthy service, and instead of being the highest in religion, as one supposes, it is exactly what must be renounced by those who would penetrate into its sanctuary. To want to have and retain belief in this sense proves that one is incapable of religion; to require this kind of faith from others shows that one does not understand it. (Schleiermacher 1988:134)

Such a statement of Romantic religion does not merely leave space for individual experience; it makes the foundation stone. However, Schleiermacher, no more than Newman, urges the sole sufficiency of personal experience because, as the context makes clear, this is less an evangelical credo as a psychological observation about the nature of human belief. The age of passive acceptance is gone. From henceforth, "real assent" is inevitably a matter of imagination and engagement. As such it is also part of a debate about aesthetic theory belonging as much to the English Romantic tradition of Wordsworth and Coleridge, Blake and Shelley, as it does to the German.

See also Blake, William; Böhme, Jakob; Bunyan, John; Coleridge, Samuel Taylor; Deism; Eliot, George; Enlightenment; Feuerbach, Ludwig; Iconoclasm; Lutheranism; Pilgrim's Progress; Reformation; Schleiermacher, Friedrich; Wesley, Charles; Wordsworth, William

References and Further Reading

- Aarsleff, Hans. From Locke to Saussure: Essays on the Study of Intellectual History. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1982.
- Chateaubriand, René François Auguste de. The Genius of Christianity. Translated by Charles White. Baltimore: 1856.
- Eichner, Hans. Friedrich Schlegel. New York: Twayne, 1970.
- Forstman, Jack. A Romantic Triangle: Schleiermacher and Early German Romanticism. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977.
- Herder, J.G. The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry (Dessau 1782–1783), 3d edition. Marburg: 1822. Translated by James Marsh. Burlington, VT: Edward Smith, 1833.
- Mueller-Vollmer, Kurt, ed. The Hermeneutics Reader. Oxford: Blackwell, 1986.
- Price, Richard. Discourse on the Love of our Country. London: 1789.
- Schlegel, Friedrich. Philosophical Fragments. Translated by Peter Firchow. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1991.
- Schleiermacher, Friedrich. On Religion: Speeches to its Cultured Despisers. Translated by Richard Crouter (1799). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Shelley, Percy Bysshe. "A Defence of Poetry (1819)." In Prose Works, edited by Mary Shelley, 1840.
- Volney, Constantin-François Chasseboeuf de. The Ruins: or a Survey of the Revolutions of Empires. Introduction by Charles Bradlaugh. London: Freethought Publishing Co., 1881.

STEPHEN PRICKETT

ROSSETTI, CHRISTINA (1830–1894)

English poet. Christina Rossetti was a major Victorian poet and author of a substantial body of devotional prose. The youngest in an exceptionally artistic and literary English-Italian family (her brother was poet and painter Dante Gabriel Rossetti), Rossetti was closely associated with the pre-Raphaelite movement in ART and poetry. Born on December 5, 1830, Rossetti's religious tendencies were stimulated by the THEOLOGY and poetics of the OXFORD MOVEMENT, which reached London in the 1840s. A devout Anglo-Catholic and longtime resident of London, she died there on December 29, 1894.

Rossetti established her poetic reputation with Goblin Market and Other Poems in 1862, followed by The Prince's Progress and Other Poems (1866), Sing-Song: A Nursery Rhyme Book (1872), A Pageant and Other Poems (1881), and Verses (1893). Her lyric poetry is exquisite in its simple diction, pure tone, and suggestive symbolism; the inconstancy of human love, the vanity of earthly pleasures, renunciation, individual unworthiness, and the perfection of divine love are recurring themes.

Rossetti also wrote several prose volumes, including the fictional works Maude (published posthumously in 1897), Commonplace and Other Short Stories (1870), and Speaking Likenesses (1874) as well as six volumes of devotional prose, the composition of which occupied Rossetti's creative energies for the last decades of her life: Annus Domini (1874); Seek and Find (1879); Called to Be Saints (1881); Letter and Spirit (1883); Time Flies (1885); and The Face of the Deep (1892). Often structurally complex, these volumes include meditations on NATURE, commentary on SAINTS and scripture, personal reflection, and poetry. Rossetti is considered the most significant poet to develop out of the literary tradition of the Oxford Movement.

See also Anglo-Catholicism; Bible; Keble, John; Pre-Raphaelites

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Rossetti, Christina. The Complete Poems of Christina Rossetti: A Variorum Edition. Edited by R.W.Crump. 3 vols. Baton Rouge and London: Louisiana State University Press, 1979–1990.
- . The Letters of Christina Rossetti. Edited by Antony H. Harrison. 4 vols. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1997.
- . Selected Prose of Christina Rossetti. Edited by David A.Kent and P.G.Stanwood. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Secondary Source:

- Marsh, Jan. Christina Rossetti: A Literary Biography. London: Jonathan Cape, 1994.

MARY ARSENEAU

ROTHMANN, BERNARD (1495–1535)

Anabaptist reformer. Rothmann was born in or near Stadtlohn to the west of the Münster diocese in GERMANY about 1495. He attended schools in Münster, Deventer, and Alkmar, became a teacher in Warendorf near Münster, and studied at the University of Mainz, receiving a master's degree in 1524. After his ordination to the priesthood he became chaplain at the church of the monastery of St. Mauritz near Münster. To enhance his theological studies, the canons sent him to Cologne. It is not known whether it is here or elsewhere that Rothmann came in contact with reform ideas. After his return he advocated Lutheran doctrines in his sermons and gained followers among the tradesmen who financed a study trip for him in 1531. After a visit with Lutherans in Marburg (Buschius, Schnepf), in Wittenberg (PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, JOHANNES BUGHENHAGEN), and in Strasbourg (WOLFGANG CAPITO, CASPAR SCHWENCKFELD) Rothmann returned to St. Mauritz in the summer of 1531. He declined to practice or participate in church rituals (e.g., requiem masses) that had no biblical mandate. In August of 1531 this resulted in denunciations by Catholic townsmen, but also in higher attendance on the part of Lutheran sympathizers. Rothmann had to set up his pulpit in the churchyard to accommodate the crowd.

Because Rothmann ignored the prohibition of his church authorities (both the bishop and cathedral chapter of Münster) not to preach, his opponents pressed for an order by emperor Charles V to bishop Friedrich von Wied (1522–1532) to restore peace and quiet and to expel the unwanted preacher. Before the order issued on December 28, 1531 in Brussels was received in Münster, the citizens had called on the authorities (city council and guild leadership) to protect Rothmann and to allow his teachings, the main features of which were clear, to be preached in Münster. Anticipating the impending expulsion order, Rothmann sought the protection of the city of Münster and took up residence in the house of the Merchants Guild.

With the support of preachers sent by the Protestant Landgrave of Hesse, Münster became an evangelical, or reformed, city. In August of 1532 Rothmann was PREACHING at the church of St. Lamberti, the main Münster church, while other Lutheran clergy preached at five other parish churches in the city.

A year later, in April of 1533, Rothmann introduced a new church order which the city council had commissioned. Because some of the theologians from Marburg had reservations about it, Rothmann received the help of five preachers who had been banished from Wassenberg in Jülich. Rejecting in principle all nonbiblical customs, they denounced infant BAPTISM. Rothmann followed them, as his writings of October and November showed: He declared that the introduction of infant baptism had brought about the beginning of the desolation of faith and the apostasy of the Roman Catholic church from the truth of Christ. On the basis of the date and duration of the apostasy that Paul (II Thessalonians 2:3–4) had described, numerous calculations had been made for the imminent return of Christ and the Last Judgment. Rothmann and others such as MELCHIOR HOFMANN and Michael Stiefel had determined that the time of Christ's return would be the end of 1533. A postponement of the date by three and a half months to Easter of 1534 had been initiated by JAN MATHIIS in Amsterdam, whose “apostles” arrived in Münster at the beginning of 1534. They baptized Rothmann and the preachers from Wassenberg, a practice that was derided by its opponents as “rebaptism.”

While the town of Münster was besieged by troops of the neighboring counts for its Anabaptist orientation, Rothmann developed his ideas of the regeneration (or restitution) of the true church of Christ that should take shape in Münster as the “New Jerusalem.” When Jon von Leiden took over leadership from Jan Mathiis, who was killed in a skirmish, Rothmann was given the rank of “enunciator of the word” whose responsibility included defining new forms of communal living (joint property, polygamy) and new forms of church worship in theological terms, and communicating that to the outside world through letters and announcements. Rothmann probably did not survive the occupation of Münster on June 24, 1535, but his body was never found.

From the earliest texts that have been handed down (1531), Rothmann’s theological positions are clear: he was convinced that the Catholic church had moved away from the teachings of Christ and that it had introduced human fabrications (such as purgatory, requiem masses, intercession of the SAINTS, fasting, holy water, last rites, forgiveness of sins through CONFESSION) not mentioned in the Scriptures. He believed the end of times and Last Judgment were near; thus all Christians had to be brought back to the right faith before these events. These changes were required to bring an end to papal HERESY and abuses.

The main works of Rothmann’s doctrine were first (at the beginning of January 1531) formulated (Stupperich, pp. 78–86) by his followers and then published extensively by Rothmann himself (epitome, Druck: Ibid., pp. 64–77). A list of “Mißbräuche der römischen Kirche” (“Abuses of the Roman Church”) was done in August of 1532 (Ibid., pp. 58–59). After a successful defense (Ibid., pp. 94–118) Rothmann printed in October of 1532 his first main work “Bekenttnis von beiden Sakramenten” (“Confession of both Sacraments”) (Ibid., pp. 138–194). In the months during the siege (starting in February of 1534) four further treatises followed, among them the “Restitution,” a programmatic piece on the reinstatement of a “rechten und gesunden Lehre” (“just and healthy Christian doctrine”) (Ibid., pp. 208–283). A final essay, written in May of 1535, has survived only in a fragmentary copy (Ibid., pp. 372–404).

See also Anabaptism; Capito, Wolfgang

References and Further Reading

- Bakker, Willem J. de. “De vroege theologie van Bernhard Rothmann. De gereformeerde achtergrond van het Munsterse Doperrijk,” in: Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 3 (1977), 9–20.
- Bakker, Willem J. de, “Bernhard Rothmann. Civic Reformer in Anabaptist Münster,” in: Dutch Dissenters. A Critical Companion to their History and Ideas. With a Bibliographical Survey of Recent Research Pertaining to the Early Reformation in the Netherlands, ed. by Irvin Buckwalter Horst (Kerkhistorische Bijdragen 13), Leiden: E.J.Brill 1986, pp. 105–116.
- Bakker, Willian John De. Civic Reformer in Anabaptist Münster: Bernhard Rothmann. 1495–1535, Diss. o. O. 1987.
- Brecht, Martin. Die Theologie Bernhard Rothmanns. Jahrbuch für Westfälische Kirchengeschichte, 78, (1985), 8. 49–82.

- Detmer, Heinrich. Bilder aus den religiösen und sozialen Unruhen in Münster während des 16. Jahrhunderts. 2. Band: Bernhard Rothmann, Münster 1904.
- Haller, Bertram. Bernhard Rothmanns gedruckte Schriften. Ein Bestandsverzeichnis. Jahrbuch für Westfälische Kirchengeschichte, 78, 1985, S. 82–102.
- Porter, Jack Wallace. Berhard Rothmann 1495–1535. Royal Orator of the Münster Anabaptist Kingdom. (Phil. Diss.), Univ. of Wisconsin 1964.
- Rothert, Hugo. Bernhard Rothmann. Westfälische Lebensbilder. 1. Band, Münster 1930, S. 384–399.
- Stupperich, Robert, ed. Die Schriften der münsterischen Täufer und ihrer Gegner. Teil I: Die Schriften Bernhard Rothmanns, Münster 1970.
- Wray, J. Bernhard Rothmann's Views on the Early Church. Reformation Studies. Essays in Honor of Roland H. Bain-ton, ed. by F.H. Littell, Richmond 1962, S. 229–238.

KARL-HEINZ KIRCHHOFF

ROUSSEAU, JEAN-JACQUES (1712–1778)

French philosopher. Rousseau was born into a Protestant family descended from French HUGUENOTS exiled in Geneva on June 28, 1712. Raised by an aunt and uncle, he ran away from Geneva at age sixteen to nearby Savoy (1728). Here, as he later said, for reasons of expediency and in ignorance of Catholicism, he quickly renounced his Protestantism, and converted to the Catholic Church. He made his way to FRANCE where he spent many years and achieved fame because of two of his writings, Discours sur les arts et sciences (1750) and Discours sur l'origine et les fondements de l'inégalité parmi les hommes (1753). He returned to Geneva in 1754 and, now in his early forties, reconverted to Protestantism and regained Genevan citizenship. Two of his most famous works, Emile, ou de l'éducation and Du contrat social (both 1762), were condemned by the parliament of Paris and burned by the government of Geneva. He then, in his early fifties, renounced his Genevan citizenship (1763), although not specifically his Protestantism, and spent most of his remaining years at no fixed address in France. His Les Confessions (written by 1770, published posthumously in 1782) depicted his life in an autobiographical genre. Rousseau died at Ermenonville, near Paris, July 2, 1778.

Both during his lifetime and continuously since, Rousseau's interpreters have represented him in quite opposite ways, whether as Genevan Protestant, French Catholic, exponent of new civil religion, ENLIGHTENMENT rationalist and deist, French proto-revolutionary, or pristine romantic.

In spite of the severe rejection of Rousseau's works in Geneva, later interpreters have sometimes detected Protestant motifs in certain of his writings, especially the controversial Emile and Contrat social, written while a Genevan citizen, and Confessions, recalling the tradition of intimate self-disclosure linked to St. Augustine. The "profession of faith of a Savoyard vicar" found in Emile, commonly assumed to suggest Rousseau's own beliefs, had a self-acknowledged Protestant ring in its approval of dogmas contrary to the Church of Rome, its low esteem for the ceremonies of WORSHIP, and its attention to the promptings of the heart. The civil society displayed in Contrat social seemed more like Calvinist Geneva than anything French, Catholic, or secularist. In Confessions he characterized Catholics as people who accept decisions made for them, and associated himself with the trait of Protestants who learn to think for themselves.

See also Deism; Enlightenment; Huguenots; Romanticism

References and Further Reading

Masson, Pierre Maurice. La religion de Jean-Jacques Rousseau. 3 vols. Paris: Hachette, 1916; reprint 1970.

McEachern, Jo-Ann E. Bibliography of the Writings of Jean Jacques Rousseau to 1800. Oxford, UK: Voltaire Foundation, 1993.

University of Geneva Rousseau website: <http://rousseau.%20unige.ch/>

C.T.MCINTIRE

ROYCE, JOSIAH (1855–1916)

American philosopher. Born in 1855 in Grass Valley, California, Royce grew up in a home where a pious and devout father was frequently absent, searching for jobs that would provide a living for the family. Royce's mother ensured that he received an education, and after his promising work as a high school student, he attended the University of California at Berkeley. After postgraduate study in GERMANY he moved to Johns Hopkins University and began an auspicious career in philosophy. While at Hopkins he met WILLIAM JAMES, who later was instrumental in securing Royce a position at Harvard.

Although many observers often place Royce in the school of American Pragmatism that developed under James and others at Harvard in the late nineteenth century, Royce developed his ideas about philosophy and religion from the standpoint of the idealism of GEORG W.F.HEGEL and German philosophy. He also incorporated Darwin's notion of evolution (see DARWINISM) into his philosophy in ways that James and others did not, thus building a philosophical system that incorporated the insights of SCIENCE and religion, which he believed were compatible.

In his first book, The Sources of Religious Insight (1885), Royce put his idealism into practice as he tried to offer a rational basis for religion, as opposed to the pragmatic and instrumental version that James was offering. In his later work on Christianity, Royce built on this early study and his work in The Philosophy of Loyalty to construct what he called a "religion of loyalty." Transcending the tension between morality and religion, Royce argued that devotion to a cause, which results in a loyal life, directs the individual's will to the common good. Such devotion takes on a religious character because the cause is an object that comes from outside the individual. The cause is a unique form of reality—a "real spiritual unity"—that binds many different people into one community. Members of this beloved community share a common faith and a common hope.

Royce believed that religion emphasized the social rather than the individual. His Beloved Community represented his ideal community in which his ideas of loyalty and devotion would be the hallmarks of the religious life.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Royce, Josiah. The Problem of Christianity. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1968.

Secondary Source:

Smart, Ninian, John Clayton, Partrick Sherry, and Steven T. Katz, eds. Nineteenth-Century Religious Thought in the West. 3 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.

HENRY L.CARRIGAN JR.

RUSSELL, CHARLES TAZE (1852–1916)

American religious figure. Russell was born on February 16, 1852 in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania to Scottish-Irish parents. His mother died when he was nine years old, and his father raised him as a Presbyterian. Although religious as a young boy, by age sixteen Russell had repudiated his Presbyterian background and rejected all religion. As a teenager he went into business with his father operating a chain of successful clothing stores. He accumulated a substantial fortune from these business interests, much of which he ultimately used to support his religious activities. In 1879 Russell married Maria Francis Ackley, who contributed to Russell's work until their contentious divorce seventeen years later. Through his adult life "Pastor Russell," as he was called by his followers, was a prolific writer (Barbour and Russell 1877). He produced tens of thousands of pages of written work, his writings were published in thousands of newspapers, and many millions of his books were distributed internationally. Russell was the founder of the Bible Students movement, which ultimately became the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, and by the end of his life the movement had gained several thousand members around the world. Russell died unexpectedly on October 31, 1916 in Pampa, Texas.

Theology

Russell developed a distinctive THEOLOGY based on his own scriptural study and liberal borrowing from both the Adventist and contemporary American Protestant traditions. His major theological tenets include the following: (1) There was no biblical basis for the trinity. (2) The DEATH of Christ was the ransom price for humanity, but humans had been ransomed from death rather than eternal hell. (3) Christ was not part of a trinity but rather a lesser god who had been created by his father. (4) The dead will remain unconscious in their graves until the resurrection. (5) Christ was resurrected in spirit but not in the flesh in 1874 as the first step in a two-stage coming (parousia). (6) The church and all of its constituent branches lost their legitimacy after the death of the apostles. Although Russell initially rejected Adventist date setting, he soon became caught up in the practice. He set a number of dates for the end time—1874, 1878, 1881, and 1914—and each time offered a reassessment and new date. Russell taught his followers that they should be prepared for the climactic events when his followers would be transformed into spirits and taken to HEAVEN. The remainder of humanity, Russell preached, would achieve SALVATION during the millennium and form a “Great Company” that would live on an Edenlike earth.

Organization

It is clear that when he began his religious career Russell did not intend to establish a church but rather slowly adopted more formal organization over several decades. When he was sixteen Russell formed his own BIBLE study group that initially consisted of a small group of friends and his father. The following year he attended a religious meeting led by Jonas Wendall, an Adventist preacher who ignited his religious passion. In 1876 Russell met another Adventist, Nelson Barbour, who was the editor of The Herald of the Morning, and the two worked together for three years before parting company over doctrinal differences. Russell then founded his own competing magazine, Zion’s Watch Tower and Herald of Christ’s Presence to disseminate his theological message. Beginning with the single congregation that Russell established in the late 1870s, new congregations formed quickly, and by 1880 congregations existed throughout the eastern and central states. Russell gradually created formal organizations to administer his growing movement. In 1884 he founded the Zion’s Watch Tower Tract Society, and he was installed as its first leader. In 1889 he established the Bible House in Pittsburgh as headquarters; in 1909 the headquarters were moved to Brooklyn, New York and a second corporation, The People’s Pulpit Association, was established.

As Russell gradually created a congregational style of organization, he emphasized voluntaristic, democratic governance. “Ecclesias,” as congregations were termed, were loosely linked to Russell through “pilgrims,” representatives from each ecclesia. Congregational leaders were to be elected, collections were not taken during services, and members were free to express their own conscience but could not dispute fundamental doctrinal tenets. Dissidents were free to form separate ecclesias. However, Russell clearly was the dominant influence within the Bible Students movement. His personal wealth was a major source of movement funding, his writings were the primary source of movement theology, and he administered Zion’s Watch Tower Tract Society. As time went on he directed the topics of Bible study of each ecclesia. Bible Studies members began referring to Russell as the “faithful and wise servant” (referred to in the book of Matthew), the “Laodicean Messenger” (referred to in the book of Revelations), or “the man with the inhorn” (referred to in the book of Ezekiel). Whichever title was used, there is little doubt that Russell was viewed within the movement, and regarded himself, as a prophetic figure.

Russell's unexpected death in 1916 produced a period of tumult within the movement. For many members the failure of Russell's last prediction was disillusioning. In the wake of his death the movement was weakened by defections, struggles for power among potential successors, and schisms. Russell was succeeded by Joseph Franklin Rutherford, who led the movement through a period of schism and persecution and renamed the group the Jehovah's Witnesses. Over time the Witnesses' doctrines changed significantly, and a number of the schismatic groups have claimed to be the legitimate heirs to the original Russell tradition.

References and Further Reading

- Barbour, Nelson, and C.T.Russell. Three Worlds and the Harvest of This World. Rochester, NY: Office of the Herald of the Morning, 1877.
- Beckford, James. The Trumpet of Prophecy: A Sociological Study of Jehovah's Witnesses. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell, 1975.
- Bergman, Jerry. Jehovah's Witnesses and Kindred Groups: A Historical Compendium and Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1984.
- Harrison, Barbara. Visions of Glory: A History and Memory of Jehovah's Witnesses. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1978.
- Penton, M.James. Apocalypse Delayed: The Story of Jehovah's Witnesses, 2d edition. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997.

Primary Sources:

- Russell, C.T. Studies in the Scriptures. East Rutherford, N.J.: Dawn Bible Students Association, 1953–1959.
- . The Battle of Armageddon. Edison, NJ: Divine Plan, 1978, 1897.
- . Harvest Gleanings. Chicago: Chicago Bible Students' Book Republishing Committee, 1980.
- Russell, C.T., Clayton J.Woodworth, and George H.Fisher. Studies in the Scriptures. Series I—[VII]. Brooklyn, London: International Bible Students Association, 1924.

DAVID G.BROMLEY

RUSSIA

Terminology

In Russian, the term “Protestantizm” serves in general as a designation for all of those Christian churches and congregations that come out of the Reformation. Specifically, the term is applied to all of the denominations (BAPTISTS, evangelical Christians, Adventists, etc.) that have had a footing in Russia since the nineteenth century. Lutherans have been resident in Russia since the sixteenth century and in general are referred to as “l’juteranskij,” the reformists that settled in Russia a bit later than the Lutherans are designated as “reformatskij” or “kalvinskij.”

Current Statistics

The number of Protestants in Russia is currently estimated to be about 1 million, which corresponds to about 0.6 percent of Russia’s total population (147,307,000). As a result of the Law on Religion, a law that took effect in 1997 and that mandated registrations for all new religious institutions in Russia, it is apparent that with about 3,800 institutions, Protestantism (after the Russian Orthodox Church with 10,912 and before Islam with 3,048) is the second largest statistically. Within Protestantism, the Pentecostal Christians represent the largest group (1,323), followed by Evangelical Christians-Baptists (975), Evangelical Christians (612), and Adventists (563). Lutherans represent a relatively small group, with 213 registered institutions.

History, An Overview

Historically, Protestantism in Russia goes back to immigrants from various countries, people that emigrated to Russia at the behest of Russian czars, already in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and later, especially after the manifests of the year 1763 by Catherine II (1762–1796) and similar statements by Alexander I (1801–1825). (Between 1763 and 1769 about 25,000 and between 1804 and 1824 about 54,000 immigrants settled in Russia.) Russia is dependent on the technical know-how of immigrants and requires the agricultural migrants to settle virgin soil or the territories around the Black Sea that have been depopulated after wars. The motives of the immigrants are economic, political, and/or religious. (For example, religious are the motives of the tide of settlers at the beginning of the nineteenth century, people who, motivated by the apocalyptic speculations of JOHANN ALBRECHT BENDEL and JOHANN HEINRICH JUNGSTILLING, tried save themselves from the impending disaster.) In general, there have been three big migrant tides: in the eighteenth century coming from the Rhineland, the Electorate Trier, and the Hessian possessions (to the Volga region); at the beginning of the nineteenth century especially from parts of Southern GERMANY, but also from Prussia, Saxony, and HUNGARY (to Southern Russia and the Caucasus); and finally in the mid-nineteenth century from the area of interior POLAND (to Volhynia). At the end of the twentieth century, there were migrant movements out of this area. From the migrant community of the Lower Volga alone, more than 90 dependent communities were formed in the years 1772–1909.

During the Czarist system, compared to the Russian Orthodox Church, Protestant congregations, if recognized at all, faced legal restrictions, for example, the prohibition to convert a Russian-Orthodox believer of Slavic origin to Protestantism. However, they also received specific privileges, including tax relief and exemption from military service.

For Protestant congregations, the time after the October Revolution of 1917 brought a certain period of religious freedom, because antireligious state terror at that time was directed primarily at the Russian Orthodox Church as the former state church (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN). But with the regulations “concerning all religious communities” in the year 1929, all of the elements were in place for the systematic elimination of all religious institutions, a move that resulted in the persecution, ban, and often the obliteration of Protestant congregations.

World War II marked a break insofar as from then on, congregations were not so much exposed to persecution. But a positive turn of events occurred only in the aftermath of the political changes of the 1980s and 1990s. The current legal basis for religious institutions is the Law on Religions of 1997. The Law on Religions guarantees the general freedom of religion; but nevertheless, among others, Protestant churches and congregations are discriminated against, because the preamble of the Law on Religions offers the Russian Orthodox Church a special role with regard of the Russian CULTURE, before Islam and before other religious institutions.

Characteristics

Protestantism in Russia is characterized by a diasporalike situation: Protestantism represents a widely dispersed minority composed largely of ethnic minorities (German, Swiss, Dutch, Estonian, Lithuanian, Latvian, Finnish, Swedish, and others) in a society that is shaped mainly by Orthodox Christianity, but increasingly also by Islam. This situation has had three major effects. First, the Protestant congregations are strongly shaped by the respective countries of origin, and church services are performed in multiple languages (in the mother tongue of the members of the congregation and in Russian). Second, because they are in the minority, the congregations are faced with defection of its members to the Russian Orthodox Church, just as the Russian Orthodox Church perceives Protestant congregations as a threat. (Historically, such conversions can be proven in one direction: Protestant believers have converted to the Orthodox Church—often during a mixed marriage or for the sake of a better education. Inversely, in the 1860s, the influence of revivalists among the German settlers in Southern Russia led to the creation of the Russian free-church movement, the so-called “Stundists.”) Third, to this day, the diaspora situation has forced congregations to concentrate their efforts primarily on basic preservation of their existence. Under these circumstances, the development of a specific theological science has not been possible. And, hence, unlike in Germany or in SWITZERLAND, Protestantism has not become a source of cultural influence.

Yet, before 1917, (especially German-speaking) Protestantism did have some influence in different areas: through the agriculturally influenced (Mennonite) congregations in agricultural production and in the agricultural craft, through the Protestant elites in the palaces of the rulers (Alexander I, for example, was greatly influenced in a revivalist sense after his meeting with Jung-Stilling, the baroness BARBARA VON KRÜDENER, and others), through the participation of the Russian Bible Society (1812–1826) and then the Evangelical Bible Society (1831–1902), through various missionary services (for example, the reformist-inspired Bale Mission at the beginning of the nineteenth century), and through the German Protestant theology that allowed advances in the education and development of a scientific Orthodox theology in Russia during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Protestant Churches and Congregations

Lutherans

The first German-Lutheran congregation was founded in 1576 in Moscow (see LUTHERANISM). Since 1704, evangelical congregations (Franco-German, German-Swedish, and German-Dutch) emerged in the newly created capital of St. Petersburg. Between 1734 and 1832, the Justice Council, set up under Peter the Great (1682/89–1725), was in charge of dealing with all matters pertaining to evangelical congregations. In 1832, a new Church Order was passed that was closely modeled on the Swedish Church Order and thus was more strongly geared toward a Lutheran understanding than other evangelical congregations in Russia as a whole with regard to matters of organization and church service. (Consistories were created, where members are not elected, but were appointed by the czar in consultation with the general CONSISTORY. The same applies to the secular president and the spiritual vice president of the general consistory, thus practically eliminating any influence on the part of congregations and synods.) The church that emerges is partly a state church; it is in charge of maintaining the registry of civil unions and adjudicates divorces. On the other hand, it is a free church with limited rights, because it is restricted by law from recruiting converts from the Orthodox faiths. Internally, the church is subjected to tensions between the need for independence on the part of congregations that are often separated by a great distance and the need for unity with regards to intercongregational matters. In 1850, the foundation of a “Support Fund for Evangelical Lutheran Congregations in Russia” helps further the desire, held over the course of the nineteenth century, to go beyond particularized congregations and towards transcongregational awareness. The church was characterized by a high degree of heterogeneity, both in terms of its social structure (engineers, tradesmen, merchants, farmers) and its ethnic makeup (in 1914, 1.3 million Latvians, 1.1 million Estonians, 1.1 million Germans, and 150,000 Finns belonged to the Evangelical Lutheran Church).

After 1917 (with the Decree of January 23, 1918 separating CHURCH AND STATE), the church’s operation was impeded and its assets confiscated (“nationalized”). Thus it becomes necessary to reorganize the church, a task that the general synod meeting of 1924 in Moscow tackled. Until the end of the 1920s, the church enjoyed a degree of freedom (in 1925, the preacher’s seminar was founded, and publication of church publications, such as the magazine Our Church, was allowed). After 1929, the church lost a large number of pastors and active members. Churches and chapels had to close and were converted to production or repair shops. The Petri Paul Church in Moscow was the last Lutheran church to be closed in the Soviet Union. The situation grew worse with the deportations that begin in 1941, a move that resulted in the destruction of a number of congregations. Even though the outer structure of the church was dissolved, there remained a loose organization of local congregations (“Brotherly Circles”). The experiences in incarceration camps contributed to a spirit of community.

After World War II, the collection and support for congregations continued under Harald Kalnins, the pastor of the Latvian Jesu Church in Riga, who was appointed bishop in 1988. The appointment was recognized by the state, thus resulting in the official recognition of the Lutheran Church in Russia. At the general synod that took place on September 27–29, 1994 in St. Petersburg, the former deputy Georg Kretschmar became Kalnins' successor. From then on, the official name of the church became the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Russia and Other Countries (ELKRAS). Not all Lutheran Churches in the CIS countries are part of the German-inclined ELKRAS. With more than 600 congregations, the ELKRAS constitutes the most important Lutheran church in the current CIS countries.

In 1992, the Finnish congregations Ingermanlands and Karelias created the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Ingermanlands, an organization under the leadership of Bishop Leino Hassinen, then led by Bishop Aarre Kuukauppi since 1995. In December 2000, the Belarus Evangelical-Lutheran Church was created against the efforts of the ELKRAS to incorporate Lutheran and reformed teachings, but with the help of the Missouri synod and the theological institute in Fort Wayne, Indiana. Its goal is to establish an Evangelical Church in Belarus that is decidedly confessional. (According to its constitution, the organization confers membership only to churches that reject the ordination of WOMEN (see WOMEN CLERGY), applies the justification doctrine, teaches real presence, and advocates that HOMOSEXUALITY is a sin.) Similar tendencies can be observed in Siberia, where the creation of a third Lutheran church organization in Russia (in addition to ELKRAS and the Evangelical-Lutheran Church Ingermanlands) hints at an unmitigated Russian profile.

Reformed

The first Reformed congregation in Russia was founded in 1632 by Dutch and French immigrants in Tula. Among the settlers that streamed into Russia over the coming centuries, the Reformed represented about one-sixth. Their share was further reduced over time, because they were absorbed into what were counted as Lutheran congregations. Prohibited initially during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries (in 1714, Thomas Ivanov, a surgeon major in the Moscow Infantry Regiment, was executed in public for his commitment to Reformist teachings), the position of the Reformed congregations was incorporated into Evangelical Lutheran consistories in the form of a "Reformed caucus" in charge of the matters pertaining to Reformed congregations. Like the Lutheran church, the Reformed congregations were faced with the antireligious policies of the Soviet government, and in 1991 the Union of Evangelical Reformed Churches in Russia was founded, leading in 1992 to the establishment of the Reformed Fundamentalist Church in Tula.

Mennonites

After the manifesto by Catherine the Great, a few thousand (Flemish and Friesian) MENNONITES settled in the area around Danzig, first near Dnepr (west of the Dnepr island Chortica) and then around the region north of the Crimea (near the small stream of Molocnaja). In the nineteenth century, dependencies were formed in Siberia. Before World War I, Mennonites in Russia counted a population of around 120,000 (approximately 10 percent of all Germans in Russia).

With the clemency of Czar Paul I (1796–1801) in 1800, the Mennonites received special privileges, including free trade and commerce, exemption from military service, and the right to open distilleries. In 1874, as the exemption from military service was lifted, 18,000 Mennonites emigrated to North America. Subsequently, the Russian government offered a kind of civil service. Because of their tradition (Baptist) and their dialect, Mennonites were considered distinct from other German congregations in Russia. From an economic standpoint, they were reputed to be exemplary. For their spiritual development, the revivalist movement (especially through Pastor Eduard Wüst and the “separate” congregations he shaped) was of special importance; the repercussions resulted in a split between the so-called “Mennonite Brother Congregation” and the traditional “churchly” Mennonite congregation. Other smaller secessions occurred. Because the Mennonites were considered “Kulaks,” they were subjected to even more repression on the part of the Soviet government than other Germans. (Between 1922 and 1926, 21,000 Mennonites emigrated from the Soviet Union; from 1926 on, emigration was made more difficult.) In the 1930s, the Mennonites were subject to widespread persecution; in 1941, this persecution took the form of deportation and incarceration in camps. In addition, after 1945, among some 35,000 Mennonite refugees, 23,000 were affected by “repatriation,” the forced return to the Soviet Union. In 1963, the Mennonites were forced to join the ALL UNION COUNCIL OF EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANS-BAPTISTS.

Baptists

Starting in the mid-nineteenth century, continental Baptists expanded into all areas where evangelical Christians in Russia settled, probably through Memel. While German-speaking Baptist congregations gained state recognition in 1879, and while the conference of the Federation of the Faithful and Baptized Christians and So-Called Baptists of Southern Russia and the Caucasus took place in 1884 in Novo-Vasil’evka, the czarist government sought to avoid Baptist-inspired free-church groups, having gained an organizational structure in 1884. In 1907, however, a break occurred between Baptists who were committed to a strong order within the congregations and those who were open to an open federation of evangelical Christians. After the “golden” 1920s, after persecution and banishment in the 1930s, the two Baptist federations were accorded legal status in 1944. For better monitoring, they had to join the All-Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists, the same organization that Pentecostals (in 1945) and Mennonites (in 1963) were forced to join. In 1961, about half of the congregation members left the All-Union Council (because of the initiatives against the Soviet leadership of the All-Union Council called “Initiativniki”) and joined the underground Council of Congregations.

In 1991, the All-Union Council was renamed the Russian Federation of Evangelical Christians. Since 1990, a number of new groups have emerged. Among them is the Union of Brotherly Congregations that grew out of the circle of the Initiativniki, the socially oriented Association of Evangelical Christians (1992; also called Prochanov supporters), the Missionary Federation of Evangelical Christians (1996) that originated from the All-

Union Council and the Council of Congregations with a strongly missionary aim, and the Association of Congregations of Evangelical Christians (1998), which emerged with support of the American organization East-West-Missionaries.

Adventists

The Adventists began to expand in the Russian Empire starting around 1880, almost exclusively under German influence. As in the case of other FREE CHURCH movements, for the Adventists the 1920s represented “golden years” of unprecedented freedom and progress in the life of the congregation: All-Unions Congresses with representatives of the entire Soviet Union were held yearly. In 1926, 600 Adventist congregations could be counted in Russia. But for Adventists, the 1930s brought persecution and obliteration of their congregations. After World War II, Adventists were allowed to build an organization, but they had to submit to the control of the All-Union Council. Since 1997, a number of Adventist institutions have been registered.

Pentecostals

Active since the beginning of the 1920s, the Pentecostals (see PENTECOSTALISM) formed the Union of Christians of Evangelical Beliefs (Pentecostals) in 1924. After 1945, a small number of Pentecostals were represented by the All-Union Council. Most congregations opted to exist in the underground. Of these congregations, the United Church of Pentecostals was formed in 1961. The Federation of Christians of Evangelical Beliefs/Pentecostals was recognized by the state in 1989, while the nonregistered United Church continued to exist. In the meantime, the Federation of Christians and the United Church cooperate. In addition, there are charismatic groups, including the New Generation movement, founded with the participation of the influential American missionary Bob Winer; the Word of Life missionary movement, created under the influence of the former Lutheran pastor Ulf Eckman; and the rapidly expanding Church of God and the Russian United Church of Christians of Evangelical Belief/Pentecostal. Tensions often arise between the “traditional” Pentecostal Christians and the charismatic groups over such issues as the composition of the church service and the assessment of ecstatic phenomena. Common to both groups is their strong social and missionary commitment.

Advisory Council

In 2002, the leaders of the most important freechurch movements (Baptists, Adventists, and Pentecostals) formed the Advisory Council of the Leaders of Protestant Organizations. This council is meant to represent a large share of evangelical adherents in Russia.

See also Lutheranism; Orthodoxy, Eastern

References and Further Reading

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1999, pp. 438–440.
- Diedrich, Hans-Christian. Ursprünge und Anfänge des russischen Freikirchentums. Erlangen, Germany: Oikonomia, 1985.
- Felmy, Karl Christian. “Die Auseinandersetzung mit der westlichen Theologie in den russischen theologischen Zeitschriften zu Beginn des 20. Jahrhunderts.” Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 94 (1983):66–82.
- Kahle, Wilhelm. Evangelische Freikirchen und freie Gemeinden im Russischen Reich, in der Sowjetunion und den Nachfolgestaaten. Ein kleines Lexikon der Gestalten, Geschehnisse und Begriffe. Zollikon, Germany: G2W-Verlag, 1995.
- . Wege und Gestalt evangelisch-lutherischen Kirchentums: Vom Moskauer Reich bis zur Gegenwart. Erlangen, Germany: Martin Luther-Verlag, 2002.
- Kretschmar, Georg, and Heinrich Rathke. Evangelisch-Lutherische Kirche in Rußland, der Ukraine, Kasachstan und Mittelasien (ELKRAS) (Evangelical-Lutheran Church in Russia, the Ukraine, Kazakhstan, and Middle Asia). St. Petersburg, Russia: Der Bote, 1995.
- Lunkin, Roman. “Die euphorischen neunziger Jahre: Pfingstler und Charismatiker in Rußland” (“The Euphoric Nineties: Pentecostals and Charismatics in Russia”). Glaube in der 2. Welt 30 no. 1 (2002):26–31.
- Schneider, Harry. Schweizer Theologen im Zarenreich (1700–1917): Auswanderung und russischer Alltag von Theologen und ihren Frauen. Zurich, Switzerland: Verlag Hans Rohr, 1994.
- Sticker, Gerd. “Russische Freikirchen im Rückblick. Wichtige Entwicklungsschritte von ihren Anfängen bis zur Perestroika” (“Russian Free Churches in Retrospect. Important Developments from the Beginnings to Perestroika”). Glaube in der 2. Welt 30 no. 1 (2002):13–18.
- Wisotzki, Elisabeth. “Die Überlegensstrategien der rußlanddeutsche Mennoniten” (“The Survival Strategies of Russian-German Mennonites”). Dissertation, Rheinische Friedrich-Wilhelms-Universität Bonn, 1992.
- <http://mcdonald.southern.edu/churches> (Adventists Churches Online).
- <http://www.ebf.org/> (European Baptist Federation).
- <http://www.cec-kek.org/> (Conference of European Churches).
- <http://www.elkras.org/> (Evangelical-Lutheran Church in Russia and in other countries).
- <http://www.mwc-cmm.org/> (Mennonite World Conference).
- <http://www.reformed-online.org/> (Reformed online).

JENNIFER WASMUTH

RUSSWURM, JOHN BROWN (1799–1851)

African American church leader. Russwurm was born in Jamaica in 1799, the son of an English merchant and his African slave. After receiving his early education in Quebec he taught for several years at the African School in Boston, Massachusetts. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1826, becoming only the second black to earn a degree from an American college. From 1827 to 1829 he edited Freedom's Journal in New York City, the first black newspaper in the UNITED STATES. This made him a controversial figure. When he announced his growing support for African colonization, the voluntary relocation of African Americans to the African continent, black leaders in the northern United States were outraged. However, Russwurm had come to believe that blacks would never achieve equality with whites in the United States. After earning a master's degree from Bowdoin in 1829 he immigrated to LIBERIA.

After arriving in Monrovia Russwurm assumed the post of superintendent of schools for the colony and actively participated in colonial politics. He founded the Liberia Herald in 1830 and served as editor for its first half-decade, a role that made him the most prominent black advocate of African colonization. In 1836 officials of the Maryland Colonization Society appointed him as governor of their Maryland-in-Liberia colony at Cape Palmas. As the first black governor of an African colonial administration Russwurm promoted actions that were often viewed as confirmation of black capacity for self-government. He provided exemplary leadership, in spite of continued challenges, encouraging agricultural development and trade, organizing a militia, establishing a judiciary and uniform legal code, and negotiating relatively peaceful relations with indigenous Africans. Despite occasional conflict with Protestant missionaries he established a setting in which missionary efforts could flourish. Before his death in 1851 he began working for the annexation of the colony by the newly independent Republic of Liberia.

References and Further Reading

- Borzendowski, Janice. John Russwurm. New York: Chelsea House Publishers, 1989.
Campbell, Penelope. Maryland in Africa: The Maryland Colonization Society, 1831–1857. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1971.

ROY E.FINKENBINE

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PROTESTANTISM

VOLUME 4
S-Z
INDEX

HANS J. HILLERBRAND
EDITOR

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PROTESTANTISM

Editorial Board

Martin Greschat
Justus-Liebig-University (Germany)

L.Gregory Jones
Duke University, Durham, N.C.

David Martin
University of Lancaster (UK)

Assistant Editor

James H.Thrall
Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Hugh McLeod
University of Birmingham (UK)

Grant Wacker
Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Andrew F.Walls
Scottish Institute of Missionary Studies University of Aberdeen (Scotland)

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PROTESTANTISM

VOLUME 4

S-Z

Index

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

EDITOR

Routledge
New York London

Published in 2004 by Routledge 29 West 35th Street New York, NY 10001–2299
<http://www.routledge-ny.com/>

Published in Great Britain by Routledge 11 New Fetter Lane London EC4P 4EE
<http://www.routledge.co.uk/>

Routledge is an imprint of Taylor & Francis Books, Inc.

This edition published in the Taylor & Francis e-Library, 2006.

“To purchase your own copy of this or any of Taylor & Francis or Routledge’s collection of thousands of eBooks please go to <http://www.ebookstore.tandf.co.uk/>.”

Copyright © 2004 Routledge

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reprinted or reproduced or utilized in any form or by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of Protestantism/Hans J.Hillerbrand, editor. p. cm. Includes bibliographical references and index. ISBN 0-415-92472-3 (set) 1. Protestantism—Encyclopedias. I.Hillerbrand, Hans Joachim. BX4811.3.E53 2003 280'.4'03—dc21 2003011582

ISBN 0-203-48431-2 Master e-book ISBN

ISBN 0-203-57509-1 (Adobe eReader Format)
ISBN 0-415-92472-3 (Print Edition)

Contents

Volume 4, Entries S–Z	1
Appendix	904
List of Contributors	920
Index	974

SABATIER, AUGUSTE (1839–1901)

French theologian. Born in Vallont-Pont-d'Arc in 1839, Louis-Auguste Sabatier was a French Reformed Protestant theologian and philosopher of religion. He first lectured on reformed dogmatics in the Protestant Faculty of Theology at Strasbourg (1867–1872), and later helped to found the Protestant Faculty of Theology at Paris (1877), where he remained professor of THEOLOGY until his death, and from 1895 served as dean. Amid the religious and political complexities of the Third Republic, he proudly affirmed his allegiance to Huguenot traditions (see HUGUENOTS), his antipathy to the Catholic Church of FRANCE, and his objection to the absolutization of science within Positivism. Sabatier died in Paris in 1901.

He was a prolific writer of theology who combined studies in biblical theology, psychology, and philosophy with the critical study of the history of religions and the history of Christianity. His works included L'Apôtre Paul, esquisse d'une histoire de sa pensée (1870), Les origines littéraires et la composition de l'apocalypse de Saint Jean (1888), La doctrine de l'expiation et son évolution historique (1903), and Les religions d'autorité et la religion de l'esprit (1904), as well as the work that brought him fame, Esquisse d'une philosophie de la religion d'après la psychologie et l'histoire (1897). All were translated into English, extending his influence, with the most powerful book being Outlines of a Philosophy of Religion Based on Psychology and History (tr. 1897).

Sabatier is usually classified as a liberal theologian whose influence reached both Protestant and Catholic modernists. He is also called a symbolist because of the role he grants to metaphor and nonfixity in the formulation of theological doctrine. The labels are inadequate to indicate his theological program, however. In Esquisse d'une philosophie, he emerges as a staunch advocate of both the Reformed Church of France and Protestant doctrines. To reach these positions, however, he does not start with the creed or orthodox doctrine or ecclesiastical institutions or the BIBLE. He starts instead with what he calls "the instinct of every being to persevere in being," that is, the religious impulse inside every person. The impulse, rightly followed, results in PRAYER as the filial movement of the soul to live in relation with God the Father. This Sabatier knows through what he calls psychology, something like study of the soul. Then, through historical study, he discovers that amid all the religions of the world Christianity emerges as the only one within which reconciliation with God is complete. Likewise he detects within the history of Christianity a clear progression from an initial Messianic form to the later Catholic form and finally to the higher Protestant form, which alone brings the original inner impulse of religion to fulfillment. Protestants successfully unite the promptings of the inner spirit with the authority of Scripture, the doctrines of SALVATION, and the common life of the CHURCH.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Modernism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Sabatier, Auguste. The Doctrine of the Atonement and its Historical Evolution. London: Williams & Norgate, 1904.

Sabatier, Auguste, and Emmanuel Christen. The Vitality of Christian Dogmas and Their Power of Evolution. London: A. & C.Black, 1898.

Sabatier, Auguste, and Louise Seymour Houghton. Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit. New York: Mc-Clure, Phillips, 1904.

Secondary Sources:

Reymond, Bernard. Auguste Sabatier et le procès théologique de l'autorité. Lausanne, Switzerland: L'age d'homme, 1976.

Silkstone, Thomas. Religions, Symbolism, and Meaning: A Critical Study of the Views of Auguste Sabatier. London: Faber, 1968.

C.T.MCINTIRE

SABATIER, PAUL (1858–1928)

French theologian. Born in 1858 at Saint-Michael-de-Chabrilanoux, Ardèche, Sabatier served one Reformed Church pastorate in Strasbourg until being forced to leave in 1889 for not relinquishing his French citizenship, and a second at St-Cierge-la-Serre in the Cévennes until resigning in 1893 because of poor health. He then spent long periods in ITALY, especially Assisi, where he engaged in research on medieval spirituality and became a historian of St. Francis of Assisi. In 1919 he became professor of church history at the Protestant Faculty of Theology at Strasbourg. He died in Strasbourg in 1928.

His book La vie de St. François d'Assise (1893), written while serving his pastorate in Cévennes, became a standard study of St. Francis of Assisi in his day. He depicted St. Francis as something like a Protestant who followed the pure Gospel of Jesus Christ, distanced himself from the Roman Curia, and stimulated a reformation of the church. The Vatican placed the book on the Index of Prohibited Books (1894). Unusual for a Protestant, he was an active leader in international and national societies of Franciscan studies, and a rigorous researcher after documents relevant to medieval religious themes. He was also fluent in Latin and Italian. His Franciscan interest boosted his own reputation as a mystic.

Within FRANCE he was a avid commentator on the religious condition of the nation. His book L'orientation religieuse de la France actuelle (1911), following upon À propos de la separation des eglises et de l'état (1905), and Les modernistes, notes d'histoire religieuse contemporaine (1909), provided an analysis of the religious history of France during the Third Republic, especially since the Law of Separation (1905). His works played down the evident polarization of religious partisanship and aimed to persuade Protestants to accept the new realities. He showed immense sympathy for Catholic Modernists (see MODERNISM), whom he interpreted as devoted Catholics desiring to help their church, and for Free Thinkers, whom he saw as authentic searchers after truth and not antireligious. He criticized his fellow Protestants for in-fighting and squandering their opportunities for timely leadership. His eye focused on the new generic morale laïque, which the government had established in the public schools of France, displacing Catholic teachings. He regarded this action as not antithetical to Catholic or Protestant traditions. The morale laïque was, he urged, the clearest expression of the new religious orientation of France. It tapped a universal morality common to society as a whole, and harmonized with the best elements of Protestantism.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Sabatier, Paul. Life of St. Francis of Assisi. New York: Scribner's Sons, 1894.
———. Modernism. New York: Scribner's Sons, 1908.

Secondary Sources:

Colwell, H.J. Two French Protestant Pastors and Mystics: J.F.Oberlin and Paul Sabatier. London: Spottiswoode, Ballantyne, 1944.
Little, A.G. Paul Sabatier, Historian of St. Francis. Manchester, UK: University Press, 1943.

C.T.MCINTIRE

SABBATARIANISM

An often misunderstood movement that cut across denominational boundaries, Sabbatarianism is best considered under two rubrics, the restorationist and the reformist. Advocates of the former type sought a return to the Old Testament Sabbath, and therefore set aside Saturday, the seventh day of the week, for WORSHIP and rest. Most prominent among restorationists are the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS and Seventh-Day Baptists. Advocates of the reformist brand of Sabbatarianism, on the other hand, maintained that the Sabbath was transferred to Sunday when Christ rose from the dead on that day. They sought through measures both coercive and persuasive to ensure that Sunday was properly observed as a Sabbath. Although each type of Sabbatarianism was evident in the sixteenth century, it was not until industrial and commercial rhythms and styles of work, rest, and worship remade societies in Western Europe and North America that they flourished. This process occurred in various communities at different times, following different paces and mandates, but it was most accelerated and pronounced in ENGLAND, colonial America, and later the UNITED STATES. This entry primarily focuses on reformist Sabbatarianism because the restorationist type, now institutionalized in a variety of Seventh-Day denominations, is addressed elsewhere.

The early Protestant reformers, above all JOHN CALVIN and MARTIN LUTHER, cast Sunday as a day for religious assembly and PRAYER, but did not seek to abolish restful and harmless sports from the day. It is well known, for instance, that Calvin played bowls on Sundays, as did many of his prominent followers on the Continent and in England. As part of their larger efforts to eradicate the superstition that they felt corrupted the Catholic Church, the early reformers taught that the Fourth Commandment applied exclusively to the Jews, and that Christians were only obligated to set aside a convenient day for rest and religious duties. Perhaps spurred by the Catholic Church's Council of Trent's publication of a treatise on the Fourth Commandment in 1567, Protestants in England and on the Continent began to closely consider Christ's actions and words in relation to the Old Testament law of the Sabbath. Out of this close reading emerged a great variety of sentiments about the Sabbath, including the restorationist and the reformist brands of Sabbatarianism.

Restorationist Sabbatarianism

Before 1617 no Christian congregations observed the seventh day (Saturday) as the Sabbath. The emergence among a handful of Protestant congregations of the seventh-day Sabbath was an aspect of the larger impulse to return to the practices of the apostolic church and to rid Christianity of papist innovations. Many of the early Sabbatarians, who could be found in small numbers from Silesia to WALES and were known to their peers as Jews, believed that Sunday worship violated God's command, and was one of the many errors imposed on Christians by the Roman Catholic church. They argued that the Sunday-Sabbath was as tainted as the many red letter days that bled into one another on the Roman calendar. Most zealous about the Saturday-Sabbath were BAPTISTS, some of whom restored the seventh-day Sabbath along with foot washing (see FEET, WASHING OF), abstinence from unclean meats, and the laying on of hands. Chief among the radical critics of the Sunday-Sabbath was the English theologian Theophilus Brabourne (1590–1661), who wrote the first seventh-day Sabbatarian treatise, A Discourse Upon the Sabbath Day (1628). In it and in a subsequent, more influential publication titled A Defence of...the Sabbath Day (1632), Brabourne made the case for observance of the Mosaic Sabbath. In the following decades several independent congregations formed with the intention of observing the Saturday-Sabbath, most prominently the Lothbury Church and the Mill Yard Church, and their leaders were often tried, and on occasion executed, for hewing too closely to the Old Testament, the Mosaic code, and the seventh-day Sabbath. Led by the nonconformist Francis Bampfield (1615–1684) the “seventh-day men” sought to radically reform the calendar by abolishing all saints days and the Sunday-Sabbath too.

Puritan Sabbatarianism

The majority of Protestants in the seventeenth century as in our own, however, were content to leave the Sunday-Sabbath intact. The Puritan brand of Sabbatarianism, the best-known and most lampooned type, developed in England during the seventeenth century (see PURITANISM). It too was part of the broader reforms of popular culture and of the Roman calendar. In seeking to regularize the rhythm of work and rest by abolishing all saints days and holidays such that on six days men and women could and would work without interruption, Puritans infused the Sunday-Sabbath with much more importance than it had held previous to the REFORMATION. For medieval and early modern Europeans there were many opportunities for revelry, worship, and rest, and for completing the irregular, seasonal, syncopated work that characterized the largely agricultural and subsistence economy. However, with the parallel rise of Protestantism, mercantile capitalism, and industrialism, pressures to regularize rhythms of work and rest accelerated (see INDUSTRIALIZATION). Thus the Fourth Commandment, “thou shalt work six days and rest on the seventh,” resonated deeply with other currents in the culture and economy such that Sunday became the site of all that was meant to be restful and worshipful. This was first evident in Great Britain.

Under the reigns of ELIZABETH I and James I, Puritan divines and Anglican authorities clashed over the observance of Sunday (see ANGLICANISM). Although the crown forbade the performance of plays on Sunday in London (1680) it also vetoed a Parliamentary bill promoting strict observance of Sunday (1684). All agreed that church attendance should be mandatory, but it was over amusement, trade, and work that conflict developed. Puritans sought to abolish the fairs, games, frolics, and mayhem that erupted after morning services in favor of religious education and public and private prayer. The crown and its bishops, however, sanctioned church in the morning and play in the afternoon, which James I's "Book of Sports" (1618) codified. James I was concerned that without Sunday "the poorer sorts" would have no chance for recreation at all. Near mid-century, Parliamentary law established one Tuesday a month as a day of "recreation and relaxation," but it did not take long for this ruling to fall into abeyance. The crown's revision and enforcement of moderate Sunday codes irked Puritans and other reformers on both sides of the Atlantic. Thus, many treatises about the Sunday-Sabbath were penned and published, including Nicolas Bownde's The Doctrine of the Sabbath (1595), Gilbert Ironside's Seven Questions of the Sabbath (1637), Thomas Shepard's Theses Sabbaticae (1649), and William Pynchon's Holy Time, or, the True Limits of the Lords Day (1654). The Restoration by no means resolved the debates over the meanings and obligations of Sunday. However, fierce theological parries diminished in power and frequency, the rationalization of the yearly calendar continued its course, Sunday observance was firmly understood as a matter for both religious and civil law, and many parties in the divided English church cherished Sunday as a day of rest and worship.

Sabbatarianism in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

So it is out of the collapse of medieval Europe's variegated and elaborate calendar that pressures on and hopes for Sunday coalesced. In eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Britain and North America, Sunday was the safety valve for many communities during a time when work days extended beyond twelve hours and religious duties remained rigorous. An array of expectations and disappointments split the large numbers of Christians, both Protestant and Catholic, who treated Sunday as the day of rest, and out of these hopes and frustrations arose a number of Sabbatarian organizations and leaders who tried to mold Sunday into their ideal of the Sabbath. These ideals changed over time, of course, such that early Sabbatarians condemned all reading but that of the BIBLE, whereas later ones actively worked in support of opening on Sundays libraries stocked with a full range of secular works. Sabbatarian goals and issues were defined far more deeply by contemporary understandings of the meaning and nature of rest than by beliefs about worship, the sacred, and biblical injunction. By charting the history of the meaning of rest, one can predict with a fair degree of surety the contours of the Sabbatarian crusade in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

It is no surprise then that the great Sabbatarian crusades began in both the United States and Great Britain at the beginning of the nineteenth century, gained momentum at mid-century, and spread to the Continent before the turn of the twentieth century. This was the age when industrial rhythms of work and rest permeated the countryside as well as the city, with railroads, telegraphs, and electricity remaking all aspects of everyday life. Societies to suppress Sunday trading, established in London in 1809 and 1810, inaugurated the practices of publishing and distributing Sabbatarian tracts and pamphlets. At about the same time in the United States a nationwide controversy over the transportation and distribution of mails erupted, eventually giving rise to the first American Sabbatarian organization, the General Union for Promoting the Observance of the Christian Sabbath (1828). In addition to publishing tracts, this organization took the novel step of petitioning the federal congress and senate in favor of a strict Sunday law prohibiting the distribution and transportation of mails. (This law was not passed until 1913.) Across the Atlantic the newly formed and long-lived Lord's Day Observance Society (1831) sounded the alarm that the nation faced immediate ruin if its people continued to desecrate Sunday. Although its successes were few, and the General Union failed in its campaign and disbanded, their formation heralded a century of Sabbatarian activity on the local, national, and international levels.

In both the United States and England, Sabbatarian organizations formed through the 1840s and 1850s with the intention of preventing the running of trains on Sundays, the sale of goods, and sundry other activities that characterized market economies and cultures. In 1843 American-born TEMPERANCE activist Justin Edwards founded the American and Foreign Sabbath Union, an umbrella organization for a variety of Sabbatarian groups and causes. Members and leaders of Sabbatarian organizations tended toward ORTHODOXY and conservatism, but came out of the great variety of Protestant denominations. In the 1850s the old question of Sunday amusements again became chief among Sabbatarian concerns. In Britain controversy about opening the Crystal Palace on Sunday afternoons caused a deluge of pamphlets, tracts, and editorials on the question, which only prepared the public for the widespread protests against a bill limiting the Sunday hours of public houses and another bill restraining Sunday trade. One witness to the demonstrations in Hyde Park during the summer of 1855, Karl Marx, was convinced that the English revolution had finally begun. Later that year a bill proposing the opening of the British Museum on Sunday afternoon to provide uplifting entertainment divided the nation. Robert Morrell, a member of England's Radical Party, formed the National Sunday League (1855) in favor of Sunday opening. Two years later opponents countered by forming the National Lord's Day Rest Association (1857), which recruited members from the working classes and dissenting churches (see DISSENT). At the end of the tumultuous decade John Stuart Mill attacked Sabbatarianism in his laissez-faire statement of political philosophy, On Liberty.

Although the 1850s was not as active a decade for American Sabbatarians as for those in Britain, in 1857 the influential New York Sabbath Committee (NYSC) formed in reaction to the "Continental Sabbath" activities—beer drinking, concert going, ex-cursion taking—of the large numbers of German and Irish immigrants. As in Britain, recreation, amusements, and, above all, drinking, were at the heart of the controversy. With the outbreak of the CIVIL WAR, the NYSC lobbied President ABRAHAM LINCOLN and Union general George McClelland, urging them to ensure Sabbath observance among the troops. Troops, trains, and supplies moved on many Sundays during the Civil War, and some of the bloodiest battles were also fought on that day, despite Sabbatarian pleas for restraint. For the most part Sabbatarians were quiet during the 1860s and 1870s. Their twin successes in keeping the Boston Public Library and the 1876 World's Fair in Philadelphia closed on Sundays were temporary. By 1893 the Chicago World's Fair, along with nearly all public libraries, art museums, and public parks in the United States and Great Britain, were open Sundays.

During the last quarter of the nineteenth century, Sabbatarians formed hundreds of organizations, including the National Sunday League (England), the American Sabbath Association (United States), and the Lord's Day Alliance (United States). Led by career reformers and ministers like Londoner Frederick Peake, Canadian J.G.Sherarer, and Americans Wilbur F.Crafts, William Wallace Atterbury, Alexander Jackson, and Martin D.Kneeland, these groups mostly campaigned against Sunday opening and worked to have their convictions written into civil law. On the local level Sabbatarian laws proliferated, but as the economy became more and more diversified, so did the laws legislating what could and could not be done Sunday. In the 1890s more than thirteen million Americans petitioned the United States Senate to pass a federal Sunday law enjoining it as a day of worship and rest. NATURAL LAW, historic precedent, and biblical mandate were all invoked in support. Sabbatarianism was one of the leading topics of the time, and sermons, pamphlets, editorials, short stories, and tracts concerning Sunday observance were widespread and frequent. Despite the widespread disagreement over the particulars, consensus was that Sunday was and should remain the day of rest.

During this same period the first Sabbatarian organizations began to form in Continental Europe, but unlike their Anglo-American brethren, these associations were animated by concern over Sunday work. Between 1876 and 1915 a series of international congresses on Sunday rest were held, usually in conjunction with world's fairs. The proceedings of these conferences highlight the tremendous variety, and at times conflict, within Sabbatarianism. Biblical injunctions against Sunday amusement and recreation animated the more conservative Anglo-American Sabbatarians. A broad and liberal interpretation of Mark 2:27 ("The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath") characterized the more heterodox Sabbatarians. A concern with the conditions of working people motivated the nonreligious Sabbatarians, many of whom were Continental Europeans. By the twentieth century many European countries had passed labor legislation limiting the hours and days of work, and in these places Sabbatarianism all but disappeared. In the United States and England, too, Sabbatarianism as a movement slowly disappeared. Controversies over the popularity of concerts, motion pictures, spectator sports, and automobile driving on Sundays continued through the 1930s. Sabbatarianism lived on in the courts, as men and women were occasionally prosecuted for violating a Sunday law. In one case that went to the United States Supreme Court in 1961, McGowan v. Maryland, the justices decided that although Sunday laws may have had religious origins, they had been sufficiently secularized so as not to violate the constitutional guarantee of a separation between CHURCH AND STATE. Nevertheless, in the 1970s and 1980s Sunday laws were widely repealed.

The inability, and at times refusal, of Sabbatarians to address the most significant and widespread form of "Sabbath breaking"—work—compromised the movement's success. Throughout the nineteenth century Sabbatarians agitated for Sunday closing of cultural and recreational sites, but at the same time trains set and followed Sunday schedules, factories ran continuously, and even in homes domestic laborers ran to and fro preparing large dinners and sewing buttons on church pants. This hypocrisy was glaringly obvious to many contemporaries, who sought to fashion movements of their own against Sunday work or in favor of healthful and uplifting activities on Sundays for those who worked tirelessly through the week. However, because those who gladly took the name "Sabbatarian" were on the one hand committed to preventing all amusements, excursions, and diversions from tainting Sunday, and on the other hand turned a blind eye to the steam and smoke pouring forth from factories, some of which they owned, the movement for a Sunday-Sabbath was doomed. To be sure, Sunday is the day of worship for most Protestants, but the aspirations and ideals of the earliest Sabbatarians have been lost in the tides of industrialism and commercialism. So the legacy of Sabbatarianism is mixed: in more conservative congregations a strict regard for Sunday as the Sabbath holds sway, but most Protestant Sundays are similar in their essentials to pre-Reformation Sundays—a little church, a little revelry or sport, and some shopping.

References and Further Reading

- Ball, Bryan W. The Seventh-day Men: Sabbatarians and Sabbatarianism in England and Wales, 1600–1800. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1994.
- Dennison, James T. The Market Day of the Soul: The Puritan Doctrine of the Sabbath in England, 1532–1700. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983.
- Hill, Christopher. “The Uses of Sabbatarianism.” In Society and Puritanism in Pre-Revolutionary England. New York: Schocken Books, 1964.
- Katz, David S. Sabbath and Sectarianism in Seventeenth-Century England. New York: E.J.Brill, 1988.
- McCrosen, Alexis. Holy Day, Holiday: The American Sunday. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2000.
- McMillan, Duncan, ed. Sunday, the World’s Rest Day. New York: Doubleday, Page, and Co., 1916.
- Parker, Kenneth L. The English Sabbath: A Study of Doctrine and Discipline from the Reformation to the Civil War. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Solberg, Winton. Redeem the Time: The Puritan Sabbath in Early America. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1977.
- Wigley, John. The Rise and Fall of the Victorian Sunday. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press, 1980.

ALEXIS MCCROSSEN

SACRAMENTS

A sacrament (from the Latin sacramentum) is defined in Protestantism as visible sign of an inward GRACE. Traditionally sacraments denote those rites which the church understands to be “means of grace” for the recipient. Protestant churches have recognized two such rites, both of which are explicitly ordained by Christ in the New Testament: BAPTISM and the LORD’S SUPPER (or Eucharist or Holy Communion). In this, they rejected the Catholic affirmation of seven sacraments, insisting that a sacrament required the specific institution by Jesus and the promise of the conveyance of grace. Protestant churches affirming the former, but not the latter, prefer the term “ordinance.”

Seeking to correct a perceived overemphasis on the externality of sacramental performance in the medieval Catholic church, the reformers of the sixteenth century stressed the FAITH of the believer as a prerequisite for sacramental efficacy. Thus the Protestant doctrine of the sacraments came to be regarded as a corollary of the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by faith alone. While MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN retained the sacraments as a visible means of grace, and continued to emphasize the ecclesial significance of their outward practice, they placed preeminent importance on the sacraments’ role in the strengthening of the faith of the believer. HULDRYCH ZWINGLI sought to redefine a “sacrament” as an “oath” between the believer and God, and as a public demonstration of the believer’s allegiance to the church.

The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries with their stress on interior faith had several lasting effects on Protestant sacramental practice, ranging from significant changes (such as the shift from infant to adult believer’s baptism by the BAPTISTS) to a moderation of the ceremonious aspects of sacramental worship (PURITANISM and PIETISM). In some cases, the result was the elimination of sacramental ceremony from the liturgical order altogether (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF). While some countercurrent sacramental movements arose within Protestantism, such as the largely communal practices of early METHODISM, and although the aesthetic concerns of ROMANTICISM provided a catalyst for the renewal of ceremony in Protestantism, the individual notion of sacramental WORSHIP remained pervasive through the nineteenth century.

The ecumenical movement of the twentieth century restored the importance of the communal church to Protestant sacramental worship. United by the perceived common mission of all Christians in the world, churches (both Protestant and Catholic) witnessed remarkable convergence in their understanding and use of the sacraments, especially as attested to in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES report on Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry. These developments have done much to address the practical concerns of sacramental worship, but doctrinal divergences, both within Protestantism and between Protestants and Catholics, remain points of serious contention. This is due in large part to the fact that questions of practice have not as readily led Protestant theologians to propose the sacraments themselves as doctrinal loci. Where such work has occurred, the way forward appears to depend on the extent to which the role that the sacraments played in constituting the liturgical life of the church in the early REFORMATION could be recovered today.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Ecumenism

References and Further Reading

Gerrish, Brian. Grace and Gratitude: The Eucharistic Theology of John Calvin. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1993.

Thurian, Max, ed. Ecumenical Perspectives on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry. Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 1983.

White, James F. The Sacraments in Protestant Practice and Faith. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1999.

NATHAN R.KERR

SAINTS

The figure of the saint is found in all world religions. Saints embody ideals of personal transformation, or holiness, which is common to all religious traditions. However, the meaning of holiness, the functions of saints, and forms by which saints are recognized and honored vary among and within religions. In all religious traditions, however, the recognition of saints is narratively constructed; that is, individuals are identified as saints through the stories told of them, for imitation and celebration, by communities of faith. Although the Protestant reformers rejected the medieval Christian cult of the saints, especially their veneration and their role as intercessors with God, the churches of the REFORMATION continue to emphasize the Christian call to holiness. Moreover, reverence for and even devotion to certain saints of the pre-Reformation church persists, most notably in ANGLICANISM. Distinctions must be made, therefore, between the veneration of saints and their intercession, as found in the Roman Catholic and Orthodox traditions (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN), and the memorializing of certain martyrs and champions of faith, which is manifest in various Protestant traditions.

Saints in World Religions

Outside of Christianity, where official sainthood is conferred posthumously in the Roman Catholic and Orthodox traditions, veneration of saints includes both the living and the dead. Buddhists venerate their arahants, their bodhisattvas. Hindus revere a wide range of divinely human and humanly divine figures, including their personal gurus or spiritual teachers. Muslims acknowledge various alwailya Allah (close friends of God) and assorted Sufi masters. Even in JUDAISM, which discourages the veneration of individuals, one can find popular devotion to the Biblical prophets, particularly Moses and Elijah, to assorted Jewish martyrs, and to beloved rabbis and other tsaddikim (just men), primarily among the Hasidim.

However, if the saint is a familiar figure in world religions, the meaning of sainthood and the functions of the saint differ according to traditions. Although all saints inspire admiration, some are considered so extreme in behavior, or so extraordinary in their manifestation of holiness, as to be inimitable. On the other hand, whereas not everyone is a saint, in most traditions the expectation is that all should aspire to holiness. Thus, in every tradition there are various schools of spirituality that have as their goal the achievement of holiness, variously understood, which constitutes sainthood.

Functionally a saint is an exemplar of holiness. In their capacity as paradigms, saints embody the mode of personal transformation that every religion puts forward as the goal of human existence. Thus the Hindu saint is one who realizes in his own life the divinity of the Self; that is, the realization that within him or her is the Atman that is identical with the Brahman. The Buddhist saint is one who realizes the emptiness of self and true compassion. In monotheistic traditions, God alone is holy. Yet saints are said to achieve a kind of holiness of their own through Divine GRACE, usually manifest through PRAYER, exceptional virtue, austerities, and other spiritual disciplines. Typically, saints are seen as charismatic figures. In all traditions saints work miracles; in Hinduism and Buddhism, miracles are regarded as supernormal powers that the saint acquires in the course of attaining progressively higher levels of spiritual liberation from the attachments of normal human existence. In the monotheistic religions, miracles ascribed to the saints are generally regarded as the work of the Holy Spirit acting through the agency of the saint. There is also in each tradition an intimate connection between personal holiness or transformation and the power to work miracles. In classic rabbinic Judaism, for example, the goal of every Jew is not simply to study the Torah but to “become” the Torah. Thus in the Talmudic literature we find exceptional sages whose holiness also included the power to work miracles. In certain Hasidic traditions the rebbe is regarded as a figure whose soul is rooted in God; in this capacity, he functions as a mediator between God and the members of his Hasidic circle. In Islam sainthood is mostly identified with Sufi mysticism; that is, miracles are attributed to those who have drawn close to Allah through mystical practices.

In sum we can say that in all traditions, a saint is someone who has been transformed, who is often credited with working miracles as the sign of that transformation, and who embodies to an exceptional degree the holiness or spiritual liberation that is held out as the perfection of human existence. It is not surprising, therefore, that saints (as charismatic figures) are often in tension with the protectors of ORTHODOXY. This has been particularly evident in the history of Christianity, Judaism, and Islam. At the same time, saints are also figures whose appeal bridges the gap that often exists between popular religion and religion’s intellectual elites.

Saints in Christianity

From a sociological perspective a saint is anyone who is recognized as such by others. The Christian cult of the saints, therefore, began as a process of recognizing certain individuals who have conformed their lives to Christ in an extraordinary manner. Theologically speaking, a Christian cannot be a Christ in the way a Buddhist, for example, can become a Buddha. However, through the power of the Holy Spirit, a Christian’s life can be transformed—a “new creation,” as the Apostle Paul declared—so that Christ can be recognized through the members of His body.

For the early Christians what mattered most about Christ was his DEATH and resurrection. Therefore, those who were martyred for Christ were those whose witness (in Greek, martyrs means “witness”) was considered complete. Although the first Christians referred to all baptized believers as saints (in Greek, hagioi), before the first century was out the term was reserved for MARTYRS: just as BAPTISM signified incorporation into the body of Christ, so martyrdom signified a dying with Christ and a rising again into the fullness of everlasting life.

All this is evident from the story of the protomartyr in the Book of Acts. There we see that the story of Stephen's arrest, testimony to Christ, his forgiveness of his enemies, and his death replicates the passion and death of Jesus. Here we have the first example of what was to become a tradition: to be recognized as a saint was to have one's death remembered and told as the story of Jesus all over again. Put differently, the only way the Christian community was able to recognize Stephen as a saint was to see in him the story of Jesus. To this day, in fact, wherever saints are formally canonized or informally recognized by a community of Christians, that recognition takes the form of constructing the saint's story so that it reveals—in new and individual ways—the transformation that occurs in those who allow Christ to live in them.

The martyr, then, was the first model for the Christian saint, and martyrdom remains the privileged form of sainthood to this day, although other models were soon added. One of the earliest was the confessor—individuals who confessed their willingness to die for Christ but whose lives, for various reasons, were spared. Once Christianity became the religion of the Roman Empire, anchorites and hermits who fled to the desert wastes of Syria and Egypt were shown the deference usually accorded to martyrs. Just as the martyrs were purified by their suffering and death, so, it was thought, these ascetics were purified by the rigors of their self-denial—and by the temptations of Satan (see DEVIL). Thus to the “red martyrdom” of those who shed their blood was added the “white martyrdom” of the ascetics.

The cult of the saints developed out of the cult of the martyrs. Their stories were recited as examples to the faithful. Their feast days were celebrated not on the day of their birth, but on their dies natalis, the day of their rebirth into everlasting glory. Because Christians believed in the resurrection of the body, saints' bones were preserved as relics. Altars were built over their tombs, which later became places of pilgrimage. Moreover, because the martyrs were with God in heaven, they could, it was believed, intercede with God on behalf of the faithful still on earth (see HEAVEN AND HELL). Believing as they did in the “communion of saints,” Christians prayed to those in heaven for help, protection, cures, and other favors. In this way miracles attributed to the saints while they were alive were extended to include those that they could work posthumously through their relics. As historian Peter Brown has observed, the cult or veneration Christians gave to their martyrs challenged the “accepted boundaries” in the Greco-Roman world between the realm and role of the living and the realm and role of the dead.

In later centuries the list of recognized saints came to include missionaries and bishops and other nonmartyrs who were considered holy for the way they lived. It also came to include biblical figures like John the Baptist and Anne, the mother of Mary, as well as figures of legend like Christopher “the Christ-bearer” and even nonhuman figures like the archangel Michael. In short, the cult of the saints brought the dead to life, breathed life into legend, and provided every community of Christians with their own heavenly patrons.

Seeing that the cult of the saints was rivaling the worship of Christ, several early church fathers took pains to distinguish between the veneration (latría) accorded to saints and the worship (dulia) reserved for God alone, although this abstract distinction had little practical effect.

Canonization: The Transformation of Lives into Texts

To “canonize” means to place a name in a canon or list of saints. The earliest lists were “martyrologies” or lists of local martyrs. Gradually these lists were expanded to include local calendars with the names and burial places of the saints. Whatever else it was, the veneration of the saints was a liturgical act: on their feast days, their stories were read out for the community. In a few cases, like the martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicitas, the local churches possessed the Roman notary’s actual transcript of the dialogue between the magistrate and the accused. More often, these dialogues were apocryphal texts composed by the community, to which were attached libelli or stories of the miracles ascribed to the saint as further proof of Divine approbation. In some cases, these texts became full-blown hagiographic biographies like the hugely popular Life of St. Martin of Tours. By the fifth century, therefore, all the key elements existed that would eventually be codified in the formal canonization procedures of the Catholic church. Saints were identified as such by their reputations for holiness among the people; by their stories and legends into which their lives were transmuted as exemplars of heroic Christian virtue; and by their reputation for producing miracles, especially those worked posthumously at shrines containing their relics. On this last point, the fourth-century discovery of the relics of the proto-martyr Stephen played an important role. After collecting stories of the miracles produced by the relics, Augustine proclaimed them proof of the resurrection of the body—and divine confirmation that saints are truly with God in heaven and therefore worthy of veneration. Luxuriant in its growth, the cult of the saints took on a life of its own. Detached from the body and separate from the tomb, relics assumed a thaumaturgic power that confirmed the triumph of the concept of the saint as source of miraculous power over the saint as an example of the imitation of Christ. Clearly some form of quality control was required lest Christianity become a Hinduism of the West.

Initially saints were recognized by popular acclamation of the local Christian community. In the early Middle Ages, however, bishops began to assume control over the cult of the saints. In the first phase residential bishops required petitioners to prove a saint’s reputation for holiness by providing them with written accounts (called vitae) of the saint’s life and virtues, together with accounts of miracles he or she performed. Later the bishops demanded to hear from eyewitnesses to these events. Still later tribunals were established to investigate the lives and miracles claimed on behalf of candidates for sainthood. Eventually, as the institution of the papacy developed, the authority to investigate lives and to canonize those found worthy passed into the hands of the pope and his curia. One result is the process of canonizing saints became more fastidious and—more bureaucratic. Another is that the number of officially recognized saints radically declined. Today the Roman Catholic Church regards as official only those saints canonized since 1234, when Pope Gregory XI published his Decretals (in which he asserted the papacy’s universal jurisdiction over the canonization process), although the church regards as valid the cult of many saints recognized before this date.

Even so, throughout the later Middle Ages many local bishops resisted handing over canonization to Rome, and on the popular level, Christian communities continued to recognize and venerate their own local patron saints. As Andre Vouchez has shown, the popular interest in saints focused on their miracles and especially their power to answer prayers, whereas the church's elites were interested in recognizing only those who manifest exemplary virtue. Either way, the saint was perceived as someone whose life was far beyond the capabilities of all but a few Christians. Nevertheless humble sinners could take hope: the perfect few, the church taught, had produced a "treasury" of vicarious "merits" that the church could dispense through indulgences practiced by the masses. It was this spiritual economy that was effectively challenged by MARTIN LUTHER. In the name of a purer Gospel he would reject both the spiritual athletes put forward by Rome and the panoply of wonder-working patron saints invoked by the common believer.

The Reformation

Luther was hardly the first to question the cult of the saints. Medieval figures and movements, such as the Cathars and Waldensians, vigorously denied the intercession of the saints. However, Luther's criticisms carried a personal edge. He had become a monk in part because he had promised St. Anne that he would do so if she saved him from a thunderstorm. As a monk he gave himself over to the penances and ascetic disciplines exemplified by many of the saints, hoping thereby to merit saving grace, although these practices only intensified his sense of personal SIN and never gave him the certainty of personal SALVATION that he sought. Thus, having found devotion to the saints useless in his own life, he rejected them in the Reformed practices he laid down for others.

The immediate object of Luther's criticism was the system and its cash nexus whereby the papacy conferred indulgences for sins in return for payment, although it was his mature theological convictions that caused him to reject the cult of the saints. Because salvation is through personal faith alone, no one—not even the saints—can merit salvation through his/her own good works, much less assign that merit to others. Because Luther could find no support in scripture for invoking the saints, he rejected their veneration, mediation, and supplication for favors as pagan practices. God alone, he insisted, is deserving of a Christian's worship and devotion. Luther did retain belief in "the communion of saints," but by that he meant the mutual edification and support that all true Christians ought to give each other. Because Luther believed that even Christians justified by faith remain sinners, he rejected the notion that grace might bring a believer to the perfection of a saint.

HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, JOHN CALVIN, and the other leaders of the Protestant Reformation, none of whom had been monks like Luther, were even firmer—and terser—in rejecting the cult of the saints as unscriptural. Thus, wherever the Reformation churches took root in continental Europe, saints, their cults, their statues, and their stories gradually disappeared. Since the Reformation, the cult of the saints has largely disappeared from Protestant Christianity, although even among conservative Evangelicals special reverence is attached to the prophets of the Old Testament and the apostles of the New. Something like the cult of the saints continues among Anglicans and Lutherans, who maintain feast days and calendars of saints (see LUTHERANISM). Thus, besides acknowledging biblical and later classic figures as saints, Lutherans from time to time recommend new, more contemporary names (for example, DIETRICH BONHOEFFER and Dag Hamarskjold, are recent additions) for special thanksgiving and remembrance by the faithful. Formal theological conversations between Roman Catholics and various Protestant churches in the late twentieth century suggest that the role and function of saints represent a permanent difference in religious imagination, but not a barrier to ecumenical reconciliation. This optimistic view, however, was somewhat chastened by the offer of indulgences by Pope John Paul II during the Roman Catholic Church's celebration of Jubilee year 2000, which expressed the important role saints play in the Catholic understanding of the economy of salvation.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Athanasius. "The Life of Antony and the Letter to Marcellinus." In The Classics of Western Spirituality. New York: Paulist Press, 1980.
- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion. Edited by John T. McNeil. Translated and indexed by Ford Lewis Battles. vol. XXI, 878–887. The Library of Christian Classics. Philadelphia, PA: The Westminster Press, 1960.
- Zwingli, Huldrych. Commentary on True and False Religion. Edited by Samuel Maculey Jackson and Clarence Nevin Heller. Durham, NC: The Labyrinth Press, 1981.
- St. Augustine. City of God. Translated by Henry Bettenson, 1033–1049. New York: Penguin Classics, 1985.

Secondary Sources:

- Brown, Peter. The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.
- . The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Holy Feast, Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Delehaye, Hippolyte, S.J. The Legends of the Saints. New York: Fordham University Press, 1962.
- Delooz, Pierre. Sociologie et canonizations. Liège, Belgium: Faculté de Droit, 1969.
- Duffy, Eamon. The Stripping of the Altars: Traditional Religion in England 1400–1580. New Haven, CT: The Yale University Press, 1992.
- Geary, Patrick J. Furta Sacra: The Theft of Relics in the Middle Ages. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1978.
- Hawley, John Stratton, ed. Saints and Virtues. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Heffernan, Thomas J. Sacred Biography: Saints and Their Biographers in the Middle Ages. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Huizinga, J. The Waning of the Middle Ages: A Study of the Forms of Life, Thought and Art in France and the Netherlands in the Dawn of the Renaissance. Garden City, NY: Doubleday Anchor, 1954.
- Kieckhefer, Richard, and George E. Bond, eds. Sainthood: Its Manifestations in World Religions. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.

- Raitt, Jill, ed. Christian Spirituality: High Middle Ages and Reformation. New York: Crossroad, 1987.
- Reames, Sherry L. The Legenda Aurea: A Reexamination of Its Paradoxical History. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1085.
- Vouchez, Andre. La Sainteté en Occident aux derniers siècles du moyen age, d'après les croces de canonization et les documents hagiographiques. Rome: Ecole Française de Rome, 1981.
- Ward, Benedicta. Miracles and the Medieval Mind. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1987.
- Wilson, Stephen, ed. Saints and Their Cults: Studies in Religious Sociology, Folklore and History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Woodward, Kenneth L. Making Saints: How the Catholic Church Determines Who Becomes a Saint, Who Doesn't and Why. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1990.
- . The Book of Miracles: The Meaning of the Miracle Stories in Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism, Islam. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2000.

KENNETH WOODWARD

SALT, TITUS (1803–1876)

English businessman. In mid-Victorian Britain, Titus Salt was much admired as the paragon of the virtuous, Christian capitalist who both cared for his workers and sought to reduce class tensions. It was for this reputation he was made a baronet in 1869.

Born at Morley in Yorkshire September 20, 1803, his parents raised him in the region's Independent dissenting tradition (see DISSENT). His father, Daniel Salt, was a farmer and wool merchant who relocated to the town of Bradford, Yorkshire, in 1822. After an apprenticeship in the wool trade, Titus joined the family firm, and by the mid-1830s had established himself as an owner of wool textile mills. He pioneered the production of blended, especially alpaca, wool fabrics, benefited from the mechanization and expansion of Bradford's textile industry, and so accumulated a large personal fortune.

He was a civic-minded man of liberal, reformist opinions who supported the extension of the franchise to working men but opposed factory legislation limiting hours of work. Although a poor public speaker he served as Mayor of Bradford (1848–1849), president of its chamber of commerce (1855–1856), and its member of Parliament (1859–1861). He was a life-long, devout supporter of the Congregational Church (see CONGREGATIONALISM), which he generously patronized with large donations. He also helped other denominations and steadfastly declined to support anti-Catholic organizations (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS).

Salt's great legacy was his planned industrial community of Saltaire near Bradford, which opened in 1853 and was under construction until 1872. Its large mill employed 3,000 people and the model town was provided with superior housing, churches, educational institutes, and recreational facilities. To both British and foreign dignitaries who toured the site, Saltaire was an exceptionally advanced urban environment for its time.

Titus Salt, who died December 29, 1876, is now seen as an exemplar of the paternalist employer whose career demonstrated for many Victorians that capitalism could be consistent with Christian virtue. He left little in the way of letters, personal papers, or writings that reveal his inner thoughts. Instead his permanent bequest to posterity is Saltaire, which has become a UNESCO world heritage site.

References and Further Reading

Reynolds, Jack. The Great Paternalist: Titus Salt and the Growth of Nineteenth-Century Bradford. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1983.

FRED DONNELLY

SALVATION

The term salvation corresponds, via the Latin salus, to the Greek soteria, which suggests both physical and spiritual wholeness. It is with the latter that Christians most often associate “salvation.” Salvation refers to God’s restoration of the world to the life appointed for it through the life, death, and resurrection of Christ. The precise nature of this restoration and its benefits—the subject of the discipline of soteriology—is construed in various ways throughout the history of Christian theology, and this variation is an irreducible part of the idea of salvation. That is, no “neutral” or “official” soteriology exists to which various expressions are given (see CHRISTOLOGY, which does have an orthodox formulation). Rather, the variety in formulations of the human problem with which God is concerned, the way in which that problem is addressed, and the manner in which human beings appropriate the divine assistance is intrinsic to the doctrine and reflects the several Christian renderings of salvation in the New Testament and in its Hebraic and Greek backgrounds. The discipline of soteriology is a close relative to theological and moral anthropology, and the notion of salvation is a close companion to those of HEAVEN AND HELL, GRACE, and ATONEMENT.

Salvation in the New Testament

Early Christian views of salvation developed against the background of Jewish and Hellenistic thought. The Jewish commitment to the observance of the law as participation in the life-giving covenant with God envisioned right relation to God as the primary end of humanity. The Greek mystery religions contemporaneous with early Christianity aimed at participation in the divine life of the gods, usually through ritual initiation practices. Not a few of the gods associated with these practices were given titles that included the term soter (savior). Christian views of salvation were direct descendants of neither of these approaches but were affected by both, as well as by the forms of thinking labeled (somewhat erroneously) as “gnosticism,” which tended on the whole to devalue the body. New Testament notions of salvation reflect the classical moral anthropology found in Plato, Aristotle, and others in which the soul, rather than the body, is fundamental to human identity. At the same time, lying somewhat uneasily alongside this classical model is a more Hebraic reverence for the body and a confidence that salvation will somehow involve the body as well as the soul; thus, the Gospel accounts of Jesus’s resurrection as a glorified state inclusive of some form of physical presence, and Paul’s account of the resurrection of the saints in which their bodies, too, will rise.

There are several lines of thinking about Christian salvation in the New Testament, none mutually exclusive. In various texts, salvation is seen as deliverance from coming judgment, forgiveness of SIN, the remedy of ignorance, release from captivity to the powers of this world, the gift of immortality, or the intrinsic blessing of the just life. Arguably four models of salvation emerge as the most prominent and well-formed among these ideas. The earliest is probably the identification of salvation with “the day of the Lord” in which the just will be rewarded and those who have been wronged will be vindicated. Salvation on this model is awaited as a future event. It is especially visible in the early writings of Paul and is rooted, at least in part, in Jewish apocalyptic thinking. In this model the shape of the salvation that is to come is manifested in Jesus Christ.

Alongside this future-oriented model of salvation is the idea of atonement for past sins. Also rooted in Jewish practice, the precision that we associate with this idea awaits later theological developments. In the New Testament the death of Christ simply brings the forgiveness of sins in which the church participates by forgiving others as Christ did in his ministry, taught in the Lord’s prayer, and modeled on the cross. Salvation as atonement draws vigorously on the Hebraic sacrificial system and on the Isaian imagery of the suffering servant found in the gospel of Luke.

Salvation is also seen in the New Testament as deliverance from DEATH. Although mortal life may be subject to extinction, the life that is given through Jesus will not be extinguished—a life that, in the gospel of John, begins in the present time and survives our physical demise. In the epistles the victory of Jesus over death is frequently depicted in battle imagery, in which Satan or the ruler of this world is vanquished by Jesus’s incarnation and passion. It is this model of salvation that will capture the imagination of such later theologians as Athanasius and Gregory of Nyssa; Gregory did not shy from describing salvation as a victory achieved by a divine deception in which the life of humanity is ransomed from the DEVIL.

A fourth prominent model of salvation in the New Testament is the flourishing that comes from a personal relationship with God. Through Jesus, the way is opened for a return to COVENANT (alternatively, a new covenant) with God, whose Spirit is poured out on those who believe and from whom one is no longer separated by sin. This model focuses not so much on salvation from the conditions of existence (e.g., mortality) as salvation within them.

Development of the Second through Fourth Centuries

New Testament models of salvation combined and recombined in the theology of early church writers, often existing in tension within the thought of a single writer. Many worked within the classical Greek moral anthropology in which the soul is composed of reason, will, and the appetites: reason, rightly oriented, provides will its object of the good while ordering and chastening the appetites accordingly. For the early writers who worked within this model, salvation remedies not so much a defect in the will but a failure of knowledge. This knowledge may be moral in character, as in the Didache’s contrast of the “two ways” that lead to life or death, or it may tend toward the mystical, as in Clement of Alexandria's rendering of Christ as the true gnosis through whom "our darkened understanding springs up to the light" (I Clement 59). Justin Martyr also inclined toward the identification of right knowledge as the content of salvation: he referred strikingly to candidates for baptism as "illuminands" (Justin Martyr, First Apology, 61).

Whereas Justin, Clement, and others focused on the intellectual defect of the human person, other models of salvation continued to thrive in the second century as well. The Epistle of Barnabas, written around the turn of the second century, lauds the deliverance of Christ's flesh to corruption so "that we should be sanctified by the remission of sin, that is, by his sprinkled blood" (Ep. Barnabas, 5.1). Ignatius of Antioch, in his Letter to the Ephesians, referred to the Eucharist as the "medicine of immortality," connecting the SACRAMENTS and work of Christ through the notion of salvation from mortality and death. Gregory of Nyssa, writing two centuries later, offered a similar interpretation of the Eucharist in its connection to salvation.

It is in the context of this theological diversity that one must evaluate the claim of the Swedish Lutheran Gustav Aulén that the soteriology of the early church was mainly a ransom theory of atonement aimed at deliverance of humanity from death. Aulén's classic study, published in English as Christus Victor in 1931, overstates the predominance of this theory as a coherent system of thought, but accurately points to an important fourth-century trend. The ransom theory reckons humanity in debt to Satan as a result of the fall; through Christ, God deceives the devil by concealing divinity under the form of flesh and "catches" the devil as a fish is caught on a hook. Thus, humanity is released from the power of death. This version of the ransom theory is that of Gregory of Nyssa, although the idea originated with Origen. It is not without soteriological alternatives, even in the fourth century. Gregory of Nazianzus, although accepting immortality as the primary benefit of salvation, rejected both the idea that God was compelled to pay a ransom and that God would engage in deception to achieve salvific ends. Gregory of Nazianzus held a position closer to that of Athanasius who, writing earlier in the fourth century, proposed that in death Christ is our substitute. Because the divine Son takes on humanity and dies the death that human beings merit by their fall, humanity is thus taken up by adoption into the divine life, receiving incorruption. Athanasius's position lies somewhere between the idea of salvation as the conferral of immortality and the forgiveness of sin. His notion of substitution laid the groundwork for the theory of satisfaction that, with important differences from Athanasius, would be developed in the eleventh century by Anselm of Canterbury.

Before turning to such later developments, one must take note of Augustine's writing, which gives a strong account of the role of grace in salvation. Sharing the classical moral anthropology through which earlier writers identified the illumination of reason as the focus of salvation, Augustine shifted the emphasis in thinking about salvation to the entrapment of the will. Through the Fall it is no longer possible for the human being not to sin (non posse non peccare); even if one identifies and desires the good, one is unable to choose it because the ability to will the good is fundamentally compromised by the Fall (original sin). Although Augustine seeks the illumination of the intellect, he is clear that the grace of God must liberate the will for one to choose rightly and order all goods in light of what God reveals. John Cassian, Pelagius, and others proposed a more cooperative relationship between divine grace and the human will, but the Augustinian account of the problem of the will and the paradoxical interaction of grace and human freedom would later combine with Anselm's atonement theory in the views of the major reformers.

As noted above, the doctrine of salvation is closely related to the doctrine of heaven/hell and no less variety of thinking about this doctrine existed in the early period than on the idea of atonement or grace. Augustine's own position, shaped by the pressure of conflict with Pelagius and others who felt that Augustine's strong version of grace threatened human freedom, implied a predestination of some to damnation, although he did not teach this directly. Gregory of Nyssa, on the other hand, assumed the invincibility of God's saving intent, providing a strong connection between salvation and the moral life. Offering an extremely nuanced account of the conditions under which some are able more easily to choose the good than others, Gregory suggests that salvation is ultimately intended for all, although some will enter into this blessed state more quickly than others. Ultimately all will be saved, but the morally vicious may not do so until "cleansed" by the fire of hell and judgment, which are not the emblems of the failure of salvation but are tools by which God achieves it, even beyond this life. The contrast between possible damnation and universal salvation set the two extreme ends of the spectrum in subsequent Christian soteriology, although the latter is arguably a minority position.

Medieval Developments in Christian Soteriology

The formulation of salvation in the Middle Ages turns again to the theory of the atonement, although reflection on the operation of divine grace and the role of the human moral action is never far in the background. In the context of a feudal social system Anselm shifts the focus of the fourth-century view on the debt by which human beings are bound: our obligation, as the result of the Fall, is to God, not to the devil, yet our predicament is insurmountable because in our sin and our finitude we cannot repay the infinite debt we owe. Our salvation is achieved by Christ who takes the form of sinful humanity, yet does not sin, and dies paying a debt he does not owe for those who owe the debt but cannot pay. This was necessary so that God's honor is reaffirmed and humanity is saved from payment for sin. This theory of "satisfaction" for sin is not accepted by all—Abelard offers a nontransactional moral theory of salvation whereby we are saved in our response to the death of Christ whose love inspires us to right action—but the shift in focus to a debt owed to God, rather than to the devil, predominates in subsequent theology. The position is considerably modified by Thomas Aquinas who, anxious to maintain a sense of God's freedom, suggests that this manner of salvation was not a necessary action but a gift of superlative grace because the mortal debt we owed was satisfied by an action of infinite worth. At the same time, Aquinas refashions Aristotelian moral theory as a component of his view of salvation: human beings are sinful yet God causes in them both the inclination to good and, cooperatively, the grace to develop dispositions toward virtue. Simultaneously, supernatural virtues are also infused in the soul. The grace God gives to empower the human enjoyment of God as the highest good is one that blesses human nature with a capacity beyond its natural state.

Reformation and Modern Developments

The classic reformers focused on the forgiveness of sin as the primary aim of salvation and tended, like Augustine and Paul, to identify the human will as flawed. Thus, MARTIN LUTHER proclaims that the law commands but we are unable to do anything; yet, by acceptance of grace offered in Christ, we can do all. Luther's theology of salvation fleshed out his criticism of medieval theology's excessive valuation of the human contribution to the state of blessedness. For Luther, God acts in Jesus Christ who substitutes for us as a sinner; his death is our JUSTIFICATION by divine grace, despite our sin. What actions we take toward God and the good of the neighbor are construed primarily as a response to this grace rather than as an active contribution to our salvation because nothing we do can earn salvation that is already freely given. The response we make is, as with Augustine, by virtue of the grace of God that sets the will free to act. In similar fashion JOHN CALVIN understood Christ to incur by his death the penalties of the law that were due to sinners, but combined this with a high view of the instructive use of the law, by which we are tutored in the commands of God toward right action. Consistent with this the judgment we incur for our continuing sin is, by virtue of Christ's sacrifice, no longer punitive but rehabilitative. Yet Calvin's emphasis on the sovereignty of God in acting toward humanity's salvation led him, like Augustine, to pose a doctrine of predestination that somewhat downplayed the capacities of human freedom to contribute to the enjoyment of the blessed state. All the reformers—Lutheran, Calvinist, English, and Swiss—were largely united in viewing Christ's death as a sacrifice with saving effect, to which human effort added nothing substantial; in this, the reformers both recovered the singular significance of the cross for salvation and struggled, at times, to connect salvation with the moral life (SANCTIFICATION).

The resistance once exemplified by Abelard to Anselm's view of salvation as satisfaction for sin continued to live in the REFORMATION in the new forms of SOCINIANISM and ARMINIANISM. The former, largely condemned by other reformers, was associated with two Siennese theologians, Lelio and FAUSTO SOZZINI. Socinianism denies the idea of original sin and, as a result, any sense in which the death of Christ was a satisfaction. Salvation is found, by contrast, in the response to his death as a moral example and with trust in that death as a pledge of forgiveness. Arminianism is less a rejection of a transactional view of salvation by the death of Christ, but insists that this gracious and sovereign act of God is more compatible with human freedom than allowed for by Calvin's strong sense of grace. Both Socinian and Arminian ideas still exercise some influence in modern reformed theology through the continuing influence of Unitarianism (see UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION).

The modern period has seen the modification of these classical positions in various forms. In the climate of the ENLIGHTENMENT and the scientific revolution, objective or transactional soteriologies fell out of favor for a time; preferred alternatives were versions of Abelardian exemplarism or, as in PAUL TILLICH'S fully developed version in the twentieth century, renderings of Christ as the living symbol of human capacity to transcend the stresses and anxieties of existence. However, the enormity of the human capacity for evil and our awareness of it kept the classic approach alive, in which salvation is an objective reality wrought through Christ who enacts God's freedom to unite the human to the divine (e.g., KARL BARTH). Of equal significance in the twentieth century has been the attention of biblical studies to Jesus's teaching on the basileia tou theou, the reign of God. The corresponding soteriology is eschatological: the blessed life is one lived in practical anticipation of the coming reign and conformed to it. This eschatological soteriology comes to its fullest expression in the work of JÜRGEN MOLTSMANN and in both Catholic and Protestant Liberation Theologies. Here, soteriological force is shifted to the life of Jesus, whereas his death and resurrection are a vindication of his teaching and a source of hope.

The horizons of soteriology in the twentieth century were set by a number of other critiques of the classic approaches. Feminist theologians raised productive questions about the soteriological significance of "sacrifice" that may undermine the ability of women and children to resist victimization in situations of abuse. The encounter of Christian theology with work of René Girard raised questions in a similar vein about the integral role of violence in theories of atonement. African American theologians have criticized traditional accounts of salvation for being insufficiently attentive to ethical practice. Finally the increased cross-cultural encounters between Christian theology and other religions revived attention to the internal relationships within traditions between their models of salvation and their conception of the telos of human life.

See also Feminist Theology; Liberation Theology; Theology

References and Further Reading

- Aulén, Gustav. Christus Victor. New York: Macmillan, 1931.
- Brock, Rita Nakashima, and Rebecca Ann Parker. Proverbs of Ashes: Violence, Redemptive Suffering, and the Search for What Saves Us. Boston: Beacon, 2001.
- Cone, James H. God of the Oppressed. San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1975.
- Dillistone, Frederick W. The Christian Understanding of Atonement. London: SCM, 1968.
- Dubose, William Porcher. The Soteriology of the New Testament. New York: Macmillan, 1892.
- McGrath, Alister E. Iustitia Dei: A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- McIntyre, John. The Shape of Soteriology. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1992.
- Sykes, Stephen, ed. Sacrifice and Redemption. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Weaver, J.Denny. The Nonviolent Atonement. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 2001.

JAMES W. FARWELL

SALVATION ARMY

The Salvation Army was founded in 1865 by WILLIAM (1829–1912) and CATHERINE (1829–1890) BOOTH as a mission to England's urban, working-class communities (see REVIVALS, HOLINESS MOVEMENT). It drew upon METHODISM, revivalism and holiness theologies, the women's rights movement, the emerging urban commercial culture, and the neighborhood culture of England's working class to create a distinctive religious organization. In the 1880s, its evangelizing reached into Europe, North America, and parts of the British Empire. In the 1890s, a social service wing was established that offered shelter to the homeless, programs for the unemployed, and homes for unmarried mothers. By the early twentieth century it was best known as a provider of social services, but its evangelical mission remained at the core of its work.

The Origins of the Salvation Army

The religious census of 1851 revealed that ENGLAND'S urban working class had the lowest rate of religious attendance of any social group. Christians, motivated by both compassion and fear, reacted with alarm to these statistics. Religion was associated by many with respect for the authority of the crown and government. Social commentators noted that many continental revolutionary movements attacked the church as well as the government. Working-class indifference to religion therefore posed a serious threat.

It was commonly believed that cities, with their crowding, filth, and the temptations of the public house and theaters, made urban dwellers more subject to disease and immorality than those who lived in the countryside. East London was regarded as an especially difficult neighborhood to evangelize because it was so vast and uniformly poor and it was not well served by the existing parish structure. Beginning in the 1850s, this area grew dramatically. Thousands of people moved to East London seeking work in the burgeoning industries there. It was also home to many Irish immigrants and after 1880, the majority of Jewish immigrants. Because they were neither English nor Protestant, these immigrants seemed doubly foreign. The term "heathen masses" was often used to describe these seemingly irreligious people. Anglicans and nonconformists responded by creating various agencies to bring working-class people into the churches (see ANGLICANISM; CHURCH OF ENGLAND; NON-CONFORMITY). The London City Mission, the Open Air Mission, Ranyard's Biblewomen, the Mildmay Mission, and the Metropolitan Tabernacle of CHARLES M.SPURGEON were all examples of organizations designed to bring Christianity to the urban working class with methods developed particularly for them. The Salvation Army was one part of that wider mission to the urban working class.

William Booth was particularly concerned with the state of England's "heathen masses." He felt a call to bring them into the church. He was ordained by the Methodist New Connexion in 1855 and worked as a circuit preacher and itinerant evangelist. His wife, Catherine Mumford Booth, was also a preacher. In 1859 she published a widely read pamphlet in support of female PREACHING and soon after began to preach herself. She proclaimed the "women's right" to preach the gospel and, unlike most of her contemporaries, did not believe women required a special call to preach nor did they need to cast themselves as the weak and low. She believed women's preaching was sanctioned in Scripture and was an absolute necessity given the dire state of England, and the world's, people. She preached by invitation with her husband and alone. Her unusual work gained her considerable attention and criticism, but she was not permitted to preach in many churches and chapels.

In 1861 William Booth resigned from the Methodist New Connexion because he felt its restrictions impeded his ability to do soul-saving work. For four years the Booths preached in Cornwall, Wales, the midlands, and north, finally coming to London in 1865.

The Establishment of the Christian Mission

William Booth was engaged by the editors of the evangelical weekly, The Revival, to conduct services in the East of London for three weeks in July 1865. He drew substantial crowds and with the encouragement of London evangelicals and philanthropists, William Booth agreed to continue the work. Catherine also received invitations to preach in London, and the couple determined to make the city the focus of their efforts. With the financial support of wealthy philanthropists and members of several evangelical organizations, William Booth began the East London Christian Mission, soon renamed the Christian Mission. He preached in the streets and rented halls for weeknight and Sunday services. He slowly drew a following of evangelists and volunteer workers to assist in him this work. By 1868 a London newspaper estimated that between 7,000 and 14,000 people attended the 140 weekly services. In that same year, William Booth began publishing a monthly magazine, The East London Evangelist, renamed the Christian Mission Magazine in 1870. It included reports on the mission's activities, biographies and autobiographies, and articles on religious questions. The mission continued to grow and by 1872 had twelve London stations and eight outside London.

The mission was modeled on the Methodist structure with class meetings, elders meetings, circuits, and annual conferences. William Booth was the general superintendent. Membership in the mission required active participation in both worship services and the work of running the organization. The mission's doctrines were essentially Methodist with a strong emphasis on holiness. Members were to abstain from alcohol, could not work in any aspect of the drink trade, and were to shun wasteful and cruel pastimes like betting, boxing, and animal sports.

Creating an Army

In 1879 the Christian Mission was reorganized into the Salvation Army. The committees, conferences, and voting procedures were disbanded and William Booth appointed himself general of this army, with direct control over the organization. It had grown into a dynamic, national organization with mission stations along the south coast, the midlands, the north, the northeast, and Wales. It employed 127 paid evangelists and another 700 worked part-time without salary. There is little evidence to explain the abandonment of a Methodist style of organizing and the adoption of a military style structure except the leaders' own assertion that the committees and annual conferences were too awkward, slow, and inefficient for a growing organization. The Deed Poll gave William Booth "oversight, direction and control" of the organization. He could expend all money donated and was required to publish an annual balance sheet. He was also to appoint his successor. This gave Booth greater authority over this organization than that of most Protestant leaders and some criticized him for enjoying greater powers than the pope. The name Salvation Army was adopted in 1879 and was intended to capture its aims as well as the dedication, faith, and obedience required of its members.

The Salvation Army created an organizational structure with a series of ranks and duties assigned to each. A corps was a town, or portion of a town, and it included all soldiers who lived in that area. It was run by a paid officer, usually a captain, assisted by a lieutenant, with a group of volunteers each with their own rank and duties. Corps were grouped into districts under the command of a major, and several districts formed a division under the command of a colonel. As the army moved outside Great Britain, it created territories that were a country or group of countries with a marshal in command. This structure provided a clear, unequivocal chain of command and division of responsibility. The duties and beliefs of each individual member were described in the Orders and Regulations (first published in 1878 and regularly updated) and the Doctrines and Discipline (first published in 1881). In 1880 uniforms were first introduced. The dark blue, military style uniform allowed officers and soldiers to be recognized instantly, but were criticized by some journalists and social commentators because they appeared to presume the authority and dignity of the British military. The sight of uniformed women particularly offended the army's critics.

Beginning in 1882 the Salvation Army required all soldiers to sign the Articles of War. This document listed the Army's principle beliefs and the requirements of membership. Every soldier had to promise that "Believing solemnly that The Salvation Army has been raised by God, and is sustained and directed by Him, I do here declare my full determination, by God's help, to be a true soldier of The Army until I die."

William Booth remained general of the Salvation Army until his death in 1912. His eldest son, Bramwell Booth, succeeded him. He served until 1929 when he was deposed and the Deed Poll altered to allow a council of leading officers to select a general. That system, with some modifications, has continued to the present day.

Holiness Theology

Holiness was the distinguishing feature of the movement's theology. The doctrine was the most frequently explained and advocated in Christian Mission, and later Salvation Army, publications. JOHN WESLEY (1703–1791), in A Plain Account of Christian Perfection, had stated that holiness could be attained by Christians in this life but was not required. In the 1820s and 1830s, some theologians reinterpreted this doctrine and asserted that it was the duty and privilege of all Christians to attain holiness. The Booths were fervent advocates of that position. Holiness meant that any Christian could be delivered from sin. William Booth wrote in Doctrines and Discipline (1881), “Entire sanctification supposes complete deliverance. Sin is destroyed out of the soul and all the powers, faculties, possessions, and influences of the soul are given up to the service and glory of God.” Holiness was an absolute necessity for office in the Salvation Army. Salvationists also believed it was the only assurance of heaven.

This theology meant that the usual education required for clerical office was far less important than a sanctified soul. Salvationists believed the experience of entire sanctification empowered them to do God's work far better than the performance of religious ritual or memorizing a creed. Many clergy, journalists, and social critics denounced the Salvation Army because it allowed previously dissolute men and women with none of the education or knowledge usually required of clergy to preach and even to question the work of learned clerical men.

Women's Work

This doctrine was particularly important for WOMEN. Because holiness was believed to remove sin, the burden of Eve's transgression was lessened and distinctions between men and women were diminished. It also allowed converts to justify unconventional behavior when called by the Holy Spirit. This doctrine also relied heavily on the events described in the Acts of the Apostles, where women figured prominently. The Christian Mission authorized women to preach, hold any office, and to vote at all meetings. In 1875 Annie Davis was the first woman to take charge of a mission station, which gave her authority over both spiritual and practical matters. This degree of responsibility and authority was matched in virtually no other denomination or voluntary organization at that time. The women who joined the army were predominantly working class and many had little formal education or other qualifications usually required for ministry. They learned to preach by addressing meetings, visiting homes, and speaking to people in the streets. There is evidence of some resistance within the organization to women's work; an 1875 conference resolution affirmed that the conference could not “obstruct the admission of females to any work or office in the Mission.” Some converts also recalled their initial horror at the sight of female preachers. Still, the women preachers, dubbed, “Hallelujah Lasses,” drew considerable crowds and many credited their conversion to a woman. In the early years, women’s wages were equal to men’s, but there was no set scale and wages were determined by the individual’s family circumstances and experience. By 1882, however, male captains earned twenty-one shillings per week and female captains only fifteen shillings.

Salvationists were expected to make all aspects of their lives part of an effort to evangelize the world. In 1882 the army adopted the Articles of Marriage. All Salvationists who wished to marry had to sign the document promising that “we do not seek this marriage simply to please ourselves, but that we believe it will enable us to better serve the interests of the Salvation Army.” Officers were not permitted to marry anyone who was not a member of the Salvation Army until 2000 when that particular regulation was dropped.

Until 1883 the Salvation Army offered communion. It was given monthly by the corps officers, male and female alike. This was among the first instances of women offering communion in Britain. Even denominations that allowed women to preach, such as the Methodists, still distinguished between lay ministers and ordained clergy, allowing only the latter to perform sacraments. Salvationist women who offered communion received strong criticism from clergy. The practice of communion was given up in 1883 because Salvationists feared it might be mistaken as a means to salvation. In her book, Popular Christianity (1887), Catherine Booth warned, “What an inveterate tendency there is in the human heart to trust in outward forms, instead of inward grace! And when this is the case, what a hindrance rather than help have these forms proved to the growth, nay to the very existence, of that spiritual life which constitutes the real and only force of Christian experience.” The theology that allowed women to offer communion also justified abandoning the practice. The army’s refusal to regard outward, physical distinctions between men and women as meaningful also meant that material means to receive the Holy Spirit were not deemed necessary.

In 1880 the Salvation Army instituted formal training for officers. Two training homes, one for women, one for men, were opened. Basic accounting and record keeping were taught along with theology, preaching, and singing. Women made up nearly half of all those trained prior to World War I. By 1881 the Salvation Army employed just over fifteen percent of all the women in England listed by the census as missionaries, scripture readers, and preachers.

Evangelizing

The Salvation Army created a battle plan especially suited to the urban geography and culture of working-class communities. Mass commercial culture was new; in the 1870s working-class Britons began to have enough leisure and disposable income to enjoy music halls or trips to the seaside, as well as traditional pleasures like the public house and local sporting events. Salvationists borrowed aspects of popular entertainment to draw crowds and to transform the culture they believed fostered sin. They held services in music halls, sang hymns in front of public houses, and appropriated the language and much of the style of commercial entertainment. The services were lively and audiences were encouraged to join in the hymn singing, shout out responses to the preacher, and stand and testify to their own experience of sin and salvation. The Salvation Army copied advertisements from the music halls or circuses so closely that sometimes the audience was not aware they had come to a religious service. Salvationists took popular music hall tunes and wrote new words. “Champagne Charlie” was among the most popular of the Victorian music hall songs and the Salvation Army published their own version of the song in 1882, entitled “Bless His Name He Set Me Free.” It became a popular song with Salvationists, but one Anglican clergyman complained in a church newspaper about the shocking impropriety of crowds singing sacred words to this music hall tune, voicing a concern shared by many (see MUSIC, POPULAR; HYMNS AND HYMNALS).

Salvationists wanted to draw a crowd and eagerly seized on sensational methods to attract attention. A preacher might dive off the platform, making swimming motions, to demonstrate the sea of God’s love, or tear a hymn book into shreds to show how the devil attacks sinners. They adopted special titles like the Hallelujah Fishmonger. In 1880 Eliza Haynes hung a sign around her neck saying “I am Happy Eliza” and marched through the streets of London’s Marylebone neighborhood handing out invitations to a service while playing a fiddle. Her antics got written up in the London papers, she was followed by the police, and a music hall song was written about her. These techniques, decried as sensationalism, earned the Salvation Army criticism from many other denominations. The Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review in 1883, for example, opined that the effect of the army’s activities was to make people incapable of any religious life “as they destroy the very foundation of religion in the human soul—reverence.”

Salvationists were also the focus of local, neighborhood opposition from the earliest years through the 1890s. In some locales, gangs of young men attacked Salvationists when they marched through the streets and the police arrested Salvationists for disturbing the peace. Some communities passed bylaws forbidding marches on Sunday in an effort to contain the army’s work. Eastbourne and Torquay witnessed street frays that included more than 1,000 people in the early 1890s. The army’s leaders succeeded in overturning the laws restricting their use of the streets and affirmed their right to march in the public thoroughfares.

The Salvation Army’s uniformed preachers, dramatic techniques, and energetic evangelism drew converts. The army never published regular statistics on its membership and it is difficult to assess with any certainty. In 1883 the Salvation Army had 528 corps and 1,340 officers in the United Kingdom. By 1886 that number had grown to 1,006 corps and 2,260 officers, but it is impossible to know how many people attended the services or joined the Salvation Army. In 1886 and 1902, religious censuses were conducted in London indicating that fewer than one percent of London’s population attended a Salvation Army hall on a given Sunday. But in 1902 the army accounted for eighteen percent of all nonconformist attenders in London. Some scholars have suggested the Army was more successful in provincial towns. It is difficult to make any strong claims about membership. Salvationists were, however, very successful at getting and keeping public attention, and certainly by the 1880s, they were well-known figures in working-class communities throughout the country as well as stock figures of fun in comic magazines and music halls.

International Expansion

The Salvation Army sent a group of officers to begin evangelizing in the UNITED STATES in 1880, to AUSTRALIA in 1881, and to CANADA in 1882. These largely Protestant countries were, it was hoped, fertile ground for the kind of work the army had pioneered in Britain. The army did succeed in establishing strong national organizations in these countries, which continue to the present day. In FRANCE and SWITZERLAND the army's officers were not welcomed. The Booth's eldest daughter was jailed and expelled from Switzerland in 1882; even after she obtained permission to evangelize there the Swiss were not sympathetic to these foreign evangelists. In 1882 the Salvation Army commenced work in INDIA. They focused their efforts on the non-Christian population and found some success with the lowest caste peoples. In 1883 the army began work in Cape Town, SOUTH AFRICA, by 1886 the army was active in nineteen countries with 1,932 officers at work outside Britain. Again, it is difficult to ascertain how many people attended army services or joined the movement, but the army has remained active in various countries in North and South America, Europe, AFRICA, Asia, Australia, and NEW ZEALAND up to the present day.

Social Services

In 1890 William Booth published In Darkest England and the Way Out. England's "submerged tenth," its poorest citizens, needed help. Booth likened the "cannibals and pygmies" of darkest Africa to these citizens of "Darkest England." His solution, he claimed, would be "as wide as the scheme of Eternal Salvation set forth in the Gospel.... If the scheme...is not applicable to the Thief, the Harlot, the Drunkard, and the Sluggard, it may as well be dismissed without ceremony." Existing charitable programs and state assistance helped too few and were ineffective. He proposed to establish city, farm, and overseas colonies. The city colonies would gather together the destitute, provide for their immediate needs, and commence with moral regeneration. They would then proceed to farm colonies, where they would restore their health and character. Finally they would find work either at home or in an overseas colony. In addition, Booth proposed to extend the army's already established network of shelters for the homeless and cheap food depots. Booth stated that it was his goal to bring the clothing, food, and shelter of everyone up to the standard of those provided to the London cab horse, a graphic comparison mentioned by many reviewers.

Scholars have debated why Booth proposed this scheme at this time. Historian Norman Murdoch (1939-) argues that Booth realized he had failed to reach England's very poorest and hoped that social services would attract them. Murdoch regards this program as an important departure from the army's previous work. Others, notably Jenty Fairbank, instead emphasize the continuity of the darkest England scheme with earlier programs. Fairbank notes that only three of the ten social services did not begin before 1890. In 1883 the army had, for example, opened a home for "fallen women," a category that included unmarried, pregnant women and prostitutes. Under the direction of Florence Booth, daughter-in-law of William Booth, the program grew to include 117 homes for women in Britain and overseas by 1914. It was one of the largest, and some argued, the most innovative of the rescue programs in Britain. The work extended to maternity hospitals, homes for women awaiting birth, adoption services, and programs for new mothers and infants. The stated goal of all these programs was to bring about the CONVERSION and salvation of these “fallen women.”

The army’s social services grew very quickly to include a large number of full-time officers, a publication devoted to their activities, and a strong public presence. The Salvation Army ran shelters for the homeless; distributed soup to the unemployed; provided homes for orphaned or abandoned children; established a farm colony, Hadleigh, beginning in 1891; and created a service to locate missing persons. By the time of the 1909 Royal Commission on the Poor Law, some experts who addressed the committee advocated providing state subsidies to the Salvation Army to extend its social service work with the poor. During World War I, the army offered food and shelter to refugees; setup canteens for military men, where they first introduced doughnuts to many soldiers; and provided services for those who lost their livelihoods or homes due to war. These programs were well regarded. It offered similar services during World War II. In both wars, the army offered services to all, regardless of nationality, but their programs were far more extensive in the Allied nations because of the army’s English origins and the difficulty of any religious organization operating independently under the Nazis. An enormous variety of people came into contact with the army’s services during the war, greatly enhancing the army’s public profile and support after 1945.

The Salvation Army Today

In 1999 the Salvation Army worked in over 100 countries. There were over 14,000 corps worldwide and social service programs operated in more than 140 languages. The army ran 152 centers for alcoholics, 200 children’s homes and day nurseries, 13 holiday camps for children, 800 shelters for the homeless, and 130 centers for refugees. The army ran 2,000 food distribution centers and 450,000 prisoners in jail were visited that year. It is among the world’s largest providers of social services.

References and Further Reading

- Ervine, St. John. God’s Soldier: General William Booth. London: Heinemann, 1934.
- Fairbank, Jenty. Booth’s Boots: Social Service Beginnings in the Salvation Army. London: The Salvation Army, 1983.
- McKinley, Edward H. Marching to Glory: The History of the Salvation Army in the United States. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1995.

- Murdoch, Norman. Origins of the Salvation Army. Knoxville, TN: University of Tennessee Press, 1994.
- Sandall, Robert, et. al. The History of the Salvation Army. Reprint, London: The Salvation Army, 1979.
- Taiz, Lillian. "Applying the Devil's Works in a Holy Cause: Working-Class Popular Culture and the Salvation Army in the United States, 1879–1900." Religion and American Culture 7, no. 2 (1997):195–223.
- Walker, Pamela J. Pulling the Devil's Kingdom Down: The Salvation Army in Victorian Britain. Berkeley: The University of California Press, 2001.
- Winston, Diane, Red Hot and Righteous: The Urban Religion of the Salvation Army. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.

PAMELA J.WALKER

SANCTIFICATION

Sanctification is the process of making something or someone holy. (Biblical Greek and Hebrew have no separate words for sanctification and holiness.) In Protestantism, the doctrine of sanctification refers to believers being made holy. In Protestant theology, sanctification occurs after religious CONVERSION, or JUSTIFICATION. “Entire sanctification” is the distinguishing doctrine of the Protestant HOLINESS MOVEMENT.

MARTIN LUTHER’S sixteenth-century Protestant insight reversed the assumed order of justification and sanctification in Christian SALVATION. In Luther’s understanding, Catholicism taught that sanctification preceded justification. Believers had to make their lives holy (sanctify themselves) before God would declare them righteous (justify them). Luther believed that placing sanctification before justification promoted righteousness by works and that justification by faith could be preserved only by placing justification before sanctification.

For Luther, justification was a judicial process whereby God declared sinners righteous apart from any righteousness of their own. In justification, God imputed Christ’s righteousness to sinners on the basis of faith. Sanctification, the attainment of holiness, followed justification, but the believer’s holiness was always alien to the believer because justification was always God’s gift to sinners. For Luther, therefore, sanctification could not result in moral transformation. Believers were always sinners and could never possess holiness of their own. Sanctification was the ever deeper awareness of one’s sinfulness. At the same time, however, Luther also insisted that the Christian was called upon to live a godly life.

JOHN CALVIN accepted Luther’s understanding of imputed righteousness, but made holiness the goal of Christian life. In the Calvinist tradition, therefore, a believer’s quest for holiness posed no threat to justification by FAITH. The believer’s holiness, although always a gift of grace and incomplete before death, was not entirely alien. CALVINISM allowed for genuine moral transformation as Christians were sanctified.

The eighteenth-century Anglican cleric JOHN WESLEY taught the doctrine of Christian perfection, which optimistically asserted that Christians could experience perfect love toward God and human beings before death. Among Wesley’s followers, this doctrine became identified as “entire sanctification.” The qualifier “entire” distinguished Wesleyan sanctification from the less-optimistic Calvinist sanctification. For Wesleyans, to be “entirely sanctified” was to love God and neighbor perfectly.

Although Wesley founded the Methodist Church in America and led the Methodist movement in Britain, by the mid-nineteenth century entire sanctification was primarily taught in interdenominational North American settings under the auspices of the National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness (later the Christian Holiness Association). Most “holiness” denominations (e.g., CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, FREE METHODIST CHURCH OF AMERICA, and WESLEYAN CHURCH) originated from this American holiness movement.

Nineteenth-century evangelical preachers like CHARLES GRANDISON FINNEY and DWIGHT LYMAN MOODY also preached sanctification and equated sanctification with spirit BAPTISM (e.g., Acts 2). Such doctrines of sanctification emphasized the believer's empowerment for witness and service without espousing perfectionist themes ("sanctification" rather than "entire sanctification"). The charismatic tradition often follows this evangelical doctrine of sanctification and emphasizes the gift of speaking in tongues as the evidence of one's sanctification.

See also Evangelicalism; Methodism; Methodism, England; Methodism, United States; Sin; Tongues, Speaking in

References and Further Reading

Alexander, Donald, ed. Christian Spirituality: Five Views of Sanctification. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1988.

Bassett, Paul M., and William M. Greathouse. Exploring Christian Holiness, Vol. 2: The Historical Development. Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press, 1985.

THOMAS E. PHILLIPS

SANKEY, IRA DAVID (1840–1908)

Gospel hymn singer and composer. Sankey joined preacher DWIGHT LYMAN MOODY to form one of the most popular evangelistic teams in nineteenth-century America. Born in 1840 in Edinburg, Pennsylvania, Sankey joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1856 (see METHODISM, NORTH AMERICA) and sang at SUNDAY SCHOOL gatherings throughout Pennsylvania and Ohio. He met Moody at a Young Men's Christian Association (see YMCA, YWCA) convention in Indianapolis in 1870.

After witnessing Sankey's ability to move an audience through song, Moody asked him to be his partner. Sankey's text-driven, emotion-filled renderings of old Sunday school songs complemented Moody's PREACHING style. The pair found initial success in a Revival campaign in Britain from 1873 to 1875 (see REVIVALS). Upon returning to the UNITED STATES, the pair established evangelistic crusades in major cities that won thousands of converts.

For his own compositions and hymn collections, Sankey chose lyrics focused on testimony rather than DOCTRINE. In his songs, humans passively receive God's grace in an emotional, intimate experience with Jesus. Several of Sankey's settings became widely popular, particularly "The Ninety and Nine."

Audiences urged Sankey to publish the songs he performed. In 1873 he issued a sixteen-page pamphlet, Sacred Songs and Solos. Sankey eventually added 1,200 songs to this collection, which sold more than 80 million copies. Sankey also joined with composer Philip Bliss to compile a six-volume series, Gospel Hymns and Sacred Songs, released from 1874 to 1891. These volumes became the standard gospel hymn collection in America. Sankey died in Brooklyn in 1908.

See also Evangelicalism; Evangelism; Hymns and Hymnals; Music, American

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Sankey, Ira D. My Life and the Story of the Gospel Hymns. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1928.

Secondary Sources:

Sizer, Sandra S. Gospel Hymns and Social Religion: The Rhetoric of Nineteenth Century Revivalism. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1978.

Wilhoit, Mel R. "'Sing Me a Sankey': Ira D. Sankey and Congregational Song." Hymn 42 (1991):13–19.

JENNIFER GRABER

SATTLER, MICHAEL (c.1490–1527)

Swiss Anabaptist leader. Sattler was a former prior of a Benedictine monastery and the short-lived leader of the Swiss Anabaptist movement in the Zurich Unterland. Little is known of his early life beyond the fact that he was born in Staufen in the Breisgau near Freiburg in about 1490. He likely did not have university training, although he was fluent in Latin. Appointed prior at the Benedictine monastery of St. Peter's northeast of Freiburg sometime between 1518 and 1525, Sattler left that position—probably in May of 1525 amid the religious and economic unrest associated with the Peasants' War—and moved to the area around Waldshut-Schaffhausen, a region noted for its radical religious DISSENT. In November of 1525 Zurich authorities arrested Sattler for his association with Anabaptists, and extracted an oath of loyalty before expelling him from the territory.

It is probable, though not certain, that Sattler was baptized as an Anabaptist in the summer of 1526 (see ANABAPTISM). He next appeared in Strasbourg, where he had friendly encounters with the reformers MARTIN BUCER and WOLFGANG CAPITO, both of whom he addressed as “beloved brothers in Christ” in a farewell letter to them written early in 1527. The letter to Bucer and Capito contained the essential features of Sattler's theological position, features that found fuller expression a few weeks later in his most important writing—the so-called SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION (Bruderliche Vereinigung). Ratified on February 24 by a gathering of leaders in Schleithem am Randen, this brief affirmation of Anabaptist distinctives became a foundational reference point for Swiss Anabaptist THEOLOGY as it took shape in subsequent decades. The christocentrism and ecclesiological separatism central to the CONFESSION—rooted in believer's BAPTISM, the practice of mutual aid and CHURCH DISCIPLINE, and a rejection of the oath, violence, and magisterial offices—show clear traces of Sattler's Benedictine background and underscore the debt owed by the Swiss Anabaptist movement to late medieval Catholic piety as well as to evangelical Protestantism.

In late February of 1527 Sattler, his wife Margarethe, and several other Anabaptists were arrested in Horb (Württemberg). After some two months of imprisonment—during which time Sattler wrote a lengthy letter of encouragement to the persecuted Anabaptist congregation at Horb—the group was transferred to a prison in Rottenburg, a territory under the jurisdiction of ARCHDUKE Ferdinand of Austria. On May 20, 1527, after a HERESY trial of several days, Rottenburg authorities tortured, then executed Sattler by burning. His wife was drowned in the Neckar river on the following day.

Despite the abbreviated nature of his leadership, Sattler gave the fledgling Swiss Anabaptist movement a theological coherence—sealed with the authority of his martyrdom—that helped to ensure its viability even amid persistent persecution in subsequent decades.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Yoder, John Howard, trans. and ed. "The Legacy of Michael Sattler." In Classics of the Radical Reformation, vol. 1. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1973.

——, trans. and ed. The Schleithem Confession. Scottsdale, PA: Mennonite Publishing House, 1977.

Secondary Sources:

Haas, Martin. "Michael Sattler: Auf dem Weg der Täufer in die täuferische Absonderung." In Radikale Reformatoren, edited by H.-J.Goertz, 115–124. Munich: C.H. Beck, 1978.

Snyder, C.Arnold. "The Life and Thought of Michael Sattler." In Studies in Anabaptist and Mennonite History, vol. 26. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1984.

JOHN D.ROTH

SCHAFF, PHILIP (1819–1893)

American church historian. Schaff was born in Chur, SWITZERLAND, on January 1, 1819. His piety led him to a religious career, not in ministerial service but rather in academic studies. While studying at universities in Tübingen (1837–1839) and HALLE (1839–1840), he came under the influence of FERDINAND C.BAUR, whose ideas about the historical development of Christian thought and practice became a permanent part of his thinking. Finishing his studies in Berlin (1840–1841), Schaff obtained a licentiate in THEOLOGY and began teaching as a Privatdozent (lecturer). While there he was befriended by JOHANN AUGUST NEANDER, another seasoned scholar of the history of Christianity, who greatly affected the young instructor's religious and intellectual life. In 1844 he accepted an invitation to become professor of church history and biblical literature at a fledgling institution in the New World. Arriving at the German Reformed Seminary in Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, he quipped that he was Swiss by birth, German by education, and American by choice.

At the seminary the newcomer became associated with JOHN W.NEVIN, a vigorous theologian in the Reformed tradition, and during Schaff's tenure there (1844–1863) the two developed the "MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY," a distinctive emphasis on broad confessionalism based on historical continuity. The CIVIL WAR interrupted normal activities in central Pennsylvania, and so Schaff moved to a place of greater safety, serving from 1864 to 1869 as secretary for the New York Sabbath Committee and lecturing occasionally (1868–1871) at Andover, Drew, and Union Theological Seminaries. Beginning in 1870 he occupied various professoriates at Union, lecturing on theology, scripture, and history until retirement in 1893. Vigorous and energetic throughout his career Schaff remained active up to the last month of his life, dying on October 20, 1893 at his home in New York City.

Schaff's most important contribution lay in historical studies of Christianity, lectures, and publications that ranged from biblical times to his own age. His efforts for a half century were sustained by a conception of developmental change that resembled a broadly Hegelian process, one that drew strength from positive, although often conflicting, forces in past times and pointed to future possibilities for improvement. As soon as he arrived in this country Schaff began articulating ideas about dialectical processes in history, patterns familiar to him but startlingly novel to many new compatriots. Most Americans in the Reformed tradition held a much more static view of church history, suspicious of the idea that they had departed from earlier precedent and resentful of any charitable thought that regarded Roman Catholicism as a valid form of Christianity (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS). In 1845 such Nativists (see NATIVISM) charged the young German professor with HERESY, hinting also that he leaned toward "popery." Schaff defended himself in open debate and in two classic books: The Principle of Protestantism, As Related to the Present State of the Church (Chambersburg, 1845) and What is Church History? A Vindication of the Idea of Historical Development (Philadelphia, 1846). In the end Schaff was completely exonerated, and, reassured by that overt vindication, he continued to disseminate attitudes about broad ecclesiastical cooperation and ideas about dynamic progress in historical experience.

Breadth of Interests

Although primarily a historian, Schaff was interested in an impressively wide range of topics in religion studies. In the area of primary concentration his work culminated in his six-volume History of the Christian Church (New York, 1882–1892) and in his successful coordination of other scholarly efforts in a thirteen-volume collection of denominational histories known as The American Church History Series (New York, 1893–1897). Schaff's warm, perennial interest in theology yielded many academic reflections, notably Theological Propaedeutic (New York, 1892), whereas cumulative liturgical studies eventuated in Bibliotheca Symbolica Ecclesiae Universalis: The Creeds of Christendom (New York, 1877). All in all, more than eighty publications bore his name, and these finished products plus his continuing example helped create a greater appreciation in this country for critical scholarship, especially that which displayed dispassionate and open-minded attitudes about all forms of religious expression.

During a lifetime of variegated academic and ecclesiastical activities Schaff was sustained by an abiding ecumenical vision (see ECUMENISM). Indeed, his view of historical development led him to expect that Protestantism and Catholicism would eventually progress to a higher level of institutional life, an "evangelical catholicism" that moved beyond current malpractices while retaining the present-day benefits of each form. Pursuing that end he lectured, wrote, and organized to promote better understanding among various branches of Christianity. He served, for example, as a key figure in the EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE and worked from 1866 to 1873 to organize an American chapter of that group, hoping also to convene one of its international conferences in New York City. Most of Schaff's historical research was based on an irenic ecumenical perspective, and his instrumental presence in founding the AMERICAN SOCIETY OF CHURCH HISTORY in 1888 served as another expression of this conviction that future growth stemmed from an adequate grasp of the past. Other pivotal activities such as committee work on creedal revision and on new biblical translations were also characterized by the hope that greater mutual understanding among churches would facilitate greater toleration and cooperation.

In 1893 the city of Chicago hosted a Columbian Exposition, and a WORLD PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS was held in conjunction with it. Schaff was determined to attend the meetings and present a paper there, entitled "The Reunion of Christendom." Doctors advised against such strenuous activity, but he pursued his objective with the same dogged persistence that he had exhibited for more than five decades. Travel by train so exhausted the old American professor that he was forced to remain seated on the rostrum while a colleague read his address for him. The return trip further depleted Schaff's strength, but he was glad to have articulated his vision one last time, even though the effort shortened his life. Emotionally and physically drained, he died less than a month later.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Schaff, Philip. America: A Sketch of its Political, Social, and Religious Character. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1961.
- . The Principle of Protestantism. Philadelphia, PA: United Church Press, 1964.
- . Church and State in the United States. New York: Arno Press, 1972.

Secondary Sources:

- Graham, Stephen R. Cosmos in the Chaos: Philip Schaff's Interpretation of Nineteenth-Century American Religion. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995.
- Penzel, Klaus. Philip Schaff, Historian and Ambassador of the Universal Church: Selected Writings. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1991.
- Schaff, David. The Life of Philip Schaff, In Part Autobiographical. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1897.
- Shriver, George H. Philip Schaff: Christian Scholar and Ecumenical Prophet. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1987.

HENRY W. BOWDEN

SCHELLING, FRIEDRICH WILHELM JOSEPH VON (1775–1854)

German philosopher. Born in Württemberg, GERMANY, in 1775 Schelling was a leading representative of German Idealism. Some of his major works are Ideas towards a Philosophy of Nature (1797), System of Transcendental Idealism (1800), and Philosophical Inquiries into the Nature of Human Freedom (1809). He also left behind a considerable body of lectures, published posthumously as the Philosophy of Mythology and Philosophy of Revelation. He died in Ragaz, SWITZERLAND, in 1854.

Schelling's main contribution to nineteenth-century Protestant theology was to provide an alternative to GEORG W.F. HEGEL. Schelling's emphasis on God's freedom contrasted favorably with Hegel's tendency to make creation a matter of logical necessity. An indication of the anxiety about the pernicious effect of Hegel's philosophy was the decision by the Prussian government to bring Schelling to Berlin as professor of philosophy in 1841. The express purpose of this appointment was to combat the influence of Hegel.

In the twentieth century Schelling's influence on Protestant thought is best seen in the theology of PAUL TILLICH. Tillich was attracted to several aspects of Schelling's philosophy. First, he credited Schelling with recognizing the importance of the unconscious as a philosophical principle. Second, he found Schelling's understanding of the divine presence within NATURE appealing. Third, he found valuable resources for existential philosophy in Schelling's later thought. Fourth, his doctrine of God corresponds roughly to Schelling's. For both, God is the ideal harmony of polar opposites. Both represented God as a dialectical movement between identity and difference.

See also Boehme, Jakob; Theology

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von. Clara, or, On Nature's Connection to the Spirit World. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2002.
- Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von, and Peter Lauchlan Heath. System of Transcendental Idealism (1800). Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1978.
- Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von, and Karl Friedrich August Schelling. Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von Schellings sämtliche Werke. Stuttgart, Germany: J. G. Cotta, 1856–1861.
- Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von, and James Gutmann. Schelling, Of Human Freedom. Chicago, IL: Open Court, 1936.

Secondary Sources:

Beach, Edward Allen. The Potencies of God(s): Schelling's Philosophy of Mythology. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.

Brown, Robert F. The Later Philosophy of Schelling: The Influence of Boehme on the works of 1809–1815. Lewisburg, PA: Bucknell University Press, 1977.

Tillich, Paul. Perspectives on 19th and 20th Century Protestant Theology. Edited by Carl E. Braaten. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.

SAMUEL M. POWELL

SCHILLER, JOHANN CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH (1759–1805)

German playwright. Schiller (von Schiller after 1802) was born on November 11, 1759 in Marbach, and died on May 10, 1805 in Weimar. From 1767 to 1773 he attended grammar school in Ludwigsburg. On the order of Duke Carl Eugen von Württemberg he entered the Karlschule, a military preparatory academy. He began studying law in 1774 and medicine in 1776, and in 1780 he served as an army physician in Stuttgart.

His play Die Räuber (The Robbers) premiered in 1782, which prompted the duke to prohibit him from further writing. Schiller fled to Mannheim, where in 1783 he secured a position as a playwright. In 1787 he traveled to Weimar and met JOHANN GOTTFRIED VON HERDER and Christoph Martin Wieland. In 1789 he moved to Jena and became a professor of philosophy. In 1790 he married Charlotte von Lengefeld. In 1791 he was gravely ill, and it was at this time that he began his study of the work of IMMANUEL KANT. He became close friends with JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE in 1794, and in 1796 he met the philosopher FRIEDRICH WILHELM JOSEPH VON SCHELLING. He moved to Weimar in 1799.

Schiller grew up in the setting of what was known as Württemberg Protestantism, which characterized by the moderate PIETISM influenced by JOHANN ALBRECHT BENGEL, and he originally wanted to become a minister. In the last hours of his life he is said to have called out many times for a Judex (judge). Schiller is considered the most important dramatist of German classicism. After the tragedies Die Räuber (1781) and Kabale und Liebe (1784), his dramas portray historical situations of crises in different European countries and address the problem of freedom: Die Verschwörung des Fiesco zu Genua (1783), Don Karlos: Infant von Spanien (1787), Wallenstein (three parts, 1798–1799), Maria Stuart (1800), Die Jungfrau von Orleans (1801), Die Braut von Messina (1803), Wilhelm Tell (1804), and Demetrius (1805; posthumous fragment). In his philosophical treatises, especially Philosophische Briefe (1786), Über die tragische Kunst (1792), Über die Ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (1795), and Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (1795–1796), he provides a theoretical foundation and justification for his art.

See also Literature, German

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Schiller, J.C.F. Nationalausgabe. Edited by Julius Petersen et al. Weimar, Germany: Hermann Böhlaus, 1943–.

Secondary Sources:

Hammer, Stephanie B. Schiller's Wound: The Theater of Trauma from Crisis to Commodity. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 2001.

Pugh, David. Schiller's Early Dramas: A Critical History. New York: Camden House, 2001.

ULRICH KARTHAUS

SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH DANIEL ERNST (1768–1834)

German theologian. Friedrich Daniel Ernst Schleiermacher, Reformed theologian and pastor in Prussia (at that time an independent German state), was the founder of a new epoch in Protestant THEOLOGY. He proposed a distinctive theological method based on the centrality of Christian experience that took seriously ENLIGHTENMENT criticisms and understandings and moved beyond them to articulate a Protestant vision in a new framework. He is widely regarded as the founder of “modern” or “liberal” Protestant theology. Schleiermacher’s recasting of Protestant theology in this-worldly, existential terms has led some to hail him as a renewer of faith and theology and others to condemn him for having sold out the faith to the intellectual and cultural currents of his day. Such diversity of evaluation has continued since his own lifetime.

Schleiermacher was born on November 21, 1768 in the city of Breslau into a family of Reformed CLERGY; his father and both grandfathers were pastors, and an uncle was a professor of theology. Although he is known to posterity for his theological contributions, he was also a pastor. He preached weekly for almost forty years and was pastor of the 12,000-member Trinity Church in Berlin from 1810 until his death there on February 12, 1834. In his pastoral role, he was a participant in the creation of the Prussian Union Church in 1817 that brought Lutheran and Reformed traditions together in one church. Schleiermacher supported the Union because he recognized the commonalities between the two versions of Protestantism. At the same time, he resisted King Friedrich Wilhelm III’s imposition of a common LITURGY. He and eleven other pastors (the “twelve apostles”) held out against the King for seven years before finally succumbing when threatened with losing their pastorates. Throughout his career, Schleiermacher advocated for the independence of the church from the state in a period when state control of all aspects of life in Prussia was on the increase (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW).

Schleiermacher’s Theology in Historical Context

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, Schleiermacher pioneered an approach that moved Protestant theology beyond the rationalism, ORTHODOXY, and PIETISM of the previous century into a new era. Schleiermacher’s theology resonated with such Protestant themes as the centrality of GRACE of Christ in SALVATION, the church enlivened by the Spirit as the means by which salvation is made known, and the experiential accent in the theology of MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN. Selfconsciously Protestant, Schleiermacher also participated in the ongoing reformation of church and theology. His theology evidenced significant material continuity with REFORMATION concerns, even as it recasts the theological enterprise so that it makes sense in the post-Enlightenment world. Particularly in his magnum opus, The Christian Faith, Schleiermacher set forth a theological vision grounded in Christian experience and explicating the faith in organic, naturalistic, and this-worldly terms.

The new epoch that Schleiermacher inaugurated is variously termed the New Protestantism (see ERNST TROELTSCH) or, more commonly, modern or liberal theology. Academic theology in the nineteenth century was dominated by thinkers who took important clues from Schleiermacher, although he had few disciples. Figures as diverse as JOHN CAMPBELL, Wilhelm Hermann, ADOLPH VON HARNACK, HORACE BUSHNELL (the “American Schleiermacher”), ALBRECHT RITSCHL, Ernst Troeltsch, and WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH belong to the liberal tradition and show the influence of Schleiermacher. None of these figures follows him slavishly, however.

Liberal theology in general and Schleiermacher in particular came in for deep suspicion by the dialectical theology, or NEO-ORTHODOXY, of KARL BARTH and EMIL BRUNNER in the early twentieth century. Brunner accused Schleiermacher of psychologism and mysticism that obscure the way that the word of God comes to the self from beyond. Barth’s interpretation is more nuanced than Brunner’s, and he recognized potential in Schleiermacher for a theology of the Holy Spirit. Still, Barth concluded that Schleiermacher’s anthropological starting point ends up selling out revelation for religion and the Word for cultural accommodation.

The negative verdict of dialectical theology dominated Schleiermacher interpretation well into the 1960s. Beginning in the 1970s and continuing into the twenty-first century, there has been a Schleiermacher renaissance led in GERMANY by scholars including Martin Redeker, Heinz Kimmerle, Kurt-Victor Selge, and Hans-Joachim Birkner and in the UNITED STATES by Richard R. Niebuhr and B.A. Gerrish. These thinkers called for a reassessment grounded in careful analysis of Schleiermacher’s theological method and the results that it produced. They demonstrated the connections between Schleiermacher and classical Protestantism and extolled the depth and creativity of his work without seeking to obscure his departures from traditional theology.

The Young Rebel and the Speeches on Religion

While a student at the Moravian seminary in Barby from 1785 to 1787, Schleiermacher experienced a community at once joyous in its assurance of salvation and rigidly disciplined, as “worldly pleasures” such as swimming, skating, card games, and board games were prohibited and rigorous educational and religious practice were required. Schleiermacher received a solid biblical and classical education at Barby even as his doubts about traditional theological claims came to the fore. He became a leader in a small group of “independent thinkers” that read banned books, such as the works of JOHANN WOLFGANG GOETHE and IMMANUEL KANT. The group was found out by seminary leaders and commanded to desist. Schleiermacher, meanwhile, wrote his father and shared his doubts about the divinity of Christ, Christ's death as vicarious ATONEMENT, and eternal damnation of unbelievers. Father Gottlieb wrote back a letter full of sorrow, admonition, and pleading. In the end Schleiermacher was asked to leave the seminary. He had no place to study and no place to live, but his father agreed to support him for a year of study at the University of HALLE.

Schleiermacher completed his study, passed his ordination examinations, and worked as a tutor and a pastor for several years before being assigned to the Charité hospital in Berlin. In the Prussian capital from 1796 until 1802, Schleiermacher moved in fashionable but countercultural society. He became a member of the Romantic circle of poets and thinkers that included FRIEDRICH SCHLEGEL, A.W.Schlegel, and the poets Novalis, Ludwig Tieck, Friedrich Hölderlin, and Jean Paul. The Romantics rebelled against the Enlightenment and its focus on reason and science, order, morality, and universality, instead focusing on feeling and art, mystery, intuition of the infinite, and individuality (see ROMANTICISM). Schleiermacher was both a full member of the circle and unique. He was no poet or aesthete and would lead persons beyond ART to religion, although, to be sure, his conception of religion was cast in Romantic, aesthetic terms.

Schleiermacher also became part of Berlin's "salon society," gatherings of cultured folk and intellectuals who met in the homes of the growing bourgeoisie to hear presentations on artistic and scientific topics and discuss the cultural issues of the day. The salons were scandalous in their day for the mixing of Jews and Gentiles, commoners and nobility, and men and women. They were part of the "new Berlin," moving beyond some of the strictures that kept folk of different status separated. Schleiermacher thrived in this atmosphere, as he was with people who stimulated his mind and heart and provided the community so necessary to his life and work.

Schleiermacher burst on the cultural scene in 1799 with the publication of Speeches On Religion (Über die Religion. Reden an die Gebildeten unter ihren Verächtern). The book caused a tremendous stir with its unorthodox interpretations of Jesus and the Bible and the surprising and unconventional way it spoke about religion. Although the book was published anonymously, soon everyone knew the author to be Schleiermacher, the thirty-one-year-old minister serving as a chaplain at the Charité hospital.

The style of Speeches is conversational and confessional—a breezy, informal tone with the cultured "despisers" and a critical, even biting tone when talking about the status quo in religion and society. Questions are addressed to the cultured despisers; the speaker goes so far as to join them at the point of their contempt for religion. And sharp criticism is leveled against the dominant understandings and practices of contemporary religion, even as the speaker clings firmly to religion in its pure state. Confessing that "religion was the maternal womb in whose holy darkness my young life was nourished," the speaker says, Religion helped me when I began to examine the ancestral faith and to purify my heart of the rubble of primitive times. It remained with me when God and immortality disappeared before my doubting eyes (Schleiermacher 1988:84).

The key distinction operative in the Speeches is that between “intuition” on the one hand and knowledge or action, on the other hand. The Speeches insist that religion in its essence is a matter of inward, lived experience; religious knowledge and action are secondary, derivative, a step removed from true religious experience. In this way Schleiermacher connected with the emphasis on FAITH in classical Protestantism. Although his conception was strikingly different, the focus on the passive and receptive character of religion resonated with conceptions of faith in Luther and Calvin. For them, faith is a gift given by God; for Schleiermacher in the Speeches, religion is intuitive reception of the universe. Echoes of and striking differences from REFORMATION formulations are evident.

The Speeches also proposed startling interpretations of Revelation, the BIBLE, the visible church, and Jesus. In place of the supernaturalism of traditional theology, the Speeches proposed a naturalistic understanding of such concepts as “miracle” and “revelation.” The speaker states that “‘Miracle’ is merely the religious name for event...To me, everything is miracle.” “Revelation” is similarly defined in a naturalistic and personalistic way: “Every original and new intuition of the universe is [a revelation], and yet all individuals must know best what is original and new for them” (Schleiermacher 1988:131).

The Bible and Jesus are also subject to critique and reconstruction. The Speeches emphasize oral communication and see written forms, including the Bible, as secondary and derivative. Personal, communal, living communication is valued over written expression. Here the young minister departed from the Reformation affirmation of sola scriptura—the Bible as the only norm for faith and life.

The Speeches also articulated what PAUL TILLICH was later to call the “Protestant Principle”—the call for ongoing reform and searching self-criticism. When the Speeches reflected critically on Jesus, it concludes that Jesus never claimed to be the only Savior. To be true to itself and to Jesus, Christianity must remain essentially free and open, imposing no restrictions, allowing no narrowness. True Christianity is always expansive, anticipating further disclosures of the Christian principle manifest in Jesus. In the Speeches, Schleiermacher claimed the reform dynamic of Protestantism, and it led him to conclusions notable for their discontinuity with traditional Protestant theology.

Halle and Christmas Eve

Schleiermacher left Berlin in 1802 under pressure from his ecclesiastical superiors. Between the furor caused by the Speeches, his deep friendship with the controversial poet Friedrich Schlegel, and his public courting of Eleanore Grunow, a married woman, scandal had mounted to the point where it was deemed that Schleiermacher had to leave his beloved Berlin. From 1802 to 1804 he was miserable in his pastorate at Stolp on the Baltic Sea, but the following years in Halle (1804–1809) were a turning point for him in terms of his ecclesial career and theological development. In Halle, he wrote his Christmas Eve: Dialogue on the Incarnation (Weihnachtsfeier). This work marked a move away from the Speeches, wherein Schleiermacher began with religion in general and only at the conclusion of the work moved to consider Christianity in particular. In Christmas Eve Schleiermacher began from within the standpoint of Christian faith.

Christmas Eve portrays a conversation among friends about the meaning of Christmas set in the parlor of a middle-class home on Christmas Eve. What emerges in the course of the dialogue is the insight that the Christian experience of a new and higher life may be found in and through the community, its remembrance and ritual. A prime example of this is the celebration of Christmas itself. As the originator of the Christian community and the experiences it mediates, Christ must be the possessor of a unique and powerful consciousness of God in which Christians now share. This is a “CHRISTOLOGY from below” that starts not with creeds or scripture, but rather with the Christian experience of new life, then works backward to who Christ must be. This shift in method—focusing not on religious experience, but rather on Christian experience—was to be decisive for the further development of his theology. This approach was continued in Schleiermacher’s great work, Der Christliche Glaube (The Christian Faith).

The University of Berlin and the Brief Outline

Upon his return to Berlin in 1809, Schleiermacher earned his way onto the planning committee for the new university by writing an independent essay on the character that a modern German university ought to have. This work so impressed Wilhelm von Humboldt that he made Schleiermacher his chief collaborator in the project. Other contributions made by Schleiermacher include selecting the university’s original theological faculty, serving as its dean for four terms, and teaching a wide array of courses in theology and philosophy. In this connection he also wrote his Brief Outline on the Study of Theology, a programmatic work that sets forth a plan for a theological curriculum. This work conceived of theology as comprising subdisciplines that come together to form an organic whole. Theology is an academic enterprise with a practical goal. Theological work brings together the results of biblical, historical, and dogmatic study informed by insights from all of the secular sciences. What holds all of this disparate knowledge together, infusing it with unity and life, is its orientation toward the upbuilding of the church and faith. The community of the faithful is at once the ground and goal of theology. Theology does not seek to prove faith, but rather seeks to understand its meaning and significance for human life and to explicate how faith lives in the world. This makes practical theology the “crown and goal” of all of the theological disciplines, for it connects most directly with the life of the church, delineating methods to be used for leadership.

The Brief Outline made two signal contributions to its vision of theology as a discipline. On the one hand, it oriented theology toward the practical goal of leadership for life in the church. It made explicit the role of theology in service in the church. On the other hand, it affirmed the historical character of theology in a new way. Faith and theology are manifest in the lives of real human beings, persons limited by concrete circumstances of their lives. There can be no absolute formulation of truth that transcends the limits placed on people by their location in history. Theology is always limited by being historically conditioned. For Schleiermacher, there was a relativity to all theological claims, and this opened the door to his “revisionist” program in theology. As the faithful in the past have expressed the faith in ways that spoke to their particular situations, so the contemporary person of faith is called to theological revision for the sake of the credibility of the faith in the contemporary world. The historical character of theology comes to the fore in a new way.

The Christian Faith

Schleiermacher’s magnum opus, the Christian Faith, is a comprehensive dogmatics comparable to St. Thomas Aquinas’s Summa Theologiae or Calvin’s INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION, but distinctive in its theological method by making faith as experienced by contemporary Christians the dominant center. Where older dogmatics had typically begun with the dogmas of the church and/or Scripture, the Christian Faith begins with Christian piety. Indeed, the work has been aptly called “a theology within the limits of piety alone” (Gerrish 1982:163). Schleiermacher once again stood in a relationship of continuity and discontinuity with Protestant forebears, especially Calvin. Schleiermacher appropriated Calvin’s insight that piety is the crucial touchstone for authentic theology. But for Schleiermacher, piety also became the limiting principle beyond which theology may not go, in this way departing significantly from Calvin. The Christian Faith argues that claims about origins (e.g., of the world or of SIN) and about the future (especially traditional Christian eschatological claims) are not, properly speaking, theological, for they go beyond what can be known on the basis of Christian piety or feeling. Theology is to explicate the contents of Christian piety, and while claims about God and the world can be made, theology most fundamentally deals with states of consciousness. Claims about God and the world have a secondary, derivative status. Theology is reconceived in terms that are strictly experiential, naturalistic, and this-worldly.

The structure of the Christian Faith also parallels that of Calvin’s Institutes in its attention to a twofold knowledge of God as creator and redeemer. This twofold knowledge provides the organizational principle for both works. Of course, in Schleiermacher’s work this knowledge is rendered in terms of Christian consciousness, and so knowledge of God as creator is expressed in terms of an immediate self-consciousness of absolute dependence. That is, Christian piety includes a sense of oneself (and the world) as not being self-caused. Underlying feelings of relative freedom and relative dependence is the sense of utter dependence on an other. This feeling of utter dependence resonates with the emphasis on the sovereignty of God articulated by Calvin and the Reformed tradition generally. Knowledge of God as redeemer is the other aspect of Christian consciousness. This is the sense that one has been delivered to a higher form of life in which one’s consciousness of God is pervasive in a way it had not been previously. This higher life includes a sense of newness and joy; it derives from and participates in the perfect God consciousness of Jesus, mediated to people in the present by means of the Christian community. Christian piety then includes these two moments bound together inextricably: a higher and living awareness of absolute dependence on God made known through Jesus as He lives on in the community that He founded.

The Christian naturalism of Schleiermacher's system is evident in his treatment of the twin doctrines of Christ and CHURCH, which together stand at the very heart of his theology. Christian consciousness includes within itself the awareness that all blessedness is "grounded in the new divinely-effected corporate life" (Schleiermacher 1928:358).

The church is a natural, living organism. To be sure, it is enlivened by Christ, but it is also caught up in the flux of social and historical life like every other human movement or institution. This conception of the church as a living organism reclaims the organic images of the New Testament. There the church is imaged as the living branches of the one true vine and as the living members of the body of Christ. The church is a true community of persons united by a common spirit that is more than the individuals who make up the community. This common spirit that Schleiermacher identifies as the spirit of Christ or the Holy Spirit, at once the community's source and the one made known in and through the community. This means that the church can be comprehended and analyzed as a natural historical entity in many ways similar to any other human movement. For believers, it is the source of the new and higher life in Christ.

Schleiermacher's christology in the Christian Faith has much more substance than is found in the Speeches. In the mature dogmatic work focus is on the humanity of Christ. Christ is the sinlessly perfect human one and thereby the culmination of God's intention for humanity. Here is the one remaining "supernatural" element in Schleiermacher's otherwise seamlessly "naturalistic" system. Jesus's perfection cannot be explained by his historical context. He was born into a sinful world. Still, Christ is only relatively supernatural, for he manifests what is possible in theory for any human being—a perfect consciousness of God.

Schleiermacher's method in this christological reflection was consistent with his usual approach. He began with the new and higher form of life that the believer receives in and through the Christian community and then moved archeologically, tracing backward to the origin. The immediate source of the experience of salvation is the Christian community. The community in turn traces its origin to its founder, Jesus Christ, and attributes all its blessedness to the founder. Schleiermacher's method, then, was to retrace steps and discover who Jesus must have been to communicate this new and higher life to believers. He concluded that Jesus must be the possessor of a unique and unblemished consciousness of God, the human ideal in whose blessedness the believer participates. Schleiermacher cannot achieve a literal restatement of orthodox views of the person of Christ—"two natures in one person"—or the Trinity—three persons in one being. He asserted that such claims are beyond our ken. But as the ultimate source of the reality of salvation in believers' lives, Jesus must be perfect in his God-consciousness, and divine and human in that sense. And Schleiermacher can affirm a trinity of God, Christ, and Spirit in the church. Here the revisionist character of Schleiermacher's enterprise is again evident: He refuses to take traditional formulas at face value. Instead, he crafts revised understandings that resonate with the spirit of the tradition even as views of God and Christ are significantly reconceived.

Schleiermacher's companion to the Christian Faith was his similarly mammoth work, the Christian Ethics. This work, pulled together posthumously from Schleiermacher's lecture notes and those of students, is the complement to and completion of the Christian Faith. The Ethics provides a comprehensive analysis of actions in the church and the wider society, and sets forth the teleological drive of Christian faith: transformation of life in this world.

See also Calvinism; Ecclesiology; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Moravian Church

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Schleiermacher, Friedrich. Brief Outline on the Study of Theology. Translated by Terrence N.Tice. Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1966.
- . Christmas Eve: Dialogue on the Incarnation. Translated by Terrence N.Tice. Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1967.
- . The Christian Faith. Edited by H.R.Mackintosh and J.S.Stewart. Edinburgh, UK: T. & T. Clark, 1928.
- . On Religion: Speeches to its Cultured Despisers. Translated by Richard Crouter. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1988.

Secondary Sources:

- Blackwell, Albert L. Schleiermacher's Early Philosophy of Life: Determinism, Freedom, and Phantasy. Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982.
- Brandt, James M. All Things New: Reform of Church and Society in Schleiermacher's Christian Ethics. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 2001.
- Gerrish, B.A. Continuing the Reformation: Essays on Modern Religious Thought. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1993.
- . The Old Protestantism and the New. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1982.
- . A Prince of the Church: Schleiermacher and the Beginnings of Modern Theology. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1984.
- . Tradition and the Modern World: Reformed Theology in the Nineteenth Century. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1978.
- Lamm, Julia A. The Living God: Schleiermacher's Theological Appropriation of Spinoza. University Park, PA: The Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996.
- Niebuhr, Richard R. Schleiermacher on Christ and Religion. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1964.
- Redeker, Martin. Schleiermacher: Life and Thought. Translated by John Wallhausser. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1973.
- Spiegler, Gerhard. The Eternal Covenant: Schleiermacher's Experiment in Cultural Theology. New York: Harper and Row, 1967.
- Thandeka. The Embodied Self: Friedrich Schleiermacher's Solution to Kant's Problem of the Empirical Self. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Williams, Robert R. Schleiermacher the Theologian: The Construction of the Doctrine of God. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1978.

JAMES M.BRANDT

SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION

Often referred to as the Schleithem Articles or Brotherly Union, the Schleithem Confession was adopted by Swiss Anabaptists in the town of Schleithem, in the area of Schaffhausen on February 24, 1527. Originally entitled Brüderlich vereinigung etlicher Kinder Gottes, sieben artickel betreffend (Brotherly Union of a Number of Children of God Concerning Seven Articles), the confession did not influence ANABAPTISM as a whole, but it did come to play a formative role in the development of the Swiss Anabaptist tradition, to which present-day AMISH, HUTTERITES, and some MENNONITES are related.

Scholars assume that a former Benedictine monk, MICHAEL SATTLER, drafted the CONFESSION, including the prefatory letter and concluding postscript. Sattler had likely been prior at Saint Peter's monastery in the Black Forest near Freiburg. In the mid-1520s he joined the Anabaptist movement, and his missionary activities took him to the vicinities of Zürich and Strasbourg. After conversations with reformers MARTIN BUCER and WOLFGANG CAPITO in Strasbourg, Sattler led the conference at Schleithem. Soon after, he was arrested, tried by Austrian authorities, and then executed on May 21, 1527.

The confession was polemical in tone and sought to demarcate the boundaries of Swiss Anabaptism over against other expressions of belief. Some scholars have concluded that the confession was directed against mainline reformers, while others have asserted that the confession represents an internal Anabaptist discussion. Whatever the immediate occasion, the confession did serve the purpose of distinguishing Swiss Anabaptist practice from that of Catholicism, mainline Protestantism, as well as other Anabaptist streams.

The Schleithem Confession takes for granted the essential beliefs of Christian orthodoxy such as belief in the triune God, the ATONEMENT, and the ongoing activity of the Holy Spirit. Attention in the confession is given to concerns that highlight the distinct beliefs of the Swiss Anabaptism community: BAPTISM, CHURCH DISCIPLINE, the LORD'S SUPPER, the relationship between the CHURCH and the world, church leadership, the sword, and the oath.

The article on baptism rejects the practice of infant baptism and emphasizes that before the rite can take place, there must be genuine repentance and amendment of life. Baptism is given to those who truly understand, believe, and have a desire to be buried with Christ, and who want to "walk in the resurrection." It is a practice that links the inner desire of repentance with an outer practice of walking in Christ's footsteps.

The article on church discipline focuses on the ban and assumes that the members of the Christian community are accountable to one another, having been baptized into the body of Christ, and having committed themselves to a life of discipleship. In cases where Christians have fallen into error and SIN, the pattern set in Matthew 18 is in force. Christians may be warned twice in private, and a third time admonished before the community of believers. This is to be done before Christians can participate in the Lord's Supper, to ensure that unity of the community is maintained.

The theme of unity continues in the third article dealing with the Lord's Supper, which is a commemorative rather than sacramental event. The community of faith that gathers to participate in the breaking of bread according to the command of Christ must before hand be united through baptism. The validity of the Supper is dependent on the character of the community whose head is Christ. For this reason, only the true children of God have a rightful place at the table.

The emphasis on separation is given attention in article four, which makes a strong distinction between the faithful community and the sinful world. By rejecting all worldly associations, and by highlighting the radical dualism between the church and the world, the Swiss Anabaptists underscore their resolve to maintain a sectarian ECCLESIOLOGY.

The fifth article attends to the various responsibilities of leaders within the Christian community. Pastors must have a good reputation outside of the church; they are called by the local congregation and must be accountable to it. If they are driven away or killed, another pastor is to be ordained that same hour—an arrangement that not only highlights the context of persecution, but also indicates the importance of church leadership among the Swiss Anabaptists.

The final two articles are concerned with how Christians are to relate to civil authorities. In the article on the sword, the role of government is affirmed and seen as ordained of God. Yet, the article's main point is that the sword is "outside the perfection of Christ." Government is necessary in the world to protect the good and to punish evildoers, but among true Christians only the ban is used as a disciplinary measure. While the world is armed with steel and iron, Christians are armed with the Word of God. Christians cannot take up the sword because of Christ's teachings and example.

The final article is concerned with the swearing of oaths, which the civil authorities often demanded of its subjects on an annual basis. Again, the Anabaptists point to Christ as the basis for their point of view: Christians cannot swear the oath, because Christ forbids it.

As to the question of the confession's theological nature and origins, there is no scholarly consensus. Mid-twentieth-century historiography tended to see the confession as representing a continuation of Zürich Anabaptist beginnings. Since then, scholars have asked whether the confession may ostensibly represent some continuation of peasant aspirations, a continuation of late medieval ascetic traditions, a continuation of a Benedictine communal tradition, or perhaps some combination of these influences.

See also Free Church; Grebel, Conrad; Hubmaier, Balthasar; Martyrs and Martyrologies; Mathiis, Jan; Pacifism; Sectarianism; Switzerland; War

References and Further Reading

- Fast, Heinhold, ed. Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer in der Schweiz. Vol. 2. Zürich, Switzerland: Theologischer Verlag, 1973.
- Goertz, Hans-Jürgen. The Anabaptists. Translated by Trevor Johnson. London and New York: Routledge, 1996.

- Haas, Martin. "The Path of the Anabaptists Into Separation: The Interdependence of Theology and Social Behaviour." In The Anabaptists and Thomas Müntzer. Translated and edited by James M. Stayer and Werner O. Packull, 72–84. Toronto, Canada: Kendall/Hunt, 1980.
- Snyder, C. Arnold. The Life and Thought of Michael Sattler. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1984.
- . "The Schleithem Articles in Light of the Revolution of the Common Man: Continuation or Departure?" The Sixteenth Century Journal 16 (1985): 419–430.
- . "The Influence of the Schleithem Articles on the Anabaptist Movement: An Historical Evaluation." Mennonite Quarterly Review 63 (1989): 323–344.
- Yoder, John H., ed. The Legacy of Michael Sattler. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1973.

KARL KOOP

SCHMALKALD ARTICLES

This confessional document, penned by MARTIN LUTHER in December 1536, is a series of interrelated doctrinal statements (“articles”). It became known by the town (Schmalkald, in Thuringia, GERMANY) where the SCHMALKALD LEAGUE met in February 1537. A testamentary document, it was written under the pressure of the reformer’s supposed imminent death and summarized Luther’s mature Reformation Theology, as well as his critique of the sixteenth-century Catholic Church.

In May 1536, when Pope Paul III called a general council of the church to meet the following spring, Luther’s ongoing bouts with illness made death seem near. Therefore Luther’s ruler, elector John Fredrick of Saxony, took the proposed council as the occasion to commission the reformer to write a summary of his theological priorities—and thereby dampen the smoldering doctrinal disagreements of second-generation reformers and also provide a theological statement for the council. The elector’s concerns over Luther’s health were well founded—not only did Luther suffer numerous illnesses in the early and mid-1530s, he suffered an apparent heart attack while composing the document itself, forcing him to dictate the last few articles from his sick bed.

Secondarily John Fredrick wanted a doctrinal statement that could serve as the basis of the Schmalkaldic League’s response to the papal council. When the League met at Schmalkald, in February 1537, the articles did not come to the floor of the meeting—the princes decided not to attend the council and Luther became deathly ill, preventing his participation in the deliberations.

After Schmalkald, Luther regained his health, made some changes in the document, added a preface, and had it published at Wittenberg in 1538. Later it was incorporated into various Lutheran corpora doctrinae (“bodies of doctrine”), designed to summarize Lutheran teaching. These local corpora were eclipsed by the definitive collection of Lutheran confessional writings published as the BOOK OF CONCORD in 1580, which gives prominent place to The Schmalkaldic Articles.

Luther organized the content of the articles into three sections. Part I, “The Lofty Articles of the Divine Majesty,” briefly summarizes Western Trinitarian, creedal doctrine. In four short articles Luther quotes and refers to the three catholic creeds, as well as his own Small Catechism, as he demonstrates the Catholic starting point of evangelical teaching. He ends with a summary: “These articles are not matters of dispute or conflict, for both sides confess them. Therefore, it is not necessary to deal with them at greater length now.”

Part II, “The Office and Work of Jesus Christ, or Our Redemption,” contains four articles. The “First and Chief Article” delineates Luther’s understanding of JUSTIFICATION by GRACE alone through FAITH alone. Significantly he constructs this article with biblical citations designed to demonstrate the Scriptural foundation of Lutheran DOCTRINE.

On the basis of this statement of his central doctrinal conviction, Luther criticized various churchly practices and their underlying theologies, thereby pointing to the heart of his reform agenda. Article Two critiques prevailing understandings of the Mass—"a human invention, not commanded by God." Article Three critiques "foundations and monasteries"—they are not "better than everyday Christian walks of life." Article Four critiques the papacy—the pope is "not the head of all Christendom 'by divine right'."

In Part III Luther integrates the catholicity of Part I with the evangelicalism of Part II, providing a constructive outline of "catholic-evangelical" doctrine for discussion "with learned, reasonable people." The key is article four, "Concerning the Gospel." The first three articles (Sin, Law, and Repentance) lead to the Gospel and the succeeding articles (Baptism, Holy Communion, the Keys, and Confession) flow from it. The concluding six articles deal with various matters of church practice (Marriage of Priests, Good Works, "Human Regulations," etc.).

This document was to Luther himself one of his most significant works, serving as a confessional capstone to his REFORMATION career. However, a number of factors (e.g., polemical tone, appearance late in Luther's career, etc.) have kept it from receiving the attention it deserves. Nevertheless, it is ecumenical and evangelical in scope, clearly schematizing the main doctrinal features of Martin Luther's reform initiatives.

See also Baptism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Clergy, Marriage of; Lord's Supper; Lutheranism; Sin

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Luther, Martin. "The Smalcald Articles." In The Book of Concord, edited by Robert Kolb and Timothy Wengert. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2000.

Secondary Sources:

Haile, H.G. Luther. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1983.

Russell, William R. Luther's Theological Testament: The Schmalkald Articles. Rev. 2nd ed. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing, 2003.

WILLIAM R. RUSSELL

SCHMALKALD LEAGUE

This defensive military alliance of REFORMATION-era German Protestant princes was formally organized in February 1531 at Schmalkald (in Thuringia, GERMANY). The League was established as a political response to imperial and pro-Catholic moves (e.g., Regensburg Alliance in 1524, the Recess of the Diet of Speyer in 1529), culminating in the Recess of Augsburg (1530), which gave Protestants six months to acquiesce to the Catholic Church or face legal and military action from the emperor. It was meant as a defensive alliance.

From the beginning, the twenty-three cities and territories that joined the League confronted enormous internal differences. Politically questions of finances and leadership dogged the alliance. Theologically disagreement arose over the fundamental question of propriety of armed resistance to defend the gospel (with MARTIN LUTHER initially opposed to such action), as well as over various theological issues.

These disagreements inhibited development of a coherent strategy in response to imperial incursions during the Schmalkald War (1546–1547). With the victory of Charles V's forces at Mühlberg and the surrender of Wittenberg in 1547, the League disbanded. However, the League was an important part of the religious and political dynamics of the era, which culminated in the Peace of Augsburg in 1555. This agreement codified the principle "cuius regio, eius religio," granting Protestant princes the right to determine the religious practices within their jurisdictions. In sixteen years of existence the League provided the nascent Protestant movement with a degree of protection from Imperial attack.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Pacifism; Schmalkaldic Articles; War

References and Further Reading

- Brady, Thomas. "Schmalkald League." In The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Reformation. Vol. 4, 12–15. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Dueck, A.J. "Religion and Temporal Authority in the Reformation: The Controversy among the Protestants prior to the Peace of Nuremberg, 1532." Sixteenth Century Journal 13 no. 2 (1982):55–74.

WILLIAM R. RUSSELL

SCHMUCKER, SAMUEL SIMON (1799– 1873)

American Lutheran theologian. Schmucker was an influential Lutheran American in the early nineteenth century. He was a revivalist who made significant contributions in EDUCATION and ECUMENISM.

Schmucker was born in February 28, 1799 in Hagerstown, Maryland. After serving as a pastor for several years, in 1826 he became the first professor of the Lutheran Theological Seminary in Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, an institution whose founding Schmucker had encouraged. The seminary quickly established a classical school or prep school, which in 1831 became Gettysburg College.

Among Lutherans, Schmucker's revivalist tendencies evoked controversy. Antirevivalists, called Old School, favored retention of the German language, and they embraced confessionalism and the CATECHISM. Schmucker and other New School Lutherans preferred English and methods associated with CAMP MEETINGS, including emotion and spontaneous conversion, although Schmucker kept the most exuberant worship at arm's length. Old School conservatives charged that revivalists distorted LUTHERANISM, but New School Lutherans cited the Pietist heritage within their tradition. Among Lutherans the tide ran against Schmucker, and had he not retired in 1865, his continued service at Gettysburg might have been difficult.

Schmucker exemplified the marriage of heartfelt faith and interdenominational reform that typified eighteenth-century Pietists and nineteenth-century revivalists on both sides of the Atlantic. He participated in a variety of reform societies, including those promoting SUNDAY SCHOOL, TEMPERANCE, Sabbath-keeping, and social work. He was particularly active in the EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE movement, which encouraged Christian unity and ecumenism.

Schmucker died of a heart attack on July 26, 1873.

See also Christian Colleges; Ethnicity; Evangelicalism; Higher Education; Pietism; Revivals; Seminaries

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Schmucker, S.S. Elements of Popular Theology. New York: Leavitt, Lord, 1834.

———. The Lutheran Manual on Scriptural Principles. Philadelphia: Lindsay & Blakiston, 1855.

———. The American Lutheran Church. New York: Arno Press, 1969.

Schmucker, Samuel Simon. The American Lutheran Church, Historically, Doctrinally, and Practically Delineated, in Several Occasional Discourses. Springfield, IL: D. Harbaugh, 1851.
———. Elements of Popular Theology, with Special Reference to the Doctrines of the Reformation, as Avowed before the Diet of Augsburg, in MDXXX. Andover, MA: Gould and Newman, 1834.

Secondary Source:

Wentz, Abdel Ross. Samuel Simon Schmucker: Pioneer in Christian Unity. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1967.

STEPHEN LONGENECKER

SCHÖN, JAKOB FRIEDRICH (LATER, JAMES FREDERICK) (1803–1889)

German missionary. Schön was born in Baden, GERMANY in 1803 and died in Chatham, ENGLAND on March 30, 1889. He offered for mission service through the BASEL MISSION and attended their seminary, but like many of his contemporaries received his commission through the (Anglican) CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY. He attended their college in Islington and was ordained in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND (deacon 1831, priest 1832). In 1832 he was appointed to SIERRA LEONE and spent the next fifteen years based in Freetown and the villages of “liberated Africans” taken from intercepted slave ships. Unlike many missionaries in Sierra Leone, such as HANNAH KILHAM, Schön studied African languages, both local vernaculars and the languages of the “liberated African” communities. Stationed at the village of Kent, he made studies of the grammar and vocabulary of Bullom, spoken in the area, and made some translations. (Gustav Nylander, 1776–1825, the pioneer translator of Bullom, was the father of Schön’s first wife.)

As he changed stations, Schön essayed languages spoken by large numbers of the liberated, notably Igbo and Hausa. In 1841 he was appointed, together with the Yoruba teacher SAMUEL ADJAI CROWTHER, to represent the missionary interest on the British expedition to the Niger. This was inspired by the ideas of Thomas Fowell Buxton (1786–1845) about producing an economic alternative to the slave trade that would allow Christianity and economic and technological development to spread in the African interior. The disastrous loss of life on the expedition (some forty members died, all Europeans) discredited these ideas and cooled any public interest in AFRICA. Schön’s report, however, insisted that the evangelization of inland Africa was still possible, provided it was based on African rather than European missionaries. These would be people of Crowther’s type, recruited and trained in Sierra Leone, where, among the liberated slaves, all the main languages of West Africa were already in use, despite predictions that they would die out and be replaced by English. During the expedition the interpreters, almost all from Sierra Leone, had been im-pressive, and Crowther’s Yoruba useful; and although his own Igbo had been too rudimentary to be much use, Schön had preached in Hausa and been understood.

So far as circumstances allowed, Schön’s recommendations formed the core of the CMS West African policy for the next two decades. For Schön, Hausa became his life’s work. The French scholar Maurice Delafosse called Schön the “discoverer” of Hausa, in that he made the language known to science and revealed the vast numbers who spoke it. Schön, whose literary output was enormous, translated most of the BIBLE and composed a major grammar and dictionary.

Schön left Africa through ill-health in 1847 and became chaplain of the Melville Hospital at Chatham naval base, taking British nationality in 1856. His duties allowed him time for his linguistic studies. Besides working on Hausa he acted as an honorary linguistic adviser to the CMS, revising in particular—not always to their satisfaction—the work of the missionaries of the Niger Mission. The mission and its African staff came under heavy fire in the 1880s, and Schön's competence was also questioned by people who had no means of assessing it. He was defended, however, by the redoubtable writer on languages, R.N.Cust (1821–1909), who opened the way for Schön to receive an honorary doctorate from Oxford. The Institut de France also awarded him their gold medal for his linguistic studies.

Although neither a trained linguist nor an encyclopedic scholar like SIGISMUND W.KOELLE, Schön was tireless and thorough. He did much to improve the standard of missionary translation and laid the foundation for the study of Hausa, West Africa's most spoken language. He was the father and grandfather of CMS missionaries.

See also Bible Translation; Missions; Missionary Organizations

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Schön, J.F., and Samuel Crowther. Journal of an Expedition up the Niger in 1841. London: Church Missionary Society, 1843.

Secondary Sources:

Church Missionary Society Register of Missionaries and Native Clergy. London: CMS, 1904.

Hair, P.E.H. The Early Study of Nigerian Languages. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967.

Stock, Eugene. History of the Church Missionary Society. London: 1899.

ANDREW F.WALLS

SCHÜTZ, HEINRICH (1585–1672)

Composer. Heinrich Schütz, also known as Henricus Sagittarius, was a Lutheran composer and church musician who wrote Music for the whole church. He was one of the finest composers of the seventeenth century and one of the most important composers in the church's history. He linked the evangelical and the catholic, the Renaissance and the Baroque, the Italian and the German. He wrote for large and small forces, pieces of tonal splendor and ones with a more archaic and delicate flavor. He set Latin texts skillfully, but also broke open German texts with remarkable musical capacity.

Born in Köstritz, GERMANY, on October 8, 1585 and baptized the next day, he and his family moved to Weissenfels in 1590. Eight years later Landgrave Moritz of Hesse convinced his parents to send him to the court at Kassel. There, in 1599, Schütz became a choirboy who sang and studied well.

In 1608 he went to Marburg to study law. Landgrave Moritz intervened again and paid his way to Venice to study with Giovanni Gabrieli from 1609 to 1612, when Gabrieli died. Back to Germany in 1613 his parents urged him to study law, but Moritz gave him the position of second court organist at the court in Kassel.

Johann Georg I, elector of Saxony, then intervened. He first got Moritz to lend Schütz to him and then in 1617 got him officially released from the Kassel court and employed as music director in Dresden, the largest and most significant Protestant musical enterprise in Germany. Until his death in 1672 Schütz remained with the Dresden court, although his conducting responsibilities ended in 1657. Because the Thirty Years War (1618–1648) severely limited musical resources in Germany, Schütz took three leaves: from 1628 to 1629 he went to Venice to study with Monteverdi; from 1633 to 1635 and from 1642 to 1644 he worked at the court in Copenhagen.

In 1619 Schütz married Magdalene Wildeckin, who was eighteen. The union was apparently an unusually happy one, but it abruptly ended in 1625 when Magdalene became ill and died. Her death was a great blow to Schütz; he never remarried.

Works

In The Psalms of David of 1619 Schütz brought to Germany Gabrieli's Venetian technique, with polychoral and instrumental splendor. In 1625 forty Latin four-voice motets called the Cantiones sacrae were published. If these two works exhibit a Lutheran and Catholic spirit, a harmonized set of German metrical versions of the Psalms (1628, revised and enlarged in 1661) might be seen with the Calvinist Genevan Psalter in the background. Called the "Becker Psalter" after the Leipzig theologian Cornelius Becker who prepared the texts, some of these were originally conceived for the morning and evening devotions of his choirboys for whom Schütz also wrote table graces.

Three Symphoniae sacrae (“spiritual concerts”) appeared in 1629, 1647, and 1650—the first twenty Latin biblical texts, mostly from the Old Testament; the second in German with reduced musical forces because of the war; and the third in the Italian polychoral style of The Psalms of David again. All three sets were influenced by Monteverdi, whom Schütz greatly admired. Two sets of Kleine geistliche Konzerte (“Little Spiritual Concerts”) on generally biblical texts were published in 1636 and 1639 with modest forces dictated by the war. The Musikalische Exequien, which influenced Johannes Brahms’s German Requiem, also was published in 1636. It contains a Missa Brevis (Kyrie and Gloria), a motet for two choirs, and a Nunc Dimittis with a superimposed text that Brahms would later employ, “Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord.”

Schütz set the core of the New Testament in several works: The Resurrection History in 1623, The Seven Words of Jesus Christ on the Cross in 1645, The Christmas Story in 1664, and three Passions according to Luke, John, and Matthew in 1665 and 1666. The Passions, especially the one according to Matthew, are among the most remarkable of Schütz’s output, although written in his eighties. Unlike the Christmas and Resurrection histories that use instruments, the Passions followed Dresden’s traditional practice of not using instruments during Holy Week and are unaccompanied. They are vernacular liturgical works modeled after the Gregorian Passions, with newly composed modal recitatives for each individual influenced by Florentine operatic monody and German Lied. Each individual has a characteristic flavor and range. The groups (turba) are given to a chorus, mostly in four parts. The text is simply the Passion narrative from the respective gospel with an introductory announcement and a stanza of a hymn as a conclusion, both for the choir. The St. John Passion alone uses the hymn’s cantus firmus. The St. Matthew and St. Luke employ musical material totally from Schütz’s hand, his more usual practice.

Death

Schütz died on November 6, 1672. Martin Geier, first court preacher at Dresden, delivered the funeral sermon on November 17. Biographical details were appended, but the sermon itself, at Schütz’s request, was about a Lutheran understanding of music in the life of the church.

Schütz was an orthodox Lutheran who regularly went to CONFESSION, heard the Word, and received the LORD’S SUPPER until September 15 of his last year when illness confined him to his house. He lived out his faith by charitable concern for his neighbors, including support for needy musicians, and through his VOCATION of composing music for the church. For his funeral he chose Psalm 119:54, “Your statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage.” Geier treated that as both generally applicable and representative of Schütz’s outlook: the whole understanding of God’s will was to be put into devout and edifying songs for the congregation in its public WORSHIP, at home, and in travels. Geier also worked from Ecclesiasticus 43:30, which Schütz had inscribed on his music cabinet: “Glorify the Lord and exalt him as much as you can, for he surpasses even that.” Geier took this to mean that the church musician, exemplified by Schütz, was to exercise the finest craft for the praise of God as a joyous, holy, laborious, and endless work of delight.

See also Lord’s Supper; Music, Northern European; Vocation

References and Further Reading

- Baron, Stephen, Kurt Gudewill, Derek McCulloch, and Joshua Rifkin. “Schütz, Heinrich.” In The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, edited by Stanley Sadie, vol. 17, 1–37. London: Macmillan Publishers Limited, 1980.
- Leaver, Robin. Music in the Service of the Church: The Funeral Sermon of Heinrich Schütz (1585–1672). St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1984.
- Moser, Han Joachim. Heinrich Schütz: His Life and Work. Translated by Carl F. Pfatteicher. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1959.
- Schalk, Carl. Music in Early Lutheranism: Shaping the Tradition (1524–1672). St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 2001.
- Smallman, Basil. Schütz, the Master Musician. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Website: <http://www.grovemusic.com/schütz>

PAUL WESTERMEYER

SCHWEITZER, ALBERT (1875–1965)

German biblical scholar and medical missionary. Born on January 14, 1875 in Kaisersberg (Alsace), Schweitzer grew up in Günsbach, a town in the Alsatian Münstertal. Here his father administered the parish of the Lutheran community. Having attended school in Günsbach and Mühlshausen in Alsace, Albert Schweitzer studied THEOLOGY and philosophy at the University of Strasbourg from 1893. In 1894 and 1895 he did his military service in the Prussian Army (Alsace then belonged to the German Empire). A man of many talents, Schweitzer also took organ lessons from Charles-Marie Widor in Paris. In the Whitsun holidays of 1896, Schweitzer made a vow that as of his thirtieth birthday he would serve his fellow humans, but until then would concentrate on scholarly activities. He did so with great academic success: in 1899 he obtained his doctorate with a dissertation on Die Religionsphilosophie Kants (Kant's Religious Philosophy). After this Schweitzer passed both theological examinations and became a vicar at St. Nicolai in Strasbourg, an office he occupied until 1912. In 1901 he qualified as a lecturer at the theological faculty with his study Das Messianitäts- und Leidensgeheimnis. Eine Skizze des Lebens Jesu (The Mystery of Messiahship and Suffering. A Sketch of the Life of Jesus) and in 1902 began teaching as an outside lecturer at the University of Strasbourg.

During this period Schweitzer managed a remarkable amount of work in a day. After intensive studies on Johann Sebastian Bach (1903–1904) and during his preoccupation with research on the life of Jesus (Von Reimarus zu Wrede; From Reimarus to Wrede, 1906), in 1905 he began to study medicine at the faculty of medicine in Strasbourg. He successfully completed these studies in 1913, obtaining a medical degree with his work Die psychiatrische Beurteilung Jesu. Darstellung und Kritik (The Psychiatric Study of Jesus. Exposition and Criticism).

His interest in medicine was linked to the decision that he had already made in 1904 to enter the service of the Paris Missionary Society. However, this Missionary Society mistrusted the liberal theologian, and Schweitzer looked to find a meaningful field of occupation independently in AFRICA as a doctor rather than a theologian. Having been appointed as a professor in the meantime, Schweitzer gave up his position as a vicar and his university career, married Helene Breslau, a nurse (1879–1957), studied tropical medicine in Paris for a further year, and in 1913 went to Lambaréné in Equatorial Africa (Gabon). There he established a hospital with personal funds. The hospital had to be closed in 1917, however, because Schweitzer and his wife were interned by the French authorities for being citizens of the German Empire. In 1918 Schweitzer returned to Alsace, again took up his service as vicar in St. Nicolai, and sought to pay off the debts he had incurred in Africa by giving numerous organ concerts and lectures. In 1920 he decided to continue his work in Lambaréné and in 1924 he emigrated to Africa for the second time. There he spent a total of thirty years in his jungle hospital. In 1957 and 1958 Schweitzer, who kept out of day-to-day politics, spoke out in three radio addresses on Radio Oslo—as the holder of the Nobel Prize for peace, which he had been awarded in 1952—against the dangers of a nuclear war. These addresses attracted much criticism of Schweitzer and contributed, along with the increasing reproaches of COLONIALISM, to his loss of popularity in the 1950s and 1960s. In 1959 Schweitzer left Europe for good and died on September 4, 1965 in Lambaréné.

Range of Interests

Schweitzer's multifaceted works cover the areas of theology, cultural philosophy, and Music. His activities in the field of medicine, for which he was renowned and on the basis of which many are still aware of him today, can be regarded as an integral part and consequence of his theological and philosophical research. Committed to liberal theology, Schweitzer emphasized his support of the school of thought of consistent ESCHATOLOGY: Jesus is the future Messiah whose expectation that upon his sacrifice on the cross the KINGDOM OF GOD would set in immediately was, however, disappointed. Thus, he believed, for today's faith only the spirit of the historical Jesus counted, which came from his word and would conquer the world. Schweitzer also remained true to eschatological ETHICS in his studies on Paul, who is consistently interpreted on the basis of early Jewish writings on the Apocalypse. For Schweitzer, his theological achievement lay in developing an eschatological ethic from an ethic of readiness for the heavenly kingdom to an ethic of being delivered (Mystik des Seins in Christo). As a philosopher of CULTURE Schweitzer, who imposed on philosophy the decline of culture that he had diagnosed, was seeking the basic principle of morality. He found this in his ethic of reverence for life. The key phrase of this was "I am life that wants to live in the midst of other life that wants to live." He came to the conclusion from this that it was good to preserve life but bad to destroy life (Werke V, 158). This "reverence for life" also includes reverence for all animals and plants; for the ethic of reverence, every life is sacred. Schweitzer was fully aware that the development of conflicts from this position was absolutely inevitable: life can exist only at the cost of other life. Yet in this ever-recurring situation of conflict between life and DEATH only the individual can make subjectively justifiable decisions. According to Schweitzer there are no objective criteria for these decisions. In the area of music Schweitzer dedicated his attention to Johann Sebastian Bach and organ playing. He not only produced Kritisch-Praktische Ausgabe des gesammten Orgelwerkes von Bach (New York 1912–1967), but with his study Johann Sebastian Bach (1908) Schweitzer produced a standard work for Bach research.

Schweitzer's impact on today's Protestantism is limited. Whereas his work in Lambaréné is continued in the Albert-Schweitzer Hospital, there is—with few exceptions (Erich Gräßer for example)—little attention paid to Schweitzer in contemporary theology. References to his cultural philosophy have also been marginal. However, a change appears imminent. Schweitzer broke the traditional restrictions of anthropocentric ethics and cleared the way for a global ethic of responsibility, the basic principle of which is “reverence for life.” With a worldwide ecological crisis and unrestricted possibilities in gene technology, Schweitzer’s ethical guidelines are receiving increased attention.

See also Colonialism; Ecology; Jesus, Lives of; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Missions

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Schweitzer, Albert. Gesamtausgabe. Tokyo: 1956–1961.

Schweitzer, Albert. The Psychiatric Study of Jesus. Boston: Beacon Press, 1948.

———. Memoirs of Childhood and Youth. New York: Macmillan, 1949.

———. The Philosophy of Civilization. New York: Macmillan, 1949.

———. Paul and His Interpreters. New York: Macmillan, 1951.

———. J.S.Bach. New York: Dover, 1966.

———. Reverence for Life. New York: Harper & Row, 1969.

———. Out of My Life and Thought. New York: Henry Holt, 1990.

Schweitzer, Albert, and Norman Cousins. The Words of Albert Schweitzer. New York: Newmarket Press, 1984.

Schweitzer, Albert, and John Henry Paul Reumann. The Problem of the Lord’s Supper According to the Scholarly Research of the Nineteenth Century and the Historical Accounts. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1982.

Werke aus dem Nachlaß. vols. I–VIII. Munich, Germany: 1995 ff.

Secondary Sources:

Buri, Fritz. Ehrfurcht vor dem Leben. Albert Schweitzer. Eine Freundesgabe zum 80 Geburtstag. Bern, Switzerland: Haupt, 1955.

Gräßer, Erich. Albert Schweitzer als Theologe. Tübingen, Germany: JCB Mohr, 1979.

———. Albert Schweitzer. Gesammelte Aufsätze. Edited by Andreas Mühlhling. Bodenheim, Germany: Philo-Verlag, 1997.

Griffith, Nancy S., and Laura Person. An International Bibliography. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981.

Günzler, Claus. Albert Schweitzer. Einführung in sein Denken. Munich, Germany: C. H. Beck, 1996.

Pojman, Louis P., ed. Life and Death. A Reader in Moral Problems. Boston: Jones and Bartlett, 1993.

Seaver, George. Albert Schweitzer. The Man and His Mind. London: Adam and Charles Black, 1947.

ANDREAS MÜHLING

SCHWENCKFELD, CASPAR (1489–1561)

German spiritualist reformer. Schwenckfeld was a noble and a courtier in his native Silesia. He became a follower of MARTIN LUTHER in 1519. In 1525 he broke with Luther over the Eucharist (see LORD'S SUPPER). Pressured by Lutheran and Catholic authorities, in 1529 Schwenckfeld went into lifelong exile. Schwenckfeld was distressed by the splintering of the church into competing confessions, and he argued that a visible true church had not existed since the death of the Apostles and that only divine intervention, a new Pentecost, could reestablish it. He denied the CHURCH, the CLERGY, the SACRAMENTS, or even the BIBLE any role in producing saving faith. His followers in South Germany were primarily of the upper classes. The Silesian Schwenckfelder movement, however, embraced entire communities and still survives in Pennsylvania.

Schwenckfeld was born in 1489 at his family's estate in Ossig. He attended university at Cologne (1505) and Frankfurt/Oder (1507), although he left without a degree, as was usual for students of his rank, and in 1510 began his career at court. Responding to Luther's teaching, the young courtier underwent in 1519 the first of several "divine visitations" (Heimsuchungen). These events combined revelation or illumination with a wrenching CONVERSION experience. Schwenckfeld became an important lay leader of the Silesian Lutheran movement. However, Schwenckfeld was disappointed by the lack of moral improvement brought by Luther's REFORMATION. This provoked his second Heimsuchung.

The Eucharistic controversy pitting Luther against ANDREAS KARLSTADT and HULDRYCH ZWINGLI drew Schwenckfeld's attention to the Lord's Supper. Schwenckfeld blamed the missing improvement on confidence in the Lord's Supper to save souls because of Luther's teaching that Christ was present in the bread and wine. Schwenckfeld agreed that if Christ were really present in the bread and wine, the Lord's Supper should in fact bring SALVATION, given that participation in the body and blood of Christ could not fail to cleanse and transform the believer. It was clear, however, that not everyone who received the Lord's Supper manifested such a change. After all, the DEVIL entered into Judas after Judas partook of the bread at the Last Supper. Christ could not be in the Outer Supper, but must be received directly in an Inner Supper. At Schwenckfeld's request and as the result of divine revelation, the humanist Valentin Crautwald provided a new exegesis of the applicable biblical texts using his knowledge of Greek and Hebrew. A 1525 visit to Wittenberg failed to procure Luther's agreement to Schwenckfeld's Eucharistic theology and Crautwald's biblical interpretation. Instead Luther and PHILIPP MELANCHTHON began to warn against the Silesians.

During 1525 and 1526, influenced by Crautwald, Schwenckfeld developed a thoroughgoing SPIRITUALISM. Schwenckfeld's third Heimsuchung (1527) ratified his repudiation of "external" Christianity that he identified with Luther. Schwenckfeld's symbolic interpretation of the Lord's Supper was quite similar to the position of Swiss and South German Reformers such as JOHANNES OECOLAMPADIUS and MARTIN BUCER, although Schwenckfeld also applied similar reasoning to BAPTISM, the church, and the Bible. The Christian did not only commune directly with Christ through the Spirit in the Lord's Supper; the Spirit also inspired saving FAITH directly, not through PREACHING or the Bible. Only after faith was infused could the Christian use the Scriptures with profit. The Outer Word, the Outer Baptism, and Outer Supper merely reflected the Inner Word, Inner Baptism, and Inner Supper that the Christian received directly and that created a new human capable of leading a visibly Christian life. Reliance on the Outer Word and Sacraments produced a dead faith that neither changed the inner person nor produced newness of life.

Schwenckfeld's emphasis on participation in the body and blood of Christ in the Inner Eucharist made his CHRISTOLOGY his most distinctive teaching. He and his followers often described themselves as Confessors of the Glorified Christ. Schwenckfeld taught that God was Father to Christ both in his divinity and humanity. After Christ's death and glorification, his humanity became fully one with the Godhead. Participation in that humanity, and through it the divinity, saved and divinized Christians.

Condemned by both Lutherans and Catholics, Schwenckfeld was forced to leave Silesia in 1529. Despite an initially warm welcome in Strasbourg, he was soon at odds with the clergy. Schwenckfeld's Spiritualism led him to advocate religious TOLERATION and to oppose state churches as unchristian. When combined with his dismissal of the outward church, Schwenckfeld's position made him a threat to the new Protestant churches in the cities of GERMANY and SWITZERLAND. He was asked to leave Strasbourg in 1533. The vehemence of the clergy of Ulm also led that city to expel him. For the rest of his life he remained peripatetic, spending varying periods of time in cities and in the castles of nobles sympathetic to him. He died in Ulm in 1563.

Schwenckfeld built a network of landed nobles and urban patricians throughout South Germany. With them he conducted an extensive correspondence, much of which survives. WOMEN were especially prominent recipients of his letters, and often were the leaders of Schwenckfelder groups. He seemed especially popular with physicians and lawyers. Because of his many powerful supporters, he was also able to publish extensively, much to the chagrin of his clerical opponents. His books won him disciples among the middle classes in the cities, and this put him in direct competition with Anabaptist groups. Although often categorized with the Anabaptists, Schwenckfeld's controversy with PILGRAM MARPECK made clear the differences separating ANABAPTISM and Schwenckfeld's Spiritualism.

See also Lutheranism, Germany

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Schwenckfeld, Caspar. Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum. Leipzig, Germany: Breitkopf & Hartel, 1907–1961.

———. Commentary on the Augsburg Confession. Pennsburg, PA: Schwenckfelder Library, 1982.

———. The Correspondence of Caspar Schwenckfeld of Ossig and the Landgrave Philip of Hesse, 1535–1561. Leipzig, Germany: Breitkopf & Hartel, 1908.

Secondary Sources:

Erb, Peter E., ed. Schwenckfeld and Early Schwenckfeldianism. Pennsburg, PA: Schwenckfelder Library, 1986.

McLaughlin, R. Emmet. Caspar Schwenckfeld: Reluctant Radical. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.

———. The Freedom of the Spirit, Social Privilege, and Religious Dissent: Caspar Schwenckfeld and the Schwenckfelders. Baden-Baden, Germany: Éditions Valentin Koerner, 1996.

Schantz, Douglas. Crautwald and Erasmus. A Study in Humanism and Radical Reform in Sixteenth Century Silesia. Baden-Baden, Germany: Éditions Valentin Koerner, 1992.

Weigelt, Horst. The Schwenckfelders in Silesia. Translated by Peter C. Erb. Pennsburg, PA: Schwenckfelder Library, 1985.

R. EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

SCIENCE

The origins of modern science are usually traced to seventeenth-century Europe. The fact that the rise of science follows closely upon the Protestant REFORMATION has led to considerable speculation about the impact of Protestantism on the emergence of modern science, and on the ways in which Protestant doctrines and practices may have encouraged the development of the sciences. The Protestant work ethic, theological voluntarism, Protestant anthropology, biblical literalism, and antisacramentalism are aspects of Protestantism that have been plausibly linked to the emergence of modern science in the seventeenth century. The subsequent relationship between Protestantism and science throughout the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries was mostly positive, largely because of a strong tradition of natural theology that informed the natural sciences. From the middle of the nineteenth century, however, the advent of evolutionary theory and the growing influence and prestige of the sciences together provoked diverse reactions from different sectors within Protestantism. The historical interactions of Protestantism and science are an important aspect of the history of modernity.

The Merton Thesis

As early as the seventeenth century, figures associated with the new sciences drew attention to possible connections between Protestantism and the new forms of natural philosophy. In the seminal work The Advancement of Learning (1605), FRANCIS BACON maintained that the reformation of the Christian church was part of a more comprehensive reformation of knowledge that had been ordained by providence to take place at this time. Arguments suggesting a common origin in divine providence for parallel reformations in religion and learning were not uncommon among Protestant thinkers in the seventeenth century. Not until the twentieth century, however, were formal attempts made to establish more direct causal connections between Protestantism and the emergence of modern science. In the 1930s the sociologist Robert Merton identified a strong link between Puritan commitment and scientific achievement. Merton argued that Protestants, and Puritans in particular, were disproportionately represented in the ranks of seventeenth-century scientists, pointing out that of the ten figures who formed the nucleus of the Royal Society in its formative stages, seven were Puritans. By 1663, he observed, almost two-thirds of the Society were Puritans at a period during which Puritans constituted a minority in the general population. To account for this apparently remarkable correlation, Merton invoked the “Weber-Tawney” thesis, which associated the rise of capitalism with the “Protestant work ethic” (see MAX WEBER).

Merton suggested that the same “this-worldly asceticism,” which inspired Puritans to more energetic economic activity, also promoted an engagement with the natural world and motivated diligent, scientific enquiry.

The Merton thesis has not proven convincing to all historians. The term “puritan” is problematic, and it has often been pointed out that a number of the individuals Merton identified as “puritans” had broader religious commitments than those suggested by this narrow designation. Moreover, many of the pioneers of early modern science—JOHANNES KEPLER, Galileo Galilei, René Descartes, and William Harvey—had made their most important contributions well before the ascendancy of PURITANISM, a movement that was in any case typically English. Galileo and Descartes, of course, were Catholics, as were other leading figures in the new sciences. Such criticisms allow for a more general link between Protestantism and science, and even for the possibility that Protestantism might have provided fertile ground for the development of science once it had been established, but they cast some doubt on the nexus of the Calvinist doctrine of ELECTION, the Protestant work ethic, and scientific activity.

Voluntarism, Original Sin, and Experimental Science

Another widely held view that links Protestantism with the development of empirical science is the “voluntarism and science” thesis. Theological voluntarism is generally understood as the DOCTRINE according to which God’s will is his primary attribute, and is prior to his reason and goodness. For the voluntarist none of God’s acts is necessitated by such considerations as wisdom and goodness. In the moral realm this means that what is good is so only because God wills it. In the physical realm voluntarism is thought to entail the view that all events that occur in NATURE do so contingently, and it follows that nature must be investigated empirically. To put it another way, for the voluntarist, God could have instituted any one of an infinite range of natural orders. To determine which of these God actually chose, recourse must be had to observation of nature. Moreover, because God’s choices in this regard were not driven by reasons, rational speculation can provide no insights into the particular laws that God chose to institute in the physical realm. Voluntarism is said to have originated among certain late medieval thinkers, and is associated with the Protestant reformers. It is commonly asserted that the promotion of a voluntarist conception of God on the part of Protestant theologians provided one of the metaphysical foundations for the development of empirical science.

Aspects of this view have also been subjected to criticism. Whether voluntarism can be characterized as a typically Protestant theological position is open to question, not least because such prominent Catholic natural philosophers as Pierre Gassendi and Descartes were also voluntarists. The case of Descartes further complicates the issue, given that not only was he an extreme voluntarist but, unlike Gassendi and most other voluntarists, he was famously committed to rationalism. Thus, for Descartes, at least some fundamental laws of nature could be known through reason alone, without empirical investigation of natural states of affairs. The case of Descartes weakens any thesis of an exclusive connection between Protestantism, voluntarism, and empiricism.

Yet there is little doubt that voluntarism played an important role in the early modern development of the concept of laws of nature, a concept of central importance in modern science. The Aristotelian science of the Middle Ages typically sought explanations in terms of the inherent properties of physical objects. It tended, moreover, to be qualitative rather than quantitative. During this period the domain of “natural laws” had been the moral rather than the physical realm. Laws of nature were then typically understood as universal moral principles that could be known through the exercise of reason (see NATURAL LAW). The early modern period witnessed the extension of the idea of natural laws to the physical world, and voluntarism was central to this development. The notion that God directly exercised control over nature through the external imposition of mathematical laws replaced the older view of a natural world that was ordered according to the intrinsic properties of self-governing matter. Inasmuch as science now concerns itself with the discovery of laws of nature, it is indebted to the voluntarist conception of a divine legislator who imposed laws on the physical universe. Although it is clear that such Protestant thinkers as ROBERT BOYLE and ISAAC NEWTON played a key role in this transition, voluntarist contributions to this new science of nature were not confined to Protestant thinkers, as the cases of Gassendi and Descartes illustrate.

Another explanation for the rise of experimental science that finds a special place for the role of Protestant thought relates to the reformers’ stress on the limited capacities of the fallen human mind. MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN both argued that the human mind had been corrupted as a consequence of the Fall—a view that differed from the standard Thomist position according to which Adam’s mind had merely suffered a privation of supernatural gifts. This stance also contrasted with that of Aristotle, who had assumed that the mind and the senses were generally reliable, and that science could therefore be premised on commonsense observations of nature in its normal state. The more pessimistic assessments of human cognitive capacities that the reformers promoted informed the mitigated skepticism of what came to be known as “the experimental philosophy,” championed by Francis Bacon, Robert Boyle, and the Royal Society. This inductive approach eschewed the certainty and confidence that characterized both the uncritical empiricism of Aristotelian science and the optimistic rationalism of Descartes. For the experimentalists, knowledge of nature would come as the end result of long and laborious procedures and the cumulative labors of many generations. Even then, it would produce knowledge that was probable at best. Related to this approach was the conviction that because nature itself had fallen, it was no longer transparent to human investigators in the way it had been for Adam in the Garden of Eden—hence, again, the need to manipulate nature experimentally and to probe its secrets more actively than had previously been thought necessary. In this manner the renewed emphasis on the Fall and on its cognitive effects that followed in the wake of the Reformation helped shape the experimental approach to nature that plays so important a role in the history of the natural sciences.

Science, Scripture, and the Symbolic View of Nature

It is often supposed that an emphasis on the AUTHORITY of scripture, particularly when combined with a preference for literalism, will inevitably give rise to conflicts with scientific conceptions of nature. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, however, literal approaches to the interpretation of scripture actually made an important contribution to the revolution that was taking place in the sciences. From the time of the Church Fathers, and for most of the Middle Ages, the literal sense of scripture formed the foundation on which figurative or allegorical readings were constructed. Although in principle the literal sense enjoyed primacy, in practice allegorical readings of scripture often displaced the literal. This tendency to elevate the importance of nonliteral readings was vigorously opposed during the Renaissance by both humanist scholars and Protestant reformers, who insisted that scripture be interpreted primarily in its grammatical or literal sense.

The relevance of this for the rise of science lies in the fact that the allegorical mentality of medieval scholars was premised on a particular view of nature. Allegory entailed the view that natural objects bore moral and theological meanings. As both Augustine and Thomas Aquinas had explained, determination of the literal sense of scripture lay in identifying the objects to which the words referred. The allegorical meaning, however, had to do with the meanings of the objects. In the literal sense words referred to objects; in the allegorical sense objects referred to other objects. Allegorical readings thus extended to the natural world, which was at that time regarded primarily as a locus of transcendental truths. Nature was scrutinized primarily for its meanings, rather than being understood in terms of causal or mathematical relations. The demise of allegory in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries—a situation to which the Protestant preference for the literal sense was a major contributing factor—was thus accompanied by the need to reorder a natural world now evacuated of its rich symbolic theological and moral associations. The mathematical sciences along with new classificatory schemes of natural history that we associate with the new sciences came to fill the vacuum left by the collapse of the symbolic world of the Middle Ages. The rise of biblical literalism was thus one of the factors that paved the way for a scientific understanding of nature.

Other features of Protestantism, in particular a suspicion of images and of the visual realm, further contributed to the decline of the symbolic understanding of nature. Central to medieval WORSHIP had been the spectacle of the mass, and religious experience was mediated by additional sacramental performances, along with images, statuary, and VESTMENTS. The reformers had not only vested authority in the literal words of a single text, but had changed the emphasis of worship to the PREACHING of the word. As a further consequence of their elevation of word over visual representation, “idolatrous” images and statues were replaced by inscriptions of the Decalogue or other passages of scripture. Protestant reforms thus utterly transformed the sensory context of religious worship, and arguably revolutionized religious experience generally. In all of this Protestant reformers evinced a profound distrust of the visual sense, which was held responsible for idolatry in religion and illicit curiosity in matters of the sciences. This suspicion of all things visual was inevitably felt in the empirical sciences, and complemented the general skepticism about the possibility of knowledge that arose out of the more pessimistic anthropology of the reformers. Experimentation, the use of magnifying instruments, the development of protocols for judging observation reports, communal witnessing, emphasis on the corporate nature of the scientific enterprise, and the development of formal theories of vision were all part of a response to the crisis of visual representation precipitated by the Protestant Reformation.

Biblical literalism also promoted the new sciences of the early modern period in another way. New, purely historical readings of the creation narratives in Genesis provided seventeenth-century thinkers with powerful motivating images for pursuing the natural sciences. Adam was thought to have possessed a perfect knowledge of all sciences, a knowledge lost to posterity when he fell from grace and was expelled from the Garden of Eden. Seventeenth-century scientists such as Bacon and his successors in the Royal Society saw as their goal the regaining of the scientific knowledge of the first man. Indeed, for these individuals the whole scientific enterprise was an integral part of a redemptive endeavor that, along with the Christian religion, was to help restore the human race to its original perfection. The biblical account of the creation, shorn of allegorical elements, provided these early scientists with an important source of motivation, and in an age still thoroughly committed to traditional Christianity the new science was to gain social legitimacy on account of these religious associations.

The Age of Physico-Theology

Throughout the Middle Ages, plants, animals, and stones had served the human race not merely for practical purposes but had represented moral and theological truths. All of this had been part of the symbolic and sacramental view of medieval Catholicism. The denial of symbolic functions to natural objects, which came in the wake of the Reformation, brought with it a renewed emphasis on the practical uses of the creatures. It was still held that God had made the creatures for human use, but these uses were increasingly understood in terms of how they might be exploited for practical purposes rather than what they might have represented symbolically. Throughout the eighteenth century and well into the nineteenth, an important justification for scientific investigation was that these practices enabled human investigators to discern the practical uses of natural objects that God had intended for God's human creatures.

At the same time, some theological truths were still held to be apparent in nature. If animals and plants no longer symbolized theological and moral truths, they nonetheless constituted evidence of God's wisdom and goodness. The study of nature thus served not merely to minister to physical human needs, but remained in some sense a theological activity. This was particularly so in ENGLAND, where a strong tradition of natural theology flourished. The study of nature was thought to demonstrate the wisdom and power of God, and natural theology and natural history were virtually indistinguishable. To investigate the natural world was to study God's providential handiwork, and the discipline of natural history consisted largely of the enumeration of instances of divine design or contrivance. So intimate was the connection between theology and the study of nature that a new hybrid discipline known as “physico-theology” emerged at this time. WILLIAM PALEY’S Natural Theology (1801) is the best known example of the genre. It became one of the standard texts at CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY, and influenced the young Charles Darwin during his student days there. For their part, Catholic thinkers, too, contributed to this tradition, although not perhaps with the same enthusiasm as English clergymen. Relations between Protestantism and science throughout the eighteenth century and for much of the nineteenth thus tended to be congenial and close.

The Conflict Myth

Two developments in the latter half of the nineteenth century and one in the early twentieth century were to disturb the happy alliance represented by the discipline of physico-theology. First, the appearance in 1859 of Darwin’s Origin of Species seemed to challenge both biblical authority and theological claims about the uniqueness of human beings. Second, the nineteenth century witnessed the emergence of the professional scientist and the beginnings of a concerted campaign to improve the social standing of the sciences. Attempts were made to give science a central place in the university curriculum, to establish mechanisms for its public funding, and through the formation of professional societies, generally to enhance its social prestige. The final development, which took place early in the twentieth century, was the emergence in the UNITED STATES of a conservative form of evangelical Protestantism that became known as FUNDAMENTALISM. Together, these factors led to a new phase in the relationship between Protestantism and science.

With regard to DARWINISM, it must be pointed out that nineteenth-century criticisms came from a variety of sources, not all of them religious. As was the case with Galileo’s advocacy of the heliocentric hypothesis, there were significant disputes within the scientific community itself over the merits of the theory. Two issues proved controversial: the mechanism of natural selection, and the method that Darwin had used to arrive at his theory. By the third decade of the twentieth century, however, most scientists had come to accept both natural selection and the Darwinian hypothetico-deductive method. To a degree, the reactions of both Catholics and the major Protestant denominations mirrored those of the scientific community. Genesis was interpreted in ways that could be reconciled with evolutionary theory, and it was argued that the special status of human beings was unaffected by a common ancestry with apes. Up until the 1930s many conservative Protestants regarded the “days” of creation set out in the first Genesis creation narrative as long periods of time, and were thus able to give qualified support to evolutionary thought.

As for the nineteenth-century attempts to raise the profile of the sciences, one common strategy called for the complete elimination of all religious and moral elements from the sphere of the natural sciences. Science was to be a secular discipline, and its methods were to be informed by methodological agnosticism. This development coincided neatly with Darwinism, which had made the alliance between natural religion and natural history superfluous. Some went further in prosecuting this agenda to make the additional claim that science and religion were, in fact, inimical. Andrew Dickson White's History of the Warfare between Science and Religion (1896) and John Draper's History of the Conflict between Religion and Science (1875) famously advanced the thesis that throughout history religion had been a regressive force that had obstructed scientific progress. Thus was the myth of an ongoing warfare between science and religion born. Although its historical merits are dubious, its legacy is pervasive, and it continues to attract adherents. Subsequent fundamentalist rejections of science also fueled the perception of conflict. Equally significant is the fact that the improved fortunes of the sciences—the consequence of these nineteenth-century developments—effected a subtle inversion of the power relations between science and religion. Scientists assumed the mantle of authority that once had rested on the CLERGY. By the end of the nineteenth century science had become a cultural force to be reckoned with.

Twentieth-Century Developments

The newly established independence of science, along with its growing prestige, led to a number of reactions within the Christian church. On the one hand, over the course of the twentieth century, Protestant and Catholic thinkers alike have sought to reconcile theological doctrines with the findings and methods of the sciences. WOLFHART PANNENBERG is perhaps the most prominent Protestant theologian to attempt such a rapprochement. The beginning of the twenty-first century has seen the development of a burgeoning field of “science and theology” that has attracted the attention of theologians and theologically inclined scientists. This development represents not only a defensive apologetic strategy on the part of some theologians, but a genuine rekindling of interest in theological issues on the part of some within the scientific community. In certain instances, the primacy of the sciences has led to major reformulation or even abandonment of fundamental Christian doctrines. PROCESS THEOLOGY might be regarded as an instance of the latter.

On the other hand, the perceived displacement of religion from the center of the cultural life of the West has provoked an entirely different response from some conservative Protestants, particularly in North America. Fundamentalist groups, to some degree correctly, regard science as having been responsible for the increasing marginalization of Christianity in the modern West and for its waning influence in public life. For such groups science, and more specifically the teachings of evolutionary scientists, represent a threat to the literal truths of Scripture and to important Christian beliefs, and as a consequence must be vigorously resisted. By the same token fundamentalists have also rejected the “liberal” theological positions of fellow Protestants who, in their view, have too easily capitulated to the sciences and have under-played genuine areas of conflict. Paradoxically, even fundamentalists have tacitly acknowledged the cultural prestige of the sciences, representing themselves as adhering to an alternative scientific thesis—CREATION SCIENCE. If biblical literalism helped to pave the way for the emergence of scientific culture in the early modern period and provided motivations for its first practitioners, the same cannot be said for the twentieth century.

Some Qualifications and Concluding Remarks

General claims about purported relationships between Protestantism and science need to be viewed in the light of four important qualifications. First, caution needs to be exercised in taking at face value the claims of contemporary historical actors for the positive influence of Protestantism on the development of science. In the seventeenth century, when tension between rival modes of Christianity in Europe was at a high point, utterances about some supposed connection between Protestantism and the advancement of knowledge could function as anti-Catholic polemic. It suited the purposes of Protestant apologists to portray Catholicism as dogmatic, authoritarian, and backward looking. Similarly polemical motives are apparent in the distorted historical treatments written by the nineteenth-century progenitors of the warfare model, although in this instance, criticism was extended to religion generally. It is important, in short, to consider likely sources of historical bias in accounts of the historical relations between science and religion.

Second, although this article has alluded to possible positive influences of Protestantism on the development of early modern science, its silence with regard to Catholicism should not be interpreted to mean that no contribution was forthcoming from that quarter. Mention has already been made of Descartes and Gassendi. A comprehensive account of the relations between science and Christianity would include a more complete account of Catholic contributions.

Third, "Protestantism" is not now, if it ever was, a monolithic phenomenon. The range of attitudes toward science exhibited by Protestants from the end of the nineteenth century is sufficient testimony to this principle. Ideally, claims about relationships between Protestantism and science should specify which Protestants, in what place, and during which historical period. Moreover, in seeking to identify possible historical influences it is important to distinguish Protestant doctrines from Protestant practices. With respect to the Reformation, likewise, the social and political conditions that ensued in its wake need to be considered separately from the explicit intentions of its principal architects. To speak of the impact of Protestantism, then, is to have regard to its doctrines, its practices, and the conditions that it generated. These are not the same and may have different and even contrary consequences.

Fourth, similar considerations apply to science. There is a popular image of "science" as a unitary entity that endures over time, and that generates reliable knowledge through the application of "the scientific method." However, the cultural institution "science," as we currently understand it, is really the product of the nineteenth century. It was then that the term "scientist" first appeared, that professional associations were formed, that the sciences began to consolidate their place in the university curriculum, and that the study of nature became a genuinely secular enterprise. This is not say that the seventeenth-century developments usually referred to as "the scientific revolution" are not central to the genealogy of modern science. However, inasmuch as scientific and religious concerns were inextricably bound together at this time, the study of nature was of necessity a somewhat different activity from the secular sciences of late modernity. In addition, now more than ever, there is a plurality of sciences each with a distinct subject matter and range of methodologies. Indeed, it is these differences that account for the fact that it is evolutionary biology that generates the most conflict in science-religion discussions, whereas cosmology tends to be cordially embraced as a useful ally—almost the reverse of the situation of the eighteenth century.

With these qualifications in mind, three broad conclusions can be drawn about Protestantism and science. First, there are good reasons to suppose that Protestantism played a significant role in the emergence of modern science, both because of its doctrines and practices, and as a consequence of the social conditions that it generated. Second, cordial relations between Protestantism and science persisted through the eighteenth century and into the nineteenth. Third, current diversity within both Protestantism and the sciences is reflected in a diversity of relationships.

See also Biblical Inerrancy

References and Further Reading

- Brooke, John Hedley. Science and Religion: Some Historical Perspectives. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Cohen, I. Bernard, ed. Puritanism and the Rise of Modern Science: The Merton Thesis. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1990.
- Harrison, Peter. "Original Sin and the Problem of Knowledge in Early Modern Europe." Journal of the History of Ideas 63 (2002):239–259.
- . "Voluntarism and Early Modern Science." History of Science 40 (2002):63–89.
- . The Bible, Protestantism and the Rise of Natural Science. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Klaaren, Eugene. Religious Origins of Modern Science. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1977.
- Lindberg, David, and Ronald Numbers, eds. God and Nature: Historical Essays on the Encounter between Christianity and Science. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986.
- Livingstone, David N., D. G. Hart, and Mark A. Noll, eds. Evangelicals and Science in Historical Perspective. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Merton, Robert K. Science, Technology and Society in Seventeenth-Century England. New York: Harper, 1970.
- Osler, Margaret. Divine Will and the Mechanical Philosophy: Gassendi and Descartes on Contingency and Necessity in the Created World. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Russell, Colin A. "The Conflict Metaphor and its Social Origins." Science and Christian Belief 1 (1989):3–26.
- Turner, Frank. "The Victorian Conflict between Science and Religion: A Professional Dimension." Isis 49 (1978):356–376.
- Webster, Charles. The Great Instauration: Science Medicine and Reform 1626–1660. London: Duckworth, 1975.

PETER HARRISON

SCIENTISM

Scientism in the strongest sense is the view that everything could and should be understood in terms of science. Science is then typically interpreted in a narrow way, referring only to the natural sciences. A weaker version of scientism holds that as much as possible could and should be understood in terms of science. It is assumed that there is something problematic, inferior, or even irrational about activities or enterprises that could not be understood in such a way.

In what follows a background to scientism is given, different versions of scientism are distinguished, and the criticism that scientism has received especially from Protestant thinkers is presented.

Background

The overwhelming intellectual and practical successes of SCIENCE have led some people to think that there are no real limits to the competence of science, no limits to what can be achieved in the name of science. There is nothing outside the domain of science, nor is there any area of human life to which science cannot successfully be applied. A scientific account of anything and everything constitutes the full story of the universe and its inhabitants. Or, if there are limits to the scientific enterprise, the idea is that science at least sets the boundaries for what we humans can ever know about reality. This is the view of scientism.

The historical roots of scientism can probably be traced to the ENLIGHTENMENT with its ideology of progress and perfectibility. Perhaps its most well-known historical advocate is the French social philosopher Auguste Comte (1798–1857) and his attempt to create a religion based on science: the “Religion of Humanity.” Another interesting and far-reaching attempt to have science take over many of the functions of religion and thus itself become a religion was made by the German chemist and Nobel Prize-winner Wilhelm Ostwald (1853–1932). He argued for science as an “Ersatzreligion”—a substitute religion. Yet many different forms of scientism have emerged over the last three centuries.

During the last three decades, an increasing number of distinguished natural scientists, including Peter Atkins, Richard Dawkins, Carl Sagan, and Edward O. Wilson (as well as philosophers like Daniel D. Dennett and Michael Ruse), have advocated scientism in one form or another. Besides receiving a number of prestigious scientific prizes and awards, these scientists have sold an enormous number of books. Their views have been discussed in newspapers and have been broadcast on radio and television. If scientism has been around for a while, the great impact these advocates of scientism have had on popular Western CULTURE is new. They have brought not only science, but also scientism, into the living room of ordinary people.

Different Versions of Scientism

All advocates of scientism believe that the boundaries of science (i.e., the natural sciences) could and should be expanded in such a way that something not previously understood as science can become a part of science. Thus a possible synonym for scientism is scientific expansionism. How exactly the boundaries of science should be expanded and what more precisely it is that is to be included within science are issues on which there is disagreement, and for this reason, scientism cannot immediately be equated with scientific naturalism or materialism (although such an equation is often correct). Scientific naturalism or materialism is roughly the view that all genuine knowledge about reality is to be found through science and science alone, and that matter (or matter and energy) is the fundamental reality in the universe.

The most common way of defining scientism, however, is to say that it is the view that science tells us everything there is to know about reality. The epistemological version of scientism is an attempt to expand the boundaries of science in such a way that all genuine (in contrast to apparent) knowledge must either be scientific or at least be reducible to scientific knowledge. Everything outside science is therefore taken as a matter of mere belief and subjective opinion. Consequently, the agenda of the scientists who accept this form of scientism is to strive to incorporate many other areas of human life within the sciences, so that rational consideration and acquisition of knowledge can be made possible in these fields as well. This is a part of the mission of the scientific faith: In a demon-haunted world, science is the candle in the dark. Epistemic scientism raises an obvious challenge to Christianity (or any other religion). Christianity could give us knowledge about God, human beings, and the world only if those knowledge claims could be confirmed by the methods of the natural sciences, because genuine knowledge—according to this version of scientism—could be obtained only through such methods.

Another way of expanding the boundaries of science is to maintain that science not only can fully explain morality, but also can replace traditional ETHICS and tell us how we ought to behave. Science, contrary to what we previously have thought, can justify ethical norms and beliefs and provide us with a new, scientific ethic. However, for a claim to be scientific in this sense, it must maintain more than that science is relevant to ethics. Nobody would deny that. Rather, it must state that science is the sole (or at least by far the most important) source for developing a moral theory and explaining moral behavior. To the extent that advocates of normative scientism offer an account of morality that contradicts a Christian understanding of morality, it creates a challenge to Christianity. So, for instance, if science (as some evolutionary biologists claim) can show that morality is an illusion and ultimately about selfishness or maximizing one's reproductive success, then genuine altruism of the Mother Teresa kind seems not to be possible or at least irrational. But, according to Christians, altruistic people such as Mother Teresa behave rather in the most rational way, because they actually reflect the unselfishly loving character of God.

Perhaps the most astonishing kind of scientism is the one that expresses a belief in the salvific mission of science. The idea is that because we have modern science, we no longer have to resort to superstition when faced with such deep problems as “Is there a meaning to life?”, “What are we here for?”, and “What is human nature?”, because science is capable of dealing with all these questions and constitutes in addition the only alternative to superstition. Science can be our new religion and answer our existential questions. Indeed, we ought to become “science believers” and leave our traditional religions behind. Scientism in this form is the idea of SALVATION through science alone. Salvific scientism is the view that science alone cannot only fully explain traditional religion and but also replace it.

Criticism of Scientism

Scientism (including scientific naturalism) has been severely criticized by many Protestant thinkers, including Ian Barbour, Alvin Plantinga, Huston Smith, Mikael Stenmark, and Keith Ward, as well as by other groups of scientists and scholars. The critical responses have differed, depending on what form of scientism is being analyzed and what understanding of Christianity is being defended. The main criticism, however, is that the advocates of scientism, in their attempt to expand the boundaries of science, base their arguments not merely on scientific, but also on philosophical premises, and thus scientism is not science proper, but rather naturalism or atheism disguised.

Perhaps the most embarrassing problem for spokes-persons for scientism is that one of its central claims seems to be self-refuting. The difficulty is that the scientific belief that we can only know what science can tell us (epistemic scientism) seems to be something that science cannot tell us. How can one set up a scientific experiment to demonstrate the truth of that claim? It seems impossible. But we cannot know that scientific knowledge is the only mode of knowledge unless we are able to determine this by scientific means. This is so simply because science—according to epistemic scientism—sets the limits for what we can possibly know. Hence the claim that we can only know what science can tell us falsifies itself. If it is true, then it is false.

See also Natural Law

References and Further Reading

- Atkins, Peter. “The Limitless Power of Science,” in Nature’s Imagination: The Frontiers of Scientific Vision. Edited by John Cornwell. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Dawkins, Richard. The Selfish Gene. 2nd ed. Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1989.

Midgley, Mary. Science as Salvation. London: Routledge, 1992.

Smith, Huston. Why Religion Matters: The Fate of the Human Spirit in an Age of Disbelief. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 2001.

Sorell, Tom. Scientism: Philosophy and the Infatuation with Science. London: Routledge, 1991.

Stenmark, Mikael. Scientism: Science, Ethics and Religion. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2001.

Ward, Keith. God, Change and Necessity. Oxford, UK: One-world Publications, 1996.

Wilson, Edward O. On Human Nature. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1978.

MIKAEL STENMARK

SCOFIELD REFERENCE BIBLE

The Scofield Reference Bible emerged as one of the most influential texts in twentieth-century evangelicalism and fundamentalism shortly after Oxford University Press published the first edition in 1909. Conceptualized and compiled by the Reverend Cyrus Ingerson Scofield (1843–1921), the BIBLE contained a series of connected topical references known as “chain links,” extensive annotations, attractive paragraphing, and supplementary material aimed at explaining and clarifying the KING JAMES VERSION text for average readers. Theologically, Scofield’s commentary supported, reflected, and somewhat modified the views associated with John Darby and the Plymouth Brethren, dividing the Bible into seven historical periods known as dispensations and arguing for the pre-tribulation secret rapture of the true Christian church. The reference bible proved extraordinary popular and has sold tens of millions of copies since its initial appearance. Scofield himself revised and prepared a second edition in 1917, and Oxford issued a third edition in 1967 under the supervision of an editorial board that consisted of leading evangelical and fundamentalist scholars.

Cyrus Ingerson Scofield

Details concerning Scofield’s life remain somewhat sketchy and controversial. Supporters and detractors have contested various biographical facts and drawn deeply contrasting portraits of the man, but several common themes and elements emerge from their accounts. Scofield was born on August 19, 1843, in Lenawee County, Michigan, not far from the Ohio border, where his parents farmed and operated a saw-mill. At some point, probably in the late 1850s, Scofield migrated to Wilson County, Tennessee, and at the outbreak of the CIVIL WAR, enlisted in the Confederate army, serving one year with the Tennessee infantry. By the late 1860s, he had relocated to St. Louis, married into a prominent local family, and commenced the study of law under the patronage of his wealthy in-laws. Politics and legal work occupied Scofield for the next decade as he moved his family to Kansas, earned election to the state legislature as a Republican, and was appointed U.S. attorney for Kansas. Personal problems, legal troubles, and continual bouts with alcohol apparently cut short his political career in the early 1870s, and Scofield subsequently moved back to St. Louis, leaving his family behind. His wife ultimately secured a final divorce decree in 1883, retaining custody of the couple’s two children.

At some point in 1879, Scofield apparently underwent a conversion experience in St. Louis. He began studying Christianity under the prominent Presbyterian minister and ardent dispensationalist James Hall Brookes, assisted in DWIGHT L. MOODY'S urban evangelistic campaign, joined the Pilgrim Congregational Church, and became acting director of the St. Louis YMCA. Within a very short time, Scofield earned a considerable reputation with the growing pan-denominational coalition of conservative Protestants that would eventually coalesce into the fundamentalist movement. In 1882 the Congregationalist Church's American Home Missions Board for the Southwest called Scofield to Dallas, Texas, where he remarried and spent the next twelve years slowly transforming a struggling congregation into the influential First Congregational Church, subsequently renamed Scofield Memorial Church. After pastoring Moody's Trinitarian Congregational Church in East Northfield, Massachusetts from 1895 through 1902, Scofield returned to Dallas and served basically as an absentee pastor while working on his reference Bible project. Scofield severed his connection with the Dallas church and with congregationalism generally in 1909, perhaps owing to his conviction that the denomination had grown too liberal and modernist in its sympathies. He affiliated with the Southern Presbyterian Church at Paris, Texas, and relocated to Long Island shortly thereafter. Scofield launched a popular correspondence course and night school in New York City and successfully completed his second edition of the Reference Bible. Plagued by ill health for the last several years of his life, Scofield died at Douglaston, New York, on July 24, 1921.

Scofield's prominence in evangelical and fundamentalist circles owed principally to his cultivation of, and participation in, a growing network of conservative Christian institutions that began to take shape in the late nineteenth century. He participated regularly in the annual Bible conferences that drew together a national evangelical cohort interested in exploring prophecy belief and debating premillennial themes each summer in pleasant resort settings. Scofield also developed his own correspondence courses based on his interpretations of biblical text. Indeed, he proved instrumental in conceptualizing, founding, and/or managing several important Protestant institutions, including: Lake Charles College, Northfield Bible Training School, New York Night School of the Bible, Central American Mission, and Philadelphia School of the Bible. His writings reflect a consistent commitment to dispensational premillennialism; his career pattern illustrates his effort to forge a broad Christian coalition that transcended denominational boundaries. The publication of The Scofield Reference Bible in 1909 most clearly articulated his theological views and proved to be a critical document in both coalescing conservative Christian sentiment and providing coherence to the somewhat inchoate fundamentalist movement.

First Edition

Scofield's closest friends and associates recalled that he began formulating his plan for a reference bible during the early years of his Dallas pastorate, but that he did not thoroughly commit himself to the endeavor until July 1901, while attending a summer Bible conference at Sea Cliff on Long Island. Evangelical colleagues enthusiastically embraced the concept and encouraged him to persist. Initial financial support came from Alwyn Ball, Jr., a wealthy New York City real estate broker attending the Bible conference, and from John T. Pirie, the Chicago-based department store magnate whose Sea Cliff estate hosted the Christian gathering. Recognizing the need to minimize pastoral responsibilities, Scofield returned to First Congregational Church in Dallas in December 1902 and negotiated a protracted sabbatical. He spent the next several years working on the Bible project, primarily in Europe, where he also established a connection with Henry Frowde, the head of Oxford University Press. Frowde promoted the reference Bible to officials at Oxford's American Branch, and the first edition appeared in 1909.

Several core principles, reflected both in the introduction to the 1909 edition and in discussions with colleagues, undergirded Scofield's work. First, and perhaps foremost, he committed himself to using the King James text rather than the Revised Version of 1885. Although he acknowledged the significance of nineteenth-century biblical scholarship and the discovery of ancient monastic manuscripts in the 1840s and 1850s, Scofield believed that these developments confirmed the essential accuracy of the Authorized Version and that minor corrections might be addressed through emendations and textual notes. The reference Bible thus both confirmed and contributed to the general popularity of the King James Version and, in Scofield's view, allowed him to combine up-to-date scholarly viewpoints with the perceived literary merit of the 1611 translation.

Second, he sought to base his book on the soundest contemporary scholarship, while avoiding interpretations that he viewed as representing mere novelties. "The Editor disclaims originality," he proudly announced in his introduction, and Scofield clearly intended the reference bible to reflect evangelical orthodoxy rather than to offer interpretive breakthroughs. Accordingly, he assembled an impressive list of consulting editors in order to lend broader credibility to the project, and their names constituted many of the leading conservative voices in early twentieth-century Protestantism: Arno C. Gaebelein (1841–1945), ARTHUR T. PIERSON, James M. Gray, William J. Erdman, Henry G. Weston, Elmore Harris, and W. G. Moorehead. Scofield composed much of the text abroad, working at Oxford, England, and Montreaux, Switzerland where he claimed to have consulted several leading European biblical scholars and have used the most sophisticated academic libraries.

Third, Scofield's distinctive method of linking topical references and concepts throughout the Bible remained in his mind a significant advance over older "unscientific" methods. His chain links allowed readers to systematically trace keywords and themes throughout the Scriptures, thereby creating a sense of unity, consistency, and coherence across the entire text. Scofield especially emphasized prophetic beliefs, carefully linking their exposition in the Hebrew Bible to their fulfillment in the New Testament. Further, Scofield intended the topical references to provide readers with a holistic view of Scripture that discouraged them from drawing hasty generalizations and from quoting material out of context.

Other editorial decisions also differentiated his work from the growing body of biblical commentaries, study helps, and exegetical literature that flooded the early twentieth-century Christian book market. Scofield offered simple and straightforward definitions of such controversial concepts as sin, grace, and justification. Brief introductory notes preceded each book of the Bible, and italicized subheads guided the reader topically through the subsequent text. Explanatory notes appeared on the same page as the concepts under review, thus facilitating ready reference. Difficult and obscure words received pronunciation aids. Throughout his introduction Scofield repeatedly emphasized the average reader as his intended audience and his principal aim involved making the Bible more accessible and understandable to a broader reading public.

In the final analysis, the most distinctive feature of The Scofield Reference Bible, and the characteristic that ultimately proved most influential and controversial, involved his incorporation of dispensational beliefs into the annotations. Scofield believed wholeheartedly in the verbal, literal inerrancy of Scripture, and argued that the Bible contained a series of progressive divine revelations that articulated and explained God's dealings with humankind. He divided biblical history into seven broad chronological periods, known as "dispensations." Each dispensation constituted a period of time during which human beings were tested by some specific revelation of God's will and each could be traced to a particular biblical passage that inaugurated a new dispensation. Scofield defined the seven dispensations as follows: Innocence (Genesis 1:28), Conscience (Genesis 3:22), Human Government (Genesis 8:20), Promise (Genesis 12:1), Law (Exodus 19:8), Grace (John 1:17), and Kingdom (Ephesians 1:10).

Subsequent History

Critics initially greeted The Scofield Reference Bible with mixed reviews; liberals rejected its intellectual assumptions while some conservatives felt that it relied excessively on good works as a means of salvation and that it suffered from theological inconsistency. Still, after modest but promising initial sales, the volume quickly gained considerable popularity. The prominent consulting editors aggressively promoted the book and it proved especially attractive to participants at Bible conferences and evangelistic campaigns. In 1911, Oxford issued a 300th anniversary commemorative edition of the King James Bible containing Scofield's chain links along with a "carefully corrected text" scrutinized by prominent biblical scholars.

Within a few years, Scofield decided that a completely new and improved revision of his 1909 compilation seemed necessary, and Oxford agreed to issue a second edition in 1917. One major change involved the incorporation of exact dates into the text, based on Archbishop James Ussher's (1581–1656) chronology and pinpointing the date of creation at 4004 B.C. Scofield also incorporated a new section, entitled "A Panoramic View of the Bible," that sought to emphasize unifying themes throughout the Bible and present the compiler's understanding of the relationship between various textual elements. For Scofield, Christ remained at the center of the Bible, and all sixty-six books could be grouped under five thematic concepts: preparation for Christ, constituting the entire Old Testament; manifestation of Jesus in the world, explicated through the Gospels; propagation of Jesus's message, contained in the Acts; explanation of Christ's ministry, described in the Epistles; and consummation of God's work through Christ, revealed in the Apocalypse.

The reference bible remained a best-seller for Oxford into the mid-twentieth century. Oxford University Press offered a complete Scofield product line and numerous foreign language translations appeared. Oxford even contracted with E. Schuyler English (1899– 1981), former president of Philadelphia School of the Bible and editor of Our Hope magazine, to abridge the annotations into a popular Pilgrim Edition (1948), which employed the King James text and was designed primarily for young readers. By 1954 Oxford concluded that recent archaeological discoveries, exegetical advances, and changes in the English language justified a revision of Scofield's work. Accordingly, the press commissioned a third major edition of the reference bible and selected English to chair the editorial committee. The eight other committee members represented the leading fundamentalist and evangelical scholarly institutions in mid-twentieth century America: John F. Walvoord (1910-) of Dallas Theological Seminary, William Culbertson (1905–1991) of Moody Bible Institute, Wilbur M. Smith (1894–1976) of Fuller Theological Seminary, Frank E. Gaebelein of The Stony Brook School, Alva McClain (1888–1968) of Grace Theological Seminary, Clarence E. Mason, Jr., of Philadelphia College of the Bible, Charles L. Feinberg of Talbot Theological Seminary, and Allan MacRae of Faith Theological Seminary.

The 1967 edition retained Scofield's dispensational system, revelatory outlook, and pretribulationist stance. The editors did change the sixth dispensation from "Grace" to "Church Age" and attempted to clarify a related doctrinal issue by carefully noting that salvation in every dispensation depended upon grace through faith. This modification sought to combat critics' claims that Scofield had implied that humanity might be saved through good works rather than faith, and that he limited salvation by grace to one particular dispensation. Other alterations attempted to place the 1967 volume more in conformity with contemporary textual and critical scholarship, as well as with twentieth-century developments in Bible prophecy. The revisers abandoned Ussher's chronology, for example, acknowledging that no date earlier than 2000 B.C. could be accurately fixed and that subsequent dates could only be approximated in most instances.

The editorial committee continued to rely on the King James Version as its biblical text, but it introduced numerous changes designed to make the language more intelligible to a late twentieth-century public. English and his colleagues altered obsolete and archaic words, modernized spellings, changed relative pronouns, and occasionally clarified questionable translation decisions, carefully noting modifications in the text. They also greatly expanded the editorial apparatus, nearly doubling the number of notes to over 1,500, and providing approximately 50,000 cross-references in contrast to the 27,000 in the 1917 edition. The committee also included new maps drawn in accordance with contemporary archaeological and cartographical advances, a concise concordance especially prepared for the revision, revised subheadings that more clearly differentiated editorial commentary from biblical text, and expanded introductions to each book. Sales figures indicate that the 1967 Scofield proved popular, though not as revolutionary or influential as its early twentieth-century predecessors. Oxford estimates that the third edition has sold millions of copies since its appearance, and sales numbered in the tens of thousands annually through the late 1990s. Clearly, The Scofield Reference Bible continued to satisfy a loyal audience of theologically conservative Protestants who remained devoted to the King James Version and who sought interpretive aids that remained faithful to dispensationalist teachings.

References and Further Reading

- Canfield, Joseph M. The Incredible Scofield and His Book. Vallecito, CA: Ross House Books, 1988.
- Gaebelein, Arno C. "The Story of The Scofield Reference Bible," Moody Monthly. (October 1942 and serially through March 1943).
- Gaebelein, Frank E. The Story of The Scofield Reference Bible, 1909–1959. New York: Oxford University Press, 1959.
- . The New Scofield Reference Bible: Its Background and Making. New York: Oxford University Press, 1967.
- Scofield, C.I., ed. The Scofield Reference Bible. New York: Oxford University Press, 1909.
- , ed. The New Scofield Reference Bible. New York: Oxford University Press, 1967.
- Trumbull, Charles Gallaudet. The Life Story of C.I. Scofield. New York: Oxford University Press, 1920.

PETER J. WOSH

SCOTLAND

Contempt and Scottish Protestantism seem to have gone hand in hand. Viewed from the eighteenth century, arguably Scotland's finest hour, the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND and its clergy appear almost to deserve the same opprobrium as the Catholic church, complete with its prelatic hierarchy and indulgences, from which Protestantism had dramatically removed itself at the time of the REFORMATION. The professor of divinity at Aberdeen, Alexander Gerard, in a series of "Theological Prelections" published in 1799, under the title The Pastoral Care, cited the oft-repeated list of contemptible practices of the clergy as both an admonition to his students and as a historical reminder. In timely fashion Gerard's instruction was also intended as a corrective to the "misrepresentation" not just of "abuses" but, more important, of the relation of Protestantism's official church in Scotland to the national character itself, and indeed of "religion itself."

The "disrespect" and "detestation of mankind" fell on ministers purportedly guilty of "hypocrisy, superstition, ambition, vanity, party-spirit, rancour, and revenge." As enthusiastic in its "malicious eagerness and exultation" as some of those religious parties were themselves, this mischief converted "imaginary faults" into "real vices," and "small failings" into "atrocious crimes." Moreover, throughout all of these "great blemishes" it made no allowance for the "weakness of human nature, or the temptations of the world." Significantly, Gerard makes reference here to his countryman DAVID HUME'S "Essay on National Characters," recognizing perhaps that this Scottish Trojan horse threatened to "confound" the "natural and primary tendency" of Scotland's national church and to fell the "city," this great "Athens of the North" (Edinburgh, the eventual seat of the combined Church of Scotland's Assembly Hall). But what was that "tendency," that the Orkney poet and critic Edwin Muir should, on traveling through the Borders region and encountering Melrose Abbey, also muse that after the Reformation something of "transcendent loveliness" should have passed out of Scotland's life?

Protestantism and Scottish Nationalism

Protestantism in Scotland has ever been tied inextricably to the nation's character and its fortunes. The nineteenth-century historian H.T. Buckle went so far as to charge that the Scotch church had "dwarfed and mutilated" the national character in the seventeenth century, thereby making the work of Scotland's "Enlightenment" thinkers all the more difficult, in their attempt to wrest from what some have called that "glacial age of Calvinism" a society and an economy worthy of its people. However, mutilation can infect all those who would tamper with, or confound, the body. As he reflected on the patronage that had sustained the reign of the so-called Moderates in eighteenth-century Scotland, a youthful Dr. THOMAS CHALMERS, whose sheer oratory later helped to bring about the Disruption from which emerged the Free Church of Scotland in 1843, proclaimed utter distaste. A student still at St. Andrews, and a contemporary of James Mylne who earned a reputation as a radical “sensationalist” after he left a curacy at Paisley Abbey to become Glasgow’s professor of moral philosophy, Chalmers admitted that he and his fellow students had “inhaled not a distaste only, but a positive contempt, for all that is properly and peculiarly gospel” (McCosh 1875:394).

Their contempt had the ring of earlier cries of disdain not, however, as the young Chalmers then supposed, for things “peculiarly gospel,” but for the empty rhetoric as well as practices that had come to distort and malign the “everlasting Gospel” of the “true Church of Scotland,” in the words of his friend and fellow “Disrupter,” James McCosh. It was the same ring that two centuries before had been heard in the voices of JOHN KNOX and ANDREW MELVILLE, in successive stages the catalysts, if not strictly the founders (that “Headship” belonged, of course, to Christ, as Covenanters and Free Church ministers never failed to remind their flocks) of Protestantism in Scotland. The object of Knox’s and Melville’s contempt had rather been popery, episcopacy, and kings (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY). If these three objects were the seeds of PRESBYTERIANISM, the contempt born against them planted itself deep in the Scottish mind. Its issue, a creature of ironic form, was no less than the flowering of a spirit of national liberty and the fruit of a fanatical intolerance.

That intolerance has sometimes had its share of almost comical twists. Although antipapistical, antiliturgical, and antiepiscopal invective may be regarded as extreme rebukes of other persons’ forms of WORSHIP, under the shifting, acrimonious, high-stakes, and frequently destructive tides of political maneuvering, especially in the seventeenth century, the installation of a bishop or prelate here, the imposition of “popish words” such as “CLERGY” and “LAITY” there, and “anti-christian” liturgical forms everywhere (so said JOHN BAILLIE, the Presbyterian preacher and principal of Glasgow University, of the “beautiful prayers” of the Scottish Prayer Book forced on them by Charles I and the archbishop of Canterbury WILLIAM LAUD, in 1636), were enough to turn blood and sea red. Tit for tat, Scottish Covenanters hit back with their own peculiar logic. Unlike the fairly evenly balanced forces of Catholicism and Protestantism then in ENGLAND, “in Scotland it was not so; nearly all (for the Catholics were mere Ishmaelites) were then Presbyterian. When the Covenanters insisted that Charles I and when the protesters insisted that Charles II should force Presbyterianism on England and Ireland, they returned, unconsciously, to Tudor principles. If it was wrong for the king to compel Scotland to accept the Liturgy [however slightly modified, in deference to the Scots], it was right for him to compel England and Ireland to accept Presbyterianism. Such was Covenanting logic” (Lang 1904:28).

The niceties of this logic notwithstanding, Lang was under no illusions about the temper that fueled and fired it time after time during the same century. Protestantism in Scotland, he recounts, like its counterpart in England, owned a “savage religious temper.”

THOMAS HOBBS had attested as much, and had built an argument for political authoritarianism on the basis of just such a ruthless intolerance of anyone standing in one's way, yet with a zeal and a relish for blood not in the converted, but in the natural human soul.

H.T.Buckle, who has earned his own share of Scottish nationalist wrath, described the Presbyterian body that grew out of the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century conflicts as a "restless and unscrupulous body, greedy after power, and grossly intolerant of whatever opposed their own views" (Buckle 1970:110). The fearlessness of religious intolerance made even kings and nobles want to ally themselves to this energy, if not strictly to its principles. As Buckle noted, albeit with his own disdain, the Scotch clergy "covered with contempt" the "great ones of the earth" and "cast down" all "who were above them." Those bitterly and cruelly divisive conflicts to which many historians have alluded had arisen in large measure out of Presbyterian concerns to reclaim ecclesiastical properties seized by the Crown with the help of self-interested nobles; to ensure the democracy (the system of equality insisted on by Knox and his leadership successor Andrew Melville, as early as 1575) of the elect against the almost irresistible tides of hierarchical thinking; and to discipline (to "inure," in a word much favored by Scottish educationalists in the eighteenth century) the soul not only against political restorations, which would eventually lead to such torments for the Scots as the Act of Union of 1707, but also against the instauratio, the celebration of new beginnings predicted by FRANCIS BACON, which would bring about the advancement at once of learning and of luxury. Buckle himself had to concede that even when the Church of Scotland fostered a feeling "almost...of disgust," its most fanatical adherents were nevertheless to be admired for having "kept alive the spirit of national liberty."

Change

Ironically, that same spirit has among modern Scots succeeded in hoisting Buckle with his own petard. The guiding principles of his historical reading of the Scots—ignorance and fear—have seemed to thinkers such as George Davie rather to cover, and to color, himself. Fear leads to all sorts of excesses, none more so than in contagiously colorful historical accounts. Buckle had taken the servile and ignominious fear, with which he claimed the Scots clergy had crushed all the noblest feelings of human nature, and had splashed it over the entire Scots character, painting the latter, under the name of "Scottish Calvinism," as now permanently "dwarfed and mutilated." This virtual defacement of the Scots character, ironically by its own Presbyterian and egalitarian ethos, survives in spite of, or paradoxically because of, the winds of metaphysical, educational, scientific, jurisprudential, and indeed cultural change that blew across Scotland during the eighteenth century and made it, a worthy companion to FRANCE itself, one of the bastions of the new, distinctly modern and secularist age. Davie recognizes a certain restraint in Buckle's, as also in the historian F.W.Maitland's, judgment, tempered as they are by an acknowledgment of the dramatic changes in post-1707 Scotland, but he expresses chagrin that other historians, such as Hugh Trevor-Roper and even the Scottish Gordon Donaldson, have taken up the cudgel of mutilation to beat the excesses of Scottish EVANGELICALISM into the less repugnant, more moderate, conformity of Scottish with English forms of Protestantism that the Act of Union (a political, not a religious settlement) supposedly made possible.

If there is such a thing as a religious monopoly in Scotland, a CALVINISM so deeply branded into the Scots character as to “dwarf” all other features, then a historical decision of considerable moment comes to the fore. Either pre-Union Scotland was a pure backwardness of austerity and fanaticism that even the long shadow of the post-Union eighteenth century was only gradually able to erode (as Scottish historians such as H.G.Graham and James Young have urged), or not even the civilizing force of political union with England nor the dynamics of Scotland’s own great enlightenment could quite efface the savagery, the dogmatic tone, the inflexibility, and the ignorance of this largely middle- to lower-class religious outlook. (If the Moderate Presbyterianism of the eighteenth century seems positively genteel by comparison, the reason lies in the fact that the Church of Scotland was for a sustained period under the sway of the cultured and intellectual upper classes.) The idea that Scotland might have evolved a “distinctive blend,” as George Davie puts it, of the “secular and the sacred,” that Protestantism in Scotland might over time have actually transformed itself from within into an entity combining disciplines of mind with those of soul and body, has until quite recently not been taken as seriously as it might be. Among others, more recent thinkers such as Craig Beveridge and Ronald Turnbull have endeavored to change the religious face of Scotland, as it were, uniting it more positively, less on the long-held note of “inferiorization,” with the real cultural and political forces at work in the Scottish nation.

Even Edwin Muir characterized his own people as “a dull drove of faces harsh and vexed.” The blame rested squarely on the shoulders, or rather in the “preaching palms,” of Knox and Melville. Scottish Calvinism had created a joyless countenance; the faces of its children, according to others, are those of the starving and culturally destitute. Beveridge and Turnbull counter “this mindless endorsement of metropolitan prejudice” by citing what they regard as the strengths, not weaknesses, of Knox’s legacy or rather of Scotland’s Calvinist inheritance more generally—“moral seriousness, distrust of complacency [and] passion for theoretical argument” (Beveridge and Turnbull 1989:10). To their modern list might be added, perhaps more judiciously, the insights of the Rev. Hugh Blair, a Moderate preacher as well as professor of rhetoric and belle lettres at Edinburgh, and thus very much a product of that age of transformation that one might rather call, in deference to Davie’s principle of a distinctive blend in Scottish culture, the age of “polite Calvinism.” In a sermon entitled, “On the Mixture of Joy and Fear in Religion,” Blair achieves his own blend of religious discipline with practical fulfillment, the rigors of “duty” and “obedience” with the “cheerfulness” of “performance.” Wanting this combination, he asserted, “our religion discovers itself not to be genuine in principle, and in practice it cannot be stable. Religious obedience, destitute of joy, is not genuine in its principle.” It is possible that Buckle could not see the “joy” behind the faces of ignorance and fear in the children of Knox and Melville. It is also possible that the Books of Discipline, as they were called, could not see the joy within themselves.

The Reign of Discipline

The physical face of Scottish Protestantism had never shown itself to be a thing of aesthetic grandeur or even comeliness. It, too, bore the marks, it seems, of austerity, or perhaps only of neglect, whether truly spiritual or simply zealously indifferent. In the First Book of Discipline, preserved in Knox's History of the Reformation, a series of "recommendations," between April 1560 and January 1561, to "the lords" (a provisional governing body of Protestant nobles and lairds), the principles of austerity had been enunciated. They were directed, of course, primarily against the legacy of "idolatry" that had led to the "holy Sacraments" being "[wrongly] ministered" in buildings as diverse as abbeys, nunneries, cathedral kirks, and colleges. Significantly, the only exceptions to this "suppression" of idolatry were to be the "parish Kirks or Schools" which had found a home in the properties confiscated after the Reformation. Nevertheless, however austere might have been the recommended "doors, close windows of glass, thatch or slate able to withhold rain, a bell to convocate the people together, a pulpit, a basin for baptism, and tables for the ministration of the Lord's Supper," repairs were to be made in the event that "unseemliness of the place [should] come in contempt."

In spite of this attempt to put distance between Scottish Protestants and such "contempt," Andrew Lang notes a description of St. Giles' Church in 1627 as telling of a colorless, if not joyless, setting for worship, but also of a spiritual discipline run amok in the growing capitalism of the day: "Bare walls and pillars all clad with dust, sweepings and cobwebs...and on every side the restless resorting of people treating of their worldly affairs; some writing and making obligations, contracts, and discharges, others laying counts or telling over sums of money" (Lang 1904:iii,25). Part of the resistance in 1638 to the infliction on the Scottish Church of an orderly or "decent" LITURGY, one that was as uniform throughout the churches as it was free of "barbarisms" or political jibes, was that it lacked "conception" or the free springing to mind of inspired thoughts or radical opinions. The General Assembly at Perth in 1618 had enjoined that "everie minister...sall make choice of severall [sic] and pertinent texts of Scripture, and frame their doctrine and exhortation thereto, and rebuke all superstitious observation and licentious profanation" of the appointed holy days of Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, Ascension Day, and Whitsuntide. Nevertheless both the "choice" and the "framing" were to be freely "conceived."

The other element in Scottish Protestantism's resistance to liturgical order was that it gave de facto recognition to the hated prelatial rule of that hierarchically defined church, now spitefully termed "the Devil." With free "conception" logically came the principle of egalitarianism whereby each preacher was to be deemed equal to every other. Just as the feisty Covenanters claimed to be fearless in "bearding [standing up] to [the] face" of James VI, so they would "beard" to any prelate and certainly to that "Romane [sic] Antichrist" the Pope. Sentiment against all things papistical ran high. The so-called Negative Confession of 1581, which was later to form part of the 1638 National Covenant, sets the "kyrk of Scotland" against "all contrarie religion and doctrine, but cheifly [sic] all kynd of papistrie in generall and perticular headis [sic] even as they are now damned and confuted by the worde of God and kyrk of Scotland...." Against "all his tyrannous lawes," against the multitude of abominations from "worshipping of imagrie and crocecs” to “vane allegories, ritis, signes and traditioneis” [sic], the Kirk pitted its own stern “discipline” and canons of “obedience.” The Negative Confession makes clear that “Godis [sic] good creatures” owe allegiance only to the “words of God,” to “Christ our head,” to the incorruptible and unsubverted “true religion within the kirk.”

Within that same kirk no one was to go wanting, either of care (provided that the person had “honestly fallen into decay”) or of education, more specifically, a “virtuous education and godly upbringing,” either at the hands of an appointed schoolmaster or, in rural areas, of a kirk reader or the minister himself. The yearly election of elders and deacons, “by common and free election,” would ensure the democracy of the faithful, while at the same time adding moral impetus to the task of assisting the minister in “all public affairs of the Church; to wit, in judging and decerning [sic] causes; in giving of admonition to the licentious liver; [and] in having respect to the manners and conversation of all men within their charge.” Democracy also worked to sharpen the attentiveness of the faithful to all that was going on around them, but more particularly, to the “life, manners, diligence and study” of the ministers themselves. The power to admonish, to correct, and, if necessary, to depose was ever to be with the people.

A Free Disruption

In part, it was to recover that very freedom, the power to elect or not to elect, that Chalmers, McCosh, Thomas Guthrie, David Welsh, and other “Free Churchmen” packed the halls of the General Assembly being held at Edinburgh in 1843 and brought about disruption, secession (several minor “secessions” had already occurred in 1690, 1733, and 1761), and the Free Church of Scotland. (It was not until 1929 that the breach between the Free Church and the Church of Scotland was healed, and even then not for all Free Churchmen.) The disciplines of the seventeenth century had fallen prey to the lure of patronage, to cultural and intellectual pretension, and to unconceived prayers and sermons, as appointed ministers gave scant notice to their congregations and even left the preparation of their sermons to some of the now classic texts of other minds. The Second Book of Discipline of 1578, fashioned by the energetic Andrew Melville after his return to Scotland from Geneva, made it clear that discipline was something actively, not passively, to be engaged. By the beginning of the nineteenth century Moderatism had obviously allowed the Kirk to drift too far in the direction of a passive sense of what it means to be the “disciplined” elect.

Ironically, the Free Churchmen identified as the root causes of that failure of discipline many of the ills against which the two Books of Discipline, effectively the legacies of Knox and Melville, had been conceived. Scottish Protestantism had always opposed any usurpation of the true “Headship” of the church by any form of civil authority, whether king or lord or, as largely became the case in the secularizing eighteenth century, the magistrate. The “licentious liver,” as we recall, had been the concern of an ever-vigilant elect, elders, deacons, ministers. Now, the perennial drunkard, McCosh complained, could go to the magistrate and gain license to drink at the communion table itself, the disciplinary restraints of the parishioners notwithstanding.

Likewise, position and privilege had been eroding the democratic spirit of free election, such that clerical appointments were frequently in civil or influential hands rather than in the hands of congregations, often of far humbler station in society. McCosh openly wondered whether, in the shifting sands of history, trust in privileges had taken the place of trusting in God. Above all perhaps, in what has to be seen as a presentiment of the social upheavals of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the work of moral, social, and even cultural improvement, the necessary accompaniment of any rights of discipline, was being lifted out of the hands of the religious elect and placed in the allegedly more capable and more responsible hands of the politically elect. The very measures of modernity that one would otherwise herald, the very steps to humanity's improvement and progress, had become as a sty not in the "devil's" but in the kirk's own eye.

Polite Protestantism

The institution of parish schools throughout the country, which the Church of Scotland had regarded with the utmost seriousness from its very inception, had indeed served to project the role of EDUCATION on to center stage. As the First Book of Discipline had enjoined, the "Grammar and the Latin tongue" taught by the parish schoolmaster would enable the "children and youth of the parish" not only to read the catechism, "as we have it now translated in the Book of Common Order, called the Order of Geneva," but also, at a later stage, the arts of "Logic and Rhetoric, together with the Tongues," as taught at the colleges, then at least, of St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Aberdeen. In short, religious discipline was to be directed toward such improvements, of mind as much as of manners, as might be furnished by ever higher levels and broader compasses of education. If the duty to improvement would later sow religious dissension, if it would serve to revolutionize Scottish society itself, ushering in a greater role for secular as opposed to sacred interests, then Protestantism in Scotland would have to live with the consequences.

One of those consequences was that Presbyterianism in Scotland inevitably went the way of social division. As the historian Christopher Hill has argued, even the theology of PREDESTINATION was made subject to the revolutionary changes wrought within British society as a whole during the seventeenth century. Predestination theories were particularly susceptible to moods of social and economic insecurity that, with the rise and fall of kings and Cromwellians, were unsettling to the English and aggravating to the Scots, of both higher and lower social orders. Somewhat brought to heel by the Act of Union, the Scottish nobility nevertheless reestablished itself with enough security that it could begin the long process of extricating itself from the clutches of predestination theory. If not wholly in the company of the "elected" ones, they could still be confident of their position as the "selected" ones in society. Hence Presbyterians of this "higher social group" could afford to "abandon Calvinism in the eighteenth century," observes Hill, although not as easily or as thoroughly as this might suggest.

The situation for the "meaner sort," the middling and lower middling classes, was manifestly more "beleaguered," less secure, at times even precarious. Presbyterianism in Scotland finds itself reflected in this division as the eighteenth century wears on. Unlike the socially selected ones, the elected members of Scottish society had little with which to defend themselves, except a stern, no doubt also proud, sense of their religious superiority over the reprobate of the world, whether above or beneath them. Although their erstwhile Calvinist countrymen of the higher orders might enjoy the fruit of their cultural and intellectual improvement (Alexander “Jupiter” Carlyle best epitomized this trend), they themselves relished strict discipline of self and others. This cultivated monitoring of lives positively feasted on capabilities of attentiveness and reflection that were truly peculiar to the Scots. Ironically, their counterparts of a more polite Calvinism also came to appreciate the “art” of attentive reflection, indeed making it one of the mainstays of Scottish HIGHER EDUCATION. Prefectors in the four Scottish universities (Edinburgh being now the fourth), especially those charged with not only the philosophy of the human mind, but also its cultivation, from rudimentary sense experience to the refinements of rhetorical discourse in the public forum, were truly masters of this “art.” Key to the philosophy as to the culture of the mind was the instrument of attentive reflection, long a Calvinist virtue and one instilled in the minds of the young as early as their assiduous learning of the Catechism.

A Very Scottish Blend

McCosh always held firmly to the view that, whatever distortions the Kirk might have suffered at the hands of Crown and government in the eighteenth century, distortions that essentially deprived the church of its critical prerogative of election, there was no necessary antagonism between the philosophy that Scotland evolved in that century and “true theology.” There were indeed “new lights” everywhere, “moderates” who tended to put the interests of patronage and their high moral seriousness before the strict obedience required of the elect who, by rule, were to lend themselves to be governed at “God’s good pleasure.” It is also quite true that the very reason in which the age was to bask did not always “yield and withdraw, to give place to the Holy Spirit.” It was never intended that new lights of any sort should play the moon to that divine Light that was the sun itself holding it, as it were, in a long eclipse. Yet far from denying that moral power, McCosh chose instead to endorse it.

What George Davie later saw as the peculiar “democratic intellect” of Scotland was precisely constituted of both an egalitarian principle of freedom and an equally egalitarian, but also highly cultured intellect. McCosh knew the power of education (he went on to become the president of Princeton University) as well, and he was grateful for that surge of “intelligence and love of freedom” that he thought any “spiritually-minded observer” (not, apparently, one of H.T. Buckle’s strengths) would recognize in what Scotland had brought to pass in its “new light” age. The Calvinist theology was firmly there in the seeds that the Scots had planted during that century: “in the schools and colleges planted throughout the land; in the love of education instilled into the minds of the people; and, above all, in their acquaintance with the Bible, and in their determined adherence to what they believed to be the truth of God” (McCosh 1875:20). How had Buckle seen so much of darkness in Scottish Protestantism when the same theology had clearly produced so much of light? More to the point perhaps, could thinkers such as McCosh be grateful on the one hand for all that the age had bestowed on the nation and ungrateful on the other for the age's polite shifting of the Headship from Christ to reason, or worse, to its governing patrons? Had the nation paid too high a price?

Virtue and Gratitude

If Protestantism in Scotland was indeed forever changed by the social and intellectual upheavals of the eighteenth century, far supplanting the tortured political ones of the previous century; if not even the evangelical fervor of the Disruption in the next century could halt the force of that movement or dampen its own brand of enthusiasm; perhaps the highly articulate Hugh Blair might serve as a final measure of the extent of the damage or, perchance, improvement to Protestantism. As minister of Knox's own St. Giles, on the High Street in Edinburgh, he forms a significant bridge between discipline and cultivation, between the rule of religious piety and the rule of secular morality. With Blair, one steps both backward and forward. Somewhere on the arch of that bridge, one may perhaps discover flowing beneath the living waters of Scottish Protestantism.

For all his literary flare, and perhaps pride therein, Blair never confused, except to deepen their relationship, piety and morality. In a sermon entitled, "On the Union of Piety and Morality" Blair sought to dispel any concerns that Protestantism in Scotland had deserted the sacred in favor of the secular. He made it abundantly clear that any morality not "seconded by piety" was "mere morality," a morality not merely answering only to the voice of Reason, but suffering from "irregularity and defect." As Knox had urged on the Scots a "care of the poor," so Blair reiterates that when piety is joined "with active virtue," it issues in the "honourable [as opposed to "irregular"] discharge of the duties of the active life," not a life dark, hateful, and cringing with violent fears, but a life of "true worth," noble and free, in which honorable duty follows naturally on the heels of "Charity to men." Subtly playing on the motif of the stranger, made famous in his countryman Hume's Dialogues concerning Natural Religion, Blair exposes the vital weakness of the Scotsman without religion, of the secular attempt to create a national society without the earnest discipline of pious reflection. All the disciplines of the attentive mind cannot aspire to any completeness, nor can they ever broaden life's circle, unless they are "touched," stirred as it were out of virtue's complacency, by "gratitude to him for all his goodness."

The ineffectualness of morality, of the secular, of life itself, without that tincture of "gratitude to him," and the discipline arising from it, was ever the theme of Protestantism in Scotland. "The man of mere morality," admonished Blair from the pulpit, "is a stranger to all the delicate and refined pleasures of devotion. In works of beneficence and mercy, he may enjoy satisfaction. But his satisfaction is destitute of that glow of affection, which enlivens the feelings of one who lifts his heart at the same time to the Father of the Universe, and considers himself as imitating God...when beneficence and devotion are united, they pour upon the man in whom they meet, the full pleasures of a good and pure heart. His alms connected him with men; his prayers with God...."

Scottish culture and its active virtues have indeed been no stranger to Protestantism, but therein lie not grounds for contempt, but rather appreciation of its very strength.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Church Discipline

References and Further Reading

- Beveridge, Craig, and Ronald Turnbull. The Eclipse of Scottish Culture. Edinburgh: Polygon, 1989.
- Blair, Hugh. Sermons for the Use of Families. London, 1808.
- Buckle, H.T. On Scotland and the Scotch Intellect. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970.
- Cowan, Ian B. The Scottish Reformation. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1982.
- Davie, George E. The Democratic Intellect. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1961.
- Donaldson, Gordon. Scottish Historical Documents. Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, 1970.
- Gerard, Alexander. The Pastoral Care. London, 1799.
- Hill, Christopher. A Turbulent, Seditious, and Factious People: John Bunyan and his Church. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Hoeverler, J.David Jr. James McCosh and the Scottish Intellectual Tradition. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Lang, Andrew. A History of Scotland from the Roman Occupation. 3 vols. Edinburgh: William Blackwood & Sons, 1904.
- McCosh, James. The Scottish Philosophy, Biographical, Expository, Critical, from Hutcheson to Hamilton. London: Macmillan, 1875.
- Muir, Edwin. Scottish Journey. London: William Heinemann Ltd., 1935.

J.CHARLES STEWART-ROBERTSON

SCOTTISH COMMON SENSE REALISM

In the wake of FRANCIS BACON'S "augmentation" of learned experience (1623) the Scottish mind felt increasingly at home in a world of real things, cultivated minds, and progressive human and civic advantages. Even the skeptical DAVID HUME had a firm grip on what the mind does "naturally," if not rationally, believe. The "common sense" philosophy that emerged in SCOTLAND during the eighteenth century built itself on this same assurance.

Historical Challenges

Epistemologically the "Scotch School" had staked itself against Hume's skeptical conclusions, the sensationalism of Étienne Bonnot de Condillac, and the materialism of Claude-Adrien Helvétius. Morally it had accepted Francis Hutcheson's "moral sense" challenge to Hobbesian self-interest (see HOBBS, THOMAS) and the rationalism of Samuel Clarke. Religiously it credited the "Supreme Being" with "inspiring" in us the intelligence and self-consciousness to be "informed" both of the Supreme Being's works and of the mental operations by which we apprehend them. On those bases, it had established a view of the constituent "powers" of the mind, both intellectual and active, that were said to "furnish" the mind with the requisite "faculties" for reasoning inductively about, and responding virtuously to, the world.

Thinkers such as Thomas Reid, James Beattie, and James Oswald (criticized by the materialist JOSEPH PRIESTLEY), and later Dugald Stewart and Thomas Brown, resisted skeptical as well as idealist assaults on the notions of the self as existent and identical; of causal efficacy; of the veracity of objects of sense as well as of memory; and of the existence of conscious acts, whether in regulating thought or in initiating change. Our "natural" or "intuitive" judgments concerning these features of our experience, touching the interaction of the conscious subject and the world as perceived and attended to in reflection, were said to be "immediate" and "irresistible."

Main Tenets

Although not uniformly enunciated, these tenets or "axioms" of the Scottish position served as what Reid himself called "common Principles." They constituted "the Foundation of all Reasoning and all Science” and were the basis for that “common Understanding” among persons that rendered discourse and thus civic harmony possible. Not to believe our own eyes or to give regard to the testimony of our senses was to be “destitute of common Sense,” he told his Glasgow students after 1764. Moreover, in questioning any of these first principles or the evidence of even the “simplest” or “most familiar” of our sensory devices, we bring “confusion” and “perplexity” to those “reflex senses” whereby we discern the morally agreeable in society and the aesthetically beautiful in NATURE. Nodding their approval once again to Bacon Scottish philosophers sought to free the mind from “prejudice” and “error” so that it might be brought into “the knowledge of those truths which tend to enlarge and elevate the mind.” These in turn would ensure “habits of virtue and true goodness” consonant with the “dignity of [our] rational and immortal Nature.” The common principles of sense were thus the first steps toward a worthier as well as “future” existence for humankind.

The Credible Real

Scottish theories of perception hinged on the factor of belief. Although conception engages our consciousness in attending to an object (attention being the key to any reflective activity of the mind), it does so without passing judgment, without any feeling of the object’s pastness (Brown broke ranks somewhat on this point), but above all without any belief in its existence. In perception, however, not only is the object made present to consciousness, but it is given credence as existing in the world. Acts of consciousness are granted no less credibility. Together, the objects of outer and inner sense constitute the real, that which is intuitively known, as McCosh later rephrased it.

The credible real did admit of some uncertainties, such as the underlying physical causes that generate expectations of consequent effects. However, if Scottish thinkers sometimes held back, largely for religious reasons, from penetrating too deeply into the nature of things, both physical and mental, they were unreserved in their application of the rule of belief, founded as that was on “common sense.” (This “modest” skepticism later appeared as a poor cousin to the strictures of critical philosophy in limiting the human understanding.) Always carefully distinguished from their Aristotelian predecessor, the principles of common sense arose as a considered response to the shifting epistemological ground of the early eighteenth century. They affirmed that there were modes of evidence, of testimony, and of human self-assurance that met the highest standards of reason as well as religious humility.

In Retrospect

Scottish common sense realism was judged by many post-Kantian readers as an “intellectual monstrosity,” parading ordinary opinions of human beings as, in William

Hamilton's approving words, a priori principles. Few appreciated that Scottish philosophers had been intent to stem the tide of various forms of "superficial" empiricism in the interests of a more "profound" one. Common sense realism was not the philosophy of the "common man," but a highly "technical" attempt to counter conflicting theories about our apprehension of the "worlds" of mind and body.

Joseph Priestley had damned the Scottish movement as "dogmatic" and "arbitrary." In the next century, Hamilton, James Frederick Ferrier, James McCosh, and Victor Cousin tried to articulate and, in doing so, to reshape its principles. Ferrier came closest to identifying its (and Reid's) real weakness. It had failed, he maintained, to get its "facts" straight. It was not the object that was "real" (the primary fact) nor the act of consciousness entertaining it, but the "consciousness of the object." His criticism highlights the seriousness with which Scottish philosophy wrestled with the problem of the real or, in another vein, with Berkeleian idealism. In 1853 J.P. Alison, a student of Dugald Stewart, summed up the tenor of that Scottish philosophy that he had inherited, but he did so rather by citing Cousin: "Our perception of simple and primary truths may be separated...from the fallible reason of man, and referred to that Reason which is Universal, Absolute, Infallible, and Eternal, beyond the limits of Space and time, above all contact with error or disorder...to that Mind, pure and incorruptible, of which ours is only the reflection."

References and Further Reading

- Davie, George. The Scottish Enlightenment and Other Essays. Edinburgh: Polygon, 1991.
- Marcil-Lacoste, L. Claude Buffier and Thomas Reid: Two Common-Sense Philosophers. Kingston, Canada: McGill-Queen's Press, 1982.
- McCosh, James. The Scottish Philosophy (1875). Bristol, UK: Thoemmes, 1990 (reprint).
- Norton, D.F. "David Hume." In Common-Sense Moralism, Sceptical Metaphysician. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1982.
- Reid, Thomas. Philosophical Works. Edited by Sir William Hamilton. Introduction by H.M.Bracken. Hildesheim, Germany: Georg Olms Verlag, 1983.
- . The Birkwood Collection. Aberdeen, Scotland: Aberdeen University Library, Unpublished manuscripts.
- Stewart-Robertson, J.Charles. "'Georgica Animi': A Compendium of Thomas Reid's Lectures on the Culture of the Mind." Rivista di storia della filosofia no. 1 (1990):113–156.
- . "A Bacon-Facing Generation: Scottish Philosophy in the Early Nineteenth Century." Journal of the History of Ideas 14 no. 1 (1976):37–49.

J.CHARLES STEWART-ROBERTSON

SEABURY, SAMUEL (1729–1796)

North American theologian and first American Episcopal bishop. Seabury was born in Groton, Connecticut on November 30, 1729. He was educated privately, at Yale (B.A., 1748) and at the University of Edinburgh (1752–1753), where he studied medicine. In 1753 he was ordained into the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, being appointed a missionary for the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL (SPG) to New Brunswick, New Jersey. In 1757 he moved to Jamaica, Long Island, where he served as an SPG missionary and as rector of the parish. In 1766 he served in a similar arrangement at Westchester, New York.

Before the American Revolutionary War, Seabury engaged in a pamphlet attack on the proposed measures of the first Continental Congress. This led to his brief imprisonment at New Haven in 1775. At the commencement of the Long Island campaign in 1776, Seabury fled for safety behind the British lines, where he served as a chaplain and supplied General Howe's army with logistical information. For the remainder of the war, he lived in British-controlled New York City, where he practiced medicine, wrote political pamphlets, and served in a variety of clerical positions. At the conclusion of hostilities Seabury supervised the exodus of Loyalists to Nova Scotia. After abandoning his opposition to American independence, he wrote a prayer for Congress. He was elected bishop by Connecticut clergy in 1783. He died in New London, Connecticut on February 25, 1796 and was buried at St. James' Church. More than anyone else, Seabury was responsible for shaping the character of the Episcopal Church along sacramental, liturgical, and historic lines, in keeping with the beliefs and practices of the wider Anglican Communion.

Career in the Church

After his ordination in the Church of England, Seabury had served in a succession of minor clerical positions in New Jersey and New York. As the Revolutionary War drew nearer, he began to be drawn into the leadership of the clergy in the northern colonies and was among the first to recognize the potential threat to the church posed by Independence. After his election as bishop Seabury sailed for ENGLAND, hoping to persuade the bishops to consecrate him for service in America, although—despite both patience and intense effort on his part—this proved unsuccessful: Parliament refused to withdraw the loyalty oath, which Seabury refused to take. Seabury also refused (despite his high church convictions) to submit to the crown's authority. He thus traveled north where, on November 14, 1784, at Aberdeen, he was consecrated by three bishops of the Non-juring Scottish Episcopal Church (see EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SCOTLAND). No oath of loyalty was required. On his return to America he served as rector of St. James' New London, bishop of Connecticut, and (after 1790) bishop of Rhode Island.

Seabury was a gifted leader of the CLERGY during difficult times, and an able and hard-working administrator. He held regular visitations of his parishes, preached frequently before his clergy, ordained numerous new deacons and priests, consecrated a number of new churches, and confirmed over ten thousand people. Implementing a "high" ECCLESIOLOGY, he governed his diocese through a series of convocations, which effectively limited lay influence; he thus circumvented the aims of WILLIAM HALE WHITE and those from Pennsylvania southward for the reorganization of the church along democratic lines.

Despite Seabury's rigid adherence to high church principles, a series of compromises allowed the delegates from Connecticut and Massachusetts to attend the General Convention of 1789, meeting in Philadelphia, where Seabury's consecration was recognized (he thus became the first presiding bishop in the church), a constitution for the new Episcopal Church was completed, a system of canon law was established, and an American version of the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER was adopted. The division between the northern and southern dioceses had effectively been healed, as had the division between the Scottish and English successions in America. (White and a colleague had recently been consecrated by the English bishops, without the necessity of a loyalty oath.)

Seabury was the first bishop of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the United States. The Church of England in America, the forerunner of the Episcopal Church, made an important contribution to Colonial religious history, although its influence was limited by the absence of a local episcopate: those seeking ordination were required to travel to England to be ordained by an English bishop. The church also suffered from the outbreak of hostilities between the colonies and Britain. Internally both clergy and LAITY were divided over the war. Externally many Patriots abandoned the church because of its close constitutional ties to the English crown. Moreover, after the cessation of hostilities, many Loyalists (including a number of clergy from the Episcopal Church) fled to CANADA or returned to England, thus diminishing the ranks of the church still further. Those who remained behind, however, soon began to formulate various proposals for the reorganization of the church in the new Republic.

A serious impediment stood in the way, however: there were no bishops in America, and, moreover, those seeking ordination in England were required to take an oath of loyalty to the British crown. To address this, in 1782 William White, the Latitudinarian rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia, proposed a series of principles that would have reorganized the church without its historic episcopate, or, in essence, as a voluntary association of clergy and laity. Until the church could secure its own bishops from England, a temporary form of presbyterian ordination would be implemented. These proposals provoked sharp debate among both clergy and laity, with those in New England objecting most strenuously to White's proposal. Consequently in 1783 ten clergy from Connecticut met secretly in Woodbury and elected Seabury as their first bishop.

See also Bishop and Episcopacy; Latitudinarianism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Seabury, Samuel. Samuel Seabury's Ungathered Imprints: Historical Perspectives of the Early National Years, edited by Kenneth Walter Cameron. Hartford, CT: Transcendental Books, 1978.
- . Discourses on Several Subjects, Hudson, NY: William E. Norman, 1815.

Secondary Sources:

- Beardsley, William Agur. Life and Correspondence of the Right Reverend Samuel Seabury, D.D. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Company, 1881.
- . Samuel Seabury, the Man and the Bishop. Hartford, CT: Church Missions Publishing Company, 1935.
- Cameron, Kenneth Walker, ed. Samuel Seabury Among His Contemporaries. Hartford, CT: Transcendental Books, 1980.
- . Connecticut's First Diocesan. Hartford, CT: Transcendental Books, 1985.
- Carroon, Robert G., ed. New Heart, A New Spirit. Wilton, CT: Morehouse-Barlow, 1988.
- Rowthorn, Anne W. Samuel Seabury, A Bicentenary Biography. New York: Seabury Press, 1983.
- Steiner, Bruce E. Samuel Seabury 1729–1796: A Study in the High Church Tradition. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1972.
- Thoms, Herbert. Samuel Seabury; Priest and Physician, Bishop of Connecticut. Hamden, CT: Shoe String Press, 1963.

GRAYSON CARTER

SECTARIANISM

Sectarianism is the process whereby new religious communities develop as alternatives to a prevailing sacred TRADITION or cultural regime. These new communities, called “sects,” often form as protests against traditional religious or cultural AUTHORITY. They typically claim to embody the true or purified form of a religious tradition, or to have discovered a new form of religious truth and life altogether. Accordingly, their beliefs and practices frequently express particular religious themes such as healing or predictions about the end of the world. Sects usually gather around charismatic leaders, but their institutions tend to emphasize the equality and mutual responsibility of members. Their tightly knit communities characteristically take radical stances toward traditional religious and political authority that range from extreme separatism to revolutionary action. Sects have occurred in all of the world’s major religions, but they have had perhaps the most profound influence on Christianity and especially on Protestantism, which has spawned sectarian movements continuously from the REFORMATION to the present day.

Sectarianism as a Theoretical Category

While sectarianism is a long-standing religious phenomenon, its theoretical definition and interpretation are distinctly modern developments created by social scientists using data drawn primarily from Protestant sects. During the Reformation, the term “sect” acquired pejorative connotations that dominant European churches and political regimes continued to use against dissenting religious groups during three centuries of religious violence. These tensions abated by 1900, and in the early twentieth century historians and sociologists brought the history of Protestant sects to the forefront of social theory. In his landmark study The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1904–1905), German sociologist MAX WEBER argued that the early Protestant sects possessed distinctive organizational and intellectual characteristics fundamentally different from those of Catholicism and the Lutheran and Calvinist state churches of Western Europe. According to Weber, the voluntary membership and strict moral discipline of Protestant sects during the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries created an ethical standard of “worldly ASCETICISM” that mandated economic productivity for the glory of God while forbidding excessive consumption as sinful. Weber interpreted the INDIVIDUALISM and activism of this “Protestant ethic” as the spiritual and moral underpinning of capitalist ECONOMICS, and thereby located Protestant sectarianism as an essential element of modernity.

At the same moment, French historian Elie Halévy was researching the influence of Methodist sects on eighteenth-century English society. In two 1906 essays later published as The Birth of Methodism in England, Halévy presented the controversial thesis that METHODISM had played a major role in preventing revolution in eighteenth-century English society. Halévy based this judgment on the comparative claim that while INDUSTRIALIZATION had produced more revolutionary potential in ENGLAND than in FRANCE, something specific to English CULTURE had prevented the middle and lower classes from resorting to political violence. That element, he argued, was Methodism, JOHN WESLEY’S sectarian movement that channeled social discontent into a quest for moral perfection and religious community while enjoining strict loyalty to the English crown.

While Weber and Halévy used historical evidence from Protestant sectarian movements to show the social, economic, and political influence of religion in the modern West, German sociologist ERNST TROELTSCH developed a theoretical distinction between sectarian and churchly forms of the Christian religion itself. In The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches (1912), Troeltsch presented models of the church and the sect as polar opposite forms of Christianity extending back to the very beginnings of Christian history. In Troeltsch’s typology, the church was a universal compulsory religious institution, closely aligned with the state, which was governed hierarchically and transmitted its doctrines and sacramental rituals through an elite priesthood. The sect was everything the church was not: a voluntary religious institution, separated from the state, governed democratically by an elected ministry, and imparting its truths through spiritual experience and moral discipline.

Troeltsch used this series of opposing traits to explain what he took to be the most basic church-sect polarity of all, that of “social teaching” or social ETHICS (soziallehren). In his view, Christianity’s political triumph under Constantine committed it to embracing the Stoic NATURAL LAW philosophy of the Roman elite and conferring moral legitimacy on the secular social order, thereby producing the conservative, hierarchical social teaching of the church type that dominated medieval Europe. Sects, on the other hand, insisted on what Troeltsch called the “pure divine law” ethics of individual obedience to other-worldly standards of behavior, which entailed rejection of traditional institutions and criticism of human failure to follow biblical commands. Troeltsch devoted half of Social Teaching to interpreting all of the Reformation churches and movements through his church-sect typology, but his treatment gave far less attention to eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Protestant sects than Weber’s had.

During the mid-twentieth century, many scholars debated the sectarian theories of Weber, Halévy, and Troeltsch, especially their association of sects with the rise of capitalism. R.H.Tawney reversed Weber’s argument in his 1926 book Religion and the Rise of Capitalism, asserting that instead of causing capitalism Protestant churches and sects had actually accommodated themselves to it by legitimizing the worldly success of their followers. In the American context, H. RICHARD NIEBUHR offered a similar class analysis in his 1929 book The Social Sources of Denominationalism, arguing that while Protestant sects began among the poor as otherworldly “religions of the dispossessed,” their aptitude for capitalistic discipline fostered material prosperity and an adjustment of their social teaching from radicalism to conservatism.

Since 1960, a new wave of sectarian studies has provided historical and empirical evidence and theoretical formulations that carry challenging implications for understanding Protestantism. Preeminent among these studies was George Huntston Williams’s 1962 book The Radical Reformation, a masterly reconstruction of sixteenth-century Anabaptist and Spiritualist groupings on the Continent. In addition, an important series of historical studies of seventeenth-century English sects appeared, some of which followed Weber in emphasizing their religious ideologies of social radicalism and political revolution, most notably Michael Walzer’s The Revolution of the Saints (1965) and Christopher Hill’s The World Turned Upside Down (1972). On the other hand, E.P.Thompson’s The Making of the English Working Class (1963) and Eric Hobsbawm’s Primitive Rebels (1963) reaffirmed Halévy’s judgment that religious sectarianism inhibited political radicalism in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Europe.

American Catholic sociologist Werner Stark synthesized many of these historical studies into a major new theoretical statement in his three-volume 1967 work The Sociology of Religion: A Study of Christendom. Stark placed heavy stress on evidence that Protestant and Russian Orthodox sects were led by discontented class groups like peasants, weavers, and merchants. He concluded that the major social cause of sects was not religious difference, but rather status discontent. He cast Christian sects into three binary categories: “retrogressive” or “progressive” movements based on social programs, “rigoristic” or “antinomian” sects defined by their internal legal codes, and “violent” or “nonviolent” groups distinguished by their teachings on the use of coercion. These defining characteristics reflected Stark’s reversal of the relationship between religion and culture that Weber, Halévy, and Troeltsch had proposed, seeing religion as a dependent cultural variable that follows rather than leads the process of social, economic, and political change.

The most important recent response to classical theories, however, has been to abandon the Christian church-sect distinction altogether and to redefine of sectarianism as a fundamental type of religion found in all the world's major traditions. Many scholars have contributed to this new formulation, none more than English sociologist Bryan R. Wilson. In his 1970 book Religious Sects: A Sociological Study, Wilson proposed an approach to sectarianism based on many of Troeltsch's attributes, but he added a new defining element of sectarianism that he called "deviant responses to the world." Rather than concentrating exclusively on religious beliefs and social mechanisms to explain sectarianism, Wilson argued that in the modern world sects come into being because their leaders and members are alienated from the world. This alienation takes a number of major forms, each of which acquires its own characteristic religious formulation. Wilson identified seven such responses and their corresponding sectarian type: conversionist, revolutionist, introversionist, manipulationist, thaumaturgical, reformist, and utopian. In Religious Sects, Wilson illustrated these types with examples drawn from the Euro-American Christian tradition, especially Protestant sects. Three years later, in Magic and the Millennium, he applied his typology to a global range of non-Christian religious movements, freeing the theory of sectarianism from its Christian derivation and inviting many provocative comparisons across the world's religions.

Theoretical work on sectarianism has continued through the 1980s and 1990s, but it is fair to say that over the past decade scholarly attention has shifted from historic Protestant sectarian movements to the sectarian qualities of contemporary worldwide religious FUNDAMENTALISM. In the American context, Nancy Tatom Ammerman has contributed the most notable study of Protestant fundamentalism and sectarianism in Baptist Battles: Social Change and Religious Conflict in the Southern Baptist Convention (1990). The most significant examination of global fundamentalism and sectarianism to date is The Fundamentalism Project (1991–1995), a five-volume comparative study of Christianity, JUDAISM, Islam, and Hinduism edited by Martin E. Marty and R. Scott Appleby. Sectarian theory has thus gained a new relevancy for interpreting the contemporary religious world, but it remains essential to any critical understanding of the history and nature of Protestantism.

While the definition and causes of sectarianism continue to be debated, there can be little doubt that it has been a primary shaping force in Protestantism. Indeed, there are good reasons to regard Protestantism itself as a sectarian movement. MARTIN LUTHER'S own protest certainly had sectarian implications. His critiques of the SACRAMENTS and papal authority attacked Catholic religious culture at its ritual and institutional foundations, while his formulation of the salvific process located it in an irreducibly individual experience of GRACE through FAITH in the scriptures. H. RICHARD NIEBUHR called this "the Protestant protest," capturing in that phrase not only Luther's challenge to Catholic tradition, but also Protestantism's subsequent tendency to foment protest, even against fellow Protestants. In this sense, Protestantism has always contained an element of DISSENT ready to explode into sectarian radicalism. The immense history of Protestant sectarianism demonstrates this enduring quality. Indeed, at the outset of the twenty-first century there are more Protestants worldwide whose traditions lie in sectarian origins than in the mainstream Reformation communions of Luther, JOHN CALVIN, and ANGLICANISM. To explain how this circumstance came about over the past five centuries is the task of this article.

The Reformation

The earliest Reformation sectarians appeared almost immediately after the publication of Luther's three great Reformation tracts of 1521. They were a group subsequently called the Zwickau Prophets, men from a small city in Saxony who believed that they had experienced direct revelations from the Holy Spirit, rejected infant BAPTISM, and proclaimed Christ's imminent return to destroy the ANTICHRIST, whom they identified as the ascendant Ottoman Turks. With Luther absent in the Wartburg, the Prophets visited Wittenberg on December 27, 1521, where they urged ANDREAS RUDOLPH BODENSTEIN KARLSTADT and PHILIPP MELANCHTHON to endorse their claims. Melanchthon hesitated, while Karlstadt embraced some of their teachings on the LORD'S SUPPER, then broke with the Prophets after they fomented iconoclastic riots in the city during January and February of 1522. Luther returned on March 6, restored most of the Latin Mass, and condemned the Prophets as "fanatics" (schwärmer).

Radical Protestants like the Zwickau Prophets have been called "spiritualists," because of their fundamental assertion that the same Holy Spirit that inspired the biblical prophets and the apostles also dwells in them, granting the same supernatural abilities to heal, prophesy, and interpret the Word of God. The earliest Spiritualists also held radical political views based on their demand that all secular and ecclesiastical institutions be remodeled according to the Mosaic Law and their expectation of the imminent second coming of Christ. Chief among these Revolutionary Spiritualists was THOMAS MÜNTZER, minister of the Zwickau parish that had nurtured the Prophets. Comprehensively articulated in his remarkable Sermon before the Princes (1524), Müntzer's program was rejected by Duke John of Saxony but vigorously embraced by an aroused laity. Rural peasants and urban artisans throughout GERMANY soon demanded the reform of feudal arrangements, town charters, and territorial constitutions. When their demands were not met, they rebelled in the Peasants' War of 1524–1525. The war was a disaster for the rebels, however, who were slaughtered in three decisive battles during May 1525 at Böblingen, Frankenhausen, and Zavern. Müntzer himself was imprisoned and executed after Frankenhausen, and the Revolutionary Spiritualist phase of Reformation sectarianism soon collapsed.

After the Peasants' War, the sectarian impulse relocated in a new form called ANABAPTISM. Even before the Peasants' War, agitation over baptism had broken out in Zurich, where HULDRYCH ZWINGLI'S sacramental theology had denied the infusion of divine grace through ritual action. Radicals there, known as the Swiss Brethren and led by Felix Mantz, CONRAD GREBEL, and George Blaurock, argued that if SALVATION indeed came by grace through faith in the scriptures, then only believing adults should be baptized. Accordingly, they began rebaptizing their followers in 1525, gaining the name Anabaptists from the Greek for “those who baptize again.” The Anabaptist movement spread quickly through SWITZERLAND.

The Anabaptists convened two synods in 1527 that prefigured their subsequent development. In February, MICHAEL SATTLER presided over a meeting of the Swiss Brethren at Schleithem that addressed the urgent need to define the movement institutionally. The Twelve Articles of Schleithem rejected antinomian excess; imposed excommunication (“the ban”) on disobedient members as a means of purifying the community; embraced separation from the profane world; established the office of pastor as teacher, liturgist, and administrator of the ban; and refused to bear arms or take part in civil government, including the swearing of oaths before secular authorities (see SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION). Six months later, Denck and Hut presided over the Martyr’s Synod in Augsburg, a gathering of apocalyptic radicals who debated when the Kingdom of Christ would begin (they agreed on Pentecost 1528) and how to organize Anabaptist missions in the last days. The leaders of this aggressive assembly were arrested, tortured, and executed by city authorities.

After the Martyr’s Synod, Radical Anabaptists took up the apocalyptic cause of preparing the world for Christ’s imminent return. The most spectacular example of Radical Anabaptism was the remodeling of the Westphalian city of Münster into the New Jerusalem during 1534–1535 by JAN MATHIIS and Jan van Leiden, Dutch followers of MELCHIOR HOFMANN, an influential millennial Anabaptist whose “covenants” also fomented an abortive insurrection in Amsterdam in March 1534. At Münster, the Anabaptists practiced community of goods, polygamy, and military defiance of secular and ecclesiastical rulers. For these excesses the city was besieged and taken in June 1535 by the army of the prince-bishop of Westphalia, and its inhabitants were slaughtered. Münster became a byword for radical extremism, and all Anabaptist movements suffered persecution after its demise.

For their part, the Anabaptists abandoned revolutionary radicalism after Münster, turning to the Schleithem model of sectarianism to construct purified, separatist, communal, and nonviolent communities that could survive and even thrive under the most difficult cultural conditions. The most important new Anabaptist groups of this type were the MENNONITES in the NETHERLANDS, the HUTTERITES in Moravia, and the Socinians in POLAND. Named for MENNO SIMONS, the West Frisian Anabaptist leader who gathered them together after 1537, Mennonites generally followed the Schleithem Confession’s teaching on adult baptism and the covenanted community of believers. Menno added a more rigorous deployment of the ban including not only the excommunication of the disobedient, but also total avoidance, or “shunning,” of them by the faithful. With the 1540 publication of Menno’s Foundation of Christian Doctrine, the defining text of Mennonite Anabaptism, his movement grew quickly in the Low Countries and by 1550 stretched east along the Hanseatic coast all the way to Königsberg.

In east-central Europe, a similar Anabaptist movement emerged under JAKOB HUTTER, who became leader of the Tyrolean Anabaptists in 1529. Hutter supervised the emigration of his followers from the Tyrol to Austerlitz and Auspitz in Moravia, where he organized a federation of all Moravian Anabaptists in 1531. Hutter speedily advanced a vision of apostolic community grounded in the community of goods, carefully organized economic cohesion, strict obedience to leaders, and spiritual and material preparedness for facing persecution and exile. These preparations quickly proved their value. In the spring of 1535, at the height of the Münster episode, King Ferdinand of Bohemia ordered the expulsion of all Anabaptists from Moravia. Hutter was captured, tortured, and publicly burned in 1536, but his movement survived fierce persecution under his successor Peter Riedemann, whose Account (1540) became the definitive formulation of Hutterite belief and practice.

Other Anabaptists fleeing Habsburg persecution in Austria migrated east into Poland and Lithuania, where they created a powerful but theologically diverse radical presence. During the 1550s and 1560s, they were molded into the Minor Reformed Church by Peter Gonesius, Francis Stancaro, and George Blandrata. These leaders were heavily influenced by the anti-Trinitarian theology of the Basque physician MICHAEL SERVETUS, burned by Calvin as a heretic at Geneva in 1553. After continuing theological and political controversy, the Lithuanian Brethren in 1577 separated under Simon Budney to form a Unitarian, nonpacifist Anabaptist community, while the Minor Church embraced PACIFISM and the esoteric anti-Trinitarian theology of FAUSTO SOZZINI (Socinus).

A somewhat different pattern of Protestant sectarianism occurred in ENGLAND. HENRY VIII had effected a magisterial reform of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND during the 1530s and 1540s shaped principally by the thought of Luther and MARTIN BUCER of Strasbourg. Decades of unrest followed under Edward VI and the Catholic Mary, then a stabilizing Anglican settlement by ELIZABETH I. During Elizabeth's reign, however, English Calvinists led by THOMAS CARTWRIGHT organized the Puritan party to press for further reformation of the national church along Genevan lines. When their attempt failed, several Puritan communities, most notably Cartwright's own congregation at Middleburg, went into sectarian exile in the Calvinist NETHERLANDS.

Other English Puritans condemned the magisterial polity and liturgical practice of the Church of England altogether and organized Separatist conventicles. Henry Barrow organized the first of these Separatist sects in London in 1587, followed by ROBERT BROWNE'S Norwich community in 1581 and JOHN SMYTH'S Arminian Separatist-Baptist congregation in London in 1612. The Separatists called for absolute separation of CHURCH AND STATE, a purified church of believers only, and WORSHIP restricted to PRAYER, biblical teaching, and "prophesying"—congregational testimony and dialogue with the teacher. For these beliefs and practices, they suffered persecution and martyrdom, which in turn drove other Separatists to seek asylum in the Netherlands. One of these groups, JOHN ROBINSON'S Separatist congregation at Leyden, chose an even more extreme voluntary exile, emigrating in 1620 to North America where they founded the Plymouth Colony. Americans know them as the Pilgrims.

The ongoing and increasingly violent clash between Anglicans and Puritans for control of both the Church of England and the nation's government continued to be the main source of seventeenth-century English Protestant sectarianism. The controversy escalated under James I and Charles I, exacerbated by the persecution of Puritans by WILLIAM LAUD, who was named archbishop of CANTERBURY by Charles in 1633. A significant number of Puritan ministers withdrew from the Church of England to preside over Congregationalist or Independent churches. Soon (Calvinist) Particular Baptists began to break away from the Independents, beginning in 1633 with Spilsbury's Broad Street congregation in London, joined by the Seventh-Day Baptists who believed that the New Testament mandated worship on Saturday, the Jewish sabbath, not on Sunday. The most important of these early Baptists was ROGER WILLIAMS, who founded the New England colony of Rhode Island in 1647 as a refuge for all of English DISSENT.

The Anglicans, returned to power with the restoration of the monarchy under Charles II in 1660, mounted persecution of dissenters through the Clarendon Code until the GLORIOUS REVOLUTION of 1689. This protracted religious and political struggle produced a host of sectarian movements bearing extreme eschatological and political teachings but generally lacking the Continental sectarians' demand for rebaptism as a sign of true faith. Oliver Cromwell's "New Model Army" of the 1640s was the seedbed for many of them. The most notable eschatological sects during the war were the Ranters, a loose group of extreme apocalyptic and chiliastic seers reminiscent of the Zwickau Prophets; the Seekers, an equally inchoate movement of spiritual pilgrims, the most prominent of whom was the unitarian, universalist, and perfectionist preacher William Erbery; and the Fifth Monarchists, who proclaimed the imminent return of Christ to rule over earth's final era of history. Of a more political bent were two sects of the late 1640s. John Lilburne's LEVELLERS demanded that Christian government derive from the people through a universal franchise, separation of powers, and protection of inalienable rights. The Diggers, or True Levellers, led by GERRARD WINSTANLEY and William Everard, were radical pacifists and communarians who from 1649 to 1651 occupied and farmed common lands on St. George's Hill near London.

The most important seventeenth-century English sect, however, was the Society of FRIENDS, or Quakers. Founded by Leicestershire lay preacher GEORGE Fox in 1648, the Friends taught the universalistic doctrine that all humans were born with the Inner Light of God's spirit, which, when embraced by the will, would produce apostolic gifts of revelatory experience, inspired utterance, and healing. Gaining their nickname from agitated "quaking" brought on by extreme charismatic states, the Friends gathered into semicomunal congregations characterized by severe moral discipline, an ascetic lifestyle, consensual decision making, incessant missionary activity, and a distinctive form of silent worship broken only by speech regarded as directly prompted by the Inner Light. The Friends also embraced radical social doctrines of pacifism and egalitarianism, including in the latter a categorical refusal to acknowledge their social superiors in Restoration England. Fox's movement gained thousands of converts even as it endured persecution under both the Puritan Commonwealth and the Restoration monarchy. By 1691, the year of Fox's death, the Friends had become the largest Protestant sect in England and had established important enclaves in the West Indies as well as in British North America, including Quaker WILLIAM PENN'S colony of Pennsylvania.

The Eighteenth Century: Pietism and Evangelicalism

On the Continent, the end of the religious wars in 1648 ushered in a period of theological systematization in the Lutheran and Reformed churches. This "scholastic" emphasis on the rational consistency of DOCTRINE helped launch the ENLIGHTENMENT, but it also tended to devalue the importance of lived religion. Reaction came quickly with the publication of Pious Desires by Lutheran pastor PHILIPP JAKOB SPENER in 1675, who called for the revitalization of local congregations by creating “colleges of piety,” small lay groups guided by their pastors to study the Bible, pray together, share their experience of God’s grace, and assist one another in their common pursuit of the Christian life. Popular LUTHERANISM enthusiastically embraced Spener’s program and it soon spread to the German Reformed churches as well. The most prominent characteristic of PIETISM was its intense emotionalism. The spiritual intimacy of Pietist societies fostered a new vocabulary of powerful personal relationships to Christ, especially a grief-stricken sense of SIN in contemplating the crucifixion and a child-like feeling of dependency on the Savior.

By 1700 Pietism had swept German-speaking Protestantism and heavily influenced Reformed communions in England and France. Pietism became the most important source of Protestant sectarianism over the next century, especially in Britain and America. One of the earliest Continental Pietist sects was the Labadists, a communal inspirationist fellowship founded by Jean de Labadie, a Jesuit from Provence who renounced Catholicism in 1650, was excommunicated from the French Reformed Church in 1670, and led his followers to Germany, where he died in 1674. Another French Pietist sect was the Cevenole Prophets, or French Prophets, a group of apocalyptic convulsionary charismatics who emerged during the persecution of Protestants in the Cevennes following the revocation of the Edict of NANTES by Louis XIV in 1685 and emigrated to England in 1703. Two German Pietist sects found permanent homes in Pennsylvania, where William Penn had welcomed Mennonites as early as 1683. In 1732 Conrad Beissel, a preacher grounded in the German Seventh-Day Baptist tradition, founded Ephrata Cloister near Reading. The Ephratans were organized into three orders of married householders, celibate men, and celibate women who practiced an ascetic life of work, meditation, and frequent worship including midnight watch services.

The most important Continental Pietist sect, however, was the Renewed United Brethren, popularly known as the Moravians. At the turn of the eighteenth century, the long-underground remnant of Jan Hus’s proto-Protestant Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren, began to revive in Catholic Silesia and Moravia. In 1717 one of its leaders, Christian David, began to search for a Protestant refuge for the often-persecuted sect. David encountered Count NICHOLAS LUDWIG VON ZINZENDORF, who granted the Brethren asylum on his estate in Saxony in 1722. Five years later, the community formally reorganized at HERRNHUT as the Renewed United Brethren. Meanwhile, Zinzendorf had embraced an ecumenical vision of what he called “the pure religion of Christianity of the heart” and after becoming Moravian bishop in 1737 stamped the movement with an urgent missionary zeal (see MORAVIAN CHURCH).

One of the earliest Moravian missionary groups sailed in 1736 from London to the new British colony of Georgia. Aboard the same ship were Georgia governor James Oglethorpe and two young Anglican priests, JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, who were assigned to organize the church and government of the colony. Leaders of a Pietistic “holy club” while at Oxford in the early 1730s, the Wesleys were strongly impressed by the Moravians’ fervent piety and hymn singing. Back in London after their Georgia mission, the Wesleys experienced emotionally charged assurances of personal salvation at Peter Böhler’s Moravian meeting in Aldersgate Street. They soon began itinerant preaching and organizing Methodist societies, modeled on Pietist and Moravian precedents, among Anglican artisan and working class people. The Wesleys' insistence on "the necessity of the New Birth" and their advocacy of sanctified "Christian perfection" helped spark the Evangelical Revival in England during the 1740s. John Wesley authorized a separate Methodist Episcopal Church in America in 1784 but resisted schismatic tendencies in his movement at home. Shortly after his death in 1791, however, the Wesleyan Methodists seceded from the Anglican Church to create English Protestantism's largest sectarian family of the nineteenth century, which also included Alexander Kilham's Methodist New Connexion (1797), HUGH BOURNE'S PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH (1807), and William O'Brien's Bible Christians (1815).

The eighteenth century was also a period of sectarian proliferation elsewhere in the Anglo-Atlantic world. In SCOTLAND, John Glas and Robert Sandeman led a schismatic Presbyterian communion after 1728 that held strict predestinarian ideas of human will and observed dietary prohibitions prescribed in Acts 15. More important Scottish sects were the Associate Presbytery formed by Ebenezer Erskine in 1733 and the Reformed Presbytery gathered in 1753. Both of these movements combined evangelical theology with an imperative to restore the classical Reformed beliefs and practices of Calvin and JOHN KNOX. After 1800, another burst of British sectarianism took a more apostolic and millenarian character. In 1830 Anglican priest JOHN NELSON DARBY gathered the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN in Devon around his radical anticlericalism and advocacy of lay exhortation and spiritual gifts. Two years later Presbyterian minister EDWARD IRVING founded the Holy Catholic Apostolic Church according to his Arian Christology and millenarian interpretations of the Book of Revelation.

It was in the American colonies, however, that the most dramatic sectarian implications of EVANGELICALISM appeared. GEORGE WHITEFIELD'S preaching in the Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS) divided American Calvinists, especially Presbyterians in the South and Middle Colonies and Congregationalists in New England. Among Presbyterians, the itinerant revival preaching of GILBERT TENNENT and doctrinal controversy over the New Birth created a thirteen-year schism (1743–1757) between the evangelical New Side and the traditionalist Old Side. New England Congregationalists polarized along similar lines into New Light and Old Light parties, but the Radical Evangelical wing of Separate or Strict Congregationalists, nearly one-third of the communion, permanently withdrew during the 1740s and 1750s. The Separates endorsed itinerant preaching, absolute congregational autonomy, charismatic gifts as evidence of the New Birth, lay testimony and exhortation in worship, and separation of church and state.

The Separate Congregationalists provided the seedbed for what would eventually become the most important American Protestant sectarian movement. During the early 1750s, some of the Separates made contact with Particular Baptists in Rhode Island who persuaded them that the old Anabaptist tenet of adult baptism upon profession of faith was true. Shubael Stearns and Daniel Marshall organized new Separate Baptist congregations in Connecticut, then migrated to the North Carolina Piedmont, where they organized the Sandy Creek Association in 1755. The Separate Baptists grew into the largest Baptist group in America by 1775 and propelled the Baptists to become independent America's largest denominational family by 1790.

As a hybrid sect, however, the Separate Baptists were themselves prone to internal dispute and sectarian division. During the American Revolution, three New England sects, the SHAKERS, the Universalists, and the FREE-WILL BAPTISTS, recruited most of their members from the Separate Baptists. The Shakers were a charismatic, celibate, pacifist, and apocalyptic sect born in the Whitefieldian evangelical milieu of Manchester, England during the 1750s. ANN LEE, the most extreme of the Manchester leaders, settled with a small band of followers at Niskayuna, New York in 1776 and conducted a highly successful mission to New England during the early 1780s, preaching CELIBACY, communalism, and millennial perfectionism. In 1787 Joseph Meacham, a Separate Baptist elder from Enfield, Connecticut, was chosen to lead the fast-growing sect. Meacham organized the Shakers into twelve communal societies scattered throughout New England and New York. UNIVERSALISM first came to America from similar English sources. John Murray, convert of one of Whitefield's associate preachers James Rely, founded the first American Universalist congregation at Gloucester, Massachusetts in 1779. Universalism's main impetus, however, came from New England Separate Baptist elders Elhanan Winchester and Hosea Ballou, who embraced universal salvation and proto-Unitarian christologies during the 1780s and built lasting institutional foundations for the emerging sect. Despite their common Separate Baptist constituency, the Shakers and the Universalists did not practice adult baptism, while the FREE-WILL BAPTISTS did. Founded by New Hampshire Separate Baptist Benjamin Randel in 1779, the Free Will Baptists rejected Calvinism for the esoteric and pacifist Arminian theology of HENRY ALLINE, yet another New England Separate Baptist who gathered a large evangelical pacifist and ecumenical sect among Yankee expatriates in Nova Scotia during the 1770s and 1780s.

The Nineteenth Century: Protestant Sectarianism in the United States

The American Revolution struck down religious establishments in the southern colonies and eventually in New England as well, while the First Amendment to the United States Constitution separated church and state in the new national government. Absent the religious establishments against which it had always struggled, sectarianism came to be redefined in America exclusively as a matter of alternative religious belief and practice. One important effect was the early Republic's receptivity to refugee sectarian movements, especially radical Pietist communions fleeing persecution in Germany. These groups generally followed a common pattern of charismatic leadership, communalism, and perfectionism. The most important of these were George Rapp's celibate colonies of Harmonie (1805) and Economy (1825) in Pennsylvania and New Harmony (1814) in Indiana, the Society of Separatists or Inspirationists at Zoar, Ohio (1817), and Christian Metz's Community of True Inspiration at Ebenezer, New York (1842) and AMANA, Iowa (1855).

Among American evangelical Protestants, religious competition and denominational schism replaced political and cultural resistance as the hallmarks of sectarian movements. These new conditions produced luxuriant results fuelled by the Second Great Awakening, another wave of intense popular concern about personal salvation and correct belief and practice that swept across America from the 1790s through the 1840s. The Methodists benefited most from the Second Awakening, in part because their institutional structure of class meetings, circuits, and conferences, carefully maintained by Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY, mitigated major sectarian ruptures. The only major American Methodist schisms before 1843 were James O'Kelly's Republican Methodists in 1794 and the Methodist Protestant Church in 1830, both of which rejected Episcopal polity. Methodists also organized the first independent denominations among African Americans, RICHARD ALLEN'S AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH in 1787 and James Varick's AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH in 1796.

Among the Reformed denominations, however, the Second Awakening proved deeply divisive. Controversies over the proper training of ministers and the use of highly emotional preaching at CAMP MEETING revivals added to the doctrinal fractures already present among Presbyterians and Baptists. Most of the early sects of the Second Awakening were regional. In 1801 Vermonters Abner Jones and Elias Smith organized the Christian Connection, an Arminian Baptist sect based on the principle of "Gospel liberty." James O'Kelly's Republican Methodists joined the Christian Connection in 1809 to create a distinctively American sect with congregations from Maine to the Carolinas. Anti-Calvinist Pietistic sects also emerged during the Second Awakening among German-speaking Pennsylvanians. The most important of these were the BRETHREN IN CHRIST (1800), founded by German Reformed minister William Otterbein; the Evangelical Association (1800), organized by Lutheran pastor Jacob Albright and Mennonite leader Martin Boehm; and the Church of God (1830), gathered by German Reformed pastor John Winebrenner.

In the West, two years after the first great camp meeting at Cane Ridge, Kentucky in 1801, the Presbytery of Springfield, Kentucky dissolved and declared all nonlocal ecclesiastical institutions unscriptural. Some of its members followed Springfield leader Richard McNemar into Shakerism after 1805, while most joined BARTON W.STONE, convener of the Cane Ridge revival, in a search for a nondenominational Christianity based on the New Testament narrative. Thomas Campbell gathered a similar sect, the Christian Association, in 1808 among Presbyterians in western Pennsylvania and Virginia, following the motto "where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent; where the Scriptures speak, we speak." In 1810 yet another group of pro-revival Presbyterians in eastern Tennessee and Kentucky broke away from the parent denomination over standards of ministerial training and creedalism to form the CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. At the same time, some strict Calvinist Baptists, beginning in 1792 with the Kehukee Association in Virginia, resisted the revival, condemned missionary activity, and began to practice foot-washing as an ordinance of worship (see FEET, WASHING OF). These churches created a loosely organized southern sect known as Anti-Mission Baptists or PRIMITIVE BAPTISTS.

Sectarianism continued to grow in America after the War of 1812, sparked by the resurgence of the Second Awakening. The powerful doctrinal disputes of this period fostered a sectarian search for new sources of religious authority. New England Unitarians cited reason as their guide in seceding from the orthodox Congregationalists in 1824 to pursue a Christianity free from what they considered superstitious and irrational teachings such as miracles and the doctrine of the Trinity. ESCHATOLOGY and perfectionism were also important sources of authority for antebellum sects. The most extreme eschatological sect were the Adventists, whose founder WILLIAM MILLER, a Baptist minister from upstate New York, summarized their chiliastic teachings in his 1835 book Evidences from Scripture and History of the Second Coming of Christ About the Year 1843. Thousands embraced Miller's prediction, and when the promised apocalypse did not occur in 1843 or on the recalculated date of October 22, 1844, the movement survived through the visions of Hiram Edson and ELLEN GOULD WHITE, who saw Christ entering God's temple in heaven to begin his work of purification and judgment. White assumed leadership of the movement, which she reorganized in 1863 as the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS, introducing dietary codes and worship practices modeled on the Hebrew Bible. A smaller sectarian branch of the Millerites organized after 1863 as the rival ADVENT CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

Perfectionism, already widely diffused in American evangelicalism though Methodism, found its most spectacular sectarian expression in John Humphrey Noyes's Putney Association in Vermont (1840) and Oneida Community in upstate New York (1848). Noyes taught that Christ had returned in 70 C.E. and initiated the kingdom of millennial perfection, of which he was now the chosen leader. The most controversial features of Noyes's communal regime at Oneida involved collective sexual practices including "complex marriage," the sharing of sexual partners; "male continence," intercourse without ejaculation; "ascending fellowship," the initiation of virgins by the community's elders; and "stirpiculture," the breeding of community children by parents selected by Noyes.

The most important source of antebellum sectarianism, however, was RESTORATIONISM, the search for a "restored" nondenominational church based strictly on Scriptural standards. In western Pennsylvania and Virginia, Thomas Campbell affiliated his noncreedal Christian Association with the Baptists in 1815; his son Alexander Campbell gathered a new restorationist sect called the DISCIPLES OF CHRIST in 1827. By 1832 Barton W. Stone's Ohio Valley "Christians" had joined the Disciples, who also aligned with Elias Smith and James O'Kelly's Christian Connection in the East, establishing restorationism as a major sectarian force in early America. In 1844 John Thomas left the Disciples to form the CHRISTADELPHIANS, or Brothers of Christ, who developed an anti-Trinitarian theology and the distinctive tenet that the souls of the unredeemed would be annihilated after death while the souls of the redeemed would sleep until Jesus returns. Among Baptists in the Deep South, in 1854 J.M. Pendleton and J.R. Graves gathered the Landmark Baptists, who believed themselves part of the continual existence of Christ's true apostolic churches since his earthly ministry.

The Latter-day Saints also proclaimed a restorationist Gospel, but with a new scripture and a new prophet to proclaim and interpret it (see MORMONISM). In addition to the Bible, the Saints followed the teachings of The Book of Mormon, published in 1830 by JOSEPH SMITH of Palmyra, New York, as an ancient inspired text shown to him by an angel who also provided miraculous instruments for its translation. The book told the story of the Nephites, an Israelite tribe who fled the Babylonian Captivity, crossed the Atlantic, landed in Central America, gradually migrated across the North American continent, received the Gospel directly from the preaching of the risen Christ, and died at the hands of their apostate relatives called the Lamanites. Smith, regarded by his followers as the prophet of this restored Gospel, organized the Latter-Day Saints as a communal sect and led them from upstate New York to Ohio, Missouri, and eventually Nauvoo, Illinois in search of a place to build a new American Zion. Amid rumors of polygamy and military insurrection, Smith was arrested, jailed, and murdered by a mob at Carthage, Illinois in 1844. BRIGHAM YOUNG succeeded Smith as leader of the Saints, and in 1849 brought them en masse to Utah, where Mormonism has continued to flourish as one of America's most successful and distinctive sectarian movements.

While radical groups like Latter-day Saints, Adventists, and Oneidans remained on the social periphery, the culturally legitimized location of most American sects permitted them to engage in mainstream political activity. From this position they experienced serious and ultimately schismatic controversies over SLAVERY, the greatest political issue in antebellum America. From the 1830s, Alexander Campbell steered his DISCIPLES OF CHRIST toward an apolitical position on slavery, claiming that it was a civil, not a religious, question. Presbyterians, on the other hand, divided along sectional lines into New School and Old School camps in 1837. The climax of the slavery crisis in the American churches occurred in 1843–1844, when America's two largest communions broke apart explicitly over the question of whether ministers should own slaves. In 1843 Methodists divided into the proslavery Methodist Episcopal Church South, the antislavery Methodist Episcopal Church North, and the abolitionist Wesleyan Methodist Connection. A year later the Baptists split into rival Northern and SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTIONS. These slavery schisms permanently altered the religious landscape of the United States, reinforcing a sectarian sensibility of denomination conflict and confrontation. The Presbyterian and Methodist divisions did not heal until the late twentieth century; while the Southern Baptist Convention and the Northern Baptist Convention, now called the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES, remain separated. After 1845, separations continued over the slavery issue, the most important being the antislavery Free Methodist schism of 1860.

After the trauma of CIVIL WAR, the abrupt arrival of modernity in the form of industrialization, urbanization, immigration, and the rise of SCIENCE became a new source of Protestant sectarianism. Dominant liberals in the mainline American denominations accepted the new conditions and accommodated their theologies and ecclesiastical institutions to modern conditions through the SOCIAL GOSPEL movement. Evangelicals in the South, however, adhered to “the old-time religion” as a badge of traditional identity while their counterparts in the North responded to their growing cultural alienation by asserting traditional biblical authority, the imperative of spiritual rebirth, and systematic doctrine as the antidote to what they called “MODERNISM.” Darwinian liberals' denial of the biblical creation account and the Social Gospel's Christian socialism were especially galling developments against which Evangelicals reacted.

During the late nineteenth century, that reaction generally took sectarian form as the reassertion of traditional evangelical beliefs and practices. Revivalism returned during the 1870s with the northern urban campaigns of Congregationalist DWIGHT LYMAN MOODY and the rural southern itinerancy of Methodist Sam Jones. Restorationist principles, applied to the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, informed the separation of GEORGE DAVID CUMMINS and the Reformed Episcopal Church from the Anglican communion in 1873. A renewal of adventism informed the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, founded in 1881 by CHARLES TAZE RUSSELL, who proclaimed that Christ would return in 1914 and instructed converts to observe biblical dietary and sumptuary rules. Increasing concern for foreign and domestic MISSIONS drove Albert B. Simpson to organize the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE in 1887 and prepared the way for the favorable American reception of WILLIAM and CATHERINE BOOTH'S SALVATION ARMY, founded in 1878 in London.

A salient exception to these traditionalist sectarian movements was MARY BAKER EDDY'S Church of Christ, Scientist, organized in Lynn, Massachusetts in 1879. Reflecting popular interest in SPIRITUALISM and her own experience of medical hypnosis, Eddy de-clared in her 1875 book Science and Health that only spirit is real and that matter is illusory. Illness, she concluded, was caused by spiritual error and could be healed by proper faith. Jesus had known this "scientific" truth, used it in his healing ministry, and proclaimed it in the gospels. CHRISTIAN SCIENCE converts, drawn principally from middle- and upper-class New Englanders, accepted Science and Health as a scriptural text that supplemented the Bible and sustained Eddy's absolute charismatic and institutional authority over one of the most successful sectarian movements in American history.

The largest group of postbellum sects, however, emerged from METHODISM as the result of the HOLINESS MOVEMENT. The Second Great Awakening had produced perfectionistic Methodist sects like the Wesleyan Methodists (1843), but after the war a broader popular concern for Christian perfection emerged with the organization of the National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness in 1867. Holiness leaders proclaimed a "second blessing" of complete SANCTIFICATION for the truly regenerate. The movement spread quickly, inducing a number of sectarian Holiness communities to separate from the Methodists. The most important of these were the CHURCH OF GOD, ANDERSON, INDIANA (1881) and the Holiness Christian Church (1889). In 1894 the Southern Methodists rejected Holiness claims, leading to the separation of more than two dozen Holiness sects, the largest of which were the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE (1895), the Pilgrim Holiness Church (1897), and the INTERNATIONAL PENTECOSTAL HOLINESS CHURCH (1898). The Holiness movement also reached the African American Methodist mainstream, drawing off a number of sects, most importantly Charles Price Jones and Charles H. Mason's CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST (1897).

The Twentieth Century: Fundamentalist and Pentecostal Sects

Doctrinal tensions and conflicts over spirituality continued to escalate in American Protestantism after 1900, finally producing FUNDAMENTALISM and PENTECOSTALISM, movements carried forward primarily by sectarian and schismatic communities. Fundamentalism was originally a northern urban phenomenon, a systematic formulation of essential evangelical doctrines by leading pastors and theologians in New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago. Central to fundamentalism was its claim that the Scriptures are verbally inspired by the Holy Spirit and entirely inerrant as historical and religious narratives. From this foundation, Fundamentalists maintained traditional doctrines such as the seven days of creation, the virgin birth of Christ, and the historicity of miracles. They also produced an elaborate political and theological interpretation of the prophetic biblical texts and urgently promoted foreign and domestic missions.

Fundamentalism spread quickly to the south and west where its classic documents appeared. The SCOFIELD REFERENCE BIBLE, published in 1909 by C.I. Scofield of Dallas Theological Seminary, provided extensive running eschatological commentary on the biblical text. The definitive statement of the movement's doctrines was The Fundamentals (from which the movement drew its name), published in four volumes in Los Angeles between 1912 and 1915. After World War I, fundamentalists battled unsuccessfully for control of the Northern Baptists and Presbyterians, agitating heresy trials of leading liberals and campaigning for major denominational offices. In the Northern Baptist Convention, William Bell Riley of Minneapolis led the fundamentalist minority to form the BAPTIST BIBLE UNION in 1923 and the schismatic GENERAL ASSOCIATION OF REGULAR BAPTIST CHURCHES in 1932. Among Presbyterians, fundamentalist professors from Princeton Theological Seminary resisted the liberal Auburn Declaration of 1924, eventually resigning to form Westminster Theological Seminary in 1929 and the Orthodox Presbyterian Church in 1936.

Pentecostalism was a more complex phenomenon than fundamentalism, and it produced many more sectarian movements. Some of the new Holiness churches had used the term "Pentecostal" to identify themselves, claiming that Christian perfection was a spiritual promise given to the church when it received the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost described in Acts 2:1-13. This controversial text, however, also described the Apostles as speaking in unknown tongues (glossolalia in Greek), thereby opening the possibility that it might be a "third blessing" for true Christians. In 1901 Charles G. Parham began teaching glossolalia as a sign of the Spirit's presence, and shortly thereafter "the gift of tongues" appeared among his community at Topeka, Kansas. William C. Seymour, one of Parham's African-American students and tongue-speakers, took the message of glossolalia to Los Angeles, California, where in 1906 he led a protracted charismatic revival at the AZUZA STREET MISSION that launched the modern Pentecostal movement.

Over the next decade, Pentecostalism divided many American Protestant constituencies, none more than African Americans. In 1907 Charles H. Mason, co-founder of the Church of God in Christ, experienced the gift of tongues. Following an intense struggle over the legitimacy of glossolalia, Mason gained control of the denomination, driving his colleague Charles Price Jones to form a new communion called the Church of Christ, Holiness. After World War I, African Americans moved to the urban north in great numbers, creating a host of small "storefront" Holiness and Pentecostal sects. Several of these movements, including "Father" M.J. Divine's communal Universal Peace Mission Movement (1914), Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (1914), and Wali Farad and Elijah Muhammed's Nation of Islam (1930), also included non-Christian and Afrocentric elements in their beliefs and practices. Garvey's influence was particularly important, extending to AFRICA and his native Jamaica, where his Afrocentric teachings were later incorporated into Rastafarianism after the coronation of Emperor Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia in 1930, whom Rastas considered a divine embodiment of African Christianity.

A similar developmental pattern produced a number of white and interracial Pentecostal communions in the South. Beginning as a Holiness movement, Richard Spurling's Christian Union (1886) embraced Pentecostalism in 1908 and under the leadership of A.J. Tomlinson reorganized as the CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY, only to suffer a schism itself in 1923 with the founding of the rival Church of God, Cleveland, Tennessee. Although Pentecostals generally embraced fundamentalism, doctrinal conflicts deeply divided them, especially the Oneness Controversy, a Trinitarian debate over whether Christ alone was God. The interracial PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF THE WORLD emerged after 1914 as the leading Oneness sect, while its Trinitarian rival the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, founded in the same year in Hot Springs, Arkansas, became the most successful of the early Pentecostal sects. After 1925, fundamentalists and Pentecostals proved adept at using mass media, especially radio, to gain converts. Although most of these media ministries did not develop into full-fledged sects, one of them did. The Radio Church of God (since 1968, the Worldwide Church of God), was founded in 1934 by Herbert W. Armstrong and grew through the anti-Trinitarian and eschatological teachings broadcast on his program "The World Tomorrow."

By 1935, the first wave of fundamentalist and Pentecostal sectarianism had subsided. While the media ministries of fundamentalist preacher BILLY GRAHAM and Pentecostal GRANVILLE ORAL ROBERTS sustained these movements through the 1950s and 1960s, the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT and the Vietnam War fractured several conservative denominations. The most notable example was the schism of the PROGRESSIVE NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION (PNBC) from its parent the National Baptist Convention (NBC), the largest African-American denomination (1866). Protesting the NBC's fundamentalist theological bent, its leaders' refusal to observe term limits on their offices, and its rejection of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. and the Civil Rights Movement, the PNBC organized in Cincinnati in 1961 and now numbers 2.5 million members.

By the mid-1970s, however, fundamentalism and Pentecostalism were poised to exert worldwide Protestant influence. Triggered in America by the Catholic Charismatic Renewal and the Bicentennial Revival, new media ministries like JERRY FALWELL'S MORAL MAJORITY, PAT ROBERTSON'S 700 Club, and Jim and Tammy Faye Bakker's Praise the Lord Club gained enormous popularity in the decade after 1975 (see TELEVANGELISM). The characteristic sectarian expression of this recent revival, however, has been "MEGA-CHURCHES," exemplified by Willow Creek Community Church, a vast nondenominational congregation founded by Bill Hybels in 1975 at South Barrington, Illinois, near Chicago, with thousands of members and more than 100 ministries located on a 155-acre campus. Thousands of such megachurches now dot the United States landscape, combining eclectic beliefs with a total community environment that provides members everything from health facilities and education to economic networks and arts collaboratives.

The most spectacular and disturbing recent examples of American Protestant sectarian extremism are Jim Jones's People's Temple and David Koresh's BRANCH DAVIDIANS. Jones, a locally ordained Disciples of Christ minister, gathered a progressive interracial community in Indianapolis, Indiana during the 1950s. Over the next two decades, Jones relocated the community in California and made increasingly extreme claims, professing powers of spiritual and physical healing and teaching the doctrine of “translation” whereby the souls of believers would be transported to another planet after death. Growing instability led Jones to move the People’s Temple again to Jones-town, an isolated agricultural site in tropical Guyana in South America where, after the catastrophic death of visiting Congressman Leo Ryan, Jones and nearly 1,000 of his followers committed ritual suicide.

Vernon Wayne Howell came from Seventh-Day Adventist roots in Texas. In 1981 he joined the Branch Davidians, a small adventist sect founded in 1935 by Victor Houteff near Waco, Texas. Howell took over the community in 1990, changing his name to David Koresh and claiming to be God’s true prophet in the restored royal line of David. Amid reports of illegal stockpiling of firearms and child abuse, federal agents stormed the Branch Davidian compound at Mount Carmel near Waco on April 19, 1993. Mount Carmel was destroyed and eighty-six Davidians, including Koresh, were killed.

Beyond the United States, an immense upsurge in Pentecostal and fundamentalist sects has occurred since 1975, especially in LATIN AMERICA, Africa, and East Asia. Estimates of Pentecostalism’s worldwide membership ranged as high as 400 million by the year 2000. Pentecostals claim nearly 20 percent of the population in Chile and El Salvador and twice as many adherents as traditional Protestant churches in Guatemala and Venezuela. BRAZIL is the center of Latin American Pentecostalism, where it has drawn an estimated 25 million converts from the Catholic Church and traditional Spiritist religions. In addition to joining American missionary denominations like the 12-million-member Asambleas de Dios (Assemblies of God), Brazilian Pentecostals have organized a host of indigenous sectarian communions. The largest of these is Edin Macedo’s six-million-member Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus (Universal Church of the Reign of God), a controversial movement founded in 1977 and widely accused of promoting spiritual blessings for monetary contributions.

In Africa, Pentecostalism has followed an earlier wave of indigenous anti-colonial and charismatic Protestant sects known as the AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES. These included SIMON KIMBANGU’S Church of the Lord Jesus Christ on Earth in Zaire (c. 1920), JOSIAH OLUNOWO OSHITELU’S Church of the Lord (Aladura) in Nigeria (1930), JOHN MARANKE’S Apostolic Church and Samuel Mutendi’s Zion Christian Church in ZIMBABWE (1930s), and Alice Lenshina’s Lumpa Church in Zambia (1950s). Recent African Pentecostalism has been largely dominated by the Faith Gospel movement, a sectarian form that preaches earthly success as a sign of true faith, and by Christian Zionism, the belief that the restoration of Israel is a sign of the imminent return of Christ. Among the leading new African Pentecostal communions are Nicholas Duncan-Williams’s Christian Action Faith Ministries (1979) and Mensa Otobil’s International Central Gospel Church (1984) in GHANA, Grace Faith Ministries (1993) and Nevers Mumba’s Victory Faith Ministries (1984) in Zambia, and John Obiri Yeboah’s National Fellowship of Born-Again Churches (1986) in Uganda.

Elements of the Faith Gospel have also appeared in Korean Protestant sectarianism along with a mixture of esoteric shamanistic and Buddhist elements. SUN MYUNG MOON’S Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity, popularly known as the UNIFICATION CHURCH (or “Moonies”), was founded in 1954 in Seoul. Claiming that Jesus had authorized him to unite all Christians in a new global church, Moon was excommunicated by the Presbyterian Church of KOREA in 1948, then published his manifesto Divine Principle (1954) and organized his own sect. Famous for its aggressive evangelism, esoteric beliefs, mass marriages, and questionable financial practices, the Unification Church enjoyed its greatest influence in America between 1972 and 1984. The most successful Korean Protestant sect today is Paul Yonggi Cho's Yoido Full Gospel Church. Founded in Seoul as an Assemblies of God tent revival in 1958, Cho's church now numbers more than 700,000 members, making it the largest single congregation in the world and a powerful sectarian influence. Cho's controversial doctrines about the spiritual and material powers of speech and the existence of a fourth dimension, along with his practice of healing rituals drawn from traditional Korean shamanism, illustrate the strong syncretistic element associated with many of the new Pentecostal sects outside America and Europe.

Conclusion

Sectarianism has played an essential role in the shaping of Protestantism from the Reformation to the present. Once unleashed in the 1520s by Thomas Müntzer, the Zwickau Prophets, and the Anabaptists, the sectarian impulse has flowed through virtually every Protestant communion with paradoxical results. Sectarianism unquestionably disrupts the unity of any church, causing deep doctrinal and social divisions. It almost always weakens the parent body by drawing off some of its members. On the other hand, sectarianism raises questions about faith and practice that extend the intellectual reach of Protestantism and ultimately bring more members into its religious tradition. This pattern of growth through conflict has proven nothing less than endemic in Protestant history and must be accounted one of the chief sources of Protestantism's survival and continuing vigor.

Why Protestantism produces such a pattern has never been adequately explained. The century-long theoretical debate over whether sectarianism is an intrinsically religious phenomenon or a function of secular causes is an essential interpretive discourse that continues to offer fruitful insights into how Protestantism works. Both views possess undeniable merit, but from the historian's perspective the approach of Weber and Troeltsch seems to explain more evidence. It is not possible to understand Protestant sectarianism without accounting for the religious beliefs that so powerfully influenced the self-conscious attitudes and behaviors of believers. Weber and Troeltsch isolated this religious factor in the social and moral teachings of the sects.

But, as this historical survey has suggested, there seem to be other powerful religious sources for Protestant sectarianism as well. Persistent themes of sectarian identity have included ritual practice and especially believers' baptism, eschatological expectation, esoteric beliefs about the Trinity, the quest for spiritual perfectionism, and the search for a restored apostolic church. None of these themes relates as directly to secular social behavior as did the calling for seventeenth- and eighteenth-century sectarians, according to Weber, yet all of them have been more explicitly and more consistently articulated as distinguishing marks of Protestant identity by the sectarians themselves. Similarly, it is difficult to regard such themes as genuine parts of Troeltsch's "social teaching"; they address quite different realms of religious experience, activity, and meaning. It is in those realms and in Protestantism's fundamental doctrinal, ritual, and institutional instabilities that further insight into the elusive sources of Protestant sectarianism is to be found.

See also Anglicanism; Antinomianism; Anti-Trinitarianism; Apocalypticism; Arminianism; Baptist Family of Churches; Campbell Family; Catholic Reactions to Protestantism; Chiliasm; Congregationalism; Covenant; Covenant Theology; Denomination; Ecumenism; Evangelicalism, Theology of; Iconoclasm; Itineracy; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Millenarians and Millennialism; Plural Marriage; Presbyterianism; Puritanism; Sociology of Protestantism; Spiritualism; Statistics; Wesleyanism

References and Further Reading

- Ammerman, Nancy Tatom. Baptist Battles: Social Change and Religious Conflict in the Southern Baptist Convention. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1990.
- Bainbridge, William Sims. The Sociology of Religious Movements. New York: Routledge, 1997.
- Bond, George, Walton Johnson, and Sheila S. Walker, eds. African Christianity: Patterns of Religious Continuity. New York: Academic Press, 1979.
- Cleary, Edward L., and Hannah W. Stewart-Gambino, eds. Power, Politics, and Pentecostals in Latin America. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1997.
- Cox, Harvey. Fire From Heaven: The Rise of Pentecostal Spirituality and the Reshaping of Religion in the Twenty-First Century. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1995.
- Goen, C.C. Revivalism and Separatism in New England, 1740–1800: Strict Congregationalists and Separate Baptists in the Great Awakening. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1987.
- Gottschalk, Stephen. The Emergence of Christian Science in American Religious Life. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1973.
- Halévy, Elie. The Birth of Methodism in England. Translated and edited by Bernard Semmel. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1971.
- Hatch, Nathan O. The Democratization of American Christianity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Hill, Christopher. The World Turned Upside Down: Radical Ideas During the English Revolution. New York: Viking Press, 1972.
- Hobsbawn, E.J. Primitive Rebels: Studies in Archaic Forms of Social Movement in the 19th and 20th Centuries. New York: Praeger, 1963.
- Marini, Stephen A. Radical Sects of Revolutionary New England. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982.
- Marsden, George M. Fundamentalism and American Culture: The Shaping of Twentieth-Century Evangelicalism, 1870–1925. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Marty, Martin E., and R.Scott Appleby, eds. The Fundamentalism Project: A Study Conducted by the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. 4 vols. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1991–1995.
- Niebuhr, H.Richard. The Social Sources of Denominationalism. New York: H.Holt and Company, 1929.
- Numbers, Ronald L., and Jonathan M. Butler, eds. The Disappointed: Millerism and Millenarianism in the Nineteenth Century. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1987.
- Shippo, Jan. Mormonism: The Story of a New Religious Tradition. Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1985.

- Stark, Werner. The Sociology of Religion: A Study of Christendom. 4 vols. New York: Fordham University Press, 1966.
- Stein, Stephen J. The Shaker Experience in America: A History of the United Society of Believers. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1992.
- Tawney, R.H. Religion and the Rise of Capitalism. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company, 1926.
- Thompson, E.P. The Making of the English Working Class. New York: Vintage Books, 1963.
- Troeltsch, Ernst. The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches. 2 vols. Translated by Olive Wyon. London: Allen & Unwin; New York: Macmillan, 1931.
- Walzer, Michael. The Revolution of the Saints: A Study in the Origins of Radical Politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1965.
- Weber, Max. The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism. Translated by Talcott Parsons. London: G.Allen & Unwin, 1930.
- Williams, George Huntston. The Radical Reformation. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1962.
- Wilson, Bryan R. Magic and the Millennium; A Sociological Study of Religious Movements of Protest Among Tribal and Third-World Peoples. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.
- . Religious Sects: A Sociological Study. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1970.

STEPHEN A.MARINI

SECULARIZATION

Secularization refers to the historical process in which religion loses social and cultural significance. As a result of secularization the role of religion in modern societies becomes restricted. In secularized societies faith lacks cultural authority, religious organizations have little social power, and public life proceeds without reference to the supernatural. Secularization captures a long-term societal change, but it has consequences for religion itself. In Western countries, where it has been most pronounced, it has made the connection to their Christian heritage more tenuous. Yet secularization is important beyond the formerly Christian West, given that many of the forces that first sustained it there affect other societies as well.

Before 1648 the term secularis had been used to denote one side of Christian distinctions between sacred and mundane. In the Catholic Church secular priests were those serving society at large rather than a religious order; secularization had referred to the dispensation of priests from their vows. After the 1648 Treaty of Westphalia ended the European wars of religion, secularization was used to describe the transfer of territories held by the church to the control of political authorities. By the end of the nineteenth century, however, it had come to refer to the shifting place of religion in society many scholars associated with modernization. Used in this way the very notion of secularization has provoked contention for more than a century. Once at the center of conflict between traditional advocates of strong public religion and secularist intellectuals striving to reduce its role, it has more recently become the subject of scholarly controversy. Although since the 1960s prominent sociologists of religion have charted the course of secularization, partly guided by the work of MAX WEBER (1864–1920), others have questioned the validity of their interpretations.

This article first conveys what secularization means and why it happened. It then addresses the reservations of scholars. It shows how critiques have enriched our understanding of secularization without refuting the best accounts of the process. These continue to capture convincingly a significant historical transformation in and of society. This transformation still reverberates across the world stage, not least because the value and viability of secular society remains the subject of global debate.

Meaning

In Paris, Sainte-Chapelle, a sanctuary built by a Catholic monarch to house Christ's crown of thorns, stands empty, its aesthetic appeal substituting for its old religious function. Across the NETHERLANDS church buildings no longer needed to serve shrinking congregations have been razed or converted into community centers. In ENGLAND majestic cathedrals that manifest in stone and glass the splendor of an old faith now often attract more tourists than believers. Where once a sense of the sacred marked the landscape itself, where social order used to be visibly embedded in sacred order, architectural relics attest to a profound change: the vanishing of the supernatural from the affairs of the world, the waning power of religion to shape society at large. In landscapes and architecture, secularization has become visible.

Secularization describes the world the West has lost. In that world faith in the supernatural was pervasive and important, indeed taken for granted. A Christian version of that faith commanded unique AUTHORITY, shaping collective understanding of the world. Its influence extended to ART and architecture, Music, and LITERATURE (see ARCHITECTURE, CHURCH). Worldviews that denied the validity of Christian DOCTRINE, let alone the existence of the supernatural, were taboo. Religious elites maintained clear standards of transcendent belief and applied them to all spheres of cultural activity. In that world every community was also a community of faith. To be a member meant identifying with that faith. Overt unbelief constituted dangerous deviance, hence cause for exclusion. Community life, its rhythm shaped by religious ceremonies and events, was tinged with the transcendent. Political authority required religious legitimation; rulers in turn were expected to sustain the cause of religion. In principle, at least, state and church had a common mission. Precisely because religion mattered greatly in public affairs, it also contributed at times to WAR or civil strife. Organized religion commanded major resources, such as valuable land, buildings, and trained staff. Supported by such resources the church long played a key role in providing EDUCATION and social services. Its worldly influence reinforced a shared sense of overarching order, in which human affairs were subject to higher forces. This world had a tangible connection with God. It was a society suffused by the sacred.

Secularization also describes the world the West has gained. In this world, CULTURE is marked by pluralism: religious faith takes many forms, and meaning has many nonreligious sources. The specifically Christian message is one among others, only one way to make sense of the world. It is there, available for individuals to choose, although turned into a preference, religion has no binding force. Conceptions of the supernatural, Christian or otherwise, carry little authority in SCIENCE, art, and literature. No church can determine society's standards of knowledge, beauty, and morality. Even when they make their way into popular culture, supernatural notions thereby lose any sacred aura. In this world citizenship requires no religious attachment, and society sets no rules for religious conformity. Secular events shape the rhythm of public life; publicly significant religious occasions tend to lose their transcendent content. Political authority derives its legitimacy from legal procedures and public support. State institutions execute policy with scant consideration of religious purposes. In modern media, education, or business, religious institutions exercise greatly diminished influence. Their resources are dwarfed by those of secular institutions. Because religious strife is less likely to spill over into the public domain, it diminishes as a cause of domestic and international conflict. Operating within such a secular environment, the nature of religion itself changes as well. Churches are organized as the voluntary effort of citizens who choose to belong; they come to terms with pluralism by giving up claims to exclusive truth; they comfort individuals more than they shape society. In this world an encompassing sacred order turns into a specialized spiritual sphere. Modern society has no sacred canopy. It makes room for religion, but operates on human terms.

This simplified before-and-after description conveys in broad strokes what happened. Secularization theories have sought to explain how and why this epochal change took place in the West.

Explanation

Secularization theories explain the process as a conjunction of cultural conditions, structural changes, and specific historical events.

The Christian tradition provided an impetus toward secularization by making a secular world conceivable. The Judaic conception of a single high God stripped the natural world of magical elements; pervasive supernatural intervention was replaced by a tradition in which ethical and legal precepts governed human affairs. The Christian church added to this incipient separation of sacred and secular by setting itself up as a distinct corporate body that was not identified with a people or community. Protestant reformers further shrank the scope of the sacred in the world by treating God as removed from ordinary life, not accessible through mediation, and by specifying only FAITH and GRACE, rather than good works, as the path to SALVATION. Protestant thought legitimated the autonomy of the secular world. Weber's classic but controversial argument supported this point by suggesting that the Calvinist doctrine of predestination produced in believers existential questions that could be resolved only by successful, methodical work in a calling. It thus put a religious premium on worldly activity, which in turn helped to set capitalist development in motion, leading to an economic system that could dispense with its originally religious underpinnings.

Christianity also contributed to secularization by breaking up as a single tradition in its European heartland. The aftermath of the REFORMATION undermined throughout Europe the broad authority of a universal church, the unquestioned truth of a single faith, and the possibility of maintaining one sacred order. Christian conscience began to make Europe secular by allowing many religions or no religion in a state. In principle, at least, no one henceforth would be pressured into accepting society's religious axioms; in principle, again, it became possible to think of society cohering despite religious difference. Emerging religious pluralism fostered decline in religious authority. In Protestant lands, the emphasis on the BIBLE as the source of truth, displacing church TRADITION, gave rise to textual disputes that in turn furthered DISSENT and schism. When the faith came in many versions, the authority any single one could command gradually diminished. Civil conflicts precipitated by religious difference ultimately led to settlements, such as the "separation" of CHURCH AND STATE in the American Constitution, that formally limited the public role of religion (see AMERICANS UNITED FOR THE SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE).

Secularization stems above all from societal rationalization. The key element in most sociological accounts of secularization is the idea that, over the last several centuries, institutions in the West have become differentiated. First state, law, market, and science, then education, media, and other institutions, increasingly operated according to formal procedures, methodically carried out by specialists, for purposes inherent to those institutions. Institutional function dispensed with transcendent faith. Secular means sufficed to reach secular ends. In modernizing societies differentiation or rationalization eroded any lingering sense of organic unity anchored in a shared conception of the transcendent. Secularization, then, came to represent the way differentiation “played out” in the religious sphere. Religion became one institution among others, operating in its own specific arena.

In many societies particular social struggles also contribute to secularization. The nature of such struggles depends mainly on the “frame,” the overall structure of the religious system, with which a society enters periods of modernizing change. For example, as in the case of FRANCE, countries that long retained a religious monopoly are likely to experience more violent opposition between defenders of tradition and advocates of secular change, with religion becoming more marginalized where the latter are successful. A starker case is that of the Russian revolution, in which a deliberately secularizing elite intended to secularize the new Soviet society by extinguishing its once-organic religious tradition (see RUSSIA). By contrast, in religiously pluralistic societies conflict is less likely to pit religious against secular forces; instead, public institutions will tend to accommodate religion in its own sphere, and conflict among elites over the direction of such institutions, as was the case around 1900 in the UNITED STATES, is more likely to be piecemeal and peaceful.

Secularization can take on a life of its own. Once society is broadly defined as a secular enterprise, religious culture becomes pluralized and rationalization takes hold—the process feeds on itself. In many instances, secularization receives increasing institutional support, for example in the form of legal provisions separating church and state, as well as cultural support, for instance in the form of liberal theological currents. The secular principle of religious freedom, construed as a fundamental human right, legitimates pluralism. In debates about the future of particular societies, the burden of proof increasingly rests on those arguing for restoration of some organic order.

In sum, secularization theories account for the process by arguing that it occurred in societies where the religious culture fostered separation of the world from the transcendent, religious tradition fragmented in a manner that undermined its former authority, social institutions underwent rationalization that reduced the social role of organized religion, contingent conflicts further undermined its authority, and over time a secular societal framework became self-sustaining. This explanation entails variation because it presents secularization as the unintended consequence of the conjunction of multiple factors in particular contexts. No single country shows the way. To analyze the course of the process in any particular case, one must first ask which religion, if any, was historically dominant, how deeply the society was affected by the Reformation aftermath, how thorough has been the experience of societal rationalization, whether religion has been involved in key conflicts, and how entrenched, if at all, in law and theology the model of a pluralistic, secular society has become.

Discussion

Secularization theory is in dispute. Scholarly controversy has focused on the issues examined below.

Historical Premises. Did secularization happen? Secularization accounts assert a shift: once religion did x, now only y. Historians have objected, first, that the timing is left fuzzy: precisely when did the process start? Any date is problematic. For example, neither the Reformation nor the European settlement of 1648 alone ushered in clear-cut secularization. Its proponents would acknowledge that they rarely supply precise dates, although this is no great problem. Watershed events such as the American and FRENCH REVOLUTIONS clearly do mark advances in secularization in those societies. Precise dates also can be misleading, insofar as the timing of secularization is in fact bound to vary from case to case. Broad comparisons over many centuries, although insufficient for fine-grained historical analysis, are themselves useful to show the depth of change. A second historical criticism is aimed at an apparent assumption behind the notion of a shift: there once existed a religious golden age, in which belief was commonly held and publicly affirmed. The evidence does not seem to support such a romantic vision because even in the heyday of medieval Catholicism heterodoxy was prevalent, commitment to the church tenuous, and conflict between church and secular authority common. However, secularization accounts need not assume general ORTHODOXY, deep commitment, or a triumphant church on the part of medieval Europeans; nor do they depend exclusively on decline in Christian influence. Their key claim, more difficult to measure but supported by evidence, is about decline in significance. This claim appears valid, although the historical criticism has shown that it is also a deliberate simplification. Societies that in fact varied in the role, meaning, and practice of faith underwent a process that had common elements and a common direction, but did not produce a single result.

Role of Christian Tradition. Did Christianity serve as its own gravedigger? To the idea that elements of Christian belief contributed to the decline in its influence, one might object that leaders never contemplated such an outcome. Reformers who in retrospect appear to have played a role in secularization themselves focused on rebuilding confessional states. Cases in point are various German states, where enforcing religious discipline became a public task. Similarly, JOHN CALVIN'S Geneva and William Bradford's Massachusetts attest to the concerted efforts of several Protestant communities to keep their faith whole, public, and pure. Catholic reaction to Protestant growth in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries further tightened the bonds of church and state (see CATHOLIC REACTIONS TO PROTESTANTISM). Even as Europe was divided along religious lines in 1648, the cultural and social significance of the dominant local faith was rarely in question. Secularization proponents would acknowledge that only in hindsight did the Reformation set the stage for future decline. Attributing some causal force to the content of Christian, specifically Protestant, belief is not to argue that history proceeded as the unfolding of a Christian script. In fact Christianity could not simply cause its relative decline, for secularization only came about as the unforeseen conjunction of Christian ideas with broader cultural and social change. Secularization accounts make plausible that secularization as understood today first occurred in the Christian West, although they stress that what appears as the “natural” consequence of Christian thought from the perspective of the twenty-first century is the contingent effect of complex processes.

Rationalization as Continuous. Is rationalization as relentless as the Weberian account suggests? To the idea of rationalization as a juggernaut moving in one direction, one might object that this is implausible as a historical scenario. Change is conflictual, resistance likely, reversal possible. Case in point is the experience of Dutch Calvinists in the late nineteenth century. Led by ABRAHAM KUYPER, they resisted secularizing trends in society and government. To advance their “anti-revolutionary” cause, they built new institutions (such as a party, university, and newspaper), imbuing modern forms with faithful content. Together with Catholics, they ultimately gained public funding for religious schools. Kuyper provided a platform for such desecularizing activity with a doctrine justifying a Christian sphere within modern society. Because Catholics built a parallel “pillar” of institutions, the Netherlands in some respects was less secular in 1950 than it had been in 1850; however, secularization proponents can respond that nothing in their accounts rules out reversals. The key question is whether reversals can take hold. The case of Dutch pillarization, for example, was one of defensive action in which religious communities adopted existing rationalized institutions and accepted the legitimacy of a secular public sphere. Church control and specifically supernatural symbolism, for instance in schools, gradually dissipated. Pillarization made the religious modern rather than the modern religious. The process complete, rapid secularization within the religious communities themselves ensued. Rationalization, so secularization proponents infer, is neither smooth nor continuous, but once in motion cannot easily be turned back.

Religion as Defense. Does religion remain socially significant where it is the core of a culture under threat? On the empirical importance of this point, there is little argument. For example, throughout the twentieth century IRELAND and POLAND remained overwhelmingly Catholic. People and nation identified with the church. This was a way to preserve some autonomy, to keep a national community intact, against a stronger foe. Secularization accounts treat this as a prime instance of external conflict that heightens the social significance of religion. Critics submit, however, that stressing the causal role of such conflict becomes a large loophole in the theory. If secularization theory allows such apparently major exceptions, then it is difficult to refute. Secularization proponents in turn counter that no immunization is intended. Arguments about religion as collective cultural defense can be recast in refutable form. For instance, if the conditions, specifically the primary external conflict, that triggered such defense disappear, then ordinary secularization should occur, leading to measurably diminished collective identification with the formerly dominant religion. Surrounded by friendly neighbors, Poland should become less Catholic. Overall, secularization accounts emphasize that contingent societal conflict affects the pace and form of secularization.

Secularization as Self-sustaining. The claim that a secular framework can become embedded in culture and law, and therefore self-sustaining, is vulnerable for two reasons. First, secularization could be self-limiting: if it supplies a product in a market, and if the latent demand of consumers is constant, then any decline in the market share of old producers will create opportunity for new ones. Competition will lead to revived religious growth over time. However, such a market argument does not address key secularization claims because it says little about the social significance of growing churches. It assumes incorrectly that demand for supernatural meaning is constant, and it actually depends on the validity of secularization accounts: to “market” religion is to operate by secular standards. A second criticism would hold that secularization is reversible, as the rise of fundamentalist movements in seemingly secularized countries demonstrates (see FUNDAMENTALISM). As indicated, secularization proponents agree that reversals are possible in principle, although they also argue that bringing institutions under a previously torn canopy is always difficult, that fundamentalists in modern societies are bound to take on features of their environment, that entering the fray of social conflict often entails co-optation into secular society, and that the burden of proof is not easily shifted back to secularizing opponents. The historical record shows few, if any, instances of full-fledged reversal.

Secularization as Privatization. What happens to individual religiosity in modern society? Secularization accounts argue that modernity means choice. Individuals may believe as they see fit. One interpretation suggests that secularization trickles down into the private sphere, and hence produces less belief, commitment, and attendance. This scenario may apply to certain European countries, and it is not surprising that British scholars have made this case, although as a general rule it is questionable. In the United States a large majority of people retain some core religious beliefs and a large minority regularly attends church. In parts of LATIN AMERICA neo-Pentecostal growth has raised commitment and attendance among converts (see PENTECOSTALISM). This does not rule out private decline over the long haul, but the record does not support such an expectation. Another interpretation posits that secularization carves out a viable sphere for individual religious practice, guided by private spiritual choices. In principle, faith can flourish and churches proselytize. This view therefore does not claim that modernity spells the demise of religion. Neither the conventional description of secularization in before-and-after terms nor the factors commonly cited in secularization theories foretell the “death of God.” Yet in many instances secularization produces profound effects even in the private sphere. The place of faith is bound to change. In the case of Latin America, for example, Pentecostal growth has meant the dismantling of an older organic model of church and society, replicating the secularizing effects of earlier, similarly vibrant Protestant movements. As it turns into private choice rather than public fate, religion casts no halo throughout peoples’ lives. Less collectively affirmed, it is less easily accepted. Exposed to alternative interpretations of human problems and natural events, it becomes less plausible. Even private belief is likely to lose some supernatural content. To vary a classic phrase, although individuals may still hold transcendent belief, they can no longer be held by it. On this point, however, critics insist that privatization underestimates the public consequences of private choice, as in the case of the communities and politics of Latin-American evangelicals. Made by millions, private choices cease to be private.

Exceptions

The American Exception. Does the American experience fit any secularization scenario? Many American scholars would reply that whereas secularization may be useful to describe the Western European course of societal change, it does not apply to the United States. Far from creating a secular republic, the “separation” of church and state in the late eighteenth century created opportunities for proselytizing churches to “Christianize” America. By the early twentieth century America had become far more “churched.” Throughout the twentieth century Americans continued to profess faith in God and to fill the pews more than people in other industrialized countries. Their religiosity has public significance. Across the American South the landscape itself offers evidence in the variety of prominent church buildings, physical evidence of a living faith. Church influence is especially prominent in places such as Utah, home of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (see MORMONISM). Novels with a prophetic and supernatural cast often outsell the secular competition. Many congregations provide services beyond the spiritual, not least for minorities; belonging shapes the lives of the faithful in numerous ways. For immigrants religion often constitutes the core of their communities, bridging old and new societies. At times religion becomes a focal point of political activity, as illustrated by the conservative evangelicals of the so-called CHRISTIAN RIGHT in the 1980s and 1990s. Nor has the religious inspiration that gave a powerful impetus to major reform movements of the past, such as the TEMPERANCE and CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENTS, disappeared. Religion serves as a resource in defining some public issues, from ABORTION to peace. Religious perspectives on natural phenomena still contend in the public sphere, as recurrent opposition to the teaching of evolution shows (see DARWINISM; CREATION SCIENCE). In public life, references to God and religious tradition are common and legitimate; the United States remains a “nation under God.”

In some respects, such examples show, the United States is not a fully secularized country, although proponents of secularization would insist that it has undergone secularization. America’s religious pluralism and competition constitute the form secularization has taken there. Its religious vitality is that of voluntary organizations minding their business within a secular republic. Christianization and secularization went hand in hand. Even though religion retained some and gained other public functions, for example as the key element in various subcultures, its relative significance in all sectors of society diminished over time. The most overt attempts to reassert a religiously inspired agenda in the public sphere, such as that of the Christian Right, had little effect on policy. In debates about evolution, defenders of creationism are at a legal and intellectual disadvantage. In conflicts that involve religion, the specifically supernatural elements tend to diminish over time. The way in which religion becomes a resource among others actually shows its diminished authority. In the life of the churches themselves, secular ideas, techniques, and expectations gain influence. On balance, America is not so much an exception as a variation on a theme. It has secularized without becoming fully secular.

The Islamic Exception. Does the experience of Islamic countries show that secularization is an ethnocentric Western idea? In spite of the enormous variety among Muslim countries, all treat Islam as part of their collective identity, assign some public role to precepts of the faith, and allow little religious competition. Islam is not a “private” choice, given that it helps to shape family and community life. Nor can it be merely private, for in principle its key doctrines do not recognize any basic distinction among the spheres of society, no “church” to be separated from the political realm. Even where rulers do not appeal to Islam directly for legitimation, they must work to uphold the faith. In many places Islamist movements strive to restore faith to power by reimposing Islamic law. The Iranian Revolution of 1979 actually reversed prior secularization by instituting an Islamic republic. Only in Turkey has a secular republic been imposed with success, but this was done by force, according to foreign example, and at the cost of continued strife over the place of Islam in society. Its record seems only to confirm that Islam is an exception to the presumed rule of secularization. The exception is gaining ground, as mosques dotting the urban landscape in Europe suggest.

Described in these terms, Islam does not pose a problem for secularization theories. They do not claim that any society must become secular, but rather argue that the process is contingent on several factors. Many of these do not prevail in Muslim lands. Typically, no tradition separates sacred from secular realms, little pluralism has flourished, rationalization has made few inroads as yet, defining conflicts with outside powers have reinforced the collective significance of religion, and resources to make a secular framework legitimate on its own terms are few. Under such conditions, secularization is unlikely; at the same time, these conditions are not immutable. Pluralism can grow, rationalization spread, old conflicts recede, thus making some secularization more likely. Overall it has not been shown that societies that were once pervasively religious can become “modern” without reducing the broad significance of religion. Here, though, secularization theory runs up against its limits because it assumes that secularization is a natural process, a set of events that follow from objective conditions in particular societies. In the Islamic context, however, secularization is also a political issue, a target of criticism, a model to be feared. Secularization has a reflexive quality. Islam is therefore not an exception by virtue of not being secular; rather, it provides a counterpoint by showing that becoming secular is more contentious than conventional accounts have recognized.

Neither of the exceptions refutes secularization theory, although each supplements it. The Islamic case, in particular, calls into question an old, tacit assumption: secularization was something that happened to coherent, independent societies, specifically nationstates. Instead, once secularization occurred for the first time, dramatically, in the formerly Christian orbit, it could then be incorporated elsewhere as desirable model or dangerous precedent, to be locally adapted. As a rule social change occurs not simply as a natural process within separate units. People and institutions compare their experiences; change in one society often occurs as a semiconscious response to the example set by another; some historical events or experiments are turned into models for others to follow. In modernity reflexive comparison becomes more common in world society. With regard to secularization, this means that, attuned to the way particular groups construe its meaning and respond to precedent, we must view it as a relational process. Put another way, secularization has become a societal possibility, a course to be debated. Whether, and if so, how, to become secular is part of the ongoing struggle over how to be modern. In some societies this old issue has been settled; in many others, it has not. Secularization therefore remains subject to contestation in the real world, a phenomenon that has yet to be fully incorporated into secularization accounts.

Conclusion

As a thesis asserting the demise of religion, secularization has been discredited; in this form it points, at best, to the now-ineradicable tension between conceptions of the transcendent and ever more assertive forms of worldly human reason, conscience, and desire. As description, secularization effectively captures the long-term decline in religious (especially, but not only, Christian) influence over culture and society. As academic theory, it explains both the common pattern in the process and the different ways in which religious tradition refracts under local conditions of modernizing change. As a contested concept, it reflects scholarly dispute over the interpretation of historical change and ongoing struggle over the place of religion in world society. Secularization therefore remains vital as an idea about the past and a problem for the future.

References and Further Reading

- Berger, Peter L. The Sacred Canopy: Elements of a Sociological Theory of Religion. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1967.
- Bruce, Steve. A House Divided: Protestantism, Schism, and Secularization. London: Routledge, 1990.
- Butler, Jon. Awash in a Sea of Faith: Christianizing the American People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1990.
- Chadwick, Owen. The Secularization of the European Mind in the Nineteenth Century. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1975.
- Dobbelaere, Karel. "Secularization: A Multi-Dimensional Concept." Current Sociology 29 (1981):1–213.
- Gorski, Philip S. "Historicizing the Secularization Debate: Church, State, and Society in Late Medieval and Early Modern Europe, ca. 1300 to 1700." American Sociological Review 65 (2000):138–167.
- Martin, David. A General Theory of Secularization. New York: Harper & Row, 1978.
- McLeod, Hugh. Religion and the People of Western Europe, 1789–1970. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981.
- Nichols, James Hastings. History of Christianity 1650–1950: Secularization of the West. New York: The Ronald Press Company, 1956.
- Swatos, William H., ed. "The Secularization Debate: Special Issue." Sociology of Religion 60 no. 3 (1999).
- Wilson, Bryan. Religion in Sociological Perspective. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982.

FRANK J. LECHNER

SEEKER

The concept of seekership was introduced into the study of religious movements by John Lofland and Rodney Stark in a pioneering study of conversion mechanisms into the Unification Church (“Moonies”) in 1965, with further elaboration by Lofland in his 1966 monograph, Doomsday Cult. The original definition was a “floundering among religious alternatives, an openness to a variety of religious views, frequently esoteric, combined with failure to embrace the specific ideology and fellowship of some set of believers” (Lofland and Stark 1965). This approach represents a process model of conversion in which predisposing conditions interact with situational contingencies to effect specific religious commitments. A key aspect of the model was that subjects defined themselves as seekers and take action to change through interaction with selected others that allowed affective ties to develop between them. Later work by Colin Campbell demonstrated that the seekership model was consistent with the “mysticism type” identified by Ernst Troeltsch in his Social Teachings of the Christian Churches (1912) as one of three manifestations of the religious impulse. Troeltsch saw it as that form most neglected by institutionalist analyses that centered solely on the churchly and sectarian alternatives that were Troeltsch’s other types, the types that had been deployed in the prior half century through the analytical device of “church-sect theory.” Campbell pointed out that in his mystical type Troeltsch was not simply speaking of a personal disposition, but a religion in its own right that regards religious experience as a valid expression of a universal religious consciousness that is based in an ultimate divine ground—a view that leads to an acceptance of religious relativity as well as to religious polymorphism, in which the “truth of all religions” is recognized. Subsequently seeker-type religiosity has come to be identified by religious studies scholars with the emergent spirituality of the American “boomer” generation (persons born between 1943 and 1962), most notably in Wade Clark Roof’s research published in 1993 as A Generation of Seekers.

References and Further Reading

- Campbell, Colin. “The Cult, the Cultic Milieu and Secularization.” In Sociological Yearbook of Religion in Britain, vol. 5. London: SCM Press, 1972.
- Lofland, John. Doomsday Cult. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1966.
- , and Rodney Stark. “Becoming a World-saver.” American Sociological Review 30 (1965):863–874.
- Roof, Wade Clark. A Generation of Seekers. San Francisco: Harper, 1993.
- Troeltsch, Ernst. The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches. New York: Macmillan, 1931 [1912].

WILLIAM H.SWATOS JR.

SEEKER CHURCHES

Sometimes also termed “MEGA-CHURCHES” or “new paradigm” churches, seeker churches represent a development in late twentieth-century American evangelical Protestantism that attempted to draw boomer and post-boomer-generation Americans (persons born since 1943) into institutional religious affiliation. Drawing on the insights of social scientific studies of changing American religious sensibilities—and major technological innovations and cultural shifts—these new congregations, usually dissociated from well-known denominational labels, replace the traditional evangelical emphasis on converting sinners with a new approach that attempts to win SEEKERS, preeminently by presenting worship and educational emphases and programs that diverge dramatically from both high and low traditional Protestant styles.

The archetypical seeker church and defining institution of the new paradigm is Willow Creek Community Church, a suburban Chicago congregation, and its founding pastor, Bill Hybels. Not only does Willow Creek minister to thousands of people each weekend in an auditorium that may be the largest in the Chicago metropolitan area, but it has also spawned the Willow Creek Association (WCA) encompassing over five thousand seeker churches worldwide.

There are theological, organizational, and practical differences between new paradigm seeker churches and old paradigm American Protestantism.

Theologically, a seeker church does not emphasize the CONVERSION of sinners. Potential members are approached as choice-making individuals who seek a better way to live, rather than as persons alienated from God and in danger of eternal damnation. Becoming an active Christian is seen as a process in which the seeker participates in a rational evaluation of life options. Christianity is presented as a lifestyle that is beneficial in the here and now, not just the beyond. Although seeker churches certainly hold many traditional evangelical beliefs, they are normally articulated as true within the context of the local setting, rather than by appeal to a theological tradition (whether denominational or more broadly creedal). Historically rooted senses of duty and conformity as constitutive of authenticity are replaced by personal experiences of good feeling.

Organizationally, the existence of the WCA notwithstanding, seeker churches uniformly eschew denominational labels and may avoid the word “church” as well—using instead such terms as “fellowship,” “community,” or “Christian center.” Team leadership is emphasized, and a wide variety of programs are encompassed within the scope of the institution. Hierarchical and formal criteria for leadership are subordinated to competency for a task. Persons are often “set apart” for specific ministries within a congregation or are hired from the outside because of demonstrated abilities rather than denominational credentials or training.

It is in the practical realm, however, that the seeker church is most likely to be identified as “different.” Music, or the musical program, in the seeker church is dramatically different. Hymnals are unknown. Instead a contemporary theatrical style emphasizing upbeat singing, in which the congregation's participation may be limited to choruses or clapping; instrumental music by live praise bands; and multimedia acoustical and lighting effects directed by competent sound technicians are the normal fare. Gone too is the traditional sermon, to be replaced by drama presentations and shorter, practical talks. Not only are there no vested clergy or choirs, but the congregation also is more likely to dress and comport itself as if it were at a concert than in a traditional Protestant worship service. Moreover, the building itself is designed intentionally to present this aspect of relative compatibility with secular experience, often in a park-like setting. A wide variety of activity programs are offered, ranging from athletics to social action/environmental programs. Counseling and child development services are especially emphasized as benefits to affiliation with a seeker congregation. Seeker church leadership staff offer weekday and weeknight study sessions that are intended to provide more traditional theological and biblical study for those who wish to "deepen their religious experience."

Seeker churches are consciously and unabashedly molding evangelical Protestantism to contemporary cultural models. Their leadership would argue that this is not new, but rather represents the continuing efflorescence of Christian truth at all times and all places. They would argue that, for example, the Protestant churches that have European REFORMATION roots molded Christianity to fit that time and place. Likewise, American frontier EVANGELICALISM structured itself to meet the sociocultural conditions of a different era, while still seeking to maintain fidelity to core DOCTRINES. This was succeeded by urban revivalism in its day, through the mass crusades of figures like BILLY SUNDAY and, later, BILLY GRAHAM.

The issues at the turn of the twenty-first century create a new context for religious outreach and organization. Whereas the debate at the turn of the twentieth century might have been over pew rents, today pews themselves are the obstacle. Group singing, once widespread through both Europe and the United States, has similarly waned, but not the desire for mass entertainment, as expressed through huge concert venues. Lecture classes were once a norm in educational institutions; now a variety of alternative pedagogies are more likely to be employed. The new paradigm church seeks to integrate Christianity into this cultural setting as other innovations did in earlier times.

From the standpoint of the history of religious organizations, however, one can also see similar processes of restructuring and sedimentation taking place as characterized earlier innovations. In spite of eschewing "denominationalism," for example, the WCA in fact works like a DENOMINATION in many respects. It defines appropriate "liturgy," prepares materials, trains leaders and teachers, assists in hiring staff, and provides networks for the sharing of information. Hence, it is likely that in spite of the structural free-wheeling that seems to characterize the new paradigm, a more historically informed view of likely outcomes would anticipate greater formalization in succeeding decades.

References and Further Reading

Anderson, Leith. A Church for the 21st Century. Minneapolis, MN: Bethany House, 1992.

Miller, Donald E. Reinventing American Protestantism: Christianity in the New Millennium.

Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Roof, Wade Clark. A Generation of Seekers. San Francisco: Harper, 1993.

Sargeant, Kimon Howland. Seeker Churches: Promoting Traditional Religion in a Nontraditional Way. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2000.

WILLIAM H.SWATOS JR.

SEMINARIES

Protestantism originated during the cultural and educational excitement of the Renaissance. The new print technology made ancient texts more available and encouraged their detailed study. Because of a popular interest in preaching, the intellectual training of the clergy became more important. In GERMANY new universities were established for this purpose.

MARTIN LUTHER'S career took place in a university context. His order, the Augustinian Hermits, like other mendicant orders, saw education as its most important mission. Because the need for university teachers was so great, Luther's own preparation for teaching was accelerated so that he could become professor of BIBLE at Wittenberg, a recently established school. PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, a young humanist and educational activist, joined him in 1518. Drawing on patristic and other sources the duo stressed thorough classical education as the necessary preparation for theological study. HULDRYCH ZWINGLI and JOHN CALVIN, also deeply influenced by the new thought, reached similar conclusions. Within a century the majority of Euro-pean Protestant CLERGY had both classical and theological training.

The Protestant model did not, however, completely replace the older medieval ideal, rarely achieved, of the synthesis of philosophical and theological study. As the Protestant churches increasingly faced an intellectually reborn Roman Catholicism, they needed pastors with well-developed apologetic and philosophical skills.

ENGLAND and SCOTLAND developed their own style of theological education. In England, deeply influenced by Renaissance humanism, the classical bachelor of arts was transformed into a course focused on the classical languages. Although a ministerial candidate was expected to read Divinity, perhaps with the Regius professor, the faculties of THEOLOGY atrophied. The minister was thus educated in much the same way as the gentry and other public leaders, and theology in England tended to take the form of treatises directed toward the learned public. In contrast, Scotland retained the medieval philosophical model, and its theologians used a scholastic form to present their conclusions.

These basic Protestant models of theological education have proven elastic with different intellectual movements transforming (not replacing) them at different times. In the eighteenth century, for instance, European Pietists, who tended to identify "true" religion with a heartfelt experience of Christ, emphasized personal biblical study. When the king of Prussia asked AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE to lead in the establishment of his new university at HALLE, Francke made the reading of the Bible in the original languages the heart of the theological program. Moreover Francke insisted that theological lectures be delivered in German, rather than the traditional Latin. Francke also established a number of voluntary associations near the university where ministerial students could get direct experience in ministry.

The modernization of university education, begun by Francke, continued throughout the eighteenth century. As the ideals of modern SCIENCE spread, research became an important component of the training of German professors, and the seminar was developed to help students develop advanced skills. New philosophical and scientific developments suggested that the Bible and theology needed to be studied from a different perspective. Meanwhile the professionalization of the German civil service pointed to the need for higher standards for ministry. Led by Prussia, the various German governments adopted state examinations that reviewed a candidate's academic preparation for the ministry.

Prussia's defeat by Napoleon led to the establishment of the new University of Berlin. FRIEDRICH DANIEL SCHLEIERMACHER, already well known for his epoch-making Speeches on Religion to Its Cultured Despisers, brought together the various reforms of the previous century, particularly the specialization of the faculty. Although theological professors continued for some time to teach different branches of theology, the ideal was for each faculty member to concentrate his research and teaching in a particular field.

Schleiermacher used the new historical critical method in his classes, setting the stage for a century of debate over the new approach's values and limits (see HIGHER CRITICISM). The new biblical studies reopened many literary questions about the Bible's composition, including the authorship and date of many books, and questioned whether many biblical events actually happened. Even scholars who resisted the new approach had to consider the issues that its practitioners raised.

Schleiermacher was also responsible for changing the basic theological agenda. He maintained that theology, rooted in religious experience, had to be reformulated in the light of contemporary knowledge. Not only did this make parts of the tradition problematical, it also required each generation of theologians to begin their work on a clean slate.

American theological education began in the British traditions with the establishment of colleges that continued either the English pattern, such as Harvard and Yale, or the Scottish tradition, such as William and Mary. The post-Revolutionary separation of CHURCH AND STATE changed this pattern. Because the government no longer maintained religious ORTHODOXY, each DENOMINATION or even party with a denomination formed its own theological "seminary" to support its understanding of Christian faith. Significantly, the first such school, Andover Seminary in Massachusetts, was only for college graduates. Although most subsequent schools adopted this same ideal, few attained it before the Second World War.

Intellectually, American Protestant theological schools developed much as their European, particularly German, counterparts. The new biblical criticism was introduced into American theological schools in the early nineteenth century and—despite a series of nasty HERESY trials—had become normative in many of the better schools by 1900. Those who dissented from the new methods, however, continued the battle by founding their own seminaries bound to an older understanding of biblical AUTHORITY. Far more than denominational background, the attitude of a school toward Scripture tends to distinguish American theological schools from each other.

Americans innovated in use of social science as part of ministerial preparation. Initially social science was introduced as part of a broad-based interest in social reform. From 1885 to 1920, SOCIAL GOSPEL theologians attempted to demonstrate that Christianity had valuable insights into labor relationships and urbanization. In time this concern led them to use social science to train ministers for specifically religious tasks. Clinical pastoral education, for instance, placed ministerial candidates in hospitals where their interaction with the sick could be observed and criticized. Although many American techniques have spread to churches in the Third World, they have not been as popular in Europe.

The separation of church and state also affected American theological education. Whereas in European countries the academic quality of theological studies continued to be guaranteed by the state, this was not true in the UNITED STATES. Consequently the various schools banded together to form The Association of Theological Schools to set appropriate voluntary standards for themselves.

See also Bible Colleges and Institutes; Education, Overview; Education, Theology: Asia; Education, Theology: Europe; Education, Theology: United States; Higher Education

References and Further Reading

- Fraser, James W. Schooling the Preachers: The Development of Protestant Theological Education in the United States, 1740–1875. vol. xiv. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1988.
- Hart, D.G., and R.Albert Mohler Jr., eds. Theological Education in the Evangelical Tradition. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1996.
- Kelly, Robert L. Theological Education in America: A Study of One Hundred Sixty One Theological Schools in The United States and Canada. New York: George H.Doran Company, 1924.
- Kitagawa, Joseph Mitsuo. Religious Studies, Theological Studies, and the University-Divinity School. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1992.
- McCarter, Neely Dixon. The President As Educator: A Study of the Seminary Presidency. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1996.
- Miller, Glenn T. Piety and Intellect: the Aims and Purposes of Ante-bellum Theological Education. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1990.
- Niebuhr, H.Richard, Daniel Day Williams, and James M. Gustafson. The Advancement of Theological Education. New York: Harper, 1957.
- Pacala, Leon. The Role of ATS in Theological Education, 1980–1990. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1998.
- White, Joseph Michael. The Diocesan Seminary in the United States: A History from the 1780s to the Present. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1989.

GLENN T.MILLER

SEMLER, JOHANN SALOMO (1725– 1791)

German historian and theologian. Noted scholar at the University of HALLE, Semler pioneered the historical critical method in the theological disciplines and challenged Protestant orthodox assumptions on canon formation, unity of the testaments, and the traditional authority of dogma.

Son of a Lutheran minister in Saalfeld, Thuringia, Semler grew up in a strong Pietist milieu but distanced himself early from its expectations of CONVERSION and intense personal piety. In 1743 he attended the University of Halle, where he became an avid student of SIEGMUND JAKOB BAUMGARTEN. Semler graduated from Halle in 1750. After a brief stint as a journalist, he became professor of history and Latin poetics at Altstedt. In 1753 he was called back to Halle, where he worked closely with Baumgarten. As professor of THEOLOGY he lectured widely across the theological disciplines including hermeneutics, biblical exegesis, dogmatics, and ETHICS.

After Baumgarten's death in 1757, Semler took a leading position within the theological faculty at Halle. Against the Pietists who emphasized the cultivation of piety and scholarly study, Semler sought to include more secular disciplines in theological studies and emphasized academic rigor. Under his leadership the theology faculty at Halle would become the foremost representative of ENLIGHTENMENT theology in GERMANY.

Semler built on Baumgarten's legacy, but he aimed to go beyond the "scientific theology" of Baumgarten and other Wolffian theologians by applying historical critical analyses to dogma, scripture, and the CHURCH. Semler argued that dogma was not immutable but developed over time in response to the exigencies of each age and was thus subject to critical investigation. Semler granted no special AUTHORITY to the early church or councils and argued that the validity of dogma should be based solely on the proper interpretation of scripture. In contrast to dogma, which was binding only on the teachers and CLERGY of the church, Semler understood the kerygma of Jesus Christ as propagating true Christianity throughout history.

Semler's criticism of the canon and the authority of the biblical texts was more controversial. In Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Canon (1771–1775), his most influential work, he argued that the Christian sacred canon was itself a historical product that took various forms as it emerged in the early church. He rejected the verbal inspiration, divinity, and equal authority of the biblical texts. Semler still held that the biblical texts contained the Word of God but that the Holy Scriptures themselves could not be identified as the Word of God.

Semler made a series of distinctions between theology and religion, dogma and kerygma, public and private, which allowed him to affirm personal religious freedom and the right of free critical inquiry while at the same time requiring clergy and professors of theology to subscribe to the church's confessions and symbols. In the controversy concerning the REIMARUS FRAGMENTS (see HERMANN SAMUEL REIMARUS) Semler openly disagreed with GOTTHOLD LESSING'S decision to publish them. At the end of his life Semler's stance on this and other issues alienated him from more radical rationalist theologians. Later, Semler would be identified among the leading Neologists in Germany (see NEOLOGY). His work on textual criticism and hermeneutics was foundational for nineteenth-century biblical scholarship.

References and Further Reading

- Hornig, Gottfried. Johann Salomo Semler. Studien zu Leben und Werk der Hallenser Aufklärungstheologen. Tübingen, Germany: Max Niemeyer Verlag, 1996.
- O'Neill, J.C. "Johann Salomo Semler." In The Bible's Authority: A Portrait Gallery of Thinkers from Lessing to Bultmann, 39–53. Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1991.
- Reill, Peter Hanns. The German Enlightenment and the Rise of Historicism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1975.

JONATHAN N.STROM

SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE

See Americans United for the Separation of Church and State

SERMONS

See Preaching

SERPENT HANDLERS

The term refers to a practice carried out by a small group of independent churches in the southeastern UNITED STATES, notably North Carolina, Tennessee, and Kentucky. Occasionally, the WORSHIP of these churches includes the handling of poisonous snakes. There is, however, in these churches no requirement to “take up” snakes; those under eighteen years of age are strictly forbidden to do so. The movement has had a varied history, mainly localized in Tennessee (Grasshopper Valley). At issue is, of course, the stark reality that there are regularly victims of poisonous bites among the members of these churches.

The churches prefer to be known as “churches of God with signs following,” and their origins lie in the early twentieth century among Pentecostal-Holiness churches (see PENTECOSTALISM; HOLINESS MOVEMENT). Ewent Hensley of Tennessee is generally considered the founder of the movement, whose size, although fluctuating over time, has probably never been more than a few thousand. Hensley traveled extensively as an ardent advocate of snake handling and died from snakebite in Florida on July 25, 1955 at the age of 70.

Theologically the phenomenon of serpent handlers raises the question of the literal exegesis of biblical verses and passages, which in mainstream THEOLOGY have been interpreted symbolically or allegorically. Snake handlers are given to a literal interpretation. The belief system of the churches practicing the handling of snakes or serpents accordingly is based on a literal interpretation of the BIBLE, specifically of several New Testament passages (Mark 16:17–20; Luke 10:19). “And these signs shall follow them that believe: in my name they shall cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues: they shall take up serpents and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover.”

Adherents of the movement argue that these passages contain direct admonitions on the part of Jesus. They insist that, upon repentance, remission of sins, and a new life through SANCTIFICATION, the baptism of the Holy Spirit includes such gifts as speaking in tongues, casting our demons, healing the sick, and taking up serpents (see TONGUES, SPEAKING IN; FAITH HEALING). Thus, the believer goes through the three stages of salvation, sanctification, and the baptism of the Holy Spirit. The key consideration is that the new life in Christ has the same spiritual gifts of which the New Testament speaks in I Corinthians 12:8–10. In a way, therefore, “taking up serpents” is but one facet of the new life of the sanctified, Holy Spirit-baptized believer, which also finds expression in other matters as simplicity of dress and attire, disapproval of alcohol, and so forth. The snake-handling churches do not believe that the “taking up” of serpents will leave the handler immune to poison or bite. The serpents are “taken up,” that is, handled in response to the Biblical command. Believers will not take up snakes unless they believe they are “anointed,” or that the power of God is sufficient to protect them.

There is, however, also the sense that those who take up snakes will be protected because of their faithfulness to the biblical command.

The snake-handling churches are another instance of the important legal and constitutional issue of whether government has the right to intervene with the free exercise of religion when possible deaths of members of a religious movement are involved (an issue also posed by members of the Watchtower Society/ JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES or by followers of CHRISTIAN SCIENCE). When a member of the Dolly Pond Church of God with Signs Following died from snake handling in 1945, the Tennessee legislature banned the practice because public sentiment quickly ran high. Other states, such as Kentucky (1940), Georgia (1941), Tennessee (1947), Virginia (1947), North Carolina (1949), and Georgia (1950), followed suit, raising the question of the free exercise of religion. A decision of the Tennessee Supreme Court affirming the ban appears to have settled the legal issue of constitutionality.

References and Further Reading

Burton, Thomas. Serpent-Handling Believers. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.

Kimbrough, David. Taking Up Serpents. Snake Handlers of Eastern Kentucky. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

Pelton, Robert W. Snake Handlers. God Fearers? Or Fanatics. Nashville, TN: T. Nelson, 1974.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

SERVETUS, MICHAEL (c.1511–1553)

Spanish anti-trinitarian. Servetus was born in Villeneuve de Sijena, Spain, in either 1509 or 1511. His family social origins are vague, but it seems he came from a petty, albeit noble family and it is known that his brother was a sometimes agent for the Spanish Inquisition. Servetus left Spain for study in Toulouse in either 1528 or 1529 and subsequently traveled extensively, visiting Strasbourg, where he met MARTIN BUCER and WOLFGANG CAPITO. In Basel he lived with JOHANNES OECOLAMPADIUS for ten months. The publication of his extremely heretical treatise, Concerning the Errors of the Trinity De Trinitatis erroribus (1531), and The Righteousness of Christ's Kingdom Dialogorum de Trinitate of the following year, brought him instant notoriety.

In these writings he challenged the authenticity of the orthodox DOCTRINE of the Trinity, arguing that it was neither scriptural nor monotheistic but the result of pagan Greek thought. Ancient Greek gods, Servetus argued, possessed divine aspects. This concept was then translated back into Christian thought as separate and distinct personalities. Servetus advanced the notion that the Godhead was composed of various modes or guises that, like hats, God changed according to the specific historical context. Although Servetus cited a host of ancient heterodox Christian authorities to make his case, he was also familiar with medieval Rabbinic thought which also interpreted the different names of God mentioned in the Old Testament as various guises or attributes of a single God. Servetus's early works were universally condemned and he was declared an outlaw. As a result, from 1533 to 1538 Servetus used the alias Michel de Villeneuve and studied medicine in Paris.

Eventually he made his home in Charlieu, Lyon, and Vienne, in Southern France where he practiced medicine and published a series of medical and astrological treatises under his alias. His medical writings dealt with the conflict between "Greeks" and "Arabist" interpretations and he was the first to describe the pulmonary circulation of the blood, a century before William Harvey. His geographical writings championed the cause of comparative geography and his exegetical writings advanced a historical-contextual method to interpret Scripture so that the text was interpreted both etymologically and conceptually within the context of the times and not from the vantage point of subsequent prophetic developments.

In 1552 he published his magnum opus, The Restitution of Christianity, a compendium of virtually every heretical idea of the late medieval and early modern period. His true identity was eventually discovered and he was tried for HERESY in Vienne, France. After a considerable trial he was condemned to death but in 1552 he escaped from prison and secretly made his way to Geneva in hopes of eventually getting to ITALY. He was found out, however, put on trial for maintaining heretical views, and was executed a year later in Geneva.

Although no church bears his name, Servetus contributed greatly to REFORMATION Age intellectual life. Unlike orthodox Protestants, Servetus did not hope to merely cleanse Christianity of an erroneous Catholic tradition, but to restore ancient Christianity in all of its vibrancy. In seeking the historical roots of Christianity, Servetus used a score of ancient heterodox religious thinkers to refabricate what he perceived as the original Christian message. He was also one of several Christian intellectuals to become familiar with medieval Jewish thought through contact with convertos, Jewish converts to Christianity. Like Servetus, they too sought to reinterpret both ancient religions' traditions into a new Judeo-Christianity that would better represent "what the first Christians believed." Despite an early death, Servetus greatly influenced subsequent radical religious developments in POLAND and Lithuania and his followers were among those who eventually founded Unitarianism.

Servetus was also important to the Reformation and the development of Protestantism for other reasons. His death in Geneva served as a clarion call for the cause of religious TOLERATION. Although he had committed no civil or religious offense in Geneva—indeed, was anonymously on his way to safer refuge in Italy—Servetus had not been tried by legal authorities because of any views he propagated or preached, but purely because of views he maintained within his conscience, within the privacy of his own being. JOHN CALVIN'S active role in Servetus's prosecution has also proven troubling because where the town council wished merely to condemn and exile Servetus, Calvin convinced the council to condemn Servetus and have him burned at the stake. Calvin acquired the reputation for intolerance, and SEBASTIAN CASTELLIO and other advocates of liberty of conscience made Servetus's death a rallying cry for religious toleration.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Servetus, Michael. De Trinitatis erroribus libri septum. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Minerva, 1965.

Servetus, Michael, and Charles Donald O'Malley. Michael Servetus, a Translation of his Geographical, Medical, and Astrological Writings. Philadelphia, PA: American Philosophical Society, 1953.

Servetus, Michael, and Earl Morse Wilbur. The Two Treatises of Servetus on the Trinity. New York: Kraus Reprint, 1969.

Servetus, Michael, Charles Donald O'Malley, and Madeline E. Stanton. Christianismi restitution: And Other Writings. Birmingham, AL: Classics of Medicine Library, 1989.

Secondary Sources:

Bainton, Roland H. The Hunted Heretic. The Life and Death of Michael Servetus. Boston: Beacon Press, 1953.

Baron, J.Fernandez. Miguel Servet. Su vida et su obra. Madrid, Spain: Espasa-Calpe, 1970.

Friedman, Jerome. Michael Servetus: A Case Study in Total Heresy. Geneva, Switzerland: Librairie Droz, 1978.

Kinder, Gordon A. Michael Servetus. Baden-Baden, Germany: Valentin Koerner, 1989.

Manzoni, Claudio. Umanesimi ed Heresia. Michele Serveto. Naples, Italy: Guida, 1974.

JEROME FRIEDMAN

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS

The Seventh-day Adventist church is an international church headquartered in Silver Spring, Maryland, with membership exceeding twelve million worldwide. The church originated in the northeastern UNITED STATES as a surviving strand of the Millerite movement. The salient teachings of Seventh-day Adventists include a belief in the biblical account of creation and mankind's fall into SIN from an originally perfect state, salvation alone through the atoning death of Jesus, the return of Jesus to earth followed by the restoration of a sinless world, and observance of the seventh-day Sabbath. Seventh-day Adventists have an organized presence in more than 200 countries and operate global networks of publishing plants, healthcare institutions, and schools, ranging from elementary to tertiary schools and a variety of postbaccalaureate programs.

Organization

The Seventh-day Adventist Church organized in 1860 in Battle Creek, Michigan after emerging from the Millerite movement, named after WILLIAM MILLER, a veteran of the War of 1812 living in Low Hampton, New York. Miller concluded that biblical prophecies predicted a premillennial return of Jesus to the earth and began preaching in 1831 in New England and New York. Other students of prophecy in the United States, Europe, and LATIN AMERICA advanced these or similar beliefs (see MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISM).

The Millerite movement culminated on October 22, 1844 when Jesus did not return to earth as anticipated. By that time Millerites were also called Adventists in recognition of their belief in the second advent of Jesus. After 1844 the movement faded; however, a nucleus of Adventists who continued to believe in the premillennial return of Jesus met frequently for Bible study and PRAYER. Led by Joseph Bates, a retired sea captain from Massachusetts, and James and ELLEN WHITE from Maine, they developed a body of identifying doctrines by 1850. Bates became a leading force in doctrinal development and the Whites strongly influenced organizational and institutional growth.

J.N.Andrews, who became a president of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and the first officially sponsored worker outside the United States, joined the group in 1846. Uriah Smith, who developed into a prolific writer, editor, and one of the church's leading expositors of biblical prophecy, joined in 1852, as did J.N.Loughborough, who became a prominent evangelist, administrator, and writer.

In 1860 this group numbered more than 3,000 and organized an official church, choosing the name Seventh-day Adventist. Between 1861 and 1922 the church developed a four-tiered administrative organization. In 1861 individual congregations grouped together to constitute local conferences. Two years later an overarching organization, the General Conference, was organized as the seat of AUTHORITY for the entire church. John Byington from New York state was the first president of the General Conference.

In 1901 the church underwent major reorganization. Clusters of conferences were organized into unions, a practice that Australian Adventists had followed during the 1890s. To provide constant church leadership in distant regions, in 1903 the General Conference began assigning a vice president to a large area, which in time became known as a division of the General Conference. By 1922 the division system was finalized.

Originally conferences sent delegates to annual gatherings called General Conference sessions to transact church business and elect church officers. Since 1970 these sessions convene every five years. Delegates approximate 2,000 and include selected lay members and representatives from the conferences, unions, and thirteen divisions that embrace all regions of the world. Between sessions the General Conference Executive Committee convenes each fall and spring to handle budget and policy matters. Officers of divisions and unions also meet every five years; conferences conduct business sessions on a three-year cycle.

Between 1860 and 1901, Seventh-day Adventists developed numerous organizations, frequently called “societies,” that were semi-independent units promoting church activities. EDUCATION, religious liberty, literature publication and distribution, healthful living, TEMPERANCE, and Sabbath School (the Adventist equivalent of SUNDAY SCHOOL) were among the early societies. As a part of the 1901 reorganization these societies became departments of the General Conference, each with a leader answerable to the General Conference president. New departments have since formed, and divisions, unions, and conferences have also organized corresponding departments. The numbers of departments and leaders vary among the unions and conferences, depending on needs and financial resources.

Individual churches organize according to policies set forth in The Church Manual, a digest of organizational instruction periodically revised and circulated throughout the Adventist community. A church board governs each congregation by establishing local operational and financial practices within the framework of conference and union policies. Congregations also control their membership by granting or withdrawing membership to individuals by general vote. Conferences rather than congregations employ pastors, and pastors are responsible to conferences for the operational integrity of their congregations.

Teachings

Seventh-day Adventist doctrine derives from a belief in a cosmic controversy between good and evil resulting from Lucifer’s challenges to God’s authority as the creator of a moral universe. The stage for this conflict is the earth and the human soul. The BIBLE is the revelation of God’s will for humans and is the sole source of belief about God’s mercy and the divine plan to save humans from evil. God created humans with the capacity to make moral choices. By choice Adam and Eve fell from their perfect state and produced a race naturally prone to sin, but each individual continues to exercise a choice in this controversy. Scripture describes the final eradication of sin and the restoration of a perfect earth.

Adventist doctrines form a systematic body of beliefs surrounding the plan of SALVATION in which Christ is central as the redeemer of a fallen human race. These beliefs begin with salvation alone through the ATONEMENT of Christ and the intercessory ministry of Jesus as part of a final judgment of humans based on the law of God. Adventists teach that Scripture foretells a specific time of final judgment; thus humans do not receive their eternal reward when they die, but remain in “sleep” until Christ’s return to pronounce divine judgment. Adventists reject the doctrine of immortality of the human soul as commonly held by Christians in favor of a conditional immortality.

Among the identifying teachings of the early Adventists led by Bates and the Whites was the seventh-day Sabbath (see SABBATARIANISM). Bates introduced the Sabbath after adopting it from a Sabbath-keeping congregation in Washington, New Hampshire, which is regarded as the first Seventh-day Adventist church. Adventists first understood and continued to teach Sabbath observance to signify their allegiance to God’s authority as creator and God’s power to restore the world to its original sinless state.

Adventists also teach that spiritual gifts as described in I Corinthians 12 would be present in the church and that Ellen White exercised the gift of prophecy. They believe that she received visions, dreams, and other special communications from God as did biblical prophets, but neither she nor the Seventh-day Adventist Church taught that her messages shared canonical status with Scripture. She believed her role was to render advice about organization and administration, clarify understanding of biblical teachings, and promote an Adventist lifestyle through public and personal counsel.

Adventists teach that God’s law defines sin because it is an unchangeable expression of divine character, but deny that humans merit salvation through obedience. Humanity is by nature sinful and totally dependent on God’s forgiving GRACE made possible through Christ’s atoning death and intercessory ministry. Adventist doctrine better defines obedience as a way of life consistent with God’s character, voluntarily chosen as a loving demonstration of faith in and commitment to Christ rather than compliance with the law’s written form for the purpose of earning salvation. Ellen White’s books, The Desire of Ages, Steps to Christ, and Thoughts from the Mount of Blessing, all written after 1880, became classic Adventist statements of these beliefs.

Adventists emphasize healthful diet and teach abstinence from alcohol, tobacco, and narcotics. These teachings stem from a wholistic view of human life, that is, the human body deserves respect because it was created perfect in God’s image and, although marred by sin, is still the temple of God.

Preserving the Integrity of Beliefs

Because Seventh-day Adventists believe in sola scriptura and a progressive understanding of Scripture they have never adopted a formal creed. Adventist doctrines are open for discussion and church leaders have issued successive official statements of beliefs. Although the wording of these statements differs to reflect updated understanding in light of continued study, the essence of fundamental beliefs has remained.

The first document, Fundamental Principles, published in 1872, embodied twenty-five propositions. It remained the official pronouncement of beliefs until the second version appeared in 1931. This second statement summarized the “principal features” of “fundamental beliefs,” condensing the propositions to twenty-two. In 1980 the number was revised to twenty-seven, which are commonly called the “twenty-seven fundamental beliefs.”

The 1980 statement places a heavier stress on the Trinity and the heavenly sanctuary, especially the intercessory ministry of Christ. Although Seventh-day Adventists have always been creationists, for the first time the biblical explanation of the origins of life became a fundamental belief. The statement also confirms the sanctity of MARRIAGE and the family, and recognizes the broad Christian community as the prophetic body of Christ.

Primarily in the United States and AUSTRALIA a debate developed in the 1970s about Adventists’ traditional understanding of Ellen White’s role as a fulfillment of the biblical gift of prophecy. Questions also arose about church teachings associated with final judgment and the 2,300-day prophecy of Daniel 8. Coincident with these discussions was a wave of concern about JUSTIFICATION and righteousness by FAITH. Careful study contributed to the revision of fundamental beliefs in 1980, which clarified the wording but did not alter the substance of church teaching.

Two service departments of the General Conference help to maintain the scriptural integrity of church teachings. The Biblical Research Institute concentrates on theological studies and biblical interpretations. The Geoscience Research Institute conducts ongoing research in scientific evidence to resolve conflicts between Scripture and SCIENCE (see CREATION SCIENCE).

Adventists universally accept the 1980 statement of fundamental beliefs. Guides to scriptural study for all age groups are published by the General Conference to be used in Sabbath Schools around the world. The Seventh-day Adventist Bible Commentary, published between 1953 and 1957 and subsequently updated, helps to standardize beliefs, although understanding of scriptural instruction affecting lifestyle and social matters may vary from region to region. At the 1990 and 1995 General Conference sessions vigorous debate about ordination of WOMEN produced a final negative vote, reflecting differences of opinion between Adventists in the Western and developing worlds (see WOMEN CLERGY).

Prospective members voluntarily commit themselves to a concise statement of fundamental beliefs that constitutes their baptismal vow. BAPTISM is by immersion.

Adventists do not baptize infants because they cannot make a voluntary choice of belief, but children who show an understanding of the meaning of such a commitment may be baptized.

Institutions

In 1849 Adventists began a paper, The Present Truth, in which the editor James White reviewed Adventist teachings and urged unity among believers (see PUBLISHING). The following year he changed its name to The Second Advent Review and Sabbath Herald, published weekly. Since 1850 it has undergone several name changes, the last in 1978 to the Adventist Review. It has become the general paper for Seventh-day Adventists and is intended primarily for church readership. Variations of the Review appear in Spanish, French, and Portuguese, prepared by local editors in fields where membership in those languages exist in substantial numbers.

To facilitate Adventist publishing, White established a press in Rochester, New York, but in 1853 he moved it to Battle Creek, Michigan. This enterprise became the first centralizing institution among Adventists and Battle Creek became a de facto headquarters to which prominent leaders gravitated. Organizational actions between 1860 and 1863 established Battle Creek as the capital of the DENOMINATION.

A new journal, The Signs of the Times, appeared in 1874 edited by James White. It was the first major paper that presented Adventist views to the non-Adventist public. The next year the Whites founded the Pacific Press Publishing Association in Oakland, California, which became the home for the new publication. This periodical became a model for similar journals for non-Adventist readership around the world. Some use the title, The Signs of the Times, but are edited and published in divisions outside North America. Divisions, unions, and many conferences publish periodicals for their own members. Departments of the General Conference promote their own specialized programs with magazines for both the Adventist and non-Adventist public. Better-known publications are Liberty (religious freedom), Vibrant Life (healthful living), and Listen (temperance).

Their wholistic view of human life led Adventists to make health one of the strongest aspects of their teachings. In 1866 the Whites founded the Western Health Reform Institute in Battle Creek. It promoted natural foods, rest, and exercise, and advocated natural remedies in treating sickness. In 1876 Dr. John Harvey Kellogg, a graduate of Bellevue Hospital Medical College in New York, became the director of the Institute. Under his leadership the center came to be known as Battle Creek Sanitarium and gained an international reputation for teaching principles of health as a lifestyle. The Sanitarium became a clinical institution for a nursing school in 1883 and a school of medicine, American Medical Missionary College, in 1895.

Kellogg's interest in diet motivated him to advocate vegetarianism and develop a line of nut-based foods and dry cereals made from grains. Following this example, Adventists established health food factories in many countries, which became known for meat analogs, cereals, and natural foods. Sanitarium Health Food Company, established in 1897 in Australia, came to be one of the most widely known food enterprises of its kind in Australia and NEW ZEALAND.

The church lost control of Battle Creek Sanitarium to Kellogg, who separated from the church in 1907. On property purchased in 1905 in southern California, Adventists reestablished their emphasis on health by equipping a new sanitarium and nursing school. In 1910 they added a school of medicine. This institution was chartered under the name of College of Medical Evangelists until 1961 when it changed to Loma Linda University. Besides offering degrees in medicine it engages in projects of academic medicine, notably in proton treatment of cancer and heart transplants among children. It operates a school of dentistry, confers doctorates in public health and selected fields of science, and offers baccalaureate and advanced degrees in other health-related fields. Adventist health-care units around the world range from small clinics to critical-care institutions and serve more than 9,000,000 outpatients annually.

In 1872 James and Ellen White encouraged the General Conference to establish an Adventist school in Battle Creek. Goodloe Harper Bell, a convert to Adventism who had attended Oberlin College, was the first teacher. Two years later the school became Battle Creek College. The purposes of the institution were to provide an education for Adventists of all ages and to train denominational employees, primarily ministers, teachers, and various lines of office workers. Through the 1880s and 1890s enrollment fluctuated from 400 to above 800, including all levels from elementary through college.

Partly as a result of reorganization in 1901, church leaders dismantled Battle Creek as the Seventh-day Adventist headquarters. In 1901 they sold Battle Creek College and moved the school to Berrien Springs in southwestern Michigan, renaming it Emmanuel Missionary College. In 1959 the Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary moved from Washington, D.C., where it had operated since its founding in 1936, to the Berrien Springs campus. The college changed to Andrews University and developed doctoral programs in theology, pastoral ministry, and education, and offered advanced degrees in other fields in the arts and sciences (see CHRISTIAN COLLEGES; HIGHER EDUCATION).

In 1903 the General Conference office transferred from Battle Creek to Takoma Park, Maryland, on the north side of Washington, D.C. It remained there until 1989 when it moved to Silver Spring, Maryland, still in the Greater Washington area. Simultaneously the Review and Herald Publishing Association moved from Battle Creek to new quarters adjacent to the church offices in Takoma Park. In 1983 it transferred to a new plant in Hagerstown, Maryland.

Internationalization of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church

J.N.Andrews became the first official Seventh-day Adventist worker outside North America in 1874. Under his leadership the church set up administrative offices and a press in Basel, SWITZERLAND. At the General Conference session of 1882 a Foreign Mission Board was formed to oversee missions in countries beyond the United States. Adventism also spread informally through literature exchange, emigration, and volunteer workers. M.B.Czechowski preached twelve years in Europe after 1864 without financial support from the church. By 1900 Seventh-day Adventists had spread to Scandinavia, ENGLAND, GERMANY, RUSSIA, Romania, Argentina, BRAZIL, MEXICO, Central America, the CARIBBEAN islands, AFRICA, CHINA, INDIA, Australia, New Zealand, and some Pacific islands.

Prominent Adventists participated in this movement. Ellen White spent two years in Europe, 1885–1887, advising Adventist groups from ITALY to NORWAY about evangelism and organization. From 1891 to 1900 she and her son, William C.White, lived in Australia, where they implemented organizational and evangelistic plans. A.G.Daniells was involved in church administration in New Zealand and Australia from 1889 to 1900. L.R.Conradi, a German immigrant to the United States who converted to Adventism, returned in 1886 to preach in eastern Europe. Frank Westphal, a German-speaking North American, settled in Argentina in 1894 to establish Adventism in lower South America. J.G.Matteson, a Danish-born immigrant to the United States, published the first non-English Adventist periodical in 1872, and in 1877 returned to Denmark, where he organized the first conference of churches outside North America. G.W. Caviness, formerly president of Battle Creek College, moved to Mexico in 1897 to lead general evangelistic activities.

In many of these locations workers established printing presses and schools that later developed into major institutions. The Norwegian Publishing House started in 1879. A worker-preparation school that became Avondale College near Cooranbong, Australia traces its beginnings to 1892. Buenos Aires Publishing House in Argentina started in 1896; in 1898, also in Argentina, River Plate Adventist University began as a small school to train church workers. Hamburg Publishing House in Germany began operations in 1895, and near Magdeburg, Germany, a school that became Friedensau University opened in 1899.

By 1921 Seventh-day Adventist membership totaled 198,088, slightly more than half of which was outside North America. This number grew to more than a million in 1955. In all of the world divisions Adventists operated health-care institutions, publishing enterprises to handle literature needs for both internal and external use, and schools with the dual purpose of providing an education in an Adventist setting and preparing church workers. During these years the world fields depended heavily on financial and personnel support from North America. At the same time church growth and organization either stopped or seriously declined in the Soviet Union, China, and other countries where political conditions hampered ecclesiastical activity.

Among the leading twentieth-century evangelists in the United States were J.S.Washburn and Carlyle B. Haynes before World War I; and J.L.Shuler, Fordyce Detamore, and R.Allan Anderson in the decades before and after World War II. H.M.S.Richards experimented with radio evangelism during the 1930s and in 1942 launched the Voice of Prophecy, the first coast-to-coast radio program by Seventh-day Adventists. W.A.Fagal started Faith for Today, a televised devotional program that began in New York in 1950 but by the end of the decade was available to viewers nationwide. A third Adventist telecast, It Is Written, first appeared in 1955, featuring George Vandeman. Breath of Life, a television program designed to attract black audiences, went on the air in 1974. All of these programs represented direct EVANGELISM by conducting live meetings and offering free literature or Bible correspondence courses to listeners.

Frequently the programs were exported to other countries or became models for similar programming by Adventists in other parts of the world, most notably in Latin America, where Marcio Braulio Perez pioneered with La Voz de la Esperanza, a Spanish version of The Voice of Prophecy.

Between 1955 and 1970 Adventist membership grew to more than two million and by 1978 it exceeded three million. In June 2001 it reached twelve million. For the most part, growth occurred in Latin America, the Caribbean, Africa, KOREA, and the PHILIPPINES. Big city evangelism underwent serious revision by, among others, Walter Schubert, Arturo Schmidt, and Salim Japas, all from Latin America, but church leaders attributed membership growth to witnessing by individual members more than to formal evangelism. To accommodate the expanding church, General Conference leaders repeatedly redrew territorial borders to create new administrative divisions in Africa and Asia.

At the General Conference session of 1990, president Neal Wilson and his successor, Robert Folkenberg, launched Global Mission, a movement to penetrate all unentered areas of the world with special emphasis on the so-called 10–40 Window, the heavily populated lands between ten and forty degrees north latitude. Much of the membership increase after 1990 occurred in this region.

Beginning in the 1970s Adventist schools in the world fields upgraded to degree-granting institutions, some of which also offered postbaccalaureate degrees. Adventists own ninety-five schools of higher learning, most of them outside North America. In Latin America Adventists operate schools of medicine at the University of Montemorelos (Mexico) and River Plate Adventist University (Argentina). In the Philippines Adventists maintain a campus devoted exclusively to graduate education, the Adventist International Institute of Advanced Studies. The largest Adventist school in the world, Korean Sahmyook University in Seoul, South Korea, offers doctorates in theology and pharmacy besides other graduate degrees.

From the 1970s onward it became increasingly customary to elect non-North Americans to leadership roles in the General Conference and the divisions. In the year 2001 national leaders headed all except one of the divisions, and ten of the seventeen administrative posts in the presidential wing and secretariat of the General Conference were occupied by persons from Europe, Africa, Asia, Latin America, and the South Pacific.

References and Further Reading

- Bull, Michael, and Keith Lockhart. Seeking a Sanctuary: Seventh-day Adventism and the American Dream. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1989.
- Douglass, Herbert E. Messenger of the Lord. Nampa, ID: Pacific Press Publishing Association, 1998.
- Froom, L.E. Movement of Destiny. Washington, D.C.: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 1971.
- . Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers. Washington, D.C.: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 1950.

- Gaustad, Edwin, ed. The Rise of Adventism. New York: Harper and Row, 1975.
- General Conference Archives and Statistics Department. Seventh-day Adventist Yearbook. [Annual directory of organizations, institutions, and workers. Published since 1883.]
- . Annual Statistical Report. [Annual statistical summary of organizations and institutions, showing revenues, membership, and other pertinent data. Limited circulation.]
- Knight, George R. Millennial Fever and the End of the World. Boise, ID: Pacific Press Publishing Association, 1993.
- . A Search for Identity: the Development of Seventh-day Adventist Beliefs. Hagerstown, MD: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 2000.
- Land, Gary, ed. Adventism in America. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1986.
- Ministerial Association, General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists. Seventh-day Adventists Believe, a Biblical Ex-position of 27 Fundamental Doctrines. Hagerstown, MD: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 1988.
- Morgan, Douglas. Adventism and the American Republic: the Public Involvement of a Major Apocalyptic Movement. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2001.
- Numbers, Ronald L., and Jonathan M. Butler, eds. The Disappointed: Millerism and Millenarianism in the Nineteenth Century. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.
- Schwarz, Richard W., and Floyd Greenleaf. Light Bearers: a History of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Nampa, ID: Pacific Press Publishing Association, 2000.
- Strand, Kenneth A., ed. The Sabbath in Scripture and History. Washington, D.C.: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 1982.

FLOYD GREENLEAF

SEXUALITY

All religions regulate sexual conduct and regard sexual behavior as part of a moral system. Within Christianity, Orthodox, Catholic, and Protestant teachings differ on some matters, such as clerical marriage, but agree on others, such as monogamy (see CLERGY, MARRIAGE OF). Protestants themselves have varied (and continue to vary) widely in terms of sexual attitudes and practices: leaders of the radical Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) at the German city of Münster in the sixteenth century practiced polygamy, or PLURAL MARRIAGE; Moravians determined marital partners by a lottery; SHAKERS saw complete chastity as the model of the Christian life for all believers; Ranters during the English CIVIL WAR and “perfectionists” in the American Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS) held that religious CONVERSION made anything they did free from sin, a view echoed occasionally by twentieth-century revivalists (see REVIVALS). In every group official attitudes and policies regarding sexual issues also differed from actual behavior. Variety has only increased in the last century as Protestantism has grown more diverse, so that on some issues relating to sexuality, such as HOMOSEXUALITY or ABORTION, the opinions of liberal Protestants are closer to those of liberal Catholics (and liberals in other religions), whereas conservative or fundamentalist Protestants are closer to conservative Catholics (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM).

Early Christian attitudes toward sexuality were shaped by the (relatively few and somewhat complex) words of Jesus as recorded in Scripture; the writings of Paul and the early Church Fathers; especially St. Augustine; Jewish norms and traditions, and ideas and practices of Greek, Roman, Middle Eastern, and Germanic societies. By the fifteenth century, official Christian teaching held that the only permissible sexual relations were those between husbands and wives, and that even these were tainted by original sin. Virginitiy and CELIBACY were more worthy states than MARRIAGE, with numerous works idealizing abstinence and denigrating sexuality. Because most of these works were written by men, they are also extremely misogynist, viewing women’s sexuality, personified in Eve, as the source of evil in the world. DIVORCE was not allowed, although unhappy spouses could get a legal separation or perhaps an annulment. Sexual matters were handled by a system of church courts, guided by increasingly elaborate canon law and staffed by canon lawyers trained at universities. Priests in Western Christianity could not marry, although married men could become priests in the Orthodox church (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN).

The Reformation Period: Ideas and Institutions

Sexuality was an integral part of the Protestant REFORMATION from its beginning. One of MARTIN LUTHER'S earliest treatises attacked the value of vows of celibacy, and argued that marriage was the best Christian life; Luther followed his words by deeds and in 1525 married a nun who had fled her convent, Katherine von Bora. Both HULDRYCH ZWINGLI and JOHN CALVIN regarded the regulation of sexual activities as just as important as the regulation of DOCTRINE, and established special courts to handle marriage and morals cases, which came to have wide powers. Many of the radical groups developed distinctive ideas of the proper sexual life for their members, and punished those who did not follow their rules with complete social ostracization, termed shunning or banning. Because Protestant theology expected good works as the fruit of saving faith, one's sexual activities—and those of one's neighbors—continued to be important in God's eyes, and order and morality were a mark of divine favor.

In a number of matters regarding sexuality, Protestants did not break sharply with medieval tradition. They differed little from Catholics in regard to basic concepts such as the roots and proper consequences of gender differences, or the differences between “natural” and “unnatural” sexual practices. Although Luther flamboyantly rejected canon law—publicly burning canon law books before the students of the University of Wittenberg in 1520—it eventually formed the legal basis of much Protestant law regarding marriage and sex. Breaking with TRADITION in terms of the power of the papacy or the meaning of key rituals turned out to be easier than breaking with tradition in terms of sexual and gender relations.

Luther was faithful to Augustine's idea of the link between original sin and sexual desire, but saw desire as so powerful that the truly chaste life was impossible for all but a handful of individuals. Thus the best Christian life was not one that fruitlessly attempted ascetic celibacy, but one in which sexual activity was channeled into marriage. Marriage was not a sacrament—Luther was adamant that it conferred no special grace—but it was the ideal state for almost everyone. The centrality of sex to marriage led Luther to advocate divorce in the case of impotence, adultery, desertion, absolute incompatibility, or the refusal of a spouse to have sex; reconciliation was preferable, but if this could not be effected, the innocent party should be granted a divorce with the right to remarry. Although it still carried the taint of SIN, marital sex was also a positive good in itself and not simply because it led to procreation; sex increased affection between spouses, and promoted harmony in domestic life.

Calvin agreed with Luther in simultaneously rejecting the sacramentality of marriage and praising its God-given nature, although he was more guarded than Luther on the virtue of marital sex; he and later English Puritans (see PURITANISM) recommended limiting the frequency and vigor of marital sex so as not to appear “bestly.” Calvin condemned those who sought to impose restrictions on marriage that had no biblical base and accepted divorce in cases of adultery (he saw desertion as a type of adultery), although he advocated attempts at reconciliation first. New England Puritans largely agreed with their English counterparts: sexual relations within marriage were a positive good, as long as they were not excessive; all sexual relations outside of marriage were unacceptable; sexual deviancy and religious HERESY were often linked.

Most reformers did not regard sexual conduct as a matter to be left up to individuals, so advocated the establishment of courts that would regulate marriage and morals, wrote ordinances regulating marriage and other matters of sexual conduct, and worked closely with the secular rulers in their area, whether city councils or princes. To make sure the ordinances were being followed and determine what other measures were necessary, church and state officials often conducted joint investigations termed visitations, in which they questioned pastors, teachers, and lay people about their religious and moral life. These institutions and activities reflected the values and aims of both religious and political elites, who both regarded marriage and moral order as essential to a stable society.

The first Protestant court was the marriage court in Zurich, established by Zwingli in 1525, which served as a model for similar courts in many other Swiss and German cities. The most famous of these courts was the CONSISTORY established in Geneva under Calvin's leadership in 1541 and made up of the city's pastors and twelve lay elders. As CALVINISM spread into FRANCE, GERMANY, SCOTLAND, the Low Countries, northern IRELAND, and eventually the New England colonies, ordinances were adopted regulating marriage for Calvinist Protestants and consistories were established to oversee doctrine and morals. These courts heard a wide range of cases and their focus varied over the years, but in general between 30 and 80 percent of their cases involved sex. Offenders were required to confess openly before the consistory, and often before their home congregations as well, and could be punished with fines or excommunication.

Among the radical reformers, marriage was generally not a sacrament—some of them rejected the idea of SACRAMENTS completely—but many of them placed more emphasis on its spiritual nature than Luther had. Marriage was a covenant—a contract—between a man and a woman based on their membership in the body of believers, and thus was linked to their redemption. Because of this the group as a whole or at least its leaders should have a say in marital choice, broadening the circle of consent far beyond the parental consent required by Luther, Calvin, and other less radical reformers. A few of the radical groups spiritualized sexuality along with marriage, emphasizing the goodness of all aspects of human sexuality, including the sexual organs and intercourse. A small German group called the Dreamers, for example, saw intercourse simply as obedience to God's command to "be fruitful and multiply," rather than linking it to disobedience and sin. In the eighteenth century the Moravians sang hymns to Jesus's penis and Mary's breasts and uterus. The leader of the Moravians, Count NIKOLAUS VON ZINZENDORF (1700–1760), defended their hymns by asserting that shame about Jesus's or Mary's sexual organs was a denial of the full humanity of Christ (see MORAVIAN CHURCH).

Although most radical groups, including the Moravians, developed stringent sexual and moral rules for their members, there were also a few who regarded the Christian message as giving them an inner light that freed them from existing religious and secular law. This position, termed ANTINOMIANISM, only very rarely led to any long-term sexual experimentation or break with traditional marriage patterns in Europe. Radical groups that developed slightly later in North America, such as the Shakers, did institute major changes, although they did not regard themselves as above the law.

The many radical Protestant groups also developed institutions to regulate the sexual and moral behavior of their members. In some cases these were bodies of elders to whom accusations were made or who ferreted out wrongdoing themselves, and in some cases the disciplinary body was the entire group or its male members. The SOCIETY OF FRIENDS (the Quakers), begun in seventeenth-century ENGLAND by GEORGE Fox, developed the most distinctive institution, a women's meeting that oversaw the readiness of candidates for marriage, upheld the maintenance of decorous standards of dress, and at times ruled on other moral issues; the first women's meetings were established in British North America in 1681.

The Reformation Period: Actual Changes

What was the impact of these new Protestant ideas and institutions? That is more difficult to trace than ideas or institutions because the sources are scattered in thousands of court records. One of the most immediately visible changes brought by the Protestant Reformation was clerical marriage. Almost all of the continental Protestant reformers married, some, such as Luther, to former nuns. Some pastors' wives were still jeered at as "priests' whores," and they had to create a respectable role for themselves, although they had no official position in the new Protestant churches. They did this largely—and quite successfully, within a generation or so—by being models of wifely obedience and Christian charity, attempting to make their households into the type of orderly "little commonwealths" that their husbands were urging on their congregations in sermons. Maintaining an orderly household was just as important for Protestant pastors as teaching and PREACHING correct doctrine, with officials investigating charges of sexual improprieties or moral laxness just as thoroughly as charges of incorrect doctrine.

Pastoral households were not the only ones scrutinized for moral failings, as church and state authorities in Europe and North America attempted to make their vision of orderly households a reality. Orderly households required a proper foundation, so consistories and courts paid great attention to the wedding ceremony, requiring it to be public and have a pastor officiating. Parental consent was another key issue, and marriage ordinances in many Protestant areas required parental consent even for children who were no longer minors. Authorities in many areas also prohibited their citizens from marrying those of different denominations, although mixed marriages continued to occur, particularly in areas where Catholics and Protestants lived in close proximity to one another. Once a marriage had taken place, the key aim of religious and political authorities was to keep the couple together. They generally did not intervene in any disputes between spouses unless they created public scandal or repeatedly disturbed the neighbors, and attempted reconciliation first for serious cases.

Accusations of adultery were taken very seriously because adultery directly challenged the central link between marriage and procreation as well as impugning male honor. Many legal codes, including the criminal code of the Holy Roman Empire of 1532, made adultery a capital offense; this law made no reference to gender differences, but in city ordinances of the 1560s in Geneva and the 1650 Adultery Act in England, adultery was made a capital offense for a married woman and her partner, but was only punished by a short imprisonment for a married man (see CAPITAL PUNISHMENT).

Following the ideas of their reformers, Swiss, German, Scottish, Scandinavian, and French Protestant marital courts allowed divorce for adultery and impotence, and sometimes for contracting a contagious disease, malicious desertion, conviction for a capital crime, or deadly assault. This dramatic change in marital law had less than dramatic results, however, at least judging by sheer numbers. In contrast to today, when divorce is a large part of all civil legal procedures, Protestant marriage courts heard very few divorce cases because marriage was the economic and social foundation of society.

The vast majority of cases involving sexual conduct actually heard by Protestant church courts in Europe and lower courts in New England were for premarital intercourse, usually termed fornication, which became evident when the woman showed signs of pregnancy. Many of the cases of fornication were actually between individuals who intended to marry, and the solution was a quick wedding. Both spouses were generally subject to punishment as well, which might include fines, public shaming rituals, and imprisonment.

If the man disputed the woman's claim that there had been an agreement, she or her father could take him to court to force him to marry her, although this often did not work, and might result in both individuals being tortured until one changed her/his story.

The consequences of having an illegitimate child with no father identified varied widely across Protestant Europe and North America, and were often related more to economic structures than to religious ideology, with areas in which there was a labor shortage being relatively tolerant. Pregnancies in which the father was the woman's married employer or was related by blood or marriage to her were especially disastrous for the woman, for this was adultery or incest rather than simple fornication and could bring great shame on the household. Women in such situations were urged to lie about the father's identity or were simply fired.

With justifications that spoke of a rising tide of infanticide, early modern governments, both Protestant and Catholic, began to require all unmarried women who discovered they were pregnant to make an official declaration of their pregnancy; if they did not and the baby subsequently died before baptism, they could be charged with infanticide even if there was no evidence that they actually did anything to cause the death. In some areas midwives were ordered to help enforce these laws by checking the breasts of women who denied giving birth to see if they had milk, and at times even checking the breasts of all unmarried women in a parish for signs of childbirth. Such examinations of the bodies of unmarried women indicate how far early modern governments were willing to go in their attempts not only to stop infanticide, but also to control the sexual activities of those who did not gain the rights to such activities through marriage.

Along with punishing those found guilty of fornication, Protestant authorities also attempted to restrict occasions that they increasingly viewed as sources of sexual temptation, such as parish festivals, spinning bees, and dances. Pastors harangued against male clothing styles in which the penis was contained in a separate codpiece, often brightly colored, stuffed to make it more prominent, and worn with a shortened doublet so that everyone could see it; municipal sumptuary laws that regulated the clothing of urban residents sometimes specifically prohibited codpieces. Dancing was attacked in great detail in laws and sermons in Calvinist cities such as Geneva and Nîmes, where along with dancing the consistories condemned low-cut necklines, cosmetics, certain hairstyles, codpieces, comic plays, games of cards and dice, masquerades, and carnival (Mardi Gras) parties. Sodomy was generally a capital crime, although the number of actual sodomy cases in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was very small; the Puritans who ruled England during the period 1640 to 1660 and New England in the colonial period were much more worried about blasphemy and illegitimacy than sodomy.

The Colonial World: Sex and Race

The Protestant Reformation occurred concurrently with the beginning of European colonization, which took Christianity around the world. Christian officials tried to impose European sexual patterns, including monogamous marriage and limited (or no) divorce, but where these conflicted with existing patterns they were often modified and what emerged was a blend of indigenous and imported practices. Colonial officials and missionaries generally regarded indigenous sexual practices that deviated from Christianity, including polygyny, incest, same-sex relations, concubinage, and temporary marriage, as markers of inferiority, and invoked them as a justification for European conquest and imperialism. The first wave of colonization and missionary activity in the sixteenth century primarily involved Catholic powers and personnel from Spain, Portugal, and France. Dutch Protestants were active in Southeast Asia and SOUTH AFRICA by the seventeenth century; English Protestants in AFRICA and Asia by the middle of the eighteenth century; and American Protestants in many parts of the world by the early part of the nineteenth century.

European accounts of exploration and travel almost always discuss the scanty clothing of indigenous peoples, which was viewed as a sign of their uncontrolled sexuality. Hot climate—which we would probably view as the main influence on clothing choice—was itself regarded as leading to greater sexual drive and lower inhibitions. By the eighteenth century leading European thinkers such as Adam Smith and DAVID HUME divided the world into three climatic/sexual zones: torrid, temperate, and frigid—words that still retain their double climatic/sexual meaning. They, and many other European writers and statesmen, worried about the effects of tropical climates on the morals as well as the health of soldiers and officials, and devised various schemes to keep Europeans sent to imperial posts from fully “going native,” adopting indigenous dress, mores, and who knew what else. They also linked this climatic/sexual schema with the advancement of civilization; in the torrid zones, heat made people indolent and lethargic as well as lascivious, whereas a temperate climate (like Britain) encouraged productivity and discipline along with sexual restraint and respect for WOMEN. This schema was devised by northern European Protestants, who judged southern European (and Irish) Catholics to be an intermediate category: not as moral as themselves, but less lazy and lascivious than those who lived in the tropics.

The aspect of “going native” that most concerned colonial authorities was, not surprisingly, engaging in sexual relations with indigenous people, and the colonial powers all regulated such encounters. In some cases, such as the earliest Spanish, Portuguese, and Dutch colonies, sexual relations and even marriage between Europeans and indigenous peoples were encouraged as a means of making alliances, cementing colonial power, and increasing the population; rape and enforced sexual services of indigenous women were also a common part of conquest. The directors of the Dutch East India Company gave soldiers, sailors, and minor officials bonuses if they agreed to marry local women and stay in the Dutch colonies as “free-burghers.” This policy was opposed by some Dutch missionaries, but accepted by others, who hoped marriage with local women would not only win converts but give missionaries access to female religious rituals. The directors of the British East India Company gave additional encouragement in 1687, decreeing that any child resulting from the marriage of any soldier and native woman be paid a small grant on the day of its christening.

There were limits to this acceptance of intermarriage, however, often explicitly along racial lines. Rijkloff von Goens, one of the Dutch governors of Sri Lanka, supported mixed marriages, but then wanted the daughters of those marriages married to Dutchmen so that the Dutch “race” would “degenerate” as little as possible. In the Dutch colony of the Cape of Good Hope (South Africa), although the races were not segregated and there was much sexual contact between European men and African women, this color hierarchy was so strong that it largely prevented interracial marriage. Until 1823 slaves in Cape Colony could not marry in a Christian ceremony; a man wanting to marry a slave had to baptize and free her first. Slaves marrying among themselves often devised their own ceremonies, or married in Muslim ceremonies even though Islam was not a recognized religion. Some of these were slaves, and by the second and third generation many of them were women of mixed race. In Dutch and English areas some of these women were Catholic, the children of marriages between Portuguese men and local women; Protestant church authorities worried about the women retaining their loyalty to Catholicism, raising their children as Catholics and perhaps even converting their husbands. Thus although they often tolerated Catholicism in general, they required marriages between a Protestant and a Catholic to be celebrated in a Protestant church and demanded a promise from the spouses that the children would be raised Protestant.

The fate of children from extramarital, interracial unions varied enormously. Some of them were legitimated by their fathers through adoption or the purchase of certificates of legitimacy, and could assume prominent positions in colonial society. For example, two of the sons of François Caron, who had worked for twenty years for the Dutch East India Company and had five children with a Japanese woman, later became well-known ministers in the Dutch church. The East India Company Council in Batavia tried to solve the issue of mixed-race children born out of wedlock by banning their fathers from returning to Europe, a policy that was counterproductive because it simply discouraged European men from recognizing or supporting their children.

Like state and company policies, church policies regarding marriage and morality were often counterproductive. In Dutch colonies, for example, marriages could be solemnized only when a pastor visited, which in remote areas might be only every several years. This did not keep people from marrying, however, but instead encouraged them to maintain traditional patterns of marriage, in which cohabitation and sexual relations began with the exchange of gifts, rather than a church wedding. Protestant missionaries advocated frequent church attendance, viewing sermons as a key way to communicate Protestant doctrine; the Asian wives of European men took this very much to heart and attended church so frequently and in such great style that sumptuary laws were soon passed restricting extravagant clothing and expenditures for church ceremonies. In the Danish Lutheran colony of Tranquebar, children of European men and local women born out of wedlock were denied baptism, but they were simply taken down the road and baptized in Portuguese Catholic churches, clearly not the intent of the Danish political or religious authorities.

Because initially almost all Europeans in colonial areas were men, interracial sexual relations generally did not upset notions of superiority. Once more women began to immigrate, official encouragement and even toleration of mixed marriages generally ceased, although informal relations ranging from prostitution through concubinage continued. The sexual activities of European women, the wives and daughters of missionaries and governors, were closely monitored, however.

In the colonial world, both sexual and racial categories were viewed as permanent moral classifications supported by unchanging religious teachings. They were not viewed as socially constructed, but as under-girded by an even more fundamental boundary, that between “natural” and “unnatural.” Thus same-sex relations were defined as a “crime against nature,” but then often tried in church courts. This link between natural and godly began to lessen in intensity during the eighteenth century, but the importance of nature in setting boundaries only intensified, and “nature” came to lie at the basis of modern understandings of sexuality.

The Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, there were two somewhat contradictory tendencies shaping the intersections between Protestantism and sexuality. On the one hand, the basic paradigm of sexuality for educated people in the West changed from religion to science, with sexual issues viewed in medical or psychological terms as part of the “natural” or material world. On the other hand, the rise of fundamentalist Christianity affirmed the strong beliefs on the part of many people that sexual ideas and practices continued to be religious issues (see FUNDAMENTALISM). These two paradigms were sometimes in opposition to one another; for example, doctors and psychologists increasingly defined certain actions as uncontrollable sexual “fetishes,” whereas religious authors labeled them as (im-)moral choices. At other times they fit together. Pornographic literature, which had been a significant share of printed works in Europe since the development of the printing press in the mid-fifteenth century, was not legally banned because of its sexual content until the mid-nineteenth century with laws such as the Obscene Publications Act passed by the British Parliament in 1857. Both medical and religious leaders supported prohibitions of pornography, with the former regarding viewing pornographic literature as unhealthy and the latter as immoral. (For an additional example of such agreement, see PROSTITUTION.)

In medical terms sex was increasingly regarded as an aspect of health, with physicians, not pastors, determining what was “normal” and “abnormal.” Sexual disorders were labeled and identified, and treatments suggested that involved drugs, therapy, and surgery, not prayer. Western governments sought to promote a healthy society as a way of building up national strength, and anything that detracted from this became a matter of official and often public concern.

Moral and religious attitudes clearly shaped the new science of sexology, however. This can be seen very well in the obsession with masturbation that developed in the nineteenth century and continued well into the twentieth. Doctors drew on the older idea of bodily humors to argue that men had only a limited amount of sperm—often labeled the “spermatic economy”—so that too early or too frequent spilling of sperm might cause them to become weak and feeble, incapable of serving their country. Masturbation would also weaken boys’ sense of morality, argued both doctors and pastors. This fixation was shaped by notions of race and class as well as GENDER; lower-class and non-white servants were often accused of teaching white, middle-class children to masturbate. A British soldier in Kenya, Robert Baden-Powell, founded the Boy Scouts in 1908 explicitly to teach British boys what he regarded as the right sort of manly virtues and keep them from masturbation, effeminacy, physical weakness, and homosexuality. These were traits he regarded as particularly common among the non-white subjects of the British Empire, and also among the residents of British industrial cities. If they were not counteracted with a vigorous program of physical training and outdoor life, Baden-Powell and numerous other writers, physicians, politicians, and church leaders predicted an inevitable “race degeneration” or even “race suicide.”

Devotion to God (and country) was an explicit part of Boy Scout teaching, both in Britain and in other parts of the world where Boy Scout groups were organized. Boy Scouts spread fastest in Protestant areas because Catholic leaders regarded them with some suspicion, although by the later twentieth century Scouts could be found in many Catholic areas as well. Belief in God remains an explicit part of the Boy Scout motto (although now this is more generic, to allow for non-Christian members), and boys can be dismissed if they publicly deny such belief, as a 2002 case involving a Washington teenage Eagle Scout made clear. Baden-Powell’s moral concerns still shape Scout policies on other matters as well because openly gay individuals are not allowed to be members or troop leaders.

Changes in ideas about sexuality shaped other quasi-religious groups as well. The Young Men’s Christian Association (see YMCA, YWCA), for example, began in England in 1848 as a Christian men’s movement in which young unmarried men were expected to strengthen their character and morality through passionate attachments to one another, a union of souls that would lead to greater love for God. During the nineteenth century individuals had often expressed same-sex desire in very passionate terms, but these were generally regarded as “romantic friendships,” expected as a part of growing up and, especially in women, not a sign of deviancy even if they continued throughout an individual’s life. Historians debate whether such friendships should be labeled “homosexual” because this was not yet a category in people’s minds, but in the decades around 1900 sexologists turned their attention to same-sex desire. They initially labeled this “inversion,” although eventually the word “homosexuality,” devised in 1869 by the Hungarian jurist K.M.Benkert, became the common term. The medicalization of same-sex desire as a form of sexual deviancy changed attitudes, and intimacy between girls or between boys was increasingly regarded with distrust. By the 1920s the YMCA's official statements condemned same-sex attraction and espoused a "muscular Christianity," centered on basketball (invented at a YMCA), swimming, and other sports, and on "normal" heterosexual relationships.

At about the same time as the founding of the Boy Scouts, many Protestants, particularly in the UNITED STATES, came to understand themselves as "fundamentalists," affirming orthodox dogma, downplaying more complicated issues of doctrine, and largely supporting a conservative social agenda. Fundamentalist Protestants grew in numbers throughout the twentieth century, and became increasingly vocal opponents of abortion and gay rights, while advocating what were labeled "traditional family values." Fundamentalist groups often broke from the Protestant denominations that had developed in previous centuries to form non-denominational community churches, although some denominations, such as the Southern Baptist Convention, were also largely fundamentalist. At the same time some Protestant denominations, or individual congregations within them, became increasingly embroiled in issues of gender and sexuality, focussing on the question of practicing homosexuals as members and clergy.

Fundamentalist Protestantism became an increasingly important part of Christianity throughout the entire world in the era after World War II; in 2000 nearly two-thirds of the world's Christians lived outside Europe and North America, with many of them belonging to nondenominational and fundamentalist churches rather than traditional mainstream Catholic or Protestant churches. These churches are appealing to people whose cultural values are shaped by animism, Hinduism, Buddhism, and other religions, and the norms they are establishing in regard to sexuality and gender also draw on many traditions, with churches often deciding individually how they will handle issues such as polygamy, child marriage, remarriage of widows, and other issues in which local traditions conflict with traditional Christian teachings. As Protestantism, and Christianity in general, declines in importance in Western society—except for the United States—Protestant ideas and practices about many aspects of sexuality may also change. Because of migration, these debates will be played out not only in the former colonies, but in Europe and North America as well.

References and Further Reading

- Adair, Richard. Courtship, Illegitimacy and Marriage in Early Modern England. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1996.
- Blussé, Leonard. Strange Company: Chinese Settlers, Mestizo Women and the Dutch in VOC Batavia. Dordrecht, The Netherlands: Foris, 1986.
- Graham, Michael F. The Uses of Reform: "Godly Discipline" and Popular Behavior in Scotland and Beyond 1560–1610. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1996.
- Harrington, Joel F. Reordering Marriage and Society in Reformation Germany. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

- Hoffer, Peter C., and N.E.H.Hull. Murdering Mothers: Infanticide in England and New England 1558–1803. New York: New York University Press, 1981.
- Juster, Susan. Disorderly Women: Sexual Politics and Evangelicalism in Revolutionary New England. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1994.
- McIntosh, Marjorie Keniston. Controlling Misbehavior in England 1370–1600. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Mentzer, Raymond A., ed. "Sin and the Calvinists: Morals Control and the Consistory in the Reformed Tradition." In Sixteenth Century Essays and Studies. vol. 32. Kirksville, MO: Sixteenth Century Journal Publishers, 1994.
- Nye, Robert, ed. Sexuality. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Phillips, Roderick. Putting Asunder: A History of Divorce in Western Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Shell, Robert C.-H. Children of Bondage: A Social History of the Slave Society at the Cape of Good Hope, 1652–1838. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1994.
- Smith, Merril D., ed. Sex and Sexuality in Early America. New York: New York University Press, 1998.
- Stuart, Elizabeth, and Adrian Thatcher, eds. Christian Perspectives on Sexuality and Gender. Leominster, UK: Gracewing, 1996.
- Weeks, Jeffrey. Sex, Politics, and Society: The Regulation of Sexuality Since 1800. London: Longmans, 1981.
- Wiesner-Hanks, Merry E. Christianity and Sexuality in the Early Modern World: Regulating Desire, Reforming Practice. London: Routledge, 2000.

MERRY E.WIESNER-HANKS

SHAKERS

The Shakers are a Christian sect that originated in ENGLAND in the mid-eighteenth century. In 1774 under the leadership of ANN LEE, a handful of Believers, as they were also known, emigrated to America. This community expanded and prospered during the first half of the nineteenth century, but began a steady decline thereafter. In the twenty-first century a small number of Shakers remain in one village in the UNITED STATES. The history of this dissenting community embraces inauspicious beginnings, remarkable success in antebellum America, sagging fortunes during the twentieth century, and yet astonishing cultural stature at the start of the new millennium. Over the course of two and a half centuries Shakerism has reflected certain Protestant ideas and practices, but also has departed from those religious patterns in significant and distinctive ways.

Beginnings

Eighteenth-century England gave rise to many dissenting sects (see DISSENT; NONCONFORMITY) that resisted conformity to the established CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Among such dissenters was a group of religious enthusiasts in Manchester whose ecstatic worship and spiritual activity were often accompanied by trembling. From this they were dubbed “Shakers,” or sometimes “Shaking Quakers.” Led by two tailors, James and Jane Wardley, this small community first emerged in the 1740s. Historical evidence from the period is sparse. Ann Lee (b. 1736), the illiterate daughter of a blacksmith, joined the group in 1758. The Shaking Quakers attracted public attention. The frenzy of their worship provoked curiosity and criticism, the latter because of the disturbances they caused when assembling in the homes of members. They also openly condemned the Anglican Church and other religious groups (see ANGLICANISM). The Shaking Quakers derived inspiration from the radical French Prophets who came to England from the Cévennes district of FRANCE. Bold and enthusiastic in style, the Shakers invaded sanctuaries during worship and denounced the clergy. For these actions they were arrested, tried, convicted, fined, and jailed. In the early 1770s Lee, the frequent recipient of visions, emerged as the prophetic leader of the sect. She was incarcerated more than once for her activities. Lee and the others proclaimed an apocalyptic message and called for separation from the churches.

In 1774, as the result of a vision, Ann Lee and eight followers left England and traveled to America, arriving in New York City, where the group disappeared from public view. Two years later they had reassembled in Niskeyuna, a rural location adjacent to Albany, New York. However, the revolutionary context in America proved hostile because the Shakers were pacifists (see PACIFISM), and colonial patriots accused them of supporting the British cause. Again Lee and several disciples found themselves in prison because of these charges.

The community began its public ministry in 1780 with the opening of the Shaker gospel to their neighbors. The first American converts came from the ranks of evangelical BAPTISTS in the region. The Believers, who lived together, soon attracted others to their new and strange religion. Lee's charisma endeared her to her followers, who called her "Mother." They credited her with miraculous gifts and powers, including prophecy and healing (see FAITH HEALING).

In 1782 Lee and several others traveled throughout eastern New York and New England in search of converts and in support of those who had already accepted the Shaker gospel. This missionary journey lasted for twenty-six months and produced more disciples throughout the region, although on this trip Lee and other Believers experienced physical harassment and persecution in several localities. In 1784, one year after returning to Niskeyuna, Lee died, and leadership passed to her English disciple, James Whittaker. He began the process of community building outside the original settlement. Under his leadership Shakers gathered on land near Lebanon, New York, a location that subsequently became the headquarters of an emerging regional society. Whittaker, however, died three years after Lee in 1787.

Nineteenth-Century Success

At this point American converts stepped into administrative roles in the society and began systematically organizing and staffing Shaker settlements at sites where Lee's travels had generated converts. Leadership in the emerging movement rested in the hands of Joseph Meacham and Lucy Wright, the former exercising influence until his death in 1796 and the latter until she died in 1821. During their combined tenure, the society gathered scattered Believers, consolidated local villages, and established uniform religious and social arrangements, the result being the formation of a national organization eventually spanning from Maine in the East to Indiana in the West. The move into the Ohio Valley in 1805, directed by Wright, resulted in both geographical and numerical expansion. By the 1820s sixteen Shaker villages were in existence containing around four thousand residents. In this period the society adopted a set of Millennial Laws governing all aspects of collective and individual activity. Leadership responsibilities were divided between men and women, elders and eldersses, who constituted the society's ministry. Economic affairs fell under the supervision of DEACONS who managed the agricultural and light manufacturing activities.

Converts who joined the society frequently came from Protestant denominations. Shakers often attended evangelical REVIVALS or CAMP MEETINGS where they conversed with potential converts, challenging them to consider a higher form of Christianity in Shakerism (see EVANGELICALISM). Individuals who accepted the Shaker gospel and the challenge of separating from the "world" sacrificed much, including former beliefs, relationships with family and friends, sexual activity, individual decision making, and economic independence. Persons who were curious about the society or potentially interested in joining were housed in separate living units—the Gathering Order—before they were admitted as full members. The latter status required Believers to leave behind their former lives, confess their sins to the ministry, accept the principle and practice of CELIBACY, obey the leaders in all things, and turn over all private property to the community. The United Society of Believers in Christ’s Second Appearing, the formal name of the organization in the nineteenth century, was a communal society, practicing a form of Christian COMMUNISM.

Life in Shaker villages was carefully regimented. Residential and economic “families” were the organizational units within the villages, each presided over by male and female leaders. Believers lived in sexually segregated quarters under close supervision of the ministry. Interaction between males and females was strictly regulated. When husbands and wives joined the society, they were separated, becoming as brother and sister; children were raised communally. Spiritual values theoretically permeated all aspects of life in the villages as spelled out in the rules set down in the Millennial Laws. All able-bodied members were to contribute to the economic well-being of the society, carrying out assigned tasks without complaint. Labor was a highly sanctioned positive value, not unlike the Protestant work ethic. Even children were assigned communal responsibilities, which they carried out under supervision.

The economic result of this collective work ethic was growing financial success at most of the Shaker villages. The Believers produced agricultural surpluses and a variety of manufactured goods, both of which were sold to the outside world. Shaker peddlers traveled widely as they marketed items, from garden seeds, herbs and herbal extracts, to baskets, brooms, and buckets. The Believers also sold cattle, wool, lumber, chairs, and other furniture items. Several villages owned gristmills and sawmills for their own use and for generating income, too. The Shakers enjoyed a widespread positive reputation for the quality of their goods.

However, labor was also a spiritual term with another meaning for Believers, who spoke of WORSHIP as “labor.” Shaker worship departed from prevailing Protestant patterns in several ways. Meetinghouses were plain, with no altar or pulpit, nor other traditional physical appointments except for movable benches (see ARCHITECTURE, CHURCH). Shaker meetings resembled Quaker meetings in some respect because they included periods of silence and also individual testimonies. They were, however, filled with song and exhortation, dancing and marching, and a variety of ecstatic physical “exercises” not unlike phenomena associated with camp meetings and revivals. During the 1830s and 1840s the society experienced a burst of extraordinary religious activity known within the community as Mother Ann’s Work. This outburst of spiritual “gifts” anticipated the Spiritualist movement that flourished in America during the second half of the nineteenth century (see SPIRITUALISM). Believers at every location functioned as mediums or instruments through whom gifts and messages were received from deceased members of the society, including Ann Lee, as well as from biblical, historical, and imaginary figures. Among the gifts received were songs and hymns, dances and marches, and elaborate rituals performed in mime, which the Believers identified as proof of the truth of the Shaker gospel. Not surprisingly, this outpouring of ecstatic activity was controversial and led to stress and conflict within the society as well as ridicule and criticism from the outside world.

The first half of the nineteenth century was a time of theological innovation and reflection. Shaker leaders found themselves defending the society against public criticism and seeking to clarify beliefs for potential converts. Two major publications merit special comment. In 1808 a first edition appeared of The Testimony of Christ's Second Appearing, a volume that rationalized the faith and practice of the community. In it Benjamin Seth Youngs, the primary author, asserted the role of Ann Lee as a Christ figure and also the nature of God as involving both male and female aspects as Father-Mother. These judgments fueled religious opponents who attacked Shaker theology as blasphemous and heretical. In 1816 the society published an edited volume entitled Testimonies of the Life, Character, Revelations and Doctrines of Our Ever Blessed Mother Ann Lee, and the Elders with Her, a compilation of memories and testimonies from those who had known Lee. This collection reasserted the special VOCATION of the founder and the status she continued to enjoy among members in the years after her death. This publication also provided the basis for the ongoing construction of the image of Lee as "Mother Ann."

The American CIVIL WAR was a moment of collective trauma for the society because of the Shakers' Pacifism and because the conflict spilled onto the Kentucky sites at Pleasant Hill and Union Village. Most of the male Believers conscripted refused service; some sought exemption; many were fined. The general tax levies for the war worked economic hardship, too.

Changing Fortunes

After the war the society began a slow but steady geographical retreat from locations in the Ohio Valley and elsewhere as a result of a decline in membership and the loss of economic well-being. The Shakers were increasingly unable to attract new converts, especially male members. The result was both an aging and a feminization of the membership. Agriculture and industry both suffered from this decline. By 1900 the society numbered approximately 850 Believers, a majority of whom were women. In the following years when villages both east and west closed, remaining members at those sites moved to other locations or left the society entirely.

Despite decline, signs of religious vitality still existed. A faction of progressive Shakers was active at several sites, including the North Family at Mount Lebanon, New York (formerly called New Lebanon), and at Canterbury, New Hampshire. During the decades after the war and in the opening years of the new century, these liberals seized the public initiative and were responsible for identifying the Shakers with a variety of social causes, including women's rights and animal rights, the TEMPERANCE movement and the anti-tobacco crusade, prison reform, and diet reform. Among the most prominent voices supporting such causes were Frederick W. Evans, Antoinette Doolittle, and Catherine Allen. In 1905 the Mount Lebanon Believers sponsored a Peace Conference, attended by Shakers and prominent outsiders, that attracted national attention. These same years, however, witnessed the growing influence of evangelical Protestantism in the society's ranks. At several sites Shaker worship began to reflect Protestant patterns in hymnody and devotional life. Sometimes evangelical ministers were invited to preach in Shaker meetings.

As village after village closed, the aging female leadership debated the proper course to follow. By the middle of the twentieth century some Believers, reconciling themselves to an eventual closing of the society, saw their role simply as final guardians of a spiritual and cultural legacy. Others disputed that judgment and determined that the Shakers must continue as a living religious society. By the 1980s the two remaining villages—Canterbury, New Hampshire and Sabbathday Lake, Maine—were divided in their judgments. The ministry at Canterbury formally closed the society to new members, but in open defiance of that decision the Believers at Sabbathday Lake accepted several new converts. The death of the last sister at Canterbury in 1992 proved decisive in the contest. The Shakers in Maine have carried the living tradition into the twenty-first century.

Stature in American Culture

The second half of the twentieth century witnessed two important developments with implications for the society. First, Shakerism became the object of sustained attention by persons interested in American history, religion, and CULTURE. Shaker artifacts, in particular, became favorite items for collectors and antique dealers. Shaker religion was cast as an attractive spirituality because of its work ethic and simple lifestyle. The remaining Shakers themselves became the object of great affection by patrons, friends, and well-wishers, many of whom were eager to finance Shaker causes, buy Shaker objects, and worship with the Believers. This renaissance of interest has fueled unending publications, the restoration of historic sites, and a host of commercial enterprises linked with Shakerism. Second, the Shakers themselves reached out in ecumenical fashion to other religious groups—for example, Catholic monastic orders and the Father Divine movement. Their own worship meetings now reflect the impact of liturgical influences from main-line churches even though they retain the rich Shaker heritage of song, exhortation, and testimony. The Believers have been participants in seminars on spirituality at such distinguished institutions as Yale Divinity School. These activities represent the mainstreaming of Shaker religion.

The future is less uncertain than it may have appeared in the late 1980s. The small but devoted group of Believers in Maine under the powerful leadership of Frances A. Carr are confident that they will carry the Shaker tradition forward, that it will be a leaven in the Christian world, and that the legacy of this movement will, in fact, be a living legacy. The Shakers, once the target of religious and social opponents, have now become near celebrities in American culture.

References and Further Reading

- Andrews, Edward Deming. The People Called Shakers: A Search for the Perfect Society. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953.
- Brewer, Priscilla J. Shaker Communities, Shaker Lives. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1986.
- Garrett, Clarke. Spirit Possession and Popular Religion: From the Camisards to the Shakers. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987.
- Kirk, John T. The Shaker World: Art, Life, Belief. New York: Harry N. Abrams, 1997.
- Patterson, Daniel W. The Shaker Spiritual. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1979.
- Promey, Sally M. Spiritual Spectacles: Vision and Image in Mid-Nineteenth-Century Shakerism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993.
- Stein, Stephen J. The Shaker Experience in America: A History of the United Society of Believers. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1992.
- Werkin, Gerard C. The Four Seasons of Shaker Life. New York: Simon & Shuster, 1986.
- STEPHEN J. STEIN

SHARP, GRANVILLE (1735–1813)

English philanthropist. Sharp was born in Durham, ENGLAND, March 10, 1735, and he died at Fulham, near London, on July 6, 1813. He was the son of an archdeacon and grandson of an archbishop. Being a youngest son, he was apprenticed to a draper. Later he became a clerk of Government Ordnance, but resigned rather than send weapons for use against the American revolutionaries, with whom he sympathized.

High-principled, generous, and somewhat eccentric, Sharp possessed—although self-taught—considerable biblical, historical, and legal learning. He was devoted to the interpretation of prophecy and was also tireless in humanitarian causes, above all to the abolition of SLAVERY. After a long battle, conducted in the face of conventional legal opinion, he won from a reluctant Lord chief justice the so-called Mansfield Judgment of 1772, which had the effect of negating masters' rights over slaves in England, thus undercutting the legal basis of slavery there.

Sharp was equally concerned about the distress and destitution in the African community in Britain, which he knew at first hand. He was the principal architect of the project launched in 1787 for a "Province of Freedom" in West Africa where the "Black Poor" of London could find dignity and security and build their own prosperity. His program for the settlement incorporated long-forgotten Anglo-Saxon institutions derived from his antiquarian reading.

Sharp was more a traditional churchman than an evangelical, but he worked happily with the CLAPHAM SECT abolitionists. When the Clapham-related Sierra Leone Company took over responsibility for SIERRA LEONE in 1792 after the collapse of the original settlement, Sharp continued active involvement. Although he held no public position or special status, no one did more than Sharp to make slavery a public religious and political issue in Britain.

See also Slavery, Abolition of

References and Further Reading

Anstey, Roger. The Atlantic Slave Trade and British Abolition, 1760–1810. London and Atlantic Heights, NJ: Macmillan, 1975.

Fyfe, Christopher. A History of Sierra Leone. London: Oxford University Press, 1962.

Hoare, Prince. Memoirs of Granville Sharp. London: Henry Colbourn, 1820.

Lascelles, E.C.P. Granville Sharp. London: Oxford University Press, 1928.

ANDREW F.WALLS

SHELDON, CHARLES MONROE (1857– 1946)

American pastor and author. Born in Wellsville, New York on February 26, 1857, Sheldon graduated from Brown University (B.A.) and Andover Theological Seminar (B.D.) before accepting the pastorate of Central Congregational Church in Topeka, Kansas, where he served from 1889 to 1919. Thanks to his writings on SOCIAL GOSPEL issues, by 1900 he was ranked among the nation's best-known Protestant clergymen. His fame derived from two sources. In 1900 he edited the Topeka Daily Capital for one week "as Jesus would," wherein he printed only positive news, rejecting all lurid tales of violence and questionable advertisements. Four years earlier he had penned a novel, In His Steps, in which the main characters all ask themselves, "What would Jesus do?" before making any decision.

Because of a technical error, In His Steps entered the public domain and so many publishers reprinted it that it became known as "the second best seller to the Bible alone." It is impossible to determine actual sales figures, which range from eight to thirty-five million. Sheldon's melding of personal EVANGELISM and social concern initially bolstered the liberal wing of Protestantism, but a century later the book attracted a largely conservative readership. Still, his timeless appeal to the idealism of young people has ensured his reputation. Later, Sheldon drew on his fame to pen over fifty books and lecture widely on such issues as ECUMENISM, world peace, and especially prohibition. He died in Topeka on February 24, 1946.

See also Publishing; WWJD

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Sheldon, Charles M. In His Steps. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1935.

Secondary Sources:

Miller, Timothy. Following In His Steps: A Biography of Charles M. Sheldon. Knoxville: The University of Tennessee Press, 1987.

Ripley, John W. "Another Look at the Rev. Mr. Charles M. Sheldon's Christian Daily Newspaper." The Kansas Historical Quarterly 31 (Spring 1965):1–40.

FERENC M.SZASZ

SHEPPARD, RICHARD (1880–1937)

English clergy. Hugh Richard Lawrie, popularly, “Dick” Sheppard was the vicar of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, magazine editor, church reformer, religious radio broadcaster, and supporter of the PACIFISM movement. He was born at Windsor Castle, ENGLAND September 2, 1880 and was educated at the University of Cambridge and Cuddesdon Theological College. In 1907 Sheppard was ordained chaplain and dean of Oxford House, which was a mission to the urban poor of London’s East End. In 1911 Sheppard became curate of Grosvenor Chapel of the Church of St. Georges in Hanover Square, London.

St. Martin-in-the-Fields, a large Anglican church in Trafalgar Square, received him as vicar in 1914. There he became King George V’s honorary chaplain. At St. Martin’s he assumed the position of editor of the St. Martin’s Review, a monthly news commentary with an approximate circulation of 10,000. Starting in 1924 the BBC broadcast the worship services from St. Martin-in-the-Fields every month.

Sheppard became involved in ecclesiastical reform when he joined the Life and Liberty Movement in 1917. The Movement sought reform in the areas of financial accountability, appointment of ministers, and the extending of church council membership to WOMEN. His ideals for reform were recorded in The Human Parson (1924) and The Impatience of a Parson (1927).

Because of ill health Sheppard left St. Martin’s in 1926. He was appointed dean of CANTERBURY (1929–1931), to be followed by service as canon of St. Paul’s Anglican Church (1934–1935). In his final years he became involved in the Peace Pledge Union of London, a peace movement whose membership included Aldous Huxley, Bertrand Russell, and Rose Macaulay. Sheppard died October 31, 1937.

See also Anglicanism; Chaplaincy; Conscientious Objection; Ecclesiology; Peace Organizations

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Sheppard, H.R.L. The Impatience of a Parson: A Plea for the Recovery of Vital Christianity.

Toronto: Musson Book Co., 1927.

———. We Say “No”: The Plain Man’s Guide to Pacifism. London: J.Murray, 1935.

Secondary Sources:

Roberts, R.Ellis. H.R.L. Sheppard, Life and Letters. London: J. Murray, 1942.

Scott, Carolyn. Dick Sheppard: A Biography. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1977.

CHRISTOPHER M. COOK

SHEPPARD, WILLIAM HENRY (1865– 1921)

African American missionary. Sheppard was born into a family of freed slaves, began to attend Hampton Institute at the age of twelve, and then went on to Stillman College, where he became immersed in the missionary fervor. Initially, upon his graduation, a pastor, he determinedly attempted to receive an appointment as missionary to AFRICA under the auspices of the Presbyterian Church, South. It was not until a white missionary was found to be the official head of the mission station that Sheppard received his own appointment.

During his decades as missionary in the Congo, Sheppard both criticized the Belgium government and business interests in the land, and accepted the notion of white supremacy. Sheppard was instrumental in recruiting numerous black missionaries for Africa. Because of his scholarly pursuits in geography, the Royal Geographic Society made him a member.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Sheppard, William Henry. Pioneers in the Congo. Louisville, KY: Pentecostal Publishing Co., 1917.

Secondary Source:

Williams, Walter. Black Americans and the Evangelization of Africa, 1817–1900. Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 1982.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

SIERRA LEONE

The boundaries of the modern West African republic of Sierra Leone follow those of the former British colony and protectorate combined. Before the declaration of the protectorate in 1896, however, the term "Sierra Leone" signified a much smaller area, usually the peninsula on which Freetown, the capital, stands. During the nineteenth century its population played a determinative part in the development of African Protestantism as a whole.

Antislavery campaigners, and especially GRANVILLE SHARP, concerned about destitution among Africans in London, devised a scheme for emigration to a piece of land purchased in Sierra Leone. Sharp designed a self-governing "Province of Freedom." In 1787 four hundred "Black Poor" left ENGLAND with a clergyman, but the settlement broke up through disease, war, and maladministration. It was reconstituted in 1792 under a Sierra Leone Company whose directors held CLAPHAM SECT ideals, with Henry Thornton as chairman.

During the American Revolutionary War the British recruited soldiers from the slave population, many of them influenced by evangelical revival movements, with promises of land and liberty. Some were later transferred to Nova Scotia, where revival movements were flourishing (see REVIVALS). The promises of land not being fulfilled, THOMAS PETERS (d. 1792) came as their delegate to London. He met directors of the Sierra Leone Company, who offered land in AFRICA. Over 1,100 people from the African congregations in Nova Scotia responded. They brought to Sierra Leone their own church organization and leadership. The Baptist preacher DAVID GEORGE (d. 1810) came with his congregation, and there were congregations of Methodists (see METHODISM, ENGLAND) and the countess of Huntingdon's Connexion (see HASTINGS, LADY SELINA). These, rather than the Colony's official chapel and chaplain, were the center of religious life. Their enthusiastic, revivalistic religion represented a different style of EVANGELICALISM from the sober, churchly form displayed by the Company's directors and officials. As political differences sharpened and trust broke down, the Nova Scotian settlers increasingly rejected European church ministry.

Several early British mission agencies tried to use Sierra Leone as a base to reach the interior, mostly with disastrous results. Only a mission of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS) among the Susu, northward of the colony, building on the work of an earlier Scottish mission, lasted more than a year or two.

Growth and Population Expansion

In 1800 the British government transported a company of “Maroons” (escaped slaves who had conducted a guerilla war in Jamaica) to Sierra Leone. Despite their slight previous contact with the Christian faith and communal tensions with the Nova Scotians, the Maroons gradually assimilated to the religious pattern of the earlier settlers.

More drastic augmentation of the population began in 1808 when the slave trade was declared illegal in Britain. The British navy became proactive in intercepting slave ships; Sierra Leone was the only feasible center to which they could be brought. The Sierra Leone Company was disbanded, and Sierra Leone became a crown colony. Year by year people from the slave ships, originating in all parts of an area stretching from Senegal to the Congo, were brought to Sierra Leone. At first they were “apprenticed” to the Nova Scotians, but the numbers were soon too great. Sir Charles MacCarthy (governor from 1816 to 1824) developed a system of villages, each with a church and school, and looked to the missions, especially the CMS, to provide the clergy and schoolmasters. The CMS closed its Susu mission to concentrate on Sierra Leone.

Missionaries, who were mostly—like the first, Melchior Renner (d. 1822)—German Pietists, had to take charge of villages as superintendents (see PIETISM). Many died or broke down, but gradually the villages became Christian communities, marked by literacy and worship in English, there being no single language common to those from the slave ships. The most dramatic transformation was at Regent village, where W.A.B. Johnson (d. 1823) was the missionary. Similar developments took place in Freetown, where the Methodist mission was active. In both Freetown and the villages the Nova Scotians acted—sometimes to the displeasure of the missionaries—as evangelists and role models. Sometimes communal tensions led to church disruption; both Maroon and “Liberated African” churches broke away from their Nova Scotian mentors. The West African Methodist Church, which continues today, was a Liberated African breakaway from a Nova Scotian church. It amalgamated with the (British) United Methodist Free Churches in 1859.

Sierra Leone’s literacy rates and school populations were often higher than those of many European countries. Church-related grammar schools (boys’ and girls’) produced an educated elite. The Fourah Bay Institution, established by CMS for the ablest students, was by the 1870s teaching degree courses of the University of Durham in arts and divinity. Sierra Leone was one of the earliest successes of Protestant MISSIONS in Africa, producing a community (usually called Krio, popularly Creole) for whom Protestant Christianity and English literacy and education were constituents of identity.

Reaching Beyond Borders

Liberated Africans, as prosperity increased, traded along the West African coast. Some Yoruba found their way to their homeland in what is now Western Nigeria, resettled there, and, retaining their Christian faith, called on the missions to follow them. The Niger Expedition of 1841, although failing in its immediate objectives, increased mission awareness of the vast populations in inland Africa. The mission representatives on the Expedition, JAMES FREDERICK SCHÖN and SAMUEL ADJAI CROWTHER, both Sierra Leone-based, identified Sierra Leone as a principal resource for the evangelization of West Africa. The majority of the early CMS missionaries to Yorubaland were from Sierra Leone, and even the Europeans among them had first served in Sierra Leone. Throughout the nineteenth century and into the twentieth, hundreds of Sierra Leonean missionaries, ordained and lay, served in the territories that now make up NIGERIA and in other regions of Africa. At first most were “Liberated Africans,” who often already spoke the languages in use where they worked, although later missionaries were born in the colony. Bishop Crowther once planned a Sierra Leone mission to the Congo; in the 1880s the United Methodist Free Churches sent a Sierra Leonean to the Kenya coast. Sierra Leone traders, clerks, technicians, and professionals often preceded the missions as the first contact for inland people with Christian life and worship.

Missions among the peoples of the hinterland of the colony—Temne, Bullom-Sherbro, Mende—saw little response for a long time. Here too Sierra Leoneans served in the missions, or represented African Christianity and “civilization” as traders or in other occupations. Many adopted local children who became assimilated to the Krio Christian community.

The first American missions were directed to the Mende and Sherbro. An African American Christian settlement was attempted in Sherbro in 1821, and another in Rio Pongas in 1822. The cause célèbre of the Amistad trial led to the formation of the interde-nominational (and multiracial) AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION (AMA), which in 1841 inaugurated a Mendi (sic) Mission at the same time as repatriating survivors from the Amistad. The United Brethren in Christ (UBC), a church of German Pietist immigrant origin, opened a Mende mission in 1855; it took over the AMA’s Mendi Mission in 1883. American missions developed practical and technical, rather than academic, education and introduced some light industries. The establishment of the Protectorate was followed by major risings of Mende and Temne. In Mendeland American and Krio missionaries suffered appallingly in a mass attack on foreigners.

Shifting Demographics

The Protectorate permanently altered the religious balance of Sierra Leone. Earlier, Gustav Warneck, the German missiologist, had declared the colony “an evangelical land.” The new colonial arrangements gave it an overwhelmingly non-Christian population, with significant Muslim communities. Poro and Sande, the powerful societies into which young men and women were initiated at puberty, often saw Christianity as a threat to tradition. New missions came from the UNITED STATES, especially to the northern peoples of the Protectorate; the older Anglican and Methodist missions started new work inland. A division that took place in the United States within the United Brethren church made one section of it, the Evangelical United Brethren, the largest church and mission in the Protectorate. (A later merger in the United States brought a change of name to UNITED METHODIST CHURCH.)

After World War II large numbers of people from the Protectorate moved into Freetown, transforming its ethnic composition. The older churches, bastions of Krio identity and using English in worship, were not usually in a position to approach them. Newer churches, especially Pentecostal (see PENTECOSTALISM), had a notable impact on certain groups, such as the Limba, who had largely resisted both Islam and Christianity in their northern homeland, but in Freetown divided between church and mosque. One result was that Freetown congregations tended to reflect ethnic identity. Since independence in 1961 the political leadership has usually lain with the hinterland peoples. Muslim influence has spread widely, but up to the beginning of the twenty-first century, despite a troubled political and military history, interfaith relations have been equable. War has led to endemic problems of uprooted and displaced populations, with the churches playing a major role in relief and resettlement of refugees.

Sierra Leone produced one of the pioneers of the new African academic theology in Harry Sawyerr (1909–1986) of Fourah Bay College. Prophet WILLIAM WADÉ HARRIS visited Sierra Leone several times in his later years and took a Sierra Leonean wife, but his preaching there did not have the electrifying effect it had elsewhere. AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES of the prophet-healing type, led by the Church of the Lord (Aladura) and Emmanuel Owoade Adeleke Adejobi, arrived from Nigeria from the 1950s. A wider and deeper effect has come from the charismatic movement, especially since the 1970s. This has affected the older Anglican and Methodist churches (and especially their young people); it has also increased the appeal of the older Pentecostal churches such as the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD; and, particularly in Freetown, it has produced a host of new churches and “ministries,” large and small. Most are indigenous; some have affiliations elsewhere in West Africa or in the United States. Healing and deliverance from malevolent powers are features of their ministry. They often have multiethnic congregations, using the Krio language, Seehe, the national lingua franca.

See also Colonialism; Missiology; Missionary Organizations; Missions, British; Missions, German; Slavery, Abolition of

References and Further Reading

- Fyfe, Christopher. History of Sierra Leone. London: Oxford University Press, 1962.
- Hanciles, Jehu J. Euthanasia of a Mission: African Church Autonomy in a Colonial Context. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2002.
- Olson, G.W. Church Growth in Sierra Leone. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1969.
- Reeck, D.L. Deep Mende: Religious Interactions in a Changing African Rural Society. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1976.
- Walls, Andrew F. The Missionary Movement in Christian History. chap. 8. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1996.

ANDREW F. WALLS

SIMEON, CHARLES (1759–1836)

Anglican evangelical clergyman. Simeon was born into an aristocratic Oxfordshire family, his mother's background including two archbishops of York. He attended Eton, where he was not known as an accomplished or pious student. Nevertheless, he won a scholarship to King's College, CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY where he enrolled in 1779, becoming a fellow in 1782 and graduating with his B.A. a year later. During his first term at Cambridge, Simeon discovered that he was required to receive Holy Communion and this obligation became the catalyst of his CONVERSION. His subsequent interaction with Anglican evangelicals John and Henry Venn shaped his theological thinking and he became a convinced lowchurch Evangelical.

Simeon was ordained to the Anglican priesthood in 1783. Through his father's influence he was named to the prestigious living of Holy Trinity, Cambridge. Holy Trinity's parishioners opposed his appointment and Simeon was unsure at first about accepting it but did so, beginning a life-long PREACHING ministry there. Strong opposition, indeed open hostility, from parishioners, students, and faculty did not immediately abate. Slowly, however, Simeon won the grudging acceptance of his community and, eventually, he gained their genuine affection by his generous pastoral care and winsome message.

Within the established church at large Simeon ultimately became a key leader of the evangelical party. He was involved in the founding of several important evangelical organizations, including the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (1797) and the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY (1804). Although a keen Evangelical, Simeon was committed to Establishment and to the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. He disliked theological controversy and sought to be a voice of moderation and conciliation in the then divisive debate between Arminian and Calvinist Evangelicals. Through many students and assorted younger curates Simeon proved to have a wide influence. He penned the multivolume Horae Homileticae, a practical expository commentary on the BIBLE (completed in 1819–1820).

When Simeon died in 1836, much of the town and university attended his funeral. After his death Simeon continued to shape the character of his CHURCH OF ENGLAND. The trust he had founded purchased advowsons and thereby ensured parish appointments for clergy of an evangelical stripe.

See also Evangelicalism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Simeon, Charles. Horae Homileticae. London: Holdsworth, 1832/33.

Secondary Sources:

Carus, William, ed. Memoirs of the Life of the Rev. Charles Simeon. New York: R. Carter, 1847.

Hopkins, Hugh Evan. Charles Simeon of Cambridge. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1977.

Moule, H.C.G. Charles Simeon. London: Methuen, 1914.

GILLIS J.HARP

SIN

In a religious sense, sin designates the human person's failure to be a properly ordered relational self. It is contrary to one's constitution as a creature of and before God and damages human relationships and community.

In the Hebrew scriptures sin is revolt against Yahweh's COVENANT (Exodus 20:1–17) and is a consequence of idolatry (Wisdom 14:22–31; cf. Romans 1:18–32). Because the Hebrew prophets insisted sin concomitantly harms one's neighbor, maintenance of the covenant required proper WORSHIP of Yahweh and the practice of justice and loving kindness with all persons, the latter dynamic serving to authenticate and ratify one's God relation (e.g., Amos 2:6–16; Micah 6:6–8). In the New Testament Paul gave to sin the character of an impotent will unable to choose righteousness (Romans 7:13–25).

Augustine (d. 430) established the parameters of a Christian THEOLOGY of sin by characterizing it as disordered loving in which one fails to love God above all things and all things through one's primary love of God. He connected sin with pride and construed it as inordinate individuation and estimation of one's capacities, a human "no" to its divine ground. In acknowledgment of the goodness of the created order (Genesis 1), sin has neither an allotted place nor intelligibility in creation. It is a privation of the good. For Augustine and MARTIN LUTHER (d. 1546), to be a sinner is to be curved in on oneself and voluntarily shut off from God and neighbor. SØREN KIERKEGAARD (d. 1855) agreed and suggested that sin is also expressed in a despairing weakness in which one has too little self or fails to be oneself before God.

In the twentieth century PAUL TILLICH (d. 1965) characterized sin as the uncentered and estranged quality of existence produced when one's ontological polarities are separated rather than integrated, the healing of which comes from the New Being in Jesus Christ. REINHOLD NIEBUHR (d. 1971) underscored collective egoism and the corporate dimension of sin, observing that sin is the only Christian DOCTRINE for which there is empirical evidence; one need only observe human beings in society for its verification. KARL BARTH (d. 1968) echoed Augustine's insistence that sin is unreal and so impermanent, and suggested GRACE negates the self-negation of sinful humanity and redetermines humanity in Jesus Christ to covenant fidelity (Romans 6), to which the appropriate human response can only be praise and gratitude.

See also Atonement; Christology; Covenant Theology; Predestination; Salvation

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Augustine, Confessions. 399. Translated by Maria Boulding. Hyde Park, NY: New City Press, 1997.

. The City of God against the Pagans (416–422). Translated by R.W.Dyson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

Barth, Karl. Church Dogmatics. The Doctrine of Creation. vol. III/2. Translated by G.W.Bromiley and T.F.Torrance. Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1960.

Kierkegaard, Søren. The Sickness Unto Death. Translated by Alastair Hannay. London: Penguin Books, 1989.

Niebuhr, Reinhold. The Nature and Destiny of Man. Human Nature. vol. I. Louisville, KY: W/JK, 1996.

Tillich, Paul. Systematic Theology. Existence and the Christ. vol. II. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957.

JOHN N.SHEVELAND

SISTERHOODS, ANGLICAN

The first sisterhood in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND was founded in 1845; by 1900 more than ninety women's religious communities had been founded within the borders of the United Kingdom, with perhaps a dozen more within ANGLICANISM and Episcopalianism worldwide. Despite the Protestant identification of the Church of England, the great majority of these sister-hoods took vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, in forms that directly reflected the vows of Roman Catholic religious. Many evangelicals and nonconformists in Victorian Britain refused to accept the Anglicanism of these groups, accusing them instead of being Jesuits in disguise, and imagining that they were founded to lure honest Protestants into the embrace of Rome.

The social, religious, and cultural forces that led to the foundation of sisterhoods was a complicated amalgam. The women who joined (and over 10,000 British women at least tried the life in the first fifty years of the movement), seem to have been moved by a mixture of motivations, including philanthropy, religious devotion, and a desire for a life independent of the family. They effectively served as unpaid but highly disciplined social workers, nurses, teachers, and care workers in a social system that had long been content to ameliorate the suffering of the poor in an sporadic and individualistic way. The first systematic training of hospital nurses began at St. John's House (later the Community of St. John the Divine) in 1848, twelve years before Florence Nightingale founded the training school at St. Thomas's Hospital. The first creches for working-class mothers, the first baby hospital, and the first seaside convalescent hospital, were all sisterhood achievements. Teaching sisters, especially those of the Community of the Sisters of the Church, were providing thousands of school places for working-class children by the end of the century, and a number of sisterhoods, most notably St. John Baptist, Clewer, were sheltering up to 7,000 prostitutes and other deviant women a year in refuges, homes, and penitentiaries. Many more sisters simply worked as district visitors—essentially prototypical social workers—in the urban slums of ENGLAND, INDIA, SOUTH AFRICA, and the UNITED STATES.

The religious views of most sisterhoods were decidedly "high church." Virtually all women's orders aligned themselves with the Anglo-Catholic wing of the Church of England, placing great weight upon the regular reception of the sacraments, the importance of the seven daily offices of prayer, and emphasizing the duty of charitable work among the destitute. While relatively few of them were in direct contact with English cardinal JOHN HENRY NEWMAN (1801–1890) (except for Marion Hughes, founder of the Society of the Holy and Undivided Trinity), a number of early communities were directly or indirectly influenced by English cleric Edward B.PUSEY and his followers.

The dominant cultural forces that led to the establishment of women's communities in mid-Victorian Britain were largely linked to the issue of women's work and their status in society. Most sisters were middle or upper class (although working-class women could join, they did so only in small numbers), and their families and society assumed that all women who could, would marry. Spinsters were an object of pity or derision to many, and were even described as having “failed in business.” Equally, it was considered inappropriate for ladies to work for pay. This meant that unmarried women of the middle and upper classes were expected to live lives without either the satisfactions of family life, or the absorbing interests of employment. They were instead expected to either devote themselves to their parents or to any sibling whose family might need assistance; if no family duty called, some trifling and amateurish philanthropic work was considered the natural sphere of the unmarried woman.

Sisterhoods upended the accepted view of unmarried women. They argued that women who did not marry might be following a higher vocation than that of family life, and that women had the right to leave their parents and siblings in order to follow this calling. The very fact of their wide-ranging programs of nursing, teaching, and caring, emphasized their insistence that such work be performed in an organized and disciplined manner. Women who entered a community could be sure they would be offered a lifetime of hard but meaningful work, both within and without the convent walls.

The mainstream Protestant reaction to these groups was mixed. On the one hand, few were willing to criticize the communities’ active work: it was too widespread, too popular, and too socially useful. However, Protestants viewed the habit, the vows, and the communal life as suspiciously similar to Roman communities. Some concluded that Anglican sisters were sadly deluded in their imitation of Roman models, but that the women themselves were essentially harmless. Others, and this was the position adopted on the harder wing of Protestant opinion, saw sisters as witting or unwitting proselytizers for Rome. It was claimed in some quarters that members of women’s communities were Jesuits in disguise, actively working to subvert Protestant principles and to lure unsuspecting victims into the Roman Catholic Church. Others felt that the women themselves were dupes of priestly schemes to convert England under a façade of Anglican conformity. The extreme lunatic fringe, led by the MP Charles Newdegate, saw no difference between Anglican and Roman orders at all, writing of nameless horrors awaiting the women who entered “prisons disguised as convents.” Such warnings were unnecessary, as women were free to leave Anglican communities both before and after taking the vows, but such fantasies were long a stock item in extreme Protestant circles.

References and Further Reading

- Allchin, Arthur M. The Silent Rebellion: Anglican Religious Communities 1845–1900. London: SCM Press, 1958.
- Anson, Peter F. The Call of the Cloister. Rev. ed. A.W. Campbell. London: SPCK, 1964.
- Mumm, Susan. Stolen Daughters, Virgin Mothers: Anglican Sisterhoods in Victorian England. London: Leicester University Press, 1999.

SUSAN MUMM

SLAVERY

The linkage between slavery and religion dates back to ancient times. Portuguese Catholics introduced African Muslim slaves into the Western world in the 1440s during religious wars against the Moors. Slavery entered British North America in 1619 when Dutch traders sold twenty Africans to English colonists at Jamestown, Virginia. Nowhere in the world is the relationship between Protestantism and racial slavery more complex than in the Southern UNITED STATES, where the institution developed between 1619 and the end of the CIVIL WAR in 1865. Although the first recorded Christian BAPTISM of an enslaved African in North America took place in 1641, widespread CONVERSIONS did not occur until the religious REVIVALS of the Great Awakening reached the Southern colonies in the middle of the eighteenth century (see AWAKENINGS). Between the mid-eighteenth and mid-nineteenth centuries, African-American slaves embraced evangelical Protestantism in large numbers, even as slavery became an increasingly divisive force among white evangelicals, whose denominations split along sectional lines in the 1840s and 1850s. As antislavery and proslavery Protestants exchanged acrimonious volleys of rhetorical fire, they prepared the moral ground for the Civil War.

I. Early Efforts to Convert Slaves to Christianity

Although there is evidence of the practice of Christianity in AFRICA as early as the first century, wide-spread conversions of Africans to Protestant Christianity accompanied the forced migration of 400,000 African slaves to North America. Upon arriving in the colonies most slaves practiced a traditional African religion that emphasized the appeasement of a pantheon of gods who otherwise threatened harm to humans. A Supreme Creator God presumably remained aloof from human affairs and consequently played less of a role in everyday religious practices than did lesser deities.

African religious traditions endured and even flourished among slave communities in South America and the CARIBBEAN to a greater extent and for a longer duration than among North American slaves. This difference can be explained in part by noting that the Catholicism practiced in countries such as BRAZIL, Cuba, and Haiti was more conducive than Protestantism to syncretism. African traditions such as divination, altars, charms, and worship cults found close parallels with Catholic rituals surrounding, for instance, SAINTS, candles, and crucifixes. More important, in the American context African theologies and practices quickly disappeared because of the relative absence of a continuous influx of new slaves from Africa. As first-generation immigrants became separated from traditional social structures and as second- and third-generation slave communities matured in a novel environment, they forgot many of the traditions of their ancestors. White slave-owners, moreover, sought to eradicate African CULTURE because of its power to unify slaves, thus making resistance and rebellion easier. Although historians have debated the extent to which African religions persisted in North America, most scholars agree that specific theological contents and expressions fared less well than more general styles, such as call-and-response and rhythmic cadences.

Protestant efforts to convert African slaves to Christianity proceeded slowly in Britain's North American colonies. Some slaves adopted Christianity as soon as they learned English and could understand PREACHING; many other first- and second-generation Africans remained indifferent or hostile to Christianity, even when they did receive instruction from their masters or from Protestant preachers. The first documented slave baptism in North America took place in Massachusetts in 1641. Hoping to stimulate more systematic missionary efforts, King Charles II of ENGLAND commissioned the Council for Foreign Plantations to christianize slaves in 1660. The SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL began the first significant institutional efforts at slave conversion in 1701. Yet there were relatively few slave conversions before the Great Awakening of the mid-eighteenth century, in part because white masters feared that Christians could not be slaves. Indeed, because early justifications of slavery distinguished between heathen and Christian peoples, some converts hoped that baptism would lead to emancipation. In 1667 the Virginia Assembly set an important precedent by legislating that baptism did not grant worldly freedom to slaves. Baptized slaves did, however, often receive more lenient treatment before slave courts than did non-Christian slaves.

A number of factors impeded the progress of Christian missions among slaves in North America. Christianization worked against slave-owners' economic interests. Some masters justified working their slaves on the Sabbath by arguing that blacks were too brutish to be encompassed in biblical injunctions to rest on the seventh day. Although the Anglican church encouraged masters to instruct their slaves in Christianity, such instruction involved time-consuming memorization of the CATECHISM, a process that took time away from crop production. The exposure of slaves to Christianity was, moreover, uneven, because many lived in isolated areas where preachers seldom visited, and because some slave-owners refused to allow their slaves to hear preaching when it was available. The first recorded slave congregation, a group of BAPTISTS, was organized in 1758 on the plantation of William Byrd in Virginia.

Fear of rebellion, especially in areas where blacks outnumbered whites, further impeded missionary efforts. Christianization of blacks proceeded most slowly in the South Carolina and Georgia low country, areas densely populated by slaves. The South Carolina legislature prohibited teaching slaves to write after the Stono Rebellion (1739). After Gabriel's Rebellion (1800), an attempted insurrection in Richmond, Virginia, resistance to slave conversions deepened. Gabriel, known as the Black Sampson, used Old Testament themes to inspire his followers to revolt. Fearing that other rebellious slaves could use religious meetings as recruiting grounds and arenas for plotting, the Virginia Assembly passed a law prohibiting blacks from assembling between sunset and sunrise for religious worship or instruction.

II. The Great Awakening and Slave Conversions

The religious revivals of the Great Awakening reached the Southern colonies by the mid-eighteenth century, stimulating renewed interest in christianizing slaves (see EVANGELICALISM). The evangelists of the Great Awakening emphasized the universal need of all humans for redemption from SIN, and the equal value of all Christians as brothers and sisters in the family of God. Revivalists preached to blacks as well as whites, sometimes sidestepping questions about the morality of slavery to persuade masters to allow them to preach to their slaves. Although JOHN WESLEY spoke against the institution of slavery, GEORGE WHITEFIELD urged masters to execute their duty to provide religious instruction to their slaves. The Great Awakening's privileging of religious experience over formal theology made Christianity more accessible to slaves than did the more lengthy processes of catechismal instruction. Emphasis on an immediate "new birth" experience, moreover, paralleled African religious practices by offering more room for emotional and physical expressions of the agonies of sin and the joys of SALVATION.

"New Light" Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian preachers gained many of their converts from among lower and middle-class whites and black slaves. Evangelical teachings attracted such groups—and alienated many wealthy white planters—by stressing humility, mutual submission, and the equality of all people before God. During the eighteenth-century revivals, black and white converts prayed, sang, and shouted together, scorning the religious formalism of the Anglican upper classes (see ANGLICANISM). African-influenced worship practices shaped the religious expressions of both black and white revival participants, for instance in the spread of the ring shout. Evangelical preachers encouraged unordained blacks as well as WOMEN and children to exhort and preach to others across lines of race, GENDER, and age. Baptists offered greater opportunities for black participation than did other denominations, even licensing black preachers.

During the eighteenth century slaves frequently attended the churches of their masters. Influenced by the egalitarian teachings of the Awakening many Southern churches welcomed black members between 1750 and 1790, often granting slave congregants equal rights in religious instruction and communion. In 1776 evangelicals accounted for just 10 percent of the adult white Southern population, and a much smaller percentage of the black Southern population. By 1790 14 percent of Southern whites and 4 percent of Southern blacks had affiliated with evangelical churches. As of 1815, 40,000 or nearly one third of all Methodists were African American; blacks constituted a similar proportion of Baptist church adherents. Smaller numbers of enslaved African Americans joined Presbyterian, Episcopal, and Catholic churches. On the eve of the Civil War nearly half a million slaves, or roughly 12 percent of the enslaved population, had affiliated with a Protestant church.

As the number of black church members increased, so too did the concerns of white church members with distinguishing between the prerogatives of white and black Christians. The practice of evangelical CHURCH DISCIPLINE, or the "watch care" of the church, implied that all church members should be treated alike, and that slaves could accuse white members of misconduct—a dangerously egalitarian principle that threatened the patriarchal social order on which the institution of slavery depended. The mere presence of blacks in Southern churches raised questions about the morality of slavery, calling attention to the degradation of the slave family in such instances as when slave church members were accused of adultery after the sale of a spouse.

By the 1790s evangelical church fellowship had weakened. Many churches began to seat blacks in separate pews or consign them to the galleries, or designate separate services for black congregants. As such discrimination increased, black Christians more often expressed a preference for worship services free from white supervision. Some state legislatures, recognizing the empowerment and potential danger to the social order that religious practice afforded, passed laws prohibiting slaves from establishing their own places of worship. Independent black denominations developed their greatest strength in the mid-Atlantic rather than the Southern states. First organized in 1816 the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH (AME) gained a total membership of more than ten thousand by 1831, the year of founder RICHARD ALLEN'S death. By 1861 there were more than fifty thousand AME members. The AME ZION CHURCH organized in New York City as an independent denomination in 1821, and gained 42,000 members by the end of the Civil War. Where Southern slaves were prohibited from forming independent churches, they attended week-night meetings for PRAYER and singing, sometimes gathering illicitly in secluded places apart from the scrutiny of their masters.

III. Protestantism and the Slave Community

As AFRICAN AMERICAN PROTESTANTISM developed, religious expressions took on distinctive forms and meanings. African American worship was characterized by the call-and-response structure of sermons and of spiritual or sorrow songs, and by preaching that emphasized liberation and justice both on earth and in heaven. Black Christians more often identified with the Old Israel, whereas white Christians frequently envisioned themselves as the New Israel. Even when whites and blacks shared common texts, beliefs, and rites, they experienced religion differently, creating their own meanings in response to distinctive needs and contexts. Christianity offered enslaved African Americans emotional and psychological strength and a sense of spiritual victory and release. Christian slaves asserted their dignity by such acts as rejecting secular music, dressing up on Sundays, and placing money in the church collection plate. Black Christians particularly seized on the Bible's teachings about the deliverance of God's people from bondage and persecution. Slave preachers replaced white messages about the religious duty of obeying AUTHORITY with accounts of Moses leading the Israelite people out of bondage to the Egyptians. As slave preachers drew on the Exodus story they viewed Christ as a second Moses, rhetorically merging Moses and Jesus into a vision of a this-worldly and otherworldly deliverer.

The slave preacher played a central role in the life of the slave community as he acted in his roles as religious leader, politician, idealist, and healer. Preachers proclaimed a message of hope that sustained slave communities and developed an oratorical tradition that provided a potent mode of expression for African American activists. Black preaching emphasized oral storytelling traditions, given that many slaves, including many slave preachers, were illiterate. Like white folk preachers, black ministers frequently employed memorized verses, repetition, vivid imagery, and dramatic delivery. In the course of a sermon, a slave preacher might begin with conversational address that built to a rhythmic cadence punctuated by congregational exclamations, and that climaxed in a tonal chant accompanied by shouting, singing, and ecstatic behavior when the Holy Spirit fell upon the meeting. Spirituals, an important component of religious meetings in the slave community, made one person's joy or sorrow into a communal expression as the congregation invited the immediate presence of God's Spirit in the midst of the gathering. In addition to leading the slave community in preaching and singing, slave preachers presided over such important events in the religious life of the community as baptisms, weddings, and funerals. Religious gatherings, under the direction of slave preachers, served as a refuge from a hostile white world, and as a center for social, economic, political, and educational activities that promoted individual and collective dignity and identity.

The slave preacher's principal rival in shaping community life was the black conjurer. Although traditional African voodoo practices took firm root in New Orleans, in other areas of North America a more diffuse system of magic, divination, and herbal medicine, known as hoodoo or conjure, developed. Hoodoo was one way that slaves expressed a belief that powers other than whites intervened in their everyday affairs. When in need, slaves resorted to potions, charms, and rituals to ward off evil, cure diseases, and harm enemies. The same individuals and communities often embraced Christianity and conjure, without necessarily experiencing contradictions between belief systems that seemingly fulfilled different communal functions.

Even as conjure constituted a mode of resisting the dominance of white masters, Christian teachings held the potential to sanction either accommodation or resistance to slavery. Historians have debated whether slave religion was more a matter of resignation or implicit resistance. It is too simple to conclude, as have some scholars, that blacks passively accepted religion handed down from their masters, or that religion bred either rebellion or docility. Although some slave-owners attempted to use religion as a means of racial control, at the same time Christianity held revolutionary potential. W.E.B.DUBOIS claimed that slaves used religion as a weapon against captivity. Dubois argued that for more than a century slave religion consisted of a Christian veneer that masked slaves' use of African traditions to resist slavery. In Dubois's view Christianity produced more docile laborers, who were also more prone to indulgence and crime.

Yet Christian slaves actively shaped a religious culture all their own. In some circumstances, Christian slaves developed short-term resignation and fatalism, coupled with hope of eventual freedom in heaven. At other points slaves used Christian beliefs to justify their decisions to flee or revolt against their masters. Christianity produced in Nat Turner, a Baptist slave preacher and revolutionary, the determination to enact vengeance on a wicked white ruling class. Most often slave resistance accepted the limits of what was and was not politically possible. Christian slaves developed spiritual strength, and yet political weakness, as they accepted the political and social dominance of an oppressive ruling class. Protestant Christianity, as practiced by African-American slaves, did not merely compensate for worldly unfreedom in hopes of spiritual freedom and otherworldly rewards; religion allowed slaves to retain their identity as persons, as it offered them meaning, freedom, and transcendence of their circumstances. Religious practice was itself in many instances an act of rebelliousness, a way of asserting independence that sometimes involved defiance, such as in attending secret meetings. Black Christians developed a sense of being a people set apart, and through this idea, expressed through distinctive worship styles and theologies, created collective identity and communal pride. Scholars have even argued that Protestantism encouraged the development of a proto-national black consciousness. Religion endowed the enslaved community's experiences of suffering and struggle with meaning and significance and gave slaves the resources to endure.

IV. Protestantism and Slavery in the Southern United States

As Southern evangelical institutions matured between the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, white Protestants sought to control black religious practices more rigidly. Evangelicals became increasingly concerned with gaining social acceptability and respect from nonevangelicals. Many slave-owners welcomed evangelical ministers who wanted to preach to slaves, provided that they emphasized sections of the Bible that exhorted slaves to obey their masters, rather than sections that emphasized spiritual equality among all Christians. Slave-owners and the CLERGY who supported them drew selectively from Old Testament passages to argue that slavery was a divinely ordained institution. Slave-owners used religion to teach slaves morality, discipline, and respect for their superiors. Fearing the consequences of teaching slaves to read for themselves, some slave-owners read the Bible to their slaves and prayed with them in special services.

After Nat Turner's Rebellion (1831), Southerners imposed new restrictions on black preachers and used more tightly controlled plantation missions to gain greater control over slaves' religious meetings. At the same time that Southerners passed laws against black preachers and against teaching slaves to read and write, they also encouraged oral instruction of slaves in Christianity and initiated campaigns for the more humane treatment of slaves. By making slave life more bearable masters hoped to make it safer for themselves. Frequently Protestant slave-owner motives combined self-interest with genuine concern for the spiritual welfare of their slaves and themselves.

The plantation missions of the 1830s represented an attempt to demonstrate that the Bible allowed slavery and that instructing slaves constituted a religious duty for masters. In the 1830s, in addition to sending out itinerant ministers, Protestants published an unprecedented volume of sermons and essays on slave EDUCATION, emphasizing the duties of masters to give their slaves religious instruction and of servants to submit to their masters. Religious newspapers, such as the Episcopal Gospel Messenger, the Presbyterian Charleston Observer, the Baptist Christian Index, and the Methodist Southern Christian Advocate, all endorsed religious instruction of slaves. Southern clergy used slave instruction to control the religious practices of slave communities and to counter mounting abolitionist complaints about the irreligion of slaves.

V. Protestant Disputes over the Morality of Slavery

Many white Evangelicals who participated in the revivals of the Great Awakening opposed slavery as an immoral institution, spiritually and physically harmful to both masters and slaves. In 1784 the Methodist General Conference officially condemned slavery as a sin (see METHODISM, NORTH AMERICA). The highest judicatory of the Presbyterian Church made formal declarations supporting abolition of slavery no less than six times between 1787 and 1836 (see PRESBYTERIANISM; PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH U.S.A.). Early Methodists, Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF), and Baptists helped fugitive slaves, taught slaves to read and write, and worked through other informal channels to undermine the slave system. Most major denominations backed away from their antislavery positions by the end of the eighteenth century, as slaveholder pressure dissolved antislavery sentiments among white church members between 1790 and 1830. Many abolitionist preachers left the South voluntarily or after being expelled by proslavery majorities. A few Southern Quakers, Baptist Friends of Humanity, and urban evangelicals remained committed to the antislavery cause through the 1820s, a period when proslavery clergymen flocked to join the ranks of overseas and domestic plantation missionaries.

Slavery became an increasingly divisive issue among white Protestants between the 1830s and the onset of the Civil War. In 1844 the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church passed a resolution prohibiting bishops from owning slaves. This incident led to the secession of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Similarly, the Baptists split along sectional lines in 1845. Old and New School Presbyterians, having already divided in 1838 in part because of the slavery question, formally split into Northern and Southern branches in 1857 and 1861, respectively.

By the 1830s increasing numbers of Northern Protestants condemned slavery as a sin that must be removed, opposing the extension of slavery into the territories or even joining an expanding movement for the immediate ABOLITION OF SLAVERY. Antislavery evangelicals argued that the institution undermined virtue and pure religion, producing a low state of morality throughout the Southwest that posed a formidable obstacle to evangelization. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE'S Uncle Tom's Cabin (1851–1852) influentially argued that genuine Christianity was incompatible with the evil institution of slavery. Stowe condemned the hypocrisy of churches that defended slavery and urged individual religious conversion as the remedy for a national sin.

In response to hardening antislavery sentiments in the North, Southern Protestants developed more sustained proslavery arguments. No longer conceding that slavery was a necessary evil, clergy began to defend slavery as a “positive good” on moral as well as practical grounds. Southern Protestants argued that slavery benefited African slaves by civilizing and christianizing them. The Baptist minister Richard Furman, writing an “Exposition of the Views of the Baptists, Relative to the Coloured Population in the United States” (1822), argued that slavery, “when tempered with humanity and justice, is a state of tolerable happiness; equal, if not superior, to that which many poor enjoy in countries reputed free.” The Presbyterian James Henley Thornwell similarly articulated the doctrine of the “Spirituality of the Church,” denying that the church should intervene in social institutions under the purview of the state, instead restricting itself to matters of personal morality, such as card playing, dancing, and drinking (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW).

Some Northern Protestants joined Southerners in articulating proslavery arguments. George Washington Blagden, the pastor of Boston's Old South Church, published a sermon, Remarks, and a Discourse on Slavery (1847), which denied that slavery was at odds with Christian tradition or values. The foremost nineteenth-century American biblical scholar, Moses Stuart of Andover Theological Seminary, published Conscience and the Constitution (1850), which presented a detailed analysis of biblical passages that Stuart considered supportive of slavery.

As proslavery proponents responded to antislavery arguments using moral and biblical arguments, they prepared the way for a Civil War laden with millennialist expectations and apocalyptic imagery deployed by Northern and Southern Protestants alike.

References and Further Reading

- Campbell, James T. Songs of Zion: The African Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States and South Africa. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Dailey, David T. Shadow on the Church: Southwestern Evangelical Religion and the Issue of Slavery, 1783–1860. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1985.
- Dillon, Merton L. Slavery Attacked: Southern Slaves and Their Allies 1619–1865. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1990.
- Genovese, Eugene. Roll, Jordan, Roll. Roll: The World the Slaves Made. New York: Pantheon, 1974.
- Heyrman, Christine Leigh. Southern Cross: The Beginnings of the Bible Belt. New York: Knopf, 1997.
- Kolchin, Peter. American Slavery, 1619–1877. New York: Hill & Wang, 1993.
- Mathews, Donald G. Religion in the Old South. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977.
- Parish, Peter J. Slavery: History and Historians. New York: Harper & Row, 1989.
- Raboteau, Albert. Slave Religion: The “Invisible Institution” in the Antebellum South. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Smith, John David. An Old Creed For the New South: Proslavery Ideology and Historiography, 1865–1918. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1991.
- . Slavery, Race, and American History: Historical Conflict, Trends, and Method, 1866–1953. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe, 1999.
- Tise, Larry E. Proslavery: A History of the Defense of Slavery in America, 1701–1840. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1987.

CANDY GUNTHER BROWN

SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF

The transatlantic slave trade and the practice of SLAVERY disintegrated throughout the European colonial empires between 1792, when Denmark first denounced the trade, and the final emancipation of Brazil's slaves in 1888. Religious REVIVALS moved many antislavery advocates from a gradualist to an immediatist abolitionist position: compensation for slave-holders or any delay in emancipation represented unacceptable compromise with sin. Perfectionist theology taught that individuals were able and therefore morally obligated to adopt lifestyles of personal and social holiness, which constituted an essential precondition for the coming millennium. Protestants played the most decisive roles in advancing abolition in Britain and the United States. Mainstream churches adopted moderate antislavery positions, but provided the membership for more radical abolitionist societies and antislavery denominations. Religious and political abolitionists joined forces in stirring U.S. antislavery sentiment in the two decades preceding the American CIVIL WAR (1861–1865), an event that destroyed one of the world's most entrenched slave systems.

Global Comparative Perspectives

Every European colonial power participated in the transatlantic slave trade between Europe, Africa, and the Americas until the nineteenth century. Abolition proceeded gradually and unevenly for the European nations and their colonies. Denmark advocated abolition of the slave trade in 1792. In 1794 France enacted the first European law abolishing slavery in its colonial possessions and granting all French subjects the rights of citizens. The French decree did not grow out of humanitarian or religious motives so much as practical necessity. It was a response to threats posed by the self-liberated West Indian slave armies of St. Domingue and an imminent British invasion. The first French emancipation was short-lived; Napoleon reinstated colonial slavery in 1802. Britain became the first country to enact enduring abolitionist legislation, outlawing the slave trade in 1807 and abolishing the practice of slavery in 1833.

Official denouncement of the transatlantic slave trade occurred before full emancipation in most countries. Britain, Denmark, and the United States all ended their support of the international slave trade in the first decade of the nineteenth century, whereas the Dutch, French, Cuban, and Brazilian trades continued until the second, fourth, sixth, and seventh decades, respectively. The European Congress of Vienna declared in 1815 that all the European powers would discourage the international transportation of slaves. Because demand for slaves in colonial plantation economies continued unabated, such resolutions and even direct legislation did not, however, end international commerce in slaves (especially in Brazil and Cuba) until the 1870s. Laws abolishing slavery were passed in the northern United States in the 1780s; in British, Swedish, Danish, and French colonies by the 1840s; and in Spanish Puerto Rico and Cuba in 1873 and 1880, respectively.

In contrast to mass-participation Anglo-American abolitionist campaigns, the French antislavery movement was dominated by elites who enjoyed state sanction. Abolitionist leaders avoided mass recruitment tactics such as the use of petitions, newspaper publishing, public meetings, and boycotts. French abolitionists maintained a gradualist approach to emancipation, insisting on property rights and financial indemnification for slaveholders. The Protestant press and some Catholic clergy became visible participants in the French abolitionism relatively late, from 1846 to 1847, when religious networks did begin to circulate petitions on a massive scale. Ultimately the February Revolution, rather than religious or humanitarian lobbying, proved the decisive factor in permanently abolishing slavery in France and its possessions in 1848.

The Netherlands was the final European nation to join the antislavery crusade. Under British pressure the Dutch ended the slave trade in 1814 and abolished slavery in 1863. The Dutch were the last of the Europeans to sign the Brussels Act of 1890, repressing the African slave trade. The Dutch case calls into question two economic models that scholars have used to explain the rise of abolitionist sentiment throughout Europe. Studies have overwhelmingly demonstrated that slavery was economically profitable during the very same decades that abolitionist campaigns undermined the institution of slavery in one country after another. According to the “market model,” societies making the transition to mercantile capitalism, long-distance commerce, banking and credit networks, and participation in world markets found slave economies outmoded. In contrast, the “free labor ideology” model views abolition as legitimizing industrial wage labor by attacking traditional labor systems for their moral failings. By the market model the earlier development of Dutch mercantile capitalism should have led to more rapid abolitionism; by the free labor model Dutch industrialization should have advanced earlier than it did.

The Brazilian example similarly challenges scholarly generalizations about the relationship between economic development and abolition. Contrary to what economic theorists would have predicted, abolitionist sentiment emerged first in the geographic regions and enterprises least involved in economic growth and modernization. Importation of African slaves by Brazil reached its apogee just before the 1851 enforcement of an 1831 law banning the transatlantic recruitment of slaves. The Rio Branco law of 1871 freed slave offspring from hereditary bondage. Brazil was the last country in the Americas to emancipate all of its slaves, through the Golden Law of 1888. Only in the last decade of the abolitionist movement did its supporters employ mass participation tactics such as newspaper campaigns, rallies, and an underground railroad. Nabuco (de Ara'jo) founded the Brazilian Anti-Slavery Society and led the abolitionist campaign through the national chamber of deputies beginning in 1878. Unlike the British and American examples, churches and religious institutions played a relatively minor role in Brazilian abolition.

Paradoxically, abolition of the international slave trade encouraged the expansion of slavery in Africa. The price of slaves on the international market fell at the same time that an expansive world market heightened its demand for African agricultural commodities. African political leaders responded to the shifting economic climate by employing more slaves domestically as agricultural workers. African slavery abated, however, by 1914, by which point European nations had enforced colonial rule throughout much of Africa.

Protestant Roots of Abolition

Religion was a motivating factor for many people who became involved in campaigns to abolish the slave trade and the practice of slavery. Religious abolitionists included Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF), Unitarians, Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists, as well as those with non-Christian faiths. Nevertheless a special affinity existed between the principles of abolitionism and evangelical Protestantism. Participation in religious revivals convinced many Protestants that individuals were morally accountable and that slavery was a sin that demanded immediate repentance and abandonment. By 1830 many abolitionists, especially in Britain and the United States, had turned from gradualist to immediatist philosophies and tactics. Most gradualist antislavery agendas assumed compensation for slaveowners and colonization or apprenticeship periods for newly freed slaves. If, however, slavery was a sin, abolitionists began to reason, any form of compensation or delay in acting constituted sin. Immediatists used moral suasion to argue that action to end the evil practice of slavery must begin right away, even if it might take some time to complete the emancipation process.

The reform movements that grew out of the nineteenth-century religious revivals were grounded in a theology that emphasized human ability in the salvation process and benevolent action as the fruit of genuine religious conversion. American theologians NATHANIEL WILLIAM TAYLOR, LYMAN BEECHER, and CHARLES GRANDISON FINNEY modified Calvinist theology in the direction of greater human initiative. According to the doctrine of perfectionism, which gained prominence in many Protestant circles in the 1830s, Christians could, subsequent to justification, become entirely sanctified or holy during their present lifetime. Confidence in the possibility of perfection led to an ultraist mentality, an unwillingness to compromise with sin, and an insistence that nothing short of millennial standards for perfection should be tolerated. Proponents of entire sanctification argued that both individuals and society must separate from impure institutions and establish a sanctified religious and civil order. The theology of the revivals implied social and political activism, by teaching that individuals had an ability, and therefore a moral obligation, to do good to benefit other individuals and to redeem the world. Many revivalists believed that perpetuation of the slave system would invite God's judgment, whereas the end of slavery was an essential prerequisite to the coming of the millennium.

Some abolitionists preached immediate emancipation as a way to reform both society and religious institutions that, in the evaluation of the reformers, had allowed the purity of the early church to become tainted. Such activists feared loss of moral control and found in abolitionism a moral community in the midst of an immoral society. Whereas many antislavery advocates pushed their churches to higher levels of holiness, other abolitionists left the institutional church, making antislavery crusades a surrogate for organized religion, an avenue through which they channeled their pietistic, anti-institutional, and perfectionist zeal.

Protestants and Abolition in Great Britain

The abolitionist movement in Britain merits special attention because of its priority and influence in ending the transatlantic slave trade and the practice of slavery internationally. The antislavery movement took shape in the late eighteenth century, under the leadership of evangelical Protestants, and embraced a new immediatist agenda by 1830. Methodist founder JOHN WESLEY articulated his most comprehensive condemnation of slavery in an essay “Thoughts Upon Slavery” (1783). British Quakers first presented a petition to the House of Commons seeking abolition of the slave trade in 1784. Women and African American Protestants, including the English Quaker Elizabeth Heyrick and the Anglo-African Methodist Olaudah Equiano, made significant contributions to the British antislavery movement.

GRANVILLE SHARP, first chairman of the Abolition Committee, founded in 1787, denounced slavery as violating common law, the law of reason, and the law of God. In the Somerset case Sharp convinced the Court of the King’s Bench in 1771, presided over by Chief Justice William Murray, baron of Mansfield, to declare slavery incompatible with the “free air” of England. Ten to fifteen thousand blacks living in England gained their freedom as a result of this judgment, which effectively abolished slavery within England. Sharp also gained Parliamentary authority to colonize a free black community named Freetown in SIERRA LEONE in 1791.

Parliamentarian WILLIAM WILBERFORCE, converted to evangelical Protestantism in 1785, took a lead in fighting for passage of the British Abolition of the Slave Trade Act in 1807, which prohibited the slave trade in the British West Indies. Wilberforce cofounded the British Society for the Mitigation and Gradual Abolition of Slavery in 1823. The Slavery Abolition Act of 1833 was passed one month after Wilberforce’s death, finally accomplishing his vision of freeing all slaves in the British Empire. The law freed 800,000 slaves on a gradual and compensated basis, and set a precedent for other European imperial powers to free their slaves.

When outlawing the slave trade did not quickly end the slave labor system, British reformers attempted to use government regulation to limit the extension of slavery and, through the Canning Resolutions, to ameliorate the conditions under which slaves lived and worked. When these efforts also failed to achieve their intended results, the reformers urged the general registration of slaves to protect their rights. The failure of registration efforts led reformers to seek direct, gradual emancipation by the British crown. The resistance of planters to even such gradualist measures convinced abolitionists of the necessity of a more aggressive, immediatist strategy. British (like American) abolitionism had reached a crucial juncture by 1830. The shift in antislavery strategy resulted not only from frustration with slaveholders’ intransigence, but from a transition in reformist assumptions away from a rationalist view of human history that favors step-by-step reform of complex social institutions to an evangelical view that refuses any compromise with sin.

Scholars have been quick to point out that the growth of abolitionist movements in Britain and the United States coincided with the rise of industrial capitalism. Studies have suggested that religious benevolence served as a hypocritical mask for baser economic self-interest in motivating antislavery sentiment. Abolitionists, by this view, were ideological imperialists who attacked the practices and social customs of slaveholding societies to rationalize the social and economic changes essential to the triumph of free-market capitalism. Abolitionist rhetoric allowed the British to reinforce their identity as the world's standard-bearer of liberty, while ignoring the exploitation of industrial workers, including many women and children, in English mills and mines. A variant on the economic view is that abolition arose not from the dialectic of class conflict, but from the interplay of market-fostered values that yielded a new "cognitive style" that favored efficient, disciplined labor.

Protestants and Abolition in the United States

In colonial America members of the SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, or Quakers, pioneered in opposing slavery because of its inconsistency with the Christian principles of nonviolence, equality of all people in God's sight, and the sin of ostentation. Four Pennsylvania Quakers, JOHN WOOLMAN, Anthony Benezet, William Southeby, and Benjamin Lay, signed an antislavery petition in 1688, and spoke publicly against slavery during the 1740s to 1750s. The Society of Friends prohibited slavery among its members in 1774. In 1780 Pennsylvania enacted the modern world's first gradual emancipation law. Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian churches all spoke out against slavery in the 1780s to 1790s, but backed away from antislavery positions for fear of alienating Southern whites and losing the ability to preach the gospel to slaves. By the 1820s most white Southerners, including church leaders, responded to Northern attacks on slavery by defending slavery as a God-ordained social system or as a civil institution irrelevant to the "spirituality of the church."

The first major U.S. antislavery society, the AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY (ACS), formed in 1816 on gradualist principles. The ACS attracted prominent politicians and even slaveholders who wanted to rid American society of free blacks. In ten years the ACS never succeeded in transporting more than two thousand blacks to the African colony of LIBERIA. In 1831 William Lloyd Garrison founded a newspaper, The Liberator, to advocate immediate abolition. Garrison organized the New England Anti-Slavery Society in 1832 and the American Anti-Slavery Society (AASS) in 1833. Women were excluded from the AASS's founding meeting, and only three of the sixty-two delegates were black, although both women and African Americans organized their own antislavery organizations, such as the Boston Female Anti-Slavery Society and the American Society of the Free People of Color. Women abolitionists, such as Sarah and Angelina Grimké, Maria Weston Chapman, Antoinette Brown, Lydia Maria Child, and LUCRETIA MOTT, supported the antislavery cause by speaking publicly, editing abolitionist newspapers, raising funds, and organizing petition campaigns. Former slaves, including FREDERICK DOUGLASS, Harriet Tubman, Sojourner Truth, and William Wells Brown, undertook international speaking tours on which they gave first-person accounts of slavery's abuses.

In part through the activities of women and African Americans, the AASS gained a membership of a quarter million by 1838 and a total of 1,300 auxiliaries. Admission of women to the AASS in 1839 nearly destroyed the society. Election of a woman officeholder, Abby Kelley, in 1840, did split the AASS, when the women's issue combined explosively with other tactical disputes regarding pacifism, political involvement, and Garrison's leadership. Garrison was a controversial personality who abandoned the institutional church because he considered it hopelessly corrupted by sin, and who took unconventional positions on such issues as the Sabbath, nonresistance, and women's rights. Anti-Garrisonians formed the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society in 1840, which forged alliances with Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian denominational antislavery movements.

Although most Northern states had abolished slavery by 1800, immediate abolitionism remained a minority position among Northern Protestants until the Civil War. Although some Protestants followed Garrison's lead in giving up on organized religion, many others persisted in calling churches and nondenominational reform societies to higher levels of holiness. Lewis Tappan was among the most influential church-centered abolitionists, through his leadership of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society and the AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION. Tens of thousands of Protestants joined "come-outer" sects based on the theological argument that Christians should refuse fellowship with other professed Christians who persisted in the sin of countenancing slaveholding. Come-outers viewed their action as protecting their own souls and as pressuring older denominations to adopt stronger antislavery positions. The most important come-outer sects were the Wesleyan Methodist Connection, Free Presbyterian Church, American Baptist Free Mission Society, Franckean Evangelical Lutheran Synod, Progressive Friends, and Indiana Yearly Meeting of Anti-Slavery Friends. Abolitionists similarly tried, without success, to sway the leaders of nondenominational reform societies, such as the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, American Tract Society, American Sunday School Union, AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, and American Home Missionary Society, to adopt immediate abolitionism. After a decade of fruitless lobbying, in the 1840s abolitionists formed their own rival religious benevolent institutions, including the American Missionary Association and the American Reform Tract and Book Society.

The largest segment of the Northern churches might be classed as antislavery moderates who supported gradual emancipation, but objected to abolitionist characterizations of all slaveholders as sinners or demands that slaveowners be expelled from church membership, and thus be relinquished from moral accountability. Mainstream denominations contributed to emancipation by spreading a relatively vague antislavery ideology that proved more acceptable to public opinion than radical abolitionist rhetoric and tactics. In articulating antislavery principles without calling for specific, immediate action, the churches in effect practiced a highly effective form of moral suasion. The Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian denominations all split along sectional lines, in 1844, 1845, and 1857, respectively; even after these schisms, the Northern denominations still refused to declare slave-owning inherently sinful or to subject slaveholders to church discipline.

Scholars have widely debated the constituency, motives, and effectiveness of abolitionists in influencing emancipation. An earlier generation of scholars argued that most abolitionists were young, middle-class, New England-born heirs of declining Federalist families, who embraced abolition to restore their declining political and social authority and to gain an exhilarating sense of self-affirmation. More recent studies have revealed the prominence of artisans, shopkeepers, and rural cash-crop farmers among the antislavery rank-and-file, and questioned whether there is any statistical difference between the occupational structure of abolitionists and the general population.

Questions regarding the motives of abolitionists have similarly generated considerable controversy, with scholars debating whether religion, economics, ideology, or psychological factors best account for abolitionist leanings. The individual and collective personalities of abolitionists have been stereotyped as impractical, self-righteous, fanatical, humorless, vituperative, disturbed, and, ironically, racist. More recently, scholars have sought to rehabilitate abolitionists from accusations of mental instability resulting from the rapid social and economic transformation of the urban North, and, more generally, to challenge generalizations about the dysfunctionality of abolitionist personalities.

Abolitionists did not directly influence the passage of much legislation, nor ever gain widespread popularity. Antislavery agitation did provoke sectional animosities that hastened the Civil War. Ultimately the strategy of moral suasion convinced Northern churches, voters, and political leaders to accept many of the arguments that the abolitionists had been making for decades.

The American Civil War and the Demise of Slavery

Tensions between the Northern and Southern United States over slavery accelerated between the 1830s and 1850s. Congress's bipartisan "gag rule" prohibiting discussion of antislavery petitions in 1836, the annexation of Texas as a slave state (1845) and disposition of territory from the Mexican-American War (1846–1848), the 1854 Kansas-Nebraska Act, the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 and HARRIET BEECHER STOWE'S publication of Uncle Tom's Cabin in 1852, the Dred Scott decision of 1857, and John Brown's raid on Harper's Ferry in 1859 all paved the way for sectional division over conflicting views of slavery.

Religious and political antislavery leaders formed a powerful alliance in the 1840s to 1850s. Although Garrisonians rejected political action as requiring unacceptable moral compromises, evangelical abolitionists joined new, antislavery political parties. The earliest antislavery politicians denounced slaveholding as a sin and endorsed nonfellowship with slaveowners. The Liberty Party, formed in 1840, ran James G. Birney for president, on a platform of immediate abolition and repeal of racially discriminatory legislation as a moral and political duty. Birney secured only 7,000 votes in 1840, and 62,000 in 1844, indicating that the single issue of slavery was insufficient to draw a significant number of evangelical votes away from the Whigs, a party that supported other evangelical issues such as SABBATARIANISM and prohibition.

The Free Soil Party, created in 1848, attracted more voters than the Liberty Party by adopting a more moderate antislavery platform. The 1848 ticket of Martin Van Buren and Charles Francis Adams received 290,000 votes. Free Soil united a coalition of former Liberty voters with nonextensionist Whigs and Democrats, including those who opposed expansion of slavery into the territories because they feared blacks rather than hating slavery for moral reasons. Some Protestant abolitionists felt betrayed by the Free Soil Party's weakened antislavery platform and political compromises. Yet even the party's more moderate nonextensionist position encouraged Northerners to view slavery as a morally unacceptable institution.

The Republican Party attracted former adherents to the Liberty and Free Soil parties and disaffected non-extensionist Whigs and Democrats. The new party attracted a still broader constituency than its predecessor, including those primarily interested in economic development and protection against competition from black labor. Abolitionists were so effective in keeping the Republican program on track with nonextension that most political abolitionists and even some Garrisonians endorsed the 1860 election of Abraham Lincoln as a morally principled means of combating slavery.

Despite abolitionist campaigns, the institution of Southern slavery was still firmly entrenched in 1860. The Civil War began as a fight for nonextension of slavery and preservation of the Union, and became a war to destroy slavery. Although the Emancipation Proclamation of 1863 freed a relatively small number of slaves, it transformed the Union armies into a liberationist vanguard. The Northern churches came to envision the war as a sacred cause with clear millennial overtones, and to perceive slavery as the crucial moral hurdle to overcome to preserve the nation from divine judgment. Yet post-war Northern failure to end discrimination indicates the inability of abolitionists to convert Protestant churches into advocates for racial equality.

See also American Bible Society; American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; American Colonization Society; American Missionary Association; Beecher, Lyman; Civil War, United States; Douglass, Frederick; Finney, Charles Grandison; Liberia; Mott, Lucretia Coffin; Revivals; Sabbatarianism; Sharp, Granville; Sierra Leone; Slavery; Society of Friends in North America; Stowe, Harriet Beecher; Taylor, Nathaniel William; Wesley, John; Wilberforce, William; Woolman, John

References and Further Reading

- Auping, John A. Religion and Social Justice: The Case of Christianity and the Abolition of Slavery in America. Mexico: Universidad Iberoamericana, 1994.
- Azevedo, Celia Maria Marinho de. Abolitionism in the United States and Brazil: A Comparative Perspective. New York and London: Garland, 1995.
- Drescher, Seymour. "Brazilian Abolition in Comparative Perspective." Hispanic American Historical Review 68 no. 3 (1988):429-460.

- . “British War, French Way: Opinion building and Revolution in the Second French Slave Emancipation.” American Historical Review 96 no. 3 (1991):709–734.
- . “Long Goodbye: Dutch Capitalism and Antislavery in Comparative Perspective.” American Historical Review 99 no. 1 (1994):44–69.
- . “Whose Abolition? Popular Pressure and the Ending of the British Slave Trade.” Past and Present 143 (1994): 136–166.
- Eltis, David. “Europeans and the Rise and Fall of African Slavery in the America: An Interpretation.” American Historical Review 98 no. 5 (1993):1399–1423.
- Howard, Victor B. The Evangelical War Against Slavery and Caste: The Life and Times of John G. Fee. Selinsgrove, PA: Susquehanna University Press; London: Associated University Presses, 1996.
- Kriegel, Abraham D. “A Convergence of Ethics: Saints and Whigs in British Antislavery.” Journal of British Studies 26 (1987):423–450.
- McKivigan, John R., ed. History of the American Abolitionist Movement: A Bibliography of Scholarly Articles. vol. 1: Abolitionism and American Reform; vol. 2: Abolitionism and American Religion. New York and London: Garland, 1999.
- , and Mitchell Snay. Religion and the Antebellum Debate over Slavery. Athens and London: University of Georgia Press, 1998.
- Stauffer, John. The Black Hearts of Men: Radical Abolitionists and the Transformation of Race. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- Strong, Douglas M. Perfectionist Politics: Abolitionism and the Religious Tensions of American Democracy. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1999.
- Thomas, Herman Edward. James W.C. Pennington: African American Churchman and Abolitionist. New York and London: Garland, 1995.
- Turner, Michael J. “The Limits of Abolition: Government, Saints and the ‘African Question’, c. 1780–1820.” English Historical Review 112 (1997):319–357.
- Yarak, Larry W. “West African Coastal Slavery in the Nineteenth Century: The Case of the Afro-European Slaveown-ers of Elmina.” Ethnohistory 36 (1989):44–60.

CANDY GUNTHER BROWN

SLESSOR, MARY MITCHELL (1848–1915)

Scottish missionary. Born in Aberdeen, SCOTLAND on December 2, 1848, Mary Slessor was destined to become one of the best-known missionaries of her era to her compatriots; her death at Use Ikot Nkon, NIGERIA on January 13, 1915, after thirty-eight years of service, was noted around the world.

Mary's father suffered from alcoholism and, after the family moved to Dundee, eleven-year-old Mary was obliged to seek work in a mill to help support the family. Her mother was a devout Presbyterian (see PRESBYTERIANISM), who saw that Mary and her siblings grew up hearing about the church's mission work, especially that in the Calabar district of West Africa. Slessor was accepted as a "female agent" for the United Presbyterian Church and sailed for Calabar in August 1876. During her years of service she drew criticism in some circles because of her unorthodox habits and methods. She climbed trees, dispensed with Victorian petticoats, marched barefoot and bareheaded through the jungle, cut her hair short, refused to filter drinking water, and allowed the use of a native oath in court cases.

An educator and church planter, Slessor pressured the mission to allow her to establish stations in new areas. In addition to teaching and PREACHING, she brought an element of stability in a time of social upheaval, as she advised and settled disputes. She lived like the native peoples and spoke the language so well that she won their respect and became known as eka kpukpro owo—everybody's mother.

Slessor was not the first to rescue unwanted twins and orphans, but she was more determined than some colleagues. Statues in Cross River and Akwa Ibom states depict her holding a baby in each arm. Many children found shelter in her home, eight of whom she adopted. She also fought to elevate the status of WOMEN and continued the missionary struggle to eliminate such practices as trial by ordeal of poison bean or boiling oil, ritual human sacrifices, killing of twins and orphans, and ethnic wars.

The British government appointed Slessor a magistrate during the colonial period (see COLONIALISM). This meant she continued to judge local court cases, as she had already been doing informally. In 1913 she was named an honorary associate of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, the highest honor then available to a British woman commoner.

Mary Slessor's Reformed faith (see CALVINISM; REFORMATION) was an integral part of her life; she considered PRAYER central to her ministry, as she endeavored to see lives transformed.

See also Africa; Church of Scotland; Free Church; Missions, British

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Slessor, Mary Mitchell. The Letters to Charles Partridge, 1905–1914. Dundee, Scotland: Dundee Central Library, Mary Slessor Collection.

<http://www.dundeeecity.gov.uk/centlib/slessor/letintro.htm> (Accessed March 14, 2003).

Secondary Sources:

Hardage, Jeanette. "The Legacy of Mary Slessor." International Bulletin of Missionary Research 26 (October 2002): 178–181.

Kalu, Ogbu, ed. A Century and a Half of Presbyterian Witness in Nigeria, 1846–1996. Lagos, Nigeria: IDA-Ivory Press, 1996.

Proctor, J.H. "Serving God and the Empire: Mary Slessor in South-Eastern Nigeria, 1876–1915." Journal of Religion in Africa 30 (2000):45–61.

JEANETTE HARDAGE

SMITH, HANNAH WHITALL (1832–1911)

American higher life evangelist, best-selling author, and reformer. Hannah Whitall was born a Quaker on February 7, 1832 in Philadelphia. In 1851 she married Robert Pearsall Smith. The birth in 1852 of their first child sidetracked her intellectual ambitions. That first child died in 1858, driving Smith to search the BIBLE for its “plan for salvation.” She decided that, for wholly consecrated readers, the Bible functioned as a guidebook.

Smith resigned from the SOCIETY OF FRIENDS in September 1859, proclaiming “the fact of the complete and finished salvation offered to us in Christ, our perfect Saviour.” She received baptism and Communion, and intensified her contacts with the Methodist Holiness movement. Smith published her first article in 1867 titled “How to Live a Life of Practical Holiness.”

By 1871, Smith recognized her gift for public work. Her eldest son died in 1872, and she wrote of him in Frank: The Record of a Happy Life (1873). The loss of the son undid her husband, who sailed for Europe in early 1873 under doctors’ orders. Over the next two years, Robert and then Hannah preached the Higher Life throughout Europe. Her book The Christian’s Secret of a Happy Life (1875) emerged from this period. In 1875, however, leaders in the movement rejected Robert’s ANTINOMIANISM. This break ended Robert’s career and he died in 1899.

The later 1870s saw Hannah Smith active in TEMPERANCE, women’s uplift, and suffrage movements. In 1888, the family moved to ENGLAND. Smith served in the front ranks of the British Women’s Temperance Union. Around 1900 she retired from public work and devoted her energies to the guardianship of her granddaughters. She died in England on May 1, 1911.

See also Higher Life Movement; Temperance.

References and Further Reading

- Kaylor, Earl C., Jr. “Smith, Hannah Whitall.” In Notable American Women. Edited by Edward T. James et al. Cambridge, MA: Belknap, Harvard University Press, 1971.
- Smith, Hannah Whitall. The Christian’s Secret of a Happy Life. Boston: 1875.
- . The Unselfishness of God and How I Discovered It: A Spiritual Autobiography. New York: Fleming H. Revell, 1903.
- Strachey, Barbara. Remarkable Relations: The Story of the Pearsall Smith Women. New York: Universe, 1980.

ANNE BLUE WILLS

SMITH, JOSEPH (1805–1844)

Mormon prophet and founder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. Joseph Smith, the unlearned visionary and prophet, went beyond the bounds of normative Protestantism in establishing MORMONISM in nineteenth-century America. Unlike other reformers of his day who strove to restore the doctrines of New Testament Christianity, Smith sought to restore its powers, including direct revelation and spiritual gifts. His followers believed Smith's revelations were scripture and equal to the Bible. In the same vein, he restored priesthood authority, including the priesthood of Melchizedek, ordained twelve apostles, and sought to build a city of Zion with a temple. Although based on passages in the Bible, Smith's doctrines went to extremes that most Protestants could not tolerate.

Smith was born in Sharon, Vermont, to Joseph Smith, Sr., and Lucy Mack Smith on December 23, 1805. The Smith family farmed in Topsfield, Massachusetts, near Salem, for four generations before hard times forced Smith's grandfather Asael Smith to move to Vermont in the 1790s. In making the move, the Smiths left behind their traditional Congregational faith. Asael became a Universalist, and Smith's father a seeker who lost faith in all the churches and had prophetic dreams about the desolate condition of the religious world. Although touched by revivals in Vermont, the Smiths did not attend church until they moved to Palmyra, New York, in 1816. Lucy Smith and three of the children joined the Presbyterians, but young Joseph stayed home with his father. Confused by the division in the family and pressured by the revival preaching in upstate New York, Smith reported a vision in 1820 in which he was forgiven of his sins and told not to join any of the churches.

The Smith family was typical of many New England migrants who spun free from the traditional churches in the early nineteenth century, and yet hungered for supernatural experience. The Smiths dabbled in treasure-seeking and magic and were part of the inchoate visionary culture that was visible also in early METHODISM. While alienated from the churches, the Smith family yearned for religion. Joseph Smith came under the influence of Methodist preaching, and for a short time joined a Methodist class after marrying Emma Hale in January 1827, a woman with Methodist connections. However, instead of finding a home in any existing religions, Smith began to receive revelations that carried him away from conventional Protestantism.

The Book of Mormon

On September 22, 1823, according to Smith's report, an angel named Moroni appeared in his bedroom to tell him about golden plates on which were engraved the history of an ancient people who had once resided on the American continent. Smith was led to the location of the plates in a nearby hill, which was later called Cumorah after a name in the record. He was permitted to view the plates but not to remove them from their hiding place until he had purged himself of the desire to profit from their value as gold. On September 22, 1827, he finally obtained the thick book of thin metal sheets, and began the process of translation. According to the story, the record was written in a combination of Egyptian and Hebrew, and Joseph was expected to translate the characters with the help of "interpreters" that came with the plates. The task was completed in June 1829, and the Book of Mormon was published in March 1830.

The Book of Mormon purported to be a history of an ancient people from whom modern American Indians had descended. The main action took place between 600 B.C. and A.D. 421, and concerned a group of exiles from Jerusalem who left the city on the eve of the Babylonian captivity and voyaged to the Western Hemisphere. Although telling a novel story, the record's basic idea of Indians being lost Israelites had been hypothesized by Christian observers since shortly after European discovery of the New World. In the Book of Mormon account, the migrants divided into two nations who battled one another for a thousand years until one group, the one not keeping the record, destroyed the other, and the story came to a close. From the survivors came the Native Americans of Joseph Smith's time. One of the Book of Mormon's stated purposes was to help restore this remnant of lost Israel to a knowledge of God.

The idea of Indian Israel would not have surprised readers familiar with speculations about Indian origins, but most Protestants would have been taken aback by the thoroughly Christian nature of the writing. Book of Mormon prophets taught the standard Christian gospel much more plainly than Isaiah or Ezekiel. Long before Christ's ministry, they preached his birth and resurrection, knew the name of his mother, taught Christian baptism, and organized Christian churches. Almost no distinction between the Mosaic and Christian dispensations was evident in the Book of Mormon. According to the book, Christ appeared to these American Israelites soon after his resurrection, but his gospel confirmed the prophetic teachings of the previous six centuries.

While the Christian nature of the Book of Mormon merely surprised Protestants, they angrily protested the Book of Mormon's presumption to be scripture of equal worth with the Bible. Without learning or ecclesiastical standing of any sort, Smith claimed that the 588-page book of prophecy and historical narrative was an expansion of the Bible, and was more likely than the Bible to be authentic because it was not damaged by editorial interventions and multiple translations. In an age that lived by the principle of sola scriptura, the Book of Mormon could only be looked upon as an audacious fraud.

At first the Book of Mormon was thought to be a clumsy attempt to deceive people and ultimately defraud them. After the unlikelihood of an uneducated farm boy producing such an intricate narrative dawned on the critics, the book was judged to be an imitation of a lost novel by a more learned and competent writer named Solomon Spaulding. Decades later, when Spaulding's book was found and the similarity to the Book of Mormon disproved, scholars went back to the idea of the Book of Mormon as the product of Smith's own inventiveness, the general opinion of non-Mormons today.

Church Organization

Smith began to attract followers who believed in his supernatural gifts, and on April 6, 1830, he organized them into a church in Fayette, New York. Smith's revelations, given usually by inspiration rather than vision, carried a strong millenarian message. In the calamities that would precede the Second Coming of Christ, the revelations said, the only safe refuge would be Zion, a place the Lord would designate for believers to gather. Church members, termed "saints," were to locate this site and build a holy city called the New Jerusalem. Missionaries were sent to Missouri in 1830 in search of a place for Zion, and Joseph Smith followed in the summer of 1831. A revelation identified Independence, Missouri, on the edge of American settlement, as the site of the New Jerusalem and the place for a temple.

Over the next few years, Smith's followers began to collect in Missouri, and at another site in Kirtland, Ohio, near Cleveland, where missionaries had gained nearly one hundred converts. The movement grew rapidly as a result of numerous short-term proselyting tours by the male members. No sooner was a person baptized than he was ordained and sent out to preach. The missionaries taught a simple New Testament form of salvation requiring faith, repentance, baptism, and the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. Mormonism resembled other restoration movements of the time, such as the Campbellites, who also sought to restore a pure New Testament gospel that circumvented the strenuous emotional ordeal of evangelical conversion.

Smith's revelations, however, did not stop with these familiar New Testament principles. He also claimed to restore priesthoods that were required to perform authorized baptisms and other sacred ordinances. John the Baptist was said to have restored the Aaronic priesthood, while Peter, James, and John, Christ's original apostles, along with other angelic visitors, were reported to have restored the higher or Melchizedek priesthood. The restoration of priesthood implicitly invalidated the sacraments of other Christian churches and made Mormons the exclusive possessors of divine authority.

Within the Mormon church, the priesthood was widely distributed. Smith did not reserve it for a clerical group set off from the laity as in most denominations. Every male member was ordained to the priesthood and authorized to perform sacred ordinances. No priestly class ever developed. Each congregation was led by lay priesthood leaders who called upon members of the congregation to preach, rather than reserving that duty for a trained ministry. Women did not receive the priesthood and did not give sermons except to other women.

Smith's revelations explained that through the priesthood believers might prepare themselves to see God and receive exaltation in the afterlife. Along with the program of gathering in Zion, Smith began to focus on the construction of temples where the saints could be instructed in the mysteries of godliness and taught to know God. The elders of the church were formed into a "School of the Prophets" to learn their duties and be shown how to purify themselves. Their schooling culminated in the 1836 dedication of a temple in Kirtland, where men, women, and children enjoyed a pentecostal outpouring.

The revelations containing these doctrines were published in 1835 as The Doctrine and Covenants, the second book of scripture produced by Smith that had equal standing with the Bible. Additions were made through the years as the revelations continued to pour forth.

Opposition to Mormonism

Almost from the beginning, Mormonism aroused opposition. The astounding claims to direct revelation, the exclusiveness of the religion, and the fear of a scheme to defraud people accounted for much of the anger. Smith was dragged from his house one night in 1832, threatened with emasculation, and tarred and feathered. In 1833, local settlers drove the Mormons from their farms around Independence, and refused to let them claim their property. The underlying problem was the Mormon practice of gathering. By concentrating members in one location, they threatened to become a majority and so control elections. Non-Mormons who might tolerate a minority of religious fanatics in their midst could not accept their dominance.

Joseph Smith's effort to found a bank in Kirtland in 1837 made still more enemies. Many of his own followers came to doubt his judgment and honesty and believed him to be a fallen prophet. In 1838 he was compelled to flee to Caldwell County, Missouri, where the saints had assembled in a largely unsettled region. Their growing power led to a fight at a polling place in the late summer of 1838, and violence erupted on both sides. The governor of Missouri ordered the Mormons expelled from the state or exterminated. In November 1838 Joseph Smith was arrested and charged with treason. He spent the winter of 1839 in prison in Missouri while his followers moved eastward toward Illinois in search of a new home.

In the spring of 1839, Smith escaped his guards, perhaps with their connivance, and joined his people. He purchased land at a place on the Mississippi called Commerce and renamed it Nauvoo. The Illinois legislature granted a charter that gave the Mormons control of local courts and a city militia. Smith wanted to erect barriers that would allow him to collect his followers and continue their instruction without fear of disruption by hostile forces. Strengthened by a flow of converts from England as well as every section of the United States, Nauvoo grew to a city of ten thousand over the next five years, with another five thousand members in the surrounding regions.

During the Nauvoo years, Smith elaborated on the temple doctrines that more than anything else differentiated his teachings from Protestantism. Family and lineage came to occupy a large place in his revelations. One of them instructed the saints to perform baptism vicariously for people now gone from the earth so that the requirement of baptism could be met by everyone. Smith said the ordinance, to be done only in temples, fulfilled the prophecy of Malachi about the hearts of the children being turned to the fathers. Another revelation made marriage a prerequisite for exaltation in the celestial kingdom. Men and women had to be sealed by priesthood authority in the temple in order to reach the highest degree of heaven.

The most controversial of Smith's revelations commanded the saints to practice plural marriage, like Abraham in the Old Testament. Smith may have received this revelation as early as 1831 and held it back, knowing the furor it would cause. His wife Emma, among others, was bitterly opposed. Beginning in 1842, he told a few of his most trusted followers about the revelation and instructed them to take additional wives as he did himself—perhaps as many as thirty-three of them. Although plural marriage was not publicly taught and was even denied until an announcement in 1852 in Utah, rumors flew about the city, turning many of the leading people in the church against Smith.

Smith's teachings in the Nauvoo years went far beyond traditional Protestantism. Though every doctrine had some foundation in the Bible—as did the polygamous practices of Abraham—Smith's revelations drove biblical passages to extremes that most Protestants could not comprehend. He taught, for example, that the phrase “be ye therefore perfect as your father in heaven is perfect” was to be taken literally. Christians were to work toward the goal of becoming gods themselves. Smith told people they were to become kings and priests, a phrase from the book of Revelation, and had himself ordained a king and priest. He established “endowment” ceremonies in the temple where the saints were instructed in how to prepare to meet God.

In the winter of 1844, Joseph Smith announced his candidacy for president of the United States. He never explained his reasons for conducting this hopeless campaign, but he sent missionaries throughout the country to promote his candidacy. Before the election, however, he was killed. Smith had closed down a reformist newspaper, The Nauvoo Expositor, in early June, believing that accusations by his disillusioned followers in the paper's pages were incendiary. Newspaper editors and politicians in the surrounding region were already calling for his blood, fearing the rising power of the Mormons. Closing the press was the last straw. Smith was arrested and taken to the county seat at Carthage, Illinois, where a mob attacked the jail in which he had been placed for safekeeping. He was shot on June 27, 1844.

Although building on the Bible and the Christian tradition, Smith cannot be thought of as another Protestant reformer. Untrained and inexperienced, he did not set out to revise established doctrines or to purify worship. Rather than reinterpreting the Bible, he took his cues from his own revelations. His followers thought he was more like Moses and Jeremiah than MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) and JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564). To this day, Mormons consider themselves to be Christians, but not Protestants, and speak of Joseph Smith as “the Prophet.”

References and Further Reading

- Brodie, Fawn M. No Man Knows My History: The Life of Joseph Smith. 2nd ed. New York: Knopf, 1971.
- Brooke, John L. The Refiner's Fire: The Making of Mormon Cosmology, 1644–1844. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Bushman, Richard L. Joseph Smith and the Beginnings of Mormonism. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1984.
- Compton, Todd. In Sacred Loneliness: The Plural Wives of Joseph Smith. Salt Lake City: Signature Books, 1997.
- Flanders, Robert Bruce. Nauvoo: Kingdom on the Mississippi. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1965.
- Hill, Marvin S. Quest for Refuge: The Mormon Flight from American Pluralism. Salt Lake City: Signature Books, 1989.
- Newell, Linda King, and Val Tippetts Avery. Mormon Enigma: Emma Hale Smith, Prophet's Wife, "Elect Lady," and Polygamy's Foe. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1984.
- Ouinn, D. Michael. Early Mormonism and the Magic World View. Rev. ed. Salt Lake City: Signature Books, 1998.
- Shipps, Jan. Mormonism: The Story of a New Religious Tradition. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1985.
- Underwood, Grant. The Millenarian World of Early Mormonism. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.
- Wood, Gordon S. "Evangelical America and Early Mormonism," New York History 61 (1980):351–386.

RICHARD LYMAN BUSHMAN

SMITH, WILLIAM ROBERTSON (1846– 1894)

English biblical scholar. Smith, Hebrew BIBLE and comparative religion scholar, introduced the literary-historical methods of German HIGHER CRITICISM to English-speaking Victorian Protestants. He propounded a theory of ritual sacrifice, totemism, and kinship that influenced the development of early sociological, anthropological, and psychological theorists of religion such as Emile Durkheim, James Frazer, F.B.Jevons, and Sigmund Freud.

Career

Born at Keig, Scotland, November 8, 1846 and raised in the recently formed Free Church of Scotland (see CHURCH OF SCOTLAND; FREE CHURCH), Smith entered the University of Aberdeen at age fifteen and became professor of Hebrew and Old Testament exegesis at the Free Church College, Aberdeen, nine years later.

The 1875 publication of his entry “Bible” in the Encyclopedia Britannica provoked intense controversy over his denial of Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy and postexilic dating of the levitical code. A five-year HERESY battle within Free Church assemblies (1876–1881) brought Smith international acclaim as a loyal churchman willing to be an outspoken advocate of the new biblical scholarship. Although accusing him of violating his oath to uphold the WESTMINSTER CONFESSIOIN, the Free Church General Assembly eventually dropped all formal charges. Nevertheless, it removed Smith from his academic post in 1881. He went on to become editor-in-chief of the ninth edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, to which he personally contributed over 200 articles. In 1883 he moved to CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY, becoming professor of Arabic, fellow of Christ College, and university librarian. He returned to the University of Aberdeen from 1888 to 1891 to deliver the Burnet Lectures, published as Lectures on the Religion of the Semites, his most seminal work in the field of religious studies.

Smith died of tuberculosis at Cambridge, ENGLAND, on March 31, 1894.

Assessment

Robertson Smith's use of literary-critical methods to reconstruct the history of ancient Israelite religion, which he defended as consistent with REFORMATION hermeneutics, helped clear the way for English-speaking Protestant biblical scholars to break free of the constraints of literalism and doctrinarism. For Smith, Hebrew biblical history revealed the story of an unfolding understanding of God, culminating in the prophetic consciousness of pure ethical monotheism and divine GRACE. He also expanded the study of Israelite religion by embedding it in the wider Semitic cultures of the Near East, including Arabia. As a result, Protestant Old Testament scholars could no longer ignore comparative issues.

In addition Smith gave direction to the academic study of religion by stressing the theoretical priority of rituals and symbolic actions over beliefs and myths in primal societies. He maintained that sacrificial rituals were originally totemic and constitutive of kinship bonds. Rejecting a propitiatory view of early sacrificial practices, he interpreted them as communal in nature, centering on the commensality established between divine and human participants in sacrificial meals. Although not fully accepted today, his views led to the treatment of religion as a positive and universal dimension of human life and society.

As a product of his times and influenced by ALBRECHT RITSCHL and German neo-Kantians (see KANT, IMMANUEL), Smith assumed an evolutionary scheme of human religious development from "primitive," ritually materialistic social stages to more private and less ritualistic stages of pure monotheistic awareness, culminating in the theology of Protestant Christianity. Thus, despite a passion for comparative studies, the privileged status he accorded Victorian Protestantism supports what Edward Said characterized as Smith's "Orientalism," that is, hegemonic Western cultural presumption.

See also Biblical Inerrancy; Colenso, John William; Cultural Protestantism; Drummond, Henry; Lagarde, Paul de; Nonconformity; Schleiermacher, Friedrich; Sociology of Protestantism; Westminster Catechism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Smith, William Robertson. Lectures on the Religion of the Semites. London: A. & C.Black, 1889/1894. Rev. ed.
- . The Old Testament in the Jewish Church: Twelve Lectures on Biblical Criticism. London: A. & C.Black, 1881/1892, rev. edition.
- . The Prophets of Israel and Their Place in History to the Close of the Eighth Century B.C. London: A. & C. Black, 1882.

Secondary Source:

Beidelman, T.O. William Robertson Smith and the Sociological Study of Religion, Chicago:
University of Chicago Press, 1974.

WILLIAM M.KING

SMYTH, JOHN (c.1572–1612)

English Baptist. Often designated “the first Baptist,” John Smyth (or Smith) was successively a Puritan, Separatist, Baptist, and Mennonite. Perhaps born in Sturton-le-Steeple, Nottinghamshire, ENGLAND, he was at Christ’s College, CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY from 1586 to 1598, earning a B.A. in 1590 and an M.A. in 1593 and becoming a fellow in 1594, but also studying medicine along the way.

Smyth was a Puritan city lecturer in Lincoln 1600–1602, losing that position because of a local political dispute (see PURITANISM). He wrote two books displaying standard Puritan theology: The Bright Morning Starre (1603) and A Patern of True Prayer (1605). He was a leader in a Puritan CONVENTICLE, which covenanted to become an English Separatist congregation (that is, a believers’ church separate from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND) about 1606–1607. In Principles and inferences concerning The visible Church (1607), he defined a true CHURCH as being composed only of saints (believers) bound together in a COVENANT, and argued that such a congregation had AUTHORITY directly from Christ to appoint leaders, administer the SACRAMENTS, and exercise discipline, for example. Smyth further defended and defined Separatist churches in Paralleles, Censures, Observations (1608). After the congregation fled to Amsterdam in the NETHERLANDS in 1608, Smyth supported himself (and apparently assisted the poor in the congregation financially) through the practice of medicine while also leading the congregation. He wrote The Differences of the Churches of the Separation (1608), in opposition to the Ancient Church, another English Separatist congregation in Amsterdam; in this book Smyth argued that books, including translations of Scripture, should not be used in WORSHIP (a prohibition perhaps aimed at the Anglican BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER and at the GENEVA BIBLE, which contained many Calvinist notes and interpretations); that a congregation should be led by several equal pastors/elders/teachers assisted by DEACONS/DEACONESSES (as opposed to the Puritan/Calvinist model, which made pastor, teacher, and elders separate positions); and that a congregation should not accept donations from outsiders.

In 1609 Smyth rebaptized himself and forty to fifty members of his congregation, thus re-establishing believer’s BAPTISM, reconstituting his congregation using believer’s baptism as a substitute form of the Separatist covenant, and creating what might be considered the first Baptist congregation. Smyth defended believer’s baptism in The Character of the Beast (1609) and later in Argumenta Contra Baptismum Infantum (an unpublished work in Latin). John Robinson led a large group out of the Smyth congregation, disagreeing with Smyth in his argument against the ancient church and with his move to a believer’s baptism position; in the spring of 1609 this group moved to Leiden in the Netherlands, where they eventually formed the nucleus of the PILGRIM FATHERS and thus helped lay the foundation for American CONGREGATIONALISM. By 1610 Smyth and most of the remaining congregation made an alliance with a group of Waterlander MENNONITES, in the process accepting Mennonite positions on the incarnation (that Christ's "first flesh" was divine and did not come from Mary), free will, and separation of CHURCH AND STATE—as evidenced by two confessions issued by the congregation, Corde Credimus and Propositions and conclusions (1612), as well as a Defense Smyth wrote supporting a Mennonite CONFESSION written by Hans de Ries.

Regarding free will, Smyth denied original sin and argued that Christ's death on the cross freed all human beings to the point that they were able to freely choose whether to accept or reject SALVATION—a free will position derived from the Mennonites rather than from the Reformed dissenter, JACOBUS ARMINIUS. A group of about ten members of the congregation, led by Thomas Helwys, although accepting much of this Mennonite theology, refused to follow Smyth into merger with the Mennonites. Helwys did not accept Mennonite views on the incarnation, accused Smyth and the Mennonites of not keeping the Sabbath, and held to a traditional Protestant view of JUSTIFICATION by FAITH (in opposition to the Smyth/Mennonite view that salvation was by both justification by faith and regeneration). Helwys accepted the Mennonite doctrine of separation of church and state (that the state should not interfere in religion) but differed with the Mennonites in saying that true Christians could nevertheless take part in secular government. Helwys defended the Smyth congregation's reinstatement of believer's baptism, accusing the Smyth congregation of returning to a form of apostolic succession by wanting to merge with the Mennonites; Smyth denied the charge, arguing that it is permissible to reinitiate believer's baptism but that this should be done only when baptism is not available from other baptized believers. The Helwys faction returned to England by 1612 and founded the GENERAL BAPTISTS.

Smyth died of tuberculosis in Amsterdam in 1612. In his Last Book (1612), Smyth affirmed his final theological position but repented some of his harshness in theological debate. In a biography published with the Last Book, his congregation briefly described his godly life and godly death at the end of August 1612. A common feature throughout Smyth's written works is the use of Aristotelian logic. Also central to his thought, beginning with The Differences of the Churches of the Separation, was a strong distinction between Old Testament and New Testament, letter and Spirit, sinners and saints, false churches and true churches. Smyth was accused by his critics of being gifted but unstable for changing his theological positions so frequently, a charge Smyth refuted on the basis of the "further light clause" in the Separatist covenant—the idea that God would progressively lead true Christians into new truth.

See also Arminianism; Baptists; Baptists, Europe; Dissent; Nonconformity

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Smyth, John. The Churches of the Separation. New York: Da Capo Press, 1973.

Smyth, John, and William Thomas Whitley. The Works of John Smyth, Fellow of Christ's College. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1915.

Secondary Sources:

Coggins, James R. John Smyth's Congregation: English Separatism, Mennonite Influence, and the Elect Nation. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1991.

Whitley, W.T., ed. The Works of John Smyth Fellow of Christ's College, 1594–8. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1915.

JAMES R. COGGINS

SOCIAL GOSPEL

The Social Gospel was a diffuse theological movement, emerging in late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century Western Protestantism, that sought to apply Christian teachings to contemporary social reform issues. Integrating evangelical and liberal theological traditions, the Social Gospel is often classified under the larger rubric of “social Christianity” associated with a number of Protestant churches and church leaders in western Europe (chiefly Great Britain) and North America in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. The term “Social Gospel” has been used with greatest regularity to define the theological and social reform initiatives undertaken by church leaders, theologians, and denominations in the United States during the Progressive Era of the early twentieth century. The Social Gospel as a theological movement focused on issues of social salvation. Whereas many Social Gospel leaders continued to emphasize the importance of personal CONVERSION, they also reinterpreted traditional Protestant understandings of soteriology, the theology of SALVATION, to emphasize how Jesus’s social teachings could be applicable to questions of economic justice and social equality. Although never a unified theological tradition, Social Gospel proponents articulated an optimistic theology, stressing human potential, the imperative for social reform, and the creation of a just social order. The most influential exponents of the tradition in Western Protestantism included the American church leaders WASHINGTON GLADDEN and WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH.

The Social Gospel served as a major catalyst for the emergence of the Protestant ecumenical movement in the twentieth century, symbolized by the founding in the United States in 1908 of the Federal Council of Churches in Christ (see ECUMENISM). Although the Social Gospel would be eclipsed by NEO-ORTHODOXY after World War I, the tradition remained influential in Western Protestantism up through World War II. Social Gospel theological themes, stressing social equality and the interrelationship between Christian theology and secular politics, were evident in many social movements and theological traditions in the latter half of the twentieth century, including the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT and genres of LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

The Rise of the Social Gospel

Scholars have identified the emergence of the Social Gospel as a response to late nineteenth-century industrialization in the United States. At the same time the Social Gospel was also a theological synthesis emerging from a variety of disparate developments impacting North America and western Europe in the late nineteenth century.

Four factors may be cited to explain the emergence of the Social Gospel as a historical and theological tradition. First, the Social Gospel's roots can be connected to American postmillennial evangelical revivalism of the early and mid-nineteenth century. Focusing on the aftermath of the Second Great AWAKENING, scholars have linked the Social Gospel's rise to the social reform crusades that emerged in the first half of the nineteenth century. Although early and mid-nineteenth century Protestant evangelicals such as CHARLES FINNEY and PHOEBE PALMER advocated an individualistic view of Christian salvation, their view of salvation emphasized the Christian's responsibility to reform society. This belief in personal salvation led many antebellum Protestants to address social issues related to temperance reform, women's rights, and the abolition of SLAVERY.

The legacy of Protestant evangelicalism spawned a number of movements in the late nineteenth century that became important conduits for the Social Gospel's emergence in Europe and North America. Organizations such as the YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION (YMCA) and the Student Volunteer Movement, a Protestant ecumenical organization that recruited university students for foreign missionary service, produced many leaders who would become associated with the Social Gospel in the early twentieth century (see MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS). Although proponents of the Social Gospel moved beyond a solitary focus on personal salvation, the movement by and large continued to stress the importance of individual salvation as a necessary component to build a just society.

The second factor contributing to the Social Gospel, and one cited by the majority of scholars as the primary catalyst for the tradition's emergence, was the rise of liberal theology in the latter half of the nineteenth century (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERATION). Embodied by theologians and ministers like ALBRECHT BENJAMIN RITSCHL, HORACE BUSHNELL, and HENRY WARD BEECHER, liberal theology served as a transition between traditional Protestant evangelicalism of the early nineteenth century and emerging theologies of the Social Gospel by the end of that century.

As opposed to a view of God's transcendence and separateness from history, liberal theologians stressed God's imminence and involvement within historical processes. Additionally, the development of liberal theology paralleled the emergence of biblical criticism from Germany. Both movements shared similar intellectual suppositions, including a tendency to view emerging nineteenth-century developments in the natural sciences, including DARWINISM, favorably.

Although not all liberal theologians embraced what would become the Social Gospel, the majority of the Social Gospel's theological exponents emerged from the legacy of liberal Protestantism. By the end of the nineteenth century, Social Gospel liberal theologians emphasized how the prophetic witness of the Old Testament prophets and Jesus's ethical teachings in the synoptic gospels could enable churches to address contemporary social problems. Among the prominent liberal theologians associated with the Social Gospel were SHAILER MATHEWS (1863–1941), a professor of New Testament at the University of Chicago, and Francis Peabody (1847–1936), a professor of ethics at Harvard University. Mathews's The Social Teaching of Jesus (1897) and Peabody's Jesus Christ and the Social Question (1900) investigated the historical context of Jesus's ministry, relating Christ's teaching to contemporary social problems. These works highlight the way many Social Gospel leaders in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries applied liberal theology and emerging currents in biblical scholarship to specific questions of social reform.

The rise of liberal theology also paved the way for the emergence of several Protestant clergy whose sermons and writings in the 1880s and 1890s are often seen as marking the beginning of the Social Gospel as a historical era in Western Protestantism. The minister often identified as the first major proponent of the Social Gospel was Washington Gladden. Throughout his career as a Congregational minister, Gladden authored several books dealing with the church's relationship to labor and capital. Like many early Social Gospel leaders, his reform agenda stressed the application of Christian social teachings to the pressing problems of urbanization and INDUSTRIALIZATION. The popularity of Washington Gladden's writings in the 1880s and 1890s coincided with the emergence of other Social Gospel clerics, whose writings became popular in both North America and Europe. These clergy included American Congregationalists Theodore Munger (1830–1910), whose book The Freedom of Faith (1883) was considered one of the most influential studies of theological liberalism, and Lyman Abbott (1835–1922), editor of the Progressive Era periodical, The Outlook. In Great Britain several clergy played a major role in propagating the rise of the Social Gospel, including the Methodist leader Hugh Price Hughes (1847–1902). Although these late nineteenth-century clergy leaders were influenced strongly by liberal theology, they also emphasized a personal piety reminiscent of earlier Protestant evangelicalism.

The intersection between Protestant evangelicalism and theological liberalism was also evident in a number of popular books published in North America and Europe in the late nineteenth century, the most prominent of which was CHARLES SHELDON'S 1896 novel, In His Steps. Sheldon's novel closely modeled William Stead's 1894 book, If Christ Came to Chicago! Stead (1849–1912), a prominent British journalist, detailed Chicago economic conditions in the 1890s, calling on churches to follow the example of Christ by serving the city's poor. Sheldon's novel describes the efforts of a congregation in a fictitious midwestern American city to follow Jesus's teachings for one year, asking one another the question, "What Would Jesus Do?" He explored many themes that became theological cornerstones for the Social Gospel. First, Sheldon emphasized the synoptic model of Jesus's ministry, epitomized by the teachings of Jesus's Sermon on the Mount. Second, his novel illustrated the vision, prominent among many American Protestant church leaders of that era, of creating a unified Protestant global culture. This vision of a "Christianized" Protestant society was predicated on the cultural assumptions held by the majority of Anglo-American Social Gospel leaders in the late nineteenth century. The book that epitomized this vision of Protestant culture was Josiah Strong's 1885 book, Our Country. A Congregational minister, Strong (1847–1916) reflected the hope that Protestant churches in America and western Europe (primarily Great Britain) could build a Christian cooperative society. His vision of a Christian commonwealth echoed both evangelical and liberal themes characteristic of many late nineteenth-century Social Gospel leaders.

A third factor contributing to the rise of the Social Gospel was the popularity in the second half of the nineteenth century of what has been termed Christian socialism (see SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN). Church leaders associated with this movement attempted to integrate liberal Christian teachings directly with emerging political and economic theories of nineteenth-century democratic socialism. Like other proponents of the Social Gospel, Christian socialists focused their analysis primarily on the social problems associated with nineteenth-century urbanization, stressing the importance of labor reform. In some cases, Christian socialists encouraged political mobilization and alliances with secular socialist organizations and political parties. The rise of the Social Gospel in Great Britain and the United States has been linked primarily with several clergy within the Anglican Church in Great Britain and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. The popular writings of Anglican church leaders such as F.D. Maurice and CHARLES KINGSLEY created a foundation for Christian socialism in the 1840s and 1850s. A strong tradition of Christian socialism also existed within German Protestantism in the late nineteenth century, represented by church leaders such as ADOLF STOECKER (1835–1908), a pastor in the German Evangelical Church.

These currents of Christian socialism played a key role in the emergence of numerous Christian socialist societies in North America and Europe in the 1880s and 1890s that have been associated with the rise of the Social Gospel. Examples of these Social Gospel fellowships include the Christian Social Union, founded by the Anglican Church in 1889; the Church Association for the Advancement of the Interests of Labor and the Society of Christian Socialists, founded by the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1887 and 1889, respectively; and the Brotherhood of the Kingdom, founded in 1892 by a group of American Baptist clergy. Christian socialist teachings were also evident in such leaders as George Herron (1862–1925), Congregational minister and professor at Grinnell College in Iowa, and William Dwight Porter Bliss (1856–1926), Episcopal clergyman and editor of the Encyclopedia of Social Reform (1897), considered the first comprehensive study of nineteenth-century social Christianity. Although some Christian socialists, like Herron, argued strongly for a political model of democratic socialism, the majority of Christian socialist movements tended to be non-doctrinal, stressing social equality among the rich and poor.

The most influential figure associated with Christian socialism in the Social Gospel era was the American economist, Richard T. Ely (1854–1943). A professor of economics at Johns Hopkins University and the University of Wisconsin, Ely's writings used liberal Protestant theological themes concerning Jesus's teachings, relating them to questions of emerging socioeconomic theory. He was a founder of the American Economic Association, and his popularity in the 1880s and 1890s reflected a growing interest among British and North American church leaders in the wider application of the social sciences (especially sociology) to questions of Christian faith and practice.

A final factor that contributed to the rise of the Social Gospel was the impact of a number of women's organizations. These groups were connected to the tradition of Protestant voluntary societies in the antebellum United States. In the aftermath of the American CIVIL WAR, Protestant women established organizations that often addressed social problems associated with urban reform.

Included in the rubric of women's organizations that served as precursors to the Social Gospel were denominational home missionary and deaconess societies, founded primarily to provide a way for women to work in a variety of intercity ministries to the poor. The rise of the home missionary movement in the 1880s within American Protestantism often complemented the intercity mission work of the institutional Settlement House movement of the times. The Settlement House movement, represented by leaders like Samuel Barnett (1844–1913), Graham Taylor (1854–1938), and Jane Addams (1860–1935), was designed to offer fellowship and self-help initiatives to poor urban residents and, in the American context, to recent immigrants. The movement integrated many secular philanthropic ideals within distinctive liberal theological and Christian socialist underpinnings, becoming a main reform movement during the Progressive Era.

Another women's organization reflecting an emerging Social Gospel consciousness was the Woman's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU). Established in 1874 as an organization devoted to enacting temperance reform in North America and Great Britain, its most prominent leader was FRANCES WILLARD. As the longtime president of the WCTU, Willard's interests ranged broadly from women's suffrage to economic reform. Although American leaders like Willard reflected a distinctive piety reflective of earlier Protestant evangelicalism, many of these women also carried a strong interest in liberal theology and Christian socialism, serving as an important linkage between Social Gospel leaders in North America and Great Britain.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, women's organizations, Christian socialists, popular writers, ministers, and theologians were drawn to the Chautauqua Institute in western New York State. Established in the 1870s as part of the SUNDAY SCHOOL movement in the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Chautauqua Institute became a major Progressive Era arena for speakers on social questions, including many representatives of the Social Gospel. The model of the Chautauqua Institute spawned regional Chautauquas, held throughout the United States until the early twentieth century, that featured prominent spokespersons of the Social Gospel.

Although early Social Gospel church leaders advocated solidarity with the working class and poor, the movement defined itself largely around the interests of white middle-class Protestant suppositions, often neglecting issues focused on racial justice. At the same time, however, a distinctive Social Gospel legacy emerged within African American churches, producing clergy and women's organizations committed to racial justice (see AFRICAN AMERICAN PROTESTANTISM). One of the most prominent African-American leaders associated with the Social Gospel was Reverdy Ransom (1861–1952). Ransom, a minister and later bishop in the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, established numerous churches that engaged in urban settlement work directed toward African Americans. Some African-American Social Gospel leaders were also instrumental in the organization in 1909 and the early leadership of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), one of the major civil rights organizations of the twentieth century. Scholarly debate continues, however, as to how the social ministries of African-American Protestantism fit into the larger Social Gospel movement in the United States.

The Maturity of the Social Gospel

The individual most identified with Protestant institutional acceptance of the Social Gospel was the German-American Baptist clergyman Walter Rauschenbusch. His formative writings, written between 1907 and his death in 1918, emphasized the interconnection between the doctrine of the KINGDOM OF GOD and contemporary imperatives for Christian social reform. More critical of economic capitalism than leaders like Josiah Strong and Washington Gladden, Rauschenbusch's theology rejected purely eschatological understandings of Christianity, maintaining that the Christian imperative to build the Kingdom of God required harsh judgments against the social and economic values of Western society. He believed that Jesus's condemnation of wealth needed to be taken literally as an indictment against contemporary socioeconomic conditions and challenged Protestant churches to devote their ministries to eradicate these inequalities. His books, including Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907), Christianizing the Social Order (1912), and A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917), resonated with many church leaders who identified themselves with the Social Gospel and were widely read in North America and Europe.

Rauschenbusch's popularity was a catalyst for numerous publications emphasizing similar themes, and related to the imperative of churches to engage both theologically and practically in questions of socioeconomic reform. Prominent Social Gospel authors in the first two decades of the twentieth century included Vida Scudder (1861–1954), American Episcopalian laywoman and college professor; Samuel Batten (1859–1925), American Baptist clergyman; Charles Stelzle (1869–1941), American Presbyterian minister; and George Albert Coe (1862–1951), American Methodist clergyman and professor. Some Social Gospel leaders, like Stelzle, became active in the creation of institutional churches designed to provide outreach and ministry to poor urban populations. Other leaders of the movement wrote popular Protestant hymns, including "O Master Let Me Walk With Thee" by Washington Gladden and "Where Cross The Crowded Ways of Life," written by Methodist clergyman and ecumenical leader Frank Mason North (1850–1935). The rise of the Social Gospel also paralleled a similar movement of social Christianity within the Roman Catholic Church in the United States. The most prominent exponent of the Social Gospel in American Catholicism was the economist John Ryan (1869–1945).

Rauschenbusch's popularity symbolized the apex of the Social Gospel tradition in the United States, before American entry into World War I in 1917. Although Social Gospel proponents never formed a majority of Protestant church members, the movement's leaders became associated with numerous reform efforts within churches and in wider secular reform movements in the Progressive Era. In particular the ideals of the Social Gospel were embraced by many influential denominational church leaders by the second decade of the twentieth century. Symbolic of this acceptance was the establishment in 1908 of the Federal Council of Churches in Christ in the United States (FCC). The foundation of the Federal Council coincided with the creation of a number of denominational organizations and caucuses designed to promote awareness of social questions within their traditions.

The most influential denominational Social Gospel organization in the early twentieth century was the Methodist Federation for Social Service (MFSS). Founded in 1907 by five American Methodist clergy, the work of the MFSS was instrumental in leading the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1908 to adopt the first social creed by any American Protestant denomination—a creed that formed the basis for the one adopted later that year by the Federal Council of Churches (see METHODISM, NORTH AMERICA). Among the primary issues addressed by the Methodist and Federal Council creeds were limitations on working hours, the abolition of child labor, and the assertion that the Golden Rule of Christ be applied as the primary law to govern societal conduct. For the next decade the Federal Council's Commission on Social Service conducted numerous social survey reports designed to enable Protestant churches to eradicate social problems in both urban and rural contexts. The efforts of the Federal Council were supplemented by numerous Protestant initiatives intended to promote social service efforts in denominations, ecumenical assemblies, and local churches.

The early twentieth century also witnessed the emergence of a strong Social Gospel tradition in Canadian Protestantism that included leaders such as J.S. Woodworth (1874–1942) and Charles Gordon (pseudonym, Ralph Connor) (1860–1937). Although Canadian churches and leaders developed social service and ecumenical ministries that paralleled their American counterparts, the Canadian context produced one institutional synthesis that never occurred in the United States or Great Britain: the creation of a new denomination. The growing prominence of the Social Gospel tradition in both the Presbyterian and Methodist churches in Canada was a contributing factor to the creation of the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA in 1925.

Although the Social Gospel has been credited with giving Protestant churches in the United States a vision of theological and cultural unity, the rise of the movement also signaled a growing theological rift within Western Protestantism. The emergence of PENTECOSTALISM and FUNDAMENTALISM in the early twentieth century signified what would become a divide between Protestants who believed exclusively in individualistic views of salvation and the literal interpretation of scripture and liberals who stressed diverse modes of interpretation. In this regard the liberal imprint of the Social Gospel contributed to the fundamentalist-modernist controversy that would lead to divisions in Western Protestantism after World War I.

Decline

The Social Gospel went into decline as a theological movement in the United States after World War I. Although scholars have pointed to the deaths in 1918 of Walter Rauschenbusch and Washington Gladden as a sign of the tradition's demise, the theological idealism of the Social Gospel remained prominent in Western Protestantism in the aftermath of World War I. Two factors can be identified as contributing to the movement's decline: the theological fractioning of the tradition and the rise of the theological tradition of NEO-ORTHODOXY.

The immediate cause for the decline of the Social Gospel was the splintering of the tradition's proponents in the aftermath of World War I. In 1918 the founding of the INTERCHURCH WORLD MOVEMENT (IWM) in the United States was a symbol for many Social Gospel leaders of their longstanding hope of building a cooperative world society in which Protestant churches would play the primary role. American postwar dissent, however, characterized by a series of major labor strikes and the vitriolic reaction of the American public against the 1917 Russian Revolution, created a rift among many Social Gospel proponents. Some proponents favored more gradualist reform initiatives and viewed the Allied victory in World War I as a sign of the coming Kingdom of God in Western society. Other church leaders, however, emerged dis-illusioned by the war's outcome. Many Social Gospel ministers, such as HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK, had served as YMCA chaplains in western Europe at the climax of World War I. Their experiences in Europe led to the emergence of a strong movement of Christian pacifism in American Protestantism during the 1920s.

Additionally, many Protestant leaders embraced more radical visions of Christian socialism, inspired partly by the example of communism in the Soviet Union. Several Social Gospel leaders were concerned about the American government's crackdown against the civil liberties of left-wing movements after World War I and became active in the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). The resulting factionalism among Social Gospel leaders contributed to a disintegration of the IWM and symbolized the emerging fragmentation of the earlier Protestant vision of building a unified Protestant society based on Western cultural suppositions.

Second, the ascendancy of Neo-orthodoxy in the 1920s and 1930s challenged many of the liberal theological underpinnings of the Social Gospel. The writings of the Swiss theologian KARL BARTH signaled a strong theological challenge to the liberal idealism of the Social Gospel. In the United States the writings of REINHOLD NIEBUHR were especially important in challenging the optimistic, liberal theological roots of the Social Gospel. Niebuhr's 1932 work, Moral Man and Immoral Society, symbolized a growing disillusionment with theological liberalism among many church leaders in the wake of America's Great Depression and the rise of international fascism.

The neo-orthodox critique of the Social Gospel centered on two primary points. First, theologians like Reinhold Niebuhr and his brother H. RICHARD NIEBUHR critiqued the Social Gospel for its failure to differentiate the message of the Gospel from historical events. In juxtaposition to the Social Gospel emphasis that God worked through human institutions, the neoorthodox movement stressed God's transcendence and the view that salvation could not be understood as solely connected to historical processes. Second, although not dismissing the imperative to work for social justice, neo-orthodox theologians attacked the Social Gospel for what it believed was the tradition's myopic view of human progress. The movement's leaders reacted to the rise of European fascism in the 1930s and critiqued the Social Gospel for its inability to develop an adequate theology of sin. Although some neo-orthodox theologians credited a few Social Gospel leaders such as Rauschenbusch for maintaining a theology that held in tension divine sovereignty and God's involvement in history, neo-orthodoxy castigated the general tendency of the Social Gospel to overemphasize human goodness and the perfectibility of society.

At the same time, the heirs to the Social Gospel theological tradition remained prominent in both British and North American Protestantism throughout the 1920s and 1930s. WILLIAM TEMPLE, Anglican clergyman and later the archbishop of Canterbury, was a major leader of the international ecumenical movement that emerged in the aftermath of World War I. The “Life and Work Conference” held in 1925 in Stockholm, Sweden, frequently viewed as the first modern international ecumenical conference of the twentieth century, echoed many of the predominant themes and theological suppositions of the Social Gospel, especially the conference’s emphasis on the Kingdom of God. In the United States, several clergy, theologians, and church leaders continued to propagate many of the reform sentiments of the Social Gospel. In addition to Fosdick, influential liberal leaders who rose to prominence in the 1920s and 1930s included Francis McConnell (1871–1953) and G. Bromley Oxnam (1891–1963), both Methodist bishops, and GEORGIA HARKNESS, the first woman to hold an academic chair of theology in a North American theological seminary.

The 1920s and 1930s also witnessed the growing popularity of the Protestant periodical The Christian Century. This periodical’s writers and its longtime editor CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON (1874–1966) reflected many germane theological emphases of the Social Gospel that related to theological liberalism and Christian pacifism. Distinctive themes of Social Gospel liberalism were also evident in the teachings of non-Western religious leaders in the 1930s, including Indian independence leader Mohandas Gandhi (1869–1948) and the Japanese Protestant leader TOYOHICO KAGAWA. The writings of these leaders were very popular within Western Protestantism, contributing to the growth of pacifist movements in Western Protestantism before World War II.

Many of the practical ideals espoused by Social Gospel leaders before World War I, particularly regarding government regulation of economic practices in the private sector, were enacted legislatively in many Western nations. In America the dissemination of Social Gospel ideals was evident within the state-sponsored economic initiatives enacted during the presidential administrations of Franklin Roosevelt in the 1930s. By the beginning of World War II, however, the majority of Western Protestant leaders had rejected the earlier progressive ideology of the Social Gospel era.

Assessment

Scholarship on the Social Gospel highlights the difficulty of defining the tradition because it never embodied a coherent systematic theological tradition. However, the tendency to apply the term “Social Gospel” chiefly to Protestant developments in the United States reflects the association of the tradition with the larger history of American Protestantism. The Social Gospel was analogous to the final historical era in American Protestantism in which Protestant churches assumed a taken-for-granted hegemony over the dominant religious and cultural lives of most Americans. As a historical movement, the Social Gospel reflected many of the cultural and class biases associated with the larger movement of progressivism in western Europe and North American society. The decline of the Social Gospel movement symbolized the ultimate demise of a larger Protestant vision of religious and cultural unity.

At the same time, the Social Gospel had a major impact on the future historical and theological development of twentieth-century Protestantism. The Social Gospel theological legacy stressed the necessity that Christian faith be integrated within the social institutions of secular society. This theme was critical to the subsequent development of many twentieth-century mainline Protestant traditions whose ministries were predicated on a belief that the church needed to embrace and reform social, political, religious, and cultural institutions. The Social Gospel also contributed to a larger theological tradition that Christian belief and practice needed to work on behalf of the poor and the oppressed in society. In addition to the impact of the tradition on twentieth-century ecumenical social teachings, the theological writings of the Social Gospel have had a germane influence on many currents in late twentieth-century theology and social ethics. The American civil rights leader and Baptist minister MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. cited Walter Rauschenbusch as one of his major intellectual influences. Theological themes of many Social Gospel writers, especially the tradition's emphasis on the rights of the poor, have been evident within currents of late twentieth-century liberation theology.

The Social Gospel embodied a high optimism in human progress that accentuated many of the larger social and theological aspirations of Western Protestant churches in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. At the same time, the tradition crafted a larger legacy of social activism that has been a pre-dominant feature of many Protestant leaders and denominations throughout the twentieth century.

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Richard. The Social Passion: Religion and Social Reform in Canada, 1914–28. Toronto and Buffalo: University of Toronto Press, 1971.
- Carter, Paul. The Decline and Revival of the Social Gospel: Social and Political Liberalism in American Protestant Churches, 1920–1940. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1954.
- Dorrien, Gary J. Soul in Society: The Making and Renewal of Social Christianity. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1995.
- Evans, Christopher H., ed. Perspectives on the Social Gospel. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1999.
- Fishburn, Janet Forsythe. The Fatherhood of God and the Victorian Family: The Social Gospel in America. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1981.
- Gorrell, Donald K. The Age of Social Responsibility: The Social Gospel in the Progressive Era, 1900–1920. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1988.
- Handy, Robert T., ed. The Social Gospel in America: 1870–1920. New York: Oxford University Press, 1966.
- Hopkins, Charles Howard. The Rise of the Social Gospel in American Protestantism. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1940.

- Hutchison, William R. "The Americanness of the Social Gospel: An Inquiry into Contemporary History." Church History 44 (1975):367–381.
- King, William McGuire. "'History as Revelation' in the Theology of the Social Gospel." Harvard Theological Review 76 no. 1 (1983):109–129.
- Lindley, Susan Hill. "'Neglected Voices' and Praxis in the Social Gospel." Journal of Religious Ethics 18 (1990): 75–101.
- Lindsey, William D. "Taking a New Look at the Social Gospel." In Shailer Mathews's Lives of Jesus: The Search for a Theological Foundation for the Social Gospel, 1–33. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997.
- Luker, Ralph E. The Social Gospel in Black and White: American Racial Reform, 1885–1912. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.
- McDowell, John Patrick. The Social Gospel in the South: The Woman's Home Mission Movement in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, 1886–1939. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1982.
- Phillips, Paul T. A Kingdom on Earth: Anglo-American Social Christianity, 1880–1940. University Park: The Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996.
- White, Ronald C., Jr., and C.Howard Hopkins. The Social Gospel: Religion and Reform in Changing America. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1976.

CHRISTOPHER H.EVANS

SOCIAL REFORMERS AND PREACHERS

See Social Gospel

SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN

Although Socialism arose as a Continental European phenomenon, the term “Christian Socialism” is generally used to describe a particular Protestant movement that originated in ENGLAND around 1848. Led mainly by Anglican priests this movement responded to the severe economic crisis, which had created great hardship among English industrial workers, as well as to the widespread influence of capitalist economic thought that praised competitive business and self-interest. Christian Socialists sought to create a more just society in which the working class could earn fair wages, have decent standards of living and education, and share political responsibilities with the middle and upper classes. They believed that any economic order should be based on a sense of fellowship among human beings as equal children of God, and they were confident that true Christian belief would necessarily lead to socialist principles and action, including cooperation and shared ownership of certain kinds of property. Although Christian Socialism declined in England in the 1850s (with a revival in the 1880s), socialist ideals were later taken up in other countries and by other schools of Christian thought such as LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM and LIBERATION THEOLOGY. Historically, Christian Socialism as a school of thought tended to flourish most where economic and political injustice is felt most keenly, whereas it often fades into the background during times of prosperity.

Background and Context in England

In 1776 Adam Smith (1723–1790) published Wealth of Nations, which is generally considered to mark the beginning of political economy as a discipline (see ECONOMICS). In it he proposed that human economic behavior (like working, buying, and selling) is motivated by individual self-interest, but that even when individuals act selfishly, a force (sometimes referred to as an “invisible hand”) guides their actions so as to work toward the benefit of society as a whole. Because of this faith that the economy essentially runs by itself, Smith and his successors thought the most appropriate way for governments to handle economics was through laissez-faire capitalism; that is, to leave people and markets alone and let them act without too many regulations. This kind of freedom would ensure the best outcome for everybody.

The trouble that many people found with this view of economics was that wealthy people who owned the means of production tended to benefit the most, whereas wage laborers tended to suffer. This was especially true when the economy was weak and there were not enough jobs to go around, as was the case in England in the mid-nineteenth century. As a result members of the working class had begun to call for government action. In the 1820s and 1830s a socialist named Robert Owen (1771–1858) had advocated trade unions for laborers as a way for them to earn better wages, but struggles and failures within the Owenite movement caused it to fail. Another movement, Chartism (named for the People’s Charter of 1838), called for political reform, including voting rights for all males, although Chartism, too, lacked unified leadership, as well as being undermined by trade unionism, and this movement had also failed.

Socialism in France and Germany

As INDUSTRIALIZATION began to spread, and with it the ideals of capitalism, workers found themselves laboring under cruel conditions with little or no power to change them. A number of French thinkers began to argue for socialist ideals—such as cooperation among workers and the sharing of wealth—often with a religious flavor. Henri de Saint-Simon (1760–1825) said Jesus’s golden rule of loving one’s neighbor as oneself should govern both employers and laborers. Pierre Leroux (1797–1871), one of the first to use the term “socialism” in FRANCE, called Jesus the “greatest economist” and advocated making the kingdom of God a reality on earth. Hugues-Félicité Robert de Lamennais (1782–1854), a Catholic priest, undertook social reform with the idea that society would be most just under the head of the church, although he denied that he was a socialist if socialism meant the abolition of private property. Other French socialist thinkers were less overtly religious. In 1840 Pierre Joseph Proudhon (1809–1865) published his pamphlet What is Property?, in which he declared that private property is essentially theft.

Socialism in France remained a largely intellectual movement until workers themselves began joining in. In Paris in 1848 conditions were ripe for revolt; industrial workers were concentrated in the city, but because of recent crop failures and subsequent depression, unemployment was high and living conditions were harsh. Tensions came to a head at a demonstration in June and workers began to riot, leading to the accidental death of Archbishop Denis-Auguste Affre, who had been sympathetic to the workers’ cause. In addition thousands of other demonstrators were killed by government forces. With this violent revolt, the poor lost much political support from the Catholic Church. Because workers and their intellectual allies felt the church had turned against them, French socialism developed with a largely anticlerical tone and did not use the qualifier “Christian.”

Socialism was moving among German-speaking people as well. Franz von Baader (1765–1841), a Catholic layperson and prolific writer who admired Lammenais, was the first to write in German of a “Christian social principle,” by which he meant Jesus’s command to love God and love one’s neighbor as oneself. Later on, the Catholic archbishop of Mainz, Wilhelm Emmanuel von Ketteler (1811–1877), who felt a special concern for the plight of workers and the poor, would continue to seek a “third way” between unquestioned capitalism and greed on the one hand and total COMMUNISM of property on the other. Drawing largely from the writings of Thomas Aquinas, Ketteler affirmed the human right to own private property (and therefore rejected political socialism), but he qualified this right by emphasizing that all creation is ultimately God's and therefore to be used for the common good. He called on wealthy Christians not only to give alms for the poor, but also to address the actual causes of poverty; and he encouraged laborers to form associations or trade unions to improve their wages and working conditions. There were a small number of Protestants who also aligned themselves with the Catholic social movement in GERMANY, such as Victor Aimé Huber (1800–1869) and Lutheran pastor JOHANN HEINRICH WICHERN (1808–1881), although political hostility between Catholics and Protestants at the time prevented widespread collaboration. German-speaking Protestants, including LEONHARD RAGAZ (1868–1945) and Swiss theologian KARL BARTH (1886–1968), would become more prominent in the religious socialism of the twentieth century.

Although socialist causes in Germany enjoyed greater support from Catholics than in France, not all German-speaking socialists were open to Christian influences. A group of German exiles who called themselves the Communist League gathered in Brussels in 1847. Among them were Karl Marx (1818–1883) and Friedrich Engels (1820–1895) who would publish the Communist Manifesto in London in 1848. Marx believed religion was little more than an “opi-ate” for the poor, a tool to keep them resigned to their low status in life, and he wanted his movement to have nothing to do with Christian ideas of any kind. He referred to Ketteler as a “dog,” and attacked one of his predecessors in the socialist movement, Wilhelm Weitling (1808–1871), who portrayed Jesus as a revolutionary communist and favored the abolition of private property as the means to fight poverty. Steeped in the tradition of Adam Smith, Marx believed economics should be treated scientifically rather than morally, and he sought to create a nonreligious basis for socialism that relied less on ethical norms and more on social science.

The Christian Socialist Movement in England, 1848–1854

Conditions in England in 1848 seem to have provided the fertile ground necessary for the birth of an explicitly Christian Socialism. England had observed the bloody revolts in France with horror, and fears arose that a similar violent revolt would break out among British workers who were likewise suffering under industrialization. A lawyer, John Malcolm Forbes Ludlow (1821–1911), who had been educated in France, wanted to Christianize the socialism he saw being imported to England from the Continent. He wrote to Anglican vicar FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE (1805–1872) of his idea to start a movement, and together with another clergyman, CHARLES KINGSLEY (1819–1875), they wrote a proclamation for the workers of London telling them that the Anglican Church sympathized with them but encouraged them not to riot (see ANGLICANISM). The group then briefly published a newspaper for workers called Politics for the People, which upheld the ideals of socialism but presented them as Christian, rather than as political, concepts. They redefined “liberty, equality, and fraternity,” watchwords of the FRENCH REVOLUTION, in Christian terms of human connection and fellowship, appealing to common humanity under God rather than precise political or economic equality.

The Christian Socialists also taught against the doctrine of self-interest that had taken hold of politics and economic thought. They were not against the possibility of capitalism in principle, nor against the idea that some people must labor while others own property. Rather than self-interest and competition being the inherent laws of economics, however, Christian Socialism preached that cooperation was God's plan, serving the common good rather than the selfish individual good.

None of those who began this Christian Socialist movement was a member of the working class. To diversify their group, the founders began a BIBLE study under Maurice's leading to which they invited some leaders of the workers' movement. At the same time Maurice began teaching at conferences for workers to bridge the chasm between workers and the church, which workers tended to associate with the wealthy. He also taught to educate the bourgeoisie, who (because of what they had seen in Europe) associated the term "socialism" with atheism and general immorality. Maurice believed that the CHURCH—which was "communist in principle"—was the only body in which all were included and equal; but he believed strongly that the state was not meant to be communist. Although all are equals in the sight of God, the state rests on the need for diversity and even inequality.

The Christian Socialist movement was thus more Christian than socialist in 1848. This changed somewhat when the group came into contact with a French socialist, Jules St. Andre le Chevalier (1806–1862), who helped to politicize the movement. They learned from him more about the socialist principles of Saint-Simon, Charles Fourier (1772–1837), Proudhon, and others; and he learned from them to believe that the church was the true embodiment of the socialist principles of fellowship or "association." The task of Christian Socialism was thus laid out more clearly: to challenge the theory of political economy that glorified competition, and to set good examples of Christian production, distribution, and consumption. With this, Christian Socialism moved out of the realm of ideas toward a policy of action. They began setting up workers' associations that divided profits on labor, as a way of protesting against competition and demonstrating that cooperation could work.

Maurice began publishing Tracts on Christian Socialism in 1850 to make the movement's objectives clear to the public. He wrote that the only true foundation for socialism was Christianity, and that Christianity would necessarily lead to socialism. He rejected any socialism that did not have its basis in religion (this would include Marxism) and also blamed church leaders for not teaching Christianity properly. Fellowship was God's natural order for humankind, but competition was a creation of human sinfulness. Socialism was thus not a threat to social order nor was it even a political agenda, but was a way of organizing society on Christian principles.

As Maurice sought to educate the upper classes, Ludlow began to publish another newspaper in 1850, The Christian Socialist, to correct what he considered wrong socialist views among workers. He emphasized that socialism was primarily spiritual, a church movement seeking to realize itself in the world of industry. Any economic system not based on the teachings of Christ was wrong; thus the "laws" of economics as seen by political economy were false. Unlike Maurice, Ludlow was in favor of common property, given that he believed Christian principles left no room for class distinctions. He approved of a democracy in which all members have equal rights and duties, and this led him to call also for reform in the Anglican Church itself, which he believed was too hierarchical.

As the movement grew it established a board to administer what it now called the “Society for Promoting Working Men’s Associations” (SPWMA). Whereas Ludlow and others focused mainly on producer-based cooperation (e.g., the Working Tailors’ Association), some in the group, such as Edward Neale, began to focus on consumer-based cooperation, setting up the Central Co-operative Agency. Ludlow feared consumer associations (for purposes of acquiring goods) were not as spiritual as producer associations. Ludlow and Neale also clashed on whether members of the movement should necessarily be Christian; Neale felt it was more important to include as many people as possible than to insist on Christian doctrines. Maurice sided with Neale; he also believed (against Ludlow) that Christian Socialism should not seek to become a political party. The name of The Christian Socialist was changed in 1852 to the Journal of Association, and because of Maurice’s fame, Christian Socialism under his leadership gained much sympathy among workers and wealthy alike. Association was seen as being good for the poor and workers and it helped revive England’s social conscience. It opened the door among politicians for serious thought about socialism and cooperation, which had previously seemed too threatening. Christian Socialism also stimulated a new tone in trade unionism, eventually leading to legislation that protected workers’ cooperatives.

Nevertheless, the movement had begun its decline. The Journal of Association ceased printing, leading to a loss in profile for the movement. In 1853 Maurice was fired from his teaching position and decided to found a Working Men’s College (1854), which would educate workers to make them fit for greater social responsibility. This model was widely imitated across England. When Maurice shifted his attention and energy from associative movements to EDUCATION, the movement followed, including a disillusioned Ludlow. This marked the end of the first wave of Christian Socialism in England.

Revival and Legacy of Christian Socialism

England enjoyed relative prosperity in the 1860s and 1870s, providing little impetus for workers’ movements, although in the latter 1800s the Fabian Society and trade unions carried on socialist ideals. When recessions hit in the 1880s Christian Socialism found a wide audience again. In 1888 the LAMBETH CONFERENCE of Anglican bishops declared its sympathy for the state taking an active role in improving the workers’ conditions, believing that to be compatible with Christian morals, and by 1900 Christian Socialism had become a prominent political force in England. Christian Socialism encouraged critique of English society and helped to create communication between the church and workers. Thus workers in England did not feel obligated to become either atheists or revolutionary communists, and instead were able to use the tools of democracy to further their objectives. In 1893 a number of Christian Socialists were influential in the formation of the Independent Labour Party.

The great change in the situation between 1848–54 and the 1880s and 1890s must be properly understood. At the former time, Socialism was just beginning. It had no generally accepted definition and little political influence. By the latter time, the working class had grown massively in numbers and political influence, not the least because of the extensions of the franchise. A Socialist party was a major force not only in England but most European countries. Karl Marx had emerged as the most influential Socialist thinker, against whom other Socialists had to define themselves, even if (as in the case of most Christian Socialists) they rejected many of his ideas. Clergymen were now seldom in a position to take a lead in the way Maurice and his colleagues had done in 1848, and the influence of Christian Socialism was exercised mainly through those individuals who became active in trade unions and Socialist parties.

Socialism also caught on in the UNITED STATES. In 1872 the Christian Labor Union formed to promote just wages and just prices; Marxists organized the Socialist Labor Party in 1877; and in 1889 the Society of Christian Socialists was founded. By 1912 the Socialist Party had 120,000 members, 1,200 elected officials, and 300 periodicals, including The Christian Socialist, which had 20,000 readers. What they shared in common was a rejection of the economic principles of competition and INDIVIDUALISM, and a desire to foster a just society through a sense of cooperation and fellowship. American churches were also sympathetic to the movement, and a Protestant theological movement known as the SOCIAL GOSPEL became prominent around the turn of the twentieth century, led by such preachers as WASHINGTON GLADDEN and WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH. These Christians rejected any use of religion as an “opiate of the people” and sought ways to make the KINGDOM OF GOD a reality on earth, not only within the church but also in the realms of politics and economics. The belief that Christianity must include active involvement in the fostering of justice had a deep impact on twentieth-century American theology, and was furthered by such key figures as MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. and JAMES HAL CONE.

The prominence of Christian socialism in England and the United States stood in contrast to Continental Europe, where socialism still had a largely anticlerical tone arising from a persistent sense that the Catholic Church was unsympathetic to workers. Historically the Catholic Church was against socialism because of the church’s belief that private property is in accordance with NATURAL LAW (MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN likewise protected the right to private property against the Anabaptists of their time who promoted common property; see HUTTERITES), as well as because of socialism’s frequent association with atheism and Marxism. In 1891 Pope Leo XIII (who referred to Archbishop Ketteler as “our great predecessor”) sought to address the divide between the church and the poor. After commissioning a number of social and economic study groups in Rome and elsewhere, he wrote his papal encyclical Rerum Novarum (“New Things” or On the Condition of Workers). In it he advocated for workers’ rights, encouraged the formation of Christian labor unions, and called for industrial reforms to improve working conditions. At the same time, however, he still rejected socialism (including Christian socialism) because of its call to abolish private property, as well as because of its previous tendencies toward revolution. Many workers and socialists at the time felt that Leo’s encyclical was too mild in its criticism of capitalism and merely supported the status quo. Nevertheless, the pope's boldness in directly addressing economic matters encouraged Christians to become more engaged in politics. Catholic popes after Leo, including John XXIII and John Paul II, took seriously the need to protect workers from the more extreme consequences of capitalism. They rejected the idea that humans were merely instruments of production and, although they did not embrace socialism, they affirmed that much of what was good in socialist principles could be found in Christianity. Christian Socialism in the late twentieth century, although not calling itself socialism, thus found one of its most persuasive voices in Catholic Liberation Theology. Advocated by such Latin American thinkers as Peruvian priest Gustavo Gutierrez (A Theology of Liberation, 1973), Liberation Theology sought to reconcile Marxist social ideas with Christian theology and ETHICS.

In Germany, an Association of Religious Socialists (Bund Religiöser Sozialisten Deutschlands) was formed after World War I. Small in size, this association consisted of both those who sought to combine Marxian socialism with Christianity and those who were concerned about a proper Christian response to the various social issues and problems of the day. In a way, the pioneering efforts in this regard had come from SWITZERLAND already, late in the nineteenth century, with such figures as HERMANN KUTTER and Leonhard Ragaz. At issue was their conviction that Christianity had not succeeded in dealing with the social issues of the late nineteenth century.

In many European countries, the restructuring of political life after World War II brought the formation of political parties, which combined the terms "Christian" and "Social" or "Socialist" in their names, for example the Christlich Soziale Union in Bavaria. Though mainly supported by Catholics, these parties were a major political force for decades; at this time, however, only in Germany does this legacy continue to exist.

See also Oxford Movement

References and Further Reading

- Christensen, Torben. Origin and History of Christian Socialism 1848–54. Aarhus, Denmark: Universitetsforlaget, 1962.
- The Columbia Encyclopedia*. Sixth edition. New York: Columbia University Press, 2002.
<http://www.bartleby.com/65/ch/Christ-soc.html> (Accessed March 30, 2003).
- Cort, John C. Christian Socialism: An Informal History. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1988.
- Dorrien, Gary. Reconstructing the Common Good: Theology and the Social Order. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1990.
- Jones, Peter D. The Christian Socialist Revival 1877–1914: Religion, Class, and Social Conscience in Late-Victorian England. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1968.
- Kaufmann, M. Christian Socialism. London: Kegan Paul, Trench & Co., 1888.
- Raven, Charles E. Christian Socialism 1848–1854. London: Macmillan & Co., 1920.
- Stauffer, John L. Socialism in the Light of Scripture. Altoona, PA: John L. Stauffer, 1959.
- Wilkinson, Alan. Christian Socialism: Scott Holland to Tony Blair. London: SCM Press, 1998.

KATHRYN D. BLANCHARD

THE SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE

The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (S.P.C.K.) was founded in 1699 by a CHURCH OF ENGLAND priest, THOMAS BRAY (1656–1730), and four lay associates, supported by the archbishop of Canterbury. Its purpose was to promote “Religion and Learning in any part of His Majesty’s Plantations abroad, and to provide Catechetical Libraries and free Schools in the parishes at home.”

The context in Britain was the GLORIOUS REVOLUTION of 1688, which had secured an unequivocally Protestant monarchy. Here, “at home,” there was need for catechetical and general education for the impoverished mass of children, and provision of theological and general libraries for the poorer clergy. The context “abroad” was the emergent British empire, competing with the imperialism of the Roman Catholic nations, FRANCE and Spain. Bray’s appointment as the bishop of London’s commissary for Maryland alerted him to the needs of the church among settlers, indigenes, and slaves in North America. This appointment also prompted his other great creative achievement in 1701, the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL (S.P.G.), to recruit and send missionaries. These two societies inaugurated Protestant mission from Britain and Ireland, their work largely complementary. They represented a High Church form of Protestantism, exemplified in S.P.C.K.’s provision of bibles bound with the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. As societies dependent on voluntary support, they were characteristic creations of the golden age of philanthropy in Britain.

There have been various aspects to S.P.C.K.’s work in Britain. The commitment to “free Schools” was realized in the eighteenth century through support for the Charity Schools, which catechized and gave extremely basic education to poor children. For similar schools in WALES, S.P.C.K. published books, chiefly religious, in Welsh. The nineteenth century saw the state beginning to assume responsibility for schools, although the Church of England continued to educate large numbers with S.P.C.K. funding teacher training, school inspection, and publishing. Publishing in support of children’s religious education and general theological publishing continued through the twentieth century. Bray’s support for the large number of poor clergy in poor parishes was by the provision of parish libraries, work that S.P.C.K. sustained through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, adding book grants for ordinands.

Initially S.P.C.K.’s work in the “Plantations” was through the provision of libraries, although S.P.G. became increasingly responsible for this in North America. Tens of thousands of books were sent there during the eighteenth century, these having a significant impact on religious and cultural developments. An unexpected but important role for S.P.C.K. came with a request in 1709 to support Lutheran missionaries beginning work then in South India, a role more appropriate to S.P.G. but precluded by its constitution until 1826, when this task was devolved to it. With the extension of British colonial rule S.P.C.K. translation, publishing, and distribution work became virtually global throughout the Anglican Communion. The society entered the third millennium with such work in 120 countries and autonomous sister S.P.C.K. organizations in INDIA, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND, and the UNITED STATES.

References and Further Reading

Clarke, W.K.L. History of the S.P.C.K. London: S.P.C.K., 1959.

Thompson, H.P. Thomas Bray. London: S.P.C.K., 1954.

DANIEL O'CONNOR

THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL

Founded by Royal Charter in 1701, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (SPG) was the CHURCH OF ENGLAND'S response to the Roman Catholic Propaganda Fide (1622). The founder was THOMAS BRAY, previously creator of the SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE (SPCK). Continental Protestants were co-opted. The charter authorized the Society to send missionaries to work among settlers, indigenes, and slaves in areas under British sovereignty, although its range was later widened. More than 400 missionaries, including a number of WOMEN, were sent to North and Central America, the CARIBBEAN and AUSTRALIA in the eighteenth century, and thousands were sent into Asia, South America, the Pacific, and AFRICA in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, laying the foundations of the Anglican Communion of Churches.

Nineteenth-century developments of the Evangelical Revival and the OXFORD MOVEMENT had the effect of fragmenting the Church of England's missionary endeavors, although the SPG continued to seek to serve the whole church. In 1965, amalgamation with the Universities Mission to Central Africa, and subsequently with other, smaller agencies, led to the SPG becoming the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

Educational and medical initiatives accompanied the SPG's evangelizing efforts, with hundreds of schools, colleges, and hospitals established. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, some SPG missionaries (e.g., ROLAND ALLEN, Mark Trollope, and J.C.Winslow) effectively promoted inculturation of church and belief, whereas a small number, including Krishna Mohan Banerjea, CHARLES FREER ANDREWS, and A.S.Cripps, bravely opposed COLONIALISM. In the later twentieth century, the Society was vigorous in opposition to apartheid in SOUTH AFRICA, and, into the twenty-first century, was doing effective medical work in the field of AIDS as well as advocating solutions to global indebtedness.

See also Missions; Missionary Organizations

References and Further Reading

O'Connor, D. Three Centuries of Mission. The United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel 1701–2000. London and New York: Continuum, 2000.

DANIEL O'CONNOR

SOCIETY OF BROTHERS (BRUDERHOF)

In early twentieth century Germany, Eberhard Arnold began a search for “true Christian community” that led him, his family, and a few disciples to establish a small Christian communitarian settlement in the 1920s, later called the Society of Brothers or Bruderhof. University studies in church history acquainted him with Anabaptist Writings (see ANABAPTISM), the most attractive of which were those of the sixteenth-century HUTTERITES, with whom he came to share views of community of goods. Only later did he discover that the Hutterites were not extinct but maintained a vibrant existence in the United States and Canada, still following the centuries-old customs and traditions he had read about. After a lengthy correspondence and a personal visit by Arnold, the Bruderhof in Germany united with the American and Canadian Hutterites in 1931.

The rise of National Socialism and the death of Arnold in 1935 created havoc for the Bruderhof church. Eventually forced out of Germany, the members settled briefly in England. However, with the outbreak of war, English society was uncomfortable with a strange, largely German group in their midst, and again they were forced to leave. They found refuge in Paraguay and Uruguay, where they struggled to survive while holding on to their Christian communitarian outlook and practice. Socioeconomic difficulties and internal strife in South America and the promise of a more suitable situation caused them to migrate en masse in 1961 to the United States where they established settlements in New York, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut. There were later efforts to establish settlements in Germany and Nigeria.

From the beginning of the union of Arnold’s group with the “Western Hutterites” (whose settlements were primarily in the U.S. Midwest and central plains of Canada), distance and circumstance plagued the concerted efforts of both to enrich the relationship. Despite significant ideological and theological similarities, differences in historical background, socioeconomic perspectives, and especially views of what constitutes true Christian discipleship created considerable tension. The “Western Hutterites” share a much narrower, homogeneous Germanic genealogy dating to the mass migration from Hutterite settlements in Russia in the 1880s, and they maintain almost exclusively an agricultural economy. The continued intermarriage within this group over the decades reinforced social homogeneity and their numerical growth was through a high birth rate rather than “outside” converts. On the other hand, the “Eastern Hutterites” (now called Society of Brothers) settled in the north-east United States and developed a small industry economy. Their membership is largely made up of converts from the outside, although a few trace their heritage to the Arnold family and early disciples. They are much more aggressive in EVANGELISM, largely centered on promoting PACIFISM and activism against such practices as capital punishment, and many have joined them from other types of communitarian endeavors. Tensions between the Western Hutterites and the Society have led to periods of estrangement from 1955 to 1974 and from 1995 to the present.

References and Further Reading

- Arnold, Emmy. Torches Together: The Beginning and Early Years of the Bruderhof Communities. Rifton, NY: Plough Publishing House, 1984.
- Bohlken-Zumpe, Elizabeth. Torches Extinguished: Memories of a Communal Bruderhof Childhood in Paraguay, Europe and the USA. San Francisco: Carrier Pigeon Press-The Peregrine Foundation, 1993.
- Brothers Unite: An Account of the Uniting of Eberhard Arnold and the Rhoen Bruderhof with the Hutterian Church*. Edited by Hutterian Brethren in America. Rifton, NY: Plough Publishing House, 1979.
- Mow, Merrill. Torches Rekindled: The Bruderhof's Struggle for Renewal. Rifton, NY: Plough Publishing House, 1989.

WES HARRISON

SOCIETY OF FRIENDS IN NORTH AMERICA

From its English origins in the seventeenth century, the Society of Friends in North America has evolved and splintered to encompass broad diversity, ranging from fundamentalists to devotees of New Age spirituality.

Beginnings

The roots of Quakerism lie in ENGLAND, with GEORGE Fox (1624–1691). Seeking the true church among the competing sects of the English revolution, between 1647 and 1652 Fox had a series of what he called “openings” in which he was convinced that God had spoken directly to him. Among Fox’s teachings were the existence of an “Inward Light” of Christ in all people; direct revelation from God without priestly intermediaries; worship based on silent waiting, with all worshipers theoretically able to preach if led by the Holy Spirit; pacifism; the equality of men and women in the ministry and most religious affairs; and a series of peculiarities, such as a refusal to swear oaths or to use the titles of social superiors. The popular impression that Fox’s followers quaked when under the influence of the Holy Spirit led to the pejorative nick-name “Quaker,” one which Friends began to use themselves.

In 1656 several English Quakers, women prominent among them, visited New England, New Netherland, Maryland, and Virginia. Only in Rhode Island did they find toleration. Persecution was worst in Massachusetts; between 1659 and 1661 Massachusetts authorities hanged three men and one woman.

Persecution in England in the 1660s led Friends to establish colonies in North America as havens. The major Quaker colony was Pennsylvania, granted to WILLIAM PENN (1644–1718) in 1681. Penn’s government was a curious amalgam of Quaker liberalism and medieval lordship; he guaranteed toleration to all Christians, provided for an elected assembly, and tried to deal fairly with Native Americans, while at the same time reserving ultimate authority to himself.

In the mid-eighteenth century, a feeling of spiritual deterioration developed. Quaker leaders, most notably JOHN WOOLMAN (1720–1772), led a reform movement designed to return Friends to spiritual fervor and disciplinary rigor. Through rigid enforcement of church discipline, especially rules against marriage with non-Quakers, this movement was responsible for the loss of thousands of members. On the other hand, while attempting to build up Quaker defenses against “the world,” it made Quakers leaders in various humanitarian movements, particularly those involving American Indians and African Americans. Friends became public opponents of slavery. By 1784 all of the American yearly meetings had ruled that members who owned slaves must free them unconditionally.

The nineteenth century witnessed the splintering of American Quakerism in a series of schisms whose impact is still visible. At their center was an influential minister from Long Island, Elias Hicks (1748–1830). Hicks saw himself as a defender of traditional Quakerism. He emphasized the power and authority of the Inward Light over that of the written Scriptures. He also defined the divinity of Christ in Sabelian terms: Christ had become divine, the Son of God, through His perfect obedience to the Inward Light. Hicks encountered opposition especially among the leaders of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, whose views on Christ and the Bible were similar to those of non-Quaker evangelicals. Their attempts to silence Hicks and his supporters led to a split in 1827 and 1828, with the orthodox emerging as the majority.

Quaker fractiousness continued after this schism. In the 1840s and 1850s Hicksite Friends found themselves badly divided over how they should respond to the abolitionist, women's rights, and nonresistance movements. Some Hicksites, most notably LUCRETIA COFFIN MOTT (1793–1880), championed Quaker participation. A majority of Hicksites were more conservative, denouncing ties with non-Friends as threatening Quaker peculiarity. Many of the radical Hicksite reformers split off to form what they called Congregational or Progressive Friends meetings.

Orthodox Friends also experienced tensions between 1830 and 1860. An English Quaker minister, Joseph John Gurney (1788–1847) championed an evangelical vision of Quakerism, including the necessity for an instantaneous conversion experience, the superiority of the Bible to the Inner Light, and the desirability of joining with non-Quaker evangelicals in good works, such as temperance, education, prison reform, and SUNDAY SCHOOL movements. Gurney traveled in the United States between 1837 and 1840, winning considerable support among a majority of Orthodox Friends, but some Orthodox Friends criticized Gurney as compromising Quaker distinctiveness, most notably Rhode Island Friend John Wilbur (1774–1856).

These gaps widened after the CIVIL WAR. Hicksite Friends became more self-consciously liberal. They also developed or adapted new institutions, like Sunday Schools (First Day Schools for Hicksites), and opened the third Quaker college in the world, Swarthmore in Philadelphia, in 1869. In 1900 the Hicksite yearly meetings merged biennial conferences on education and reform under an umbrella organization, Friends General Conference.

Orthodox Friends changed more radically. After 1870, most Gurneyite Friends meetings were swept up in a wave of revivalism imported largely from the interdenominational second-experience holiness movement. Under its influence, pastors were hired, music and choirs became part of worship, the Peace Testimony was abandoned, and in many places meetings were renamed the "Friends Church." Such Friends also championed Quaker work in foreign missions, laying the groundwork for the growth of Quakerism in AFRICA, LATIN AMERICA, the CARIBBEAN, and Asia. This movement brought in thousands of new members, but also led to a new round of splits between 1877 and 1904.

The 1890s saw a reaction develop among Gurneyites. This movement found its leader in Haverford College professor RUFUS M. JONES (1863–1948), who tried to meld

Quaker doctrine with the modernist movement. But his work, especially his editorship of the periodical, the American Friend, aroused considerable opposition from other Gurneyites, who embraced views that were similar to those of the emerging Fundamentalist movement. Modernist and Fundamentalist Friends battled for control of the central Gurneyite organization, the Five Years Meeting, formed in 1902, culminating in the formation in 1947 of the Association of Evangelical Friends, now known as Evangelical Friends International (EFI).

The most visible Quaker activities in twentieth-century America involved social activism. Best known has been the American Friends Service Committee, formed by Friends of all persuasions in 1917 as a vehicle for Quaker nonviolent service during World War I.

American Quakerism today spans the spectrum of Christianity and beyond. Many pastoral Friends are allied with the most conservative elements of American EVANGELICALISM. Many in the unprogrammed yearly meetings embrace a Universalist outlook that argues that Quakerism is not necessarily Christian or even theistic. Total membership is now about 90,000.

References and Further Reading

- Bacon, Margaret Hope. Mothers of Feminism: The Story of Quaker Women in America. San Francisco: Harpers' Row, 1986.
- Barbour, Hugh, and J. William Frost. The Quakers. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1988.
- Punshon, John. Portrait in Grey: A Short History of the Quakers. London: Quaker Home Service, 1984.

THOMAS D.HAMM

SOCINIANISM

Socinianism refers to a number of Antitrinitarian churches in POLAND, Lithuania, and elsewhere shaped by the thought of FAUSTO PAOLO SOZZINI (see ANTITRINITARIANISM). Several groups and religious entities fall within the definition of eighteenth-century Socinianism. The term itself was created by Protestant theologians in the seventeenth century and was rejected by Socinians. Although “Socinianism” was meant to describe them, they preferred to be called “Christians,” “Polish Brethren,” or “Unitarians.”

History of Socinianism in Poland

Socinianism is considered to be a continuation of sixteenth-century Antitrinitarianism, despite the fact that reforms by Augusto Sozzini changed its doctrinal shape. Between 1601 and 1602 Sozzini worked as a tutor in Rakow, a town that soon became a capital of the movement, which it remained until 1638. In 1606–1609 and 1619 Sozzini’s favored successor Valentius Smalcus continued the work of his teacher. Even though the name of the famous theologian from Siena was remembered, believers themselves opposed being called Socinians.

Rakow was also the place where a Socinian educational institution was founded in 1601. Excellent teaching made this academic institution (the first students arrived in 1603) extremely challenging. No wonder it attracted many Protestant and even Catholic students. The school in Rakow also included a modest theological faculty for future Socinianic clergy. It never regained its former glamour after it was closed in 1638 and moved to Kisielin in the Wolyn district.

Rakow was also the place of Sebastian Sternicki’s print shop that published some 250–300 books in Polish, German, Flemish, and Latin, a great majority of which were in theology (for example, the Racovian Catechism [first Polish edition, 1605; first German edition, 1608; first Latin edition, 1609]). A vast number of books from the Rakow press were secretly distributed throughout the whole of Europe. Many of the Socinians in the Polish-Lithuanian Common-wealth were German. Together with the Poles they formed the administrative and intellectual elites of the movement. This included such names as Johann Volker (d. 1658), author of the basic Socinian doctrinal work entitled De vera religione (“Concerning true religion,” 1630); Johann Crell (1590–1633), an intellectual and biblical scholar; and Joachim Stegman, senior (1592–1633), mathematician and theologian. The vast majority of German Socinians—for example, Valentius Smalcus—were Polish citizens who adapted to the new culture. On the other hand, German presence in the community allowed the church to maintain its missions in areas where German was a native language.

Although Socinianism enjoyed relatively good conditions during its early development, subsequent years brought problems and defeats caused by the Catholic Counter-Reformation, which considered Socinianism its greatest enemy.

An act of the Polish Senate in 1638, passed after schoolboys were allegedly seen throwing stones at a wayside cross, ordered the closing of schools and the printing office in Rakow. The seminary was moved to Wolyn, where it did not manage to regain its former importance and reputation. In 1647 Socinians were refused the right to any pedagogical or PUBLISHING activity in the territory of the Commonwealth. Finally in 1648 Catholics excluded Socinianism from the so-called Warsaw Confederation (1573), an act that had been the guarantee of freedom of religion to all.

Nevertheless, the main blow to Polish-Lithuanian Socinianism came after the Swedish War, during which part of the non-Catholic gentry and leaders declared their support for SWEDEN. This caused an increase of reluctance skillfully fomented by Catholic propaganda. On July 10, 1658 Parliament ordered the expulsion within three years of the "Arians" (Socinians) under the penalty of death or confiscation of all property. This, however, was only binding for those Socinians who refused to convert to Catholicism. In 1659 Parliament decided not to delay any longer and enforced the earlier law. Socinians were refused protection, and their religion was found unlawful in 1660.

Socinian Emigration

Probably only a couple of thousand Socinians decided to leave the country. Not only did the rest stay and officially agree to practice the religion of the majority, but also supplied the outlawed Socinians with financial aid. This phenomenon, which existed until the end of the eighteenth century, is known as Crypto-Socinianism. Despite the draconian law, none of the Socinians was sentenced to death. However, cases of expulsion from the country or fines for delays in converting to Catholicism were common.

Intensified Socinian emigration from Poland took place in the fall of 1660, when a couple hundred Socinians were forced to Transylvania. Robbed of the last penny along the way, Socinians were hospitably welcomed by the Hungarian Unitarians. The refugees established local religious communities that managed to preserve the national identity of their members. They lasted until 1784. Years of Hungarian influence on the younger generations weakened differences and enabled Socinians to join the national church of HUNGARY.

The situation of emigrants in East Prussia and Neumark was worse. Despite being constantly attacked by Lutheran CLERGY, the small community managed to survive until the beginning of the nineteenth century.

A third group, led by a historian and astronomer Stanislaw Lubieniecki, unsuccessfully looked for protection in North GERMANY and the Palatinate, but the influence of the Lutherans was too strong. Therefore a part of the group decided to settle in the NETHERLANDS with their famous leader Anrzej Wiszowaty (1608–1678), the author of the masterpiece Religio rationalis (“Rational religion”). He and his son Benedict (who died after 1704 as a pastor of exiles) tried to preserve the heritage and history of Socinianism. Thus between 1665 and 1668 Andrzej Wiszowaty published the eight-volume work called Bibliotheca a Frerum Polonorum (Library of Polish Brethren) consisting of pieces written by F.Sozzini, J.Crell, J.Szichling, and J.L.Wolzogen. (An incomplete collection of works by Samuel Przytkowski titled Cognitiones sacrae published in 1692 was a ninth volume.) New editions of “the Racovian Catechism” (1665, 1680, 1681, 1684), Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum (Antitrinitarian Library) (1684) by Christoph Sondius, and Historia reformationis Polonicae (History of Polish Reformation) (1685) by Stanislaw Lubieniowski were issued thanks to Wiszowaty’s devotion and persistence.

The Socinian diaspora remained in continuous contact among themselves. This contact was lost in the eighteenth century when local churches absorbed emigration. Until this time Transylvania and Prussia were the places where regular synods met. The latter also included representatives of Crypto-Socinianism from the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. Leaders of emigration churches—Stanislaw Lubieniowski, Samuel Przytkowski, and Andrzej Wiszowaty—endeavored often to encourage their English and Dutch brethren to be generous. They also sought to return to Poland through fruitless efforts to obtain the repeal of the act that declared Socinians outlaws.

The Spread of Socinianism in Europe

Fausto Sozzini and his successors had made promoting religion one of their top priorities. Books printed in Rakow were dispersed all over Europe. Traveling Socinians, who were sometimes specially trained for that kind of mission, soon became the main instruments of propaganda.

German universities, attended by Polish students and tutors who were Socinian activists, also became an extremely important terrain for missionary activity. The reputation of Ernst Solar, a philosopher popular among students, was one of the greatest Socinian successes at the University at Altdorf. This center of Crypto-Socinianism (from 1605 to 1616) that had remained in close relations with Rakow was closed after an intervention of University activists.

The dissent of Rakow occasioned a great concern and a brisk polemics among Lutheran clergy. Earl M. Wilbur suggested that in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Germany some 700 proceedings against Socinians took place.

Before that time, as early as 1598, there were signs of Socinian activity in the Netherlands. That is the time when Andrzej Wojowski and Christoph Ostrorodt appeared there. However, they were soon dismissed from the country and the books from Rakow they brought with them were burned. Although their ideas were treated with reserve, Socinians maintained close relations with the Remonstrants in the Netherlands. They never managed to attract their friends with Trinitarian and soteriological notions. Nevertheless, the influence of Socinianism on two representatives of the “left wing” of the Remonstrants, also known as Collegiants, was significant. Two leaders of this stream, Johannes Geestteranus (1586–1622) and Dirk Camphuysen (1586–1622), were in a close contact with Rakow while translating biographies of F. Sozzini and V. Smalcus into Dutch.

Socinian propaganda found a fertile ground in ENGLAND as well. Two editions of the Racovian Catechism in 1614 and 1624 (with a false issue date of 1609) initiated the process. The real expansion of the movement began in the thirties of the seventeenth century. Theologians from the so-called Tew Circle, John Hales (1584–1654) and Wiliam Chillingworth (1602–1644) seemed to be interested in Socinianism. Both had a significant influence on English religious thought, including JOHN LOCKE, who was familiar with Socinianism. John Biddle (1615–1662), also known as a father of English Unitarianism, translated the works of Samuel Przykowski and Joachim Stegmann. Nevertheless, he had a separate view of the role of the Holy Spirit. Socinianism seemed to have interested ISAAC NEWTON as well.

The Doctrines of Socinianism

Although Fausto Sozzini was a source of the vital part of concepts that became Socinian doctrine, his successors enriched it with new ideas or modified some important issues.

The function of the Holy Trinity is the most important part of Socinian belief. It was also the main subject of Socinian literature. Nevertheless, Socinian thought produced no new argumentation beyond what is already found in early works of Antitrinitarians from ITALY, Poland, or Transylvania. The reflection on God, on the other hand, was without doubt deepened by seventeenth-century philosophy. Socinians believed God to be the only creator of the world and an eternally existing matter. According to Socinians, God is a substance localized in HEAVEN, acting gradually (per gradus) over time in the world. He is immutable and his decisions do not belong to his substance.

Christ is a human being (purus homo) born without SIN from the VIRGIN MARY. However, he is not everlasting. According to F. Sozzini and other Socinian theologians, Jesus was in heaven where he received instructions from his Father before he was sent on a mission to earth.

Socinianism—just like Sozzini—rejected the redemptive role of the crucified Christ, claiming that his main aim was to teach people the way to SALVATION. They also rejected the dogma of original SIN, insisting that it never destroyed the perceptive abilities or moral dispositions of humankind. Humans must have a full disposition of their free will, otherwise any good deed would be impossible and God would be responsible for sin.

Humans are mortal. Immortality is a gift only to those who believe in Christ and fulfill his commandments. The souls of unbelievers will be annihilated.

Elements of religious rationalism are an important part of Sozzini's thought. Sozzini pointed out that religion must be in conformity with the intellect. In his opinion it is impossible for humans to discover the nature of God because revealed truth is partial. Sozzini's position was questioned by other theologians who proposed the idea of natural religion, giving an important role to the senses as a source of perception. Such notions were a substantial part of Joachim Stegmann and Samuel Przykowski's already mentioned treatises Religio rationalis ("Rational Religion") published by Andrzej Wiszowaty. The mind is the highest judge on earth; therefore the Bible must be interpreted according to rational rules. The Holy Gospel is a source of truth (supra rationem) existing above the mind. This means that, even though the teachings of the Gospel cannot be fully understood, they are not contrary to reason (contra rationem).

The social and political doctrines of Socinianism in its early stage were not much different from the views of Sozzini. As a source of the new approach he tried to find a connection between the radical ideas of the first Antitrinitarians and everyday life. He was not against possession of goods, feudalism, or holding offices, but was against CAPITAL PUNISHMENT and the active participation of believers in WAR (see PACIFISM).

The discussion over the state and wars was open by a Dutch Collegiant Daniel Brenius (1594–1664). His negative approach was expressed in De qualitate regni Christi ("About the Quality of Christ's Kingdom") (1641), a first statement of disapproval of both the state and its institutions. It became the catalyst of a long dispute between Socinian thinkers: Johann Ludwig Wolzoe (c. 1599–1661), Joachim Stegmann, Jr. (c. 1618–1678), Daniel Zwicker (1612–1678), Jonasz Szlichtyng (1592–1661), and Samuel Przykowski (1592–1670). Wolzoe, Stegmann, and Zwicker declared their unambiguous opposition to supporting the state, whereas Szychtyng and Przykowski sought to defend the old order. Treatises by Przykowski played a most important role: Animadversiones in bellum cui titulus est De qualitate regni Christi ("Remarks on a Book with the title The Quality of Christ's Kingdom"), c. 1650; De iure Christiani magistratu ("About the Right of Christian Office"); Apologia prolixior de iure Christiani magistratu ("The Extended Apology about the Right of the Christian Magistracy"); Vindiciae tractatus de magistratu ("The Defense of the Treaty of the Magistracy"). In these works the author argued that because the spheres of the two institutions are not contradictory, state and church should cooperate for the sake of the citizens' best interest (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW). Whereas the clergy is meant to use spiritual power with all those who voluntarily obey their orders, the state uses force to maintain order. Only cooperation of both organizations is a guarantee for a proper spiritual and secular life of communities. Przykowski criticized Sozzini's argumentation, which closed the way of political participation for the members of the Socinian Church.

During the late phase of Socinian activity, both tendencies—the sectarian one close to ANABAPTISM and the civil one proposing Christians' full participation in the social and political life—coexisted. Nevertheless, emigrants seemed to appreciate the first more.

Socinian doctrine fascinated many eighteenth-century philosophers. Those with Protestant roots tended to overestimate the meaning and reach of Socinianism and saw it as a major danger for Catholicism. At the same time Western European Catholic thinkers seemed to be far less interested in it.

A majority of positive and moderate attitudes existed among philosophers who appreciated tolerance and the high level of morals in Socinian communities, although this should not imply the lack of any critique. The Socinian attempts to create a rational religion were disapproved by French philosopher PIERRE BAYLE (1647–1706). In his opinion any religion was irrational by its very nature. Another famous philosopher, Voltaire (1694–1778), sympathized with Socinians but considered their actions anachronistic—they should not attempt to attract new members in times indifferent to religion.

See also Unitarian Universalist Association

References and Further Reading

- Balazs, Mihaly, and Gizella Keser, eds. Gy rgy enyedi and Central European Unitarianism in the 16th–17th Century Countries. Budapest, Hungary: Balessi Kiado, 2000.
- Florida, Robert E. “Voltaire and the Socinians.” In Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century, 122. Banbury, UK: Voltaire Foundation, 1974.
- Kot, Stanislas. Socinianism in Poland. The Social and Political Ideas of the Polish Antitrinitarians in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. Translated by Earl Morse Wilbur. Boston: Starr King Press, 1957.
- Lubieniecki, Stanislas. History of the Polish Reformation. Translated and interpreted by George Hunston Williams. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1995.
- McLachnan, Herbert John. Socinianism in Seventeenth Century England. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1952.
- Ogonowski, Zbigniew. Socinianism vs. Enlightenment. Studies on Philosophical-Religious Thought of Arians in Seventeenth Century Poland. Warsaw: PWN Polish Scientific Publisher, 1966.
- , ed. Arian’s Thought in Seventeenth Century Poland. Anthology of Texts. Wroclaw, Poland: Ossolineum, 1991.
- Szczucki, Lech ed. Socinianism and its Role in the Culture of Sixteenth to Seventeenth Centuries. Warsaw: PWN Polish Scientific Publisher, 1983.
- Tazbir, Janusz. Polish Brothers on Exile. Studies on Arian’s Emigration Times. Warsaw: PWN Polish Scientific Publisher, 1977.
- Wilbur, Earl Morse. A History of Unitarianism. Socinianism and its Antecedents. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1946.
- . A History of Unitarianism. In Transylvania, England, America. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1952.
- Williams, George Hunston. “The Polish Brethren. Documentation of the History and Thought of Unitarianism in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and in the Diaspora 1601–1685.” In Harvard Theological Studies, parts I-II, 30. Missoula, MT: Scholar Press 1980.

LECH SZCZUCKI

SOCIOLOGY OF PROTESTANTISM

Since its emergence, the discipline of sociology has concerned itself with an analysis of the role of religion in society. Beginning with Auguste Comte, the father of the discipline of sociology, and continuing in the works of the classical pioneers of the discipline, Emile Durkheim and MAX WEBER, sociology was intensely interested in the role of religion in society. The interest in religion was strongly linked to the rise of the modern world and changes brought about by INDUSTRIALIZATION and political transformation. In the midst of these social changes, the perception emerged that modern societies were moving from social orders dominated by religion and tradition to modes of social life dominated by bureaucracy and instrumental rationality. Weber devoted special attention to Protestantism, because he saw in it a key contributing factor to the emergence of the modern economic order. Durkheim, in Suicide (1897), considered Protestantism to be a more modern form of religion than JUDAISM or Catholicism, and a form that was less effective in creating social cohesion and integration than they were.

This article considers a number of perennial issues in the sociological study of Protestantism, beginning with the discussion of Durkheim and Weber. One issue raised by Durkheim is the question of the relationship between voluntaristic Protestantism and INDIVIDUALISM. Weber's study The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1905) addressed the impact of Protestant forms of religiosity on economic life. Closely related to this issue is the question of the political impact of Protestantism. One of the most fruitful perspectives in the social analysis of religion, sect-church typology, emerged from Max Weber's and ERNST TROELTSCH'S considerations of the various social forms of Protestantism. Finally, this article considers the ongoing sociological debate about SECULARIZATION and Protestantism and the importance of the globalization of Protestantism, especially in its evangelical and Pentecostal forms.

The Consideration of Protestantism in Early Sociology

Emile Durkheim, the central figure in early French sociology, was concerned throughout his career with the problem of social order in modern society. His first work, The Division of Labor (1893), proposed that in traditional society, social order and cohesiveness were maintained by the homogeneity of the population. Because the diversity of occupations and social roles was limited, the beliefs and perspectives of the populace tended to be relatively uniform and unified. This traditional social order contrasts with modern, urban, industrial society, which has a highly developed division of labor and tremendous diversity of occupation, outlook, and interest. Here social order and cohesiveness are maintained by the functional interdependence of people engaged in specialized occupations.

Durkheim formulated the concept of the “collective conscience” to describe what he believed to be a vital component of a unified society. He defined the collective conscience as the “totality of beliefs and sentiments common to average citizens of the same society” (Durkheim 1933:79). In traditional society, the collective conscience was strong and extensive; that is, most people were in substantial agreement about the essential truths and moral values of their society. Unity and solidarity in traditional society rested on the homogeneity of the population.

In modern society, however, the collective conscience was less extensive in scope, and its hold on the population was weaker. This idea concerning the collective conscience becomes central to Durkheim’s later theorizing, which serves to demonstrate the validity of this concept and clarify its nature. Increasingly, he comes to view the basis of the collective conscience as religious and also to regard it as having continued vital importance even in modern society.

In the bulk of his work, Durkheim does not give full attention to an analysis of Protestantism. His definitive work on the sociology of religion, The Elementary Forms of Religious Life (1912), focuses on the religious life of the Australian aborigines as an example of what is most basic to all religious life, even in more complex societies. However, Durkheim’s important statistical study of suicide rates in Europe, titled Suicide, focuses on contrasts between Protestantism, Catholicism, and Judaism. Durkheim compared suicide rates in different regions of Europe, particularly FRANCE and GERMANY, in an effort to understand the causes of the variations in rates. He found that provinces and regions with predominantly Protestant populations tended to have higher suicide rates than did regions where Catholicism predominated. By conclusively demonstrating a religious influence on suicide rates, Durkheim supported the notion of a collective conscience exerting a profound influence on social behavior. He inferred that Protestantism produced a weaker collective conscience than did Catholicism. As a result, individuals were less socially integrated in Protestant regions than in Catholic regions and experienced weaker forms of social control. Under these circumstances, anomie and egoism were less thoroughly checked, and the incidence of suicide increased. Durkheim suggested that Protestantism, because of its insistence on individual assent on matters of FAITH and conscience, created a more individualistic society with weaker social integration and cohesion than a more corporate Catholic society. Protestantism here was viewed as being related to those changes of modernity that opened the way to free inquiry and undermined medieval, traditional society. This connection between Protestantism and individualism continues to be important in present-day sociological considerations of Protestantism.

Weber’s study, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, was a defining work in his understanding of the emergence of the modern economic order. The central concept in much of Weber’s writing was the idea of rationalization. Weber argued that history had progressed in such a way that rational thought and rationalized procedures increasingly dominate social existence. He sought to show in this study that Protestantism had been a key factor in this process of rationalization. A significant transformation of social existence occurred in the modern world in the shift from a limited economy of agriculture, craft production, and localized trade in the medieval period to the new capitalist economy of continuous investment, manufacturing, and global trade that characterizes the modern era. Marx's dialectical materialism claimed that ideas and beliefs were ultimately rooted in the social arrangements of economic life. Weber, on the other hand, argued that ideas and beliefs could have a profound effect in shaping the social and economic order.

Weber argued that the spirit of modern capitalism was more than simply the quest for economic gain, which, he said, has always been a part of the world's history. Rather, modern capitalism is based on the rational, methodical organization of economic life in the pursuit of gain. Whereas merchants in previous eras certainly sought to get rich, modern capitalism is characterized by the continuous investment and reinvestment of earnings to create more profit. This disciplined and rationally organized economic system is something new on the scene of world history.

Weber argues that to some degree Protestantism has provided a stimulus to the development of this new economic order. He begins by pointing out the relative importance of Protestant regions in the development of the capitalist system. He also finds a preponderance of Protestants among businessmen and skilled tradesmen in Germany in his time. Weber argues that Protestantism altered the ETHICS of medieval Christianity in such a way as to promote capitalist enterprise. He labels this new behavioral and ethical orientation inner-worldly ASCETICISM.

Weber argues that MARTIN LUTHER'S contribution to the Protestant economic ethic was the doctrine of VOCATION (beruf in German). In his polemic against MONASTICISM, Luther argued that people could serve God best not by abandoning the life of the world by entering a monastery or convent, but rather by serving God in the context of their everyday life and work. As Luther put it, a milkmaid faithfully milking and caring for the cows with trust in Christ in her heart served God better than a monk who sought to please God through a self-chosen righteousness of works. Weber stated that Luther's emphasis on godly labor in a vocation gave a new positive valuation to earthly economic activity that differed from the characteristic medieval attitude, where mundane economic activity was considered to be inferior to contemplation and otherworldly religious activity.

However, Weber argues that LUTHERANISM'S focus on passive acceptance of God's GRACE through Word and Sacrament did not provide the powerful inducement to the rational discipline of economic life that other forms of Protestantism, especially CALVINISM, did. Thus Lutheranism, although it provides an ethical impulse toward economic activity as a means to serve God (it is "inner-worldly" as opposed to monasticism and the medieval ethic), is not ascetic because of its emphasis on objective grace, and so it does not induce a high level of discipline in its adherents.

Calvinism, on the other hand, is ascetic in that it promotes a disciplined and consistent ethical discipline to a degree not found in Lutheranism or in Catholicism outside the monastery. The Calvinistic emphasis on the doctrine of PREDESTINATION as the inscrutable decree of God, in the absence of a strong sacramental emphasis, left the believer with the question, "How do I know I am one of the elect?" Whereas Lutheranism directed the believer to the written Word of God, the SACRAMENTS and confession, and Catholicism also directed the believer to the sacraments, Calvinism emphasized an unmediated relationship between the individual and God. Although both Calvinism and Lutheranism vigorously asserted the doctrine of justification by grace through faith,

Calvinism in practice directed individuals to confirm the reality of their election through faithfulness in Christian living. One could be assured of one's ELECTION by the reality of one's renewed Christian life. Although one was not saved by works, one could produce the evidence of SALVATION by one's works. As Weber put it:

The Calvinist...creates his own salvation, or, as would be more correct, the conviction of it. But this creation cannot, as in Catholicism, consist in gradual accumulation of individual good works to one's credit, but rather in a systematic self-control which at every moment stands before the inexorable alternative, chosen or damned (Weber 1998:115)

For the Calvinist, to prove one's election, one must display a systematically consistent Christian life, while for the Lutheran or Catholic, Weber says, daily Christian ethics are more a matter of living from hand to mouth. When one sins, one returns to the sacrament and confession for grace or the promise of grace.

So where Luther provided the religious impulse toward inner-worldly economic activity, Calvinism provided the ascetic impulse that led to the transformation of Europe's economic traditionalism into capitalism. For the Calvinist, the best way in which one can live out one's Christian life is by consistent and disciplined work in one's calling. This is to be combined with an avoidance of worldly pleasure and frivolous expenditure. The result is an economic ethic of hard work, savings, and careful accounting of all that one has to the glory of God.

Weber sees this as a matter of unintended consequences. Certainly, Calvin was no supporter of a worldly orientation toward life, but Weber sees a gradual drifting from the rigorous and otherworldly Calvinism of the REFORMATION to a more worldly form that sees material prosperity as a sign of God's favor. Weber sees the ideal type of the secular form of the Protestant ethic in Benjamin Franklin with his worldly maxims encouraging hard work and savings.

Weber's thesis concerning Protestantism and the spirit of capitalism, although not without its opponents, has had wide influence in sociology and other fields and continues to shape debates today about economic development and the globalization of Protestantism.

Sect-Church Typology

In contrast with Durkheim, who viewed religion primarily as a force promoting social unity, Weber was much more interested in the divisions of society by groups and interests that are in conflict. In his analysis of religious groups and their social orientation, he came up with a distinction that has since been very fruitfully used as a typology for the analysis of Protestant, as well as other, religious orientations to the world. In Weber's essay "The Protestant Sects and the Spirit of Capitalism," he describes the church as a "compulsory association for the administration of grace" and the sect as a "voluntary association of religiously qualified individuals." This fundamental distinction has been worked and reworked by a number of sociologists of religion since that time. The basic contrast in church-sect typology comes from the emergence of voluntary religious groups in the context of European Christendom where one religious organization exercises a religious monopoly, but it has proven to be a typology that can be applied more broadly to examine the orientations of various religious groups to the wider society. Weber's basic idea is to contrast those groups in which membership is voluntary and which one must be religiously qualified to enter (sects), and those groups where membership is presumed to be coterminous with society and is given at birth (churches).

The most influential proponents of this typology have in fact been not professional sociologists, but rather theologians. Troeltsch took Weber's basic distinction and fleshed it out both theologically and sociologically in the context of Christian churches in his The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches. Troeltsch views the two sociological types, church and sect, as being rooted in the New Testament. The church type is based theologically on the Pauline emphasis of universal grace. The church type develops sociologically after Constantine's CONVERSION, as the church becomes an institution that embraces all of society. People are born into the church (membership is ascribed rather than achieved), and this is best demonstrated by the practice of infant BAPTISM. From a sociological standpoint, it is important to note that Troeltsch stresses that the church type tends to have a professional CLERGY and to ally itself with the ruling powers and upper classes.

Troeltsch relates the sect type theologically to Jesus's call to radical repentance as found in the Gospels. "Come out from among them and be separate" (II Corinthians 6:17) would be the text that perhaps best describes the orientation of the sect to the wider society. Whereas people are born into the church, they enter the sect voluntarily. Adult baptism symbolizes this commitment to voluntary membership.

Troeltsch's development of sect-church typology looks at each type as having a series of paired contrasting characteristics. Whereas the church emphasizes grace, the sect tends toward legalism. Whereas the church embraces all of society, the sect is exclusive. Lay participation and a strong fellowship are social characteristics that describe the internal functioning of the sect type. Professional clergy and a view of the church as more of an institution and less of a community characterize the church. The sect tends to be associated with the poor. In contrast, the church tends to be allied with the ruling classes. The sect stands in opposition to society and in rebellion against it; the church seeks to direct and incorporate society. The medieval Roman Catholic Church epitomizes the church type and the Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) of the sixteenth century, the early Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF) of the seventeenth century, and the early Pentecostals (see PENTECOSTALISM) would be good examples of the sect type. The Protestant state churches following the Reformation in Europe would be good examples of the church type as well.

The second theologian who developed and popularized church-sect typology, especially within the context of the UNITED STATES, is H. RICHARD NIEBUHR in two of his best-known works, Christ and Culture and The Social Sources of Denominationalism. For theologians and ethicists, the first work has been more significant, but for sociology of religion, the second is the more interesting work. In The Social Sources of Denominationalism, Niebuhr built on Troeltsch's basic scheme, applying it to the American context. He developed the idea of the DENOMINATION as a third type mediating between the sect and church types. In the American context of disestablished religion, the denomination combines the voluntarism of the sect with a more relaxed attitude toward the world and other religious groups. Niebuhr is also very interested in the development and change of religious groups and in their relationship to the social class structure. In this regard, his analysis benefits from a post-Marxian understanding and interest in social stratification.

Niebuhr discusses the development of certain sectlike groups that he refers to as the “churches of the disinherited.” He describes how the theology and practice of these churches were related to the social status and situation of their adherents. He suggests that churches of the poor often emphasized emotion and informality in WORSHIP, while churches among more prosperous sectors of the population emphasized formality and more abstract thought. Churches of the disinherited, in keeping with the sect type, also tended to be more lay oriented than the churches of the prosperous with their professional and highly educated clergy. Because of a greater inconformity with existing social arrangements, the church of the disinherited had a higher tension with the world and tended to be more legalistic.

However, Niebuhr points out that groups that at one time were very sectarian in orientation evolve toward a more churchly type as their social status changes. Churches that began as movements of the disinherited evolve into middle-class denominations as they rise socially. Niebuhr points to METHODISM as an excellent example of this process. In ENGLAND, JOHN WESLEY appealed to the working classes, and Methodism was particularly successful among them. In the United States, Methodism expanded on the frontier, often among people of little education. Its REVIVALS and CAMP MEETINGS were emotional and unsophisticated. The movement depended on strong lay leadership operating in organized classes. Adherents were warned against worldliness. However, as time went on, Methodists became an established presence on the American scene. Methodists prospered and rose into the middle class. With these social changes came a demand for more social respectability. Methodists began to expect and develop an educated professional clergy. Sectarian tension with the world diminished. In his own time, Wesley noted that as his converts prospered they seemed to become less zealous. Niebuhr sees this as a continuing trend in American denominationalism. Sect-like churches of the disinherited become transformed into church-like denominations as their adherents move up in the social class system.

Protestantism, Secularization, and the Modern World

When Martin Luther stood at the DIET OF WORMS, refused to retract, and appealed to Scripture and reason, a challenge was issued to the medieval principle of religious AUTHORITY. Henceforth, in Protestantism, TRADITION and constituted religious authority in a hierarchy no longer held sway over the conscience of the individual. With this challenge to traditional religious authority came a new relationship of the individual both to the hierarchy of the church and to the religious community. The old idea of Christendom would soon break down under the strain, and a new relationship between religion and the social order would emerge. Protestantism also brought a new view of the LAITY. No longer passive recipients of a religion administered and controlled by the clergy and religious bureaucracy, they were called to understand the doctrines of the church and their foundation in Scripture. They were also called to act themselves to preserve and extend the church. Luther's "Address to the Christian Nobility" called the German princes to act independently from the church hierarchy to defend and support biblical faith. The social consequences of these ideas would be profound.

The immediate consequence of Luther's Reformation was to establish state churches where the relationship between CHURCH AND STATE was similar to that between the Catholic church and the empire. As the power of the state grew in the modern era, the state's power over religious life grew in both Protestant and Catholic societies. Yet, Luther had clearly taught a distinction between the two kingdoms, the left-hand kingdom of secular power and the right-hand kingdom of God's proper work, the proclamation of the Gospel. Where the Pope had claimed authority in both temporal and spiritual matters, the Protestant Reformation led to a distinction and a separation between two spheres, the secular and the religious. In addition, the rise of new sects and quarreling among Protestants led to an even greater disintegration of the old medieval unity of society and faith.

Although in most European countries, state churches were established that attempted to maintain religious monopolies within their territories, the seeds of the political principle of separation of church and state had been sown. In the United States, these seeds led to fully disestablished religion after the American Revolution. Rather than disestablishment leading to religious decline, it led in the United States to more vigorous and lay-oriented religious life.

Classical sociology assumed that secularization was an inevitable process of the modern world. Most sociologists argued that religion was destined to shrink under the assault of reason, SCIENCE, and marginalization from influence over political and economic life. Its influence was to be confined to private life, and even there it was viewed as an anachronism that would slowly fade away.

From the perspective of Durkheimian sociology, Protestantism was a part of this weakening of religious life in society. In traditional society, religion was largely unchallenged, because it held a central role in integrating social life and was uniformly adhered to by all. Protestantism, however, appealed to the individual conscience. It required individual assent. No longer did all in a society hold the same religious views. Rather, everyone examined religious convictions for themselves. The collective conscience was weakened. The increasing pluralism and individualism of modern life, of which Protestantism was a part, would lead to a diminishing plausibility of religious belief, which depended on social affirmation and collective ritual. Peter Berger's The Sacred Canopy (1967) makes this Durkheimian argument that secularization is a phenomenon brought about by religious pluralism.

However, many sociologists of religion, including Berger, no longer hold this secularization paradigm. On closer examination, various scholars have argued that there is in fact insufficient evidence to conclude that religion is disappearing from the modern world. There is a separation of spheres in modern society, where political, economic and other institutions operate free of direct religious influence and control. However, it is not at all clear that religion is destined to diminish in influence or be restricted to the private sphere.

Although in Europe state-supported churches seem to have sapped the vitality from Christian faith, in the United States, where churches have operated free from direct state support and control, religion has maintained a strong position in the culture. A number of historians and sociologists of religion have indeed argued that religious influence in the United States, rather than shrinking, has actually grown since colonial times. Certainly, church membership as a percentage of population has grown since then.

It is important to note, however, the trends in growth within Protestant denominations in the United States. Researchers following Kelley (Why Conservative Churches Are Growing) have found that it is the more conservative churches, those that resist the trends of secular society, that grow in numbers, while those churches that most clearly accommodate themselves to secularism are shrinking. Kelley argued that people are looking for clear authoritative religious answers. Churches that supply those answers attract and hold on to adherents, while those that do not dwindle in numbers and influence. Thus, the traditional mainline denominations in American society, such as the Methodists and Episcopalians, are declining, while the conservative evangelical church bodies are growing.

The strongest challenges to the secularization paradigm have argued that a free market for religion and religious pluralism, rather than undermining the plausibility of religion, actually strengthen its practice and influence and mobilize greater participation from the population. Europe, with its highly secularized population and state-supported churches, rather than representing the trend of modernity, is a particular response to a unique history and social organization of religious life. Protestantism, because it allows for religious competition and pluralism, can maintain its vigor also in modern societies.

The Globalization of Protestantism

Some of the greatest challenges to be faced in the sociological study of Protestantism are being raised by the globalization of Protestantism. Historically Protestantism arose and developed in the countries of northern Europe and was taken by immigrants to the United States and the countries of the British Commonwealth. The growth of Christianity worldwide, however, has shifted the demographic balance of the Christian church in general and Protestantism in particular. LATIN AMERICA has experienced tremendous growth in Protestant, especially Pentecostal, adherents in the twentieth century. Sub-Saharan AFRICA has had great increases in numbers of both Protestant and Catholic Christians. In CHINA, Christianity, both Protestant and Catholic, has grown since the Communist revolution in 1949 (see COMMUNISM). Estimates of the current number of Christians run as high as 100 million (Jenkins 2002:70). Most of this growth has been in the underground church, which is mostly Protestant and evangelical (Martin 2002:155). South Korea (see KOREA) has experienced high rates of Christian growth and Protestants have become a significant part of the population there. Understanding the sociological dimensions of the worldwide growth of Protestantism and its implications for the world's societies and for the future of Christianity is a major task for sociologists of religion.

The most important sociological studies of global Protestantism have focused on the rise of Pentecostalism. Protestant growth worldwide has been most notable among Pentecostal and Pentecostalized Christian movements, particularly among the poor of the Third World. Since its beginnings in the AZUSA STREET REVIVAL in 1906 in Los Angeles, California, Pentecostalism has been a religious movement that carries some of the same social characteristics earlier associated with Methodism. It has had great success among the poor and disenfranchised. Its roots in the United States are associated with the African-American community and the poor white community. As it has grown, Pentecostalism and Pentecostal influences have become important and significant among the middle classes as well. Like Methodism in its early stages, Pentecostalism is grassroots religion; it is responsive to the religious needs of the masses and gives a voice to the LAITY. Its leaders are not primarily seminary trained, but rather rise up from the ranks of the membership because of their demonstrated charismatic qualities. Among the urban poor in squatter settlements around the world, Pentecostalism provides community and moral discipline for people who are uprooted from their old traditions and living in an economically hostile environment.

David Martin calls Pentecostalism "the Christian equivalent of Islamic revivalism" (Martin 2002:167). It is comparable to Islamic revivalism in its global scope and in its dynamism among the urban poor. However, Martin points out that its political logic is much different. Because Christianity conceives of two distinct spheres of authority, church and state, based on Jesus's words "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's," Pentecostalism represents a religious revolution that is voluntaristic and not directly political. In fact, as Martin points out, Pentecostalism thrives as previous religious monopolies begin to break down, as is the case in Latin America. Pentecostalism represents a break with the past but at the same time, because it concerns itself with issues of spiritual power, healing, exorcisms, and spiritual warfare, it addresses itself directly to issues of concern to peoples emerging from animistic religions concerned with shamanism and the power of spirits.

Due to the dramatic growth of Pentecostalism in Latin America, the most detailed sociological studies of its growth in the developing world have been done there. A brief outline of the various sociological interpretations offered for the global rise of Pentecostalism would include the following: (1) a Weberian, developmental understanding of Pentecostalism as being tied to processes of modernization and the expansion of capitalism; (2) a Marxian critique of Pentecostalism that sees it as a form of false consciousness brought on by the expansion of that same global capitalism; (3) a perspective that links Pentecostal growth to its responsiveness to the needs of WOMEN and its reformulation of domestic morality; and (4) an interpretation that seeks to explain Pentecostal growth in terms of its responsiveness to concerns about healing and spiritual power.

Martin's work is a good example of the first perspective. He sees Pentecostalism and Protestant growth in the developing world in the context of life-long work on secularization processes. Pentecostalism grows when religious monopolies begin to decay. It both benefits from the social free space that is created when these monopolies weaken, and at the same time works to create a cultural free space for voluntaristic religious DISSENT and expression. Martin suggests that though Pentecostalism is apolitical, it can nevertheless impact political life by working in the sphere of culture. While proponents of LIBERATION THEOLOGY often criticize Pentecostalism as a form of false consciousness, Martin and others point out that it meets the felt needs of the poor and does indeed bring helpful change into their lives.

The Marxian interpretation popular among a number of Latin American interpreters of Pentecostalism focuses on this issue of false consciousness. As global capitalist markets penetrate third-world societies, these societies are transformed in ways that break down traditional social relationships and economic patterns. The resulting alienation in the lives of the poor leads them to Pentecostal religiosity as a form of escape, an “opiate of the masses.” This interpretation, whether in the hands of secular critics or liberation theologians, tends to view Pentecostalism as inauthentic and often charges that Pentecostalism is a cultural import from the United States. Martin and others counter that though Pentecostalism did originate in the United States, it has become thoroughly indigenous in other parts of the world and reproduces itself through local, rather than foreign, leadership and cultural forms.

Elizabeth Brusco, in a work titled The Reformation of Machismo, provided the most complete exposition of the third point of view, that Pentecostalism is successful because of its appeal to women. Brusco argues that women are attracted to evangelical Protestantism because it transforms the ethic of their husbands. Although Pentecostalism generally affirms biblical injunctions in favor of patriarchy, at the same time it succeeds in enforcing a domestic morality of marital fidelity, abstinence from alcohol, and an investment of the families’ limited income in the home. This is a powerful attraction for the urban poor, whose lives are often devastated by the vices and temptations of the city.

Finally, some researchers (e.g., Chesnut 1997) have focused on Pentecostal responsiveness to concerns about healing and spiritual power. They have found that belief in divine healing plays a major role in Pentecostal conversion and growth. This is due in part to the fact that the poor often have little access to adequate medical care and suffer from health problems related to poor sanitation and malnutrition. In addition, traditional belief systems focus on the power of spirits, SAINTS, and magic to effect healing or to cause illness or trouble. While Pentecostalism challenges these traditional beliefs, it does so in a way that takes the concerns about spiritual power and threats seriously. Thus, there is both continuity and a break with traditional belief systems.

Weber linked Protestantism to the rise of the modern world. Studies of global Protestantism are influenced by many of Weber’s ideas. Protestantism is proving to be adaptable in many cultures even (or perhaps especially) in the face of modernity. Given the social and political importance of religion in today’s world, an understanding of the global growth and dynamism of Protestantism today makes the sociology of Protestantism as important as it was a century ago.

See also Culture; Economics; Evangelicalism; Methodism, England; Methodism, North America; Modernism; Politics; Sectarianism

References and Further Reading

- Berger, Peter L. The Sacred Canopy. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1967.
- Brusco, Elizabeth. The Reformation of Machismo. Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1995.
- Chesnut, R. Andrew. Born Again in Brazil: The Pentecostal Boom and the Pathogens of Poverty. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.
- Durkheim, Emile. The Division of Labor in Society. Glencoe, IL: Free Press, 1933.
- . Suicide: A Study in Sociology. New York: Free Press, 1951.
- Jenkins, Philip. The Next Christendom: The Coming of Global Christianity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Kelley, Dean. Why Conservative Churches Are Growing. New York: Harper and Row, 1972.
- Martin, David. Pentecostalism: The World Their Parish. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 2002.
- Niebuhr, H. Richard. The Social Sources of Denominationalism. New York: The World Publishing, 1957.
- Troeltsch, Ernst. The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches. Vol. II. Translated by Olive Wyon. London: Allen & Unwin, 1931.
- Weber, Max. The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism. Translated by Talcott Parsons. Los Angeles, CA: Roxbury Publishing, 1998.

ERIC MOELLER

SÖDERBLOM, NATHAN (1866–1931)

Swedish Lutheran archbishop and pioneer in ecumenism. Söderblom was born January 15, 1866, at Trönö, Hälsingland, Sweden, and died February 12, 1931, at Uppsala, Sweden. After his ordination to the priesthood in 1893, Söderblom became the rector of the Swedish Church in Paris. He studied the ancient religions of Iran and received his doctorate in history of religions in 1901 at the Sorbonne. While in Paris he made a significant friend in AUGUSTE SABATIER. After Söderblom's disputation, he was immediately made professor of the history and philosophy of religions at the University of Uppsala. That post was linked to that of vicar of one of the parishes at Uppsala. As a priest as well as a professor, he made strong impressions on an entire generation of students. From his own years as a student onward, he was influenced by the theology of A. RITSCHL and J. Wellhausen, and he counts as a "modern" theologian. In his work Uppenbarelsereligion (The Religion of Revelation, 1903), he distinguished between natural-cultural religion and prophetic religion, and also between the non-Christian mysticism of indefiniteness and the specifically Christian mysticism of personality. This work marks the declaration of his theological program. Between the years 1912 and 1914 he was professor of the history of religions at the University of Leipzig. During that period he wrote Gudstrons uppkomst (The Emergence of Belief in God, 1914). As a summary of his research into the history of religions, his Gifford Lectures—The Living God. Basal Forms of Personal Religion—were posthumously published in 1933 (Swedish translation in 1932).

In 1914 Söderblom was appointed archbishop of Uppsala and thus became the head of the Church of Sweden. Already as a student, his interests had extended to the international scene. He took part in the YMCA World Congress in 1888 and again in 1891, and in the Christian Student Movement International Assembly at Northfield, Massachusetts in 1890. At Northfield the experience of the universality and unity of the Church became overwhelming and DWIGHT L. MOODY made a great impression. Thanks to his extensive and lifelong international contacts, Söderblom considered the First World War a challenge for the worldwide Christian churches to seek closer interconfessional and ecumenical relations. Immediately after his appointment as archbishop, he became a public critic of the political leaders of the nations at war, challenging them to work "for peace and Christian fellowship." In 1925 he issued the invitation to The Universal Conference on Life and Work in Stockholm, which gathered representatives, not only for the churches and denominations of the Reformation, but also for the Orthodox churches. The invitation had also been issued to the Holy See. Söderblom is thus the founder of the current Life-and-Work Movement as well as the inspiration behind it. This marks him as a portal figure of modern ecclesiastical ecumenism (see ECUMENISM). Inspired by Sabatier, Söderblom's ecumenical program was determined by the conflict he perceived between what he called the body and the soul of the Swedish Church (Svenska kyrkans kropp och själ, 1915), that is, between the temporary organization, confessions, and forms of services on the one hand and, on the other, the abiding prophetic calling of the church throughout the ages. He summarized his view on the nature of the church in the concept of "evangelical catholicity," thus clearly demarcating his position against both the Roman Catholic claim to universality and the liberal catholicity championed by some Anglicans. The church is "the one and only holy catholic and apostolic church," the global Christian community of "all honest souls in every specific denomination." As archbishop, he emphasized the historic ministry of episcopacy as well as the apostolic succession of the Church of Sweden, and he also consecrated bishops for the Evangelical Lutheran Churches in Estonia, Lithuania, and Slovakia. As an ecumenist, Söderblom, more than any other Swede, made an active contribution to international ecclesiastical developments. In 1930 he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in acknowledgment of his ecumenical achievements.

In 1941, on the seventy-fifth anniversary of Söderblom's birth, Nathan Söderblom-Sällskapet (Societas Soederblomiana Upsaliensis) was established in Uppsala, as a learned society of scholars, chiefly in history of religions and in exegetics; its yearbook is entitled Religion och Bibel (Religion and Bible).

See also Sweden

References and Further Reading

Brodd, S.-E. "A Swedish Archbishop between American and German Lutheranism. American Influences on the Ecumenical Strategies of Nathan Söderblom." Tro & Tanke (Uppsala) no. 3 (1997).

———. Evangelisk katolicitet. Ett studium av innehåll och funktion under 1800- och 1900-talen. [Summary: Evangelical Catholicity: A Study of Content and Function during the 19th and 20th Century]. Lund, Sweden: CWK Gleerup, 1982.

Curtis, C.J. Nathan Söderblom, Theologian of Revelation. Chicago: Covenant Press, 1966.

Dahlgren, S. "Nathan Söderblom as European." Tro & Tanke (Uppsala) no. 7 (1993).

Nathan Söderblom in memoriam [with bibliography by S Ågren]. Stockholm: Svenska kyrkans diakonistyrelses bokförlag, 1931.

Sharpe, E.J. Nathan Söderblom and the Study of Religion. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.

Sundkler, B. Nathan Söderblom. His Life and Work. Lund, Sweden: Gleerups, 1968.

OLOPH BEXELL

SOUTH AFRICA

Throughout history, religion has played a major role in the South African context. This is equally true of Roman Catholicism, Eastern Orthodoxy, and Protestantism. In a historical overview, attention is given to the origin and rise of Protestantism in three major periods in South African history. Aspects such as the sociopolitical context and theological developments also receive necessary focus.

The Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

The original inhabitants of South Africa consisted primarily of the indigenous Khoikhoi (Hottentot) herdsmen and San (Bushmen) hunters, together known as the Khoisan. Elsewhere in southern Africa there dwelt various Bantu-speaking peoples. Although the Khoisan and black groups had a common origin, thousands of years of separated development resulted in widely different lifestyles, languages, and cultures. With the permanent settlement of Europeans, beginning at the Cape in 1652 and reaching toward the interior, came radical changes to the structure and nature of South African society.

Europe made first contact with indigenous South Africans in 1488 when Bartholomeu Diaz (d. 1500) rounded the Cape of Good Hope. The period between 1488 and 1652 saw intermittent contact between the Khoisan and the Portuguese, English, and Dutch navigators. The temporary nature of the European visits to the Cape allayed any fears the Khoisan might have had that the visitors would establish themselves permanently at the Cape and subdue them, creating a false sense of security among the Khoisan.

In the periods of European imperialism (1500–1800) and Western neo-imperialism (1880–1920), the establishment of overseas colonies took a variety of forms. The colony at the Cape was originally established by Jan van Riebeeck (1619–1677) as a replenishment station. The Reformed tradition in South Africa had its beginnings with the arrival of the Dutch in 1652, the early German settlers in the 1660s, and the French Huguenots in 1688. Except for a few cases, these settlers were Protestants. The Dutch and French settlers were Calvinists.

On April 6, 1652 Jan van Riebeeck arrived in Table Bay. For the first few months his company of some ninety people lived in tents. Work immediately commenced on the erection of a fort, and on June 4 the first “sick-comforter,” Willem Wylant, and his family moved in. The sick-comforters were initially responsible for the spiritual welfare of the settlers. Before any man could be appointed sick-comforter, he had to furnish a testimonial to his life and beliefs, pass an examination in doctrine, and prove his competence in reading aloud and in leading in singing. A commission of the classis (PRESBYTERY) of Amsterdam was charged with the task of examining and recommending sick-comforters to the directors of the company.

Although a number of Khoikhoi became economically involved in the establishment of the replenishment station at the Cape, there was little involvement on their part in the church. No Khoikhoi was, for instance, baptized before 1662.

The first thirteen years of the settlement at the Cape can be seen as the period when the church was incompletely constituted. Although there was no established church, it existed nonetheless: the faithful gathered for public worship and the sacraments were administered.

The ideas of European ENLIGHTENMENT had only a limited influence on the colony. Bearers of enlightened ideas to the Cape were chiefly travelers on the ships that called regularly at the Cape. They were mainly representatives of political movements, students who traveled to Europe to study, correspondents between the two continents, and adventurers and retired sailors who sometimes acted as teachers. Colonists at the Cape were also influenced by the Eighty Years War (1568–1648) in Europe and the patriotic movement in the NETHERLANDS. As a consequence of the FRENCH REVOLUTION (1789), the rights and freedom of citizens became subjects of intense discussion. It was a stormy period, concerned to some extent with righteousness, justice, and freedom. There was a widespread spirit of distrust in and opposition to the government.

The year 1688 saw the population of the Cape considerably increased, and Protestantism (more specifically the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH) further strengthened with the arrival of the French Huguenots. The Edict of Nantes, which had granted the Huguenots a certain degree of religious freedom, was revoked in October 1685, resulting in a great number of Huguenots fleeing from France. Many emigrated to the Netherlands, where French-speaking Protestant communities already existed. These “Walloon” congregations dated from the period when French-speaking Reformed Church members fled from the southern Netherlands (the present Belgium), to escape Spanish domination.

In the course of the next decades the Dutch colonists gradually trekked further into the hinterland. The great distances prevented them from attending church services regularly. At times ministers journeyed to their members in the remote districts to conduct services and administer the sacraments. Governor General van Imhoff (1705–1750) undertook a journey through the colony in 1743. On his return he made Governor Swellengrebel (1700–1760) aware of the need to create two new congregations with a school-master for each.

Shortly after the first Dutch Reformed minister, Van Arckel’s, arrival in 1665, the church council decided that Lutherans of good standing would be permitted to partake of the Lord’s Supper, but a letter written by the church council to the classis of Amsterdam in 1714 indicates that by that date this provision had been set aside. The classis replied that if they held to a correct doctrine of justification, Lutherans might certainly be admitted to the sacrament. As a result several Lutherans presented themselves at the Lord’s table. These people had been in the habit of attending divine worship, and they already constituted a considerable section of the population.

In 1742 a petition signed by sixty-nine people was presented to the Council of Policy, asking for permission to request from the Dutch Council of Seventeen a minister for the local Lutherans and to be allowed to hold public worship. The Council of Policy rejected the petition on the grounds that it was ill timed. In the course of the next years various further requests for permission were submitted.

Eventually, in 1780, the first Lutheran minister, Andrew Kolver, landed at the Cape. On December 10 the warehouse built by Martin Melck and the grounds on which it stood were granted to the congregation and formally consecrated as a church. The Dutch Reformed church council of Cape Town now had to accept the inevitable.

To begin with, a good understanding prevailed between the two congregations, though the departure of the Lutherans from the Dutch Reformed Church had the immediate effect of decreasing the number of young people coming forward to profess their faith. This led the church council to take what steps it could to ensure that the Lutherans did not expand at the expense of the Dutch Reformed Church.

The Lutherans were granted freedom of worship on the same basis as their fellow-Lutherans in Batavia. One of the stipulations was that in the case of parents belonging to different churches, the boys were to be baptized in the father's church, the girls in the mother's church. These parents were also permitted to have all their children, boys as well as girls, baptized in the Dutch Reformed Church, if they so desired.

The Nineteenth Century

The British settlers of 1820 were to have a considerable influence on developments in South Africa. These settlers came from Europe and Britain which, after the French Revolution and the following Napoleonic wars, faced serious political, economic, and social problems. Although the influx of English people to the eastern Cape was small in comparison to their emigration to other parts of the world, the approximately 4,000 settlers were strongly resolved in their determination to improve the quality of their lives. This goal was not to be realized in the short term; the climatic conditions to which they had to adapt and various disturbances on the eastern border were serious setbacks. Accustomed as they were to the rule of law and a parliamentary government, the settlers were critical of the authoritarian style of government at the Cape. After 1825 the process of constitutional government and the development of the legal system gradually took place.

The Great Trek was not "great" because of the numbers participating in it, but rather because of the far-reaching sociopolitical implications it was to have. By the middle of the nineteenth century the interior had been transformed into an interdependent multiracial society characterized by both cooperation and conflict. With the passage of time, the Great Trek was regarded as an Afrikaner national movement, and the great majority of the Afrikaner people were later to identify themselves with its ideals.

The discovery of gold and diamonds had explosive economic, social, and political results for the subcontinent of South Africa, beginning in the second half of the nineteenth century. This was to become the heart-beat of the South African economy, ushering in the industrial period and giving rise to a new capitalist society. The process of urbanization, especially in the diamond city of Kimberley and the gold city of Johannesburg, brought about radical changes in South African demography. Dramatic political developments left their mark on relations both within and outside the country. For the black community, all these events brought about the disintegration of their traditional socioeconomic structures.

The Church Order of de Mist, formally known as the “Provisional Ecclesiastical Decree of the Batavian Settlement at the Cape of Good Hope,” appeared on July 25, 1804. It was an important watershed in South African church history, particularly because of its implications for the relationship between church and state and for wider religious freedom at the Cape.

The second half of the nineteenth century saw a split among Afrikaans churches into three churches: the larger Dutch Reformed Church (Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk), the Nederduitsch Hervormde Kerk van Afrika, and the Gereformeerde Kerk. Theological issues and ecclesiastic and political differences played a role. (Because it is virtually impossible to translate the names of these churches into English and still to be able to differentiate between them, the Afrikaans names are used.) The Nederduitse Gereformeerde was born in South Africa as a historical continuation of the Reformed Church in the Netherlands. The Nederduitsch Hervormde Kerk van Afrika also lays claim to this continuation, but was in fact a new church that originated in the Transvaal with the arrival of the Reverend Dirk van der Hoff (1814–1881) in 1853. The Gereformeerde Kerk was founded in 1859 by Reverend Dirk Postma (1818–1890). The Gereformeerde Kerk objected to hymns sung in the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk at the Cape.

The missionary calling of the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in the late nineteenth century seems to have receded into the background in the face of problems of institutional consolidation. Pastoral care in the new situations created by the diamond mining and slums seems to have been neglected. One generation later, Pentecostal services on the Rand drew huge crowds of poor whites, including many Nederduitse Gereformeerde members.

One of the key reasons why British missionaries came to South Africa was the great missionary thrust of European Protestant churches during the nineteenth century. Also, when British rule was established for the second time (1806), soldiers from different British denominations came looking for fellowship and a spiritual home. At the time, the CHURCH OF ENGLAND based at the Cape thought of itself as an outstation of Canterbury, with all the rights of the establishment, only to find out inadvertently (in the Colenso litigation) that legally this was not the case. Although the first bishop, Robert Gray, had been appointed in 1847, the diocese was only given the status of an Anglican Province in 1866.

Missionary work was undertaken by the Anglican Church, though missionaries reported directly to the bishop and were therefore in a different position than other clergy; thus the organizational unity of the church was not jettisoned. This work continued quietly, with the result that the church of the province was able to create the dioceses of St. John’s (Transkei, 1873; and Zululand, 1870). Concern for the welfare of members on the goldfields prompted the bishop of Zululand to proclaim the diocese of the Transvaal—a fine example of the give and take between outreach to the heathen and the unchurched.

Long before a Methodist minister could be sent to the Cape, the initiative was taken by laypeople to gather members of this confession into a fellowship. Even when Barnabas (1788–1857) and William Shaw (1798–1872) arrived in their far-flung parishes, their call to minister to the needs of the white settlers could not stifle their concern for the salvation of the local people, work that was undertaken almost from the start, true to the spirit of the founder of this denomination. Work proceeded in Namaqualand, Caffraria, and Bechuanaland and a chain of mission stations was established from Caffraria to Natal. Frontier warfare not only destroyed mission buildings, but also greatly affected the evangelism. Lack of funds necessitated the transfer of some of the mission stations north of the Orange River, respectively, to the Rhenish Mission, to the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk, and to the Anglicans from the late 1860s. This purposeful mission to black South Africans ensured that the Methodist Church would eventually have more black members than any of the other mainline denominations.

The work to convert whites had already commenced in Cape Town, as well as by the 1820 Settlers. By 1860 there were 132 Methodist missionaries/ministers in the eastern Cape and Natal, and their flock numbered 5,000. English immigration swelled the number of whites, particularly in the Kimberley and Reef areas, and the Methodist Church became the largest of the English-speaking churches in South Africa. The whole church was divided into different geographical circuits. The Methodist missionaries were more sympathetic to the colonists' point of view regarding the frontier situation in the Ciskei, most probably because they worked among white settlers as well as with the black tribes beyond the frontier. Though John Philip regarded the Methodists as traitors to black people, they did much to restore the image of the missionary among the colonists.

By 1829, when the Presbyterians erected their first church, St. Andrew's in Cape Town, Presbyterian services had already been started by Thomas Pringle in the Eastern Province, John Brownlee was working at Chumic, and Lovedale had also been established. Lovedale produced not only indigenous ministers but provided artisan and academic education on an interdenominational and nonracial basis. It was rated as one of the foremost educational centers in South Africa. Missionary outreach, especially by the Glasgow Mission Society, London Mission Society (LMS), Free Church of Scotland, and expansion of the work to convert whites to Natal in the Orange Free State (OFS), and later to Kimberley and the goldfields continued. Adams, Grout, and Lindley did pioneer work among the Zulus in Natal.

The beginnings of the Baptist Church in South Africa were modest, and were primarily concerned with finding members and establishing fellowship groups among the 1820 settlers. The first Baptist service was held by William Miller in the Albany district. Baptists, too, had a passion for reaching the unconverted, something they shared with the Methodists, in contrast to the complacent Anglican attitude toward mission work at the time. Their numbers were appreciably swelled with the arrival of co-religionists among the German Legion settlers (1857), who settled in the King William's Town area.

The Baptists were the first of the Protestant English-speaking churches to begin conversion of Afrikaans-speaking people (Vrede). Once white congregations had been started in Durban and Pietermaritzburg, work began with the Zulu by the Swedish Baptists. The Baptist Union of 1877 evidenced the determination of this small and relatively poor denomination to live out its commission faithfully. Like the Anglican, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches (the last until the 1920s), the Baptists became a multiracial union with separate congregations and work.

Early in the nineteenth century, the LUTHERAN CHURCH was shaken by theological controversies over baptism and missionary work among the slaves at the Cape, a most emotive issue in those pre-abolition days. This led to a split in the congregation. An Afrikaner, who had served as interim minister, was not appointed as third minister to cater to the Dutch-speaking members of the congregation, and a German-speaking congregation seceded from the parent body, in which services were held regularly in both Low German and Dutch. This struggle between mission-consciousness and culture-oriented churchmanship stunted further expansion.

The missionary outreach, which the local white Lutheran congregation seemed to lack, was imported, so to speak, in the form of the Rhenish and Berlin Missions. They were located within the settled areas, Wuppertal, Stellenbosch, and the eastern frontier, but also far away in Namaqualand-Bethanie in the Orange Free State. Not only did their workers occasionally serve the dispersed white settlers in their jurisdictions, but sometimes they were also called to serve a white community, such as Sachs in Pretoria. Some even left mission work for this new calling (e.g., Döhne in Pietermaritzburg).

The Norwegian Mission Society workers served the Scandinavian community in Natal, just as the Hermannsburg missionaries served the small German communities in the Transvaal. The image of constant enmity and mutual accusations and suspicion between all missionary bodies and white settlers, especially in the Afrikaans Republics, seems to be a distortion.

During the period 1652 to 1795 the Dutch Reformed Church (Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk) was the state church in the Cape Colony. In the period of English rule from 1806 to 1875, both the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk and the Anglican Church were subordinated to the Cape government. After the introduction of the Voluntary Bill in 1875, these churches were allowed a far greater measure of freedom and independence. During this period both the Anglican and the Dutch Reformed churches experienced difficult heresy trials (the Colenso, Kotzé, and Burgers trials), after which they became increasingly unhappy about too close a relationship with the state. In both these cases, after an appeal by the accused to the state, the latter upheld the appeals. Disestablishment seemed the only option open to the churches. Therefore, contrary to their usual position on church-state relations, they supported Saul Solomon, a member of both Parliament and the CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, who tried for some time to convince Parliament to withdraw state aid to the churches. Finally in 1875, the Voluntary Bill was passed, and there has been no officially established church in South Africa since that time. All the churches in the Cape henceforth became free churches; free to pursue their affairs in their own way. The year 1875, therefore, is an important watershed in South African church history.

The Twentieth Century

Among the English-speaking Protestant churches, the Methodist Church has the second largest number of white members, and the largest number of black members. The Methodist Church in South Africa, which was started by Sergeant Kendrick, gradually spread throughout South Africa. At the local level, most congregations were still segregated according to race, while the multiracial character of the church was expressed in the highest of its church bodies, the conference. That multiracial character has also become increasingly expressed in district synods, and from January 1980 congregations became multiracial.

The United Congregational Church of Southern Africa was formed in 1967. It was a merger of three groups: the Congregational Union, which consisted of a union of separate congregations after the London Missionary Society withdrew from the Cape Colony in 1859; the London Missionary Society Church of Botswana and Zimbabwe; and the Bantu Congregational Church, which was a product of the labors of the American Board of Missions in Natal. Ecclesiastical authority is centered in the local church meeting, although each region holds a yearly meeting. An annual assembly is also held consisting of representatives of churches throughout South Africa.

The Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa traces its history at the Cape to 1806, when a Scottish regiment founded a Calvinist association. In 1812 the first Presbyterian congregation was founded, with the Reverend George Thom (1789–1842) as its minister. From Cape Town the work spread over the entire country. In 1897 the Presbyterian Church accepted as its doctrinal standard the Twenty-four Articles of the Faith, which were drawn up in 1890 by the Presbyterian Church of Britain. At the general assembly level the races are united, but they are divided on a congregational level.

It could be agreed that various theological, and some other factors, helped to influence developments in the English-speaking churches: The English-speaking churches came to South Africa during or shortly after European upheavals and the rise of British movements such as the Enlightenment, the Industrial Revolution, and the Methodist revival. This means that they were in varying degrees under the influence of biblical and theological criticism, scientific optimism, liberal and pietistic evangelicalism, and deeply aware of and influenced by the struggle against slavery, child labor, and in the case of the nonconformists, the struggle against the established church itself.

The Lutheran Church, and in particular the German, Norwegian, Swedish, Finnish, and American Lutheran missionary societies, made a major contribution to the evangelization of South Africa. The Moravian, Rhenish, Berlin, and Hermannsburg missionary societies were among the first to pioneer missionary work in South Africa. The missionary activities of the Lutheran churches fall into three clear phases: a pioneering period (1829–1889), a period of cooperation (1889–1959), and a period of consolidation (since 1959).

Various attempts were made during the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries toward greater understanding between the churches in South Africa. Movements were launched from various quarters, either to promote Christian and church unity, or to protect the churches against deviant teachings. One of these was the Evangelical Alliance, which, for instance, the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk joined as far back as 1857. The emphasis was on Christian unity in and through prayer. The alliance played a prominent role for many years with Dr. Andrew Murray as one of the leading figures.

The Presbyterian Alliance, which was founded in 1875, was very significant for the South African churches that followed the Presbyterian Church order. Contacts are still maintained between these churches. Delegates from the English-speaking churches and from the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk have regularly attended the alliance's international congresses. Even during the turbulent years of the Anglo-Boer War, a delegation of the Nederduitsch Hervormde or Gereformeerde Church of the Transvaal (the present Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk) attended the alliance's conference overseas. The former Presbyterian Alliance is now known as the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, to which several South African churches still belong.

The Methodist Church of South Africa, as well as the Lutheran, Baptist, and Anglican Churches, all participated in the great international gatherings of their respective denominations (the Anglican Lambeth conferences are particularly well known). This worldwide interaction between churches of the same confession or church order helped to promote ecumenism, albeit in a restricted sense.

There have also been various attempts to bring about unity between the English-speaking churches. In 1928 the Presbyterian, Congregational, and Methodist churches sought closer cooperation because, in their view, a divided church in South Africa could not effectively uphold the principles of evangelical religion. After the Methodists withdrew, the matter was taken up again in 1934. After various fruitless attempts to unite, the attempted union was abandoned in 1947. After the instigation of the Lambeth Conference in 1958, the Anglican Church initiated discussions with the Presbyterian Church in 1960. These talks were extended to include the Tsonga Presbyterian Church, the three Congregational Churches, and the Methodist Church. Talks between the three Presbyterian churches and the Congregationalists have shown the most progress. However, this was checked in 1976 when the Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa advocated a federation, while the other three churches supported organic union. The Church Unity Commission has, nonetheless, continued to work for unity between the Anglicans, Presbyterians, Methodists, and Congregationalists, and several united churches have already been formed.

The South African Council of Churches (SACC) remains one of the few comprehensive ecumenical organizations in South Africa. Its weakness is that it does not represent all the churches and missions in the country. At first, all the Afrikaans churches and the majority of Evangelical churches remained outside its organization. Nonetheless, it has created a fellowship for dialogue among a wide and representative group of churches. At present the SACC is undoubtedly the most comprehensive and ecumenical church organization in South Africa, embracing churches of all racial groups and almost all languages. Its aim is to promote church unity, coordinate church and missionary endeavors, and undertake joint enterprises.

The strained situation experienced in South Africa during the 1950s and 1960s acquired a fresh dimension with the Soweto riots in 1976, when black youth demonstrated their dissatisfaction with the state's education policy and the existence of certain laws, which broke up homes, families, and ordinary life. In 1976 there was widespread unrest that assumed far greater dimensions than the events following the Sharpeville uprising in 1960. Young people were no longer prepared to accept the situation in which they found themselves. Soweto gradually became a national symbol of a new generation of nationally and politically conscious black people in South Africa.

Meanwhile, the Afrikaans-speaking churches followed the national government in the crucial matter of racial discrimination. However, some South African churches (including the Afrikaans-speaking churches), were part of the rapid developments in social and political reforms. They have expressed their concern and involvement through discussions, talks, conferences, and concrete action.

During the 1980s events in the church were in continued flux and change: the Nederduitsch Hervormde Kerk resigned from the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, the banning order on Dutch Reformed Church Clergyman and anti-apartheid activist Beyers Naudé was lifted, Bishop Desmond Tutu received the Nobel peace prize, and documents like “Church and Society,” “Evangelical Witness,” and the “Kairos Document” were published.

At the beginning of the 1990s, the progress of ecumenical relations in South Africa remained uncertain. Within South Africa the gulf between the so-called evangelical churches on the one hand and members of the SACC on the other remained, and there were few signs of reconciliation or greater mutual understanding.

The political situation in South Africa was charged with a desire for negotiations between the major political players, and a spirit of uncertainty and expectancy emerged in broader society. In this connection, the consultation of Christian Churches at Rustenburg in November 1990, where leaders of different churches gathered to discuss their Christian witness, proved historically significant, because it was the largest and most representative gathering of Christian churches ever held in South Africa.

In the critical period of negotiations and transition toward a new South Africa in the last decade of the twentieth century, church and religion in general, and Protestantism more specifically, played a decisive and formative role. Naturally, not all the positive developments during these years can be attributed to either the direct or indirect role of the churches. It can, however, be stated that without the presence, witness, and involvement of the Protestant Churches, South Africa may have advanced further along the road to violence and possibly civil war. Without the churches, the uncertain process of transition would have been far more difficult and much more dangerous.

Involvement in church life and church affairs in South Africa is still at a high level, both in rural and urban areas. The different Protestant churches are well served by ministers, officials, and laity. Ministers of churches are still respected members of the community, and apart from the ministry, they serve in various other spheres as well. The church enjoys freedom of worship and is therefore free to fulfill its prophetic task toward governmental institutions. By and large, the importance of religion in South Africa cannot be overemphasized, and Protestantism plays a major role in the consolidation, expansion, and development of church and society.

In the global context of the twenty-first century, issues such as democratization, high moral values, non-racism, justice, reconciliation, reconstruction, and development will probably be the order of the day. In some ways South African society, particularly because of the Protestant churches’ involvement, is showing the way to that future.

References and Further Reading

Balia, D. Black Methodists and White Supremacy in South Africa. Durban: Madiba Publications, 1991.

- Bredenkamp, H., and R.Ross, eds. Missions and Christianity in South African History. Johannesburg: Witwatersrand University Press, 1995.
- Cochrane, J. Servants of Power: The Role of the English-speaking Churches, 1903–1930. Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1987.
- Davenport, T.R.H. South Africa: A Modern History. Bergvlei: Southern Book Publishers, 1987.
- De Gruchy, J.W. The Church Struggle in South Africa. Cape Town: David Philip, 1979.
- Elphick, R., and R.Davenport, eds. Christianity in South Africa: A Political, Social and Cultural History. Cape Town: David Philip, 1997.
- Hofmeyr, J.W., and G.J.Pillay, eds. A History of Christianity in South Africa. Vol. 1. Pretoria: Haum, 1994.
- Prozesky, M., ed. Christianity in South Africa. Bergvlei: Southern Publishers, 1990.

J.W.HOFMEYR

SOUTH INDIA, CHURCH OF

On September 27, 1947, the same year in which INDIA achieved her independence, the Church of South India was inaugurated. This event concluded nearly thirty years of negotiations, which concerned matters of DOCTRINE, LITURGY, ordination, and SACRAMENT. The Church of South India united the Anglican dioceses of India, Myanmar (Burma), and Ceylon (Sri Lanka) with the Methodist Church of South India and the South Indian United Church (SIUC). The SIUC itself was established in 1908 and included Presbyterian, Reformed, and Congregational churches. The South Indian union scheme sought to preserve distinctive features of each of its historic traditions, while tailoring them to the Indian context.

The formation of the Church of South India was the product of two distinct, but overlapping processes: movement toward ecumenical cooperation between Western-based churches and missionary societies, and the rise of Indian NATIONALISM. To a great extent, this spirit of cooperation was prompted by the imperatives of missionary work in societies where Christians were in a small minority. Limited resources in the field, conflicts over spheres of influence, and a growing need for churches to accommodate local converts from wide-ranging ethnic and denominational backgrounds all prompted ecumenical dialogue.

Since the mid-nineteenth century, mission societies in India established regular conferences to discuss their common objectives. Local or provincial conferences during the 1850s and 1860s were followed by a General Missionary Conference held in Allahabad in 1872, consisting of 136 missionaries who were predominantly European. In 1900, the South Indian Missionary Conference in Madras drew nearly 150 missionaries representing forty-five missionary organizations. Among these were the London Missionary Society, CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, American Baptist Mission, and SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL. Subsequently, missionaries in the main Christian centers of South India, Madras, and Bangalore organized themselves into missionary conferences. Organizations such as the Christian Literature Society, the YMCA (see YMCA, YWCA), and the Christian Endeavor Convention, along with the leadership of Madras Christian College were instrumental in bringing European and Indian church leaders together in dialogue. This climate of ecumenical dialogue helped prepare the way for the formal union of churches embodied the Church of South India.

In 1919, delegates from Anglican and SIUC churches met in Tranquebar to explore a scheme that would lay the groundwork for the formation of the Church of South India. G.Sherwood Eddy, H.A. Popely, V.Santiago, Meshach Peter, and V.S.AZARIAH drafted a manifesto that stressed the importance of church unity. This manifesto sought to reconcile the Anglican emphasis on the historical episcopate with the SIUC's emphasis on the spiritual equality of all believers. The delegates proposed a union on the basis of a common regard for the Old and New Testaments, belief in the Apostle's and Nicene Creeds, the sacraments of BAPTISM and the LORD'S SUPPER, and the historic episcopate, "locally adapted" (Sundkler 1954:102). At the Lambeth Conference of Anglican bishops the following year, questions of "reordination" and "rebaptism" for members of the united church and intercommunion were discussed at length.

Since the deliberations of 1919, the relationship between the "Church of England in India" and the colonial government weighed heavily on those involved in negotiations for church union. Leaders of free churches insisted that they would enter a union only with a disestablished church. In response to such concerns, a decision was made in December 1927 to replace the designation "Church of England in India" with "Church of India, Burma, and Ceylon." Anglican leaders were willing to regard the same as a "disestablished Anglican province" (Sundkler 1954:157). This decision significantly raised hopes that ecumenical union between Anglican and non-Anglican churches could be realized in India.

Influence of Nationalism

The disestablished character of the envisioned church union was particularly significant in light of the rise of Indian nationalism. Into the 1920s and 1930s, Mohandas K. Gandhi led Indians in a campaign of nonviolent civil disobedience against the British raj in India. An important aspect of Indian nationalism was swadeshi, a doctrine of economic, political, and cultural self-reliance. Under the influence of this ideology, Indian Christian leaders stressed the need to "Indianize" Christianity.

For some, Indianization involved efforts to make the church more "Hindu" or Sanskritic in its LITURGY, hymnody (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS), and ARCHITECTURE. For others, Indianization called for greater representation of Indians within the ranks of Christian institutions. At a time when the British raj itself was implementing policies of devolution, which increased Indian representation within every branch of government, ecumenical circles stressed the need to implement ideas of the former Church Missionary Society secretary, Henry Venn. Known today as the father of the "indigenous church" principle, Venn advocated the rapid transfer of influence and responsibility of church administration into indigenous hands.

Since the late nineteenth century, several key indigenizing projects emerged: Pulny Andy's National Church, Sadhu Sunder Singh's Christo Samaj, and the Christian Ashram Movement. Together, these move-ments envisioned an Indianized Christianity that was to be free from the denominational divisions that afflicted the Western church. Some advocates of this vision expressed their views through the evolving Christian press of South India, most notably the newspaper The Guardian.

In 1938, a group of Indian Christian intellectuals published Rethinking Christianity in India, which among other things took objection to the South Indian union scheme. According to theologian Vengal Chakkarai, the union scheme was a Western invention that addressed Western denominational illnesses more than it did Indian realities. Another member of the Rethinking Group, P.Chenchiah, contended that the debates over the church union scheme were steeped in Western ecclesiastical history. As such, they were irrelevant to the masses of illiterate Indian laypersons far removed from that history. Attitudes of the Rethinking Group downplayed the church as a visible, dogmatic institution, drawing attention to its “inner core” of spirituality that suited the Indian ethos.

Such criticisms show how participants in the debate over church union were able to view it either as a genuinely Indian project or as a Western one that was being foisted on Indians. J.E.LESSLIE NEWBIGIN, former Church of South India Bishop in Madura and Ramnad and an ardent ecumenist, advocated the union precisely because it addressed the heterogeneous character of Indian congregations and provided a more effective means for EVANGELISM. Alternative perspectives were put forth not only by advocates of a more “Indianized” Christianity, but also by those who would later embrace Donald MacGavran’s principles of church growth, which emphasized the value of segregating congregations on the basis of caste.

See also Dialogue, Interconfessional; Ecumenism; Missions; Missionary Organizations

References and Further Reading

- Job, G.V., et. Al: Rethinking Christianity in India. Madras, India: A.N.Sudarisanam, 1938.
- Harper, Susan Billington: In the Shadow of the Mahatma: Bishop V.S.Azariah and the Travails of Christianity in British India. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans and Richmond, Surrey, UK: Curzon Press, 2000.
- Hollis, Michael. The Significance of South India. Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1966.
- Neill, Stephen C. Men of Unity. London: SCM, 1960.
- Newbigin, J.E.Lesslie. The Reunion of the Church: A Defense of the South India Scheme. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1948.
- Paton, David M., “Ecumenism in Action: A Historical Survey of the Church of South India,” Ecumenical Review, 25 (1973), 375–376.
- Rajaiah, D.Paul. Ecumenism in Action: Church of South India, An Assessment Madras, India: Christian Literature Society, 1972.
- Samartha, Stanley., “Vision and Reality: Reflections on the Church of South India, 1947–1997,” Lexington Theological Quarterly, 33 (1998), 47–60.
- Stackhouse, Max L., “Tensions Beset the Church of South India,” Christian Century, 104, no. 25, S 9–16, 1987, 743–744.
- Sundkler, Bengt. Church of South India: The Movement Towards Union, 1900–1947. London: Lutterworth Press, 1954.
- Webster, John B., “The Church of South India Golden Jubilee,” International Bulletin of Missionary Research, 22 (1998), 50–54.

CHANDRA MALLAMPALLI

SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION

This is the largest Protestant denomination in the United States, numbering some 17 million members in 38,000 congregations. While its largest constituency remains primarily in the American South, the convention includes churches that are located throughout the United States and Canada. Its missionary task force at home and abroad is also one of the largest in the world.

The Southern Baptist Convention (SBC) was founded at First Baptist Church, Augusta, Georgia in May 1845, as a result of a schism with Baptists in the north regarding the appointment of slaveholding missionaries by the General Missionary Convention of the Baptist Denomination in the United States for Foreign Missions (Triennial Convention). The Baptist missionary society, founded in 1814 as a means of promoting and funding the mission enterprise, was the first national organization of BAPTISTS in the United States. After years of remaining neutral on the slave question, the Triennial Convention was confronted with a test case when Georgia Baptists demanded the appointment of James Reeve, a southern slaveholder, as a home missionary. When the mission board denied the appointment, declaring “we can never be a party to any arrangement which would imply approbation of slavery,” Baptists in the South formed a new convention to promote their own missionary cause.

Convention Organization

The SBC soon established a convention system that was much more connected than the earlier society method of forming Baptist organizations. Societies were autonomous, freestanding agencies funded by churches, associations of churches, and individuals to carry out specific functions such as home and foreign missions, publishing, and education. The convention system linked those agencies in a more centralized, connected organization. While boards and agencies retained their own boards of trustees, they were not completely autonomous, but agencies of the entire convention. Trustees were appointed by the convention, not by self-perpetuating boards. Nonetheless, local Baptist churches retained their autonomy and could unite with local associations of churches, state Baptist conventions, and the national Southern Baptist Convention. State conventions, many formed before the SBC itself, maintained their own regional organizations and programs. They founded and supported state Baptist colleges and universities, hospitals, and other regional endeavors. Many Baptist colleges in the South were founded before the beginning of the SBC. These include what is now the University of Richmond, Virginia (1832); Wake Forest University, North Carolina (1834); Furman University, South Carolina (1826); Samford University, Alabama (1841); and Baylor University, Texas (1846).

Associations of churches were formed for fellowship, ministry, and mutual encouragement by churches in a given geographic area, roughly paralleling townships or counties. Associations extended the work of local congregations within a more proximate region. All these connections meant that individual churches could maintain connections on local, regional, national, and (through the mission boards) international, operations.

This system encouraged the development of elaborate denominational programs for education, missions, publications, and evangelism. Home and foreign mission boards were established almost immediately. The first Southern Baptist foreign missionaries were appointed to China in 1846. In 1847 and 1848 the board also appointed two African Americans, John Day and B.J.Drayton, as missionaries to the African colony of LIBERIA.

The Domestic Mission Board, later called the Home Mission Board, was founded in Marion, Alabama in 1845. Russell Holman (1812–1879), a northerner, served as its first executive secretary, encouraging work with blacks, native Americans, and immigrants. Conflicts with Northern Baptist home missionaries after the CIVIL WAR and difficulties in raising funds made Southern Baptist efforts difficult until the 1880s, when I.T.Tichner (1825–1902) assumed leadership and put the organization on more solid financial and organizational foundations.

In 1859 the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary was founded in Greenville, South Carolina, to provide ministerial education for the new denomination. Its first faculty was composed of four prominent educators: John A.Broadus (1827–1895), James P.Boyce (1827–1888), Basil Manley, Jr. (1825–1892), and William Williams (1804–1895). Following the Civil War the school was relocated in Louisville, Kentucky in 1877.

Southern Baptists supported the Confederacy during the Civil War and experienced the desolation of defeat and Reconstruction. After the war, the denomination became one of the primary vehicles for perpetuating the “religion of the lost cause,” a reassertion of Southern morality and idealism amid the devastation of Northern conquest. Programmatic organization, evangelical zeal, and loyalty to the South combined to create a powerful denominational system and identity for Southern Baptists from Virginia to Texas. It is impossible to understand the development of the SBC apart from the relationship between Southern Baptist denominational programs and Southern culture that characterized the convention throughout the first 150 years of its history. The Foreign Missions Board was located in Richmond, Virginia. In 1882 the Home Missions Board was moved from Marion, Alabama, to Atlanta, Georgia. The Sunday School Board was founded in 1891 with headquarters in Nashville, Tennessee. It was charged with publishing monographs, denominational literature, and other resource materials for use in churches and schools. Concerns for the financial needs of ministers led to the founding of a relief and annuity board in 1918. In 1925 the SBC developed a cooperative program of collective funding whereby local church monies were sent to state Baptist conventions that retained a portion and then sent a percentage on to the national denomination, which then funded specific boards and agencies. Also in 1925, the convention established an executive committee to oversee denominational administration. A full-time president of the executive committee of the SBC is the chief administrative agent of that committee.

The Woman's Missionary Union (WMU) was founded as an auxiliary to the Southern Baptist Convention in 1888. Many of the males who led the convention were not sure that women should be included in the operations of the convention, and thus it began as a freestanding body alongside the official denominational organization. Its purpose was to raise support for women missionaries, to provide programs in mission education for youth, and to raise offerings for support of home and foreign missions. In 1907 the WMU founded a missionary training center for women in Louisville, Kentucky, a school that ultimately merged with the Southern Baptist Seminary in 1962 as the Carver School of Missions and Social Work. The school was closed in the 1990s.

The Women's Missionary Union sponsors two annual offerings for foreign and home mission programs, which raise millions of dollars for the support of Southern Baptist missionary activity. The Lottie Moon Christmas Offering, begun in 1888, honors the work of Charlotte Diggs (Lottie) Moon (1840–1912), one of the Southern Baptists' first single female missionaries in China. The Annie Armstrong Easter Offering for home missions is named for Annie Walker Armstrong (1850–1938), a founder of the WMU.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement of the Southern Baptist Convention was formed in 1907 for the purpose of educating and enlisting men in the church's missionary calling. It later became the Brotherhood Commission and is currently known as Baptist Men.

The Southern Baptist Convention meets annually, usually in mid-June, to elect officers, approve the annual budget, and conduct other matters of business. Worship services include elaborate music and a "convention sermon." The president of the convention is elected annually, and may serve two one-year terms. The president has primary responsibility for appointing nominating committees that name trustees to convention boards and agencies. Decision making at the annual meeting is vested in messengers sent from member congregations. To this day, congregational size and a minimal amount of financial support determine the number of representatives from each church. Southern Baptists distinguish delegates who might speak officially for congregations from messengers whose votes do not necessarily reflect the consensus of opinion in their specific church. No church may send more than ten messengers. A resolution admitting women as messengers was approved in 1918. Messengers are required to provide information regarding church contributions to the convention, and sign a statement that neither they nor the church they represent supports or affirms homosexuality in any way.

In 1919 Southern Baptists instituted the Seventy-five Million Campaign, an effort to raise $75,000,000 to alleviate debt and move the convention into a new era of denominational solvency. While the goal was not met, the convention did receive over $58,000,000.

The Sunday School Board of the Southern Baptist Convention publishes books on Baptist history, polity and doctrines, devotional works, and wide variety of materials for use in church educational programs. Its Sunday school materials, which include weekly lessons, provide Bible study guides for millions of Southern Baptists from Sunday to Sunday across the United States and throughout the world. Throughout much of the twentieth century, Sunday evening programs known variously as the Baptist Young People's Union (BYPU), Training Union, and Church Training, provided study courses in church history, Baptist studies, ethics, and Christian discipleship. While it continues in various forms, these evening events have declined steadily during the last two decades.

During the 1990s the names of many of the denominational agencies were changed. The Foreign Mission Board became the International Mission Board of the SBC, and the Home Mission Board became the North American Mission Board of the SBC. The Sunday School Board was renamed Lifeway Christian Resources of the Southern Baptist Convention.

By the 1950s the SBC had established six theological seminaries, funded by the denomination, and offering ministerial training at locations spread across the continent. These included the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky (1859); Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Fort Worth, Texas (1905); New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, New Orleans, Louisiana (1918); Golden Gate Baptist Theological Seminary, Mill Valley, California (1950); Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Wake Forest, North Carolina, (1956); and Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Kansas City, Missouri (1957). During the latter decades of the twentieth century, one out of five seminarians in the United States was registered in one of these schools. Southwestern Baptist Seminary, with an enrollment of several thousand students, remains the largest Protestant theological seminary in the world.

Evangelism

Evangelical zeal has long characterized the Southern Baptist Convention and its churches. One of the reasons for its dramatic increase in size following the war was its efforts to convert persons to faith and bring them into Baptist churches. Revival services were scheduled seasonally in most Baptist churches well into the twentieth century. These evangelical campaigns often ran for weeks at a time with calls for sinners to be converted, Christians to be renewed, and young people to surrender for full-time Christian service as ministers, missionaries, or other Christian workers. By the twenty-first century one- or two-week revivals were shortened to three or four days. Some churches, particularly in the southwest, continued the practice, while others gave it up all together, promoting abbreviated “renewal” services, “deeper life” conferences, or “preaching” series.

Many Southern Baptist churches and individuals place great emphasis on personal evangelism, or “soul winning,” the direct, one-on-one presentation of the “plan of salvation” culminating in an invitation to “trust Christ as Savior.” In many congregations, members are taught how to “witness” and encouraged to do so at every opportunity. Southern Baptist church members often testify to their conversion and entrance into Christian faith. At the same time, Southern Baptists also give serious attention to the nurturing of children to faith. The average age of baptism in most Southern Baptist churches is somewhere between nine and twelve years of age. Thus some members describe dramatic conversions while others testify to gradual nurturing into Christian faith.

Baptist Distinctives

Southern Baptists identified themselves with the broader Baptist movement, a tradition that began in 1608 in Holland when a group of Puritan Separatists, exiled from England, renounced their earlier infant baptism and received baptism on the basis of a profession of faith. A portion of the group returned to England in 1612, constituting a church in Spitalfields, just outside the walls of London. These were called General Baptists and were Arminian in their theology, affirming Christ's death for all persons, the role of human free will in salvation, the need for all persons to repent and believe in Jesus Christ, that God's grace could be accepted or resisted, and the possibility that believing individuals could fall from grace, thereby rejecting an earlier salvation. By the 1630s another group of Baptists had appeared in England, affirming the basic tenets of Calvinism or reformed theology. These Particular Baptists insisted that Christ died only for the elect, a number chosen unconditionally by God before the foundation of the world. Grace was irresistible to the elect and would ultimately claim them before they departed this world. Those who received grace could not reject it and would persevere to the end.

The first Baptist church in America was founded in Providence, Rhode Island, around 1639 by Roger Williams (1603–1683), the quintessential colonial dissenter. Baptists came into the south in the late 1690s when a Baptist congregation from Kittery, Maine, moved to Charleston, South Carolina, founding the first Baptist church there.

Baptists in the south were influenced by numerous Baptist traditions. These included the Regular Baptists, who came to Charleston and emphasized classic Calvinist doctrines, preferred ordered worship, and sang the Psalms, not “man-made” hymns. They were evangelicals in their concern that the elect be brought to salvation, but were often suspicious of revivalistic methods as too “enthusiastical” (overly emotional). Regulars encouraged their ministers to seek formal education. Revivals and awakenings throughout the colonies in the 1740s and 50s influenced the development of Separate Baptist churches that encouraged emotionalism in conversion and worship, permitted women to preach, and were suspicious of written creeds or confessions. Separate Baptists disparaged an educated or paid ministry. Separate Baptist presence in the South began in North Carolina in 1755 with the founding of the Sandy Creek Baptist Church by Shubal Stearns (1706–1771) and Daniel Marshall (1706–1784), popular preachers and church planters. As revivalism came to permeate Southern evangelicalism, many Southern Baptists softened their original Calvinism and placed greater emphasis on the general atonement of Christ and the possibility that all persons might freely choose salvation through repentance and faith.

From their beginnings in 1845, Southern Baptists were heirs of certain basic Baptist “distinctives,” common to the tradition worldwide. These included:

1. The authority of the Bible as the guide for faith and practice.
2. Freedom of conscience in matters of religious faith and practice.
3. A regenerate church membership. Each congregation was to be composed of believers only.
4. The autonomy of each local congregation.
5. Associational relationships between congregations.

6. Congregational polity.
7. The priesthood of the laity.
8. An ordained clergy to provide ministry in the churches.
9. Religious liberty in the church and the state.
10. Immersion baptism and the Lord's Supper as "ordinances" of the church.
11. A strong concern for evangelism and the missionary enterprise.

While Southern Baptists share these distinctives, they have not hesitated to disagree over the nature and meaning of each characteristic. The autonomy of the Southern Baptist system at almost every level insured differences of opinion, debate, and even schism, especially in local congregations. Indeed, denominational controversies and church splits have been so prevalent as to reinforce the saying: "Baptist churches multiply by dividing."

Throughout their history, Southern Baptists have differed on questions of doctrinal uniformity and denominational participation. Some insist that a basic doctrinal consensus is necessary for cooperation, while others suggest that Baptists may disagree on doctrinal definitions and work together in ministry. Freedom of conscience and autonomy of the local congregation are often promoted as allowing churches and individuals room for interpretation and disagreement. The need for orthodoxy and doctrinal consistency are viewed as essential for denominational stability and order. Those differences, long present in the SBC, became more pronounced in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries.

Worship Practices

Southern Baptists also reflect a variety of styles in the practice of public worship. Heirs of both the Regular and Separate Baptist traditions, Southern Baptist churches could be formal and orderly, as well as informal and spontaneous in their orders of worship. Heirs of a strong evangelical, revivalistic ethos, most placed great emphasis on preaching, calls to conversion, and opportunities for public commitment usually known as "invitations," or "altar calls," in which persons were invited to come forward in public professions of faith. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, shouts of "amen" or "hallelujah" were not uncommon in certain congregations across the South. HYMNS, usually sung to the accompaniment of organ or piano, included traditional English hymnody as well as frontier revival songs, and, more recently, simple praise choruses. The standard worship service incorporates prayers, hymns, Bible readings, an offering, musical selections from choirs or ensembles, and a sermon. Services generally conclude with an "invitation," or "call to Christian discipleship." The sermon remains the central element of Southern Baptist Sunday worship. It involves an extended commentary on specific texts of scripture in an effort to expound biblical teachings, encourage ethical behavior, and address pastoral needs of the worshipping congregation.

In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries some Southern Baptist clergy wore black "frock coats" (tails) in the pulpit. In some the ministers now wear pulpit robes. In certain contemporary worship services, the ministers were casual clothing in an effort to promote a less formal style. Most, however, conduct worship in business attire. Choirs in most Southern Baptist churches generally wear matching robes. In the nineteenth and much of the twentieth centuries, Southern Baptists generally held services on both Sunday and Sunday night, with a mid-week prayer meeting on Wednesdays. While that remains the norm in many congregations, other, particularly urban, congregations have given up Sunday evening services. Some have added two or three services on Sunday morning both to accommodate crowds and the schedules of their parishioners.

During the waning years of the twentieth century and the beginning of the twenty-first, a growing number of Southern Baptist churches developed what is sometimes known as contemporary worship services, aimed at younger audiences or at “seekers” who have little background or interest in traditional worship. These services promote informality in dress and content, utilize skits, videotapes, film, and drama along with sermons and praise choruses projected on screens above the congregation. Some of these services reveal the influence of the charismatic movement as practitioners lift their hands heavenward in prayer, clap and shout in worship services, and, perhaps, even speak in tongues. Debates over this more folksy, contemporary style have resulted in a variety of “worship wars” among Southern Baptists. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, Southern Baptist worship practices are increasingly varied and demonstrate significant diversity in theology and practice.

Controversies

Controversy has been a hallmark of Southern Baptist life since the beginning of the convention. Begun in schism and racism, the SBC struggled throughout its history with issues of race, generally supporting the institution of slavery before and during the Civil War, cooperating or at least acquiescing to Southern segregationists, and dividing over the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT. For example, Richard Furman (1755–1825), pastor of the First Baptist Church in Charleston, South Carolina, and one of the South’s most prominent ministers, articulated one of the most famous Biblical defenses of slavery (1822) produced in America. Although there were significant exceptions, most Southern Baptists participated in or remained silent about Jim Crow laws and other segregationist policies throughout most of the twentieth century. During the Civil Rights movement in the South, the SBC passed various resolutions calling for peaceful responses from blacks and whites, and urging an end to segregationist legislation. Nonetheless, innumerable churches debated and divided over the integration of schools and churches. In some cases church deacons stood at the doors of church buildings in an effort to obstruct the entry of African Americans and even Africans seeking a place to worship. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. (1929–1968) was invited to speak in the chapels of only two Baptist-related schools in the South, the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary and Wake Forest University. In 2000 the denomination officially apologized for its participation in the support of slavery and all that accompanied it. While the number of people of color was increasing significantly in the SBC in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, the SBC remains an overwhelmingly AngloSaxon denomination.

Another enduring controversy involved the Old Landmark Movement that began around 1859 in Tennessee and Kentucky. Initiated by J.R.Graves (1820–1893), Nashville Baptist preacher and editor, it involved the question of whether non-immersed ministers could officiate in Baptist churches. Graves's colleague, J.M.Pendleton, pastor of First Baptist Church in Bowling Green, Kentucky, concluded that they could not because their "pedobaptism" (infant baptism) was invalid. Landmarkists took their name from Proverbs 22:28, "Remove not the ancient Landmark, which thy fathers have set." They insisted that Baptist churches were the only true churches of Christ because they alone could trace their history in a succession of dissenting churches all the way back to Jesus's baptism by John the Baptist in the River Jordan. Landmark Baptists required the immersion of all those not baptized in Baptist churches and practiced "close" communion, limiting the participation in the Lord's Supper only to members of the congregation where it was being celebrated. While the SBC resisted Landmark attempts to impose their interpretations on the entire denomination, the Landmark legacy shaped baptismal and communion practices in many churches into the twenty-first century. Likewise, Landmark concern for the absolute autonomy of the local congregation led them to oppose denominationally-based mission agencies, financial programs, and general operations as too "hierarchical."

Anti-denominationalism was also a facet of the fundamentalist movement that developed in America in general and Baptist life in particular in the early twentieth century. Fundamentalism called the church to reassert the basic doctrines of Christianity, such as biblical inerrancy, Christ's virgin birth, his sacrificial atonement, his bodily resurrection, his second coming, and literal miracles. While Southern Baptists were theologically conservative and generally affirming of these dogmas, they resisted efforts to impose them on the entire convention. J.Frank Norris (1887–1952), pastor of First Baptist Church in Fort Worth, Texas, was a strong proponent of fundamentalism who denounced the denominational "machine," and charged that liberalism was present in many Baptist seminaries and universities in the south. His efforts were unsuccessful and he ultimately distanced himself from the SBC, helping to form the independent Baptist movement.

Largely in response to the fundamentalist-modernist controversy, the SBC approved its first official confession of faith known as the Baptist Faith and Message in 1925. Taken largely from the nineteenth-century New Hampshire Confession of Faith, it contained basic statements on biblical authority, the need for conversion, baptism by immersion, local church autonomy, and other doctrines. The confession was revised in 1963 and in 2000 and remains the denomination's doctrinal standard.

During the 1960s the denomination confronted two controversies regarding biblical authority and the use of historical/critical methods of biblical studies. In 1961 Broadman Press, the denominational publishing house, released a book entitled The Message of Genesis, written by Ralph Elliott, professor at the Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary in Kansas City, Missouri. Elliott's use of critical methods of biblical scholarship provoked an immediate response from Southern Baptist conservatives who felt that the book undermined the authority of the Scriptures. In response to the controversy, Broadman Press ceased publication of the book and Elliott was dismissed from his teaching position, not for his scholarly views, but for insubordination when he resisted a mandate from the seminary that he not republish the book.

In 1969 another controversy over biblical authority developed with the publication of a commentary on the book of Genesis in The Broadman Bible Commentary, a series published by Broadman Press. Written by British Baptist professor G.Henton Davies, the commentary also made use of critical methods of biblical study, with attention to the JEDP theories of multiple compilers of the Hebrew Torah. Convention conservatives again demanded that the book be rejected. Broadman Press editors responded by discontinuing publication of the volume and contracting with Southern Baptist Seminary professor Clyde Francisco for a new edition.

These controversies highlighted increasing division between convention conservatives and moderates over the theological underpinnings and leadership of the denominations. Conservatives insisted that the denomination was perched on a slippery slope that would lead to liberalism and the loss of orthodoxy. They were particularly concerned that professors in SBC seminaries did not adhere to the doctrine of biblical inerrancy, the belief that the Bible is totally without error in its original manuscripts on every subject it addresses.

In 1979 conservatives, led by Houston Appeals Court Judge Paul Presslar and conservative educator Paige Patterson, began a concerted effort to elect a series of SBC presidents who would use the appointive powers of that office to add trustees to convention boards who would promote inerrancy and other conservative agendas. At the annual SBC meeting in Houston, Texas they succeeded in electing Adrian Rogers, pastor of Bellevue Baptist Church in Memphis, Tennessee (a conservative), to the convention presidency. Conservatives declared that they were simply offering a “course correction” that would return the SBC to its orthodox origins. Moderates charged that the conservatives were attempting a take-over in order to gain political control of America’s largest Protestant denomination. For a decade, conservative and moderate Southern Baptists confronted each other every June in an effort to elect presidents sympathetic to their vision for the convention. Conservatives won every election and succeeded in changing the denominational boards enough to gain complete control of the national convention structure. So intense were the divisions that the 1985 SBC meeting in Dallas, Texas attracted some 45,000 messengers, the largest such gathering in the denomination’s history.

Biblical inerrancy was not the only divisive issue between the two groups. One significant debate involved the role of women in the church, particularly focused on the ordination of women to the Baptist ministry. The first ordination of a Southern Baptist woman occurred in 1964 when Addie Davis was ordained by the Watts Street Baptist Church in Durham, North Carolina. Others soon followed, and conservatives challenged such actions as a violation of biblical mandates that they believed limited the pastoral office only to males. In 1984 conservatives at the annual SBC meeting approved a (nonbinding) resolution stating that women should be excluded from the pastoral office on the basis of 1 Timothy 2:12ff in order “to preserve a submission God requires because the man was first in creation and a woman was first in the Edenic fall.” In 2000 the revision of the Baptist Faith and Message (the denomination’s confession of faith) declared officially that women were not to serve as pastors.

The controversy between conservatives and moderates had significant long-term effects on the nature and organization of the SBC. It produced a variety of divisions, even formal schisms, throughout the old SBC system. During the 1980s and 1990s, numerous Baptist colleges and universities chose to distance themselves from the state Baptist conventions that controlled them and appointed their trustees. The University of Richmond, along with Wake Forest, Furman, Samford, and Baylor Universities were among the schools that renegotiated their relationships with their parent bodies and asserted the right to appoint their own trustees while retaining varying Baptist connections. Likewise, as the six Southern Baptist seminaries came under complete control of the conservatives, new Baptist-related seminaries and divinity schools appeared. These included Beeson Divinity School at Samford University; Baptist Theological Seminary, Richmond, Virginia; George Truett Seminary at Baylor University; Logston School of Theology at Hardin-Simmons University, Abilene, Texas; McAfee School of Theology at Mercer University, Atlanta, Georgia; Christopher White School of Divinity at Gardner-Webb University, Boiling Springs, North Carolina; Campbell University Divinity School in Buies Creek, North Carolina; and Wake Forest University Divinity School in Winston-Salem, North Carolina. Baptist houses of study were also established at Duke Divinity School, Durham, North Carolina; Candler School of Theology at Emory University, Atlanta, Georgia; and Brite Divinity School at Texas Christian University, Fort Worth, Texas.

State Baptist conventions also reexamined their relationship with the national denomination. Baptist conventions in Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina generally affirmed the conservative directions of the convention, while the state conventions in Virginia and Texas reflected more moderate sentiments. In Texas and Virginia, conservatives formed their own state conventions, creating formal schisms with the traditional state organizations. The Baptist General Convention of Texas not only developed its own denomination-like programs, but also invited moderates from throughout the nation to join them. In other southern states moderates and conservatives maintained an uneasy coalition, often by permitting a variety of alternative funding possibilities for churches, thereby enabling them to designate money to conservative or moderate causes.

New Baptist organizations also developed out of the controversy in the Southern Baptist Convention. The Alliance of Baptists was founded in 1986 as a moderate/liberal “conscience” within the convention. Its member churches moved away from the denomination more rapidly than other moderate congregations. The alliance affirmed women’s ordination, academic freedom, and freedom of conscience.

The Cooperative Baptist Fellowship, founded in 1991, became a clearinghouse for moderate Baptist missionary, educational, and benevolent endeavors. Based in Atlanta, Georgia, it sends out missionaries, funds theological education, and provides resources for churches in areas of Christian education, Baptist identity, and church leadership. Many of its member churches retain their affiliation with the SBC.

In the year 2000 the denomination’s revision of its confession of faith, the Baptist Faith and Message, delineated more specific doctrinal and ethical concerns of the conservatives and further delineated the differences with the moderates. The revised document included additions regarding the “total truthfulness” of Scripture; opposition to abortion, adultery, and homosexuality; and the denial of the pastoral role to women. In their public statements on the role of the denomination in the “public square,” SBC leaders often believe themselves to be a counterculture movement, at odds with an increasingly secular society and churches that have sold out to the culture. All this makes it more difficult for moderate churches to continue formal association with the SBC.

The Southern Baptist denominational system was one of the most elaborate and enduring religious organizations in American religious history. Continued controversy between conservatives and moderates has led to significant restructuring of the denomination, the redefining of the nature of the convention, and the realignment of institutions and individuals connected with it. These changes make the Southern Baptist Convention an important case study in transitions in American denominational life, theology, and practice.

References and Further Reading

- Ammerman, Nancy Tatom. Baptist Battles. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers, 1990.
- Baker, Robert A. The Southern Baptist Convention and Its People, 1607–1972. Nashville: Broadman Press, 1972.
- Cohen, Grady C. What Happened to the Southern Baptist Convention? Macon, GA: Smyth & Helwys Publishers, 1993.
- Eighmy, John Lee. Churches in Cultural Captivity. Knoxville, TN: University of Tennessee Press, 1974.
- Encyclopedia of Southern Baptists*. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1958.
- Fletcher, Jesse C. The Southern Baptist Convention, A Sesquicentennial History. Nashville, TN: Broadman & Holman Publishers, 1994.
- James, Robison B., and David S. Dockery. Beyond the Impasse? Scripture, Interpretation, and Theology in Baptist Life. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1992.
- Leonard, Bill J. God's Last and Only Hope: The Fragmentation of the Southern Baptist Convention. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing, 1990.
- Wills, Gregory A. Democratic Religion, Freedom, Authority, and Church Discipline in the Baptist South. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Wilson, Charles Reagan. Baptized in Blood: The Religion of the Lost Cause. Athens, GA: University of Georgia Press, 1980.

BILL J. LEONARD

SOUTHERN PROTESTANTISM

The Southern United States, popularly called the Bible Belt, has long been a bastion of an evangelical Protestantism inclined toward ORTHODOXY in belief. Historical reality undergirds that perception, although there has also consistently been a substratum of diversity even within Southern Protestantism. This complex story has roots in the earliest English colonial settlements in the region.

English immigrants who made their first permanent settlement in Virginia in 1607 were decidedly Protestant, by birth members of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, by inclination attracted to Puritan ways. In each Southern colony, although the timetable differed, the Church of England in time became legally established, supported by tax monies and often the only recognized form of Christianity. Throughout the colonial period Anglican churches in the South had too few CLERGY to make this tradition vital and dynamic and had to rely on the bishop of London for episcopal oversight (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPALY). In addition, when the first Africans forced to migrate as slaves arrived in 1619, Anglicans were ambivalent about whether to seek slave CONVERSIONS; they were also ignorant of how African tribal sensibilities continued to provide a substratum of religious meaning for the slave population. White Anglican laymen assumed greater control over parish life than was the case in ENGLAND, and, for many, religion was more an expression of rational gentility than of deep piety.

Before the era of independence, however, other Protestant currents were undermining Anglican dominance. Evangelist GEORGE WHITEFIELD in the mid-eighteenth century preached a more enthusiastic style of the gospel, whereas the steadily increasing migration of Scots-Irish into the Southern upcountry along the eastern slopes of the Appalachian mountain chain also brought a decidedly more evangelical cast to Southern religious life. By the time of independence, which left the Church of England in disarray, EVANGELICALISM was poised to dominate Southern Protestantism.

Evangelicalism's penetration into the South owed much to itinerant Methodist CIRCUIT RIDERS and Separate Baptists preachers whose mobility enabled them to reach people where they were (see BAPTISTS, UNITED STATES; METHODISM; METHODISM, NORTH AMERICA). With a more emotionally charged emphasis on personal conversion, evangelicals appealed especially to WOMEN and to African Americans. The evangelical message offered spiritual power to those on the margins of the larger society. In addition, by stressing experience over intellectual formulation, Evangelicals shunned the formal education for preachers thought necessary for Episcopal priests or even Presbyterian clergy. Powerful African-American preachers, often unable to read Scripture but with an ability to speak dynamically about their own experience of conversion, attracted a biracial audience. The disorganization independence brought to the Church of England also aided evangelical growth; in many areas Anglican women found spiritual needs better met by Evangelicals, especially when parishes lacked priests.

The Impact of Frontier Camp Meetings

After independence, as Euro-Americans migrated west of the Appalachians, the frontier CAMP MEETING further secured evangelicalism's dominance of Southern Protestantism. The date and location of the first camp meeting are lost to history, but the notable revival at Cane Ridge in Kentucky in 1801 became a model for those that followed along much of the Southern frontier. Attracting preachers from different denominations, the REVIVALS lasted two weeks or so, during the time between the maturing of crops and their harvest. The revivals drew thousands, providing opportunities not only for spiritual experience but for socializing with neighbors who lived so great a distance away that the camp meeting was the only time for coming together. The revivals also drew African Americans into their orbit, furthering the biracial character of much Southern Protestant life.

With dramatic manifestations of the Spirit as individuals were seized by the jerks or began to bark like animals, frontier camp meetings were also times of emotional excess. Yet they had a more somber cast, with a celebration of the LORD'S SUPPER often closing the gathering. This sacramental dimension most likely reflected the influence of the Scots-Irish; similar celebrations were part of Scottish religious culture in the eighteenth century. In the camp meetings, too, lie some forerunners of Southern gospel as a musical genre, for camp meetings songs added distinctive rhythmic patterns and refrains to familiar HYMNS.

Among the organizers of the Cane Ridge camp meeting was BARTON W. STONE, who with Alexander Campbell (see CAMPBELL FAMILY) sought to restore Christian practice to patterns thought to prevail in New Testament times. Abandoning the notion of denominations, these Christians saw themselves reconstituting the church according to apostolic models. In time the movement spawned several divisions; the Churches of Christ, which retain pockets of strength in parts of Tennessee and Texas, originated in the Stone-Campbell movement (see CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, CHURCHES OF CHRIST). Linked today by colleges, lectureships, and a variety of publications, the Churches of Christ continue to eschew denominational structures. The other major body rooted in Stone-Campbell RESTORATIONISM, but stronger outside the South, is the DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

The frontier experience made revivalism a hallmark of Southern Protestant life. In the twentieth century, for example, the nation's most well known evangelist was BILLY GRAHAM, a native North Carolinian.

Controversy over Slavery

The early nineteenth century not only cemented the hold of the evangelical denominations on Southern Protestantism, but also led to increasing concerns over chattel SLAVERY and the moral issues involved. Debates over slavery were not limited to the South, nor were concerns over race regionally exclusive. As antislavery sentiment mounted in the North, Southern Protestants became more strident in efforts to support slavery on biblical grounds and to resist moves toward abolition (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). Among Presbyterians in the South there developed the idea of the “spirituality of the church,” articulated forcefully by James Henley Thornwell and Benjamin Morgan Palmer. This notion insisted that only spiritual matters like SALVATION were the proper concern of the church; on political issues, like slavery, the church should remain silent. Such thinking allowed Southern Protestants formally to avoid the moral dilemma posed by slavery. It also elevated an individual ethic over a social ethic in much popular thinking, such that social matters became issues of political concern, not religious; in time, this narrower ethical perspective would almost restrict ethical concern to the realm of personal behavior, although some, even among Evangelicals, always called for a gospel with ramifications for the social order.

Within the churches, increasing angst over slavery led to the introduction of balconies where African Americans would be required to sit, although most Southern worship remained biracial. This move paralleled moves in the North that followed on the ejection of RICHARD ALLEN and a few others during worship at Philadelphia’s St. George’s Methodist Church in 1787 for refusing to move to the balcony. That episode spurred the organization of separate congregations and also of separate denominations for African Americans. In the South there were already a few congregations that were entirely or predominantly African American, with Silver Bluff Baptist Church near Augusta, Georgia, among the oldest. However, in the South, creating racially separate congregations and denominations was largely a post-Civil War phenomenon.

As regional tensions over slavery increased, the major evangelical denominations eventually split, foreshadowing the national schism that came when the Confederate States of America formed after South Carolina seceded from the Union in 1860. The Methodists divided in 1844, not reuniting until 1939; the Baptist division in 1845 still endures, with the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION by the later twentieth century becoming the largest Protestant group in the nation. Among major Protestant bodies, only the Episcopal Church did not divide over slavery, although during the war, separate conventions were held in the South and in the North. Ironically, the CIVIL WAR years furthered the evangelical grip on Southern Protestantism. Revivals spread among the Confederate army from time to time, leading many soldiers to reaffirm their commitment to an evangelical understanding of Protestant Christianity.

After the war, Northern-based groups like the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL and AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION churches made inroads among former slaves in the South, as did the Christian (formerly Colored) Methodist Episcopal church that emerged from Southern Methodism in 1870 and various Baptists denominations (see BLACK METHODISTS; NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION OF AMERICA; NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION, U.S.A.). The result was that race continued to mark Southern Protestantism. The white denominations, in an effort to seize victory out of defeat, helped promote a civil religion that glorified a mythic past and celebrated presumed Confederate virtue, whereas the African-American denominations became centers of social life for the free black population that had to contend with a virulent racism that replaced slavery.

African-American churches kept alive profound ways African religious sensibilities buttressed Southern Protestantism, by fashioning an underlying foundation in theology and practice that drew on both the African and the slave experience (see AFRICAN-AMERICAN PROTESTANTISM). For example, for a time the African-American pastor was as much conjurer and root doctor as educated cleric, fusing roles and moving freely from one to the other. In addition, the black church became and remained a center of social and political life, providing opportunities for leadership, recreation, and expression of social welfare concern that white Protestantism readily yielded to other cultural institutions. Thus, when the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT erupted with the Montgomery, Alabama, bus boycott in 1955, a pastor, MARTIN LUTHER KING JR., became its acknowledged spokesman and the churches became cradles of leadership and support.

Holiness and Pentecostal Expressions

Not all who came into the Appalachian mountains in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries moved on to the Southern frontier. Some who remained developed distinctive styles of Protestantism, many influenced by currents of Holiness that took the BIBLE very seriously and greatly emphasized how the Holy Spirit empowered personal behavior and experience. Many churches scattered through the mountains lack denominational affiliation, although most major denominations are represented. Among the unaffiliated congregations are those that look to the Gospel of Mark, chapter 16, for signs that accompany faith. Since the early twentieth century, these signs have often included handling serpents and ingesting strychnine (see SERPENT HANDLERS). Several Southern states tried to outlaw such practices, but freedom of religion ideals prevailed. Serpent handling churches rarely proselytize. Handlers usually come from families where several generations have engaged in the practice, but most children born of handlers eventually affiliate with nonhandling groups.

In the mountains, too, came the first Southern stirrings of PENTECOSTALISM, although the modern American Pentecostal movement tracks its roots to the 1906 AZUSA STREET REVIVALS in Los Angeles. A decade earlier Pentecostal experiences were reported around Camp Creek, North Carolina. Pentecostals accept "gifts of the Spirit" such as glossolalia (see TONGUES, SPEAKING IN). At first biracial, in time most Pentecostal congregations divided along racial lines. Several groups, such as the CHURCH OF GOD and the Church of God of Prophecy, maintain headquarters in Cleveland, Tennessee, whereas the largest African American Pentecostal body, the CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST, is based in Memphis, Tennessee. By the twenty-first century the growth of Southern Pentecostal groups outpaced that of other evangelical denominations, spurred by immigration of Hispanic Pentecostals into the South as well as by the appeal of Pentecostal experience. As well, the enthusiasm characteristic of Pentecostalism was influencing WORSHIP in congregations affiliated with most Protestant denominations.

The South has also been fertile ground for many smaller religious groups. Groups as diverse as Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF) and Unitarians (see UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION) have found a place in the South. There are also a variety of smaller Baptist bodies, such as Old Regular Baptists, Seventh-Day Baptists, and PRIMITIVE BAPTISTS. Alongside larger denominations are smaller ones that represent offshoots, often over matters of DOCTRINE, POLITY, or social policies. Among them are the Southern Methodist Church and the Presbyterian Church of America. Groups popularly identified as more sectarian, such as the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS, have likewise flourished in the region. Even so, their combined presence only modestly challenges the continuing dominance of the Southern Baptist Convention and the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH among the region's Protestants.

The Impact of Fundamentalism

By the second decade of the twentieth century, FUNDAMENTALISM had made inroads into the South, although its primary impact had first been among northern Baptists and Presbyterians. In 1925 in Dayton, Tennessee, the conviction of John Scopes on charges of teaching evolution in a public school signaled that fundamentalism or an extreme Protestant orthodoxy had come to the South. Until then most Southern Protestants believed that MODERNISM had only a small following in the South and that most remained consistently orthodox in belief and practice. Aided by the long history of evangelistic revivals and camp meet-ings, linked by a network of BIBLE COLLEGES AND INSTITUTES (including Bob Jones University), and adept at using the most advanced communications media, fundamentalists became a force within most Southern Protestant denominations by the middle of the twentieth century. The rise of Southern fundamentalism also reinforced the evangelical emphasis on a personal ethic, although groups like the FELLOWSHIP OF SOUTHERN CHURCHMEN represented an alternative perspective that sought to promote a SOCIAL GOSPEL in the region.

When the Civil Rights movement challenged the racism long taken for granted in the South and U.S. courts moved to eliminate prayer and Bible reading from the public schools, fundamentalists perceived that the religious substratum of the region was crumbling. Many congregations started private schools, both to maintain racially segregated educational opportunities and to ensure that children would receive instruction in traditional evangelical moral values. Televangelists like JERRY FALWELL and PAT ROBERTSON sought to translate fundamentalist leanings into political power through organizations such as the MORAL MAJORITY and other so-called CHRISTIAN RIGHT groups (see TELEVANGELISM). Such political organizations represented a significant break with earlier understanding that had seen religion's role almost exclusively concerned with the SALVATION of individuals, not with political matters.

Within the Southern Baptist Convention, similar concerns over a perceived erosion of traditional faith and practice by the late 1960s led more conservatively inclined leaders to launch a campaign to wrest control of the denomination's bureaucracy and affiliated institutions, such as colleges and SEMINARIES, from those thought too moderate or liberal. Although the effort was successful, the internal controversy left the region's largest Protestant body deeply divided, with many institutions and local congregations forming a parallel network through the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship to keep a less conservative presence flourishing.

At the dawn of the twenty-first century, Southern Protestantism remained predominantly evangelical in style and orthodox in belief. However, there were increasing challenges to that hegemony, many from other Protestant bodies whose approach was different, and the Protestant landscape was becoming decidedly more diverse. Ethnicity continued to signal some of that diversity, with a growing Hispanic population joining people of African descent in offering alternatives to the white evangelical style. As well, Pentecostal groups were growing at a faster rate than had been the case a half century before. Protestants also had to confront a rapidly increasing proportion of Southerners who were not Protestant or even Christian. Roman Catholicism and JUDAISM both had a distinguished history in the region, and, after immigration laws changed in 1965, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Islam also took their place in Southern religious culture.

References and Further Reading

- Bruce, Dickson D. Jr. And They All Sang Hallelujah: Plain-Folk Camp-Meeting Religion, 1800–1845. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1974.
- Frey, Sylvia R., and Betty Wood. Come Shouting to Zion: African American Protestantism in the American South and British Caribbean to 1830. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1998.
- Glass, William R. Strangers in Zion: Fundamentalists in the South, 1900–1950. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 2001.
- Harvey, Paul. Redeeming the South: Religious Cultures and Racial Identities among Southern Baptists, 1865–1925. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Heyrman, Christine Leigh. Southern Cross: The Beginnings of the Bible Belt. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Hill, Samuel S. Southern Churches in Crisis Revisited. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1999.
- , and Charles H. Lippy, eds. Encyclopedia of Religion in the South. 2nd ed. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 2004.
- Kimbrough, David L. Taking Up Serpents: Snake Handlers in Eastern Kentucky. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.
- Leonard, Bill J., ed. Christianity in Appalachia: Profiles in Regional Pluralism. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1999.
- Lyerly, Cynthia Lynn. Methodism and the Southern Mind, 1770–1870. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Mathews, Donald G. Religion in the Old South. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977.
- McCauley, Deborah Vansau. Appalachian Mountain Religion: A History. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.
- Morgan, David T. New Crusades, New Holy Land: Conflict in the Southern Baptist Convention, 1969–1991. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1996.
- Raboteau, Albert J. Slave Religion: The “Invisible Institution” in the Antebellum South. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.

Wilson, Charles Reagan. Baptized in Blood: The Religion of the Lost Cause, 1865–1920. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1980.

——, ed. Religion in the South. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1985.

CHARLES H.LIPPY

SOZZINI, FAUSTO PAOLO (SOCINUS, FAUSTUS) (1539–1604)

Italian reformer. Born in Siena, ITALY on December 5, 1539 to a famous family of lawyers, Sozzini spent his childhood in Siena, Bologna, and Scopeto. He planned for a career as a lawyer, traditional for his family, but in his studies he only marginally dealt with jurisprudence and instead concentrated on humanist studies and writing poetry in Italian and Latin. He became a member of the Accademia degli Intronati in Siena, the intellectual salon of the city. He soon became expert in the organization of various games and plays that were popular in Siena.

He also developed an interest in religious issues at a very young age. His family was under the influence of reform ideas very early. Sozzini's cousins Camillo, Celso, Cornelio, but above all Lelio (1525–1562) were supporters of reform. From 1547 on Lelio Sozzini, who had left Italy, proved to be a skeptic intellectual and convinced Antitrinitarian linked to radical REFORMATION circles. He also enjoyed warm and even friendly relations with many leaders of the Reformed Church.

The anti-Catholic sentiment of the Sozzini family, including Fausto, was closely observed by the Catholic Inquisition, which arrested a few of its members in November 1560. Alerted in time, Fausto managed first to hide out in the Siena area but then to leave for Lyon in FRANCE in April 1561. He represented his family's interests there, corresponding with his friends. Religious issues became of even greater interest to him, and when he learned about the death of his uncle Lelio in Zurich, he immediately left for that city to secure Lelio's manuscripts. He later often noted that Lelio's works highly influenced his own religious convictions. Fausto's commentary on the first chapter of St. John's Gospel, Expiatio primi capituli Ioannis ("Explication of the first chapter of John"), an interpretation of this passage in the spirit of radical ANTITRINITARIANISM with his rejection of Christ's eternity, is an example of Lelio's influence. During his stay in SWITZERLAND, Sozzini came to know SEBASTIAN CASTELLIO, whose thought also shaped his religious beliefs.

Return to Italy

Toward the end of 1563 Sozzini returned to Italy. His stay, presumably with the intent to take care of inheritance matters, was supposed to be short, and he planned to return to Switzerland quickly to undertake theological studies. Nevertheless, he remained in Italy almost twelve years. This is an enigmatic period of Sozzini's life. Sozzini was in Rome between 1565 and 1568, probably as secretary of the auditor of the Roman Rote Serafin

Razzali. Between 1569 and 1575 he entered the service of Isabelle de' Medici and her husband Paolo Giordano Orisini. Socinius later described these years as lost in unproductive activities. At the same time he had secret contacts with Italian religious dissenters in Switzerland (see DISSENT). In 1568 Sozzini's commentary appeared in Alba Julia, Transylvania, and shortly thereafter the Polish version was published in Krakow by Grzegorz Pawel from Brzeziny.

At the end of 1575 Sozzini left Italy for good and moved to Switzerland, where he spent three years. This stay was characterized by intensive writing and numerous debates during which Sozzini defined the main lines of his theological system. Presumably he had developed most of these ideas while in Italy.

The first important debate, in which Jacques Covet—a Huguenot theologian—was his main opponent, touched on soteriological, or SALVATION, issues (see HUGUENOTS). Sozzini rejected the redemptive character of Christ's DEATH on the cross, claiming that Christ's saving mission consisted of showing the right way of life. This debate led him to write the important work De Iesu Christo Servatore ("About Christ the Savior"), published in 1594 in POLAND. The second debate with Italian religious emigrant Francesco Pucci included anthropological problems—the state of the first human before original SIN. Sozzini claimed that human beings were mortal by nature. This debate, De statu primi hominis ante lapsam ("About the state of the first man before the fall"), was published after his death in 1610.

Move to Poland

In June 1579 Sozzini moved to Krakow, where he established close relations with the Polish Antitrinitarian Church known as the "Minor"—that is, "smaller"—church. While stressing his desire to join this church, he did not hide his own views on numerous matters. BAPTISM by immersion practiced in the Minor Church represented the main point of disagreement. He rejected this practice, stating that it was not relevant for Christians. This position, as well as his ideas about eternity, JUSTIFICATION, and Christ's sacrifice on the cross, prevented the synod in 1580 from accepting him into the church. Nevertheless, he quickly gained a high informal position within the church.

At the end of the 1580s Sozzini fought for leadership in the Polish Antitrinitarian Church, putting forward his soteriological concepts, defending his belief about the symbolic character of the LORD'S SUPPER. A prolific writer, he answered vigorous Jesuit attacks against Antitrinitarians. The treatise against Jacob Wujek, Refutatio libelli, quem Iacobus Vyjekus Iesuita edidit ("Refutation of the books published by the Jesuit Jacob Wujek"), in 1595 and the Calvinist Andrzej Wolan, De Iesu Christi Filii dei natura ("About the nature of Jesus Christ son of God") in 1588 are the culmination of these efforts.

At the Lublin synod (May and June 1593) he imposed his positions on redemption, justification, and the Lord's Supper on the Minor Church. In political and social issues he was not that successful. The synod agreed to welcome lay rulers but did not enable its members to take part in court proceedings. From the synod in Lublin (1598) on, Sozzini occupied a leading spiritual role among Polish Antitrinitarians.

Sozzini married Elzbieta Morsztyn in May 1586. In May 1587 his daughter Agnieszka (mother of the Socinian thinker Andrzej Wiszowaty) was born. In September of that year his wife died, and in October his Tuscan protector Ferdinando de' Medici also died. The new ruler, Cardinal Ferdinando de' Medici, had no friendly feelings toward Sozzini and did not prevent the Inquisition from charging him with HERESY on February 3, 1591. He was sentenced to death but was burned in effigy because of his absence. This, however, put an end to his income from the property in Italy. He had to lead a very modest life, relying on the help of his friends and cobelievers.

Final Years

On April 29, 1598 Sozzini was attacked by Catholic students in Krakow, who managed to get into his apartment and destroy his manuscripts and books. They intended to drown him in the Vistula River. Already sick at the time, he was saved by several professors from the University of Krakow. He could not overcome the loss of his manuscripts and books, particularly his treaty against atheism. He left Krakow on April 30 and spent the remainder of his life at various places. Works including Commentarius in Epistolam Ioannis Apostoli prima (Commentary to the First Letter of St John the Apostle) (1614) and the unfinished Lectiones sacra (Sacred lectures) were published after his death. Troubled with failing eyesight, Sozzini dictated both works. He did not finish another work against Jesuits and a CATECHISM, which were important to him. The treaty to Reformed Evangelicals asking them to join the Antitrinitarians (Manifestation..., 1600) was his only work published in Lutoslawce. He died in Lutoslawce on March 3, 1604 and was buried there.

Despite his long stay in Poland, Sozzini did not learn to speak Polish (he had a passive understanding of the language). He remained a patrician from Tuscany, dreaming of a return to his native country. At the same time he understood that Poland was the only country where he could develop his program of radical Christian reform.

Sozzini influenced Polish Antitrinitarianism of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and European SOCINIANISM. Many of his works have also been published (in the original language or translated) in other countries, mainly ENGLAND, Holland, and GERMANY. His grandson Andrzej Wiszowaty prepared a collection of his works, including some unedited ones. It appeared in Amsterdam in 1688 as t. I and t. II Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum.

References and Further Reading

- Cantimori, Delio. Eretici italiani del Cinquecento e altri scritti. Edited by Adriano Prosperi, 146–148, 331–360, 365–368, 400–417. Torino, Italy: Giulio Einaudi editore, 1992.
- Chmaj, Ludwik. Faust Socyn (1539–1604). Warsaw, Poland: Książka i Wiedza, 1963.
- Godbey, John. “Fiducia. A Basic Concept in Fausto Sozzini’s Theology.” In Socinianism and Its Role in the Culture of XVI-th to XVIII-th Centuries. Edited by Lech Szczucki, 59–67. Warszawa-Lódź, Poland: PWN, 1983.
- Lubienieki, Stanislaw. History of the Polish Reformation. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1995.
- Marchetti, Valerio. I simulacri delle parole e il lavoro dell’eresia. Ricerca sulle origini del socinanesimo. Bologna, Italy: CISEC, 1999.
- Ogonowski, Zbigniew. “Faustus Socinus.” In Shapers of Religious Traditions in Germany, Switzerland, and Poland 1560–1600. Edited, with an Introduction by Jill Raitt, 195–209. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1981.
- Wilbur, Earl Morse. A History of Unitarianism: Socinianism and Its Antecedents. 384–407. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1946.
- Williams, George Huntston. “The Christological Issues between Francis Dávid and Faustus Socinus during the Disputation on the Invocation of Christ.” In Antitrinitarianism in the Second Half of the 16th Century. Edited by Róbert Dán and Antál Pirnát, 287–321. Budapest, Hungary: Akadémiai Kiadó-Leiden/E.J.Brill, 1982.
- . The Radical Reformation. 3rd rev. ed. 978–989, 1162–1175. Kirksville, MO: Sixteenth Century Publishers, 1992.

LECH SZCZUCKI

SPALDING, JOHANN JOACHIM (1714–1804)

German theologian. This leading personality of the religious ENLIGHTENMENT was born on November 11, 1714 in Tribsees, at that time a part of Swedish Pomerania, and died on May 22, 1804 in Berlin. His father was the principal of the municipal school in Tribsees. After studying THEOLOGY in Rostock and Greifswald and receiving his doctorate in 1736, Spalding worked as a tutor and then as a parish minister in Pomerania. He moved to Berlin, where his responsibilities included not only those of a parish clergy but also the position of provost and membership on the supreme CONSISTORY council for Prussia.

Spalding is considered the main representative of NEOLOGY, the new theology of the eighteenth century. This “modern theology” sought to overcome Protestant ORTHODOXY and PIETISM. The optimistic view of this theology understood God as a loving father whose wisdom and providence worked to lead humanity to its moral perfection. Ethics played a central role in this theology.

Much of what new theologians advocated was taken from English theologians. Spalding was one of the most important purveyors of moderate antideist literature, made famous through his translations. These included Joseph Butler’s Analogy of Religion, an apologetic work that weaves together Christian creed, scientific knowledge, and the fundamental principles of the Enlightenment.

In 1748 Spalding won literary fame and significant ecclesiastical influence with his Gedanken über die Bestimmung des Menschen (Thoughts on the Human Destiny). In this work he opposed the French philosophical materialism of the court of the Prussian king Frederick II. Among his other successful publications were Gedanken über den Wert der Gefühle im Christentum (Thoughts on the Value of Emotion in Christianity, 1761; 5th ed., 1784); Über die Nutzbarkeit des Predigtamtes und deren Beförderung (On the Usefulness of the Preaching Office and its Enhancement, 1772; 3rd ed., 1791), in which he opposed the dog-matic doctrines broadcast from the pulpit; and a kind of bequest, Religion, eine Angelegenheit des Menschen (Religion, a Human Affair, 1797; 4th ed., 1806).

In Berlin and beyond, Spalding maintained a vigorous correspondence with many important personalities, including J.F.W. Jerusalem, JOHANN SALOMO SEMLER, Johann Wilhelm Ludwig Gleim, Christoph Friedrich Nicolai, FRIEDRICH ERNST DANIEL SCHLEIER-MACHER, Moses Mendelssohn, and IMMANUEL KANT. In protest against the religious edict of Johann Christoph Wöllner, which required CLERGY in Prussia to teach only officially recognized DOCTRINE, Spalding resigned his leadership positions in the church in 1788.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Religion, eine Angelegenheit des Menschen. vol. 1. [First volume in a critical edition of Spalding's works]. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, 2001.

. Ueber die Nutzbarkeit des Predigtamtes und deren Beförderung. 1772. Tobias Jersak, ed. Kritische Ausgabe. Johann Joachim Spalding. Albrecht Beutel, ed. Abt. 1. Schriften, Bd. 3. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, 2002.

Secondary Sources:

Schollmeier, Joseph. Johann Joachim Spalding: ein Beitrag zur Theologie der Aufklärung. Gütersloh, Germany: Mohn, 1967.

Nordmann, Hans. Johann Joachim Spalding: Ein Bild aus dem geistigen Ringen der deutschen Aufklärung. Naumburg, Germany: Sieling, 1929.

MARTIN GRESCHAT

SPCK

See Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge

SPENER, PHILIPP JAKOB (1635–1705)

German Pietist. Spener is known for having spearheaded a movement of moral and religious renewal within German LUTHERANISM known as PIETISM, which blossomed in the aftermath of the destructive Thirty Years War (1618–1648).

Early Life and Education

Born in Alsace, the son of a councilor to the duke of Rappolstein, Spener was influenced in his youth by his reading of JOHANN ARNDT'S Wahres Christentum (True Christianity), which countered a formalized system of orthodox Lutheran DOCTRINE with an emphasis on a new birth, understood in terms of the categories of late medieval German mysticism. His reading of Puritan literature (see PURITANISM), especially RICHARD BAXTER and Lewis Bayly, also heightened his interest in self-examination and predisposed him to theological study at the University of Strasbourg, where, under Johann Conrad Dannhauer's influence (1603–1666), he was led to value the role of the LAITY, the vernacular reading of Scripture, and a casuistic approach to personal ETHICS and Sabbath observance. As was customary for theological students, he spent two years as a traveling scholar in SWITZERLAND, FRANCE, and GERMANY. In Geneva he fell under the influence of the radical HUGUENOT preacher, Jean de Labadie (1610–1674).

Ministry in Frankfurt am Main (1666–1686)

After completing a doctorate in theology at Strasbourg, and marrying, Spener was called at the age of thirty-one to become senior of the Lutheran CLERGY at Frankfurt/Main. Here he gave emphasis to reviving the rite of confirmation through a program of catechization of the youth, as well as befriending the youthful GOTTFRIED LEIBNIZ. He also instituted his method of activating the laity to assist the clergy in renewing parish life, by means of the collegia pietatis, private gatherings of “earnest” laity, first held biweekly in his home, where the sermon of the previous Sunday was discussed. In time, other devotional literature was studied, and the central focus eventually became BIBLE Study.

A prolific writer, Spener's most noted work, which was highly acclaimed throughout Germany, was his Pia Desideria (1675). It appeared as the preface to a new edition of Arndt's True Christianity, but it created such a sensation that it was soon published separately. It was organized in three parts: an account of the shortcomings of the church of the day, the possibility of reform, and a program of specific proposals for effecting that end. These proposals were intended to address such abuses as churches controlled by the absolute pretensions of local princes, the rigid observance of class and ecclesiological distinctions, and the duplicity implicit in a church life that was outwardly flourishing but which appeared to yield little evidence of producing genuine Christian life. Spener's response to these conditions included a call for a more extensive use of Scripture, charity when engaged in controversy, PREACHING for purposes of edification, and the reform of schools, especially theological education (see EDUCATION, THEOLOGY: EUROPE).

Spener's book reflected his efforts to activate the universal Christian priesthood, as announced in a sermon in 1669, which called for committed members of the congregation to serve with the clergy in reforming parish life. There was a tendency for the collegia pietatis to be regarded as the heart of the church, as an ecclesiolae in ecclesia, a church within the church, although this was not Spener's intention. To avoid charges of Donatism and to circumvent rumors of raging ANTINOMIANISM in the collegiae, he attempted to forestall the unchecked proliferation of conventicles, the small Bible study groups, by letters and tracts, and by requiring that they be held in the church, under the pastor's leadership, rather than in private homes. They were to be vehicles for parish reform and renewal, although they also precipitated withdrawal from the church on the part of the Frankfurt separatist leader Johann Jakob Schutz (1640–1690).

Although Spener wrote against the separatists, he did not regret forming the collegium, particularly because it represented the only place where all three social classes (the clergy, nobility, and general laity) could meet and strategize in the work of the CHURCH. Nonetheless, despite his initial enthusiasm for this structure, that Spener refrained from instituting CONVENTICLES in his later parish appointments.

Service in Dresden (1686–1691) and Berlin (1691–1705)

After twenty years in Frankfurt, Spener accepted the post of first court chaplain to the elector of Saxony in Dresden (1686–1691). Here he found some respite from controversy, with more leisure for serious theological writing. He also became acquainted with a younger teacher at Leipzig, AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE (1663–1727), whom he helped to obtain a post at the new Saxon university of HALLE. Spener's final post was as inspector of churches and preacher in the Church of St. Nicholas in Berlin (1691–1705). Here he became more involved in the controversies of the Pietist movement, including several doctrinal and moral charges leveled against it by the theological faculty of the University of Wittenberg, the hotbed of Lutheran Orthodoxy. In his latter years, he consented to publish his voluminous letters and papers. He also served as sponsor at the baptism of NIKOLAUS VON ZINZENDORF (1700–1760), providing a link with that renovator of the MORAVIAN CHURCH.

Conclusion

Spener differed from those Orthodox Lutherans who placed the doctrinal content of the Lutheran symbolical books on a par with Scripture. He balanced the Lutheran concern for the inspiration of Scripture with an emphasis on the effects of the Bible on persons, through the activity of the Holy Spirit. There was also an implicit doctrinal shift from the centrality of forensic JUSTIFICATION to the biological metaphor of regeneration.

With an eschatological interest grounded in his doctoral dissertation on the Revelation of John, he held out hope for “better times” for the church on earth, and regarded Christian existence from the standpoint of its goal, its perfection in Christ. Spener’s devout, modest, and even cautious style belie the extent to which he became a central figure for church renewal in seventeenth-century Germany.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Tappert, Theodore, ed. Pia Desideria, by Philip Jacob Spener. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1964.

Secondary Sources:

Brown, Dale. Understanding Pietism. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1978.

Erb, Peter, ed. Pietists: Selected Writings. New York: Paulist Press, 1983.

Stein, K. James. Philipp Jakob Spener; Pietist Patriarch. Chicago, IL: Covenant Press, 1986.

J. STEVEN O’MALLEY

SPEYER, DIETS OF

Two imperial diets, or legislative assemblies, met in Speyer, GERMANY in 1526 and again in 1529 primarily for the purpose of dealing with the religious controversy that had arisen within the Holy Roman Empire because of the theological teachings of MARTIN LUTHER. The first diet resulted in a unanimous agreement among the estates to suspend in effect the EDICT OF WORMS (1521), which had outlawed Luther's teachings, until a general ecumenical council could be called. Three years later a council had not convened, so a second diet was held to decide the issue. Here the Catholic majority voted to rescind the 1526 Recess and to enforce the Edict of Worms. The evangelical minority formally protested the decision, but was disregarded. Their objection revealed a new corporate character of the REFORMATION and led to a new designation for followers of reform—Protestants.

The Diet of Speyer, 1526

In February 1525, Emperor Charles V achieved a decisive military victory over the French, allowing him to deal with the religious controversy within the German estates at an imperial diet. The diet was to convene in Speyer in the spring of 1526, but by March it was apparent Charles would be unable to attend because of renewed conflict with the French, the papacy, and the Turks, so he sent his brother, Ferdinand, instead. The business of the diet opened on June 25 with the proposition sent by Charles instructing those assembled to resolve the religious issue by prohibiting liturgical innovation and requiring enforcement of the Edict of Worms. The Emperor also sent secret instructions to Ferdinand informing him to cease all business if the discussion of the diet proceeded in a contrary direction. When the proceedings diverged, however, Ferdinand revealed Charles's instructions.

The estates were forced to delineate the nature of their AUTHORITY in relation to the emperor's. From recent conflicts, particularly the Peasants War of 1525, they had learned they could maintain their authority without Charles's assistance through the formation of alliances, even transconfessional alliances. Thus, the estates stood together in unanimous agreement. On August 27 they resolved in the Recess that, with respect to the Edict of Worms, each ruler along with his subjects would "live, govern, and carry himself as he hopes and trusts to answer to God and His Imperial Majesty" until a general council convened. This agreement was meant as a temporary solution to the question of the enforceability of the Edict of Worms. Many of the estates insisted that the edict could simply not be enforced. The Recess, supported by the Catholic estates, was meant to petrify the status quo. As time passed and a general council was not convened, the temporary solution became more permanent, especially since the reform-minded estates proceeded to undertake reform.

The Diet of Speyer, 1529

Two years later, as Charles continued his struggle against FRANCE and its new English allies, Ferdinand, recently crowned king of both Bohemia and HUNGARY, also confronted political problems. First was the prospect of violence among the opposing religious parties in the German lands. Additionally he faced possible war with the Turks, which would require financial support from these same estates. Hoping to resolve these difficulties, Ferdinand, as the emperor's representative, called for a diet to convene in the spring of 1527. It was postponed twice, first when Ferdinand was unable to attend and then because of Charles's objections. Realizing the inevitability of such a meeting, Charles called for a diet to meet in Speyer in February 1529, again with Ferdinand as his representative.

To Ferdinand's benefit, the imperial messengers were delayed, allowing him to modify the Proposition read to open the business of the diet on March 15. The proposition called for the revocation of the 1526 Recess of Speyer as well as the enforcement of the Edict of Worms. A committee drafted several new provisions: estates observing the Edict of Worms should continue to do so; evangelical estates in which the new teaching could not be abandoned without considerable trouble should discontinue all innovations; the mass could not be outlawed; communion in one kind could not be forbidden; those convicted of practicing rebaptism would be sentenced to death; CLERGY were forbidden to preach against the church's standard teachings; and the confiscation of property was outlawed. All provisions would be obligatory until a general council would make a final decision.

On April 19 the Catholic majority voted to approve the committee's proposal while simultaneously rejecting the evangelical opposition. The next day the evangelical estates submitted an official protest to the majority's action. Appealing to the constitutional protestatio principle, they argued that the unanimous decision of the 1526 Recess could not be overturned by a majority decision. They contended further that in matters concerning God's honor and the SALVATION of souls they were bound by conscience not to concede to the majority. Ferdinand and the Catholic majority rejected the protest. The Recess, approved on April 22, included only the majority decision.

With their communal stand the newly dubbed "Protestants"—John of Electoral Saxony, Philipp of Hesse, George of Brandenburg-Ansbach, Wolfgang of Anhalt, Ernst and Franz of Braunschweig-Lüneburg, and the cities of Strasburg, Nuremberg, Heilbronn, Ulm, Constance, Lindau, Memmingen, Kempten, Nördlingen, Reutligen, Isny, Saint Gall, Weissenburg, and Windesheim—achieved a new corporate character for the evangelical movement. Although they remained in Speyer, some took steps to form a defensive alliance should the dispute turn violent, but this was later hindered by theological disagreements. Many of these Protestants, however, would come together again in 1530 to make a theological defense of the evangelical movement with the AUGSBURG CONFESSION.

See also Lutheranism; Lutheranism, Germany

References and Further Reading

- Friedensburg, Walter. Der Reichstag zu Speier 1526 in Zusammenhang der politischen und kirchlichen Entwicklung Deutschlands im Reformationszeitalter. Reprint (1887), Nieuwkoop, The Netherlands: B.de Graaf, 1970.
- Kidd, B.J., ed. Documents Illustrative of the Continental Reformation. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1911. [Especially chapters 29 and 32.]
- Kühn, Johannes. Die Geschichte des Speyrer Reichstags 1529. Leipzig, Germany: M.Heinsius Nachfolger, Eger & Sievers, 1929.
- Ney, Julius, ed. Die Appellation und Protestation der evangelischen Stände auf dem Reichstage zu Speier 1529. Reprint (1906), Darmstadt, Germany: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1967.

MARY ELIZABETH ANDERSON

SPIRITUALISM

Spiritualism is described as a theological tendency and religious movement that seeks direct spiritual communication with God, while minimizing or rejecting external, material media, for example, SACRAMENTS, CLERGY, and Scripture. Spiritualism derives ultimately from the BIBLE and the Platonic tradition. In the early church the impact of both can be seen in pneumatic movements such as Montanism and theologians such as Origen and Augustine. Although the elements of spiritualism were pervasive in THEOLOGY thereafter, the mass of the population adhered to a materialist approach in the cult of the SAINTS, the sacraments, and the clergy. That is, because they imagined spirit as a fine material substance, they readily accepted its presence in and transmission by material objects.

Beginning in the eleventh and twelfth centuries spiritualism became much more prominent both among the orthodox and the heterodox (heretics) as a reaction to growing clerical power and increased emphasis on the objective sacrality of the CHURCH, the clergy, the sacraments, and other holy objects. The REFORMATION is the result and heir to these concerns. All Protestant theologies were spiritualist as compared to Catholic DOCTRINE and practice. The Radical Spiritualists (e.g., THOMAS MÜNTZER, SEBASTIAN FRANCK, CASPAR SCHWENCKFELD) went beyond the Magisterial Reformers (e.g., MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN). They denied the need for any visible church, clergy, or sacraments. The erection of state churches made Spiritualism attractive to those who resisted the legal imposition of belief and who complained of the lack of fervor that they decried in the established churches. Spiritualism provided thinkers like JOHN LOCKE with arguments for religious TOLERATION. A pervasive non-aggressive spiritualism allows Western societies to escape the cycle of religious conflict and WAR seen elsewhere.

At the root of “Spiritualism” is the “Spirit.” Christian Spirit derives from two quite different sources: Platonic “Mind” and biblical “Spirit.” Both Platonic “Mind” and Ideas are immaterial—the Ideas exist apart from Mind and physical reality in a superior realm of which the physical universe is an inferior reflection. The Ideas are eternal, unchanging, and absolute. SALVATION for the human is achieved by looking within and ascending to this higher reality through use of the rational powers of the intellect. The mind “turns its back” on the external, material world and the physical desires and emotions (which Platonists associated with the body) that it provokes. The goal is eternal rest in the static perfection of the Ideal realm. Platonism accepts a stark dualism between mind and body, immaterial and material, with the latter incapable of containing or conveying the former. Rather, material reality, the world of bodies, is a distraction and obstacle to be avoided.

By contrast, biblical Spirit, in both the Old and New Testaments, is a force that shakes NATURE, transforms humans, and drives them to do God’s will. The Bible does not describe the Spirit as immaterial and Spirit’s behavior suggests physical power and presence. Its effects on humans can include a quiet wisdom, but more often involve heightened states of faith, fear, hope, love, anger, and the full range of human emotions. Spirit is an active force that works upon humans, not a crystalline perfection toward which humans strive. Although Spirit sometimes made use of an initial period of withdrawal to remake the human into a fitting instrument of God's will, Spirit normally propels humans to work in the world, not to flee it. Unlike the INDIVIDUALISM often associated with Platonism, biblical Spirit created community—the People of God or the church. Biblical Spirit could dwell in, be conveyed by, and make use of bodies and physical objects, although it also worked directly. Its effects ranged from military victory, to miracle, to prophecy, to individual enlightenment. Spirit was often associated with resistance to injustice, the rescue of the weak, and the punishment of the powerful. Biblical Spirit's dualism was not mind and matter, but spirit (reliance on God) and flesh (reliance on self or other humans).

Early movements like Montanism continued the biblical tradition. They appealed to prophecy against a growing clericalism, increasing reliance on the written Word, and marginalization of the pneumatic elements so characteristic of New Testament Christianity. Although structure eventually won out over spirit, biblical Spiritualism remained an option wherever the Bible was known. Radically dualist Gnosticism drew on Platonism. Within the institutional church, however, Christian thinkers trained in classical philosophy planted the seeds of Platonic Spiritualism. Already visible in Clement of Alexandria and Origen, Platonism was pervasive after the CONVERSION of the emperor Constantine when the learned elites joined the church and created sophisticated theological systems using Greek philosophy. Neoplatonists like Augustine produced a Christian understanding of the Spirit and of God by equating Platonic immaterial mind with biblical spirit. The implications for the Eucharist or LORD'S SUPPER were apparent in Augustine's famous line "Why do you prepare your teeth, if you have faith you have already eaten." Protestant reformers cited that passage repeatedly.

The fall of the Roman Empire, the decay of education, and the reduction of the learned elite to a few scattered clerics prevented the spread of Platonic Spiritualism to the church as a whole. A materialist understanding of Spirit remained common for the mass of the population and clergy. The theological defense of a real presence (see TRANSUBSTANTIATION) of Christ in the bread and wine of the Eucharist resulted.

The revival of Europe in the eleventh and twelfth centuries established a spiritualistic trajectory leading to the sixteenth-century Protestant Reformation. The weight of new bureaucracies in church and state provoked popular resistance and HERESY that drew on the biblical Spirit for its authorization. Monastic (see MONASTICISM) and university cultures produced mysticism (direct ecstatic union with God) and further elaborated immaterialist theologies. New religious orders (e.g., Franciscans and Dominicans) spread both intellectual/religious currents in the wider culture, primarily through PREACHING. Joachim of Fiore predicted a new Age of the Spirit; rigorist Franciscans who rebelled against the church were labeled the Spirituallists; and the spiritual human (homo spiritualis) became the goal of ascetic and devotional regimens. By the beginning of the sixteenth century, "spiritual" had become a term that was promiscuously used to describe any form of piety or practice of which one approved, a meaning that it retains to this day.

A Neoplatonist revival on the eve of the Reformation caused the rediscovery and publication of the entire surviving corpus of Platonic and Platonist writings. Erasmus of Rotterdam, who influenced many first-generation Protestant reformers, recast Neoplatonic thought into a Christian vision marked by simplicity, inwardness, and lack of interest in the outward trappings of medieval Catholicism.

The Reformation

Every form of sixteenth-century Protestantism embraced a more “spiritualized” Christianity than did medieval Catholicism. The number, frequency, and sacrality of the sacraments were drastically reduced. Popular piety was curtailed or eliminated. The cult of the saints was outlawed. The clergy were denied a superior sacral status. All post-biblical miracles were viewed with suspicion or rejected. After a brief flirtation with late medieval mysticism, however, Luther was little affected by Platonism as his retention of a real presence in the Lord’s Supper shows. His core teachings of JUSTIFICATION by FAITH alone and Scripture alone also owed little or nothing to that spiritualistic tradition. Reformed Protestantism (e.g., HULDRYCH ZWINGLI and Calvin), by contrast, owes much to the Platonic tradition, as its arguments against a real presence and its hostility toward religious art make manifest. The Radical Spiritualists drew the logical, if unacceptable to the other Protestant reformers, conclusions.

Radical Spiritualism assumed three identifiable forms whose differences derive from their ultimate biblical and Platonic sources. Müntzer is the purest representative of the biblical spirit among the Radicals and, perhaps, in the Reformation as a whole. Assuming the role of an Old Testament prophet, he thundered against secular rulers and clergy, both Catholic and Protestant, as enemies and oppressors of the people of God who corrupted God’s Word and practiced “idolatry.” He emphasized God’s continuing revelation to Christians, the need for inspiration to understand Scripture, and the direct implantation of faith by God, that is, not through the Bible. Müntzer denied the real presence and criticized infant BAPTISM, but he retained both the Lord’s Supper and infant baptism. Franck offered the most thoroughgoing Platonic Spiritualism. He dismissed all the sacraments as toys that God had given to the earliest Christians in their childish weakness. They were no longer necessary or useful. Rather, they were an impediment. The clergy were also superfluous, but dangerous, because they sought to impose their fantasies on others. Franck found no use for the church as a body of believers. His was an intensely individual appropriation of the Christian message. As for the Bible he found it a dark and contradictory book whose obscurity forced Christians to look elsewhere—inward—for the true Word of God. He and Schwenckfeld were two of the most consistent defenders of religious toleration in the Reformation. Schwenckfeld’s Spiritualism owed much to medieval Catholic Eucharistic piety. Medieval theologians had overcome the spirit/matter dualism by arguing that material objects, including the flesh and blood of Christ, could in fact “contain” and “convey” Spirit, despite the manifest contradiction involved. Schwenckfeld retained that mystery, but internalized and “spiritualized” it so that the entire interchange took place within the believer. An Inner Word, Inner Baptism, and Inner Supper replaced the outer Bible and sacraments. Christ, the inner teacher, replaced the clergy. Schwenckfeld’s rejection of the outward or visible church was less thoroughgoing than Franck's. Although the church had vanished with the Apostles, it would return with Christ at the end of time. The outward Eucharist and baptism would also be reinstated, but as mere symbols of the true inner rites.

Although Spiritualism became pervasive during the Reformation and thereafter, it is impossible to determine exactly the extent of its influence. Müntzer had imitators, but the violence that they ignited quickly consumed them. We know of many other writers from the sixteenth century whose thinking was Spiritualist or at least spiritualizing in the way of Franck or Schwenckfeld (e.g., Valentin Crautwald, Hans Bänderlin, Christian Entfelder, Johannes Campanus, VALENTIN WEIGEL, Dirk Volketszoon Coornhert). Schwenckfeld had a popular following in Silesia whose descendants now live in the UNITED STATES. However, the vast majority of practicing Spiritualists were Christians who maintained a silent resistance where state churches ruled (see CONFSSIONALIZATION), or an independence of all churches (called "libertinism" by Calvin) in areas where membership in the official church was not legally required, as in the NETHERLANDS. In the seventeenth century PIETISM'S call for a more heartfelt faith continued the Spiritualist tradition, although so did a Rationalism that led to DEISM and beyond. John Locke drew on Spiritualist arguments to advocate religious toleration and that has reshaped the religious landscape in Anglo-Saxon countries.

In the modern West the Spiritualist conviction that each believer has direct access to the divine Spirit, that no person or institution can or should impose a faith on another, and that external rites—"empty rituals"—are inessential has become a new ORTHODOXY for many and, perhaps, most Christians.

References and Further Reading

- Hegler, Alfred. Geist und Schrift bei Sebastian Franck: Eine Studie zur Geschichte der Spiritualismus in der Reformationszeit. Freiburg, Germany: J.C.B. Mohr, 1892.
- Jones, Rufus M. Spiritual Reformers in the 16th and 17th Centuries. London: Macmillan, 1914.
- Klaassen, Walther, "Spiritualization in the Reformation." Mennonite Quarterly Review 37 (1963):67–77.
- Ozment, Steven E. Mysticism and Dissent: Religious Ideology and Social Protest in the Sixteenth Century. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1973.
- Rupp, Gordon. "Word and Spirit in the First Years of the Reformation." Archive for Reformation History 49 (1958): 13–26.
- Troeltsch, Ernst. Social Teachings of the Christian Churches. Translated by Olive Wyon. Louisville, KY: Westminster/ John Knox Press, 1992.
- Williams, George H. Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1957.
- . Radical Reformation. 3rd ed. Kirksville, MO: Sixteenth Century Journal Publishers, 1992.

R.EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

SPORTS

Overview

Serious academic study of the relationship between Protestantism and sports has been a product of the new interest in social history that began in the 1960s. Despite a great deal of detailed historical research, no one overarching theory that convincingly explains the interaction between the two has achieved widespread assent. This is partly because of the diversity of Protestant denominational attitudes to sports, but also because the nature of sports has changed considerably over time. For this reason it is helpful to begin by looking at sports and Protestantism in preindustrial society.

In the period from 1500 to 1800, sporting activities were largely local in character and formed part of a wider and predominantly rural pattern of leisure that could include religious festivals, fairs, and holidays that were governed by the rhythms of the agricultural year. Protestants viewed many of these traditional kinds of sporting activity with suspicion, but we need to be careful not to caricature Protestant and particularly Puritan attitudes to sports as entirely negative.

The period from 1800 to about 1880 can be characterized as the formative period in the creation of modern sport. Seen by historians as intimately connected with the growth of INDUSTRIALIZATION and urbanization, sports became more national in character and more governed by explicit rules. Protestant attitudes to sports underwent significant changes in this period. Beginning in ENGLAND, what was called “muscular Christianity” emphasized the links between sporting and spiritual prowess. This ideal assumed that sports were participant and amateur activities. Finally, the late nineteenth century saw the advent of modern professional sports as forms of mass entertainment. Although many professional teams owed their beginnings to Protestant initiatives aimed at EVANGELISM, in the twentieth century sports came to seem more of a rival than an aid to Protestant Christianity. Sport in this period was often described as a new form of religion. Nevertheless, among some evangelical Protestant groups attempts to convert men to Christianity continued to associate the gospel with sportsmen and with sporting achievement, although as a form of consumerist entertainment modern sport is less closely identified with Protestant theology and practice than in the nineteenth century.

Protestantism and Sports: Theorizing the Relationship

The new forms of social history that emerged in the 1960s stimulated interest in this subject from two different directions. On the one hand, historians of religion were encouraged to move beyond a theological and institutional focus in their studies of Protestantism and of the REFORMATION and to study the interaction between these movements and elite and popular CULTURE. Although much of this work has concentrated on topics such as SEXUALITY, MARRIAGE, and GENDER, some work has been done on the impact of Protestantism on other aspects of culture including sports. On the other hand, social historians began to study the history of sport in its social and cultural context, although much of this work has emphasized the relationship between modernization and sports, and has tended to neglect religion. One notable earlier pioneering thinker who attempted to combine these approaches was MAX WEBER in his 1904–1905 work The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism. Weber argued that what he called Protestantism's doctrine of worldly ASCETICISM, in which work became part of the Christian's calling, created a hostility to traditional forms of recreation and sports. Weber's insights remain valuable and still inform our understanding of the relationship between PURITANISM and sports. However, attempts to build on his work and to create a coherent theoretical perspective for understanding the relationship between sports and Protestantism have remained problematic because many researchers have noted not only hostility between the two, but also notable affinities. Jay Coakley has suggested that this contradiction may be more apparent than real, given that the Weberian Protestant ethic—with its emphasis on rationality, organization, self-discipline, hard work, and success in one's calling—is compatible with, and may well have contributed to, the development of modern forms of sports. However, because interest in sports has not been limited to Protestant cultures, and because Protestantism has been an exceptionally diverse form of religious belief and practice, it seems more helpful to regard such theoretical perspectives as stimuli to thought and re-search and to proceed by adopting a more historically based approach to this subject.

Sports and Protestantism in Preindustrial Society

On the eve of the Reformation, sporting activities were very different in form and social significance from the kinds of professional codified sports that we now associate with the term sport. Upper-class pursuits included hunting, hawking, jousting, and tennis. Archery, an important form of military training, and horse racing tended to transcend class distinctions. There also existed a range of more exclusively popular activities such as football, bowling, wrestling, animal baiting, and cockfighting. The latter were often conducted according to local rules and took place on the great religious holidays such as Christmas, Epiphany, Shrove Tuesday, and Pentecost, or on the feast days of the patron SAINTS of particular parishes or guilds. Such events were also marked by more general communal celebrations that might include mystery plays, dancing, and beer drinking.

Like their medieval Catholic predecessors, early Protestant reformers were often hostile to popular sports because they linked them to what they regarded as dangerous and immoral habits including drinking, gambling, sexual license, and failure to attend church. However, Protestants had two further distinctive theological reasons of their own for suspicion of sports. First, they associated them with a Catholic way of life that they rejected as superstitious. Second, LUTHERANISM sought to emphasize the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS within the Christian scheme of SALVATION. This was in reaction to what Protestants believed had been the false dichotomy within medieval Catholicism between the priestly and monastic religious life of the elite and that of the rest of the population. One result of this change was to endow work, along with all other aspects of secular life, with a new kind of importance. One's worldly occupation and recreations became part of one's calling as a Christian. Although this meant that sports could be engaged in as a means of maintaining physical health or as part of a regime of military training, without such justifications, sports appeared to be forms of idleness that hindered the Christian's struggle to lead a godly life and thereby attain eternal salvation.

MARTIN LUTHER exemplifies this attitude in his 1523 work, On Temporal Authority: To What Extent it Should be Obeyed. After stressing the high calling of the Christian prince to lead a life of devoted service to the needs of the people, Luther considered the objection that this would leave no time "for princely amusements—dancing, hunting, racing, gaming and similar worldly pleasures." His reply was that, "We are not here teaching how a temporal prince is to live, but how a temporal prince is to be a Christian, such that he may reach heaven." Nevertheless, such rigorism was combined with a sense of proportion. In his 1524 program for the education of boys who were not destined to be scholars, Luther advocated one to two hours of schooling each day. This was to be combined with teaching at home or learning a trade to limit, but not eliminate, the amount of time that boys would otherwise spend in "ball playing, racing, and tussling." The Zurich reformer HULDRICH ZWINGLI took a similarly balanced, but cautious view. Games with educational value, such as chess—which taught mathematics and strategy—were permissible, but only in moderation, "since there are some who neglect the serious business of life and devote themselves to this alone." Dicing and card playing were to be banned. Games such as "running, jumping, throwing, fighting and wrestling" were, Zwingli acknowledged, prevalent among almost all nations, but especially among the Swiss who found them "useful in many different circumstances." Wrestling, however, was to be engaged in only with moderation, and Zwingli found no great value in swimming, although he admitted that it was on occasion "pleasurable to immerse our limbs in water and become a fish."

In the draft of Ecclesiastical Ordinances that he drew up for the city of Geneva in 1541, JOHN CALVIN made a similar distinction between different kinds of sports, decreeing that "no one is to play at games played for gold or silver or at excessive expense." In practice Calvinist authorities were more diligent than their Lutheran counterparts in their attempts to regulate the lives of Christian citizens through the religious sanctions imposed by CONSISTORY courts. The same was true of Puritans in England in the seventeenth century, although their efforts did not go uncontested. In 1618 King James I issued a declaration that came to be known as The King's Book of Sports, which was written in response to disputes in Lancashire between Puritans on the one hand, and Anglicans and Roman Catholics on the other, as to the morality of traditional sports. Conservative Protestant Anglican opinion rejected the Puritan case (see ANGLICANISM). The declaration stated that it was the king's wish that after the end of divine service, activities such as "archery for men, leaping, vaulting, or any other such harmless recreation" were not to be prohibited. During the English CIVIL WAR, when Puritan influence was in the ascendant, Parliament in 1644 issued an ordinance stating that "no person or persons shall hereafter upon the Lord's Day use exercise, keep, maintain, or be present at any wrestlings, shootings, bowling, ringing of bells for pleasure or pastime, masque, wake, otherwise called feasts, Church-ale, dancing, games, sport, or pastime whatsoever." Again, we should notice that sports were viewed here as part of a much wider range of suspect activities and that the thrust of the legislation was aimed at Sabbath-breaking rather than at sports as such. When in 1647 Parliament abolished the traditional church festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, it decreed that alternative days for recreations should be established on the second Tuesday of each month. The same pattern of a Puritan attempt to limit what were deemed to be unsuitable types of sporting activities, tempered by Protestant denominational variety, was exported to colonial America. For example, Puritans in Massachusetts Bay, although conceding what the first governor of the Massachusetts Bay Company, John Winthrop, called the need to "recreate the mind with some outward recreation," were far from accepting the passion for horse racing that characterized the plantation society of Anglican-dominated Virginia.

Protestantism and Sports in the Era of Industrialization

During the nineteenth century profound changes began to occur in the nature of sporting activities. As a result of industrialization, urbanization, and the revolution in communications, sports such as football and cricket began to be organized on a national rather than a local basis. Agreed systems of rules and new forms of record keeping of results and of sporting achievements also contributed to this change. The modernization of sports was also, however, partly created by a revolution in Protestant attitudes to such activities that, as we have seen, had hitherto been at best ambivalent. This change began in the great English private boarding schools in which the playing of organized sports came to be associated with team spirit, masculinity, and Christian virtue.

This revolution has come to be associated with the reforms of the Anglican Liberal Protestant clergyman, THOMAS ARNOLD, at Rugby school after he became its headmaster in 1828. In fact Arnold saw the organized playing of games such as rugby, football, and cricket as only one of many methods designed to instill new standards of discipline into the hitherto often violent and unruly world of boys' boarding schools. The equation of sporting activity with Christian holiness was popularized much more effectively by another Liberal Protestant clergyman and novelist, CHARLES KINGSLEY, to whose writings the term “muscular Christianity” was first applied (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). Although Kingsley repudiated this label, arguing that he did not seek to exalt physical qualities above spiritual ones, many of his heroes are characterized as engaging in sports. Even more important, Kingsley identified participation in sporting activities with English Protestantism and with English nationalism. By contrast, he depicted Catholicism as characterized by a foreign, unhealthy, and ascetic rejection of the body and of sporting activities (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS). For example, in Kingsley’s 1851 novel Yeast the hero may be a “poor wild uneducated sportsman,” but in contrast to his unflattering portrait of the sickly Roman Catholic priest, Kingsley depicts him as “full of manhood.” Rightly in Kingsley’s view, his ideal Christian prefers the physical discomforts of duck shooting to the false asceticism of wearing hair shirts. The belief that the battle of Waterloo was won on the playing fields of Eton can thus be seen as a product of Kingsley’s heady blend of English Protestantism, sports, and NATIONALISM. Kingsley’s identification of Protestantism, not Catholicism, with sporting achievement was of course a myth, although it was one that could influence the reality. Partly because of the association between sports, Protestantism, and nationalism, in the nineteenth century major Catholic boarding schools, such as Stonyhurst, were slower to adopt the cult of athleticism that characterized schools such as Eton and Harrow. When they did so, however, there is no evidence that their pupils were any less accomplished sportsmen.

Muscular Christianity and its sporting ethos found a ready reception among many American Protestants. The incorporation of organized sports into elite colleges paralleled English developments. Yale inaugurated the first rowing club in 1843 and baseball, football, and athletics followed in the 1860s and 1870s. American advocates for the new cult of sports and Christianity were as persuasive as their English counterparts. For example, in the 1861 edition of his widely read book Christian Nurture, the Congregationalist minister HORACE BUSHNELL was highly critical of the puritanical strain within American culture and with what he saw as its overemphasis on work. Sport and recreation were, he argued, fully compatible with faith. A major vehicle for the practical outworking of these ideas was the Young Men’s Christian Association (see YMCA, YWCA), which had been founded in London in 1844 and first appeared in America in Boston in 1851. Branches created gymnasiums for physical training and promoted sports such as basketball and volleyball. By 1915 it seemed a commonplace for the Association’s Bible Study secretary, Fred Goodman, to comment that “the risen Jesus is a member of every gymnasium class, of every athletic team in which there are Christians.” The benefits of such activities could also be extended to women, although Protestant writers drew the line at their engaging in competitive sports because this, they feared, would encourage qualities deemed to be unfeminine.

Scandinavian and German Protestants developed similar ideas about the beneficial role of sports in Christian EDUCATION, although they tended to place less emphasis than in America and Britain on the role of competitive team games and more on gymnastic training in the curriculum. German Protestantism had its own native tradition of Christian athleticism exemplified by the eighteenth-century Pietist JOHANN KASPAR LAVATER, who regarded efforts to perfect the human body as following on naturally from the Christian doctrine of the incarnation. By the end of the nineteenth century, Protestant advocates of sports and gymnastics struck much the same tone as their muscular Christian counterparts in Britain. Thus the Protestant school teacher Konrad Koch, in his 1900 work Education for Courage through Gymnastics, Games and Sport, identified the development of willpower and character with sports, Christianity, and patriotism.

The further spread of these ideals across the globe was one of the consequences of nineteenth-century COLONIALISM. Protestants who believed in their Godgiven role to disseminate Christian civilization often saw sports as one of its essential elements as well as being a useful means of its dissemination. The bestknown example of sporting missionary enterprise was the Cambridge and England cricketer C.T. STUDD. A devout Evangelical, Studd became famous as one of “the Cambridge Seven,” a group of sportsmen who joined JAMES HUDSON TAYLOR’S CHINA INLAND MISSION in 1885. The effect of Studd on a group of university students encapsulated the ideals and hopes of the muscular Christian movement. According to one observer he soon dispelled the then prevalent idea that Christians were “unfit for the river or cricket field, and only good for Psalm-singing and pulling a long face.” The spread of sports such as cricket and rugby throughout the British empire was one result of such enthusiasm.

Protestantism and Modern Sport

The latter part of the nineteenth century saw the creation of modern sport as an activity characterized not only by participation by large numbers of people for health and recreation, but also by the existence of large-scale professional sports organizations that exist primarily to provide forms of mass entertainment. The role of Protestantism in this change was a complex one. Muscular Christians envisaged sporting activities as forms of character building through self-discipline and not as means to financial gain. For this reason the ideal of amateurism was deeply ingrained in school and university institutions. In Britain, for example, the playing of football or soccer as it was often called was shunned by most private schools, especially after it became associated with the creation of a predominantly professional league in the 1880s. Rugby football was preferred because it retained its amateur status. For similar reasons in America, the YMCA’s Athletic League stressed the virtues of amateurism in sport and in 1911 severed its ties with the Amateur Athletic Union when it proposed to field professional teams.

Despite these reservations, Protestant churches contributed significantly, if often unwittingly, to the development of sports as forms of professional entertainment. This was partly because of their belief that the spiritual benefits of sports should be spread to not just the middle, but also to the working classes. Sports were also seen as a form of EVANGELISM, as a means of making the Christian gospel attractive to what the churches saw as the alarmingly large numbers of the working class who had no contact with Christianity. One result of this in Britain was that a number of football clubs that went on to become the backbone of the professional football league owed their origins to the initiative of local churches. This was true, for example, of Aston Villa in Birmingham, which was formed by young men associated with the local Methodist chapel. In the industrial town of Sheffield in 1879 the local newspaper recorded the fortunes of eight church or chapel clubs. More of a pointer to the future was the outcome in Bolton where the football club was formed by a local CHURCH OF ENGLAND school in 1872 with the support of the local vicar. In 1877 it changed its name from Christ Church to Bolton Wanderers after a dispute with the vicar, thereby becoming a purely secular organization.

The growth of mass sports as a form of entertainment that threatened to compete with, rather than support, religion was part of a much wider crisis that befell the movement to associate sports with Protestant Christianity in the early twentieth century. There were a number of reasons for this. Despite the enthusiasm of a generation of propagandists, not all Protestant leaders ever accepted that there was a beneficial link of this kind. More seriously, many facets of the cult of athleticism and games had causes that either had no logical links with Christianity or were antithetical to Christian beliefs and practices. These included fears over the supposedly declining virility of the white Anglo-Saxon male transported from the morally bracing atmosphere of rural life to the sickly environment of the city; alarm over levels of teenage delinquency; and an often negative response to feminism and the supposed feminization of the churches. The First World War also dealt a severe blow to the concept of heroic Christian sportsmanship. If it had been believed that the battle of Waterloo was the result of prowess on the games field, then the slaughter of millions of young men in the trenches of Europe could be said to have had similar ideological roots. Denominational rivalry proved to be another unintended consequence of linking sports and religion. A notable example of this was the identification of Scotland's two principal football teams, Celtic and Rangers, with Catholicism and Protestantism, respectively. Finally, despite the assertions of Charles Kingsley, it became increasingly apparent that Protestantism had no convincing claims to a monopoly of interest in sport. As Pope Pius XII explained near the end of the Second World War, the Catholic Church regarded sport as a form of education and one that was closely related to morality.

Yet interestingly, the symbiotic relationship between Protestantism and sports still continues, particularly in America. The belief that sports can be a means of evangelism has not disappeared. For example, the television evangelist JERRY FALWELL argued at the inauguration of the sports program at his Liberty University in the 1970s that Christian witness to young people worked better when Christians proved themselves to be their equal on the playing field. The evangelical men's organization The Promise Keepers, founded by a football coach at the University of Colorado, also enlists sport in its outreach to men, associating it with traditional models of MASCULINITY. Successful Christian sportsmen and women continue, as in the past, to be enlisted as potentially attractive exemplars of the Protestant Christian lifestyle. According to the National Basketball Association player David Robinson, playing sports provides "a great opportunity to model Christ in front of a lot of people by the way I play and the way I conduct myself." The belief in the character-building effects of sports is also still in evidence. For instance, the evangelist BILLY GRAHAM argued in 1971 that "The Bible says leisure and lying around are morally dangerous for us. Sports keeps us busy; athletes, you notice, don't take drugs."

Graham's mention of drugs and sport does in some respects have an unintentionally ironic ring given their misuse as performance enhancers in modern competitive sports.

This is one of a number of factors that suggest that the relationship between sports and Protestantism has become, for very different reasons, as problematic in the twenty-first century as it was in the fifteenth. Although the examples of individual Christian sporting heroes and heroines can be presented as part of a gospel of self-discipline and success, the aggression and naked materialism that surround much of modern sport as a form of mass entertainment make this connection difficult to sustain. Whether this heralds the end of the long, complex, and changing relationship between Protestantism and sports remains to be seen.

References and Further Reading

- Burke, Peter, ed. Popular Culture in Early Modern Europe. London: Temple Smith, 1978.
- Coakley, Jay. "Sports and Religion. Is it a promising combination?" In Sport in Society: Issue and Controversies, by Coakley Jay, 475–500. Boston, MA: Irwin McGraw-Hill, 1998.
- Higgs, R.J. God in the Stadium: Sports and Religion in America. Lexington: The University of Kentucky Press, 1995.
- Hoffman, Shirl J., ed. Sport and Religion. Champaign, IL: Human Kinetics Books, 1992.
- Mangan, J.A. Athleticism in the Victorian and Edwardian Public School: The Emergence and Consolidation of an Educational Ideology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981.
- Putney, Clifford. Muscular Christianity: Manhood and Sports in Protestant America, 1880–1920. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001.
- Riess, Steven A. Major Problems in American Sport History. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1997.
- Vance, Norman. The Sinews of the Spirit: The Ideal of Christian Manliness in Victorian Literature and Religious Thought. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

SEAN GILL

SPURGEON, CHARLES HADDON (1834–1892)

English revival preacher. The greatest preacher of the later nineteenth century in the English-speaking world was Charles Haddon Spurgeon. Born in Kelvedon, Essex, ENGLAND, on June 19, 1834, he was converted and baptized as a believer in 1850 and, before he was twenty, he became minister of the prestigious New Park Street Baptist Church in London. When the congregation outgrew the premises, in 1861 Spurgeon started to preach in the purpose-built Metropolitan Tabernacle. He established a college to train pastors, issued weekly sermons, and wrote popular religious works. In 1887–1888 he criticized other members of the Baptist Union in the “Down-Grade Controversy” for drifting into theological liberalism (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM) and withdrew from his DENOMINATION. He maintained his ministry, although with increasing bouts of ill health, until his death at Mentone in FRANCE on January 31, 1892.

Early Life

Spurgeon was molded by the powerful Puritan (see PURITANISM) tradition of East Anglia. His father, John Spurgeon, was Independent minister at Tollesbury near Colchester in Essex and also worked as a coalyard clerk, while his grandfather James served as another Independent minister in the same county, at Stambourne. There Charles spent part of his childhood, devouring the works in the library that had been assembled by successive ministers since the seventeenth century. In January 1850, at the age of fifteen, he was converted to a personal faith after hearing a sermon by a PRIMITIVE METHODIST local preacher in Colchester. In May, as a matter of personal conviction, he was baptized as a believer at Isleham in Cambridgeshire and, moving to Cambridge to teach, became the pastor of the small church in the nearby village of Waterbeach in 1851. His PREACHING was so remarkable that in 1854 he was called to the ministry of New Park Street Baptist Church in Southwark, London, which had previously been the congregation of John Gill and John Rippon, leading Baptist theologians.

London Ministry

Spurgeon rapidly became a pulpit sensation. Seemingly uncouth and certainly very young, he nevertheless possessed a self-command, a mastery of evangelical theology and a directness of address that deeply stirred his hearers and brought many CONVERSIONS (see EVANGELICALISM; EVANGELICALISM, THEOLOGY OF). He was censured for vulgarity, but the criticism only enhanced his celebrity. While his chapel was being extended, he preached in the Exeter Hall, the meeting place of the great evangelical societies, but it soon became necessary to secure an even larger building. To the disgust of his critics, he hired the Surrey Gardens Music Hall, a place of secular amusement, for evening services. On the first day there, October 19, 1856, there was a malicious cry of fire, the crowd panicked, and, to Spurgeon's great distress, seven people died. Yet his ministry continued to attract thousands. To accommodate them permanently, a vast new church, the Metropolitan Tabernacle, was opened in 1861. There, for the next thirty years, Spurgeon became one of the sights of London. His church grew from 232 members in 1854 to 5,311 at the end of 1891. He added a series of institutions to the church—prayer meetings, evening classes, almshouses, and even an orphanage. The church magazine, called The Sword and the Trowel, a Colportage Society for distributing Christian literature, and a Book Fund for poorer ministers run by Spurgeon's wife, Susanna, extended the influence of his ministry. Most significant among Spurgeon's creations was the Pastor's College, designed to train candidates for the ministry without regard for their financial circumstances or their educational qualifications. The theology taught in the college, like that of the founder, was distinctly Calvinistic (see CALVINISM). Spurgeon often supported his students in pioneering EVANGELISM and church planting. By the end of his lifetime over a fifth of the Baptist ministers in England and WALES had been trained at his college (see BAPTISTS).

Spurgeon remained an outspoken Baptist and conservative Evangelical all his life. In 1864 he denounced Anglican Evangelicals for remaining in a church that taught baptismal regeneration, and he became increasingly restive about the growth of liberal opinion in NONCONFORMITY. In 1887 The Sword and the Trowel carried a series of articles warning of doctrinal downgrading, and Spurgeon withdrew from the Baptist Union. He was not opposing ARMINIANISM, as has sometimes been supposed, for he had a Methodist preach for him in the aftermath of the "Down-Grade Controversy." Rather he was concerned that younger men were lax in their views on the ATONEMENT, biblical inspiration, and JUSTIFICATION by FAITH. He was disappointed, however, that few of even his own trainees followed him in severing denominational links. His sense of isolation was accentuated by separation from the Liberal Party that he had previously strongly supported when, in 1886, he could not accept its policy of Home Rule for IRELAND. Rheumatic gout had brought on Bright's disease, and in his last years he often traveled to recuperate in Mentone in the south of France, where he died in 1892. His writings, many of which remain in print, constitute a lasting memorial. They include the popular and witty John Ploughman's Talk (1868) and a multivolume extended commentary on the Psalms, The Treasury of David (1870–1886). His sermons, published weekly until 1917, continued to enjoy a huge international sale.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Spurgeon, Charles Haddon. The Early Years, 1834–1859. London: Banner of Truth Trust, 1962.

———. The Full Harvest, 1860–1892. Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1973.

———. John Ploughman's Talk. London: n.p., [1868].

———. The Treasury of David. 7 vols. London: Passmore & Alabaster, 1870–1886.

Secondary Sources:

Bebbington, David W. "Spurgeon and British Evangelical Theological Education." In Theological Education in the Evangelical Tradition, edited by D.G.Hart and R.Albert Mohler, Jr. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1996.

Hopkins, Mark Thomas Eugene. "Baptists, Congregationalists and Theological Change: Some Late Nineteenth Century Leaders and Controversies." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Oxford, 1988.

Kruppa, P.S. Charles Haddon Spurgeon: A Preacher's Progress. New York: Garland Publishing, 1982.

Payne, Ernest A. "The Down Grade Controversy: A Postscript." Baptist Quarterly 28 no. 4 (1979): 146–158.

D.W.BEBBINGTON

STAHL, FRIEDRICH JULIUS (1802–1861)

German political theorist. The influential legal theorist and ecclesiastical policy maker was born on January 16, 1802 in Würzburg as Julius Jolson and died on August 10, 1861 in Bad Brückenau. Stahl grew up in an orthodox Jewish merchant family, but, inspired by Protestant neohumanism, he converted in 1819 to LUTHERANISM and took the new name for which he is known.

Stahl studied law and graduated in 1827. In 1832 he became professor of the philosophy of law in Würzburg, and in 1834 he moved to Erlangen, where he came under the influence of Lutheranism. The Prussian king Friedrich Wilhelm IV, shortly after his coronation, saw to Stahl's appointment as a professor in Berlin, with the expectation of finding in him a sharp, convincing advocate who shared his understanding of the state during the period of German restoration. Stahl did not disappoint the king's expectations, and his reputation and influence in politics and church policy grew accordingly.

The two-volume Philosophie des Rechts (Philosophy of Law) that appeared in 1830 (vol. 1) and 1837 (vol. 2) is Stahl's greatest work. Influenced by FRIEDRICH WILHELM JOSEPH VON SCHELLING, Stahl formulated the foundation of the state not in liberal or romantic terms but in terms of divine right, which consequently laid the foundation for the Christian state. According to Stahl any form of popular sovereignty was the same as revolution, something he considered a continuous threat whose only cure was the Christian state. To establish such a state, the idea of nation needed a theory that reasserted the duty of the throne, the state, and the CHURCH. With this intention Stahl wrote Die Kirchenverfassung nach Lehre und Recht der Protestanten (The Constitution of the Church according to Protestant Doctrine and Law, 2nd ed., 1862) and Über das monarchische Prinzip (On the Principle of Monarchy) in 1846. In 1853 he gave his idea its most pointed conception in the work Der Protestantismus als politisches Prinzip (Protestantism as Political Principle).

Stahl was a brilliant speaker who had a tremendous impact not only as a professor but also as a popular writer and politician. In 1848 he helped found the Conservative Party in Prussia and its main newspaper, the Neue Preussische Zeitung. Because of the iron cross on the title page, it was generally known as "Kreuzzeitung." The end of the period of restoration (1858–1861) also brought an end to his influence. His conception of the Christian state had a lasting impact, however, not only in Prussia and GERMANY but also beyond.

See also Church and State, Overview

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Stahl, F.J. What is the Revolution? State College, PA: Penn State University Press, 1977.

Secondary Source:

Nabrings, Arie. Friedrich Julius Stahl: Rechtsphilosophie und Kirchen-politik. Bielefeld, Germany: Lutherverlag, 1983.

MARTIN GRESCHAT

STANTON, ELIZABETH CADY (1815–1902)

U.S. women's rights leader. Born in Jonestown, New York, into a prominent Presbyterian family (see PRESBYTERIANISM), Elizabeth Cady married attorney Henry Stanton in 1840; they raised seven children. Active in the abolitionist movement, Stanton and her husband spent their honeymoon at the World's Anti-Slavery Convention in London (see SLAVERY; SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). There she, LUCRETIA COFFIN MOTT, and other women delegates were prohibited from being seated because of their sex.

This discrimination prompted Stanton and Mott to organize the first U.S. women's rights convention in 1848 in Seneca Falls, New York. Stanton wrote the convention's Declaration of Sentiments modeled after the Declaration of Independence, stating that "all men and women are created equal." For the next fifty years, she was the leading theorist of the women's rights movement. In 1866 Stanton established the American Equal Rights Association with Mott and Lucy Stone; founded the National Woman Suffrage Association with Susan B. Anthony in 1869, serving as its president until 1890; coedited The History of Woman Suffrage (1881–1886) with Anthony and Matilda Joslyn Gage; and wrote numerous articles on women's right to vote, equal wages, fair DIVORCE laws, access to EDUCATION, and property ownership.

Stanton devoted her final decades to attacking women's oppression by organized Christianity. In 1895 and 1898 she published The Woman's Bible, two volumes of seething critiques of women's roles in the Old and New Testaments. Although a committee was credited with the work, Stanton wrote over half the commentaries herself. She lauded uppity biblical women like Eve, Jael, and Esther, and vilified contemporary Christian women who obeyed clerical injunctions to submission. This radical work alienated her from many suffragists. Stanton died in 1902 in New York City. Her legacy is an indomitable faith that women can think and live for themselves apart from men, church, or state.

See also: Women; Women Clergy; Feminist Theology; Womanist Theology

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Stanton, Elizabeth Cady. Eighty Years and More: Reminiscences 1815–1897. Introduction by Ellen Carol DuBois; Afterword by Ann D. Gordon. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1993.
, and the Revising Committee. The Woman's Bible. New York: European Publishing, 1895, 1898; reprint, Seattle, WA: Ayer, 1974.

Secondary Source:

Griffith, Elisabeth. In Her Own Right: The Life of Elizabeth Cady Stanton. New York: Oxford University Press, 1984.

EVELYN A.KIRKLEY

STATISTICS

This article outlines the quantification of Protestant affiliation in the context of global Christianity and world religions. Every year, virtually all of the world's 8,600 Protestant denominations conduct an in-house census asking clergy and lay leaders a wide variety of statistical questions. These cover in aggregate 180 major religious subjects and number more than 1,000 different variables. This whole exercise costs the churches $600 million annually. Its long-established purposes are threefold: to assist the churches in analyzing their past, in deploying their resources for the present, and in planning for the future. Table 1 summarizes the results of these censuses worldwide and across the years 1900–2050, the latter being conservative future predictions based on current long-term trends.

Origin of the Term “Protestant”

In the year 1529 in Germany, the Second DIET OF SPEYER voted to rescind previously agreed-upon Lutheran geographical expansion. A minority of five German princes of the Holy Roman Empire and fourteen free cities then issued a formal “Protestation” (Latin, protestatio). Thereafter, supporters of Lutheran doctrines on the European continent began to be called, and to call themselves, “Protestants.” After 1600, Calvinists, who up to this point were termed “Reformed,” began to be included in the term Protestants. Two distinct applications of the term then gradually arose, resulting in widely differing statistics, as follows and as systematized in Table 2.

Core Protestants. This term is used here to depict the original Lutheran and Reformed churches of Europe together with the vast number of denominations linearly descended from them, holding to the basic REFORMATION doctrines and calling themselves (and called by others) by the same term “Protestants” (in German, evangelischen; in French, evangéliques; in Spanish, Portuguese, and Italian, evangelicos). Major dictionaries agree with this definition; thus Protestant churches are “Christian churches separating from the Roman Catholic Church in the Reformation of the 16th century or from another Protestant church to defend beliefs and practices held vital” (Webster’s Third New International Dictionary of the English Language [WTNIDEL]). Their numbers are represented in Table 1 by the one single line “Protestants” across the table in bold type. In the year 2000, their total of affiliated church members can be seen to have been 342,002,000, increasing at a rate of approximately 4,565,000 per year. These may be regarded as constituting the whole of mainstream historic Protestantism (in German, Protestantismus; in French, Protestantisme). As well as “historic Protestants,” they could also be called “classical Protestants,” “inner Protestants,” and even “Protestants proper.” For convenience, the term “Core Protestants” is adequately descriptive.

Table 1. The Pilgrimage of Protestantism and its Affiliated Church Members in the Context of Global Christianity and World Religions, 1900–2050

Year: Religion	1900 Adherents	%	1970 Adherents	%	Mid-1990 Adherents	%	Annual change, 1990–2000				Mid-2000 Adherents	%	Mid-2025 Adherents	%	Mid-2050 Adherents	%	Countries in 2000
							Natural	Conversion	Total	Trend
Christians	558,131,000	34.5	1,236,574,000	33.5	1,747,462,000	33.2	22,709,000	2,501,000	25,210,000	1.36	1,999,564,000	33.0	2,616,670,000	33.5	3,051,564,000	34.3	238
Unaffiliated Christians	36,489,000	2.3	106,268,000	2.9	101,889,000	1.9	1,305,000	-382,000	924,000	0.87	111,125,000	1.8	125,712,000	1.6	124,655,000	1.4	232
Affiliated Christians	521,642,000	32.2	1,130,106,000	30.6	1,645,573,000	31.3	21,404,000	2,883,000	24,287,000	1.39	1,888,439,000	31.2	2,490,958,000	31.8	2,926,909,000	32.9	238
Roman Catholics	266,547,000	16.5	665,954,000	18.0	929,702,000	17.7	13,118,000	-355,000	12,763,000	1.29	1,057,328,000	17.5	1,361,965,000	17.4	1,564,603,000	17.6	235
Indep den	7,931,000	0.5	95,605,000	2.6	301,536,000	5.7	4,496,000	3,925,000	8,421,000	2.49	385,745,000	6.4	581,642,000	7.4	752,842,000	8.5	221
Protes tants	103,024,000	6.4	210,759,000	5.7	296,349,000	5.6	4,224,000	341,000	4,565,000	1.44	342,002,000	5.7	468,633,000	6.0	574,419,000	6.5	232
Orthodox	115,844,000	7.2	139,662,000	3.8	203,766,000	3.9	751,000	386,000	1,136,000	0.54	215,129,000	3.6	252,716,000	3.2	266,806,000	3.0	134
Anglicans	30,571,000	1.9	47,501,000	1.3	68,196,000	1.3	1,072,000	74,000	1,145,000	1.56	79,650,000	1.3	113,746,000	1.5	145,984,000	1.6	163
Marginal Christians	928,000	0.1	11,100,000	0.3	21,833,000	0.4	269,000	153,000	423,000	1.79	26,060,000	0.4	45,555,000	0.6	62,201,000	0.7	215
Non religious	-2,609,000	-0.2	-29,781,000	-0.8	-154,615,000	-2.9	-2,458,000	-1,558,000	-4,016,000	2.34	-194,780,000	-3.2	-308,402,000	-3.9	-413,844,000	-4.7	93
Doubtly affiliated	-592,000	0.0	-10,694,000	-0.3	-21,193,000	-0.4	-68,000	-82,000	-150,000	0.69	-22,695,000	-0.4	-24,897,000	-0.3	-26,102,000	-0.3	11
Disaffiliated	1,061,495,000	65.5	2,459,774,000	66.6	3,518,980,000	66.8	56,152,000	-2,501,000	53,651,000	1.43	4,055,485,000	67.0	5,207,033,000	66.6	5,857,531,000	65.8	238
Muslims	199,941,000	12.3	553,528,000	15.0	962,357,000	18.3	21,723,000	865,000	22,589,000	2.13	1,188,243,000	19.6	1,784,876,000	22.8	2,229,282,000	25.0	204
Hindus	203,003,000	12.5	462,598,000	12.5	685,999,000	13.0	13,194,000	-660,000	12,534,000	1.69	811,336,000	13.4	1,049,231,000	13.4	1,175,298,000	13.2	114
Non religious	3,024,000	0.2	532,096,000	14.4	707,118,000	13.4	6,639,000	-535,000	6,104,000	0.83	768,159,000	12.7	875,121,000	11.2	887,995,000	10.0	236
Chinese universities	380,006,000	23.5	231,865,000	6.3	347,651,000	6.6	3,801,000	-86,000	3,716,000	1.02	384,807,000	6.4	448,843,000	5.7	454,333,000	5.1	89
Buddhists	127,077,000	7.9	233,424,000	6.3	323,107,000	6.1	3,531,000	157,000	3,688,000	1.09	359,982,000	6.0	418,345,000	5.4	424,607,000	4.8	126
Ethnor eligionists	117,558,000	7.3	160,278,000	4.3	200,035,000	3.8	4,098,000	-1,265,000	2,833,000	1.33	228,367,000	3.8	277,247,000	3.5	303,599,000	3.4	140
Atheists	226,000	0.0	165,400,000	4.5	145,719,000	2.8	1,315,000	-878,000	437,000	0.30	150,090,000	2.5	159,544,000	2.0	169,150,000	1.9	161
New-Reli gionists	5,910,000	0.4	77,762,000	2.1	92,396,000	1.8	1,032,000	-36,000	996,000	1.03	102,356,000	1.7	114,720,000	1.5	118,845,000	1.3	60
Sikhs	2,962,000	0.2	10,618,000	0.3	19,332,000	0.4	364,000	29,000	393,000	1.87	23,258,000	0.4	31,378,000	0.4	37,059,000	0.4	34
Jews	12,292,000	0.8	14,763,000	0.4	13,189,000	0.3	195,000	-70,000	125,000	0.91	14,434,000	0.2	16,695,000	0.2	16,695,000	0.2	134
Spiritists	269,000	0.0	4,603,000	0.1	10,155,000	0.2	137,000	81,000	218,000	1.96	12,334,000	0.2	16,212,000	0.2	20,709,000	0.2	55
Baha'is	10,000	0.0	2,657,000	0.1	5,672,000	0.1	117,000	26,000	143,000	2.28	7,106,000	0.1	12,062,000	0.2	18,001,000	0.2	218
Con fucianists	640,000	0.0	4,759,000	0.1	5,856,000	0.1	56,000	-11,000	44,000	0.73	6,299,000	0.1	6,818,000	0.1	6,953,000	0.1	15
Jains	1,323,000	0.1	2,618,000	0.1	3,868,000	0.1	75,000	-40,000	35,000	0.87	4,218,000	0.1	6,116,000	0.1	6,733,000	0.1	10
Shintoists	6,720,000	0.4	4,175,000	0.1	3,082,000	0.1	9,000	-41,000	-32,000	-1.09	2,762,000	0.1	2,123,000	0.0	1,655,000	0.0	8
Taoists	375,000	0.0	1,734,000	0.1	2,402,000	0.1	25,000	0	25,000	1.00	2,655,000	0.0	3,086,000	0.0	3,272,000	0.0	5
Zoro astrians	108,000	0.0	122,000	0.0	1,959,000	0.0	45,000	13,000	58,000	2.65	2,544,000	0.0	4,440,000	0.1	6,965,000	0.1	22
Other religi onists	49,000	0.0	784,000	0.0	964,000	0.0	10,000	0	10,000	1.03	1,067,000	0.0	1,500,000	0.0	1,938,000	0.0	78
Doubtly-counted religionists	0	0.0	-4,000,000	-0.1	-11,879,000	-0.2	-215,000	-50,000	-265,000	2.04	-14,531,000	-0.2	-20,665,000	-0.3	-25,516,000	-0.3	24
Global population	1,619,626,000	100.0	3,696,148,000	100.0	5,266,442,000	100.0	78,861,000	0	78,861,000	1.41	6,055,049,000	100.0	7,823,703,000	100.0	8,909,095,000	100.0	238

Notes.
 1. The six columns headed “%” give the size of adherents as a percentage of world population.
 2. Christian megabibles are ranked by size in 2000; Non-Christians also by size in 2000. For definitions of terms, see World Christian Trends, 2001.
 3. The four lines in bold type across the page make up the category of Wider Protestants. The line labeled “Protestants” is called and explained in the accompanying article as Core Protestants.
 4. The main category “affiliated Christians” refers to church members. “Unaffiliated Christians” are those professing to be Christians but without affiliation or contact with the churches.
 5. Under the heading “Annual change,” “Natural” means births minus deaths per year, “Conversion” means converts (the newly baptized or initiated) minus defectors, and “Trend” gives each line’s rate of change as a percent.

Wider Protestants. Dictionaries record the narrow or straightforward definition above but all add a second, wider definition. Webster’s New World Dictionary of the American Language (NWDAL) defines “Protestant” as not only a member of German/French/Lutheran/Calvinist churches, but also as “any Christian not belonging to the Roman Catholic or ORTHODOX EASTERN church.” This is a huge expansion of the definition. Many government census organizers, administrators, journalists, and even scholars follow this definition of Protestant to cover and include all other non-Catholic and non-Orthodox traditions.

This wider usage has arisen over the last five centuries, both in popular usage and in ecclesiastical parlance, as well as in those scholarly circles. It arose to meet the need for a shorter, simpler overall classification and typology of Christians for those persons working with or frustrated by the vast complex of more than 300 different varieties of Christian denominations. The most widely used such typology simplifies the nomenclature to three categories only—dividing all Christians into Catholics, Orthodox, or Protestants.

Table 1 shows the numerical implications of this enlarged definition. While Core Protestants are shown in bold on the line “Protestants,” this second usage, here termed Wider Protestants, now includes all four lines in bold type—those four basic megablocs known as Protestants, Anglicans, Independents, and Marginal Christians.

A caution needs to be stated at this point. These last three additional megablocs do not normally call themselves Protestants. First, although NWDAL had extended its core definition of a Protestant to include “a member of any of the Christian churches as a result of the Reformation,” it expanded the definition by adding the words “especially a Lutheran, Calvinist, or Anglican.” Anglicans themselves preferred (and still prefer) to describe themselves not as “Protestant,” but rather as “Catholic and Reformed.” Since the High Church OXFORD MOVEMENT of 1833, several thousand Anglican clergy of Anglo-Catholic or Anglo-Roman persuasion overtly rejected the label “Protestant” for themselves, for the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, and for the entire Anglican Communion. Moreover, WTNIDEL states that to define “a member of the Anglican Church” as “Protestant” is now an “archaic” usage, invalid since the reign of Charles I. This whole subject is investigated in depth in the Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (1997:1338–1340).

Second, “Independents” are defined here as those claiming to be “independent of historic Protestant denominationalism.” In most cases they do not trace their roots to the Protestant Reformation in sixteenth-century Europe—one thinks of the 75 million affiliated to the African Independent Churches, the 50 million in China’s HOUSE CHURCH movement, or the 15 million nonbaptized Hindu believers in Christ. The vast majority of these 140 million indigenous believers in Christ do not understand the main languages of the Reformation—German, French, English—and hence there is little empirical sense in calling them “Protestants.”

Finally, “Marginal Christians” is the self-definition of those churches rejecting both Protestantism and mainstream Trinitarian Christianity (e.g., Unitarians, JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES) although regarding themselves as still on its margins.

Having given this evidence, it is still valuable to accept this usage of “Wider Protestants,” although many scholars or journalists do not indicate which usage they are using. For the credibility of the science of empirical Christianity, all quantitative use of the term “Protestants” needs to make clear what exact definition is meant. Table 1 assists in this clarification by analyzing the magnitude of its composition under those four lines in bold type labeled “Protestants,” “Independents,” “Anglicans,” and “Marginal Christians.” The total shows that by mid-2000, wider Protestants numbered 833,457,000 affiliated church members, increasing at a rate of approximately 14,554,000 per year (adding the four numbers under “Annual Change, Total”).

Table 2. Terminology, Usages, and Statistics of Protestantism in AD 2000 The table depicts relations between the two major statistical constructs: Core Protestants and Wider Protestants.

Column A	WIDER PROTESTANTS				Totals
	833,457,000				833,457,000
	Column B				Column C
	Column D	Column E		833,457,000
	CORE PROTESTANTS	NON-CORE PROTESTANTS
	342,002,000	491,455,000
Basic Protestant Statistics in 2000
	INDEPENDENTS	ANGLICANS	MARGINALS
		Column F	Column G	Column H
1. Affiliated to churches	342,002,000	385,745,000	79,650,000	26,060,000	833,457,000
2. Affiliated, % of world	5.7	6.4	1.3	0.4	13.8
3. Growth p.a.	4,565,000	8,421,000	1,145,000	423,000	14,554,000
4. Growth % p.a.	1.44	2.49	1.56	1.79	1.74
5. Worship centers	952,800	1,587,000	91,700	106,100	2,737,600
6. Denominations	8,600	22,100	300	1,470	32,470
7. World Communion	39	92	40	25	196
8. Countries present in	232	221	163	215	238
Relations with and Interest in Protestantism, % (0% =none, 100%=maximum)
9. 16th-century Reformation	90	0	60	0	50
10. Subsequent heritage	80	0	40	0	40
11. Major locations	Europe	Asia, Africa	Europe	Americas	World
12. Contact with core	100	1	50	10	60
13. Use of term "Protestant"	100	0	30	0	60
14. Main autonym	Protestants	Charismatics	Anglicans	Marginal Christians	Christians
15. Subsidiary autonym	Lutherans /Reformed	Postdenominationalists	Episcopalians	Neo christians	Believers
16. Component autonym	Evangelicals	Apostolics	Catholics /Evangelicals	Unitarians	Followers
17. Official use of term	90	0	20	0	50
18. Interest in the "Protestant"	70	0	10	0	30
19. Confessionalism	90	10	60	10	60

20. Conciliarism (councils)	80	20	80	0	70
21. Church union (mergers)	70	0	60	0	40
22. Denomina tionalism (HQs)	100	0	80	0	60

A further complexity arises because 194,780,000 Christians are doubly affiliated, which means that they are individually members of two or more Protestant denominations at the same time, or members of one Protestant and one non-Protestant body, or collectively members in congregations affiliated with two Protestant denominations. Likewise, 22,695,000 persons are disaffiliated (baptized members who have subsequently abandoned Christianity but without rescinding or notifying their old affiliation). Again, 14,530,000 persons are doubly counted religionists, these being mostly Hindus who are also followers of Christ. All of these factors enumerate Christians correctly, but their precise definitions must be stated and recognized by their users.

The relationship between core Protestants and Wider Protestants and their subcategories is set out in Table 2. The first half of the table, "Basic Protestant statistics in 2000," gives a statistical profile of the five categories of Protestants. Its eight statistical measures demonstrate how core Protestants (column D) and the three non-core Protestants (Independents in column F, Anglicans in column G, and Marginal Christians in column H) all add up to Wider Protestants (column B). Particularly noteworthy in passing is line 7, stating in column C that of the world's 196 distinct and different Christian World Communions (CWCs) of Protestant origin or character, ninety-two have been created by Independents with little or no assistance from the thirty-nine CWCs in column D or the forty CWCs in column G.

The second half of Table 2, "Relations with and Interest in Protestantism," gives a descriptive verbal profile of the five statistical varieties of Protestants. The final line (22) sums up the whole typology and its status; all Core Protestants belong to denominations characterized here as "Denominationalist," that is, controlled to some extent by strong centralized head-quarters and bureaucratic staff. Most Anglicans (80 percent) likewise belong to dioceses exercising centralized control over members and churches and finances. In strong contrast, virtually all Independents are Postdenominationalists, which means that although they have created thousands of new networks, new denominations, and new communions, they steadfastly reject all centralized denominationalist power or control over members and their local churches and finances.

The Current Situation of Protestantism

A further analysis of several aspects of Protestant phenomenology can now be made. From their humble beginnings in Central Europe in the early sixteenth century, Protestants are now found in every country of the world, in some 32,470 wider Protestant denominations with more than 2.7 million congregations claiming more than 833 million followers. Today's Protestants, like other Christians, who were more than 80 percent white in 1900, are now found mainly in AFRICA, Asia, and LATIN AMERICA. This diverse collection of cultures and denominations at first may seem difficult to enumerate. But seen in the context of global efforts of counting Christians, there is actually a remarkably consistent wealth of data to draw on. To further understand the Protestant situation, one must first outline in more detail how all Christians and other world religions enumerate their followers.

The Overall Context of Counting

Vast efforts are put into the collection of statistics relating to the 10,000 or so distinct and separate religions in today's world. The most detailed data collection and analysis is undertaken each year by some 34,000 Christian denominations and their constituent churches and congregations of believers. This massive, decentralized, and largely uncoordinated global census of Christians includes both local and global contexts. Around 10 million printed questionnaires are sent out in 3,000 different languages. This collection of data provides a year-by-year snapshot of the progress or decline of Christianity's diverse movements, offering an enormous untapped reservoir of data for the researcher to track trends and make projections. The most extensive of these inquiries is that done by the Roman Catholic Church. As with many other church leaders, all Roman Catholic bishops are required to answer, by a fixed date every year, a twenty-one-page schedule in Latin and one other language asking 140 precise statistical questions concerning their work in the previous twelve months. Results are then published every January in Annuario Pontificio. The entire operation, undertaken in varying degrees by all Christian bodies and some non-Christian religions as well, is best termed the annual "religion megacensus."

Government Censuses of Religion

At the same time, the world's governments also have—since the twelfth century—collected information on religious populations and practice. A question related to religion is thus asked in more than 120 of the world's countries in their official national decennial population censuses. Until 1990, this number was slowly declining each decade as developing countries began dropping the religion question as too expensive (in many countries, each census costs well over a half a million dollars per question) and, apparently, too uninteresting. This trend appears to have reversed by 2001. Thus Britain, which produced the world's first national census of religious affiliation (the Compton Census in 1676), and later a religion question in the national census of 1851 although none thereafter, reintroduced the question in Britain's 2000 census as the best way to get firm data on each and every non-Christian minority to fairly apportion education, broadcasting, health care, and other benefits.

Analyzing and Defining

The starting point in any analysis of religious affiliation is the United Nations' 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Article 18: "Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance." Since its promulgation, these phrases have been incorporated into the state constitutions of a large number of countries across the world, with many countries instructing their census personnel to observe this principle: If a person states that he or she is a Protestant, or a Catholic or other Christian (or Muslim, Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh, Jew, etc.), then no one has a right to say he or she is not. Public declaration or profession must be taken seriously. The result is a clear-cut assessment of the extent of religious profession in the world.

Resolving Apparent Contradictory Data

Meanwhile, a formidable amount of new material for each year is being collected by the religious bodies themselves. In a particular country, the results from these two methods (government censuses and religion megacensus) can be strikingly different. For example, in Egypt, where the vast majority of the population is Muslim, elaborate government censuses taken every ten years for the last 100 years show that only some 5 percent of the population declare themselves as or profess to be Christians. However, detailed church censuses reveal the number of Christians affiliated with churches to be 15 percent of the population. Why this discrepancy? The reason appears to be that due to Muslim pressure on the Christian minority, to avoid being discriminated against many Christians are recorded in censuses by enumerators, or record themselves, as Muslims. Thus, any understanding of religious affiliation must take into account precisely what is being measured by these two approaches.

A Threefold Dynamic of Change in Religious Affiliation

Both of these sources—religions and governments—must be explored to gain an understanding of the total context of religious affiliation. With this in mind, the dynamics of change in religious affiliation over time can be limited to three sets of empirical population data. Overall numerical growth among religious adherents (increase or decrease, per year) may be measured by adding three components: (1) births minus deaths, (2) converts minus defectors, and (3) immigrants minus emigrants. All future projections of religious affiliation within any subset of the global population (normally a country or region) depend on this dynamic.

Births Minus Deaths. The primary mechanism of religious change globally is births and deaths; the number of adherents goes up with the number of births and down with the number of deaths. Children are almost always counted to have the religion of their parents (this is the law in NORWAY and many other countries). This means that a religious population has a close statistical relationship to demography. The change over time in any given community is expressed most simply as the number of births into the community minus the number of deaths out of it. Many religious communities around the world experience little else in the dynamics of their growth or decline.

The impact of births and deaths on religious affiliation can change over time. For example, the recent Northern IRELAND census revealed a closing of the gap between Protestants and Catholics over the past three decades. Protestants used to make up 65 percent of the population, but by 2001 this had dropped to 53 percent. Catholics, in the meantime, had grown from 35 percent to 44 percent of the population. This shift is due primarily to the higher birthrate among Catholic women. One would expect that, given time, Catholics would eventually exceed 50 percent of the population. But the census also revealed two countertrends: (1) the death rate among Protestants is falling and (2) the birth rate among Catholics is falling. Given these trends, forecasters believe that, barring any other factors, Protestants are likely to remain in the majority in the coming decades.

Converts Minus Defectors. Nonetheless, it is common observation that individuals (or even whole villages or communities) change allegiance from one religion to another (or to no religion at all). Within a specific Christian community, it should be noted that “converts per year” is often similar, or even identical, to the number of new persons baptized over the last twelve months. Defectors, in contrast, are never enumerated or recognized or even known about by each and every religion. In the twentieth century, this change was most pronounced in two general areas:

1. Tribal religionists, more precisely termed “ethnoreligionists,” have converted in large numbers to Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, or Buddhism.
2. Christians in the Western world have defected to become nonreligious (agnostics) or atheists in large numbers. Both of these trends slowed considerably by the dawn of the twenty-first century, however.

Immigrants Minus Emigrants. At the national level, it is equally important to consider the movement of people across national borders. From the standpoint of religious affiliation, this can have a profound impact. In the colonial era in the nineteenth century, small groups of Europeans settled in Africa, Asia, and the Americas. In the late twentieth century, people from these regions emigrated to the Western world. Thus, in the United States, such religions as Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism grew faster than either Christianity or the nonreligious and atheists. This growth is due almost entirely to the immigration of Asians. In Europe, massive immigration of Muslims has not only been transforming the spiritual landscape, but also has now become a major political issue, notably in FRANCE, GERMANY, Austria, and ITALY and also in plans for European Union expansion. In the Central Asian countries of the former Soviet Union, Christianity has declined significantly every year since 1990, due to the mass emigration of Russians, Germans, and Ukrainians.

Methodology

In a recent survey volume, tables have been prepared enumerating both the Christian and religious situation for each of the world's 238 countries; see Country Tables 1 (religions) and Country Tables 2 (Christian denominations) in Volume 1 of World Christian Encyclopedia: A Comparative Survey of Churches and Religions in the Modern World (WCE). A further analysis of the world's 12,600 ethnic peoples and their 10,000 distinct religions has provided much additional context for these tables (WCE Vol. 2). Detailed descriptions of methodology explaining how the formidable technical difficulties were resolved in these tables are found in the WCE and World Christian Trends, AD 30-AD 2200: Interpreting the Annual Christian Megacensus (WCT). Every two years since 1950, the databases have incorporated the updates of the United Nations' population database for all countries from 1950 to 2050 and for some 100 variables each. A summary global report on the religion megacensus has been published annually in Encyclopaedia Britannica's Book of the Year since 1987.

Christian data are more complete globally than data on other religions. These data are presented in Country Tables 2 in WCE Part 4, "Countries," for each of the world's 238 countries. Statistics on the world's 33,800 denominations are given for 1970 and 1995. Christian data can then be presented in the total context of other religions and demographic data. This is done in Country Tables 1 for each country in WCE Part 4, "Countries." Here one finds a breakdown of the population into all of its constituent pieces—religious and nonreligious for the years 1900, 1970, 1990, 1995, 2000, and 2025. The growth rates of all categories from 1990 to 2000 are presented here as well. The results of this method have for selected years been shown in Table 1.

Further Details on Protestant Trends

Table 1 illustrates the changing fortunes of Protestants over the twentieth century. First is their apparent decline in percentage of the world's population, dropping from 6.4 percent in 1900 to 5.7 percent in 2000. This decline can be explained largely by the meteoric rise of Independents in the same period from only 0.5 percent to, coincidentally, 6.4 percent. Many of these Independents are schisms from Protestants and Anglicans (thus the tendency for scholars to consider them all as Protestants). If one combines Anglicans, Independents, Protestants, and Marginal Christians, then a different picture emerges. Together, these represented 8.8 percent of the world's population in 1900, but had risen to 13.4 percent by 2000. Nonetheless, the fastestgrowing segment remains the Independents.

Second, as noted earlier, another significant trend is the changing ethnic and cultural mosaic of the Protestant world. What was largely a white church 100 years ago is now largely nonwhite. These “new Protestants” have emerged largely from three phenomena:

- a. The CONVERSION of Roman Catholics in Latin America has been so pronounced that a major study was recently published with the title “Is Latin America turning Protestant?”
- b. The conversion of ethnoreligionists in Africa has meant that since 1900, thousands of tribal groups have been penetrated by Protestant missionaries in sub-Saharan Africa. Although many of these new Protestants later split off and became Independents, most have remained within the Protestant denominations.
- c. To a lesser extent, Protestant MISSIONS among world religions, such as Islam or Hinduism, have begun to make more progress in recent years. Most of these are found in Asia.

Third, Protestants across the world have been impacted by the Postdenominationalist movement. Many churches no longer identify their denominations in their titles. Leadership structures have become less hierarchical. WORSHIP has become less formal. What Protestants have to offer amidst the fast-growing Post-denominationalist world, ironically, may be its continuity with historic Christianity. Many Independent Christian leaders are studying the lives and writings of MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN in an attempt to find theological moorings for their movements. It is likely that Core Protestants will remain in a unique position to thus guide their Independent neighbors.

Protestants and Catholics Each Reach 1.5 Billion

Table 1 extends its statistical coverage into the future by cautious extrapolation from existing long-term trends. Four columns near the right edge depict the situation in 2025 and 2050. One startling finding is that Core Protestants in 1900 and in 2050 both show a percentage of global population unchanged at 6.7 percent. Wider Protestantism, in contrast, is expanding unabated, to become 17.2 percent of the world by 2050. Observers carefully comparing all these figures in the total context will have observed the even more startling finding that for the first time ever in the history of Protestantism, Wider Protestants will by 2050 have become almost exactly as numerous as Roman Catholics—each with just over 1.5 billion followers, or 17 percent of the world, with Protestants growing considerably faster than Catholics each year. Many believers born in the twentieth century will be the church leaders guiding both constituencies at that time.

The Long-Term Future of Protestantism

The future of the Protestant enterprise may be found in its growth outside of its European and American homelands. One hundred years from now, while continuing its traditions and doctrines, its cultural forms may be largely unrecognizable to Western Protestants. That may be an unintended consequence of its commitment to world evangelization, but it augurs well for its richness of cultural and linguistic diversity that Luther advocated for German Christians nearly 500 years ago.

See also Anglicanism; Anglo-Catholicism; Calvinism; Denominations; Lutheranism; Sectarianism

References and Further Reading

- Annuario Pontificio*. Citta del Vaticano: Tipografia Poliglotta Vaticana, annual.
- Barrett, D.B., and T.M.Johnson. World Christian Trends, AD 30-AD 2200: Interpreting the Annual Christian Megacensus. Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 2001.
- Barrett, D.B., G.T.Kurian, and T.M.Johnson. World Christian Encyclopedia: A Comparative Survey of Churches and Religions in the Modern World. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Cross, F.L., and E.A.Livingstone, eds. The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church. 3rd ed. London: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Eliade, M., et al., eds. The Encyclopedia of Religion. New York: Macmillan, 1986. Encyclopaedia Britannica Book of the Year. Chicago: Encyclopaedia Britannica, annual
- “Protestantism” in The New Encyclopaedia Britannica. 15th ed., vol. 26, 206–267, 1995.
- Statistical Yearbook of the Church*. Citta del Vaticano: Secretaria Status, biennial.
- Stoll, David. Is Latin America Turning Protestant?: The Politics of Evangelical Growth. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1990.
- World Population Projections to 2150*. New York: United Nations, 1998.
- World Population Prospects*. New York: United Nations, 2001.

TODD M.JOHNSON AND DAVID B.BARRETT

STOECKER, ADOLF (1835–1909)

German theologian. Stoecker is remembered as a Christian socialist, anti-Semite, ardent German nationalist, outspoken critic of Marxist socialism, prolific journalist, controversial court preacher in Berlin, member of the Reichstag, the German parliament, for twenty years, and leader of the Freie Volkskirche movement. He was born in Halberstadt in northern GERMANY in 1835 and studied for the ministry at the universities of HALLE and Berlin. In 1874 Stoecker was appointed by Emperor Wilhelm I to be a court preacher in Berlin, where he preached sermons based on biblical Christianity, patriotism, and social reform until he was dismissed by Bismarck in 1890.

Stoecker became convinced that the traditional methods of pastoral care and charitable activities were inadequate responses to the needs of impoverished people and the challenges of social problems. In addition, he realized that the Social Democrats, with their Marxist-oriented revolutionary and atheistic agenda, would alienate the disestablished classes from both the church and the state. Therefore, in 1878 Stoecker organized the Central Association for Social Reform and founded the Christian Socialist Workers Party based on Christian and nationalistic principles as an alternative and competing political and social movement for the purpose of renewing and reforming society. After the party failed to elect any candidates, Stoecker reorganized it as the Christian Social Party and added ANTI-SEMITISM to its platform because he had become convinced that the Judenfrage was one of the key elements of the social problem. In 1880 Stoecker was elected to the Reichstag, where he served until 1893, and then again from 1891 to 1908.

In spite of his anti-Semitism and his linking of German NATIONALISM with Christianity, Stoecker made a significant contribution to German Protestantism by reinterpreting individualistic and private faith (see INDIVIDUALISM) into a politically and socially oriented Christianity. For Stoecker, the gospel was not just evangelical but a significant force that belonged in the everyday lives of people and the nation. Although not a blueprint, the gospel, claimed Stoecker, provided the necessary impetus and appropriate grounding for social change. Understanding human existence in historical terms, he argued that social change must be evolutionary because revolutionary attempts to sever humans from their past were alienating and dehumanizing. Stoecker supported shaping social structures by the gospel vision of the KINGDOM OF GOD, although he recognized that this very vision always relativized any human effort to create it. Rejecting both individualized CHARITY and revolutionary approaches, he advocated the alternative of CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM. Adopting the human-in-community perspective, Stoecker argued for the dual approach of religious-ethical renewal (a change in individual human consciousness) and structural reform (an evolutionary change in the social, political, and economic structures of life and living). Although unsuccessful relative to the church and nation at large, Stoecker along with other Christian socialists injected a significant perspective and alternative for those Protestants concerned with the plight of people marginalized by industrialized society.

See also Industrialization

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Stoecker, Adolf. Christlich-sozial: Reden und Aufsätze. Leipzig: Velhagen und Klasing, 1885; 2nd ed. Berlin: Verlag der Buchhandlung der Berliner Stadtmission, 1890.

Stoecker, Adolf. Reden und Aufsätze. Edited by Reinhold Seeberg. Leipzig, Germany: A.Deichert, 1913.

RONALD L.MASSANARI

STONE, BARTON (1772–1844)

American church leader and theologian. Born on December 24, 1772, at Port Tobacco, Maryland, Stone became a New Light Presbyterian pastor in Kentucky in 1793 and hosted the Cane Ridge (Kentucky) REVIVAL of 1801, before founding a movement of churches that embraced what they understood to be New Testament Christianity and took the name Christian. An advocate of Christian unity, Stone led his churches into a relationship with the DISCIPLES OF CHRIST movement of Thomas and Alexander Campbell in 1832.

Stone had broken with the Presbyterians over doctrinal matters in 1804. Unable to reconcile Calvinist understandings of PREDESTINATION, the Trinity and substitutionary atonement found in the WESTMINSTER CONFSSION of Faith, with his understanding of the New Testament, Stone joined fellow ministers in dissolving the Springfield Presbytery of Kentucky with the “Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery.” In 1805 Stone became embroiled in a debate over the ATONEMENT and published a pamphlet entitled Atonement, in which Stone argued that Christ’s DEATH served not to appease God’s wrath but to lead all humans to repentance by demonstrating the nature of human SIN. Stone’s advocacy of unity and simple biblical Christianity gave birth to a movement of churches called CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, which adopted both a noncreedal form of Christianity and BAPTISM by immersion. By 1830 the Christians had more than sixteen thousand members in at least five states. In 1826 Stone began publishing the Christian Messenger, a monthly journal, as a way of communicating with the growing network of Christian Churches and to advance his vision of Christian unity. After the 1832 merger Stone continued to publish the Christian Messenger, pushing his vision of Christian unity until his death on November 9, 1844.

See also Calvinism; Presbyterianism; Salvation

References and Further Reading

Dunnivant, Anthony, ed. Cane Ridge in Context: Perspectives on Barton W. Stone and the Revival.

Nashville, TN: Disciples of Christ Historical Society, 1992.

Williams, D. Newell. Barton Stone: A Spiritual Biography. St. Louis, MO: Chalice Press, 2000.

R.D.CORNWALL

STOWE, HARRIET BEECHER (1811–1896)

American author. Harriet Beecher was born June 14, 1811 at Litchfield, Connecticut, the seventh child of Roxana Foote and the Congregationalist minister LYMAN BEECHER. She was educated at her sister Catharine's Hartford Female Seminary, where she became a teacher in 1827. In 1832 she moved with the family to Cincinnati when Beecher became the president of Lane Theological Seminary and the pastor of a Presbyterian church there. At Cincinnati she again taught in a school headed by Catharine, until her marriage in 1836 to the recently widowed Calvin Stowe of the seminary faculty. The Stowes moved to Bowdoin College in Maine in 1850, and to Andover Theological Seminary in Massachusetts in 1852. Beginning in 1867 they divided their time between homes in New England and in Florida. Mentally incompetent during the last years of her life, Stowe died July 1, 1896.

Although she authored over thirty books, Stowe is usually remembered for her epic antislavery novel, Uncle Tom's Cabin: or, Life among the Lowly (1852). Angered by the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, Stowe—already a published author—wrote this novel (first serialized in the National Era) to expose the systemic evils of SLAVERY, and to indict Northerners and Southerners who countenanced its continuance. Although the Beecher family was antislavery without being abolitionist (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF), there was little in Harriet's education or previously expressed sentiments to indicate that she would become "the little woman who wrote the book that made this great war," as ABRAHAM LINCOLN is said to have quipped upon meeting Stowe in 1862. Uncle Tom's Cabin was an immediate commercial success; over 300,000 copies were sold in the year after its publication, and millions have been sold since. Indeed, it is often described as the best-selling novel of all time. That it helped galvanize antislavery sentiment in the North in the years leading up to the CIVIL WAR is unquestioned.

The critical reaction to Uncle Tom's Cabin was immediate and diverse. Southerners attacked it for inaccuracies in its description of slavery, for its overly generous estimation of the capabilities and character of African Americans, and for its clarion call for active resistance to the Fugitive Slave Law. In the South, distribution of the book was often forbidden. Northern critics debated its portrayal of slavery, its radicalism, and its artistry; the critical reception in the North was, however, mainly positive. The book was also popular overseas, where it was critically acclaimed; within a few years it had been translated into over twenty languages. In response to questions about its portrayal of slave life, Stowe documented her knowledge of slavery in A Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin (1853). She also wrote another, less successful, antislavery novel, Dred: A Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp (1856). After the Civil War, plays based on Uncle Tom's Cabin, which often severely distorted the original message, remained popular with the general public. The book itself was little read, however, and critics became increasingly negative in their estimation of its artistry, calling it “popular” and “sentimental,” a work by one of that mid-nineteenth century “mob of scribbling women” (the dismissive words with which Nathaniel Hawthorne had described his female rivals). By 1900 Stowe and Uncle Tom’s Cabin were largely ignored in literary history and theory.

Critical rediscovery of Stowe came in the mid-twentieth century, initially under the impetus of attacks on her alleged racism. James Baldwin pilloried Uncle Tom’s Cabin in a 1949 article, accusing Stowe of racism (for her frequent use of racial stereotypes), “theological terror” (for her threatened divine retribution against slaveholders), and for robbing the central character of the book of his manliness (by making him a longsuffering and forgiving Christ-figure). Baldwin’s provocative criticism was followed by that of J.C.Furnas, in his book Goodbye to Uncle Tom (1956). Although recognizing the truth in these critiques, especially that Stowe’s racial stereotyping (even when intended to be benevolent) could be destructive, critics soon began to enunciate more nuanced interpretations. The ensuing discussion of not only her antislavery books, but of the larger corpus of her work—especially that portion focusing on life in New England, and her controversial Lady Byron Vindicated (1870)—has continued to the present. Feminist, and to a lesser extent African-American, scholars have taken the lead in examining a wide range of religious, racial, political, economic, and social issues in her books, as they attempt to understand her within the context of her own time.

As a result of this reexamination of her work, Stowe has reappeared within the canon of American literature from which she was ejected in the late nineteenth century. Her racial attitudes, her feminism (she supported women’s suffrage and equal pay for equal work, but rejected some ideas and programs of the more radical feminists), her friendships with other women writers and reformers, her reaction to personal tragedies (especially the deaths of three of her children), and her religious views (she significantly altered her inherited Calvinist theology, becoming an Episcopalian in her later years) all continue to be widely discussed.

Many critics, from her time to ours, have noted that much of Stowe’s writing was essentially sermonic. As the daughter of a Protestant minister, and the sister of several others, including the famous HENRY WARD BEECHER, this is hardly surprising. Her own self-understanding was primarily religious and moral; she struggled creatively all her life with the theological ideas and ethical convictions that she had learned from her New England Puritan upbringing.

See also Calvinism; Congregationalism; Episcopal Church, United States; Presbyterianism; Puritanism; Weld, Theodore Dwight

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Stowe, Harriet Beecher. Uncle Tom's Cabin, or, Life Among the Lowly. New York: Literary Classics, 1982.

Stowe, Harriet Beecher, and Joan D.Hedrick. The Oxford Harriet Beecher Stowe Reader. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Secondary Sources:

Ammons, Elizabeth, ed. Uncle Tom's Cabin: Authoritative Text, Backgrounds and Contexts, Criticism. New York: W.W. Norton and Co., 1994.

Foster, Charles H. The Rungless Ladder: Harriet Beecher Stowe and New England Puritanism. New York: Cooper Square Publishers, 1970.

Gossett, Thomas F. Uncle Tom's Cabin and American Culture. Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 1985.

Hedrick, Joan D. Harriet Beecher Stowe: A Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Hildreth, Margaret Holbrook. Harriet Beecher Stowe: A Bibliography. Hamden, CT: Archon Books, 1976.

DONALD L.HUBER

STRAUSS, DAVID FRIEDRICH (1808–1874)

German theologian. Born in Ludwigsburg, GERMANY, in 1808, David Friedrich Strauss produced one of the most important theological and historical works of the nineteenth century. His landmark volume The Life of Jesus, Critically Examined, first published in 1835, was revised and edited again through several successive (and very different) volumes. Strauss's 1,400-page masterpiece, written in just one feverish year, was originally translated into English by the British novelist GEORGE ELIOT in 1846, introducing Strauss's revolutionary ideas to the English-speaking world. Strauss's major contribution was to place the life of Jesus in a broader mytho-historical context and pioneer in the techniques that eventually came to be known as the HIGHER CRITICISM of the BIBLE. Rejecting both the rationalist approach to biblical study, which attempted to dismiss biblical stories as fairy tales that could be attributed to natural explanation, and the supernaturalist approach, which held to the direct miraculous intervention of God in history through the life of his son Jesus, Strauss proposed that the life of Jesus as recounted in the various gospels was best explained through setting the biblical literature in the context of Judaic myths about the coming of the Messiah on earth. Strauss meant by myth "the representation of an event or idea in a historical form but characterized by the pictorial and imaginative thought and expression of primitive ages" (Lawler 1986:42). Strauss's influence was far-reaching because his work set the stage for the revolution in the historical-critical study of the Bible that was developed in nineteenth-century German academic institutions and soon spread through Christendom. Although some of Strauss's ideas are dated, and some of his historical research long since surpassed, Strauss's notion of understanding Jesus within the messianic Jewish thought of his own time is now accepted as a commonplace in biblical studies, even among biblical conservatives.

The Life of Strauss

Born to a Protestant German family, Strauss was clearly destined for a ministerial and theological role in life from his early days. However, his revolutionary study of the biblical literature on Jesus's life blocked his career opportunities both in academia and in the church world, leaving him a mostly frustrated and bitter man from the time of the publication of The Life of Jesus, when he was just twenty-seven and recently graduated from theological seminary, until his painful death from an ulcer in February of 1874. After publication of his work on Jesus, Strauss lost his post as a college lecturer, and was blackballed as well from any pastoral positions in German Protestant parishes. He subsequently lived in Stuttgart, Germany, where he carried on an extensive correspondence with both supporters of and detractors from his work. In 1839, after much local controversy, Strauss was offered a professorship in dogmatics and church history in Zurich, SWITZERLAND. Local reaction in the strongly Protestant hamlet was intense; and when put to the vote of the citizenry, the Swiss citizens overwhelmingly rejected use of their tax money to pay the notorious professor. From the early 1840s forward, with money from the Swiss government that bought out his contract as well as a family inheritance, Strauss spent his remaining thirty-four years as an author, short-term politician, avid suitor but failed husband of a troubled opera singer, biographer, journalist, book reviewer, prolific and dyspeptic correspondent, and polemicist with and against the “Young Hegelians” in German academia. In his last decade he authored a failed popular work, The Life of Jesus for the German People, a kind of biography that would set the stage for countless other “Jesus Life” books to come in the twentieth century. In 1873 he left instructions to his son for his very secular funeral; by that time his youthful dream to deepen the Christian faith through his landmark scholarship and engagement with the ideas of the likes of FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER and GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH HEGEL had long since died.

The Life of Jesus: Background Preparation

As a young man, from 1821 to 1825, Strauss studied with the historian FERDINAND CHRISTIAN BAUR at a preparatory seminary in Blaubeuren, Germany. From there he moved on to university studies at Tübingen. From 1827 to 1830 he continued advanced theological studies and came under the influence of the famous German theologian Schleiermacher, as well as Hegel. He also completed a Ph.D. dissertation, his only substantial piece of writing before The Life of Jesus. Entranced by the Hegelian dialectic, Strauss came to Berlin in October of 1831 to study further with the philosopher-king, although Hegel died of cholera a few weeks later. Strauss expressed his dismay at the news in front of the proud theologian Schleiermacher, who normally expected more deference from his students. Strauss later wrote: “Schleiermacher has greatly stimulated me and I owe him a lot; but the man has still not satisfied me. He only goes half way; he doesn’t pronounce the final word.” Strauss determined to go intellectually where Schleiermacher, and no man, had gone before (Harris 1973:35).

Strauss decided to put before the public a life of Jesus that would deconstruct the older but no longer satisfactory ways of understanding the Gospels and the life of Jesus. He would strip away the accretion of false DOCTRINE and rationalistic simplicities that had distorted biblical study, and in doing so “re-establish dogmatically that which has been destroyed critically” (Strauss 1840:757).

What he soon learned was that “what has been destroyed critically” was about all the shocked and horrified reading public could talk about; and that Strauss as a thinker and writer was simply better at annihilation than at creation. The results of his work were that the foundations for the doctrines of the Christian faith were undermined, and Christian THE-ODOLOGY could never again be the same. Point by point, incident by incident, Strauss ruthlessly dissected the Gospel stories, showing again and again how little real knowledge could come from them, and how many of the supposed sayings and doings of Jesus fulfilled and arose out of older Jewish traditions and rabbinic literature. Jesus's DEATH, although real in Strauss's mind, could not have been followed by a literal physical resurrection. Older myths and legends, he contended, were recast into reports on the ostensibly empty tomb, whereas Jesus's later appearances to the disciples were clearly hallucinatory; Jesus's final ascension into HEAVEN capped the story with the ultimate messianic denouement.

In his younger years Strauss innocently believed he could carry on his work but that the essential faith would remain pristine; that the virgin birth, the miracles, and the death and resurrection would remain deep truths even if one might question their exact historicism. However, once doubt was cast on them as historical facts—and doubts coming not from known infidels such as Voltaire and DAVID HUME, but rather from a sturdy German Protestant scholar and parish minister whose intent was to deepen and enrich contemporary understanding of the Christian faith—the revolution was on. Strauss's own happiness was to be a casualty of the German culture wars of the mid-nineteenth century.

The Life of Jesus: Major Ideas

“Our standpoint,” Strauss announced in his major work, “allows the same laws to hold sway in every sphere of being and activity; and, therefore, where a narrative runs contrary to the laws of nature, it must be regarded as unhistorical” (Harris 1973:42). With that dictum in mind Strauss calmly picked apart what could be known truly about the historical Jesus. The result, as he himself put it, was that “the boundless treasure of truth and life, on which humanity has been nurtured for eighteen centuries, now seems to have been destroyed...God divested of his GRACE, man of his dignity, the bond between heaven and earth rent asunder” (Harris 1973:51). As he told a friend, however, all this destruction to “partly shake the infinite significance which faith attributes to this life,” was in the service of restoring it again “in a higher way.” This reconstruction would begin by “showing first, the crudity of supernaturalism; secondly the emptiness of rationalism, and thirdly the truth of SCIENCE” (Harris 1973:33–34).

By “science” Strauss meant that “which sees in the life of Jesus the consciousness which the Church has of the human spirit objectified as divine spirit; this consciousness is not projected into particular features, into miracles which are then allotted their significance; in the history of Jesus' death and resurrection, however, that idea in its whole process sums itself up systematically and shows that the Spirit attains the true positivity, the divine life...only through the negation of the negation” (Harris 1973:34).

The Hegelian influence is obvious: supernaturalism was the historic thesis, the truth that had comforted Christians for centuries (the notion that the Gospels record history accurately and nothing can be discarded, as Strauss summarized it); rationalism was its antithesis, the crude village atheist rejection of the supernatural (such as the notion that Jesus did not really walk on water but must have been stepping on rocks submerged just beneath the surface, and other like trivializations of the profound stories of the Bible). Strauss used the Hegelian method of using the thesis and antithesis positions to refute one another; the truths of supernaturalism refuted the trivial empiricism of rationalism, whereas the historical investigation of the rationalists undermined the simplistic faith of the supernaturalists. Strauss's view—the mythical approach—would provide the majestic synthesis, by proposing the new interpretation of Jesus's life as the representation of the Infinite Spirit in finite form, expressed in the Bible in the poetic and mythological language of the Jewish messianic authors of the Gospel (with the notable exception of the Gospel of John, which Strauss, at least in the first edition of his work, denied as too untrustworthy and internally fallacious to bear up under study).

Most radically, Strauss proposed that the essential truth was the unity of God and man, with Jesus being the individual physical representative of that unity for the ancient mind that needed a concrete symbol of that unity, although modern man could understand the idea philosophically. The fructifying contact of the Infinite Spirit of God with the finite being of man no longer needed the mythological props of the quasi-historical Jesus. The union of the divine and the human transcended the historic Jesus; the union was realized in the spirit of the human race as a whole. Indeed, Strauss saw Jesus himself as given to dubious and time-bound forms of a fanatical messianism, hardly an appropriate symbol for the more profound ideas of the modern age. Through the various editions of the work Strauss wavered somewhat on his opinion of Jesus the person, but even in his most positive readings he found Jesus the individual to be a shaky symbol for the more profound immanence of God as Spirit in Man.

Strauss's use (and, in the analyses of many critics, abuse) of Hegelianism in an attempt to wrest the deeper truths of religious thought from the time-bound conventions of the Gospels was the least successful portion of his work. As explained by scholar Peter Hodgson, “instead of a hermeneutics of symbols and religious myths, he proposed to destroy them, together with the historical tradition in which they were imbedded. It is no wonder that his constructive program remained barren and unfruitful” (Hodgson 1972: xxx vi).

Impact of Strauss's Work

Strauss put out three versions of his work in the late 1830s, during a time in which he remained intensely religious and sought to help his critics understand that he was not the devilish infidel that was quickly becoming his public persona. At one point, nearly pleading with the public, he proclaimed that “to this historical, personal Christ belongs everything from his life in which his religious perfection is portrayed: his discourses, his moral actions and his suffering.” That was as close as Strauss came to endorsing Protestant ORTHODOXY. In later editions he drew back from such forms of apologia. His efforts were without much success. After his rejection by the seminary in Zurich, the jobless Strauss, unable to fulfill his dream of being an august university professor and exiled from the church that had raised him, grew increasingly bitter. By that point he was inclined to be the very ogre to the faithful that he had been (falsely) reputed to be in his more pious years in the 1830s.

Strauss grew less concerned about defending the Christian faith, but as the years progressed was more agitated by the Hegelian left, notably LUDWIG FEUERBACH. The young Hegelians, picking up where Strauss left off, turned the idea of God itself into a projection of human desire; rather than God creating man, it was instead the case that man created God in his own image, they insisted. It was the beginnings of what would later be called the DEATH OF GOD theology. By that time Strauss was no longer truly a revolutionary, for the young Hegelians had surpassed him. Strauss despised them, in part because they had stolen his thunder. By that time he was the object of hatred from the traditionalist Christian right, and of scorn from the revolutionary left. Perhaps for this reason Strauss grew more conservative and conventional in his own political views.

Whatever its faults and limitations, whatever its own time-bound and abstruse Hegelian formulations, Strauss's work revolutionized theology by introducing into it the anthropological concept of myth and symbol. Since that time thousands of theologians and writers have grappled with the life of Jesus; none has come close in intellectual impact and international controversy to the work of David Friedrich Strauss.

See also Jesus, Lives of; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Strauss, David Friedrich. The Life of Jesus Critically Examined. 4th ed., 1840. Edited by Peter Hodgson. Translated by George Eliot. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1972.

Secondary Sources:

Harris, Horton. David Friedrich Strauss and His Theology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973.

Hodgson, Peter C. "Editor's Introduction: Strauss's Theological Development from 1825 to 1840." In David Friedrich Strauss, The Life of Jesus Critically Examined. Repr. ed. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1972.

Kim, Jee Ho. "David Friedrich Strauss (1808–1874)." http://people.bu.edu/wildman/WeirdWildWeb/courses/mwt/%20dictionary/mwt_themes_475_strauss.htm (December 1998).

Lawler, Edwina G. David Friedrich Strauss and His Critics: The Life of Jesus Debate in Early Nineteenth-Century German Journals. New York: Peter Lang Publishing, 1986.

Massey, Marilyn Chapin. Christ Unmasked: The Meaning of The Life of Jesus in German Politics. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1983.

PAUL HARVEY

STRONG, JOSIAH (1847–1916)

American clergy. Strong was born in Naperville, Illinois on January 19, 1847. After studying at Lane Theological Seminary between 1869 and 1871, he assumed pastorates in various Congregational churches in Ohio. In 1886 he became the general secretary of the American branch of the EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, which had been founded in ENGLAND in 1846 as a reaction to the OXFORD MOVEMENT. This gave Strong a national platform and position of considerable importance. Strong's commitment to Christian solutions to contemporary social problems found expression in his editorship of the journal The Kingdom and Social Service, in which the ideals of the SOCIAL GOSPEL movement were reiterated incessantly. All the same, his efforts to commit the Evangelical Alliance to the approach of the Social Gospel proved not overly successful.

More important was Strong's commitment to American imperialist expansion. In his numerous books—all in all, Strong published eleven books, alongside countless articles—he sought to make the case not only for the superiority of the Anglo-Saxon, that is, English-speaking race (which would forever retain its superiority because of its growing numbers) but also for American expansion. This argument was embedded in the moral dicta of Christianity and is found in such books as Our Country (1886), which sold over 25,000 copies, and Expansion: Under New World Conditions (1900).

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Strong, Josiah. The New Era. Or, The Coming Kingdom. New York: Baker and Taylor, 1893.

———. Expansion under New World Conditions. New York: Garland, 1971 [1900].

———. Our Country. Cambridge, MA: Belknap, 1963.

Secondary Sources:

Deichmann Edwards, Wendy J. "Manifest Destiny, the Social Gospel and the Coming Kingdom:

Josiah Strong's Program of Global Reform, 1885–1916." In Wendy J. Deichmann Edwards, ed. Perspectives on the Social Gospel, 81–116. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1999.

Jordan, Philip D. "Josiah Strong and a Scientific Social Gospel." Iliff Review 42 (1985):21–31.

Muller, Dorothea R. "Josiah Strong and the Social Gospel: a Christian's Response to the Challenge of the City." Journal of the Presbyterian Historical Society 39 (1961):150–175.

HANS J. HILLERBRAND

STUDD, CHARLES THOMAS (1860–1931)

English missionary. Studd was born near Andover, ENGLAND in 1860, and he died in Ibambi, Belgian Congo July 16, 1931. Both missionary and mission advocate, he was the son of a wealthy retired tea planter who had been converted through DWIGHT L. MOODY'S campaigns. At Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, Studd became one of the leading cricketers in England and toured Australia with the Test team of 1882–1883 that regained the Ashes.

Studd was the best known, although not the moving spirit, of the small group of CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY students and army officers known as the Cambridge Seven who volunteered for service with the CHINA INLAND MISSION in 1885. The Seven—who between them represented wealth, social standing, and athletic fame—made a deep public impression. Their evident spirit of sacrifice (Studd gave up a considerable inheritance) promoted the idea of missionary service among English university students and the upper classes generally, sectors not previously noted as major sources of missionary recruits. In 1894 Studd left CHINA, sick, and engaged in missionary advocacy for the Student Volunteer Missionary movement. In 1900 he returned to mission service, this time in INDIA, until 1906 when, again ill, he resumed mission advocacy and home EVANGELISM.

In 1910 he went to the south Sudan, and in 1911 established the nondenominational Heart of Africa Mission for the evangelization of the African interior, leading it himself from the Belgian Congo from 1913. He spent the rest of his life there. His charismatic presence and eloquence in person and in print moved many, but his eccentric behavior, dictatorial style, and increasing dependency on drugs brought controversy and disruption to the mission. His abiding monument is the large and international Worldwide Evangelization Crusade, embodying his principles without his eccentricities, and shaped by his son-in-law, Norman P. Grubb. Studd's brother Kynaston (1858–1944), lord mayor of London from 1928 to 1929, was also a prominent spokesman for MISSIONS and evangelism.

Studd was a leading representative of one important strand in the Protestant missionary movement during the later nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Its features included energetic verbal evangelism, a spirituality based on “a blessed interior life of peace and triumph”; a call to consecration and sacrifice; and a strong premillennial ESCHATOLOGY. It displayed little interest in THEOLOGY or intellectual activity. The missionary movement of the period accommodated other strands of thought, outlook, and activity. The Cambridge Seven, of which Studd was a vital component, gave impetus to the founding of the Student Volunteer Missionary Union. This in turn, with the support of the university Christian unions, especially at Cambridge and Oxford, gave rise to the Student Christian Movement and thereafter to the INTERVARSITY CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP. Between them these organizations reflected most of the determinative forces in twentieth-century Anglo-Saxon Protestantism and affected ecumenical thought and action.

See also Africa; Ecumenism; Missionary Organizations; Missions, British

References and Further Reading

Buxton, Edith. Reluctant Missionary. London: Lutterworth, 1968.

Grubb, Norman P. CT Studd, Famous Cricketer and Pioneer. London: Lutterworth, 1933.

Pollock, J.C. A Cambridge Movement. London: Murray, 1953.

———. The Cambridge Seven. London: Inter-Varsity Press, 1955.

ANDREW F. WALLS

SUDAN INTERIOR MISSION

The Sudan Interior Mission (SIM) began with the vision of three young men: Canadians Walter Gowans and Rowland Bingham, and Thomas Kent of the UNITED STATES. In 1893 they banded together to carry the Gospel to the “Soudan,” a vast expanse stretching eastward from the Niger river across the central tier of sub-Saharan AFRICA. They landed at Lagos in late 1893 and made their way into the interior. Within a year Gowans and Kent had died of malaria. Bingham was stricken, and returned to CANADA gravely ill, but unbroken. After being driven back by illness on his second attempt, Bingham returned home and committed his life to recruiting and funding others for the task. By 1902 the first party of missionaries had established a base in the interior, and the Sudan Interior Mission was born.

Although the first decade of work was not particularly fruitful, two of the first wave of missionaries would make a considerable impact on the breadth and depth of the work. A.W.Banfield established Niger Press, which would evolve into a wide-ranging translation and Christian publication service. Dr. Andrew Stirrett came in the first decade of the new century, and would serve for over fifty years, establishing clinics and hospitals throughout Africa. SIM quickly developed into a general mission, with work in translation, education, publication, medicine, and social ministry. However, the focus always remained centered on EVANGELISM and church planting.

In the early 1920s several candidates from AUSTRALIA and NEW ZEALAND entered service with SIM. Mr. Bingham traveled “round the world” to establish offices in those locations, and in the process his vision for the work of SIM was considerably broadened. Ethiopia was the first field outside the “Soudan,” and in time SIM missionaries were at work in many other fields throughout the world.

Ministry Characteristics

Four characteristics have marked out SIM from the beginning: evangelical, interdenominational, international, and church centered. All SIM personnel must affirm the doctrinal statement of the organization, which places it squarely within the conservative evangelical tradition of nineteenth- and twentieth-century Euro-American Protestantism. The statement affirms the BIBLE as the “inerrant and authoritative Word of God,” the Trinity, the lost estate of the race, SALVATION by GRACE through FAITH in Jesus Christ, and a commitment to fulfill the Great Commission.

Although the statement is clear, it is narrowly drawn, omitting such issues such as BAPTISM, the LORD’S SUPPER, church offices, gifts of the spirit, church government, PREDESTINATION, or ESCHATOLOGY. This is consistent with the firm commitment to be an interdenominational mission, open to a wide range of Christian believers. This was so from the beginning: Walter Gowans was a Presbyterian, Thomas Kent a Congregationalist, and Rowland Bingham was an Anglican who joined the SALVATION ARMY and was ordained by the BAPTISTS. SIM has opened its ranks to missionaries from a wide range of denominational backgrounds and has consistently opposed the introduction of denominational “distinctives,” tensions, or hostility into its varied ministries, or into the host of churches spawned from its endeavors. However, in some areas those churches have joined together in indigenous bodies that have many of the marks of a DENOMINATION. The Evangelical Church of West Africa (ECWA) is the clearest example, a faith community of several thousand churches that sits most comfortably in the broad evangelical Wesleyan tradition.

SIM is also international in scope. From the beginning the mission looked to the United States, Canada, SCOTLAND, and ENGLAND for funds and personnel. This base soon expanded to Australia, New Zealand, then to other “sending” nations.

Finally, SIM is church centered. From the initial vision of the founder down to the present, SIM has remained convinced that the church is God’s primary agent for transforming the world. The mission works closely with local churches for the purpose of starting churches where none exist, and then building up and strengthening those churches so that they might fulfill their part in the Great Commission. Again, the Evangelical Church of West Africa stands as a clear example of that goal. In 1976 ECWA assumed responsibility for most of the social, medical, literature, educational, and church expansion ministries of SIM in NIGERIA. Today ECWA has over 1,200 missionaries, working primarily with unreached people in Nigeria and other West African nations.

In the early 1980s the International Christian Fellowship (a mission working primarily in INDIA) and the Andes Evangelical Mission merged with the Sudan Interior Mission to form the new SIM, the Society for International Ministries. Currently SIM assists local churches in over forty different nations to send out some sixteen hundred cross-cultural missionaries to over fifty fields, ranging from Togo to Ecuador to India to Italy.

See also Anglicanism; Biblical Inerrancy; Congregationalism; Missionary Organizations; Missions; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

- Adeyemi, E.A. From Seven to Seven Thousand: The Story of the Birth and Growth of SIM/ECWA Church in Ilorin. Lagos, Nigeria: Okinbaloye Commercial Press, 1995.
- Bingham, Roland V. Seven Sevens of Years and a Jubilee: The Story of the Sudan Interior Mission. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1943.
- Carpenter, Joel A., ed. Missionary Innovation and Expansion. New York: Garland Publishing, 1988.
- Turaki, Yusufu. An Introduction to the History of SIM/ECWA in Nigeria 1893–1993. Lagos, Nigeria: Self-published under a grant from the PEW Charitable Trust, 1993.

JAMES D.CHANCELLOR

SUN YAT-SEN (1866–1925)

Chinese nationalist politician. Sun Yat-sen (1866–1925) was born in Guangdong province in south CHINA, but raised and schooled in Hawaii and Hong Kong. He was actively dedicated to the overthrow of the Qing (Manchu) government from the 1890s until the Revolution of 1911. Sun was first president of the provisional government of the Republic of China in early 1912, but was outmaneuvered politically and relegated to an outsider's role, although after 1912 he became leader of the new Kuomintang (Guomindang, Chinese Nationalist Party).

Relatively powerless for a number of years, Sun's fortunes skyrocketed in the 1920s when his Kuomintang became the beneficiary of strong new nationalistic currents among urban Chinese. Sun also allied himself and his movement with the Comintern and the Soviet Union, which provided advisors as well as military and material assistance for the small but dynamic Kuomintang power base around Canton, as well as brokering an alliance with the Chinese Communists. At this point Sun died, leaving his protégé Chiang Kai-shek to inherit his leadership role in the Nationalist Party. Sun is known as the "father of the country," and is claimed as a hero by both Communists and Nationalists today.

Sun's Christian identity is hard to pin down. He attended an Anglican school in Hawaii (see ANGLICANISM), and studied medicine at missionary hospitals in Hong Kong and Canton. He was baptized by the American missionary Charles Hager in 1884, the same year he had an arranged marriage that produced three children. Sun's Christianity, although well known, does not seem to have strongly colored his political career. In 1914, however, in a second marriage that scandalized Protestant circles, he wed Soong Ch'ing-ling (Song Qingling), daughter of Charles Jones Soong, patriarch of the large and well-connected Soong clan, the single most politically influential Chinese Protestant family of the twentieth century. This association alone makes Sun an important figure in Chinese Protestant history.

See also Communism

References and Further Reading

- Bergere, Marie-Claire. Sun Yat-sen. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1998.
 Chang, Sidney H., and Leonard H.D. Gordon. Bibliography of Sun Yat-sen in China's Republican Revolution, 1885–1925. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1998.

DANIEL H. BAYS

SUNDAY SCHOOL

Sunday School is a form of religious instruction undertaken as a supplement to Sunday worship for children. ROBERT RAIKES is conventionally recognized as the founder of the Sunday School, a “ragged school” set up for the poor in the English city of Gloucester in 1783. There were in fact a number of Sunday Schools in existence before Raikes’s experiment, the earliest of which may have been set up by Hannah Ball in 1763. The Charity School Movement of the early eighteenth century had sought to transform the lives of the poor in WALES, and then in ENGLAND by the use of “dame schools” to teach the children to read. The use of Sunday for education was the result of a pragmatic recognition by the 1780s that weekday schools were ineffective for children who were already employed. Raikes’s description of the school in the Gloucester Journal created widespread interest in other towns. The experiment was not confined to one DENOMINATION and was often organized by community committees quite separate from any local church. They had among their goals the preservation of society from social anarchy, rather than just religious knowledge.

These early schools taught reading and used the BIBLE as their primary text. They were always envisaged as catering primarily to the children of the poor. By 1787 some 250,000 children were enrolled and by 1831 some 37 percent of all children—and a much higher proportion of factory children—were attending. Conservatives sometimes feared the scale of the organization involved and its potential for giving the poor ideas above their station. However, the British Sunday School Union, founded in 1803, continued to exert significant influence.

The schools slowly became located in local churches and came under the control of the religious bodies. In 1800 the large Manchester Sunday School split up into Anglican and nonconformist schools (see ANGLICANISM; NONCONFORMITY), with the Methodists particularly successful in their efforts (see METHODISM, ENGLAND). A building spree resulted to house the classes in the urban districts. The growth of child employment in the factories meant that the Sunday School remained a vital social instrument, while Sunday School teachers were often former successful students. The Sunday School gained huge popularity in the working class community, and its festivals—awarding prizes, picnics, and church parades—could attract a huge attendance. There were fierce debates about the place of reading in the curriculum, and this led to some splits and the establishment of radical Sunday Schools with an amended curriculum.

Sunday Schools in the United States

Americans adopted the vision of religious instruction in Sunday Schools soon after the War of Independence. A broadly based First Day school was organized in Philadelphia about 1790. However, there was less urgency while America remained predominantly rural. Two New York women sought to establish a Sunday School in their city in 1816, but the major breakthrough came when the prominent minister LYMAN BEECHER moved a resolution in 1828 creating the American Sunday School Union, “eminently adapted to promote the intellectual and moral culture of the nation, to perpetuate our republican and religious institutions, and to reconcile eminent national prosperity with moral purity and future blessedness.” In the urban crisis of the 1830s and 1840s, concern about the “street arabs” led to fresh attempts to plant Sunday Schools in the cities, led by followers of CHARLES G. FINNEY, who idealized the Sunday School as a critical social instrument.

American schools soon developed a broader scope and the Sunday School became a symbol of republican inclusiveness. Theological debates about the legitimacy of childhood CONVERSION made the curriculum of the school controversial. HORACE BUSHNELL urged that conversion be seen as a process in which education should not be coercive. In 1872 what became the International Sunday School Lesson plan was commenced by the Sunday School Union, and this was subsequently widely adopted by liberal schools in many countries. Meanwhile the American Sunday School expanded to a period of religious instruction for adults as well as children. In contrast, in Britain and British countries Sunday Schools became the last link of the masses with the church.

After the 1960s the scope of Sunday Schools declined dramatically. They have largely catered to the children of church members and been run parallel with the main morning church service. Moreover, a declining sense of the value of voluntary education for the young has taken away the value of the Sunday School. Its efficacy is being questioned.

The Sunday School has often been viewed as a key instrument used by middle-class interests to redirect the leisure and radicalism of the working class. Thomas Laqueur offered another explanation, that the Sunday School helped the formation of working class identity by giving them literacy and entrusting them with their own education.

References and Further Reading

- Lynn, Robert W., and Elliott Wright. The Big Little School: 200 Years of the Sunday School. 2nd ed. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1980.
- Laqueur, W.T. Religion and Respectability: Sunday Schools and Working Class Culture 1780–1850. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1976.

PETER LINEHAM

SUNDAY, BILLY (1862–1935)

American evangelist and prohibition advocate. Born William Ashley Sunday on November 19, 1862 in a log cabin near Ames, Iowa, the evangelist frequently spoke of his hardscrabble childhood. A promising small-town baseball player, he was recruited by the Chicago Whitestockings in 1883, converted to evangelical Christianity at Chicago's Pacific Garden Mission in 1886, and married Helen Amelia Thompson (1868–1957), the daughter of a prosperous Chicago ice cream-manufacturing family, in 1888. Sunday continued to play professionally for various teams until 1890; thereafter he worked full-time for the YMCA and then became an assistant to J. Wilbur Chapman (1859–1918), a well-known traveling evangelist. In 1896 Sunday struck out on his own, assisted by his wife, and continued in full-time evangelistic work until he died of heart failure in Chicago at age 72 on November 6, 1935.

Sunday's distinctive pulpit manner, marked by athletic gestures, liberal use of slang, and excoriation of his opponents, won him wide popularity as he preached in cities across the northern United States. He was famous for exhorting converts to "hit the sawdust trail" at his upbeat urban revival meetings. Music was also an important component of Sunday's revival meetings; from 1909 to 1927 song leader Homer A. Rodeheaver (1880–1955) accompanied him, warming up audiences with stirring gospel choruses and trombone solos and coordinating performances by visiting ensembles.

By World War I, Sunday was the most recognized American preacher, but thereafter his popularity declined, due partly to his increasingly strident tone and partly to theological fissures within American Protestantism that made organizing citywide crusades increasingly difficult.

References and Further Reading

- Brown, Elijah P. The Real Billy Sunday. Dayton, OH: Otterbein Press, 1914.
- Dorsett, Lyle W. Billy Sunday and the Redemption of Urban America. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1991.
- McLoughlin, William G., Jr. Billy Sunday Was His Real Name. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1955.

JAY BLOSSOM

SUNG, JOHN (SUNG SHANGJIE) (1901–1944)

Chinese revival preacher. Sung was born in Fujian, CHINA on September 27, 1901 into the family of a Methodist pastor, Sung Xue Lien. When he was very young he began to imitate his father, both in PREACHING and in handing out tracts. Because of his alert mind and Christian commitment, Shangjie (“noble and frugal one”) was sent, with the support of Methodist missionaries, to the UNITED STATES to study for pastoral leadership. In 1920 Sung began his studies at Ohio Wesleyan College, where he completed a bachelor’s degree in three years. He then went on to complete a master’s and Ph.D. in chemistry at Ohio State University by the summer of 1926.

Remembering his reason for studying in the United States, Sung turned down lucrative offers in chemistry (including an offer to help develop explosives for GERMANY) and turned to study THEOLOGY at Union Seminary in New York. In his first semester at Union, Sung heard a fifteen-year-old girl evangelist at Calvary Baptist Church. His CONVERSION or awakening was remarkable. Sung began evangelizing his fellow seminary students, and he would sing HYMNS until late into the evening. His behavior was understood to be caused by mental problems, so Sung was placed in a mental asylum for 193 days. During this time he read through the BIBLE, according to his account, forty times, tracing different themes with each reading. This would become the foundation for his seventeen years of preaching in East Asia.

Sung then returned to China in 1927, married (Yu Chin Hua), and began teaching chemistry three days a week at the Methodist Christian High School in Fujian. His heart, though, was in preaching and so the bulk of his time was spent as an apostolic preacher in South China. He came into contact with Andrew Gih, an evangelist of the Bethel Worldwide Evangelistic Band, and cooperated with this group from 1931 to 1933. The Band was short-lived but very influential. Their doctrine of eradication of all SIN was not accepted by Sung, but their methods of organization and itineration were adopted. By 1934 Sung was on his own and he was widely known in most of south and east China. He did not approve of the work of most missionaries because of their emphasis on nonessentials (i.e., not focused solely on the Bible) and their liberal theology (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM).

From 1935 to December 1939 Sung traveled to preach to Chinese communities throughout Southeast Asia: TAIWAN, PHILIPPINES, Malaya, Singapore, Thailand, and INDONESIA. His impact was great as he brought together Chinese from many denominations and dialects, and he also organized the converts in “evangelistic bands” reminiscent of the Bethel Worldwide Evangelistic Band. These local bands of ten or twelve would meet weekly to study the Bible, pray, and go out to evangelize their communities. His impact was so great that in some towns local shops would close for the week of Sung’s meetings.

Sung's preaching style was full of emotion; he preached from all of the Bible and he often confronted people directly with sins of gambling, sexual affairs, or stealing. Sung lived a very simple life, prayed for great lengths of time, and held meetings for healings (see FAITH HEALING). Although not strictly speaking Pentecostal, Sung emphasized the role of the Holy Spirit in personal transformation and healing, which brought him into conflict with most missionaries (see PENTECOSTALISM). Sung, along with WANG MINGDAO, Andrew Gih, and others, pioneered an indigenous form of Chinese Christianity that has had much success among the Chinese masses both in China and overseas.

Sung and his wife had five children, but after years of preaching with great pain, John Sung died August 18, 1944 of tuberculosis (and probably cancer) at the early age of forty-three.

See also Asian Theology; Evangelism, Overview; Missions

References and Further Reading

Lyll, Leslie T. John Sung. Chicago: Moody Press, 1964.

Schubert, William E. I Remember John Sung. Singapore: Far Eastern Bible College Press, 1976.

Tow, Timothy. John Sung, My Teacher. Singapore: Christian Life Publishers, 1985.

SCOTT W.SUNQUIST

SWABIAN SYNGRAMMA

The Swabian Syngramma was an antisacramental treatise written by fourteen Lutheran theologians, advocating the real presence of Christ in the elements of bread and wine in the LORD'S SUPPER.

All the reformers rejected the Catholic position of TRANSUBSTANTIATION. However, HULDRYCH ZWINGLI took the further view that the Lord's Supper was a thanksgiving in which Jesus was spiritually present. JOHANNES OECOLAMPADIUS published an attack on MARTIN LUTHER'S position, which held for the real presence of body and blood in the elements of bread and wine. Arguing for Christ's being only figuratively present at the Eucharist, Oecolampadius dedicated his book to the "beloved brethren" in Schwabia, his former students, intending to win them over. The region was strategically important as the reformers continued to compete for the spiritual and political allegiance of southern GERMANY.

However, Luther's influence was strong, and under the leadership of JOHANNES BRENZ some fourteen theologians responded by drafting a statement—the Syngramma Suevicum—on October 14, 1525 in support of Luther. Meant as a document to be sent to Oecolampadius, it was published with an introduction by Luther and given its title by the printer. It offered a positive affirmation of Christ's actual presence in the sacrament. The document argued that as the word of peace from Christ confers peace, and saying that sins are forgiven gives pardon, so the word of Christ imparts into the bread and wine the very body and blood of Christ. When the sacrament is consumed the believer is sanctified by the body and given the creative power of the word, whereas the unbeliever is condemned.

MARTIN BUCER responded to the document, arguing that the real presence in the Lord's Supper produces no benefit for the Christian, whereas Oecolampadius composed his Anti-syngramma noting that the Swabians had erred in an un-Lutheran spiritual activity by denying that the body of Christ is broken by hands and chewed by teeth. The ensuing controversy between Zwingli and Luther promptly overshadowed any significance the Syngramma may have had.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Sacraments

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Brenz, Johannes. Frühschriften. Edited by M.Brecht. vol. 1, 222ff. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, 1970.

Secondary Source:

Sasse, Hermann. This is My Body. Rev. ed. Adelaide: Lutheran Publishing House, 1977.

JAMES CHAPMAN

SWEDEN

One of the Scandinavian countries located in northern Europe. Sweden has a population of 8,847,625 (1998), of whom 7,907,189 are Protestants (90 percent). Roman Catholics number 165,691 (1.5 percent); Eastern Orthodox, 68,260 (0.5 percent); and the Oriental denominations (Monophysite), 37,282 (0.25 percent). Non-Christian religious groups total 152,766 members (1998), of whom one-third are Muslims. Six percent of the total population or 546,656 people (1998) have declared that they have no religious affiliation.

Out of the 90 percent who are Protestant, 86 percent of the population belongs to the Lutheran Church of Sweden, leaving 4 percent as adherents of non-Lutheran Protestant churches. Until the latter part of the nineteenth century, when the so-called Dissenter Law was passed, it was illegal to belong to any other church other than the Lutheran State Church of Sweden. The twentieth century witnessed a marked religious pluralization of Swedish society.

Medieval Background

Protestantism was ushered into Sweden in the sixteenth century when the Protestant Reformation swept across Europe during that era. Unlike the craving for church reform that welled up in GERMANY, Swedish people were, by and large, content with the ministrations of the medieval Roman Catholic Church.

To understand the rise of Protestantism in what is today called Sweden, it is necessary to remember that three southern provinces of Sweden (Skane, Halland, and Blekinge) were actually a part of DENMARK until 1658. Thus Protestantism in Sweden is intimately intertwined with the Protestant Reformation in Denmark as well. It is also necessary to remember that Scandinavia in the sixteenth century was not composed of five separate, independent countries as it is today, but actually one. This was the result of the Kalmar Union of 1397, which united Denmark, NORWAY, and Sweden under Queen Margaret of Denmark, who ruled with a firm hand. Under her weak successor, Erik of Pomerania, Swedish NATIONALISM erupted in 1433 under Engelbrekt Engelbrektsson, who sought a strong, native Swedish rule. After the death of Engelbrekt in 1436, Karl Knutsson rallied the lower classes and was elected king on three occasions, only to be deposed by a union king from Denmark.

Much of the fifteenth century in Sweden therefore witnessed a struggle for a strong, indigenous ruler championed by the Swedish lower classes as opposed to the Swedish Riksråd (Council) composed of nobles and bishops who were pro-union and pro-Danish in their sympathies. By the mid-fifteenth century, nobles and bishops had become so internationalized through intermarriage that they had no real national ties to either Sweden or Denmark. People like Archbishop Gustav Trolle of Uppsala, who was actually Danish, owned property in both Sweden and Denmark. This tended to minimize national loyalties to either country.

During the latter part of the fifteenth century, Sten Sture the Elder became the Regent of Sweden and frustrated the Danish rulers' efforts to effectively gain control of Sweden. Svante Sture and Sten Sture the Younger continued this policy by deposing the Regent, Erik Trolle, but in 1515, Erik's son was elected archbishop of Uppsala. Two years later, Sten Sture the Younger succeeded in getting the Riksdag (Parliament) to depose Gustav Trolle. This took place before October 31, when MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) nailed The Ninety-five Theses on the door of the Castle Church in Wittenberg. It signified a significant breach with Rome because Leo X had just recently appointed and recognized Gustav Trolle as archbishop of Uppsala. Family feuding between the Sture and Trolle families had been going on for some time and there was no love lost between them.

The new Danish king (Christian II, 1513–1523) was determined to bring the unruly Swedes and Sten Sture the Younger under control. Upon the death of Sten Sture in battle (1520), Christian II was crowned king of Sweden on November 4. As a goodwill gesture, the Danish king invited the leading Swedish nobles and two Swedish bishops to a sumptuous reconciliation banquet. After dinner, instead of dessert and toasts to future cooperation, goodwill, and amnesty as had been expected, Danish soldiers barred the exit doors and the infamous Stockholm Bloodbath took place, in which over eighty of Sweden's leading noblemen were beheaded, including two Swedish Catholic bishops. Historians have long debated the identity of the instigator of the bloodbath. Fledgling history students are often assigned the task of wading through the sources in their introductory historiography courses. The blame has usually been assigned to the archbishop, Gustav Trolle, or to Christian II, referred to as "The Tyrant" by patriotic Swedes.

Instead of the Swedish unrest subsiding, the Stockholm massacre caused Sweden to erupt in rebellion under the leadership of Gustav Vasa, son of one of the beheaded Swedish noblemen. After struggling for three years, Sweden won its independence and Gustav Vasa was crowned king of Sweden in 1523.

Initial Stirrings of Protestantism

The election of Gustav as king of Sweden took place in the city of Strengnas, where a young Swedish disciple of Luther by the name of OLAUS PETRI (1493–1552) had been preaching for five years. Often called the "Luther of Sweden," Olaus Petri returned from Wittenberg in the summer of 1518 after having studied there for two years. When Petri arrived at Wittenberg in 1516, the German reformer was just beginning his lectures on Galatians. Petri soon joined his mentor in strong opposition to indulgences, and was present during the eventful days when The Ninety-five Theses were published. Late in 1518, after Luther had expounded his theology of the cross at the Heidelberg Disputation before his Augustinian brothers, Petri returned to Sweden aglow with his new evangelical insights. However, there was no thought of leaving the Roman Catholic Church. John Eck would not raise the “Saxon Hus” label until the next year at Leipzig. The REFORMATION treatises of 1520 and the famous “Here I stand” declaration at the DIET OF WORMS in 1521 were still in the distant future. Thus the evangelical theology that inspired Olaus Petri was very conservative and was to remain so all his life.

Olaus Petri also had a younger brother, Laurentius Petri (1499–1573), who studied at Wittenberg some years later. Upon his return to Sweden in 1527, Laurentius was ordained as the first evangelical (Protestant) archbishop of Uppsala in 1531 by two Erasmian reform-minded Catholic bishops, thus preserving the historic episcopate in what was to become the Lutheran State Church of Sweden. Together, the two Petri brothers introduced a gradual transformation of the medieval Catholic Church in Sweden along evangelical (Protestant) lines.

It was not the intention of the Petris to break with Rome, introduce a Lutheran confessional subscription, or establish a “Protestant” church. Rather they were convinced that the pure Word of God was all that was needed to recall the Catholic Church from the error of her ways. Holy Scripture was the Word of God and upon this rock the church could prevail against the gates of hell itself. All one needed for salvation was sola scriptura (the Word alone).

There was little pressure to adopt any particular confessional creed. The ancient ecumenical creeds (Apostles, Nicene, and Athanasian) were seen as aids in the preparation of sermons and as guides for a faithful interpretation of Scripture for those who could not understand the message of Scripture as a whole, but they had no confessional validity as such. A corollary to the doctrine of the all-sufficiency of Scripture would negate the necessity for any formal confession. Any human attempt at writing a confession endangered the sola scriptura principle of the evangelical reform movement within the Catholic Church.

The Protestant Reformation

During the 1520s Gustav Vasa, the Swedish king, was hard-pressed to maintain political stability and unite his followers, who had become divided on the religious issue. Many who favored the “old faith” supported the 1527 uprising in Dalarna. In desperation, Gustav Vasa turned to the pope and asked what could be done to reform the Swedish church.

This was a golden opportunity for the pope (Clement VII) to heal the breach that was developing between Rome and the Swedish church, but instead of proposing reforms of significance, Clement VII ordered the reinstatement of Gustav Trolle as archbishop of Uppsala. This was something no Swede could contemplate after the Stockholm Bloodbath of 1520. Thus an opportunity for a throne-and-altar alliance to reform the church in Sweden was lost. In the midst of all this, burdened with a huge debt to Lübeck for its help in overthrowing the yoke of the Danish king with no hope of raising the necessary funds, struggling to suppress the revolt in Darlana, and with no encouragement from Rome, Gustav Vasa resigned in 1527. This action galvanized Sweden into supporting Gustav Vasa because no one could contemplate a return to the political domination of Denmark or the suzerainty of Lübeck.

At a hastily called meeting at Vesteras, the estates prevailed upon Gustav Vasa to continue as king and promised to crush the rebellion in Dalarna. With no hope of reform coming from Rome, the Diet of Vesteras (1527) also effectively severed the Swedish church from obedience to the Roman pontiff and established a national Catholic Church in Sweden. From that time forward, the CLERGY came under the jurisdiction of civil law. The king received the church's income in order to repay the Lubeck debt. All material goods given to the church before 1454 were returned to the legal heirs, and all complaints against the "new faith" were to stop provided that the Word of God was preached in its purity. Bishops were instructed to see that their parishes were staffed with preachers of ability, otherwise the king was empowered to intervene. There was no Lutheran or Protestant confession enunciated except "to teach and preach according to the Word of God."

In the decades that followed the Diet of Vesteras, there was very little discussion or explicit mention of Lutheran confessional subscription. The Church of Sweden was becoming an evangelical Protestant church without any formal confessional subscription. Nevertheless, the Petri brothers maintained a consistent, though conservative, Lutheran stance as seen in the HYMNAL (1526), the pastors' manual (1529), and the Swedish Mass (1531), which came from the pen of Olaus Petri.

It was not until the reign of Erik XIV (1560–1568) that confessional subscription became a problem. The new king leaned toward CALVINISM and was very sympathetic toward the many Calvinist refugees who fled to Sweden. In 1564 some Calvinists drew up a confession of faith that they claimed was Lutheran, but it was quickly seen to be a Swedish translation of the Calvinistic GALLICAN CONFESSION of 1559. For the first time, the AUGSBURG CONFESSION of 1530 was invoked to define what was authentically Lutheran. Laurentius Petri, as archbishop of Uppsala, also effectively thwarted Erik XIV from introducing Calvinism into Sweden by royal decree while at the same time quietly withdrawing his own Church Ordinance for a more opportune time.

The long life of Laurentius Petri, his faithful service under three kings, and his conservative but consistent Lutheran theological principles gradually came to the forefront. Slowly but surely, and in the absence of any official Lutheran confessional subscription, popular religious loyalty slowly swung from a Roman Catholic to an evangelical and increasingly Lutheran theological position. Ten years after his failed attempt to introduce his Church Ordinance, Laurentius Petri placed the capstone on his career when he persuaded the new king John III (1568–1592), the younger brother of the Calvinist Erik XIV, to adopt it as the law of the land in 1571. There was no confessional subscription espoused in this ordinance, nor was there any in the oath pastors took upon their ordination. Instead, the tried and true formula that everything was to be judged by the Word of God was reiterated. Ordinands were asked if they would "at all times remain steadfast in the pure Word of God and flee all false and heretical doctrines." Clergy were admonished to "preach the Word with all freedom" so it might grow in the hearts of people and be fruitful (see PREACHING). To proclaim the Word meant that the archbishop preached repentance and forgiveness of sin through Jesus Christ. Two years later (1573), Laurentius Petri died after having served as the first Protestant archbishop of Uppsala for forty-two years.

The Counter-Reformation

After the death of the archbishop, the theological battlefield shifted from Calvinism to Roman Catholicism. The new king had a decided predilection in that direction. Shortly after Laurentius Petri's death, John III, who saw himself as a liturgical scholar, issued his Red Book (named after the color of the covers), which manifested his leanings toward Rome. It has been much debated whether John III actually converted to Roman Catholicism, but it is known that he was greatly influenced by his Polish wife's Jesuit chaplains and his own father confessor, the Norwegian Jesuit Laurentius Norvegus (Lars the Norwegian).

Though the Peace of Augsburg (1555) had no legal validity in Sweden, it was nevertheless conceivable that if the king of Sweden became Roman Catholic, the principle of cuius regio eius religio (whoever the king, his religion) enunciated at the close of the Smalcald War (1555), could be extended to Sweden also. Thus it was that Pope Gregory XIII launched Operation Sweden (Missio suetica) under the direction of Laurentius Norvegus and the secretary of the Society of Jesus, Antonio Possevino. The plan of the Jesuits was to establish a rival "high church" theological school in Stockholm to counter the "anti-liturgical" Lutheran theological faculty at Uppsala. With the king's acquiescence, the Jesuits established the Royal Stockholm College under the pretext of educating a new generation of theological students who were more in agreement with the king's high-church predilections. In reality, it was a front for the secret Jesuit mission to turn Sweden back to Rome.

On the verge of success in 1580, Operation Sweden suddenly soured when John III insisted on three concessions before he would publicly announce his conversion to Roman Catholicism. The post-Tridentine papacy was not, however, inclined to compromise on the issues of clerical CELIBACY, vernacular WORSHIP, and communion in both kinds (communicants received both bread and wine). Against the strong counsel of Laurentius Norvegus, Possevino tried to force the hand of John III by publicly announcing the king's CONVERSION.

Instead of the intended effect, John III immediately renounced Roman Catholicism and ordered the Jesuit mission out of Sweden. As a result of Operation Sweden, the Swedish people had become thoroughly aware of the dangers of the COUNTER-REFORMATION, but Rome needed only to bide her time because Sigismund III, the Roman Catholic son of John III who had just recently been elected king of POLAND, stood ready to become king of Sweden as well upon the death of his father. When John III died in 1592, it was just too much for the clergy and people of Sweden to contemplate. "Bloody" Mary's reign in England, the "Reign of Terror" in the Lowlands, and the St. Bartholomew Day Massacre in France had all occurred during the lives of most Swedes living in the 1590s.

Triumph of Lutheranism

At a hastily called church assembly gathered at Uppsala in 1593 (only the king could convene the Riksdag), the unaltered Augsburg Confession became the legal confessional basis for the Church of Sweden for the first time. From that time forward, one could speak of the Lutheran State Church of Sweden. All Swedish sovereigns had to be Lutheran in the future. As a result, Sigismund III was never able to gain his Swedish throne, though he tried to regain Sweden by a military assault that was repulsed by his uncle, Duke Charles of FINLAND. For all practical purposes, the Protestant Reformation and LUTHERANISM had become synonymous in Sweden in spite of the Calvinist leanings of Duke Charles, who became Carl IX in 1599.

Southern Sweden (Eastern Denmark)

The three southern provinces of what is today Sweden, as was said, were controlled by Denmark in the sixteenth century. Unlike Sweden, where Lutheranism was introduced through a century-long process of ecclesiastical transformation led by the clergy and people who often opposed the wishes of the king, the Protestant Reformation in Denmark was introduced by a royal decree of Christian III (1536–1559). Here it was definitely a case of cuius regio eius religio, with LUTHERANISM being the order of the day. The decree of 1536 also applied to the three southern provinces of Skaane, Blekinge, and Halland.

It was not as though there had not been a grass roots reform movement in Denmark and southern Sweden. Indeed there had. Under HANS TAUSEN (1494–1564) and Jens Sadolin, a strong evangelical movement had arisen in Jutland, which was brought to Copenhagen by the sympathetic Danish king Fredrik I (1523–1533). Another center of reform was in eastern Denmark (what today is southern Sweden) centered around the city of Malmo. Here was the hotbed of an Erasmian-type of Christian humanism that clamored for reform. The leaders were disciples of the “Erasmus of Scandinavia,” Paul Helie, who remained within the Roman Catholic Church to the end of his life. However, his followers, Claus Mortensen, Frants Vormordsen, Peder Lauritzsen, and Oluf Chrysostomus, went beyond their mentor and embraced Protestantism and Lutheranism in particular. With their theological leadership and the support of the Danish king, Christian III, Lutheranism swept across eastern Denmark and by 1658, when this part of Denmark came under the political control of Sweden, all of what is today the country of Sweden was found to be firmly within the fold of Protestantism and the Lutheran State Church of Sweden.

The Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

During the next two centuries, Protestantism and Lutheranism in Sweden were one and the same. Both people and king had to be Lutheran; no other choice was allowed. The seventeenth century saw Sweden reach the height of political greatness during the reign of GUSTAVUS II ADOLPHUS (1612–1632). During the Thirty Years War, the “Lion of the North” was credited with saving Protestantism. It was also during his reign that plans were laid for a colonial venture in the New World that resulted in the founding of New Sweden along the Delaware River in 1638. Though taken over by the Dutch and in 1664 by the English, the settlement continued to be supplied by Swedish pastors into the nineteenth century, when the Swedish language died out and the congregations migrated to the EPISCOPAL CHURCH. One lasting legacy of the Swedish colony was the preservation of the Delaware Indian language through the translation of Luther’s Small Catechism by Johan Campanius, the first translation into an American Indian language by a European.

After the successful struggle to preserve Protestantism in the latter part of the sixteenth century, the next century witnessed the dominance of Lutheran ORTHO DOXY in Sweden. The Lutheran confessional writings were stressed, as was correct doctrine. It is interesting to note that in Campanius’s work with the Delaware Indians, he did not translate the BIBLE into their language as might have been expected, but instead chose to translate Luther’s Small Catechism. The leading exponent of Lutheran orthodoxy in Sweden at this time was Johannes Rudbeckius (1581–1646), bishop of Vesteras.

During the years following the Great Northern War (1700–1721), a conservative churchly PIETISM grew (see also FRANCKE, A.H.; and SPENER, P.J.). Regeneration, conversion, the new life in Christ, and assurance of salvation were stressed. A decade later, a more radical Pietism arose similar to that championed by Gottfried Arnold in Germany as well as Moravian Pietism under the leadership of NIKOLAUS ZINZENDORF (1200–1260). Devotional literature came to play a dominant role in the Pietist movement and its adherents were often known as “Readers.” Toward the latter part of the eighteenth century, the theological rationalism of CHRISTIAN WOLFF (1679–1754) of HALLE made its presence felt in Sweden.

Spiritual Awakenings in the Nineteenth Century

In 1809, in the midst of the Napoleonic Wars, Sweden lost Finland to RUSSIA. This caused a great deal of soul searching on the part of clergy and laity alike. Religious freedom, which had been experimented with during the era of the ENLIGHTENMENT, though still on the books, was for all practical purposes abrogated. Censorship was imposed, and rationalism with its internationalism was found wanting. In its place arose a strong nationalistic and religious AWAKENING. In the old Danish archbishopric of Lund, Henrik Schartau (1757–1825) labored for forty years to bring about a spiritual awakening along Lutheran orthodox lines, while to the north in Stockholm, a Pietist-type revival broke out under the leadership of George Scott and Carl O. Rosenius (d. 1868). Scott was actually a Methodist pastor stationed in Stockholm (1826–1842) to minister to English sailors and other English-speaking people in Sweden. Through his work, the Methodist Church came into being in Sweden (see METHODISM, EUROPE). Rosenius, on the other hand, was a Lutheran theological student who never chose to be ordained but who worked closely with Scott. Through their partnership and especially through the prolific writings of Rosenius, which have been translated into over twenty different languages, a spiritual renewal swept across Sweden. Rosenius stressed the objective grace of God coupled with a strong emphasis on sanctification. Far to the north, LARS L. LAESTADIUS (d. 1861), spearheaded a REVIVAL movement that bears his name to this very day and has spread across to Norway and especially Finland. Much of the awakening was inspired by the hymns of Johan Wallin (d. 1830). These were brought to America in the latter half of the nineteenth century by Swedish immigrants and sung into the hearts of the people by the renowned “Nightingale of Sweden,” Jenny Lind, much like “How Great Thou Art” (another Swedish hymn) was sung by George Beverly Shea during the Billy Graham Crusades.

As an outgrowth of the spiritual awakenings, many VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES were founded such as the Swedish Missionary Society (1835), the Lund Missionary Society (1845), and various Bible and tract societies. In 1856 the Evangeliska Fosterlands-Stiftelse (Evangelical National Society) was founded by Rosenius, which sought to reach all of Sweden through evangelistic activity. Five years later it expanded its scope worldwide.

Rise of Non-Lutheran Protestantism

In the wake of the revolutions of 1848 throughout Europe, the new religious impulses welling up in Sweden, the writings of SOREN KIERKEGAARD (1813–1855), and the example of Norway and Denmark, the old CONVENTICLE Law of 1726 was abolished in 1858 in spite of high church Lutheran opposition. This allowed Lutheran laymen to gather and lead devotional meetings and religious assemblies. Two years later, the Dissenter Law was passed, allowing nonLutherans freedom of religion and worship.

It did not take long before various “free churches” or “dissenter churches” came into being. The first were the BAPTISTS, who trace their beginnings back to 1848 when it was still illegal to be a non-Lutheran. F.O. Nilsson, a Swedish seaman who had been converted in America, returned to Sweden as a lay preacher and championed the cause of adult BAPTISM, but the real leader of the Baptist movement in Sweden, until his death in 1887, was Anders Wiberg. He had been an ordained pastor in the Lutheran State Church of Sweden for nine years when he resigned his position in 1851. The following year F.O. Nilsson, the lay preacher, rebaptized him. The same year (1852) Wiberg published Vilken bor dopas och varuti bestar dopet? (Who Should Be Baptized and What Is Baptism?). This was the first exposition of the Baptist DOCTRINE of baptism ever written in Swedish. Also in 1852, Bethel Seminary was founded to train Swedish pastors and evangelists for the new church. A church newspaper and a foreign mission society followed in quick order. By 1889 the Baptist Church in Sweden numbered some 33,500 members, but the movement splintered thereafter, and in the year 2000 numbered only 18,631 members.

The Methodist Church also came into being in Sweden through the work of Swedish seamen who had been converted while in America. The initial Methodist work had been done by the English Methodist pastor, George Scott, in the 1830s but congregations made up of Swedish citizens had not been allowed. With enactment of the Dissenter Law, Methodist work resumed in 1868. In 1876 the Methodist Church in Sweden was uniquely and legally recognized as an independent faith community with the right to perform marriages and burials. This lasted until 1951, when other churches obtained the same right. In the year 2000, there were 5,177 members in the Methodist Church.

Another religious impulse from England led to the founding of the SALVATION ARMY in 1882. As it had in several other countries, the leadership fell to a woman, Hanna Ouchterlony. Under her ten-year leadership, the Salvation Army grew to 10,000 soldiers (members) and 500 officers. In 1905, having deteriorated under the centralized generalship of WILLIAM BOOTH (1829–1912), a schism occurred in the Salvation Army in Sweden which, since 1988, has become a nongeographical district within the Mission Covenant Church. In the last decade of the twentieth century, the Salvation Army membership declined thirty percent to 18,789.

The Mission Covenant Church (MCC) grew out of a theological dispute over the doctrine of ATONEMENT. Its members had been part of the Evangelical National Society (ENS) founded by Rosenius, which sought to evangelize, among others, the new proletariat in the urban centers created by the Industrial Revolution. Unlike Rosenius, the leader of this more radical wing of the ENS, Paul P. Waldenstrom (1838–1917), urged his followers to withdraw from the Lutheran State Church, which they did in 1878. Waldenstrom taught a subjective doctrine of the atonement as opposed to the traditional forensic (or objective) doctrine, which stated in effect that a person was justified (see JUSTIFICATION) by Christ because Christ died “for you” and not because Christ dwelled “in you” as Waldenstrom taught. This theological position of Waldenstrom, who had been a Lutheran pastor up until that time, not only caused a rupture within the Lutheran State Church of Sweden, but caused the other free churches and societies like the Swedish Mission Alliance to distance themselves from Waldenstrom and the MCC. In the year 2000, the MCC had some 70,000 members in Sweden. Much of its membership emigrated to the United States in the early twentieth century and founded a DENOMINATION by the same name. The Swedish Baptists followed a similar path.

PENTECOSTALISM developed in Sweden when the Norwegian Methodist pastor, T.B. Barratt, who had experienced “the baptism of the Holy Spirit” while in the United States, drew a young twenty-three-year-old Swedish Baptist pastor from Linköping into his orbit. The young pastor, Lewi Pethrus, became the pastor of the famous Pentecostal congregation in Stockholm (Filadelfia) and the leader of the Swedish Pentecostal movement. When he retired in 1958 after a forty-seven-year pastorate, the congregation numbered 6,500 members. At the outset of the twenty-first century, Swedish Pentecostals number some 91,000.

Secularism and Modernity

The rise of the free churches following the passage of the Dissenter Law in 1860 and the accompanying spiritual awakenings can be misleading and paint too rosy a picture of religious life in Sweden at this time. Swedish society was actually bifurcating and going in two different directions. At the time Protestantism was experiencing religious revivals, the inroads of modernity were coming into play. The Industrial Revolution was having its debilitating effect on huge segments of Swedish people, alienating them from the church. Marxist philosophy (see MARXISM), secular materialism, political liberalism, biblical higher criticism, and the teachings of Darwinian evolution (see DARWINISM) all combined to form a modern schism in which the masses of Swedish society became accustomed to ordering their lives without much need for the ministrations of the church.

Ecumenism and Lundensian Theology

In the twentieth century, Swedish Protestants (Lutherans) made a huge contribution to the modern Ecumenical Movement (see ECUMENISM). After the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh in 1910 and the Armistice had been signed ending World War I, many Christians around the world longed to work together to help solve the horrendous human problems caused by the war. Under the leadership and inspiration of NATHAN SODERBLOM (1866–1931), archbishop of the Lutheran State Church of Sweden, the first meeting of the Life and Work Conference was held in Stockholm in 1925 seeking to relate the Christian faith to social issues, POLITICS, and ECONOMICS without first having to arrive at a theological consensus. During these years Swedish theologians also made a major theological contribution to what has been called “Lundensian Theology,” with its motif methodology as epitomized by ANDERS NYGREN’S (1890–1978) Agape and Eros (1930) and Gustav Aulen’s study on the atonement (Christus Victor, 1930).

Pluralization of Swedish Society

After World War II, Swedish Protestants and especially the Lutheran State Church of Sweden continued to be challenged by the ever-increasing SECULARIZATION of Swedish society. At the same time, Swedish society was becoming much more pluralistic as a result of its liberal political asylum policy, its generous attitude toward providing a haven for world refugees, and the influx of workers from southern Europe. This accounts for the increase in the non-Protestant churches mentioned at the outset of this article, as well as for the increased number of Muslims from Bosnia, Kosovo, and Turkey. During the last decade of the twentieth century, JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES grew to 23,393 members and the Mormons to 8,817, while the historic free churches from the nineteenth century leveled off in their membership growth.

Separation of Church and State

With the increased pluralization of Swedish society during the latter half of the twentieth century and the ongoing pressure from the free churches and those who had voluntarily withdrawn from the Lutheran State Church of Sweden and declared themselves to be without religious affiliation, legislation was set in motion during the 1990s to separate church and state. This legislation took effect on January 1, 2000. Today the Lutheran Church of Sweden is no longer a state church. It is legally recognized as one church among several. The state now collects the church tax for those churches that so desire on a proportionate basis and not for the Lutheran Church alone. Every Swedish citizen in the future, however, will have to pay a cultural tax for the maintenance of historic Swedish church buildings as well as a cemetery tax.

Facing the Twenty-first Century

New challenges in the twenty-first century facing Swedish Protestantism (and not just the Lutheran Church of Sweden) include the need for an ongoing spiritual revitalization of its church life, bold evangelical initiatives to reach the unchurched people of Sweden, and outreach to the non-Protestant Christian churches as well as to the non-Christian faith communities.

See also Bible; Book of Concord; Christology; Colonialism; Confession; Darwinism; Dissent; Ecumenism; Francke, August Hermann; Herrnhut; Justification; Marriage; Marxism; Methodism, Europe; Missionary Organizations; Missions; Mormonism; Preaching; Spener, Philipp Jakob; Theology; Universities.

References and Further Reading

- Aulen, Gustav. Christus Victor. Translated by Arthur G. Herbert. London: SPCK, 1931.
- Bergendoff, Conrad. Olavus Petri and the Ecclesiastical Transformation in Sweden. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1965.
- Ekstrom, Soren. Svenska kyrkan i utveckling. Stockholm: Verbum Forlag, 1999.
- Ferre, Nels. Swedish Contributions to Modern Theology. New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1967.
- Garstein, Oskar. Rome and the Counter-Reformation in Scandinavia. 3 vols. Oslo: Universitetsforlaget, 1963–1992.
- Grell, Ole, ed. The Scandinavian Reformation. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Hofgren, Allan, ed. Svenska trossamfund. Uppsala: EFS Forlaget, 1990.

Kyrkoordning for Svenska kyrkan faststalld av Kyrkomotet 1999. Stockholm: Verbum Forlag, 1999.

Lindhardt, P.G. Den Nordiske Kirkes Historie. Copenhagen: Nyt Nordisk Forlag, 1945.

Nygren, Anders. Agape and Eros. 2 vols. Translated by Philip S. Watson. London: SPCK, 1932–1939.

Scott, Franklin D. Sweden: The Nation's History. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1977.

Skog, Margareta, ed. En salig blandning. Stockholm: Svenska kyrkans forskningsrad, 1998. (Tro og Tanke 1997:3).

Straarup, Jorgen, ed. Perspektiv pa Svenska kyrkans statistik 1997. Stockholm: Svenska Kyrkans forskningsrad, 1998. (Tro og Tanke 1998:8).

TRYGVE R.SKARSTEN

SWEDENBORG, EMANUEL (1688–1772)

Swedish reformer. Born on January 29, 1688 in Stockholm, SWEDEN as the second son of Jesper Svedberg, court chaplain and later professor and bishop of Skara, Svedberg studied in Uppsala from 1699 and devoted himself intensively to studies both in the humanities and natural sciences. Having gained his doctorate in 1709 he traveled to Holland, ENGLAND, FRANCE, and GERMANY until 1715 in connection with his studies, before joining the civil service. In 1719 he was ennobled together with his brother and took the name Swedenborg. In 1747 he gave up his position as a Swedish civil servant to work as an independent researcher and live alternately in France, ENGLAND, Sweden, and Germany. Swedenborg died on March 29, 1772 in London.

Swedenborg's writings and his impact can be divided into two sections: 1745 was the decisive year dividing these two periods. As can be gleaned from Swedenborg's record of his dreams (which was not published within his lifetime), he experienced a deep religious crisis in 1743/44. At the end of this crisis Swedenborg felt himself called as a prophet to bring a religious message to the people.

In his first creative period, before 1745, Swedenborg made a name for himself as a natural scientist whose work attracted much attention. From 1716 to 1718 he published Sweden's first scientific journal (Daedalus Hyperboreaues). In addition, he published popular works on mineralogy (Opera philosophica et mineralica, 1734) and anatomy (Oeconomia regni animalis in transactiones divisa, 1740/41; Regnum animale, anatomice, physice et philosophice perlustratum, 1744/45).

His second creative phase began after 1745 and constituted a complete break in terms of methodology. After his sudden CONVERSION, which signified a rejection of DEISM and mechanistic natural philosophy, Swedenborg made clear in his first theological work De cultu et amore dei (1745) that he had not given up the search for a synopsis, an all-embracing synthesis. However, the paths of discovery were entirely different. He left the analytic method of the natural sciences behind and searched along spiritual paths for religious certainty, which was expressed in an exegetic interpretation of the story of the Creation in Genesis. For Swedenborg it became clear that the Book of Genesis contains a teaching of correspondences. He believed that everything has its natural, spiritual, and divine significance. He held on to the outer form of the written Word, but considered the inner meaning to be definitive. Chosen by God to interpret the spiritual meaning of the Scripture and to establish contact with the spiritual world, which he saw as corresponding to the earthly world, Swedenborg believed he was able to give an insight into the divine secrets in his De cultu et amore dei, an interpretation of the books of Genesis and Exodus. This was Swedenborg's principal theological work.

Adjusting the Canon

Taking his teaching of correspondences as a basis, he removed all biblical books from the canon that do not fit in with this theory. Thus the entire writings of Paul are discarded, as Swedenborg strictly rejected Paul's teaching of JUSTIFICATION. He maintained that it is not the literal but rather the spiritual sense that is decisive for an understanding of the Scriptures. Swedenborg summarized his THEOLOGY in Summaria expositio doctrinae novae ecclesiae (1769). In this he rejected a Christian concept of the Trinity. God is regarded as a person who is differentiated within Godself. God is the spiritual original being in whose image we are formed. However, only the spiritual person in us is the image of God, which means that our goal lies in shedding the natural and being taken up in the spiritual kingdom. Reconciliation with God takes place not in God's acquittal of humans but rather through rebirth and revival in the spiritual world.

Swedenborg's conviction that the Last Judgment had already taken place in 1757 and the parousia of the Lord had already occurred are of great significance for his ECCLESIOLOGY. This parousia, Swedenborg maintained in his interpretation of St. John's Apocalypse Apocalypsis revelata (1766), was not the physical appearance of the Lord but synonymous with the disclosure of the inner meaning of the Apocalypse. Swedenborg's interpretation of the Apocalypse testified to the parousia of the Lord. A new era had come, he said, a new church had been born—a new church that, according to Swedenborg's optimistic conviction, all believers would join as soon as they had been told of its teaching.

Swedenborg's ideas on correspondences between this and the heavenly world prompted comment from IMMANUEL KANT and Friedrich Christoph Oetinger as well as JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE, WILLIAM BLAKE, Honore de Balzac, Charles Baudelaire, Ralph Waldo Emerson, William Butler Yeats, and Jorge Luis Borges.

Within a relatively short space of time after his death, the first Swedenborg followings were formed (London 1787, Baltimore 1792). In 1810 the first society was founded under the name of "The Swedenborg Society in London," which saw its most important task in translating and printing his writings. In the Anglo-Saxon sphere, in particular in the UNITED STATES, further followings were rapidly established ("General Convention of the New Jerusalem," Philadelphia 1817; since 1980 "Swedenborgian Church of North America"). In 1897 a group strongly emphasizing the priesthood split off and formed the "General Church of the New Jerusalem," centered around Bryn Athyn in Pennsylvania. In Europe groups who felt committed to Swedenborg's interpretation of the BIBLE did not develop until after the liberalization of religious laws in the mid-nineteenth century. Today there are a large number of groups in Europe, in JAPAN, KOREA, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND, BRAZIL, and CANADA, as well as in over twenty states in the United States.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Swedenborg, Emanuel. The Apocalypse Revealed. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, 1968.
- . The Four Leading Doctrines of the New Church, Signified by the New Jerusalem in the Revelation. New York: AMS Press, 1971.
- . The Four Doctrines: The Lord, Sacred Scripture, Life, Faith. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, 1976.
- . Swedenborg's Journal of Dreams, 1743–1744. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, 1977.
- Swedenborg, Emanuel, and John Curtis Ager. True Christian Religion. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, 1981.
- Swedenborg, Emanuel, and Frank Bayley. The True Christian Religion Containing the Universal Theology of the New Church. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1933.
- Swedenborg, Emanuel, and George F. Dole. The Universal Human and Soul-body Interaction. New York: Paulist Press, 1984.
- . Heaven and Hell. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, Inc., 1984.
- Swedenborg, Emanuel, and Michael Stanley. Emanuel Swedenborg: Essential Readings. New York: Sterling, 1988.
- Swedenborg, Emanuel, and John Whitehead. Posthumous Theological Works of Emanuel Swedenborg. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, 1928.
- Warren, Samuel M. A Compendium of the Theological Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, 1979.
- Woofenden, William Ross. Swedenborg Researcher's Manual. Bryn Athyn, PA: Swedenborg Scientific Association, 1988.

Secondary Sources:

- Block, Marguerite Beck. The New Church in the New World: A Study of Swedenborgianism in America. New York: Swedenborg Publishing Association, 1984.
- Brock, Erland J., ed. Swedenborg and His Influence. Bryn Athyn, PA: Academy of the New Church, 1988.
- Jonsson, Inge. Emanuel Swedenborg. New York: Twayne, 1971.
- Larsen, Robin, and Stephen Larsen, eds. Emanuel Swedenborg: A Continuing Vision. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, 1988.
- Lenhammar, Harry. "Swedenborg, Swedenborgianer." TRE 32 (2001) Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 472–476.

ANDREAS MÜHLING

SWIFT, JONATHAN (1667–1745)

Irish essayist. Swift was born in Dublin of English parents on November 30, 1667. He was educated in IRELAND, graduating from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1686, and was ordained a priest in the Church of Ireland in 1695. Early in his career he played a significant role in obtaining the remission of certain Crown taxes to the Irish church. As its agent in London he negotiated with Robert Harley, leader of the Tory ministry, and following the success of his mission in 1710, he accepted Harley's offer to lend his pen in support of the ministry's efforts to end the war with FRANCE. For his services he was appointed dean of St. Patrick's Cathedral in Dublin in 1713. With the fall of the Tory government in 1714 he returned to Dublin to take up his duties as dean. Although for much of the remainder of his active life his opposition to ENGLAND'S political and economic domination of Ireland frequently involved him in public controversy, he discharged his decanal duties conscientiously and effectively until 1742, when a series of strokes incapacitated him. He died on October 19, 1745.

In a collection of aphorisms, Thoughts on Various Subjects (1711), Swift wrote that "We have just Religion enough to make us hate, but not enough to make us love one another." The pertinence of this observation to conditions in eighteenth-century Ireland is borne out by Swift himself. He shared the bias held by most English Protestants against Roman Catholicism and that held by many Anglicans against Protestant DISSENT. He approved of the Penal Laws, which deprived Irish Catholics of virtually all their rights, and of the Sacramental Test Act, which effectively excluded dissenters from holding civil and military posts. Swift's endorsement of this measure was grounded in his belief that episcopacy (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY) was closer to the primitive church than were other ecclesiastical institutions, and that as the established religion, ANGLICANISM should be maintained to preserve stability in the state. Protestant dissent, on the other hand, he associated with the English CIVIL WAR, the execution of Charles I, and the military dictatorship of OLIVER CROMWELL. To Swift the growing economic and political strength of the ULSTER Presbyterians and their increasing agitation for the repeal of the Test Act represented a serious threat to the Church of Ireland. Throughout his career he wrote pamphlets opposing efforts to repeal, including The Sentiments of a Church-of-England Man (1711), The Presbyterians Plea of Merit (1733), and, most notably, the ironic masterpiece An Argument against Abolishing Christianity (1711). Swift's implacable antipathy to both Protestant and Roman Catholic dissenters informs one of his major secular writings, A Tale of a Tub (1704), a brilliant satire on these and other targets.

The available evidence suggests that Swift was a competent, although not inspiring, preacher. In A Letter to a Young Gentleman, Lately enter'd into Holy Orders (1720), he cautioned against highly rhetorical sermons and speculations on abstruse theological points. The aim of PREACHING should be "to tell the People what is their Duty; and then to convince them that it is so." This prosaic conception of homiletics is illustrated by his eleven extant sermons. They are commonsensical rather than profound, and their topics more often treat temporal than spiritual concerns. The most emotionally charged of them, Upon the Martyrdom of King Charles I (published 1765), is principally an intemperate attack on the Puritans, who beheaded Charles, and on their successors, “our present dissenters.” The sermon that deals most centrally with Doc-TRINE is On the Trinity (published 1744), a conventional defense of the Christian mysteries against those “who are Enemies to all Revealed Religion.” The doctrine of the Trinity is beyond the comprehension of human reason and must therefore be accepted on implicit FAITH. A telling statement occurs in a collection of Swift’s miscellaneous remarks, published posthumously as Thoughts on Religion (1765): “I am not answerable to God for the doubts that arise in my own breast, since they are the consequence of that reason which he hath planted in me, if I take care to conceal those doubts from others, if I use my best endeavors to subdue them, and if they have no influence on the conduct of my life.”

The sermon On Mutual Subjection (published 1744) urges the duty of believers to practice CHARITY, a virtue Swift performed both privately and publicly. In addition to gifts to the needy, he established an alms house for destitute widows and regularly extended small loans at low interest to distressed tradesmen. He served on various philanthropic committees, was active in the charity-school movement, was a charter member of the Incorporated Society in Dublin for Promoting English Protestant Schools in Ireland, and was a trustee of Dr. Steevens’ Hospital. His most noteworthy benefaction was St. Patrick’s Hospital, established and endowed by him as an asylum “for Idiots, Lunatics and Incurables.”

No assessment of Swift’s place in the history of Irish Protestantism can ignore the narrow range of his influence. His loyalty was exclusively to the Established Church. Granting this limitation, his contributions to the Church of Ireland were substantial. Although Swift is best known as the author of Gulliver’s Travels (1726), he had in his own day a distinguished reputation as a clergyman as well. According to contemporary accounts, large crowds attended his sermons—evidence not only of his renown as a secular writer but also of the public’s recognition of his conspicuous services to his church.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Swift, Jonathan. The Prose Works of Jonathan Swift. Edited by Herbert Davis et al. 14 vols. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell, 1939–1968.

Secondary Sources:

Beckett, J.C. Protestant Dissent in Ireland, 1687–1780. London: Faber & Faber, 1948.

Ehrenpreis, Irvin. Swift, the Man, His Works, and the Age. 3 vols. Volumes 1 and 2, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1962, 1967; volume 3, London: Methuen, 1983.

Ferguson, Oliver W. Jonathan Swift and Ireland. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1962.

Landa, Louis A. “Jonathan Swift and Charity.” The Journal of English and Germanic Philology 44 (1945):337–350.

———. Swift and the Church of Ireland. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1954.

OLIVER W.FERGUSON

SWITZERLAND

The late-medieval development of the Swiss Confederation is crucial to understanding the course of the REFORMATION in Switzerland. The Confederation was in many ways a relic of the older Germanic CULTURE in which valley communities came together in alliances of mutual support. Founded by three states (Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden) in 1291, the Swiss Confederation grew during the next two centuries to thirteen by 1501, along with a collection of associated and communal territories. The importance of the Swiss Confederation to Europe was primarily attributed to the trade routes from ITALY over the Alpine passes to the Rhine. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, however, the Confederates won a series of major battles against their principal enemies, the Habsburgs and Burgundy, securing for themselves a formidable reputation as soldiers. Foreign rulers were quick to take advantage of the young men from these poor lands, and the history of the Swiss quickly became closely intertwined with mercenary service. There were various attempts to draw the members of the Confederation into a closer bond, but essentially each of the Confederates remained autonomous, able to conclude alliances with whomever it chose. The fragility of this arrangement was demonstrated in the Old Zurich War of 1439–1450, when Zurich made a serious attempt to gain hegemonic control of the Confederation. By the start of the sixteenth century the Confederation was an unequal mixture of wealthy urban members (Zurich, Berne, Basel [older Basle], Schaffhausen, Lucerne, Fribourg, and Solothurn) and the poorer, largely rural states (Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, Appenzell, and Glarus).

Although victory in the Swabian War of 1501 had essentially guaranteed independence of the Confederation from the Holy Roman Empire, the Swiss were still closely bound by language, trade, and religion to the southern German world. The cities of Berne, Basel, and Zurich belonged to the civic culture of the Imperial cities of the southwest, and this was crucial for the Reformation. There was only one university in the Confederation, Basel, so Swiss students regularly crossed the Rhine to the north to study in GERMANY. Basel was itself key to the Reformation. A cosmopolitan center, it had a flourishing printing industry and it was here that MARTIN LUTHER'S works were printed in the crucial years of the early Reformation. Also, Basel had been the residence of Erasmus, who had developed a circle of reform-minded humanists around him in the city. HULDRYCH ZWINGLI had studied in Basel, knew Erasmus personally, and was drawn into this world. Basel University was a crucial point of contact for many who would lead the Reformation in the Confederation.

Role of Zwingli

It was, however, the work of Zwingli in Zurich that was the beginning point. From his arrival in 1519 as stipendiary priest in the Grossmünster, Zwingli began a program of lecto continua PREACHING—sermons on the whole book and not simply selected passages. These sermons were the catalyst for reform, and from the pulpit Zwingli attacked the venality of the hierarchical church and the profiteering of the mercenary service, and he inveighed against idolatrous worship and moral turpitude. God, Zwingli argued, is pure and demands that his people be pure. There was a strong ethical dimension to Zwingli's message—men and women should lead lives of moral rectitude. Drawing on a mixture of St. Paul, Augustine, late-medieval scholasticism, Luther, and Erasmus, Zwingli emphasized both the sovereignty of God and the complete separation of the spiritual and material. God who is spirit must be worshipped in spirit, and true religion, therefore, must be purged of all attempts to reduce the divine to material representations (i.e., the mass and religious images). The role of the Holy Spirit is central to Zwingli's thought because it was the means by which men and women, as well as the world in which they lived, could be transformed into the new reality of the Christian life.

Zwingli's preaching brought him notoriety and infamy. His denunciation of established religion and mercenary service jarred with influential elements of Zurich society, and there were protests from other parts of the Confederation. The influence of Luther's teachings, particularly in the cities of Berne and Basel, was creating unrest along the lines found in Germany. For his part Zwingli saw little difference between what he was preaching and what he read by Luther. The crucial year was 1523, when two disputations were held in Zurich resulting in the de facto establishment of the new faith. The result of Zwingli's alliance with sympathetic magistrates was a new POLITY that envisaged a central role for the political rulers. Zwingli developed the model of Christian government based on the Old Testament monarchy. The kings (magistrates) were to govern with laws and the sword, and the prophets (essentially Zwingli) were to convey to them God's message. Thus by 1523 Zwingli had a new vision of the CHURCH as the gathering of those united by the spirit. He had essentially rejected the medieval church, but to realize this new church he was dependent on the good will of the political masters in Zurich. The immediate consequence of this, however, was the alienation of those who had been attracted to Zwingli's more radical message articulated in his early sermons. This group around CONRAD GREBEL broke away at the start of 1524, focusing their opposition on the issue of infant BAPTISM.

Reformation Unrest

By the middle of the 1520s the evangelical movement was present in both urban and rural areas and the Swiss found themselves caught up in the vicissitudes of the Peasants' War. The tumults made the magistrates extremely nervous about the effects of evangelical preaching, and in Berne and Basel there were attempts to control what was taught from the pulpits. Catholic opposition, however, was weak and disorganized, and evangelical sympathizers, most of whom were friends of Zwingli, made progress. In Zurich, however, opposition remained considerable and the Reformation Mandate of spring 1525 was only narrowly passed by the Council at a poorly attended session. Zwingli was very much in charge, but he worked with close colleagues such as Leo Jud and the printer Froschauer. The first reforms pertained to worship and a new order for celebration of the LORD'S SUPPER was introduced on Maundy Thursday 1525. Other key institutional reforms included morals mandates, a new marriage court, and the Prophezei, the foundation of higher education. The nature of reform in Zurich was fairly conservative: the parochial system was retained and virtually all of the urban and rural clergy remained in post. The main inspiration for the institutional reforms was drawn from the decrees of the Council of Basel.

In Berne and Basel evangelical movements were struggling, and these movements lacked a person with the authority and charisma of Zwingli, although the crucial role of the writings of JOHANNES OECOLAMPADIUS in Basel in formulating the theological character of the Swiss Reformation has been recently recognized. Nevertheless, in contrast to Zurich, the LAITY played a much more significant role in the implementation of the Reformation in Berne and Basel. The guilds gave decisive weight to the movement, forcing the hesitant Councils in the cities to act. In Berne, however, one must also acknowledge the pivotal role played by Niklaus Manuel, the painter and politician. The Disputation of Berne in 1528, which led to the implementation of the Reformation in the city, was the most important gathering of Swiss reformers and a decisive stage in the formation of Swiss Reformed theology. In Basel revolutionary activity among the lower guilds succeeded in strengthening the Council's hand to introduce the new faith in early 1529.

By the end of 1529, Zurich, Berne, Basel, and Schaffhausen had adopted the Reformation. Furthermore, the movement had made stunning gains in the eastern part of the Confederation in St. Gall, Appenzell, and Glarus. Zwingli was the dominant figure, but his authority must not be overstated. Both Basel and Berne had their own traditions and they were not prepared to follow Zurich. This became very clear in the years 1529 to 1531, when Zurich under Zwingli led a campaign to force the remaining parts of the Confederation to accept the new religion. The focus for hostilities between Catholics and Reformed was the Mandated Territories (lands jointly governed by the Confederates), where numerous local conflicts inflamed passions. Zwingli came to the conclusion that only war could overcome Catholic resistance, although Berne and Basel disagreed. The First Kappel War of 1529 saw virtually no military conflict, but it stirred bad memories of Zurich's previous attempts at domination of the Confederation. Particularism in the Confederation overrode confessional solidarity, and Zwingli was dismayed by the lack of support from the other Reformed states. Relations between Zurich, Berne, and Basel were fragile and the failure to find common purpose led to the rash attempt by Zurich to force the matter in 1531, when an army was sent out and defeated at a surprise battle at Kappel in the night of October 11. It was more of an ambush than a battle, but it left Zwingli and a good number of Zurich ministers dead.

Zwingli's death brought to an end a period of rapid reform and great conflict. During his ten years as a reformer he had given shape to a reform movement that focused on the creation of a new form of church. In so doing he had incurred the wrath of Catholics, Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM), and—most famously—Luther, with whom he fell out so disastrously and venomously over the LORD'S SUPPER. In connecting the reform movement so closely to Zurich he had also alienated the other Swiss states, which feared that the Reformation was simply a renewed form of hegemony by Zurich. It is also important to note that the reform movement under Zwingli was almost entirely guided by an urban core that had little time for the rural population, who in turn became disenchanted with the Reformation.

New Unity, New Tension

The result of Kappel was the fragmentation of the Swiss Reformation. It was the work of Zwingli's successor, HEINRICH BULLINGER, which eventually succeeded in restoring unity to the Swiss Reformed churches. Bullinger, in his forty years as head of the Zurich church, established a new relationship with the political authorities, gave the Swiss Reformation a clearer theological profile through his leadership, international influence, and writings (in particular the SECOND HELVETIC CONFESSION of 1566), and became a father figure to reform movements across Europe, from HUNGARY to ENGLAND. Under Bullinger and men like Konrad Pellikan and Theodor Bibliander, Zurich remained the theological center of the Swiss Reformation. Of particular importance was the ongoing work on the Zurich BIBLE, which first appeared in 1531. Zurich also became a center for religious refugees, particularly from Italy and England, and this did much to spread the influence of Bullinger's ideas across Europe. Bullinger also played a key role in securing the position of JOHN CALVIN in Geneva. Although the two men were not especially close, Bullinger was Calvin's key ally among the Swiss and their agreement on the Lord's Supper (Consensus Tigurinus) in 1549 marked an important stage in the development of Reformed thought.

In both Berne and Basel the Reformed tradition of Zwingli and Oecolampadius was locked in a struggle with Lutheran influences, and during the 1530s and 1540s both saw rancorous theological struggles that led to the clampdown by the magistrates on the churches. Although Bullinger's status as the leading churchman was recognized, neither Berne nor Basel saw itself as subordinate to Zurich. Basel had extensive contacts with the Empire and was involved in the network of southern German cities, whereas Berne was preoccupied with the conquest of the Pays du Vaud and the expansion toward Geneva after 1536. Berne's influence was in the French-speaking west, whereas Basel regained its place as a center of learning and culture, and like Zurich attracted many refugees who helped to create a diverse religious culture. Until the end of the sixteenth century Basel retained a distinct theological character and refused to sign the Second Helvetic Confession of 1566, which was the key theological document of the Swiss Reformation.

For about a century after Bullinger's death in 1575 the SECOND HELVETIC CONFESSION and Calvin's Genevan CATECHISMS remained the theological standards of the Swiss Reformed churches. To this must be added the Canons of the Synod of Dordrecht, or Dort (see DORT, CANONS OF), which were officially adopted by the Swiss churches. Theologically, the Swiss were greatly influenced by the Dutch Reformed churches. The period 1575 through the middle of the seventeenth century did not produce theologians of great distinction among the Swiss. There were, however, some notable figures, such as Johann Jakob Grynäus in Basel, Johan Jakob Breitinger in Zurich, and THEODORE BEZA and then Theodor Tronchin in Geneva. Basel, so often the renegade in the sixteenth century, had, under Grynäus, become a bastion of Reformed ORTHODOXY. The Swiss churches felt extremely vulnerable during the Thirty Years War. They remained unreconciled with German Lutherans, and they were surrounded by the Catholic forces of FRANCE, the Spanish Habsburgs, and the Austrians. There was considerable instability within the Confederation as numerous confessional disputes, particularly in the Grisons, threatened to upend the precarious Peace of Kappel of 1531. The most dramatic, or infamous, even, was the massacre by Catholics of six hundred Protestants in the Veltelina on July 23, 1620. The Grisons saw the only major confessional change of the seventeenth century, as many of the areas which had adopted the Protestant Reformation were forcibly re-Catholicized. At the same time there was trouble in the west as the Waldensian communities were being persecuted by Savoy.

Although the Swiss formally received their independence from the Holy Roman Empire with the Peace of Westphalia in 1648, confessional dissonance remained. The third religious war (after the First and Second Kappel Wars of 1529–1531) was the First Villmerger War of 1656, which was a defeat for the Reformed Confederates, above all Zurich, and led to the Peace of 1656. Swiss Protestantism was largely on the defensive during the period from 1650 to 1750 as Baroque Catholicism seemed to prevail everywhere. The Formula Consensus of 1675 was issued as a response to doctrinal controversies and was the principal articulation of late-orthodox Swiss theology. It enshrined a strict understanding of the doctrines of verbal inspiration and double PREDESTINATION and was meant to be binding on all the Swiss Protestant churches, but already there was considerable opposition to the imposition of Reformed creeds.

Influence of Pietism, the Enlightenment

With the emergence of PIETISM and the ENLIGHTENMENT in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries), confessions lost much of their credibility. Opposition to the form of Protestantism which arose out of the state churches of the Reformation took the form of Pietism, which flourished in Swiss lands from the second half of the seventeenth century.

Many of the first members of the Pietist movement were HUGUENOTS fleeing France. The Pietist awakenings took place in Berne and Zurich, and the state churches responded aggressively against these movements, which they regarded as heterodox. During the eighteenth century there was a strong movement among the Pietists to separate from the established Protestant churches. At the same time, the eighteenth century saw the rise of “rational orthodoxy,” an accommodation with ideas of the Enlightenment. What both of these movements shared was a rejection of the religion of theological confessions, and by the late eighteenth century the formal obligation to the traditional confessions of faith was gradually abolished. The eighteenth century also saw the last religious war, the Second Villmerger War of 1712, which was a victory for the Protestants over the Catholics, shifting political weight decisively towards the Protestant Confederates in the Swiss Confederation, where it would remain.

During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Swiss Protestant churches developed their own unique structures and traditions, but to preserve a sense of unity they continued to meet regularly at Aarau. In each case the church was a part of the state, and the clergy were officials of the ruling government (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW). These institutions would remain intact until the end of the old regime following 1789.

The rise of liberal theology in the nineteenth century led to further conflict (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). Perhaps the most significant theologian of the nineteenth century was FRANZ OVERBECK (1837–1905), professor of church history in Basel and close friend of FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE. The protest against liberal theology and governmental interference in church life (e.g., the abolition by decree of the traditional confessions of faith) as well as the general impulses of the Revival Movement led to secessions of Reformed free churches: 1846 in Vaud, 1849 in Geneva, 1873 in Neuchâtel. The Geneva Free Church still exists today, but the free churches in Neuchâtel and Vaud reunited with the official Reformed Church in 1966 and 1943 (see FREE CHURCH). In addition to these Reformed free churches, a number of pietistic associations were formed following the Revival in the nineteenth century. They were organized as groups within the Reformed churches; e.g., Evangelical Societies (the first in Berne in 1831) or the Pilgrim’s Mission St. Chrischona (beginning in 1869). The Swiss Reformed churches owe much to Pietism and the Revival Movement. Most of the church-related social service and missionary organizations go back to the initiative of Revival groups. Although structurally independent, these organizations have spiritual ties to the churches. Basel was the center for most of these organizations with the most significant being the BASEL MISSION, which was founded in 1815. The social and pastoral orientation of the Swiss churches was reflected in the dominant theological figures of the twentieth century, so-called neo-orthodox EMIL BRUNNER (1889–1966) and KARL BARTH (1886–1968), both of whom had enormous international audiences, above all in the UNITED STATES.

Until the nineteenth century the Swiss Reformed churches remained dependent on the political authorities of the cantons. This changed during the twentieth century so that the churches were regulated separately in each canton, resulting in major variations among the cantons. Basel (since 1905), Geneva (since 1907), and Neuchâtel (since 1943) separated church and state, while Berne, Zurich, Vaud, and also Basel-Land have retained the close relationships forged at the Reformation.

The Swiss Reformed churches have no central AUTHORITY. In 1858, following the foundation of the Swiss Confederation (1848), the churches founded a Swiss Church Conference, which met annually, as the Reformation churches had done. After World War I, partly in response to the American Federal Council of Churches, which sought a partner to coordinate reconstruction help for war-damaged Europe, the Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches was founded in 1920. The Federation is not itself a church but an alliance of autonomous churches.

In addition, the Swiss Reformed churches have created a series of organizations for specific tasks. In the French-speaking area of Switzerland the Département missionnaire des Eglises protestantes de la Suisse romande (DM) and in German-speaking Switzerland the Kooperation evangelischer Kirchen und Missionen (KEM) are responsible for church partnerships. The Hilfswerk der evangelischen Kirchen der Schweiz was founded to do relief work, while Brot für alle is the Reformed churches' agency for development work.

Conclusion

A brief summary does little justice to the complexities of the Swiss Reformation. In character it was created by a small network of humanist-minded reformers who drew their inspiration from Erasmus, Luther, and Zwingli. Zurich was the dominant force and without the Reformation in Zurich there would have been no Swiss Reformation. However, there were crucial differences between the states reflecting the manner in which the Confederation had evolved historically. Zwingli had created a dynamic reform movement that was closely enmeshed in the political and cultural realities of the Confederation, yet his ideas concerning God, the SACRAMENTS, and WORSHIP spread across Europe. Heinrich Bullinger turned the Swiss Reformation into an event of profound importance for the sixteenth century, and for a period of decades in the sixteenth century this backward Confederation was a center of religious and intellectual development. After his death in 1575 the Swiss churches became part of the international Reformed world but in the shadow of those areas, such as England, the NETHERLANDS, France, and SCOTLAND, they had once influenced.

See also Calvinism; Catholic Reactions to Protestantism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Lutheranism

References and Further Reading

Brady, Thomas A. Turning Swiss. Cities and Empire 1450–1550. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Brecht, Martin. Der Pietismus vom siebzehnten bis zum frühen achtzehnten Jahrhundert. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1993.

Gordon, Bruce. The Swiss Reformation. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press, 2002.

- Gossmann, Lionel. Basel in the Age of Burckhardt. A Study in Unseasonable Ideas. Chicago: Chicago University Press, 2000.
- Guggisberg, Hans. Basel in the Sixteenth Century: Aspects of the City Republic before, during and after the Reformation. St. Louis, MO: Sixteenth Century Studies, 1982.
- Locher, Gottfried. Die zwinglische Reformation im Rahmen der europaeischen Kirchengeschichte. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoech & Ruprecht, 1979.
- Pfister, Rudolf. Kirchengeschichte der Schweiz. 2 vols. Zurich, Switzerland: Theologischer Verlag Zurich, 1974.
- Potter, George. Zwingli. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976.
- Wernle, Paul. Der schweizerische Protestantismus im XVIII. Jahrhundert. Tübingen, Germany, 1923–24.

F.BRUCE GORDON

SYNOD

The word “synod” comes from the Greek synodos, which means “a group of people traveling together,” a “gathering,” an “assembly,” “a meeting,” “together on the way,” and “going the same way.” A synod is a meeting of the CLERGY, and sometimes the LAITY, of a particular CHURCH, nation, province, or diocese to discuss ecclesiastical matters, make decisions, and promulgate regulations related to issues of DOCTRINE, LITURGY, ethical concerns, and discipline (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE). In the early church the terms “synod” and “council” were interchangeable. Sometimes a meeting covering a large area was called a council and one covering a smaller region was called a synod. Gradually, the ecumenical councils were called councils and not synods, and synod was used for regional meetings.

The earliest synods were those held in Asia Minor in response to Montanism and those held in the East and the West to settle the quartodeciman (date of Easter) controversy. Possibly the first official synod, the calling together of the clergy of a diocese, was held by Bishop Siricius of Rome in 387. Later Pope Benedict XIV (1758–1769) ruled that a synod was a convocation of the diocese, and the meeting of all the bishops was to be called a council. The major synod in Roman Catholicism is the Synod of Bishops, sometimes called the World Synod of Bishops, which was mandated by the Second Vatican Council’s Decree on the Bishops’ Pastoral Office in the Church, and established by Pope Paul VI on September 15, 1965, in the document Apostolica Sollicitudo (Apostolic Solitude). The Synod of Bishops meets every few years at the call of the pope, and is an opportunity for bishops from around the world to discuss issues with the bishop of Rome.

The Synod in Protestantism

In Protestantism, synod has been used in a variety of ways. At the time of the REFORMATION, the Reformed/ Presbyterian tradition introduced synodical structures of church government (see PRESBYTERIANISM). The first synod of the canton of Zurich was held in April 1528, and consisted of the pastor and two lay deputies from each parish. It was primarily a means of maintaining standards for the ministry. In late May 1559, in Calvinistic FRANCE, representatives of about fifty churches met in Paris and adopted a form of discipline and the GALLICAN CONFESSION. It established a synodical form of church government. At the local level was the CONSISTORY and above that was the colloquy, composed of the pastor and one elder from each congregation. The colloquy was subject to the provincial synod, which was attended by each pastor and two elders. The supreme AUTHORITY was the annual national synod, which consisted of two ministers and two elders from each of the provincial synods. A similar system was arranged in the NETHERLANDS, which had three synods meeting annually, and at the top, biennial national synods.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND replaced the General Assembly with the General Synod in 1969. It consists of the CONVOCATIONS OF CANTERBURY AND YORK joined together in a House of Bishops and a House of Clergy joined by a House of Laity. It is the highest authority in the Church of England.

In the American colonies, synods were used in New England CONGREGATIONALISM as early as 1637. One of the most important of the colonial synods was the Cambridge Synod, which met on September 1, 1646. At the request of the General Court of the Bay Colony, Massachusetts, a synod consisting of elders (ministers) and messengers (laymen) from the four Puritan (see PURITANISM) colonies—Bay Colony, New Haven, Plymouth, and Connecticut—met to discuss issues of ECCLESIOLOGY. Chapter xvi of the CAMBRIDGE PLATFORM was “Of Synods.” It noted that Acts 15 referred to a synod, so synods are the ordinance of Christ, but not absolutely necessary to the being of the church. Synods are necessary for the well-being of the church because of the iniquity of men and the perverseness of the times. Synods could be called to debate and determine controversies of faith, cases of conscience, directions for the public worship of God, and the good government of the church. It gave synods strong advisory and admonitory powers, but not legal coercive authority. The first synod of the Presbyterians in the American colonies met at Philadelphia in 1717.

The EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the United States is organized into nine provinces. Each province has a synod consisting of a House of Bishops and a House of Deputies. The Provincial Synod has a president who may be a bishop, presbyter, deacon, or lay person in the Province.

LUTHERANISM also uses the term synod. In 1807 FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER made a proposal for a new constitution for the Protestant Church in Prussia, which included the adoption of a synodical system. Gradually this synodical system dominated European Lutheranism. Synods became very important after World War I. Participation of pastors and laymen in synods during the Kirchencampf increased the prestige of synods. The first synod of the CONFESSING CHURCH at Barmen, May 29–30, 1934, drew up the BARMEN DECLARATION in response to the Nazi GERMAN CHRISTIANS.

In American Lutheranism, synod has been used in several ways. One is as a national label, such as the LUTHERAN CHURCH-MISSOURI SYNOD and the WISCONSIN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN SYNOD. The primary use of synod in American Lutheranism has been as a geographical area. The first Lutheran synod was held in Philadelphia in 1748. The EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA has sixty-five synods. There are two small bodies in the UNITED STATES that use the word synod in their titles—the Evangelical Lutheran Synod and the Lutheran Ministerium and Synod-United States of America.

The MORAVIAN CHURCH in America (Unitas Fratrum) is divided into three provinces. The highest administrative body in each is the provincial synod, which is composed of ministers and laypersons, and meets every three or four years.

References and Further Reading

Church of England, National Assembly, Synodical Government Commission. Synodical Government in the Church of England: Being a Report of a Commission Appointed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York. London: Church Information Office, 1966.

Hauck, Albert. "Councils and Synods." In The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, edited by Samuel Macauley Jackson, vol. 3, 279–284. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1950.

Margull, Hans, ed. The Councils of the Church. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1961.

DONALD S. ARMENTROUT

This page intentionally left blank.

T

TAIT, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL (1811–1882)

Archbishop of Canterbury. Tait was born and educated in Edinburgh. He moved from Edinburgh High School to the University of Glasgow in 1827. Although born into a Presbyterian family, he decided to enter the ministry of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. He joined Balliol College, Oxford in 1829 and was confirmed in the Church of England in 1830. After securing a first-class degree in classics in 1833, he taught in the university as a fellow and tutor of Balliol College and became one of the most respected tutors in the university, lecturing in logic and ethics. Tait was not drawn to the OXFORD MOVEMENT of the time and contributed to a public protest against Tract 90, in which JOHN HENRY NEWMAN attempted to show that the Calvinist THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of the Church of England were compatible with Roman Catholic teaching. In 1842 Tait was appointed headmaster of Rugby School in succession to THOMAS ARNOLD, and in 1849 he became dean of Carlisle.

In 1856 family tragedy overtook Tait. In one month, from March 10 to April 10, the Tait family lost five daughters to scarlet fever. In the same year he was appointed bishop of London. Here he was prepared to be innovative, preaching in public places like transportation depots and encouraging popular services in Westminster Abbey and in London theaters. He was active in the cholera epidemic of 1866.

In 1869 he became archbishop of CANTERBURY. He attempted to curb the excesses of the Anglo-Catholic ritualists through the Public Worship Regulation Act of 1874. He incurred much criticism by adopting a liberal attitude to the use of non-Anglican forms by nonconformists who exercised their right to burial in Anglican churchyards (see NONCONFORMITY). Tait was judged to have had greater influence in the House of Lords than any other archbishop since the REFORMATION and was an able and persuasive speaker. During his tenure the LAMBETH CONFERENCE, begun in 1867, was consolidated as a meeting for Anglican bishops from overseas, thus changing the role of archbishop into a leader of a worldwide communion.

References and Further Reading

- Davidson, R.T., and W. Benham. The Life of Archibald Campbell Tait. 2 vols. London: Macmillan and Co., 1891.
- Edwards, David L. Leaders of the Church of England 1828–1944. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1971.
- Fremantle, W.H. Dictionary of National Biography. vol. 55. London: Oxford University Press, 1898.
- Marsh, P.T. The Victorian Church in Decline: Archbishop Tait and the Church of England 1868–1882. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1969.

TAIWAN

The island of Formosa ("beautiful [island]") was inhabited solely by aboriginal peoples of uncertain origins until the modern period. Less than a century after Japanese and Chinese established communities on the island, the Dutch arrived (1626) and occupied a southern region of Formosa in 1642. The Dutch came not as missionaries, but as a multinational corporation known as the Dutch East India Company (VOC) to protect their spice trade from the north. The rule of the VOC in the south lasted only thirty-eight years. When the Dutch were expelled (1662), a long period of Chinese domination began that included a long and steady exodus of Han Chinese from the mainland to Taiwan. This Chinese domination of the island was ended only by the newer imperial power of Japan (1895–1945). Upon the defeat of the Japanese, and then the victory of the Communists in China, in 1949, Taiwan became the refuge of great numbers of Nationalists from CHINA.

The earliest Christian presence on Formosa began in the 1620s with Dutch Reformed ministers who were funded by the VOC. Thirty-two ministers came to serve the Dutch community but also with the clear purpose to evangelize the Aboriginal population. During their brief stay, over 17,000 local people were baptized, and a good amount of catechetical material was translated into the local tongue.

The next Protestant phase in Taiwan began in 1860, after the signing of the Tien-chin Treaty (1858), an agreement between Qing China and a number of Western powers that opened various treaty ports for evangelization. In September 1860 Carstairs Douglas and H.L.Mackenzie, English Presbyterians who had been working in South China, made an exploratory trip to the island. Thus begins a long tradition of Christian development in Taiwan being closely linked with China. The first resident missionary to Taiwan was a physician, Dr. James L.Maxwell, who arrived from Amoy, China with three Chinese assistants. For the next half-century, church work in Taiwan was dominated by Presbyterians from the United Kingdom, CANADA, and later the UNITED STATES. Most notable of the early missionaries was Canadian George Leslie Mackay (1844–1901). His work, mostly with the Han Chinese, helped to establish the first hospital, first college (Oxford), and established the first Presbytery in the North (1914). Antiforeign persecution, as in China, periodically cropped up on Taiwan, aimed both at missionaries and at Christian converts. Other institutions founded in the nineteenth century include the Taiwan Theological Seminary (1876), the first Presbytery (1896), and the Taiwan Church Press (1884).

In 1915 another turn occurred when Japanese rule was established in Taiwan. This meant a greater encouragement to self-support as well as greater cooperation among churches, enforced by the Japanese. Still there was a close relationship with mainland China. In the 1920s the recently formed True Jesus Church (TJC, 1918; Beijing), an indigenous Chinese Pentecostal Church, began work in Taiwan. The TJC became an important church on the island, having its greatest influence among the poor and less educated. Also during this time of Japanese occupation, the aboriginal work went forward. Although the impetus to this growth came from both Western mission and Japanese mission leadership, the growth in the work was mostly the work of indigenous Christian leaders like Loh Sian-chhun, Kho Iu-chai, and others.

Another great shift in the Christian presence and Christian influence occurred at the close of the Pacific War. The Japanese influence ended, but very quickly the island was dominated by Guomindang personnel under the leadership of Chiang Kai-shek. Along with the various refugees fleeing Maoist rule were a number of Christians. This marks the end of the Presbyterian and Reformed domination of Protestant MISSIONS in Taiwan. Soon both Chinese Christians and missionaries were arriving from Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran, and other churches. Numerous smaller churches sent missionaries to evangelize the mainland Chinese, adding further to the church diversity. Some of these missionaries came from China, already speaking certain dialects of Chinese, but few spoke Taiwanese. Thus the division between ministry to Han Chinese and local Taiwanese and aboriginal peoples increased.

After nearly four centuries of often interrupted Christian witness, Taiwan is still less than 7 percent Christian. More Taiwanese are members of newer, non-Christian, religious groups than are members of Christian churches. One of the ongoing themes in Christianity in Taiwan is the appropriate role of political involvement. For some, independence from the People's Republic of China is a central concern, but for others the main issue is the domination of political life by "foreign" Nationalist elements from China. The Presbyterian Church in Taiwan is the largest Protestant church, although it is still only half the size of the Roman Catholic Church. PENTECOSTALISM, even though it arrived very late in Taiwan, is followed by about one-third of the Christian population. It seems that indigenous forms of Christianity such as the True Jesus Church and the Little Flock will continue to have influence, but that overall Protestant Christians will remain a significant but small minority of the population.

References and Further Reading

- Band, Edward. The History of the English Presbyterian Mission: 1847–1847. London: Publishing Office of the Presbyterian Church of England, n.d. (reprinted. Taipei: Ch'eng Wen Publishing Company, 1972).
- Moffett, Samuel A. A History of Christianity in Asia. vols. 1 and 2. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Press, 1998/2004.
- Rubenstein, M.A. "Taiwan." In The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, edited by Stanley M. Burgess. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2002.
- Tong, Hollington K. Christianity in Taiwan: A History. Taipei: China Post, 1961.

SCOTT W.SUNQUIST

TAUSEN, HANS (1494–1561)

Danish Lutheran reformer. Tausen was born in Birkende on the island of Fyn in 1494. Little is known of his early childhood. As a young monk in the Order of St. John in Antvorskov, he was sent in 1516 to study theology at Rostock. Upon his return to Copenhagen in 1521, he came under the influence of Paul Helie, the leading Christian Humanist in Scandinavia and a disciple of Erasmus. Tausen continued his theological studies at the University of Wittenberg, where he was strongly influenced by MARTIN LUTHER.

Upon his return to DENMARK in 1525 Tausen began to preach in Viborg (Jutland), where an evangelical, grassroots awakening broke out. Imprisoned for his preaching and expelled from his order, Tausen came under the personal protection of Frederik I who appointed him to be his personal chaplain in 1526. A printing press set up in Viborg in 1528 greatly aided the dissemination of Tausen's views. By 1529 when Tausen was called to be the pastor of St. Nicholas Church in Copenhagen, a popular evangelical renewal movement had spread throughout Jutland.

In July 1530 Tausen led a group of like-minded evangelical preachers in presenting Forty-three Articles (Confessio Hafniensis) to the Danish National Assembly. This Copenhagen Confession was avowedly Lutheran and more polemical in tone than the AUGSBURG CONFESSION. However, in 1537 when JoHANNES BUGENHAGEN drew up the Danish Church Ordinance, the Augsburg Confession came to overshadow the Confessio Hafniensis as a confessional statement of the Lutheran Church of Denmark.

In 1538 Tausen was appointed lecturer at the Cathedral School in Roskilde, one of the last Roman Catholic strongholds in Denmark. As "superintendent" (bishop) of Ribe (1542), Tausen spent the rest of his life introducing the vernacular into congregational hymn singing and worship while augmenting his influential collection of Sermons (Postil).

See also Evangelicalism; Hymns and Hymnals; Lutheranism, Scandinavia

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Andersen, Niels K. Confessio Hafniensis. Diss. Copenhagen: 1954.

Tausen, Hans. Postille. Edited by Bjoern Kornerup. Facs. edition, 2 vols. Copenhagen: Levin & Munksgaard, 1934.

Secondary Sources:

Bugge, Knud E. Tro og Tale: Studier over Hans Tausens Postil. Copenhagen: Gad, 1963.

Christensen, Marie. Hans Tausen. Copenhagen: 1942.

Rordam, Holger F., ed. Smaaskrifter af Hans Tausen. Copenhagen: 1870.

TRYGVE R. SKARSTEN

TAYLOR, JAMES HUDSON (1832–1905)

English missionary to China. Taylor was born on May 21, 1832 in Barnsley, ENGLAND. He was a pioneer Protestant missionary to inland CHINA and the founder of the interdenominational CHINA INLAND MISSION (CIM). He raised funds for missionary work and served as a recruiter of missionaries to China. By the time of his death, on June 3, 1905, the CIM had sponsored over 800 missionaries to China. Throughout his missionary work Taylor traveled on eleven journeys.

Early Years as a Missionary

Taylor received his calling to serve as a missionary at age seventeen. His first missionary work was with the Chinese Evangelization Society. This Society paid for him to undergo medical training in London. He arrived in China for the first time in 1854 at Shanghai aboard the ship the Dumfries. Shanghai was one of five port cities opened to foreign trade through the signing of the Treaty of Nanking (1842), which also gave control of Hong Kong to Great Britain.

At the time of Taylor's arrival, China was in the middle of the Taiping rebellion (1850–1864), a revolt against the Chinese emperor Xian Feng led by a pseudo-Christian religious fanatic. The rebellion was reported initially to have the effect of opening up China to foreign missionaries.

South of Shanghai, Taylor worked in the missionary hospital at Ningpo. In 1857 Taylor resigned from the Chinese Evangelization Society. He had objected to being supported by borrowed money. It was Taylor's conviction that a Christian should not be indebted to anyone. Taylor instead believed that monetary support for MISSIONS work should come from God, asked for in PRAYER. He continued to work as an independent missionary in China after his work with the Society.

Hudson Taylor differed from other missionaries of his time. He adapted himself cross-culturally throughout his work in order to fit in more easily with the Chinese people. Having won the affections of Maria Dyer, a missionary daughter, Taylor married her in 1858. He gave up Western attire and wore Chinese robes, dyed his hair black, and attached a queue, resembling a pigtail, to his hair. Taylor later required all missionaries serving with the CIM who traveled into the Chinese interior to do likewise.

Returning to England in 1860 on account of ill health, Taylor asked for additional missionaries to China. Before he returned to China in 1865 he revised the translation of the New Testament in the Ningpo dialect. His book China: Its Spiritual Needs and Claims (1865) motivated many to consider missionary work to China.

Work with the China Inland Mission

Missionaries usually remained near the shore provinces of China. Taylor, however, intended to travel inland with the gospel message. This shift in Protestant Chinese missionary work resulted in the establishment of the China Inland Mission in 1865 in London. Taylor returned to China under the auspices of the CIM. The CIM was to be a “faith mission,” in which the missionaries would rely on God’s help to finance their labors. The CIM was an international organization, represented by England, SWEDEN, the UNITED STATES, CANADA, and others. Taylor had brought sixteen missionaries on his second voyage. Arriving at Shanghai in 1866, the missionaries spread the gospel message into interior China.

Taylor’s wife, Maria, died in July 1870 at age thirty-three. She had borne eight children. In 1871 Taylor married Jennie Faulding in England. One year later, the whole family returned to China.

China’s Millions, the monthly journal of the CIM, was first published in 1875. This journal continued being published until 1952, when the CIM was renamed the Overseas Missionary Fellowship. Taylor had contributed numerous articles to the journal, including “To Every Creature” (1889). In that article Taylor outlined an ambitious plan to evangelize the whole of China. The article was inspired by the Conference of Missionaries, held in Shanghai in 1887.

The Chefoo Convention, signed between Great Britain and China in 1876, had the effect of allowing missionaries to travel into inland China. For the next two years Taylor traveled over thirty thousand miles in the nine interior provinces of China. He was accompanied by eighteen missionaries, who Taylor believed were an answer to many prayers. Against criticism by other MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS, Taylor brought single female missionaries to work in teams to inland China in 1878. They served an important role with the CIM, establishing mission settlements in the Chinese interior. He was the first to involve single women in missionary work to China.

Among the missionaries traveling to China with Taylor in 1885 were the “Cambridge Seven.” They were a group educated at the University of Cambridge who gave up careers in England for the missionary work in China and sparked a student movement.

Taylor left China for SWITZERLAND in 1900 because of his failing health, and entered into semiretirement. While Taylor was convalescing, the Boxer Rebellion, (1900), directed against foreigners in China, took the lives of over a hundred CIM missionaries—men, women, and their children.

James Hudson Taylor lost his second wife (1904) in Switzerland, a year before his own death. He undertook what was to become his final journey to China in 1905. That year Taylor took ill and died in Changsha, Hunan Province. He was buried near the Yangtze River. Taylor is remembered as a man of faith who had a pioneering missionary spirit that opened inland China to foreign missions.

See also Bible Translation; Cambridge University; Missions, British; Studd, C.T.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Taylor, James Hudson. Hudson Taylor. Minneapolis, MN: Bethany House, 1987.

Secondary Sources:

Cromarty, Jim. It is not Death to Die: A New Biography of Hudson Taylor. Sevenoaks, UK: Hodder & Stoughton, 2001.

Steer, Roger. J.Hudson Taylor: A Man in Christ (An OMF Book). Wheaton, IL: H. Shaw Publishers, 1993.

Taylor, Howard, and Geraldine Taylor. Spiritual Secret of Hudson Taylor. New Kensington, PA: Whitaker House, 1996.

———. Hudson Taylor: Two-Volume Biography. 2 vols. Littleton, CO: OMF Books, 1998.

CHRISTOPHER M.COOK

TAYLOR, JEREMY (1613–1667)

English theologian. Jeremy Taylor was born on August 15, 1613, at Cambridge, and died on August 13, 1667, at Lisburn, Ireland. He studied at Gonville and Gaius College, CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY. Taylor lectured at St. Paul's, London, and attracted the attention of WILLIAM LAUD, archbishop of Canterbury. He served as rector of Uppingham and then chaplain in the Royalist army. After imprisonment for a short time he retired in 1645 to WALES, where he lived as a chaplain and where he wrote many of his best works. On January 27, 1661, he was consecrated bishop of Down and Connor, to which the small adjacent diocese of Dromore was later added, in IRELAND.

Taylor's fame rests almost entirely on his devotional writings. In 1646 he published Theologia eklektike; a Discourse of the Liberty of Prophesying, in which he asked that deprived CHURCH OF ENGLAND clergy be allowed to function. It is a plea for TOLERATION that advocated a more liberal attitude to religious differences. It had an impact on the American colonies and was highly regarded by ROGER WILLIAMS. An Apology for Authorized and Set Forms of Liturgy (1646) was an attack on the Directory of Public Worship, which was opposed to all forms of written prayers including the Lord's Prayer. Doctor Dubitantium, or the Rule of Conscience (1660) was a treatise on moral theology. A Dissuasive from Popery (1664) was an attack on Roman Catholicism in which he argued that councils are not infallible, that Scripture is sufficient for understanding SALVATION, and that indulgences were a Roman innovation.

Taylor's two major devotional writings were The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living (1650) and The Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying (1651). These are probably the most widely known writings of any seventeenth-century Anglican divine. Both volumes describe how a Christian can live a holy life and die a holy death. Both volumes had an impact on JOHN WESLEY and influenced his understanding of perfection and sanctification.

Because he lived through the chaotic period of the Commonwealth, Taylor had a great fear of ANTINOMIANISM and moral chaos. Justification by GRACE through FAITH should not weaken insistence of living a good life. For Taylor JUSTIFICATION was a process, and holy living was a matter of constant repentance. He argued that Christ is the medium to God, but obedience is the medium to Christ. Before one receives Holy Communion (see LORD'S SUPPER) there must be the complete removal of any known sin or desire to sin as well as an earnest belief never to commit sin again.

Taylor was a great prose stylist and he has been called the prose Shakespeare, the English Chrysostom, and the Anglican Bossuet. He was a pre-Tractarian High Churchman.

References and Further Reading

Bolton, Frederick Rothwell. The Caroline Tradition of the Church of Ireland, with Particular Reference to Bishop Jeremy Taylor. London: S.P.C.K., 1958.

McAdoo, H.R. The Eucharistic Theology of Jeremy Taylor Today. Norfolk, UK: Canterbury Press Norwich, 1988.

Scott, David A. Christian Character: Jeremy Taylor and Christian Ethics Today. Oxford, UK: Latimer House, 1991.

Williamson, Hugh Ross. Jeremy Taylor. Norwood, PA: Norwood Editions, 1975.

DONALD S.ARMENROUT

TAYLOR, NATHANIEL WILLIAM (1786–1858)

American theologian and educator. Born in Connecticut June 23, 1786, Taylor graduated from Yale in 1807, where he studied theology under TIMOTHY DWIGHT, and became his amanuensis. In 1812 he was ordained and became the pastor of the First Church of New Haven. He was handsome and dignified, and a powerful preacher. Taylor was called to be Dwight professor of didactic theology in 1822 at Yale Divinity School, where he remained until his death on March 10, 1858.

The theology of JONATHAN EDWARDS, modified by SAMUEL HOPKINS, Bellamy, and Dwight, was the orthodox belief held in most New England churches. It taught that man's only freedom of choice is liberty to obey the strongest motive. Taylor disagreed, denying the doctrines of total depravity and original SIN. He stated that no one is depraved but by his own acts because the sinfulness of the human race does not pertain to human nature as such. "Sin is in the sinning," he declared, and therefore it is "original" only in being universal. Humans always had, in his famous phrase, "power to the contrary." Fully in accord with the AWAKENINGS of the time, his intention was to formulate a revival theology that could prosper in the democratic ethos of Jacksonian America, and prevent the feeling of inability in people. Taylor taught that preachers must confront sinners with their state, and demand immediate response to the gospel. He regarded human beings as free and rational, and therefore fully responsible for everything they did.

In 1828 Taylor presented his New Haven Theology in his Concio ad Clerum address before the Congregational clergy of Connecticut, shocking many and dividing the churches into "Taylorites and Tylerites," the latter following his chief opponent, Bennet Tyler. The controversy among Congregationalists became so heated that a more orthodox and Calvinistic seminary was formed in 1833, with Tyler as president. Taylor's influence soon passed beyond the borders of New England and was a factor in the Presbyterian Church schism of 1838, with the New School faction generally accepting his views. Taylor's works include Practical Sermons (1858), Lectures on the Moral Government of God (1859), and Essays...upon Selected Topics in Revealed Theology (1859). See also Congregationalism; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

Ahlstrom, Sydney E. A Religious History of the American People. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1972.

- Foster, Frank H. A Genetic History of the New England Theology. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1907.
- Harountunian, Joseph. Piety versus Moralism: The Passing of the New England Theology. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1932. Reprint. Introduction by Sydney H. Ahlstrom. New York: Harper and Row, Torchbooks, 1970.
- Mead, Sidney E. Nathaniel William Taylor, 1786–1858: A Connecticut Liberal. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1942.

KEITH J.HARDMAN

TELEMANN, GEORG PHILIPP (1681– 1767)

German composer. Telemann, born March 14, 1681, was GERMANY'S most eminent and prolific composer during the first half of the eighteenth century. A musically precocious child, he began formal study of singing in 1691 and claimed to have learned to play several instruments—organ, violin, and zither, and later, flute, oboe, chalumeau, viola da gamba, double bass, and trombone—with little or no instruction. Two years later, at the age of twelve, he wrote his first opera, Sigismundus, and began writing a motet almost every week for the church choir at his school in Zellerfeld.

In 1701, apparently giving in to the wishes of his family that he not follow a musical career, he began to study law at Leipzig University. Even so, he was soon commissioned to write music for both the Thomaskirche and Nikolaikirche. He also founded a student Collegium Musicum, became director of the Opernhaus (writing four operas before leaving Leipzig), and was appointed (in 1704) to the posts of organist and music director at the Neukirche. Telemann left Leipzig in 1705 to take up the post of Kappellmeister at the court of Count Erdmann II of Promnitz in Sorau (now Żary in Poland).

During these early years, he wrote most of his motets, masses, and psalm settings. In 1708 Telemann left Sorau to take up the appointment of Konzertmeister to Duke Johann Wilhelm of Saxony-Eisenach, and was promoted Kapellmeister the following year. He married Amalie Louise Juliane Eberin, a musician's daughter and a lady-in-waiting to the countess of Promnitz, who died in 1711 giving birth to their daughter. The child's godfather was Erdmann Neumeister (poet-theologian and court chaplain at Sorau), whose texts Telemann set the same year for an annual cycle of cantatas; these pieces helped establish the "mixed" style of cantata, in which operatic arias and recitative were interspersed with chorales.

The death of Telemann's wife and a dissatisfaction with court politics may have contributed to what Telemann described as a religious awakening that led him to seek church employment. In 1712 he took the post of city director of music and Kapellmeister of the Barfüsserkirche in Frankfurt, where, among other duties, he was responsible for providing music for two city churches and for civic gatherings. Over the following three years he started a public concert series with a revived Frankfurt Collegium Musicum, married Maria Catharina Textor (the sixteen-year-old daughter of the council clerk, who in subsequent years bore eight sons and one daughter), and began publishing his instrumental works. In 1716 he performed his setting of the Hamburg poet B.H. Brockes's passionatorio, which was to become a favorite Lenten piece in Germany even up to the early nineteenth century. During the same year he visited the Eisenach and Gotha courts and was installed as the nonresident Kapellmeister to the former. He was offered a resident position at the Gotha court, which he declined after negotiating a salary increase from the city of Frankfurt. Three complete cantata cycles survive from these years (1714–15; 1716–17; 1717–18) that show Telemann's conscious attempt to master national styles and also demonstrate his lifelong interest in incorporating the styles of secular, including operatic, music into his church music.

In 1721 he left Frankfurt to become Kantor of the Johanneum Lateinschule (where he gave a Latin oration on the superiority [excellētia] of church music) and musical director of Hamburg's five main churches. Before settling in at Hamburg, however, he applied (in 1722) for the post of Thomaskantor at Leipzig. He was selected over six other candidates, including J.S. Bach, but negotiated a salary increase that convinced him to remain in Hamburg. His many duties there included giving music instruction four days each week at the school and providing a sacred oratorio and serenata each year for the military, two sacred cantatas each week, and a new passion each Lent. Twenty-three of these passions, which are for liturgical use—he set each Evangelist's account in turn—are still extant. In spite of such a heavy workload, Telemann found the energy to direct the weekly concerts of the Hamburg Collegium Musicum, two years later expanding the series to two concerts each week. He also became director of the Gänsemarktoper, where he performed his own, Handel's, and Keiser's operas.

In 1725 he began to concentrate on publishing his music, bringing out forty-three publications (not counting second editions) over the next fifteen years. Telemann's published cantata cycles from these years [1725–26; 1726–27; 1731–32] consist of practical music for fairly small scorings, suitable for domestic as well as small church settings. In 1736 his marriage (which had deteriorated twelve years earlier) ended when his wife left home, possibly to stay in a convent. Although by 1740 he had effectively retired, the death of his eldest son, Andreas, in 1755, led to Telemann's taking responsibility for his musically gifted seven-year-old grandson, Georg Michael. This seems to have rejuvenated him, ushering in his last phase of creative activity, during which he concentrated on writing sacred oratorios; one of his finest, Der Tag des Gerichts, dates from 1765. Telemann died June 25, 1767, at the age of eighty-six, having produced over 3,000 works, including 1,700 cantatas (1,400 of which are still extant). His popularity (attributed to his native talent for melody and to his dramatic sense) and the freedom that he found in church employment enabled him to bring music of a quality generally reserved for the most wealthy courts to a new urban and middle-class concert-going public.

References and Further Reading

Menke, Werner. Thematisches Verzeichnis der Vokalwerke von Georg Philipp Telemann. 2 vols.

Frankfurt: Klostermann, 1988 (vol. 1), 1983 (vol. 2).

Ruhnke, Martin, and Wolf Hobohm, eds. Georg Philipp Telemann: Musikalische Werke. Kassel, Germany: Bärenreiter, 1950–.

Telemann, Georg Philipp. Autobiographien: 1718, 1729, 1739. Blakenburg, Germany:

Konsultationsstelle, Leistungszentrum beim Telemann-Kammerorchester, 1976.

Zohn, Steven. "Telemann, Georg Philipp." In The New Grove Dictionary of Music Online. Edited by L. Macy. <http://www.grovemusic.com/>.

WILLIAM T. FLYNN

TELEVANGELISM

The new communications technologies of the twentieth century challenged the Protestant, especially evangelical, understandings of the Great Commission, ultimately resulting in the massive proliferation of television ministries, often referred to collectively as the “Electronic Church.” The flamboyant early twentieth-century revivalist BILLY SUNDAY, although active before the advent of television, anticipated the methods of later televangelists by measuring the economic costs of bringing souls to Christ. Television dropped the costs of God’s saving GRACE, at least in the minds of televangelical pioneers, through large potential audiences. The transition from tent REVIVALS to television, however, necessitated changes in the way televangelists presented the Gospel. Driven by financial imperatives and the need to purchase broadcast time, televangelists developed styles of programming that, although individually unique, relied heavily on continuous financial appeals. Moreover, the large influx of funds combined with often secretive and careless accounting standards resulted in suggestions of corruption. Besides accountability problems and other moral improprieties, however, a group of televangelists began garnering attention for their active role in national politics beginning in the late 1970s. Despite the mostly unfavorable attention televangelism has received, it has survived, albeit with a changing cast of characters. Finally, although its potential audience of regular viewers and contributors appears finite, its cultural and political influence appears disproportionate to its numerical base because of both its own media strength and the sense of panic its activities trigger among its secular detractors.

The Rise of the Electronic Church: Historical Elements

Evangelists have typically used new methods and technologies as quickly as these could be harnessed, despite the occasional reservations of evangelical laypersons and critics within the mainline churches. The Second Great AWAKENING (c. 1800–1860), for example, witnessed the rise of a phenomenon known as urban revivalism, which allowed talented evangelists to reach larger audiences. The first of these, CHARLES GRANDISON FINNEY (1792–1875), introduced new measures, or techniques designed to win converts more effectively. Finney also organized his revivals to an extent previously unknown, especially through his use of advance publicity. Finney’s successors, DWIGHT L. MOODY (1837–1899) and Billy Sunday (1862–1935), further augmented Finney’s techniques with musical performances, vaudeville entertainment, and an urgent sense of “the soon coming of Christ.” Sunday further rationalized Moody’s methods, actually organizing his ministry around the belief that it cost $2 to save a soul.

Such rational calculation in business matters, combined with emotional and dramatic presentations of the Gospel, prepared the stage for broadcast ministries.

Evangelical broadcasters, however, met with resistance from regulatory agencies and mainline churches. The government's initial reluctance to provide time for evangelical broadcasts can be traced to several factors, although two personalities had much to do with federal decisions. AIMEE SEMPLE MCPHERSON, the famed INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL revivalist, dominated the airwaves with her radio broadcasts and even refused orders from secretary of commerce Herbert Hoover to desist from broadcasting because of her unregulated use of radio bandwidth. Hoover, however, lacked sufficient authority to implement his directive. McPherson's defiance, along with the increasingly radical political statements of another broadcaster, Father Charles Coughlin, necessitated tighter control of the airwaves by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). Established by the Communications Act of 1934, the FCC created a special category of broadcast time for edifying programming called "sustaining," or "free time." Stations and networks allotted this time through the mainline Federal, later NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (NCC) to mainline broadcasters who provided inoffensive programming to fill the required slots, continuing a tradition begun in 1928 with the relationship between the NBC network and mainline churches. Most stations also proved reluctant to sell time outright; thus evangelical broadcasters found themselves scrambling for airtime.

The first religious television broadcasts occurred on Easter Sunday 1940, with the airing of Catholic and Protestant services. In 1952 Bishop Fulton J. Sheen, who officiated the Catholic broadcast, became the first religious figure to offer a regular program, the Emmy-award winning "Life is Worth Living." Although Bishop Sheen benefited from network sponsorship, evangelical broadcasters required more startup capital and advocacy. To help obtain the necessary airtime evangelical broadcasters formed the National Religious Broadcasters (NRB) in 1944, a group that gained increasing clout as a Washington lobby. By 1953 televangelist Rex Humbard began broadcasting to local stations in Ohio, and ORAL ROBERTS interrupted his tent revivals to broadcast on January 10, 1954. JERRY FALWELL rounded out the triumvirate of evangelical broadcast pioneers in 1957, and his "Old Time Gospel Hour" helped launch Liberty University along with his later political ambitions.

Several landmark changes beginning in the 1960s marked the end of the NCC's dominance of religious broadcasting. First, the FCC ruled in 1960 that no difference existed between "paid-time" and "sustainingtime," at least as required by FCC regulations for edifying programming. This meant, in practice, that networks could sell their allotments of sustaining time at significant profit while still fulfilling FCC requirements. Mainline denominations could not afford such luxuries; but televangelists, relying on extensive donor support, could. Second, the development of tape in the early 1960s allowed broadcast distribution and syndication. Finally, by the 1970s satellite and cable distribution became possible, which further allowed the proliferation of the Gospel over the nation's airwaves.

Televangelism: Personalities, Messages, and Audiences

Among the televangelical superstars, BILLY GRAHAM stands most prominent, although his crusades appear only irregularly as media events. Nevertheless, he typically appears in prime time, a practice few televangelists can afford. The next tier includes the other pioneers of the 1950s: Falwell, Humbard, and Roberts. PAT ROBERTSON joined this group with the purchase of a defunct UHF station in 1959 in Portsmouth, Virginia for far less than its market value. His flagship program, “The 700 Club,” although initiated by Jim Bakker, became a staple of religious programming, helping Robertson build a cable television empire, Regent University, and, ultimately, the Christian Coalition. Jim and Tammy Faye Bakker launched their own cable network in the 1970s, and their “Praise the Lord” program regularly drew hundreds of thousands of viewers until the Bakkers’ scandalous collapse in 1987. Much the same could be said of Jimmy Swaggart, whose rise in the 1970s was equaled by his rapid decline after a series of sex scandals. Robert Schuller completed the list of early heavyweights with his message of positive thinking gleaned from noted optimist NORMAN VINCENT PEALE of the Marble Collegiate Church in New York City. The only mainline televangelist with a significant following, Schuller is best known for his “Crystal Cathedral” in Garden Grove, California, an all-glass edifice complete with drive-in stalls for cars, hearkening back to Schuller’s humble beginnings preaching on the roof of a snack bar at a drive-in theater.

Current celebrities include Paul and Jan Crouch, whose own cable and satellite ministry, the Trinity Broadcasting Network (TBN), has grown into a televangelical empire, providing airtime for almost every major televangelist. TBN has also moved aggressively into international markets, buying stations and beaming broadcasts to an ever-expanding list of countries. Benny Hinn appears frequently on TBN, broadcasting miracle crusades from across the country that feature Hinn’s healing powers. Kenneth Copeland, also a noted healer and former pilot of Oral Roberts, appears often on TBN’s only rival, the DayStar Network founded in 1997 by Marcus and Joni Lamb.

Among the multitude of programs, one can trace five basic formats, excepting church broadcasts that remain mostly local phenomena: revival crusades that often feature live music and healing, talk-show formats modeled after “The Tonight Show,” prophecy programs that highlight current events as “signs of the times,” newsmagazines that resemble major network morning news programs, and a fifth category characterized by its familiarity and “living room” feel. Billy Graham and Jimmy Swaggart have both used the crusade format with great success. Jim Bakker’s defunct “Praise the Lord” program featured him as an evangelical Johnny Carson, mixing in the country-gospel melodies of Tammy Faye. Jack van Impe’s weekly broadcasts interpret news headlines in light of his eschatological perspectives. Pat Robertson’s “700 Club” has perfected the newsmagazine format, featuring a slick newscast that leads off the program before the anchorperson turns to Robertson for his interpretation of world events. Co-hosted by Terry Meeuwson, the “700 Club” also spotlights testimonials of CONVERSION and miraculous deliverance from sickness and debt, along with “soft” segments that deal with mundane topics such as cooking and investment strategies. TBN's "Praise the Lord" program best typifies the fifth format, as guests make themselves at home amid an elaborate, nouveau riche rococo backdrop that suggests material success, with participants alternating between PRAYER, prophecy, discussions of current events, and an occasional country-gospel performance.

Despite the diversity of formats, however, the program content remains somewhat homogeneous. Most, with the exception of Graham and Swaggart, suggest that Christians ought to have abundant success in this world. Kenneth Copeland claims the believer can be freed from the demons of disease, whereas Oral Roberts, to name just one example, believes in "seed faith" and "giving out of one's need." That is, if one lacks sufficient material success, one ought to give to the televangelist who will ensure that God will provide a positive turn on the "seed," or investment. A second pervasive theme of televangelism is its conservative political content. Although not all ministries adopt such political tones, Pat Robertson, Jerry Falwell, and James Robison, especially, have acted centrally in the development of the so-called Religious or CHRISTIAN RIGHT.

Program audiences tend to be disproportionately female. Jimmy Swaggart did best among male viewers, at least before his departure, despite a two-to-one female-to-male ratio. The elderly are also overrepresented, tuning in especially to Jimmy Swaggart, along with prosperity programs like those of Oral Roberts, and, more recently, TBN. Pat Robertson's "700 Club" reverses the age trend somewhat, attracting many younger viewers, attributed in part to the high production values and content geared toward working professionals. Minorities are also overrepresented, along with those on the economic and social margins. Finally, viewers tend to concentrate in the South. Robert Schuller, whose "Hour of Power" has done reasonably well on the West Coast and in the Midwest, provides a notable exception.

Controversies

Televangelism has been an object of controversy from its earliest days. Its heavy reliance on financial appeals has raised suspicions and many critics have suspected, and occasionally found, widespread fraud. The criticism of the Electronic Church seems at least partially validated by the embarrassing financial and sex scandals of Jim Bakker and Jimmy Swaggart in the late 1980s. Moreover the same period also witnessed Oral Roberts's increasingly intense appeals for funds, including his vision in 1980 of a 900-foot Jesus who commanded him to raise funds for a new hospital, along with his 1987 claim that God would "call him home" if he failed to raise $8 million for the project. Combined with the high-profile scandals of lesser figures like Robert Tilton, whose ministry collapsed after the 1991 airing of a Prime Time Live expose, audience shares fell dramatically by 1992.

The entry of televangelists into national POLITICS in 1980 proved even more alarming to its critics. After James Robison and a consortium of televangelists unofficially blessed the presidential candidacy of Ronald Reagan at the National Affairs Briefing in Dallas, Texas, critics became shrill in their assaults on the Electronic Church.

Jerry Falwell's MORAL MAJORITY helped consolidate a cross section of conservative Protestantism to further their mutual political interests, intensifying the anxieties of many on the left. Even Pat Robertson's failed bid for the Republican nomination in 1988 led to a more powerful political entity, the Christian Coalition, which by 1992 became a major force within the Republican Party.

Beyond money and politics, however, some critics have charged that the Electronic Church has not only failed to follow the Great Commission but, through its application of a rational, businesslike calculus to spiritual matters, has cheapened the grace it purports to dispense. Critic Quentin J. Schultze, who has conducted extensive studies of the Electronic Church from both sociological and theological perspectives, has also questioned whether the mere presence of the Electronic Church has weakened the creedal emphasis and theological gravity of nonbroadcast ministries. Noting the increasing de-emphasis of THEOLOGY in evangelical churches in favor of entertainment ministries, Schultze fears that new generations of Evangelicals, raised at least partially on TV PREACHING, will demand less substance and more style, mirroring the inherent limitations of the televisual format. Such claims will require time to evaluate as cultural trends develop. Nevertheless, Schultze's charges seem more apt than the cynical observations of those who perceive rampant hucksterism. On the contrary, as Schultze notes, televangelists for the most part are probably sincere in their beliefs, which may, ironically, intensify the allegedly harmful effects they have on more traditional theologies and styles of WORSHIP.

Conclusions

Despite aggressive international expansion, televangelism persists as a distinctly American phenomenon, enduring despite periodic scandals. New figures continue to emerge, and even veterans like Pat Robertson strive to reinvent themselves, adapting to ever-changing audience demands. This audience, however, appears finite. Although it is inconclusive whether electronic ministries siphon funds from brick-and-mortar ministries, televangelists do seem to compete against each other for a limited supply of potential donors. Nevertheless, the electronic church perseveres because, in spite of its critics, it does appear to provide a service to some that brick-and-mortar churches either cannot or will not provide. In a spiritual economy the donations flow to those who best meet the needs of consumers; and televangelism, built on a business ethos, rapidly perceives and adapts to those needs. This is both its strength and a major source of its criticisms. Nevertheless, like its revivalist forebears who rankled the sensibilities of established churches, televangelism will continue as a unique blend of American pragmatism and popular entertainment, combined with the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Thus while critics may decry it as fraudulent or even idolatrous, it will likely endure so long as pious viewers find benefit in its programming. Whether it furthers the Great Commission and preaches to more than the choir, however, remains unclear.

See also Evangelicalism; Evangelism, Overview; Faith Healing; Mass Media

References and Further Reading

- Frankl, Razelle. Televangelism: The Marketing of Popular Religion. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1987.
- Hadden, Jeffrey K. "The Rise and Fall of American Televangelism." The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 527 (May 1993):113–130.
- , and Anson Shupe. Televangelism: Power and Politics on God's Frontier. New York: Henry Holt, 1988.
- , and Charles E.Swann. Prime Time Preachers: The Rising Power of Televangelism. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1981.
- Harding, Susan Friend. The Book of Jerry Falwell: Fundamentalist Language and Politics. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2000.
- Horsfield, Peter G. Religious Television: The American Experience, New York: Longman, 1984.
- Martin, William. With God on Our Side: The Rise of the Religious Right in America. New York: Broadway Books, 1996.
- Melton, J.Gordon, Phillip Charles Lucas, and Jon R.Stone. Prime-Time Religion: An Encyclopedia of Religious Broadcasting. Phoenix, AZ: Oryx Press, 1997.
- Peck, Janice. The Gods of Televangelism: The Crisis of Meaning and the Appeal of Religious Television. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press, 1993.
- Schultze, Quentin J. Televangelism and American Culture: The Business of Popular Religion. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1991.

GLENN W.SHUCK

TEMPERANCE

When the ship Arabella came into port in the Massachusetts Colony in 1630, the new settlers unloaded 10,000 gallons of beer and 12 gallons of distilled spirits, and this was only the communal supply. Each family had packed its own liquor and home-brewing equipment. Although a few of the Puritan colonial governments passed laws against excessive drinking, colonial New Englanders in general tranquilly imbibed their rum in moderation. Kentucky and Pennsylvania frontier settlers swilled their corn and bourbon whiskey, the latter, supposedly, first produced by a minister. Although the Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF) had taken an early temperance stand (seen in minister Elizabeth Levis's temperance pamphlet of 1761), churched and unchurched Americans generally viewed alcohol as essential as bread and safer than water. Men, women, and even children downed their "toddlies" at breakfast, had "eleveners" at mid-day instead of tea, and sipped their afternoon whiskey "drams." In the mid-1800s, after the arrival of hundreds of thousands of German immigrants and major technological advances in mechanical refrigeration and integrated transportation, beer became the all-American drink of choice, especially lager beer.

After the Revolutionary War, some elites in the newly established nation feared that the people lacked the self-control necessary to handle an experiment in democracy. Religious, political, and economic leaders feared the fine line between democracy and anarchy. For "rule by the people" to work, the people had to be self-restrained, disciplined, educated, and focused. A little alcohol-induced pleasure was good—even necessary—when the colonials faced British oppression, but a keen mind and strong body would be needed to keep the fledgling democracy afloat.

Changing Attitudes

Medical authorities provided the theoretical grounding for this shift in attitude toward alcohol, but it was evangelical CLERGY who launched the "temperance" movement into a major reform crusade. In his pamphlet An Inquiry into the Effects of Ardent Spirits Upon the Human Body and Mind (1784), Dr. Benjamin Rush reversed conventional wisdom by pronouncing distilled liquor bad for human health. Protestant clergy carried this torch of medical discovery into the moral and political sphere. About the time of the Second Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS), with its perfectionist message that humans could hasten the coming millennium by improving themselves morally, well-known preachers like LYMAN BEECHER gave sermons on the biblical basis for temperance. Evangelical clergymen led the way in forming organizations to promote temperance, the most widespread being the American Temperance Society (ATS), founded in 1826. Basing its organization closely on evangelical tract and missionary societies, the ATS spread its gospel of temperance via the spoken and written word. It sent out itinerant temperance speakers to organize local auxiliaries and deluged the country with temperance tracts and a weekly newspaper. Temperance as an issue transcended doctrinal infighting, bringing white Protestants together around their common interest in moral reformation and national prosperity. By 1835, the ATS reached a peak of 1.5 million members, possibly as many as one in five free adults. The membership was varied in age and gender, with about 50 percent female and a significant contingent of young men in college as a result of campus REVIVALS that combined Christianity and abstinence in the call to CONVERSION.

In the 1830s, the ATS became a largely middle-class movement when it changed its abstinence pledge from a focus on distilled liquors (aimed at the poor) to include a pledge against wine (aimed at the upper classes). Members from the upper classes rejected this new “teetotalism” of the renamed American Temperance Union (ATU), and a significant number of clergy and lay people also rejected teetotalism, but for a different reason: its impact on their communion, or LORD’S SUPPER, service. For example, although the Methodist Episcopal Church strongly advocated temperance, it did not accept the substitution of unfermented wine in communion until fifty years later, in 1880.

Teetotalism caused the Protestant-initiated movement to fragment during the 1840s, but a new type of temperance group emerged to renew enthusiasm. In 1840, six working-class, unchurched tavern drinkers founded the Washingtonians, the first temperance group among the poor and working classes. Most of the Protestants who joined the Washingtonian societies came from Methodist and Baptist churches; conspicuously absent were the Congregational, Unitarian, and Presbyterian clergymen who had led the early temperance movement.

Cultural Weapons

Almost all of the temperance efforts until the 1850s focused on moral suasion. In addition to formal societies, the temperance message spread through popular culture, usually according to heavily Protestant plots and narratives that positioned conversion and piety as the solutions to intemperance. Temperance literature hit the print market as popular authors like Timothy Shay Arthur, Louisa May Alcott, E.D. E.N. Southworth, and others gave the country heroes and heroines who eschewed booze or courageously recovered from it. Arthur’s “Ten Nights in a Barroom” (1854) sold millions of copies and was a Broadway blockbuster even in the early 1900s. In this pathos-packed story, Joe Morgan’s life is ruined because evil saloon-keeper Simon Slade gets him hooked on booze. Joe finally turns his life around after Slade accidentally kills Joe’s daughter, little Mary Morgan, in a saloon brawl. There were visual images as well: “Drunkard’s Progress” (1846) by Nathaniel Currier etched into people’s minds the steps of degeneration from “first glass to drunkard’s grave.” The well-dressed man sips a glass of whiskey with a friend in the first frame and by the last frame, he has suffered jail (for robbery and rioting), disease, unemployment, humiliation of his family, loss of friends, poverty, and suicide.

This massive cultural assault against liquor, combined with the influx of Italian, German, and Russian immigrants, convinced many native-born Protestants that moral suasion alone would never solve the problem of intemperance. In 1851, Maine was the first state to make the sale of liquor illegal, and several other states followed with similar laws. The temperance movement's shift from moral suasion to legal coercion provoked thousands of evangelical Protestant women to join, and eventually take over, the temperance movement.

Although the male temperance fraternities (the Sons of Temperance, founded in 1842, and the Independent Order of Good Templars, founded in 1851) revived after the CIVIL WAR, it was female temperance activism that flourished between 1873 and 1901. Protestant women, including Annie Wittenmyer (first president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union) and Mother Eliza Stewart (leader of the Woman's Temperance Crusade), served as federally appointed "sanitation" leaders during the Civil War and found they liked public leadership. Temperance work, they discovered, was an "acceptable" arena for them to continue their public advocacy. Because evangelical Protestantism had pedestalized WOMEN as the morally superior sex, women in the Northeast and Midwest used this to their own advantage when critics accused them of moving out of their "proper" sphere. Temperance, they replied, was a moral problem requiring legal action, and the best solution lay in the work of the morally superior sex.

A Women's Movement

In the Woman's Crusade of 1873–1874, hundreds of thousands of women in thirty-one states marched in bands to pray and sing in front of local saloons. Women usually sought to avoid saloons by crossing the street or detouring for blocks. When they had to enter a saloon to purchase milk or other items, they would use the discreet "ladies' entrance." But the Woman's Crusade marchers went right to the front doors. They had an axe to grind (sometimes literally) with saloons, because women tended to suffer the most from excessive drinking. An alcoholic husband had the legal right to liquidate all communally held property, as well as his and his wife's wages in the saloons. Drunken men frequently beat or abandoned their wives and, because of the saloon's reliance on prostitution as a drawing card to clients, they also passed on syphilis and gonorrhea to their wives. If not threatened at home by a violent or negligent alcoholic male, women faced the threat in streets where they were often physically and verbally harassed. Drunken rowdies even disrupted church services by making commotion in the aisles or hurling bottles through the windows. Women were virtually powerless over the quality of their own and their children's lives, and they were barred by law or custom from divorcing inebriate husbands. Without the ballot, they could not vote against the liquor industry either. Women were eyewitnesses to the way that saloons, as they believed, caused the irreversible degeneration of men and boys. Saloon-smasher Carry Nation saw her first husband go to an early grave, leaving her in poverty, because of a saloon in her hometown's Masonic lodge. Eliza Thompson, the revered leader of the Woman's Crusade of 1873, grieved the loss of her minister son, who died in an asylum for "inebriates."

The saloons, in addition to ruining their lives and livelihoods, reinscribed women's political marginalization, because they served as clearinghouses for underground exchanges of money and favors to which women did not have access. They were bastions of male privilege. Saloons also were often used as polling stations, where unknowing wanderers enticed inside for a drink could be persuaded to vote a certain way. In New York City during the late nineteenth century, more than one-half of the nominating conventions held by major parties occurred in saloons. The saloons also symbolized the rise of male leisure and a growing commercialism that tapped into it. Already alienated from the market economy and lagging behind men in "leisure" consumption, women were angry at the saloons for further cordoning off spaces of male privilege and taking the men (and their money) away from the family.

The greatest contribution of the 1873–1874 Woman's Crusade was its galvanization of women into the first mass organization of women, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU). The WCTU was founded in 1874 by Protestant women, many of them connected through the Methodist-initiated summer Chautauqua program. By the late nineteenth century, the WCTU outnumbered all other women's politically oriented organizations, including all of the various national suffrage associations combined. Unlike the suffrage organizations, the WCTU did not permit male sympathizers or affiliates to vote; it was an organization run by women for women. Under the leadership of President FRANCES WILLARD (1879–1898) and her "do everything" policy, the WCTU added many other reforms to its temperance agenda, including suffrage—an agenda that further made it impossible for conservative Protestant Southern women to join. The WCTU functioned as a political training school where women learned about constitutional law, petitioning, lobbying, partisan politics, public speaking, organizing marches, planning large meetings, labor issues, infrastructure, public education, advertising, and more. The WCTU paper admonished members to own three books: "the Bible, a copy of the state laws, and a copy of the city laws."

Most women entered the WCTU because it was a religiously inspired effort to promote the moral virtues of temperance and purity. But once in the WCTU, many initially conservative women began to work for progressive reforms like suffrage, welfare, sanitation, and child labor laws. Historians debate whether the WCTU ultimately liberated women or simply reinforced conventional GENDER roles, but clearly in many cases, the WCTU empowered women to assert policy and legislation that they believed would liberate their sex from the clutches of liquor-lubricated oppression. Without a doubt, the organization never lost its original religious inspiration. Even though efforts were made to include Catholic women and unchurched women, the WCTU remained an "arm" of the Protestant churches. Significantly, whereas most Protestant denominations did not ordain women into the preaching ministry until the mid-twentieth century, the WCTU gave those with an aptitude and desire to preach the opportunity to have a career as an "evangelist" or "lecturer," and many women discovered their aptitude for PREACHING through lecturing on temperance. Mabel Madeline Southard, for example, was the only female member of the ministerial association at her college. But when she graduated and realized that she would not be given a Methodist Episcopal pastorate like all of her male colleagues, she entered the WCTU to work as an “evangelist.”

Drive to Prohibition

The WCTU was at the forefront of temperance advocacy during the 1880s, joining other organizations, including the Prohibition Party, to fight for national prohibition. But the prohibition movement became divided over procedure and goals, especially in the 1890s. Some activists were “abolitionists,” whose goal was immediate abolishment of the entire liquor industry because it was seen as a moral and social evil and the main cause of other problems such as poverty, disease, and corruption. These radical reformers also tended to be “broad gaugers,” uniting around a constellation of reforms like women’s suffrage and pro-gressive taxation. They expressed impatience with the “regulationists” like the Anti-Saloon League (ASL), who sought to work within existing political structures to regulate liquor consumption and keep the liquor industry in check through licensing. Unlike all of the other temperance organizations, the ASL had a single goal: prohibition. Founded in 1893 by Congregationalist minister Howard Hyde Russell, the ASL rose to dominate the temperance movement in the early 1900s. Most historians credit the ASL’s lobbying, single-mindedness, and local-option gradualism with achieving the Eighteenth Amendment, which was finally ratified in 1919. The Protestant churches played a key role in the success of the ASL. Whereas the Prohibition Party had become so alienated from the Protestant denominations that it formed its own “prohibition churches” during the 1890s, the ASL aligned itself with the Protestant churches, describing itself as “the Church in Action Against the Saloon.” Threefifths of the ASL leadership was composed of Protestant clergymen, and they relied on local pastors to build up the League’s grassroots organization. Cooperating churches set aside one Sunday each month for an ASL “field day” at which representatives solicited pledges and gave reports on the progress of the movement.

After a successful campaign effort to have Republican Herbert Hoover elected over the “wet” Democratic (and Catholic) candidate Al Smith in 1928, the ASL lost influence. The economic crisis shifted attention away from alcohol as the burning issue. Americans voted in Franklin D. Roosevelt, a wet, for the economic recovery he promised, knowing that he favored repealing national prohibition. The Twenty-First Amendment was ratified in 1933.

New Methods

Thereafter, the most influential efforts to address drinking steered away from both moral suasion and legal coercion, focusing instead on a fusion of selfimprovement and loosely defined spirituality. Certainly many Pentecostal, Fundamentalist, and Evangelical Protestant churches preached abstinence throughout the twentieth century; however, they usually limited their preachments about alcohol to their own members. As with many aspects of social and political life in an increasingly religiously diverse society, Protestants had to give up their custodial role regarding American drinking habits. Secularized “experts” in a burgeoning treatment industry took over the mantle of alcohol awareness and recovery; nonetheless, segments of this industry bore the marks of the spiritual origins of temperance concerns.

Alcoholics Anonymous (AA) invites people with drinking problems to rely on their “higher power” for help in overcoming addiction, as well as faithfully attend meetings and be accountable to another person who has achieved sobriety. AA was founded in 1935 by Wall Street businessman Bill Wilson and Dr. Robert Smith after Wilson had experienced a spiritual awakening in a hospital for alcoholics. The founders drew heavily from the evangelical Protestant movement called the Oxford Group (later called MORAL REARMAMENT). For example, Wilson and Smith incorporated several of the Oxford Group’s practices: the self-survey, confession, amends to those harmed by one’s actions, service to others, and sense of group support. But Wilson and Smith avoided those aspects that turned people off, such as the pressure to make a religious commitment and the requirement to identify oneself. By the late 1970s, AA claimed some 1 million active members worldwide, including 350,000 in the United States.

The popularity of AA rose at the same time that drinking became more and more widespread, with abstinence decreasing from 45 percent of the adult population in 1959 to 29 percent in 1977. In previous times, Protestants would have blamed such low abstinence rates for social chaos, family breakdown, and economic malaise. The failure of national prohibition changed this. However, although late twentieth-century Protestants rarely mentioned alcohol, they did carry on the temperance crusade’s legacy of political and legal coercion to advance their position on a variety of moral issues, from ABORTION to same-sex marriage to the legalization of drugs. The issue changed, but the strategy of legislating morality remained.

See also Evangelism

References and Further Reading

- Bader, Robert Smith. Prohibition in Kansas. Lawrence, KS: University of Kansas Press, 1986.
- Blocker, Jack Jr. “Give to the Winds Thy Fears”: Woman’s Temperance Crusade, 1873–1874. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1985.
- . American Temperance Movements: Cycles of Reform. Boston, MA: Twayne Publishers, 1989.
- Bordin, Ruth. Woman and Temperance: The Quest for Power and Liberty, 1873–1900. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1981.
- Crowley, John, ed. Drunkard’s Progress: Narratives of Addiction, Despair, and Recovery. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1999.
- Fahey, David. Temperance and Racism: John Bull, Johnny Reb, and the Good Templars. Lexington, KY: University Press of Kentucky, 1996.
- Grace, Fran. Carry A. Nation: Retelling the Life. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2001.

- Gusfield, James. Status Politics and the American Temperance Movement. Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1963.
- Kerr, Austin. Organized for Reform: A New History of the Anti-Saloon League. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1985.
- Parker, Alison M. Purifying America: Women, Cultural Reform, and Pro Censorship Activism, 1873–1933. Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1997.
- Pegram, Thomas. Battling Demon Rum: The Struggle for a Dry America, 1800–1933. Chicago, IL: Ivan Dee, 1998.

FRAN GRACE

TEMPLE, FREDERICK (1821–1902)

Archbishop of Canterbury. Noted for his involvement in some of the most controversial issues facing the Victorian Church, Frederick Temple was born on November 30, 1821 in Santa Maura (Lefkada) in the Greek Ionian Islands. He was educated at Balliol College, Oxford and ordained to the Anglican priesthood in 1847. His early career as an educational reformer culminated with his appointment as headmaster of the prestigious public school at Rugby in 1857.

Temple contributed the lead article to the controversial Essays and Reviews, a collection of works by noted Anglican liberals published in 1860 to the dismay of traditional churchmen. The article gained Temple a reputation as a liberal and caused some public embarrassment when he was elevated to the bishopric of Exeter in 1869. As bishop he supported the Education Act of 1870 and, in 1884, delivered the Bampton Lectures at Oxford on religion and science, an attempt to reconcile orthodox Christian beliefs with DARWINISM. In 1885 Temple was consecrated bishop of London and, in 1897, was elevated to the archbishopric of CANTERBURY, where he served until his death on December 22, 1902. Frederick Temple married Beatrice Blanche in 1876 and had two sons, including WILLIAM (b. 1881), who was also archbishop of Canterbury from 1942 to 1944 and was one of the most prominent Anglican churchmen of the twentieth century.

Frederick Temple's active career spanned an important period in the history of the English Church when Christianity was confronted with the challenges of modernization and unbelief. He participated in debates over such issues as the relationship between religion and science, the role of the Christian churches in public education, the relationship between the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and the Roman Catholic Church, and the nature of Anglican ritual. Temple was essentially a moderate who attempted to reconcile modernist trends in Victorian CULTURE with orthodox ANGLICANISM and a conservative acceptance of ecclesiastical AUTHORITY.

See also Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Modernism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Temple, Frederick. The Relations between Religion and Science. New York: Macmillan, 1884.

Secondary Sources:

Hinchliff, Peter. Frederick Temple, Archbishop of Canterbury. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Sandford, E.G., ed. Memoirs of Archbishop Temple by Seven Friends. London: Macmillan, 1906.
RICHARD J.JANET

TEMPLE, WILLIAM (1881–1944)

Archbishop of Canterbury. Of all the archbishops of Canterbury, William Temple has been described as the most distinguished successor to St. Anselm. He was born in the Bishop's Palace in Exeter on October 15, 1881; and apart from brief terms as fellow and lecturer in Queen's College, headmaster of Repton School, as rector of St. James, Piccadilly, and head of the Life and Liberty Movement, he lived most of his life in bishop's palaces. In 1916 he and Frances Anson were married. After a brief canonry at Westminster he was consecrated bishop of Manchester in 1921, and enthroned as archbishop of York in 1929. At the time of his death on October 26, 1944, he was archbishop of Canterbury. He is buried alongside his father, FREDERICK TEMPLE, in the cloisters of Canterbury Cathedral; they are the only father and son to sit on St. Augustine's throne.

Natively brilliant and classically trained, he was the author of more than fifty books and a vastly larger number of essays. The master influences on his life, he said, were Plato, St. John, and ROBERT BROWNING. His lifelong socialist convictions were developed while an Oxford undergraduate in Balliol College, and his philosophical theology begins with a view "far nearer to Materialism than Idealism."

In the nineteenth century "natural theology" consisted of thought about God conducted without reference to the BIBLE, whereas "revealed religion" was human response to the self-disclosure of God as contained in the Bible. By the 1930s, when Temple delivered his Gifford Lectures, this distinction had been changed, and concern had shifted from the "content" of particular beliefs to the "method" that underwrote and supported them. Is the Bible itself the revelation, or the record of revelation? Is revelation in the book or the events recorded in the book? Temple's answer was succinct: plainly revelation cannot be in the book unless first in the events recorded in the book. Revelation, in his view, does not consist in propositional truths about God; instead, it is the "coincidence of divine event and human appreciation," and must incorporate both communication and apprehension. What is offered, therefore, in any specific revelation is not a truth concerning the subject, but the living subject him/herself.

Temple held that philosophy attempts a problem—to construct a conception of God (or "Mind") equal to the universe, whereas THEOLOGY attempts a theorem—to show that God is equal to the universe. Were philosophy able to achieve its goal of a single system, explanatory of the world, we would have a theistic worldview. However, philosophy cannot achieve its goal because it confronts a world over whose destiny we appear to have little control. The most important question, therefore, inquires about the nature and character of that AUTHORITY that does order and control the world process.

Yielding that question to sheer ratio, Temple believed, results in frustration and uncertainty because we cannot comprehend the full range of experience and fact. Lacking that comprehensiveness and clarity, the philosophical method of intellection is driven back on itself and readied, through despair, for the answer that Christian theism posits.

While at Repton School Temple wrote in Religious Experience and Other Essays and Addresses (1913): “The whole of my theology is an attempt to understand and verify the words, ‘He that hath seen me hath seen the Father’” (p. 21); and four years later the first book of the trilogy that would define his theology was published.

Mens Creatrix (1917) was Temple’s response to Henri Bergson’s Creative Evolution. It was his philosophical attempt to show that the Christian Incarnation supplies the central point: actual belief in a living God rests primarily on religious experience, but it finds intellectual support because it is a belief that is capable of supplying an explanation of purpose in the universe, which no other hypothesis available to us offers any hope of doing. Temple’s theism is dialectical, resting on a convergence of both philosophy and religious experience, rationality, and faith.

Temple’s CHRISTOLOGY is more concerned about the character of God than the identity of the historical Jesus. In Christus Veritas (1924), the theological companion to Mens Creatrix, he argued that the human search for meaning finds its answer only in the central event of Incarnation. Although rejecting any form of external compulsion, Temple nevertheless believed that the miracle of Incarnation—because it offers persons a reference for meaning, purpose, and value that is other than themselves—is (almost!) irresistibly attractive. One does not worship a principle, and Jesus Christ’s “human personality is actually the self-expression of the Eternal Son” (pp. 150–151). Temple graphically represented the many points of human experience as on the circumference of a circle, all of which point inward in search of a unifying core postulate that, in turn, points outward to embrace the entire circumference of the circle. That core postulate is Jesus Christ who emancipates us from failed attempts to discover for ourselves our own raison d’être: “You could not cure yourself; but God has offered the means of your cure in Christ.”

Temple’s Gifford Lectures, Nature, Man and God (1934) laid out his “dialectical realism.” In it he argued for personal theism by beginning with the world as offered by science and, thereafter, showing how only a special revelation of the God who is both immanent and transcendent makes it finally intelligible. Reality exists in a series of ascending and descending grades or strata; and he employed a Platonic motif to describe a perceptible scale of reality that ranged “from mere inorganic matter at one end, through organic matter, vegetable life, animal life, to personality as we know it in human life” (Muirhead 1925:214).

“Matter, life, mind, and spirit” were his abbreviated categories for this continuous whole. In his scheme the lower forms are necessary to the actualization of the higher ones, whereas, coincidentally, the lower forms find their purpose and meaning only when employed by a higher one as the instrument of its self-expression. These strata were presided over by what he called “personality” or “intelligent purpose,” which provides the “governing principle” of the world process. Mind is purposive when it no longer merely adjusts itself to its environment but adjusts its environment to its own ends.

Experience is thus always of the real world; and mind, when conscious, is always engaged directly in apprehending reality. This basic correspondence of mind with reality is the core postulate for value inasmuch as it is good to know the real. Things do not possess value as an extended attribute of a knowing mind; value in real objects is primarily in the object. Still, value qua value is latent until actualized by an appreciating subject, and value only becomes actual in and through subjective appreciation of the value of an object. Value is a relational category that signifies that what is given to us in experience is the value of an object and a value for the subject.

A further clue from this ontology, epistemology, and axiology is what Temple calls the “sacramental universe,” in which the apparent good is also the real good and where the “material” has been made a vehicle for the “spiritual.” On these terms “inward and spiritual grace” is conveyed only through matter, and the sacraments are “real” because they are not dependent on psychological verification or validation for their efficacy.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Temple, William. Basic Convictions. London: Harper Brothers, 1936.
———. Christianity and Social Order. New York: Penguin Books, 1942.
———. Christus Veritas. London: Macmillan and Company, Ltd., 1924.
———. Mens Creatrix. London: Macmillan and Company, Ltd., 1917.
———. Nature, Man and God. London: Macmillan and Company, 1935.
———. Nazi Massacres of the Jews and Others. London: V. Gallancz, 1943.
———. Readings in St. John's Gospel 2 vols. London: Macmillan and Company, 1949.
———. Religious Experience and Other Essays and Addresses. 1913.

Secondary Sources:

- Baker, A.E., ed. William Temple's Teaching. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1951.
Iremonger, F.I. William Temple, Archbishop of Canterbury: His Life and Letters. London: Oxford University Press, 1948.
Muirhead, J.H. Contemporary British Philosophy. London: Allen & Unwin; New York: Macmillan, 1924–1925.

HARMON L.SMITH

TENNENT, GILBERT (1703–1764)

Presbyterian minister and Great Awakening evangelist. Tennent was born in IRELAND, the oldest, most gifted son of a Scotch-Irish minister who immigrated to Pennsylvania. Educated in his father's "log college," Gilbert received his M.A. from Yale and entered the Presbyterian ministry in 1725. The Scottish tradition of promoting REVIVALS through prolonged LORD'S SUPPER celebrations bore fruit in his New Jersey parish. Tennent led a minority group in the Philadelphia Presbytery, called the New Lights or New Side, which supported the AWAKENINGS and assessed ministerial candidates on personal piety rather than education.

Interaction with GEORGE WHITEFIELD further emboldened Tennent's demand for revival. The mounting tensions in the presbytery increased with Tennent's famous sermon of 1740 on "The Danger of an Unconverted Ministry," which derisively likened antirevival ministers to a "Man who would learn others to swim, before he has learn'd it himself." In 1741 Old Side pastors responded, enacting seven protestations expelling the New Lights. The Tennents and their supporters formed the conjoint presbyteries of New Brunswick and Londonberry, which later joined with the New York Presbytery to form the Synod of New York.

The Old Side/New Side schism lasted until 1758 with Tennent laying the groundwork for reunion and serving as the first moderator of the reunited synod. The fervor of the revivals waning, he backed off the extreme characterizations of his opponents, and in 1749 Tennent passionately argued for Christian union in "Irenicum Ecclesiasticum." Seeking middle ground, Tennent combined education with piety in the training of ministers. He left an institutional legacy in Princeton College, for which he and the Rev. SAMUEL DAVIES solicited the initial financial support in Great Britain.

See also Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

- Coalter, Milton J. Gilbert Tennent, Son of Thunder. New York: Greenwood Press, 1986.
 Fishburn, Janet F. "Gilbert Tennent, Established Dissenter." Church History 63 no. 1 (1994): 31–49.

STEPHEN R.BERRY

TENNYSON, ALFRED (1809–1892)

English poet. More than any other Victorian poet, Tennyson is remembered for struggles with religious FAITH and doubt. The son of an Anglican priest, Tennyson's Christianity was more intuitional and practical than doctrinal. He was only twenty-four when his closest friend from Cambridge, Arthur Hallam, a young man of brilliant promise, died in 1833. For the next seventeen years Tennyson, who shared the depressive tendencies of many of his family, fought to reconcile his grief with some kind of Christian belief. The result, In Memoriam, a series of over 100 short lyrics meditating on Hallam's death, his memory, the meaning of life, and the possibility of immortality in the light of new scientific discoveries in geology and paleontology, was an instant popular success. The tightly controlled verse form, combined with memorable and pithy phrases, produced some of the finest poetry of the period. Many of his lines, "Tis better to have loved and lost/Than never to have loved at all" and "Nature red in tooth and claw," have passed into the language.

Although it provided few answers, In Memoriam caught the then-current mood of metaphysical insecurity, as none of his other works, such as the Arthurian Idylls of the King, were to do; and its conclusion, that Hallam was a forerunner of a higher evolutionary type of humanity, seemed to offer a solution that was both scientifically and religiously satisfactory. In retrospect, after Darwin's Origin of Species (1859) had made Tennyson's Lamarckian evolution seem facilely optimistic, and the definition of "faith" as "believing where we cannot prove" was questioned, many saw the poems more in terms of expressive doubt than triumphant faith. Nevertheless, it gave Queen Victoria "inexpressible comfort" after the death of Prince Albert, and fame and royal patronage were assured—Tennyson reluctantly accepted both poet laureateship and, eventually, a peerage.

See also Darwinism; Death and Dying; Literature

References and Further Reading

- Henderson, Philip. Tennyson, Poet and Prophet. London: Routledge & K. Paul, 1978.
 Levi, Peter. Tennyson. London: Macmillan, 1993.
 Marshall, George O. A Tennyson Handbook. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1963.

STEPHEN PRICKETT

TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION

The Tetrapolitan Confession (Confessio Tetrapolitana), or “Confession of the Four Cities (Strasbourg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau),” was written by MARTIN BUCER and WOLFGANG CAPITO during the 1530 Augsburg Diet.

Emperor Charles V had convened the Augsburg Diet to deal with the REFORMATION controversy besetting the empire, pledging to “hear everybody’s opinion” in the matter. This prompted the various Protestant parties to consider drafting statements of their beliefs. MARTIN LUTHER and his Wittenberg colleagues prepared, at the request of Elector John of Saxony, a brief statement but quickly found (because of Johannes Eck’s 404 Theses) that they had to write a more lengthy Confession (the AUGSBURG CONFESSION). The delegates from Strasbourg, in an attempt to unite the Protestant free imperial cities in South Germany with the northern Protestant princes, hoped to secure their signatures to the Augsburg Confession. Because of political complications and distrust between the two factions over Holy Communion (see MARBURG, COLLOQUY OF), this proved impossible. Jacob Sturm, the lead Strasbourg delegate to the diet, hoped to overcome theological disagreement and called on Bucer and Capito in hopes that they might convince the princes to allow Strasbourg to sign the Augsburg Confession.

Bucer was an ideal candidate. Converted to the notion of theological reform by Luther in 1518 and a close theological ally of HULDRYCH ZWINGLI’S for a time, Bucer believed that unity was of the utmost importance and dedicated himself to its pursuit. Failing in their attempts to persuade the Lutheran theologians and forbidden by Elector John to sign the Augsburg Confession, the Strasbourg delegates were forced into writing their own confession. Bucer and Capito drafted the Tetrapolitan Confession, which purposefully mimicked PHILIPP MELANCHTHON’S Augsburg Confession. Even the article on Holy Communion (Article XVIII) was written in an attempt to persuade the Lutherans of the essential agreement of the Strasbourg position with their own. Ultimately only three other South German cities joined in their support of the Tetrapolitana; the Lutherans rejected it completely. Because it ultimately satisfied no one it was later replaced by other more specific Reformed Confessions.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Cochrane, Arthur C., ed. Reformed Confessions of the 16th Century. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1966.

Stupperich, Robert et al., eds. Martin Bucers Deutsche Schriften. Vol. 3, 13–185. Gütersloh, Germany: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1969.

DAVID M. WHITFORD

THEOLOGY

Protestant theology is faith seeking understanding, fides quaerens intellectum. It is a way of speaking of God that arises naturally from the biblical witness to God's saving presence in the world, and which thereby has as its ultimate origin God's Word, the crucified Christ. FAITH in this sense is God's gift of God's Son, in which gift lies the meaning of creation and of ourselves as God's creatures.

Faith seeking understanding is a definition of theology that was made famous by its appearance in the work of Anselm of CANTERBURY, but which comes to characterize most appositely those changes in European thought that occur in the sixteenth century and which have come to be recognized as the Protestant REFORMATION. By understanding faith as something that comes from God, rather than human discovery or ingenuity, the first reformers were able to identify the single most important aspect of how human beings understand their relationship with God. That quality is the way in which humans live coram deo, before God. "Living before God," properly understood biblically as a relationship with Jesus of Nazareth, is the starting point of any deeper understanding of Protestant theology.

The biblical origin of this way of thinking about theology can be recognized if one considers the sophisticated interpretation of coram deo in MARTIN LUTHER'S early career. Luther, teaching the exegesis of Scripture in Wittenberg 1513–1515 and reacting against the received conventions of several versions of scholasticism, was involved in the study of the Psalms. His work was characterized by a strong emphasis on the fallen nature of human existence as a consequence of SIN, and in particular by the abject unworthiness of human beings in God's eyes. For Luther this reality was constantly in evidence through the manifold temptations that confront humanity, and which humanity constantly fails to resist. Luther's word here for temptation—Anfechtung—is vitally important for any understanding of the origins of Protestant theology because of its ability to characterize humanity's fallen nature.

The notion of Anfechtung remains with Luther throughout his career, so that not only his own work up until his death in 1546, but also the work of his successors, is best understood in its immediate light. It is, as Gordon Rupp so memorably named it, "that unremitting spiritual conflict which never ends until death" (Rupp 1953:105), and which crucially is nothing less than humanity's just deserts for its sinful nature. Or, better expressed: Anfechtung is the manifestation of not only humanity's sinfulness, but also God's righteous anger when faced by that same sin. God's righteousness, therefore, is for the early Luther God's justified condemnation of our sinful lives, and the fear and collapse we feel as a result is the necessary consequence of our realization that we stand condemned before God—coram deo.

Anfechtung has another popular translation in Luther's Bible: the wrath of God. For Luther the Psalms are replete with evidence of humanity's dereliction before this same divine anger. Here one recognizes again and again Luther's acknowledgment of this situation and, as significantly, his confirmation of the theology that binds humanity's fate to the outcome of this condemnation. Out of this apparently hopeless predicament, however, arises a deeper and more positive understanding of God's love, and ultimately an insight that comes to characterize all true Protestant theology, both Lutheran and Reformed. Stated simply, Luther began to realize in 1514–1515 that the most profound manifestation of our temptation is the "tentatio cogitationum de securitate," that temptation to seek and believe that one has obtained the security of holding faith beyond all doubt; namely, spiritual certainty. Such an understanding does violence to faith, argues Luther, because it fails to recognize that faith is always in the balance; faith is never secure, but must always be delivered by God. That faith comes from God, and that God freely gives it to the repentant sinner not because of anything he/she has done, but in spite of everything he/she is.

When Luther starts to understand the fragile character of humanity's grip on faith, and yet the sovereign immortality of faith itself as God's gift to the world, then he begins to understand that faith as a gift is not the product of a righteous anger and condemnation—however justified this might be—but rather of a divine love that cannot be constrained but that must be freely given. The resolution of humanity's Anfechtung, consequently, is to be found not in a doctrine of justification by endless religious observation, but rather in Luther's famous doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by faith alone, which Luther identifies by working through the depth of humanity's rejection of God, and God's insistent overcoming of that same rejection.

There is a consistent logic at work in Luther's theology after this primary discovery. Luther understands after 1515 that faith is about love, and love is about God's embrace of the world, not its rejection. Although it is true to say for Luther therefore that sin always remains a visceral reality in a man's life, nevertheless the meaning of his faith, and the true origin of Protestant theology, is to bring people before God, so that they might hear the Word, repent, and slowly learn to follow lives of Christian discipleship. It is this quality, rather than the more melodramatic images of Luther nailing theses to a church door in 1517, or before the DIET OF WORMS in 1521, that characterizes Luther's deepest insights. It is why Protestant theology, at its outset, is about God's love of people and where those same people discover that love, rather than being about the church. It is this very practical emphasis, rather than a rejection of mediation, that brings Luther to his split with the Catholic Church in 1517–1521.

The clearest example of this development in Luther's theology came in 1522 in his famous Wittenberg sermons, which were delivered over eight consecutive days and in which Luther gives his first sustained exposition of his theology. The occasion was Luther's return from the Wartburg, and the anxieties caused by the overly accelerated rate of reform in Wittenberg effected by other figures there, most notably ANDREAS BODENSTEIN VON KARLSTADT. What makes these sermons so significant is the way in which they establish those same principles that will inform not only the development of the German Reformation in the 1520s and 1530s, but also the consistent development of Protestant theology ever since.

The first sermon was preached on March 9, 1522, Invocavit Sunday. Luther admonishes Wittenberg for its sins, judging the reformers' conduct in the light of God's will, rather than their own ecclesial aspirations. In so doing he clearly outlines the basis of his belief and theology:

Dear friends, the kingdom of God—and we are that kingdom—does not consist in talk or words, but in activity, in deeds, in works and exercises. God does not want hearers and repeaters of words, but followers and doers, and this occurs in faith through love. For a faith without love is not enough—rather it is not faith at all, but a counterfeit of faith, just as a face seen in a mirror is not a real face, but merely the reflection of a face. (LW 51:68)

Luther returns to this theme again and again throughout the sermons, reiterating constantly his main theme that the BIBLE teaches the faithful to be justified before God, to understand this justified faith as the basis of all Christian practice, and to support each other in building up God's people on earth. Such, Luther states, is the heart of the Gospel, and all other questions, concerning images, the sacraments, and CONFESSION and absolution, are secondary to this principal doctrine. As Luther concludes, at the end of this same first sermon: "If we do not earnestly pray to God and act rightly in this matter, it looks to me as if all the misery which we have begun to heap upon the papists will fall upon us" (LW 51:70).

There are five key themes that arise naturally from Luther's Wittenberg sermons, and that characterize orthodox Protestant theology: the authority of the Bible as the proclaimed Word of God; human existence before God, which embraces repentance and justification by faith alone; the relationship between faith and reason; the pastoral emphases of Protestant theology, which includes questions of church-state relations and theological education; pietism as the mark of the true congregation. In what follows, an understanding of these central themes will be developed in conjunction with an interpretation of the evolution of Protestant theology.

The Authority of the Bible

For Protestantism the Bible is the proclaimed word of God, identified in its theological meaning with the revealed Word of God, Jesus Christ. The Bible's authority rests on its unique status as the divinely inspired witness to God's act of self-disclosure. That uniqueness is not to be understood contingently, as if the Bible were unique because it just happens to be the only record to what took place in the first Christian communities. Rather, the Bible is unique because it, like Christ himself, is God's gift of God to creation. In the Bible we receive God as God speaks to us, its words resonant with God's Word.

The origin of such a reading of biblical authority lies in the development of Luther's understanding of the doctrine of justification by faith alone, meaning also that the distinctively Protestant sense of biblical authority is linked with Luther's rejection of scholasticism. This fact is significant, not because it implies that scholastic theologies were uninterested in the Bible (which would be erroneous), but because it identifies a tension with other forms of AUTHORITY that, for Protestantism, must always be resolved in favor of the Bible. For Protestantism, scholasticism's emphasis on the power of reason to resolve questions of divine being must always be secondary to the disclosure of revealed knowledge in the Bible. Thus, although it is undoubtedly true that many Protestant theologians have sought to place reason (and other cognate authorities) within their work, nevertheless such attempts must always give way to the Bible in a genuinely Protestant theology.

This requirement has not always been met without tension. Although it was true, therefore, that the primacy of biblical authority was largely unchallenged during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the advent of biblical criticism in the eighteenth century, founded on a developing appreciation of the significance of scientific reasoning, presented important challenges. Similarly, FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER'S Reformed theology constituted a diminution of biblical authority in favor of more philosophical arguments derived from IMMANUEL KANT, which was certainly how KARL BARTH responded to Schleiermacher's work in the early part of the twentieth century. Notwithstanding Barth's great significance in that period, however, nineteenth-century neo-Kantianism continued to exert an influence on Protestant theology into the 1950s, a situation that one finds in the background to the work of such figures as JÜRGEN MOLTMANN, WOLFHART PANNENBERG, and Eberhard Jüngel.

Such challenges are significant because they make Protestantism think again about the role of the authority of the Bible in its understanding of faith. The Bible is not authoritative because it is old; rather, the Bible is authoritative because it is God's. In this respect neither philosophies, nor social theories, nor cultural and aesthetic achievements are in the same way God's. They are humanity's achievements, and as such are of necessity secondary to the Bible. None of this requires human reflection to avoid attempting to make sense of the Bible, and none of it vitiates the significance of biblical exegesis and theological interpretation. The simple given of the authority of the Bible, however, is the origin of all Protestant theology. Everything else flows from it.

Coram Deo

If one asks why the Bible has this authority, moving on from the simple fact of its being given by God, one recognizes that in the Bible one stands before God; that coram deo, as Luther had it, is the defining characteristic of biblical humanity. Again, if one contrasts that with, say, philosophy or social theory, then one would say that standing before philosophy is standing before a human construct; or at best, standing before certain principles of indeterminate status. The best philosophers, GEORG W.F. HEGEL and Martin Heidegger for example, are clearly aware of this distinction and do not understand their philosophies as functioning in the same way, or with the same character, as faith. This fact did not stop theologians like RUDOLF BULTMANN from attempting to draw together certain methodological and conceptual parallels with, for example, Heidegger's historical phenomenology. It must be acknowledged, however, that the attempt was not always successful, and certainly not universally popular with Protestant churches, both Lutheran and, particularly, Reformed.

The same comments about the authority of the Bible, therefore, also apply to the doctrine of coram deo, with the qualification that certain theologians, for example Schleiermacher, have taken the coram deo argument seriously, without necessarily positioning the Bible as its sole medium. Schleiermacher's idea of religion's "sense and taste for the infinite," for example, could be argued to take very seriously a notion of standing before God. Schleiermacher would not be willing to limit it to the Bible, however, preferring instead to position the idea as something akin to a universal opportunity for the individual, which is clearly problematic for orthodox Protestantism. The idea of coram deo itself can be problematic for Protestantism, if it is so closely restricted to the Bible that it does not leave sufficient room for the DOCTRINE of the church. One might argue, under such circumstances, that a fundamental distinction between Lutheran and Reformed Protestantism is in their doctrine of the church, and the mediating role the church plays in communicating God's presence to believers. If orthodox LUTHERANISM has rather more of an emphasis on Word and People, therefore, it is probably true to say that Reformed Protestantism understands "Church and People" as being as key a component as "Bible and People." Certainly, that would be the sense emerging from figures like HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, MARTIN BUCER, and JOHN CALVIN in the Swiss Reformed Churches in the sixteenth century.

If the question is about coram deo, therefore, it is also about mediation, and indeed immediation, an issue that has always been problematic for Protestantism because of the close historic ties between mainstream and radical (often Anabaptist) Reformations. There is a radicalism in Protestantism, evident today in the many conservative evangelical movements (see EVANGELICALISM), that wants to think in terms of a Pentecostal and immediate inspiration for the Christian life, imbued with the Spirit and independent of mediation by church and sacrament and even, arguably, the Bible. Although it is undoubtedly wrong to suggest simply that such positions constitute bad theology, nevertheless it is more plausible to argue that, properly understood, orthodox Protestantism is as much a religion of mediation in principle as Catholicism—the principle being, however, mediation through the Bible, coram deo.

Faith and Reason

Because of its historical origins in the sixteenth century, and particularly the intellectual shift from medieval to modern mindsets, Protestant theology has generally been coincidental with the development of scientific reasoning, something that particularly came to characterize Protestant exegesis of the Bible from the early eighteenth century onward. This coincidence can be understood in terms of the relationship between faith and reason that to a great degree becomes in modernity the relative tension between epistemology in general, and theological epistemology in particular. Or, stated differently: the tension is between general theories of how we know things, which are commonly the domain of philosophy or science, and theological theories of how we know things, which for Christianity are theories of how God makes God known in the world. As has been demonstrated, for Protestantism the latter questions are ones of biblical authority.

The shift from medieval to modern here is informative because the various schools of scholastic theology, against which Luther struggled, were concerned with understanding how reason could be employed to demonstrate the will or mind or being of God, often in terms of how, by analogy, theology could reason itself philosophically back toward the divine by starting from the natural. To turn Luther's thoughts around, for certain strands of scholasticism it was not so much coram deo as coram mundo—the latter allowing us to demonstrate how and why God created the world, including humanity. For Protestantism, by contrast—both Lutheran and Reformed traditions—God's creative will/being/mind allows of no demonstration: it is axiomatic that God wills to create, because—as the Bible states—God is love. So as God is love is axiomatic, so also is the medium by which God communicates this will to the world; that is, the Word and the word, Jesus and the Bible. One thereby arrives at a very arresting view of the relationship between faith and reason, established in the confessed authority of the Bible: we know things because God tells us things, a proposition that cannot be demonstrated, but rather only confessed as Word and Gospel.

This understanding of the relationship between faith and reason has dominated Protestant theology ever since Luther and Calvin, both positively and negatively. Positively, it has allowed generations of theologians, from GOTTHOLD LESSING through to SØREN KIERKEGAARD and on to FRANZ OVERBECK and Barth and then Moltmann, to return to biblical first principles, certain in the conviction that their Protestantism is determined by the axiomatic character of the Protestant witness to truth. Negatively, however, it has also provoked generations of Protestant thinkers, from Kant and Schleiermacher through neo-Kantianism and ADOLF VON HARNACK to Bultmann and Pannenberg, to struggle with the precise role of general or philosophical reflection in relation to Christian belief. It is probably best not to understand these tensions as either right or wrong per se, but rather as indicative per accidens of the Protestant struggle with Luther's doctrine of coram deo. It is more a matter of understanding—and then teaching—something of what it is to be human, to understand axiomatically what it is to be divine, as hearers and Speaker of the Word, respectively. Orthodox Protestant doctrine, however, argues that the relationship between faith and reason is one in which the former always conditions the latter, not vice versa.

Theology's Pastoral Character

The Protestant understanding of the relationship between faith and reason helps to make sense of theology's pastoral character, which otherwise can too often be reduced to an echo of biblical images of the Good Shepherd that, although not insignificant, are perhaps too open to naïve interpretation. Protestant theology's pastoral character, as exemplified by Luther's Wittenberg sermons, is really a matter of lay education. The pastoral quality of Protestant theology consists in leading the People of God to a deeper understanding of their position coram deo, and a better understanding of their faithful responsibilities to God in the light of Christ's saving death on the cross. Gerald Strauss characterized this initiative in the 1520s as "Luther's House of Learning" (Strauss 1978), and the early Reformation's commitment to the provision of new CATECHISMS, family Bibles, village pastors, and public confessions, was evidence not so much of the desire to build a new church, as to make the ordinary people understand and own their responsibilities to God. To a large extent similar initiatives were followed by Zwingli in Zurich and Bucer in Strasbourg, and slightly later Calvin in Geneva, who codified these protestant pastoral concerns into a more systematic understanding of what it was to be a Reformed Christian.

The important features of this turn in Protestant theology, and why it is best described as “pastoral,” can be enumerated quite straightforwardly. First, Protestant theology originates in the conviction that there is a right relationship with God, as realized in Jesus Christ, and as proclaimed in the Gospels and the Letters of St. Paul. Properly understood, therefore, the role of the pastor is to teach people how to return to this right relationship with God, something that God achieves in peoples’ hearts and which is known in repentance and confession. This in turn leads, second, to the need to keep people together as the People of God, which means avoiding fragmentation and individualization by teaching people as communities, and equipping them with the means to remain together; that is, Bible and WORSHIP, or better, Word and the SACRAMENTS of baptism and Eucharist (see LORD’S SUPPER). Only in this way, third, can the People of God realize its moral commitments to God, commitments that are better realized as the cost of discipleship.

Even today these central features of Protestant theology’s pastoral character are realized in countless congregations in very straightforward terms. The difficulty with modernity, however, has been in the way that this pastoral character has been replaced on occasions by a more secular understanding of the therapeutic role of religion, which has tended historically to work against the communal character of Protestantism, toward a more individualized notion of what it is to be saved. As with faith and reason the tension here is chronic, something that remains always a major part of being a modern religion. At its worst, however, arguably in many Western, outwardly Protestant denominations, this tendency has produced religious movements that are not really Protestant congregations in any orthodox sense, but rather collections of amorphously religious individuals.

Pietism

One might argue that the tendency toward such individualization is an inherent weakness in Protestantism, as with the relationship between faith and reason, stemming from its peculiar historical origins. On such a reading, one might argue that it is Protestantism’s inherent PIETISM that is both its greatest strength and its greatest weakness, if that same pietism is defined as Protestantism’s instinct for life before God, in the light of Word and sacraments. On such a reading there is something almost inevitably human in the desire or need to understand standing before God as something pious individuals must own for themselves, just as the same pious individuals must repent for themselves, and indeed confess for themselves. In these terms the question of the right response to God, which characterizes so much of Protestantism’s heart and soul, is inevitably for most people going to be an individual response to God. It is the way human beings relate to others, and therefore The Other: as individuals.

Here one arrives at the heart of the matter. In keeping with what has been said about the relationship between faith and reason, one might acknowledge that it is intrinsically human to behave as individuals, and that this tendency is something sciences like anthropology and psychology can elucidate for theology. Nevertheless, this is not the same thing as saying that this is the way in which human beings should behave, and certainly not the same thing as saying that this is how they should behave coram deo. Protestantism teaches that human beings before God are called to return to the People of God, which means they are called to return to being together one with the Lord (to state it devotionally). This is why all of the essential structures of Protestant theology—the authority of the Bible, standing before God, the tension between faith and reason, and Protestant theology’s pastoral character—are properly understood as communal realities, as principles that are true because they are shared, with each other and, most important, with God. Properly understood, the principles of Protestant theology pull people back toward the Protestant understanding of Trinitarian Incarnationalism, the central doctrines of the Christian faith that are only intelligible as the actions of the communal God.

The historical origins of the Protestant Reformation demonstrate this reality clearly enough, so that it is justified to speak of pietism as a shared practice of devotion that arose as early communities, orthodox and Anabaptist (see ANABAPTISM), were placed under considerable duress by Catholic and secular authorities in the sixteenth century. The Hutterite Communities (see HUTTERITES), which later evolved to include the Moravian Brethren and which in turn profoundly influenced Schleiermacher and subsequently Karl Barth, typify this pietistic tendency. Pietism, on this reading, is a distinctive feature of Protestantism not simply because it reflects the essential characteristics of its theology, but also because it was the historical lived experience of generations of Protestant Christians in Europe and subsequently around the world. As such it is exemplified in the many social and cultural achievements that Protestantism has given the world, from the integration of civil and religious understandings of shared authority through to the great traditions of hymnody and chorales that are often the bestknown features of Protestantism, and arguably some of its finest theologies (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS; Music).

If this analysis comes close to speaking of Protestant theology as the elucidation of first principles in the tense relationship between the KINGDOM OF GOD and the kingdom of the world, then that is simply to state the case in Luther’s explicit terms. The key point for Protestant theology then becomes how to teach people fidelity to these first principles, all the time being sensitive to the fact that those same people are called to become one in the midst of a world that pulls them away from God and each other, toward a misguided sense of themselves as free agents. To refer to this conviction as “Pietism” is not to trivialize Protestant religiosity as emotive or sentimental, but rather to identify Protestantism as a religion of observation and devotion, one in which the taught praxis of discipleship is as important as the theological sense of the confessed Word.

Protestant Theology Today

Even though these historic strands remain normative for orthodox Protestant theology, contemporary social and cultural pressures obtain. Although the question of justification remains central to Protestantism, therefore, as the recent dialogue with Rome demonstrates, Protestant theology has also to come to terms with a very wide range of issues, including human SEXUALITY, HIV/AIDS, interfaith Dialogue, ECOLOGY, and so forth (see DIALOGUE, INTERCONFESSIONAL). These pressures mean that the tension between theological consistency, on the one hand, and theological relevance, on the other, are probably more heightened than at any time since the sixteenth century. The differing theologies of Pannenberg and Moltmann, for example—the former inherently conservative, pursuing the classical themes of Protestant thought, the latter far more attentive to contemporary issues, albeit within an orthodox framework—highlight the kind of tension that now exists. This is to reckon without the very many practicing theologians who would regard themselves as Protestant, and who would yet be generally identified far more with one particular issue, as is the case, for example, with various feminist theologians (see FEMINIST THEOLOGY).

In a world where there are now literally thousands of Protestant denominations, many of them taking a profoundly conservative view of the evangelical character of the Christian faith, particularly in relation to social issues, it would seem likely that any defining sense of orthodox Protestant theology is doomed to increasing fragmentation. The possibilities, however, are more promising, particularly if one returns to an authentic sense of the origins of faith itself. If Christian BAPTISM functions for Protestantism as the entry into a new creation, therefore (II Corinthians 5:17), binding all believers together into one People of God, then the requirement to address the salvation of the old creation becomes a religious responsibility identifiable with the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost. If there is one consistency in Protestant theology that holds together Lutheran and Reformed Churches, it is the conviction that the eschatological character of revelation marks human existence out in a unique way, and that that uniqueness is really a oneness of which many aspects are but reflections and refractions.

The apparent fragmentation of contemporary Protestant theology, consequently, albeit a symptom of the identity crisis of contemporary society, is also implicitly acknowledged in the original understanding of the Christian faith itself. No one believed that resolving the tension between old and new was ever straightforward. Paul and Luther did say, however, that it would be necessary, if the Word of God were to be genuinely confessed to souls in need of redemption. Such was the gist of Luther's sermons to the Wittenberg congregation in 1522: that the path would be rocky because the needs of the faithful were many and the Word of God was One.

References and Further Reading

- Brecht, Martin. Martin Luther. 3 vols. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1985–1993.
- Bruce, Steve. A House Divided: Protestantism, Schism and Secularization. London: Routledge, 1990.
- Jones, Gareth. Christian Theology: A Brief Introduction. Cambridge, MA: Polity Press, 1999.
- Oberman, Heiko. The Dawn of the Reformation: Essays in Late Medieval and Early Reformation Thought. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1986.
- Pauck, Wilhelm. The Heritage of the Reformation. London: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Rupp, Gordon. The Righteousness of God: Luther Studies. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1953.
- Strauss, Gerald. Luther's House of Learning. Indoctrination of the Young in the German Reformation. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978.
- Wagner, Falk. Zur gegenwärtigen Lage des Protestantismus. Gütersloh, Germany: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1995.

GARETH JONES

THEOLOGY, AFRICAN

See African Theology

THEOLOGY, ASIAN

See Asian Theology

THEOLOGY, BLACK

See Black Theology

THEOLOGY, COVENANT

See Covenant Theology

THEOLOGY EDUCATION: ASIA

In the earliest centuries of Christianity in Asia, theological education was very much linked with the theological developments in the West. Although Antioch is technically in West Asia, we usually speak of early Asian Christianity as Christian communities east of the Roman Empire, in Persia and thus east of Antioch. Some of the themes of theological education from this early period—close relations with the West, contextualization of theology in Asia, and languages used in theological education—continue throughout the history of Christianity in Asia. Before the advent of Protestant churches in Asia, theological education was generally monastic, focused on memorization of scripture and learning to follow the exegesis of the “great teachers.” In the School of Nisibis, for example, the basic curriculum was the BIBLE, taught in Syriac, following the teaching of the great Nestorian doctors. The theology of this school was determined by its relationship with the West.

Protestant theological education came to each new region with the earliest resident missionaries. Protestants pioneered most all of the BIBLE TRANSLATION work in Asia, and this meant that people needed to learn to read. Thus, the normal progression would be from a small group of language helpers studying the Bible in a missionary’s home, to a small class of recent converts to a “school” taught by one or two missionaries, to a more formal “Bible college.” Some of the early Protestant missionaries saw the need to establish seminaries, but little was done until the nineteenth century. In the East Indies, for example, Dutch chaplains working mostly with Dutch, but with a concern for training Ambonese pastors, proposed in the 1630s that a seminary be established in the East Indies. The Dutch could not yet envision theological education anywhere except in Europe, so these ideas were never carried out. For a brief period of one decade in the middle of the eighteenth century (1745–1755), the first Protestant seminary was established in the East Indies, but in its 10 years it graduated only two students. The Dutch seemed to have more commitment to Asian theological education in Ceylon. After rooting out the Portuguese, they imitated the Iberians by starting two SEMINARIES, one in Colombo (1685) and another in Jaffna (1690). And yet Europeans, both Roman Catholic and Protestants, still sent most of their candidates for ministry to Europe to get a “proper” theological education. Only in the later part of the nineteenth century can we talk about seminary education carried out by Europeans in Asia with the confidence that future pastors could be educated for ministry without going to Europe. The very earliest Protestant missionaries (as opposed to chaplains) in Asia, the Danish-Pietist mission in Tranquebar, South India, began to teach catechists who were to be ordained as the first Protestant pastors in INDIA. Until the development of the Baptist college at Serampore, this method of private tutoring was the standard used.

Developments in the Nineteenth Century

In the nineteenth century, most of the pioneering Protestant theological centers were established from the Mediterranean to the Pacific. Virtually all countries in Asia, excluding KOREA, Vietnam, JAPAN and Nepal, had developed some type of Protestant Bible colleges or institutes for preparing local pastors in the nineteenth century. One of the first countries that developed schools for training pastors was India. In 1818 the Serampore Trio of WILLIAM CAREY, Joshua Marshman, and William Ward established Serampore as the first Protestant college in India. As with many Christian colleges in Asia, Serampore began with the dual mission of reaching out to the non-Christian elite and providing theological training for the young Christians. It was not until 1910 that higher theological education was added, and in 1918 a consortium of Christian schools under the "Serampore Senate" was established. By this time, BIBLE COLLEGES and seminaries were being established in most other regions of Asia. For the most part, schools established in the nineteenth century were started by MISSIONS or denominations and reflected the particular theological outlook of the mission. In the twentieth century, with the rising tide of the ecumenical movement, many union or ecumenical schools were established.

In Burma, formal theological education began with the Baptist school started by E.L. Abbot in Thandwe in 1840. Originally founded to educate converts in the faith, this school developed into a seminary for training Baptist clergy. The first Protestant seminary in Thailand was the Evangelistic Training School, founded by the Laos Mission of the Presbyterian Church in 1889. After various starts and stops, the school was finally named after the great Protestant pioneer in northern Thailand, Daniel McGilvary. The McGilvary Theological Seminary taught advanced courses in English beginning in 1926, but soon added the Thai medium. In Pakistan, the Punjab Synod of the Presbyterian Church of North America established the first seminary for the region. Immediately, other churches (including Scotch Presbyterians, Methodists, Anglicans, and others) began to establish their own schools. In Korea, the first resident Methodist missionary in Korea, Henry Appenzeller, began training three Korean Christians in his home. This group became the core of a theological class that in time became Methodist Theological Seminary in Seoul.

Theological Education Comes of Age in Asia

In northern Korea, a Presbyterian pioneer, Samuel A. Moffett, also began teaching young pastors in his home in Pyongyang in 1901. Classes were held during the off seasons for farmers and those in rhythm with the agricultural calendar. Students were taught for three or four weeks, and then they returned to their villages and passed on what they had learned during their planting or harvesting seasons. This became what today is one of the largest seminaries in the world, The Presbyterian College and Theological Seminary, now based in Seoul.

In CHINA, the basic strategy of the Protestant denominational missions was to reach China through education. Thus, colleges and universities providing Christian perspectives on the sciences were as much of a priority as theological seminaries. By 1876, there were a reported 20 training centers for Christian leaders with 231 students. By 1906, this had increased to 68 schools with 772 men and 543 women enrolled. It is clear from these last statistics that from the very beginning in China, the training of both WOMEN and men was important to the effort to reach all of the society. Women were generally educated to be “Bible women,” passing out Bibles and engaging local households and villages in the study of the Bible. Some of the theological education for women however, was on par with the education given to men, requiring courses in church history and theological studies, as well as in the Bible.

Although new seminaries were being started in CHINA, as in other countries in Asia, there was also a movement to consolidate or combine efforts in larger institutional work such as seminaries, colleges, and hospitals. In 1910, for example, Nanking became a Union Bible School by combining three older schools from four missions. In the first decades of the twentieth century, with the rapid increase in Christian college graduates, there developed in China as much as anywhere in Asia a two-tiered type of theological education. Some students received a four-year certificate after completing a basic theological education. These students had little or no previous formal education. Other students had graduated from the new “Western-style” colleges and would follow the more traditional three-year Bachelor of Divinity or Masters of Divinity program from the West.

In Vietnam, the Nhatrang Bible and Theological Institute was founded in 1921 by missionaries of the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (CMA) Church. The seminary (first called the Tourane Bible College) grew from eight students that first year to sixty-six students in 1927. The CMA later started Bible colleges in Cambodia in 1925, Thailand in 1936, and then Laos in 1957. With the Communist victory in Vietnam, the Institute was closed in 1976, with 264 students studying at the time. All Protestant theological education in Vietnam had found its home in this important school.

Along with the rapid development of theological education in the twentieth century came movements of NATIONALISM and contextualization. As more and more pastors are taught in their local contexts, in their own language, a pool of indigenous theologians has begun to develop. Christian leaders are often among the better-educated people in Asian countries, and they often respond to social and political issues with greater understanding. Although we see the results of this theological development in such movements as the Korean Independence Movement (1919) and the number of theological leaders supporting the end of the Qing Dynasty in China, it was not until after the Pacific War and the ensuing independence movements that indigenous Christian leaders began to make a national and continent-wide impact.

During the height of Japanese imperialism, it became most clear that theological education is both shaped by and shapes cultures and countries. In Japan, the rise of Japanese imperialism brought with it state-directed reordering of Christian institutions. To ensure close supervision by the Japanese government, church institutions were forced to combine efforts and organizations. As a result, the fifteen seminaries and departments of theology started by various denominations in Japan during the first half of the twentieth century were merged to form three seminaries in 1941. After the war, these merged into Tokyo Union Theological seminary. A similar development occurred with the Communist victories in China. During the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, a number of regional seminaries were started in China (such as the Sheng Dao Guan [Methodist]), and other theological schools were attached to the Protestant colleges (such as at Shanghai Baptist College). However, after 1951, these regional schools were again consolidated. Yenching Union Theological Seminary, for example, was the merger of thirteen Protestant seminaries from northern China and Nanjing (“Jinling”) seminary was the product of a merger of twelve Protestant Bible schools and seminaries in East China directed by the Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee in 1952. In 1961 these two seminaries were merged to form Nanjing Union Theological Seminary, the one national seminary of the China Christian Council in China. The other regional seminaries were also organized through the CCC as approved by the government.

Diversification and Growth After Independence Movements

In the last half of the twentieth century, theological education in Asia exploded, both in terms of increased diversity and in terms of the number of schools and organizations for overseeing theological education. A number of trends deserve mention for this most recent period. First, newer missions and churches began to establish their own schools for training pastors. The day of the ecumenical cooperation ended and the day of free-market proliferation of seminaries had begun. Many missions and churches, in both Asia and the West, became critical of the liberal orientation of established seminaries. Thus, schools like Union Biblical Seminary (originally in Yeotmal) were founded to provide an alternative to the more liberal education of Serampore or United Theological College. Union, in fact, was started by eleven church and mission groups, including the Evangelical Fellowship of India. In Singapore, the ecumenical or union seminary, Trinity Theological College, was founded in 1948 (English medium) and Singapore Theological Seminary (now Singapore Bible College) was founded four years later (Chinese medium). Two other theological divisions from the West, fundamentalism and pentecostalism, promoted the founding of other seminaries supporting these particular theologies. In Nepal, one of the earliest theological schools after Nepal opened up to Christian worship was an ASSEMBLIES OF GOD institute established in 1980 as a nine-month training program for pentecostal pastors. Pentecostal schools are now the fastest-growing schools in Asia.

In the 1950s and 1960s, these newer seminaries and Bible colleges were mostly founded by Western leaders. By the 1970s, however, an increasing number were being founded by Asian leaders. Most of the theological schools founded since 1980 in Asia were started by Asians who felt constrained by the older seminaries built on Western models. Indians have founded schools in Nepal, Singaporeans have started schools in Cambodia, and Koreans are founding schools all over Asia.

A second trend since World War II is the development of Asian forms of theological education. In south Asia, this has meant using the pattern of the Ashram or “retreat” center for theological education. The Nepal Bible Ashram, for example, was founded on May 14, 1981 in the village of Jorpati, east of Kathmandu. The first group of 11 students were all converts from Hinduism. This Ashram, like many others, has developed a local curriculum (including reading through the whole Bible, because most of the students would not have done so), health care, agricultural studies, and adult literacy.

A third trend worth noting is the development of associations for the standardization of theological education in Asia. These associations help coordinate theological education, and they usually provide some type of accrediting for seminaries and Bible schools. Most of these associations had some type of relationship with theological education in the West, either as a reaction to other developments or as an extension of these developments. In 1968 the Philippine Association of Bible and Theological Schools (PABATS) was formed to bring together in cooperation Philippine schools that shared a common evangelical heritage. At its founding it included 17 schools, but by the twenty-first century more than one-half of the Protestant schools had been involved in some way in PABATS. The ecumenical Association for Theological Schools in Southeast Asia was formed in 1957 in Singapore, with 16 schools in the original membership. This is one of the most active associations (now called the Association for Theological Education in Southeast Asia), accrediting theological schools in Southeast Asia, publishing the Asia Journal of Theology, as well as operating the Southeast Asia Graduate School of Theology (SEAGAST). Like the Serampore Senate in India, SEAGAST pools the faculty and libraries of member schools in the region to provide advanced training in theological studies. A parallel organization, the Asia Theological Association, does the same thing for schools that are more evangelical in theology. There are some schools that have dual membership, demonstrating that the divisions in Asia are not always the same as those in the West.

A fourth trend in Asian theological education is the contextualizing of the curriculum and the courses themselves. In most Asian seminaries, a general course in church history, as well as a course in national or regional church history, is required. Most seminaries also are teaching in a local language (with India the major exception to this), but another research language, like English, is required. Thus, in most seminaries modern languages are being taught along with biblical languages. Theological studies in seminaries often include required courses such as “Asian theologies” and “Minjung theology,” as these movements continue to develop. Most Asian seminaries also require courses in other Asian religions (e.g. Buddhism, Hinduism, Islam). These three subrends (local languages, local theologies, and local religions) are mutually enhancing to theological formation in Asia.

A fifth trend would have to be the rapid increase in Asian publications that are available and are being used in theological education. This is related to the fourth trend just mentioned, but it also has an economic cause: Books and periodicals printed in Asia are much more affordable for Asian students. For example, in 1973, supported by the German East Asia Mission Society, the Korea Theological Institute was formed, with the express purpose of promoting the best of modern, especially Korean, theological thinking. Its journal, Shinhak Sasang (Theological Thought), as well as its translations of contemporary theological works, provides material for Korean seminaries and Bible colleges. Newer publications, like the Asian Journal of Pentecostal Studies, are beginning to express global movements from an Asian perspective. Larger projects, such as the Church History Association of India's multivolume history of Christianity in India, are giving greater credibility and honor to Christianity as an Indian religion.

Finally, the last trend is the increasing number of women in theological education. Women entered theological education in Asia later than men, although from early in the nineteenth century, women were involved in ministries of teaching, EVANGELISM, and (later) medical work. Not until late in the twentieth century were women involved in higher theological education as both students and teachers. Through such regional organizations as the Christian Conference in Asia, as well as at national levels, women-supported networks and conferences were developed to meet the special needs of women in theological education. In 1978, for example, the Association of Women in Theology (AWIT) was formed in the Philippines with the purpose of supporting women's movements in theology. The AWIT was supported in part by the Asian Christian Women's Association. In some countries, including China, women are the backbone of theological education.

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Yorke, Jr. A Seminary Survey. New York: Harper and Brothers, Publishers, 1960.
- Hunt, Robert, Lee Kam Hing, and John Roxborough, eds. Christianity in Malaysia: A Denominational History. Selangor, Malaysia: Pelanduk Publications, 1992.
- Latourette, Kenneth Scott. A History of Christian Missions in China. New York: McMillan, 1949.
- Sugirtharajah, R.S., ed. Asian Faces of Jesus. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1993.
- Wilson, L.F. "Bible Institutes, Colleges, Universities." In The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Edited by Stanley M. Burgess. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2002.

SCOTT W.SUNQUIST

THEOLOGY, EVANGELICAL

See Evangelicalism, Theology of THEOLOGY, FEMINIST

Origins and Agenda

Feminist theology may be said to have appeared in the nineteenth century in the context of women's struggles in Europe and North America to better their legal, social, and economic condition, following on from the attempts of women in the period of the American and European revolutions in the eighteenth century to improve their lot. That early phase is classically represented by Mary Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792), which remained influential through the next century as women assimilated its arguments. Feminism and feminist theology has always been a "protest" movement, and North American Protestant women launched feminist theology on its way.

Although she was by no means the first to struggle with the biblical texts and their connections with women's position in church and society, ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, a veteran campaigner for women's voting rights and for the abolition of slavery, coordinated a team of female collaborators to produce a best-seller, The Woman's Bible (1895–1898). This work attempted critically to evaluate what the Bible did and did not say about women, from the perspective of women. This was the first serious attempt to dislodge an exclusively male-centered (androcentric) perspective in biblical criticism and exposition. So from the beginning, feminist theology has been concerned with what is nowadays referred to as "gender," that is, relationships between the sexes, as these vary over time in different social and cultural conditions, and, crucially, the interaction of gender with how human beings respond to and understand God. Feminist theology has always been engaged with questions about how the use and interpretation of the Bible impacts on women's lives, and inevitably, therefore, also on their relationships to men. From this perspective, a central conviction is that women's perspectives are to be taken with utter seriousness in theology, because being female is just as important a dimension of being human as being male. A male-only focused understanding of reality is a distortion, and the Christian tradition needs to come to terms with the insights of feminist theology if it is to be reinvigorated and not to be seen to be yet one more religious tradition that does not unequivocally uphold the full human dignity of women. Feminist theology rejoices in complexity, readily acknowledging the need for much sensitivity to the complications of race and class, "grass roots" experience, and the legacies of colonialism, as well as working to have an impact on church and the academic world. No one group of feminist theologians presumes to speak for another, and learning to appreciate the perspectives of feminist theologians across the globe is an important dimension of theological reflection. The names of Chung Hyun-Kyung, Ada Maria Isasi-Diaz, Mercy Amba Oduyoye, and Delores Williams are key here.

Feminist Biblical Theology

Feminist theologians endeavor to explore the riches and the limitations of biblical and related literature, even as many factors will affect the weight still to be given to biblical perspectives. Biblical texts have been used to argue for the submission of women to men and women's incapacity to represent God or Christ, since they have not seen to bear the image of God independently of men. Of particular interest to Feminist theologians are "feminine" images for God found in Biblical texts, especially the association of "Sophia," divine wisdom, with the dignity and intelligence of the human female/feminine. Related has been the complexity of allowing women to gain access to theological education, and to the linguistic and critical tools of biblical scholarship as it developed in the course of the twentieth century. Feminist theology has found common cause with feminist perspectives on biblical material from a whole range of other academic disciplines.

Outstanding work has been done, by Phyllis Trible for example, in her re-reading of texts from Genesis and the Song of Songs in her God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (1978). Here she finds resources to challenge convictions about women's inferiority and thus necessary subordination to men, and explores the way in which the "love-story gone wrong" is redeemed in the love lyrics of the Song of Songs. Trible tracks down overlooked female/feminine-related language for God in the Bible, language that is as reality-depicting as much as any language for God may be. Her Texts of Terror: Literary-Feminist Readings of Biblical Narratives (1984) explored appalling cases of violence to women in the Bible, prompting questions about the connections between the devaluation of women and their abuse, as well as the abuse of dependent children, which continues to be a live issue even in Christian contexts.

The most outstanding contribution to feminist theological interpretation of the New Testament is that of Elisabeth Schussler Fiorenza, first woman President of the Society of Biblical Literature in 1987, almost a century after the publication of The Woman's Bible. Fiorenza's book In Memory of Her. A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (1983) was a Feminist landmark study. Central to this book is the conviction that women may claim Jesus and indeed the habits and practices of the earliest Christian communities as a prototype (not a blueprint) of their own history. The point here is that by taking clues from the beginnings of Christianity, with a future-orientated perspective rather than a backward-look, Christianity remains open to future transformation as it did in the first centuries of its existence. The implications are considerable, not only for the ways by which human beings understand God, but also for the structures of ecclesiology and ministry—sore points in many devout women's lives. By paying attention to what was at stake in the movement initiated by Jesus of Nazareth, the women and men associated with him, and the way they and later generations came to understand him, we can find resources to shift toward mutual acknowledgement of the full dignity and worth of all individuals. Some of her critics have insisted that Fiorenza is too generous in her evaluation of early Christianity painting an idealized picture. Important, however, is Fiorenza's argument that faithful representation of the discipleship and apostolic leadership of women supports women in their efforts to appropriate Jesus' notion of love and service, so that they too may be seen as the image and body of Christ.

In another monograph, Miriam's Child, Sophia's Prophet (1994) Fiorenza turns her attention to Jesus' execution and the theology of the cross. This relates to Phyllis Trible's perspective in Texts of Terror, for feminist theology is suspicious of texts and traditions of interpretation which urge the willing suffering of violence, even when such suffering is allegedly redemptive, since such suffering makes the dominated serve the interests of the dominant. Rather, in the New Testament is evidence of the way in which the earliest Christians struggled to make sense of the disaster of Jesus' death, with the presence of women ascribed a leading role in the stories of his suffering, death and resurrection. At the center of these narratives is the future-orientated empty-tomb proclamation of Jesus as the vindicated, resurrected one, who is always ahead to summon a new future. Thus the challenge to believers, and to women especially, is to position themselves, as it were, within the "open space" of the empty tomb and the open road to Galilee, to experience and proclaim divine and life-enhancing transformation and empowerment.

Assessment and Further Agenda

Apart from the interests of feminist biblical theologians, attention to the texts of the Bible has characterized other fields of feminist study, such as archaeology, linguistics, social history, economics, literature, history, and anthropology. The interests of feminism have ensured that biblical criticism and biblical theology did not remain only the concerns of faculty of Religion and Theology in the academic world or institutions concerned with the training of future clergy, into which women have moved in large numbers in the latter half of the twentieth century. In turn, the insights of faculty in Religion and Theology that have an interest in "gender matters" help refresh biblical theology, and, not gender in relation to women, but also in relation to men.

One of the weaknesses of feminist theology in some of its modes, has been its indifference to the materials from the pens of historians, which illuminate the lives of women in the churches through the centuries. The legacy of the Reformation era deserves particular attention. There is much to be learned here, for the interpretation and evaluation of biblical texts and doctrines has never been a simple matter, not least where the lives of women have been concerned.

Feminist Doctrinal Theology

Doctrinal or systematic theology has been the central feature of the theological discipline, as the study of the first millennium alone reveals. In these times, creeds, doctrinal reflection, and the Bible interrelated with one another, not least as the New Testament writings came into being, and were gradually established as an authorized list of readings. It is important to remember that one of the long-term aims of feminist theology is the reintegration of areas of theology too long and too often kept apart in the interests of habits of “academic” theology as that developed in universities over the last three centuries. At times neglected are sacramental theology, liturgy, pastoral practice, ethics, and popular piety. The reintegration of different areas of theology could have a major impact on the way not merely these disciplines, but also the topics within them, are to be treated. For instance, “liturgical theology,” that is, the context of worship in which most people learn their theology, has been engaging the attention of Protestant as well as Roman Catholic theologians for half a century, and it concerns itself with the work of poets and hymn-writers, as the work of Teresa Berger exemplifies. Feminist theology has only begun to engage with this area, or with inter-faith dialogue. The prospects are promising, however, because of the range of theological approaches both East and West, though feminist theology as yet has few interpreters from within the Orthodox family of churches, except on the issue of ordination, a touch-stone for many women of how they are regarded within their churches.

Key Developments

In the aftermath of the Second Vatican Council of the Roman Catholic Church, two books by Mary Daly were the major catalyst for reappraisal of Christian doctrine. What Elizabeth Cady Stanton was to the nineteenth century, Mary Daly was for the twentieth. Defending her tradition in The Church and the Second Sex (1968), Daly wrote herself out of it. A groundbreaking book by Rosemary Radford Ruether, Sexism and God-Talk: Towards a Feminist Theology (1983), recalled a fundamental principle that an understanding of Christ must be adequate for the salvation of women as well as men. The Incarnation reverses and undermines claims to privilege and status as Jesus undoes all claims to male dominance in his very vulnerability, thus revealing God to us. Ruether has become one of the most significant of recent voices in theology in the course of her career.

The most important writer of feminist doctrinal theology at the present time, however, is Elizabeth A. Johnson, not least in Roman Catholic-Lutheran interchurch discussion in the United States. She has tackled the issue of language for God, both biblical and non-biblical. Given the theological principle that God transcends both sex and gender, and the hope that God is given to us and we respond to God in humanly inclusive ways, we may name God in a variety of ways, each of which acts as a corrective to every other, reminding us of the mystery of God. To overcome the unease in formal expressions of belief about the association of the “feminine” with the divine, however, we need to go further than that and say that the “feminine” can of and by itself represent God in as full and in as limited a way as God is represented by the “masculine”: “She Who Is.” All of our language for God is inadequate, but it may be feminist theological insight that will revitalize the Trinitarian tradition and enable the praise of God in many ways. The use of the doctrines and liturgies of the past for the insights they preserve, should be enriched. Johnson also wrote a major book on the “Communion of Saints,” taking the cue for her book title (“friends of God, and prophets”) from Wisdom 7.27. At once biblical and feminist, attending to the insights of ecological theology as well as to those of the Reformation and JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, her work is a major example of feminist ecumenical theology, exploring a credal doctrine and enlightening it for our time.

At this juncture, many women from different ecclesiastical backgrounds are contributing to the reshaping of theology, and it may be helpful to think of a theological schema based on the traditional pattern given by the creeds developed in the early period of the Church’s formation. One re-appreciation of a creed as a whole is the book by Elizabeth Rankin Geitz, and we may follow that with attention to new understandings of creation written by Celia Deane-Drummond, based on “wisdom theology.” A book by Shannon Shrein discussing two contrasting Christologies (those of Sallie McFague and Elizabeth Johnson) is illuminating, since these represent two approaches to Rosemary Radford Ruether’s perceptive question, “Can a male saviour save women?” The latter’s most recent book discusses the many ways in which women past and present have engaged with Christianity. The most pungent critique of sentimentality about women in some feminist theology is that by Angela West; and the most profound exploration of the experience of evil is Melissa Raphael’s book about women in Auschwitz, a feminist study of the meaning of holiness. Elina Vuola’s book tackles the limitations of liberation theology in dealing with the suffering and death of women in Latin America; Denise Ackerman’s book raises acute questions about “redemption” from South Africa. Serene Jones has written on the reconfiguration of the Church, tackling such central topics as “sanctification and justification,” and Susan Ross writes on the renewal of sacramental theology. And since some men are now feminist theologians, in addition to Elizabeth Johnson’s book on the Trinity, the work of Gavin D’Costa is much to be recommended.

See also Gender; Theology; Women; Women Clergy

References and Further Reading

- Ackermann, Denise M. After the Locusts. Letters from a Landscape of Faith. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003.
- Baukham, Richard. Gospel Women. Studies of the Named Women in the Gospels. New York: Continuum, 2002.
- Behr-Sigel, Elisabeth. The Ministry of Women in the Church. Redondo Beach, CA: Oakwood, 1991.
- Berger, Teresa. Theology in Hymns? A Study of the Relationship of Doxology and Theology According to A Collection of Hymns for the Use of the People Called Methodists (1780). Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1995.
- Chopp, Rebecca S. “Feminist and Womanist Theologies” in Ford, David, ed. The Modern Theologians. Oxford: Blackwell, 1997, 389–404.
- Deane-Drummond, Celia. Creation Through Wisdom. Edinburgh: T.&T.Clark, 2003.
- D’Costa, Gavin. Sexing the Trinity. Gender, Culture and the Divine. London: SCM, 2000.

- Fiorenza, Elisabeth Schussler, ed. Searching the Scriptures. A Feminist Introduction; A Feminist Commentary. New York: Crossroads, 1993/1994; London: SCM, 1994/1995.
- . The Power of Naming: A Concilium Reader in Feminist Liberation Theology. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis; London: SCM, 1996.
- Geitz, Elizabeth Rankin. Gender and the Nicene Creed. Harrisburg, PA: Morehouse, 1995.
- Graff, Ann O'Hara, ed. In the Embrace of God. Feminist Approaches to Theological Anthropology. Maryknoll: Orbis, 1995.
- Hilkert, Mary Catherine. "Current Theology. Feminist Theology: A Review of Literature." Theological Studies 56 (1995): 327–352.
- Johnson, Elizabeth A. Friends of God and Prophets. A Feminist Theological Reading of the Communion of Saints. London: SCM, 1998.
- . She Who Is. The Mystery of God in Feminist Theological Discourse. New York: Crossroad, 1993.
- Jones, Serene. Feminist Theory and Christian Theology. Cartographies of Grace. Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000.
- Karant-Nunn, Susan, and Merry Wiesner-Hanks, ed. Lutheran Women. Cambridge/New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- King, Ursula, ed. Feminist Theology from the Third World: A Reader. Maryknoll: Orbis, 1994.
- Loades, Ann. Feminist Theology: Voices from the Past. Oxford, U.K.: Blackwell, 2001.
- McFague, Sallie. Models of God. Theology for an Ecological, Nuclear Age. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987. Important for re-thinking divine creativity and Christology.
- Mowry LaCugna, Catherine. Freeing Theology. The Essentials of Theology in Feminist Perspective. New York: Harper San Francisco, 1993.
- Newsom, Carol A., and Sharon H. Ringe, eds. The Women's Bible Commentary. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1992; London: SPCK, 1992.
- Parsons, Susan Frank, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Feminist Theology. Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Raphael, Melissa. The Female Face of God in Auschwitz: a Jewish Feminist Theology of the Holocaust. London/New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Ramshaw, Gail, and Jennifer Walton. God Beyond Gender: Feminist Christian God-Language. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995.
- Ross, Susan A. Extravagant Affections. A Feminist Sacramental Theology. New York: Continuum, 1998.
- Ruether, Rosemary Radford. Women and Redemption: A Theological History. London: SCM, 1998.
- Sawyer, Deborah F. God, Gender and the Bible. London: Routledge, 2002.
- Schrein, Shannon. Quilting and Braiding. The Feminist Christologies of Sallie McFague and Elizabeth A. Johnson in Conversation. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1998.
- Vuola, Elina. Limits of Liberation. Feminist Theology and the Ethics of Poverty and Reproduction. Sheffield/New York: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002.
- Watson, Natalie K. Introducing Feminist Ecclesiology. Sheffield, U.K.: Sheffield Academic, 2002.
- . Feminist Theology. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003.

ANN LOADES

THEOLOGY, LIBERATION

See Liberation Theology

THEOLOGY, PROCESS

See Process Theology

THEOLOGY, TWENTIETH-CENTURY

The twentieth century began with great confidence in the powers of Western civilization. Europe was still in control of many of its colonies, and industrial and economic progress was celebrated in the United States. Nevertheless, the two World Wars, the HOLOCAUST, and the Depression of the U.S. economy soon changed this confidence and raised new questions that would have a deep impact on the future of theology. In this context, Protestant theology found itself in an ongoing struggle between adaptation and resistance.

Early Developments in Mainline Theology in Europe and North America

In the early decades of the twentieth century, academic Protestant theology was concentrated in Europe and the UNITED STATES, with German theology occupying one of the most prominent positions. Theologians in training from all over the world would spend time at German universities. Most theological discourse outside of Europe and the United States was shaped by the debates at the theology centers.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, the most prominent manifestations of Protestant theology developed in close relationship with the interests and concerns of Western CULTURE. What was not seen as clearly at the time, however, was that this also implied a close relationship with political and economic developments.

The theologians of what has become known as “culture Protestantism” (see CULTURAL PROTESTANTISM) in GERMANY, for instance, were interested in showing the relevance of Christian theology in a culture that did not expect much from Christianity, and they sought to reestablish the place of Protestantism as a major force of civilization. In the very last decades of the nineteenth century, ALBRECHT RITSCHL (1822–1889), seeking to leave behind metaphysics as a premodern discipline, grounds the theological enterprise in “the particular structures of revealed religion” and the “actuality of those structures in the founder and in the community” (Ritschl 1972:210). Here theology becomes a practical matter, embedded in history. Following in these footsteps, the project of ERNST TROELTSCH (1865–1923) is summarized in the foreword to his The Social Teaching of Christian Churches (1960) as “think[ing] through and formulat[ing] the world of Christian thought and life in frank relation to the modern world.” In these approaches, the ethical aspect of Christianity is central—“Christianity is first and foremost a matter of praxis”—and theology needs to make use of other disciplines, including history, philosophy of religion, and sociology to create a harmony with state and society “in such a way that together they will form a unity of civilization.” (Troeltsch 1960:19, 32)

In the United States, similar efforts took shape. The work of SHAILER MATHEWS (1863–1941), a prominent representative of the liberal Chicago school of theology, is interested in the embeddedness of Christianity in the world. Christian belief in God is belief not in a force removed from the universe, but rather in a cosmic force that produces individual and social relationships. In this context, the work of WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH (1861–1918) introduces a different note. Rauschenbusch, like most other theologians of the early decades of the twentieth century, emphasizes the immanence of God and the social implications of Christianity. But Rauschenbusch opts for CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM rather than the liberal capitalism promoted by Mathews or the liberal state promoted by Troeltsch. Rauschenbusch, more aware than most theologians of his day of the devastating underside of industrial society (see INDUSTRIALIZATION), particularly in the lives of the workers and the unemployed of the inner cities, turned the attention of theology to the internal limits of Western culture and set out to “christianize” it. While he saw the failures of the modern world in sharper relief than most of his contemporaries in Europe and the United States and thus was less interested in adapting his theology to it, he did not give up the fundamental optimism of the liberal perspective and continued to believe in the possibility of reform (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM).

Theology and the World Wars

While the major theme in the early decades of the twentieth century was adaptation and in some cases reform, new voices after the end of World War I refused to adapt and introduced themes of resistance. Sensing that things have gone wrong in liberal society and in the liberal theology that catered to it, the most prominent voice of resistance was that of Swiss theologian KARL BARTH (1886–1968), who would emerge to be the most prominent theologian of the twentieth century. Barth critiqued the synthesis between Christianity and society of his predecessors and introduced a sharp contrast. Already early on, as pastor of bluecollar workers in Safenwil, SWITZERLAND, Barth picked up a new theological theme when he began to address God’s otherness. God is not with the powers that be, but rather where we usually do not expect Him: on the underside, with those who suffer.

The contrast between God and humanity emphasized by Barth has been developed in different ways by other members of what has been called “dialectical theology,” or NEO-ORTHODOXY, including Swiss theologian EMIL BRUNNER (1889–1966) and the German theologians FRIEDRICH GOGARTEN (1887–1967) and RUDOLF BULTMANN (1884–1976). While, under the shock of World War I, these theologians saw the shortcoming of liberal theology in focusing too strongly on humanity and not enough on God, they refused to sever the relation of God and humanity in their theological thinking. Brunner, in contradistinction to Barth, continued the search for a “point of connection” between humanity and God, and Gogarten tried to identify God in the midst of human history to such an extent that in 1933 he united with the so-called “GERMAN CHRISTIANS” who found God at work in National Socialism (Gogarten, nevertheless, maintained a certain level of resistance when he rejected their racist ideology). Bultmann’s later efforts at demythologizing the Gospel to make it more understandable and useful for modern humanity show not only his efforts to adapt to the modern world (the remaining challenge of Christianity, where it must not adapt, has to do with the fact that God’s GRACE is given without merit), but also another aspect characteristic of this group of theologians: Humanity is seen by and large in terms of the modern middle class, with little awareness of the lower classes (except for the early Barth) and relatively little awareness of non-Western and non-European humanity. This is the case also in the work of the German-American theologian PAUL TILLICH (1886–1965) and his attempt to develop a “method of correlation” that brings together theological answers and existential human questions. Tillich’s questions identify the Western middle class’s anxiety, meaninglessness, and despair as universal human questions.

In this regard, the theology of DIETRICH BONHOEFFER (1906–1945), a theologian who was executed at the end of World War II for his resistance to Adolf Hitler and National Socialism, introduced a new element. In agreement with the new theological focus on the reality of God, Bonhoeffer argued for theology’s need to follow God where God has preceded us—not only out of the church into the world in general, but also to the underside of history—and to see things from that perspective. “Our relation to God is a new life in ‘existence for others’, through participation in the being of Jesus” (Bonhoeffer 1971:381). Bonhoeffer, whose life ended on the underside of Western culture and in persecution and imprisonment, provided new theological impulses without being able to pursue them to the next level.

In the United States, resistance took a different shape. Theologians like REINHOLD NIEBUHR (1892–1971) and his brother H. RICHARD NIEBUHR (1894–1962) began in their own ways to question the adaptation of the cultural characteristics of liberal theology. The central theological theme in their work and in a broader movement of that time known as neoorthodoxy is, as in continental dialectical theology, the sovereignty of God. In these approaches, however, this theme is connected with a stronger focus on the nature of human sinfulness. This leads to what is often seen as a more realistic assessment of the human predicament, picked up by so-called “Christian realism.” Against liberal optimism, these theologians seek to develop a view of God and the world that takes into account our limitations. H. Richard Niebuhr’s reflections on Christ and culture, for instance, expanded Troeltsch’s “historical relativism in the light of theological and theo-centric relativism” (Niebuhr 1951: xii). Niebuhr did not advocate relating Christ and culture either in terms of a synthesis (here he resisted liberal theology) or in terms of a contradiction (here he resisted more radical theologies of resistance). His sympathies tended to be closer to his final model, according to which Christ transforms culture. One of the achievements of these approaches is that they reintroduce concerns about sociopolitical developments into theological reflection. Reinhold Niebuhr’s assessment of colonialism is a case in point that demonstrates both the broad perspective of his work and the principles of Christian realism. Niebuhr is one of the few theologians to deal with the moral ambiguity of COLONIALISM. At the same time, however, Niebuhr defends U.S. imperialism by economic means as a more advanced model that provides a service to the world. The European sense of ethnic and cultural superiority, in his opinion, was much worse and caused much more harm.

The Second Half of the Twentieth Century

The second half of the twentieth century was heavily influenced by the events of the first half. Theologians from both Jewish and Christian traditions have raised questions as to how theology can still be done in light of the murder of six million Jews in the Holocaust and in light of the two World Wars. Such questions have been taken up by German Protestant theologians like JÜRGEN MOLTMANN (1926–) and Dorothee Sölle (1929–2003), and American Protestant theologian Frederick Herzog (1925–1995). In an effort to inspire Christianity's engagement with its Jewish heritage, Moltmann's work developed to a significant degree in dialogue with Jewish theological themes, including fresh research on messianic and apocalyptic traditions.

Other mainline theologians went back to the basic tenets of liberal theology to develop them further. In the United States of the 1970s, John Macquarrie announced that the star of FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834), the father of liberal Protestant theology, was rising once again. The work of Schubert M. Ogden (1928–) builds on the foundations laid by the work of Rudolf Bultmann and tries, in conversation with other contemporary perspectives, to be "at once appropriate" to Christian witness "and credible to men and women today" (Ogden 1992:19). John B.Cobb, Jr. (1925–), one of the founders of PROCESS THEOLOGY, seeks to develop another natural theology (one of the classic concerns of liberal theology) on the basis of the process philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947). In Germany, WOLFHART PANNENBERG (1928–) is attempting to connect theology with a future-directed universal history.

In the United States, resistance to this new liberal theology, sometimes called "revisionist theology," emerged in postliberal theology. George Lindbeck (1923–) questions liberal theological approaches that are based on general religious experience and proposes an approach to theology built on the texts of the CHURCH and the cultures that are based on those texts. Postliberal theology aims at reshaping the world in terms of the texts of the church. This agenda shares various parallels with certain strands of so-called "evangelical theology," particularly in its emphasis on the BIBLE as represented in the work of theologians like Donald Bloesch (1928–) and others, and in similar critiques of what is seen as the "secular culture" of modernity. Nevertheless, evangelicals generally prefer a more realist view of the biblical texts than postliberals. Despite significant differences, however, liberal, postliberal, and evangelical paradigms share in common a focus on cultural phenomena and a focus on the Western world. There is little awareness of political and economic horizons and virtually no discussion of questions of power. Of the theologians that belong to these groups, only John B.Cobb in his later work breaks the mold in significant ways by dealing with economic and ecological issues and by introducing themes of resistance.

The second half of the twentieth century also gave birth to a strong ecumenical theology movement, closely related to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. This movement significantly extends the narrow focus on the Western world that characterizes much of twentieth-century theology. Often overlooked by “firstworld” Protestant theology is the work of such theologians as D.T.Niles (1908–1970) from Sri Lanka and M.M.Thomas (1916–1996) from INDIA. Thomas’s reflections on SALVATION as “humanization” pushes beyond Western anthropocentrism, and Niles reminds theology of the significance of the presence of the Holy Spirit outside of traditionally Christian contexts.

Transitions Into the Twenty-first Century

It might be argued that twentieth-century theology ends not with a particular date. The themes of mainline twentieth-century theology are interrupted by new themes and issues raised in Protestant theology in the final decades of the century that come from voices that have not traditionally been part of academic theological discussions. These voices include various political theologies and liberation theologies as well as feminist and African-American theologies in the United States. In these contexts, the horizon of theology is expanded to include questions of POLITICS and ECONOMICS and the lives of people crushed by these powers. In the process, the notion of culture is broadened significantly to include not only popular cultures, but also many other expressions and struggles that have not been part of mainline Protestant theology. Academic theology is thus no longer centered solely in the middle classes in the United States and Europe, even though these affiliations continue. Some of the most prominent newer names in Protestant theology at the end of the twentieth century include José Míguez Bonino (1924–) from Argentina, C.S.Song (1929–) from Taiwan, and Elsa Tamez (1950–) from Costa Rica. This diversity in theology has led to a wealth of new theological insights that complement some of the mainline twentieth-century debates that are still with us and that continue to be addressed by such European thinkers as Moltmann and Pannenberg as well as Rowan Williams, John Milbank, Sarah Coakley, Miroslav Volf, and Michael Welker. Add to these voices those of the evangelical Protestant theologians and this diversity has also led to concerns that theology is becoming more fragmented and fractured. Nevertheless, new forms of unity emerge in the midst of this diversity where theologians address God’s responses to human suffering and where they come up once again with theological forms of resistance rooted in their own experiences of the power of God.

See also African Theology; Asian Theology; Black Theology; Dialogue, Interconfessional; Ecumenism; Evangelicalism, Theology of; Feminist Theology; Theology, Twentieth Century British; Theology, Twentieth Century, North American; Womanist Theology.

References and Further Reading

- Barth, Karl. Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century: Its Background and History. Valley Forge, PA: Judson, 1973.
- Bloesch, Donald G. A Theology of Word and Spirit: Authority and Method in Theology. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1992.
- Bonhoeffer, Dietrich. Letters and Papers from Prison. The enlarged edition. Edited by Eberhard Bethge. New York: Touchstone, 1997.
- Bultmann, Rudolf. Faith and Understanding. Edited with an introduction by Robert W. Funk. Translated by Louise Pettibone Smith. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1987.
- Lindbeck, George A. The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1984.
- Moltmann, Jürgen. The Way of Jesus Christ: Christology in Messianic Dimensions. Translated by Margaret Kohl. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1993.
- Niebuhr, H. Richard. Christ and Culture. New York: Harper, 1951.
- Niebuhr, Reinhold. The Structure of Nations and Empires: A Study of the Recurring Patterns and Problems of the Political Order in Relation to the Unique Problems of the Nuclear Age. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1959.
- Ogden, Schubert M. The Point of Christology. Dallas, TX: Southern Methodist University Press, 1992.
- Pannenberg, Wolfhart. Systematische Theologie. 3 vols. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1988 ff. (Systematic Theology. Edinburgh: T.&T. Clark, 1991ff.)
- Rauschenbusch, Walter. A Theology for the Social Gospel. New York: Macmillan, 1917.
- Rieger, Joerg. God and the Excluded: Visions and Blindspots in Contemporary Theology. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2001.
- Ritschl, Albrecht. Three Essays. Translated and with an introduction by Philip Hefner. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1972.
- Thomas, M.M. Salvation and Humanisation: Some Crucial Issues of the Theology of Mission in Contemporary India. Madras, India: Christian Literature Society, 1971.
- Troeltsch, Ernst. The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches. Translated by Olive Wyon, with an introduction by H. Richard Niebuhr. New York: Harper, 1960.

JOERG RIEGER

THEOLOGY, TWENTIETH-CENTURY, BRITISH

Since the English Reformation, theology in Britain has had a significant impact on the character and direction of Protestant theology throughout the world. Its primary contribution to twentieth-century Protestant theology has arguably been its dialogue concerning Incarnational CHRISTOLOGY, its appropriation of KARL BARTH in giving new impetus to Trinitarian thought, discussions on SCIENCE and THEOLOGY, studies on the ATONEMENT, and developments in the field of New Testament.

Twentieth-century British theology must be understood through several historical factors shaping its direction, including the Elizabethan Act of Uniformity (1559) which proposed a via media between Catholic and REFORMATION Theology for ANGLICANISM, the development of nonconformist churches (see NONCONFORMITY), the influence of Cambridge and Oxford Universities as centers of theological education (see CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY), two World Wars, Britain's geographical and consequently theological role as an interface for North American and continental theology, the attack of logical positivism on theology, the liberal-fundamentalist debate, and particularly the ENLIGHTENMENT.

David Ford (1997; 2000c) contends that British theology is best understood not by tracking doctrinal tendencies, but rather through interaction with various disciplines. He opts for a taxonomy of: (1) theology through history, (2) theology through philosophy, and (3) theology and society. The advantage of this approach is that it highlights that British theology has never been performed in a vacuum. Nevertheless, it tends to omit several important areas of theological contention. The approach herein highlights the general tripartite Protestant "parties" and provides an overview of several significant areas of theological discussion in Britain.

Theologies in Conflict: Liberalism, Anglo-Catholicism, and Evangelicalism

Broadly speaking, theological positions in Britain can be divided into liberalism, ANGLO-CATHOLICISM, and EVANGELICALISM, with numerous variations and intersections between them. Theological liberalism (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM) arose in Britain from the Enlightenment critique of supernatural religion and was expressed in LATITUDINARIANISM. Old liberalism (i.e., pre-World War I) was characterized by a perception of the BIBLE as historically fallible, a denial of the miraculous, and a reinterpretation of biblical doctrines such as creation, incarnation, and atonement. Liberalism was also distinguished by social action (see SOCIAL GOSPEL) and the development of an ethical spirituality. R.J.Campbell's work The New Theology (1907) made a forthright case for liberal theology but amounted to virtual pantheism. World War I had a cataclysmic effect on liberal theology, destroying its optimism about human benevolence and the immanence of the KINGDOM OF GOD in human society. Yet it did not wane completely in Britain, with the Modern Churchmen's Union founded in 1928. It was revived further by such scholars as John Macquarrie, who incorporated existential philosophy into their liberal tendency. In the post-World War II setting, the "DEATH OF GOD" debate reached ENGLAND with Bishop JOHN A.T.ROBINSON'S Honest to God (1963), which drew heavily from PAUL TILLICH, for whom God was "the ground of being." Don Cupitt advocated similar ideas in Sea of Faith (1984), couching Christianity in postmodern terms and promoting theological antirealism. D.E.Nineham represented the liberal wing of biblical scholarship and popularized form criticism and RUDOLF BULTMANN'S demythologization. The introduction of comparative religion in Britain had far-reaching consequences, chiefly through John Hick and Maurice Wiles, who vigorously attacked Christian exclusivism.

Anglo-Catholicism is predominantly, but not exclusively, an Anglican phenomenon. Its heritage lies in the Tractarians, especially JOHN HENRY NEWMAN and E.B.Busey, as well as the OXFORD MOVEMENT. It stresses the encounter of God through LITURGY, the need for community, the visible nature of the church, continuity with Roman Catholicism, the centrality of the episcopacy, and a synthesis of scripture, reason, and TRADITION. It reached prominence in the 1920s and 1930s and attracted well-known converts such as authors T.S.ELIOT and C.S.LEWIS. Two notable archbishops of Canterbury, A.M. RAMSAY and Rowan Williams, have given scholarly support to AngloCatholicism. Rowan Williams's On Christian Theology (1999) has granted Anglo-Catholic theology arguably its most succinct and cogent theological expression to date. He avers that theology operates in three domains: the celebratory, the communicative and the critical. In a work titled Radical Orthodoxy (1999), Anglo-Catholic scholars such as John Milbank, Catherine Pickstock, and Graham Ward have endeavored to engage postmodernism (see POSTMODERNITY) from an Anglo-Catholic perspective and yet retain their essentially orthodox beliefs.

British evangelicalism is a transdenominational phenomenon that owes its roots to PURITANISM, PIETISM, and Revivalism (see REVIVALS), and emerged more fully from the liberal-fundamentalist debate. The overarching agenda was to maintain biblical AUTHORITY, an emphasis on personal CONVERSION, and a focus on the atonement. The movement has had several prominent preachers and theologians. J.I.Packer has been a leading evangelical exponent, with works such as Fundamentalism and the Word of God (1958). John Stott is another evangelical voice known for Bible exposition as well as his concern for evangelical unity and social action. G.Campbell Morgan and Martin Lloyd Jones were prominent preachers, with Lloyd Jones even calling for evangelicals to leave their liberal-run denominations. The Tyndale Fellowship for Biblical Research has attempted to promote evangelical biblical scholarship. Gordon Wenham, F.F.Bruce, and I.Howard Marshall are examples of evangelicals who made in-roads into biblical scholarship. Alister McGrath has endeavored to help evangelicalism recapture its reformed heritage. A charismatic stream of evangelicalism has also emerged in figures such as Michael Green (see PENTECOSTALISM). The tension in evangelical theology has been one of defense against liberalism, the quandary of relating to other Christian groups, self-definition, and balancing evangelistic zeal with social action.

Significant Areas of Theological Discourse

An important development in British Christology began with Charles Gore in an edited work Lux Mundi (1889), which attempted to reconcile chalcedonic christology with the conclusion of critical scholarship. The solution was a Kenotic theology that emphasized Jesus's self-emptying of his divine attributes to participate fully in humanity. The view found prominent defenders in H.R.Mackintosh and PETER TAYLOR FORSYTH. JOHN BAILLIE represented a synthesis of NEO ORTHODOXY, liberalism, and mysticism that saw revelation given uniquely in Christ but not exclusively to Christianity. His brother Donald Baillie, in God Was in Christ (1948), reaffirmed the humanness of Christ and defended the liberal view that Jesus was a man who fully discovered God and in whom God dwelt. The incarnation is understood as a paradox of GRACE wherein God dwells in Christ, who ascribes all goodness to God. John Macquarrie used existentialism as a matrix for christology. John Hick advocated a pluralistic framework for christology and a view of the incarnation in terms of myth and metaphor. Historical treatments of christological origins were published by C.F.D.Moule and I.Howard Marshall. James D.G. Dunn, in Christology in the Making (1981), examined the development of christology from its Jewish framework, alleging that Jesus did not think of himself as pre-existent and neither did Paul, who instead used Adam and wisdom motifs to express Christ's cosmic significance. In contrast, Richard Bauckham, in God Crucified (1998), advocated that second-temple Jewish was indeed a "strict monotheism," but the concept of God was constituted in such a way as to make it possible for Jesus to be incorporated into the divine identity. N.T.Wright has argued similarly that early Christianity redefined God so as to accommodate their belief in Christ. This suggests (contra Macquarrie 1990:327) that British christological discussion is more than a commentary and criticism of Continental ideas.

In contrast to the liberal view of ESCHATOLOGY that saw the Kingdom of God progressing immanently through human society and the wholly futurist eschatology of ALBERT SCHWEITZER, C.H.Dodd set forth a "realized eschatology" that saw the kingdom as present and manifested in Jesus's ministry dislocating futuristic hopes of the kingdom. Popular as Dodd's thesis was, it has been eclipsed by a more balanced approach to biblical eschatology that stresses the kingdom as being both a present reality and a future event. Such a view was arguably foreshadowed in the work of JOSEPH B. LIGHTFOOT. JOHN A.T.ROBINSON attempted to revive the idea of a nonapocalyptic eschatology by focusing on the Gospel of John as being indicative of Jesus's eschatology. The parousia of Christ is a symbolic presentation of what happens when Christ comes in love. Richard Bauckham popularized JÜRGEN MOLTMANN'S "Theology of Hope," making it more widely known in Britain. G.B.Caird questioned the nature and function of apocalyptic language in the Bible, contending that attempts to invest political events with cosmic meaning were problematic.

In terms of the doctrine of God, the most vigorous discussion centered on the Trinity. Heavily indebted to KARL BARTH, Thomas Torrance and Colin Gunton were the vanguard of a resurgence of Trinitarian thought in the British academy. For Gunton, the Trinity is not a mathematical enigma, but rather encapsulates the heart of the Christian gospel. Ultimately, it is Christ who makes the Trinity visible and accessible to us. Moreover, the church is an institution called to reflect on earth the eternal divine community of the Trinity.

British theology has been the battleground for competing interpretations of Christ's death. The view of penal substitution was attacked by liberalism on the grounds that it rested on the unacceptable notion of original sin and the idea of vicarious sacrifice was morally reprehensible. H.Rashdall, in The Idea of Atonement (1919), launched a barrage of criticism against the historical doctrine, instead arguing for a moral improvement theory. According to Donald Baillie and John Macquarrie, the atonement is not a once-for-all activity, but rather illustrates God's continuing reconciliation with creation and constitutes a continual or eternal event. P.T.FORSYTH wrote several works on the atonement, including The Cruciality of the Cross (1909) and The Justification of God (1916). In conjunction to his defense of penal sacrifice, Forsyth suggested that the cross is God's means of restoring justice in the cosmos. His emphasis on christology and grace largely foreshadowed Karl Barth. Similar apologies for substitutionary atonement were offered by James Denney, Vincent Taylor, John Stott, J.I.Packer, and I.Howard Marshall. Alister McGrath's study of justification represents an effort to restore the doctrine back to centrality in evangelicalism. Richard Swinburne's Responsibility and Atonement (1989) put forward the notion that Jesus's sacrifice is a gift of utmost value to God that humans may plead upon. Colin Gunton in The Actuality of Atonement (1988) and Vernon White in Atonement and Incarnation (1991) have defended an objective approach to the atonement, contending that genuine rec-onciliation is contingent on a real, extrinsic action by God in the cross that confronts SIN and moral evil.

The tradition of British biblical scholarship that commenced with F.J.A.Hort, B.F.Westcott, and J.B.Lightfoot continued on in the twentieth century. The International Critical Commentary series has provided an outlet to express the finest of British biblical scholarship. The Biblical theology movement evolving out of GERMANY gained a foothold in Britain through H.Wheeler Robinson, H.H.Rowley, F.V. Wilson, and Vincent Taylor. Several glaring criticisms were leveled at the movement by James Barr, which significantly diminished its influence. Anthony Thiselton sought to awaken biblical scholarship to the challenges posed by hermeneutics. Postmodern reading strategies have received support on various fronts, particularly from John Barton. James D.G.Dunn coined the term "the New Perspective on Paul," which asserts that Paul's problem with Judaism was not over Jewish legalism, but rather over Jewish exclusivism. Patristics studies have also been furthered by Hendry Chadwick, Rowan Williams, Maurice Wiles, and Frances Young advocating their significance for the modern church.

Since the publication of Charles Darwin's The Origin of the Species (1859), theologians have had to wrestle with scientific theories and their relationship to theological doctrines (see DARWINISM). The relationship between the two disciplines has been explicated by Arthur Peacocke, T.F.Torrance, John Polkinghorne, and Alister McGrath. Keith Ward, in God, Chance and Necessity (1996), attempted to expose the scientific and philosophical inadequacies of scientific atheism. An integration of philosophy and theology was attempted by Richard Swinburne and Donald MacKinnon. The former attempted to demonstrate the philosophical coherence of Christian doctrine, while the later studiously engaged metaphysics, evil, and Marxism in relation to Christian doctrines such as christology and the Trinity. Logical positivism made a strong challenge to theology in Britain by asserting that theological language was unverifiable and therefore meaningless. Several responses followed, including that of John Hick, who saw religious belief as eschatologically verifiable. Others tried to legitimize God-talk through Wittgensteinian philosophy.

ECUMENISM gained a strong following in Britain in the twentieth century. Advances were made at the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE of 1910 in Edinburgh, the 1920 LAMBETH CONFERENCE, and from the Faith and Order Movement. JOHN R. MOTT, John Baillie, and WILLIAM TEMPLE were instrumental in providing the theological rationale behind ecumenism and formation of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. This coincided with several studies on the church by British scholars such as L. Thornton, A. M. Ramsay, R. N. Flew, and J. E. LESSLIE NEWBIGIN. However, ECCLESIOLOGY has generally been eclipsed by other doctrinal discussions, and publications in Continental Europe by Barth, Karl Rahner, Hans Küng, and Jürgen Moltmann have dominated debate. The Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission has maintained steady contact between CANTERBURY and ROME, dialoguing on such issues as authority, CHURCH, eucharist, ETHICS, justification, and ministry.

LIBERATION THEOLOGY found expression in urban theology, the "Radical Evangelicals," the British Jubilee group, and a scholarly voice in Christopher Rowland. Feminist, black, and gay theologies likewise have respectively emerged since the 1970s with the formation of such journals as Theology and Sexuality stimulating thought in adjacent areas (see FEMINIST THEOLOGY; HOMOSEXUALITY; BLACK THEOLOGY; WOMANIST THEOLOGY). Despite the critique of Barth, the British tradition of natural theology that started with WILLIAM PALEY was continued by F. R. Tennant, Basil Mitchell, John Hick, and Richard Swinburne and publicized through the Gifford lectures.

Conclusion

A distinguishing feature of British twentieth-century theology is that it has never been dominated by one school or figure. Although significant inroads were made by Barth, Tillich, and Bultmann, various philosophies such as existentialism and logical positivism, and theological movements like death of God theology and neo-orthodoxy, none came to dominate Britain's theological landscape. This is perhaps attributable to the emergence of a significant breadth of theological diversification in Britain, further enhanced by the fact that since the Reformation the British have never taken to religious excesses and have always preferred the via media.

Whereas in the twentieth century British theologians had to grapple with Christianity and MODERNISM, it appears that in the twenty-first century a similar struggle will be waged over Postmodernity. The gradual de-Christianization of Britain through an increasingly secularized and multifaith population, the rise of relativistic epistemologies, and religious pluralism will present their own unique challenges to British theology in the future.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Education, Overview; Evangelicalism, Theology of; Secularization; Theology, Twentieth-Century; Theology, Twentieth-Century, Global

References and Further Reading

- Ford, David F., ed. The Modern Theologians: An Introduction to Christian Theology in the Twentieth Century. 2nd ed. 225–305. Blackwell, UK: Oxford, 1997.
- . “Theological Wisdom, British Style.” The Christian Century 117 no.11 (2000a):388–391.
- . “British Theology After a Trauma: Divisions and Conversations.” The Christian Century 117 no. 12 (2000b): 425–431.
- . “British Theology: Movements and Churches,” The Christian Century 117 no. 13 (2000c):467–473.
- Gunton, Colin. “An English Systematic Theology?” Scottish Journal of Theology 46 (1993):479–496.
- Hastings, A. A History of English Christianity 1920–1990. 2nd ed. London: SCM, 1991.
- Macquarrie, John. Jesus Christ in Modern Thought. London: SCM, 1990.
- Worrall, B.G. The Making of the Modern Church: Christianity in England Since 1800. London: SPCK, 1988.

MICHAEL BIRD

THEOLOGY, TWENTIETH-CENTURY, GLOBAL

Theology is reflection on God; for Christians, it is “faith-seeking understanding.” It may also include fundamental theology or natural theology, which are attempts to provide rational support to belief in God and God’s self-revelation that faith grasps. Christian theology began with the second-century church fathers; Protestant theology arose in the sixteenth century with the reforming movements led by MARTIN LUTHER, HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, and JOHN CALVIN. The nineteenth century was a particularly successful one for Protestant theology, in that it flourished and underwent several renewals. During that century, Protestant theology in Europe began to come to terms with the ENLIGHTENMENT and scientific revolutions. FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER and ALBRECHT RITSCHL gave great impetus to the progressive movements in Protestant theology during the nineteenth century. They sought to do theology in a manner consistent with modern philosophy’s “turn to the subject”; their theologies took seriously universal human experience as a source and norm for Christian theological reflection. Also during the nineteenth century, Protestant ORTHODOXY underwent a revival, especially in North America, where a dynasty of conservative Protestant thinkers at Princeton Theological Seminary influenced generations of Protestant ministers and theologians for a theology of Reformed retrieval (“back to the sources”) that opposed accommodation to the modern thought world.

Divergent Directions

As the twentieth century dawned, two opposing forces of Protestant theology threatened to tear it apart. On the one hand, the heirs of Schleiermacher and followers of Ritschl developed various forms of liberal Protestant theology, which was labeled “MODERNISM” by its more conservative critics (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). On the other hand, the followers of the Old Princeton School theologians Charles Hodge and Benjamin Warfield joined forces with revivalists influenced by evangelist DWIGHT L. MOODY to form the fundamentalist movement to oppose liberal theology. Fundamentalists emphasized the AUTHORITY of Scripture interpreted relatively literally and promoted what they regarded as “traditional Christianity.” They condemned any deviation from what they considered the “fundamentals” of the true Protestant Christian faith. Among their fundamentals were the verbal inspiration of Scripture, the virgin birth of Jesus Christ, and the substitutionary ATONEMENT. Some added the “premillennial return of Christ” to the list of Christian fundamentals. FUNDAMENTALISM came in many variations, all of which opposed progressive Protestantism's tendency to accommodate to the spirit of modernity. The most influential fundamentalist theologian was the last representative of the Old Princeton School of Protestant theology, J.GRESHAM MACHEN, whose book Christianity and Liberalism (1923) declared the theology being developed by Schleiermacher's and Ritschl's progressive heirs not authentically Christian but a different religion altogether.

Liberal Protestant theology's leading defender and expositor at the opening of the twentieth century was German church historian ADOLPH VON HARNACK, whose What Is Christianity? (Das Wesen des Christentums) was published in 1900. Interpreting his mentor Ritschl's revisionist approach to Protestant theology, Harnack summed up Christianity with three basic principles: the KINGDOM OF GOD and its coming, God the father and the infinite value of the human soul, and the higher righteousness and the commandment of love. According to Harnack and most other progressive Protestants, the essence of Christianity has little or nothing to do with supernatural events or the traditional dogmas of the person of Jesus Christ; rather, it has to do with the message proclaimed by Jesus Christ about the historical kingdom of God as a real possibility within history. In the UNITED STATES, Baptist theologian and church historian WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH and other progressives formed a type of liberal theology known as the SOCIAL GOSPEL that blended the liberal emphasis on the historical kingdom of God with evangelical themes of CONVERSION and transformation. Rauschenbusch's influential manifesto, published in 1917 as A Theology for the Social Gospel, proclaims the essence of Christianity as the kingdom of God as a society organized according to love. Whereas liberal theology revolved around an optimistic vision of human nature and history, fundamentalist theology was pessimistic about humanity and the future. It stressed humanity's sinfulness and incapacity for good apart from supernatural transformation by God; liberal theology viewed God's transforming activity as in and through human social progress. Liberal theology encouraged a spirit of free inquiry and nondogmatic theology within the churches, whereas fundamentalist theology promoted commitment to what it saw as Protestant Christianity's foundational beliefs even against the allegedly assured results of modern SCIENCE and philosophy. By the 1920s, fundamentalism and liberal thought were locked in mortal combat over the souls of most mainline Protestant denominations, many of which experienced divisions over the issues raised in the fundamentalist-modernist strife.

Dialectical Theology

Many commentators believe that twentieth-century theology was actually born in 1919 with the publication of Swiss Protestant theologian KARL BARTH'S Der Römerbrief (The Epistle to the Romans), a theological commentary on Romans. According to one historian, the book "fell like a bombshell on the playground of the theologians." A new school of Protestant theology that would indelibly place its stamp on twentieth-century theology was being born that would be known popularly as NEO-ORTHODOXY and as dialectical theology by most scholars. Its two main early representatives were Barth in Basel, SWITZERLAND and EMIL BRUNNER, who taught theology in Zurich, Switzerland. Barth's magnum opus, the multivolume Church Dogmatics (1932–1967), is the classic of the movement, whereas Brunner's smaller three-volume Dogmatics (1946–1960) and other writings first introduced neoorthodoxy to English-speaking audiences. In Der Römerbrief, Barth countered liberal Protestant theology with a strong emphasis on the transcendence of God and God's Word and a stress on humanity's sinfulness and need for obedience to the Word that is foreign to its own thinking. Although many liberals—including Barth's teacher Harnack—regarded the first soundings of neo-orthodoxy as little more than a sophisticated version of fundamentalism, it was in actuality far from fundamentalistic.

Neither Barth nor Brunner, nor any other dialectical theologian, affirmed the verbal inspiration and inerrancy of Scripture (see BIBLICAL INERRANCY). Brunner denied the virgin birth (although not because of antisupernatural bias) and raised questions about many of the Bible's miracle stories. Both Swiss theologians and their followers decried liberal theology's perceived maximal acknowledgment of the claims of modernity and fundamentalism's perceived slavish adherence to its own "paper pope," the BIBLE. For neo-orthodox thinkers, the Bible "becomes the Word of God" in the moment when God chooses to speak through it; the Word of God is event and not propositions. Nevertheless, they averred, the Word of God in and through Jesus Christ, Scripture and the proclamation of the CHURCH, contradicts every human ideology and zeitgeist (spirit of the age) and invites people into crisis with God, where they are judged and called to repent. Against both liberal theology and fundamentalism, neo-orthodoxy embraced paradox as a necessary form of theological expression. Lurking behind dialectical theology was the figure of nineteenth-century Protestant philosophical prophet SÖREN KIERKEGAARD OF DENMARK, who embraced the incarnation as the "absolute paradox" and eschewed attempts to achieve a synthesis of truth based on human reasoning.

Twentieth-century Protestant theology can be understood largely in terms of these three major movements of thought and their permutations: liberal Protestantism, Protestant fundamentalism, and neoorthodoxy. In 1959 Protestant publisher Westminster Press presented three volumes by proponents of these three general theological movements with the intention of summarizing twentieth-century theology under this rubric: The Case for Orthodox Theology by EDWARD JOHN CARNELL, The Case for a New Reformation Theology by William Hordern, and The Case for Theology in Liberal Perspective by L. Harold DeWolf. Carnell, who was president of Fuller Theological Seminary, was not representative of the militant wing of fundamentalism; his book was influenced by the Protestant orthodoxy of the Old Princeton School of Hodge and Warfield. Hordern preferred "new Reformation theology" to "neo-orthodoxy," but his volume presented dialectical theology. However, these three types of Protestant theology hardly exhaust the range of theological opinion in the twentieth century.

Two of the century's most influential Protestant thinkers cannot be comfortably categorized by them. REINHOLD NIEBUHR (1892–1971) and PAUL TILLICH (1886–1965) broke out of the molds of liberal Protestant theology without becoming neo-orthodox. Neither was fundamentalist. Niebuhr's magnum opus The Nature and Destiny of Man (1941–1949) represented a manifesto for "Christian realism" that blended elements of neo-orthodox pessimism about humanity with liberal elements of accommodation to modern CULTURE. Niebuhr also affirmed the traditional symbols of Protestant orthodoxy even if he did not interpret them literally. According to Niebuhr, liberal theology overestimated the human potential for per-fection and underestimated human depravity as pride. He retrieved the classical Augustinian doctrine of original SIN from its neglect by liberal Protestantism while leaving behind the literalism of the fall of humanity in the primeval garden. He interpreted the kingdom of God as an impossible ideal that is always coming but never arriving, and warned against eschewing harsh justice because it falls short of the perfection of love. Tillich's three-volume Systematic Theology (1951–1963) presented a chastened liberalism heavily influenced by existentialist philosophy with its tragic sense of the human condition. According to Tillich, God is not to be thought of anthropomorphically as “person” but ontologically as “Being Itself” or “the Ground of Being,” and humanity is not infinitely perfectible, but rather is caught in the polarities of a predicament that leads inevitably to sin. Nevertheless, human beings can come to accept that they are accepted by Being Itself and thereby achieve the “courage to be” in the face of the threat of nonbeing.

Other Theologies

The 1960s witnessed the fragmentation of Protestant theology with the rise of secular and radical theology, the theology of Christian atheism, PROCESS THEOLOGY, theology of hope, and the beginnings of LIBERATION THEOLOGY. Conservative theology also experienced a renewal as it emerged out of militant fundamentalism into a less restrictive and separatistic “new evangelical theology.” One of the most influential Protestant voices in the 1960s was that of one who died in a German concentration camp in 1945—DIETRICH BONHOEFFER. His Letters and Papers from Prison was published by one of his students in the 1950s and 1960s (it appeared in several editions containing different collections of letters and papers) and aroused a great deal of excitement, especially among so-called secular and radical Protestants who hailed the arrival of “religionless Christianity” in a “world come of age.” Precisely what Bonhoeffer meant by these and other enigmatic phrases is a matter of debate, but many radical Protestant theologians interpreted them as promoting a secularized church that allows the world to set its agenda. A few more radical Protestant thinkers proclaimed the “DEATH OF GOD” in modern culture and promoted the “gospel of Christian atheism,” which was a message about the way of Jesus Christ devoid of a transcendent divine being. In GERMANY, JÜRGEN MOLTMANN published A Theology of Hope (1964) and The Crucified God (1968), in which he expounded an alternative theological vision to secular and radical theology that placed God in the future and traced the arrival of God out of the future in the promises of God and in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. WOLFHART PANNENBERG also created an eschatological theology that defined God as the God of history whose full deity would appear and be finally established only at the end of history. History itself is divine revelation, and God is realizing or actualizing Godself in and through humanity's discovery of God. For all their differences, the two German theologians presented a way of thinking about God and the world that took with utmost seriousness the secularity of the world and the evil within history without discarding God or the sacred.

The 1960s also witnessed the rise of “POLITICAL THEOLOGY” within both Roman Catholic and Protestant theological communities. In Germany, Johannes Baptist Metz, Dorothee Sölle, and Jürgen Moltmann called for greater application of the Gospel to the creation of a just society of equal persons; they decried the continuing tendency of some theologians to focus attention on questions of secularity and atheism while the poor became poorer and the rich became richer. In LATIN AMERICA, various liberation theologies arose beginning in the late 1960s and gained strength throughout the 1970s and into the 1980s. Argentinian Methodist theologian Jose Miguez Bonino joined Catholic theologian Gustavo Gutierrez of Peru and other Catholic and Protestant thinkers in calling for Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation (1975). For liberationists, theology must recognize God’s preferential option for the poor and the privileged insight into God provided by poverty. It must also side with the poor in their struggle for liberation from all that dehumanizes and oppresses them. In North America, Presbyterian feminist theologian Letty Russell attempted to do liberation theology from a feminist perspective and joined with Catholic feminists Rosemary Radford Ruether and Elizabeth Schüssler Fiorenza in calling for a radical revision in Christian theological categories and language to rid them of patriarchy and misogyny. The second half of the century saw Protestants of various theological orientations entering into positive dialogue and alliances with Roman Catholic thinkers, overcoming many, if not most, of the hostilities that separated Protestant and Catholic communities of scholars before the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965).

Non-Western Protestant theologians increasingly weighed in to the theological conversations during the second half of the twentieth century. One of the first Asian Protestant theologians to gain worldwide notice was Japanese Lutheran thinker Kazoh Kitamori, whose 1946 Theology of the Pain of God went through many editions and translations. Kitamori reflected on the suffering of God in the tragedies of history against the background of his own country’s defeat at the end of World War II. He questioned the traditional doctrines of God’s immutability and impassibility and brought resources from his own culture to bear on reconstructing the doctrine of God’s transcendence and immanence. About a year before Kitamori’s book was published, Dietrich Bonhoeffer wrote that “only the suffering God can help.” Their dual influence led to a vast reconsideration of God’s involvement in the historical travail of humanity.

During the last few decades of the century, other Asian theologians contributed to the ongoing discussions about contextualization of the Gospel and the nature of theological reflection. Kosuke Koyama, a Japanese theologian working in Thailand and Singapore, drew on South Asian cultural resources to shape a new Christian theology specifically for Asian Christians. His best-known and most influential volume of Asian theology is Waterbuffalo Theology (1974). A Chinese theologian, Choan-Seng Song of Taiwan, published several volumes of theology that sought to integrate Christianity with traditional and modern Chinese culture. His Third-Eye Theology (1979) argued for the development of a new vision for Christian theologians that incorporates Asian culture with its mystical insights into Christian theology shaped by the more rational West.

The continent of AFRICA contributed a number of fresh Christian approaches to theology during the 1970s through the 1990s. Among them was a creative new interpretation of the doctrine of the Trinity based on African tribal and family structures titled On Communitarian Divinity: An African Interpretation of the Trinity (1994). In North America, Puerto Rican Methodist church historian and theologian Justo González helped create a Christian theology from a Hispanic perspective in his Mañana: Christian Theology from a Hispanic Perspective (1990). There he argued for greater attention by theologians of all ethnic and denominational background to the plights of powerless minorities in cultures dominated by powerful majorities and sought to show that such powerless minorities have the right and the responsibility to develop their own forms of Christian life, worship, and theology.

As the twentieth century drew to a close, Protestant theology was more fragmented than ever. Many Protestant theologians were less concerned about carrying the torch for Protestantism and its distinctive themes than about developing contextual theologies that cross traditional boundaries.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Evangelicalism, Theology of; Theology; Theology, Twentieth-Century; Theology, Twentieth Century, British.

References and Further Reading

González, Justo. Out of Every Tribe and Nation: Christian Theology at the Ethnic Roundtable. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1992.

Grenz, Stanley J., and Roger E. Olson. 20th Century Theology: God and the World in a Transitional Age. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992.

Livingston, James, and Francis Schüssler Fiorenza, eds. Modern Christian Thought, Volume II: The Twentieth Century. Rev. ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 2000.

ROGER E. OLSON

THEOLOGY, TWENTIETH-CENTURY, NORTH AMERICAN

The great majority of North American Protestant Christians in the twentieth century was influenced by theologies of the Reformed and Evangelical traditions. The First Great AWAKENING, typified by North America's preeminent theologian, JONATHAN EDWARDS, and the revivals of the nineteenth-century Second Great Awakening, set the general terms of North American theological thought and practice. It was liberal theology, however, that became the prominent antagonist in twentieth century theological schools and mainline denominations (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM).

The European ENLIGHTENMENT'S disruption of orthodox Christianity arrived in full force in North America only after the CIVIL WAR. Devastating dismissals of Christianity and theology by the doubt and atheism of the modern intellectual world led to the enduring twentieth-century conundrum: how to reestablish theology's integrity as a discipline. Five crises have confronted twentieth-century American theology, and at least the first four have their roots in the Enlightenment. The first crisis is epistemological, that is, the problem of knowledge, introduced classically by JOHN LOCKE and IMMANUEL KANT. If we become clear about the limits of human knowledge, then theology must press the question: Can God really be known, and if so, how?

The second crisis is one of AUTHORITY. The modern dedication to the new criteria of historical reliability was eventually applied to the BIBLE and the Christian TRADITION. This led to questions that are still current: To what extent must theology recover the Christian past, or can theology do without the "house of authority"? If we are conditioned by many factors in our context as we seek to interpret the past, what would constitute true interpretation of scripture and tradition? Should the primary task of theology be establishing the identity of the Christian faith or demonstrating its relevance to MODERNITY?

A third crisis was prompted by the application of scientific approaches, such as historical critical methods, to religion itself. Modern thinkers such as Karl Marx, Charles Darwin (see DARWINISM), and Sigmund Freud offered alternatives to the traditional story of Christianity (embracing creation and new creation) and in the process gave alternative, reductionist explanations of religion. Can theology describe religion in such a limited way as to protect it from the "science" of history, or does theology need an altogether new overarching conception of history? A fourth crisis stems from the violence, oppression, and suffering of the twentieth century, which was dubbed at its beginning "the Christian century" but, as it unfolded, mocked the Enlightenment visions of eternal peace, freedom, and justice. Two World Wars, Fascism, state COMMUNISM, the nuclear threat, the massive growth of technology, and the global market with the attendant degradation of the environment, recalcitrant forms of racism, GENDER oppression, and neocolonialism were negations that contradicted everything modernity stood for. Theology in the twentieth century ended with a final crisis, that is, the collapse of modernity itself. How could theology proceed without its failed modernist partners?

North American theologies in the twentieth century, whether in the Reformed/Evangelical strands or in the “liberal” strands, can be categorized according to their responses to these pressing questions of “modernity.” At the turn of the century liberal theology on both sides of the Atlantic was thriving. It was recognizable by its attempt to rehabilitate theology in the face of modernity by stressing practical reason, subjectivity, ethical/moral content, the immanence of God, and the centrality of freedom. It recommended abandoning doctrines that seemed clearly antimodern, such as original sin, and reinterpreting other doctrines according to the spirit of the age, for example, jettisoning the divinity of Jesus in favor of his ethical teachings. It grounded theology in immediate human experience, following the lead of the first “liberal” theologian, FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER, thus obviating the problem of mediating God through scripture or tradition.

A second skein of liberal theology shaping much of American theology through the 1930s sprang from what some scholars call the “Third Great Awakening” or the SOCIAL GOSPEL. Informed by the theology of ALBRECHT BENJAMIN RITSCHL, it was inspired by a vision of human progress. The “KINGDOM OF GOD” was interpreted as a realm of static values guiding society toward perfection. WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH and SHAILER MATHEWS provided the theological framework for the radical criticism of the unjust economic conditions produced by unregulated industrial giants and the first modern economic globalization. An old theological motif of the coming of the kingdom of God in America was revived.

There were three strands of North American theology that radically broke off from liberal and modernist theology during the first three decades of the twentieth century. The initial torrid enemy of liberal theology arose in the form of FUNDAMENTALISM and extreme EVANGELICALISM, movements that thoroughly resisted modernity, although it is widely recognized that in their opposition to modernity these thought forms took on modern characteristics. Fundamentalists used doctrines like biblical inerrancy and the premillennial return of Christ as barriers to separate themselves from secular culture. It is generally thought that fundamentalism as a major force ended with the Scopes “monkey” trial of 1925, but its temper continued to influence some evangelicals until it was repudiated by the “new” evangelicalism after World War II.

A second type of theological criticism of liberal secular culture uses a thought system of modernity (such as idealist, empiricist, or historicist philosophies or a combination of them) to overcome the challenges of modernity, but in so doing assumes that Christianity has validity only insofar as it fits into a modern philosophical framework. Out of this approach arose the first peculiarly American theologies of the twentieth century based on the empirical philosophies of WILLIAM JAMES and John Dewey, the idealist philosophy of JOSIAH ROYCE, and the pragmatist philosophy of Charles Pierce. These theologies, eschewing liberal subjectivism and romanticism, prized reason and scientific enquiry above all. The vanguard of these movements was concentrated in what was known as the “Chicago School” and was best exemplified by the empirical theology of Henry Nelson Wieman.

A third general criticism of liberalism characterizes the middle third of the twentieth-century North American theology and, in part, is given various patterns by the different directions taken by the so-called German “dialectical” theologians of the 1920s (KARL BARTH, PAUL TILlich, RUDOLF BULTMANN, and FRIEDRICH GOGARTEN), who were united in their criticism of a liberalism that foundered on the concussions of World War I but who later disagreed about how and what to retrieve from the best of nineteenth-century theology.

Barth, perhaps the most generative theologian of the twentieth century, has been called on by a wide spectrum of American theologians who are primarily concerned to protect Christian identity over against what they consider modernity’s pretensions. Christianity must develop its own framework of interpretation and verification, although it must responsibly engage modernity in all its promises and threats. Although Barth came into vogue again in the last third of the twentieth century, in large part through the sway of Postliberal Theology, in the 1930s the main thrust of North American theology appreciated Barth’s cautions but wanted to maintain the questions and some answers of nineteenth-century theology, especially as summarized in the thought of ERNST TROELTSCH, whose work provided a framework for much of liberal theology in the remainder of the twentieth century.

The brothers REINHOLD NIEBUHR and H. RICHARD NIEBUHR were prominent in setting the North American theological agenda in the middle third of the twentieth century and, in their quite distinctive ways, cast the largest shadows over American theology in the last fifty years of the twentieth century through their teaching of two generations of theologians, Reinhold at Union Theological Seminary in New York and Richard at Yale. Reinhold’s experience as a pastor among the families of automobile workers in Detroit led to his thoroughgoing criticism of liberal theology as ineffective in dealing with the new situation of industrial democracy because of its naive doctrines of human perfectibility and progress. His theology tended to be largely anthropological and his social criticism benefited from a recovery of the doctrine of SIN, but his thought left much to be desired in terms of CHRISTOLOGY, ESCHATOLOGY, and ecclesiology.

In the theology of H. Richard Niebuhr is found both an appreciation of the radical insights of Barth and SØREN KIERKEGAARD, but also a loyalty to the liberal tradition, especially the Schleiermacherian experiential root of theological reflection and a Troeltschian historical and sociological orientation. In the former he found a radical monotheism that replaced liberal anthropomorphism with the sovereignty of God’s being and action over the human. From the latter he learned that theology cannot escape its locus in the historical relativity of the language and experience of the believing community. He dealt with the problem of revelation and history by describing the way each human being, even a scientist, expresses faith in Being’s peculiar revelation of itself to him or her.

The revolt against a superficial modernity took yet another form in the theology of Paul Tillich, who in effect became an “American” theologian after leaving Nazi Germany. Tillich developed a theological method of “correlation,” which was devoted to both the relevance and identity of the Christian faith. It does not claim an overarching integration that would obviate either the essence of Christianity or modernity but juxtaposes them in a variety of dialogical patterns. Basic existential questions are raised through philosophical analysis in expectation of answers in the form of the reinterpretation of various Christian symbols, especially of Jesus as the Christ.

North American theology in the middle third of twentieth century was also deeply affected by the theology of Rudolf Bultmann and his philosophical mentor, Martin Heidegger. Bultmann joined the most extreme conclusions of the History of Religions School with Heideggerian existentialism for an answer to the question of history. He demythologized those elements of the New Testament that did not fit the modern consciousness. This left an isolated kerygma of Jesus, which can be proclaimed as an offer of freedom, without the necessity of historical mediation, to the individual conscience in the present.

The 1960s represent a watershed in North American theology, which now seemed to be declaring independence from European theology in a new age of diverse, more global theological conversation. A veritable explosion of novel theological options was tendered in the academic marketplace in response to a new pluralist context for theology and a growing crisis of modern secularism. The Vietnam War, the CIVIL RIGHTS struggle, the nuclear threat of a blistering Cold War, a growing inequality in wealth, feminist and youth revolts, the sexual revolution, and novel forms of popular culture created a new sense of historical threat.

In the early 1960s PROCESS THEOLOGY appeared as another distinctively North American theology. It attempted to deal with a deficit in modern liberal theology with regard to the doctrine of God and attracted deep interest as a new endeavor to conceive God in relation to the modern world. It provided a radical critique of many God concepts in the Christian tradition, but did not discard the best of the classical tradition. Depending on the metaphysics of Alfred North Whitehead, in which neither being nor self but rather "events" or "actual occasions" in a purposive, living cosmos are primary, Charles Hartshorne, John B.Cobb Jr., and Schubert Ogden, the main proponents of Process Theology, set out to depict God as the unifier and envisioner of all possibilities. As the one who gives direction to reality, God experiences all and surpasses all. In experiencing all, God changes, and yet in God's purpose, God remains immutable. Whereas Process Theology often gained a new relevance to modern dynamic views of NATURE, it showed a deficit in the appropriation of the tradition for dealing with evil and suffering.

Revived interest in the theologies of Friedrich Gogarten and DIETRICH BONHOEFFER and a new focus on history and eschatology in the theologies of JÜRGEN MOLTMANN and WOLFHART PANNENBERG gave rise to a theological turn from the individual self to concrete history, society, and politics. North American theology was suddenly focused on the questions of concrete suffering among specific people, and "liberation" emerged as a common theme among many different theologies. In the late 1960s, just about the time Latin American LIBERATION THEOLOGY began, BLACK THEOLOGY arose out of the long struggle of African-American people against the inhumanity of SLAVERY and the ensuing bitterness of racism in all its forms. Working from the new historical context created by the civil rights movement of MARTIN LUTHER KING JR., and the black power movement of Malcolm X, black theologians JAMES CONE, Gayraud Wilmore, and J.Deotis Roberts created a theology that made the suffering of black people the subject of theology. In Cone's theology a Barthian emphasis on God's self-disclosure was now identified with God's revelation within the liberation of blacks, and the identity of Jesus was inseparable from the fate of the humiliated within an inhuman society.

FEMINIST THEOLOGIES also began to emerge in the 1960s in response to the peculiar denigration and subordination of WOMEN in North American society. These theologies took up the several North American feminist movements of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries and many global intellectual developments that work for the well-being and participation of women in family, church, and society. Some feminist scholars held that the maleness of the Christian symbol-system inevitably named women as inferior and subjected, and should therefore be rejected. Other feminist theologians, such as Rosemary Radford Ruether, Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, Letty Russell, and SALLIE MCFAGUE attempted, in very different ways, to deconstruct and reconstruct the Christian traditions, texts, or symbols/metaphors for their use in the service of women's liberation.

By the 1980s a new theological movement termed "womanist" sought to show that African-American women suffered a kind of oppression that had not been dealt with by either Black Theology or feminist theologies (see WOMANIST THEOLOGY). Jacquelyn Grant, Kelly Brown Douglas, and Delores S. Williams produced new readings of the Bible, Jesus, and atonement in the context of African-American women. Other theologies of freedom that played major roles in the last third of the twentieth century centered on the specific contexts of oppression among NATIVE AMERICANS, the Hispanic/Latino and Asian-American communities, and gay and lesbian communities (see HOMOSEXUALITY).

Another new horizon for encountering modernity begins in the 1960s with a reconceived hermeneutical theology dealing with the old themes of history, tradition, and interpretation. In depending on the hermeneutic theories of Hans-Georg Gadamer and Paul Ricoeur, these theologians move beyond the perceived devaluation of history and individualism in the Bultmannian approach.

In the last third of the twentieth century there was a growing sense that modernity itself was breaking down and that the liberal tradition did not serve theology well. Postliberal theology and various forms of postmodern theologies radically distinguished themselves from the Schleiermacherian liberal tradition. Postliberal theology is identified with Hans Frei and George Lindbeck of Yale. Following the philosophies of Ludwig Wittgenstein and Alasdair MacIntyre, postliberal theologians developed a view of religion as historical and tradition-shaped. They eschewed unmediated religious experience common to all human beings or any other universal foundation for theology. For them, becoming religious means interpreting the narrative, the language of faith, of a community and entering into the peculiar practices of that tradition's way of life. Stanley Hauerwas developed these perspectives in an ethic of virtue in a community loyal to the fundamental commitments of the Christian tradition.

The Constructive Theology of Gordon Kaufman and others may be mentioned as a late twentieth-century theology that went in the opposite direction of postliberal theology by obviating scripture and tradition in favor of the construction of the doctrine of God out of the best current scientific and moral attempt to confront the life and death questions of our time, such as nuclear armaments and the survival of the environment.

The 1980s and 1990s produced a widespread postmodern consciousness, reflected in the philosophies of Michel Foucault and Jacques Derrida, in the North American intellectual setting. A number of new theological impetuses thrived in this context, including a wide variety of new, invigorated evangelical theologies (that went well beyond the postwar “new evangelicalism” of CARL F.H.HENRY), the Reformed epistemological theology of Alvin Plantinga and Nicolas Wolterstorff, and the “Radical Orthodoxy,” led by the Cambridge theologian John Milbank, now transplanted to the United States.

A mainstay of the twentieth century was the theology created in the ecumenical movement, in which the American JOHN RALEIGH MOTT was a prime mover as president of the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE in Edinburgh in 1910. Ecumenical theology increasingly found its focus in various theologies of mission, and as Western MISSIONS came under more intense criticism, the oikoumene by the end of the century found its bearings mostly in liberation, postcolonial (see POST-COLONIALISM), and Third World theologies.

Ecumenical and mission theology made way for a significant increase of theologies of world religions during the last three decades of the century. Unmistakable at the end of the century was the rebirth of the “religious.” Many commentators pointed out that, despite the predictions of secularism at the beginning of the twentieth century, at its end the world was more religious than ever, and, as is ever the case, religion was full of promise and threat for the future of the globe.

References and Further Reading

- Braaten, Carl E., and Robert W.Jenson, eds. A Map of Twentieth-Century Theology. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1995.
- Ford, David S. The Modern Theologians. 2nd ed. Oxford: Blackwell, 1997.
- Frei, Hans. Types of Modern Theology. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1992.
- Grenz, Stanley J., and Roger E.Olson. 20th-Century Theology: God and the World in a Transitional Age. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992.
- Hodgson, Peter, and Robert H.King, eds. Christian Theology: An Introduction to Its Traditions and Tasks. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1994.
- Küng, Hans. Great Christian Thinkers. London: SCM Press, 1994.
- Livingston, James C., et al. Modern Christian Thought: Vol II, The Twentieth Century. 2nd ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 2000.
- Macquarrie, John. Twentieth Century Religious Thought. 4th ed. London: SCM Press, 1988.
- Nicholls, William. Systematic and Philosophical Theology, Vol. III: Pelican Guide to Modern Theology. London: Penguin, 1971.
- Zahrnt, Heinz. The Question of God: Protestant Theology in the Twentieth Century. New York: Harcourt Brace & World, 1969.

M.DOUGLAS MEEKS

THEOLOGY, WOMANIST

See Womanist Theology

THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES OF RELIGION

Implemented for dynastic reasons intended to secure the Tudor Succession, HENRY VIII's celebrated breach with Rome inevitably had doctrinal repercussions. Yet if isolated in Catholic Europe at a time when the Protestant princes who had staged the SPEYER "walk out" would have provided natural allies, the vulnerable English king chose only to flirt with the Lutherans; a commitment to orthodoxy (papal sovereignty only excepted) kept him loyal to the traditional religion of the Western Church.

This observation is fundamental to the historian's consideration of the English articles, if only because it illustrates the diplomatic and political backdrop against which the high drama of doctrinal debate was to play. MARTIN LUTHER'S teaching had secured a considerable following in continental Europe, and carefully codified in the AUGSBURG CONFESSION (1530) by the irenic scholarship of PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, much of the Wittenberg manifesto influenced England's Ten Articles when they were drafted in 1536. However, the Bishops' Book (1537) first set out the beliefs reforming prelates pressed on Henry VIII. When treating of justification, the sacraments, and the subordination of church tradition to the authority of the BIBLE, they argued in tones more Protestant than the Ten Articles. Failing to ride Court faction, however, any advantage was short-lived, traditional counselors soon securing the Six Articles; and "the whip with six strings" Henry's regime wielded on heretics at home, the king used to impress rulers abroad as he faced new threats from Pope Paul III. With the accession of that young Josiah, EDWARD VI, the tables turned again, despite the fact that diplomatic considerations still impeded progress toward an English CONFESSION of faith. THOMAS CRANMER'S ecumenical vision had convinced the primate that a "godly synod" would provide the REFORMATION with a real alternative to the resurgence of Roman DOCTRINE urged on the faithful by the COUNCIL OF TRENT. The archbishop thus sought to enlist Melanchthon, JOHN CALVIN, and HEINRICH BULLINGER for the cause while taking great care not to jump the gun with any confessional statements that might conflict with the singular achievement of Augsburg and alienate the Lutherans rather than bringing unity to the cause as a whole. When idealism was obliged to give way to reality and his much cherished solution proved abortive—how could Melanchthon or Calvin possibly be expected to put Reformation itself at risk by traveling to England?—Cranmer tried to regain lost time and make amends. In short, the affirmation of Forty-two Articles, and their subsequent recension as the Thirty-nine Articles set forth under ELIZABETH I, were the result of some twenty-five years of theological uncertainty. However highly prized their biblical and patristic pedigree, the Articles were something of a rushed job.

Forty-two Articles

Altogether different in tone from the Tridentine decisions, Cranmer's Forty-two Articles, with a CATECHISM set out in both Latin and English, were published "by the King's Majesty's authority" (but without the backing of Convocation as was claimed) in June 1553. They constitute a cautious, even idiosyncratic, commitment to present in place a bland kind of Protestantism, as if diplomatic pragmatism still conditioned the king's mind; because if Rome is certainly ridiculed and ANABAPTIST SECTS repeatedly attacked, the evidence suggests that Cranmer took good care to chart a course between Wittenberg and Geneva, particularly in the focus he placed on the key issues "Of the Justification of Man" (XI), "Of Predestination, and Election" (XVII), and "Of the Lord's Supper" (XXIX).

At the same time Cranmer's work showed a clear sense of priorities in framing an English formulary that, if it set forth "the new religion" of Reformation, also consciously chose to counter any charge of innovation. This he achieved by immediate concentration (I-IV) on key clauses of orthodoxy so regularly rehearsed in the creed. As if to dispel any lingering doubts too, Article VII stated that all three creeds—"Nicene...Athanasius...and that...commonlie called the Apostles"—should be "thoroughly received." If there was a lapse, this concerned extended reference to the Spirit of God, an omission Archbishop MATTHEW PARKER later made good (following the Württemberg Confession, 1552) in Article V ("Of the Holy Ghost") in the Thirty-nine Articles.

The Church of Rome, which "hath erred, not only in...living, but also in...faith" (XX), Cranmer indicted in a range of Articles (XII, XIII, XXIII, XXVI, XXIX, and XXXI). Just as the Litany prayed that the Lord deliver his people "from the tyranny of the bishoppe of Rome and all his detestable enormities," so Article XXXVI denied the pope "jurisdiction in this realm of England." Treating "Of Civil magistrates," the same Article is unique to the XLII for its reference to "The King of England" as "Supreme head in earth, next under Christ, of the Church of England, and Ireland." Article XXXVII of Elizabeth's XXXIX simply afforded "The Queen's Majesty...chief power." As for Cranmer's other bêtes noires the Anabaptists or "Heretics called Millenarii" (XLI) who do "boast themselves continually of the Spirit" (XIX), they were targeted in as many as eighteen of the Forty-two Articles (II, III, IV, VI, VIII, IX, X, XV, XVIII, XIX, XXIV, and XXXVI-XLII), a sure indication that such sectaries were regarded as a menace to lawful authority in mid-Tudor times.

The Thirty-nine Articles

With the death of Edward VI on July 6, 1553, less than a month after the Forty-two Articles had been promulgated, it seemed that Cranmer's work on both that formulary and Prayer Book revision would die too. For the accession of Mary the Catholic meant not only the restoration of the "Old Religion" but the martyrdom of the Protestant reformers such as HUGH LATIMER, Nicholas Ridley, John Hooper, and above all Cranmer himself. However, like that of Edward, the new regime was itself to have a limited life, and with the accession of Queen Mary's half sister as ELIZABETH I in November 1558, it was soon clear that England would return again to Reformation faith and order. It was equally evident that any new settlement could not be achieved overnight, just as precedent itself dictated that, granted Henry VIII's constitutional revolution, religion must be "by law established." Determined to be independent too, Elizabeth declined marriage to Philip of Spain, an act that united Catholic Europe against her in a way that demanded she proceed with particular caution in matters like Prayer Book revision and any reissue of the Articles. Nevertheless, to profess faith and inform the clergy, the new primate set out Eleven Articles for subscription in 1559. Archbishop Parker's document, credal in content, thus simply confirmed Trinitarian belief, affirmed the importance of Scripture, the sacraments, and ecclesiastical discipline, and in due deference to royal prerogative, repudiated the bishop of Rome.

By 1562 it was time for Convocation to deal with the issues, and the following year, "for the avoidance of diversities of opinions, and for establishing of consent touching True Religion," the Thirty-nine Articles made their debut as a preliminary revision (set out in Latin) of the Edwardian Articles. Sensitivity toward German Lutheran princes suspended Article XXIX as if to respect manducatio impiorum ("of the wicked who do not eat") because Luther's REAL PRESENCE belief had clearly held the reverse to be the case with the result that some critics had even ridiculed the Wittenberg Reformer as but a "new papist." Then too, in a key half sentence, Article XX recognized that Elizabeth's "Church hath power to decree Rites or Ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith." Unknown to the "Supreme Governor," a parallel bill had been promoted in Parliament, but because of royal fury had been rapidly withdrawn. Accordingly it was not until 1571 that the Thirty-nine Articles (in Latin and English) were finally approved by both Convocation and Parliament to stand as a duly authorized part of the religious settlement and a specifically English confession of Protestant faith.

Matthew Parker's revision dropped seven of Cranmer's original Articles and added four, but the final meticulous and at times ingenious trimming is no mere compromise. After a specifically credal introit resonating well with Cranmer's collect for Advent II in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, Article VI ("Of the sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for salvation") provides a Protestant bedrock for the formulary as a whole. By providing the "names and numbers of the Canonical Books" too, Parker and his Convocation colleagues not only went beyond Cranmer in spelling out detail, but also followed Jerome's respect for the Apocrypha as "books...the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners." In similar vein, respecting the conscientious application of JOHN JEWEL, bishop of Salisbury, who widened the range of Cranmer's Homilies, Article XXXV lists "the several titles" the clergy were convinced "contain a godly and wholesome doctrine...necessary for these times." Homilies 3 and 6, treating respectively "Of repairing and keeping clean of Churches" and "Against excess of apparel" certainly cast rare shafts of light for the social historian.

In their firm biblical base the Thirty-nine Articles constituted a full spectrum of Reformation orthodoxy in both faith and order. Carefully sourced from Protestant confessions like those of Augsburg and Württemberg, roughly a third were drafted in sensitive style that made them at least patient of different interpretations. Down the centuries critics have caricatured this approach with extremist labels, but the fine line between ambiguity and irenicism endowed the formulary with an enduring quality and no mean respect, before JOHN HENRY NEWMAN started to demolish them in nineteenth-century Oxford. Parker shared Cranmer's zeal for patristic scholarship, as second only to Scripture; this is highlighted in the way the creeds are described as "proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture" (VIII). Various Articles devoted to man's sin and Christ's loving righteousness (IX, XIII, XIV, XV, XVI) deal in language reminiscent of Luther's "rediscovery" of the Gospel, and the wording of Article XI—"We are accompted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by faith, and not for our own works or deservings"—is no deviation from the Wittenberg party line. Quite the contrary, given that that same Article made abundantly clear how justification "by faith only, is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort as more largely expressed in the Homilie."

Following St. Paul, Protestant orthodoxy so embraced the idea of PREDESTINATION that every theologian and all formularies had to gloss over difficult and divisive doctrines. (Calvin's legacy is accordingly to be found in Article XVII, albeit without the "double take" of those Calvinists who distorted the balanced teaching of Geneva's patriarch on the sovereignty of God by directing the elect to life and the reprobate to damnation.) For in language decidedly urbane with every approximation to the scriptural statements of apostolic letters to the young churches at Rome (Romans 8 and 9) and Ephesus (Ephesians 1), the faithful are to take "sweet, pleasant and unspeakable comfort" in the "purpose of God" by whose mercy "they attain to everlasting felicity." To believe otherwise "is a most dangerous downfall" and the work of "the devyll." In short, and especially in an embattled sixteenth-century setting, Article XVII was indebted to Melancthon as much as to Calvin, and extended reference to Articles IX, X, and XI confirm a biblical reference, just as Articles II and XXXI clearly state that Christ died "for all actual sins of men."

Parker sustained the two-pronged attack on the sects and on Rome, a prominent feature of Cranmer's Articles, in the Articles of 1571. Zealots were thus checked (cf. especially Articles IV, VII, VIII, IX, XVI, XVIII, XXXVII–XXXIX) on the one hand, and popery abused on the other. In any case, by the Bull Regnans in Excelsis (February 1570), Pius V had formally excommunicated and deposed Gloriana. As far as the papal see was concerned, any diplomatic deference was now pointless, and the royal "heretic and favourer of heretics" no longer felt the need to tread warily. Governed by the kind of biblical and patristic principles Jewel had rehearsed in his celebrated Apology (1562), Rome was singled out for leading the Catholic Church astray, a criticism that fell short of Calvin's denunciation of it as an entirely "false church." Article XIV drew attention to the "arrogance and impiety" of works of supererogation; Article XIX indicated that "the Church of Rome hath erred," but in Article XXI it was also made clear that "General Counsellés" may err "and sometime have erred." If Cranmer had condemned purgatory as an invention of the "Scholeaucthoures," Article XXII held such doctrine "Romishe" and, like pardons, the adoration of images and relics, "a fond thing" not merely "vainly invented" but altogether repugnant to the word of God. Convinced that they had "grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles," Article XXV denied the sacramental status of "Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony and extreme Unction"; and "Transubstantiation," with reservation and any procession or adoration of the consecrated eucharistic elements, with the “sacrifice of Masses” were all roundly condemned in Articles XXVIII and XXXI.

By contrast, seen as a bond of unity, the Eucharist was afforded pride of place in a Protestant revision that prized the sacrament of the LORD’S SUPPER “given, taken, and eaten...only after an heavenly and spiritual manner...received and eaten” by “faith” (Article XXVIII). Then too, omitted in 1566, as much to appease Rome as the Lutherans, Elizabeth no longer found Article XXIX (a denial of manducatio impiorum) politically inconvenient, and in 1571 consented to its restoration. In all, eleven Articles (IX, XV, XVI, XXIII, XXIV, XXV, XXVI, XXVII, XXVIII, XXIX, and XXX) relate to sacramental doctrines, “Baptism and the Supper of the Lord” being “not only badges or tokens of Christian men’s profession: but rather...certain sure witnesses and effectual signs of grace” (XXV).

From Cranmer’s day, the Articles of Religion provided a litmus test to determine orthodoxy, and an Act of 1571 required the clergy, schoolmasters, and later those entering the universities to subscribe to it. The force of those Articles dealing with consecration and ordination (XXXVI), Civil Magistrates (XXXVII), and the “Christian man’s oath” (XXXIX) proved relevant here. Only in the nineteenth century, largely as a result of Tractarian caricature, was the formulary recognized to be not timeless, but itself very much a tract of Reformation times. Nowadays diluted from a “Form of Assent” to a simple affirmation of the “inheritance of faith,” whence clerks in Holy Orders should find “inspiration and guidance under God,” many Anglican clergy poke fun at “reading in.” Not so the remarkable evangelist Reverend J.R.W.Stott, who as rector of All Souls’, Langham Place, London, publicly read the Articles annually to remind his congregation of their Protestant heritage. His letter to The Times (May 30, 1963) is significant for the conviction he expressed that “the widespread ignorance of the reformed doctrines of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND is one of the major causes of its weakness today.”

In the United States, the clergy of the Protestant EPISCOPAL CHURCH have never been required to subscribe to the Articles of Religion, although a revised version of the formulary was published in 1801. In this, Article VIII omits mention of the Athanasian creed; Article XXI (“Of the Authority of General Councils”) was dropped; Article XXXV (“Of Homilies”) suspended until such a time as “obsolete words and phrases” are removed; and Articles XXXVI and XXXVII amended to avoid references to the English Crown, capital punishment, and, strangely, the propriety of bearing arms.

It was WILLIAM WORDSWORTH’S “Solitary Reaper” who sang of “...old, unhappy, far-off things,” and although the Thirty-nine Articles are very much a period compilation, the literary quality of their expression surely affords the formulary a significant place among Christian Confessions. Appropriately paired with the Book of Common Prayer itself, the Articles remain a key primary source of the English Reformation and as such a valuable heritage document of the Protestant faith.

See also Anabaptism; Augsburg Confession; Bible; Book of Common Prayer; Bullinger, Heinrich; Calvin, John; Catechism; Church of England; Confession; Cranmer, Thomas; Doctrine; Elizabeth I; Episcopal Church; Henry VIII; Jewel, John; Latimer, Hugh; Lord’s Supper; Luther, Martin; Melancthon, Philipp; Newman, John Henry; Parker, Matthew; Predestination; Wordsworth, William

References and Further Reading

- The Book of Common Prayer* (as Revised and Settled at the Savoy Conference, 1662). Edited by D.MacCulloch. London: Everyman, 1999. [Contains Charles I's reprint of Articles agreed by Convocation in 1562 (pp. 443–461).]
- Bicknell, E.J. A Theological Introduction to the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England. Revised by H.J. Carpenter. London: Longmans, Green and Co., 1955.
- Browne, E.H. An Exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles, Historical and Doctrinal. Edited by J.Williams. Houston, TX: Classical Anglican Press, 1998.
- Dickens, A.G. The English Reformation. London: Batsford, 1964. [The first edition of this classic work includes a most sensitive analysis of the Articles of Religion (pp. 249–254).]
- Hardwick, C. A History of the Articles of Religion. Cambridge, UK: Deighton, 1851. [Useful for the texts of both XLII and XXXIX Articles.]
- Ketley, J. Liturgies of Edward VI. Cambridge, UK: For the Parker Society, 1844. [Contains the Latin text of Cranmer's XLII Articles (pp. 572–582).]
- O'Donovan, O. On the Thirty Nine Articles. A Conversation with Tudor Christianity. Exeter, UK: Paternoster Press, 1986.

PETER NEWMAN BROOKS

THOLUCK, FRIEDRICH AUGUST GOTTREU (1799–1877)

German theologian. Born in Breslau, Tholuck first studied philology, then THEOLOGY in Berlin. As a student he was influenced by Pietistic-revivalistic circles. Although FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER opposed his appointment, he taught Old Testament in Berlin (1820–1826). There he published his best-known work, Guido und Julius. Die Lehre von der Sünde und vom Versöhner (1823). A revivalistic tract in the form of correspondence between two young men, it countered an earlier tract by de Wette that criticized the notion that recognition of one's sinfulness was necessary for a theologian. In 1826 Tholuck became professor at HALLE where, with interruptions for travel and a year as preacher in Rome, he remained until his death. Martin Kähler was his most famous student.

Tholuck was a major figure of the nineteenth-century German REVIVALS. His theology stressed SIN and redemption. He was Lutheran, although he approved the union of Lutheran and Reformed churches and distrusted the growing confessionalism of the time. He also opposed theological and social liberalism. Tholuck's influential biblical commentaries, reprinted many times, sought to counter rationalistic approaches to scriptural interpretation. He affirmed that historical-critical interpretation did not negate biblical truths. In opposition to DAVID F.STRAUSS'S Life of Jesus (1835) he maintained the historical authenticity of the gospels. Less well known is his sympathetic scholarly work on the history of rationalism. A gifted linguist, Tholuck's influence extended abroad. He had many international contacts and was active in the Evangelical Alliance.

See also Ecumenism; Evangelicalism; Higher Criticism; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Pietism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Tholuck, Fredrich A.G. Der sittliche Character des Heidenthumus. 1867.
———. Calvin as an Interpreter of the Holy Scriptures. Edinburgh: [s.n.], 1854.

Secondary Sources:

Bainton, Roland H. "Yale and German Theology in the Middle of the Nineteenth Century."
Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 66 (1954/55):294–302.

- Krumwiede, Hans-Walter. "August G. Tholuck." In Gestalten der Kirchengeschichte, edited by Martin Greschat, vol. 9.1, Die neueste Zeit I, 281–291. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1985.
- Schaff, Philip. "Tholuck." In Germany: its Universities, Theology, and Religion, 278–294. Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1857.

MARY JANE HAEMIG

THOMASIUS, CHRISTIAN (1655–1728)

German jurist. Born into a respected academic family in Leipzig, GERMANY, and raised in Lutheran ORTHODOXY, Thomasius studied philosophy in Leipzig and law in Frankfurt/Oder. In 1680 he started practicing law in Leipzig and lecturing at the university. A nonconformist, he lectured (1687) in German rather than in Latin, a step toward the breakdown of unified European academic culture. In Leipzig, a center of Lutheran orthodoxy and Aristotelian thought, Thomasius defended the NATURAL LAW theories of SAMUEL PUFENDORF among jurists and the PIETISM of AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE among theologians. These stances and his acerbic manner led to his move to HALLE (1690), a center of Pietism and the ENLIGHTENMENT.

Thomasius soon was combating what he saw as the authoritarian tendencies of Pietism. His ethical teachings, holding that no pietistic CONVERSION was necessary to practice love toward one's neighbors, led to an edict forbidding him to teach anything but law (1702). Known as an advocate of religious TOLERATION, Thomasius thought true religion was an inner, private matter, not subject to state direction. The state could regulate the outward cult, but uniformity of religion was not necessary in a state. Thomasius opposed witch trials (see WITCHCRAZE) because he believed the state had no right to punish heretics (see HERESY). He believed that individual insight took precedence over received AUTHORITY; law and matters of state were subjects for human reason, not religious authority. Thomasius was concerned with the practical application of juristic and philosophical thought. His teachings led to the separation of law and morality as areas of inquiry.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Thomasius, Christian. Über die Hexenprozesse. Weimar, Germany: H. Bohlhaus Nachfolger, 1967.
 ——. Auserlesene deutsche Schriften. Hildesheim, Germany: G. Olms, 1705.
 ——. Ausgewählte Werke. Hildesheim: G. Olms, 1705.
 ——. Über die Folter. Weimar, Germany: H. Bohlhaus Nachfolger, 1960.

Secondary Sources:

- Hattenhauer, Hans. "Christian Thomasius." In Gestalten der Kirchengeschichte, edited by Martin Greschat, vol. 8, Die Aufklärung. Stuttgart, Germany: Kohlhammer, 1983.
 Schroeder, Peter. "Thomas Hobbes, Christian Thomasius and the Seventeenth-Century Debate on the Church and State." History of European Ideas 23 (1997):59–79.

MARY JANE HAEMIG

TILLICH, PAUL (1886–1965)

German theologian. Tillich was one of the most influential Protestant theologians of the twentieth century. Born and educated in GERMANY, he fled the Nazi regime and established himself as a seminary professor and religion scholar in the United States, becoming a bridge between European theological currents and the English-speaking world. He became a major spokesman for Protestant progressivism in the public arena and published a number of widely read theological works, most notably the three-volume Systematic Theology.

Life and Work

Paul Tillich was born in 1886 in the village of Starzeddel in eastern Germany (now in POLAND), the son of a minister and high official of the Evangelical Union Church of Prussia. Tillich understood his deepest theological roots to be in the Lutheran Tradition (see LUTHERANISM), and he reaffirmed characteristic Lutheran emphases throughout his life. After undergraduate and graduate studies that focused on theology and philosophy at several German universities, Tillich entered the Christian ministry. At the outbreak of World War I he became a chaplain in the German army. After the war—for him a traumatic and transforming experience—he became a professor of philosophy and theology first in Berlin, then Marburg, Dresden, and finally Frankfurt. In the 1920s he was a leading figure in a movement called “religious socialism,” which attempted to offer an ideological alternative to traditionalism and fascism. This affiliation, plus his close association with Jewish scholars and students, brought about his dismissal from his academic post when the Nazis came to power in 1933. Shortly thereafter he and his family emigrated to the United States. After the war he became a professor successively at three distinguished American universities: Union Theological Seminary at Columbia University (1933–1955); Harvard University (1955–1962); and The University of Chicago (1962–1965).

Although Tillich became known principally as a scholar of religion rather than as a churchman, his sermons—often preached in university chapels—were warmly received. During World War II Tillich delivered a large number of antifascist speeches that were broadcast over the Voice of America. After the war he became increasingly influential as an interpreter of the religious dimension of CULTURE, termed by Tillich “the depth dimension.” In the 1950s Tillich gave more attention to psychological and existentialist analyses of the human predicament and to the completion of his systematic theology (see especially The Courage To Be and Systematic Theology, vols. 1–3). In the late 1950s

Tillich turned from dialogue with Western secularity to dialogue with non-Western religions, an interest brought into focus by his visit to JAPAN in 1960, at which time he engaged in conversations with Buddhist scholars (see Christianity and the Encounter of the World Religions).

Thought

Tillich gave considerable attention to the history of Protestantism and to its fate in the twentieth century (see The Protestant Era). He criticized the pre-Vatican II Roman Catholic Church for a strain of authoritarianism, while valuing much in Catholic thought and experience (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTION TO). This breadth of perspective is captured in his distinction between “Catholic substance” and “Protestant principle.” For Tillich, Catholic sacramentalism reflects the “holiness of being,” the presence of the divine within the world. Without some religious “substance”—some sense of divine presence—Protestantism becomes sterile and empty, but the Protestant principle represents the protest against any tendency toward absolutizing finite symbols of holiness. Without this protest, religion—whether Protestant or Catholic—becomes “heteronomous.” Both emphases are needed for what Tillich called “theonomous” Christianity, which expresses its religious substance but is self-critical of any absolutizing of its own finite forms.

Tillich viewed the Protestant principle as an expression of the REFORMATION Doctrine of “justification by grace through faith.” This DOCTRINE, which criticizes dependency on all humanly devised assurances, was extended by Tillich to apply to intellectual “works” of religious belief as well as to works of moral or sacramental practice. One cannot be justified before God by right belief, said Tillich, any more than by right behavior or right ritual observance. Even while doubting, one can be in a state of reconciliation with God.

Tillich displayed his Protestant personalism by finding his theological starting point in something subjective, in what he called “ultimate concern.” In this he followed the nineteenth-century Protestant theologian, FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER, for whom religion begins with the “feeling of absolute dependence” rather than with a claim of truth content or revelation. God is understood to be the correlate of this feeling. Tillich attempted to counter the charge of subjectivism by asserting that one is “grasped by the power of an ultimate concern”; faith is received ecstatically (in the strict sense of standing beyond one’s ordinary self). All religion is revelatory in this sense.

The philosophical side of Tillich’s thought was nourished by his reading of the nineteenth-century German idealists, who sought to revive metaphysics on Protestant soil after IMMANUEL KANT’S critique. Tillich agreed with Kant that morality is constitutive of human individuality, autonomy, and freedom. Indeed, Tillich put metaphysical as well as moral weight on human freedom (and, linked with freedom, creativity). Following F.W.J.Schelling, Tillich saw freedom as the point where the completion of creation and the “fall” coincide. Tillich thought there was no rational necessity for humanity’s existential predicament (here countering rationalism, but in accord with Schelling's existentialist successor, SØREN KIERKEGAARD). Nor is there any rational path to SALVATION (or human fulfillment). Human existence rests on incalculable freedom, and all paths to salvation involve the "risk of faith." However, there is for Tillich a power that makes for salvation and reconciliation. The power that reunites is love; in all its forms love is reunion, and—as G.W.F. HEGEL taught in his early theological writings—ultimately it is the divine power in all things.

The Christian faith affirms the presence of this reconciling power in "the New Testament picture of Jesus as the Christ" (in Tillich's auspicious phrase). All religions employ symbols that claim to mediate divine power; the distinctiveness of the Christ symbol is that Jesus sacrifices that which is finite in himself that he might point beyond himself to the ultimate power of reconciliation. Herein lies a criterion for a valid religious symbol—that it points beyond itself without making claims of ultimacy for itself. Although rooted in the Jesus of history, the New Testament picture includes mythic elements. Instead of "demythologizing" in the manner of the New Testament theologian RUDOLF BULTMANN, Tillich favored acknowledging the necessary presence of mythic expression. The doctrine of Christ's incarnation is viewed by Tillich as "broken" (that is, acknowledged) myth, subject to interpretation but not to replacement by rationalizing categories.

In embracing the "apologetic" role for Christian theology, reformulating itself so as to provide answers to contemporary culture's most pressing questions, Tillich differed sharply from his Swiss Protestant contemporary, KARL BARTH. Barth rejected all efforts toward a "natural theology" (a theology based on reason, science, or general human experience). Tillich on the contrary reached back to the apologetic tradition found in the early church and in St. Augustine; here Christianity is seen as fulfilling human culture's passionate quest for ultimacy. Tillich contended that different issues become the focus of concern in different cultural epochs. The predominant problem of contemporary life, he asserted, is not finitude and DEATH, or sin and guilt, but emptiness and meaninglessness—this theme derived from much twentieth-century literature. In the face of doubt about the meaning-giving qualities of the traditional symbols (including the theistic, personal God), Tillich reflected on "the God beyond the God of theism." To ground our affirmations of the meaningfulness of finite being, he argued, we are in a time of quest for new symbols.

In his social ethics Tillich can be seen as a precursor of the LIBERATION THEOLOGIES that have come into prominence since the 1960s. Tillich backed away from explicit commitment to socialism in his American years, although he remained a steadfast critic of the excesses of capitalism and of the individualist culture of "self-sufficient finitude." The social ideal of the KINGDOM OF GOD—Christianity's key symbol for the goal of human history—in his view captures the affirmation of the goodness of finite existence along with criticism of the injustices of present societies.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Tillich, Paul. The Protestant Era. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948.
- . Systematic Theology. 3 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1951, 1957, 1963.
- . The Courage to Be. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1952.
- . Dynamics of Faith. New York: Harper & Row, 1957.
- . Christianity and the Encounter of the World Religions. New York: Columbia University Press, 1963.
- . Main Works/Hauptwerke. 6 vols. Edited by C. H. Ratschow. Berlin and New York: Evangelisches Verlag and de Gruyter, 1987–1993.

Secondary Sources:

- Adams, James Luther, Wilhelm Pauck, and Roger L. Shinn, eds. The Thought of Paul Tillich. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1985.
- Pauck, Wilhelm, and Marion Pauck. Paul Tillich: His Life and Thought, vol. 1: Life. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.

GUYTON B. HAMMOND

TILLOTSON, JOHN (1630–1694)

Archbishop of Canterbury. Tillotson was born in Sow-erby, Yorkshire, ENGLAND in 1630. After a CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY education, where the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS taught him tolerance, Tillotson served in PRES-BYTERIANISM but conformed to the episcopally ordered CHURCH OF ENGLAND at the Restoration. He served parishes in rural Hertfordshire and London and became well known as a preacher.

Although his vigorous advocacy of Protestantism (The Rule of Faith, 1666) irritated Charles II, he was made dean of CANTERBURY in 1672. When the Roman Catholic James II was replaced in 1688 by his Protestant daughter Mary II and her husband William III, Tillotson helped to secure TOLERATION for Protestant Dissenters. He was appointed dean of St. Paul's, London, November 1689. The archbishop of Canterbury, Sancroft, was finally deposed for nonacceptance of the new reign. Reluctantly, Tillotson consented to succeed him in May 1691. He died in November 1694 in London.

Tillotson wrote against SOCINIANISM (1693), and he has often been called Latitudinarian, both for his preference for morals over doctrinal strife and his appeal to reasonable self-interest and natural inclination as motives for CONVERSION. More positively, he called for holiness: "To see God is to be happy; but, unless we be like him, we cannot see him. The sight and presence of God himself would be no happiness to that man who is not like to God in the temper and disposition of his mind" (Sermon VII).

See also Latitudinarianism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Tillotson, John. The Works of Dr. John Tillotson, late Archbishop of Canterbury, with the Life of the Author, by Tho. Birch, M.A., ... [1759, later edition] ... in Ten Volumes. London: Richard Priestley, 1820.

Secondary Sources:

Gordon, Alexander. "Tillotson, John." in Dictionary of National Biography, vol. XIX, 872–878.

Reprinted Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1921–1922.

Reedy, Gerard. "Interpreting Tillotson." Harvard Theological Review 86 no. 1 (January 1993):81–103.

DAVID TRIPP

TINDAL, MATTHEW (1657–1733)

English deist. Born in 1657 in Devonshire, ENGLAND, Tindal is best known for his apology for natural religion, Christianity as Old as the Creation (1730). Son of a High-Church minister, Tindal studied at Lincoln College at Oxford and later at Exeter College. He became a law fellow at All Souls' College in 1678 and earned his doctor of civil law in 1685. Religiously, he moved from the High-Church tradition to a temporary interest in Catholicism to Unitarianism to a later self-professed Christian DEISM.

His early works—for example, An Essay Concerning Obedience to Supreme Powers (1693), The Liberty of the Press (1698), and The Rights of the Christian Church Asserted (1706)—are characteristically antiauthoritarian and anticlerical in tone. Tindal aimed, as found in Christianity as Old as the Creation, to demonstrate that the “Religion of Nature” is the original and perfect religion to which revelation has nothing to add or subtract. Tindal taught that true religion is natural, universal, and innate within the human soul and that morality is its essence. According to Tindal, natural and revealed religion (i.e., Christianity) have a common source, but the ideas given by reason are more certain than those given by TRADITION or “revelation.” Thus, what is true in Christianity must be “as old as the creation,” and all else is false. Tindal attacked “absurdities” and inconsistencies in the BIBLE (e.g., miracles, immoral stories, anthropomorphisms, and arbitrariness of God) and insisted that the Bible should be read like any other book.

After his death on August 6, 1733, Christianity as Old as the Creation came to be known as the “Deists' Bible.” Tindal's emphasis on the primacy and universality of reason, avenues into biblical criticism, and advocacy for natural religion had significant influence on the ENLIGHTENMENT in both GERMANY and FRANCE.

See also Higher Criticism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Tindal, Matthew. Christianity as old as the creation. Edited and translated by Günter Gawlick. Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt, Germany: Frommann-Holzboog, 1967-.
- . Christianity as old as the creation: or, The gospel, a republication of the religion of nature. London: [s.n.], 1730.
- . A defence of the rights of the Christian church: against a late visitation sermon, intituled, The rights of the clergy in the Christian church asserted; preach'd at Newport Pagnell in the county of Bucks, by W. Wotton, B.D., and made publick at the command and desire of the Bishop of Lincoln, and the clergy of the deaneries of Buckingham and Newport. London: [s.n.], Printed in the year 1707.
- . A letter to the reverend the clergy of both universities, concerning the Trinity and the Athanasian creed [micro-form]: with reflections on all the late hypotheses, particularly Dr. W's, Dr. S-th's, the Trinity placed in its due light, The 28 propositions, The calm discourse of a Trinity in the Godhead, and the defence of Dr. Sherlock's notions: with a short discourse concerning mysteries. [London: s.n.], 1694.
- . The nation vindicated, from the aspersions cast on it in a late pamphlet, intituled, A Representation of the present state of religion, with regard to the late excessive growth of infidelity, heresy and profaneness, as it pass'd the Lower house of convocation. London: Printed for A. Baldwin, 1711–1712.

Secondary Sources:

- Herrick, James A. The Rhetoric of the English Deists. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.
- Kavcic, John Andrew. English Deism and Natural Law: The Case of Matthew Tindal. Ottawa: National Library of Canada, 1999.
- Leland, John (1691–1766). A View of the Principal Deistical Writers, 1755–1757. vol. 1. New York: Garland, 1978.

G. SUJIN PAK

TING, K.H. (DING GUANGXUN) (1915-)

Chinese theologian. Born in Shanghai, CHINA, K.H. Ting has been China's foremost Protestant leader and theologian since the reopening of churches after the end of the Cultural Revolution era in the late 1970s. He became principal of Nanjing Union Theological Seminary at its founding in 1953, a position that he still holds. He was chair of the Chinese Christian Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee (TSPM) and president of the China Christian Council (CCC) from 1981 until his retirement in 1997. Ting continues to serve as vice-chair of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, in which capacity he seeks to promote openness and reform in the religious policy of the government.

Ting grew up in a comfortable Christian home, the third of four children. His maternal grandfather was one of China's first Anglican priests, and his father a banker. The greatest influence in his early life was his mother, a devout Christian, who encouraged her son to enter the ministry. Ting received a B.A. from St. John's University in Shanghai in 1937 and a B.D. from its school of theology in 1942. In 1948 he received an M.A. in religious education from Union Theological Seminary in New York. In 1942 he was ordained to the Anglican diaconate and priesthood, and in the same year, he married Siu-may Kuo (d. 1995). They had two sons. In 1955 he was consecrated bishop of the Anglican diocese of Chekiang (Zhejiang).

Ting's experience as a student and priest in Japanese-occupied Shanghai (1937–1945) convinced him of the need to be involved in the struggle for national salvation and freedom from foreign domination. He became one of the many YMCA student workers inspired by Y.T. Wu (1893–1979). Later he served as curate of the Church of Our Savior, and then as pastor of Shanghai's Community Church. In 1945 the Tings went to CANADA, where K.H. had been appointed mission secretary for the Student Christian Movement. In 1948 Ting moved to Geneva to work for the World Student Christian Federation. In this capacity he traveled widely and got to know many men and women in the ecumenical movement and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In 1951, against the advice of many friends and colleagues in Geneva, the Tings returned to China with their young son. They were committed to the newly established People's Republic of China, and K.H. became associated with the TSPM. This was the time of the Korean War, when foreign missionaries were being expelled and Chinese churches were severing their connections with Christians overseas. Ting served for a brief time as general secretary of the Christian Literature Society (1952–1953) in Shanghai, before moving to Nanjing where he became principal of Nanjing Union Theological Seminary.

In the 1950s and early 1960s Ting was active in the TSPM, and became a well-known interpreter of the Chinese revolution in the West. He was convinced that Christians should work together with socialists, and in his writings, he attempted to provide Christians with a convincing theological rationale. Conservative and evangelical Christians in China and in the West tended to disagree with Ting's approach, but he was widely respected among Protestants and Anglicans in the ecumenical movement.

With the intensification of radical political movements in the China of the late 1950s and early 1960s Ting's position became increasingly difficult. He was removed from all his church and political posts at the start of the Cultural Revolution in 1966. He again came into public view in the early 1970s, and over the next few years met with many overseas visitors.

At the end of the Cultural Revolution era, K.H. Ting emerged as the preeminent leader of China's Protestant Christians and headed both the newly organized CCC (1981) and the reestablished TSPM. He promoted the reopening of churches and other religious institutions, the printing of the BIBLE and religious literature, and increasing contacts with churches in other parts of the world. In 1991 he led the CCC delegation to Canberra when it joined the World Council of Churches. By this time Ting had become a significant voice for the interests of the church on a national level, using his government positions to promote both religious freedom and the rebirth of theology and religious studies.

As China's best-known Protestant theologian, Ting's central theological concern has been love as God's primary attribute, and the importance for Christians to practice love in their ETHICS and in society. His writings have stressed the continuity between creation and redemption; the Cosmic Christ who presides over all human history; and a deemphasis on "justification by faith" in Chinese Protestantism, insofar as it divides Christians from non-Christians. Since retirement Ting has promoted "theological reconstruction" in the Chinese Church, which implies the broadening and opening of Christian faith to the changes taking place in society.

K.H.Ting's contributions to the reemergence of Chinese church life, Protestant THEOLOGY, and the opening of China to the outside world are widely recognized. His views on "theological reconstruction" and the need for working in concert with the government continue to be criticized in some conservative church circles. However, under Ting's leadership, Christianity in China has assumed a higher profile than at any time in its history. He has promoted reconciliation between church and society, Christian and non-Christian, China and the world, and this continues to be K.H.Ting's enduring legacy to Christians in China and to the church universal.

See also Ecumenism; YMCA, YWCA

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Ting, K.H. No Longer Strangers: Selected Writings of K.H. Ting. Edited by Ray Whitehead.

Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1989.

———. Love Never Ends: Papers by K.H.Ting. Edited by Janice Wickeri. Nanjing: Yilin Press, 2000.

Wickeri, Janice, and Philip Wickeri, eds. A Chinese Contribution to Ecumenical Theology: Selected Writings of K.H. Ting. Geneva: WCC Books, 2002.

Secondary Source:

“A Tribute to K.H. Ting on His Eightieth Birthday.” The Chinese Theological Review 10 (1995).

PHILIP WICKERI

TOCQUEVILLE, ALEXIS DE (1805–1859)

French writer. De Tocqueville's fame rests on a single work. For nine months, beginning in May 1831, the young French aristocrat studied the emergent democratic culture in the United States. His classic work Democracy in America continues to be seen as a most insightful analysis of American society. In it, he devotes considerable attention to the cultural significance of American Protestantism.

De Tocqueville described Americans as deeply religious and credited their faith for creating a bulwark of republican freedom. Although Catholic by birth and elusive about his own religious beliefs, he applauded the fact that political liberty had multiplied ways of believing in America but had not led to religious skepticism as predicted by ENLIGHTENMENT Philosophers. Such divisions provoked heated theological debates, he admitted, but they could not undermine a prevailing harmony of Christian social purpose.

Harboring deep concerns about the centrifugal tendencies of unbridled DEMOCRACY, de Tocqueville assigned particular importance to the ways Protestants balanced personal spiritual devotion with equal commitment to moral reform, political freedom, and material improvement. Such earthly applications enabled religion to control popular passions and preserve republican order without benefit of formal political power. His sanguine expectations met a far different reality in the 1840s, however, when the SLAVERY issue divided BAPTISTS and METHODISTS along sectional lines, aggravating social tensions that led to the CIVIL WAR in 1861.

Finally, the absence of a clerical establishment in America led de Tocqueville to give WOMEN particular prominence in American political culture. He concluded that this most vitally religious segment of the population made the home a private reservoir of Christian morality indispensable to training citizens committed to the public good.

References and Further Reading

Tocqueville, Alexis de. Democracy in America. vol. 1 originally published 1835; vol. 2 originally published 1840. Edited by J. P. Mayer. Translated by George Lawrence. New York: Harper and Row, 1968.

Mitchell, Joshua. The Fragility of Freedom: Tocqueville on Religion, Democracy, and the American Future. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.

MARK Y. HANLEY

TOLAND, JOHN (1670–1721)

English theologian. Toland was born in Londonderry, Ireland, on November 30, 1670, of Roman Catholic parents, and died in Putney, near London, on March 11, 1721. He studied at the University of Glasgow and then at Leiden in the NETHERLANDS. In 1694 he went to Oxford and two years later, in 1696, published his first and most important book, Christianity Not Mysterious, or a Treatise Showing That There is Nothing in the Gospel Contrary to Reason Nor Above It, And That No Christian Doctrine Can Properly Be Called a Mystery. In this volume, in the Deist tradition of his time, Toland rejected such external authorities as TRADITION, the Scriptures, and the church. Reason is the only principle of AUTHORITY for the Christian. The criterion for making all religious decisions and for formulating all Christian DOCTRINE must be unimpaired reason. Although the Christian may get information from revelation, that is, Scripture, that information must be confirmed by reason. Therefore, in Christianity there is nothing that is mysterious. Here Toland goes beyond some Deist writers who (see DEISM) taught that there were truths of reason, truths of revelation that agree with reason, and truths above reason. Toland insists that there are not truths above reason, such as the resurrection and the virgin birth. The argument that there are truths above reason is the source of all absurdities in Christianity, usually promulgated by the CLERGY, such as TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

Toland insists that what can be known by revelation must as well be understood as any other matter in the world. In this regard reason is superior to revelation, just as a Greek Grammar is superior to the New Testament, for we make use of the grammar to understand the language and of reason to understand the sense of the BIBLE. Reason is no less from God than revelation; indeed, reason is the candle, the guide within each person. Revelation is never mysterious nor incomprehensible once it is known. There cannot even be the appearance of a conflict between revelation and the gospel. Toland wanted to prove that the essence of Christianity is found in natural religion that all peoples and races have in common. In a sense, Christianity is “sectarian,” that is, a special branch of the real, natural religion.

Toland was convinced that a special revelation was limited to a particular time and a particular people; thus it lacks universality. True religion is universally available and is equally available to all peoples in all times. In Nazarenus (1718) he argued that the original simple moral precepts of Christianity as found in the synoptic gospels were corrupted by priests and philosophers.

References and Further Reading

Cragg, G.R. Reason and Authority in the Eighteenth Century. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1964.

Stephen, Leslie. English Thought in the Eighteenth Century. vol. I. New York: G.P.Putnam's Sons, 1927.

Sullivan, Robert E. John Toland and the Deist Controversy: A Study In Adaptations. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982.

DONALD S.ARMENROUT

TOLERATION

Toleration, tolerantia, is taken by many to be an overwhelmingly modern virtue. Most associate the idea with the separation of church and state as embodied, paradigmatically, in the constitution of the United States of America. Most look to English philosopher John Stuart Mill's (1806–1873) On Liberty (1859) or, at the earliest, to philosopher JOHN LOCKE'S (1632–1704) A Letter Concerning Toleration (1689) for its intellectual antecedents. Toleration is, furthermore, taken to be a positive virtue, indicating an acceptance of pluralism and diverse behaviors and beliefs. It is variously interpreted as referring to an array of different acts, individuals, or claims of truth, and a refusal to judge any one position, individual, or claim as beyond the boundaries of a common humanity. Often, as can be perceived, such a position can easily shade off into a shallow relativism, indifference, or alternatively into a skepticism toward all truth-claims and normative desiderata. On the other hand, an attitude of toleration is deemed central to the working of a pluralistic, democratic polity—the prerequisite to any idea of universal human rights. As such, it is central to the changing world order at the turn of the twenty-first century.

The Problem of Toleration

The idea of toleration has a much longer history and is both conceptually and historically a more elusive concept than is commonly held. Taken today as a positive trait, tolerantia was, historically, understood as a negative one, a necessity, the lesser of two evils, but not as a positive good. Tolerance, in the medieval period in Europe was understood as restraint, forbearance, and as the ability to suffer and endure what was unacceptable but could not, for all that, be eradicated. In medieval canon law the two primary examples of this restraint involved Jews and prostitutes. In both cases the toleration demanded was a restraint of hatred rather than a command to love. The existence of both in society was taken as a necessary evil rather than as a positive good. The move from treating tolerance as the lesser of two evils to treating it as a normatively desirable state is, in fact, one of the chief differences between medieval and modern positions.

This changing valuation of toleration does, however, enormously complicate many of the problematic and contradictory aspects of the term. Any attitude of toleration immediately raises the question of the limits of toleration, And if, in the modern world, we do not accept the position that any individual can be beyond the boundaries of a shared humanity, certain forms of behavior most certainly can. What then are the limits of tolerance? Can these be framed in a universal language, shared by all societies and peoples? How can the limits be justified in terms that would benefit from worldwide compliance—if such is indeed a goal. Or, would such a goal in itself be intolerant toward myriad local traditions and practices?

Viewing toleration in a positive light returns us to the very contradictory meaning of the term. Tolerance implies endurance of something we reject as wrong (otherwise we would not need to be tolerant of it). Tolerance is clearly relative to practices and beliefs whose validity or normative status we reject as somehow incorrect, unreasonable, or undesirable. Tolerance does not, moreover, involve coming to accept these beliefs as correct or somehow less wrong. Rather it involves the ability to abide by, to live with those beliefs we continue to think of as wrong or misguided.

Moreover, if one group of people simply hated another we would not demand tolerance of them, but rather that they lose their hatred. We do not ask the racial bigot to tolerate the black, but to lose his hatred of him, or of the anti-Semite to tolerate the Jew (as in the Middle Ages). We do not, furthermore, consider the bigot who, through a vast expenditure of psychological energy refrains from acting on his prejudice, tolerant. This is not to say that toleration does not involve restraint, but it is a restraint of more than action; it is a restraint of thought and a restraint, quite possibly, of judgment. Thus, toleration involves some tension between commitment to one's own set of values and principles or religious edicts, and a willingness to abide by those of others who adhere to beliefs we believe are wrong. Again, the question of boundaries or limits to tolerance arises.

One way modern societies have posited these boundaries has been through the liberal distinction between public and private realms, which thus becomes a distinction in realms and types of toleration; certain beliefs and/or practices are deemed private and so, almost by definition, are to be tolerated. Here then, tolerance is not quite indifference simpliciter, but more a principled indifference, for one has no right to intervene in private matters, or even to judge them. In this reading, all conflicting views are reduced to an almost aesthetic realm of different matters of taste (or what are often termed lifestyles). One could, however, query if this is tolerance at all. Principled indifference is not tolerance. The much-vaunted toleration of mod-ern societies may well be more complicated and problematic than we often take it to be, tending, in fact, to constantly be in danger of slipping into indifference and relativism.

Within the experience of most Western European and North Atlantic societies, the development of toleration has been marked by a retreat of religion from the public arena, its privatization, and the general growth of secularization as the defining context of public life. Toleration has come to be associated with pluralism, which, when accepted as a value, implies the ability to exist together with other, competing visions of society and of the cosmos. Pluralism implies tolerance, not solely the toleration of error (what can perhaps be termed tolerance with a small "t"), but tolerance of alternative and competing civilizational visions (tolerance with a capital "T") with their own claims to the public sphere and the organization of communal life.

In Western Europe the development of this form of tolerance has taken a very particular form—that of secularization. That is to say, as society secularized and religion retreated from the public domain, reducing its claims on the public sphere and becoming more and more a matter of the congregant's internal value disposition, there developed, concomitantly, a growing tolerance of other faiths. This change has generally been identified with the ENLIGHTENMENT and the influence of the FRENCH REVOLUTION. Within Europe, the test case of this type of toleration has been in attitudes toward the Jewish people, from which we also learn that privatized belief in itself is far from sufficient for the development of toleration toward the other. The HOLOCAUST was perpetrated less than one hundred years after Jews were granted full civic emancipation in Western European countries.

Tolerance and Protestantism

The privatization of religious belief as a basis for toleration is very much rooted in the institutionalization of Protestant religiosity. The very circumscription of religious truth claims to the realm of the private rather than that of shared, public culture has much to do with the way sectarian Protestantism developed in England and New England in the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries. The epistemological foundations of this orientation were, in part, laid by John Locke, who claimed that because religion was a matter of belief, any coercion of the will would simply not work in enforcing religious conformity, for the structures of belief were not subject to the workings of the will.

While true, such an approach indicates its own particular religious assumptions in its stress on belief as standing at the center of religious consciousness, reflecting, that is, a very particular type of Protestant religiosity. For while belief cannot indeed be coerced, practice, and most especially public practice, certainly can. There are religions where public practices are a good deal more central than the structure of individual belief systems. If we look to Hinduism, Islam, or JUDAISM we immediately see this to be so. No small number of people continue to be engaged in violent, illegal, and often repressive behavior in many parts of the world over issues of religious practice, such as whether coffee houses can be open in Jerusalem on the Sabbath and whether women must go veiled in public or can attend university, and so on.

The path of toleration that eventually led to modern positions on the privatization of belief, freedom of thought, and individual rights is nevertheless rooted in Protestant beliefs in the privatization of grace and the internalization of conscience that developed most saliently among groups of sectarian Protestants—MORAVIANS (see Moravian Church), QUAKERS, BAPTISTS, ANABAPTISTS (see Anabaptism), Collegiants, Socinians (see Socinian Church)—in the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Such religious thinkers as Hans Denck (1500–1527) and SEBASTIAN FRANCK (1499–1542) played an important role in developing an attitude of toleration, not just of different Christian sects to one another, but to all of humankind. Sebastian Franck's belief in religious freedom, the opaqueness of all ultimate truths, and the common nature of the human predicament continued to be influential much beyond his own lifetime.

The writings of thinkers such as Jean Bodin (1529–1596) and Pierre Bayle (1647–1706) developed less explicitly religious bases for toleration and provided a critical bridge between the explicitly religious discourse of the sixteenth century and the arguments of the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, increasingly based on natural law. Pierre Bayle, who himself converted to Catholicism in 1668 and back to Protestantism less than two years later, was exceptional for his time, extending toleration even to atheists, which neither Jean Bodin nor, later, John Locke was to do. (Locke also refused toleration to Catholics.) Bayle, indeed, anticipated a very modern approach to toleration predicted on individual liberty and freedom of expression. Samuel Pufendorf's (1623–1694) writings on toleration within the context of the early modern natural law tradition (though less radical than Bayle) must also be noted in this context.

Belief in the unmediated access of the believer to the deity, the importance of faith, and the freedom of conscience all contributed to the growth of toleration in early modern Europe. Eventually these beliefs led to the secularization of the ideas of inner light or Holy Spirit, the internalization of the idea of grace and, by the eighteenth century, its secularization into more contemporary notions of morality, civic virtue, and often romantic nationalism as well. Critical here were developments in the thirteen colonies of what became the United States of America. The unique nature of individual rights as expressed in the bills of rights of the different states was the perceived source of these rights in godly dictates rather than in any tradition or customary ideas of inherited privileges. Individual rights and the tolerance that accompanied them were deemed sacred and rooted in the words of the Gospel rather than in the positive law of the state. A direct inheritance of the Puritan migration of the 1630s, it is not clear that such an attitude can be generalized to other religious traditions and cultures.

Toleration and Skepticism

There has, historically, been another foundation posited for toleration, one that for a period shared the stage with what became the modern argument for individual rights, but then retreated to the background; this was an argument based on skepticism. Both arguments—that predicated on individual rights and the freedom of conscience, and that predicted on skepticism—emerged out of the Protestant REFORMATION and the wars of religion and the challenge that the Reformation posited for the faith, practices, and criteria of justification of Catholic Europe.

The history of skepticism has been less studied outside the history of science. Here too, though, the Protestant Reformation was critical, most especially in challenging the church's infallibility. For in so doing, Protestant thought challenged existing ideas of certitude as well as the veracity of received truth as proclaimed by church authorities. Consequently, in the debates between Catholics and Protestants over sufficient evidence, the problems of knowledge and faith were joined and ultimately characterized by the failure to justify faith on the basis of knowledge. This led, in turn, to pure fideism on one hand (that is, belief by faith alone) and on the other a sort of mitigated skepticism. It was this latter position that was taken by Sebastian Castellio (1515–1563) in his condemnation of the burning of Miguel Servetus (1511–1553) in the Geneva of JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564)—a reasonable belief that because we cannot be sure of truth, we cannot be sure of the nature of HERESY and hence cannot go to extremes such as the burning of heretics. Tolerance came to be based on a skepticism toward our ability to know ultimate truth.

The debate between Castellio and Calvin took place in an atmosphere characterized by the revival of classical Pyrrhonism (i.e., the doubting of all propositions including those of doubt itself), which was itself called up by the search for justification of an infallible truth via a self-evident criteria. While the Protestants contested papal authority, the Catholics vigorously attacked Protestant belief in the work of inner conscience. Francois Veron (c. 1575–1625) was one of the masters of the Counter-Reformation polemic that showed how (1) the Protestant claim that Scripture was self-evidently clear was manifestly false and in need of interpretation, and (2) predicating interpretation on individual conscience opened the floodgates to endless sectarianism and antinomian potentialities.

One side claimed that the Catholic demand for infallible knowledge led to the discovery that no such knowledge exists and hence to complete doubt and Pyrrhonism, while the other claimed that the very proliferation of opinions that Protestantism led to, ended in complete uncertainty in religious belief and hence to total doubt. That such a position could also be the basis of a deeply felt humanism and widely practiced toleration is best evinced in the life and writings of Michael de Montaigne (1533–1592).

Criticism of biblical narrative in the writings of Baruch Spinoza (1632–1677) and others also contributed to an increasing skepticism of religious truthclaims and a tolerance toward different interpretations of godly edicts and divine commandments. Together with a growing realization of the magnitude of human suffering caused by religious persecution, this contributed to a growing, albeit mitigated, toleration in societies such as Holland and, in the late seventeenth century, in England and New England as well. (In England for example, the Toleration Act of 1689 granted freedom of religion to dissenting Protestant sects but not to Roman Catholics nor to those who denied the Trinity).

Historically, in the countries of Western Europe, the argument for a tolerance based on skepticism was overtaken by two developments: (1) the liberal argument for individual autonomy, and (2) the process of secularization itself, which obviated the very need for religious tolerance. To these was added the Cartesian revolution, which reoriented the whole issue of certitude as well as the position of the knowing subject.

Conclusion

A principled toleration based on skepticism is a difficult position to maintain as it would seem that people have a marked preference for certitude, even if it is of a tremendously circumscribed horizon. To maintain a position of belief while at the same time maintaining a position of skepticism as to its truth-claims—indeed a skepticism so great that one is tolerant of other such claims—is a truly stoic position, but it is one that, first and foremost, rests on some belief, otherwise the whole issue of tolerance becomes moot.

