

DICTIONARY for THEOLOGICAL
INTERPRETATION of the BIBLE

KEVIN J. VANHOOZER
GENERAL EDITOR

—
CRAIG G. BARTHOLMEW, DANIEL J. TREIER, and N. T. WRIGHT

(p
3)

DICTIONARY
for THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION of
the BIBLE

KEVIN J. VANHOOZER GENERAL
EDITOR

CRAIG G. BARTHOLOMEW, DANIEL J. TREIER, AND N. T. WRIGHT ASSOCIATE EDITORS

(p 4)© 2005 by Baker Book House Company
Published in North America by Baker Academic a division of Baker Publishing Group
P.O. Box 6287, Grand Rapids, MI 49516-6287

www.bakeracademic.com and in Great Britain by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge

36 Causton Street
London SW1P 4ST

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means—for example, electronic, photocopy, recording—without the prior written permission of the publisher. The only exception is brief quotations in printed reviews.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Dictionary for theological interpretation of the Bible / Kevin J. Vanhoozer, general editor; Craig G. Bartholomew, Daniel J. Treier, and N. T. Wright, associate editors.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 10: 0-8010-2694-6 (cloth) (U.S. edition)

ISBN 978-0-8010-2694-2

1. Bible—Theology—Dictionaries. 2. Bible—Criticism, interpretation, etc.—Dictionaries. I. Vanhoozer, Kevin J. II. Bartholomew, Craig G., 1961– III. Treier, Daniel J., 1972– IV. Wright, N. T. (Nicholas Thomas) BS440.D4952005 220.3—dc22 2005015484

British Library Cataloguing-in-Publication Data

A catalogue record of this book is available from the British Library.

ISBN 0-281-05780-X (U.K. edition)

Unless otherwise labeled, Scripture quotations are from The HOLY BIBLE, NEW INTERNATIONAL VERSION®. NIV®. Copyright © 1973, 1978, 1984 by International Bible Society. Used by permission of Zondervan. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations labeled ESV are from The Holy Bible, English Standard Version, copyright © 2001 by Crossway Bibles, a division of Good News Publishers. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations labeled KJV are from the King James Version of the Bible.

Scripture quotations labeled NKJV are from the New King James Version. Copyright © 1982 by Thomas Nelson, Inc. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations labeled NRSV are from the New Revised Standard Version of the Bible, copyright 1989, Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations labeled RSV are from the Revised Standard Version of the Bible, copyright 1952 [2nd edition, 1971] by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations labeled TNIV are from the Holy Bible, Today's New International Version™ copyright © 2001 by International Bible Society. All rights reserved.

(p 5) CONTENTS

List of Contributors

List of Abbreviations

Introduction

Dictionary Articles

List of Articles by Category

Topical Index

Scripture Index

(p 7) CONTRIBUTORS

Anderson, Ray S. Ph.D., University of Edinburgh. Professor of Theology and Ministry, Fuller Theological Seminary. Practical Theology

Bacote, Vincent E. Ph.D., Drew University. Assistant Professor of Theology, Wheaton College. Justice

Badcock, Gary D. Ph.D., University of Edinburgh. Associate Professor of Theology, Huron University College. Calling/Vocation; Holy Spirit, Doctrine of the

Baker, William R. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Professor of New Testament, Cincinnati Bible Seminary. James, Book of

Bartholomew, Craig G. Ph.D., University of Bristol. H. Evan Runner Chair in Philosophy, Redeemer University College. Biblical Theology; Deconstruction; Ecclesiastes, Book of; Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation

Barton, Stephen C. Ph.D., King's College London. Reader in New Testament, University of Durham. Social-Scientific Criticism

Beck, John A. Ph.D., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Associate Professor of Hebrew, Concordia University Wisconsin. Geography

Begbie, Jeremy. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Vice Principal, Ridley Hall, University of Cambridge. Music, the Bible and; Worship

Benson, Bruce Ellis. Ph.D., Katholieke Universiteit Leuven. Associate Professor of Philosophy, Wheaton College. Poststructuralism; Structuralism

Bimson, John J. Ph.D., University of Sheffield. Tutor in Old Testament, Trinity College, Bristol. Chronology and the OT; Ezra, Book of; Nehemiah, Book of

Blocher, Henri A. G. Diplôme d'Etudes Supérieures de Théologie, Faculté Libre de Théologie Protestante of Paris. Professor of Systematic Theology, Faculté Libre de Théologie Evangélique. Atonement; Original Sin

Block, Daniel I. D.Phil., University of Liverpool. Professor of Old Testament, Wheaton College. Deuteronomy, Book of

Bock, Darrell L. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Research Professor of New Testament Studies, Dallas Theological Seminary. Messiah/Messianism; Miracle

Boersma, Hans. Th.D., State University of Utrecht. James I. Packer Professor of Theology, Regent College. Violence

Bowald, Mark A. Ph.D., University of Toronto. Assistant Professor of Religion and Theology, Redeemer University College. Grace; Objectivity

Brady, Christian M. M. D.Phil., University of Oxford. Assistant Professor and Director of Jewish Studies, Tulane University. Lamentations, Book of; Targum

Bray, Gerald. D.Litt., University of Paris-Sorbonne. Anglican Professor of Divinity, Beeson Divinity School. Allegory; Medieval Biblical Interpretation

Briggs, Richard S. Ph.D., University of Nottingham. Tutor in New Testament and Hermeneutics, University of Durham. Speech-Act Theory

Brown, Jeannine K. Ph.D., Luther Seminary. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Bethel Seminary. Chronology and the NT

Bryan, Christopher. Ph.D., University of Exeter. C. K. Benedict Professor of New Testament, University of the South School of Theology. Passion Narratives; Romans, Book of; Sermon on the Mount

Burnett, Richard E. Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary. Associate Professor of Systematic Theology, Erskine Theological Seminary. Historical Criticism

Burridge, Richard A. Ph.D., University of Nottingham. Dean of King's College and Honorary Lecturer in New Testament Studies, King's College London. Biography

Buth, Randall. Ph.D., University of California Los Angeles. Director, Biblical Language Center, Hebrew University and Biblical Language Center. Language, Linguistics

Chaplin, Jonathan. Ph.D., University of London. Associate Professor of Political Theory, Institute for Christian Studies. Political Theology

Charry, Ellen T. Ph.D., Temple University. Margaret W. Harmon Associate Professor of Systematic Theology, Princeton Theological Seminary. Earth/Land; Human Being, Doctrine of; Incarnation

- (p 8) Chilton, Bruce. Ph.D., University of Cambridge. Bernard Iddings Bell Professor of Religion, Bard College. Temple
- Cole, Graham A. Th.D., Australian School of Theology. Professor of Biblical and Systematic Theology, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. God, Doctrine of; Lord's Supper; Sanctification
- Cook, John A. Ph.D., University of Wisconsin. Lecturer, University of Wisconsin. Lexicons, OT
- Cummins, S. A. D.Phil., University of Oxford. Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Trinity Western University. John, Book of; Oral Tradition and the NT
- Davids, Peter H. Ph.D., University of Manchester. Scholar-in-Residence, Vineyard Church, Stafford, TX. Jude, Book of; 2 Peter, Book of
- Dawn, Marva J. Ph.D., University of Notre Dame. Theologian, Christians Equipped for Ministry. Powers and Principalities
- de Gruchy, John W. Ph.D., University of South Africa. Robert Selby Taylor Professor of Christian Studies, University of Cape Town. Bonhoeffer, Dietrich
- deSilva, David A. Ph.D., Emory University. Professor of New Testament and Greek, Ashland Theological Seminary. Apocrypha
- Enns, Peter. Ph.D., Harvard University. Associate Professor of Old Testament, Westminster Theological Seminary. Exodus/New Exodus; Pseudepigrapha
- Escobar, Samuel. Ph.D., Universidad Complutense de Madrid. Thornley B. Wood Professor of Missiology, Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary. Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics
- Evans, Craig A. Ph.D., Claremont Graduate University. Payzant Distinguished Professor of New Testament, Acadia Divinity College. Jewish Exegesis
- Evans, Mary J. M.Phil., CNAA. Vice Principal, London School of Theology. Hosea, Book of
- Farrow, Douglas. Ph.D., King's College London. Associate Professor of Christian Thought, McGill University. Ascension; Church, Doctrine of the
- Felch, Susan M. Ph.D., Catholic University of America. Professor of English, Calvin College. Dialogism
- Fowl, Stephen E. Ph.D., University of Sheffield. Professor of Theology, Loyola College in Maryland. Virtue
- Frame, John M. D.D., Belhaven College. Professor of Systematic Theology and Philosophy, Reformed Theological Seminary. Apologetics; Logic
- France, R. T. Ph.D., University of Bristol. Principal of Wycliffe Hall (Retired), University of Oxford. Kingdom of God; Relationship between the Testaments
- Gagnon, Robert A. J. Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary. Associate Professor of New Testament, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary. Sexuality
- Garland, David E. Ph.D., Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Associate Dean of Academic Affairs and Professor of New Testament, Truett Theological Seminary. 1 Corinthians, Book of
- Gow, Murray D. Th.D., Australian College of Theology. Minister, St. Paul's

Cooperating Parish, Kamo, New Zealand. Ruth, Book of

Gracia, Jorge J. E. Ph.D., University of Toronto. Samuel P. Capen Chair of Philosophy and State University of New York Distinguished Professor, State University of New York at Buffalo. Meaning

Green, Joel B. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Dean of Academic Affairs and Professor of New Testament Interpretation, Asbury Theological Seminary. Commentary; Context; Dictionaries and Encyclopedias; Narrative Theology

Greene-McCreight, Kathryn. Ph.D., Yale University. St. John's Episcopal Church, New Haven, CT. Interpretation, History of; Literal Sense; Mary; Rule of Faith

Grenz, Stanley J. D.Theol., University of Munich. Late Pioneer McDonald Professor of Theology, Carey Theological College. Community, Interpretative

Griffiths, Paul J. Ph.D., University of Wisconsin. Arthur J. Schmitt Professor of Catholic Studies, University of Illinois at Chicago. Reading; Religion

Groves, J. Alan. Ph.D. candidate, Free University of Amsterdam. Professor of Old Testament, Westminster Theological Seminary. Judges, Book of

Gundry, Robert H. Ph.D., Manchester University. Scholar-in-Residence and Professor Emeritus, Westmont College. Jesus, Quest for the Historical; Matthew, Book of Gundry-Volf, Judith. Th.D., University of Tübingen. Adjunct Associate Professor of New Testament and Research Scholar, Yale University.

Harlow, Daniel C. Ph.D., University of Notre Dame. Associate Professor of New Testament, Early Judaism, and Early Christianity, Calvin College. Dead Sea Scrolls; Jewish Context of the NT

Harrison, Carol. Ph.D., University of Oxford. Professor of Historical Theology, University of Durham. Augustine

Hart, Trevor A. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Professor of Divinity and Dean of the Faculty of Divinity, University of St. Andrews. Imagination

Hess, Richard S. Ph.D., Hebrew Union College. Professor of Old Testament, Denver Seminary. History of Israel; Kings, Books of; Oral Tradition and the OT

(p 9)Hill, Andrew E. Ph.D., University of Michigan. Professor of Old Testament Studies, Wheaton College. Genealogy

Hill, Daniel. Ph.D., Kings College London. Lecturer in Philosophy, University of Liverpool. Philosophy; Proposition; Warrant

Holmes, Stephen R. Ph.D., University of London. Lecturer in Theology, University of St. Andrews. Creed; Image of God; Salvation, Doctrine of

Horton, Michael S. Ph.D., University of Coventry; University of Oxford. Professor of Theology and Apologetics, Westminster Theological Seminary in California. Historical Theology; Sacrament

House, Paul R. Ph.D., Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Associate Dean and Professor of Divinity, Beeson Divinity School. Haggai, Book of; Obadiah, Book of

Humphrey, Edith M. Ph.D., McGill University. Associate Professor of New Testament Studies, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary. 2 Corinthians,

Book of; Infancy Narratives; Jesus and Scripture; New Creation
Hurtado, Larry W. Ph.D., Case Western Reserve University. Professor of New Testament Language, Literature, and Theology, University of Edinburgh. Monotheism

Jacobs, Alan. Ph.D., University of Virginia. Professor of English, Wheaton College. Love

Jacobs, Mignon R. Ph.D., Claremont Graduate University. Associate Professor of Old Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary. Malachi, Book of; Micah, Book of

Jeanrond, Werner. Ph.D., University of Chicago. Professor of Systematic Theology, Lund University. Text/Textuality

Jeffrey, David Lyle. Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary. Distinguished Professor of Literature and Humanities, Baylor University. Western Literature, the Bible and

Keesmaat, Sylvia C. D.Phil., University of Oxford. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies and Hermeneutics, Institute for Christian Studies. Colossians, Book of

Kelly, Brian E. Ph.D., University of Bristol. Dean of Chapel, Canterbury Christ Church University College. Samuel, Books of

Kille, D. Andrew. Ph.D., Graduate Theological Union. Consultant. Psychological Interpretation

Knapp, Henry M. Ph.D., Calvin Theological Seminary. Associate Pastor, First Presbyterian Church, Beaver, PA. Protestant Biblical Interpretation

Koptak, Paul E. Ph.D., Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary; Northwestern University. Paul and Bernice Brandel Professor of Communication and Biblical Interpretation, North Park Theological Seminary. Intertextuality

Laansma, Jon C. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Associate Professor of Ancient Languages and New Testament, Wheaton College. Hebrews, Book of

Lane, Anthony N. S. B.D., University of Oxford. Professor of Historical Theology and Director of Research, London School of Theology. Justification by Faith; Tradition

Lauber, David. Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary. Assistant Professor of Theology, Wheaton College. Yale School

Lee, Moonjang. Ph.D., University of Edinburgh. Professor of Theology and Missions, Trinity Theological College, Singapore. Asian Biblical Interpretation

LeMarquand, Grant. Th.D., University of Toronto. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies and Mission, Trinity Episcopal School for Ministry. African Biblical Interpretation

Longman, Tremper, III. Ph.D., Yale University. Robert H. Gundry Professor of Biblical Studies, Westmont College. Song of Songs

Lucas, Ernest C. Ph.D., University of Kent; Ph.D., University of Liverpool. Vice Principal and Tutor in Biblical Studies, Bristol Baptist College. Daniel, Book of

MacDonald, Neil B. Ph.D., University of Edinburgh. Senior Lecturer in Theology, University of Surrey Roehampton. Language-Game

Magallanes, Hugo. Ph.D., Drew University. Associate Dean and Associate Professor of Church in Society, Asbury Theological Seminary. Racism

Marshall, I. Howard. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Honorary Research Professor of New Testament, University of Aberdeen. Johannine Epistles; 1 Timothy, Book of; 2 Timothy, Book of; Titus, Book of

Martin, Francis. S.S.D., Pontifical Biblical Institute. Chair for Catholic-Jewish Theological Studies, Pope John Paul II Cultural Center. Spiritual Sense

Mattox, Mickey L. Ph.D., Duke University. Assistant Professor of Theology, Marquette University. Luther, Martin

McCann, J. Clinton, Jr. Ph.D., Duke University. Evangelical Professor of Biblical Interpretation, Eden Theological Seminary. Psalms, Book of

McConville, J. G. Ph.D., Queen's University, Belfast. Professor of Old Testament Studies, University of Gloucestershire. Jeremiah, Book of; Joshua, Book of; Prophetic Writings

McGrath, Alister E. D.Phil., University of Oxford. Professor of Historical Theology, University of Oxford. Doctrine

(p 10)McIntosh, Mark A. Ph.D., University of Chicago. Associate Professor of Theology, Loyola University Chicago. Mysticism, Christian

McKnight, Scot. Ph.D., University of Nottingham. Karl A. Olsson Professor in Religious Studies, North Park University. Apostasy; Covenant; Israel

Millard, Alan R. M.Phil., University of London. Emeritus Professor of Hebrew and Ancient Semitic Languages, University of Liverpool. Archaeology

Moberly, R. W. L. Ph.D., University of Cambridge. Reader in Old Testament, Department of Theology, University of Durham. Exodus, Book of; Jewish-Christian Dialogue; Patriarchal Narratives

Möller, Karl. Ph.D., University of Gloucestershire. Lecturer in Theology and Religious Studies, St. Martin's College. Amos, Book of; Prophecy and Prophets in the OT; Rhetoric; Rhetorical Criticism

Moritz, Thorsten. Ph.D., London University. Professor of New Testament, Bethel Seminary. Critical Realism; Mark, Book of

Motyer, Stephen. Ph.D., King's College London. Lecturer in New Testament and Hermeneutics, London School of Theology. Anti-Semitism

Murphy, Francesca Aran. Ph.D., King's College London. Reader in Systematic Theology, University of Aberdeen. Revelation, Book of

Murphy, Nancey. Ph.D., University of California Berkeley; Th.D., Graduate Theological Union. Professor of Christian Philosophy, Fuller Theological Seminary. Epistemology

Noll, Mark A. Ph.D., Vanderbilt University. McManis Professor of Christian Thought, Wheaton College. History

Noll, Stephen F. Ph.D., University of Manchester. Vice Chancellor, Uganda Christian University. Angels, Doctrine of

Nolland, John. Ph.D., University of Cambridge. Academic Dean and Director of Postgraduate Studies, Trinity College Bristol. Form Criticism and the NT

Nordling, Cherith Fee. Ph.D., University of St. Andrews. Director of Spiritual Leadership Development, Calvin College. Feminist Biblical Interpretation

O'Connor, Robert. Ph.D., University of Notre Dame. Associate Professor of Philosophy, Wheaton College. Pragmatism; Science, the Bible and

Osborne, Grant R. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Genre; Redaction Criticism

Pao, David W. Ph.D., Harvard University. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Prophecy and Prophets in the NT

Parry, Robin. Ph.D., University of Gloucestershire. Commissioning Editor, Paternoster Press. Ideological Criticism; Narrative Criticism; Reader-Response Criticism

Paul, Ian. Ph.D., Nottingham Trent University; St. John's College. Director of Partnership Development, St. John's College Nottingham. Metaphor

Perrin, Nicholas. Ph.D., Marquette University. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Wheaton College. Gnosticism; Gospels; Nag Hammadi

Peterson, Eugene H. M.A., Johns Hopkins University. Professor Emeritus of Spiritual Theology, Regent College. Prayer; Spirituality/Spiritual Formation

Rae, Murray A. Ph.D., King's College London. Senior Lecturer, University of Otago. Anthropomorphism

Redditt, Paul L. Ph.D., Vanderbilt University. Professor of Old Testament, Georgetown College. Esther, Book of; Leviticus, Book of; Source Criticism

Reese, Ruth Anne. Ph.D., University of Sheffield. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Asbury Theological Seminary. Male and Female

Reno, R. R. Ph.D., Yale University. Associate Professor of Theology, Creighton University. Sin, Doctrine of

Renz, Thomas. Ph.D., University of Bristol. Lecturer in Old Testament, Oak Hill College. Ezekiel, Book of; Habakkuk, Book of; Nahum, Book of; Zephaniah, Book of

Richards, Kent Harold. Ph.D., Claremont Graduate University. Executive Director and Professor of Old Testament, Society of Biblical Literature. Societies, Scholarly

Riches, John K. M.A., University of Cambridge. Hon. Research Professor, Department of Theology and Religious Studies, University of Glasgow. Galatians, Book of

Riddell, Peter G. Ph.D., Australian National University. Professor of Islamic Studies and Director of the Centre for Islamic Studies and Muslim-Christian Relations, London School of Theology. Language, Grammar and Syntax; Semiotics

Rodgers, Peter R. B.Litt., University of Oxford. Adjunct Professor, Fuller Theological Seminary. Lexicons, NT; 1 Peter, Book of; Textual Criticism

Rogerson, John W. D.D. Emeritus Professor of Biblical Studies, University of Sheffield. Liberal Biblical Interpretation

Rosner, Brian S. Ph.D., University of Cambridge. Senior Lecturer in Biblical Studies and Ethics, Moore Theological College; Macquarie University.

Salvation, History of

Rota, Michael W. Ph.D. candidate, Saint Louis University. Thomas Aquinas
(p 11) Rowland, Christopher. Ph.D., University of Cambridge. Dean Ireland
Professor of the Exegesis of Holy Scripture, University of Oxford.
Apocalyptic

Ryken, Leland. Ph.D., University of Oregon. Professor of English, Wheaton College. Literary Criticism

Schreiner, Thomas R. Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary. Professor of New Testament, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Assurance

Schultz, Richard L. Ph.D., Yale University. Armerding Chair of Biblical Studies, Wheaton College. Form Criticism and the OT; Isaiah, Book of

Scott, James M. Th.D., University of Tübingen. Professor of Religious Studies, Trinity Western University. Exile and Restoration

Seerveld, Calvin. Ph.D., Free University of Amsterdam. Professor Emeritus of Aesthetics, Institute for Christian Studies. Art, the Bible and Seitz, Christopher. Ph.D., Yale University. Professor of Old Testament and Theological Studies and Dean of the Faculty of Divinity, University of St. Andrews. Canonical Approach

Snodgrass, Klyne. Ph.D., University of St. Andrews. Paul W. Brandel
Professor of New Testament Studies, North Park Theological Seminary.
Exegesis

Sparks, Kent L. Ph.D., University of North Carolina. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, Eastern University. Numbers, Book of

Spencer, Stephen R. Ph.D., Michigan State University. Blanchard Professor of Theology, Wheaton College. Hope; Last Things, Doctrine of

Spinks, Bryan D. D.D., University of Durham. Professor of Liturgical Studies, Yale University. Liturgy

Stiver, Dan R. Ph.D., Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Professor of Theology, Hardin-Simmons University. Method

Streett, Daniel R. Ph.D. candidate, Yale University. Adjunct Professor of New Testament, Criswell College. Philemon, Book of

Stylianopoulos, Theodore G. Th.D., Harvard University. Professor of New Testament, Holy Cross Greek Orthodox School of Theology.
Orthodox Biblical Interpretation

Sundberg, Walter. Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary. Professor of Church History, Luther Seminary. Enlightenment; Princeton School

Sung, Elizabeth Yao-Hwa. Ph.D. candidate, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Culture and Hermeneutics

Tennison, D. Allen. Ph.D. candidate, Fuller Theological Seminary. Adjunct Professor, Azusa Pacific University. Charismatic Biblical Interpretation

Thiselton, Anthony C. Ph.D., University of Sheffield. Professor Emeritus of Christian Theology, University of Nottingham. Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics

Thompson, John L. Ph.D., Duke University. Professor of Historical Theology, Fuller Theological Seminary. Calvin, John

Throntveit, Mark A. Ph.D., Union Theological Seminary Virginia. Professor of Old Testament, Luther Seminary. Chronicles, Books of

Torrance, Alan J. Dr. Theol., University of Erlangen-Nuremberg. Chair of Systematic Theology, University of St. Andrews. Analogy

Travers, Michael E. Ph.D., Michigan State University. Professor of English, Southeastern College at Wake Forest. Formalism; Poetry

Treier, Daniel J. Ph.D., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Assistant Professor of Theology, Wheaton College. Concept; Creation; Faith; Jesus Christ, Doctrine of; Model; Philosophy; Proof Text; Scripture, Unity of; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary; Typology; Wisdom

Trueman, Carl R. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Associate Professor of Church History and Historical Theology, Westminster Theological Seminary. Illumination

Turner, Max. Ph.D., University of Cambridge. Professor of New Testament Studies, London School of Theology. Ephesians, Book of; Utterance Meaning

Urban, David V. Ph.D., University of Illinois at Chicago. Assistant Professor of English, Calvin College. Hero Story; Imagery; Irony

Van Leeuwen, Raymond C. Ph.D., University of Toronto. Professor of Biblical Studies, Eastern University. Proverbs, Book of; Translation; Wisdom Literature

VanGemeren, Willem. Ph.D., University of Wisconsin. Professor of Old Testament and Semitic Studies, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Joel, Book of

Vanhoozer, Kevin J. Ph.D., University of Cambridge. Research Professor of Systematic Theology, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Intention/Intentional Fallacy; Providence; Ricoeur, Paul; Systematic Theology; Truth; Word of God

Verhey, Allen. Ph.D., Yale University. Professor of Christian Ethics, Duke University. Ethics

Wainwright, Geoffrey. D.D., University of Cambridge. Cushman Professor of Christian Theology, Duke University. Trinity

Walton, John H. Ph.D., Hebrew Union College; Jewish Institute of Religion. Professor of Old Testament, Wheaton College. Ancient Near Eastern Background Studies; Etymology; Jonah, Book of

(p 12) Walton, Steve. Ph.D., University of Sheffield. Senior Lecturer in Greek and New Testament, London School of Theology. Acts, Book of

Wanamaker, Charles A. Ph.D., University of Durham. Associate Professor, University of Cape Town. 1 Thessalonians, Book of; 2 Thessalonians, Book of

Ward, Timothy. Ph.D., University of Edinburgh. Vicar, Holy Trinity Church, Hinckley, Leicester, UK. Scripture, Sufficiency of

Webb, William J. Ph.D., Dallas Theological Seminary. Professor of New Testament, Heritage Seminary. Slavery

Webster, John. Ph.D., University of Cambridge. Professor of Systematic Theology, University of Aberdeen. Barth, Karl; Canon; Gospel; Scripture, Authority of

Wenham, Gordon J. Ph.D., King's College London. Professor of Old Testament, University of Gloucestershire. Genesis, Book of; Law

Westphal, Merold. Ph.D., Yale University. Distinguished Professor of Philosophy, Fordham University. Onto-Theology

Williams, Stephen N. Ph.D., Yale University. Professor of Systematic Theology, Union Theological College. Revelation

Williamson, Peter S. S.T.D., Pontifical Gregorian University. Assistant Dean, Sacred Heart Major Seminary. Catholic Biblical Interpretation

Wilson, Lindsay. Ph.D., University of Melbourne. Vice Principal and Lecturer in Old Testament, University of Melbourne. Job, Book of

Wolters, Albert. Ph.D., Free University of Amsterdam. Professor of Religion, Theology, and Classical Languages, Redeemer University College. Metanarrative; Worldview; Zechariah, Book of

Wolterstorff, Nicholas P. Ph.D., Harvard University. Noah Porter Professor Emeritus of Philosophical Theology, Yale University. Authorial Discourse Interpretation

Wood, Susan K. Ph.D., Marquette University. Professor of Theology and Associate Dean, St. John's University. Baptism

Wright, N. T. D.Phil., D.D., University of Oxford. Bishop of Durham. Philippians, Book of; Resurrection Narratives; Resurrection of the Dead; Roman Empire

Wright, Stephen I. Ph.D., University of Durham. Director, College of Preachers, Spurgeon's College. Luke, Book of; Parables; Preaching, Use of the Bible in

Yarbrough, Robert W. Ph.D., University of Aberdeen. Associate Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Tübingen School

Yocum, John. D.Phil., University of Oxford. Fellow in Christian Doctrine, University of Oxford. Scripture, Clarity of

Young, Frances M. Ph.D., University of Cambridge. Edward Cadbury Professor of Theology, University of Birmingham. Patristic Biblical Interpretation

(p 13) ABBREVIATIONS

Bible Texts and Versions

AT	Author's Translation
BH	Biblia Hebraica . Edited by R. Kittel and P. Kahle. 3d ed. Privileg. Württ. Bibelanstalt, 1937
BHS	Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia . Edited by K. Ellinger and W. Rudolph. Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1983

DH	Deuteronomic History
ESV	English Standard Version
ET	English translation/version(s)
KJV	King James Version
GNB	Good News Translation
JB	The Jerusalem Bible
LXX	Septuagint (Greek OT)
MT	Masoretic Text (Hebrew Bible)
NA 27	Novum Testamentum Graece . Edited by Eberhard and Erwin Nestle, and K. Aland. 27th rev. ed. Deutsche Bibelstiftung, 1993
NIV	New International Version
NJB	The New Jerusalem Bible
NKJV	New King James Version
NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
NT	New Testament
OT	Old Testament
PN	Passion Narrative
Q	Quelle , hypothetical source of material common to Matthew and Luke but missing in Mark
P.Oxy.	Papyrus Oxyrhynchus
RSV	Revised Standard Version
SP	Samaritan Pentateuch
Tanak	Acronym for the Hebrew Bible: Torah (Law), Nevi'im (Prophets), Ketubim (Writings)
TNIV	Today's New International Version
UBS 4	The Greek New Testament . Edited by K. Aland et al. 4th rev. ed. United Bible Societies, 1983
Vulg.	Vulgate (Latin)
WL	Wisdom Literature

Old Testament Books

Gen.	Genesis
Exod.	Exodus
Lev.	Leviticus
Num.	Numbers
Deut.	Deuteronomy
Josh.	Joshua
Judg.	Judges
Ruth	Ruth
1–2 Sam.	1–2 Samuel
1–2 Kings	1–2 Kings
1–2 Chron.	1–2 Chronicles
Ezra	Ezra
Neh.	Nehemiah
Esther	Esther
Job	Job
Ps. (Pss.)	Psalms
Prov.	Proverbs

Eccles.	Ecclesiastes
Song	Song of Songs
Isa.	Isaiah
Jer.	Jeremiah
Lam.	Lamentations
Ezek.	Ezekiel
Dan.	Daniel
Hos.	Hosea
Joel	Joel
Amos	Amos
Obad.	Obadiah
Jon.	Jonah
Mic.	Micah
Nah.	Nahum
Hab.	Habakkuk
Zeph.	Zephaniah
Hag.	Haggai
Zech.	Zechariah
Mal.	Malachi

New Testament Books

Matt.	Matthew
Mark	Mark
Luke	Luke
John	John
Acts	Acts
Rom.	Romans
1–2 Cor.	1–2 Corinthians
Gal.	Galatians
Eph.	Ephesians
Phil.	Philippians
Col.	Colossians
1–2 Thess.	1–2 Thessalonians
1–2 Tim.	1–2 Timothy
Titus	Titus
(p 14) Philem.	Philemon
Heb.	Hebrews
James	James
1–2 Pet.	1–2 Peter
1–3 John	1–3 John
Jude	Jude
Rev.	Revelation

Apocrypha

Add. Dan.	Additions to Daniel
Bel.	Bel and the Dragon
Pr. Azar.	Prayer of Azariah
Song of Thr.	Song of the Three Young Men
Sus.	Susanna

Add. Esth.	Additions to Esther
Bar.	Baruch
1 Esd.	1 Esdras
2 Esd.	2 Esdras (= 4 Ezra)
Jdt.	Judith
Let. Jer.	Letter of Jeremiah (Bar. 6)
1–4 Macc.	1–4 Maccabees
Pr. Man.	Prayer of Manasseh
Ps. 151	Psalms 151
Sir.	Sirach (Ecclesiasticus)
Tob.	Tobit
Wis.	Wisdom (of Solomon)

OT Pseudepigrapha

Apoc. Ab.	Apocalypse of Abraham
Ascen. Isa.	Ascension of Isaiah
1 En.	1 Enoch (Ethiopic Apocalypse)
2 En.	2 Enoch (Slavonic Apocalypse)
3 En.	3 Enoch (Hebrew Apocalypse)
Jub.	Jubilees
L.A.B.	Liber antiquitatum biblicarum (Pseudo-Philo)
Liv. Pro.	Lives of the Prophets
Pss. Sol.	Psalms of Solomon
T. Judah	Testament of Judah
T. Levi	Testament of Levi
T. Mos.	Testament of Moses
T. Naph.	Testament of Naphtali

Dead Sea Scrolls and Related Texts

CD	Cairo Damascus Document (cf. 4Q265–273; 5Q12; 6Q15)
DSS	Dead Sea Scrolls
1QH	Thanksgiving Hymns
1QIsa <sup>a</sup>	Isaa
1QM	War Scroll
1QpHab	Commentary on Habakkuk
4QMMT	Miqtsat Ma'ase ha-Torah = 4Q394–399
1QS	Community Rule
4Q158	Reworked Pentateuch
4Q174	Florilegium = 4QFlor
4Q252	CommGen A
4Q285	Sefer ha-Milkhamah
4Q500	papBened
4QSam <sup>a</sup>	4Q51
4QSam <sup>b</sup>	4Q52
11Q19–20	Temple Scroll

Tractates of the Mishnah, Tosefta, and Talmud Mishnah

m. 'Abot	'Abot/Avot
m. Demai	Demai
m. Git.	Gittin
m. Meg.	Megillah
m. Ned.	Nedarim
m. Sanh.	Sanhedrin
m. Šabb.	Šabbat
m. Sotah	Sotah
m. Sukkah	Sukkah
m. Yad.	Yadayim
m. Yoma	Yoma

Tosefta

t. Sanh.	Sanhedrin
-----------------	------------------

Jerusalem Talmud

y. 'Abod. Zar.	'Abodah Zarah
y. Pe'ah	Pe'ah
y. Pesakh.	Pesakhim
y. Ta'an.	Ta'anit

Babylonian Talmud

b. B. Bat.	Baba Batra
b. Khag.	Khagigah
b. Hul.	Khullin/Hullin
b. Meg.	Megillah
b. Mo'ed Qat.	Mo'ed Qatan
b. Nid.	Niddah
b. Pesakh.	Pesakhim
b. Šabb.	Šabbat
b. Sanh.	Sanhedrin
b. Yoma	Yoma

Other Rabbinic Works

'Abot R. Nat.	'Abot/Avot de Rabbi Nathan
Gen. Rab.	Genesis Rabbah
Lev. Rab.	Leviticus Rabbah

Other Jewish Works

Josephus

C. Ap.	Contra Apionem (Against Apion)
A.J.	Antiquitates judaicae (Jewish Antiquities)
B.J.	Bellum judaicum (Jewish War)
Vita	Vita (The Life)

Philo

Abr.	De Abrahamo (On the Life of Abraham)
Cher.	De cherubim (On the Cherubim)
Contempl.	De vita contemplativa (On the Contemplative Life)
Det.	Quod deterius potiori insidari soleat (That the Worse Attacks the Better)
Hypoth.	Hypothetica (Hypothetica)

Plant.	De plantatione (On Planting)
(p 15)Prob.	Quod omnis probus liber sit (That Every Good Person Is Free)
QG	Quaestiones et solutiones in Genesin (Questions and Answers on Genesis)
Spec.	De specialibus legibus (On the Special Laws)

Nag Hammadi Tractates

Gos. Thom.	Gospel of Thomas
Gos. Truth	Gospel of Truth

Apostolic Fathers

Barn.	Barnabas
1–2 Clem.	1–2 Clement
Did.	Didache
Herm. Vis.	Shepherd of Hermas, Vision
Ign. Eph.	Ignatius, To the Ephesians

Other Early Christian Literature

Athanasius

Inc.	De incarnatione (On the Incarnation)
C. Ar.	Orationes contra Arianos (Orations against the Arians)
C. Gent.	Contra gentes (Against the Pagans)

Augustine of Hippo

Bapt.	De baptismo contra Donatistas (Baptism)
Civ.	De civitate Dei (The City of God)
Conf.	Confessionum libri XIII (Confessions)
Doctr. chr.	De doctrina christiana (Christian Instruction)
Enarrat. Ps.	Enarrationes in Psalmos (Enarrations on the Psalms)
Enchir.	Enchiridion de fide, spe, et caritate (Enchiridion on Faith, Hope, and Love)
Faust.	Contra Faustum Manichaeum (Against Faustus the Manichaeum)
Quaest. Hept.	Quaestiones in Heptateuchum
Spir. et litt.	De spiritu et littera De spiritu et littera ((The Spirit and the LetterThe Spirit and the Letter))
Trin.	De Trinitate (The Trinity)

Clement of Alexandria

Paed.	Paedagogus (Christ the Educator)
Strom.	Stromata (Miscellanies)

Cyprian

Ep.	Epistulae (Epistles)
------------	-----------------------------

Eusebius

Dem. ev.	Demonstratio evangelica (Demonstration of the Gospel)
Hist. eccl.	Historia ecclesiastica (Ecclesiastical History)

Gregory of Nazianzus

Ep. ad Cled.	Epistula ad Cledonium (Letters 101–2)
Or.	Orationes

Irenaeus

Epid.	Epideixis tou apostolikou kerygmatos (Demonstration of
--------------	---

the Apostolic Preaching)

Haer. Adversus haereses (Against Heresies)

John Chrysostom

Hom. 2 Cor. Homiliae in epistulam ii ad Corinthios

Hom. Matt. Homiliae in Matthaeum

Hom. Rom. Homiliae in epistulam ad Romanos

Justin (Martyr)

1–2 Apol. Apologia i–ii (First–Second Apology)

Dial. Dialogus cum Tryphone (Dialogue with Trypho)

Lanctantius

Inst. Divinarum institutionum libri VII (The Divine Institutes)

Origen

Cels. Contra Celsum (Against Celsus)

Comm. Jo. Comentarii in evangelium Joannis

Comm. Matt. Commentarium in evangelium Matthaei

Princ. De principiis (Peri archōn) (First Principles)

Tertullian

Marc. Adversus Marcionem (Against Marcion)

Praescr. De praescriptione haereticorum (Prescription against Heretics)

Prax. Adversus Praxean (Against Praxeas)

Spect. De spectaculis (The Shows)

Virg. De virginibus velandis (The Veiling of Virgins)

Classical and Hellenistic Sources

Aristotle

Metaph. Metaphysica (Metaphysics)

Rhet. Rhetorica (Rhetoric)

Herodotus

Hist. Historiae (Histories)

Plato

Leg. Leges (Laws)

Theaet. Theaetetus

Pliny the Elder

Nat. Naturalis historia (Natural History)

Pliny the Younger

Ep. Epistulae (Letters)

Seneca

Ep. Epistulae morales (Letters)

Sophocles

Oed. col. Oedipus coloneus

Suetonius

Aug. Divus Augustus

Medieval Sources

Gregory the Great

Hom. in evan. Homiliae in evangelia
(p 16)Moral. Expositio in Librum Job, sive Moraliū libri xxv
(Moralia)

Thomas Aquinas

QQ Questiones quodlibetales
ST Summa theologiae/theologica

Additional Abbreviations

A1CS The Book of Acts in Its First Century Setting
AAR American Academy of Religion
AB Anchor Bible
ABD Anchor Bible Dictionary. Edited by D. N. Freedman. 6 vols. Doubleday, 1992
ACCS Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture
ACCSNT Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture: New Testament
ACCSOT Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture: Old Testament
AGJU Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums
AJSL American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literature
AJT Asia Journal of Theology
AnBib Analecta biblica
ANET Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament. Edited by J. B. Pritchard. Princeton, 1950. 3d ed., 1969
ANF Ante-Nicene Fathers. Edited by A. Roberts and J. Donaldson. 10 vols. 1885–96. Reprint, Eerdmans, 1986–89
AThR Anglican Theological Review
AUSS Andrews University Seminary Studies
BA Biblical Archaeologist
BAR Biblical Archaeology Review
BASOR Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research
BBR Bulletin for Biblical Research
BDAG Bauer, W., F. W. Danker, W. F. Arndt, and F. W. Gingrich. A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature. 3d ed. University of Chicago Press, 2000
BEATAJ Beiträge zur Erforschung des Alten Testaments und des antiken Judentum
BECNT Baker Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament
BETL Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologiarum lovaniensium
Bib Biblica
BibInt Biblical Interpretation
BIS Biblical Interpretation Series
BKAT Biblischer Kommentar, Altes Testament. Edited by M. Noth and H. W. Wolff
BN Biblische Notizen
BNTC Black's New Testament Commentaries
BSac Bibliotheca sacra
BSL Biblical Studies Library

BT	The Bible Translator
BTB	Biblical Theology Bulletin
BU	Biblische Untersuchungen
BZAW	Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft
CahRB	Cahiers de la Revue biblique
CBC	Cambridge Bible Commentary
CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly
CCSL	Corpus Christianorum: Series latina. Turnhout, 1953–
CD	Church Dogmatics, Karl Barth
Chm	Churchman [Watford, Herts, UK]
ChrLit	Christianity and Literature
CJT	Canadian Journal of Theology
Comm	Communio
CoS	Hallo, W. W., and K. L. Younger, eds. The Context of Scripture . Vol. 1, Canonical Compositions from the Biblical World . Vol. 2, Monumental Inscriptions from the Biblical World Brill, 1997–2000
CQ	Classical Quarterly
CRINT	Compendia rerum iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum
CTJ	Calvin Theological Journal
CurBS	Currents in Research: Biblical Studies
DBI	Dictionary of Biblical Imagery . Edited by L. Ryken, J. C. Wilhoit, and T. Longman III. InterVarsity, 1998
DBSJ	Detroit Baptist Seminary Journal
DJG	Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels . Edited by J. B. Green and S. McKnight. InterVarsity, 1992
ÉBib	Études bibliques
ECC	Eerdmans Critical Commentary
EDBT	Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology . Edited by W. Elwell. Baker Books/Paternoster, 1996
ÉgT	Église et théologie
EKKNT	Evangelisch-katholischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
EncJud	Encyclopaedia Judaica . 16 vols. Encyclopaedia Judaica, 1972
ErJb	Eranos-Jahrbuch
ET	English translation/edition
EvQ	Evangelical Quarterly
EvT	Evangelische Theologie
ExAud	Ex auditu
FC	Fathers of the Church. Catholic University of America, 1947–
FCB	Feminist Companion to the Bible
FF	Foundations and Facets
FOTL	Forms of the Old Testament Literature
FThSt	Freiburger theologische Studien
GBS	Guides to Biblical Scholarship
HAT	Handbuch zum Alten Testament
HBT	Horizons in Biblical Theology

HS	Hebrew Studies
(p 17) HSM	Harvard Semitic Monographs
HTKNT	Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
HTR	Harvard Theological Review
HUCA	Hebrew Union College Annual
HUT	Hermeneutische Untersuchungen zur Theologie
IBC	Interpretation: A Bible Commentary for Teaching and Preaching
ICC	International Critical Commentary
IDB	The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible . Edited by G. A. Buttrick. 4 vols. Abingdon, 1962
IJST	International Journal of Systematic Theology
Inst.	John Calvin. Institutes of the Christian Religion . Edited by J. McNeill. Translated by F. L. Battles. 2 vols. Westminster, 1960
Int	Interpretation
JAAR	Journal of the American Academy of Religion
JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society
JBL	Journal of Biblical Literature
JETS	Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society
JNES	Journal of Near Eastern Studies
JPS	Jewish Publication Society
JPT	Journal of Pentecostal Theology
JPTSup	Journal of Pentecostal Theology: Supplement Series
JR	Journal of Religion
JSJ	Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic, and Roman Periods
JSJSup	Journal for the Study of Judaism Supplement
JSNT	Journal for the Study of the New Testament
JSNTSup	Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series
JSOT	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament
JSOTSup	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament: Supplement Series
JSS	Journal of Semitic Studies
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies
JTSA	Journal of Theology for Southern Africa
KEK	Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar über das Neue Testament (Meyer-Kommentar)
LCC	Library of Christian Classics
LCL	Loeb Classical Library
LWorks	Martin Luther. Luther's Works. Vols. 1–30 edited by J. Pelikan, 31–54 by H. Lehman. 55 vols. Concordia/Fortress, 1955–1986
MTS	Marburger theologische Studien
NAC	New American Commentary
NBf	New Blackfriars
NCB	New Century Bible Commentary
Neot	Neotestamentica

NHS	Nag Hammadi Studies
NIB	The New Interpreter's Bible . Edited by L. Keck. 12 vols. Abingdon, 1994–2002
NIBCNT	New International Biblical Commentary on the New Testament
NIBCOT	New International Biblical Commentary on the Old Testament
NICNT	New International Commentary on the New Testament
NICOT	New International Commentary on the Old Testament
NIDNTT	New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology . Edited by C. Brown. 4 vols. Zondervan, 1975–85
NIDOTTE	New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis . Edited by W. A. VanGemeren. 5 vols. Zondervan, 1997
NIGTC	New International Greek Testament Commentary
NIVAC	NIV Application Commentary
NovTSup	Novum Testamentum Supplements
NPNF 1	Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers , Series 1. Edited by P. Schaff. 14 vols. 1886–90. Reprint, T&T Clark/Eerdmans, 1979–
NPNF 2	Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers , Series 2. Edited by P. Schaff and H. Wace. 14 vols. 1890–1900. Reprint, Hendrickson, 1994
NSBT	New Studies in Biblical Theology
NTAbh	Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen
NTC	New Testament in Context
NTG	New Testament Guides
NTS	New Testament Studies
NTT	New Testament Theology
NTTS	New Testament Tools and Studies
ÖBS	Österreichische biblische Studien
OBT	Overtures to Biblical Theology
OED	Oxford English Dictionary . Prepared by J. A. Simpson and E. S. C. Weiner. 2d ed. 20 vols. Clarendon/Oxford University Press, 1989
OiC	One in Christ
OTG	Old Testament Guides
OTL	Old Testament Library
PG	Patrologia graeca [= Patrologiae cursus completus: Series graeca]. Edited by J.-P. Migne. 162 vols. J.-P. Migne, 1857–86
ProEccl	Pro ecclesia
PRSt	Perspectives in Religious Studies
PTMS	Pittsburgh Theological Monograph Series
QD	Quaestiones disputatae
QR	Quarterly Review
(p 18)RAC	Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum . Edited by T. Klauser et al. A Hiersemann, 1950–
RACSup	Supplements to RAC . Edited by T. Klauser. A.

	Hiersemann, 1971–
RelS	Religious Studies
RelSRev	Religious Studies Review
RevExp	Review and Expositor
RevQ	Revue de Qumran
RHPR	Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses
RHR	Revue de l'histoire des religions
RTR	Reformed Theological Review
SAC	Studies in Antiquity and Christianity
SBB	Stuttgarter biblische Beiträge
SBL	Society of Biblical Literature
SBLDS	Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series
SBLMS	Society of Biblical Literature Monograph Series
SBLSCS	Society of Biblical Literature Septuagint and Cognate Studies
SBLSP	Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers
SBLSymS	Society of Biblical Literature Symposium Series
SBS	Stuttgarter Bibelstudien
SBT	Studies in Biblical Theology
SBTS	Sources for Biblical and Theological Study
SC	Sources chrétiennes. Paris: Cerf, 1943–
SCA	Studies in Christian Antiquity
SE	Studia evangelica
SemeiaSt	Semeia Studies
SHR	Studies in the History of Religions (supplements to Numen )
SHS	Scripture and Hermeneutics Series
SJLA	Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity
SJT	Scottish Journal of Theology
SNTSMS	Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series
SP	Sacra pagina
SR	Studies in Religion
SSN	Studia semitica neerlandica
ST	Studia theologica
TDNT	Theological Dictionary of the New Testament . Edited by G. Kittel and G. Friedrich. Translated by G. W. Bromiley. 10 vols. Eerdmans, 1964–76
TDOT	Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament . Edited by G. J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren. Translated by J. T. Willis, G. W. Bromiley, D. E. Green, and D. W. Stott. Eerdmans, 1974–
Them	Themelios
ThTo	Theology Today
TJ	Trinity Journal
TNTC	Tyndale New Testament Commentaries
TOTC	Tyndale Old Testament Commentaries
TS	Theological Studies
TSAJ	Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum
TynBul	Tyndale Bulletin
TZ	Theologische Zeitschrift

TZTh	Tübinger Zeitschrift für Theologie
VE	Vox evangelica
VT	Vetus Testamentum
VTSup	Vetus Testamentum Supplements
WA	D. Martin Luthers Werke: Kritische Gesamtausgabe ( Weimarer Ausgabe ). Ed. J. F. K. Knaake et al. 57 vols. H. Böhlau, 1883–
WBC	Word Biblical Commentary
WC	Westminster Commentaries
WCC	World Council of Churches
WMANT	Wissenschaftliche Monographien zum Alten und Neuen Testament
WTJ	Westminster Theological Journal
WUNT	Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament
YNER	Yale Near Eastern Researches
ZAW	Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft
ZNW	Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche
ZPE	Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik
ZTK	Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche

(p 19) INTRODUCTION

What Is Theological Interpretation of the Bible?

Kevin J. Vanhoozer, General Editor

Of the making of dictionaries there would seem to be no end. What, then, could possibly justify adding one more item to an already well-stocked inventory? Neither the editors nor the contributors are under the illusion that a new reference work will change the world. Nevertheless, we believe that the time is ripe for a resource that combines an interest in the academic study of the Bible with a passionate commitment to making this scholarship of use to the church. DTIB aims to provide clarification, analysis, and evaluation of the various approaches to biblical interpretation currently in the marketplace, with a view to assessing their theological significance—in particular, their value for reading Scripture in and for the community of the faithful.

What Theological Interpretation Is *Not

Initially, it is easier to say what theological interpretation of the Bible is not rather than what it is.

Theological interpretation of the Bible is not an imposition of a theological system or confessional grid onto the biblical text. By theological interpretation, we do not intend to urge readers to return to a time when one's interpretation was largely dominated by one's particular confessional theology (e.g., Lutheran, Reformed, Roman Catholic, et al.). While it may be true that exegesis without theological presuppositions is not possible, it is not part of the dictionary's remit to take sides with a specific confessional or denominational tradition. (On the other hand, we do affirm the ecumenical consensus of the church down through the ages and across confessional lines that the Bible should be read as a unity and as narrative testimony to the identities and actions of God and of Jesus Christ.)

Theological interpretation is not simply what dogmatic theologians do when they use the Bible to support their respective doctrinal positions. Although so-called precritical interpretations took biblical authority seriously and sought to read for the church's edification, they may be vulnerable at three points: They may fail to take the text seriously in its historical context. They may fail to integrate the text into the theology of the OT or NT as a whole. They may be insufficiently critical or aware of their own presuppositions and standpoints (Wright).

Theological interpretation of the Bible is not an imposition of a general hermeneutic or theory of interpretation onto the biblical text. Theological interpretation is also not simply a matter of imposing a general hermeneutic on the Bible as if the Bible could be read "like any other book." There are properly theological questions, such as the relationship of the OT and NT, that require more than what is typically offered in a general hermeneutic (Watson). Stated more strongly, there are some interpretative questions that require theological, not hermeneutical, answers: "The turn to hermeneutics as a general discipline . . . has not so much offered a resolution of older theological questions, historically considered, as it has changed the subject" (Seitz). There is something left for interpreters to do after reading the Bible like any other book. At the same time, we believe that certain biblical and theological themes have implications not only for biblical interpretation, but for general hermeneutics as well.

Theological interpretation of the Bible is not a form of merely historical, literary, or sociological criticism preoccupied with (respectively) the world “behind,” “of,” or “in front of” the biblical text. Those who seek to renew biblical interpretation will incorporate whatever is true, noble, right, admirable, and useful in the various historical, literary, and sociological approaches used to describe the world “behind” the text (e.g., in the past), the world “of” the text (e.g., its plot and literary form), or the world “in front of” the text (e.g., the way in which readers receive and react to it). Theological interpretation may not be reduced to historical or to literary or to sociopolitical criticism, but it is not less than these either. For God has been active in history, in the composition of the biblical text, and in the formation (p 20) of a people to reveal and redeem. Yet each of these disciplines, though ancillary to the project of interpreting the church’s Scripture, stops short of a properly theological criticism to the extent that it brackets out a consideration of divine action.

Why “Theological” Interpretation of the Bible?

DTIB responds to two crises precipitated by Enlightenment and post-Enlightenment developments in biblical interpretation respectively: to the modern schism between biblical studies and theology, and to the postmodern proliferation of “advocacy” approaches to reading Scripture where each interpretative community does what is right in its own eyes. The primary purpose of this dictionary is to provide biblical interpreters with a tool that would help make sense of the diverse interpretative approaches and evaluate these approaches as to their contribution toward a theological interpretation of the Bible. Our hope is that this work will provide an important new resource for recovering biblical studies as a properly theological discipline.

The “ugly ditch” in modern biblical interpretation: between exegesis and theology. The critical approach to biblical interpretation that has come to dominate the modern study of the Bible, especially in the university but also in seminaries, was developed in order to protect the Bible from what was thought to be its “dogmatic captivity” to confessional and theological traditions. For some two hundred years now, Christian faith has not been thought to be either necessary or relevant in the attempt to discover “what it meant.” Theology thus came to be of only marginal importance for biblical studies as practiced in university and divinity school settings. Indeed, modern biblical studies has become a virtual “theology-free zone.” Even scholars who identify themselves as Christians have to check their theological convictions at the door when they enter the academy (Fowl xii–xxx).

The divide separating biblical studies and theology was nothing less than Lessing’s famous “ugly ditch”: : the gap between reason and the gap between reason and faith, between publicly ascertainable history on the one hand and privately valued belief on the other. The goal of biblical studies for the typical modern scholar was to understand the texts by restoring them to their original historical contexts and by reading them on their own terms, namely, as (human) products of particular times and places, cultures and societies. In this interpretative framework, the Bible tended to be studied as evidence of a historically developing “religion,” as evidence of how ancient Israelites—and later, Jesus and his followers—tended to think about God, the world, and themselves. To study “religion,” however, is to study human beings and human history—in contrast to “theology” as the study of God and the mighty acts of God.

The problem was not so much with modern biblical scholarship’s interest in reconstructing historical contexts and the history of the text’s composition. The bigger problem was its tendency to treat the biblical texts as sources for reconstructing human history and religion rather than as texts that testify to God’s presence and action in history. To treat the Bible as a source—as evidence for some natural phenomenon “behind” it—is to deflect attention away from what the texts are saying (as testimony) in favor of a hypothetical reconstruction of “what actually happened.” History here trumps exegesis.

Interpreted theologically, the ugly ditch may be nothing less than the perceived gap between “nature” and “grace.” Reason, together with its many critical children—source, form, tradition, redaction criticism, and so on—is qualified to interpret the Bible as a historical and human text. But to read the Bible as the word of God is to make a leap into the realm of “grace” that either opposes, crowns, or outflanks reason (Wolters).

The “muddy ditch” in postmodern biblical interpretation: between exegesis and ideology. The Bible-theology relation in the late modern or postmodern era is less an ugly ditch, across which it is impossible to leap, than it is a “muddy ditch”—the quagmire of history, language, tradition, and culture—out of which it is impossible ever to extricate oneself. Postmoderns typically deny that we can escape our location in history, culture, class, and gender. Our readings of the biblical text will be shaped, perhaps decisively so, by our particular location and identity. The goal of interpretation is therefore to discover “what it means to my community, to those with my interpretative interest.” Postmodern readers come to Scripture with a plurality of interpretative interests, including (perhaps) the theological, though no one interest may claim more authority than another. The postmodern situation of biblical interpretation gives rise to a pluralism of interpretative approaches and hence to a legitimation crisis: Whose interpretation of the Bible counts, and why?

(p 21) Biblical interpretation in postmodernity means that there are no independent standards or universal criteria for determining which of many rival interpretations is the “right” or “true” one. A host of postmodern thinkers has slain the giant assumption behind much modern biblical scholarship that there can be objective, neutral, and value-free reading of biblical texts. Postmodern thinkers have charged modernity’s vaunted historical-critical method with being just one more example of an ideologically motivated approach. The critical approach only pretends to be objective, neutral, and value free. Modern biblical critics are as rooted in the contingencies of history and tradition as everyone else. Indeed, biblical criticism is itself a confessional tradition that begins with a faith in reason’s unprejudiced ability to discover truth. The question postmoderns raise for historical critics is whether, in exorcising the spirit of faith from biblical studies, they have not inadvertently admitted even more ideological demons into the academic house.

Whereas the temptation of historical criticism is to offer only “thin” descriptions of the world behind the text or of the process of the text’s composition, the temptation of ideological criticism is to offer only thinly veiled echoes of one’s own voice. To be distracted by what is “behind” or “before” the text, however, is to miss its message; such nontheological biblical criticism is like music criticism by the deaf and art criticism by the blind.

What Is Theological Interpretation of the Bible?

DTIB attempts to provide resources for understanding and engaging the contemporary crises in and around biblical interpretation and for proceeding toward a more constructive engagement with Scripture. Three premises undergird our approach to the theological interpretation of the Bible.

The theological interpretation of the Bible is not the exclusive property of biblical scholars but the joint responsibility of all the theological disciplines and of the whole people of God. It was Gerhard Ebeling who once declared that church history is essentially the history of biblical interpretation. To the extent that this is so, the present crisis in biblical interpretation—the confusion not only over what the Bible means but also over how to read it—is also a crisis for the church. The study of church history can itself be a theological discipline insofar as it helps the present church to learn from previous ways of interpreting Scripture. Indeed, one reason for the increased interest in theological interpretation of the Bible is the recent rehabilitation of the reputation of the church fathers as profound exegetes. Some have even touted “the superiority of pre-critical exegesis” (Steinmetz).

Is biblical studies a theological discipline? By and large, the resounding answer, at least in the setting of the modern university, has been Nein! Modern biblical scholars insist that biblical studies must be autonomous in order to be critical (Barr). Yet some degree of involvement with theology seems to be inevitable, for three reasons. First, biblical scholars must have recourse to theology in order to make sense of the text’s claims (Jeanrond). Readings that remain on the historical, literary, or sociological levels cannot ultimately do justice to the subject matter of the texts. Second, biblical studies needs theology (especially the latter’s analysis of contemporary culture) in order to be aware of the aims, intentions, and presuppositions that readers invariably bring to the biblical text (Wright). Third, biblical studies needs theology in order to provide a sufficient reason for the academy’s continued engagement with the biblical text. Only the assumption that these texts say something of unique importance can ultimately justify the depth of the exegete’s engagement (Levenson).

A word about biblical theology is in order, for on the surface this discipline seems a likely candidate to mediate the divide between biblical studies and theology. However, some (e.g., Barr; Fowl) see biblical theology as one more symptom of modern biblical scholarship’s assumption that it is possible neutrally and objectively to describe the religious beliefs of the biblical writers. The results of this study—“what it meant” to them, back then—are of more antiquarian than ecclesial interest and are offered to the academy, not the church. Yet others (e.g., Watson; Rosner) view biblical theology as an activity that is practically identical with the theological interpretation of the Bible in its concern for hearing the word of God in the church today.

If exegesis without presuppositions is impossible, and if some of these presuppositions concern the nature and activity of God, then it would appear to go without saying that biblical interpretation is always/already theological. One’s view of God, for instance, will influence which biblical statements about God one considers literal and which statements one takes as figurative. The inevitability of employing theological categories, (p 22) however, does not automatically license a wholesale appropriation of any one theological system. Nevertheless, readers with a theological interest, whether in the academy or the church, will at least seek to go further than describing what others have said or thought about God. Theological interpreters want to know, on the basis of Scripture and in light of contemporary concerns, what we should say and think about God.

Finally, practical theology takes part in biblical interpretation when it inquires into how the people of God should respond to the biblical texts. The way in which the church witnesses, through its language and life, is perhaps the most important form of theological interpretation of the Bible.

The theological interpretation of the Bible is characterized by a governing interest in God, the word and works of God, and by a governing intention to engage in what we might call “theological criticism.” Can theological interpretation be “critical,” and if so, in what sense? Historical and literary criticism we know, but with regard to theological criticism, we may be tempted to ask, “Who are you?”

A theological interpretation of the Bible is more likely to be critical of readers than of biblical authors or biblical texts. It is not that text criticism and other forms of criticism have no role; it is rather a matter of the ultimate aim of reading. Those who seek to interpret Scripture theologically want to hear the word of God in Scripture and hence to be transformed by the renewing of their minds (Rom. 12:2). In this respect, it is important to note that God must not be an “afterthought” in biblical interpretation. God is not simply a function of a certain community’s interpretative interest; instead, God is prior to both the community and the biblical texts themselves. A properly theological criticism will therefore seek to do justice to the priority of God. One way to do so is to guard against idols: images of God manufactured by the interpretative communities.

The dictionary editors believe that the principal interest of the Bible’s authors, of the text itself, and of the original community of readers was theological: reading the Scriptures therefore meant coming to hear God’s word and to know God better. DTIB therefore aims not to impose yet another agenda or ideology onto the Bible, but rather to recover the Bible’s original governing interest. On this view, biblical interpretation takes the form of a confession or acknowledgment of the work and word of God in and through Scripture.

One should not abandon scholarly tools and approaches in order to interpret the Bible theologically. On the contrary, modern and postmodern tools and methods may be usefully employed in theological interpretation to the extent that they are oriented to illuminating the text rather than something that lay “behind” it (e.g., what actually happened) or “before” it (e.g., the ideological concerns of an interpretative community). At the same time, a theological vantage point calls into question the autonomy of the realm of “nature,” and the autonomy of so-called critical approaches to reading the Bible, in the first place. Neither “nature” nor “knowledge” is ever religiously neutral; from the standpoint of Christian doctrine, “nature” is a divine creation, and “knowledge” is inseparable from some kind of faith. The challenge, therefore, is to employ critical methods, but not uncritically. Critical tools have a ministerial, not magisterial, function in biblical interpretation. The aim of a properly “confessional criticism” (Wolters) is to hear the word of God; a theological criticism is therefore governed by the conviction that God speaks in and through the biblical texts.

The strongest claim to be made for theological interpretation is that only such reading ultimately does justice to the subject matter of the text itself. Because biblical texts are ultimately concerned with the reality of God, readers must have a similar theological interest (Jeanron). Theological text genres (e.g., Gospels, prophecies, apocalyptic, etc.) call for theological reading genres, for styles of reading that proceed from faith and yet seek theological understanding. To read the biblical texts theologically is to read the texts as they wish to be read, and as they should be read in order to do them justice.

In sum, DTIB provides a Christian theological evaluation of the contemporary issues and approaches pertaining to biblical interpretation with a view to assessing how they enable the church better to hear what God is saying to church and world today. DTIB thus promises to be a key resource for those involved in the contemporary renaissance of what has come to be known as the “theological interpretation of Scripture.”

The theological interpretation of the Bible names a broad ecclesial concern that embraces a number of academic approaches. At present, no one model of theological interpretation of the Bible holds sway in the church. The editors of DTIB recognize that there is more than one way (p 23) of pursuing an interest in theological criticism. Because we are only in the initial stages of recovering a distinctly theological interpretation of Scripture, it would be unwise to preempt discussion of how best to read the Bible in the church. In choosing the various contributors, the editors were careful to invite representatives of different theological backgrounds, denominations, and interpretative approaches. Nevertheless, it is possible to discern at least three distinct emphases, more complementary than contradictory, that help us begin to distinguish types of theological interpretation.

Some interpreters have an interest in divine authorship, in the God-world relation “behind” the text as it were. This first type recognizes that our doctrine of God affects the way we interpret the Scriptures, while simultaneously acknowledging that our interpretation of Scripture affects our doctrine of God. Indeed, this two-sided problematic has been designated a matter of “first theology” (Vanhoozer). The focus here is less on establishing “what actually happened” than on reading the Bible in terms of divine authorship or as divinely appropriated human discourse (Wolterstorff). Interpreting Scripture as divine discourse opens up interesting possibilities for discerning the unity among the diversity of biblical books and for relating the two Testaments. Theological assumptions about God’s involvement with the production of Scripture play an important role in how interpreters take or construe the text and in how they deal with thematic developments as well as apparent historical inconsistencies.

A second group of theological interpreters focuses on the final form of the text rather than on questions of human or divine authorship. For these interpreters, it is the text as a finished literary work or narrative that serves as the prime theological witness. One discovers who God is by indwelling the symbolic world of the Bible. Proponents of this second approach seek to interpret the Bible on its own terms, whether these terms be literary (e.g., narrative) or properly religious (e.g., canon). Theology is a matter of “intratextual” reading (Lindbeck) that patiently unfolds the world of the text in order to learn what God was doing in Israel and in Jesus Christ. The God-world relation as depicted in the text thus becomes the framework for understanding today’s world too.

Still other interpreters of Scripture identify the theologically significant moment with the reading and reception of the Bible in the believing community today. The divine action that counts for these interpreters is the work of the Holy Spirit, which they locate as much in the present as, if not more than, in the past. What makes biblical interpretation theological is a function of the aims and interests of the community of readers for which the Bible is “Scripture” (Fowl). The focus here is on the world of the Christian community and its members, who seek to live before God and to worship faithfully. The theological interpretation of Scripture is a distinct practice of the church, and hence it is regulated by the goods at which that practice aims. The primary concern with the outcome of biblical interpretation affords an interesting vantage point from which to assess the relative contribution of various types of biblical criticism and interpretative approaches.

The Format of *DTIB

DTIB is intended as a resource for all readers interested in the theological interpretation of Scripture, not merely for those who advocate a particular approach. One purpose of the dictionary is to heal the debilitating breach that all too often prevents biblical scholars and theologians from talking to each other, or even from using the same reference books. If the dictionary accomplishes the purpose for which it was commissioned, it should appeal to biblical scholars, theologians, and pastors alike. Indeed, it should become an indispensable resource for any serious student of the Bible who also regards it as Scripture—a word from God about God. And this leads to the second purpose: to provide a resource for scholars in other disciplines to employ as they seek to promote biblical wisdom in and for their own disciplinary domains. The theological interpretation of Scripture is as important for scientists and sociologists as it is for exegetes and theologians proper—for all of us need a biblically and theologically informed framework for understanding God, the world, and ourselves.

Articles in the dictionary are arranged alphabetically from A to Z. Many headings are cross-referenced to other topics. Some readers may be interested to know how the editors formulated the list of topics. DTIB contains four basic types of articles.

Texts. Articles under this heading will focus on the various books of the Bible as well as certain textual features (e.g., canon) that have theological significance. Articles on books of the Bible focus on the message of the text rather than the process of its composition. They also pay special attention (p 24) to issues of theological significance that have arisen in the history of interpretation and highlight special problems and/or contributions that particular books of the Bible make with regard to doctrine and theology.

Hermeneutics. Some articles under this heading will treat issues pertaining to the theory of interpretation; other articles will examine the theories themselves. Articles in this category will also evaluate the suitability of general interpretative approaches for a theological interpretation of the Bible. Articles in this section include philosophical and literary approaches or concepts that have made an impact on biblical studies (e.g., deconstruction, genre).

Interpreters and Interpretative Communities. Articles under this rubric will focus on the persons or communities doing the interpreting (e.g., Barth; African biblical interpretation). This category includes topics relating to the interests, presuppositions, ideologies, and traditions of interpretative communities as well. Several articles will focus on certain qualities of the reader that contribute to “theological interpretation of Scripture” (e.g., virtue).

Doctrines and Themes. Finally, one group of articles treats explicitly theological concerns, especially as these can and have been brought to bear on the practice of biblical exegesis (e.g., covenant) and vice versa. These articles move in both directions: doctrinal themes arise out of reflection on biblical texts yet these doctrines in turn afford new lenses through which to interpret the text (McGrath). As we have already argued, assumptions about God have an important bearing on our biblical interpretation. Yet other doctrines too are particularly relevant to how one conceives the task of biblical interpretation. What, for instance, are the effects of sin on biblical interpretation? What is the role of the Holy Spirit in biblical interpretation? More importantly, how does our Christology affect our reading of Scripture (and vice versa)? Questions such as these indicate how the worldview implied in Scripture in turn affects how we think about, and engage in, biblical interpretation.

Conclusion: Reading to Know God

Of the making of dictionaries there is no end. Quite so! Yet the “end” of DTIB, its most important raison d’être, is to help promote the knowledge of God, the good, and the gospel via the practice of biblical interpretation. The ultimate justification for DTIB is its utility in helping to promote the knowledge of what God has done in Israel and in Jesus Christ for the good of the world.

The principal thrust of theological interpretation is to direct the interpreter’s attention to the subject matter of Scripture—God, the acts of God in history, the gospel—rather than to a particular theological tradition or, for that matter, to some other topic (e.g., the history of the text’s composition, the secular history “behind” the text, the structure of the text, etc.). The dictionary will explore all these other elements in interpretation with a view to assessing their contribution to helping the reader grow in the knowledge of God.

Theological interpretation of the Bible, we suggest, is biblical interpretation oriented to the knowledge of God. For much of their history, biblical studies, theology, and spirituality were all aspects of a single enterprise, that of knowing God (McIntosh). Knowing God is more than a merely academic exercise. On the contrary, knowing God, like theological interpretation of the Bible itself, is at once an intellectual, imaginative, and spiritual exercise. To know God as the author and subject of Scripture requires more than intellectual acknowledgment. To know God is to love and obey him, for the knowledge of God is both restorative and transformative.

Theological interpretation of the Bible achieves its end when readers enter into the world of the biblical texts with faith, hope, and love. When we make God's thoughts become our thoughts and God's word become our word, we begin to participate in the world of the text, in the grand drama of divine redemption. This is perhaps the ultimate aim of theological interpretation of the Bible: to know the triune God by participating in the triune life, in the triune mission to creation.

No one denomination, school of interpretation, or hermeneutical approach has a monopoly on reading the Bible for the word of God. Insights from the whole body of Christ—a body animated and guided by the Spirit of Christ—are needed if Christians are to display the mind of Jesus Christ.

In sum, the aim of this dictionary is to provide the resources necessary to respond to what for Johann Albrecht Bengel (1687–1752) was the biblical interpreter's prime directive: "Apply yourself wholly to the text; apply the text wholly to yourself." Interpreting Scripture theologically is the way to read the Bible "for a blessing" (Kierkegaard), for the sake of human flourishing, for the individual and social "good." Dictionaries are not schools of sanctification, of course; yet (p 25) the ultimate aim of the present work is to commend ways of reading Scripture that lead to the blessing of knowing God and of being formed unto godliness.

Bibliography

Barr, J. The Bible in the Modern World. SCM, 1973; Fowl, S., ed. The Theological Interpretation of Scripture. Blackwell, 1997; Jeanron, W. Text and Interpretation as Categories of Theological Thinking. Crossroad, 1988; Levenson, J. The Hebrew Bible, the Old Testament, and Historical Criticism. Westminster John Knox, 1993; Lindbeck, G. "Postcritical Canonical Interpretation: Three Modes of Retrieval." Pages 26–51 in Theological Exegesis, ed. C. Seitz and K. Greene-McCreight. Eerdmans, 1999; McGrath, A. The Genesis of Doctrine. Eerdmans, 1990; McIntosh, M. Mystical Theology. Blackwell, 2000; Rosner, B. "Biblical Theology." Pages 3–11 in New Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. T. D. Alexander and B. Rosner. InterVarsity, 2000; Seitz, , CC. . "The Theological Crisis of Serious "The Theological Crisis of Serious Biblical Interpretation." Pages 40–65 in Renewing Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2000; Steinmetz, D. "The Superiority of Pre-Critical Exegesis." Pages 26–38 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997; Vanhoozer, K. First Theology. InterVarsity, 2002; Watson, F. Text, Church, and World. T&T Clark, 1994; Wolters, A. "Confessional Criticism and the Night Visions of Zechariah." Pages 90–117 in Renewing Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2000; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995; Wright, N. T. The New Testament and the People of God. SPCK, 1993.

(p 27) A

Acts, Book of

History of Interpretation

Acts is arguably one of the most complex books of Scripture for the interpreter because of its multiple dimensions. It is a narrative that locates the growth of the early Christian movement in particular geographical and historical settings. As Luke's second volume (Acts 1:1), it is unique in the NT in continuing the story of Jesus into the story of the church. But in it Luke also presents a portrait of the church designed to persuade (the purpose enunciated in Luke 1:1–4 covers both volumes), so students of Acts need to ask what Luke seeks to persuade his readers about. Hence, for a book so full of references to God and the Spirit, that necessarily involves asking about the book's theology. Because of its multiple layers, Acts has been a laboratory for most types of critical study, although many are theologically disappointing.

The earliest full commentary on Acts is that of John Chrysostom, a series of sermons displaying a strong concern to relate Acts to Christian life and faith in his day—at times to the exclusion of the historical focus of twentieth-century scholarship. Similar concerns can be seen in the sixteenth-century commentaries of Luther and Calvin, who regard Acts as speaking to the issues of their day.

However, it took the nineteenth-century missionary movement for Acts to become seen as a resource for the church's mission in the contemporary world. Most notably, Roland Allen, a High Church Anglican, challenged the burgeoning missionary societies of the early twentieth century to adopt a strategy more like that portrayed of Paul in Acts, developing indigenous leadership for nascent churches and handing responsibility over to local leaders. It was only in the later twentieth century—with honorable exceptions—that Allen’s plea began to be heard.

Mainstream academic study of Acts, meanwhile, was strongly focused on historical criticism. Three German scholars are pivotal: Dibelius, Conzelmann, and Haenchen. Their studies focus on Luke’s theology, in the sense that they believe that Luke put his own stamp on his material, in both his selection and shaping of the stories. They combine studying Acts by using the tools of redaction criticism with a thoroughgoing historical skepticism, assuming that many parts of the story did not take place as Luke described them. In large measure, they do so because they believe that Luke was reinterpreting early Christian history to come to terms with the “delay of the parousia”—the collapse of the expectation that Jesus would return soon.

Conzelmann, in particular, develops a view of Luke-Acts that centers on a threefold division of time into the time before Jesus’ coming, the time of his ministry (called “the middle of time,” the German title of his seminal work The Theology of St. Luke), and the time of the church; he sees this threefold division in Luke 16:16. Conzelmann proposes that Luke replaced the imminent expectation of the earliest generation with a theological interpretation of continuing history, which Conzelmann calls “salvation history” (German: Heilsgeschichte), including moving the return of Jesus into the remote future.

The debate over the “delay of the parousia” dominated Lukan scholarship for most of the second half of the twentieth century, with the result that historical questions were foreground in debate and theological questions tended to be sidelined. Thus, O’Neill’s The Theology of Acts is subtitled In Its Historical Setting; it begins with a chapter on the date of Acts, and then reads the book against O’Neill’s reconstructed historical setting in the first third of the second century. A shining exception to this trend is Marshall, Luke, who argues cogently that salvation is a, if not the, central theme of Luke-Acts.

In the 1980s narrative criticism grew in prominence, applied to Luke-Acts first by Johnson and later by Tannehill. Their work reset the agenda of Acts scholarship and led to more theological readings of Acts. Notably, narrative criticism’s emphasis on studying the “final form” of texts, (p 28) rather than hypothetical sources, means that Acts is seen holistically. Of course, analyzing Luke’s presentation in Acts does not compel a scholar to agree with Luke’s view (e.g., Tannehill [3] disagrees with what he understands to be Luke’s view, that Christians should call Jewish people to become followers of Jesus). But it does produce a “level playing field,” where scholars can discuss together what Luke’s theology is. Thus, in more recent times there are stimulating and helpful studies of the theology of Acts (not all from a narrative-critical perspective).

The Message of Acts

There are numerous proposals for the theological center of Acts; in particular, “salvation” is widely seen as Luke’s major theme across his two volumes (Marshall, Historian; Green 19–22). Here is a typical statement: “Salvation is the principal theme of Acts, its narrative centrally concerned with the realization of God’s purposes to bring salvation in its fullness to all people” (Green 19). Although salvation is very important, and the book of Acts is the story of salvation spreading “to the ends of the earth” (1:8), a careful reading shows that God is the one who drives the story along and takes the initiatives that lead to the expansion of the believing community. And so we consider the message of Acts from this perspective.

In Acts, God is purposeful. Luke presents the church’s growth as fulfilling Scripture, with a particular stress on Isaiah and the Psalms (e.g., “fulfillment” language is prominent in the key speech in 13:27, 29, 33–35, 41, citing Psalms, Isaiah, and Habakkuk; see Pao). God is now bringing about these purposes (Peterson; Squires), manages events to his own ends, and directs his servants to be in the right place at the right time to bring others to know God (e.g., 8:26, 29, 39).

Acts portrays God as a missionary God, seeking first Jewish people to come to know him through Jesus the Messiah, and then drawing in Gentiles too, carrying out the program of 1:8. In the earlier sections Acts focuses on evangelism among Jews (e.g., 2:5–11; 3:11–26), and throughout the book the mission goes to Jewish people first, whether in synagogue (e.g., 17:1–3; 18:4) or a (Jewish) place of prayer (16:13–16). At the end, Paul is seeking to persuade Jewish people in Rome to become followers of Jesus (28:17–23). This shows that Acts should not be read as the story of God abandoning the Jewish people, but rather as God redefining the nature of his people (Jervell, esp. 18–25, 34–43).

As the book progresses, God pushes the believing community out among the Gentiles. At crucial points, God intervenes to direct the believers. Thus, it is God’s initiative that creates and progresses Philip’s encounter with the Ethiopian eunuch (8:26, 29)—a man whose castration would not permit him to take a full part in Jewish worship (Deut. 23:1). God engineers Peter’s meeting with the Roman centurion Cornelius, sending an angel to Cornelius’s house, using a vision to overcome Peter’s reluctance to go to the home of a Gentile, and speaking by the Spirit to Peter (10:1–8, 9–16, 17–21). Then God pours the Spirit on the Gentiles, thus overcoming any outstanding hesitancy from both Peter and the Jerusalem believers (10:44–48; 11:15–18). When Barnabas and Saul leave the pioneering Jew-Gentile community in Antioch, it is God who calls them to do this by the Spirit (13:1–3, presumably speaking through a prophet in the gathering). When Paul and his colleagues cannot find the right way to go, God is actively preventing them from going in wrong directions (16:6–8), and God then communicates the right direction by a vision (16:9–10). Again and again Acts highlights that the redefinition of God’s people is happening at God’s initiative.

God acts and calls people through a number of agents: angels (10:3–6), the Spirit (8:29), people (Peter, Stephen, Philip, and Paul are particularly prominent), and his word, which can be almost personified (over fifty times Acts uses “the word,” frequently qualified by “of the Lord/God,” esp. in 6:7; 8:14; 11:1; 12:24; 13:49; 19:10, 20).

In all of this activity God is a saving God (Green 19–22; Marshall, Historian), a wide-ranging category that includes physical healing (3:1–10 with 4:9; 14:9), reconciliation with God (2:21, 40, 47), forgiveness (5:31), and deliverance from a storm (27:20, 31). Throughout, God is the one who accomplishes these things, through Jesus (2:22; 10:38; 15:11; 16:31), who is the Savior (5:31; 13:23). Humans receive salvation by responding to the message in believing trust in Jesus (2:44; 3:16; 14:9; 16:31–32, 34) expressed in repentance and water baptism (2:38; 16:33; 22:16), resulting in becoming part of the believing community (2:39–42). Acts stresses the believers’ unity (e.g., the use of homothymadon, “with one accord,” in 1:14; 2:46; 4:24; 5:12; 15:25).

The believing community is presented warts and all, to the extent that believers can be a barrier, or at least resistant, to the new moves God is making. Thus, the Jerusalem believers criticize Peter for visiting Cornelius (11:2) and are persuaded otherwise only because they see that God is (p 29)acting (11:18). The argument does not go away, for more Judean believers argue that circumcision and torah-observance are necessary for salvation (15:1, 5). When this question is debated, there is repeated emphasis on what God is doing, to make clear that this is no human project (15:7–11, 12, 14–19).

So where does Jesus fit into this development? While he is not entirely absent from the narrative (e.g., 9:34), in Acts we generally hear about Jesus rather than encounter him acting personally. Jesus is the center of the apostolic preaching, especially his resurrection (2:24, 32; 3:15; 4:10; 5:30; 10:40–41; 13:30, 34, 37; 17:3, 31), which is stressed rather more than his death. Because of his resurrection and exaltation, Jesus is able to pour out the Spirit (2:32–33). Indeed, his resurrection shows that Jesus is truly Israel’s Messiah and Lord (2:36), the fulfiller of Israel’s hopes and God’s promises (13:32–33), and it is on the basis of his resurrection that people are summoned to repentance and faith (2:38; 17:30–31).

The question of responsibility for the death of Jesus in Acts is strongly debated, particularly because of Sanders’s claim that Luke holds the Jews responsible as a race. Though there are passages in which the apostles hold “you” responsible for Jesus’ crucifixion, albeit in ignorance (e.g., 2:23, 36; 3:13–15, 17; 4:10), these passages are always found in and around Jerusalem locations. By contrast, when the evangelists speak to Jews from outside Jerusalem, it is “they” (the Jerusalemite Jews and their leaders) who are responsible for the death of Jesus (10:39; 13:27–29). Luke’s view becomes clear in 4:27, where a combination of Herod, the Gentiles, and the Jewish people of the city are responsible for the death of Jesus. Thus Luke hints not only that God’s salvation reaches to the whole world, but also that the whole world needs God to save them (on this issue, see Weatherly, esp. ch. 2).

In Acts, God is encountered personally most frequently by the Holy Spirit—when people turn to God, they receive the Spirit (2:38, a programmatic verse whose emphasis recurs in 9:17; 10:43–44; 11:15–17; 15:8; 19:1–7). Considerable debate exists over the nature of the Spirit’s ministry in Acts, especially whether the Spirit exclusively brings empowerment for mission. Menzies argues that a soteriological ministry of the Spirit is a Pauline emphasis not found in Luke-Acts. Others assert that the Spirit also brings people into the experience of salvation and transforms them ethically (Dunn; Turner, Power—both agreeing with Menzies that the empowerment for witness theme is the major emphasis of Luke’s pneumatology, but denying that it is exclusively so). That the Spirit’s work likely includes more than witness is shown by, for example, the lack of any emphasis on witness among the Samaritan converts after they receive the Spirit (8:14–24)—indeed, Peter and John are the ones who preach in the other Samaritan villages (8:25).

A second important issue is whether the Spirit comes “once and for all” to believers at conversion or whether there is a subsequent “gateway” experience (frequently called “baptism in the Holy Spirit” by today’s writers, although this is not a phrase found in the NT; on the wider issue, see the helpful compact discussion in Turner, Baptism). Pentecostal scholars appeal to accounts such as the delay in the Samaritan believers receiving the Spirit (8:14–17; Menzies 204–13), or the Ephesian “disciples” who had not heard of the Spirit (19:2; Menzies 218–25). However, others note the uniqueness of the Samaritan situation, where the gospel was reaching new territory (Turner, Power, 360–75), and the fact that Paul baptizes the Ephesian dozen in water in the name of Jesus (19:5), suggesting that previously they were not Christians, but disciples of John the Baptizer (19:3–4; Turner, Power, 388–97).

Acts in the Biblical Canon

Acts is properly to be read as the continuation of Luke's Gospel, and many seeds planted in the Gospel come to fruition in Acts. Thus, the hints of Gentile inclusion found in the infancy narratives (e.g., Luke 2:32) become a major theme in Acts. The new exodus motifs found in Luke, notably the use of Isa. 40–55 (e.g., Luke 3:4–6; see Pao, esp. ch. 2; Turner, Power, 244–50), are fully developed in the renewal and restoration of Israel in Acts (Pao, ch. 4), which now becomes a worldwide, ethnically inclusive community (note the echo of Isa. 49:6 in the key verses Acts 1:8; 13:47). The Lukan emphasis on the Spirit as the power of Jesus' ministry (Luke 1:35; 3:16, 21–22; 4:1 [twice], 14, 18; 10:21; 11:13) leads to Jesus promising the Spirit's power for the apostles' ministry (Luke 12:12; 24:49; Acts 1:5), and to the Spirit's coming to equip the believers for mission and ministry (Acts 2:1–4, 16–21, 38; etc.). To read Acts apart from Luke is to impoverish and badly skew one's reading of Acts (see Walton; Wenham and Walton, chs. 11, 13).

Reading Luke and Acts together, on the other hand, can explain some puzzles. Such an approach is suggestive for Luke's apparently diminished emphasis on the death of Jesus in Acts, (p 30)for Luke has told this story clearly in his Gospel and, while writing Acts, can count it as read and known. The clear statement of Acts 20:28, seeing the blood of Jesus as "obtaining" his people, is the tip of a large iceberg of understanding of Jesus' crucifixion found in the Gospel, notably in Luke 23 (Wenham and Walton 235).

As Wall (26–32) highlights, the canonical location of Acts, sandwiched between the fourfold Gospel and the Epistles, also suggests a double relationship with the four Gospels on the one hand, and the Epistles, especially the Pauline Epistles, on the other. This location highlights the uniqueness of Acts within the canon, as telling the story of the earliest believers as a continuation of the story of Jesus, and as a preparation for reading the Epistles. Without Acts, the canon would provide a diminished understanding of both the divine power behind mission and the divine passion for mission, which together drove the growth of the earliest communities. Without Acts, we would lack models of how mission works out in different situations, for we would be left trying to reconstruct events from the even more fragmentary accounts in the Epistles. Without Acts, we would find it much harder to envisage a framework for the writing and events of the Pauline Epistles (although it must be said that it is hardly easy with Acts!). Equally, Acts provides insight into the varieties within earliest Christianity, such as in the Jerusalem meeting (15:6–29), which shows up tensions between believers who emphasize their Jewishness and those wanting to be open to Gentiles—tensions that can also be seen in the Pauline corpus (e.g., Galatians, Romans, Ephesians) and elsewhere (e.g., the Jewishness of James or Hebrews), but whose landscape would be harder to reconstruct without Acts.

Theological Significance of Acts

A major issue in interpreting Acts is the extent to which it is prescriptive, saying how the church is always meant to be, or descriptive, telling us how the church was at this particular period (Marshall, Acts, 101–5). One helpful tool in deciding case by case about this issue is to consider how far Luke presents clear patterns of events. For example, 2:38–42 presents a fivefold pattern of what it means to become a Christian, involving repentance from sin, water baptism, receiving forgiveness and the gift of the Spirit, and joining the renewed people of God. This pattern keeps reappearing in Acts, not always in the same sequence as in 2:38–42, but with the same elements present (e.g., 8:12–17; 10:44–48; 19:1–20). Using this “patterning” tool, we may identify three themes that address the theology and practice of today’s churches.

First, Acts compels us to ask, and keep asking, what God is doing in our churches and our lives. At times the voice of God prevents believers from going the wrong way (e.g., 16:6–8), and at other times the divine call seems surprising (e.g., 8:26, taking Philip away from a growing new congregation in Samaria and to the desert). As we have seen, at times the church’s instincts are misguided (e.g., 11:2; 15:1, 5).

The radical theocentricity of Acts highlights the constant temptation to anthropocentricity today, whether seen in advertising that panders to human self-centeredness or “tribalism” that will not act outside the parameters of our community. In practice, churches—and theologians—find it all too easy to believe that they need not pay attention to asking what God is doing, and therefore fall into the dangers of making God in their own image and limiting what they consider he can do to the parameters of their experience. Acts calls us to real and continuing openness to God and his agenda, and highlights the prayerfulness of the believing community, for that is how their dependence on God is expressed and experienced (e.g., 1:14, 24; 2:42; 3:1; 6:4; 9:40; 10:9; 12:5; 13:1–3; 14:23; 16:25;

20:36; 21:5; 28:8).

Second, Acts encourages an expectation that God will act and speak in order to bring people to himself. The emphasis on the expansion of the believing community “to the ends of the earth” (1:8) shows this theme on a large scale, and numerous individual incidents show God reaching out to people. Among Jews, most notably God touches the life of Saul, the persecutor of the church, and turns him round to become a passionate advocate of the faith that he attacked (9:1–22). Among Gentiles, God reaches beyond the bounds of the believing community by using angels (10:1–6) or guiding the missionaries into unexpected places (16:6–10)—and in the case of the journey to Philippi, they find themselves in prison when they follow this clear divine leading (16:19–24), a sign that to follow the divine voice and participate in the divine mission is far from an easy path. In this expansion God uses a variety of agents—most prominently the Spirit, as we noted above, but also angelic and human agents.

Western churches and theological thinkers today can easily have a low expectation that God actively seeks to draw people to himself, whereas such expectation can be stronger and fuller in (p 31) parts of our world where the church is growing. Acts offers a challenge and encouragement that God truly is active in his world and has not abandoned it to its own devices in deistic fashion. Acts thus invites the construction of a theo-logy that sees God as its subject and not merely its passive object. Recent developments in pneumatological thought suggest that this emphasis is in the process of being recognized.

Third, the evangelistic speeches in Acts focus on the resurrection of Jesus, suggesting a corrective to today’s evangelistic message and preaching. The speeches highlight the fact and implications of the resurrection of Jesus. A case that he has been raised from the dead is rarely offered. Most often, the evangelists are interested in communicating that it is God who has raised Jesus—the verbs used, egeirō and anistēmi, are found with God as their subject (e.g., 2:24; 17:31)—and that God’s action in raising Jesus confirms Jesus’ identity as Israel’s Messiah and the world’s Lord and judge (e.g., 2:36; 17:31). It is because of who Jesus is now known to be, postresurrection, that people are summoned to repent and turn to God (e.g., 2:38; 17:30).

This emphasis contrasts with the near-exclusive emphasis found in much of today’s evangelistic preaching and christological thinking on the death of Jesus. While the cross is by no means unimportant to the evangelists of Acts, it is not the sole focus of their preaching and reflection in a way that 1 Cor. 1:23–24; 2:2 might suggest, if read in isolation from the rest of that letter and the NT. Resurrection from the dead is by no means easy to proclaim to skeptical, scientifically trained, Western ears, but today's Westerners, like their contemporaries in the east and south, are increasingly open to "spiritual" dimensions to reality, and Acts encourages today's evangelists to give greater attention to the resurrection of Jesus in their proclamation. It also invites christological reflection that sees the exaltation of Jesus, in his resurrection and ascension, as a key factor in understanding who he truly is, both then and now.

Bibliography

Allen, R. Missionary Methods. Robert Scott, 1912; Conzelmann, H. The Theology of St. Luke. Faber & Faber, 1960; Dibelius, M. Studies in the Acts of the Apostles. SCM, 1956; Dunn, J. D. G. Baptism in the Holy Spirit. SCM/Westminster, 1970; Green, J. "Acts of the Apostles." Pages 7–24 in Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments, ed. R. P. Martin and P. Davids. InterVarsity, 1997; Haenchen, E. The Acts of the Apostles, trans. R. M. Wilson. Blackwell, 1971; Jervell, J. The Theology of the Acts of the Apostles. Cambridge University Press, 1996; Johnson, L. T. The Literary Function of Possessions in Luke-Acts. SBLDS 39. Scholars Press, 1977; Marshall, I. H. The Acts of the Apostles. NTG. JSOT, 1992; idem. Luke. Paternoster, 1970; Menzies, R. Empowered for Witness. JPTSup 6. Sheffield Academic Press, 1994; O'Neill, J. C. The Theology of Acts in Its Historical Setting. SPCK, 1961; Pao, D. Acts and the Isaianic New Exodus. Baker, 2002; Peterson, D. "The Motif of Fulfilment and the Purpose of Luke-Acts." Pages 83–104 in The Book of Acts in Its Ancient Literary Setting, ed. B. Winter and A. Clarke. AICS 1. Paternoster/Eerdmans, 1993; Sanders, J. T. The Jews in Luke-Acts. SCM, 1987; Squires, J. T. "The Plan of God in the Acts of the Apostles." Pages 19–39 in Witness to the Gospel, ed. I. H. Marshall and D. Peterson. Eerdmans, 1998; Tannehill, R. The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts. Vol. 2 of Foundations and Facets. Fortress, 1990; Turner, M. Baptism in the Holy Spirit. Grove, 2000; idem. Power from on High. JPTSup 9. Sheffield Academic Press, 1996; Wall, R. "The Acts of the Apostles." NIB 10:1–368; Walton, S. "Where Does the Beginning of Acts End?" Pages 448–67 in The Unity of Luke-Acts, ed. J. Verheyden. BETL 142. Peeters, 1999; Weatherly, J. Jewish Responsibility for the Death of Jesus in Luke-Acts. JSNTSup 106. Sheffield Academic Press, 1994; Wenham, D., and S. Walton. A Guide to the Gospels and Acts. Vol. 1 of Exploring the New Testament. SPCK/InterVarsity, 2001.

Steve Walton

Aesthetics See Art, the Bible and; Formalism; Literary Criticism; Music, the Bible and; Western Literature, the Bible and

African Biblical Interpretation

For most of the first two millennia of Christian history, the geographical center of Christianity has been the northern hemisphere. During this century a radical shift has been taking place. Most of the Western world is now secularized, with church membership shrinking drastically and Christian influence on the wane. The situation in the southern hemisphere, and particularly in Africa, is quite different. The churches have grown at an amazing rate such that there are now almost a half a billion Christians on the continent. As Christians in Africa have taken responsibility for the many dimensions of their common life, there has emerged a vibrant biblical scholarship, most of which is little known outside of Africa.

Patristic Exegesis

Biblical scholarship is not a new thing on the African continent. Some of the most important biblical exegetes from the patristic period lived and worked on African soil. “African fathers” like Origen and Augustine are considered an important memory for modern African Christians to reclaim. Although the ancient North African and (p 32)Nubian churches are now gone, the ancient Coptic and Ethiopian Orthodox Churches continue to thrive in difficult circumstances. More work is needed to help us to understand this tradition of exegesis.

Missionary Exegesis

In the modern period Western missionaries brought Christianity to Africa. This missionary heritage is an ambiguous reality for modern Africans. Although grateful for those who sacrificed much to carry the gospel message, most Africans are also suspicious of the Western cultural baggage, which informed missionary readings of Scripture. One cannot spend many days in Africa before one hears this story: “When the white men came, they told us that our way of praying was wrong—one should not pray with one’s eyes open but with one’s eyes closed. So we closed our eyes to pray. When we opened our eyes, we had the Bible but the white man had the land.” The missionary who came with the Bible was also the interpreter of the Bible. Many African clergy and biblical scholars today (at least from the so-called “mainline” or “mission-founded” churches) were trained by white teachers who, to one degree or another, have used Western methods of exegesis and engaged the text with Western presuppositions. Many of the Bible versions available in African languages were translated by missionaries with an inadequate grasp of African languages and cultures. Most textbooks in African theological colleges and universities today were written in the West and reflect those needs and interests. Few African interpreters consider this “missionary” exegesis to be adequate.

White South African Exegesis

White South African exegetes have tended to concentrate on text-critical and literary-aesthetic issues. The racist apartheid system, which formed the basis of South African society for much of the twentieth century, was sometimes defended by biblical interpreters (Smit). There is now, however, a growing community of biblical scholars in the white community in South Africa who are supportive of exegesis that is engaged in the struggle for what Gerald West calls “survival, liberation and life” (West, Academy, 114).

Liberation Exegesis in South Africa

Sharing much in common with American black theology and Latin American liberation theology, liberation exegesis in South Africa has found its primary motivation in employing the Bible as a liberating tool. Black biblical scholars living under apartheid could not ignore the fact that they lived within an oppressive system. Some (Boesak; Tutu) have focused on the text itself, finding liberative themes such as the story of the exodus and Jesus’ concern for the poor. Others (Mosala) have looked behind the text for the ideology that produced it, claiming that the Bible and its readers need to be liberated from the Bible before it can be a liberative tool (cf. West, Hermeneutics).

Biblical Exegesis in Independent Africa

A growing corpus of biblical interpretation is emerging in independent sub-Saharan Africa. Little of this literature is satisfied with the historical-critical paradigm that tries to sever exegesis from the hermeneutical task. While often using Western exegetical tools, African readers always make the attempt to relate the text to their contemporary situation. The context of the reader (the world “in front of” the text) tends to be a higher priority than the context of the text (the world “behind” the text).

Actually, this individualistic way of stating the issue needs correction. No African would consider the individual alone as the interpreter. John Mbiti sums up the worldview of the African with the words “I am, because we are” (Mbiti, Religions, 108). The dialogue, therefore, is not so much between reader and text as between community and text. The African reader of the text cannot be separated from her or his context in the community.

Biblical interpretation in sub-Saharan Africa is done in the context of mission, culture, suffering, and faith. African Christians are aware of having been “evangelized,” of having received the gospel message from the West. This gospel came in a package that included Western church structures (and denominational divisions) and assumptions. In short, even the best missionary endeavors had an imperialistic dimension. It has been a concern of African interpretation to discern the difference between the gospel and Western cultural imposition. To take a notoriously difficult example, when missionaries came to Africa, some condemned polygamy as un-Christian and unbiblical. When the Bible was translated into African languages, it did not escape notice that many of the great heroes of the faith had more than one wife. Examples of this kind can be multiplied. One of the first attempts to deal with the “missionary” context was Mbiti’s Cambridge doctoral thesis published as New Testament Eschatology in an (p 33) African Background. The original title “Christian Eschatology in Relation to Evangelisation of Tribal Africa” reveals how crucial the mission context is for African interpretation (cf. Okure, “Parables”).

Closely related is the reality that African interpretation is done within the context of African culture. Exegesis comparing African cultural practices and ideas with similarities found in Scripture makes up the largest part of the growing corpus of published African exegesis (LeMarquand, “Bibliography”). It has long been noted that there are similarities between the biblical world and the African world. African OT scholars in particular have highlighted the continuity, as well as the discontinuity, between the two worlds. On the basis of linguistic and cultural similarities, a few have tried to trace genealogical relationships between the Bible and Africa. Most are content to see analogical relationships between these cultures and to mine the similarities in order to illumine the text or find biblical principles for dealing with analogous issues in the modern African context. Some African scholars argue that finding parallels between biblical and African traditions serves an apologetic purpose: if the biblical world is similar to our African world, then the Bible must be a good thing! Others have a more kerygmatic approach, seeing the purpose of comparison in the heuristic value that the elucidation of similarities has for helping African readers to understand the text: moving from African tradition (the known) to a biblical text (the unknown) enables biblical understanding.

Examples of this comparative approach abound. For example, does the Kikuyu taboo on counting help us to understand the guilt that, according to 2 Sam. 24:1–10, David felt after conducting a census (Githuku), or does the story of the Gerasene demoniac in Mark 5 help African church leaders to deal with problems of spirit-possession in Africa today (Avotri)? A major problem felt by interpreters in the West—the presence in the biblical text of stories of miraculous occurrences—is not considered to be an interpretative problem by most African interpreters. The latter usually assume belief in the unseen world and its effects on the visible world (LeMarquand, "Relevance").

Suffering is pervasive in modern Africa. War, hunger, exploitation, and tyranny cannot be bracketed out of interpretation. In an eloquent plea for a "relevant" exegesis, Nigerian scholar Teresa Okure argues that exegesis without hermeneutics is useless. To urge the exegetical community never to forget that exegesis must always be the servant of the community, she appeals to the Nigerian proverb that says, "The legs of the bird that flies in the air always point to the ground" (Okure, "Parables"). The exegete cannot ignore human need.

In the West, scholarship has been done primarily within the academy. In the interest of "objectivity," critical methods are used to uncover the meaning of the text in its original context. The faith stance of the reader is considered to be irrelevant (or problematic) in the "unbiased" search for truth. In Africa, there is more of an attempt to acknowledge the place of the faith of the biblical scholar. Almost all exegesis in Africa is "confessional" and written for the edification of the believing community. The meetings of the Pan-Africa Association of Catholic Exegetes, for example, open with prayer and include the daily celebration of the Eucharist on their agenda. Papers are discussed not only in the light of critical exegetical methods and relevance to the African situation, but also in the light of the regula fidei.

Problems and Emerging Concerns

The most pressing problems for African biblical exegesis are practical. There is rarely enough money for African scholars, seminaries, and universities to buy books. Most scholars are writing in their second or third language. Publishing houses in Africa have a small market for scholarly books. War, political unrest, and lack of clean water play havoc with the running of theological institutions.

On the other hand, biblical studies in Africa is beginning to garner attention, both inside and outside of the continent. The Society of Biblical Literature has encouraged the interaction of scholars from the global community, including Africa. The African Journal of Biblical Studies (published in Nigeria), The Bulletin for Old Testament Studies in Africa (published in Norway), and a number of helpful monographs and collections of essays by African scholars provide vehicles for disseminating biblical scholarship. The global exegetical community can no longer ignore African scholarship. African contributions provide enriching biblical readings for scholarship and for the body of Christ.

Within the exegetical community in Africa are a number of emerging concerns (Dube): Can the liberationist perspective from South Africa and the more culture-focused questions of the rest of the continent be mutually beneficial? How can the (p 34)readings of “ordinary” or “popular” readers enrich scholarship? How can scholarship best be a help to the Christian community? Will postcolonial models of interpretation be of benefit?

Beneath these readings from Africa, a unifying theological issue can be discerned. The search for common ground between the Bible and African culture raises the issue of general revelation. In the face of African colonial and missionary history, which often tended to vilify African cultural and religious practices, many contemporary African theologians and Bible scholars are concerned to show that God had not abandoned Africa before the missionaries came. Just as God was at work in the cultures of the Bible, so he was at work in Africa. Some on the more radical side have even suggested that African culture should be considered “the OT” for Africans, God’s special revelation for African peoples (see the essays in Mukonyora, Cox, and Verstraelen). Most have not taken this road, however. Several African scholars appeal to the story of Paul’s preaching in Athens as a model (Acts 17:16–34). In this text Paul begins his preaching from the culture of Athens, showing how God was close to all people and known to all, at least to some limited degree. Likewise, Africans can be assured that the God they had known and worshipped for millennia was not an evil God, but the same God who has now fully manifested himself in Jesus Christ. The same God who in the past provided rain, food, children, and health in response to the prayers of African peoples has now been fully revealed in the person of Jesus Christ. Certainly there is discontinuity between African religion and the biblical revelation since all cultures (and Africans are quick to point out that this includes Western cultures) participate in the fall. Biblical revelation is unique and necessary but not completely new. God’s work in Christ is seen as a completion of God’s kindness, which was always known in African societies, in which God did not leave himself without a witness (Acts 14:17).
See also Augustine; Culture and Hermeneutics; Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics

Bibliography

Avotri, S. “The Vernacularization of Scripture and African Beliefs: The Story of the Gerasene Demoniac among the Ewe of West Africa.” Pages 292–310 in The Bible in Africa, ed. G. West and M. Dube. Brill, 2000;
Boesak, A. “The Relationship between Text and Situation, Reconciliation and Liberation, in Black Theology.” Voices from the Third World 2, no. 1 (1979): 30–40; Dickson, K. “Continuity and Discontinuity between the Old Testament and African Thought and Life.” Pages 95–108 in African Theology en Route, ed. K. Appiah-Kubi and S. Torres. Orbis, 1979; Dube, M. Postcolonial Feminist Interpretation of the Bible. Chalice, 2000; Githuku, S. “Taboos on Counting.” Pages 113–17 in Interpreting the Old Testament in Africa, ed. M. Getui, K. Holter, and V. Zinkuratire. Peter Lang, 2001; LeMarquand, G. “A Bibliography of the Bible in Africa.” Pages 631–800 in The Bible in Africa; idem. “An Issue of Relevance: A Comparative Study of the Story of the Bleeding Woman (Mk 5:25–34; Mt 9:20–22; Lk 8:43–48) in North Atlantic and African Contexts.” Th.D. diss., Wycliffe College/University of Toronto, 2002; Mbiti, J. African Religions and Philosophy. Heinemann, 1969; idem. New Testament Eschatology in an African Background. Oxford University Press, 1971; Mosala, I. Biblical Hermeneutics and Black Theology in South Africa. Eerdmans, 1989; Mukonyora, I., J. L. Cox, and F. J. Verstraelen, eds. “Rewriting” the Bible: The Real Issues. Mambo, 1993; Okure, T. “‘I Will Open My Mouth in Parables’ (Matt 13.35): A Case for a Gospel-Based Biblical Hermeneutic.” NTS 46 (2000): 445–63; idem. The Johannine Approach to Mission. Mohr/Siebeck, 1988; Smit, D. “The Ethics of Interpretation—and South Africa.” Scriptura 33 (1990): 29–43; Tutu, D. “Some African Insights and the Old Testament.” JTSA 1 (1972): 16–22; West, G. The Academy of the Poor. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; idem. Biblical Hermeneutics of Liberation. Cluster, 1991.

Grant LeMarquand

Alexandrian Interpretation      See Allegory; Hermeneutics;
Jesus Christ, Doctrine of; Literal Sense; Patristic Biblical Interpretation

Allegory

Allegory is primarily a method of reading a text by assuming that its literal sense conceals a hidden meaning, to be deciphered by using a particular hermeneutical key. In a secondary sense, the word “allegory” is also used to refer to a type of literature that is expressly intended to be read in this nonliteral way. John Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress is a well-known example of allegorical literature, but it is doubtful whether any part of the Bible can be regarded as such. The parables of Jesus come closest, but they are not allegories in the true sense. The apostle Paul actually used the word allegoria, but arguably this was to describe what would nowadays be called “typology” (Gal. 4:24). The difference between typology and allegory is that the former attaches additional meaning to a text that is accepted as having a valid meaning in the “literal” sense, whereas the latter ignores the literal sense and may deny its usefulness altogether. Paul never questioned the historical accuracy of the Genesis accounts of Hagar and Sarah, even though he regarded them as having an additional, spiritual meaning as well. Other interpreters, however, were often embarrassed by (p 35)anthropomorphic accounts of God in the Bible, and sought to explain away such language by saying that it is purely symbolic, with no literal meaning at all. It is in this latter sense that the word “allegory” is generally used today.

Allegory began in the Hellenistic world as a means of interpreting the Homeric poems. The obvious immorality of so many of Homer’s divine heroes could not be accepted as the basis for instructing children in morality, and so the commentators of Alexandria devised ways of interpreting it figuratively. The fornication of the gods was understood to picture cosmic events that could not easily be described. By the first century BCE it had become a standard hermeneutical tool, and was widely used by Philo of Alexandria (d. 50 CE), a Jew who wanted to demonstrate that the OT was the true source of Greek philosophy. Perhaps the most famous of his allegorical conjectures is the way in which he interpreted the meeting of Abraham with the three men (or angels) at the terebinths of Mamre (Gen. 18). Noting that Abraham addresses them in the singular as “Lord,” Philo supposed that this indicates the presence of a triad in God. The Pythagoreans believed that three was the perfect number, and so finding this number in the divine being was part of demonstrating God’s perfection.

Philo did not believe that God was three, of course, but later Christian exegetes took up what he said and used it as an indication that God had revealed himself, even in the OT, as a Trinity of persons. Such recycling reveals one of the major motives for allegory among early Christian exegetes, who needed to find a Christian meaning in every OT passage. Interestingly, their main hermeneutical principle was one still regarded by many people today as valid, that the clearer parts of Scripture must be used as the basis for determining the meaning of the harder parts. Allegory was not used to establish Christian doctrine, but merely to discover it in texts that, on the surface, appear to be talking about something else.

The locus classicus for Christian allegory was the Song of Solomon, which became and remained a favorite of medieval interpreters. It was universally agreed that the literal sense of the Song could not possibly be its “real” meaning, since God would not have inspired a tale of seduction. Given that assumption, and the belief that the Scriptures speak of Christ, those who interpreted the Song had to find a way of reading it that would reflect the relationship between Christ and his church. Two main strands of allegory sprang up: one stressed the identity of the woman as the church, and the other said that she stood for the soul of the individual believer. These strands were frequently interwoven, so the text could be applied to either the individual Christian or the body of the church, depending on what seemed most likely in the eyes of the interpreter.

The Song of Solomon rapidly established itself as one of the most popular OT books and inspired many great spiritual classics. Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153) preached eighty-six sermons on it, which are still in print and widely read today. In the nineteenth century the missionary Hudson Taylor wrote Union and Communion, which remains a staple devotional book among evangelical Christians. So deeply entrenched was the allegorical reading that when it was challenged, George Burrows actually wrote a commentary defending it (1859), which is also still in print! The power of this tradition is perhaps best seen in the popularity of a modern chorus: “He brought me to his banqueting table, and his banner over me is love” (Song 2:4 KJV). Almost everyone automatically interprets this as referring to Christ and the fellowship of his church, even though it apparently has nothing to do with either.

Theologically speaking, allegory relied on the belief that Scripture was an object analogous to the human body. Just as we are composed of flesh, soul, and spirit, so the Bible has a corresponding literal, moral, and spiritual sense. This was the teaching of Origen (ca. 185–254), which became the basis for all future interpretation. Origen believed that it was essential to get the literal sense right, because only it could provide the clues needed to interpret the other senses correctly. When the literal sense was clear, it did not need any elaboration, but when it was not, interpreters had to take recourse to one or both of the other possible meanings. Origen did not limit the use of this technique to obscure passages only, but applied it to any that lacked an immediate pastoral application. For instance, in Origen’s view the episode of Jesus cleansing the temple, while it might have been historical, could not be taken literally as an example of appropriate Christian behavior, and so he allegorized it into the purification of the soul from all evil thoughts and desires. Given that the NT teaches that our bodies are temples of the Holy Spirit, this interpretation seemed merely to be using a well-known spiritual principle as a means to interpret an otherwise inapplicable text.

It is often difficult to distinguish the moral from the spiritual sense of interpretation, but broadly speaking, the former deals with our life (p 36) on earth and the latter with our relationship with God. Jacob’s ladder, for example, was to be interpreted in the spiritual sense, because it was the way of ascent to God. Jacob (Israel) failed to climb it because he—the OT people of God—was asleep in God’s house (Bethel). In this way, the story came to symbolize both the apostasy of Judaism and the spiritual blessing given to Christians, who are privileged to stand with the angels in the presence of God.

Allegorical interpretation is often fanciful but seldom harmful because it is generally based on theological truths that can be proved from the clearer parts of Scripture. Only at a late stage did it become the basis for certain doctrinal formulations, like those of Roman Catholic Mariology, which Protestants uniformly reject. In the late twentieth century, a new form of “postmodern” allegory made its appearance, based largely on psychological archetypes supposedly present in our subconscious. It differs from classical allegory partly because of its fixation with particular symbols (many of which are assumed to be sexual) but mainly because it is oriented toward a secular, humanist interpretation of reality and eschews the divine dimension of traditional theology. In some respects, and particularly in its interpretation of sexual symbolism, postmodern allegory is more rigid than its classical counterpart, which enables its proponents to claim that it is “scientific,” though this has been disputed by its detractors, many of whom are theologians and biblical scholars.

In sum, allegory as a hermeneutical method has generally fallen into disfavor since the eighteenth century, but it can still be found at the popular level, and recent interest in literary criticism has revived interest in it, at least to a limited extent. It is even conceivable that allegory may be a valid way to interpret certain parts of the Bible, though it is most unlikely ever to become a general hermeneutical principle.

See also Medieval Biblical Interpretation; Parables; Patristic Biblical Interpretation; Spiritual Sense; Typology

Bibliography

Daniélou, J. From Shadows to Reality. Burns & Oates, 1960; Edwards, M. J. Origen against Plato. Ashgate, 2002; Fletcher, A. Allegory. Cornell University Press, 1964; Hanson, R. P. C. Allegory and Event. 2d ed. Westminster John Knox, 2002; Whitman, J., ed. Interpretation and Allegory. Brill, 2000.

Gerald Bray

Allusion     See Intertextuality; Relationship between the Testaments

Amos, Book of

The book of Amos is widely regarded as the earliest legacy of the “writing prophets” and as a paradigm of the prophetic genre. Amos’s main theological contributions are the uncompromising censure of the social injustice prevalent in Israelite society in the eighth century BCE, together with the concomitant threat of a severe divine punishment.

History of Interpretation

“Precritical” Readings. The members of the Qumran community were particularly interested in passages that illuminated their own beliefs and practices. These include Amos’s reference to David’s “fallen tent” (9:11), which was reinterpreted in line with their own missionary expectations (4QFlor 1.11–13), and the threat of Israel being exiled beyond Damascus (5:26–27), which was seen to justify the community’s own existence “in the land of Damascus” (CD 7.14–21).

In the Talmud, a range of passages from the book of Amos is used for a variety of ceremonial, ethical, paraenetic, and apologetic purposes (see y. ‘Abod. Zar. 39a, 40 on Amos 4:4; b. Nid. 65 on 4:6; b. Mo‘ed Qat. 25b, 28b on 8:9; and b. Hul. 59b–60a on 3:8).

With Origen’s commentary (see Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.36.2) having been lost, Jerome’s work of ca. 406 CE is the earliest and most important commentary of the patristic period. Jerome offers primarily historical exegesis, paired with a christological understanding of the prophet’s message. Theodore of Mopsuestia and Theodore of Cyrrhus, exponents of the Antioch school, while aware of the text’s metaphorical and salvation-historical dimensions, similarly favored literal readings. Even Cyril of Alexandria, who was strongly indebted to Jerome, sought to avoid the excesses of mystical-allegorical interpretation associated with the school of Alexandria (Dassmann 340–44).

In the patristic writings, quotations from Amos were often restricted to the same dozen verses. For instance, 4:13 played an important role in dogmatic discussions about the creatureliness of the Holy Spirit (advocated by the Pneumatomachs), and 8:9 was frequently understood to refer to the darkness that came over the land at Jesus’ death. Amos 5:18–20 was interpreted as referring to the horrors of the final judgment, 9:6 and 9:11–12 were understood christologically, (p 37) and 8:11 was used by preachers to instill in their audiences a hunger and thirst for God’s word (Dassmann 344–50).

Amos in Modern Perspectives. Modern research on Amos shows the same trends as the scholarly investigation of the OT prophets generally. From the 1880s to the 1920s, scholars focused on the innovative impetus of the prophet, understood as an “ethical monotheist,” whose task it was to announce the divine ethical imperative (Wellhausen; Duhm). This stress often went hand in glove with a search for Amos’s ipsissima verba, the very words of the prophetic genius.

From the 1920s onward, form and tradition critics reversed this trend. They focused on the social and institutional settings (such as the Israelite cult or certain wisdom circles) of the speech forms used by Amos and understood the prophet largely as a transmitter of traditional theological convictions (Reventlow).

While these approaches were most concerned with the oral stages of the prophet's words, redaction criticism, which originated in the 1960s, attends to the book's literary prehistory and attempts to trace its stages of growth (Wolff). Contrary to their predecessors, redaction critics affirm the value of redactional contributions, rejecting pejorative labels such as "secondary" or "inauthentic" (Jeremias).

Simultaneously with the redaction-critical quest, other scholars have begun to focus on the text's final form, investigating the structure, poetics, or rhetorical nature of the book (Carroll R., Contexts; Möller, Prophet). Yet another recent trend is to concentrate on the contribution made by the reader in the generation of meaning.

The Message of Amos

As with every text, our appreciation of Amos's message depends on a variety of hermeneutical decisions. One of these is well illustrated by Brevard Childs's comment, made vis-à-vis redaction criticism's interests in the text's literary prehistory, that historical interpretation of the redactional layers of Amos often runs counter to the perspective demanded by the literature itself (408). Thus, while redaction critics might regard some material as later additions to the prophet's message, the book's canonical form invites a reading that treats the text as what it purports to be: the words of the eighth-century prophet Amos (1:1).

We should also recognize that the book is addressed to subsequent Judean readers, who would have seen Amos's struggle—and ultimate failure—to convince his Israelite audience of the imminent divine punishment in the light of the catastrophic events of 722 BCE. Read from this "past-fulfillment perspective," the book thus becomes a powerful warning, admonishing its readers not to repeat the stubborn attitude of their northern brothers and sisters, lest they too face the divine judgment.

An Outline of Amos's Message. Following the superscription (1:1) and motto (1:2), a series of oracles threatens Israel's neighbors with a divine punishment for their atrocious war crimes (1:3–2:5). Yet, the series eventually culminates in a judgment speech against Israel (2:6–16). Amos thus singles out God's people as the prime target of punishment, which is presented as the divine response to Israel's oppression of the weak and marginalized.

The book then gives the ensuing debate between Amos and his complacent audience (5:14; 6:1–3; 9:10; Möller, Prophet), who reject his message of judgment, relying instead on their cherished theological traditions. Amos’s reinterpretation and subversion of concepts like the exodus (2:9–10; 3:1–2; 9:7) and the day of Yahweh (5:18–20), his “hymns” extolling God’s destructive powers (4:13; 5:8–9; 9:5–6), and the acerbic criticism of Israel’s religious activities (4:4–5; 5:21–23)—these are all best understood from the polemical perspective demanded by this dialogical context.

Amos 3–6 contains five judgment speeches (chs. 3 and 4; 5:1–17, 18–27; ch. 6) introduced by “hear this word” or “woe to you who ...” They reiterate the threat of a divine punishment, arguing that its annunciation was unavoidable (3:3–8). They also corroborate God’s verdict (3:9–11; 4:6–12; 5:10–13) and underline the absurdity of the social injustice prevalent in Israelite society (6:12).

The visions in Amos 7:1–8:3—together with the embedded narrative report of Amos’s clash with the priest Amaziah, which confirms the hostile attitude of Amos’s audience (7:10–17)—underline that the punishment, while not desired by Amos, will not be averted (7:8; 8:2). Another judgment speech (8:4–14), introduced by “Hear this,” repeats some of Amos’s charges before giving way to various announcements of judgment.

In the final vision (9:1–4), this judgment is depicted as actually occurring, while 9:8–10, in line with the book’s implied distinction between culprits and victims, identifies the “sinful kingdom” and “all the sinners among my people” as the prime targets of the divine punishment. An image of future restoration, agricultural abundance, and security in the land concludes the book (9:11–15).

(p 38) Amos and the Canon

Amos and the Twelve. Recent scholarship has stressed the unity of the Book of the Twelve. On this view, echoes such as that of Joel 3:16a (4:16a MT) in Amos 1:2 are understood as indicating a deliberate linkage and juxtaposition of the two writings. Yet from a canonical perspective Amos’s message of judgment might just as fruitfully be compared with a passage like Hab. 1:12–17. While Amos readily depicts the divine judgment as an enemy invasion, Habakkuk, in raising the question of theodicy, offers an intriguing canonical counterperspective.

Amos and the OT. Regardless of the historical relationship between the prophets and the Torah, in canonical perspective Amos is presented as presupposing some of Torah’s stipulations (cf. 2:8 with Exod. 22:26; 3:12 with Exod. 22:13). As Douglas Stuart has shown (xxxi–xlii), Amos also frequently employs the language of the pentateuchal blessings and curses.

Amos in the NT. The NT quotes Amos twice. In Acts 7:41–43, Amos 5:25–27 is understood as referring to the Israelites' idolatry during the wilderness period. In Acts 15:13–18, James applies the rebuilding of David's fallen tent (Amos 9:11–12) to God forming a new people for himself from among the Gentiles.

Some statements in the letter of James about the rich and their treatment of the poor (James 2:6–7; 5:1–6) also show a connection with Amos's message or, more likely, that of the OT prophets generally.

Amos and Theology

There has been a tendency to regard Amos as the harbinger of an inescapable and all-encompassing divine judgment. Others have rejected this construal of the prophet as the messenger of a nation-murdering God, arguing that the prophetic proclamation is instead aimed at repentance. A possible way out of this impasse is suggested by sociolinguistic approaches like rhetorical criticism and speech-act theory, which can help to demonstrate that the possibilities of inescapable doom and of mercy invoked by repentance both inhere in the use of prophetic judgment oracles (Möller, "Words").

Yet our construal of Amos's theology is also affected by judgments about the authenticity of passages such as the salvation oracle in 9:11–15, which is frequently understood to contradict the prophet's uncompromising message of judgment. From a canonical perspective, the oracle does represent an important contribution to the book's theology. Since recent sociolinguistic approaches refute historical criticism's literalistic fixation on the supposed discrepancies of the surface text, they actually invite us to regard this salvation oracle as an integral part of the prophet's original message.

A "full" theological reading thus entails an appreciation not only of Amos's denunciation of the social injustice prevalent in Israelite society and the concomitant threat of an impending divine punishment. It also includes the prophet's vision of a restored people, who once again will fully enjoy life in the land. The oracles against foreign nations (Amos 1–2), furthermore, point to God's sovereign control of this world and his determination to hold the nations responsible for their oppressive and inhumane treatment of the weak and powerless.

In current theological discussion, Amos has been inspirational particularly for Latin American theologies of liberation. They have appropriated its message in an attempt to change existing political and economic structures and create a society marked by solidarity with the poor and “sacrificial service in the struggle to eradicate oppression” (Carroll R., Contexts, 19).

See also Prophecy and Prophets in the OT; Rhetorical Criticism

Bibliography

Carroll R., M. D. Contexts for Amos. JSOT, 1992; idem. Amos. Westminster John Knox, 2002; Childs, B. Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture. Fortress, 1979; Dassmann, E. “Amos.” RACSup 1 (2001): 334–50; Duhm, B. Die Theologie der Propheten. Marcus, 1875; Jeremias, J. The Book of Amos. Westminster John Knox, 1998; Möller, K. A Prophet in Debate. Sheffield Academic Press, 2003; idem. “Words of (In-) Evitable Certitude?” Pages 352–86 in After Pentecost, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2001; Reventlow, H. G. Das Amt des Propheten bei Amos. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1962; Stuart, D. Hosea–Jonah. Word, 1987; Wellhausen, J. Die kleinen Propheten. 4th ed. De Gruyter, 1963; Wolff, H. W. Joel and Amos. Fortress, 1977.

Karl Möller

Anagogical Sense See Medieval Biblical Interpretation

Analogy

At the very heart of Scripture there appear to stand contradictory axioms—what Frederick Ferré has described as “the prima facie conflict between repeated Biblical warnings that God is wholly incommensurable with his creation and (p 39)... explicit statements on the Deity’s purposes, emotions, and characteristic modes of behaviour” (94). On the one hand, the Bible appears to imply that God must so utterly transcend finite created reality that statements with God as referent must mean something different from what they would if their referent belonged to the created order. On the other hand, the Bible clearly suggests that human creatures (operating with a creaturely vocabulary and conceptuality) can indeed refer to God and understand that to which they are referring on the basis of his Self-revelation to contingent and finite human minds. So how can the same terms refer to both domains?

When we affirm that the apostle Paul loves, Mother Teresa loves, and God loves, are we really saying the same thing of the transcendent and eternal God that we are saying of the apostle Paul or Mother Teresa? This poses a dilemma. If we assume that the word “love” is used univocally of humans and also God, we seem to risk the charge of anthropomorphic projection—treating God as if “he” were simply another human creature. If, on the other hand, we suggest that when the word is used of God it means something radically different from when it refers to the human context, one has to explain how using human language of God does not amount to sheer equivocation. The latter suggests agnosticism with respect to the meaning of our terms when they refer to the Deity and condemns Christian reference to God and his purposes to an “Alice in Wonderland” world. In sum, is it possible to assume semantic continuity in applying our terms to the two contexts? If so, on what grounds?

Theology has traditionally rejected univocal predication (which leads to anthropomorphism) and equivocal predication (which implies agnosticism) in favor of analogy as a means of referring to God.

In Western thought, this theory has been associated primarily with the thought of Thomas Aquinas as interpreted by Cardinal Cajetan. This tradition argued that when a quality is predicated analogically of two or more different beings (Paul and God), it is intrinsically possessed by each but not in the same way. It is possessed by each in proportion to the being that each kind of reality has (Phelan). Love is possessed intrinsically by human beings, by angels, and by God, but not in the same way. The way in which human beings love is proportionate to the being that humans have, the way in which angels love is proportionate to the being that angels have, and likewise, the way in which God loves is proportionate to the being that God has.

This means we can affirm analogically that “God loves” without ascribing human loving to God, thereby avoiding the anthropomorphic trap. The divine incommensurability with the created order is thus respected.

But this solution is flawed. The “analogy of proper proportionality,” as this is called, makes two claims simultaneously: First, it claims that the relevant quality can be affirmed analogically of both the created and the Creator. Second, it claims that a further analogy exists between the two proportionalities that exist between the analogates—there is an analogy between the relationship between God and God’s loving and the relationship between humans and their loving. But this second statement does not help the first. It simply makes a further analogical statement of the same kind as the first but referring now to the relationships rather than the qualities. Suggesting an analogical proportionality between the two relationships is irrelevant. It does nothing to solve the fundamental problem as to how love or goodness or wisdom can refer (and be understood) within the created realm while also being predicated appropriately of God.

The recent scholarship of J. B. Mondin and others has claimed that Aquinas does not advocate any such analogy of proper proportionality but affirms direct (analogical) similarity between perfections attributed to God and those same perfections attributed to humanity. Theological claims are possible because there is an intrinsic likeness between the divine and the contingent realms. This is what undergirds the semantic continuity that makes God-talk possible. Integral to Aquinas's theory are two key principles. First, the utilization of a term of God and humanity must invariably recognize the priority of that term's application to God and the posterior or derivative applicability of that term to the human (God-talk is per prius et posterius). Second, given that God does not belong to a class (Deus non est in genere), analogical statements must never serve to subsume God and humanity under some third generic concept (e.g., wisdom, goodness, or love). Perfections are predicated primarily and properly of God and are only predicated of human beings because these qualities derive from God. (Predication is always unius ad alterum as opposed to duorum ad tertium.)

Here, however, a further problem emerges. The metaphysical principle that undergirds and sustains God-talk conceived in these terms is, as (p 40) Mondin explains, the scholastic principle that there is a universal similarity or likeness between agents or causes and their effects. (“Omne agens agit simile sibi.”) This provides the grounds of Aquinas's affirmation that the creation possesses an intrinsic likeness to its Creator. If God is an agent, then there must be an intrinsic similarity or likeness between the Creator and what is created—and thus semantic continuity between statements attributing perfections to God and similar affirmations relating to features of the created order.

This solution, however, seems to contravene the principle at the very heart of Aquinas's theory, that God must not be subsumed within a class. Not only has he subsumed God within the class of agents, but also he has extrapolated to the divine from assumptions that apply to the universal class of agents, assumptions that effects necessarily (for some reason) resemble their causes.

This brings us to one of the most fundamental and important questions for biblical theology. Is there an alternative, consistent ontological ground that provides warrant for the assumption of semantic continuity?

Whereas the West has assumed that Aquinas was the father of analogy, the concept of analogein is central to Athanasius's theology (Heron; Torrance, Reconstruction, and Reconciliation). In debate with Arianism, Athanasius distinguished between the anthropomorphic projection (mythologein) of mere human concepts (epinoiai) on to the divine and theologein or analogein. In theologein (God-talk proper), human terms can transcend their ordinary context of use (ana-logein) such that they refer veridically (alēthōs) or appropriately to the reality of God.

The condition of this is the twofold homoousion—that the incarnate Word of God to humanity (the skopos [goal] of the Scriptures) is of One Being with God the Father, and that the Spirit, in whom we recognize the incarnate Logos and who transforms our thinking, speaking, and understanding, is also of One Being with the Father. In and through the reconciliation and reschematization of our thinking and concepts (noiai) divine truth is discerned in such a way that the vocabulary of a world alienated in its thinking is thereby commandeered (Jüngel) to refer to God. Theology supposes, therefore, a semantic shifting of our concepts in parallel with the transformation of our minds (Rom. 12:2) through the witness of the Spirit to the incarnate Logos so that they might truly and appropriately refer to God. In sum, theologein, valid or truthful (alēthōs) referring to God, is grounded in the reconciliation of our conceptualities, paradigms, and language-games such that, as we have the mind that is in Christ Jesus, we are given to participate in the new, transformed semantics (or “language-games”—rhē mata) of the Body of Christ. The ontological ground of theological analogy, therefore, is the participation of our logoi in the incarnate Logos where, by grace, our human language and thought-forms are given to refer meaningfully to the transcendent God.

“I have revealed you to those whom you gave me out of the world.... I gave them the words [or ‘speech’—rhē mata] you gave me and they accepted them” (John 17:6, 8).

Bibliography

Ferré, F. “Analogy in Theology.” In vol. 1 of The Encyclopaedia of Philosophy, ed. P. Edwards. 2 vols. Macmillan, 1967; Heron, A. I. C. “Homoousios with the Father.” Pages 58–87 in Incarnation, ed. T. F. Torrance. Handsel, 1981; Jüngel, E. Doctrine of the Trinity. Eerdmans, 1976; Phelan, G. B. Saint Thomas and Analogy. Marquette University Press, 1941; Torrance, T. F. Theology in Reconciliation. G. Chapman, 1965; idem. Theology in Reconstruction. Eerdmans, 1979.

Alan J. Torrance

Analogy of Faith See Protestant Biblical Interpretation; Rule of Faith; Scripture, Unity of

Analytic Philosophy See Philosophy

Ancient Near Eastern Background Studies

For over a century comparative studies between the OT and the ancient Near East have hovered at the fringe of hermeneutics and exegesis. Since at times critical scholars have exploited these studies for polemical attacks against the biblical text, conservatives were long inclined to avoid or even vilify them. Borrowing or adapting was viewed as incompatible with Scripture's inspiration. Even as these interpreters in recent decades have grown more interested in tapping into the gold mine of comparative data, the results have often been considered tangential to the ultimate theological task. The influence from the ancient world has been identified with all that Israel was supposed to reject as they received the revelation from God that would purge their "worldview" (or, if this word is used precisely in a theological sense, "world-picture") of its pagan characteristics. Comparative studies were seen as serving only as a foil to the theological interpretation of the text. Consequently, comparative studies have (p 41) been viewed as a component of historical-critical analysis at best, and more often, as a threat to the uniqueness of the literature of the Bible.

In the process something very important has been lost. We have come to think of the material provided by comparative studies as anti-theological when in reality it has the potential to serve as a guide to understanding some of the theology of the text. Here is the extended syllogism:

If:

- (a) comparative studies provide a window to the ancient worldview; and
- (b) Israel in large measure shared that ancient worldview; and
- (c) revelation was communicated through that worldview; and
- (d) that revelation embodies the theological teaching of the text;

Then: comparative studies become crucial to the theological understanding of the OT. This syllogism will be explored in five theses.

1. God did not reject the entire world-picture of Israel's neighbors, but used much of its structure as a framework for revelation

The revelation that Israel received typically concerned the nature and acts of God, the condition of humanity, and the relationship between God and the people that he had created. This revelation, penetrating and reformatory as it was, did not change other aspects of Israel's worldview. (Again, for sake of space, I use "worldview" loosely here to encompass understanding of the structure of the world, as well as a wide array of cultural perspectives, societal institutions, and philosophical assumptions.) God left unchanged much of the way Israel learned about the shape of their world. He offered no new information about geography, astronomy, physics, physiology, medicine, or biology. In short, he left Israel operating and thinking in terms of Old World, premodern science. They did not know that there was more than one continent, that people think with their brains, that illness is caused by bacteria, or that a spherical earth rotates and revolves around a spherical sun. The truth of God's revelation of himself did not depend on changing those concepts. Furthermore, God worked within Israel's concepts (shared with her neighbors) of how time and history worked, of the corporate solidarity that was shared by groups in community, of the social structures relating to tribal and monarchic governments, and of how what was sacred should be protected and respected. Theologically, these may well be understood within the framework of creation, fall, and providence, but our concern here is to track the impact that these correlations might have on the interpretation of various aspects of the biblical text. In addition, God's communication used the established literary genres of the ancient world and often conformed to the rules that existed within those genres. All of these issues are critical to the proper interpretation of the text and require comparative studies to clarify them.

Perhaps the best example of this is found in the concept of the three-tiered cosmos.... In the ancient Near East the heavens were understood to be made up of three superimposed disks with pavements of various materials. Flowing all around this cosmos were the cosmic waters, held out by mountains at the fringes of the land and held back by the sky, on which the earth floated. Similar views of the structure of the cosmos were common throughout the ancient world and persisted in popular perception until the Copernican revolution and the Enlightenment. The language of the OT text reflects this view, and there is no revelation in the Bible that seeks to correct it. Without revelation to the contrary, we must consider it likely that this is the view of the cosmos that Israel would have held in common with her neighbors.

Our theological understanding of the text and our doctrine of Scripture both must accommodate this information. Specific texts that would be affected might include Exod. 24:10 and Gen. 1:6–8. The former will now be understood better, but it is the latter that will have potentially far-reaching effects. We may understand the text, in its cultural context, to be saying that God put the raqi'a in place, which (p 42)the Israelites understood to be something solid in substance (“firmament/expanse/dome”; cf. Ezek. 1:22–26), holding back the cosmic waters above. If in contrast we do not believe that anything solid is or ever was up there, our resulting theological interpretation of Scripture needs careful nuancing. Such nuance will of necessity have ripple effects into the way we formulate our doctrine of Scripture, which, in the long run, this must not weaken. Such information is no more a threat to the integrity of the text than the fact that we do not think with our hearts (as people in the ancient world, including Israel, believed). But if we fail (or refuse) to recognize the cultural dimension of the text in Gen. 1, our theological interpretation will be affected. Devising an alternative explanation of raqi'a would require attaching to it a meaning contrary to how the Israelites understood the word. Our doctrine of Scripture would be jeopardized if we felt free to conform the meanings of words to make them more comfortable to us.

Furthermore, understanding that God was not trying to give a modern description of the structure of the cosmos can allow us to focus on the part of the teaching of the text that is most pertinent theologically, the functioning of the cosmos as established in the purpose of the Creator.

2. God often used existing institutions and converted them to his theological purposes

Many of the theologically laden concepts and institutions in the OT were not devised as new ideas in heaven and delivered via theophany to the Israelites. Numerous examples can be cited of where they were adapted from contemporary cultural practice, perhaps the most obvious being circumcision. Circumcision was practiced widely in the ancient Near East as a rite of puberty or marriage. It was used as a rite of passage to mark individuals as members of a particular community. In Genesis it is also a rite of passage used to identify the newborn infant as a member of the covenant community. This is how Israelites would have understood this practice when it was prescribed for Abraham and his descendants, and many of the nuances that it held in society were carried across into the theological meaning, though others were radically changed. This is an important example to show clearly that theological initiatives are not necessarily devoid of cultural history. At the same time, the recognition of a cultural bridge does not rule out the providential activity of God within those cultures. Once we know that theological initiatives can come across a cultural bridge, we can begin asking what other institutions or initiatives might have cultural bridges.

Consider the Israelite institution of sacrifice. When the details of the Israelite sacrificial system are finally laid out in Lev. 1–7, sacrifice has already been a regular practice in the ancient Near East and among Israel's ancestors for millennia. Yet the OT offers no other text instituting this practice or giving guidelines for it. Theologians seeking to rectify this gap often found themselves, in Gen. 3, suggesting that God's provision of clothing for Adam and Eve would have required an animal to be killed, and therefore could have served as an opportunity to give instructions about sacrifice.

Little confidence can be achieved by inferring such a major institution from such a small gap of silence in the text.

The sacrifices offered by Cain and Abel, Noah, and the patriarchs are similar to those found throughout the rest of the ancient Near East. They focus on thanksgiving, dedication, or petition. It is not surprising that there is nothing in pre-Sinai Israelite practice to compare to the purification or reparation offerings described in Lev. 4–6 since they involve cleansing of the sancta and therefore would have no function prior to the construction of a sanctuary to define sacred space.

If we ask where the pre-Mosaic practice of sacrifice derived from, we would have to take the silence of the text as suggesting that it was of human invention, guided by Providence. When we accept that it was developed through divine providence rather than through more direct revelation, we give the culture a much larger role. Such a conclusion implies that a study of the culture must be undertaken to grasp the theological dimensions that finally emerged in Israel's practice, and received the divine stamp of approval with modifications and additions.

3. Revelation did not always counter ancient Near Eastern concepts, but often used them in productive ways

When Israel was instructed to build the tabernacle, and thus define sacred space, ancient Near Eastern concepts were behind the entire undertaking, and they gave shape to the theology of sacred space. The orientation toward the east, the centering of the most important objects, the creation of zones of increasing sacredness, the ideas about what materials would be most appropriate to sacred space, and the rules for access to sacred space—all these draw heavily from the ancient Near East and comprise the theology of the temple.

We would entirely miss the mark to allegorize the architectural features of the temple, trying to give them “theological” meaning rather than finding meaning in the ancient Near Eastern background, as the Israelites would have. That they can be given allegorical meaning is arguably demonstrated in Hebrews. That the theological interpretation in the text is meant to be found in allegory or that we have the freedom or ability to pursue such an approach with confidence is questionable.

(p 43)4. Literary connections do not negate inspiration of Scripture

Ever since the discovery of the Babylonian flood and creation accounts, a major building block of the platform of critical scholarship has been to demonstrate that the OT is derivative literature, a disadvantaged stepsister to the dominant cultures of the ancient Near East. The attempt has been made to reduce the OT to converted mythology whose dependency exposes its humanity. For confessing orthodoxy, there is no room for the conclusion that the OT is simply man-made theology. If the flood is simply a human legend made up by people and borrowed into Israelite thinking, if the covenant is merely Israel's way of expressing their optimism that God has specially favored them by making a treaty agreement with them, if the prophets never heard the voice of God but were simply mimicking their ancient Near Eastern counterparts—then we are greatly to be pitied for having been duped in what would have to be considered the greatest hoax in history.

In contrast, however, there is nothing inherently damaging to a high view of Scripture if its authors interacted at various levels with the literature current in the culture. All literature is derivative relative to its culture—it must be if it intends to communicate effectively. For the text to engage in polemic and correction, it must be aware of current thinking and literature.

In our modern world, if God were to reveal his work in creation, he would have to explain how it related to the big bang or to evolution. His revelation would focus on the origins of the physical structure of the universe because that is what is important in our cultural perspective. In the ancient world, physical structure was relatively insignificant. They were much more interested in the aspect of bringing order out of chaos and the divine exercise of jurisdiction demonstrated in giving everything a role and a purpose. Written in this context, the creation account would be presented with these ancient ideas in mind. The text formulated its discussion in relation to the thinking found in the ancient literature. It would be no surprise, then, that areas of similarity will be found. This is far different from the contention of some critics that Israelite literature is simply derivative mythology. There is a great distance between borrowing from a particular piece of literature and resonating with the larger culture that has itself been influenced by its literatures. When Americans speak of the philosophy of “eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow we die,” they are resonating with an idea that has penetrated society rather than borrowing from the writings of Epicurus.

In like manner, it is no surprise that OT genres show marked similarities to those same genres in the larger culture. Whether we are looking at wisdom, hymnic, historical, or legal literature, we will find generous doses of both similarities and differences. Insofar as we are convinced that genre understanding contributes to legitimate theological interpretation, we must become familiar with the mechanics of the genre in the ancient Near East. But similarities do not jeopardize inspiration. Even if the OT had the very same law or the very same proverb that was found in the ancient Near East, inspiration would be involved in the author choosing to incorporate that law or proverb into the canonical collection and to nuance it properly in the appropriate context.

Where there are differences, it will be important to understand the ancient Near Eastern genres because the theological points will often be made by means of contrast. The theology behind the book of Job, for example, is built primarily on the distinctives of the ancient Near Eastern view (represented in the arguments of Job's friends), which was based on an appeasement mentality. The book's message is accomplished in counterpoint. If we are unaware of the contrasts, we will miss some of the nuances.

In fact, then, we must go beyond the simple identification of similarities and differences to articulate the relationships on a functional level. Similarities could exist because Israel adapted something from ancient Near Eastern culture or literature or, as previously mentioned, because they simply resonated with the culture. Differences could exist as the Israelites reject some ancient Near Eastern perspective or could emerge in Israelite polemics (Rodriguez 62–63). In all such cases, the theology of the text may find its nuances in the cultural context. Thus, even in cases of borrowing institutions, practices, literary forms, and so on from surrounding cultures, Israel would have had the fallen direction (fallenness) of these structures corrected by revelation, and we may appreciate their development within the frame of creation and providence.

5. Spiritualized explanations must not be chosen when cultural explanations are readily available

Without the guidance of comparative studies, we are bound to misinterpret the text at some points. If a text is a complex of ideas linked by (p 44) threads of writing, and interpreters have the task of filling in the gaps, it is theologically essential that we fill them appropriately. Distortion or misinterpretation will result if we fill gaps with contemporary theological trajectories when they ought to be filled with cultural understanding. Consider the following examples.

In the account of the tower of Babel in Gen. 11, the traditional interpretation that goes back to the rabbis and the early church fathers suggested that the tower was a means by which the people were attempting to get up to God. Some suggested a specific objective such as overthrowing God or replacing him with an idol. Others proposed that the people were acting out their hubris and overstepping divinely established boundaries. In contrast, analysis against the background of urbanization in early Mesopotamia identifies the tower as a ziggurat. In turn, a study of ziggurats demonstrates that they were not designed so that people could go up to the heavens or in an attempt to transgress divine boundaries. Instead, a temple was built next to the ziggurat and the idea was that the god would come down and visit his temple and people. There his needs would be met and, as a result, he would bring blessing and prosperity. Thus, Gen. 11 indicates that the tower was built, as all Mesopotamian ziggurats were, with its head in the heavens. Then it tells us that God did indeed come down, but not with the expected results. Rather than being pleased and bringing blessing, he was disturbed and reacted with punishment.

It is only through this understanding that the theological purpose of Gen. 11 comes through as introducing the development of the principal religious ideals of the ancient Near East. In Genesis, this comes at the climax of Gen. 1–11, where the sin of humankind has progressed from the initial act of disobedience by Adam and Eve, through the corrupt behavior of all people at the time of Noah, and now to the more insidious distortion of Deity. Having failed to become like God, people have regressed into making Deity in their own image—a being with needs, who can be manipulated. It is in this context that the covenant is initiated as God’s program of revelation to correct the distortions of Babel. The history of interpretation shows that without the necessary cultural data, the theological interpretation of the text has pursued blind alleys. Not only was the account itself thereby misunderstood, but also the bridge between the two parts of Genesis was lost.

A second illustration can be found in Josh. 10. How could the sun and moon stop? Those committed to literal interpretation have just suggested that people of faith simply have to accept the plain statement of Scripture, not recognizing that they have already changed it. After all, it is not hard for the sun to stand still when it is not even moving. They have changed the “literal” interpretation to a statement that the earth stopped moving. Here interpreters since the Copernican revolution have been content to fill in the gaps in the text with physics. Or, unpersuaded that physics could be so tamed, they have offered alternative suggestions, such as protection from the heat of the sun, with little conviction that the text was thereby well represented. Again, we must try to penetrate the ancient worldview, where we will find that Josh. 10 operates in the world of omens, not physics. We cannot ask what these terms mean to us; we must ask what they meant to an Israelite in their cultural context.

In the ancient Near East the months were not standardized in length, but varied according to the phases of the moon. The beginning of a month was calculated by the first appearance of the new moon. The full moon came in the middle of the month and was identified by the fact that the moon set just minutes after the sun rose. The day of the month on which the full moon occurred served as an indicator of how many days the month would have. It was considered a good omen if the full moon came on the 14th day of the month because then the month would be the “right” length and all would be in harmony. If “opposition” (moon and sun simultaneously on opposite horizons) occurred on the 14th it was considered to be a “full-length” month made up of full-length days (cf. Josh. 10:13). People observed the horizon very carefully in the middle section of the month, hoping for this opposition of sun and moon to come on the propitious day (14th). Opposition on the wrong day was believed to be an omen of all sorts of disaster, including military defeat and overthrow of cities. Thus, great significance was attached to these omens. In Josh. 10, since the sun is over Gibeon (east) and the moon is over Aijalon (west), it is clear that it is near sunrise in the full-moon phase.

The Mesopotamian celestial omens use verbs like “wait,” “stand,” and “stop” to record the relative movements and positions of the celestial bodies. When the moon and/or sun do not wait, the moon sinks over the horizon before the sun rises and no opposition occurs. When the moon and sun wait or stand, it indicates that the opposition (p 45) occurs for the determination of the full-moon day. The biblical text does not suggest that the astronomical phenomena were unique; instead, Josh. 10:14 says plainly that what was unique was the Lord accepting a battle strategy from a man (“the LORD listened to a man”). Joshua’s knowledge of the Amorites’ dependence on omens may have led him to ask the Lord for one that he knew would deflate their morale—for the opposition to occur on an unpropitious day.

Thus our theological reading of the text does not require us to defend an astronomical occurrence such as heavenly bodies actually pausing in their movements. This does not change the general idea that God fought on behalf of Israel, but it does give the interpreter a more accurate picture of the way in which God did so, which is surely an important aspect of the theological reading of the text.

In conclusion, then, as our theological interpretations require us to fill in the gaps, we have to be careful to consider the option that those gaps may be filled from the cultural context before we leap to fill them with strictly theological significance. As we make this transition, we have to expand the focus of our comparative studies. Too often in the past, focus has been limited to either individual features (e.g., birds sent out from the ark) or the literary preservation of traditions (e.g., creation accounts, vassal treaties) and has been conducted with either apologetics (from confessional circles) or polemics (against confessional traditions) in mind. As theologians interested in the interpretation of the text, we should recognize the importance of comparative studies that focus on conceptual issues to illuminate the cultural dynamics behind the text.

See also Archaeology; Worldview

Bibliography

Hallo, W. "Biblical History in Its Near Eastern Setting: The Contextual Approach." Pages 1–26 in Scripture in Context, ed. C. Evans et al. Pickwick, 1980; idem. "Compare and Contrast: The Contextual Approach to Biblical Literature." Pages 1–19 in The Bible in Light of Cuneiform Literature, ed. Hallo, Jones, and Mattingly. E. Mellen, 1990; Horowitz, W. Mesopotamian Cosmic Geography. Eisenbrauns, 1998; Rodriguez, A. M. "Ancient Near Eastern Parallels to the Bible and the Question of Revelation and Inspiration." Journal of the Adventist Theological Society 12 (2001): 43–64; Saggs, H. W. F. The Encounter with the Divine in Mesopotamia and Israel. Athlone, 1978, 1–29; Seely, P. "The Firmament and the Water Above." WTJ 53 (1991): 227–40, and 54 (1992): 31–46; idem. Inerrant Wisdom. Evangelical Reform, 1989; Talmon, S. "The Comparative Method in Biblical Interpretation: Principles and Problems." VTSup 29 (1977): 320–56; van der Toorn, K. Sin and Sanction in Israel and Mesopotamia. Van Gorcum, 1985, 1–9; Walton, J. Ancient Israelite Literature in Its Cultural Context. Zondervan, 1989; idem. Genesis. NIVAC. Zondervan, 2001; idem. "Joshua 10:12–14 and Celestial Omens of the Ancient Near East." Pages 181–90 in Faith, Tradition, History, ed. A. Millard, J. Hoffmeier, and D. Baker. Eisenbrauns, 1994; idem. "The Mesopotamian Background of the Tower of Babel and Its Implications." BBR 5 (1995): 155–75; Walton, J., V. Matthews, and M. Chavalas. IVP Bible Background Commentary: Old Testament. InterVarsity, 2000.

John H. Walton

Angel of the Lord See Angels, Doctrine of

Angels, Doctrine of

Are angels a theme or a doctrine in biblical theology? Since Schleiermacher's time, angels have been seen as liturgical and aesthetic embellishments. In classical times, they were given a place in the dogmatic syllabus (see Grudem). While granting that angels are found primarily in narrative settings, a case can be made that the Bible has an angelology, a consistent portrayal of angelic existence, character, and activity.

Angels in the Biblical Texts

The term “angel” itself (Hebrew: mal’ak; Greek: angelos) is functional, denoting a messenger, whether human or spiritual. Hence, a survey of biblical texts must cast its net wider and consider other designations of spiritual beings. Within the OT these include the gods or sons of God, holy ones, and several lesser terms. The admission of demigods as angelic raises a further issue: whether Satan and the fallen angels must be treated in a similar fashion. The admission of evil angels and spirits then broadens consideration to include NT references to “principalities and powers.” Perhaps the overarching category for theological interpretation would be “spiritual beings,” whether faithful or rebellious (cf. Heb. 1:14).

OT Creation Accounts. In contrast to later interpretation (e.g., Milton, Paradise Lost), the OT creation account makes no mention of the creation of angels or their activity in heaven or on earth until Gen. 3:24, which speaks allusively to cherubim with flaming sword. The OT creation account must be read both as a polemic against ancient Near Eastern mythologies of origin and as a realistic description, similar to the view of the Wisdom literature, of life under the firmament of heaven. In other places, the (p 46)OT makes reference to the divine council of the “sons of gods” (Hebrew: bene elim), suggesting that heaven is populated by spiritual beings, whether they are loyal servants or not (Ps. 82). However, the primary function of these beings is to set off the incomparability of the One God of Israel (Labuschagne).

Human nature is also implicitly contrasted with the angelic realm. The first woman is tempted by the hope of becoming like God or the gods (’elohim), who know good and evil. Three post-Edenic accounts—of the marriage of the sons of God (Gen. 6:1–4, the font of the Enoch myth), of the assault on heaven at Babel, and of the attempted rape of angels at Sodom—all raise questions about the relation of human nature to the angelic world. Most explicit, however, is the psalmist’s marveling inquiry: “What is man that you are mindful of him, the son of man that you care for him? You made him a little lower than the heavenly beings and crowned him with glory and honor” (Ps. 8:4–5). The implied answer is that humanity in the image of God surpasses the ranks of the angelic world.

OT Salvation History. The “angel of the LORD” (mal’ak Yahweh) is best known from appearances to Hagar, Abraham, and Jacob. The angel of the Lord appears sometimes as a distinct messenger, at other times as virtually interchangeable with God himself (Gen. 32:24–30). In a highly suggestive passage, the Lord appears to Abraham at Mamre as three men, two of whom are later explicitly called angels (Gen. 18:1–2; 19:1).

At the time of the exodus, the angel of the Lord acts as the leader of God's people (Exod. 23:20–22). He identifies himself as “the captain of the LORD's host” (Josh. 5:13–15 KJV). The idea of angels fighting for Israel and executing God's judgments appears in later narrative (2 Kings 6:17) and in the eschatological visions of the prophets (Ezek. 8–9). In an apocalyptic development of the tradition, Daniel sees angelic princes fighting for God's saints and accompanying “one like a son of man” in judgment (Dan. 7:9–14; 10:13). Some interpreters see the Son of Man as himself an angel, but this seems unlikely.

OT Evil Powers. The OT reticence to speak of evil angels and Satan in particular is of a piece with its “apophatic angelology” (Noll). Nevertheless, the apocalyptic tradition and the NT are not mistaken in discerning an evil spirit in Eden's “ancient serpent” (Rev. 12:9; 20:2). Likewise, the Adversary (ha-satan) of God's court in Job manifests the same rebellious character. The mythology of divine and human hubris reappears in the prophets, particularly in the “Day Star, son of Dawn,” who is cast down to the underworld (Isa. 14:12 NRSV).

NT Christology. Despite the centrality of Christ in NT theology, angels continue to appear throughout. In the Gospels they provide the “framework of mystery” (Barth) around the entry of the Son of God into the world of flesh and his return to heaven. They announce Jesus' birth and his resurrection and ascension but are strangely absent from his earthly ministry. Jesus himself makes clear that angels accompany the work of salvation (Luke 15:10) and will accompany the Son of Man when he comes in glory (Mark 8:38).

In the Christology of the Epistles, angels provide a foil to set off the exclusive deity of Christ (1 Cor. 8:4–8). Paul sometimes lumps “angels” and “principalities” together as representatives of the intermediary realm over which Christ reigns (Rom. 8:38). The Letter to the Hebrews devotes two chapters to a comparison of Christ and the angels. It concludes that Christ is both above and below them, “the radiance of God's glory and the exact representation of his being,” and also true man, for a little while being made lower than angels (Heb. 1:3; 2:9).

Prince of This World. Satan is more prominent in the NT than the OT, apparently being flushed out by the appearance of Christ (Rev. 12:9). He is the “prince of demons,” whose forces are routed by Jesus (Mark 3:22). He is also “the prince of this world,” who is judged even as he appears to win victory at Calvary (John 12:31). He is the spirit infecting the “principalities” and “powers” (KJV) so that they can be described as “the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 6:11–12).

John's Apocalypse. The angelology of the OT and NT climax in the final book of the Bible. In chs. 4–5, John from a heavenly vantage point describes the drama of creation and redemption. The angels of creation ask: “Who is worthy?” and they acclaim the slain Lamb, who steps forward with choruses of praise. In chs. 12–14, the theme of conflict and combat in the heavenly realm is represented in the battle between the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet on one side, and the Lamb and his witnesses on the other. The final victory is acclaimed in three antiphonal “Hallelujah” choruses to God and the Lamb (19:1–8), echoing the praise in chs. 4–5.

(p 47) *Angels in the Practice of Theological Interpretation

Angelology provides a kind of litmus test in detecting changes in theological interpretation through the ages, since there have been radically different evaluations of the meaning and importance of the biblical texts about spiritual beings.

The Classical Synthesis. The two most important sources of classical theology in the East and West are Pseudo-Dionysius and Augustine, respectively, who synthesized biblical angels with the Platonic realm of the mind. The former author, a Neoplatonist of the fifth century CE, portrayed a complex “celestial hierarchy” of nine angelic ranks, using various terms from Scripture. His account, thought for centuries to be apostolic, forms the basis of Eastern Orthodox angelology. Augustine’s thought takes more seriously the biblical focus on angels as messengers of salvation, but he also exegetes the creation accounts and sees angels as rational creatures who turned to (and from, in the case of Satan’s host) God’s grace. Rational deduction about angels reaches its zenith in Thomas Aquinas, who argues for the logical necessity of an order of “minds without bodies.” Thomas bases much of this rationalization on the thin biblical thread of Ps. 104:4.

The Reformation Reserve and Modernist Rejection. The Reformers reacted against the speculative nature of scholastic angelology. John Calvin in particular limited discussion of angels to positive texts. In his view, the function of angels is limited to the economy of salvation. One may wonder whether Calvin’s minimalism opened the door to the outright skepticism of the Enlightenment. René Descartes and John Locke, for instance, do not reject angelology outright, given its scriptural authority, but they claim that angelic existence and character is unknowable. It is only a small step for one to conclude that “heaven may be left to angels and sparrows.”

Romantic and Postmodern Recoveries. From the Renaissance onward, angels became increasingly humanized in Western art as chubby cherubs, having virtually no resemblance to their biblical namesakes. The last serious attempt to treat angels in a narrative context is John Milton's Paradise Lost. While this epic goes behind the biblical texts, it represents a serious attempt to grasp the intermediate nature of angels in the drama of creation and redemption. Later aesthetic treatments, like that of William Blake, blur the biblical distinction between good and evil spirits and move toward a kind of pantheism. Among current theologians, Walter Wink follows the same tack in a postmodern recovery of principalities as "symbolic of the 'withinness' of institutions, structures and systems."

Karl Barth deserves special mention as a postcritical "angelic doctor." Barth's own angelology begins with rejection of the Thomistic synthesis but devotes more attention to the biblical texts than Calvin does. For Barth, heaven with its angels represents the Whence of salvation in Christ, and Barth shares with the psalmist the marvel that "in Jesus Christ [God] has not taken to himself heaven and the angels in their majesty but man and the earth." For all his serious treatment of angels as servants, Barth dismisses texts about evil angels "with a swift, sharp glance," interpreting John 8:44 to imply that "the devil never was an angel."

Theological Significance of Angels

The first and most pertinent question to ask is, Must we accept the biblical testimony that angels exist? Karl Barth answered this question bluntly: "To deny the angels of God is to deny God himself." Confession of "things visible and invisible" seems indeed to be the dogmatic position of the historic catholic faith. Yet it seems that many evangelical Protestants have put angels and angelology out of sight and out of mind.

Angels and the Biblical Canon. The "canonical approach" to biblical theology pioneered by Brevard Childs opens the door to a contemporary angelology derived from Scripture. Three features stand out in such a canonical approach. The first is a willingness to explore the tradition underlying biblical portrayals of angels without succumbing to the genetic fallacy, that the final form is simply the background writ large. For instance, the divine council of gods may be accepted as reality in many OT references without undermining the exclusive monotheism of the Torah.

A second feature is attention to the discrete witness of both Testaments while seeking a holistic doctrine to emerge. So, for instance, the virtual absence of Satan in the OT can be acknowledged while understanding his full-fledged appearance in the Gospels as concomitant with the coming of the Son of God, as explained allegorically in the war in heaven (Rev. 12:1–5).

A third feature is the shape given an angelology by the christocentric character of the canon. The unanswered questions of the OT—“What is man that you are mindful of him?”—are only (p 48) answered by the appearance of One who stands on the divine side of heaven’s throne and who has descended lower than the angels. Similarly, the surprised angelic paeans at the announcement of the slain Lamb’s coming to redeem creation are completed by the victory songs that accompany his second coming, to usher in a new creation.

Such a canonical angelology makes space for the various kinds of questions asked by the angelic doctors of the Jewish and Christian tradition, while reminding interpreters of the limits of piercing the mysteries above the firmament of heaven.

See also Powers and Principalities

Bibliography

Bandstra, A. In the Company of Angels. CRC Publications, 1995; Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Vol. III/3. T&T Clark, 1960; Bauckham, R. The Climax of Prophecy. T&T Clark, 1993; Childs, B. Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments. Fortress, 1992; Forsyth, N. The Old Enemy. Princeton University Press, 1987; Garrett, S. The Demise of the Devil. Fortress, 1989; Grudem, W. Systematic Theology. Zondervan, 1995; Hurtado, L. One God, One Lord. Fortress, 1988; Kreeft, P. Angels (and Demons). Ignatius, 1995; Labuschagne, C. J. The Incomparability of Yahweh in the Old Testament. Brill, 1966; Noll, S. Angels of Light, Powers of Darkness. InterVarsity, 1998; Paige, S. Powers of Evil. Baker, 1995; Rowland, C. The Open Heaven. Crossroad, 1982; Russell, J. B. The Devil. Cornell University Press, 1977; Wink, W. Unmasking the Powers. Fortress, 1986.

Stephen F. Noll

Anthropomorphism

Anthropomorphism is the portrayal of God in human form. In the biblical literature we find individual parts of the human body attributed to God, such as hands (1 Sam. 5:11; Heb. 10:12), eyes (Ezek. 7:4; 1 Pet. 3:12), ears (1 Sam. 8:21; 1 Pet. 3:12), face (Gen. 32:30; 1 Pet. 3:12), and so on. The text attributes to him physical actions such as laughing (Ps. 2:4), smelling (Gen. 8:21), and whistling (Isa. 7:18). In addition to these portrayals of God with bodily characteristics, God is also depicted as experiencing hatred (Deut. 16:22; Rom. 9:13), anger (Exod. 22:24; John 3:36), vengeance (Deut. 32:35), sorrow (Gen. 6:6), and a range of other human passions. The attribution of passions to God is more specifically referred to as anthropopathism.

Such anthropomorphic depictions of God are used freely in the Scriptures, yet those same Scriptures also warn against conceiving of God in human terms. In Exod. 20:4 the prohibition of idolatry carries with it the implication that the infinite God cannot be represented through any finite form, nor conceived according to the measure of the natural world. Israel is reminded that they saw no form when the Lord spoke at Sinai (Deut. 4:12, 15). God's unlikeness to human beings is thus asserted: God does not sleep (Ps. 121:4); he is not a human being that he should lie or change his mind (Num. 23:19; 1 Sam. 15:29); nor will he exercise wrath like a mortal (Hos. 11:9). The transcendence of God is a constant theme, and his surpassing of all human understanding is frequently enjoined upon those who would speak of him.

The Theological Tradition

Out of deference to the transcendence of God and under the influence of Hellenistic philosophy (Heraclitus and Xenophanes were relentless critics of anthropomorphic talk of God), both the Jewish and Christian traditions have sought at times to downplay the anthropomorphic language of Scripture. Aramaic translations of the OT avoid all anthropomorphisms, and the Septuagint frequently removes or moderates the attribution of human characteristics to God in the Hebrew texts (e.g., LXX, Josh. 4:24; Exod. 15:3). The Jewish philosopher Philo was typical of many who were eager to stress the allegorical interpretation required in the face of biblical anthropomorphism. He was followed in this by Maimonides, who drew on the philosophy of Aristotle to counter all anthropomorphic conceptions of God. Caution about the anthropomorphic portrayal of God emerged early in Christian tradition. Clement of Alexandria, for instance, denied that God experiences emotions such as joy, pity, or grief (Strom. 2.16, 72). When encountering biblical anthropomorphism, therefore, we must not suppose that these terms express passions of God. "Reverence rather requires that from these expressions an allegorical meaning should be extracted" (Strom. 68.1–3). This advice is followed by Gregory of Nazianzus, who interprets reference to God's "face" as his oversight and to his "hand" as indicating God's provision (Or. 31.22). Theodoret understands God's "face" as his benevolence, his restoration of freedom, and his care (on Daniel 3:41), while John of Damascus gives allegorical explanations for each of the biblical anthropomorphisms that attribute parts of the body to God (Exact Exposition of the Orthodox Faith 1.11).

If, in order to avoid naive conceptions of God, anthropomorphic expressions may be substituted by more abstract allegorical explanations, what (p 49) is to be said about their appearance in the Bible? According to these patristic authors, anthropomorphic expressions are a divine concession to the weakness of human understanding. Calvin takes up this line and writes of God's accommodation to the capacities of the human mind and heart. The important point to note here is that it is God who so accommodates himself. Human thought and language has no capacity from itself to speak of God. The possibility of human speech, even indeed of anthropomorphic speech, bearing witness to God is entirely a matter of God's blessing (Gollwitzer 151).

Gollwitzer is among those who further point out that all language is anthropomorphic insofar as it relates everything to humanity itself. The deficiency of anthropomorphism, if it be regarded as such, can only be removed, therefore, by having language remove itself (Jüngel, God, 260). Such is the approach of apophatic theology.

Revelation

There is, however, an alternative. The correctness of the tradition's caution against all human attempts to represent God must not be allowed to obscure the central affirmation of Scripture that God makes himself known. God presents himself in ways that enable human beings to know and to speak of him. All the language we use of God will be inadequate and cannot attain to the full mystery and transcendence of God; yet the treasure of God is entrusted—by God himself—to earthen vessels. God reveals himself and makes eloquent the witness of faith, so that even inadequate human words and concepts may be the means by which God makes himself known. This takes place most especially in the incarnation. The divine Word takes human form. This is the most significant anthropomorphism, for by this means God enables human beings, in speaking of one who is like them in all respects, but without sin, to speak truly of God himself. Naive anthropomorphism is banished; God is not like a human being (Jüngel, God, 297), but here we may speak of God by speaking of him as a human being.

The meaning of all theological speech, in consequence, is to be determined by reference to Christ. In his light human beings may learn what it means to say that God is "Father" or that he is "angry" or that he "rejoices" or that he inclines his "ear" toward humankind. They may do this not by projecting human images onto God, for that is idolatry, but by attending to revelation humanity is enabled to speak truly of God. The incarnation confirms, furthermore, that the OT speaks correctly of God when it speaks not in remote and abstract terms but in anthropomorphic terms of the living God, who is present in person. The reality of God's personal presence with humanity must not be sacrificed to a form of deference for the infinity and transcendence of God that would preclude us from speaking of God at all.

See also Analogy; Revelation

Bibliography

Caird, G. B. The Language and Imagery of the Bible. Duckworth, 1980;
Calvin, J. Ins. 1.12; Eichrodt, W. Theology of the Old Testament. Vol. 1, trans. J. A. Baker. SCM, 1961; Gollwitzer, H. The Existence of God as Confessed by Faith, trans. J. W. Leitch. SCM, 1965; Jüngel, E. "Anthropomorphism." Pages 72–94 in Theological Essays, trans. J. Webster. T&T Clark, 1989; idem. God as the Mystery of the World, trans. D. Guder. Eerdmans, 1983; Kuitert, H. M. De mensvormigheid Gods. Kampen, 1962. German translation by E.-W. Pollman. C. Kaiser, 1967; Prestige, G. L. God in Patristic Thought. 2d ed. SPCK, 1952; Torrance, T. F. The Christian Doctrine of God, One Being Three Persons. T&T Clark, 1996.

Murray A. Rae

Anti-Judaism      See Anti-Semitism

Antiochene Interpretation      See Hermeneutics; Jesus Christ, Doctrine of; Literal Sense; Patristic Biblical Interpretation; Typology

Anti-Semitism

The term "anti-Semitism" came into public use as recently as 1879, when Wilhelm Marr, a German political agitator, founded the "League of Anti-Semites." He was a racist who had earlier replaced "Jews" with "Semites" in his writings, in order to make his point that Jewish identity is first and foremost racial rather than religious. The "League" quickly failed as a political organization, but the term took root, and since then "anti-Semitism" has been used to denote "all forms of hostility manifested toward the Jews throughout history. It is often qualified by an adjective denoting the specific cause, nature, or rationale of a manifestation of anti-Jewish passion or action: e.g., 'economic anti-Semitism,' 'social anti-Semitism,' 'racial anti-Semitism,' etc." (EncJud 3:87). Its origin in Marr's racist theories means that the term always connotes hatred of Jews as a people, even if it also covers opposition to Judaism as a religion or cultural phenomenon.

This raises an important question, whether the NT can be called "anti-Semitic" just because in various ways it rejects the religion of the Jews. (p 50) Does theological argument against Judaism constitute hostility toward Jews? Some significant Jewish writers in this area (e.g., Cohn-Sherbok) do not distinguish between anti-Semitism and anti-Judaism, because they regard a theology that treats Jesus as the fulfillment of the Scriptures, and salvation as by faith in him (rather than through membership in Israel and obedience to Torah), as implicitly anti-Semitic. In fact, this is the predominant Jewish reaction to the NT, with Berkowitz, for instance, describing the NT as “the most dangerous antisemitic tract in history,” providing the theoretical basis for actual anti-Semitic hatred throughout time (Berkowitz 325).

If this is so, then Christianity is inherently anti-Semitic—much more clearly so than Hinduism or Buddhism, because it takes the sacred Scriptures of Judaism and rereads them around Jesus Christ. Some Christian theologians have taken up this view. Ruether, for instance, argues that the “christological hermeneutic” of the NT must be rethought, because it disallows the Jewish interpretation of the Scriptures. Christians must repent of such imperialism, she argues, and recognize that Jesus was just a Jewish prophet, giving hope of the kingdom rather than the kingdom itself. The theologies of John, Paul, and Hebrews come in for particular criticism, with their apparently replacementist attitude toward Judaism. To rescue something of original Christianity, this view employs the critical procedure known as Sachkritik, whereby a conception of the NT’s basic message is used to criticize other aspects of NT theology. In this case, the simple proclamation of the kingdom by Jesus forms the essential heart. He called his hearers to a new life of love and service as they waited for the kingdom morning to dawn. But then (in this view) the NT writers made Jesus the personification of divine Wisdom (John 1), or the temple in person (John 2; 1 Cor. 3), or the “true” vine of Israel (John 15), or the real recipient of the Abrahamic promises (Gal. 3), or the heavenly High Priest who alone makes atonement (Heb. 9). Thus they took the simple message of Jesus and turned it against the Judaism to which he belonged, implicitly disallowing the Jewish covenant with God. The real dynamic of such theology appears, we are told, when the NT gives vent to rabidly anti-Jewish sentiments, such as “Ye are of your father the devil” (John 8:44 KJV), or Matthew’s damning “His blood be on us and on our children!” (Matt. 27:25)—two NT texts which have certainly been used to fuel hostility toward Jewish people.

So we are faced with three questions. First, is there a proper distinction to be drawn between anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism? Second, is the NT view of Jesus essentially anti-Semitic? And third, what are we to say about the so-called “anti-Semitic” texts in the NT, like those quoted above?

Anti-Judaism and Anti-Semitism?

We must surely say that a distinction between these is vital. All anti-Semitism is anti-Jewish, because hatred of Jewish people is hardly compatible with love of their religion. But not all anti-Judaism is anti-Semitic, because it is fully possible to disagree with tenets of Judaism while still loving Jewish people. In fact, it is highly likely that this is what we encounter in the NT. All the NT writers, with the possible exception of Luke, were Jewish. Tomson, in his major treatment, argues that Jews by definition cannot be anti-Semitic. This is a passion that can only be felt and expressed by Gentiles, he argues. Statements that would be anti-Semitic on Gentile lips must be regarded as “argument within family” when uttered by Jews to fellow-Jews. Otherwise the OT prophets themselves, and Jesus, would have to be accused of anti-Semitism simply for directing strongly worded polemic at Israel (see, e.g., Isa. 1:2–15; Hos. 8; Matt. 23). In theory we may imagine a completely apostate Jew consumed with hatred for the people of his or her birth, but we do not meet this anywhere in the Bible.

NT Christology?

Is it essentially anti-Semitic to regard Jesus as the “meaning” of the OT Scriptures? That the NT writers held this view of Jesus and the OT is clear—taking their inspiration, apparently, from Jesus himself (Luke 24:27). Here the vital issue is to ask after their intention. Not long after the NT we encounter, in the Epistle of Barnabas, a hateful polemic against the Jews based on “Jesus fulfills the OT”: they have never understood their own Scriptures, they have always been idolatrous and rebellious, and now they refuse to see the truth. The Epistle of Barnabas begins a long and sorry catalog of the Christian “use” of the basic convictions about Jesus to denigrate and demonize the Jews: because they do not believe, they show themselves to be “of the devil” and worthy of exclusion from Christian society. One of the most shameful was Luther’s horrible diatribe against the Jews, in which he urged German Christians to burn Jewish houses and throw them out: this was motivated precisely by Luther’s belief that (p 51) the Jews had shown themselves to be finally unresponsive to the Christian gospel. The NT view of Jesus thus became a weapon by which to judge them.

But in the NT itself the desire to interpret the OT around Jesus arises from three humble convictions, held “within family,” and argued-for within that context: (1) Jesus really is the Messiah. (2) The “Old Testament” (as we call it) is still the faithful word of God, and Israel his covenant people. (3) Through Christ God has again poured out the Spirit of prophecy, enabling a prophetic rereading of the old texts. The NT writers shared the second conviction with their fellow-Jews; the argument flowed around and out of the other two. It gave rise to some passionate polemic, both from Jesus himself (e.g., Mark 13) and from Paul (e.g., Rom. 11:9–10; 1 Thess. 2:14–16), announcing the judgment of God on an apostate nation, in prophetic style. It produced dramatic rereadings of OT themes: For examples, the exodus and Passover are reinterpreted around Jesus (John 6). The Melchizedek priesthood is highlighted as undermining the cult and pointing to Jesus (Heb. 7). Deuteronomy 32—the famous “Song of Moses”—is understood to explain the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ (Rom. 10:19–11:12). And the longed-for restoration of Israel (e.g., Amos 9:11–12) is understood to include the Gentiles (Acts 15:13–18)!

None of these points—and many others like them—is made with hostility or hatred toward fellow Jews who still read the Scriptures in the traditional way. But taken out of this original context, into a Gentile environment in which there is already a sharp social distinction between Jews and dominant Gentile cultures, the words of the NT can ring very differently.

Anti-Semitic Texts?

This brings us to those awkward texts, such as Matt. 27:25 and John 8:44 (quoted above; cf. also Rev. 2:9; Acts 7:51). The approach to these must be the same as the approach to the broader christological reinterpretation of the OT. They are not ontological judgments on the essential character of the Jews, but warnings within family that, if hostility to Jesus persists, then their relationship with God is radically changed. “You are of your father the devil” (John 8:44) is, in context, a warning that, if “the Jews” persist in plotting Jesus’ death, or in regarding it as justified, they will forge a moral kinship with the devil, who is a murderer. This challenge is all part of John’s subtle argument framed around the debate: was the death of Jesus the legally justified execution of a blasphemer, or the illegal murder of a prophet? Similarly Matt. 27:25 (“His blood be on us and on our children!”) is an appeal to the “children” of the speakers—now contemporary with the evangelist—not to accept the verdict of their parents, that Jesus’ execution is a “safe bet” before God.

Anti-Semitism has been the scourge of Christian history, a terrible blot on the name of Christ, and a grave distortion of Christian Scriptures. Yet, when we listen to those Scriptures carefully, we hear a very different message.

See also Ideological Criticism; Israel; Jewish-Christian Dialogue

Bibliography

“Antisemitism.” EncJud 3:87–160. Keter, 1972; Berkowitz, E. In Judaism 27 (1978): 325; Cohn-Sherbok, D. The Crucified Jew. HarperCollins, 1992; Luther, M. “On the Jews and Their Lies” (1543), trans. M. Bertram. LWorks 47:122–306; Motyer, S. Antisemitism and the New Testament. Grove Books, 2002; idem. Your Father the Devil? A New Approach to John and ‘the Jews.’ Paternoster, 1997; Ruether, R. R. Faith and Fratricide. Seabury, 1974; Tomson, P. ‘If This Be from Heaven ...’ Sheffield Academic Press, 2001.

Stephen Motyer

Apocalyptic

“Apocalypticism” is a word derived from apokalypsis, Greek for “unveiling,” or “revelation,” and is the term found at the start of the book of Revelation (Rev. 1:1). Apocalypticism is a strand of religion in Second Temple Judaism (though found in different forms in other religions in antiquity) and refers to the discernment of divine secrets by dream, vision, or audition. Prime among the unveiled secrets are those concerning the future and the fulfillment of the divine promises for history. This is an important feature in the two canonical examples of this kind of literature, the books of Daniel and Revelation. In addition to these canonical works, typical apocalypses would include those attributed to Enoch (1, 2, and 3 Enoch), 2 Esdras (4 Ezra), the Apocalypse of Abraham, the Ascension of Isaiah, the Shepherd of Hermas. In addition, there are many apocalyptic fragments in nonapocalyptic texts, such as the account of Levi’s visionary ascent to heaven in the Greek version of the Testament of Levi (2).

An apocalypse is a particular type of revelatory literature found in ancient Judaism, characterized by claims to offer visions or other disclosures of divine mysteries concerning a variety of subjects. (p 52) But apocalypticism is also widely used to describe a religious phenomenon whose characteristics evince many of the eschatological features of the apocalypse. There are radical differences between this age and the age to come, angelic mediation, symbolic form, and the cataclysmic events that must take place before the new age can come about. This differentiation is crucial for any understanding of the contemporary discussion. On the one hand, there is the view that apocalypticism is determined by the revelatory character of this literature. On the other hand, there is the view that the religion is determined entirely by the (mainly eschatological) contents of these texts. This difference explains the great variety in definitions that modern literature on the subject offers of this phenomenon.

Apocalypses vary in the degree of mystery they contain in their contents. Some include explanations of their imagery by means of an authoritative angelic interpreter. The book of Daniel functions in this way, as also do parts of 2 Esd. 11–13. By contrast, Revelation differs from these in not having such a pattern of symbolic vision followed by interpretation. Martin Luther—in his 1535 preface to the book of Revelation (his earlier preface had been much more dismissive of the religious value of the book)—observed the difference between Daniel and Revelation. Daniel’s dream visions are followed by an accompanying angel’s interpretations (e.g., Dan. 7:15–28). This feature is almost completely lacking in the Apocalypse. Revelation 17, in which one of the angels of the seven bowls accompanies John and explains the vision of Babylon, offers a solitary exception.

The discovery of fragments of the Enoch apocalypse at Qumran reminds us that apocalyptic was a widespread phenomenon in Second Temple Judaism. The fact that the earliest parts of this text antedate the book of Daniel by at least a century suggests that the phenomenon had a long history in Judaism. It has obvious links with the prophetic texts of the OT, particularly to the future of hope and the visionary insight of the prophets. The emergence of a visionary tradition, with evocations of heavenly visions and extravagant symbolism, suggests a change even beyond the prophecy in Ezekiel and the early chapters of Zechariah.

The concern with human history and the vindication of Jewish hopes in the apocalypses echo prophetic themes, several of which have contributed to Revelation’s language, particularly Ezekiel, Daniel, and Zechariah. It is possible that a change took place in the form of that hope in the prophetic literature, when the future hope comes to be placed on another plane, the supernatural and otherworldly (e.g., Isa. 65–66; cf. Rev. 21; 2 Esd. 7:50). The cataclysmic upheavals described in Zech. 8–14 and Isa. 24–27; 55–66 have similarities with those described in Revelation. Apart from prophetic texts, antecedents of apocalypticism have also been found in the Wisdom tradition of the Hebrew Bible. This literature shows special interest in understanding the cosmos through the discernment of the meaning of dreams, oracles, astrology, and the ability to divine mysteries concerning future events. These were the activities of certain wise men in antiquity, as evident from Dan. 2. The book of Job, with its opening apocalyptic insight into the doings in the heavenly world and its concluding divine theophany, suggests a work that uses the theme of revelation to contribute a solution to the problem of human suffering.

The book of Revelation is the classic apocalypse. Not only is it described as “an apocalypse of Jesus Christ” (Rev. 1:1 AT); it is also “prophecy” (22:18). The first three chapters of Revelation describe the call of John the seer on the isle of Patmos. This is followed by a series of seven letters to the angels of the seven churches in Asia Minor. In chapter 4, a door is opened for the seer to behold a vision of God, lauded by the host of heaven. Into that heavenly world comes a Lamb “standing as though it had been slain” (5:6 AT), which also receives worship. The opening of a sealed book in God’s hand sets in train a catalog of destruction and judgment. Between chapters 4–5 and 21 the visions are dominated by three sequences—seven seals, seven trumpets, seven bowls. These sequences are interspersed with other visions that focus on the role and cost of witness (e.g., ch. 11), the threat from the demonic power and its earthly embodiment in the state (chs. 12–13), in which Revelation continues the political symbolism found in Dan. 7. Throughout these visions there is a challenge to readers to opt for the way of witness rather than compromise with the diabolically inspired imperial culture. The book concludes with visions of the messianic reign on earth, which precedes the last assize, the descent of the new Jerusalem, and resolution of the dualistic contrast between heaven and earth, good and evil. A major theme of the book is the overcoming of the stark contrast between God and the world, most graphically expressed in the early chapters, but overcome at the climax of the (p 53)book when God’s presence is on earth, dwelling in a renewed creation and in the new Jerusalem.

There are two basic types of interpretation of Revelation. The first involves presenting the meaning of the text in another, less-allusive form, showing what the text really means, usually with great attention to the details of the text and their meaning, often relating them to historical events or persons. The Apocalypse only occasionally prompts the reader to “decode” the meaning of the apocalyptic mysteries (17:9, 18; cf. 1:20; 4:3).

A second form of interpretation refuses to translate the images but instead uses them metaphorically. Thus, it applies the image to another situation or person, not by way of equating the two, but by a process of juxtaposition, casting light on that to which the image has been applied. The imagery of the Apocalypse is juxtaposed with the interpreter’s own circumstances, whether personal or social, so as to allow the images to inform understanding of contemporary persons and events. Such interpretation has deep roots in the Christian tradition, going back at least to the time of the fifth-century writer Tyconius, whose work was so important for Augustine. Revelation thereby becomes a resource not just for the generation of the last days but also for the religious life in every generation. Finally, there is appropriation by visionaries, where the words of the Apocalypse either offer the opportunity to “see again” things similar to what has appeared to John, or prompt new visions related to it.

In early Christianity visionary insight played an important part (Mark 1:10; Acts 10–11). Paul, for example, writes about the centrality of the divine revelation (Gal. 1:12, 16). For many NT writers, vision equips them with insight hidden from others and privileges them to enjoy a role in history denied even to the greatest figures of the past. First Peter is typical of the outlook of many other NT documents in its emphasis on the privilege of the writer's time: "It was revealed to [the prophets] that they were serving ... you, in regard to the things that have now been announced to you, ... things into which angels long to look!" (1:11–12 NRSV).

Even the Gospel of John, which has few explicit references to visionary experience, is permeated with the theme of the apocalypses—revelation. Thus, at the conclusion of the prologue, the evangelist speaks of the Son in the following way: "No one has ever seen God; the only Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has made him known" (1:18 AT). Jesus proclaims himself as the revelation of the hidden God, when he tells Philip, "Whoever has seen me has seen the Father" (14:9 NRSV). The vision of the invisible God is related to Jesus. The vision of God, which is reserved in the book of Revelation for the fortunate seer (Rev. 4) and for the inhabitants of the "new Jerusalem," who will see God face-to-face (22:4), is found, according to the Fourth Evangelist, in the person of Jesus of Nazareth.

Despite attempts over the years to play down the importance of apocalypticism in early Christianity, the indications suggest that its thought forms and outlook were more typical of early Christianity than is often allowed. In the earliest period of Christianity, resort to the apocalyptic language and genre enabled the NT writers to have access to the privilege of understanding the significance of events and persons from the divine perspective. Apocalypticism, therefore, was the vehicle whereby the first Christians were able to articulate their deepest convictions about the ultimate significance of Jesus Christ in the divine purposes.

See also Hope; Last Things, Doctrine of

Bibliography

Bauckham, R. The Theology of the Book of Revelation. Cambridge University Press, 1993; Charlesworth, J. H., ed. Apocalyptic Literature and Testaments. Vol. 1 of The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. Doubleday, 1983; Collins, J. The Apocalyptic Imagination. Crossroad, 1984; idem, ed. The Origins of Apocalypticism in Judaism and Christianity. Vol. 1 of The Encyclopedia of Apocalypticism. Cassel & Continuum, 1998; Hellholm, D. Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East. 2d ed. Mohr, 1989; Kovacs, J., and C. Rowland. The Book of Revelation.

Blackwell, 2004; McGinn, B., ed. Apocalypticism in Western History and Culture. Vol. 2 of The Encyclopedia of Apocalypticism. Cassel & Continuum, 1998; Rowland, C. The Open Heaven. SPCK, 1982; idem. Revelation. NIB 12. Abingdon, 1998; Stein, S., ed. Apocalypticism in the Modern Period and the Contemporary Age. Vol. 3 of The Encyclopedia of Apocalypticism. Cassel & Continuum, 1998; Stone, M. E. "Apocalyptic Literature." Pages 383–441 in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, ed. M. E. Stone. Fortress, 1984.

Christopher Rowland

Apocrypha

The OT Apocrypha are books written during the later Second Temple period (between ca. 300 BCE and 100 CE) in a variety of genres, most patterned after books in the Hebrew Scriptures. This collection is considered canonical, and thus the object of theological interpretation, by Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox communions (the (p 54)latter having an even more inclusive definition of the corpus than the former), but noncanonical by Jews and Protestant Christians. The stance of several Reformation-era Protestant bodies was that the books of the Apocrypha were suitable for private reading for instruction in ethics and manners, but not for the establishing of any doctrine.

Nevertheless, the apocryphal books are important for both Jews and Christians of all denominations as texts that are themselves rich with the theological interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures, shaping, preserving, and extending the theology of the OT. Moreover, the leading voices of the early church clearly recognized the contribution these texts could make to the formation of Christian theology.

The Theological Interpretation of the OT in the Apocrypha

The Apocrypha continue to proclaim God as a God of covenant faithfulness, both in dealing with individuals and with the nation. Recurrent themes are the following: God's choice of Israel as God's inheritance and special portion (Add. Esth. 13:15–17), selection of Jerusalem as the place where people (specifically, Israel) can have access to the unapproachable God (3 Macc. 2:9, 15–16), special connection with the fortunes of Israel such that the honor of God and the nation of Israel are inseparably associated (Bar. 2:11, 14–15; 3:5; 3 Macc. 2:16), and God's commitment to protect the Jews against their enemies, who thus become God's enemies (3 Macc. 2:3–10; 6:3–9, 15, 28; 7:6, 9).

God's grace toward Israel is especially manifested in the giving of the Torah (the embodiment of Wisdom) exclusively to Israel (Sir. 24:1–23; Bar. 3:36–4:4). The law is not a means of earning God's favor—it is a manifestation of God's favor. It is regarded as the path to life, virtue, and the continued experience of God's favor now and hereafter (Sirach; 4 Maccabees; Wisdom). It may present a challenge, but it is not too difficult for human beings (2 Esdras; Sirach). Far from a burden, it is the God-given provision for virtue and immortality, for a properly ordered human existence, fulfilling God's intentions for humanity in our creation (4 Macc. 2:21–23). The fact that God gave the commandment proves that it can be observed, providing the antidote for sin. In this regard, it is quite instructive to contrast 4 Macc. 2:4–6 and Rom. 7:7–10.

The doing of Torah is placed entirely within a reaffirmation of Deuteronomy's theology of history and covenant: obedience leads to the experience of God's promised favors, transgression leads to chastisement of Israel at the hands of Gentile nations, and repentance and recommitment to Torah lead to restoration of God's favor toward God's people. This is consistently reaffirmed throughout the literature in light of new challenges (deSilva 207, 229, 274–75). Across this literature, Deuteronomy's basic theology is expanded to include the afterlife and the enjoyment of covenant rewards or experience of punishment in light of the failure of this life to bring "justice for all" (see 2 Macc. 7; Wis. 1–5; 4 Maccabees, passim; 2 Esdras, passim). This assures that God will be just not only to the nation, but also to each individual Jew.

Out of this literature also comes a more advanced theology of suffering. It may come as punishment or chastisement for sins (Tob. 3:3–5; 2 Macc. 6:12–16; 7:18; Bar. 1:15–18; Pr. Azar. 3–9), but this is an insufficient explanation in many cases, as when individual righteous people suffer. In such cases, suffering becomes a test of the righteous (Tob. 12:13–14; Wis. 3:5; 4 Macc. 11:12) or even an opportunity to atone for the nation (2 Macc. 7:37–38; 4 Macc. 6:28–29; 17:21–22).

The way in which the authors of the Apocrypha interpret biblical prophecy shows that they already follow a hermeneutic whereby no prophecy of God can fail (Tob. 14:4), and whereby earlier prophecies of restoration following some past disaster can continue to be applied to new situations of exile or domination. God's faithfulness, justice, and sovereignty must therefore lead to the regathering of Israel from the Dispersion and the fulfillment of Isaiah's vision of Jerusalem's ascendancy (Tob. 13–14; Sir. 36:13, 16). As 2 Esdras shows, the concept of the "two ages" becomes ever more important for rescuing covenant theology and the doctrine of election as the people face disconfirmation by historical infelicities.

In addition to meditating on texts speaking about God's special relationship with Israel and the righteous, the Apocrypha develop traditions about creation in significant ways. The belief that God created the cosmos ex nihilo is attested in 2 Macc. 7:28, a belief that will provide further support for the conviction that God is capable of re-creating a person's life in the resurrection. The created order, indeed, ought to prove sufficient to lead people to the knowledge of God, but remains ineffectual for the Gentiles (Wis. 13:1–9). God displays his sovereignty and providence in that every created thing has a purpose (Sir. 39:16–21, 33–35). This sovereignty extends to the lives of (p 55) human beings, who are “clay in the hand of the potter,” to be done with as the potter decides (Sir. 33:10–13 NRSV); the government of the nations (Add. Esth. 13:9–11; 16:16); and timely interventions on behalf of God's people (Wis. 11–19; 3 Maccabees, passim; Sus. 44–46).

These authors also show lively engagement with the Adamic traditions as they struggle with the human predicament. Wisdom of Solomon understands God to have created humankind for immortality, after God's own image/eternity. Death only came in as a result of sin and of the devil's envy (Wis. 1:16; 2:21–24), clearly developing Gen. 3. Second Esdras takes this further, lamenting the fact that the “evil inclination” took root in Adam and has spread like a “disease” through all the human race (2 Esd. 3–14; see 3:20–22; 4:30; 7:118–119). This expresses a doctrine of “original sin” quite similar to that developed earlier by Paul (Rom. 5:12–21). As in Paul, however, it is held in tension with human responsibility for striving against the evil inclination and eagerly pursuing righteousness (2 Esd. 7:92, 127–29; Rom. 2:6–10).

Finally, the Apocrypha contribute significantly to the growth of angelology and demonology. Demons are the source of affliction for individuals, with exorcism and the binding of the demon bringing relief (as in Tob. 3:7–8, 17; 8:1–3). Angels act on behalf of God's people and are expected to intervene in the lives of individuals, whether taking human prayers before God as messengers or bringing assistance or revelations from God to human beings (as in Tob. 3:16–17; 12:12–15, 18).

The Theological Interpretation of the Apocrypha in the Early Church

The influence of apocryphal books on the early church is considerable. We must ignore the stunning examples of how the Apocrypha have shaped the ethics, the imagery, and the expression of the NT and focus solely on major points of theological influence.

As early Christian leaders reflected upon the person and work of Jesus, they showed a special indebtedness to Wisdom of Solomon and the traditions of the Maccabean-era martyrs found in 2 and 4 Maccabees. The Christology of Hebrews, Colossians, and John builds upon previous traditions about the person of “Wisdom,” God’s partner in creation, the mediator through whom God made the cosmos and continues to order and govern it (Wis. 8:1; 9:1–2, 9). “Wisdom” is no longer a created being, but an emanation of God—“a pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty, ... a reflection of eternal light, a spotless mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness” (Wis. 7:25–26 NRSV).

Reflecting on the person of Jesus, NT authors interpret him in light of these traditions about “Wisdom.” Now it is Jesus who is “the image of the invisible God” (Col. 1:15), the “reflection of God’s glory and the exact imprint of God’s very being” (Heb. 1:3 NRSV), God’s agent in the creation of all that is (John 1:1–3; Heb. 1:2–3; Col. 1:16–17), and the mediator by which people come into relationship with God (John 1:10–13; cf. Wis. 7:27). These wisdom traditions, then, gave the early church a theological language with which to express their convictions about their encounter with God in the person of Jesus. The impact of Wisdom of Solomon continues to be felt throughout the first four centuries. It contributes to the church’s development of the doctrines of the Son’s eternal generation by the Father, the Father and the Son sharing in the same essence (homoousios), and the Trinity and the equality of the three persons.

Another important contribution to Christology concerns the sacrificial interpretation of Jesus’ death on the cross. The Torah does not prepare one to regard a human death in such terms, but the Apocrypha offer reflection on the deaths of the martyrs, who chose torture and death out of obedience to God and to Torah rather than apostasy and release. These texts provide an important bridge between the “Suffering Servant” song of Isa. 52:13–53:12 and the broad spectrum of concepts used to express the meaning of Jesus’ death. In 2 Maccabees, the seven brothers embrace death as a means of bringing “to an end the wrath of the Almighty” that fell upon the “whole nation” (2 Macc. 7:37–38 NRSV). They allow God’s anger, in other words, to expend itself fully upon them so that the nation would not continue to suffer. In 4 Maccabees, the language of “purification,” ransom, exchange, and “atoning sacrifice” is added to speak of the deaths of these martyrs: “Let our punishment suffice for them. Make my blood their purification [katharsion], and take my life in exchange for theirs” (4 Macc. 6:27–29 NRSV); the martyrs have “become, as it were, a ransom for the sin of our nation. And through the blood of those devout ones and their death as an atoning sacrifice [hilastērion], divine Providence preserved Israel” (4 Macc. 17:21–22 NRSV). All of these concepts are used in the NT to interpret the significance of Jesus’ crucifixion, (p 56) and the basic theories of atonement all have their roots in these martyrological texts.

The belief in the physical resurrection of the dead, in the possibility of going to “be with the Lord” upon death, in the certainty of postmortem reward and punishments, and in the judgment of all people by God beyond death—these are found throughout the NT and the writings of successive generations of Christians. These convictions, however, are nurtured more by the Apocrypha than by the Hebrew Scriptures, which are slight in their references to postmortem existence (and ambiguous in most places where an afterlife might be too readily assumed by Christian readers). Nowhere in the Hebrew Scriptures does one find visions of God’s postmortem vindication of the righteous and of God’s indictment and punishment of the wicked such as one finds in Wis. 1–5 or 2 Macc. 7. It is these texts that resonate so well with the personal and cosmic eschatology of Jesus, Paul, and the other voices of the NT.

The theological influence of these apocryphal books can also be seen in smaller ways. Examples are the frequent attribution of the introduction of sin and death to the devil’s envy (first posited in Wis. 2:24; see 1 Clem. 3.4; Augustine, Trin. 4.12.15), and the dualistic anthropology in which the physical body is devalued as an impediment to the soul and its perception of spiritual realities (Wis. 9:15; see Augustine, Trin. 4.5, 10; 8.2; 17.28; 24.44).

Theological Interpretation of the Apocrypha among Protestants?

The Protestant position regarding the Apocrypha as a basis for theological reflection stems from two major concerns about these books. First, there was never a clear, unanimous agreement in the early church concerning their canonicity, though the majority position by the early fifth century was clearly for their inclusion in the OT. The same objection, however, could be made against most of the General Epistles and Revelation. The second concern, and probably the more serious, was the manner in which certain passages in the Apocrypha were used to establish doctrines that were especially objectionable to the Protestant Reformers.

The intercession of the “saints” in heaven on behalf of God’s people here in this life is most clearly evidenced by 2 Macc. 15:12–14. There the deceased high priest Onias III and the prophet Jeremiah pray to God on behalf of the Jewish nation in its struggle against the Seleucid armies. The belief that atonement could be made for the sins of the deceased, to release them from the consequences of their sins, was clearly supported by 2 Macc. 12:39–45. Finally, we find the doctrine that virtuous deeds built up a “treasure” against a future day of necessity and could have cultic value as an offering

(Tob. 4:8–11; Sir. 29:9–12). This easily lays a foundation for the “treasury of merits” and support for the belief that these merits, once accumulated, could be passed on to others (including the departed, as in 2 Macc. 12:39–45). These were key issues in the Protestant Reformation, and key texts that supported them were to be found in the books whose canonicity had never been officially decided. Hence, it was inevitable that the Reformers should revive the arguments of Jerome and others that the church should follow the shorter OT canon received from the synagogue.

What, then, are Protestant Christians interested in theological interpretation to do with the Apocrypha? First, the Apocrypha are indispensable to understanding the theological environment of the first century CE. They provide a witness to the ways in which OT theological traditions were being selected, weighed, and modified or extended in the centuries after the return from exile, and thus being made available to Jews at the turn of the era. Through attention to these texts, we arrive at a much better informed understanding of what was at stake theologically in the confession of Jesus as Messiah and in the questions addressed by early Christians (e.g., the inclusion of Gentiles without the requirements of circumcision and keeping kashruth [Jewish dietary laws]).

Second, these texts were resources that made significant contributions to early Christian theology, especially in the areas of Christology, personal eschatology, anthropology, and martyrology. If Protestants exclude them from their study, they are without access to books that were highly valued by their theological parents and highly formative for the faith they confess.

Finally, Protestants can continue to appreciate their raising of, and wrestling with, questions of perpetual interest to theologians. Sirach raises the problem of divine sovereignty and human responsibility for sin (15:11–15; 33:11–13). Second Esdras raises the perennial questions of God’s justice and of the struggle to rise above our own bent to sinning. Wisdom posits the relationship of a defective ethics with the crumbling of the Jewish (and Christian) worldview, a strangely (post-) modern problem as well. All Christians would profit from engaging the apocryphal books (p 57) at least as worthy conversation partners, if not as canonical authorities.

Bibliography

Charles, R. H. Apocrypha. Vol. 1 of The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English. Oxford University Press, 1913; Collins, J. Jewish Wisdom in the Hellenistic Age. Westminster John Knox, 1997; deSilva, D. Introducing the Apocrypha. Baker, 2002; Harrington, D. J. An Invitation to the Apocrypha. Eerdmans, 1998; Longenecker, B. Eschatology and the Covenant. JSOT, 1991; Metzger, B. An Introduction to the Apocrypha. Oxford University Press, 1957; Nickelsburg, G. W. E. Resurrection, Immortality, and Eternal Life in Intertestamental Judaism. Harvard University Press, 1972.

David A. deSilva

Apologetics

Apologetics is the theological discipline that defends the truth of the Christian message. One important subject of recent debate among apologists has been the relationship between apologetics and Scripture. All apologists seek to defend the biblical message, and they usually defend their apologetic method as itself in accord with Scripture. But they disagree on questions such as these: (1) Does the Bible teach anything specific about apologetics, or about related topics such as epistemology (see, e.g., the debate in Cowan, 208–19, 256, 350–51)? (2) What does it teach about apologetics? (3) How should Scripture itself be used (alongside other tools such as general revelation, logic, reason, et al.) in the work of apologetics? For purposes of this dictionary, it is also important to consider (4) how Scripture teaches us about apologetics and (5) how apologetic concerns may affect our interpretation of Scripture more generally. The discussion below will address these topics, not necessarily in sequence.

The Bible does not discuss apologetics as an academic discipline, but it does speak about defending the faith. The term “apologetics” comes from the Greek apologia, apologeisthai, which in the NT usually refers to an individual’s defense of his conduct, as in 1 Cor. 9:3, and sometimes against legal charges, as in Acts 19:33; 22:1; 24:10. In the Acts passages, however, Paul defends himself by defending his message. So in Phil. 1:7, apologia refers explicitly to a defense of the gospel, and in 1 Pet. 3:15 to a defense of the Christian hope.

Moving beyond the apologia-vocabulary, we can see that defense of the gospel appears frequently in the Bible. There is a strong apologetic element in the “signs” of the fourth gospel (John 20:30–31), and in Luke’s attempt to impart “certainty” to Theophilus (Luke 1:4; cf. “proofs” in Acts 1:3). Paul’s epistles contain much defense of his gospel against objectors. This emphasis on defense goes back to Jesus’ own confrontations with opponents and, still earlier, to God’s prophetic indictments of unfaithful Israel. (In these cases especially, we should bear in mind the maxim that often the best defense is a good offense.)

All of this suggests the broader thesis of Ezra Hyun Kim, that from one perspective the whole Bible is apologia. For in the Bible

God presents his truth over against error, speaking it into a sinful world, always having in view the objections of his opponents. The authors of the Bible, divine and human, seek to present their message cogently, rationally, persuasively. This is not to say that the Bible is a collection of rational syllogisms, but that in all its genres, even in its poetic, narrative, and wisdom teaching, it seeks to present God's message as right, true, and persuasive.

Defending the faith, therefore, is a biblical practice. The discipline of apologetics seeks to instruct Christians in such defense. As analysis of a biblical practice, apologetics is a properly theological discipline. If theology is "the application of Scripture to all areas of life," then apologetics is "the application of Scripture to unbelief" (Frame, Knowledge of God, 81, 87), including the unbelief that remains in Christian hearts.

As with all theology, the Bible is normative for apologetics. It does not teach apologetics in a focused or systematic way, even to the extent that it teaches about justification in Rom. 1–5, the resurrection in 1 Cor. 15, or the events of the last days in 1 Thess. 4–5. However, it has much to say about the theistic worldview; the nature of the gospel, knowledge, wisdom, the noetic effects of sin, and regeneration; the opposition of belief and unbelief; the Spirit's illumination; God's revelation in the natural world; and the role of Scripture itself as our authority for all areas of human life.

My own reading suggests that a "biblical apologetic" would take this general shape: "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge" (Prov. 1:7) and "wisdom" (9:10); indeed, wisdom and knowledge are summed up in Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 1:30; Col. 2:3). Though God is known through his creation, people repress this knowledge (Rom. 1:18–32) until God's grace renews their minds (12:2). The apologist should press upon the non-(p 58)Christian the evidence that God is clearly revealed in nature. But he should present it in the context of a biblical worldview, with an epistemology reflecting what the Bible says about knowledge. And he should present the gospel in God's own authoritative voice, using Scripture's own arguments (as 1 Cor. 15:1–11) and other arguments that follow scriptural leads. As an example of the latter, when Scripture says that God is revealed in creation, it authorizes us to find evidence in creation to use in apologetic witness (as Acts 14:15–18; 17:22–31). When it says that the events of redemption occurred at specific times and places, it authorizes us to find apologetic resources in the historical study of those times and places (Acts 26:26).

Having learned from Scripture what we can about apologetics, it is natural that those conclusions influence our reading of Scripture in other areas. All theological conclusions serve as hermeneutical grids in this sense. But there are dangers. For example, apologists have sometimes drawn a sharp distinction between miracle and providence, for the sake of the “argument from miracle.” Miracles must be distinct from other events, it is said, so that we can identify them for use in apologetic argument. In my judgment, however, Scripture itself does not make such a sharp distinction (Frame, Doctrine of God, 241–73). The implication for apologetics is not that the argument from miracle is faulty, but that both providence and miracle reveal God to human beings in somewhat, though not sharply, different ways. We need to hold loosely enough to our theological/apologetic conclusions that we will be able to revise them in the light of further study of Scripture. There must be a true hermeneutical circle: our theological conclusions influencing our exegesis, and our exegesis influencing our theological conclusions. Openness to revision in both directions requires humility as well as perspicacity.

Cornelius Van Til’s work in apologetics led him to a model similar to the one sketched earlier. This model, in turn, inclined him toward theological interpretations of Scripture that emphasized the sovereignty and authority of God, the authority and sufficiency of Scripture, the ontological Trinity, the fullness of wisdom in Christ, and the foolishness of unbelief. His apologetic creativity influenced his theological creativity, and the reverse. On the whole, I think his work is a good example of fruitful hermeneutical reciprocity between these disciplines.

Bibliography

Boa, K., and R. Bowman Jr. Faith Has Its Reasons. NavPress, 2001; Cowan, S., ed. Five Views of Apologetics. Zondervan, 2000; Frame, J. Apologetics to the Glory of God. P&R, 1994; idem. Cornelius Van Til. P&R, 1995; idem. Doctrine of God. P&R, 2002; idem. Doctrine of the Knowledge of God. P&R, 1987; Kim, E. H. “Biblical Preaching Is Apologia: An Analysis of the Apologetic Nature of Preaching in Light of Perspectivalism.” D.Min. project, Westminster Theological Seminary (CA), 2000; Van Til, C. Introduction to Systematic Theology. P&R, 1962.

John M. Frame

Apology     See Apologetics

Apostasy

Apostasy is a theological category describing those who have voluntarily and consciously abandoned their faith in the God of the covenant, who manifests himself most completely in Jesus Christ. As a category, it cuts across significant philosophical and theological ideas, including freedom of the will, the sovereignty of God, the perseverance of the saints, the relationship of faith and works, eternal security and assurance, as well as how one understands the nature of genuine faith. Christian theologians, since Augustine but also even more intensely since John Calvin and Martin Luther, have vigorously disputed not so much the reality of apostasy as the validity of the category for genuine believers (Pinnock). Apostasy, as Christians have understood it, pertains to the orientation of the heart, to moral behavior, and to theological orthodoxy (which technically is “heresy”). Furthermore, many theologians distinguish between “backsliding” (forgivable lapses of the believer) and “apostasy” (permanent, unforgivable lapses).

Apostasy in the OT

Analogous to, but not identical with, apostasy are the various cataclysmic sins of Adam and Eve (Gen. 3), Cain (ch. 4), Lot’s wife (19:15–29), Esau (25:29–34), and even Saul (1 Sam. 13) and Solomon (1 Kings 11). More significant, however, are (1) the sin of Israel in the wilderness, where Israel tests Yahweh and Yahweh disciplines Israel; and (2) the perpetual disobedience of Israel in the land, which leads to covenantal discipline in exile (e.g., Exod. 32; Num. 14; 25; Judges; 2 Kings 17; Ps. 78; Isa. 3:6–12). One of the fundamental themes of the prophets (e.g., Hosea; Isa. 1–39; Jeremiah) is the warning to turn (shuv) away from sin and back to covenantal fidelity. Those who fail to turn are deemed covenantal apostates (p 59). Forgiveness, however, remains the divine promise for those who do turn back to Yahweh (Hos. 1–2; 11:1–4).

Apostasy in the NT

The NT speaks of apostasy in numerous passages and under a variety of terms (e.g., Luke 22:22; 2 Thess. 2:3; 1 Tim. 4:1–3; 2 Tim. 4:10; Marshall). Jesus speaks of the “unforgivable” sin as blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:31–32), which is overt and conscious denunciation of the work of God’s Spirit in Jesus Christ (cf. Lev. 24:15–16). There are similar descriptions and attitudes found in Acts 13:8, 45; 14:2; 18:6; 19:13–16, and one might argue that the “sin that leads to death” (1 John 5:16–17) is another instance of apostasy, or perhaps an irrecoverable form of backsliding. Apostasy and sin (in general) are set in a powerful theological context by the apostle Paul; though he certainly counts sin as a tragedy in Christian existence, God’s eternally faithful grace and forgiveness continue to abide for those who are faithful (Rom. 8). Paul, however, clearly states the necessity of perseverance (Col.

1:21–23; Volf).

Early Christian thinking on apostasy receives a powerful statement in the Letter to the Hebrews, where warning passages punctuate the text with rhetorical potency (McKnight). In each warning passage, we find (1) the subjects or audience in danger of committing the sin, (2) the sin that leads to (3) the exhortation, which if not followed, leads to (4) the consequences of that sin. These passages are 2:1–4; 3:7–4:13; 5:11–6:12; 10:19–39; 12:1–29. In brief, they have several elements: (1) The subjects appear to be believers. (2) The sin is apostasy, understood as deliberate and public refusal to submit to God and his will for persons in Jesus Christ. (3) The exhortation is to repent and to follow faithfully and obediently. And (4) the consequence for apostasy is eternal punishment.

Apostasy in the Practice of Theological Interpretation

Because apostasy is disputed among Christian theologians, it must be recognized that one's overall hermeneutic and theology (including one's general philosophical orientation) shapes how one reads texts dealing with apostasy. One set of theologians understands apostasy as sinful behaviors of a permanent nature that only nonbelievers or those who are on the edge of saving faith can commit (Ortlund; Schreiner and Ware). Another set believes the biblical evidence sets forth the case that some genuine believers can repudiate their faith and jeopardize their standing before God.

Apostasy candidly recognizes the responsibility of humans before the covenant God: humans are created by God in his image, are fallen, but can also be reconciled by faith to that Creator-covenant God through his gracious act of forming a covenant with them. Without ever suggesting that obedience must be perfect, apostasy warns that the covenant member has an obligation to live within its terms. Such responsibility is framed by a biblical theology of grace, sin, justice, and final judgment. Humans who violently and voluntarily violate the terms of the covenant are in danger of final judgment. Again, however, this responsibility is not about perfection (which the Day of Atonement and the offer of forgiveness completely deny) but about the pattern of life: covenant members who fail to live responsibly are in danger.

Most importantly, apostasy is theo-fugal. Apostasy is neither casual sin, nor even a specifically violent sin (e.g., murder, adultery, etc.). Instead, apostasy is settled and voluntary rejection of God's will: it is a departure from the Fatherhood of God. Apostasy is not about violating civil or moral law (though it probably involves such behaviors) but about repudiating the lordship of God (Heb. 3:12) over the life of a person living in a relation to God through the covenant that God has made in Jesus Christ. This leads to the idea that apostasy is not only theo-fugal but also Christo-fugal—it is a departure from Jesus Christ, the agent of salvation (Heb. 6:4–6). We can go further: the statement of Jesus about blasphemy reveals that apostasy is also Pneuma-fugal: it is departure from the Holy Spirit, the very source of life and sanctification (Matt. 12:31–32).

Yet, it needs to be noted that apostasy is compatible with God's sovereignty and election. Apostasy does not somehow threaten God's sovereign will (as if the apostate successfully resists what God is fighting for; cf. Cottrell; Craig). It is within God's will, somehow within God's covenantal plan of redemption, for the covenant person to carry responsibility for his or her life before God. Furthermore, within the biblical notion of election (e.g., Rom. 8; 1 Pet. 2:9–10) there is an understanding that those elected by God are called to perseverance and obedience. If the “elect” repudiate God's sovereign claim on life, that election is shown to be compatible with apostasy.

(p 60)How so? Election, to begin with, must be defined in its biblical, rather than modern English, sense. Thus, it needs to be understood as an expression of God's preemptive and sustaining grace that is sufficient both to rescue his people from sin and sustain them in a life of obedience. “Sufficient” should not be understood to mean “inevitable.” Some argue that election itself is only an election of Christ, and that all who are in him become the elect by virtue of his election (but only in that relationship to him; Shank; Forster and Marston). Thus, apostasy as a category must be given a voice in determining what “election” means. Election does not rule out apostasy, nor does apostasy make light of God's sovereign election.

Pastorally, apostasy needs to be muted by the sufficiency of God's work in Christ and through his Spirit while it is held up as a rare, but real, possibility. Apostasy ought not to be used as a continual threat so much as an occasional warning of the disaster that Christians may bring upon themselves if they do not examine themselves. As a warning, apostasy can function as a moral injunction that strengthens commitment to holiness as well as the need to turn in complete trust to God in Christ through his Spirit. It needs to be remembered that God's grace is sufficient to sustain his own (Jude 24).

See also Assurance; Covenant

Bibliography

Cottrell, J. “The Nature of the Divine Sovereignty.” Pages 97–119 in The Grace of God, the Will of Man, ed. C. Pinnock. Zondervan, 1989; Craig,

W. "Middle Knowledge: A Calvinist-Arminian Rapprochement?" Pages 141–64 in The Grace of God, the Will of Man, ed. C. Pinnock. Zondervan, 1989; Forster, R., and V. Marston. God's Strategy in Human History. Tyndale, 1973; Gundry-Volf, J. Paul and Perseverance. Westminster John Knox, 1990; Marshall, I. H. Kept by the Power of God. Bethany, 1969; McKnight, S. "The Warning Passages of Hebrews: A Formal Analysis and Theological Conclusions." TJ 13 (1992): 21–59; Ortlund, R., Jr. "Apostasy." Pages 383–86 in New Dictionary of Biblical Theology. InterVarsity, 2000; Pinnock, C. "From Augustine to Arminius: A Pilgrimage in Theology." Pages 15–30 in The Grace of God, the Will of Man, ed. C. Pinnock. Zondervan, 1989; Schreiner, T., and B. Ware, eds. Biblical and Practical Perspectives on Calvinism. Vol. 1 of The Grace of God, the Bondage of the Will. Baker, 1995; Shank, R. Elect in the Son. Westcott, 1970.

Scot McKnight

Aquinas, St. Thomas      See Thomas Aquinas

Archaeology

In the nineteenth century the discovery of ancient Egyptian and Assyrian monuments and inscriptions with occasional references to events also mentioned in the Bible led to an expectation that more could be found in the biblical lands, which some hoped would "verify" the Scriptures in the face of biblical criticism. Throughout the twentieth century, excavations in the Near East have added enormously to the wealth of material found by the Victorian pioneers. Most discoveries have no direct relevance to the Bible; though bringing more details to knowledge of the ancient world, many offer general information about the background of the biblical writings, and some aid interpretation more specifically. Obviously, ancient texts tend to give the most precise help. The reader of any book written in a different age or environment from his or her own is likely to face concepts that are strange, hard to understand, or even appear incredible.

The OT

Only acquaintance with the context in which a work was composed can lead to a sensible explanation of it, and this is where archaeology helps to interpret the OT. Its contribution can be divided into four areas: (1) historical background; (2) historical complements; (3) cultural analogies; (4) cultural correlations.

Historical Background. While the biblical writings and Greek and Latin authors preserved some facts and traditions about Assyria, Babylonia, Egypt, and Persia, recovery of original documents and artifacts has enabled extensive histories of those powers to be written, revealing the kingdoms of the Hittites, the Aramaeans, and other neighbors of ancient Israel. The varying periods of strength and weakness enjoyed by the great powers on the Tigris, Euphrates, and Nile over more than two millennia provide the setting for OT history, while briefer spells of glory enjoyed by lesser monarchies are analogous to Israel's.

By Abraham's time, ca. 2000 BCE, urban civilization, with written records, was over a thousand years old. The accounts of the patriarch and his descendants fit well with the Middle Bronze Age period in the Levant, when abandoned cities were refounded and Egypt was making its strength felt in the area. People were moving, or being moved, from there into Egypt, and they eventually seized control as the Hyksos rulers. The Egyptian New Kingdom provides the setting for Moses and the exodus, with its power in Canaan declining (p 61) during the twelfth century BCE as Israel took over the promised land. The half century or so of the Israelite empire under David and Solomon can be understood once the weakness of Egypt and Assyria at the time is recognized. Then the aggressive new regime in Damascus, followed by resurgent Assyrian forces pushing westward, reduced Israel to a local state and ultimately to incorporation in the Assyrian provincial system (720 BCE). Judah survived until Nebuchadnezzar sacked rebellious Jerusalem in 586 BCE. The "live and let live" policy of Persian kings enabled the Jews to reestablish their center in Jerusalem, within the imperial administrative system. Understanding political events through the centuries aids interpretation of Israel's history and of many prophecies involving other nations; plus, the biblical explanations of events in theological terms gain added perspective.

Historical Complements. Reports composed to glorify Assyrian kings in particular complement the biblical records in especially valuable ways. First, they name kings of Israel and Judah in the same chronological sequence as the Bible, relating some to the same episodes, sometimes to episodes additional to the biblical narratives. Thus, they testify independently to the reliability of the biblical texts and the opposing side's view of events. Second, the Assyrian texts usually supply exact dates, enabling the chronology of the kings of Israel and Judah to be established in terms of world history, something impossible from the biblical texts alone. Later, the Babylonian Chronicle places Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Jerusalem in 597 BCE, on March 15/16, and offers other entries clarifying events in the last decades of Judah's life and in the career of Jeremiah. Persian history affords similar illumination for the postexilic period. Earlier than Assyria's first contact with Israel, in Ahab's reign, was Pharaoh Shishak's visit, ca. 925 BCE. His list of places visited on his campaign, although incomplete, expands the report of 1 Kings 14:25–26 (see Kitchen 293–300, 432–47, 575, 587). Few historical records have been recovered from Syria-Palestine, and only one certainly reflects a biblical text. That is the Moabite Stone on which Mesha celebrates his conquest of towns held by Gad in Transjordan about 830 BCE (2 Kings 3:4–27; Num. 32; Smelik in CoS 2:137–38).

Cultural Analogies. As noted above, when Israel came into being, major cultures were already ancient; she did not, therefore, have to build her culture from nothing. In fact, excavations show that the towns and villages of the monarchy were similar to those of adjacent realms in architecture, masonry, metalwork, and pottery, and so also in economy and lifestyle. Although in the second millennium BCE Babylonian cuneiform script was widely used, with Egyptian hieroglyphic and hieratic current in the Levant, by 1000 BCE, the alphabet was fully formed and replaced those systems there. Being simpler and easier to use, it may have spread more widely through society; but since most documents were written on papyrus or leather, they have perished. Nevertheless, the evidence of scanty texts and situations elsewhere suffices to show that books could have circulated throughout the monarchy period (Millard, “Books”).

Israel occupied its promised land as ironworking began to be developed in the Near East. That is well reflected in the Canaanites’ fearsome war machine, “iron chariots,” presumably chariots armored with iron (Josh. 17:16–18; Judg. 1:19; 4:3; see Millard, “King Og’s Bed”), and in the armor and weapons of Goliath, wholly of bronze except for his spearhead (1 Sam. 17:5–7). No trace of the golden decorations of Solomon’s temple survives, and the description in 1 Kings 6 seems to make extravagant, exaggerated claims in asserting that the interior was plated with gold. Investigations into the use of gold sheeting in Egyptian temples demonstrate that this was an ancient practice, and Assyrian and Babylonian kings boast of similar pious donations; so Solomon’s activity can be comprehended as consistent with the expectations placed on wealthy monarchs.

Conceptual comparisons are helpful, too. In Mesha’s inscription (see above) Moab’s god Chemosh is “angry with his land” and so allowed Israel to dominate it, then relented and, says Mesha, “delivered me from all kings and let me have victory over all my enemies,” phraseology familiar from Judges (2:14; 2 Sam. 8:14; 22:18; etc.). In this and other ways, Hebrew writers commonly employed the ideas of their day.

Cultural Correlations. Discoveries with clear links to biblical texts are less common. One example is the finding of many carved ivory pieces in the palace precinct of Israelite Samaria. They had served as veneer and decoration on wooden furniture and can explain how the “ivory house” of Ahab should be understood (1 Kings 22:39). Amos (6:4) condemned such expensive and useless luxury, widely admired at the time and well attested in Assyrian palaces. At several sites, notably Lachish, heavy destruction can be dated to the Assyrian attack in Hezekiah’s reign, pictured in relief on the walls of Sennacherib’s palace at Nineveh, (p 62)described in his annals, and told in 2 Kings 18–19 (Ussishkin). Through archaeological discoveries in various countries of texts in languages closely akin to Hebrew, meanings of terms and expressions in the Bible are more precisely understood. Best known are the small stone weights marked with their value pim, by weight two-thirds of a shekel, so explaining the previously unintelligible word pim in 1 Sam. 13:21.

The NT

The history of NT times is well known from the works of Greek and Latin authors, so archaeology contributes less in this area than it does for the OT. Yet it can enlarge understanding of details, such as why the titles of Roman officials vary from city to city in Acts (Hemer, Acts). The historical geography of the NT has benefited from the definite location of ancient sites and thus of routes taken (notably Derbe; Hemer, Acts, 112) and from clarifying local allusions in the letters to the seven churches (Rev. 2–3; Hemer, Letters). Knowledge of the Jewish background has gained enormously through the recovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls. They not only open new windows on religious thought and practice (e.g., covenant concepts, eschatology; Schiffman and VanderKam), but also on the state of the Hebrew Scriptures, the reading and writing of other books in first-century Palestine. With other discoveries, they show a wider spread of literacy than often supposed (Millard, Reading). Greek papyri found dehydrated in Egypt from the mid-nineteenth century onward yield a continuing stream of examples of the common Greek language of the era (Koine), elucidating words and expressions throughout the NT (e.g., Heb. 11:1, faith as the “title-deeds”; the classic work remains Deissmann).

Cultural Correlations. Material remains offer cultural correlations similar to those for the OT. Large stone jars exemplify those at Cana (John 2:6), stone vessels being less susceptible to ritual impurity (Millard, Discoveries, 182–84). The criticism of large, showy phylacteries (Matt. 23:5) becomes intelligible in the light of first-century examples from Qumran less than one inch wide, which would be hardly visible when worn (Millard, Discoveries, 196–97). The numerous tombs around Jerusalem have features comparable with the description of Joseph of Arimathea’s tomb, making intelligible some of the details (e.g., the disciple bending to look in, John 20:5; Millard, Discoveries, 278–95). Phrases in Paul’s Letters become more vivid when their ancient connotations are recognized and the physical contexts perceived (e.g., metaphors from athletics, 1 Cor. 9:24–27). Especially significant are the Greek inscriptions forbidding Gentiles entry to the inner parts of Herod’s temple. They not only make plain the crime Paul allegedly committed there (Acts 21:28); they also anchor his picture of the dividing wall Christ has in reality abolished (Eph. 2:14).

Interpretation

Devout Christians and others have used archaeology to try to prove that the Bible is true (e.g., Marston; Keller), while some have claimed it proves the opposite (e.g., Thompson; Finkelstein and Silberman). Both approaches expect more of archaeology than it can yield, and neither takes a balanced attitude to the texts. As a theological work, the Bible cannot be proved by discovery of material remains, nor can they demonstrate it to be erroneous (unless they reveal an indisputable anachronism). Failure to find Canaanite cities destroyed by Joshua’s forces, or magnificent buildings erected by Solomon, cannot prove the reports wrong; there may be good reasons for the failure. Such problems arise through lack of evidence, which some scholars take to indicate that biblical assertions are wrong. However, further research has often vindicated the biblical writers (e.g., Belshazzar was considered a fictional figure until inscriptions naming him proved the contrary; the royal letters in Ezra have often been deemed Jewish concoctions, yet original imperial decrees of Persian rulers display comparable attitudes toward local cults).

The Distinctiveness of God’s People

In the realm of religion, archaeology helps to clarify the distinction between Israel’s faith and her neighbors’ beliefs. Texts from the Late Bronze Age provide instructions for rituals and lists of sacrifices (notably at Emar on the mid-Euphrates: Fleming in CoS 1:427–43; and at Ugarit: Pardee in CoS 1:295–302). They include practices like those in Israelite ritual laws, but directed to a variety of deities. Stone, metal, and pottery figures represent those gods, while texts reveal the extent and problems of polytheism (heavenly quarrels, inconsistent and amoral behavior), emphasizing the distinct nature of Israel’s monotheism. Ancient cultures continuously struggled to understand their divinities and their wishes, in contrast to the revelations of divine purpose given in the Hebrew Bible. It was in its faith, archaeology demonstrates, that Israel was unique. As ancient Israel differed little in material matters from its neighbors and held many attitudes in common (p 63) with them, so Jesus and his followers shared the cultures of their contemporaries. In both cases the differences lay in the largely intangible spiritual and moral tenets, which are not bound by time or place.

Bibliography

Deissmann, A. Light from the Ancient East. Hodder & Stoughton, 1927; Finkelstein, I., and N. A. Silberman. The Bible Unearthed. Free Press, 2001; Hemer, C. The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History. Mohr, 1989; idem. The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia in Their Local Setting. Sheffield Academic Press, 1986; Keller, W. The Bible as History. Rev. ed. Lion Publishing, 1991; Kitchen, K. A. The Third Intermediate Period in Egypt 1100–650 BC. 2d ed. with supplement. Aris & Phillips, 1996; Marston, C. The Bible Is True. Eyre & Spottiswoode, 1934; Millard, A. “Books in Ancient Israel.” Palestine Exploration Quarterly. Forthcoming; idem. Discoveries from Bible Times. Lion Publishing, 1997 = Nelson’s Illustrated Wonders and Discoveries of the Bible. T. Nelson, 1997; idem. “King Og’s Bed and Other Ancient Ironmongery.” Pages 481–91 in Ascribe to the Lord, ed. L. Eslinger and G. Taylor. Sheffield Academic Press, 1988; idem. Reading and Writing in the Time of Jesus. Sheffield Academic Press/Continuum and New York University Press, 2000; Schiffman, L. H., and J. C. VanderKam, eds. Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls. Oxford University Press, 2000; Thompson, T. L. The Bible as History. Cape, 1999; Ussishkin, D. The Conquest of Lachish by Sennacherib. Institute of Archaeology, 1982.

Alan R. Millard

Argument    See Utterance Meaning

Art, the Bible and

The Bible itself is art, God-speaking literary art, booked under the Holy Spirit’s guidance by very differently skilled persons.

The Bible Charters Human Artistic Activity

The Bible charts human artistry indirectly by assuming that making art is a normal creaturely gift and responsibility in God’s world, like becoming married. Although some persons decide not to marry (Matt. 19:3–12; 1 Cor. 7:25–40), marriage is a room in creation provided by the Lord for the enrichment of a person’s life, and it is not to be depreciated (1 Tim. 4:1–5). Although not everyone may compose music, write novels, or craft pictures, God has provided us humans, says the Bible, with the ability to speak poems (Gen. 2:23), sculpt ornaments (Exod. 25:9–40), and sing songs (Pss. 33:1–3; 149–150), which can please the Lord and edify the neighbor. Imaginative construction of materials such as metals, wood, and fabrics into lampstands, cherubim statues, and festive clothing as God-honoring symbols can be bona fide, Holy-Spirited work (Exod. 31:1–11).

Older Testament. The Bible documents how, after humankind fell into sin with Eve and Adam’s disobedience toward God, artisans like everyone else—parents, political leaders, teachers, prophets—could be true to the way of the Lord or revel in the lies of pride, violence, and vanity. Lamech’s rhetoric was murderous boasting (Gen. 4:23–24); skyscraping Babel architecture was an idolatrous affront to the Lord (Gen. 11:1–9); and the special praise festivals God’s elect people frequently orchestrated stank in God’s nostrils (Amos 5:21–24; Isa. 1:10–20). Yet the Lord approved Miriam’s dance, choreographed with timbrels for the women of liberated Israel to perform on the banks of the Red Sea (Exod. 15:19–21). It was good of King David to set up a Levite guild of musicians and songwriters (1 Chron. 15:16–24). These, along with the poetry of Isaiah (40; 60–62) and Job (19; 28; 40–41), are incontrovertible evidence that God enjoys literary art.

God has no qualms about the visible, sensible character of artistry and its possible liturgical use. The Lord told Moses to sculpt a bronze snake and raise it up on a pole, so those bitten by vipers could look at it and receive God’s healing (Num. 21:4–9). Because the statue eventually became treated as a miracle-working relic, hundreds of years later Hezekiah finally had it destroyed (2 Kings 18:1–8). Art can be a costly offering that God apparently allows (1 Kings 5–6; 7:13–51). Yet King Solomon’s opulence and excessive attention to building his own fabulous palaces (1 Kings 7:1–12) signal that the excellent pagan Sidonian artisans hired for producing God’s temple fit into Solomon’s deteriorating wisdom, headed for luxury, militarism, national bankruptcy, and a lascivious idolatry (1 Kings 9–11). Prizing art—like the desire for knowledge (“philosophy”) (Gen. 3:1–7; 1 Cor. 1:20–25) and concern for political security (2 Sam. 24:1–10)—can be a temptation to sin as well as a test to exercise one’s faithfulness (Judg. 7:2–8; Prov. 1:2–6) in thanking the Lord for such marvelous capabilities (James 1:2–4).

The OT treats the weal and woe of art among God’s people and the surrounding nations throughout history. Nomadic tribal cultures have song rituals and tell stories (Num. 10:35–36; Judg. 9:7–20), but it takes a measure of education (e.g., Moses: Exod. 2:1–10; Acts 7:20–22; Heb. 11:23–26) and a sense of peoplehood to develop certain artistry (Exod. 15:1–18; Deut. 32:1–44). A corpus of repeatable Psalms, editing books of Proverbs (Prov. 25:1), composing literature like the Song (p 64) of Songs, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and the writings of Job and Ecclesiastes—all these take settled cultural capital and the differentiated institutionalization of professional composers and scribal schools to develop.

NT. The NT is prospecting, as it were, to form a new cultural community of believing Jew and Greek (Rom. 10:5–13; 1 Cor. 12:12–13; Gal. 3:23–29; Col. 3:5–11) amid a dominant Roman and Hellenistic pagan culture (John 18:28–40; Acts 17:16–34). Hence, it is focused more on the mission of converting unbelievers into the discipleship of realizing Jesus Christ as the promised Messiah and the Savior of all nations (Matt. 16:13–20; Rom. 9–11) than in dealing with artistic problems. However, the Bible is a single continuous and true narrative of the Lord God’s great deeds, and the NT also assumes the goodly presence of art and literature as a creaturely way to express human gratefulness to the Lord and to encourage one another on our journey to the eschaton.

The Eastern magi gave artistic valuables to baby Jesus and his parents as worship offerings (Matt. 2:7–12). Jesus defended the Mary who spilled precious perfume from an alabaster jar over his body in celebration of his ministry (Mark 14:3–9). It was normal for Jesus and his twelve apostles to sing a hymn after the Passover meal (Mark 14:22–26). According to the Bible, singing psalms and hymns, Spirit-filled songs, is redeeming one’s time (Eph. 5:15–20), and is part and parcel of the redemptive lifestyle (Col. 3:12–17). Through the educated apostle Paul (Acts 22:3), who was gifted by God’s Spirit to book the fervent tour de force of Rom. 1–8, God says: Do not speak in bland generalities, but season your speech with specific salty rhetoric (Col. 4:5–6). Remember, Jesus Christ was a consummate teller of parables, which are NT meshalim, a genuine metaphorical artistry of words.

From beginning to end the Bible is positive toward all things bright and beautiful, fascinating and strange. God saw everything God had made, and it all looked good (tov, kalos), says Gen. 1. Trees planted near running water, wild animals in jungles, birds nesting in shrubs, whales sporting in the oceans, precious stones hid deep in the earth (Pss. 1; 104; Job 28)—these are God’s treasure hunt, for us humans to discover and clothe with artful cultivation. Someday even the glorious art of the nations will be refined, purified, and brought into the city of God (Rev. 21:22–27). The fact that God surprises human expectation (Matt. 25:31–46) suggests that the saints on the new earth may come to enjoy art they had not noticed in their lifetime.

Art as Biblia Pauperum

Once followers of Jesus Christ became a dominant public church

institution, after the conversion to Christianity of Emperor Constantine (313 CE), art became a means to bring the Bible story to the many who could not read. Pope Gregory the Great (590–604) enunciated the stand on didactic art in the church environs, which despite occasional waves of iconoclasm became Roman Catholic Church policy for a millennium. The church would use images to teach Bible stories and trained singers to chant biblical texts in a regular lectionary way, thus reinforcing the OT and NT doctrines for the faithful to hear (in Latin).

Meanwhile, skilled monks who recopied parchment manuscripts of the Bible (especially from ca. 900 CE until movable type printing was invented ca. 1450) took time to decorate initial capital letters with fantastic curlicue tendrils. Sometimes these artists illuminated margins of the biblical text, using colorful tempera and gilding gold to portray flowers, monsters, and insects, out of sheer jubilation at the amazingly prolific glory of creatures God has created.

Recent Past History. When the Renaissance popes (Julius II, 1503–13; Leo X, 1513–17) had the resources to live like princes and begin building St. Peter’s Church in the Vatican in 1506, art by great painters in papal employ such as Raphael (1483–1520) and Michelangelo (1475–1564) tended to magnify and glorify the patrons (and the artists) more than present the simple gospel of the Bible. Nevertheless, the Bible still often provided the subject matter for the artwork. Art promoted later by the Council of Trent (1545–63) remained catechetical church art, but also mixed in adoration of saints, so that the Bible storytelling focus of quattrocento art mutated into broadly devotional art, inclining viewers to an ecclesiastical piety.

The Eastern (Greek and Russian) Orthodox Church, since the second ecumenical Council of Nicea (787), adopted icons as a special way to have “sacred” art parallel the Bible’s mediation of God’s word. Because Christ is the image of God (Col. 1:15–20; 2 Cor. 4:1–6), images honor the prototype original they are like. A consecrated painted image of Christ makes God’s incarnation as a visible human palpable. So the standardized, almost schematic icon figure simply focuses one’s rapt attention, acts as a window beckoning the viewer into the very presence of Christ, (p 65) and brings the invisible God veritably close to oneself. Just as the God-breathed Bible makes God’s will known to humans, so the Holy Spirit uses venerated icons such as sermons in paint to mediate grace: the holy icon serves believers like a sacrament. Art for the Orthodox Church is closely tied to a churchly presence.

In Europe the historic Reformation led by Luther (1483–1546), Calvin (1509–64), and others championed Bible reading and Bible

preaching (in the vernacular language) as the principal means of grace; the Bible had become neglected by the institutional church. Art, however, was viewed not as an instrument to be specially adopted by the institutional church, but as a human response to God's grace, for service in the world at large. So art became "unchurched" but was considered a marvelous conduit for believers' faith to be shared and imaginatively bodied forth in the public square.

Luther himself wrote new melodies with stanzaic pattern, so ordinary people could sing songs of faith at home, in school, and at church gatherings. Calvin persisted with poet Clement Marot and songwriters like Louis Bourgeois until there was a complete Genevan Psalter, so the Bible's praise and laments could be artistically voiced by God's people and heard by their enemies. Later Heinrich Schütz (1585–1672), Johann Sebastian Bach (1685–1750), and many other church musicians wrote cantatas and "passions" for choirs to sing at worship services, to highlight celebration of Bible passages bringing the gospel. But it was especially the mundane outreach of art into the nonchurch world that received impetus wherever the centrality of the Bible promulgated by the Reformers took hold.

Group portraits of businessmen fulfilling their nonchurch vocation (Rembrandt, Syndics of the Cloth Guild, 1662), spacious atmospheric landscapes filled with Ps. 19 glory (by Jan van Goyen and Jacob Ruisdael), scenes honoring domestic daily life (Vermeer's Cook [pouring milk], before 1660), and stunning bouquets of cut flowers with the memento mori of a dead bug (by Pieter Claeszoon)—all testify that in the 1600s Dutch artists were looking at God's world outside the church door and presenting imaginative artwork about it with a vision shaped by the Bible.

Current Problems and Opportunities. Since the Enlightenment, European art, like politics and philosophy, has become deeply secularized; the Bible has been largely privatized and downgraded to "a personal choice" rather than experienced as a culture-forming directive. There are, to be sure, still many outstanding artists, Jews and Christians, whose artwork bespeaks their communion with the Bible.

Throughout the world non-European people have been greatly influenced by Pentecostal Christian missionaries. Their Bible is mainly instruction for us to be saved from this world for heaven, rather than a source of light for redeeming historical acts and re-forming artistry to be a gift of joy and sorrow for believers' neighbors now. Many Bible-believing evangelical Christians today either see little connection between Bible and artistry or restrict art to what is functional for church liturgy, doctrinal beliefs, and devotional practice.

However, if one has a robust faith in the power of God the Holy Spirit to permeate culture—art, political policy, philosophical theory—with the directional message of the Bible, then one can appreciate how the Bible has suffused its light. It broke through, for example, in the novels of Alan Paton (1903–88), the cinematic oeuvre of Robert Bresson (1907–82), and the popular song of Bruce Cockburn (born 1945). The Bible often enters artistry as a leaven in ways one cannot clearly point to so much as taste in the artistic bread distributed (Luke 17:20–21; Matt. 13:33).

Bibliography

Bach, B., ed. Das Bild in der Bibel. Claudius, 1991; Chaplin, A., and H. Brand. Signposts for Christians in the Arts. 2d ed. InterVarsity, 2001; Drury, J. Painting the Word. Yale University Press, 1999; Luttikhuisen, H., and M. Bendroth, curators. The House of God. Calvin College Center Art Gallery, 8 January–13 February 2003; Morgan, D., ed. Icons of American Protestantism. Yale University Press, 1996; Panofsky, E. “Comment on Art and Reformation.” In Symbols in Transformation. Princeton University Press, 1969; Paulson, R. Book and Painting. University of Tennessee Press, 1982; Rookmaaker, H. The Complete Works, ed. Marleen Hengelaar-Rookmaaker. 6 vols. Piquant, 2002–; Seerveld, C. Bearing Fresh Olive Leaves. Piquant/Tuppence, 2000; idem. “Christian Aesthetic Bread for the World.” Philosophia Reformata 66 (2001): 155–77; idem. Rainbows for the Fallen World. Tuppence, 1980; Veith, G., Jr. The Gift of Art. InterVarsity, 1983; idem. State of the Arts. Crossway, 1991; Wolfe, G., ed. IMAGE. Quarterly. www.imagejournal.org.

Calvin Seerveld

Ascension

The comic cycle of descent and ascent is to epic narrative what proodos and epistrophē are to classical cosmology and psychology. Scripture knows little or nothing of the latter, naturally, though later allegorical and anagogical exegesis (such as (p 66) informs Augustine’s Confessions, e.g., or Dante’s Comedia) does. Of the former, however, Scripture already knows a great deal. Its narrative structure is characterized by cycles of descent and ascent, and is ultimately comic. It is the ascension of Jesus that makes it so, and as a resolution of these cycles the basic significance of Jesus’ ascension can in turn be grasped.

That being the case, the doctrine of the ascension ought itself to become an organizing principle for the reading of Scripture, even before appeal is made to patristic or medieval exegetical hierarchies. The same conclusion can be reached from consideration of the primitive confession “Jesus is Lord.” For in pointing to the culmination of biblical history and all the aspirations of the people of God, that confession offers itself as a universal hermeneutic of the Scriptures. And it is precisely, in the first instance, a confession of Jesus' ascension (cf., e.g., Phil. 2:9; Acts 2:34; Heb. 1:3).

Our first task, then, is to approach the doctrine of the ascension from the standpoint of Scripture, while our second task is to approach Scripture and tradition from the standpoint of the doctrine of the ascension. Obviously, these cannot be strictly sequential activities; they must overlap. Nor can they be pursued successfully in a short space. All that can be done here is to provide a bit more detail about the ascension as a biblical motif, and about the deployment of the doctrine of the ascension.

As Biblical Motif

Irenaeus reminds us that the Word of God has descended and ascended from the beginning of human history, to draw humanity into a life-giving conversation with God. The Bible offers an account of this descent and ascent, and of the corresponding movements of mankind, especially of the covenant people. From the mountain garden of God to the deserts east of Eden; from Ararat to the plains of Shinar, where the great tower was built; from Mt. Sinai to the wilderness wanderings; from Zion to Babylon—the biblical story is one of invitations to communion with God and declensions from that communion. The biblical landscape, in other words, is full of peaks and valleys, of ascents and descents, literally as well as figuratively, historically as well as liturgically. The Prophets and the Psalms (including the songs of ascent) integrate the Edenic aspirations of the people of God with the geography of Zion, the temple liturgy, the spirituality of covenant life, and geopolitics. Psalm 24, for example, becomes a cipher for the whole biblical vision, Dan. 7 for the full sweep of redemption history.

We are not surprised to encounter, then, at the climax of the gospel story and “the mystery of godliness” (1 Tim. 3:16), the ascension of Jesus into heaven. Here is the “one like a son of man, coming with the clouds of heaven,” who approaches the Ancient of Days and is “led into his presence” (Dan. 7:13). Each of the evangelists has his own way of presenting this event, but none overlooks it, for it would be impossible to tell the story of Jesus as part of the story of Israel, or the story of God's universal redemptive purposes, without giving some account of Jesus' ascension. That the ascension, as an event distinct from the resurrection, is often said today to be a Lukan invention represents a mistake in theological interpretation that truncates the story of Jesus and makes difficult any attempt to carry it through to the parousia (Acts 1:9–11). It also makes it difficult to interpret either the church or the world in the eschatological situation of the present age, marked as it is by the tension between the presence and the absence of the ascended Jesus—a point to which we will return.

The NT employs a variety of imagery and allusions in presenting the ascension, each of which contributes something to its theological richness. Individual histories in the OT are taken up typologically: Moses (especially in Matthew); Aaron, Elijah, and David (especially in Luke); Melchizedek (especially in Hebrews, John, and the Apocalypse); and of course Daniel’s visionary “son of man” (throughout and especially in Paul). But no single office or image or forerunner provides a paradigm that is fully adequate. Hence, allusions generally come in complex bundles. No one but Jesus, in whose personal history all these others coalesce, can bring to a resolution the cycle of ascent and descent that characterizes fallen humanity. No one but Jesus can complete the victory of God over the nations (cf. Pss. 2, 47, 110) or bring humanity into the very presence of God. No one but Jesus, that is, can mediate eternal life.

Irenaeus, one of the Bible’s most theologically astute readers, captures something of the vitality and reach of the ascension motif. He views it from the perspective of Pentecost (cf. John 20:17–23; Acts 2:33–36) and sets it in the cosmic context of Gen. 1–3 (cf. Eph. 4:7–10; Heb. 1:1–14). The ascension of Jesus marks the completion of the divine act of creating humanity in the image of God, through full investiture with the Holy Spirit, thus fitting humans for an eternally refreshing (p 67) converse with the Father and for stewardship of the renovated cosmos. Through his own U-shaped history (baptism, death, resurrection, and ascension) Jesus recapitulates the entire experience of fallen man and restores the gift of the Spirit, who becomes “our ladder of ascent to God” and to immortality (Haer. 3.24.1; cf. 3.17ff.; 4.20; 5.20.2; 5.36). At the parousia the results of this recapitulation will be revealed. Meanwhile the church, as the community of the Spirit, participates eucharistically and through martyrdom in the ministry of Jesus (Haer. 4.18; 5.2.3; 5.28.4; cf. John 6:35–66).

As Doctrine and Hermeneutic

The doctrine of the ascension, if anthropological in the sense just stated, is also political, liturgical, cosmic, and spiritual. In each of these dimensions it is—or ought to be—not only an ecclesial doctrine but also an ecclesiological one. And in each of these ways it can teach us to appropriate Scripture more deeply.

The political is developed in connection with the confession of Jesus as Lord. The lordship of the ascended Messiah means that, not only the people of God, but also all powers in heaven and on earth are subjected to him. This means in turn that Caesar can no longer claim lordship over the peoples of the earth except in some limited sense as a temporary steward of justice and good order (cf. Acts 4; Rom. 13; 1 Pet. 3:13–22; etc.). The Son of Man, not Caesar or his equivalent, is the supreme pantocrator. It is vital, however, to recognize that the exercise of his rule, openly declared by and through the church (Eph. 3:10), nonetheless appears on earth during the saeculum in the same paradoxical form as it did on the cross. It is the burden of the Apocalypse, in particular, to make this clear. Special sight is required to see the power of the ascended Melchizedekian Christ (Rev. 1:9–20; cf. Acts 7:56), and a special vocation—martyrdom—is required to exercise that power effectively (Rev. 7; 14; cf. 11:11–13; 20:4–6). It is always tempting to overlook this qualification, especially in periods when martyrdom is in decline. But perhaps it is equally tempting, at least in the modern context, to overlook the basic political claim as such. (Oliver O’Donovan presents a recent attempt to recover that claim, through a theological interpretation of Scripture.)

The liturgical also appears in the Apocalypse, where the blood of the saints shed on earth is a witness to the blood of Christ presented before God in the holy of holies (Rev. 4–19). So does the cosmic, for cosmic renovation is the ultimate consequence of that liturgy (Rev. 20–22; cf. Col. 1). The liturgical and the cosmic likewise come together in Hebrews, as the true backdrop against which political decisions are to be made. Hebrews is structured rhetorically around the Pentecost lections and an invitation to the church to “draw near” to the divine throne on which the ascended Christ has been seated as Priest-King (cf. Heb. 4:16; 8:1–7; 10:19–25; 12:25–29). Later on, with the abatement of political urgency, the liturgical and the cosmic are expressed more optimistically in terms of “the marriage of heaven and earth,” which in patristic homilies is especially celebrated in connection with Ascension Day. This becomes the theme of several of Christianity’s great theological, liturgical, and architectural structures (witness, for example, the Orthodox liturgies influenced by Pseudo-Dionysius; or, in the West, the building of the St. Denis basilica). Permutations here have much influenced the way in which the Scriptures have been read and understood, as the latter are drawn into the orbit of particular liturgical and cosmological visions, whether more or less distant from those of the biblical authors themselves. Needless to say, not all of these readings are compatible or equally felicitous in their effects.

The spiritual dimension of the doctrine cannot be detached from the other dimensions mentioned if, as Scripture and tradition teach, Jesus' ascension was a bodily event (cf. Acts 1:9–11; Irenaeus, Haer. 1.10.1; Gregory of Nazianzus, Ep. ad Cled.). Nevertheless, we must speak also of its relevance to the inner life of the soul: from the corporate context of the sursum corda, to personal prayer and the practice of piety, to private meditation and pursuit of the visio Dei. Paul points us to all of this, though not only to this, in Col. 3:1–3: “Seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God” (RSV). On such passages Origen and Augustine and their respective followers provide many centuries of glosses, often in the vein of Christian Neoplatonism, though other kinds of glosses can be found as well. It may be in this way that the doctrine of the ascension has had the most direct bearing on interpretation of the Bible. For the soul, as it advances toward God, is said to have insight into the Scriptures unavailable to less-refined souls. A hierarchy of meanings thus appears to it in keeping with its advance; grosser interpretations are stripped away along with this-worldly vanities (cf. Origen, Princ. 4.2.9).

(p 68) Though there is most certainly some truth to this Origenist principle, it has its dangers. In the modern context it has been reformulated by Immanuel Kant in Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone (bk. 3). Here one may do with the Scriptures what one pleases, if operating on the premises of the Enlightenment and pursuing the course of progress—that is, the putative historical or general ascent of man. This Kantian understanding of the spiritual sense of Scripture may well relieve us of any embarrassing difficulty over the miraculous nature of the ascension. But it also relieves us of most of the traditional wealth of this doctrine, and of its power to confront our own age with the challenge of Jesus' lordship. At the same time, it relieves the church of its obligation to point to the absence of the ascended Christ as well as to persist in the sacramental embodiment of his presence—to bear witness quite concretely to his impending parousia.

Bibliography

Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Vol. IV/2. T&T Clark, 1958; Davies, J. G. He Ascended into Heaven. Association, 1958; Dawson, G. S. Jesus Ascended. P&R, 2003; Farrow, D. Ascension and Ecclesia. T&T Clark, 1999; Kierkegaard, S. Practice in Christianity. Princeton University Press, 1991; Lohfink, G. Die Himmelfahrt Jesu. Kösel, 1971; Marreeve, W. H. The Ascension of Christ in the Works of St. Augustine. Saint Paul University, 1967; Milligan, W. The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of Our Lord. Macmillan, 1892; O'Donovan, O. The Desire of the Nations. Cambridge University Press, 1996; Parsons, M. C. The Departure of Jesus in Luke-Acts. JSOT, 1987; Torrance, T. Space, Time, and Resurrection.

Asian Biblical Interpretation

During the last few decades some Asian theologians have actively engaged in searching for Asian elements in biblical hermeneutics. This article surveys some issues in Asian biblical hermeneutics, and reflects from within the Asian context on the ways the discourse has developed.

Asian Perspectives

In the Asian approach to the Bible, we can identify four stances. Asian theologians have read the Bible from the contextual, pluralist, postcolonial, and religious perspectives.

Contextual Perspective. Asian theologians brought their contextual concerns to the reading of the Bible. Bringing the contextual concerns to the biblical text and excavating themes that would illuminate the distorted historical realities in Asia have been encouraged by the hermeneutical initiative of liberation theologies in Latin America. In Korea, theologians who experienced economic exploitation and political oppression came to interpret the Bible from the minjung (the poor and oppressed people) perspective. They eventually developed the minjung theology. In Japan, the harsh reality of the burakumin people (the defiled indigenous group and the tribals) was used as a hermeneutical lens to focus light from the Bible. Similarly in India, we saw the emergence of the dalit (the untouchables outside the caste system) theology, interpreting the Bible from the perspective of dalit people. Various other contextual concerns have been brought to interact with the Bible: women, nation building, unification, coexistence with other religious neighbors, social justice, poverty, liberation, and many others.

Pluralist Perspective. Moving beyond the contextual concerns, a few Asian theologians have attempted to bring a pluralist perspective in interpreting the Bible. They accept the cultural-religious texts and stories in Asia as authoritative sources on equal footing with the Bible. In their interaction with the Bible, those Asian theologians using the pluralist perspective seek to juxtapose the Bible (text A) with the Asian sources (text B) for mutual correction and mutual enrichment. Archie C. C. Lee, who is on the front line in advertising this pluralist approach, calls it a “cross-textual” hermeneutics. This cross-textual reading is a new experiment in Asian hermeneutical discourse, though for some time Asian Christians have circulated the idea that the Asian religious traditions and Christianity converge. Archie Lee defines this new adventure in the following way: “A cross-cultural approach aims at going beyond comparative studies and interfaith dialogue. It is a way to do theology which is meaningful to Asian Christians and theologians who have both the identity of being Asian as well as being Christian and who value both their cultural-religious text and the biblical text” (“Biblical”). Asian theologians who propose story theology as an Asian way also espouse the reading of the Bible side by side with the Asian cultural-religious stories/texts.

Postcolonial Perspective. A few Asian theologians have been active in using postcolonial discourse in biblical interpretation. In a nutshell, the postcolonial reading brings the following two hermeneutical perspectives. (1) The postcolonial reading exercises the hermeneutics of suspicion on the texts used to justify the colonial powers. (2) The postcolonial reading pays primary attention to the voices of the colonized and marginalized (p 69) in the biblical text. We cannot say that the postcolonial reading of the Bible is a unique Asian contribution in the discourse of biblical hermeneutics. But we may have to recognize how, in line with the pluralist approach, it suggests that “other” religious texts that were once suppressed by the colonial power are to be valued equally with the Bible. Kwok Pui-Lan and R. S. Sugirtharajah are on the front line in advertising the postcolonial reading of the Bible.

Religious Perspective. In the Asian circle of biblical hermeneutics, another proposal is to approach the Bible with a religious perspective. This hermeneutical stance attempts to overcome the limits of the much-criticized historical-critical approach, and to read the Bible for awakening, embodying, and transforming the reading subject. Moonjang Lee suggests that readers explore alternatives to the current approaches to the Bible. He points out that the traditional Western approaches tend to be academic and detached, focusing on extracting “themes from the text that can be explained logically and supported factually.” The traditional Asian approaches to sacred texts, according to Lee, are more practically engaged and focus on personal transformation, internalizing the messages of the text that are to be grasped intuitively. What Lee is suggesting is a reorientation in the way readers approach the Bible. A reader should approach the Bible as a religious text with the goal to grasp the wisdom and principles that can be perceived. As long as this reorientation of the hermeneutical goal is safeguarded, Asian readers can be open to the various critical reading methods.

Issues in Asian Biblical Hermeneutics

Scriptural Authority. The issue of biblical authority has been the subject of much debate in the West. Most Asian theologians involved in the discourse of Asian biblical hermeneutics readily accept the critical view of the Bible as a book that contains conflicting ideological traditions—the tradition of the oppressors and the tradition of the oppressed. Consequently, Asian theologians do not accept the authority of the whole Bible. Minjung theologians in Korea regard the Bible as one of the reference books that show aspects of minjung movements in particular socioeconomic situations in the past.

Asian theologians have added one more ingredient in relativizing scriptural authority by referring to the multiscriptural environment in Asia. The gist of their argument is that the authority of the Bible is hard to maintain because the Bible is just one of the sacred scriptures in Asia. The superior status of the Bible in relation to other authoritative scriptures of Asian religions is to be rejected. The following remark by Archie Lee well expresses the so-called new awareness: “The encounter between the biblical text and the religiosity and spirituality expressed in the sacred texts of the living faiths of Asia will re-address the whole question of scriptural authority and absolute truth claims of the Christian faith” (“Biblical”). Other Asian theologians—such as Stanley Samartha, R. S. Sugirtharajah, Kwok Pui-Lan, C. S. Song, and Wesley Ariarajah—strongly endorse the attempt to relativize the authority of the Bible.

There seems to be a legitimate call to rediscover the Bible in the multiscriptural reality in Asia. However, its implications do not seem to have been fully digested by those theologians. A few observations can be made. (1) Every Asian theologian is well aware not only of the existence of the sacred texts in respective religious traditions in Asia, but also of their place within the respective faith community. The sacred texts are given due respect. (2) The sacred texts remain normative for adherents of the respective faith community. Samartha had to admit that the Bible is normative for Christians as other sacred books are normative to their respective adherents: “The Bible remains normative for all Christians in all spaces and at all times, because it bears witness to God’s dealings with the whole world and to Jesus Christ, his life and death, and resurrection, his deeds and teachings, thus providing the basis for Christian theological reflection.” Within the Christian faith community, the Bible is not seen as “one among many references in the search for truth.” The attempt to relativize scriptural authority in the Asian hermeneutical discourse does not seem to be successful because traditional understanding of sacred books in Asia would safeguard the biblical authority within the Christian faith community. In this sense the Asian critique of scriptural authority fails to reflect the Asian religious ethos.

Use of Asian Cultural-Religious Stories. Another major issue in Asian biblical hermeneutics is the use of Asian resources. Some Asian theologians have proposed to juxtapose the Bible with other Asian resources. Their hermeneutical stance can be summarized as follows. (1) The Creator God has always been present in the Asian history, cultures, and religions. (2) Asian cultures and religions have equal status with the Bible, which cannot be regarded as the only reference (p 70) in the search for the truth. (3) Therefore, Christians should be “open to different religious and cultural insights in the matter of interpreting the texts” (Samartha).

Archie Lee suggests cross-textual hermeneutics as the most appropriate approach to the Bible in Asia. He holds that cross-textual hermeneutics would solve what he calls the dilemma of Asian biblical interpretation, and urges us to accept the Asian cultural and religious text (text B) along with the biblical text (text A). The hermeneutical task in Asia necessarily includes two sides: “On the one hand, [cross-textual hermeneutics] affirms the cultural-historical point of view in order to understand its form and setting-in-life. The text is then applied to and interpreted in contemporary context. It is assumed that the text can enlighten our context. On the other hand, our Asian perspectives must also be brought in to shed light in the interpretation of biblical texts” (“Biblical,” 38). Drawing on these perceptions, Lee proposes a creative interpenetration between the gospel and the Asian cultural text as the guiding principle in cross-textual hermeneutics (“Cross-Textual”). Sugirtharajah also fully endorses this initiative by further insisting that “divers textual expressions of human-divine encounter” should be reflected in the interpretative process (“Bible”). He even calls it religious bigotry to claim the uniqueness and superiority of the Christian tradition over others.

This hermeneutical stance is intertwined with the idea of religious pluralism. We may need to have a detailed examination of the relevancy of religious pluralism in Asian biblical hermeneutics to assess this proposal. That task would go beyond the scope of this article. Yet the following comments place their proposal in context. (1) Asian Christians have lived in a multireligious and multicultural milieu for centuries, but their experience of religious plurality needs to be correctly described. In Asia, each religion is a comprehensive system to perceive humanity, nature, and the universe. Each has maintained its respective religious identity and faith community. Hinduism, Buddhism, and Confucianism have their unique religious identity and teachings. (2) An Asian identity by culture must be differentiated from an Asian identity by commitment and allegiance to a particular religion. Asians carry the traditional religious elements in their body, but a multiple simultaneous allegiance to various religions would be something alien to the experience of religious plurality in Asia. (3) The boundaries between faith communities are to be respected. To be a member of a particular faith community is to accept the authority of the religion's unique teachings. The popular religiosity of Asian people expects Christians, Buddhists, and Confucians to be faithful to their respective teachings. In this regard, it may not be plausible to advise the Buddhist scholars or monks to be consciously open to Christian insights while reading their Buddhist sacred books.

Asian Reading Method. In the Asian biblical hermeneutical circle, strange as it may sound, the search for an Asian reading method has been one of the areas least attempted. We saw an embryonic attempt in an Indian Jesuit theologian, George M. Soares-Prabhu. About three decades ago he suggested an Indian way of reading the Bible, reacting critically to historical criticism. Soares-Prabhu made two important observations. (1) The nature of the Bible as a religious text requires reading methods different from the historical-critical approaches. (2) The effectiveness of a method is judged by the hermeneutical concern or interest of the reader. He differentiated the academic interest to obtain exact information from personal transformation through response in faith. The reading method should be devised to suit the hermeneutical concern. Although Soares-Prabhu attempted to pioneer a new territory, we do not see any further development in that line. Though some Asian theologians referred to the existence of hermeneutical traditions in Asia, they did not explore further, to work out ways to employ them in biblical interpretation. More recently, Moonjang Lee proposed to read the Bible in a postcritical way as a religious text and to develop an academic reading of the Bible in Asian ways. But still the traditional reading methods in Asia were not fully appropriated and incorporated in biblical hermeneutics.

Conclusion

Asian biblical hermeneutics are still in the making and challenge Asian Christians to be more creative and original in approaching the Bible. In approaching the Bible with multiple perspectives, Asian readers can have a dialogical partnership with Western readers. In the discourse of biblical hermeneutics, the uniquely Asian contribution will be found in the way(s) in which the traditional reading practices in Asia are appropriated and incorporated in exegeting and perceiving the messages of the Bible.

(p 71)Bibliography

Ariarajah, W. The Bible and People of Other Faiths. WCC, 1989; Lan, K. P. Discovering the Bible in the Non-Biblical World. Orbis, 1995; Lee, A. C. C. "Biblical Interpretation in Asian Perspective." AJT 7, no. 1 (1993): 35–39; idem. "Cross-Textual Hermeneutics on Gospel and Culture." AJT 10, no. 1 (1996): 38–48; Lee, M. "A Post-Critical Reading of the Bible as a Religious Text." AJT 14, no. 2 (2000): 272–85; Samartha, S. J. One Christ—Many Religions. Orbis, 1991; Soares-Prabhu, G. "Towards an Indian Interpretation of the Bible." Biblehashyam 6 (1980): 151–70; Sugirtharajah, R. S. Asian Biblical Hermeneutics and Postcolonialism. Orbis, 1998; idem. "The Bible and Its Asian Readers." BibInt 1, no. 1 (1993): 54–66; idem. The Bible and the Third World. Cambridge University Press, 2001; idem, ed. Vernacular Hermeneutics. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999.

Moonjang Lee

Assurance

Assurance is often limited to subjective feelings of security before God, but if we are to understand assurance in a biblical theology framework, it must be placed on the larger canvas of God's redemptive historical purpose.

Based upon God's Promise

Assurance is rooted in God's saving promise, beginning with the protevangelium, the pledge of victory over the seed of the serpent in Gen. 3:15. The initial promise is then fleshed out in Yahweh's covenants with Abraham, Israel at Sinai, David, and the new covenant. We must grasp the thread of the story line that informs Yahweh's covenant with Israel. The Lord has promised to redeem his people, and indeed the whole world, through the seed of Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3; cf. Gal. 3:16). The blessing promised to Abraham is fulfilled in the gospel of Christ (Acts 3:19–26; Gal. 3:6–9). The covenantal promises all point to the apostolic gospel (Rom. 1:2–4; 16:25–26), which proclaims the crucified and risen Lord (Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 15:1–4). Hence, we are not surprised to read that all God's promises find their fulfillment in Christ (2 Cor. 1:20). What Paul says relative to God's word to Israel is true of God's entire saving plan, "But it is not as though the word of God has failed" (Rom. 9:6 ESV).

The fundamental biblical teaching on assurance, therefore, is that believers should be full of confidence since God has promised to bless his people. That which God has pledged shall certainly be accomplished. Nothing can thwart his purposes in redemptive history. Believers can be assured that God will complete the good work that he has begun in them (Phil. 1:6). The love of God in Christ is so powerful that believers will never be severed from God's love (Rom. 8:35–39). God is faithful, and hence he will bring to pass what he has pledged in the lives of his people (1 Cor. 1:9; 10:13; 2 Cor. 1:18; 1 Thess. 5:24; 2 Thess. 3:3; 2 Tim. 2:13). Those whom God has foreknown and called will certainly be glorified on the last day (Rom. 8:28–30; cf. 1 Pet. 1:5). Further, it seems clear from Scripture that God desires his people to have confidence in their final salvation (John 5:24; Heb. 10:19–22; 1 John 3:2; 5:11–13). Still, the scriptural writers insist that assurance must focus on God's objective promises. Assurance does not come fundamentally from introspection, nor are believers summoned to reflect on their own capacity to endure. Assurance rests upon God's promises in Christ, clinging in faith to the work of Christ that secures salvation and brings us into God's presence.

Assurance and Warnings

Through most of its history the Christian church has been divided as to whether genuine believers will truly persevere. The debate centers particularly on the severe warnings in the NT that threaten judgment for those who apostatize (e.g., Rom. 11:22; Gal. 5:2–6; 2 Tim. 2:11–13; Heb. 6:4–8; 10:26–31). Furthermore, other texts refer to those who were part of the church and have since defected (e.g., 1 Tim. 1:18–20; 2 Tim. 4:10; 2 Pet. 2:19–22). Most agree that the problem is remarkably difficult and defies facile answers. Preserving the tension between assurance and warnings is necessary to be faithful to the biblical witness. If we abstract assurance from the warning passages, believers are prone to fall into lethargy and a false sense of spiritual security. If the warnings are sundered from assurance, believers may be overwhelmed by fear and doubt. The tension between these two sets of passages should be plotted against the background of NT eschatology, in which believers are already saved in this present evil age, but have not yet received the perfection promised.

Some have argued that apostasy is possible for genuine believers (Marshall; McKnight). Others maintain that those whom God has truly saved will persevere to the end (Grudem; Schreiner and Caneday). We should observe that both sets of interpreters believe that good works are evidence of genuine saving faith, and both argue that good works as a fruit of faith are necessary for eschatological salvation (cf. James 2:14–26). Furthermore, both would agree that obedience is one indication that a person genuinely belongs to God (p 72)(1 John 2:3–6; 2 Pet. 1:5–11). In both instances assurance is not an abstraction that is realized apart from the work of the Spirit in the lives of God's people. Still, it seems that the biblical teaching on assurance is best preserved by acknowledging that those who defected from the church only appeared to be genuine believers. Their leaving of the church demonstrates that their faith was not genuine (1 Cor. 11:19; 1 John 2:19).

Witness of the Spirit

Assurance in faith is also inextricably tied to the witness of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8:16; 1 John 3:24; 4:13). The witness of the Spirit must not be abstracted from the rest of the biblical testimony. Believers have assurance fundamentally because of God's promises, and hence they consider God's objective work on their behalf. But the witness of the Spirit also confirms that believers are the children of God. The Spirit testifies to the hearts of God's people that they are truly God's children. The objective promises of God are now confirmed by the work of the Spirit within. The Spirit ineffably but clearly communicates that believers are in the circle of God's love and that they will never be lost from God's saving grasp.

What role does assurance play in the interpretation of Scripture? The Spirit seals to our hearts as we read that we truly belong to God. The objective promises of God found in Scripture and the internal work of the Spirit coalesce to produce assurance. In turn, the assurance granted by the Spirit informs us as we continue the interpretative task. Scripture is interpreted within the circle of confidence that belongs to the children of God. As we read the word of God, the Spirit assures us that the Father is benevolent to his children. Thus, those who have the Spirit grasp that God's promises are fundamental, and that our works, though important and necessary, can never be foundational or the basis of our right standing with God. The assurance that comes from the Spirit always points believers to Christ as God's wisdom, from whom we receive righteousness, sanctification, and redemption (1 Cor. 1:30).

See also Apostasy; Covenant

Bibliography

Beeke, J. The Quest for Full Assurance. Banner of Truth, 1999; Berkouwer, G. C. Faith and Perseverance, trans. R. Knudson. Eerdmans, 1958; Carson, D. A. "Reflections on Assurance." Pages 247–76 in Still Sovereign, ed. T. Schreiner and B. Ware. Baker, 2000; Eaton, M. No Condemnation. InterVarsity, 1995; Grudem, W. "Perseverance of the Saints: A Case Study of Hebrews 6:4–6 and the Other Warning Passages in Hebrews." Pages 133–82 in Still Sovereign, ed. T. Schreiner and B. Ware. Baker, 2000; Gundry-Volf, J. Paul and Perseverance. Westminster John Knox, 1990; Marshall, I. H. Kept by the Power of God. Bethany, 1974; McKnight, S. "The Warning Passages in Hebrews: A Formal Analysis and Theological Conclusions." TJ 13 (1992): 21–59; Schreiner, T., and A. Caneday. The Race Set before Us. InterVarsity, 2001; Zachman, R. The Assurance of Faith. Fortress, 1993.

Thomas R. Schreiner

Assyriology See Ancient Near Eastern Background Studies

Atlas See Geography

Atonement

“Atonement” (at-one-ment) has been, since the sixteenth century, the main English word for that which ensures right or happy relations with the Deity and removes obstacles to that end. Other languages do not offer an exact correspondence—and this may subtly affect theological interpretation as it is carried in different linguistic areas. The semantic spectrum of “atonement” covers both German Versöhnung (reconciliation) and Sühne (expiation), with some overlap with Erlösung (redemption, with emphasis on its effect, liberation). In French and other Latin tongues, the main term is rédemption (the thought of the price paid is near at hand), with expiation important too, at least in the vocabulary of previous generations. English use offers a distinct advantage: the lexical frequency and weight of “atone” and “atonement” in common versions of Scripture can be compared with that of the verb kapar and its derivatives in the Hebrew OT, which they usually render in translation. Intensive Bible reading by a majority of the people over a long time had linguistic effects: under contextual guidance or pressure, the biblical use of kapar thus molded the meaning of “atonement.” “Atone” is probably perceived with a fair degree of equivalence with kapar. Yet, it is to be remembered that correspondence cannot be perfect (e.g., the English reader hardly guesses that there is a close kinship between “atone” and “ransom,” kofer, a kinship of which the Hebrew reader is marginally aware even when his or her attention is focused elsewhere). One should also realize that there is no NT word to play a similar role—occurrences of hilaskesthai (nearest in meaning), “to propitiate,” and its derivatives are sparse indeed (Luke 18:13; Rom. 3:25; Heb. 2:17; 1 John 2:2; 4:10).

Whether served by one keyword (kapar in the OT), or by none—that is, many (NT)—the theme (p 73) of atonement could hardly be more prominent than it is in Scripture: the major topic of one book in the Law, the concern of several psalms, an important interest of prophecy. Atonement lies at the heart of the good news. The striking NT feature is its close association with the death of Jesus, not only in Paul’s evangel (1 Cor. 2:2–13), but also in all strands of apostolic witness (an index could be the amount of space devoted to the passion narrative in the Gospels, or the title “Lamb” in Johannine writings). Since that death is a scandal for Jewish expectations and foolishness to the Greek mind, the problem of interpretation is felt acutely, first in the NT, and also throughout the history of theology. We shall recall how diverse theologies of the atonement have been, sketching the history of interpretation; briefly survey main biblical material; and then investigate the loci of decision, in procedure and attitudes—where and why this or that course has been chosen.

Theologies at Variance

With few exceptions, the church fathers were pastors rather than specialized theologians. To communicate the message of the atonement, they freely mingled several schemes, with little concern for systematic ordering. They saw the surrounding pagan world as the playground of demons, and proclaimed the victory of Christ over Satan; often with the thought that God, through the cross, outwitted and duped the Deceiver (Gregory of Nyssa). But that presentation was by no means exclusive, and Aulén went far beyond the evidence when he called it the “classical view.” Logos-Christologies easily combined with an emphasis on the teaching of heavenly truth and the “true Gnostics” of the Alexandrian school (Clement; Origen) saw revelation as a major component of atonement. The “mystical” view was widespread, basing atonement on the union of flesh and Spirit in the person of Jesus Christ, the infusion of divine life into the body of humankind, with healing and transforming power. Irenaeus’s anakephalaiōsis (recapitulation) synthesis stressed the role of the new Adam (and the new Eve). Athanasius emphasized the theōsis (deification) of human nature as assumed by the One who is very God of very God. At the same time, the fathers freely use the languages of piacular sacrifices and penal substitution, not only the Latin but also the Greek fathers, as Rivière has shown. Athanasius is noteworthy for his effort at systematization (Rivière 94–95): God’s veracity demanded that sin be retributed with the death penalty (Gen. 2:17); Christ offered his mortal body in death as a substitute for ours (antipsychon hyper pantōn); thus was our debt repaid (Inc. 6.9–10; cf. C. Ar. 2.47, 66). Eusebius explicitly identified the principle of sacrificial expiation with vicarious punishment (Dem. ev. 10.1). Augustine, as the legitimate heir of the patristic estate, clearly formulated the penal debt interpretation, though it is not in the forefront of his teaching (Enchir. 10.33; Faust. 14.4).

Anselm’s contribution was to concentrate on one scheme, to bind it with Chalcedonian Christology, and fearlessly to bring out its logic. The structure is the same as in Athanasius's argument on divine truthfulness, but the decisive concern is that of feudal honor. Satisfaction obtains through Christ's denial of self as a work of supererogation (it is not penal: the Cur Deus homo assumes the alternative aut satisfactio, aut poena; 1.15). Abelard is known as the pioneer of the subjective, moral influence, view (though he did express the objective and penal one when commenting on Rom. 4:25; as quoted by Tobias Eißler 124n30). Thomas Aquinas highlights Christ's loving and meritorious consecration to the Father, as the Head of the body, but he definitely maintains a penal satisfaction component (ST IIIa, q. 48, esp. art. 4 and 5; and most precise, De rationibus fidei 7).

The Magisterial Reformers made penal expiation central and set forth the once-for-all, finished work of the cross as the foundation of justification by faith alone. Luther preached it with unprecedented force (under the influence of Gal. 3); he taught that the satisfaction of divine justice and the propitiation of God's wrath is the basis of our deliverance from sin, death, and the devil (Eißler 128–29). Calvin marshaled the biblical evidence (Isa. 53 as a key). While Anabaptists stressed Christ's example in the way of martyrdom, Luther's and Calvin's doctrine of atonement became the heart of the evangelical message, and its so-called "crucicentrism," down, for example, to John Stott. Until the middle of the twentieth century, Roman Catholics also commonly held penal substitution as one element in complex theologies.

In the wake of Socinian attacks, Protestant liberalism and Catholic modernism rejected objective theories, especially penal substitution. The "heretical" anthropology of R. Girard has reinforced the trend. Radical feminists have expressed the strongest possible aversion. In the Roman Church, after the critique by Sabourin and Lyonnet and under the climate created by Teilhard de Chardin and Rahner, few scholars of note, if any, (p 74) have maintained it. K. Barth again proclaimed that Christ was "the Judge judged in our stead" but expressly repudiated the doctrine that he was so punished as to spare us death and to "satisfy" the demands of wrath (CD IV/1, §59/2, fine print after about 40 percent of the section). In their later writings Moltmann and Pannenberg have come closer to evangelical language. However, Moltmann denies that God's wrath was appeased (25–26), and Pannenberg, despite strong statements of penal substitution (425–27), claims that "the reconciling death of Christ is not a payment that Christ made to God in place of others" (429; 448, against "satisfaction").

Mapping Biblical Evidence

In the OT, atonement appears as the effect of divine grace, mainly as forgiveness (Ps. 130:3–4) and as the function of sacrifices—God-given to that end (Lev. 17:11). Hope is directed to a total removal of sin (Zech. 3:9), toward which the seventy “sevens” are decreed (Dan. 9:24, using kapar). The NT claim to fulfillment centers in Jesus’ death. How does it provide atonement? Though the heinous crime of men, the rejection of Light by darkness, it was no accident; it accomplished what God had purposed (Acts 2:23; 4:28; 1 Pet. 1:20) and was the goal of Christ’s mission (Mark 10:45; John 12:27; cf. 10:18). It offered the perfect example of meekness and courageous confession (1 Pet. 2:21; 1 Tim. 6:13), but there is no suggestion that it could be as such the basis of atonement. It demonstrated the summum of love, on Christ’s and on the Father’s part (John 13:1; 15:13; Rom. 5:8), but since that love is no romantic (suicidal) passion, it remains to be explained why it had to be expressed in death. The clearest answer is that Christ’s death was required for our justification, which happens “by his blood” (Rom. 5:9), and specifically—since leaving sins unpunished casts doubts on God’s justice—that God may be “both just and justifier” when he acquits the guilty who put their faith in Jesus (cf. 3:26).

How, still, is this achieved? R. W. Dale discerned three pictorial sets or schemes through which the NT accounts for the atoning efficacy of Jesus’ death; E. Brunner added two others, which may be regarded as complementary:

1. Sacrifice. The title “Lamb” (at least in part) and references to the blood belong to that presentation. Sacrifice is expressed in Isa. 53 (v. 10, asham); it is found in many NT places, as “propitiatory sacrifice” in 1 John 2:1–2 and 4:10 (cf. Rom. 3:25), and as sacrifice “for sin” in Rom. 8:3 (possibly the same in 2 Cor. 5:21).

2. Penal Execution. The language of the law court (that also of justification, including the justification of Jesus; 1 Tim. 3:16), with condemnation and curse, and of the legal document that was against us (Col. 2:14) develops that viewpoint. It is dominant in Isa. 53; it is implied in the phrase “to bear sin or iniquity,” meaning liability to the corresponding punishment. Christ bore our sins (1 Pet. 2:24), suffered under their condemnation (Rom. 8:3) and the curse we had deserved (Gal. 3:13).

3. Ransom. Redemption implies not only the effect of freedom granted but also the means of price paid (the price is underlined in 1 Cor. 6:20 and 7:23, and how precious the ransom-blood that was given for us in 1 Pet. 1:19). The language of debt is correlative, since our legal debt, we were unable to pay, made us slaves and captives (Gal. 3:23; 5:1–3), the “remission of sins” being the “release of debts” (aphesis). Also in the background is the special institution of the kinsman-redeemer, who acts as a substitute for a deceased relative.

4. Victory. Atonement represents a winning battle against the forces and agents of estrangement, against the devil and the powers aligned with him. Christ's Passion as his duel with Satan and the outcome as his triumph is found in several passages (John 12:31; Col. 2:14; Heb. 2:14; Rev. 5: 12).

5. Passover. Jesus told of his imminent death as the fulfillment of the Passover type (Luke 22:15–16). John (19:36) and Paul followed (1 Cor. 5:7). This representation brings together the themes of the Lamb, the new exodus, and the new covenant.

Discerning Critical Issues

Strategic choices on how to deal with biblical material are made on many issues or clusters of issues.

One Biblical Thought? Whether there is a unifying perspective on atonement throughout biblical writings and whether it can guide theological reflection is obviously first rank. There is little hope of a fruitful interpretation of Scripture as such if one discards the canonical principle, presupposes that various authors held contrary views, or that their witness lies on a plane altogether alien from the quest of intellectus fidei. The presupposition of classic Christianity affirms that all the Scriptures, owing to their common inspiration, reflect the same, homogeneous, mind—despite striking differences in angle, (p 75) aspect, emphasis, vocabulary, and conceptual apparatus (in that sense, there are many theologies of atonement in the Bible, but they are not incompatible with one another).

This entails the Reformers' hermeneutical principle: Scriptura sacra semetipsam interpretans. It implies several things: The lack of a clear statement of a view in a book should not count as a sign of rejection (the absence of evidence is no evidence of absence)—contrary to much current practice. Various presentations should be interpreted as convergent and complementary, not opposed. And theological “hygiene” should banish dichotomies between biblical themes (e.g., initiative of love/appeasement of wrath). Sound method will then extend to the whole of Scripture the import of the more explicit passages, whose “natural” meaning (as Calvin would say) remarkably resists efforts at circumventing it, such as Isa. 53; Rom. 3; 2 Cor. 5; Gal. 3; Heb. 9. Other presuppositions on Scripture and its relationship to theological reason hardly generate similar interpretations.

Mere Disjointed Metaphors? Skeptics of the classical use of Scripture to build the doctrine of atonement often stress the metaphorical nature of the language used; representations are not consistent, signifying that they should not be taken literally (We do not read of the debt being settled. To whom was the ransom paid? There is no resurrection in sacrifices ...). That the NT uses metaphor is fact—one could argue that the cross was a judicial punishment literally, but the statement that God's judgment was exercised also involves transference. It is less obvious that these metaphors disagree. On the contrary, writers freely blend several of them in the same verses (the three main schemes intertwined in Rom. 3:24–26), and it is fairly easy to “translate” one into the other, including that of victory. Therefore, the presumption is that they made for a consistent picture. The issue, however, is the cognitive import of metaphors generally. It may be argued that metaphors range from free and ornamental ones, to foundational and revealing ones, tools of knowledge that glide into conceptual status. These play a regulative and even informative role in theology (analogy may then be distinguished from metaphor). Criteria might include frequency, consistency, richness in correspondence, and whether logical consequences are drawn (in the text).

Sacrificial and judicial metaphors may claim a privileged status in Scripture. The NT views the Levitical system as typical, foreordained to represent the meaning of Christ's death. Human judges are instituted as the representatives of God, with delegated authority to render judgment in his name (the logic of Rom. 12:19–13:7). Presumably, these institutions yield metaphors (analogies) apt and cognitively useful.

Organic Connections? Within the “body” of divinity, to some extent an organic whole, there must be solidarities between the doctrine of atonement and neighboring ones. Consideration of thematic connections weighs heavily upon the interpretation of atonement material.

The main issues concerned seem to be these: the seriousness of sin and helplessness of human beings (Cur Deus homo: “You have not yet considered what is the gravity of sin”), especially the preoccupation with guilt in biblical sensitivity; the validity of retribution (in such doubt in contemporary culture); the reality of divine wrath, and the way it is related to love and mercy; the incarnation, and whether it is understood as salvific in itself or as a preparation and precondition for the work of the cross; the principle of substitution, with the structure of “headship” (for some, “corporate personality”); the relationship of justification and sanctification, with exclusive and inclusive representation.

More or Less Radical? A theological interpretation of Scripture, tending toward an intellectus fidei, faces the question of radicality. Is it right to insist that the demands of God's righteousness are so absolute that our best deeds are but “filthy rags” in his sight? That he would deny his word (Athanasius) and himself, if he were to forgive sinners without capital punishment for sin being executed? Or is this a false absolutization of a human idea of divine holiness?

Adjusting Subjective Involvement

When Scripture is interpreted on atonement, the theologian’s personal implication is also a locus of decision.

Reverence and Responsibility. Against the former myth of neutrality, the role of tradition, which shapes the interpreter’s horizon, and of community interests have been increasingly recognized. At the same time, theology would dissolve into tribal propaganda if the theologian relinquishes the responsibility of critical assessment, after objective criteria.

The topic of atonement illustrates the need for that balance. It would be rash to ignore the continuity of patristic, medieval, and evangelical tradition on atonement. Combined with hermeneutical virtues (Vanhoozer), gratitude and reverence (p 76) for tradition are in order. They may free a theologian from the tyranny of contemporary sentiment, and from the demand (also commercial) that he offer allegedly “new insights,” with the assumption that older treatments are obsolete. Yet, tradition itself is not unanimous, and as a fallible human apprehension, it too stands under the word of God. The analysis of present community interests should help in resisting distortions of biblical evidence (vigilance) and also help in highlighting what is most relevant to real needs and adapting pedagogical procedure.

Another kind of reverence and responsible vigilance is called for with contributions from the social sciences—precious indeed, provided the degree of corroboration be appraised and “ideological” twist discerned.

Fear and Faith “Coram Deo.” The roots of a theologian’s choice go deeper than intellectual tradition and environment. They are spiritual. The way one will interpret the Scriptures is ultimately affected by one’s stance “before God.” Does one see oneself as God’s advocate, called to make the doctrine less repulsive to “cultured people among its despisers”? Does one see oneself as a sinner without a plea, “undone” in the presence of the thrice-holy God, in fear—and faith?

See also Metaphor; Violence

Bibliography

Aulén, G. Christus Victor, trans. A. G. Hebert. SPCK, 1961 [1931]; Blocher, H. “Agnus Victor: The Atonement as Victory and Vicarious Punishment.” In What Does It Mean to Be Saved? ed. J. Stackhouse Jr. Baker, 2002; idem. “The Sacrifice of Jesus Christ: The Current Theological Situation.” European Journal of Theology 8 (1999): 23–36; Brunner, E. Dogmatics. Vol. 2, trans. O. Wyon. Lutterworth, 1952; Cousar, C., et al. on Atonement and Scripture. Interpretation 52, no. 1 (Jan 1998); Dale, R. W. The Atonement. Congregational Union of England and Wales, 1897 [1875]; Eißler, T. In Warum das Kreuz? ed. V. Gäckle. R. Brockhaus, 1998; Goldingay, J., ed. Atonement Today. SPCK, 1995; Lyonnet, S., and L. Sabourin. Sin, Redemption, and Sacrifice. AnBib 48. Pontifical Institute, 1970; Moltmann, J. “The Passion of Christ as the Suffering of God.” Asbury Theological Journal 48 (1993): 19–28; Morris, L. The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross. Tyndale, 1955; Nicole, R. “The Nature of Redemption.” Pages 245–82 in Standing Forth. Christian Focus, 2002; Packer, J. I. “What Did the Cross Achieve? The Logic of Penal Substitution.” TynBul 25 (1974): 3–45; Pannenberg, W. Systematic Theology. Vol. 2, trans. G. W. Bromiley. Eerdmans, 1994; Rivière, J. Le Dogme de la Rédemption. Lecoffre-Gabalda, 1931.

Henri A. G. Blocher

Augustine

Scripture was at the heart of Augustine’s conversion and ministry, his theological reflection and personal devotion. At least two-thirds of his works are either commentaries or sermons on scriptural texts (the latter often take the form of sustained commentary, for example his Tractates on St. John’s Gospel and his Ennarations on the Psalms). His other works constantly cite or allude to Scripture, so that it often seems that the language of the biblical author becomes Augustine’s own; this is particularly evident in his Confessions, which are immersed in the poetry of the Psalms.

It was probably Augustine’s devout mother, Monica, who first made him aware of the Christian Scriptures, and it is significant that, fired with an enthusiasm for wisdom after reading Cicero’s Exhortation to Philosophy at the age of nineteen, he should immediately turn to examine the Scriptures. At this stage they were a great disappointment: they struck Augustine’s educated and cultured mind as somewhat crude and badly written, lacking the literary merit of the “majesty of Cicero.” It was not just how the biblical authors expressed themselves, but also what they said that troubled Augustine: the OT and NT seemed to be full of discrepancies; the morality and conception of God contained in the former repelled Augustine; the contradictions in the latter undermined their authors’ credibility. He discovered that these were reservations that he shared with the dualistic Manichaean sect, which claimed to represent true Christianity; it was to them and their literalistic exegesis that he adhered for the next nine years.

Ambrose, bishop of Milan, whom Augustine heard preach in the mid 380s, was a key figure in Augustine's eventual reconciliation with Christianity and its Scriptures. His allegorical approach, coupled with his Neoplatonic learning, revealed to Augustine the revolutionary possibility that true reality was spiritual, and that Scripture need not be treated with deadening literalism. Instead, it could be interpreted spiritually, with levels of meaning to meet the most demanding literary scholar and rational critic, as well as the devout faithful.

Scripture itself finally tipped the balance for Augustine, the reluctant convert, in Milan in 386. The divinely inspired call, "Take up and read," led to his opening the copy of Paul's letters that he had been reading and taking to heart the text upon which his eyes alighted: Rom. 13:13. From then on (p 77) Scripture was to be the hub of Augustine's Christian life and work. When he was unexpectedly ordained in Hippo in 391, he immediately asked his bishop for time free to study the Scriptures. Thenceforth, they were to be his sole resource for the moral, spiritual, and practical guidance of his congregation. They were an arsenal from which to refute heretics and schismatics, the source and inspiration of his theological reflection, and the wellspring of his spiritual life.

Augustine would not have possessed a single-volume Bible; rather, he would have used individual books of Scripture, which, in his mind, together constituted a canon. The text he would have generally used is now known to us as the Old Latin, though he perhaps later used some of Jerome's new Latin translations (which laid the foundations for what we now possess as the Vulgate). He shared with other early fathers the basic presupposition that Scripture was wholly inspired by the Holy Spirit, so that no one part could disagree with or contradict another; Scripture was unified and inerrant. It therefore also possessed for them various levels, which invited different interpretations of the same text, according to whether it was read literally or spiritually. Many of the fathers identified three or four different levels; Augustine, in two texts, enumerates four: the etiological, the historical, the anagogical, and the allegorical. Most important, Augustine and the fathers regarded Scripture as primarily christological; Christ was the key to its interpretation and was to be found in both Testaments as its foundation, meaning, center, and end.

Augustine, in common with other fathers of the church, used various traditional (by his day) methods of interpretation, which had become established due to their usefulness in overcoming the difficulties that the diverse and disparate scriptural texts raised, and in teaching and preaching to their congregations. Typology, which identified "types" or prefigurings of NT persons, events, and sacraments in the OT, allowed them to unify the two Testaments with each other and with the current identity and practices of the church. Allegory, the most popular method of interpretation, allowed Augustine to overcome the difficulties posed by a passage that appeared contradictory, banal, immoral, or obviously figurative and to plumb its spiritual depths. Thereby he could guard its mysteries from the unworthy and reveal them to the worthy, meeting the various members of his congregation at their different levels and enabling them to exercise their minds and, ultimately, delight in the truth they discovered. It also allowed Augustine and his cultured audience to reconcile themselves to Scripture as a text possessing literary merit, able to stand alongside the great works of classical literature on an equal footing. This was obviously an issue to which Augustine was particularly sensitive: his On Christian Doctrine, a work on Christian exegesis and preaching, is at the same time a treatise on the relation between Christianity and classical culture and rhetoric. He cannot resist the temptation, in the fourth book, to demonstrate in a detailed and technical way, characteristic of the former rhetor, the literary eloquence and polish of Scripture.

It was ultimately at the level of meaning or intention that Augustine located the unity of Scripture. In his work On the Harmony of the Gospels, he argues that the apparent discrepancies in the accounts of the evangelists are merely at the level of personal reminiscence. The Holy Spirit has providentially allowed such discrepancies to provide the reader with different viewpoints. The accounts are the “casualties of their recollections.” What is much more important is the truth of the facts they recount and their unified intention: this is what the exegete is obliged to seek out. In Confessions, book 12, Augustine goes even further and argues that the meaning and intention that each individual reader finds might be different, but each is equally valid; there are as many meanings as readers. What then are the parameters for acceptable interpretation? For Augustine, it is the double commandment of love of God and neighbor; so long as exegetes do not contradict this basic rule, then their teaching is acceptable. Love is the inspiration and source of Scripture, its meaning and its end.

See also Human Being, Doctrine of; Illumination; Love; Medieval Biblical Interpretation; Patristic Biblical Interpretation

Bibliography

Arnold, DD. , WW. , HH., and P. Bright, eds. De Doctrina Christiana. Christianity and Judaism in Antiquity 9. University of Notre Dame Press, 1995; Bright, P., ed. Augustine and the Bible. University of Notre Dame Press, 1986; Duchrow, U. Sprachverständnis und biblisches Hören bei Augustin. Vol. 5 of Hermeneutische Untersuchungen zur Theologie. Mohr, 1965; La Bonnardière, A.-M. Biblia Augustiniana. Études augustiniennes, 1960–75; idem. Saint Augustin et la Bible. Beauchesne, 1986; de Margerie, B. Saint Augustine. Vol. 3 of An Introduction to the History of Exegesis. Saint Bede's, 1993; Pépin, J. "Saint Augustin et la fonction protréptique de l'allegorie." Recherches Augustiniennes 1 (1958): 243–86; Pontet, M. L'Exégèse de saint Augustin prédicateur. Aubier, 1944; Van Fleteren, F., and J. C. (p 78) Schnaubelt, eds. Augustine. Collectanea Augustiniana 5. Peter Lang, 2001.

Carol Harrison

Authorial Discourse Interpretation

The defenders of authorial discourse interpretation claim that such interpretation is what all of us do most of the time when we interpret; for example, it is what we all do when we read history books, scientific texts, legal documents, and instructions for the repair of home appliances. The special contribution that this way of understanding makes to biblical interpretation is that it offers a way to grasp how it can be that God speaks.

Why God's Speaking Has Been Neglected

The claim that God speaks to human beings occurs over and over in the Bible. It likewise occurs throughout history, as Christians and others try to make sense of their experience. In the Christian liturgy, when Scripture reading is introduced with the words "Listen for the word of God," the people respond with the acclamation "This is the word of the Lord."

Yet theologians have paid remarkably little attention to God's speaking. There would seem to be two main reasons for this. For one thing, God's speaking has typically been assimilated, mistakenly so, to other things that God does, and thus given no attention in its own right. In conservative and evangelical circles, God's speaking has traditionally been assimilated to inspiration; God inspires the prophets and the writers of Scripture. That inspiration is not the same as speaking can be easily seen, however. I may in one way or another inspire you to say or write what you did; it nonetheless remains the case that it was you who said or wrote it, not me. God's inspiring the prophets and biblical writers to speak and write as they did is not the same as God himself speaking.

In mainline and liberal circles of the twentieth century, God's speaking has been assimilated to God's self-revelation. God, it is said, reveals or manifests himself; and human beings then put into words what it is that was revealed or manifested. It can easily be seen that revelation is also not the same as speaking. One may reveal something about oneself without saying anything at all; while remaining silent, the person's quaking hands reveal his nervousness. It is no doubt true that when we speak, we always reveal something about ourselves; but what we reveal is normally not the content of our speech. A native speaker of English reveals that he is a native speaker but rarely says that he is. It is especially important not to identify such speech actions as asking or commanding with revelation. If you ask me the time of day and I focus all my attention on what that reveals about you, I neglect to respond to your request; indeed, focusing on what your question reveals about you may be a way of evading your request.

The other reason theologians have given remarkably little attention to God's speech as such is that it has been thought that to attribute speech to God is to speak anthropomorphically, just as when one attributes eyes and arms to God. Theologians have asked what it is about God that these supposed anthropomorphisms point to; and their answer, in the case of attributions of speech to God, has been either that it points to God's inspiration or to God's revelation. The conviction that talk about God speaking is anthropomorphic thus contributes to the mistaken assimilation of God's speaking to inspiration or revelation. As we shall see, the theory used to articulate authorial discourse interpretation enables us to understand the attribution of speaking to God as non-anthropomorphic.

Locutionary and Illocutionary Actions

One of the major contributions of the Oxford philosopher J. L. Austin, who did most of his work in the 1950s, was his development of so-called speech-act theory. For our purposes here, all we need from speech-act theory is the most basic of all the distinctions that Austin introduced. Suppose that someone makes an assertion about a late train by uttering the sentence, "The train is running late." Austin calls the act of uttering that sentence a locutionary act; likewise, the act of inscribing that sentence.

But there is something else the person has done, says Austin, than perform that locutionary act, something else he has done by performing that locutionary act, not just in addition to it. He has asserted that the train is running late. To see that uttering that sentence is a distinct act from making that assertion, notice that either one can be performed without performing the other. One can utter or inscribe the sentence without asserting that the train is late; for instance, one can utter or inscribe it as an example of some point, which is, in fact, what I did in the preceding paragraph. On the other hand, there are ways of asserting that the train is running late that do not involve uttering or inscribing that sentence. For instance, (p 79) I might make that assertion by uttering a synonymous sentence in some foreign language; or I might make it by using smoke signals, pictures, Morse code, and the like. Austin proposed that we call actions that we perform by way of performing locutionary actions, illocutionary actions, with examples being asserting, warning, asking, and commanding. The locutionary action counts as the illocutionary action.

The defender of the priority of authorial discourse interpretation holds that what all of us do most of the times we interpret oral or written discourse is try to identify and understand the illocutionary acts that the discourser performed by producing that utterance or inscription. When you turn to me in the station and utter the sentence, “The train is running late,” I want to grasp what you said—that is, what illocutionary act you performed. And when I read the repair manual for my lawn mower, I want to grasp what those who issued this manual were saying thereby—what instructions they were giving.

Sometimes we think we know very well what the person said; but we suspect that is not what she wanted to say, not what she intended to say. As with all intentions, the intention to say something may misfire. You intended to say that the train is running late; but you were somewhat distracted, and what came out was something else. In some situations it is more important to us to know what the person intended to say than what she did say. But obviously, most of us do not misspeak most of the time, or communication would be next to impossible. For the most part, our interest is in what the person did say, not in what she intended to say in case that is different. Our interest is in the illocutionary action she did perform. Interpretation conducted with the aim of discovering and understanding the illocutionary act performed is authorial discourse interpretation. (The term was probably first used in Wolterstorff.)

Double Agency Discourse

If we are to employ this conceptuality to understand how God speaks, we must take note of a kind of discourse that neither Austin nor any of his followers took any special note of, double agency discourse. (This term too was probably first used in Wolterstorff.) Sometimes one person performs some illocutionary action by way of another person performing some locutionary or illocutionary action; the latter speaks on behalf of the former, or in the name of the former. One of the most common forms of such double agency discourse in ordinary life occurs when one person gives to another the right of attorney. Before the day of telephone and electronic communication, it also occurred when a head of state commissioned someone to be his ambassador. It seems clear that this is how the biblical writers understood the relation of God to the prophet; the prophet spoke on behalf of God. The prophet was not merely a communicator of messages from God to human beings; the prophet also spoke in the name of God. By hearing the prophet speak, human beings heard God speak to them there and then—double agency discourse.

Another form of double agency discourse occurs when one appropriates the discourse of another for one's own purpose—as when we approvingly quote what someone said, or remark, in response to some speech, “I agree with that” or “He speaks for me too.” In such cases there was no prior commissioning; one simply took a piece of discourse that had already occurred and appropriated it for one's own discourse.

The question of anthropomorphism comes down, then, to this: does God need a body to perform illocutionary actions by way of commissioning someone to speak on his behalf or by way of appropriating what has already been said? The answer seems quite clearly to be no. It might be asked whether God needs a body even to perform locutionary actions; why could God not produce inscriptions of sentences on a wall even though God lacks hands, and produce utterings of sentences in the air even though God lacks vocal cords? But what we are interested in is whether God can literally command, warn, reassure, ask, assert, and so forth—all of these being il-locutionary actions. And there seems no reason to say that God could not.

Advantages of Thinking in Terms of Double Agency Discourse

When a head of state commissions someone as his ambassador, and when any one of us gives someone power of attorney, the ambassador or attorney does not become a mere mouthpiece of the one who commissions him to speak on his behalf. The ambassador and attorney retain their own individuality. They choose the words they use, their character is reflected in how they speak, their knowledge or lack of knowledge of one thing or another is revealed, and all of that. So too when we appropriate some extant piece of discourse for our own: the appropriated discourse obviously retains its own character. Had we spoken in our own voice, it might well have come out rather differently. The application to (p 80)God's speech is obvious. If we think in terms of double agency discourse, we can take due account of all the particularities and idiosyncrasies of what the human being said while at the same time interpreting what God said thereby.

One particular application of this point is of special importance. The Bible comes to us in the form of sixty-six books, plus perhaps a few depending on the canon that one prefers; biblical scholars have argued that a few of these, especially Isaiah, should be seen as two or more books attached to each other. It is common among biblical scholars in the critical tradition to insist that each of these books be read separately, not as parts of one big book, the Bible. To read them as parts of one big book is to fail to recognize the integrity of each. Matthew presents Jesus in a different light from Luke; if we read them together, we miss the richness of those different perspectives.

But now suppose one thinks about the situation in terms of double agency discourse. Sometimes when a person writes a book, he will, along the way, appropriate by quotation one passage from one writer to make his point, another passage from another writer, and so forth. Indeed, it would in principle be possible to write a book of one's own in which one does nothing but quote passages written by others. In many such cases, the point one wants to make by quoting some passage may be somewhat different from the point that the original author made by writing it. On the other hand, often one cannot figure out the point of the quoting writer without first figuring out the point of the quoted text. So too, if we think of Scripture as God's word to us, God's discourse to us. One can both interpret each book by itself, honoring its integrity by trying to discern its particular message, while also interpreting all the books together for God's discourse. Indeed, doing the latter presupposes that one has done the former. Scripture is the polyphony of human discourse through the totality of which God's discourse comes to us. See also Intention/Intentional Fallacy; Meaning; Revelation; Speech-Act Theory; Word of God

Bibliography

Austin, J. L. How to Do Things with Words. Clarendon, 1962; Searle, J. Speech Acts. Cambridge University Press, 1970; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Nicholas P. Wolterstorff

Authorial Intention      See Authorial Discourse Interpretation; Intention/Intentional Fallacy

Authorship See Authorial Discourse Interpretation; Pseudepigrapha

(p 81) B

Bakhtin, Mikhail See Dialogism

Baptism

Baptism has multiple meanings reflected in various biblical texts. It incorporates members into the church through baptism into the one body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:13). Through baptism into Christ's priesthood (1 Pet. 2:5, 9; Rev. 1:6; 5:10) the baptized are able to offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God and thus are deputed to the public worship of the church. Baptism described as a "spiritual circumcision" indicates participation in the new covenant (Col. 2:11–12 NRSV). It is also a pardoning and cleansing from sin (Acts 22:16; 1 Cor. 6:11; Eph. 5:26; Heb. 10:22), a new birth (John 3:5), and a gift of the Spirit (Acts 2:38). Baptism requires conversion, a new life in Christ, and a renunciation of sin that entails a new ethical orientation (1 Cor. 6:9–11).

In Christian churches the theology of baptism has been influenced by two foundational texts, Rom. 6:3–4 and Mark 1:9–11. The Western churches have primarily stressed baptism as participation in Christ's death and resurrection according to the theology in the Epistle to the Romans. The act of baptismal immersion is the sign of Christ's dying and rising and signifies the new life and Christian identity of the baptized.

The Eastern churches tend to privilege Mark 1:9–11 and parallel texts. They view baptism as the reenactment of Jesus' baptism in the Jordan. The Gospel texts stress the pneumatological and trinitarian aspects of baptism—the gift of the Spirit and the presence of the Father, Son, and Spirit in the water bath in the Jordan. The baptized become adopted heirs of the Father and receive the anointing of the Holy Spirit.

Faith is both required for baptism and an effect of baptism. For example, in Acts 2 those who welcomed Peter's message were baptized. In the early church the rite of initiation included a trinitarian profession of faith in question-and-answer form. For the traditions that have restored the ancient practice of the catechumenate, this period is a time in which the candidates grow in faith. The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults has made adult baptism normative for an understanding of the theology of baptism. The primary difference between those communions who baptize infants and those who practice believer baptism is not whether faith is present or not, but where faith is located. Baptists and other groups issuing from the Anabaptist arm of the Reformation require a personal profession of faith on the part of the person who is baptized. In the Roman Catholic tradition, as in many other Christian traditions, the godparents and the parents express faith by proxy. In the baptism of infants, the faith of the church precedes the initiation of the child, signifying that all are welcomed into a faith community through baptism. It shows that proclamation and evangelization on the part of a faith community must precede any individual confession of faith, and that faith is God's work in us and not our own.

Evidence for the baptism of infants exists from the end of the second century. Reasons supporting the development of infant baptism include references to the baptism of households (Acts 16:15, 33; 1 Cor. 1:16), a literal interpretation of John 3:3 accompanied by a high mortality rate, and the explanation of Cyprian that the sin of Adam was forgiven in baptism. In addition, Augustine developed the doctrine of original sin, based on his reading of Rom. 5:12–21 and his efforts to counter the Pelagian teaching that free will supported by ascetic practices was sufficient for living a Christian life and attaining salvation.

Swiss Brethren, also known as Anabaptists, hold that baptism represents a public confession of “repentance and amendment of life” by those “who believe truly that their sins are taken away by Christ” (Schleitheim Confession, 1527). Other confessional groups who do not practice infant baptism, although not directly related to the Swiss Brethren, profess similar doctrines. For example, Baptists consider baptism to be a voluntary public profession of Christian faith, which requires candidates (p 82) old enough to understand its significance and symbols.

More attention needs to be given to the unity of the rites of initiation: baptism, postbaptismal anointing or confirmation, and Eucharist. As the Faith and Order document Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry observes, “Participation in Christ’s death and resurrection is inseparably linked with the receiving of the Spirit. Baptism in its full meaning signifies and effects both” (WCC §B14). Baptism and the Eucharist are linked as early as 1 Cor. 10:2–4 and perhaps John 19:34 and 1 John 5:6. Both baptism and Eucharist celebrate the same mystery, the death and resurrection of Christ in the power of the Spirit. We are baptized only once, but our regular celebration of the Eucharist recalls the once-and-for-all sacrifice of Christ represented on the altar and enables us to join ourselves to Christ and one another as the body of Christ (1 Cor. 10:16–17). In the Eucharist our communion in the body of the Lord, both in the Christ dead and risen and in his ecclesial body, achieves a repeatable visibility. Our participation in the Eucharist is as profoundly baptismal as our baptism is profoundly oriented to the Eucharist. In baptism we become the priestly people of God, and in the Eucharist we exercise that priesthood. The unity of the rites is most apparent when they are celebrated together as in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. The Orthodox churches also maintain the unity of the rites in the initiation of infants.

Even though there is but one baptism because there is only one Christ, dead and risen, into whom we are baptized (Eph. 4:4–6), the mutual recognition of baptism remains one of the ecumenical tasks of our time. Baptism administered with water and invocation of the trinitarian name together with faith in Christ form the basis of an imperfect communion among Christians. Traditional disputed issues are whether or not baptism is a sacrament and whether a personal confession of faith is required for the sacrament. While Roman Catholics do not require a full understanding of their sacramental teaching by other ministers to recognize their baptisms, those communities who practice believer's baptism do not recognize infant baptisms. More recently, theological debates about the proper language used for God in the trinitarian formula affect mutual recognition. Eucharistic practices relative to sacramental initiation are inconsistent. The Orthodox, Roman Catholics, Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, and various Baptist groups link full ecclesial community with full sacramental initiation and the Eucharist. Other groups admit all the baptized to the Eucharist. Finally, even though baptism is identified as a significant ground of unity among Christian churches, the ecclesial character of baptism has not been given significant attention, particularly in view of the fact that a person is baptized into a particular ecclesial community within a divided Christianity. All are baptized into the one church of Christ, yet the particular communities into which we are baptized are not always in communion with one another. Since baptism is an unrepeatable act, any practice that might be interpreted as rebaptism must be avoided where there is mutual recognition of baptism.

See also Sacrament

Bibliography

Beasley-Murray, G. R. Baptism in the New Testament. Eerdmans, 1973;

Buchanan, C. A Case for Infant Baptism. 3d ed. Grove, 1984; Hartman, L. 'Into the Name of the Lord Jesus.' T&T Clark, 1997; Johnson, M. The Rites of Christian Initiation. Liturgical Press, 1999; Kavanagh, A. The Shape of Baptism. Pueblo, 1978; Pawson, D., and C. Buchanan. Infant Baptism under Cross-examination. Grove, 1974, 1976; Wainwright, G. Christian Initiation. John Knox, 1969; WCC. Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry. Faith and Order Paper 111. WCC, 1982.

Susan K. WoodWood

Barr, James See Biblical Theology; Concept; Etymology

Barth, Karl

The Swiss Reformed theologian Karl Barth (1886–1968) is by common consent the weightiest Protestant dogmatician since Schleiermacher. His significance for the theory and practice of biblical interpretation and the importance of his biblical exegesis in understanding his theology are, however, commonly underestimated. Because of this, Barth's work remains marginal in contemporary theological hermeneutics, and the corpus of his work is read with insufficient attention to what he regarded as its most essential feature, its reference to the biblical testimony. An informed account of Barth's exegetical labors and of his theology of Scripture and its interpretation is thus essential to any adequate assessment of his work.

Reared in moderately conservative Swiss clerical and academic circles, Barth studied with the leading German theologians in the early years of the twentieth century, and entered the pastorate (p 83) in 1911, formed in the theological and exegetical culture of liberal Protestantism. This theology proved unworkable in the task of ministry, above all because its focus on human history and moral endeavor lacked a deep sense of the sovereign aseity of God. From around 1915, Barth began to dismantle his heritage and to replace it with an account of the Christian faith centered on God's free, prevenient perfection. The reconstruction was largely undertaken through intensive study of the Pauline corpus; its most enduring literary monument is Barth's Epistle to the Romans, first published in 1919 and entirely rewritten two years later.

Barth's Romans is often read either as an account of his own developing theological position, or as a hermeneutical manifesto. It is in fact neither; it is intended as a commentary on Paul, which tries to say what Paul's text said and says as a servant of revelation. The commentary takes the form of an elaborate conceptual paraphrase; though it is not always transparent, and sometimes overwhelms Paul's text, Barth's intention was to try to indicate the astonishing reality that he considered Paul to be indicating: the sheer gratuity of God. It was this content, and not any hermeneutical commitments, that shaped Barth's stance toward the dominant conventions of historical criticism (his views are expressed in the prefaces to the various editions of the commentary). Barth considered historical criticism necessary but insufficient. It is necessary because the interpreter must seek to grasp the biblical text as what it is, in all its historical contingency. It is insufficient because the contingent text is defined by its function within revelation. Historical criticism seeks to explain the text without reference to its revelatory function, and consequently it fails to grasp the text as what it is (an instrument of divine speech). Moreover, historical criticism misconstrues the act of interpretation as one performed by an exegete upon a historically distant, inert text, rather than as an attempt to follow the text's indication of the present activity of the divine word. Barth's critics considered his exegesis to be mere practical or spiritual theology; yet this hardly met his challenge that exhaustive historical explanations of the text fail to treat Scripture in accordance with its objective character as an instrument of revelation.

In 1921 Barth took up work as a theological professor in Germany. Most of his teaching in the 1920s was in the fields of Reformed historical theology and NT exegesis. One fruit of his rediscovery of the Reformed tradition was a rearticulation of the Protestant Scripture principle: Scripture is the contingent textual servant of the divine word, though not identical with that word. However, Barth's chief preoccupation was not with questions of the nature or authority of the Bible so much as with its content, expounded in lengthy lecture series on, for example, Ephesians, 1 Corinthians, the Sermon on the Mount, John, James, and 1 Peter. Much of this material has only been published posthumously; its sheer bulk indicates the centrality of biblical exegesis for Barth's theological project.

From 1932 Barth devoted himself increasingly to writing his Church Dogmatics (CD), a multivolume work of systematic theology unfinished at his death. The work attempts a comprehensive account of the triune God's ways with his creatures, structured around the themes of creation, reconciliation, and redemption, introduced by a treatment of the doctrines of revelation and God. Part of the bulk of the work derives from the presence of a great deal of detailed exegesis, often in the form of lengthy excursuses (such as on Gen. 1–3, Job, or the Synoptic presentation of Jesus' ministry). Barth insists that dogmatics is secondary to exegesis, not a conceptual improvement upon Scripture but an attempt to listen to Scripture so as to assist the church's work of proclamation. The CD is best read as a set of conceptual variations upon scriptural texts and themes, sometimes explicitly tied to exegesis, sometimes more loose and indirect, but always attempting to indicate what is already proclaimed in the prophetic and apostolic witness.

“Witness” is a key category in Barth’s understanding of the nature and authority of Scripture. God’s revelation takes place through the testimony of the biblical writings, which are elect witnesses to the divine word. The authority of their witness is not grounded in a static, quasi-material relation between the divine word and an inspired text, but in God’s use of Scripture as an auxiliary. Though Barth’s account is sometimes misread as unstable actualism, he believed it preferable to older Protestant teaching because it respects both divine freedom and the human character of the biblical witnesses. The category of witness is also central for Barth’s understanding of biblical interpretation. To interpret a text is to read it for what it is; but the biblical text is a human witness to revelation, and so, if it is to be read as what it is, it must be read with an eye to its function of testifying to revelation. This testimony is not some additional feature alongside other, more “natural” features of the (p 84)text; it is simply the text’s content, that to which it refers and directs its readers.

Within this conception of the nature of the Bible and its interpretation, Barth’s exegetical practice in the Church Dogmatics is quite varied. Attempts are often made by interpreters of Barth to present one or another strategy as basic, particularly by those who find in Barth a concentration on the christological narratives of Scripture, and on their ability to present the identity of particular agents. Though Barth’s use of narrative in Christology is instructive for his insistence that Jesus’ significance is not reducible to general attitudes, it by no means exhausts his ways of using scriptural materials, which are varied and unsystematic. Sometimes he gives lengthy exegetical treatment to specific passages; sometimes he generates catenae of biblical quotations with little comment. He produces extensive restatements of biblical stories, arguments, themes, or concepts. At some points his interest is more directly applicative, and at other points scriptural citations are analyzed in the course of seeking warrants for theological proposals. Moreover, the presence of Scripture in the CD is as much in its saturation by biblical allusion, citation, and paraphrase as it is by explicit exegesis (in this, Barth is recovering a more ancient mode of theology as meditation on the scriptural sources of faith).

Barth showed little interest in the theoretical questions about hermeneutics that preoccupied many in Bultmann’s school in the mid-twentieth century. He thought little would be gained from high theory, and much could be lost—most of all, a sense that the biblical texts are inherently communicative because of their election as witnesses to Christ. He also feared the subjectivism of existential hermeneutics in which the text and its content await the interpreter’s act of “realization.” Barth was also relaxed about questions concerning Scripture’s historical reference, since he did not consider realism dependent upon literalism, and since on theological grounds, he judged, Scripture offered adequate testimony to that of which it speaks.

Barth is the commanding modern example of constructive theology undertaken in the closest relation to the exegetical task. His interpretation of Scripture is undoubtedly not beyond question, especially when he allowed it to be commandeered by doctrinal interests (his late account of the baptismal material in the NT is a case in point). But his achievement is to have offered a theological account of the nature of Scripture and its interpretation that makes appeal to divine revelation rather than interpreting subjects, and to have undertaken a dogmatic work that both recommends and illustrates the deference of doctrine to the Bible.

Bibliography

Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. T&T Clark, 1956–75; idem. The Epistle to the Philippians. Westminster John Knox, 2002; idem. The Epistle to the Romans. Oxford University Press, 1933; idem. The Resurrection of the Dead. Hodder & Stoughton, 1933; idem. Witness to the Word. Eerdmans, 1986; Burnett, R. Karl Barth’s Theological Exegesis. Mohr, 2002; Cunningham, M. K. What Is Theological Exegesis? Trinity, 1995; Ford, D. Barth and God’s Story. Lang, 1991; Hunsinger, G. “Beyond Literalism and Expressivism: Karl Barth’s Hermeneutical Realism.” Pages 210–25 in Disruptive Grace, ed. G. Hunsinger. Eerdmans, 2001; Jeanrond, W. “Karl Barth’s Hermeneutics.” Pages 80–97 in Reckoning with Barth, ed. N. Biggar. Mowbray, 1988; McGlasson, P. Judas and Jesus. Scholars Press, 1991; Watson, F. “The Bible.” Pages 57–71 in The Cambridge Companion to Karl Barth, ed. J. Webster. Cambridge University Press, 2000.

John Webster

Being See Onto-Theology

Biblical Criticism See Historical Criticism

Biblical Theology

Introduction: The Pedigree of and Motivation for Biblical Theology

Biblical theology is said to have begun with Gabler’s inaugural address in 1787, in which he distinguished biblical theology from systematic theology. This is an important milestone in the development of biblical theology as a distinct theological discipline, but biblical theology, in the sense of the search for the inner unity of the Bible, goes back to the church fathers.

In his struggle with Marcion and the Gnostics over the unity of the Bible, for example, Irenaeus articulates the unity of the Bible as a single story:

Two histories converge in the biblical account, the history of Israel and the life of Christ, but because they are also the history of God's actions in and for the world, they are part of a larger narrative that begins at creation and ends in a vision of a new, more splendid city in which the "Lord God will be their light." The Bible begins, as it were, with the beginning and ends with an end that is no end, life with God, in Irenaeus's charming expression, a life in which one is "always conversing with God in new ways." Nothing falls outside of its scope. (Wilken 63)

(p 85)With Irenaeus's narrative approach to the Bible, we have an incipient biblical theology seeking to articulate the inner unity of the Bible in response to Marcion. The unity of the Testaments is affirmed—there is one God, who called Abraham, spoke with Moses, sent the prophets, and is also the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ—and is articulated in terms of the story shape of the Bible as a whole. Furthermore, the story is explained in terms of the theme of renewal or re-creation.

Here we see how, from the earliest days of the Christian church, ways are found of expressing the inner unity of the Bible, in the service of reading the Bible as Scripture and relating it to the challenges of the day, producing theological interpretation. At the heart of such interpretation is a highly creative grafting of the new onto the old. We wonder where this development comes from. Henri de Lubac rightly asserts:

Rather was it the consequence of the fact of the Incarnation on the conscience of some few Jews. In the end what was originally known by intuition was developed into a skilfully constructed theory capable of withstanding Jewish attacks on the one hand and those of Gnostics on the other, at the same time providing the means for preserving the scriptures and using them as a basis.... Right from the beginning the essential was there, the synthesis was made, in the dazzling and confused light of revelation. Novum testamentum in Vetere labet: Vetus nunc in Novo patet.... Very early, of course, separate traditions in the interpretation of scripture were established, different schools arose.... But the same fundamental principle compelled the recognition of all. From the beginning "the harmonious agreement of the Law and the Prophets with the Testament delivered by the Lord" was the "rule of the Church." (88)

Lubac here perceptively notes that central to Christian faith from its inception is an intuitive sense of the unity of the Testaments in Christ. In this respect biblical theology originates, as it were, in the Christ event and in the Bible itself. The relationship of the Testaments is the issue in (modern) biblical theology (Reventlow), and Lubac helpfully points us to the source of the Christian commitment to, and concern to articulate the logic of, the inner unity of the Bible. Not surprisingly, therefore, this pattern and concern is evident in different ways in catechesis and homiletics from the outset and in all the major Christian thinkers that follow the church fathers, not least Augustine, Aquinas, Luther, Calvin, and others (cf. Childs, Old and New).

Barr (Concept) thinks it anachronistic to find biblical theology in these Christian thinkers that precede Gabler. Barr is wrong insofar as biblical theology is the search for the inner unity of the Bible, for in this sense it is clearly present from the church fathers onward. But Barr is right in the sense that it is only around Gabler's time that biblical theology is clearly distinguished from systematic theology/dogmatics as a distinct discipline. In the church fathers and the Reformers, biblical theology is not differentiated from theological interpretation or systematic theology. This differentiation of the two in the theological encyclopedia is Gabler's major contribution. (For assessments of Gabler's contribution, see Sandys-Wunsch and Eldredge; Stuckenbruck; Ollenburger.)

Gabler and the Development of Biblical Theology as a Distinct Discipline

Gabler's motivation for the distinction between biblical theology and dogmatics is theological—he wants to help Christians discern what God is really saying. He commences his inaugural with his concern about the variety of views among Christians. One of the reasons he discerns for this is the failure to distinguish biblical theology from dogmatic theology. Gabler contrasts religion with theology: “Religion then, is every-day, transparently clear knowledge; but theology is subtle, learned knowledge, surrounded by a retinue of many disciplines, and by the same token derived not only from the sacred Scripture but also from elsewhere, especially from the domain of philosophy and history” (495). In this contrast, Gabler associates the Bible with religion: “There is truly a biblical theology, of historical origin, conveying what the holy writers felt about divine matters; on the other hand there is a dogmatic theology of didactic origin” (495). Biblical theology remains the same, whereas dogmatics changes all the time.

Gabler's understanding of biblical theology is deeply rationalistic. He argues that we need to separate the things in the Bible that refer to their own times from the “pure notions which divine providence wished to be characteristic of all times and places” (496). Thus, we first need to collect the sacred ideas of the authors and then classify them, after which we should compare them with the universal ideas of reason. From this process biblical theology will appear! In this way Gabler’s genuine theological concern is irretrievably skewed by his rationalist philosophy. The Bible is seen as a source of ideas and principles that are separated from their embodiment in Israel, Jesus, and the life of the church. This shadow (p 86) of alien philosophical concerns has dogged the footsteps of biblical theology to this day. Does this mean that any renewal of theological interpretation should return to a pre-Gabler view, in which biblical theology and theological interpretation are undifferentiated?

Gabler was not original in making the distinction between biblical theology and dogmatics. Rather, he sought methodological clarity on their relationship and “can be said to have done more than any other single figure to make biblical theology a separate discipline” (Sandys-Wunsch and Eldredge 150). Gabler’s whole approach is so colored by philosophy that one is tempted to dismiss him out of court, but that would be a mistake. His distinguishing of biblical theology from theology is helpful and an important step in differentiating biblical theology in the “theological encyclopedia.” For biblical theology to flourish as an entity in its own right, such a distinction is important, provided we can distinguish it from Gabler’s rationalism and other alien philosophies.

Biblical theology is concerned to describe the inner unity of the Bible on its own terms. It therefore is descriptive and historical in a way that theological interpretation and systematic theology are not. In my view, for this component in the theological encyclopedia to flourish, it needed to be differentiated from associated elements, just as with time it had become necessary for the doctrine of the church and eschatology to be distinguished from the doctrine of God. Without accepting one manifestation of this development as wholly true, it is possible to discern here a normative unfolding of theology as a discipline.

What seems to argue against this is Gabler’s rationalism, Wrede’s development of biblical theology in a history-of-religions direction (Fowl 14), and the fragmentation to which Gabler’s distinction led in biblical studies. Bauer was the first to distinguish OT and NT theology, and soon the view arose that the discontinuities between the Testaments were so strong as to defy attempts to articulate their unity. The related stress on the diversity of Scripture that has been central to most historical criticism has haunted biblical theology to this day. The result has been a focus on smaller and smaller parts of the Bible, all with their own theologies, so that nowadays it is quite difficult to take the inner unity of the Bible seriously at all.

Biblical theology has always been motivated at least in part by a concern for theological interpretation: “Most biblical theologians want to be theological” (Fowl 14). But if it inevitably subverts such work, then Fowl and others are right to see it as unhelpful in relation to theological interpretation. “The discipline of biblical theology, in its most common form, is systematically unable to generate serious theological interpretation” (Fowl 1). This is, however, in danger of confusing its philosophical underpinnings with the discipline itself. There are a variety of ways of doing historical and descriptive biblical theology, and it is a mistake to view Gabler and Wrede’s approaches as the norm. As Childs says, “The real question is not whether to do Biblical Theology or not, but rather what kind of Biblical Theology does one have” (Crisis). We need to learn from the checkered history of biblical theology that it will flourish and develop in very different ways in relation to different theologies and philosophies. Thus, for example, Childs’s extensive work on biblical theology demonstrates the fertility of the Barthian tradition in this respect.

The impetus toward biblical theology stems from the gospel itself. Gabler’s distinction is helpful in that it enabled biblical theology to develop as a theological discipline in its own right, thereby making possible a deepened understanding of the inner unity of Scripture.

The Possibility of Biblical Theology Today

The growing sense of the diversity of Scripture in modernity (Levenson) and the ideological critique of postmodernity militate against the flourishing of biblical theologies of the Bible as a whole. Indeed, in recent years only two scholars, Childs and Scobie, have produced major theologies of the Bible in the English-speaking world. For many biblical scholars, biblical theology is not a viable possibility.

The more immediate context for (the lack of) contemporary efforts in biblical theology is the rise and demise of the so-called Biblical Theology Movement (BTM). Dates for this movement can be set with precision, from around 1945 to 1961, when publications by Gilkey and Barr are said to have sunk the BTM. Although biblical theology should not be equated with the BTM, it has never fully recovered from its demise. The BTM was strongly Protestant, particularly American, and consciously oriented toward reading the Bible for the church, while acknowledging the legitimacy of historical criticism. The BTM was connected with the emergence of the “neoorthodoxy” of Barth, although it tended to be suspicious of Barth’s supposed rejection of historical criticism. Indeed, (p 87) Brunner rather than Barth was the greater influence on the BTM.

The BTM in the USA represented a major attempt to break out of the impasse of the modernist/fundamentalist debate about the Bible that had plagued American churches, through a vibrant recovery of biblical theology. Childs (Crisis) identifies its major emphases:

1. A recovery of the Bible as a theological book. Historical criticism has a legitimate role to play, but it represents the start and not the end; it must lead us to hear God address us through his word, and biblical theology is a major ingredient in this respect.
2. The unity of the Bible as a whole. The BTM regarded it as vital that we overcome the chasm that had opened up between OT and NT.
3. The BTM made God’s revelation of himself in history central to biblical theology. In this respect Israel was regarded as utterly unique, and God reveals his being and will through his great acts, particularly in the OT through his redemption of the Israelites from Egypt.
4. The BTM laid great stress on the distinctiveness of the biblical perspective.

By 1961 the BTM, which manifested such energy and hope for a recovery of the Bible, was verging on collapse. What were the structural deficiencies that facilitated the demise of this great edifice? Childs (Crisis) argues that there were a host of unresolved problems in the BTM that eroded it from within and made it vulnerable to attack from Barr and Gilkey from without:

1. According to Childs the BTM never resolved the issue of the Bible and its authority. Fundamentalism was rejected, but so too was Barth’s use of the Bible, which was regarded as not taking historical criticism sufficiently seriously. Problematically, no clear alternative emerged to either of these views. For all its emphasis on the Bible, the BTM failed to produce great commentaries and generally seemed to confine its use of the Bible to a few favorite books.
2. Second, the emphases of the BTM were seldom translated into educational and curriculum policy in the seminaries.
3. In the late 1950s and in the 1960s, the church was feeling the need to respond to the modern world and the great diversity of challenges it represented. The BTM appeared to be sorely lacking in this respect. It had not given rise to a new style of preaching, and theological ethics seemed to be getting along quite well without it.
4. The BTM’s emphasis on God’s acts in history appeared to solve many problems, but this apparent success concealed some major cracks in its edifice, cracks that James Barr and Langdon Gilkey exploited ruthlessly.

The arguments that facilitated the demise of the BTM bear close scrutiny. Gilkey argues that the BTM got caught between being half liberal and modern, and half biblical and orthodox: “Its world view or cosmology is modern, while its theological language is biblical and orthodox” (194). In opposition to liberalism, the BTM asserted its belief in revelation through God’s mighty acts, thereby understanding God’s speech and acts literally and univocally. At the same time it held on to the modern belief in the causal continuum same time it held on to the modern belief in the causal continuum.

A modern understanding of causality means that most of the biblical events did not in fact happen. Instead, they become symbols: “We believe that the biblical people lived in the same causal continuum of space and time in which we live, and so one in which no divine wonders transpired and no divine voices were heard” (Gilkey 196). Gilkey probes the writings of the BTM in this respect and finds them riddled with contradictions. He argues that the implication of this tension for the BTM is that the Bible is really a book of great acts the Hebrews believed God to have done, but which we know he in fact did not do. The result is that the mighty acts of God are reduced to God’s “inward incitement of a religious response to an ordinary event within the space-time continuum” (201), akin to Schleiermacher’s emphasis on religious experience. Gilkey argues that the BTM needs a more sophisticated view of language and a theological ontology. Hebrew recital must be distinguished from our recital; the biblical writers use language univocally, whereas we know that we can only speak of God analogically.

Living as we do in the light of postmodern undermining of many aspects of modernity, it is remarkable to think how effective was Gilkey’s argument. There is an implicit assumption of the modern myth of progress. It is now apparent that Gilkey is assuming the particular perspective of modernity, as well as misrepresenting the biblical and Christian tradition. Even within the Bible there is awareness that its language of God is not univocal. And certainly the Christian tradition is well aware of the complexity of its language for (p 88) and of God. Already in Aquinas we find a careful distinction between univocal, equivocal, and analogical language.

Barr’s critique of the BTM relates to two main areas, the concept of revelation and history central to the BTM (Interpretation, 65–102), and its misuse of word studies and the so-called Greek/Hebrew contrast in views of the world. Barr’s critique of the historical emphasis of the BTM is similar to that of Gilkey. He focuses on the antinomy or “double talk” between the confession of God’s acts in history, and history as the result of critical examination of data. Barr furthermore finds that substantial parts of the Bible do not fit with a historical emphasis.

Barr's better-known critique is of the BTM's persistent failure to take modern semantics into account and thus to be guilty time and again of "illegitimate totality transfer," thereby wrongly reading meanings into words. Barr is critical of the tendency of the BTM to find the distinctive theological content of the Bible in its vocabulary, as exemplified, for example, in the Kittel-Friedrich dictionary (TDNT).

There was undoubtedly a need for Barr's critique of the understanding of how language worked in the BTM. However, Francis Watson has rightly argued that Barr's critique of the BTM in this respect is not as devastating as is often suggested by others and by Barr himself. According to Watson, Barr builds his sweeping criticism on a narrow foundation and wrongly suggests that the errors are foundational to the entire project of the BTM. Watson reexamines Cullmann's work on time, a particular object of Barr's critique, and demonstrates how Cullmann is aware of the diverse ways in which the NT words for time are used, but consciously chooses to focus on occasions that are theologically poignant. For Watson, such an approach is quite legitimate. Barr also criticizes Cullmann for his contrast between Hebrew and Greek thought. Cullmann contrasts the NT view of the resurrection with the "Greek" concept of immortality and, as Watson shows, Cullmann is quite right in this respect.

Watson concludes: "There is little basis for his claim that 'biblical theology' as once practised was fundamentally and irretrievably flawed. If biblical theology collapsed, it did not do so because of the overwhelming force of its critics' arguments" (24). Indeed, "there is, then, little or nothing in this piece of modern theological history to deter one from attempting to renew and to redefine biblical theology" (26).

The significant corpus of literature the BTM produced has largely disappeared. While we should not repeat its errors, the positive elements in it need to be retrieved, and not least its sense that biblical theology and theological interpretation are closely allied. What is clear from both Gilkey's and Barr's critiques of the BTM is that they stem from particular theological outlooks. The demise of the BTM is related to the radicalization of modern theology at the time, and Barr appeals regularly to this "progress" as part of his critique. What is lacking in Barr's and Gilkey's approach is a healthy sense of plurality in theology and the way in which different theological perspectives might relate to something like the BTM. Barr's approach, for example, is much that of liberal theology, whereas Childs's is that of a scholar working in the Reformed, Barthian tradition. These contexts orient them toward biblical theology and the BTM in quite different ways. Theological context makes a huge difference when it comes to (the very possibility of) biblical theology.

Biblical Theology and Theological Interpretation

Assuming, therefore, the possibility and importance of biblical theology, how might it relate to theological interpretation?

1. *Tota Scriptura. Theological interpretation is concerned with reading the Bible for the church today. In that process it inevitably assumes an understanding of the Bible as a whole. In this respect biblical theology connects not only with sola scriptura but also tota scriptura. Scripture as a whole is confessed to be God's word. The major contribution of biblical theology is to deepen our understanding of the shape, complexity, and unity of Scripture on its own terms. Barr (Concept) calls this type of biblical theology "panbiblical" and says that we should not focus on it at the expense of all the biblical theological work done on smaller parts of the Bible. However, the intuition that motivates comprehensive biblical theology stems from the gospel itself, so that discernment of the inner unity of the Bible must remain the goal and crown of biblical theology.

Theological interpretation will inevitably focus on and draw from different parts of the Bible—a strong sense of the macrobiblical theological context will constrain such interpretation against proof-texting and selective myopia. An example of this is the selective use made by some theologians of the exodus motif in the Bible. A sense of the larger context of biblical theology constrains (p 89) use of this motif in terms of its relation to creation and redemption and their interrelationship (Levenson; O'Donovan).

2. *The Relationship between Bible and Theology. Biblical theology and its (im)possibility bear strongly on the relationship between the Bible and theology. In his analysis of the uses of the Bible in theology, Kelsey (158ff.) articulates the question as to whether the discrimen—the imaginative construal the reader brings to the Bible so that it functions theologically as Scripture—comes from the community or reader, or whether Scripture norms the discrimen. Kelsey argues that the unified appropriation of Scripture for theology results from the discrimen the reader brings to Scripture. However, this approach seems to underplay the role of biblical theology in the process. Biblical theology as the attempt to articulate the inner unity of Scripture suggests that Scripture itself may norm the discrimen. Certainly this is the case in the work of a theologian such as O'Donovan, about whose work we shall say more below.

It should also be noted that the relationship between biblical theology and theology is not one-way but dialectical. Calvin asserted that the role of a good theology is to lead us back into the Bible so as to hear it better (Childs).

3. *The Relationship between the Testaments. This remains the key issue for biblical theology. Irenaeus's fight to affirm the identity of the OT "LORD" with the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ remains foundational for the practice of a Christian biblical theology. In response to salvation-historical readings of the Bible, Reventlow (14) asserts that by itself the Christ event should not be regarded as a continuation of the OT event; only faith sees it thus. Such a believing assumption is an indispensable starting point for a Christian biblical theology.

Yoder, Hauerwas, and Hays advocate a narrative approach to the Bible, but one in which Jesus' pacifism is central and critically normative in relation to the OT traditions. By comparison, Reformed biblical theology discerns a deeper unity between the Testaments anchored around the themes of covenant and kingdom. Indeed, a major issue today is Christian interpretation of the OT. Childs has become cautious of his earlier use of quotations of the OT in the NT as a means of tracking biblical theology (Crisis). He has become more aware of the need to do justice to the discrete witness of the OT and thus to hear the OT on its own terms first (Old and New). By comparison, Watson argues for a christological reading of the OT and finds von Rad a more fecund source in this respect. In response to Watson, Seitz asserts that we instead need a trinitarian hermeneutic that will allow us to hear the voice of the OT on its own terms, as Childs recommends.

4. *Appropriate Methods for Biblical Theology. Diverse methods have been proposed in OT and NT theology, methods such as dogmatic, diachronic, cross-section (Eichrodt for the OT), redemptive-historical, topical, and so on (see Hasel, OT Theology; Hasel, NT Theology). Similarly, certain major models for biblical theology can be discerned today: dogmatic, typological, great themes, redemptive history, narrative, cultural-linguistic, sociological, Jewish biblical theology, and canonical (Childs, Old and New). Such methodological pluralism has led some to doubt the rigor and possibility of the discipline itself. However, if we imagine Scripture as a great cathedral, with multiple entrances and rooms, then it is easier to see how a variety of approaches may be legitimate and even complementary, just as a cathedral can be explored in many different ways and from a variety of angles. Thus, there is, for example, no reason why separate OT and NT theologies may not be of great value provided they are part of a broader goal of articulating a biblical theology as a whole. And there is surely room for a range of biblical theologies, operating along topical, dogmatic, great ideas, redemptive-historical, story lines, and so on. Yet, what these approaches will need to share, if they are to fund theological interpretation, is recognition of the Bible as canonical and the ancient sense of its inner unity that comes from Christian faith.

Such a model of diverse but complementary approaches within a canonical framework still leaves open the question of whether or not there is a main entrance to the cathedral of Scripture from which its inner unity can most clearly be discerned. Theologically, such a center would certainly be Christ, and it remains a matter of debate as to how to articulate this more precisely, whether in terms of the kingdom of God or other such expressions.

5. *Biblical Theology and God's Address for All of Life. The BTM failed to relate biblical theology to the wide variety of challenges with which modernity presented the church in the twentieth century. This is surprising because any biblical theology attentive to themes such as creation and re-creation (cf. Gunton) will be aware of the comprehensive scope of the Bible. Contemporary theological interpretation needs to wrestle with the scope of the Bible as God's (p 90) address for all of life in our postmodern context. There are some fine examples of this, such as Brueggemann's work on The Land, but the terrain is largely uncharted.

6. *Biblical Theology and Theological Interpretation: An Example. Undoubtedly, biblical theology and theology can be related in a variety of helpful ways. An excellent example of how biblical theology might fund theological interpretation is O'Donovan's work in theological ethics. In Resurrection and Moral Order, the Pauline insight of resurrection as the reaffirmation of creation provides the construal whereby O'Donovan is able to read the Bible as a whole for theological ethics. In The Desire of the Nations, this insight remains but is informed by a redemptive historical sense of God's work in Israel, which climaxes in Jesus of Nazareth. In both cases biblical theology is a vital ingredient that enables O'Donovan to take Scripture in its totality with the utmost seriousness while doing theological work with a high degree of sophistication. Even as theological concepts take hold in his work, O'Donovan continues to do thick, creative readings of the Bible. Thus, that exegesis increases rather than decreases as the Bible is brought to bear on politics.

Conclusion

As the church fathers realized, biblical theology in the sense of discerning the inner unity of the Bible is an indispensable ingredient in theological interpretation if the latter is to take the authority of Scripture seriously. Modern biblical theology has had a checkered history, so it is tempting to separate biblical theology from theological interpretation. This would be a serious mistake since some sense of the unity of Scripture will always be a vital ingredient in any reading of the Bible for the church. Of late, comprehensive biblical theologies have been the exception rather than the rule. It will be vital for a renewal in biblical theology to accompany any renewal of theological interpretation.

Bibliography

Barr, J. The Concept of Biblical Theology. Fortress, 1999; idem. Old and New in Interpretation. SCM, 1966. 2d ed., 1982; Bartholomew, C. "Biblical Theology and Biblical Interpretation: Introduction." Pages 1–22 in Out of Egypt, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2004; Bartholomew, C., et al., eds. A Royal Priesthood? SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2002; Brueggemann, W. The Land. Fortress, 1977; Childs, B. Biblical Theology in Crisis. Westminster, 1970; idem. Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments. Fortress, 1992; Eichrodt, W. Theology of the Old Testament, trans. J. Baker. 2 vols. OTL. Westminster, 1961–67; Fowl, S. Engaging Scripture. Blackwell, 1998; Gabler, J. P. "An Oration." Pages 492–502 in The Flowering of Old Testament Theology, ed. B. Ollenburger, E. Martens, and G. Hasel. Eisenbrauns, 1992; Gilkey, L. "Cosmology, Ontology, and the Travail of Biblical Language." JR (1961): 194–205; Gunton, C. Christ and Creation. Paternoster/Eerdmans, 1992; Hasel, G. New Testament Theology. Eerdmans, 1978; idem. Old Testament Theology. 4th ed. Eerdmans, 1991; Kelsey, D. The Uses of Scripture in Recent Theology. SCM, 1975; Levenson, J. The Hebrew Bible, the Old Testament, and Historical Criticism. Westminster John Knox, 1993; Lubac, H. de. Catholicism. Sheed & Ward, 1958; O'Donovan, O. The Desire of the Nations. Cambridge University Press, 1996; idem. Resurrection and Moral Order. IVP/Eerdmans, 1986; Ollenburger, B. "Biblical Theology: Situating the Discipline." Pages 37–62 in Understanding the Word, ed. J. T. Butler et al. Sheffield Academic Press, 1985; Rad, G. von. Old Testament Theology, trans. D. Stalker. Vol. 1, Harper, 1962. Vol. 2, Harper & Row, 1965. Reprint, Westminster, 2001; Reventlow, H. G. Problems of Biblical Theology in the Twentieth Century. SCM, 1986; Sandys-Wunsch, J., and L. Eldredge. "J. P. Gabler and the Distinction between Biblical and Dogmatic Theology: Translation, Commentary, and Discussion of His Originality." SJT 33, no. 2 (1980): 133–58; Scobie, C. The Ways of Our God. Eerdmans, 2003; Seitz, C. "Christological Interpretation of Texts and Trinitarian Claims to Truth." SJT 52, no. 2 (1999): 209–26; Stuckenbruck, L. "Johann Philipp Gabler and the Delineation of Biblical Theology." SJT 52, no. 2 (1999): 139–57; Watson, F. Text and Truth. T&T Clark, 1997; Wilken, R. L. The Spirit of Early Christian Thought. Yale University Press,

Biography

Ancient or Modern?

Our modern world is preoccupied with people, and the development of a postmodern rejection of the “big picture” has only intensified this with its fascination about individuals. Over the last century or so, biography has become a major tool for understanding people within society. Thus at a more academic level, biographies have sought to describe the life and times of significant persons, to set the individual in the context of the major events of his or her period, often at great length. On the other hand, popular literature is full of instant biographies that reflect the current obsession with celebrities, what they look like, and speculations about their private life. Both types are indebted to a post-Freudian interest in “personality,” to understand what makes an individual “tick.” The problem for the theological interpretation of Scripture occurs when readers today bring these understandings of biography to the books of the Bible, especially the Gospels: to what extent can they be read as biographies of Jesus?

(p 91)The Interpretation of the Gospels*

For much of the ancient and medieval periods, the Gospels, like the rest of the Bible, could be interpreted on several levels: The literal meaning provided facts. An allegorical interpretation applied the text to the story of redemption. Moral approaches gave instructions for behavior. And an anagogical reading related it to the reader’s spiritual pilgrimage. The Reformers rejected all levels except the literal, and so the Gospels were interpreted as history—the stories of Jesus, even biographies. They were even used to produce romantic “Lives” such as Ernest Renan’s Life of Jesus (1863). However, when modern biographers began to explain the personality of someone through the individual’s upbringing, schooling, psychological development, and so on, the Gospels looked unlike such biographies.

Uniqueness. During the 1920s, scholars like K. L. Schmidt and Rudolf Bultmann rejected any notion that the Gospels were biographies; the Gospels have no interest in Jesus’ personality or appearance, and they tell us little about his life, other than his brief public ministry, concentrating on his death. Instead, the Gospels were seen as popular folk literature, collections of stories handed down orally over time. Far from biographies, the Gospels were described as sui generis (Bultmann 371–74). For Bultmann, this interpretation had theological implications: God's unique revelation of his word in Jesus Christ was written in a unique genre.

Historical and Sociological Interpretations. Form-critical approaches meant that the Gospels were no longer read as whole narratives or theological documents. Instead, the concentration on each individual pericope moved the focus to the passage's Sitz im Leben in the early church, and traditio-historical analysis replaced theological interpretations. The rise of redaction criticism led to the development of theories and sociological analysis about the groups that produced them, the so-called Johannine or Matthean communities. However, redaction critics did see the writers of the Gospels as individual theologians, and the development of new literary approaches to the Gospels viewed them as conscious literary artists. This reopened the question of the place of the Gospels within first-century literature, with scholars like Talbert and Aune treating them as biographies.

The Gospels as Ancient Biography

Genre Is Central to the Interpretation of Any Text.

Communication theory considers the relationship of transmitter, message, and receiver—or author, text, and audience. Discerning the kind of communication is crucial, for both transmitter and receiver must use the same conventions: thus, correct interpretation depends on a correct identification of the kind of communication. One does not listen to a fairy story in the same way as to a news broadcast. Hence, genre is central in both composition and the interpretation. Genre forms an agreement, often unspoken, or even unconscious, between authors and readers, whereby the author writes according to a set of expectations, and readers interpret the work using the same conventions. Genre is identified through a wide range of “generic features,” which may be signaled in advance, or embedded in a work's formal and structural composition and content. Taken together, such features communicate the “family resemblance” of a work.

Ancient “Lives.” In examining whether the Gospels are a form of ancient biography, we must consider the generic features shared by ancient “lives” or bioi—the word biographia does not appear until the ninth-century writer Photius. From the formal or structural perspective, they are written in continuous prose narrative, between 10,000 and 20,000 words—the amount on a typical scroll of about 30–35 feet in length. Unlike modern biographies, Greco-Roman lives do not cover a person's whole life in chronological sequence, and they have no psychological analysis of the subject's character. They may begin with a brief mention of the hero's ancestry, family, or city, his birth and an occasional anecdote about his upbringing; but usually the narrative moves rapidly on to his public debut later in life. Accounts of generals, politicians, or statesmen are more chronologically ordered, recounting their great deeds and virtues; lives of philosophers, writers, or thinkers are more anecdotal, arranged topically around collections of their ideas and teachings. Although the author may provide information about his subject, often his underlying aims include apologetic, polemic, or didactic. Many ancient biographies cover the subject's death in great detail, since here he reveals his true character, gives his definitive teaching, or does his greatest deed. Finally, analysis of the verbal structure of ancient biographies reveals another generic feature. Though most narratives have a wide variety of subjects, it is characteristic of biography to focus on one particular person, with a quarter to a third of the verbs dominated by the subject, while another 15 to 30 percent occur (p 92) in his sayings, speeches, or quotations (Burridge, What? 261–74).

Lives of Jesus. Like other ancient biographies, the Gospels are continuous prose narratives of the length of a single scroll, composed of stories, anecdotes, sayings, and speeches. Their concentration on Jesus' public ministry from his baptism to death, and on his teaching and great deeds, is not much different from the content of other ancient biographies. Similarly, the amount of space given to the last week of Jesus' life, his death, and the resurrection reflects that given to the subject's death and subsequent events in works by Plutarch, Tacitus, Nepos, and Philostratus. Verbal analysis demonstrates that Jesus is the subject of a quarter of the verbs in Mark's Gospel, with a further fifth spoken by him in his teaching and parables. About half the verbs in the other Gospels either have Jesus as the subject or are on his lips: like other ancient biographies, Jesus' deeds and words are of vital importance for the evangelists' portraits of Jesus. Therefore, these marked similarities of form and content demonstrate that the Gospels have the generic features of ancient biographies.

Theological Implications

A Christological Claim. It is significant that Jesus was the only first-century Jewish teacher about whom such a bios was written. Individual Gospel pericopae can be helpfully compared with rabbinic stories and anecdotes. Thus, the greatest-commandment debate (Mark 12:28–34 et par.) is like the famous story of the differing reactions of Shammai and Hillel when asked to teach the whole law to a Gentile inquirer standing on one leg (b. Šabb. 31A). If the Gospels are seen merely as a collection of such stories strung together like beads on a string, we might expect similar works about Hillel, Shammai, or the others. Yet this is precisely what we do not find. Both Neusner and Alexander have explored reasons why there is nothing like the Gospels in the rabbinic traditions. BurrIDGE (“Gospel,” 155–56) has argued that to write a biography is to focus on a human person center stage, where only the Torah should be. Therefore, the biographical genre of the Gospels is making an explicit theological claim about the centrality of Jesus, that the full revelation of God is to be found in the life, death, and resurrection of this person.

Focus on Jesus. Since the Gospels are portraits of a person, they must be interpreted in a biographical manner. Given that space is limited to a single scroll—ranging from Mark’s 11,250 words to Luke’s 19,500—every pericope or passage contributes to the overall picture of Jesus according to each evangelist. Thus, Christology becomes central to the interpretation of the Gospels. Each evangelist builds up his account of Jesus through the selection, redaction, and ordering of material. The key question for the interpretation of any verse or section is what this tells us about Jesus and the writer’s understanding of him. Hence, the motif of the failure of the disciples to understand Jesus in Mark is not to be interpreted as polemic against differing groups and leaders within the early church, as often in a more form-critical approach. Instead, it is part of Mark’s portrayal of Jesus as hard to understand and tough to follow—and therefore readers should not be surprised to find the Christian life sometimes difficult. Reading the Gospels requires a thorough understanding of the Christology of each evangelist, while every section must be interpreted in the context of its place in the whole theological narrative. BurrIDGE (Four?) has attempted to describe the particular Christology of each Gospel writer through the traditional images of the human face, lion, ox, and eagle.

Plurality within Limits. Theological interpretation must also take account of the presence of four Gospels within the canon. The diversity was a problem for ancient pagan critics and comes up in debate today, especially with Muslims. Yet Morgan has argued that this is a theological opportunity to produce “faith images of Jesus,” with the four canonical portraits acting as both “stimulus and control” (386). Therefore, we must resist the temptation since Tatian’s Diatessaron to reduce everything to a single master narrative, or even the amalgam mixing different Gospels’ passages, as often found in carol services or Good Friday meditations. The theology of each evangelist needs to be respected, while the canon of all four serves to establish the limits for orthodox interpretations of Jesus. The twentieth-century scholarly consensus about the uniqueness of the Gospels' genre produced a sociohistorical interpretation of them as documents produced "by committees, for communities, about concepts." However, their biographical genre means that they must be interpreted as "by people, for people, about a person" (Burridge, "About," 115, 144). This means paying proper attention to their biographical focus on the person of Jesus Christ and their theological understanding of him as we seek to interpret his significance for today.

See also Gospels; Jesus, Quest for the Historical

(p 93)Bibliography*

Alexander, P. "Rabbinic Biography and the Biography of Jesus: A Survey of the Evidence." Pages 19–50 in Synoptic Studies, ed. C. Tuckett. JSNTSup 7. JSOT, 1984; Aune, D. The New Testament in Its Literary Environment. Westminster, 1987; Bultmann, R. The History of the Synoptic Tradition. Rev. ed. with supplement, trans. J. Marsh. Blackwell, 1972; Burridge, R. "About People, by People, for People: Gospel Genre and Audiences." Pages 113–45 in The Gospels for All Christians, ed. R. Bauckham. Eerdmans, 1998; idem. Four Gospels, One Jesus? SPCK/Eerdmans, 1994; idem. "Gospel Genre, Christological Controversy and the Absence of Rabbinic Biography: Some Implications of the Biographical Hypothesis." Pages 137–56 in Christology, Controversy, and Community, ed. C. Tuckett and D. Horrell. Brill, 2000; idem. What Are the Gospels? SNTSMS 70. Cambridge University Press, 1992; Morgan, R. "The Hermeneutical Significance of Four Gospels." Interpretation 33, no. 4 (Oct 1979): 376–88; Neusner, J. In Search of Talmudic Biography. Brown Judaic Studies 70. Scholars Press, 1984; idem. Why No Gospels in Talmudic Judaism? Scholars Press, 1988; Talbert, C. H. What Is a Gospel? Fortress, 1977/SPCK, 1978.

Richard A. Burridge

Body See Human Being, Doctrine of

Bonhoeffer, Dietrich

In 1925 Bonhoeffer, a young student at the University of Berlin, wrote a seminar paper on "The Historical and Pneumatological Interpretation of Scripture" (Young, 285–99) that set out an approach to the interpretation of Scripture to which he adhered throughout his life. While this approach can best be seen in his specifically exegetical writings (e.g., Creation and Fall; and Discipleship) and sermons, it is implicit more generally in his other theological writings.

The influence of Karl Barth's commentary The Epistle to the Romans is evident throughout Bonhoeffer's seminar paper and, behind that, the legacy of the Protestant Reformation. Without rejecting the achievements of historical criticism, Bonhoeffer noted that once it had done its work, the canon of Scripture disintegrated, leaving only debris and fragments behind. Thus, if we are truly seeking to listen to the word of God in Scripture, we cannot be captive to the shifting results of critical study. But pneumatological interpretations of Scripture that make experience the criterion for interpreting Scripture are equally problematic, for they do not take the historicity of revelation seriously. The key issue is therefore the relationship between the letter of Scripture, which historical criticism helps us understand better, and the Spirit, who speaks to us through Scripture as witness to God's revelation. The letter of Scripture is dead unless the Spirit gives it life, awakening our response within the community of faith. Discerning the word of God within the words of Scripture is what the theological interpretation of the Bible is all about. As Bonhoeffer put it in his introduction to Creation and Fall: "Theological exposition takes the Bible as the book of the church and interprets it as such. This is its presupposition and this presupposition constitutes its method; its method is a continual returning from the text (as determined by all the methods of philological and historical research) to this presupposition" (22).

Bonhoeffer's approach to Scripture was profoundly affected during his year of study in New York in 1930–31, when he discovered the liberating power of the Bible in relation to his own life. This call to obedience to the word of God in the biblical witness prepared him for his role in the church struggle against Nazism. At an ecumenical conference at Gland in 1932, he declared: "We are more fond of our own thoughts than the thoughts of the Bible. We no longer read the Bible seriously, we no longer read it against ourselves, but for ourselves" (No Rusty Swords, 185).

Three further comments are relevant for our discussion. The first is Bonhoeffer's recognition of the importance of the OT in preventing us from falsely spiritualizing the witness of the NT. The second is his rejection of Bultmann's program of demythologization as a liberal reductionism, in which the concrete and contextual character of the biblical message is denied in the interests of some universal truth. The third is his proposal for a "nonreligious" hermeneutics with an emphasis on identifying with Christ in solidarity with the victims of oppression.

Bibliography

Bonhoeffer, D. Creation and Fall. Dietrich Bonhoeffer Works 3, ed. J. de Gruchy. Fortress, 1997; idem. No Rusty Swords. Collins, 1977; idem. The Young Bonhoeffer: 1918–1927. Dietrich Bonhoeffer Works 9, ed. C. Green et al. Fortress, 2002.

Bultmann, Rudolf See Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics

(p 94) C

Calling/Vocation

The idea of the call of God is deeply rooted in biblical thought. The God of the Bible does not hold himself aloof from the world, but reaches out and establishes relationship with us. One of the more frequent expressions of this outreach is found in narratives of divine calling. In the Bible calling is basically a summons by which a person enters into some relationship with God. As such, it is not infrequently a shattering human experience (Jer. 1:4–10). From the theological point of view, however, the call is grounded in the will of God himself as expressed in his word of grace and command, and as mediated by the power of the Spirit working in human lives.

So important is the idea of God's calling in a variety of biblical contexts that talk of the call of God can actually be synonymous with talk of salvation itself. For example, we read in the prophet Hosea: "When Israel was a child, I loved him, and out of Egypt I called my son" (Hos. 11:1). Here the "call" is shorthand for God's deliverance of the people of Israel in the exodus, and thus refers to the primal salvation story of the OT. Similarly, in what is likely the earliest document of the NT, the "call" again denotes the offer of salvation itself. We are urged to live a life worthy of the God who "calls [us] into his own kingdom and glory" (1 Thess. 2:12 NRSV). Elsewhere, the call is also closely aligned with the concept of election. It is because Israel has been "chosen" that it is also "called" (Isa. 41:8–9); in the NT, by the same logic, it is because the Gentiles have also been chosen by God that they too are called, in order to be included among God's people (Rom. 8:30; 9:24–25).

Calling, Protestantism, and Modernity

The common contemporary use of the words “calling” and “vocation” to refer to the professions or careers upon which a person can embark, therefore, is quite alien to the root meaning of calling in the Bible. The origin of this secular understanding has been much debated since M. Weber’s Die protestantische Ethik und der “Geist” des Kapitalismus (1904–5). In this seminal sociological study, Weber argued that the successful rise of capitalism in the early modern period was closely linked with Protestant and, in particular, Calvinist piety. In Weber’s interpretation, it was no accident that capitalism first flourished in contexts such as Scotland and New England. In these cultural settings, Calvinism led people to reject any notion of a “monkish” withdrawal from the world, and to believe instead that a life of Christian perfection was both obligatory and attainable in this world. According to Weber, Calvinism accordingly interpreted the world of ordinary work, marriage, and so forth as having full religious significance. Thus, it generated the conditions under which an occupation could be embraced as a “calling” in the religious sense, and under which the generation of wealth could be viewed as a moral obligation. The near-universal recognition of the Weberian phrase “the Protestant work ethic” testifies to the pervasive influence of this thesis.

There is, however, little basis in Scripture for Weber’s understanding of calling, so that it is difficult to envisage a strict Calvinist culture giving such a secular twist to the idea. Even 1 Cor. 7:17–24, the text most often cited in this connection, nowhere directly equates an occupation with a vocation. Furthermore, virtually every Calvinist in early modern Scotland and New England knew that there was such a thing as an “effectual calling,” which in the Westminster Confession of Faith (10.1) was formidably defined as the bringing of the predestined to actual faith and obedience. In strict Calvinist circles, this doctrine (for doctrine it emphatically was) is also known as “irresistible grace.” The Calvinists of Scotland and New England learned this view of calling by heart from their Shorter Catechism:

Q. 31. What is effectual calling?

A. Effectual calling is the work of God’s Spirit, whereby, convincing us of our sin and misery, enlightening our minds in the knowledge of Christ, and renewing our wills, he doth persuade and enable (p 95) us to embrace Jesus Christ, freely offered to us in the gospel.

Nor is such a view necessarily restricted to classical Calvinism. A recent Roman Catholic document says in another voice something similar concerning the basic theological sense of calling:

God, infinitely perfect and blessed in himself, in a plan of sheer goodness freely created man to make him share in his own blessed life. For this reason, at every time and in every place, God draws close to man. He calls man to seek him, to know him, to love him with all his strength. (Catholic Church, 1.1)

Modernity, however, from its beginnings in the philosophical revolutions of the seventeenth century and in the culture that these inspired, has struggled to draw down the kingdom of God to the earth, insisting upon the this-worldly character of “rational” religion. Against its inevitable triumph stood only the ancient deceptions of “priestcraft,” deceptions that could be exposed through reason. It was primarily in this context that the earlier understanding of calling came to be reinterpreted in terms of secular occupations. Such reinterpretation follows from the innermost logic of modernity. The Christian religion is construed in the Enlightened sense, so that righteousness amounts to following the dictates of ordinary human moral sensibility rather than hearing the promise of the gospel with faith. Hence, the point at which a person “hears the call” can only be where one engages in “rational” moral action. Perhaps for this reason, much modern usage of “calling” and “vocation” implies a reference to the caring professions in particular (education, medicine, etc.).

Within liberal Protestantism, Weber’s thesis concerning vocation found clear resonance. On the whole the liberals embraced the Enlightened vision, seeking to highlight the moral content of Christian faith and its this-worldly character—though also admittedly attempting to defend against the harsher criticisms of church, theology, and faith that the storm of the Enlightenment brought on. Representative liberal theologians of the early twentieth century, such as Ernst Troeltsch, quickly accepted Weber’s thesis, since they held the realization of a this-worldly “Protestant” faith to be the real goal of Christian history. Through the direct and indirect influence of such thinkers, the idea of vocation as occupation found its way into mainstream Protestant thought in the twentieth century. Though later resisted by a few theologians (e.g., Karl Barth), their objections have for the most part gone unnoticed.

Calling in Contemporary Theological Perspective

With the demise of the modernist vision, however, the challenge for theology in a postmodern context must surely be to develop afresh a theological understanding of the ideas of calling and vocation. One interesting option that presents itself in the present context is to reconceive calling with the help of virtue theory. From this point of view, a primary obligation laid upon the churches would be to become communities within which discernment of God's call and obedience to it become matters of attention, habit, and collective wisdom. But to be faithful to the biblical witness, such attention needs to be directed in the first instance to hearing the word of God, responding to the initiative of grace, and living out its implications in a life of godliness, rather than to fulfilling some role in the secular economy.

In a narrower sense, of course, though always within this larger vision, it is possible to speak of a calling to a particular office in the church. Paul was "called to be an apostle of Christ Jesus" just as the Corinthian believers to whom he wrote were "called" to faith (1 Cor. 1:1, 26). The latter, however, remains the normative kind of calling. Not all are apostles, but all are summoned to faith and obedience.

In bearing our witness to the gospel, however, the fulfillment of our calling in leading a life worthy of the Lord must influence life in the public sphere. In this derivative sense, we can fulfill God's calling in an occupation or some social role. In the case of a figure such as Martin Luther King, and in the context of the American South in the 1950s–60s, one might well judge that faithfulness to the call of God needed to take precisely the form it did. But this is not at all the same as to say that such activism was in and of itself King's calling. On the contrary, King's work and witness had religious depth precisely because it was so rooted in Christian faith and in the service of our neighbor, which the gospel requires.

Bibliography

Badcock, G. The Way of Life. Eerdmans, 1998; Catholic Church. Catechism of the Catholic Church. 2d ed. U.S. Catholic Conference, 2000; Hardy, L. The Fabric of This World. Eerdmans, 1990; Schuurman, D. Vocation. Eerdmans, 2004; Troeltsch, E. The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, trans. O. Wyon. 2 vols. Macmillan, 1931; Volf, M. Work in the Spirit. Oxford, 1991; Weber, M. The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of (p 96)Capitalism, trans. T. Parsons. 2d ed. Allen & Unwin, 1976; Wingren, G. Luther on Vocation, trans. C. Rasmussen. Muhlenberg, 1957.

Gary D. Badcock

Calvin, John

Having joined the "evangelical" or Protestant movement in the early 1530s through what he later called a "sudden conversion," Calvin describes himself, in his rare autobiographical statements, as instilled from childhood with reverence for the church. But his conversion brought a new teachability, fueled by an equally new taste of purer doctrine and true godliness. In his career as a Reformer of both Strasbourg and Geneva, Calvin would retain all these traits as ingredients for the interpretation and application of Scripture.

For Calvin, the virtue of Scripture for the reader lay in its utility or benefit, and the key that unlocked those benefits was an understanding of the scope of Scripture—the goal or purpose of the writer. Calvin’s instincts as a reader and proclaimer of the Bible were hugely shaped by his absorption of the rhetorical agenda of Renaissance humanism, which sought the truest human knowledge in a return to the classical sources, including the Bible. In Calvin’s case, his turning to the classics was concerned less with beauty of expression than with how to ascertain an author’s meaning and how to communicate that meaning persuasively.

Accordingly, Calvin’s earliest exegetical work, his 1539 commentary on Romans, made his own commitments clear. First, Calvin asserted that the whole point of commenting on Scripture was “to lay open the mind of the writer.” To be sure, in the case of Scripture, Calvin was not overly concerned to distinguish between the divine and human authors of any particular text: the rules for interpretation, in either case, were the same. One effect of Calvin’s doctrine of inspiration was to confirm the Bible’s embeddedness in history and culture. Hence, the best tools for unlocking the mind of the scriptural writer always included a solid understanding of history, geography, and chronology, as well as matters of Hebrew and Greek grammar, genre, and context.

Second, from the outset of his career, Calvin attempted to write commentaries with “lucid brevity”; unlike many of his contemporaries, he usually succeeded. But this particular principle was much more than a plea for clear prose; it was also expressive of his commitment to exegesis in service of the church, including the laity. Here, too, one sees how Calvin always directed his exegesis to discern the benefits of what Scripture reveals and to communicate these benefits persuasively. Even as the Scriptures represent God’s accommodation of revelation to human capacity, so also must interpreters accommodate proclamation and teaching to their audiences.

Third, the earliest methodological remarks of Calvin demonstrate that he saw no tension whatsoever between the homiletical orientation of the exegete and the more dogmatic or didactic role of the theologian. Here it is helpful to read his preface to the 1539 edition of the Institutes alongside his Romans commentary; it becomes clear that he has in mind a common project served best by a division of genre. Calvin believed that the dogmatic and systematic exposition of doctrine is a natural outgrowth of exegesis. His goal of lucid brevity was strategically supported by reserving what could have been lengthy theological digressions—loci communes, commonplaces—for his oft-revised Institutes. That work is integrated far more closely with his commentaries than modern editions make known.

Fourth, Calvin's early remarks argue that Scripture is read best in dialogue with one's predecessors and contemporaries. Indeed, despite the common impression that sola scriptura signaled Protestants' rejection of tradition, for Calvin the final authority of Scripture by no means warranted neglect of earlier commentators or theologians. Calvin elsewhere went so far as to insist that these ancient writings (Augustine and Chrysostom took pride of place) were providentially arranged aids for our own reading of Scripture, and we would be ingrates to neglect them.

These affirmations of earlier exegetical literature provide a good point of departure for considering some important aspects of Calvin's later exegetical practices. These include not only his relationship to the traditional exegesis of his day, but also the question of how he implemented his own rules for interpreting and applying Scripture as his career unfolded.

If the motto sola scriptura is often mistaken as a dismissal of all tradition, the exegesis of early Protestants such as Calvin is just as often wrongly taken as having forsaken allegory in favor of a stark literalism. To be sure, Calvin did reject traditional interpretations that could not find support in what he variously described as the simple, literal, historical, or genuine meaning of the text. And in his more theoretical comments on this point, Calvin displayed a quick and instinctive (p 97) rejection of allegorical meanings, particularly those attributed to Origen and his successors, but also what he saw as the "fanciful" readings of many of the rabbis.

In practice, however, Calvin could not avoid all allegory nor, it turns out, did he wish to. At least, he had to reckon with the apparent warrant introduced by Paul in Gal. 4:24, where Sarah and Isaac's conflict with Hagar and Ishmael is presented as an allegoria of the conflict between faith and works, gospel and law. Forced to reckon with this apostolic allegory, Calvin insisted that here is no fictive or arbitrary metaphor, but simply a comparison between the household of Abraham and the church of Paul's day. The typology is legitimate because it is closely tied to the historical narrative; indeed, Abraham's household literally was the church in his day.

In his comments here and elsewhere, Calvin proceeds to retain many traditional typological interpretations of the relationship between the NT and OT and to introduce others of his own coinage. But he does so by establishing such links not as secret or spiritual meanings that upstage the "letter" of the text. Where the traditional allegories or anagogies are retained, they reappear either as adjuncts or extensions of the historical narrative (typological fulfillments, etc.) or as rhetorical devices employed by the biblical narrator (analogies, hyperbole, figures). Calvin can therefore truly be said to be more concerned for the literal sense of the text, but his interpretations are still concerned to find Scripture's application. In maintaining this "churchly" concern, however, he has more in common with the "spiritual" approach of his medieval forebears than with modern historical-critical exegesis.

All these exegetical moves on Calvin's part are governed by one fundamental conviction, still related to what he understood as the scope of Scripture in the broadest sense: Scripture tells of but one people of God, one covenant of grace, one gospel, and one story—the story of a gracious God's tenacious claim on a people called by his name. Most important of all, it is a story that extends beyond Scripture, to Calvin's own day, and (he would say) to ours.

Calvin is thus understandably lauded for the way his theological interpretation of Scripture finds a unity throughout the Bible and brings Scripture to bear on the life and faith of its readers, but not all should be counted as easy gain. If Calvin's passion for application brought biblical promises into the present, it also revived biblical antagonists. In his own day and in later centuries, many lamented his frequent polemical outbursts against modern-day heirs of Hagar and Ishmael—especially the Roman Catholics of the sixteenth century, along with Jews and Anabaptists. Any reappropriation of Calvin as a model for theological exegesis has to temper his methods and rhetoric by a sober appreciation of the dangers of a Protestant triumphalism, an appropriate measure of self-criticism, and an awareness of the lessons (good and bad) that might be drawn from modern ecumenism. Nonetheless, Calvin's vision of the unity of Scripture as the good news that draws a sinful people into obedience and hope remains a worthy goal today.

Bibliography

Kraus, H.-J. "Calvin's Exegetical Principles." Interpretation 31 (1977): 8–18; Millet, O. Calvin et la dynamique de la parole. Bibliothèque littéraire de la renaissance, série 3, tome 28. Editions Slatkine, 1992; Muller, R. "The Hermeneutic of Promise and Fulfillment in Calvin's Exegesis of the Old Testament Promises of the Kingdom." Pages 68–82 in The Bible in the Sixteenth Century, ed. D. Steinmetz. Duke University Press, 1990; idem. The Unaccommodated Calvin. Oxford Studies in Historical Theology. Oxford University Press, 2000; Parker, T. H. L. Calvin's New Testament Commentaries. 2d ed. Westminster John Knox, 1993; idem. Calvin's Old Testament Commentaries. T&T Clark, 1986; Puckett, D. John Calvin's Exegesis of the Old Testament. Columbia Studies in Reformed Theology. Westminster John Knox, 1995; Steinmetz, D. Calvin in Context. Oxford University Press, 1995; Thompson, J. "Calvin's Exegetical Legacy: His Reception and Transmission of Text and Tradition." Pages 31–56 in The Legacy of John Calvin: Calvin Studies Society Papers 1999, ed. D. Foxgrover. Calvin Studies Society, 2000; Wright, D. F. "Calvin's 'Accommodation' Revisited." Pages 171–90 in Calvin as Exegete, ed. P. De Klerk. Calvin Studies Society, 1995.

John L. Thompson

Canon

The term "canon," originally meaning a measuring rod or rule, and then a catalog or set of standards, has from the fourth century been in general Christian theological usage as a technical term for the list of sacred writings deemed normative for Christian belief and practice. The decline of theological and exegetical appeal to the canonicity of the biblical writings is one of the major indicators of the changed status of Scripture in modernity. Recent attempts in theology and biblical hermeneutics to rehabilitate the notion of canon are among the most important developments in contemporary biblical interpretation.

(p 98)History of the Canon*

The history of the development of the biblical canon is complex and controversial. The full canon of Jewish Scripture is a relatively late development. Though substantially complete at the beginning of the Christian era, it was not finally settled until the beginning of the second century CE. Postexilic Judaism was governed by the Torah, to which were added (possibly from around 400 BCE) the Prophets. These are the Former Prophets—Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings; the Latter Prophets—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel; and the twelve Minor Prophets. The so-called "Writings"—Psalms, Proverbs, Job, the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, and 1 and 2 Chronicles—only acquired common acceptance at some later point. In addition, there are a number of postexilic writings in Greek of apocryphal or pseudepigraphical status, widely used by Jews and by Christians in the first centuries of the church. Athanasius's canon of the OT in his Festal Letter of 367 includes, for example, Baruch and the Epistle of Jeremiah. Judith, Tobit, Sirach, 2 Esdras, and the Wisdom of Solomon commonly appear in early Christian lists of what are regarded as the accepted OT writings, indicating wide usage of such texts. In the latter half of the fourth century, Jerome (unlike, for example, Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, or Augustine) restricted the Christian OT to the thirty-nine Hebrew texts that now constitute the canon as set out by the Protestant Reformers. In the sixteenth century the Council of Trent established the wider list of Hebrew and apocryphal texts as de fide for Roman Catholics.

By the middle of the second century, the four Gospels and thirteen letters of Paul were generally accepted by the churches as authoritative apostolic teaching, to be read as Scripture alongside the OT. This can be seen from allusions to NT texts in the writings of the apostolic fathers, and from references to NT readings in public worship. A major stimulus to the development of an NT canon was given by the heretic Marcion, who promulgated a severely restricted list, comprising ten Pauline letters (excluding the Pastorals) and a truncated version of Luke's Gospel. In response, Irenaeus and Tertullian, for example, insisted on acceptance of all four Gospels. Though the core of the NT canon is thus stable by the end of the second century, the full list of writings does not settle for a further two hundred years. The so-called Muratorian Canon/Fragment (sometimes dated to the late second century, though it may be much later) lists all the NT books except Hebrews, James, and 1 and 2 Peter, but includes the Apocalypse of Peter and the Wisdom of Solomon. Early in the imperial era, Eusebius gives a list of universally accepted books (the four Gospels, thirteen Pauline letters, 1 John, and 1 Peter), a list of disputed books (including James, 2 Peter, Jude, 2 and 3 John, Hebrews, and Revelation), and a list of rejected texts (the apocryphal gospels and acts, the Didache, and others). Athanasius's Festal Letter of 367 lists the current twenty-seven NT books; but the canonical status of some texts (especially Hebrews, 2 Peter, Jude, and Revelation) remained in dispute. The first known full list of both OT and NT writings is that of the so-called Gelasian Decree (originating in the council around 380); this list is reproduced by the Council of Trent.

Theology of Canon

The status of the canon has undergone a drastic shift in modernity. The precise boundaries of the canon, and the relation of canonical writings to nonbiblical tradition, remained matters of confessional dispute after the Reformation. Yet, precritical Christian theology was largely agreed that Christian faith and practice are governed by a set of inspired texts whose antiquity, orthodoxy, and wide usage entitle them to be recognized as prophetic and apostolic Scripture. With the rise of the critical history of Christianity in the eighteenth century, a different account of the status of the canon and the lengthy processes of canonization came to prominence.

On this critical account, canonization is not so much an aspect of the providential ordering of the history of the church, but a set of contingent human undertakings. The effect of this is the “naturalization” of the canon, so that it comes to be regarded as an arbitrary or accidental feature of the Christian religion, to be explained, not transcendently, but simply in terms of the immanent processes of religious history. This means that the texts of the canon cease to be viewed as categorically different from other noncanonical texts. It means, further, that canonicity is to be defined as the result of an act of choice and authorization on the church’s part, apart from any supposed divine warrants for such an act. Moreover, the processes of canonization are not viewed as the church’s gradual perception of the inherent status of the biblical texts, but as a product of, and medium for, social and political relations, to be analyzed in terms of the functioning of ideology as a means (p 99) of social control. Canon, like “orthodoxy,” is a product, not recognition. Both in giving an account of the history of early Christianity, and in giving a theological account of the Bible, therefore, canon has been subsumed into the history of religion, and so it has become a concept both more arbitrary and less innocent.

This set of developments has stimulated a variety of responses. Some historically reductive accounts have abandoned any affirmations of the normativity of the canon, since its imposition is merely a transient stage in the routinization of Christianity in the early period, a stage that has no enduring claim upon Christian thought and practice. Some recent theologians have sought to rehabilitate the notion of the canon by a variety of strategies. Most commonly, these involve explicating the social functions of canonical materials. The biblical canon, like other socially authorized collections, is a primary resource in the construction of a social and religious world, an instrument of common sensibility. In effect, these accounts shift the location of the canon away from the theology of revelation and toward the church community, with the canon as a function of its need for identity and persistence. These accounts resist the historical reductionism that makes canon into a matter of arbitrary power. But because their defense of the canon is socially pragmatic, they find it difficult to specify nonarbitrary reasons for the adoption of the canon, such as those that might be given by a theological account of revelation.

A further response to the “naturalization” of the canon would be to make use of more directly theological language to describe both the texts of Scripture and the processes of their canonization. Thereby one could relate them to the revelatory and providential work of God in Christ and the Spirit. This would entail developing claims that the texts to be found in the canonical catalog are revelatory, in that they are appointed by God to be instruments of his communicative activity. The theological conceptuality to describe this feature of the biblical texts can vary (the most usual term is that of “inspiration”). An important feature of any such account, however, will be theological teaching about the present communicative activity of the risen Christ in the power of the Spirit; critical-historical accounts of canon and canonization are frequently vitiated by deistic assumptions that make God’s action through creaturely entities difficult to conceive.

On this basis, the process of canonization would be described, not as an arbitrary act of decision or political imposition, but as a Spirit-directed process of discernment and judgment. Canonization thus is to be understood as assent rather than authorization, as an act of reception and submission, and as a pledge to be governed by the textual norm given to the church. Further, a theological account of canon would seek to show that canon is not mere statute, a rule to be invoked only at points of transgression. Instead, it forms the primary discursive habits of the Christian community, especially in public worship, in doctrine, and in decisions concerning the identity of the community. Hence, acceptance of the canon commits the church to the use of the biblical writings as authoritative norm.

Canon and Interpretation

The canon of Scripture is a list of texts to be used. The “use” of Scripture is its deployment as norm by the Christian community. “Use,” however, is an activity of a different order from “production”: the church’s acts of reading and reception of the biblical writings do not constitute the Bible as Scripture; instead, believers seek to hear what is addressed to the church through the mediation of this text. As canon, therefore, Scripture needs to be read fittingly, in the particular ways and with the particular virtues that are appropriate to the nature of Scripture as the church’s given norm, and that serve the end of Scripture, which is the instruction and edification of the saints.

As canon, Scripture is authoritative because it is the instrument of divine address. To read and interpret canonical material is therefore to be required to read and interpret faithfully—with attention to the divine speech encountered through the text, and so to read and interpret repentantly—with awareness of the human capacity to resist God’s address. In the Christian tradition, such virtues have generally been regarded as the gifts of the Holy Spirit, and the interpretation of canonical Scripture has been considered a spiritual exercise directed by God’s illuminating presence. If, further, the end of Scripture is attention to divine speech, then strategies of biblical interpretation will be judged according to their capacity to promote that end. Methods whose primary concern is (for example) the reconstruction of a text's historical or authorial origin, or the generation of affective states in the reader, will be judged less likely to foster attention to revelation as it is presented in Scripture.

To describe Scripture as canon is also to make a claim that the assembled texts constitute a whole, (p 100) and that their collection is of significance for the interpretation of the constituent parts. Gathered as a canon, the individual texts of the Bible do not simply exist adjacent to each other, and their relations are not simply intertextual (as in the reference of the NT to OT materials). Rather, the canon is a single (though complex) entity whose individual textual elements are both mutually interpretative, and also to be understood in the light of the whole of which they form parts. The texts of the canon are such because they testify to a single overarching work of God in the economy of creation and reconciliation: the canon is a whole because it refers to this unified divine work. This has direct effects on biblical interpretation. Individual canonical units are not to be defined as discrete entities, wholly determined by such factors as provenance, authorship, genre, language, and so forth; they are also determined by the whole to which they belong. Moreover, the canon may be read as a whole, derivative as it is from a single (though manifold) act of divine communication, and its individual texts are to be interpreted with reference to that whole.

Bibliography

Abraham, W. Canon and Criterion in Christian Theology. Clarendon, 1998; Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Vol. I/1. T&T Clark, 1975; Berkouwer, G. C. Holy Scripture. Eerdmans, 1975; Campenhausen, H. von. The Formation of the Christian Bible. Fortress, 1972; Childs, B. Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments. SCM, 1992; Folkert, K. "The 'Canons' of 'Scripture.'" Pages 170–79 in Rethinking Scripture, ed. M. Levering. SUNY Press, 1989; Gamble, H. The New Testament Canon. Fortress, 1985; Guillory, J. Cultural Capital. University of Chicago Press, 1993; Metzger, B. The Canon of the New Testament. Clarendon, 1987; van der Kooij, A., and K. van der Koorn, eds. Canonization and Decanonization. Brill, 1998; Webster, J. "The Dogmatic Location of the Canon." Pages 9–46 in Word and Church. T&T Clark, 2001.

John Webster

Canonical Approach

A "canonical approach" or a "canonical method" refers to a species of theological interpretation and exegesis pioneered by Brevard Childs. It has had wide application within the disciplines of biblical theology, OT and NT interpretation, commentary, and history of biblical interpretation. It might be helpful to speak of a canonical approach as having three related facets: literary/exegetical, catholic/ecclesial, and theological. It is not possible entirely to isolate these, so beware of areas of overlap in the discussion that follows.

Literary/Exegetical

Canonical reading is derived from historical-critical interpretation of the last two centuries. That is, it is to be distinguished from reader-response or structural/rhetorical modes of reading, which hermeneutically privilege the place of the reader or the preunderstanding (secular or theological) of the community approaching the text. In that sense, it shares a concern for the objective reality of the text and for its intentional direction and ruled character, as this also distinguished historical-critical approaches in their various stages of development (literary-critical, source-critical, form-critical, tradition-critical).

Unlike them, however, canonical reading does not seek authorial intent at the level of the text's prehistory, in an alleged source or form, or tied to an historical audience, as these might be reconstructed using various critical tools of retrieval. At the same time, a canonical approach does believe that the depth dimension uncovered by historical tools is a reality that must be dealt with constructively and with great theological sensitivity. This is so because appeals to things like "single Isaiah authorship" may assert a form of historical rationalism equally at odds with the objective form of the material as it lies before us in its plain-sense presentation. Further, by noting the prehistory of the text—mindful of the speculative and therefore limited nature of such reconstructions—a canonical reading can seek to understand the theology of the final-form presentation as a kind of commentary on the text's prehistory. Through the arrangement and sequencing of the material as we now have it, it is a theological statement made by allowing certain aspects of the prehistory to receive prominence and clarity, and other aspects of that prehistory to recede in importance. Nowhere, for example, is any biography of "deutero-Isaiah" provided by the final form of Isaiah, even as the material may plausibly be connected to such a historical conceptuality. This means that the literary constraints of Isa. 40–55 must be sought in the context of the larger book, and its assertion of a unified or coherent or single "vision." Similarly, while historical analysis may lay bare levels of tradition (Q or the "J Source" or pre-Deuteronomic tradition), it will not have adequate theological or literary warrant for determining which level is to have exegetical priority. It will either conclude that the biblical text is a container of competing and incongruent theological claims, or it will wittingly or unwittingly give precedence to one such claim over another. (p 101) The earlier source or form will be privileged because it is closer to the “reality” being conveyed; or the later sources might be privileged because they suit the more mature theology that can only, with the proper passage of time, be grasped and understood.

Canonical reading sees the choices offered by such a historical approach, and yet reckons that the final form is itself a statement, fully competent to judge and constrain the prehistory reconstructed by such methods. Sometimes earlier traditions will be given literary prominence, while on other occasions a later editorial move will seek to constrain the tradition as received, and seek to coordinate interpretation by an extrinsic link to other texts in the canon. Canonical reading is therefore not an exact science, but a theological decision about what the proper parameters for interpretation are: the final-form presentation and the arrangement and sequencing that it exhibits, over against the simple history of the text’s development as this is critically reconstructed.

Catholic/Ecclesial

A canonical reading is, self-consciously, a modern form of reading. It takes seriously its own specific location in the history of ideas and in the development of modern historical study. At the same time, because it seeks to honor the final form of the witness, and the associations that the final form has sought to privilege, it is understandably an art of reading kindred to that of many phases of precritical reading. This is most obvious in terms of what it rejects by not giving priority to phases of the text’s prehistory (about which most premodern reading is unaware or disinterested). But it is also the case that, insofar as the final form of the witness receives a sensitive and appreciative handling, canonical reading may find itself open to allegorical and figural interpretations, such as emerged in an earlier day. At a minimum, because canonical reading does not believe that a historical approach represents a progressive improvement, but only asks specific kinds of questions of texts, it has a different understanding of what counts for good reading. This makes it open to learn from the past and from the kinds of questions that occupied theological readers in the rich catholic heritage of precritical interpretation. It is not a retrievalist or nostalgic concern that makes this history of interest, but rather the recognition that reading has an ineluctable social component. Premodern exegesis is keenly aware of the history of reading within which it is situated, and it judges this context a blessing as well as a challenge to be faced and dealt with.

Historical approaches tended to believe that the prior history of interpretation was outmoded, irrelevant, wrong, confused, or capable of being transcended by appeal to “historical objectivity.” This insistence on being an altogether different species of reading is what marred historical approaches, and it should have put a question mark over the entire enterprise. Canonical reading has always judged the historical-critical questions as interesting and necessary to consider—in the light of the sheer givenness, externality, and materiality of the witness—but as incapable of sustaining a claim to independence or priority.

One other factor is crucial to note. What I am terming “catholic or ecclesial” reading is, in the first instance, Christian reading. Appeal to the “rule of faith” by canonical reading is not an appeal to piety or virtue, in the manner of some recent approaches, but to an assumption of an interlocking and coherent witness, in the material form of the canon. That witness stretches across two Testaments of one Bible (whether in a single Greek language or not). The rule of faith operated in the early church by constraining the church to seek interlocking and associative interpretation. The Creator God of the OT sent his only Son, witnessed to through the medium of the apostolic writings and in the life of the Holy Spirit, given at baptism. This faith was sustained by preaching (from the same two-Testament witness), the sacraments, and the life of prayer. Catholic reading, so understood, cannot read the Testaments apart from one another, because the two different material witnesses have a single subject matter.

It cannot be said ahead of time what kind of pressure a canonical reading must be willing to respond to on this front. There will be times in the church’s life when the danger is in conflating the two different witnesses, with the consequence that a “resultant system” (allegorical excess, propositionalism, philosophical abstraction, or something else) obscures the plain-sense witness of the two-Testament witness. At other times, historical differentiation and the search for distinctive individual witnesses within the Testaments, for whatever salutary reasons one might give, make the relationship between Old and New forms of witness impossible to see. Or one may make only extrinsic and artificial linkings in the name of aesthetic harmony or apologetic worries.

Here, attention to readings that take place in Jewish religious life serve an important corrective function; such attention may call the church (p 102) to a deeper understanding of what a single religious tradition makes out of diverse Scripture, for similar as well as for different reasons. Central to Jewish religious life is the conviction that God is one, and the insistence at this point is not philosophical but exegetical and scriptural. Christians share this theological conviction, even as the material form of their witness is differently diverse: it comes in the dual form of “prophets and apostles.”

Theological

Canonical reading exists within a recent history of ideas, concerning especially literary and hermeneutical methods applied to the reading of the Bible. It offers a critical perspective on critical interpretation in the modern academic context.

But it does not assert its literary and catholic distinctives, as these have been described, only to point to deficiencies and attenuations. Indeed, canonical reading is reading in a particular post-historical-critical climate, and it draws positively from this context as well as negatively.

The same is true in some measure for the theological goal and underpinnings of canonical reading. It locates, and then cautions about, the kinds of theologizing that inevitably, if sometimes minimally, appear in historical readings, insofar as these ignore the final arrangement and presentation of the individual writings and collections in the canon, and so foreshorten or historicize or misconstrue genuine theological reflection.

One can defend the appeal to the final form, not just on the grounds that such a presentation has integrity and rationality. The final form—because it is not simply the most recent level of tradition, but is the aggregation of the entire history of the text’s development, now in a given form—has a claim to our greatest attention. In other words, there is nothing morally superior about later reflections as over against earlier ones, as is sometimes claimed for a canonical approach’s interest in the final form. Only the final forms bear the fullest witness to all that God has said and handed on within the historical community of faith. This point has been made recently by a theologian: “If God is thought of as revealing himself to his people in increasing measure over time, in the course of a teleological process of salvation worked out within history, then there is a prima facie case for privileging the witness of later communities, who were witnesses to the greatest extent of that revelation.” He continues: “A reading of the Old Testament which assumes this view of revelation will naturally give theological privilege to the later compilers of the final form of the canonical texts. It is their historical location, rather than some special moral quality of trustworthiness which they supposedly possessed and earlier writers lacked, which gives their text theological priority” (Ward 249).

What is said here of the OT can be, and is, extended theologically to the entire Christian Bible by a canonical reading. It is all the more crucial to acknowledge the centrality of a two-Testament theological approach, when it is considered that the formation of the second Testament, as a theological witness, took place as commentary on the Old in the light of the gospel, showing Christ to be “in accordance with the Scriptures.” The theological work of the NT is intrinsically connected to hearing the full revelation of the OT as accorded and configured in the gospel of Jesus Christ. This happens not as an extrinsic act of piety or hope; it grows out of the testimony of the NT’s own witness, which lays claim to the Old Scriptures and sees in them the gospel’s preparation and prefiguration.

See also Narrative Theology; Rule of Faith; Yale School

Bibliography

Brett, M. Biblical Criticism in Crisis. Cambridge University Press, 1991; Childs, B. “The Exegetical Significance of Canon for the Study of the Old Testament.” VT Supplements 29 (1977): 66–80; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; Seitz, C. Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments. Fortress, 1992; idem. Word without End. Eerdmans, 1998; Sheppard, G. T. “Brevard Childs.” Pages 574–84 in Historical Handbook of Major Biblical Interpreters, ed. D. McKim. InterVarsity, 1998; Ward, T. Word and Supplement. Oxford University Press, 2002.

Christopher Seitz

Canon within a Canon    See Canon; Scripture, Unity of

Catholic Biblical Interpretation

Catholic interpretation—here referring to the Roman Catholic tradition—is best understood in light of the history of interpretation, and of Catholic doctrine about the relation of Scripture to Tradition and the Catholic Church.

History

The first generation of Christians accepted the Jewish Scriptures and the interpretation of them they had received from Jesus and the apostles. The church interpreted the Law, the Prophets, (p 103) and the other sacred Writings in light of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, who “fulfilled” the Scriptures. Disputes about doctrine were resolved by resorting to the judgment of the apostles and elders (Gal. 2:2; Acts 15) or by appealing to the primitive apostolic tradition (Gal. 1:8; 2 Thess. 2:15; 1 John 2:24; Jude 3; 1 Tim. 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:12–14). Second-century Christianity saw the rise of interpretation that rejected the OT and selected from the apostolic writings (Marcion) or radically reinterpreted them (Valentinus and other Gnostics). The church responded by referring to the tradition of interpretation found in the churches established by apostles (Irenaeus, Haer. 3.2–3; PG 7:847–48) and by compiling lists of apostolic writings authorized for catechetical and liturgical use—leading eventually to the canon.

The fathers of the church continued the struggle for sound interpretation, seeking to clarify doctrinal questions and feed their flocks by means of the Scriptures and of the traditions they had received. Through the patristic era there was little distinction between exegesis and theology: biblical commentaries were at the same time theological works, and vice versa.

Medieval writers and preachers expounded the four senses of Scripture taught by some church fathers: The literal sense reported events and the face-value meaning of the words. The allegorical revealed the meaning of OT events in light of Christ. The moral explained the implications of the text for Christian behavior. The anagogical pointed to the eschatological significance of the text. Other authors, such as Thomas Aquinas, produced theological summae, which expressed doctrine in carefully defined propositions and inadvertently introduced a separation between theology and the study of Scripture.

Renaissance humanism paved the way for a renewal of exegesis through its interest in the biblical languages and its advances in textual criticism. The Reformers reoriented theology, preaching, catechesis, and Christian devotion toward Scripture. However, their principle of sola scriptura and their rejection of the authority of Tradition and the teaching authority of pope and bishops evoked a strong reaction: the Council of Trent (1546) upheld the authority of both Scripture and the “unwritten ... traditions concerning both faith and morals, as coming from either Christ’s spoken words or from the Holy Spirit” (First Decree). It further asserted “that no one, by relying on their own judgment in matters of faith and morals, ... shall dare to interpret the Sacred Scriptures in opposition to what has been and continues to be taught by Holy Mother Church, to whom belongs the capacity to judge the true meaning of the texts, or to the unanimous teaching of the Fathers” (Second Decree). Although Reformation controversies led the Catholic Church to reform in various ways, its leadership became wary of biblical studies and subordinated biblical interpretation to scholastic theology.

Encounter with Modern Biblical Criticism

The Catholic Church’s caution about Scripture and Catholic scholarship’s isolation from Protestant biblical studies delayed the confrontation with modern biblical criticism. In 1893 Pope Leo XIII's Providentissimus Deus encouraged Catholic scholars to study biblical languages and become expert in the new scientific criticism in order to defend against its rationalist forms. However, when some prominent Catholic scholars adopted modernism, the Catholic Church's openness gave way to a reaction against higher criticism that forbade Catholic scholars to question traditional assumptions about authorship, historicity, and the integrity of biblical books (Pontifical Biblical Commission, "Responses"). Fifty years later, after the rationalist threat had subsided, Pope Pius XII authorized Catholic exegetes to pursue critical studies with full freedom. He directed them to pay attention to literary forms and the manners of communication in previous ages and other cultures, so as more clearly to understand the mind of the human authors (Divino afflante Spiritu, 1943).

The Second Vatican Council marked an important turning point as the Catholic Church sought to refocus on the sources of its faith in Scripture, patristic writings, and the ancient liturgies. The council's Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Paul VI, Dei Verbum [DV]) reformulated Catholic doctrine regarding Scripture and Tradition. It confirmed Pius XII's acceptance of modern biblical studies and exhorted both clergy and laity "to learn by frequent reading of the Divine Scriptures 'the supreme good of knowing Jesus Christ' (Phil 3:8)." The ecumenical orientation of Vatican II opened Catholics to learning from, and cooperating with, biblical scholars outside the Catholic Church.

After the Second Vatican Council, Catholic scholars made up for lost time by immersing themselves in the historical-critical study of Scripture; exegetes such as Raymond Brown, Joseph Fitzmyer, Roland Murphy, and Rudolf Schnackenberg earned the respect of their guild. (p 104) However, now complaints began to arise that the historical-critical method was not producing the desired fruit. Historical theologians such as Henri de Lubac and Jean Daniélou judged that the church's tradition of theological interpretation was being lost, arguing for a return to patristic interpretation and a recovery of the spiritual sense of Scripture. Tensions grew between exegesis and systematic theology; some questioned whether scientific exegesis was useful for the church's pastoral ministry. In a 1988 public lecture Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger, head of the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, called for a critical examination of the philosophical assumptions that commonly accompany the historical-critical method and spoke of a "crisis" in biblical interpretation.

In response to these criticisms and to new literary and hermeneutical approaches, the Pontifical Biblical Commission, reconstituted as an international consultative body of twenty exegetes, undertook an evaluation of exegesis in the church. Pope John Paul II officially received their study and authorized its publication in 1993, The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church (IBC). The IBC describes the characteristics of Catholic interpretation, confirms—but qualifies—the use of the historical-critical method, and welcomes the use of other methods and approaches, provided they function within a hermeneutic of Christian faith. The Biblical Commission’s document emphasizes that Catholic exegesis must “maintain its identity as a theological discipline” (Conclusion, e). This document and DV remain the most important church documents for understanding Catholic biblical interpretation.

Since the publication of the IBC, Catholic exegesis has continued to reflect the extreme diversity of contemporary biblical scholarship. Nevertheless, a trend in some quarters toward theological interpretation may be detected in arguments for its importance (Johnson and Kurz; Schneiders; Williamson), in some commentaries, and in a renewed appreciation for patristic and medieval interpretation.

Doctrine of Scripture

Catholic biblical interpretation is governed by the belief that Scripture is the word of God expressed in human language. On the one hand, because all Scripture is inspired by the Holy Spirit, God is its principal author. “Since everything asserted by the inspired authors or sacred writers should be regarded as asserted by the Holy Spirit, it follows that ... Scripture ... teach[es] firmly, faithfully and without error the truth that God wished to be recorded in the sacred writings for the sake of our salvation” (DV 11). On the other hand, God “chose and employed certain men, who ... made full use of their own faculties and powers ...” (DV 11). The human limitations of the inspired authors were not eradicated by the activity of the divine Author so as to make Scripture inerrant in scientific matters or historical details.

Scripture fulfills a foundational, life-giving, and authoritative role for the church. It is foundational for doctrine because Scripture is the word of God and because it witnesses to the events and their interpretation on which Christian faith is grounded. It communicates life: “God’s word ... remains the sustaining life-force for her children, the nourishment for the soul and the pure and lasting source of spiritual life” (DV 21). Scripture is also authoritative: “All the preaching of the Church, as indeed the entire Christian religion, [should] be nourished and ruled by Sacred Scripture” (DV 21).

Scripture does not merely recount God's saving words and actions in the past; it also is perpetually relevant, since God continues to speak to his people through it. This always-contemporary attribute of Scripture especially characterizes its reading in the liturgy "since it is Christ himself who speaks when Sacred Scripture is read in the church" (IBC IV.C.1.b).

Interpretation

The Role of Tradition. Christ's apostles communicated to the churches they founded what they had received from Christ or learned by the Spirit. "What was handed on by the apostles includes everything that helps the People of God to live in holiness and to grow in faith, and so the Church, in her teaching, life, and worship, perpetuates and hands on to every generation all that she herself is, all that she believes. The Tradition that comes from the apostles develops in the Church with the help of the Holy Spirit, for there is growth in understanding of the realities and words that have been handed down" (DV 7). As a communication of divine revelation, Tradition must be distinguished from various theological, disciplinary, liturgical, or devotional traditions that arise and seek to give expression to it. Sacred Tradition can be understood as the living presence of God's word in the church's life through time.

Scripture and Tradition flow "from the same divine wellspring" (DV 9) and "form one sacred deposit of the word of God" (DV 10). The relationship between Scripture and Tradition is (p 105) reciprocal; each acts upon the other. The idea that Scripture should be interpreted in light of Tradition follows from the fact that the canon of Scripture itself is a fruit of Tradition. At the same time, meditation on Scripture nourishes and shapes the development of Tradition. Besides Scripture itself, in varying degrees, the fathers of the church, the creeds, the liturgy, the writings of the saints, the dogmatic definitions, and contemporary teaching of bishops and the pope bear witness to Tradition.

The primary role of Tradition in Catholic exegesis is to provide a deliberately embraced preunderstanding of what it is that Scripture is talking about (IBC III.b). Catholic exegesis seeks to avoid the risk of eisegesis that preunderstanding poses by distinguishing meanings present in the text from later developments. For instance, one may distinguish what the Gospel of John says about the Father and the Son from later trinitarian dogma, which, though consistent with the gospel, goes beyond it. In pastoral catechesis and preaching, Tradition provides the context in which Scripture is explained (IBC IV.C.3.b).

The Role of the Church. Catholics insist that Scripture is entrusted not to individual Christians, but to the whole people of God. Interpretation must occur in communion with the whole church. Differing roles belong to different members of the body of Christ. Biblical interpretation is not the exclusive preserve of scholarly or priestly elites, but belongs to all and, in a special way, to the simple poor who hope in God (IBC IV.C.3.m).

The pope and bishops exercise a special role of rendering authoritative decisions if the occasion requires it. “The task of authentically interpreting the word of God, whether in its written form or in the form of tradition, has been entrusted to the Teaching Office of the Church [which] is not above the word of God but serves it by teaching only what has been handed on” (DV 10). Historically, the Magisterium has concerned itself primarily with doctrine and has rendered authoritative interpretations of only a handful of texts (Brown and Schneiders 1163–64). Catholics believe that Scripture, Tradition, and the Teaching Office of the church each play necessary and complementary roles.

The OT and the Gospels. Catholic interpretation receives the OT (including the seven books of the LXX not found in the Hebrew canon) as Sacred Scripture and perpetually valid, even though the OT contains some things that are “incomplete and provisional” (DV 15). These books bear witness to God’s dealings with his chosen people, Israel, and prepare for the coming of Christ, the universal Redeemer, announcing his coming by prophecy and indicating its meaning by various types (DV 15). Catholics interpret the OT in light of the paschal mystery and the NT. Nevertheless, the Catholic Church esteems the literal sense of the OT, its canonical interpretation before the Christian Passover, because it testifies to a stage in salvation history and nourishes the church with teachings about God, sound wisdom about human life, and a treasury of prayers (DV 15).

Among all the Scriptures, “the Gospels have a special preeminence, for they are the principal witness to the life and teaching of the incarnate Word” (DV 18). The Gospels “faithfully hand on what Jesus, the Son of God ... actually did and taught for [our] eternal salvation ...” (DV 18). Catholic interpretation recognizes the selective and synthesizing work of the evangelists in keeping with their purpose of proclamation and pastoral care (DV 19).

Other Principles. The proper object of interpretation is the final canonical text since it alone is the inspired word of God; source criticism is useful insofar as it sheds light on the meaning of the final text. The aim of interpretation is to understand the word of God, the meaning of the text for Christian faith, and to pass beyond a cognitive grasp of the words of Scripture to understand the realities to which the words refer (IBC II.A.1.d). Exegesis can never be reduced to historical or literary knowledge, which are means rather than the end. Because genuine understanding requires an affinity between text and interpreter, certain qualities should characterize interpreters: Christian faith, the grace of the Spirit, a life lived in accord with the message of Scripture, participation in the life of the church, and personal prayer. The primary task of Catholic exegesis is to “determine as accurately as possible the meaning of biblical texts in their own proper context, that is, first of all in their particular literary and historical context and then in the context of the wider canon of Scripture,” explaining the theological significance where appropriate (IBC III.D.4.b).

In carrying out its task, Catholic exegesis seeks the “meaning the sacred writer, in his own historical situation and in accordance with the condition of his time and culture, intended to express and did in fact express with the help of the literary forms that were in use during that time” (DV 12). To this end Catholic exegesis makes use of the ordinary scholarly means for interpreting ancient texts, the historical-critical method, while seeking to avoid rationalism, historicism, historical positivism (p 106), and other problematic presuppositions that have sometimes accompanied its use. At the same time exegesis freely makes use of literary methods, approaches derived from the history of interpretation or social sciences, and contextual approaches—so long as these methods and approaches are used in a manner consistent with Catholic interpretation’s essential principles.

Catholic interpretation seeks to understand what the divine Author wished to communicate, and thus to interpret Scripture “in the light of the same Spirit by whom it was written” (DV 12). Valid interpretations of texts must cohere with the meaning of the whole of Scripture and Christian doctrine. Although Catholic exegesis recognizes differing perspectives and interpretations of the same events in Scripture (IBC III.A.2.g), it affirms the essential unity of Scripture grounded in Scripture’s intertextuality, in its divine inspiration, and in the unity of the divine plan. This unity requires interpreting individual texts in light of the whole canon.

Catholic interpretation recognizes various senses of Scripture. The literal sense, “that which has been directly expressed by the inspired authors” (IBC II.B.1.c), is derived by studying texts in their historical and literary contexts. The spiritual sense is “the meaning expressed by the biblical texts when read under the influence of the Holy Spirit in the context of the paschal mystery and of the new life which flows from it” (IBC II.B.2.b). The importance of the spiritual sense is most obvious in reference to OT texts that are read christologically, such as 2 Sam. 7:12–13. Typology forms part of the spiritual sense. The fuller sense (sensus plenior), “a deeper meaning intended by God but not clearly expressed by the human author” (IBC II.B.3a), is a special instance of the spiritual sense when the literal and the spiritual sense differ. It is recognized when a later biblical text or an authoritative doctrinal tradition confirms its presence (e.g., Isa. 7:14 and Matt. 1:22–23).

Catholic interpretation insists on the need to bring the meaning of the biblical word into the present (actualization) and to embody it in diverse cultures (inculturation). By its attention to the theological meaning of Scripture, good exegesis prepares for actualization, a task that belongs to pastoral ministry.

See also Spiritual Sense; Tradition

Bibliography

Béchar, D., ed. The Scripture Documents. Liturgical, 2002; Brown, R., and S. Schneiders. “Hermeneutics.” In The New Jerome Biblical Commentary, ed. R. Brown, J. Fitzmyer, and R. Murphy. Prentice Hall, 1990; Catholic Church. Catechism of the Catholic Church (§§74–141). 2d ed. United States Catholic Conference, 2000; Council of Trent. Session IV. First and Second Decrees. Pages 3–6 in Béchar; Daniélou, J. The Bible and the Liturgy. University of Notre Dame Press, 1956; Gilbert, M. “Exegesis, Integral.” In Dictionary of Fundamental Theology, ed. R. Latourelle and R. Fisichella. Crossroad, 1995; Johnson, L. T., and W. Kurz. The Future of Catholic Biblical Scholarship. Eerdmans, 2002; Latourelle, R., ed. Vatican II, Assessment and Perspectives. Paulist, 1988; Leo XIII. Providentissimus Deus. Encyclical. 1893. Pages 37–59 in Béchar; Lubac, H. de. Medieval Exegesis, trans. M. Sebanc. Eerdmans, 1998; idem. Scripture in the Tradition, trans. L. O’Neill. Crossroad, 2000; Montague, G. Understanding the Bible. Paulist, 1997; Paul VI. Sacred Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum). Vatican II, 1965. Pages 19–31 in Béchar; Pius XII. Divino afflante Spiritu. Encyclical. 1943. Pages 115–36 in Béchar; Pontifical Biblical Commission. The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church. 1993. Pages 244–315 in Béchar; idem. “Responses.” 1905–15. Pages 187–208 in Béchar; Ratzinger, J. “Biblical Interpretation in Crisis: On the Question of the Foundations and Approaches of Exegesis Today.” Pages 1–23 in Biblical Interpretation in Crisis, ed. R. J. Neuhaus. Eerdmans, 1989; Schneiders, S. The Revelatory Text. 2d ed. Liturgical, 1999; Williamson, P. Catholic Principles for Interpreting Scripture. Pontifical Biblical Institute, 2001; idem. “The Place of History in Catholic Exegesis.” In Behind the Text, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2003.

Peter S. Williamson

Charismatic Biblical Interpretation

For “charismatic” groups, the communities that emphasize an individual experience of the Holy Spirit as well as an empowerment in spiritual gifts, the Bible is an authoritative revelation from God that must be read, proclaimed, and lived out as it offers the example of the “Spirit-filled” life. At the heart of charismatic biblical interpretation is the expectation of a personal encounter with God’s supernatural power. Charismatic Bible reading should lead to charismatic experience.

Charismatic movements are a worldwide phenomenon, yet a lion’s share of self-reflection on charismatic hermeneutics comes from North America and Europe. This article reflects a North American and European focus.

The Pentecostal Movement

While there have been charismatic movements throughout Christian history, Pentecostalism is the first such movement in the twentieth century. Two primary convictions for early Pentecostals were the restoration of beliefs and practices of the NT church, and the second coming of Christ. Christians should expect apostolic experiences from miracles to ministry, since a fully realized (p 107) Christian life would prepare believers for Jesus’ soon return.

Early Pentecostal Hermeneutics. These convictions influenced a hermeneutic that viewed biblical narratives as a paradigm for modern Christian life. Of central importance was the “baptism in the Spirit” as described in Acts 2:1–4; 10:44–46; and 19:1–7. According to Pentecostalism as a whole, Spirit baptism was (and is) an experience subsequent to conversion, evidenced physically by “speaking in tongues,” and given for the purpose of empowering the believer to evangelize the world and minister through spiritual gifts.

This particular interpretation of the reception of the Spirit in Acts reflects what has been called Pentecostal “Bible Reading Method,” a precritical practice of reading all verses upon a particular subject, then harmonizing those verses into a consistent doctrine. This way of reading the Bible is both literal and immediate, with little awareness of a history behind or after the events and teachings recorded in the text. Pentecostal determination to see apostolic witness and life restored to the church is driven by a theological focus on Jesus as the Savior, Healer, Baptizer in the Holy Spirit, and Soon-Coming King—what many Pentecostals have called the “fourfold gospel” (the first Pentecostals would add “Sanctifier” to that list). It stresses an experiential desire for the Spirit-filled life as exemplified in biblical narratives, or the “full gospel.”

Beyond the formulation of doctrine, a Pentecostal hermeneutic is largely typological. Because the text must immediately apply to the life of believers, correlations have been made between biblical narratives and present circumstances without critical exegesis. Pentecostal preaching has disclosed Pentecostal themes throughout the biblical text, from Genesis to Revelation.

Along with a restorationist, Jesus-centric theology (a foundational text was Heb. 13:8—“Jesus is the same yesterday and today and forever”), Pentecostals have understood biblical interpretation to be guided by the Holy Spirit and confirmed by their experience. The role of the Spirit is paramount to Pentecostal hermeneutics. If the Spirit inspired the Bible, its interpretation must depend on the Spirit. When disputing an interpretation, Pentecostals appeal to the Spirit’s leading in their Bible reading.

Experience is sometimes viewed as so important to their hermeneutic that Pentecostals have been strongly criticized for exegeting their experience rather than the Bible. However, many Pentecostals understood their experience to be God’s confirmation of their interpretation, particularly with regard to spiritual manifestations. Spiritual manifestations during communal worship have been viewed as a sign of God’s blessing on whatever had been preached, even if Pentecostals outside of that local community rejected the sermon’s message.

Recent Debates in Pentecostal Hermeneutics. Since the mid-twentieth century, the Pentecostal movement has seen its members join the academic community and engage in critical biblical scholarship. Pentecostal scholars have rejected the earlier methods of Pentecostal Bible reading, with a precritical exegesis, while debate continues concerning the function of narrative, and the roles of the Spirit and experience in hermeneutics.

Contemporary works reflect the influence of evangelicalism within Pentecostal scholarship as much of the Pentecostal debate focuses on the comparison and position of a Lukan narrative theology alongside a Pauline didactic theology. Gordon Fee, a well-known Pentecostal exegete, has strongly criticized the didactic value of biblical narratives within Pentecostalism, leading to a critique of Spirit baptism following conversion and “speaking in tongues” as evidence of received baptism. However, other Pentecostal scholars have rejected that critique as an attack on the very basis of Pentecostalism. To answer Fee and others, they include the paradigmatic role of biblical narratives as part of authorial intent and argue for a “charismatic” pneumatology based on Luke-Acts alongside Paul’s soteriological pneumatology.

Most recently, scholars have debated the need for a Pentecostal hermeneutic outside of an evangelical framework. Some argue for a postmodern hermeneutic that moves beyond questions of authorial intent to an understanding of the text as capable of multiple meanings in dialogue with the reader. These scholars attempt to build a hermeneutic in dialogue with such thinkers as Paul Ricoeur, Martin Heidegger, Hans-Georg Gadamer, and Jürgen Habermas.

Another discussion concerns what essentials would make a hermeneutic “Pentecostal.” The role of the Spirit in interpretation is given primary emphasis, though some scholars worry that it leads to a dualistic hermeneutic. Other essentials include the dialogical role of experience and openness to the authority of biblical narratives.

While Pentecostal scholars work on a hermeneutical method open to Pentecostal experience and acceptable to the academic community as (p 108) a whole, much of the scholarly discussion has had only a moderate impact on local Pentecostal communities that continue to practice a largely precritical and typological hermeneutic.

The Charismatic Movement

The “charismatic movement” is a term commonly applied to Baptists, Catholics, Episcopalians, Lutherans, Methodists, Presbyterians, Orthodox, and other non-Pentecostal Christians who accepted in whole or in part the Pentecostal message, with a confirming experience of the Spirit, though they did not leave their respective denominations. By the 1960s, this reception became a nationally recognized phenomenon, with charismatic movements found in many historic denominations.

Charismatic Hermeneutics. Since a primary charismatic concern is spiritual renewal within traditional denominations, many charismatics interpret Scripture within their own theological tradition. However, they do bring to the subject of hermeneutics a belief in the personal relevance of Scriptures concerning the Spirit-filled life, especially those that focus on charisms (e.g., 1 Cor. 12:8–10). Charismatics also see the paradigmatic value of biblical narratives, though they reject some of the ways Pentecostals have interpreted those narratives. Many do not accept the interpretation of Spirit baptism (this term is also disputed) as a subsequent work of grace or “speaking in tongues” as its necessary evidence.

Charismatic experience has led some to view Scripture in a new way. Many charismatics report a renewed focus on Christ, which has led to a fresh commitment to the authority of the Bible as God’s word about Christ. A deeper appreciation of the Spirit’s role in interpretation has also been cited as a contribution of the charismatic renewal to more traditional hermeneutical approaches. According to Richard Quebedeaux, Scripture is understood only through the Holy Spirit, who makes known the “living, ‘dynamic’ word of God,” to which Scripture is subservient.

Charismatic scholars such as Paul Hinnebusch stress the recovery of a personal meaning in Scripture among charismatics, many of whom prayerfully engage in a “directive use of Scripture,” believing that the Bible can give specific answers to personal situations. Mark Stibbe adds that charismatics also rely on “a community of shared experience” in interpreting and applying Scripture to their lives. Drawing on the work of thinkers like Ricoeur, they argue that Scripture can have multiple meanings under the leading of the Spirit, though these meanings may be valid only to the person reading and may not supersede doctrine or good exegesis. Some scholars, though, want to distinguish between the usage of Scripture and its interpretation. Others such as Clark Pinnock strive to maintain a balance between biblical authority, doctrinal tradition, and the freedom of the Spirit, a balance not always found among other charismatics.

Recent Trends in Charismatic Hermeneutics. Since the 1980s, new types of charismatic groups have arisen with their own unique emphases in Christian spirituality, including “signs and wonders” as a means to evangelism, and “power encounters” with demonic forces. Critics have accused these groups of experimenting with Christian practice and then “proof-texting” various Scriptures to support those experiments—such as the “power encounter” teaching of Charles Kraft. These newer charismatics argue in turn for a more prophetic hermeneutical approach that keeps both the original meaning and the prophetic significance of Scripture in mind. The Spirit that inspired the original biblical authors also leads the charismatic community to recollect Scriptures that apply directly to their situation. There is an analogical correlation between the original meaning and contemporary significance of Scripture that is safeguarded from error by the Spirit and community discernment.

Restoration of the NT church as an eschatological event is also emphasized in some nondenominational groups who, as reflected in the writings of C. Peter Wagner, believe in the renewal of the five offices mentioned in Eph. 4:11, with special attention given to apostles and prophets. Restoration of the Spirit-filled life remains a guiding focus of these charismatic biblical interpreters, who seek to bridge a gap between reading the Bible and living the Bible.

Bibliography

Archer, K. “Early Pentecostal Biblical Interpretation.” JPT 18 (2001): 32–70;
Arrington, F. “Hermeneutics, Historical Perspectives on Pentecostal and Charismatic.” Pages 376–89 in Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, ed. S. Burgess and G. McGee. Regency, 1988; Fee, G. Gospel and Spirit. Hendrickson, 1991; Kärkkäinen, V.-M. “Pentecostal Hermeneutics in the Making: On the Way from Fundamentalism to Postmodernism.” The Journal of the European Pentecostal Theological Association 18 (1998): 76–115; Ma, W. “A ‘First Waver’ Looks at the ‘Third Wave’: A Pentecostal Reflection on Charles Kraft’s Power Encounter Terminology.” Pneuma 19:2 (1997): 189–206; Martin, G., ed. Scripture and the Charismatic Renewal. Servant, 1979; Menzies, W., and R. Menzies. Spirit and (p 109)Power. Zondervan, 2000; Quebedeaux, R. The New Charismatics II. Harper & Row, 1983; Stibbe, M. “This Is That: Some Thoughts concerning Charismatic Hermeneutics.” Anvil 15:3 (1998): 181–93; Wagner, C. P. Apostles and Prophets. Regal, 2000.

D. Allen Tennison

Christian Interpretation of the OT     See Anti-Semitism; Relationship between the Testaments; Rule of Faith; Scripture, Unity of

Christus Victor     See Atonement; Powers and Principalities

Chronicles, Books of

The two books of Chronicles were originally written as one by an anonymous author. Known as “The Book of the Events of the Days” in early rabbinic tradition, the translators of the Septuagint divided it in two and, assuming it was a supplement to the earlier history of Samuel and Kings, gave it the misleading title “The Things Omitted.” Much of the earlier history is omitted (e.g., the history of the northern kingdom). Other parts are simply summarized (e.g., David’s military victories in 1 Chron. 18–20; cf. 2 Sam. 8–23), or presented in significantly different ways (e.g., the account of Manasseh in 2 Chron. 33; cf. 2 Kings 21). The title “1–2 Chronicles” comes from Jerome, translator of the Latin Vulgate, who in the fourth century CE suggested that “a chronicle of all of sacred history” would better describe the contents of a work beginning with Adam and ending with Cyrus.

History of Interpretation

Chronicles has not received the attention it deserves in either Jewish or Christian theological circles for several reasons. In the first place, the LXX’s misleading title (“Things Omitted”) and its questionable placement among the historical books in subsequent Bibles have led some—who fail to recognize its inherently theological, if not homiletical, nature—to challenge its historical accuracy. Specifically, the question of the historical reliability of these books has dominated the discussion from earliest times. In the precritical period, though synagogue and church alike assumed Chronicles’ reliability, its apparent supplementary character rendered it useful only in instances where Samuel–Kings was silent. This, more than any other reason, accounts for Chronicles being the least utilized portion of Scripture.

Second, only a few exemplars of Chronicles have appeared at Qumran. No ancient commentaries have survived the rabbinic neglect of these books that continued into the medieval period. This may be because both the Talmud and Mishnah regarded Chronicles as a book for the sages to ponder, rather than the laity. What pondering was done, however, saw Chronicles essentially as Ezra's midrash on the earlier histories of Samuel and Kings.

Third, the earlier, widespread assumption that any differences between Chronicles and Samuel–Kings were the result of tendentious alteration has been successfully challenged, especially since the critical work of Wilhelm de Wette in the nineteenth century. Text-critical investigation demonstrates the care with which the Chronicler used his sources. The sources were closer to the Lucianic version of the LXX and the parts of Samuel found among the Dead Sea Scrolls (4QSam<sup>a</sup>) than to the Masoretic text of Samuel, as previously thought. Understanding this fact accounts for many of the discrepancies and means that Chronicles must not simply be read as a theologically motivated rewriting of the earlier history.

Fourth, until recently it was supposed that Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah comprised two parts of a single composition, relating Israel's history from Adam to the postexilic community under Nehemiah. As a result, Chronicles was read through the theological lens of Ezra-Nehemiah. Today that assumption is questioned. While these books do display similarities of style, language, and general outlook, they differ on a number of key theological matters. These include the nature of "Israel," the Davidic covenant, the function of the Levites, the place and function of prophecy, retributive justice, the Sabbath, mixed marriages, and the significance of the exodus. Though still debated, an emerging consensus recognizes the separate authorship of Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah as well as the integral nature of the genealogies in 1 Chron. 1–9 to the work as a whole. This favors a date during the Persian period, somewhere in the fourth century BCE. Decisive here are the lists of David's descendants in 1 Chron. 3:17–24, extending to the late fourth century, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem in 9:2–34, extending to the early fourth century.

Finally, since interpretation depends upon prior decisions regarding setting, extent, and time of composition, the variety of opinion regarding the dating of Chronicles and its relationship to Ezra-Nehemiah has generated a corresponding variety (p 110) in elucidation. For instance, a previous generation, following Noth, interpreted the Chronicler's work as a response to a rival Samaritan faction formed in the wake of the 332 BCE fall of the Persian Empire. Today, however, the schism is placed at the end of the second century, rendering the Chronicler's so-called "anti-Samaritan polemic" anachronistic. Among contemporary scholars, Welten, who continues to maintain the common authorship of Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, has extensively investigated the Chronicler's battle reports and suggests that the early-third-century hostilities between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids are a more appropriate interpretative milieu for Chronicles. Those who reject common authorship are divided in their understanding of the Chronicler's context. Some find a likely backdrop in the early years of the return (529–515 BCE), influenced by the prophetic call of Haggai and Zechariah to rebuild the temple (e.g., Freedman; Newsome; Braun). Others suggest the need for faithfulness amid the tense repercussions of the Persian suppression of the Tennes revolt in 351–348 BCE (Williamson). Japhet, convinced that Ezra-Nehemiah precedes Chronicles, suggests the end of the fourth century, early in the Hellenistic period.

In sum, it is only in the modern period that Chronicles has been read for the very different historical and theological portrayal of Israel that it presents. From the ancient period through the middle of the twentieth century, Samuel–Kings provided the biblical version of that history, with Chronicles providing "supplementary" information. This, in turn, resulted in the substantial neglect of these books in rabbinic, patristic, medieval, and Reformation exegesis.

Context and Message

Comparisons between Chronicles and Samuel–Kings frequently fail to recognize the very different contexts of the two works. Samuel–Kings sought to answer the pressing questions of exiles who had experienced the fall of Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar II, the destruction of the temple, the end of Davidic rule, and deportation to Babylon in 587/6 BCE. Chronicles, however, addresses the postexilic community that, following the Persian defeat of the Babylonians under Cyrus in 539 BCE, had returned from Babylon to live under Persian rule and worship in the rebuilt Jerusalem temple. Instead of asking, "Why did this happen to us?" they sought their relationship with the past: "Who are we?" "Are we still the people of God?" and "What do God's promises to David and Solomon mean for us today?"

Chronicles addresses these questions by retelling the story of Israel and inviting the people to see themselves as living in situations of either "exile" or "restoration." Exilic situations result from unfaithfulness, serving other gods, or failing to seek the Lord. Even if literal exile does not occur, the loss of God's blessing inevitably results in devastating consequences. Blessing can be restored, however, through repentance (2 Chron. 7:14). Thus, Chronicles encourages the struggling postexilic community to seek and serve a loving and merciful God, who awaits their response and hears their prayers.

Contribution to the Canon

Modern versions of the Bible, the LXX, and the Vulgate group 1–2 Chronicles with the historical books, placing them between 2 Kings and Ezra–Nehemiah. In this arrangement, the prophet Malachi’s announcement that Elijah will precede the arrival of the Lord immediately precedes the Gospels’ portrayal of John the Baptist as the forerunner of the Messiah in the opening books of the NT. In the Hebrew canon, however, these books of Chronicles follow Ezra–Nehemiah in the Writings. This placement at the end of the Hebrew Bible is theologically significant in two ways. First, on the basis of chronology, Ezra–Nehemiah should close the Hebrew Bible. But their presentation of the return from exile soon deteriorates into the familiar problems of the postexilic community, issues only partially resolved in the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah. The Chronicler’s presentation of the return, though confined to a brief citation of the Cyrus Edict, ends with an invitation: “Whoever is among you of all his people, may the LORD his God be with him! Let him go up!” (2 Chron. 36:22–23 NRSV). This conclusion avoids the less-than-optimistic state of affairs found in Ezra–Nehemiah and lets the Hebrew canon end on a note of hope.

Second, the books of Chronicles function as a culminating summary and integration of all that has gone before. This is especially evident regarding worship. Disparate cultic considerations from the Psalter, the institution of Levitical functionaries, and the reorganization found in the Priestly Code are synthesized and brought together, thereby positing worship as the cohesive element lacking in the fragmented postexilic community. A Hebrew canon concluding with Chronicles also explains Luke 11:51, “From the blood of Abel to the blood of Zechariah,” as a time (p 111) frame extending from the murder of Abel (Gen. 4) to the murder of Zechariah (2 Chron. 24:20–22). No other OT book utilizes more biblical material than Chronicles, which draws extensively upon all three sections of the Hebrew canon. While the books of Samuel and Kings serve as the primary source, citations of or allusions to Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Ezra, Nehemiah, several psalms, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Zephaniah, and Zechariah all appear. In this way, Chronicles anticipates aspects of contemporary “inner-biblical exegesis.”

Theological Significance

The explication of Chronicles' theological significance begins with recognition of its overall structure. A long genealogical introduction (1 Chron. 1–9) is followed by a presentation of the period of the united monarchy under David and Solomon (1 Chron. 10–2 Chron. 9). A third section discusses the period of the divided monarchy, concentrating upon the kings of Judah (2 Chron. 10–28). The work concludes with an interpretation of the period from Hezekiah to the Babylonian exile as a reunited monarchy (2 Chron. 29–36). Of these four, the long second section is fundamental for the Chronicler's theological position. The reigns of David and Solomon are presented as a unity. Within this unity, two divine promises establish the Chronicler's central theological principles. In the first of these, God promises David that his throne will be established forever, through his descendants (1 Chron. 17:3–14). In the second, God promises Solomon that all who humble themselves, pray, seek God's face, and repent will be forgiven (2 Chron. 7:12–22). The genealogies that precede this crucial section depict the people's original unity. By means of these twin principles of king and cult, the section that follows evaluates the kings of Judah, who ruled during the divided monarchy, following the reign of Solomon. The final section presents Hezekiah as a new David and Solomon, who restores that vision of all Israel, reunited under a Davidic king, and worshipping at the Jerusalem temple following the collapse of the north.

Within this narrative framework, three theological themes are especially important. First, the temple dominates these pages as the primary symbol of God's presence with Israel. The Chronicler's presentation of the reigns of David and Solomon consists, essentially, of David's preparations for and Solomon's construction of the temple. David's preparations for the temple include bringing the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 13–16), military conflicts that consolidate the empire and amass the required wealth (18–20), the purchase of Ornan's threshing floor as the temple site (21:25), and the more-detailed preparations found in chapters 22–29, including numerous lists of temple personnel and God's placement of the blueprint for its construction into David's hands (28:19). Solomon is explicitly designated as the temple-builder (28:6, 10; cf. 28:5; 29:1), and the presentation of his reign has been drastically rewritten to emphasize this role (2 Chron. 1–9). Abijah's programmatic speech (ch. 13), often deemed a compendium of the Chronicler's theological interests, cites the northern tribes' abandonment of the temple and establishment of a rival priesthood as the primary form of their rebellion, in contrast to the faithful worship practiced in the south (13:8–12). Furthermore, every subsequent king is evaluated regarding the faithful preservation of proper worship in the temple. Finally, the Chronicler's concern for identity and continuity, first seen in the genealogies that linked the postexilic community with their roots (1 Chron. 1–9), is intimately tied to the temple. The central presence of the Levites within those genealogies suggests that worship, properly led by the Levites and carried out in the Jerusalem temple, provides the means by which the community connects with the traditions of the past.

“All Israel” is a second theological theme of the Chronicler. Earlier scholarship insisted that the Chronicler was uninterested in the northern kingdom after its fall to Assyria, and that his concept of “Israel” was narrowly exclusive and confined to the southern tribes of Judah and Benjamin, as in 2 Chron. 11:3; 12:1. The situation, however, is more complex than this. In 10:16; 11:13, “all Israel” clearly refers to the north, and in 9:30 both north and south are meant. Actually, the Chronicler's understanding of Israel is quite inclusive and seeks to revitalize the ancient ideal of the twelve tribes by regularly depicting the enthusiastic and unanimous participation of “all Israel” at major turning points in the narrative. These include the accessions of both David and Solomon to the throne (1 Chron. 11:1; 29:20–25), the capture of Jerusalem (11:1–4), the transfer of the ark (13:1–4, 5–6; 15:3; 16:3), and the construction and dedication of the temple (2 Chron. 1:2; 7:8). Consequently, the Chronicler sees the division of the kingdom into north and south as a tragic severing of God's people by Jeroboam's rebellion and Rehoboam's inability to deal with the insurrection (13:4–12). His hope is that “all (p 112)Israel,” north as well as south, will again be one. To that end, there are frequent calls for the people to return to common worship in Jerusalem, most notably, those of Abijah and Hezekiah that frame the period of the divided monarchy (13:4–12; 30:6–9).

A third theological theme is the Chronicler's so-called “principle of immediate retribution,” the view that obedience leads to blessing and disobedience leads to judgment. First Chronicles 28:9 first expresses this: “If you seek him, he will be found by you; but if you forsake him, he will abandon you forever” (NRSV). The blessing/judgment is immediate in that it occurs within the individual king's lifetime. Although many instances are regularly cited, a careful reading of Chronicles indicates that this characteristic principle of the Chronicler is neither as mechanical nor as simplistically applied as previously thought. In 2 Chron. 7:14 God promises Solomon, “If my people ... humble themselves, pray, seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways, ... I will forgive their sin and heal their land” (NRSV). When one remembers that judgment is typically preceded by prophetic warning (e.g., 16:7–9; 20:15–17; 36:15–16), and that judgment is withheld after a repentant response to prophetic warning (e.g., 12:5–8; 15:1–15), it is clear that the Chronicler is more concerned with repentance and restoration than retribution.

Bibliography

Allen, L. The First and Second Books of Chronicles. NIB. Abingdon, 1999; Braun, R. 1 Chronicles. WBC 14. Word, 1986; Coggins, R. J. Samaritans and Jews. John Knox, 1975; Freedman, D. N. “The Chronicler’s Purpose.” CBQ 23 (1961): 436–42; Graham, M. P., et al., eds. The Chronicler as Historian. JSOTSup 238. Sheffield Academic Press, 1997; Graham, M. P., and S. L. McKenzie, eds. The Chronicler as Author. JSOTSup 263. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Japhet, S. I and II Chronicles. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 1993; Kalimi, I. Zur Geschichtsschreibung des Chronisten. BZAW 226. De Gruyter, 1995; Kelly, B. Retribution and Eschatology in Chronicles. JSOTSup 211. Sheffield Academic Press, 1996; Klein, R. W. “Chronicles, Book of 1–2.” ABD 1:992–1002; Newsome, J. D. “Towards a New Understanding of the Chronicler and His Purposes.” JBL 94 (1975): 201–17; Noth, M. The Chronicler’s History. JSOTSup 50. Sheffield Academic Press, 1987; Selman, M. 1 Chronicles and 2 Chronicles. TOTC. InterVarsity, 1994; Throntveit, M. “Linguistic Analysis and the Question of Authorship in Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah.” VT 32 (1982): 201–16; idem. “The Relationship of Hezekiah to David and Solomon in the Books of Chronicles.” In The Chronicler as Theologian, ed. M. P. Graham et al. JSOTSup 371. T&T Clark, 2003; idem. When Kings Speak. SBLDS 93. Scholars Press, 1987; Welten, P. Geschichte und Geschichtsdarstellung in den Chronikbüchern. Neukirchener, 1973; Williamson, H. G. M. Israel in the Book of Chronicles. Cambridge University Press, 1977; idem. 1 and 2 Chronicles. NCB. Eerdmans, 1982.

Mark A. Throntveit

Chronology and the NT

Chronology can refer to the fixed or relative dating of key NT events as well as the dating of NT writings. The goal of this entry will be to evaluate the importance of chronological analysis for theological interpretation and to raise some cautions related to the search for chronology. (For lists of proposed dates for key NT events, cf. Caird or Hoehner.)

The Value of Chronological Analysis for Theological Interpretation

To Illuminate the Historical Context of NT Books More Fully.

An understanding of the sociohistorical context of the NT is crucial for its theological interpretation. As much as chronology contributes to greater understanding of the social world of the biblical text, to that degree chronology has decided value for theological interpretation. One obvious illustration would be the dating of NT books. Proposals for the dating of the Pastoral Epistles, for example, differ widely, depending on authorship perspectives. It is readily apparent that conclusions regarding the theology of the Pastorals, especially their ecclesiology, will differ quite markedly, depending on determination of their composition dates (with authorship corollary).

For Reconstruction of the Historical Jesus and the History of the Early Church. Since a reconstruction of the historical Jesus or the history of the early church often sits in dialogical relationship with NT theological interpretation, chronology that assists in such reconstruction has value. For example, if the temple incident occurs during Jesus' final days, as recorded in the Synoptics (cf. Mark 11:15–19 et par.), and is the impetus for his execution, then it is likely that John has intentionally moved the temple incident to the early part of his Gospel for theological reasons. Possibly he wants to introduce Jesus as fulfillment of key Jewish festivals by first drawing the analogy of Jesus as temple, the center of Jewish worship. If this is the case, then chronology helps illuminate Johannine theology.

For Intertextual Reading of the NT Writings. An area where chronology has significant impact on theological interpretation is at the level of an intertextual or canonical understanding of the NT. At this level the relative dating of NT (p 113)books has its greatest interpretative impact. To illustrate, redaction criticism, whose goal is the theological distinctives of the Gospels, is predicated on the hypothesis that Matthew and Luke postdate Mark and use Mark as source material. To use another example, study of the Pauline corpus necessarily involves some determination of the relative chronology of his letters, especially as it clarifies Pauline theology. If one posits theological development in Paul, the relative dating of Paul's letters will necessarily coincide with any particular proposal of development. The view, for example, that Paul moves toward a greater tolerance of the law is based in part on specific sequencing of his letters.

For Affirming or Calling into Question the Historical Reliability of the NT. The determination of a detailed chronology is more often tied to the issue of the historical reliability of the NT than strictly to its theological interpretation. For example, an important issue in Pauline chronology is whether Gal. 2 retells an incident that precedes or postdates the Jerusalem Council of Acts 15, and whether these two portraits of an early church event even agree with each other. In the end, however, determination of this issue is not absolutely necessary for theological interpretation of either Galatians or Acts. Scholars who understand Acts 15 to be contradicting Gal. 2 do not by necessity produce a different theological interpretation of these books than those who see the two as coherent. The issue comes down to the historical reliability of Acts (or Galatians), which, while important, should not be confused with their theological interpretation.

The Need to Evaluate Worth of Chronological Analysis in Particular Instances

These illustrations show that the importance of NT chronology for theological interpretation surfaces on a case-by-case basis. No single perspective on chronology would seem to fit the NT as a whole. It would be most profitable to take our cue from the NT authors themselves regarding chronology. The writers of the Gospels, for example, often favor thematic concerns over those of chronology. Luke transposes the story at Nazareth from placement after several miracle stories, giving it head position at the start of Jesus' ministry (4:16–30; cf. Mark 6:1–6//Matt. 13:54–58). This indicates the importance of this story for his thematic interests: concern for the marginalized in Jesus' ministry. Even when chronological interests are present, theology is often primary. This may be the case with the three-year ministry of Jesus often derived from John's record of three Passover festivals. In the end, it may be that John is less interested in three Passovers (years) than in three Passovers, the feast he most carefully emphasizes in his Gospel.

The Danger of Undue Emphasis on Chronology

By forcing chronological precision (a modern vs. ancient value) upon the NT writings, we risk missing or misconstruing their theological message (Stiver 52). It also frequently results in unnecessary harmonization. A classic example involves the three denials of Peter between the Gospel accounts. By neglecting nonchronological interests of the evangelists, some have counted six or even nine denials of Peter in a harmonized version of Jesus' passion. Either case ignores the four evangelists' agreement in attributing three denials to Peter.

More complex and theologically important is the issue of the date of Jesus' crucifixion. The Synoptics seem to indicate that Jesus is killed on Nisan 15, the afternoon after celebration of the Passover meal, while John apparently ties his death to Nisan 14, during the ritual slaughter of the lambs on the day before the Passover meal. The problem with too quickly moving toward harmonization of these two witnesses is potential misinterpretation of one or the other.

While proposing that Jesus is crucified on Nisan 14 does not take away significantly from the Synoptics' theological connection between Jesus' death and Passover (in either dating scenario, they are in close affinity), affirming a Nisan 15 date for his death does require major theological maneuvering in John.

John identifies Jesus as the Passover lamb at crucial points. Twice at the beginning of the narrative, the theme is heralded from John the Baptist's lips: "Here is the Lamb of God ..." (1:29, 36 NRSV). It is also inferred from the day and time of Jesus' crucifixion at 19:14, since the sixth hour was the very time when the slaughter of the lambs commenced on Nisan 14, the Day of Preparation. (For the argument that the reference is instead to Friday, cf. Blomberg 246–47.) It is highly significant that the final scene of the crucifixion climaxes with a fulfillment quotation referencing the Passover lamb: "None of his bones will be broken" (Exod. 12:46; John 19:36). To argue that John is not drawing the analogy between Jesus and the Passover lamb might be the result of an excessive need to harmonize the (p 114)Synoptics and John. To miss the analogy would be a theological shame.

In this example, John's theology is based on a specific detail of chronology, the date and time of Jesus' crucifixion, and so this is an example of chronology that has import for theological interpretation. By this example, I am not arguing that the Synoptics can or should be harmonized with John on this issue, although France provides a rather compelling reading of the Synoptics that does just that (France 50–54). The example, however, does illustrate what might be lost if we depart too quickly, and against textual indicators, from an evangelist's theological motive toward chronological harmonization.

Conclusion

Is the determination of chronology important for theological interpretation of the NT? A multifaceted answer is necessary. At times study of chronology is not necessary or even desirable for theological interpretation. In other instances, a general sense of chronology is helpful, but exact chronology proves to be both illusive and more or less irrelevant. There also seem to be situations in which very specific chronological determinations have significance for theology. Whenever possible, we ought to let the NT authors themselves lead the way in determining the importance of chronology for theological interpretation.

Bibliography

Beckwith, R. Calendar and Chronology, Jewish and Christian. AGJU 33. Brill, 1996; Blomberg, C. The Historical Reliability of John's Gospel.

InterVarsity, 2001; Caird, G. B. "The Chronology of the New Testament." IDB 1:599–607; Finegan, J. Handbook of Biblical Chronology. Princeton University Press, 1964; France, R. T. "Chronological Aspects of 'Gospel Harmony.'" VE 16 (1986): 33–59; Hoehner, H. "Chronology." DJG, 118–22; Luedemann, G. Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles, trans. F. S. Jones. Fortress, 1984; Riesner, R. Paul's Early Period. Eerdmans, 1998; Stiver, D. "Ricoeur, Speech-Act Theory, and the Gospels as History." Pages 50–72 in After Pentecost, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2001; Vardaman, J., and E. Yamauchi, eds. Chronos, Kairos, Christos. Eisenbrauns, 1989; Wedderburn, A. J. M. "Paul's Collection: Chronology and History." NTS 48 (2002): 95–110.

Jeannine K. Brown

Chronology and the OT

There is no single, coherent chronology running through the OT, though an interest in chronology is evident at many points. Attempts to add detail and coherence to OT chronology are evident in the surviving fragments of Demetrius the Chronographer (third century BCE), the book of Jubilees (second century BCE), the works of Josephus, and rabbinic writings. A concern to synchronize biblical and secular chronologies first emerges with early Christian writers such as Julius Africanus. The chronology worked out by Archbishop James Ussher in the seventeenth century (which famously dated creation to 4004 BCE) became widely known through its incorporation in some editions of the King James Bible.

The rise of the historical-critical method made many scholars skeptical of the OT's chronological information. Today it is recognized that it cannot all be treated in the same way. For the earliest periods we encounter frequent round numbers and multiples of (e.g.) 60 or 70 (sometimes with the addition of 7), which suggest we are dealing with schematic and symbolic figures rather than historiographic data. This may explain why it is sometimes difficult to reconcile chronological information, such as for the period between the patriarchs and the exodus (cf. Gen. 15:13, 16; Exod. 6:16–20; 12:40–41). On the other hand, the books of 1–2 Kings furnish us with information that can often be shown to be accurate (see below).

There is little evidence that our practice of counting years by eras was known in OT times. There are some indications that the exodus may have provided the starting point for such a reckoning (Num. 33:38; Judg. 11:26; 1 Kings 6:1), but the figures involved are often regarded as schematic.

Partly for this reason, the date of the exodus (and consequently the length of the period of the Judges) has been a notoriously difficult issue for OT historians. According to 1 Kings 6:1, the exodus took place 480 years before the founding of the temple in the fourth year of Solomon's reign. Taken at face value, this dates the exodus around 1450 BCE, in round figures. However, many scholars place greater weight on Exod. 1:11, according to which the enslaved Israelites built the "store cities" Pithom and Raamses for Pharaoh. The name Raamses (or Rameses in Exod. 12:37) recalls the Egyptian Delta capital Pi-Ramesse, built under Ramesses II. Taken with other evidence, this has led many to identify Ramesses II (1279–1213 BCE) as the pharaoh of the exodus and/or the oppression. Hence Exod. 1:11 seems to favor a date no earlier than the thirteenth century BCE for the exodus (Kitchen).

(p 115)The majority of scholars have adopted a date of around 1260 BCE, explaining the 480 years of 1 Kings 6:1 as either schematic (a multiple of the significant OT figures 12 and 40) or a total obtained by adding periods that actually overlapped. But the earlier date does have its defenders (Bimson; Wood). Proponents of a fifteenth-century exodus would see the name Raamses/Rameses as the work of a redactor who wished to give an ancient site its more "modern" name (a parallel case being the reference to Dan in Gen. 14:14; cf. Judg. 18:29). The reference to Israel in Merenptah's stela is often brought into the debate. This attests Israel's presence in Canaan by 1208 BCE but, unfortunately, tells us nothing about how long Israel may have been in the land before that date.

Far less controversy attends the dating of the monarchic period. For the overlapping monarchies of Israel and Judah, we are given a wealth of chronological information. The editors of 1–2 Kings may well have drawn on actual court annals that were preserved into the exile. Usually we are given the length of a king's reign, a note synchronizing his accession with a particular regnal year of his counterpart in Israel or Judah, and his age on ascending the throne. Early critical scholarship treated this information with the same skepticism that it applied to the data in Genesis, but an appreciation of the wider ancient Near Eastern context has led to its being treated with greater respect.

Even so, it is no easy matter to work the regnal lengths and synchronic references into a chronology that dovetails with extrabiblical sources. Working back from a firm base in the Persian period, a detailed chronology has been pieced together for the preceding Neo-Assyrian and Neo-Babylonian periods. In fact, the Assyrian practice of keeping "eponym lists" (in which each year was given the name of a different official, or eponym) means that Assyrian chronology can be reconstructed accurately, to within a year, as far back as 911 BCE. This provides OT chronology with several cross-references, since the OT refers to five Assyrian kings, and Assyrian texts mention eight kings of Israel and Judah.

Several proposals have been made for harmonizing the biblical data in 1–2 Kings with absolute dates supplied by the extrabiblical material. Many scholars in the English-speaking world have adopted the scheme of E. Thiele. This involves a combination of calendar reforms, coregencies, and different methods of reckoning a king's first year (accession-year and nonaccession-year systems) to produce both internal harmony for the biblical data and synchronisms with the absolute dates derived from Assyrian sources.

Some scholars have rejected Thiele's approach, concluding that some of the information in 1–2 Kings is simply schematic and inaccurate (e.g., Hughes). However, Thiele accounts convincingly for most of the awkward data, and there is little reason to suspect schematization until we reach the reigns of David and Solomon, with their forty years each. Thiele's chronology gives a date of 930 BCE for the end of Solomon's reign.

As mentioned above, we have secure dates for the Neo-Babylonian and Persian periods, so where biblical chronology depends on synchronisms with the specific years of Babylonian or Persian kings (e.g., 2 Kings 25:8; 2 Chron. 36:22; Hag. 1:1), the dates are not usually in doubt.

The OT writers were interested in chronology for the same reason they were interested in history, for it was in the world of concrete events that the will and work of Israel's God could be traced and demonstrated. Figures that appear schematic (e.g., 40 or 70 years and multiples thereof) also serve an important role, though it may not be a historical one. They underline the recurring theme that Israel's history was not just a string of random events; it had shape and purpose, reflecting the sovereignty of Israel's God.

See also History of Israel

Bibliography

Anstey, M. The Romance of Bible Chronology. Marshall, 1913; Barnes, W. Studies in the Chronology of the Divided Monarchy of Israel. Scholars Press, 1991; Bimson, J. Redating the Exodus and Conquest. JSOTSup 5. 2d ed. Almond, 1981; Hughes, J. Secrets of the Times. JSOTSup 66. JSOT, 1990; Kitchen, K. A. "Egyptians and Hebrews, from Raamses to Jericho." Pages 65–131 in The Origin of Early Israel. Beer-Sheva 12, ed. S. Ahituv and E. D. Oren. Ben Gurion University of the Negev Press, 1998; Thiele, E. The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings. 3d ed. Eerdmans, 1983; Wood, B. "Did the Israelites Conquer Jericho? A New Look at the Archaeological Evidence." BAR 16, no. 2 (1990): 44–58.

John J. Bimson

Church, Doctrine of the

The Bible is the world's most fascinating book, whether from a literary, historical, cultural, or theological perspective. But the Bible is for something more than our pleasure and puzzlement. It is for our instruction in salvation and in good works (2 Tim. 3:15–17). The Bible is about something more than the pattern of our cultural or (p 116)religious past. It is about “the plan of the mystery hidden for ages in God who created all things,” a plan fulfilled in Jesus Christ and made known through the church (Eph. 3:9–10 NRSV). The theological interpretation of the Bible, then, which assumes this “something more,” cannot be conducted without reference to Christ and to the church (Col. 1:24–29). Indeed, it cannot be conducted without the church itself as its context and precondition. It is never merely private (2 Pet. 1:20–21).

But what is the church? From whatever angle we approach this subject—and theological interpretation of Scripture invites and demands an approach from many different angles simultaneously—we can hardly fail to say at least this: the church is the community of the new covenant between God and humanity, which is grounded in the self-offering of Jesus Christ. Everything else that is said about the church, particularly that which is believed but not yet seen, is said in this connection. Is the church the people of God, opened now to “the elect from every nation,” en route to the promised rest of God (Heb. 4)? Is it the servant of God, the prophet or herald of the kingdom of God? Is it a company of disciples and martyrs, devoted to its Lord and to his Great Commission? Is it a time-embracing but death-defying communion of saints, and is it really “one, holy, catholic and apostolic,” as the creed says? Is the church the household of God, the body and the bride of Christ, the temple of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 3:9–17; 1 Pet. 2:4–10)? Is it an eschatological mystery, a sacrament of salvation, a mystical fellowship in the divine nature, a corporate imago Trinitatis? Is it the city of God, the polis of perpetual peace, the very “pillar and foundation of the truth” (1 Tim. 3:15)? If indeed all of these things, it is what it is by virtue of the new covenant that God the Father effected in Christ and sealed with the Spirit (Eph. 1–3; cf. John 13–17).

Now if the church is a presupposition of theological interpretation, actual ecclesial modes of life—whether more or less true to the nature of the new covenant—shape our interpretative possibilities both in ecclesiology and elsewhere. We can make no pretense to some neutral or ideal standpoint for interpretation. Even the adoption of a basic paradigm is conditioned by our ecclesial experience; moreover, the simultaneity demanded above is attainable only in principle. Theological interpretation of the church is conducted from within the church, and under the conditions of the church militant—which means also under the conditions of the church paradoxically at odds with itself. That is a problem to which we will return, but only after considering the church from the standpoint of its trinitarian foundations and its twofold liturgical life, the life by which it knows and expresses itself as the new covenant community.

Creatura Verbi et Spiritus

The Nature and Purpose of the Church (§9) rightly speaks of the church as creatura Verbi et creatura Spiritus. For lex orandi agrees with lex credendi that “without the Spirit there is no seeing the word of God, and without the Son there is no approaching the Father” (Irenaeus, Epid. 7; cf. Rom. 8). The church is that new humanity which God’s two hands are molding into the divine image for communion with the Father, which is the church’s goal. The Word himself is incarnate as the head of the church, on whose behalf “through the eternal Spirit [he] offered himself unblemished to God” (Heb. 9:14; cf. Eph. 5:25). The Holy Spirit is the church’s animator and guide, its cohesive force and fructifying power. What the Word articulates, the Spirit manifests, such that the church, as the body of Christ, becomes “the fullness of him who fills all in all” (Eph. 1:17–23 NRSV; 3:14–21; cf. Epid. 5).

Thus the church is indeed the creation of the Word and the Spirit in an altogether unique sense. While not itself a mode of the Trinity’s own koinonia or perichorēsis, the church has that koinonia and perichorēsis as its presupposition. While not itself the incarnation of God (this is where the “bride” metaphor must qualify the “body” metaphor: it is Christ alone who is both divine and human), the church has the Son of God within it. While not itself divine (the Spirit of God is its animator, not its anima or animus), the church has deification as its destiny. That is, with Christ’s return it expects the fullness of the gift of the Spirit, so as to perfect its communion with the Father. It is to keep in view this highest of callings, this ultimate of dignities, that the expression creatura Verbi et Spiritus is employed.

The four creedal notae (marks) rest on this trinitarian foundation and must be interpreted in this light, for they open up questions of ontology which no lesser mode of analysis can penetrate. But the trinitarian foundation itself is laid through the economy of God in bringing about the birth of the Son in the womb of Israel—literally, of Mary the Theotokos—so as to bring “many sons to glory” (Heb. 2:10). It is laid down as an offering of the triune God to humanity, and of (p 117) humanity to the triune God, in a mutual history, in a covenanted relationship. This relationship, as extended to the church, is governed and enabled by word and sacrament in their new covenant form.

Creatura Verbi et Sacramenti

Both the liturgy of the word and the liturgy of the sacrament require us to recognize the church as creatura verbi in a second, derivative sense, which points simultaneously to three facts: First, the new covenant community is the beginning of the promised new creation: paradisus in hoc mundo, as Irenaeus put it (Haer. 5.20.2). Second, it is brought into being, like the first creation, by divine fiat; it springs to life under the impact of the command it hears with and from Christ: Rise! Exsurge! (Eph. 5:14 Vulg.; cf. Rev. 1:17–20). Third, while the people still dwell in “the land of sepulture” (Irenaeus, Haer. 5.31), this divine fiat is mediated to them through the proclamation of the gospel and the exposition of Scripture. As in the awakening, so also in the nourishing and ordering of its life, the church is responsive and responsible to the divine word that is there spoken. In the Scriptures, “the Father who is in heaven comes lovingly to meet his children, and talks with them” (Dei Verbum 21). When we have said that the church is creatura verbi, we have said that the church does not live out of its own resources but “by every word that proceeds from the mouth of God” (Matt. 4:4 NRSV; cf. John 6:63).

It is not enough, however, to say that the church is creatura verbi, not if the church really does live. The living church is not only creatura verbi but, if that, then also creatura sacramenti. The manna from heaven on which it lives comes to it during its present sojourn not only as word but, epiclestically, also as sacrament (John 6:52–65; cf. Irenaeus, Haer. 5.2.3). It is by means of the sacraments that the people of God are given a real participation in the self-offering of Jesus Christ, which is a self-offering both of God to man and of man to God. By means of the sacraments they are sealed within the church and as the church, in order to render a thank offering in and for the world. By means of the sacraments they become not merely a priestly people but a “body,” participant in that body quod pro vobis datur and in the eternal life inherited by it (cf. Luke 22:19; Heb. 10). In other words, there are covenant rites as well as covenant documents in the ecclesial economy: word and sacrament work together to make the church the firstfruits of the new creation.

Chief among the sacraments are baptism and the Eucharist, which between them form the axis of all other sacramental activity in the covenant community. Taken together, these two sacraments constitute the forma formans of participation in the life of Christ and in his royal priesthood (Rom. 6; 1 Cor. 10–15; cf. Irenaeus, Haer. 4.17–18; 5.28.4). Baptism effects a once-for-all recapitulation of the believer’s own life and thus replaces circumcision as the effectual sign of membership in the covenant community. It liberates believers for the worship of God. The Eucharist continually places in the believer’s hands an offering worthy of God while actualizing the ecclesial community as such, locating and maintaining it by divine grace at the intersection of the ages and at the junction between heaven and earth. Just as the old covenant was sealed by a feast on Mt. Sinai, so also the new covenant has its eucharistic feast. In it God’s people share “the food of immortality” through communion with him who has passed from death to life, and from this world to the Father (cf. Exod. 24; Heb. 12). It is through these sacraments that the promises fulfilled in Christ and announced to the world are substantiated in and for the church, and that the church appears, to the eye of faith, as the eschatological mystery that it is.

Theological Interpretation and the Sacrifice of Unity

Theological interpretation (whatever its immediate object) is obliged to take into account the church’s character as creatura verbi et sacramenti, and in particular the eschatological qualification that the sacraments entail. The new covenant community is not merely a community that, aided by the Scriptures, remembers Jesus and hopes for his return. It is a new being determined by a eucharistic becoming—by the Spirit’s act of making it present to the Father in and with Jesus. That being the case, authentic theological interpretation is possible only as something implicated in eucharistic activity. It is possible only as gift and gratitude. It may be approached through the faithful sowing and harvesting of words, ideas, and actions, and through the reading and rereading of texts in the company of the faithful, but it cannot be achieved apart from the taking, blessing, breaking, and donating that is God’s own act in Christ. With that in mind, we may return to the problem of theological interpretation under the (p 118)paradoxical conditions of ecclesial disunity and the breaking of eucharistic fellowship.

Disunity contradicts both the headship of Christ and the lordship of the Spirit, just as it contradicts the truth of the divine fatherhood (Eph. 3–4). It thus contradicts the church as such and defies the law of its being as creatura Verbi et Spiritus. Not surprisingly, there is a lack of agreement about the causes of the contradiction. Historically, the East charges the West with failing to say et Spiritus clearly enough, because in the creed it has already said what it ought not to say: filioque. The West reverses the charge. For its own part, however, the West has for some time been divided internally between a word-oriented and a sacrament-oriented ecclesiology. The former tends to epistemology, emphasizing knowledge, individual faith, and the local congregation; the latter to ontology, emphasizing communion, corporate faith, and a catholic institution. This gives rise to Schleiermacher's claim that the latter makes one's relation to Christ depend upon one's relation to the church, while the former makes one's relation to the church depend upon one's relation to Christ—as if this either/or were really conceivable!

If these divisions already owe something to differences in theological interpretation of Scripture, they also profoundly exacerbate the same. Scripture helps to maintain the church as the pillar and foundation of the truth, but if the church really is the pillar and foundation of the truth, then legitimate theological interpretation is jeopardized by the disunity of the church to the same degree that the church itself is jeopardized. Disunity robs authentic interpretation of its main condition of possibility. Church divisions render the intersection between Scripture and church tradition chaotic and the rules that govern it (even those of the Vincentian Canon) unclear. What are we to say that will cast some light on this situation?

What we must not say is that unity is something for us to achieve through ecumenical cooperation. That is really to think of the church merely as a human creation, as creatura conventus. Moreover, it may lead to such patent nonsense as we find inserted (§74) into The Nature and Purpose of the Church. There it can even be asked, in exploring “the tolerable limits to diversity,” not only whether we might safely disagree about the procession of the Spirit, but also whether it is really church-dividing “to understand the resurrection of Christ only symbolically,” or “to confess Christ only as one mediator among others,” or “to substitute the history of ancient Israel ... with the pre-Christian history of one's own culture and people” (§74). What is this if not to ask whether theological interpretation needs to be Christian or churchly at all?

On the other hand, we must not say either that the unity essential for sound theological interpretation can already be found here or there in the church. That claim also trivializes the problem of disunity, and hence of theological interpretation. Whether in Orthodox, Catholic, or Protestant guise, it reproduces the Corinthian error rebuked by Paul.

A third thing we ought not to say is that unity and catholicity are features of the church only in the eschaton. The et sacramenti disallows this evasion. The integrity of the church, like that of its members, may be something “hidden with Christ in God” (Col. 3:3), but we are not thus relieved of the burden of anticipating it on earth. As John Paul II reminds us, “Concern for restoring unity pertains to the whole Church, faithful and clergy alike. It extends to everyone according to the potential of each” (Ut unum sint §101; quoting Unitatis redintegratio §5). Or more pointedly (in §96): “Could not the real but imperfect communion existing between us persuade Church leaders and their theologians to engage with me in a patient and fraternal dialogue on this subject, a dialogue in which, leaving useless controversies behind, we could listen to one another, keeping before us only the will of Christ for his Church and allowing ourselves to be deeply moved by his plea ‘that they may all be one ... so that the world may believe that you have sent me’ (Jn 17:21)?” To refuse such a request, or to adopt a contrary attitude, would be to deny the real presence of Christ in the church militant, and to speak only of his absence from it. Far from affirming an eschatological reserve, it would deny the eschatological situation of the church altogether—the witness of its martyrs as well as of its Eucharists.

It is precisely the eucharistic tension between the presence and the absence of Christ with which we must reckon here. The sin of disunity—of competing creeds and jurisdictions, or of other de facto denials of the ecclesial notae—stems in part from the anxiety generated by this tension. The Eucharist places the new covenant people in a posture of waiting. It situates them precariously between Egypt and Canaan, between the saeculum and the kingdom of heaven. The apparent insecurity of this position may tempt the church to cling to this or that feature of its secular identity. Insurance policies are then taken out against the eschatological wager; from matters of dress to matters of dogma, identity markers are laid down (p 119) by the church to secure for itself a unity that it can only receive as a gift. The same markers that comfort the church here, of course, alienate it there; but it does little good to go around collecting the markers and trying to sort out which ones everyone can accept. What is called for instead is a more careful eschatological analysis and the willingness to make what John Paul II calls “a sacrifice of unity” (Ut unum sint §102).

What would such a sacrifice look like in eucharistic theology itself? Or in Mariology, that closely related mode of ecclesiological discourse—Mary being the archetype of free participation in the self-offering of Christ—that is likewise plagued by difficulties in eschatology? What would it look like in treating the present relation between the people of the old covenant and the people of the new? What would it look like in treating of the keys and of the Petrine office (Matt. 16:13–20), and hence also of the conduct of the wider Christian mission? Where the unity of the church is concerned, these (together with the filioque) are still among the most important challenges facing the theological interpretation of Scripture. And if they are important for the unity of the church, they are important for theological interpretation as such. Only by way of a sacrifice of unity can theological interpretation hope to flourish. Only as the church takes up Mary's "fiat mihi secundum verbum tuum" (Luke 1:38 Vulg.) can it hope to see the barriers to unity removed, and the condition of authentic interpretation restored.

See also Catholic Biblical Interpretation; Community, Interpretative; Israel; Orthodox Biblical Interpretation; Protestant Biblical Interpretation

Bibliography

Congar, Y. The Mystery of the Church. Helicon, 1960; Dulles, A. Models of the Church. Image, 1987; Farrow, D. Ascension and Ecclesia. Eerdmans, 1999; John Paul II. Ecclesia de Eucharistia. Encyclical. Vatican, 2002; idem. Ut unum sint. Encyclical. Vatican, 1995; Journet, C. The Theology of the Church. Ignatius, 2004; Küng, H. The Church. Sheed & Ward, 1967; Lubac, H. de. Catholicism. New American Library, 1964; Minear, P. Images of the Church in the New Testament. Westminster, 1960; Newbigin, L. The Household of God. SCM, 1953; O'Donovan, O. The Desire of the Nations. Cambridge University Press, 1996; Torrance, T. F. Royal Priesthood. Oliver & Boyd, 1955; Vatican II. Dei Verbum, 1965; idem. Lumen gentium, 1964; Volf, M. After Our Likeness. Eerdmans, 1998; Watson, F. Text, Church, and World. Eerdmans, 1994; WCC. The Nature and Purpose of the Church. Faith and Order Paper 181. WCC, 1998; Zizioulas, J. Being as Communion. St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1985.

Douglas Farrow

Colossians, Book of History of Interpretation

Throughout the history of Christian thought, Colossians has played a central role, particularly in relation to Christology and soteriology. The church fathers focused primarily on the hymn in Col. 1:15–20, where Paul's description of the Son as the image of the invisible God and the firstborn of all creation (1:15) provided the basis for the doctrine of the preexistence of Christ. This in turn gave rise to the doctrine of the two natures of Christ: "The pre-existent one is also the incarnate one and who yet at the same time bears the whole divine being in himself" (Schweizer 253; Gorday 12–14). Such an emphasis provided the impetus for seeing the work of God in the OT as continuous with the work of Jesus. Calvin later argued that 1:15–20 is not about the two natures but rather describes Jesus as the one who has made God visible to believers. The emphasis shifts, therefore, from Jesus' relation to God to his relation to believers and the result of such a relationship in their lives.

The second major contribution of Colossians in the history of interpretation was to discussions of soteriology, primarily whether salvation includes all of the natural world, the whole of the cosmos, and even all people (Gorday 15–21). More recently, Sittler has carried this theme forward in arguing that 1:15–20 shows that redemption embraces both history and nature and therefore has political, and especially ecological, implications. The radical nature of this redemption for all dimensions of life has continued to shape the soteriological thrust of discussion of Colossians into the present.

Ethically, Colossians initially provided the basis for condemnations of ascetic practice. For much of the history of interpretation, readers paid relatively little attention to the household codes of Col. 3:18–4:1, using them primarily to counteract the abuse of Christian freedom and equality. More recently, however, this passage has played a central role in ethical discussions concerning the role of women and the institution of slavery. Such discussions generally interpret Colossians as endorsing a restrictive social ethic that justifies both slavery and the subordination of women (D'Angelo; Martin). Such interpretations have provided one of the bases for the position that Colossians is post-Pauline. In such a context Colossians is seen to be evidence of a tendency toward a more hierarchical ethic in the development of the early church. While such views (p 120) on the post-Pauline character of Colossians are widespread, they are by no means unchallenged (Wright, Colossians; Cannon).

The Message of Colossians and Its Relation to the Canon

Paul's letter to the Colossians is rooted in the story of Israel and in the story of Jesus. These two stories function as a challenge to the dominant story facing the Colossian Christians: the story of Rome. Such a challenge is evident from the outset of the letter, where Paul describes the gospel as bearing fruit and growing in the whole world (1:6), and later describes the Colossians themselves as bearing fruit and growing in the knowledge of God (1:10).

For the inhabitants of Colossae, the language of gospel (euangelion) carried strong imperial overtones. A central claim of Rome was that the empire achieved and guaranteed universal peace, the Pax Romana. The imperial gospel, moreover, assured the Colossians that fruitfulness and fertility was all around them. It was a claim that incessantly called everyone to acknowledge Rome as the source of abundance. Partaking in such abundance in the midst of scarce resources required fidelity to the empire and its structures, oppressive or not.

This was no new claim. Throughout its history, Israel constantly grappled with an empire's claims to be the source of abundance, security, and fertility. But there was also a countertestimony within Israel's story, a witness to an alternative social vision that challenged the claims of empire. The fruitfulness of Yahweh, and the fruit that Israel was called to bear, was central to that countertestimony. Fertility and fruitfulness in the land on the one hand, and peace and security on the other, are rooted in a rejection of the militaristic consumerism of empire and the social and economic practices that support it. The language of such blessing is the language of fruitfulness (Lev. 26:3–6; Isa. 5:1–7; Ezek. 34:25–31; Mic. 4:1–5; Zech. 8:1–16).

These themes come to their climax in Jesus. The community that Jesus envisions is not only judged by its fruit but is itself a manifestation of the fruitfulness of Yahweh. At key points in the narrative—some of them foundational, some of them climactic—we meet the metaphors and language of fruitfulness (Matt. 13:23/Mark 4:20; Luke 8:15; Matt. 7:16–20; Luke 6:43–45).

By using the language of fruitfulness, with all of its overtones from the story of Israel and the preaching of Jesus, Paul in Colossians is proclaiming a different gospel, which bears fruit fundamentally different from the fruit of the empire.

Before Paul discusses that way of life, he describes the cosmic scope of this gospel and the nature of the reconciliation it brings. In 1:15–20 Paul alludes to Adam as the image of God; however, he does so in his description of Jesus, the second Adam. He also alludes to the creation of wisdom in Prov. 8:22, the firstborn of creation. There is a faint echo of Gen. 9:8–17, where God reaffirms the covenant with all living things, and the phrase “all living things” or “all flesh” is repeated nine times in the Greek. In Col. 1:15–20, the repetition of “all things” or “everything” occurs seven times. By confessing that in Jesus God reconciles all of creation to himself, Paul is reaffirming God's most foundational covenantal promise to be faithful to all of creation.

The identification of Jesus with God, and the linking of God's covenant promise to creation with the reconciliation of all things in Jesus through the cross, is a clear challenge to the empire. Not only does the language of image evoke Adam, it also evokes Caesar, whose images were ubiquitous throughout the ancient Roman world both in statues and on coins. The claim that Jesus is above all thrones, dominions, rulers, or powers challenges the throne, dominion, rule, and power of Rome. And while the Pax Romana is achieved and maintained through the public crucifixion of those who challenge Rome's rule, Jesus' blood shed on such a cross radically subverts imperial rule and establishes a more profound peace.

Here Paul is asserting the primacy of the story of Jesus over against the story of Rome. This alternative story line, with its proclamation of a different peace, is rooted deeply within the story of Israel. That story, however, is redefined in Jesus, in whom its central character finds expression.

In Col. 2 Paul reinforces this by describing a worldview that is attempting to capture the imagination of the Colossian Christians. Paul's description of this worldview echoes the scriptural prophetic polemic against idolatry (Walsh 8–9). Perhaps the best way to draw out the parallels is in the form of a chart.

(p 121)The Colossian Philosophy	Idolatry
1. The philosophy is captivating ( Col. 2:8 ).	1. Idolatry makes repentance and knowledge of God impossible ( Hos. 5:4 ).
2. The philosophy is empty deceit ( 2:8 ), and a shadow without substance ( 2:17 ).	2. Idolatry is worthless, vanity, nothingness ( Pss. 97:7; 115:4–7; 135:15–18; Isa. 44:9; 57:13; Jer. 2:5 ).
3. The philosophy is a human tradition ( 2:8 ), a human way of thinking ( 2:18 ), that imposes human commands and teaching ( 2:20 ).	3. Idols are constructed by human hands ( Ps. 115:4; Isa. 2:8; 41:6–7; 44:11; Jer. 10:1–10; Hos. 8:4, 6; 13:2; Hab. 2:18 ).
4. The philosophy is puffed up without cause ( 2:18 ) and deceives people by employing so-called plausible arguments ( 2:4, 8 ).	4. Idolatry results in a deluded mind and a fundamental lack of knowledge ( Isa. 44:18–20; Hos. 4:6 ); an idol is a teacher of lies ( Hab. 2:18 ).
5. The philosophy is of no value in checking the flesh ( 2:23 ).	5. Idolatry is impotent, without value, and does not profit ( Pss. 115:4–7; 135:15–18; Isa. 45:20; 46:1–2; Jer. 2:11; Hos. 7:16; Hab. 2:19 ).
6. The philosophy disqualifies, insists on self-abasement ( 2:18 ), and promotes severe treatment of the body ( 2:23 ).	6. Idolatry is a matter of exchanging glory for shame ( Ps. 106:20; Jer. 2:11; Hos. 4:7; 7:16; 13:1–3; Rom. 1:23 ).

In these verses Paul's language evokes the prophetic critique of idolatry, and in so doing his critique of the empire finds a context in larger biblical tradition. For instance, "the proclamation that Christ triumphs over the rulers and authorities on the cross (2:15) is clearly rooted in the prophetic confession that Yahweh is Lord and shares glory with no idols (Isa 42:8; 48:11)" (Walsh 9). These overtones are heightened when put in parallel with Col. 1:15–20. The prophetic critique of idolatry is rooted in the confession that Yahweh, not the idols, is Creator of heaven and earth (Pss. 115:16; 135:5–7; Isa. 40:12–26; 44:9–28; 45:12, 18; Jer. 10:11–16; 51:15–19). So also Paul’s critique of the philosophy is rooted in the assertion that Jesus is the one through whom and for whom all things were created (Col. 1:15–17). As the results of such an echo, Paul alludes to empire and asserts that Jesus is the true image, not Caesar. Jesus is over all thrones, dominions, rulers, and powers. He is the head in whom all things hold together, not Caesar. And Jesus is the one in whom the Deity dwells. All of these assertions are rooted in the larger biblical narrative of Yahweh as the one who offers a salvation that defeats the captivity, deceitfulness, vanity, shame, and impotence of idols and the empires that image them.

Here we return to competing stories. If a life directed by idolatry constitutes forgetfulness of Yahweh’s covenant in Israel’s Scripture (Deut. 4:15–31; 6:10–15; 8:11–20), the succumbing to imperial idolatry means that the Colossian Christians have forgotten that they indwell the story of Jesus. “In Christ” they have died (2:20; 3:3), were buried (2:12), and were raised from the dead (2:12; 3:1). They set their minds on the ascended one (3:2–3) and anticipate his coming (3:4). Christ’s death, burial, resurrection, ascension, and return form the narrative heart of the counterimperial ethic Paul elucidates in 3:1–17.

This alternative story and ethic culminate, however, in Paul’s description of the “household code” in 3:18–4:1. Here Paul’s argument is made or broken. It doesn’t matter if Paul uses language that subverts the empire and its violent and oppressive practices, if in the end he affirms a patriarchal household structure that reinscribes economic control and violence. I have argued elsewhere that rather than reinscribing the hierarchy of the household in these verses, Paul is subverting them (Walsh and Keesmaat, ch. 11). Paul’s instructions to the household have three surprising and subversive aspects. Many scholars have recognized the first aspect: Paul directly addresses not only the head of the household—husband, father, and master—but also women, children, and slaves. This has the effect of giving the dignity of participation to those who would have seldom been addressed as having status in the relationship.

Second, and often lost in English translation, is Paul’s play on the language of Lord, or Master (kyrios). This is most striking in the section to slaves, where the rhetorical effect of the constant movement from the “masters according to the flesh” to “the Master” undermines the ultimate legitimacy of these earthly masters.

Third, when Paul tells slaves that they will receive an inheritance (3:24), he is evoking the language of slaves receiving an inheritance in the year of Jubilee (Lev. 25). For those with ears to hear, Paul’s language suggests that in the story of Jesus, slaves are to be set free, for they too are to receive an inheritance. As a result, in these verses Paul challenges the most fundamental hierarchy in which power was centralized in the Roman Empire.

(p 122) These verses are thus shown to be a working out of Paul's words in 3:12 and following. There a self-sacrificing love, manifesting itself in compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, and patience, comes to its culmination in an ethic of forgiveness, love, and the rule of peace. This is not the peace of the empire (the Pax Romana), but the peace of a different ruler, Christ (3:13–15). In light of these verses, and in light of v. 11, where Paul proclaims that “there is no longer Greek and Jew, circumcised and uncircumcised, barbarian, Scythian, slave and free” (NRSV), a subversive word to slaves that proclaims their liberation makes perfect sense.

For the Colossian Christians, Paul's allusions to Israel's Scriptures provide an alternative story line that fundamentally challenges the claims of the story of the empire.

The Theology of Colossians

The challenge that Colossians provides to its imperial context is overwhelmingly rooted in a strong theology of creation. Paul describes himself as the servant of a gospel that “has been proclaimed to every creature under heaven” (1:23). This assertion comes after the hymn of 1:15–20, with its echoes of creational monotheism (Wright, “Poetry”) and its repeated affirmation that all things in heaven and on earth were created in Christ, through Christ, and for Christ. It is because all things were created good in Christ that all things are now reconciled in Christ.

At the heart of the philosophy was its insistence on self-abasement, asceticism, and severe treatment of the body (2:17, 20–23). As we saw above, Paul describes these practices as idolatrous and emphasizes Jesus as the one who has triumphed over all other thrones and rulers and powers. Thus he asserts that God in Jesus is the true Creator of the heaven and earth, over against the idolatrous forces that seek to enslave the Colossian Christians (2:8). Jesus is the one who is now the Creator of all, and in the face of all that would seek to deny the goodness of his creation, Paul is asserting that as Creator he has not only vanquished all other creation-denying rulers (2:15), but has also renewed the creation.

In addition, not only is Jesus the true image of the Creator God, but those who have clothed themselves with the new self are “being renewed in knowledge according to the image of [the] creator” (3:10). The Colossian Christians themselves bear the image of that Creator and hence witness to the world the forgiveness, love, and reconciling peace that Jesus has achieved through the blood of the cross (1:20; 3:13–15). At the end of this letter, Paul’s subversion of the household codes reveals how far-reaching this creational reconciliation goes. The household structure he is describing was the basic economic, social, and political unit of first-century culture. Hence, Paul is daring to assert that those who image the Creator will act differently in social, economic, and political spheres. From what we know of the church in the first century, this was indeed the case.

In a culture such as ours, where the idolatry of the market necessarily results in disregard for almost every creature under heaven, Colossians provides a word of hope. Just as in the first century Paul proclaimed that Jesus, not Caesar, was the one who had reconciled the whole of the world, so Paul proclaims to us that Jesus, not globalization, reconciles the whole of the world. Just as Paul proclaimed to the Colossians that the forces that deny the goodness of this creation are idolatrous, so he proclaims to us today that those economic and political practices that destroy the creation and those in it are idolatrous. And just as Paul proclaimed that the lordship of Christ challenged the imperial structures for familial, social, and economic life, so Paul proclaims to us today that the lordship of Christ challenges our societal structures that shape familial, social, and economic life in service of empire and its oppression.

Paul ends Colossians by asking the believers to remember his chains (4:18). We do well to remember them, for they indicate where such a subversive theology could lead, not only in Paul’s time, but also in ours.

See also Powers and Principalities; Roman Empire

Bibliography

Cannon, G. The Use of Traditional Materials in Colossians. Mercer University Press, 1983; D’Angelo, M. “Colossians.” In A Feminist Commentary. Vol. 2 of Searching the Scriptures, ed. E. S. Fiorenza. Crossroad, 1994; Dunn, J. D. G. The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon. NIGTC. Eerdmans, 1996; Gorday, P. Colossians, 1–2 Thessalonians, 1–2 Timothy, Titus, Philemon. ACCSNT 9. InterVarsity, 2000; Lincoln, A. The Letter to the Colossians. Vol. 9 of NIB. Abingdon, 2000; Lincoln, A., and A. J. M. Wedderburn. The Theology of the Later Pauline Letters. Cambridge University Press, 1993; MacDonald, M. Colossians and Philemon. SP 17. Liturgical Press, 2000; Martin, R. Colossians and Philemon. NCB. Eerdmans, 1981; Schweizer, E. The Letter to the Colossians, trans. A. Chester. Fortress, 1981; Sittler, J. “Call to Unity.” Ecumenical Review 14 (1961–62): 177–87; Walsh, B. “Late/Post Modernity and Idolatry: A Contextual Reading of Colossians 2:8–3:4.” Ex Aud 15 (1999): 1–17; Walsh, B., and S. Keesmaat. Colossians Remixed.

InterVarsity, 2004; (p 123)Wilson, W. The Hope of Glory. Brill, 1997; Wright, N. T. The Epistles of Paul to the Colossians and Philemon. TNTC. Eerdmans, 1986; idem. "Poetry and Theology in Colossians 1.15–20." Pages 99–119 in The Climax of the Covenant. T&T Clark, 1991.

Sylvia C. Keesmaat

Commentary

A commentary on a biblical book provides information, organized schematically in relation to the structure of the book, presumed to be relevant for understanding the book's message. Traditionally proceeding in a verse-by-verse format, the commentator presents interpretative data chosen from a wide array of possibilities, such as philological, grammatical, source-critical, historical, social-scientific, and literary.

Beyond this general characterization, the genre of the biblical commentary today is difficult to describe. This is because the late twentieth century witnessed the genesis of numerous commentary series, each justifying itself by purporting to represent a different approach to the task of commenting on biblical texts. Each attempts to serve an increasingly well-defined audience, and each subtly redraws the boundaries of the genre to meet its own ends.

Generalizations about the commentary are also made problematic by the increasingly pervasive recognition that the enterprise of commentary writing has entered a critical era. How can the sheer number of commentaries flooding the marketplace be justified? With the deluge of secondary literature on seemingly every possible aspect of a biblical text, and with the smorgasbord of methodological approaches wielded among biblical scholars, what hope of taking into account and representing the state of the scholarly enterprise might a commentator nurture? Given the multitudinous questions raised against modern biblical criticism, with its inherent commitment to literal meaning and scientific neutrality, must we not recognize that commentaries have failed in their purported roles as mere servants of the biblical text, wholesalers of authoritative, objective scholarship?

The particular enterprise of theological interpretation of Scripture has not been well served by the spread of commentary writing in the last three centuries. Among the primary interests shaping biblical studies during this period, two are especially inhospitable to theological interpretation of these texts. The first is a heightened concern with the "literal sense" that arose in the wake of the Reformation. In biblical studies as in natural science, focus on "literal interpretation" pressed for commitments to observer neutrality. According to the medieval encyclopedia, both the Bible and the entire sensible world were books written by the hand of God. Both biblical text and all of nature served metaphorically to reveal the Divine Author. Thus, where Luke writes that, after witnessing the ascension of Jesus, the disciples' walk from the Mount Olivet to Jerusalem was "a sabbath day's journey" (Acts 1:12–13 NRSV), the Venerable Bede could comment in the early eighth century:

Anyone who becomes worthy of an interior vision of glory of the Lord as he ascends to the Father, and of the enrichment by the promise of the Holy Spirit, here enters the city of everlasting peace by a Sabbath journey. There will be for him [sic], in Isaiah's words, Sabbath after Sabbath, because, having been free of wicked works here [in this life], he will be at rest there in heavenly recompense. (Bede 14)

Prior to the 1600s, then, exegesis of God's two books, cosmos and Bible, proceeded in accordance with the theory of the four levels of interpretation: the literal, the allegorical, the moral, and the analogical. When Protestant interpretation countered this fourfold method of exegesis, in favor of the "literal sense," the work of interpretation, broadly conceived, was loosed from the specifically religious concerns to which it had previously been tethered (Howell).

At the same time, the modern era came increasingly to be characterized by its position vis-à-vis history, and especially by its detachment from what went on before. The modern era, as though it occupied a new space though it occupied a new, , autonomous cultural space (Schorske). Moderns inhabit one history, the biblical texts another, with the result that the biblical materials could not be read as having direct relevance to modern people. What is more, this perspective segregated "history" and "text" so that the history to which the biblical text gives witness was isolated from the biblical text that provides such a witness. Since biblical studies accorded privilege to "history," the biblical text was viewed with critical suspicion, and interpretation was increasingly construed as a discipline of "validation" (when the biblical text was judged to represent historical events with accuracy) or of "reconstruction" (when it was not).

For many critical scholars, then, even to acknowledge the search for contemporary significance would be enough to poison the water. As one observer has put it, the historical project was to move forward "without any practical interest, be it lessons, devotion, entertainment, or (p 124)propaganda" (Breisach 323). Therefore, it is no surprise that voices bemoaning the irrelevance of modern biblical criticism to the theological task, to ethical discourse, to homiletics, and the like have become so pervasive and increasingly vibrant. The modern paradigm of study portrayed "the strange world of the Bible" as profoundly remote from our world, rendering as arduous if not impossible the task of shuttling between the world of the Bible and our own world, for the purpose of negotiating good news for God's people. Many commentators who today articulate a real concern for the life of the church nevertheless self-reflectively witness the success of the historical paradigm in the writing of commentaries: "I like to think of commentaries as windows into the world presented by the biblical text" (Perkins 398). "To my mind, the first and main purpose of a commentary is to help the reader to discover what the text meant in its original setting" (Hagner 58). It is important that we grasp, though, that this way of construing the enterprise is of relatively recent vintage in relation to the long history of commenting on biblical texts.

The beginnings of commentary are found in the Bible itself—first, in the interpretation of biblical texts within other biblical texts, all within the Hebrew Bible; and then in the interpretation of the Scriptures of Israel within the writings of the NT. Texts were revised and reappropriated, as authoritative tradition, to address changing circumstances. Although these interpretations were not systematized, they nonetheless served as early commentary. A common feature of ancient Judaism was "the realization that there was no pure teaching of Revelation apart from its regeneration or clarification through an authoritative type of exegesis" (Fishbane 4). Moving outside the interpretation of biblical texts among the biblical writers themselves, the translation of the Hebrew Bible into Greek (LXX) and the development of the targumic tradition served further to codify interpretative traditions. The Qumran scrolls evidence a vast exegetical enterprise, with two commitments not so much juxtaposed as intertwined: to the truth and authority of the Scriptures, and to their legitimate interpretation and embodiment in the community of the faithful. Whether through reworking biblical texts or in more substantive exposition, commentators represented among the Dead Sea Scrolls concerned themselves with the contemporary understanding and practice of the Scriptures. The traditions of midrashim similarly engaged in a dialogue with the biblical texts, extending their meaning from the past into the present, with "readers fighting to find what they must in the holy text" (Boyarin 16). Precisely because of the authoritative status of the biblical texts, their immediacy to contemporary readers was a nonnegotiable presupposition; their capacity to speak on God's behalf in the readers' present and to be embodied in their lives was crucial. Commentary, in this sense, was cultivated in the field of contemporary culture while at the same time it plowed the language and theological categories of the biblical witness deep into the imagination of these communities.

The early church was not known for the writing of commentaries, at least not in a form recognizable to twenty-first-century pastors, teachers, and students. In those first centuries, theology was an exegetical enterprise, and the typical forms of “commentary” were the homily and theological treatise, along with catechetical lectures and pastoral letters. Scholarly Christian writing in the first centuries devoted itself to an elaboration of biblical theology—drawing out and schematizing rather than rehearsing biblical texts. Following interpretative patterns found already in the Hebrew Bible, remembered of Jesus, and practiced among the writers of what would become the NT documents, interpreters recontextualized biblical texts, providing an updated rereading in the service of Scripture’s messianic and ecclesial message of salvation (Margerie). In the millennium before the Reformation, the growth of the commentary proper pressed less and less in the direction of dialogical engagement with Scripture, depending more and more on handing down the received tradition of interpretation (for a list of commentaries in 650–1000 CE, see McNally 83–117). Bible commentary took a more doctrinal and picturesque form from the twelfth to the fifteenth centuries in the xylograph known as Biblia pauperum, with biblical scenes shown, like stained-glass windows, in triptych and produced from wooden blocks carved in relief. With this Bible of the Poor, the fundamentals of the faith could be taught to the illiterate through the juxtaposition of images drawn from OT and NT. Type and antitype appeared side by side, as with scenes of Moses receiving the law and Elijah’s calling fire down from heaven presented as precursors to the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost (Labriola and Smeltz). Reacting against biblical interpretation in the medieval period, the Protestant Reformers emphasized making the Bible accessible to the people (thus new efforts to translate the Bible in the common vernacular) and determining the one meaning of Scripture (thus the quest for the (p 125)original meaning of biblical texts). Handbooks for interpretation focused on criteria for achieving legitimate readings, including philology, study of the historical circumstances governing the meaning of words, and reference to the intent of the author (e.g., Griffiths; Steinmetz).

Commentary has thus taken many forms. Each reflects (1) the hermeneutical imperative, which proceeds from the twofold observation that these texts must be interpreted if they are to function as Scripture, and that biblical texts are not self-interpreting; and (2) the interpretative needs and aims of the world within which the commentary was produced.

Today, the major critical commentaries (e.g., AB, Hermeneia, ICC, NIGTC, WBC) are characterized above all by concerns of a philological, grammatical, and historical nature; when engaging concerns of a theological sort, they tend to treat them historically—such as by reporting on Paul’s theological concerns with the Corinthian church. Commentary series that are more widely accessible (e.g., NICNT, NAC, SP, NCB, NIBC) may be more strategic and selective in the issues they discuss, but are similarly concerned primarily with establishing meaning “back there and then.” Commentators have been “good technicians of the text, but have avoided theology like the plague” (Fee, “Reflections,” 389). The commentaries self-consciously concerned with “application” (e.g., NIVAC; Fee, 1 Corinthians) tend to move at the level of “principles” derived from historical exegesis. They work under the presumption, articulated in the eighteenth century by Johann Philipp Gabler (see Sandys-Wunsch and Eldredge), that one might derive timeless and universal principles of the Bible from the foundations of linguistic and historical analysis. Lacking is a thoroughgoing commitment to the immediacy of the biblical witness, which derives from the theological affirmation that Christian believers who read these texts today and the people of God to whom those texts were first addressed comprise the one people of God, historically and globally. Scripture’s theological vision—with its theological claim on our willingness to regard these texts as our Scripture and to inhabit its story as our own—when it is present at all in modern commentary, has typically been relegated to the periphery.

Given the degree to which the modern commentary is the child of scientific exegesis, which aspires to articulate authoritatively the single, historical meaning of the biblical text, some will doubt whether the plasticity of the commentary genre is capable of an authentically theological interpretation of Scripture. If the history of the commentary we have briefly rehearsed is at all suggestive, however, our only concern is not whether but how theological commentary may be written today.

If, in the wake of the Reformation, commentary exists especially to mediate the text to its would-be interpreters (Bruner), who are eager but relatively unskilled, then the pressing question is, What separates the contemporary reader from comprehending the ancient text? Scientific exegesis has answered singularly with reference to the historical rift. Theological exegesis focuses elsewhere, on the degree to which we share the theological claims of the biblical text and in terms of our willingness to “stand under” the Scriptures. It refers to our practices of engaging with Scripture in the context of our commitment to live faithfully before the God to whom the Scriptures witness.

What shape might theological commentary take? First, it would operate on the basis of the theological claim of one people of God, one church. It would hold the hermeneutical motto that the community within which the biblical texts were generated, the community who came to regard these books as canonical, and the community now faced with the need to interpret these texts as Scripture are the same community.

Second, then, it would see the contemporary community served by the commentator as the community to whom the biblical text is addressed. Eco's concept of the Model Reader is helpful here: "To make his text communicative, the author has to assume that the ensemble of codes he relies upon is the same as that shared by his possible reader. The author has to foresee a model of the possible reader (hereafter Model Reader) supposedly able to deal interpretively with the expressions in the same way as the author deals generatively with them" (7). To engage the biblical text in this way is not to objectify its message in a historical moment now distant from our own, and then imaginatively to allow its message to leap forward to our own time. It is, rather, to embrace the persona of the text's audience as our own. We do not invite the text to a transformation of its original meaning into a new application geared toward our thought-forms; instead, the text invites us into a transformation of allegiances and commitments. Such transformation will manifest itself in behaviors appropriate to our social worlds. In the case of 1 Peter, for example, the model readers presumed (p 126) and sculpted by the text are those who hear their names in the letter's opening, "to the elect who are sojourners of the diaspora" (1:1 AT). Peter's model readers are those who embrace and embody the status of persons whose identity as pilgrims in the world grows out of their experience of the new birth. Their lives are radically marked by their membership in a community defined by their allegiance to Christ, and thus stand in an ambiguous relationship to the mores and values of the world around them. Accordingly, their forms of existence attract opposition from their neighbors. First Peter is addressed to just such people and is read best by those who share its theological assumptions and those who hear its opening as an invitation to embody its world.

This means that the primary agenda of theological commentary would not be the construction of systematic theology, in the now-dated sense of organizing and restating the central doctrines of the Christian faith. Questions would focus elsewhere—such as what sort of world, what sort of community, and what sort of person is this text constructing? Reading these texts as Scripture would thus call for dispositions of humility and expectation before the text, pressing for authentic wrestling with such questions as these: To what life-world is this text pointing? With what vision of reality does it confront us? Taking seriously the narrative shape of the biblical canon has the effect of calling upon its readers to choose sides: Will we embrace and serve the divine aim that presses this narrative forward and surfaces in these texts, or will we resist and oppose it? The result is that engaging with this narrative involves us in a formative and decision-making process. With which characters will we identify? Who are our heroes? How does the divine aim that guides this narrative beckon us? In short, the biblical narrative is present as an alternative framework within which to construe our lives, and so it challenges those who would be Christian by calling for a creative transformation of the stories by which we make sense of our lives and of the world. From this perspective, failure to “stand under” Peter’s message would not be the consequence of historical distance, but theological.

Third, theological commentary would locate itself self-consciously within the particularity of an ecclesial community. On the negative side, this means that theological commentary cannot hope to serve an encyclopedic role, documenting and passing on all that is known about a given text. Nor can it proceed as though its basic concern is with the sort of history that might satisfy the world of academe or the interests of the wider public. Nor can it act as though the measure of validity in interpretation can be taken apart from the great creeds of the church, a concern with the “rule of faith,” and the history of Christian interpretation and its embodiment in Christian lives and communities (Wirkungsgeschichte). What distinguished Karl Barth’s commentary on Romans, which deserves pride of place as theological commentary of the modern era, was Barth’s self-conscious stance as a theologian. Similarly, Brevard Childs’s justly celebrated work on Exodus reflects on this book theologically within the context of the Christian canon, in a deliberate attempt to actualize the text for the church that turns to it as Scripture. What distinguishes Anthony Thiselton’s more recent work on 1 Corinthians is not merely its judicious navigation of scholarly opinion on this Pauline letter. We also see his careful attention to how the letter has been read over the centuries and his ability to bring Paul’s text into engaging conversation with theological issues that plague us today. François Bovon undertakes his study of Luke “with the sober reserve of a scholar and with the confidence of a believer,” realizing that genuine understanding becomes possible “only if God leads me into his Word” (xiii). Writing in a commentary series that describes itself as “critical and historical,” where we would have anticipated assertions of scientific objectivity and scholarly neutrality, Bovon lays claim to his theological commitments and ecclesial location not as hindrances to, but as partners in, the interpretative enterprise.

Such contemporary scholars as Childs, Bovon, and Thiselton move in the direction of theological commentary by pressing the limits of the series to which they contribute. Other series are friendlier to the enterprise. The Two Horizons Commentary, now in process, promises theological exegesis in tandem with sustained attention to theological horizons. Some of these horizons are attention to key themes of the writing, elucidation of the book's contribution and relation to biblical theology, and deliberate exploration of the book's significance for constructive theology today (Green and Turner). The New Interpreter's Bible provides for each biblical book both commentary and reflection; in his contribution on the Acts of the Apostles, for example, Robert Wall insists that "reading Acts as Scripture seeks to insinuate its narrative world into the changing 'real' worlds of current readers" (28). With reference to the NIB, however, it must be admitted that some treatments are more helpful than others in their (p 127) theological hermeneutic. The Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture provides stunning access to the theological interpretation of Scripture characteristic of the first eight centuries of the church; here is a signpost toward insights and strategies aplenty for reading Scripture theologically today.

Fourth, to engage in theological commentary would not require that one proceed in an antihistorical or ahistorical fashion. That is, the choice between theology and history is a false one, and so is the choice between theological exegesis and historical inquiry. Barth, myopically criticized for despising historical criticism, had no apparent difficulty in writing for both: "If we rightly understand ourselves, our problems are the problems of Paul; and if we be enlightened by the brightness of his answers, those answers must be ours" (1). In commenting on Romans, Barth says, "I felt myself bound to the actual words of the text, and did not in any way propose to engage myself in free theologizing" (ix). The constraints of working with this historical text and the work of theological interpretation need not be mutually exclusive.

It could not be otherwise. After all, all language is embedded in culture, and whatever else they are, biblical texts are cultural products whose communicative aims are at the same time both constrained and mobilized by the contexts within which they were generated. Moreover, the capacity of the Bible to function as Scripture depends in part on its capacity to expose and thwart our own limited, historical horizons. Our interpretative horizons threaten the domestication of Scripture, so that its strenuous demands are denuded of their challenge. For a well-formulated theological hermeneutic, one needs to secure the status of the biblical text as “subject” in theological discourse, and not only as object. We turn to historical inquiry to help structure a conversation in which values and customs familiar in our communities are juxtaposed with those not simply represented but actually proposed in Scripture. The relativizing of taken-for-granted concepts such as kinship, wealth, and power has the effect of disorienting the reader and altering perception. In this sort of scriptural engagement, communities of interpretation are challenged and formed with respect to their practices; they find their theological horizons expanded, their moral imaginations assaulted and sculpted. Historical inquiry is thus a servant of theological commentary.

No particular method can insure theological interpretation, but any method must be tamed in the light of Scripture’s theological aims, and some methods are more relevant and theologically friendly than others. In addition to approaches that situate the voice of Scripture sociohistorically, of special interest in theological commentary would be models of analysis that take seriously the generally narrative content of Scripture. They would also respect the theological unity of Scripture, which takes its point of departure from the character and purpose of Yahweh and gives rise to its historical unity as the narrative of that purpose being worked out in the cosmos. And they would respect the final form and canonical location of the biblical texts.

Bibliography

Barth, K. The Epistle to the Romans. Oxford University Press, 1933; Bede, the Venerable. Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles. Cistercian Studies Series 117. Cistercian Pubns., 1989; Bovon, F. Luke 1. Hermeneia. Fortress, 2002; Boyarin, D. Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash. Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature. Indiana University Press, 1990; Breisach, E. Historiography. 2d ed. University of Chicago Press, 1994; Bruner, F. D. “The Why and How of Commentary.” ThTo 46 (1990): 399–404; Childs, B. The Book of Exodus. OTL. Westminster, 1974; idem. Isaiah. Westminster John Knox, 2000; Eco, U. The Role of the Reader. Advances in Semiotics. Indiana University Press, 1979; Fee, G. 1 Corinthians. NICNT. Eerdmans, 1987; idem. “Reflections on Commentary Writing.” ThTo 46 (1990): 387–92; Fishbane, M. “Inner-biblical Exegesis: Types and Strategies of Interpretation in Ancient Israel.” Pages 3–18 in The Garments of Torah. Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature. Indiana University Press, 1989; Green, J., and M. Turner, eds. Between Two Horizons. Eerdmans, 2000; Griffiths, R., ed. The Bible in the Renaissance. St. Andrews Studies in Reformation History. Ashgate, 2001; Hagner, D. “Writing a Commentary on Matthew: Self-Conscious Ruminations of an Evangelical.” Semeia 72 (1995): 51–72;

Howell, K. God's Two Books. University of Notre Dame Press, 2002; Labriola, A., and J. Smeltz. The Bible of the Poor. Duquesne University Press, 1990; Margerie, B. de. An Introduction to the History of Exegesis. 3 vols. Saint Bede's Pubns., 1991–95; McNally, R. The Bible in the Early Middle Ages. Scholars Press Reprints and Translations. Scholars Press, 1986; Perkins, P. "Commentaries: Windows to the Text." ThTo 46 (1990):
 393–98; Sandys-Wunsch, J., and L. Eldridge. "J. P. Gabler and the Distinction between Biblical and Dogmatic Theology: Translation, Commentary, and Discussion of His Originality." SJT 33 (1980): 133–58;
 Schorske, C. Thinking with History. Princeton University Press, 1998; Steinmetz, D., ed. The Bible in the Sixteenth Century. Duke Monographs in Medieval and Renaissance Studies 11. Duke University Press, 1990; Thiselton, A. The First Epistle to the Corinthians. NIGTC. Eerdmans, 2000; Wall, R. "The Acts of the Apostles." NIB. 10:1–368.

Joel B. Green

(p 128) Community, Interpretative

We observe a resurgent awareness of one's community of reference in personal identity formation and of one's participation in community and their importance for human existence in general. This has worked with the reemergence of "community" as a value in the postmodern context to occasion a renewed interest among Christians in the role and even the primacy of the faith community in the hermeneutical task. This development has sparked a lively debate about the role of the interpretative community in the theological interpretation of Scripture. Hence, some theorists elevate the communal goal of fostering virtue and human flourishing as providing the hermeneutical key to interpreting Scripture (Fowl). Others look to the role of the community in performing the "drama" set forth in the Bible (Wright). A third group highlights the community's task of bearing faithful witness to what God declares in Scripture (Wolterstorff).

Despite this difference of opinion regarding the precise role of the interpretative community, the communal focus is in keeping with emphases within the Bible itself, which coalesce in the image of the faith community as a people gathered around the text, listening intently for the voice of God. Both the OT and the NT place importance on the public reading of Scripture, on reading the sacred texts within the context of the gathered community. For example, the revival of religious practice that occurred among the Jews who had returned from the Babylonian exile came as a result of the people inviting Ezra to read and expound the Law to the assembled company (Neh. 7:73–8:18). This OT focus is carried over into the NT. Hence, Paul exhorts Timothy to "devote" himself "to the public reading of Scripture, to preaching and to teaching" (1 Tim. 4:13). In the era of the new covenant, the Scripture that is to be read publicly is not limited to the Law of Moses; it also includes the writings of the apostles and other early church leaders, some of whom authored circular letters intended for the hearing of several local congregations. In these gatherings, the believers were not merely silent recipients of the teaching of their leaders. Rather, when prophets spoke the people were to weigh carefully the messages being voiced (1 Cor. 14:29). Above all, however, the goal of that weighing was to discern the voice of the Spirit speaking to the community. The image of the gathered people listening for the Spirit's voice lies behind the exhortation that concludes each of the letters of the risen Lord to the seven churches: "Those who have ears, let them hear what the Spirit says to the churches" (Rev. 2:7 AT; etc.).

In keeping with the biblical image of the community gathered to listen to the Spirit's voice, the Westminster Confession declares that the final authority for the community of faith is "the Holy Spirit speaking in the Scripture" (art. 1.10). Although the context in which it is given suggests a communal orientation, this statement of the "Protestant principle of authority"—to cite Bernard Ramm's apt descriptor—does not explicitly stipulate who constitutes the intended recipients of the Spirit's speaking. Indeed, in the modern era the Spirit was thought to direct the divine message primarily toward individuals, who, in the opinion of specialists in the guild, were to approach the text with the techniques of biblical exegesis.

The recent questioning of the hegemony of historical-critical approaches has raised in the minds of some scholars the specter of subjectivism. What is to prohibit the individual interpreter from reading into the biblical text one's own preferences, thereby confusing the voice of the Spirit with the special pleading of the reader's own inner psyche? This concern suggests one understanding of the primacy of the interpretative community: it provides the basis for placing all private "hearings" of the Spirit within the wider hearing of the community, including the conclusions regarding the content of the Spirit's speaking that have characterized the faith community throughout its history.

Yet, as important as it may be, appealing to the community as a check on potential pitfalls of privately interpreting Scripture does not mark the central significance of the interpretative community in the hermeneutical task. To determine this dimension requires a consideration of the goal of the Spirit's speaking in Scripture. Although the address can take several forms, in keeping with the manifold diversity of writings that constitute the Bible (Goldingay), the overarching goal of the Spirit's speaking is to create a "world" or a "comprehensive universe" (McKnight 262). What the Spirit creates is nothing less than the eschatological world God intends for creation, a new creation centered in Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 5:17). Because above all this world entails a new community comprised of renewed persons, the world the Spirit creates through Scripture is a communal world, a community of the Word, a fellowship of persons who gather around Jesus Christ, who is the Word.

(p 129)If the goal of the Spirit is the creation of a community, then the Bible is primarily a communal book. It is truly a book of the community. The Bible is the source of the “paradigmatic events” (Coleman 109–10) of the Christian community. These events—at the center of which is the story of Jesus—shape or form the community’s way of conceiving the totality of reality, as well as the community’s understanding of its ongoing experience. Insofar as their appropriation of these events leads succeeding generations to understand themselves in relationship to the past history of the community and in anticipation of a future that will bring about the actualization of the community’s ideals, these events create a meaningful present (O’Dea 43). In this manner, the community gathered around the text becomes the contemporary embodiment of Jesus’ narrative, and as such it is “the body of Christ.”

The goal of the interpretative community in gathering around the text, therefore, is to embody the biblical narrative to such a degree that it becomes the foretaste of the eschatological new creation that the Spirit is fashioning. En route to this goal, the community reads the text enlivened by the question, “What is the Spirit saying to the churches?” This question is universal and ecumenical, and consequently it demands that the global church read together with the goal of discerning what it means to be the one church in the world today.

At the same time, this question is also highly local in intention. Ultimately, the text is read and the Spirit’s voice is heard within the context of local gathered communities. We come to Scripture aware that we are participants in a concrete, visible fellowship of disciples in covenant with each other. We desire to hear what the Spirit is saying to us as a particular congregation of believers who share the mandate of being a fellowship of disciples in this specific setting (Klaassen 10). Sensitivity to reading within community, in turn, extends to our individual interpretative efforts, as our private readings of Scripture are seasoned with the awareness that, even as the church scattered, each of us remains at all times a participant in a gathered community.

Viewed from this perspective, the interpretative community plays a central role in the hermeneutical task. As a gathered community we listen to the voice of the Spirit so as to determine what it means for us to be an embodiment of the one church of Jesus Christ within the specific locale in which God has placed us.

Bibliography

Coleman, R. Issues of Theological Conflict. Eerdmans, 1980; Fowl, S. Engaging Scripture. Blackwell, 1998; Goldingay, J. Models for Scripture. Eerdmans, 1994; Grenz, S., and J. Franke. Beyond Foundationalism. Westminster John Knox, 2002; Klaassen, W. "Anabaptist Hermeneutics: Presuppositions, Principles and Practice." Pages 5–10 in Essays on Biblical Interpretation, ed. W. Swartley. Institute of Mennonite Studies, 1984; McKnight, E. Postmodern Use of the Bible. Abingdon, 1988; O’Dea, T. The Sociology of Religion. Prentice-Hall, 1966; Ramm, B. The Pattern of Religious Authority. Eerdmans, 1959; Stackhouse, J., Jr., ed. Evangelical Futures. Baker, 2000; The Westminster Confession of Faith. In The Creeds of the Churches, ed. J. Leith. 3d ed. John Knox, 1982; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1991; Wright, N. T. "How Can the Bible Be Authoritative?" VE 21 (1991): 7–32.

Stanley J. Grenz

Composition Criticism    See Redaction Criticism

Concept

The nature and status of “concepts” is a general philosophical debate, entangled in the problem of “universals”—more fittingly pursued in other dictionaries. Concepts have been a problem for biblical interpretation too, however, especially in the use of linguistic evidence for the practice of “biblical theology” and then doctrinal construction.

In 1961 James Barr famously attacked “Kittel,” the Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, as not in fact a lexicon but a set of concept-studies in linguistic guise. An entire apparatus for biblical theology was perceived to collapse at the same time—sharp distinctions between Greek and Hebrew thought, with the former more abstract and conceptual than the latter, were shown to be simplistic, as were overly tight connections between words and ideas, and so on. Barr noted the tendency to use “concept” in several senses: (1) It can mean a general notion that might be represented by any of several words (“love”). (2) It can be a brief formulation of the main content of a passage (“the Johannine concept of God’s love”). (3) It can mean an idea that might not be tied to a specific linguistic expression (“the Johannine concept of God”). These senses might be either favorable or pejorative (Barr 210–11).

Confusion of technical terms with concepts is a related difficulty (Silva 107); however, etymology, semantics, and the like are handled elsewhere. Barr’s own linguistic theory now seems dated, (p 130)and his disjunction between the linguistic and the ideal/philosophical/theological quite sharp. But in any case, he started a revolution that has stood time's test (see, e.g., Cotterell and Turner 106–28). The idea—so dear to a phase of biblical theology and also to fundamentalism—that the Bible might be mined for simple, stable ideas tied to words is untenable in view of authorial diversity and linguistic philosophy.

Most technicalities aside, two points are worth addressing briefly. First, linguistic “commensurability” is at stake in a postmodern context: can verbal meaning cross cultural boundaries, or not? Kevin Vanhoozer has addressed the tension between “canon” and “concept”—between “sameness” and “otherness”—by arguing for the possibility of “conceptual mimesis” involving a degree of “creative imagination.” His specific query was the diversity of biblical genres, which invites conceptual redescription while also forestalling any absolute sameness within that. David Yeago provides a helpful example by countering arguments for multiple, widely varying, NT Christologies: similar theological judgments can take different conceptual forms. Words lying behind the concept “incarnation” in John 1 need not appear in Phil. 2 for some kind of conceptual overlap to obtain. Accordingly, a relatively adequate narrative of rough conceptual identity is ingredient to biblical and postbiblical traditioning processes (Treier).

Second, then, with regard to language in practice: while concepts require a degree of framework-independence to achieve relative stability across cultural distance, this does not force us into an antiquated understanding of language. Linguist Kathleen Callow suggests that for explaining translation we need “a mental correlate of words which is not language specific” (Callow 20). She tackles the difficulty of defining concepts and concludes that they should be understood as “habitual events” (mental, in the first instance) acquired “by participation” in activities (which have a social dimension; 53, 55). Concepts have “firm cores” of meaning with vast amounts of detail, some of which we draw upon in any particular thinking event, in any action of referring (57, 64). So “concepts are not what we think about; they are what we think with” (65).

Concepts are learned as social skills; to what extent their patterns of organizing knowledge about the world are universal—even “essential” as the basic categories of reality—is a debate that biblical interpretation is unlikely to solve. Still, the consequences are severe if we remain ignorant of the debate—not only regarding proper conceptual stability and diversity amid the church's theological interpretation, but also regarding what outsiders can or cannot discern about the meaning of Christian teaching.

See also Biblical Theology; Etymology; Systematic Theology

Bibliography

Barr, J. The Semantics of Biblical Language. Oxford University Press, 1961; Callow, K. Man and Message. UPA/Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1998; Cotterell, P., and M. Turner. Linguistics and Biblical Interpretation. InterVarsity, 1989; Silva, M. Biblical Words and Their Meaning. Zondervan, 1994; Treier, D. "Canonical Unity and Commensurable Language." Pages 211–28 in Evangelicals and Scripture, ed. D. Okholm et al. InterVarsity, 2004; Vanhoozer, K. "From Canon to Concept: 'Same' and 'Other' in the Relation between Biblical and Systematic Theology." Scottish Bulletin of Evangelical Theology 12, no. 2 (Autumn 1994): 96–124; Yeago, D. "The New Testament and the Nicene Dogma." Pages 87–100 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997.

Daniel J. Treier

Context

Referring generally to the social and linguistic webs within which speech is set and derives its significance, "context" has proven to be a prodigiously elastic term in the hands of biblical interpreters. The term is often used of (1) the sociohistorical setting within which a text was generated, within which the events to which a text provides witness took place, or within which the traditions that came finally to expression in a text were shaped and handed down. Context can mean (2) the portions of something written that precede and follow a word or passage in a text. It can also refer to (3) the situation of the reader, understood in sociohistorical as well as theological terms, which helps to shape how the reader accesses and construes the significance of a text. For persons interested in the theological interpretation of Scripture, none of these species of context is unimportant.

1. Context as Sociohistorical Setting

Various forms of historical criticism of biblical texts have deployed the concept of context. In the early 1900s, the form critics sought to classify the individual units of teaching or narrative within a book according to their form (e.g., legend or miracle story), then assign each form to a Sitz im Leben (situation in life) within the practices of the (p 131) community. In an attempt to reconstruct the preliterary history of biblical literature, form critics inquired into how particular forms of literature functioned in the life of their communities, and answered with reference to such needs as worship, proclamation, instruction, apologetic, settling disputes, and so on (e.g., Gunkel). Similarly, in its concern with the disciplined art of persuasion, rhetorical criticism seeks as a necessary step the identification of a rhetorical situation—that is, that complex of persons, events, and relations generating pressure for a verbal response (e.g., Kennedy). Historical criticism draws attention to the worlds (chronology, geography, politics, institutions, customs, etc.) within which the biblical texts were written, as well as the aims of the authors of those texts, as the primary determinants of textual meaning. Social-scientific analysis has both refined and thickened historical inquiry by seeking to account for the social and cultural conditioning of the writers and their first readers and, then, how and why those texts were designed to function in their sociocultural matrix (e.g., Eilberg-Schwartz). Opening the notion of “context” further, discourse analysis concerns itself with the temporal moment of a communicative act. First, this involves the world within which the text first participated at the time of its generation. It thus is focused on such presuppositions as sociocultural scripts assumed, challenged, and/or broadcast by the author, or provided by the author in order to broaden further the presupposition pools of his audience. Second, it examines the new discourse situation within which its readers access the text (see below, §3). In its own way, each of these approaches to interpretation takes seriously the purposeful nature of biblical texts, which were conceived in order to accomplish certain ends. Attention to context, then, urges interpreters carefully to consider the particularity of those texts, whose meaning is tied in some significant sense to the situations motivating their generation.

The relation of authors and their texts to their contexts is rarely straightforward, and this has profound implications for theological interpretation of biblical texts. Robert Wuthnow helpfully notes how cultural products, like texts, often relate in an enigmatic fashion to their social environments: “They draw resources, insights, and inspiration from the environment: they reflect it, speak to it, and make themselves relevant to it. And yet they also remain autonomous enough from their social environment to acquire a broader, even universal and timeless appeal” (Wuthnow 3). Similarly, Stephen Greenblatt draws attention to the concepts of “constraint” and “mobility,” which set the parameters within which textual improvisation is possible. “Constraints” refers to the boundaries set around one’s behavior within a given society, to the limits set around acceptable and unacceptable actions. “Mobility” refers to the elasticity or “scope for variation” within those parameters. Between these two poles, works of art, like texts, have an educational or formative purpose. “They do not merely passively reflect the prevailing ratio of mobility and constraint; they help to shape, articulate, and reproduce it through their own improvisatory intelligence” (Greenblatt 229). This means, on the one hand, that textual meaning cannot simply be identified with or reduced to the historical situation of their origins since, from this perspective, cultural products such as texts have the capacity to speak to and also beyond the situations within which they were formed. Even products of cultures distinct from our own may speak to us in our own encultured situations, by means of the juxtaposition of those cultural structures, alien and familiar, that lend certainty to everyday life, with the result that we find ourselves disoriented, our perceptions altered, our imaginations transformed. These texts have the capacity to bring our own conventional wisdom into question, to assail our own pet convictions, to renew our deepest commitments, and to shape our imaginations toward the divine purpose and project to which these texts give witness.

The capacity of texts to improvise in relation to their social environments means, on the other hand, that through attention to context we may follow in the theological footsteps of the writers of biblical texts, tracing how they themselves have engaged in cultural analysis and critique. When read against the horizons of their own, particular sociohistorical environment, what do these texts affirm, deny, reject, undermine, or embrace? How does this text participate in theological and ethical reflection? On what authorities does it build its theological engagement? That is, texts such as Job or Mark do not simply present the world “as it really is” but purposely shape the story in such a way that some aspects of their worlds are undermined and others legitimated. Hence, what vision do they present of the world “as it should be” or as we are to imagine it to be? How does the text speak back to, against, and within its world?

In such ways, attention to “context as sociohistorical setting” has the potential to return to the text its role as subject, and not only object, (p 132) in theological discourse. We are better enabled to hear the voice of the biblical text itself, rather than that of the church or other authorized interpreter who, like a ventriloquist, has become skilled in controlling the text so that it speaks only as it is allowed.

2. Context as Cotext

“Cotext” refers to the location of an utterance within a string of linguistic data, the sentences, paragraphs, and chapters surrounding and related to a text and within which an utterance finds its meaning. The importance of cotext is signaled by the ambiguity of language. Specific words are often capable of multiple meanings, giving rise to potential uncertainties whether one is reading or hearing words read. Likewise, chunks of texts, whether phrases or sentences or even paragraphs, can be interpreted in diverse ways. Sentences other than the first to appear in a text have their interpretation constrained by the preceding text, as words, sentences, and entire units of discourse are shaped in their significance by the larger cotexts within which they appear. Previous meaning systems can be renewed, nuanced, and even destroyed in new, or even in expanded, cotexts. Accordingly, attending to the cotextual location of a text is an exercise in the control of meaning.

For theological interpretation, exegetical attention to cotext provides an indispensable corrective to the focus on word studies that has plagued biblical studies. Numerous reference works (e.g., especially earlier contributions to TDNT, and an older generation of word studies associated with such names as Vincent or Vine) erroneously tied a great deal of theological freight to the appearance of particular terms, quite apart from how those terms were actually used. In a notorious example, Ethelbert Stauffer wrote that, for John, agapē (and its cognates) refers to Christian, self-giving love, thus neglecting the fact that we find in the Johannine corpus usages of the term that provide significant evidence to the contrary (e.g., John 3:19; 12:43; 1 John 2:15).

Theological interpretation underscores the importance of cotext, too, when a specifically Christian reading of the Bible is undertaken, since this requires that a text be read in relation to the whole of the canon (within its canonical cotext).

3. Context as Readerly Situation

In the decades leading up to the twenty-first century, the location of the reader as a potent factor in biblical interpretation came increasingly to be recognized. Under the influence of Descartes (1596–1650), who pictured the perception of knowledge in terms of a mind grasping a subject, the interpretative process posited an objective reader in search of the meaning already inherent in the text. In biblical theology, this perspective was expressed in the famous distinction between what a text meant (in its historical context) and what it means (today), with a premium placed on extracting from the biblical materials timeless, universal truths (i.e., “truths” independent of context). Today, however, it is widely acknowledged that we are incapable of grasping the text as it is in and of itself, that texts are construed always in relationship to those engaged in the process of reading.

Although the context of the reader is capable of being parsed in numerous ways relevant to biblical interpretation, of special importance for theological interpretation is the theological location of the reader. According to more moderate forms of reception theory (e.g., Iser; Eco), texts like those in Scripture are characterized by the invitation for readers “to make the work” together with the author.

Texts are characterized by gaps that must be filled by readers, and different readers will actualize the text's clues in different ways. Accordingly, texts are capable of a range (though not an infinite number) of possible, valid meanings, depending on who is doing the reading, from what perspectives they read, and what reading protocols they practice.

To some significant degree, what it means to engage, for example, in a Wesleyan reading of Scripture is that those doing the reading have been nurtured in the Wesleyan tradition of according privilege to some theological categories over others—the pursuit of holiness, for example, and the primacy of grace. This does not mean that the readings of Wesleyans (or Anabaptists or Calvinists) are complete, or that they constitute the only possible ways of construing texts, but it does indicate how, from diverse communities of reading, we may hear the same pattern of words in new keys. Neither does it sanction every reading as equally valid, but it does indicate in one significant way how diverse readings of the same text might lay claim to legitimacy. And it underscores the importance for the hermeneutical equation of the theological formation of those engaged in the practice of interpretation.

See also Archaeology; Canonical Approach; Geography; Intertextuality; Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics; Reader-Response Criticism; Utterance Meaning

(p 133)Bibliography*

Eco, U. Interpretation and Overinterpretation. Cambridge University Press, 1992; Eilberg-Schwartz, H. The Savage in Judaism. Indiana University Press, 1990; Greenblatt, S. "Culture." Pages 225–32 in Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. F. Lentricchia and T. McLaughlin. University of Chicago Press, 1990; Gunkel, H. The Folktale in the Old Testament. Historic Texts and Interpreters in Biblical Scholarship 5. Sheffield Academic Press, 1987; Iser, W. The Implied Reader. Johns Hopkins University Press, 1974; Kennedy, G. New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism. University of North Carolina Press, 1984; TDNT; Wuthnow, R. Communities of Discourse. Harvard University Press, 1989.

Joel B. Green

Continental Philosophy See Philosophy

Continuity (between the Testaments) See Relationship between the Testaments

1 Corinthians, Book of

In the effective history of 1 Corinthians, the letter has been primarily mined for its contribution to debates about virginity (7:1–40), the mode of Christ's presence in the Lord's Supper (11:23–26), and the nature of the resurrection (15:1–58). Because Paul seems intent only on settling the practical problems that have arisen in the church, many in recent times think the letter lacks developed doctrine and contains only applied theology. Paul is assumed to be counteracting the Corinthians' spurious beliefs that have caused confusion about the importance of individual leaders, the nature of human sexuality, the nature of spiritual gifts, and the nature of resurrection—all of which have led to their behavioral excesses.

In the last century, these beliefs have been identified as antinomian Gnosticism. The letter became a favorite of later Gnostics in the tradition of Valentinus, who fastened onto Paul's statements about a spiritual body to buttress their view denying the resurrection of flesh and blood, but most are now skeptical of identifying the Corinthian opponents as Gnostics. Others attribute the problems to a Hellenistic Jewish religiosity, akin to Philo's, that focused on sophia and gnōsis. More recently, some claim that the problems are rooted in an "overrealized eschatology." The Corinthians presumably took literally Paul's statement "Behold, now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2 KJV) and developed an overheated, spiritualistic illusion that they were already living in the kingdom come, as if the day of the Lord had come (1 Cor. 4:8; 2 Thess. 2:2). A theology of glory also caused them to downplay the cross.

Other recent studies find the problems in Corinth stemming more from the influence of their cultural setting than from specious theological beliefs. Paul's purpose is not to correct their theology but to get them to think theologically so that they would respond properly to their polytheistic, pluralistic culture. The cross and resurrection form the theological cornerstone of Paul's response. Karl Barth argues: "The discourse of the whole epistle proceeds from a single point and harks back to this point," the resurrection of the dead (113).

Shortly before his assassination, Julius Caesar reestablished Corinth as a Roman colony in 44 BCE. The Romans established colonies to foster the majesty of their culture, religion, and values. When Paul came to Corinth a century later to proclaim Christ's greater majesty, he found a city teeming with commerce as the vital link between Rome and its eastern provinces. This letter should be read against the background of a mercantile society imbued with Roman cultural values that fed a ruthless preoccupation with attaining public status, promoting one's own honor, and securing power. The scramble for scarce honor was as intense as the scramble for scarce wealth. Values of the dominant culture so antithetical to the message of the cross percolated into the church, destroying its fellowship and its Christian witness as some members vainly sought to balance secular mores with Christian norms. These secular values played havoc with Paul's attempt to build a community based on love, selflessness, and the equal worth of every member. Paul corrects their misconduct with carefully wrought ethical exhortations grounded in a correct theology.

Traditionally, the problems that Paul addresses in 1 Corinthians have been attributed to imagined theological disputes swirling around Peter, Apollos, Paul, and the elusive Christ party (1:12). These theological rivalries combined with the Corinthians' attraction to flashy displays of knowledge, wisdom, and spiritual gifts, and a gnostic worldview—all were assumed to be ripping apart the fellowship. A recent trend traces the problems in Corinth back to personality-centered politics and the members' social placement. The discordant factions within the community did not divide over fine points of theological interpretation but grew out of the rivalry of leading figures, who may have hosted different house churches.

The influence of secular ethics and the Corinthians' failure to grasp the full implications (p 134) of the wisdom of the cross led to their competitive party spirit (1:10–4:21), their suing one another in pagan courts (6:1–11), their dangerous brushes with sexual immorality (5:1–13; 6:12–20), their dallying with idols (8:1–11:1), their humiliation of the have-nots at the Lord's Supper (11:17–34), and their vaunting of particular spiritual gifts (12:1–14:40). A Greek worldview caused them to believe in life after death without a resurrection of the dead (15:1–58). They failed to comprehend how an earthly body that is physical and perishable could be made suitable for a heavenly realm that is spiritual and imperishable.

Paul's letter has its genesis in his dismayed response to oral reports about what is going on in Corinth (1:11; 5:1; 11:18; cf. 16:17–18) and his answers to Corinthian queries in their letter to him (see 7:1). The problems emerge from the complexities of everyday life—a man living with his father's wife (5:1–13), lawsuits against fellow Christians (6:1–11), prostitution (6:12–20), celibacy and marriage (7:1–40), food sacrificed to idols (8:1–11:1), head dress in public worship (11:2–16), divisions at the Lord's Supper (11:17–34), the use of tongues in worship (12:1–14:40). Paul alternates between his reactions to oral reports and his answers to the Corinthian letter:

- Oral reports (1:10–4:17 / 4:18–6:20)
- Corinthian letter (7:1–40 / 8:1–11:1)
- Oral reports (11:2–34)
- Corinthian letter (12:1–14:40)

Oral reports (15:1–58)

Corinthian letter (16:1–12)

In each case, Paul draws out the theological implications of their behavior and the necessity of the norm of love and the wisdom of the cross for guiding all that they do, rather than issuing authoritarian directives. The theological core of this letter is his reiteration of the heart of his preaching—the feeble and stupid message of the crucified Christ, which nevertheless proves to have a power and wisdom no human eloquence possesses, since it is the power and wisdom of God himself.

Internal Dissension and the Wisdom of the Cross (1:10–4:21)

Paul first addresses the problem of the internal rivalries among the bigwigs in the church, who were scrambling for position in the community and dividing up Christ into lifeless fragments (1:10–4:17). The breakdown of community is caused by the infusion of “the spirit of the world” (2:12, synonymous with “the wisdom of the world” [1:20; 3:19] and “the wisdom of this age” [2:6]) into their attitudes, judgments, and behavior. Secular wisdom’s baneful influence on church members, rather than some overarching theological misconception, lies behind most of the problems that Paul addresses.

To bring an end to the Corinthians’ political infighting and to uproot the worldly wisdom driving their behavior, Paul seeks to stimulate theological thoughtfulness that results in a cross-centered community adopting his own cruciform lifestyle (4:16). The death and resurrection of Jesus are the foundational events that determine Paul’s vision of the Christian community, but Greco-Roman symbols and mythology competed with the cross to provide a framework for interpreting life. The Corinthians’ quarreling reveals that they have uncritically absorbed the ideals and values of the pagan world around them. Paul seeks to replace a pagan paradigm, fascinated by displays of status and power, with God’s paradigm, exhibited in the weakness of the cross. He does not sweep the crucifixion under the carpet as an unfortunate episode remedied by the glories of the resurrection but trusts the power of the cross to convict the audience of its truth. For those who claim honor on the basis of worldly wisdom, he offers the foolish wisdom of the cross that overturns human wisdom. For those who crave impressive displays of eloquence, he proclaims Christ’s crucifixion in weakness, fear, and trembling, accompanied only by demonstrations of the Spirit’s power.

The cross embodies the power of God to absorb all the blind rage of humanity and to avert its deadly consequences, but humanity, both

Jew and Greek, fails to recognize that truth because it does not fit their categories and ways of thinking. Human wisdom is circumscribed by its partial knowledge, susceptible to self-deceit, and blinded by its own conceit and pride. Paul cites five passages from Scripture in 1:18–3:23 (1:19; 2:9, 16; 3:19, 20) to make the point that humans cannot grasp God’s wisdom through their own effort. God has manifested his power and wisdom in sending his Son, allowing him to be crucified, proclaiming a seemingly weak and foolish message through apostles regarded by the world as weak and foolish, calling into being a church made up of those whom the world regards as nobodies, and uniting them to the crucified Christ, who becomes their righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. This wisdom can only be appropriated through the Spirit, whose most central work is not to be found in the visible things such as (p 135) healings, glossolalia, and eloquent preaching but in leading believers to the crucified Christ (2:2) and calling believers into community. The Spirit, not an orator’s eloquence, reveals the message’s truth to the believer (2:4, 13).

For Paul, the message of the cross is the antidote to the human self-glorification poisoning the fellowship. Victory is won by giving up life, not taking it. Selfish domination of others is discredited. Shame is removed through divine identification with the shamed in Christ’s shameful death. Paul further undermines the self-aggrandizement of the leading figures in the church by casting himself and Apollos as servants (3:4) and field hands (3:6–9), and he identifies apostles as figures of shame who are indistinguishable from the dregs of society (4:10–13). The image of building contractors (3:10–17) reminds them of their accountability in the final judgment. He expects submission to the cross to quash egoism and to lead all Christians to serve one another, and Christian leaders, in particular, to serve the community from below.

Ethics and Christ’s Lordship of the Body (5:1–6:20)

The three issues that occupy Paul in 5:1–6:20 (incest, lawsuits, and visiting prostitutes) complement the previous discussion in chapters 1–4. In these opening chapters he insinuates that the church is riven by unnecessary strife, fed by unjustified spiritual pride. These cases expose their carnality (3:1) and serve to puncture the Corinthians’ inflated arrogance. The immorality of church members has not only undermined any grounds for the church’s boasting; it has wrecked the church’s witness of God’s transforming power to change lives. Christianity offers not only a completely new sexual ethos and a new ethos regarding material possessions; it also brings about a complete transformation of individuals through their washing, sanctification, and justification (6:11). God's grace does not simply whitewash sin. It is intended to transform sinners.

Paul's ethical exhortation is grounded in his view of the final judgment of all humanity and the resurrection of Christians. Each passage contains an eschatological affirmation: a hope that the incestuous man's spirit might be saved on the day of the Lord (5:5); an assertion that the saints will judge the world and the angels (6:2); and a reminder that the body will be raised (6:14). Paul seeks to shake them out of their blasé attitude toward sinful conduct and drive home the seriousness of their sin and their need for repentance. He argues that Christians should live in ways congruent with who they are—as those who belong to Christ and are destined to live with Christ (5:7–8; 6:11, 19–20). Christ's lordship lays claim on the Christian's body, which is destined for resurrection, so that those who belong to Christ are not free to do with their bodies whatever they please. Hiring a prostitute for sex essentially denies Christ's ultimate sovereignty by filching what belongs to Christ and handing it over to one who belongs to Satan.

Celibacy, Divorce, and Marriage and God's Calling (7:1–40)

In discussing questions about celibacy, divorce, and marriage in 7:1–40, Paul does not foist his own preference for celibacy on others but leaves room for believers to make their own decisions under Christ (see 7:6–7, 10, 12, 25, 28, 32, 35, 40). Some in Corinth must have regarded celibacy as a higher good, as evidenced by his opening quotation from their letter to Paul (7:1). While he believes celibacy is good, he knows that it is not good for everyone and certainly does not lift one to a higher spiritual plateau. His advice is grounded in his theological conviction that no condition presents an obstacle to living the Christian life, since a Christian is now defined by God's call (1:9) and nothing else. He develops this principle in 7:17–24, which seems from a casual reading to interrupt the discussion. These digressions (see also 9:1–10:22; 13:1–13) provide the theological underpinning guiding his counsel on the practical matters. Here Paul reminds them that the offer of salvation comes to believers without requiring them to alter their ethnic, social, or domestic status. What matters is keeping the commandments of God (7:19), in particular, avoiding fornication (7:2–5). Christians can keep the commandments of God whether circumcised or uncircumcised, slave or free, married or celibate. Any attempt to alter one's status in life for religious reasons gives more importance to that worldly status than it merits and controverts God's calling in Christ based on grace alone.

Again, Paul's advice is suffused with his eschatological

perspective. The death and resurrection of Christ and the giving of the Spirit mean that the new age has invaded the present. Christians must evaluate their choices in life from the perspective of the end that has come so near (7:29–31). An end-time awareness should sharpen the focus of their decisions in the mundane matters of this world. Since the end is plainly in sight, Christians should see and judge more clearly what is and is (p 136)not important and not allow the world's values and opinions (7:22–23) to cast them in the forge of its deadly furnace.

Idol Food and Christological Monotheism (8:1–11:1)

Paul's lengthy discussion of idol food (8:1–11:1) is grounded in his christological monotheism, which defines the people of God over against those who worship many so-called gods and lords in their sundry guises. As a cosmopolitan city, Corinth was a religious melting pot, with older and newer religions flourishing side-by-side. Most persons could accommodate all gods and goddesses into their religious behavior, and they could choose from a great cafeteria line of religious practices. The Christian confession of one God and one Lord, however, requires exclusive loyalty to God as Father and to Christ as Lord (8:6). Paul rejects Christians participating in any function that overtly smacks of idolatry because it poses a danger to the Christian with a weak conscience, who might be sucked back into idolatry's clutches (8:7–13). It also compromises the Christian witness to one God, confirms the idolater in his idolatry, and will bring the Christian under God's wrath (10:1–13). The Supper of the one Lord, which unites participants to him, excludes eating idol offerings, which unite participants to idols and their demons (10:14–22). Even a perfunctory or make-believe show of fealty to an idol compromises the loyalty owed only to God and Christ. Christianity breaks down the barriers that classify people by their ethnic identity, social standing, or sexual gender; it also erects barriers that create a distinctive Christian identity (cf. 10:32). Paul teaches that one's presumed rights should be readily forfeited in the interest of saving others. At stake is whether the church will keep religious syncretism at bay so that it can remain holy to God, and whether the believer's allegiance to Christ will override all other attractions and attachments.

Decorum in Public Worship and God's Creation (11:2–16)

Paul's advice on another mundane matter, wearing headdresses in public worship, is grounded in his view of creation and how being "in the Lord" alters how life is to be perceived (11:11). God's saving work through Christ transcends society's gender hierarchy. Paul takes for granted that women may pray and prophesy in the assembly as long as they have an appropriate head covering. But Christians must avoid flouting what is culturally shameful (11:6; cf. 14:35). Wearing a head covering (11:13) is a sign of personal rectitude for a woman, and its absence implies the opposite. Christians should observe the proprieties of polite society in their public gatherings to avoid bringing unnecessary dishonor to themselves and, concomitantly, to their Lord.

The Lord's Supper and Christ's Sacrifice (11:17–34)

In 11:17–34, Paul seeks to correct the Corinthian desecration of the Lord's Supper. The Lord's Supper should intensify group solidarity, but the Corinthians' supper has become a flash point highlighting their social inequality and alienation. No one ought to feel humiliated at the Lord's Supper, yet the Corinthians' manner of conducting the meal has left the have-nots feeling that they are beneath the notice of their fellow Christians (11:22). Paul appeals to the Last Supper tradition to correct their practice. The Corinthians act selfishly; Jesus acted unselfishly in giving his life for others. The Corinthians' actions will lead to their condemnation (11:29, 32); Jesus' action leads to the salvation of others. The combination of broken bread and cup conveys the nature of Jesus' ultimate sacrifice. Christ gave his body and sacrificed his blood in an expiatory death, which brings the offer of salvation to all persons, and each believer receives an equal share of the benefits of his sacrifice. That reality should be symbolized by what happens during the Lord's Supper. The Corinthians' observance of the Lord's Supper, in which one has more than enough and gets drunk, while another has too little and goes hungry, epitomizes the culture of selfishness and fails to proclaim the meaning of the Lord's death for all. Instead, they are to imitate Christ's example of self-giving, and everything they do in their meal should accord with his self-sacrifice for others. Consequently, Paul urges them to share what they have with each other (11:33).

Spiritual Gifts, Spiritual Persons, and Public Worship (12:1–14:40)

The lengthy discussion of spiritual gifts in 12:1–14:40 reveals that the Corinthians have limited the “spiritual gifts” to a handful of spectacular gifts and placed tongues above prophecy as a clear sign of supernatural power working in a spiritual person. In correcting their unwarranted spiritual pride and disorderly worship, Paul obliquely critiques their infatuation with speaking in tongues. He begins by asserting that all Christians are imbued with the Holy Spirit and (p 137) are therefore spiritual by virtue of their confession “Jesus is Lord” (12:3), and he broadens the spectrum of grace gifts that manifest the Spirit (12:4–26). As throughout the letter, Paul develops the issue’s theological implications, which they have overlooked. He makes clear that there are diversities of gifts, services, and activities, but only one Spirit who distributes them as he wills. Each gift is given to different persons for the common good. Consequently, each person is needed in the community. Inspired speech is only one among many ways the Spirit works in the body of Christ. No one should feel superior because he or she possesses a particular spiritual endowment. The Spirit decides who gets what gift and apportions them according to the need in the community, not according to the value of the recipient. All are gifted by God in some way and encouraged to contribute their gifts in ways that will build up the community. Spiritual gifts are not indicators of one’s spiritual status.

The segmentation of the Corinthian congregation into cliques is the by-product of human depravity that spurs individuals to treat their differing spiritual experiences as a pretext for reinstating class divisions—now employing spiritual classifications—so as to elevate themselves over others. The seemingly unrelated digression in 13:1–13 praising love actually lays out the principle by which gifts should be exercised in the church. If any extol their own particular gift(s) as the highest and best, Paul demonstrates how devoid of value these gifts are without love. The question is not which gift is the most beneficial, stimulating, or spiritual. It is, instead, whether love is radiated in exercising their gifts. Though God and Christ are not mentioned, the cross of Christ as the manifestation of God’s love for the world defines Paul’s understanding. The principle of love embodied in the cross mandates that one should always seek honor for others, which stands in an absolute antithesis to the dominant value, which seeks honor only for oneself out of preening self-indulgence. Since almost every problem in the church is mentioned in 13:4–7, Paul implies that the source of their problems is their lack of love.

Paul holds up what contributes most to “building up” the church (14:3–5, 12, 17, 26) as the touchstone for ranking the relative value of gifts, particularly for public worship. The speech gifts that are intelligible to all, including outsiders, are the most fruitful and should be the most valued. Finally, he gives specific advice and commands on tongues and prophecy in worship (14:26–40), based on the theological conviction that the Spirit of ardor is also the Spirit of order.

The Resurrection of the Dead and God's Creative Power (15:1–58)

The climax of the letter is Paul's lengthy discussion of the resurrection in chapter 15. The Corinthians did not assume that the resurrection had already occurred (2 Tim. 2:18) but believed in an afterlife without the resurrection of the dead. Their error is not rooted in some deliberate doctrinal rebellion but in honest confusion, given their Greek worldview. They failed to comprehend how an earthly body that is physical and perishable can be made suitable for a heavenly realm that is spiritual and imperishable. Earthly bodies and heavenly existence are therefore deemed to be as different as chalk from cheese. The Corinthians assumed that at death the mortal body is shed like a snake's skin, and the immortal soul continues in a purely spiritual existence. Paul's argument for the bodily resurrection divides into two distinct sections. The first section, 15:1–34, makes the case for the reality of the resurrection. The second section, 15:35–58, explains how the resurrection is possible.

In the first unit recording the resurrection appearances of Christ (15:1–11), Paul is not trying to prove the resurrection of Jesus but arguing from it. Some of the Corinthians are saying that there is no resurrection of the dead (15:12), yet they accepted the unified apostolic proclamation that Christ has been raised. Their denial of the resurrection of the dead is theologically untenable (15:12–19). If there is no resurrection of the dead, Christ has not been raised. If Christ is not raised from the dead, then everything based on that belief collapses in a heap of broken dreams. Paul affirms that as Christ was resurrected from the dead, so also those who are in Christ and pattern their lives after him can hope to be resurrected by God. Jesus is the representative of others who also will be raised so that the end-time resurrection becomes the ineluctable sequel to Jesus' resurrection (15:20–28). This unit reveals why Paul so adamantly defends the resurrection of the dead. If there is none, then death will remain unconquered and still hold sway beyond the End as a power set over against God. This circumstance is theologically incongruous. Since God is all-powerful, death must in the end be vanquished.

Because the Corinthians could not comprehend how resurrection was possible, they assumed it was impossible. In 15:35–58, Paul does (p 138) not explain how the resurrection happens but only makes the case that it can happen. He grants their assumption that a polarity exists between earth and heaven, and that earthly embodied existence is completely incompatible with heavenly spiritual existence. He makes clear that resurrection is not the resuscitation of the corpse. A body fit to inhabit this world must be changed before it is fit to inhabit the heavenly world. Nature illustrates that there are different kinds of bodies and that dramatic transformation can occur. As the bare seed that is sown is not the plant that miraculously sprouts from the ground, so the earthly body that is sown is not the spiritual body that is raised. As God chooses to give the seed a different body (15:37), so God will give humans, sown with a body animated by soul, a body animated by the Spirit in the resurrection (15:42–44a). As humans were dressed at birth in the clothing of the “man of dust,” so Christians will put on the clothing of the “heavenly man” in the resurrection (15:47–49). What is mortal will be changed by the power of God so that those who are raised will be given a spiritual body that is consistent with its new celestial habitat. Divine agency must be accounted for in life and in death. Death is impotent before the power and mercy of God, who wills to forgive sins (15:3, 17) and to raise the dead.

Paul is concerned about the correlation of theology and morality throughout the letter. Bad theology can lead to bad behavior and vice versa. Belief in the resurrection impinges directly on how one is to live (6:12–14; 15:32–34, 58).

Bibliography

Asher, J. Polarity and Change in 1 Corinthians 15. HUT 42. Mohr, 2000; Barclay, J. “Thessalonica and Corinth: Social Contrasts in Pauline Christianity.” JSNT 47 (1992): 49–74; Barth, K. The Resurrection of the Dead. Hodder & Stoughton, 1933; Carson, D. A. Showing the Spirit. Baker, 1987; Fee, G. The First Epistle to the Corinthians. NICNT. Eerdmans, 1987; Furnish, V. P. The Theology of the First Letter to the Corinthians. NTT. Cambridge University Press, 1999; Garland, D. 1 Corinthians. BECNT. Baker, 2003; Litfin, D. St. Paul’s Theology of Proclamation. SNTSMS 83. Cambridge University Press, 1994; Mitchell, M. Paul and the Rhetoric of Reconciliation. Westminster John Knox, 1992; Rosner, B. Paul, Scripture, and Ethics. Biblical Studies Library. Baker, 1999; Thiselton, A. The First Epistle to the Corinthians. NIGTC. Eerdmans, 2000; Winter, B. After Paul Left Corinth. Eerdmans, 2001; Wright, N. T. “Monotheism, Christology, and Ethics: 1 Corinthians 8.” In The Climax of the Covenant. Fortress, 1992.

David E. Garland

2 Corinthians, Book of

Second Corinthians is complex on several levels. Subtleties in language render it the student’s nightmare and the exegete’s playground. Because of debates regarding its integrity, it provides a convenient entrée into the ongoing conversation of Pauline scholars. Here, too, Paul deftly joins matters particular to the Corinthian church with larger theological questions. In all this we see the apostle at his most impassioned and his most astute, as he plays pastor, theologian, and even “fool.” Throughout he uses a variety of literary and rhetorical strategies, grounding his concerns in the foundational principles of the faith.

History of Interpretation

Today’s commentaries normally commence with the onset of the historical-critical method and the controversies sparked by the epistle in the last few centuries. Prior to this time, however, the letter served the church to a degree disproportionate to its size. It is, indeed, from 2 Cor. 3 that we derive the Christian categories of “old” and “new covenant.” Augustine devoted an entire book of his Literal Meaning of Genesis (12.28, 34) to the intricacies of 2 Cor. 12:1–9.

Chrysostom drew upon the letter in order to paint striking word-pictures of his favorite apostle (Hom. 2 Cor.). Gregory Palamas dwelt upon the epistle’s theme of glory throughout his defense (The Triads) of the “hesychasts” who practiced “quietude” and so saw God’s energies with natural eyes. Aquinas used 2 Corinthians to argue that, in their final beatific vision, the faithful will behold “the divine essence” (ST q. 12. art. 9. obj. 2) and in his discussion of reason and grace (ST q. 109. art. 1. obj. 3). Charles Wesley adapted 2 Cor. 3:18 to hymnody in his immortal lines “Changed from glory into glory / Till in heav’n we take our place.”

By the late eighteenth century, the profound delight that the letter inspired in its readers was overtaken by more mundane concerns. J. S. Semler (1776) considered that 2 Corinthians must have been composed of at least two letters; A. Hausrath (1870) posited his “four chapters hypothesis” concerning chapters 10–13. The results of their source criticism were further complicated by Windisch (1924), who treated chapters 8 and 9 as two independent administrative letters. Current proponents of partition theories cite the apostle’s name at 1:1 and 10:1, and a tonal change between chapters 9 and 10. They further point to ongoing correspondence between Paul and the Corinthians, seen in 1 Cor. 5:9; 2 Cor. 2:3–4, 9; and 7:8, 12. Some have believed that chapters 10–13 (p 139) comprise the “tearful letter” of which Paul speaks. Most recently, the section 6:14–7:1 has been debated, with some dubbing it an Essene-like interpolation incompatible with Paul’s theology, and others arguing for its authenticity (Webb). Such issues of integrity are interconnected with views of Paul’s theology, career, and ministry. For convenient descriptions of the debates, see Gilchrist and Kreitzer (esp. 35–36).

Quite recently, some have prescinded from the source debate, turning to sociological, literary, and rhetorical concerns. An interest that links contemporary scholars with their forebears is the question of the identity of Paul's opponents—those “[hyperlian] super-apostles” who could, like Satan, “transform themselves” into agents of light (11:5, 14). Chrysostom, in the usual pragmatic manner of the Antiochene school, had identified these opponents as the much-debated “skolops [thorn]” in Paul's flesh (12:7; Hom. 2 Cor. 26.3–4). Through the years, critics have emerged with various pictures of this group—Judaizers (F. C. Baur [1833] and many others); proponents of Jesus as a miracle-working “divine man,” or Theios Anēr; “enthusiasts” of various stripes, including early Gnostics (from Bultmann 1985 to F. Watson 1986). These questers have sought to make sense of the issues of apostolicity, gospel, and revelatory signs and wonders that run throughout the letter. (Again, for more players in this drama, see Kreitzer 71–82.) However, others wisely have urged caution in “mirror-reading” the epistle to locate opponents.

Then there is the study of Paul the visionary. Second Corinthians 12, despite its irony, inclines the reader to inquire in this vein. In antiquity, such concern led to the pseudepigraphical Apocalypse of Paul, and the use of 2 Corinthians in grounding the insights of spiritual theology. Today, Paul's “spirituality” is studied in an “academic” mode, with its major proponent from the Jewish community. Alan Segal views Paul as our best example of early rabbinic mysticism, followed by others who detect in 2 Corinthians merkabah mysticism (visions of the heavenly throne-chariot; cf. Ezek. 1). James D. Tabor likewise sees evidence that Paul privileged visionary experience.

The letter has also been grist for the mill of the literary and rhetorical critic. Richard Hays demonstrates Paul's subtle appeal to echo and allusion in such passages as 3:1–18. Others, beginning with Hans D. Betz, have turned their minds to the apostle's rhetoric, labeling chapters 10–13 a “Socratic apology” (Betz), a “philosopher's apology” (McCant), or a pastoral speech-act (Chevallier). F. Young and D. F. Ford argued that the entire letter follows the rhetorical template set down by classical rhetorical theoreticians, and so is unified. Paul's moves also have provided an entrée for sociological discussions of inner and external conflict and power-relations (Chow). Some have sought a deliberately integrative approach, such as Ben Witherington, or E. Humphrey, who demonstrates the intricacies of textual, cultural, and historical allusions in 2 Corinthians through an adaptation of V. Robbins's “textural” model.

Issues, Themes, and Messages

Principal themes of the letter include: true knowledge (a theme shared with 1 Corinthians), old and new covenants, suffering and patience, holiness in the authentic Christian life, vulnerable giving and receiving, the importance of the body and body of Christ, the loving resolution of conflict and reconciliation, the use and abuse of authority, and especially, revelation and transformation. Joining these disparate themes together is the person of Jesus himself. He gives knowledge of God, fulfills the old covenant and initiates the new, and is the patient Sufferer par excellence. He is himself the temple of the living God, “God’s unspeakable gift” to humanity, and the one by whose body and in whom we become a body together. Through Christ, God reconciled the world to himself, in his life divine power was made perfect in weakness, and through him has come God’s new creation. “For it is the God who said, ‘Let light shine out of darkness,’ who has shone in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ” (2 Cor. 4:6 NRSV, italics added).

Despite the debates regarding unity, the letter is bound together by what could be called “apocalyptic discourse.” With the apocalypses proper, 2 Corinthians presents a cosmic reality so that the life of the Christian community is understood in terms of God’s disclosed actions in time, as well as in light of a weighty unseen world. However, Paul further reconfigures the world in terms of the decisive apokalypsis of God in the person of Jesus Christ. Hence, knowledgeknowledge, , austerity of lifeausterity of life, , sacrificessacrifice, , charitable giving, authority, and even special revelation are not ends in themselves. All are of value because of Jesus, in whom the new creation has been established so that his body grows from glory to glory (3:18). From one perspective, the glory of Jesus is the only light in this letter, that before which every other light-source pales; from another perspective, it is because of his very light that all human (p 140)endeavors, all struggles in the church, and all members of the new creation are utterly important. Paul calls the apostles “the glory of Christ” (8:23b NRSV), picturing the entire community growing into this likeness (3:18).

By this unflinching focus upon Jesus as the revelation of God, Paul sees human existence as both transitory and bound for glory. Currently we hold “treasures in clay vessels” (4:7 AT); our human and failing eyes have seen “the knowledge of the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus” (4:6 AT). This visionary possession of Christ’s body together is a gift that far surpasses the revelations of those great souls of old. Moses, Elijah, and Ezekiel glimpsed, in special visions, God’s glory from afar, and so instructed God’s people. But that hazy “appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD” (Ezek. 1:28b, italics added) has been eclipsed by the very light of God among us. Jesus, the seemingly “poor” (8:9), with veiled and vulnerable glory that the world thought to extinguish, blazed on the resurrection morning. As a result, the whole world has changed (“There is a new creation!” 5:17 NRSV) and has been granted a surprising fresh dignity. Because of Jesus, the new creation is being prepared.

Things are not as they seem, once it is acknowledged that the greatest apocalypse (Jesus himself) has been revealed. Mundane symbols such as clay jars and mirrors, as well as potentially sacred images such as fragrance and veils, are all taken up into Paul’s dramatic vision. Here we are taught not to despise the work of God’s hands, nor to overexalt it. Readers of the twenty-first century are reminded, in our time of crazy and undisciplined “spirituality,” that if we are truly to live, our spiritual life must be cruciform and lived together in that particular Holy Spirit of God. Present faithful suffering displays the life of Jesus in mortal bodies (4:11) and prepares “an eternal weight of glory beyond all measure” (4:17 NRSV). So it is that the foundational story of Jesus the Messiah—his life, death, resurrection, and exaltation—casts its light upon the everyday and the terrible. So it is that the arduous and irksome life of God’s people is assumed into the cosmic drama, taking on great significance. “I will welcome you, . . . and you shall be my sons and daughters, says the Lord Almighty” (6:17b–18 NRSV).

As he concludes a difficult correspondence, Paul summarizes, “For he was crucified in weakness, but lives by the power of God. For we are weak in him, but . . . we will live with him by the power of God” (2 Cor. 13:4 NRSV). In the apostle’s own case, this weakness and power would mean a painful rectification of problems with and in Corinth. It would mean looking to see Christ’s resurrection power working in difficult interchurch relationships. Our own needs may not be so very different, given the current crisis of authority in many congregations and communions. Be that as it may, we may give thanks for an epistle that is at once heavenly minded and earthly rooted, given to us “for building up and not for tearing down” (13:10 NRSV).

2 Corinthians and Canon

In its description of God’s new covenant through Christ, 2 Corinthians exegetes the OT hope for a qualitatively new communion (Jer. 31:31–34; Ezek. 34; 37) between God and humanity, and among the faithful. The historical dynamic Paul offers is essential: we are not to disparage the Mosaic covenant, as though the ancient people of God had erred; we are nevertheless to fully honor the new covenant, made perfect in Jesus. There is both a continuity and a discontinuity, since God's glory has been revealed, first to Israel, and now fully in Christ. This is a historical understanding of the covenants that the church has not always heeded. In early centuries, some Christians missed this dimension of the gospel, forgetting that God "did something new" in Jesus whereby the law was fulfilled. Gnostics, Marcionites, and others in the subapostolic period mocked the ancient Hebrews for taking literally words that God had "intended" only to be taken metaphorically (e.g., Clement of Alexandria, Paed. 2.10). Today, the opposite error is in vogue: Christians ignore the finality of the Jesus apocalypse, positing two ways of salvation, one for Jew, one for Christian. Paul will not leave us this option. In 2 Cor. 3–4, as in Rom. 10, he shows an undeniable continuity of the new covenant with the old, but the "veil" is only removed ("apocalypsed!") in Jesus. The Torah possessed a glory meant to be "set aside" (2 Cor. 3:13–14 NRSV) because it would come to completion in the One from whom the very light of God shines (on this, see Wright).

Paul relates this new story of Jesus and God's people by explicit reference to the OT, and also by allusion and echo, deeply inhabiting the old covenant story and demonstrating its new climax. Nor does he despise writings not strictly canonical, since he recalls (not uncritically) movements of Judaism (e.g., rabbinic mysticism) that we have long forgotten. Like the ancient poet Terence, Paul can say, "I consider nothing human to be alien to me"—but this he does with theological (p 141) reason, for all is his, and he is in Christ, and Christ is God's. Close readings of 2 Corinthians dislodge unexpected allusions and memories of past writings, artifacts, and traditions. These discoveries enrich our own Christian world, so long as we maintain our focus upon the One in whom all things cohere.

2 Corinthians and Theology

The theological drive of 2 Corinthians is that of integration. Above all others, this letter reminds us that the pastoral, academic (scribal), and theological roles are best held together. Paul addresses the particular questions of his beloved church without losing sight of the larger picture. Here, if we will look, are answers to the "New Age" challenge, as Paul holds before us the One for whom new-agers thirst, but whom they do not recognize. Here are methods to resolve problems of authority and church structure—Paul embodies the vulnerable leader who uses his powerful role for the sake of his church. Here is a call to holiness that does not denigrate the body or the physical, but sees even the mundane as “sacramentals” disclosing the Holy One. Here is a written and luminous icon of the one who spoke worlds into being, and through whom has come and is coming and will come God’s new creation. Paul does not here fully articulate the doctrine of the divinity of Christ, as he did in his reformulated Shema of 1 Cor. 8:5–6. In 2 Corinthians, that doctrine of Jesus as the LORD (through whom are all things) is assumed. Here Paul builds on that foundation, so as to nurture the common life made possible by “the Lord [who] is the Spirit” (2 Cor. 3:17). It is his lively hope that together we will be transformed into the image of that One who participates by right in the life of the Triune God. In the Spirit, Paul proclaims not himself, but Jesus Christ as LORD.

Bibliography

Baur, F. C. “Die Christuspartei in der korinthischen Gemeinde.” Pages 1–76 of Ausgewählte Werke, ed. K. Scholder. 1963; Betz, H. D. Der Apostle Paulus und die sokratische Tradition. Mohr/Siebeck, 1972; Bultmann, R. The Second Letter to the Corinthians, trans. R. A. Harrisville. Fortress, 1985; idem. Der zweite Brief an die Korinther, ed. E. Dinkler. KEK 6. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1976; Chevallier, M.-A. “L’argumentation de Paul dans II Corinthiens 10 à 13.” RHPR 70 (1990): 3–15; Chow, J. Patronage and Power. JSNTSup 75. JSOT, 1992; Fitzmyer, J. “Glory Reflected on the Face of Christ (2 Cor 3:7–4:6) and a Palestinian Jewish Motif.” TS 42 (1981): 630–44; Gilchrist, J. “Paul and the Corinthians—The Sequence of Letters and Visit.” JSNT 34 (1988): 47–69; Hays, R. Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul. Yale University Press, 1989; Humphrey, E. “Apocalyptic Rhetoric and Intertextuality in 2 Corinthians.” Pages 113–35 of The Intertexture of Apocalyptic Discourse in the New Testament, ed. D. Watson. SBLSymS 14. SBL, 2002; Kreitzer, L. 2 Corinthians. Sheffield Academic Press, 1996; McCant, J. “Paul’s Thorn of Rejected Apostleship.” NTS 34 (1988): 550–72; Robbins, V. Exploring the Texture of Texts. Trinity, 1996; Segal, A. Paul the Convert. Yale University Press, 1990; Tabor, J. Things Unutterable. University Press of America, 1986; Watson, F. Paul, Judaism, and the Gentiles. Cambridge University Press, 1986; Webb, W. Returning Home. JSNTSup 85. JSOT, 1993; Witherington, B., III. Conflict and Community in Corinth. Eerdmans, 1995; Wright, N. T. “Reflected Glory: 2 Corinthians 3.” Pages 175–92 of The Climax of the Covenant. Fortress, 1991; Young, F., and D. Ford. Meaning and Truth in 2 Corinthians. SPCK, 1987.

Edith M. Humphrey

Covenant

Covenant—the promissory relationship that Yahweh would be Israel’s God and Israel would be Yahweh’s people (Rendtorff)—has recently found itself in dispute with “promise” for the central category in Christian thought (McComiskey; Kaiser). Historical critics, with their emphasis upon historical context, development, and diversity within the biblical witness, often fail to engage the Bible as a unity in spite of the largely successful explorations of the covenant theme by a variety of biblical theologians (Baker; Childs; Eichrodt; Fuller; Wright).

Covenant in Biblical Texts

Context for the Covenant. Scholarship has recently recognized that the creation narrative depicts the universe as the temple of God (Watts). Pagans fashioned idols and images for their temples and places of worship, and so constructed an image of God. But the creation account turns pagan worship on its head. Instead of humans fashioning an image of God, the Creator God fashions a human in his own very image (Gen. 1:26–27). He places that very image in the temple of his creation, as its climactic revelation of who he is and what he is like. That image is a male-female (2:18–25; Jewett). However, the male-female image of God has been disputed as to its specific content (Hughes; Sayers). Regardless, it is this perception of humans that cries out the (largely) unheeded summons of “Ecce homo!” (John 19:5 Vulg.) in modern civilization.

It is precisely “human as image of God” that falls (Gen. 3), and (as theology unfolds) so the imago Dei suffers under sin. Humans apart from God fight with one another, make measly progress, and eventually threaten their own destruction (p 142)(Gen. 4–11). But in his grace, Yahweh steps into history through a man named Abram/Abraham to form a new relationship with humans. Genesis 1–12, then, establishes not only the justification for covenant, but also a revelation of God as the Covenant Maker, who desires that his creation be established in a proper relationship with him.

Covenant: From Abraham to Jeremiah. With Abraham, Yahweh fashions a (grant) covenant (Gen. 12:1–3; 15; 17; 22), in which God obligates himself to Abraham and his descendants as Lord, Savior, and Protector in promising them a place (land, temple), people (Israel), and blessing (spiritual and material). Israel is called to covenant faithfulness (Gen. 15:6), circumcision (ch. 17), and torah obedience (Exod. 19–24; Deuteronomy). Noteworthy in the biblical revelation of covenant is divine initiative: humans do not, as pagans do with idols, imagine a covenant; instead, God breaks into history with a revelation of relationship in terms of covenant.

Israel, however, breaks covenant (e.g., Exod. 32). Nonetheless, Yahweh promises that he will remain faithful to the Abrahamic promise/covenant with Israel, if only through the two southern tribes of Judah and Benjamin and, most especially, in the royal promise of an eternal heritage in the Davidic line (2 Sam. 7; Ps. 89). As the flood expressed God's reshaping of his covenantal relationship with humans through judgment, so the exile provokes Yahweh to promise a "new covenant" (Jer. 31:31–34). It will be a covenant where God begins again with a new people (seen here as the restoration of the twelve tribes), an unbreakable covenant that is internal, democratic, and marked by forgiveness and peace (Isa. 11:6–9; Jer. 31:27–34; 32:40; Ezek. 34:25, 27).

The New Covenant. The Last Supper of Jesus is the occasion at which that anticipated covenant of Jeremiah is established: "This is my blood of the covenant ... poured out for many" (Mark 14:24). Jesus' message heretofore concentrated on kingdom (McKnight, Vision), and so little is spelled out in this context, but the writer of Hebrews has what can be called a "New Covenant hermeneutic" (Hahn). Jesus is "the mediator of a better covenant" (8:6 NRSV), the "new covenant" (8:8), because it is enacted on the basis of better promises (8:6; cf. 9:15). This covenant renders the old as "obsolete," with its focus on temple, land, and nation (8:13). This author's focus is on the eschatological effectiveness (10:1, 10, 14) of the new covenant because it is effected through the blood of the eternal Son (9:12–14). Once again, however, covenant faithfulness is required (cf. 6:1–8; 10:29; McKnight, "Warning").

Covenant in the Practice of the Theological Interpretation

Covenant, as a hermeneutical category, is a powerful heuristic tool for comprehending the large sweep of the biblical message, but it is only one lens. Not every biblical author sorts out history and God's ways through the lens of covenant. The term is found throughout the OT, but it is relatively rare in the NT. Recognizing the relatively rare use of covenant as a hermeneutical tool for the earliest Christians, however, does not minimize the depth and clarity this category permits those who read the Bible as a whole, to find a center from which the entire can be seen.

Even if Jesus prefers "kingdom" as his "hermeneutic," the term "covenant" at the Last Supper demonstrates that what Jesus means by kingdom can be aptly summarized, and even reshaped, by the category of covenant. Covenant, then, is in dialectic with other terms. Thus, "kingdom" focuses upon prophetic expectation of a Davidic restoration and draws the reader into the prophetic corpus to find what Jesus was expecting and doing. "Covenant" leads that same reader to see kingdom in terms of what God was doing from the very beginning—with Adam, with Noah, and especially with Abraham, Moses, and David. Kingdom and covenant, then, are two ways biblical revelation speaks of God's doings in this world. One might grant hermeneutical priority to kingdom (McKnight, “Hermeneutics”).

Similar reflections might be made about other terms that shape how the early Christians depicted the relationship of humans with God. Thus, “justification,” while it has been given preeminence at times among systematic theologians (e.g., Anselm and those who operate fundamentally with legal and academic categories), can be given a reinigorated value when understood as a powerful instance of God’s covenant relationship with his people. One might say that God’s relationship with his people is not so much a “legal declaration of being in the right” as God’s covenantal act of establishing a right relationship, where the focus of covenant leads the term “justification” in the direction of a relationship rather than a status.

The biblical material on covenant is the discourse of theological anthropology. While humanistic thinking centralizes humans, it also burdens them with an insufferable load and a life-sapping weight. But, biblical thinking on covenant shows humans for what they are: the male-female image (p 143) of God, now fallen, but restored through a relationship with God. Instead of offering yet another human-created image in the pagan temple of humanism, covenant offers to the world a depiction of humans as God’s image placed on earth to nurture his creation and sustain fellowship with one another. Humanism is thus shown for what it is: an attempt by moderns once again to re-create God in their own image. At the deepest level, then, covenant instructs that humans are not what they are meant to be, do not know what they are to know, and do not live as they are to live apart from the covenant.

If God’s essential act is one of covenant making, then his people’s task is fundamentally to lead others into that covenant relationship and to live faithfully in terms of that covenant. Humans are hereby given the proper place they deserve in God’s creation: they are made in the male-female image of God, but they are fallen. In his grace, however, God has provided the path of restoration through a covenant relationship. If God’s fundamental relationship to humans can be described as covenantal, then the task of his people is to lead others into that covenant and to live faithfully.

Covenant thinking not only establishes relationship with God. It also summons the human related to God through covenant to a life of faithfulness. If the covenant with Abraham fails to address the human need for moral direction, God began to make that clear when he reestablished the covenant with Moses (Exod. 19–24). But even that covenant failed to remedy the human moral condition. So, the expectation of Jeremiah becomes a reality in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. This event, in connection with Pentecost and the creation of the church as new-covenant community, establishes that covenant morality is only effective through the blood of the eternal Son and the internalization of the covenant through the Spirit.

What boggles the mind, however, is that God did not write off humans after their rebellion. Judgment does occur (seen in the flood and the exile, both of which anticipate final judgment), but God's last word is not judgment. God's final word to humans is covenant. The image of God is given full range when we reflect on covenant, and sin is made out to be what it really is. God makes humans special—and so they are given the responsibility to order, manage, and direct the created orders. So valuable are they to God that he seeks their restoration. But this only makes it clear that covenant theology shows sin for what it is: sin is not just human failing, nor is it just behavioral disturbance. Instead, sin is rebellion against the good guidance of the image-creating God, against God himself.

Covenant also reminds humans of the patience of God, for though he calls his people to faithfulness, their sin does not lead to immediate extirpation. Instead, God's patient hand remains stretched out for his people to turn back to him and follow his good guidance. God's patience leads him to permit torah revelation as a preliminary glimpse of his goodwill. Only over time do humans come to terms with their unflagging inability to follow the torah as God would have. So, in his gracious patience, God comes to terms with humans in an internal work of the heart through his Son and through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. All of this is part of God's covenant. What God's patience allows, then, is the gradual unfolding of the one (not two) covenant (not covenants) for the entire world (Holwerda).

Finally, covenant enables us to see that the end of history is a glimpse of God's intent from the beginning of history. The end of history finds humans bowing before Jesus Christ (Phil. 2:5–11) and offering God their praises of the worthiness of his Son (Rev. 5). That is the climax of the covenant relationship. It means that from the beginning the telos (goal) of God has been to lead all humans to bow before him in eternal worship and praise. That praise finds its motivation in the blood-stained Lamb, who is also the conquering Lion of Judah.

Bibliography

Baker, D. L. Two Testaments, One Bible. InterVarsity, 1991; Childs, B. The New Testament as Canon. Fortress, 1985; Eichrodt, W. Theology of the Old Testament. 2 vols. SCM, 1967; Fuller, D. The Unity of the Bible. Zondervan, 1992; Hahn, S. "Kinship by Covenant." Ph.D. diss., Marquette University, 1995; Holwerda, D. Jesus and Israel. Eerdmans, 1995; Hughes, P. The True Image. Eerdmans, 1989; Jewett, P. Man as Male and Female. Eerdmans, 1975; Kaiser, W. Toward an Old Testament Theology. Zondervan, 1978; McComiskey, T. The Covenants of Promise. Baker, 1985; McKnight, S. “The Hermeneutics of Confessing Jesus as Lord.” Ex Auditu 14 (1998): 1–17; idem. A New Vision for Israel. Eerdmans, 1999; idem. “The Warning Passages of Hebrews: A Formal Analysis and Theological Conclusions.” TJ 13 (1992): 21–59; Rendtorff, R. The Covenant Formula. T&T Clark, 1998; Sayers, D. The Mind of the Maker. HarperSanFrancisco, 1987; Watts, R. “The New Exodus/New Creational Restoration of the Image of God: A Biblical-Theological Perspective on Salvation.” Pages 15–41 in What Does It Mean to Be Saved? ed. J. Stackhouse Jr. Baker, 2002; Wright, N. T. The New Testament and the People of God. Fortress, 1992.

 Scot McKnight

(p 144)Covenant Theology      See Last Things, Doctrine of

Creation

The developed doctrine of creation ex nihilo emerged, from roots in the Jewish Scriptures, as the early Christian alternative to pagan and gnostic cosmologies. It “is not something self-evident or the discovery of disinterested reason, but part of the fabric of Christian response to revelation” (Gunton 8). Among contemporary rivals to its trinitarian understanding of divine providence, we find materialism and remnants of Deism, varieties of animism and Eastern monism, plus New Age and other adoptions of pantheism and/or panentheism.

Creation as a Matter of Interpretation

On the Christian understanding, creation was an act of divine freedom; the universe had a beginning in time and is limited in space. God’s act was not arbitrary, but purposeful as a project of love; creation is in close relation to God, but relatively free to be itself so as to develop in love for God and display divine glory (Gunton). By maintaining the world’s relative goodness, Christian tradition resisted the pagan tendency to view matter as evil or deficient, unleashing scientific inquiry since the world became valuable for study in its own right (not simply for symbolizing other ideal structures).

Biblical Narrative and Science? Today, however, biblical teaching and scientific inquiry are widely regarded as polar opposites. Basic approaches to the creation narratives of Gen. 1–2 may be treated on a rough spectrum. (1) Strict creationists, often identified with “creation science” belief in a “young earth” (especially in the USA), interpret Genesis “literally” first and then evaluate science, correlating various details but rejecting mainstream conclusions. (2) At the other end of the spectrum, science is consulted first and Genesis interpreted as thoroughgoing “myth.” Naturalistic evolutionists turn science into a worldview; various theistic evolutionists may or may not adopt “methodological naturalism,” while some of their “allegorical” understandings take Genesis quite seriously in theological terms. (3) In between, the so-called “gap” theory understood much of evolution to be compatible with an indefinite time period between Gen. 1:1 and 1:3, while (4) the “day-age” theory likewise held to an “old earth,” by taking the days of Gen. 1 to be epochs of indefinite length. These views still tended to try correlating particular details between the biblical and scientific narratives. (5) Recently rising in influence among Christian interpreters of Genesis are versions of a “literary framework” approach. Noting that Augustine, for instance, recognized literary patterning in Genesis long before the challenge of modern science, such an approach takes seriously the historical context of the creation narratives as well. (Meanwhile, regarding philosophy, the recent “intelligent design” movement does not necessarily align with a particular reading strategy.)

Literary approaches recognize that Genesis counteracts pagan myths focused on procreation instead of creation (regarding the genealogy of deities rather than nature). Days 1–3, of “preparation,” address the darkness, watery abyss, and formless earth of Gen. 1:2; days 4–6, of “population,” involve the filling of what God has formed (e.g., Hamilton 54–56); day 7, connecting God via Sabbath to Israel’s “workweek” (Exod. 20:8–11), has much-debated theological significance. In any case, scientific theories are open to ongoing Christian consideration, while the biblical texts are interpreted with integrity as authoritative. Theologians debate implications for the nature and origin of evil, cosmology, animal death, and human death. Immortality of the soul in a Greek sense is not the teaching of Genesis, and passages such as Ps. 90 point Christians toward greater appreciation of finitude as divine gift. Yet canonical reading requires that Rom. 1–8 regarding life and death, and the many NT uses of Adam and Eve, be respected so as to maintain the goodness of God’s original creation, the specificity of humanity’s creation as image of God, and the historicity of the fall. More broadly, creation is a divine act that in the cosmos gives not only “general revelation” of God but also a context connecting biblical interpretation to all of life.

The Triune God and Redemption? Links are strong, then, between creation and the rest of the Christian story. While creation in the OT connects to the rise of monotheism, the universality of Israel's God does not support the many natural, basically unitarian, theologies that arose in the modern age. Though appropriating aspects of the Christian doctrine, these always stay subject to the shifting vagaries of science or even philosophical naturalism; in the context of such new narratives, the doctrine's crucial contributions are rejected or lost.

Hence, creation confronts us with whether or not to achieve biblical theology via strategies of correlation. Accepting Christianity's scandal of particularity does not require obscurantism, (p 145) but a trinitarian vision of the created world that responds to cultural challenges winsomely, with unique beauty and logic. For instance, when arguing for "genuinely causal" (as opposed to "merely explanatory") gaps in cosmological knowledge, given a distinction between divine and human causality, we do not automatically revert to a discredited "God of the gaps" (DiNoia 72). It has been Gunton's frequent claim that loss of trinitarian distinctiveness weakened the doctrines of creation and providence internally, which has exposed the Christian faith to opposition from the very scientific inquiry it helped to foster.

By contrast, a trinitarian emphasis helps to connect, rather than oppose, creation and redemption. Moreover, trinitarian divine agency enables personal relatedness and creaturely freedom in noncompetitive forms of causality, as we learn most dramatically in the incarnation. The Son gives the cosmos structure and coherence (see, e.g., OT hints about wisdom; John 1; Col. 1; Heb. 1), while the Spirit gives ongoing life and freedom for created particulars to be themselves (e.g., Pss. 33:6; 104:30). The Trinity need not be forced directly into passages such as Gen. 1:26–27 to be a coherent extension of the story at which Scripture—including the OT—hints.

Creation and the Form of Interpretation

Aside from its role as a test case, then, in various ways the doctrine of creation could shape the form of theological exegesis.

"Natural" Order. Creation as sustained by God possesses order, which has been reaffirmed in the resurrection of Christ's body (O'Donovan); we are redeemed as a new creation within the present order, awaiting full transformation that preserves continuity with current identities. Thus, the "structure" of reality has integrity of goodness to which our action responds; it is the "direction" of entities, not their being, which is subject to the order of fall and redemption (Wolters). Interpretation, in a sense parallel to Adamic naming of other creatures, is a God-given responsibility involving meaningful human action, but it also discovers and responds to the "kinds" of things that are.

Biblical interpretation is special given the story of fall and redemption, the unique sort of book(s) being read, and the ministry of Word and Spirit. But we are still reading texts. If space permitted, one could show that understandings of “nature” and “grace” correlate readily with biblical hermeneutics. One example is a Lutheran tendency toward the relative freedom of nature and grace, thereby sharply distinguishing historical criticism and theological exegesis from each other. Another is a “Reformed epistemology,” seeking distinctively Christian approaches that transform nature (textual scholarship) by grace (e.g., one’s presuppositions).

“Cultural” Development and Diversity. Thus, the created order seems, at minimum, to determine some limits to the possible meanings of biblical texts. From the beginning, though, God has delighted in the variety of creation and its human stewardship. After Pentecost has apparently begun to reverse Babel, cultural development—including interpretative difference tied to human particularity—can produce plurality worth celebrating, and not always problems tied to fallenness (Smith). Variety need not entail violence; it can create the conditions necessary for love and joy. From a Christian standpoint “nature” and “culture” blend form and freedom, givenness and graveness.

Cultural development is worth celebrating when it connects us with delight to the natural world God has made. Forms of interpretation can be oppressively technical and stifle the freedom of such delight, or can foster the use of technologies that overwhelm nonhuman creatures, natural beauty, and/or cultural difference. This should give Western interpreters pause concerning our scholarly exports and current practices—both hoarding our exegetical resources and hiding from the gifts that others may offer—plus, more mundanely, how much power and paper we consume. Biblical texts require that we take seriously the tangible world where we might embody them, and its rhythms for work and rest.

Creativity and Divine Glory. Concern for the tangible and for time also raises the question of “creativity.” Such language can risk blurring the grandeur of God, who creates in a way that humans do not. We rearrange and realize the possibilities of preexisting materials. Yet the fact that “there is nothing new under the sun” (Eccles. 1:9) does not license monotony, but gives measured appreciation of human potential. Ecclesiastes soberly considers the endless proliferation of books and other cultural projects, concluding that pretense to mastery—of knowledge or any other domain of life—would be folly (12:12). Cultural production, including biblical scholarship, has relative value as a way of fostering community and celebration of ordinary life; its goal should be neither to finish a project of mastering texts, nor to create much of the novelty on which our academic programs and reputations currently thrive.

(p 146) Nevertheless, the doctrine of creation reminds us that we live in a “person-friendly cosmos” (DiNoia). God does glory and receive glory in ongoing cultural efforts, which can be pleasing and make some progress. To the degree we undertake biblical interpretation communally with God, each other, and the nonhuman creation—to the degree that our doctrine of creation leads us to interpret for and from shalom—we will delight in new harmonies of various voices. Joining together to hear biblical texts speak the wonders of our God, we may also look to “the Maker of heaven and earth” for loving help (Pss. 121; 124); because of God’s power we need fear nothing else (Seitz).

See also Providence; Science, the Bible and; Worldview

Bibliography

Blocher, H. In the Beginning. InterVarsity, 1984; DiNoia, J. A. “By Whom All Things Were Made.” Pages 63–73 in Nicene Christianity, ed. C. Seitz. Brazos, 2001; Gunton, C. The Triune Creator. Eerdmans, 1998; Hamilton, V. The Book of Genesis Chapters 1–17. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1990; O’Donovan, O. Resurrection and Moral Order. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1994; Seitz, C. “Our Help Is in the Name of the LORD, the Maker of Heaven and Earth.” Pages 19–34 in Nicene Christianity, ed. C. Seitz. Brazos, 2001; Smith, J. K. A. The Fall of Interpretation. InterVarsity, 2000; Wolters, A. Creation Regained. Eerdmans, 1985.

Daniel J. Treier

Creed

Brief summary statements of the heart of the Christian faith, possibly used during baptismal services, can be traced right back to the NT, ranging from the simple assertion “Jesus is Lord” (Rom. 10:9) to fuller assertions (1 Cor. 8:6 or 15:3–5). Even in the canonical writings, these are already being used to regulate belief (there are several examples in 1 John), and so, presumably, to regulate biblical interpretation. Creeds, and their role in the reading of Scripture, might be seen as a development of such indications.

In the early patristic period, there are regular appeals made to the “rule of faith”: the essence of Christian truth as taught by the apostles who had been with Jesus is encapsulated in the “rule of faith”; if the Scriptures teach the same apostolic faith, they cannot contradict this rule. For Tertullian, Irenaeus, and other early patristic theologians, the conditional might have been alive, in that they lived before the canon was determined, and so it would have been open to them to object to a particular book on grounds of unorthodox teaching. Historically, although the development of both is complex, the ecumenical creeds (Nicene; Apostles'; the Chalcedonian Definition) and the canon of the NT come into being at about the same time. The creeds offer a summary of the central points of faith that cannot be diverged from; these points are developed largely through scriptural exegesis (e.g., Athanasius and the Arians argue as to which of their positions is more faithful to Scripture), but once fixed they become virtually regulative. The creeds were intended to represent binding exegetical decisions: this (in summary and in part) is what the Christian Scriptures say. No theology, and so no interpretation of Scripture, could be judged adequate if it falls outside the creedal boundaries.

Generally, the Christian churches have accepted this decision, at least until recently. The common formulation confessing the faith "contained in the Holy Scriptures and witnessed to in the ecumenical creeds" expresses this decision precisely. On this account, the idea that those who fixed the creeds were wrong is unthinkable. God in his good providence guided his church in this decision, just as he did in the fixing of the canon of Scripture. The creeds remain an authoritative summary of the central dogmatic propositions to which the Scriptures witness. This has profound hermeneutical implications: some interpretations are authorized, and others excluded, if the creedal formulae have interpretative authority. For instance, certain Arian positions concerning the relative status of such Johannine texts as "the Father is greater than I" (14:28) and "I and the Father are one" (10:30) are excluded a priori.

The role and status of Protestant confessions (e.g., the Westminster Confession) are similar, but within a narrower compass. Many Presbyterian churches are still committed to the Westminster standards (and Lutheran churches to the Formula of Concord, etc.). Here the point is explicit: since the confessions often assert that there is no other authority than Holy Scripture, their own role can only be as interpretations, and interpretative tools, for Scripture. Their status as doctrinal standards can only be understood as a corporate insistence that the Scriptures be read this way, and not another, within their traditions. Scripture remains the absolute and unchallengeable basis and norm of all faith and theology. Nevertheless, creeds and confessions act as subordinate norms, codifying and interpreting the teaching of Scripture in an authoritative way.

See also Rule of Faith; Tradition

(p 147)Bibliography

The most significant creeds and confessions are in Pelikan, J., and V.

Hotchkiss, eds. Creeks and Confessions of Faith in the Christian Tradition. 4 vols. Yale University Press, 2003 (with Credo, a valuable introductory volume by Pelikan). See also Barth, K. Credo, trans. J. S. McNabb. Hodder & Stoughton, 1936; Webster, J. "Confession and Confessions." In Nicene Christianity, ed. C. Seitz. Brazos, 2002.

Stephen R. Holmes

Critical Realism

In recent years critical realism has made significant inroads in the theological interpretation of Scripture (Meyer; Wright). There are two main reasons why this development is particularly significant. First, it reflects an increasing willingness among biblical scholars to conceive of their interpretative work as a philosophical enterprise based on epistemological choices and frameworks. Second, critical realism has thrown into question many of the underlying positivistic assumptions of naive realism, which have underpinned much theological interpretation, but it has done so without selling out to the relativism inherent in idealist, phenomenalist, and even instrumentalist epistemologies. What are the distinctives of critical realism that have propelled it to the forefront of philosophical reflections on theological interpretation? The critical-realist combination of insisting on the external reality of "the thing known" while acknowledging that human knowledge can only be a subjective appropriation of reality can hardly be accused of having attained esteem by sheer eccentricity. Given the commonsense character that theological realism (Grosshans) or indeed metaphysical realism in general (Alston) has for many, a brief historical contextualization is necessary to account for its rise.

Contextualizing Critical Realism

Modernity has been characterized by approaches to human knowledge largely based on an abstract objectivism and empiricism, a combination that in turn was seen to facilitate the dialogue between religion and science about the cognitive value of epistemological theories. Only in the final thirty years of the twentieth century did critical realism become an essential part of the science-religion dialogue (Barbour; Peacocke; van Huyssteen; Soskice). This is not to deny that critical realism essentially existed along with naive realism as far back as pre-Enlightenment times. But it was only recently that it came to be presented by many as the most plausible way of making sense of scientific theories and religious doctrines as symbolic representations of external reality. As such, they ought to be taken "seriously but not literally" as approximations of reality (Robbins 656). Critical realism thus moves from perceived explanatory success to claims of realism. In the process it lays the ground for theology as epistemically compatible with science (van Huyssteen 258). Robbins and Murphy, however, question critical realism's inherently Cartesian distinction between the mind as an inner realm of representations of reality and the physicality of existence, thus potentially allowing a serious gap between how the world is and how it is perceived (Robbins 655–66; Murphy 287–90). Yet, the avoidance of precisely such a gap by postulating that reality was mind-independent, while accessible in principle (however subjectively), was billed by critical realists as a major selling point over against both relativist and empiricist conceptualizations of truth. Toward the end of the twentieth century, it was especially Alston who questioned the assumption that antifoundationalism required antirealism. However, another challenge comes from those who approach the matter in a strictly verificationist manner. This line of attack denies the possibility of excluding the appearance of future evidence (which would demonstrate the inadequacy of earlier truth judgments). For a theological response, see McGrath (148–50).

Epistemological debates in the natural sciences are paralleled in theological circles, for instance, with reference to the application of religious language to matters of spirituality and God. Is such language—or indeed all language?—strictly metaphorical (Soskice) or does religious language allow us a “real” glimpse into external spiritual realities, including the divine? However, it is in the field of modern theology that some of the most significant debates have taken place. This is perhaps best illustrated by comparing the positions of MacIntyre on the one hand and Torrance on the other. The latter seemingly celebrates objective thinking as based on “facts,” whereas the former privileges tradition as the communal dimension of human knowledge. On closer inspection, though, Torrance agrees that knowledge is indeed communal (the “social coefficient of knowledge”—Torrance 102–3), as opposed to being “neutral” in the sense of truth-as-correspondence. Torrance may occasionally use the language of scientific positivism, but in fact he is deeply suspicious of claims about there (p 148)being logical bridges between ideas and existence (76). Like MacIntyre, he understands the need to utilize intuition and creativity in advancing rational inquiry (Achtmeier 355–74).

It is the Canadian theologian Lonergan whose blend of cognitional theory, epistemology, and metaphysics is profoundly influencing biblical studies, especially through the writings of Meyer and Wright. In light of his relevance for developing a hermeneutic of theological interpretation of Scripture, a closer look at his contribution is warranted.

Loneragan and the Quest for Religious Knowledge

For Lonergan the critical realist, human knowledge involves experience, intelligence, reflection, and deliberation. Experience is the sensing of outer reality and as such is the first step toward knowledge. It generates basic questions about reality such as How? Why? What for? Hypothetical answers are then given. But the pursuit of knowledge requires the move from asking What is it? to Is it? In other words, there is a progression (by way of “understanding”) from asking questions incapable of being answered affirmatively or negatively to those that require precisely such a judgment by way of answer. The resulting judgment itself is an approximation of what Lonergan calls the “virtually unconditioned,” or certainty. It is refined by asking further questions to ensure that as much data as possible are allowed to inform the judgment.

Knowledge claims are judgments of probability, even in the modern sciences, for such claims are invariably based on, and abstracted from, partial or random evidence. As human beings we are incapable of accounting for the universe in a single ordered sequence of reasoning. Moreover, since knowledge is based on experience, it is inconceivable that sound judgment results from looking “objectively” at the world of experience. Experiential objectivity (i.e., orientation toward experience as an object) as the expression of a crude obsession with sense data (naive realism or empiricism) is therefore not an option. Cognitive meaning cannot be restricted to what is “sense perceptible,” for such perception is only preliminary in the acquisition of knowledge. Idealism, on the other hand, is equally deficient in its denial of what is real, for experience is based on precisely what is real, whatever metaphysical realm is reflected by a given reality.

Loneragan’s insistence that epistemological judgment is an approximation to the virtually unconditioned has repercussions for the notion of religious knowledge or theology. As we are not aware of conditions against which the existence of the transcendent can be verified or judged, metaphysical arguments about the transcendent fall short. In other words, since the transcendent is not just “virtually” unconditioned but also “really” so, we have no way of judging its existence independent from our philosophical premises. Religious knowledge evades the constraints of ordinary human knowledge. Knowing God is a function of conversion, not human reasoning. Against Lonergan, it has been pointed out that his brand of critical realism leaves no way of adjudicating between competing religious claims (Stinnett 107). This may be a slightly unfair criticism in the sense that Lonergan does not regard critical realism as a way of solving the philosophical impasse caused by such competing religious claims. Having said that, he seems to claim that the impasse is relativized by privileging prior divine love in the process of attaining religious knowledge (123). What matters in terms of a theological reading of Scripture is that for Lonergan the very act of such a reading ought to foster openness for God's prior love as a condition of developing religious knowledge. The resulting purification of our subjectivity is a precondition for the kind of objectivity that transcends the experiential and moves toward the absolute, that is, the "objectivity" that results from judgment.

Another Canadian scholar, Ben F. Meyer, has digested Lonergan's philosophical contribution to the enterprise of reading Scripture theologically and made it accessible for biblical studies.

Critical Realism and Biblical Theology (Meyer)

Readers of Meyer's two major books on the subject (Critical Realism and Reality and Illusion) are immediately alerted to his indebtedness to Lonergan's thought. Meyer himself suggests that Lonergan is the master whose work Meyer cannot improve. Instead, he appropriates Lonergan's philosophical approach for the purpose of recovering biblical theology from the clutches of positivism, neo-Kantianism, and the existentialism that has dominated much of German theology (Reality, 151ff.). He wants to promote biblical theology as a hermeneutical enterprise that puts a high premium on the author's intentionality as a way of connecting with the extratextual (including transcendent) realities. Yet he does not have illusions of doing so either neutrally (or free from dogma and in that sense "academically") or (p 149) by reducing the biblical witness to a theological projection of the mind. The interpreter needs to exhibit both historical realism and a prior commitment to the Bible as divine proclamation. The theological truth claims of the biblical text have to be faced, not demythologized or ideologized. For too long historical criticism has been dominated by atheistic ideological paradigms and movements. What is needed is a critical realist cognitional theory that starts with an all-powerful loving God whose prime characteristic is his continued interest in creation as evidenced in his biblical self-disclosure. As such, the Bible is neither just allegorical-figurative (Alexandrian approach) nor literal-historical (Antiochene approach). It is conceivably both, the main adjudicator being the human intentionality embodied in the text. It will not do, for instance, to interpret Romans as an abstract discussion of God's grace, when Paul's intentionality was to speak into the specific social situation of the first-century Roman church. That church was struggling with issues of God's covenantal faithfulness in light of Jewish-Gentile tensions resulting from the law-free admission of Gentiles into the christocentrically defined people of God. Nor will it do to reduce the significance of the Gospels to issues of historicity versus theology when in fact their authors' intentionality was to hold the two together.

Importantly, for Meyer human intentionality in biblical interpretation and theology is not just a key aspect that connects authors and interpreters; it also is equally significant for bridging the gap between the NT kerygmatic claims about Christ and Jesus' historical consciousness. Alluding to what Mussner once called the crux of Christian theology, he asks: "If Christology has no roots at all in the consciousness of the historical Jesus, how in the end could it vindicate its claim to be other than and much more than mere ideology?" (Critical, 161). There needs to be significant continuity between the NT authors' intentionalities and that of Jesus. Meyer is deeply suspicious of theological readings of the NT that do not account for or indeed demonstrate such continuity.

The Role of "Story" (Wright)

Meyer's rehabilitation of human intentionality to biblical interpretation lives on in the work of N. T. Wright. The latter's indebtedness to the former is not dissimilar to Meyer's own use of Lonergan. Yet Wright goes significantly beyond a restatement of Meyer's hermeneutics by developing a "story"-based approach to biblical interpretation, which leads to more tangible exegetical results and decisions. His focus on narrative-historical categories is grounded in the conviction that human transformation and intentionality (as expressed in texts) are most fundamentally affected by the stories that make up human reality and relationality. Our worldviews, and therefore our perception of reality, are most directly affected by the stories we live and encounter.

This insight has significant repercussions for biblical interpretation. (1) It forces the interpreter to recover both "story" and "stories" as major factors in our approach to the biblical literature. It is probably no coincidence that the prime genre in the biblical literature is that of storytelling. Far from being intended as vehicles of lightweight doctrinal insights, they have the prime function of drawing the hearer (or reader) into a transformative dialogue in ways that transcend the capabilities of propositionally phrased truth claims. (2) It leads to a recalibration of interpretative priorities. Instead of approaching the task of exegesis from the bottom up (by privileging dictionaries and grammars), the theological interpreter seeks primarily to account for the textually embodied intentionality of the author. One does this by relating it to all of its pertinent levels of story, starting with the biblical grand narrative and moving toward the sociorhetorical situation of the text to be interpreted. Therefore, in contrast to the positivistic objectification of knowledge, human intentionality is now seen against the canvas of the storied knowledge of the communicative partners. Knowledge simply does not exist in a vacuum; neither does intentionality.

(3) It follows that the notion of subjectivity in interpretation per se is not an evil to be rejected or lamented; it is to be welcomed as an aspect of human creativity that allows communication to be transformative, that is, “story-changing.” In this sense interpretation has to be subjective to be relevant. Yet critical realism insists that authorial intentionality as an external reality must be the controlling factor in interpretation. Determinate meaning exists, even if it is not objectively accessible. (4) This is not to deny that the intentionality of empirical or historical authors may be partially or entirely obscured. But insofar as a text (or speech for that matter) conveys authorial presence via the implied author—who is the empirical author’s creation—authorial intentionality remains the crucial interpretative corrective. The provisionality of an interpretation in itself does not imply a value judgment. All interpretations of a given text are provisional, but relative to the (p 150)others, only one of them will have the strongest claim to accuracy.

Summary and Outlook

Critical realism distinguishes between external reality on the one hand and human knowledge on the other. The former exists objectively, but it is only accessible through the grid of knowledge or worldview. Far from being objective, knowledge is in fact more than the merely “factual,” for it is the ever-changing matrix that connects mental consciousness to external realities, with the latter holding the former accountable. The matrix itself consists of beliefs and questions about reality, as well as epistemic frameworks for determining what qualifies as proper knowledge discourse. Almost by definition critical realism rejects any dichotomy between scientific and nonscientific knowledge. Put differently, it welcomes cross-disciplinary integration, for the critical realist’s configuration of truth has to remain open to further refinement by whatever tools are appropriate to the subject matter. In theory, what qualifies as “appropriate” is determined by worldview. In practice, of course, worldview is a function of religiocultural conditioning and—as the theologian insists—revelation. In constructing representations of reality, the role of revelation is at least twofold: (1) to provide and safeguard biblical discourse, and (2) to empower the interpreter spiritually and transformatively. In recent years speech-act theory has made great strides in bringing precision to our understanding of Spirit-endowed theological interpretation. It should prove fascinating to observe the increasingly significant contributions of speech-act theory to critical-realist hermeneutics, for the subjectivity of theological (or indeed any) interpretation needs to be both captivated and cultivated by the Spirit of God.

See also Epistemology; Objectivity

Bibliography

Achtmeier, P. "The Truth of Tradition: Critical Realism in the Thought of Alasdair MacIntyre and T. F. Torrance." SJT 47 (1994): 355–74; Alston, W. A Sensible Metaphysical Realism. Marquette University Press, 2001; Barbour, I. Religion in an Age of Science. Harper & Row, 1990; Grosshans, H.-P. Theologischer Realismus. Mohr, 1996; Lonergan, B. Method in Theology. Herder & Herder, 1972; MacIntyre, A. After Virtue. 2d ed. University of Notre Dame Press, 1984; McGrath, A. The Foundations of Dialogue in Science and Religion. Blackwell, 1998; Meyer, B. Critical Realism and the New Testament. Pickwick, 1989; idem. Reality and Illusion in New Testament Scholarship. Glazier/Liturgical, 1994; Murphy, N. "From Critical Realism to a Methodological Approach: Response to Robbins, Van Huyssteen, and Hefner." Zygon 23 (1988): 287–90; Peacocke, A. Intimations of Reality. University of Notre Dame Press, 1984; Robbins, J. "Pragmatism, Critical Realism, and the Cognitive Value of Religion and Science." Zygon 34 (1999): 655–66; Soskice, J. M. Metaphor and Religious Language. Clarendon, 1985; Stinnett, T. "Lonergan's 'Critical Realism' and Religious Pluralism." The Thomist 56 (1992): 97–115; Torrance, T. F. Reality and Scientific Theology. Scottish Academic Press, 1985; van Huyssteen, W. "Experience and Explanation: The Justification of Cognitive Claims in Theology." Zygon 23 (1988): 247–61; Wright, N. T. The New Testament and the People of God. Fortress, 1996.

Thorsten Moritz

Cross-Cultural Interpretation    See Culture and Hermeneutics

Cultural-Linguistic Theology    See Culture and Hermeneutics; Language-Game; Narrative Theology; Yale School

Cultural Studies    See Culture and Hermeneutics

Culture and Hermeneutics

The status of culture as a consequential factor in biblical and theological interpretation is receiving increasing attention, thanks to three major phenomena: theoretical developments related to epistemology; the onset of postmodernism in the West; and the proliferation of Christian communities in the global South, whose theological readings of Scripture and of their situations (postcolonial and other) are becoming more readily available. A host of theological visions now claim attention in their own right. For those pursuing the theological interpretation of Scripture as that which grounds and directs Christian identity and practice, this complexity calls for a reappraisal of the contribution of culture to hermeneutics, the constitution and function of tradition, and the character of theological diversity and unity.

In this discussion, we will sketch the concept of “culture”; identify issues in several important exemplars and proposals; and note the implications these suggest for the church’s interpretative practice.

The Culture Concept

Culture is notoriously difficult to define. Noted here are relevant features of several major theoretical orientations and shifts in its conceptual development.

(p 151) Culture in early anthropology was defined as a “complex whole” encompassing a society’s beliefs and values, behavioral norms, institutions, and artifacts (Tylor, in Geertz 4). Among many subsequent modifications, social structure (referring to relatively enduring social arrangements) is differentiated from culture (reserved for the symbolic dimension: the quest to construct and communicate meaning). On a semiotic view, a culture, comprised of “interworked systems of construable signs,” is not a causal power but a context calling for “thick descriptions” (Geertz 5, 14). Cultural analysis renders the particular universe of symbolic action (or life-view) of a group at a specific time, expressed in the forms and practices associated with its way of life (Storey).

Other approaches to social description have emphasized structure and function. Earlier theories assumed the closely coordinated relations of forms and practices: culture qua unified system whose reproduction supported the group’s persistence over time.

Late- and postmodern sociological conflict theories have criticized such conceptions for construing groups and cultures as static entities; as systems comprised of highly interdependent parts; or as constituted by consensus. They emphasize, rather, contradictions and rival traditions within cultures; intragroup conflicts of interest; and the role of power, ideology, and coercion in organizing social life (Tanner).

Under the present conditions of globalization and postmodernity, the more extensive encounter with cultural pluralism has intensified our awareness not only of variation, but also of the porosity and hybridity of cultures within a continual dialectic between the local and the global (Schreiter, Catholicity). The prevailing academic practice treats cultures not in essentialist terms (as consisting in distinctive traits) but in social constructionist ones (as constituted by symbolizing practices occasioning the ongoing production of meaning). Human actors, located within a sociocultural landscape comprised of shifting alignments under continually changing circumstances, are central to this account. Culture's functionality—its contingent, negotiated character—is accentuated.

Culture and Epistemology

Although culture is the medium of human existence, and evidence of complex intercultural relations and processes goes back to antiquity, the theoretical study of culture and an articulated concept as such is a distinctly modern development in the West. Thus, apart from a few exceptions (e.g., Troeltsch; Kuyper; et al.; see Niebuhr), until relatively recently, theological scholarship has not engaged systematically with issues such as cultural production, particularity, and pluralism, and their hermeneutical implications.

Late modern/postmodern developments in the human sciences have established the now widespread recognition that because the world for humans is as much conceptual as concrete, facts are theory-laden. In large measure rationalities are tradition-constituted, rooted in particular symbolic worlds (Berger and Luckmann; MacIntyre). Enculturation and social location substantively fund and shape our capacities for perception and judgment and our consequent social practice, as communities and as individuals.

Thus, the modern notion of objectivity had assumed that “to get genuinely in touch with the object, or to do so in a more reliable way, one must eliminate the particularity of one's perspective” (Wolterstorff 85). Instead, it is the case that “every human community shares and cherishes certain assumptions, traditions, expectations, anxieties, and so forth, which encourage its members to construe reality in particular ways, and which create contexts within which certain kinds of statements are perceived as making sense. There is no such thing as the ‘neutral’ or ‘objective’ observer; equally, there is no such thing as the detached observer” (Wright 36; Thiselton). Insofar as readers have viewed culture principally as a deforming impediment to theological interpretation, or have sought to confine cultural knowledge to either the tacit dimension of preunderstanding or the “contextualization” stages of the interpretative process, a modification is in order. The particular, partial cultural programming all acquire via primary socialization (and thereafter) is both an enabling and obstructing condition for knowledge, a theological asset and liability. Moreover, readers' culturally situated and specific knowledge cannot be divested; it operates within every phase of biblical and theological interpretation, whether inadvertently or intentionally. The following examples exhibit the mutually implicated relationship of culture and interpretation.

Culture and Biblical Interpretation

General (culturally informed) assumptions about texts and reading initially influence the process and outcome of interpretation. Critical-realist, conservative reader-response approaches acknowledge readers' contributions, but "believe (p 152) there is something in the text prior to the act of reading—gaps, indeterminacies, instructions, flags, and signals, for example—that governs their response" (Vanhoozer, "Reader," 318). Such readers will follow the text's cues, seeking to understand (via, e.g., grammatico-historical exegesis) before overstanding it (pursuing their own questions, interests, and aims), while more radical methods privilege the reader's freedom to overstand and/or undo it (ideology criticism's proper service; Clines).

In addition to general stances, readers' specific social locations and theological orientations both open up and occlude reception of Scripture. While the yields of self-conscious commitments might be presumed, the actual history of interpretation indicates that readers' particular positions and interests—theological and sociological—may interact in unexpected ways.

In the history of Christian interpretative practice in the United States, readings of the biblical exodus account exemplify several such approaches. They also illustrate the complicated dynamics of interpretation: the initial typological use of the exodus story by European settlers escaping Old World oppressions (Goldingay) was followed by their appeal to the conquest narrative to justify subjugation of Native American peoples and seizure of the land (Warrior). In 1637, New England Puritans, claiming OT warrant for making slaves of captives taken in a "just war," shipped the defeated Pequots to the West Indies in exchange for African slaves (Takaki 58).

As a Native American reflecting on the history of this text's reception and use, Warrior expresses misgivings concerning the church, Scripture, and the methodology of narrative theology (advocated by ethicists, liberationists, and others), in view of the proved capacity of the formerly oppressed to become oppressors (Goldingay). His account is instructive not only as a protest of de facto imperialist hermeneutical practices, but especially as a caveat: faith communities who remain sociohistorically unself-critical and self-referential in their theological and devotional readings of Scripture are susceptible to producing and actualizing ideological interpretations.

These instances also suggest that pursuit of singular interests and/or employment of exclusive methods will circumscribe theological understanding. “What we see in the text, especially in its implications, is what our experience, our gender, our social position, and our political affiliations have prepared us to see” (Elliott 12) in the first instance. Thus, readers’ explicit awareness of their personal, social, and ecclesial locations and interests (theological and other), including views represented in the history of interpretation, coupled with intentional interaction with interpreters outside their tradition—all such awareness is needed to help counteract tendencies to docetism and/or ethnocentrism (Craffert). An expanding knowledge of history’s ambiguities can discipline and deepen interpreters’ social self-understanding, enabling a greater critical-realist grasp of Scripture’s narrative and prophetic salience.

The cases above also demonstrate that a selective appropriation of Scripture—whether formally (sole use of any hermeneutical framework) or materially (anything less than tota Scriptura)—lends itself to misreading both parts and whole, which may result in the attenuation or inversion of genuine Christian identity and practice.

Culture and Theology

Theological construction—the integrative attempt to articulate the vision and instruction that the world projected by the canonical text provides for the world of lived existence—is another level at which the sociocultural factors contribute considerably to interpretative judgments. Although diverging as “prescriptions,” several proposals argue that context and the logic of cultural construction are constitutive of Christian identity and theological discourse.

Local Theologies. Robert Schreiter (Local) has called attention to the “local” character of theology, reframing the tradition as a series of local theologies; thus emergent “contextual” theologies can enter a nonpreemptive “gospel dialogue” with the tradition. Formally, many modes for theological reflection comprise the tradition: variations on sacred Scripture, wisdom, and praxis alongside scientia, sure knowledge (implying a decentering and supplementation of the academic genre). Materially, Schreiter’s proposed process for discerning Christian identity involves a theory relating local performances to the tradition, criteria (cohesion, translatability into worship, orthopraxis, openness to criticism, ability to challenge other theologies), norms (Scripture, creeds, etc.), and conditions for a successful mutual engagement of a theology and the tradition. His process offers evaluative resources, while suggesting further reflection on the status and uses of the tradition's constituents.

Contextual Theologies. Attending to context ("present human experience") as a valid source for theology is an intrinsic Christian imperative, says Stephen Bevans. "Contextual theologies" prioritize (p 153) variously the gospel, the tradition, a specified culture, and social change, as his fivefold typology shows. The translation model stresses preservation of the tradition; the anthropological, cultural "authenticity"; praxis, the need for social change; the synthetic model, all aspects equally; and the transcendental, the self-expression of a unique historical, cultural subject. Since "exclusive use will distort the theological enterprise" (28), a "healthy pluralism" will select circumstantially among these equally valid options.

Bevans's analysis formally accounts for theological pluralism and highlights the significance of concrete conditions for theology. However, context qua "locus theologicus" calls for qualification: though context is an indispensable source for theology, it is problematic that some models assign context revelatory status on a par with Scripture. Because limits, fallibility, and fallenness attend all group life, contexts are not self-interpreting or privileged sources in se, but normed by Scripture.

Schreier observes that under the impact of globalization, the concept of context itself has become increasingly deterritorialized and hyperdifferentiated (Catholicity). Notions of social identity and of space are constructed with greater attention to difference and to multiple belonging. These developments clearly add to the complexity and plurality of theological discourse.

Constructed Theologies. The logic of an a priori contextualism is intensified in Kathryn Tanner's proposal appropriating postmodern cultural theory. Its major tenets are a thoroughgoing constructionism and historicism and a neo-Marxian conception of theology as reflection on social practice. Since symbols are "bare essential forms," the theologian is "always ultimately making meaning rather than finding it" (93). Thus, she rejects the claim that Christian identity is the same as a coherent meaning-complex of any depth around which consensus obtains, and also tradition's putatively privileged status. Instead, the markers Christians commonly invoke can be detached from received interpretations, redeployed to criticize conventional practices, and used to argue for the theological sense of emergent markers. The unruly, largely nondetermined character of Christian symbols and practices should produce not worry over disagreements, but an extended argument: "discipleship is an essentially contested notion" (159) precisely because each is to live as a creative, critical, responsible agent. Christian identity, then, is not a given, but a task: “Our lives are our own construction.... The way we live could be different.... Established meanings and rules have no power of themselves to resist alteration [but are] held in place through the exercise of human power—by the will of the participants, by human institutions of social control, by the sanctions of human authorities, and by penalties against deviance” (169).

Tanner rightly dispels misconceptions of theology and practice as a monolithic, self-enclosed tradition by emphasizing Christians’ participation in wider societal life (hence the assimilability of many practices across permeable “boundaries”). She stresses the tradition’s diversity and the underdetermined, culturally adaptive, creative character of Christian practice due to its life- and globe-encompassing aspirations and to changing conditions. Yet, alongside the (related) view of God, the most debatable proposition is the indeterminacy of the symbol; as the object of a historical and living tradition of interpretation, the canonical text possesses both a determinate if complex semantic (historical, linguistic) range, and generative potential tied to the text. The poststructuralist insistence that signifiers may float and be reemployed at will (especially as disarticulated from the Bible’s narrative structures) distances itself from characteristic Christian belief and practice (however diversely developed) since the church’s inception.

A critical-realist hermeneutic recognizes a moderate form of contextualism and constructionism in our interpretative products, since communities and readers are positioned, conditioned, and invested variously (theologically, culturally, sociologically) with respect to the concrete and the biblical worlds. Still, radical forms of historicism and constructionism (attuned to difference and disagreement, and suspicious of claims of consensus) challenge the project of theological interpretation of Scripture to account for the diversity within the tradition and to demonstrate their theological coherence and convergence. Wherein does the actual unity of Christian interpretation consist, given the multiplicity of local, occasional readings? What are the implications of cultural particularity, partiality, and pluralism for our hermeneutical practice?

Contextual, Canonic, and “Catholic” Theologies. Vanhoozer (Drama, esp. ch. 10) argues that theology ultimately aims at a participatory understanding enabling Christian communities to speak, think, and live out the theodrama, the story of what God is doing in Christ for the sake of the world. A sapiential “canonical-linguistic” theology involves exegetical reason but especially (p 154) practical reason (phronēsis: forming fitting judgments about how to act in particular contexts), in order to “live well with others in the world to God's glory" (308). Word and Spirit operate conjointly. The Spirit empowers comprehension and actualization of the word (the canonical text: the church's Scripture and the Christian's script), leading readers into an imaginative grasp of text and context. Thereby the Spirit enables them to "follow the Scriptures into new territory, continuing the 'itineraries of meaning' indicated by the biblical text" (308). As a wisdom-oriented, canonically directed exercise of practical reason, theology is prosaic, expressed and enacted in everyday life. It also is phronetic, making contextually sensitive, biblically faithful, "improvisatory" decisions about rendering the "fit in Christ" in new situations for which there are no guaranteed procedures. And it is prophetic, as countercultural and contextual as the gospel requires.

This canonical-linguistic vision of theology articulates what is definitive for Christian identity (Christianity's core doctrines, rooted in the canon's authority as the triune God's communicative action), and the universality of this assent. It affirms the basic character and translatability of the canonical text as an instantiation of a concrete universal (the embedding of truths of transcultural significance in necessarily particular situations, words, and actions). It also accepts the cross-cultural, contextualizing nature of all Christian proclamation and action, and thus the respective contributions made by a "Pentecostal plurality" of such theologies, rendering and realizing the canon's theological potential (Walls; Sanneh). Moreover, theology's prosaic task of serving contemporary speech-act and moral action in ordinary life proceeds on phronēsis—discerning significant similarities between situations, thus reasoning with creative fidelity to Scripture via a theodramatically and canonically instructed metaphorical imagination (Hays).

However, the properly prosaic and phronetic character of a canonical-linguistic approach reintroduces the issue of culture(s) more acutely. The biblical texts preserve "a prosaic wisdom, ... practical reasoning incarnated" in a plurality of specific social contexts as well as literary genres. Since the Bible's explicit and implicit ethical instruction took the form of culture-specific practices in a series of concrete, changing environments in the ancient world, on many issues the canon represents a genuine dialogue. The diverse perspectives and practices the Bible incorporates are such that determining its teaching as a whole, and discerning its salience in a specific context, is no small task. Phronēsis, the next section suggests, is a complex matter, pervasively informed by culture.

Culture and Theological-Ethical Judgment. A major weakness of a “principlizing” approach to biblical ethics is the frequently culturally unself-conscious, inconsistent reasoning underlying judgments about how the culturally embedded biblical texts provide transculturally normative direction (Swartley; Vanhoozer, Drama). Aiming to bring greater clarity and coherence to contemporary ethical appropriation, Webb offers a method for interpretative assessment based on a crucial distinction concerning the nature of the Bible’s ethical teaching. That teaching is comprised both of the definitive revelation of an “ultimate” social ethic and a historical series of partially realized, concrete instantiations of it. Webb’s thesis is that the canonical text embodies and projects a “redemptive movement” hermeneutic, one indicating, in some cases, the possibility of “moving beyond the original application framings” in order to extend the scope of redemption in other contexts. In their given form the biblical utterances are intended to express and implement a further measure of redemption in their original life-settings. Subsequent interpreters, bearing in mind the Bible’s redemptive thrust, must distinguish between instances in which the practices detailed in a given text are intended to be reproduced without change in every context, and those intended as instructive paradigms for further redemptive action in their own situations. (A “static” hermeneutic, by contrast, tends to construe the NT’s “original application framings” as the limit-situations for actualizing redemption.) Certain postbiblical, sociocultural developments (e.g., in the U.S., institutionalized, mandatory [versus ad hoc, voluntary] changes to the earlier acceptance of slaveholding, many patriarchal practices, primogeniture-based inheritance laws) represent advances most Christians now recognize as more consistent with the biblical vision of creation and redemption. Strictly speaking, however, these practices surpass certain directives intended as first steps toward the fulfillment of the ultimate ethic the Bible envisages. To fulfill Scripture’s redemptive intent in and for all (differently configured) cultures, additional hermeneutical clarity is needed.

Webb suggests this might be gained by a cultural analysis of biblical texts, based on three standards of reference: the movement a practice represents in comparison to its “foreign” (p 155) context (the conventions of the ancient world); the “domestic” context (existing traditions or norms within the immediate covenant community); and the “canonical” context (across major salvation-history epochs, primarily from the OT to the NT). He also identifies sixteen intra- and two extra-scriptural criteria focusing and refining the transcultural/cultural assessment of specific texts on a given topic; further appraisal regarding relative force (from “persuasive” to “inconclusive”) yields cumulative patterns. The major test-cases examined are slavery, patriarchy, and homosexual practice: Webb demonstrates, via these criteria, that the biblical presentation of the first two institutions moves redemptively in the direction of reducing restrictions and disparities in status; the last is consistently rejected, despite its acceptance outside the community of faith. The Bible's differing stances show that individual assessment of topics is required.

This proposal's major strengths are the canonic-theological rootedness of the "redemptive movement" thematic, and the heuristic value of the formal and material criteria elicited for the transcultural/cultural assessment of texts. These strengths enable the coherence and trajectories as well as the diversity of biblical teaching to emerge within the metaframework of redemptive history. Extending the contributions of Hays, Swartley, and Longenecker, it invites additional critical and constructive work.

A socially self-aware, contextualizing phronēsis recognizes that, in many instances, contemporary readers may not properly appreciate, appropriate, or extend the redemptive and often countercultural force of biblical instruction apart from understanding its salience vis-à-vis the social systems and symbolic worlds within which they were originally specified. Thus, interpretation and practice will be enhanced as readers engage in comparative, thick cross-cultural and structural descriptions and ponder the distinctive ranges of constraint and possibilities God's people have faced and currently face, in the worlds behind, of, and in front of the biblical text.

The theological interpretation of Scripture, then, is essentially contextual, "canonic," and "catholic" (Vanhoozer, Drama). Only as the renewed attempts to engage with the canonical dialogue by particularly situated communities are enlarged by catholicity (e.g., seeking cross-cultural validation; Swartley) can interpreters incorporate a mutually instructive enrichment and a critical check on unreflexive ethnocentrism. This will help to ensure that it is the canonical text (and the redemptive movement of the theodramatic action it projects) that remains the norm and impetus for creative fidelity in a multiplicity of local interpretations.

See also Context; Ideological Criticism; Wisdom

Bibliography

Berger, P., and T. Luckmann. The Social Construction of Reality. Doubleday, 1996; Bevans, S. Models of Contextual Theology. Orbis, 1992; Clines, D. "Biblical Interpretation in an International Perspective." BibInt 1 (1993): 67–87; Craffert, P. "On New Testament Interpretation and Ethnocentrism." Pages 459–68 in Ethnicity and the Bible, ed. M. Brett. Brill, 2002; Elliott, J. A Home for the Homeless. Fortress, 1981; Geertz, C. The Interpretation of Cultures. Basic, 1973; Goldingay, J. "Hermeneutics."

Pages 387–401 in Dictionary of the Old Testament: Pentateuch, ed. T. D. Alexander and D. W. Baker. InterVarsity, 2003; Gonzalez, J. Out of Every Tribe and Nation. Abingdon, 1992; Hays, R. The Moral Vision of the New Testament. HarperSanFrancisco, 1996; Larkin, W., Jr. Culture and Biblical Hermeneutics. Baker, 1988; Longenecker, R. New Testament Social Ethics for Today. Eerdmans, 1984; MacIntyre, A. Whose Justice? Which Rationality? University of Notre Dame Press, 1988; Mouw, R., and S. Griffioen. Pluralisms and Horizons. Eerdmans, 1993; Niebuhr, H. R. Christ and Culture. Harper & Row, 1956; Sanneh, L. Translating the Message. Orbis, 1989; Schreier, R. Constructing Local Theologies. Orbis, 1985; idem. The New Catholicity. Orbis, 1997; Storey, J. An Introduction to Cultural Theory and Popular Culture. 2d ed. University of Georgia Press, 1998; Sugirtharajah, R., ed. Voices from the Margin. Orbis, 1995; Swartley, W. Slavery, Sabbath, War, and Women. Herald Press, 1984; Takaki, R. A Different Mirror. Little, Brown, 1993; Tanner, K. Theories of Culture. Fortress, 1997; Thiselton, A. The Two Horizons. Eerdmans, 1980; Vanhoozer, K. The Drama of Doctrine. Westminster John Knox, 2005; idem. “The Reader in New Testament Interpretation.” Pages 301–28 in Hearing the New Testament, ed. J. Green. Eerdmans, 1995; Walls, A. The Missionary Movement in Christian History. Orbis, 1996; Warrior, R. “A Native American Perspective: Canaanites, Cowboys, and Indians.” Pages 277–85 in Voices from the Margin, ed. R. Sugirtharajah. Orbis, 1995; Webb, W. “The Limits of a Redemptive-Movement Hermeneutic.” EvQ 74 (2003): 327–42; idem. Slaves, Women, and Homosexuals. InterVarsity, 2001; Wolterstorff, N. “Suffering, Power, and Privileged Cognitive Access: The Revenge of the Particular.” Pages 79–94 in Christianity and Culture in the Crossfire, ed. D. Hoekema and B. Fong. Eerdmans, 1997; Wright, N. T. The New Testament and the People of God. Fortress, 1992.

Elizabeth Yao-Hwa Sung

Custom      See Ancient Near Eastern Background Studies

(p 156) D

Daniel, Book of

History of Interpretation

Qumran. The eight manuscripts of Daniel found at Qumran indicate its importance for that community. Florilegium (4Q174) 2:3 cites Dan. 11:32 and 12:10, using the same citation-formula as for other biblical prophetic books. The Community Rule (1QS) echoes Dan. 11:33–34 in calling a teaching official a maskil, and the members of the community the rabbim. Although in column 1 it alludes to Dan. 11–12, the War Scroll (1QM) does not mention resurrection (Dan. 12:1–3).

Jewish Apocalyptic. In the Similitudes (Parables) of Enoch (ca. 50 CE) the figure called “that/the Son of Man” originates from Dan. 7:13. He casts down kings from their thrones, taking his seat on the throne of glory as a judge—probably based on Dan. 7:9–10. He is equated with the messiah in 1 En. 48:10; 52:4. First Enoch 70:1 distinguishes Enoch from the Son of Man, while in 71:14 the two seem to be identified. Some argue that 71:14 is simply comparing Enoch to the Son of Man, others that 1 En. 71 is a later addition and development of the tradition.

In 2 Esd. 13 (late first century CE) a wind stirs up the sea, out of which comes “the figure of a man” who “flew with the clouds of heaven” (cf. Dan. 7:1, 13). The man takes his stand on a great mountain that was “carved out without hands” (cf. Dan. 2:34). The preceding vision of an eagle that rises out of the sea (2 Esd. 11–12) refers to Dan. 7. The interpreting angel says that the eagle is the fourth kingdom of Daniel’s vision, but indicates that identifying it as Rome is an innovation (12:12).

Later Jewish Interpretation. Josephus (A.J. 10.10–11) counts the fourth kingdom in Dan. 2 as Rome, but refuses to comment on the stone, probably to avoid offending Roman readers by speaking of Rome’s downfall. This may explain why he ignores Dan. 7. Josephus identifies (p 157) the little horn of Dan. 8 with Antiochus Epiphanes. Also in Lev. Rab. 13:5, Rome is the fourth kingdom. Later commentators modify the interpretation to make Islam the fourth empire. The seventy weeks of Dan. 9:20–27 are usually interpreted as the period between the destruction of the first and second temples. The Talmud (b. Sanh. 97b) records a curse on those who try to calculate the date of the End. Nevertheless, various Jewish scholars attempted to do that by using the numbers in Daniel (see Silver).

Christian Interpretation. For Hippolytus (early third century) Christ is the stone in Dan. 2 and the fourth figure in the furnace in Dan. 3. The little horn of Dan. 8 is Antiochus, but the fourth kingdom in Dan. 7 is Rome and the little horn the antichrist. The birth of Christ comes after sixty-nine weeks of Dan. 9:20–27, with the last week referring to the distant future. Most other patristic commentators saw the seventy weeks fulfilled either in the life and death of Christ or in the destruction of Jerusalem. Jerome took the latter view. He defended the historicity and christological interpretation of Daniel against Porphyry. He opposed allegorization of the stories by Alexandrian exegetes such as Origen. Antiochus is the little horn in Dan. 8, and a type of the antichrist, who is the little horn of Dan. 7 and the subject of Dan. 11:24–45. Identification of references to the antichrist in Daniel continued into the Middle Ages. Dissident Catholics, such as Franciscans in the early fourteenth century and Jan Hus (d. 1415), identified the pope with the antichrist (see McGinn).

In Luther's preface to his translation of Daniel, the fourth empire is Rome, living on in the German Empire. Although threatened by the Turks (Muhammad is the little horn in Dan. 7), it would last until the coming of God's kingdom. He saw dual reference to Antiochus and the antichrist in Dan. 8 and 11. The antichrist is the sole subject of 11:36–45, where Luther saw references to the papacy. Luther wrote a more detailed exposition of Dan. 8 in terms of the antichrist/the pope.

John Calvin held that Daniel's visions extended only to the time of Nero. The fourth beast is the Roman Empire. The giving of the kingdom to the holy ones refers to the spread of the gospel. The little horn of Dan. 8 is Antiochus. The seventy weeks of Dan. 9 end with the coming of Jesus and the Romans' destruction of Jerusalem. Daniel 11:36–45 refers to the Roman Empire.

Late medieval apocalyptic millennialism drew inspiration from Daniel. Thomas Müntzer (ca. 1489/90–1525) defended the German Peasants' Revolt as the coming of the "fifth kingdom," the stone of Dan. 2. The "fifth monarchy men" in mid-seventeenth-century England saw themselves in similar terms. Another kind of apocalypticism is William Miller's (1782–1849) calculation, based on Dan. 8:14, that the world would end in 1843. The dispensational movement based on J. N. Darby's (1800–1882) teaching sees Daniel's prophecies culminating either in the coming of Jesus or in the "end times" yet to come (e.g., the whole or last half of the seventieth week).

A few seventeenth-century scholars, such as Hugo Grotius (1583–1645), argued that the fourth beast was Greece and that Daniel's prophecies refer only to the events of the Antiochene period. In the nineteenth century this was strongly advocated, with a second-century BCE date for the book, in commentaries by Bertholdt (1806), von Lengerke (1835), Hitzig (1850), Ewald (1868), and others. There was a strong response from conservative scholars such as Hengstenberg (1831), Pusey (1864), and Keil (1867).

Commentaries by F. W. Farrar (1895) and S. R. Driver (1900) popularized the German critical consensus among English readers. By the turn of the century this was the majority view, though the conservative position continued to be defended down through the twentieth century.

This survey shows that Daniel has often been a center of controversy, particularly over interpretation with regard to eschatology, but also regarding authorship and date. In the midst of this debate, the book's theological message has often been neglected; three approaches combine to help in discerning it. The growth of literary approaches to the OT is helpful, with emphasis on recognizing how different genres convey meaning. The study of intertextuality is particularly useful in Dan. 7–12; recognition of allusions to, or the reuse of, material from elsewhere in the OT provides important indicators of the underlying theology. Third, Childs's canonical approach rightly stresses the importance of understanding an OT text first in its own context, and then also in the context of the revelation of God in Christ in the NT.

The Message of Daniel

Daniel 1:1–2 introduces the theme of human and divine sovereignty. The Babylonian king's capture of Jerusalem and removal of some temple vessels to the treasury of his gods might evidence the superiority of Babylon's gods. Daniel 1:2 counters this. The Lord, the God of Israel, "gave" the king of Judah and the temple vessels into Nebuchadnezzar's power—for reasons not specified. The Lord is the ultimate sovereign, who "sets up kings and deposes them" (2:21a) and has a goal for history, the establishing of "a kingdom that will never be destroyed" (2:44). Nebuchadnezzar confesses that "he does what he wills with the host of heaven and the inhabitants of the earth" (4:34–35 NRSV) and, importantly, that "all his works are truth, and his ways are justice" (4:37 NRSV). God's rule is morally determined. The Ancient One judges the world powers, taking sovereignty from the bestial, subhuman powers and giving it to "one like a human being" (7:9–14 NRSV; NIV: "son of man"). In God's kingdom humanity reaches its full potential. Salvation history culminates in the achievement of God's purpose in creation—a world in which sovereignty is given to human beings (Gen. 1:26–28). However, God's people will experience suffering before receiving the kingdom (Dan. 7:21–22). The cry "How long?" (8:13) reinforces this point. Why does God's purpose sometimes seem to be frustrated? Daniel 9–11 provides a partial answer, countering any idea that God's sovereignty makes humans merely puppets. Daniel's prayer explains why the Lord gave Judah into the power of Babylon. This was a moral act, arising from Judah's persistent unfaithfulness to God. The prayer assumes that God responds to human behavior. Daniel 11 balances allusions to God's sovereignty (vv. 27, 29, 36, 45) with statements that, within limits, a human sovereign can "do as he pleases" (vv. 3, 16, 36).

Daniel 1 introduces a second major theme: human and divine faithfulness. Kings are prone to hubris, believing they can exercise a godlike sovereignty. As a result, those committed to God are challenged to a lifestyle of faithfulness. In Dan. 1 the issue is personal integrity. Daniel's stand is made privately and diplomatically. The Jews in Dan. 3 have to oppose idolatry publicly. The plot in Dan. 6, motivated by jealousy, is targeted at Daniel's religious practice because that seems the best way to succeed. Daniel could still pray to God secretly, but since his piety was well known, that would have been to compromise. In each case God is faithful to the faithful Jews. (p 158) The stories emphasize the Jews' preservation in the furnace or lions' den and not just their being saved from it. They are preserved because an angel mediates God's presence to them. In the context of the whole book, these stories are not simplistic promises of divine deliverance, but prepare the way for the intimations of suffering, persecution, and martyrdom of the faithful in chapters 7–12. They assert that God is faithful to his people and that his purposes will triumph.

In Dan. 1 God rewards Daniel's faithfulness by giving him exceptional wisdom. The stories emphasize the superiority of Daniel's wisdom over that of the Chaldeans. But God does not reveal things to satisfy curiosity. Nebuchadnezzar's dream about the tree is a warning against hubris and an opportunity to repent. The writing on the wall is a judicial sentence on Belshazzar's idolatrous blasphemy. The visions of Dan. 7–12 encourage the faithful to remain firm until the triumph of God's purpose. Those given wisdom are to use it to instruct others and to "lead many to righteousness" (11:33; 12:3).

Talk of angels enables talk about God's involvement in the world while preserving God's transcendence. Daniel 10:13 and 10:20–11:1 describe a struggle between heavenly beings, called the "princes" or "leaders" of Persia, Greece, and Israel. The main theological points expressed here are that history has a transcendent dimension, and that there is a synergy between events in heaven and on earth. What happens in heaven does not totally determine what happens on earth, and vice versa.

Daniel and the Canon

Given the different Hebrew and Greek forms of Daniel, canonical interpretation raises the question: Which canon? Childs argues for the primacy of the Hebrew canon, on the ground that only this corpus is common to both Jews and Christians, and so provides the theological bridge between the peoples of the two covenants. In practice, Daniel's inclusion in "the Writings" rather than "the Latter Prophets" in the Hebrew Bible is of little theological significance, since Jews usually treat Daniel as a prophetic book alongside those in the Latter Prophets.

Daniel and the OT. Daniel 4 echoes tree imagery in Ezek. 17, 19 (vine), and 31. Daniel 10 has verbal links with the theophanies in Ezek. 1–3 and 9–10. Daniel 9 contains parallels in thought and vocabulary with Lev. 26:27–45, a passage about sabbatical years and divine wrath. Daniel 9:2 refers explicitly to Jeremiah. Second Chronicles 36:20–21 understands Jeremiah's seventy years symbolically, as ten sabbatical cycles. This suggests that Dan. 9:24–27 is a symbolic, not a chronological, schema. The theological basis of the symbolism is the jubilee cycle (forty-nine years, seven sabbatical cycles, Lev. 25:8–12) as the prelude to release from slavery. In Daniel's schema one jubilee cycle leads to release from Babylon. This foreshadows the ultimate release after ten jubilee cycles (for more detail, see Lucas). Daniel 11:40–45 has verbal links with the prophecies about Assyria in Isa. 8, 14, 28, 37, and others in Ezekiel and Zechariah. Maybe it is not a detailed prediction about Antiochus's end, but a promise that that end will come, using the language of earlier prophets about the downfall of Assyria.

Daniel and the NT. Luke 20:18 concludes the parable of the Wicked Tenants with, "Everyone who falls on that stone will be broken to pieces; and it will crush anyone on whom it falls" (NRSV), alluding to Isa. 8:14–15 and Dan. 2:34–35. Jesus is identified with the stone that crushed the statue, and thus with the kingdom of God.

Scholars disagree about the background of the phrase "Son of Man" as used by Jesus, and how far the Synoptics reflect Jesus' own usage or develop it. The Synoptic sayings fall into three groups: (1) those about the future "coming" of the Son of Man with clouds and/or angels; (2) those about his suffering, death, and resurrection; (3) a small number about the present authority of the Son of Man. There is wide agreement that Dan. 7:13 lies behind the first group. These identify Jesus with the figure in Daniel who finally receives the kingdom, the coming of which was a central theme of Jesus' preaching. The idea of the Son of Man suffering may arise from his association with the suffering "people of" (7:27) "the holy ones of the Most High" (7:18, 22, 27 NRSV). Those who suffer martyrdom are promised resurrection and vindication (12:1–3). The third group may reflect the "dominion" given to the "one like a son of man" in

7:13.

Revelation's major antichrist figure is "the beast" that rises out of the sea and is a hybrid of Daniel's four beasts (Rev. 13:1–4). It shares features with the little horn in Dan. 7 and 8. The time for which it exercises authority (Rev. 13:5) seems based on Dan. 8:14. This is a reapplication of the theological significance of the little horn without any attempt to treat what Daniel says of it as detailed predictions about the antichrist.

(p 159) Daniel and Theology

Daniel presents a salvation-history metanarrative that integrates and interprets the smaller narratives within history. Postmodernists are averse to metanarratives, claiming that they are "oppressive." However, Daniel's metanarrative empowers the oppressed by challenging the metanarrative of the oppressor, who in his hubris seeks to shape history according to his will.

Although Daniel exposes the hubris of human rulers and the divine judgment it attracts, it also states that God gives rule and dominion to humans. Daniel 4:10–12 paints a picture of the good that can be achieved by human rulers. When humans image God, they have the right to rule in his name. When they try to be God, they forfeit that right and may become "bestial." Those who recognize God's rule over them are in a position to allow God to rule through them.

Because God allows rulers enough freedom to become bestial, the faithful sometimes suffer. Daniel's stories encourage the faithful to become involved in a pagan world, with the hope of some measure of success and effective witness, even if there are risks. In the visions this seems impossible. God's sovereignty means that the faithful cannot take his response to their situation for granted. Belshazzar's blasphemous conduct meets with swift retribution. That of the little horn is allowed much longer before being ended. The faithful may be delivered from death in a fiery furnace (ch. 3) or through death in the fires of persecution (ch. 12).

The references to "the wise" and the "many" whom they influence (Dan. 11:33; 12:3) may allude to the Suffering Servant of Isa. 52:13–53:12. If so, this emphasizes that the way to glory is faithful service, even through the suffering that this may bring. The response to the cry "How long?" is a call to endurance, trusting in the faithfulness of God and holding to hope of resurrection. Jesus, the Son of Man, exemplified this.

See also Apocalyptic

Bibliography

Archer, G. Jerome's Commentary on Daniel. Baker, 1958; Beale, G. The Use of Daniel in Jewish Apocalyptic Literature and in the Revelation of St. John. University Press of America, 1984; Calvin, J. A Commentary on Daniel. Banner of Truth, 1986 (reprint of the Calvin Translation Society edition of 1852–53); Childs, B. Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture. SCM, 1979; Collins, A. Y. "The Influence of Daniel on the New Testament." Pages 90–112 in Daniel, ed. J. Collins; Collins, J. Daniel. Hermeneia. Fortress, 1993; Collins, J., and P. Flint, eds. The Book of Daniel. 2 vols. Brill, 2001; Dunn, J. D. G. "The Danielic Son of Man in the New Testament." Pages 528–49 in vol. 2 of The Book of Daniel, ed. J. Collins and P. Flint; Fewell, D. Circle of Sovereignty. Abingdon, 1991; Goldingay, J. Daniel. WBC. Word, 1989; Knowles, L. "The Interpretation of the Seventy Weeks of Daniel in the Early Fathers." WTJ 7 (1944): 136–60; Lucas, E. Daniel. Apollos OT Commentary. Apollos/InterVarsity, 2002; McGinn, B. Visions of the End. Columbia, 1979; Russell, D. S. Daniel. Saint Andrew Press, 1989; Silver, H. A History of Messianic Speculation in Israel. Macmillan, 1927.

Ernest C. Lucas

Dead Sea Scrolls

Discovered in 1947–56, the Dead Sea Scrolls (DSS) preserve the library holdings of a group of Essenes who established themselves at Qumran around 100 BCE. There are around a hundred thousand scrolls, yet all but a handful of them survive only in fragments. Together they represent some 930 manuscript copies of approximately 350 different literary compositions that may be divided into three general categories: (1) Biblical texts. Among the biblical scrolls and fragments are copies of virtually every book of the Hebrew Bible, with the sole exception of Esther and possibly Nehemiah, although the latter may be represented in absentia if Ezra and Nehemiah were originally one book. (2) Parabiblical texts. From a modern point of view, the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha may not be canonical, but some of these books had scriptural status among various Jewish groups. Besides fragments of previously known works such as Tobit, Ben Sira, the Epistle of Jeremiah, all parts of 1 Enoch except for the Similitudes, and Jubilees, the DSS have yielded new texts associated with such figures as Noah, Jacob, Levi, Rachel, Joseph, Qahat, Amram, Joshua, Samuel, David, and Daniel. Many of the pre-Qumran works in this category survive in Aramaic instead of Hebrew. (3) Sectarian texts. These works represent the in-house literature not just copied but also composed by and for members of the Qumran community. A variety of genres are represented under this heading, including (a) rule books such as the Community Rule, the Damascus Document, and the Messianic Rule; (b) hymns and poetic works such as the Thanksgiving Hymns and Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice; (c) calendrical and liturgical texts (e.g., priestly courses, calendric signs, and Words of the Heavenly Luminaries); (d) apocalyptic works (e.g., 11Q Melchizedek, 4Q521 Messianic Apocalypse, 4Q246 Aramaic Son of God text); (e) Wisdom literature (e.g., 4Q525 Beatitudes); (f) commentaries on scriptural texts (e.g., the pesharim associated with several books (p 160) of the Prophets); and (g) midrashic reworkings of biblical works (e.g., Reworked Pentateuch and Genesis Apocryphon).

For interpreting the theological message of Scripture, the DSS shed considerable light on the textual form, canonical shape, and exegesis of the Hebrew Scriptures at the turn of the eras. They also provide comparative leverage for appreciating the distinctive theology of the NT writings.

The Scrolls and the OT

The biblical manuscripts among the DSS number around 220, a little over a fourth of the library. The majority (140) come from cave 4. As with the library in general, the state of their preservation varies widely. The oldest biblical manuscripts (4QSamb, 4QJera, 4QExodb) date to the end of the third century BCE and are therefore more than a thousand years older than the oldest previously known manuscripts. Among their library holdings, the Qumran Essenes had multiple copies of most scriptural books, the most popular being the Psalms (36 copies), Deuteronomy (30), and Isaiah (21). These happen to be the very ones most often quoted in the NT.

The biblical scrolls from Qumran have helped to clarify that there was no “Bible” before the end of the first century CE. There were collections of sacred writings (“scriptures”) but no official canon, no fixed collection of books accepted as authoritative and normative for all Jews. And there was no fixed textual form for each book up until about 100 CE or even as late as the end of the second Jewish revolt against Rome (132–35 CE).

The biblical DSS may be grouped into at least four broad textual categories (Tov). (1) Proto-Masoretic texts resemble the text of a particular book in the developing MT tradition. By one calculation, some fifty-seven, 47 percent, of the Qumran biblical scrolls fall in this category, including 1QIsab, 4QJera, c, and 4QEzra. The actual figure, however, may be much lower, since twenty of the twenty-four Pentateuchal texts in this category are equally close to the Samaritan Pentateuch (SP). (2) Proto-Samaritan texts are those bearing affinities with the text of the SP. Qumran Scrolls in this category comprise around 6.5 percent of the Qumran pentateuchal manuscripts, or 2.5 percent of all the biblical scrolls and include such manuscripts as 4QpaleoExodm, 4QExod-Levf, and 4QNumb.

(3) Septuagintal texts are those that look like the putative Hebrew text behind the Greek translation of a particular book in the LXX. Texts in this group represent only some 3 to 4 percent of the Qumran biblical scrolls and include 4QDeut<sub>q</sub>, 4QSam<sub>q</sub>, and 4QJer<sub>b</sub>. (4) Nonaligned texts have no strong affinity with any of the above text types. This group is, in fact, a broad rubric for numerous forms of the biblical text. Qumran scrolls that fall into this category number approximately fifty-seven, or 47 percent, including 4QDeut<sub>b, c, h</sub>, 4QIsac, and 4QDana.

Several books of the Hebrew Scriptures seemed to have existed in multiple literary editions (Ulrich). The identification of a distinct literary edition centers on recognizing large-scale patterns in the variants in a manuscript or manuscripts. Many biblical books evidently were the product of a long, complex literary process involving numerous authors, editors, and copyists through several generations and even centuries. Among the biblical scrolls from the Judean desert, variant literary editions are most evident for Exodus, Numbers, Joshua, Jeremiah, and Psalms. The sheer variety of textual forms exhibited among the biblical DSS suggests that the Essenes at Qumran—and likely other Jewish groups in the Second Temple period—did not assign sacred status or authority to only one textual form of certain scriptural books, but to the book or tradition as such. Their various methods of interpreting Scripture, from rewriting it to reading it as prophecy pointing toward their own history and experience, show that they regarded Scripture as a living tradition and treated it as such.

The official rabbinic canon (Tanak) eventually had three divisions: the Law (Torah), the Prophets (Nevi'im), and the Writings (Ketubim). Such a threefold division, or perhaps even a fourfold one, may be attested, albeit not very clearly, in the halakic document 4QMMT. This pre-Qumran work from the second century BCE speaks of “the books of Moses” and “the books of the Prophets” and mentions “Davi[d]” (a reference to the Psalter?) and “[the events] of ages past” (a reference to the historical books Joshua–2 Kings and/or Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah[?]). By the latter part of the Second Temple period, most Jews recognized the Torah or Pentateuch as authoritative, and this was certainly the case at Qumran. But not all Jewish groups necessarily limited the Mosaic Torah to only five books (Genesis to Deuteronomy). The Qumran Essenes evidently regarded Jubilees, the Temple Scroll, and the Reworked Pentateuch as sacred books of Moses. Most Jewish communities also recognized the books of the Prophets as sacred Scripture. Here again, the Essene group at Qumran was no exception, as both the number of copies of prophetic (p 161) books and the existence of commentaries on them attest. However, it is not clear which books and how many books each group put in this category, or in what order they put them. It is also unclear whether a third distinct category of books (such as the Writings in the rabbinic canon) existed before about 100 CE. If it did, it did not necessarily contain only the books included in the rabbinic canon (Psalms to Chronicles).

The Scrolls and the NT

The community of Essenes who copied and composed the DSS overlapped with the early Jesus movement for a period extending about four decades. Most of the DSS, though, are pre-Christian, and all of them are non-Christian. Despite the idiosyncratic claims of a few scholars, no NT figures are mentioned or alluded to in the Scrolls. Still, the DSS have shed welcome light on the Jewish matrix of Christian origins by providing parallels to the NT in terminology, conceptuality, literary genres, biblical interpretative methods, religious practices, and theological beliefs. Some of the parallels in theological terminology and belief are especially noteworthy.

Terminology. Both the Essenes of Qumran and the early Christians referred to themselves as members of “the Way” (Acts 9:2; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22; cf., e.g., 1QS 9.17–18; CD 1.13). The expression “(the) many/majority” (2 Cor. 2:6; cf. Mark 14:24 et par.) to designate the community or congregation appears as ha-rabbim several times in the community rules 1QS and CD. The word ha-mebaqqer, “guardian, overseer,” a title found in the sectarian rule books (e.g., 1QS 6.13; CD 13.5–7; 15.5–6, 10–11), may be the Hebrew equivalent of episkopos, “bishop, overseer” in the NT (Acts 20:28; Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:2; Titus 1:7). The phrase “poor in spirit” (Matt. 5:3) surfaces in 1QM 14.7 and 1QH 14.3, and the antithetical formulation “You have heard that it was said, ... but I tell you” in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:21–48) resembles the rhetorical structure “You know, ... but we think/say” now found in 4QMMT. Furthermore, not a few expressions familiar from the letters of Paul have parallels in the Scrolls. Among them are “the righteousness of God” (Rom. 1:17; 3:5, 21, 22; 10:3; 2 Cor. 5:21; 1QM 14.5–6; 1QS 10.25; 11.12), “righteous/just judgment” (Rom. 2:5–6; 1QH 1.23, 30), “Spirit of holiness” (Rom. 1:4; 1QS 4.21; 8.16; 9.3; CD 2.12; 1QH 7.6–7; 9.32), “sinful flesh” (Rom. 8:3; 1QS 11.9; cf. 1QM 4.3), and “mystery” in the sense of divine secret (Rom. 16:25; 1 Cor. 2:7; 1QpHab 7.5).

Righteousness and Faith. The concepts of righteousness and faith have featured in discussion of the theological appropriation of a particular OT verse in Paul and the DSS. According to Hab. 2:4b NRSV, “The righteous [will] live by their faith [or: faithfulness, emunah].” Paul applies the verse to those who have faith in Christ: “The one who is righteous will live by faith” (Rom. 1:17 NRSV; Gal. 3:11). The Habakkuk Commentary from Qumran quotes the same verse and comments: “Interpreted, this concerns all those who observe the Torah in the house of Judah, whom God will free from the house of judgment on account of their suffering [or: their toil/work, ‘amlam’] and their faith in [or: their fidelity to, loyalty to, emunatam] the Teacher of Righteousness” (1QpHab 8.1–33). ). Understood as loyalty or fidelity, the faith of believers in Christ may not be that much different from the Qumran sectarians’ faith in their founder, the Teacher of Righteousness, insofar as both involve commitment. Two differences are notable, though. First, the Qumran text applies the Habakkuk verse to the sectarians’ Torah observance, which may also be the referent of ‘amlam’ understood as “their observance”; this strikes a decidedly different note than Paul’s emphasis on faith apart from Torah observance. Second, the Teacher of Righteousness apparently was not for the Essenes the object of faith as Jesus was for his followers. However much they revered the Teacher, the Jews at Qumran did not attribute any saving significance to his death or see themselves as mystically united to him. The DSS therefore speak not so much of faith in the person of the Teacher of Righteousness as of faith in or fidelity to the path he had marked out for them and to the divinely revealed approach to Scripture he had mediated.

Works of the Law. One of the most important parallels is the expression “works of the law.” Paul uses the phrase (erga nomou) in Rom. 3:20, 28; Gal. 2:16 (3x); 3:2, 10. It occurs nowhere in the Hebrew Bible or rabbinic literature, and before the discovery of the Scrolls it was considered a Pauline neologism. Now it is found in the Florilegium (4Q174 1.1–2.i.7; cf. 1QS 5.21; 6.18 for the formulation “his observances in the law”) and, most revealingly, in the halakic document 4QMMT (C 29). The abbreviation for this writing is an acronym derived from its use of the expression miqtsat ma’ase hattorah, “some of the works of the law.” This document appears to be a manifesto of the Essenes or their progenitors before they left Jerusalem and before they or an offshoot of them moved to Qumran. It contains a (p 162)calendar that may or may not be original to it, a list of more than twenty legal issues on which they and their opponents disagree, and an exhortation to a person (“you”) whom they try to win over to their position. Three parties are thus in view, a “we” party, a “you” (singular) party, and a “they” party. The document was initially identified as a letter from the Teacher of Righteousness to the “Wicked Priest,” the sect’s principal opponent. Yet it does not have the form of a letter, and the precise identity of both the senders and the recipient is unclear, though the addressee may well have been the current high priest, perhaps even the one who would become the Wicked Priest.

Eschatology and Messianism. Both the Qumran Essenes and the members of the early Jesus movement had an intense awareness that they were living in the last times (e.g., 1QpHab 2.5–6; 1QS<sub>a</sub> 1.1; Acts 2:17). Early Christians located themselves further along the eschatological time line than did the covenanters of Qumran. For the Christians, the new age had already dawned, the kingly rule of God in the earth had already begun, and the Messiah had already come. Yet both groups had a charismatic founder, and both read and interpreted Scripture in actualizing ways while seeing their respective movements as the fulfillment of biblical prophecy. Both could speak of themselves as children of light and of everyone else as children of darkness. Both viewed themselves as predestined by God to their elect status and their final salvation.

Although the Qumran Essenes were, like the earliest Christians, an apocalyptic movement, and though they composed works with apocalyptic features and copied older apocalypses such as 1 Enoch and Jubilees, they evidently did not compose any full-blown apocalypses themselves. Yet one of the works found in fragments at Qumran and Masada, the Angelic Liturgy or Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice, shares with the NT Apocalypse (Revelation) of John particular themes. Examples are the heavenly temple and heavenly worship, and specific motifs, such as silence in heaven (Rev. 8:1; 4Q403 1.i.40–46) and an animate heavenly altar (Rev. 9:13–14; 4Q405 frag. 20, 2.21–22 [= 11 Q17], lines 12–13). One of the major sectarian scrolls, the War Rule (1QM and cave 4 fragments), has in common with Revelation the expectation of an end-time battle between the forces of good and evil. And the pre-Qumran New Jerusalem text shares with Rev. 21 an extensive reliance on Ezek. 40–48. Both have a heavenly guide who measures the architecture and offers occasional explanations, a gargantuan size for the city, an emphasis on the twelve tribes of Israel, and an interest in precious stones and metals.

Messianic expectation also features in both the DSS and the NT but with some profound differences. The Essenes of Qumran may have expected the Teacher of Righteousness to have an eschatological counterpart in a priestly messiah, who would function as “Interpreter of the Law” and “teach righteousness at the end of days.” But they did not regard the Teacher as a messiah, they attached no redemptive significance to his death, and they did not expect him to come back from the dead or down from heaven as God’s final agent of redemption. Nor did they worship him. For their part, most early Christians did not pull out of mainstream society and retreat to the isolation of the desert, as the Qumran Essenes did. The Christian movement was open to Jews of all persuasions and to Gentiles as well. Not so with the Qumran Essenes. What is more, the Qumran Jews were devoted to the ideals of celibacy, ritual purity, and Torah observance in a way that did not characterize most forms of Christianity. Then, too, messianism was and remains much more prominent a belief in Christianity than it has ever been in Judaism or ever was at Qumran.

The Scrolls anticipate a division of messianic labor and envisage the one coming of multiple messiahs, whereas the NT speaks of the two comings of the one messiah and of several messianic tasks being performed by Jesus alone. It is customary to speak of two messiahs at Qumran: the royal, Davidic “messiah of Israel” and the priestly “messiah of Aaron” (e.g., 1QS 9.11; 1Qsa 2.14, 19–20; CD 12.23; 14.19; 19.10 [= ms. B, 1.10]; 20.1 [= ms. B, 2.1]). The “messiah of Israel” is also given other, biblically derived titles such as “Branch of David” (e.g., 4Q174; 4QpIsaa; 4Q285; 4Q252) and “Prince of the Congregation” (e.g., CD 7.19–20; 4Q285). His main job is to play the role of conquering warrior at the end of days. The priestly messiah of Aaron always takes precedence over the royal messiah; his eschatological functions include providing atonement and giving instruction in and proper interpretation of the Torah. He is probably the referent of the titles “the Interpreter of the Law” (e.g., 4Q174; CD 7.18) and the one “who will teach righteousness at the end of days” (CD 6.11). Besides these two figures, however, the Scrolls speak about an eschatological figure known as the Prophet (1QS 9.10–11; the same figure may be in view in 11QMelch 2.18; 4QTest 5–8, citing Deut. 18:18–19). And 4Q521 seems to envision an Elijah-type prophet-messiah. Further, two key scrolls invest the archangel (p 163) Michael with a major role in eschatological salvation (1QM 17; 11QMelch). In view of the functions served by these various eschatological figures, then, it may be proper to speak of not two but four messiahs in Qumran expectation, even if only two are regularly called messiah. Overall, the distinctive feature of NT messianism is that it applies variations of all four paradigms—royal, priestly, prophetic, heavenly—to a single figure.

Conclusion. Familiarity with the DSS has become indispensable for a well-rounded theological interpretation of both the OT and NT. For interpreters of the OT, the DSS provide an invaluable glimpse into the state of the text and canon of the Hebrew Scriptures at the turn of the eras, as well as insight into how one Jewish group interpreted and applied those Scriptures to themselves. For readers of the NT, the DSS provide a treasure trove of parallels in theological beliefs. In all this they supply a crucial historical contextualization of the witness of Scripture, in respect to both the continuities and discontinuities of Christianity's relation to early Judaism.

Bibliography

Abegg, M., P. Flint, and E. Ulrich. The Dead Sea Scrolls Bible. HarperSanFrancisco, 1999; Charlesworth, J., ed. Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls. Doubleday, 1992; idem. John and the Dead Sea Scrolls. Reprint, Crossroad, 1991; Collins, J. The Scepter and the Star. Doubleday, 1995; Fitzmyer, J. The Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Origins. Eerdmans, 1999; Flint, P., and J. VanderKam, eds. The Dead Sea Scrolls after Fifty Years. 2 vols. Brill, 1999; Murphy O'Connor, J., and J. Charlesworth, eds. Paul and the Dead Sea Scrolls. Reprint, Crossroad, 1990; Schiffman, L., and J. VanderKam, eds. The Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls. 2 vols. Oxford University Press, 2000; Stegemann, H. The Library of Qumran. Eerdmans/Brill, 1998; Stendahl, K., with J. Charlesworth, eds. The Scrolls and the New Testament. Reprint, Crossroad, 1992; Tov, E. Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible. 2d ed. Van Gorcum/Fortress, 2001; Ulrich, E. The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Origins of the Bible. Eerdmans/Brill, 1999; VanderKam, J., and P. Flint. The Meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls. HarperSanFrancisco, 2002; Vermes, G. The Complete Dead Sea Scrolls in English. Penguin, 1997.

Daniel C. Harlow

DeathSee Creation; Last Things, Doctrine of; Original Sin; Sin, Doctrine of

Decalogue See Ethics; Law

Deconstruction

Deconstruction is far more than another “neutral” method of interpretation. It involves a critique of Western philosophy and of the entire hermeneutical tradition. Consequently, to begin to grasp the implications of deconstruction we must suspend any idea of deconstruction as just another dish on the hermeneutical smorgasbord. Here we explore its theoretical roots and shape before examining more closely its implications for theological interpretation.

“Deconstruction” is the word that has come to describe Jacques Derrida’s philosophy. Derrida (1930–2004) derived the term “deconstruction” from Heidegger’s Destruktion:

When I made use of this word, I had the sense of translating two words from Heidegger at a point where I needed them in the context. These two words are Destruktion, which Heidegger uses, explaining that Destruktion is not a destruction but precisely a destructuring that dismantles the structural layers in the system, and so on. The other word is Abbau, which has a similar meaning: to take apart an edifice in order to see how it is constituted or deconstituted. (Derrida, Ear, 86–87)

Naming his philosophy “deconstruction” was not his choice; according to Derrida, the word was seized upon by some of his readers. For most English readers, Derrida’s thought is so difficult when first encountered that it is easily seen as wholly new, but this is not the case. Paul de Man and Derrida are the major figures in deconstructive postmodernism, but its roots push down into the soil of phenomenology, structuralism, Heidegger, and Nietzsche.

A chance hearing of a broadcast about Camus led Derrida to enroll at the École Normale for philosophy classes. His main early influence was Sartre. By 1957 Derrida was planning a doctorate on “The Ideality of the Literary Object,” inspired by the reading of Husserl and phenomenological aesthetics, but this was never completed. At his thesis defense in 1980 Derrida explained some of the reasons for not completing the original project. Most important was his reading of Husserl, which led him to discern problems with phenomenological inquiry, problems with writing and the literary aspects of philosophy.

In the process of developing his critique of phenomenology and of Husserl in particular, Derrida came to share Heidegger’s criticism of the metaphysics of Western philosophy and of ontotheology. Such a critique is anticipated in Nietzsche, and though “he has refrained from offering a comprehensive commentary on Nietzsche’s thought, Derrida often avails himself of Nietzschean motifs, and Nietzsche is either named or implicated in virtually every work to which Derrida has appended his signature” (p 164)(Schrift 95). In Derrida’s critique of Husserl, signs play a central role, and Derrida’s deconstruction of Saussure, the father of structuralism, is fundamental to his project.

Much could be written about metaphysics, ontotheology, and presence. Briefly and simply put, they refer to strategies of finding an Archimedean point amid the flux of history, whereby one discerns the true meaning of things, texts, and so on. This point might be Plato’s ideas or Husserl’s consciousness, but they all have in common the promise of an absolute and secure knowledge. In that knowledge we would be able to see the world sub specie aeternitatis, to peek over God’s shoulder, as it were, from a standpoint far away from the play of the world.

Regarding hermeneutics, Derrida sees the approach of seeking to decipher the true meaning of texts as a manifestation of the metaphysics of presence. At the well-known ending of his essay “Structure, Sign, and Play,” Derrida (Writing, 292–93) discerns two types of interpretation. “The one,” he says, “seeks to decipher, dreams of deciphering a truth or origin which escapes play and the order of the sign, and which lives the necessity of interpretation as an exile. The other, which is no longer turned toward the origin, affirms play and tries to pass beyond man and humanism, the name of man being the name of that being who, throughout the history of metaphysics or of ontotheology—in other words throughout his whole history—has dreamed of full presence, the reassuring foundation, the origin and end of play.”

In terms of philosophy of language, a helpful way to understand what is at stake in deconstruction is to attend to the role of ideality (Wolterstorff). The doctrine of ideality, which comes from Frege in particular, distinguishes between authorial intention and the element in language that remains constant and fixes meaning: ideality. Gadamer and Ricoeur distance themselves from strong connections between authorial intention and meaning but retain a doctrine of ideality. Derrida problematizes ideality, especially in Speech and Phenomena, by exposing its aporia. An ideal meaning is never a pure presentation to begin with; it is a re-presentation. Thus, there can be no purely “ideal” meaning; there is only an endless series of reverberations. What presents itself is the representation of nonpresence, what Derrida calls “otherness,” “difference,” or “alterity,” thereby opening meaning up to flux and play and endless deferral.

The implications of this deconstruction of ideality are radical, and Derrida develops an arsenal of techniques for setting texts in play. However, it is important to note that Derrida’s problematizing of ideality, and thus the metaphysics of presence, never means finally abandoning ideality or the metaphysics of presence for an alternative position, which for Derrida does not exist. The result is that there are always two poles or two ways in Derrida’s thought. Authorial intent is that indispensable guardrail for interpretation (metaphysics of presence), but it never “opens” a reading (play and flux). The logic of deconstruction leads one toward flux and play, but Derrida always tries to hold on to both at the same time.

Theologically, responses to Derrida have varied considerably, ranging from Mark Taylor and Caputo to Ward, Milbank, Pickstock, and others. Taylor and Caputo are much enamored with Derrida and reshape theology along the lines of deconstruction. Ward argues that deconstruction supplements Barth’s theology with an adequate postmodern philosophy of language. A fascinating aspect of Derrida’s work is his regular engagement with the Bible. He often refers to biblical texts and motifs, and he has focused in particular on the tower of Babel narrative and the Akedah (Binding of Isaac; Gen. 22). But Ward’s argument is belied by a comparison of Derrida’s actual handling of biblical texts with Barth’s theological interpretation.

Take Derrida's reading of the tower of Babel narrative, for example. For Derrida, it is a metanarrative, the narrative of narratives. Derrida takes the narrative to be about the origin of the multiplicity of mother tongues. For what, Derrida asks, does God punish the Shemites? It is for having desired and sought by themselves a singular and universal genealogy. Derrida understands God's punishment in terms of the misunderstanding that results from a multiplicity of tongues. He sums this up in terms of translation: God imposes, as it were, the necessity and impossibility of translation. Out of God's jealousy and resentment against that single and unique lip of men, says Derrida, Yahweh violently imposes his name. Derrida takes Babel to be God's name, which God proclaims over the city! Derrida connects God's name "Babel" with Yahweh, observing that the text says this YHWH, an unpronounceable name, descends toward the tower. And the war God thus declares has already raged in God's name, Babel. Babel is a proper noun and simultaneously, according to Derrida, functions as a common noun signifying confusion.

(p 165) Derrida's performative setting of the tower of Babel narrative in play is intriguing in the way it brings the story of Babel into relationship with language and translation. But the story is not read in its canonical context, and the interpretation of Babel as the name of God is exegetically wrong and theologically a serious distortion (Bartholomew). Likewise, his secularized reading of Kierkegaard's reading of Gen. 22 in The Gift of Death is also miles away from Barth's positive style of theological interpretation of the Bible. Ward may be right that Barth's theology of language does require a supplement, but certainly not a Derridean one.

In my view the most insightful theological analysis of deconstruction is that by George Steiner (Real Presences). He acknowledges Derrida's great contribution toward dismantling the fortress of consciousness so utterly central to modernity. However, for Steiner deconstruction confronts us ultimately with a religious choice; either nihilism—the ultimate destination of Derrida's work—or "In the beginning was the Word." If Steiner is right, then it will be apparent that deconstruction will not be of great help to theological interpretation. Indeed, while there are significant examples of the use of deconstruction in biblical interpretation (see the article on Postmodernity), few of these are examples of theological interpretation. We should be grateful for Derrida's critique of modernity and for his engagement with biblical and theological issues such that they are on mainstream philosophical agendas nowadays. But he will provide us with little help in developing a positive theological hermeneutic.

For theological interpretation, Derrida's major challenge is philosophical and especially at the level of philosophy of language. This has implications for theological interpretation in that any contemporary theological hermeneutic will need to account for language better than postmoderns such as Derrida. As Milbank asserts, "If Derrida can give a gnostic hermeneutic of the human text in the light of the gnostic logos, then we should have the confidence to give a Christian hermeneutic in the light of the real one" (79).

Bibliography

Bartholomew, C. "Babel and Derrida: The Challenge of Postmodernism for Biblical Interpretation." TynBul 49, no. 2 (1998): 305–28; Caputo, J. The Prayers and Tears of Jacques Derrida. Indiana University Press, 1997; Derrida, J. The Ear of the Other. Schocken, 1985; idem. The Gift of Death. University of Chicago Press, 1995; idem. Speech and Phenomena and Other Essays on Husserl's Theory of Signs. Northwestern University Press, 1973; idem. "Des Tours de Babel." Pages 165–207 in Difference in Translation, ed. J. Graham. Cornell University Press, 1985; idem. Writing and Difference. University of Chicago Press, 1978; Ingraffia, B. Postmodern Theory and Biblical Theology. Cambridge University Press, 1995; Milbank, J. The Word Made Strange. Blackwell, 1997; Schrift, A. D. Nietzsche and the Question of Interpretation. Routledge, 1990; Steiner, G. Real Presences. Faber & Faber, 1989; Ward, G. Barth, Derrida and the Language of Theology. Cambridge University Press, 1995; Wolterstorff, N. "The Promise of Speech-Act Theory for Biblical Interpretation." Pages 73–90 in After Pentecost, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2001.

Craig G. Bartholomew

Demons      See Angels, Doctrine of; Powers and Principalities

Demythologization      See Hermeneutics; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary; Western Literature, the Bible and

Derrida, Jacques      See Deconstruction; Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation

Descartes, René      See Epistemology

Determinate Meaning      See Meaning; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

Deuteronomistic History      See Deuteronomy, Book of; History of Israel

Deuteronomy, Book of

The theological significance of Deuteronomy can scarcely be overestimated. Inasmuch as this book offers the most systematic presentation of truth in the entire OT, we may compare it to Romans in the NT. On the other hand, since Deuteronomy reviews Israel's historical experience of God's grace as recounted in Genesis–Numbers, a comparison with the Gospel of John may be more appropriate. Having had several decades to reflect on the significance of Jesus, John produced a profoundly theological Gospel, less interested in the chronology of the life of Christ, and more concerned with its meaning. Similarly, according to Deuteronomy's internal witness, Moses has had almost four decades to reflect on the exodus from Egypt and Yahweh's establishment of a covenant relationship with Israel. Like John, Deuteronomy functions as a theological manifesto, calling Israel to respond to God's grace with unreserved loyalty and love.

(p 166)History of Interpretation

Deuteronomy is the fifth and final book of what Jewish tradition knows as the Torah, and Christians refer to it as the Pentateuch. In popular Hebrew tradition, the book is called Sefer Devarim, “Book of Words,” which is an adaptation of the official Hebrew name,

Elleh Haddebarim, “These are the Words,” the first two words of the book. In the third century BCE the LXX translators set the course for its history of interpretation. Instead of translating the Hebrew To Biblion tōn Logōn, “The Book of Words,” or more simply Logoi, “Words,” they replaced this with To Deuteronomion, “Second Law” (Latin: Deuteronomium). The form of the name seems to be derived from Deut. 17:18, where Hebrew mishneh hattorah, “a copy of the Torah,” is misinterpreted as to deutero-nomion. This Greek heading probably became determinative because the book reiterates many laws found in Exodus–Numbers, and in chapter 5 cites the Decalogue almost verbatim. But the name “Deuteronomy” overlooks the fact that the book presents itself not primarily as law but as a series of sermons. Much of the book reviews events described in the earlier books. Where laws are dealt with (e.g., the central sanctuary law in ch. 12), the presentation is often exposition rather than recital of the laws themselves.

Prior to source criticism, both Jewish and Christian readers assumed Mosaic authorship, a fact reflected in the common designation of the pentateuchal books outside the English world as the Five Books of Moses. For the former, as the work of Moses it came with profound authority (cf. Mark 10:3; 12:19; Luke 20:28;

John 5:45; 9:28; etc.). Observing Jesus' manner, some looked upon him as the eschatological prophet like Moses, whom Yahweh would raise up (Deut. 18:15; cf. Matt. 11:9; John 1:21, 25; 6:14; 7:40). While Jesus himself rejected this role (John 1:21), judging by his number of quotations, Deuteronomy was Jesus' favorite book. This impression is reinforced by his distillation of the entire law into the simple command to love the Lord with one's whole being and to love one's neighbor as oneself. In the Pentateuch, although appeals for loving one's neighbor and the stranger occur earlier (Lev. 19:18, 34), the command to love God appears only in Deuteronomy (6:5; 11:1; 11:13; 13:3; 30:6).

Paul repeatedly cites Deuteronomic texts (Rom. 10:19; 11:8; 12:19; 1 Cor. 5:13; 9:9; Eph. 6:2–3; etc.). However, it is clear that Paul interpreted the entire history of God's revelation and also Deuteronomy in light of Christ and the cross (Rom. 10:6–8; 1 Cor. 8:6; Gal. 3:13). He seems to have functioned as a second Moses, not only providing a profoundly theological interpretation of God's saving actions in Christ, but also reminding readers that salvation comes by grace alone. In Romans and Galatians Paul's argumentation addresses those who would pervert the "law" (a narrow legalistic interpretation of Hebrew torah) into a means of salvation, rather than treating it as a response to salvation (cf. Schreiner; N. T. Wright). While on the surface Paul's responses to this heresy often appear to contradict Moses, such statements should be interpreted in context and as rhetorical responses to opponents. In his disposition toward the "law," he was in perfect step with Moses. There is nothing new in Paul's definition of a true Jew as one who receives the praise of God because he is circumcised in the heart (Rom. 2:28–29; cf. Deut. 10:16–21; 30:6), nor in his praise of the law as holy, righteous, and good (Rom. 7:12; cf. Deut. 6:20–25), nor in his distillation of the whole law into the law of love (Rom. 13:8–10; cf. Deut. 10:12–21). Elsewhere, Peter's characterization of Christians as a privileged people, "a chosen race" and "God's own possession" (1 Pet. 2:9), echoes Moses' understanding of Israel (Deut. 4:20; 10:15; 14:2; 26:18–19).

Insofar as the early church used Deuteronomy, on the one hand the fathers and other spiritual leaders tended to follow Paul's christological lead, but in application of the laws often resorted to spiritualizing the details. By marshaling the Shema (Deut. 6:4–5) to defend trinitarian doctrine (Lienhard 282–83), they obscured the original contextual meaning (Block, "How?"). In the Reformers we witness two different dispositions toward the laws of Deuteronomy. Luther tended to read them through Paul's rhetorical and seemingly antinomian statements (Rom. 7:4–9; 2 Cor. 3:6; Gal. 3:10–25) and his own debilitating experience of works-righteousness within the Roman Catholic church. Hence, he saw a radical contrast between the law (which kills) and the gospel (which gives life). His emphasis on the dual function of the law (civic—to maintain external order on earth; theological—to convict people of sin and drive them to Christ; cf. Lohse 270–74) missed the point of Deuteronomy. This book presents the law as a gift to guide the redeemed in righteousness, leading to life (cf. Deut. 4:6–8; 6:20–25). Like Luther, Calvin insisted that no one can be justified by keeping the law. But through the law, Israel is instructed on how to (p 167)express gratitude for their redemption and bring glory to God (Calvin 363).

These two approaches tended to dominate until the Enlightenment, when the attention of critical scholars shifted from the theological value of Deuteronomy to hypotheses concerning its origin. By the second half of the nineteenth century, the documentary approach to pentateuchal studies was firmly entrenched. Deuteronomy had been isolated as a source separate from J, E, and P. Julius Wellhausen proposed that chapters 12–26 represent the original core, written by a prophet (some suggest Jeremiah) ca. 622 BCE (cf. 2 Kings 22–23) to promote reform of Israel’s religious practices (2 Chron. 34–35) and centralize the cult in Jerusalem. The prophet presumably hid the book in the temple so as to be found; it was completed after the exile and combined with Genesis–Numbers (an amalgam of J, E, and P sources).

Convinced that Joshua completed the story of the Pentateuch, Wellhausen and others preferred to interpret Deuteronomy within the context of the Hexateuch. Deuteronomy was crucial for von Rad’s OT theology, which found in 26:5–9 an ancient credo confessing the essentials of Israelite faith (e.g., “The Form-Critical Problem,” in Problem). Martin Noth went in the opposite direction, cutting Deuteronomy from Genesis–Numbers and treating this book as the paradigmatic theological prologue to the Deuteronomistic History (Joshua–Kings). Its purpose is to provide a theological explanation for the events surrounding 722 BCE and 586 BCE, now viewed as the result of Israel’s persistent apostasy and worship of strange gods.

Some scholars attribute the bulk of Deuteronomy to country Levites writing shortly before 701 BCE (von Rad, Studies), prophetic circles of northern Israel (Nicholson 58–82), or sages in the Jerusalem court (Weinfeld). Recent scholarship tends to interpret the book as a manifesto, written in support of Josiah’s efforts to centralize the religion of Israel in Jerusalem. According to Weinfeld, Deuteronomy is not only a remarkable literary achievement, but also represents a profound monument to the theological revolution advocated by the Josianic circles. This revolution involved attempts to eliminate other shrines and centralize all worship of Yahweh in Jerusalem, as well as to “secularize,” “demythologize,” and “spiritualize” the religion. It sought to replace traditional images of divine corporeality and enthronement in the temple with more abstract, spiritual notions reflected in its “name theology.” In this new religious world, sacrifices were no longer institutional and corporate but personal expressions of faith, and the tithe was no longer “holy to Yahweh” but remained the owner’s (14:22–27; Weinfeld, ABD 2:177).

Recognizing the strengths of each position, most recently some have proposed that dissidents (scribes, priests, sages, aristocrats) originally produced Deuteronomy. According to Richard D. Nelson (4–9; cf. Albertz 194–231), the book has roots in crisis (seventh century), when loyalty to Yahweh was undermined by veneration of other gods. The well-being of many was jeopardized by exploitative royal policies, and the prophetic institution was out of control, calling for tests of authenticity and limitation of influence. The inconsistencies and ambiguities in the Deuteronomic legislation reflect the varying interests of the dissident groups. On the one hand, virtually all critical scholars agree that Deuteronomy either provides the occasion or is the result of the Josianic reform. On the other hand, they agree that its speeches are pseudepigraphical, fictionally attributed to Moses in support of the parties whose interests are represented (cf. Sonnet 262–67).

Not all are willing to date Deuteronomy this late. J. G. McConville (Deuteronomy, 33–40) and others argue that its religious and political vision does not fit the Josianic period as described in 2 Kings. On the contrary, “Deuteronomy, or at least a form of it, is the document of a real political and religious constitution of Israel from the pre-monarchic period” (34). As such, it challenges prevailing ancient Near Eastern royal-cultic ideology, replacing this with a prophetic vision of Yahweh in direct covenant relationship with his people governed by torah. Through the torah the prophetic authority of Moses, the spokesperson for Yahweh, extends to the community. The “Book of the Torah,” deposited next to the ark and formally read before the assembly, provides a constant reminder of the will of the covenant Lord. As for the theological revolution envisioned by Weinfeld, this interpretation is coming under increasingly critical scrutiny (Wilson; Richter; Vogt).

Deuteronomy presents itself as a record of addresses delivered orally by Moses on the verge of Israel’s crossing over into the promised land, speeches immediately committed to writing (31:9; cf. Block, “Recovering”). However, in accordance with ancient Near Eastern literary convention, strictly speaking, the book as we have it is anonymous. We can only speculate when the individual (p 168) speeches of Moses were combined, arranged, and linked with their present narrative stitching. Certain stylistic and literary features, the content of historical notes in the book, and the resemblances of the present structure to second millennium BCE Hittite treaty documents suggest that this happened much earlier than many critical scholars admit.

Hearing the Message of Deuteronomy

Because of a pervasive latent Marcionism and adherence to theological systems that are fundamentally dismissive of the OT in general and Deuteronomy in particular, its message has been largely lost to the church. This is a tragedy, not only because—more than any other OT book—the message of Deuteronomy lies right on the surface, but also because few OT books proclaim such a relevant word. How can readers today rediscover the message?

First, it is important to “hear” Deuteronomy. At significant junctures Moses appeals to his people to “Hear” the word he is proclaiming (5:1; 6:3–4; 9:1; 20:3). In 31:9–13 he charges the Levitical priests to read the torah that he has just transcribed (i.e., his speeches) before the people every seven years at the Feast of Booths. This statement not only assumes canonical status for the torah Moses has just proclaimed; it also highlights the critical link between hearing his words in the future and the life of the people of God. This link may be represented schematically as follows:

Reading → Hearing → Learning → Fear → Obedience → Life

A similar relationship between reading/hearing the words of “this torah” and future well-being is expressed in 17:19, where Moses explicitly charges future kings to read the torah so that they may embody the covenant fidelity he has espoused on the plains of Moab.

Second, to hear the message of Deuteronomy, we must recognize its genre and form. At one level, Deuteronomy represents the final major segment of Moses’ biography that began in Exod. 1 (cf. Knierim 355–59, 372–79). Accordingly, Deuteronomy may be interpreted as narrative in which lengthy speeches have been embedded.

At another level, the manner in which the first two speeches have been arranged is reminiscent of ancient Near Eastern treaty forms, especially the second millennium BCE Hittite suzerainty treaties (see Thompson; Craigie). Recognition of the fundamentally covenantal character of Deuteronomy has extremely significant implications. Yahweh is the divine suzerain, who graciously chose the patriarchs and their descendants as his covenant partner (4:37; 7:6–8). He demonstrated his commitment (’ahab, “he loved”) by rescuing them from Egypt (4:32–40), entering into an eternal covenant relationship with them at Sinai (4:9–32), revealing his will (4:1–8), and providentially caring for them in the desert (1:9–3:29). He is now about to deliver the promised land into their hands (1:6–8; 7:1–26). As a true prophet of Yahweh, Moses challenges Israel to respond by declaring that Yahweh alone is its God (6:4), and by demonstrating unwavering love for him through obedience (6:5–19; 10:12–11:1; etc.). Moses realistically anticipates Israel’s future rebellion, leading ultimately to banishment from the land. Yet, Yahweh’s compassion and the irrevocable nature of his covenant mean that exile and dispersion among the nations cannot be the last word; Yahweh will bring them back to himself and to the land (4:26–31; 30:1–10). Indeed, Moses perceives the covenant that he is having them renew with Yahweh as an extension of Sinai (29:1), and ultimately an extension and fulfillment of the covenant made with the ancestors (29:10–13).

At a third level, Deuteronomy presents itself as a series of addresses by Moses to Israel immediately before their entrance into Canaan and his own decease. The narrative preamble (1:1–5) should determine how we hear its message. Although in later chapters Moses will integrate many prescriptions given at Sinai and afterward into his preaching, contrary to prevailing popular opinion Deuteronomy does not present itself as legislation. Rather, this is prophetic preaching at its finest. The preamble identifies Moses’ words as hattorah hazz’ot, “this torah” (1:5 AT). The word torah should be primarily understood not as “law” (for the book includes much that is not legal), but as “instruction.” “Torah” is derived from the verb yarah, “to teach,” and from the expression sefer hattorah (e.g., Deut. 29:21 [20 MT]; Josh. 1:8; etc.): “Book of the Instruction,” rather than “Book of the Law.” Torah was applied to specific aspects of Yahweh’s will revealed earlier (e.g., Exod. 12:49; 24:12; Lev. 7:1; Num. 19:14; etc.). Nevertheless, the torah that Yahweh commanded Joshua to read and obey fully (Josh. 1:7–8) and read to the people of Israel as part of the covenant-renewal ceremony at Shechem (8:30–35) was likely the collection of Moses’ sermons that constitute the bulk of the present book. Eventually, the scope of torah was expanded to include the narrative sections (Deut. 1:1–5; 27:1–10; 34:1–12; etc.), that is, the entire book of Deuteronomy more or less as (p 169) we have it. It is widely accepted that the document referred to as “the book of the torah” (sefer hattorah, 2 Kings 22:8; 2 Chron. 34:15) and “the book of the torah of Yahweh by the hand of Moses” (2 Chron. 34:14), discovered by Josiah’s people in the course of renovating the temple, was some form of Deuteronomy. It represents the heart of the torah, which the priests were to teach and model (Deut. 33:10; 2 Chron. 15:3; 19:8; Mal. 2:6, 9; cf. Jer. 18:18; Ezek. 7:26; Ezra 7:10). Psalmists praised it (Pss. 19:7–14; 119), the prophets appealed to it (e.g., Isa. 1:10; 5:24; 8:20; 30:9; 51:7), faithful kings ruled by it (1 Kings 2:2–4; 2 Kings 14:6; 22:11; 23:25), and righteous citizens lived by it (Ps. 1). In short, Deuteronomy provides the theological base for virtually the entire OT and the paradigm for much of its literary style.

Deuteronomy obviously incorporates prescriptive and motivational material deriving from Sinai (in the Decalogue, 5:7–21; the so-called Deuteronomic Code, 12:1–16:15; the covenant blessings and curses, 28:1–29:1). Yet, specific prescriptions analogous to other ancient Near Eastern law codes tend to be concentrated in only seven chapters (19–25; on legal lists as a genre, see Watts 36–45). But even these are punctuated by strong rhetorical appeals and a fundamental concern for righteousness rather than merely legal conformity. The remainder, even of the second address, bears a pronounced homiletical flavor. Both Deuteronomy and the word torah are represented more accurately by Greek didaskalia and didachē, as used in the NT, than by nomos.

This does not mean that what Moses declares in these speeches is any less authoritative than the laws given at Sinai. In 1:3 the narrator declares that Moses functions as the authorized spokesman for Yahweh. Nevertheless, here Moses' role is that of pastor, not lawgiver. Like Jacob in Gen. 49, Joshua in Josh. 24, and Jesus in John 13–16, knowing that death is imminent, Moses gathers his flock and delivers his final homily, pleading with the Israelites to remain faithful. Deuteronomy is therefore to be read primarily as discourse on the implications of the covenant for a people about to enter the promised land (cf. Gen. 15:7–21; 26:3; Exod. 6:2–8).

But hearing the message of Deuteronomy involves more than hearing the words and correctly identifying the genre; it also involves interpreting the book correctly, grasping its theology, and making appropriate application. According to the internal witness, with these addresses Moses sought to instill deep gratitude in the generation that was about to claim the promised land. At the same time he guided them in applying the covenant made at Sinai to the new situation on the other side of the Jordan. While the Canaanites posed a formidable military threat, the spiritual threat was more serious. Accordingly, throughout the book emphasis is on exclusive devotion to Yahweh, demonstrated in grateful obedience. If they would do so, Moses envisioned the people of Israel and the land they would occupy as flourishing.

How are Christians to read the book today? The following principles may guide in the face of this challenge. First, rather than beginning with what the NT has to say about Deuteronomy, we should read the book as an ancient Near Eastern document that addressed issues current a thousand years before Christ, in idioms derived from that cultural world. Although the NT church accepted this book as authoritative Scripture, Deuteronomy sought to govern the life of Israel, composed largely of ethnic descendants of the patriarchs.

Second, we should recognize the book as a written deposit of eternal truth. Some of these verities are cast in explicit declarative form, as in “Yahweh is God; there is no other [god] besides him” (4:35, 39 AT). Others are couched in distinctive Israelite cultural dress, for which we need to identify the underlying theological principle. For example, “When you build a new house, you shall make a parapet for your roof” (22:8 NRSV). This represents a specific way of demonstrating covenantal love for one’s neighbor. The validity of specific commands for the Christian may not be answered simply by examining what the NT explicitly affirms. On the contrary, unless the NT explicitly declares a Deuteronomic ordinance passé, we should assume minimally that the principle underlying the command remains valid.

Third, after we establish the meaning of a passage in original context, we must reflect on its significance in light of Christ, who has fulfilled the law (and the prophets, Matt. 5:17). This means not only that he is the perfect embodiment of all the law demands, and its perfect interpreter, but also that he represents the climax of the narrative. The message of the NT is that the One who spoke on the plains of Moab is none other than Jesus Christ, Yahweh incarnate in human form.

Deuteronomy and the Canon

The written copies of Moses’ last addresses to Israel were recognized as authoritative from the very beginning. Not only did Moses prohibit addition to or deletion from his words (4:2), but (p 170) he also commanded the Levites to place the written torah beside the ark of the covenant. There it was to remain perpetually as a witness against Israel, as the norm by which the nation’s conduct in the promised land would be measured. The fact that this Torah was placed beside the ark, rather than in it (unlike the tablets containing the Decalogue [10:1–9], written down by God himself [5:22; 10:2]), does not suggest lesser authority, but different significance. The Decalogue represented the actual covenant document (4:13; 10:1–4), placed in the ark as a reminder to God of his covenant with Israel. The Deuteronomic torah was Moses’ commentary on the covenant, whose terms included not only the Ten Principles, declared directly by God himself, but also the statutes and ordinances (khuqqim and mishpatim) revealed to Moses at Sinai and then passed on to the people (4:1). Moses' instructions on the covenant were fully inspired and authoritative, for he spoke to Israel "according to all that Yahweh had commanded him [to declare] to them" (1:3 AT).

The theological stamp of Deuteronomy is evident throughout the OT canon and into the NT. If in Deuteronomy the term torah applies expressly to the speeches of Moses, eventually it was applied to the entire Pentateuch, for which Deuteronomy represents the conclusion. Many treat Deuteronomy as a dangling legal appendix to the narratives of the patriarchs, Israel's exodus from Egypt, the establishment of covenant at Sinai, and the desert wanderings; yet, some (e.g., Noth) divorce the book from the Pentateuch altogether. However, critical scholars are increasingly recognizing a Deuteronomistic flavor in many of the preceding narratives, so that in some the classical JEDP source hypothesis of pentateuchal origins has collapsed into a theory of two sources. One would be Deuteronomistic (including most of what was previously attributed to Yahwistic and Elohist sources), and the other the reactive P source (Albertz 464–93).

The stamp of Deuteronomy on the so-called "Deuteronomistic History" (Joshua–Kings) is evident not only in the style of these books (many of the embedded speeches sound like Deuteronomy—Josh. 23, 24; 1 Sam. 12; etc.), but also especially in its theology (cf. McConville, Grace). Specifically, Solomon's emphasis on the temple as a place for the "name of Yahweh" to dwell (1 Kings 8) harks back to Deut. 12 et passim. More generally, if and when the nation of Israel and her monarchy are destroyed, it is because they have failed in covenant with Yahweh as outlined in Deuteronomy. The influence of Deuteronomy is less obvious on Chronicles and Ezra–Nehemiah, but in the Latter Prophets one hears echoes of Moses' orations throughout. In Hosea and Jeremiah, the links are so direct that scholars often debate which came first, Deuteronomy or the prophet. Prophetic pronouncements of judgment and restoration appear often to be based on the covenant curses of Deut. 28 and promises of renewal in chapter 30. Indeed, the canonical prophets as a whole and Malachi specifically (Mal. 4:4–6) end with a call to return to the "torah of my servant Moses" (AT), which has its base in the revelation at Sinai but, strictly speaking, refers fundamentally to Moses' exposition.

In the Psalms, Deuteronomistic influence is most evident in the so-called "torah" psalms (1, 19, 119), which highlight the life-giving purpose of the law, but also in the "wisdom" psalms, with their emphasis on fear of Yahweh (111:10; cf. 34:8–12). Weinfeld has argued that Deuteronomy bears many verbal and conceptual affinities with Proverbs (e.g., emphasis on fear of Yahweh, and presentation of two ways—life/blessing and death/curse)—which point to wisdom influence (Deuteronomy 1–11, 62–65; School, 244–319). However, it seems more likely that the influence was in the opposite direction.

NT texts like Luke 24:44 suggest that by the time of Christ the expression Torat Mosheh (Law of Moses, as in Josh. 8:31) served as the standard designation for the first part of the Jewish canon (alongside “the Prophets” and “the Psalms”). As noted earlier, the pentateuchal location of Deuteronomy, which serves as a theological exposition of the events narrated in the previous books, may have influenced the canonical location of John. However, whereas Christ himself is presented as Yahweh incarnate, the person whose role most closely resembles Moses in Deuteronomy is Paul. This apostle was specially called not only to lead the community of faith in mission, but also to interpret God’s saving actions and instruct God’s people in the life of covenant faith. In so doing he responded sharply to those who insisted that adherence to the law of Moses was a prerequisite to salvation. Like Deuteronomy, often Paul’s Epistles each divide readily into two parts, the first being devoted to theological exposition (cf. Deut. 1–11), and the second to drawing out the practical and communal implications of the theology (cf. Deut. 12–26).

(p 171) *Deuteronomy and Theology

As an overall theme to Deuteronomy, we propose the following: A call to Israel for faithfulness in the land, in response to the grace Yahweh has lavished on them (cf. 6:20–25). In developing this theme, Moses presents a theology that is remarkable for both profundity and scope.

First, Israel’s history begins and ends with God. Deuteronomy instructs Israel and all subsequent readers on his absolute uniqueness (4:32–39; 6:4; 10:17; 32:39; 33:26), eternity (33:27), transcendence (7:21; 10:17; 32:3), holiness (32:51), justice and righteousness (32:4; cf. 10:18), passion (jealousy) for his covenant and relationship with his people (4:24; 5:9; 6:15; 9:3; 32:21), faithfulness (7:9), presence (1:45; 4:7; 6:15; 7:21; 31:17), compassion (4:31), and especially covenant love (4:37; 7:7–8, 13; 10:15, 18; 23:5). But none of these are mere abstractions. Yahweh lives in relationship with humans, which explains why Moses never tired of speaking of God’s grace—expressed in many different concrete actions toward Israel. Examples include election of Abraham and his descendants (4:37; 7:6), rescue of Israel from the bondage of Egypt (4:32–36), establishment of Israel as his covenant people (4:9–31; 5:1–22; 26:16–19), providential care (1:30–33; 8:15–16), provision of a homeland (6:10–15; 8:7–14), provision of leadership (16:18–18:22), and victory over their enemies (7:17–24).

Second, Deuteronomy offers a comprehensive picture of the community of faith. Externally, the community that stands before Moses consists largely of the descendants of Abraham, and the first-generation offspring of those who had experienced the exodus from Egypt. In Deuteronomy, the doctrine of divine election plays a prominent role. The book speaks of the divine election (bakhar, choose) of the place for Yahweh's name to be established and to which the Israelites are invited for worship and communion (12:5; et passim). It also tells of the divine election of Israel's king (17:15), whose primary function is to embody covenant righteousness, and of the Levitical priests (18:5; 21:5), who were to promote righteousness. However, Yahweh's election of Israel to be his covenant people receives special attention. Deuteronomy 4:32–40 places Yahweh's rescue of Israel within the framework of cosmic history, declaring this event to be unprecedented both as a divine act and as a human experience. Lest hearers have any illusions about the grounds of election, Moses emphasizes that Yahweh's election of Israel was based on neither exceptional physical nor spiritual qualifications. Israel was not granted favored status with Yahweh because of its significance as a people, for it was the least (7:6–8), or because of its superior behavior vis-à-vis the nations, for her past is characterized by rebellion (9:1–23). On the contrary, election was an act of sheer grace, grounded in Yahweh's love for the ancestors (4:32–38) and in his inexplicable love for their descendants (7:6–8). In so doing, Deuteronomy presents Israel as an incredibly privileged people. They alone have experienced the strong redeeming hand of Yahweh (4:32–40), have participated in a covenant ceremony (4:9–31), and enjoy vital communion with Yahweh. Thereby he not only hears them whenever they cry out, but in an unprecedented act of revelation he also has made his will known to them (4:11–88; ; 6:20–25). Their standing with God is characterized directly as that of covenant partners (26:16–19) and a holy people belonging to him alone (7:6; 14:2; 26:19; 28:9). Metaphorically, they are counted as his adopted sons (14:1; cf. the portrayal of God as their father in 1:3 KJV/MT; 8:5; 32:5–6, 18) and his treasured possession (segullah, 7:6; 14:2; 26:18). However, although Yahweh had called the nation as a whole to covenant relationship, the true community of faith consists of persons who love Yahweh with their entire being. They demonstrate that love through righteousness (tsedaqah, 6:25), which includes repudiating all other gods and compassionately pursuing justice toward others (10:16–20).

Third, no other book in the OT presents as thorough a treatment of covenant relationship as Deuteronomy. Though some draw sharp lines of distinction between the Abrahamic covenant and the covenant that Yahweh made with Israel at Sinai, Deuteronomy perceives these to be organically related. The Sinai/Horeb covenant represents the fulfillment of the covenant Yahweh had made with Abraham and an extension of his commitment to Abraham's descendants (cf. Gen. 17:7). In Deuteronomy, Moses propounds an exposition of the covenant to which the present generation binds itself (26:16–19). Chapters 29–30 do not envision a new covenant, but the present generation's recommitment to and extension of the old.

It is within this covenantal context that we must understand the role of the law. Deuteronomy stresses obedience within that relationship: (1) Obedience was not to be viewed as a burden but as response to the unique privilege of knowing God's will (Deut. 4:6–8), in contrast to the nations who worshipped gods of wood and stone (4:28; p 172)Ps. 115:4–8). (2) Obedience is not a way of salvation, but the grateful response of those who had already been saved (6:20–25). (3) Obedience is not primarily a duty imposed by one party on another, but an expression of covenant relationship (26:16–19). (4) Obedience is the external evidence of the circumcision of one's heart and the internal disposition of fearing God (10:12–11:1; 30:6–9). (5) Obedience involves a willing subordination of one's entire being to the authority of the gracious divine suzerain (6:4–9; 10:12–13). (6) While obedience is not the prerequisite to salvation, it is the evidence of righteousness, which is a precondition to Israel's fulfillment of her mission and blessing (4:24–25; chs. 11, 28). (7) Obedience is both reasonable and achievable (30:11–20).

The last point demands further comment, especially since the book seems to view Israel's failure as inevitable (4:24; 5:29; 29:14–30:1; 31:16–21; 32:14–27). Part of the answer to this dilemma may be found in the frequent alternation of singular and plural forms of direct address. The shifts between "you" singular and "you" plural serve a rhetorical function, recognizing that though Yahweh entered into covenant relationship with the nation, in the end fidelity cannot be legislated and must be demonstrated at the personal level. Yet, this device also recognizes the existence of two Israels. On the one hand, there was a physical Israel, consisting of descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. On the other hand, there was a spiritual Israel, consisting of those persons (like Moses and Joshua and Caleb) who demonstrated unqualified devotion to Yahweh. For the latter, obedience was not only possible; it was a delight. But Deuteronomy is both pessimistic and realistic about the former, anticipating a future of rebellion that will lead eventually to the destruction and exile of the nation. According to 30:6–10 this problem of national infidelity will only be resolved in the distant future, when Yahweh brings the people back and circumcises their hearts.

Fourth, Deuteronomy presents a highly developed theology of land. Moses' cosmic awareness is expressed by his appeal to heaven and earth to witness Israel's renewal of the covenant (4:26; 30:19; 31:28). But corresponding to Yahweh's love for Israel within the context of the nations, in 11:12 he declares that the land currently occupied by the Canaanites, set aside for Israel, is the special object of Yahweh's perpetual care (darash). Yahweh is delivering this land to the Israelites as their special grant (nakhalah, 4:21 et passim), in fulfillment of his oath to the ancestors (1:8 et passim). Yet, the Israelites are challenged to engage the Canaanites, drive them out (9:3), and utterly destroy them and their religious installations (7:2–5; 12:2–3). However, this land is not given to Israel because the people have earned it (9:1–24), but as an act of grace.

Deuteronomy describes the nation's relationship to the land within the context of the tripartite association of Deity-land-people. Accordingly, the response of the land to Israel's occupation will depend entirely upon the people's fidelity. If they are faithful to Yahweh, the land will yield bountiful produce (7:11–16; 11:8–15; 28:1–14). But if they prove unfaithful, not giving Yahweh the credit for their prosperity and going after other gods, then the land will stop yielding its bounty, and he will sever the tie with it (4:25–28; 8:17–20; 11:16–17; 28:15–26). When the Israelites will be removed from the land because of their sin (which in Moses' mind appears inevitable), this will not represent a cancellation of the covenant, but the application of its fine print (cf. Dan. 9:4–16). Because of Yahweh's immutable covenant commitment to Abraham (Deut. 4:31), he must and will bring Israel back to the land and to himself (30:1–10). Accordingly, within their present literary contexts and the history of God's covenant relationship with Israel, the "new" covenant of which Jeremiah speaks in Jer. 31:31–34 and the eternal covenant of which Ezekiel writes in 16:60 (cf. 34:25–31) should not be interpreted as absolutely new. Instead, they are anticipations of the full realization of God's original covenant made with Abraham (ratified and fleshed out at Horeb), when the boundaries of physical and spiritual Israel will finally be coterminous. (The NT development of this theme in the context of the Lord's Supper [Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25] and in Hebrews [8:8–13; 9:15; 12:24] recognizes that ultimately God's covenant relationship with his people is possible only because of the mediatorial and sacrificial work of Christ.) Accordingly, Israel's exile cannot be the final word on the land. Because of Yahweh's compassion and the irrevocability of his covenant with Israel (Deut. 4:31), when the people repent he will regather them (30:1–5). However, the book is clear: Israel's occupation of the land and her prosperity are contingent on fidelity to Yahweh.

Fifth, Deuteronomy presents a remarkable approach to government. From beginning to end, Israel is presented as a theocracy, with Yahweh as her divine suzerain (though the kingship of Yahweh receives scant explicit attention; cf. 33:5). The book provides for judicial officials (p 173) appointed by the people (1:9–15; 16:18), and kings, priests, and prophets appointed and/or raised up by Yahweh (17:14–18:22). Indeed, many scholars interpret 16:18–18:22 as a sort of state “constitution” for Israel, designed to reinforce the centralization of power in Jerusalem under Josiah (cf. McConville, Deuteronomy, 78–79). However, this interpretation is extremely problematic, because 17:14–20 presents the monarchy as optional, and interest in the king's real power over the people is eclipsed by concern for his role as a paradigm of covenant faithfulness. This disposition is quite at odds with the nature of Israelite kingship historically. The “constitution” interpretation of 16:18–18:22 also is especially problematic because it tends to overlook the primary concern of the book—to establish a people under the authority of torah and governed by “righteousness” (tsedaqah).

Conclusion

For modern readers plagued by a negative view of the OT in general and OT law in particular, Deuteronomy offers a healthy antidote. Through the work of Christ not only is Israel's relationship made possible, but also the church, the new Israel of God, is grafted into God's covenant promises. As with Israel, access to these promises remains by grace alone, through faith alone. However, having been chosen, redeemed, and granted covenant relationship with God, Yahweh's people will gladly demonstrate wholehearted allegiance with whole-bodied obedience (Rom. 12:1–12). Deuteronomy remains an invaluable resource for biblical understanding (1) of God, especially his grace in redeeming those bound in sin; (2) of appropriate response to God, entailing love for God and for our fellow human beings; and (3) of the sure destiny of the redeemed. More than any other book in the OT (if not the Bible as a whole), Deuteronomy concretizes faith for real life. Inasmuch as the NT identifies Jesus Christ with the God of Israel's redemption, in the spiritual and ethical pronouncements of Deuteronomy we find fleshed out both the first and great commandment (Matt. 22:34–40) and “the law of Christ” (Gal. 6:2). A church that has discovered this book will have its feet on the ground, resisting the tendency to fly off into realms of Platonic ideas and inward subjectivity so common in Western Christianity.

Bibliography

Albertz, R. A History of Israelite Religion in the Old Testament Period. 2 vols. Westminster John Knox, 1994; Block, D. “How Many Is God? An Investigation into the Meaning of Deuteronomy 6:4–5.” JETS 47 (2004): 193–212; idem. “Recovering the Voice of Moses: The Genesis of Deuteronomy.” JETS 44 (2001): 385–408; Calvin, J. The Four Last Books of Moses. Vol. 1. Eerdmans, 1950; Craigie, P. The Book of Deuteronomy. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1976; Knierim, R. “The Composition of the Pentateuch.” Pages 351–79 in The Task of Old Testament Theology. Eerdmans, 1995; Lienhard, J., et al., eds. Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy. ACCSOT 3. InterVarsity, 2001; Lohse, B. Martin Luther's Theology. Fortress, 1999; Luther, M. Lectures on Deuteronomy. LWorks 9. Concordia, 1960; McConville, J. G. Deuteronomy. Apollos/InterVarsity, 2002; idem. Grace in the End. Zondervan, 1993; idem. Law and Theology in Deuteronomy. JSOTSup 33. JSOT, 1984; McConville, J. G., and J. G. Millar. Time and Place in Deuteronomy. JSOTSup 179. Sheffield Academic Press, 1984; Millar, J. G. Now Choose Life. Eerdmans, 1998; Nelson, R. Deuteronomy. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 2002; Nicholson, E. W. Deuteronomy and Tradition. Fortress, 1967; Noth, M. The Deuteronomistic History. JSOTSup 15. JSOT, 1981; Olsen, D. Deuteronomy and the Death of Moses. Fortress, 1994; Rad, G. von. Deuteronomy. OTL. Westminster, 1966; idem. The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Studies. SCM, 1966; idem. Studies in Deuteronomy. SBT 9. SCM, 1953; Richter, S. The Deuteronomistic History and the Name Theology. De Gruyter, 2002; Schreiner, T. The Law and Its Fulfillment. Baker, 1993; Sonnet, J.-P. The Book within the Book. Brill, 1997; Thompson, J. A. Deuteronomy, TOTC. InterVarsity, 1974; Tigay, J. Deuteronomy. JPS Torah Commentary. JPS, 1996; Vogt, P. Religious Conceptions in the Theology of Deuteronomy. Eisenbrauns, forthcoming; Watts, J. Reading Law. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Weinfeld, M. Deuteronomy 1–11. AB 5A. Doubleday, 1991; idem. “Deuteronomy, Book of.” ABD 2:168–83; idem. Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic School. Clarendon, 1972; Wenham, G. “Deuteronomy and the Central Sanctuary.” TynBul 22 (1971): 103–18; Wilson, I. Out of the Midst of the Fire. SBLDS 151. Scholars Press, 1995; Wright, C. J. H. Deuteronomy. NIBCOT. Hendrickson, 1996; Wright, N. T. The Climax of the Covenant. Fortress, 1993.

Daniel I. Block

Dialectic     See Dialogism

Dialogism

Dialogism, as its root “dialogue” suggests, is based on our ordinary experience of face-to-face conversations, but its expanded perspectives on persons, reciprocity, and responsibility offer a rich hermeneutical context in which to read the Bible.

Dialogism was most fully articulated by Mikhail Mikhailovic Bakhtin (1895–1975), a Russian writer arrested in 1929 for alleged activity in the underground Orthodox Church and sentenced to internal exile. Despite poor health and political pressure, Bakhtin survived the Stalinist regime, although he published relatively little in his own lifetime and most of his works remained fragmentary (p 174) or unrevised. Promoted by a group of graduate students who rediscovered him in 1961, he has subsequently emerged as an important thinker, both in Russia and in the West.

Central to the notion of dialogism is that meaning does not exist in an abstract or singular form; this is in contrast to the dialectical tradition, in which thesis and antithesis are resolved into a synthesis. Dialogism insists on the priority of two or more persons who remain distinct from one another. Thus, it is not words that communicate, but we who communicate in interactions that require, as a minimum, the irreducible community of two. To illustrate, imagine two people looking at each other: I see you as a whole person, a three-dimensional body situated within a three-dimensional environment. At the same time, I see only bits of myself and a two-dimensional horizon that stretches away from me. I see you better than I see myself, and you see me better than you see yourself. Your excess of vision supplements mine, just as my excess of vision supplements yours. To create meaning, we must each “fill in” the other’s horizon by offering our “excess of vision” to each other as a gift. What I offer to you and what you offer to me, in our reciprocal, complementary visions, is what we cannot create for ourselves. And to offer that gift we must remain distinct, outside one another, resisting the temptation to collapse one perspective into the other.

Meaning thus arises from within an irreducible community of two, as part of a dynamic call and response. Dialogism is more than simply a dialogue, two people talking together; it is rather a rich personal context that emphasizes asymmetric reciprocity and responsibility.

Although Bakhtin was not a theologian, dialogism can help us better understand the Bible by focusing in turn on the author, the text, and the reader.

First, the call/response of meaningful language characterizes not only our relationships to other persons, but also our relationship to the infinite Person, to God. Bakhtin puts it this way: “Revelation characterizes the world just as much as natural laws do,” and this revelation is itself “characterized ... by the Person who wants to reveal Himself” (Felch and Contino 219–20). Communication, call/response, or dialogic interchange is thus inscribed into the very fabric of the world. To return to the visual image, God is the one who looks on me, who sees more of me than I can see of myself, who from this excess of vision offers me the gift of meaning. Furthermore, “what I must be for the other, God is for me” (Bakhtin, Art, 56). That is, what I should be for others, God already is for me, whether or not I recognize this to be the case.

It is not simply that God’s beneficent, and therefore productive, gaze provides a model for meaningful encounters, but also that God’s creation of and revelation in the world guarantees the possibility of meaning. God is not a concept, an absolute principle, an inert authoritative dogma. God is the infinite person who can in his wholeness guarantee a three-dimensional environment that will sustain a plenitude of meanings. But because he is a person, he also initiates the call/response of meaningful language. What this means for the Bible is that inscripturated revelation, along with natural revelation, must be received as a gift that bestows meaning upon me. God’s word reveals me to myself, and to submit to its gaze is to accept a meaning-ful gift. To refuse its gaze is to attempt the impossible and the perverse, to create a meaningful event with only one participant, myself. For Bakhtin, such an attempt is not only doomed to failure but also constitutes “a lapse into sin” (Bakhtin, Art, 124).

Second, because words are offered as gifts from other people, dialogism takes seriously their shape and form. What this means for the Bible is that its genres and language are not expendable casings that can be updated, discarded, or ignored at will. With the critical realists (cf. Soskice), dialogism insists that there is no such thing as “mere” metaphor: terms such as “shepherd,” “king,” or “father” do not exhaust the nature of God but neither are they arbitrary. They speak in true, if limited, ways of God’s person. Similarly, although the Bible is not identical with God, just as my own words are not identical with my person, it is the ordinary means by which I come to know God and myself. Dialogism thus refuses both bibliolatry and bibliophobia.

Third, dialogic reciprocity requires that the reader actively engage the words of the Bible. To use Bakhtin’s terms, we can read the Bible merely as authoritative discourse, as words that come at us. Such words can be either recited or rejected, but they remain external to us and therefore lifeless. We can also read the Bible as internally persuasive discourse, as words that come to us. Such words are internalized as we chew them, digest them, and make them our own in new and living ways. At best, however, authoritative discourse and internally persuasive discourse become united in the penetrated word that retains its authoritative self-sufficiency without tyranny. As penetrated word, the Bible holds (p 175) together both horizontal and vertical dimensions; it penetrates us, pushing us toward the truth, and is itself penetrated by God's presence.

Bibliography

Bakhtin, M. M. Art and Answerability, ed. M. Holquist and V. Liapunov, trans. V. Liapunov. University of Texas Press, 1990; idem. The Dialogic Imagination, ed. M. Holquist, trans. C. Emerson and M. Holquist. University of Texas Press, 1981; idem. Problems of Dostoevsky's Poetics, ed. and trans. C. Emerson. University of Minnesota Press, 1984; idem. Toward a Philosophy of the Act, ed. M. Holquist and V. Liapunov, trans. V. Liapunov. University of Texas Press, 1993; Coates, R. Christianity in Bakhtin. Cambridge University Press, 1998; Emerson, C. "Russian Orthodoxy and the Early Bakhtin." Religion and Literature 22 (1990): 109–31; Felch, S., and P. Contino, eds. Bakhtin and Religion. Northwestern University Press, 2001; Green, B. Mikhail Bakhtin and Bible Scholarship. Society of Biblical Literature, 2000; Mihailovic, A. Corporeal Words. Northwestern University Press, 1997; Soskice, J. M. Metaphor and Religious Language. Clarendon, 1985.

Susan M. Felch

Dictionaries and Encyclopedias

With important precursors, since the second half of the twentieth century, these reference tools have become increasingly available and important for biblical and theological studies. They now comprise the closest analog we have to the "knowledge base" available on the World Wide Web for industrial and scientific applications. The explosion of research and publishing, together with the ever-more-detailed work of biblical scholarship, has made it virtually impossible for individuals to remain current or to gain currency in any but the most circumscribed fields. As a result, the Bible dictionary and theological dictionary or multivolume encyclopedia has achieved the status of indispensable compendia of contemporary thought. Nevertheless, a general perusal of these reference tools demonstrates the degree to which those engaged in the theological interpretation of Scripture occupy the frontiers of the disciplines of systematic theology and biblical studies. This is because, at their best, dictionaries and encyclopedias gather together and collate the state of play at the time of their publication; due to relative adolescence theological interpretation of Scripture, discussion or exemplars of the discipline are largely absent from the theological reference library.

We turn, first, to theological dictionaries (e.g., Elwell; Ferguson and Wright; Richardson and Bowden), where the centuries-old chasm separating scholarly study of the Bible and systematic theology is plainly on display. Only rarely does one come across serious engagement with biblical scholarship. Often one encounters either evidences of the commitment of the theological enterprise to philosophical foundations and/or the propositional content of systematic theology, or the repetition of some of the failed experiments in biblical theology. The latter is expressed, for example, in the choice of systematic categories as a mold into which one might press or squeeze the biblical witness; in facile descriptions of the biblical witness that grasp for unity at the expense of hearing also the diverse voices of Scripture or making sense of them; in characterizations of the biblical witness that allow one biblical voice to speak for all (in evangelical Protestant traditions, with the Pauline voice often trumping the others); in the aggregation of biblical texts drawn from throughout the canon without reference or attention to literary, historical, or canonical context; and in the deployment of problematic word studies in the service of biblical theology (see below).

This rather dismal portrayal is not so much an indictment of the enterprise represented by theological dictionaries as it is a summary statement of the segregation of the disciplines of theological and biblical studies, each with its own accredited procedures and epistemic base. Concerning the task of theology, Barth remarked: “Dogmatics does not ask what the apostles and prophets said but what we must say on the basis of the apostles and prophets” (16). But two hundred years of biblical studies have left us with little access to the theological immediacy or vitality of “what the apostles and prophets said.” Moreover, due to the ways in which the discipline of systematic theology has developed, the genre of theological dictionaries has not been oriented toward producing or representing theological interpretation of Scripture. What we do encounter in these reference works is often a keen sense of the developing theological tradition—an overview of the ways in which the biblical witness has been crystallized in the history of doctrine; and this can prove invaluable in the theological formation of the interpreter of Scripture. In this respect, The Dictionary of Historical Theology (T. Hart) especially invites careful attention.

Of course, theological reference works are not without bias, and individual entries do not always move beyond the theological horizons of the tradition and perspective of their contributors (whether Reformed or Lutheran, for example). For this reason, a recent entry into the field of (p 176)reference works, those books that self-consciously work within and represent a particular tradition are worthy of note. Not surprisingly, for example, The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements (Burgess) treats such subjects as healing or glossolalia far more extensively and within different theological assumptions than more traditional theological dictionaries. The same may be said with regard to “ordinances” in the Dictionary of Baptists in America (Leonard) and “sacraments” in the Dictionary of the Presbyterian and Reformed Tradition in America (D. G. Hart). Even where one finds little in the way of explicit theological interpretation of Scripture, these reference tools provide plentiful evidence of how our formation within a theological tradition and under the influence of wider sociocultural forces helps to shape the character of our theological engagement with the biblical materials.

If, from the side of systematic theology, reference works do not exhibit much in the way of engagement with academic biblical studies, the opposite is, if anything, even truer in the case of Bible dictionaries and encyclopedias, where the concerns of constructive theology seem far from view. This is due above all to the self-imposed agenda of biblical studies since the late eighteenth century, its primary and narrow focus on discerning and explicating the meaning of the biblical text, understood grammatically and historically. Theological concerns, when they surface in biblical studies, are mostly articulated descriptively (e.g., “the theological perspective of the Deuteronomist” or “John’s theological stance” designated the domain of biblical scholars who describe themselves especially as historians) rather than constructively (in terms of their contemporary immediacy, regarded as the domain of systematic theologians and ethicists). With respect to this descriptive task, suitable works have multiplied in the last two decades. Discussion of theological motifs is well represented in such reference works as Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels (Green and McKnight), Dictionary of Paul and His Letters (Hawthorne et al.), Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments (Martin and Davids), and Dictionary of the Old Testament: Pentateuch (Alexander and Baker), as well as in the more traditional one-volume Bible dictionaries (e.g., Freedman, Eerdmans).

Conversation with systematic theology in biblical studies reference tools remains scarce; indeed, even descriptive theological work cannot yet be taken for granted. Consider, for example, “the industry standard”: the widely acclaimed, six-volume, 7,035-page

Anchor Bible Dictionary (ABD; Freedman). With more than 6,000 entries, one might think that every conceivable topic pertinent to the biblical studies enterprise would be represented, even exhausted. Although one does find all sorts of biblical minutiae and cognate esoterica, including references to numerous sites and people not mentioned in the Bible, theological concerns are sometimes conspicuously absent. There is no entry on “gospel” (“good news”) or “truth,” for example, and one looks in vain for biblical-theological treatments of “prayer” or “church.” A magnificent achievement in many respects, the ABD often finds its home more easily in the department of religious studies than in Christian theological discourse.

The shortcomings of the Theological Dictionary of the New Testament (TDNT; Kittel and Friedrich) are widely recognized (cf. Barr). With its interest in the distinctive theological significance of NT words, essays in TDNT, especially but not exclusively in its earlier volumes, tended to download impressive theological content into words, suggesting that the significant unit of meaning was the individual word rather than the discourse within which the word appears. The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology (Brown) often fails to escape the same criticism. Happily, as wordbooks the more recent Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament (Botterweck and Ringgren) and New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis (VanGemeren), working from more nuanced linguistic commitments, have advanced beyond their NT counterparts as reference tools suited to the work of theological interpretation of Scripture.

For persons interested in the theological interpretation of Scripture, the bibliography (below) may thus far seem to be of little help. Two recent contributions have begun to mitigate this rather negative assessment, however. Among its offerings, A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation (Coggins and Houlden) provides essays sketching the history of interpretation of biblical books and discussing major biblical interpreters (e.g., Origen and Augustine), interpretative practices (e.g., “Inner-Biblical Exegesis”), and some biblical themes (e.g., “Akedah”) relevant to our concerns. Finally, there is the New Dictionary of Biblical Theology (Alexander and Rosner), divided into three major sections. The first addresses a range of concerns central to the contemporary biblical-theological enterprise (p 177), including the unity and diversity of the biblical materials, the relationship between the Testaments, and even “Systematic Theology and Biblical Theology.” The second focuses on major collections of writings in the Bible (the prophetic books, for example, or the Pauline corpus) before turning to entries on individual books. Third, we find a generally well-chosen series of articles on biblical themes. Even here, however, one finds little by way of self-conscious engagement with contemporary theology; the focus is largely descriptive, though from time to time the careful reader will find contributors moving into programmatic comments regarding present-day appropriation.

Bibliography

Alexander, T. D., and B. Rosner, eds. New Dictionary of Biblical Theology. InterVarsity, 2000; Alexander, T. D., and D. W. Baker, eds. Dictionary of the Old Testament: Pentateuch. InterVarsity, 2003; Barr, J. The Semantics of Biblical Language. Oxford University Press, 1961; Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Vol. I/1. T&T Clark, 1975; Botterweck, G., and H. Ringgren, eds. TDOT; Brown, C., ed. The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology. 3 vols. Zondervan, 1975–78; Burgess, S., ed. The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Rev. ed. Zondervan, 2002; Coggins, R. J., and J. L. Houlden, eds. A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation. Trinity, 1990; Elwell, W., ed. Evangelical Dictionary of Theology. 2d ed. Baker, 2001; Ferguson, S., and D. F. Wright, eds. New Dictionary of Theology. InterVarsity, 1988; Freedman, D. N., ed. The Anchor Bible Dictionary. 6 vols. Doubleday, 1992; idem. Eerdmans Dictionary of the Bible. Eerdmans, 2000; Green, J., and S. McKnight, eds. Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels. InterVarsity, 1992; Hart, D. G. Dictionary of the Presbyterian and Reformed Tradition in America. InterVarsity, 1999; Hart, T. The Dictionary of Historical Theology. Eerdmans, 2000; Hawthorne, G., et al., eds. Dictionary of Paul and His Letters. InterVarsity, 1993; Kittel, G., and G. Friedrich, eds. TDNT; Leonard, B. Dictionary of Baptists in America. InterVarsity, 1994; Martin, R., and P. Davids, eds. Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments. InterVarsity, 1997; Richardson, A., and J. Bowden. The Westminster Dictionary of Christian Theology. Westminster John Knox, 1983; VanGemeren, W., ed. New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis. 5 vols. Zondervan, 1997.

Joel B. Green

Différance See Deconstruction; Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation

Discontinuity (between the Testaments) See Relationship between the Testaments

Dispensation(alism) See Daniel, Book of; Last Things, Doctrine of; Revelation, Book of; Salvation, History of

Diversity See Culture and Hermeneutics; Feminist Biblical

Interpretation; Racism; Scripture, Unity of ### Doctrine

One of the central tasks of Christian theology is to weave together the various strands of the biblical witness, integrating them into a coherent and systematic account of the Christian vision of reality. “Doctrine” is the term generally given to the body of teachings that result from this sustained engagement with Scripture. This process of engagement is complex and involves a number of specific forms of interaction, including the development of a coherent understanding of a given area of thought through reconciling passages that sometimes appear to be in tension. Historically, this has been of particular importance in relation to the areas of Christology (synthesizing biblical statements concerning the humanity and divinity of Christ) and grace (reconciling statements concerning human freedom and divine sovereignty). In recent years, a more general debate over how Scripture is to be interpreted through doctrine has been extended, with particular attention being paid to the different types of biblical genre (especially narratives), and their relationship to the development of doctrine: in what way may a narrative be said to generate doctrines?

At a very early stage in Christian reflection, it was conceded that it was simply inadequate to repeat biblical affirmations and assume that this ended intellectual discussion of the issues they raised. A series of controversies—most notably, the Gnostic controversy of the second century, focusing on Irenaeus—demonstrated the need for a normative interpretation of Scripture as the official teaching of the church. He also stressed the need to accept that certain interpretations of the biblical material were severely deficient and incapable of doing justice to the Christian vision of reality. For Irenaeus, these interpretations were to be defined as heretical, and the church needed to clearly repudiate them as such.

Irenaeus stressed the importance of creeds as public statements of Christian doctrine. These creeds wove together biblical images, themes, and statements to yield a definitive statement of fundamental Christian doctrines. Writing around 350, Cyril of Jerusalem defined the role of creeds as a “synthesis of faith” that set out “... to present (p 178) the one teaching of the faith in its totality, in which what is of greatest importance is gathered together from all the Scriptures. And just as a mustard seed contains a great number of branches in its tiny grain, so also this summary of faith brings together in a few words the entire knowledge of the true religion which is contained in the Old and New Testaments.”

Christian doctrine is thus a communal, authoritative interpretation of the totality of the biblical witness. It is to be distinguished from theological opinion by the fact that it is accepted within the church as an authoritative, normative statement of Christian beliefs. Even at an early stage in the long process of Christian engagement with Scripture, it was accepted that not all areas of doctrine were of equal importance. The early church singled out the doctrine of the “two natures” of Christ and the doctrine of the Trinity as being of especial importance, in that they distinguished Christianity from Judaism on the one hand, and from pagan worldviews on the other. The term “dogma”—meaning an essential, nonnegotiable element of Christian belief—was used to refer to these two areas of doctrine, and dogma was contrasted with heresy. However, a degree of latitude was recognized in other areas of doctrine—for example, in relation to understandings of the church or of the last things.

The overall development of doctrine through the centuries is best seen as the gradual unfolding of the fundamental themes of Scripture, in much the same way as a seed grows into a plant. This view is stated in the works of the leading Scottish evangelical theologian James Orr (1834–1913). In his Christian View of God, Orr insists that theology must constantly work to ensure that its doctrinal formulations are adequate to the “infinite truth” they seek to mediate, which is revealed in Scripture. One of Orr’s most distinctive contributions lies in his recognition of “progress in dogma”—in other words, doctrinal development. Rejecting a static understanding of doctrine, he argues that the entire theological enterprise must be dedicated to developing dogmatic formulations that are adequate to the revelation they seek to express, yet which ultimately transcends them. “The dogmatic molds which were found adequate for one age have often proved insufficient for the next, to which a larger horizon of vision has been granted; and have had to be broken up that new ones might be created, more adapted to the content of a Revelation which in some sense transcends them all.”

A similar idea is developed by Charles Gore (1853–1932). He responds to those who argue that the simplicity of the biblical witness to Christ is compromised and distorted by theoretical development within the history of the church, especially during the patristic period. Gore insists that these later theoretical formulations are to be seen as “the apostolic teaching worked out into formulas by the aid of a terminology which was supplied by Greek dialectics.” There was no distortion, no misrepresentation—merely the “gradual unfolding of teaching” of “an unbroken stream of tradition.”

A number of factors stimulated the development of doctrine in the patristic period and beyond. The most important of these is the outbreak of controversy within the church over a point of doctrine, which forced clarification of this area of theology. The Arian, Pelagian, and Donatist controversies all forced reconsideration of areas of theology (specifically, in the areas of Christology, the doctrine of grace, and the doctrine of the church). In the case of the Arian controversy, issues of biblical interpretation were of central importance. The key question under debate was whether the complex NT witness to the person of Christ could best be understood by asserting that Christ was one of God's creatures, but supreme among those creatures (the Arian position); or whether Christ was the Son of God incarnate (the Athanasian position, which eventually won the day).

A second factor of importance is the need to see the "big picture"—to be able to understand how the various elements of Scripture relate to each other, and how they contribute to the shaping of a Christian worldview. This idea can be seen in the writings of P. T. Forsyth (1848–1921), especially his landmark work The Person and Place of Jesus Christ. Here Forsyth argues that doctrine is the "science of faith," in that it sets out to give a coherent and comprehensive account of the Christian understanding of reality as expressed in Scripture.

Yet such an understanding is of more than intellectual importance; it serves to identify the church and safeguard its distinctiveness, so that it might not lose its "saltiness." Forsyth argued that the identity of the church requires definition if it is to continue in existence as a distinct entity. Doctrine, according to Forsyth, is essential to the life of the church, in that it both arises from and expresses that life. "A Church must always have a dogma, implicit or explicit. A cohesive Church must have a coherent creed. But it must (p 179) be a dogma the Church holds, not one that holds the Church. The life is in the body, not in the system.... The idea of a dogma, as the organized declaration or confession by any Church of its collective doctrine, is only the intellectual counterpart of the idea of the organized Church itself" (Forsyth 213).

There thus exist two pressures that make doctrine inevitable: the human desire to make sense of things and extend the horizons of understanding, and the social need for the church to offer a definition of its identity and boundaries. As Reinhard Hütter points out, there is a clear need for the church to possess a publicly recognizable, binding teaching that transcends individual beliefs or personal interpretations of biblical passages.

The development of doctrine has not been without its critics. For some, doctrine represents an unnecessary and distorting overlay on the Bible. Adolf von Harnack (1851–1930), one of the most significant German liberal Protestant theologians, argued that the development of doctrine or “dogma” was the result of the intrusion of Greek ideas into Christian theology. Harnack drew a sharp and ultimately indefensible distinction between “Hellenistic” and “Jewish” ways of thinking, arguing that doctrine represented the triumph of the former over the latter. Although this view was highly influential in the first half of the twentieth century, it is no longer regarded as acceptable.

Nevertheless, Harnack’s concerns remain significant, especially as they raise the question of how improper doctrinal developments may be identified and reformed. Are all doctrinal developments authentic? Certainly not. A good example of the problems arising from unchecked theological expansionism can be seen from the Middle Ages, which witnessed remarkable proliferation in doctrinal speculation, some of which seemed highly questionable. So how can such doctrines be assessed? And how can the situation be remedied? These questions were faced with the utmost seriousness during the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century. The mainline Reformers argued that there was an urgent need for the reform of the church. That there existed a Christian church in Europe prior to the Reformation was not to be doubted; it had, however, lost its way at the spiritual, theological, and ecclesiastical levels.

The Reformation is best seen as a demand for the church to set itself in order and return to more authentic and biblical ways of living and thinking. The use of the word “reform” is of critical importance; it points to the need for the reformation of an existing body: a Christian church existed in the form of the medieval Catholic Church in Europe, before the Reformation. Even though both Luther and Calvin were scathing in their criticisms of that church, their fundamental assumption was that this was a Christian church, even if it was severely distorted and confused.

The fundamental concern of Reformers such as Martin Luther and John Calvin was thus to recall the church to its biblical roots. The Reformers were particularly concerned that a series of beliefs and practices had developed within medieval Christianity that had little biblical basis. Luther and Calvin proposed to eliminate such beliefs and replace them with more biblical themes. The Reformation can be seen as an attempt to reaffirm the priority of Scripture in every aspect of Christian life and thought; it gave a new stimulus to doctrinal reflection.

One of the most important developments of this period was the emergence of works of biblical theology, works stressing that doctrine was directly grounded in Scripture. The most important of these was Calvin's Institutes, first published in 1536. "My object in this work," wrote Calvin, "is to so prepare and train students of sacred theology for the study of the word of God that they might have an easy access into it, and be able to proceed in it without hindrance" (preface [1539]). In effect, Calvin set out to provide a detailed work of systematic theology that demonstrated its rooting in Scripture at every point, offering a continuous interpretation of Scripture in doing so.

Although subjected to much criticism in recent years, the concept of doctrine now remains an assured element of Christian life and thought, particularly within evangelical circles. The recognition of the need for communally accepted interpretations of Scripture has been catalyzed by a series of debates, often focusing on the ideas of theological mavericks, which have met with vigorous responses from leading representatives of more orthodox positions. While evangelicals will always wish to insist upon the priority of Scripture over its interpreters, the importance and legitimate place of such communal interpretation is part of Christian intellectual discipleship. See also Creed; Historical Theology; Rule of Faith; Systematic Theology; Tradition

Bibliography

Betz, H. D. "Orthodoxy and Heresy in Primitive Christianity: Some Critical Remarks on Georg Strecker's (p 180) Republication of Walter Bauer's Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum." Interpretation 19 (1965): 299–311; Calvin, J. Institutio Christianae religionis. 2d ed. V. Ribelius, 1539; Chadwick, O. From Bossuet to Newman. Cambridge University Press, 1957; Cyril of Jerusalem, "Of Faith." Vol. 7 of NPNF2; Forsyth, P. T. The Person and Place of Jesus Christ. Independent Press, 1909; Gore, C. The Incarnation of the Son of God. John Murray, 1922; Hütter, R. "The Church as Public: Dogma, Practice and the Holy Spirit." ProEccl 3, no. 3 (1994): 334–61; McGrath, A. The Intellectual Origins of the European Reformation. 2d ed. Blackwell, 2003; Nichols, A. From Newman to Congar. T&T Clark, 1990; Orr, J. The Christian View of God and the World, as Centring in the Incarnation. Charles Scribner's Sons, 1908; Packer, J. I. "On from Orr: The Cultural Crisis, Rational Realism, and Incarnational Ontology." Crux 32, no. 3 (Sep 1996): 12–26; Torrance, T. F. "The Deposit of Faith." SJT 36 (1983): 1–28.

Alister E. McGrath

Dogma      See Creed; Doctrine; Rule of Faith; Systematic Theology; Tradition

(p 181) E

Earth/Land

“Earth” and “land” are both translations of erets, one of the most frequently used nouns in the Hebrew Scriptures. The roughly 2,400 references to earth, land, dry land, ground, and soil are a key to understanding both Israelite religion and the transformation of it wrought by Christianity powered by Greek thought.

Part of the lengthy conversation between the Samaritan woman and Jesus at Jacob’s well (John 4:20–24) captures the point perfectly.

“Our ancestors worshiped on this mountain, but you say that the place where people must worship is in Jerusalem.” Jesus said to her, “Woman, believe me, the hour is coming when you will worship the Father neither on this mountain nor in Jerusalem. You worship what you do not know; we worship what we know, for salvation is from the Jews. But the hour is coming, and is now here, when the true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and truth, for the Father seeks such as these to worship him. God is spirit, and those who worship him must worship in spirit and truth.” (NRSV)

Jews and Samaritans disagreed on where to worship God, but they agreed that there is an appropriate place to do so because God has a mountain home. John’s Jesus opposes the basic notion that where to worship God is even an issue at all. Proper worship is a matter of “spirit and truth,” not mountains. A proper relationship with God is not connected to land but to spirit. This made room for the Greek notion that revolutionized religion, leaving Jews, Samaritans, and anyone else who understands God to be connected to earthly events and places gaping in shock.

Christians, however, could not adopt the Platonic notion that meaning resides only in ideas and not in places, because they do not worship the God of the philosophers, but of the Jews, and they so must also attend to Scriptures besides John. Genesis teaches that God created the earth and its contents and blesses it. “The earth is the LORD’s” (Ps. 24:1) says that meaning does reside in concrete places, indeed, in every place, because of its origin and owner. Human beings are merely its stewards, authorized both to guard and to use it.

Yet Ps. 115:16 puts it forcefully: “Heaven belongs to God, and he has given the earth to mankind” (AT). In this vein, particular territories belong to different tribes and nations. God promises the land of Canaan to Abra(ha)m (Gen. 13:15; 17:8), his son Isaac (26:3–4), his grandson Jacob (28:13), and their offspring forever. Further, portions of the promised land are distributed to each of the twelve tribes from Jacob’s sons, except the tribe of Levi, which does not live from the land.

Even though specific lands are designated for various tribes and nations, the land itself ever remains God’s possession, with its own theological vocation. It glorifies God by providing a natural order that sustains life and supplies the needs of all living things. By controlling nature, God inspires awe, wonder, and praise at his wisdom and goodness, and we rejoice (Ps. 104). At the same time, the earth is God’s tool to reward obedience and punish wrongdoing. At God’s command, it can produce famine instead of plenty, or swallow up the disobedient (Num. 16:31–32). If we defile the earth with sexual impropriety and violence, it will vomit us up out of itself to be cleansed (Lev. 18:28).

OT theology teaches that piety is well formed when people properly understand God’s relationship to land. Places become memorials to divine grace and power. They are named or renamed after God does striking events in specific places in order to edify future generations. Hagar named the spring where an angel of God promised that her son, Ishmael, would be the father of a mighty nation. Because she had seen the Lord and lived, she named it Beer-lahai-roi, spring where one sees and lives (Gen. 16:7–14). Jacob, for example, renames Luz as Bethel, house of God, after his famous dream in which God reconfirms the promises made originally to Abraham, adding that he would accompany Jacob wherever he goes and bring him back to the land (28:10–22). Next, he named the ford of the Jabbok River as Peniel, the face of God, after wrestling with the angel of God (p 182) all night in preparation for meeting his brother Esau on the morn (32:24–32).

Perhaps the most striking example of how the Bible grounds religious identity in places is Josh. 3–4, Israel’s crossing of the Jordan River. It repeats Israel’s crossing of the Red Sea, but with a new generation that had never known Egypt. Here God authorizes Joshua to take Moses’ place as leader of the people. God stops the flow of the river and has the priests stand in the middle of the riverbed with the ark of the covenant while all the people file past to safety on the other side. When all have crossed, Joshua has a leader of each of the twelve tribes select a large stone from the riverbed. He sets them up to mark what has happened there as a sign of God’s favor, to stand as a reminder forever. According to the OT, the land itself proclaims the story of God and Israel, and the earth preaches Israel's God to the nations.

The NT charts a different path for Christianity by radically reconfiguring the connection between God and the land and people of promise. Physical Israel, both people and land, becomes spiritual Israel by faith, as suggested by John 4. Yet, Christianity cannot let go of the earth, because it is more grounded in the reality of Jesus Christ than in the power of human faith. Augustine of Hippo saw that Plato and his philosophical descendants had powerful insights into human psychology and morality. Still, he could not cut the cord between God and the earth because Jesus Christ has bridged the distance between earth and heaven. For Christians, he is the paramount (if not the only) place of God's grace and wisdom, which comes, not as ideas, but as one formed of the dust of the earth and the blood of human life.

It has proved difficult to hold together the two notions that meaning resides in place and that meaning resides in the power of ideas. Revelation picks up John's spiritualizing move. The argument between Jerusalem and Mt. Gerizim is still won by Jerusalem, but not the city of David. Now Jerusalem comes down from God out of heaven (Rev. 3:12; 21:2); indeed, it is heaven. One wonders whether contemporary postmoderns have retained the theological meaning of place in their zeal for the politics of personal sociological locatedness.

Bibliography

Brueggemann, W. The Land. Fortress, 1977; Wilken, R. L. The Land Called Holy. Yale University Press, 1992.

Ellen T. Charry

Ecclesiastes, Book of

Ecclesiastes is particularly challenging for theological interpretation. The vigorous debate among Jewish schools in the first century as to whether or not Ecclesiastes "defiled the hands" continues to this day. Now the discussion is about the extent to which Ecclesiastes is good news. A minority of scholars argues that Ecclesiastes affirms joy, while the majority finds it to be pessimistic, even hopeless.

History of Interpretation

By the fourth century CE, allegorical reading of Ecclesiastes was dominant among Jews and Christians, with "eating and drinking" being taken as referring to the Torah or the Eucharist, and the vanity element as a warning against excessive attachment to this world compared to “eternal” life. An allegorical reading of Ecclesiastes remained the dominant mode until the Reformation. It took the revival of literal interpretation by the Reformers to recover, for example, the possibility that “eating and drinking” refers to legitimate enjoyment of the God-given creation. Whether interpreted allegorically or literally, Ecclesiastes, prior to the rise of modern criticism, was read as Scripture, with the epilogue regarded as the key to the book.

Siegfried pioneered the source-critical approach to Ecclesiastes, identifying nine different sources in the book. Within English-speaking circles, McNeile and Barton developed more moderate source-critical approaches to Ecclesiastes. As the twentieth century progressed, a radical source-critical approach to Ecclesiastes became rare, and the book has come to be seen more and more as a unity, with the exception of the epilogue, which is almost universally seen as a later addition. The prime legacy of source criticism in the interpretation of Ecclesiastes is the tendency to read the book without the epilogue.

Hermann Gunkel initiated form-critical analysis of Wisdom literature, and the assessment of the forms used in Ecclesiastes has continued to play a fundamental role in the interpretation of the book. However, on the macrolevel of the form of Ecclesiastes, no consensus has been reached with regard to genre and structure. The tradition history of Ecclesiastes has been a matter of concern throughout the twentieth century. Within the OT wisdom tradition, Ecclesiastes has regularly been seen as a negative, skeptical reaction to mainline wisdom as represented by Proverbs. Gese identified Ecclesiastes with a crisis of wisdom (p 183) in Israel, but scholars remain divided over the existence and extent of this “crisis.”

A limited consensus has emerged out of historical-critical interpretation of Ecclesiastes. Few scholars nowadays defend Solomonic authorship; most regard Ecclesiastes as having been written by an unknown Jew around the latter part of the third century BCE. Most regard the book as a basic unity apart from the epilogue. However, there is no agreement regarding Ecclesiastes’ structure, message, and relationship to OT traditions and to international wisdom. Historical-critical scholarship differs from precritical readings in its general rejection of the need to harmonize Ecclesiastes with theological orthodoxy. However, this loss of theological constraint has not produced agreement about the message of Ecclesiastes, as, for example, the variety of proposals for translating hebel indicates.

In recent decades a variety of new reading strategies have been applied to Ecclesiastes.

Childs's canonical reading has led him to reappropriate the epilogue as the key to the canonical function of Ecclesiastes. Childs reads Ecclesiastes as a corrective within the broader wisdom tradition, comparable to James's relationship to Romans in the NT.

The literary turn in biblical studies in the 1970s resulted in a spate of fresh literary readings of Ecclesiastes. Wright ("Riddle of the Sphinx") has analyzed the structure of Ecclesiastes by means of a close reading along the lines of "New Criticism." The theme of Ecclesiastes is understood to be the impossibility of understanding what God has done. The only advice that Qoheleth (the "preacher" or "teacher" of Ecclesiastes) gives is to enjoy life while one can. Loader (Polar) performs a modified structuralist reading of Ecclesiastes, whereby he discerns polar opposites as the heart of its structure. These polar opposites reflect the tension between Ecclesiastes' view and that of general wisdom. However, for Loader, Ecclesiastes finally is negative; he rescues it theologically as a negative witness to the gospel.

Perry approaches Ecclesiastes as the transcript of a debate between Qoheleth (K) and the Presenter (P). Perry argues that Ecclesiastes elaborates on the paradigmatic contradiction in Hebrew Scripture that is introduced in the creation story of Genesis. It has to do with the way religious consciousness distinguishes itself from empirical or experiential modes of viewing life. Fox ("Frame") proposes reading Ecclesiastes as a narrative-wisdom text, with openness to distinguishing between narrator, implied author, and Qoheleth. Longman, Christianson, and others have pursued Fox's narrative proposal in a variety of ways. There are also examples of poststructuralist, feminist, and psychoanalytic (Zimmerman) readings of Ecclesiastes.

Hearing the Message of Ecclesiastes

There is something wonderfully ironic about a book on the enigma of life being terribly difficult to grasp, so that Ecclesiastes enacts its own message. Yet the following hermeneutical steps enable us to discern that message.

First, it is important to read Ecclesiastes and not just "Qoheleth." The legacy of historical criticism is to try to get behind the text to the "real Qoheleth." However, the case for reading the book as a literary whole is compelling; one is always on highly speculative ground when trying to get to the "real Qoheleth." The way forward is to focus on the different voices in Ecclesiastes, inquiring after the perspective of the implied author. Perry, Fox, Longman, and Christianson have done important work in this direction.

Second, reading the text as a literary whole must involve taking the epilogue seriously as part of that whole. An urgent issue in Ecclesiastes scholarship is to reopen the debate about how the epilogue relates to the main body of the text.

Third, Ecclesiastes must be read in the context of the canon of Scripture and especially of the OT Wisdom literature. Fox (Time) has done seminal work on the epistemology of Qoheleth in comparison with Proverbs and rightly argues that Qoheleth's epistemology is empiricist, whereas that of Proverbs is not. However, Fox does not note the significance of this for the canonical interpretation of Ecclesiastes. Although Qoheleth goes out of his way to stress that he embarked on his quest by khokmah (1:13; 2:3), the key elements of his epistemology are reason and experience alone, and these always lead him down to the hebel hebalim ("vanity of vanities") conclusion (1:2; 12:8). Read against Proverbs, in which "the fear of the LORD is the beginning [foundation and starting point] of wisdom" (9:10), it becomes apparent how ironic Qoheleth's description of his epistemology is. In this sense Ecclesiastes is an ironic exposure of an empiricist epistemology as always leading one to a hebel conclusion. Further work needs to be done on irony and epistemology in Ecclesiastes.

Fourth, considerable attention needs to be given to the poetics of Ecclesiastes. Only comparatively recently have scholars come to recognize that the Wisdom books are literary compositions (p 184) in their own right. Repetition, for example, is a significant characteristic of Ecclesiastes. Most significant are the repetitions of the hebel (vanity) conclusion and the joy/carpe diem passages. From one angle the history of the interpretation of Ecclesiastes is a sustained attempt to level the book to one or the other of these two poles. Either the joy passages are made subsidiary to the negative hebel conclusion, or the hebel passages are made subsidiary to the joy conclusion. The crucial question is how the hebel passages relate to the joy passages.

My suggestion is that in Ecclesiastes the hebel conclusions, arrived at via Qoheleth's empiricism applied to the area he examines, are juxtaposed with the joy passages, which express the positive perspective on life that Qoheleth received from his Jewish upbringing. These perspectives are set in contradictory juxtaposition so that, in the reading, gaps are opened up that have to be filled as the reader moves forward. The book thereby raises for readers the question of how these perspectives are to be related. Especially in the postexilic context in which Ecclesiastes was probably written, it would have been tempting for Israelites to use reason and experience to conclude that life is hebel hebalim.

A crucial question is whether or not Ecclesiastes itself gives us clues as to how to bridge the gaps between these perspectives. Understanding the irony of Qoheleth's epistemology is one major clue, telling us that if one starts with reason and experience alone in difficult situations, one will always end up with hebel. The other major clues to bridging the gaps come toward the end of the book. Normally in Ecclesiastes, a hebel conclusion is reached and then juxtaposed with a joy passage. Toward the end of the book this order is reversed (11:8–10), and particularly important is the exhortation prefacing the final section before the epilogue: "Remember your creator" followed by a threefold "before ..." (12:1–8). This exhortation to remember is the equivalent of starting with the fear of the Lord. It means developing a perspective integrally shaped by a view of this world as being the Lord's.

Ecclesiastes and the Canon

Read positively, Ecclesiastes complements rather than contradicts Proverbs and Job. Proverbs is already well aware of retributive paradox (Gladson), especially in its latter chapters; Job and Ecclesiastes explore such paradox in detail, Job through a story of terrible suffering, and Ecclesiastes through an intellectual struggle for meaning. Also, Ecclesiastes, with its affirmation of creation and its understanding of work as toil and life as hebel, has strong links with Gen. 1–3.

Ecclesiastes never is quoted in the NT, although Rom. 8:20 perhaps alludes to it, as mataiotēs (frustration, futility) is the usual Septuagint word for hebel. Ecclesiastes, like Proverbs, hopes for justice, although it manifests no doctrine of the new creation, as do some of the prophets and the whole NT. Like Proverbs, Ecclesiastes contains reflections upon diverse topics such as wealth, pleasure, work, time, injustice, wisdom and folly, and government. Considerable work remains to be done in exploring these themes in relation to the rest of the Bible.

Ecclesiastes and Theology

The theological relevance of Ecclesiastes depends upon one's reading of it. Read as negative and hopeless, Ecclesiastes' only contribution will be as a negative witness to the gospel. However, a positive reading of Ecclesiastes indicates that it has an important positive contribution to make theologically.

Qoheleth's affirmation of joy is an expression of the doctrine of creation. In line with the goodness of creation, Qoheleth celebrates life under the motifs of eating and drinking, working, and enjoying marriage. This is not hedonism in the context of despair, but an affirmation of life as God has made it.

In a fallen world there is much that raises the most serious questions about the goodness of life. The empirical strength of those questions comes into focus in the hebel passages and conclusions. In terms of pastoral theology, Ecclesiastes is most important in its juxtaposition of hebel and joy in the experience of Qoheleth as he wrestles with the value of life under the sun. Ecclesiastes explores the struggle that believers go through as they endeavor to affirm life amid suffering, injustice, and disillusionment.

Qoheleth's struggle is more intellectual than that of Job. His quest is summed up in a rhetorical question: "What do people gain from all the toil at which they toil under the sun?" (1:3 NRSV). Central to Qoheleth's quest is the issue of how we know in such a way that we can trust the results—epistemology. In my view, Ecclesiastes is an ironic exposure of a way of knowing that depends upon reason and experience alone, as opposed to an approach that starts with remembering one's Creator, with faith and obedience. Ecclesiastes explores these issues in a narrative (p 185) fashion, telling the story of Qoheleth's quest. It is not a philosophical book. Nevertheless, it does have implications for the theology of epistemology. In line with Proverbs and Job, Ecclesiastes affirms the importance of a theological starting point comparable to "faith seeking understanding." Ecclesiastes' exposure of empiricism and its logical consequences are of great contemporary relevance in the face of the nihilism so common in postmodernism.

Bibliography

Barton, G. A. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Ecclesiastes. ICC. T&T Clark, 1912; Childs, B. Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture. Fortress, 1979; Christianson, E. S. A Time to Tell. Sheffield Academic Press, 1998; Fox, M. "Frame Narrative and Composition in the Book of Qoheleth." HUCA 48 (1977): 83–106; idem. A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up. Eerdmans, 1999; Gese, H. "The Crisis of Wisdom in Koheleth." Pages 141–53 in Theodicy in the Old Testament, ed. J. Crenshaw. Fortress, 1983; Gladson, J. A. Retributive Paradoxes in Proverbs 10–29. University Microfilms International, 1979; Loader, J. A. Ecclesiastes. Eerdmans, 1986; idem. Polar Structures in the Book of Qohelet. De Gruyter, 1979; Longman, T. The Book of Ecclesiastes. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1998; McNeile, A. H. An Introduction to Ecclesiastes: With Notes and Appendices. Cambridge University Press, 1904; Perry, T. A. Dialogues with Koheleth. Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993; Siegfried, C. Prediger und Hoheslied. HAT. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1898; Wright, A. G. "The Riddle of the Sphinx: The Structure of the Book of Qoheleth." CBQ 30 (1968): 313–34; idem. "The Riddle of the Sphinx Revisited: Numerical Patterns in the Book of Qoheleth." CBQ 42 (1980): 38–51; Zimmerman, F. The Inner World of Qoheleth. Ktav, 1973.

Craig G. Bartholomew

Echo See Intertextuality; Relationship between the Testaments

Egyptology See Ancient Near Eastern Background Studies

Eisegesis See Exegesis

Election See Church, Doctrine of the; Covenant; Israel; Violence

Enlightenment

This is a historical designation used initially in English-speaking scholarship to describe the ideological program of the eighteenth-century French philosophes, but which became a general descriptor identifying the eighteenth century as a progressive social epoch, promoting secular intellectual freedom and representative government against the oppressive forces of tradition. This broader meaning of the term corresponds to the German concept of Aufklärung, defined by Immanuel Kant in 1784 as both a spiritual force and method of truth that rejects “self-incurred tutelage” to authorities that represent old ideas of the past. To be mature and free, a person must analyze the reality of the human condition apart from the conventional wisdom of religious dogma and the divine right of kings. “Sapere aude,” said Kant, “ ‘Dare to use your own reason!’—that is the motto of enlightenment.”

Kant’s essay captured the spirit of an age that had been in formation for over a century. Reacting to the wars of religion that engulfed Europe between the death of Luther in 1546 and the Glorious Revolution of 1688, an intellectual avant-garde felt compelled to examine the rational basis for society and its improvement. This examination was dependent especially upon Thomas Hobbes (Leviathan, 1651) and Baruch Spinoza (Theological-Political Tractate, 1670), both of whom treated the mutual alliance of religion and politics as the source of corruption and tyranny in the social order. Drawing upon ancient Epicurean thought, Hobbes and Spinoza construed historical religion essentially as “superstition,” which manipulates “the fear of the gods” in order that priest and prince may dominate a largely unlettered populace. To make their case, both philosophers interpreted the Bible not as the revelation of a timeless ecclesiastical dogma, whether Catholic or Protestant, but rather as largely the profane story of the human effort to usurp divine sovereignty for political purposes. The corrupting force of political power is the key hermeneutical idea needed to understand Scripture. It is the meaning behind the text. The Bible must be read like any other book: its purposes are defined by the human motivations of its writers.

According to Spinoza, the only exception to this harsh and suspicious interpretation of the Bible is the teaching of Christ. Against religious superstition, Christ teaches that the Law and the Prophets—that is, the essential content of the Bible—are summed up in the commandments to love God and neighbor. These commandments are the foundation of a natural religion of reason. To read the Bible according to Christ is not easy because of the way religious and political authorities use it. The rational interpretation of Scripture requires an educated elite that will exegete the text independently of dogmatic considerations.

A comparable position is advanced in English Deism, which formed its philosophy in reaction (p 186) to the turmoil of the civil war and its aftermath in the Restoration. John Locke (A Letter concerning Toleration, 1689) asserts that religion is a matter of free, private association in which like-minded individuals worship God in their own way. Neither government nor the established church should interfere with this freedom. By noninterference they bear the true “mark” of Christ, which is toleration. “The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them, said our Savior to his disciples, but ye shall not be so, Luke xxii, 25, 26.”

On the continent, Pierre Bayle grounded religious toleration not in the teaching of Christ but in methodological skepticism. In his notorious and influential Historical and Critical Dictionary (1695–97), Bayle asserts that rational inquiry, because it leads to doubt, serves true religion in that it tests the proper basis of faith: “God does not want [our minds] to find a standing ground too easily and sets traps for it on all sides.” No “truth” is so certain that it may be used to suppress the free expression of ideas.

This conviction became a commonplace among the French philosophes such as Denis Diderot and Voltaire, and also in the philosophy of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. In their work outright hostility to Christianity is barely disguised. In the Social Contract (1762), for example, Rousseau judges Christianity to be the enemy of a just social order, arguing that Christ set up on earth “a spiritual kingdom, which, by separating the theological from the political system, made the state no longer one.” Christians cannot be trusted to be good citizens because their allegiance is divided. The effort to de-Christianize France in the fanatical phase of the French Revolution was a direct result of this opinion.

Suspicion of Christianity also underlies the secular impulse of the American Revolution. Reflecting on the significance of the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson declared it to be “the signal of arousing men to burst the chains under which monkish ignorance and superstition had persuaded them to bind themselves, and to assume the blessings and security of self-government.” Jefferson saw the history of Christianity as little more than a “slaughterhouse.”

The “enlightened” ideas of tolerance and free inquiry, especially as these ideas are grounded in an Epicurean suspicion of religion, were embraced even among those who ostensibly served the church as pastors and teachers. This is clear in the work of Hermann Samuel Reimarus, whose Apology for the Rational Worshipers of God was written in secret and did not appear in print until after his death. In 1777–78, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing anonymously published portions of the manuscript as Fragments and caused a sensation. In the Fragments, Reimarus claims that the accounts of the resurrection in the Gospels are fraudulent narratives concocted by the disciples for political advantage. Jesus himself was an admirable but disillusioned moral teacher of the imminent kingdom of God, an idea common to Judaism of the time. For the future of modern historical research of the Bible, Reimarus is crucially important. He is the first to place the teaching of Jesus in contextual continuity with Judaism and to see it as reflecting an eschatological worldview. Lessing’s ugly broad ditch resulted, between history’s accidental truths and the demands of reason.

Perhaps Kant summed up the thrust of the Enlightenment with regard to religion by his understanding of Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793). In “moral religion,” he says, “it is a basic principle that each must do as much as lies in his power to become a better man.” Whether Jesus Christ and Scripture serve this basic principle may have been a matter of debate among the proponents of Enlightenment. What was not in debate among them was the principle itself.

Bibliography

In addition to primary sources mentioned: Harrisville, R. A., and W. Sundberg. The Bible in Modern Culture. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 2002.

Walter Sundberg

Ephesians, Book of

No NT writing more joyfully celebrates God’s grace in the gospel than does Ephesians, nor does any contain so rich and concentrated a vein of theological gold. This short letter’s profound and extensive influence on the church’s thought, liturgy, and piety ranks with that of the much longer Psalms, John, and Romans (on the letter’s history of influence, see Schnackenburg 311–45). It was Calvin’s favorite letter, and Coleridge was later to pronounce it “the divinest composition of man.” In more recent times Ephesians has come to be thought pseudepigraphical, and consequently marginalized in Pauline studies. In the meantime, contemporary focus on both ecumenical theology and on canonical readings of the biblical writings has helped to maintain something of the letter’s former prominence.

(p 187)History of Interpretation

Ephesians has been a central text throughout the history of the church, the subject of many commentaries from Origen, Chrysostom, and Jerome onward, and continually thereafter ransacked for its spiritual and theological treasures. With the Reformation, and the modernist quest that followed it, the letter came increasingly to be read as a unified discourse with its own distinct message. This tendency was radically sharpened by increasing doubts in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries concerning its authenticity and its Ephesian destination.

Increasingly interpreters propose that “Ephesians” was written by an admiring disciple of Paul, late in the first century—one who wrote in a different style from the apostle. This author was far more heavily dependent on Colossians than Paul ever was on his own writings (about a third of the wordings of Colossians, and many of its main themes, appear in Ephesians) and was offering what he saw as the essential legacy of the apostle’s theology for a new time and circumstances. It is argued that the (pseudonymous) writer no longer actively hopes for an imminent return of Christ and, indeed, has replaced the whole shape of Paul’s largely future hope with a realized eschatology, in which believers are already raised from death and exalted with Christ into the heavenly places (2:1–10; 1:3–4; allegedly contra 1 Cor. 4:8; 15:1–54; and Rom. 6:1–11; but see Col. 2:11–13). It is held that the writer has left Paul’s theology of the cross for a theology of glory instead, and that he has given ecclesiology a radical new direction and extravagant prominence as the “universal church” (whereas, it is often asserted, Paul himself uses ekklēsia only of local congregations; but per contra, see Gal. 1:13; 1 Cor. 10:32; 12:28; 15:9; Phil. 3:6). It is also said that he has moved toward a supersessionist view of Israel and the law, in which the church replaces Israel as the people of God (2:14–18; contra Rom. 9–11; for an accessible account of all these alleged shifts, see, e.g., Lincoln and Wedderburn, ch. 8).

Other interpreters, however, consider Ephesians authentic and see most of the claimed shifts as either exaggerated or already present in its “companion” letter, Colossians (cf. Col. 4:7–8//Eph.

6:21–22), and/or generated by the letter’s more general, doxological, visionary, and exhortatory purposes (so, e.g., Arnold, Moritz, and the major commentaries by Barth, O’Brien, and Hoehner).

The Style of Theologizing in Ephesians

Unlike other Pauline letters, Ephesians does not directly tackle some particular local or immediately strategic concerns. Yet it was probably intended primarily to be read alongside Colossians in the Lycus valley churches (possibly as the “letter from [nearby] Laodicea,” Col. 4:16), and as a partial prophylactic against the danger there of syncretistic veneration of angelic powers (see Arnold). Instead, Ephesians is dominated by (1) blessing of God for the cosmic reconciliation he has begun in Christ (1:3–14 [esp. 1:9–10]; 3:20–21); (2) prayer that the readers might spiritually comprehend this gospel and be fully grasped by it (1:15–2:10; 3:1, 14–21); and (3) an integrally corresponding ethical exhortation to live out that good news together in a unity that exemplifies it to the cosmos (4:1–6:17).

The writer deliberately builds important stages in the letter around material already regarded as core “creedal” tradition in the Pauline churches, including a significant vein of OT texts largely read christologically (cf. Pss. 8 and 110 in 1:20–23; Isa. 52 and 57 in 2:14–18; Ps. 68 in 4:8–10; Isa. 26 and 60 in 5:14; Gen. 2:24 in 5:30–32; and Isa. 11, 52, and 59 in 6:10–17: see Moritz, passim; Best, Essays, ch. 3). And this short letter is so densely packed with the apostle’s major themes that it has been hailed as the “crown” and “quintessence” of Paulinism. But the style of address is not Paul’s usual “argument” or expository discourse as much as it is thankful, prayer-filled celebration and exhortation, written with the zeal, idealism, and burning enthusiasm of the visionary. The writer almost certainly feels that he himself powerfully experiences the very “Spirit of wisdom and revelation” which he prays for his readers (1:17), and that the eyes of his own heart have thereby been opened to comprehend the rich glory of the gospel (1:18–2:8; 3:2–10). He senses that by this Spirit he is already deeply united with the ascended Lord (1:3; 2:5–6). By the same Spirit (3:16) he has already begun to know the depths of Christ’s love and to be filled with the eschatological fullness of God (3:18–19). And it is as one full of this Spirit (5:18) that he pours out his doxological and edificatory address.

The form and style of address—together with the concrete content of Paul’s prayer for his readers in 1:17–2:10 and 3:1, 14–19—underscore that the apostle regards authentic theological understanding (the sort that enlivens and transforms) as fully possible only in the community (not in mere “individuality”) that experiences the charismatic (p 188)self-revealing and transforming presence of God’s Spirit.

The Substantive Content, Shape, and Contribution of the Letter’s Theology

For the sake of brevity, in what follows I distribute, under separate headings (like so many separated bones, muscles, and other organs), parts that Ephesians holds together in interconnected, full-bodily motion.

Theology. Written from a Jewish-Christian perspective, from the very outset (1:3–14) Ephesians patently blesses Israel’s God. He is the almighty author of creation and the promised new creation (1:4; cf. 2:15; 3:11 [cf. 4:6]; 4:24), working out his sovereign pretemporal will to the eschatological praise of his glorious grace (1:6, 11–14). That grace focuses on fulfillment in Christ of the promises made to Israel of corporate “sonship” (now, yes, but primarily eschatological: 1:5–6, as in Rom. 8:23); new-exodus “redemption” from slavery/sin (1:7); “sealing” (with the Spirit: 1:13), and final “inheritance,” in which God takes full possession of his people (1:14; cf. 1:18). At that point he will bring all things into the open cosmic unity and harmony of reconciliation with himself, which has already begun in the church in and through Christ (1:9–10; cf. 1:22–23; 3:19).

In Pelagian and especially in Reformation and later debates, attention fell on the opening eulogy’s emphasis on God as the sovereign source of election and predestination (1:3–5, 9–11), and on what it means to affirm that this is accomplished “in Christ.” Unresolved is the question whether behind the evident corporate nature of the election (the “we”/“us” stands for the congregation of God’s people in Christ) there is also an implied election/predestination of individuals into the church: the latter is exegetically improbable (but not theologically thereby excluded).

But (as with other NT writings) God’s identity is supremely revealed as “the God and Father of our Lord Jesus” (1:3 NRSV, italics added; cf. 1:17)—not so much on the basis of the number of times such expressions are used, as on the letter’s profoundly christocentric (proto-binitarian) shape.

Christology. In most ways Ephesians recapitulates the teaching of Paul’s other letters, including emphasis on Jesus as (1) the Christ; (2) the unique Lord (exalted to God’s right hand, and thence as “head of all things,” sharing his cosmic rule: see esp. 1:20–23; cf. 4:6); and (3) the Son of God. As elsewhere, he is also an Adamic figure who is the beginning (1:4), the paradigm (4:20–24; 5:1–2, 25–32), and the end of God's purposes with humankind (1:10; 4:13, 15–16). As in other Paulines, the Lord is invoked as the co-source, with the Father, of “grace and peace” (1:2; cf. 6:23), but uniquely also of “love and faith/faithfulness” (6:23–24). Paul usually refers to God as providing the “grace” of his apostolate and other ministries, through the Spirit, and Ephesians maintains the same (e.g., 3:2, 7), but much more explicitly than at (e.g.) 1 Cor. 12:5, describes the ascended Christ as the (co-)giver of the varied ministry gifts (4:10–12). Similarly, in Ephesians the risen Christ, like God, uniquely “fill[s] all things” (4:10), especially the church (1:22–23). Grasping the infinite love of Christ means to be filled with all the fullness of God (3:17). All this amounts to a deep-level “binitarian” Christology. It is matched by Paul's first explicit exhortation that Spirit-filled congregational worship should regularly involve singing and making melody to the Lord Jesus as well as giving thanks to the Father through (or “in the name of”) the Lord Jesus (5:18–20). To mark Jesus as the expected recipient of full and regular worship, alongside the Father, was thus to include him within the identity of the One God/Lord of Israel (cf. 4:5–6; 1 Cor. 8:5–6; and the Shema [Deut. 6:4], on which they depend). That in turn was self-consciously to move into some form of binitarian monotheism (see Hurtado), and to provide the basis for pronounced liturgical developments.

Two more distinctive christological emphases may be mentioned: (1) Eph. 4:8–10 speaks of a descent and ascent of Christ. In conjunction with 1 Pet. 3:18–19, this has been taken (from the fathers onward) as a descent from the cross to hades (e.g., to harrow the imprisoned spirits), followed by resurrection-ascension. But this is exegetically implausible (in both letters!) and breaks the contextually required symmetry of the ascent-descent pattern, which might be ascent to heaven followed by corresponding re-descent (in the gift of the Spirit: so Lincoln; Harris). More probably it is the incarnational descent from heaven to earth, and then to the humiliation of the cross (= “the very lowest parts” AT), followed by corresponding ascent in resurrection-exaltation (see Schnackenburg; O'Brien; Hoehner). (2) The confession of Jesus as “head” of the ecclesial body is said to shift from the image of the local church as a whole body (including head, ears, eyes, etc., in 1 Cor. 12) to a universal church seen as an otherwise headless torso-and-limbs. But more probably as head to the church, Christ is portrayed (p 189) as a lordly husband to his bride in a “one-body” union (5:22–31).

Pneumatology. The teaching on the Spirit in Ephesians is far more extensive than in its companion letter, Colossians, but also much closer to that of Paul's other letters (contra Adai; see Hui). The Spirit is the self-manifesting, transforming, and empowering presence of God—and of Christ—most probably the personal executive power by which both the Father and the Son indwell and “fill” the church (cf. 2:18, 22; 3:16–19), and direct (3:5; 4:30; 6:18), shape (1:17–19; 4:3), inspire (5:18), and empower it (1:17–19; 6:17; cf. 4:10–16). As such, the Spirit is essentially proto-trinitarian in character (Turner, “Trinitarian”).

Salvation/Reconciliation/Cosmic Unity. At the theological heart of Ephesians glows the multifaceted jewel of the ineffable “mystery” revealed in the gospel (cf. 1:9–10; 3:3–4, 6–9; 5:32; 6:19; cf. Caragounis). This, while planned in eternity, was “set forth” paradigmatically in the Christ event (1:9 ESV, NRSV) as God’s eschatological intention to (re-)unite “all things” in cosmic harmony with himself in Christ (1:10; cf. Col. 1:18–20). Many fathers from Irenaeus onward took the key verb anakephalaiōsasthai to mean “recapitulate” (i.e., to restore in the new head, Christ, all that was lost in the old, Adam). Others preferred to see a simpler allusion to 1:23, and took the verb to mean “to bring under (the) one head, Christ” (cf. NJB). The majority, however, recognize the verb means “to sum up/gather up” as under one kephalaion (= heading). The background assumption (as at Col. 1:18–20) is that creation has been plunged by sin into a chaos of alienations. Correspondingly, the hoped-for “summing up” takes the specific form of the reuniting of all things (or “reconciling” thereof: so Col. 1:20) in cosmic peace and harmony. This is the vision that fundamentally stamps all else in the letter (see Turner, “Mission”). It is a vision the author believes has been decisively inaugurated through Christ’s redemptive (1:7), and especially in his reconciling, death (2:14–18). In a horizontal dimension the cross tears down (in principle) the wall of alienation dividing the two ancient divisions of humankind (Jew and Gentile), previously generated by the law, and allows the former two to be re-created as one new humanity in Christ (2:14–15). But in a vertical dimension the cross also reconciles both these groups to God (2:16–17), creating a church that thereby already exemplifies (to the world and to the heavenly hosts: cf. 3:10!) the beginnings of the cosmic reunification and messianic peace (2:18) in 1:9–10. That salvation has at least fully dawned in the transforming faith-union that joins Jew and Gentile with the exalted Lord (2:6, 8); even though it has yet to be consummated.

Eschatology. Contrary to the assertion of some interpreters, the author does not believe the vision of 1:9–10 is already fully accomplished. He looks out onto a still largely benighted unbelieving “old” humanity, alienated from God, from the church, and from each other; dead in sin, and under the malign influence of the evil one (cf. 2:1–5; 4:17–20; 5:11–14). Even for the church itself, the days are evil (5:15; 6:13) and beset by encircling hosts of opposing powers (6:10–17; 4:27). Its day of redemption and inheritance (1:11–14, 18; 4:30) still essentially lies in the temporal future, which readers will naturally identify (from Col. 3:4, or from the Pauline tradition more generally) with the parousia. Ephesians does, however, take up the Pauline apocalyptic belief that the eschatological blessings already exist in the heavenly places, and that believers already share in these by virtue of their union with Christ. Ephesians gives distinct emphasis to this (esp. 1:3–14) and in 2:6 can even assert that believers are raised up and enthroned with Christ there (themes closely paralleled in Col. 2:12–13; 3:1–4). But this does not mean a shift to an overrealized eschatology, as is so often asserted. It is partly the regular bold assurance of eschatological benediction. More specifically, though, it is joyful affirmation of faith’s close, partly reciprocal, indwelling between the believer and the heavenly Lord. Just as experience of the Spirit as “down payment” (1:14) of our inheritance is a foretaste of the eschatological fullness of Christ (1:23; 3:18–19; 4:10), so by the same Spirit we are now present to Christ, and so “with him,” and share in his exaltation. And this sharing “with” him in the heavenlies is no triumphalism: it does not lift the believer out of earthly existence, with all its individual, household, and community responsibilities to live the cruciform life of openness, meekness, love, and service (see below).

People of God/Church/New Humanity/Ministry. In no Pauline letter is the church so remarkably prominent (see Schnackenburg 293–310, 321–31; Best, Critical and Exegetical Commentary 622–41). Ephesians develops many ecclesiological themes present in other Pauline letters, especially Colossians. Thus, the church is the holy “people of God” (= the saints), fulfilling the destiny of Israel. It is the body over which Christ is the head (Eph. 1:22//Col. 1:18; 2:10; Eph. 4:15//Col. 2:19). It is God’s ekklēsia (assembly), probably meaning the multiple and distinct earthly representation (p 190) of the one heavenly and eschatological assembly (against the view that it is simply the universal earthly church, see O’Brien), the temple he indwells (Eph. 2:20–22; cf. 1 Cor. 3:16–17; 2 Cor. 6:16–18). But Ephesians brings distinctive emphases to bear. The temple is being built on the foundation of the fundamental apostolic/prophetic revelation of its essentially concorporate nature (fusing Jew and Gentile; 2:20–22; 3:5–6).

The church is also portrayed as a single developing body, one growing harmoniously from childhood toward Christlike (eschatological?) maturity, the “complete man.” In this growth it is shaped, and held together, by the ministries that the Lord gives (4:10–16). Or to vary the metaphor again (sharply so in gender!), it is a body that is Christ's bride, and he is head over it as a husband to his wife (5:22–32; cf. 2 Cor. 11:2, but there the bride is a single congregation, and Paul its “best man”). The church is also the one new-creation humanity (2:15; 4:20–24), which, while not effacing the Jew/Gentile distinction (readers can still be addressed as “You Gentiles,” 2:11; 3:1), embraces both in a unity that transcends such distinction (and any other racial division). It has a fundamentally “Israel” bias and shape and fulfills its hopes and destiny (2:11–18, esp. 12–13), but takes its singular most-defining identity from the ultimate reconciling self-giving of the (Jewish) Christ (4:20–21, 32; 5:1–2). In a context of Jewish mysticism, where the veneration of the heavenly beings was a potentially divisive threat (see Colossians), the soteriology, eschatology, and ecclesiology of the letter could hardly be more sharply relevant.

Ethics. Not surprisingly, the one main and urgent task of the church (as the writer composes his three chapters of ethical exhortation) is to maintain, and visibly live out, the cosmic unity/harmony begun in Christ (4:1–3). This means much more than merely ensuring that Gentile converts are treated on fully equal terms with Jewish believers (2:11–20; 3:5–6): it also means that all must renounce the old-creation patterns of alienated and alienating behavior (4:17–31; 5:3–15). Instead, they must adopt the cruciform virtues that recognize the authentic self, in God's likeness (not the smothered self of totalitarian regimes!), as belonging to and for the other. Thus they embrace ways of being/living that build the community's varied relationships and thereby give them previously unimaginable and joyful depth (esp. 4:25, 29; 4:32–5:2; 5:15–20, but throughout: cf. Turner, “Mission,” 148–60). No better paradigm can Paul provide than that of authentic marriage, which models the Christ-church relationship (5:22–32), and none has been more influential. But we would miss the apostle's point entirely if we took it just to be his later, more-considered teaching on marriage than that in 1 Cor. 7: he intends this portrayal of marriage to illumine all Christian relationships.

Powers and Spiritual Warfare. No Pauline letter—other than the sister letter, Colossians—gives such attention to principalities and powers. Arnold has argued that this is evoked by Ephesian fears of demonic magical powers associated with the Artemis cult. Perhaps more probable is that Paul fears the influence of Jewish-Christian teaching (primarily in the Lycus valley) about mystical heavenly ascent, and concomitant undue reverence for angelic beings. In terms of the history of interpretation, pride of place has certainly been given to Eph. 6:10–20. But while this passage has regularly been taken as a kind of specialist appendix on how to deal with the evil powers, it is much more convincingly understood as a fitting summary and conclusion to the themes of the whole letter (Lincoln).

Ephesians and the Canon

With relatively few exceptions, those who consider Ephesians pseudonymous still warmly commend its message. Its place in the canon restores a reading of it as complementary to Paul's letters and, indeed, even the "crown of Paulinism," rather than as any kind of substantial reassessment of it. As recognized above, it also dramatically highlights the universal, heavenly, and eschatological nature of the church as a community of cosmic reunification.

Ephesians and Theology

There is hardly a sentence of Ephesians that has not been deeply influential on Christian theology. But it is the letter's ecclesiology of cosmic reunification that has deservedly given it a place of singular import in contemporary theological discussion. Ephesians 2 has sparked important discussion of racial hostility (Rader). Ephesians 4:1–3, 7–16 has profoundly inspired various kinds of ecumenical theology of church and ministry. Many of these constitute a challenge to an evangelical tendency to point to Christ rather than to the church (which Ephesians would surely have seen as a false antithesis and even possibly as a betrayal of the church's calling). But the letter also emerges in theology as a challenge to contemporary individualism, and as a call for a radically (p 191) new and engaging understanding of the "self" and authentic personhood (see, e.g., Ford).

See also Powers and Principalities

Bibliography

Arnold, C. Ephesians. Cambridge University Press, 1989; Barth, M. Ephesians. 2 vols. AB 34–34A. Doubleday, 1974; Best, E. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Ephesians. T&T Clark, 1998; idem. Essays on Ephesians. T&T Clark, 1997; Caragounis, C. C. The Ephesian "Mysterion". Gleeup, 1977; Ford, D. Self and Salvation. Cambridge University Press, 1999; Harris, W. H., III. The Descent of Christ. Brill, 1996; Hoehner, H. Ephesians. Baker, 2002; Hui, A. W. D. "The Concept of the Holy Spirit in Ephesians." TynBul 44 (1993): 379–82; Hurtado, L. Lord Jesus Christ. Eerdmans, 2003; Lincoln, A. Ephesians. WBC 42. Word, 1990; Lincoln, A., and A. J. M. Wedderburn. The Theology of the Later Pauline Letters. Cambridge University Press, 1993; Moritz, T. A Profound Mystery. Brill, 1996; O'Brien, P. T. "The Church as a Heavenly and Eschatological Entity." Pages 88–119 in The Church in the Bible and the World, ed. D. A. Carson. Baker, 1987; Rader, W. The Church and Racial Hostility. Mohr, 1978; Schnackenburg, R. The Epistle to the Ephesians. T&T Clark, 1991; Turner, M. “Mission and Meaning in Terms of ‘Unity’ in Ephesians.” Pages 138–66 in Mission and Meaning, ed. A. Billington, T. Lane, and M. Turner. Paternoster, 1995; idem. “‘Trinitarian’ Pneumatology in the New Testament?—Towards an Explanation of the Worship of Jesus.” Asbury Theological Journal 58 (2003): 167–86.

Max Turner

Epistemology

This branch of philosophy, also called theory of knowledge, considers issues such as the sources of knowledge, the means by which knowledge claims can be justified, and the relationship between justification and truth. Though philosophers have addressed it since the beginning, it became the center of philosophical inquiry in the modern era; now, however, there are those who question its necessity or legitimacy.

From Medieval to Modern

Medieval thought recognized two categories of knowledge: scientia, based on the model of geometry; and opinio, or probable knowledge, based on approbation by authority. The rejection of traditional authority as a legitimate source of knowledge has been attributed to the race’s “coming of age” and rejecting religious superstition. A more credible account involves the problem of too many authorities created by the Reformation (Stout). At the beginning of the seventeenth century, bloodshed due to theological differences challenged epistemologists to provide a rational method for settling disputes (Toulmin). René Descartes (1596–1650), the “father” of modern philosophy, proposed to reject all he had been taught and then rebuild a system of knowledge by means of demonstrative (geometrical) reasoning. In his quest for certitude, he deployed two metaphors that shaped epistemological theories for the next three hundred years: the metaphor of knowledge as a building and the image of the “veil of ideas.” It is ironic that these metaphors are a continuing source of skepticism, as seen below.

Foundationalism. It is now common to identify modern epistemology as “foundationalist.” Knowledge is a building, which must be constructed by reason upon a set of indubitable (foundational) beliefs. Modern epistemology consisted of a succession of failed attempts to carry out Descartes’s project. Descartes took beliefs that appeared “clearly and distinctly” to the mind’s eye to be indubitable; he argued from these ideas to the existence of God and the trustworthiness of the senses.

Unfortunately, what is clear and distinct to one thinker is often not so to others.

John Locke (1632–1704) countenanced three kinds of knowledge: that, like Descartes's, based on "relations of ideas"; that based on revelation; and that based on ideas derived from sensory experience. In light of his focus on the last of these, he is credited with inaugurating the modern empiricist tradition.

Already in the eighteenth century David Hume (1711–76) showed the futility of the foundationalist's ambitions. Scripture could not provide a foundation for theology because there is no compelling argument for the text to be a product of revelation. With empirical knowledge the problem is construction; one may indeed have certain knowledge of one's own sensory experiences, but attempts to prove anything on this basis (e.g., the existence of unobserved objects) all fail to meet Descartes's standard of truth-certifying reasoning. Thus, in every case either the proposed foundational beliefs turn out to be questionable, or if unquestionable, not suitable for supporting any interesting claims. Philosopher of science Karl Popper concluded that the structure of science is not built on a solid foundation, but is more like a house built on pilings driven into a swamp.

The end of foundationalism came with W. V. O. Quine's metaphor of knowledge as a web of belief. According to this "holist" theory of knowledge, no belief need be immune from revision. When a belief is called into question, it can be supported by reasoning in various directions: "inward" from (p 192) experiential beliefs near the edges of the web, or "outward" from theories and presuppositions central to the web.

Inside-Out Epistemology. A second metaphor has shaped modern epistemology: "Knowing is seeing." Descartes conceived the mind as an inner theater in which metaphorical objects (ideas) are illuminated by an inner light and observed by a metaphorical spectator. The notion that the true perceiver is in the mind and has access only to its own ideas has been a constant source of skepticism; there is no way to compare one's ideas to the things they are supposed to represent. More recent versions of skepticism or relativism translate this "veil of ideas" into the "veil of language" (Rorty).

Modern Controversies. Immanuel Kant attempted to overcome Hume's skepticism by healing the opposition between rationalism and empiricism. He inaugurated the idealist tradition (the thesis that all of reality is essentially mind-dependent), which dominated philosophy through the nineteenth century. Since then, a new opposition has been established: that between Anglo-American philosophers, who tended to return to empiricism, and Continental philosophers, who tend to operate within the Kantian problematic.

A second dichotomy has been between those who distinguish the human sciences from the natural sciences and those who do not. The distinction between the Naturwissenschaften and Geisteswissenschaften, based on a dualist account of human nature, was intended to immunize culture from reduction to the deterministic categories of Newtonian physics. A valuable result has been an emphasis on the role of interpretation in understanding human phenomena.

A third opposition is between those who approach epistemology by seeking criteria for justifying a claim itself versus a person's being justified in believing that claim. Much current work in philosophy of religion focuses on the latter; philosophy of science and most (other) epistemology focuses on the former.

Truth and Justification. Descartes saw no distinction between criteria for asserting the truth of a proposition and criteria for its justification. However, once it was recognized that foundations and reasoning therefrom ordinarily produce mere probability, the relation between justification and truth became problematic. One solution was to define both truth and justification in terms of coherence: a belief is justified if it coheres with the rest of a true system of beliefs. This theory of truth contrasts with the theory that truth lies in correspondence with reality. Arguably, neither of these theories has found adequate explication.

The problem of relating truth and justification has been evaded by an important movement in recent epistemology that analyzes the concept of knowledge as justified, true belief. Truth is taken for granted (or handed to the philosophers of language for analysis), and the epistemologist's task is merely to provide an explication of justification.

Recent philosophers of science have judged it impossible to argue from a theory's justification to its truth; furthermore, the question is unimportant given that scientific knowledge is never final.

After Modernity, What?

If modern epistemology began with Descartes (1650), its end is marked by the publication of Quine's "Two Dogmas of Empiricism" in 1951. Since then, developments in holist epistemology have been largely by philosophers of science. Best known is Thomas Kuhn, who argued that scientific paradigms originate with an authoritative text, and they include metaphysical assumptions, guidelines for appropriate scientific methodology, and judgments regarding significant problems, as well as the theories and data that were the focus of earlier philosophy of science. Kuhn's account of science has been exported to other fields of knowledge, including theology (Barbour). These moves have rightly been taken to imply the inevitable particularity and historical location of paradigms, research programs, or traditions; the tradition-dependence of standards of justification (and perhaps theories of truth); and the theory-ladenness of evidence. Whether these problems spell the end of the pursuit of rationality is open to debate.

Current Options. Periods in intellectual history are usually only recognizable with hindsight. There are many who would deny that the epistemological changes since Quine are significant enough to constitute the end of an era. So one option in contemporary epistemology is to keep trying to improve on modern positions. For example, Susan Haack proposes a theory of knowledge that combines the best of foundationalism with a coherence approach to knowledge. Alvin Plantinga dismisses "classical foundationalism" but argues that Reformed epistemologists are entitled to their own judgments about "properly basic beliefs."

(p 193)In sharp contrast are self-styled postmodernists. This diverse group is difficult to characterize except for their agreement that the modern period has come to an end. Their positions range from the (unexceptionable) claim that there is no universal, God's-eye knowledge to the claim that one can never escape one's class, gender, and cultural location.

Another current option is Richard Rorty's neo-pragmatism. He diagnoses modernity's preoccupation with skepticism as a consequence of understanding knowledge in terms of representation; instead, he argues that knowledge is to be understood as what is best for us to believe. The method of seeking agreement is not by comparing propositions to some independent reality but by open dialogue.

Finally, there is the option of recognizing the tradition-constituted nature of all human knowledge, but without succumbing to the relativist position that no rational debate is possible between proponents of rival traditions. This account began with the holist philosophy of science mentioned above. Alasdair MacIntyre, its primary proponent, set out to find a method for rational adjudication between competing theories in ethics. He came to the conclusion that such judgments could only be made by tracing the historical development of the theories. This parallels the conclusion that scientific theories can only be judged according to their progress over time. MacIntyre recognizes that large-scale intellectual traditions have particular historical starting points, usually a text or set of texts; a tradition can be understood as a historically extended, socially embodied argument about how best to interpret and apply the community's formative texts. Although competing large-scale traditions contain their own accounts of truth and justification, he argues that nonetheless it is sometimes possible to make objective arguments for the rational superiority of one tradition over its rivals. One may do this on the basis of how each tradition does or does not succeed in overcoming its own intellectual crises, and especially when one tradition is capable of explaining its rival's failures more intelligibly than the rival can itself.

Modern epistemology was preoccupied with the (unsuccessful) quest for universal and certain knowledge; skepticism was a constant threat. If this is indeed the postmodern era in epistemology, the preoccupation of this era can be said to be relativism. There is a spectrum of positions from some postmodernists' acceptance and celebration of relativism, through Rorty's modest proposal for seeking agreement through open discussion, to MacIntyre's claim that rational adjudication between competing traditions is difficult but not always impossible.

Significance for Interpretation of Scripture

To a great extent styles of reasoning in theology and biblical studies have followed developments in epistemology. Foundationalism led to revolutions in theology and biblical studies. Theology came to require its own sorts of foundations, whether rationalist, experientialist, or biblicist. The requirement for indubitability explains why biblicists would want a doctrine of inerrancy; the demand for truth-certifying construction encourages foundationalists to minimize the gap between text and interpretation. The quest for the objective history behind the text is another manifestation of the search for foundations.

What are we to say of current options in epistemology? The postmodernist openness to multiple interpretations may be welcomed by many, especially those whose voices have been marginalized. Yet, lest this openness be pushed to the point of pure relativism, there is much to be said for Rorty's optimism regarding the possibility of reaching agreement on the basis of open discussion, and for MacIntyre's proposal for the testing of rival traditions.

Kuhn's account of the role of authoritative texts in science and MacIntyre's account of the role of texts in all major traditions have important implications for the role of Scripture. In the ancient and medieval periods, theology's basis in authority needed no special pleading; thus, the modern rejection of the epistemology of authority in favor of scientific reasoning based on empirical evidence dealt a blow to theology, from which some would say it has never recovered (Stout). But if Kuhn and MacIntyre are right, the modern rejection of tradition and authoritative texts has been mistaken. All knowledge is “intratextual” (Lindbeck). Stephen Toulmin describes the progress of modern epistemology as omega-shaped: at the end of modernity we have nearly returned to where modernity began. This is certainly correct regarding the role of textual authority.

A consequence of rejecting the modern quest for universal knowledge is an end to the distinction between reading the text as Scripture and studying the text “objectively”; the Enlightenment tradition provides no more conviction-free starting point than the Christian tradition itself (McClendon and Smith).

(p 194) See also Critical Realism; Method; Objectivity; Philosophy; Warrant

Bibliography

Barbour, I. Myths, Models, and Paradigms. Harper & Row, 1974; Haack, S. Evidence and Inquiry. Blackwell, 1993; Kirk, J. A., and K. Vanhoozer, eds. To Stake a Claim. Orbis, 1999; Kuhn, T. The Structure of Scientific Revolutions. 2d ed. University of Chicago Press, 1970; Lindbeck, G. The Nature of Doctrine. Westminster, 1984; MacIntyre, A. Three Rival Versions of Moral Enquiry. University of Notre Dame Press, 1990; McClendon, J. Wm., Jr., and J. Smith. Convictions. Trinity, 1994; Murphy, N. Anglo-American Postmodernity. Westview, 1997; Plantinga, A. “Reason and Belief in God.” Pages 16–93 in Faith and Rationality, ed. A. Plantinga and N. Wolterstorff. University of Notre Dame Press, 1983; Popper, K. The Logic of Scientific Discovery. Harper, 1965; Quine, W. V. O. “Two Dogmas of Empiricism.” Philosophical Review 60 (1951): 20–43; Rorty, R. Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature. Princeton University, 1979; Stout, J. The Flight from Authority. University of Notre Dame Press, 1981; Toulmin, S. Cosmopolis. University of Chicago Press, 1990.

Nancey Murphy

Essenes      See Jewish Context of the NT

Esther, Book of

The book of Esther is set in the reign of Ahasuerus (the biblical name for Xerxes, king of Persia 485–465 BCE), though the Septuagint version calls the king Artaxerxes, presumably Artaxerxes I Longimanus (464–424), but possibly Artaxerxes II Mnemon (404–359). The book narrates the life of a Jewish maiden, who is orphaned, reared by her uncle, becomes queen of the Persian Empire, and saves the Jews living in the empire from the scheming of Haman, the Agagite. The Hebrew version cannot be earlier than the time of the events it relates (fifth century), and may be a product of the Greek period (i.e., after 332 BCE). The Septuagint version, which intersperses another 107 verses, probably took its shape in the second or first century BCE.

History of Interpretation

Early Jewish interpretation of Esther took the form of comments on individual verses, which were collected during the Middle Ages in the Esther Rabbah. The earliest, extant, complete Jewish commentary on the text was that of Rashi (1040–1105 CE). Generally speaking, Jewish opinion moved in two directions. On the one hand, Jews objected to its lack of specifically religious sentiments, and to its authorization of the Feast of Purim, which they think may well have originated as a pagan festival. On the other hand, because of its treatment of anti-Semitism, Jews through the centuries have often read it as their “story.” Early Christian interpretation is relatively sparse, especially in Eastern churches that rejected it as canonical (see below). Nor did the Reformers Luther and Calvin devote much energy to it.

Modern interpretation of Esther has focused first on whether it is a work of historiography or fiction. Those favoring historiography point to places where what is known from other sources seems to corroborate the book of Esther. The dates given in the book fit appropriately in the reign of Xerxes, as do the extent of the Persian Empire from India to Ethiopia, the council of seven nobles, the efficient postal system, the keeping of official diaries, the use of impalement as a means of capital punishment, the practice of obeisance, and reclining on couches at meals. The book also uses Persian words and names (Clines, Ezra, 260–61). For example, the name “Marduka” appears in Babylonian sources, though it is not certain that name was equivalent to “Mordecai.” The word “Purim” also derives from the Assyrian language (Hallo). The difficulty with that word is that in Esther it refers to one who “casts the lot” (singular) rather than “lots.” Despite a variety of attempts to explain the plural term, it may be easiest to recognize that people “cast the lot” several times in the narrative—hence, the use of the plural form “lots.”

On the other hand, several features seem historically improbable to scholars. Some find it unlikely that Xerxes orders thousands of Jewish subjects slaughtered for no good reason, then reverses himself and gives the Jews free rein to kill thousands of other Persian subjects. Others note that the elevation of a Jewess to the rank of queen contradicts Herodotus (Clines, Ezra, 257–60).

More recently, Craig has argued that the reversals occurring throughout the narrative indicate that the book is “carnavalesque.” The dominant characteristic of carnivals is their use of reversals to ridicule the status quo. So in Esther, the Jewess heroine replaces the Persian queen; Mordecai replaces Haman. Parody takes the form of turning King Ahasuerus and Haman into fools, and the “nonreligious” festival of Purim subverts the status quo.

Clines employs a variety of methods of biblical study to find the primary “book” in 1:1–8:17, a book whose plot focuses on the threat to Jews (ch. 3) and its resolution in a decree counterbalancing the first (ch. 8). He takes 9:1–10:3 as a series (p 195) of additions similar to those in the longer Greek versions of the book.

Feminist readings typically see Esther as forming a context for reflecting on the (in)visibility of women in history and historiography. The book of Esther teaches that danger to the community “can be averted ... by mixing [physical] attractiveness, sense and faith” (Brenner 13). Nevertheless, this solution carries a price tag: assimilation into Persian culture.

The Message of Esther

First, the efforts of Mordecai and Esther show that Diaspora Jews can serve God through serving foreign leaders. Such service entails temptation to compromise their convictions. Nor is it without danger, as the books of Esther and Daniel both make clear. Governments, however, often influence people’s lives so personally that a God-fearing public servant can do great good.

Second, Mordecai’s urging Esther to become involved on behalf of her people (4:13–14) shows that holding positions of power carries with it the responsibility to use that power appropriately. Esther’s ethnicity might well have enveloped her in the pogrom, too, so her action included the element of self-preservation. Even if it had not, however, she would have had the responsibility to act.

Esther and the Canon

Despite the fact that the book of Esther was composed relatively late, it makes few allusions to the rest of the OT. Yet the Joseph narratives in Genesis form an exception. Hebrew phrases are virtually identical in Esther 1:3 and Gen. 40:20; in 3:4 and Gen. 39:10; in 1:21 and Gen. 41:37; in 2:3 and Gen. 41:35; in 3:10//8:2 and Gen. 41:42; or similar in 4:16 and Gen. 43:14 (Moore, Studies, xliii, lxxix nn. 69–70). Another obvious connection is between Esther and 1 Sam. 15, which narrates the execution of Agag by Samuel. That event constitutes the background for Haman’s hatred of the Jew Mordecai. The “additions” to Esther in the Greek translations, moreover, contain numerous allusions to other books in the Hebrew Bible.

Esther’s place in the Jewish canon seems to have been secured by the second century CE, when it was listed among the books of the Hebrew Bible in the Talmud (b. B. Bat. 14b–15a). How much earlier it reached that status is a matter of discussion. No copy of it was found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. Further, Josephus spoke of a Hebrew canon of twenty-two books, rather than the generally recognized number of twenty-four, suggesting that he did not include Esther (or Ecclesiastes).

Probably the reason the rabbis accepted it was that it provided the warrant for the Feast of Purim, the origin of which the book describes. Reasons for debating its canonicity centered on the morality of the book in general and its glee over the slaughter of Persians in particular. Another problem is its failure to mention God even once! Consequently, the additions in the Septuagint mention God frequently, especially in prayers of Mordecai and Esther and in a speech by Mordecai.

The NT makes no allusions to Esther, and early Christians divided over its inclusion in the Bible. Generally speaking, Western churches accepted it, while churches farther to the East did not. As late as the Reformation, Luther could say that he wished the book did not exist at all, because it contained pagan impropriety.

Esther and Theology

One crucial issue in the book of Esther is that of vengeance. The book openly portrays God's people taking revenge on their enemies. Occasionally scholars have tried to mitigate that portrayal by translating the Hebrew verb naqam as meaning "to inflict just punishment" instead of "to take revenge." However, the verb appears in Gen. 4:24, where Lamech tells his two wives that he has avenged himself seventy-sevenfold by killing a man who wounded him.

Readers may sympathize with threatened Jews in the Persian Empire and understand their desire for revenge, but neither of those factors mandates that they approve of wholesale slaughter. Such readers do well to remember that the Bible depicts human beings as invariably sinful, so the mere fact that the book of Esther does not call this taking of revenge "sinful" does not mean that God approved the action. Furthermore, Wenham (109) advocates reading narratives like this one not by stressing the actions of the actors, but by stressing the outlook of the book itself. So, what was the theological outlook of the book of Esther?

Remarkably, the Hebrew book of Esther does not mention God explicitly even once, though it does include one possible circumlocution for God (Esther 4:14): "relief and deliverance will rise for the Jews from another place" (Meinhold). Wiebe (413) argues that the phrase actually is a rhetorical question: "If you [Esther] keep silent at this time, will relief and deliverance arise for the Jews from another place?” Either way, the omission (p 196) of any reference to God gives the book what is often referred to as a “secular” tone. Hence, it is necessary to deal with this issue before saying anything about the book’s theology. Clines (Ezra, 255) argues that so many pieces have to fall into place for the Jews to escape annihilation that an attentive reader will see the book as relating, not a series of remarkable coincidences, but the careful operation of a hidden God working behind the scenes. A survey of the book reveals the following examples: (1) the fall of Queen Vashti, which brings Esther to the attention of King Ahasuerus (1:10–12); (2) Mordecai’s help when the king is in danger, followed by palace oversight in not rewarding him (2:21–23); (3) the king’s sleeplessness, resulting in his discovery of Mordecai’s unrewarded service, precisely while Haman is on duty in the palace and can be tapped to name and extend the reward to Mordecai (6:5); (4) Haman’s jealousy of Mordecai, which results in his preparing a gallows for Mordecai—from which Haman himself is hung (5:14; 7:9–10); (5) when Esther discloses to the king the plot of Haman to destroy all Jews, herself among them, the king leaves the room in a rage, but returns just as Haman further compromises himself in the eyes of the king by flinging himself upon the queen to beg for mercy; and (6) the last-minute nature of rescinding the king’s order to slay Jews and its replacement with an order to slay those who want to kill Jews (9:1–17). The king of Persia may think he is in control of matters, but the author of Esther knows better. Still, it takes the eyes of faith to see the hidden God, a worthwhile discovery for Jews in a foreign land.

The hidden God protects God’s people in Persia, so God is universal, not limited to the land of Palestine. Moreover, God’s victory on behalf of the Jews is to be celebrated in a festival. There is no mention of a temple, either in Jerusalem or Persia. (Ackroyd [34] reads Ezek. 11:16 as saying that God had made for the exiles a “temporary sanctuary” or a “sanctuary in small measure,” but that translation is uncertain, with no other evidence that Jews built a temple in Mesopotamia or Persia.) The festival described in Esther is not one of the annual festivals mandated in the Torah as times to offer sacrifices to God. Possibly the author advocates a type of celebration of God that involves not sacrifice, but resting and exchanging food.

Also, the hidden God remains faithful to the people of Israel. This conclusion is justified even though there is no reference in the Hebrew version to the patriarchs and no appeal to God’s covenant with them or with the people at Sinai because, paradoxically, the identity of the hidden God must be self-evident. In the Septuagint version, moreover, Mordecai prays to God as the “God of Abraham”

(Add. Esth. 13:15; cf. Esther's allusion to the call of Abraham in 14:5), and reminds God of God's salvation of the people from Egypt (13:16). Even the pagan king Artaxerxes can recognize Jews as the "children of the living God" (16:16), probably but not necessarily a reference to the God of Israel.

Bibliography

Ackroyd, P. Exile and Restoration. OTL. Westminster, 1968; Berg, S. The Book of Esther. SBLDS 44. Scholars Press, 1979; Brenner, A. A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith, and Susanna. FCB 7. Sheffield Academic Press, 1995; Clines, D. J. A. The Esther Scroll. JSOTSup 30. JSOT, 1984; idem. Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther. NCB. Eerdmans/Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1984; Craig, K. Reading Esther. Literary Currents in Biblical Interpretation. Westminster John Knox, 1995; Fox, M. Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther. University of South Carolina Press, 1991; Gerleman, G. Esther. BKAT 21. Neukirchener Verlag, 1973; Hallo, W. "The First Purim." BA 46 (1983): 19–26; Levinson, J. Esther. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 1997; Meinhold, A. "Zu Aufbau und Mitte des Estherbuches." VT 33 (1983): 435–45; Moore, C. Esther. AB 7B. Doubleday, 1971; idem. Studies in the Book of Esther. Ktav, 1982; Paton, L. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Esther. ICC. T&T Clark, 1908; Wenham, G. Story as Torah. T&T Clark, 2000; Wiebe, J. "Esther 4:14: 'Will Relief and Deliverance Arise for the Jews from Another Place?'" CBQ 53 (1991): 409–15.

Paul L. Redditt

Ethics

"Ethics" may be defined as disciplined reflection on that dimension of human life denoted "moral." Within the Bible is abundant reflection on issues of conduct and character. Among those who would read the Bible as Scripture, as somehow normative for faith and life, reflection on issues of moral conduct and character is disciplined by such reading. The theological interpretation of Scripture must, therefore, attend both to biblical ethics and to its use in the moral deliberation of the churches.

Biblical Ethics

Biblical ethics is inalienably religious, always qualified and disciplined by convictions about the works and ways of God. To abstract biblical ethics from its religious context is to distort it. And biblical ethics is stubbornly diverse, resisting any simple reduction to a timeless set of rules. Within Scripture different particular communities, each (p 197) with its distinctive cultural and social context and each facing particular concrete questions of conduct and character, are addressed. To reduce this rich diversity to an abstract and timeless unity is to impoverish it. Still, the one God of Scripture provides the unity of biblical ethics.

Ethics in Torah. The one God forms a people as their liberator and ruler. The story was told in recitals of Israel's faith: the God of Abraham heard our cry when we were slaves, rescued us from oppression, and made us a people with a covenant (e.g., Josh. 24:2–18). The covenant was like an ancient suzerainty treaty, acknowledging and confirming God as the great king and themselves as God's people. Like other suzerainty treaties, this covenant begins by identifying the great king and reciting his works (e.g., Exod. 20:2), then continues with stipulations that forbid both loyalty to another king and injustice and violence in the land (e.g., 20:3–17). It ends with provisions for periodic renewal of the covenant plus assurances of blessings upon faithful observance and curses upon infidelity (e.g., 25:22–33).

This story and covenant formed not only a people but a Scripture, providing the framework for gathering stories and stipulations until the literary formation of Torah, the first five books of the Bible, and its acceptance as having Mosaic authority.

“Torah” is usually translated “law,” and much of it is legal material. Various collections (e.g., the Decalogue, or Ten Commandments; the Book of the Covenant, Exod. 20:22–23:19; the Holiness Code, Lev. 17–26; the Deuteronomic code, Deut. 4:44–28:46) can be identified and associated with particular periods of Israel's history. The later collections sometimes revisit earlier legislation, displaying both fidelity to, and creativity with, the earlier traditions.

Although there is no tidy differentiation in the Torah between “ceremonial,” “civil,” and “moral” laws, the traditional rubrics identify significant functions of the law. As “ceremonial,” the Torah struggles against temptations to covenant infidelity in foreign cults, and nurtures a communal memory and commitment to covenant. As “civil,” the Torah is fundamentally theocratic; this theocratic conviction that the rulers are ruled too, that they are subject to law, not its final creators, has a democratizing effect. As “moral,” the Torah protects the family and its economic participation in God's gift of the land, protects persons and property (but persons more than property), requires fairness in disputes and economic transactions, and provides for the care and protection of the vulnerable: widows, orphans, the poor, the sojourner.

The legal materials, however, never escape the story and its covenant. Indeed, “torah” is finally better rendered “teaching.” Narrative and covenant set the legal traditions in the context of grateful response to God's works and ways. Moreover, the story forms and informs the law. The story of one God, who heard the cries of slaves, for example, forms statutes that protect the vulnerable.

The narratives of the Torah, of course, are morally significant in their own right. Artfully told, they nurture moral dispositions, forming a vision of a people and a world ruled by God. Noteworthy among them are the stories of creation, affirming as they do that the one God of covenant is the God of creation, too. Nothing God has made is god, but all that God has made is good. The very ethos of the cosmos prohibits idolatry and invites gratitude. If the curse falls heavy on human sin, the God who makes promises and covenant will not let sin or the curse have the last word. He comes again to bless, and the Yahwist stories of the ancestors not only trace the blessing of David's empire to God but also evoke the readiness to use the power of empire to bless the subject nations (e.g., Gen. 12:1–3; chs. 18–19, 26; 30:27–28; chs. 39–41).

Ethics in the Prophets. The one God who created the world, and rescued and established a blessed people within it, spoke to them through the prophets. Their “Thus saith the LORD ...” was familiar language of diplomacy in the ancient Near East for the “announcement” by a ruler's messenger. The prophets always came with a particular word for a particular time, but always reminded the people of the story and the covenant. They were not social reformers skilled in the craft and compromise of politics; they were messengers of God.

They brought a word of judgment against any infidelity to the covenant. The infidelity of idolatry was never “merely” religious; the claims of Ba'al involved the fertility of wombs and land, and a theory of ownership. The infidelity of injustice was never “merely” moral, for covenant fidelity to God does justice. The welfare of the poor and powerless was the best index of covenant fidelity. So the prophets denounced unjust rulers, greedy merchants, corrupt judges, the complacent rich, and especially those who celebrated covenant in ritual and ceremony without caring about justice, without protecting the powerless, without faithfulness (e.g., Amos 5:21–24). On the other (p 198) side of God's judgment, the prophets saw and announced God's own good future. God will reign and establish both justice and peace, not only in Israel but also among the nations, and not only among the nations but in nature itself.

Ethics in Wisdom. The will and way of the one God can be known not only in the great events of liberation and covenant, not only in the oracles of God's messengers, but also in the regularities of nature and experience. The moral counsel of Israel's sage did not appeal directly to Torah or to covenant; rather, reflection about moral conduct and character was disciplined and tested by experience.

By careful attention to nature and experience, the sage was able to comprehend the basic principles operative in the world, and to these principles it was both prudent and moral to conform. The one God is the Creator, who established and secures the order and stability of ordinary life. So the sage could give moral advice about eating and drinking and sleeping and working, the way to handle money and anger, the way to relate to friends and enemies and women and fools, when to speak and when to be silent—in short, about everything in experience.

The ethics of wisdom tend to delight both in simple things, like the love of a man and a woman (Song of Solomon), and in the quest for wisdom itself. Experience, however, teaches the hard lessons that there is no tidy fit between prudence and morality, that the righteous sometimes suffer (Job), that wisdom has its limits (Job 28), and that the regularities of nature and experience cannot be simply identified with the cause of God (Ecclesiastes).

Wisdom reflects about moral conduct and character quite differently from the Torah and the prophets, but “the end of the matter,” like the beginning of wisdom (Prov. 1:7; 9:10), is a reminder of covenant: “Fear God and keep his commandments” (Eccles. 12:13). That beginning and end keeps wisdom in touch with Torah, struggling mightily to keep Torah in touch with experience, and covenant in touch with creation.

Ethics in the NT. Jesus of Nazareth came announcing that the kingdom of God is at hand, already making God’s good future present in words of blessing and works of healing. He called people to repent, to form their conduct and character in response to the good news of that coming (and present) future.

To welcome a future where “the last will be first” (Mark 10:31 NRSV), a future already signaled in Jesus’ humble service, is to be ready to be “servant ... of all” (Mark 10:43–45). To delight in a kingdom where the poor will be blessed is now to be carefree about wealth and to practice generosity. To repent before a kingdom that belongs to children, that is signaled in table-fellowship with sinners, and that is gestured in open conversation with women is now to turn from conventional standards of value to bless children, to welcome sinners, and to treat women as equals.

Because Jesus announced the good future of God, he spoke with authority, not simply on the basis of law and tradition. Because the reign of God demands a response of the whole person and not merely external observance of the law, he made radical demands upon character. A radical demand for truthfulness replaced (and fulfilled) legal casuistry about oaths. A readiness to forgive and be reconciled set aside (and fulfilled) legal limitations on revenge. A disposition to love even enemies put aside legal debates about the meaning of “neighbor.” Neither the law nor experience was discarded as moral teacher, but law and wisdom were both qualified and fulfilled in an ethic of response to God’s future reign.

Jesus died on a Roman cross, but God raised him up in an act of power that was at once vindication of this Jesus and prelude to God’s final triumph. Thus, moral reflection in the NT always looks backward and forward.

The Gospels use the tradition of Jesus’ words and deeds to tell his story creatively and faithfully, shaping the conduct and character of particular communities. Mark represents Jesus as calling people to a heroic discipleship, being ready to suffer and die, as well as to live in ordinary relationships with heroic confidence, not in Jewish law or Roman justice, but in God. Matthew represents Jesus as upholding the law, as its best interpreter, even as he demands a righteousness that “exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees” (5:20 NRSV). Luke emphasizes the requirements of care for the poor and mutual respect of Jew and Gentile. John tells the story quite differently, that his readers might “have life” (20:31) and know that such life requires love for one another.

The Epistles of Paul make little use of the tradition of Jesus’ words and deeds. He proclaims the gospel of the cross and resurrection as “the power of God for salvation” (Rom. 1:16 NRSV). Thus, within Paul’s churches moral reflection is to be radically affected by the works and way of God made known in the gospel (Rom. 12:1). The power of God enables and requires a response, a life and a common life “worthy of” or fitting to the gospel (Phil. 1:27). The power of God stands in (p 199) fundamental opposition to the powers of this age. And the one who receives the gospel, the power of God, is freed from their dominion to stand under the lordship of Christ. That “standing” is now always both gift and demand, appropriately treated both as indicative and as imperative (cf. Rom. 5:2; 1 Cor. 16:13).

The Pauline Epistles address and form communities of moral discourse and discernment (Rom. 15:14). Neither Paul nor the churches created moral guidelines and judgments ex nihilo; rather, they utilized existing traditions (of the church, synagogue, and the Greek schools and culture), but tested and modified them. Thus, they discerned a way of life “worthy of the gospel of Christ” (Phil. 1:27). Paul and his churches exercised such discernment in moral reflection about the relations of Jew and Gentile, slave and free, male and female, rich and poor, church and state. The judgments were not “timeless truths” in the style of a philosopher, but timely applications of the gospel to specific problems in particular contexts.

Other NT writings confirm both the inalienably religious character of biblical ethics and its great diversity. Revelation, for example, provides a symbolic universe to make intelligible both the experience of injustice at the hands of Caesar and the conviction that Jesus is Lord, and to call for both patient endurance of suffering and faithful resistance to the values of empire.

The ethical voices are “many and various,” but the one God of Scripture still speaks in their midst to renew life, transform identity, sanctify a people, and bring conduct and character and community into coherence with God’s reign.

Ethics in Biblical Interpretation

The churches have always commended Scripture as “useful . . . for training in righteousness” (2 Tim. 3:16). But they have not always agreed about how Scripture is “useful.” There is “an important two-part consensus” that “Christian ethics is not synonymous with biblical ethics,” and that “the Bible is somehow formative and normative for Christian ethics” (Birch and Rasmussen 11, 14). Somehow, but how?

Various strategies (see Gustafson) have been proposed to bring Scripture to bear on moral reflection, sometimes privileging one or another of the diverse biblical materials (e.g., law, prophetic social criticism, wisdom), and sometimes privileging one or another mode of reflection (e.g., teleology, deontology, axiology). Such proposals are flawed, as long as they regard the Bible as a little library of ancient religious texts, or ethics as autonomous, founded on reason. Apart from the faith and practices of the church, there can be no constructive relation between Scripture and ethics. There has recently been fruitful attention to the theological interpretation of Scripture for the moral reflection of churches, notably from both Protestant (like Hays; Fowl and Jones) and Catholic scholars (like Spohn; Harrington and Keenan).

Christian communities continue to read the biblical materials not just as an interesting ancient Near Eastern library but as Christian Scripture, not only as curious literary artifacts but as canon, not only as scripted (as written) but also as script to be somehow performed.

The Bible is not a legal code but fundamentally a story. As we read Scripture in Christian community, the Bible has its authority to remember the story. This is the “good” that belongs to the practice. Remembering, of course, is not just the disinterested recall of facts, but owning it as our story—as constitutive of identity and determinative for discernment. Without remembering, there is no identity. In amnesia, one loses oneself. In memory, one finds an identity. Without common remembering, there is no community. It is little wonder that the church sustains this practice of reading Scripture and is itself sustained by it.

There are, moreover, certain standards of excellence in reading Scripture to remember: fidelity and creativity, humility and discernment. Fidelity is simply readiness to live with integrity, in faithful remembrance of the story. Fidelity, however, requires creativity; for the past is past and we do not live in it, even if we remember it.

We do not live in David's Jerusalem or in Paul's Corinth, and an effort simply to "preserve" or perform the past is doomed to anachronistic eccentricity. Fidelity requires creativity and change.

Humility is readiness to read Scripture "over against" ourselves rather than in self-serving defense of our own interests and opinions (Fowl and Jones 42). Humility will not simply insist on some "right to private interpretation"; it will participate in the moral discourse of the community. To see the shape of the story and of lives formed to it requires discernment, the ability to recognize "fittingness"—the ability to recognize the plot of the story, to see the wholeness of Scripture, and to order the interpretation of any part toward that whole. It is to recognize how a statute, a proverb, or a story "fits" the whole story. In Christian ethics, discernment is the ability to plot our lives to (p 200) "fit" the whole of Scripture, to order our lives to be worthy of the story.

The practice of reading Scripture is not a substitute for the practice of moral discourse, but the two are intimately related. The churches are communities of moral discourse and deliberation, "able to instruct one another," because they are communities of discernment—by being communities of memory. Discernment in Christian community depends finally on remembering the story of the one God of Scripture. Scripture is "useful" and indeed critical for that remembering. The greatest danger for the Christian life is still forgetfulness, and reading Scripture together is still the remedy for it. See also Law; Virtue; Wisdom

Bibliography

Birch, B., and L. Rasmussen, Bible and Ethics in the Christian Life. Rev. ed. Augsburg, 1989; Blount, B. Then the Whisper Put On Flesh. Abingdon, 2001; Brown, W. The Ethos of the Cosmos. Eerdmans, 1999; Cosgrove, C. Appealing to Scripture in Moral Debate. Eerdmans, 2000; Fowl, S., and L. G. Jones. Reading in Communion. Eerdmans, 1991; Furnish, V. P. Theology and Ethics in Paul. Abingdon, 1968; Gustafson, J. "The Place of Scripture in Christian Ethics: A Methodological Study." Interpretation 24 (1970): 430–55; Harrington, D., SJ, and J. Keenan, SJ. Jesus and Virtue Ethics. Sheed & Ward, 2002; Hauerwas, S. Unleashing the Scripture. Abingdon, 1993; Hays, R. The Moral Vision of the New Testament.

HarperSanFrancisco, 1996; Longenecker, R. New Testament Social Ethics for Today. Eerdmans, 1984; McDonald, J. I. H. Biblical Interpretation and Christian Ethics. Cambridge University Press, 1993; O'Donovan, O. Resurrection and Moral Order. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1994; Ogletree, T. The Use of the Bible in Christian Ethics. Fortress, 1983; Spohn, W. C. Go and Do Likewise. Continuum, 1999; Swartley, W. Slavery, Sabbath, War, and Women. Herald Press, 1983; Verhey, A. The Great Reversal. Eerdmans, 1984; idem. Remembering Jesus. Eerdmans, 2002; Yoder, J. H. The Politics of Jesus. Eerdmans, 1972. Rev. ed. 1994.

Allen Verhey

Etymological Fallacy     See Etymology

Etymology

Etymological studies have long been an alluring seductress to students of the Bible. It is not surprising that those who view every word of Scripture as inspired by God should be tempted to seek inspired meaning in each individual word. It is not surprising that those who consider Scripture to represent a mystical union of the Holy Spirit with human authors have been tempted to find a meaning in words that penetrates far deeper than the conscious levels of usage. It is commonplace to believe that even ferreting out every possible nuance behind every word fails to exhaust all the levels of inspired truth. Thus, etymological studies, through no fault of their own, have become a menace to sound interpretation. Those who sometimes maintain only the slightest grasp of the Bible's original languages repeat their clichéd results from pulpits. These expositors desire to offer theological insight, but more often than not the result is exploitation.

The Meaning of Etymology

A word's origin is called its etymology. Speakers and writers do not usually choose to employ a word based on an understanding of its etymology or subsequent history. Most speakers are entirely unaware of the etymology of the words they are using. Even when they are aware of it, they realize that they are not using their words in that connection. Linguists refer to the study of the historical development of a word as a diachronic approach. The alternative is the synchronic approach, the study of the current usage of the word in all its possible contexts. The diachronic study of a word, including its etymology, may help the interpreter to understand by what route a word came to mean what it does mean. Additionally, it may help to alert someone to a subtle nuance of meaning. A synchronic study of a word will help the interpreter know what the word means to the person who has just used it.

Words originate in various ways. A word might arise as a composite of parts (combining two independent words, such as a preposition and a verb). Alternatively, a word might enter speech from another language, or develop out of an already established root (e.g., by using affixes to change the part of speech, e.g., “kindness”). But however words come into a language, they tend to develop over time, and through the whims of usage often wander from their origins. The changes can be morphological (altering the form of the word) or semantic (altering the meaning of the word) or both, but often the current meaning is only vaguely related to the original meaning. For example, though the English word “sinister” originally referred to being left-handed, those who use the word today are rarely even aware of that history. The important point here, and the central point for theological interpretation, is that understanding the meaning of a word, whether theological or otherwise, must derive from its usage, not from its etymology. Synchronic data are essential for interpretation; diachronic data are unreliable.

(p 201) Understanding the meanings of words, then, is accomplished by understanding how words are used and how meanings are understood by the native speakers who hear or read them. Like any other author, the main reason a biblical author chose a particular word would be because it carried precisely the meaning in contemporary usage that he wanted to communicate. We should not expect that the Holy Spirit altered the laws of communication, but that he operated within those laws to achieve his objective effectively.

This article will not have the space to give positive instruction on carrying out a synchronic approach to arrive at sound exegetical results. Readers will find that aspect developed in NIDOTTE (Walton). We will only be able to summarize the most common fallacies perpetrated when the diachronic method is not used cautiously.

Composite Parts

When we analyze word choices, we should not interpret as if the use of a compound word assumes knowledge of or carries the meaning of the parts. For example, in English we would use the word “awful” without even noticing that it is a combination of awe + full. English has many compound words, some easily recognizable, such as “understand,” others not as readily noticed, such as “syllabus” (because the compound was devised in Greek rather than in English, and then borrowed whole). In Greek, where compound words are common, interpretation by dissection is a constant temptation. But a moment's thought about English usage should warn us against placing confidence in that type of approach. Returning to the word "understand" we see that our use is not at all influenced or informed by viewing it as a combination of "under" and "stand." One could not arrive at an interpretation of the meaning of that word by evaluating the parts. Furthermore, it would be difficult to sustain an argument that, in addition to the meaning of the word as a whole, additional meaning could be drawn from the parts.

Consequently, it would not be legitimate to build theology by dissecting Greek words. The Greek word translated "church" (ekklēsia) is built out of two words that mean "called out," yet we cannot assume that the word was being used with that etymology in mind—it is simply the word for church. Likewise, the fact that the Holy Spirit is described by the Greek term paraklētos (a compound of preposition and verb) does not mean that we can understand the nature of the Spirit as "one called alongside" (the meaning of the parts). With each of these words, the meaning would be determined by how they were used in contemporary Greek literature.

Shared Roots between Parts of Speech

In Hebrew, the problem is not so much compound words as it is the relationship of words that share the same root. In English, we understand that words sharing the same root may be related or may not. For instance, recognition of the root "adult" in "adultery" will not be of any use. Using a more complex and subtle example, one could easily associate "company" and "companion," but when one examined the verb "accompany," only partial success could be achieved. If the verb were being used to speak of joining someone on a walk, there would be no problem; but if the speaker were using the more technical idiomatic sense of accompanying a soloist on the piano, the root relationship would provide little assistance.

Likewise, in biblical languages the interpreter cannot have confidence that the words sharing a common root will also share a common core meaning. We must be aware, therefore, that we cannot use one to shed light on the other unless the relationship can be independently established. For instance, the word for "angel, messenger" (mal'ak) shares a root with the Hebrew word for "work, occupation" (mal'akah), yet it would be a mistake to try to interpret one in light of the other. In conclusion, reducing a word to its constituent parts or relating it to a common root cannot be expected to provide reliable guidance to establishing meaning or theology.

A well-meaning teacher dealing with Prov. 22:6 was trying to explain to his class what the text meant when it said that the properly trained child would not depart from the parent's teaching "when he is old." He informed the class that since the verb "to be old" also contributed its root to the noun "beard," the text meant that when the son was old enough to grow a beard, he would not depart from the teaching. Such analysis can only mislead and distort—it contributes nothing to sound exegesis.

Shared Roots between Hebrew Stems

A related distinction concerns the verbal stems. Though there is often a level of semantic interrelation between stems (e.g., the Niphal as the passive of the Qal), sufficient examples of deviation urge us to caution. Sometimes stems have developed in entirely different directions. More subtle are the cases where relationship between the stems remains visible yet certain nuances pertain in (p 202)one but not in the other. So, for example, for the root s-kh-q the Qal and the Piel both concern joy, laughter, and fun, but the Piel contains a more negative nuance (making fun of someone) as well as a sexual nuance (Gen. 26:8, caress). The extent of relatedness between verbal stems should be established by applying the synchronic method to each stem individually before the interpreter feels free to classify all the verbal occurrences together in the semantic range.

For example, it is not unusual for the suggestion to be made that the Hebrew word kipper, often translated "to atone," "comes from the root" meaning "to cover." Kipper is a Piel form in ritual texts. The supposed meaning of the root is drawn from a single occurrence in the Qal in Gen. 6:14, where Noah covers the ark with pitch. The problem is that the meaning "cover" could not be carried confidently from the Qal to the Piel without some independent attestation of that meaning in the usage of the Piel. The situation is exacerbated here in that it is possible that the Qal occurrence comes from a homonymous root, which does not mean simply "to cover," but "to cover with pitch" (based on analysis of the much more frequent Akkadian usage).

Words Confused by English Usage

A problem can occur when an element from the semantic range of an English word is applied to the corresponding Hebrew word, which itself has a more limited semantic range. In a classic example the English word "glory" has in its semantic range the meaning "heaven" (e.g., "gloryland"). The Hebrew word kabod, though properly translated "glory," does not have "heaven" in its semantic range. The lay English reader then might be excused for making the mistake of interpreting Ps. 73:24 as a reference to heaven, but linguistically informed interpreters are without excuse.

Another variation can occur when too close an association is drawn between English and Greek words. When a speaker introduces the offering suggesting that we should give “hilariously” because the Greek word in 2 Cor. 9:7 is the word from which our English word “hilarious” derives, an English meaning has been imposed on a Greek word. This phenomenon is also evident when it is commented that we can understand a passage like Acts 1:8 by knowing that the word “power” translates the Greek term from which our word “dynamite” is derived. Again this is an English meaning being imposed on a Greek word that is its ancestor. Linguistically, this constitutes anachronism as it reads back a meaning derived from synchronic analysis of contemporary English onto an earlier diachronic stage in Greek.

Lexical and Contextual Use

The lexical sense refers to those elements of meaning that the word will automatically carry into any of the contexts in which it is used. If there is even one occurrence (in the same category of the semantic range) that does not carry an element of meaning, then that element must be excluded from the lexical sense. So, for instance, one could not include “creation out of nothing” in the lexical sense of Hebrew bara’ because there are a number of occurrences that clearly do not involve creation out of nothing (e.g., Gen. 5:1–2). This verb has the potential to express creation out of nothing, but that would be up to the context to establish. Such a nuanced meaning could be one option available for the contextual sense of the verb, but it is not a meaning inherent in the very nature of the word, the lexical sense. Neither the contextual sense nor the lexical sense necessarily includes the etymological sense, which may not be preserved within the current semantic range of the word at all. We cannot think of the Holy Spirit as adding to the normal semantic range of a word.

Conclusion

We will be better interpreters when we understand words and their usage. Authors make choices in the communication process, and it is our task to understand the choices they have made. Our goal is to be on their wavelength. Word study is a step in the process of exegesis; it does not comprise the whole. The authority of the Scriptures is not found in words, though each word has an important role to play; rather, the authority is embodied in the message.

Bibliography

Barr, J. Comparative Philology and the Text of the Old Testament.

Eisenbrauns, 1987; idem. The Semantics of Biblical Language. Oxford University Press, 1961; Cotterell, P., and M. Turner. Linguistics and Biblical Interpretation. InterVarsity, 1989; Klein, W., C. Blomberg, and R. Hubbard. Introduction to Biblical Interpretation. Word, 1993; Osborne, G. The Hermeneutical Spiral. InterVarsity, 1991; Silva, M. Biblical Words and Their Meaning. Zondervan, 1993; Walton, J. “Principles for Productive Word Study.” NIDOTTE 1:161–71.

John H. Walton

Evangelical Biblical Interpretation    See Charismatic Biblical Interpretation; Princeton School; Protestant Biblical Interpretation

(p 203)Evil    See Original Sin; Powers and Principalities; Sin, Doctrine of; Violence

Exegesis

The word “exegesis” is derived from the Greek verb exēgeisthai, which can mean “to lead” or “to explain.” In biblical literature it is always used in the sense “to explain, interpret, or describe.” Acts 21:19 uses the verb to say that Paul explains to James and the elders what God has done among the Gentiles (see also Judg. 7:13 LXX; Luke 24:35; Acts 15:12–14). The most illustrative NT use of exēgeisthai is in John 1:18, where we are told that “the unique God” (or “the unique Son”—note the textual question) has explained (or revealed) the Father. Although no one has seen God, this one who is in the bosom of the Father has explained him—or, in the context of the Gospel of John—the Father is revealed, communicated, and made known in and by the Son. Even so, the use of exēgeisthai in the NT gives no hint as to why the word “exegesis” took on such importance. The noun exēgēsis is attested in the NT only at Luke 1:1, but it is used elsewhere, including twice in the LXX, at Judg. 7:15 and Sir. 21:16. In nonbiblical Greek, however, exēgēsis was used by Jews, Greeks, and Christians for explanation—often careful explanation—of laws and religious ideas. Herodotus, Plato, Philo, and Josephus all use exēgeisthai and exēgēsis as technical terms in describing the exposition or interpretation of laws or sacred Scriptures (e.g., Herodotus, Hist. 1.78; Plato, Leg. 7.802c; Philo, Contempl. 78; Josephus, B.J. 2.162; A.J. 11.192). Christians used the words the same way. Clement of Rome asks “Who can explain (exēgeisthai) the bond of the love of God?” (1 Clem. 49:2) and marvels that of love’s perfection there is no explanation (exēgēsis; 50:1). In the Shepherd of Hermas exēgēsis is used of the explanation of the image of the tower (Vis. 3.7.4). Eusebius mentions that five treatises of Papias were extant which have the title “Interpretation of Oracles of the Lord” (Logiōn kyriakōn exēgēseōs; Hist. eccl. 3.39.1).

“Exegesis” then means “explanation,” nearly always intended as explanation after careful consideration and usually with regard to Scripture or founding documents. It is the process we go through in explaining any communication, whether written or oral. But usually the assumption associated with “exegesis” is that this analysis is “scientific,” that one is trained in understanding words and their relations, that one is careful to analyze correctly and not import meaning illegitimately, and that one is not guilty of eisegesis (importing meaning unrelated to the text). More technically, “exegesis” refers to a linguistic-syntactical analysis to discern communicative intent. That is, exegesis is the analysis of the significance of words and the relations into which they are set to construct meaning. Meaning is a set of relations for which words are verbal symbols. By placing specific words in specific relations to each other and in specific contexts, meaning is conveyed, and exegesis seeks to analyze the significance of the particular words used and the relations into which they are set to discern the intent of the communication.

For some, the terms “exegesis,” “hermeneutics,” and “interpretation” are synonymous. In earlier times the terms were distinguished, with interpretation encompassing both other words and including the process of theologizing and application as well. Hermeneutics was seen as the rules and procedures governing interpretation, and exegesis was limited to a search for past meaning. Exegesis focused on historical context and grammatical relations to determine what the text meant at its origin. Today, hermeneutics may well be the most comprehensive of the three terms in that it deals with the whole process of understanding and appropriating texts. Distinctions can and should be made between the three terms but with the realization that the boundaries between them are blurred. Valid exegesis will always involve an attempt to understand the historical and cultural context in which the communication arose, and by necessity it leans more toward an author-oriented hermeneutic. Exegesis is rightly assumed to be a foundational task for doing theology. We need to understand the intent of the text before we build theological systems on it, but in reality the implied objectivity often associated with exegesis is misleading. Theology, however primitive, is already at work before we come to the text. We all bring to the text theological assumptions and questions that motivate our work and that both allow and hinder our efforts to see the significance of the relations in the text. Still, the attempt not to impose our theologies on texts is demanded by any fair exegesis. We cannot come to the text without presuppositions, but we can come to the text without presupposing what its meaning is.

The goal of exegesis is not merely information but a “usable understanding.” Far too much attention is placed on “meaning” and not nearly enough on the function of texts. Texts are the result of action and are intended to produce action (p 204)(Lundin, Thiselton, and Walhout 43–44), and speech-act theory rightly is gaining prominence in helping us understand how language works (Vanhoozer, Meaning? 208–65; “Speech Acts,” 1–49). We have not understood a text until we understand what it seeks to accomplish in its hearers, and exegesis is not successful until it knows how the text should be used. Texts may legitimately be used for meditation and reflection beyond their intent, but that is a process quite distinct from interpretation and certainly from exegesis. This is especially true of Scripture that has as its primary intent to change us and give us an identity. “Thus it is simply wrong-headed for us ever to think that we have done exegesis at all if we have not cared about the intended Spirituality of the text” (Fee, To What End? 282). Both God and the human authors desire to communicate, and no interpretation can be considered valid that does not listen for and to that communicative intent (Snodgrass 9–32). If we come unwilling to obey the text, we will never fully understand it (cf. John 7:17). If we come assuming we already know what the text says, it does not have a decent chance to address us. The primary task of exegesis is to listen with a willing and obedient heart. Isaiah 6:10 and Matt. 13:15 speak of understanding with the heart for good reason.

Exegesis can be done while using a translation of the Bible, but only with difficulty and at considerable handicap. Translations are the result of someone else’s exegetical activity. Translators by necessity interpret a text in order to translate it. Translation is both the first and last step in interpreting a text. A translator must make a preliminary translation to begin to understand the text, but then makes exegetical choices about the text’s intent and chooses the best way to communicate those ideas in the receptor language. Translations, therefore, close off options that are present in the text—to say nothing of creating options that are not in the original. Those working only with translations need even more care and effort to make sure they know what is involved in the text. For these reasons, when people think of exegesis, the primary reference is to exegesis of the Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek texts of Scripture.

The Process of Exegesis

Exegesis involves the careful analysis of the relations of the text

at every level—from the macrolevel to the microlevel—to determine communicative intent. Understanding of intent depends on our ability to “locate” a text, to perceive where and how the text takes its existence, and how its component parts relate to each other to form the message. Much of this happens intuitively and without reflection. We understand that Paul’s letters were written in the first century, not the fifteenth, to people in cities around the Mediterranean, not to people in China or America. Exegesis seeks consciously to discern the relations within the text and its world, and in doing so focuses attention on specific arenas. The following tasks—each primarily a discerning of relations—are required in doing exegesis.

1. Assess Relevant Textual Variants. Unlike with some documents, the initial task in biblical exegesis involves determining the most likely original wording of the text. Modern editions of the Hebrew and Greek Testaments are wonderful tools, giving not only the likely text but also evidence showing the most important variants. The existence of numerous manuscripts copied by hand has resulted in variant readings, some intentional, some unintentional. Textual criticism is the discipline that assesses these variants to determine the most likely original. It assesses external evidence (the physical evidence of the manuscripts, to determine the quality and date of the manuscripts and the distribution of the readings) and internal evidence (both what scribes are likely to have done in copying and what most likely fits the author’s style and theology). Analysis of important textual variants not only provides insight about the original wording; it also provides commentary by showing what scribes did in seeking to understand the text they copied.

2. Learn as Much as Possible about the Historical, Cultural, and Literary Context of the Passage. Broadly conceived, this means learning as much as possible about the world in which the document emerges and is a never-ending task. We bring to the text an assumption—sketchy as it may be—of what its world was like, whether ancient Israel or first-century Palestine and the Greco-Roman world. The more we learn about these entities and the primary sources revealing them, the more opportunity we have to understand the text. It is not that we must study other documents first, however, for the biblical text is itself a primary witness to these worlds.

More narrowly conceived, the concern is to learn as much as possible about the specific context and content of the entire work and then of the specific context of the passage being studied. Exegesis usually focuses on specific passages of a document, but a given pericope can be understood only in light of the whole. Understanding of the whole, however, presupposes understanding (p 205)the individual parts. This is the horizontal hermeneutical circle; interpretation takes place in the continual movement of knowing the part from the whole and the whole from the part. Attention must be given to the purpose and “location” of the whole document and then to the location within the document of the passage in question. The relation to passages immediately preceding and following the pericope being studied is among the most important relations for understanding. Also involved is the ability to perceive relations to other practices or writings, most importantly, quotations or allusions to the OT, but also cultural aspects of Judaism or the Greco-Roman world (such as attitudes toward impurity or emperor worship). Some people distinguish between the “context” and the “cotext” of a passage, with the former referring to the historical and sociological setting of the text and the latter referring to the sentences and paragraphs surrounding the passage and related to it (Cotterell and Turner 16). Most, however, refer to historical and social context and to literary context.

3. Determine the Significance of the Genre Both of the Whole Work and of the Individual Passage. Signals are sent about the function of a passage by the genre selected, and determination of genre is one of the most important aspects of exegesis. This is one more way a text is “located.” A promise and a proverb have quite different functions: the former entails a commitment, whereas the latter states what is only generally true. A narrative, a psalm, and a letter to a church do not carry the same kinds of authority. Apocalyptic is expected to use certain images and treat certain themes. Recognition of a passage as early-church confessional material puts it in a different category.

4. Determine the Structure of the Passage. Thought is always structured or it is nonsensical. In discerning the structure of a passage, we are able to follow the flow of the author’s logic and come to understanding. Some structures are rather set by convention (such as letters) or chronology (such as narratives). Others provide insight through creative arrangement, using such features as parallelism, chiasmus, ring structures, or inclusio. One of the most important questions to keep asking of texts is, What has prominence? What has the author emphasized by repetition, placement, or some other device? The more we understand how an author presents material, the clearer our understanding is.

5. Determine the Syntax of the Passage. If analysis of structure deals with the general flow of thought in a passage, syntax is concerned with the flow of thought in detail and how individual clauses, phrases, and words relate to each other. Particularly with narrative texts, the overall syntax may be rather straightforward and obvious. With more discursive material, often the syntax is quite complex, especially for a text like Eph. 1:3–14, which is one long sentence in the Greek text. Where such complexity exists, the effort to diagram the Greek or Hebrew sentence, noting how independent and dependent clauses function, is a tremendous aid to understanding (Fee, N. T. Exegesis 31, 60–77).

6. Determine the Significance of Individual Words or Constructions. Discerning how specific words convey meaning is obviously crucial, but exegesis is much more than word studies. In fact, word studies are often misleading. Words do not have meaning that can be assessed by some formula. Words have a conventional range of meanings, ways we expect them to be used. These meanings (the dictionary definitions) make up the semantic field of a word. Any aspect of a word's meaning—but not all of it—may be used in a given context, or the word may even be used creatively in a new way. Word studies show the etymology (the origin) of words, which may be of no significance for later meaning, and the variety of ways in which a word has been used. Such work must be done, but it does not show what a word means in a given context. One can only know that meaning by discerning the relations in the context. This also means discerning how words are put together in specific grammatical constructions. Of crucial importance for both Hebrew and Greek is discerning the use of prepositions, infinitives, participles, and the way nouns are connected, especially with the genitive and dative in Greek. By way of example, the meaning of pistis Christou (Gal. 2:16 et al.) is notoriously debated both as to the aspect of the semantic field of pistis and the kind of genitive with Christou. Does the phrase mean “faith in Christ” (as most translations, but yielding a redundancy in the text) or “the faithfulness of Christ”?

7. Summarize the Findings by a Dynamic Translation or Paraphrase. Only after a careful analysis of the relations of and in the text can one think to have done an exegesis, but it is not enough to have dissected the text. Understanding requires that the thought of the text be expressed in a meaningful translation or paraphrase—and then appropriated for life.

(p 206) Conclusion

The process described above is focused on determining the author's communicative intent, but exegesis also has larger concerns, or at least may be seen in a broader set of relations. Biblical exegesis does not deal merely with individual books but also with the relations between them (doing biblical theology). The understanding of a canonical work is augmented and nuanced when that work is seen in relation to other documents in the canon. This is true for all interpreters but is most obvious in Brevard Childs's emphasis on canon criticism, which seeks to transcend an overly historical-critical approach and focuses on the "canonical meaning" that texts take on by being part of the church's collection. Further, when biblical documents are seen in light of a developed theology, additional light may be shed by a theological exegesis that searches out implications, explains the relevance of texts, and uses the text to think theologically. A good example of legitimate theological exegesis is Miroslav Volf's adaptation of the parable of the Prodigal Son to issues of violence and reconciliation among humans (156–65). While much benefit is possible, the danger is that interpreters impose on texts a theology unrelated to their function. Such "spiritual exegesis" was often present throughout the church's history, but is more meditation on the text than exegesis of it.

See also Canonical Approach; Commentary; Context; Genre; Meaning; Textual Criticism; Translation

Bibliography

Cotterell, P., and M. Turner. Linguistics and Biblical Interpretation. SPCK, 1989; Fee, G. New Testament Exegesis. Westminster, 1983; idem. To What End Exegesis? Eerdmans, 2001; Hagner, D. New Testament Exegesis and Research. Fuller Theological Seminary, 1992; Hayes, J., and C. Holladay. Biblical Exegesis. John Knox, 1982; Kaiser, O., and W. Kümmel. Exegetical Method, trans. E. Goetchius. Seabury, 1963; Kaiser, W., Jr. Toward an Exegetical Theology. Baker, 1981; Lundin, R., A. Thiselton, and C. Walhout. The Responsibility of Hermeneutics. Eerdmans, 1985; Marshall, I. H., ed. New Testament Interpretation. Paternoster, 1977; Porter, S. "What Is Exegesis? An Analysis of Various Definitions." Pages 3–21 in Handbook to Exegesis of the New Testament, ed. S. Porter. Brill, 1997; Snodgrass, K. "Reading to Hear: A Hermeneutics of Hearing." HBT 24 (2002): 1–32; Stenger, W. Introduction to New Testament Exegesis, trans. D. Stott. Eerdmans, 1993; Stuart, D. Old Testament Exegesis. 3d ed. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Vanhoozer, K. "From Speech Acts to Scripture Acts: The Covenant of Discourse and the Discourse of Covenant." Pages 1–49 in After Pentecost, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2001; idem. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998; Volf, M. Exclusion and Embrace. Abingdon, 1996.

Klyne Snodgrass

Exile and Restoration

The themes of exile and restoration occupy a privileged position in any discussion of the theological interpretation of Scripture. They not only pervade biblical texts both directly and indirectly, but also form an organizing principle—a theoretical framework—for the fundamental thought-structures of the Scriptures. Many biblical scholars think that Israel's experience of exile contributed powerfully to the formation of the biblical texts themselves.

The present essay will not try to catalog the extensive biblical material on exile and restoration; that would go well beyond the space available here (see, e.g., Smith-Christopher; Hatina; Scott, Exile; Scott, Restoration). Instead, this essay discusses an ancient Jewish model of the theological interpretation of Scripture, a model that uses exile and restoration as a crucial part of its overall construct. The "grand narrative" that postmoderns have given up trying to find was much at the forefront of the theological interpretation of Scripture in the Second Temple period.

The Role of the Modern Interpreter

Before turning to antiquity, however, it seems best to begin with ourselves as modern interpreters. Self-awareness is essential to any theological interpretation of Scripture, not least with respect to the themes of exile and restoration. In attempting to interpret the Scriptures "for the church," we must be cognizant of our own proclivities and presuppositions, which filter and, to some degree, determine what we may find in the biblical text and how we may apply it. To this end, we may begin our study of exile and restoration by considering how our own modern interpretative framework may affect our perspective on the issues at hand.

In recent discussion of exile and restoration, two concerns have been raised about the role of the interpreter on these matters. First, Erich Gruen distinguishes what he calls "the gloomy approach" to Jewish dispersion from the less common positive approach. The gloomy view resolves Diaspora into exile (galut) and sees salvation exclusively in terms of homecoming, the recovery of a homeland. The positive view sees Jews as "the people of the Book," the text as a "portable temple," and restoration to a homeland (p 207) as superfluous. In the end, Gruen suggests that both approaches are too simplistic, too stark. "The whole idea of privileging homeland over diaspora, or diaspora over homeland, derives from a modern, rather than an ancient, obsession" (Gruen 234 [emphasis added]). Whether or not Gruen is correct, we must remain vigilant to detect in ourselves any unwarranted biases that may distort interpretation.

Second, Simon Goldhill argues that Friedrich Nietzsche (1885) is a fundamental starting point for the modern discourse of exile. The interpretative strategies that Nietzsche reveals inaugurate the arguments of much contemporary writing on exile. These strategies include, first of all, the premise that "homesickness" or "nostalgia" (Heimweh) is part of the general human condition: all human beings experience alienation, a loss of home, which defines their lot as existentially “exilic.” Second, exile is not merely a physical condition of spatial separation from a literal homeland, but rather a metaphor for the loss of an idealized intellectual topography, whether sociopolitical, cultural, moral, or spiritual. In this sense, exile becomes an expression for the “dislocation” and “alienation” that modern human beings (and especially intellectuals within society) feel on an existential level. Third, exiles desire to return to the idealized intellectual topography. However, to “return” is not a simple process of merely readopting an earlier intellectual position, because really to “return” requires one to overcome the disenfranchisement that led to exile in the first place. Therefore, “return” always involves reclaiming power (Nietzsche, The Will to Power) and setting things right again. For Nietzsche, the intellectual homeland to which he longs to return is pre-Socratic philosophy of ancient Greece, and the way back is by means of “the rainbow bridges of concepts,” which he constructs by an intellectual journey “from North to South” (from the Renaissance through Christianity to the pre-Socratics). Fourth, Nietzsche’s notion of exile and restoration (return to the pre-Socratics) is inextricably linked with the rise of German nationalism in the nineteenth century, which sought to establish the Dorian race as the founding ancestors of the German people.

Nietzsche’s concept of “return” should be seen in light of his “classical” teaching of an “eternal return of the same.” As Hubert Cancik (Antike; Cancik, “End,” 89, 105) has rightly argued, however, this construct was in no way the quintessence of Greek thought (Hesiod’s Works and Days, for example, never indicates that the golden age will return). It nevertheless has had a profound effect on modern comparisons between Jewish and Greek religion and philosophy. The favorite image used in this kind of comparison, line and circle—“goal-oriented thought, history, eschatology” versus a “static idea of being, nature, eternal return”—misrepresents the historical facts on both sides.

Nietzsche’s influential ideas about exile and return should alert us to possible latent assumptions in our interpretation of these motifs in the Scriptures. We all come to the text with a certain amount of “cultural baggage.” Even if we ourselves have not read Nietzsche (and Nietzsche is merely one possible source of “interference”), his influence on us may be indirect and unperceived. Although we can never escape our location in history, culture, class, and sex, careful historical work can help us at least to see our blind spots in these areas and to avoid making ancient texts merely a reflection of our own self-absorbed, modern fantasies.

Learning Theological Interpretation from “Reworked Scriptures”

If we must be sensitive to modern influences that may distort our historical and theological interpretation of the biblical texts, we must consciously open ourselves to ancient influences that may enhance our ability to interpret the same texts. Particularly relevant here are Jewish writings of the Second Temple period, some of which were considered authoritative in their own right, such as Reworked Pentateuch (4Q158), the Temple Scroll (11Q19–20), and Jubilees. These are books that experts usually place under Geza Vermes’s rubric “Rewritten Bible,” but which James VanderKam argues are better termed “Reworked Scriptures.” Hence, it is not presumed from the outset that a particular canon exists at Qumran, with a specific scope and shape.

These “Reworked Scriptures” are especially interesting for several reasons. First, they exemplify the theological interpretation of Scripture as it was practiced during the Second Temple period, the very time in which the NT writings were being formed. Learning from these Jewish sources may therefore contribute to our general understanding of exegetical, traditional, and theological processes at work within the NT, which are often remarkably different from the ones that modern scholars devise.

Second, in the case of the book of Jubilees at least, the “Reworked Scriptures” can be shown to have had a direct influence on the NT and (p 208) other early Christian writings (Scott, Exile; Scott, Restoration). Therefore, the work we do on the “Reworked Scriptures” may provide not only a general understanding of certain hermeneutical aspects of these early Christian writings. It may also build a traditional bridge between what we call the OT and the NT, a bridge much more substantial and directly relevant than the gossamer “rainbow bridges of concepts” used by Nietzsche.

Third, the “Reworked Scriptures” offer us a model for our own theological interpretation of Scripture, since in many ways we are attempting to do much the same thing as these writings were doing: to help the community of faith, often in a stressful situation, to understand in a comprehensive, coherent, and cogent way the revealed word and works of God. The purpose is so that the people of God can be progressively transformed in the process, thereby responding to God’s will for both the community and the world. It would seem absolutely essential that we take these texts seriously as part of the matrix of the NT and other Christian literature, even if their pseudepigraphical form repels us at first. The worldview to which these (and other) Second Temple texts expose us opens up a wholly different mode of thinking and facilitates a contextualized and nuanced theological interpretation of Scripture.

We should be clear, however, that theological interpretation, whether ancient or modern, is a decisively human task—a human attempt to bring together disparate pieces into a coherent whole and to see their collective implications for life. In a sense, every theological interpretation of Scripture is a reworking, since the interpreter is actively involved in the process (not merely a passive observer of phenomena). The interpreter always introduces a creative element (insight) into the resultant theological construct that was not necessarily inherent in the discrete biblical texts themselves. Hence, the process can yield differing results depending on (1) which texts are considered (always a selection, since it is impossible to see everything all at once and, in any case, everything cannot be brought into a coherent theological construct), (2) which interpretative framework is used to understand those texts and to correlate them with each other, and (3) how the resulting theological construct is applied to the needs of the interpretative community. Although the theological construct is vulnerable to criticism and correction at any one of these three points, entering into the hermeneutical circle of the part and the whole allows for refinements at any level. This happens as the retroductive process of interpretation continues through successive stages, often either in consultation with the interpretative community or in response to outside pressures.

Exile and Restoration in the Book of Jubilees

The book of Jubilees, a pseudepigraphon that apparently dates from the middle of the second century BCE, presents itself as divine revelation that Moses received on Mt. Sinai. In the first chapter, God converses with Moses directly. In chapters 2–50, the revelation comes through the mediation of the “angel of the presence,” who dictated to Moses from heavenly tablets. Although this divine revelation to Moses reportedly consisted of the whole history of humankind from beginning to end (e.g., Jub. 1:4, 26–27, 29; 23:32), the surface narrative of the book focuses on only part of it, from the creation of the world to the arrival of Israel at Sinai. In essence, therefore, Jubilees covers the same ground as Gen. 1 to Exod. 24. It appears to be “a rewriting of earlier pentateuchal material, which it places in a new setting (Sinai), and it quotes extensively from a more ancient text of Genesis and Exodus” (VanderKam 287).

Jubilees is a polemical writing with a strong priestly orientation, which seeks to prove the validity of its own position over against other competing perspectives with respect to two main issues—sacred space and sacred time. Like other pseudepigrapha in the Second Temple period, Jubilees is vying for predominance in the name of divine revelation transmitted through heroes of the past. To this end, Jubilees portrays itself as containing the very revelation given to Moses on Mt. Sinai, the scope of which spanned from creation to new creation. Although the book is firmly based on Israel's Scriptures, it is nevertheless also, at least in part, a radical reworking of those texts. The book seeks to demonstrate the divinely ordained symmetry between the temporal and spatial axes in the space-time continuum.

First, Jubilees affirms a rigorous temporal symmetry. All human history is foreordained by God and inscribed in the heavenly tablets, which in turn are revealed through angelic mediation to Moses on Mt. Sinai. In this presentation, historical patterns are adduced to confirm divine providence over earthly events. A striking example of this is found in the correspondence between the Endzeit and the Urzeit. In Jubilees, as in other apocalyptic literature, God intends the world ultimately to conform to his original (p 209) intention for the creation. But Jubilees goes even further by implying a complete recapitulation: the Endzeit or restoration will exactly mirror the Urzeit or patriarchal period. For just as human longevity progressively declined over the course of the fifty Jubilees from the creation of the world until Israel's entrance into the promised land, so also human longevity will incrementally increase over the course of the fifty Jubilees from Israel's return to the land to the new creation. In other words, the proof of the existence of divine providence—and therefore the correctness of Jubilees' version of things—is in its rhythmic working in history: construction, destruction, and reconstruction. All this was decreed from heaven to occur in periods that were equal in length and therefore symmetrical.

According to our reconstruction of Jubilees' chronological system, the axis of symmetry on the temporal plane—both the midpoint and low point of all human history—is astonishingly the exile and the destruction of the temple. This occurred at the culmination of the sixtieth Jubilee (AM 2940 [ anno mundi, “in the year of the world,” reckoned from creation] = 588/587 BCE) in a world era totaling 120 Jubilees. On either side of this line of symmetry, human history is essentially a mirror image.

This perfect historical symmetry is a function of the cultic cycles (such as the weekly Sabbath, the 364-day year, the seven-year “week,” and the 49-year Jubilee) generated by rhythms of the sun, which were established on the fourth day of creation—the exact middle of the first week. The greater and lesser conjunctions of these cultic cycles divide history into distinct periods, and the intersection of these conjunctions with major events in human history lends the events a particular significance or reveals an interrelationship with other events. For example, the grand Jubilee of Jubilees—the fiftieth Jubilee from creation in AM 2450—is seen, in conformity with the law of Jubilee in Lev. 25 interpreted on a national scale. It is the time for Israel’s redemption from the slavery in Egypt and the nation’s return to the land that rightfully belongs to it.

Jubilees affirms not only a temporal symmetry between Urzeit and Endzeit, but also, second, a spatial symmetry between heaven and earth. We have argued that the goal of history in the book is God’s original intention for his creation, the total recapitulation of the primeval period before Adam’s sin in the Garden of Eden. If this is correct, then we must also notice that the way things will be on earth is the way things are and always have been in heaven. The goal of history, in other words, is that the cultus will be “on earth as in heaven.”

Since the earthly cultus operates first and foremost in the land of Israel, and especially in the central sanctuary within the land, the process of recapitulation begins when Israel in exile repents from its previous sins (not least from its previous failure to observe the proper calendar), and God returns the people to the land. At the precise moment of entrance into the land of restoration (to occur ostensibly in 98/97 BCE), the cultic clock starts ticking. In fact, the people are expected to enter the land at the culmination of the seventieth Jubilee (AM 3430), ten Jubilees (= seventy “weeks” = 490 years) after the exile began. From then on, Israel is obligated to observe the entire law, including most prominently the weekly Sabbath, the annual festivals, the sabbatical year, and the Year of Jubilee. Only in so doing can Israel maintain the proper rhythm, which is simultaneously going on in heaven—all oriented on the cycles of the sun and of the cultus.

If the clock of the cultic cycles starts ticking upon entrance into the land, then the exact boundaries of the land need to be precisely defined. Since the Scriptures give differing dimensions, Jubilees opts for the tradition that gives the land maximal boundaries to the north and to the east (Gen. 15:18–21; Deuteronomy), corresponding to the ideal extent of the land during the Davidic-Solomonic empire.

Jubilees apparently holds that the generation of the conquest not only employed a faulty (lunar) calendar, but that they also misconstrued the boundaries of the land as beginning at the Jordan rather than at the Arnon. In this way, Israel radically erred in its cultic practice from the outset and thereby defiled the land, making the exile necessary so that the land would make up the cumulative seventy years of sabbatical rest that had been missed during the 490-year preexilic period (2 Chron. 36:21). Thus, by the end of the corresponding 490-year period of exile, atonement for iniquity would have been made (Dan. 9:24).

In Jubilees, recapitulation includes both universal and particular aspects that are integrally interrelated. In keeping with its view of sacred time—a comprehensive chronological framework rooted in the creative order itself—Jubilees necessarily contains a complementary vision of sacred space. This vision includes the whole created world and especially the holiest sites, Zion and the land, which will occupy the focal point in the age to come. All times and places will eventually be (p 210) brought back into conformity with the Creator’s will as foreordained in the heavenly tablets.

The foregoing survey of Jubilees’ temporal and spatial axes goes a long way toward explaining the crucial role of exile and restoration within the book’s overall conception of world history. We may add a further observation about the role of exile. There is a striking similarity between Israel’s exile from the land and the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden. In order to appreciate this similarity, we need to see that both places are presented in Jubilees as the holiest earth. Thus, Jub. 8:19–20 describes the choice territory allotted to Shem as having all the holy sites: “He [Noah] knew that the Garden of Eden is the holy of holies and is the residence of the Lord; [that] Mt. Sinai is the middle of the desert; and [that] Mt. Zion is in the middle of the earth. The three of them—the one facing the other—were created as holy [places].” The Garden of Eden is portrayed as a temple (“the holy of holies,” 8:19), just as Zion itself contains the temple (having a “holy of holies,” 23:21), which was to be built (1:10, 17) and then rebuilt in the end time (1:28–29). When Jubilees speaks about Eden, it is aimed at a future, eschatological temple on Mt. Zion in a new creation, at the time of Israel’s return to the land and restoration.

Implications

The vistas that Jubilees’ treatment of exile and restoration open up have many far-reaching implications for the investigation of the NT and other early Christian literature. For example, Jubilees foresees a protracted period of exile that would end only after Israel had turned to God in repentance (1:15, 23). Does this have any relevance for the message of repentance preached by John the Baptist and Jesus? In support of this possibility we may note that the Matthean genealogy of Jesus divides the generations from Abraham to the Messiah into three groups of fourteen, the last of which extends “from the Babylonian exile to the Messiah” (Matt. 1:17 AT). Does this mean that the Messiah brings the end of the exile? According to the summary in Mark 1:14–15, Jesus proclaimed, “The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has come near; repent and believe in the good news” (NRSV). What exactly is “the time” that is proclaimed as “fulfilled”? Paul uses similar language in Gal. 4:4: “But when the fullness of time had come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under the law” (NRSV, italics added). Are we to think of a periodization of history such as that presented in Jubilees as divinely foreordained?

Jubilees may also be helpful in understanding the nature of the restoration. According to Acts 1:6–7, when the disciples ask Jesus after the resurrection, “Lord, is this the time when you will restore the kingdom to Israel?” Jesus replies, “It is not for you to know the times or periods that the Father has set by his own authority” (NRSV). Thereupon, Jesus tells his followers that they will be empowered for mission “to the ends of the earth” (v. 8), apparently assuming that there will be a length of time before the final restoration of Israel takes place. Scholars have long thought that the “delay of the parousia” (the second coming of Christ) was a great embarrassment to early Christians. However, according to our reconstruction of Jubilees’ chronological system, the book expects an era of incremental restoration to last for fifty Jubilees (2,450 years), corresponding to the length of the first era of incremental decline. In this regard, Jubilees’ expectation can be compared with that in the Apocalypse of Weeks (1 En. 91:11–17; 93:1–10), which looks forward to a similarly long period of restoration. In view of these expectations for a progressive and lengthy restoration, which do not appear to be apologetic in nature, we can ask: Does the delay of the parousia in Christian sources now look less like a dire expedient to explain away an embarrassing situation than like an established tradition regarding the duration of the recapitulation of all things?

Finally, the Book of Jubilees provides opportunity to interact with N. T. Wright’s reconstruction of the historical Jesus. According to Wright, Jesus should be understood as a Jewish apocalyptic prophet who proclaimed the kingdom of God: (1) the return of Israel from exile, (2) the final triumph of God over evil, and (3) the return of Yahweh to Zion. However, unlike the literal expectations of return from exile and restoration found in the OT prophets and in Jewish literature of the Second Temple period, Jesus believed, in Wright’s view, that all three elements of the kingdom of God were taking place figuratively in and through his own ministry. Thus, for example, Wright states: “[Jesus] believes himself, much as John the Baptist had done, to be charged with the God-given responsibility of regrouping Israel around himself. But this regrouping is no longer a preliminary preparation for the return from exile, the coming of the kingdom; it is the return, the redemption, the resurrection from the dead” (132, with author’s emphasis). Similarly, in (p 211)his final journey to Jerusalem, Jesus in his own person was intentionally enacting Israel's return from exile, the final triumph over evil, and the return of Yahweh to Zion.

Although Wright's reconstruction of Jesus' restoration program is vulnerable to critique at many crucial points (cf. Newman), perhaps one of Wright's most controversial statements is that "the great majority of Jesus' contemporaries" understood themselves to be "still in exile, in all the senses that really mattered" (445). It is impossible, however, to know whether "the great majority" held to an ongoing exile mentality, for our evidence of popular conceptions in first-century Judaism is extremely limited. Moreover, behind Wright's idea of exile "in all the senses that really mattered" is the notion that "exile" (normally understood as the state of living in banishment from the homeland) can somehow be redefined (such as the state of living under foreign oppression) to make it applicable to first-century Jews residing in the land of Israel. Jubilees shows, however, that already in the mid-second century BCE (before the formation of the Qumran community and its possibly idiosyncratic self-conception of living in exile near the Dead Sea), the concept of a protracted exile in the literal and unvarnished sense of the term was part of a living tradition, at least in one pocket of "Palestinian" Judaism of the "Second Temple period." This raises afresh the issue of whether Jesus himself may have held a similar view (cf. McKnight; Scott, Geography).

See also Jewish Context of the NT

Bibliography

Cancik, H. "The End of the World, of History, and of the Individual in Greek and Roman Antiquity." Pages 84–125 in The Encyclopedia of Apocalypticism. Vol. 1, The Origins of Apocalypticism in Judaism and Christianity, ed. J. Collins. Continuum, 2000; idem. Nietzsches Antike. Metzler, 1995; Goldhill, S. "Whose Antiquity? Whose Modernity? The 'Rainbow Bridges' of Exile." Antike und Abendland 46 (2000): 1–20; Grabbe, L., ed. Leading Captivity Captive. JSOTSup 278. Sheffield Academic Press, 1998; Gruen, E. "Diaspora and Homeland." Pages 232–52 in Diaspora. Harvard University Press, 2002; Hatina, T. R. "Exile." Pages 348–51 in Dictionary of New Testament Background, ed. C. Evans and S. Porter. InterVarsity, 2000; McKnight, S. A New Vision for Israel. Eerdmans, 1999; Newman, C., ed. Jesus and the Restoration of Israel. InterVarsity/Paternoster, 1999; Nietzsche, F. Werke: Kritische Gesamtausgabe. Pages 412–13 [August–September 1885, frag. 41(4)] in vol. 7.3, Nachgelassene Fragmente Herbst 1884 bis Herbst 1885, ed. G. Colli and M. Montinari. De Gruyter, 1967; Ruiten, J. van. "Eden and the Temple: The Rewriting of Genesis 2:4–3:24 in the Book of Jubilees." Pages 63–94 in Paradise Interpreted, ed. G. Luttikhuisen. Themes in Biblical Narrative: Jewish and Christian Traditions 2. Brill, 1999; Scott, J. "The Division of the Earth in Jubilees 8:11–9:15 and Early Christian Chronography.” Pages 295–323 in Studies in the Book of Jubilees, ed. M. Albani et al. TSAJ 65. Mohr/Siebeck, 1997; idem. Geography in Early Judaism and Christianity. SNTSMS 113. Cambridge University Press, 2002; idem. On Earth as in Heaven. JSJSup 91. Brill, 2005; Scott, J., ed. Exile. JSJSup 56. Brill, 1997; idem. Restoration. JSJSup 72. Brill, 2001; Smith-Christopher, D. A Biblical Theology of Exile. Overtures to Biblical Theology. Fortress, 2002; VanderKam, J. “Questions of Canon Viewed through the Dead Sea Scrolls.” BBR 11 (2001): 269–92; Wright, N. T. Jesus and the Victory of God. Fortress, 1996.

James M. Scott

Exodus, Book of

The book of Exodus—traditionally ascribed to Moses, the central human figure in the book, but in itself anonymous—is foundational for the biblical understanding both of God, Yahweh, and of the people of God, Israel. Its content sets out parameters for understanding God and Israel, parameters that have always played a major role in the thought and practice of both Jews and Christians, though these differing religious traditions have tended to appropriate the material in markedly different ways. Of enormous significance for Christian theology is God’s self-revelation to Moses at the burning bush (Exod. 3); for ethics, the Ten Commandments (Exod. 20); and for spirituality, the pattern of Egypt, exodus, sea, and wilderness read metaphorically in terms of sin, redemption, baptism, and discipleship.

The book is in two main parts, strikingly depicted in its own words. First, Yahweh delivers Israel from Egypt: “You have seen what I did to Egypt and how I bore you upon eagles’ wings and brought you to myself” (19:4 NRSV). Second, Yahweh gives torah, a moral and ritual constitution for Israel to enable them to realize their unique vocation: “So now, if you truly obey my voice and keep my covenant, you shall be my special treasure among all peoples. Although the whole earth is mine, you shall be for me a priestly kingdom and a holy nation” (19:5–6 AT).

The preliminary question of the genre(s) of the text, and the difference this might make to its theological interpretation, is complex. What it might mean to take seriously the received form of the text, and yet to recognize its intrinsic diversity and its likely lengthy underlying processes of transmission and discernment, can here only be briefly suggested, rather than argued. First, divine self-revelation and its faithful human recognition could as well take place over an extended period (p 212) as at a single point of time. Second, the shape and sequence of the material may be meaningful in its own right, even if it does not correspond straightforwardly to the historical development of Israel's religion. Third, there need be no intrinsic reason why the Spirit should not appropriate any meaningful form of human communication. If ancient Israel's genres do not correspond to those of "history" as articulated in modern Western thought, they need be none the worse for that. The challenge is learning to recognize and appreciate the ancient conventions, and to relate them appropriately to our modern ones.

Exodus is well served by modern, theologically oriented commentaries. The outstanding volume remains the one by Childs, both for its reflection on the text and for its giving access to the great Jewish and Christian commentaries down through the centuries. Fretheim and Brueggemann each offer sophisticated but easily readable interpretation. From a Jewish perspective, Sarna is accessible and fascinating, while Jacob is more comprehensive though more polemical.

The richness and complexity of Exodus suggest an approach to its theological interpretation section by section.

1. *Setting the Scene, Exod. 1:1–2:22

The growth of Israel into a people has clear resonances with God's mandate at creation and with his promise to Abraham (Exod. 1:7; cf. Gen. 1:28; 12:2), thus clearly contextualizing all that follows within God's overall purposes for his world. Yet human opposition directly threatens this outworking of God's purposes, and the patient overcoming of this opposition is a major concern of the book.

It is striking that the first characters to play a positive role are all women—the midwives, Moses' mother and sister, Pharaoh's daughter—and unsurprisingly feminist interpreters have engaged suggestively with this (Bellis and Kaminsky 307–26).

Moses means well, but his act of violence exposes the double-edged nature and unpredictable consequences of such acts (Childs 27–46).

2. *God Calls and Commissions Moses, Exod. 2:23–7:7

The burning bush story is one of the most discussed passages in the whole OT (for an introduction to its symbolic interpretations, see Levine). Fire that burns without consuming is a prime symbol of God; perhaps because fire, as in Otto's famous characterization of holiness as mysterium tremendum et fascinans (Otto), both attracts (by its movement and color) and repels (by its heat if one gets too close). The hearing of God's voice from the fire will characterize Israel's encounter with God at Sinai (Deut. 4:9–13).

God calls Moses to be a "prophet," one who will speak and act for God; God will deliver Israel (3:7–8), which means that Moses is to deliver Israel (3:9–10). Moses feels overwhelmed at the enormity of this and produces a series of excuses, mainly expressing a sense of inadequacy; God takes these difficulties seriously, thereby implying genuine space in relationship with himself (3:11–4:12). Only when Moses tries to decline altogether does God become angry (4:13–14).

Moses' second difficulty relates to the name of God, which God then gives—Yahweh (3:13–15). The wordplay on the verb “to be” (hayah), which indicates something of the meaning of the divine name (3:14), has been a focus for Christian theologizing about the nature of God down through the ages, not least in relation to the LXX's rendering: “I am the One who is” (see LaCocque and Ricoeur 307–61). In both Hebrew and Greek, the text envisages a Deity whose nature is not dependent upon other than self—yet who graciously engages with, and indeed commits to, Moses and Israel. The self-revelation that makes God known also in no way removes the intrinsic mystery of God, but rather establishes the principle that, with God, “the more you know, the more you know you don't know.” (On the vocalization of the divine name and the appropriate form for Christian use, see Seitz 131–44.)

Moses' initial encounter with Pharaoh is disappointing—far from heeding Moses, Pharaoh responds with cynical brutality; Moses needs to learn that God's ways are not his ways (5:1–23). God reaffirms his new self-revelation as Yahweh, a God who will deliver his people, and a reluctant Moses prepares to try again.

(On the much-discussed technical problem of how Yahweh giving his name to Moses relates to the extensive use of the divine name in Genesis, see Moberly, Old Testament.)

3. The Plagues, *Exod. 7:8–11:10

Moses' confrontation with Pharaoh and his magicians—who initially can exercise the same kind of power that Moses exercises—raises numerous theological issues. First, why such an extended sequence? Why does not Yahweh, through Moses, simply sweep away the opposition? This is explicitly addressed in 9:14–16, in terms of the plagues serving to enhance recognition of Yahweh (p 213). Implicitly also, God's action is appropriately encountered within the familiar constraints of a long struggle.

Second, why does God harden Pharaoh's heart? This is clearly related to the first issue. At least it is clear that Pharaoh also hardens his own heart; thus it is not the case that Pharaoh is wanting to respond positively but is being prevented, but that God confirms him in the course he embraces for himself, and uses this to heighten the significance of Israel's deliverance.

Third, what if one reads this text (and the crossing of the sea) from an Egyptian perspective? Does this not show Yahweh to be, in some sense, a tribal or national deity, less than the one God of all? Interestingly, this question, sharply posed by those who have suffered oppression that has justified itself by appeal to God (Warrior), tends not to bother liberation theologians who are inclined to see an oppressor receiving just deserts. The underlying issue is election, Yahweh's call of Israel, with God consequently making a distinction in how he treats Israel (9:4, 26). Yet election is not just a privilege, for the OT principle is that (in the words of Jesus, Luke 12:48 AT) "much is expected of those to whom much is given" (cf. Amos 3:2).

4. *Passover, Exodus, and Crossing the Sea, Exod. 12:1–15:21

The Passover texts have usually been of greater interest to Jews, who have still sought to enact what is prescribed, than to Christians, who have seen them as prefiguring Christ and so have tended to read the texts in a metaphorical mode (cf. 1 Cor. 5:7–8).

The use of the exodus by liberation theologians raises important hermeneutical issues (see Bellis and Kaminsky 215–75). On the one hand, a general OT case can be made that Israel is a model for the nations, and that therefore what applies to Israel can be applied to others also; and deliverance from unjust oppression is clearly a major concern within the text. On the other hand, God is said to be motivated explicitly by his antecedent commitment to the patriarchs (2:24; 6:2–8). The particularity of Israel's election should not be ignored, as also the purpose of the exodus, to make Israel servants/slaves to Yahweh. In general, any responsible Christian use of the material should be refracted through the lens of Christ, where the judgment and redemption of God are definitively revealed. To take the OT seriously both in its own right and in the light of Christ is demanding, but that is the task of Christian theology.

5. *Learning in the Wilderness, Exod. 15:22–18:27

The wilderness narratives of Exodus are continued in Numbers, where some of the stories are clearly similar so as to draw a contrast (manna/quails, Exod. 16//Num. 11; rebellion at Meribah, Exod. 17:1–7//Num. 20:2–13). Israel's failings are treated more lightly in Exodus, before the giving of torah at Sinai, than in Numbers, where the post-Sinai context implies that more is expected of those to whom more is given.

In the wilderness Israel has to learn new ways of living—what it means to be Yahweh's people. Exodus 16 is paradigmatic, presenting a form of "Give us each day our daily bread." The hardships of the wilderness lead Israel to complain and to remember Egypt selectively (16:1–3). Yahweh’s response is not only to provide for them, but explicitly to test their obedience (16:4–5). After Israel is reprimanded for complaining (16:6–12), God’s provision is given (16:13–14) and initiates a didactic sequence. First, when God provides food, the people do not even realize it without Moses’ explanation (16:15). Second, God’s provision is strictly according to need (not strength)—neither more nor less (16:16–18). Third, it cannot be hoarded, so God’s gift must be collected fresh each day (16:19–21). Fourth, the regular daily pattern varies on the Sabbath, for on Sabbath eve double can be collected and some kept; but the people are tempted to disbelieve this just as much as the regular pattern (16:22–30). Finally, some manna is solemnly preserved, presumably as a reminder of its lesson and meaning even in the promised land, where manna no longer needs to be provided (16:31–36).

6. *The Covenant at Sinai, Exod. 19–24

As Israel gathers at Sinai, we have the keywords that sum up Exodus as a whole (19:4–6). The awesome nature of Yahweh’s presence at Sinai is depicted by the language of storm, earthquake, volcano, fire, and trumpet (19:16–19). The argument that this depicts a live volcano, and therefore attempts to locate Mt. Sinai should search for a volcano, seriously misconstrues the purpose of the language. The text seeks to convey the overwhelming nature of the divine presence by appealing to the most shaking and moving of known phenomena.

In this awesome scene, Moses has uniquely privileged access to God (19:19–20; cf. 19:9; 14:31). Sinai in Exod. 19:24 is like a temple with restricted access: the people stay off/outside; selected leaders, such as priests, come into the holy (p 214) place and encounter God (24:1, 9–11); Moses, like the high priest, goes alone to God as into the holy of holies (24:2, 15–18). Among other things, this underlines the parallels between Israel’s regular worship and its foundational engagement with God; also, it stresses the implicit authority of the legislation associated with Moses. (In a different vein, Moses’ ascent of the mountain into the fire and darkness of the divine presence was taken as a model of spiritual life in the suggestive typological interpretation of the early church; see Gregory of Nyssa.)

Yet even Moses is off the mountain when God speaks the Ten Commandments (19:21–20:1), which are presented as the direct, and overwhelming, address of God himself (20:18–19, 22), so as to suggest the conformity of their content to the very nature of God. Moses interprets the giving of the commandments in a key verse, 20:20: they are to test Israel, so as to bring about the fear of God and diminish sin. Obedience to the commandments is demanding but will make Israel into the upright people they are meant to be. “Fear of God” is the prime OT term for appropriate human responsiveness to God. The combination of “test” and “fear” recurs in Gen. 22, in a way suggesting that Abraham’s costly obedience in being willing to relinquish Isaac in some way models what Israel’s responsiveness to the Ten Commandments should be (Moberly, Old Testament, 144–45).

The detailed laws of Exod. 21–23 are, by contextual implication, outworkings in everyday, mundane situations of the fundamental concerns of the Ten Commandments. The Israelites then commit themselves to the covenant explicitly in terms of obedience to the Ten Commandments and the detailed laws (24:3) in a ritual where the blood perhaps symbolizes consecration (24:4–8; cf. 29:20–21), thus marking Israel as Yahweh’s holy people (Nicholson 172). On this basis Israel’s representatives “see” God (24:9–11). The proximity of access to God that is now possible, on the basis of consecrated covenantal obedience to the will of God, contrasts sharply with the earlier distance from the holy place of God that was enjoined upon Israel (19:10–15, 21–24).

7. Tabernacle and Priesthood, Exod. 25–31

The purpose of the tabernacle is to mediate the presence of Yahweh, so that as Israel moves on from Sinai, the divine presence that came upon Sinai can continue to accompany Israel in this “sacramental” shrine. The ark and the mercy seat is where Yahweh will meet with Moses (25:22), and the regular daily sacrifices will set the context for Yahweh’s sanctifying presence in Israel (29:38–46, a key interpretative passage). Subsequent Jewish and Christian practices of morning and evening prayer seek to perpetuate this basic pattern of enabling openness to the divine presence in differing contexts.

The images and symbols within the tabernacle resonate with a wider ancient Near Eastern context (Keel 111–76). Since royal thrones were regularly flanked by fabulous creatures, the flanking cherubim above the ark implicitly indicate the presence of Yahweh’s royal throne (25:17–22). The symbolism also acquires meaning from its Israelite context. It is likely that the seven-branch lampstand (25:31–40) is meant to be understood as a stylized representation of the burning bush—a perpetual symbolization of the fundamental encounter at Sinai/Horeb.

8. Covenant Breaking and Renewal, Exod. 32–34

Israel's impatient making of the golden calf is presented as, in effect, a breaking of the first two commandments, and this while Israel is still at the mountain of God; it is rather like committing adultery on one's wedding night. Even if this was not the specific intention of the people (which is open to various less-heinous construals), the text's account of their action is explicit (32:7–10). Aaron's self-exculpatory evasiveness—compare his account to Moses (32:21–24) with the narrator's own account (32:1–6)—suggests deception of self and/or others in a way indicative of a gap between appearance and reality.

Israel's faithlessness almost terminates the covenant at the outset. But Moses remains faithful, and his intercession makes a difference within God's purposes (32:10–14; cf. the importance attached to the role of faithful intercessor in Ezek. 22:30; Isa. 62:6–7). When Yahweh offers to make of Moses another Abraham (32:10b; cf. Gen. 12:2–3), Moses shows his true stature by declining the offer. The intercessory role of Moses is further developed in Exod. 33:11–20. The pattern here is that initially Moses speaks much and Yahweh little; but as the intercession continues, Moses speaks less and Yahweh more, until finally Yahweh alone speaks and Moses recedes from view. Overall, Moses uses his privileged position before God to seek a fuller revelation of God, which is granted in terms of what stiff-necked Israel most needs—grace and mercy (33:19). Yet this deeper engagement with God brings out the intrinsic limits of such engagement: the one with whom Yahweh speaks “face-to-face” (33:11) “cannot (p 215) see my [Yahweh's] face” (33:20) (cf. Eph. 3:19, where Paul prays for Christians to know the love of Christ that surpasses knowledge). And the following provisions for Moses' safety in the rock (33:21–23), which stress the limited and partial nature of what Moses will see, paradoxically prepare for the greatest self-revelation of the nature of God, upon Yahweh's own lips, in the whole Bible (34:6–7).

Despite its intrinsic importance for the character of God, 34:6–7 has received less attention in Christian theology than 3:14. By contrast Jewish theology has given prime weight to 34:6–7, even designating it as a revelation of “the thirteen attributes” of God (for enumeration, see Jacob 985). Together the two passages are complementary in a foundational way for the OT understanding of Yahweh. In the context of Israel's sin, the strong emphasis is on divine mercy (see Moberly, “How?” 191–201). The reaffirmation of judgment in 34:7b is striking—since, in context, there is a sense in which Yahweh is clearing the guilty—and is most likely meant to safeguard Yahweh's moral nature and requirements, to clarify that the mercy is not leniency or moral indifference. In other words, Yahweh's mercy is meant to lead to renewed practices of faithfulness and integrity (cf. Ps. 130:4), not to a sense that Israel can "get away" with things because God will let them off. If Exod. 19–24 emphasizes God's searching moral demand, Exod. 32–34 stresses his searching grace. Theologically, it is vital to hold these two emphases in tension, and to resist all attempts to play off one against the other.

As a unit Exod. 32–34 offers a fundamental construal of Israel's existence before God, analogous to the construal of the world's existence in the flood narrative (Gen. 6–9). At their very beginnings the world in general, and the chosen people in particular, commit sin and face destruction (Gen. 6:5–13; Exod. 32:7–10). One person, Noah/Moses, remains faithful, is uniquely said to have "found favor" with Yahweh (Gen. 6:8; Exod. 33:12), and becomes a mediator of God's grace for the future. Faithful Noah and Moses are mentioned at the turning point of the narratives from judgment to renewal (Gen. 8:1; Exod. 33:11). Noah offers sacrifice and Moses prays (Gen. 8:20; Exod. 33:12–18), each to elicit a climactic pronouncement of divine mercy and forbearance toward sin (Gen. 8:21; Exod. 33:19; 34:6–7). And each narrative strikingly emphasizes that the sinful qualities that brought judgment in the first place remain unchanged (humanity's sinful inclinations, Gen. 6:5; 8:21; Israel's being stiff-necked, Exod. 32:9; 33:3, 5; 34:9). So God deals with the world in general, and the chosen people in particular, in the same way (without partiality). And each should know that their continuing existence is because of divine grace toward the unfaithful, grace paradoxically mediated by one who is faithful.

9. *The Tabernacle Established and Inaugurated, Exod. 35–40

Israel brings extensive freewill offerings (implicitly a response to grace), and the skilled craft that enables the tabernacle to be constructed is explicitly an endowment from God (35:4–36:7). Everything for the tabernacle and for the vestments of its priests is made as prescribed (39:32–43). Moses is obedient in exactly the same way that Noah was obedient (40:16; Gen. 6:22).

At the end of the book the cloud and glory of Yahweh's presence come to the tabernacle as they earlier came to Mt. Sinai (40:34; 24:15–16). So the one who met with Israel at Sinai will accompany Israel through the wilderness, and will also come to the temple in Jerusalem (1 Kings 8:10–11).

Conclusion

One possible way of reading the book as a whole is to see Exodus as probing the meaning of servitude and freedom, which can be focused on the differing implications of the Hebrew root ‘bd (slave/servant). Israel is delivered from slavery to Egypt (esp. 1:13–14, ‘bd, 5x), a slavery of heartless oppression, so as to become a slave to Yahweh instead. The first of the specific “ordinances” at Sinai is about the Hebrew slave (‘ebed) who (remarkably) loves his master and chooses to serve him for life in preference to gaining independence (21:2–6). This may well be put in this prime position so as to metaphorically picture Israel in relation to Yahweh, who later says, “For it is to me that the Israelites are slaves” (Lev. 25:55 AT). Such servitude is one of justice and holiness. It is the highest honor elsewhere in the OT for a person to be designated as “servant (‘ebed) of Yahweh” (so, e.g., Abraham, Moses, David [Gen. 26:24; Josh. 1:7; 1 Kings 11:13]). Likewise, Paul calls himself the servant/slave (doulos, the regular LXX rendering of ‘ebed) of Christ (Rom. 1:1; etc.). The thought underlying all this is well captured in the famous (Book of Common Prayer) words “His service is perfect freedom.” Compare the psalmist’s linking obedience to torah with living in freedom (Ps. 119:44–45), and Paul’s emphasis that Christian freedom is not for self-gratification but for loving service of others (Gal. 5:1, 13). The basic point is (p 216) the intrinsic conceptual connection between freedom from alien oppression and obedient service to God—a conceptuality that, in a contemporary culture that rather too easily appeals to “freedom” as self-evident in value and meaning, requires careful and sustained attention.

Bibliography

Bellis, A., and J. Kaminsky. Jews, Christians, and the Theology of the Hebrew Scriptures. SBL, 2000; Brueggemann, W. “The Book of Exodus.” NIB 1:675–981; Childs, B. Exodus. OTL. SCM, 1974; Fretheim, T. Exodus. IBC. John Knox, 1991; Gregory of Nyssa. The Life of Moses. Classics of Western Spirituality, trans. A. Malherbe and E. Ferguson. Paulist, 1978; Jacob, B. The Second Book of the Bible, trans. W. Jacob. Ktav, 1992; Keel, O. The Symbolism of the Biblical World, trans. T. Hallett. SPCK, 1978; LaCocque, A., and P. Ricoeur. Thinking Biblically. University of Chicago Press, 1998; Levine, E. The Burning Bush. Sepher-Hermon, 1981; Moberly, R. W. L. “How May We Speak of God? A Reconsideration of the Nature of Biblical Theology.” TynBul 53 (2002): 177–202; idem. The Old Testament of the Old Testament. OBT. Fortress, 1992. Reprint, Wipf & Stock, 2001; Nicholson, E. God and His People. Oxford University Press, 1986; Otto, R. The Idea of the Holy, trans. J. Harvey. Oxford University Press, 1924; Sarna, N. Exodus. The JPS Torah Commentary. JPS, 1991; Seitz, C. Figured Out. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Warrior, R. “Canaanites, Cowboys, and Indians: Deliverance, Conquest, and Liberation Theology Today.” Reprinted in pages 188–94 of The Postmodern Bible Reader, ed. D. Jobling et al. Blackwell, 2001.

R. W. L. Moberly

Exodus/New Exodus

Exodus is more than a book of the OT. It is a theological paradigm that resonates, both implicitly and explicitly, in various books of the OT, Second Temple literature, and the NT. In both Jewish and Christian heritage, Israel's exodus has served as a generative model for articulating God's subsequent redemptive acts in new exoduses. This theme is also closely aligned with the new creation; there is a connection between creation and redemption: to redeem is to re-create.

The Book of Exodus

Within the book of Exodus itself, we already begin to see the interpenetration of these themes. In 1:1–7, Israel's life in Egypt is described by using creation language: "The Israelites were fruitful and multiplied greatly and became exceedingly numerous, so that the land was filled with them" (v. 7). Such language is clearly reminiscent of Gen. 1:28 and 9:1. When Pharaoh takes notice that the Israelites have become "much too numerous" (v. 9), he takes it upon himself to counter that trend first by enslaving them and then by killing the male children at birth. The very thing that is a sign of God's creation-blessing (filling the earth) is what Pharaoh wants to reverse. Such a maneuver pits Pharaoh not so much against Israel but squarely against Israel's God, its Creator and, as the story unfolds, its Redeemer.

Because Pharaoh's actions are an attempt to reverse the blessings of the Creator/Redeemer God of Israel, it is only fitting that God's subsequent dealings in Exodus be couched in the language of creation. Yahweh enacts redemption of Israel through a series of creation reversals. Each plague is, for example, an undoing of the created order. Frogs and insects, rather than maintaining their ordained place in the ecosystem, invade Egypt—chaos results where once there was order. Also, the ninth plague reintroduces the reign of darkness into what God had once ordered light (Gen. 1:3–5); what were once separated in orderly fashion, day and night, are now again joined in chaos. Perhaps most explicit is the parting of the Red Sea. Long ago God had separated the water from the dry land (Gen. 1:9–10). For the Israelites, he does so again: in Exod. 14:16, God divides the water, exposing the dry land so the Israelites can walk through. The army of Pharaoh is not so blessed, however. They attempt to cross, but in the final creation reversal, God brings the waters of chaos crashing down upon the army. In Gen. 1 and Exodus, God employs his creation to bring life. But in Exodus, he reintroduces chaos to punish the enemies of Israel.

This interplay between redemption and creation continues to work itself out throughout Exodus. Israel was redeemed for a purpose, and that purpose begins to come to fruition on Mt. Sinai. Commentators have considered both the giving of the law at Sinai and the building of the tabernacle to be re-creative acts. The completion of Israel's redemption includes the institution of God's order on the level of human conduct toward God and others (social/moral law). Likewise, the tabernacle is the introduction of heavenly order into a chaotic world. Even the dimensions of the tabernacle suggest order: each outer and inner court is 75 by 75 feet square. The curtain is made of blue, purple, and red material, with cherubim interwoven throughout (36:35)—a picture of heaven, so to speak. The tabernacle was constructed on a pattern of six creative days culminating in a Sabbath rest; six times in the tabernacle narrative we find the phrase "The LORD said to Moses" (25:1; 30:11, 17, 22, 34; 31:1), which culminates in a Sabbath (31:12–18). The entire account is (p 217) punctuated in 40:33; "So Moses finished [klh] the work [ml'kh]" is reminiscent of the words at the completion of creation in Gen. 2:2 (AT): "So God on the seventh day finished [klh] his work [ml'kh]." The building of the tabernacle is a mini creative act.

Exodus is not simply about liberating the Israelites from captivity, as it is sometimes expressed in various modes of liberation theology. Rather, taken as a whole the entire exodus story is about God's redemption of Israel, to form a new-creation community, one that is obedient to God and through which God will fulfill his promise to Abraham: "All peoples on earth will be blessed through you" (Gen. 12:3).

Isaiah

The interplay of themes is seen in a number of places in the OT, some more subtle than others. Perhaps the most explicit reflex of the creation/exodus thematic complex is Israel's return from Babylon. The exodus and return from Babylon are bookends to Israel's journeys. She begins her existence by being redeemed from one foreign land, and then, hundreds of years later, at the close of one chapter of her existence and the beginning of another, she is again rescued from exile. Isaiah 43:14–19 refers to Yahweh as Israel's "Redeemer" (v. 14), who is also Israel's "Creator" (v. 15). He announces Israel's imminent release from Babylon by reminding them that it was "he who made a way through the sea, a path through the mighty waters, who drew out the chariots and horses, the army and reinforcements together, and they lay there, never to rise again, extinguished, snuffed out like a wick" (vv. 16–17). Israel's Creator is also its Redeemer. This Redeemer-Creator God who drowned Pharaoh's army is the same God who will now deliver the Israelites from another captivity. The certainty of God's deliverance today is based on what he has done yesterday. The Redeemer-Creator God of Exodus is on the move again: "See, I am doing a new thing!" (v. 19).

Wisdom of Solomon

Jewish writings of the Second Temple period also employ this thematic complex. A good example is the apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon. This book was written during a time of intense persecution (likely during the reign of Gaius Caligula, 37–41 CE), and the writer is attempting to bring encouragement to his readers. The form this encouragement takes is a review of God's (or, for this writer, Wisdom's) care for his people throughout history. For most of the book's second half, the culminating event to which the writer appeals is the exodus (10:15–19:22). The message is that the God of the exodus is "our God" as well (15:1). The author adds a dimension to this theme, however. The deliverance of which he speaks is not primarily escape from persecution but through persecution, the transition from this life to the next, an "exodus" from one land to another (see 3:1–4, esp. v. 2: exodus, "departure"). Perhaps this is why the author chooses Israel's exodus experience as a central topic of conversation in chapters 10–19. The author presents Israel's historical exodus, its passage from "death to life," as it were, as the prime biblical portrait of what wisdom is doing now in the lives of the persecuted Jews to whom he is writing. It is their own passage from death to life, their own exodus.

The New Testament

The NT shows clear evidence of articulating God's work in Christ in exodus-creation language. In fact, it is such a richly attested theme in the NT we can only draw attention to a few central passages. First we have the use of Hos. 11:1 in Matt. 2:15. Much has been made of this passage, mainly in terms of the odd way Matthew seems to be using Hosea. But our point here is more straightforward. By appealing to Hos. 11:1 in conjunction with the boy Jesus leaving Egypt, Matthew is drawing an analogy: as God called the Israelites out of Egypt, so too did God call Jesus out of Egypt as a boy. In some sense Jesus is to be understood as living out Israel's experience. Christ, to put it a bit differently, is the final, concrete, focal point for Israel's experience. He is the "ultimate Israel," and this is shown, according to Matthew's quotation, by the fact that Jesus, like the Israelite slaves, came out of Egypt.

Perhaps nowhere in the NT is the new exodus theme more explicit than in Heb. 3:1–6. The parallel here is between Moses and Christ as deliverer. The main point of this difficult passage is that Jesus is superior to Moses. Although somewhat difficult to discern in 3:1–6, the reasons for this are made clearer in what follows (4:1–13). It is through Christ (the new Moses) that we the church (the new Israel) are delivered from enslavement (to the present world order, characterized by sin, death, and eternal separation from God) and given entrance to heaven (the new promised land).

Paul alludes to the exodus in 1 Cor. 10:1–2: “For I do not want you to be ignorant of the fact, brothers, that our forefathers were all under the (p 218)cloud and that they all passed through the sea. They were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea.” Paul seems to be recalling the exodus for the benefit of his Christian audience (a point made explicit in v. 11). He says that the Israelites who experienced the exodus were “under the cloud,” meaning they were guided and protected by God in the form of the pillar of cloud, and by that guidance they “passed through the sea.” What then does it mean that the Israelites have been “baptized into Moses”? Baptism is the Christian’s concrete expression that the believer, in Christ, is now leaving behind an old way of life—a life of bondage to sin and death—and entering into a new mode of existence (see also Rom. 6:3–4). It is a symbol of the process whereby we undergo our own exodus, leaving the pattern of this world and joining another way of life under Christ’s leadership and authority. This, perhaps, is the point that Paul is making about Israel’s passage through the sea. It, too, was a kind of baptism, where God’s people leave an old way of life and begin another under Moses’ leadership. The Red Sea incident has thus become for Paul a powerful, theologically rich forecast of that final deliverance in Christ, the beginning of a new life, a new mode of existence in a new land, with God as supreme ruler.

The NT also employs creation language to describe the church’s redemption in Christ. For example, John 1:1 recounts the birth of Christ in words that clearly echo Gen. 1: “In the beginning was the Word.” The coming of Christ is a new beginning. Paul puts it somewhat differently. Christ is the second Adam, in whom all of humanity will have a new beginning (Rom. 5:12–21; 1 Cor. 15:20–28). It is worth noting that Jesus refers to his own “departure” from this life as his “exodus” (Luke 9:31). And through his resurrection, in fact, the creation itself begins to anticipate not only personal but also cosmic implications of what the Creator-Redeemer God has done (Rom. 8:22–23).

The exodus theme in the NT reaches its final stage in the book of Revelation. The coming of Christ, the new Moses, and the deliverance he achieves for his people through his death and resurrection—these are actually the first stage of a two-stage process. The final stage of this exodus journey will take place at his second coming. Revelation speaks a great deal about the destruction of “Babylon.” This is certainly not meant to represent any one city, much less the literal city of Babylon, but the present world order as a whole. The status that Egypt achieved in the OT as the ultimate symbol of worldly opposition to God came to be supplanted during the postexilic and intertestamental period by Babylon. And for generations of Jews living in the shadows cast by this horrific event, it stands to reason that the exile to Babylon would inspire them to use this nation as a shorthand representation for any major opposition to God. We have already seen how Isaiah draws the forceful analogy between Egypt and Babylon. The writer of Revelation, then, stands in a strong tradition.

The destruction of God’s enemies in Revelation is marked by a series of plagues and disasters that are clearly reminiscent of the plagues against Egypt. When this world order, with its oppression against God’s people, is finally brought to an end, it will be the final act of judgment against God’s enemies who would dare harm his servants. In the end, Babylon will, like Pharaoh and his army before them, meet a violent end, like a huge millstone thrown into the sea (Rev. 19:21). Babylon will meet a watery death, in symbolic terms, and the final exodus will be complete. Then a new heaven and new earth will take the place of the old (21:1). The redeemed humanity, re-created in the image of the risen Christ, will return to the garden (note the presence of the tree of life in 22:2) and dwell in the new creation. The last exodus leads to the new creation.

See also Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics

Bibliography

Enns, P. “Creation and Re-Creation: Psalm 95 and Its Interpretation in Hebrews 3:1–4:13.” WTJ (1993): 255–80; idem. Exodus. NIVAC. Zondervan, 2000; idem. Exodus Retold. HSM 57. Scholars Press, 1997; Fretheim, T. Exodus. Interpretation. John Knox, 1991; Gowan, D. Theology in Exodus. Westminster John Knox, 1994; Janzen, J. G. Exodus. Westminster Bible Companion. Westminster John Knox, 1997; Keesmaat, S. Paul and His Story. JSNTSup 181. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Plastaras, J. The God of Exodus. Bruce Pubg. Co., 1966.

Peter Enns

Explanation and Understanding See Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics

Expository Preaching See Preaching, Use of the Bible in

Ezekiel, Book of

The book of Ezekiel is most famous for its visions, especially of the dry bones (ch. 37) and (p 219)the new temple (40–48). More recently, the sexually charged language of chapters 16 and 23 has provoked comment. The book is addressed to an audience in the Babylonian exile. It speaks to those who have lost everything and yet have everything to gain, if only they acknowledge their guilt and put their trust in the God of the covenant. Its main concern is the true identity of the people of God, which is not to be found in history or genealogy but in the purposes of God. The theocentric message of the book is reinforced by frequent use of the recognition formula (“then they/you will know that I am Yahweh”).

The Argument of the Book

While the book of Ezekiel is the only prophetic book largely written in the first person, the prophet is portrayed not so much as a preacher as someone addressed by the word of God. The prophet is a model for how to receive the word of God, which is contrasted with his audience’s lack of receptiveness (2:8–3:11). In fact, the resistance of Ezekiel’s exilic audience to the prophetic word is a major theme in the book, and 37:1–14 appears to comment on the fact that the prophetic word will accomplish its task only the second time round, in its written form (Renz, Function, 204–9). This task is the reconstitution of the people of Israel, which requires a change of allegiance on the part of the exiles. They must dissociate themselves from their sinful past and identify with the restored Israel that God is about to create—a new people as far as attitudes are concerned, although a branch from the same ethnic stock. The task of dissociation is undertaken primarily in the first part of the book, while the new orientation is offered particularly in chapters 34–48.

There are several subcollections in the first part of the book. They are marked by a narrative portion that includes either a date (1:1–3), a notice about elders approaching the prophet (14:1), or both (8:1; 20:1). In four cycles, which all end on a strong note of finality, the destruction of Jerusalem is justified as deserved punishment for its rebellion, but the argument is developed in specific ways in each cycle. The first cycle, chapters 1–7, presents the basic case: Judah’s and Jerusalem’s sin will lead to its end. The second cycle, 8–13, strengthens the plausibility of this case by answering possible objections, such as the idea that God could not possibly abandon his people (8–11) or the idea that judgment is for the distant future, not for the present time (12:21–13:23). The third cycle, chapters 14–19, outlines more precisely what the exiles’ response should be to this disaster and includes explicit calls to repentance (14:1–12; 18:1–32). Repentance cannot avert the disaster that will befall Jerusalem, but it offers life for the exilic community, which without repentance is as doomed as Jerusalem. The last section (in the book's first part), chapters 20–24, summarizes the first three cycles and brings the narrative to the point when Jerusalem is laid under siege. Ezekiel's response to his wife's death is a model for how the exilic community should respond to Jerusalem's fall. Public mourning would signal sympathy, which in the case of Jerusalem's deserved judgment, is inappropriate. Instead, the exiles are to accept the judgment and groan over their own sins (24:15–27).

In the compilation of prophecies concerning nations other than Judah in chapters 25–32, three collections can be identified: prophecies against Judah's nearest neighbors (25), prophecies against Tyre (26–28), and prophecies against Egypt (29–32). The following points are made: (1) The fact that the Babylonian king is Yahweh's instrument can be seen not only in the events surrounding the fall of Jerusalem but also throughout Nebuchadnezzar's western campaign. (2) Yahweh does not tolerate malice and self-righteousness, and thus, by implication, he himself does not act out of malice or self-righteousness. (3) No other nation will be allowed to take possession of the land—indeed, seven nations are dealt with before Israel reenters the land (cf. Deut. 7:1). (4) The oracles against Tyre and Egypt affirm that Yahweh deals with rebellious, self-sufficient pride and shows up its futility wherever he encounters it. (5) Egypt will never again be attractive as a substitute for trusting Yahweh. And (6) the frequency of the recognition formula reminds us that in all this God is revealing himself, making each of these events in international affairs “a moment of self-disclosure for Yahweh” (Block 2:12).

The reuse of the watchman motif in chapter 33 forms a closing bracket, paired with its first occurrence in chapter 3, and signals the function of the intervening chapters: to warn of impending danger. The prophet did not return to his homeland to warn Jerusalem, the community most obviously under threat. His ministry was to the exilic community, for whom the warning was not yet too late. Chapter 33 picks up motifs from chapter 18 to remind readers that the proper response to the warning is repentance. The arrival of a refugee from Jerusalem informing the exiles that the city has been destroyed (33:21) changes the rhetorical situation but not the message. Ezekiel reaffirms that physical descent from Abraham is insufficient (p 220) for reestablishment in the land. At the same time, the chapter gives a discouraging picture of Ezekiel's post-586 audience; only “when this comes—and come it will!—then they shall know that a prophet has been among them” (33:33). The first part of the book has already indicated that “this” includes judgment as well as restoration (20:32–44), and glimpses of judgment are found throughout chapters 34–48.

This last major part of the book is arranged in a palistropic pattern (ABCDCBA), with the vision of the dry bones in the center (37:1–14), and at the outer ends an affirmation of Yahweh’s kingship as the beginning and end of Israel’s restoration (chs. 34, 40–48). The first inner ring is formed by two-panel prophecies claiming the land for Israel against other nations (35:1–36:15; chs. 38–39). The second is formed by anthologies summarizing the work of transformation and the blessings resulting from it, with 36:16–38 focusing on the spiritual, and 37:15–28 on the political. The two are aspects of the one transformation brought about by acknowledging Yahweh as king. Yahweh’s kingship is affirmed vis-à-vis self-serving human rulers (ch. 34) and in the way space is organized in chapters 40–48, with the temple forming the new center of the nation independent of the palace, confirming Yahweh as absolute power holder (43:7). The messiah plays no part in the nation’s restoration, but a new David will guarantee the nation’s unity (37:15–28). He will exercise rather than challenge the rule of Yahweh (34:23–24). There is a certain shift from responsibility to passivity in the oracles of salvation. Yahweh will not only bring repentant exiles back to the land but also will himself bring about the repentance. He does this work of transformation through the prophetic word, as the central vision makes plain.

Ezekiel within the Canon

God’s sovereignty and glory are central to the book of Ezekiel, but his anguished passion is stressed as well. This combination, together with a focus on the fate of Jerusalem, is also found in the book of Isaiah, but developed in Ezekiel with a greater focus on the Babylonian destruction of the city. There are close parallels to the book of Jeremiah. It is possible that Ezekiel heard Jeremiah and that later material from Jeremiah came to Babylon via people who were in contact with Jeremiah (Vieweger). Ezekiel is characteristically more expansive (cf., e.g., Jer. 23:1–8 with Ezek. 34). Both stress that the future lies with the exiles, even though they deserve no better than the inhabitants of Jerusalem. In the language of Ezekiel, Israel’s future lies in God’s concern for his name, not in any virtue on the part of the exiles. While the book of Jeremiah has many links with Deuteronomy, Ezekiel borrows priestly language and categories. Common to both traditions is the adultery motif for depicting disloyalty to God. Characteristic for priestly thinking is an emphasis on the polluting effect of sin. By polluting land and sanctuary, sin jeopardizes God's presence among his people and the people's presence in the land. The effect is such that the prophet at one point wonders whether there will be a future for Israel (9:8). The punishment is not so much deportation from the land but death: in the city, in flight, and in exile. It is appropriate that a priestly prophet should draw this stark distinction between life and death, since Israel's cultic system is based on this fundamental contrast. Rebellion against God leads to death, but "I have no pleasure in the death of anyone, declares the Lord Yahweh; so turn, and live" (18:32 AT). Thus, the book of Ezekiel can be read as an illustration of Rom. 6:23: "For the wages of sin is death, but the free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord" (NRSV).

A vital theme of biblical theology, covenant, is also important in the book of Ezekiel. Ezekiel fulfills a role similar to Moses, renewing the covenant at a time of breakdown of the relationship. In the biblical narrative, Ezekiel is the only person other than Moses to communicate divine laws to Israel (chs. 43–48). The covenant motif stresses the need for loyalty and the catastrophic effect of disloyalty. Zedekiah's disloyalty to Nebuchadnezzar reflects his disloyalty to God (17), and Jerusalem's disloyalty to God is portrayed as a wife's disloyalty to her caring husband (16). The covenant metaphor rests on the concept of an ordered relationship. The heart of the problem is the people's rejection of God's governance. This also explains why the leaders of Judah are often singled out for condemnation: they have usurped God's sovereignty. But God's sovereignty is not founded in the covenant relationship itself, which is why any creature's appropriation of glory rightly belonging to the Creator leads to destruction. Ezekiel demonstrates that judgment begins with the household of God (cf. 1 Pet. 4:17), but also that it does not end there. The Oracles against the Nations in chapters 25–32 focus more narrowly on one set of historical events than those found in Jeremiah and Isaiah. Nevertheless, they presume that divine standards are the same for everyone, and they offer a particularly vivid condemnation (p 221) of human pretensions to power and self-sufficiency (cf. Rom. 1:18–23).

The definition of God's people as those who submit to God's rule stresses that descent from Abraham does not guarantee inheritance of Abraham's promises (33:23–29); this definition resonates with a similar emphasis in the NT (cf. John 8:39; Rom. 9:8–16; Gal. 3:29; 4:24–31). In both Ezekiel and the NT, submission to God's rule finds expression in how one relates to a specific act of God's judgment. Jerusalem's destruction is for the exiles, who deserve the same judgment, chance, and challenge to repent. Similarly, the cross is an exercise of God's sovereignty and judgment over human pride and rebellion, an exercise that allows others to go free. Yet only Christ's death deals with sin. Ezekiel's concern for accepting Jerusalem's destruction as God's just judgment is consequently transformed in the gospel concern to accept Christ's death as the judgment that makes peace (e.g., Col. 1:20).

Perspectives from the History of Interpretation

The impact of the book of Ezekiel on the postexilic community is visible in the book of Zechariah, though less obvious in other postexilic writings. Ezekiel was an inspiration also for the Qumran community (Cothenet). Philo and Josephus paid little attention to Ezekiel, but rabbinic interest in the book was strong in spite of difficulties in making it agree with the Mosaic Torah. Especially after the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE, Ezekiel's vision of the throne-chariot gained prominence as an attempt to integrate the transcendence and immanence of God without the tangible reality of a temple (merkabah mysticism). Maybe to stress the need for communal guidance in reading Ezekiel, parts of the book were apparently declared off limits for Jews under thirty years old, as Jerome noted.

The use of motifs from Ezekiel in the Johannine literature, and especially in the book of Revelation, is well known (see, e.g., Moyise). More recently, Newman traced Ezekiel's influence on the apostle Paul's understanding of divine glory. The early church remained fascinated by the book, and especially the concluding vision as a picture of heaven or the church. The four faces of the creatures bearing the throne-chariot in the opening vision became symbols of the four Gospel-writers, and the king of Tyre was identified with the antichrist (both already in Hippolytus). Such luminaries as Origen, Ephraim the Syrian, Jerome, Theodoret of Cyrus, and Gregory the Great expounded Ezekiel. It was also used outside exegetical and homiletical literature. Along with the chapters (14; 18) stressing repentance, other passages (3:17–21; 33:1–9; 34:1–24) were used frequently, especially in expressing a theology of church offices and in dealing with questions such as whether bishops who fled from persecution should be reinstated. Ezekiel 37 is often cited as a prediction of the eschatological resurrection of the body, most forcefully by Tertullian.

Central to the church's reading of the book is recognition of Christ in Ezekiel. The early church was reluctant to offer a detailed christological interpretation of the figure in the opening vision. Thus, Jerome insisted that the figure primarily represents God the Father, then the Son as image of the invisible God. Nevertheless, after the Council of Chalcedon, the combination of metal and fire in the appearance of the figure in Ezekiel's opening vision (1:26–27) served for defending the doctrine of Christ's two natures (Theodoret, Gregory). It was also popular to find the protective sign of the cross in 9:4, and the shut gate in 44:1–3 was often applied to the Virgin Mary. These are cases where the doctrine rather than the biblical text must bear all the weight of the interpretation. Ezekiel's prophecies of a new David stress divine sovereignty and the unity of God's people, saying little about the new David himself. Most promising is the lead given by commentators such as Origen and Isidore of Seville, who saw Ezekiel himself as a sign of Christ. It is noteworthy that in the Targum of Ezekiel "son of man" is rendered as "son of Adam," suggesting that in this early interpretation Ezekiel was seen as the first member of the new creation.

The book of Ezekiel retained its popularity in the Middle Ages among Jewish interpreters (e.g., Rashi, Eliezer of Beaugency, David Kimhi), but the church's interest appears to have waned over time. Indeed, Anselm of Laon used the widespread neglect of the book to justify his lecture series on Ezekiel in 1121–23. Where there was interest, it was often focused on the visions, whether they be understood allegorically (e.g., Rupert of Deuz) or literally (Andrew of St. Victor), an interest also reflected in illustrations and paintings related to Ezekiel, which often combined the throne vision of Ezek. 1 with Isa. 6. With the Reformation, the allegorical reading was more and more sidelined, although it remained popular in the Puritan tradition (Greenhill). John Calvin devoted his last written efforts to Ezekiel, producing a historical and theological exposition of the first twenty chapters.

(p 222)Early modern scholarly interpretation focused on philological matters and poetic style, while the book gained prominence in African-American spirituals ("Dem Bones") and preaching as a message of hope to exiles. The historical-critical method left the book's literary unity and integrity of authorship intact for a long time. Indeed, the book was in favor by some critics for its supposed teaching of individualism, a view based on a misunderstanding of Ezekiel's use of individualistic legal language to affirm generational responsibility (see, e.g., Joyce). But a publication by Hölscher in 1924 opened up an era of wide disagreement about all aspects of the origin and content of the book, with dates suggested from the time of Manasseh to the Maccabean period (for a brief summary, see Childs 357–60).

While the variety of positions held is still striking, three main approaches can be distinguished today. The majority of interpreters identify different levels of growth in the book, with later layers interpreting earlier layers. The material from the Ezekiel “school” is often thought to have been added in exilic and early postexilic times (Zimmerli), but many commentators argue that the book was completed in exile (e.g., Hals; Allen). This is also the view of a number of “holistic” interpreters, who focus on reading the book as a literary whole addressed to the Babylonian exiles (e.g., Greenberg; Block). Theological interpretation is not greatly affected by the disagreements between these first two approaches. A third group of scholars claims to identify up to more than a dozen redactional layers in the book (e.g., Pohlmann). In their view the book of Ezekiel originated over a period of more than 250 years and provides little or no reliable evidence for the existence of a prophet Ezekiel.

Theological interpretation undertaken in this context would look different, but the methodology used appears misguided and unreliable, and its advocates have not yet offered a theological interpretation of the book based on their analyses. Feminist interpretation has raised important issues (Patton) that have entered mainstream study of the book, unlike the attempt at a psychoanalytical interpretation offered by Halperin. More popular interest has focused on the eschatological visions (Lindsey), and the book is sometimes used as evidence for premillennialism (Rooker). Throughout this history, arguably the most successful interpretations have been those that paid attention to the rhetorical force of the book. Thereby readers discover what behavior God punishes and what kind of community he re-creates. They also reflect on the prophetic office and word as a means of establishing the new community.

Ezekiel and the Church Today

Each generation needs to explore afresh how Ezekiel reveals behavior that leads to death. The condemnation of idolatry and false prophecy was transformed in the early church to warnings against heresy and pagan lifestyle. This can still serve us today, if we remember that these judgment passages apply to God’s people first of all. The stark alternatives of allegiance to God or rebellion against him, and thus consequences of life or death, must be presented to everyone. Nevertheless, the book’s particular thrust is to remind us that we have all been on the way to death and that receiving life in Christ is no cause for self-congratulation. Similarly, the fall of the king of Tyre from a divinely given position of privilege may be seen as illustrative of the fall of the antichrist or Satan, but this should not distract from its application to individual and collective human pride and arrogance. Being a member of God’s people presumes proper acknowledgment of the cause of death and the source of life. The original function of the book for the Babylonian exiles, and its use in spirituals, remind us that socioeconomic aspects do not define the people of God. At the same time, finding one's identity in God's purposes ought to influence all aspects of life, including the socioeconomic. Communal life and, by implication, personal life need to be ordered in such a way that nothing compromises God's sovereignty. Given the harsh critique of human pretensions to power and the careful limitation of human power in the concluding vision, any use of Ezekiel to bolster one's own power (e.g., husbands over wives, priests over laity) is an abuse of the book.

Because it is in Christ that the people of God experience death and resurrection, Ezek. 37 is ultimately fulfilled in Christ's death and resurrection. As a second Adam and Moses, the prophet is a type of Christ, who is the ultimate second Adam and Moses, the beginning of a new creation. The central role of the prophetic word in bringing about this new creation prefigures the transformation of God's people through the incarnated Word. Now as then, the word gives life by bringing forth faith in the purposes of God. Like those who saw the return from exile, the church today experiences fulfillment of God's purposes, while awaiting the time when everything will be ordered in a manner that acknowledges God's (p 223) lordship. The way spiritual and political restoration are intertwined in Ezek. 34–48 and the flexible use of motifs from Ezekiel in the book of Revelation (e.g., Magog changed from person to nation) counsel against identifying a sequence of eschatological events in the latter part of the book, let alone any sequence that separates spiritual from political restoration.

In our contemporary cultures, which often link identity with consumption and marginalize the church, Ezekiel offers the promise of new life in the wilderness for a community that finds its identity in God and his purposes.

Bibliography

Block, D. The Book of Ezekiel. Vol. 1, Chapters 1–24. Vol. 2, Chapters 25–48. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1997–98; Calvin, J. Ezekiel 1 (Chapters 1–12), trans. D. Foxgrover and D. Martin. Calvin's Old Testament Commentaries 18. Paternoster, 1996; Childs, B. Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture. Fortress, 1979; Cothenet, E. "Influence d'Ézéchiél sur la spiritualité de Qumran." RevQ 13 (1988): 431–39; Dassmann, E. "Hesekiel." RAC 14 (1988): cols. 1132–91; Duguid, I. Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel. VTSup 56. Brill, 1994; Galambush, J. Jerusalem in the Book of Ezekiel. SBLDS 130. Scholars Press, 1992; Greenhill, W. An Exposition of Ezekiel. Banner of Truth, 1995 (reprint of 1863 ed.; originally published 1645); Halperin, D. J. Seeking Ezekiel. Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993; Hölscher, G. Hesekiel. BZAW 39. De Gruyter, 1924;

Jerome. Commentariorum in Hiezechielem libri XIV, ed. F. Glorie. S. Hieronymi presbyteri Opera 1/4. CCSL 75. Brepols, 1984; Joyce, P. Divine Initiative and Human Response in Ezekiel. JSOTSup 51. JSOT, 1989; Levey, S. H. The Targum of Ezekiel. The Aramaic Bible 13. T&T Clark, 1987; Lindsey, H. The Late Great Planet Earth. Zondervan, 1970; Matties, G. Ezekiel 18 and the Rhetoric of Moral Discourse. SBLDS 126. Scholars Press, 1990; Mein, A. Ezekiel and the Ethics of Exile. Oxford University Press, 2001; Milgrom, J. "Leviticus 26 and Ezekiel." Pages 57–63 in The Quest for Context and Meaning, ed. C. A. Evans. Biblical Interpretation 28. Brill, 1997; Moyise, S. The Old Testament in the Book of Revelation. JSNTSup 115. Sheffield Academic Press, 1995; Newman, C. Paul's Glory Christology. NovTSup 69. Brill, 1992; Patton, C. L. "'Should Our Sister Be Treated Like a Whore?' A Response to Feminist Critiques of Ezekiel 23." Pages 221–38 in The Book of Ezekiel, ed. M. S. Odell and J. T. Strong. SBL Symposium Series 9. SBL, 2000; Renz, T. "Proclaiming the Future: History and Theology in Prophecies against Tyre." TynBul 51 (2000): 17–58; idem. The Rhetorical Function of the Book of Ezekiel. VTSup 76. Brill, 1999; Rooker, M. F. "Evidence from Ezekiel." Pages 119–34 in A Case for Premillennialism, ed. D. Campbell and J. Townsend. Moody, 1992; Stevenson, K. R. The Vision of Transformation. SBLDS 154. Scholars Press, 1996; Vieweger, D. Die literarischen Beziehungen zwischen den Büchern Jeremia und Ezechiel. BEATAJ 26. Lang, 1993.

Thomas Renz

Ezra, Book of

At first sight the book of Ezra is an uneven work that does not yield easily to theological interpretation. More than half of it concerns the first wave of returning exiles, from the decree of Cyrus in 538 to the completion of the temple in 516 BCE. Ezra does not appear until chapter 7, after a gap of almost sixty years. Events of the intervening decades are sketched out of chronological order in 4:6–23. Ezra's return to Judah with another group of repatriates is the substance of chapters 7–10, which cover the events of a single year (458/457). A particular barrier for Christian interpreters is the book's uncompromising Jewishness, expressed in its concern for genealogical purity and restored temple worship.

History of Interpretation

The book of Ezra was originally read as the first part of a longer work that included the book of Nehemiah (as is evident from the earliest listings of canonical books). The division into two books occurred in the early church, for reasons that are not clear, and is first attested in the third century. It is not found in Hebrew Bibles until 1448. The current arrangement should not be allowed to obscure the essential unity of Ezra-Nehemiah, and this article should be read in conjunction with that on the book of Nehemiah.

Precritical Christian interpreters either viewed the books of Ezra and Nehemiah typologically (e.g., the crises over mixed marriages point to the need to keep in mind at all times the distinction between the children of God and the children of this world) or held up the personal piety of the two men as examples to be emulated. Some commentators, taking a lead from Jerome's comment that Ezra means "the Helper" while Nehemiah means "the Consoler sent by the Lord," treated the two books as works of help and consolation in times of trouble. One bishop of the Church of England saw the combined work of Ezra and Nehemiah prefiguring and legitimizing the alliance of church and state, while another clergyman preferred to see the two as examples of the passive and active virtues of religion.

In sharp contrast to rabbinic tradition, which saw Ezra as the father of Judaism, Christian critical scholarship of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries generally had a negative view of the man and of the book that bears his name. Postexilic Judaism was widely regarded as inferior to the earlier prophetic faith, and this naturally affected assessment of Ezra--Nehemiah. The view of Torrey, that Ezra was a fictional creation (p 224) of the Chronicler, was an extreme expression of this tendency. Others merely played down Ezra's role or judged him a failure. Recent scholarship has moved toward a more positive assessment, though there are occasional attempts to revive the view that Ezra never existed.

According to the Babylonian Talmud (B. Bat. 15a), Ezra was the author of Ezra-Nehemiah and 1–2 Chronicles, and a few modern scholars have defended this view. The majority, however, have held that the anonymous author of Chronicles was responsible for putting Ezra-Nehemiah into more or less its final form (e.g., Clines; Blenkinsopp). This view has affected theological interpretation insofar as a uniform theological stance has been perceived throughout 1–2 Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah.

The two works certainly share many points of common interest (summarized by Blenkinsopp 53). However, since the 1970s a number of scholars have put more weight on the distinctive ideas and emphases of Ezra-Nehemiah and have strongly challenged the common authorship theory (notably Williamson, Israel, 5–70). The independent authorship of Ezra-Nehemiah has gained ground in recent years, but the issues are complex and by no means resolved.

The Message of Ezra

Because there is particularly clear evidence for diverse sources within Ezra-Nehemiah, interpretation of the work has tended to become bogged down in historical-critical issues (Childs 626–30).

Notable exceptions are Eskenazi's attempt to read Ezra-Nehemiah as a literary whole, and Williamson's analysis ("Nehemiah") of the work's "overall theological shape" (see further under Nehemiah). Studies such as these, which focus on the message of the final literary product, facilitate theological interpretation. They show that it is important to read the book of Ezra not only as a literary whole but also as the first part of a larger work. The key theological issue that emerges is the continuity of God's purposes for Israel. Given that the return from exile fell far short of a return to preexilic status, was there any sense in which the earlier "Israel" could still be said to exist? Did its God-given identity and purpose remain intact?

The book of Ezra answers "yes" to these questions in a variety of ways. The opening verse establishes the continuity of God's purpose from before the exile. It is repeatedly emphasized that the temple was rebuilt on its original site (2:68; 3:3; 5:15; 6:7); it was thus to be seen as a reconstruction of, not a replacement for, Solomon's temple (cf. 6:3–4; 1 Kings 6:2, 36). The very same vessels that Nebuchadnezzar had looted from the temple were restored to it (1:7–11). Personnel were appointed according to "the Book of Moses" (6:18). Ezra himself was descended from the chief priests of the preexilic age (cf. 7:1; 1 Chron. 6:14). The genealogies of chapters 2 and 8 also serve to affirm continuity. The returned exiles represented all twelve tribes (6:17; 8:35) and could indeed be called "the people of Israel" (6:16, 21).

The continuation of God's purposes is also affirmed by means of typology (Williamson, Ezra, 84–86). The book of Ezra shares with Isa. 40–55 the view that the return from exile was a second exodus. Thus, 1:11b echoes the language of Exod. 3:17; 33:1; and so on, and may also recall a much earlier bringing-out from Babylonia (cf. Gen. 15:7). This exodus typology is not confined to the first wave of returnees. Ezra's own "journey up from Babylon" began on the first day of the first month (cf. 7:9 NRSV). But the party did not actually leave the River Ahava until the twelfth day of that month (8:31), a date that Ezra may have chosen because of its resonance with Exod. 12:2–6.

The use of typology indicates that the God who had created his people from unpromising beginnings and rescued them from slavery could be trusted to act in similar ways again.

Canonical Context

Because of its focus on continuity with the past, Ezra-Nehemiah may seem to stand at the end of a canonical trajectory, looking back rather than forward, and content with the Jewish community's status within the Persian Empire. References to the prophecies of Jeremiah

(1:1), Haggai, and Zechariah (5:1; 6:14) might also seem to suggest that a point of fulfillment has been reached.

But this is to miss a powerful strand of discontent and a sense of only partial fulfillment. The attitude toward Persian kings is ambivalent. On the one hand they are God's agents for the reconstruction of the community; on the other, what the people experience under their rule is nothing less than bondage (9:8–9). In Ezra 6:22 the Persian king is called “the king of Assyria,” and this is unlikely to be an error; it is probably an “indication that there is in the end little to choose between Empires” (McConville 38).

The restored Israel repeats the sins of earlier Israel (9:10–14), and the list of those who pledged to divorce their foreign wives in Ezra 10 provides no reassurance that the cycle of iniquity (p 225) and shame is thereby ended. Indeed, the conclusion to Nehemiah provides yet more instances of backsliding after a time of renewed commitment to the covenant laws. These indications of a hope that is only partially fulfilled are reminders that the postexilic community was only one stage in the unfolding of God's purposes.

It is important to remember this when considering that community's exclusiveness. The racial purity established by genealogies, and safeguarded by the dissolution of mixed marriages, sounds like narrow nationalism and exclusive soteriology, but it must be set in both a historical and canonical context. Historically, the concern for continuity and legitimacy can be seen as a reaction to particular circumstances: the identity of the community was precarious and in need of safeguards. Canonically, the tenor of Ezra-Nehemiah is balanced by a more open attitude to Gentiles in other OT narratives (e.g., Gen. 41:50–52; Josh. 6:25; Ruth 4:13–17), and in numerous prophetic texts (e.g., Isa. 49:6; 56:3–8; Zech. 8:20–23). Thus, OT Israel lived within the tension of its election and its priestly role to the nations (encapsulated in Gen. 12:2–3; Exod. 19:5–6). Sometimes one aspect of the polarity is to the fore, sometimes the other.

Theology

Viewed historically, the restoration of Jerusalem and Judah was piecemeal, dogged by setbacks and reversals, and proceeding without any coherent plan. However, the theological perspective of Ezra-Nehemiah invites us to see the guiding hand of Israel's God in seemingly disconnected events. This explains the writer's disregard for chronological order and the fact that gaps of several years, in one case decades, are passed over in silence (see further on Nehemiah).

Related to this perspective is the writer's wish to trace the will of God in the affairs of state. A secular historian might explain the repatriation of Judean exiles and the rebuilding of the temple in terms of the Persian Empire's policy toward the religious life of its subject peoples. Ezra-Nehemiah acknowledges the important role of Persian kings (Ezra 1:1–4; 6:1–12), but wants us to know that it was Yahweh who stirred up the spirit of Cyrus and put a desire to beautify the temple into the heart of Artaxerxes (1:1; 7:27).

Ezra 6:14 is particularly telling. The writer informs us that the temple was completed by “command of the God of Israel and the decrees of Cyrus, Darius and Artaxerxes, kings of Persia.” Artaxerxes actually reigned after the period mentioned in vv. 14–15, but he is included because all three Persian kings fulfilled the command of the God of Israel. The eye of faith does not sharply divide the acts of God from the actions of human rulers.

Bibliography

Blenkinsopp, J. Ezra-Nehemiah. OTL. SCM, 1989; Childs, B. Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture. SCM, 1979; Clines, D. J. A. Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther. NCB. Eerdmans, 1984; Douglas, M. “Responding to Ezra: The Priests and the Foreign Wives.” BibInt 10 (2002): 1–23; Eskenazi, T. In an Age of Prose. SBLMS 36. Scholars Press, 1988; McConville, J. G. “Diversity and Obscurity in Old Testament Books: A Hermeneutical Exercise Based on Some Later Old Testament Books.” Anvil 3 (1986): 33–47; Torrey, C. The Composition and Historical Value of Ezra-Nehemiah. BZAW 2. Ricker, 1896; Williamson, H. G. M. Ezra and Nehemiah. OTG. JSOT, 1987; idem. Israel in the Books of Chronicles. Cambridge University Press, 1977; idem. “Nehemiah: Theology of.” NIDOTTE 4:977–82.

John J. Bimson

(p 226) F

Faith

“Faith” is a significant biblical theme both materially and formally—not only requiring theological exegesis, but also shaping the very form that understanding takes. It exemplifies the need for both a large-scale theological vision, to orient one’s gaze upon the various biblical witnesses, and for that vision to be refined through detailed exegesis.

The Biblical Narrative of Faith

The OT narrative, according to Heb. 11, portrays many heroes of faith. Consensus has suggested that the relevant Hebrew noun, emunah, is primarily used to designate truth, honesty, or loyalty, especially characteristic of God. The hiphil form of the verb mn is used for the appropriate response to God’s fidelity, in faithful trust and obedience. For example, Abraham believed God’s (seemingly) unbelievable promise so that he obediently set out for a promised inheritance and later was willing to obey the unthinkable and sacrifice Isaac. By contrast, prophetic texts, particularly Isaiah, relate Israel’s exile in part to its lack of faith, for the people idolatrously trusted in tactics based only upon what they could see. These prophets nevertheless call upon Israel, once again, to trust in divine deliverance.

Thus, they establish a theological trajectory for the primacy of faith in the new covenant, with its foreshadowing in the old. In the NT faith has been taken to have a more cognitive dimension, relating to persuasion or conviction, while the OT aspect of trust is emphasized over against the priority of postexilic Judaism: faith as fidelity to the Torah. By no means, however, does that trajectory produce a monologic NT use of the term. Its variety, in fact, prepares for the diversity of later developments in Christian theology.

Theological Understandings of Faith

In his important treatment, Avery Dulles develops seven models for how theologians understand faith. On the propositional model, faith involves assent to revealed truths on God’s authority. A transcendental model relates faith to a new cognitive horizon or perspective given by God, distinguishing it from “beliefs” formulated in propositions.

Even less cognitive are the fiducial model, which emphasizes trust; and the affective-experiential model, which emphasizes faith’s relation to experience. So also the obediential model, which emphasizes acknowledgment of God’s sovereign initiative; the praxis model, which emphasizes hopeful action in solidarity with the suffering; and the personalist model, which emphasizes personal relationship conferring a new mode of life—these largely exclude cognition in defining faith.

Faith and Knowledge: Epistemological Questions and the Doctrine of Revelation

Undoubtedly, some definitions exclude or deemphasize knowledge because of noncognitive biblical emphases such as trust. But modern theologians have also tended to consider the very possibility of divine revelation incredible. Accordingly, they have prioritized either the credible (e.g., human experience) or the divine (e.g., God's particular sovereign initiative) in their construals of revelation's corollary, faith.

Biblical teaching that sees faith as response to the proclamation of God's truth, however, seems inescapable at some level. Faith might well involve more than doctrinal assent, but can it involve less? Alternatively, focusing on propositions has often meant neglecting the holistic, personal, and dynamic dimensions of faith. Moreover, can we maintain that faith involves a form of knowledge ("a firm and certain knowledge of God's benevolence toward us," as Calvin put it) without becoming answerable, in a deadly way, to epistemological standards oriented to "sight"? Must we respond to a perceived (but false) dichotomy between faith and reason by emptying faith of revealed truth?

(p 227) *Faith and Works: Soteriological Questions and the Doctrine of Justification

Another theological dilemma in defining faith concerns its place in salvation, especially the doctrine of "justification by faith" and whether or not to add the word "alone." If we accept this doctrine at all, we must then define its terms. On the one hand, if we add to "faith alone" that "the faith which saves is never alone," do we lose Paul's distinction between faith and works? On the other hand, if we understand "faith alone" largely in cognitive terms, do we not fall prey to the faith-works dichotomy, which James criticizes?

Both Paul and James supported their teachings with OT texts (e.g., Gen. 15:6; Hab. 2:4), so that the theology of faith is an important test case regarding canonical unity. Paul captured the thrust of OT eschatology in a way that some Jewish opponents did not: after Israel's exile, covenant life with God would no longer consist in possession of—or proficiency at obeying—the Torah, but trust in God's deliverance through another's fidelity. Accordingly, Paul emphasized that eschatological salvation required God's particular action in the history of Jesus Christ, also excluding Hellenistic overrealizations of that salvation via the Holy Spirit. With faith thus related to love, in light of a particular hope, Paul's teaching would not grant justification to those with the mere "faith"

James criticized. The two concepts of “faith” are recognizably different, as are their emphases from common OT texts; nonetheless, the soteriological teachings of Paul and James may be complementary rather than contradictory.

A related dilemma concerns pistis Christou and related phraseology in Paul—whether this is an objective genitive designating faith in Christ (an “anthropological” view), or a subjective genitive designating the faith(fulness) of Christ (a “christological” view). The former might be called the traditional approach, at least from the Protestant Reformation onward; the latter has come into favor especially since the early 1980s (with the publication of Hays; favoring the former, see Dunn in Hays’s new edition), but has had periodic supporters throughout the modern age. Tradition therefore does not factor too strongly; nor are exegetical or hermeneutical arguments knockdown, for one side or the other. Since it is unlikely that dramatic new evidence will surface, the theological interpreter probably must wait for arguments that favor more clearly a pattern of interpreting the evidence we have.

This dilemma already makes clear the need to distinguish words from concepts: pistis cannot be read exclusively as “faith” or “fidelity,” and cannot have the same sense with regard to God, Abraham, Christ, and us in all the relevant texts. Yet the need to clarify its sense in Rom. 4 with regard to Abraham (and Christ) is very important, if the christological view is to shore up the flow of Paul’s argument contra justification by faithfulness via the Mosaic law (so Dunn). Alternatively, the anthropological view must avoid turning human believing into a conditional “work,” and show how God’s faithfulness could be manifest by way of such human believing (Rom. 3; so Hays). It is difficult to decide whether in several passages (e.g., Gal. 2:16; Rom. 1:17; 3:22) Paul repeats himself regarding human faith for emphasis (the anthropological view), or kerygmatically moves from divine faithfulness in Christ’s faith(fulness) to human response.

Biblical Faith, Covenant Communion, and Theological Interpretation

Thus, despite recent reconciliations of Paul and James (in the judgment of some biblical scholarship), and of Protestants and Roman Catholics (in the theological judgment of some), much work remains. Hays maintains that the newer readings of Paul push us to relate justification by faith and participation in Christ much more closely. There are dangers in that, if we take such participation in an overly mystical or ontological sense (as McCormack notes). However, even if one doubts the newer Finnish readings of Martin Luther as orienting salvation toward “divinization” or participation in the divine life, it still seems that Luther and Calvin depicted faith in a far richer, less individualistic frame than many of our contemporaries. Whatever the exegetical shortcomings, what remains sure is the Reformers’ legacy for theological interpretation of faith as involving covenantal union with Christ, the mediator of divine action (so, e.g., Pitkin).

Today we need exegetically informed soteriological articulations of the connection between faith and love, as well as theological epistemologies that take seriously faith’s challenge to “sight” (a characteristically “modern” preoccupation) without lapsing into the worst of “fideism” (perhaps a characteristically postmodern tendency). Faith, after all, is oriented very much to hearing instead of sight, since it is a corollary concept of obedient human response to the divine word (e.g., Rom. 10). More particularly, we have only begun to approach biblical exegesis with the (p 228) goal of “faith seeking understanding”—striving for cogent, defensible interpretations, but also knowing when to justify particular readings on Christian theological terms, and what it means to resist pretenses of eschatological certainty or exhaustiveness. Only in the modern age has such faith seemed fully opposite to reason, a matter of “believing what you know ain’t true” (Mark Twain, cited in Springsted 6).

In classic terms, faith involves a tradition that shapes moral action and perception by way of participation in God, the good. Contrary to somewhat artificial dichotomies with reason, Christian faith is “thinking with assent”—not so much “chosen, willed, and judged from a critical spectator’s standpoint; it is, rather, thinking and willing and doing from a participant’s standpoint” (Springsted 223). Faith is a matter of time, for it is a virtue—not simply an internal property to be acquired, and then momentarily isolated when described or assessed—but an enduring pattern of action in a moral space marked by divine communication. Christian understanding of faith develops not by proof-texting biblical definitions but from reading such texts within an anthropology and a narrative framework shaped by covenant.

Faith’s relation to prayer is all too easily obscured or neglected, due to preoccupations with epistemology and soteriology. This emphasis on prayer is true of our Lord in the Gospels (e.g., Mark 11:22–26), and is consistent with faith as “calling on the name of the Lord” (e.g., Rom. 10:13). Recovering prayer as faith’s characteristic posture might provide for a covenantal, more holistic understanding than has informed our epistemological and soteriological dilemmas to date. Boldness in prayer is based upon the Spirit’s assurance of God's benevolence toward us in Christ, yet we are also warned (e.g., in the OT prophets) not to approach God if we refuse to share that benevolence with others. In this way charity is the form, though not the essence, of faith, as mind and will attend together to God—and others (Springsted 168, 174). Over and over we cry out for forgiveness and grace, being faithful—obeying the gospel and mining its riches—by trusting the Lord. We are not simply called to be good Samaritans, but first are always cared for as wounded travelers (Springsted 251). For this reason theological interpreters ought not only to pray while vigorously seeking understanding, but also to pursue (via mind and will) understanding itself as a prayerful activity of faith.

See also Justification by Faith; Virtue

Bibliography

Bultmann, R. “Πιστεύω...” TDNT 6:174–228. Eerdmans, 1968; Dulles, A., SJ. The Assurance of Things Hoped For. Oxford University Press, 1994; Hart, T. Faith Thinking. InterVarsity, 1995; Hays, R. The Faith of Jesus Christ. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 2002; John Paul II. On the Relationship between Faith and Reason (Fides et Ratio). U.S. Catholic Conference, 1998; McCormack, B. “What’s at Stake in Current Debates over Justification? The Crisis of Protestantism in the West.” Pages 81–117 in Justification, ed. M. Husbans and D. Treier. InterVarsity, 2004; Michel, O. “Faith.” NIDNTT 1:593–606. Zondervan, 1986; Pitkin, B. What Pure Eyes Could See. Oxford University Press, 1999; Springsted, E. The Act of Faith. Eerdmans, 2002.

Daniel J. Treier

Female      See Male and Female

Feminist Biblical Interpretation

Just as there is no single approach or ideology that encompasses “feminism” as a whole, neither is there a single approach that can legitimately be called “feminist biblical interpretation.” One’s hermeneutical stance may be womanist, mujerista, African, North American, Asian, Latin American, or European. It may be rejectionist, reformist, or loyalist in terms of method. Nevertheless, feminist biblical interpretation generally places women at the center of theological inquiry and, to varying degrees, makes their experience the criterion and norm for theological reflection, critique, reconstruction, and praxis. Despite recent challenges from postmodern, post-structuralist, and certain process feminist theorists and theologians, this appeal to women’s experience—particularly the experience of oppression and marginalization by men—is predominant among feminist hermeneutics.

Despite their different social, political, and religious locations and worldviews, most feminist biblical scholars operate from a common set of assumptions. These include the following presuppositions: (1) Language not only expresses the world but helps to shape it. (2) Women's diminution has been aided and abetted by male-centered language, symbols, and structures. (3) The texts reflect the patriarchal, androcentric, and sometimes oppressive forms of hierarchy, which have prevailed in Hebrew and Christian cultures. And (4) all interpretation is "interested" and must necessarily be critiqued according to whose interests are being served by existing systems. This critique generally leads to either a reexamination of text and tradition to offer alternative interpretations, (p 229) or a revision of the texts, or an outright rejection of the biblical canon.

Broadly defined, these options represent the three primary Western feminist approaches to Scripture. The first is the rejectionist position of feminists like Mary Daly and Daphne Hampson, who judge the Hebrew and Christian texts, and the entire Judeo-Christian tradition, to be hopelessly sexist and patriarchal. These anti- or post-Christian feminists believe this tradition to be a primary source of human oppression. The loyalist (biblicist) or evangelical position takes an opposite approach. These interpreters embrace the biblical canon as a whole without necessarily considering it to be sexist and accept as authoritative its witness to Jesus Christ as the triune God's human self-revelation. However, two different interpretative approaches exist regarding women's ontological and relational identity.

One approach accepts the historically promulgated argument for a hierarchy of order in human creation and thus in gendered relationships, particularly in terms of marriage, family, and in the church. Women's fulfillment is considered found in her submission and dependence on male leadership in each of these spheres—leadership exercised in love that does not diminish women's human uniqueness or freedom. The other approach advocates egalitarianism in all spheres of life such that women and men's diversity and unity are honored and upheld in relationships of equal, mutual submission. This view particularly argues that the full biblical material does not allow for subordination within the Christian community. In the unity and diversity of the body of Christ through the Holy Spirit, divine gifting precedes gender and not the reverse. Women who are loyalist biblical scholars generally read the text as women to give an interpretative perspective not often found in the existing literature.

Finally, there is the experience-based reformist approach, which represents the largest and most pervasive influence in feminist biblical interpretation. As their initial interpretative step, reformists such as Elizabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, Letty Russell, Phyllis Trible, and Sandra Schneiders all employ a hermeneutic of suspicion, or what Anthony Thiselton refers to as a “sociocritical hermeneutic.” This approach to texts, traditions, and institutions seeks to penetrate beneath their surface function and expose them as instruments of power, domination, or social manipulation. Predominantly influenced by the women’s liberation movement and various liberation theologies, reformists use one chief criterion to judge biblical texts for truth, adequacy, and coherence—or the lack thereof. That criterion is the alignment of such texts with the feminist critical principle of women’s full and equal humanity (or in some cases, a view of female ascendancy). At work is the powerful and pervasive Kantian conviction that tradition must be freed from the constraints of what it “actually says” by applying the “inner light of truth” inherent in the human subject, who has final authority over one’s own moral sensibility. Hence, modern feminism has a tendency to equate authority with domination and to prioritize the hermeneutic of suspicion.

Functioning as active agents of interpretation and critical construction of religious meaning, reformists employ a variety of methods, including historical-critical, literary, anthropological, sociological, sociopolitical, narrative, and various combinations thereof. Often, however, there is a common methodological pattern to each that includes deconstruction, critical assessment, and reconstruction. The text is first deconstructed to uncover the hidden dynamic of domination. Next, there is the search and retrieval of what are believed to be dormant theological themes, neglected history, and lost female interpretation and experience concerning the texts. If the first question is, “Who currently benefits?” then the second question is, “Can the text be altered in form and/or interpretation to specifically benefit those who have been marginalized?” If the answer is positive, then the final step of reconstruction begins. If a negative judgment is made, the text is deemed not to be “true.”

One of two critical stances can generally be found in Western reformist hermeneutics. One is to critique interpretations by appealing to the authority of certain texts to judge the interpretation of others. In other words, it advocates an authoritative canon within the canon, which unfortunately often fails to recognize its own interested interpretation and dominating potential. The other views the text itself as patriarchal and thus in need of reform based on an a priori, externally derived set of criteria, or what is essentially a normative canon outside the biblical canon. A level of ambiguity is thus inherent in these interpretative approaches as they try to criticize the tradition while correlating women's experience with it. Two seemingly contradictory assumptions arise. On the one hand, the biblical text has the quality of a neutral object set between competing value systems and moral judgments. These values, morals, and worldviews operate (p 230) to judge certain interpretations as oppressive and thus incorrect. On the other hand, given its original context, the text is judged to be inherently patriarchal.

In either case, however, feminists admit that the same texts considered to promulgate women's exclusion and subordination have also been the source of hope, formation, and sustenance for centuries of Christian women. Both rejectionists and reformists argue, however, that a loyalist reading of the text (a gendered rather than liberationist reading) is not adequately critical and truly feminist. Such interpretations are viewed as enmeshed in the order of reality established through male domination. Women simply collude com/implicitly with their oppressors in perpetuating existing patriarchal systems, rather than radically undermining them. Loyalists, on the other hand, challenge the totalizing narrative of victimization, the universal experience of oppression, and the villainy of the Judeo-Christian tradition assumed out of hand by reformists and rejectionists.

See also Ideological Criticism; Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics; Male and Female

Bibliography

Achtemeier, P., ed. Interpretation 42, no. 1 (1988); Carr, A. "The New Vision of Feminist Theology—Method." In Freeing Theology, ed. C. LaCugna. HarperSanFrancisco, 1993; Collins, A. Y., ed. Feminist Perspectives on Biblical Scholarship. Scholars Press, 1985; Fiorenza, E. But She Said. Beacon, 1992; idem. In Memory of Her. New York, 1983; Johnson, E. "Feminist Hermeneutics." Chicago Studies 27 (1988); Martin, F. "Feminist Hermeneutics." In This Is My Name Forever. InterVarsity, 2001; idem. The Feminist Question. Eerdmans, 1994; May, M. "Feminist Theology." In vol. 2 of The Encyclopedia of Christianity. Eerdmans, 2001; Parsons, S., ed. The Cambridge Companion to Feminist Theology. Cambridge University Press, 2002; Reno, R. R. "Feminist Theology." In This Is My Name Forever. InterVarsity, 2001; Russell, L., and S. Clarkson, eds. Dictionary of Feminist Theologies. Westminster John Knox, 1996; Schneiders, S. "The Bible and Feminism—Biblical Theology." In Freeing Theology, ed. C. LaCugna. HarperSanFrancisco, 1993; idem. "Feminist Ideology Criticism and Biblical Hermeneutics." Biblical Theology Bulletin 19 (1989); Thiselton, A. The Two Horizons. Paternoster, 1980; Tribble, P. God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality. Fortress, 1978.

Cherith Fee Nordling

Figural Reading    See Allegory; Literal Sense; Typology

Figure of Speech See Imagery; Metaphor; Poetry

Fish, Stanley See Community, Interpretative; Pragmatism

Folklore See Hero Story; Oral Tradition and the NT; Oral Tradition and the OT

Formalism

Definition

Formalism is a type of literary criticism that concentrates study on the “literary work as an object in its own right” (Murfin and Ray 132–33). It emphasizes careful reading of the text and minimizes such external considerations as author, historical occasion, original audience, and contemporary audience. At its best, formalism attempts to provide an objective analysis of a piece of writing from a literary perspective, including style, rhetorical contexts, and structure. Formalism assigns ontological status to the text, claiming it to be “an object of knowledge sui generis” (Wellek and Warren 156). Formalist critics deny that meaning is to be found in the author’s intention or the reader’s understanding (Wimsatt and Beardsley’s “intentional fallacy” and “affective fallacy” respectively). Radically text-based, formalism claims that meaning is intrinsic to the text, not to be found by referencing any external considerations such as history or the author’s biography.

History

Philosophically, modern versions of formalism developed out of Immanuel Kant and aesthetically from the Romantic poets of the early nineteenth century (Walhout and Ryken 2). In the United States, formalism received its classic expression in the New Criticism of the mid-twentieth century, in the works of such writers as Cleanth Brooks, John Crowe Ransom, Robert Penn Warren, and William Wimsatt. The term “New Criticism” is to be understood in the context of their wish to move past the historical and biographical study of literature in American university classrooms of the day to a literary criticism that is more text-based. New Criticism quickly became the norm in university literature departments and remained so until the 1960s. On the European continent, formalism was associated with the Russian formalists and the Prague Linguistic Circle (Roman Jakobson and Rene Wellek). In all its expressions, formalism calls attention to the primacy of the text in interpretation.

Formalism began to play an important role in biblical interpretation in the late twentieth century(p 231). An influential early article by James Muilenberg reminded us of the importance of the biblical texts themselves. Formalism took on full force with the rise of interest in literary approaches to the Bible in the 1970s and 1980s. Kenneth A. Mathews notes, “While this [new] criticism had a short life among secular literary critics, superseded by structuralism and deconstruction, it has had a stronger hold on biblical studies” (213). Notable examples of works that use formalistic principles include one by M. Weiss and those published by the Sheffield School (JSOT). J. Cheryl Exum and David J. A. Clines supply a useful brief overview of “new” and “newest” literary criticisms for biblical interpretation (11–25). Tremper Longman provides a brief survey (25–37). In the early twenty-first century, formalism as a literary approach has given way to a range of reader-centered interpretative strategies, among them feminism, reader-response criticism, and deconstruction.

Usefulness

Understood and used in proper balance, formalism offers valuable insights and necessary tools to biblical interpreters. With its emphasis on the primacy of the text, formalism demands careful analysis of the biblical texts as we have them. In so doing, formalism underscores a high view of inspiration and gives due respect to the details of individual books in the Bible. Further, formalism calls attention to the unity of the text as it is in the canon, thereby vitiating the atomistic tendencies of some historical-critical approaches of the twentieth century. The attention to the text in formalistic readings provides a much-needed antidote to the many reader-oriented interpretative strategies that have held sway in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. Such strategies as postcolonialism, psychoanalysis, and others mentioned above locate meaning in the reader rather than the text or author. At their worst, these poststructuralist approaches, as they are sometimes called, leave too much room for affective, sectarian, and even idiosyncratic readings. Formalism provides a necessary corrective by returning the interpretative focus to the text itself. When used in its moderate forms—shorn of the radical formalists’ insistence that meaning has no existential or historical dimensions—and employed alongside other time-proven methods of biblical interpretation, formalism contributes to a balanced hermeneutic.

Limitations

As with any interpretative approach, formalism has its limitations. First, formalism, along with other literary approaches to interpretation, invariably minimizes historical concerns and is sometimes blatantly ahistorical (Exum and Clines 11; pace Walhout and Ryken 19). When interpreting the Bible, we must keep one eye on historical backgrounds. Second, formalism denies any correspondence between a literary text and truth; rather, formalism typically affirms a coherence epistemology that ultimately falls short of doing justice to biblical texts. The Bible refers to a “real reality,” both transcendent and temporal. Textual coherence as the only epistemological requirement comes short of a comprehensive biblical hermeneutic. Third, formalism sometimes privileges aesthetic concerns in literary analysis over ethical or intellectual issues (Walhout and Ryken 19); while there is much beauty in biblical writings, such beauty is not the raison d’être of the Bible. Finally, formalism implicitly denies the relevance of authorial intention to the text (Longman 26). In effect, formalism denies the relevance of author, reader, and Sitz im Leben to interpretation of texts.

Applicability

Even with its limitations, formalism still provides an essential element in a full-orbed interpretative strategy. Its emphasis on the text underscores the unity of the biblical texts as we have them in the canon, thereby providing an antidote to the centrifugal force of many traditional historical-critical methodologies. When interpreters pay due attention to the unity and coherence of the canonical texts, they demonstrate their respect for the inspiration of Scripture. The Bible is not a book of theological proof texts; it is written in literary forms. Formalism focuses attention on genre, structure, and figures of speech, thereby balancing the historical methods of interpretation. Used alone, no single interpretative strategy will do justice to the biblical texts. Taken in its proper context and accompanying other appropriate approaches, formalism illuminates biblical texts in ways no other current methodology can.

See also Deconstruction; Intention/Intentional Fallacy; Poststructuralism; Psychological Interpretation; Reader-Response Criticism

Bibliography

Exum, J. C., and D. J. A. Clines. “The New Literary Criticism.” Pages 11–25 in The New Literary Criticism (p 232) and the Hebrew Bible. JSOTSup 143. Sheffield Academic Press, 1993; Longman, T., III. Literary Approaches to Biblical Interpretation. Zondervan, 1987; Mathews, K. A. “Literary Criticism of the Old Testament.” Pages 205–31 in Foundations for Biblical Interpretation, ed. D. Dockery, K. A. Mathews, and R. Sloan. Broadman & Holman, 1994; Muilenberg, J. “Form Criticism and Beyond.” JBL 88 (1969): 1–18; Murfin, R., and S. M. Ray, eds. The Bedford

Glossary of Critical and Literary Terms. Bedford Books, 1997; Sternberg, M. The Poetics of Biblical Narrative. Indiana University Press, 1987; Walhout, C., and L. Ryken. Contemporary Literary Theory. Eerdmans, 1991; Weiss, M. The Bible from Within. Magnes, 1984; Wellek, R., and A. Warren. Theory of Literature. 3d ed. Harcourt, Brace & World, 1956; Wimsatt, W. K., and M. C. Beardsley. The Verbal Icon. University Press of Kentucky, 1954.

Michael E. Travers

Form Criticism and the NT

When we speak or write, we do not just “say what we say.” Patterns and conventions of various kinds focus and enhance our communication efforts; it has always been so. What is more, the patterns and conventions we employ in a particular context are typically well chosen for their appropriateness to the aspects of life to which any particular activity of communication is connected. Certain uses of language seem fitting if we are called upon to write a reference; others fit better the telling of a joke, the conduct of an argument, the writing of a poem, or the activity of prayer, and so on. The conventions are not rigid, and there is plenty of overlap. But for the most part, there is a clear connection between the patterns and conventions of language use and the life context for a particular exercise in communication. Form criticism is the study of these forms that are or have been used in communication.

The approach to the NT that claimed for itself the name form criticism (Formgeschichte, lit., “history of form”) is to be traced to the work of three German scholars who had all studied with H. Gunkel, whose approach to the study of forms in the OT strongly influenced them. The three are M. Dibelius (1919), K. L. Schmidt (1919), and R. Bultmann (1921). The work of Dibelius, and especially Bultmann, has had an enduring impact on NT studies. Typically, before them the study of forms had focused on forms as found in the studied materials themselves. At times this was understood as implying a prehistory, but the focus of interest was in the forms and their functioning. Dibelius coined the new term in connection with the fact that he was concerned not with the “history of forms” (Formengeschichte), but with unearthing the history to which the use of specific forms pointed. Dibelius and the others built upon an important feature of Gunkel’s approach. Gunkel believed that each of the primitive forms found in the OT had its original setting in some definite place in the life of Israel, and that in this original setting (Sitz im Leben) was a clear and distinct form designed to match the specific setting. Correspondingly, Dibelius assumed that the original oral forms standing behind the Gospel materials would be relatively pure exemplars of forms that corresponded to the specific life-settings in which each originated. Dibelius identified six kinds of material in the Gospels: sermon material, paradigms, tales, legends, passion story, and myth. He believed that, on the basis of form, materials could be dated earlier or later, and that form provided an index to historical reliability. Specifically, the forms in which the artistry of the narration has gained value were secondary (e.g., the miracles stories), and those with mythical elements were relatively late.

The basic contours of Bultmann's inquiry are quite similar to that of Dibelius. But where Dibelius was interested in establishing laws of formation that would account for the structure of the different forms, Bultmann was more interested in the ways in which texts change in transmission. On the basis largely of the changes made to Markan material by the later Gospels, Bultmann formulated "laws of tradition," which he thought could be applied equally well to the oral phase, and would make it possible to remove accretions and restore materials to their original form. Also, compared with Dibelius, Bultmann was more comfortable with the idea that a single story might exhibit the features of more than one form. Bultmann offered a more complete and systematic analysis of the materials of the Gospels and identified a greater range of forms and subforms; partly for this reason he has had a much greater enduring impact. Bultmann was quite skeptical about the likely historicity of Gospel materials. According to his "criterion of dissimilarity," only materials that were distinctive in relation to both the Jewish context and early-church interests can with any confidence be traced to the historical Jesus, though in practice Bultmann was not rigid in the application of this criterion.

Vincent Taylor offered to British scholarship a version of form criticism that was much more optimistic about the historical reliability of the Gospel materials and thus opened up the possibilities of a form-critical method for more conservative scholars.

(p 233)Form criticism is to be appreciated along a number of fronts. Despite all that is speculative about it, it succeeded in stimulating an imaginative engagement with dimensions of the life of the early church in a period largely otherwise inaccessible to us. It also highlighted the way in which the telling of Gospel stories represented an articulation of the faith of those who had come to an experience of salvation in connection with Jesus. And in the Gospel materials it demonstrated the importance of a range of forms, the identification of which can contribute to the clarification of the intended thrust of the materials. At some level form criticism

underlined the importance for the Gospels of their own prehistory. The Gospels represent the witness of the early church to the enduring significance of the historical life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. Unfortunately, the general historical skepticism of the practitioners of form criticism has eviscerated this potential.

The most questionable assumptions of form criticism are these: (1) The earliest form will be the purest form. (2) Oral development closely parallels written development. (3) The use of specific forms points sharply to a specific Sitz im Leben (only a measure of correlation is likely). (4) Form is an index to historical accuracy. And (5) development took place under the control of impersonal laws of tradition (without, e.g., a role for key church leaders or for specific eyewitnesses). A different perspective on form-critical judgments would be created by attention to the constraints that the religious integrity of the transmitters of the Gospel material might impose upon their role. In addition, one must respect the investment of God, not only in the ministry of Jesus, but also in the subsequent transmission of knowledge of the events and their significance.

The name form criticism (but probably not Formgeschichte) has also been applied to other dimensions of, and approaches to, the study of forms in the NT. Classical form criticism was weak on the aesthetics of literary forms. But at least part of the significance of forms has to do with their capacity for particular kinds of rhetorical impact. A. N. Wilder (1964) and R. Tannehill (1975) and others have provided a lead in this direction. Yet others have sought to use the categories of Hellenistic rhetoric to illuminate the NT. These include H. D. Betz (1979) and K. Berger (1984). And finally we should mention the study of the forms to be found in NT letters. Dibelius made a beginning in 1926; B. Rigaux addressed the topic in 1962; R. Funk did so in 1966; and there has since been a small flow of monographs and articles exploring particular forms (thanksgiving, benediction, doxology, petition, disclosure, greeting, etc.).

Bibliography

Berger, K. Formgeschichte des Neuen Testaments. Quelle & Meyer, 1984; Betz, H. D. Galatians. Fortress, 1979; Bultmann, R. History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh. Harper & Row, 1963; Buss, M. Biblical Form Criticism in Its Context. JSOTSup 274. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Dibelius, M. From Tradition to Gospel, trans. B. Woolf. Scribner's, 1933; idem. Geschichte der urchristlichen Literatur. De Gruyter, 1926; Funk, R. Language, Hermeneutics, and the Word of God. Harper & Row, 1966; Güttgemanns, E. Candid Questions concerning Gospel Form Criticism. PTMS 26. Pickwick, 1979; Linnemann, E. Biblical Criticism on Trial. Kregel, 2001; McKnight, E. What Is Form Criticism? Fortress, 1969; Rigaux, B. Saint Paul et ses lettres. De Brouwer, 1962; Schmidt, K. Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu. Trowitzsch, 1919; Tannehill, R. The Sword of His Mouth. Fortress/Scholars Press, 1975; Taylor, V. The Formation of the Gospel Tradition. Macmillan, 1933; Wilder, A. N. The Language of the Gospel. Harvard University Press, 1964.

John Nolland

Form Criticism and the OT

Form criticism is a historical-critical analytical method that identifies and compares conventional structural and content features of biblical texts. Just as modern oral and written forms such as the business letter, fairy tale, and sermon are fairly standardized, so also OT genres such as hymns, laments, proverbs, and prophetic judgment oracles reflect fairly constant formal patterns. Originally, the primary interest of those who used it was sociohistorical; today, their focus is increasingly literary-rhetorical. As a historical-critical tool it is essentially nontheological in its orientation. However, several of its conclusions and entailments have significant implications for the theological interpretation of texts.

History

Hermann Gunkel (1862–1932) is credited with developing the method that became known as form criticism (or form history). However, the Hebrew Scriptures themselves employ some designations for literary types (dirge, psalm, proverb, instruction, song, prayer), and already early Jewish and Christian as well as Reformation-period interpreters gave attention to literary forms in their discussions of biblical style (Buss in Hayes 10–56). Gunkel’s primary goal was to reconstruct a “history of Israelite literature” by isolating the individual shorter forms and longer (p 234) genres contained in the biblical books. This was an undertaking that the then-dominant literary-critical method could not achieve since, in his view, most biblical texts had a long and complex oral prehistory. According to Gunkel, “every ancient genre originally belonged to a quite definite aspect of Israel’s life,” its so-called life-setting or Sitz im Leben (Gunkel 33).

Thus, studying Israelite literary history also entailed studying its social history. Gunkel viewed these forms as relatively stable, but gradually developing from short to long and pure to mixed, also claiming that every genre has only one life-setting (but not vice versa). However, much of the OT was considered to involve the later imitation of earlier oral forms, after the creative Hebrew “spirit lost power” (Gunkel 37). Unfortunately, according to Longman (48; also Knierim 435–40), Gunkel employed a theory of genre that was obsolete even in his own day.

Gunkel applied this new approach to Genesis and the Psalms, while Gressmann and Westermann applied it to the historical and prophetic books, respectively. Gunkel's student Mowinckel argued for the predominantly cultic origin of all Hebrew literature. Later practitioners tended to overextend the method in their effort to categorize every textual segment, frequently engaging in debates over the correct category (e.g., is Ps. 139 an individual complaint, a praise psalm, or a wisdom poem?). Others have domesticated the method, offering little more than structural outlines of texts. (The various FOTL volumes, though well-intentioned, offer examples of both.) Some alleged imitated forms (e.g., Isa. 55:1 as mimicking the water-hawker's sales pitch) may be understood better as merely figurative language. In recent decades, the attempt to reconstruct the history of various forms has largely been abandoned, and greater attention is given to the analysis and comparison of written genres than to underlying oral forms.

As a new century began, the method was being reassessed and combined with new linguistic, sociological, aesthetic-rhetorical, and postmodern perspectives.

Procedure and Recent Developments

The examination of the sociocultural shaping of linguistic expressions has four basic steps: (1) demarcating the unit and analyzing its structure, (2) comparing individual forms and determining the genre to which they belong, (3) reconstructing the life-setting of the genre, and (4) determining the intention of the genre in general and of this example in particular. Genre categories can be conceived of as a series of concentric circles, in which fewer texts share a greater number of features as one moves toward the center: poetry → psalm → lament → of the individual → with confession of guilt. For Gunkel, three elements were constitutive components of a genre: (1) thoughts and moods, (2) linguistic form, including vocabulary and grammar, and (3) connection with life, more recently described by Ben-Amos as “the cognitive, expressive, and behavioral levels” (Buss in Hayes 1), while Giese distinguishes form, content, and function (Sandy and Giese 9). More simply, one could speak of formal (or structural) and nonformal features. Modern literary theory offers a “communicative-semiotic approach” to genre (Longman 50) that is more useful than Gunkel's theory, which was dependent on the folklore studies of the Grimm brothers. One can consider forms as a literary “menu” from which the speaker/author can choose, although genre selection may be more instinctive than consciously purposeful. More helpful is the comparison of genre with a contract or with the rules of a game that govern the relationship between the sender and receiver of the encoded message. In order for the audience/reader to “get” the message, the speaker/author must adhere to the terms of the agreement, to the regulations that order play. In other words, effective communication must conform to conventional expectations. The bending of genres can be intentional, as in parody, but may result in cognitive dissonance rather than heightened attention.

As one proponent of the method summarizes: “Form criticism had a meteoric rise in the early part of the twentieth century and fell from favor toward its end” (Campbell in Sweeney and Ben Zvi 15). Accordingly, some view form criticism as passé or as having no future; others consider a radical revision to be necessary if it is to survive. According to Campbell, a literary genre is best understood not as the key that unlocks a text’s meaning but rather as “a tag that an interpreter can put on a text after its secrets have been explored, ... that helps situate a text within a general class so that it can be more easily understood” (Campbell in Sweeney and Ben Zvi 24). Focusing on the actual rather than on the hypothetical, on the Sitz im Text (textual setting) rather than on the Sitz im Leben, on the fluidity and adaptability rather than on the static or ideal nature of genre types—these strategies will rescue form criticism from the abuses and limitations that plagued it during the preceding century. This (p 235) involves studying the larger literary patterns that connect smaller units into larger compositions, noting the unique as well as the typical features of a text, combining both synchronic and diachronic approaches, and attending to the readership as well as the authorship of texts. Such efforts will integrate this “new” form criticism with other critical methods and lead to new interpretative insights.

Implications for Theological Interpretation

What are the potential implications of the form-critical method for the theological interpretation of biblical texts? As a primarily analytical tool aimed at historical reconstruction, traditional form-critical perspectives can clearly run counter to more synthetic theological-canonical approaches. In its initial failed attempt to facilitate the writing of a history of biblical literature, form criticism served as a handmaiden of historical criticism. Form critics’ unproved assumption of evolutionary developments from short to long utterances and simple to complex (mixed) forms, coupled with exclusive ascription of expressions of individual piety to the postexilic period, undercut biblical claims of divinely inspired prophetic spokespersons and authors. Early form critics also denigrated late biblical literature as a “tragedy” when the “genres are exhausted; imitations begin to abound [and] redactions take the place of original creations” on the road to canon (Gunkel 36).

Furthermore, listing “saga, legend, tale, novella, and fable” as primary OT narrative genres (Coats) suggests that, although such genres can contain historical elements, any claim that they offer reliable accounts of God’s mighty acts is exaggerated. The etiological tale that explains the origin of a current name or practice is normally understood as a fabrication (contrast Childs). Finally, close comparison of Hebrew genres with parallel examples from the ancient Near East (e.g., cosmologies, love songs, prophetic oracles) can lead to downplaying the uniqueness and authority of biblical literature.

A basic premise of form-critical analysis is that form and function are integrally related: the identification of the former can lead to the latter. However, comparison of three lists of even the basic OT genres reveals the difficulty of achieving a consensus in labeling. For example, Sandy and Giese, using standard designations, speak of narrative, history, law, oracles of salvation, announcements of judgment, apocalyptic, lament, praise, proverb, and nonproverbial wisdom. Walton, using ancient literary types, distinguishes cosmology, personal archives and epics, legal texts, covenants and treaties, historical literature, hymns, prayers, incantations, Wisdom literature, prophetic literature, and apocalyptic literature. Ryken, using modern literary categories, discusses heroic narrative, epic, comedy, tragedy, lyric poetry, psalms, love lyrics, encomium, proverbs, satire, and visionary literature.

To give a more specific illustration, one wonders how useful an interpretative tool form criticism is when the genre of Jonah has been variously analyzed as a fable, didactic novel, prophetic legend, parable, midrash, allegory, prophetic confession, or a mixture of several genres. Each of these labels is also in tension with the book’s place within the Hebrew (the Book of the Twelve) and Greek canon as one of a dozen undifferentiated briefer records of prophetic activity. Similarly, no consensus has emerged regarding which OT (or ancient Near Eastern) texts properly belong to the category of “Wisdom literature.” Roland Murphy includes Job, Proverbs, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, and Esther in his volume on Wisdom Literature. However, even though Job addresses questions of theodicy, some have assigned it a nonsapiential genre category such as “lawsuit” or “dramatized lament,” while others abandon the attempt, simply concluding that it is a “masterpiece ... sui generis” that draws on numerous genres (Hartley 37–38). Form-critical analyses often run the risk of imposing modern standards of coherence and consistency on ancient texts, having failed to illuminate the nature of the fundamental unit of canonical literature—the biblical “book” (but see Ben Zvi in Sweeney and Ben Zvi).

This is not to suggest that form criticism is a completely flawed tool, unable to assist in the task of theological interpretation. If Longman is correct in claiming that genre identification is the key to the meaning of a text (Longman 61, citing Hirsch), then form-critical analysis is foundational to the interpretative task. Recent modifications of the method, especially by evangelical scholars, have made it more useful in this regard. For example, Giese describes his approach as “genre criticism,” which “works with the canonical form of the text and not any form before that,” focusing on the function of a given genre within the present biblical text rather than on its original oral form and setting in life. Giese dismisses the latter pursuit as unnecessary and too often biased (Sandy and Giese 8). Gunkel’s focus on formal conventions served to rescue Psalms studies from one-sided efforts to understand individual compositions on the basis of internal indications (p 236) of their origin (especially in the postexilic and Maccabean periods). In 1969, James Muilenburg issued a call to give proper attention not only to the conventional features of a group of related texts but also to the unique rhetorical features of individual compositions. Thus, an awareness of the typical form of the community lament helps one to have a greater appreciation of the skill of the author of Ps. 80. He integrated into this structure a refrain that echoes the priestly blessing from Num. 6:24–26 (vv. 3, 7, 19), and developed the extended metaphor of a vine to portray Israel’s redemptive history (vv. 8–16).

Genre analysis helps to focus and correct reader expectations in a number of respects. A proper understanding of genre features and functions can prevent a person from unduly seeking precise scientific assertions in poetic or anthropomorphic cosmological texts whose primary purpose is to exalt the sovereign creational activities of Israel’s God, especially in contrast to pagan concepts of origins. The comparison of ancient Near Eastern genre parallels with OT texts, far from diminishing the uniqueness of the Bible, serves to highlight it. No ancient annalistic history or prophetic collection is as extensive as the biblical exemplars or clearly displays a deity’s sovereign purposes in history for a people or nation (rather than the temporary favoring of a particular monarch). Comparing biblical with Mesopotamian law reveals the higher valuation of life over property and the protection of the poorer classes in the biblical materials. A comparison between the Song of Songs and later Egyptian love poetry not only highlights the biblical demand for exclusive sexual relationships within the context of marriage, but also raises fundamental questions about the validity of predominantly allegorical or typological interpretations. A comparison of Deuteronomy's structure with contemporary international treaty documents not only offers support for a late-second-millennium date of composition but also suggests that God appropriated contemporary literary conventions in portraying his relationship with his covenant people (Kitchen, "Fall and Rise"). Similarly, Kitchen's comparison of the book of Proverbs with forty ancient proverbial collections shows that a form-critical argument can be made for the unity of Prov. 1–24 (consisting of a title, prologue, main body; Kitchen, "Proverbs"). Thus, chapters 1–9 provide the theological context for interpreting the often more "nontheological" individual proverbs in chapters 10–24.

An awareness of genre distinctions also can enrich understanding of biblical inspiration. All biblical genres (psalms, proverbs, historical narrative) are equally inspired (2 Tim. 3:16–17) and therefore profitable, but they do not communicate divine truth in the same manner as prophetic oracles do, nor are their corresponding "truth claims" equally testable. Paul Ricoeur writes (90–91): "A hermeneutic of revelation must give priority to those modalities of discourse that are most originary within the language of a community of faith," which "are caught up in forms of discourse as diverse as narration, prophecy, legislative texts, wisdom sayings, hymns, supplications, and thanksgiving." To express the literary richness and diversity of biblical genres and imagery merely through dogmatic propositions involves unnecessary reductionism.

Though various genres may be capable of "conceptual paraphrase" (to use Vanhoozer's term), it is necessary to approach the Bible both as a literary critic and as a systematic theologian, and to acknowledge that biblical texts are intended to do more than inform us. According to Vanhoozer, applying "speech-act" theory to biblical literature reminds us that, since Scripture does many things with words, its authority is multifaceted: proverbs require thoughtful consideration, while the Ten Commandments require absolute obedience. More expressive genres are needed to supplement more assertive, directive, or commissive genres in order to communicate the nature of an appropriate response to divine revelation (Vanhoozer 93–104). Thus, form criticism, as modified in contemporary genre-criticism theory, not only can aid us in interpreting texts but also can deepen our appreciation of the diversity of Scripture as a whole.

See also Genre

Bibliography

Ben-Amos, D. "Analytical Categories and Ethnic Genres." Genre 1 (1968): 275–301; Childs, B. "The Etiological Tale Re-examined." VT 24 (1974): 387–97; Coats, G. W., ed. Saga, Legend, Tale, Novella, Fable. JSOTSup 35. JSOT, 1985; Gunkel, H. "Israelite Literary History." Pages 31–41 in Water for a Thirsty Land, ed. K. C. Hanson. Fortress, 2001; Hartley, J. The Book of Job. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1988; Hayes, J. H., ed. Old Testament Form Criticism. Trinity University Press, 1974; Kitchen, K. R. "The Fall and Rise of Covenant, Law, and Treaty." TynBul 40 (1989): 118–35; idem. "Proverbs and Wisdom Books of the Ancient Near East: The Factual History of a Literary Form." TynBul 28 (1977): 69–114; Knierim, R. "Old Testament Form Criticism Reconsidered." Int 27 (1973): 435–48; Knierim, R., and G. Tucker, eds. The Forms of the Old Testament Literature [FOTL series]. Eerdmans, 1981–; Longman, T. "Form Criticism, Recent (p 237) Developments in Genre Theory, and the Evangelical." WTJ 47 (1985): 46–67; Muilenburg, J. "Form Criticism and Beyond." JBL 88 (1969): 1–18; Murphy, R. Wisdom Literature. FOTL 13. Eerdmans, 1981; Ricoeur, P. "Toward a Hermeneutic of the Idea of Revelation." Pages 73–118 in Essays in Biblical Interpretation, ed. L. Mudge. Fortress, 1980; Ryken, L. How to Read the Bible as Literature. Zondervan, 1984; Sandy, D. B., and R. Giese. Cracking Old Testament Codes. Broadman, 1995; Sweeney, M., and E. Ben Zvi, eds. The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century. Eerdmans, 2003; Tucker, G. Form Criticism of the Old Testament. Fortress, 1971; Vanhoozer, K. "The Semantics of Biblical Literature: Truth and Scripture's Diverse Literary Forms." Pages 51–104 in Hermeneutics, Authority, and Canon, ed. D. A. Carson and J. Woodbridge. Zondervan, 1986; Walton, J. Ancient Israelite Literature in Its Cultural Context. Zondervan, 1989.

Richard L. Schultz

Foundationalism    See Epistemology

Fourfold Sense    See Literal Sense; Medieval Biblical Interpretation; Spiritual Sense

Fowl, Stephen    See Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary; Virtue

Frei, Hans    See Narrative Theology; Yale School

Fulfillment    See Prophecy and Prophets in the NT; Prophecy and Prophets in the OT; Relationship between the Testaments; Salvation, History of

Functionalism    See Scripture, Authority of; Theological

(p 238) G

Gabler, J. P. See Biblical Theology

Gadamer, Hans-Georg See Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics; Ricoeur, Paul

Galatians, Book of

With an appropriateness that Paul could hardly have anticipated, Galatians is one of the most fruitful writings of the NT. Not only was it the foundational document of the Reformation; it was also widely influential throughout church history. Chrysostom, Jerome, and Augustine all composed commentaries on it within a few decades and a few hundred miles of each other at the turn of the fourth/fifth centuries, as Christianity began to expand under official recognition. Luther's commentary was itself enormously influential (even John Bunyan records his debt in Grace Abounding), in contrast to his commentary on Romans, published only in a provisional form in 1908 (critical ed. 1938). The letter is evidently written with deep passion and out of a great sense of care and anxiety for the Galatians, as they are tempted to follow those who argue that observance of the law is a necessary condition for membership in the people of God. It reveals the existence of deep controversy and conflict among the apostles over the issue of observance of the law. By contrast with the proponents of a law-observant Christianity, Paul insists that righteousness is to be found only by those who live by faith in Jesus Christ and who are led by the Spirit. Such people live in hope and out of the experience of the living Christ within them. This is the new life of freedom, which replaces the former life of bondage.

Such a radical view of the newness of Christian existence (by contrast with all old ways, not only of the Gentiles but also of the Jews) raises some difficult questions about the relation of the OT to the NT, and of Paul to some of the other NT writers (Matthew and James) who place much greater emphasis on the law. At the same time it raises important questions about the nature of Christians' freedom and guidance by the Spirit. What weight are the churches to give appeals to the Spirit in the search for guidance and in times of controversy? Paul's assertion of the radical newness of believers' life in Christ also raises acute questions about the place of other forms of religious belief and practice within Christian understanding and practice, not least of members of the Jewish faith.

History of Interpretation

Guidance by the Spirit and Freedom from the Law in Galatians. In his argument with the Galatians, Paul clearly states that the role of the law in their lives (or the lives of the Jews?) was a temporary one. Before faith they were kept under the law, which acted as a custodian; once faith came they were all sons of God, "no longer under a custodian" (3:23–26 RSV). Clearly (not least in the light of the subsequent interpretation of this passage), Paul's use of this metaphor leaves a number of questions open: What precisely was the nature of this custodianship? Once Christian believers were no longer subject to the law as custodian, did that mean that their relationship to the law was then at an end? What was the nature of their new life in the Spirit, in which they had begun their Christian existence, such that the desire to return to practice of the law could be ironically described by Paul as a desire to perfect their new life "in the flesh" (3:3 AT)?

Marcion, one of the earliest commentators on Paul, saw the law as stemming from a different God than the God of Jesus Christ, and believed that the law of the just but cruel creator God had as its principal function the enslavement and punishment of human beings. The gospel brought by the Spirit liberated believers and allowed them to escape from the world of creation. This reading sets a mark for subsequent orthodox interpreters who seek to distance themselves from the teaching of Marcion. For Chrysostom, the law has two functions: the first as a bridle to curb the Jews; the second, more importantly, to teach the Jews the basic grammar of morality. The law is, as it were, a primary teacher who drills on the rudiments of (p 239) the subject and is left behind when the pupil has learned all that he may and then moves on to be taught by a philosopher. It would be degrading for such a student to go back to his primary teacher, when he is already being taught by one much wiser and more learned. The role of the Spirit is also twofold: regenerating believers in baptism, thus liberating them from the desires of the flesh; also, instructing in the higher morality, so that believers may produce fruit. Augustine introduces a new motif into the understanding of the function of the law: it is there to humble those who seek justification by works, precisely because no one can perform all the works of the law. Thus, people are driven to seek the righteousness that comes by faith in Jesus Christ. The Spirit leads believers in the way of faith, but they constantly have to battle with the effects of original sin. Thomas Aquinas drew together the teaching of the fathers: the law was to restrain sins, to bring people to seek grace, to tame concupiscence, and also to serve as a figure of future grace. This last point allowed a more allegorical reading of the ceremonial aspects of the law.

Luther accepted that the law had a civil (political) use in promoting order and discipline in society; it also had a theological use: following Augustine, he described it as a hammer to break the proud and bring them to Christ. Through faith Christ enters the life of believers and through his Spirit guides and leads them, though they always have to battle with the power of sin in their lives. Until this point, few commentators attributed anything but a quite minor role to the law in the life of believers. At most, it is one source of ethical teaching, though a minor one compared with the teaching of the NT (Aquinas). For Calvin, this became more problematical. Faced with the Radical Reformers—who appealed to the inspiration of the Spirit to justify their pacifist and simple style of living—and inspired by a belief in the unity of the two covenants, Calvin appealed to the law as the true benchmark of Christian ethics. He thus proposes a third use of the law, which is the “principal use and more closely connected with its proper end. It has respect to believers in whose hearts the Spirit of God already flourishes and reigns.... That, by teaching, admonishing, rebuking, and correcting, it may fit and prepare us for every good work.... The law acts like a whip to the flesh, urging it on as men do a sluggish ass.” But it also has a teaching function, even for believers in whose hearts “the Law is written and engraved.” For them, “it is the best instrument for enabling them to learn with greater truth and certainty what that will of the Lord is which they aspire to follow, and to confirm them in this knowledge” (Inst. 2.7.12). Thus Calvin exalts the written law of the OT over the law written in the heart. This is taken up by later Puritan commentators such as William Perkins, who see evidence of obedience to the law as a ground for assurance of the believer’s election. Perkins gives some remarkable examples of what he sees to be the clear guidance of the written law, which includes not selling one’s children into slavery. Among post-Enlightenment commentators, F. C. Baur saw the conflict between Peter and Paul at Antioch as representing the struggle between a law-based, particularist understanding of religion and the new law-free, universalist religion of Christianity, based on a new God-consciousness mediated through the Son. This new (idealist) understanding of Spirit was subsequently attacked by the history of religions school (Heitmüller), which located the understanding of Spirit in popular Hellenistic forms of effervescent religion, though Bousset argued that Paul's true religion of the Spirit transcended the popular cultic form of early Christianity. This characterization of Spirit-led belief as universalist, and Judaism with its own ethical traditions as particularist, easily led into various late-nineteenth-century portrayals of Judaism as legalistic and caught up in extreme forms of casuistry.

Justification by Faith and Not by Works. Commentators see Paul as contrasting two very different types of religious observance; one is based on works, driven by fear of the consequences of failing to obey the law; the other is based on faith in Christ's work in securing our forgiveness, which brings freedom to follow the Spirit (Chrysostom). There are questions, however, about the role of believers in the life of faith, how far they are restored/regenerated and able to act justly and lovingly, how far any such acts of righteousness are themselves the result of God's gracious action. Chrysostom believed both that our crucifixion with Christ in baptism leads to the killing of our passions and so to the end of sin, and also that there was a continuing need for ascetic discipline in the life of the Christian. Thus, he portrayed Paul as the ideal type of the Christian monk. Augustine believed that those who die to the law exchange a carnal for a spiritual understanding of the law. Moreover the law is no longer imposed, for now Christ lives in the believer, who thus acts out of love of justice. Nevertheless, although this might sound like a perfectionist understanding of Christian life, Augustine (p 240) distinguishes between the present mode of Christ's dwelling in the believer and that which is to come. Now Christ lives in believers by faith only; in the life to come he will live in them by sight. In this life there is still a lack of clarity and certainty about relationship with Christ, which leads Augustine to become less confident in the bond.

For Aquinas, faith itself is a gift of grace and is informed by the gift of love (fides caritate formata); in this way God is understood as imparting the fullness of his gifts to believers. God assists our free will by his grace; Christians are released from the written law and instructed and directed by God himself; Christ directs the soul as the soul directs the body. Luther vehemently objected, saying this meant that faith not informed by love and therefore not issuing in works of love was viewed as nonsalvific; such teaching implied a doctrine of justification by works. The righteousness received through faith in Christ was a pure gift and not in any sense dependent on our activity. Christ entering the heart drives out Moses and brings grace and righteousness. With such a view, righteousness is not merely reckoned to the believer but, because it has its roots in the intimate union between Christ and the believer, issues in actual righteousness. In this sense, the believer is freed from the law. Nevertheless, while there is this union in the believers' hearts, they live out their callings in the world, where the law still obtains.

Calvin's reading of Gal. 2:15–21 first attacks the view of Jerome (and Origen) that it was only the ceremonial (as opposed to the moral) law that could not justify. While conceding that the original dispute was about ceremonial matters, he argues that Paul nevertheless moved from the particular to the general because he “was worried not so much about ceremonies being observed as that the confidence and glory of salvation should be transferred to works.” He differs importantly from Luther, who takes “Through the law I died to the law” (v. 19) to mean renouncing it and being freed from it. For Calvin, it means rather that the law bears the curse within it, which slays us, not that we are liberated from its sphere. The new life of believers is engrafted into the death of Christ, from which they receive a secret energy. Believers are “animated by the secret power of Christ, so that Christ may be said to live and grow in [them].” The life of Christ in the believer depends on a “true and genuine communication with him” and has two possible senses for Calvin. First is the governance of the believer's actions by Christ's spirit. Second is participation in Christ's righteousness, so “that, since we cannot of ourselves be acceptable to him [French version], we are accepted in him by God. The first relates to regeneration, the second to the free imputation of righteousness.” It is in the second sense that Calvin takes the present passage, though he indicates in the French version of his commentary that he would find it better if it could be taken in both senses. Thus both Luther and Calvin provide support for the dominant Reformed view that the righteousness of faith is an alien righteousness, imputed rather than imparted, a view linked with a negative view of the reality of the believer's sharing in Christ's righteousness. On the other hand, both these Reformers speak powerfully and movingly of the believer as united to Christ: “We so live in the world that we also live in heaven; not only because our Head is there, but because, in virtue of union, we have a life in common with him (John 14:1ff.)” (Calvin, Galatians, 42–43; Commentaires, 296–97).

Christian Anthropology—the Desires of the Flesh and the Desires of the Spirit: Gal. 5:16–18 and the Ethics of Desire. Paul states that the desires of the flesh and the Spirit are opposed to each other and engaged in struggle with each other in such a way as to bring a certain consequence: “You may not do what you want” (v. 17 AT). This statement is wonderfully ambiguous and has spawned a family of Christian anthropologies of very different temperaments. For dualists like Gnostics and Manichaeans, the flesh is seen as the creation of an alien principle, which holds the pure, incorruptible soul in bondage. The soul can, however, be released through saving knowledge of its plight. This knowledge of the fundamental opposition between flesh and spirit leads to renewal of the soul and a life of abstinence and asceticism, not doing what one—wrongly—wants. Such doctrines were vigorously opposed by the orthodox churches but nevertheless were influential and reflected in the adoption and idealization of ascetic lifestyles and the exaltation of virginity. Chrysostom saw flesh and spirit not as two opposed principles but as referring to different states of mind or judgment: those instructed by the Spirit knew clearly what the choices were that faced them and were able to choose not to do what was wrong. Again, this meant resisting the desires of the flesh and leading a life of (monastic) asceticism. Chrysostom portrayed Paul as the ideal type of the Christian monk, crucifying the flesh with its passions and desires (5:24). Aquinas follows the fathers (p 241) in taking “flesh” and “spirit” to refer to different modes of the soul’s willing. But rather than seeing fleshly desires as intrinsically wrong, he understands them as natural, wrong only insofar as they are taken to excess or allowed to distract the soul from the pursuit of spiritual, supernatural desires. For Aquinas, there is then a struggle within the Christian life to establish a proper balance between natural and spiritual desires, which means that we cannot always do the good we want. This tendency to see the Christian life as one of continuing struggle in the will between the desires of the flesh and the Spirit is given greater impetus by Luther, whose deep fears of judgment during his life as an Augustinian friar continued to disturb him later. He remained powerfully convinced of the continuing sinfulness of believers, and at the same time he also believed that those who were united to Christ were able to bear the fruit of the Spirit in their lives. This darker strain in Reformed theology was given yet greater impetus by Calvinist doctrines of total depravity, tendencies that were combated by Methodism and the holiness movements.

View of the Other in Galatians. Finally, we must consider the ways that readings of Galatians have influenced Christians’ views of those outside the community of faith. With its sharp contrasts between those who follow the life of the flesh and those led by the Spirit—and between those who believe, are in Christ, and are sons and daughters of Abraham, Christ, and God and those who are not—Galatians can easily lead to a quite negative characterization of all those who are not Christian believers, indeed, to a very negative characterization of all forms of human difference (3:28). Such negative attitudes are clearly evinced in Chrysostom’s Discourses against the Jews and in Luther’s and subsequent Lutheran portrayals of Christianity as a legalistic religion of works and self-redemption. This is further developed in F. C. Baur’s portrayal of Judaism as a particularistic, as opposed to a universal, form of religion (cf. Boyarin’s reception and critique of Baur). But it is not only Jews who are thus categorized as alien and other: for Luther, all those who do not accept his doctrine of justification by faith are to be seen as pursuing some form of works-righteousness, whether Jews, Turks, schoolmen, philosophers, or monks. The list presumably is extendable.

Place within the Canon

The radical nature of Galatians’ theology of the Spirit and its doctrine of the temporary nature of the law raise a number of questions. In the first place, it is argued that Paul’s own views of the law change between Galatians and Romans (describing the law as “holy and just and good,” in 7:12 NRSV). This does not necessarily entail any contradiction between Galatians and Romans, though there is certainly a difference of tone and emphasis. There are much greater difficulties in plotting the relations between Galatians and works like Matthew and James, which emphasize performing works of the law and doing all that Jesus commanded. Certainly, Luther felt that it was not possible to reconcile Paul and James, which he famously dismissed as an “epistle of straw,” just as commentators have continued to see Matthew’s emphasis on judgment by works as inimical to Paul’s teaching on justification by faith. However, there are similar tensions within Paul’s own writings, which should prompt the theological interpreter to question a too-simplistic resolution. Yet Marcion raised more radical questions about the relation of Paul’s works (pruned to suit Marcion) to the rest of the canon and in particular to the OT, which for him was testimony to a different, creator God, opposed to the merciful and gentle God of Jesus Christ. Even though orthodox Christian interpreters have fiercely resisted such views, they continue to find powerful supporters. Harnack was one such, and this support for Marcion was coupled with a deeply negative view of Judaism. He saw it as a labyrinthine religion of legalism—transcended by Jesus’ teaching of the fatherhood of God and a higher righteousness in the form of an ethic of intention. Even among those who have held that the law plays an integral part in the history of salvation, there is, as recognized, a radical dispute about the nature of its continuing role in the life of the believer.

Galatians presents us with one of the sharpest statements of the giftedness of Christian existence, its dependence not on human effort but on gratitude and faith in God's grace in Christ, a life lived in union with Christ. That life neither springs from nor is subsequently conditional upon human observance of the law of the OT, though it will indeed bear the fruit of the Spirit. Such a vision of the Christian life as a wholly new mode of existence, free from the "bondage" of the old life of the flesh, has never been easy to sustain or indeed to reconcile with the continuing evidence of disharmony, conflict, and other "works of the flesh" in the life of Christian communities. At one extreme (p 242) are those who have emphasized the perfectionist strand in Paul's thought, asserting the possibility of a new life wholly freed from the flesh, where the soul is free to follow the guidance or instruction of the Spirit. At another extreme are those who have regarded such perfection as something to be achieved only in a future state, since the present life is still dominated by the power of the flesh to create disorder in Christian lives. Hence, the law remains necessary both as a whip to scourge the flesh and as a clear guide for Christian conduct. In this life the human will remains weak; hope, in the face of imminent judgment, resides in the imputation of Christ's righteousness to the believer: "Just as I am, without one plea" (C. Elliott). While perfectionist readings may run up against the hard facts of Christian communal existence, the more negative views seem largely deaf to the promises that Paul makes to Christians in this life and to his despair that those who have once tasted such a life should be willing to turn their backs on it. Readings like those of Aquinas, and to a degree Augustine and Luther, are more alert to the tensions within Christian existence between Spirit-led freedom and the "desires of the flesh," and thus seem more faithful to the text and offer creative ways of appropriating it. In particular, they offer encouragement to Christians to take more seriously their own moral experience as they are led by the Spirit, and to have the courage to explore new ways of living that are governed not by the letter of the law but by the fruit they bear.

See also Justification by Faith; Pauline Epistles

Bibliography

Baur, F. C. Paul. Williams & Norgate, 1876; Bousset, W. Kyrios Christos. Abingdon, 1970; Boyarin, D. A Radical Jew. University of California Press, 1994; Bunyan, J. Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners. Clarendon, 1962; Calvin, J. Commentaires de M. Jean Calvin sur toutes les épîtres de l'Apôtre Saint Paul. S. Honorati, 1563; idem. The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians. Eerdmans, 1965; idem. Inst.; Chrysostom, J. "Commentary on Galatians." Vol. 13 of NPNF<sub>1</sub>; Harnack, A. von. Marcion. Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1996; Heitmüller, W. Taufe und Abendmahl bei Paulus. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1903; Luther, M. A Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. J. Clarke, 1953; Perkins, W. A Commentary on Galatians. Pilgrim, 1989; Plumer, E., trans. Augustine's Commentary on Galatians. Oxford Early Christian Studies. Oxford University Press, 2003; Thomas Aquinas. Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. Magi Books, 1966.

John K. Riches

Genealogy

Numerous genealogical records are scattered throughout the OT and NT. Genealogies were one way to demonstrate both historical continuity and sociological relationship(s) in the ancient world. Practically speaking, the inability to bridge past and present through such ancestral records meant a family, clan, tribe, or society was at risk of extinction—since it implied a set of circumstances that imperiled an ongoing genealogical history.

Principal Genealogies in the Bible

The most extensive and complex of the biblical genealogies are found in 1 Chron. 1–9. This prologue to the Chronicler's history selectively traces the generations from Adam (1:1) to the Hebrews who resettled Jerusalem and Judah after the Babylonian exile (9:3–9); it contains more than thirty genealogies. Like most biblical genealogies, they were designed to illustrate the continuity of the postexilic Hebrew community with earlier counterparts. They also linked the divine promises to David and his descendants with the covenant promises made previously to the Hebrew patriarchs. Finally, the Chronicler's genealogies served to legitimize the interim political leadership role of the Levitical priesthood in Jerusalem until such time as the Davidic monarchy was reestablished.

Other significant genealogies are found in Gen. 4:16–24; 5; 10; 11:10–32; 19:30–38; 22:20–24; 25:12–26; 36; 46:8–27; Exod. 6:14–25; Num. 3; 26; Ruth 4:18–22; 2 Sam. 3:2–5; 5:13–16; Ezra 7:1–5; Esther 2:5–6; Matt. 1:1–17; Luke 3:23–38.

Definition

According to Robert Wilson, "A genealogy is a written or oral expression of the descent of a person or persons from an ancestor or ancestors” (Genealogy, 9). Particular terminology is sometimes employed to characterize the composition of biblical genealogies, as illustrated in 1 Chronicles:

- breadth, listing a single generation of descendants from a common ancestor (e.g., 2:1)
- depth, listing successive generations, commonly four to six (e.g., 3:10–16)
- linear, displaying depth alone (e.g., 2:10)
- segmented, displaying both breadth and depth (e.g., 3:17–24)
- descending, proceeding from parent to child (e.g., 9:39–44)
- ascending, moving from child to parent (e.g., 9:14–16; further, Wilson, Genealogy, 18–26)

(p 243)Purpose

Literarily, genealogies are important connecting links in the biblical narrative since by nature any such reporting of history must be selective. They may serve a number of purposes, even simultaneously. At times the genealogy may signify social status and legitimize the wielding of certain power by individuals or groups (as in the case of the hereditary offices of kingship and priesthood in Hebrew society). Certain legal rights and duties were associated with the genealogy as well, such as claims for land tenure and military conscription. In agrarian tribal societies, genealogies commonly identified clans and families by means of geographical location and thus were the ancient equivalent of an address book.

According to Satterthwaite, two primary functions of the biblical genealogies may be noted: describing the descent of the nations from Adam through Noah; and tracing the “line of the promise” from Seth to the nation of Israel—culminating in the genealogies of Jesus Christ (656, 662; also, Johnson [77–82] has isolated nine distinct functions).

History of Interpretation

Ancient and Medieval. Generally speaking, early Christian interpretation emphasized spiritualized and symbolic meaning rather than historical and sociological understanding. For Augustine, Cain represented the temporary and corrupt “earthly city,” while Adam, Abel, and Seth typified the “heavenly” or “eternal city of God” (ACCSOT 1:111, 116). In the same way, after the tower of Babel episode, the descendants of Abraham continued the legacy of the “city of God” on earth (ACCSOT 1:172).

Sometimes christological prefigurations were attached to certain individuals. For example, Bede taught that the birth of Enoch (as the seventh in the line of descent from Adam) foreshadowed the virgin birth of Jesus the Messiah and the sevenfold gifts of the Holy Spirit that rested in Jesus (ACCSOT 1:118; cf. Rev. 5:6). Augustine did, however, recognize the sociological function of the genealogy in legitimizing an individual or tribe for service in an office, as in the case of Moses and Aaron (ACCSOT 3:37).

At times, the fathers were given over to extensive allegorizing, as in the case of Lot's genealogy (Gen. 19:30–38). Origen equated Lot with the Torah and his wife with the people of Israel who longed for the comforts of Egypt, while Lot's two daughters represented the sins of "vainglory" and "pride." For Irenaeus, the offspring (Moab and Ammon) from Lot's incestuous relations exemplified the two synagogues, Samaria and Judah (ACCSOT 2:80–81).

Finally, the early church fathers sometimes applied numerological interpretations to demonstrate the symbolic affirmation of future fulfillment or the spiritual reality of great theological truths in the OT. Thus Chrysostom connected the number seventy-five (descendants of Jacob who went to Egypt, Gen. 46:27 LXX; seventy in MT and Vulgate) etymologically with the name "Israel" as used in Ps. 75:1 LXX (= 76:1 ET) to show the fulfillment of God's prediction to grow Israel into a great nation.

Reformation. Both Luther (1483–1546) and Calvin (1509–64) read the biblical genealogies at face value, as historical records. The two addressed their historical accuracy and the literary integrity of the Bible in attempts to reconcile apparent discrepancies (e.g., the number of descendants in the genealogy of Jacob, Gen. 46:8–27; see Calvin 1/ii:392; Luther 8:84–88).

Theologically, both affirmed that the genealogies demonstrated God's sovereign and merciful oversight generally of humanity, and especially of his people Israel, in moving history to the Christ event (e.g., Calvin 1/ii:44–45; Luther 2:240). Both perceived evidence of the fulfillment of divine prophecy about the progeny of figures like Jacob and Esau (e.g., Calvin 1/i:253; Luther 1:340). Finally, both emphasized their purpose in identifying Jesus as the "promised Seed" (Calvin 16:80–81; Luther 1:340). More specifically, Calvin interpreted the dual genealogies of Jesus as a twofold verification of his fulfillment of OT prophecies, both as part of the natural lineage of the "son of Adam" (Luke 3:38) and the legal lineage of the "son of Abraham" (Matt. 1:1; Calvin 16:84).

Generally speaking, Luther tended to extract spiritualized meanings more so than Calvin. For example, see his commentary on the glory and success of the "flesh" in the godless lineage of Esau, designed as a foil for the "poor in spirit" character exemplified by the righteous stemming from Isaac through Jacob (Luther 6:310–11; cf. 1:348 on the spiritualizing of Enoch's righteousness). Luther was also highly polemical against the rabbinic interpretation of the OT genealogies (cf. Luther 1:349–50; 8:88–89).

Not long afterward, Archbishop James Ussher published his famous work on biblical chronology (Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti [1650–54]; see Anstey 26–27). Ussher assumed that the genealogies were both historically accurate and complete as linear registers of human descent. Thus, (p 244) by calculating the number of generations (and assuming a fixed time span per generation), he established a date for the creation of the world at 4004 BCE. Ussher's chronologies were the premodern standard for centuries, largely due to inclusion in the margin of certain editions of the King James Version.

Modern. 1. Post-Enlightenment interpreters tend to assume a skeptical stance. Broadly construed, the reasons for this “hermeneutics of suspicion” are the highly selective and theological nature of the biblical genealogies, and the comparative data provided by ancient Near Eastern parallels and modern sociological and anthropological study (cf. Rendsburg 185). For example, the genealogy of Ezra (Ezra 7:1–5) contains only five links back to Zadok, King David's high priest (a span of five centuries!). Similarly, Exod. 6:14–26 records five generations between Jacob and Moses, whereas 1 Chron. 7:23–27 lists at least ten generations. Matthew's stylized genealogy of Jesus (three sets of names, each with fourteen links) indicates interests more literary and theological than chronological (Matt. 1:17). More than this, Luke traces Jesus' lineage to God himself (Luke 3:38)!

Rendsburg, however, has recently argued for the overall reliability and consistency of genealogies in the Pentateuch (202–4). He has based his conclusions, in part, on the observable pattern of overlapping generations (190–91), so that people of the same age need not be of the same generation. Likewise, an individual may be a descendant of a common ancestor through two different family lines of unequal length (e.g., Jair four generations removed from Judah or five from Joseph, both sons of Jacob; Rendsburg 188; cf. 1 Chron. 2:21). By means of careful internal analysis, Rendsburg has demonstrated that everyone coeval with Moses in Exodus through Joshua is from three to six generations removed from one of Jacob's sons (the exception is Joshua; 193–94; see section “OT Genealogies and Historical Reconstruction” in Satterthwaite 658–59).

2. The emphasis of form criticism on genre identification, literary structure, and social setting has prompted the study of genealogies as a subgenre of biblical narrative. Such study has raised questions concerning issues of orality and fluidity in transmission, and the identification of formal characteristics (see “Definition” above). Overall understanding has been enhanced because form-critical analysis provides an opportunity to study the function of this (sub-)genre in literary and theological context.

3. Various types of literary analysis have also increased appreciation and understanding of genealogies. For example, comparative study of ancient Near Eastern materials reveals that function varies according to circumstances and may be categorized in domestic, political, and religious terms (Chavalas 109). In addition, such literature may combine material from varying time periods, often telescoping several generations, and typically emphasizing legitimation (120–27).

Robinson (601) has noted that the genealogies work to establish the narrative genre of the OT by continuing the theme of the narrative genre of the OT by continuing the theme(s) of the context in which they are embedded (e.g., the genealogy of Seth has links to the creation story; the genealogies of Isaac and Jacob are tied to the Abrahamic covenant). A case in point is the quasi-genealogical Table of Nations (Gen. 10). The purpose is not genealogical. Rather, it serves as a detailed expansion of the statement in Gen. 9:19 (a reference to Noah's three sons as progenitors of all peoples) and a continuation of the divine blessing of Gen. 1:28 (cf. Walton 367, 379).

Beyond this, etymological study of Gen. 1–11 reveals that the names, by means of wordplays, offer an “‘onomastic commentary’ parallel to the events within the narratives” (Hess, Studies, 158). For example, the genealogy of Seth contains names related to ideas like substitution, praise, prayer, and rest, thus supporting the understanding that Seth represents the line of God's promise.

4. Much current NT scholarship sides with the Reformers on the genealogies of Jesus. Matthew portrays Jesus as Son of David, rightful heir to the throne and Israel's Messiah (cf. DJG 255). Matthew's Gospel also links the Davidic covenant with the Abrahamic covenant. Luke identifies Jesus not only as the descendant of Abraham, but also in the lineage of Noah, Adam, and ultimately God himself. Luke's Gospel emphasizes the divine sonship of Jesus and his universal ministry as “Son of Man” (cf. DJG 256–57). Luke's strategic placement of Jesus' genealogy after his baptism and before his temptation further supports this understanding. Less prominent, but still espoused by some, is the idea that Matthew's genealogy records Jesus as a descendant of David through Joseph, while Luke's reports Jesus as a descendant of David through Mary (see discussion in NIDNTT 3:654–56).

Theological Significance

1. The biblical genealogies make subtle but substantial contributions to our understanding (p 245) of God and his redemptive plan. For instance, the continuity of his covenantal revelation with successive generations (as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob) indicates his intention to work with and through humanity (Exod. 3:16). The extensive genealogies spanning many generations verify that God indeed is slow to anger and abounds in love and faithfulness (34:6–7). Implicit in the lists of names, whether belonging to the righteous or to the wicked, is God’s providential rule of human activity—overturning evil for good (Gen. 50:20). Ultimately, the genealogies are not about famous or heroic people, but generations of people in relationship with a great God (Pss. 33:11; 102:12; Eph. 3:21).

2. Broadly understood, the genealogies of Genesis attest humanity’s fulfillment of the divine commission to “be fruitful and increase in number” (Gen. 1:28). More specifically, the genealogies of Seth, Terah, and Jacob are testimony to God’s covenant faithfulness to the Hebrew patriarchs and matriarchs, developing Israel into a great nation (Gen. 12:1–3; 15:5; 26:24; 28:14).

3. The biblical genealogies reflect the culture of the ancient world as well, emphasizing the preservation of individual identity within the group. It is difficult for modern technological societies to appreciate the importance of interrelatedness in agrarian societies, where subsistence living is often the norm. By means of genealogies, however, the ancients placed themselves into this pangenerational solidarity (see Walton, Matthews, and Chavalas 413). Indirectly, this may be a manifestation of the “social likeness” of people made in God’s image, a reminder that it is not good to be alone, and an affirmation of cooperation and partnerships for success in life (cf. Gen. 2:18; Eccles. 4:9–12).

4. The process of naming a child was significant in the ancient world. Many times a name reflected circumstances related to birth (e.g., Isaac, Gen. 21:3, 6; Esau and Jacob, Gen. 25:24–26; Jabez, 1 Chron. 4:9). In some instances, the act of naming was an expression of blessing or even a statement of destiny concerning a child’s future (e.g., Jesus, Matt. 1:21). Occasionally, a person’s name may change to reflect a reversal of fortunes: Jacob, meaning “He grasps the heel,” is renamed Israel, “He struggles with God” (Gen. 32:28; 35:10). Naomi, “Pleasant,” renames herself Mara, “Bitter” (Ruth 1:20). Many theophoric names (including elements of names of Israel’s God like “Jeho-” or “El-”) are self-contained statements about God or relationship to God: Jehohanan means “Yah[weh] is gracious,” and Elijah, “My God is Yah[weh].” So instead of serving a primarily historical function, the genealogy often served “to use continuity with the past as an explanation of the current structure and condition of society ... [and] their current theological situation” (Walton, Matthews, and Chavalas 413).

5. The Chronicler deliberately included Hebrew women and foreigners in his genealogical prologue. This suggests that the writer recognized in Israel’s history at least partial fulfillment of God’s covenant promise to bless the nations through Abraham’s descendants (e.g., 1 Chron. 4:17–19; 7:24; cf. Gen. 12:1–3). In addition, this “inclusivism” may have been both a corrective to the later excesses of the racial “exclusivism” promoted by Ezra and Nehemiah, and an exhortation for Hebrew women to become more active in initiatives for the restoration of postexilic Jerusalem (Hill 100–1, 157–58).

6. The purpose of genealogies generally is both to preserve the ancestral legacy of an individual or family and (or) legitimize an individual or familial claim to some position of leadership or service. The biblical genealogies trace the ancestral legacy of Jesus of Nazareth as both “Son of Man” (or representative human being, Matt. 1:1–16; cf. 12:8, 32, 40) and “son of David” (or rightful heir of the Davidic throne, Matt. 1:1; 20:30–31; cf. Rev. 3:7; 22:16). The Bible’s careful identification of Jesus as the Messiah fulfills the “offspring theology” first announced in Gen. 3:15 and then developed through the rest of Scripture. It is no coincidence that biblical genealogies cease in the NT record after the birth of Jesus of Nazareth.

Bibliography

Anstey, M. Chronology of the Old Testament. Kregel, 1973; Brown, R. The Birth of Messiah. Doubleday, 1977; Calvin, J. Calvin’s Commentaries. Reprint, Baker, 1979. Vol. 1, Genesis, trans. J. King; Vol. 16, Harmony of the Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, trans. W. Pringle; Chavalas, M. “Genealogical History as ‘Charter’: A Study of Old Babylonian Period Historiography and the Old Testament.” Pages 103–28 in Faith, Tradition, and History, ed. A. Millard et al. Eisenbrauns, 1994; Hasel, G. “The Genealogies of Gen 5 and 11 and Their Alleged Babylonian Background.” AUSS 16 (1978): 361–74; Hess, R. “The Genealogies of Genesis 1–11 and Comparative Literature.” Bib 70 (1989): 241–54; idem. Studies in the Personal Names of Genesis 1–11. Alter Orient und Altes Testament 234. Neukirchener Verlag, 1993; Hill, A. 1 and 2 Chronicles. NIVAC. Zondervan, 2003; Hillyer, N. “The Genealogies of Jesus.” NIDNTT 3:653–60; Huffman, D. “Genealogy.” DJG: 253–59; Japhet, S. 1 and 2 Chronicles. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 1993; Johnson, M. The Purpose of the Biblical Genealogies. SNTSMS 8. 2d ed. Cambridge University Press, 1988; Lienhard, J., ed. Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy. ACCSOT 3. InterVarsity, 2001; (p 246)Louth, A., ed. Genesis 1–11. ACCSOT 1. InterVarsity, 2001; Luther, M. LWorks. Vol. 1, Genesis 1–5, trans. G. Schick; Vol. 2, Genesis 6–14, trans. G. V. Schick; Vol. 6, Genesis 31–37, trans. P. Pahl; Vol. 8, Genesis 45–50, trans. P. Pahl; Malamat, A. “King Lists of the Old Babylonian Period and Biblical Genealogies.” JAOS 99 (1968): 163–73; Prewitt, T. “Kinship Structures and the Genesis Genealogies.” JNES 40 (1981): 87–98; Rendsburg, G. “The Internal Consistency and Historical Reliability of the Biblical Genealogies.” VT 40 (1990): 185–206; Robinson, R. B. “Literary Functions of the Genealogies of Genesis.” CBQ 48 (1986): 595–608; Sasson, J. “A Genealogical ‘Convention’ in Biblical Chronography?” ZAW 90 (1978): 171–85; Satterthwaite, P. “Genealogy in the Old Testament.” NIDOTTE 4:654–63; Sheridan, M., ed. Genesis 12–15. ACCSOT 2. InterVarsity, 2002; Walton, J. Genesis. NIVAC. Zondervan, 2001; Walton, J., V. Matthews, and M. Chavalas. The IVP Bible Background Commentary: Old Testament. InterVarsity, 2000; Wenham, G. Genesis 1–15. WBC 1. Word, 1987; Wilson, R. R. “Between ‘Azal’ and ‘Azal’: Interpreting Biblical Genealogies.” BA 42 (1979): 11–22; idem. “Genealogy, Genealogies.” ABD 2:928–32; idem. Genealogy and History in the Biblical World. YNER 7. Yale University Press, 1977.

Andrew E. Hill

General Revelation See Creation; Ethics; Philosophy; Revelation; Science, the Bible and

Genesis, Book of

Introduction

By its very position as the first book of the Bible, Genesis (Greek: “origin”) has been the focus of more attention than most other parts of the OT. It sets the scene for the rest of Scripture and is one of the books most quoted in the NT. Genesis orients the Bible reader to study the following books with appropriate assumptions about their context and theology. Its narratives have been an inspiration to countless authors and artists. Even in today’s secular West, its stories and themes are still familiar.

But familiarity is no guarantee of interpretative integrity. Texts used out of context are liable to be misunderstood and misused, so here, as elsewhere in this dictionary, the aim is to understand Genesis both as a text of its time and as a key witness in the canon of Holy Scripture.

History of Interpretation

“The early chapters of Genesis had arguably a greater influence on the development of Christian theology than did any other part of the Old Testament” (Louth xxxix). Early Christian writers, following the lead of the NT, drew heavily on the opening chapters of Genesis to explain the doctrines of creation and the fall. The typology of Christ as the second Adam, who triumphed where the first Adam failed, was very important in patristic theology. Vital too was the understanding of humanity created in the image of God. Though this image was marred in the fall, God's ultimate purpose was its restoration in the new creation.

Symbolism was important in early Christian interpretation of Genesis, but that is not to say that they took the stories allegorically. They were accepted as literal accounts of the origin of the cosmos, just as the patriarchal narratives that follow them were understood historically. The problems posed by modern science did not trouble Christian interpreters till the nineteenth century. The Reformers and their immediate successors continued the same essentially literal approach to Genesis, with less emphasis on the symbolic dimensions of the book. Throughout this time it was assumed that Moses was the author of Genesis.

From the seventeenth century and the dawn of the Enlightenment, however, these traditional views began to be questioned. Spinoza in his Tractatus theologico-politicus (1670) suggested that Ezra had compiled the Pentateuch from Mosaic materials. A landmark for the discussion of Genesis was Astruc's Conjectures on the Memoires Used by Moses to Compile Genesis (1753), which proposed that Genesis was compiled from several parallel sources. This idea that Genesis and the other books of the Pentateuch were composed of various sources was intensely debated throughout the nineteenth century. Thanks to the brilliant advocacy of Julius Wellhausen in Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1878), a form of the documentary hypothesis came to be widely accepted by biblical scholars. This approach distributes Genesis into three main sources, J (Yahwist, 950 BCE), E (Elohists, 850 BCE), and P (Priestly, 500 BCE). These three sources were combined successively, so that Genesis reached its final form in the fifth century BCE, about 800 years after Moses. This entailed a quite skeptical approach to the content of Genesis. The accounts of the patriarchs do not reflect their own historical situation, "but only of the time when the stories about them arose.... This later age is here unconsciously projected ... into hoar antiquity, and is reflected there like a glorified mirage" (Wellhausen 319).

While historical skepticism was battering the patriarchs, scientific discovery was undermining the traditional understanding of Gen. 1–11. Early Christian writers read these chapters more as narrative theology than as history, but nevertheless (p 247) tended to assume that the chronology of Genesis was credible. But the development of geology indicated that the earth originated much earlier than 4004 BCE, as Archbishop Ussher had supposed in the seventeenth century. This made the interpretation of the genealogies of Gen. 5 and 11 problematic. Further discovery showed that the processes of creation had probably taken many millions of years, not six days. And Darwin's Origin of Species (1859) led many to conclude not only that the timescale of Genesis was wrong, but also that its ultimate assertion, "God created the heavens and the earth" (1:1), was misleading. Chance mutation was a sufficient explanation of the diversity of life on earth: the idea of a creator was superfluous and indeed just the superstition of a less-enlightened era.

This dismissal of Genesis and its theology as just the misguided notions of an ignorant age seemed to be confirmed by texts from ancient Nineveh of a flood story similar to Gen. 6–9. G. A. Smith deciphered and announced the Gilgamesh tablet 11 in 1872 and published it the next year. Though Smith was no skeptic, works by him and others led many to regard Gen. 1–11 as just another ancient oriental myth, with no more credibility or authority than the creation myths of any other people. The nineteenth-century intelligentsia concluded that Western science is the source of real truth.

The twentieth century was kinder to Genesis. Although for most of the century the documentary hypothesis with its late dating of the sources reigned supreme, there was a concerted attempt by scholars to find early authentic elements in these sources. Alt and Westermann argued that elements of the promises to the patriarchs went back to very early times. Scholars well-versed in archaeology and comparative Semitics (Albright; Speiser; de Vaux) found many parallels between the names and customs of Genesis and those of early-second-millennium Mesopotamia. This allowed them to argue that the stories of Genesis contain more historical information than their date of composition might have led one to expect. Though more skeptical voices (Van Seters; Thompson) have been raised in the late twentieth century, the archaeological evidence still tends to speak in support of Genesis (Millard and Wiseman).

The discovery of yet more ancient texts paralleling Gen. 1–11 (Sumerian King List, Flood Story, and the Atrahasis epic, among others) has led to the recognition that Genesis is not simply reproducing the ideas of surrounding cultures. At least at the theological level, it is contesting them fiercely (see below on "The Message of Genesis").

Finally, the last quarter of the twentieth century has witnessed many assaults on the documentary hypothesis (e.g., Whybray), so that it is now widely agreed that a better explanation of the growth of the Pentateuch ought to be found. Meanwhile, a vogue for final-form canonical readings has swept through biblical studies, including work on Genesis. This has bypassed much of the debate about sources and led to scholars asking about the structure and message of the books in their extant form. Though some of this work is driven more by literary concerns than by theological interest, it has often revealed some very instructive points about the theology of the book.

The Message of Genesis

Like many other books, Genesis has suffered from attempts to read its parts separately. This is most obvious among commentators who accept the documentary hypothesis. The Yahwist's (J) love of simple anthropomorphic descriptions of God is contrasted with the Priestly writer's (P) lofty transcendental approach. Whereas P tells of God speaking, in the Elohist (E) source God tends to reveal himself in dreams. In commentators wedded to this theory of distinct sources, it is unusual to find much attempt to describe the theology of the book as a whole, to see these different emphases in polyphonic harmony as opposed to clashing dissonance.

More traditional readers of Genesis have also been guilty of directing more attention to one portion of the book than another. Christian commentators tend to devote disproportionate attention to Gen. 1–11 because of its importance in NT and later theologies. Jewish readers, on the other hand, are more interested in the stories of the patriarchs because they tell of the origins of the Jewish people and their claim to the land of Israel.

If we are to be fair to the text, however, we must be wary of privileging one part of the book over another section. We should look at individual parts, but it is necessary to integrate the message of one part into the overall picture.

The Structure of Genesis

The coherence of the book is demonstrated by its carefully articulated structure. The opening creation account (1:1–2:3) is followed by ten sections, each headed by the same (toledoth) title: (p 248)“These are the generations/descendants of” (2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; 11:10, 27; 25:12, 19; 36:1; “story,” 37:2 NRSV). The sections alternate between extended narratives, such as chapters 2–4 and 37–50, and terse genealogies, such as chapters 5 and 36. If extended narratives are compared, such as the career of Abraham (chs. 12–25) alongside that of Jacob (chs. 25–35), certain similarities emerge, suggesting a typological reading. This is particularly evident in the comparison of Adam and Noah, where the latter is clearly a second-Adam figure. Like Adam, he is the father of the whole human race; and like Adam, he sins (9:20–27).

Keywords form another device linking and unifying the book of Genesis. The terms “bless” and “blessing” are used more often in Genesis than in any other book of the Bible. At creation, God blesses birds, fish, humankind, and the Sabbath, but it is preeminently the patriarchs who are blessed. Indeed, Abraham’s name contains two of the three consonants in the word “bless” (barakh), suggesting that he is the incarnation of blessing. A second key term in Genesis is “seed” or “offspring” (zera), first used of human seed in 3:15 and then frequently in the promises to the patriarchs. The third important word is “land/earth,” first occurring in 1:1 and often again in the patriarchal promises.

These keywords tie the introductory eleven chapters to the following stories about the patriarchs. They cluster thickly in 12:1–3: “bless/ing” occurs five times, “land/earth” three times, and the whole passage revolves round the promise of descendants: “a great nation.” Genesis 1–11 tells of the disarray between the nations; 12:3 declares that in Abraham all the nations will find blessing. The call of Abraham is the answer to the problems of the world.

The Sections of Genesis

To grasp the message of Genesis more exactly, however, we need to examine the contribution of each section in more detail. It falls into three distinct sections:

1. First Exposition: The Hexaemeron, 1:1–2:3
2. Second Exposition: The Protohistory, 2:4–11:26
3. The Core: The Patriarchs, 11:27–50:26

The opening expositions not only give the background to the core; they also foreshadow its themes.

The Hexaemeron. The magnificent overture tells of God creating the cosmos in six days (hence the Greek title “Hexaemeron,” “six days [of creation]”) and gives the first exposition of the theology of Genesis. Its first verse, “In the beginning God,” mentions not a pantheon but only one God, who takes the initiative and orders the whole of creation. Implicitly, this rules out polytheism, the general belief of antiquity.

Second, this one God is sovereign. There is no fight with competing deities, as in other creation myths. God simply speaks, and there is light, dry land appears, and fish swarm in the sea. This is a God whose word effects what is spoken. The God who spoke in creation is the God who spoke to the patriarchs and who will do what he promised them.

Third, not only is this one God almighty, but also the celestial bodies—such as the sun, moon, and stars, worshipped by much of the ancient world—are merely creatures. Indeed, the significance of the attention given to the creation of these bodies and the dry land is that they are vital for human existence.

Fourth, the Hexaemeron climaxes with the creation of human beings in the image of God. Everything builds to this point, and God himself draws the attention of the rest of creation to it by inviting the heavenly host to watch the creation of the human race: “Let us make man in our image” (1:26). Humankind is not only blessed but also encouraged to propagate: “Be fruitful and multiply” (1:28 NRSV).

Here the contrast with Babylonian thought is again evident. In the Atrahasis epic, the creation of humanity is an afterthought, to supply the gods with food; later the gods regret making humans and therefore curb human fertility. Genesis, on the contrary, sees God supplying human beings with food and encouraging their proliferation.

Finally, the Hexaemeron concludes with God resting on the seventh day, another unique feature of this account. The implication is clear: since human beings are made in God’s image, they too should rest on the seventh day. The erratic patterns of ancient pagan festivals and holidays are replaced by a weekly Sabbath, on which not only God rests but also his creatures, humankind and beasts (Exod. 20:8–11; Deut. 5:14), must rest as well. The goal of creation is thus rest and peace, not ceaseless activity: this is a vision reaffirmed in Jacob’s blessing (Gen. 49).

The Protohistory. The second exposition, or Protohistory (2:4–11:26), simultaneously reaffirms the ideals of Gen. 1 and explains how the present sin-dominated world emerged. The Garden of Eden was a place of harmony, where (p 249) a benevolent Creator provided all humankind’s needs: water, food, animals, and companionship. First, 1:28 urges humankind to be fruitful and multiply; then, 2:21–25 portrays the archetypal marriage, in which God creates the perfect bride and presents her to Adam. Yet in a world where humanity lacks nothing, Adam and Eve break the one injunction given to them, and their cosmos turns to chaos.

Their relationship of mutual help and companionship turns sour. The harmony between humankind and beast now becomes a deadly struggle: “He shall bruise your head, and you shall bruise his heel” (3:15 RSV). Since the serpent will suffer in the head and the man only in his heel, the text clearly predicts the eventual triumph of man over beast, of humankind over the power of evil; but the focus of the text is on the ongoing violence within creation. Humankind will battle not just with animals, but also with plant life while struggling to grow food rather than weeds (3:18). And the result of it all is death (3:19).

Death comes quickly in chapter 4: Cain kills Abel, and Lamech promises seventy-sevenfold vengeance on those who attack him.

Fratricidal strife will characterize the families of the patriarchs too (Jacob-Esau in chs. 25–33, and Joseph in ch. 37). But the avalanche of sin continues in Gen. 3–11, culminating in God’s remark that “the earth is filled with violence” (6:11, 13). This state of affairs prompts God to send the flood to wipe out all flesh, both humans and animals.

Again, this is an example of Genesis rejecting the theology of the Near East. The Gilgamesh and Atrahasis epics tell of the gods sending a flood simply because there were too many people making too much noise! In Genesis, however, sin, not pique, motivates the divine judgment. Gilgamesh portrays the gods as scared by the catastrophe they have unleashed and as quite unable to halt it; Genesis presents matters as always under God’s sovereign control. When God remembered Noah, the flood started to subside (8:1).

The flood is portrayed as a great act of decreation. Not only are all living creatures destroyed, but the water also covered the earth, just as it did before God declared, “Let the dry land appear” (1:2, 9 RSV). This act of decreation is followed by an act of re-creation. Once again, the dry land appears, plants and trees are seen, and the animals and Noah leave the ark to repopulate the earth. Indeed, like Adam and Eve, Noah is told to “be fruitful and multiply” (8:17; 9:1, 7 RSV). He is the new Adam, who by his obedience and sacrifice has transformed divine wrath into mercy (8:21; cf. 6:5–6).

Unfortunately, Noah, the one perfectly righteous man, also falls (9:20–21), and his sin is compounded by his son’s behavior (cf. Cain). So the world enters a downward spiral again, which culminates in another universal act of judgment at the Tower of Babel (11:1–9).

The Patriarchs. The stories of the patriarchs (Gen. 12–50) are five times as long as the opening chapters of the book. This clearly shows where the author’s interests lie: he wants to trace the origins of Israel and the twelve tribes. However, he wants to show more than that. He is putting forward the call of Abraham and his offspring as the answer to the problems of mankind set out in Gen. 3–11. The promises in 12:1–3 are more than a conglomeration of keywords such as “blessing”; they declare God’s intention to deal with the effects of sin on the human race.

There are four elements to the promises in Gen. 12 and following chapters. First, a land is promised (12:1, 7; 13:14–17). Second, this land will be inhabited by numerous descendants of Abraham (12:2; 13:15–16; 17:4–6). Third, Abraham and his descendants will enjoy a special covenant relationship with God (12:3; 17:4–13). Fourth, through Abraham and his descendants all the families of the earth will be blessed (12:3; 18:18; 22:18). A close reading of all the promise passages shows how the promises develop each time they are repeated. These repetitions make the promises more detailed and specific: “a land” (12:1) becomes “this land” (12:7) and “all the land ... forever” (13:15). Similar developments are discernible in the other elements of the promise.

The promises are so central to the message of Genesis that David Clines (29) is right in defining the theme of the Pentateuch: “The partial fulfillment—which implies the partial non-fulfillment—of the promise to or blessing of the patriarchs.” Nearly all the episodes in Gen. 12–50 may be related to these promises. The patriarchs gradually acquire land rights in Canaan (21:22–33; 23:1–20; 33:19). Slowly and with difficulty they have children (21:1–7; 25:21; 30:1). God’s blessing is evident in his protection of the patriarchs despite their folly (12:10–20; 20:1–18; 28:1–22; 34:1–35:5). Finally, through them some foreigners are blessed (14:15–24; 20:17–18; 21:22–24; 39:3–23; 47:13–25). As Clines observes, the fulfillment of these promises within the book of Genesis is but partial: subsequent books of the Pentateuch show a yet more complete fulfillment, and it is not until the book of Joshua that the Israelites (p 250) eventually acquire the land. Running through the story line is openness to the future, a mood alternating between hope and disappointment.

The promises announce God’s solution to the problems painted so graphically in Gen. 3–11. They also reaffirm his original intentions for creation. Abraham, like Noah before him, is a second-Adam figure. Adam was given the Garden of Eden; Abraham is promised the land of Canaan. God told Adam to be fruitful and multiply; Abraham is assured that God will make his descendants as numerous as the dust of the earth (13:16) and the stars of heaven (15:5). In Eden, God walked with Adam and Eve; Abraham is told to walk before God and be perfect (3:8; 17:1; cf. 6:9). Through his obedient and faithful response to these promises, the promise is turned into a divine oath guaranteeing its ultimate fulfillment (22:16–18; cf. 50:24).

The length and detail of the patriarchal narratives show that the origin of Israel and the twelve tribes is the chief concern of Genesis. However, this analysis of the promises and their relationship to the story line shows that Israel’s special relationship with God—and through that relationship their connection with land and to the nations—is even more important. It justifies Israel’s claim to the land: God promised it to them, and the Canaanites forfeited their right to it through their misbehavior (Gen. 19).

However, a subsidiary theme is particularly apparent in the second half of the book. The two longest stories are about feuds between Jacob and Esau in chapters 25–33 and between Joseph and his brothers in 37–50. Fratricidal strife is also prominent in the Cain and Abel episode of the Protohistory (4:1–16). There is no resolution of the conflict in chapter 4; indeed, the situation degenerates until the whole earth is filled with violence (6:11, 13). But in the case of the later patriarchs, there are quite different endings. Both stories present moving scenes of reconciliation. Esau runs to meet Jacob and throws his arms around him. Joseph declares he has forgiven his brothers: “You meant evil against me, but God meant it for good.... So do not fear; I will provide for you and for your little ones” (33:4; 50:20–21 RSV). On a number of occasions Abraham and Isaac act as peacemakers in disputes (13:8–10; 26:17–33).

In all these episodes the patriarchs are depicted as being anxious to make peace and forgive past wrongs. This goodwill shines all the more brightly when set against the unrepentant callousness of Cain and Lamech. The experience of the patriarchs, on the other hand, suggests that forgiveness and reconciliation within families and between nations is not only possible but also desirable. It is an appeal to its readers to forgive and make up with their enemies, whether they be close relatives or people of other races, for it is by so doing that the fulfillment of the promise comes that “through your offspring all nations on earth will be blessed” (22:18).

Genesis in the Canon

As the first book of the Hebrew and Christian canon, Genesis inevitably occupies a most important place. It sets the tone and agenda for the rest of Scripture. The book sets out in clear and simple terms some of the basic affirmations of the Bible. Direct allusion and quotation from it are rare in the OT, but its ideology is pervasive. In the NT direct quotation from it is quite frequent, and its ideas are treated as even more fundamental than the law.

Within the OT canon it heads the first section, the Torah, which is often translated as “the Law.” But this English term is too narrow a rendering of the Hebrew: “Instruction” would be better. The narratives of Genesis are profoundly instructive: they explain the nature of God, the role of humankind, God’s ideals for human behavior, and so on. Similarly, in the following books of the Pentateuch, it is not just the laws that instruct, but also the narratives in which the laws are given.

There is a particularly close relationship between Genesis and the next four books of the canon: Genesis gives essential background information for readers of Exodus to Deuteronomy. Without Genesis the plot of Exodus to Deuteronomy would be difficult to follow. In particular, the frequent references to the patriarchs and the promises made to them would be most obscure. However, it is difficult to define the relationship between the books of the Pentateuch more decisively.

Exodus to Deuteronomy does look like a biography of Moses. Exodus 2 tells of his birth, and Deut. 34 of his death, while in between he is the most important human character in the story. But Genesis seems almost superfluous to a biography of Moses. On closer reading more connections emerge between Genesis and the following books. The promises to the patriarchs constitute the foundation of Moses' ministry (Exod. 3:6–22). Other experiences of the patriarchs foreshadow episodes in Moses' life. For instance, Abraham's expulsion from Egypt is described in terms suggesting that it was like the exodus. The patriarchal (p 251) encounters with their future brides at wells prefigure Moses' meeting with his future wife (Gen. 12:20–13:3; 24:15–28; 29:1–14). These features make Genesis more than mere background to the life of Moses: they show his continuity with Israel's founding fathers.

In other ways Genesis sheds light on the teaching of the later books and complements them. Sacrifice figures quite importantly in Exodus to Deuteronomy, and in Genesis the patriarchs are depicted as offering sacrifice at various turning points in their careers. Furthermore, the sacrifices of Cain and Abel, Noah, and Isaac (Gen. 4; 8; 22) serve to teach key principles of sacrifice through narrative, just as the later books of the Law make similar points through precept. Genesis 1 teaches monotheism: the later laws insist that Israelites may worship only "the LORD." Genesis 2 sets out the Pentateuch's approach to relations between the sexes: passages such as Lev. 18 and 20 and Deut. 22 show how these ethical principles apply in some controversial situations.

Themes and personalities from Genesis reappear in many parts of Scripture. Psalms celebrate creation (e.g., , 104), lament the sinfulness of God's people (e.g., 106), and retell the patriarchal story (e.g., 105). The same themes reappear in the prophets, who also occasionally mention the patriarchs (Isa. 41:8; Hos. 12). The whole book of Ecclesiastes is a reflection on the state of humankind after the fall, which has made death universal and inevitable (Gen. 3:19).

The NT's debt to Genesis is also huge. In defining his views on marriage, Jesus appeals to Gen. 1:27 and 2:24 (Matt. 19:5). In a similar way Paul uses Gen. 3 to explain the nature of sin and to develop his doctrine of Christ as the second Adam (Rom. 3; 5; 7). Several writers hold up Abraham as a model of faith and obedience (Rom. 4; Heb. 11:17–22; James 2:21–23). And the Bible ends with Revelation's vision of the new Jerusalem, some of whose most notable features—a river, tree of life, gold, and jewels—all hark back to the original Garden of Eden (Rev. 21:1–22:5).

Genesis and Theology

The pervasive influence of Genesis on the rest of Scripture and on early Christian theology has already been mentioned, and it can hardly be explored further here. Suffice it to say that the themes of Genesis are both fundamental and central to biblical theology. That there is but one sovereign God, who created the world and continues to rule it by his power, is apparent from Gen. 1 and is foundational to the whole of Scripture and the theologies that have sprung from it.

Also apparent in the early chapters of Genesis is God’s concern for humankind. Inverting the beliefs of the ancient world that humans were designed to supply the gods with food, Genesis declares that God provides both the human and the beast with food. His concern for human well-being is also apparent in Gen. 2. This divine care for God’s creatures runs through the OT and in the NT climaxes in the incarnation.

Contrasting with the immorality of ancient deities and the permissiveness of modern gods, however, the God of Genesis is stern in his moral demands. Humanity’s sinfulness and particularly its violence lead to three massive acts of judgment: the flood, the scattering of the nations at Babel, and the destruction of Sodom. The rest of Scripture affirms God’s moral character: “You are of purer eyes than to see evil and cannot look on wrong” (Hab. 1:13 AT). This divine intolerance of sin is at once both the hope of the world and its greatest problem. It is its hope, in that God will not permit evil ultimately to triumph. It is its greatest problem: Genesis shows that even the most righteous are liable to sin, with disastrous consequences.

Yet Genesis looks forward in hope; the promise to the patriarchs comes to its climax: “In you all the families of the earth shall be blessed” (12:3 NRSV). The book affirms that the offspring of Abraham will ultimately bruise the serpent’s head. From pre-Christian times this verse (3:15) has rightly been read messianically. The grim realism of Genesis about the present human condition is lightened by the firm hope of redemption in the future.

Finally, through its accounts of forgiveness and reconciliation in chapters 33 and 50, Genesis points the way forward for human societies. It anticipates our Lord’s demand that we should forgive our enemies and demonstrate our discipleship by loving one another. See also Patriarchal Narratives

Bibliography

Alt, A. "The God of the Fathers." In Essays on Old Testament History and Religion. Blackwell, 1966; Brueggemann, W. Genesis. Interpretation. John Knox, 1982; Calvin, J. Commentary on Genesis. 2 vols. 1554, ed. and trans. J. King. Calvin Translation Society, 1847, 1965. Reprint, Banner of Truth Trust, 1975; Cassuto, U. A Commentary on the Book of Genesis. 2 parts. Magnes, 1961–64; Clines, D. J. A. The Theme of the Pentateuch. JSOT, 1978; Dalley, S. Myths from Mesopotamia. Oxford University Press, 1989; Driver, S. R. (p 252) The Book of Genesis. WC. Methuen, 1904; George, A. The Epic of Gilgamesh. Penguin, 2000; Gunkel, H. Genesis. 3d ed. Göttinger Handkommentar zum Alten Testament. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1910; Hamilton, V. The Book of Genesis. 2 vols. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1990–95; Hartley, J. Genesis. NIBCOT. Hendrickson/Paternoster, 2000; Kitchen, K. The Bible in Its World. Paternoster, 1977; Louth, A., ed. Genesis 1–11. ACCSOT 1. InterVarsity, 2001; Millard, A., and D. Wiseman, eds. Essays on the Patriarchal Narratives. InterVarsity, 1980; Moberly, R. W. L. The Old Testament of the Old Testament. Fortress, 1992; Rad, G. von. Genesis, trans. J. Marks. Rev. ed. OTL. SCM, 1972; Speiser, E. A. Genesis. AB 1. Doubleday, 1964. 3d ed., 1979; Van Seters, J. Abraham in History and Tradition. Yale University Press, 1975; Vaux, R. de. The Early History of Israel. 2 vols. Darton, Longman & Todd, 1978; Wellhausen, J. Prolegomena to the History of Ancient Israel. 1878. Meridian, 1957; Wenham, G. Genesis. 2 vols. WBC. Word, 1987–94; idem. Pentateuch. Vol. 1 of Exploring the Old Testament. SPCK, 2003; idem. Story as Torah. T&T Clark, 2000; Westermann, C. Genesis, trans. J. Scullion. 3 vols. SPCK/Fortress, 1984–86; Whybray, R. N. The Making of the Pentateuch. JSOT, 1987; Williamson, P. Abraham, Israel and the Nations. Sheffield Academic Press, 2000; Young, D. The Biblical Flood. Eerdmans, 1995.

Gordon J. Wenham

Genre

Wellek and Warren say: "Genre should be conceived, we think, as a grouping of literary works based, theoretically, upon both outer form (specific meter or structure) and upon inner form (attitude, tone, purpose—more crudely, subject and audience)" (221). This definition, however, is hotly contested in today's postmodern climate. The current debate centers on whether it is descriptive or prescriptive. Does it provide rules for interpreting a work or merely describe what some works have in common? If it is only descriptive, it cannot function as a category for understanding a literary creation.

History of the Discipline

Plato took a descriptive approach, identifying two types—drama (with action) and epic (centering on people). Aristotle demurred, defining genre as mimesis, or imitation, and arguing that each (comedy, tragedy, epic) was to be interpreted accordingly. The Roman poet Horace went further, arguing that each had interpretative laws governing it (with eight genres—comedy, tragedy, epic, lyric, pastoral, satire, elegy, epigram). For the next several centuries the Platonic view dominated, with some exceptions such as Martin Luther, who built on Aquinas to develop the idea of sensus literalis, arguing that a statement can be understood literally on the basis of its generic context. In the neoclassical period (seventeenth–eighteenth centuries), Aristotle was rediscovered, and the view of genre as mimesis came to the fore. Prescriptive laws developed, but they on the whole were arbitrary, and the Romantic period revolted and considered each work an autonomous piece of art in process of becoming. Thus, many abolished all generic classifications.

The tension between the descriptive and the prescriptive has continued to the present and parallels the development of hermeneutical theory. Ricoeur (“Hermeneutics,” 112–28) sees three periods: (1) a classificatory approach (classical period); (2) an epistemological understanding following Schleiermacher and Dilthey (nineteenth to early twentieth centuries); (3) an ontological approach, from Heidegger through Gadamer to the present. Representing the classical understanding have been the New Critics (seeing genre as a formal category), literary scholars such as E. D. Hirsch (calling for an “intrinsic genre” in every work that guides interpretation), and John Searle (whose speech-act theory calls for the interpreter to allow the work to guide the interpretation), as well as most evangelical approaches. The autonomous view is upheld by recent schools such as deconstruction and reader-response criticism, which state that genres intermix and cannot be classified (Derrida).

Genre as Classification, Epistemology, and Ontology

The solution to the debate is to recognize that genre contains all three dimensions: it classifies a literary work, is part of the process of coming to understanding (epistemology), and develops a literary world into which one enters (ontology). In literary circles there is also a growing realization that generic categories change on the basis of periods of literary interest. Aune speaks of “the necessity of a diachronic, or historical, study of generic types in addition to a consideration of their internal or external form” (“Problem,” 9). The genre of various biblical works, such as apocalyptic, must be determined by the characteristics discovered through meticulous study of the many Jewish apocalyptic writings of 200 BCE–100 CE. Baird notes five criteria for a generic type, characteristics that (1) set it apart from other generic types, (2) recur with enough frequency to distinguish it from others, (3) form a logically coherent pattern within the set, (4) persist in writings before and after the time of writing, and (5) contain a similar style, language, and content (387–88).

(p 253) The epistemological aspect is identified by Gerhart, who introduces the reader into the process via four aspects: the text determines meaning (Hirsch), leading to a fusion of past and present as the reader is placed within a process of tradition (Gadamer), resulting in a new reality structured by a number of texts (Todorov), thus allowing the reader to produce an individual work from the text (Ricoeur). This of course leads to a polyvalent view of meaning, as each reader constructs his/her own understanding. Here we move into the ontological dimension, in which writing as discourse becomes an event that is autonomous from the author and takes on a life of its own. It develops its own “life-world” and invites the reader to enter that world and unite with the text (Ricoeur, “Distanciation”). Thus, genre is no longer a prescriptive system but simply the matrix that guides interpreters in constructing their own worlds of meaning.

Yet one wonders if these opposed poles are the final word. Gerhart (“Diagnostics,” 145–53) provides a bridge from the subjectivist to the objectivist aspects via three stages of interpretation: (1) An initial reflective awareness of the text occurs. (2) Possible meanings (polysemy) are sifted as the interpreter verifies the more likely and constructs the sense and meanings of the text. (3) This opens up new vistas of meaning as the text becomes a model “in front of” the reader. In doing so, she sets Hirsch and Ricoeur side by side. Hirsch uses Wittgenstein’s concept of “language-games” to separate meaning (the classification side) from significance (the epistemological and ontological sides) and sees both as valid aspects of interpretation. Vanhoozer (337–50) also weds the three dimensions by calling genre “a rule-governed form of social behavior” (following Searle). Genre as communicative act demands competence in the language-games of the various literary types, and understanding can come only as the reader uses the proper rules according to the sociohistorical location of the literary work. These rules lead to a discovery of the life-world of the text and guide the reader into that textual world. Thus “the concept of genre ... describes the illocutionary act at the level of the whole, placing the parts within an overall unity that serves a meaningful purpose” (341, italics his). In this way genre not only classifies the form but also allows one to experience the world and to connect in a new way with existence. Thereby the different forms of the Bible can not only be understood but also encountered as divine truth. In them God’s voice can be experienced anew.

Bibliography

Aune, D. The New Testament in Its Literary Environment. Westminster, 1987; idem. "The Problem of the Genre of the Gospels: A Critique of C. H. Talbert's What Is a Gospel?" In Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels. Gospel Perspectives 2, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham. JSOT, 1981; Baird, J. A. "Genre Analysis as a Method of Historical Criticism." SBL Proceedings 1972. Vol. 2; Cross, A. "Genres of the New Testament." Pages 402–11 in Dictionary of New Testament Background, ed. C. A. Evans and S. Porter. InterVarsity, 2000; Derrida, J. "Law of Genre." Glyph 7 (1980): 207–9; Genette, G. "Genres, 'Types,' Modes." Poétique 8 (1977): 389–421; Gerhart, M. "Generic Studies: Their Renewed Importance in Religious and Literary Interpretation." JAAR 45 (1977): 309–25; idem. "Paul Ricoeur's Notion of 'Diagnostics': Its Function in Literary Interpretation." JR 56 (1976): 137–56; Hirsch, E. D. The Aims of Interpretation. University of Chicago Press, 1976; Osborne, G. "Genre Criticism—Sensus Literalis." TJ 4 (1983): 1–27; Ricoeur, P. "The Hermeneutical Function of Distanciation." Philosophy Today 17 (1973): 129–41; idem. "The Task of Hermeneutics." Philosophy Today 17 (1973): 112–28; Searle, J. Speech Acts. Cambridge University Press, 1969; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. Zondervan, 1992; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998; Wellek, R., and A. Warren. Theory of Literature. Harcourt, Brace & World, 1956.

Grant R. Osborne

Geography

The geographical investigation of a region typically explores that place either through the lens of physical geography or through the lens of human geography. Physical geography is concerned with the surface of the earth and the processes that change it, pursuing questions related to the geology, topography, hydrology, climate, plants, and animals associated with the region. By contrast, human geography is primarily concerned with the way humans are influenced by the realities of physical geography and the ways they interact with it. This type studies urbanization patterns, use of the land, economic advantages, politics, and transportation within a region.

Because the events and people of the Bible are intimately linked to time and place, both the realities of physical and human geography find their way into its pages. This occurs at several levels. First of all, every inspired author of the OT and NT lived and worked under the realities of a given place. That means that their setting influenced all their daily habits and their perspective on matters such as water, wildlife, and travel. Since this geographical worldview was intimately connected to the way they thought and wrote, we will have a clearer understanding of their perspective on matters like dew and (p 254)rain when we understand the authors' experience with dew and rain in their cultural context. Second, the events on which these authors reported were also greatly influenced by their geographical setting: for example, the location of battles, the motivation for those battles, and the lines of retreat. Our understanding of those events will grow with our understanding of geography. Third, there are times when the biblical authors intentionally bring matters of geography into the communication process in order to artfully manipulate both the message received by the reader and the reader's emotional response to it. To miss the significance of the geography used in those texts is to miss a portion of the message the author is trying to deliver.

Because the Bible is affected by geography in these three ways, specialists in the land of the Bible carefully pursue these matters to enhance their understanding of the events recorded and the message associated with those events. This pursuit may take one of two forms: historical geography or literary geography. Historical geography inquires into both the physical and cultural geography of the Bible lands to assess its impact on the history and culture of the events reported. Edward Robinson (1838) did the first such scientific investigation of the Holy Land. This work was complemented by the explorations of William F. Lynch (1849), the writings of William F. Thompson (1883), and the monograph by George Adam Smith (1936). Similar investigation of historical geography has been advanced in our own time through scholars like Yohanan Aharoni, Barry Beitzel, Nelson Glueck, Efraim Orni, Elisha Efrat, and Carl Rasmussen.

Historical geography has tirelessly pursued the placement of cities and regions on the map while answering questions that only the study of geography might answer for us. Consider two such examples. In Judg. 4, we find that Jabin, the king of Hazor, has been oppressing the Israelites cruelly for twenty years. He was able to establish and hold this power both at the Lord's indulgence and through the use of nine hundred iron chariots. When the children of Israel turn from their idolatry, the Lord designs a battle plan that will eliminate those chariots and remove Jabin's influence from the region. The Israelite general who is to carry out that plan is named Barak. But when Deborah carries the Lord's instructions to Barak, he responds with stammering hesitation, "If you will go with me, I will go; but if you will not go with me, I will not go" (Judg. 4:8 NRSV). With God's plan in hand, why would Barak hesitate to advance? The answer to the question lies in the geography reported in the text. Barak was instructed to muster the Israelite forces on Mt. Tabor. This prominent mountain rises dramatically to tower eight hundred feet above the level floor of the Jezreel Valley. Since chariot forces charging down this valley would be unable to mount an attack up this rising terrain, it appears to be the perfect place for infantry to wait for the intruding chariots. But the Lord's instructions call for Barak to leave this natural citadel and charge the advancing chariots. This plan, which defied logic but not faith, causes Barak to hesitate. And when the Lord brings a miraculous rainstorm that floods the plain, disabling the chariots before the charging infantry, logic joins faith in seeing this as a masterful plan. The divine plan requires Barak to step out in faith. His hesitation is directly related to the geography of God's plan and the lack of faith he displays upon hearing it.

Another example may be found in Mark 4:35–41, where a violent windstorm nearly takes the lives of the disciples as they attempt to cross the Sea of Galilee. Apparently, Jesus has been seeking some solitude after a time of intense teaching and ministry on the northwest shore. At evening, Jesus invites the disciples to join him in taking a boat from the west shore of the lake to the east. Along the way, they are met by a furious squall that threatens to swamp the boat. Given the fact that a number of these men are professional fishermen on this very lake, why would they have agreed to set off in weather conditions that could put them in such peril? The answer to that question may again be found in geography. A variety of winds can make their influence felt on the Sea of Galilee. Some are quite predictable; others are not. The sharquia (Arabic for "east") wind is an unexpected downdraft that develops in the lake region during the evening hours when the temperature difference between the surface of the lake and the 1,300-foot ridges above the eastern shore is just right. As heat radiates away from those ridges, the cold air from above can accelerate down the slopes to replace the warmer air at the lake's surface. These winds can reach sixty miles per hour, rousing the placid surface into a frothing bath with six-foot waves. Since this wind typically occurs under a clear evening sky only when temperature differences are just right, there is no way the disciples can see it coming. That is why they do not hesitate to follow Jesus into the boat that will become the setting for the dramatic miracle that closes the story.

(p 255) A second way in which geography plays a role in interpreting the Bible is through what we call literary geography. This form of literary analysis is new to biblical studies but has had a longer history within secular literary analysis under the guise of local-color writing and regionalism. This form of geographical inquiry leans heavily on the insights of the physical and human geographer but then pursues the literary function of those references in the text. A close reading demonstrates that biblical authors and poets strategically use, reuse, and nuance geography in order to influence the emotions, understanding, and perceptions of their readers. Consequently, Bar-Efrat concludes, “places in the narrative are not merely geographical facts, but are to be regarded as literary elements in which fundamental significance is embodied” (194).

The familiar story of David and Goliath (1 Sam. 17) provides an example of geography at work as a literary mechanism. Throughout the book the author is working aggressively at many levels to elevate the reader’s perception of David while allowing the stock of Saul to fall. The story of David and Goliath plays an important role in shaping those perspectives, and the geography used in this story strongly influences the way we read this event. The very first words of the narrative occupy the reader with the geographical setting of this classic battle. The Philistine army has gathered at Socoh in Judah, encamped at Ephes Dammim, between Socoh and Azekah, while Saul and his army have camped in the eastern portion of the Elah Valley (17:1). A careful, literary reading of this geography illustrates that the detail and precision are designed to influence the reader’s perception of all that follows.

The battle will occur within the Judean Shephelah. The Shephelah lies just to the west of the Judean Highlands, separating the Israelites and the Philistines. Topographically, the Shephelah consists of a series of low ridges and wide U-shaped valleys oriented on an east-west axis. These unassuming valleys are critical both to the economy and defense of Saul’s kingdom. This region is noted for its plentiful grain fields and sycamore trees. But what is more, these valleys are the buffer zone that separates Israel from the Philistines. The nation that controls these valleys enjoys both economic advantages and a higher level of national security. As the story begins, the reader is provided with troubling news. The Philistines have made a significant incursion into the Elah Valley, penetrating all the way to Socoh. Earlier, when the Israelites asked Samuel for a king, they may have had just such a scenario in mind. They asked for a king who would go out before them and fight their battles (1 Sam. 8:20). If Saul is going to show his worth, the geography suggests that this is the time to do it. But as the reader meets Saul in this story, we find him to be anything but that kind of leader. Goliath calls for a man to fight with him; Saul is dismayed and terrified, failing to inspire his soldiers to action even in the face of this national crisis (17:11). But David is all that Saul is not. Once he arrives on the scene, things change quickly. David dispatches Goliath and immediately the Israelite army surges forward, chasing the Philistines out of the Elah Valley and plundering their camp on the way. Given any other setting, this would have been a remarkable military victory over the Philistines. But this battle acquires the Elah Valley for the kingdom of Israel, securing both economic and military advantages for the victor. Hence, it is no wonder that David is heralded as a national hero at the expense of King Saul. Thus, the further demise of Saul and the rise of David are enhanced in this story through the careful and strategic use of geography in the storytelling process.

Another example of the literary use of geography is found in the book of Genesis, where the author uses “drought” to compare and contrast the faith of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The life and family of each is threatened by the arrival of a drought: Abraham (Gen. 12:10–20), Isaac (26:1–7), and Jacob (46:1–7). This form of famine was a terrible tragedy for those living in the rain-dependent reaches of the promised land. A drought would typically cause the residents of Canaan to migrate toward greener pastures. But there is more to these stories than the inconvenience of migration, for each man is confronted with the question of whether to leave the promised land. Although these narratives are widely separated from one another in the book of Genesis, careful structuring of each story as well as the issue of drought invites the reader to compare and contrast the responses of these three men to this challenge. In the end, Jacob is the one who demonstrates the highest level of spiritual commitment to the divine plan. He literally has to be pushed out of the promised land by the Lord in a theophany at Beersheba. By contrast, Abram demonstrates the lowest level of spiritual commitment. The narrative shows him rushing from the land with little thought for the consequences to the promises he had received earlier in the chapter. In the end, the author of Genesis uses famine both to link these three stories, to create (p 256) tension in the plot, and to contrast the spiritual commitment of these three men—yet another example of geography’s importance for proper theological interpretation of Scripture.

See also Earth/Land

Bibliography

Aharoni, Y. The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, trans. A. Rainey. Westminster, 1979; Bar-Efrat, S. Narrative Art in the Bible. JSOT Bible and Literature Series 17. Almond, 1989; Beck, J. “Faith in the Face of Famine: The Narrative-Geographical Function of Famine in Genesis.” Journal of Biblical Storytelling 11 (2002): 58–66; idem. “Geography and the Narrative Shape of Numbers 13.” BSac 157 (2000): 170–79; idem. “Geography as Irony: The Narrative-Geographical Shaping of Elijah’s Duel with the Prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18).” Scandinavian Journal of the Old Testament 18 (2003): 291–302; idem. “The Storyteller and Narrative Geography.” Pages 165–96 in Translators as Storytellers. Studies in Biblical Literature 25. Peter Lang, 2000; idem. “Why Did Moses Strike Out? The Narrative-Geographical Shaping of Moses’ Disqualification.” WTJ 65

(2003): 135–41; Beitzel, B. The Moody Bible Atlas of Bible Lands. Moody, 1985; Glueck, N. The River Jordan. McGraw Hill, 1968; Lynch, W. Narrative of the United States' Expedition to the Jordan River and the Dead Sea. Lea & Blanchard, 1849; Orni, E., and E. Efrat. Geography of Israel. 4th ed. Israel Universities Press, 1980; Rasmussen, C. Zondervan Atlas of the Bible. Zondervan, 1989; Robinson, E. Biblical Researches in Palestine and the Adjacent Regions 1838 and 1852. 3 vols. Universitas Booksellers, 1970; Smith, G. The Historical Geography of the Holy Land. Harper & Row, 1966; Thompson, W. The Land and the Book. 3 vols. T. Nelson & Sons, 1881.

John A. Beck

Gnosticism

Sometimes used in reference to modern thinkers, “Gnosticism” as a historical term is associated with various heterodox sects that emerged between the second and fifth centuries CE. Some of these sects proved to be of little lasting consequence, others posed serious challenges to the faith of the church, and still others gave way to such important religious movements as Mandaism and Manichaeism. Reliant on biblical figures and terminology, Gnosticism has sometimes been regarded as a “parasitic religion.” The description is aptly ambiguous, for it is often unclear whether a given gnostic sect should be regarded as a variation within Judaism or Christianity, or as a religion in its own right, one that, though building on prior traditions, makes a decisive break from its theological and exegetical heritage. Much of what is commonly considered gnostic seems to reflect an accommodation to the Platonic philosophical orientation of the culture (in this respect, Harnack’s edict that Gnosticism represents the “acute hellenization of Christianity” is still apropos) or a radicalization of the demands of the parent religion (resulting most notably in ascetic practices). Both the libertine and ascetic expressions of Gnosticism are rooted, paradoxically, in the common vision of an ontologically debased cosmos.

Sources

For years the most important witnesses to the gnostic teachers have been the church fathers. In this connection, Irenaeus’s Against the Heresies, written toward the end of the second century, is most important. Other fathers worthy of mention are, in the West, Tertullian (e.g., The Prescription against the Heretics) and Hippolytus (Refutation of All Heresies); in the East, Clement of Alexandria (Stromateis), Origen (Commentary on the Gospel of John), and Epiphanius of Salamis (Panarion). A handful of gnostic texts have also been preserved in Askew Codex, Bruce Codex, and Berlin Codex. Following the discovery of the Nag Hammadi codices in 1946, the pool of sources has widened considerably. Even more significantly, the Nag Hammadi library has allowed scholars to examine the Gnostics on their own terms and not simply from the testimony of their opponents.

Definition

The most widely quoted definition of “Gnosticism” occurs in a statement prepared at the 1966 Messina Colloquium. Differentiating between “gnosis,” which is broadly defined as the “knowledge of divine mysteries reserved for the elite,” and “Gnosticism” as a specific phenomenon developing in the second century, the authors of the Messina “Final Document” see the latter as involving a coherent series of characteristics that can be summarized in the idea of a divine spark in man, deriving from the divine realm, fallen into this world of fate, birth and death, and needing to be awakened by the divine counterpart of the self in order to be finally reintegrated. Compared with other conceptions of a “devolution” of the divine, this idea is based ontologically on the conception of a downward movement of the divine whose periphery (often called Sophia or Ennoia) had to submit to the fate of entering into a crisis and producing—even if only indirectly—this world, upon which it cannot turn its back. (Bianchi xxvi–xxvii)

While this is adequate as a generalization, methodological objections to this definition have been raised on two levels. In the first place, it is sometimes charged that the Messina document (p 257) artificially separates second-century Gnosticism from its first-century antecedents. The stipulation that “Gnosticism” was of second-century origin not only may serve to slant subsequent phenomenological analysis of the movement, but also prejudges the question as to its formative influences. Second, although the definition certainly applies to the majority of gnostic teachings, there are important exceptions to the Messina rule. For example, though neither Marcion nor Justin the Gnostic espouse systems of devolution or original divine consubstantiality, both are regularly considered Gnostics.

But a more generalized definition may not be the answer either. For example, Jonas has suggested that Gnosticism simply reflects a soteriological system in which the obtaining of gnosis or knowledge is central. This is hardly useful, for by this definition Judaism, Christianity, and Islam could also count as “gnostic.” Thus, the dilemma: on the one side, an overspecific description of “Gnosticism” hazards setting up an uncomfortably narrow Procrustean bed; on the other side, an overly broad definition is in danger of saying at once too much and too little. Perhaps the most useful definition is one that focuses strictly on the characteristically gnostic distinction between the transcendent Deity and the creator-demiurge (cf. Plato, Timaeus), the latter being regularly identified with the Creator of Gen. 1–2.

The Gnostic Myth in Outline

Although there is a wide degree of variation in the details of the gnostic myth, a basic outline may be distilled from a representative number of systems. For most Gnostics, humanity is intrinsically good, in fact, consubstantial with the divine. But after being created, humanity falls into a protracted stupor; it forgets its divine origins and is tricked by the malevolent creator into thinking that there is none higher than the creator. Taking pity on humanity, the true God then sends the Redeemer figure down through the heavens in order to reveal knowledge and thereby to awaken the divine spark within humanity. Those who recognize this divine inner spark have secured their redemption, proved themselves among the elect, and transcended the evils of material creation.

Origins

Certainly the most pressing questions in current studies of Gnosticism are those regarding origins: (1) What are the philosophical and religious forces that influenced Gnostic doctrine? (2) In what religious grouping did Gnosticism immediately begin to take shape? To the first question various answers have been offered. Hinduism, Buddhism, Babylonian astral speculation, Iranian mythology, Canaanite religion, Jewish apocalyptic, and Greek mystery religions (to name some) have all been credited at various points for having exerted some kind of influence on Gnosticism. Nor, in the religious ferment of the Hellenistic age, is such a constellation of influences impossible, although some of these theorized backgrounds cancel each other out.

Toward identifying the religious milieu in which Gnosticism arose, the comparative methods employed in the history-of-religions school, which focus on isolated motifs, have proved to be of limited use. More recently, broader comparisons have led to a narrowing of options: pre-Christian Judaism or Christianity. The former was first seriously proposed over a century ago by Friedländer. He points out that Eusebius attests to pre-Christian Jewish philosophers who saw a literal reading of Torah as unnecessary. Philo and Filastrius speak of similar such groups in Alexandria; these also had a developed system of “powers,” a strong tendency toward allegorization, and an antinomian stance. Perhaps because much European scholarship of the time was generally disinclined to accept Second Temple Judaism as a formative religious force, these arguments failed to win support for a number of decades. Today, scholars like Quispel, Perkins, and Pearson have vigorously renewed the case for Gnosticism's pre-Christian Jewish origin. The position no doubt receives added support from the Nag Hammadi texts: several writings, for example, the Apocalypse of Adam and the Apocryphon of John, contain traces of Christian redaction but no evidence that the basic document was anything other than Jewish.

For those who subscribe to the Christian origins of Gnosticism (Yamauchi, Pétrement, Logan), the absence of specifically Christian motifs is no evidence of Jewish origin. The OT was after all the Christians' first Bible. Second, it is argued that the antinomian character of Gnosticism is best understood as an outcome of Christian reflections on law. Finally, a number of stock motifs within Gnosticism (a savior/redeemer figure, realized eschatology, freedom-giving grace) can hardly have had their starting point anywhere else but in Christianity.

Yet some of these arguments that see Gnosticism as strictly a Christian development often (p 258) seem to presuppose an overly sharp discontinuity between Christianity and Judaism. What is more, the alleged conceptual parallels between the gnostic texts and the NT writings sometimes seem to rely on a dubious and over-Gnosticized reading of the latter. Unavoidably, judgments concerning the origins and nature of Gnosticism are inextricably tied to a (prior) interpretation of the NT, including its cosmology, anthropology, soteriology, and eschatology. To some extent, the present impasse in the question of gnostic origins (and with it the sense that scholars are often speaking past one another) reflects an equally disparate understanding of the nature of early Christianity.

If it is all but impossible to draw a tight and unilinear connection between Gnosticism and its immediate religious context, it is at least possible to explain the emergence of Gnosticism through other categories. There is a good deal of evidence that Gnosticism, at least in its initial form, arose as an interpretative movement that sought to respond to metaphysical and theodicean problems raised by Scripture. Stroumsa and Fossum have convincingly argued that certain Hellenistic Jews, embarrassed by the anthropomorphisms of the Torah, resorted in Platonic fashion to separating the creator god from the Most High God so as to avoid debasing the transcendent Deity. The introduction of the demiurge into the biblical account of creation may also have afforded means of dealing with the question of evil. Without reflecting negatively on the true God, the entrance of sin into the world could thereby be attributed to one who made the less-than-perfect world and was himself morally deficient. On this reconstruction, it is also possible that as those maintaining a demiurgical reading of Genesis came into conflict with the larger community, they continued to galvanize their position so that their portrayals of the demiurge became increasingly negative. So, for example, when in gnostic interpretation the god of Isaiah declares, “Apart from me there is no God” (Isa. 45:5), far from being a statement of the Creator’s superiority, the divine assertion only betrays his peevish arrogance and ignorance of transcendent reality. This consistent turning of Scripture on its head, for which the Gnostics are well known, is principally governed by their cosmogony.

If this account of gnostic origins is accurate, then the labeling of gnostic interpretation as “protest exegesis” (Rudolph) risks missing the point. Gnosticism was a protest of sorts, but it was not interested in protest for protest’s sake. Instead, it appears that the very first Gnostics were at bottom trying to reconcile the data of Scripture with the philosophical assumptions inherent in their Hellenistic worldview. The resulting synthesis involved not only the development of elaborate mythological systems, but also a thoroughgoing rereading of Scripture. While it is possible, as some suggest, that the rise of this hermeneutical movement was occasioned by a particular social or political crisis (perhaps the failure of the apocalyptic vision and hence a disillusionment with the traditional God of Judaism), this remains only conjecture.

Gnosticism Then and Now

Understanding Gnosticism is an important step toward ascertaining its possible influences on the NT. It has been argued, for example, that Paul’s Corinthian opponents adhered to a gnostic-like over-realized eschatology. Gnostic-style dualism has also been said to lie behind the writing of many of the so-called Deutero-Pauline letters (e.g., Colossians, Ephesians); concerns with a particular brand of Gnosticism, docetism, are also apparent in the Johannine corpus (e.g., John 20:27; 1 John 4:2). It remains highly controversial whether and to what degree the earliest church regarded gnostic thought as consistent with normative faith.

By the end of the second century, the church fathers (and rabbis) were eager to refute Gnostic claims. In almost every respect, gnostic teaching stood at odds with emerging orthodoxy. Perhaps there is some truth to Williams’s suggestion that it was Gnosticism’s thoroughgoing integration of Scripture with prevailing philosophical trends that accounted for its eventual superfluity and demise. Yet the basic ideas of Gnosticism live on to this day, in both conservative and liberal theologies, and in ethical systems that downplay the role of the body and creation. Ancient Gnosticism also anticipates certain strains of modern and postmodern thought. Seeing self-authentication as the means of transcending a hostile universe, Gnosticism has been rightly deemed the forerunner of modern existentialism. It is equally appropriate to compare Gnostic hermeneutics with deconstruction's emphasis on the instability of the linguistic sign: both rely on the metaphysical judgment that creation is fundamentally incoherent. For Gnosticism, existentialism, and deconstructionism alike, salvation/knowledge is obtained individualistically, quite apart from the mediation of communal interpretations and structures.

See also Nag Hammadi

(p 259)Bibliography

Bianchi, U., ed. The Origins of Gnosticism. SHR 12. Brill, 1967; Fossum, J. The Name of God and the Angel of the Lord. WUNT 36. Mohr/Siebeck, 1985; Friedländer, M. Der vorchristliche jüdische Gnosticismus. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1898; Grant, R. Gnosticism and Early Christianity. Rev. ed. Harper & Row, 1966; Harnack, A. Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius. 2 vols. Hinrichs, 1893–1904; Jonas, H. The Gnostic Religion. 2d ed. Beacon, 1963; King, K. Images of the Feminine in Gnosticism. SAC 4. Fortress, 1988; Logan, A. Gnostic Truth and Christian Heresy. Clark, 1996; Pearson, B. Gnosticism, Judaism, and Egyptian Christianity. SAC. Fortress, 1990; Perkins, P. The Gnostic Dialogue. Paulist, 1980; Pétrement, S. A Separate God. HarperCollins, 1990; Quispel, G. "Der gnostische Anthropos und die jüdische Tradition." ErJb 22 (1953): 195–234; Robinson, J. M. "From Easter to Valentinus (or to the Apostles' Creed)." JBL 101 (1982): 5–37; Rudolph, K. Gnosis. Harper & Row, 1983; Stroumsa, G. A. G. Another Seed. NHS 24. Brill, 1984; Williams, M. A. Rethinking "Gnosticism". Princeton University Press, 1996; Yamauchi, E. Pre-Christian Gnosticism. Eerdmans, 1973.

Nicholas Perrin

God, Attributes of See God, Doctrine of

God, Doctrine of

What a person believes about God or does not believe about God is of great moment. A. W. Tozer (9) put it powerfully: "The history of mankind will probably show that no people has ever risen above its religion, and man's spiritual history will positively demonstrate that no religion has ever been greater than its idea of God." To seek to understand the biblical ideas of God is no trivial pursuit.

The theological interpretation of the God of Scripture asks normative questions of the biblical deposit. What ought we to believe about God in the light of this portrayal? How ought we to live, given that light? To expect normative answers to such questions assumes an authority of the text and an access to its meaning and an ability to frame its significance in such a way as to bridge the then of the writing and the now of the present reader. A whole cluster of theological terms comes into play to establish the bona fides of such a pursuit: revelation, inspiration, reliability, perspicuity, supremacy, sufficiency, canonicity, and illumination by the Holy Spirit.

God in the Biblical Texts

In the canonical presentation God comes before us in myriad ways. God is the majestic Creator in the creation narrative (Gen. 1:1–2:3), the awesome warrior celebrated in Moses' song (Exod. 15:1–18), the holy God of Leviticus, the righteous God of the proverb (Prov. 20:23), the living God of prophetic claim (Isa. 44:1–20), the heavenly Father of prayer (Matt. 6:7–15), the waiting father in parable (Luke 15:11–32), and the sovereign God of apostolic epistle (Eph. 1:3–12). This list is by no means exhaustive.

With regard to the specifics, the wise course is to follow the Scriptures' own "storied" portrayals of God and thus observe the flow of redemptive history.

The Creator God. The scriptural account begins with God as the majestic Creator of the heavens and the earth (Gen. 1:1–2). Like a king, God says the word and his will is effected. Like a Hebrew worker, a week is the divine rhythm of creation, with six days of labor, and then rest (2:2–3). The created order is good, and with the creation of God's image bearer, very good. The picture is of a number of harmonies—between God and humankind, between man and woman, and between man and woman and other creatures. The primal word is one of blessing (e.g., 1:28). But then comes the rupture and cursing results (e.g., 3:17).

The mystery of evil's appearance is never fully explained. The serpent is like a dark parallel to Melchizedek (i.e., without genealogy). Scripture is non-postulational, not given to theory. It has been up to theologians and philosophers to attempt theodicies (e.g., Irenaeus, Augustine, Leibniz, Hick). The canonical response is to include the story of Job rather than a philosophical treatise. What the biblical account goes on to present is how the good God recovers the creation and fulfills his purposes. Put another way, Scripture is more interested in the survival-of-evil problem than its arrival—"How long, O LORD?" is a frequent question. As in Job, the ending is the key.

The Grieving God. Humankind now lives outside Eden. The divine responses are grief, judgment, and grace (Gen. 6:5–8). A new start is made as Noah and his kin emerge from the flood of judgment (ch. 8). But the declension continues, and Babel represents the nadir (11). Creation needs reclamation. Disorder needs to give way to order. And God has a plan. Importantly, God is portrayed in these events with something analogous to the emotional life of his image bearer. There is divine pathos as A. J. Heschel observed (Prophets, 2:3).

The Calling God. God calls Abraham and makes him a promise (12:1–3). The outworking of that promise becomes the spinal column of (p 260) canonical Scripture. Abraham’s name will become a great one, and it has. Some today refer to Judaism, Christianity, and Islam as Abrahamic faiths because of the importance that each places on Abraham as either the paradigmatic man of obedience (Judaism), or the man of faith (Christianity), or the man of submission (Islam).

In addition, a great nation will emerge from Abraham’s stock. Through Abraham and his progeny, the whole earth will be blessed. The language of blessing that pertained to the initial creation reappears. The Abraham story will begin a stream of history crucial to the divine project. But as the biblical story line unfolds, the promise comes under threat again and again.

The Redeemer God. The threat to the promise’s realization becomes particularly acute during Israel’s years in Egypt (Exod. 1–2). With Joseph, Abraham’s descendants begin so well in Egypt, but eventually they become an enslaved people. Their oppression by Pharaoh reaches to heaven itself, and God responds by calling Moses to the task of leading Israel to the promised land. God sets his people free. He redeems them from slavery (chs. 3–15). The cluster of events constituting that liberation becomes paradigmatic for so much that follows, whether on view as God’s people returning from exile (Isa. 40–55) or as the cross of Jesus (Luke 9:31).

The Gracious and Merciful God. Once beyond Pharaoh’s reach, Moses—who led God’s people so successfully out of Egypt—asks to see this God’s glory (Exod. 33:18). The divine answer comes as close to a systematic articulation of the being and attributes of God as the Scripture provides. God reveals his name, which in effect is a window into the nature and character of the Deity (33:19). He is the gracious and merciful God, the slow-to-anger God, and the forgiving God. However, this God also judges wickedness (34:5–7). This much Moses can know, and yet only the back parts of God are to be seen (33:21–23). There are depths to God that Moses cannot access. This God can only be known on God’s own terms, and as the subsequent rendering of God in Leviticus makes plain, approached in worship only on God’s own terms.

The One God. The God who created the heavens and the earth, and who is the maker of Israel, has no consort and is part of no pantheon. This is the stand-alone God without rival (Deut. 6:4–5). This was the lesson that God’s people had to learn time and time again. So important is this claim that it is to become the heart of Israel's religious pedagogy (6:6–9). A culture shows its values in what must be passed on to its children. The confession of the oneness of Israel's God is central to its confession of faith and value.

The Triune God. The coming of Jesus requires nothing less than a reconfiguring of the divine name. Disciples are to be baptized now in the one name of God, which is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (Matt. 28:18–20). The divine oneness—so prominent in the earlier Testament and reaffirmed by Jesus earlier in this very Gospel account—is now seen as complex in its nature (cf. 19:17 and 28:18–20). The story of the one God now involves Father stories, Son stories, and Holy Spirit stories in ways that so overlap as to underline the reality of the oneness and yet preserve internal distinctiveness. And in the case of Jesus, the biblical authors write in such a way as to maintain the reality of his humanity without jettisoning his divinity (as John's testimony shows).

The Forgiving God. The God who forgives is a prominent aspect of the divine name, as noticed in an earlier section. That accent continues in the newer Testament. Jesus commissions his disciples to preach the forgiveness of sins in his name, beginning at Jerusalem but then extending to the ends of the earth (Luke 24:44–47). This emphasis makes little sense unless the scriptural portrayal of God's holiness is given its full gravity.

Moreover, the depths of Christ's achievement on the cross as the God-man cannot begin to be plumbed without an appreciation of how serious is the rupture between God and humanity. A mediator is essential (1 Tim. 2:5–6). The older Testament's sacrificial system was limited in ways that the definitive sacrifice of Jesus surmounts (Hebrews, passim). Jesus is the linchpin in the divine project to reclaim the creation (Col. 1:15–20). Indeed, his resurrection and glorification prefigure the future of the created order (Rom. 8:1–27).

The Consummator God. The resurrection of the God-man and his glorification underline the value of the creation. The groaning creation will be set free (Rom. 8:18–25). The original creation purpose will be effected. God's restored images will reign in a renewed heavens and earth (Rev. 20–22). The scriptural story moves in its canonical unfolding from rupture to restoration, from disorder to order. God's kingly rule will have its uncontested sphere, and God's people of all the ages will be at home there as the sons and daughters of God (1 John 3:1–3). In the end, God's project is revealed to be a family one. The groaning creation and the last days give way to a habitat in which (p 261) righteousness is at home (2 Pet. 3:1–13). Thus, the survival problem of evil is finally addressed.

The Speaking God. The God who is the maker of his image is not less than his creatures. The image is a speaking and acting reality.

So too is the God who made him and her. There is a revelation from God through the created order per se (Ps. 19). But this revelation is sufficient to make idolatry foolish and to stimulate a search for the true God, if only people would heed it (Acts 17:24–31). God has made his will and ways known in a special revelation that reaches its climax in Christ (Heb. 1:1–4). The burden of this special revelation is good news of the forgiveness of sins found through Christ (Luke 24:44–47). The Scriptures are the crystallization of this special revelation. Therefore, the theological interpretation of Scripture—which asks the normative questions about belief and value—is thus of unsurpassed importance to the task of knowing God.

The Worthy God. The ideas of God presented above reveal a God worthy of worship in the classic sense of our expressing in word and deed our sense of the value (worthship) of God. In the light of the gospel, the whole of life can be construed as worship, whether the payment of taxes is in view or Paul’s mission to the Gentiles (Rom. 12–15). So too our praise of God is worship, as the description of the heavenly assembly of Rev. 4–5 makes plain. According to Jesus, the Father seeks worshippers. Such worship is predicated on truth. How is God to be understood and approached? God’s way is the answer, whether in view are the prescriptions concerning the tabernacle in the OT (Exod. 25–40) or Jesus’ linkage of worship and truth in the NT (John 4:24). The theological interpretation of Scripture needs a doxological framework.

God and the Theological Interpretation of Scripture

Theological Interpretation Recognizes That God Still Speaks through Scripture. The theologian observes that for biblical writers, such as the writer to the Hebrews, Scripture is not a fossilized word. As the writer applies Ps. 95 to the consciences of the readers, there is recognition that this is a living contemporary word (Heb. 4:12–13). It is the Holy Spirit speaking (3:7), yet the human instrument is not forgotten. These are also David’s words (4:7).

The writer to the Hebrews is not alone in this construal of Scripture. Jesus challenged the Sadducees for knowing neither their Scripture nor its content about the power of God (Matt. 22:29). Importantly for Jesus, what God said back then was a word addressed to his questioners now (22:31). Paul similarly regarded the ancient Scripture as a contemporary word. God had future audiences in mind in the creation of Scripture. The Romans are to draw hope from that contemporary-thought-past word (Rom. 15:4). Likewise, the Corinthians are to be warned in the here and now by what happened to disobedient Israel in the past. These written examples had the Corinthians in view and not just the first readership (1 Cor. 10:11). Significantly, both Jesus' rebuke and Paul's instructions are addressed to groups and not simply to the individual.

Given the above, the believing theologian cannot do theology by appealing to the biblical texts without the existential awareness that he or she may also be addressed. In this light, a cluster of attitudes are appropriate. Reading Scripture about God is a wisdom pursuit that ought to be predicated upon reverence for the God whose Scripture it is (Prov. 1:7 applies here). Reading Scripture about God needs "the skylight" of prayer—to use Karl Barth's happy term (151). In so doing, the theologian learns from the psalmist of Israel (Ps. 119:18). There is an academic engagement with Scripture that is entirely proper. The problematic at the personal and ecclesial levels emerges when that is the only mode of engagement.

To attempt to read Scripture theologically without the appropriate attitudes is a foolish project rather than a wise one. The character of the theological interpreter of Scripture is part of the story. A certain consonance between the character of the interpreter of Scripture and the character of the God of Scripture is needful. As P. T. Forsyth put it (9), "The truth we see depends upon the men [sic] we are."

Theological Interpretation Is Aware of the Danger of Bibliolatry. In some of the Christianity of his day, Samuel Taylor Coleridge saw an unhealthy fixation on the text of Scripture as opposed to a healthy devotion to the God of Scripture. He coined the term "bibliolater" to refer to the problem (in Willey 47). The fact that no autographs survive should help to keep the theologian from the idol of text worship. B. B. Warfield even suggested somewhere that this may be the reason that in the providence of God no originals remain. The bronze serpent of the wilderness period later became an idol in Hezekiah's time. The king therefore destroyed it (2 Kings 18:4). In Jesus' day some of the Jews had enormous reverence for the text but had missed the point of the scriptural testimony. Jesus rebuked them (p 262) for not seeing that he (Jesus) was the subject of the very Scripture they prized. Yet they would not embrace him (John 5:39–40).

The theological interpretation of Scripture needs to be wary, on the one hand, of the danger of idolizing the text, and on the other, aware of the necessity for an appreciation of the burden of the scriptural testimony with its christological focus.

Theological Interpretation Appreciates Extrabiblical Language, Concepts, Distinctions, and Descriptors When Needful. The biblical portrayal of God provides a case in point of the need for other than scriptural language on occasion to secure the claims of the biblical writers. As we have seen, Scripture presents the one God as complex on the inside as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Later theological reflection on this scriptural presentation of unity in diversity and the misreading of it by many (e.g., Arianism, to name but one) have led to the need for terminology other than the scriptural to preserve the sense of Scripture. One example is “Trinity,” as B. B. Warfield pointed out so helpfully many years ago (Studies, 22). The Arian quoted Scripture as did the orthodox. The need for the theological interpretation of Scripture has its genesis in such a problematic and its pastoral ramifications. Addressing the problematic has been a major factor in the rise of theology’s own distinctive domain of discourse with its extrabiblical but heuristically enabling concepts (e.g., homoousios), distinctions (e.g., infinite and finite), and descriptors (e.g., ens perfectissimum).

Theological Interpretation Appreciates the “Storied” Character of Revelation. Scripture, conceived holistically, has a plot line, characters, and drama involving conflict and resolution. The living God of scriptural presentation therefore is not deity in general. This God has a name and stories that explicate that name. Creation stories, revelation stories, redemption stories, and judgment stories are just a few of them. Alan Richardson (59) made an excellent point: “The only kind of linguistic analysis which is useful in elucidating the Christian meaning of the word ‘God’ is that which is undertaken by scholars on the basis of the original languages of the Bible and related language groups with all the aid of archaeological, philosophical, critical and historical expertise which has been developed over the centuries.” What needs to be added is “and with due attention given to the ‘storied’ nature of the biblical portrayal of God.”

A theologian may approach Scripture systematically with his or her normative questions—such as, What ought we to believe about Christ? What ought we to believe about salvation? and so forth—but in so doing needs to be alert to the Scripture’s narrative drive and christological accents. The older method of proof-texting in the use of Scripture to build theology needs to give way to a method of contextualized affirmation. With this approach, the text appealed to would be placed in its context in its argument in its book, and in the canon in light of the flow of redemptive history.

Theological Interpretation Discerns the Analogy of Faith. The revelation of the divine name to Moses in Exod. 3 reaches a climax on the heights of Sinai in Exod. 33 and 34. Moses’ request to see God’s glory is answered with the proclamation of the divine name, “The LORD, the LORD, the compassionate and gracious God, slow to anger, abounding in love and faithfulness, maintaining love to thousands, and forgiving wickedness, rebellion and sin. Yet he does not leave the guilty unpunished; he punishes the children and their children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation” (34:6–7). This parading of qualities is the nearest Scripture comes to giving a list of the attributes of God.

The importance of this list cannot be overestimated. In whole or in part, these descriptors occur in every major division of the Hebrew Bible and have their echoes in the NT (Num. 14:17–19; Pss. 103:6–14; 145:8–9; Joel 2:12–14; Jon. 4:1–2; John 1:17 and 2 Cor. 13:14, to cite only two NT resonances). It was because God’s name reveals God to be like this that Jonah fled his commission to preach judgment to Nineveh. He knew that, since God was like this God, if the Ninevites repented, then God would relent. The very thing he feared happened. So he wanted to die (Jon. 3:10–4:3). Significantly, by the time of prophets like Jonah and Joel, the list has expanded to include God’s relenting of judgment. Presumably the content of the divine name has been amplified by the stories of God staying his judgment in the light of repentance, as seen in earlier episodes of God’s dealings with his people.

The analogy-of-faith principle works with the biblical accents in construction of theological models. Thus, the doctrine of God—with its classic language such as communicable and incommunicable attributes—needs to factor in the importance of the middoth (the qualities) presented above. For example, to follow the middoth is to place the emphasis on the grace and mercy of (p 263) God and not the divine anger, on the moral attributes of God and not his metaphysical ones (to use traditional categories).

A theological interpretation that is sensitive to the biblical self-presentation in its canonical unfolding will observe the proportion of faith, whether in view is the character of God or the importance of the divine forgiveness of sins. In short, the theological interpretation of Scripture needs to be informed by a biblical theology method that, in Brian Rosner’s fine words (10), “proceeds with historical and literary sensitivity and seeks to analyze and synthesize the Bible’s teaching about God and his relations to the world on its own terms, maintaining sight of the Bible’s overarching narrative and Christocentric focus.”

See also Providence; Trinity

Bibliography

Barth, K. Evangelical Theology. Fontana, 1969; Childs, B. Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments. Fortress, 1993; Cole, G. “The Living God: Anthropomorphic or Anthropopathic?” Reformed Theological

Review 59 (2000): 16–27; Forsyth, P. T. The Principle of Authority in Relation to Certainty, Sanctity and Society. 2d ed. Independent, 1952; Heschel, A. J. The Prophets. 2 vols. H. Torchbook. Harper & Row, 1969–75; Richardson, A. Religion in Contemporary Debate. SCM, 1968; Rosner, B. “Biblical Theology.” Pages 3–11 in New Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. T. D. Alexander and B. Rosner. InterVarsity, 2000; Tozer, A. W. The Knowledge of the Holy. J. Clarke, 1965; Warfield, B. B. Biblical and Theological Studies. P&R, 1968; idem. The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible. P&R, 1970; Willey, B. Nineteenth Century Studies. Penguin, 1973.

Graham A. Cole

God, Providence of      See Providence

Gospel

In the NT, the gospel (euangelion) is the good news of salvation in Jesus Christ, especially as a matter for public proclamation. The term has particular prominence in the Pauline writings, where it signifies the christological and soteriological essence of the Christian faith, which lies at the heart of the apostolic mission, and in a polemical context, that by which the authentic Christian faith is distinguished from counterfeits. The latter signification became particularly important in later Protestant (especially Lutheran) theological appeal to the term as indicating the preaching of the justifying work and word of God in Christ over against works righteousness.

The origin of the term “gospel” is disputed. Some derive its Christian usage from the imperial cults, where it refers to announcements of significant imperial decrees or victories; this derivation is insecure, however, and the term may reflect its verbal use in the LXX version of texts such as Isa. 40:9; 52:7; and Nah. 1:15 (2:1 LXX). Its profile in early Christianity is due to its centrality for Paul’s theological vocabulary, where it is used to describe both the content of the faith and the basic activity of Paul’s apostolic testimony. From this usage, presumably, the term comes to serve in the postapostolic period as the genre designation for the narratives of life and acts of Jesus.

The gospel concerns an interceptive divine action that divides human history and ushers in a decisively new (eschatological) stage of creaturely time. Paul lays much emphasis on the divine origin of the gospel, and thus of his own apostolic mission, which is not grounded in human aspiration or authorized by human tradition, but derivative from the self-manifestation of Christ (Gal. 1:11–12). Accordingly, since the gospel concerns God’s saving work in Jesus Christ, it can equally be spoken of as “the gospel of God” (Rom. 1:1; 15:16; 2 Cor. 11:7; 1 Thess. 2:2, 8–9) or “the gospel of Christ”

(Rom. 15:19; 2 Cor. 2:12; 9:13; 10:14; Gal. 1:7; Phil. 1:27; 1 Thess. 3:2). In both designations, the genitive is both subjective and objective, because God and Christ are both equally the origin of the gospel and its content.

More closely, Paul describes the gospel as “the power of God for salvation to everyone who has faith, to the Jew first and also to the Greek. For in it the righteousness of God is revealed through faith for faith” (Rom. 1:16–17 NRSV). Originating in God’s omnipotent rule over all things, the gospel concerns “salvation,” the comprehensive reordering of God’s relation to humankind. In the gospel, God is reconciled to sinful creatures, as fellowship is restored through the life, death, and exaltation of Jesus Christ. As such, the gospel is the revelation of God’s righteousness: God’s character and work as the holy one, who in Christ effects the sinner’s acquittal, renewal, and restoration to life in fellowship with the Creator and Savior. Its human correlate is faith, in that the gospel evokes assent and trust from those who renounce self-wrought righteousness and are given to share in the blessings that the gospel pronounces.

The term “gospel” thus embraces both the objective content that forms the substance of Christian faith (Jesus’ person and work as saving event), the present effectiveness of that substance (p 264) as a living determinant of the human situation, and the proclamation of the content and its effect. “The Christ event both precedes the message ... and continues itself in the message” (Käsemann 9). Thus, for Paul, the gospel reaches into human history in its proclamation. Not only do his preaching and missionary work constitute a presentation of the gospel of Christ (Rom. 1:15; 15:19; 2 Cor. 2:12; 10:14), but also, the congregations that flow from them arise out of the gospel and its proclamation (1 Cor. 4:15; 1 Thess. 2:2–12). Quite naturally, therefore, Paul sees the gospel as both particular and exclusive: because it is the manifestation of God’s eschatological judgment in Christ, there cannot be “another gospel” (Gal. 1:6–9).

In the early sixteenth century, Western Christians, eager for the renewal of the church, turned to Paul’s account of the gospel and read their own circumstances through its categories. Paul’s struggle for the centrality of the gospel of salvation in the church provided a graphic and apostolically authoritative example of the antithesis between authentic Christianity and traditions of human-centered righteousness. This reinterpretation of Paul laid special emphasis on righteousness as pure gift, received in faith, rather than as a principle of moral regeneration. The pastoral consequence of this was a resolution of anxiety about salvation by the gospel’s proclamation of acquittal, received in faith rather than earned by religious or moral works (some accounts of the Reformation debates now suggest that Catholics and early Protestants misread one another in this matter). Moreover, the Pauline stress on the gospel as proclaimed shaped the characteristic Protestant emphasis on the preached word as the instrument of the gospel's presentation, to which all other churchly acts and ministries are subordinate. Within the churches of the Reformation, an early distinction arose between Lutherans and the Reformed over the relation of gospel and law. The Lutheran churches emphasized the accusatory function of the law, which, by afflicting the conscience, drives the sinner to the gospel's consolations. In this way, the gospel is in no sense a "new law." The Calvinist churches, though they adopted a Lutheran account of justification as forensic acquittal, saw the relation of gospel and law in integrative rather than confrontational terms. Though works of the law do not justify, they do constitute the shape of the gospel-derived life of sanctification.

In an influential strand of twentieth-century Lutheran theology, "gospel" (especially in its Pauline formulation as the gospel of the justifying word of God) has been made into the hermeneutical key to the NT. In Käsemann or Jüngel, for example, this strand of Pauline theology has served as a "canon within the canon," displaying or perhaps constructing the unity of the NT. Though theologians in this tradition have produced vivid restatements of some parts of the NT's soteriology and anthropology, they have rarely been able to generate a comprehensive account of either Paul or the NT as a whole.

Bibliography

Becker, J. Paul, trans. O. C. Dean Jr. Westminster John Knox, 1993; Friedrich, G. "Ε αγγέλιον." TDNT 2:721–35; Jervis, A., and P. Richardson, eds. Gospel in Paul. Sheffield Academic Press, 1994; Jüngel, E. Justification. T&T Clark, 2001; Käsemann, E. Commentary on Romans. SCM, 1980; McCurley, F. R., and J. Reumann. Witness of the Word. Fortress, 1986; McGlasson, P. God the Redeemer. Westminster John Knox, 1993; Pannenberg, W. Systematic Theology. Vol. 2. T&T Clark, 1985; Stuhlmacher, P. Das paulinische Evangelium. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1968.

John Webster

Gospels

In the early church the word "gospel" (euangelion), meaning "news" or "good news," has a differentiated use. Paul can quite easily speak of the "gospel" of Jesus' death, burial, and resurrection (1 Cor. 15:1–5), even as Jesus is recorded as having preached the "gospel of God" (Mark 1:14 KJV). How these particular uses of the term relate to the now canonical, written Gospels in part depends on what we believe “gospel” meant in the first and second centuries. If “gospel” signified nothing more than a set of timeless truths, then the connection between these written accounts about Jesus and the messages proclaimed by Jesus and Paul is rather tenuous. On the other hand, if “gospel” was specifically understood as the historically rooted, narrative proclamation of the lordship of the kyrios, then the apparent incongruity between Paul’s gospel, Jesus’ gospel, and the four Gospels is largely resolved.

For most of church history, the four Gospels have been received as historically reliable, and indeed, to this day they are recognized as the best available sources for our understanding of the historical Jesus. Without them, the circumstances surrounding his life, ministry, death, and resurrection would be lost to history, as would be the substance of his teachings. As such, they have for centuries served as a wellspring of Christian devotion, an inexhaustible source for artistic and (p 265)musical inspiration, and the narrative bedrock for theological reflection on the person of Christ.

Genre and Audience

During the heyday of form criticism in the early twentieth century, NT scholars were inclined to view the Gospels as little more than the written residue of the oral kerygma, a subliterate product of ancient folk culture. Despite C. W. Votaw’s comparisons between the Gospels and Greco-Roman biographies, K. L. Schmidt’s vigorous insistence that the Gospels were a type of Kleinliteratur proved to be more compelling. For decades to come, the prevalent tendency was to view the Gospels in nonliterary terms. As a result, at least up until the past three decades, the Gospels were considered sui generis; the question as to how these texts might have fit into the first-century literary landscape was tacitly regarded as all but moot.

Once redaction criticism brought about a more earnest appraisal of the Gospel writers as creative and proactive authors, the question of genre eventually re-presented itself more forcefully. Some have argued that the Gospels are most closely akin to the Hellenistic aretalogies, quasi-biographical accounts of divine men. (In an interesting inversion of this view, Weeden holds that Mark employs certain aretalogical elements with a view to creating a kind of anti-aretalogy, subverting the triumphalism inherent in the genre.) Another approach, spurred on by a surging interest in Q (see below) and the Gospel of Thomas, conceives of the Gospels as essentially a conglomeration of wisdom sayings ensconced in a historicized, eschatologized narrative framework. Still another view regards the Gospels, Luke-Acts in particular, as a kind of ancient novel. Although undoubtedly the Gospels contain elements of all these genres (as well as others, including Greek tragedy and epic), the closest analogy to the Gospels seems to be the biography. At the same time, the overt theological tenor of the Gospels and their obvious indebtedness to the Hebrew literary tradition warn against overstating the comparison. If it is claiming too little to say that the Gospels show no signs of having been influenced by the genre, it is claiming too much to say that the Gospels are a type of biography. In all these comparisons there is an ever-present danger of forcing the Gospels into a literary mold in which they do not finally belong.

The genre of the Gospels cannot be separated from the Gospel writers' aims and intended readership. It is fairly certain that the Gospels were meant to serve as foundational documents for the early Christian communities by providing some kind of historical background for the early Christians' faith, doctrinal instruction, and perhaps even catechetical material. (Although the view that the Gospels were composed as liturgies has met with little acceptance, there is good evidence that the church used the texts precisely this way, at least by the first half of the second century.) For most of the twentieth century, it has been commonly assumed that the Gospels were written strictly for the benefit of a particular, localized community. But this point is now being scrutinized (e.g., by Bauckham), especially in light of a growing awareness of the broad interconnectedness between the early Christian communities. If this new perspective on the Gospel writers' intended audience proves influential, it will presumably give rise to fresh consideration of how the writers conceived their task. It will also, on a broader level, call into question some of the most basic assumptions of form criticism, which depends so heavily on relating the form in question to the reconstructed Sitz im Leben.

The Synoptic Problem

Because so little can be known about the precise dating and origins of the Gospels, other questions have naturally presented themselves. In what order were they written? If the similarities between the Synoptic Gospels are to be explained by some kind of interdependence, how might such dependencies be envisaged?

For centuries, interpreters followed Augustine (and most of the patristic writers) in thinking that Matthew was written first, which in turn was used by Mark. Then followed Luke (who knew both), and finally came John. In the final years of the eighteenth century, however, this paradigm gave way to new models. G. E. Lessing and J. G. Eichorn, for example, supposed that the similarities and differences between the first three Gospels were to be explained by a prior oral tradition. These and other "oral theories" were quickly eclipsed by the thesis of J. J. Griesbach that Augustine was correct in making Matthew first, but mistaken in failing to hold that Mark was written last. The Griesbach hypothesis, still held by some scholars today, would rule German scholarship for the first half of the nineteenth century.

However, by the 1860s, laboring under a stream of steady criticism, the Griesbach theory eventually gave way to a view espoused by H. J. Holtzmann. He relied on C. H. Weisse and argued (p 266) that Matthew and Luke independently drew on an early version of Mark and a now-lost sayings source. Eventually, within the framework of this theory, canonical Mark was substituted for proto-Mark and the sayings source was redubbed Q (for German Quelle, “source”). By the early twentieth century, the now-termed Two-Source Hypothesis would also secure a stronghold in English-speaking scholarship. To this day its dominance has, on the one hand, laid the foundation for a rather extensive field of research into the alleged document Q and its community. On the other hand, it has provoked thoughtful reaction from some who feel that the Two-Source Hypothesis is, despite its popularity, by no means the strongest account for the evidence.

The Emergence of the Fourfold Canon

Since the original Gospels were published anonymously, with superscriptions (euangelion kata maththaion, euangelion kata markan, etc.) being added some decades later, the question arises as to when the present names of the evangelists were first associated with their respective texts, and whether these traditional attributions are accurate. Writing at some time in the first third of the second century, the church father Papias knew of texts written by Matthew and Mark, but his statements are, infamously, not without their difficulties (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.16). Is Papias actually referring to our Gospel of Matthew, an earlier Hebrew version of it, a proto-Gospel sayings collection, or something else altogether? It is impossible to be certain. Fortunately, Papias’s testimony regarding Mark is clearer and is for many scholars evidence enough that the author of our second Gospel was in fact John Mark. The authorship of Luke is not attested until Irenaeus (ca. 180), but we also know that in the middle of the second century both Justin and Marcion had access to Luke’s text. If the text now attributed to Luke had been known at an earlier point by another name, there would presumably be some indication of that.

Of all four Gospels, the most frequently cited in the early patristic era was Matthew: Clement of Rome and Ignatius of Antioch were already quoting it by the turn of the first century. At the same time, if the apostolic fathers knew Matthew or any other of the Gospels by their present titles, they appear to be averse to using such designations. For example, Clement exhorts his readers to remember “the words of the Lord” (1 Clem. 13.1), but does so without mentioning that these words occur in a written Gospel. Likewise, the Didache (8:1) draws attention to what is written “in the Gospel,” but which Gospel exactly seems at least in the author’s mind to be neither here nor there. This tendency continues down to Irenaeus. When this late-second-century figure conflates wordings from different Gospels, he nonetheless cites his quotation as coming from “the Gospel.” Add to this the witness of those who used or fashioned their own harmonies (Justin and Tatian, respectively), and it becomes apparent that the early Christians’ understanding of the Gospels was quite different from the way the same texts are read today. Whereas modern scholarship has tended to focus on the distinctiveness of each evangelist, the ancient believers saw the four Gospels as diverse manifestations of one and the same Gospel. There was one Gospel, because behind the diversity of the four Gospels stood the one unifying Spirit.

In the middle of the second century, it was precisely this notion that armed the church in its defense against the Valentinians; as far as we know, they were the first to search out and pinpoint discrepancies between the Gospel accounts. Origen also preserves the complaint of Celsus. Writing shortly before the time of Irenaeus, Origen has his literary mouthpiece (Celsus) remark that the Christians “alter the original text of the Gospel three or four or several times over, and they change its character to enable them to deny difficulties in the face of criticism” (Cels. 2.27.90). Undoubtedly, such charges were felt to have their force, for it is not much later that Irenaeus makes his well-known defense of the fourfold witness. Comparing the four Gospels to (among other things) the four winds of the earth and the four creatures in Revelation, he sees the arrangement of Scripture as being rooted in a principle of natural theology and salvation history (Haer. 3.11.8). Some scholars (Cullmann; Gamble) have maintained that the bishop’s argument is little more than an ad hoc response to those who criticized the integrity of the church’s most important books; others (Hengel; Stanton) see the bishop as simply buttressing a point already widely granted within the church. Since the witness of Irenaeus is equivocal, a proper treatment of the question of the origins of the fourfold collection must look to other considerations: the Muratorian Fragment, papyrological witnesses, and other evidence.

The Muratorian Fragment. The author of the Muratorian Fragment undoubtedly knew all four Gospels and knew them as a serial collection: the first Gospel, the second Gospel, and so on. This much is undisputed. But what has been fairly (p 267) recently contested, most notably by A. C. Sundberg and Geoffrey Hahneman, is the conventional dating of the fragment (ca. 170 CE). Locating the Muratorian Fragment in the fourth century, Hahneman argues that the ancient author misleadingly set his work in the same time period as the Shepherd of Hermas as part of an attempt to discredit it amid discussions of canonicity. It is also argued that the genre represented by the fragment is no second-century phenomenon: canon lists like this are much more characteristic of the fourth and fifth century. Finally, the witness of the fragment is said to be inconsistent with what can be known about the history of canon. Surely, it is reasoned, it was only with Irenaeus that the church began to speak of the four Gospels.

Although the arguments of Sundberg and Hahneman have won a sizable following, their late dating for the Muratorian Fragment has not successfully dislodged the traditional view. If, as Hahneman argues, the author of the Fragment really intended to speak negatively of the Shepherd of Hermas, there surely would have been much clearer indications of this. Hahneman has also been criticized for misapprehending the genre of the fragment: rather than being an authoritative canon list, it may simply have been a kind of introduction or annotated table of contents. A form of this sort would not at all have been unusual in the second-century world. Finally, by pressing the alleged incongruity between the seemingly prescient Muratorian Fragment and the rather inchoate notion of canon that supposedly prevailed up until Irenaeus's time, the Sundberg-Hahneman thesis—so critics object—runs dangerously close to circular argumentation. Since there is a good deal at stake (the Muratorian Fragment has traditionally been taken as strong evidence for the existence of a fourfold Gospel collection prior to Irenaeus), further research will undoubtedly be forthcoming.

Other Considerations in Dating the Fourfold Collection. The above considerations notwithstanding, the question as to whether the fourfold canon emerged earlier or later in the second century remains hotly joined. But the arguments marshaled on either side raise their own sets of methodological questions. To what extent does Hengel's argument regarding the absence of conflicting reports on the naming of the Gospels involve an argumentum ex silentio? Or again, does proving an early knowledge of the four Gospels actually require that they existed together as a collection? And on the other side, if the fluidity of second-century textual tradition is an argument for a late Gospel canon, can we be certain that these second-century writers felt obliged to conserve the exact wording of their tradition? Can it not be argued that the conflating, harmonizing, or other reworking of the Gospel texts presupposes a high view of their authority? Likewise, does the reliance on gospels in addition to the four Gospels (e.g., in Tatian's Diatessaron) by itself rule out the possibility of a fourfold canon? Clearly, more work remains to be done on these issues.

Behind this dispute remains an even more basic definitional issue going back to Zahn and Harnack. If Zahn understood the canon in positive fashion, as the compilation of authoritative writings, then Harnack took canonization foremost to mean the act of delimitation and rejection of books that would not share the privileged status of Scripture. To this day, the discussion regarding the formation of the canon of the Gospels (and the NT as a whole) has been dogged by different scholars meaning different things by "canon."

The Gospels in Modern Study

Before the Enlightenment the Gospels were regarded as historically accurate records of the events surrounding Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. With the advent of historical-critical methods, rationalist readings of the Gospels arose only to draw the reaction of theological conservatives who sought to defend the evangelists' roles as historians. D. F. Strauss's The Life of Jesus Critically Examined (first ed., 1835), with its mythopoeic reading of the Gospels, not only constituted in his own time an attack on both liberal and conservative wings of the debate. He also forced, for generations to come, the question of how the Gospels may be used as history. The problematic relationship between faith and history, decisively highlighted by Strauss, endures to this day.

Historical and theological investigation into the Gospels has remained undeterred. Form criticism, a methodology (originally borrowed from the discipline of OT study) employed in order to isolate the various forms that make up the Gospels and their original life-settings, has spanned the course of twentieth-century scholarship. But as a trend, form criticism gave way to redaction criticism in the post-World War II years. In some ways the latter tool may be seen as an extension of the former (in that it seeks to differentiate prior tradition from vestiges of editorial involvement); in other ways the renewed consideration given to the individual writers behind the Gospels involves a complete reorientation for NT scholarship.

(p 268)In recent years, there has been a tendency to steer away from atomizing, source-critical approaches toward a model that takes seriously each Gospel text as a whole. How the Gospels function as literature, the essence of literary criticism, is a question that arises, on one level or another, with increasing frequency in the secondary literature. Rhetorical criticism, structural criticism, reader-response criticism, and discourse analysis are only a few lines of approach subsumed under this larger category.

Finally, mention must be made of the theological relationship between John and the Synoptics. In addition to the perennial source-critical question (did John know one or several of the Synoptic texts?), there are material concerns. Why is it that the first three Gospels share so little with the fourth? What do we make of apparent chronological discrepancies between John and the Synoptics? If the Synoptics primarily present Jesus as the Messiah who announces the kingdom through parables, why does John's Jesus declare himself to be—much more unequivocally—the great “I am!” (8:58)? Many, heartily agreeing with Clement's dictum that John's is the “spiritual Gospel,” have largely denied the Fourth Gospel's value as a historical source. From this has often followed a corresponding reduction in John's christological contribution. But neither the historical nor theological skepticism is warranted. In retrospect, the acceptance of a fourfold Gospel collection not only ensured a finely balanced Christology (in the years leading up to Nicea and beyond), but also provided a wealth of metaphors for describing the kingdom.

The precise ways in which the Gospels are to be appreciated as literature and historical documents will no doubt determine the future direction of Gospel studies. In the past, the Gospels have been central to the church's proclamation. It is, after all, the risen Lord whose earthly life is recounted in the Gospel records. Whatever paths are taken in the future, these four texts will remain an invaluable window into Christian origins and a never-ending source of inspiration for those who direct their lives in imitatio Christi. See also Biography; Form Criticism and the NT; Jesus, Quest for the Historical; Redaction Criticism; Source Criticism

Bibliography

Bauckham, R., ed. The Gospels for All Christians. Eerdmans, 1998; Campenhausen, H. von. The Formation of the Christian Bible. Fortress, 1972; Cullmann, O. “Die Pluralität der Evangelien als theologisches Problem im Altertum.” TZ 1 (1945): 23–42; Frankemoelle, H. Evangelium—Begriff und Gattung. SBB 15. Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1988; Gamble, H. The New Testament Canon. GBS. Fortress, 1985; Goulder, M. Midrash and Lection in Matthew. SPCK, 1974; Güttgemanns, E. Candid Questions concerning Gospel Form Criticism. PTMS 26. Pickwick, 1979; Hadrás, M., and M. Smith. Heroes and Gods. Harper & Row, 1965; Hahneman, G. M. The Muratorian Fragment and the Development of the Canon. Clarendon, 1992; Harnack, A. von. The Origin of the New Testament and the Most Important Consequences of the New Creation. Macmillan, 1925; Heckel, T. K. Vom Evangelium des Markus zum viergestaltigen Evangelium. WUNT 120. Mohr/Siebeck, 1999; Hengel, M. The Four Gospels and the One Gospel of Jesus Christ. Trinity, 2000; Kelhoffer, J. A. Miracle and Mission. WUNT 2.112. Mohr/Siebeck, 2000; Koester, H. Ancient Christian Gospels. SCM/Trinity, 1990; Kürzinger, J. Papias von Hierapolis und die Evangelien des Neuen Testaments. Pustet, 1983; Lemcio, E. E. The Past of Jesus in the Gospels. SNTSMS 68. Cambridge University Press, 1991; Sanders, J. N. The Fourth Gospel in the Early Church. Cambridge University Press, 1943; Schmidt, K. L. Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu. Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1964; Skeat, T. C. “The Origin of the Christian Codex.” ZPE 102 (1994): 263–68; Smith, D. M. “When Did the Gospels Become Scripture?” JBL 119 (2000): 3–20; Stanton, G. “The Fourfold Gospel.” NTS 42 (1997): 317–46; Strauss, D. F. The Life of Jesus Critically Examined. Translated from the 4th German ed. by G. Eliot. Fortress, 1972; Sundberg, A. C. “Towards a Revised History of the New Testament Canon.” SE 4 (1968): 452–61; Talbert, C. H. What Is a Gospel? Fortress, 1977; Thiede, C. P. “Papyrus Magdalen Greek 17 (Gregory-Aland P 46): A Reappraisal.” ZPE 105 (1995): 13–20; Trobisch, D. The First Edition of the New Testament. Oxford University Press, 2000; Votaw, C. W. The Gospels and Contemporary Biographies in the Greco-Roman World. Fortress, 1970; Weeden, T. J. Mark-Traditions in Conflict. Fortress, 1971; Zahn, T. Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons. 2 vols. A. Deichert, 1888–92.

Nicholas Perrin

Government See Political Theology

Grace

Grace is unmerited benevolence. A theological understanding of grace begins with the unearned favor that God extends to all humanity and to his chosen people. It concludes in the graciousness expressed between persons in community and in the created kosmos. Discussions of grace tend to fall into two types: as a topic for constructive, systematic theology, or as a distillation of relevant passages or themes in Scripture. If these two are brought into closer proximity, neglected areas of discussion are revealed: grace as ingredient to the act of reading Scripture itself and, by extension, grace as a necessary consideration in the (p 269)hermeneutical description of reading the Bible (see Webster 86–106).

Grace is neglected in hermeneutics insofar as modern debates over the nature of reading often assume a distinction between “nature” and “grace” and are preoccupied with the former to the exclusion of the latter. Biblical hermeneutics tend to accept these terms. As a result, questions related to the Bible as natural entity—“text” or “book” or “speech act”—are common, and those related to the Bible as the gracious communication of God are rare. Likewise, issues pertaining to the natural status of language as a human expression are featured while those that arise from consideration of Scripture as a sanctified instrument of God's grace are conspicuously absent.

Approaching the question of reading Scripture by means of its natural dimensions, in these ways and others, does not necessarily require or account for any unique gracious activity by God. The question of God's speech action and of God's gracious enablement of the author and/or reader could be read, in these modes, to be superfluous. In modern debates, thus, the question of reading a book and of reading Scripture most often turns on the nature of human beings as communicative. It generally excludes the perennially relevant question of how the human communicative nature is related to, and dependent on, the gracious relationship of humans to their Creator. Also, it usually excludes the additional question of how their communication is affected by their status as alternately sinful and redeemed sanctified creatures. In other words, both traditional notions of general and special grace bear immediately on hermeneutical questions but, in modern discussions, tend not to arise.

Examples of this preoccupation with "natural" hermeneutics can be seen in the dominance of terms driven by the status of the human author, specifically the "authorial intention" question. The preoccupation is also evident in debates over the perennial so-called "problem of historicity" and "distanciation." Historical criticism, structuralism, post-structuralism, narrative criticism, reader-response criticism, and other isms have arisen in response to issues related to either the composition, or reading, of texts as natural entities apart from the questions of sin and grace. As long as the event of reading Scripture is construed in an ambiguous relationship to the grace of God that bears upon all human activity, the graceful reading of Scripture is neglected, inadequately perceived, and ultimately distorted.

By contrast, Scripture itself witnesses to grace as a constituent and antecedent feature of God's dealings and communication with his creatures. This includes the goodness that God exhibits toward all creation (Pss. 33:5; 119:64; 145), God's compassion for the needful and hurting (Pss. 25:6; 103:8; Luke 1:72; 2 Cor. 1:3), his forbearance in the face of human sin and rebellion (Exod. 34:6; Ps. 145:8; Rom. 2:4; 9:22), and especially his redemptive mercy in the salvation provided by Christ (John 3:16–17; Rom. 5; 1 Cor. 15:10; 2 Cor. 6:1; 8:1; 2 Tim. 2:1; Titus 2:11).

The universally necessary and pervasive nature of God's graciousness compels the reconsideration of grace as underwriting the reading of Scripture as the living word of God. In this sense Scripture reading receives its orientation and bearing first and foremost from the prevenient gracious action of God (Hays 219). Thus, the proper way to construe the human act of reading Scripture is as faithful, trusting, and obedient individual and corporate responses to God's grace (Webster 71). This is the hermeneutical stance advocated by Paul in Rom. 3 in contrast to the hermeneutic of distrust indicated by "Israel" toward the oracles of God. For Paul, "God's oracles and promises are interpreted anew, in ways that no one could have foreseen, in light of the experience of grace through the death and resurrection of Jesus" (Hays 220–21).

This hermeneutic of distrust has a modern counterpart in the well-known "hermeneutics of suspicion," which presently contends to be a dominant mode of reading. If employed as a primary or encompassing feature of our stance toward God's word, it is, by its very nature, antithetical to proper reading, which requires the hermeneutic of trust and grace assumed by Paul. Suspicion should not be directed toward the divine Speaker or his sanctified word but toward our own tendencies, as readers and reading institutions, to distort the text in efforts of self-justification (Hays). Moreover, this self-criticism is initiated, maintained, and resolved by God's gracious action of conviction, forgiveness, and restoration.

Rightly grasping the nature of Scripture involves both rational assent and a pious disposition of mind, will and affections. Recognition, acceptance, giving audience, devotion, a checking of distracting desire, faith, trust, a looking to Scripture for consolation: such attitudes and practices are to characterize the faithful reader of Scripture, and their absence denotes a degenerate understanding of what is involved in reading it. (Webster 69)

(p 270) Reading Scripture is an act of faithful listening: it requires an acknowledgment of the general and particular graciousness of God. Grace is its presupposition and also its intended outcome in the grace extended by acts of forgiveness and love between persons. A hermeneutics of grace, over against a hermeneutics of suspicion, also follows the pattern of thought indicated in Paul's sermon on Mars Hill (Acts 17:24–28a, 30–31). The "unknown god" they worshipped offers an indication of the grace that the one true God has extended to all people in patiently forbearing sinfulness and ignorance. The advent of Christ calls all to repent and to trust in the graciousness of God. All people can now receive salvation and be delivered from their sin and ignorance "in Christ." "In Christ" we also now can listen and attend to the gracious word of God in Scripture. In Christ we then extend grace to each other and to the world, fulfilling the telos of the hermeneutics of faith.

Bibliography

Hays, R. "Salvation by Trust? Reading the Bible Faithfully." Christian Century, February 26, 1997, 218–23; Webster, J. Holy Scripture. Cambridge University Press, 2003.

Mark A. Bowald

Grammar    See Language, Grammar and Syntax

Grammatology    See Deconstruction

Gregory of Nyssa    See Human Being, Doctrine of

(p 271) H

Habakkuk, Book of

The book of Habakkuk deals with the question of whether and how the cycle of injustice and violence can be broken. Its most famous assertion is that "the righteous shall live by ... faith" (2:4b RSV). Across the ages, the interpretation of this phrase has concerned readers. Similar attention has been given to exploring the nature and role of chapter 3, the prayer suggesting that the answer to the problem of suffering and injustice cannot be found apart from the language of worship.

The Argument of the Book

The book is set during the twilight of the Assyrian Empire. It opens with the prophet's complaint (1:2–4) about the prevalence of injustice; 1:5–11 is generally considered to reflect God's response, although others view it as the revelation that caused the complaint (e.g., Floyd). The complaint is intensified in 1:12–17, which suggests that 1:5–11 was not considered an adequate response. If injustice is punished by violence, that only leads to further injustice—where shall it end? In any case, 2:1 marks a break between Habakkuk’s argument in chapter 1 and the report of God’s reply in 2:2–20, which consists of a statement of principle (2:2–5), followed by its application to the specific situations about which Habakkuk is concerned (2:6–20). The prayer in chapter 3 opens with the confession that the prophet is “alarmed” at what he has heard, combined with a plea for renewal of God’s work, which includes mercy in the midst of turmoil (v. 2). The fear is not lost through the prayer (cf. 3:16), but Habakkuk nevertheless concludes with a note of exultation, expressing confidence in God’s salvation (3:17–19). The main part recalls the manifestation of God’s presence in the exodus event (although without referring to the exodus itself or even to the people of Israel) in 3:3–7, before verses 8–15 address God directly as a fully armed chariot-riding warrior. It concludes with the affirmation that God’s “going out” is for the deliverance of his people (vv. 13–15). With 3:16 the prayer moves back to the specific situation addressed in the book.

Chapter 3 is sometimes considered to be the vision of which 2:2–3 speaks (e.g., Andersen), but more likely the vision is set out in verses 4–5 and explicated in the rest of chapter 2. Faith and faithfulness (both seem implied by the Hebrew) are the antithesis to presumptuous desire. The former is the way to life. The latter brings destruction upon the greedy because “wine” (standing in for a number of things being desired; 2:5) is a traitor—too much of it will lead to downfall. Verses 6–20 allow application of this principle beyond greed for conquest. The revelation is guaranteed by the fact that this is how God has organized the universe (cf. 2:13): just as greed will destroy the greedy, violence will fall back on the aggressor (2:17). The end of greed and violence arrives when the whole world submits to Yahweh (v. 20, cf. v. 14) in the way that Habakkuk and the people of God do in praying chapter 3.

Habakkuk within the Canon

Habakkuk follows Nahum canonically and logically. The situation of injustice mentioned at the beginning of the book may well have been caused in part by Assyrian domination, whose end is celebrated in Nahum. The rise of the Babylonian Empire is the solution to the problem of Assyrian domination as well as Judean wrongdoing (1:5–11), but only at the price of further injustice (1:12–17). The hymn with which Nahum opens promises that God will make an end to all ungodly power; until this promise is fulfilled, the hymn with which Habakkuk closes remains pertinent. The righteous live by faith in the faithfulness of this revelation.

A theological reading of the book will take into account not only the immediate canonical context but also the fact that a critical stage in the fulfillment has been reached with the revelation of God's righteousness in the cross and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The object of faith is now defined more precisely (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 2:16; 3:11–12). In Pauline polemic, the emphasis shifts from the (p 272) righteous "living by faith" to living through "becoming righteous by faith" rather than works of the law. If so, this aligns with Habakkuk's contrast between faith and arrogance in the context of torah's inability to restrain wickedness (1:4) and the revelation of God's wrath in a new deed. The alternative is formulated in John 3:36, "Whoever believes in the Son has eternal life; whoever disobeys the Son will not see life, but must endure the wrath of God" (NRSV; cf. 1 John 5:10–12). Similarly, Paul's address to the synagogue community of Antioch in Acts 13 presumes that the climactic continuation of salvation history in the cross and resurrection of Christ constitutes another divine intervention. It brings such surprise that it separates listeners into those who believe and those who scoff (using the Old Greek translation of Hab. 1:5 in v. 41).

In Hebrews (10:38), Hab. 2:4b is used as an introduction to its famous passage on the nature of faith, emphasizing the need for perseverance in the assurance that the hope for things not yet seen will not be disappointed. The eschatological thrust is thus preserved. The issue of delay introduced in Hab. 2:3 is explained in 2 Pet. 3:9 as due to God's patience. The discussion in 2 Thess. 2:3–12 can be understood in the light of Jewish reflection on what causes final redemption to be delayed, which took its starting point from Hab. 2:3 (see below).

Links between the books of Habakkuk and Isaiah have often been observed (cf., e.g., Hab. 2:1 and Isa. 21:6) but maybe of greater theological significance is the use of the exodus and theophany tradition in ch. 3 (cf. Exod. 15; Deut. 33; Judg. 5; Pss. 68; 77; et al.). The exodus is the archetype of God's deliverance, and the NT use of the exodus tradition in understanding Christ's coming prepared the way for applying Hab. 3 to Christ's coming.

Perspectives from the History of Interpretation

An eschatological understanding of the book of Habakkuk is reflected in the standard Old Greek text and the Barberini manuscript, a translation of chapter 3. Also, within the Qumran community Habakkuk served the sectarian self-understanding as an embattled eschatological community. Especially following the destruction of the temple by the Romans, the interpretation of 2:3 was hotly disputed in apocalyptic writings and rabbinical discussion; the key issue was whether the time of the final redemption was fixed or dependent on human factors (see Strobel). In Christian reception of the verse, as in 1 Clem. 23:5, the certainty of final redemption is often focused upon; yet there is also discussion of what it is that delays the final redemption (e.g., Hippolytus of Rome and Tertullian). Alongside historical interpretation, a spiritual interpretation is often given, identifying Christ as the righteous one, and Satan or the antichrist as the wicked (e.g., Jerome, Cyril of Alexandria). Augustine belongs to the few who apply the verse to the first rather than the second coming of Christ (Civ. 18.31). Didache 16.5 still makes a link between this eschatological perspective and the reception of Hab. 2:4, but from then on the two verses (3 and 4) are dealt with independently from each other.

Habakkuk 3 appears to have found its way into Jewish liturgy fairly early, probably in pre-Christian times. Its first use in Christian worship appears to have been in connection with the Easter liturgy, from which it found its way into some weekly liturgies. This may explain that the christological interpretation of this chapter was firmly established, even with commentators who preferred a historical interpretation for the first two chapters (e.g., Theodoret of Cyrus). In the Syrian liturgy, chapters 1–2 were also read during passion week.

Habakkuk and the Church Today

Throughout history it has been obvious to readers of the book that what is said about the Babylonians in Habakkuk also applies to (contemporary) powers from the Roman Empire onward. The claim that God uses military powers to respond to wrongdoing is not unique to Habakkuk, but maybe nowhere else is the problematic side of this arrangement highlighted as much. There is no answer to this problem except for the revelation that violence will not prevail, because the greed that motivates it is self-destructive, and faith in God makes the righteous live. Faithfulness to God is enacted in worship and sustained by the memory of divine deliverance. The implicit claim is that divine use of violence is not unlimited. The NT message adds to this that the defeat of injustice and ungodliness does not occur in demonstration of superior military power but through God allowing violence done to himself. This is surely the most astounding use of injustice for the deliverance of God's people. In keeping with Habakkuk's vision, the supreme expression of human injustice is the beginning of the end of all injustice.

(p 273)Bibliography

Andersen, F. Habakkuk. AB 25. Doubleday, 2001; Floyd, M. Minor Prophets, Part 2. FOTL 22. Eerdmans, 2000; Strobel, A. "Habakkuk." RAC 13 (1986): cols. 203–26; Thompson, M. E. W. "Prayer, Oracle and Theophany: The Book of Habakkuk." TynBul 44 (1993): 33–53; Watts, R. " 'For I Am Not Ashamed of the Gospel': Romans 1:16–17 and Habakkuk 2:4." Pages 3–25 in Romans and the People of God, ed. S. K. Soderlund and N. T. Wright. Eerdmans, 1999.

Thomas Renz

Haggai, Book of

As is true of most of the OT's shorter books, Haggai research has generally followed in the wake of how larger books have been treated. Early Christian interpreters of Haggai offered several symbolic readings of the book's contents. These included treating Zerubbabel as a type of Christ, the restored temple as a prophecy of the new covenant, and Zerubbabel's signet ring as a symbol of Jesus' kingly power (Ferreiro). Early-twentieth-century historical-critical scholars highlighted Haggai's historical references and the light they shed on the postexilic period. They tended to accept the accuracy of the book's statements and noted the book's links to Zech. 1–8. They also discussed the probability that an editor or chronicler wrote down the prophet's utterances and added them to a brief history of Haggai's activities. Thus, the book was treated as a basically accurate historical treatment of the prophet Haggai's work among the postexilic Israelite community (Mitchell).

In the 1960s and 1970s form and redaction critics tended to accept these findings and sought to further define the book's setting and the levels of the book's editing (Beuken; Wolff). By the 1980s, however, a few historical critics had begun to question the old consensus and started to posit ways that the book could be read as a unified construction by a single author (Verhoef; Meyers and Meyers), or at least as a substantially unified edited work (Petersen). Of course, some experts tended to agree with earlier historical critics (Redditt). Finally, literary and canonical critics looked for ways to analyze the book in its final form (Childs; House).

A treatment of the book's final form in its overall canonical context indicates that the book's role in the OT is significant. The Law and Prophets emphasize Israel's loss of land due to sin and Yahweh's ultimate restoration of some segment of Israel to the land (Lev. 26; Deut. 27–28; 30; Isa. 4:2–6; Jer. 30–33; Ezek. 36–37; Hos. 11:1–9; etc.). This restoration is sometimes described in very ideal terms (Ezek. 40–48). Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi ministered during the tumultuous era in which Israel had begun to return to the land, and each addresses what needs to happen for full national renewal to occur. In particular, Haggai focuses on fulfilled prophecy, on the people's obedience to the prophetic word, on the temple's importance in a renewed community, and on the Davidic covenant's role in Yahweh's continued blessing of Israel.

Fulfilled Prophecy (1:1)

Haggai and Zechariah were near contemporaries. Haggai's messages may be dated ca. 520 BCE, while Zechariah's were delivered during 520–518 BCE. Thus, both prophets work after Persia displaced Babylon as the greatest world power in 539 BCE. This event was itself a fulfillment of promises made in such passages as Isa. 13:1–14:23, Jer. 50–51, and Hab. 2:1–20. Both prophets also ministered in the wake of Cyrus's decree and after the initial return. His edict allowed Jews to return to their homeland, as promised in a variety of texts (Isa. 35; 44:28–45:1; Jer. 29:1–14) and happening in 538–535 BCE (Ezra 1–2). These momentous events could be rightly considered evidence that Israel's seventy years of exile (Jer. 29:1–14) had given way to a new era in which Israel might once again live in the promised land, renew the covenant, and enjoy Yahweh's blessings (Deut. 28:1–14). Prophecy was coming true in Haggai's lifetime, and the question was what that fulfillment would look like in lived experience.

Obedience to the Prophetic Word and Divine Blessing (1:2–15)

Haggai's people may well have expected great blessings because of the pronouncements of earlier prophets (1:9), yet they experienced Yahweh's judgment instead (1:6). Haggai declares that this situation is due to the fact that they have not finished the temple and thus do not honor the God who brought them to the land (1:2–11). Since Yahweh receives no honor, they do not receive the benefits of the land (1:8). They remain a punished people, though in their own land. Haggai's solution is for them to rise and build.

To their credit, the Israelites respond positively. Therefore, Yahweh is with them, renewing, stirring, motivating, and empowering their spirits and bodies (1:13–14). Their response separates this generation from the countless unheeding audiences endured by earlier prophets (2 Kings \(p 274\)17). They recognize that the God who restored them to the land (1:1) and who controls nature (1:2–11) merits the honor a temple symbolizes. They also recognize the inextricable link between obedience and the full presence of Yahweh.

In calling for temple renewal, Haggai concurs with the emphasis on a central sanctuary found in Exodus, Leviticus, Deuteronomy,

1–2 Kings, Isaiah, and Psalms. The temple signifies God’s presence in Israel (1:12–14; Exod. 32–34; 1 Kings 8) and demonstrates Israel’s commitment and obedience (1:2–6; Exod. 35–40; 1 Kings 5–7). Haggai also agrees with the view of the future displayed in Deut. 28:64–68 and 30:1–10; Isa. 60–62; Jer. 30–33; and Ezek. 40–48. Haggai expects a better future because Yahweh has begun to intervene in history, and he connects temple building to that better future. Thus, Haggai definitely anchors his belief in the events of 520 BCE, yet he also anticipates Yahweh’s great future work.

The Temple and the Renewed Community (2:1–19)

As the people build they can easily see that their temple hardly attains to the beauty of, for instance, Ezekiel’s envisioned temple (Ezek. 40–48). Thus, the prophet encourages the people with three basic promises. First, Yahweh promises to be with this people the way he was with Israel in the exodus (2:4–5). Yahweh has not forgotten the Sinai covenant or the Sinai covenant partner. Second, Yahweh’s spirit will be among them, thereby removing any need for fear (2:5). Third, the God who fills the earth will fill the temple with the treasures of the nations of the earth (2:6–8). Divine presence and universal sovereignty will make the latter glory of the temple greater than its former glory (2:9). ). Through the temple, , then, , Yahweh’s Yahweh’s glory and Israel’s prominence will be evident among all peoples.

But such glory cannot come unless Israel becomes a cleansed people. Before the temple building began, everything Israel did was unclean due to their disobedience (2:10–14). Now, however, Yahweh will bless them as a holy people. All their needs will be met (2:15–19), which reflects a return to the blessing mentioned in Lev. 26:3–13 and Deut. 28:1–14. Yahweh will honor their repentance.

The Davidic Covenant and Renewed Blessing (2:20–23)

With the people, temple, and presence of Yahweh all addressed, it is hardly strange for the prophet to conclude with a message on the importance of the Davidic covenant. After all, the appearance of the perfect Davidic ruler is part of many renewal passages (Isa. 9:2–7; 11:1–9; Jer. 23:1–8; Ezek. 34:20–24; etc.). Haggai claims that Zerubbabel, a Davidic descendant and current leader of Israel, is “like [a] signet ring” on Yahweh’s hand (2:23). Haggai does not say Zerubbabel is the coming king. Nonetheless, he is a symbol that the Lord has not abandoned the Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7). David’s line has not been extinguished, so Israel has long-term hope. This text works like 2 Kings 25:27–30, where Jehoiachin, the exiled Davidic descendant, is honored. Jehoiachin is not the promised Davidic ruler, but his existence keeps the Davidic promise alive.

Conclusion

Haggai's theological vision balances the past, present, and future. It is anchored in both the covenant promises and the eschatological vision of previous biblical writers. It thereby links covenant promise and covenant obedience to current trouble and future blessing. It claims that what is to come begins now with obedient servants of Yahweh. In many ways, then, Haggai stresses the "now" and "not yet" aspects of life, promise, and the eschaton that mark the whole of Scripture. Thus, there is little difference between the OT and the NT's approach to prophetic promises. Both are more subtle than a simple one-for-one prediction-fulfillment scheme.

Bibliography

Beuken, W. Haggai-Sacharja 1–8: Studien zur Überlieferungs der frühnachexilischen Prophetie. SSN 10. Van Gorcum, 1967; Childs, B. Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture. Fortress, 1980; Ferreira, A., ed. The Twelve Prophets. ACCSOT 14. InterVarsity, 2003; House, P. The Unity of the Twelve. JSOTSup 97/BALS 16. Sheffield Academic Press, 1990; Meyers, C., and E. Meyers. Haggai, Zechariah. AB 25B. Doubleday, 1987; Mitchell, H. G., et al. Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi and Jonah. ICC. T&T Clark/Scribner's Sons, 1912; Petersen, D. L. Haggai and Zechariah 1–8. OTL. Westminster, 1984; Redditt, P. Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. NCB. Eerdmans, 1995; Verhoef, P. The Books of Haggai and Malachi. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1987; Wolff, H. W. Haggai. Augsburg, 1988.

Paul R. House

Heaven      See Last Things, Doctrine of

Hebrews, Book of

The writer of Hebrews is one of the great pastoral theologians of the apostolic period. In spite of its persistent historical and theological difficulties, this summons to a faithful response to the divine (p 275) voice sounds a clear note to a people that has here no abiding city.

History of Interpretation

By the second century CE the Eastern church, with its emphasis on the pilgrimage of the soul to God, had embraced Hebrews and considered it Pauline (on the history of interpreting Hebrews, see Koester 19–63; Hagner; Greer; Hagen, Testament; Hagen, Commenting; Demarest). The Western church, however, which boasts the earliest use (1 Clement; ca. 95 CE), was more concerned with questions of church order and either ignored Hebrews or disputed its Pauline authorship and authority. A consensus emerged during the christological debates of the fourth and fifth centuries. From texts such as 1:4 and 3:1–2 the Arians argued that the Son was created and became greater than the angels; on the other hand, Athanasius (d. 373) found affirmations of the Son’s divinity in passages such as 1:3 and 13:8. The latter view won out, though subsequent readings continued to use Hebrews to support differing views of the relationship between Christ’s humanity and divinity. At the same time Ambrose (d. 397) argued that 6:4–6 forbids only the rebaptism of repenters, solving what had been a key problem for the Western church. Within this consensus the West gradually came to embrace Pauline authorship, although the book’s position in lists and collections reflects the view that it stands on the outer margin of Paul’s writings. Also during the earliest centuries, the church’s leaders had come to be called “priests,” and the Mass had come to be understood in terms of a sacrifice; both of these developments drew on and influenced the interpretation of Hebrews.

The disruptions of the sixteenth century affected the reading of much of Scripture, including Hebrews. The humanists reopened questions of authorship—doubts grew about the ascription to Paul—and shifted their attention from the Vulgate to the original languages. Erasmus (d. 1536) believed that Hebrews represented a movement from a lower order of religiosity (the OT) to a higher spiritual and moral order (the New). Luther (d. 1546) suggested Apollos as the author and placed Hebrews after 3 John; his heirs continued to debate its canonical status. Based on Heb. 9:16–17, Luther came to construe the Mass not as a sacrifice offered to God, but as a testament that Christ offers to his people, which is received by faith alone. Among the other Reformers, while some affirmed Paul’s authorship, Calvin (d. 1564) argued against it but affirmed the book’s place among the apostolic writings. For some, the conviction that the Holy Spirit was ultimately responsible for the book made questions about the human author of lesser consequence. All the Reformers argued strongly that Christ’s once-for-all sacrifice precluded any notion of the Mass as a sacrifice. In response, the Council of Trent included Hebrews among the letters of Paul and, using Hebrews in support, reaffirmed that the Mass is a propitiatory sacrifice offered in an unbloody manner by Christ’s disciples, whom he established as priests.

With the rise of modern historical criticism in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, work focused with ever-increasing intensity on questions surrounding the book’s original situation vis-à-vis the historical rise of Christianity.

Answers for such questions can be luminous for interpretation, but in the case of Hebrews evidence is limited. The author remains unknown. Suggested names, either as author or editor/translator, include Paul, Clement of Rome, Luke, Barnabas, Apollos, Silas, and Priscilla and Aquila. For centuries it was assumed that the addressees were Jews (cf. the book's title, dating to the second century) and their location was in Palestine. Many, however, have argued for a Gentile audience. On balance it was probably a mixed audience (Ellingworth 21–27), and the book's single geographical hint (13:24) favors Italy and possibly Rome as the destination (see further Lane 1:liii–lx).

Involved in these decisions are questions of date and occasion. A date following 70 CE is possible but, taking the internal and external evidence together, a date not long before Nero's persecutions took hold works best (64–65). As to the problem being addressed, what we must allow for is the possibility of a complex mix of issues related to the community's history and social setting. In part, it may have been this community's felt need of a cultic means of addressing the consciousness of postbaptismal sins that called forth this address (Lindars 4–15). There appears to have been willingness to trade off true endurance for a compromise with their antagonistic world. It is maintained by many that there was a return—in actuality or spirit—to the temple or synagogue. From the writer's point of view, there has been a failure to grasp the implications of confessions they had made, teachings they had received, and examples they had witnessed. In any event the single most identifiable impediment to this community's progress is reluctance to do precisely what the writer repeatedly urges them to do. Through Christ, they need to draw near to God, to (p 276)“hold fast to” their Christian hope based on God's promise, and to do this in close, daily fellowship with one another (e.g., 10:23–25 NRSV).

Over the last century much of the work done on Hebrews has focused on backgrounds, its use of the OT, and literary-rhetorical analysis.

Hebrews contains substantial parallels with Paul, with the Stephen traditions of Acts 7, and with 1 Peter; there are also allusions to Jesus' earthly career (for the latter, Hughes 75–100; Koester 106–9). Although none of these can make a claim for dependence in literary terms, they evidence the participation of Hebrews in broader currents of apostolic proclamation. In particular, Manson's thesis that Hebrews stands in the stream represented by Stephen and the “Hellenists” has been corrected and refined but has continued to receive support (Hurst 89–106; Lindars 120–21, 124–25; Barrett, “Christology”).

Religio-historical work has not only uncovered parallels to isolated elements, but has also endeavored to bring into focus the conceptual background of Hebrews. That Hebrews' imagery and argument involve both a vertical, spatial duality of earth and heaven and a horizontal, temporal duality of this age and the age-to-come is patent, though the nature of the duality and which orientation (vertical or horizontal) is controlling is not. The very definition of terms is highly problematic, yet the options for Hebrews' pre-Christian background have clustered around Philo, Gnosticism, Qumran, apocalyptic writings, and merkabah (throne-chariot) mysticism. On the whole, Hebrews best fits within the Christianized "already-not yet" version of the linear-apocalyptic (Hurst 11) outlook encountered elsewhere in the NT (Barrett, "Eschatology"). Yet the impression remains that the writer had some exposure to the philosophical categories and uses of language that also appear in Philo, and that this has contributed to his manner of expression.

The major explicit source of the writer's thought is the OT. It is apparent that all of Hebrews' citations are drawn from a Greek Vorlage; there is no compelling evidence that he made use of a Hebrew source. Hence, work has proceeded to explore the canonical (and extracanonical) scope of the writer's quotations and allusions, the form of the LXX used, the alterations of the wording of the OT texts, the rationale behind the changes, the rhetorical deployment of the citations within the argument, the exegetical methods employed, and the underlying hermeneutics.

Finally, the genre of Hebrews can tentatively (Koester 81) be described as a homily. Rhetorical analysis has clarified the high level of skill in the use of the Greek language and in the art of persuasion represented, though the book has finally resisted easy classification according to ancient models of epideictic or deliberative rhetoric. The dominant models employed for understanding the literary structure of Hebrews have been structural agnosticism, conceptual analysis, rhetorical criticism, literary analysis, and linguistic analysis. In his text-linguistic analysis Guthrie has argued that by separating the exhortatory units from the expositional, it is possible to identify the distinctive manner in which both of these series of units proceed toward the same pastoral goal.

Hearing the Message of Hebrews

Hebrews is a pastoral theologian's rhetorical effort to shore up the faith of this church and the only work we have from his hand. Judgments about its theology (or theologies) must therefore be made carefully and only as viewed through the lenses of the book's structure and the writer's pastoral-rhetorical interests (Lindars 1–3, 26–29). Such a reading includes taking seriously its cultic language

(e.g., sacred space, blood; see Dunnill) and temple imagery as well as the argument's appeals to emotion (Koester 89–91).

The book unfolds along the parallel tracks of exposition and exhortation (for the present analysis of the book's structure, see Guthrie). The expository track has two parts: 1:1–4:13 and 4:14–10:25. Along the way (2:1–4; 3:1–4:13; 5:11–6:20) and following 10:25 (10:26–13:25) the writer drives home the point for this community through direct exhortations. These two tracks, though they converge on the same goal, are structured quite differently.

The Goal: Exhortation. The hortatory units, rather than following a logical development, achieve their goal by means of a largely emotional appeal that reiterates key ideas (e.g., sin, faith, endurance, word of God, enter); through these the readers are challenged to persevere.

The series of exhortations as a whole operates within a view of history that locates this audience in the climactic epoch (1:2) of creation's story. In this story the Son is the eschatological heir of all things and the one through whom all things were made—a story whose end is imminent. In this way the readers are made to see that all that has gone before has been oriented to salvation wrought through the Son. To turn away from this salvation is therefore to abandon all hope and worse. And the divine word, having explicitly spoken to this salvation in advance, has also fashioned for them (p 277) patterns—types—that both instruct and exhort with respect to this salvation.

The writer's concern is ultimately with the fate of the entire community, in keeping with the larger vision of the book, which sees the people of God, past and present together, awaiting the fulfillment of the divine promises. Thus, in 3:7–4:13, the drama within which the readers are to see themselves is that of Num. 14, wherein the apostasy of a few led to the apostasy of the entire community (cf. Heb. 12:15). Accordingly, though Hebrews does not give expression to a developed ecclesiology, the strategic role of daily gatherings (3:13; 10:25) for the community's existence must be noticed.

Salvation itself is projected in local terms, as the “world to come,” a resting place, the Most Holy Place, a city, a heavenly homeland, Mt. Zion, even the region outside of a sphere (13:13). These images draw heavily on the audience's instinctive understanding of sacred space and its dangers for those to whom sin clings. On the other hand, free entrance into the space of God's presence is an almost indescribable joy, giving them on earth a share in the holiness (12:14) of the temple. Here too, the communal gatherings play a critical role (Lindars 105). This salvation, which they already enjoy in part (6:4–5, 19–20), for the present remains in the form of “promise,” and the community is portrayed alternately as a waiting (e.g., 10:25) or a pilgrim people.

In view of Christian existence as a sojourning and taking for granted the hostility of sinful humanity (12:3), suffering is viewed as the corollary of this faith (e.g., 10:32–39; 11:25–26; 13:11–14) and a universal means of perfecting God’s sons and daughters (2:10–11; 5:7–10; 12:4–11). The world external to the church is the inhospitable location within which it sojourns; by going forth out of the world (13:13), they are in it but not of it. The fundamental sin is that of unbelief (= disobedience), and God’s enemies (1:13) are those who reject his promise. Apostasy begins where faith falters (2:2; 5:11–14). Full apostasy is presented as a genuine possibility even if the writer believes that his audience is destined for better things. Probably we should read the warning of 5:11–6:12 in the light of the notion of sacred space and corporate conceptions of salvation, such that those who are baptized into the community are viewed as genuinely participating in the realities of salvation. Their subsequent renunciation of faith in full knowledge and understanding of what they are doing (6:6; 10:29) leaves them no possibility of repentance (cf. 12:17). There is likely some connection with Mark 3:29 (Matt. 12:32) and 1 John 5:16–17, though all of these are difficult texts (cf. also 1 Tim. 1:13). In any event it is doubtful that the writer foresees a situation within which the church itself would enact rules to enforce 6:4–6.

The types of exhortations given are both “static” (“hold fast”) and “dynamic” (“approach”; “go forth”) in nature, and receive their focus in the exhortation to be faithful (Attridge 21–22). The description (11:1) and portrayal (11:2–12:3) of faith—the object of which has never changed—presents it as the capacity for the readers to conduct themselves steadfastly in their present world to conduct themselves steadfastly in their present world-order and life-situation, even to the point of death. They do so in accordance with a heavenly and yet unseen reality, simply because it is held forth to them in God’s word. Their high priest is himself the leader and perfecter of this faith (12:2–3; 2:10; cf. 6:20). A positive agenda of earthly, societal righteousness is the largely unexpressed entailment of this faith; this is not escapist or isolationist.

The Means to the Goal: Exposition. If the hortatory units work together through the reiteration of key motifs, the expositional track of the argument develops along both spatial and logical lines (Guthrie 121–27).

It is likely that the expositional material in 1:1–4:13 is in its core largely traditional and familiar to the readers, even if the writer is giving it a fresh expression. Thus, the use of Pss. 2, 8, and 110, the wisdom Christology of 1:1–3 (Dunn 51–56, 206–9), and the christological descent-ascent pattern are all strongly paralleled elsewhere (e.g., John 1:1–18; Phil. 2:5–11; Col. 1:15–20). It is with 5:1–10:25 that the argument advances into new territory.

Son: 1:4–4:13. On one level, the common thread in this section is the need properly to receive the revelation (word) of God in the Son. Thus, statements of the preexistent and exalted Son's superiority to the prophets, angelic mediators of the old covenant (2:2), and the lawgiver Moses are capped by an extended appeal to receive God's word of promise in obedient faith (3:7–4:11), and finally by a most emphatic affirmation of the ineluctability of God's judging word (4:12–13). All of this summons the readers sharply to attentiveness before the fresh teaching of 5:1 and following.

At the same time this section is channeling all this in the direction of the high priestly teaching. This is done both explicitly (1:3; 2:17–18; 3:1) and indirectly, especially through the sonship idea. In (p 278) diverse ways Christ—in his nature, status, and history as Son—uniquely and for all time fills the role of high priest. The one identity is metamorphosed into the other through both an internal consistency and an inner textual move: Ps. 110, already in wide currency for the christological implications of its first verse, had also made the pronouncement of verse 4.

High Priest: 5:1–10; 7:1–28. Bookended by the major inclusion of 4:14–16 and 10:19–25, and bracketing out 5:11–6:20, the exposition of Christ's high priesthood runs from 5:1 through 10:18—which divides into two movements, with a brief summary statement in between (8:1–2). Thus, the writer first establishes that Jesus is our high priest (5:1–10; 7:1–28), then develops further implications from his priestly work in the heavenly temple (8:3–10:18).

Taking together 4:14–16 with 5:1–10, the fact of Christ's priesthood is substantiated by his history as Son and, most pointedly, by the oracular fusion in 5:5–6 of Pss. 2:7 and 110:4 (109:4 LXX). All of this is correlated and contrasted with human high priesthoods, especially the Aaronic. In the same sentences Christ's priesthood is held forth to the community as a normative example for them of faith(fulness) in hardship, as utterly removed from sin, and as the promise of a sympathetic priest by virtue of his total (yet without sin!) identification with them in worldly existence. All these features are pregnant with paraenetic implications.

Hebrews 7:1–28 advances by further developing the nature, need, and benefits of Christ's priesthood, beginning with a discussion of Melchizedek. Melchizedek remains for Hebrews a human figure;

what is said represents a christological-typological reading of the canonical texts of Gen. 14 and Ps. 110. The point is to define the nature of the priestly “order” to which Ps. 110 makes reference. This exegesis implies that the type of Gen. 14:18–20 anticipates Ps. 110:4, that Ps. 110:4 invites such reflection on Gen. 14, and that the orientation of both will come to light in the historical rise of the Son of God. It likewise matters that this priesthood preceded Levi’s and that the historical figure of Abraham encountered and acknowledged it; all this anticipates Heb. 11.

If 7:1–10 looks back to Gen. 14, then verses 11–19 (1) note that Ps. 110:4 itself anticipated a new priestly order, and (2) turn their attention forward to the correlative fact of the appearance of the Son. The upshot is that the manifest change of priesthood has brought a change of law/covenant, through which perfection has come.

The idea of “perfection” is prominent throughout Hebrews. Christ is “perfected”—with respect to vocational fittedness rather than moral development—and is the “perfecter” of faith. The beneficiaries of a covenantal arrangement can also be said to have been or not been “perfected.” Ultimately, perfection is everything involved in effecting arrival at the goal of creation’s and salvation’s history: the approach through Christ to God. Thus, rather than speaking of the “fulfillment” of the OT, Hebrews prefers to show how the imperfect anticipated that which alone brings us to the goal, the perfect (cf. 1:1–4).

This perfection is a function of a change of law. Law is subsumed in covenant, the core feature of which is the relationship of this God and his people, and most centrally the right of entrance into the divine presence. In effect the Mosaic law asserts the postponement of the revelation of the promised access even as it symbolizes it. With the historical inauguration of the “eternal covenant” (13:20), the goal has been reached. How this writer views the revelatory function of the first covenant is implied by the way in which he uses it to explicate the perfect high priesthood of the Christ; discontinuity and continuity thus converge in the notion of perfection. Further, if Ps. 110 ordains a change of priesthood, then we should expect to find that the Scriptures anticipated a change of law/covenant. Of course, they do so in a famous passage (Jer. 31), and the writer will cite it shortly (8:8–12). Thus Jer. 31, which again bespeaks discontinuity and continuity, is made to serve the argument of Ps. 110:4, and the scriptural pieces interlock perfectly in the Son (1:1–2).

Finally, before summarizing the argument thus far (7:26–28), it is further supported by focusing on the implications of the divine oath and the inherent weakness of the human priests (vv. 20–25).

Merely human priests are not able to usher humanity through eschatological divine judgment and death to the “world to come.” Thus, the Son by virtue of his resurrection life “is able to save forever [or, to the uttermost] those who are drawing near to God through him, because he always lives to intercede for them” (v. 25 AT; cf. 2:14–15).

Priestly Ministry in the True Tent (8:1–10:18). If the argument of 5:5–6 proceeded by slipping from Ps. 110:1 down to v. 4, then the direction is reversed in 8:1–2, the hinge text between 5:1–7:28 and 8:3–10:18. The fact of the high priesthood having been established through Ps. 110:4, we (p 279) follow the lead of Ps. 110:1 into the location and nature of Christ’s ministry.

First, it is established that the Melchizedekian order must involve a sacrifice in a temple, and that it must be the “true” sacrifice and temple to which the earthly sacrifices and tabernacle/temple corresponded (an ancient and widespread notion, native to the OT) and which they foreshadowed as an eschatological reality. All this was indicated by the Scriptures themselves. As to the day of inauguration, Christ’s earthly ministry before the cross served to prepare and qualify him vocationally. But his entrance into the office appears to have comprised everything from the cross onward, such that the cross is an aspect of the heavenly offering (Milligan 127–33; Peterson 191–95; contra Westcott 227–30).

Having established that Christ, as our high priest (5:1–7:28), has obtained a ministry within the “true tent” superior to that of the Levitical priesthood (8:1–13), the exposition proper concludes with an extended and involved description of that ministry (9:1–10:18). To understand Christ’s service, this description proceeds along the lines of a broad utilization of the Levitical priestly service. The centerpiece is going to be the annual Day of Atonement (Lev. 16; cf. 23:26–32; Num. 29:7–11), quite naturally, since the ultimate point of either system is the approach to God, quintessentially expressed in the entrance into the Most Holy Place. Yet the argument slides with ease from there to the daily service and the covenant inauguration ceremony and back, allowing these cultic actions to merge somewhat. Ultimately, the argument is that the entire integrated Mosaic cultus (the law) possesses the “shadow of the good things that are coming, and not the very embodiment [or, actual presence] of the realities” (10:1 AT; cf. 8:5). Thus, while the law corresponds to and thus reveals Christ’s ministry, providing the categories through which Christ’s ministry is to be imagined and understood (continuity), it must be clearly seen that it is not the reality and stands in contrast to it (discontinuity).

What should be noticed in this is that the logic of the argument does not work on the basis of a simple material versus immaterial opposition. It is finally the blood and body of Christ as fully human that replace the sacrifices of the old covenant. Just exactly what blood signified for the writer is never articulated (cf. Ellingworth 471–74; Attridge 248); likely it was accepted by writer and readers alike as a polyvalent symbol from the OT. Within this argument, Christ’s blood alone effects true cleansing, forgiveness, and sanctification; certainly the opening chapters of Scripture are never far from the writer’s mind, suggesting that he views all of this as the answer to the defilement, death, and expulsion of Gen. 3. This in turn assumes a broader understanding of a substitutionary atonement (2:9; 10:12). For this reason, Christ’s sacrifice was effective for all sins from the foundation of the world (9:15, 26).

Hebrews 10:1–18 constitutes a four-shot finishing salvo, summarizing the general perspective on the law (10:1–3) and underscoring it with three scriptural appeals: Ps. 40:6–8 (39:7–9 LXX, in Heb. 10:4–9); Ps. 110:1 (109:1 LXX, in Heb. 10:11–14); Jer. 31:33–34 (in Heb. 10:15–18). The closing words of 10:18, masterfully chosen, contain within them both promise (10:19–25) and warning (10:26–31).

Hebrews and the Canon

The question of canonization was dealt with above (on what follows, in general see Lindars 119–27). Certainly there are NT parallels to elements within Hebrews’ theology (e.g., Attridge 30–31, 102–3; Koester 54–58). Yet, in spite of the call to hold fast to “our confession” of Jesus being “high priest” (3:1; 4:14; 10:23), only in Hebrews is Christ directly called the “high priest” (= “great priest” in 10:21) or even a “priest.” Nowhere else in the NT is Melchizedek or his priesthood mentioned or Ps. 110:4 taken up. Moreover, the convergence of sonship (not merely a royal idea in Hebrews) and priesthood, on the one hand, and priesthood and kingship on the other (6:20–7:1)—this convergence is provocative against their OT background. Unique also is the way in which Hebrews portrays the heavenly cultus, especially in line with the Day of Atonement. All these points, with the exception of kingship, are basic to Hebrews’ entire argument.

It has been said of Hebrews’ Christology that it provides some of the clearest statements in the NT supporting both preexistence and adoption (Dunn 52). Related to this, the depictions of the Son’s inclusion in the divine identity and his full participation in human “blood and flesh” (2:14 AT)—yet without sin—are among the strongest anywhere. Moreover, Hebrews does not hold back from drawing out the implications of the Son’s humanity as the leader and perfecter of faith (2:10, 17–18; 4:15; 5:7–10; 12:1–3). Hebrews’ definition and illustration of faith itself develops much more richly than James (2:14–26), and in a distinctive fashion develops an aspect of faith that Paul only alludes to (e.g., Gal. 5:6). In its strong warnings against unbelief, Hebrews’ “rigorism” (5:11–6:20; (p 280)10:26–30, 39; 12:17) has challenged readers since the earliest centuries. Themes such as the word of God, angels, promise/oath, resting place, the new covenant, perfection, and divine discipline receive distinctive treatment here.

Certainly, Hebrews’ use of the OT signals a deep investment of this writer’s argument in the Scriptures. This facet of the book not only provides one of the chief NT examples of apostolic exegesis; it also represents a highly developed theology of the divine Word in history (Hughes). His approach to the OT takes seriously its historical nature but insists that it speaks directly to the Christian context, sometimes even consisting of words spoken by Christ himself (e.g., 2:12–13; 10:5–7); carefully understood, there is nothing naive or manipulative in his work. Consistent with this is the strategy to show how the OT Scriptures themselves indicate their incompleteness and anticipate the perfect yet to come (Caird, “Exegetical”). The result is that both deep-running continuity and sharp discontinuity cut across the entire fabric of usage. Certainly this strategy is informed and guided by the writer’s Christology, and there can be no question that the Scriptures came to this writer as already interpreted. Yet he gives every indication of conducting an independent, fresh reading of the OT, which is finally to be measured by the implicit claims that this is truth. It is true both in terms of what the Scriptures were/are saying (from his own perspective, he is simply articulating the meaning that is in fact there, in the text) and in terms of how things are with God and the world, “yesterday and today and forever” (13:8).

Hebrews and Theology

There is something fascinating and unsettling about this book that names neither author nor audience. It cannot have come from any of the disciples, and it has no claim to have been Paul’s, yet it represents one of the leading theological voices of the apostolic age. The most “Hellenistic” of NT books, yet known as “to the Hebrews,” intensely pastoral and theologically creative, a heavenly summons to a very earthly holiness—it has spent much of its existence on the margins. Its glimpse into the abyss of apostasy has kept the church off balance from the beginning till now. Its cultic logic has puzzled a Gentile-dominated church, derogating the blood sacrifices of animals by insisting on the blood sacrifice of the Son of God, pronouncing obsolete the Mosaic cultus while leaving no alternative but to view Christ's work, encompassing all of creation's story, through the cultic world of Israel's story. In Christ's work, finally, the voice of God has been heard, the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, our great high priest. As certainly as Hebrews contemporizes the OT Scriptures in the mouth of the Holy Spirit, so also in it the Spirit speaks, as the church has acknowledged.

Without looking over its shoulder, Hebrews has passed beyond questions of Jew-Gentile boundary markers and ethnic derivation to the one God who has spoken to his one historic people, past, present, and future, formerly and incompletely in the prophets, consummately in these last days in the Son. All of the readers—presumably Gentiles too—are Abraham's seed (2:16) and heirs of the promise to him (6:13–20). Again, this writer has not been shy to make explicit what was latent in the inherited confession. He fearlessly works out the implications of the Scriptures and thus reveals—not constructs—for the church a wider and clearer vision of a priestly sacrifice and intercessory ministry than is given anywhere else in the canon (regarding the Eucharist, in general and as a sacrifice, and the Christian priesthood, see Koester 127–29; Lindars 136–42).

Centrally, Hebrews is a summons to faith. That its salvation is by divine grace is explicit, and in the world projected by this writer's theology, it could not possibly be otherwise than through faith. That this is a faith with deeds, a faith expressing itself through love, is assumed. But what matters here is that ours is a faith that is “the reality of things hoped for, the proof of things unseen” (11:1 AT). This faith was pioneered and perfected by Jesus Christ, so that through his work authentic faith embodies his agonistic story of salvation.

Remarkably, given the nature of its argument, this discourse with studied care avoids a restriction of its challenge to Jewish readers tempted to return to the religion of the temple. Certainly, as Lindars has emphasized (101–18, 134), there is an effective program offered for those who feel the need “to do something practical so as to objectify their inner conflict of emotions” concerning guilt. Yet if, when Hebrews says that “we have here no enduring city” (13:14), this applies to Jerusalem, then, a fortiori, it applies to Rome—or to Kampala—as it does to Jerusalem. Nothing finally requires us to think that the writer's concerns were limited to a threatened return to Judaism; his thoroughgoing appeal to the OT law is due more to his theology of the Word than to the orientation of his audience. His real concern is that his readers “show the same zeal” that they (p 281) had earlier demonstrated “until the end”—that they continue to stand their ground “in a great contest with sufferings,” accepting the seizure of their possessions, because they know that they have a “better and lasting possession.”

What this sermon’s effect was on the house church for which it was written cannot be known. But for the church catholic this “word of exhortation” has done exactly what it set out to do: encourage and embolden to a faith that will go outside the camp, bearing the disgrace Christ bore. Countless thousands have enacted such a form of existence “to the point of shedding blood,” based precisely on this firm demonstration and revelation of the high priestly work of Christ. They did not shrink back.

Bibliography

Attridge, H. The Epistle to the Hebrews. Hermeneia. Fortress, 1989; Barrett, C. K. “The Christology of Hebrews.” Pages 110–27 in Who Do You Say That I Am? ed. M. A. Powell and D. Bauer. Westminster John Knox, 1999; idem. “The Eschatology of the Epistle to the Hebrews.” Pages 363–93 in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube. Cambridge University Press, 1954; Blackstone, T. “The Hermeneutics of Recontextualization in the Epistle to the Hebrews.” Diss., Emory University, 1995; Bockmuehl, M. “The Church in Hebrews.” Pages 133–51 in A Vision for the Church, ed. M. Bockmuehl and M. B. Thompson. T&T Clark, 1997; Caird, G. B. “The Exegetical Method of the Epistle to the Hebrews.” CJT 5 (1959): 44–51; idem. “Son by Appointment.” Pages 73–81 in vol. 1 of The New Testament Age, ed. W. C. Weinrich. Mercer University Press, 1984; Demarest, B. A History of the Interpretation of Hebrews 7,1–10 from the Reformation to the Present Day. Mohr/Siebeck, 1976; Dunn, J. D. G. Christology in the Making. 2d ed. SCM, 1989; Dunnill, J. Covenant and Sacrifice in the Letter to the Hebrews. SNTSMS 75. Cambridge University Press, 1992; Ellingworth, P. The Epistle to the Hebrews. NIGTC. Eerdmans, 1993; Grässer, E. Der Glaube im Hebräerbrief. MTS 2. Elwert, 1965; Greer, R. The Captain of Our Salvation. Mohr/Siebeck, 1973; Guthrie, G. The Structure of Hebrews. NovTSup 73. Brill, 1994; Hagen, K. Hebrews Commenting from Erasmus to Bèza, 1516–1598. Mohr/Siebeck, 1981; idem. A Theology of Testament in the Young Luther. Brill, 1974; Hagner, D. The Use of the Old and New Testaments in Clement of Rome. NovTSup 34. Brill, 1973; Hughes, G. Hebrews and Hermeneutics. SNTSMS 36. Cambridge University Press, 1979; Hurst, L. D. The Epistle to the Hebrews. SNTSMS 65. Cambridge University Press, 1990; Käsemann, E. The Wandering People of God, trans. R. A. Harrisville. Augsburg, 1984; Koester, C. Hebrews. AB 36. Doubleday, 2001; Laansma, J. “I Will Give You Rest.” WUNT 2.98. Mohr/Siebeck, 1997; Lane, W. Hebrews 1–8 and Hebrews 9–13. WBC 47A–B. Word, 1991; Lindars, B. The Theology of the Letter to the Hebrews. NTT. Cambridge University Press, 1991; Loader, W. R. G. Sohn und Hoherpriester. WMANT 53. Neukirchener Verlag, 1981; Manson, W. The Epistle to the Hebrews. Hodder & Stoughton, 1951; Milligan, G. The Theology of the Epistle to the Hebrews. T&T Clark, 1899; Peterson, D.

Hebrews and Perfection. SNTSMS 47. Cambridge University Press, 1982; Westcott, B. F. The Epistle to the Hebrews. Macmillan & Co., 1892.

Jon C. Laansma

Heidegger, Martin See Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics;
Onto-Theology

Hell See Last Things, Doctrine of

Hellenism See Jewish Context of the NT; Roman Empire

Hermeneutical Circle

The term “hermeneutical circle” has two separable but closely related meanings. One concerns the relation between understanding the “parts” of the text and understanding it as a “whole.” A “circle” arises because each process depends reciprocally upon the other. To understand the parts (grammar, vocabulary, and individual elements in their context), we need to have some inkling of the whole, including what the text is about. Yet to understand this “whole” depends on an apprehension of its elements. These two processes together form a progressive dialectic. Hence, “spiral” might be less misleading than “circle.”

A second version of this principle traces a parallel dialectic between the two poles of a “preliminary” understanding or (reflecting the German) of preunderstanding (Vorverständnis), and a fuller understanding (Verstehen), for which this beginning can pave the way. The interpreter begins with what Dilthey calls a prior relationship to “life” (Leben), in contrast to what Lonergan terms “the principle of the empty head.” The latter leads nowhere. Bultmann suggests an example: to understand a musical text, we need to have some inkling of what music is; to suppress everything that we may know already about music simply ensures an absence of understanding.

This process does not stop here. The fuller (or more accurate) understanding “speaks back” to the preunderstanding to correct and to reshape it. This revision contributes to a better understanding. Hence, to reread a “difficult” book, or even to undertake successive readings, may bring about a deeper understanding of it.

Applications of the First Version in Hermeneutics

Schleiermacher (1768–1834) expounded both versions of the hermeneutical circle and is often credited with its first formulation. However, he (p 282) himself gives this credit to Friedrich Ast

(1778–1841): “The hermeneutical principle which Ast has proposed and ... developed ... is that just as the whole is understood from the parts, so the parts can be understood only from the whole.”

Schleiermacher observes that this principle is “incontestable”: “One cannot begin to interpret without using it” (195–96).

It is central to Romanticist hermeneutics that to understand a text the interpreter needs to catch the vision that inspired or motivated the author to give creative expression to it in a text. Thus, Schleiermacher valued “NT Introduction” because on the one hand it engaged with the occasion for writing and the author’s distinctive theology, and on the other hand with the grammatical and lexicographical details needed to test or to correct provisional understandings of this larger picture. This also reflects a broad correlation with Schleiermacher’s other two poles, the “divinatory” (divinatorische) and “comparative” axes of understanding. The divinatory is “the feminine strength in knowing people,” and the comparative is the “masculine,” scientific, and analytical dimension (150).

Elsewhere I have applied this principle to the understanding of Pauline texts. As Beker urges concerning Paul, a constructive dialectic emerges between the principle of coherence and the principle of contingency. The first concerns the nature of Paul’s theology and his vision as a whole; the second explores the exegesis of passages written for specific occasions. Each facilitates understanding the other (Beker; Thiselton 237–71). This also applies to understanding interpreters themselves.

Applications of the Second Version in Hermeneutics

A positive emphasis upon preunderstanding appears in Schleiermacher, Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), and Hans-Georg Gadamer (1900–2002), but is most widely associated with Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976). Yet a rudimentary awareness of the hermeneutical circle emerged in the work of Heinrich Bullinger in 1538. He held that a preliminary notion of where the author’s argument leads must inform detailed understandings of the language and text. In 1742 Chladenius also stressed the relevance of an initial “perspective” (Sehe-Punkt) on the part of an interpreter.

Schleiermacher is more explicit: “The provisional grasp of the whole ... will necessarily be incomplete; ... our initial grasp is only provisional” (200). “Even after we have revised our initial concept of the work, understanding is still only provisional.... [But] this procedure is indispensable” (201, 203). Bultmann’s most widely known account occurs in his essay “Is Exegesis without Presuppositions Possible?” (342–51). Here he discusses W.

Dilthey's notion of the interpreter's "life-relation" to the text. Preunderstanding (Vorverständnis) comes through experience of life (Leben) and equips an initial encounter with a text to lead on to "understanding" (Verstehen). Bultmann writes, "Can one understand economic history without having a concept of what economy and society ... mean? One cannot understand the Communist Manifesto of 1848 without understanding the principles of capitalism and socialism" (347). Exegesis thus "presupposes" a life-relation that constitutes a needed preunderstanding.

Heidegger insists: "Interpretation is grounded in something we have in advance ... in a fore-conception [Vorgriff]" (192). He concedes that the interpreter "must already have understood what is to be interpreted"; but adds, "If we see this circle as a vicious one, ... the act of understanding has been misunderstood from the ground up" (194–95). In Gadamer, this gives rise to a dialectical process of question and answer, and the role of "openness" in inquiry.

Since about 1970 the hermeneutical circle has featured prominently in liberation hermeneutics, in feminist interpretation, and in ideological critiques including Marxist hermeneutics. Juan Luis Segundo appeals to the hermeneutical circle to legitimate a "pre-understanding" of solidarity with the poor (esp. 29), and he cites the work of James Cone as another positive use of the hermeneutical circle to privilege Black consciousness as a condition for liberating interpretation (Cone 53–81). Do these uses, however, compromise the "openness" that Gadamer, Betti, and Ricoeur find essential for a preunderstanding that is not shaped by "interest"? See also Dialogism; Hermeneutics

Bibliography

Beker, J. C. Paul the Apostle. Fortress, 1980; Bultmann, R. Existence and Faith. Fontana, 1964; Cone, J. A Black Theology of Liberation. Lippincott, 1970; Heidegger, M. Being and Time. Blackwell, 1962; Schleiermacher, F. Hermeneutics. Scholars Press, 1977; Segundo, J. L. The Liberation of Theology. Orbis, 1976; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. Paternoster, 1992.

Anthony C. Thiselton

(p 283)Hermeneutics

"Hermeneutics" denotes critical reflection upon processes of interpretation and understanding, especially the interpretation of biblical texts or texts that originate from within other cultures. However, this may include all kinds of communicative processes, from signs and visual art to institutions and literary phenomena.

Introduction: The Shape of the Subject

In premodern times hermeneutics was often defined as the formulation of “rules” of interpretation. However, after Schleiermacher (1768–1834) it was widely recognized that understanding constitutes a creative art, not merely the application of rules. Further, hermeneutics became a transcendental discipline; it explored the very basis and conditions under which understanding becomes possible. After Schleiermacher it also became more significant to distinguish between the actual process of interpretation and a critical and coherent reflection upon this process.

A second turning point came with the work of Hans-Georg Gadamer (1900–2002). Gadamer stressed that all understanding is decisively conditioned not only by the place of texts within given historical horizons, but also by the “situatedness” of interpreters within their own historical horizons. “Historicality” [Geschichtlichkeit] conditions all understanding. If differences between these two horizons are simply suppressed, understanding will be illusory or distorted, and we cannot then “listen” to a text on its own terms.

Gadamer uses “method” in a pejorative sense. Method attempts to impose a preformed grid of concepts upon that which we seek to understand. Thereby it speaks before it listens, while hermeneutics listens before it speaks. “Method” reflects the generalizing bias of rationalism. By contrast, Gadamer looks to art, to “worlds” of language, for a more sensitive and fruitful dialectic between historical particularities and truth.

In this light many writers from Gadamer to the present emphasize the role of human fallibility, self-deception, manipulation, and “interest” in interpretation. Paul Ricoeur (b. 1913) begins with an account of the fallibility of the human will and the possibility of self-deception. Hermeneutics addresses the problem of “double meaning.” Hermeneutics may counter manipulation and “destroy idols,” as well as retrieve meaning. Jürgen Habermas (b. 1929) develops “interest” further. Suspicion of the interpreter or human “subject” reaches a high point in the deconstructionism of Jacques Derrida (1930–2004). In postmodernism Richard Rorty (b. 1931) tends to reverse the hermeneutical project by transposing it into a version of pragmatic relativism, in which the verdict of the “local” peer-group becomes a criterion of truth. This is a reversal of Schleiermacher and Gadamer, even if Rorty calls it “hermeneutics.”

Hermeneutics nurtures respect for “the other.” It endeavors to train habits of “listening” to the other (including texts) on its own terms, before laying out some conceptual grid into which “the other” must fit. In their original aims, although not always in their programs, liberation hermeneutics, feminist hermeneutics, black hermeneutics, and even Marxist hermeneutics arose as attempts to hear the voice of the marginalized, or “the other.” Emilio Betti (1890–1968) believes that hermeneutics should be required in all universities, because it nurtures patience, tolerance, the capacity to listen, and respect for the “otherness” of the other, rather than “mastery” by reason alone.

Hermeneutical Reflection in the Ancient World and the Early Church

It is difficult to draw a clear line between interpretative practices and hermeneutical reflection. Philo of Alexandria (ca. 20 BCE–50 CE) interprets much of the OT in allegorical terms, but it is clear that this results from hermeneutical reflection on the misleading character of anthropomorphisms in language about God. To say “God planted a garden in Eden” is “fabulous nonsense,” just as Adam cannot “hide” from God (Philo, Plant. 8; cf. Gen. 2:8; 3:8).

Whether Paul uses “allegorical” interpretation in Gal. 4:24–26 may be a matter of interpretative practice rather than “hermeneutics,” although modern discussions do elucidate a hermeneutical principle. Otto Michel prefers the term “typology” to “allegory” because allegory suggests parallel ideas, but typology rests on parallel events. In pre-Pauline traditions, the phrase “in accordance with the Scriptures” (1 Cor. 15:3–5 NRSV) denotes an appeal to Scripture as a frame of reference for understanding Christ’s death and resurrection, not simply an appeal to some specific text. This coheres with Jesus’ two-way use of the OT: Scripture sheds light on his work, while Christology equally offers a frame of reference within which to understand Scripture (Luke 24:26–27).

In the second century Marcion provoked debate about the OT as Scripture. The church rejected his devaluing of the OT. Irenaeus (ca. 130–ca. 200) also raised the question of the status (p 284) of Christian tradition (regula fidei) as a necessary guide for interpretation of the Bible. It is because they ignore such tradition and Christology that gnostic exegesis becomes fanciful and “garbled” (Haer.* 1.11.1; 2.5.2).

Origen (ca. 185–254) formulated perhaps the first system of hermeneutics. He postulated a “triple sense” of Scripture: the literal, the moral, and the spiritual (Princ. 4). However, this is not merely “allegorical interpretation,” for Origen grounds his work in an appreciation of symbol, a theology of the incarnation, and a “sacramental” view of the world. The Scriptures are “letters brought to life by the Holy Spirit” (Balthasar xii; Torjesen).

Origen also pays attention to the effects of texts upon readers. When he speaks of the Gospel of John as “spiritual,” he is thinking of its transforming power; it is more than “a book of facts.” “The words must be brought to life” (Princ. 4.1.7). These are God’s words, albeit spoken through “earthen vessels” (4.1.6). Origen does not devalue the “literal” meaning. R. W. L. Moberly broadly echoes Origen’s perspective when he urges that we should “take with full seriousness the integrity of the biblical text on its own terms, that is, to find the ‘spiritual meaning’ precisely in the ‘literal sense’ ” (231–32).

This suggests the need for caution against any overly neat contrast between a supposedly allegorizing “Alexandrian” school (Origen and his successors) and a supposedly more literalist “Antiochene” school (John Chrysostom, 347–407, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, ca. 350–428). Chrysostom indeed emphasized the need to study the mind of the writer, and to pay attention to the linguistic context. Why was this passage composed? What is it to effect (“Homily LXIV on Matthew,” sect. 3)? However, it may be more accurate to suggest that while Antiochenes looked especially to authors of texts, Alexandrians looked in greater degree to the pastoral effect on readers, although even this is relative.

Features from the Middle Ages to the Eighteenth Century

Gregory the Great (of Rome; ca. 540–604) commended the “four senses” of Scripture: the literal (mainly semantic and historical), the allegorical (often a spiritual or pastoral extension of meaning), the moral, and the anagogical (a context in world-history related to eschatology).

The medieval Glossa ordinaria, or standard “gloss,” offered brief explanatory notes on given chapters or verses, and could vary in quality from personal intrusions to responsible exegetical comments. Hugh of St. Victor (d. 1141) placed a renewed historical emphasis on the agenda. Thomas Aquinas (ca. 1225–74) endorsed the notion of “the fourfold sense,” but also paid special attention to linguistic and theological issues: Scripture uses metaphor, but above all it reveals God.

Luther (1483–1546) and Calvin (1509–64) insisted that Scripture is not so multilayered and polyvalent that it presents only puzzles and uncertainties. Their concern to promote the clarity of Scripture (claritas Scripturae in Luther; perspicuitas Scripturae in Calvin) and their claims about a “single” meaning belong in this polemical context. These are misunderstood if viewed in the abstract. The many exegetical commentaries that they produced demonstrate that, as H. Bavinck observes, “Clarity does not mean that ... exegesis would be unnecessary” (cited with approval by Berkouwer 271). Erasmus regarded Scripture as so complex that it was virtually impossible for an interpreter to pass through its puzzles to certain knowledge. Luther replied that the interpreter could always apprehend “sufficient” light for each step of the way for doctrine and action.

Luther and Calvin also offered many guidelines familiar in biblical studies. “We must look and see to whom it has been spoken, whether it fits us” (LWorks 35:170). By forcing passages out of context, each “constructs his own Christ” (LWorks 40:157). William Tyndale (ca. 1494–1536) stressed the historical and corporate dimensions of hermeneutics, including what today we might call the capacity of Scripture to perform speech acts: it promises, heals, convicts, appoints, pronounces verdicts, and liberates (7–10).

J. C. Dannhauer appears to have been the first to use the actual term “hermeneutics” as a title in 1654. By the eighteenth century, however, hermeneutics had become a broader discipline. In 1713 Christian Wolff produced a general work, in which he emphasized “author’s intention.” In 1728 Jean Alphonse Turretinus reaffirmed that the goal of interpretation was to place oneself within the surroundings and times of biblical writers. Chladenius (1742) noted the role of interpreters’ “perspective” (Sehe-punkt). J. A. Ernesti (1707–81) distinguished between hermeneutics as the study of meaning and theology as the study of truth; but J. S. Semler (1725–91) insisted that hermeneutics embraced both.

(p 285) *The Refounding of Hermeneutics as a Modern, Independent Discipline

Friedrich Schleiermacher stands at a decisive turning point in the development of hermeneutics. In his early years he was deeply influenced by Moravian pietism. However, he also discovered and relished the intellectual challenges of university theology and the transcendental philosophy of Kant. Kant had asked not simply, “What do we know?” but also, “On what basis is knowledge possible?” Schleiermacher asked not simply, “How do we understand texts?” but also, “On what basis is textual understanding possible?” Hermeneutics became an independent discipline exploring the problem of “understanding” (Verstehen). In the past, he believed, hermeneutics had been subsumed within some prior system, and applied retrospectively to justify an “understanding” already reached. He called such a procedure “regional hermeneutics,” in contrast to “universal hermeneutics.”

Schleiermacher based hermeneutics on two poles or axes: the divinatory and the comparative. He writes, “The divinatory (divinatorische) method seeks to gain an immediate comprehension of the author as an individual.” “Divinatory knowledge is the feminine strength in knowing people; comparative knowledge, the masculine” (150). He illustrates this in The Celebration of Christmas (1805). After the Christmas service, the women of the household sing hymns to Jesus, while the men debate the conceptual difficulties of the incarnation. The women “understand” Christmas, which is like “a long, caressing kiss” to the world.

Yet both poles are necessary. To divine intuitively without critical reflection is the way of “the nebulist”; to focus narrowly on historical and comparative questions without personal vision is the way of “the pedant” (205). These respectively become the key categories of “understanding” (Verstehen) and “explanation” (Erklärung) in Ricoeur, Apel, and Habermas. Understanding reflects Schleiermacher’s pietist roots and his interaction with Romanticism; explanation reflects his respect for Enlightenment thought and transcendental philosophy.

A divinatory perception of the whole transcends mere “analysis” of the elements of a text. Here Schleiermacher expounds “the hermeneutical circle” in two senses. To understand presupposes a preliminary understanding (or preunderstanding, Vorverständnis) of the whole, but this in turn depends on understanding the parts; yet even to commence the process of understanding presupposes such a preunderstanding of what is to be understood. A parallel circular (or spiral) movement characterizes (1) understanding the whole and the parts, and (2) preunderstanding and fuller understanding. Hermeneutics thus requires study of “Introduction to the NT,” although not for merely antiquarian purposes. “Only historical interpretation can do justice to the rootedness of the New Testament authors in their time and place” (104). “The interpreter must put himself ... in the position of the author” (112–13).

Further, the NT can be understood “only by the joint consideration of two factors: the content of the text and the range of effects” (151, italics added). Although he speaks of “psychological” interpretation, Schleiermacher does not elevate inner “intentions” above language in the public, intersubjective world (expanded in Thiselton, New Horizons, 204–36, 558–62).

Wilhelm Dilthey (1831–1911) stands as Schleiermacher’s successor in hermeneutics in several respects, but also with major differences. Dilthey drew on Hegel’s concept of “historical understanding” and placed hermeneutics on the agenda for the social sciences. He extended textual interpretation to interpretation of actions and institutions, and had a stronger perception of the double-sided historical “situatedness” both of interpreters and of what they sought to understand.

Martin Heidegger (1889–1976) radicalized this historical situatedness or “historicality” (Geschichtlichkeit). He used the term “being-there” (Dasein) in contrast to Being (Sein), viewing Dasein as “thrown” into a pregiven “world,” which bounded its horizons of understanding. Although he describes this as “phenomenology,” many see it as an existentialist hermeneutics. Heidegger further declares that time is “the horizon for the understanding of Being” (40). Thus, a pregiven temporal “world” determines “possibilities” for Dasein and human understanding. It is in terms of this pregiven world that we understand something as something (188–90). Hence, “interpretation is grounded ... in a fore-conception” (Vorgriff, 191), and understanding is never without “presuppositions” (191–92).

Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) echoes this last phrase and also seeks to formulate an existential hermeneutic of the NT. Indeed, his proposals to “demythologize” the NT are largely based on the view that while “myth” purports to describe “objective” states of affairs, in actual practice myth serves to evoke certain attitudes or to generate (p 286) certain acts of will. More strictly, it might be called a program of de-objectification. He writes, “The real purpose of myth is not to present an objective picture of the world as it is.... Myth should be interpreted not cosmologically but anthropologically, or better, existentially” (1:10).

Bultmann offers three definitions of myth, but these do not entirely cohere with one another. Sometimes “myth” denotes an “obsolete” worldview in which miracles occur; sometimes it is virtually equivalent to analogy or metaphor. In this latter case, we could not dispense with myth, and demythologizing would be impossible. The main use of myth is to denote existential language disguised as descriptive or “objective” language. Thus, language about creation is not to inform us about events in a remote past, but to summon us to acknowledge our present creatureliness and total dependence upon God. Language about the last judgment is not to describe some future event, but to call us to responsibility before God.

Sometimes this does indeed help to restore “the main point” of certain biblical material. Nevertheless, Bultmann is profoundly mistaken in holding a view of language that ascribes to it only one function at a time (either to describe or to change our attitude). If he had engaged with J. L. Austin’s view of performative language, or with Wittgenstein, or with wider theories of language, Bultmann would have perceived that often it is precisely because language conveys truth about a state of affairs that its force may be performative or life-changing. Jesus can effectively say “I forgive you” because God has authorized Jesus to act in the place of God. Christians can acknowledge Christ as Lord not only in terms of an existential cash-currency of trust and obedience as “slaves of Christ,” but also because God has declared that Christ is Lord (as the state of affairs) at the resurrection (Rom. 1:3–4). To be “raised with Christ” presupposes that Christ was raised in a more-than-subjective or existential way (1 Cor. 15:3–5; for a detailed critique, see Thiselton, Two Horizons, 205–92).

The Late Twentieth Century: From Gadamer to Postmodern Approaches

Gadamer takes us beyond rationalism, but also beyond existentialism. In part 1 of Truth and Method, he compares the more fruitful starting points of the classical sensus communis and of Bildung as “formation”—against a narrower rationalism (Gadamer 9–30). He compares the appropriate historical concerns of Vico with the individualistic rationalism of Descartes. Kant’s preoccupation with “autonomy” and the individual self misleads (Gadamer 42–70). Further, aesthetics cannot be transposed into merely abstract concepts without distortion (81–100).

He explores the dynamics of the “world” of the game, “performance” in theatre or festival, and art as ontology. In the “world” of the game, “the primacy of play over the conscientiousness of the player is ... acknowledged.... Play draws him into its domain” (Gadamer 104, 109). What constitutes it as a game determines the world within which the player acts. The game exists only in its performance, just as “a festival exists only in its being celebrated” (124). Musical or theatrical events or games would not be what they are if they merely replicated previous music or games in every possible respect. They “define themselves” in contingent, finite terms “only through the occasion” (147), even if a continuity of tradition makes them performances of this music or this game. Understanding comes about in changing, contingent events, but also in dialectic with shared traditions.

Gadamer traces the development of the hermeneutical tradition in part 2 of Truth and Method. Schleiermacher had focused on “consciousness,” but this is “a distorting mirror” (276). Following Heidegger, he explores that upon which consciousness rests, historically given traditions and “prejudgments” or “prejudices” (Vorurteile). “Tradition is a ... partner in dialogue” (358). The Enlightenment wrongly opposed reason against tradition or authority. To acknowledge authority is an act of reason whereby reason, “aware of its own limitations, trusts to the better insight of others” (279). “Hermeneutical experience” is characterized by “openness.” “Anyone who listens is fundamentally open” (361). In openness, I “listen” even to “things that are against me.” This recalls the claims of Luther and Bonhoeffer that if we read Scripture only to affirm what we want to hear, its cutting edge will be blunted.

Gadamer urges that hermeneutics transforms supposedly fixed, freestanding “problems” into “questions that arise and that derive their sense from their motivation” (377). This forms a fruitful process of dialectic.

Part 3 explores ontology and language and contains some ambiguities. An overready hospitality to *intra*linguistic worlds may be said to invite postmodern perspectives, in spite of Gadamer’s emphasis upon historically given traditions. Further, he does not explicitly address the problem of criteria of understanding, not least because these cannot be formulated in advance, or in (p 287) abstraction from the dialectic of question and answer in its “application.” However, his work on linguistic “worlds” retains a constructive role in hermeneutical enquiry.

Paul Ricoeur (b. 1913) is the most creative hermeneutical theorist of our times. With an interdisciplinary approach, he begins with the fallibility of the human will and with the nature of symbol. He writes, “Extension of meaning [is] operative in every symbol” (Theory, 55). This also applies to dreams, which both disguise their content from the self through self-deception, yet are potentially revealing. Dreams are “disguised, substitutive, and fictive expressions of human wishing or desire” (Freud, 5). “To interpret is to understand a double meaning” (8).

Ricoeur’s recognition of deception alongside symbol reaches the heart of his hermeneutics. He writes, “Hermeneutics seems to me to be animated by the double motivation: willingness to suspect, willingness to listen; vow of rigor, vow of obedience. In our time we have not finished doing away with idols and we have barely begun to listen to symbols” (Freud, 27, with first italics mine; later italics, his). In his two masterpieces, Time and Narrative and Oneself as Another, he expounds the continuity of a stable self in terms of accountability and agency, and also temporally in relation to memory, attention, and hope. He expounds the temporal logic of “emplotment,” which allows for narrative coherence and responsible agency amid change and pluriformity. In effect, he recognizes certain insights of postmodern thought, including a hermeneutic of suspicion, but resists evaporating human selfhood into mere semiotic performances.

Ricoeur opposes oppressive manipulation. However, it is left to Jürgen Habermas, among others, to formulate a more explicitly sociopolitical hermeneutic. In Christian theology this kind of concern emerged in Gustavo Gutiérrez. Hermeneutics should begin, he argues, with an empathy with the socioeconomic situation of the poor in Latin America, as, in effect, a preunderstanding. He draws on hermeneutical tools associated with Marxist theorists and with Habermas, and focuses on specific biblical texts that handle “liberation,” notably that of the exodus. Within this movement Juan Luis Segundo acknowledges that liberation hermeneutics begins with “partiality,” and appeals to the hermeneutical circle for methodological justification for this. He claims that “de-ideologizing” is a legitimate parallel with Bultmann’s “demythologizing” (7–38, 231–34). Lack of space here prohibits my further discussion, available elsewhere (New Horizons, 103–41, 393–410, 430–70, 515–55, and elsewhere).

See also Allegory; Anthropomorphism; Authorial Discourse Interpretation; Deconstruction; Gnosticism; Hermeneutical Circle; Literal Sense; Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation; Reader-Response Criticism; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

Bibliography

Balthasar, H. U. von. “Preface.” In Origen: An Exhortation to Martyrdom, Prayer, and Selected Works, ed. R. Greer. SPCK, 1979; Barton, J., ed. The Cambridge Companion to Biblical Interpretation. Cambridge University Press, 1998; Berkouwer, G. C. Studies in Dogmatics: Holy Scripture. Eerdmans, 1975; Bultmann, R. “New Testament and Mythology.” In Kerygma and Myth, ed. H.-W. Bartsch. 2 vols. SPCK, 1962–64; Gadamer, H.-G. Truth and Method. 2d ed. Sheed & Ward, 1989; Gutiérrez, G. The Theology of Liberation. Orbis, 1973; Heidegger, M. Being and Time. Blackwell, 1962; Moberly, R. W. L. The Bible, Theology, and Faith. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Mueller-Vollmer, K., ed. The Hermeneutics Reader. Blackwell, 1986; Ricoeur, P. Essays on Biblical Interpretation. SPCK, 1981; idem. Freud and Philosophy. Yale University Press, 1970; idem. Interpretation Theory. Texas Christian University Press, 1976; idem. Time and Narrative. 3 vols. University of Chicago Press, 1984–88; Schleiermacher, F. . HermeneuticsHermeneutics. . Scholars PressScholars Press, , 19771977; ; SegundoSegundo, , J. L. The Liberation of Theology. Gill & Macmillan, 1977; Tate, W. Biblical Interpretation. Hendrickson, 1991; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. Paternoster, 1992; idem. The Two Horizons. Paternoster, 1980; Torjesen, K. Hermeneutical Procedure and Theological Method in Origen’s Exegesis. De Gruyter, 1986; Tyndale, W. A Pathway into the Holy Scripture. In Doctrinal Treatises, ed. H. Walter. Parker Society/Cambridge University Press, 1848; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998; Watson, F. Text, Church and World. T&T Clark, 1994.

Anthony C. Thiselton

Hero Story

Hero stories (or heroic narrative) are stories focused on the life and actions of the text’s protagonist, who “expresses an accepted social and moral norm” (Ryken 107). He is one whose life “reenacts the important conflicts of [his] community,” is able to benefit that community, and whose exploits “capture the popular imagination”; moreover, the hero’s narrative “suggests that life has both a significant pattern and an end” (Houghton and Strange xxiii; cf. Campbell). Biblical heroes have exemplary lives but are rarely portrayed as wholly ideal. Rather, they represent the cultural and religious values of their environment. Biblical heroes provide both positive examples to follow and negative examples to avoid; readers of biblical hero stories will see themselves (p 288) and their own circumstances in these heroes and their exploits.

The Bible abounds with various kinds of hero stories. Leland Ryken outlines different types of heroes: Idealized heroes merit respect and emulation. Tragic heroes, despite being basically good persons, possess a tragic character flaw that leads to a horrible mistake. And comic heroes, albeit imperfect, emerge victorious and sympathetic by dint of perseverance. Ryken notes that most biblical heroes can be considered “heroes of common humanity, or realistic heroes”—those who resemble us in both strengths and weaknesses, offering positive examples to follow and negative examples to avoid (108). The realistic and ultimately historical nature of such biblical heroes makes the term “hero story” preferable to the alternative term “legend,” a word whose meaning, by 1600, became increasingly associated with unhistorical accounts (OED). Heroes also fall under the larger category of archetypes—an image or pattern that recurs throughout literature and life, about which Northrop Frye has written extensively in general (Anatomy) and in the Bible specifically (Great Code; cf. Ryken, Wilhoit, and Longman [DBI], xvii–xx). While there are various kinds of archetypal characters (e.g., the virtuous wife, the benevolent ruler, the deliverer, et al.), the one most significant to biblical heroes is the “hero of faith”—a category celebrated in Heb. 11. Biblical heroes are inevitably heroes of faith, and they are inevitably rewarded for their faith even as, conversely, they fall from idealized stature when they exhibit less than unswerving dependence on God.

Heroes of Genesis

Genesis contains various realistic heroes of faith. Noah’s righteousness amid a corrupt generation and his unflinching obedience to the Lord seems to identify him as an idealized hero—until his drunken nakedness (9:21–22) reveals his fallibility. In the same way, Abraham’s bold obedience to God (e.g., leaving Haran, 12:4; nearly sacrificing Isaac, ch. 22; Auerbach), his courageous rescue of Lot (14:14–16), and his intimate, importunate relationship with the Lord (18:16–33) present us with an idealized figure. At the same time, his misrepresentations of Sarah before Pharaoh (12:10–20) and Abimelech (ch. 20) reveal his own lapses into cowardice and faithlessness, as does his relationship with Hagar (16:1–4). Nonetheless, Abraham’s NT representations are those of an idealized hero of faith. His role as the father of believers in God and Christ transcends his role as the physical father of the Jewish people (cf. John 8:31–59; Rom. 4; 9:7–8; Gal. 3:6–29; Heb. 6:13–15; 11:8–12, 17–19; DBI, 4–5).

Unlike the Noah and Abraham narratives, Jacob’s narrative features a protagonist whose initially dubious character becomes increasingly heroic. It is initially difficult to sympathize with the conniving and domestic Jacob, who cheats his older twin, Esau, out of both his birthright and blessing. When his father-in-law, Laban, later tricks Jacob into marrying his older daughter, Leah, one senses that Jacob is receiving his just deserts for his own deceptions (Gen. 29:23–27). Even before Laban’s bait and switch, however, Jacob begins to grow in faith—the most notable characteristic of his grandfather Abraham (28:10–22). This faith reaches heroic proportions when he wrestles with God (32:22–32). Significantly, this encounter immediately precedes Jacob’s reconciliation with Esau. Jacob’s ultimate reward for his great faith is (as was Abraham’s) his place as a patriarch of the people of Israel, and it is no coincidence that the One with whom Jacob wrestles names him “Israel” after Jacob’s successful struggle (32:28).

Jacob’s son Joseph follows a more idealistic route to heroism, most notably in the faith he demonstrates while resisting Potiphar’s wife and while a prisoner (39:1–41:40). Still, the youthful Joseph’s behavior before being sold into slavery may be seen as brash and conceited (37:2–11), and a development in Joseph’s character—from self-exalting to unequivocally exalted by God—is evident before he is called to rescue Egypt and his own family from famine.

Moses and Joshua

Moses’ story, spanning Exodus through Deuteronomy, is heroic in part because of Moses’ decision to leave his place of privilege as the son of Pharaoh’s daughter and instead to identify with and champion his own people, the enslaved Israelites (Heb. 11:24–26). As with the Genesis patriarchs, however, he is not an idealized hero, and his own flawed acts—his murder of the Egyptian (Exod. 2:12) and his striking of the rock before the Lord (Num. 20:10–12)—both display self-reliant anger instead of obedient submission to God’s direction. Significantly, the first rash act delays Moses’ ministry some forty years; the second prevents his entrance into the promised land. Overall, however, Moses is a quintessential hero of faith, obeying God unswervingly before the might of Pharaoh, his armies, and the natural elements.

(p 289) Moses heroically champions the cause of his people even as he rises above their common failings. Throughout their wanderings, Moses displays faith where the Israelites are faithless, most significantly in his bold responses both to their idolatry before the golden calf (Exod. 32) and their rebellion after the exploration into Canaan (Num. 14). In both these cases, Moses bravely upholds God's righteousness before a disobedient people. Moreover, in both instances, Moses intercedes for the people before a wrathful God, particularly significant in the second case, where God has threatened to destroy the Israelites altogether and make Moses himself "into a nation greater and stronger than they" (14:12). In these instances, Moses shows himself to be God's champion first and Israel's champion second, but there is no doubt that his former status brings about the latter.

Joshua, Moses' successor, can be seen as an idealized hero whose faithful obedience to God's commands enables him to lead Israel's conquest of the promised land (Josh. 1–12). Unlike Moses, he does not lapse into disobedience, and he enters the land as a reward for his faith (Num. 14:6–9, 30). Consequently, Joshua, God's flawless champion, was often portrayed as a type of Jesus, the Flawless One to come (e.g., Milton in Paradise Lost, 12:300–14; Flannagan 699nn94–95).

Later OT Heroes

The heroes of Israel continue throughout the OT, each displaying varying degrees of faithfulness to the Lord. Samson is a hero whose consistent lapses into faithless disobedience are transcended by God's faithfulness to his champion (Judg. 13–16; cf. Heb. 11:32). An idealized contrast is Daniel, whose bold faith as a captive in Babylon empowers him to represent the highest ideals of his people's religion in the face of multiple antagonists and ordeals (Ryken 109–14). The OT heroes include the deliverers of Judges, prophets (most notably Samuel, Elijah, and Elisha), a number of the kings of Israel (or Judah, after the kingdom was divided), and the postexilic heroes Ezra and Nehemiah. Saul is the most prominent example of a tragic hero (Good 56–80; Ryken 151–55), although Samson too can rightly be classified as tragic (Ryken 148–51). Displaying the tragic flaw of impiety, Saul fears men before God; this results in his death and the end of his royal line. Saul demonstrates his flaw when he disobeys the Lord's instructions to destroy the Amalekites and all their possessions (1 Sam. 15). When Samuel confronts him, Saul admits that he “was afraid of the people” and succumbed to their demands (15:24). For this sin, God rejects Saul as king and chooses David to replace him (15:26–16:13).

The tragic Saul finds his foil in David, who exhibits heroic faith by slaying Goliath, defeating various enemies, and evading the jealous Saul (1 Sam. 17–2 Sam. 10). Sadly, his adultery with Bathsheba and murder of Uriah (2 Sam. 11) make David’s own story largely tragic in his later years. Although his repentance before God and Nathan (2 Sam. 12) saves him from an end like Saul’s, the tragic consequences of his actions can be seen in the death of his illegitimate son (12:18). In addition, violent strife and sexual immorality thereafter characterize David’s household (2 Sam. 13–18; 1 Kings 2:13–25). Similarly, Solomon indulges in sensuality and idolatry in old age and falls from heroic faithfulness; as punishment, God divides the kingdom after Solomon’s death (1 Kings 11:1–13).

Female Heroes

The OT contains a number of hero stories with female protagonists, two of the most prominent being Ruth and Esther. Ruth demonstrates heroic faithfulness to the Lord through faithfulness to her mother-in-law, Naomi, articulated in her declaration, “Where you go I will go, and where you stay I will stay. Your people will be my people and your God my God” (1:16). Ruth’s faithfulness is noticed by Boaz, who commends both her dedication to Naomi (2:11) and the upright manner in which she entreats him to marry her and fulfill his role as kinsman-redeemer (3:10). The ultimate significance of Ruth’s heroism is revealed in the book’s closing verses, which reveal her to be the great-grandmother of King David and (as we may see from Matt. 1:5) a direct ancestor of Jesus. (The NT also celebrates the heroic faithfulness of Boaz’s ancestor Rahab; Josh. 2; Matt. 1:5; Heb. 11:31.)

Esther’s heroic faithfulness is manifested in her loyalty to the Jewish people and her wise cousin Mordecai. Heeding his admonition that she may well have been raised up as King Xerxes’ queen in order to save the Jews from Haman’s plot (4:14), Esther wisely acts to rescue her people and expose Haman’s treachery.

The heroic faith of Deborah and Israel’s unlikely deliverer, Jael, is celebrated in Judg. 4–5 and contrasted favorably with Barak’s timidity (4:8). Curiously, Heb. 11 lists Barak while remaining silent about Deborah and Jael (11:32).

(p 290)The feminist critic Phyllis Trible has emphasized the stories of female characters who are marginalized and/or victimized in male-dominated narratives. Although Trible does not focus on heroic faith, at least two of these characters—Sarah (“Genesis”) and Hagar (Texts, 8–35; cf. Bellis 70–79), both of whose narratives are embedded within Abraham’s narrative—can be considered “heroes” in the sense discussed here. Both demonstrate various degrees of faith amid their comparative powerlessness.

Jesus as Hero

The Gospels can rightly be called heroic narratives of Jesus, for they consistently depict him as the ultimate “hero of faith.” This characterization extends from his youthful declaration, “I had to be in my Father’s house” (Luke 2:49), to his final words on the cross as recorded by Luke, “Father, into your hands I commit my spirit” (23:46; DBI, 381). Jesus’ most heroic act—his death on the cross for humanity’s sins—is portrayed in all four Gospels as an act of faithful obedience to God his Father (Matt. 26:39–46; Mark 14:35–42; Luke 22:42; John 18:11). Jesus also exhorts his disciples to exhibit heroic faith, telling them, “If you have faith as small as a mustard seed, . . . nothing will be impossible for you” (Matt. 17:20), and promising them, “Anyone who has faith in me will do what I have been doing” (John 14:12). It is thus fitting that the author of Hebrews immediately follows his litany of heroes by admonishing his audience and himself: “Let us fix our eyes on Jesus, the author and perfecter of our faith” (12:2). Indeed, the archetypal OT heroes of faith find their fulfillment in the heroic narrative of Jesus; in turn, all believers in Jesus are exhorted to display heroic faith themselves, having Jesus as their ultimate example (12:1–3).

Bibliography

Alter, R. The Art of Biblical Narrative. Basic, 1981; Auerbach, E. “Odysseus’ Scar.” Pages 3–23 in Mimesis. Princeton University Press, 1953; Bellis, A. Helpmates, Harlots, and Heroes. Westminster John Knox, 1994; Campbell, J. The Hero with a Thousand Faces. Bolligen Series 17. Pantheon, 1949; Flannagan, R. The Riverside Milton. Houghton Mifflin, 1998; Frye, N. Anatomy of Criticism. Princeton University Press, 1957; idem. The Great Code. Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1982; Good, E. Irony in the Old Testament. 2d ed. Almond, 1981; Houghton, W., and R. Strange. Victorian Poetry and Poetics. 2d ed. Houghton Mifflin, 1968; Nohrnberg, J. “Princely Characters.” Pages 58–97 in “Not in Heaven,” ed. J. Rosenblatt and J. Sitterson. Indiana University Press, 1991; Ryken, L. Words of Delight. 2d ed. Baker, 1992; Ryken, L., J. Wilhoit, and T. Longman III, eds. Dictionary of Biblical Imagery [DBI]. InterVarsity, 1998; Sternberg, M. The Poetics of Biblical Interpretation. Indiana University Press, 1985; Tribble, P. “Genesis 22: The Sacrifice of Sarah.” Pages 170–91 in “Not in Heaven,” ed. J. Rosenblatt and J. Sitterson; idem. Texts of Terror. Fortress, 1984.

David V. Urban

Hillel See Jewish Context of the NT

Hirsch, E. D., Jr. See Intention/Intentional Fallacy

Historical Criticism

Because both “history” and “criticism” are such protean terms, and have been for nearly two centuries, historical criticism has never been easy to define (notwithstanding the often rather arbitrary distinctions made between so-called “lower” and “higher criticism”). Historical criticism is sometimes narrowly defined as “the study of any narrative which purports to convey historical information in order to determine what actually happened” (Marshall 126). Yet, historical criticism is typically more broadly associated with the (more or less) scientific process of investigating a text’s transmission, development, and origins. It includes matters such as the text’s linguistic, literary, cultural, religious, political, sociological, psychological, economic, and anthropological context. Source, form, redaction, tradition, and even more recent rhetorical and reader-response criticism are often regarded as specialized types of historical criticism, but these disciplines have different goals even if they share methodological similarities. Historical criticism seeks to answer a basic question: to what historical circumstances does this text refer, and out of what historical circumstances did it emerge?

To some extent, historical criticism has been employed since ancient times, especially in the legal tradition, where questions about the meaning, intent, and authenticity of documents have always been at issue. But ever since Lorenzo Valla in 1440 exposed the spurious origins of the Donation of Constantine—a document falsely purported to go back to the early fourth century—and critically compared the Vulgate and the Greek NT, Western scholars especially have been concerned to interpret texts, especially the Bible, according to a systematic process of analysis. Thereby they at every point examine the relationship between what stands in the text and what stands behind it—the connection between the text and the various antecedents that may have shaped it. Renaissance humanism with its cry “Back to the (p 291)sources!” developed many tools for doing so, and Erasmus’s work on the Greek NT was a supremely influential product of this newer, more “critical” approach. In fact, many believe it was this newer, more rigorous approach to the Bible that was the driving force behind the Reformation. Whether or not their approach can be justly called “historical criticism,” the Reformers demonstrated a remarkable openness to using practically any tool for understanding what stands in the text. Moreover, they saw their approach to the interpretation of Scripture as a means of liberation not only from allegorical interpretation and many of the dogmatic interpretations of Rome, but also from the entire tradition and history of interpretation. For example, Calvin showed his historical curiosity through his efforts to harmonize the Synoptic Gospels and even wondered—though on the basis of albeit largely linguistic-grammatical analysis—who actually wrote the Epistles of James, Hebrews, and 2 Peter.

Protestants in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries used an increasingly historical approach to the Bible—the literal sense having gradually collapsed into the historical (Frei 1–50)—in order to continue their battle against Rome and to settle doctrinal disputes among themselves. They also used it to counteract the subjectivizing tendencies of pneumatic and pietistic interpreters. Yet the greatest impetus for such an approach came as a result of the Enlightenment’s rationalistic demands. In the face of growing skepticism about the Bible, especially the historicity of many of its narratives, many both within the church (Griesbach, Semler, Michaelis, et al.) and outside it (Spinoza, Reimarus, Lessing, et al.) thought a more “scientific” interpretative method was needed to warrant belief or disbelief in this or that church doctrine. By the nineteenth century highly sophisticated historiographical methods of research had developed. German scholars and others began to draw and insist upon a distinction between the traditional, commonplace definition of history—Geschichte, more akin to story—and a newer, more scientific kind of history—Historie, which is based on the formal concepts of analogy and probability. Von Hofmann and his followers made valiant efforts to rehabilitate history’s formal connection to faith by the development of the concept of Heilsgeschichte (salvation history), but the concept never really survived Troeltsch and the history of religions school.

With the rise of historical consciousness, an ever-increasing abundance of information about the past, and a growing confidence in modern man’s ability to ascertain it, history—both as an ideal concept and an academic discipline—began to assume almost metaphysical significance (Hegel). Instead of history being a predicate of revelation, revelation became for many a predicate of history. Thus, historical-criticism (now hyphenated to emphasize its power) became all the more important. In godlike fashion, many modern biblical interpreters began to presume a position of unprejudiced, nonparticipatory observation outside or above history even though their judgments were often as prejudiced, speculative, and dogmatic as those they were seeking to overcome. Unaware of the relativity of their own judgments, some approached the Bible with a presupposition of skepticism, especially with regard to miracles. In the name of scientific objectivity, others attempted to place biblical authors under the hot lights of historical criticism and conduct “a disciplined interrogation of their sources to secure a maximal amount of verified information” (Krentz 6). Other more sophisticated interpreters, such as Schleiermacher, claimed that the goal of interpretation was “to understand the author better than he understood himself.” Still others, with cruder methods and sensibilities, such as F. C. Baur, D. F. Strauss, and legions after them, searched for the “historical Jesus” as if with “swords and staves” (Matt. 26:47 KJV). But perhaps as significant as this or any hermeneutics of suspicion was historical critics’ focus on what lies behind the text rather than the text itself. Atomistic preoccupation with individual parts of the biblical witness, especially the various historical-psychological circumstances from which it arose, contributed to confusion over what the biblical witness as a whole is about: its actual content, subject matter, and theme.

Such confusion combined with the tendency to reduce the meaning of biblical texts to their sociohistorical antecedents or to the various psychological conditions of authors. All this led Karl Barth—having been deemed by his contemporaries as “a declared enemy of historical criticism”—to exclaim defiantly in his preface to the second edition of his Römerbrief (1922): “The historical critics must be more critical to suit me!” Barth’s theological revolution was in large part actually a protest against historicism and psychologism. These two great tools of modern theological reductionism were the philosophical and ideological bases for much that was done in the name of “historical criticism” throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Barth was not content with an explanation of the text that (p 292) he could not “regard as any explanation at all, but only as the first primitive attempt at one.” Nor was he content with a bifurcated, two-stage, “double-entry bookkeeping” approach whereby historical critical “results” stand on one side of the ledger and theological truths on the other, and the task of the exegete is to reconcile the two. Instead, Barth insisted that theological exegesis of the Bible include honest, sober historical-critical analysis. Yet suppose, as Barth also insisted, that the actual subject matter, content, and theme of the Bible is not a historical fact like other historical facts that can be grasped by historical critical investigation. Suppose it is not something a historian qua historian can find behind the biblical witness. Then what role does historical criticism have for the theological exegete?

Despite its misapplication and abuse, historical criticism provides an invaluable service. It offers an initial preparation for understanding what stands in the text. It delivers a disciplined and deliberate rather than arbitrary process for determining what is there. Because what is there is often not only propositional statements or expressions of human piety but also words that point to actual events and circumstances, historical criticism can be useful in reconstructing pictures of such events and circumstances. However, in light of Barth's efforts to promote theological exegesis, two important points should be made.

The first thing to be said about such pictures is that not only are they necessary; they are also inevitable. The witness of the prophets and apostles does indeed have to do with historical situations. Interpreters ineluctably reconstruct these situations in their minds, and do so with or without the help of historical criticism. The question, therefore, is not whether interpreters reconstruct what lies behind the text, but concerning the quality or appropriateness of the pictures they reconstruct. Obviously, some pictures are better, more plausible, and less anachronistic than others. This does not mean, of course, that truthful readings of the Bible are unavailable to "precritical" interpreters, only that "belief in the 'truth' of the Bible cannot be a substitute for historical study" (Marshall 132), any more than historical study can be a substitute for truth. But all interpreters, critical, precritical, or postcritical, do well to remember that the truth at issue in the Bible is one, not two, and cannot be divided up, parceled out, distributed, applied, or treated as some sort of aggregate. It is whole, complete in itself, self-determining and self-actualizing, or it is something else altogether.

Second, the picture that historical criticism helps to form is one solely in the mind of the interpreter. It is not to be confused with the actual events themselves or with the real subject matter, content, and theme the prophets and apostles' words bear witness to: God, truth, or revelation. In other words, historical critics should be wary of the temptation to make idols of such pictures. Because of the sovereign freedom of the Bible's central subject matter, content, and theme, such pictures should be regarded as strictly provisional and subject to continual reform.

Historical criticism can help not only to liberate readers from layers of false presuppositions and conceptions laid upon the text by the history of interpretation or tradition. It can also help to shatter the false images, the inappropriate conjectures and unwarranted constructions modern (and even postmodern) interpreters often bring to the Bible. It can serve to alert readers to the often utterly foreign nature of biblical texts and their various antecedents. By disabusing presumptions of familiarity with the text, it can serve to reinforce, even if only at a human level, the otherness of the text. If genuinely critical, it can neither undermine nor establish faith, but can assist interpreters in being self-critical and therefore modest about their own results.

At its most basic level, historical criticism is a method used to understand the concrete humanity of texts. Because the Bible too is, notwithstanding its divine content, a fully human document, historical criticism is an indispensable tool for analyzing its human character. Written in human speech by specific individuals at specific times in specific places, in specific languages and with specific motives and intentions, the Bible itself requires serious historical investigation, and if “serious,” then why not also “critical”? Unless one embraces a docetic understanding of the Bible, Christian interpreters of the Bible can no more ignore the task of its critical historical investigation than they can ignore the humanity of Jesus Christ.

Bibliography

Barr, J. The Bible in the Modern World. SCM, 1973; Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Vol. I/2, trans. G. W. Bromiley. T&T Clark, 1958; Bray, G. Biblical Interpretation Past and Present. InterVarsity, 1996; Brown, R. The Critical Meaning of the Bible. Paulist, 1981; Burnett, R. Karl Barth's Theological Exegesis. Eerdmans, 2004; Childs, B. Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments. Fortress, 1993; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; Gadamer, H.-G. Truth and Method, trans. J. Weinsheimer and D. Marshall. Crossroad, 1975; Harrisville, R. A., and W. Sundberg (p 293). The Bible in Modern Culture. Eerdmans, 1995; Krentz, E. The Historical-Critical Method. Fortress, 1975; Marshall, I. H. “Historical Criticism.” Pages 126–38 in New Testament Interpretation, ed. I. H. Marshall. Eerdmans, 1977; Morgan, R., and J. Barton. Biblical Interpretation. Oxford University Press, 1988; Neill, S., and N. T. Wright. Interpretation of the New Testament, 1861–1986. Oxford, 1988; Smart, J. D. The Strange Silence of the Bible in the Church. Westminster, 1970; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. Zondervan, 1992; idem. The Two Horizons. Eerdmans, 1980.

Richard E. Burnett

Historical Theology

While biblical theology draws a line through redemptive history and systematic theology draws a circle demonstrating the intrasystematic coherence of scriptural doctrines, historical theology reminds both that one never steps outside of the hermeneutical circle, simply exegetes Scripture, and discovers its doctrines in abstraction from a communal history of interpretation. In distinction, then, from both biblical and systematic theology, historical theology may be described as the study of the history of exegesis (descriptive) rather than the act of biblical exegesis itself (prescriptive). The goal is not to determine what the church is authorized to say, but to determine what the church has in fact said in its dogmatic formulations through their organic development.

Historical theology is also distinguished from church history. The latter (with precedent since Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History or earlier) is concerned with the development of the church per se (incorporating various subdisciplines of historical research, such as social, political, and intellectual history). Historical theology limits its concentration to the development of church dogmas in relation to their environment. Thus, historical theology requires familiarity with both the realm of biblical studies and theology on one hand, and the formal methods of historical research on the other.

Only in the eighteenth century was theological study divided into distinct subdisciplines now familiar in theological education: biblical, systematic, historical, practical, and sometimes also apologetic (philosophical) theology (Farley). In the ancient church period, the term "theology" was sufficient to cover the range of exegesis and extrapolation, and in this enterprise the basic tasks of historical theology (interpretation and analysis of doctrinal precedent) were actively pursued. Origen's First Things (De principiis, or Peri archōn), Lactantius's Divine Institutes (Divinarum institutionum), John of Damascus's Accurate Exposition of the Orthodox Faith (Ekdosis akribēs tēs orthodoxou pisteōs), and Augustine's Enchiridion became paradigmatic for this topical approach.

In the Middle Ages, theology as "queen of sciences" was regarded as the most comprehensive research program; hence, the attempt to supply a summa of knowledge. This included metaphysics, ontology, cosmology, and epistemology as much as the traditional topics of earlier (and later) theological treatises. Increasingly, the sentence form of theology also emerged as a gloss on Scripture and the church fathers (as in Peter Lombard's Sentences).

Historical theology was anticipated in many respects by the Reformation and Counter-Reformation movements of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. In this context, a sophisticated grasp of the sources (biblical, patristic, and medieval) was necessary in order to demonstrate the antiquity and consensual support for one tradition over against another. And while the Protestant Reformers held different views of tradition from those of their Roman Catholic opponents, their humanist training grounded them and their Counter-Reformation rivals in the importance of historical perspective and development. Still, there was a considerable unity of exegetical, systematic, historical, and practical research, commanding equally considerable breadth of learning that later specialization in some respects lacks.

With the Enlightenment, the polemical intent of much historical-theological reflection (a largely interconfessional battle) was regarded as a dead end, since all heteronomous authority was viewed with suspicion. We are only now beginning to recognize modernity as its own form of repressive polemicism, rather than a benign, liberating, and neutral criticism. Historical theology as a distinct subdiscipline emerged out of what was called the “history of dogma” (Dogmengeschichte) in the eighteenth century and is associated with the names of G. S. Steinbart, F. C. Baur, Albrecht Ritschl, and especially turn-of-the-century Berlin professor Adolf von Harnack. Nineteenth-century historians of dogma, both conservative and liberal, tended to identify a given figure or period with a central dogma (the Great Idea), which, although more easily summarized, often led to a reductionism that ran roughshod over important nuances. As a rule, more recent historical theologies—across the various Christian traditions—reflect greater appreciation of dialectical subtlety.

(p 294) In his multivolume History of Dogma (German, 1885–90; ET, 1896–) and more popular What Is Christianity? (ET, 1901), Harnack succeeded in radicalizing his predecessors’ critique of orthodox Christianity, which he identified as a decadent “Catholicism.” The grandson of formative historian of dogma Gustav Ewers, Harnack hoped that his work may be “found not unworthy of the clear and disciplined mind which presided over the beginnings of the young science” (History of Dogma, xi, American preface). Disguised as a neutral, historical-scientific analysis of Christian backgrounds, historical theology emerged under Harnack’s leadership as a learned yet highly critical discipline, presupposing that the earliest faith of Jesus and his followers (always ethical in nature) was corrupted by Hellenism, resulting in the major articles of the Christian creed. Although this thesis has been seen to be reductive at best and a fatal distortion of the evidence at worst, it continues to exercise enormous rhetorical force, especially among some biblical scholars and theologians for whom borrowed philosophical terms constitute declension from the simplest, earliest Christianity. Just as historical studies contributed to the deconstruction of the Christ of faith in favor of the so-called “Jesus of history” in NT studies, so also historical theology (it was thought) would eventually strip away the husk of patristic, medieval, and Protestant orthodox consensus to reveal the kernel of original truth in the teachings and person of Jesus himself.

In the light of its development in the wake of Enlightenment criticism, one may wonder how useful or even appropriate it might be for a recovery of a theological interpretation of Scripture. Two responses come to mind.

First, in its associations with modern criticism, historical theology is no more compromised than biblical studies, and in spite of their particular biases, both fields in the modern period have yielded a considerable body of knowledge that is often taken for granted today. While we must be aware of presuppositions—especially unacknowledged ones—that guide any given proposal, erroneous conclusions do not disqualify the method, which in this case is critical though sympathetic analysis. Historical theology shares with the human sciences more generally the methods and skills advanced in the history of hermeneutics, and those hermeneutical assumptions are as evident in the work of a given historical theologian as in the subject studied.

A second response has to do with the dangers to theology in general that historical theology in particular can help avoid. The dangers include the following: golden-age thinking, in which an individual or community selects a favored period, movement, or hero, and treats every other subject and period in relation to it as either a renewal or a declension. While the historical method cannot be the determinative factor in biblical and systematic theology, it must limit the study of the history of dogma. Thus, historical theologians can often serve to critique the description of particular dogmatic formulations offered or assumed by exegetical and systematic theology, holding naive or “straw-man” arguments in check. As Richard Muller counsels, “Rightly or wrongly, Arianism had considerable power and appeal: it is the task of the historian to examine this appeal. The orthodoxy of Nicea must also be examined in its cultural and intellectual context—so that the forms of its doctrinal expression and their adequacy to the needs of fourth-century Trinitarianism can be fully understood” (Muller 99). To a certain extent, therefore, historical theology relativizes and postpones normative evaluations by placing them within a context, while allowing other theological disciplines the freedom to assert the truth of those claims themselves.

In addition to reining in golden-age thinking, historical theology can challenge a timeless view of church dogmas. Just as biblical theology traces the development of canonical revelation in concrete historical contexts, historical theology does the same with postcanonical ecclesial reflection. As is the case with the various biblical traditions, church dogmas did not drop out of the sky; they reflect the effects of cultural, linguistic, social, and even political circumstances of their time and place.

Historical theology can also provide a guard against biblicism: the tendency to identify one's own interpretation of Scripture with Scripture itself. A biblicist does this to the extent of ignoring, or perhaps even being unaware of, the location of that interpretation both in the interpreter's frame of reference and in relation to the history of interpretation generally. No dogma is an island; any dogma is inextricably linked with other dogmas of varying importance, which themselves also participate organically in an "effective history" (Wirkungsgeschichte). This ongoing conversation and its effects condition every exercise in exegesis and systematization (as in any other form of interpretation). Historical theology reminds us that it is as easy for the exegete to impose one's own dogmatic framework on the biblical text as (p 295) it is for the community to do this in any given place and time.

Finally, historical theology can serve as a helpful corrective to speculative tendencies, to which biblical scholarship as well as systematic and philosophical theology are sometimes inclined. While it is not itself immune to this temptation, historical theology is at least equipped to remind its corollary subdisciplines of the (often enormous) skill and energy that the church has expended in identifying its boundary-formulations. This can reduce the frequency with which theological programs repeat the mistakes of the past and provide them with a constant check on innovative or retrogressive construals. As Muller summarizes, "The study of the history of the church and its teachings is not only an objective church and its teachings is not only an objective, external discipline, it is also a subjective, internal exercise by which and through which the life and mind of the church become an integral part of the life and mind of the individual Christian" (107).

See also Tradition

Bibliography

Farley, E. Theologia. Fortress, 1983; Harnack, A. The History of Dogma. Translated from the 3d German ed. by N. Buchanan. 7 vols. Little, Brown & Co., 1896–1905; Hart, T., ed. Dictionary of Historical Theology. Eerdmans, 2000; Muller, R. The Study of Theology. Zondervan, 1991; Pelikan, J. The Christian Tradition. 5 vols. University of Chicago Press, 1989.

Michael S. Horton

Historicism See History; Historical Criticism

Historiography See History

History

The Christian stake in history is immense. Every aspect of lived Christianity—worship, sacraments, daily godliness, private devotion, religiously inspired benevolence, preaching—and every major theme of Christian theology—the nature of God in relation to the world, the meaning of Christ, the character of salvation, the fate of the universe—directly or indirectly involves questions about how the present relates to the past. Yet despite this superlative importance, theological reflection on historical practices, assumptions, and arguments remains in short supply. And this is not to speak of how persistently questions about the historicity of the Bible—which concern the relation of scriptural narrative to events that may have actually happened—remain in the intellectual background. In the precritical period questions of the Bible’s historicity tended to be subsumed under overarching church dogma: biblical narratives were interpreted as factual, typological, or both, depending upon the theological system as a whole. In modern (Enlightenment) discourse, biblical writers frequently have been understood using contemporary standards of critical verification, and so have been defended by conservatives as “accurate” or relativized by liberals as “myth-making.” In postmodern discourse, the assertion is heard that the historicity of biblical writings is in principle a diversionary question, because it takes attention away from the interpretative constructs of contemporary readers and communities. Common in all eras has been the assumption that historical knowledge takes care of itself.

The Bible and Modern Debates about History

Standard accounts of developments leading to current uncertainties about the status of historical knowledge trace a primarily European story, which begins with the emergence of the modern historical seminar at the University of Berlin in the 1820s under the guidance of Leopold von Ranke. Sustained by great personal drive and buoyed by optimism drawn from Enlightenment, Romantic, and Christian sources, von Ranke contended that diligent research in state archives would lay bare the genesis of modern nations and so reveal history “as it really was in its essence” (wie es eigentlich gewesen). Over the next 140 years, von Ranke’s concentration on elite males as the main actors in political and military narratives was greatly expanded as various forms of social, Marxist, comparative, and quantitative history came in and out of fashion. Yet his ideal of historical investigation as a rigorously critical enterprise (“scientific” in the broad sense of the term) that yields truths about the past—sometimes The Truth—survived. Only with the modern “linguistic turn” was that ideal challenged and the nature of historical knowledge turned into a complex problem.

That problem involves the collapse of three certainties (summarized from Appleby, Hunt, and Jacob). First was a heroic myth about Western history interpreted as—in one account for the United States—the rise of “the successful male white Protestant, whose features were turned into ideals for the entire human race” (135). Against this myth have arisen various forms of historical advocacy that treat once-marginalized populations (women, subalterns, African-Americans, (p 296) Orientals, workers, homosexuals) as critical historical actors. The result is sharp contention among advocates speaking for these various groups concerning which of them is most central or important for the truest understanding of the world’s real history.

Second was a myth about the intellectual purity of science. So long as this myth survived, historians could dignify their labor by showing how closely careful archival research resembled the research of scientists; it sought verifiable conclusions drawn from facts arranged objectively to tell the truth. Against this myth arose the subversive notion that science too was a social process (or more radically, a social construction), resembling other products of human mental activity such as art, nationalism, or religious belief much more than had previously been thought. Thomas Kuhn’s Structure of Scientific Revolutions (1962) was the catalyst for this revolutionary assault. The tremors resulting from this work shook the ground on which historians stood. In the new view, scientific procedures were governed by much larger social conventions and did not necessarily yield pristine, irrefragable, objective results. If so, how much less certainty could be produced by history, with its incomplete “data sets,” its inability to replicate “experiments,” and its lack of “verifiable” proof for conclusions?

Third were myths about the ability of language to reflect reality or, put another way, the unexamined assumption that statements about human conditions were indeed really about those conditions rather than about the ones who made the statements. Here the precipitate of tumult was writing from Europe, often France, suggesting that language revealed much more about how humans perceived (“constructed”) their experience than what they found in a supposedly “real” world (Jacques Derrida). Or it proposed that statements about human activities in the past were mostly encrypted devices aimed at solidifying relationships of power in the present (Michel Foucault). For history-writing, such assertions threatened notions about re-creating the past wie es eigentlich gewesen as remorselessly as they undercut notions about historians’ ability to float free above the political conflicts of their own day.

In extreme forms, the modern attitude toward historical knowledge is dismissive, for example, in the words of Hans Kellner: “History can be redescribed as a discourse that is fundamentally rhetorical.... Representing the past takes place through the creation of powerful, persuasive images which can be best understood as created objects, models, metaphors or proposals about reality” (Ankersmit and Kellner 2). The shift such radicals hail is from an ideal of history grounded in the scientism of Carl Hempel—featuring schemes of “verification” and aspirations toward “covering laws”—to one governed by Kuhn’s notion of “paradigm.”

In all contests defined by modern-postmodern battles over the nature of history, it is important for Christians to affirm that scriptural religion defines its own moral and epistemological universe. Traditional Christian faith, in other words, does not articulate well with the basic coordinates taken for granted by combatants from many sides in contemporary intellectual dispute. Unlike postmodernism—exemplified at its extreme by radical forms of multiculturalism—biblical religion holds forthrightly to the ideal of universal truth. Unlike modernism—exemplified at its extreme by the overweening objectivism of Enlightenment rationality—biblical religion describes truth as a function of personal relationships. In a recent survey of the Western historical canon, Donald Kelley of Rutgers University succinctly summarizes the basic biblical preoccupations: “The term, and perhaps the concept, history in a Herodotean sense is not used in the Bible ..., but ... the term truth appears over a hundred times in both the Old and the New Testament, ... and wisdom ... over two hundred times. Classical tradition ... conceived of truth as conformity to fact and proper meaning, which occasionally corresponds to biblical usage.... But most often truth is the word and law of God, which must be obeyed on the grounds of authority. So it was also in the New Testament, especially in the preaching of Paul, where the truth resides in Christ and, in contrast to human ‘fables,’ ‘traditions,’ and ‘philosophy,’ would set men free” (81).

Over the last several centuries, Western Christians have committed themselves variously to notions of history as simple fact. Christian efforts both to appropriate Enlightenment standards and to take the measure of postmodernist challenges are worthy in themselves. But they will come closer to biblical norms if they remember two overarching realities: (1) In Scripture, God is pictured as both personal and the source of all truth. (2) In a scriptural view, because God truly exists and is always more than the construction of any individual person (or aggrieved group, or ethnic community, or political interest), the personality of truth does not undermine its reality.

More specifically, biblical religion can afford an attitude of intellectual lèse-majesté toward recent (p 297) debates about historical knowledge. On the one side, this view affirms that the Enlightenment rationalists are correct. Humans may certainly come to learn true things, and to make valid moral judgments, about events or circumstances in the past. The reasons for this confidence, however, rest not on notions of human competence but on an understanding of divine action. God is the source of all things. Through Christ, “all things came into being, ... and without him not one thing came into being” (John 1:3 NRSV). Not only does the creative activity of the Son of God stand behind the production of all records useful for history, but in that same Son of God “all things hold together” (Col. 1:17), or we might say, sustain their coherence as part of an integrated discourse. Moreover, believers concerned about historical knowledge can take heart from the assurance that God created all possibilities for human culture, art, politics, and social interaction, and so they are “good, and nothing is to be rejected,” if they are regarded thankfully as manifestations of God’s creating power (1 Tim. 4:4). One of the implications from realizing that humans may appreciate the creation as good must certainly be that we may know it to be good, and even more basically, that we may know it.

Biblical revelation also contains multitudinous statements about the epistemic capacities of humanity that lead to a similar confidence in the possibility of historical knowledge. God created humans with the moral and intellectual capacity to “have dominion” over the physical creation (Gen. 1:26 NRSV). God also is the source of human diversity, since “from one ancestor he made all nations to inhabit the whole earth, and he allotted the times of their existence and the boundaries of the places where they would live” (Acts 17:26 NRSV). But that human diversity, as the entire narrative of Scripture underscores, does not prevent people everywhere from learning the true facts and the proper interpretation of God’s ongoing historical action aimed at the redemption of his people.

So what’s the problem? When looking at what Christians affirm about the nature of the created universe and the epistemic abilities of human beings, it seems that the Christian faith fully embraces a religious version of Enlightenment confidence in the perspicacity, security, and objectivity of historical knowledge.

The problem is that other parts of biblical revelation look like a quarry for postmodernist assertions undercutting blithe confidence in historical objectivity. Humans are sinners and thus empirical recidivists who “keep listening, but do not comprehend; keep looking, but do not understand” (Isa. 6:9 NRSV). Freely chosen moral corruption darkens understanding (Eph. 4:18); it turns the God-given capacity for knowledge into blindness (Isa. 43:8; Matt. 15:14; 2 Pet. 1:9; and many more). According to these strands of revelation—and they are not insubstantial—humans persistently abandon their capacity for finding the truth in favor of abuses that spring from idolatrous self-interest.

Another and very different strand of Scripture also seems to reinforce postmodernist conclusions. It is the biblical message of the incarnation of the Son of God—at a particular time and place, and into a particular culture with its singular patterns. The very particularity of the incarnation inspires the notion that the vast panoply of human cultural differences—the very differences that so often seem incompatible and, thus, the ground for skeptical theories from the multiculturalists—is a gift of God. Missiologists who study the passage of Christian faith between widely varying cultural groups have put this matter best. So Andrew Walls explains: “Christ took flesh and was made man in a particular time and place, family, nationality, tradition and customs and sanctified them, while still being for all men in every time and place. Wherever he is taken by the people of any day, time and place, he sanctifies that culture—he is living in it. And no other group of Christians has any right to impose in his name a set of assumptions about life determined by another time and place” (217). In sum, from the perspective provided by Christian understanding of the fall, but also the incarnation, there seems to be considerable Christian support for the radical, postmodernist parties in contemporary historical strife.

Yet the point in beginning with an effort to view problems of historical knowledge first from a Christian angle of vision is not merely to inquire how Christian resources may be exploited by armies active on the field of contemporary intellectual combat. The point is rather to achieve a “Peace of God” (an allusion to the medieval church’s provisional efforts at reducing feudal anarchy)—which means, among other things, not taking the current state of discussion as the best way of framing the question.

A Peace of God for history requires a self-consciously Christian form of chastened realism, with the chastening every bit as serious as the commitment to realism. Such a modest realism should be ready to acknowledge that postmodernist (p 298) critics have accurately described many forms of self-serving distortions or limitations of historical knowledge. At the same time, it can treat the hubris of Enlightenment rationality as a heresy rather than the original sin. This stance does not, of course, solve actual controversies of historical fact, specific problems of historical interpretation, or contested applications of historical knowledge. What it does provide is some reassurance about the potential of grasping actual historical fact, however limited or hedged around by self-limiting qualifications. It offers hope for potential progress in moral evaluation of the past, but only if evaluators are much more attentive to the interpretations of others and much more humble about their own certainties than evaluations usually are. This line of directly biblical reasoning rests, finally, on the awareness—however obscured by idolatrous self-assertion, simple fallibility, or the situatedness of all human existence—that the reason we may come to know something about the past is that the past, like the present, is governed by an all-powerful, all-loving God.

Modern Debates about History and the Bible

Some awareness of modern arguments over the status of historical knowledge would help biblical theologians steer between the Scylla of relativistic postmodernism and the Charybdis of naive Enlightenment positivism. On one side, the extreme application of radical views about history would destroy the Christian faith, and so such an application can be set aside without a qualm. Morality in classic Christian terms rests on a real, God-given natural law, on divine commands like those revealed in the Ten Commandments, or on both. The heart of the gospel is also bound up with a realistic view of history: “If Christ has not been raised, our preaching is useless and so is your faith” (1 Cor. 15:14). Christianity has always displayed an innate tendency toward historical realism, in large part because it depends upon events that Christians—by their creeds, liturgies, dogmatics, preaching, ethics—assert really happened.

Yet, on the other side, the Bible and the great Christian traditions do not offer unambiguous support for the opponents of postmodernism. Individual biblical passages and the great historical summaries of Christian doctrine agree:

- People write history, and people always view the past from the particular vantage point where they stand.
- There are no simple historical facts that are also interesting. Asserting that “there once lived in Judea a rabbi called Jesus” comes close to a simple historical fact, but it is far less interesting and far less complex than the assertion that “Jesus was the Christ of God.”
- Although historical knowledge is possible, it is never exhaustive, irreformable, or absolute. The apostle in 1 Cor. 13 was not speaking directly about questions of historical knowledge, but he very well could have been: “For our knowledge is imperfect.... For now we see in a mirror dimly.... Now I know in part” (13:9, 12 RSV).

- The history inspired by God in Scripture is unique. It contains a full understanding of the divine purpose for human events in a way that no history authored by humans can do. When humans write history as if they were inspired by the Holy Spirit, the result is foolishness (e.g., countless false sightings of the antichrist), disastrous violence (e.g., God is fighting for our side), or a contradiction of the gospel (e.g., the history of only my denomination has been guided by God).

Constructively considered, modern debates about historical knowledge might be helpful for bringing out themes in Scripture and the Christian traditions that are obscured when either rampantly postmodern or unreconstructed Enlightenment assumptions prevail, including themes of contingency, multiple causation, and the personality of truth.

Christian commitment to the notion that research opens a broader pathway to historical insight than does deduction depends upon scriptural intimation of a principle of contingency. In other words, if we want to find out about a theological system, a particular doctrinal possibility, or a proposed exegetical innovation, we must seek out as much evidence as possible about the system, the doctrine, or the innovation. The contingency of the incarnation is the key pointing a way forward for historians in their research (e.g., John 1:46—“Can anything good come from [Nazareth]?” ... “Come and see”). It might do the same for theologians. If we want to know something, we should not rely upon what we simply take for granted that it must entail, but rather, study that something. We know God by experiencing him; so likewise do we gain reliable knowledge about theological systems, individual (p 299)doctrines, and specific interpretations of Scripture by studying them.

Historians who attend to the person of Christ—the sum of God’s own self-disclosure—expect historical knowledge to be made up of multiple, overlapping explanations concerning causes for events and circumstances. This understanding is rooted in the duality of orthodox Christology, especially as phrased by the Chalcedonian Definition: “One and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten to be acknowledged in two natures, inconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably, the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one person and one subsistence, not parted or divided into two persons, but one and the same Son, and only begotten, God the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ.” Christian historians who take to heart Chalcedonian doctrine about the divine and human present in one integrated Person are predisposed to seek knowledge about any historical situation from more than one angle. The wisdom of that expectation is underscored by the fact that it is often illustrated in Scripture.

This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross. (Acts 2:23)

And because the gracious hand of my God was upon me, the king granted my requests. (Neh. 2:8//2:18; Ezra 7:6, 9)

These are instances where the biblical authors recognize multiple legitimate skeins of cause and effect, one in the purposes of God, others in the realm of ordinary historical investigation. What Christian historians may derive from Scripture about the possibility of legitimate multiple causation to explain past events could also be put to use by theologians. Discussions of providence, creation, the divine and human agency in salvation, the coming of the kingdom of God—these and many other doctrines would be better understood if historiographical insights were called upon for assistance.

The personality of truth—an important reality underscored for Christian historians with the assistance of postmodern reasoning—is of perhaps even greater use. Debates over whether, for example, Luke was more a theologian or a historian are shown to be jejune by both biblical reasoning and modern historiographical controversy. If all purported history is in some sense ideological, then the pertinent question becomes not whether Luke was more theologian or historian, but what he was trying to do with his historical materials. We explore what in our contemporary assumptions about historicity aids or obscures our understanding of Luke-Acts, and what we will make of Luke's actual writing, rather than what we feel it is possible for him to say.

In sum, modern debates over the nature of historical knowledge are no more a royal road to theological understanding than debates, assumptions, practices, and expectations about history in earlier times. What they do offer, however—and usually in proportion to how upsetting they seem—are goads to more self-conscious and consistently biblical theological construction.

See also Historical Criticism

Bibliography

Ankersmit, F., and H. Kellner, eds. A New Philosophy of History. University of Chicago Press, 1995; Appleby, J., L. Hunt, and M. Jacob. Telling the Truth about History. W. W. Norton, 1994; Domanska, E., ed. Encounters. University Press of Virginia/University Press of Virginia, , 1998/1998; ; Evans/ Evans, , CC. . S. The Historical Christ and the Jesus of Faith. Oxford University Press, 1996; Evans, R. In Defense of History. W. W. Norton, 1999; Haskell, T. Objectivity Is Not Neutrality. Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998; Iggers, G. Historiography in the Twentieth Century. Wesleyan University Press, 1997; Kelley, D. Faces of History. Yale University Press, 1998; Kuklick, B., and D. G. Hart, eds. Religious Advocacy and American History. Eerdmans, 1997; Murphey, M. Philosophical Foundations of Historical Knowledge. State University of New York Press, 1994; Noll, M. "History Wars." Books and Culture, May/June 1999, 30–34; July/Aug 1999, 22–25; Sep/Oct 1999, 38–41; Nov/Dec 1999, 42–44; idem. "A Theological Understanding of 'Ordinary History.'" Christianity and History Newsletter 19 (2000): 6–16; Spitzer, A. Historical Truth and Lies about the Past. University of North Carolina Press, 1996; Walls, A. "Africa and Christian Identity." Pages 212–21 in Mission Focus, ed. W. Shenk. Herald Press, 1980; Wells, R., ed. History and the Christian Historian. Eerdmans, 1998.

Mark A. Noll

History of Effects See Historical Theology; Interpretation, History of; Tradition

History of Israel

A theological interpretation of the biblical history of Israel may review the story of the nation from two polar opposites: The gracious and mighty deeds of God bring about his people's existence and deliver them from destruction. But then, the people themselves have a rebellious nature and thus are constantly at odds with the will of their Deity. These opposite movements find reconciliation (p 300) in the OT through the covenant that God gives to his people to guide them in their life and faith. Even this, however, proves inadequate so many times. In the end it is the same powerful and loving grace of God, present in the nation's birth, that continues to guide the people—a grace that delays judgment and yet, when that judgment comes, provides a means of salvation and life for a remnant. In the NT period Israel appears composed of many factions, and its responses to the messianic claims of Jesus vary. Nevertheless, the dominant sense is one of the rejection of these claims. God's plan for Israel remains, but alongside that plan emerges the Gentile Christian community, where the message of the gospel flourishes in a largely unforeseen manner.

The history begins with the calling forth of Abram and the promise of Gen. 12:1–3. Abram's repeated demonstration of faith expands the promise in the following chapters until it reaches a point where it includes the entire land of Canaan, offspring as many as the sand of the sea, and blessing to all nations who bless Abram's seed. Although Abram experiences small expressions of this promise—the purchase of the cave of Machpelah (ch. 23), the birth of Isaac (21), and the blessing of Melchizedek (rewarded with Abram's tithe in 14:18–20)—their full realization is postponed beyond the period of Abram and the following three generations. Yet this promise remains the theological key to the interpretation of the narratives of Israel's patriarchs. God reaffirms blessing to Isaac (25:11), who passes it on to his son Jacob (27:28–29). The promise of offspring remains a precarious one throughout Genesis, as it was the most difficult one for Abram to believe and accept. God preserves Jacob despite his brother's hatred. God blesses him in the house of Laban, and when he leaves to return to the promised land, he has many sons to carry on his line. Even here, however, Joseph appears headed for certain death and oblivion (ch. 37). Yet God does not forget his promise, and this younger son is elevated to second in command in Egypt. As a result Jacob and his family are delivered from the famine and thrive there.

The oppression and exodus form the fundamental saving event in God's plan for his people of the OT. Remembered twice in prose and poetry (Exod. 14–15), God's work is nothing less than the creation of a new people for himself, distinct from the other nations of the earth. Neither the power of Pharaoh nor that of the sea is able to hold back this event. Instead, they become the means by which God demonstrates his sovereignty in the liberation of his people. The exodus event, as a historic act of redemption, becomes a key element in defining God and his relationship to his people. He is a liberator from slavery, and they are bound in covenant with him. Without the exodus, none of the promises of land, seed, and blessing would be fulfilled. This event transforms the means by which the remainder of Israel's history is understood. The redemption of God sets the stage for a much more complete fulfillment of the earlier promises. God's claim on his people is absolute, and so is their obligation to accept the demands of the covenant relationship. Marred by idolatry and moral failure, that generation does not inherit the land of promise. Instead, their children receive the opportunity. Like their parents they also march across the dry ground of a body of water. This time it is the Jordan, rather than the Red Sea. However, they follow God's leader, and their faithfulness is rewarded with the covenant blessing of the land of promise. In this manner the great stories of conquest should be read as fulfillment. The salvation of Rahab and the Gibeonites represents the reciprocity of blessing promised to those who bless God's people. The settlement throughout the land continues the promise of fruitfulness as Israel expands to occupy the gift God has given them. As at Sinai, the covenant renewal ceremonies (Josh. 8:30–35; 24) reaffirm that these blessings are part of God's ongoing relationship with his people.

The generations after Joshua do not prove as faithful in their life according to God's covenant. Their assimilation to the worship of the gods of surrounding peoples (Judg. 2:9–11) and their marriages with nonbelievers result in a dilution of their power to resist the enemy invaders. The disunity grows worse and worse, and in the end even the divinely appointed judges are unable to prevent the civil war that erupts (chs. 20–21) and the consequent destruction of many Israelites. In this scene the story of Ruth demonstrates the ongoing presence of the faithful, even if in a minority. It is this faithfulness that reasserts the promise of God to Abram and his descendants. The fruitfulness of Ruth continues a line that leads to David and Israelite control of all the land of promise. If the promise to Abram reaches a high point during David's reign, one must for this period also read of God often working behind the scenes. Not so obvious as in previous generations, the divine hand continues to move events according to his will. Thus, the popular Saul is ultimately rejected and replaced with the youthful upstart David. The selection of David and (p 301) rejection of Saul is not an arbitrary whim introduced by the narrator. Instead, the confessions that David regularly makes before undertaking tasks suggest a vibrant faith in God, a faith not evident in the statements of Saul.

Nevertheless, the human freedom to choose remained, as did the divine willingness to allow people to act on their own moral decisions. As previously in the wilderness generation, the people under the judges, and Saul's hatred of David, so the latter's family and his own generals engage in blood-filled betrayals and battles to usurp power and seek murderous revenge. Without an awareness that the line of good and evil goes through the heart of everyone, it is difficult to understand the terror and carnage that often reigned in the palace. And the family of David was only the first in a long line of the children and spouses of kings who sought to affect the decisions and events of the palace through schemes and force. The Israelite citizenry imitated this pattern of evil. The depravity of human nature and the propensity to turn away from God led to Israel's worship of other gods. This abandonment of the covenant could only mean that God would respond by driving people from the covenantal gift, the land. As he had done with the first couple in driving them from the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3), so God allowed enemies to end the independence of the northern kingdom and, nearly a century and a half later, that of the southern kingdom. Neither nation would repent, and this sinful failure led to the downfall of the nation of Israel. All this is recorded in the books of Kings as the reason for their destruction. As Noth observed, the whole history of Israel as written especially in the books of Kings (but also in the earlier historical books) is a demonstration of the justice of God, in bringing about the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem and the end of the independent monarchy.

Side by side with this depiction of sin and judgment is the story of Israel's history as recorded in the books of Chronicles. Unlike Kings, the Chronicler begins the historical account with a series of genealogies that focus on the good hand of God in his grace, which begins with the first man and woman and proceeds to the present day of the Chronicler. The emphasis on the roles of those who worship and create music for the Jerusalem temple suggests a different purpose of this history. Unlike the books of Kings, Chronicles delights in the positive features of the great kings whose faith and faithfulness inspired the Chronicler to emphasize their best. Thus Saul is glossed over and nothing critical is said of David or Solomon. The southern kingdom is emphatically the place of God's blessing. The north is condemned from the outset: nothing good can come from there. David is the cult founder of the worship of God in Jerusalem. Once the ideal of unity is compromised, even the good Judean kings fall into sin and experience God's judgment.

Theologically, this recounting of Israel's history is less concerned with the sin of the people and more concerned with the right way to worship God. This occurs with the people of God united and praising God in all forms of temple worship. Here the history is understood less in terms of how kings responded to the covenantal requirement to believe in a single Deity, and more in terms of how they worshipped that Deity through the temple and its cult in Jerusalem.

Next to the exodus and the covenants with Israel and David, one of the most reflected-upon events in Israel's history is the destruction of the temple. This destruction—especially after the miraculous deliverance of Jerusalem and the temple from the Assyrian king a century earlier (a miracle recorded in three separate biblical accounts in 2 Kings 18–20; 2 Chron. 32; Isa. 36–39)—brought a greater crisis of faith than any other event in Israel's history. How could the writers see through the sorrow and rejection of God, such as found in the poetry of Lamentations, to affirm God's faithfulness (3:23)? For the inhabitants of Jerusalem, Jeremiah would proclaim that the people had so sinned in their idolatrous pursuits that they could expect nothing but judgment (Jer. 2; etc.). Habakkuk would not try to explain the terrible mystery of a people more idolatrous than Israel destroying the nation, but only counsel a steadfast faithfulness (2:3–4). For those already in exile, Ezekiel would explain how the temple had become thoroughly saturated with idolatry of every kind so that God departed from it and from the land, thereby allowing the terrible judgment to fall (chs. 8–11). Yet almost two centuries earlier Hosea (in speaking of the judgment against the northern kingdom) had affirmed that God's mercy would override his judgment for his people (Hos. 11:7–9), and other prophets had looked forward to a new age (e.g., Isa. 2:1–4 = Mic. 4:1–5).

The history-changing event of the destruction of Jerusalem and the exile brought with it a new interpretation of ancient prophecies. No longer did the people look for the anointed one, the Messiah, in a historical king, but now they began to look for this fulfillment in a golden age in which all the prophecies would be fulfilled. It is no wonder that the returnees from the exile who were (p 302) old enough to remember the temple before the 586 BCE destruction, wept when they saw the modest foundations of the one that was rebuilt in 517 (Ezra 3:12). Nevertheless, this was neither the end of Israel's history nor the fulfillment. Side by side with the grand expectations of a renewed Jerusalem and temple (Ezek. 40–48; Isa. 56–66) were the prophetic figures who sustained the early returnees with promises of God's blessings for their devotion to rebuilding the temple. At the same time some projected their prophecies beyond the stage of immediate history to an earth-shattering apocalypse (Daniel; Zech. 9–14) that would usher in a new age. Then there were the priestly pragmatists, such as Ezra the scribe; with the leadership of figures like Nehemiah, Ezra reconstituted the postexilic community of the mid-fifth century BCE into a people who were called to a life of holiness centered around the torah, the law of God.

All these trajectories continued into the intertestamental age. The apocalyptic writers generated a mass of literature that followed world-changing themes. They also formed isolated communities such as the one that produced the Dead Sea Scrolls. John would follow in this literary style with his Revelation, and Jesus himself would be remembered for a similar teaching in his Olivet Discourse (Matt. 24). The prophetic trajectory would also continue. In the teachings of Jesus and his followers, it would combine with messianic fulfillment in the person of Jesus Christ, and in literary allusions in the Gospels that would suggest at last the true return from the exile had come, and the promised age was about to begin. The call to holiness would remain along with its application in the obedience to the torah. In particular, this group formed the center of Judaism in Palestine, with a faith strong enough to endure the persecutions of the second-century (BCE) Hellenizer Antiochus Epiphanes and the oppression of Roman rule that began a century later. While groups such as the Pharisees would debate the meaning of the words of God in the Law, Jesus introduced his authoritative interpretations that penetrated to the heart of the purpose of God's intention (Matt. 5:27–44). Thus, Israel's history was brought to a turning point for all who would take it seriously. There would be those who saw in Christ the fulfillment of the old prophecies and those who sought to follow the law in all its requirements. The small group that attempted to cling to both Christ and the law would not long outlast the division of Christianity and Judaism that emerged by the end of the first century. With the destruction of the temple in 70 CE, the promise to Abram of land, seed, and universal blessing would take on a distinct meaning and provide a different history for Christians and Jews.

Bibliography

Block, D. Judges, Ruth. NAC 6. Broadman & Holman, 1999; Clines, D. J. A. The Theme of the Pentateuch. JSOTSup 8. JSOT, 1978; Eichrodt, W. Theology of the Old Testament, trans. J. Baker. 2 vols. SCM, 1967; Fretheim, T. Exodus. Interpretation. John Knox, 1991; George, M. “Yhwh’s Own Heart.” CBQ 64 (2002): 442–59; Hanson, P. “Israelite Religion in the Early Postexilic Period.” Pages 485–508 in Ancient Israelite Religion, ed. P. Miller Jr., P. Hanson, and S. McBride. Fortress, 1987; Hess, R. Joshua. TOTC. InterVarsity, 1996; idem. “Joshua.” Pages 165–71 in New Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. T. D. Alexander and B. Rosner. InterVarsity, 2000; Japhet, S. I and II Chronicles. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 1993; Noth, M. Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien. 2d ed. M. Niemeyer, 1957; Provan, I. Hezekiah and the Book of Kings. De Gruyter, 1988; Schniedewind, W. The Word of God in Transition. JSOTSup 197. Sheffield Academic Press, 1995.

Richard S. Hess

History of Religions School    See Religion

Hittitology    See Ancient Near Eastern Background Studies

Holocaust    See Anti-Semitism; Jewish-Christian Dialogue; Violence

Holy Spirit, Doctrine of the

It is a measure of its importance to Christian faith that the doctrine of the Holy Spirit has been disputed through the history of Christianity; lesser subjects never prove so controversial. The NT claims that in the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, the risen and ascended Lord Jesus Christ himself continues to be present to us (John 14:16–18; 2 Cor. 3:17). It also claims that in our experience of the Spirit, the fulfillment of God’s promises concerning the end of the age can be discerned (Acts 2:14–21). These are, however, monumental claims, the full sense of which was then and is now extraordinarily difficult to grasp.

It was thus inevitable that disagreement should have emerged over how the “work” and “person” of the Spirit should be understood. Even within the NT, evidence of such controversy can readily be identified. In the Acts of the Apostles, the outpouring of the Spirit upon Gentiles at first scandalizes the Jewish followers of Jesus. Although (p 303) ultimately the coming of the Spirit grounds the Gentile mission they themselves undertake (Acts 10:44–11:18; 15:1–21), it would be mistaken to overlook the immense religious upheaval occasioned by the Spirit's work for the first Christians. Again, as a result of this mission, Paul is obliged to regulate the Corinthian church's anarchic expression of the gifts of the Spirit. In his argument he appeals to principles of mutuality in Christ's body, the supremacy of love, and the need for worship to be conducted "decently and in order" (1 Cor. 12:1–14:40 RSV).

There thus is good precedent in the Bible for the difficulty that Christians have subsequently had in negotiating the many claims made concerning experience of the Spirit.

The "Breath" of God in Biblical and Theological Perspective

In the wider biblical context, it is nevertheless notable that references to the Spirit "frame" the total narrative of the biblical canon. In the beginning, the Spirit of God "broods" over the face of the primeval waters; then God speaks and heaven and earth are summoned into being (Gen. 1:2). At the other end of the canon, the Spirit is source for a different act of summons, by which we inherit a new heaven and new earth: "Come" (Rev. 22:17). Though modest reference to the Spirit is made in these texts, the association of the Spirit with both protology and eschatology is significant, for such ideas decisively shape theological understanding. Whether by accident or providence, thus is signaled that the work of the Spirit is a regulative theme in the Bible as a whole. Indeed, Scripture itself is said to be "breathed" by God (theopneustos, 2 Tim. 3:16), an expression that involves reference to the Spirit as the "breath" of God.

Such usage, however, demands a certain hermeneutical subtlety that often proves elusive. Christian orthodoxy affirms the deity of the Holy Spirit, but the basic meaning of the Hebrew word ruakh, as of the Greek pneuma, both of which our word "spirit" translates, is simply "moving air." The temptation is to understand the Spirit in an impersonal and instrumental sense. A recent example is found in the NRSV translation of the ruakh Elohim of Gen. 1:2 as "a wind from God," rather than more robustly as "the Spirit of God" (as in the footnote).

Though the temptation to free the Bible from ecclesiastical or dogmatic constraint is particularly characteristic of modern historical-critical exegesis, this specific problem is not new. Augustine, among others, wrestled with the ostensibly impersonal connotations of "Spirit," even when employing it in a fully trinitarian sense. The problem was that the name Spirit differs sharply from the personal and relational names of the other two persons, “Father” and “Son.” At one point, Augustine substitutes the name “Gift” for “Spirit,” since he can make so little of the latter in his theory of relations (Trin. 5.11).

In the face of such difficulties, one may well ask why “spirit” should have become a theological word at all, not only in Hebraic thought, but also in a wide variety of human cultures. The answer, undoubtedly, is that as an elemental force of nature, and as the medium of life for everything that breathes, air fascinated ancient peoples. Even today in many human languages, the words “life” and “breath” are closely related or even identical. In English, the connection appears only indirectly, but it is nevertheless significant. “He breathed his last,” we say, reflecting not only the experience of anyone who has watched another die, but also the view of ancient medicine, which looked to breath rather than the brainwaves as evidence of life. By extension, the ancients took breath to be significant not only physically, but also religiously. If to have breath is to be alive, then to be alive is to be, potentially or actually, a religious subject—a person capable of relating to God.

Such associations between breath, or spirit, and physical life appear in the Bible, as in “breath of life” texts of Genesis (6:17; 7:15, 22) and in the poetry of the Psalms (104:25–30)—though most spectacularly, in the “valley of dry bones” vision of Ezek. 37: “Prophesy to the breath, prophesy, mortal, and say to the breath: Thus says the Lord GOD: Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live.... The breath came into them, and they lived, and stood on their feet, a vast multitude” (Ezek. 37:9–10 NRSV).

The biblical link between breath and physical life, however, easily yields in overall significance to the theme of the Spirit’s gift of “spiritual” life. Already in Hebrew Scripture, one can find intimations of the future work of the Spirit, such as the words of Joel 2 quoted in Acts 2:14–21. Here the spiritual renewal of the people of God in the end times is associated with a new outpouring of the Spirit. It is, however, above all in the Pauline corpus and the Johannine literature of the NT that this theme is developed.

In the letters of Paul, the Spirit is not only the source of authority in Paul’s ministry (Rom. (p 304)15:17–19; 1 Cor. 2:4–5, 13), but the whole Christian life is comprehended as life “in the Spirit.” It is by virtue of the Spirit’s work that we become children of God (Rom. 8:14–17; Gal. 4:5–7), making the confession of faith: “Jesus is Lord” (1 Cor. 12:3). By the Spirit, we are able to overcome our struggle with the principle of sin in ourselves (Rom. 7:5–6; 8:1, 17; Gal. 5:16–17). The Spirit thus bears its fruit in the moral conduct and character of the Christian (Gal. 5:22–23). The Spirit, furthermore, is operative in the worship and existence of the church, in an activity extending from the routine affairs of administration through to the charismata of “tongues,” prophecy, and the working of miracles (1 Cor. 12:7–11, 27–31).

The Johannine tradition, for its part, not only speaks of the Spirit as “living water” (John 4:13–14; 7:37–39 RSV), thus drawing upon and extending the ancient association between the Spirit and life, but also as “Paraclete” or “Counselor” (John 14:16, 26). It is also the most explicit of all the main pneumatological sources of the NT about the root sense of “Spirit” as breath or wind (John 3:8). In John, however, this breath of God has become also the breath of Jesus himself, for John’s “Pentecost” occurs when the risen Lord appears, breathes upon the disciples, and says, “Receive the Holy Spirit” (John 20:22).

The Holy Spirit in the History of Doctrine

The subsequent history of pneumatology contains two major foci, around which the doctrine of the Spirit moves. Both involve an explicit trinitarian reference, and both remain living issues in the contemporary theological context.

The Christian writers of the second century had little interest in the Holy Spirit, so that, from the pneumatological standpoint, their writings are a disappointment. The apologists, in particular, concentrate so heavily on the doctrine of the Logos that the Spirit is effectively pushed to the margins. As great a third-century theologian as Origen lives in the shadow of this kind of subordinationism. Even in the protracted debates of the early fourth century occasioned by the claims of Arius the arch-heretic, the sense persisted that a satisfactory treatment of the christological question would be a satisfactory treatment of everything that really mattered. The original Creed of Nicea (325), from which the “Nicene Creed” ultimately derives, managed to affirm only “[We believe] in the Holy Spirit” in its third article, omitting to specify further what the shape of this belief ought to be. The inescapable impression left is that it does not matter greatly.

As in the case of Christology, however, controversy eventually brought the doctrine of the Spirit explicitly to the fore—after the christological question had been mainly resolved. Having been marginalized theologically and politically in deference to christological orthodoxy, a moderate version of Arianism reasserted itself in the middle decades of the fourth century, maintaining that, whatever may be said of the Son in his relation to the Father, the Spirit at least remains a creature. The major responses to this claim came from the bishop-theologians Athanasius of Alexandria, Basil of Caesarea, and Gregory of Nazianzus, in works that still rank among the classic formulations of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. The answer of Athanasius and Gregory to the new Arian challenge was unambiguous: the Spirit is “consubstantial” with the Father and/or the Son. In both cases, arguments in defense of Nicene Christology that were well established in anti-Arian polemic were adapted to the cause of pneumatology (McIntyre). Basil of Caesarea, in his public writings at least, took a different course. He knew that the Nicene dogma had proved to be so controversial in the past as to be of limited use in the present. So Basil presented his case on the basis of ecclesiastical precedent, arguing that the matter could be resolved by recognizing that the Spirit is the Sanctifier who is, as such, rightly the object of worship. Established liturgical formulae, for example, constitute a major thread of evidence in the case he makes. Ultimately the Council of Constantinople (381) dogmatized the deity of the Spirit in its formulation: “The Lord and giver of life, who proceeds from the Father, who with the Father and the Son is worshipped and glorified.” Thereby it employed both a language and a pneumatological “style” that can be traced directly to Basil of Caesarea.

The question of the deity of the Holy Spirit was thus formally resolved by the Council of Constantinople in 381, in its revision of the Nicene Creed (Kelly). What is left unstated, however, is what the relation between the Son and the Spirit might be, or indeed, whether there is any relation at all. This surprising omission unfortunately left a space in which the most far-reaching controversy in Christian history surrounding the doctrine of the Holy Spirit could occur. For reasons relating as much to trinitarian theory as to pneumatological principle, Latin theology from the time of Augustine had maintained that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son. Augustine, for example, had suggested that the temporal “missions” of the persons are grounded in their (p 305) eternal “processions,” so that the sending of the Spirit by Christ was possible only on the basis of a metaphysically prior procession of the Spirit from the Son. This understanding was then fleshed out in a brilliant theory of trinitarian relationality, and by way of the famous “psychological analogy.” By the beginning of the scholastic period, however, the Augustinian thesis had assumed a rigidity in the minds of major representatives of the Latin tradition that was altogether foreign to Augustine’s own more tentative approach.

The major outcome of this self-certainty within the Latin tradition was the insertion of the filioque phrase into the Latin text of the Nicene Creed on the authority of Pope Benedict VIII in 1014. Hence, “qui ex Patre filioque procedit [who proceeds from the Father and the Son]” now became the Latin confession. Though dogmatizing long-standing Western theory, and universalizing in Latin liturgy something that had for centuries been local liturgical preference, this act was deeply offensive to the Christian East. To the Greeks, it symbolized not only the increasingly chauvinistic claims of the Latins, but also what was wrong with the papacy. In the East the filioque has never been seen as a constructive contribution to the Christian doctrine of the Holy Spirit. The result was ironically that the greatest of Christian schisms, that between the Greeks and the Latins (formally dating from 1054), occurred in the cause of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, the trinitarian person to whom communion is technically appropriated.

Contemporary Problems and Possibilities

The debates of the fourth or the eleventh century may seem distant, but many of the same issues face us today. On the Christian left, from the “pop” theology of John Shelby Spong to varieties of feminist analysis, a running polemic against any idea of a transcendent God who acts redemptively in the world can be identified. It has issued in a treatment of the Spirit as so radically immanent in the several liberative quests of our time as to be indistinguishable from them. As in the philosophy of Fichte, and the theology of the classical liberal Protestant tradition, moralizing praxis here is everything.

On the other side of the coin, the explosive growth of Pentecostal groups globally presents another challenge, some might say an equal and opposite one. If the weakness of the liberal approach is a loss of the lordship of the Holy Spirit, then a major problem in much current Pentecostalism is that the lordship of the Spirit claimed is irreconcilable with the human good as ordinarily conceived. Of real relevance here is the question of the relation of the Spirit to the word of God, the word that dignifies human reason, and its implications for a fully trinitarian understanding of the Spirit.

A theological hermeneutic of the Spirit for today must endeavor to steer a middle path between these extremes of pure anthropocentrism and pneumatic excess. Ideally, in so doing such an account would leave adequate scope for the satisfaction of both tendencies, humane and ecstatic, within a more comprehensive vision. However, Western theology today lacks the intellectual foundations upon which such an account could, in principle, be given. What is demanded is a theology integrative of the whole, whereas what is offered by virtually all contemporary Western theology is a theology in and of fragments. Perhaps it can only be from the cultural and theological traditions emerging in non-Western Christianity that such integrative insight will come. In such a case, the future of the Christian doctrine of the Holy Spirit may lie in the hands of the emerging churches.

See also Illumination

Bibliography

Anselm. On the Procession of the Holy Spirit. In Trinity, Incarnation, and Redemption, ed. and trans. J. Hopkins and H. Richardson. Harper & Row, 1970; Augustine. Trin.; Badcock, G. Light of Truth and Fire of Love. Eerdmans, 1997; Basil of Caesarea. De Spiritu Sancto. Herder, 1993; Congar, Y. I Believe in the Holy Spirit, trans. D. Smith. 3 vols. Seabury, 1983; idem. The Word and the Spirit, trans. D. Smith. Harper & Row, 1986; Del Colle, R. Christ and the Spirit. Oxford University Press, 1994; Dunn, J. D. G. Jesus and the Spirit. SCM, 1975; Kelly, J. N. D. Early Christian Creeds. 2d ed. Longman, 1972; Lampe, G. God as Spirit. SCM, 1977; McIntyre, J. The Shape of Pneumatology. T&T Clark, 1997; Moltmann, J. The Spirit of Life, trans. M. Kohl. SCM, 1992; Mühlen, H. Der Heilige Geist als Person in der Trinität bei der Inkarnation und im Gnadenbund. 5th ed. Aschendorff, 1988; Pinnock, C. Flame of Love. InterVarsity, 1996; Smail, T. The Giving Gift. Hodder & Stoughton, 1988.
Gary D. Badcock

Homiletics See Preaching, Use of the Bible in Homosexuality See Sexuality

Hope

Hope is waiting in confident expectation for God's promises in Christ, summed up in the gospel. Hope is fundamental because the gospel concerns (p 306) God's culmination of his redemptive work, "the grace that Jesus Christ will bring you when he is revealed" (1 Pet. 1:13 NRSV), the "hope of glory" (Col. 1:27). Most of that for which we trust in Christ remains yet future (Rom. 8:24b), for the Spirit's present blessings are "firstfruits." God alone controls fulfillment, so hope is waiting for God to act, graciously and powerfully, on our behalf as in the past.

Christians hope "by faith" (Gal. 5:5). Faith trusts in God's promises, while hope expects what is to come. God's reliability and his promise should foster lively, growing assurance, despite delays and doubts.

Waiting Expectantly for God in Christ

Humans' most pressing need is for the fullness of God's gracious, glorious presence with us, for us. The psalms and the prophets frequently speak of waiting for the Lord (Pss. 25:3, 5, 21; 33:20; 130:5), hoping for and in him (33:18, 22; 131:3; 147:11), and calling him their hope (71:5), the hope of Israel (Jer. 14:8; 17:13) and of all the earth (Ps. 65:5). In turn, “the eye of Yahweh” is on them (33:18 AT). The singleness of biblical hope (62:5–6) should persevere despite perilous circumstances, assured of deliverance and restoration (42:5, 11). God’s faithful power favors with his provision those who trust in him, but those who trust in human rulers are hopeless (Ps. 146).

As the only Creator, the living God is the only reliable object of hope. This provides an authentic (“living”) hope (1 Pet. 1:3). All promises made in the name of other gods fail (Jer. 14:22).

Christ Jesus, “our great God and Savior,” is the hope of all believers (Titus 2:13). The “last days” are already here because the Messiah has come (e.g., 1 Cor. 10:11; Heb. 1:2–3) and will complete what he has begun. As joint heirs with Christ (Rom. 8:17), Christians wait for his return from heaven (1 Thess. 1:10), the glorious manifestation that is the blessed hope (Titus 2:13) and includes resurrection into the eternal kingdom of God (1 Cor. 15:19). The presence of Christ even now dwelling with us and in us by the Spirit constitutes “the hope of glory” (Col. 1:27).

Waiting Confidently

Christians enjoy trinitarian grounds for confidence in “the hope promised by the gospel” (Col. 1:23b NRSV). The “God of hope” covenantally bound his promises, guaranteeing their hope (Rom. 4:18; 15:13). God’s character establishes the gospel’s promises as utterly reliable (Col. 1:5; Heb. 10:23; Titus 1:2; Heb. 6:18; 7:20). Likewise, God’s past faithfulness to his people gives reason to hope (e.g., Pss. 42:4, 6; 105; 106; Rom. 15:4).

Triumphant over enemies (Col. 2:15), the superlative priest and perfect sacrifice anchors Christian hope (Heb. 6:19). God’s supreme “mighty act” was raising Jesus, as the firstfruits (1 Cor. 15:20; cf. Rom. 8:29; Rev. 1:5), assuring believers that he will raise them also (2 Cor. 4:13).

Through the eschatological Spirit, the power of the age to come (Ezek. 36:26–28; 37:5–6, 9–10, 14; Joel 2:28–29), believers “eagerly wait for the hope of righteousness” (Gal. 5:5 NRSV) and abound in hope (Rom. 15:13), having received pledge and seal (Eph. 1:13c–14).

Waiting Expectantly for Remedy

Hope for grace is oriented toward remedying sinfulness, displaying hope's historical character by situating it in the sequence of creation-fall-redemption-reconciliation-consummation. Hope is discontent with the present, personally and structurally, unwilling to remain wounded and wounding. The remedy includes corporate, personal, and cosmic dimensions, all integral to God's salvation (Rom. 8:19, 22). Hope derives from the Messiah's culminative work and thus experiences the tension between present and future blessings.

In this unjust order, the relatively innocent suffer, while the wicked remain unpunished. Justice is not simply punishment of the wicked, for no amount of suffering by the guilty will make things right. The God of justice promises to restore the fortunes of the oppressed (Zeph. 3:19–20), bringing a world in which righteousness dwells (Isa. 65:25; Amos 5:24). In restoration God will make all things new (Rev. 21:4–5).

God's purging and renewal is so extensive as to be "new creation" (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15; Isa. 65:17; Rev. 21:1), overturning sin's effects and accomplishing what sin prevented. Sin and Satan will not thwart God from the eternal fruition of his purposes for creation (Rev. 21–22).

Expectant Waiting as Lifestyle

Hope can seem illusory, given rampant evil and appalling suffering. Christian hope rejects triumphalism ("first suffering, then glory," Rom. 8:17–18). Though God's promises sustain hope, God has not fully revealed his purposes, nor do we fully understand what is revealed. Moreover, waiting can undermine confident expectation, echoed by the psalmists: "How long, O Yahweh?" (p 307)(Pss. 6:3 AT; 13:1–2; 74:10; 79:5; 80:4; 89:46; 94:3; cf. Rev. 6:10).

Portrayed in vivid images of majestic, soaring eagles and inexhaustible runners, God's magnificent promise (Isa. 40:31) speaks not of hope's ultimate fulfillment, but of its effectiveness before fruition, even during long delays. Unfailingly faithful to his promises, God is unpredictable in his utter reliability. His faithfulness is seen only in faith.

Hope is an essential Christian virtue (1 Cor. 13:13), bestowed by the Spirit on the basis of Jesus' resurrection (Rom. 15:13). Christian hope yields the moral fruits of joyful confidence in God (8:28; 12:12), unashamed patience in tribulation (Rom. 5:3; 12:12), and perseverance in prayer (12:12), anchored to God's steadfastness (Heb. 3:6; 6:18–19). Waiting for God is associated with virtues such as integrity and uprightness (Ps. 25:21) and love (1 Cor. 13:7). Paul admonishes believers not to set their hopes on the uncertainty of riches, but rather on God, who richly provides everything (1 Tim. 6:17)—as exemplified by real widows (5:5).

Hopeful Christians should be diligent servants in the world, manifesting the gospel's hope in their vocations. As new creations foreshadowing the new creation, Christians should be means of gracious change to the communities and structures of the age, calling others to join in mercy and justice now and hope for the culminative justice and renewal.

The vice of hopelessness can be presumption (“premature, self-willed anticipation of the fulfillment of what we hope for from God”) or despair (“premature, arbitrary anticipation” of nonfulfillment, perhaps as resignation, “humble acquiescence to the present”) (Moltmann 23). Both forms deny the pilgrim character of hope (Pieper 47).

Hermeneutical Conclusions

Right reading of Scripture on hope requires understanding what God has promised—to each generation. Reading Scripture for its hopes for believers thus acutely poses how it is both a historically and culturally specific document (or collection) and also the enduringly authoritative word of God for all the church throughout history in every culture.

Christians should not read Scripture's promises as merely descriptive of narrated characters or initial recipients/hearers; neither should they claim “every promise in the Book is mine.” Reading Scripture canonically, as God's written word for all the church, still acknowledges distinctions between historically and theologically contextualized promises and later readers' contexts.

Christians' most cherished hope is Christ's personal, bodily return in judgment and blessing. God's character abides infallibly (though without specifying how in each situation he will be loving, merciful, faithful, nor what that means for possible peril or blessing). God's people read his promises to earlier generations as God's hope-full word to them as well, but discerning what God thereby says for them in their circumstances. God's narrated past provisions illustrate what he can do (and sometimes does) for believers in need.

Modern biblical scholars and theologians largely abandoned biblical eschatology as mythological. Moltmann's Theology of Hope spurred recovery of eschatology as fundamental to Jesus' and the apostles' teaching, and the gospel itself as inescapably eschatological, against the profoundest evils. At an extreme, however, especially among evangelicals, exaggeration abounds, wrongly embellishing with conjecture what God has promised.

Hopelessness refuses to wait for God's promises, insisting “now or never.” Hopeless readings (whether presumptuous or despairing) insist on understanding and nurture “now or never,” refusing insight that comes slowly, from the Spirit, through diligent, sound practices. In contrast, rather than facile or evasive readings of challenging or puzzling passages, readings that “hope all things” (1 Cor. 13:7c NRSV) trust God’s provision of insight and nourishment, if not now, then later, and perhaps only incrementally.

See also Last Things, Doctrine of; Virtue

Bibliography

Bauckham, R., and T. Hart. Hope against Hope. Eerdmans, 1999;
Moltmann, J. Theology of Hope, trans. J. Leitch. Harper, 1967; Moule, C. F. D. The Meaning of Hope. Highway Press, 1953. Reprint, Fortress, 1963;
Pieper, J. On Hope. Ignatius, 1986.

Stephen R. Spencer

Hosea, Book of

History of Interpretation

In earlier times comment on Hosea tended to concentrate on the book’s imagery rather than its place in the history of Israel. Special attention was paid to the varied pictures of God’s love and judgment, and it was often related in typological fashion to the work of Christ. In recent years (p 308) Hosea has not been the focus of as much scholarly interest as some of the other OT prophets. Often literary-critical or historical issues have been of most interest. Questions concerning Hosea’s family have occupied a lot of attention: the identity of his wife, Gomer; the nature of her adultery; whether or not she and the wife of chapter 3 are the same person; whether any or all of her children are fathered by Hosea and what the precise significance of their names might be; and whether indeed these are real people or merely literary constructs. Most scholarly articles have concentrated on chapters 1–3. Those who have considered the later chapters have focused on the interpretation of the many and varied images and metaphors used by Hosea to describe Israel’s unfaithfulness and God’s attitude toward his people. The familiarity with the imagery of bread-making (in ch. 7) and of farming and shepherding has led some to draw conclusions about Hosea’s own background.

The question as to the relation of the more positive approach of chapter 14 with the strong judgmental emphasis of chapters 4–13 has occupied the attention of some. So also have other questions relating to the unity and integrity of the book, sometimes relating to the many textual difficulties or to the various canonical links mentioned below. In more recent years feminist scholars have looked again at chapters 1 and 3 and questioned whether Hosea is in fact here portrayed as an obsessive, possessive, power-hungry, and abusive husband—with Gomer in reality the heroine rather than the villain of the piece. Others, in response, have argued that it is not valid to read such a modern agenda into the text.

The Message of Hosea

Hosea speaks directly into the situation of Israel within the eighth century BCE, and it is not really possible to understand what is going on in Hosea without some awareness of that situation. On the one hand, Israel as a whole was economically prosperous and stable during and after Jeroboam's long reign. They were at peace, with the southern kingdom of Judah equally flourishing under their longtime king Uzziah. They benefited economically from their situation on the major trade route between Assyria and Egypt. Assyria had removed surrounding threats but as yet had not really troubled Israel itself. But the prosperity of the nation was not shared by all. Many of the previous generation of small farmers had lost their land after repeated Syrian incursions and several years of drought. A huge, almost unbridgeable gap had developed between rich and poor, with justice almost inevitably the prerogative of the rich.

Religiously speaking, things were going well. Worship of Yahweh was popular; all the required sacrifices and feasts were kept with rigorous attention to detail, great ceremony, and no regard for expense. However, alongside this religiosity, idolatry was rampant, respect for the law was nonexistent, and the people were in effect treating Yahweh as an idol or a baal who could be pacified by presents and bribed into acting on Israel's behalf.

Within this context Hosea takes the imagery used by surrounding nature cults, with a strong emphasis on fertility, and completely transforms it. Chapters 1 and 3 speak of his own fairly disastrous family life. Sandwiched between is a poetic description of the unfaithfulness and adultery of God's people Israel, dramatically pictured here as God's wife, and of the consequences of that unfaithfulness, which puts their identity as the people of God at severe risk. Chapters 4–13 present a series of sermons or oracles using a whole range of methods, pictures, images, and metaphors to set out the reality of Israel's attitudes and actions, the reaction of God to these, and the consequences that had been set in train. Interspersed within this are insights into the nature of God, his deep love, the hurt he feels at Israel's behavior, his desire for them to return to be his people in reality, but also God's justice and the inevitability of their punishment and destruction if there is no repentance.

Hosea's main aim seems to have been to show Israel that their religious confidence was spurious, their behavior was unacceptable, their understanding of God was quite deficient, and their future was at risk. Hosea 1:1 makes it clear that the book was completed after Hosea's ministry was ended, and 14:9 indicates awareness of future readers. However, in between, certain editorial comments have been incorporated within the messages that Hosea delivered to his contemporaries. The whole is clearly seen as having ongoing relevance, reflecting Hosea's own conviction that history repeats itself. Those from different generations and different situations can certainly be challenged by Hosea's message.

Hosea and the Canon

Hosea's closest links are with Amos, who also spoke out in the northern kingdom during the reign of Jeroboam II. Amos brings to the foreground and extends the picture of Israel's economic (p 309) and social corruption that is reflected in Hosea, while Hosea extends and develops Amos's portrayal of the idolatry and syncretism that was rife throughout the land. There are also many connections with Isaiah and Micah, the other eighth-century prophets working in the south. The understanding of the covenant presented especially in Deuteronomy and Exodus has a strong influence on Hosea's reflections. In turn, Hosea's exploration of what is involved in being God's people stands as a background to the more event-based account of the period in 2 Kings and to the teaching of the later prophets.

There are few direct references to Hosea in the NT. Yet, Matthew (9:13; 12:7) records Jesus twice quoting from Hosea's clear statement in 6:6 that God desires "mercy, not sacrifice." And Paul uses Hos. 1:9–10 and 2:23 in Rom. 8:14 and 9:25–26, as part of his discussion on who exactly it is that is eligible to be called "my people." It is debatable whether the Israelites' conviction that "on the third day he will raise us up" (Hos. 6:2 NRSV), almost certainly spoken in the context of a spurious repentance, lies behind the references to Jesus' resurrection on the third day in, for example, Matt. 16:21; 17:23; and Luke 9:22.

Hosea and Theology

Hosea's understanding of God, Israel, and the world is founded on the concept of covenant, specifically the covenant between God and Israel. Israel's very existence was bound up with the people's identity as those in covenant relationship with God, whose calling was to represent God before the world. They were Yahweh's people, and he was their God. If the covenant collapsed, then Israel would, in effect, no longer exist. Any kind of relationship is costly. It makes demands in both emotional and behavioral terms. Hosea portrays the covenant requirements incumbent on God's people and the cost that is involved for Yahweh himself. The marriage metaphor, where Israel is pictured as God's wife, was avoided by many of the prophets due to the danger of misunderstanding arising from the widespread use of sexual imagery in the surrounding fertility cults. As in all the prophetic literature, this book totally rejects everything that Baalism stands for and, in particular, the use of sex in magical and cultic fertility rites. However, Hosea's transformation of the image becomes quite appropriate. God had committed himself to Israel as a husband to a wife, and Israel had also committed itself to the covenant. The corollary of this is that both sides must remain faithful. Hosea's point is that just as physical adultery shatters a marriage relationship and in the process causes great pain, so Israel's spiritual adultery will shatter their relationship with God. On the other hand, with evidenced forgiveness and mercy on the one hand and evidenced repentance on the other, even a shattered marriage can be repaired.

God's Love for Israel. The "marriage" between Yahweh and Israel was based on his love for them. Even when they deserted him and served other gods—committed spiritual adultery—he still loved them and longed to have them back. Hosea's own experience helped him to understand God's position, and he therefore strongly attacks Israel's idolatry but also pleads desperately with them to repent and return to God, who in that circumstance will gladly forgive and restore them. The constancy of God's love is a theme that runs through the book. In the past he has blessed and cared for them (2:15; 11:1; 13:4–5). In the present he longs to restore them (7:1; 11:8–9). The future is still in question, depending on their response. God takes them seriously as people and allows them the dignity of taking responsibility for their own actions even when that results in negative consequences. The way they exercise their responsibility will influence their own future. Those who argue that God is portrayed here as abusive and controlling miss this point altogether. He cannot be in relationship with those who are not his people and, if they persist in their refusal to act as his people, then they are inevitably signing their own death warrant (4:6–9; 9:7–9; 13:9–16). However, because of God's ongoing and gracious love, there is still hope for salvation (11:10–12; 14:4–9). This is Yahweh's ongoing and deep desire.

The marriage metaphor is profound, but it is not big enough to tell the whole story. Hosea also portrays God, among other things, as a caring parent (11:1–4), a doctor (7:1; 11:3; 14:4), and a shepherd (11:4; 13:5). The implication is that God is able to supply all their needs.

The Requirements of Relationship. Because of God's nature as "the Holy One" (11:9, 12), relationship with him can only exist on his terms. If Israel is to be his people, they must be a holy people; their commitment to him must be exclusive, and their behavior must reflect his nature. Wholehearted devotion and faithfulness to God are vital, but right behavior toward other people as well as toward God himself is an essential part of being God's people. Hosea does not major on social responsibility in the way that Amos does, but he is very well aware of the importance of justice, righteousness, and compassion as characteristics (p 310) of God's people (2:19; 6:6; 12:6). Relationship also requires knowledge, and Hosea stresses the importance of Israel studying God's word in order to know what he has revealed about himself. The priests who had been given the responsibility for ensuring the people's knowledge of God therefore come under particular condemnation (4:6–9). God's terms for a restored relationship include their repentance and turning back to him (3:5; 5:4; 11:5, 10–11). Hosea wants Israel to grasp the seriousness of sin (1:2; 2:1–5; 3:1–5). The imagery he uses to describe the faithfulness and betrayal of Israel is almost as varied as what is used to describe the love of God. Israel needs to see itself not just as an adulterous wife or an unresponsive child, but also as a stubborn heifer, a half-baked and half-raw cake, a sick person or a foolish bird (4:16; 5:13; 7:8–12; 9:11; 11:1–3). In Israel there is "only cursing, lying and murder, stealing and adultery" (4:2), prostitution, idolatry, immorality, arrogance, and hypocrisy (2:7–8; 4:10–13; 5:7; 8:2–6; 12:7–8). Like adultery in marriage, Israel's sin is not something that can simply be ignored; it needs to be acknowledged and dealt with. But repentance must be real. Sacrifices without major lifestyle changes are completely unacceptable. Renewed commitment is evidenced not by a renewed demonstration of religious fervor but by transformed lives (6:1–6).

Hosea was apparently not very hopeful that Israel in general would respond to God's pleading with them, but he was convinced that in the end God's love would triumph (11:8–11; 14:4–9). In this way he points forward to the later revelation of God's love revealed in Jesus. The people cannot defeat sin by ignoring or avoiding it, but a way nevertheless does exist to deal with its otherwise inevitable consequences.

Beeby's theological commentary on Hosea brings out strongly the link demonstrated between the love of God and the knowledge of God, providing an illustration of the way in which others have used Hosea to discuss a range of epistemological questions. Several of the essays edited by Vanhoozer helpfully use Hosea to illustrate their understanding of the love of God in today's world. Stuhlmüller, in the book cowritten with Senior, shows how Hosea can provide stimulation for modern mission. Hosea's critique of attitudes toward economics found among his wealthier contemporaries certainly speaks into today's consumer cultures. Hosea has much to say to all who accept the challenge of reflecting theologically on today's world.

Bibliography

Achtemeier, E. Minor Prophets I. Hendrickson, 1996; Bal, M. Lethal Love. Indiana University Press, 1987; Beeby, H. D. Grace Abounding. Eerdmans, 1989; Birch, B. C. Hosea, Joel, and Amos. Westminster John Knox, 1997; Goldingay, J. "Hosea 1–3, Genesis 1–4 and Masculist Interpretation." HBT 17 (1995): 37–44; Kidner, D. Love to the Loveless. InterVarsity, 1981; Mays, J. L. Hosea: A Commentary. OTL. SCM, 1968; Senior, D., and C. Stuhlmüller. The Biblical Foundations for Mission. SCM, 1983; Stuart, D. Hosea–Jonah. WBC. Word, 1987; Vanhoozer, K., ed. Nothing Greater, Nothing Better. Eerdmans, 2001; Ward, J. J. Hosea. MM. Harper & Row, 1966; idem. Thus Says the Lord. Abingdon, 1991; Williamson, H. G. M. "Hope under Judgment: The Prophets of the Eighth Century BCE." EvQ 72 (2000): 291–306; Wolff, H. W. Hosea. Hermeneia. Fortress, 1977; Yee, G. A. "Hosea: Commentary and Reflection." NIB 7:195–297.

Mary J. Evans

Human Being, Doctrine of

The Bible has no single theological psychology or doctrine of human nature, sometimes also called theological anthropology. These are philosophical generalizations, and the Bible is not a philosophy book. Still, some NT texts do embody philosophical concepts that were prominent at the time of their writing. The Tanak does not contain philosophical concepts. What we have are verses here and there that have been central in the thinking of highly influential philosophical theologians who specifically treated this theme, bequeathing their interpretation of Scripture on this topic to us latter-day Christians. Christian psychology as such took shape in the fourth and fifth centuries.

To speak about theological psychology differentiates the Christian understanding of human nature from secular psychology. It too operates according to assumptions about human behavior that enable us to construct safe and just societies. Christian psychology differs from secular psychology because it posits an undeniable and indestructible link between God and humanity. From a Christian perspective, humanity can never interpret itself in terms of itself, but only in terms of God, its Creator. All religions holding that God created us share this characteristic. Nonreligious interpretations of human life do not bear this constraint. Hence, theological psychology cannot admit that human beings are autonomous, but only and always related to God.

Biblical Foundations

Perhaps the most important verse used in constructing a Christian psychology is Gen. 1:26, “Let (p 311)us make humankind in our image, according to our likeness” (NRSV). Yet, two chapters later, the first humans disobey God (Gen. 3); in the next chapter (4), we learn of the first murder; and two chapters after that (6), God sees the world so filled with corruption and violence that he regrets having created it altogether. Nevertheless, after the flood, seeing that humanity is morally unstable, God promises that he will never again destroy the world in response to corruption, “for the inclination of the human heart is evil from youth” (8:21 NRSV). In other words, early in the biblical story God reconciles himself to the reality of human moral failing. Perhaps he suffers disappointment. As if not to let us forget for a moment, the remainder of the Tanak teems with stories of deception, idolatry, and violence.

Sin is a prominent theme in Rom. 5–8. Paul draws an analogy between Adam, the first man, and Christ, the new man. The former brought death into the world; the latter, by being resurrected, brought life from death. Later tradition would make the same parallel between Eve, the mother of life, and Mary, the mother of Christ. In Rom. 8, Paul introduces what would become a major theme of Christian psychology. We incline toward either physical things or spiritual things. Those whose cast of mind is toward the former are hostile to God because God is spiritual, while the Spirit of God dwells in those inclined toward spiritual things. We are transformed from the former to the latter by baptism into the death of Christ and called to live that spiritual power thereafter.

Christian psychology has teetered on the point of this paradox: we are in the divine image, yet fatally flawed. Interpreters stress now one side of this tension, and then the other. Theologians who meditate on these Scriptures search for clues as to what God thinks of us. So, to understand how Scripture may be and has been read theologically for our edification and to search out its wisdom, we do well to read behind those who deposited these traces for us.

Since biblically grounded Christians insist on constructing a theological psychology from the biblical materials, we will follow two highly influential Scripture interpreters on this theme, one from Greek-speaking Christianity, Gregory of Nyssa, and one from Latin-speaking Christianity, Augustine of Hippo.

Patristic Formulations

Gregory of Nyssa. Gregory of Nyssa framed Christian psychology for the Greek Christian world with his treatise On the Creation of Humanity (De opificio hominis), written in 380. It is an interpretation of Gen. 1:26–27 organized around thirty questions that he poses about the intent of God with the creation of humankind. The questions cover the meaning of being in the divine image, the relation of the soul to the body, and the physical likelihood of the possibility of resurrection in response to unbelievers and Christians with whom he seriously disagreed.

Humanity, Gregory teaches, is the summit of creation, created last so that everything was prepared for our enjoyment and well-being. We are superior to other creatures because only we can draw near to God, can be clothed in virtue, and are capable of immortality and drenched in righteousness. We are the royalty of the cosmos.

Being the image of God is a psychological and moral likeness, not a physical one. It means that only we resemble the beauty of God and experience the bliss that he is when we are alienated from all evil, free from unruly emotions. That we manifest the divine beauty is evident in that we have the gift of understanding and are capable of love.

He follows the psychology of his day by identifying three aspects of the soul: physical, sensual, and rational. The soul is created together with the body at conception and animates the body. It is perfected in its higher intellectual functions.

Gregory is most interested in the mind. There is what he calls a spacious “city of the mind” that stores information gathered by the senses to give us knowledge of things. The mind, he believes, is not located in a single organ but is diffused throughout the whole body, producing its proper effect on each part as is appropriate to it. Similarly, the image of God is present in the whole body, but is fullest in the human intellect.

The mind remains good and beautiful as long as it remains like its archetype, but if it departs therefrom, it loses its beauty and goodness and becomes misshapen until the image of God is hidden. The instability of the soul suggests that although we image God, we are quite different from the one who is pure, immortal, and everlasting. Scripture points this out by following Gen. 1:26 with the creation of humanity as male and female. This is a departure from the prototype, God, who is neither male nor female.

The male-female distinction speaks of human passion, which creates the struggle between the unchangeable beauty and goodness that characterize God and his image in us, and our desires that pull us in different directions. Although (p 312) human nature is created for the beauty and goodness that are God, our emotional instability means that our powers of understanding and deliberation can be swayed by different desires. We are at once brutal and beautiful and endowed with freedom to change.

Marriage was added for procreation, since we humans are mortal and must replace ourselves. And procreation comes from the irrational side of the self, in which we act like animals rather than angels. Thus, the irrational side of our nature is also profitable for the human race. Marriage controls the most irrational and potentially destructive part of us.

Our erratic emotions, however, extend beyond sexual lust and can deteriorate into anger, love of pleasure, fear, greediness, envy, deceit, conspiracy, hypocrisy, and so on. Gregory calls this the “evil husbandry of the mind.” These evils can be transformed into virtues when the desire for the good and the beautiful (God) is strengthened. A rightly ordered life enables the divine gift to reappear. Gregory concludes that our personalities are neither fully good, nor fully evil, but caught between nobility and vanity. When vanity becomes ascendant, “life becomes painful and miserable.”

All of this will only be worked out, Gregory teaches, with the consummation of history, with resurrection. Following 1 Cor. 15, he looks forward to our transformation from the corruptible and earthly to the impassible and eternal. Then we shall become like the angels.

Augustine of Hippo. The Christian West was deeply influenced by Augustine of Hippo, Gregory of Nyssa’s younger contemporary. He was a tremendously prolific writer and returned again and again to the task of articulating his moral psychology. It is found in all three of his major works: his autobiography, the Confessions, the second half of his major work on The Trinity, and The City of God, as well as in his major commentary on Genesis. Bits and pieces are also scattered throughout other works. His understanding of human nature is one of his irrevocable contributions to Western thought and literature.

Augustine, like Basil, took his understanding of human nature from the beginning of Genesis and wrote several commentaries on it. But he was also apparently taken with the great penitential psalm (51), honing in on v. 5: “Indeed, I was born guilty, a sinner when my mother conceived me” (NRSV). From Gen. 1:26 he insisted that being created in the divine image refers to our higher faculties, those that separate us from brute animals. He especially stressed abilities of memory, understanding, will, and the attributes of goodness, love, justice, and wisdom that characterize God and in which we can participate. Growth in spiritual maturity is the gradual recognition that growing into this image is the purpose of human life. The human calling is to discover that we long for the goodness and wisdom that are of God, and that we find these only through Jesus Christ.

Augustine's Confessions established the fundamental point of theological psychology: we cannot understand ourselves unless and until we understand God. In his book The Trinity, he made this point in terms of discovering that the image of God we bear is the image of the triune God. In The City of God, he formulated this vision in terms of the Christian pilgrimage to the heavenly city; the human calling is to grow in holiness.

While our self-concept must always be in relation to God, Augustine had to account for the reality round about. The world (the earthly city) is filled with dissension, war, and violence. When he observed children, including recalling his own childhood, Augustine saw that they seem to be naturally selfish; they do not want to share their toys, obey their caregivers, or do their lessons. Adolescents, he said, recalling his own destructive behavior at age sixteen, are no different. We all, he concluded, are rebellious, turned in upon ourselves, self-absorbed. Sin contrasts with the goodness of God that Gregory so exalted in when looking at us.

From Ps. 51:5, one suspects, Augustine drew the conclusion that all human beings are born sinful and that state is somehow transmitted to them at conception. In The City of God, he was careful to say that sex itself is not sinful (sex in marriage for procreation is especially good), but the fact that after the fall lust surrounds it renders it dangerous. Augustine's main concern is self-mastery. Our inability to conquer lust—be it sexual, economic, or political—is the reason behind human downfall and the key to understanding human psychology. The observation that we fail of self-mastery is called original sin, and it contrasts with actual sin. The former has nothing to do with our life's story, but is how things are with all of us, while the latter, actual sin, refers to misdeeds that make up our personal narrative.

The irrefragability of sin led to the idea that we are utterly unable to please God, and so have no freedom to avoid sin. This was in contrast to all previous Christian theology that depended on the ability to learn from the goodness of God. Yet (p 313) the need to assert human freedom in order to render morality possible has plagued this view. Unfortunately, the tradition thought in polar opposites, each side condemning the other, rather than recognizing both individual variation and the contradictions within each human breast. The older view that spiritual growth is a slow process of education empowering the soul for obedience to God was often ruled out.

Lest we conclude that there is no escape from death and corruption of the body, Augustine turned to the sacraments of the church. He created the notion that baptism into the death of Christ so connects us with the Mediator that we are washed clean of original sin. Thereby we gain the opportunity to begin a pilgrimage to the heavenly city, during which we grow into the image of God, which is our true identity. We do this in the companionship of the church.

There are many matters on which we might compare Gregory and Augustine, since their psychology pivots around the same points. In many cases, the differences are of emphasis. Three points of difference between them, however, are worth mentioning. Augustine divided humanity into saints and sinners and laced his psychology with the doctrine of election. He bounced between urging people to aspire to the heavenly holiness and holding that God ordains only some to make up the number of angels in heaven, to complete the proper number lost by the fall of the bad angels. Gregory did not struggle with this tension. He believed that good would naturally vanquish evil, and that human freedom remained pure enough even after the fall to restore us to our divine destiny with God.

A second important difference to note is that while Augustine divided humanity into two sorts, Gregory saw the struggle between what Augustine called the two cities as a struggle within every human heart. We are inclined toward both goodness and evil at the same time.

The third difference between them is the role of Christ. Gregory's treatise does not tie the struggle between good and evil in human life to Christ. Augustine locates the ability to make the pilgrimage to God dependent on being baptized into the Mediator, who bridges the great chasm between earth and heaven.

These two readings of human nature—one stressing the strength of human self-mastery, the other stressing the weakness of the human will—are two judgments about who we really are, what will destabilize us, and what will ennoble us. They are different assessments of human moral strength and character. Does the nobility we inherit from God empower us to overcome the pull of lust and evil that the world offers? Or are our baser desires beyond our control, throwing us utterly on the grace of Christ if it be God's will so to rescue some of us?

These are the major themes of Christian psychology, which at bottom is a moral psychology. Later theologians toy with these themes, and in modern times, secular psychology and ideology has cast them in different lights. In the West, Karl Barth, in a particularly Reformed manner, reinterpreted the imago Dei as a divine promise to be eternally in covenant relationship with human beings, a promise signified by Christ, rather than as a human ability to relate to or know God. On this view, moral motivation arises from gratitude for this covenant relationship. Liberation theology, on the other hand, used the Augustinian framework to give theology an especially moral bent by distinguishing oppressed from oppressor in political confrontations.

See also Image of God; Original Sin; Psychological Interpretation; Sin, Doctrine of

Bibliography

Cary, P. Augustine's Invention of the Inner Self. Oxford University Press, 2000; Mathewes, C. "Augustinian Anthropology." Journal of Religious Ethics 27, no. 2 (1999): 195–222; Young, R. "Gregory of Nyssa's Use of Theology and Science in Constructing Theological Anthropology." Pro Ecclesia 2 (Summer 1993): 345–63.

Ellen T. Charry

Hymn      See Music, the Bible and; Poetry; Psalms, Book of

I

(p 314)

Ideological Criticism

Definitions of "ideology" abound, and arguably all such definitions are themselves ideological. Some interpreters, influenced by Marxist scholarship, use the term negatively to refer to an idea-system that creates "false consciousness" and blinds one to the way things really are. Increasingly the term is used in broader ways. I use it to refer to "a roughly coherent set of ideas, amounting to a world-view" (Clines 8). Ideologies are acquired through processes of socialization, and they function as "glasses behind the eyes," shaping the way reality is perceived and guiding behavior. To those who hold them, they seem obvious and natural, and so are usually unperceived until attention is drawn to them.

At its most basic, ideological criticism is the task of uncovering the hidden ideologies at work in social practices, structures, and texts. Written texts encode ideology, communicating and reinforcing it in ways usually unperceived. It is often said that every ideology serves the interests of certain people and groups while marginalizing others. This would make every ideology, however liberating for some, a potential source of oppression for others. Unmasking the dynamics of such power-relations is central to the work of the ideological critic. With reference to a written text, the critic will employ a hermeneutic of suspicion, seeking to find whose interests are served by the text. For instance, David Clines argues that the Decalogue was written to protect the interests of the older males within the Israelite community.

Ideological critics have also argued that no interpretation of a text is “objective” in a positivist sense. Thus, the project of a neutral interpretation of Scripture, to which some forms of historical criticism have aspired, is every bit as ideologically loaded as a theological interpretation (Segovia). Many evangelicals share this perspective (e.g., Bartholomew). Every reading is itself ideological, and reading therefore is a fundamentally ethical and political act. Ideological critics will openly declare their own position and will (in theory) aspire to subject it to constant critique lest it become absolutized. Thus, ideological criticism of the Bible seeks to critique not only Scripture but also those who have interpreted it.

The Variety of Ideological Criticism

Ideological criticism is a quite diverse reading strategy. It is employed by the many liberation theologies (Latin American, Black, feminist, postcolonial, queer), which all seek to take the experiences of the oppressed group they represent as the critical principle for hermeneutics, the marginal position from which the biblical texts are read. The engagement with Scripture arises from concrete situations, and a passion for justice lies at its root. The liberationist reader will seek out the biases of official interpretations, thus undermining their neutrality and truth-status. They will also identify liberating strands within the Bible (e.g., freedom for the slaves, all humanity in God’s image) that feed into their liberating theology. At the same time “toxic texts” (racist, sexist, homophobic ones, etc.) will be identified and thus stripped of authority. For instance, some feminist biblical interpreters argue the following: (1) The teaching that all humans are equally in God’s image (Gen. 1:26) is a liberating text that undermines any theology or practice denying the full humanity and equality of women. (2) Paul’s teaching that man is the image and glory of God while woman is the glory of man (1 Cor. 11:7) is patriarchal and must be rejected. (3) Traditional Christian teachings of the equality of men and women are patriarchal and oppressive because “equal but different” in practice means “not equal.”

The ideological critic will often be aware that an ideology (and theology is seen as an ideology) liberating for one group may be oppressive to another; consequently, no ideology must be absolutized. For instance, the exodus motif, with its focus on freedom for the oppressed and suffering slaves, has been a major inspiration to many diverse liberation theologies. However, the exodus was a stage on the way to the all-important possession (p 315) of Canaan—a land already inhabited. The Canaanites were the indigenous people who were conquered, subjugated, and killed. The Bible invites readers to identify with the Israelite invaders rather than the Canaanites. A Native American reader may find such texts oppressive and wish to subvert them, especially as such texts were used by European settlers to justify their taking of land (Warrior). Thus, radical pluralism in interpretation is celebrated by many ideological critics, for it stops any one reading strategy from setting itself up as the way to read texts. Postcolonial interpretation is especially sensitive to such issues. At the heart of postcolonialism is the criticism that Europe has set the agenda for reading Scripture. Europe has decided the issues that matter and the methods for reading, imposing these on the rest of the world. This is simply an extension of the colonial relationship that existed in the past. Interpreting the Bible postcolonially involves allowing for radical diversity in interpretations arising from the radical diversity of concrete situations in which Scripture is read (Segovia). It means reading Scripture through the eyes of the colonized and not only the colonizer.

Ideological Criticism and Theological Interpretation

The claim that all interpretation is ideological creates a welcome space for the academic acceptability of theological interpretation alongside other academic modes. Also, Christians should not be too quick to dismiss a hermeneutic of suspicion because it finds an analogue in the doctrine of sin. The human heart is deceitful, and often our real motivations are hidden even from ourselves. Suspicion thus has its hermeneutical role in a fallen world, although the elevation of suspicion to the driving seat of interpretation is problematic. That move would undermine the very cry for justice that calls forth ideological readings in the first place. All notions of “truth” and “justice” would be unmasked, and Christian theology would dissolve in a pool of agnosticism, along with all moral and truth-seeking discourse (including liberation theologies). The Christian reader of Scripture will prioritize a hermeneutic of trust and only allow suspicion to play second fiddle. There are good nontheological (Patrick and Scult) as well as theological reasons for such a stance. Indeed, the theological interpreter will see in Scripture the basis for an unmasking of the ideologies of the world. In the dialogical encounter between Bible and present situation, the present situation is decentered and open to reevaluation in light of Scripture, which retains the weight of authority (Thiselton, ch. 16).

One gift that ideological criticism can bequeath theological criticism is that of opening up genuinely liberating dimensions of biblical texts to which we have been blinded by our own ideological limitations. Thus, a middle-class Western Christian may never so much as notice the political implications of the exodus narrative, or the value of the insight that much of the biblical literature was written by people living under the rule of colonial powers. Ideology can blind us to some aspects of the text but also open us to others. There is much to learn from listening to how others “hear” the Bible.

However, most ideological critics wish to argue that the Bible contains numerous conflicting ideologies, many of which are positively oppressive. The Bible contains “texts of terror” that are sexist, racist, homophobic, elitist, and colonialist. At one and the same time, the Bible is a liberating text and a “letter that kills.” Numerous problems are raised for theological interpretation. First, Christian theological criticism must see Scripture as in some sense being or mediating the word of God. But how can we receive Scripture as the word of God if it contains so many harmful texts? Indeed, many ideological critics have the undermining of biblical authority as one of their declared aims, for as long as Scripture exercises authority, it retains its authority to oppress. Second, theological criticism seeks to read Scripture as a unity; but if it embodies numerous conflicting ideologies, how can we claim that the teaching of any particular text is the (as opposed to a) teaching of the Bible? Third, ideological criticism often seeks to expose the notion of a canon as itself ideological and suspect. This unweaves the very notion of Scripture that lies at the heart of theological interpretation. Christians need to be careful how they appropriate the tools of ideological criticism.

To get our bearings, Christian theological interpretation must not surrender the notion of canon—indeed, canon provides a fruitful way to address some of the concerns raised by ideological critics. For Christians, the Bible is only authoritative as a whole, with all its complex intertextual connections (Parry). Suspicious interpretations are often the result of isolating texts from the canonical context. For instance, reading Abraham’s sacrifice of Isaac as a legitimization of child abuse is only possible if the notion of canon is abandoned (Moberly). The biblical canon provides resources for internal critique, (p 316) so that the critical standpoint from which the unmasking is done is generated by the Scriptures themselves and is not an alien one imposed from the outside. For example, a text like Ruth, told from a female perspective, relativizes the androcentric perspective of many biblical stories without in any way threatening biblical authority or inspiration (Bauckham, ch. 1; Parry). Or the fact that Deuteronomy stands at the head of the history running through to 2 Kings invites a critical interpretation of the stories of Israel's kings (McConville). William Webb has helpfully developed a "redemptive-movement" hermeneutic maintaining that Christian interpreters should trace the canonical trajectories across Scripture when attempting to see which aspects of the Bible transcend cultural contexts and which do not. This enables him to argue, for instance, that even though much of the Bible reflects the patriarchal cultures in which it was written, it would call us either to egalitarianism or ultrasoft patriarchy in gender relations. Webb's canonical hermeneutic (1) arises from Scripture itself and (2) retains a strong notion of biblical inspiration and authority while (3) allowing interpreters to recognize the presence of patriarchal ideology in the text. Webb argues that all biblical texts push in a redemptive direction even if many texts do not push all the way.

Less-conservative canonical strategies for handling ideological critique of the Bible for Christian readers can be found in the work of Walter Brueggemann and Terence Fretheim (with Froehlich).

See also African Biblical Interpretation; Asian Biblical Interpretation; Canon; Feminist Biblical Interpretation; Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics; Racism; Scripture, Unity of; Slavery

Bibliography

Adam, A. K. M. What Is Postmodern Biblical Criticism? Fortress, 1995; Bartholomew, C. "Uncharted Waters: Philosophy, Theology and the Crisis in Biblical Interpretation." Pages 1–39 in Renewing Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2000; Bauckham, R. Gospel Women. Eerdmans/T&T Clark, 2002; Brueggemann, W. Theology of the Old Testament. Fortress, 1997; Clines, D. J. A. Interested Parties. Sheffield Academic Press, 1995; Fretheim, T., and K. Froehlich. The Bible as Word of God in a Postmodern Age. Fortress, 1998; McConville, J. G. "Law and Monarchy in the Old Testament." Pages 69–88 in A Royal Priesthood?, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2002; Moberly, R. W. L. The Bible, Theology and Faith. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Parry, R. "Feminist Hermeneutics and Evangelical Concerns: The Rape of Dinah as a Case Study." TynBul 53 (2002): 1–28; Patrick, D., and A. Scult. "Rhetoric and Ideology: A Debate within Biblical Scholarship over the Import of Persuasion." Pages 63–83 in The Rhetorical

Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Porter and D. L. Stamps. Sheffield University Press, 1999; Segovia, F. F. Decolonizing Biblical Studies. Orbis, 2000; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. HarperCollins, 1992; Warrior, R. "A Native American Perspective: Canaanites, Cowboys, and Indians." Pages 277–85 in Voices from the Margin, ed. R. Sugirtharajah. Orbis, 1995; Webb, W. Slaves, Women and Homosexuals. InterVarsity, 2001; "Ideological Criticism." Pages 272–308 in The Postmodern Bible. Yale University Press, 1995.

Robin Parry

Ideology     See Ideological Criticism

Illocutionary Act     See Speech-Act Theory

Illumination

Illumination is the term that refers to the need for the human mind to be enlightened by God in order to understand the things of God. It finds its scriptural roots in language of God as light, often in contrast to the darkness of the world. Here, God is seen as the one who, as light, dispels the darkness; and human beings are shown as those who yet prefer darkness since it allows their wicked deeds to be hidden (e.g., John 1; 3:19–21). Theologically, however, the concept really emerged not so much in the context of exegeting such passages but rather in discussions of epistemology that took their cue from the kind of issues raised by the Neoplatonic philosophy of Plotinus.

The central issue to which the idea of illumination is addressed is that of knowledge of divine things: given the fact that divine truth is ultimately infinite, perfect, and uncreated truth and human beings are finite and sinful creatures, how can the latter have certain knowledge of the former?

The concept receives its most influential yet enigmatic expression in the writings of Augustine, who regards the idea as resting on three principles: God is light and thus illuminates all human beings to one level or another. Divine truth is intelligible. And human beings can only come to grasp this Divine truth to the extent to which God illumines them. Further, God has endowed human beings with a structure of rationality that reflects the pattern of ideas in the divine mind. This makes knowledge possible, but the human mind still requires light from God. In other words, all knowledge requires the constant presence and action of God himself. By developing his position thus, Augustine is able to safeguard both the (p 317)finitude of the human mind, the sovereignty and mystery of God, yet also the reality and adequacy of human knowledge of God. Thus, he offers a view of Christian knowledge that maintains the importance of both its objective reality and its subjective appropriation within a context controlled by God's sovereignty.

In the history of theology, significantly divergent interpretations of Augustine's view arose. Thomas regarded the active intellect as the source of illumination, and since God was the cause of the active intellect, so he was, in an ultimate sense, the one who illumines. This involves something of an attenuation of Augustine's own position while still safeguarding his central concerns. Franciscan approaches, however, tended to emphasize the direct role of God himself in illumination via the infusion or impression of divine forms upon the mind.

One influential modern interpretation of Augustine that has enjoyed some influence in Catholic circles is that associated with the neo-Thomism of Etienne Gilson and Frederick Copleston, known as the "formal theory." This view is not dissimilar in some ways to aspects of the Protestant approach, since it is concerned not so much with the origins of ideas as with the way in which they are believed. The formalists regard illumination as providing a quality of certainty and necessity to particular ideas. Where this approach would appear to break distinctly with the older Franciscan notion is in the radical separation it makes between the origin/content of the ideas and their certainty, with only the latter being the proper sphere of illumination.

A further interpretation of Augustine emphasizes the fact that he can talk of illumination in terms of two lights: the divine light of God, and the lesser light of the human intellect. This view has the advantage over that of the neo-Thomism of Copleston in that it is able to offer an account of the human intellect as both passive (in relation to the divine light) and active (in relation to its own power of illumination/cognition). This view has been argued most notably by Protestant philosopher Ronald Nash, who sees three paradoxes lying at the heart of Augustine's teaching: The human intellect is both passive and active in relation to the forms, which are both given to it by God and used by the human mind in knowing. The forms are and are not separate from the human mind (they exist as archetypes in God, in things created after the eternal pattern, and in the human mind). And the human mind is and is not a light that makes knowledge possible.

While Augustine was a profound influence on pre-Enlightenment Protestantism with respect to grace, this was not so marked with respect to illumination. Given its essentially Aristotelian epistemology, the philosophical use of illumination tended to be avoided, with theologians on the whole identifying illumination with the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit. In this context, illumination became a mode of knowing divine truths, which separated it from mere notional assent to the same. Thus, for example, though the sense of the Bible could be grasped by the application of the standard rules of linguistic interpretation, the mode by which these truths were themselves known was radically different in the believer and the unbeliever because of the action of the Holy Spirit. In this way, illumination also played a significant role in those crucial Protestant concepts, certainty and assurance of faith, by testifying not simply that biblical teaching is true in the general sense but also that it is true for the one who believes it. Frequently linked to the notion of filioque, the Spirit was seen as taking the word and applying it, or making it real, to the person upon whom the Spirit was acting. Furthermore, Protestantism saw illumination as allowing for belief in suprarational truths (such as the Trinity) that were taught in Scripture but seemed nonsensical in comparison with normal categories of logic and coherence. Illumination in context effectively exalted human reasoning powers to a higher level, where such apparently paradoxical ideas could be believed without incoherence.

Several comments are in order relative to the various notions of illumination. First, the abandonment of Neoplatonism as offering an adequate account of human nature inevitably meant that the Augustinian notion of illumination needed to be either replaced or radically transformed in the modern philosophical and psychological context.

Second, even if vestiges of the tradition can be salvaged for the present day, numerous problems persist. There is, for example, always a danger—inherent in use of illumination as focused simply on the certainty with which a belief is held—that a radical separation between the content of belief and the mode of belief is being posited. The maintenance of a strict separation between the origin of a belief and the way in which the belief is held would seem to be a highly problematic position if conceived in terms of illumination in anything approaching the trajectories of Augustinian thought.

(p 318) Further, notions of illumination that purport to lift the human mind beyond normal rationality are also not without difficulty. On one level, the crisis in criteria of rationality, as posited by much recent thinking, renders the structure of the old arguments about rationality implausible. On another level, when illumination is conceived of in this way, it can come to function simply as a deus ex machina, to be wheeled in at the appropriate time in a manner that allows a coach and horses to be driven through opposing positions while rendering one's own stance impervious to criticism.

This leads to the third point: the relationship of the theological concept of illumination to biblical interpretation is not straightforward. Too much emphasis on illumination as providing the content of Christian belief can render biblical interpretation an essentially gnostic activity, which places the views of those who have been “illuminated” beyond the criticism of those who have not. Thus, any views proposed by the illuminated can be claimed as legitimate biblical teaching no matter what interpretative methods are being used to extract them. Too much emphasis on illumination as the mode of believing, however, can reduce the act of interpretation itself to the level of the nontheological and thus destroy what is distinctly Christian about the act of interpretation. In fact, the linguistic emphasis of modern accounts of knowledge in general and interpretation in particular renders much of the tradition a dead end. With reference to understanding texts, the rise of hermeneutics in the place of epistemology has, in theological discussion, really served to sideline the kinds of issues with which illumination in the classical sense dealt. Having said that, it can perhaps be retained as useful if it is restricted in application to discussion of the mode of belief (faith), when linked to the subjective activity of the Holy Spirit. First Corinthians 2 speaks of the Spirit of God teaching and imparting truth in words not taught by human reason, and of giving understanding of spiritual truths. To the natural person, such things as the Spirit teaches are nonsense and incomprehensible, implying that there is more to biblical interpretation than simply learning the public rules of the game. Clearly, Scripture here is making an implicit connection between the Spirit, faith, and precisely the kinds of questions with which classical theories of illumination attempted to wrestle, and which remain perennially relevant to the church. See also Epistemology; Holy Spirit, Doctrine of the

Bibliography

Ackworth, R. “God and Human Knowledge.” Downside Review 75 (1957): 207–14; Bubacz, B. St. Augustine’s Theory of Knowledge. E. Mellen, 1981; Copleston, F. A History of Philosophy. Vol. 2, Augustine to Scotus. Burns & Oates, 1962; Gilson, E. The Christian Philosophy of St. Augustine. Random House, 1960; Nash, R. The Light of the Mind. University Press of Kentucky, 1969; idem. The Word of God and the Mind of Man. Zondervan, 1982; Scheutzinger, C. E. The German Controversy on Saint Augustine’s Illumination Theory. Pageant, 1960; Warfield, B. B. Calvin and Augustine. P&R, 1956.

Carl R. Trueman

Image of God

The idea of the image of God both illustrates and tests theological interpretation of Scripture. On the one hand, the near-universal witness of the Christian Church that the distinctiveness of humanity lies in their creation in the image of God is an illustration of how an apparently minor biblical theme can come to have a major role in theological work. On the other hand, the content given to the idea tests whether an account responds adequately to the theological witness of the Scriptures.

On the first point, it is noteworthy that beyond the foundational text in Gen. 1:26–27, and its reprise in Gen. 5:1–3 and 9:6, the phrase never occurs again in the OT. Other indications of the particular place of humanity within God’s plan exist (e.g., Ps. 8), but the particular phrase “image of God” is absent. Why, then, should the Christian theological tradition have fastened onto this phrase, and not another, to describe what makes humanity unique within creation?

The answer seems to be a theological judgment concerning both the centrality of the Gen. 1 text and the appropriateness of the phrase for describing humanity’s place in the world. Although this term is not central in the sense of being regularly repeated within the biblical witness, there has been a consistent sense among Christian exegetes that the place of Gen. 1:26–27 within the canon makes its assertions of prime importance. Hence, this description of what it is to be human is regarded as far more significant than other phrases that occur more often. Equally, this term, with its implication of a particular resemblance to God, has been judged to get to the heart of what it is that distinguishes humanity from the rest of the creation.

On the second point, the meaning of “the image of God” is not at all clear within the Genesis account. That this is what sets humanity apart from the beasts is clear enough, but what (p 319)it might denote is much less obvious. Recent historical-critical study claims that the image is a physical resemblance; clearly, from a theological perspective, this is totally inadequate and indeed unacceptable. The majority Christian tradition of reading the image in terms of rationality or some similar intellectual ability appears to owe more to Greek philosophical anthropology than any biblical or theological tradition. In any case, it has the unacceptable consequence of denying true humanity to those suffering from profound learning difficulties, and indeed from young children, the unborn, and certain persons toward the end of their lives.

An alternative approach, hinted at by Augustine but arguably not fully developed until the work of Karl Barth, sees the creation of humanity in the image of God as interpreted by the following text, which emphasizes the gender differentiation in human life: “male and female he created them.” This can be spelled out in various ways: the family might be seen as the basic instantiation of society or culture, and so the image of God might be seen as the ability to be social or cultural beings, for instance. The most common reading in recent theology, however, has been to see the mention of male and female as pointing to the irreducibly relational nature of human life. On this account, to be made in the image of God is to somehow share in or repeat God's own relational life as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (which, as Luther suggested, might be seen hinted at in the text "Let us make humanity in our own image" [AT]).

A different and profoundly theological approach is suggested by the ways in which the Genesis phrase is taken up in the NT. It is still used in the same way to indicate the specialness of humanity, as in the Letter of James (3:9), but there is also a new emphasis, with Jesus Christ being described several times as "the image of God," or a similar phrase: Col. 1:15; 2 Cor. 4:4; Heb. 1:3; Phil. 2:6. If a canonical approach to Scripture is adopted, so that this identification is permitted to interpret the earlier use of the phrase in Genesis, the possibility of a family of thoroughly theological readings is opened. At least on this reading, we would want to insist that it is the incarnate Son, the Jewish man Jesus Christ, who shows us what it is to be human. This might be glossed by acknowledging the present fallen state of humanity, and suggesting that it is only in seeing Jesus, unfallen and so unwarped, that we can really give any account of what it is to be human.

It is possible to go further than this, however. Jesus might not just be seen as the one example of humanity available to us, but also as the true pattern of humanity—he is not only created in the image of God, but he is himself the image of God, in which we are all created. Given that he comes "late in time," a theological discussion of how this works will depend on discussions of God's eternity or similar concepts, but it is not difficult to construct an adequate account. An analysis of Paul's language of the "two Adams" is sometimes offered to support such a reading, with Christ as the last, or eschatological, Adam, whose life is as decisive for the nature and possibilities of human life as the first, or protological, Adam. Reflection on the "cosmic Christ" language of several NT letters could lend further support and content to such an idea. If Christ is the "firstborn of all creation," through whom, and for whom, and in whom all else is made, then the reality of his own human nature must interpret the humanity that is created in, for, and through him. (If Wisdom's song in Prov. 8 is read christologically, as it generally was at least in the patristic period, then this text also supports such a reading.) The rich possibilities of a theological reading, so different from the more dominant readings within the tradition, are apparent. See also Human Being, Doctrine of

Bibliography

Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Pages 183–206 in Vol. III/1, The Doctrine of Creation, trans. G. W. Bromiley. T&T Clark, 1958; Berkouwer, G. C. Man, trans. D. Jellema. Eerdmans, 1962; Jenson, R. Systematic Theology. Vol. 2. Oxford University Press, 53–72.

Stephen R. Holmes

Imagery

Genuine appreciation of imagery is crucial to the theological interpretation of Scripture. As the Dictionary of Biblical Imagery (DBI) declares, “The Bible is a book that images the truth as well as stating it in abstract propositions” (xiii). The DBI defines “image” as “any word that names a concrete thing ... or an action.... Any object or action that we can picture is an image.” Important terms related to “image” include “symbol,” “an image that stands for something in addition to its literal meaning” (xiv); “metaphor,” “an implied comparison”; “simile,” which “compares one thing to another ... using the formula like or as”; “motif,” a pattern that recurs throughout a piece of literature; and “archetype,” an image (p 320) or pattern that recurs throughout literature and life (see Frye, Anatomy; Frye, Great Code).

Motif

The creation account in Gen. 1 is replete with natural images. But God’s initial image of creation—light—comes about without a natural source, thus drawing special attention to itself. Supernatural light is a recognizable motif throughout the Bible, seen in the pillar of cloud that guides the Israelites in the desert (Exod. 13:21), the light surrounding the divine figures revealed to Ezekiel (1:27; cf. 43:2) and Daniel (10:6; cf. Rev. 1:14–16), the light radiating from Jesus during his transfiguration (Matt. 17:2), and finally, the light of God’s glory that illuminates the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:23). These concrete images of light are distinguished from instances where God is metaphorically described as being or giving light. But the connection between the concrete and the metaphorical is clear (all being manifestations of the broader archetype of light throughout Scripture), and the former gives meaning to the latter. Other important biblical motifs include ordeal by water (e.g., Noah’s ark; the crossing of the Red Sea; Jesus calming the storm and walking on the water) and the honoring of a younger brother over his older brother(s) (e.g., Abel, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Ephraim, David, Solomon; and finally Paul, the last-born of the over five hundred “brothers” to see the resurrected Christ [1 Cor. 15:5–8]).

Simile

The OT contains numerous similes, usually offering comparisons to nature. The Psalms and prophetic books employ simile to describe God and his attributes. The psalmist tells God, “Your righteousness is like the mighty mountains, your justice like the great deep” (36:6); both God’s “jealousy” and his “wrath” are said to “burn like fire” (79:5; 89:46; cf. Jer. 4:4; Nah. 1:6). Hosea frequently uses simile (Petersen and Richards 50–60), often to describe God’s wrath against Israel. God declares, “I will pour out my wrath on them like a flood of water.... I am like a moth to Ephraim, like rot to the people of Judah.... I will be like a lion to Ephraim, like a great lion to Judah” (5:10, 12, 14; cf. 13:7–8). In response to repentance, however, God will be “like the dew to Israel” (14:5; cf. 14:5–8).

The OT often uses simile to describe those blessed or opposed by God. The righteous man of Ps. 1 is “like a tree planted by streams of water” (v. 3), while the wicked are “like chaff that the wind blows away” (v. 4). Rich men who heed not God are “like sheep ... destined for the grave” (49:14). The faithful psalmist, conversely, is “like an olive tree flourishing in the house of God” (52:8). Hosea uses similes to describe the rebellious Israel that God will soon judge. Adulterous Israel will be stripped naked “like a desert” (2:3); the Israelites are “like a stubborn heifer” (4:16). As punishment “they will be like the morning mist, like the early dew that disappears, like chaff swirling from a threshing floor, like smoke escaping through a window” (13:3). These foreboding similes can be contrasted to the lush imagery in the similes of the Song of Songs (Landy), a book seen by many interpreters as a celebration not only of human love, but also of the love between God and his people.

The NT abounds in similes, perhaps the most significant being Jesus’ parables of the kingdom. In these parables, which function as extended similes (but whose literary elements transcend simple categorization; Ryken 139–53), Jesus combines the imagery of nature and society as he proclaims “the kingdom of heaven” to be “like a man who sowed good seed in his field” (Matt. 13:24), “a mustard seed” (13:31), “treasure hidden in a field” (13:44), “a king who prepared a wedding banquet for his son” (22:2), and “ten virgins who took their lamps and went out to meet the bridegroom” (25:1; cf. 13:45, 47; 18:23; 20:1; 25:14; Luke 13:19–21). Elsewhere, Jesus employs simile, often to admonish or confront. He tells his audience they must “become like little children” (Matt. 18:3; cf. 1 Pet. 2:2); he tells the teachers of the law and Pharisees they are “like whitewashed tombs” (Matt. 23:27).

Paul uses simile to describe the rigors of Christian discipleship, employing imagery from contemporary Greco-Roman culture (1 Cor. 4:9; 9:26; Eph. 6:6; 2 Tim. 2:3) and Jewish ceremonial law (Phil. 2:17; 2 Tim. 4:6). The General Epistles use similes of nature to describe humanity's fleetingness (James 1:10; 1 Pet. 1:24), "the man who doubts" (James 1:6), false teachers (2 Pet. 2:12; Jude 10), God (James 1:17), and the devil (1 Pet. 5:8). Revelation is laden with imagery (Farrer), including similes. Multiple similes, generally drawing upon powerful images of nature or splendid images of refined metals or jewels, describe "someone 'like a son of man'" (1:13; 1:14–16), the four living creatures (4:7), the attacking locusts (9:7–10), and the new Jerusalem (21:11, 21). Revelation's imagery demonstrates the richness of language but also its inability to describe fully the still-unseen things of God. Both despite and (p 321) because of its powerful imagery, readers of Revelation—and Scripture as a whole—recognize with Paul that for now they "see but a poor reflection," as "in a mirror" (1 Cor. 13:12 NIV/NRSV). See also Hero Story; Metaphor

Bibliography

Abrams, M. H. A Glossary of Literary Terms. 7th ed. Harcourt Brace, 1999; Alter, R. The Art of Biblical Poetry. Basic Books, 1985; Farrer, A. A Rebirth of Images. Dacre, 1949; Frye, N. Anatomy of Criticism. Princeton University Press, 1957; idem. The Great Code. Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1982; Landy, F. "The Song of Songs." Pages 305–19 in The Literary Guide to the Bible, ed. R. Alter and F. Kermode. Harvard University Press, 1987; Petersen, D., and K. H. Richards. Interpreting Hebrew Poetry. Fortress, 1992; Ryken, L. How to Read the Bible as Literature. Academic, 1984; Ryken, L., and T. Longman III, eds. A Complete Literary Guide to the Bible. Zondervan, 1993; Ryken, L., J. C. Wilhoit, and T. Longman III, eds. Dictionary of Biblical Imagery (DBI). InterVarsity, 1998.

David V. Urban

Imagination

If, as Kevin Vanhoozer noted in the introduction, the theological interpretation of Scripture (and the knowing of God that is its end) is indeed "at once an intellectual, imaginative, and spiritual exercise," then it behooves us to inquire what the particular contributions of imagination might be. Two main reasons render such stock-taking desirable. First, many readers will have only a vague sense of what the words "imagination" and "imaginative" actually connote. Second (and related), many will perhaps have inherited an equally vague sense of disquiet about the imaginative as a disposition, and suspect that they can (and perhaps as good Christian readers of the text even should) get along fine without it. But it is not so. By clarifying some of the vital contributions of human imagination, we will see that "two out of three ain't bad" holds no more water in this context than in trinitarian theology. A reading that is properly “intellectual” and “spiritual” will also necessarily be imaginative, and enhancement of imagination’s distinctive contributions to the process can only enhance its other two dimensions as well.

What is imagination? There is no single or simple answer to this question. One recent study of the subject asks whether we ought not to “say of imagination what Augustine once said of time—we think we know what it is but when asked we realize we don’t” (Kearney). Having stopped and thought about those activities and phenomena that we intuitively associate with the imaginative, attempts to list its key contributions reveal its basic and pervasive influence on much if not most of what, humanly, we do in the world and experience of it. Hence, Kearney’s maxim that “better to appreciate what it means to imagine is ... better to appreciate what it means to be.” Limiting ourselves to a high level of abstraction and a short list, we might venture the following set of contributions explored in the literature.

Imagination

- traces and creates patterns of likeness and dissimilarity between things. (Green; Warnock)
- renders presence in the midst of absence. (Casey; Kearney)
- orders the human world even in its empirical manifestation. (Johnson; Llewelyn)
- facilitates our trespass beyond the empirical or the familiar. (Murdoch; Nussbaum)
- reorders the given and enables us to experience the world differently. (Bachelard; Coleridge)
- permits our apprehension of possible futures. (Bloch; Lynch; Steiner)
- is the source of fantasy, falsehood, and delusion. (Nettle; Sartre)

Close attention to these discrete but related aspects reveals each having something to do with a human capacity to make sense of things by locating them within some wider pattern or order. Warnock concludes that imagination is indeed the name we give to ways of engaging with things (whether real or “imaginary” things, and whether in intellection, feeling, or action) that ascribe to them meaning and value. Clearly, then, we should expect imagination to be central to our attempts to make sense of Scripture.

On the whole—and unfortunately—it has been the negative potential of the imaginative that has been noticed most clearly by Christians. In the modern period this negative spin is perhaps inherited partly from the single-minded reservation of the term “imagination” by the translators of the 1611 King James Version of the Bible for use in referring to evil plotting, evil motivation, inclination against and even resistance to God’s will, when there were other perfectly good English words available for use (as comparison with any modern translation shows). From Gen. 6:5 to the Magnificat, for 350 years English-speaking Christians had “the imagination of their hearts” etched into consciousness in association with that \(p 322\) which displeases God and is a cause for judgment (McIntyre). Little wonder, then, that they treated it at best with suspicion and at worst with disdain. Our point here is not to sanctify imagination in any artificial manner. No doubt sin is something in which imagination is usually complicit in one way or another; but it shares this in common, surely, with the rest of our fallen nature (including the intellect!). And if imagination lies close by the worst products of our humanity, so too its presence and activity must be acknowledged in the very best. This, though, is generally overlooked, as is the fact that God’s drawing of the world to himself in Christ and through the Holy Spirit deliberately appropriates forms and strategies, and calls in turn for responses, of a highly imaginative sort. This is true not least with respect to the central role that the text of Scripture plays in this revelatory and redemptive economy.

In several ways imagination is essential to our efforts as readers to trespass beyond the text itself. Such efforts are vital to our understanding of any text, for unless we are to rest content with the text as a more or less attractively bound stack of paper adorned with ink marks, then we naturally assume that it is intended by someone to refer us beyond itself in some sense. Space here compels us to consider only three examples of how this is so.

1. Even the most thoroughgoing literary formalism, which eschews bids to discover the “actual” author/editor or his intention, cannot escape the need to posit a hypothetical author, to treat the text, that is to say, as the result of an intentional act of human communication. In doing so, we generally do not ignore issues of particular context from which the texts emerged. We seek to attune our sensibilities to the expectations to which they were directed, and this sometimes involves an imaginative bid to become surrogate members of a culture or community remote from our own. Moreover, we are sometimes driven (in order to make sense of a particular text) to posit quite specific personal or social situations, to account for peculiar emphases or modifications of the vulgate. The capacity to translate ourselves out of our own circumstance into that of others in this way is vital to our attempts to understand any text, and it is one way in which imagination facilitates understanding.

2. Imagination also permits us to fathom the human depths of Scripture’s own world; to resonate with or react against the experiences, actions, and motivations of characters in the stories that the text tells; to indwell vicariously the joys and complaints crystallized in the Psalms; and so on. Imagination provokes (and helps us satisfy) that insatiable curiosity about what is other than ourselves (Murdoch), which fuels our interest in the world of the text and draws us into it with transforming effect.

3. Theological interpretation of Scripture cannot skip over the general levels of interpretation just described, but has nonetheless finally to reckon with the distinctive claim that in this book God has spoken and speaks. This clearly requires us as readers to go beyond the words on the page and discern what God might be saying through the appropriation (Wolterstorff) of human texts. Here if anywhere the spiritual and intellectual levels of reading are both manifest. But such discernment, recognizing God's speech within the already complex patterns of human discourse, appropriating such discourse "as" divine discourse, is also a highly imaginative activity (cf. Green on "as" as the "copula of imagination"). So, the sort of careful historical work that attempts to piece together "what actually happened" in the history of Israel or the ministry of Jesus, to which imagination is also central (Collingwood), is far from being the only—let alone the most important—way in which it facilitates our trespass beyond or behind the text of Scripture as Christian readers.

Imagination is clearly also vital to our approach to the text as it confronts us at various levels on the page as a literary phenomenon. Despite the Christian suspicion of imagination alluded to above, the Bible itself is a text that uses, to the full, highly imaginative genres in the service of divine self-revealing. In this regard the "basic character" (McIntyre) of imagination is indicated by the thoroughly imaginative cast of much of Jesus' own teaching, the characteristically parabolic mode that repeatedly subverts his hearers' (and readers') views of the world, themselves, and how things stand with God. But the poetry of Psalms, the vivid images of the aphorisms of Proverbs, the imaginative visions of God's promised future around which prophetic and apocalyptic writings are structured, the carefully composed narratives of the OT and the Gospels—these are all vital rather than incidental elements of the rich symbolic world that Scripture furnishes for our imaginative indwelling, with a view to our personal reorientation and renewal. This is true of individual portions of the biblical text, but also of our insistence as Christian readers upon taking it as a whole that is greater than the sum of those parts. Those patterns of meaningfulness (p 323) to which we appeal in our use of such categories as "canon," "typology," and so forth are ones the recognition of which is a highly skilled imaginative exercise.

As theologians have usually recognized, the radical otherness of God with respect to the world he has created renders any and every appropriation of creaturely forms or categories by God in revealing himself inherently analogical, and therefore directed inevitably toward the inculcation of a response on our part at the level of imagination. It is first and foremost through engagement with the textual medium of Scripture that these forms and categories encounter us. In this sense it may justly be insisted that Christian faith as a gift of the Holy Spirit is a matter of having one's imagination taken captive and reshaped, such that one comes to see and taste and feel the world anew (Green)—as one's experience of it collides with that redescription in the light of God's character and activity that Scripture contains.

Bibliography

Bachelard, G. On Poetic Imagination and Reverie. Spring Pubns., 1971; Bloch, E. The Principle of Hope. Blackwell, 1986; Casey, E. Imagining. Indiana University Press, 1976; Coleridge, S. T. Biographia literaria. J. M. Dent, 1906; Collingwood, R. G. The Idea of History. Oxford University Press, 1948; Green, G. Imagining God. Harper & Row, 1989; Hart, T. "Imagination and Responsible Reading" Imagination and Responsible Reading.. Pages 307-34 in Renewing Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2000; Johnson, M. The Body in the Mind. University of Chicago Press, 1987; Kearney, R. Poetics of Imagining. Edinburgh University Press, 1998; idem. The Wake of Imagination. Routledge, 1988; Llewelyn, J. The Hypocritical Imagination. Routledge, 2000; Lynch, W. Images of Hope. Helicon, 1965; McIntyre, J. Faith, Theology and Imagination. Handsel, 1987; Murdoch, I. Existentialists and Mystics. Penguin, 1997; Nettle, D. The Strong Imagination. Oxford University Press, 2001; Nussbaum, M. "The Literary Imagination in Public Life." New Literary History 22 (1991): 877-910; Sartre, J. P. The Psychology of Imagination. Methuen, 1972; Steiner, G. After Babel. Oxford University Press, 1992; idem. Grammars of Creation. Faber, 2001; Warnock, M. Imagination. Faber, 1976; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Trevor A. Hart

Incarnation

The incarnation claims that during the Roman occupation of Palestine, when King Herod the Great ruled Judea, the God of Israel became a human person. "God the Son," or the "Second Person of the Trinity," became a Jewish artisan: Jesus of Nazareth, who later came to be called Jesus Christ, meaning "anointed Savior."

Biblical Foundations

Two biblical texts in particular support this shocking claim. One is from Paul, and the other is from the Gospel of John. The earlier text is Phil. 2:5-8. Paul is encouraging the young Christians at Philippi to be steadfast, noble, and firm in their commitment to Christ, expressed through love for one another and utter humility and unity of mind in their dealings with one another. He urges them to imitate Christ himself, who, though in the form (morphē) of God, was so humble that he discarded his godliness to become human and even die, mistaken for a common criminal.

The other text that suggests incarnation is the prologue of John's Gospel, 1:1–14, 18. The prologue is set up as a theological interpretation of Gen. 1, giving a rather different account of God's work of creation than presented there. John uses the Greek word Logos (itself meaning "word") to signify the order and meaning with which he created the world. He gives this Logos an independent identity, saying that it was with God, and even was God before or as he created the world. The Word has this divine meaning and order, and it is also the light of "all people" (1:4 NRSV), whether individuals are able to recognize it or not. In v. 14, John articulates one of the most compelling yet disconcerting ideas of all time: "Divine Logos became flesh," a person! "Incarnate" is the transliteration of the Latin incarnatus est (Nicene Creed), which itself is a translation of sarx egeneto (became flesh) of John 1:14, in which the evangelist says that the meaning and order of God became Jesus of Nazareth.

Patristic Formulations

These two passages remain elliptically tantalizing. Much remains unclear. As Christians began praying to Jesus, many both within and without the church asked, "What are they doing?" Worshipping Jesus seemed simply idolatrous. It took two hundred years for the implications of the startling claims raised by the Pauline and Johannine texts to be thoroughly understood, and another 150 years for criticism of them to be clearly answered. Indeed, the incarnation is one of the great mysteries of the faith.

Worshipping Christ raised the question of where to draw the line between God and creature. In the fourth century, a presbyter named Arius (d. 336) objected to considering Christ as God, because anything that is separate from God (as (p 324) suggested by John's identification of divine speech as separate from God) must be a creature, and therefore could not be God, who is eternal and uncreated. The Word of God, Logos, that resides in Jesus had to be categorized as a creature, and so too Jesus. Arius's position was rejected by the Council of Nicea in 325, John's notion of divine speech was considered to be divine (uncreated), and Christ to be "begotten, not made, of one being with the Father," as the later Nicene Creed would put it.

Some years after the Council of Nicea, the words sarkōthenta (became enfleshed) and enanthrōpesanta (became human) appear in the second article of baptismal creeds of the Greek-speaking churches. These creeds are first associated with the historian Eusebius of Caesarea (d. ca. 340) and the catechist Cyril of Jerusalem (d. ca. 387). Their creeds were standardized into what was called the Nicene Creed at the Council of Chalcedon in 451, whose 500–600 bishops attributed it to the work of the 150 bishops gathered at the previous Council of Constantinople in 381. The Creed went by the name Nicene because the bishops of these two councils were upholding and, in their turn, elucidating the faith of the earlier Council of Nicea regarding the divine identity of Christ.

Once the church agreed that Christ was God and that Christians were not worshipping a man, as the Romans worshipped the emperor, the question arose, In what sense then was Christ a human being? In the fifth century, the question was, Is becoming enfleshed the same as becoming human? If it is, being human is reduced to having a body, and this was not appealing because it left out human consciousness. The objection was based on the claim that salvation comes from God's having become human. If being human is limited to having a body, then our personalities, our spirits are not saved, and this seemed to undermine the whole point of the incarnation.

Conflict was not resolved until the majority of bishops agreed that John's teaching meant that God became a complete human being, not simply a human body. The debates ended by accepting a great paradox. It was said that Jesus Christ was a thoroughgoing union of divinity and humanity in which divinity took on but did not overpower the humanity and the humanity did not besmirch the divinity. Christ had not simply human flesh, but also human consciousness; the fullness of God assumed the fullness of humanity—body, mind, and spirit. This was stated officially by the phrase "one person, two natures."

This settled, there remained the question of Gospel passages that attributed human emotions to Jesus while seeming to deny his divinity. These were attributed to the human nature in order to protect the divine nature from involvement in human emotions, because God was above these. On the other hand are passages that indicate Jesus knew the future. These were attributed to the divine nature. In short, everything Jesus did had to be attributed to one nature or the other, because there remained deep anxiety about fully embracing the claim that God became a human being. God and "man" still had to keep apart.

Interpretation

Official teaching on the incarnation underwent little change after the fifth century. Christians continue to confess that Christ is truly human and truly divine, God from God, light from light. Our question is, What is its significance for us? There are at least two points to note.

Jesus reveals God to us in his person, not conceptually. Yet Jesus is no pushover. He had a temper. He could dismiss people rudely, and even spoke to his mother smartly. He spoke in riddles, refused to answer pointed questions, and intentionally hid his meaning from his friends. He made incredibly harsh demands of his followers, and taught love of enemies while denouncing his opponents, according to the Gospel accounts. And this, Christians claim, is God enfleshed.

Now, it is perhaps precisely in seeing the “unlovely” sides of Jesus that we learn how utterly human God actually did become. He became a person with all the weaknesses and temptations that we know so well. Indeed, by becoming a person with all sorts of human weakness, his voluntary death, to save both his followers and the entire nation from a bloodbath, appears the more astounding.

God became a man with all the warts of human nature and offered them all to God by dying that others might live. The final act of his life overwhelms all the irritations others endured from him during his short life. Here is where the meaning of the incarnation is revealed. God became like us in every way, and only because of that does his dying on our behalf cancel out the sins that he has taken as his own. In this, he shows us both our greatest unloveliness and our greatest nobility. In this, he ennobles us beyond our sins.

A second important meaning of the incarnation is that the other face of God’s becoming human is that a man became divine. God has taken human life, with all its warts, and raised it to accompany (p 325) himself. Here is the true foundation of human dignity. In Jesus, God takes us into his own nobility, remaking us in his likeness. Jesus not only reveals the wisdom, goodness, and beauty of God, but also again, by representing all of us, shows us the divinization of human life. Through him, human life is remade in the beauty, wisdom, and goodness of God.

See also Jesus Christ, Doctrine of

Bibliography

Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Vol. III/1, The Doctrine of Creation, trans. G. W. Bromiley. T&T Clark, 1958; Berkouwer, G. C. The Person of Christ. Eerdmans, 1954; Dunn, J. D. G. Christology in the Making. Westminster, 1980; Gregg, R. C., and D. Groh. Early Arianism. Fortress, 1981; Grillmeier, A. Christ in Christian Tradition. John Knox, 1964; Keck, L. “Toward the Renewal of New Testament Christology.” NTS 32 (1986): 362–77; Kelly, J. N. D. Early Christian Creeds. Longman Group, 1972;

Norris, F. “Deification: Consensual and Cogent.” SJT 49, no. 4 (1997): 411–28; Norris, R. Manhood and Christ. Clarendon, 1963; Wesche, K. “ ‘Mind’ and ‘Self’ in the Christology of Saint Gregory the Theologian: Saint Gregory’s Contribution to Christology and Christian Anthropology.” The Greek Orthodox Theological Review 39, no. 1 (1994): 33–61; Williams, R. Arius. Darton, Longman & Todd, 1987; Young, F. From Nicaea to Chalcedon. Fortress, 1983.

Ellen T. Charry

Indeterminacy      See Meaning

Infancy Narratives

Matthew 1–2 and Luke 1–2 (with the chronology in 3:23–38) are at once among the most beloved, ignored, and debated Gospel passages. A treasure-house for the liturgist, they bring the theologian to the edge of mystery, the literary critic to the margins of genre, and the historian to the brink of a headache.

Issues and History of Interpretation

Neither Mark nor John contains infancy accounts, and those of Matthew and Luke differ in outline and detail; it might thus be considered that these four chapters are not strictly necessary. Although other bizarre extracanonical stories (e.g., Pseudo-Matthew, Infancy Gospel of Thomas, and Protevangelium of James) cast their shadow, these prologues retain an honored place in the canon, providing the church with the Magnificat and the Nunc Dimittis.

Classical Commentators. Earliest commentators evince technical, textual, and theological concerns. For example, the speaker of the Magnificat is identified as Elizabeth in both the second-century Irenaeus and in some Old Latin manuscripts. This difference in detail indicates that there was, even at this stage, debate regarding the more appropriate cantor of a song that echoes the aged Hannah—Elizabeth, the natural choice, is passed over for Mary in our Gospels. A more significant controversy revolved around Matthew’s Isa. 7:14 citation, and the meaning(s) of ‘almah—translated parthenos, “virgin,” in the LXX; but as neanis, “young woman,” in other Greek translations. The second-century apologist Justin argues in his Dialogue with Trypho for the faithfulness of the LXX, which seems to inform Matthew. Again, Origen (Cels. 1.28–69) refutes Celsus’s charge that the Matthean account is a fabrication (inspired by Jesus’ own malingering) and that Mary conceived Jesus out of wedlock by the soldier “Panthera.” (Similar illegitimacy stories are found in the writings of the Tannaitic rabbis [see Tertullian, Spect. 30] and in the medieval Jewish Toledoth Yeshu [lit., Generations/Lineage of Jesus].) All these materials, along with John 8:41, reflect ongoing discussion of the irregularity of Jesus' conception.

More frequently the infancy gospels were a source of enrichment for the ancients rather than of contention. For example, John Chrysostom, in introducing the intricacies of the Matthean infancy narrative, exhorts his listeners to “revolve these things” in their minds. “For from taking thought concerning these matters, there springs in the soul some great good, tending unto salvation, ... that all our members may serve him” (Hom. Matt. 2.9). His interpretation of Matt. 1–2 does not shy away from the problems aforementioned, even while he discloses unanticipated mysteries drawn from this “holy vestibule” (Hom. Matt. 2.1), meaning Matthew's prologue. In particular, his treatment of the women in the genealogy shows how the incarnate Son assumed human weakness. So also Jerome and Ambrose: “None of the holy women are taken into the Saviour's genealogy, but rather such as Scripture has condemned, that He who came for sinners being born of sinners might so put away the sins of all” (in Aquinas, Catena aurea 1.19); “Nor ... would it shame the Church to be gathered from among sinners, when the Lord Himself was born of sinners” (1.20). Another favorite vignette of the fathers was the offering of the magi's gifts: “It was knowledge and obedience and love that they offered Him ... as to God” (Chrysostom, Hom. Matt. 8.1); “Gold, as to a King; frankincense, as sacrifice to God; myrrh, as embalming the dead” (Gregory the Great, Hom. in evan. 1.106). “They bring three gifts, i.e. the (p 326)faith in the Holy Trinity. Or, opening the stores of Scripture, they offer its threefold sense, historical, moral and allegorical” (Gloss. Anselm, in Aquinas, Catena aurea 1.77).

The ancient commentators, then, followed Mary, who “kept all these things ... in her heart” (Luke 2:19 KJV). Such is the case also with the greats since that time. For example, Calvin (Commentary on a Harmony of the Evangelists) and John Wesley (Notes on the Whole Bible), unstymied by the obvious textual difficulties, stress their theological and anthropological significance. We may be surprised to discover that these Protestant commentators agree with the ancients regarding the ever-virginity of Mary, and explain Matt. 1:25 so as to deny that Jesus' mother had subsequent children! We are less surprised to read Calvin's and Wesley's meditations on God's initiative in the incarnation and humankind's ideal stance in receiving that gift, as embodied in Mary.

Post-Enlightenment Commentators. A spiritualized approach to the narratives emerged in the nineteenth century with D. F. Strauss, who, among others, salvaged an “inner meaning” of Scriptures from what were supposed to be entirely nonhistorical texts. Strauss enthused:

This is the key to the whole of Christology.... In an individual, a God-man, the properties and functions which the Church ascribes to Christ contradict themselves. In the idea of the race, they perfectly agree. Humanity is the union of the two natures—God become man. (Life, 2:895)

The infancy narratives about Jesus, then, are to be read by the enlightened as a picture for the greatness of humanity.

Scholarship on the infancy narratives has probably never fully recovered from the nineteenth century. Few standard NT introductions tackled the passages until the advent of redaction and literary criticism, when they made a comeback, frequently accompanied by a rationalist distinction between “history” and theological ideas (on this, see Horsley, ch. 1). The recent treatment of Edwin D. Freed (170) closes with the predictable words of J. K. Elliott (17): “For all their apparent historicizing and verisimilitude, the Christmas story provides us with no more real facts about the historical Jesus than Paul himself does.”

Freed should have heeded the masterful work of Raymond Brown, who offered, as an exception to the ongoing dichotomized treatment of the infancy narratives, two editions of his comprehensive The Birth of the Messiah. His work reminds us of many keen scholars who have read these passages, considering the chapters from within the Catholic tradition, while remaining aware of “contemporary” problems (often anticipated in antiquity!). He places the passages in historical, theological, and literary context, and eschews a simplistic division between “fact” and “theology.” Again, he questions the faddish appeal to the “midrash” genre (popularized by Episcopal Bishop John Spong) that now so engages those working on these narratives: the stories cannot be termed “midrash,” Brown explains, because they do not aim to comment upon OT texts; instead, they illuminate the identity of Jesus the Christ by echoing the OT.

The welter of newer approaches to the accounts includes the studies of feminist Jane Schaberg, who breathtakingly musters evidence for Mary giving “illegitimate birth” to Jesus. The social historian Horsley finesses the work of Otto Rank (The Myth of the Birth of the Hero [1909; ET, 1914]) with an eye to sociological analysis, and concludes that “the birth legends of Jesus have sociopolitical implications” (171) and thus a revolutionary connection with history. Regarding Horsley’s attempt to bring the accounts into dialogue with Herod’s “oppressive” legacy, Brown wisely comments, “Modernizing the sociopolitical situation of Jesus’ time is often a hindrance in discerning what the author wished to convey to his first hearers/listeners” (614). Despite the appeal of Schaberg and Horsley for many early-twenty-first-century readers, the thorough and faithful work of Brown remains an unparalleled standard.

Message and Contribution to the Canon

It is probably inadvisable to distill our four chapters into a single “message,” except that of initiating and incarnating God’s care for his people. The infancy narratives introduce many significant matters, including the connection of the OT with the NT, the virginal conception (implied in Matt. 1:18–23; stated in Luke 1:34), the provision of Mary as a model of piety and faith, the human growth of Jesus to maturity, and the exquisite artistry of the Gospel writers. Both Gospel writers aptly suit their prologues to the contents that follow. Matthew forges an explicit pattern of “fulfillment” through the genealogy, OT citation, and narrative patterns. Luke, through atmosphere, echo, and structure, subtly impresses upon his readers the climax and turn of the ages in Jesus the Christ. Luke’s deft use of the diptych (the intertwined stories of the infants John and Jesus) has been noted by many; Matthew’s use of citation (p 327) is less well understood, since some moderns have dismissed it as proof-texting, without an intimate knowledge of the evangelist’s perspective. Readers need to give careful attention to Matthew’s role in the nascent conflict with emerging Judaism and to Luke’s irenic emphasis.

It is frequently remarked that the infancy narratives present a late stage in the NT understanding of Jesus’ divinity—first fixed at the resurrection, then at the baptism, and finally, at the moment of conception. We could add that although the virginal conception might simply have been a “sign” of God’s special activity, we may not be in a position to apprehend what was a “necessary” correlative for the genesis of the Second Adam. Brown admits that the quest for the progressive understanding of Christology remains speculative, but sees no conflict between a commitment to the creed and the possibility that the apostolic community “only gradually and in retrospect ... work[ed] out the christological implications for earlier parts of Jesus’ life” (711). However we approach such schemes, Brown provides a model for the faithful reader who refuses to bracket questions of genre and history.

Those concerned about the details of the narratives continue to deliberate over their differences (cf. Freed’s chart, 57–59), their parallel to pagan birth narratives (e.g., Suetonius re Augustus, Aug.

94.3), the phenomenon of the “star” (supernova? comet? planetary conjunction?), the details of Quirinius’s reign and the census, the problem of Jesus’ “brothers and sisters,” and the status of the “magi” (e.g., Freed 96–100). This latter was a point of discussion among the ancients and has come full circle in the wake of the contemporary “new age” movement. Such quests are not to be despised but to be placed in a larger context, as the student forges a perspective that is at once historical, theological, and literary. The faithful reader will recognize the unique literary flavor of each narrative and approach the relationship between event and text with regard for genre. To be sure, the nativity stories differ from the rest of the Gospels, providing us with poignant stories that are masterfully shaped so as to recall key figures and highly symbolic OT passages. They are not, however, created from whole cloth, and they continue to bear upon historical research.

In the end, we will not want to be so concerned with minutiae that we miss the impact of the stories. Gregory Thaumaturgus recalls God’s wondrous actions, unveiled to the eye of the child or the seasoned scholar:

She wrapped in swaddling-clothes Him who is covered with light as with a garment.... She laid in a manger Him who sits above the cherubim, and is praised by myriads of angels.... In the board from which cattle eat was laid the heavenly Bread, in order that He might provide participation in spiritual sustenance for men who live like the beasts of the earth. Nor was there even room for Him in the inn. He found no place, who by His word established heaven and earth; “for though He was rich, for our sakes He became poor.” (The First Homily on the Annunciation to the Holy Virgin Mary 34–37; in ANF, vol. 6)

Bibliography

Brown, R. The Birth of the Messiah. Doubleday, 1993; Caird, G. B. The Gospel of Saint Luke. Penguin, 1963; Davies, W. D., and D. Allison. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to Saint Matthew. 3 vols. ICC. T&T Clark, 1988; Elliott, J. Questioning Christian Origins. SCM, 1982; Fitzmyer, J. The Gospel according to Luke. Vol. 1. AB 28. Doubleday, 1981; Freed, E. The Stories of Jesus’ Birth. Sheffield Academic Press, 2001; Horsley, R. The Liberation of Christmas. Crossroad, 1989; Marshall, I. H. The Gospel of Luke. Eerdmans, 1978; Schaberg, J. The Illegitimacy of Jesus. Harper & Row, 1987; Spong, J. Born of a Woman. Harper, 1992; Strauss, D. F. The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, trans. M. Evans. 2 vols. C. Blanchard, 1860.

Edith M. Humphrey

Inner-Biblical Interpretation     See Intertextuality

Intention/Intentional Fallacy

Debates about the intentional fallacy date from the mid-twentieth century. Nevertheless, the notion of authorial intention crops up throughout the history of biblical interpretation and has bearing on a number of crucial hermeneutical issues, including the nature of the text, the meaning of meaning, and the aims and norms of reading.

Literary Criticism

In 1946, William Wimsatt and Monroe Beardsley coauthored “The Intentional Fallacy,” a manifesto for “New Critics,” who believed that an exaggerated concern with the psychology of the poet (e.g., motives and purposes for writing) leads one to overlook the formal features of the literary work itself, thus substituting biography for criticism. The “fallacy” of intentionalism is therefore to mistake a historical inquiry about authors for a properly interpretative study of texts. In late-twentieth-century biblical studies, much the same charge was leveled against historical critics by exegetes who focused on the Bible’s (p 328) textual properties (its poetic, literary, narrative, and rhetorical features).

E. D. Hirsch led the “intentionalist backlash.” His Validity in Interpretation (1967) defended “the sensible view that a text means what its author meant.” Hirsch argued that the author’s intention—the willed verbal meaning—is the only practical interpretative norm, the only scholarly standard for judging right and wrong interpretations. It is the author’s will alone that determines which of the possible verbal meanings a sentence (e.g., “He’s hot”) or text actually bears.

Hirsch built upon Edmund Husserl’s phenomenology, holding that intentionality is the essential characteristic of consciousness, which is always consciousness of something. To intend, therefore, is to direct one’s consciousness in a particular way (e.g., believing, hoping) toward a particular mental content (e.g., a thought, a hope). Understanding is an intentional act directed at an intentional object (e.g., meaning); meaning is what understanding grasps or is about.

Poststructuralists present a new challenge to intentionalism. They argue that the author’s will is not “outside” language, directing it this way and that, but is itself subject to language, forced to speak and think in terms of distinctions and relations instituted by diverse language systems. So Paul, the apostle of freedom, continues to think in terms of master/slave even as he asks Philemon to treat Onesimus as a brother in Christ. Language precedes subjectivity and intentions; hence, the so-called death of the author.

Biblical Studies and Theology

For the church fathers, theology was largely a matter of biblical interpretation, and ascertaining the author's intention was often cited as one mark of right interpretation. Athanasius wrote: "Now it is right and necessary here, as in all divine Scripture, faithfully to expound the time which the Apostle wrote, and the person, and the point; lest the reader ... be wide of the true sense" (C. Ar. 1.54). At the same time, biblical passages should be interpreted in light of the entire "scope of Scripture," by its overall message handily summarized in the Rule of Faith.

In Augustine's opinion, it is ultimately more important to arrive at truth than at the intention of the human author. However, "anyone who understands in the Scriptures something other than that intended by them is deceived" (Doctr. chr. 1.36.41). Such a person may reach the right destination, but on the other hand, the person may begin to prefer one's own way. Augustine concludes that such a person "is to be corrected and shown that it is more useful not to leave the road."

Although Thomas Aquinas identified the literal sense of Scripture with the meaning intended by the author, he also held that the ultimate author of Scripture is God (ST I.1.10). This is arguably the major point of contrast between medieval and modern interpreters. Biblical scholars after the Enlightenment tend to restrict authorial intention to what the human authors, situated in particular cultural and historical contexts, could have meant. Biblical criticism has contributed much to our stock of knowledge, though it has also resulted in an inability to read the Bible as animated by a divine intention.

The Reformers stand between the medieval and modern periods, concerned with reading for the inspired Word of God yet also concerned to do justice to the grammar and historical context of the text. In the preface to his Commentary on Romans, Calvin declared, "It is the first business of an interpreter to let his author say what he does say, instead of attributing to him what we think he ought to say." Calvin was precritical in his insistence that the human authors were divinely inspired. In his interpretation of Ps. 87, he refers to the historical and spiritual intentions interchangeably: "We must consider the intention of the prophet, or rather the object of the Spirit of God, speaking by the mouth of the prophet."

Partly in response to the theological impoverishment of modern biblical criticism and partly influenced by the New Critical reproach of historical criticism, late-twentieth-century interpreters developed an interest in the intent of the text itself. Narrative critics sought the world "of" or "in front of" the text (the self-contained textual world mediated to the reader), not the world "behind" it (the world of the historical author). It is doubtful, however, whether much sense can be made out of textual intent because texts, lacking consciousness, cannot have intentions. Brevard Childs worked an interesting variation on this theme by proposing “canonical intent” as the object of exegetical interest. Those responsible for assembling and transmitting Scripture inscribed their intent into and onto the final form of the canonical texts. It is not the narrative but the properly canonical shape that renders the authoritative subject matter of Scripture. However, to the extent that canonical intent refers not to the final form of the text but to the intentions of the canonizers, one may ask why their intentions, rather than those of the original authors (p 329) or even later interpreters, enjoy pride of place. In response, Childs suggests that what is theological about canonical intention is the subject matter (not the divine authorial intention) to which the final form of the biblical text directs us.

Yet another contemporary approach stresses the aims of the interpretative community. The aim of believers who read Scripture in the church differs from scholars who study the Bible in the academy. Believers read Scripture with the aim of knowing God and of being transformed in order to live and worship faithfully before God; for this end, reading for the intention of the human author is neither necessary nor sufficient (Fowl). The church’s interest in edification and doxology overrides its interest in authorial intention.

Intentional Action

Recent philosophy of action has breathed new life into the concept of authorial intent; it has also clarified what is right and what is wrong about the “intentional fallacy.” According to Wittgenstein, John Searle, and other analytic philosophers, intention is not a private mental event but an indispensable and public aspect of all human action. Only intention, for example, makes a blink count as a wink, the wave of a hand count as a greeting—something more than mere bodily movements or physiological events. Similarly, only intention makes marks in the sand count as a line from a Shakespeare play rather than random patterns caused by the waves. When confronted with apparently meaningful human behavior or intelligible signs, we cannot help but attribute intentionality (Gibbs).

A text is a set of verbal signs intended by an author to bring about understanding in a reader. Intention pertains to what authors are doing in tending to their words. To interpret is to describe what an author is doing in a particular sentence or passage by paying attention both to its formal features (e.g., the words, the structure) and to its broader context, to the text as a whole (e.g., the literary genre). The relevant context is the one that allows one to offer a sufficient description of the author’s action, a description that admits of no more relevant questions. Note that what an author does with words may occasionally have little to do with the meaning of the words themselves. We ascribe ironic intentions to authors, for example, not because the verbal meaning demands it but because other relevant contextual clues tip us off as to what the author is really doing. Irony could not exist apart from authorial intention. To generalize: every appeal to the text as evidence for one's interpretation turns out to be a tacit appeal to the author's probable intent (Juhl).

Knowing what an author planned or tried or wanted to say is not the same as knowing what an author has actually done. For the intentionalist, meaning is a matter of intentional action, not planning. Again, intention is not a psychological event that precedes an action but an intrinsic aspect of the action that in fact makes the action what it is. A string of words counts as a promise, for example, because a speaker uses the appropriate linguistic conventions (e.g., "I promise") intentionally to make a promise.

Is authorial intent boon or bane to the project of theological interpretation of Scripture? A focus on authorial intent would seem to run counter to the kind of spiritual interpretation of Scripture that Augustine and others felt was necessary for the edification of the church. How, for example, could one read the OT as pointing to Christ if the human authors did not consciously have Christ as the content of their message? Yet some ascription of intentionality to biblical texts appears inevitable, for someone is doing something with these words. To understand textual meaning, then, is just to impute intentions; the only question is whose, author's or reader's?

Divine Authorial Intention

Acknowledging Scripture as the word of God does not militate against intentionality but calls for and qualifies it. Specifically, it calls for recognition of dual authorship where the divine intention appropriates, superintends, or supervenes on the human intention. God speaks in Scripture by way of human discourse, but not by outshouting the human authors. God identifies his word with just these texts because they already communicate a good number of his intentions. We may legitimately presume that the divine intention corresponds to the human intention unless there is good reason—given the nature of God or the broader canonical context—to think otherwise. Recognizing Scripture's divine authorship ultimately requires us to read the biblical texts as one book. As with any action, we can adequately identify what has been done in Scripture only by considering its action as a whole. The divine intention most comes to light when God's communicative acts are described in canonical context.

What interpreters believe about God affects what they take God's intention to be: "Interpretation of a person's discourse occurs, and can only occur, in the context of knowledge of that (p 330)person" (Wolterstorff 239). Does this represent a "divine intentionalist fallacy," where biographical criticism (of God!) intrudes on interpretation? It does not. For we know the Word who is God primarily by attending to God's word written. Luther observed that all books are to be interpreted in the spirit of their author, and that an author's spirit is nowhere more on display than in his or her writings. In the case of Scripture, the divine author's spirit is the Holy Spirit; the word is the enactment of the Spirit's communicative intention. To read theologically is to ascertain the intention of the Spirit speaking in and through Scripture.

Conclusion

Whose intentions guide interpretation? To interpret Scripture theologically is to read for the divine intention, and this means reading each part in light of the canonical whole. The canonical context alone forms the proper context for describing what God is doing in his word and for understanding the purpose for which God's word was sent (Isa. 55:11). To limit oneself to recovering only the human authorial intentions is to fall short of theological interpretation. And to impose one's own intentions or the intentions of one's community is to fail to guard oneself from potential idols.

The final word belongs to Jerome: "It was my purpose not to draw the Scriptures to my will but to say what I understood to be the intention of the Scriptures. For it is the duty of the commentator to set forth not what he himself wants but what the one whom he interprets means. Otherwise, if he says contrary things, he will not be so much interpreter as opponent of him whom he attempts to explain" (Letters XLVIII.17).

See also Authorial Discourse Interpretation; Canonical Approach; Formalism; Meaning

Bibliography

Childs, B. Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture. Fortress, 1979; Fowl, S. "The Role of Authorial Intention in the Theological Interpretation of Scripture." Pages 71–87 in Between Two Horizons, ed. J. Green and M. Turner. Eerdmans, 2000; Gibbs, R., Jr. Intentions in the Experience of Meaning. Cambridge University Press, 1999; Gracia, J. How Can We Know What God Means? Palgrave, 2001; Hirsch, E. D. Validity in Interpretation. Yale University Press, 1967; Iseminger, G., ed. Intention and Interpretation. Temple University Press, 1992; Juhl, P. D. Interpretation. Princeton University Press, 1980; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text?

Zondervan, 1998; Wimsatt, W. K., with M. Beardsley. The Verbal Icon. University Press of Kentucky, 1954; Wimsatt, W. K., and M. Beardsley. "The Intentional Fallacy." Sewanee Review 54 (1946): 468–88. In Wimsatt, Verbal Icon; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Kevin J. Vanhoozer

Interlocutionary Act      See Speech-Act Theory

Interpretation, History of

The history of biblical interpretation can refer to a present act of historical research, in which writers from the history of the precritical tradition are examined for content as they engage the biblical texts. This we might call first-order history of biblical interpretation, and it is a basic description of what is said. On the other hand, the phrase "the history of biblical interpretation" can mean the study of modern-period writings about the church's tradition for their hermeneutical and interpretative strategies. We might call this second-order history of biblical interpretation. Modern historical-critical research on the Bible has deemed both these first- and second-order tasks as irrelevant in the search for knowledge of the biblical world, defined in terms of the historical world into which the Bible fits. The first task, while deemed "historical" in its research methods, is itself dismissed as useless for historical-critical research on the Bible. The second task is dismissed, because studying "precritical" hermeneutics is deemed useless for modern historical research—but only useful for contemporary interpretation. That is, both the first task and second task, while historical in their own right, can indeed offer the contemporary church forgotten insights and methods of reading Scripture. Both tasks also call on the interpreter to acknowledge and value the interconnectedness of the canon and the overall narrative that it recounts in its very task. Within the theological disciplines, this then can provide for a contemporary return to recapture riches from the history of biblical interpretation.

From their very beginning the Scriptures have been subject to interpretation. Indeed, interpreting them is a command: " 'Son of Man, ... eat this scroll; then go and speak to the house of Israel.' So I opened my mouth, and he gave me the scroll to eat.... So I ate it, and it tasted as sweet as honey in my mouth" (Ezek. 3:1–3). Indeed, the Scriptures themselves are interpretations of events and communication both human and divine. We think here of both narrational recounting of events and prophetic declarations that interpret Israel's (p 331) action in light of its covenant relationship with its God. We can also see this reinterpretation of the OT within its own pages, for example, in the Psalms' recasting of creation and redemption. And the two covenants in their turn interpret each other, for example, in the NT figural rereading of the OT manna story, which casts Jesus as the Bread of Life (Exodus; Num. 11; John 6). We also see this in the proof-texting of the OT in the NT, such as the Matthean formula quotations "This happened in order to fulfill ..." "The Old Testament lies within the New, and the New shines forth from the Old" (Jerome). This reliance of the OT on the NT and the NT on the OT raises the question of canon in the history of biblical interpretation. In both the first-order task of the history of interpretation and its second-order task, the canon is seen to be one, not two, much less documents, much less documents J, E, D, P, Mark, Matthew, Luke, Q, and John. The unity of the canon is assumed, not proved.

Until the last twenty years or so, the debate about the interpretation of Scripture has been centered around how the Antiochene school differed from the Alexandrian school of interpretation. It was once thought that the Antiochenes were more "literal" in their interpretation and the Alexandrians more "allegorical." In addition, these terms themselves were not clearly defined. For the most part, this schema has been set aside. Recently a new thesis has emerged, moving in a much different direction (Young), proposing that in the patristic era the Bible was read for the formation of the Christian culture and people, both individual and collective. This makes Alexandria and Antioch appear much closer to each other than previously assumed.

Recent studies of biblical interpretation have tended instead to focus on the cultural worlds and communities represented by the exegetical works. This includes considering the collection and transmission of the scriptural texts, and examining both social conflict and communal formation arising from the reading of these writings. However, from the earliest times interpretation of the Scriptures became a tool of theological argumentation and formation of the understanding of the "literal sense," or plain sense, its authoritative meaning. An example of this is Justin's Dialogue with Trypho, where Scripture's "literal sense" funds the argument, the assumption being that both the speaker and his opponent each understand themselves to be reading according to the literal sense, the authoritative sense, which would ground arguments based on Scripture. While clearly the history of biblical interpretation of the first order is for the main an investigation of precritical material within a critical scholarship, we can learn more about what exactly precritical might mean by engaging in this task and following their example. A corollary of this is the supposed great hermeneutical divide of the modern period between what the text meant and what it means. For modern interpretation, what the text meant is a question of systematics or even phenomenology. For the history of biblical interpretation, though, both the first- and second-order tasks, the question of what the text meant and what it means, are not two separate matters, with the second prioritized over the first. Again, we can learn from the history of biblical interpretation the wholeness of reading Scripture over against a modern dissection of text and meanings.

Christian history is always written to and for a specific community. This is true also of biblical interpretation of the first order in particular, but potentially for the second order as well. While we are coming to see that Christian history may differ in method and conclusions from its secular companions, likewise we find that biblical interpretation of both the first and second orders will not have the same categories, premises, and goals as secular, modern interpretation. The most important observation to make is that the first order and even second order will not necessarily have the goal of “objectivity,” but of transformation of lives. For the purpose of first-order and potentially second-order history of interpretation is laying Christ bare within the straw of the manger, which is the Bible (so Luther).

See also Literal Sense

Bibliography

Bobertz, C., and D. Brakke. Reading in Christian Communion. University of Notre Dame, 2002; Margerie, B. de. Introduction à l'histoire de l'exégèse. 4 vols. Cerf, 1980–90; ET, An Introduction to the History of Exegesis. 3 vols. St. Bede's Pubns., 1994; McKim, D. Historical Handbook of Major Biblical Interpreters. InterVarsity, 1998; Old, H. The Reading and Preaching of the Scriptures in the Worship of the Christian Church. 4 vols. Eerdmans, 2002; Young, F. Biblical Interpretation and the Formation of Christian Culture. Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Kathryn Greene-McCreight

Interpretation in the Church    See Catholic Biblical Interpretation; Church, Doctrine of the; Liturgy; Mysticism, Christian; Orthodox Biblical Interpretation; Protestant Biblical Interpretation; Spirituality\(p 332\)/Spiritual Formation; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary; Virtue

Intertestamental Period    See Jewish Context of the NT

Intertextuality

In Matthew's account of the crucifixion, all but the women watching from a distance make their assessment of Jesus; everyone close to the scene has something to say. The Roman soldiers post a sign over his head that reads, THIS IS JESUS, THE KING OF THE JEWS. Those passing by also mock him, repeating his words about the temple's destruction. The chief priests, scribes, and elders join in, "He saved others, ... but he cannot save himself." After three hours of darkness and narrative silence, Jesus finally speaks, quoting the words of another righteous sufferer: " 'Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani?' —which means, 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' " (Matt. 27:37–46). While Jesus' famous use of Ps. 22 has generated much commentary, it should be remembered that every utterance in this scene makes use of words previously spoken in other contexts. Readers who attend to all these citations and their original contexts find that Jesus' cry of abandonment stands as a profound answer to the mockery. Moreover, three aspects of this use of quoted speech touch on matters that interpreters now place under the umbrella term "intertextuality" (inner-biblical exegesis, literary theory, and biblical theology).

Inner-Biblical Exegesis

First, Jesus' quotation of the psalm voiced his anguish by means of scriptural words. Some have suggested that the citation of the lament psalm also proclaims confidence that God will deliver those who trust in him. "For he has not despised or disdained the suffering of the afflicted one; he has not hidden his face from him but has listened to his cry for help" (Ps. 22:24). The cry of dereliction is shorthand for the movement of the whole psalm from a wail of lament to a shout of victory (Perelmuter 14).

Although the church has always studied and expounded the NT's citation of the Scriptures of Israel, a group of recent interpreters has turned its attention to inner-biblical exegesis, the way that OT texts relate to other Scripture texts as a midrash (from Hebrew darash, "to seek") or commentary (treditio) on already existing texts (traditum). Instead of looking at the influence of earlier sources on those that come after, the focus shifts to how later generations interpret and comment on the literary tradition. So Prov. 2–7 can be seen as a commentary or sermon on Deut. 6:7–9 and 11:19 (Buchanan 1–20), and Lev. 25:3–7 as explanatory gloss on Exod. 23:10–11a (Fishbane, Garments, 9). In this view, later rabbinic intertextual readings of midrash continue and extend a process that began in the formation of the OT itself (Boyarin). Fishbane (Biblical) distinguishes scribal, legal, haggadic (nonlegal ethical), and mantological (prophetic) modes of exegesis. Others, such as Mason, speak of gloss (e.g., contemporizing additions to Amos 2:4–11), arrangement (e.g., 1 Sam. 8–10 juxtaposes positive and negative views of monarchy), directed quotation (e.g., Dan. 9:1–2, 20–27 interprets Jeremiah’s prophecy), and theological themes (e.g., David’s preparations for constructing the temple in Chronicles resemble Moses and the tabernacle).

While Fishbane did not include the NT in his study, some interpreters find signs of inner-biblical exegesis, for example, in Paul’s use of Jer. 9:22–23 to critique “boasting” in 1 Cor. 1:26, 29 (O’Day). Others argue that Christian writers used techniques similar to the covenanters at Qumran, who also believed that their community was the fulfillment of God’s promises to Israel. These techniques include typology (Rom. 5:14), allegory (Gal. 4:24; Deut. 25:4), catchword links (“reckon” in Rom. 4; cf. Gen. 15:6; Ps. 32:1–2), quoting from variant texts, altering the quoted text, reading the text in an unorthodox manner (Gal. 3:16 uses singular “offspring”), use of haggadic interpretations of texts (Moses received the law on Sinai from angels), and traditional forms of homiletic argumentation (Jesus answered the lawyer’s question, “Who is my neighbor?” by citing texts from the Law and Prophets and illustrating with a story; Moyse 128–31). Some read the Gospels for clusters of Greek words that also appear in the Septuagint (Stegner); others for larger narrative patterns, such as the Elijah/Elisha cycle (Roth) or OT traditions of temple and kingship (Swartley). Arguing that NT texts were composed according to the literary conventions of the day, still others would speak of imitation of OT, intertestamental, and even classical models (McDonald), and adapting citations to speak to new situations (Stanley). In sum, while such approaches rely on historical reconstructions of the Bible’s history of composition and run the risk of subjectivity in identifying precursors, they remind the contemporary interpreter that biblical writers were also interpreters of traditional texts.

(p 333)Theories of Language and Literature*

Second, the mockers make sarcastic use of Jesus’ words about the temple, misquoting his claim that “not one stone here will be left on another” (Matt. 24:2; cf. 26:60). This verbal recycling points to the dialogical nature of speech acts, that in some sense all the words we speak are a response to a situation or even the answer to the words of another. Based on this insight, another stream of approaches starts with the nature of language itself, incorporating literary theories of intertextuality. The movement may be traced back to T. S. Eliot’s insistence that no writer or artist works in isolation from the “dead poets” that have gone before, and Harold Bloom’s suggestion that an “anxiety of influence” moves writers to misread those predecessors in order to create something new. Julia Kristeva used Mikhail Bakhtin’s dialogical view of language to speak of a text as a “mosaic of quotations,” each text the “absorption and transformation of another.” Although she is credited with coining the term “intertextuality,” Kristeva eventually rejected it as too narrow to describe the intersubjectivity of human discourse. She and other theorists expanded the notion of “text” to encompass all potential interrelationships—historical, cultural, and social—not only written artifacts (see Fewell 11–20; Tanner 1–47).

For many biblical interpreters who use these theories, the network of potential connections is endless, yet exegetical practice requires that some limits on investigation be set. Therefore, questions about the ideology that motivates the interpreter’s choice of limits must be raised. Moreover, because the dialogical approach holds that something more can always be said, interpretation is in some way incomplete, and meaning is tentative and decentered. While the very nature of this approach may seem to undercut biblical authority, intertextual study need not presume the “loss of an authoritative Center.” Divine authorship does not rule out the possibility for hearing multiple voices in biblical interpretation (Phillips 244), and interrelation with other texts need not rule out authorial intention.

As a “sympathetic critic,” Richard Hays uses a form of inner-biblical exegesis to show how Paul reinterprets biblical traditions in the light of God’s new work of joining Jews and Gentiles into a community centered in Jesus Christ. Building on that approach, he also uses Hollander’s literary theory of poetic echo to distinguish intentional allusion from echoes that do not depend on intention. Such a distinction is difficult because we do not know the minds of the readers Paul addressed; therefore, Hays speaks of the “allusion” of obvious intertextual references, and the “echo” of subtler ones (29). Echoes of Scripture call the reader to evoke aspects of the original context of the textual echo that are not quoted, yet within the echo chamber of a new context as well. Thus, Paul interprets Hosea’s “my people” in 2:25 (ET, 2:23) as directed to Gentile Christians, a sign that God indeed has fulfilled his promises to Israel by calling out a people in Christ (Rom. 9:25–26; Hays 66–68). As with studies in inner-biblical exegesis, Hays’s approach points to a radical newness in relation to existing texts, a newness that continues and does not supersede the earlier work.

Rhetoric and Biblical Theology

Third, Matthew shows that the mockers also cite the same psalm that Jesus did. The scornful words of the religious leaders recall those of the mockers in Ps. 22:6–8, “He trusts in the LORD; let the LORD rescue him. Let him deliver him, since he delights in him” (v. 8; Matt. 27:41–43). Matthew does not say whether the mockers were aware or unaware that they were recalling ancient words of another. But by assembling these citations, the writer leads readers to identify the religious leaders of Jesus’ day with the mockers in the psalm, an identification they would never have embraced. Believing they are on the Lord’s side, their own words put them in the place of those who oppose the Lord (cf. Ps. 2). Spoken to bolster their claims of victory, the mockery ironically highlights their defeat. Moreover, Matthew sends readers back to the psalm and the whole Psalter to see that their mockery actually states the truth. Jesus is the King of Israel, he is the Son of God, and most importantly, he will be delivered—all the ends of the earth will hear and worship (Ps. 22:22–31).

In sum, by reporting the words of Jesus and his enemies, Matthew uses the earlier words of Ps. 22 to demonstrate the significance and richness of the scene, and also to show that this story of a crucified teacher is not divorced from the way Israelites understood their own story. As Childs puts it, the radically new is stated in terms of the old (93). Therefore, intertextual study also reveals Matthew’s rhetorical purpose, to persuade readers that Jesus is not only a trusting Israelite whom God delivered and vindicated, but also Messiah, Son of God and King of Israel. More than a tracing of possible sources and influences, an intertextual approach illuminates the way (p 334)writers use earlier texts to enrich meaning and establish authoritative testimony. It helps readers identify and understand the biblical writer’s rhetorical strategies.

Finally, if the study of intertextuality offers any promise, it encourages work toward a biblical theology that relates the two Testaments without smoothing over the distinctives of either. It was the juxtaposition of the NT beside the OT that brought about a new reading of Israel’s Scriptures, not a modification of the text (Childs 75–79). The older paradigms of promise-fulfillment and salvation history are enriched by the recognition that biblical writers stood in dialectical relationship with their own written tradition. Simply put, interpreters will not only look for what is old in the new; they will also see how the new sheds new light on the old. Moving beyond older evolutionary assumptions that what comes last is best, the approach can break down some of the compartmentalization into theologies of the OT and NT. One can understand the desire to maintain strict boundaries, based as they are in reaction to Christian tendencies to read the OT through “Romans-colored glasses” and leave the witness of the OT writers muted. Yet this distinction is also one of many factors behind the neglect of the OT in the teaching and preaching of the church.

In the best of recent intertextual studies, the two Testaments are seen not as discontinuous, but as part of a story with recurring themes and patterns, facilitating a “more synthetic presentation” (Martens 101). Such a presentation of the whole biblical canon can only encourage greater use of the OT in the church’s teaching and proclamation, “to show how the word made flesh is in accordance with the Scriptures” (Seitz 6), and how God addresses the church in God’s word to Israel (Achte-meier). Matthew’s claim that the God of Israel is at work in Christ and the church is a matter that must be proclaimed and to which hearers may be persuaded, either to believe what they did not believe before or to believe it more firmly and fervently. So also, the study of biblical intertextuality can and should carry over into Christian preaching and teaching, for it is here that congregations are introduced to the “stereophonic witness” (Martens) of the Christian Scriptures.

See also Jewish Exegesis; Relationship between the Testaments

Bibliography

Achte-meier, E. “The Canon as the Voice of the Living God.” Pages 119–30 in Reclaiming the Bible for the Church, ed. C. Braaten and R. Jenson. Eerdmans, 1995; Boyarin, D. Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash. Indiana University Press, 1990; Buchanan, J. Introduction to Intertextuality. E. Mellen, 1994; Childs, B. Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments. Fortress, 1992; Fewell, D. “Introduction: Writing, Reading and Relating.” Pages 11–20 in Reading between Texts, ed. D. Fewell. Westminster John Knox, 1992; Fishbane, M. Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel. Oxford University Press, 1985; idem. “Inner-Biblical Exegesis: Types and Strategies of Interpretation in Ancient Israel.” Pages 3–18 in The Garments of Torah. Indiana University Press, 1989; Hays, R. Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul. Yale University Press, 1989; MacDonald, D., ed. Mimesis and Intertextuality in Antiquity and Christianity. Trinity, 2001; Martens, E. “Reaching for a Biblical Theology of the Whole Bible.” Pages 83–101 in Reclaiming the Old Testament, ed. G. Zerbe. CMBC, 2001; Mason, R. “Inner-Biblical Exegesis.” Pages 12–14 in A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, ed. R. Coggins and J. Houlden. SCM/Trinity, 1990; Moyise, S. The Old Testament in the New. Continuum, 2001; O’Day, G. “Jeremiah 9:22 and 1 Corinthians 1:26–31: A Study in Intertextuality.” JBL 109 (1990): 259–67; Perelmuter, H. Siblings. Paulist, 1989; Phillips, E. “Serpent Intertexts: Tantalizing Twists in the Tales.” BBR 10 10 ((20002000): ): 233233—4545; ; RothRoth, , WW. . Hebrew GospelHebrew Gospel. . MeyerMeyer--StoneStone, 1988; Seitz, C. Word without End. Eerdmans, 1998; Stanley, C. Paul and the Language of Scripture. SNTSMS 74. Cambridge University Press, 1992; Stegner, W. Narrative Theology in Early Jewish Christianity. Westminster John Knox, 1989; Swartley, W. Israel's Scripture Traditions and the Synoptic Gospels. Hendrickson, 1994; Tanner, B. The Book of Psalms through the Lens of Intertextuality. Studies in Biblical Literature 26. Peter Lang, 2001.

Paul E. Koptak

Intratextuality      See Narrative Theology; Yale School

Irenaeus      See Patristic Biblical Interpretation; Rule of Faith; Scripture, Unity of

Irony

The Bible contains two major kinds of irony, verbal and dramatic.

Verbal Irony

Verbal Irony Occurs When a Statement's Intended Meaning Differs Significantly from Its Ostensible Meaning. Wayne Booth notes that ironic statements “cannot be understood without rejecting what they seem to say” (1). Such statements, however, are not always easily recognized. A sinister irony accompanies Cain’s response to God’s inquiry concerning Abel’s whereabouts: “Am I my brother’s keeper?” (Gen. 4:9). This (p 335) question is doubly ironic. Cain’s intended verbal irony—likely playing upon Abel’s role as a keeper of flocks—presupposes the answer “no.” But Cain’s words also reveal his “ironic failure to perceive his true relationship to his brother” (Good 85).

Verbal Irony Often Produces a Humorous Effect. Abraham recognizes the irony of Ephron’s apparent generosity when he offers to give Abraham a burial plot free of charge; the result is that Abraham politely dismisses such pretense and pays a ridiculously high sum for Ephron’s field (Gen. 23:8–15). Humorous irony is also evident amid situations as horrific as the Israelites’ revelry before the golden calf. The narrator reports that Aaron fashioned the calf “with a tool” (Exod. 32:4), but when he explains the matter to Moses, he tells him that the people “gave me the gold, and I threw it into the fire, and out came this calf!” (32:24). A more self-conscious example of irony is Elijah’s sarcastic taunting of the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18:27).

In Job, Several Speakers Employ Verbal Irony, with Increasing Rhetorical Effectiveness. Irony is evident in Bildad’s and Zophar’s rhetorical questions regarding the justice of God and Job’s inability to understand it (8:3; 11:7). Job’s exasperated response displays a more aggressive, biting irony: “Doubtless you are the people, and wisdom will die with you!” (12:2). God himself, however, displays the most powerful irony. He follows a series of questions to Job—all ironic because no one but the Lord could possibly answer them—with this supremely sarcastic declaration: “Surely you know, for you were already born!” (38:21). God then continues his questions, even asking Job if he is able to domesticate and communicate with the fierce leviathan (41:1–5). The power of God’s irony here lies in his “treating an obvious impossibility as a possibility” (“Humor,” 410).

Verbal Irony Is Also Evident in the NT. Consider Jesus’ statement to the Syrophenician woman who begs him to deliver her demon-possessed daughter: “First let the children eat all they want, ... for it is not right to take the children’s bread and toss it to their dogs” (Mark 7:27). The woman’s recognition of Jesus’ irony exhibits great faith, and Jesus grants her request. John’s Gospel contains plentiful examples of intentionally ironic questions by Jesus and unintentionally ironic questions by others (Duke 63–94). Paul’s irony is evident when he taunts the arrogant Corinthians (1 Cor. 4:8, 10), and throughout Galatians (Nanos), which contains his hyperbolic denunciation of his circumcising opponents, whom he wishes “would go the whole way and emasculate themselves!” (5:12).

Dramatic Irony

Dramatic Irony Results from the Audience Sharing with the Author Knowledge Unavailable to One or More Characters. One example is Jacob’s indignant address toward Laban after the latter unsuccessfully searches Jacob’s fleeing caravan for Laban’s stolen household gods (Gen. 31:36–37). Angered by Laban’s accusation, Jacob considers his household vindicated when Laban finds nothing. Unknown to either character, but known to the audience, is that Rachel has indeed stolen and successfully hidden the gods (31:19, 33–35). Dramatic irony is central to Joseph’s narrative, particularly his interaction with his brothers in Egypt. The audience knows what his brothers only learn later: their attempt to reduce Joseph by selling him into slavery has actually served to fulfill his boyhood dreams that they would bow before him (Gen. 37; 42:6–9).

In the Ehud narrative, the left-handed Ehud’s sword, strapped to his right thigh, escapes detection by King Eglon’s guards. The audience, however, is well aware of the “secret message” Ehud says he has for Eglon (Judg. 3:19). Ehud plunges the sword into the fat king’s belly, and the ensuing phrase can be translated “the offal in his belly came out” (3:22). This translation emphasizes the narrative’s irony, for after the escaping Ehud locks the doors of the upper room, Eglon’s waiting servants—who had obeyed the king’s order to leave him alone with Ehud—speculate that the doors are locked because Eglon “must be relieving himself” (3:24).

Irony also surrounds Haman’s downfall in Esther. Thinking King Xerxes means to honor him, Haman unwittingly advises Xerxes to honor Mordecai—even though Haman had come to the king to persuade him to hang Mordecai on a gallows he had built (6:3–11). After being humiliated by Xerxes’ honoring of Mordecai, Haman is punished for his treachery by being hung on his own gallows.

Dramatic Irony Is Prominent in the Gospels. Gilbert Bilezikian calls Mark “a drama of mistaken identity” (122). He asserts, “The dramatic irony that permeates the very structure of the Gospel finds its highest expression in the ethnarchs’ resolve to destroy Jesus in order to shatter his messianic pretensions, which, when carried out, in fact accomplishes his messianic destiny.” Dramatic irony in John is also prominent (p 336)(Culpepper 165–80; Duke), exemplified by the narrative of the man born blind (9:1–41) and Jesus’ trial (18:26–19:16; 19:19–22; Duke 117–37). Duke observes, “The man born blind ... sees with increasing clarity; the ones who claim sight plunge into progressively thickening night” (118). In a sense, Jesus’ entire ministry is fundamentally ironic, for although God’s Son, he comes to serve and be sacrificed for humanity (Matt. 20:28); and he bids his followers to humble themselves so that they might be exalted (Luke 14:11; 18:14; cf. Matt. 20:27).

Authorial Intent and Theological Significance

Although characters are often oblivious to the irony in which they participate, the biblical authors consistently present their irony intentionally, thereby displaying the larger intentions of the God who sovereignly orders every narrative. Such sovereignty is equally evident in rare cases where readers suspect they see ironic happenings the human author may have been unaware of.

Bibliography

Bilezikian, G. The Liberated Gospel. Baker, 1977; Booth, W. A Rhetoric of Irony. University of Chicago Press, 1974; Culpepper, R. A. Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel. Fortress, 1983; Duke, P. Irony in the Fourth Gospel. John Knox, 1985; Gabel, J. B., C. B. Wheeler, and A. D. York. The Bible as Literature. 4th ed. Oxford University Press, 2000; Good, E. M. Irony in the Old Testament. 2d ed. Almond, 1981; “Humor.” DBI, 407–11; Muecke, D. C. Irony and the Ironic. Critical Idiom 13. Methuen, 1970; Nanos, M. The Irony of Galatians. Fortress, 2002; Ryken, L., and T. Longman III, eds. A Complete Literary Guide to the Bible. Zondervan, 1993; Sternberg, M. The Poetics of Biblical Interpretation. Indiana University Press, 1985.

David V. Urban

Isaiah, Book of

The book of Isaiah has had a profound effect on Judaism and the Christian church. The prophet Isaiah is often viewed as the most significant of ancient Israel's prophets. Furthermore, due to its well-known messianic prophecies, Isaiah has been known as the "Fifth Gospel" since early in the Christian era (Sawyer 1). Nevertheless, for more than a century, its theological legacy has been obscured by historical-critical claims that, in addition to the eighth-century prophet, two or more major authors or prophetic circles as well as numerous editors and glossators over a period of nearly half a millennium contributed to the book. They supposedly produced a diverse and diffuse anthology with a prophetic voice that, theologically, makes "an uncertain sound." In recent decades, however, a renewed focus on the book's unity has led to a greater appreciation of its major themes and literary motifs.

History of Interpretation

Isaiah's significance was immediately recognized, becoming the prophetic book most frequently quoted in the NT and cited in the Mishnah, as well as the most copied prophetic book among the Dead Sea Scrolls. Sirach 48:17–25 recounts the events of Hezekiah's reign, just as Isa. 36–39 does. Sirach describes the prophet Isaiah as "great and faithful in vision" (v. 22 AT) and as the one who "by the spirit of might ... saw the last things and comforted those who mourned in Zion" (vv. 23–24 AT; likely referring to Isa. 61:2–3). The existence of the first-century CE pseudepigraphical book The Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah also attests to Isaiah's import. The Talmudic tractate Baba Batra (15a) claims, "Hezekiah and his colleagues wrote Isaiah."

The LXX translator(s) tended to "personalize" the text, turning third-person references into first- and second-person statements, and to create a "preached text" by turning statements into commands. Jewish nationalism was asserted, contrary to the Hebrew text's "generosity toward the nations" (Baer 278–79). The targum affirmed the messianic understanding of Isa. 9; 11; and 52:13–53:12 (as well as 10:27; 16:1, 5; 28:5; 43:10), but not of 7:14. The targum describes the Messiah not simply as an eschatological figure but as "something of an eternal figure," for there is a "tendency to move from anticipation to actuality in respect of God's action" with regard to Messiah. Israel's "saving response to God is seen as already under way" (Chilton xviii–xix).

Origen (185–254) authored the first known commentary on Isaiah, but it remained incomplete. Early full commentaries were written by Eusebius of Caesarea, Jerome, and Cyril of Alexandria. The importance of the book for the fathers was due primarily to its messianic prophecies, and their interpretation basically followed that of the NT. Patristic commentators emphasized Israel's rejection of the Messiah and consequent judgment, although a remnant would be saved, as well as God's blessing on the nations. They used Israel's legalistic blindness as a warning to Christians to beware of idolatry (McKinion xxi). According to Jerome, Isaiah "should be called an evangelist rather than a prophet, because he describes all the mysteries of Christ and the church so clearly that one would think he is composing (p 337) a history of what already happened rather than prophesying what is to come" (McKinion 3). A sampling of patristic interpretation illustrates their christological and ecclesiological emphases: Isaiah 2:1–6 refers to the law being first given to the apostles and then delivered to all peoples by them (Theodoret of Cyr). The seven women of 4:1 are the seven churches (Victorinus of Petovium). The branch of 4:2–4 is Jesus (Bede). The angelic cry "holy, holy, holy" displays the Trinity (Jerome). The desolation of the land announced in 6:11 refers to that carried out by the Romans (Eusebius of Caesarea). The animal harmony described in 11:6 depicts the makeup of the church (Chrysostom). And 35:6 refers to the healing ministry of Jesus.

Nine complete commentaries remain from the medieval period. Two medieval interpreters, in particular, helped pave the way for later modernist approaches. Andrew of St. Victor gave exceptional attention to historical concerns, writing a prologue to Isaiah in which he described the prophet's life and character. Unlike his contemporaries, he interacted with both Jerome and the rabbis, citing without refutation the rabbinic interpretation of 7:14 as referring to Isaiah's son, even though affirming the messianic interpretation. In the case of 53:3, however, he accepted the Jewish interpretation that this refers to the Jews in the Babylonian captivity or to the prophet (Smalley 162–65). Another medieval interpreter, Abraham Ibn Ezra, is credited with being the first extant commentator (in 1155) to attribute the second part of the book to an anonymous prophet in Babylon on the eve of the Persian conquest. In this claim, Ibn Ezra by more than six centuries anticipated the similar conclusion of two German scholars, Döderlein and Eichhorn.

Various scholars built on the insights of late-eighteenth-century German scholars. Isaiah 40–66 was viewed as distinctive in three major respects: (1) It addresses a different audience than 1–39, exiles in Babylon anticipating an imminent return to Zion, even naming the Persian ruler Cyrus. (2) It contains different theological emphases, focusing on God as Creator of Israel and sovereign over the nations and on God's servant as the bringer of salvation, rather than on God's exaltation through judgment and through the reign of the messianic king. (3) It has a more flowing and lofty poetic style, making extensive use of repetition and rhetorical questions. This culminated in Bernhard Duhm's influential commentary of 1892, distinguishing three primary authors: one preexilic, associated with chapters 1–39; one late exilic, associated with 40–55; and one postexilic, associated with 56–66. These authors eventually became known as First Isaiah, Second Isaiah, and Third Isaiah. However, these three major sections were hardly to be viewed as unified compositions. According to Duhm, for example, chapters 13–23 were edited in the second half of the second century BCE, 24–27 was composed around 128 BCE, 34–35 stemmed from the Maccabean period, 36–39 were added from 1–2 Kings, and four “Servant Songs” that neither Second nor Third Isaiah had authored were inserted into chapters 40–55. From Duhm onward, more than half a dozen authorial and editorial hands were seen as involved in the production of the final canonical book, with only a few hundred verses being ascribed to the eighth-century prophet.

This “search for the historical Isaiah” essentially eliminated any possibility of a unified theological reading. For nearly a century, those rejecting authorial unity ceased to write on the entire book, commenting instead on critically distinguished subsections thereof. Nor did they give much attention to developing plausible explanations for how all of the diverse writings ultimately came to be included in one prophetic scroll. The focus rather was on discerning those texts that, for various reasons, could not have originated with the eighth-century prophet. The prophet ceased to be viewed as a divine spokesperson who received a revelation of God's plan for his covenantal people, both present and future, which he, in turn, communicated to them with passion, persuasion, and poetry with the words “thus says the LORD.”

In the late 1970s a new phase of Isaianic studies began, as scholars began to investigate various unifying elements. For the most part they focused on phenomena within the text that generations of conservative scholars had pointed out in support of Isaianic authorship. These scholars variously attributed the observed unity (Schmitt 117–27) to a connecting hinge (Ackroyd), canonical relationships (Childs), thematic patterns (Clements), cultic prophetic activity (Eaton), symbolic structures (Lack), prophetic schools (Mowinckel), unitary editing (Rendtorff and Steck), or editorial insertions and stylistic imitation (Williamson). In addition, a number of “assured results” of Isaianic studies since Duhm have been questioned, including the late dating of much of 13–23, the apocalyptic label for 24–27, the Deuteronomistic origin of 36–39, the distinctiveness of the Servant Songs, and the existence of Third

Isaiah (Schultz, (p 338)“How Many ‘Isaiahs,’ ” 154). The application of newer rhetorical-literary approaches (such as those of Conrad, Gitay, Melugin, Muilenburg, Polan, and Quinn-Miscall) has also contributed to more holistic readings. Conrad focuses on “repetition in vocabulary, motif, theme, narrative sequence, and rhetorical devices” that creates cohesion (30), while Quinn-Miscall reads Isaiah “as a single work, a vision expressed in poetic language,” emphasizing imagery, “the picture displayed by Isaiah” (Quinn-Miscall 169). As a result, the dominant focus has once again shifted to the unity of Isaiah rather than on its many authors and editors. However, now the emphasis is not on the one prophet Isaiah, as was the predominant view up until the nineteenth century, but on the one book Isaiah.

Hearing the Message of Isaiah

The current focus on the common themes, motifs, and verbal parallels throughout Isaiah, leading to a new focus on the unity of the book, allows one to once again hear the message that has been largely drowned out by more than a century of historical-critical debate. Such a unified reading is not dependent on one’s ability to identify the particular “prophetic voice” that is speaking in a given passage (contra Goldingay 2–5); rather, one must trace the development of prophetic thought in the course of the book. One such approach is to follow a macrostructural model for understanding the message. William J. Dumbrell (107) divides the book into eight sections that alternate between history and eschatology, with the first and final sections containing both elements. W. H. Brownlee, C. A. Evans, and A. Gileadi view the book as following a symmetrical, or “bifid,” structure (Evans), dividing Isa. 1–33 and 34–66 up into seven corresponding sections. David Dorsey expounds the book following an ABCDC’B’A’ chiastic structure (234). Although each of these proposals reflects recurrent thematic emphases, it is difficult to distinguish clearly between history and eschatology within blocks of prophetic texts or to assume that a competent reader can discern and adequately evaluate elaborate structural patterns. Therefore, in unfolding the message, it is preferable to proceed through the book sequentially, synthesizing section-by-section how major themes are developed through the repetition of key words, images, and motifs, intertextual links, and narrative analogies.

Barry Webb notes four indicators of formal and thematic unity within the book (“Zion,” 67–72): the title in 1:1, the emphasis on the heavens and the earth at the beginning and end of the book, the role of the Hezekiah narrative in 36–39 within the overall structure, and the focus on Zion/Jerusalem throughout. Each of these indicators will be discussed in our journey. Isaiah 1:1 claims all that follows not simply includes but is “the vision concerning Judah and Jerusalem that Isaiah son of Amoz saw during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah,” a prophetic ministry spanning more than half a century. The reference to a succession of Davidic kings fully roots the book in the events that unfolded in eighth-century Israel, while the use of the term “vision” (khazon) indicates that the prophecy results from divine revelation rather than from human insight. The visionary role of the eighth-century prophet is noted in 1:1; 2:1; and 13:1; no new prophetic figure is explicitly introduced in Isa. 40 or 56 to give legitimacy to the presence of a Second or Third Isaiah.

Chapter 1 offers an introductory indictment of Judah and Jerusalem, announcing both the ongoing beating of God’s rebellious child and the future purging of the morally polluted city.

However, a second title introduces a vision not of contemporary Jerusalem but of Jerusalem’s future exalted temple mount to which all nations will stream (2:1–4), indicating that the scope of Isaiah’s vision extends from the prophet’s day to the “last days.” The prophet implores the house of Jacob to “walk in the light of the LORD” now, just as all nations will do then. Numerous parallels between the initial chapters (1:1–2:4) and the final chapters (63–66, see Tomasino) form an inclusio (bookends) around the main body: the (present or new) “heavens and earth,” the future glorification of Zion, and the reference to God’s people as rebels (pasha’, 1:2; 66:24). The central section of chapters 1–5 (within an apparent ABCB’A’ structure) describes God’s judgment against all “the proud and lofty” men and women, humbling them so that the LORD alone will be exalted (2:6–4:1; cf. 2:11–12, 17). The coming devastation is contrasted with the future glory of Mt. Zion (4:2–6//2:1–5), before the section ends with a second indictment against Judah and Jerusalem (5:1–30//1:2–31), this time portrayed not as a rebellious child or harlot but as an unfruitful vineyard.

In Isa. 6, against the backdrop of the end of the half-century reign of Uzziah, Isaiah encounters the LORD of Hosts as the exalted King who sends him to his estranged people, although the prophetic proclamation will result in hardening and judgment rather than repentance and salvation. (p 339) Isaiah 7–8 presents the first of three tests within the first half of the book.

King	Object of Trust	Outcome	Text
Test 1: Ahaz	Assyria	Failure	Isa. 7–11
Test 2: Unnamed	Egypt	Unclear	Isa. 28–33

Test 3: Hezekiah      God                      Success                      Isa. 36–39

In each test, the Davidic king is tempted to trust in foreign alliances rather than in Yahweh's covenantal election of Zion. (The second and third passages are tied to the first by numerous intertextual and thematic links, cf. 7:9 + 28:16; 8:7–8 + 28:17–29; 8:14 + 28:16; 8:15 + 28:13; also 37:1; 7:3 + 36:2; 7:4 + 37:6; 7:11, 14 + 37:30; 38:7, 22.) The prophet's trust (8:17) is in sharp contrast to Ahaz's doubt (7:11–13). In the face of the present Davidic king's failure, Isa. 9–11 announces God's future intervention in history (note the inclusio formed by 5:3 and 8:22, bracketing Isa. 6–8). This is to happen both in judging Assyria (10:24–27) and in the coming of a future Davidic ruler who will not falter (Isa. 9; 11). A hymn caps all this off, celebrating the future victory (Isa. 12, a partial reprise of the Song of the Sea in Exod. 15).

The so-called “oracles concerning the foreign nations” section (Isa. 13–23) affirms God's sovereignty over both the neighboring states (14:28–17:14) and the great powers (chs. 18–21). Accordingly, God's people are neither to fear them nor to trust them. Although these chapters frequently have been ascribed to a much later date, Hayes and Irvine offer a convincing interpretation of them against the backdrop of eighth-century political developments (17–33). In the introductory subsection, Babylon is addressed (13:1–14:23) and is already a major player in Isaiah's day (see 39:1, 5–7). Serving as “a fitting symbol of that arrogant pomp and power of the world,” the fall of the king of Babylon is described in hyperbolic poetic terms, anticipating “the eventual fall of the whole world system which stands in opposition to God” (Webb 81). But Zion is equally prominent: the next two subsections begin by affirming Zion's security (14:32; 18:7) and conclude by describing an assault on Zion (17:12–14; 22:1–14; Jenkins 239).

Isaiah 24–27 usually is labeled as “late apocalyptic” and therefore often ignored in tracing Isaiah's message. However, most of its major motifs and emphases can be found in nonapocalyptic prophetic texts, and key apocalyptic elements are lacking in these chapters (e.g., symbolic visions, schematization of history, angelic interpreter). Furthermore, this section displays thematic continuity with Isa. 13–23 in its depiction of a world judgment expressing divine wrath against human pride and national presumption (Isa. 24). Expressions of praise are also prominent: 24:14–16a; 25:1–5, 9–12; 26:1–19. Intertextual links with earlier chapters are striking (25:4 → 4:6; 26:1 → 12:2; 26:15 → 9:3; 27:2–5 → 5:1–7). This section also develops major themes from the preceding chapters: the humbling of the proud and lofty (25:10–12; 26:5–6), rebellion (24:20), faith (26:2–4), and Zion's future (24:23; 25:6–8; 27:13).

The focus is on two unidentified cities: the ruined city (qiryat-tohu, 24:10) that opposes God, and the strong city ('ir 'az, 26:1) that trusts him (cf. 24:10, 12; 25:2 [2x], 3; 26:1, 5; 27:10), thus evoking divine visitation (paqad: 24:21–22; 26:14, 16, 21; 27:1, 3). Isaiah 24–27 lacks datable historical allusions, portraying more generally than chapters 13–23 how the fate of the nations ultimately will be determined when God triumphs over his enemies (chs. 24–25) on behalf of his people (chs. 26–27). At the heart of this section is a banquet for all peoples on Mt. Zion, culminating in the cessation of death (25:6–8; on the latter, see also 26:19–27:1).

Isaiah 28–33 is parallel in structure to Isa. 7–11, and contains a series of woe oracles (28:1; 29:1–15; 30:1; 31:1; 33:1) in which the rulers of Judah are once again challenged to trust Yahweh (i.e., Test #2, // chs. 7–8). In the course of these chapters, the specific situation becomes clearer. Rather than trusting in the assurances linked to the divine election of Zion (28:16), they are “obstinate children ... who go down to Egypt without consulting me; who look for help to Pharaoh’s protection, to Egypt’s shade for refuge” (30:1–2) against “Assyria[, who] will fall by a sword that is not of man” (31:8). Just as in Isa. 7–8, the description of failed human leadership in Zion is juxtaposed with the announcement of a coming ruler who will reign in righteousness and justice (chs. 32–33//9–11; esp. 32:1 and 33:17, but also 33:22, which recalls 6:5). The quietness and trust that was lacking in Isaiah’s day will then be experienced forever (cf. 30:15 and 32:17), and the dulled senses will be sharpened (29:9–10, 18; 32:3–4).

Isaiah 34–35 has been variously described as a little apocalypse (Duhm), as poems dislocated from Second Isaiah (McKenzie), as postexilic additions forming a redactional bridge between First and Second Isaiah (Steck), and as the original (p 340) conclusion of First Isaiah (Clements). However, proceeding from the previously mentioned suggestion that Isaiah has a two-part structure—perhaps supported by the DSS manuscript 1QIsaa, which leaves three blank lines between Isa. 1–33 and 34–66—these chapters are best viewed as introducing the great reversal within the book: the theological transition from judgment to salvation. Seitz (Isaiah 1–39, 242) understands Isa. 34–35 as portraying the promise of the ultimate victory of Zion along with the defeat of the representative opponent of God (Edom in ch. 34, similar to the role of Babylon within 13–23 and Moab [25:10–11] within 24–27). The following chapters, 36–38, then offer a concrete historical example of this victory, with Assyria as the foe. Within the structure of Isaiah, these chapters function analogically in announcing eschatological promise and praise: 1–11 + 12; 13–23 + 24–27; 28–33 + 34–35. Chapters 34–35 are in stark thematic contrast. In 34 the garden becomes a desert; in 35 the desert becomes a garden (see the verbal parallels: vengeance, 34:8 + 35:4; streams, 34:9 + 35:6; haunts of jackals, 34:13 + 35:7; abode [khatsir], 34:13 + 35:7; will not pass through/journey on it [ 'abar], 34:10 + 35:8). In its introductory function, Isa. 34 anticipates the day of divine vengeance (v. 8), which will be described more fully in the final section (59:17; 61:2; 63:4). More significantly, Isa. 35 introduces numerous images and motifs of salvation and restoration that are prominent in Isa. 40–55 (according to one calculation, nearly 90 percent of the words in the chapter recur in the latter).

Since Duhm, it has been commonplace to assume that Isa. 36–39 has been inserted into the book from 2 Kings when Second Isaiah was added to First Isaiah. However, Seitz has argued that these chapters are more at home within the Isaianic tradition (Zion's Destiny, 193–94), especially in its development of God's sovereign control over history (37:26), the giving of a sign to the Davidic king (37:30), and the promise of a remnant from Zion (37:32). Taken together, these chapters serve two functions: (1) They present the third historical test, which King Hezekiah passes. (2) They facilitate the historical transition from Assyrian to Babylonian domination as insolent Sennacherib's doom is both predicted and described (37:21–38) and the prophet makes the first announcement of the Babylonian conquest of Jerusalem (39:5–7). Chapters 38 and 39 are nonchronological in order, both taking place during the Assyrian siege of Jerusalem, which is probably the event underlying the initial description of “the Daughter of Zion, ... left like a shelter in a vineyard, like a hut in a field of melons, like a city under siege” (1:8). Chapter 38 describes Hezekiah's exemplary trust in God in a time of personal crisis, being rewarded with personal and national deliverance (38:5–6). Then chapter 39 describes his prideful failure in a time of personal recognition, being rebuked by the prophet who announces Jerusalem's coming destruction. These chapters form the climax toward which the entire first half of the book has been heading: the ultimate showdown between Yahweh and Assyria as Yahweh intervenes on behalf of Zion.

However, as a result of the announcement of Jerusalem's ultimate destruction, the question of Zion's future is necessarily raised. Following the transitional sections of Isa. 34–35 and 36–39, the remainder consists of three sections of nine chapters each. The first two end in a refrain-like warning: “There is no peace ... for the wicked” (48:22; 57:21); the third ends with a graphic description of the ultimate end of the rebels (66:24). The book describes Zion's future restoration in three movements: (1) God's people will first be restored to the land through his anointed political deliverer, Cyrus (chs. 40–48). (2) Israel will be restored to God through the spiritual deliverer, the Suffering Servant (Isa. 49–57). (3) Then once again Zion will be glorified by Yahweh and the nations (Isa. 58–66).

Isaiah 40–48 begins with words of comfort to God’s people. Following Sennacherib’s western campaign ending in 701, the people of the northern kingdom (Israel) and many of the southern kingdom (Judah) were already in exile. (According to Sennacherib’s Annals, he conquered 46 strong cities and countless small villages, leading 200,150 people into captivity.) Thus, reassuring words regarding restoration would have been in order already in Isaiah’s day. Isaiah 40 offers the thematic introduction: your incomparable God returns! Paralleling Isa. 6, the prophet receives a fresh commission to announce the new thing about to happen: the coming “salvation.” All but one of the major themes are addressed in Isa. 40: the powerful prophetic word, which transforms everything; the unrivaled sovereignty of the Creator God; the futility of idols and the gods they represent; the divine preparation and execution of the return (second exodus); and Jerusalem’s comfort. The LORD’s servant, the final theme, is developed in the following chapters. In Isa. 41, Yahweh’s sovereignty is demonstrated in the calling of Cyrus (still unnamed) from the east, subduing kings before him (41:2). In Isa. 42 the true (p 341) Servant of God is introduced and is contrasted by juxtaposition with Cyrus, whose violent ways (41:2, 25) he will not follow (42:2–3). Both Cyrus and God’s Servant are called in righteousness (41:2; 42:6), called by name (45:4; 49:1), grasped by the hand (45:1; 42:6), and will accomplish Yahweh’s will (44:28; 53:10, both using khepets). This servant is also contrasted with the chosen nation, which is blind and unresponsive (42:18–20), in need of redemption (chs. 43–44; cf. 43:1, 14; 44:6, 22–24). In 44:24–45:25, Cyrus is explicitly named and his work is described: he will bring about the destruction of Babylon (chs. 46–47). However, the focus remains on Yahweh rather than on Cyrus: he is the God who has carried and will continue to carry his people—in sharp contrast to the Babylonian gods, which must be carried in carts (46:1–4, each verse using some form of nasa’). The anticipatory call for the exiles to “leave Babylon” can already be sounded, for “the LORD has redeemed his servant Jacob” (48:20).

In Isa. 49–57, the coming spiritual deliverance through God’s Servant is announced. Three passages describing the Servant’s election, opposition, and vicarious suffering and exaltation (49:1–13; 50:4–11; 52:13–53:12) alternate with three extended passages describing Zion’s current condition, coming comfort, and glorious future (49:14–50:3; 51:1–52:12; ch. 54). The servant has a twofold mission: to restore Israel, being made a “covenant for the people” (the means of reestablishing their relationship with God); and to “bring my salvation to the ends of the earth” as a “light for the Gentiles” (49:6, 8–9; cf. 42:6–7). The events of Isa. 53 bring about a remarkable shift. In Isa. 54–66, the word “servant” (‘ebed) occurs only in the plural (11 times): “The work of the individual suffering servant restores the national servant so that individuals within Israel once again can serve God” (Schultz, “Servant, Slave,” 1195). The section concludes by offering the free gift of salvation to “all you who are thirsty” (55:1), while also setting forth its demands (chs. 56–57; cf. 55:6–8). However, the new exodus in its fullness will be postponed due to the “failure of Jacob-Israel to fulfil its role” (R. Watts, New Exodus, 58–59).

The final section of the book is framed by an indictment of the rebels among the people (pasha’, 58:1; 66:24)—not all of them will choose to become God’s servants. However, the primary focus is on the glorification of God and Zion (kabod, 58:8; 59:19; 60:1–2, 13; 61:6; 62:2; 66:11–12, 18–19, a word that does not occur once in Isa. 49–57; cf. also “splendor,” pa’ar, 60:7, 9, 13, 19, 21; 61:3, 10; 62:3). In response to God’s accusations, the people confess their rebellion (59:12–13; cf. v. 20), and the Divine Warrior, in turn, zealously avenges them (59:15b–19; 63:1–6). His actions frame the description of the resultant blessings: foreigners will help to rebuild and glorify Zion (ch. 60), the mourners will be comforted and made participants in an eternal covenant (61:1–3, 8–9), and God’s estranged bride will be restored (62:4–5). The climactic summary announces: “They will be called The Holy People, The Redeemed of the LORD; and you will be called Sought After, The City No Longer Deserted” (62:12). The praise and petition of the prophet (63:7–64:12) evoke the divine promise of judgment against the obstinate people and the creation of a new heaven and new earth, in which a restored Jerusalem rejoices in unmitigated material blessing and peace and an intimate relationship with God (65:17–25). People from all nations will come and see God’s glory and worship him (66:18–23), but the rebels will be subjected to unending punishment (66:24).

A close analysis of Isaiah as a whole reveals a carefully edited composition. Each section has its own distinctive structure and emphases; numerous intertextual links serve to connect various sections. Repeated words and images indicate the centrality of Zion and faith, and of judgment followed by salvation. The book develops along a redemptive-historical trajectory, beginning with a portrait of Zion in Isaiah’s day as it weathers several political-military crises. Then it moves ahead through the Babylonian exile and restoration under Cyrus to the renewal and glorification of Zion in the context of the new heavens and the new earth.

Isaiah and the Canon

As do most Israelite prophetic books, Isaiah draws frequently on historical traditions: creation (40:26; 42:5; 45:7, 12, 18; 57:16), the flood (24:18; 54:9), Sodom and Gomorrah (1:9–10; 3:9; 13:19), Abraham (29:22; 41:8; 51:1–2; 63:16), the exodus and wilderness rebellions (11:16; 43:14–21; 48:20–21; 51:9–10; 52:11–12; 55:12–13; 63:9–13), Joshua and the judges (1:26; specifically Gideon: 9:4 and 10:26; 28:21), David (28:21; 29:1; 37:35; 38:5; 55:3), and the post-Solomonic split into two kingdoms (7:17). More important are the covenantal foundations of Isaiah's portrayals of rupture and transformation:

1. Creation/Noahic: 24:5–6; 51:3; 54:9–10
2. Patriarchal: 10:22; 41:8–10; 48:19; 49:18–21; 54:1–3; 61:7, 9; 65:9 (p 342)
3. Sinai: 2:3; 4:2–6; 5:18–30; 42:24–25; 56:1–8
4. Davidic: 9:6–7; 11:1–5, 10; 16:5; 32:1; 55:3
5. New: 32:15–20; 33:24; 51:4–7; 61:8

The book's central passage, Isa. 36–39, appears in nearly identical form in 2 Kings 18:13–20:19 (although Hezekiah's written prayer following his illness is without parallel; Isa. 38:9–20). Second Chronicles 32:1–26, 31 summarizes these events much more briefly, offering an intriguing interpretation involving a divine test of "all that was in [Hezekiah's] heart" (v. 31). His heart reflected initial pride and ingratitude, which provoked divine wrath, as well as self-humbling, delaying the consequences of divine wrath (vv. 25–26). There are also similarities between 2 Kings 16:5 and Isa. 7:1. Second Chronicles 26:22 and 32:32 claim that Isaiah wrote accounts of Uzziah's and Hezekiah's reigns.

The verbal and thematic parallels between Isaiah and other prophets, such as with Micah (esp. Mic. 4:1–3//Isa. 2:2–4) or Jeremiah, have often been recognized (Schultz, Search for Quotation, 34–42, 290–329), indicating that Isaiah both influenced and was influenced by his prophetic colleagues.

More profound and pervasive, however, is Isaiah's influence on NT writers. According to J. Watts (111; see Sawyer 26–28), 194 NT passages contain allusions to verses from 54 of Isaiah's 66 chapters. Citations are especially frequent in Matthew, Luke/Acts, Romans, Hebrews, and Revelation, with Isa. 6:9–10; 40:3; and 56:7 being quoted three times each. If one analyzes the explicit NT quotations of Isaiah, one can identify four main categories: (1) messianic prophecies, distinguishing (a) texts fulfilled by Jesus (apologetically useful examples of fulfilled prophecy: 9:1–2; 11:10; 42:1–3, 4; 49:6; 53:1, 4, 7–8, 9; 61:1–2) and (b) texts applied (or transferred) to Jesus (54:13; 55:3; 56:7; 62:11); (2) eschatological texts (referring to salvation history and the “last things”: 25:8; 27:9; 45:23; 49:8, 18; 59:20–21; 65:1–2); (3) texts applied to the Christian life or used to teach doctrine (22:13; 40:6–8, 13; 45:21; 52:7, 11, 15; 53:12; 59:7–8; 64:4; 66:1–2); and (4) texts pointing to parallels between events or Israel’s conduct in the OT and in the NT (1:9; 6:9; 7:14; 8:14, 17; 10:22–23; 28:11–12, 16; 29:10, 13, 14; 40:3–4; 43:20–21; 52:5; 54:1). Going beyond individual citations, scholars have identified the foundational use of Isaiah in various biblical books. R. Watts demonstrates that a “dual perspective of salvation and judgment—both within the context of the INE [= the Isaianic new exodus]—seems to provide the fundamental literary and theological structure of Mark’s Gospel,” and that the “Markan Jesus apparently understood his death in terms of the Isaianic ‘servant’ ” (New Exodus, 4, 384). Similarly, “the entire Isaianic New Exodus program provides the structural framework for the narrative of Acts as well as the various emphases developed with this framework” (Pao 250). According to Hays, Paul quotes Isaiah thirty-one times, since, as is especially evident in Romans, Paul “reads in Isaiah the story of God’s eschatological redemption of the world” (223). After examining fifty allusions to Isaiah in Revelation, Fekkes claims that his “interpretation of Isaiah in particular was clearly one of the more important pre-visionary influences which provided the substance and inspiration for the vision experience and for its final redaction” (290). In sum, one must conclude that Isaiah has influenced the NT more than any other OT book.

Isaiah and Theology

Isaiah’s potentially rich contribution to systematic and practical theology has been more piecemeal than profound for a number of reasons. For more than a century, historical-critical scholars have divided up the book among various authorial and editorial hands. They thus claim that it is impossible to find—and even inappropriate to seek—a unified theology in the book (Roberts 130–31). Typical of this approach is Hans Wildberger, whose massive German-language commentary on Isa. 1–39 concludes with (fifty pages of) summaries of the theology of both the Isaianic and the non-Isaianic portions, even excluding Isa. 40–66 from consideration. Furthermore, even when synthesizing Isaiah’s theology, interpreters commonly turn instinctively to systematic categories such as Yahweh—LORD of the nations, Israel—the people of God, Christology, and eschatology.

Accordingly, theologians typically have mined Isaiah’s theological riches in search of raw materials for constructing various doctrines. Two examples offer illuminating illustrations. Following early Christian interpreters, such as Origen, Tertullian, and Gregory the Great, some systematic theologians (such as Henry Thiessen) find in Isa. 14 (especially vv. 12–15) a characterization and description of the fall of Satan, which is linked to Ezek. 28 as well as Luke 10:7–19 and Rev. 12:7–9. Others reject such use of Isa. 14 as “double-meaning” exegesis. However, the former approach ignores the context of the description at the head of Isaiah’s Oracles concerning Foreign (p 343) Nations (Isa. 13–23). The latter approach disregards the function of Babylon within canonical Scripture as the prototypical foe of God and his purposes in the world, perhaps accounting for its placement as the first of the oracles.

A more significant example is the use of messianic texts drawn from Isaiah to construct an OT Christology or as reading selections for the church year. On the one hand, such approaches often focus primarily on the triad Isa. 7, 9, and 11 as advent texts and on Isa. 53 as a passion text. On the other hand, historical-critical scholars often view the former and the latter as presenting distinctive or even contradictory messianic portraits stemming from different authors and eras. More commonly, historical-critical scholars view the former as too theologically advanced to come from the eighth-century prophet or as simply reflecting idealized poetic portraits of leadership that focused on Hezekiah or Josiah or some other future king of Judah. However, such approaches overlook the placement and intertextual relationship between these texts. As argued above, the Davidic-king texts within Isa. 1–39 and the servant texts within Isa. 40–66 are integral to the progression of thought in their respective contexts (the terms “king” and “servant” therein being uniquely suited as messianic designations). Isaiah 32 and 33 also should be included in christological reflections, since they also mention the future king, functioning similarly to Isa. 9 and 11. Furthermore, in portraying the servant’s act of vicarious atonement, Isa. 53 must be viewed as “part of a grander and more comprehensive vision of purification” within the book (Groves 87).

Moreover, these two messianic figures legitimately can be identified (see Schultz, “The King,” 157–59). Both possess the Spirit (11:2; 42:1) and are linked to the Davidic covenantal promises (9:7; 11:1; cf. 55:3, with the servant serving as a covenant for the people: 42:6; 49:8). And both are royal figures who establish justice (11:5; 42:3–4), the latter being honored by kings (49:7; 53:12). In fact, Isa. 61:1–3 may be taken as a final “servant” text, especially in light of its use in Luke 4:16–22. However, the Immanuel text of Isa. 7:14, despite its use in Matt. 1, functions within the first historical test of faith as a confession of trust in the divine presence in the midst of a national crisis, rather than as a messianic prediction. Reading this text within its canonical context requires that we see Matthew's fourfold use of "fulfillment" language in Matt. 1–2 \(1:20–23 → Isa. 7:14; 2:13–15 → Hos. 11:1; 2:16–18 → Jer. 31:15; 2:19–23 → Isa. 11:1\).

In employing this term, the evangelist apparently is identifying events within the personal biography of Jesus the Messiah that echo events in Israel's corporate history and fill these earlier prophetic utterances full of meaning. It is therefore legitimate to affirm that "the gospel of earthly Jesus and risen Lord is found in Isaiah, in nuce.... In its temporal, literary, and theological organization, the Book of Isaiah is a type of Christian Scripture, Old and New Testaments" (Seitz, Figured Out, 104).

To be sure, Isaiah is neither a dogmatics textbook nor merely an anthology of ancient religious texts; rather, it is a prophetic witness to the divine word addressing the fears and hopes of God's people within the context of their historical situation. Accordingly, a theological synthesis of Isaiah will recognize the centrality of Jerusalem (48x)//Zion (46x) as God's chosen dwelling place, climaxing in its divine deliverance from Sennacherib's siege (Isa. 37:33–37; cf. 36:14–20), an event that may well have been the catalyst for the composition of the present book. Isaiah is thus clearly theocentric in focus. The Holy One of Israel (28x) is variously portrayed metaphorically as a disappointed father (1:2), a vinedresser (5:4–6; 27:3), a king (6:5; 33:22; 43:15; 44:6), a barber (7:20), a sanctuary and stumbling stone and snare (8:14), a banquet host (25:6), a warrior-hero (27:1; 28:21; 30:32; 42:13; 51:9; 59:17), a builder (28:16–17; 34:11), a shepherd (40:11), a pregnant woman (42:14), a husband (54:5), and a potter (64:8). He is Immanuel, the God who is with us (7:14; 8:8–9), standing behind every act of judgment or salvation, regardless of who his immediate agent may be.

In stark contrast to God's holiness is the people's guilt ('awon, 24x, as in 1:4), incurred through both idolatry and social injustice. A central sin of Israel as well as of the nations is pride (at least 17x), presenting two options—self-humbling or divine humbling (at least 15x), so that God alone will be exalted (esp. 2:11–12, 17; 5:15–16). God's sovereignty over the nations and over history is demonstrated as expressing his plan ('etsah, 5:19; 46:10–11). The nations play a central role in that divine plan (see Seitz, Zion's Destiny, 152–57), both as divine agents (10:5, 12) and as those who ultimately will worship and serve the one true God (2:1–4). Sometimes the movement is centripetal (45:5–6, 22–23) and sometimes it is centrifugal (49:6–7; 66:19–21), but throughout it is clear that God's covenantal blessings and (p 344) salvation are not reserved for Israel alone. Isaiah is about mission. Through his mighty word God asserts his superiority over the gods (10:10–11; 44:9–10, 15, 17) and announces his acts of deliverance through his King, through his Servant, and through his own deeds as Divine Warrior (42:13; 51:9; 63:1–6). Thereby, he brings about the eschatological glorification of Zion on behalf of the remnant (10:20–22; 11:11, 16), so that there is a radical contrast between Zion’s immediate and eschatological future (1:27; 2:3; 24:23; 46:13). In terms of the book’s central images, the divinely prepared highway will lead the people back to their God (11:16; 19:23; 35:8; 40:3; 42:16; 43:19; 49:11; 57:14; 58:11; 62:10). Then their dulled and limited (spiritual and physical) senses will once again be fully operational (6:9; 29:9–10, 18; 30:10–11; 32:3–4; 33:23; 35:5–6; 42:7, 18–20; 43:8; 44:18; 59:10), and light (’or, 27x) will permanently dispel the darkness (khoshek, 13x, as in 9:2; 42:16).

These theological claims and assurances call for behavioral changes from God’s people: salvation has its demands (55:6–8; chs. 56–58), and confession of sin is in order (59:9–15; 63:15–64:12). Isaiah’s vivid portrayal of Israel’s ungodly behavior parallels contemporary societal woes (5:8–25; 10:1–4). As modern readers, we are drawn into the “we-words” of Isaiah (Conrad 83–116; esp. 25:9; 26:1, 8, 12–13, 17–18; 33:2; 53:1–6). We, just as the leaders of ancient Judah, are challenged to place our faith and trust in God alone (aman, 7:9; 28:16; 43:10; 53:1; batakh, 17x, esp. 26:3–4). It is God alone whom we should fear, rather than fearing people or our circumstances (7:4; 8:12–13; 10:24; 11:2–3; 12:2; 19:16; 33:6; 35:4; 37:6; 40:9; 41:10, 13–14; 43:1, 5; 44:2, 8; 50:10; 51:7, 12; 54:4, 14; 57:11; 59:19), for God is ever with us. This is the abiding message of Isaiah.

Bibliography

Baer, D. When We All Go Home. JSOTSup 318. Sheffield Academic Press, 2001; Chilton, B. The Isaiah Targum. The Aramaic Bible 11. M. Glazier, 1987; Conrad, E. Reading Isaiah. OBT. Fortress, 1991; Dorsey, D. The Literary Structure of the Old Testament: A Commentary on Genesis–Malachi. Baker, 1999; Duhm, B. Das Buch Jesaia. HAT. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1892; Dumbrell, W. The Faith of Israel. Apollos/InterVarsity, 1988; Evans, C. A. “On the Unity and Parallel Structure of Isaiah.” VT 38 (1988): 129–47; Fekkes, J. Isaiah and Prophetic Traditions in the Book of Revelation. JSNTSup 93. JSOT, 1994; Goldingay, J. Isaiah. NIBCOT. Hendrickson, 2001; Groves, J. A. “Atonement in Isaiah 53.” Pages 61–89 in The Glory of the Atonement, ed. C. Hill and F. James III. InterVarsity, 2004; Hays, R. “‘Who Has Believed Our Message?’ Paul’s Reading of Isaiah.” Pages 205–25 in SBLSP: Part One. Scholars

Press, 1998; Jenkins, A. "The Development of the Isaiah Tradition in Isaiah 13–23." Pages 237–51 in The Book of Isaiah, ed. J. Vermeylen. Leuven University Press, 1989; McKinion, S., ed. Isaiah 1–39. ACCSOT 10. InterVarsity, 2004; Pao, D. Acts and the Isaianic New Exodus. WUNT. Mohr/Siebeck, 2000; Quinn-Miscall, P. Reading Isaiah. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Sawyer, J. F. S. The Fifth Gospel. Cambridge University Press, 1996; Schmitt, J. Isaiah and His Interpreters. Paulist, 1986; Schultz, R. "How Many 'Isaias' Were There and What Does It Matter? Prophetic Inspiration in Recent Evangelical Scholarship." Pages 150–70 in Evangelicals and Scripture, ed. D. Okholm et al. InterVarsity, 2004; idem. "The King in the Book of Isaiah." Pages 141–65 in The Lord's Anointed, ed. P. Satterthwaite et al. Baker/Paternoster, 1995; idem. The Search for Quotation. JSOTSup 180. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; idem. "Servant, Slave." Pages 1183–98 in NIDOTTE, vol. 4. Zondervan, 1997; Seitz, C. Figured Out. Westminster John Knox, 2001; idem. Isaiah 1–39. Interpretation. Westminster John Knox, 1993; idem. Zion's Final Destiny. Fortress, 1991; Smalley, B. The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages. University of Notre Dame Press, 1964; Tomasino, A. "Isaiah 1.1–2.4 and 63–66, and the Composition of the Isaianic Corpus." JSOT 57 (1993): 81–98; Watts, J. D. W. Isaiah. Word Biblical Themes. Word, 1989; Watts, R. "Consolation or Confrontation? Isaiah 40–55 and the Delay of the New Exodus." TynBul 41 (1990): 31–59; idem. Isaiah's New Exodus and Mark. WUNT. Mohr/Siebeck, 1994; Webb, B. The Message of Isaiah. InterVarsity, 1996; idem. "Zion in Transformation." Pages 65–84 in The Bible in Three Dimensions, ed. D. J. A. Clines. JSOT, 1990.

Richard L. Schultz

Israel

The fundamental covenant of the Bible is that Yahweh would be Israel's God and Israel would be Yahweh's people (Gen. 17; Exod. 6:2–8; Deut. 32:8–9; Isa. 44:1–2; Ezek. 20:5; Rendtorff). Three affirmations are assumed in this formula: (1) Yahweh is sovereignly active in history; (2) it is this sovereign Yahweh who establishes a relationship with humans; and (3) the relationship gives birth to a specific people who are special to Yahweh (elect Israel; cf. Novak). Fuller revelation provides definition to each: Yahweh reveals himself as Trinity; the relationship with humans is enacted in perfection through the accomplishments of Jesus Christ (life, teachings, death, resurrection, ascension, sending of Holy Spirit); the special, elect people of God is the universal church. Thus, in Christian theology "Israel" refers to the ethnic nation that becomes the spiritual body of Christ.

Israel in Biblical Context

Israel in the OT. God is the Creator; he fashions in the world (his temple) humans in his image and presents humans to the world as an expression of who he is and what he is like (Gen. 1:26–27). Those humans fall (ch. 3) and make chaos of God’s (p 345) good creation. In turn, God judges sinfulness by unlocking the keys of order and returning it to its original tohu va-bohu (the formlessness and emptiness of 1:2). He saves only Noah and his family, and from them begins afresh to turn his image-bearers into what they were intended to be. But, once again, they seek to turn other things into images (ch. 11). Hence, God, in his mysterious grace, seeks to re-create his image-bearers through Abraham, father of Isaac, who fathered Jacob, also called Israel (Gen. 12–35). “Israel,” then, is technically the progeny of Jacob; at the larger level, however, “Israel” is the line of Abraham through Isaac and Jacob and Joseph.

The story of Israel is a story of survival based on gracious election, responsibility, and discipline: redemption from Egypt (Exod. 12–15); entry into the land (Joshua); leadership struggles before the Davidic dynasty (Judges; 1 Sam. 8–11). The kingdom splits under Rehoboam (2 Chron. 10–12), but God’s Davidic promise continues through Judah (2 Sam. 7). Even exile at the hands of Babylon (and Persia) does not break apart the promise to Israel as the successor of Abraham and David (Isa. 40–55; Haggai; Ezra-Nehemiah).

Israel in the NT. Jesus both reenacts and fulfills Israel’s history in his baptism at the Jordan (Matt. 3), temptations (4:1–11), refashioning of the torah (chs. 5–7), ten miracles (chs. 8–9), selecting twelve apostles as the new shepherds of Israel (10:1–4), and recapitulation of specific figures in Israel’s history, like Son of Man (Dan. 7; Mark 2:8–12; 13:24–27; 14:61–62), Servant (cf. Isa. 52:13–53:12; Mark 1:11; 3:27; 9:9–13; 10:45; Luke 4:16–21; 7:22), and David (Matt. 19:28–30; his use of “kingdom”). Jesus thus is the representative Head as the new Israel, and he thus divides human history into the Adam (old Israel) line and the Christ (new Israel) line (Rom. 5:12–21).

The church is thus the “Israel of God” (Gal. 6:16). More importantly, the Christians’ constant appropriation of language formerly used of Israel but now applied to the church shapes this idea. No better expression of this can be found than 1 Pet. 2:9–10. One thinks also of Eph. 2:11–22; Heb. 8:8–10; and Rev. 2:14. “So strong is this sense of solidarity that one must conclude that continuity between the two Testaments is grounded in the fact that both tell the story of how the same God fulfills his covenant promises to the same people” (Minear 72). The most significant early Christian revelation was that the gospel of Jesus Christ was a salvation for anyone and everyone who believes, to the Jew first but also to the Gentile (Gal. 3:6–14; Rom. 1:16; ch. 4). In effect, then, the early Christians democratized the atonement and universalized the covenant (Gal. 3:28; Rom. 12:1–2; Heb. 8–10).

The question of whether or not early Christian prophecy expected a future for ethnic/national Israel is disputed. One might take Matt. 23:37–39 as a conditional prophecy (Allison), and one might take Rom. 11:26 (“all Israel will be saved”) as spiritual Israel (the church). One might take other figures of Israel in prophecy as referring either to the remnant (thus, the followers of Jesus) or as metaphorical—so concluding that the NT does not anticipate a future for ethnic/national Israel. Or, one might focus on the ethnic dimensions of Rom. 9–11 (e.g., 9:1–5, 31; 10:21; 11:1–36), take other supposed metaphorical references as more literal, and conclude that there is in fact an expectation that at the end of history God will again work with Israel as his people.

Israel in the Practice of the Theological Interpretation

Israel Demonstrates the Faithfulness of God to Abraham and David. What God has promised to Abraham and David continues throughout history and finds its embodiment in the gospel of Jesus Christ. The covenant with Abraham, expressed as Yahweh being Israel’s God and Israel as Yahweh’s people, remains viable, active, and powerful because of the fidelity of God to his word. But it is not just covenant that God grants to Israel: it is also torah that Israel bequeaths to the world (Van Groningen). God has chosen to reveal the terms of his covenant and the structure of moral expectations through Israel, his people. Israel’s election provides history with an exemplary people, sometimes falling woefully short. Israel is thus God’s revelation of justice, peace, and loving-kindness (Wright 68–81).

The role of Jesus Christ in reenacting Israel’s history and prophecies concentrates the moment of fulfillment, not so much in the church, as in Jesus Christ himself. Thus, there is a christocentric “replacement” of Israel, rather than an “ecclesial” replacement (Motyer). (Replacement theology, the theory that the church so fulfills the promises to Israel that the promises to ethnic Israel are rendered obsolete, is much disputed by Christian theologians today [Holwerda].) Fulfillment in Jesus Christ leads to a rereading of the OT as a witness to the redemption that is found in Jesus Christ.

Israel Illustrates That God’s Work Is through a People, Not Just Individuals. Modern individualism is chased from the room when one (p 346) reflects on how God has chosen to work in history: his work, while clearly individual at points, is through a people. God works through Israel, and as effected by the gospel of Jesus Christ, that “social organism” explodes into a universal new “social organism,” the church. Israel as people also illustrates what the apostle Paul means: “Not all descended from Israel are Israel” (Rom. 9:6, 8; 11:5). As the prophets also anticipated (Mic. 6:6–8), the true people of God are not identical with ethnic Israel. As the NT affirms, the true people of God are those who do the will of God (Matt. 7:21–28; Mark 3:31–35; Rom. 4).

Israel Embodies God’s Way of Disciplining a People to Remind Them of His Covenant Expectations. Israel’s (and the church’s) history, if it tells us anything, speaks not of triumphalism but of the ups and downs of covenant obedience and disobedience, and how God responds to his people in discipline for disobedience. If Israel and the church find themselves powerless, they need either to stand faithfully against the inevitable war of the Seed of Eve with the serpent or to confess that their sin has led to God’s discipline. The primary examples of God’s discipline remain the Egyptian sojourn, the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, and the Roman destruction of Jerusalem in 66–73 CE.

Israel Demonstrates the Sovereign Act of God in His Election of a People. Israel did not “deserve” God’s election of the people, and neither is the church a body that “deserves” God’s grace. Instead, in his mystery God chose to make his redemptive purposes for the entire world known through a wandering man from Ur of the Chaldees (Abraham), through a small group of people in the highlands of the land of Israel, through an oppressed minority in the land of Egypt, through a wandering people in the desert who come to terms with the land of Israel, through an exiled and beaten community, and through a small group of followers of Jesus who become a worldwide church. This choice cannot be explained; it can only be declared that God in his grace has spoken his word through these peoples. Thus, revelation and election, as the Jewish author David Novak has made clear, must be connected.

Choosing Israel Is a Revelation of God as Incarnate. God’s form of revelation is not philosophy but a covenant relationship with a people. In other words, choosing Israel anticipates the embodiment of God in human history not only through a people but also in an individual, Jesus Christ. God’s revelation thus becomes fundamentally personal and interpersonal, taking part in human realities. This cuts into the mystical flight from earth, as well as the neglect of planet earth and human history in anticipation of “heaven.” Even more so, it blasts the arrogance of modern pluralism and cultural postmodernism, where truth is called into question by appeal to variant cultural manifestations. Israel calls moderns to concrete, universal revelation through a people (Israel, church) and in one person (Jesus Christ).

See also Anti-Semitism; Church, Doctrine of the; Covenant; Jewish-Christian Dialogue; Kingdom of God

Bibliography

Allison, D., Jr. The Jesus Tradition in Q. Trinity, 1997; Holwerda, D. Jesus and Israel. Eerdmans, 1995; Minear, P. Images of the Church in the New Testament. Westminster, 1960; Motyer, S. “Israel \(Nation\).” Pages 581–87 in New Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. B. Rosner et al. InterVarsity, 2000; Novak, D. The Election of Israel. Cambridge University Press, 1995; Rendtorff, R. The Covenant Formula. T&T Clark, 1998; Van Groningen, G. “Israel.” Pages 379–85 in Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. W. Elwell. Baker, 1996; Wright, G. E. The Challenge of Israel’s Faith. University of Chicago, 1944.

Scot McKnight

(p 347) J

James, Book of

James, disparaged by Luther and broken into context-less pieces by Dibelius, has struggled for its theological voice to be heard by the church. Today, as theology is being turned on its head into action items for faithful Christians, James’s “wisdom” comes across as theologically cutting edge for people who desire a dynamic relationship with God.

History of Interpretation

The clearest early use of James comes from the Eastern church, specifically from Origen, in the third century, who cites it thirty-six times. Employment of similar language, such as “double-minded” (a term unique to James in the NT), suggests possible knowledge of James in early Western writings, such as 1 Clement, Shepherd of Hermas, the Didache, and the Letter of Barnabas. Eusebius reports that Clement of Alexandria, Origen’s predecessor, wrote an entire commentary on James, though Clement never cites James in other extant writings.

Despite its early favor in the Alexandrian school, James was not allegorized. More common was quoting statements from James, without regard for their contexts, in support of various teachings. Cyril of Alexandria, who cites James 124 times, for example, isolates James 3:2 (“We all stumble in many ways”) from its context about teachers, as support for general human frailty. He also, among many others, promoted 1:17 (“Every good and perfect gift is from above”) as a proof for the divinity of Christ.

Chief interest in James—both in the West and in the East throughout the early centuries of teaching and preaching, beginning as early as fourth-century Hilary of Poitiers but including Augustine—focused most heavily on the latter half of 1:17 (“who does not change like shifting shadows”) as crucial biblical support for God’s immutability. Another focal interest was James’s intersection with the cosmic struggle of God and the devil in temptation of the believer. Augustine wrote an unrecovered commentary on James, and his respect for James, shown in his sermons, helped vault it from obscurity in the West. He was interested in the moral teaching of James, especially with regard to speech.

The Venerable Bede, eighth-century author of the best, most influential early commentary on James, carefully explicates 1:13 by explaining that God does test people with “external” temptations, but only the devil tempts with “internal” temptations, which attack the soul. This also helps explain Jesus’ temptation, which troubled the early church in light of this verse. Bede, more like commentaries centuries later, combines exacting exegesis with insightful theology and application.

Eleventh-century Theophylact, who is almost certainly dependent on Didymus the Blind and Oecumenius, curiously identifies the “righteous man” of 5:6 (KJV) not only with Christ but as a prophecy of the author’s (understood as James, Jesus’ brother) own political execution.

Attention did not focus on faith and works in 2:14–26, though the contrast with Paul is recognized. A seventh-century monk, Andreas, is typical in explaining that “faith” in Paul is prebaptismal, whereas “faith” in James is postbaptismal. Augustine proclaims that James explains how Paul should be understood, that good works are to result from justifying faith. Origen and Cyril of Alexandria both similarly bring James into their commentaries on Romans.

In the Reformation era, Luther disdained James’s teaching on faith, lack of any teaching about Christ, exaltation of the law (his understanding of “law of liberty” in 1:25 KJV), and lack of logical order. This led him to the dogmatic conclusion that it was not written by an apostle but by a second-generation believer, probably Jewish, who carelessly wrote down some apostolic teaching he had heard but packaged this with his own nonapostolic, even anti-Christian ideas. Even in the early church, the authorship of James was a question mark on its authority, and Eusebius recognized it as a “disputed” book. Origen’s connecting (p 348) it to James, the Lord’s brother, had settled the question for most. Though concern over James’s authorship troubled others of Luther’s era, like Erasmus and even Luther’s disputant, Cardinal Thomas de Vio (Cajetan), Luther’s radical solution was unique.

None of the other Reformers, such as Tyndale, Zwingli, Calvin, or even Philipp Melancthon, were influenced to adopt this extreme position, which strikes many as a much-too-convenient way for Luther to subordinate James’s theology of faith to salvation by faith alone. The fact that 2:26 was used against Luther in his Leipzig Debate and that 5:14 was the Roman Catholic proof text for the sacrament of extreme unction may be historical factors that prejudiced Luther against James.

In his commentary, Calvin explicitly rejects Luther’s unwise precedent, cautioning against imposing uniformity and upholding the value of diversity in the canon. Calvin underscores this by asserting that Paul and James apply faith to different, legitimate facets of justification, Paul to acceptance by God, James to a reality that requires evidence. In fact, a person can even be said to be justified by works in that works are a necessary evidence of saving faith. Calvin makes no mention of divine immutability in 1:17 and Christ in 5:6 and rejects extreme unction in 5:14 on the basis that the gift of healing was a temporary apostolic gift.

Despite the fact that Luther’s canonical subordination of James and conjectures about authorship were but a ripple that seemed to disperse quietly in his day, they erupted again like a geyser in the era of critical scholarship and continue to moisten the air of James scholarship. Efforts to resolve the issue of authorship and the related issue of James’s relationship to early Christianity occupied nearly all scholarly resources from the mid-1800s to the late twentieth century.

The quest to find historical solutions began with Herder, who postulated that Paul and James had a personal relationship, understanding each other’s view of justification and faith. Historical criticism proper began with Kern and De Wette, who, interacting with each other’s publications, propelled the notions that Paul and James are totally incompatible on justification (Luther redivivus). They counted James as the pseudonymous voice of a radical, Ebionite, Jewish Christianity of the second century, which opposed domineering Gentile Christianity, and as devoid of any coherence or valuable theological perspective.

This low opinion of James was magnified by those connected to the Tübingen School and reached its pinnacle at the end of the nineteenth century. Then Massebieau and Spitta independently proclaimed James to be a Jewish document, covered with a veneer of Christianity by the introduction of Jesus Christ to 1:1 and 2:1. At the same time, in contrast, Mayor, and also G. Kittel, believed historical-critical methodology implicated James, written by Jesus' brother, legitimately to represent earliest Christianity, pre-apostolic council (49 CE), still heavily flavored with Jewish thought. They even raised evidence to suggest that Paul responds to James on faith and not vice versa.

As the twentieth century began, two scholars focused on the literary aspects of James but with strikingly different conclusions. Ropes, postulating a pseudonymous Palestinian author writing post-70 CE, recognized James's indebtedness to Jewish and Christian thought, and also Jewish Wisdom literature, but nevertheless advocated that the controlling influence is the fourth-century BCE Greek moral form of address, "diatribe." Ropes also recognized James's intelligent use of Greek to create catchwords, particularly in chapter 1. Unlike Ropes, who believed the somewhat-isolated units show progress in thought, Dibelius, operating from a form-critical perspective, put feet on Luther's earlier criticism. He determined that the organization of the pieces in James is totally ad hoc and superficial, that the book is the best NT representative of paraenetic literature throughout, and that each unit must be interpreted independently from its context because no authorial intention holds the book together. All of this leads to his conclusion that James has no theology of its own, only thoughts ripped from other contexts and meaninglessly pieced together.

Nearly all twentieth-century study has attempted to breathe life into James after Dibelius's near deathblow to it. Adamson specifically focuses his commentary on demonstrating the coherence and relevance of James to Christian life. Laws boldly unveils integrity of human character, akin to God's own singleness, as the underlying theological conviction of the book. Davids advanced the study of Francis, and Martin built on the work of Davids, taking the epistolary character of James to its penultimate and contending for an intricate cycle of patterning within. Cargal and Johnson find cohesiveness through rhetorical criticism. Moo suggests that (p 349) James be approached as a sermon and defended as a theological document.

The Overall Message

Dibelius's charge of incoherence has quite rightly been set aside as exaggerating the scissors-and-paste construction of James and drawing unfounded conclusions regarding the paraenetic genre. Even if James results from the work of an editor or even a collector, its purpose and intent are communicated at least by the arrangement of the material.

Despite the lack of a direct statement of purpose or a clear statement of its intended audience, James does base its teaching on the author's intimate and authoritative knowledge of a specific community to whom he writes. Yet, exactly how wide or narrow the community is cannot be determined very far. They are Hellenistic Jewish Christians, but as to where in the early Christian Mediterranean world, only conjectures may be offered.

What is clear is that James fits more into a wisdom genre than into the polemics of philosophy or theology. James leads with behavior and relationship to God, for which theological values form an oft-assumed base. James is concerned that his readers live well and more successfully than they currently are. This is the typical concern of Wisdom literature, like Proverbs, or Job, or Sirach.

The general problem the author of James perceives for his readers is that their spiritual development is being hindered by various forces: their own economic and social condition, lack of conviction, poor choices, overconfidence in the security of their position with God, injustices inflicted on them, and the influence of the world around them. The solution is to repent, to turn back from their spiritual wasteland of wandering before it is too late and Christ comes in judgment. The author's overall goal is for his readers to become one in person, in community, and in relationship with God. The proof of this new and continuing orientation is in their behavior with respect to God and others, in and outside the church. The means for this is for them to hear God immediately through the epistle itself, and daily through prayer, worship, and the church.

James's focus on hearing God comes from recognizing the significance of the proverb of 1:19, "Let everyone be quick to hear, slow to speak, and slow to anger" (NRSV), in relationship to the entire epistle. It is commonly recognized that the three parts of this proverb are unpacked in the paragraph that follows: "slow to anger" (1:20–21), "quick to hear" (1:22–25), and "slow to speak" (1:26–27). What is not so often observed is that these three parts of the proverb, broadly conceived, are also developed in the ensuing chapters: correctly hearing the word (ch. 2), the difficulty of controlling the tongue (ch. 3), and the damaging effect of angry speech (ch. 4). The positive effect of hearing God reverberates through every negative issue the author takes up, right through to enabling a wandering believer to hear and respond to the truth of God in 5:19.

Contribution to the Canon

Despite its current location at the back of the NT canon among the “non-Pauline” collection of epistles, reflecting the Western (Roman) ordering, in the Eastern order (also reflecting Athanasius’s order in his Festal Letter of 367), James heads the General Epistles, which follow immediately after Acts, before the Pauline Epistles.

How might reading James this far up in the NT canon affect our interpretation of it? First, it would be more obvious that James is a trustworthy representative of Jesus’ teaching, particularly the Sermon on the Mount, as also found in the Gospels. Second, it would be more apparent that James showcases concerns of the church in its earlier, pre-Gentile days as seen in the earlier chapters of Acts. Third, it might make it easier to see that Paul, not James, is the innovator in the early church and the one whose teaching requires careful scrutiny and patient explaining.

Deppe documents that while as many as 184 sayings in James have been purported to be allusions from the Synoptic Gospels, those that are most assuredly legitimate (though many others are probable allusions) narrow to eight: James 1:5 and 4:2c–3 (Matt. 7:7; Luke 11:9); 2:5 (Luke 6:20b; Matt. 5:3); 5:2–3a (Matt. 6:19–20; Luke 12:33b); 4:9 (Luke 6:21, 25b); 5:1 (Luke 6:24); 5:12 (Matt. 5:33–37); 4:10 (Matt. 23:12; Luke 14:11; 18:14b). While James never quotes Jesus or one of the Gospels, it showcases how many early Christian teachers may have freely incorporated the very language of Jesus’ teaching as they understood it. This allows that teaching to be applied to new situations, as when showing favoritism to the powerful and neglect to the marginal becomes a violation of neighbor love (2:1–4).

James provides a peek into the early church. Whether or not its date is pre-Gentile, its orientation is Gentile-less, with no mention of circumcision or issues of how Jewish law applies to those beyond Jews. It speaks of the assembly (p 350) of believers as a “synagogue” (2:2 Greek), implying that the church began organizing itself on this Jewish model. It suggests that nonbelievers at times frequented these synagogues (2:2–4). It shows that elders, apparently at least two, provided spiritual leadership, that they visited the sick and sought their spiritual and physical healing through prayer. It also shows that people in the church had spiritual obligations to care for one another through times of nagging sinfulness and even apostasy (5:13–20).

Recognition that James draws upon three of the same OT passages as 1 Peter but for different purposes (Isa. 40:6–8//James 1:10–11//1 Pet. 1:24; Prov. 10:12//James 5:20//1 Pet. 4:8; Prov. 3:34//James 4:6//1 Pet. 5:5) suggests that early Christian teachers worked freely from common resources.

With Paul, James shared a desire that people be justified before God through Christ. Yet, James was not concerned about those entering justified status so much as those exiting by default or intention. James would probably have agreed with Paul's adamant position that keeping Jewish traditional laws and rituals has nothing to do with justification in Christ. Nevertheless, he was probably intentionally cautionary about how Paul's teaching on this subject could be easily misused.

However the canon is organized, James stands as an important balance to Paul's presentation of justification, and a needed caution. James has value as the only NT epistle that marshals a theological defense of the poor, a sustained concern about speech-ethics, and reflection on numerous and various aspects of prayer. This makes its canonical weight proportionally much heavier than its slim size.

Theological Significance

James's thoughts about God are typical of anyone raised in a Jewish home in the early first century, and the author assumes his readers share these convictions with him. They rest comfortably beneath the surface of his main points. When 1:17 says that God supplies the good things in people's lives, the author shows his trust that God knows what is good for us and who we are personally, and that he is powerful enough to harness the forces of the universe to our well-being. When 4:3 says that people do not receive everything they pray for because of sinister desires, the author reveals his belief that God knows our motives, good and bad—that we cannot hide anything from him.

Many other ideas about God can be discerned. He is the Creator (1:17–18), making people in his own image (3:9), and his word is powerful enough to give people rebirth (1:18). His character is constant in that he never cavorts with evil (1:13, 17), always keeps his promises (1:12), and has a watchful, discerning eye on the poor and how the powerful treat them (1:9–11; 2:1–7; 5:1–6).

No doubt, James is far more God- than Christ-centered, though what is said about Christ has to count as a quite high Christology. Jesus shares the titles “Lord” (1:1; 2:1; 5:7–8, 14–15) and Judge (5:9) with God; his very name, like God's, is powerful enough to heal (5:14) and significant enough to be blasphemed/slandered (2:8); to him is possibly attributed the Shekinah glory of God (2:1).

Christ's return to judge on God's behalf is also pending (5:7–9).

James emphasizes that the fundamental point of human life is to find God, respond to his voice, and relate to him successfully and robustly, now and eternally. As essential as Christ is in this enterprise, James reminds us of something Christianity understandably quite easily forgets, that Christ is the means, perhaps the agent, but not the end of our quest. Our goal is God and a successful relationship with him. To focus solely on Christ in worship is to miss Christ's own purpose of bringing us to God. In this way, James should be prized and heard in the church. Though written to believers, James speaks to Christians first as people, and second as those who believe in Jesus. Thus, it can speak to people beyond the church. James functions as a guide to everyone in their most basic need, to be integrated with others, God, and themselves. James tells us that we can each, like Abraham, be God's friend, and he ours. No message is more needed for the world or for the church than this.

Bibliography

Adamson, J. The Epistle of James. NICNT. Eerdmans, 1954; Baker, W. "Christology in the Epistle of James." EvQ 74 (2002): 47–57; idem. Personal Speech-Ethics in the Epistle of James. WUNT 2.68. Mohr, 1995; Bauckham, R. James. New Testament Readings. Routledge, 1999; Bray, G., ed. James, 1–2 Peter, 1–3 John, Jude. ACCSNT 11. InterVarsity, 2000; Calvin, J. Commentaries on the Catholic Epistles. 1551, trans. J. Owen. Eerdmans, 1948; Cargal, T. Restoring the Diaspora. SBLDS 144. Scholars Press, 1993; Chester, A., and R. P. Martin. The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter, and Jude. Cambridge University Press, 1994; Davids, P. Commentary on James. NIGTC. Eerdmans, 1982; Deppe, D. The Sayings of Jesus in the Epistle of James. Bookcrafters, 1989; De Wette, W. M. L. Historical-Critical Introduction to the Canonical Books of the New Testament, trans. F. Frothingham. Crosby & Nichols, (p 351)1858; Dibelius, M. James. Revised by H. Greeven. Hermeneia. Fortress, 1976; Francis, F. "The Form and Function of the Opening and Closing Paragraphs of James and I John." ZNW 61 (1970): 110–26; Herder, J. G. Briefe zweener Brüder Jesu im unserm Kanon. Meyer, 1775. Herders sämtliche Werke 7, ed. B. Suphan. Weidmann, 1884; Johnson, L. T. The Letter of James. AB. Doubleday, 1995; Kern, F. H. "Der Charakter und Ursprung des Briefes Jacobi." TZTh 8 (1835): 3–132; idem. Der Brief Jacobi untersucht und erklärt. Fues, 1838; Kittel, G. "Der geschichtliche Ort des Jakobusbriefes." ZNW 41 (1942): 54–112; Luther, M. Luther's Works, vols. 35–36, 54. Fortress, 1959; Martin, R. P. James. WBC. Word, 1988; Masebieu, L. "L'épître de Jacques: est-elle l'oeuvre d'un chrétien?" RHR (1895): 249–83; Mayor, J. The Epistle of St. James. 1913. Zondervan, 1954; Moo, D. The Letter of James. Pillar. Eerdmans, 2000; Ropes, J. The Epistle of St. James. ICC. T&T Clark, 1916; Spitta, F. Zur Geschichte und Literatur des Urchristentums. Vol. 2, Der Brief des Jakobus. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1896; Wall, R. The Community of the Wise. New Testament in Context. Trinity, 1997.

William R. Baker

JEDP See History of Israel; Source Criticism

Jeremiah, Book of

Jeremiah, one of the longest OT books, has given us the most memorable portrayal of a biblical prophet, and is also the source of the idea of the “new covenant.”

History of Interpretation

Interpretation of Jeremiah has often focused on the prophet himself. The first great phase of modern study of the book, initiated by B. Duhm, distinguished between its prose and poetry. In isolating the poetry, Duhm was searching for the authentic words of the prophet, and therefore for the true prophetic experience. In this sense, his critical questions were inseparable from a religious interest. Duhm’s work gave rise to further studies that pursued strictly historical questions, such as S. Mowinckel’s classic division of the book’s material into three strands, A (poetic oracles), B (prose sermons), and C (prose narratives about Jeremiah); others manifested religious interest. A supreme example is J. Skinner’s treatment, in which the prophet is regarded as a model of prayer and of the individual’s experience of God.

As a fruit of this phase in the critical study of the book, Jeremiah became the initiator and parade example of religious individualism, by contrast with the older type of religion in Israel, which was characterized as corporate and ritualistic. Jeremiah’s qualification as an example of personal piety lay particularly in his prayers. A group of these prayers came to be known (inappropriately) as his “confessions” (viz., 11:18–23; 12:1–6; 15:10–14, 15–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–12, 14–18). These prayers keenly express his pain and protest that arise directly from his call to be a prophet. Their honesty and boldness seemed new and important to the older critical scholars.

In this phase of interpretation, the new covenant (31:31–34) was regarded as a high point in individualistic religion, because of the idea of a transition from written code to knowledge of God that was “written on the heart.”

A second important phase in modern interpretation focused, not on the prophet himself, but on the meaning of the book in its final redaction. J. P. Hyatt inaugurated the tendency to see the book as “Deuteronomistic” (or “Deuteronomic”). One theological advantage of this development was that it reinstated the prose sections of the book, which had been devalued in the first phase (and which often still suffer from that legacy). The Deuteronomistic interpretation allowed the accent to fall on the experience of the community in exile, and the capacity for prophecy to be reappropriated in new circumstances. The Deuteronomistic interpretation branched into a variety of models. E. W. Nicholson, for example, saw the prose sermons as the preaching of Jeremiah's message in exile, with developments and innovations. R. P. Carroll and W. McKane think, in contrast, that the book grew rather haphazardly over a protracted period.

In this phase the central theological issue was how the promises of Yahweh might be valid in the wake of the exile, which seemed to have changed everything. The new covenant could now be seen as the key to a new way of thinking about God's activity in Israel. For example, J. Unterman perceived a theological shift from a theology of repentance (in which Israel could avoid judgment by repenting) to one of "redemption," in which Yahweh took a quite new initiative in Israel's salvation, by enabling the people to be faithful (32:39–40). (How far the new covenant was really "new," however, was a matter of debate; Carroll.)

A final phase may be identified as that in which the book is regarded as a literary text. An example is T. Polk, for whom the "persona" of the prophet is a figment of the religious community's imagination, and who embodies aspects of their experience. One focus in this context is the parallel between the depicted life of the prophet and the (p 352)life of Israel. Jeremiah's restoration after suffering becomes an earnest of the community's (cf. 15:19; 31:18).

In a modern reading of Jeremiah with theological questions, historical, literary, and canonical factors all play a part. In seeking to apply the message to church and individuals, we need to be aware first of its challenge to a Jewish people exiled in Babylon. We should, second, attend to its shape as a whole. In this way its "gospel," in the shape of new covenant and restoration, can be heard along with Jeremiah's analysis of the ills that brought judgment in the first place. The new covenant itself can be heard, not only as foreshadowing salvation in Christ, but also as a challenge to understand the radical nature of covenantal commitment, and of "worship in spirit and in truth." Finally, the ministry of Jeremiah is a model of courage, faithfulness, and true leadership, without becoming a pretext for an unbiblical "individualism."

The Message of Jeremiah

The message of Jeremiah can be traced initially by an account of the book's progression. Following the prophet's call (1:1–19) is a series of poetic oracles of judgment, together with exhortations to repent (2:1–6:30). The people's falseness in worship and faith is characterized, along with Jeremiah's grief over this (7:1–20:18). The failure of Judah's kings is lamented, and we are given initial visions of a wholly new order, including a messianic promise, and judgment on Babylon (21:1–25:38). The stubbornness of the people is a major theme in 26:1–36:32, but at the heart of this section, paradoxically, is the Book of Consolation (30:1–33:26), which in turn is constructed round the new covenant. The fall of Judah and subsequent events are narrated (37:1–45:5). The last main section consists of Oracles against the Nations (OAN) and a further account of the fall of Judah (46:1–52:34).

Such an account is inevitably overly schematic. For example, the division offered above is that of the MT, while the LXX differs, being much shorter, but also having the OAN in the middle of the book rather than the end. These two redactional types of Jeremiah have adopted different strategies to highlight the OAN, which play an important part in demonstrating a reversal of fortunes by God's grace. The account given is overly schematic in another way, for in drawing attention to the centrality (literally and theologically) of the new covenant, it passes over the fact that from an early stage salvation-notes are interspersed among passages of judgment (e.g., 3:14–18).

However, this overview does highlight key movements and themes. The first half of the book, up to chapter 25, gives an analysis of the problem with Judah in God's eyes. They have abandoned him for other gods (ch. 2), mistaken a trust in institutions for true religion (7:1–15), and become deeply corrupt as a society, so that no truth or trust is known or practiced (8:22–9:9). For this, God will act against them. His action can be seen as a dismantling of the elements of the covenant: temple, Davidic king, historic land (Stulman). Up to this point the organization of the book shows how such hope as Jeremiah might have originally had for a renewal in Judah closed down as the stubbornness of the people became evident (McConville). Such closure is symbolized by the prohibition placed on Jeremiah's intercessory prayer (7:16; 11:14; cf. 15:1).

In tandem with this systematic undermining of Judah's false trust is a strong theme of God's own empathy with the people, manifested through the portrayal of the prophet. Jeremiah stands on both sides of the issue, feeling the grief of the people that will surely come with the judgment (4:19–22), and also the anger of God because of their perversity (11:11–20). The unity of Jeremiah and God in grief and alienation from sinful Judah is clearly expressed in 8:22–9:3, which grounds Jeremiah's reputation as "the weeping prophet," yet where the true grievance turns out to be God's. On the other hand, the symbolic and representative character of Jeremiah's life is illustrated, for example, by the embargo on marriage placed upon him, as a witness to the tragic brevity of the life now held out to the people (16:2–4).

The emotional burden of this dual role on Jeremiah is extreme and leads to a lament in which he curses his birth (20:14–18). The death he thus seeks corresponds to the "death" that Judah itself must endure; and the continuation of prophet and message into the second half of the book is a token of life beyond that death for the people (Clines and Gunn).

The book is constructed so as to affirm that God's judgment is not the final word. The perspective of salvation beyond judgment occurs sporadically in the first half (3:14–18; 16:14–15), but it is stronger in the second half. Important turning points are the Davidic messianic promise (23:5–6), following hard on the condemnation of the historic kings (ch. 22), God's first promise that he will enable faith among the returned exiles (24:7), and the seventy-year term put on the (p 353)exile, after which Babylon will be judged in turn (25:12–14). From chapter 24, the challenge to faith becomes the acceptance that God will first act in judgment. The insistence on this, which informs Jeremiah's confrontation with the false prophet Hananiah, for example (ch. 28), is also an insistence that God in the end will vindicate himself and his faithful people, as exemplified by Jeremiah.

A key phrase that expresses God's intention to save after judging is "I will restore your fortunes" (NRSV; "I will ... bring you back from captivity," NIV), which comes first in 29:14, then seven times in Jer. 30–33 (the Book of Consolation [BC]). The core of this idea is God's "turning" (shub). Indeed, there is extensive play on this word in Jeremiah, since it can mean repenting and returning (on Israel's part) and a turning (of fortunes) brought about by God. In Jer. 30–33 the dramatic turn from judgment to salvation is vividly depicted. One device is the non sequitur, exemplified in 30:12–17 (picture of sin and judgment, vv. 12–15, followed "illogically" by a declaration of salvation, vv. 16–17). Another is the story of Jeremiah's purchase of a field in the midst of siege (ch. 32), an apparently nonsensical act that signifies a future for Judah against all likelihood.

God's turning Judah's fortunes is depicted as a new miraculous act. Jeremiah declares to God, "Nothing is too hard for you!" (32:17, cf. v. 27), and his intention to save hard-hearted Judah after the Babylonian devastation is put on a par with his primary acts in both creation and deliverance of Israel from Egypt (32:17, 21–22).

In the middle of the Book of Consolation is the famous promise of the new covenant (31:31–34). This covenant has several elements: It will be made “with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah.” It will be unlike the former covenant, in that its requirements (the torah) will be written “on their hearts.” They consequently will need no teacher. And God will forgive their past sins. The agency of God himself in bringing about the renewed faithfulness of the people is prominent in this, and is repeated later in the BC (32:39–40). This becomes an important explanation of how there can be a future for Judah in covenant with God, given that they have so persistently flouted it in the past. The continuity with historic, geographical Judah should also be noted, since the new covenant promise is followed almost immediately by an assurance that the devastated city of Jerusalem will be rebuilt (31:38–40).

After this theological high point, the narrative returns to the account of the fall of Jerusalem and Judah, together with its causes. This account is not strictly chronological, since it embraces both Zedekiah, the last king (597–587; chs. 34, 37–39), and the earlier king Jehoiakim (609–598, chs. 35–36). Right to the end, Jeremiah continues to declare God’s purpose to punish Judah by means of Babylon, and he is beaten and imprisoned for what is perceived as treason (37:13–16). Following the fall of the city, Jeremiah himself is spared the exile by the Babylonian authorities, but then is taken to Egypt by a party that sought its salvation in that quarter, despite Jeremiah’s consistent warnings against this (24:8–10; 42:18–22). Even so, the word of God still comes through Jeremiah to the people in Egypt, implying the possibility of grace even after this new act of disobedience (ch. 43).

In the last main section of the book are the OAN (chs. 46–51). These confirm the commission at Jeremiah’s call, that he would be a “prophet to the nations” (1:5). Unexpected is the application of the formula “Afterward, I will restore [their] fortunes” (48:47; 49:6, 39) to Moab, Ammon, and Elam. This shows how far the theology of the Book of Consolation affects the structure of the whole book of Jeremiah. The oracles also confirm, however, God’s intention to save Judah in the end. The demise of Babylon, accordingly, occupies most space here (chs. 50–51). In saving Judah, God is called their “Redeemer” (50:34).

Jeremiah and the Canon

The canonical importance of Jeremiah is evident not only from its length and its prominent position, but also from its influence on later books. Chronicles, Ezra, and Daniel cite Jeremiah’s “seventy years” in their respective assimilations of the idea of a purposeful “exile” followed by salvation (2 Chron. 36:21; Ezra 1:1; Dan. 9:2). The Daniel text in particular shows how the principle established by Jeremiah goes well beyond the immediate historical circumstances for which it was conceived.

Jeremiah also develops themes already present in Hosea: God’s faithfulness, the covenant people’s unfaithfulness, the prophet’s deep involvement in his message, signifying God’s personal engagement with his people, and salvation after judgment (note Hos. 14). These then may be seen to have a broad grounding in the prophetic message. In fact, the judgment-salvation pattern, so clearly exemplified in Jeremiah, is embedded deeply in the whole prophetic corpus. While only Jeremiah gives the name of “new covenant” to the decision of God to save out of and in spite of sin, (p 354)the theme is present in other prophetic books. Ezekiel, for example, also knows of the divine agency in replacing “the heart of stone” with “a heart of flesh” (Ezek. 11:19). (W. Dumbrell has shown how “new covenant,” properly understood, is a feature of the prophets in general.) Moreover, Jeremiah’s embodiment of the suffering of God is an important OT witness to the incarnation, and it has affinities with the Suffering Servant of the book of Isaiah. The primacy of God in the achievement of Israel’s ultimate salvation, therefore, is not a matter of doctrine only, but entails his personal, costly commitment to his purpose.

The pattern of judgment-salvation in Jeremiah is also present in Deuteronomy. That book too knows of a judgment inevitably consequent upon Israel’s stubbornness (Deut. 9:4–6; 30:1), and converts an exhortation to “circumcise your hearts” (Deut. 10:16; cf. the metaphor in Jer. 4:4) into a declaration that God himself will undertake to do this (30:6). While critical scholarship does not always recognize the historical priority of Deuteronomy over Jeremiah, the agreement of the two books on the pattern of salvation prohibits any simplistic antithesis between Law and Prophets in canonical terms. Therefore, in any explanation of the new covenant, the contrast between the law “written on stones” and “written on hearts” should not be absolutized into a categorical repudiation of Moses. A rhetorical aspect of the contrast should be recognized. The Law and the Prophets share an analysis of the human problem (persistence in sin), call for thoroughgoing moral and spiritual reconstruction (from the “heart”), and point to the grace of God, ultimately, as the source of reformation.

Jeremiah should also be placed in relation to the books of Kings. This is partly because there is material overlap between the two corpora (esp. in 2 Kings 25 and Jer. 52), reflecting the fact that both account for the same cataclysmic events in the history of Israel and Judah. In canonical terms, they tell the story of the covenant that is set up in Exodus–Deuteronomy, showing how the covenantal curses, threatened in Lev. 26 and Deut. 28, finally fall (Jer. 11:3–4; 2 Kings 17:19–20). While Kings knows that the exile of Judah will not be the end of the covenant between Israel and God (1 Kings 8:46–53), Jeremiah is more explicit on an actual restoration to its full blessings, especially in terms of return to the promised land. In this respect, Jeremiah echoes Deuteronomy more fully than Kings does (Deut. 30:3–5).

Finally, new covenant finds fulfillment in the NT. The Gospels attest to Jesus as fulfilling the “covenant” in his own blood (Mark 14:22–24; Matt. 26:26–28; cf. John 6:54). The sacrificial terminology in the context of a Passover meal comprehends Jesus’ covenant-fulfillment in relation to the Mosaic covenant. Some ancient texts insert the word “new” in the Synoptic accounts here, testifying to an understanding in the church that the covenant inaugurated by Jesus was in fact the new covenant. This understanding is found expressly in 1 Cor. 11:25 (cf. 10:16; Rom. 11:27); Heb. 8:8–13; 9:15; 10:16–17; 12:24.

The fundamental NT witness, therefore, is that Jesus fulfills the covenant with Israel. The adoption of the language of new covenant, especially in Hebrews, draws attention to the promise in Jeremiah (and behind it Deuteronomy) that God himself would act decisively to bring about the salvation that had always eluded his people because of their hardness of heart. The coming of Jesus is thus presented as the culmination of that “incarnational” trend, already visible in Hosea and Jeremiah, in which God commits himself, at cost, to the salvation of his people. Since Jeremiah’s new-covenant language should not be used to evacuate the Mosaic covenant of force or meaning, as if it were a failed experiment, so its adoption in Hebrews, being part of that book’s strong pattern of new replacing old, has a certain rhetorical aspect. “Fulfillment” and “abolition” are both tropes that, if pressed logically, can hardly be reconciled. Rather than postulating an “old” covenant abolished, it is better to think of a combined canonical witness to God’s resolve ultimately to make his covenant with humanity effective.

Jeremiah’s Theological Significance

Jeremiah tells a story that promises renewed salvation after judgment and names this as a new covenant, which, canonically, leads to fulfillment in God’s act of salvation through Christ. However, as a word to the church, it functions not merely as a story with a happy ending. While the story line in Jeremiah depicts the prophet's call to repent as something in the past that went unheeded, a reading of the book paradoxically continues to witness to the perennial need to return to God. The memorable "return [repent], faithless children" (3:14)—where "faithless" is shobabim, a play on shub, "return/repent"—ironically depicts the moral condition of those who are ever under God's call to obedience, while displaying a tendency at heart to strain in the opposite direction (p 355)(here Jeremiah is not far from Paul in Rom. 7:14–25). The structure of judgment-salvation, then, can be heard, not only as a once-for-all story leading to the triumph of Christ, but also as a portrayal of an ever-present possibility in God's dealings with people.

The book of Jeremiah helped its first readers to face an unmitigated calamity and come to terms with new acts of God. Its demolition of false objects of trust still speaks to those who have an unhealthy attachment to any particular form of "church," tradition, or any way of being religious that has become entrenched and comfortable. Judah's road to idolatry (Jer. 2) was strewn with the good intentions of much worship of Yahweh in his temple (7:1–15). Modern idolatries too may seem to cohabit easily with the form of religion.

Correspondingly, exile and restoration can call us to readiness for new ways of being in relationship with God. When false attachments are exposed for what they are, the way of faith can seem unsettlingly to lack familiar markers. Change can seem synonymous with chaos. In Jeremiah, salvation is both restoration of the old and exploration of the radically new. The return to land would be no mere recovery of the status quo ante; yet it was properly a restoration. The ambivalence is in the idea of "renewal" itself. Whatever shape the new might take, the same God leads and finds us there. With this reassurance we can sit lightly to religion as a familiar set of symbols, and find it again as the worship of God in spirit and truth.

Jeremiah uses "heart" metaphors to speak about this true religion (4:4; 31:33). The specific metaphors (involving circumcision, torah) are based, trenchantly, on elements in the religious tradition. With such language Jeremiah appeals for a loyalty and devotion of will and energies that run through the whole being. This prompts, finally, considerations about individual and community.

As we noticed, the appeal to the "heart" is not a mark of a turn to "individualistic" religion. Rather, in Jeremiah as in Deuteronomy (6:5), it calls for the thorough reformation and renewal of a whole community. There is thus no sanction here for the false polarities of individual versus community, or institutional versus spontaneous (notwithstanding the point about false attachments to institutional forms). Rather, Jeremiah calls the community of faith to be constantly renewed, in its breadth and depth.

What then of Jeremiah as the OT's greatest witness to an individual in communion with God? This individualism is precisely "prophetic." That is, Jeremiah demonstrates by his calling, ministry, and life how an individual can bear the responsibility for the burden of memory and obligation that belongs properly to the whole community. Jeremiah did not willingly choose the lonely path; it was laid on him by the people's abandonment of God, his own attachment to the "ancient paths" (Jer. 6:16), and God's call to him to be a prophet. He is thus not a model of individual piety as such. Rather, as a faithful Israelite, he proved equal to the challenge of standing against the powerful tide of his contemporary "modernity." That is his perennial challenge to believers, whatever form the temptation to compromise and apostasy might take in their time and place.

Bibliography

Carroll, R. P. Jeremiah. OTL. SCM, 1986; Clines, D., and D. Gunn. "Form, Occasion and Redaction in Jeremiah 20." ZAW 88 (1976): 390–409; Duhm, B. Das Buch Jeremia. Mohr, 1901; Dumbrell, W. Covenant and Creation. Paternoster, 1984; Hyatt, J. "The Deuteronomic Edition of Jeremiah." Vanderbilt Studies in the Humanities 1 (1951): 71–95; McConville, J. G. Judgment and Promise. Eisenbrauns, 1993; McKane, W. Jeremiah. Vol. 1, 1–25. Vol. 2, 26–52. ICC. T&T Clark, 1986–96; Mowinckel, S. Zur Komposition des Buches Jeremia. Jacob Dybwad, 1914; Nicholson, E. Preaching to the Exiles. Blackwell, 1970; Polk, T. The Prophetic Persona. JSOTSup 32. JSOT, 1984; Skinner, J. Prophecy and Religion. Cambridge University Press, 1922; Stulman, L. Order amid Chaos. The Biblical Seminar 57. Sheffield Academic Press, 1998; Unterman, J. From Repentance to Redemption. JSOTSup 54. JSOT, 1987.

J. G. McConville

Jesus, Quest for the Historical

The quest for the historical Jesus seeks to discover Jesus as he was in historical fact as distinct from portrayals of him—however factual or unfactual they may be or have been—in oral tradition, which has long since disappeared, and in early literature that has survived (above all, the canonical Gospels and, in recent study, the Gospel of Thomas). The quest is a modern phenomenon, dating from the eighteenth century onward. Up to that century and except for some who resorted to symbolical interpretations, it was generally assumed that at least the canonical Gospels, plus references to Jesus' earthly career elsewhere in the NT, contain historically accurate information, so that differences among them have only to be harmonized for a fuller picture. Underlying this assumption was a belief in the divine inspiration of Scripture (p 356) and a further, literary assumption that the canonical narratives about Jesus are meant to be taken as entirely factual. Otherwise and unthinkably, God would be lying through the Scripture. Since early accounts of Jesus contain a good deal of the miraculous, acceptance of supernaturalism accompanied this complex of historiographical assumptions and theological belief.

Theological and Philosophical Sources of the Quest

The advent of Deism and rationalism in the eighteenth century shook the foundations of the foregoing traditional view. In concert, Deism and rationalism denied the supernatural intervention of God in history. This denial entailed a rejection of historicity when it came to the accounts of Jesus' virgin birth, miracles, resurrection, ascension, and foreknowledge as the Son of God. Consequently, scholars set about picking and choosing what they thought to be historically acceptable as distinct from myth, folklore, and the like; or in the case of traditionalists, they set about defending historicity in toto. Thus began the quest for the historical Jesus, and it has continued to the present moment.

Effects of the Quest

The history of the quest has often been detailed (see esp. Schweitzer; Brown) and need not be repeated here except insofar as it has affected, and been affected by, theology. The deistic element in the quest—that is, the notion of God as an absentee landlord—led naturally to a wholesale rejection of the incarnation of God in Jesus Christ or, not so radically, to a redefining of Jesus' divinity less in terms of the hypostatic union and more in terms of a closeness to God that is true also of other human beings, though to a higher degree than in their case (so, e.g., Schleiermacher). Consequently, an appreciation of Jesus' humanity came to the fore, in contrast to an earlier emphasis on his deity. The appreciation of his humanity also spread to traditionalists, though they continued to maintain his full deity, but now in a more even balance with the humanity. Across the board, then, the historical Jesus looked more human than before, more rooted in the general human condition and in the particulars of first-century Palestinian geographical, social, political, and economic as well as religious conditions. Insofar as Jesus' deity is neither denied nor diminished and inasmuch as orthodox Christology affirms his humanity, this development counts as a theological plus.

Rationalism had a similarly mixed effect on the way ancient records of Jesus' life were evaluated. On the left hand, a critical eye discovered more and more differences among them—differences that fall into apparently redactional patterns and that to many scholars looked historically unharmonizable—so that the doctrine of scriptural inspiration suffered, as did also opinions regarding the historical reliability of the canonical Gospels even apart from miracle stories. On the right hand, some traditionalists were so convinced of already having the historical Jesus by way of factual reporting in every line of those records that they felt no need to join in the quest, only the need to offer rational harmonizations of reportorial differences. Yet others, however, kept hold of divine inspiration but allowed the differences to make them rethink the question of literary genre to the effect that a Gospel does not have to consist only of historical facts. It may also include unhistorical elaborations—christological, ethical, eschatological, and so on—inspired as such in equal measure with the historical reportage. Those who thought so joined the quest of the historical Jesus, but have come to considerably more positive results than the pure rationalists.

Jesus as Teacher. With the rejection or fading of the supernatural came an emphasis on the historical Jesus as a teacher of individual morality and then, too, of communitarian ethics (“the social gospel”). Meanwhile, the miracles of healing were explained away as psychosomatic, the exorcisms as mental therapy on the insane, and the nature miracles (such as the stilling of a storm) as coincidental (the storm just happened to abate at that moment) or mythological (deriving from OT portrayals of God as treading on the waters or from pagan stories of gods and heroes doing the same). Those parts of the Gospels, such as the Sermon on the Mount, that portray Jesus as a teacher thus came into prominence.

Jesus as Example. The Romantic movement laid weight on human experience, so that under its influence questers after the historical Jesus portrayed him as a human being who experienced God in a specially intimate way—thus as an example to be imitated as well as a teacher by whom to be instructed. His death ceased to be an atonement for sins and became more an example of self-sacrificial love for one’s neighbor. Theologians of Abelardian proclivity gravitated to this sort of historical Jesus.

The Mysterious Jesus. Experience can easily slide into mysticism. Hence, when mysticism (p 357) was combined with the strangeness to modern sensibilities of apocalyptic elements in scriptural portrayals of Jesus, it was only natural that Albert Schweitzer should describe the Jesus of history as so inscrutable that mystery (by no means a divine one, however) engulfs him. Therefore, the exemplary Jesus and the didactic Jesus took their exit just as the uniquely divine and redemptive Jesus had already done for the Deists, rationalists, and Romantics.

Jesus as Preacher. But a Jesus so shrouded in mystery as to be inscrutable can explain the historical phenomenon of early and continuing Christianity even less well than a moralistic teacher and example does. So emphasis shifted to the historical Jesus as a powerful preacher of God's kingdom and, more particularly, of God's claim on human beings in the crises of their everyday existence. This existential theology is often portrayed as uninterested in Jesus as he was in historical fact. Indeed, it focused more on the preached Jesus ("the Christ of faith") than on Jesus the preacher ("the Jesus of history") and drastically minimized the amount of historical factuality to be found in ancient sources, as in R. Bultmann's program of demythologization (shades of D. F. Strauss). Nevertheless, the slimmed-down Jesus was theologically designed to accommodate the distaste of "modern man" for the miraculous and other supernatural ingredients in the scriptural and traditional Jesuanic recipes. Yet at the same time it left some impression of the existential pungency of the historical Jesus' words (hence the designations "word theology" and "crisis theology").

The Kerygma and the New Quest

Such pungency seemed to require a Jesus who left historical memories of more robust proportions, however. So the Jesus of the early Christian kerygma (proclamation), as outlined especially by C. H. Dodd, T. W. Manson, and J. Jeremias (among others), acquired a few more historical features derived from the canonical Gospels. Then out of a theological fear that the demythologized Jesus had turned into a docetic Jesus, devoid of tangible humanity, or at least of very much of it, E. Käsemann—a Bultmannian—launched "The New Quest of the Historical Jesus." Skeptical presuppositions of a historiographical sort—for example, that any data about Jesus that tally with his Jewish heritage or with what Christians believed about him must be suspected as unhistorically projected into his life—kept this new quest from voyaging very far from the port of Docetism in its modern configuration.

The Third Quest

But discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls aroused a renewed interest in Jesus' Jewish heritage, so that similarities between him and this heritage came to be viewed with greater trust. By the same token, similarities between him and early Christian beliefs about him also came to be viewed with greater trust. This produced a measure of historical continuity from Judaism through Jesus to Christianity (the so-called "Third Quest of the Historical Jesus," though the division into three quests is itself historically suspect). Thus, Jesus came to be seen as a prophet who tried to reform Judaism in a movement of restoration through socioeconomic justice and nonviolence (so in various ways, E. P. Sanders, John P. Meier, and N. T. Wright, among others), or as an apocalypticist who announced the near and cataclysmic inbreaking of God's rule on earth (so Dale Allison Jr.). As a prophet, Jesus would have expected continuity between Jewish history and—given national repentance and obedient faith—the arrival of God's rule. As an apocalypticist, he would have expected a break between that history and the arrival of God's rule, a break marked by a literal coming of the Son of Man on the clouds of heaven (as opposed to a figurative coming at the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE) with an accompanying resurrection of the dead and the last judgment. In either case, because the attempt at reform mostly failed or because the fullness of God's rule did not arrive on time, his followers turned the historical Jesus into the founder of a new species of Judaism that rapidly developed into the church, with the heavenly exalted Christ at its head.

Interplay between Theology and Historiography

Theological predilections among early Christians produced different ways of portraying Jesus, whether as a prophet, an apocalypticist, a teacher of practical wisdom, a miracle-worker, a righteous sufferer, the Messiah, or God in human form. Modern theological predilections and animosities have fastened on this or that early portrayal of Jesus as historical at the expense of other such portrayals. This phenomenon has characterized the quest for the historical Jesus from its start; and despite repeated warnings concerning its prejudicial character, it continues to characterize the quest. Thus, for example, there are marriages (p 358) of theological convenience between two parties: One is a modern dislike of apocalyptic expectations for the future and a historical Jesus who only dealt in wise and witty observations about the present human condition (so the Jesus Seminar). The other is a modern concern for economic justice and a historical Jesus who only set about establishing egalitarianism among first-century Palestinian peasants (so liberation theology). Under the influence of postmodernism, particularly with its stress on differences between communities of faith, advocacy theology has exacerbated the tendency to look for Jesus in the well of history and see the reflection of one's own face, or the face of one's community. Thus, theological predilections unite with the desire for simplicity to produce caricatures of the historical Jesus, who in all likelihood was a figure of considerable complexity and to one degree or another fit all his canonical portrayals.

Rejection of Jesus' deity devolves into views of the historical

Jesus solely as a prophet, a teacher of wisdom, a charismatic holy man, a shaman, or even a magician. A nontheological history-of-religions approach also tends toward such views. A theological antipathy toward eschatology, which includes a doctrine of bodily resurrection, leads either to rejecting the historicity of Jesus' resurrection, or to redefining it in nonbodily terms and often putting it in a supposedly unhistorical category of eschatology, where it is not subject to historical investigation (against which, see Wright). A theological openness toward eschatology stems these tides; and, in reverse, the conflicting historical judgments affect theological positions.

Conclusion

All in all, then, the history of the quest for the historical Jesus exposes a symbiotic relation between theological positions and historiographical positions taken in the quest. Rejection of divine immanence and a dehistoricizing of the miraculous in Jesus' life feed each other. To the contrary, acceptance of divine immanence and trust in the historicity of the miraculous in Jesus' life feed each other. Full acceptance of Jesus' deity (so-called "Christology from above") undergirds the historicity of his predicting the passion-and-resurrection, the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and the second coming, while these predictions in turn support a belief in his deity. On the other hand, rejection of his deity—or a preponderant emphasis on his humanity (so-called "Christology from below")—feeds a dehistoricizing of the predictions and vice versa. At most it allows—in the cases of his passion and resurrection and the destruction of Jerusalem—for prediction by the power of natural human foresight.

Not that the historical Jesus always called on his divine omniscience. No, according to the canonical records he called on it only when necessary for the work of God's kingdom. Otherwise, he asked questions to gain information and used other ordinary means of learning. According to those same records, he similarly called on his divine omnipotence only when it was needed for the work of God's kingdom. Otherwise, he was subject to the same physical needs and limitations that all human beings are subject to. These two examples show how theology—in this case, a Christology of the divine and the human in the one person of Jesus—contributes to the historicity of biblical accounts concerning him, and how these accounts contribute to the Christology concerning him.

See also Biography; Gospels; History; Jesus Christ, Doctrine of

Bibliography

Braaten, C., and R. Harrisville, eds. The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ. Abingdon, 1964; Brown, C. Jesus in European Protestant Thought. 2d ed. Baker, 1988; Bultmann, R. Jesus and the Word. Charles Scribner's Sons, 1958; Dodd, C. H. The Apostolic Preaching and Its Development. Hodder & Stoughton, 1936; Green, J., and M. Turner, eds. Jesus of Nazareth, Lord and Christ. Eerdmans, 1994; Gundry, R. "Recent Investigations into the Literary Genre 'Gospel.'" Pages 97–114 in New Dimensions in New Testament Study, ed. R. Longenecker and M. Tenney. Zondervan, 1974; idem. "Reconstructing Jesus." Christianity Today 42, no. 5 (April 27, 1998): 76–79; Haight, R. "The Impact of Jesus Research on Christology." Louvain Studies 21 (1996): 216–28; Johnson, L. T. The Real Jesus. HarperSanFrancisco, 1996; Kähler, M. The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic, Biblical Christ. Fortress, 1964; Käsemann, E. "The Problem of the Historical Jesus." Pages 15–47 in Essays on New Testament Themes. Alec R. Allenson, 1964; Powell, M. A. Jesus as a Figure in History. Westminster John Knox, 1998; Robinson, J. M. A New Quest of the Historical Jesus. SCM, 1959; Schwarz, H. Christology. Eerdmans, 1998; Schweitzer, A. The Quest of the Historical Jesus. Macmillan, 1973; Sobrino, J. Jesus the Liberator. Orbis, 1993; Wright, N. T. The Resurrection of the Son of God. Fortress, 2003.

Robert H. Gundry

Jesus and Scripture

The phrase "Jesus and Scripture" suggests at least two separate studies: the relationship between the incarnate Word and the inscribed word, and the stance of the historical Jesus toward the Scriptures (p 359) of his own day. Generally, theologians have confined themselves to the first discussion, while biblical scholars have tackled the latter. They are so mutually informative, however, that it is difficult to determine which should be foundational. One could begin "inductively" with Jesus' own attitude toward the Tanak, and then go on to probe the relationship between the Son and Scripture as authorities. However, no such study "from below" is entirely successful without recourse to established traditions or decisions concerning, first, the person of Jesus, and second, the canonicity and accuracy of various Scriptures. The circle or spiral of hermeneutics is encountered wherever we enter, at the level of "history" or "theology"—if, indeed, pursuits of history and theology can ever be fully separated in a Christian enterprise. In this study, we begin with the theological question and then attempt to form a picture of Jesus' own pattern in approaching Holy Writ, as this emerges in the Gospels.

People of the Book; People of the Christ

Christians have been called one of the three "Peoples of the Book." This is, however, less true of Christianity than it is of Islam or Judaism (cf. Barton). Some have assumed that this is because Christians give priority to the (present personal) experience of God over the “written record of experience” from the past. It seems truer, however, to describe Christians as “People of the Christ” even more than they are “People of the Book.” Though much of “the Book” may have come chronologically before an understanding of “the Person,” it is to the personal Word, the Son, that we pay our homage; he is the one who illumines both those pages of the Book that have preceded and those that have followed his advent.

Thus, Paul argued that the entire purpose of the Torah was to point to the Christ; its glory was meant to be “set aside” (2 Cor. 3:7, 14 NRSV) so as to give way to his greater glory. Speaking of the first covenant people, he says, “To them belong the ... glory, the covenants, the giving of the law, the worship, and the promises; to them belong the patriarchs, and from them ... comes the Christ, who is over all!” (Rom. 9:4 NRSV). After the fall of the temple in 70 CE, the Jewish rabbis increasingly extolled the Torah; in Christian circles, that honor was given to the incarnate Word: what the rabbis said about the Torah, the apostles declared true of Jesus. The Book, as it was recognized in the Christian community, was seen to be gathered, Old and New Covenant/Testament, around the One who brings, enacts, and ratifies God’s promises. We thus call the Scriptures “the word” in a secondary sense, because in them we find a lifted curtain or “re-velation” of the One who is the Word, God-with-Us. But it is Jesus himself who reveals the triune God.

This relationship between the inscribed and incarnate Word is taught, implicitly and explicitly, in the Scriptures themselves. Mark 11:27–12:37 presents the question of authority chiastically, moving between Jesus as authority and Scripture as authoritative:

- A Jesus, in the temple, asked about authority; Jesus approved by crowd, 11:27–33
- B Rejecting God’s word, 12:1–12
- C Test 1: What does Torah say about taxes (Pharisees)? ? 12:13–17
- C’ Test 2: What does Torah say about resurrection (Sadducees)? 12:18–27
- B’ Heeding God’s word, 12:28–34
- A’ Jesus, in the temple, asks about authority; Jesus approved by crowd, 12:35–37

Throughout this section, the Gospel weaves together questions of right worship, understanding, and authority, implying a connection between monotheistic worship and the honor of the “Messiah-Lord,” and moving from a common deference toward Scriptures to a polarized reaction to Jesus’ teaching: “They were afraid”; others

“listened ... with delight” (12:12, 37). These same issues are tackled more directly in the Fourth Gospel. Jesus parries with the scribes: “You search the Scriptures because you believe that in them you possess eternal life: and it is they that are witness-bearers concerning me” (5:39 AT). Again, in Luke 14:24, to the friendly ears of his disciples, Jesus is heard to declare: “I tell you that many prophets ... desired to see what you see, but did not see it, and to hear what you hear, but did not hear it” (NRSV). The author to the Hebrews schematizes all this: “Long ago God spoke to our ancestors in many and various ways by the prophets, but in these last days he has spoken to us by the Son ... [who] sustains all things by his powerful word” (Heb. 1:1–3 NRSV).

Finally, in visionary mode, the seer John places before our eyes, at the climax of his visions, the Logos: “He has a name inscribed that no one knows but himself. He is clothed in a robe dipped in blood, and his name is called The Word of God” (Rev. 19:12 NRSV). Finally disclosed by the seer as the Logos with the sharp sword coming from his mouth, this One is identified with the Lion/Lamb, who earlier in Revelation displayed (p 360) unique power to unseal the scroll held in the hand of the Almighty (Rev. 5:1–10). The One who is the Word has jurisdiction and interpretative power over God’s word, and so creates, sustains, and explains all things. It is by him, indeed, that we know the mysterious unnameable One, for he it is who “exegetes” the Father (“has made him known,” exēgēsato, John 1:18) to those with ears and eyes made new.

For Christians, then, the Word is in the first place a Person. Because the Word is a Person and the Son has become human, true human words can be spoken and written, and so collected in the library that we call the Scriptures. Because the Word is a Person, the Word of God is not simply a record of experience, but active (Rom. 10:6–18), near to us, within our hearts, and renewing the world that the Son spoke into existence at the beginning. To understand the primacy of the personal Word may indeed assist in ecumenical debate regarding the manner in which the Scriptures are inspired, and the stance that Christians ought to take toward the written word. Careful reflection will prevent both the use of Jesus’ words to critique other scriptural words (as in “material criticism,” Sachkritik), and also a “bibliolatry” that confuses a certain theory of inspiration with worship of the One who has come among us. Jesus and the Scriptures are both authoritative; yet the latter is an authority because of and on behalf of the former. The One we adore; the other we honor because of that One who is all lovely. In the Scriptures, letters, words, sentences, precepts, propositions, and stories are dignified and pressed into service by that One who is God’s first, perfect, and ultimate Word. Again, they come into shape within the context of God's living people ("tradition"). Because of this, God's communication or communion with us is internal and mysterious, as well as transferable one to another. His goal is to make of us "letters," "written on our [corporate] heart" with his own "finger," the Holy Spirit of God (2 Cor. 3:2–18).

Jesus Reads the Scriptures

Thus, by the surprising design of God, we find ourselves in a position to ask that impudent question, "What was Jesus' attitude toward Scripture?" Perhaps it is inevitable that we will not fully understand how the master exegete saw and read the Scriptures. We are constrained, however, to ask these questions, for throughout the Scriptures we encounter Jesus' name and voice alongside references to Holy Writ. While it may be cheeky to speak about Jesus' attitude toward Scriptures, we can surely observe how the Gospels picture Jesus as reading, quoting, and using them.

Synoptic and Johannine studies, as well as the simple recognition that Jesus spoke in Aramaic, not in Greek (the language of the NT), demonstrate that we do not possess many of his ipsissima verba (actual words). No doubt the Gospel writers reflected issues of their own communities as they inscribed the oral traditions in which Jesus used Scripture. Many have tried to isolate what Jesus himself must have said from these later stages in which the faithful community adapted his handling of Scripture to suit their audience(s). Readers interested in this quest may dip into the bibliography below and make their own judgments regarding the various "hermeneutical keys" that have been used. Here we do not attempt a reconstruction but rather consider how Jesus' use of Scripture emerges from reading the Gospels as a whole. In this approach, we show confidence that the writers of the NT were stamped by the mark of the exegete Jesus, imitating his methods (perhaps from within the matrix of the earliest church, rather than directly at his feet), and so informing their own work by the stance that the Lord himself embodied.

History of Interpretation: What Constitutes a "Use of Scripture"?

Ought we to circumscribe our task by referring strictly to outright citations prefaced by formulas such as "as it is written" or "as Scripture says"? Some have done this, arguing that where the text calls attention to Scripture qua Scripture, the citations are more fundamental (e.g., Powery). Here is a major methodological problem: Are references to Scripture found on the lips of Jesus to be traced to the historical events, or are they the portraits of the early church or the Gospel writers? Again, we find a scholarly spectrum.

In adjudicating between the various views, the words of Nils Dahl are instructive:

In no case can any distinct separation be achieved between the genuine words of Jesus and the constructions of the community. We do not escape the fact that we know Jesus only as the disciples remembered him. Whoever thinks that the disciples completely misunderstood their Master or even consciously falsified his picture may give fantasy free reign. (94)

It seems best, then, to approach the study of Jesus' use of Scripture from within the context of an overall picture, seeking his authentic voice—whether this be found in direct reference, allusion, echo, or a cumulative teaching that emerges from combined texts and images. (p 361) Although there are functional differences between direct citations, indirect references/allusions, and “echoes” (cf. Hays), direct citations are not necessarily more significant than the less-obvious references. Direct citations may reach a broader audience, but indirect allusions strike a deeper chord. Direct citations call attention to the issue of authority, offering a kind of argumentative trump card; unsignaled references appeal to an acknowledged authority, creating a community of understanding (see Dimant 379–419; Allison). Think of the difference between a lecturer who quotes pedantically and a preacher who represents a beloved personality by echoing “I have a dream!”

Mode: Playful and Serious. In the Gospels, Jesus is depicted as using Scripture, positively and polemically, as a shield and a sword, in playfulness and with utter earnestness. In John 10:34, for example, Jesus engages in controversy over the relationship between humans, the Anointed One, and God, citing Ps. 82:6. Many assume that this passage tells us more about overt theological disagreements between first-century monotheists (Pharisaic versus Christian) than about Jesus. Yet his style is inimitable: pointed questions, allusive reference to Scripture, and the tantalizing “and the scripture cannot be annulled” (10:35 NRSV). Some have taken his phrase as programmatic (cf. Matt. 5:19; e.g., Kuyper), without commenting on the bizarre choice of Scripture and the parenthetical nature of his remark. Others have seen his comment as wholly ironic, descriptive of Pharisaic minute exegesis but not the Jesus way: so the scribes are hoisted on their own petard (Chilton).

There is another option: here Jesus both instructs and corrects, subtly calling the hearer to question what it really means to “break” or “annul” God’s Torah. Torah is not “broken” by healing on the Sabbath (John 5:18; 7:23) but by ignoring the shape of Torah’s narrative, and its climax in the One before them. Whether or not Jesus had such an overt discussion with his detractors concerning his status is a less important issue than the approach to Scripture—as a coherent whole that transformingly addresses a people (10:35) and that will culminate in God’s dramatic transforming action (v. 36). Here Jesus cites an unusual phrase, one that jolts his hearers into thinking about the purpose of God’s word.

Approach: Humility and Authority. This approach is consonant with the pattern found in a Synoptic Gospels debate (Matt. 22:23–33//Mark 12:18–27//Luke 20:27–40) variously related. Here Jesus tackles the disbelief of the Sadducees, humbly submitting to their “canonical” scruples in teaching about the resurrection. Though the Torah itself provides precious little direct teaching on the doctrine, Jesus finds help in the central passage “at the bush,” which calls attention to the living and life-giving nature of God. The readers understand the Scriptures when they come to recognize the “power of God” (Mark 12:24//Matt. 22:29): any other reading is limiting and simply “wrong.” The Scriptures can be read in an unfruitful manner, whenever they are not seen as providing a window onto the character of the living God. Jesus links the question about doctrine, as in John 10, with the nature of God’s power. Especially in Mark’s version of the debate, we see the same allusive and devastating interrogative style—this seems to be muted in Matthew and attenuated in Luke, though still discernible.

Use: Direct and Indirect. We have seen Jesus speak about the fruitful reading of Scripture, by citations both exact (“at the bush”) and inexact (a psalm is not “Law”). We conclude by considering a passage that offers both an allusion and an echo—Matt. 11:18–30. Wisdom has already been invoked in Matt. 11:19, making the allusions to Sir. 24:19 and 51:23–27 inescapable. Here Jesus speaks with the grace and generosity of personified Wisdom, offering rest, refreshment, humility, and a yoke to “all.” He embodies Wisdom, thus (in a style reminiscent of the parables) pointing to himself without engaging in self-assertion. The words function in the same way as his roundabout phrase “Son of Man,” intriguing the hungry hearer and offering rest to those who recognize the divine voice. In Sirach, it is the teacher who directs students to take on “Wisdom’s” yoke; here, Jesus calls, “Take my yoke.” It is up to the hearer to decide whether he is quoting Wisdom, simply offering Wisdom’s yoke on God’s behalf, or whether it is the special yoke of Jesus to which the listener is called. Who is the one who speaks? What and whose is the yoke promised? How is the carrying of burdens related to rest? The hearer is invited to “come and see.”

The Sirach allusion is nourished by echoes of Jer. 5:5, in which God’s yoke has been broken, and 6:16, where God himself offers counsel and rest for the soul. The one who comes, follows, and learns humility will be led to the Jesus of the cross, that one who bears burdens and alone can give the Sabbath rest of God. Again, an intriguing voice uses holy books in such a way as to make the hearers question their presuppositions and redirect their gaze toward the Author of life. Even sacred (p 362) books of dubious authority bend to his purpose, as Jesus with humble authority calls us to the central questions. His method, at once direct and indirect, bears fruit. The one who is concerned for God's yoke of Torah and free offer of Wisdom's feast, will find themselves at the feet of the one whose burden is light. All of Scripture—Torah, Prophets, Deuterocanonicals—accomplishes the purpose of the living God and directs us to the life-giving Word incarnate.

Method: Scripture Fulfilled in the Personal God. We can see that Jesus' method is to point us to the personal God. Ultimately, Jesus handles Scripture so as to illuminate God, to tell God's story, and thus, it seems, to testify (however indirectly) to himself. His skirmishes with the Sadducees indicate that Scripture can be read in an entirely wrong way. Hence, there are limits to hermeneutical freedom! However, his confidence in the word of God seems robust enough that he can use Scripture as a tool, engaging the readers even at their own limited levels. Brief "snapshots" or "still lives" of the Word may bring about life, for the inscribed Word echoes the enlivening Speaker. Though Jesus may have modeled rather than directly stated the relationship between himself and the scriptural story, the general tenor of the Gospels presents Jesus as reading the Torah in a consistent way: Torah (indeed the whole Hebrew Bible) "testifies" to the living God, and so also to him.

This theme of Scripture as "fulfilled" corresponds to Jesus' announcement that the reign of God has arrived. This fulfillment does not, however, point mainly to a subjective "experience" (pace Chilton 167), but to the person and activity of God, who shares his life with the new humanity. Because the person and activity of God cannot be tamed, Jesus frequently uses Scripture in surprising ways, thus bringing the reader up short. He is not entirely alone in this enterprise, for by the time of Jesus, Torah was interpreted through debate (cf. the Mishnah), through surprising attention to details of the text (pesherim), through stories creatively retold (midrashim), and through expanded paraphrase (targumim). As with other ancient interpreters of the written word, Jesus exegetes both to correct his hearers and to expand their horizons. Today, we would be remiss not to expect that Jesus' use of Scripture disturbs as well as confirms our human enterprises. Though we have approached his reading of Scripture in terms of drama and story, we must not squeeze the Master Storyteller into our own mold, insisting that he read Scripture according to our model, be that narrational or otherwise. It may be that the growing edge for our present faith community lies elsewhere, as we note Jesus using Scripture in an ironic, prescriptive, propositional, or concessive mode.

Throughout the Synoptics and John, in various strata and subgenres, clues point unmistakably to the conclusion that Jesus considered himself to be intimately connected with a new divine activity—a new exodus, a new yoked activity, a surprising turn (but also a fulfillment) to God’s ongoing dealings with humankind. The range of citations and several references to “Law and Prophets” suggest a certain shaping of the inscribed word, without a confinement of God’s Spirit—the texts deemed “apocryphal” can also be used, and Jesus can cheerfully use the restricted canon of Torah where this is necessary. Again, much evidence points to Jesus’ habitual use of the Aramaic paraphrases of Scripture (the targumim), which would have been readily understandable to his audience, rather than the Greek translations (LXX) or even the Hebrew (Evans 98; Chilton 57ff.) version of the OT. The revelation of Scripture, then, is translatable, not slavishly depending upon the “originals” or even always hampered by a restricted canon. The Scriptures are authoritative because they disclose the living God; they can, however, also be misread and misused. Here Jesus’ ironical use of Scripture must be acknowledged (cf. Mark 4:11–12: “lest they repent and be forgiven” [AT], citing Isa. 6:9–10).

The central strategy in the Gospels’ overall interpretation of the OT narrative seems to have been the bringing together of two traditional corporate figures—Suffering Servant (second half of Isaiah) and victorious Son of Man (Dan. 7)—as Jesus’ story and person are presented. Some interpreters have assumed that this was the activity of early-church exegetes. However, Jesus himself is the most obvious candidate for a striking move of this sort. As C. H. Dodd put it (in his classic on this subject):

Creative thinking is rarely done by committee.... To account for the beginning of this most original and fruitful process of rethinking the Old Testament we [find] need to postulate a creative mind. The Gospels offer us one. Are we compelled to reject the offer? (110)

Significance for Today

Our two intertwined themes—the incarnate and inscribed word, and Jesus’ approach to Scripture—are enormously important for the formation of God’s people. Because of God’s gifts to (p 363)us, we hold within our Christ-formed community the treasure of God’s word (2 Cor. 4:7). As such, we are living “arks of the covenant,” who contain not simply information nor a beguiling story, but the enlivening Word by Whom we enter the divine drama and live within it. The written word is prized because it points to the One who discloses God's very secrets to us. Entering into these mysteries means to be taught by the Jesus of Scripture how to approach, read, and deploy his word, so that we become, under his tutelage, scribes bringing out of the storehouse what is old and what is new, at the appropriate times (Matt. 13:52). To be trained by Jesus means that we will learn how to read the Scriptures in deadly earnest and with celebrative play, that we will model humility and bow to Christ's authority as we direct others to him in our reading of the word, and that we will dwell within the Scriptures daily so that they become a natural part of our allusive and indirect speech, as well as direct authorities to cite. Given the current challenges, we will not allow our concern for the authority of Scripture to become a new idolatry, so that we focus solely on a doctrine of inspiration, or on Christianity as a system. Rather, we will learn from our Lord, who read Scripture as a revelation of the personal and living God, culminating in his great act of taking humanity unto himself.

By a multitude of different words, conventions, and genres, we see before our eyes and hear within our ears news of that One who spoke worlds into existence, and who speaks the new creation into our startled ears. His glory shines in its pages, inscribed word and incarnate Word bound up together. Here is a great humility—that the One who is the Word could become an unspeaking infant. Here is, perhaps, an even greater humility—that the One who is the Word deigned to be inscribed within the written page, stamped upon the product of created vegetation, and made visible by design upon a humanly formed palimpsest. By his light we understand its enlightening words; by this light we approach the One who is the Light. The service of the written word toward us, God's people, is in itself a parable of our vulnerable, incarnate Lord, the Servant of all. See also Jewish Exegesis; Relationship between the Testaments; Targum; Word of God

Bibliography

Allison, D. The Intertextual Jesus. Trinity, 2000; Barton, J. People of the Book. Westminster John Knox, 1988; Boring, M. The Continuing Voice of Jesus. Westminster John Knox, 1991; Bultmann, R. History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh. Harper & Row, 1963; Chilton, B. A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible. Glazier, 1984; Dahl, N. A. "The Problem of the Historical Jesus." In Jesus the Christ, ed. D. Juel. Fortress, 1991; Dimant, D. "Use and Interpretation of Mikra in the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha." Pages 379–419 in Mikra, ed. M. Mulder. Van Gorcum, 1988; Dodd, C. H. According to the Scriptures. James Nisbet, 1952; Ellis, E. The Old Testament in Early Christianity. Mohr, 1991; Evans, C., ed. The

Interpretation of Scripture in Early Judaism and Christianity. Sheffield Academic Press, 2000; Fitzmyer, J. “The Use of Explicit OT Quotations in Qumran Literature and in the NT.” In Essays on the Semitic Background of the New Testament. Sources for Biblical Study. Scholars Press, 1971; France, R. T. Jesus and the Old Testament. Tyndale, 1971; Funk, R., R. Hoover, and the Jesus Seminar, eds. The Five Gospels. Macmillan, 1993; Hays, R. Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul. Yale University Press, 1989; Hooker, M. Jesus and the Servant. SPCK, 1959; Hoskyns, E. The Riddle of the New Testament. Faber & Faber, 1947; Juel, D. Messianic Exegesis. Fortress, 1988; Kimball, C. Jesus’s Exposition of the Old Testament in Luke’s Gospel. JSNTSup 94. Sheffield Academic Press, 1994; Kugel, J., and R. Greer. Early Biblical Interpretation. Westminster, 1986; Kuypers, L. The Scripture Unbroken. 1978; Moyise, S. The Old Testament in the New. Continuum, 2001; Powery, E. Jesus Reads Scripture. Biblical Interpretation Series 63. Brill, 2003; Vermes, G. Jesus the Jew. MacMillan, 1973; idem. The Religion of Jesus the Jew. Fortress, 1993; Wright, N. T. Jesus and the Victory of God. Fortress, 1996.

Edith M. Humphrey

Jesus Christ, Doctrine of

It is a Christian truism that Jesus Christ is central when reading the OT and NT as Scripture: he is their basic content, the Word of God; he gives them their form (in a certain sense, Old and New Testaments); he himself is the aim toward which their reading should be oriented. Such hermeneutical claims surface in diverse places—Luke 24; John 5; Rom. 10; Heb. 1; and so on. Many articles in this volume explore interpretative territory in that light, and more specifically in light of christological material: incarnation, atonement, ascension, Jesus as interpreter of Scripture, and other themes. Meanwhile, many find compelling the statement in John’s Gospel that if everything about Jesus were written down, “the whole world would not have room” (21:25). Hence, this essay pursues Christology from a more narrowly hermeneutical vantage point (and, to some degree, vice versa).

Christology’s Biblical Foundations

Christian faith has the roots of its storied history in Jewish monotheism. The basic pattern of biblical teaching about God starts with the Shema of Deut. 6:4: “Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, (p 364)the LORD is one.” What are Christians to make of their worshipping Jesus Christ in view of such OT teaching—the Bible as the early Christians knew it? This remains the perennial question for our faith, especially if we build on the biblical metaphor of Jesus Christ as its foundation (Matt. 7:24–27; 1 Cor. 3:10–17).

How then should we gather biblical materials for christological construction? A popular approach in the past few decades has been to survey the NT titles for Jesus; we then consider NT proclamations of salvation via biblical theology with reference to Christ.

Titles of Christ. “Son of Man,” it seems, was Jesus’ favorite self-designation. While in the OT this preeminently designates humanity, the Gospels associate it with the entire scope of the Christ-narrative: his service on earth, suffering and death, and exaltation to eschatological glory. By naming himself the Son of Man, Jesus seems to have claimed a messianic role and dignity, avoiding the political hazards of the term “Messiah” while nevertheless acknowledging his mission’s supernatural origin and character in some fashion. The latter point remains controversial, especially in tandem with the interpretation of Dan. 7. However, some kind of divine identity may lie in the background. This would legitimate taking the honorific language of Pss. 2 and 110, “whereby Israel’s anointed king was thought of as God’s son seated at God’s right hand,” to a new level of significance with respect to Jesus’ relation to Israel’s God (C. A. Evans 32, in Davis et al., Trinity, unfolding various reasons for this).

“Son of God” is not recorded as Jesus’ own term, but is a favorite of the Epistles, wherein sometimes it may refer to his preexistence. In the Gospels its emphasis is Jesus’ supernatural power over the spirit world (e.g., Mark 3:11; 5:7). Likewise, “Lord [kyrios]” does not predominate in the Gospels; it was probably a form of respectful address (perhaps akin to “sir”) while Jesus was on earth. After his resurrection and ascension, however, its use as the Greek equivalent of the OT Yahweh becomes significant. A famously crucial instance is Phil. 2:9–11, where Paul uses this name to identify Jesus with Israel’s covenant God—in shocking fulfillment of a strong monotheistic text, Isa. 45:21–24. The exaltation of a human being to share in what was, and is now fully revealed to be, Yahweh’s identity was a remarkable claim (and a political one, too, according to recent emphases regarding such titles vis-à-vis the imperial cult).

John’s Gospel, of course, also identifies Jesus with Yahweh, in particular via repeated “I AM” sayings (cf. Exod. 3:14). The name becomes Jesus’ self-identification, often followed by various appellations that link him to the roles of Israel’s God: light, shepherd, true vine, and so on. John also identifies Jesus Christ with the Logos, the divine Word, in which the universe has its beginning and structure.

Long debates persist in biblical theology over the existence and coherence of an “orthodox” conceptual substructure underlying these titles. “Christ,” or “Messiah [anointed one],” may illustrate this matter. In the OT, anointing simply designates a divinely ordained office within the Israelite theocracy. Although the idea of a particular person fulfilling the role of Davidic king, overthrowing the Romans, and ushering in Yahweh's kingdom was present within first-century Judaism, messianic conceptions were not monolithic. There were skeptics, corporate notions of Israel having a messianic vocation, and various proposals on offer for the renewal of the nation and its full return from exile.

“Messiah” is usually a title in the Synoptic Gospels, where it is only occasionally Jesus' claim (e.g., Mark 14:61–65); moreover, defending that biblical portrayal of his self-attestation to a historian's satisfaction has been somewhat challenging. In any case, the divine identity with which the Gospels associate Christ is not simplistically that of the later creeds (on which, see below). Eventually, however, “Christ” became so associated with Jesus' identity as to tend toward a proper name (e.g., at points in Acts and Paul).

Surrounding biblical theology's struggle with the significance of titles for Jesus Christ, then, two stresses especially have caused vulnerability. (1) The relation of OT and NT and (2) the identification of God in and between those texts receive further treatment below regarding the (perceived) modern collapse of the Christian story's integrity. Meanwhile, we may address a third biblical-theological concern here: the Christologies implied in NT proclamations of salvation. Indeed, the traditional distinction between the “person” and “work” of Christ is quite tenuous or even unhelpful in light of biblical theology; at minimum, the distinction must not become a division. The Bible generally keeps “act” and “being” tightly together.

Proclamations of Salvation. The Synoptic Gospels present Jesus as the bearer of God's kingdom in his person, words, and work. But they do so with variety. Matthew's Jesus comes to save his (p 365) people from their sins, in a manner especially concerned with functional righteousness—theirs must exceed that of the Pharisees as they learn from the authoritative Teacher what is really crucial for fulfilling Torah. Matthew's Jewish Christians must become people of universal mission, concerned with extending to others the mercy, forgiveness, and healing they have received from God. Mark's Gospel, meanwhile, is action-packed, with Jesus not only teaching but also healing, exorcising demons, and suffering—all the while deflecting attention to Israel's God, whose fulfillment of the Isaianic new exodus has begun, and with it a drama of decision for discipleship. The somewhat cosmopolitan two-volume Luke-Acts too, then, develops considerable Jewish material and emphasizes some of these themes. But Luke's prophetic Jesus has now poured out his Spirit upon a new community, through whom he powerfully continues his work—unhindered, as the last word of Acts emphasizes (Greek/NRSV), despite both internal and external challenges. These Gospels narrate a Jesus whose relationship with Israel's God as Father (e.g., Matt. 6–7) and dependence upon the Spirit (e.g., Matt. 4; Luke 4) are singular—as his resurrection ultimately vindicates—but also paradigmatic for the followers who, given a new form of his presence, will spread his life's work.

That empowering presence of the Spirit of Christ leads us to Paul. If there is a “center” of Pauline theology, then union with or participation in Christ might be the strongest candidate. The baptized drink of the Spirit, whom Jesus outpoured and by whom they are covenanted together as one community, continuing to partake of their nourishing source and to proclaim their unity. Christ and his Spirit may be distinguished but never separated in Paul, and this surely gives us an incipient form of the conceptual apparatus for later trinitarian theology (so Fee, e.g., in Davis et al., Trinity; Davis et al., Incarnation).

The Johannine Jesus is yet more strongly divine and human—both. He is the Light in whom there is Life, who abundantly illuminates his people already by the Spirit. However extensive its differences from the Johannine writings, the book of Revelation likewise portrays Jesus with both a human and a heavenly face. The Lion of Judah is, of course, paradoxically the slain Lamb, and in this way his people, paradoxically, overcome the world.

So also in other Epistles, especially 1 Peter, the suffering service of Jesus Christ not only accomplishes God's triumph over evil powers and the liberation of his people, but also establishes the pattern for their resistance. Theological interpreters must be careful not to advocate a christological paradigm of passive quietism that further subjugates the victim; instead, they must clarify that Jesus' suffering constitutes active struggle against the devil, sin, and death—as may ours. Some have suggested a contrast in 2 Peter and Jude, where focus on the power of the cross gives way to emphasis on future divine judgment. Christ is the Master of believers, but the Judge of people outside his household. What balances this is the OT truth that “judgment ... begin[s] with the household of God” (1 Pet. 4:17 NRSV). Thus, eschatologically oriented Christology becomes an incentive for Christian virtue—ultimately love (2 Pet. 1), which must be extended even or especially to all whom Christ's community might turn away from pagan immorality (Jude).

The Christology of James is even more indirect, while his concerns are again bound up with communal virtue. Yet God's protective judgment on behalf of the suffering and an implied christological opposition to violence (even or especially verbal violence!) remain evident. Also, for an audience with some Jewish background, Hebrews addresses suffering and communal life. Jesus' suffering richly fulfills Lev. 16: His sacrifice was public and once-for-all. Yet he has triumphantly ascended to the heavenly sanctuary as high priest, where he continually intercedes for us. And he will eventually return to the people and announce forgiveness finished. Metaphors of Jesus as sacrifice and as priest are mixed, to care for all the dynamics of human consciences—both past and postbaptismal sins—in a way that the OT system could not decisively accomplish. Hebrews is replete with typological use of the OT regarding the person and work of Christ, and it is perhaps no coincidence to find there some of the NT's strongest language for both Jesus' preexistent sonship and adoption into sonship.

In short, the NT seems to play out two OT trajectories—the prophetic Servant or Son of Man, and the royal Son of David or Son of God—in identifying Jesus with the anticipated revelation of the Creator Yahweh in redeeming Israel. This foundation put in place a structure for centuries of Christian thought, life, and worship. But did the church build with wood, hay, and stubble; or with gold, silver, and precious stones?

Christology's Traditional Building Blocks

Patristic and early medieval developments are often narrated with reference to successive intellectual (p 366) environments (Alexandria and Antioch) and the major heresies, which elicited controversy along with (sometimes) creedal consensus. The christological essentials that emerged are chiefly three: Jesus Christ is fully human but also fully the divine Son of God, and these two “natures” are united in one “person” (the “hypostatic union”), though their properties remain appropriately distinct.

Ebionism, for which source material is scant, was probably the earliest post-NT tendency that was deemed heretical. Apparently growing out of Jewish Christianity and perhaps those dubbed “Judaizers” by Paul, Ebionites saw Jesus as a unique human, as the Christ (for a time, anyway) but not divine. They held a form of “adoptionism,” in which the human Jesus was assumed into a role within the divine plan. This will, perhaps, be a characteristic temptation of those who take seriously interaction with the OT, the historical Jesus, and Judaism, in their own right.

Alexandrian “Word-Flesh” Christology. As the gospel continued to gain influence in (and be influenced by) the broader Greco-Roman world, Alexandria became an important center of Christian reflection. Alexandrian or “Word-flesh” Christology prioritized the mystical Christ over the historical Jesus (as we think of it now), concerned chiefly with the possibilities of union between the divine Logos and human flesh. Tending toward some form of Platonic dualism between body and soul, material and immaterial, and so on, this approach emphasizes the unity of Christ—at the extreme, a single divinized person to the expense of his human integrity. Such was the environment from the third century on through the ratification and extension of the Nicene Creed (originally developed in 325) at Constantinople in 381.

Docetism, then, names a family of heresies that lost the reality of Christ's humanity in the second and third centuries, protecting the divine from suffering or change. For instance, a sharp distinction was made between Jesus and the Christ (Cerinthus), or it was suggested that Jesus the Christ only appeared to be human (Marcion). In either case, the specter of "patripassianism" (the idea that God directly suffered on the cross) loomed, against which Tertullian notably contended. Meanwhile, Irenaeus led the charge against "gnostic" elements that Docetism reflected. The hermeneutic behind such movements will be manifest more indirectly today. Yet, one might argue that transpositions of passages about Jesus Christ into some more abstract "divine" reality—opened via some philosophical or cultural key—are perennial, as demonstrated by defenses of Gnosticism among some mainline Christians, and de facto Gnosticism among some conservatives.

In the fourth century, Arianism erred on the Ebionite side, although in a rather subtle and often compelling way. Saying that Jesus Christ was the Son of God, Arius nevertheless seemed to say that he was the first (and only a) creature. "There was a time when he was not"; hence, Arianism denied the self-existence and eternity of the Son, thereby contending that he was homoiousios (of similar substance) but not homoousios (of one or the same being, the eventual orthodox formulation) with God the Father. Arius's Christ protected the grandeur of God by, in the end, being nothing more than a mediating creature. Hermeneutical temptations here include again protecting the humanity of the Son in salvation, but more subtly adopting a philosopher's God, with whom the Logos could not be in the beginning.

Athanasius, exiled five times as the church's imperial battle raged back and forth, is the orthodox hero in vanquishing Arianism. For him, the incarnation of the Son was vital because of a theiōsis soteriology: God must take on the human substance in order to communicate divine being to humanity. Salvation is a matter of sharing in the power of the risen immortal Christ, not simply a sophisticated human ascent. It might be said that Athanasius's Christology was as “Word-flesh” as Arius’s; because of soteriology Athanasius affirmed the divinity of this Word, while Arius did not. Accordingly, a heresy naturally emerged on the other side. Apollinarianism saw the incarnation as the Logos replacing the human mind or will of Jesus Christ—in a sense, a form of monophysite (or, one-nature) Christology. The hermeneutical struggle is subtle, for biblical passages do not directly specify when they are speaking of “person” or “nature,” or that to which such terms refer.

Antiochene “Word-Man” Christology. By contrast to Alexandria, Antioch would approach Christology more “from below” than “from above.” Its hermeneutics were less allegorical and more literal (not in a constricted modern sense but in a richly canonical, typological, or figural sense). More Aristotelian in character, “Antiochene” or “Word-man” thinking saw a necessary connection between body and soul; God would be understood through and not apart from the world, so that the human Jesus was necessary for knowing the divine Logos. Theodore of Mopsuestia popularized the Cappadocian dictum that “what is not (p 367) assumed is not redeemed”—the Logos must have a human mind or will instead of replacing it.

Once the full divinity and humanity of Jesus Christ had been reaffirmed in 381, Antiochene ascendancy naturally raised the question of their relationship. Although the sources are scant and complex here as well, Nestorianism took the Antiochene extreme. Asked to rule on whether it was suitable to call Mary Theotokos (God-bearer), Nestorius demurred, worrying that it would imply either Arian or Apollinarian errors. But his position seemed adoptionist, de facto separating the two natures so that they formed only a moral but not an ontological union. As an extreme reaction, then, Eutychianism initiated a new monophysitism, in which the one nature was a sort of tertium quid that blended divine and human.

Chalcedon and the Later Middle Ages. Drawing heavily on Tertullian and the Eastern leader Cyril of Alexandria, Leo the Bishop of Rome produced his “Tome,” a doctrinal letter that substantially informed the Definition of Chalcedon in 451. Chalcedonian Christology became basically the orthodox solution, although monophysite groups in the East (and some Nestorians) have continued to object. Chalcedon’s solution was a sort of hermeneutical rule, drawing boundaries outside which the church might not go: the two natures were reaffirmed, and their union in one hypostasis without confusion (contra Eutychianism), separation (contra Nestorianism), and so on. The incarnation reveals but does not change the essence of what it means to be God or human.

Subsequently, monothelitism (the view that Jesus Christ had only one will) would be condemned (at Constantinople in 680). The coherence of trinitarian and christological dogma would be explored with ever-increasing analytic clarity, or speculation, depending on one's point of view. Thomas Aquinas is an intriguing later medieval figure, not only for the paradigmatic influence of his Summa, but also in view of his increased attention to Christ's humanity. Forms of Christ-devotion were ever more burgeoning, and in the West these forms often attended to the human vulnerability of Jesus in new ways (Williams, in Bockmuehl). He was simultaneously a terrifying Judge and a petitioner for sympathy. The earlier and Eastern emphasis on adoration of the cosmic Lord shifted in the West to the eucharistic host. This time period teaches us to pay attention to various kinds of texts, and indeed the variety of media and contexts in which Jesus Christ is rendered; such devotion expresses and may shape theological interpretation.

The Reformation. The Eucharist, in fact, became the center of christological controversy with the rise of the Protestant Reformation. Luther probably saw himself doing nothing new, except recovering a more biblical focus on Christ as God's justifying Word. Still, Philipp Melanchthon's Lutheran dictum "To know Christ is to know his benefits" would, transmogrified variously and in concert with "quests for the historical Jesus" (discussed elsewhere), shape the modern age decisively, as exemplified in Friedrich Schleiermacher and Rudolf Bultmann (Tanner).

The Eucharist debate among the Reformers remains instructive, however. Luther eschewed what he saw as the crudity of "transubstantiation" in Roman Catholicism, along with the excessive speculation of scholasticism's "theology of glory," which retained the dignity of the philosophers' terrifying God in place of the radically self-giving God revealed in Jesus ("theology of the cross"). Yet Luther also retained a bodily presence of Christ "in, with, and under" the sacramental elements, not only based on a "literal" reading of John 6 and "This is my body," but also because he perceived the alternatives to be Nestorian. On his understanding of orthodoxy's communicatio idiomatum ("communication of attributes" or "properties"), the human nature of Jesus must share in the divine ubiquity; for Zwingli to insist that Christ's body was only present in heaven was a heretical division of the natures of the God-man.

John Calvin's effort at a mediating position remains complex. The Reformed tradition generally has taken the communicatio idiomatum to occur at the level of the person rather than between the natures. Calvin argued against the Lutheran line regarding what literal exegesis of “This is my body” must conclude; regarding biblical texts concerning heaven, divine omnipresence, and their relation to the human; and regarding what view of the Eucharist would be adequately trinitarian, taking the humanity of Christ and a distinct role for the Holy Spirit seriously enough. In the so-called “Extracalvinisticum” he affirmed with Augustine and other forebears that the Second Person of the Godhead remained omnipresent even while incarnate, whether on earth or in heaven.

Calvin also took up from predecessors Christ’s threefold office of Prophet, Priest, and King, which has remained influential (see Wainwright’s exposition). The foundation he thought was biblical: these were the anointed OT offices that the (p 368) Messiah would fulfill—proclaiming the divine Word of wisdom to us, gaining divine favor for us, and strengthening us for eternal victory over evil.

Hermeneutically, the Reformers probably saw themselves as producing kerygmatic and biblical-theological Christologies more than strongly systematic Christologies. Still, for all their commitment to sola scriptura and concern about scholastic speculation, they could not avoid logical struggles and appeal to traditional formulations. The Christ-narrative was primary but provoked discussions of necessity, of traditional but biblically tricky items such as the descent into hell, and so on. Karl Barth may add another lesson here: he placed Luther in a line of Johannine emphasis running toward Eutyches, with Calvin following the Synoptic Gospels’ focus that heads toward Nestorius (CD I/2:24). Accused at points of erring on both sides, Barth felt we must instead pursue a strategy of “juxtaposition” regarding the two approaches, opting to balance them in the long run rather than trying to say the whole truth all at once.

Modern Collapse of Scripture’s Christ-Narrative

As hinted earlier, the modern age pressured the “incarnational narrative” both historically and hermeneutically. Rising historical consciousness, embedded in certain philosophical commitments, provoked doubt over the Bible’s supernatural claims. Beyond challenges between OT and NT, and within the NT regarding the identity of Jesus Christ in relation to God, incoherence was alleged between the biblical witnesses and the orthodox creeds (e.g., Harnack’s legacy).

The response of “liberal” (ever a slippery term) forms of Christianity was generally to accept significant reductions in the historical truth status of the biblical story. Hans Frei has generalized that the early modern English were more willing to deny straightforwardly the Bible’s christological narrative, whereas the Germans tended more piously to salvage its truth by understanding its meaning in an alternative conceptual scheme. Jesus has therefore been a great moral teacher, a supreme example of religious consciousness, more recently an egalitarian revolutionary, etc.

Meanwhile, grossly oversimplifying, we may develop two basic lines of response among the confessionally orthodox. Responding with “Nein!” to modern religion, Barth returned the biblical Jesus Christ to the center of dogmatics—to some extent, a revolution in theological content for liberals and conservatives alike. Barth sought a revolution in form as well, suffusing his dogmatics with Christology throughout rather than treating it primarily in a few distinct or even isolated sections. A unique interweaving of reconciliation (his most basic soteriological category) and revelation (the modern preoccupation) was crucial to this, and the architecture of Church Dogmatics IV on reconciliation is striking. For example, in his strategy of juxtaposition, Barth tied obedience to the Son of God, exaltation to the Son of Man, and glory to his mediatorial role. The latter refers to narrative identification of the divine and human with/in the concrete person named Jesus Christ, not to a sphere of distinct action such as the other two. That concrete person or “mode of being” is also the revelation per se of “God himself.” A singular convergence between God’s act and triune being comes in the doctrine of election: in Jesus Christ (as both the electing God, and the elected and rejected human) God has constituted himself as being always for us. Much of Barth’s most interesting christological exegesis may be found in that discussion.

While appreciative, Wolfhart Pannenberg has worried with Dietrich Bonhoeffer about Barth’s “revelatory positivism.” Pannenberg has attempted a new understanding of history in which its meaning is only finalized eschatologically, but Christ’s resurrection proleptically enables a certain confidence. Criticizing modern notions that exclude the Christian faith, he has constructed a Christology “from below” that ends up with the creedal Jesus as the Son of God. Emphasis on public historical argument may also be found in the work of biblical scholars such as N. T. Wright, who has learned enough philosophy of history to address the possibilities of “quests for the historical Jesus” theologically. Most recently he has made an argument for the resurrection’s high probability, once Jesus is set in the context of first-century Judaism and the development of the early church. By contrast, many have continued in Barth’s legacy, especially as extended by Frei, with an emphasis on literary study of how the Gospels identify Jesus Christ, and then on kerygmatic presentation. Others appreciate elements of both strategies and create a variety of nuances along the spectrum.

The Hermeneutics of Contemporary Reconstructions

As we sift through the rubble of postmodern Christologies, perhaps surprisingly we find treasures new and old—possibly even a solid foundation (p 369) standing firm. Three queries about the legacy of Chalcedon offer a way to organize efforts at reconstruction.

(How) Can We Accept Chalcedon's Content? For some Christians, and surely for Western culture at large, the legacy of Chalcedonian Christology remains incredible. Even if the challenges were adequately addressed regarding its supernatural claims, there would still be the apparent philosophical impossibility of these two natures being united in one person, and the temptation of psychological inquiry into what must have been the consciousness of one living such a life. The former continues to receive sophisticated treatment (surveyed, e.g., by C. S. Evans, in Davis et al., Incarnation), with “two-minds” or modified “kenotic” Christologies being the most promising alternatives to paradox. Psychology probably influenced the popularity of process-oriented Christologies for a time (e.g., Macquarrie), but the hermeneutical question remains: To what extent can views claim to be faithfully Chalcedonian if they somewhat vaguely aim to fulfill its “governing intention” only?

In a sophisticated treatment of christological models and methodologies, John McIntyre reflects on that question. He rejects not only the more original “anhypostatic” framework that Chalcedon implied (in which the Son’s human nature is without hypostasis, or impersonal—to avoid adoptionism and the like), but also the subsequent “enhypostatic” framework in which Leontius of Byzantium stated a similar point (the Son’s human nature is personal not independently but in the divine person of the Logos). In light of perceived philosophical and psychological problems for the Son’s full humanity, McIntyre argues for an ontological union of divine and human hypostases. He nobly attempts to avoid Nestorianism, but most will have their doubts: should personhood be thought first from the human to the divine, or vice versa? And in any case, is not “person” something Jesus Christ “is,” instead of something one “has” (“personality”; tied to “nature”)? If the communicatio idiomatum is the essential point of the Chalcedonian solution (so Weinandy), and if enhypostatic Christology is ingredient to it, then our options seem limited.

The communication of properties is not an unambiguous hermeneutical rule (as the Reformers testify); indeed, “person” and “nature” are feeble categories with which we talk about the grammar of the biblical story, which is tied to the name Jesus Christ. There are passages hinting at two aspects of his reality (e.g., Phil. 2)—but divinity and humanity are secondary abstractions regarding this singular primary being. We cannot apply preconceived notions to our Lord or to passages about him, so much as use such categories post facto for describing the mystery of the incarnation.

(How) Can We Adopt Chalcedon's Categories? What then of Chalcedon's dependence upon substance metaphysics? This relates again to the nature of its claims—and of our own pursuit of truth.

Chalcedon's boundary language—"without ..."—regarding substances seems static compared to the dynamism of the Gospel narrative. Are these boundaries only analytical—grammatical and hermeneutical—but not metaphysical? Some seize on this issue and take the point further, turning incarnation solely into metaphor; others in a backlash take Chalcedon's language to be straightforwardly literal. Having surveyed these contemporary options, Sarah Coakley suggests instead that Chalcedon is riddle-like, using negatives to point out a horizon of Christian vision while distancing the incarnation from conceptual grasp (in Davis et al., Trinity).

In other words, Chalcedon makes metaphysical claims according to a certain theological (rather than post-Kantian) apophatic approach that preserves the divine mystery. Linguistic rules have great value within such an approach. Thus we may fulfill "the law of prayer is the law of faith"—an early church slogan that suggested not only salvation, but also worship, is at stake in Christology.

Recent work on early Christianity has shown how fitting are these rules. Yeago has countered Dunn's representative claims about Paul having a nonincarnational Christology (in contrast to John), by showing that the differences deal with conceptual expression; the underlying theological judgments are similar. Paul's use of Isaiah in Phil. 2:6–11 is a test case in which, with hermeneutical precision about the proper role of concepts vis-à-vis judgments, the conclusions of the Nicene Creed biblically follow.

Moreover, Bauckham counters the widely held scholarly narrative of Jesus Christ's ascent to Hellenistic divinity in the creeds, via intermediate steps, through Jewish angelomorphic or exalted-patriarch Christologies. He replaces the usual disjunction between "ontic" (being) and "functional" (act) Christologies with the Jewish distinction between who may and may not be worshipped: principal angels and exalted patriarchs never properly receive worship, according to (p 370) almost all first-century Jewish literature. Yahweh alone may be worshipped, and this divine identity is tied to three actions: creation, sovereign rule, and the redemption by which that rule is extended over the whole creation. Again, Isaiah is crucial, anticipating that the Servant of the new creation/exodus will be constitutive for more fully revealing the identity of Yahweh himself. Paul rightly reads the fulfillment of this trajectory to be Jesus Christ the incarnate, resurrected Lord. Bauckham illustrates that narrative christological thinking will continue to raise questions about the traditional divine attributes such as impassibility—although the answers may surprise us if we are respectful of classic incarnational doctrine (so, e.g., Weinandy).

It is intriguing to what extent Chalcedon's approach to theological categories might have broader use. Parallels between the divinity and humanity of Christ, and the doctrine of Scripture, are discussed elsewhere—as are models of christological or trinitarian oneness and multiplicity with reference to other doctrines. The doctrine of God might be especially connected to Christology in the form of its categories—the incarnation is surely singular but also revealing (!) about the relations between God and world, divine act and being, various divine attributes, and the like. This may entail a certain reserve about using models that positively “solve” problems in the doctrine of God, versus instead negating errors and narrating the mystery of salvation so as to make space for proper worship. Christology may teach us a hermeneutic both rigorous and apophatic. In any case, focus on the interconnections between worship and salvation not only brings patristic seeds of theological exegesis back into bloom. It also has borne historical fruit—being broadly consistent with, for example, the recent work of Hurtado on early Christ-devotion in the context of Jewish monotheism.

(How) Can Chalcedon Go Global? Christ-devotion is, of course, burgeoning throughout much of the world and in particular in the global South. Western theological interpreters who neglect the resulting christological harvest shall be malnourished (for survey and some bibliography, see Kärkkäinen); after all, both the junk food and what is healthy, savory fare from the West are themselves local theologies!

To be sure, there are challenges in relating some global Christologies to biblical expressions. In particular, models of atonement are increasingly contested, along with the propriety of problem-to-solution connections between Christology and soteriology—doctrinal constants that have seemed essential to the biblical narrative until the “New Perspective on Paul” and the plurality of postmodern communities and concerns (Lowe).

However, such melting-pot or mixing-bowl questions have been asked first and foremost of the Bible itself! Following Chalcedon, and associated efforts that protect the mystery of worship and the narrative of salvation with some agreed-upon Christian language, promotes doctrinal freedom within parameters for the variety of local witness. Such a model for theological exegesis will be increasingly important in a world of religiously plural reactions to Jesus (for samples of which, see Ford and Higton). Biblical fidelity and freedom connect when “the law of prayer is the law of faith,” while we also maintain “what is not assumed is not redeemed.” Global concerns support Wright’s mission “to get the question of Jesus back on the agenda when people are talking about Christology” (Wright 49, in Davis et al., Incarnation). Liberationists especially have insisted that Jesus’ humanity—when this uniquely Christian story of God is taken seriously—forces open Western enclaves while grounding and connecting local projects (for historical examples of the theological point, see Walls).

Attending to the human and the historically particular, as required by Christology, requires accordingly that Christology be developed with attention to the full array of biblical materials. Christological hermeneutics should not substitute generalizations about the form of other subjects for the content of the Bible regarding Jesus Christ and his meaning for those subjects. The biblical story is, for example, strikingly political, but not by way of a generic “incarnational” theme. Instead, we must be humbled by a theology of the cross, face the demand implied by naming him “Lord” in baptism, and so on. Nor is the cross a principle to be wielded by human reason or winsome to cultural sensibilities (1 Cor. 1–2) about advocacy groups; we must have hermeneutics that accept its scandalous biblical particularity.

In Christ, then, theological interpretation connects to both worship and salvation. For the sonship and servanthood that are such prominent christological themes in the Bible connect us to Jesus in faith by way of testing (Moberly). He is Yahweh, condescending to forgive our failure and singularly fulfill the human vocation, but he is again and ultimately forming a people that will live according to his human pattern. Christ is therefore the meeting point in which our interpretations (p 371) can be acts of humble adoration (wherein we participate in adoration of the Father with him; so Torrance), yet also human acts—seeking faithful understanding. Whether or how we might have our eyes opened, in childlike faith (on which Thompson reflects) to recognize Jesus, itself tests us—even as Christ himself meets us in this too (Moberly). Hence, Luke 24 has been a pinnacle of recent reflection on theological interpretation, and on Christology as its orienting vision. May our communion—both sacramental and ordinary—set the context for interpretation that realizes the true identity of Jesus Christ.

See also Incarnation; Jesus, Quest for the Historical; Jesus and Scripture;

Messiah/Messianism; Rule of Faith; Scripture, Unity of

Bibliography

Bauckham, R. God Crucified. Eerdmans, 1998; Bockmuehl, M., ed. Cambridge Companion to Jesus. Cambridge University Press, 2001; Davis, S. T., et al., eds. The Incarnation. Oxford University Press, 2002; idem. The Trinity. Oxford University Press, 2000; Dunn, J. D. G. Christology in the Making. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1996; idem. Jesus Remembered. Eerdmans, 2003; Ford, D., and M. Higton, eds. Jesus. Oxford Readers. Oxford University Press, 2002; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; Grillmeier, A. Christ in Christian Tradition, trans. J. Bowden. 2 vols. in 3. John Knox, 1975–96; Hunsinger, G. “Karl Barth’s Christology.” Pages 127–42 in Cambridge Companion to Karl Barth, ed. J. Webster. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Hurtado, L. Lord Jesus Christ. Eerdmans, 2003; Kärkkäinen, V.-M. Christology: A Global Introduction. Baker Academic, 2003; Lowe, W. “Christ and Salvation.” Pages 235–51 in Cambridge Companion to Postmodern Theology, ed. K. Vanhoozer. Cambridge University Press, 2003; Macquarrie, J. Jesus Christ in Modern Thought. SCM, 1990; McIntyre, J. The Shape of Christology. 2d ed. T&T Clark, 1998; Moberly, R. W. L. The Bible, Theology, and Faith. Studies in Christian Doctrine. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Powell, M. A., and D. Bauer, eds. Who Do You Say That I Am? Westminster John Knox, 1999; Tanner, K. “Jesus Christ.” Pages 245–72 in Cambridge Companion to Christian Doctrine, ed. C. Gunton. Cambridge University Press, 1997; Thompson, W. The Struggle for Theology’s Soul. Crossroad, 1996; Torrance, A. “Being of One Substance with the Father.” Pages 49–61 in Nicene Christianity, ed. C. Seitz. Brazos, 2001; Wainwright, G. For Our Salvation. Eerdmans, 1997; Walls, W. A. The Cross--Cultural Process in Christian History. Orbis, 2002; Weinandy, T. Does God Suffer? T&T Clark, 2000; Wright, N. T. The Resurrection of the Son of God. Christian Origins and the Question of God 3. Fortress, 2003; Yeago, D. “The New Testament and the Nicene Dogma.” Pages 87–100 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997.

Daniel J. Treier

Jesus Christ, Return of    See Hope; Kingdom of God; Last Things, Doctrine of Jesus Christ, Titles of    See Jesus Christ, Doctrine of

Jewish-Christian Dialogue

Until about a generation ago, Jewish-Christian dialogue hardly featured in the context of theological interpretation of Scripture. One would expect to find such dialogue primarily in relation to Israel’s Scriptures, since these texts are both Jewish Scripture (Tanak) and Christian Scripture (OT). Yet, if one looks at the landmark OT theologies of Walther Eichrodt (1961) and Gerhard von Rad (1965), Jewish-Christian dialogue simply does not feature. If comments about Judaism are found, they are regularly of a pejorative kind (see the memorable picture of a Jewish boy encountering biblical criticism in Chaim Potok's In the Beginning), very much in the tradition of Wellhausen (see Levenson 1–61). The sphere of NT study was hardly different in this regard. Bultmann had little to say about Judaism (except with regard to the influence of Hellenistic Judaism upon NT thought), and what he did say was rarely complimentary. Occasional works considering both Jewish and Christian perspectives can be found, such as Martin Buber's Two Types of Faith; though this a little too easily reads as a Jew repaying in kind to Christians the kind of sophisticated misrepresentation and pejorative assessment that Christians have regularly directed toward Jews.

The contemporary situation is different, at least in most scholarly contexts (though Christian disinterest in, or negative assessments of, Jewish faith—and vice versa—can still be found in many contexts). There are various reasons for this—horror at the Holocaust, the pressures of secularized indifference to Christianity and Judaism, a growing number of Jewish participants in academic biblical study, the recognition that Christians have often misrepresented Judaism (Sanders, among others, has been influential here). Whatever the reasons, Christians and Jews are realizing that, for all their differences, they share greater common ground than they have sometimes realized, and that therefore the perpetuation of older attitudes and assumptions is at best ignorance and at worst sin. Not only Christians (see, e.g., Braybrooke, Time to Meet) but also Jews (see, e.g., Dabru Emet, with responses by Christians, in Pannenberg et al.) are trying to articulate fresh (p 372) ways of understanding and relating to the sibling faith in constructive dialogue.

Dialogue, properly understood, should not (though unfortunately sometimes it does) mean marginalizing or downplaying the distinctive beliefs and practices of Christians and Jews. Rather, it represents an attitude of respect and constructive engagement, whose aims are understanding and friendship, and whose long-term outcome cannot be predicted.

Within OT studies the transformed ethos is evident in the way von Rad's former pupil Rolf Rendtorff has made Jewish-Christian dialogue into a focal point for theological interpretation. The two most influential Christian OT theologians of recent years, Brevard Childs and Walter Brueggemann, both (in different ways) take seriously Jewish interpretations of those biblical texts they themselves interpret as Christians. From a Jewish perspective Jon Levenson has argued in theory and demonstrated in practice the kind of difference that should (and should not) be made by interpreting the biblical text within the wider context of Judaism.

Childs's and Levenson's accounts of the difference that a Jewish-Christian perspective may make are instructive. Both recognize the legitimate anxiety that theological perspectives may too quickly prejudge interpretative issues in favor of understandings congenial to traditional Jewish or Christian theologies; so they both insist on the disciplines of philological and historical criticism to promote self-critical scholarly integrity. But both see as crucial the wider context, or frame of reference, within which such disciplined work is done. The believer can simultaneously inhabit a tightly defined academic context, in which certain faith-related questions and concerns may be bracketed out, and a more broadly defined community-of-faith context, where a wider range of texts, practices, understandings, and experiences creates resonances and insights that would not otherwise be possible. Just as a faith perspective can be both bracketed out and incorporated in relation to a nonfaith perspective, so can a Christian perspective be both bracketed out and included in relation to a Jewish perspective, and vice versa. Childs and Levenson thus each revive—though only in a fundamentally reconceived way—the ancient and medieval affirmation of different senses, or multiple level readings, of Scripture.

Childs, for example, says: “Because of the experience of the Gospel, a Christian rightly renders the Old Testament ultimately in a different way from the Jew” (Biblical, 335). “But how can one claim to read Isaiah as the voice of Israel in the Hebrew Scripture and at the same time speak of its witness to Jesus Christ? It is not only possible, but actually mandatory for any serious Christian theological reflection. Because Scripture performs different functions according to distinct contexts, a multi-level reading is required even to begin to grapple with the full range of Scripture's role as the intentional medium of continuing divine revelation” (“Does?” 63).

Levenson, for example, says:

In the realm of historical criticism, pleas for a “Jewish biblical scholarship” or a “Christian biblical scholarship” are senseless and reactionary. Practicing Jews and Christians will differ from uncompromising historicists, however, in affirming the meaningfulness and interpretive relevance of larger contexts that homogenize the literatures of different periods to one degree or another. Just as text has more than one context, and biblical studies has more than one method, so scripture has more than one sense, as the medievals knew and Tyndale, Spinoza, Jowett, and most other moderns have forgotten. As the context gets larger, Jews and Christians can still work together, as each identifies imaginatively with the other's distinctive context. But imagined identities are only that, and if the Bible (under whatever definition) is to be seen as having coherence and theological integrity, there will come a moment in which Jewish-Christian consensus becomes existentially impossible. (104)

In terms of the differences that such perspectives can make to specific exegesis, Moberly on Gen. 22 offers a reasonably detailed case study (71–161, esp. 154–61). There is a growing dialogical literature, of which Bellis and Kaminsky (215–385) provide an instructive example.

See also Anti-Semitism; Israel; Relationship between the Testaments

Bibliography

Bellis, A., and J. Kaminsky. Jews, Christians, and the Theology of the Hebrew Scriptures. SBL, 2000; Braybrooke, M. Time to Meet. SCM/Trinity, 1990; Buber, M. Two Types of Faith, trans. N. Goldhawk. Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1951; Childs, B. Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments. SCM, 1992; idem. "Does the Old Testament Witness to Jesus Christ?" Pages 57–64 in Evangelium, Schriftauslegung, Kirche, ed. J. Adna et al. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997; Eichrodt, W. Theology of the Old Testament, trans. J. Baker. 2 vols. SCM, 1961; Frymer-Kensky, T., et al. "Dabru Emet." ProEcccl 11 (2002): 5–7; Levenson, J. The Hebrew Bible, the Old Testament, and Historical Criticism. Westminster John Knox, 1993; Moberly, R. W. L. The Bible, Theology, and Faith. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Pannenberg, W., et al. "A Symposium on Dabru Emet." ProEcccl 11 (2002): 8–19; Potok, C. In the Beginning. (p 373)Knopf, 1975; Rad, G. von. Old Testament Theology, trans. D. Stalker. 2 vols. SCM, 1965; Rendtorff, R. Canon and Theology, trans. M. Kohl. Fortress, 1993; Sanders, E. P. Paul and Palestinian Judaism. SCM, 1977.
R. W. L. Moberly

Jewish Context of the NT

An understanding of the Jewish context of early Christianity is essential for the theological interpretation of Scripture, particularly the NT. Jesus was a Jew, his first followers were Jews, and the movement he initiated was Jewish. Many of the NT authors were Jewish, and until the end of the first century, Jews continued to make up a significant proportion of the many Christian communities that sprang up around the Mediterranean. It was only in the second century that the Christian movement parted ways with Judaism, but even then the new faith continued to find much of its theological inspiration in the Jewish Scriptures and in Jewish traditions of interpreting those Scriptures.

Historical Overview

The Persian Period (539–333 BCE). Judaism emerged during the exile of Judah in Babylon (586–539 BCE), where the ancient religion of Israel underwent a transformation. When the decree of Cyrus the Persian allowed Judean exiles to return to their homeland, only a modest number took the opportunity. Among the major events of the early postexilic period were the final editing and codification of the Torah; the rebuilding of the temple (520–515 BCE), though on a much humbler scale than the temple of Solomon; the religious and social reforms of Ezra, who promulgated the Torah as the law of the land and put an end to mixed marriages; the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls under the direction of Nehemiah, a Persian-appointed Babylonian Jew; and the emergence of the high priesthood as the locus of leadership. Several late books of the Hebrew Bible were written during this period, including historical, prophetic, and possibly some of the wisdom books.

Ancient Israelite religion was tied to the land, the status of nationhood, and the monarchy. It was based on ancestral traditions that were not yet in their definitive written form. Postexilic Judaism, however, developed in totally changed circumstances: the people of Israel-Judah had lost control of their land, which became a province in a succession of foreign empires, with no status as an independent nation and no native kingship. What they did have, though, was a definitive written code of instruction, the Torah of Moses. The changed political situation also brought with it a change in religious understanding. Specific theological beliefs, either absent or undeveloped in the religion of Israel, came to develop. These included the apocalyptic notions of resurrection and eternal life, with postmortem rewards and punishments, as well as developed thinking about Satan, angels, and demons. The touchstone of Israelite religion, worship of only one God, took on a more decisive form beginning in Babylon (Isa. 40–55), to become in the postexilic period a full-fledged monotheism, the chief hallmark of Jewish theology.

The Hellenistic Period (333 BCE–63 BCE). The next great watershed in Jewish history came with Alexander the Great's conquest of the ancient Near East, from Greece to western India, including Palestine (333–323 BCE). After defeating the Persian Empire, the young Macedonian fostered a fusion of Greek and oriental cultures (Hellenism). The Greek polis and its institutions—gymnasia, racetracks, amphitheaters, public baths—sprang up all over the East. After his death, Alexander's generals divided up his empire. Palestine was ruled at first by the Ptolemies (301–198 BCE), a dynasty of Greek kings based in Egypt, where a large and influential Jewish community was established and where the Hebrew Scriptures were translated into Greek, beginning in the third century BCE. The Jewish Diaspora in Egypt also produced a variety of Greek literature in classical genres, such as epic poetry, tragedy, and philosophical treatises. Writings produced by Jews in the eastern Diaspora include Esther, Tobit, and possibly the court tales in Dan. 1–6.

After the Ptolemies, Palestine fell under the sway of the Seleucids (198–142 BCE), a line of Greek rulers headquartered in Syria. The first real crisis faced by Palestinian Jews in the Hellenistic era came in the form of an unprecedented persecution by the Seleucid ruler Antiochus IV “Epiphanes” (175–164/3 BCE), whose motives remain puzzling. The backdrop of the persecution involved struggles between factions of Hellenizing and pious Jews in Jerusalem, and rival claims to the high priesthood. In 167 BCE Antiochus effectively outlawed the practice of Judaism by having copies of the Torah destroyed, forbidding circumcision and sacrifices, banning Sabbath observance and holy days, and forcing Jews to make offerings to pagan gods. After erecting and garrisoning a fortress in Jerusalem, he committed the ultimate blasphemy by entering the innermost sanctuary of the Jerusalem temple, (p 374)erecting an altar to Zeus there, and ordering the sacrifice of pigs on it (1 Macc. 1:41–64; 2 Macc. 6:1–11).

This act touched off a revolt in 167 BCE led by a priest named Mattathias and his sons, dubbed the “Maccabees” after the nickname Maccabeus, “the Hammerer,” given to Mattathias’s son Judas (1 Macc. 2). After three years of guerrilla warfare and victories over the Syrians, Judas took control of Jerusalem and rededicated the temple in 164, an event celebrated to this day in the festival of Hanukkah (1 Macc. 4:36–61). Many scholars think that Dan. 7–12 was written and the entire book put into final form during the temple crisis. For the next twenty years or so, periods of armistice and renewed fighting alternated until Jewish military rule passed to the brothers of Judas: Jonathan (152–142 BCE) and Simon (142–134 BCE).

For a brief eighty-year period (142–63 BCE), the Maccabees established an independent Jewish state, the only time in the Second Temple age when Jews ruled themselves. The dynasty bears the name “Hasmonean,” after an ancestor of Mattathias named Hashmon. In 142 Judas’s brother Simon crowned himself king and assumed the office of high priest. By investing both offices in himself, he enacted something that had never been done before. Eventually the dynasty was weakened by squabbles over succession; it came to an end when the Romans conquered Palestine in 63 BCE. Through the Hasmoneans may have been popular with the masses, many pious Jews resented them because they adopted Hellenistic ways and ruled like pagan monarchs, and because they combined the offices of king and high priest.

The Roman Period (63 BCE–135 CE). By the first century BCE, Jews were a visible minority in the Roman Empire, numbering some five or six million in a population of fifty to sixty million. After conquering Jerusalem, the Roman general Pompey installed the Hasmonean John Hyrcanus II (63–40 BCE) as high priest and ethnarch (“ruler of the people”). Palestine now became a puppet state of Rome. As their client king, the Romans eventually appointed Herod the Great (37–4 BCE), an Idumean who through a series of massive construction projects left the most indelible mark on the land of any Jewish ruler. Among his extensive building programs were a refurbished Jerusalem temple and the seaside resort city of Caesarea Maritima. Infamous for political cunning and ruthlessness, he had three of his sons and one of his wives executed. After his death, Herod’s kingdom was divided among his three surviving sons: Herod Archelaus (4 BCE–6 CE) got Judea, Idumea, and Samaria; Herod Antipas (4 BCE–39 CE) received Galilee and Perea; and Herod Philip II (4 BCE–34 CE) ruled in the area northeast of Galilee. From 6 CE to the outbreak of the first Jewish revolt against Rome in 66, the Romans ruled Judea through their own prefects, the most notorious of whom was Pontius Pilate (26–36 CE).

A host of factors led the Jews of Palestine to revolt against the Romans in 66–70 CE. Among them were economic hardship and accompanying social unrest fueled by famine and the oppressive tax policies of the Romans, which took upward of 30 percent of the income of the typical Jewish farmer. Also significant was Jewish nationalist sentiment fomented by revolutionary groups like the Zealots, and heightened end-time hopes and messianic expectations fueled by royal pretenders and would-be messiahs. Last but not least was the offensive leadership of the Roman procurators, such as Florus, who in the year 66 CE pilfered the temple treasury and permitted his troops to ransack the city as he tried to gain control of the temple.

An unofficial declaration of war ensued when the lower priests and revolutionary leaders in Jerusalem terminated the sacrifices offered on behalf of Rome and the emperor, much to the consternation of the chief priests and leading Pharisees, whose opposition sparked a civil war among pro- and anti-Roman factions. The historian Josephus provides a most circumstantial account of the conflict in The Jewish War; his other great work, The Jewish Antiquities, is a major source for our knowledge of the entire Second Temple period. Though the Romans largely quelled the insurrection by the year 70, when they destroyed Jerusalem and the temple, it was not until 73 that the last Jewish rebels perished, after taking refuge atop the Judean mountain fortress of Masada. A second Jewish revolt, put down by the Romans in 132–35 CE, was led by a self-proclaimed messiah, Simon Bar Kosiba, who took the messianic title Bar Kochba, “Son of the Star.” The Romans crushed the rebellion and turned Jerusalem into a pagan city. Jewish life in Palestine shifted northward to Galilee.

Unity and Diversity: Common Theology and the Various Groups

The Four “Pillars”: Monotheism, Covenant Election, Torah, Temple. Jews stood out in the Greco-Roman world by virtue of the antiquity of (p 375)their religion, adherence to a religion of the book, and observance of ritual practices such as circumcision, Sabbath rest, and dietary restrictions. By the first century, Judaism was a diverse religion with several interest groups competing to represent the true heritage of Israel and its sacred traditions. With the exception of the Qumran Essenes, we cannot speak of “sects” since the very notion presumes deviations from an official, normative form of the religion—something that did not exist in the first century. There was, however, a Jewish common theology. The single most important belief was monotheism. Also important was the notion of covenant election: God had entered into a solemn pact with Israel at Mt. Sinai, choosing them to be his special possession and agents of redemption in the world, and graciously giving them his instruction in the (written) Law. As a token of his presence and favor, God had given Israel the land and caused his name to dwell in the temple, the one place where they were to offer sacrifices.

God, election, Torah, and temple: these constitute the core of common beliefs shared by virtually all religiously minded Jews; yet each of the four major tenets, and much else besides, was understood and applied in often competing ways. For example, many Jews expected God to act more or less directly in eschatological salvation, gathering the scattered tribes of Israel, bringing Gentiles to worship in Jerusalem, and establishing his universal reign of righteousness. Others, however, believed that God had used various mediator figures to accomplish his work in creation and history and that he would do so at the end of the age. The personified divine attributes of “word” and “wisdom” feature in Hellenistic Jewish texts as God’s agents in creation. Also, a variety of intermediary figures—principal angels like Michael, exalted patriarchs such as Enoch, and four types of messiahs, royal, priestly, prophetic, and heavenly—play a role in the eschatological tableau of the Pseudepigrapha and the Dead Sea Scrolls (DSS). The notion of covenantal election was also embraced in a variety of ways. The Qumran Essenes, for instance, held a very exclusive, sectarian form of this doctrine. Likewise, the interpretation and implementation of the Torah was conceived quite differently among various Jewish groups, particularly on matters of ritual purity and sacrifices.

The temple itself was widely regarded as the center of the nation, the navel of the universe, the focus of identity for Jews living in the land of Israel as well as a source of pride for those in the Diaspora. Diaspora Jews such as Philo of Alexandria, however, often spiritualized the temple and its sacrificial system; even devout Jews in the homeland viewed the institution with ferocious ambivalence. On the one hand, it was the locus of God's presence, worth defending and even dying for in the threat of its profanation. On the other hand, it was run by priests whose manner of doing so met with vehement objections and whose very legitimacy was often questioned. In the eyes of fervently nationalist Jews, the temple was the seat of collaboration with Rome, corrupt beyond fair use. Some Jews expected it to be destroyed and replaced by a temple made by God in the new age. Others thought it was dispensable even in the present age. It is amid this variety of religious conviction and theological understanding that the various Jewish groups are to be placed.

Pharisees. The Pharisees were a lay movement whose name may mean something like "separatists." They devoted themselves to the exact interpretation of the written Torah and to the promulgation of their "oral Torah," traditions of interpreting and applying the written text (B.J. 2.162; A.J. 13.297; 17.41; Vita 91; cf. Mark 7:5; Matt. 15:2; Acts 22:3; 23:6–8). A key element of their social program was to extend the priestly regulations of ritual purity mandated in Leviticus to all Jews in all spheres of life. We have little specific knowledge of their internal organization or their social status and roles, but they seem to have formed themselves into a voluntary association, stood above the peasant and artisan classes, and functioned in a variety of administrative and educational settings. That they exerted an informal, popular influence is undeniable, but they never had control of either governmental or religious affairs. Only in the decades after 70 CE did they attain true predominance, since they were the only integrated Jewish group to survive the first revolt against Rome and to reconstitute Judaism on a new footing.

Next to Josephus, the apostle Paul is the only literary figure of the first century who can confidently be identified with Pharisaism. In a recitation of his pre-Christ Jewish pedigree, he says that he was "as to the Law, a Pharisee" (Phil. 3:5). Elsewhere he comments, "I advanced in Judaism beyond many among my people of the same age, for I was far more zealous for the traditions of my ancestors" (Gal. 1:14 NRSV). In both of these passages, Paul connects his former persecution of the Jesus movement with his zeal for the Torah, but his Pharisaism as such would hardly account for his violent acts. Acts portrays the apostle as (p 376) a Christian Pharisee who maintained his devotion to the Torah. This portrait stands in some tension with the testimony of Paul's letters (e.g., Gal. 2:15–21; Phil. 3:7–11; Rom. 3:21–26; 10:4) without being totally at odds with it (e.g., 1 Cor. 9:19–21).

The Pharisees appear in the Synoptic Gospels, often coupled with the scribes (learned men, typically Pharisees [Mark 2:16; Luke 5:30], but not necessarily), as the principal antagonists of Jesus during his Galilean ministry. They debate with him over such halakic matters as Sabbath, fasting, tithing, food purity, and divorce (Mark 2:18–22, 23–28; 3:1–6; 7:1–23; 10:2–9; et par.). These issues are the very ones that figure in the earliest (pre-70 CE) traditions about the Pharisees in rabbinic literature. In the Synoptics the Pharisees also question Jesus' association with tax collectors and "sinners," demand a prophetic sign to validate his authority, and try to entrap him with a question about paying taxes to the Romans (Mark 2:15–17; 8:11–13; 12:13–17; et par.).

Even so, the Pharisees were probably the Jewish group to whom Jesus was the closest in his stance on matters of Torah piety. Matthew's portrayal of them as petty legalists and hypocrites (ch. 23) owes much to controversies between Pharisaic Jews and Christian Jews in the evangelist's own milieu. The exact reach of their influence in the time of Jesus is portrayed variously, with Mark limiting their appearance to the villages of Galilee, while Matthew expands their role and locates them in Judea and Jerusalem as well. Luke sustains the element of hostility between Jesus and the Pharisees but includes unique traditions favorable to them (e.g., Luke 13:31; Acts 5:34–39; 23:6–9). The Fourth Gospel places them in both Galilee and Judea (e.g., John 1:24; 3:1; 4:1; 7:32–52), virtually equates them with "the Jews," enlarges their leadership role in national and synagogue life (e.g., John 9), and allies them with the chief priests and Sanhedrin (11:46–47; 12:19, 42; 18:3). Missing in John are most of the debates over Torah piety; instead, objections to Jesus' healing on the Sabbath develop into charges that he makes himself out to be "equal to God" (John 5:18; cf. 8:13–30).

Sadducees. Sad to say, we know even less about the Sadducees than the Pharisees. The label probably derives from the name Zadok, the high priest in the time of David and Solomon. Many, perhaps most, of the Sadducees belonged to the Jerusalem aristocracy; at least a few high priests came from their ranks. There is no basis, though, for assuming that all aristocrats were Sadducees, that all Sadducees were priests, or that the Sadducees made up the majority of the Sanhedrin. This common portrait represents a generalization drawn from a few modest statements in Josephus and Acts.

Another misleading but oft-repeated claim derived from Josephus is that the Sadducees recognized the authority of only the Pentateuch, the written Torah of Moses, with the implication that they did not accept the books of the Prophets or any of the books later included among the Writings. What Josephus actually says is that they rejected those laws of the Pharisees “not recorded in the laws of Moses” and that they observed nothing “apart from the laws” (A.J. 13.297; 18.17). What this probably means is simply that the Sadducees rejected (many of) the Pharisees’ halakic positions. The Sadducees themselves surely propounded their own (stricter, more conservative) traditions of interpreting and applying the Torah—their own “oral torah,” in effect. At any rate, there is no good reason to suppose that they acknowledged only the books of the Torah as authoritative.

Oddly enough, every tenet of Sadducean theology highlighted in the ancient sources entails a negative. According to Josephus (B.J. 2.164–65), the Sadducees rejected the idea of fate while affirming the free will and moral responsibility of human beings, as opposed to the Pharisees, who accepted both. They also (in contrast to the Pharisees) denied that the soul continues after death and therefore dispensed with the notion of postmortem rewards and punishments (B.J. 2.165; A.J. 18.16). This might mean that they believed in the extinction of the soul at death, but it might rather indicate that they subscribed to the ancient Israelite belief in Sheol as the realm where all the dead, just and unjust alike, go to lead the same shadowy existence. In the Synoptic tradition and Acts, their disbelief in the resurrection of the dead stands out (Mark 12:18–27 et par.; Acts 23:6–8). The formulation of Acts 23:8 is particularly striking: “The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, or angel [angelon], or spirit [pneuma]; but the Pharisees acknowledge all three” (NRSV). A denial of angels would be odd in a group that accepted the Torah, and Josephus says nothing of this matter. Perhaps all that is meant is that they did not entertain the elaborate angelologies typical of some Jews (the Qumran Essenes, for instance). But if the words angelon and pneuma are taken as adverbial accusatives, the verse may be understood to suggest (p 377) that they denied resurrection as or in the form of an angel or spirit.

The Sadducees appear far less frequently in the Synoptics than do the Pharisees. Matthew sometimes pairs the two groups against Jesus (16:1, 6, 11–12). The similarity of a few halakic positions registered in the DSS with stances attributed to the Sadducees in rabbinic literature—particularly those relating to the transmission of ritual impurity in liquid streams in 4QMMT and m. Yad. 4:7—has led some scholars to suggest that the Qumran sectarians were Sadducees and not Essenes. More likely, however, the priestly roots shared by both groups led to some shared halakic judgments. Besides, the developed angelology and strong determinism of the core sectarian texts among the DSS render a Sadducean identity for the Qumran group highly unlikely.

Essenes. Thanks to the DSS, we are better informed about the Essenes than any other Jewish group, and Josephus devotes more attention to them than to the others (B.J. 119–61; A.J. 18.18–22). Rather surprisingly, though, they are never mentioned in the NT, at least under a label that we can confidently associate with them. Most scholars regard the Scrolls as the library holdings of Essenes who installed themselves at Qumran off the northwest shore of the Dead Sea around 100 BCE. This consensus has survived several competing explanations posed over the last decade.

Pliny the Elder locates the Essenes off the northwest shore of the Dead Sea (Nat. 5.73), which is where Qumran lies. He notes that they were without women, renounced sexual desire, did without money, and lived in isolation. Josephus describes their procedures for admitting new members (B.J. 2.137–42), and both he and Philo comment on the communal ownership of property among the Essenes (Jos., B.J. 2.122; cf. Philo, Prob. 77) as well as their celibacy (Jos., B.J. 2.120–21; Philo, Hypoth. 11.14). All of these features, along with other parallels, are attested more or less clearly in the Qumran Community Rule (1QS).

The Essenes at Qumran may have been a breakaway group or else a subset of the wider Essene movement, which emerged in the middle of the second century BCE and whose membership Josephus places at four thousand. A celibate group with priestly origins and leadership, they pulled out of Jerusalem sometime in the mid to late second century BCE, protesting how the temple was being run. The DSS indicate that they objected to the temple's worldliness, the calendar in use there, the stance on ritual purity taken by its leadership, and the illegitimacy and impiety of the Hasmonean high priesthood (e.g., CD 3.12–17; 4.13–19; 20.22–23 [= ms. B, 2.22–23]; 4QMMT). They eventually withdrew to the desert to practice an ascetic lifestyle in preparation for the end of the age. These Essenes devoted themselves to communal prayer, study, worship, meals, and ritual purity, as a surrogate temple in whose midst prayer and praise functioned as substitute sacrifices that would atone for the sins of the land (e.g., 1QS 5.4–7; 8.4–10; 9.3–6). An apocalyptic sect with a strongly dualistic and deterministic worldview, they considered themselves the only true Israelites, whom God would vindicate and exalt when he visited the earth in judgment. They expected a great final battle (1QM), and anticipated God using a variety of redemptive agents, including two messiahs, a priestly one and a royal one; a prophet; and the archangel Michael. The Qumran Essenes were wiped out in the summer of 68, although a few of them may have joined the last vestiges of Jewish resistance atop Masada.

The Essenes are particularly relevant to theological interpretation of the NT since Jesus and his followers shared much of the same apocalyptic worldview, minus the stark determinism and the sectarian withdrawal from mainstream society. The messianism of the DSS provides an important comparative vantage point from which to appreciate NT Christology. Three notable similarities between Essene and early Christian practice include the communal sharing of goods; the Essenes' daily ritual immersion in water and John's baptism; and the communal meals at Qumran and the Christian Lord's Supper. Each of these practices was undertaken with different theological understandings and took on distinctive forms, so the parallels should not be exaggerated. The DSS and the NT also share several parallels in terminology (e.g., "poor in spirit," "the Way," "works of the Law," and "the righteousness of God"), theological conceptions such as dualism, doctrines like justification by grace, and the expectation of a final battle and a new Jerusalem.

Fourth Philosophy and Other Resistance Movements. After his account of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes in book 18 of his Jewish Antiquities, Josephus devotes a section to a group he calls "the fourth philosophy." He identifies Judas the Galilean as the leader and notes that "this school agrees in all other respects with the opinions of the Pharisees, except that they have a passion for liberty that is almost unconquerable, since they are convinced that God alone is their (p 378) leader and master. They think little of submitting to death in unusual forms and permitting vengeance to fall on kinsmen and friends if only they may avoid calling any man master" (A.J. 18.23). Judas and his followers regarded taxation as slavery and submission to it as a denial of God's sovereignty. With the aid of a Pharisee named Saddok, Judas incited a revolt in response to a census undertaken by Quirinius, the Roman legate of Syria, after Herod Archelaus was removed from office in 6 CE (A.J. 18.4–5; cf. B.J. 2.18; cf. Acts 5:37).

Josephus recounts several instances of social banditry during Herod's reign, during periods of especially harsh economic conditions. He also devotes considerable attention to royal pretenders who emerged after the death of Herod. At the start of the first Jewish revolt in 66 CE, two messianic movements took shape.

Manahem captured the arsenal at Masada, proclaimed himself king in Jerusalem, and organized a siege of the palace. He was later murdered, but some of his followers returned to Masada. Simon bar Giora took control of Jerusalem from the Zealots and John of Gischala. After decking himself out in a white tunic and a purple cape, he was captured and executed in Rome. The most overtly messianic of the royal pretenders was the leader of the second Jewish revolt in 132–35, Simon bar Kosiba, who took the name bar Kochba, “son of a star,” and minted coins bearing the inscription “Year 1 of the Redemption of Israel.”

Josephus mentions a variety of popular prophets. Some of them engaged in symbolic actions regarded as tokens of eschatological salvation (such as leading people across the Jordan River); others delivered oracles of either deliverance or doom.

A group of urban assassins known as the Sicarii (after the Latin name for their weapon of choice, a small curved dagger known as a sica) began practicing their craft in Jerusalem in the 50s. According to Josephus, “This group murdered people in broad daylight right in the middle of the city. Mixing with the crowds, especially during the festivals, they would conceal small daggers beneath their garments and stealthily stab their opponents. Then, when their victims fell, the murderers simply melted into the outraged crowds, undetected because of the naturalness of their presence. The first to have his throat cut was Jonathan the high priest, and after him many were murdered daily” (B.J. 2.254–56). The targets of the Sicarii were the ruling elite in Jerusalem and pro-Roman members of the aristocracy who lived in rural areas. Hostage taking was also part of their strategy.

The Zealots came on the scene in the year 67 CE. So-called because of their revolutionary zeal, this movement originated among peasants in Galilee who fled to Jerusalem a year into the first Jewish revolt. In their effort to gain control of the city, they attacked members of the Herodian nobility and priestly aristocracy who wanted to sue for peace with the Romans, competed with other revolutionary factions, and of course joined in battling the Romans during the final siege. At one point, the Zealots were compelled by the forces of Ananus and Jesus son of Gamala, both chief priests, to take refuge in the inner court of the temple. They were eventually freed by outside supporters from the Idumeans, who killed Ananus and Jesus, and took vengeance on their enemies, including members of the nobility (B.J. 4.197–333). By the time the Romans laid their final siege to Jerusalem, the Zealots were the smallest of the rival revolutionary groups.

Priests. Josephus does not include the priests in his discussion, but they were the chief religious leaders in Judaism during the Second Temple period. To the extent that their secular overlords allowed it, they also exercised political control. Below the one high priest were chief priests, ordinary priests, and their assistants, the Levites. The ordinary priests together with the Levites probably numbered some twenty thousand in the first century (cf. C. Ap. 2.108), though only a tiny fraction of that number served in the temple at any one time. They took up their duties on a rotation of twenty-four courses or shifts for a week at a time (1 Chron. 24:4; A.J. 7.365; m. Sukkah 5:6). Among their tasks were inspecting and handling animals for sacrifice, butchering the sacrificial victims and cleaning up after the process, offering sacrifices on the altar, burning the appropriate parts and sorting the remaining portions for their own consumption or else that of the worshippers, reciting Scripture, conducting prayers, and burning incense. The Levites assisted them by carrying firewood into the temple precincts, manning the gates, and providing music.

The chief priests were probably comprised of former high priests and members of the principal families from whom the high priests were chosen (cf. B.J. 2.243; 6.114). The high priests traditionally stood in the line of Zadok, a succession that lasted with few interruptions until 172 BCE, when Antiochus IV appointed the Hellenophile Menelaus. During the Hasmonean era, the high priesthood was hereditary in the Maccabean family (p 379), from Simon's assumption of the office in 142 BCE until Herod began installing those of his own choosing. It is often assumed that the Hasmoneans were not from the line of Zadok, but there is no solid evidence of this.

The high priest presided over worship and sacrifice. He alone was permitted to enter the holy of holies every year on the Day of Atonement to offer mandated sacrifices. In the first century he was also the main political liaison answerable to the Roman prefect, who expected him to keep Jerusalem peaceful and the temple running smoothly. He also functioned as head of the Jewish council, the Sanhedrin, a judicial body that tried cases dealing with high crimes against Jewish law and whose members were drawn from both the clergy and lay orders, including scribes, Pharisees, Sadducees, "elders" (leading lay people from the aristocracy), and priests. According to the Mishnah, it had seventy-one members (m. Sanh. 1:6). Josephus reports that it once put the future King Herod on trial (A.J. 14.165–67). The Synoptic Gospels highlight the Sanhedrin's role in their narratives of Jesus' passion (Mark 14:53–65 et par.; cf. John 11:47–50), and Acts depicts it putting the apostles on trial (Acts 5:17–42 [cf. 4:1–22]; 22:30; 23:5). Whether the Romans granted the high priest and the Sanhedrin authority to issue the death penalty in capital cases remains disputed (cf. A.J. 14.177; John 18:31).

Others. In his treatise On the Contemplative Life, Philo of Alexandria describes a group called the Therapeutae, Jewish mystics who lived near Lake Mareotis in Egypt. Apart from their avoidance of wine and meat, they resembled the Essenes in several respects, including their practice of asceticism, celibacy, communal worship, and composition of hymns.

The Samaritans may be thought of as a Jewish sect, insofar as they shared much of the same Israelite heritage but were at odds with the Judaism practiced in Jerusalem. They called themselves Shamerim, “observers [of the Torah],” and claimed to be descendants of the tribes of Joseph. According to 2 Kings 17, though, they were a mixed population comprised of inhabitants of the old northern kingdom and foreign colonists whom the Assyrians forced to settle there when they conquered Israel in 722 BCE.

From the viewpoint of Jews in Judea, the Samaritans were apostates with an improper devotion to Yahweh, led by an illegitimate priesthood that presided over an errant cult centered in an unlawful temple located on the wrong site (Mt. Gerizim). Samaritan feelings for Jews were mutual. In their eyes, Judaism was a heresy that began with the Israelite priest Eli and that was continued by Ezra, whom they accused of corrupting the text of the Pentateuch, and Hillel, to whom they attributed false legal traditions. They revered only the Mosaic Torah, in a distinctive version (the Samaritan Pentateuch) that highlighted the sacred status of Mt. Gerizim, and regarded the second and third divisions of the Jewish Bible as the record of an apostate faith.

According to Ezra, the Samaritans were among those who tried to oppose the resettlement of Judean exiles in and around Jerusalem. In the second century BCE, the Samaritans had supported the Syrians against the Jews, and in 128 BCE John Hyrcanus conquered Samaria and destroyed the temple on Mt. Gerizim.

In Matthew, Jesus forbids his disciples from entering Samaritan territory (10:5), though Luke recounts the unfriendly welcome of some disciples of Jesus in a Samaritan village (9:51–55). According to Acts 8, the Christian mission to Samaria began only after Jesus’ death, resurrection, and ascent to heaven. The Fourth Gospel, on the other hand, narrates the famous encounter between Jesus and a woman of Samaria. In its present form John 4 brings something of the post-Easter situation back into the earthly ministry of Jesus (esp. 4:35–38), which may indicate that there was a mission to the Samaritans at some point in the history of the Johannine community.

Conclusion

Attending to the historical context of Scripture is one of the first tasks in its interpretation. Indeed, the validity of an interpretation depends in part on how well it takes into account a biblical text's historical (not to mention literary) context. Thus, the task of engaging the Jewish context of the NT becomes an important hermeneutical responsibility. Such engagement has a theological rationale as well: it is one means of reckoning with the historical particularity of God's self-revelation in Jesus Christ. That context constitutes part of "the fullness of time" in which "God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under the law" (Gal. 4:4 NRSV). So, for examples, Jesus' teaching about the kingdom of God, his debates with Pharisees and Sadducees, his ethical directives in the Sermon on the Mount, and his solidarity with tax collectors and sinners—none of these issues in the Gospels can be comprehended apart from their mooring in first-century Jewish debates. Similarly, the richness and distinctiveness of NT Christology cannot be fully understood (p 380) apart from its rooting in strands of early Jewish messianism and in reflection on God's Wisdom and Word. Nor, to cite a final example, can Paul's doctrine of justification by faith be understood apart from its setting in early Jewish and Christian disputes over what Gentiles needed in order to become members of God's covenant people. Of course, the word of God cannot be imprisoned in the past. For thoughtful Christians, historical study of Scripture will never be undertaken out of a mere antiquarian interest or regarded as an end in itself. Yet, since every page of the NT points beyond itself to historical realities outside the text, those realities must be taken into account if we are to read the Bible for all its worth.

See also Dead Sea Scrolls; Exile and Restoration; Jewish Exegesis; Messiah/Messianism; Roman Empire

Bibliography

Barclay, J. Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora from Alexandria to Trajan (323 BCE–117 CE). T&T Clark, 1996; Barclay, J., and J. Sweet, eds. Early Christian Thought in Its Jewish Context. Cambridge University Press, 1996; Collins, J. The Apocalyptic Imagination. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1998; idem. Between Athens and Jerusalem. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 2000; idem. The Scepter and the Star. Doubleday, 1995; Dunn, J. D. G. The Partings of the Ways between Judaism and Christianity and Their Significance for the Character of Christianity. SCM/Trinity, 1991; Grabbe, L. Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian. 2 vols. Fortress, 1992; Horsley, R., and J. Hanson. Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs. Winston, 1985; Hurtado, L. One God, One Lord. 2d ed. T&T Clark, 2003; Nickelsburg, G. W. E. Ancient Judaism and Christian Origins. Fortress, 2003; Saldarini, A. Pharisees, Scribes and Sadducees in Palestinian Society. Glazier/T&T Clark, 1989. Reprint, Eerdmans, 2001; Sanders, E. P. Jesus and Judaism. Fortress, 1985; idem. Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah. SCM/Trinity, 1990; idem. Judaism. SCM/Trinity, 1992; idem. Paul and Palestinian Judaism. SCM/Fortress, 1977; Schürer, E. The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ. Rev. ed. Ed. G. Vermes et al. 3 vols. Vol. 3 in 2 vols. T&T Clark, 1973–87; VanderKam, J. An Introduction to Early Judaism. Eerdmans, 2000; Wright, N. T. The New Testament and the People of God. SPCK/Fortress, 1992.

Daniel C. Harlow

Jewish Exegesis

Jewish exegesis in late antiquity took many forms. It was pursued consciously and methodically, sometimes manifesting itself in informal, almost unconscious ways. There was no purely Jewish exegesis; rather, Jewish exegetes adopted and adapted forms and styles of interpretation of sacred literature practiced throughout the eastern Mediterranean world, including aspects of rhetoric developed in Greek-speaking contexts. Nevertheless, a distinctive body of materials did emerge in Jewish circles, exemplifying interpretative approaches that are also found in the NT.

Targum

The Aramaic translations of Hebrew Scripture are known as targums (or targumim). They shed important light on biblical interpretation in Jewish circles in late antiquity and as such are part of a very important interpretative method that had developed, in which Scripture was translated, paraphrased, and rewritten. There are extant targums of every book of Scripture, with the exceptions of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Daniel. These books may not have been translated because parts of them are already in Aramaic.

How early Hebrew Scripture was translated into Aramaic is unknown. Most of the extant targums are products of the rabbinic period, dating from the fourth to tenth centuries CE. However, the discovery of at least one targum at Qumran (11QtgJob) and possibly two others (4QtgLeviticus; 4QtgJob) demonstrates that some targums existed in the first century BCE, perhaps even earlier. The impulse to translate Hebrew Scripture into Greek (the Septuagint, or LXX) for one Jewish constituency, which began in the third century BCE, may have coincided with a similar impulse to render Scripture into Aramaic for another constituency.

The targums originated in the synagogue and perhaps also the rabbinical academies, as homiletical and interpretative paraphrases of the passage of Hebrew Scripture that was to be read (such as the haftarah). Following the Babylonian and Persian exile (ca. 600–500 BCE) many of the Jewish people spoke Aramaic with greater ease than the cognate Hebrew, the language of Scripture. Therefore, it became useful to translate Hebrew Scripture into Aramaic (cf. Neh. 8; cf. b. Meg. 3a). The translator was called the meturgeman (“translator”). He recited his translation after the reading of the Hebrew passage.

The targums are sometimes literal, but more often they are paraphrastic and interpretative. Targums are part of the phenomenon sometimes called “rewritten Bible,” though not identical to it. Rewritten Bible, as seen, for example, in Jubilees or Pseudo-Philo’s Biblical Antiquities, freely omits, rearranges, and radically alters the biblical text. In comparison, targums are more conservative. Concern to update the text, answer questions raised by the text, even correct the text is seen in the targums.

(p 381) Elements of targumic tradition are present in the NT. At several points Jesus’ utterances and interpretation cohere with targumic tradition, especially as seen in the extant Isaiah Targum. Jesus’ allusion to Isa. 6:9–10 in Mark 4:12 reflects the targumic diction (“forgive”), not the Hebrew or Greek (“heal”). Jesus’ saying about perishing by the sword (Matt. 26:52) reflects Isa. 50:11 in the Aramaic, while linkage of Gehenna with Isa. 66:24 in Mark 9:47–48 also reflects Aramaic tradition. Jesus’ admonition to his followers to be “merciful, as your Father [in heaven] is merciful” (Luke 6:36//Matt. 5:48) coheres with Lev. 22:28 in Aramaic (in Pseudo-Jonathan). Jesus’ parabolic understanding of Isaiah’s Song of the Vineyard (Isa. 5:1–7) and his use of it against the temple establishment in his similar parable (Mark 12:1–12 et par.) once again reflects acquaintance with the Aramaic tradition. The antiquity of this tradition is attested at Qumran (cf. 4Q500). Jesus’ allusion to Lev. 18:5 in reference to “eternal life” (cf. Luke 10:25–28) once again reflects the Aramaic and once again is attested at Qumran (CD 3.12–20).

Targumic tradition is echoed in Paul as well. Perhaps the most important instance is seen in Rom. 10, where the apostle creatively applies Deut. 30:11–12 to Christ. At many points Paul’s allusive paraphrase and exegesis cohere with the Aramaic paraphrase, especially as seen in Targum Neofiti (where instead of crossing the sea to fetch the law, we have reference to Jonah descending into the depths to bring it up).

Midrash

The Hebrew noun midrash is derived from the verb darash, which means to “search (for an answer).” Midrash accordingly means “inquiry,” “examination,” or “commentary.” The word often refers to rabbinic exegesis, both with respect to method, as well as to form. Scholars therefore refer to midrashic interpretation and rabbinic midrashim. However, in recent years midrash has been discussed against the broader background of ancient biblical interpretation and textual transmission in general. It has become increasingly apparent that portions of the NT itself reflect aspects of midrash. Indeed, there has been considerable recent interest in ascertaining to what extent Jesus and the evangelists may have employed midrashic exegesis.

The verb darash occurs in a variety of contexts in the OT, meaning “to seek,” “to inquire,” or “to investigate.” Scripture speaks of seeking God’s will (2 Chron. 17:4; 22:9; 30:19; Ps. 119:10), making inquiry of God through prophetic oracle (1 Sam. 9:9; 1 Kings 22:8; 2 Kings 3:11; Jer. 21:2), or investigating a matter (Deut. 13:14; 19:18; Judg. 6:29; cf. 1QS 6.24; 8.26). The nominal form, midrash, occurs in the OT twice, meaning “story,” “book,” and possibly “commentary” (cf. NRSV: 2 Chron. 13:22; 24:27). In later usage there is a shift from seeking God’s will through prophetic oracle to seeking God’s will through study of Scripture. Later traditions tell us that Ezra the scribe “set his heart to search the law of the LORD” (Ezra 7:10 RSV). Other texts convey similar meanings: “Great are the works of the LORD, studied by all who have pleasure in them” (Ps. 111:2 RSV); “I have sought out your precepts” (Ps. 119:45; cf. vv. 94, 155); “Observe and seek out all the commandments of the LORD” (1 Chron. 28:8 RSV). Although this “searching” of God’s law should not in these passages be understood as exegesis in a strict sense, it is only a small step to the later explicit exegetical reference of midrash: “This is the study [midrash] of the Law” (1QS 8.15); “The interpretation [midrash] of ‘Blessed is the man ...’ [cf. Ps. 1:1]” (4QFlor 1.14). Indeed, the Teacher of Righteousness is called the “searcher of the Law” (CD 6.7). Philo urges his readers to join him in searching (ereunan = darash) Scripture (Det. 17 §57; 39 §141; Cher. 5 §14). In rabbinic writings midrash becomes standard and its practice as an exegetical method was consciously considered.

In the writings of the rabbis, midrash attains its most sophisticated and self-conscious form. In “searching” the sacred text, the rabbis attempted to update scriptural teaching to make it relevant to new circumstances and issues. This approach was felt to be legitimate because Scripture was understood as divine in character and therefore could yield many meanings and many applications: “‘Is not my word like a hammer that breaks the rock in pieces?’ [Jer. 23:29]. As the hammer causes numerous sparks to flash forth, so is a verse of Scripture capable of many interpretations” (b. Sanhedrin 34a; cf. m. 'Abot 5:22).

According to early rabbinic tradition, midrash could be practiced following seven rules (or middot) of Hillel the Elder (cf. t. Sanh. 7.11; 'Abot R. Natan [A] §37). All of these rules are utilized in the Gospels.

1. Qal wa-khomer. “Light and heavy” (lit.). According to this rule, what is true or applicable in a “light” (or less important) instance is surely true or applicable in a “heavy” (or more important) instance. This rule is plainly in evidence when Jesus assures his disciples that because God cares (p 382) for the birds (light), he will surely care for them (heavy; Matt. 6:26//Luke 12:24).

2. Gezerah shawah. “An equivalent regulation” (lit.). According to this rule, one passage may be explained by another, if similar words or phrases are present. Comparing himself to David, who on one occasion violated the law by eating consecrated bread (1 Sam. 21:6), Jesus justifies his apparent violation of the Sabbath (Mark 2:23–28 et par.).

3. Binyan ab mikkathub ekhad. “Constructing a father [principal rule] from one [passage]” (lit.). Since God is not the God of the dead, but of the living, the revelation at the burning bush, “I am the God of Abraham ...” (Exod. 3:14–15), implies that Abraham is to be resurrected. From this one text and its implication, one may further infer, as Jesus did (Mark 12:26), the truth of the general resurrection.

4. Binyan ab mishene ketubim. “Constructing a father [principal rule] from two writings [or passages]” (lit.). From the commands to unmuzzle the ox (Deut. 25:4) and share sacrifices with the priests (18:1–8), it is inferred that those who preach are entitled to support (Matt. 10:10; Luke 10:7; 1 Cor. 9:9, 13; 1 Tim. 5:18).

5. Kelal upherat upherat ukelal. “General and particular, and particular and general” (lit.). When Jesus replies that the greatest commandment (the “general”) is to love the Lord with all one’s heart (Deut. 6:4–5) and to love one’s neighbor as oneself (Lev. 19:18), he has summed up all of the “particular” commandments (Mark 12:28–34).

6. Kayotse bo mi-maqom akher. “To which something [is] similar in another place [or passage]” (lit.). If the Son of Man (or Messiah) is to sit on one of the thrones set up before “the Ancient of Days” (as Rabbi Aqiba interprets the “thrones” in Dan 7:9; cf. b. Khag. 14a; b. Sanh. 38b), and if Messiah is to sit at God’s right hand (Ps. 110:1), then it may be inferred that when the Son of Man comes with the clouds (Dan. 7:13–14), he will be seated at the right hand of God and will judge his enemies. This is evidently what Jesus implied in his reply to Caiaphas (Mark 14:62).

7. Dabar halamed me inyano. “Word of instruction from the context” (lit.). This rule is exemplified in Jesus’ teaching against divorce (Matt. 19:4–8 et par.). Although it is true that Moses allowed divorce (Deut. 24:1–4), it is also true that God never intended the marriage union to be broken, as implied in Gen. 1:27 and 2:24.

Rabbinic midrash falls into two basic categories. These categories are distinguished by objectives, not by method. Halakah (from halak, “to walk”) refers to a legal ruling (plural: halakoth). Hence, a halakic midrash gives legal interpretation. The purpose of halakoth was to build an oral “fence” around written Torah, making violation of it (written Torah) less likely (’Abot 1:1; 3:14). Haggadah (lit., “telling,” from the root nagad, “to draw”) refers to the interpretation of narrative and is usually understood as homiletical or nonlegal interpretation (plural: haggadoth). Best known is the Passover Haggadah (cf. b. Pesakh. 115b, 116b). Haggadic midrash was much more imaginative in its attempts to fill in the gaps in Scripture and to explain away apparent discrepancies, difficulties, and unanswered questions. Legal rulings were not to be derived from haggadic interpretation (cf. y. Pe’ah 2:6).

The rabbis of the pre-Mishnaic period (50 BCE–200 CE) are referred to as the Tannaim (the “repeaters”), while the rabbis of the later period (“early”: 200–500 CE; “late”: 500–1500) are called the Amoraim (the “sayers”). Obviously, the Tannaitic traditions are of the greatest value for NT interpretation.

The legal corpus, in which halakic concerns predominate, is made up of Mishnah (“repetition” or “[memorizable] paragraph”; ca. 200 CE), Tosefta (lit. “supplement [to Mishnah]”; ca. 300), and Talmud (“learning”; Palestinian [or Jerusalem], ca. 500; Babylonian, ca. 600; note that the word for “disciple” is talmid, “one who learns”). Many of the halakoth found in the Mishnah date back in one form or another to the time of Jesus (e.g., cf. Mark 2:16 and m. Demai 2:3 on being the guest of a nonobservant Jew; Mark 3:1–6 and m. Shabb. 14:3–4; 22:6 on healing on the Sabbath; Mark 7:3–13 and m. Ned. 1:3 concerning qorban [“corban,” NIV]). It was believed that the oral law ultimately derives from Moses: “Many rulings were transmitted to Moses on Sinai, [and] ... all of them are embodied in Mishnah” (y. Pesakh. 2:6).

Many of the nonlegal works are called midrashim (“commentaries”). From the Tannaitic period we have Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael (on Exodus), Sifre Numbers, Sifre Deuteronomy, and Sifra Leviticus. From the early Amoraic period we have Midrash Rabbah (on the Pentateuch and the Five Scrolls), Midrash on the Psalms, Pesiqta Rabbati, Pesiqta of Rab Kahana, Seder Eliyahu

Rabbah, and Midrash Tankhuma. Tannaitic tradition is often found in these writings as well and is then called a baraita (outside teaching).

(p 383)Pesher

At Qumran, Scripture (usually prophecy) was viewed as containing mysteries in need of explanation. The “pesher” was the explanation of the mystery: “The pesher of this [Scripture] concerns the Teacher of Righteousness to whom God made known all the mysteries of the words of his servants the prophets” (1QpHab 7.4–5). It was assumed that the text spoke of and to the Qumran community, and that it spoke of eschatological events about to unfold. There is also a charismatic element to pesher exegesis, in that the interpreter knows things contained in Scripture that the original author did not. As in NT exegesis (see Mark 12:10–11, citing Ps. 118:22–23; 14:27, citing Zech. 13:7; Acts 2:17–21, citing Joel 2:28–32), pesher exegesis understands specific biblical passages as fulfilled in specific historical events and experiences.

Allegory

Allegorical interpretation involves extracting a symbolic meaning from the text. It assumes that a deeper and more-sophisticated interpretation is to be found beneath the obvious letter of the passage. The allegorist does not, however, necessarily assume that the text is unhistorical or without a literal meaning. His exegesis is simply not concerned with this aspect of the biblical text. The best-known first-century allegorist was Philo of Alexandria, whose many books afford a wealth of examples of the allegorical interpretation of Scripture, primarily of the Pentateuch. Allegorical interpretation is found in Qumran and in the rabbis. There is even some allegory in the NT. The most obvious example is Gal. 4:24–31, where Sarah and Hagar symbolize two covenants. Another example is found in 1 Cor. 10:1–4, where crossing the Red Sea symbolizes Christian baptism (though this aspect may be typological as well), and the rock symbolizes Christ. Jesus’ parables are not allegories, but they do sometimes contain allegorical features, as in the parable of the Vineyard Tenants in Mark 12:1–9. There the vineyard owner is God, the vineyard is Israel, the tenant farmers are the religious leaders, and the murdered son of the vineyard owner is Jesus.

Typology

The NT makes several comparisons between various OT and NT individuals and institutions. These comparisons are often expressed, sometimes explicitly, in terms of typology, and as the examples below illustrate, constitute major components of Christology and ecclesiology. But typology offers more than comparisons between specific events and details; it also establishes important links between and within the Testaments themselves. Typology therefore has played an important role in the very formation of the biblical canon. By means of typology, as well as by means of prophetic fulfillment, the NT writers present Jesus and the church as the continuation and completion of the OT.

The biblical concept of typology is based upon the word typos, which literally means “impression,” “mark” (John 20:25), or “image” (Acts 7:43). Metaphorically it usually means “example” or “model” (Phil. 3:17; 1 Thess. 1:7; 2 Thess. 3:9; 1 Tim. 4:12; Titus 2:7; cf. hypotypōsis in 1 Tim. 1:16; 2 Tim. 1:13), or even “warning” (1 Cor. 10:6, cf. typikōs in 10:11). In hermeneutical contexts typos means something like “pattern” or “figure” (Heb. 8:5). Although the hermeneutical usage of this word, and the related word antitypos (“copy” or “counterpart”; Heb. 9:24; 1 Pet. 3:21), is found only in the Pauline and General Epistles, important typologies are also present in the Gospels.

Typology is not unique to the NT. Within the OT itself typological comparisons are made. The exodus story becomes a type of salvation in Second Isaiah (Isa. 40:3–5; 43:16–24; 49:8–13). Psalm 95:7–11 presents the wilderness rebellion (Exod. 17:1–7; Num. 20:1–13) as an example of hardness of heart that Israel is to avoid. Psalm 110:4 mentions Melchizedek, priest of Salem (Gen. 14:18), as a biblical example of the priestly role of the king.

Typology is not to be confused with allegory. Allegorical interpretation assigns, usually rather arbitrarily, “deeper” meanings to biblical stories and their various details. The actual history of the biblical story is unimportant to this method of interpretation. But in typological interpretation, history is essential. It is believed that the original historical event is the “type,” and the later corresponding event is the “antitype” that parallels, perhaps fulfills, and sometimes even transcends the type.

Because in the early Jewish and Christian period biblical exegesis was founded on the belief that Scripture contained the ever-relevant will of God, every effort was made to bring its teaching to bear upon the contemporary world and the concerns of the believing community. This effort lies behind all interpretative methods: allegorization, midrash, peshet, and typology. Allegorization discovers morals and theological symbols and truths from various details of Scripture. Peshet seeks to unlock the prophetic mysteries hidden (p 384) in Scripture. Midrash seeks to update Torah and clarify obscurities and problems in Scripture. And typology represents the effort to coordinate the past and present (and future) according to the major events, persons, and institutions of Scripture. Despite their differences, there is significant overlap between these methods of interpretation. For example, to some extent all four involve a “searching” (midrash) of Scripture. All four find symbolic meaning that transcends the letter of the text (allegory). All four recognize the presence of mystery and hiddenness within the text (peshet). And all four believe that to some extent the present and future are foreshadowed by biblical history (typology). The real difference among these methods is more a matter of what Scripture is essentially taken to be than a matter of method.

Emphasis upon the unity of Scripture and history is the distinctive of typological interpretation. What God has done in the past (as presented in Scripture), he continues to do in the present (or will do in the future). Recent events or future events that are interpreted as salvific are frequently compared to major OT events of salvation. Such comparison does at least two things: (1) It lends credibility to the belief that the newer events are indeed part of the divine plan; and (2) it enables the interpreter to grasp more fully the theological significance of the newer events. Typological interpretation makes it possible for later communities of faith to discern the continuing activity of God in history. It is likely that these ideas lay behind the typologies that Jesus developed.

Typological interpretation is not limited to the NT; it is also found in rabbinical writings. Just as Israel prevailed over Amalek as long as Moses was able to hold his hands high, so also Israel has prospered when the people have obeyed the law of Moses (Mekilta on Exod. 17:11). The messianic age is often compared with the exodus, a comparison frequently developed by typological interpretation. For example, when Messiah comes, manna will once again be provided in the wilderness (Mekilta on Exod. 16:13, 33). See also Allegory; Relationship between the Testaments; Targum; Typology

Bibliography

Bowker, J. The Targums and Rabbinic Literature. Cambridge University Press, 1969; Drane, J. “Typology.” EvQ 50 (1978): 195–210; Ellis, E. “Midrash, Targum and NT Quotations.” Pages 61–69 in Neotestamentica et Semitica, ed. E. Ellis and M. Wilcox. T&T Clark, 1969; Forestell, J. Targumic Traditions and the New Testament. SBL Aramaic Studies 4. Scholars Press, 1979; Gertner, M. “Midrashim in the NT.” JSS 7 (1962): 267–92; Le Deaut, R. “Apropos a Definition of Midrash.” Int 25 (1971): 259–82; Lieberman, S. Hellenism in Jewish Palestine. 2d ed. Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1962; McNamara, M. The New Testament and the Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch. AnBib 27A. 2d

ed. Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1978; idem. Targum and Testament. Irish University Press/Eerdmans, 1972; Miller, M. "Targum, Midrash, and the Use of the OT in the NT." JSJ 2 (1971): 29–82; Neusner, J. Midrash in Context. Fortress, 1983; Patte, D. Early Jewish Hermeneutic in Palestine. SBLDS 22. Scholars Press, 1975; Porton, G. "Defining Midrash." Pages 55–92 in The Study of Ancient Judaism, ed. J. Neusner. Ktav, 1981; idem. Understanding Rabbinic Midrash. Ktav, 1985; Vermes, G. "Bible and Midrash: Early OT Exegesis." Pages 199–231 in The Cambridge History of the Bible, ed. P. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans. Cambridge University Press, 1970; Wright, A. The Literary Genre Midrash. Alba House, 1967.

Craig A. Evans

Job, Book of

Job presents both great opportunities and peculiar difficulties for those seeking to read it theologically. Why would God cause such disasters to happen to righteous Job? How do Job's protests and accusations against God fit with faith in the rest of Scripture? Are Job's laments still appropriate or permissible after the death and resurrection of Christ?

History of Interpretation

Two trends in early Christian interpretation can be seen in John Chrysostom (ca. 347–407) and Jerome (ca. 347–419). Chrysostom found in Job a model of self-denial for those struggling with the devil, and his perseverance under trial was therefore to be imitated. Yet, it is largely the Job of chapters 1–2 who is Chrysostom's model, not the protesting Job of the dialogue, nor the Job transformed by the Yahweh speeches (Glatzer 24–26). Instead of emphasizing the prologue, Jerome used texts such as 19:23–27 to establish the hope and reality of bodily resurrection as a key to a Christian reading. Thus, Job's trust in his Redeemer is the book's clear and distinctive contribution.

In Moralia in Job, Gregory the Great (ca. 540–604) argues for allegorical and moral readings. On the moral level, he seeks to explain away Job's bold words to God, and to portray him as the patient saint of the prologue. His preferred reading is an allegorical one so that, for example, the ostrich in 39:13–14 is the synagogue and her eggs are the apostles "born of the flesh of the synagogue (p 385)." The book thus outlines the great doctrines of the Christian message, with Job himself being a type of Christ.

The variety of medieval views can be seen by contrasting Maimonides (1135–1204) and Aquinas (1225–74). Both saw that Job centered on the issue of God's providence, but Maimonides in The Guide to the Perplexed understands the story as a parable about a nonhistorical person who, though righteous, lacked some wisdom.

He suggests that Job had wrong beliefs instigated by Satan, and it was Elihu's role to introduce the concept of the angel of correction and intercession, a kind of counterpart to Satan, who enables the "knowledgeless" Job to hear "the prophetic revelation" of the Yahweh speeches. Aquinas, however, in The Literal Exposition of Job, views Job as a real historical figure who, despite his advanced wisdom, was still sinful in his protests. He argued against "spiritual" readings of the story (allegorical, moral, anagogical) and opted for the "literal" or historical sense.

The Reformers strongly affirmed the literal sense rather than the allegorical. Luther (1483–1546), in his preface to the German translation of Job, argues that the theme of the book is whether the righteous can suffer misfortune. He thinks that Job, in his human weakness, spoke wrongly toward God, but was still more righteous than the friends. He does not explore how to read the book christologically. Calvin (1509–64) wrote 159 sermons on the book, but no commentary. He found in Job a resource for enduring suffering, although he often contrasts the more "humble" or submissive approach of the David of the psalms to the angry and impatient outbursts of Job, which cross the line of genuine piety (Schreiner). He found much truth in the words of the friends, but especially in Elihu's view of God's providence and the place of suffering. Despite his pride, Job came to see that God could be trusted to run his world justly.

In more recent times (nineteenth to mid-twentieth century; beyond in Germany), the historical-critical approach has dominated Joban studies, generally focusing on innocent suffering as the central theme of Job, and thus foregrounding the prologue and epilogue. This has led to some clarification of matters of language, date, authorship, and literary parallels in the ancient Near East, but has been accompanied by doubts about the authenticity of many segments in the book (e.g., ch. 28, Elihu, the Yahweh speeches, the epilogue). Such scholars usually assumed that the putative earlier versions of the book offer better clues for the meaning of the book than does its present form.

In the mid-twentieth century, the focus shifted to the dialogue and its discussion of the doctrine of retribution, often seen to be in tension with the prologue and epilogue. This also raised the issue of theodicy, or justifying God's moral governance of the universe. A third movement has been to concentrate on Yahweh's speeches and Job's reply, which makes the key issue the nature of God and how humans can respond to God. A fourth approach has been to explore the message of the book as protesting and unorthodox, calling into question such ideas as retribution or traditional understandings of God (Dell).

More recently, English-speaking scholars have tended to read the book as a literary and theological whole (e.g., Andersen; Habel; Hartley; Janzen; Newsom). Such final-form approaches have sought to give full weight to each section of the book, and they have regained a sensitivity to lament as a legitimate stance before God. Other contemporary interpretations include the liberationist approach of Gutiérrez, deconstructionist readings by Clines, a historicized reading by Wolfers (Job is the nation of Israel), and a variety of feminist, psychoanalytical, and philosophical perspectives.

This brief survey alerts us to several contentious issues. First, where do you look (if at all) for the teaching of the book as a whole? Is it in the prologue and epilogue, the dialogue between Job and his friends, or in the Yahweh speeches? Second, is the book about suffering, the nature of God and his activity in the world, or the appropriate stance for humans to take before God? Third, there is the difficulty with Job's strong laments and protests. Can Job be read in a way that reflects God's verdict in 42:7–8? Finally, how should the book be read as Christian Scripture? Can Job be seen as a person of faith apart from those passages in which he looks for a Redeemer? Does the book point to Christ, and if so, in what way? How is Job to be read as part of the canon? A theological reading of the book is committed to its coherence in its final form, even if there is some tension between the various parts. It will not excise parts that are problematic.

The Message of Job

The popular perception is that Job is a book about suffering, but in what sense? It does not explore why there is suffering, nor the quandary of innocent suffering, but rather the question of how a person can respond in the midst of suffering (p 386)(Clines). However, this is really to assert that suffering is simply the setting in which the issue of the book is raised. The question of 1:9, “Does Job fear God for nothing?”—whether Job's faith is genuine or based on self-interest—is tested by the losses and suffering in the rest of the prologue. Suffering clarifies and isolates the central issue of faith. In a similar way, the Satan's role in the book is not to inform readers about Satan, who disappears after the prologue (though Fyall suggests that he reappears as Behemoth and Leviathan). The Satan functions simply to implement the testing of Job's faith.

Throughout the dialogue (chs. 3–31), Job's God-directed cries and complaints are best viewed as calls on the seemingly absent God to become present. Though he strongly accuses God (6:4; 13:21; 16:11–14), he longs to speak to God in person (13:15), in a relationship in which God would call and Job would answer (14:15). Job explores imaginative possibilities, including a figure variously described as an arbiter, witness, and Redeemer (9:32–35; 16:18–22; 19:23–27). His oath of clearance (ch. 31) climaxes in a cry that God might answer him (31:35). A legal metaphor is woven through the book (Habel), as Job desperately pleads for justice from God. Job persistently believes that only God can resolve his crisis (7:20–21; 10:1–2; 13:3, 15–19, 22–24; 19:25–27; 23:10–16).

A number of false trails suggest some unsatisfactory answers to Job's dilemma. The first is the advice of the friends. The final verdict of the book is that Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar have not spoken about God what is right, but that Job has (42:7–8). This has puzzled many readers since the dialogue is dominated by Job challenging, accusing, and complaining to God, while the friends attempt to defend God's justice and explain Job's suffering. Their trite formulas depict Job as a sinner suffering for his sins (4:17; 5:7, 17–27; 8:3–7; 11:6, 13–16). In the case of Job, their analysis and advice have missed the mark.

Another false trail is the suggestion that the wisdom poem of chapter 28 provides the answer, implying that Job needed to learn to fear God (28:28). However, the prologue has stated that Job already feared God (1:1, 8; 2:3). Furthermore, Job 28 is followed by chapters 29–31, in which Job repeats his complaints and calls for the presence of God. Chapter 28 has not provided the answer, and Job is still calling for a resolution. When God finally does appear, he does not mention fearing him as the way forward.

The final false trail is found in the Elihu speeches (chs. 32–37). While some misunderstand Elihu to be a fourth friend, his function is rather that of an adjudicator. Elihu narrows in on Job's words in the debate (34:3, 5–6, 9, 35–37; 35:16), rather than Job's conduct before the dialogue. His conclusion is that Job has not "spoken of God what is right," a verdict that is thus intentionally set up as a rival to the later words of God. He is thus a foil for the real answer (McCabe).

Job's situation is clarified when chapters 38–41 are seen to provide the answer. There is debate over whether these should be called the Yahweh speeches, drawing attention to what God said, or rather labeled a theophany, which highlights (p 387) God's appearance. Some of Job's problems (e.g., God's apparent absence) are resolved simply by the arrival of Yahweh. Yet God's speeches also bring about a paradigm shift in the book, and God even needs to speak twice before Job finally understands. His survey of the natural world decisively shifts the issue from Job's question "Why am I not dealt with justly?" to the broader one of how God orders his creation. The dialogue is thus shown to have been telescopic, rather than panoramic. A delicate balance has to be maintained in these chapters, as Yahweh seeks to redirect Job's energies without crushing him. If Yahweh is too harsh, he would appear to endorse the views of the friends; if Yahweh is too soft, then Job will not hear what is needed. The playful irony of the Yahweh speeches preserves a right balance. Job's longings are met, but his broadened understanding has enabled him to persevere in faith.

This change of perspective is exactly what is found in Job's response (42:2–6). He concedes that he spoke of “things too wonderful for me, which I did not know” (v. 3 NRSV; hence the Yahweh speeches). Furthermore, before God's appearance, he had only heard of God “by the hearing of the ear, but now my eye sees you” (v. 5 NRSV; hence the theophany). His new direction is recorded in 42:6, which has often been misunderstood as Job repenting of his sin. This is most unlikely in view of God's endorsement of Job's words (42:7–8, including the honorific title “servant”), and Job's intercession for the friends, leading to their restoration (42:8–10). The Hebrew permits, and the context demands, a translation such as “therefore I reject and turn from the way of dust and ashes” (lamenting as a social outcast). Now that Job's horizons have been expanded and his thinking reconfigured, Job needs to change his perspective in life, which is precisely what he proceeds to do as he rejoins society (42:10–17). God's appearance and his speeches have enabled Job to move on. Since Job feared God for nothing, genuine human faith is possible.

Job as Part of the Bible

The intellectual or ideological setting of the book is more significant than its historical setting. Job is a part of the wisdom corpus and stands in counterpoint to Proverbs' insistence that the world is regular and ordered, due in part to the presence of wisdom at creation (Prov. 8:22–31; 3:19–20). While Proverbs allows for temporary setbacks (24:15–16), it does proclaim that the righteous will be rewarded and the wicked punished (3:9–10; 10:27–32)—the doctrine of retribution.

The book of Job protests not against Proverbs, but against a fossilized misunderstanding of retribution that had misrepresented the mainstream wisdom tradition of Proverbs (Holmgren). Job's friends are examples of those who have ignored the flexibility of Proverbs (as seen in Prov. 26:4–5), and simply read off a person's spiritual state from their circumstances. The prologue to Job (chs. 1–2) reveals that Job's suffering is not a consequence of his sin, and God's failure to rebuke Job in chapters 38–41 clearly shows that his honest protests throughout the dialogue are seen as legitimate. The book of Job is not rejecting the doctrine of retribution, but simply insisting that retributive justice is not the only principle on which God runs his world.

Job's story is not reflected on at any length in the rest of the Bible, though Job is listed as a righteous person in Ezek. 14:14, 20. However, the issues grappled with in the book have strong echoes in the rest of the OT. The endorsement of Job's lamenting is understandable in the light of a significant OT theme that regards protest addressed to God as legitimate. This can be most clearly seen in the complaints of Lamentations, Jeremiah's laments, and the many lament psalms in the Psalter. These do not picture doubt and protest as illegitimate, but rather as needing to be directed to God, since he has the power to rectify any crisis.

The strong theology of creation in Job also integrates well with the rest of the OT. Genesis 1–11 reminds us that God is king over the whole world that he has created, and not just over Israel. Job is set outside Israel and before the giving of the law (Job 1:1), apparently to give a typically wisdom universal twist to the issues that the book explores. In the Yahweh speeches, Job is confronted with God's kingly rule as sustainer in everyday life, and this broadens his understanding of God's purposes. Until God spoke, he had understood too narrowly how God rules his creation, but now he sees that it is wider than the dispensing of justice. This fits well with the cameos of God's providential involvement in everyday life in books like Ruth and Esther.

The NT affirms many of these OT insights. The legitimacy of lament is reinforced by Christ's uttering the opening words of a lament psalm while hanging on the cross (Matt. 27:46, citing Ps. 22:1; cf. Heb. 5:7–8). Furthermore, God's purposes in Christ are clearly wider than human justice, for in his love and mercy Christ died for undeserving sinners. Yet, while the NT focuses less on the mighty Creator and Redeemer of the OT, and more on God assuming humanity, some full-orbed descriptions of Jesus occur. He was in the beginning, and all things came into being through him (John 1:1–4). Colossians 1:15–23 describes Christ not only as Redeemer but also as the firstborn over all creation, and that in him all things were created and hold together. Thus, while there is a focus in the NT on God's sovereignty in redeeming his people, there is certainly no denial of Christ's lordship over creation. All that Yahweh says in Job 38–41, Christ can say too. His mighty control of the created world surfaced in his nature miracles (Mark 4:35–41; cf. Job 38:8–11). Furthermore, the world to come will be a new creation (Rev. 21–22), in which the Lamb's majesty will be fully seen (Rev.

5:11–14; 21:22–23).

The connection between Christ as Lord of creation and the need for persevering faith is also manifest in the NT. At the climax of Col. 1:15–23, Paul’s hearers are reminded to “continue securely established and steadfast in the faith” (NRSV). The supremacy of Christ as Creator and sustainer is meant to lead to persevering faith. In the miracle of stilling the storm Jesus asks the disciples, “Where is your faith?” expecting them to keep on trusting him. Significantly, the only time that the NT names Job, it singles out his steadfastness or perseverance (hypononē, James 5:11), and it invites us to understand Job’s faith in light of his vindication in the end or outcome (telos) of his restored situation (1 Pet. 5:6–10).

Job and Theology

The book of Job testifies to a God who is sovereign over all creation. The God of the friends (despite the reference to 5:12–13 in 1 Cor. 3:19) seems to be a hollow and shrunken version of the one who appears and speaks in chapters 38–41. No human dogma, even that God must act with (p 388)justice, can bind or restrict God (35:7 and 41:11, cited in Rom. 11:35). While God is undoubtedly just, his ordering of the world is broader than a reductionistic human concept of retributive justice in which he can do no more than reward righteousness and punish wickedness.

The picture that emerges in chapters 38–41 is one of God having been involved in his creation from its very beginning, both in the inanimate (38:1–38) and the animal realms (38:39–39:30). He has mastered the mythological forces of cosmic chaos, Behemoth and Leviathan (chs. 40–41), though these may be natural creatures described in hyperbolic terms. God is also sovereign ruler over the creation, so that the Satan must ask permission before afflicting Job (1:6–12; 2:1–6). God is also free to restore Job once the test is over (42:10–15), even though some object that this reestablishes the doctrine of retribution. The book never denies the flexible doctrine of retribution evident in Proverbs, but refuses to distort this into an ironclad dogma that shackles God.

The theology of creation is clearly pivotal in a comprehensive biblical theology. In Job, creation is mentioned in a couple of hymnic (9:5–10; 26:5–14) and other passages (10:3, 8–12, 18) in the dialogue, in chapter 28, and above all in the Yahweh speeches (introduced by Elihu in 36:27–37:24). Job urges his friends to learn from the natural world from the natural world ((1212::77—1010; ; 1414::77—1212, , 1818—1919; ; 2424::55, , 19), and God certainly uses it as an object lesson in chapters 38–39. God’s delight in his ordered creation is reflected in the leisurely nature of the guided tour, in his care for those bearing young (39:1), and in his evident pleasure in animals such as the warhorse (39:19–25). Yet, there are puzzling elements of God’s ordering of creation such as the clumsy and neglectful ostrich (39:13–16) and those animals that devour others (38:39–40). Both order and apparent disorder are manifest.

Furthermore, the way in which God is ordering his creation makes it clear that his concerns are wider than humans alone. The clearest example of this is when he makes rainfall where there are no humans (38:26–27), while the series of impossible questions indicates that God’s ordering of his cosmos is beyond human comprehension. These factors have significant implications for contemporary ecological debates, both in their assertion of God’s ownership of creation as well as in the breadth of his concerns. The majestic picture of God as the Creator, distinct from his creation, yet involved in freely caring for it, is clearly different from process theology readings.

Job also contributes many insights for a better understanding of humanity. Job’s successful passing of the test testifies that he does “fear God for nothing” (1:9), and thus it is humanly possible to have faith in God without ulterior motives. Incidentally, chapter 31 is a classic source of the OT picture of the personal ethics of a righteous person. What emerges from this oath of clearance is an “identikit” picture of unblemished righteousness and integrity. Cultic matters are not at the heart of this (only 31:26–28), nor is keeping the law, for Job’s integrity extends to his thoughts and attitudes (31:1, 9, 24–25, 29) and not simply his outward actions.

The nature of human piety is stretched to its extremities within the book. It is Job’s strong, accusatory words of protest in the dialogue that seem to sit most awkwardly with his piety in the prologue. Yet, Job’s laments and complaints are directed to God and assume God is in control and can alone right the situation. They are ultimately a call for a restored relationship with a seemingly absent God. In such trying circumstances as Job’s, they are legitimated as a genuine part of faith. They deal with the hiddenness of God without giving up on the relationship or reducing God to less than God-sized proportions.

Room needs to be made in an understanding of prayer for such words, since God is big enough to take genuine hurt and bewilderment. Job’s raw honesty in addressing God is part of a proper expression of faith, not an abandonment of it. His pain and confusion can be communicated openly to his God. Job’s struggle is to break through the straitjacketed thinking of his friends to a restored relationship with God, and this only comes through his bold words addressed to the one who can help.

Bibliography

Andersen, F. Job. TOTC. InterVarsity, 1976; Beuken, W. A. M., ed. The Book of Job. BETL. Leuven University Press, 1994; Calvin, J. Sermons from Job. Edited and translated by L. Nixon. Baker, 1952; Clines, D. J. A. Job 1–20. WBC. Word, 1989; Dell, K. J. The Book of Job as Sceptical Literature. BZAW. De Gruyter, 1991; Fyall, R. S. Now My Eyes Have Seen You. NSBT. Apollos, 2002; Glatzer, N. N., ed. The Dimensions of Job. Schocken, 1969; Gutiérrez, G. On Job, trans. M. J. O’Connell. Orbis, 1988; Habel, N. The Book of Job. OTL. SCM, 1985; Hartley, J. The Book of Job. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1988; Holmgren, F. “Barking Dogs Never Bite, Except Now and Then: Proverbs and Job.” AThR 61 (1979): 341–53; Janzen, J. G. Job. Interpretation. John Knox, 1985; Lévêque, J. Job et son Dieu. 2 vols. (p 389)J. Gabalda, 1970; McCabe, R. V. “Elihu’s Contribution to the Thought of the Book of Job.” DBSJ 2 (1997): 47–80; Newsom, C. “The Book of Job.” NIB 4 (1996): 317–637; Schreiner, S. Where Shall Wisdom Be Found? University of Chicago Press, 1994; Smith, G. V. “Is There a Place for Job’s Wisdom in Old Testament Theology?” TJ 13 NS (1992): 3–20; Wolfers, D. Deep Things out of Darkness. Eerdmans, 1995.

Lindsay Wilson

Joel, Book of

The book of Joel is the second book in the Minor Prophets (the Twelve, MT). The superscription (1:1) connects the prophecy with Joel the son of Pethuel. The name Joel is fairly common, and the father’s name is otherwise unknown. The book lacks data that suggest a specific historical context. No chronological setting is provided, and nothing else is known of Joel.

Date

Interpreters vary greatly in dating the book (from the ninth to the second century BCE). The cumulative evidence is suggestive of a date as early as the late sixth or fifth century (Crenshaw, Joel), or as late as the late fifth to mid fourth century (Wolff). Calvin’s assessment that the theological message of Joel is unaffected by the issue of the date is still relevant.

The Locust Plague

The thematic variation between images of the locusts and the drought (1:4, 5–7, 8–10, 11–12; 2:3–8, 16–20) and warriors (1:6; 2:2–11, 20) has raised the issue of the reality of the locusts. Some rabbinic, patristic, and medieval interpreters understood the locust plague as an image of an enemy attack, such as the Assyrians or Babylonians. Rashi, Calvin, and Luther interpreted the plague as a realistic portrayal of an agricultural disaster that may have evoked memories of foreign invaders (“the northern army,” 2:20, 25). Most recent interpreters agree with this conclusion, but Stuart has returned to the metaphorical interpretation and links the prophecy with an invasion by Assyrians (701 BCE) or Babylonians (598 or 588).

Joel among the Twelve

The placement of Joel in the LXX after Micah varies from the MT. The LXX is more chronological throughout, and this is also true for the Twelve: Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi (Crenshaw, Joel). The arrangers of the MT paid more attention to literary links between the books of Joel and Amos, such as Yahweh’s roaring from Zion (Joel 3:16 [4:16 MT]; Amos 1:2) and the mention of nations (Philistia in Joel 3:4 [4:4] and Amos 1:7; Tyre and Sidon in Joel 3:4 [4:4] and Amos 1:9–10; Edom in Joel 3:19 [4:19] and Amos 1:11). Further, the Zion focus in Joel provides a balance to the Israelite orientation of Hosea and Amos. Each part of the Book of the Twelve makes a contribution to the thematic network of the Minor Prophets and particularly to the theme of the Day of the Lord.

Theological and Literary Unity

Rabbinical, patristic, medieval, and Reformation interpreters viewed the book as unified. The critical analysis of the nineteenth century questioned the book’s literary and theological unity (Duhm). The unity of the book has found general acceptance in recent literature except for isolated passages, such as 2:3b; 2:29 (3:2); and 3:4–8 (4:4–8) (Wolff; Crenshaw, Joel). The various proposed structures support the unity of the book, but there is little unanimity on the structure.

The Message of Joel

The literary reading of Joel as a unit engages several gaps that open the theological dimensions of the book. First, the text connects the locust plague in history with the eschatological day of the Lord (1:15–18; 2:2–11). Joel links the real world of human phenomena (1:1–14) with the expectation of the eschatological day of the Lord (2:1–11). The superhuman strength of the locusts dramatically heightens the catastrophe. The images of darkness (2:2), fire (1:19–20; 2:3), and earthquake (2:10) suggest a theophany. God himself is behind the image of the locusts, as he comes to bring devastation on the land and to judge his people (2:10). His coming is near (2:1), cosmic (2:10), and awe-inspiring (2:11). The experience of the locust plague in history is a mirror image of the coming day of the Lord in the future (eschatology).

Second, the language and images of the oracle of salvation (2:18–27) combine what can be conceived in history with what is not readily conceivable (eschatology). The prophecy anticipates that Yahweh’s renewal will embrace all aspects of their suffering. The Lord will send rain (2:23), so the crops will provide food and drink (2:19, 21–23, 24, 26). He will protect his people from the disgrace they have suffered from the “northerner” (2:20, 25–27).

The imagery of the renewal is so radical that the oracle conjures up a world unlike the world (p 390) known to humans: the radical elimination of evil and the absolute presence of God’s goodness, resulting in the beneficent joy of his people. The Lord assures them that they will never again suffer (2:19, 26–27). The abundant provisions and the protection offered by the Lord mark the age of a new creation. The whole of creation (humans, fields, animals) shares in the benefits of this renewal (2:21–22). The sound of crying and lament is exchanged for the sound of joy (v. 23) and of praise in Zion (v. 26).

Third, the promise of restoration links up with the coming of the Spirit. But what is the connection between the two? The key to the interpretation lies in the first words of 2:28 (3:1): “And afterward.” Is the Spirit’s coming subsequent to the era of restoration, or are the two events more closely related? Many take “afterward” to be subsequent to God’s act of restoration from the agricultural disaster. The promise of the Spirit (2:28–32 [3:1–5]) confirms God’s reversal of fortunes, his goodness, and his presence (2:18–27). The phenomena of God’s goodness are not an end in themselves. They evidence God’s presence among his people (2:27). The self-declaration, “You will know that I am in Israel” (v. 27), and the recognition formula, “I am the LORD your God,” attest to the beneficent presence of Yahweh and to his commitment to bring about all that he has promised. Yahweh alone is God, and he will remove suffering from his people (2:26–27; cf. v. 19; 3:17 [4:17]). The benefits of God’s assurance take place in history and extend to the time of the renewal of all things (the new creation).

Fourth, the Spirit comes on the “whole” community (“all flesh,” 2:28 [3:1]). The long-expected Spirit (cf. Num. 11:25–29) will come and manifest Yahweh’s presence in the new community. Each member in the new community shares in the gift of the Spirit. The democratization by the Holy Spirit transforms the community from a hierocratic (ruled by priests) to a theocratic community. The totality of God’s people, nevertheless, is marvelously diverse: male and female, young and old, free and servants. The new community consists of those who “rend [their] heart” rather than their garments

(2:13). They are further defined by their “call” (vv. 28, 32 [3:1, 5]). On the one hand, they are “all who call on the name of the LORD” (v. 32 AT). The prophet has already prepared the reader for the importance of this call, because he, too, has called on the Lord (1:19). On the other hand, this group is defined as the remnant “whom the LORD calls” (v. 32).

Fifth, Yahweh is sovereign over the nations in history (3:1–16 [4:1–16]). This section gives hope to the new community as they still face the real world, with adversaries and enmity. Yahweh promises that he will hold the nations accountable for what they have done to his people and to the land (3:2–4 [4:2–3]). As time (the day of the Lord) was the focus in the previous chapters, space (“the Valley of Jehoshaphat” = “the Valley where Yahweh judges”) is the focus of this section (3:1–2, 14 [4:2, 14]). The principle of judgment is the law of retribution (lex talionis; 3:4–8 [4:4–8]). The Lord responds by bringing the nations into judgment (“the Valley of Jehoshaphat,” v. 12 [4:12]). The combination of agricultural and war images powerfully presents the bloody nature of the eschatological battle (vv. 10, 13 [4:10–13]), as do the cosmic signs of the day of the Lord (3:15 [4:15]; cf. 2:10, 31 [3:4]). The day of the Lord is terrifying for the wicked nations, but he is the refuge for his people (3:16 [4:16]).

Sixth, the center of Yahweh’s promise is his presence in Zion, from which oppressive and evil people are removed (3:17 [4:17]; cf. 2:26–27). Zion is the transcendent reality of Yahweh’s dwelling with the new community (3:21 [4:21]). Yahweh’s beneficence is expressed in images of the new creation (wine, milk, water, 3:18 [4:18]). The image of water flowing from the temple further reinforces the image of the new creation (3:18 [4:18]; cf. Ezek. 47:1–12; Zech. 13:1; 14:3–9). This oracle, too, comforts God’s people in any age, giving hope of a world that far surpasses the present reality. The language of imagination in Joel, as in all the prophets, projects transcendence in images of space and time. The combination of a world in and out of time is characteristic of prophetic speech. The images are best taken as representative of the benefits God’s people enjoy throughout redemptive history, as tokens of the renewal of creation. Salvation, the new community, and the new creation are already a present reality, but they also await a greater fulfillment.

Joel and the NT

The book of Joel suggests three major intertextual connections with the NT. First, the day of the Lord imagery is prevalent in the Gospels and in the book of Revelation. The day of the Lord is a general designation for the judgment-to-come (Matt. 24:21, 42; cf. 1 Thess. 5:1–11). The apostles cite or allude to aspects associated with the day of the Lord: the locusts (1:6; 2:2, 4–5; cf. Rev. 9:7–9), the cosmic phenomena (2:10, 31; 3:15 [4:15]; cf. Matt. 24:29 et par.; Rev. 6:12–13; 8:12), the sounding (p 391) of the trumpet (2:1; cf. Rev. 8:6), and the sickle (3:13; cf. Mark 4:29; Rev. 14:15; cf. 19:15). The question “Who can endure/stand?” in Joel 2:11 occurs in Rev. 6:17. The eschatological day of the Lord is the time of the judgment inaugurated by the coming of Jesus Christ, but it is experienced in the history of the church as well, such as in the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE.

Second, the coming of the eschatological Spirit (2:28–32 [3:1–5]; cf. Acts 2:17–21), including calling on the name of the Lord and being called by the Lord (2:32 [3:5]; cf. Acts 2:39; 22:16; Rom. 10:13), shapes the book of Acts and the apostolic mission of Paul. The Spirit as the mark of the new community defines the church as the body of Christ and individual believers as members of his body. He constitutes the new community that awaits the coming of Jesus Christ. The coming of the Spirit on Gentile believers evidences the inclusion of Gentiles as copartners with Israel. All who call on the name of the Lord are not only saved (Rom. 10:12–15), but also receive his Spirit (ch. 8; 15:16). The new community of Joel’s days is continued in the church, but Israel too will share in this promise (11:28; cf. Acts 2:38–39).

Third, John adopts the image of the fountain flowing (Joel 3:18 [4:18]) from God’s throne to describe the new creation (22:1).

Bibliography

Achtemeier, E. Minor Prophets. Vol. 1, Hosea–Micah. NIBCOT. Hendrickson, 1996; Allen, L. The Books of Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, and Micah. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1976; Barton, J. Joel and Obadiah. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Crenshaw, J. “Freeing the Imagination: The Conclusion to the Book of Joel.” Pages 120–47 in Prophecy and Prophets, ed. Y. Gitay. Scholars Press, 1997; idem. Joel. AB 24C. Doubleday, 1995; idem. “Joel’s Silence and Interpreters’ Readiness to Indict the Innocent.” Pages 255–59 in Lasset uns Brücken bauen, ed. K. D. Schunck and M. Augustin. Duhm, B. The Twelve Prophets, trans. A. Duff. Black, 1912; idem. “Who Knows What YHWH Will Do? The Character of God in the Book of Joel.” Pages 185–96 in Fortunate the Eyes That See, ed. A. Beck and A. H. Bartelt. Eerdmans, 1995; Dillard, R. “Joel.” In An Exegetical and Expository Commentary: Hosea, Joel, and Amos, ed. T. E. McComiskey. Baker, 1992; Garrett, D., and P. Ferris. Hosea, Joel. NAC. Broadman & Holman, 1997; Kapelrud, A. S. Joel Studies. Almqvist & Wiksells/Harrassowitz, 1948; Marcus, D. “Nonrecurring Doublets in the Book of Joel.” CBQ 56 (1994): 56–67; Meinhold, A. “Zur Rolle des Tag-JHWHs-Gedichts Joel 2,1–11 im XII-Propheten-Buch.” Pages 207–23 in Verbindungslinien: Festschrift für Werner H. Schmidt zum 65. Geburtstag, ed. A. Graupner et al. Neukirchener Verlag, 2000; Prinsloo, W. S. The Theology of the Book of Joel. BZAW 163. De Gruyter, 1985; Stuart, D. Hosea–Jonah. WBC. Word, 1987; Sweeney, M. “The Place and Function of Joel in the Book of the Twelve.” SBLSP 38 (1999): 570–99; Sweeney, M., et al., eds. Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah. Berit Olam 1, ed. D. W. Cotter. Liturgical Press, 2000; VanGemeren, W. “The Spirit of Restoration.” WTJ 50 (1988): 81–102; Watts, J. D. W. The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk and Zephaniah. CBC. Cambridge, 1975; Wendland, E. R. The Discourse Analysis of Hebrew Prophetic Literature. Mellen Biblical Press, 1995; Wolff, H. W. Joel and Amos, trans. W. Janzen et al. Hermeneia. Fortress, 1977.

Willem VanGemeren

Johannine Epistles

Second and 3 John are two short letters from a person who simply calls himself “the elder” to “the elect lady and her children” (either a Christian community or possibly a Christian family) and to his friend Gaius respectively. The letters praise them for their spiritual progress, encourage them to follow love and truth, and urge them to be hospitable to traveling Christian teachers but not to those who do not confess that Jesus Christ has come (or possibly will come) in the flesh. They shed an interesting light on local church life, probably around Ephesus, in the late first century. The unnamed author is known to early tradition as “John,” but whether this is John the apostle or another person is not entirely clear.

First John (our focus in the remainder of this article) develops much more fully the theological teaching in these two letters, but it is a tract or written discourse and lacks the form of a letter (including any indication of authorship). The close similarities in style and theological idiom make it most likely that it is by the same author. It is related in the same kind of way to the Gospel of John and is either by the same author (the traditional view) or by somebody in the same Christian circle (an increasingly widely held view). Most hold that it was written subsequent to the Gospel.

History of Interpretation

First John has traditionally been understood as a letter to an unknown group of believers in danger of various problems and errors. These include (1) the danger of claiming freedom from sin; (2) the failure to recognize that Christian love must include not only God but also one’s fellow Christians, and must be a matter of deeds as well as words; (3) the problems caused by a group who have left the congregation and denied in some way that Jesus was the incarnate Son of God, the Christ (their thinking resembled that of Cerinthus, a first-century heretic, who claimed that a divine power came upon Jesus at his baptism (p 392) and departed just before his crucifixion, so that it was only the human Jesus who suffered and died [since a divine being could not do so]; and (4) the difficulty of knowing whether the messages given by prophets claiming inspiration from the Holy Spirit were genuine or otherwise.

These may be identified as the major problems. Side by side with them the author deals with some issues common to any group of Christians: failure to seek forgiveness for sin, the danger of loving sin, uncertainty regarding whether they had true knowledge of God, the danger of assuming that Christians may continue in sin, self-condemnation rather than confidence in approaching God in prayer, problems in pastoral concern for sinful members of the congregation, and the attractions of idolatry. Much of this may be seen as a lack of Christian confidence, and the readers needed encouragement rather than blame. This is what the letter provides; it is meant to strengthen in faith, love, and hope.

Modern critical discussion has raised a number of issues:

1. The identification of the false teaching. It is not identical with that of Cerinthus, and closer parallels have been sought in the teaching opposed by Ignatius or simply in Judaism, denying that the Messiah was Jesus (Griffith). Or it has been argued that there is no other heresy known to us with which it completely corresponds.
2. The relationship of the letter to the Gospel. In various forms it is suggested that the letter endeavors to correct false ideas that may have been held by the readers of the (earlier) Gospel. The problem is complicated by the tendency of some scholars to see various stages in the composition of the Gospel by editors with different agendas and the consequent need to determine where the letter fits into the history of a so-called "Johannine community" (Brown). Some hold that the letter is more "orthodox" than the Gospel and represents a later, more "ecclesiastical" stage in the development of the community. Such a theory assumes that the authors of the Gospel and Epistles were different. More recently, there have been strong criticisms of the whole idea of reconstructing a particular community for whom the Gospel was intended, and it is proposed that all of the Gospels were written for "all Christians." Even if this is so, it is still the case that the author belonged to a particular community and must have been influenced to some extent by its nature and needs.
3. There have been attempts to uncover earlier material in the letter (such as series of antithetical statements) and, even more, to identify stages in composition (Bultmann), but these have been largely abandoned.

Hearing the Message of 1 John

First John begins with a stately introduction (1:1–4) reminiscent of the prologue to the Gospel, with its focus on the Word of life that was from the beginning, has been revealed, and has been experienced by believers. The Word as Jesus, as the Christian message, and as itself the life that it promises—all three are bound up together in this expression. The writer aligns himself with the original witnesses and servants of the word, whether or not he is an apostle, sharing the message with a wider group who presumably had not the same firsthand experience.

He wants to promote fellowship between his readers and himself that is simultaneously fellowship with the Father and the Son (1:5–2:17). Therefore, the problem of sin must be dealt with by living in the light and seeking forgiveness provided through the atoning death of Christ. Belonging to Christ is seen in keeping his commandments, which appear to be concrete instances of the basic command to love fellow believers. Not loving the world means not being tempted by worldly temptations rather than not loving nonbelievers (although this point lies outside the writer's horizon).

Another danger to the readers is the risk of false belief, which denies that Jesus is the Son of God (2:18–25). The line of thought here is not completely clear. Plainly, the writer believes that if a person does this, they are no longer in fellowship with God, just as a believer may suggest to a Jew that apart from acceptance of Christ they cannot count God as their Father since God has now revealed Jesus as his Son. The belief in the coming of a final adversary of God, an anti-Messiah, before the End (and the second coming of the true Messiah), as reflected in 2 Thess. 2:8–12 and Revelation, is here picked up, with the claim that anybody who denies that Jesus is the Messiah is in effect a manifestation or anticipation of this final foe.

Nevertheless, the readers should not succumb to this deceit because they have been anointed by God (with a gift of discernment from the Spirit or with the knowledge of the gospel). Furthermore, they can look forward to the coming of (p 393) Jesus and to their consequent sharing in his glory (2:26–27).

The next part of the letter deals again with the question of sin (2:28–3:10). It emphasizes that the readers should be free from sin because they have a close relationship with Christ and have received a new birth from God; such people do not sin. This leads directly into a reminder that instead of sinning, their positive calling is to love one another, and not to “hate” one another by failing to show genuine, practical love (3:11–24). As they do this, their confidence in prayer will increase.

Yet comes another comment on false teachers, and how to discern the reality or otherwise of messages allegedly given by spiritual inspiration, this time with an assurance that those who are of the truth will not be overcome by false teachings (4:1–6). The rest of chapter 4 reiterates much of what has already been said about the love of God as the pattern for human love, and the confident assurance that God gives to those who love in this way (vv. 7–21). Believers will overcome the world with all its falsity and evil.

Once again, the nature of true belief is spelled out (5:1–12). It is belief in Jesus as the one who came by water (a reference either to his birth or his baptism) and by blood (a reference to his death). This strange expression may be intended to rule out any suggestion that the Son of God had departed from Jesus before his death or simply to emphasize the importance of his atoning death alongside his earlier life.

Finally, there is yet more assurance for the readers (5:13–21). But now specifically they are told that God will hear their prayers for sinful fellow-Christians, except where mortal sin has been committed. “Mortal sin” is generally identified as apostasy.

First John and the Canon

The letters of John are important testimony to the existence of a major stream in early Christianity alongside the Pauline tradition. Together with the Fourth Gospel, they constitute a closely related set of documents with distinctive vocabulary and theology different from that of the Synoptic Gospels and Paul. The book of Revelation is related more closely to this stream than to any other, and it was traditionally thought to be by the same author. This should not be ruled out as entirely impossible, since the apocalyptic genre could have dictated a distinct style of writing, but it is not widely held. It may be safer to see Revelation simply as another witness to Johannine Christianity in a broad sense.

The similarities between 2 and 3 John and 1 John are clear; the shorter pieces, being real letters, help to relate 1 John to the day-to-day life of actual communities.

The relationship to the Gospel is more complex. A large part of the Gospel is concerned with the relationship of Jesus to nonbelieving Jews, and hence the questions of his messiahship and authority to speak from God are prominent. First John, however, is concerned with problems arising within the Christian community, and the christological error is more concerned with denial of the reality of the incarnation by persons who previously believed in it. There is more stress on the death of Jesus as atonement. It has been argued that this contrasts with the teaching in the Gospel, where (it is claimed) the death of Jesus has significance only as part of the revelation of God in Jesus and not as the means of atonement for sin. But attempts to identify a discontinuity here are fatally flawed by the opening emphasis in the Gospel on Jesus as the Lamb of God who bears sin (John 1:29, 36; cf. 1 John 3:5). The description of the Spirit in the Gospel as “another Comforter” (John 14:16 KJV) is clarified in the light of 1 John 2:1. Within the Gospel the second part especially (John 13–21) is concerned with the disciples after Jesus has left them, and in this part there are closer links with the epistle. As with the other NT letters, there is virtually no reference to the earthly Jesus and his teaching, and this strengthens the hypothesis that the writers leave the straight citation of Jesus almost entirely to the Evangelists. Nor does the letter directly refer to the resurrection and exaltation of Jesus, although the references to abiding in him and to his future coming clearly imply belief in this.

First John and Theology

Within the history of theology, 1 John has occupied an important place in the debate over freedom from sin and Christian perfection. John Wesley is the best-known advocate of the view that there is a call upon believers to perfection (cf. Matt. 5:48) and that it is possible for them to attain it. He was careful to fence his doctrine negatively by insisting that (1) it was freedom from known, deliberate sin; (2) a person might fall away from perfection and regain it; and (3) we should be quite cautious in recognizing examples of it. Positively, he preferred to speak not of sinless perfection but of perfect love that drives out sin. Wesley was largely indebted to 1 John for (p 394) this doctrine, and he insisted that the promises or declarations in 3:4–10 were to be taken seriously. But his related belief that perfection was a state perhaps attained instantly by faith (rather like baptism with the Spirit in the Pentecostal tradition) would appear to come from elsewhere. His teaching has been largely forgotten in the mainstream Methodist churches but has been cultivated and preserved in the Nazarene tradition.

The crucial teaching in 1 John 3 has been variously interpreted, not least in light of the clear recognition that no believers can say, “We have no sin” (1:8, 10). Part of the problem lies in the juxtaposition of these apparently contradictory teachings. Some think that the “impossible sin” in chapter 3 (esp. v. 9) is solely the sin of apostasy (Griffith), but 3:10 might be thought to suggest otherwise. Most argue, in one way or another, that John is describing an ideal or an eschatological state that believers may claim in this sinful world; the paradox of “already ... not yet ...” that characterizes Pauline teaching is also valid here. It is also likely that John is addressing two different tendencies in the congregation, one that claimed sinlessness while not loving their fellow believers, and the other that was content with a low level of Christian living and did not grasp at the higher level promised to them.

The truth is probably that different NT writers use different pictures of the Christian life, including traveling toward a future goal, living by the Spirit, living in love, wrestling with temptation, and so on. These all contain an appeal to progress in Christian living. The danger of not taking 1 John 3 on board is that believers may comfortably resign themselves to mediocrity and fail to realize promises of, and provision for, a life free from sin. In reality, John does not put the point any more strongly than Paul does with his: “sin will have no dominion over you” (Rom. 6:14 NRSV).

Possibly the major, lasting contribution of the letter is its identification of love as the quality shown by God in the self-giving of his Son to atone for human sin and in the call for believers to show a like love for one another, demonstrated in action and not just in words (3:16–17). The letter is silent about loving nonbelievers, possibly because lack of love within the Christian community was a more pressing issue, but the readers are faced with the example of a God who first loved us (before we loved him), and the implication of that is surely clear enough.

Bibliography

Bogart, J. Orthodox and Heretical Perfectionism in the Johannine Community as Evident in the First Epistle of John. SBLDS. Scholars Press, 1977; Brown, R. The Epistles of John. AB. Doubleday, 1982; Bultmann, R. The Johannine Epistles. Hermeneia. Fortress, 1973; Edwards, R. The Johannine Epistles. NTG. Sheffield Academic Press, 1996; Griffith, T. Keep Yourselves from Idols. JSNTSup. Continuum, 2002; idem. “A Non-polemical Reading of 1 John: Sin, Christology and the Limits of Johannine Christianity.” TynBul 49, no. 2 (1998): 253–76; Klauck, H.-J. Der erste Johannesbrief. EKKNT. Benziger/Neukirchener Verlag, 1991; Lieu, J. The Theology of the Johannine Epistles. NTT. Cambridge University Press, 1991; Marshall, I. H. The Epistles of John. NICNT. Eerdmans, 1978; Schnackenburg, R. The Johannine Epistles. Crossroad, 1992; Smalley, S. 1, 2, 3 John. WBC. Word, 1984; Strecker, G. The Johannine Letters. Hermeneia. Fortress, 1996; Wesley, J. A Plain Account of Christian Perfection. Reprint, Epworth, 1952.

I. Howard Marshall

John, Book of

Traditionally, the church has viewed Holy Scripture as divinely inspired and authoritative, read it communally within the context of ecclesial faith and practice, and sought coherence and common ground amid exegetical diversity and disagreement. It is in relation to this rich heritage that we must view the interpretation and influence of the Gospel of John, its message and motifs, its role within the canon, and within the church its ongoing reception as the word of God.

History of Interpretation: John's Role in Church and Scholarship

In the Early Church. Today it is often argued that the earliest interpretations of the Gospel of John are now embedded within the final form of the text, having occurred during the several stages of its composition within a rather isolated and evolving late-first-century "Johannine community." During this process notable contributions would have included those of a "beloved disciple" (13:23; etc.), an "evangelist," and editors and/or "elders" ("we," 21:24), who together sought to shape and safeguard John from secessionist factions and their unorthodox interpretations (cf. 1 John 2:18–19; 4:1).

Moreover, it is claimed that the outcome of all such orthodox efforts remained in doubt until well into the second century. Then, early and enthusiastic gnostic use of John, and concomitant wariness and neglect by mainstream Christians, was only finally reversed through the strenuous efforts of Irenaeus (ca. 130–200; esp. Against Heresies, ca. 185). In this view, Irenaeus (p 395) rescued and restored John to the great church (cf. Sanders; Culpepper 107–38).

However, it is likely that such estimations would have puzzled second-century readers themselves, who normally associated the Gospel's origin with the apostle John and the church in Ephesus and Asia Minor. Certainly there was gnostic, more particularly Valentinian, interest in John. This is shown by allusions in writings such as the Apocryphon of John, Gospel of Truth, Gospel of Thomas, and others; citation by Basilides; a commentary on the prologue by Ptolemy; the first complete commentary by Heracleon; and interpretations by Theodotus (all ca. 130–80). Yet, inasmuch as John was clearly inimical to gnostic positions on creation, Christology, and salvation, such interest did not signify ringing endorsement but rather regularly entailed polemic and rejection (see Hill 205–93). Similarly self-serving were Montanist appeals to John in support of their unorthodox views on the Holy Spirit.

Moreover, there is considerable underestimated evidence that together indicates the widespread ecclesial ownership of John during the first half of the second century. This is shown in the writings and teachings of Ignatius, Polycarp, the longer ending of Mark, (John) the Elder, Aristides, Papias, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Epistula Apostolorum. In the later decades John's broad influence and repute is attested by early extant papyri, Justin, Tatian, Apollinarius, Melito, Theophilus, Athenagoras, the Epistle of Vienne and Lyons, Hegesippus, Polycrates, the Muratorian Fragment, Appollonius, and Tertullian. In sum, familiar and habitual use of John reveals the authoritative, indeed scriptural, role it played within the early church at large, with any dissenting voices (purportedly Gaius of Rome) clearly the exception that proved the rule (on all this, see Braun; Hengel; and now esp. Hill).

In subsequent centuries the church continued to plumb John's theological depths for both pastoral and apologetical purposes. Clement of Alexandria (d. ca. 215), linking John to the Synoptic Gospels and recalling its inspired apostolic and communal context of origin, memorably encapsulated its unique nature: "John, last of all, conscious that the outward facts had been set forth in the Gospels, was urged on by his disciples, and, divinely moved by the Spirit, composed a spiritual Gospel" (in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7). Similarly Origen (ca. 185–254), who emphasized John's originality and extolled it as the choicest of the four Gospels, wrote a Commentary on John, which attended to both literal and allegorical aspects in seeking to discern its intellectual and spiritual sense. He critiqued Gnostics such as Heracleon for private and arbitrary interpretations, which lacked the church's testimony. For Origen, inasmuch as John disclosed the very Word dwelling with the Father, it exhausted all human interpretation (Schnackenburg 202–3).

John played a significant role in the christological and trinitarian debates of the third and fourth centuries, as attested in the writings of Athanasius, Eusebius of Caesarea, Gregory of Nyssa, and others (Pollard). So, for example, Athanasius countered Arius's subordination of Jesus to God by regarding John 1:1 and 1:14 as complementary rather than contradictory, insisting on both Christ's humanity (incarnation) and divinity, held together in mysterious union. Chrysostom (ca. 347–407) also refuted the Arians in his Homilies on the Gospel of John, a quite influential series of pastoral and polemical expositions that stressed the revelatory, theological, and spiritual dimensions of John in service of the practical needs of the church. Commentaries by Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 428) and Cyril of Alexandria (376–444) also drew much upon John in support of both the divinity of Christ and the distinction between his divine and human natures as upheld by the Nicene Creed (Schnackenburg 204; Wiles 129–47).

Such emphases are also evident in Augustine's important Tractates on the Gospel of John, 124 sermons that pastorally appropriate the great mystery of the divinity and incarnation of Christ. Augustine attributes the source of John's profound theology to its author's privileged proximity to Christ (John 13:23), reclining and receiving all his secrets, and issuing in a Gospel that refines the mind so that it may contemplate God. Compared to his Synoptic counterparts, "the Evangelist John, like an eagle, takes a loftier flight, and soars above the dark mist of earth to gaze with steadier eyes upon the light of truth” (Tractate 15.1).

From the Middle Ages to the Reformation. Patristic exegesis of John dominated its interpretation during the Middle Ages, with Chrysostom’s Homilies and Augustine’s Tractates especially influential in the East and West respectively. While much medieval commentary took the form of sample collections and epitomes of the patristic materials, we know of a number of notable works devoted to John (Kealy 1). The Venerable Bede (ca. 673–735) wrote a homily on the prologue; Alcuin (ca. 740–804) produced a widely circulated and much revised commentary; John Scotus Eriugena (ca. 810–77) also left a homily (p 396) on the prologue (“The Voice of an Eagle”) and an unfinished commentary. Later the Byzantine exegete Theophylactus (ca. 1050–1125) wrote a commentary. So too did the Benedictine Rupert of Deutz (ca. 1075–1129); his 800-page work was designed to reconsider and supplement Augustine’s efforts, refute all ancient christological heresies, and meditate upon the divinity of Christ. Bonaventure (1217–74) also wrote in response to heresy, with his very popular Postilla (a brief commentary and questions) on the Gospel of John reflecting upon this “sublime” Gospel in terms of the divine Word in itself (1:1–6) and as joined to human nature (1:7–21:25).

The commentary by Thomas Aquinas (ca. 1225–74) on John is a supreme example of scholastic medieval exegesis. It cites extensively from Origen, Chrysostom, and Augustine; aims to refute all error from the Arians to the Pelagians; and attends carefully to the literal (intended) meaning of the text, while also explicating its threefold spiritual sense. Major themes drawn from John include the all-surpassing love of God; the incarnation, redemption, resurrection, and return of Christ; and the great truth, authority, and contemplative weight of this Gospel, written so that the faithful might be built up into the temple of God. A later commentary by the medieval mystic Meister Eckhart (ca. 1260–1328) employed the now-familiar image of the eagle to portray John the Evangelist as scrutinizing, pondering, and preaching from above, his Gospel of the Word become flesh countering the pretentiousness of a needy humanity (on above, Kealy 1:115–84).

The Gospel of John also played a prominent role in the Reformation period. From 1516 to 1555 alone, some thirty or more authors published works on John in more than 125 separate printings, many of them notable in various respects. Erasmus (1469?–1536), who produced a popular Paraphrase on John, caused an uproar with his 1519 Latin version of John 1:1 as “In principio erat sermo [in the beginning was the Speech/Discourse],” rather than employing the Vulgate's "Verbum [Word]." The also popular first Protestant commentary on John by Philipp Melanchthon (1497–1560) then developed this in the direction of Jesus as the "oratio [oration]" of God. An interesting blend of influences, Melanchthon followed Chrysostom and Augustine in his christological and trinitarian readings of certain passages. Yet he was also significantly shaped by Aquinas's scholastic commentary. As a man of his own day, he regarded John as something of a Renaissance historian and Jesus as a divine rhetorician. Other important works included those of Martin Bucer (1491–1551), François Titelmans (Franciscus Titelmann, 1502–37), and Wolfgang Musculus (1497–1563; see Farmer).

Martin Luther (1483–1546) never wrote a commentary on John, but he did give it an honored place among NT texts, observing how its focus on the preaching of Jesus served to highlight his divinity and saving significance. Similarly, John Calvin (1509–64) viewed John as the key to understanding the other Gospels, preferring its rich Christology; typically, his commentary attended to the divine intent and transformative impact of the text (Kealy 1:203–74; cf. Larsson).

From the Enlightenment to the Present Day. The increasingly rational, historical, and often skeptical approach toward biblical studies in the centuries succeeding the Enlightenment, not least in relation to Jesus and the Gospels, was also directed toward John in ways that puzzled prejudicially over its historical value and distinctive theological nature. To the extent that a Gospel such as Mark could be seen as taking us closer to the original environment and eyewitnessed activities of a Jewish Jesus, the very different Gospel of John was deemed all the more remote and Hellenistic. Its Jesus was counted as a theologically laden construct of later "Catholic Christianity." Such an outlook was evident in the influential 1820 commentary of K. G. Bretschneider (1776–1848), and more broadly in the wider work of the Tübingen School under F. C. Baur (1792–1860) and D. F. Strauss (1808–74). It resulted in the proliferation of skeptical positions on the authorship, date, purpose, unity, and significance of John.

There were, however, more moderate voices. In his 1832 lectures F. Schleiermacher (1768–1834) regarded John as a trustworthy and realistic eyewitness to a Jesus of "depth and substance." A 1,500-page commentary by Friedrich Lücke (1791–1855) upheld it as an authentic, apostolic Gospel, which combined historical content and spiritual understanding. An 1881 commentary by B. F. Westcott (1825–1901) also defended its apostolic origins and provided a deeply theological analysis of its focus upon Christ's self-revelation to the world (1:19–12:50) and to his disciples (13:1–21:25). Even so, by the beginning of the twentieth century, scholars widely regarded John as a largely second-century Hellenistic presentation of the gospel, theological rather than historical, portraying an “idea” rather than an “actual” Jesus (cf. Kelly 1:357–471).

Over the last century scholarly interpretations of John have often focused on competing and (p 397) nuanced claims regarding a certain set of interrelated issues: principally, its background, relation to the Synoptic Gospels, sources, composition, and community context. R. Bultmann’s influential commentary (1941; ET, 1971; see Ashton) did develop the history-of-religions and Hellenistic approach by arguing for a background in Mandaean Gnosticism. However, most scholars now rightly recognize that the evidence instead points to John’s decidedly Jewish setting and traditions. John is far too familiar with the geography, customs, and culture of first-century Palestine; its language and imagery find closer parallels in strands of Judaism such as represented by the Dead Sea Scrolls. Moreover, this same evidence may well indicate that John actually preserves its own early and genuine Jesus materials, and thus can also be seen as emerging reliably and independently of the Synoptic Gospels (e.g., Dodd). While this “new look” at John may reopen basic considerations—such as on dating, apostolic authorship, witness to the historical Jesus (Robinson)—it has largely been taken as clearing the ground for additional proposals. Rather than drawing upon the Synoptics, John may be using common traditions and/or “signs,” “discourse,” and other sources, all put together by one or more redactors (cf. Fortna). Indeed, as intimated at the outset of this review, rather than requiring the primary eyewitness of an apostolic author, it is usually argued that John unfolded over a multistage compositional and communal process, whether construed as a Johannine community, circle, or school (e.g., Martyn; Brown).

Without depreciating or dismissing any genuine gains arising from these ever-expanding and increasingly nuanced hypotheses, I observe that too often they deflect and defer the essentially theological concerns that earlier commentators regarded as intrinsic to the message of the Gospel of John. Happily, more-recent interest in the narrative, symbolic, theological, and spiritual dimensions of John is beginning to redress the oversight and imbalance (e.g., Kelly and Moloney; Schneiders; Thompson; and others).

Message and Motifs: John and the Drama of the Divine Life

The Gospel of John narrates a two-act divine drama that reveals and enacts the redemption and re-creation of humanity and the world. The prologue unveils the divine life and the entrance into the world of the Word, Jesus the Messiah and Son of God. In the first act the divine will unfolds in the (p 398)works and words of an obedient if much misunderstood Jesus. The second act displays God's glorification in the departure, death, and resurrection of Jesus. The epilogue charges Jesus' followers with the ongoing embodiment of the divine life in the world.

Prologue: God, Word, and World (1:1–18). The prologue raises the curtain on the divine drama. The opening transcendent and primordial scene discloses the preexistent Word in eternal communion with and as God (1:1–2). This is the divine life, which we later learn also includes the Spirit (1:32). Out of this triune communion has issued the created order, with the co-Creator Word bringing into being all things, including humanity, who thus have in him the divine life and light that sustains and illuminates (1:3–4). Yet, with all this, the Word is also identified as “he/this one” (1:2). In a startling shift in scenes from the heavenly to the earthly realm, we find that in order to overcome a now darkened world (1:5), the co-Creator has entered into creation and history as a human person: the Word has become flesh (1:14). The first witness to this astounding event is John the Baptist, sent by God to testify to the divine light now present so that all might believe through him (1:6–7, 15). However, equally remarkably, the world does not recognize the Word as its Maker; “his own people” do not see that they are his own (1:8–11 NRSV) and that in rejecting him they are denying their true selves.

Yet some do indeed believe in his name—accepting the Word's divine origin, identity, and saving mission—and thus no longer live as those merely “of man” but as “children of God” (1:12–13 NRSV). The manner in which the Word has incarnated the fullness of divine glory and truth is further specified both in relation to God and to the world: he comes as the only Son of the Father and as Jesus Christ (1:18). The prologue thus attests to the primary purpose of the Gospel of John, that its recipients believe Jesus to be Israel's Messiah and the Son of God (20:31). In this way they may be the beneficiaries of “grace upon grace” (1:16 NRSV): the outworking of divine redemption traceable from the giving of the torah to the self-giving of God in Jesus Christ. Given the magnitude of all that is taking place, it is discernible only as disclosure, witness, and confession of faith (“we have seen,” 1:14).

Act I: God the Father Revealed in the Works and Words of Jesus the Son (1:19–12:50). The prologue's divine pattern and purpose materializes with the advent and unfolding of Jesus' public ministry within first-century Israel. The first act is focused upon his revelatory and regenerative works and words (signs and discourses). This involves a series of encounters with a range of representative figures and groups, who gradually divide into those who reject or follow him. In the course of these highly charged events, the main issues and themes come into view.

At the outset John the Baptist openly announces the identity and mission of Jesus: “Here is the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world!” (1:29 NRSV). The divine life strides onto the earthly stage and will rescue its entire cast by rewriting their script in a wholly unexpected and self-sacrificial way. After calling the first enthusiastic but as yet unenlightened members of his new company (1:35–51), Jesus challenges Israel’s usual players and practices in a series of provocative and pregnant episodes. At Cana the Jewish ritual of purification is transformed into the new wine of divine glory (2:1–12). The Jerusalem temple incident foreshadows the replacement of a bankrupt and closed Jewish establishment by a Jesus-centered and Spirit-enriched inclusive community (2:13–22). A representative and too self-assured Nicodemus (“we know,” 3:2) has yet to recognize the love of God and receive the eternal life that comes only “from above” in the form of Jesus and the Spirit (3:1–21). The Samaritan woman learns that salvation does indeed come from the Jews, but climactically in Messiah Jesus, who reaches out and includes all faithful worshippers within the divine design (4:1–42). This startling scenario is extended even further in Jesus’ ensuing encounter with a believing Gentile official (4:46–54) (cf. Kelly and Moloney 61–114).

There follows a more extensive series of works and words from Jesus, all significantly set against the backdrop of various highly symbolic Jewish festivals. Jesus’ healing on the Sabbath critiques “the Jews’ ” constraint of the holy day and its Lord, and instead enables him as Son to reveal the Father in new, authoritative, and life-giving ways (5:1–47). (In view of later unconscionable anti-Semitic readings of “the Jews,” it must be stressed that in John this phrase is a cipher for all who are closed and opposed to the divine economy operative in Jesus.) With the Passover in view, the feeding of the five thousand, walking on the water, and accompanying “bread of heaven” discourse—these together display Jesus’ divine origin (“I am,” 6:35) and limitless provision for his people (6:1–71). The Festival of Tabernacles (or Booths) is the setting for Jesus’ ensuing temple teaching and failed arrest; his discourses on the light of the world, coming death, discipleship, and Abraham; and the incident of the man born blind (7:1–9:41). In all these events it is Messiah Jesus (not the temple) who is associated with true and living water, light, and the glorious divine presence (again, “I am,” 8:12, etc.), and God’s saving action (“lifted up,” 8:28). Jesus’ divine work effects true freedom, sight, witness, and worship; this gives rise to children of God, who are characterized by their life, love, and truth.

On either side of a reference to the Festival of Dedication (or Hanukkah, 10:22), we find Jesus' discourse on the Good Shepherd and an account of his rejection by "the Jews" (10:1–42). The latter are aligned with former false leaders in Israel (e.g., Ezek. 34) and contrasted with the selfless outpouring of the Father's love in the Son's atoning self-sacrifice, which overcomes all human pretense and issues in abundant eternal life. Indeed, all this arises out of a divine life in which "the Father and I [Jesus] are one" (10:30 NRSV). This claim incurs charges of blasphemy from those purportedly concerned to safeguard the glory of God and yet failing to recognize that it is revealed only insofar as (says Jesus) "the Father is in me, and I am in the Father" (10:38).

Two complementary scenes—the raising of Lazarus (11:1–57) and Mary's anointing of Jesus (12:1–8)—anticipate his paradoxical death and resurrection, the subject of Act II. But first the current act closes with Jesus' dramatic entrance into Jerusalem, dialogue with both Gentiles and Jews, and his summary reflections upon his much misconstrued mission to date (12:12–50).

Act II: God the Father Glorified in the Death and Resurrection of Jesus the Son (13:1–20:31). The second act finds Jesus focused upon preparing his disciples for his forthcoming departure and their own role thereafter (13:1–17:26). This is immediately followed by a climactic rendering of the events involved in his crucifixion and resurrection (18:1–20:31). Herein the revelation of the Father in the works and words of the incarnate Son is ultimately realized through their shared glorification in Jesus' shameful death, astonishing vindication, and return to the eternal divine life. Again, a rich tapestry of motifs is discernible throughout.

With both the Passover and "his hour" at hand, God's very own Lamb prefigures his self-sacrifice and prepares the disciples for their own share in his servanthood by humbly washing their feet. Attended by Judas's betrayal and the other disciples' lack of understanding, this act expresses Jesus' exemplary and enduring love (13:1–38). It is also a sign of the divine hospitality that will ultimately be given to his followers ("in my Father's (p 399)house," 14:2). This will be made possible by Jesus' departure and the sending of the Spirit, who in the interim will abide, guide, teach, and comfort the people of God (14:1–31). With all this in view, Jesus, himself "the way and the truth and the life" (14:6), exhorts his disciples to expand their limited horizons ("Rise, let us be on our way," 14:31 NRSV). He thus summons them to follow him homeward into the Father's glorious realm—albeit via the cross and thence the resurrection (Kelly and Moloney 270–306).

Union with Jesus (“the true vine”) and his sent Spirit enables his followers to have communion with God and hence a fruitful life of love and joy in one another; this will overcome the barren existence of a hateful and degenerate world (15:1–16:3). Jesus develops these themes as he accounts for his divinely designed yet disturbing death and anticipates its advantages for his disciples. The cross will expose and eradicate the world’s sin and injustice, and the Spirit will bring forth the Father’s abundant new covenant life in the form of love, joy, and peace (16:4–33). Then in a prayer Jesus binds together all his hopes and fears for himself, his disciples, and all believers, drawing them up into his own eternal communion with the Father. Once again, many interrelated motifs recur, gathered around God’s limitless grace, love, holiness, truth, authority, knowledge, protection, unity, and eternal life. All this is found in Jesus’ obedient mission, which climaxes in the coming “hour” with the mutual glorification of the Father and the Son (17:1–26) (Kelly and Moloney 307–51).

Paradoxically, in the betrayal, arrest, trial, and death of Jesus, humanity’s self-destructive schemes are taken up into God’s gracious grand design. At Gethsemane, a remarkably assured Jesus discloses his divine identity (“I am he,” 18:6) to the startled authorities and surrenders himself to “the cup the Father has given [him]” (18:11). He is abandoned by his disciples and even denied by Peter (“I am not,” 18:17). Behind closed doors Jesus reminds the high priest, Caiaphas, that he has always spoken openly and rightly—of God and of himself in relation with his Father—in the synagogues, the temple, the world (18:19–24). Then a puzzled Roman governor, Pilate (“I am not a Jew, am I?” 18:35 NRSV), also finds himself caught up in this climactic conflict with a strange but seemingly innocent Jewish “Messiah,” who pointedly informs him: “My kingdom is not from this world” (18:28–38a NRSV).

The divine logic, which escapes and subverts all concerned, unfolds inexorably: “The Jews” falsely acclaim Caesar as their king; Pilate ironically returns the compliment, calling Jesus “King of the Jews” (19:19–22); and on the cross Jesus truly reveals his identity and destiny, thus also disclosing and glorifying God. Therefore, although the situation seems disastrous to the bereft disciples, the reverse is actually the case. The empty tomb attests to a risen Jesus, who reappears, is acknowledged as “Lord and God,” and bequeaths the Spirit, in whose form he will continue to be present with his disciples (20:1–29). From thence he will ascend “to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God” (20:17), to the glory to be enjoyed by all those who believe and receive the divine life given in Jesus, the Messiah and Son of God (20:30–31).

Epilogue: Embodying the Divine Life (21:1–25). In an epilogue, perhaps added later, Jesus again appears and exhorts his gathered disciples, including Peter and “the disciple whom Jesus loved,” to remain faithful witnesses and to care for the people of God. This, we are now informed, the beloved disciple has done, not least with the provision of this spiritual Gospel, which invites and enables its audience to join Jesus, the apostles, and all the saints in the divine life.

The Canon: John and the Divine Company

The Gospel of John offers itself as a revelatory and inspired new-covenant document generated by the teaching and deeds of Jesus as recalled through the operation of his Spirit within the witnessing community of faith (cf. 14:25; 20:21–23, 30–31; 21:24–25). On this basis its author (known early on as the apostle John) and its initial audience preserved, transmitted, and proclaimed this divinely authoritative Scripture (cf. 2:22; 19:36–37; 20:31). Despite scholarly claims that this Gospel struggled for acceptance, there is every indication that it was widely received and revered by the early church, and that it played a distinctive, prominent, and indeed canonical role (see Hill). Among the most important elements in this are John’s use of the OT and its early associations with both a Johannine corpus of literature and the Synoptic Gospels.

It is according to the OT that John views its own witness to the fulfillment of God’s purposes for Israel and the world in Jesus and his Spirit-empowered disciples (5:39, 45–47). This is immediately evident from a range of OT citations, particularly from the Pentateuch, Isaiah, and Psalms, variously quoted by Jesus (1:51; 6:45; 10:34; 13:18; 15:25), his Jewish contemporaries (1:23; 2:17; 6:31; 12:13), and the author (12:15, 38, 40; 19:24, 36–37). Even more impressive is the (p 400) extent to which John’s account of Jesus’ message and mission includes a typological and polemical reworking of various OT elements. These include symbols (torah, temple, Sabbath), figures (Moses, Isaiah’s Servant, the Psalms’ righteous sufferer, Ezekiel’s Davidic shepherd), imagery (vine, water, light), and festivals (Passover, Tabernacles). Thus, what John says of the prophet is true of the entire OT: “Isaiah said this because he saw [Jesus’] glory and spoke about him” (12:41). From John’s postresurrection perspective, what Isaiah foresaw and the OT prefigured and promised was the startling glory of a cruciform Christ, the very self-expression of God. Above all, this is what lies at the heart of the collective witness of the OT, Jesus, and the Gospel of John.

Yet, not the Gospel of John alone; this document invites comparison with its NT counterparts, not least the Letters and Revelation of John. The well-recognized collocation of so many striking verbal, conceptual, and thematic similarities between the Gospel and especially 1 John is unlikely to be incidental. We may cite, for example, Jesus as Messiah and Son of God; the Paraclete and “S/spirit of Truth”; believers as “children of God”; the love commandment; light and darkness imagery; a stress on truth, witnessing, eternal life; and the exhortation to know, remain in, and love God. All this the recipients of the Letters of John have heard and seen from the beginning, perhaps via the Gospel itself (cf. 1 John 1:1; 2:7, 24; 3:11; 2 John 5, 6). While Revelation is an apocalyptic prophecy in the form of a letter, rather than a Gospel, it too bears notable christological (e.g., Lamb, Logos) and eschatological affinities; it emphasizes similar significant themes (witnessing, commandment-keeping, overcoming, glorification); it also draws extensively and evocatively upon OT language and imagery. Moreover, while scholarship has usually considered the origin and identity of the Gospel, Letters, and Revelation of John individually, there is strong evidence from the early second century of an ecclesial awareness that they belonged to an authoritative (even scriptural) corpus. Mention may be made of the common and often intertextual exegesis of two or more Johannine documents; their implicit and explicit attribution to the same author, the apostle John; and the possible existence of codices containing these Johannine works (Hill 451–64).

As noted earlier, the patently distinctive Gospel of John has caused many contemporary scholars to conclude that it emerged independently of and sits rather awkwardly alongside Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Yet, from its outset John presupposes much concerning Jesus, not least as the Word who was Messiah and Son of God, which would only have made sense in the light of the sort of information supplied in documents such as the Synoptic Gospels (Smith, “Prolegomena”). Given the extensive networking between the early and expanding Christian communities, and the probability that each of the Gospels was intended for all Christians (so Bauckham), it is all the more likely that they were correlated with one another. Indeed, second-century evidence (such as from Tatian and Clement) suggests that the church regarded John as written in the full knowledge of Matthew, Mark, and Luke; that it soon circulated in their company; and that it was strategically located last because it could clarify, amplify, supplement, and provide a broader and deeper theological framework for its Synoptic counterparts. In sum, then as now, the reader is invited to read John as a Gospel among the Gospels; and, by extension, to regard it as an integral document within a two-Testament witness to the triune God.

John and Theology: God, Church, and World

From the foregoing it is evident that the Gospel of John is entirely “of God”—in its emanation from Jesus, the Word made flesh, as first witnessed to within its own apostolic and communal context of origin; in its expeditious and widespread reception within an increasingly inclusive and ever-expanding early church; in the mutually interpretative canonical company it has kept from its earliest days as Spirit-shaped Scripture; and in its continued profound effect, explication, and enactment throughout the church historic and universal.

As such, John cannot be constrained by mere human conjecture and self-serving sectarian readings, but must always be embodied ecclesially and thence manifest publicly as a rich and resonant witness to the triune God’s self-giving and limitless love for the whole world (3:16; 21:24–25). In God the Father this gracious love precedes and exceeds, creates and generates, sustains and consummates all things. In God the Son this love is incarnate and cruciform as it unmask and overcomes sin and death, and is vindicated and glorified as it opens up and enables a transformed way of life. In God the Spirit, the continuing presence of the Son, this love also establishes, indwells, abides, witnesses to, and guides all the people of God (cf. Kelly and Moloney 388–94).

It is this all-encompassing divine love and life that governs and authenticates the church and its (p 401)mission in the world. The church is to be present, faithful, and giving. It is to help, heal, endure, question, confront, and transform. It is to reach out, invite, gather, welcome, and include. Certainly such a calling must not be distorted in the direction of religious pluralism and syncretism (or, conversely, recoil into a peevish parochialism); it is at all times the church of this God. Thus, the church must personify God’s glory in all its grandeur, with a love and faithfulness that is both vital and vulnerable, disclosing the heavenly horizon and economy within which humanity can know its true identity and destiny. In this way a world that is otherwise enslaved by often unspeakable evil may be providentially rescued and relocated within a new heaven and earth, and so enjoy eternally the divine life.

Bibliography

See Keener 1:1251–1409 in addition to the following select entries: Ashton, J. Understanding the Fourth Gospel. Clarendon, 1991; Bauckham, R., ed. The Gospel for All Christians. Eerdmans, 1998; Braun, F.-M. Jean le théologian et son évangile dans l'église ancienne. 3 vols. J. Gabalda, 1959; Brown, R. The Community of the Beloved Disciple. Paulist, 1979; idem. The Gospel according to John. 2 vols. AB 29–29A. Doubleday, 1966–70; Bultmann, R. The Gospel of John, trans. G. R. Beasley-Murray. Blackwell, 1971; Culpepper, R. A. John, the Son of Zebedee. University of South Carolina Press, 1994; Dodd, C. H. Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel. Cambridge University Press, 1963; Farmer, C. S. The Gospel of John in the Sixteenth Century. Oxford University Press, 1997; Fortna, R. The Fourth Gospel and Its Predecessor. Polebridge, 1988; Hengel, M. The Johannine Question, trans. J. Bowden. Trinity, 1989; Hill, C. E. The Johannine Corpus in the Early Church. Oxford University Press, 2004; Kealy, S. P. John's Gospel and the History of Biblical Interpretation. 2 vols. E. Mellen, 2002; Keener, C. The Gospel of John. 2 vols. Hendrickson, 2003; Kelly, A. J., and F. J. Moloney. Experiencing God in the Gospel of John. Paulist, 2003; Larsson, T. God in the Fourth Gospel. Almqvist, 2001; Martyn, J. L. History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel. 2d ed. Abingdon, 1979; Pollard, T. E. Johannine Christology and the Early Church. SNTSMS 13. Cambridge University Press, 1970; Robinson, J. A. T. The Priority of John, ed. J. F. Coakley. SCM, 1985; idem. Twelve New Testament Studies. SCM, 1962; Sanders, J. N. The Fourth Gospel in the Early Church. Cambridge University Press, 1943; Schneiders, S. Written That You May Believe. 2d ed. Crossroad, 2003; Smith, D. M. "Prolegomena to a Canonical Reading of the Fourth Gospel." Pages 169–82 in "What Is John?" ed. F. Segovia. Scholars Press, 1996; Schnackenburg, R. The Gospel according to St. John. Vol. 1, trans. K. Smyth. Crossroad, 1982; Thompson, M. M. The God of the Gospel of John. Eerdmans, 2001; Wiles, M. The Spiritual Gospel. Cambridge University Press, 1960.

S. A. Cummins

Jonah, Book of

Highlights in the History of Interpretation

Y. Sherwood has thoroughly documented the history of interpretation of this popular book that has served as a "cultural hologram" of religious and theological sentiments and trends (71). Early Christian interpretation found its interpretative key in Matt. 12:40 and focused on Jonah and Jesus as "typological twins" (Sherwood 11–21). Jerome and others constructed a web of parallels between the book and the events of Jesus' ministry. Augustine accepted this approach, but alongside it he adopted the idea of the prophet as an embodiment of carnal Israel, inaugurating the second phase of interpretation: Jonah as negative stereotype of Jews. Even into the Reformation, this is evident in Luther's assessment of the book as showing the superiority of Christianity to Judaism. Thus, the book became a lightning rod for anti-Semitic and supersessionistic sentiment and theology (Sherwood 32). The period of the Reformation also saw a shift to a third category, evident in Calvin's treatment of the book as warning against fleeing from God or chiding that people are more important than plants.

Post-Enlightenment exposition focused on the phenomena of the book, whether from a vantage point of skepticism or reacting against it apologetically. Thus, the details of the book came under close scrutiny. Even as the Age of Criticism was dawning and “adolescing,” the older modes of interpretation were transmogrified rather than discarded. The eighteenth-century interpreters sermonized about Jewish envy of Gentiles, while the nineteenth century adopted Jonah as the poster child for anti-Semitic sentiment (Sherwood 25–27). As critical study reached the apex of modernism and began the transition to postmodern interpretation, attention turned to deeper discussion of genre, even as more traditional communities continued to argue for the historicity of the book’s events.

Contemporary literary analysis is prone to resort to rhetorical labels such as satire (Ackerman 227), parody (Orth), or irony (Simon) to describe the book. Such suggestions are often rejected by evangelical interpreters who view these as modern categories and consider them threatening to biblical authority. On the first count, parody at least has now been identified in ancient literature (Michalowski 84–86), and on the second, it can be observed that satire and parody do not imply fictionalization. The real issue can be framed in the question, “Should the book be categorized (p 402) as a ‘truth-telling’ genre or as ‘nonrealistic’ writing?” Complexity increases if we consider options such as “nonrealistic” writing based on a kernel of historical information, or “truth-telling” tailored so that certain stereotypes surface. While consensus on these questions may exist within particular interpretative communities, a universal consensus has not yet been reached.

The above survey categorizes ways that the book of Jonah has been exploited over the years, commandeered for social, theological, or methodological agendas. Alternatively, the interpretations of the book can be sorted out with relation to its message rather than its use. D. Alexander identified four approaches to the interpretation of the text: that the book was about repentance, about unfulfilled prophecy, about Jewish attitudes toward Gentiles, or about theodicy (Alexander et al. 81–91). U. Simon uses a similar list to represent the history of Jewish interpretation (vii–xiii), all still reflected in interpretative communities today.

Deciding about the theological message of the book concerns what equations it sets up: Israel = Nineveh? Jonah = Israel? Jonah = Jesus? The purpose and message are going to derive from whichever equation is adopted. The challenge interpreters face is arriving at a cohesive reading that would have been recognizable to the author—to arrive confidently at an understanding of what could be called the “face value” of the book.

Literary Structure

The book of Jonah is characterized by a highly artistic literary structure. Chapter 1 parallels chapter 3 as each highlights a non-Israelite audience threateningly confronted by Yahweh. In both cases the response is exemplary, contrasting favorably to the prophet’s questionable behavior. God is seen as initiator, non-Israelites as responders, and prophet as foil. Both chapters conclude with God’s merciful deliverance. Chapters 2 and 4 are likewise parallel as Yahweh interacts in each with his prophet. These chapters conclude recognizing God’s character.

Overview of the Message

The above literary structure highlights many of the major elements that bind the book together. Yet despite parallels, chapter 4 has often been seen as incompatible with the unity of the book. If the persuasiveness of a particular understanding is found in its ability to integrate every aspect into the whole, then the object lesson and the abrupt ending of chapter 4 must be addressed. As the conclusion, it is the key to the book’s purpose and message, which in the end is not about Nineveh, Jonah, or Israel, but about God.

The object lesson gives the reader the operative equation by which the book operates: Jonah becomes a surrogate Nineveh. The initial indicator of this is signaled by the variations in the divine name. Through most of the book, Jonah interacts with Yahweh, while the non-Israelites predictably use the term elohim (except 1:14–16, after the sailors have been introduced to Yahweh). Consequently, in 4:6 the sudden use of the compound divine name, Yahweh-Elohim, catches the attention of the reader and signals a temporary and meaningful switch. The object lesson then uses Elohim through its conclusion in 4:9. This suggests that Jonah has been relocated among the non-Israelites in the object lesson.

The second indicator is the repetition of the Hebrew root ra’ah in 3:10 and 4:6. For Nineveh, this describes the impending “destruction,” from which they are spared. For Jonah, it is the impending “discomfort,” from which he is initially spared, but eventually experiences in full. Again, Jonah is thus equated with Nineveh. This opens up the full parallelism incorporated in the object lesson (from Walton 49):

1. Both Nineveh and Jonah have an impending calamity from which they desire to protect themselves (their ra’ah), respectively the prophesied destruction and discomfort of the weather.
2. Both Nineveh (by repentance) and Jonah (by his hut) embark on a course of action to prevent the ra'ah.

3. Both attempts are supplemented and actualized by an act of divine grace: God grants Nineveh a reprieve and provides Jonah a protective plant.
4. At this point there is a change. Rather than allowing his gracious act to continue to protect Jonah, God's protection is removed. A parasite devours the plant, and Jonah is exposed to the full force of the calamity, left only with the protection of his own provision, the hut, which does him no good.

Thus, the object lesson draws out the message of the book. The lesson puts Jonah and Nineveh on the same side, with God on the other side, and establishes its significance relative to God, regardless of the results for Nineveh/Jonah.

What did the incident teach Nineveh? Some consider Jonah as the story of a remarkable conversion (p 403) of pagan Nineveh to true faith in God, and they focus on what Nineveh learned. Nevertheless, evidence for a conversion to true Yahwism is difficult to find in the text. Unquestionably, they repent of "their evil ways." But there is no mention of turning to Yahweh, being instructed about the covenant, or discarding their other gods. The description of their belief indicates only that they believed what God had said through Jonah about their impending doom (Walton 53–54). It is their action that is commended in 3:10, not their faith.

In addition, once the nature of the object lesson is understood, it becomes clear that Nineveh's response is important for its inadequacy. It is paralleled by Jonah's hut, unable to shelter him from the calamity. In short, then, the Ninevites learned little. But even in their ignorance and paganism, they recognized the need to respond to the word of Deity. They thus offer an important model both to the Israelite audience and to future audiences (Matt. 12:41).

What did the incident teach Jonah? Jonah's function in the narrative is to be the foil—static and recalcitrant. The only "change" in him came simply in response to the inevitable. Once he learned that he had no choice but to go to Nineveh, he did so. He was consistent in self-righteously seeing himself as justified in all his actions and attitudes. We could conclude, then, that he did not learn anything, other than that sometimes God will not take "no" for an answer. The book does not depend on his making progress.

What did the book teach Israel? The purpose of the book, we suggest, focuses on the changes accompanying the period of classical prophecy. The example of Nineveh serves to educate Israel and its prophets regarding the "ground rules" of this era. Through the eighth-century prophets, a new age had dawned in which Israel and Judah were warned of coming judgment in the form of prophetic pronouncement—usually deemed irrevocable. The book of Jonah illustrates that repentance was a proper and acceptable response, and could even turn back the judgment. It worked even for naive, wicked, pagan Nineveh. When Israel faced such warnings, this model for response suggests that even in the shadow of pronounced doom, repentance can bring mercy. It therefore becomes important to recognize the Ninevites' response as shallow and uninformed. The book is counting on that contrast to drive home the point that the response of Israel, God's covenant people, would surely be able to elicit similar compassion from God.

In choosing this interpretation, we reject the popular reading that the book was written to scold Jewish exclusivism in the postexilic period. That view assumes that Jonah was asked to preach repentance and did so. We find no conclusive evidence for such an assumption.

What does the book teach about God? In the interpretation offered here, this is the key, as it should be when we consider Scripture as God's self-revelation. The book ends with God and makes a clear point about his compassion. Jonah is angry that God's grace is stimulated by his compassion rather than requiring a minimal level of theological sophistication or faith. Instead, God's compassion is stimulated by responsiveness. This proclaims a God of second chances, who delights in even small steps in the right direction. Even though Jonah is theologically offended by such grace benefiting Nineveh, he is glad enough of it when his own comfort is at stake, as Israel would be when the classical prophets proclaim their doom-laden oracles. The God of threatening oracles of judgment is a compassionate God, prone to be gracious at the slightest hint of response.

What does the book teach us? We are not receiving messages of doom from prophets, but the judgment of God still threatens the unrighteous. It is most important for us to use the message of the book to deepen our understanding of God. It is not unusual for people to feel that something they have done has put them beyond the reach of God's mercy, disqualified for his grace or compassion. The book of Jonah has encouraging words to offer: God's compassion is boundless. Should anyone feel that their straying has left no way back to God, the encouragement of the book is that God is inclined to respond to even the smallest steps in the right direction. The jump from prodigal to sainthood need not be made in a single leap. We need only to climb the fence out of the pigsty and take a step toward home. A compassionate God waits with open arms and is ready to meet us on our journey.

Discussion of the Book's Contribution to the Canon as a Whole

If the book offers a model response to classical prophecy, it can be seen as canonically integrated with the prophetic corpus. It also offers some nuancing of Deut. 18:22 concerning a prophet's authentication. Jonah qualifies that principle with the allowance for God's grace to postpone judgment if there should be a positive response.

(p 404)Jonah appears in the Book of the Twelve as a transition between the juxtaposed books of Hosea–Obadiah and the chronologically arranged books, Micah–Malachi. If Jonah serves as conclusion or synthesis of the initial juxtapositions, one can explore them to discover Jonah's role.

Hosea proclaims the impending judgment that grain, new wine, and oil will be taken away (2:9). Joel shows a repentant response to a prophet in whose time this same sort of threat is realized in a locust plague. As a result of the positive response, God restored those commodities (2:19). The juxtaposition of these two books shows the positive result of response by God's errant people. In contrast, Amos pronounces coming judgment on the nations. Edom is not only included in the initial list (1:11–12), but is targeted at the end (9:12). It is logical, then, that Obadiah should follow Amos, illustrating the result of nonresponse found in the destruction of Edom. Joel and Obadiah then serve as postexilic illustrations of the ongoing relevance of preexilic prophetic messages. In the process they exemplify the deliverance that comes when people do respond and the judgment that comes when they do not.

