With these two examples juxtaposed for the audience, the book of Jonah provides a synthesis. Even the most pagan of cities, Nineveh, showing even the most uninformed response, experienced mercy at the hands of God. The appropriate response to the prophetic oracles of indictment and judgment is to begin taking steps in the right direction. As Jonah synthesizes the fruits of the juxtaposition of the two previous pairings of books, it also then provides transition to the chronological sequence of prophetic collections. This sequence is concluded and synthesized by Malachi, who summarizes the call and response for the postexilic audience.

The NT connections concern the “sign of Jonah” (Matt. 12:39–41; 16:4; Luke 11:29–32). The Pharisees request a “sign,” presumably to authenticate Christ's message, and are told they will receive no sign but the sign of Jonah. In Matt. 12 Christ proceeds with the analogy that as Jonah was three days in the belly of the fish, so the Son of man will be three days in the earth. In both Matt. 12 and Luke 11, Christ comments that the Ninevites will stand up at judgment and condemn the Pharisees for their unbelief. Neither the three-day analogy, nor the future act of the Ninevites, is textually identified as the “sign of Jonah.” Luke 11:30 gives the only positive clue: “For just as Jonah became a sign to the people of Nineveh, so the Son of man will be to this generation” (NRSV). We must ask, then, how Jonah “was a sign to the Ninevites.” The only indication that the book offers for Jonah to be a sign to the Ninevites (not just to the Pharisees or us) is that he proclaimed a message of judgment. This served as a sign preceding the impending judgment of God.

Bibliography

Ackerman, J. “Satire and Symbolism in the Song of Jonah.” Pages 213–46 in Traditions in Transformation, ed. B. Halpern and J. Levenson. Eisenbrauns, 1981; Alexander, D., D. Baker, and B. Waltke. Obadiah, Jonah, Micah. InterVarsity, 1988; Allen, L. The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Jonah, and Micah. Eerdmans, 1976; Clements, R. “The Purpose of the Book of Jonah.” VTSup 28 (1974): 16–28; Cook, S., and S. C. Winter. On the Way to Nineveh. Scholars Press, 1999; Craig, K. “Jonah in Recent Research.” CurBS 7 (1999): 97–118; Fretheim, T. “Jonah and Theodicy.” ZAW 90 (1978): 227–37; idem. . Message of Jonah Message of Jonah. . AugsburgAugsburg, , 19771977; ; HolbertHolbert, , J. C. “Deliverance Belongs to Yahweh! Satire in the Book of Jonah.” JSOT 21 (1981): 59–81; Landes, G. “Jonah: A Mas[h]al?” Pages 137–58 in Israelite Wisdom, ed. J. Gammie, W. Brueggemann, et al. Scholars Press for Union Theol. Sem., 1978; idem. “The Kerygma of the Book of Jonah.” Interpretation 21 (1967): 3–31; idem. “Matthew 12:40 as an Interpretation of ‘the Sign of Jonah’ against Its Biblical Background.” Pages 665–84 in The Word of the Lord Shall Go Forth, ed. C. Meyers and M. O’Connor. Eisenbrauns, 1983; Michalowski, P. “Commemoration, Writing, and Genre in Ancient Mesopotamia.” Pages 69–89 in The Limits of Historiography. Brill, 1999; Orth, M. “Genre in Jonah: The Effects of Parody in the Book of Jonah.” Pages 257–82 in The Bible in the Light of Cuneiform Literature, ed. W. W. Hallo, B. W. Jones, and G. L. Mattingly. E. Mellen, 1990; Sasson, J. Jonah. Doubleday, 1990; Sherwood, Y. A Biblical Text and Its Afterlives. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Simon, U. Jonah. JPS, 1999; Stuart, D. Hosea–Jonah. Word, 1987; Tribble, P. Rhetorical Criticism. Fortress, 1994; Walton, J. “The Object Lesson of Jonah 4:5–7 and the Purpose of the Book of Jonah.” BBR 2 (1992): 47–57; Wiseman, D. J. “Jonah’s Nineveh.” TynBul 30 (1979): 29–51.

John H. Walton

Josephus     See Jewish Context of the NT

Joshua, Book of

Joshua gives the account of Israel’s taking possession of the land promised by God, the division of the land among the tribes, and finally a renewal of the covenant at Shechem (Josh. 24).

History of Interpretation

In precritical Christian interpretation, Joshua was read in light of theology. Since the name Joshua is close to Jesus (identical in the Greek forms in LXX and NT), the figure was readily taken as a type of Christ. In Heb. 4:8–11 the “rest” (p 405) into which Joshua led Israel is seen as temporary and inferior to the “rest” that still awaits God’s people in Christ. Allegorical readings persisted into medieval times (Sæbø 184). In the Reformation it was read with the perspective that God’s historical dealings and covenant with Israel were both preparatory for and analogous to his dealings with the Christian church and Christian nations (O’Donovan and O’Donovan 715). Joshua’s actions in Canaan could then be exemplary for contemporary rulers (86, 605).

Critical interpretation, no longer looking for Christian doctrine, saw the book rather as evidence of the historical emergence of Israel. Because Joshua relates the taking of the land that was promised in the Pentateuch (Exod. 23:20–33; Deuteronomy passim), early critics thought that the sources they found in the Pentateuch could be traced into Joshua, within a so-called Hexateuch (von Rad 296–305; Fohrer 197). The strength of this view is its recognition of Joshua’s continuities with the Pentateuchal books prior to Deuteronomy (e.g., Num. 13–14; 34:17). This kind of approach found links with Israel’s actual early history, for example, in memories of conquest kept alive at the sanctuary at Gilgal (Fohrer 200–201).

Recent critical study has placed Joshua within the Deuteronomistic History (Deuteronomy–Kings; Noth). This view rightly observes close affinities between Deuteronomy and Joshua, for example, in the “Deuteronomic” terms in which Joshua succeeds Moses, especially the importance there of “the Book of the Law” (Josh. 1:1–9, cf. Deut. 28:61; 31:26), and also in specific correspondences between the two books (e.g., Deut. 27 and Josh. 8:30–35). Yet there are also contrasts between Deuteronomy and Joshua and, conversely, continuities with Numbers. For example, Joshua has a larger role for the priests than Deuteronomy (Josh. 4:10, cf. Num. 4:1–15). Noth’s answer to this was to postulate priestly additions to the Deuteronomistic work. But this underrates the extent to which Joshua follows Numbers as well as Deuteronomy. The role of Joshua himself is prepared for throughout Exodus–Deuteronomy (Exod. 33:11; Num. 27:12–23; Deut. 3:23–29; 31:1–8, 23; 34:9).

Smend’s reading of Josh. 1:1–9 found evidence of an exilic “nomistic,” or conditional, redaction (1:7–9) of the basic Deuteronomistic account, which had stressed complete victory. A different line derives from the now-dominant view that the basic Deuteronomistic edition stems from the time of Josiah. Here, Joshua is deliberately portrayed as a type of Josiah, and the issue in the book is the need to affirm Yahwistic faith in the context of religious pluralism in late monarchic Judah; this is the condition of Josiah's expansionistic policies (Nelson 21–22).

Form-critically, Joshua has been compared with ancient Near Eastern conquest accounts. Younger has shown that Joshua broadly fits within patterns of such accounts from 1300 to 600 BCE. However, the book may also include other forms, such as toponym lists and boundary descriptions (cf. Nelson 9–11).

Regarding historicity, it is widely argued that Joshua's account of the conquest does not match what is known from archaeology about the patterns of occupation and destruction of the cities in Canaan, such as Ai (Jericho is less of a problem in this respect than sometimes claimed [Mazar 283]). Conservative explanations for these disharmonies include redating the conquest from the generally accepted thirteenth century to the fifteenth century BCE (Bimson), reexamining the identifications of cities in the account (including Ai), and exegetical strategies (e.g., Joshua may not always imply the total destruction of a city; Hess 141, cf. 158–59). In general, the provisional nature of archaeological results is stressed, "etiological" explanations of traditions avoided, and the basic historicity of the text affirmed.

Modern literary approaches draw attention to the dangers of oversimplified readings. Most significantly, a tension is perceived between the claims in the text that Joshua conquered the entire land (11:23; 21:44–45) and the perspective that, even in Joshua's old age, much of the land remained to be conquered (13:1) and certain enclaves still held out (15:6). It is the latter perspective that gave credence to Smend's nomistic redactional layer. The literary approach tends to see the discrepancy as having a function in the meaning of the book, such that, for example, Israel is depicted as undeserving and yet taking the land (Polzin 90).

Finally, sociological readings understand Joshua, not as the history of an actual conquest, but as the delineation of cultural, ethnic, and religious boundaries. Mullen's work provides this new paradigm, and for him the setting is, once again, the time of Josiah, the need being to define carefully who counts as "Israel" (Mullen 87–119).

Hearing the Message of Joshua

The book may be divided into four sections: entry to the land (1:1–5:12), its conquest (5:13–(p 406)12:24), its division among the tribes (13:1–21:45), and the worship of Yahweh in it (22:1–24:33).

The opening verses of Joshua announce that the time has come for the promises made to Israel through Moses to be fulfilled. The words “After the death of Moses the servant of the LORD” (1:1) not only function as a structural marker of a new beginning, but also recall that Joshua, not Moses, would lead Israel into the land (Deut. 3:23–29). The vision of the land that awaits is reaffirmed (1:4; cf. Deut. 11:24), God’s promise of his presence is transferred from Moses to Joshua (1:5), and Joshua is called to “be strong and very courageous” (as Moses had already commissioned him; Deut. 31:7). This courage is to be directed in two ways: first to the battles ahead (v. 6), and second to the keeping of God’s commandments, in the form of the “Book of the Law” (1:7–8), which thus stands over the whole action of the book. Joshua is both like and unlike Moses. With respect to God’s call and enabling, he is like Moses in taking responsibility to put Israel in possession of the promised land (Moses had begun this with the settlement of the Transjordanian tribes; Deut. 3:12–17), and in his loyalty to Yahweh alone and his obedience to “the Book of the Law.” Joshua is unlike Moses in that he is not himself lawgiver (but see Josh. 24:25–26), and that his leadership is specifically orientated to the task of land possession. His role as successor to Moses is thus limited, since in a certain sense Moses is succeeded by the “Book of the Law” itself (the written form of his spoken words), and in another sense by the “leaders of the congregation,” who make decisions alongside Joshua concerning the status of the Gibeonites (Josh. 9:15, 18 NRSV; see also 23:2). The succession to Moses as prophet (Deut. 18:15–18) is not directly raised in Joshua.

The first section of the book (1:1–5:12) focuses on the crossing into the land. The mission of the spies (ch. 2) recalls a previous, unsuccessful mission (Num. 13–14), but here the cooperation of the Canaanite Rahab and her confession of faith give hope of a better sequel. The crossing of the Jordan (Josh. 3–4) has echoes of that of the Reed Sea at the exodus (Exod. 15). The first Passover in the land (5:10–12) signals the completion of the journey from Egypt to Canaan. Passover structurally marks the departure and the arrival, and theologically the passage from slavery to freedom.

The freedom has yet to be realized in the conquest itself, however. The narrative of this follows in 5:13–12:24. The taking of Jericho furnishes the paradigm for the conquest of a city within the promised land, with the destruction of every living creature in it (6:21), in accordance with the law of Deut. 20:16–18. That this is a victory of Yahweh alone is emphasized by the means by which the city falls. The qualifications of totality in this action are, first, the sparing of Rahab, in fulfillment of the spies’ promise to her (2:14), and second, the offense against the ritual proscription of the goods of the city by Achan, which is then nullified by his execution along with his family.

The taking of Jericho is followed by further victories over cities both north and south, these victories being specifically over kings (Josh. 12:7–24). In this way a triumph is suggested, not only over enemies as such, but also of a new kind of society over one based (like Egypt) on tyranny. This is another example of the full circle from the exodus.

The account of the conquest is presented first as a clean sweep (11:23), but then as an ongoing work, likely to overspill Joshua's own life (13:1; cf. Judg. 1:1). In the account of the division of the land that follows, there are several indications that this corresponds to reality (15:63; 16:10; 17:12). The stage is thus set for a continuing struggle.

The third section relates the division of the land among the tribes (13:1–21:45). An exception is made for the Levitical (priestly) tribe, who receive towns within the other tribes' territories (14:3–4; ch. 21), following the principle in Deut. 18:2 that "the LORD is their inheritance" (where "inheritance" otherwise entails territory). In practice, they would have towns and land, and in that limited way hold property. But their particular role in relation both to Yahweh and to Israel as a whole is highlighted by this special treatment.

Finally, the commitment of Israel to worship Yahweh alone is reaffirmed, first in a charge by Joshua to "all Israel," represented by its elders, judges, and officers (23:2; cf. Deut. 16:18), then in a formal covenant renewal at Shechem (Josh. 24). This follows a reaffirmation of the obligation of Israel to worship Yahweh alone, including the tribes who had settled in Transjordan (Josh. 22). The people are unified within one land, and the unrivaled place of Yahweh in it is symbolized by the acknowledgment of only one place of worship, at this stage Shiloh, by virtue of the presence of the tabernacle there (18:1).

Can this story of Israel's liberation into its own land have relevance today? The answer lies neither in treating the book's message in a purely spiritualizing way (where, for example, crossing the Jordan is a metaphor for death), nor in finding direct mandates for the warlike behavior of (p 407)contemporary nations. If there is a mandate for godly nationhood in Joshua, what form does it take? A reading of the NT, with its proclamation of the gospel to all nations, apparently precludes the application of Joshua narrowly to historic Israel and the land it once occupied. On the contrary, the idea of a "Christian nation," which has appeared frequently in the history of Christian thought, in widely differing places (Grosby 213–33), has more credibility. Yet that too has been capable of abuse, to the point of justifying repressive nationalisms and landgrabs. If the dangerous theology of Joshua is to be appropriated somehow for political theology, it must be in such a way as to avoid such extreme and self-regarding realizations.

Joshua and Theology

Joshua continues, in one sense, Deuteronomy's blueprint for nationhood. This consists in an ordering of people under Torah, which is in turn given by God. Joshua himself is called to show the right attitude to this Torah (Josh. 1:7–8), in terms similar to those required of the king (Deut. 17:18–20). And when he comes to pass on responsibility for leadership to “elders and heads, their judges and officers,” he urges them in turn to adhere rigorously to it (Josh. 23:2, 6 NRSV). In the covenant renewal at Shechem, Joshua establishes a “statute and ordinance” with the people (24:25 AT; cf. Deut. 5:31), and then writes in the “Book of the Law [Torah] of God” (v. 26). This suggests that the “Book of the Law” is open to allow reaffirmations of Israel's allegiance to God to be added to it (this in qualification of Deut. 4:2). Joshua shows that Torah always informs the people's true leadership.

It is Torah obedience, furthermore, that legitimates the people's possession of territory. The close connection of law and territory is established in Deuteronomy, in which the gift of land is consistently predicated on the people's obedience to Torah (Deut. 17:14–20 is an example). The same connection is made at the outset of Joshua, when Joshua is exhorted to “be strong and courageous” in respect of both law-keeping and land-possession (Josh. 1:6–9). The book of Joshua, therefore, enacts in principle the concept of a people living in a territory, subject to a law that operates within its borders.

Such possession, however, must be legitimate. An important function of Joshua is to demonstrate the legitimacy of Israel's possession of the land of Canaan. The issue is confronted directly, because the land to be possessed is no “land without a people.” On the contrary, it is inhabited by peoples who are firmly bedded down in their own places, and who base their own claims, we suppose, on their actual possession, their culture, and their religion. The claim to legitimate possession entails the assertion of the right to take and keep by force, and in principle the need to press the claim against others. This is what is asserted in Yahweh's victory over the peoples of Canaan. It is not only a victory, but also an act of judgment, a claim that it is right that Israel and not others should possess this land. The nature of the war against the Canaanites as a judgment is signaled in several texts outside Joshua (Gen. 15:16; Lev. 20:23; Deut. 9:4–5), and in the frequent characterization of them as acting abominably in God's eyes (Deut. 12:29–32). (For the nexus of victory, judgment, and possession, see also O'Donovan and O'Donovan 36–45.)

The confrontation between Israel and the nationsThe confrontation between Israel and the nations, therefore, is between a nation that lives under Yahweh in obedience to Torah and others that do not. This fundamental difference between Israel and the Canaanite nations is fully present in Joshua only by virtue of the knowledge that Deuteronomy and the Pentateuch generally lie behind it. But it appears at certain points, one hint being in the categorization of the Canaanite enemies repeatedly as “kings” (Josh. 12), a feature that seems to pitch the type of power in the city-states against the kingship of Yahweh, much like the power of Pharaoh in Exodus.

It is against this background that we have to consider the greatest stumbling block for modern readers of Joshua, notwithstanding the rationale just offered. This is the “ban of destruction,” or the kherem, the command from God to put the inhabitants of Canaan to the sword (6:17). In modern commentary it is common to explain this command as a metaphor for rigorous adherence to Yahweh and separation from other forms of religion (Moberly). This is supported by the historical assessment that in all probability Israel never did to Canaan what the book of Joshua depicts it as having done. The language of kherem was borrowed from the conventions of ancient Near Eastern religious war (also known from the famous ninth-century BCE Moabite Stone, on which the Moabite King Mesha claimed to have put Israel to the kherem).

The problem with a metaphorical understanding is that Joshua speaks about real peoples, land, and politics. The plain force of the language has been felt by those in every age who have used the conquest of Canaan as grounds, by identifying (p 408)themselves with Israel, for their own subjugation of peoples by war in order to possess land (Collins). The use of a warlike metaphor to speak of a God who abhors war would have to be regarded as a failed strategy!

The issue must be approached differently, by asking whether the book of Joshua as a whole really portrays Israel as matching the criteria of legitimate possession. We have begun to see that the story of the book is not as straightforward as it appears at first glance. Israel permits first Rahab (Josh. 2) and then the Gibeonites (Josh. 9) to live alongside themselves in the land. And the picture of total possession is called in question by the perspective that possession remains to be accomplished (13:1), and has in some cases been frustrated. There are thus questions as to boundaries: what are the actual boundaries of the people? As Hawk (xxii–xxiii) has put it, outsiders (Rahab, Gibeon) become insiders, while insiders (Achan's family) become outsiders. And even the geographical boundary of the Jordan is put in question by the issue of the settlement of some tribes in Transjordan, producing the conflict related in Josh. 22 (Jobling).

On this view the careful constructions of Israelite identity are not finally affirmed in Joshua, but precisely put in question. While the building blocks for a national identity may be put in place here (and thus for nations generally, not just Israel), the picture of Israel in Joshua is part of the wider portrayal in Genesis–Kings of a people that fails to become what it is called to be. Joshua proclaims at Shechem: “You cannot serve the LORD” (24:19 NRSV), a jarring note that corresponds to Deuteronomy's view (9:4–7), ensuring that the story of Israel's possession becomes a critique of the violence that subjugates others without rightly possessing a mandate to do so. In Israel's failure to occupy the land of Canaan in obedience lies the warning that none might claim to make war and dispossess others in the name of God. In Hawk's words: “Joshua should be studied, not shunned, precisely because it holds the mirror up to all who regard themselves as the people of God” (xxxii). Joshua is the counterpart of the prophetic vision for Israel, which consistently resists the identification of “Israel” with an ethnic people and with power that relies on force (see also Jewett and Lawrence). The legitimate possession of warrants to be a nation depends not on unbreakable historic guarantees, but on ongoing commitment to true freedom from tyrannies and idolatries of whatever kind. Joshua, as a document for Israel in its own place and time, offers a remit for peoples today to conceive their specific traditions of culture and place anew, in light of God's law of liberty.

In the NT, Israel finds its true self in Christ (O'Donovan and O'Donovan 131), and so in the supranational church. This does not mean that God's action of judgment on the nations is revoked, nor the enactment of judgment within political structures (Rom. 13:1–5), both of which can be said to be proposed by the book of Joshua, the latter with warrants that extend to all political authorities. But it does mean the renunciation of all claims to be the people of God in ways that equate with ethnic or national entities. See also Earth/Land; Political Theology

Bibliography

Bimson, J. Redating the Exodus and Conquest. JSOTSup 5. Almond, 1981; Collins, J. “The Zeal of Phinehas: The Bible and the Legitimation of Violence.” JBL 122 (2003): 3–21; Fohrer, G. Introduction to the Old Testament. SCM, 1970; Grosby, S. Biblical Ideas of Nationality.

Eisenbrauns, 2002; Hawk, L. Joshua. Liturgical Press, 2000; Hess, R. Joshua. TOTC. InterVarsity, 1996; Jewett, R., and J. Lawrence. Captain America and the Crusade against Evil. Eerdmans, 2003; Jobling, D. “ ‘The Jordan a Boundary’: Transjordan in Israel’s Ideological Geography.” Pages 88–134 in The Sense of Biblical Narrative, II. JSOTSup 39. JSOT, 1986; Mazar, A. “The Iron Age I.” Pages 258–301 in The Archaeology of Ancient Israel, ed. A. Ben-Tor. Open University of Israel, 1992; Moberly, R. W. L. “Theological Interpretation of an Old Testament Book: A Response to Gordon McConville’s Deuteronomy.” SJT 56 (2003): 516–25; Mullen, E. Narrative History and Ethnic Boundaries. SemeiaSt. Scholars Press, 1993; Nelson, R. Joshua. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 1997; Noth, M. The Deuteronomistic History. JSOTSup 15. JSOT, 1981; O’Donovan, O. The Desire of the Nations. Cambridge University Press, 1996; O’Donovan, O., and J. Lockwood O’Donovan, eds. From Irenaeus to Grotius. Eerdmans, 1999; Polzin, R. Moses and the Deuteronomist. Seabury, 1980; Rad, G. von. Old Testament Theology. Vol. 1. Oliver & Boyd, 1962; Sæbø, M. Hebrew Bible/Old Testament: The History of Its Interpretation. Vol. 1, part 2, The Middle Ages. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2000; Smend, R. “The Law and the Nations: A Contribution to Deuteronomistic Tradition History.” Pages 95–110 in Reconsidering Israel and Judah, ed. G. Knoppers and J. G. McConville. SBTS 8. Eisenbrauns, 2000; Younger, K. L. Ancient Conquest Accounts. JSOTSup 98. Sheffield Academic Press, 1990.

J. G. McConville

Jude, Book of

The challenge of Jude for theological interpretation is not so much its theology as its ethics: what is the ethical evaluation of such a prophetic denunciation? The second challenge is Jude’s use (p 409) of noncanonical literature and its meaning for our view of the canon.

History of Interpretation

The interpretation of Jude begins with 2 Peter, who edits and adapts Jude, such as removing the direct references to the Pseudepigrapha, to form his second chapter. Unlike 2 Peter, Jude was cited relatively early and included in the early canon lists, only to go through a period of questioning due to his citation of Pseudepigrapha. By the end of the fourth century, most of the church had decided for the canonicity of Jude and thus were using the letter. In the contemporary period Jude again fell out of favor, not because of his use of the Pseudepigrapha, but because of his prophetic denunciation that was viewed as ethically sub-Christian. Normally the work was dated late in the first century or in the first half of the second. Thus it was only after a century and more of neglect that the last thirty years have seen a revival of interest in the letter, as it began to be viewed by some as a representative of Jewish Christianity and appreciated by many for its rhetorical skill.

The Message of Jude

Jude's message is relatively straightforward. He is concerned about traveling teachers who are subverting the local church. His concern is not about doctrinal deviation, but about a rejection of the practical rule of Jesus over Christians in that his teachings were being rejected in the name of grace, which was being used to justify licentiousness. Jude denounces this moral deviation and pronounces a sentence of doom on these teachers, a doom based on illustrations drawn from his understanding of narratives that we find in the OT. Because these teachers also appear to have rejected angelic authority (as well as the authority of the established leaders in the church)—whether of fallen or holy angels is not clear—Jude also accuses them of rebellion, adding to this a third charge of greed. Thus, deviation from the teaching and character of Jesus, in the realms of money, power, and sex, he condemns as practices that doom these Christian teachers to hell.

The response that Jude teaches is twofold. First, the believers are themselves to focus more on growing in their Christian life (prayer in the Spirit, love, Christian practice, and eschatological expectancy). Second, they are to reach out to those caught in the teaching of these teachers, extricate such, and receive them. There is nothing said about dealing with the teachers (no sentence of excommunication or instruction to have nothing to do with them), but instead they are left to the judgment of “the Lord,” who is coming soon.

Jude and the Canon

It is well known that Jude refers to both 1 En. 1:9 and probably the lost ending of the Testament of Moses (known to us from references in the writings of the fathers). What is not as clearly seen is that most of Jude's references to OT narratives reflect the recontextualization of those narratives in Jewish literature. This means that he makes no differentiation between OT texts and 1 Enoch, nor a differentiation between the canonical form of a story and how that story was told in later Jewish literature. Thus, Jude demonstrates a stage in the development of canon consciousness in which narratives have authority because they are related to the canon, not because they are the canonical form of a narrative. This reminds us that the questions Jews asked about OT works (whether they could be given up to be burned in situations of persecution) were different than later Christian questions about NT works (whether they were to be read in and thereby endorsed by the church).

As Jude's second contribution to the canon, he makes his twin points that ethical deviations are deviations from the faith as much as or more than doctrinal deviations, and that eschatological expectation determines and enforces ethics. Furthermore, he demonstrates in his treatment of those who have followed the intruding teachers his awareness of the present as a time of grace before judgment.

Finally, Jude also demonstrates that the genre of prophetic denunciation was alive and well throughout the first century.

Theological Significance of Jude

Theologically, Jude reveals that neither post-fourth-century concepts of canon nor modern models of biblical interpretation are absolute. His narrative method, which relies on the later development of the biblical narratives, and his loose sense of canonical boundaries show this.

Furthermore, Jude contributes to our understanding of the importance of eschatological, even apocalyptic, expectation. It is the lively expectation of final judgment that for Jude sanctions present ethical behavior.

Jude also shows us the practical application of the doctrine of grace. Upon repentance alone, (p 410) people are freely received back into the orthodox camp.

Finally, Jude demonstrates the centrality of the concept that Jesus is Lord to the early church. Those who deny his authority in their lives ethically (no matter what their doctrinal confession) are apostate and under sentence of eternal judgment. Heresy for Jude is primarily ethical.

In none of these is Jude unique, but his contribution nonetheless is real.

See also Pseudepigrapha

Bibliography

Bauckham, R. Jude, 2 Peter. WBC 50. Word, 1983; idem. Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church. T&T Clark, 1990; Bray, G., ed. James, 1–2 Peter, 1–3 John, Jude. ACCSNT 11. InterVarsity, 2000; Charles, J. D. Literary Strategy in the Epistle of Jude. University of Scranton Press, 1993; Chester, A., and R. Martin. The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter, and Jude. NTT. Cambridge University Press, 1994; Kelly, J. N. D. A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and Jude. BNTC. Baker, 1981; Kraftchick, S. Jude, 2 Peter. Abingdon, 2002; Neyrey, J. 2 Peter, Jude. AB 37C. Doubleday, 1993; Vögtle, A. Der Judasbrief, der 2. Petrusbrief. EKKNT 22. Benziger/Neukirchener Verlag, 1994; Watson, D. Invention, Arrangement, and Style. SBLDS 104. Scholars Press, 1988.

Peter H. Davids

Judges, Book of

On the surface Judges seems a straightforward account of Israel's history between the conquest of Canaan and the rise of David, focused on the role of Israel's leadership with respect to the people's increasingly sinful behavior. Along these lines the book breaks quite neatly into three parts:

- an overview story of the failure to complete the conquest (1:1–2:5);
- stories of various judges, which collectively portray a downward spiral of repeated cycles of sin, judgment, distress, and deliverance (2:6–16:31); and
- two final stories of religious and moral depravity (chs. 17–21).

Below the surface, the book is more than simply a negative account of this particular period. The writer of Judges was using past events and experiences of the community of faith and its leadership to exhort his contemporary audience to follow the Lord. Based on theology drawn from Deuteronomy, Judges argued that Israel's leaders were to be constantly reminding Israel to remember the Lord's covenant faithfulness demonstrated by his past action in the exodus and conquest, as well as his ongoing and continued acts of compassion in repeated deliverances of Israel. Therefore, they were to fear the Lord and follow him by keeping covenant (Deut. 4:9–12; cf. Judg. 2:6–10, 20–23; 3:1–6; 6:13). Judges understood this leadership as coming from Judah (1:2–20) and through a king (e.g., 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25). Judges was pointing, in other words, to King David as the ideal, covenant-keeping leader. For the writer, the right kind of leader—exemplified by King David—was essential for transforming the people of God.

History of Interpretation

Among the historical books in the OT, Judges has perhaps received the least attention in the history of interpretation, except in the modern period.

The events and personages from the period of the judges are barely mentioned in the rest of the OT (only a dozen times outside the book of Judges). The references are of three types: (1) General historical overviews reflect the same negative view (in language similar to Judges) of Israel's covenantal failings in the period of the judges (1 Sam. 12:8–12; Neh. 9:22–37; Pss. 78:54–72; 106:34–46). (2) There are particular accounts of events in Judges (e.g., the victory over Midian [chs. 7–8; Ps. 83:9–12; Isa. 9:4; 10:26], the moral failure of Gibeah [ch. 19; Hos. 9:9; 10:9], and Abimelech's ignominious death [ch. 9; 2 Sam. 11:21]). And (3) there is one positive allusion to the period of the judges (Isa. 1:26), where Isaiah sees the future Zion, purified of sin, as a time of the restoration of judges “as in days of old.”

Jewish interpretation in the Second Temple period and Christian interpretation in the NT (and early church period) also show relatively little use of the book, especially in light of much more substantial treatment of other portions of the OT. In the Second Temple period, only a few of the various historical reviews covered the period of the judges. Pseudo-Philo (first century CE) reviewed the period of the judges (L.A.B. 25.1–48.5), and spoke of Kenaz, rather than Judah, as the one to lead Israel. (Kenaz is mentioned only in passing in Judges but receives extensive treatment in Pseudo-Philo.) Ben Sirach (175 BCE), as part of a brief review of Israel’s history, spoke briefly of the judges in positive tones, suggesting that they did not yield to idolatry (Sir. 46:11–12). During this period the tendency to idealize important figures from Israel’s past (e.g., Abraham, Moses, Jacob) was part apologetic against those opposing the Jews of the Second Temple period, and (p 411) part support for a positive history to encourage national Jewish identity. Not all comments were positive, however. In a passing remark, The Lives of the Prophets (early first century CE) refers to the period of the judges as “days of the anarchy” (Liv. Pro. 16.3).

In the NT, Acts 13:19–20 and Heb. 11:32–34 are the only clear reflections on the period of the judges. In Acts 13, as Paul reviews Israel’s history in a sermon leading up to Christ, he mentions only that the conquest took about 450 years and that God gave Israel judges. (None of the similar sermons in Acts—by Peter, Stephen, and Paul—where a historical review is used even mention the judges; in Acts 7:45–47 Stephen jumps from Joshua to David.)

Hebrews 11:32–34 mentions four judges:

And what more shall I say? I do not have time to tell about Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah, David, Samuel and the prophets, who through faith conquered kingdoms, administered justice, and gained what was promised; who shut the mouths of lions, quenched the fury of the flames, and escaped the edge of the sword; whose weakness was turned to strength; and who became powerful in battle and routed foreign armies.

This passage comes at the end of the so-called “honor roll of faith,” where the writer of Hebrews extols the faith of Abraham, Moses, and significant others. The remark in verse 32—“I do not have time to tell about Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah”—sums up (unintentionally) what seems to have been the prevailing attitude among interpreters, that one can pass over Judges quickly, if not skip it altogether.

Between the ancient church and the present day, relatively little has been done with the book of Judges as a whole. Yet in 1615, during the Reformation, Richard Rogers wrote a thousand-page commentary on the book of Judges. He saw the period through the lens of Heb. 11, with his commentary as being for the benefit of “all such as desire to grow in faith and Repentance, and especially of them, who would more cleerely [sic] understand and make use of the worthie [sic] examples of the Saints, recorded in divine history.” Rogers saw the various judges as positive examples of faith. What other work was done on Judges seems to share Rogers’s approach of interpreting particular judges as illustrations of theological points. A century later, for example, Jonathan Edwards reflected on Jephthah’s vow (Judg. 11:32–40) at length, while addressing issues of his day concerning making vows and covenants.

In the modern period, Judges has been treated as part of a larger, single body known as the “Deuteronomistic History,” comprised of Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings. Within this grouping of books, scholars have spent more time with Joshua, Samuel, and Kings than with Judges. Only in the contemporary period, where literary—particularly feminist—readings of the Bible have been the focus, has Judges become the object of more intense theological and interpretative scrutiny. In particular, the stories of Acsah, Deborah, Jael, Jephthah’s daughter, and the Levite’s concubine have received much attention.

When studying any OT passage or book, one should “read the text twice.” A “first reading” seeks to understand the text in its own historical setting and on its own terms, without reference to later scriptural or historical developments (e.g., the life, death, and resurrection of Christ). What was the situation of the original audience? How did the author address their concerns and struggles? What did he want them to learn about God and about themselves? How did he want them to respond? A “second reading” looks at how the text fits into the broader picture of the whole sweep of redemptive history, how it appears in light of the climax of the OT story in Christ, and then how it contributes to theology and application.

The book of Judges is not merely a showcase of examples of behavior or belief to imitate or avoid. Rather, it reveals God’s plan, purpose, and character (e.g., faithfulness to his covenant and to his people; his patience and compassion in delaying the ultimate judgment of exile from the land). It also reveals the human heart (e.g., its inability to serve God faithfully; its ongoing need to know who God is and what he has done for his people). Judges lays bare the community of faith’s need in a certain place and time—the need for godly leadership to lead them in keeping covenant by faith. But like all OT Scripture, it also points forward to Christ, the perfect leader who alone can truly redeem, change hearts, and reveal God.

The Message of Judges

This section reflects a “first reading,” as described above, concerned with the message of Judges to its original OT audience. Under the later section entitled “Judges and Theology,” a “second reading” of Judges in the light of Christ will come into play.

(p 412) Written after the time when David became king, Judges has provided the only extant account of the historical events between the conquest and the rise of David. But the recounting of that history was not its primary purpose. Rather, most simply put, the message of Judges addresses the difficulty that Israel’s leadership (the judges) had in leading the people of God to fear the Lord and keep covenant. Failure to follow the Lord by fearing him and keeping his covenant threatened Israel’s continued peace and presence in the land. Judges calls the Israelites to consider whom they would follow in terms of both human and divine leaders.

More particularly, Judges’ purpose is (1) to demonstrate the failure of Israel’s leadership to pass on the knowledge of God to the next generation or to lead them in covenant-keeping (2:10 as it leads into 2:11ff.) and (2) to argue for a better leader: a covenant-keeping king, not a judge; from Judah, not Benjamin; David, not Saul. (David and Saul are never explicitly mentioned in Judges, but the character and behavior of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin are contrasted several times, serving to contrast the character of the leadership of the most famous sons of each tribe—David and Saul.) For Judges, the answer to the crisis in leadership and the increasing Canaanization of Israel was David, the king from Judah, who would lead the people of God in fearing the Lord and keeping covenant.

Judges opens by noting the crisis in leadership created by Joshua’s death and God’s answer that Judah would lead Israel in completing the conquest (1:1–2). Judges 1 continues by outlining the general success of the tribe of Judah in taking their allotted inheritance (1:2–20) and the almost universal failure of the other tribes to do likewise (1:21–36). Judah is presented as keeping covenant and as a result being the tribe to lead Israel. David, to whom Judges’ focus on Judah is pointing, ultimately completed the conquest of Canaan by taking the stronghold of Zion from the Jebusites (2 Sam. 5:6–10). Moreover, he decisively defeated the Philistines (5:17–25), something that even Judah was unable to do in the period of the Judges (Judg. 1:19).

The heart of the book recounts the stories of twelve judges: six are extended accounts and six are short (3:7–16:31). In the extended narratives the problem of the particular leadership of the judges themselves is elaborated. Significantly, the first judge, Othniel, is from Judah, and there is nothing negative recounted about his leadership (3:7–11), both details pointing positively to the role of Judah in leadership, and hence to David. Judges concludes with the accounts of two sordid episodes of religious and moral failure (chs. 17–21). The refrain “in those days Israel had no king; everyone did as he saw fit” (17:6; 21:25; cf. 18:1; 19:1) punctuates the message of Judges, pointing to a king—David in particular—as the solution to Israel’s covenant-keeping woes.

Judges showed that not just any king would do. Appealing to the theology of kingship found in Deut. 17:14–20, the writer of Judges is arguing for a covenant-keeping king who would read the Law daily and lead the people in faithful acknowledgment of God (Deut. 4:9, 32–40). Throughout Deuteronomy that obedience is presented as a faith response (fearing the Lord). As Israel knew God, experienced his care and lordship, meditated on his amazing acts on their behalf (particularly the exodus), and rejoiced in being his children, they would want to honor him. Hence, it was essential to recall regularly, and teach their children, these things so that each new generation of Israelites would know the Lord and live as his obedient covenant children.

Judges tells repeated tales of what happens when that knowledge of the Lord is not passed on to subsequent generations (e.g., the story of Gideon, who has heard of the Lord from his father; but his father has also built an altar of Baal—Judg. 6:11ff., esp. vv. 13, 25). By focusing on the judges, the book emphasizes the integral role of leaders in this process.

Judges 2:16–19 states that Israel will not listen to their judges but prostitute themselves after other gods, thus suggesting that the judges may serve prophetic roles (although the accounts portray them almost exclusively as military leaders). And 2:17, read by itself, seems to imply that the judges are righteous and that the problem is simply with Israel at large. The individual stories, however, give more-complex accounts of the judges’ faith and failure, elaborating on the problems of their leadership and indicating that their own behavior and struggles with belief have made it difficult for them to remind and teach Israel. They do bring about mighty victories and deliver the people, and they do exercise faith; they are not simply failures. But they fall short and do not establish permanent peace (e.g., 2:19; 3:11; 8:33).

Judges recounts a downward spiral in the pattern of Israel’s belief and behavior. The people become increasingly “Canaanized” (Block 58), as shown preeminently in their idolatry, but also in religious (chs. 17–18) and moral (chs. 19–21) failure. The pattern of sin, judgment, crying out (p 413) in distress, and then deliverance by means of Spirit-anointed judges is not effecting any lasting change. God shows compassion again and again by not sending the nation into exile and by continually delivering the people. But the foreshadowing is there: Israel has to change, or the downward spiral of sin and judgment is going to lead to loss of the land and of God (18:30–31). The judges are not getting that job done. Israel needs to have changed hearts, as Deuteronomy calls for (10:16; 29:2–4; 30:6). They desperately need the right kind of leader—who will remind them of who the Lord is, who will lead them in obeying, and who will help them pass that knowledge on to their offspring. According to Judges, they need a king—from Judah.

By providing mixed accounts of the judges—faith and failure—with the repeated refrain in the closing chapters—“In those days Israel had no king; everyone did as he saw fit” (17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25)—Judges is arguing that a king is a better kind of leader. Not just any king would accomplish this, of course. It is essential that he be a God-fearing, covenant-keeping king, who would help the people themselves keep covenant.

Judges was not written to the people who lived during the time of the judges. It was an account of that time period for a later audience of God’s people. For its contemporary audience, Judges is an account of what happens when one generation fails to pass on the knowledge and fear of the Lord, and it is therefore an exhortation to correct that problem among themselves. Its message is to seek and embrace God-fearing, covenant-keeping leadership, which would lead Israel in keeping covenant.

The original setting has been much debated: Was it during David’s reign? In the divided kingdom? During the reign of Josiah? In the exile? After the exile? A subtle polemic against Benjamin (and by implication Saul) is found throughout. Benjamin was first in the list of tribes who failed to complete their part of the conquest (1:21). Gibeah in Benjamin (Saul’s hometown) was portrayed as a new Sodom (Judg. 19 vs. Gen. 19). Benjamin was the source of a civil war in Israel (Judg. 20), in which all Israel fought against Benjamin. In contrast, Judah, the tribe chosen to lead (1:1–2; 20:18) against Israel’s enemies, is the tribe that successfully keeps covenant by driving out the Canaanites (1:2–20). Together the anti-Benjamite polemic and the pro-Judahite apology suggest that Judges may well have been written in the period when there were two viable candidates for the throne—one from the house of David and the other from the house of Saul. That is the period when David was king in the south in Hebron, and Ish-Bosheth, the son of Saul, was king of the ten northern tribes in Ephraim (2 Sam. 2:8–5:10).

In that context, the writer of Judges was encouraging his fellow Israelites to choose and follow King David. One senses the writer hoping that under the leadership of a godly king like David, the people's hearts would at last be changed, they would fear the Lord and keep covenant, and they would avoid the covenant curse of the loss of the land that the Lord had given them.

Judges and the Canon

While Judges may not be reflected upon in great detail elsewhere in the history of interpretation, it does have several important canonical functions. First of all, if not for the book of Judges, almost nothing would be known of this period between the initial entry into the land and the time of Samuel. In that context it provides the first extended picture of problems with covenant-keeping in Israel. It sets a quite different tone than Joshua. Judges repeats the conclusion of Joshua (24:27–31) virtually verbatim rather early (Judg. 2:6–9). Yet, this passage, which served to conclude Joshua on a positive and hopeful note, is used by Judges to introduce the decline of Israel.

The second canonical contribution concerns a particular accent in Deuteronomic theology. As mentioned above, more-recent OT scholarship has most often treated Judges as part of a larger Deuteronomistic History. This DH reflects the particular theological concerns of the late preexilic and exilic periods as refracted through certain key themes: God dealt with Israel by means of the covenant he had made with them (Deut. 4:31). Worship was to be centralized in Jerusalem (ch. 12). Idolatry was the key sin that represented covenant-breaking (4:15–28). And blessing for obedience or judgment for disobedience was the primary expression of covenant in action (ch. 28). It is arguable, however, that Judges was written earlier than the late preexilic period and stands as a unique witness to an earlier Deuteronomic theology with a somewhat different focus. One generation is proclaiming the great and mighty deeds of God to the next and teaching the next generation to fear the Lord (Deut. 4:9–12; Judg. 2:6–10). Judges then becomes an account of what happens when one generation fails to pass on the knowledge and fear of the Lord.

A third canonical contribution concerns the land of inheritance that the Lord had given to Israel. The land's theological significance was (p 414) underscored by (1) the use of the refrain that "the land had peace" to conclude narratives of deliverance (3:11, 30; 5:31; 8:28) and (2) the recollection of the Lord's gift of the land in covenant lawsuit contexts (2:1–4; 6:7–10). The Lord (appropriately) punished the Israelites for their covenant disobedience by letting them experience captivity to foreigners while they were still in the land, which foreshadowed the eventual captivity of Israel outside it.

A fourth canonical contribution concerns kingship, about which Deuteronomy was reticent (17:14–20). David brought kingship into a prominent position in the theology and tradition of Israel. Judges, written after David had become king, argued for covenant-keeping kingship like David's as a means for leading people in spiritual transformation (echoed by Ps. 78—see esp. vv. 65–72 in light of 56–64). This would help Israel to avoid a continual falling into sin, and instead to enjoy lasting peace. From a perspective of leadership in the community of faith, Judges is perhaps the strongest canonical argument for kingship, although the focus is not on political structure but on spiritual transformation.

Judges and Theology

As has been noted, Judges took its theology primarily from Deuteronomy. Its theology was covenantal. That is, whatever happened to Israel, for good or for ill, was in the hands of the Lord, according to the covenant that he had made with them. When they were oppressed, it was the Lord who sold Israel into the hands of oppressors on account of their sin. When they were delivered, it was the Lord who raised up the judge to deliver them because of his compassion. Both judgment and deliverance (compassion) flowed from God's absolute covenant faithfulness (cf. Deut. 4:31; Judg. 2:18–19).

For the writer of Judges, the immediate hope on the horizon was a king, in particular, David, the king after God's own heart. In later OT history, however, it became obvious that most of the kings were no better at leading the people in keeping covenant than the judges had been. In fact, their perpetual unfaithfulness eventually caused Israel to be cast out of the land. Even the few outstanding, godly kings like David, who brought peace that lasted beyond their own reigns, were not able to change their own hearts or the hearts of the people. Books written by those standing further down the stream of OT history paint substantially the same bleak picture of covenant unfaithfulness on the part of the Lord's people. The OT story as a whole still cries out, like the book of Judges, for a leader who would be faithful to God and lead his people in keeping covenant.

That cry is answered in Christ, who was from the tribe of Judah, descended from David. Deuteronomy shows that Israel's faithfulness would flow from knowing the Lord. Jesus, God himself, became a man and dwelt among the Israelites, revealing the Lord to mankind in an unprecedented way (e.g., John 1:14; 1 John 1:1–2), being the exact radiance of God's glory (Heb. 1:3). Israel was to remember the great deliverance event of the exodus as the ultimate expression of God's care. Jesus brought about an even greater deliverance, saving his people even from sin and death by his own death on the cross. The unfaithfulness of the Israelite kings cost the nation the promised land. Jesus' faithfulness secures heaven itself for his people. The judges did not bring about permanent peace. Jesus, David's son, brought an enduring kingdom and peace that lasts even into eternity. Judges urged the need for a king, from Judah, who would fear God, live in covenant faithfulness, and lead the people in doing the same. Jesus, who was from the tribe of Judah, feared God and lived in perfect obedience to the Father (e.g., Phil. 2:5–8), giving his people an example to follow. Even more, by sending the Holy Spirit, he was able to do what David could not do: break the cycle of sin, judgment, crying out, and deliverance, and actually change the hearts of God's people, enabling them to be faithful to God.

God's compassion during the period of the judges pointed to the greater compassion and permanent peace he would bring through Jesus, the better deliverer. In Jesus, God's repeated acts of compassion in the OT have a foundation; God's mercy, grounded in the cross, extends "backward" as the basis for his compassion in Judges.

Furthermore, in Christ the judges are viewed from a new perspective. As recognized in the history of interpretation, Heb. 11 focuses on the judges as examples of faith, not as examples of failed covenantal leadership. Hebrews is not simply idealizing these characters the way interpreters in the Second Temple period did. Rather, Hebrews' interpretation is grounded in a "second reading," as described earlier, in rereading the OT in light of what has happened in Christ. In the setting of a first reading, the judges are complex characters, sometimes acting in faith, sometimes falling short. But once Christ had come, the struggling faith of the judges was understood as looking forward to Christ. In the end, in Christ, they were seen not as bringing the solution, but as (p 415) acting in faith that God would bring the solution. Which he did, in Christ.

The book of Judges called its original audience to follow a king who would lead them in knowing and fearing the Lord. In its place in the Christian canon, it issues the same call, except that the king to follow is no longer David but Jesus.

Bibliography

Block, D. Judges, Ruth. NAC 6. Broadman & Holman, 2002; Brettler, M. Z. "The Book of Judges: Literature as Politics." JBL 108 (1989): 395–418; Davis, D. R. "A Proposed Life Setting for the Book of Judges." Ph.D. diss., Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1978; Klein, L. R. The Triumph of Irony in the Book of Judges. Almond, 1988; O'Connell, R. H. The Rhetoric of the Book of Judges. Brill, 1996; Rogers, R. A Commentary upon the Whole Booke of Iudges. T. Man, 1615; Webb, B. G. The Book of Judges. JSOT, 1987.

J. Alan Groves

Judgment See Last Things, Doctrine of; Prophetic Writings; Sin, Doctrine of; Violence

Justice

The biblical theme of justice provides a standard and practice for the theological interpretation of Scripture. It exhibits a contrast to modern, post-Enlightenment notions of justice, which focus on the power and freedom of autonomous subjects. It also contrasts with conceptions under the umbrella of postmodernity that consider justice a matter of freedom from the tyranny of the majority, or privilege given to the perspectives of the marginalized. Whether focused on the liberty of individual rational thinkers or various oppressed constituencies, conceptions in modernity and postmodernity both contain primary commitments to the human subject. An aim toward understanding biblical justice in such a way that one hears from God and honors God in practice requires a perspective that places humans beneath the divine.

Justice conceived pan-biblically requires an understanding of the drama of creation and redemption that refuses to drive a wedge between the two. Genesis 1:26–28 and Ps. 8 reveal that God created humans and gave them the responsibility for earthkeeping and cultivation. With this initial responsibility comes the demand of justice: humans are to reflect the character of God in their response to the divine mandate that attends the purpose of human existence, granting God’s unique creatures their due regard and proper treatment. This regard and treatment are considered “just” because the resultant social, political, and relational practices correspond to the righteous character of God as seen, for example, in God’s love for the poor and downtrodden as well as in the hospitality God commands his covenant people to extend the stranger and alien. Some traditions also claim that this human responsibility specifically carries with it that justice inheres in the social structure of creation, leading to the view that discoverable divine ordinances exist that correspond to and express the command to love God and neighbor. These latter traditional views present a high view of general revelation as a source for the application of justice, though in concert with special revelation.

The biblical narrative reveals God as a covenant-maker and keeper, self-disclosed as one who will judge rightly and who expects those in covenantal relationship to act justly as one way of expressing fidelity. The Hebrew words for justice and righteousness (mishpat and tsedaqah, respectively) both reflect significant aspects of the biblical concept of justice. Tsedaqah reflects God's righteousness in moral character and his covenant love and faithfulness, as well as the legislative, judicial, and administrative aspects of his action in the world. God's law reflects his perfection in character. He rules justly, and his providential interaction with the world throughout history will ultimately be shown to accord with his righteous character. Mishpat and its cognates emphasize God's role as lawgiver and just judge as well as the attribute of rectitude. Mishpat and tsedaqah commonly appear as a word pair that expresses social justice throughout the OT. Mishpat and tsedaqah refer to the character trait of justice granted the king by God for the purpose of judging the people rightly, especially the poor and lowly (Ps. 72:1–2), and are found in relationship to the term for "equity" (99:4). As a social ideal, mishpat and tsedaqah are seen along the lines of kindness, mercy, and truth, and is further considered practically in conjunction with derek, "way" of life. To walk in the right way, in the straight and right path, is to practice justice and righteousness in the establishment of laws (99:7), the proper execution of justice, and the institution of social equity for the downtrodden, the poor, and the widow. The pursuit of the way of justice and righteousness is not limited to kings, but it is generally expected of all of God's covenant people as Micah (6:8) requires and Amos asks (5:24). If God's people practice justice, they will be blessed. As the OT narrative reveals, however, God's covenant people repeatedly fail to practice mishpat and tsedaqah.

(p 416) Readers of the NT, particularly Protestants, see the failure of God's covenant people to practice justice (dikaioynē—translated as "righteousness" and "justice") as a demonstration of the futility of achieving and practicing righteousness and justice by the power of the law alone. A considerable emphasis in the NT reflects this inability to practice justice, though the requirement remains for God's covenant people (e.g., the righteous in the parable of the sheep and goats practice mishpat and tsedaqah, even though they do not recognize the significance of their service to God). Part of the Messiah's mission is to meet the righteous requirement for salvation and to exemplify justice for those who would follow him. While the final, eschatological justice where God establishes his reign in full is yet to come, the inaugural presence of the kingdom reflects not only that believing sinners are saved, but also that glimpses of the end come through the practice of justice exhibited by God's new covenant people.

The implications of justice for the theological interpretation of Scripture are vast, especially in light of the legacy of Protestantism. In one sense the Reformation handed the Bible over to the laity, and interpretation became the responsibility not only of the clergy but of all believers. The opposite effect, however, is that the liberation of interpretation has sometimes resulted in anarchy, where the autonomy of the reader (who also “has the same Spirit” as other Christians) leads to reader-response interpretations that often unintentionally do violence to the intent of the text. Interpretative injustice also occurs when autonomous subjects or marginalized groups assume a privileged perspective that implicitly or explicitly displaces the view of the divine author in favor of some human-centered interest. Conservative and liberal interpreters are both guilty of this practice. Unjust interpretations of this sort operate under guises of a rationalistic objectivity that betrays a methodological naturalism or in other cases the hermeneutical equivalent of interest-group politics. To pursue justice in the theological interpretation of Scripture requires the virtue of humility—no interpreter is unaffected by sin, and even the most rigorous may suffer from myopia—as well as charity that yields willingness to listen to other perspectives, even if there is significant disagreement. In addition, interpreters of Scripture must resist the urge toward engagements with the text that render the practice of justice abstract rather than concrete. Justice is rightly a hermeneutical principle beyond the sole purview of liberation theologians and legal experts. To do justice in the interpretative task requires submission to the triune God, who is the standard for justice, and to the ongoing work of the Spirit, who refines our interpretative perspectives.

See also Ethics; Ideological Criticism; Law; Political Theology

Bibliography

Dengerink, J. Justice in Christian Perspective. Wedge, 1978; Reventlow, H. G., and Y. Hoffman, eds. Justice and Righteousness. JSOTSup 137. JSOT, 1992; Skillen, J. A Covenant to Keep. CRC Publications, 2000.

Vincent E. Bacote

Justification See Epistemology; Warrant

Justification by Faith

The Greek word for “justify,” like the Hebrew word in the OT, means primarily “to acquit” or “to declare righteous,” the opposite of “to condemn.” It is a forensic term, taken from the law courts.

This does not mean that our relationship to God can be reduced to legal terms but rather that such terms provide one important way among others of describing the salvation that we have in Christ.

Justification in the NT

The theme of justification is developed in three main passages in the NT: Rom. 1:16–5:21; Gal. 2:16–3:24; and James 2:21–25 (cf. Rom. 10:1–13; Phil. 3:7–11). Paul clearly teaches that we are justified or reckoned righteous by God by his grace, through faith and apart from works of the law. This does not mean that Christians can live without performing good works, but rather that their justification or acceptance by God is on the basis of Christ's atoning death for our sins, received by faith.

James appears to contradict this, teaching that we are justified by works and not by faith alone. In fact, however, he acknowledges that Abraham was reckoned righteous (= justified in Pauline terms) by faith (Gen. 15:6), and that later he was justified (seen to be righteous) when he offered Isaac (Gen. 22). Also for James, the faith that alone does not justify is a head knowledge that does not lead to a changed life.

The Historical Understanding of the Doctrine

In the church of the second to fourth centuries, there was little interest in the theme of justification. It was Augustine who brought it into (p 417)prominence during his dispute with Pelagius in the fifth century. Working in the Latin language, he understood justification to refer not to a “not guilty” verdict but to the making of an unrighteous person righteous. This is clearly demonstrated in a key passage where he discusses Paul's statement (Rom. 2:13 NRSV) that “the doers of the law ... will be justified” (Spir. et litt. 26.45). He recognizes that “justified” here (as in Luke 10:29) means “held to be righteous” or “accounted righteous,” but did not recognize that this was also its meaning in the NT as a whole. The Western Catholic doctrine of justification (building on Augustine) is an account of how the unrighteous are transformed by the work of the Holy Spirit and thus become righteous.

With the Reformation the doctrine of justification moved center stage. Renaissance humanism brought a renewed interest in and study of the Greek language. This led to the realization that justification was a forensic term referring to our standing before God, a “not guilty” verdict in the court of God's justice. The Reformers also made a careful distinction between justification (God's declaration that we are righteous) and regeneration or sanctification (the process of inner transformation by which we become righteous). They distinguished between these but did not imagine that they could be separated. One can no more have justification without sanctification, faith without love, than one can enjoy the sun's heat without its light. We are justified or accepted as righteous by God because the righteousness of Christ is reckoned or imputed to our account. They adopted the controversial slogan of justification by "faith alone" (sola fide), meaning by this that it is only because of Christ's work, received only by faith, that we are accepted by God. This does not mean that repentance, baptism, love, and good works are unnecessary, but rather that it is not these that lay hold of justification. Justification is not by good works, yet it is not without good works. The Reformers insisted, however, that even the best works of the believer fall short of perfection and that a Christian remains (in Luther's terms) simul iustus et peccator (at the same time righteous and sinner). Alongside this rather austere message, they also affirmed that God in Christ accepts and is pleased with the good works of believers.

In the early years of the Reformation, a number of leading Catholic theologians were sympathetic to the Protestant doctrine of justification, which was possible because there had been no authoritative church pronouncements on the issue. This enabled a historic agreement on the doctrine at the Regensburg Colloquy (1541), where leading theologians on both sides (Melancthon, Bucer, Eck, and Gropper) agreed on a common statement (art. 5). This affirmed that at conversion we receive both inherent righteousness (inner transformation) and the imputed righteousness of Christ. It is on the latter alone that we should depend before God. Underlying the agreement was a shared perception that converted Christians throughout their lives remain in need of the mercy of God. This article was approved by Calvin and by Cardinal Contarini (who were there), but rejected by Luther (who was not) as a compromising patchwork.

Since the Regensburg Colloquy failed to agree on other doctrines, the Council of Trent was called to define Roman Catholic doctrine in clear contradistinction to Protestantism. The Decree on Justification (1547) expounded the doctrine in reaction against the Protestant account. Its exposition of initial justification at conversion is not very different from the Protestant understanding, but the two diverge when it comes to the ongoing justification of the Christian. Christians are acceptable to God and counted as righteous because they truly are righteous, having been transformed by God's grace. At the end they can be said to have truly merited eternal life by their works. Firmly excluded from the decree was any talk of the inadequacy of the inherent righteousness of the Christian or of the need for ongoing mercy or for the imputation of Christ's righteousness. Paul's reference to the justification of "the ungodly" (Rom. 4:5 NRSV) applies only to the initial justification of the unconverted, not to those on the Christian way. Justification was a major theme of the Council of Trent, but it has been far less significant in Catholic teaching, for which the sacramental system is more central.

The Reformers taught that Christ's righteousness is imputed to us, an idea that finds limited support in pre-Reformation Catholic writings. There continues to be another tradition within orthodox Protestantism, however, which is unhappy with this and prefers the alternative phraseology of faith being counted as righteousness (following Rom. 4:5, which echoes Gen. 15:6).

In recent years two main developments have taken place. First, following the pioneering work of Hans Küng in his Justification (1957), there has been intensive dialogue between Catholics and Protestants on this issue. The best document produced was the first, entitled Justification by (p 418) Faith, by American Lutherans and Catholics in 1983. This process culminated in the signing, in 1999, by the Roman Catholic Church and the Lutheran World Federation, of a Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification. The declaration claimed not total agreement, but a "consensus in basic truths of the doctrine of justification" such that the condemnations of the Reformation era no longer apply (§§40–41). These dialogues have labored to show not that there is no difference between the two sides but that each side can expound its doctrine in such a way as to answer the fears and meet the concerns of the other side.

The second development is a new approach to the doctrine of justification by a number of NT scholars, often referred to misleadingly as the "New Perspective on Paul." This is misleading because it suggests a unity of approach in what are in fact a variety of new perspectives. E. P. Sanders initiated this movement with his Paul and Palestinian Judaism (1977), which questioned the idea that first-century Judaism taught a religion of merit and works righteousness. He described it rather as "covenantal nomism," according to which we enter the covenant by grace but remain in it by obedience to the law. Sanders's reassessment of Judaism has been received sympathetically, though not without reservations. Sanders also offered a reinterpretation of Paul, which has met with less favor. Others, such as James Dunn and Tom Wright, have responded to Sanders with their own reinterpretations of Paul. For Dunn, the "works of the law" to which Paul objected were not moral deeds aimed at acquiring merit but Jewish distinctives (such as the Sabbath and the food laws) aimed at excluding Gentiles. What he affirmed has been received with greater sympathy than what he denied. Wright, meanwhile, understands justification in the context of the covenant and as referring not to how one enters the people of God, but how one can tell who belongs to them. There is as yet no consensus about the new perspectives; controversy remains about questions like Paul's attitude to the law and the extent of continuity between Judaism and Paul's doctrine.

Justification and the Hermeneutical Task

The centrality or otherwise of justification is an important hermeneutical issue. Following certain remarks of Luther, some (by no means all) Lutherans have claimed a privileged role for this doctrine. It is the central doctrine of the Christian faith. It is the sole criterion by which other doctrines are to be tested and the article by which the church stands or falls. It is a controlling principle that is to mold all other doctrines. Reformed Protestantism has prized the doctrine, but has never given it this exaggerated prominence. Calvin, for example, declared that it was the main hinge on which religion turns (Inst. 3.11.1) and devoted eight chapters of his Institutio to it. But he devoted the same number of chapters to sanctification, taking care to give the two doctrines equal weight and to hold them in balance.

It is hard to see how the extreme Lutheran claims can be justified. Given the paucity of mention of justification in the NT and its lack of prominence for most of Christian history, such claims are highly implausible. Paul does not mention it in his account of what is of "first importance" (1 Cor. 15:3–8). In Gal. 1:6–9 Paul condemns those who preach another gospel, but simply to reduce the gospel to justification by faith would be a caricature of Paul's message. Yet justification remains an important doctrine. The doctrine of salvation is clearly of major importance for the Bible, and justification is one important aspect of that doctrine. It tackles the vital issue of how we can be accepted by God and as such has implications for the interpretation of the whole Bible, not just for passages that use the word "justify."

Understanding the doctrine of justification is not simply a matter of correctly exegeting certain NT passages. It is also about the need to hold together theologically a tension that is found throughout the NT and can be seen in a number of ways:

- In Luke 18:9–14 (the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector) it is not the one who can point to his works who is justified but the one who prays, "God, have mercy on me, a sinner." Yet shortly before, we hear in Luke 14:25–33 the uncompromising teaching that "any of you who does not give up everything he has cannot be my disciple.”

(p 419)•Paul teaches both justification by faith and judgment by works (Rom. 2:5–11; 2 Cor. 5:10; cf. Rom. 14:7–12; 1 Cor. 3:12–15; 4:4–5; 5:5; 6:9; Gal. 5:19–21; 6:7–9). This tension is closely related to one of the most fundamental tensions of NT theology, that between the already and the not yet. Justification is the anticipation of the final judgment, the declaration of what we will be; yet there is a future judgment by works.

- Paul teaches that we are justified by faith apart from works; James that we are not justified by faith alone.

The hermeneutical task is to allow both sides of this tension to be heard clearly and not to suppress or mute one in the interests of the other. There has always been a danger in Protestantism of so stressing free forgiveness and imputed righteousness as to overlook the call to discipleship and the reality of inner transformation. At a time when the secular world emphasizes openness and individual choice, the threat is greater than ever.

Bibliography

Anderson, H., T. Murphy, and J. Burgess, eds. Justification by Faith: Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue VII. Augsburg, 1985 [key ecumenical document]; Braaten, C. Justification. Fortress, 1990 [Lutheran exposition]; Carson, D. A., ed. Right with God. Paternoster/Baker, 1992 [from World Evangelical Fellowship study unit]; Carson, D. A., P. O’Brien, and M. Seifrid, eds. Justification and Variegated Nomism. 2 vols. Mohr/Siebeck/Baker Academic, 2001, 2004 [large-scale assessment of the New Perspectives]; Husbands, M., and D. Treier, eds. Justification. InterVarsity, 2004 [recent conference proceedings]; Jüngel, E. Justification. T&T Clark, 2001 [recent theological study]; Lane, A. Justification by Faith in Catholic-Protestant Dialogue. T&T Clark, 2002 [on ecumenical debates, with text of the Joint Declaration]; McGrath, A. Iustitia Dei. 2 vols. 2d ed. Cambridge University Press, 1998 [magisterial history of the doctrine]; Seifrid, M. Justification by Faith. Brill, 1992 [important NT study]; Tvard, G. Justification. Paulist, 1983 [Roman Catholic study, sympathetic to the Reformation]; Thompson, M. The New Perspective on Paul. Grove Books, 2002 [brief account and assessment of the movement].

Anthony N. S. Lane

K

(p 420)

Kant, Immanuel    See Enlightenment; Epistemology

Kerygma    See Gospel; Jesus, Quest for the Historical; Oral Tradition and the NT; Preaching, Use of the Bible in

Kingdom of God

The phrase “the kingdom of God” (for which Matthew generally uses the more Jewish equivalent, “the kingdom of heaven,” but without any discernible difference in meaning) is generally agreed to have been a characteristic feature of Jesus’ teaching style. It encapsulates a (perhaps “the”) central focus of his teaching about his own mission and about the life of discipleship. “The kingdom of God” (hē basileia tou theou), or an equivalent such as “his kingdom,” “your kingdom,” occurs some seventy times in the three Synoptic Gospels (not counting parallels). Mark 1:15 tells us that Jesus’ public proclamation from the beginning was of the coming of the kingdom of God. In the Fourth Gospel, by contrast, it is found only in John 3:3, 5, and in the rest of the NT less than twenty times.

But it is easier to agree on its importance than to define its nature and scope, and the problem has been made more intractable by the modern habit of using “kingdom” language in connection with a wide range of sometimes-incompatible Christian agendas, from charismatic healing to political activism. Such language serves to commend the matter under discussion as an authentically Christian concern rather than to clarify its nature and aims, and a poll on the meaning of “kingdom” across a representative selection of modern Christians would present a very varied picture.

One reason for this confusion is the English word “kingdom” itself. In the sixteenth century, when this term established its place in the tradition of biblical translation, it appropriately translated the dynamic sense of basileia as “kingship” or “rule.” But over the centuries that more abstract meaning of “kingdom” has become obsolete, and the term conveys to modern readers the more concrete sense of a place or group of people under the control of a king (“the United Kingdom,” “the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia”). Yet, rarely thus far has a modern English version of the Bible had the courage to replace the familiar term “kingdom” with “reign,” “rule,” “sovereignty.” Hence, the term “kingdom” continues to mislead speakers with the idea that some thing or place or group of people is being talked about when the NT speaks of “the kingdom of God.” This impression is fostered by the regrettable and widespread tendency to abbreviate “the kingdom of God” into simply “the kingdom” (or worse, to use “kingdom” as an adjective: “kingdom ethics,” etc.). But “the reign” has no meaning unless it is stated whose reign is in view. In other words, “the kingdom of God” is not making a statement about a “thing” called “the kingdom,” but about God, that he is king. Thus, “the kingdom of God has come near” means “God is taking over as king,” and to “enter the kingdom of God” is to come under his rule, to accept him as king.

God’s Kingship in the OT and Jewish Thought

The phrase “the kingdom of God” does not occur as such at all in most translations of the OT, though “his kingdom” and “your kingdom” are used with God as the subject in Pss. 103:19; 145:11–13; Dan. 4:3, 34; 6:26. In later Jewish literature there are only a few uses of the phrase. But it would be a serious mistake to assume that God’s kingship is not therefore an important theme for the OT and later Jewish literature. Many of the psalms celebrate the rule of the Lord as “a great king above all gods” and call on the people of the earth to bow to his authority. It has been rightly observed that God’s kingship (in contrast with the pretended kingships of earthly powers) is the controlling theme of the book of Daniel. In such passages God’s kingship is stated as an eternal fact, but there are also a number of prophetic passages that, recognizing the extent of human (p 421) rebellion against God’s rule, look forward to a day when his kingship will be more effectively established. In such passages it is possible to speak of God’s complete kingship as still future, a hope to be cherished rather than already a fait accompli (e.g., Isa. 45:23; Zech. 14:9).

Both these strands continue in later Jewish literature, so that on the one hand the wisdom writers can speak of “God’s kingship” as a basic fact of the present (Wis. 6:4; 10:10; cf. Pss. Sol. 17:3: “The kingdom of our God is for ever”). On the other hand, apocalyptic writers speak of a kingship of God yet to be established (T. Mos. 10:1: “Then his kingdom will appear throughout his whole creation”; 1QM 6.6: “Kingship shall belong to the God of Israel”). The Qaddish prayer that was in regular use in the synagogue by the time of Jesus (and which is surely echoed in the Lord’s Prayer) focused on the petition “May he let his kingdom rule in your lifetime, ... speedily and soon.”

So Joseph of Arimathea, a pious Jew “looking for the kingdom of God” (Mark 15:43), represents a strong strand in first-century Jewish piety. The phrase “the kingdom of God” may not yet have been widely used, but all the raw materials are there. Thus, when Jesus began his mission with the words “The kingdom of God has come near,” he would be sure of a ready hearing and would not be misunderstood. He would be heard as saying that the God whose sovereignty over his whole creation was a fundamental belief of Judaism was about to establish that sovereignty in a newly effective way; the king de jure was becoming the king de facto.

What Jesus Meant

In Mark 1:15 Jesus not only declares, “The kingdom of God has come near” (NRSV), but also, “The time has been fulfilled” (AT). This is not, then, as for the prophets, a hope for the future, but the declaration of a new reality. Jesus’ exorcisms are a sign that “the kingdom of God has come upon you” (Matt. 12:28). When asked when the kingdom of God is coming, Jesus replies that it is already “among you” (Luke 17:21 NRSV). Yet Jesus can also speak of a future time when people will see that the kingdom of God “has come with power” (Mark 9:1 NRSV); at the Last Supper he looked forward to drinking new wine with his disciples “in the kingdom of God” (Mark 14:25). This tension between the now and the not yet is illustrated by the traditional form of the Lord’s Prayer, which bids us pray “Your kingdom come” and yet concludes with the declaration “Yours is the kingdom.”

In a series of parables in Mark 4 and Matt. 13, Jesus explains more about the “mystery of the kingdom of God” (Mark 4:11 KJV). It is not visible to all, but only to those with God-given eyes to see. It is like seed that germinates in some soil but not in others (4:3–8), like a seed growing secretly away from human observation (4:26–29), like the tiny mustard seed that is now so small as to be unnoticed but will one day be a great tree (4:30–32), like the tiny pinch of yeast that will gradually penetrate the whole lump of dough (Matt. 13:33). So God has already established his rule in the coming of Jesus, yet it still has to work itself out to its full potential. In the meantime it remains a secret, a paradox, rejected by some, but for others the one great treasure for which they will sell all they have (13:44–46).

So God’s kingship divides people. In Matt. 5:3–10 Jesus sets out the “good life” in terms that sharply differentiate his people (poor in spirit, mourning, meek, hungry for righteousness, merciful, pure, peacemaking, and persecuted) from the world, which despises them. Jesus frames the portrait with the explanation “for theirs is the kingdom of heaven” (5:3, 10). The Sermon on the Mount might be described as a manifesto for life in the kingdom of heaven. When Jesus instructs his disciples on the revolutionary values by which he expects them to live (most notably in Mark 10), it is the phrase “the kingdom of God” that repeatedly sums up this alternative lifestyle. His teaching leads up to the paradox of 10:42–45, where the power structures of this world are contrasted with a regime in which the first are last and the last first.

Jesus is more than the herald of God’s kingship. In a few places the subject of basileia is not God (or “heaven”) but the Son of Man (Matt. 13:41; 16:28; 25:31–34; Luke 22:29–30), who now exercises the kingship he came to inaugurate. And in the last of those passages, even the disciples themselves are to receive a delegated kingship (cf. also Matt. 25:34; Luke 12:32). God rules, but he rules through his Son, and he in turn through those whom he has summoned to accept the kingship of God.

Jesus says that God’s rule would come with power during the lifetime of those to whom he speaks (Mark 9:1). And so it has. As the good news was preached, the “powers of the age to come” (Heb. 6:5 NRSV) were experienced, and increasing numbers were brought from darkness into light. But there is still darkness as well as (p 422)light, and God’s people must go on praying “Your kingdom come” until “the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Messiah” (Rev. 11:15 NRSV).

The Kingship of God in Christian Thought

The classical debate among modern theologians as to whether the kingdom of God should be understood as already “realized” in Jesus’ ministry (Dodd) or still wholly future (Schweitzer) can thus be seen as a false trail. It is based on the wrong assumption that “the kingdom of God” denoted a particular time or state of affairs within history. Instead, the term is a dynamic expression for any and every situation in which God is king, his authority exercised, and his will done. Even the compromise language of “inaugurated eschatology” (Jeremias) fails to meet the case, since in biblical thought God’s kingship is eternal, not just inaugurated in the first century CE. Rather, it operates at different levels as God interacts with human affairs and people respond in their different ways to his kingship. As long as God continues to allow his world to resist his rule, so long will there be tension and paradox built into the language of the “kingdom of God.”

This brief survey of the complexity of biblical “kingdom of God” language indicates the danger in much modern “kingdom” talk, which tries to hijack this “feel-good” terminology to the service of one particular Christian agenda. Within certain Christian subcultures the word “kingdom” has a conventional resonance that may have little to do with the essential meaning of such terminology in the Bible. If Christians are to communicate effectively with other Christians outside their own particular subgroup, let alone with a wider world to which the biblical terminology is foreign, they would do well to find other ways of expressing this broad concept of God implementing his eternal sovereignty in the affairs of his world—at least until modern Christians can agree to use the terminology in something more like its biblical sense.

To do so they would be well advised to discard the misleading English translation “kingdom” in favor of “kingship” or “reign” or the like. Thus they could express the basic biblical conviction that God is king and the central concern of Jesus that divine sovereignty should be fully implemented and acknowledged, not only by those who have chosen to “enter the kingship of God,” but also by the wider world, which has yet to bow the knee.

Bibliography

Allison, D., Jr. The End of the Ages Has Come. T&T Clark, 1985; Ambrozic, A. The Hidden Kingdom. Catholic Biblical Association, 1972;
Beasley-Murray, G. Jesus and the Kingdom of God. Eerdmans, 1986;
Chilton, B. God in Strength. JSOT, 1987; Chilton, B., and J. McDonald. Jesus and the Ethics of the Kingdom. SPCK, 1987; Dodd, C. H. The Parables of the Kingdom. Nisbet, 1935; France, R. T. Divine Government. SPCK, 1990; Jeremias, J. New Testament Theology (part 1). SCM, 1971;
Ladd, G. Jesus and the Kingdom. Harper & Row, 1964; Perrin, N. Jesus and the Language of the Kingdom. Fortress, 1976; idem. The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus. SCM, 1963; Willis, W., ed. The Kingdom of God in 20th-Century Interpretation. Hendrickson, 1987; Wright, N. T. Jesus and the Victory of God. SPCK, 1996.

R. T. France

Kings, Books of

The books of 1 and 2 Kings provide a theologically laden interpretation of the history of the Israelite monarchy from the death of King David until the end of the monarchy itself. Although some chapters contain administrative records (1 Kings 4), building descriptions (chs. 6–7), rituals (ch. 8), and prophecies and prayers (2 Kings 19), the dominant genre is narrative. For this reason, the primary theological exposition of the text is indirect, through narrative rather than clear exhortative forms. Major theological themes lie behind the narratives and also inform the other types of literature. They concern the nature of God and his relation to his people, including matters such as divine sovereignty and human responsibility, judgment, covenant, worship of God alone, and the Messiah.

Foremost in the books of Kings is the reign of the single God of Israel. Along with it is the habitual practice of God's people, who turn from him to worship other gods. The centers of contrast between the one true God of Israel and the other gods of the nations appear in 1 Kings 11 and 18 and 2 Kings 17. In 1 Kings 11 Solomon reaches the low point of his reign. The king's many foreign wives entice him to leave his devotion to the God who had given him his power, and they divert him to the worship of other gods. This brings about divine judgment: the division of the kingdom and the capitulation to compromise the sole worship of the LORD God in the northern kingdom. A few of the oldest members from that time of division may still have been alive when Elijah challenged the wholesale worship of Baal by Jezebel and Ahab (1 Kings 18). The absolute victory of Israel's God over Baal in the contest and the subsequent execution of all the priests of Baal (p 423)(and Asherah) demonstrated the uncompromising nature of God's demand for sole worship by his people. The final grand statement of God's sovereignty is that of 2 Kings 17, where the author reflects on the fall of the northern kingdom, attributing it to the worship of other deities and the abandonment of the one true God of Israel. As the writer observes, the consequence of these actions, begun before the time of Solomon, was to bring other nations into the land (through Assyrian deportation and resettlement) so that the countryside became even more polytheistic. This result would contrast with the practice of southern kings, such as Hezekiah and Josiah, who to varying degrees sought to abolish idolatry. The author of Kings praises them for doing so. Nevertheless, the preponderance of kings in the south tolerated the worship of other deities and at times even supported it. Thus, even the righteousness of Josiah was unable to prevent God's judgment for the worship of other deities, as announced by his propheticess (2 Kings 22:17).

Perhaps nowhere more vivid is the contrast between Israel's God and those of other nations than in the verbal challenges that the invading Assyrian king Sennacherib and his representatives raise against Hezekiah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. In 2 Kings 18:22, 32–35; 19:10–12, 18 appears the Assyrians' charge that the God of Israel cannot deliver from their hand. They suggest that this is the reason Hezekiah closed the outlying worship centers (high places) and brought all formal worship into Jerusalem. The Assyrians point to the inability of all the other national gods to deliver their countries from this superpower. However, it is the response of Hezekiah and of the prophet Isaiah that seals the fate of the enemy. In particular, 19:18–19 brings the matter to a conclusion: "They have thrown their gods into the fire and destroyed them, for they were not gods but only wood and stone, fashioned by men's hands. Now, O LORD our God, deliver us from his hand, so that all kingdoms on earth may know that you alone, O LORD, are God." Thus the collapse of the northern kingdom demonstrates the failure to worship God alone, while the survival of Judah shows how faith in God can bring about unexpected miracles.

It also ties together the theology of God as one, and of God alone with absolute sovereignty over all nations of the world. That power is able to bring the greatest nation of the era, Assyria, to its knees. God's majesty becomes worthy of the greatest of structures that the wealthiest of the kings can build (1 Kings 6–7). The form and structure of this temple, as well as the multitude of sacrifices, represent imports from the surrounding lands—a transformation of the forms and style of the media of worship toward the honoring of the one true Deity.

Solomon's prayer of dedication for the temple sets forth another key theological principle of God's dealings with his people and their kings. In 1 Kings 8:44–53 Solomon prays to God that the nation might receive forgiveness when it sins. If at that time it turns back to God, even if it has been deported to a foreign land, God will forgive and restore the nation to his blessing. This possibility is based upon the sense of Israel as specially chosen by God. God affirms this promise to Solomon in 1 Kings 9:3–10. There he promises that Solomon and his descendants will be treated according to the degree to which they wholeheartedly worship God and refrain from worshipping other gods. God has entered into covenant with them, and their responsibility is to remain faithful to him and refuse the worship of foreign deities. Thus, God promises retribution—punishment for those who turn away from him and blessing for those who follow him. Solomon himself becomes a model of both elements and, in the sequence of blessing followed by judgment, a foreshadowing of the experience of the nation (both northern and southern kingdoms) through the remainder of its history to the exile. Solomon's early search for wisdom from God (1 Kings 3), organization of his kingdom and palace (ch. 4; 7:1–12), and above all his construction and dedication of Yahweh's temple (chs. 5–6; 7:13–9:9)—all indicate a king in obedience to the divine will, leading his people to great prosperity and devotion to God. Nevertheless, his success with other nations, and the consequent diplomatic marriages, compromise his faith and lead to prophecies of judgment (11:1–13). At Solomon's death, the kingdom is divided. Thus, the mixture of some faithfulness with apostasy, characteristic of Solomon's reign and the beginning of the book, anticipates the subsequent history of the monarchy.

Although the title of the books suggests the dominant focus, and the doctrine of retribution is most pronounced with the leaders of the two kingdoms, the prophetic stories that lie in the heart of the books also depict encounters of personal faith and the responses of God. Unlike earlier and especially later prophets, Elijah and Elisha, along with others of their generation, are gifted with amazing abilities to work miracles that complement their verbal messages. Their miracles most often provide life for those to whom they minister. (p 424) This could include the miraculous provision of food. As with the story of Solomon, many of these are anticipated in the initial words and acts that introduce the prophet Elijah. In 1 Kings 17, where he first appears, he is kept alive by ravens that feed him. In the same chapter, he preserves alive the widow of Zarephath in Sidon and resurrects her son from death. These miracles would be repeated again and again by Elijah and other prophets who represent living signs of God's power for life. Indeed, even in death the body of the prophet can remain a source of life for others (2 Kings 13:21). The best-known event of Elijah is his challenge of the prophets of Baal, a challenge that ends in their execution (1 Kings 18). This, however, is the other side of the story. God provides signs through his prophets. For those who believe and respond, these are life-giving. For those who reject the signs and turn away from God, they lead to death. The lives of the prophets and the people with whom they deal, kings and commoners, illustrate the love of God for all people (even outside Israel, as at Zarephath), and the need to respond with personal faith. It is this ministry of life that forms the closest living model of Jesus' life and work in the NT. Again and again the miracles that Jesus performs are anticipated by prophets' works in the books of Kings. Further, Elijah ministered in Sidon, outside Israel, and Elisha assisted Naaman the Syrian; these episodes anticipate the mission of Jesus to the Gentiles (Luke 4:25–27).

The theology of the prophetic movement also provides a critique of simple assumptions of retribution. The prophetic word of 1 Kings 13:2, proclaimed against the apostasy of the northern kingdom at the time of the division, names King Josiah, three centuries into the future, as a figure who will bring to an end the sacrifices of the unauthorized northern kingdom altars. Thus the fulfillment of judgment is postponed for three hundred years. In addition, this prophet, one of the first to appear in Kings, is duped by a northern prophet to disobey God's word. As a result, he pays for it with his life. An even greater indictment of the prophets as a group is 1 Kings 22:19–38, which depicts God orchestrating a lying spirit to mislead the court prophets. The prophet Micaiah tells this story, which demonstrates the universal effects of the sin nature on all humanity—even on the prophets (cf. also Gehazi in 2 Kings 5:20–27). No one group or individual is without sin, and the book of Kings makes this clear among kings, commoners, and prophets.

The role of the Lord’s anointed, the Messiah, provides a key theological theme throughout the books and ties the whole together. It plays a dominant role in the three great sections of the text: the Solomonic era from David’s last days to the division of the united monarchy (1 Kings 1–11); the prophetic challenge from Elijah’s conflict with Ahab until the death of Athaliah and the rise of Joash (1 Kings 17–2 Kings 11); and the downfall of the northern kingdom followed by the last kings of Judah (from Hezekiah to Zedekiah) and the destruction of Jerusalem (2 Kings 17–25). The Messiah, or anointed one in Israel, would have been considered the ruling king in Jerusalem, a descendant of the line of David. In each of these sections in the books, that line is threatened. The first book of Kings opens with David near death. As the recipient of the promise of perpetual rule in Jerusalem for his dynasty (2 Sam. 7), the succession is crucial. The establishment of Solomon amid the brutality of the first three chapters demonstrates that God’s promise is secure. Solomon’s own apostasy ultimately leads to the division of the kingdom, a split that threatens the power of Solomon’s successor, Rehoboam. Nevertheless, the line continues. Although Elijah’s battle is with the northern kingdom’s Ahab and Jezebel, the southern kingdom’s ruler, Jehoram, married their daughter Athaliah. Both he and their son, Ahaziah, followed the worship practices of Ahab. Upon Ahaziah’s death, Athaliah declared herself ruler and sought to execute the remainder of the royal family. The high priest protected one royal prince, Joash, by hiding him. Despite the attempt to destroy the line of the Messiah, God protects it in the person of young Joash, who becomes king after Athaliah’s execution. The collapse of the northern kingdom and then of the southern kingdom, as described in detail at the end of Kings, raises the specter of no continuation of the line. Due to the people’s sins, not even the righteousness of kings such as Hezekiah and Josiah can save the kingdom (2 Kings 20:16–19; 23:25–27). Yet, as with Solomon, Rehoboam, and Joash, there remains an heir to the line of David. The book concludes with Jehoiachin alive and well in exile in Babylon. Thus, both hope and God’s anointed remain and can be found throughout the books of Kings. The promise of the Messiah is not lost.

See also History of Israel; Kingdom of God; Messiah/Messianism

Bibliography

Hess, R., and G. Wenham, eds.... Zion, City of Our God. Eerdmans, 1999;

Knoppers, G. The Reign of Jeroboam, (p 425)the Fall of Israel, and the Reign of Josiah. Vol. 2 of Two Nations under God. HSM 53. Scholars Press, 1994; McConville, J. G. Grace in the End. Studies in Old Testament Biblical Theology. Paternoster, 1993; Noth, M. The Deuteronomistic History. JSOTSup 15. Sheffield Academic Press, 1981; Provan, I. 1 and 2 Kings. OTG. JSOT, 1997; Rad, G. von. Old Testament Theology. 2 vols. Harper & Row, 1965; Wiseman, D. 1 and 2 Kings. TOTC. InterVarsity, 1993.

Richard S. Hess

Knowledge See Epistemology; Warrant; Wisdom

(p 426) L

Lamentations, Book of

The book of Lamentations is one of the smallest works in the Bible and yet one of the most powerful and enigmatic. Written in the aftermath of the destruction of Jerusalem and its temple by the Babylonians, Lamentations expresses the grief and disbelief of those who lived through the horror and yet still looked to their God for their hope and deliverance.

Canon, Date, and Authorship

The book of Lamentations is found in the Jewish canon as one of the Megillot, the Five Scrolls. The LXX placed Lamentations after Jeremiah and Baruch, assuming the prophet to be the author, thus leading to its current place in the Christian canon. Wherever its location, its existence within the canon has never been challenged, within either Jewish or Christian tradition.

Almost all scholars agree that the book of Lamentations was written in the years immediately following the destruction of Jerusalem. Certainly these five poems express the kind of shock and despair that we might expect from an eyewitness, yet their form and style demonstrate that they were created as an act of reflection on their tragedy and as a memorial of it. Lamentations does not contain any glimpse of the restoration of Jerusalem and the temple that occurred after Cyrus the Great and the Persians defeated the Babylonians. They allowed the Jews to return and rebuild their holy city in 538 BCE. Thus, the time of composition is set within the years immediately following 586 BCE and before Jerusalem's restoration. Moreover, it is likely that the poet was one of the many who were not exiled to Babylon, but remained in Judah and endured the daily reminders of the Babylonian conquest (Dobbs-Allsopp 4).

Jeremiah has traditionally been ascribed as the author of Lamentations, largely based upon the reference in 2 Chron. 35:25 to Jeremiah's having composed laments for the death of Josiah, but also due to the similarities in message and vocabulary between portions of the books of Jeremiah and Lamentations. The text of Lamentations itself is, in fact, anonymous, and most scholars today agree it is unlikely that it is the work of Jeremiah. In many ways it is the anonymity of the work that provides it with such great power, especially for today's reader. It is not a work by a named and distant prophet; rather, it is a work by "anyone/everyone" who has gone through such tragedy, and the reader is invited to identify with the author's perspective (e.g., Lam. 3, "I am the man ...").

Form and Genre

The form and genre of Lamentations are unique within the biblical canon and as such deserve some comment. Lamentations is a collection of five poems, each intimately related by both structure and content. The first four are acrostics: the first letter of each stanza is a sequential letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Thus, the first stanza begins with aleph, the second with beth, and so on. There is variation within this form: chapter 4 has only two couplets per stanza, and chapter 3 has one couplet per stanza and repeats each letter three times (so the first three lines each begin with aleph, etc.). The final chapter does not have an alphabetic acrostic but echoes the acrostic form, with 22 lines paralleling the 22 letters in the Hebrew alphabet. The acrostic form is found in other ancient Near Eastern texts and may be merely intended as an aid to memory; however, it is more likely intended to demonstrate the completeness of Judah's grief, which is "from A to Z" (Gottwald).

Another key feature of Lamentations is the rhythm. In biblical Hebrew poetry the fundamental unit is two lines (or units) on each line of text, usually of similar length. In Lamentations and in other lament poems in the Bible, many lines are of unequal length, the first being longer than the second. This “limping” pattern is referred to as qinah meter and provides a solemn and mournful rhythm to the recitation of the poem. (For a brief discussion of the poetry of Lamentations and its literary context, see Berlin 2–30.)

(p 427)The lament genre dominates Lamentations and has particularly strong parallels to the city-lament genre widely attested in Mesopotamian literature (e.g., see Kramer). Some key features of the city-lament genre that have been incorporated into Lamentations include the structure and form, the assigning of responsibility, the abandonment of the city by its patron deity, weeping of the female figure (in this case, Lady Zion), lamentation, and the restoration of the city (see Dobbs-Allsopp 9). As Dobbs-Allsopp has pointed out, however, Lamentations “is no simple Mesopotamian city lament.” The author has transformed and adapted the forms and styles available to him, including those well-known from Hebrew poetry, to compose a unique Judean lament of the destruction of Jerusalem.

The most significant departure from the city-lament genre in terms of theological consideration is that the destruction of Jerusalem is not attributed to the action of a capricious god. While God is always the primary agent in that he allowed Jerusalem’s destruction (“The Lord has destroyed without mercy all the dwellings of Jacob” [2:2 NRSV]), the author of Lamentations makes it abundantly clear this has only come about because of Judah’s sin. “Jerusalem sinned grievously, therefore she became filthy” (1:8 RSV; see also 2:14, 17; 3:25–33).

Liturgical Use

The earliest recorded use of these poems is within the Tishah-b’Ab liturgy commemorating the destruction of Jerusalem (see Zech. 7:3–5). They were used and perhaps written as monuments of memorial and continue in such use within Jewish tradition. The early church saw reference to Jesus’ messiahship in passages such as Lam. 4:20 (“The LORD’s anointed”) and his suffering on the cross in 1:12. Portions of the text continue to be used in Christian liturgy such as in the Tenebrae service during Holy Week (1:15).

Interpretation

In seeking a theology of Lamentations, many scholars have failed to take adequate notice of the emotive elements, and instead have focused upon the moments of confession and contrition that employ covenantal language. The language of confession is certainly present within Lamentations and clearly reflects Deuteronomic theology; hence, it fits within the larger canonical context of the Torah and Jeremiah. But Lamentations was written as an expression of grief rather than a systematic theological reflection. These poems are raw and poignant replies to the atrocities that the poet had just survived. Where the book of Job addresses suffering on the personal level, Lamentations addresses it on the national scale. By entering into the text with the author, as both the individual (ch. 3) and the nation/church, we may find solace in the deepest despair, even if that solace is long in coming.

Perhaps the most theologically challenging aspect of Lamentations is the presence of God. Where was God during this tragedy? Where is he now, as we seek to make sense of our own tragedies? The book of Lamentations brings this question home with dramatic power. Although the poet repeatedly appeals to God, God never responds; his voice is not heard. “Look, O LORD!” is a repeated refrain (as in 1:11). Yet, even as the personified Zion begs God to see her plight, she has already been ravaged. Zion’s cry for God’s help and mercy echoes hollowly, and there is no reply. The divine silence is awful. Yet in that silence the poet confronts Israel’s responsibility and confesses that “the LORD is in the right, for I have transgressed his word” (1:18 AT).

Even in this confession of responsibility, the poet also asserts throughout Lamentations that God is the active agent. It is the Lord who sent fire from on high that “went deep into my bones” (1:13 NRSV). The Lord “destroyed without mercy all the dwellings of Jacob” (2:2 NRSV). The poet speaks directly to God, declaring, “You have wrapped yourself with anger and pursued us, killing without pity” (3:43 NRSV). Such a direct accusation against God may sound offensive to us, yet it contains within it a powerful statement of faith. In spite of all the famine, torture, and killing, the poet continues to believe that his God, “the LORD” alone, is ruler of the universe and is thus capable of bringing about such utter destruction of his people.

Yet God is silent. This is where life becomes interpretation. Lamentations contains the complaints, prayers, and petitions that any of us might address to God in our grief. God’s response is not found in the text, but in history. While the poet recognizes the sin of Israel and declares God just in punishing them, the book ends with a question: “Or have you utterly rejected us and are angry with us beyond measure?” (5:22 AT). God responded to the complaints of Lamentations by fulfilling his word given through Jeremiah (29:10): he restored his people to Judah by the act of Cyrus.

(p 428)Bibliography

Berlin, A. Lamentations. Westminster John Knox, 2002; Dobbs-Allsopp, F.

W. Lamentations. Interpretation. Westminster John Knox, 2003; Gottwald, N. Studies in the Book of Lamentations. SCM, 1954; Kramer, S., trans. "Lamentation over the Destruction of Ur." ANET (1950): 455–63.

Christian M. M. Brady

Language, Grammar and Syntax

Grammar is used as a term with reference to several layers of language. The grammar of words, or morphology, refers to the construction of words from certain component parts. Hence "construction" comprises a verbal root and a noun suffix. For example, Greek hypomenein (endure, Luke 2:43) is made up of hypo (under) + menein (remain).

The grammar of sentences, or syntax, analyzes the way sentences are held together according to certain rules. The grammar of discourse focuses on yet larger blocks of text, considering what are the features of a paragraph, chapter, or larger passage that make it coherent as a unit. Nevertheless, grammar as a term is most frequently used to refer to syntax.

There are varying approaches to describing grammatical rules. These include traditional grammatical approaches, structuralist approaches, and functionalist approaches.

From Traditional Grammar to Structuralism

Language analysis was dominated by traditional grammar from the time of the ancient Greeks for over two thousand years. In the early twentieth century the new school of structuralism, founded by the Swiss linguist Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913), challenged key assumptions of the traditional grammarians, initiating a dynamic century of debate about diverse approaches to grammatical description.

Traditional grammarians had taken words as their starting point in considering the rules of combination that permitted the forming of correct sentences. For the structuralists, the starting point was the correct sentence, which was then dissected to determine what rules of word combination were permissible.

Furthermore, in concerning themselves with grammatical description, traditional grammarians focused upon literary language, seeing spoken language as secondary in importance. The structuralists, however, insisted that spoken language was primary and grammatical analysis should concern itself with correct spoken forms, on which written forms would be based.

The American structuralist school, which formed around the person of Leonard Bloomfield (1887–1949), advocated the sidelining of semantics in the process of syntactic analysis. The purpose of grammatical description should be to identify the rules built into the minds of language users, which were activated in the production of grammatical sentences. Describing this approach, John Lyons (34) adds, “This part of the grammar was to be a purely formal study, independent of semantics.”

Noam Chomsky (b. 1928) refined the thinking of the structuralists in producing transformational generative grammar (TGG). He affirmed the structuralist view that semantics should be demoted in the description of grammatical rules, but argued that underlying surface structures were a large set of deep structures in the minds of language users, which were sufficiently uniform across languages to enable the development of a universal grammar. These deep structures depended for their activation on a series of syntactic transformations that would generate grammatical surface structures—hence the name transformational generative grammar.

A further refinement came in the form of case grammar, following the thinking of Charles Fillmore of the University of California at Berkeley. He argued that semantics could not be largely ignored, as proposed by the structuralists and transformational grammarians. Fillmore’s case grammar was “a semantic-syntactic grammar model which tries to relate a small number of semantic notions to the syntactic functions in a sentence” (Dirven and Radden 5–6).

From Structuralism to Functionalism

Functionalism represented a revolution in linguistic thinking and had a major impact on how grammar was conceived. Whereas structuralists had focused their efforts to describe language on the workings of the mind, functionalists argued that social context was the driving force in determining the need for linguistic communication and the shape that it took.

Functionalism makes two key assumptions. First, “language has functions that are external to the linguistic system itself.” Second, these external functions “influence the internal organisation of the linguistic system” (Schiffrin 22). Although there are a wide variety of functions of language, they nevertheless fall into two broad categories. Transactional functions express language content (p 429) or transmit information, while interactional functions express social relations and personal attitudes.

For structuralists, study of grammar precedes the study of the use to which language is put; for functionalists, language use precedes and determines the study of grammar. For the former, grammatical structures are arbitrary; for the functionalists, grammatical structure is ethnographically determined.

Grammatical Analysis

The differences in approach described above become evident when linguists from particular schools undertake grammatical analysis of texts.

Classifying Sentences. For traditional grammarians, sentence classification follows long-established grammatical considerations. Sentences may be syntactically unmarked or marked according to word order. For example, in Semitic languages such as Hebrew and Arabic, the unmarked order is represented by verb-initial sentences: VS(O) or V(O)S. For special effect, however, in sentences marked syntactically, the verb is moved away from the initial position on the basis of certain grammatical rules.

Another way of classifying sentences according to traditional grammatical models is on the basis of form. Simple sentences are those consisting of a single proposition centering upon a single verb, such as “Jesus wept” (John 11:35). However, expanded sentences are theoretically capable of indefinite expansion, though they are usually kept to limits as determined by the syntax of the language. These are of two types. Compound sentences, based on coordination, consist of a combination of two or more simple sentences, each of which can stand alone. So (in a sense) Ezek. 18:15—“He does not eat at the mountain shrines or look to the idols of the house of Israel.” Complex sentences are based on subordination, where one simple sentence is joined by a subordinate clause that cannot stand alone. So John 3:3—“Unless one is born again, one cannot see the kingdom of God” (AT).

An alternative approach is based upon a twofold classification (Cotterell and Turner 191–92). This approach is essentially structuralist, drawing on the Saussurean distinction between paradigmatic and syntagmatic considerations. Ferdinand de Saussure argued that words achieved both meaning and syntactic role from within a particular language system by way of their relation to other words within that same system, which either could or could not replace them in their sentence context. So in major-pattern sentences (the vast majority), an infinite range of possible sentences may be produced by substitution of alternative nouns, verbs, adjectives, and so forth. So “Jesus came to Nazareth” could be grammatically acceptable as “Peter came to Nazareth,” which could then be transformed into “Peter went to Nazareth.” In contrast, minor-pattern sentences do not allow for such paradigmatic substitution. This particularly applies to idioms, such as “Not on your life.” These minor-pattern sentences pose particular challenges for translators of the biblical materials.

Dissecting Sentences. Traditional grammatical approaches to syntactic analysis focus upon identification of sentence constituents, or parsing. Sentences are parsed into word classes distinguished according to semantic considerations, called form classes, the principal ones being nouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs, prepositions, and conjunctions. Once parsing is undertaken, traditional grammarians consider grammatical categories, such as number, case, tense, and aspect.

For transformational grammarians, however, a different set of considerations is paramount, including surface and deep structures, identification of kernel sentences, and various other features of language, such as embedding, deletion, and substitution. Langacker (122) points out that “the surface structure of a sentence represents only one facet of its syntactic organisation ... To give a full account of how a sentence is put together, one must describe not only its surface structure but also its conceptual structure and the step-by-step derivation of the former from the latter.”

The surface structure refers to the sentence on the page or as spoken. The deep structure relates to cognitive processes that draw on a series of kernel sentences to produce the surface structure shapes of communication. A kernel sentence consists of a single proposition. Multiple kernel sentences are transformed through various processes before appearing as the surface structure sentence. Thus, following Nida and Taber (53–54), the surface structure sentence “For by grace you are saved through faith, and this is not of yourselves, it is the gift of God” (Eph. 2:8 AT) is derived from a series of kernels: God showed grace. God saved you. You believed. You did not save yourselves. God gave it. You did not work for it. No one should boast.

(p 430) Tree diagrams represent a key device for transformational grammarians in assisting the task of dissecting a sentence into its constituent kernels.

Functional grammarians adopt a very different angle of approach to analysis of sentences. No longer is semantics regarded as of subsidiary importance, as it is by structuralists and transformational grammarians. Furthermore, the functionalist spotlight is placed on pragmatics, an area virtually ignored by structuralists. An understanding of the space between living language and the society that produces it is considered crucial to any exercise in grammatical analysis. This is so true that for functional grammarians, grammatical sentences devoid of context are banished in favor of utterances, or sentences rooted in the contexts that produced them.

The most outstanding example of functional grammar is the systemic functional linguistics model developed by Michael Halliday. Another prominent model is the functional grammar of Simon Dik.

Ongoing Applications to Scriptural Hermeneutics. The above models have all received some attention from biblical scholars. The application of traditional grammatical principles to the study of the biblical text is widespread. Weingreen's widely used reference grammar of biblical Hebrew shows traditional grammatical analysis at its best.

Structuralist approaches, and TGG grammatical concepts, have also made their mark in the world of biblical scholarship. A key name in this regard is Robert Longacre of the Summer Institute of Linguistics. His attention to the grammar of discourse owes much to TGG approaches. Longacre points to certain constituent elements in a block of discourse contributing to a discourse peak, or a zone of grammatical turbulence. Two levels are considered—the surface structure and the notional structure—with the former being the text on the page, and the notional (deep) structure existing in the mind of the author. Furthermore, Longacre's attention to semantic-based constituent roles resonates with Fillmorean case grammar, as seen in the following example:

“Bill received a book from Tom ...

Bill is agent and goal, book is patient, and Tom is source.” (204)

Two biblical scholars greatly influenced by Longacre are David Dawson in his Text-Linguistics and Biblical Hebrew and Ralph Terry in analyzing 1 Corinthians.

The application of functionalist grammatical principles to the study of biblical materials is still in its infancy. Ludwig Wittgenstein laid important foundations with his reference to “theology as grammar,” which has stimulated much discussion in later scholarship. His commitment to use, preceding and forming the basis for analysis, is clear from his statement: “One cannot guess how a word functions. One has to look at its use and learn from that” (109).

The reference grammar by Van der Merwe, Kroeze, and Naude provides functionalist perspectives on the description of biblical Hebrew in seeking to take account of syntactic, semantic, pragmatic, and sociolinguistic considerations (11). In various pieces of research, Randall Buth has applied Dik's functional grammar to the study of biblical Hebrew and Aramaic texts. Jean-Marc Heimerdinger produced important pioneering results, adapting various functionalist analytical models in his study of Hebrew narrative texts. The functionalist concerns with moving beyond sentence-level syntax in favor of pragmatic considerations, as well as considering both author and audience perspectives, are clear as Heimerdinger (14) writes: “As information structure deals with the way a speaker tailors an utterance to meet the particular needs of the intended hearer or receiver, it reflects the speaker's hypothesis about the hearer's assumptions and beliefs and it is concerned with the form and structure of utterances in relation to the assumed mental states of speakers and hearers."

Both Buth and Heimerdinger devote dedicated attention to issues of prominence within OT discourse. They seek to identify those clausal and paragraph elements that assist the communication process by foregrounding and backgrounding information, by identifying and changing topic, and by directing focus to a constituent that may have fallen from attention in the communication. Buth (97) offers the following discussion of prominence connected with verb position in relation to Dan. 6:19–20:

6:19 [6:18 ET] Then went the king to his palace [foreground-continuity]

6:20 [6:19 ET] Then the king at dawn got up at sunrise and with haste to the pit of lions he went [background-discontinuity, dramatic pause, peak]

In terms of functionalist attention to the NT, Jeffrey Reed's study of Philippians represents the first comprehensive attempt to apply Hallidayan systemic functional linguistic principles to the study of the Bible. He too is concerned with issues (p 431) of prominence in his chosen discourse, and demonstrates that these issues cannot be addressed apart from pragmatic factors related to the text in question. Likewise, Cotterell and Turner emphasize the importance of considering text, cotext, and context in analyzing discourse.

These studies have blazed an important trail, but much more needs to be done in order to realize the considerable potential of functional grammar for opening new windows into the study of biblical texts.

See also Etymology; Structuralism; Utterance Meaning

Bibliography

Buth, R. "Functional Grammar, Hebrew and Aramaic: An Integrated, Textlinguistic Approach to Syntax." Pages 77–102 in Discourse Analysis of Biblical Literature, ed. W. Bodine. Scholars Press, 1995; Cotterell, P., and M. Turner. Linguistics and Biblical Interpretation. InterVarsity, 1989; Dawson, D. Text-Linguistics and Biblical Hebrew. Sheffield Academic Press, 1994; Dik, S. Studies in Functional Grammar. Academic Press, 1980; Dirven, R., and G. Radden, eds. Fillmore's Case Grammar. Groos, 1987; Halliday, M. Introduction to Functional Grammar. 2d ed. E. Arnold, 1994; Heimerdinger, J.-M. Topic, Focus and Foreground in Ancient Hebrew Narratives. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Langacker, R. Language and Its Structure. Harcourt Brace, 1973; Longacre, R. The Grammar of Discourse. 2d ed. Plenum, 1996; Lyons, J. Chomsky. Fontana/Collins, 1970; Nida, E., and C. Taber. The Theory and Practice of Translation. Brill, 1969; Reed, J. A Discourse Analysis of Philippians.

Sheffield Academic Press, 1997; Schiffrin, D. Approaches to Discourse. Blackwell, 1994; Terry, R. A Discourse Analysis of First Corinthians. Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1995; Van der Merwe, C., J. Kroeze, and J. Naude. A Biblical Hebrew Reference Grammar. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Weingreen, J. Practical Grammar for Classical Hebrew. 2d ed. Oxford University Press, 1959; Wittgenstein, L. Philosophical Investigations, trans. G. E. M. Anscombe. 2d ed. Blackwell, 1958.

Peter G. Riddell

Language, Linguistics

Linguistics provides precise ways for people to understand how human languages work. Linguistics as a science has had a remarkable development over the past hundred years. Along with this knowledge explosion has come a plethora of technical terms and specific theoretical perspectives that often bewilder those who begin to study linguistics. Linguistics is a generic way of describing aspects of a language. The sound system (phonetics and phonology), the word shapes (morphology), the formation of sentences (syntax), the relationship of structures of meaning (semantics), and even the formation of whole texts (discourse grammar and text linguistics)—these are all objects of study. Within linguistics, questions are asked that go beyond any one language. Comparisons are regularly made between several languages. Historical linguistics, or the study of the development of related languages, is only one aspect of comparison. Universal grammar is also studied to find out why certain processes recur in languages that are not historically related. Other aspects of linguistics include the study of language learning, reading, cognitive processes, and communication theory.

Phonology and Phonetics

If we remember that approximately one-third of the Hebrew Bible is poetry, it will be immediately apparent that sound plays a role in biblical interpretation and appreciation.

The sound system of Greek in the first century was different from the pedagogy that most NT students are taught. After the time of Alexander the Great (d. 323 BCE), Greek use spread throughout the Near East and Mediterranean world. With the rapid spread and use among second-language users, Greek underwent a series of changes as a result of losing “length” within its phonemic system. This resulted in a vowel system reduced to seven phonemes by the first century (see Horrocks 109 [11a]; 110 [12, 13 iv]; Buth, Living Koine Greek, 175–84). These seven vowel phonemes can be grouped according to their graphic representations:

ι = ει    η        ε = αι    α        ω = ο    ου        υ = οι

This may influence interpretation when one encounters passages like Rom. 5:1, where the two translation options “we have”/“let us have” and two textual options echomen/echōmen both rest on words (textual variants) that were homonyms in the first century.

Morphology, the Shapes of Words

There are historical reasons for whatever is found in a language. However, it is not usually necessary to understand “why” a particular historical development took place in order to use a language. For example, an English speaker does not need to know the history of the forms “to be”: is, am, are, was, were. In general, what seem like irregularities to a student are historical fossils that have resisted more general changes sweeping through a language and trying to simplify and regularize it. These fossils are able to remain because they are so commonly used.

(p 432)Hebrew Morphology. Many of the changes in Hebrew vowels are caused by consonants that have guttural features, especially the pharyngeal fricatives, khet (voiceless) and ‘ayin (voiced). This often causes a lowering of expected vowels because of the pulling back of the tongue root in khet or ‘ayin.

New vocabulary was produced within Semitic languages like Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic by altering the pattern of a three-consonant root. This is similar to the way in which Indo-European languages form new vocabulary by adding prefixes, suffixes, or prepositions. Consider for example “produce,” “deduce,” “reduce,” all related to a root “duce” (based on Latin ducere, “to lead”). Hebrew had three basic vocabulary building patterns, traditionally called the Qal, Pi’el, and Hiph’ il. Two other common vocabulary-building patterns were the Niph’al and Hithpa’el, bringing the total productive patterns in ancient Hebrew to five. (The Pu’al and Hoph’al patterns were only passives; they do not form new vocabulary and may be produced automatically, predictably, as the passives of their respective active pattern.) Examples of vocabulary building patterns: manah (מָנָה) meant “he counted”; minnah (מִנָּה), “he appointed”; safar (סָפַר), “he counted”; but sipper (סִפֵּר), “he detailed, reported”; paqad (פָּקַד), “he made an accounting”; hifqid (הִפְקִיד), “he appointed.”

Greek Morphology. A subject sometimes debated among Greek teachers or students is whether Greek had five noun categories or eight. A linguistic framework has a contribution to make. Simply put, the “eight-case” position confuses form and meaning and confuses the protohistory of a language with the language itself.

Attic and Hellenistic Greek had five categories of noun forms (nominative, genitive, dative, accusative, vocative). Semantically, those five categories must cover any and all uses of a Greek noun. The number of semantic functions depends on the grammarian's methodology. Thirty to fifty semantic functions may be pedagogically useful for the five formal categories.

Greek and Hebrew Lexical Semantics

Individual words—whether nouns, verbs, or other—contribute a minimal meaning to any one context. They do not carry with them meaning from other contexts. Likewise, they do not carry etymological “original” meanings any more than English “reduce” means “lead back (a horse to its corral).” Lexica and vocabulary studies must be sifted so as to exclude illegitimate importations from other contexts. In English, a person “charging” a purchase on credit cannot be called “aggressive” simply because a football player can “charge” a defensive line.

Aspect, Greek. A parameter that confronts a user of Greek is “aspect.” Aspect is a perspective on an event. An event may be viewed from “inside” a process or state, without specifying the beginning or end of a process/state. In general linguistics, such a perspective is labeled “imperfective.” An event may also be viewed from “outside” a process or state, viewing the whole event and specifically including an end point or fixed state. In general linguistics, such a perspective is called “perfective.” In English, a simple past “he came” or simple future “he will come” is perfective. English imperfective aspect is signaled with compound structures: “he was coming,” “he is coming,” “he will be coming.” Subcategories of imperfectivity in various languages include repetition (iterativity, “he would visit his aunt”) and habituality (“he jogs,” “he used to smoke”).

The distinction of Greek aspect is that it has entered the morphology of the language to the point where an aspectual choice must be made on virtually every verb. Neutral ambiguity is not an option. A famous example is a line from the Lord's Prayer in both Matthew and Luke.

In English, Hebrew, and Aramaic it is normal to use a simple command and to let the context clarify whether the command is simple and perfective or open-ended and imperfective.

Et lehem huqqenu ten lanu. (Aramaic)

Give us our allotted food. (Matt. 6:11 AT)

Saying this in Greek requires a distinctive, aspectual choice. Below, we find Matthew with a perfective imperative and Luke with an imperfective imperative. Both writers have properly configured the rest of their sentence to their choice of aspect.

Matt. 6:12—Ton arton hēmōn ton epiouision dos heēmin seēmeron.

Give [perfective] us our daily bread today.

Luke 11:3—Ton arton hēmōn ton epiouision didou hēmin to kath' hēmeran.

Be giving [imperfective] us our daily bread day by day.

It is possible to make such an aspectual distinction in another language, but doing so requires extra processing energy and extra words.

Greek is a language that lives and breathes aspect. Ironically, its highly aspectual nature is often hidden from students by grammatical (p 433) terms, by the metalanguage. The various imperfective verbs listed above are traditionally called “present subjunctive,” “present optative,” “present infinitive,” and “present imperative.” Grammar books correctly point out to the student that these categories have nothing to do with time, but the name lingers and confusion results more often than not. If an aspectual name like “continuative” were used (continuative subjunctive, continuative optative, continuative infinitive, continuative imperative), students would probably find that they remember and interpret their Greek categories more easily and correctly.

Hebrew “Aspect” and Tense-Mood-Aspect. Hebrew presents the opposite phenomenon from Greek for English users. Instead of a language that requires extra categories for referring to an event, Hebrew uses fewer categories than English. The common terminology in European Hebrew studies has been “imperfect” and “perfect” verbs. As a result of this metalanguage, interpreters have not infrequently assumed that Hebrew was a language where the speakers focused on aspect without reference to time, while Greek was tacitly assumed to be the more temporal, time-oriented language. That inference is quite misleading.

For Hebrew we ask: How many divisions does its TMA (Tense-Mood-Aspect) verb system use? The standard answer is two. (Already in the biblical period the participle had become the default present tense for describing what was happening around a speaker. A volitional system was also in place that partially overlapped with one of the two TMA categories.) While these can be argued to have arisen etymologically from an aspectual category, it would be a logical fallacy to imply that this category in Hebrew did not include both time and modal constraints. For example, a purely “aspectual” Hebrew verb would predict that either verb category, “imperfect” or “perfect,” could be used in a future context with mahar (מחר), “tomorrow.” However, none of the 52 occurrences of mahar in the Hebrew Bible are used with a so-called perfective; zero out of 52.

This is especially diagnostic for linguists because most of the future contexts are “perfective,” looking forward to a situation where the future event will be complete. Since Hebrew verbs only have two signals available for marking Times and Aspects and Moods, mapping the categories to cover all potential semantic situations will overlap the three parameters. Ironically, it is specifically aspect that gets the least attention when telling a Hebrew story. Most past events are reported together, mono-aspectually, whether or not the event was still in process. (This is frequent with motion verbs: “He went to X and he saw Y on the way.” A language highly sensitive to aspect might say: “He was going to X and saw Y.”) Likewise, future events are reported monotonally, usually without differentiating those that will be complete from those that will be in process.

This means that among the biblical languages, Greek is the one that is highly aspectual, while from an Indo-European perspective, Hebrew is not really aspectual but is underdifferentiated, producing a functional fusion of time-aspect-mood. We do not have a good plain-vanilla metalanguage label for the Hebrew system, and until such time as we do, students can comfort themselves with the model of light being both a particle and a wave as the need arises. The biblical Hebrew verb functioned very well over a thousand years for marking time distinctions, mood distinctions, and aspectual distinctions, all with only two distinct TMA categories.

Textuality and Syntax

The use of the lexical, morphological, and syntactical resources of a language is constrained by the context of a larger text in which the pieces sit. Studying these constraints and patterns has given rise to a branch of linguistics called textlinguistics and discourse analysis (on which see the article “Utterance Meaning” in relation to syntax, word order, and the like). Here we note that “Topic,” “Comment,” and “Focus” are commonly used terms in linguistic literature and are helpful concepts for understanding word-order systems. They are used in various ways by different linguists. We will start with “Comment.”

Comment refers generally to the main point of a clause. One linguistic school, Praguean Functional Sentence Perspective (FSP), developed an analytical methodology around this idea. The Comment of a sentence is “what the author wants to say.” (In FSP terms, the comment of a sentence is called the “Rheme” of a sentence.)

The “Topic” of a sentence is the noncomment part, and the Topic becomes the framework for predicating the comment. The term “Topic” does not mean syntactic subject. It can refer to any kind of syntactic material as long as it is “nonfocal, noncomment.” Consider:

“They did it in the morning.” Presumably, the salient, new, rhemic information is “in the morning.” The whole phrase “they did it” becomes the Topic in this analysis. (In FSP terms, the Topic was called a Theme. Thus started the cycle of terminological confusion because in English something thematic is a (p 434) generic way of talking about something “focal.” So in FSP, the Theme is topical but not thematic, while the Rheme is the salient information, the raison d’être for the sentence.) These concepts of Topic (theme) and Comment (rheme) could be applied to any sentence.

However, there is another kind of information that is specially signaled by the grammar. A specially marked Focus may be a special word-order structure where the salient part of a clause, the Rheme or a part of the Rheme, is put in a special place in the sentence, typically near the beginning. In several linguistic theories the concept of placing special focal information at the beginning of a clause is considered a universal option in human language, though not all languages make use of the phenomenon in the same frequencies.

Topical information, too, can occur in special positions in a sentence. So a reader of a sentence ends up with two kinds of linguistic Topics. One is the generic, unmarked information of a clause that provides more assumed information as a springboard for the comment. The second kind of Topic is when some of this topical information is itself specially marked by placing it near the beginning of a sentence. This special Topic is also hypothesized to be a universal option in human language around the world, to one degree or another.

What the above means is that several linguistic theories have hypothesized that not just one, but two kinds of communicative information (“pragmatic information,” in linguistic terms) can be placed in a special order near the beginning of a sentence. Consequently, “emphasis”—a frequently encountered term in Greek and Hebrew grammar books—is insufficient as a guide for interpretation. A reader of Greek and Hebrew texts needs to develop the ability to distinguish a marked Topic from a marked Focus. Greek requires special practice because of its flexibility with word order and multiple marked elements.

Relevance Theory and Interpretation

Relevance Theory is a cognitive theory about how utterances carry meaning. The theory can explain situations from irony to simple questions and answers. The theory stipulates that all statements are encoded and decoded with maximum relevance assumed. An encoder uses as much processing energy as is necessary for the intended audience. An audience assumes that the author thought he had used enough information so that they can reach appropriate strong and weak implicatures about the message. Shared cultural information will frequently be left out, or if included, it will raise a question in the recipient's mind as to why, and lead them to look for a more complex interpretation. If the implication of a message will take extra processing, the author usually needs to signal this.

Relevance becomes quite complicated in a canonical context because there are two and three audiences. A story in the Gospels takes place between Jesus and his audience, and we regularly see relevance principles at work as various parties in an incident respond to each other. However, there is also the audience of a written Gospel.

Jesus took the five loaves ... and blessed. (Matt. 14:19 AT)

The words of the blessing are not given. We may test several hypotheses as readers. Perhaps Matthew did not want us to know the words of blessing. In some cultures this might even suggest that they were special words, powerful words used in a miraculous context. Perhaps the words were irrelevant or distracting to the story line, so Matthew did not record them. Certainly possible, but this leads to the next consideration. The words may not have been recorded by either Matthew or his source because everyone already knew the words to the blessing. Jesus used the traditional wording, so there was nothing to add beyond the mention of blessing itself. To an audience that knew the traditional blessings, that last interpretation has a good claim to be the easiest and first to process for someone who hears the simple "he blessed." (Blessing before eating was part of the oral interpretation of the law and puts Jesus in the camp of the Pharisees on this issue.)

In the Hebrew Bible a reader may also assume relevance. The Joseph story raises a question or two when confronting a reader with Gen. 38, where the story line diverges and follows two generations of Judah's offspring before returning to Egypt in Gen. 39. Whatever reason we come up with, we can assume that the author/editor intended us either to understand or expected us to ask questions about this intervention. (Genesis Rabbah, a collection of interpretations and sermons from Talmudic times, understood the story as an example of "measure for measure," poetic justice. Just as the brothers told Jacob to "recognize these things" [Gen. 37:32–33], so did Tamar tell Judah to "recognize these things" [38:25–26]. Robert Alter provides an excellent account of how to read this story carefully.)

(p 435) Language Learning

Linguists have learned much about what works for human language learning and what impedes language learning. Exciting developments have taken place with listening comprehension theory and with communicative approaches. The development of curricula in theological schools has usually taken place without input from language acquisition studies. This has produced an insular environment where certain questions or tests simply do not arise. What would happen if a Greek professor were asked to explain what she did the week before, in Hellenistic Greek, in the very language in which teacher and students are trying to develop high interpretative skills? This skill is normally expected of a graduate literature instructor or student. Finding efficient methods for teaching a language in a classroom raises the question of how to train the next generation of teachers. Students of canonical literature may take comfort in knowing that Hebrew was used and transmitted as a learned language in a classroom for 1,500 years. The task is doable if made a priority.

See also Etymology; Language, Grammar and Syntax; Utterance Meaning

Bibliography

Alter, R. The Art of Biblical Narrative. Basic, 1981; Bar-Asher, M., ed. מירקמה [= Mehqarim ba-lashon] [Studies in Language]. 9 vols. Hebrew University Press, 1985–2003; Bendavid, A. וּשֵׁל מִימְכָה וְוִשְׁלוֹ לְשׁוֹן מִימְכָה וְוִשְׁלוֹ [= Leshon Miqra' wu-leshon hakhamim] [Biblical Language and Mishnaic Language]. 2 vols. Dvir, 1967; Bickerton, D. Roots of Language. Karoma, 1981; Buth, R. "Functional Grammar, Hebrew and Aramaic: An Integrated Textlinguistic Approach to Syntax." In Discourse Analysis of Biblical Literature. ed. W. R. Bodine. SemeiaSt. Scholars, 1995; idem. Living Biblical Hebrew for Everyone. 2 vols. Biblical Language Center, 2003; idem. Living Koine Greek for Everyone. Vol. 1. Biblical Language Center, 2002; Casey, M. An Aramaic Approach to Q. SNTSMS 122. Cambridge University Press, 2002; Chomsky, N. The Minimalist Program. MIT Press, 1995; Comrie, B. Aspect. Cambridge University Press, 1976; Dirven, R., and V. Fried, eds. Functionalism in Linguistics. Linguistic and Literary Studies in Eastern Europe 20. John Benjamins, 1987; Fromkin, V., N. Hyams, and R. Rodman. An Introduction to Language. 7th ed. Heinle, 2002; Horrocks, G. Greek. Longmans, 1997; Hurvitz, A. A Linguistic Study of the Relationship between the Priestly Source and the Book of Ezekiel. CahRB 20. Rome, 1982; Krashen, S. D., and T. D. Terrell. The Natural Approach. Alemany, 1983; Kutscher, E. Y. Hebrew and Aramaic Studies. Magnes, 1977; Porter, S. "Did Jesus Ever Teach in Greek?" TynBul 44 (1993): 199–235; Safrai, S. "Literary Languages in the Time of Jesus." Jerusalem Perspective 4, no. 2 [= issue 31] (1991): 3–8; idem. "Spoken Languages in the Time of Jesus." Jerusalem Perspective 4, no. 1 [= issue 30] (1991): 3–8, 13; Wilson, D., and D. Sperber. "Relevance Theory." Pages 607–32 in Handbook of Pragmatics, ed. G. Ward and L. Horn.

Language-Game

The concept of “language-game” (Sprachspiel) is one of several key concepts belonging to the later philosophy of Ludwig Wittgenstein as preeminently expressed in his classic work Philosophical Investigations. The theological significance of the concept for philosophical theology, contemporary hermeneutics, and biblical interpretation stems from the posthumous publication of the Investigations in 1953. Nevertheless, Wittgenstein’s own thoughts began to crystallize in the 1930s, when he was engaging in intensive reevaluation and criticism of his earlier work, the Tractatus logico-philosophicus.

The Later Philosophy

The first occurrence of the concept in Wittgenstein’s thought is found in The Blue Book:

I shall in the future again and again draw your attention to what I shall call language-games. These are ways of using signs simpler than those in which we use the signs of our highly complicated everyday life.

Language-games are the forms of language with which a child begins to make use of words. The study of language-games is the study of primitive forms of language. If we want to study the problems of truth and falsehood, of the agreement or disagreement of propositions with reality, of the nature of assertion, assumption, and question, we shall with great advantage look at primitive forms of language in which these forms of thinking appear without the confusing background of highly complicated processes of thought. When we look at such simple forms of language the mental mist which seems to enshroud our ordinary use of language disappears. We see activities, reactions, which are clear-cut and transparent. (Wittgenstein, Blue, 17)

Here Wittgenstein draws attention to his belief that the study of language-games is central to the study—and dissolution—of philosophical problems. In the Philosophical Investigations he gives the clearest indication of what he takes to be such forms of language. The term “language-games,” he writes, “is meant to bring into prominence the fact that the speaking of language is part of an activity, or of a form of life.” He cites as examples of language-games the following: giving orders and obeying them; describing the appearance of an object, or giving its measurements; constructing an object from a description (p 436)(a drawing); reporting an event; forming and testing a hypothesis; making up a story and reading it; play-acting; guessing riddles; making a joke; telling it; asking, thanking, cursing, greeting, praying (Wittgenstein §23).

In his early view Wittgenstein let logic determine the limits of language; in his later philosophy he assigned that role to the concept of a private language. What is a private language? It can be defined in terms of ordinary language itself. It was not a question of language spoken by the ordinary person in the street as compared to the specialized technical vocabulary of the expert. For Wittgenstein, both of these qualified as ordinary language (even logic in this sense was ordinary language in having a definite genuine usefulness to which it could be put). Ordinary language was language whose rules could be taught in principle to other people. Beyond the limits of ordinary language lay the realm of private language, the rules of which, Wittgenstein held, could not be taught in principle from one person to another. In his battle against the errors of traditional philosophy, such as the philosophical skepticism of a philosopher like Descartes, Wittgenstein's objective is to "bring words back from their metaphysical to their everyday use":

When philosophers use a word "knowledge," "being," "object," "I," "proposition," ... one must always ask oneself: is the word ever actually used in this way in the language-game which is its original home? What we do is bring words back from their metaphysical to their everyday use. (Philosophical §116)

This emphasis on meaning as use—and the correlative concepts of teachability and learnability—is central to Wittgenstein's understanding of language-games. Language-games that are not teachable or learnable are examples of a private language. Conversely, those that are teachable or learnable are part of the great natural and historical corpus of linguistic behavior and communication. Philosophy will only generate confusion if it seeks to go beyond the limits of these language-games, because then language will not be doing any real work. In epistemology, for example, when Descartes doubts whether we can be sure what anything is, Wittgenstein asks how we could teach—outside of the ordinary everyday context of knowing what it is a chair is—what it means to say (pointing to a chair), "That is probably a chair." Wittgenstein's point is this: Try teaching the meaning (or use) of this assertion to a child without first having taught him or her what it is a chair is! To know whether something is "probably a chair" presupposes that one knows what it is a chair is (Zettel §411). One cannot teach the former without first having taught the latter. This means that—outside of the latter context—one cannot teach (and the child cannot learn) the rule for the use of "That is probably a chair." Saying that the philosopher is to bring words back from their "metaphysical to ordinary everyday use" is saying that they are to be brought back from the realm of the unteachable to that of the teachable. This is why in Zettel Wittgenstein makes the remark, “Am I making the connection between meaning and teaching?” (§411). The answer must be “Absolutely yes.”

Theology and Religion

The later Wittgenstein is often construed as affirming a “cultural-anthropological” approach to philosophical problem-solving. According to this view, central to the later philosophy is a plethora of language-games, each with its own respective logic and rationality. The philosopher of religion D. Z. Phillips undoubtedly construes Wittgenstein as a “philosophical” cultural anthropologist, albeit an enlightened one. A similar view is held in mainstream theological circles. In common with Phillips’s “internalist” approach, George Lindbeck’s “intratextual” interpretation of Wittgenstein in The Nature of Doctrine advocates a Wittgenstein who maintained that philosophy was limited to describing the grammar of each individual “language-game” or “form of life.” In this context “grammar” coincided with rules of truth, intelligibility, reality, and rationality, whose final court of appeal was how these rules were used in each (communal) language-game. Since these rules were different for different language-games, no external critical perspective was possible, each language-game was “self-authenticating,” and rationality was an “internal” matter. Lindbeck called his approach “faithfulness as intratextuality.” Intratextuality entails that “meaning is constituted by the uses of a specific language rather than being distinguishable from it” (Lindbeck 114).

Though it is not likely that Wittgenstein conceived religion, or for that matter science, as individual and autonomous language-games, the idea that the rules of religious discourse were precisely teachable and therefore learnable repudiated once and for all the view that such discourse was meaningless. As against the kind of positivist conclusions reached by such as A. J. Ayer in his Language, Truth, and Logic, one of the implications of the later philosophy was that the (p 437) charge of meaninglessness was absurd: since the rules of religious language were learnable, it was clearly meaningful.

Nevertheless, it would be a mistake to deduce from this that religious language guaranteed its authenticity in terms of belief, knowledge, and truth. To say that religious and theological discourse have their own epistemological and ontological criteria, for example, that the ontology of God is not the same as the ontology of physical objects, is to say one thing. Saying that the concepts of “true” and “false” are different in the two cases is saying quite another. What is possible is that the rules of religious discourse be only taught among believers, in which case believing would be a necessary condition of understanding. This has led to the charge of fideism by such as Kai Neilson and Ernst Gellner.

Hermeneutics and the Bible

The impact of the concept of language-games on biblical hermeneutics has been both theoretical and practical (viz., Shanker’s response to Apel). As a hermeneutical approach to the Bible, the concept of the interpretative community has much to commend it. Though the original impetus is undoubtedly Wittgenstein’s concept of language-games and forms of life, the church as an interpretative community has been understood in terms of the Aristotelian or Thomistic concept of virtuous readers (Fowl). The hermeneutics of the liturgical life of the church can also be understood in the context of an “ecclesial” language-game.

Noting the resemblance to the concept of language-event in the work of Gerhard Ebeling and Ernst Fuchs, Anthony Thiselton has attempted to apply Wittgenstein’s insights about language-games to the field of NT hermeneutics and exegesis with some success (Two; New; Promise). He employs the concept of communicative action in order to point to the essentially performative nature of an important part of our linguistic behavior.

Conclusion

It may be that Wittgenstein’s impact on hermeneutics has been somewhat superseded by current developments in postmodern and “Derridean” hermeneutics. Nevertheless, those in the church who believe that only saving grace can help us understand the concepts of the Bible may gain some validation in Wittgenstein’s concept of a language-game. Ironically, the theory of speech acts in the work of Oxford linguistic philosopher John L. Austin may be the true alternative to post-Heideggerian hermeneutics (see Wolterstorff). Yet it is conceivable—in interpreting the word of God—that speech-act theory may constitute merely one practice of many in the life of the church understood as an interpretative community.

Bibliography

Apel, K.-O. “Wittgenstein and the Problem of Hermeneutic Understanding.” Pages 70–103 in Ludwig Wittgenstein. Vol. 4, ed. S. G. Shanker. Croom Helm, 1986; Austin, J. L. How to Do Things with Words. Harvard University Press, 1962; Ayer, A. J. Language, Truth and Logic. 2d ed. Victor Gollancz, 1946; Baker, G. P., and P. M. S. Hacker. An Analytical Commentary on Wittgenstein's "Philosophical Investigations." Vols. 1–2. Blackwell, 1980–85; Fowl, S. Engaging Scripture. Blackwell, 1996; Gellner, E. "Reply to Mr. McIntyre." Pages 71–89 in Universities and Left Review, 1958; Hacker, P. M. S. An Analytical Commentary on Wittgenstein's "Philosophical Investigations." Vol. 3. Blackwell, 1993; Lindbeck, G. The Nature of Doctrine. SPCK, 1984; MacDonald, N. B. Karl Barth and the Strange New World within the Bible (ch. 12). Paternoster, 2000; Nielsen, K. "Wittgensteinian Fideism." Philosophy 42 (1967): 191–209; Phillips, D. Z. Belief, Change and Forms of Life. MacMillan, 1986; idem. The Concept of Prayer. Blackwell, 1981; idem. Faith after Foundationalism. Routledge, 1988; idem. "Primitive Reactions and the Reactions of Primitives." Pages 103–22 in Wittgenstein and Religion. MacMillan, 1993; idem. "Religion in Wittgenstein's Mirror." Pages 135–50 in Wittgenstein Centenary Essays, ed. A. P. Griffiths. Cambridge University Press, 1991; Shanker, S. G. "Wittgenstein and the Problem of Hermeneutic Understanding." Pages 104–15 in Ludwig Wittgenstein. Vol. 4, ed. S. G. Shanker. Croom Helm, 1986; Thiselton, A. "Communicative Action and Promise in Interdisciplinary, Biblical, and Theological Hermeneutics." Pages 133–239 in The Promise of Hermeneutics, R. Lundin, C. Walhout, and A. Thiselton. Eerdmans, 1999; idem. Language, Liturgy, and Meaning. Grove Books, 1975; idem. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. Paternoster, 1992; idem. The Two Horizons. Paternoster, 1980; Wittgenstein, L. Blue and Brown Books. Blackwell, 1978; idem. Culture and Value, ed. G. H. von Wright in collaboration with H. Nyman. Blackwell, 1980; idem. Lectures and Conversations of Aesthetics, Psychology and Religious Belief, ed. C. Barrett. Blackwell, 1966; idem. On Certainty, ed. G. E. M. Anscombe and G. H. von Wright, trans. D. Paul and G. E. M. Anscombe. Blackwell, 1969; idem. Philosophical Investigations, ed. G. E. M. Anscombe. Blackwell, 1953; idem. Remarks on Frazer's Golden Bough, ed. R. Rhees. Brynmill, 1979; idem. Tractatus logico-philosophicus. German, 1921. ET, 1922, trans. D. F. Pears and B. F. McGuinness. Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1961; idem. Zettel, ed. G. E. M. Anscombe and G. H. Von Wright. Blackwell, 1981; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Neil B. MacDonald

(p 438) Last Things, Doctrine of

The doctrine of the last things (eschatology) concerns the culmination of God's purposes, focused on the last One, Jesus Christ, "the last Adam" (1 Cor. 15:45), whose (second) coming in judgment and blessing is the focus of Christian hope. Scripture associates the last things with the messianic "last days" or "latter days" or "those days." Scripture portrays the last things in trinitarian style: Christ's return to reign eternally, the fullness of the Spirit's work, and God's presence eternally with his people.

Eschatological Orientation of Re-Creation and Salvation

A broad consensus of contemporary scholarship agrees that the last things should not be understood primarily as a series of events at the end of history, relatively detached from what precedes. The last things are integral to the biblical message for, though culminating at the end, they begin much earlier. Bringing to fulfillment the many story lines and divine promises while exceeding all that we can ask or imagine, this dynamic, transforming rule of God over the entire—and entirely submissive—re-creation culminates the complex scriptural story.

Numerous biblical themes have overtones that confirm the significance of the last things for interpreting Scripture: two themes, creation and salvation, are predominant.

Re-creation culminates the reversal of sin's effects on the fallen, judged creation. The biblical account climaxes with the "new heavens and a new earth, where righteousness is at home" (2 Pet. 3:13 NRSV). The extent and pervasiveness of sin's effects mean that restoring the created order amounts to a re-creation. So drastic a cosmic renewal is regeneration, rebirth, "renewal" (Matt. 19:28). The new birth experienced by God's children, without which they cannot see the kingdom of God, anticipates the created order's renewal.

Jesus brings to fulfillment God's promises for cosmic justice and restoration, and thus is the savior of all humanity. The same enemies threaten humanity's eternal well-being and oppress the created order: injustice and suffering resulting from sin and death, and the devil, "the god of this age" (2 Cor. 4:4 TNIV). Jesus' death and resurrection atones for the sins of the world and conquers these enemies, delivering the created order from bondage. The freedom of the creation, suffering under judgment because of human sin, is integral to the redemption of God's children.

With themes and images pervasively eschatological, salvation is inseparable from the culmination of God's work. Victory over enemies, healing from disease, cleansing from impurity, abundant and satisfying provision for the thirsty and hungry, light for the blind and those in darkness, adoption of the abandoned, reconciliation of the alienated, forgiveness for the guilty, vindication for the wrongly oppressed, restoration of the lost, wholeness and well-being for those who suffer, life for the dead—though God's people often experience foretastes of these blessings, they come fully only in the end. The fullness of redemption culminates God's work for his people. Thus, hope is a preeminent eschatological virtue.

Covenantal Structure of Hope

God embodied his redemptive promises in covenants made with his people, beginning with Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3; 15; 17; 22:15–18; reaffirmed to Isaac in 26:24 and to Jacob in 28:13–15), promising land, seed, and blessing for the world. The Mosaic covenant established at Sinai (Exod. 19–24) and renewed before the Jordan (Deuteronomy) administered the patriarchal promises to Israel, Abraham’s multiplied descendants, preparing to enter Canaan. The Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7; Ps. 89) provided a perpetual dynasty to reign over Israel. The new covenant (Jer. 31:31–34; Ezek. 36:16–37) replaced the broken “old” covenant by granting the Spirit for the covenant community’s universal internal renewal and permanently removing sinfulness.

The Day of Yahweh

The day of God’s intervention to deliver Israel from oppression became known as the day of Yahweh. Israel experienced many such interventions, but looked for one climactic day of Yahweh at the end of this age, increasingly associated with the Messiah. Though many Israelites rejoiced, anticipating their unqualified victory, Amos warned against seeking that day, for Yahweh would judge his people (5:18–20).

Apocalyptic

The books of Daniel and Ezekiel include a distinctive genre that would flourish during the intertestamental period. Commonly originating during a crisis of oppression, apocalyptic literature consists of angelically mediated divine revelation that humans receive in highly symbolic visions. It announces the climactic triumph of the kingdom of God over hostile earthly kingdoms, (p 439)calling readers to view contemporary struggles eschatologically.

Jesus, the Covenants, and the Kingdom of God

Jesus’ ministry culminates the OT redemptive covenants. He is the seed of Abraham (Gal. 3:16), the Savior of the world, in whom the blessings of God become universal, to all who by faith become children of Abraham. He is the final anointed Davidic king, who in righteousness will reign over Israel and all peoples, because the kingdom of this world becomes his kingdom (Rev. 11:15). The crucified, risen, and ascended Messiah has inaugurated the new covenant (Matt. 26:26–30; Mark 14:22–25; Luke 22:14–23; 1 Cor. 11:23–26) and sent the eschatological Spirit (Acts 2). The church experiences this new life in the Spirit while it awaits the fullness in the new earth. Jesus, the priestly mediator offering himself as perfect sacrifice, fulfills the Levitical cultus, incomparably manifesting God’s love for the ungodly in conquering his enemies and dealing fully and finally with God’s wrath and sin’s guilt, alienation, and uncleanness. Jesus unifies in himself God's covenantal promises, far surpassing all expectations.

Echoing John the Baptizer, Jesus proclaimed the nearness of the kingdom of God (Matt. 4:17//Mark 1:15; Matt. 4:23; Luke 4:43–44). His ministry manifested its presence in his person (Luke 11:20), anticipating the Spirit's Pentecostal inauguration. Those who insightfully recognized Jesus' messianic significance evoked his astonished commendation (Matt. 8:5–13; 15:21–28).

Because he conquered sin and death, Jesus received redemptive rule over creation (Phil. 2:6–11). His gift of the Spirit inaugurated God's dynamic, transforming reign mediated through his anointed representative, effected by the Spirit in fullness when Jesus returns. Intermixed with the world, its presence in this age is invisible. Bringing justice and peace and radically reversing this cosmos's priorities, it includes all kinds of people, even the "unclean," but not those expecting honored entrance.

The Spirit's greatest prominence is eschatological. The promise of the Spirit is the promise of kingdom blessings, God's abundant provision for his people, since the Spirit accomplishes them and mediates personal participation in them.

Jesus as Son of Man

Jesus' typical self-designation is "Son of Man," echoing Daniel's vision of "one like a son of man," who comes gloriously from heaven in judgment, receiving an everlasting, universal, indestructible kingdom (7:13–14). Jesus identifies himself as this eschatological judge (Matt. 26:64//Mark 14:62//Luke 22:69).

Present Age and the Age to Come

Like the OT, the NT divides history into two eras, "this age" (the present reign of evil) and "the age to come" ("the last days," Messiah's reign of justice and peace; Matt. 12:32; Mark 10:30; Luke 20:34–35; Eph. 1:21; Heb. 6:5). In Jesus' person and ministry, the age to come has broken into the present age rather than replacing it, so the two ages overlap "between the times" of Jesus' comings (Acts 2:17; 1 Cor. 10:11b; Heb. 1:1–2; 9:26; 1 Pet. 1:20; 1 John 2:18).

Parousia

Christ's parousia (his coming or presence) is his second coming. Two comings were not expected by first-century Judaism. The disciples' questions to Jesus on the Mount of Olives suggest that after three years with him, they still expected him to fulfill his work then. His talk of leaving puzzled them, not least because so much was incomplete.

The same Jesus of Nazareth will personally return (Acts 1:11), but gloriously and powerfully (Matt. 24:30) in a disclosure (apokalypsis; 2 Thess. 1:7) evident to all (Matt. 24:27). The exalted Jesus will be seen in the splendor now rightfully his at the Father's right hand (Phil. 2:9; Eph. 1:20–23; Heb. 2:9). He will destroy antichrist and evil (2 Thess. 2:8), gather his people, both the dead and the living (Matt. 24:31; 1 Cor. 15:23; 1 Thess. 4:14–17; 2 Thess. 2:1), and judge the world in justice (Matt. 25:31; James 5:9).

Millennialism

The millennium receives its name from Rev. 20, where the phrase “a thousand years” occurs six times. Two disputes concern this phrase: whether it should be read as a specific chronological description and, if so, whether it occurs previous to or subsequent to the parousia.

Amillennialists believe that this period includes Christ's present reign from heaven over the church and the world, not a future distinct from this age and the eternal kingdom. They argue that Christ's present reign and the eternal kingdom fulfill the prophecies, making a distinct period superfluous. Postmillennialists regard the millennium as the glorious fulfillment of OT prophecies, inaugurated through the church's Spirit-empowered (p 440) preaching of the gospel, followed by the parousia. They argue that the Spirit's blessing of the gospel's worldwide expansion fulfills millennial expectations, in contrast to premillennialism's pessimistic postponement of this until after Christ's return.

Premillennialists regard the millennium as a distinct future period (though they differ regarding its chronological precision, as do some postmillennialists) inaugurated by the glorious coming of Christ. Premillennialists generally believe that a seven-year period (“the great tribulation,” Rev. 7:14), Daniel's “seventieth week of sevens” (9:24–27), precedes Christ's premillennial return in judgment and blessing. “Historic premillennialists” affirm that the church remains on earth through the tribulation; “dispensational premillennialists” usually teach that Christ removes the church to heaven before the tribulation. For some premillennialists, especially dispensationalists, the period includes national Israel's (spiritually renewed and Messiah-trusting) participation in Jesus' messianic blessings (fulfilling OT national promises) along with Gentile nations. Recent amillennialists such as A. Hoekema emphasize national Israel's eternal experience of the fulfillment on the new earth, not the present earth during the millennium.

Resurrection of the Body and Life Everlasting

The OT provides little indication of a hope for life after death or beyond the grave. The OT holistic understandings of humans did not suggest that disembodied persons might persist after death. Sheol is the place of the dead, primarily the grave. Only in scattered references is conscious life after physical death implied. Yet those indications challenge claims that the OT teaches life ending with bodily death. Cooper rightly distinguishes between indications of conscious human activity after death, on the one hand, and explicit teachings of that life, on the other. The OT may lack the latter, but not the former. Resurrection of the dead seems clearly present in Dan. 12:2–3, 13 and Isa. 26:19.

Jesus' resurrection is victory over death and the grave, bringing life and immortality to light in the gospel (2 Tim. 1:10). Christ is raised as the firstfruits of those who will follow (1 Cor. 15:20, 23). God, who raised Jesus, will also raise us (Rom. 8:11; 1 Cor. 6:14; 2 Cor. 4:14).

The resurrection of the body heralds the completion of redemption, including redemption of the body (not from the body). The "fleshly" (sinful) orientation of the former life is put off, but not human materiality. Denying bodily resurrection imperils the hope of the new creation, making eternal life ethereal, more Platonic than Pauline. God's renewed imagers will fulfill his commission for responsible stewardship of creation, now on the new earth.

The hope of the gospel is bodily resurrection to everlasting life with the triune God, yet this does not exclude an intermediate, apparently disembodied, existence between death and resurrection. Humans are not naturally or essentially immortal, but God grants them enduring conscious existence. In the interim between death and the parousia, the righteous are "with Christ" (2 Cor. 5:6–8; Phil. 1:23) as God grants life even in the unnatural state of disembodiedness, longing with the created order itself for redemption's completion.

The wicked will be raised (Dan. 12:2; John 5:28–29; Acts 24:14–15; Rev. 20:12–15) to judgment in the bodies in which they sinned, enduring "everlasting" punishment. Scriptural depictions of the reality of eternal suffering include apparently conflicting images of "flames of fire," "darkness," and "deepest darkness" (Jude 13 NRSV). Punishment will be physical and also nonphysical (Matt. 8:12; 13:42–43; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30). The majority of the Christian tradition has read this as endless punishment in a conscious state, but a recurring minority reading has recently gained increasing support, including significant evangelicals, arguing that the "everlasting destruction" (2 Thess. 1:9; see Matt. 7:13; Rom. 9:22; Phil. 3:19) of the damned is their annihilation.

Believers will be like Christ (Rom. 8:29; 1 Cor. 15:49; Phil. 3:21; 1 John 3:2) and be with him (John 14:3; 2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23; Col. 3:4; 1 Thess. 4:17), sharing his glory (Rom. 8:18, 30; 2 Cor. 3:18; 4:17; Col. 3:4; Heb. 2:10; 1 Pet. 5:1) and his reign (2 Tim. 2:12; Rev. 2:26–27; 3:21; 20:4, 6). As children of God they will enjoy perfect fellowship with him (Rev. 21:3, 7), worshipping him (7:15; 22:3) before his face (Matt. 5:8; 1 Cor. 13:12; Rev. 22:4; see Bauckham 339).

Scripture portrays believers in a restored paradise (Luke 23:43; Rev. 2:7; 22:1–5) and the new Jerusalem (Heb. 12:22; Rev. 21). God's people share table fellowship at an eschatological banquet (Matt. 8:11; Mark 14:25; Luke 14:15–24; 22:30) or wedding feast (Matt. 25:10; Rev. 19:9).

Twentieth-Century Revival of Eschatology

For much of church history, study of the last things was limited to bodily resurrection, (p 441) judgment, heaven, and hell. Nineteenth-century emphasis on the kingdom of God, and classical liberalism's excessive correlation of that with human social progress, precipitated a reversal in A. Schweitzer's and J. Weiss's insistence on Jesus' imminent, apocalyptic, eschatological expectation, later undermined by the delay of the parousia. C. H. Dodd's counterclaim that the NT taught a realized kingdom in turn evoked arguments that it manifests both the presence of and expectation for the kingdom of God, an inaugurated but not consummated kingdom—now a widely acknowledged understanding.

In particular, O. Cullmann, W. Pannenberg, and J. Moltmann have contributed to the return of eschatology as a central Christian doctrine. Cullmann emphasized that Christ, as salvation history's midpoint, must be understood in terms of that entire history, from Abraham to the parousia. Pannenberg argued that Jesus' resurrection can only be understood proleptically, from the end of history. Moltmann's early work made hope an encompassing interpretative lens, understanding eschatologically the church's present life amid unjust suffering and all of theology.

Implications for Theological Interpretation of Scripture

Christians should read Scripture in its relationship to redemptive history and to the measure of proleptic realization of eschatological realities. The blessings and spiritual privileges enjoyed already before the parousia are foretastes and should incite confident expectation. This life's sorrows remind us that it is unjust, marred by sin, and transient. Commands come in light of what has been done in us and as eschatological exhortations to become what we are, as well as to become what we are not yet. One test of faithful discipleship, including scriptural interpretation, is the degree to which it fosters appropriate spiritual dissatisfaction with the present age and corresponding longing for redemption (Rom. 8). Because “what we will be has not been revealed” (1 John 3:2) and “no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor the human heart conceived, what God has prepared for those who love him” (1 Cor. 2:9 NRSV), hermeneutical humility (not agnosticism) is particularly appropriate in eschatology.

Most fundamental of several demarcating issues is whether the future promised is mythological or historical. Modern defenders of a historical eschaton have often debated whether the scriptural depictions should be read “literally” or “spiritually.” Recent discussions have instead asked whether national Israel would be regathered in faith and restored from its dispersion and whether that would take place on this earth or on the new earth. Some covenant theologians argue for Israel’s typological relationship to the church, making Israel’s national spiritual restoration obsolete. Such questions divided much of recent evangelicalism into “covenant theology” (more amillennial than postmillennial, but sometimes “historic premillennial”) and dispensationalism. The church’s relation to Israel’s promises is symptomatic: Does Israel have promises separate from the church? Does the church participate in the fulfillment of Israel’s promises, without exhausting that fulfillment or supplanting Israel? Does Israel find its future only among believers from all nations in the “new Israel” (the church)?

Dispensationalists disagree over the degree of continuity between redemptive history’s successive administrations. “Progressive dispensationalists” argue for greater continuity (progress), including an inaugurated kingdom, though the church’s participation in Israel’s messianic blessings does not supplant Israel’s millennial national restoration to faith, while other dispensationalists argue that this blurs or removes the distinction between dispensationalism and covenant theology.

See also Apocalyptic; Covenant; Hope; Kingdom of God; New Creation; Resurrection of the Dead

Bibliography

Bauckham, R. “Eschatology.” Pages 333–39 in New Bible Dictionary, ed. D. Wood. 3d ed. InterVarsity, 1996; Beasley-Murray, G. R. Jesus and the Kingdom of God. Eerdmans, 1986; Bock, D., ed. Three Views on the Millennium and Beyond. Counterpoints. Zondervan, 1999; Collins, J. The Apocalyptic Imagination. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1998; Cooper, J. Body, Soul, and Life Everlasting. Eerdmans, 2000; Cullmann, O. Christ and Time. 3d ed., trans. F. Filson. Westminster, 1964; idem. Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? Macmillan, 1958; Fudge, E., and R. Peterson.

Two Views of Hell. InterVarsity, 2000; Harris, M. Raised Immortal. Eerdmans, 1985; Hoekema, A. The Bible and the Future. Eerdmans, 1979; Ladd, G. The Presence of the Future. Eerdmans, 1974; Moltmann, J. Theology of Hope, trans. J. Leitch. Harper, 1967.

Stephen R. Spencer

Latin American Biblical Interpretation See Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics

Law

Definition

The English term “law” covers a much narrower range of literature than the Hebrew term (p 442) torah, which is conventionally translated “law.” Hebrew torah would be better translated “instruction,” and this torah comprises the whole of the Pentateuch, Genesis to Deuteronomy, despite the fact that these books contain a fair amount of narrative. Psalm 1:2, inviting the reader to meditate on the torah day and night, seems to envisage the book of the Psalms as well as the Pentateuch being the torah.

By “law” the English Bible reader understands the legal rulings and moral injunctions found within the Pentateuch, such as the Ten Commandments, the farming regulations of Exod. 22, the laws on sacrifice and purity in Leviticus, and the sermons of Deuteronomy. It is “law” in this sense that is the focus of this article, though I argue that only a broader definition that understands law as torah does full justice to the biblical understanding of the term. (There is also “law,” of course, in the NT, though its instruction less frequently takes the form of detailed legal stipulations. Regarding law in the Epistles, and their approaches to OT law, see especially articles on Pauline texts.)

History of Interpretation

From the first century the law has been understood in a fairly straightforward literal sense. Among the many NT quotations and allusions to the law, there is only one passage where it appears to be taken allegorically (1 Cor. 9:9). Generally the moral and civil law was taken as binding by the early church; indeed, the ritual obligation to avoid blood was endorsed by the Jerusalem council (Acts 15:29) and still upheld by Tertullian nearly two centuries later. In Christendom the law of the Pentateuch continued to inspire later legislators. King Alfred, father of the English common law, drew inspiration from the laws of Exod. 20–23. The Magisterial Reformers emphasized the positive value of the law. Although the ceremonial law no longer applies to Christians, and the civil law cannot be applied universally, “no Christian man whatsoever is free from the obedience of the Commandments which are called Moral,” affirms the seventh of the Anglican Thirty-Nine Articles. As late as 1853 J. L. Saalschütz subtitled his legal study of the Mosaic law as being For Biblical Scholars, Lawyers and Statesmen.

But from the late eighteenth century a quite different approach to reading the law began to dominate interpretation: historical criticism became the regnant interpretative paradigm. Instead of focusing on the interpretation and applicability of the law to later societies, scholarship concentrated on trying to work out when and why the different groups of law came into existence. On a straightforward reading of the Pentateuch, all the laws it contains are associated with Moses: they are either said to have been revealed to Moses (Exodus to Numbers) or to be his exposition of the Sinaitic laws (Deuteronomy). A study of these laws should therefore give a clear insight into the constitution and legal principles of early Israel.

However, in the nineteenth century it became the received wisdom that different groups of laws originated in different periods. Generally three main blocks of laws were distinguished: the book of the covenant (Exod. 21–23), the priestly law (most of Exod. 25–Num. 36), and the Deuteronomic code (Deut. 12–26). Early-nineteenth-century scholars such as de Wette held that the different groups of law were written in this order. The Deuteronomic law was dated last, around the time of Josiah’s reformation (622 BCE). The other laws preceded Deuteronomy, but whether they went back to the time of Moses was debated.

At the end of the nineteenth century, a drastic change came over this reconstruction, largely as a result of the brilliant advocacy of Julius Wellhausen in his Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1878). A Josianic date for the Deuteronomic code was still maintained, but the Priestly material in Exodus to Numbers was dated to the exilic or postexilic eras (sixth–fifth centuries BCE). So instead of these laws being viewed as giving an insight into early Israel’s constitution and values, they were now read as the aspirations of tendentious priests or utopian reformers. Great effort was put into distinguishing between earlier and later elements in the law, but because the laws were seen as essentially idealistic and detached from reality, little attention was paid to interpreting them or setting them in their social context.

The twentieth century witnessed a move back to a realistic reading of the laws. Albrecht Alt (The Origins of Israelite Law, 1934) distinguished between apodictic laws (Thou shalt not ...) and case law (If a man does X, he shall suffer Y), arguing that the case law had probably been borrowed from the Canaanites, while the apodictic law was uniquely Israelite and quite early. While he did not link it to Moses, he certainly thought it could be as early as the era of the judges. His disciples Gerhard von Rad and Martin Noth also emphasized the importance of the judges period, holding that some of the key ideas of Israel's unity and covenant with Yahweh could be traced back to that (p 443)era and have left their imprint on Israel's laws. Though these scholars were trying to recover the original setting of the laws in the Pentateuch, it is now widely acknowledged that their conclusions are quite speculative (Whybray).

The second half of the twentieth century has seen another attempt to read the law realistically. The publication of ancient collections of law from the ancient Near East—such as those of Lipit-Ishtar, Hammurabi, Eshnunna, the Hittites, and the Middle Assyrians—has prompted some distinguished legal commentaries thereon. Commentators on these nonbiblical texts have drawn on many other legal documents from the ancient Near East, including the OT, to illuminate these legal collections and their key ideas.

In turn, OT scholars have drawn on ancient Near Eastern law to clarify the Bible. Many customs in Genesis have been explained on the basis of oriental legal customs. Sometimes these comparisons have been pushed too far, leading to charges of parallelomania. Nevertheless, a number of incidents recorded in Genesis have been helpfully illuminated this way (Selman). Certainly Near Eastern legal texts have shed much light on biblical law. Sometimes these comparisons demonstrate the continuity between biblical and extrabiblical practice, such as in marriage and divorce law or the treatment of homicide (e.g., Westbrook). In other areas, such as the Sabbath and slavery, scholarship has been struck by the discontinuity between the Bible and neighboring cultures. It is neither a case of casual borrowing by the biblical writers nor a wholesale rejection of their neighbors' practices. Instead, these comparisons reveal a principled selection process whereby some oriental laws and customs are endorsed, while others are firmly dismissed.

Another fruitful area of comparison between the biblical legal collections and their oriental parallels has been in the area of covenant and treaty. The pentateuchal laws are not given in a vacuum; rather, they form part of a covenant between "the LORD" and Israel. This is a God-initiated relationship whereby the LORD pledges to make Israel his people and protect them, while Israel responds by pledging to be totally loyal to the LORD their God. In the 1960s many scholars observed that this covenantal relationship corresponds in terminology and ideas to the ancient suzerainty treaties of the Near East. Typically in these treaties, the "Great King," who had conquered his enemy, now made him his vassal. In the treaty the vassal pledged total loyalty to his suzerain. It was noted that not only was the ideology similar, but also that the structure of oriental vassal treaties was quite similar to the covenant texts in the Pentateuch that contain the laws (McCarthy).

The Message of the Law

Influenced by some apparently disparaging remarks about the law in Romans, many Bible readers have tended to neglect it and miss its true value. Deuteronomy can say, “What great nation is there, that has statutes and rules so righteous as all this law which I set before you this day?” (4:8 RSV). Jesus can say, “Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them” (Matt. 5:17). Hence, the law ought to have a vital part in the thinking of the individual, the church, and society.

Its Covenantal Setting. Central to an appreciation of the law is recognition of its covenantal setting. As already mentioned, the lawgiving at Sinai is part of the making of the covenant with Israel, in which the whole nation was constituted the chosen people of God. This was a God-directed relationship. It began with an act of divine grace, with the LORD bringing Israel out of Egypt: “You have seen ... how I bore you on eagles’ wings and brought you to myself” (Exod. 19:4 RSV). Israel was expected to respond with obedience: “Now therefore, if you will obey my voice and keep my covenant ...” (19:5 RSV). Such obedience would be rewarded by blessing, by an even closer relationship with God: “You shall be my treasured possession out of all the peoples” (19:5 NRSV). Indeed, Israel will mediate divine blessing to the nations through its priestly role: “You shall be to me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (19:6 RSV). This short passage shows that the covenant relationship is based on grace, on God’s undeserved kindness toward Israel, exhibited in releasing them from Egyptian slavery and bringing them into his presence on Sinai. The laws that follow are not a means of earning divine favor but are part of God’s bounty to Israel. By keeping them, Israel shows gratitude to the LORD and brings itself into a closer relationship with its Redeemer.

On the other hand, the covenant, like ancient treaties, also has threats built into it. If the Israelites fail to keep the law, they will be punished: curses will come into play, blighting their future. The covenant will not be terminated by disobedience, but instead of bringing blessing to Israel, it (p 444) will bring suffering. The key ideas of the covenant may be set out as follows:

1. Divine grace in past history
2. Law
3. Blessing if law obeyed
4. Curse if law disobeyed

Often these ideas are not simply referred to in legal texts, but also structure them to some extent. It has been recognized that the Israelite covenant form is a cross between the form of a typical vassal treaty and a law “code” of the second millennium.

Vassal Treaty	OT Covenant	Law Code
Historical review	History of God’s grace	Historical review
Stipulations: Be loyal to suzerain	Laws	Laws
Curses if disloyal	Blessings if obedient	Blessings if obedient
Blessings if loyal	Curses if disobedient	Curses if disobedient

Not only is the OT covenant structurally a hybrid between the vassal treaty and the law code; it is also ideologically a cross between the two. Its centerpiece is numerous laws like a law code, but the most important of these laws is the demand for total loyalty to the LORD, Israel’s suzerain, just as in a vassal treaty. The first of the commandments is “You shall have no other gods before me” (Exod. 20:3). The central demand of Deuteronomy is “You shall love the LORD your God with all your heart, with all your soul, and with all your might” (6:5 NRSV).

The structural dependence of the legal collections on this pattern can be observed at the micro and macro levels. The Ten Commandments are an example of the former. They are prefaced by a historical summary of God’s grace: “I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery” (Exod. 20:2 NRSV). The Ten Commandments are themselves treaty stipulations or laws. Within them there are promises of blessing on the obedient (20:6, 12) as well as warnings of punishment in case of disobedience (20:5, 7). On the macro scale the whole of Exodus to Leviticus is cast in covenant shape. Exodus 1–19 tells the history of redemption from Egypt, and Exod. 20–Lev. 25 gives the laws that should regulate the life of the redeemed people of God. Then Lev. 26 lists blessings that the nation will enjoy if they obey the law (vv. 1–13) and the curses that will befall them if they fail to keep the law (vv. 14–45). But the best example of a covenantal outline is provided by the book of Deuteronomy: chapters 1–3 give historical retrospect; 4–26, stipulations and laws; and 27–28, blessings and curses. This covenantal thinking pervades the OT. The prophets recall God’s saving deeds for Israel, berate them for failing to keep the law, and warn that the threats in the covenantal curses will therefore soon be fulfilled. In Amos’s epigram: “You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities” (3:2 NRSV).

But this covenantal thinking is not just important for biblical theology in general; it also is vital for interpreting the law. The law is not seen as a means of gaining God’s favor: his favor is shown in the redemption of Israel and in his giving them the law. The law shows them how to “be holy, for I am holy” (Lev. 11:45 NRSV). It shows them how to live in a way that will excite the admiration and envy of the nations (Deut. 4:6). Their obedience will make it possible for God to fulfill his promise: “I will walk among you and will be your God, and you shall be my people” (Lev. 26:12).

Its Literary Context. Although covenantal principles pervade the law and the narratives are organized in patterns that reflect treaty-cum-law-code models, the laws in the Pentateuch are not embedded in straight covenant/treaty documents. Rather, the laws form part of a narrative recounting the history of Israel from their enslavement in Egypt to the death of Moses. More exactly, the Pentateuch is a biography of Moses (Wenham, Exploring): Exodus 1 tells of his birth and Deut. 34 of his death, and he is the leading human actor throughout these books. Even Genesis may be seen to be part of this biography since it gives vital background material, without which the subsequent four books would not be intelligible.

For instance, the account of creation (Gen. 1:1–2:3) ends with the institution of the Sabbath. “God blessed the seventh day and made it holy, because on it he rested from all the work of creating that he had done” (2:3). The clear implication is that human beings, made in the image of God (1:27), must imitate their Creator by also resting on the seventh day (Exod. 20:11). Genesis 2 portrays the creation of Eve out of Adam’s rib and brings her to him in the archetypal marriage. This narrative illustrates many of the principles that underlie the theory of marriage as enshrined in the laws of Leviticus and Deuteronomy: for example, marriage should be monogamous, heterosexual, and (p 445) permanent. Similarly the stories of sacrifice—by Cain, Abel, Noah, and Abraham—highlight features essential if sacrifice is to achieve its end (Gen. 4:3–7; 8:20–9:17; 22:1–19). These are just a few examples of how Genesis through its narratives inculcates principles that are fundamental to the law.

Nevertheless, in another respect Genesis relativizes the law, or at least some of the laws. Take the issue of violence. Genesis 1 seems to portray a world free of violence, where both humans and animals are vegetarian (1:29–30). However, chapter 4 introduces two murderers, Cain and his descendant Lamech, who actually boasts about his murders (4:23–24). Then as violence envelops the earth, God decides to wipe out all flesh (man and beast), “for the earth is filled with violence through them” (6:13 RSV). The only family to survive is Noah's, who was "blameless in his generation" (6:9 RSV). Genesis 9:11 promises that there will never again be a flood to wipe out all flesh. But how will the problem of violence be dealt with? What is to stop the world being engulfed again in violence?

Genesis 9:6 is the answer: "Whoever sheds the blood of a human, by a human shall that person's blood be shed; for in his own image God made humankind" (NRSV). This is the first remark in the Bible in case-law form. It expresses a principle that applies to most case law. Case law typically deals with problems that in a perfect world would never arise: murder, theft, adultery, and so on. What is to be done in such cases? Genesis 9:6 lays down the principle of proportionate punishment. Ideally, the murderer, made in the image of God himself, should not be put to death. But to stop violence from getting out of hand in the way it did before the flood, or even blood feuds in which tit-for-tat killings may continue over many years, Genesis insists that the murderer be executed. This principle of appropriate punishment runs through the case law of the Pentateuch. Cattle thieves must restore the stolen beast and several extra; arsonists must pay compensation for the damage they cause; seducers must pay the appropriate sum to the girl's father and marry her properly (Exod. 22). Ideally, the Bible would prefer that none of these things happen, that everyone should love his neighbor. But in a sinful world, laws are necessary to preserve order in society and to prevent the strong and ruthless (cf. Lamech in Gen. 4:23–24) from oppressing the weak and innocent. In this sense the literary context of the laws in the Pentateuch relativizes them: they are often compromises between God's ideals for man and the fallenness of human society.

Elements of the Law: (1) The Decalogue and Moral Injunctions

Though we have insisted that many of the case laws in the Pentateuch are essentially compromises, there is much moral idealism expressed in the law as well. Best known of course are the commands to "love the LORD ... with all your heart" (Deut. 6:5) and "your neighbor as yourself" (Lev. 19:18). But scattered liberally through the law are many other such ethical injunctions, such as these: "If you meet your enemy's ox, ... you shall bring it back to him" (Exod. 23:4 RSV). "You shall not oppress a resident alien" (23:9 NRSV).

It has been argued (Phillips, Criminal Law) that the Ten Commandments are Israel's criminal law: they enshrined the principles of the covenant, and to break any of them was punishable by death. However, this seems improbable. How could someone be convicted in a court of coveting? Rather, the Ten Commandments or the Decalogue reflect the core values of Israel's theology and moral outlook (Exod. 20). At the heart of the faith is total loyalty to the LORD: "You shall have no other gods before me." To protect the family, "honor your father and mother" and "do not commit adultery." Since life is sacred, "you shall not murder." The Ten Commandments, while hinting at God's attitude to those who flout these principles (20:5, 7), do not lay down how society should react to those who break the commandments. This is the concern of many subsequent laws within the Pentateuch.

Elements of the Law: (2) "Love the LORD Your God with All Your Heart"

After the initial section of law largely focused on the Ten Commandments and general moral principles (Exod. 20–23), the central section is devoted principally to the demands of worship. The construction of the tabernacle, in which God would dwell among his people (cf. 40:34; Lev. 26:11–12), is the principal concern of Exod. 25–40. The importance of complete loyalty to God is brought into high relief by the counterpointed episode of the golden calf in Exod. 32–34, in which the first two commandments (no other gods, no graven images) were flouted.

The focus on the correct worship of the LORD continues in Leviticus and Numbers. Laws about the proper way to offer sacrifice dominate Lev. 1–7, and the establishment of the priesthood occupies chapters 8–10. Entry into the holy shrine (p 446) demands purity, whose exact definition occupies Lev. 11–16, 21–22. Holy days for worship and holy years are the main topics of Lev. 23–25. Further instructions about worship recur in the early chapters of Numbers (e.g., 2–10, 15). In these ways the law emphasizes the centrality and paramount importance of worship. It is the way in which the people of God declare their love for God and through which his love for them is demonstrated in powerful symbols and rites.

Elements of the Law: (3) "You Shall Love Your Neighbor as Yourself"

This command is found in Lev. 19:18 (NRSV), a pithy saying that sums up much of Lev. 18–20 as well as many other elements of the law, especially in the book of Deuteronomy. Moses' exposition of the law in Deut. 12–26 seems to be based in content and order on the Ten Commandments. So from Deut. 17 to 25 the sermon seems to be a reflection on the humanward commandments, applying them to the particular problems that will face Israel in the promised land.

The Future Orientation of the Law

The law ends with Moses looking over the Dead Sea into the promised land. He must die outside the land, but the young Israel will enter the land and enjoy the fulfillment of the promises made to the patriarchs centuries earlier (Deut. 33–34). There in the land, Israel will be able to keep the law, if only they want to. Many of its provisions were quite inapplicable in the wilderness. But in the land flowing with milk and honey, these wise laws and statutes could be implemented and would enable Israel to enjoy peace with God and harmony with each other. This is the great hope of the Pentateuch, though so many of its stories recount the dashing of these hopes on various occasions.

Subsequent history has borne out this ambivalence: the Jews' fidelity to the law over many centuries has preserved them as a people despite dispersal and persecution. But complete fulfillment is as elusive as ever. The LORD promised to write the law of the new covenant on human hearts (Jer. 31:31, 33). But though the Spirit bears fruit in every believer, the church still falls a long way short of perfection. And in a world marred by sin, the law points to ideals for which people should aim and offers a way for them to do justice in situations wrecked by injustice.

Law is in frequent disfavor among many Christians. Luther's sharp law-gospel antithesis contrasts not only portions of Scripture but also approaches to it. Influential upon subsequent Protestants in particular, it may foster both neglect of the OT and ignorance of the gracious character of torah. Perhaps related is the contemporary disfavor, particularly among pacifists, into which the civic aspects of law have fallen. Hauerwas, Yoder, Hays, and others can seem to forbid torah from informing either state or church, in view of strong or even exclusively christocentric and ecclesiocentric hermeneutics. While theologian approaches must be avoided and the pluralism of contemporary cultures acknowledged, torah must not be simply dismissed. Luther himself saw that torah remains revelation; we must not neglect this provision from God for the care of all in society and the promotion of justice for all societies. This raises the complex but important theological question of whether or how biblical law might reflect a "natural law" within God's creation.

Bibliography

Alt, A. "The Origin of Israelite Law." In Essays on Old Testament History and Religion. Blackwell, 1966; Brin, G. Studies in Biblical Law. Sheffield Academic Press, 1994; Friedmann, D. To Kill and Take Possession. Hendrickson, 2002; Levinson, B., ed. Theory and Method in Biblical and Cuneiform Law. Sheffield Academic Press, 1994; McCarthy, D. J. Treaty and Covenant. Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1963; Otto, E. Theologische

Ethik des Alten Testaments. Kohlhammer, 1994; Patrick, D. Old Testament Law. John Knox, 1985; Phillips, A. Ancient Israel's Criminal Law. Blackwell, 1970; idem. Essays on Biblical Law. Sheffield Academic Press, 2002; Roth, M. T., et al. Law Collections from Mesopotamia. 2d ed. Scholars Press, 1997; Saalschütz, J. L. Das Mosaische Recht. C. Heymann, 1853; Selman, M. "Comparative Customs and the Patriarchal Age." Pages 93–138 in Essays on the Patriarchal Narratives, ed. A. Millard and D. J. Wiseman. InterVarsity, 1980; Sprinkle, J. M. The Book of the Covenant. Sheffield Academic Press, 1994; Watts, J. W. Reading Law. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Wellhausen, J. Prolegomena to the History of Ancient Israel. 1878. Meridian, 1957; Wenham, G. Pentateuch. Vol. 1 of Exploring the Old Testament. SPCK, 2003; idem. Story as Torah. T&T Clark, 2000; Westbrook, R. Studies in Biblical and Cuneiform Law. Gabalda, 1988; Whybray, R. N. The Making of the Pentateuch. JSOT, 1987; Wright, C. J. H. God's People in God's Land. Paternoster, 1990; idem. Living as the People of God. InterVarsity, 1983; idem. Walking in the Ways of the Lord. Apollos, 1995.

Gordon J. Wenham

Lectio Divina      See Liturgy; Medieval Biblical Interpretation

Lectionary      See Liturgy

(p 447)Leviticus, Book of

In the first five books of the OT, Genesis narrates events before the life of Moses, while Deuteronomy repeats the law given on Mt. Sinai for the generations after Moses. The middle three books detail the career of Moses, with Exod. 1–19 tracing it from his birth until he receives the law, and Num. 10:11–36:13 tracing it afterward until just before his death. The account of the giving of the law runs from Exod. 20:1 to Num. 10:10. The book of Leviticus, therefore, stands in the center of the law and contains many of its most striking provisions.

History of Interpretation

One early interpreter of Leviticus was Jesus, who cited Lev. 19:18: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (NRSV). Likewise, the NT book of James makes frequent positive allusions to Lev. 19 (Johnson). Often, though, the NT has to deal with issues from Leviticus that were problematic for the early church: sacrifice (Lev. 1–7), circumcision (12:3), and dietary regulations (ch. 11). Led by Paul, early Christians determined that such works were unnecessary for salvation. In addition, the early church perhaps preserved Mark 5:25–34 because it remembered the church's break with the purity rules found in Lev. 15:19–20.

Jewish interpreters also commented on Leviticus. After the destruction of the temple in 70 CE, the rabbis emphasized prayer and substituted the study of the sacrificial laws for performing the ritual. Indeed, the medieval scholar Maimonides argued that sacrifice was a concession to human frailty (to give Jews a rite similar to rites practiced by the worshippers of other deities) and never really God's intention.

Post-temple Jews had to address three other issues emphasized in Leviticus: the purity of priests, the Jewish family, and dietary regulations (Levine). Even though there was no further use for priests as officials at sacrifices, priestly families continued to hold to Levitical laws of purity, especially in regard to marriage and contact with the dead. Priests could not marry divorcees, harlots, or daughters born to forbidden unions. Adultery by the wife was the only grounds for divorce. In addition, priests were still to avoid contact with the dead, though members of the immediate family were exempted from this restriction. Preserving the purity of the Jewish family involved observing the ban on a woman's having intercourse for seven days (for her monthly period) and circumcising male babies. The dietary laws in Lev. 11 were not only retained but also carried out strictly in traditional families.

Within Christianity, Origen articulated a theory of Scripture interpretation that distinguished the literal from the more important spiritual meaning discerned by typology. Hence, the sacrifices described in Lev. 1–7 constituted a typology and prediction of Christ, whose sacrifice was superior to and fulfilled the system outlined in Leviticus.

Similar views dominated for over a millennium, but in the last few centuries the interpretation of Leviticus has come under the influence of historical, sociological, and literary theory. Based on stylistic and theological differences, scholars have for years pointed to various alleged sources for the Pentateuch (JEDP) and assigned them different dates, running from the tenth to the fifth centuries BCE. The law codes of the Pentateuch perhaps grew up independently, though often scholars identify their theology with that of a given source. Scholars adhering to this theory generally argue that Leviticus belongs to the postexilic P, or Priestly source, but think Leviticus was comprised of smaller codes, particularly the so-called Holiness Code (chs. 17–26). Among these scholars there has often been a noticeable denigration of Leviticus because of its perceived legalism and ritualism in favor of the prophets, who are thought to have better prepared the way for Jesus and the gospel.

The twentieth century witnessed an explosion of interpretative developments. Hermann Gunkel began a new form of study called form criticism, which utilized an approach to the study of oral literature developed in Germany. For Leviticus, this meant that the original setting for some laws was understood to be priestly judgments on cases brought to them, which became precedents for other people. Other laws or narratives were said to have grown up to regularize sacrifices or in defense of priestly prerogatives. That approach divided biblical books into such small units; however, reaction against it came in the form of attention to the work of editors or redactors and to the rhetorical devices that supply cohesion to books.

Other scholars have taken their cue from sociologists and anthropologists, seeking to interpret Leviticus against the backdrop of societies thought to be comparable to ancient Israel. So, for example, Douglas has subjected the dietary regulations to sociological scrutiny and observes that animals seem to be grouped into what one may call—for a lack of better terms—species and subspecies (not Douglas's terms). If a subspecies (p 448) conformed wholly to the requirements of the species, it was considered clean and could be eaten. For example, Israel seems to have thought of a species of cloven-footed, cud-chewing farm animals. Subspecies that conformed to both characteristics (e.g., sheep) could be eaten. Subspecies with only one of these characteristics were considered unclean and were not to be eaten: e.g., swine did not chew the cud and camels did not have cloven feet. Similarly, water animals should have scales and fins; those that did were clean, and those that did not were unclean. Animals that died on their own were to be considered unclean; if alive, they could be slaughtered or sacrificed and eaten. Thus, scavengers should be avoided because of their consumption of dead animals. She argues that these distinctions reflect and make specific the worldview of the priestly creation account in Gen. 1:1–2:4a.

Still other scholars advocate abandoning such enterprises altogether and approaching the text of Leviticus simply as a literary product of the postexilic period. For them, it can supply no information about the preexilic period, but can give insights into the thinking of the postexilic author(s) of the Pentateuch and the worship practices current then.

In light of these divergent interpretations, one might approach Leviticus as a book with many laws that no longer apply literally in either a Jewish or a Christian context. Nevertheless, it still retains relevance for its insistence on the worship of God and on moral living in response to God's holiness.

The Message of Leviticus

From the book of Exodus, Leviticus presupposes God as the One who has delivered Israel from bondage in Egypt and covenanted with Israel to be their God. Hence, it conceives of God as somehow resident among the Israelites in their camp (Lev. 1:1). For Israel, the implications of that residency revolve around two pairs of terms: “holy” and “profane,” “clean” and “unclean.” What is holy has been marked off or set aside for God. In Leviticus, the holy include people (the Aaronic priesthood), space (the tabernacle, which has the peculiar feature that it can be moved), implements used in worship (priestly garb, vessels of various sorts, the altar), and time (festivals, the Day of Atonement). Laws pertaining to these items appear in Lev. 1–10, 16, 23–25, and 27. In addition, things in the world are either clean or unclean. What is holy is supposed to be clean, but can be polluted by what is unclean. Hence, both sacred and nonsacred people have to be careful how they approach the holy, lest they pollute it and bring danger upon themselves and/or others. So, the book of Leviticus contains numerous laws about dealing with impurity, including diet, the purification of women after childbirth, the purification of lepers, and proper sexual relations (Lev. 11, 12, 13–15, and 18 respectively). Either priests or the people can be rendered unholy, with the result that they have to be sanctified before they can again approach the holy (Lev. 18–20; ch. 21 for priests only). Jenson has argued that this worldview actually amounted to a system running from the very holy through the holy, the clean, the unclean, to the very unclean.

One should note, however, that the term “holy” is also used of God, and not only as what is set apart for God (Lev. 19:2 et passim). God is both the source of life and the only being worthy of worship. Hence, idolatry is wrong. Moreover, to be holy as God is holy involves morality in the sense of living in proper communion with God and humans, of recognizing one’s dependence upon God and limits to one’s desires and rights, and thus the necessity for justice in human affairs. The message of Leviticus, therefore, can be summarized under four sentences that spell out the implications of the residence of the holy God among the people.

First, the people are to worship God (Lev. 1–7). This worship will take the form of a variety of sacrifices. In the “burnt offering” (1:1–17), the priests burn the entire carcass of the animal. Reasons for making this offering might include dedicating new altars or worship sites, expressing thankfulness, imploring God’s help in times of difficulty, and covering sin. The “grain offering” (2:1–16) can accompany the burnt offering, honor God, or express thanksgiving for the grain crop. In the “peace” or “well-being offering” (3:1–17 NRSV), the worshippers consume a large portion of the animal and share the best parts (fat parts and kidneys) with God. Passover seems to be such an occasion. The “sin offering” (4:1–5:13) atones for inadvertent errors in cultic practice and other inadvertent sins. It is accompanied by confession. The “guilt offering” (5:14–6:7) atones for inadvertent actions where restitution is called for. The sacrificial system does not cover intentional sins (see Num. 15:30), though God nevertheless can forgive people for such behavior.

Second, the Aaronic priests are to direct the worship (Lev. 8–10). Leviticus 8 narrates the selection, anointing, and purification of the Aaronic priesthood, while Lev. 9 describes the commencement (p 449) of Aaron’s priesthood. Two of Aaron’s sons, however, violate the altar entrusted to the Aaronites and pay for their sin with their lives. Mediating between God and the people is serious business.

Third, the people are to avoid ritual impurity and make atonement when they fail (Lev. 11–16). Avoiding ritual impurity covers various aspects of family life, even including, for example, what to do about household mold (14:34–53), which is discussed in connection with leprosy. Actions that render one impure include coming into contact with the dead or with blood. According to Lev. 16, the Day of Atonement arises upon the death of Aaron’s two sons, but it becomes a time for public repentance and community cleansing. The liturgy for the day calls upon the high priest to offer a sacrifice for his own sins, and a second one for the people. Then he is to lay his hands upon the scapegoat, symbolically laying the sins of the people upon it. He then sends the scapegoat away into the wilderness, symbolically carrying the sins of the people with it.

Fourth, the people are to be holy (Lev. 17–26). The book reaches its pinnacle in the Holiness Code. It derives its name from the oft-repeated phrase “You shall be holy, for I the LORD your God am holy” (as in 19:2). These laws forbid misdeeds ranging from sacrificing in the wrong places to committing incest to worshipping foreign deities. It prescribes the three annual feasts (Passover/Unleavened Bread, Weeks, Tabernacles). One law deserves particular attention. The so-called lex talionis (the law of the talon or claw) seems cruel to moderns who see in it “an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth” (24:20). Actually, however, it limits revenge and takes the first step toward leaving revenge to God and ultimately to forgiving one’s enemies.

Leviticus and the Canon

The canonical status of Leviticus was established by virtue of its central place in the Pentateuch. The later OT books Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah cited it. A few examples must suffice. Second Chronicles 7:9–10 describes the dedication of Solomon’s temple at the festival of Booths as sacrifices offered in accordance with laws such as those in Lev. 23:23–43. It also explains the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple as the consequence of Israel’s failure to observe the Sabbath years as commanded in Lev. 25:1–7 (see 26:27–39 for a warning; 2 Chron. 36:21). Also Ezra 9:11, part of Ezra’s penitential prayer, seems to be a fair summary of Lev. 18:24–30 and Deut. 7:1–6 combined. Ezra 3:5 appears to have in view Lev. 23, and Neh. 8:14–15 refers to the commandment in Lev. 23:42 that the Israelites live in booths during the fall festival.

The author of Hebrews dialogued with the book in his discussion of Jesus’ superiority to the old law. First, Jesus the Son of God is superior to Moses, the servant of God who received the law (Heb. 3:1–6). Second, Jesus belongs to a line of priests descended from Melchizedek, which is superior to the Levitical priests. This superiority manifests itself in a number of ways. Jesus is the perfect high priest because he is without sin (2:17–18; 4:15) and did not have to offer sacrifices to cleanse himself as the OT priests did (5:3; cf. Lev. 9:7; 16:2–14). Jesus did not simply offer an animal sacrifice; he offered himself as the perfect sacrifice (Heb. 5:7–8). That sacrifice was superior to the Levitical sacrifice because it was given once for all and did not need to be repeated (9:13–14, 25–26). Finally, Jesus is superior to Levitical priests because he has been raised to the right hand of God, to mediate an eternal covenant superior to the one given at Sinai (8:1–2; 9:15).

Leviticus and Theology

The book of Leviticus (particularly chs. 17–26) emphasizes the holiness of God as the most important theological motif. The holy is mysterium tremendum et fascinans, to use Otto’s terms.

Worshippers confront God as an overwhelming and yet appealing mystery, and then recognize themselves as creaturely. Regardless of the characteristic of God by which worshippers might measure themselves (e.g., power, knowledge, love, moral purity), God is always superior.

Leviticus is about worship. The sacrificial system is the means it outlines by which penitent sinners can express their contrition to God. It is never intended as the vehicle to buy forgiveness, as the prophets made clear (cf. Isa. 1:12–15; Amos 5:21–24). Nevertheless, it speaks the word of God that in worship people should express contrition and ask forgiveness (Lev. 1:1–2:16; 4:1–5:13), share with others and with God (3:1–17), and be prepared to make restitution for losses inflicted on others (5:14–6:7). It has a healthy appreciation for the role of ritual in living the holy life and the possibility of forgiveness when God's people fail.

Bibliography

Budd, P. Leviticus. NCB. HarperCollins/Eerdmans, 1996; Douglas, M. "The Abominations of Leviticus." (p 450)Pages 41–57 in Purity and Danger. 2d ed. Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1969; Elliger, K. Leviticus. HAT 1.4. Mohr, 1966; Gerstenberger, E. Leviticus. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 1996; Grünwaldt, K. Das Heiligkeitgesetz Leviticus 17–26. De Gruyter, 1999; Hayes, J. "Atonement in the Book of Leviticus." Int 52 (1998): 5–13; Jenson, P. P. Graded Holiness. JSOTSup 106. JSOT, 1992; Johnson, L. T. "The Use of Leviticus 19 in the Letter of James." JBL 101 (1982): 391–401; Levine, B. Leviticus. JPS Torah Commentary. Jewish Publication Society, 2003; Milgrom, J. Leviticus. AB 3, 3A, 3B. Doubleday, 1991–2001; Noth, M. Leviticus. OTL. Rev. ed. Westminster, 1977; Origen. Homilies on Leviticus 1–16, trans. G. Barkley. FC 83. Catholic University of America Press, 1990; Otto, R. The Idea of the Holy, trans. J. Harvey. 2d ed. Oxford University Press, 1923; Rendtorff, R. Leviticus. BKAT. Neukirchener Verlag, 1985; Wenham, G. Leviticus. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1979.

Paul L. Redditt

Lexicons, NT

The last half-century has witnessed a heightened interest in NT lexical and linguistic study. This has resulted in a wealth of resources for the study of NT words and idioms. Special attention has been given to the theological vocabulary of the NT, with an important bearing on the theological interpretation of Scripture.

One of the landmark publications of the twentieth century was Kittel's Theological Dictionary of the New Testament (TDNT). Thorough on issues of background, TDNT served the exegetical needs of a generation in which "biblical theology" was in vogue. James Barr's The Semantics of Biblical Language questioned some of the assumptions and methods of TDNT. Barr exposed the tendency in the dictionary toward "illegitimate totality transfer," in which the exegete assumes the same theological connotation for every occurrence of a word in the NT. He criticized the practice, prevalent in the "biblical theology" movement, of assuming that the root meaning of a word was its basic meaning (the root fallacy). He questioned the common procedure of assigning unwarranted theological overtones to some biblical words, for example, church (ekklesia). Only if the context in which the word occurs permits such an interpretation should the word be considered to carry special theological freight. A generation of commentators and exegetes heeded Barr's perceptive and humorous warnings.

The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology

reflects the chastened exegesis in the years following Barr's work. Colin Brown, the editor, notes in his introduction the new situation created by Barr's observation. Nevertheless, the contributors to this dictionary saw the need for continued attention to the theological dimension in NT lexicography. "The dictionary is expressly theological in intention. Historical, geographical and archaeological information, appropriate in a general dictionary of the Bible, is included here only insofar as it is theologically relevant."

Similarly, Baltz and Schneider's Exegetical Dictionary of the New Testament "sought to present and work out the implications of the exegetical and theological contexts of the different words, including the necessary historical backgrounds, without commitment to one particular literary theory" (1:vi). The study of a vocabulary of writings that are essentially theological cannot ignore the theological dimension. Nowhere is there a greater need to be alert to the theological element in NT vocabulary than with words and expressions that have entered the NT already theologically freighted. For example, Paul employed the words "righteousness" and "justification" in the context of an already-rich exegetical and theological tradition. This is especially the case for words taken from the LXX and already bearing special connotations. Semitic phrases like Son of Man need especially to be noted. Translating such words offers additional challenges.

Another dictionary with theological focus is C. Spicq's Theological Lexicon of the New Testament. Spicq states in the preface, "My intention is theological. What interests me is not orthographic novelties, idioms, phonetics, or declensions, but the semantics and the religious and moral sense of the language of the NT" (vii). The translator observes that the special value of Spicq's work is the use made of the nonliterary papyri, "still a largely unmined treasure for the study of early Christianity" (xii).

This focus on the papyri was given its initial impetus through the 1935 publication of Moulton and Milligan, The Vocabulary of the New Testament. This specialized resource documents the light shed on biblical words through papyri and inscriptions from the Greco-Roman world. Since then, many more documents from the era have been published, and a new and expanded dictionary is now appearing in subsequent issues of the journal Filologia neotestamentaria (Horsley and Lee). Attention in these dictionaries has been on background rather than theology.

The most widely used NT lexicon is that of Walter Bauer. First published in Germany in 1937, it appeared in English in 1957 under the editorship of W. F. Arndt and F. W. Gingrich. Subsequent editions appeared in 1979 and 2000, with F. W. Danker as the editor.

This dictionary follows the (p 451)standard philological orientation. The most striking and pleasing departure in the 2000 BDAG is the use of bold roman typeface to highlight the meanings of words and their functional usage. Numerous entries modify some older classifications that were based on mere grammatical or theological distinctions. This indicates that Danker has taken into account recent developments in lexicography and linguistics.

Chief among these lexicographic developments is the approach of Louw and Nida's Greek-English Lexicon of New Testament: Based on Semantic Domains. Primarily intended as an aid to translators, this dictionary explores the areas of overlap between similar words, and the distinctive nuances of the different NT words. It seeks to organize words along semantic rather than theological lines. This approach avoids the confusion created when so many different glosses representing diverse meanings are lumped together.

In reviewing the extraordinary achievement and lasting value of Bauer's lexicography, M. Silva nonetheless complained of "a failure to distinguish language and theology" (172). But is such a distinction possible or desirable? The study of literature that is essentially theological cannot ignore the essentially theological character of its vocabulary. The key task in NT lexicography thus remains how to evaluate and interpret the theological content of NT words. Some words have clearly entered the NT already theologically freighted ("beloved," "lift up," "righteousness"). Others will have gained theological dimensions by Christian use or coinage ("Christian"). Still others will have a heightened theological connotation, but sometimes will be used without that sense (agapē).

The science and art of discerning where the theological sense is warranted, and where it is not, is a key task facing those engaged in the theological interpretation of Scripture. This is a promising task in light of the richness of resources now available.

See also Biblical Theology; Concept; Etymology

Bibliography

Balz, H., and G. Schneider, eds. Exegetical Dictionary of the New Testament. 3 vols. Eerdmans, 1990–93; Bauer, W., et al. A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature. 3d ed. Revised and edited by F. W. Danker. University of Chicago Press, 2000; Brown, C., ed. New International Dictionary of the New Testament Theology. 4 vols. Zondervan, 1976–86; Kittel, G., and G. Friedrich, eds. Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, trans. G. W. Bromiley. 10 vols. Eerdmans, 1962–76; Louw, J. P., and E. Nida. Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament: Based on Semantic Domains. United Bible Societies, 1988; Silva, M. Biblical Words and Their Meanings. Zondervan, 1983; Spicq, C. Theological Lexicon of the New Testament. Translated and edited by J. D. Ernest. Hendrickson, 1994.

Peter R. Rodgers

Lexicons, OT

Word studies have long been a standard tool of exegetes for unlocking the truths of Scripture. Lexicons come in two main varieties: traditional philological lexicons and theological dictionaries. Although both types of reference may treat comparative Semitic data and survey the range of meaning and syntactic constructions to a greater or lesser degree, the theological dictionary ultimately aims at treating theological concepts organized around certain key words to which these are related. Thus, the theological dictionary stands in a unique, and somewhat precarious, position between that of a philological lexicon (which treats words) and a biblical theology (which treats concepts).

The precariousness of the enterprise was borne out by Kittel's Theological Dictionary of the New Testament (TDNT), which fosters erroneous approaches to theological word studies. Examples are the assumptions that etymology is an infallible guide to the "basic" meaning of a word, and that every nuance and associated concept for a word is represented in each of its occurrences. These and other criticisms were leveled at Kittel's TDNT, among other offenders of the biblical theology movement, by James Barr in The Semantics of Biblical Language. The theological dictionaries of the OT that postdate Barr's work have assiduously sought to avoid the pitfalls he outlined.

For example, the Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament (TDOT), a companion series to TDNT, explicitly states that the words are not directly related to the concepts with which they are associated, but are merely an avenue to their study: "Thus a comprehensive analysis enables a single word to reveal a bit of history, culture, religion, society, and human self-understanding" (1:v). (The German edition of this project, begun in the early 1970s, was completed in 2000, and the English version has fourteen volumes available in 2004.)

The editors (Harris et al.) of the Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament (1980) describe the work as in the tradition of the multivolume TDOT, but more "practical" and "less exhaustive" (just two volumes) than the latter. Another (p 452) similarly sized theological dictionary is the Theological Lexicon of the Old Testament (TLOT), edited by Jenni and Westermann. Published in three English volumes (1997), the work originally appeared in German in the 1970s. Writing shortly after Barr's work, the editors show an acute awareness of the pitfalls of theological lexicography.

In the preface they discuss the need to avoid the “limitations” of one particular approach to lexicography (e.g., grammatical-philological, diachronic, etc.), claiming instead “to establish and maintain as broad an approach as possible” (1:xi). The editors also acknowledge that the sentence, rather than the word, is the locus of meaning in language, and claim a unique niche for their work in taking into account the findings of form and tradition criticism.

The newest theological dictionary is the New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis (NIDOTTE), edited by VanGemeren (et al.)—and its currency is evident especially in its employment of “text” or “discourse” as the locus of meaning instead of the sentence. In several introductory articles, NIDOTTE presents the theory behind these lexicographic studies. Kevin Vanhoozer claims, “What is interesting theologically happens on the level not of the letter, nor of the word, but rather of the whole text. In other words, it is not the word or concept alone, but the word/concept as used in the context of the literary whole that is the object of understanding” (1:40). However, since the dictionary is still arranged by words, Peter Cotterell warns that “it is clearly important to understand their [i.e., the words’] status as symbols only, to be given their significances by the respective language users” (1:147). Thus, the editors of NIDOTTE point out what is true of all the theological dictionaries discussed here: although, following tradition, they are organized by individual words, these words are only “secondary symbols” of the various concepts that may be associated with those symbols by different authors at different times in different literatures of the OT. Thus, recognizing that these dictionaries in practice move from the narrow meaning of individual words to a focus on larger theological concepts allows for their responsible use.

Besides this array of theological dictionaries, there are even more traditional philological lexicons for OT study. Several prominent in English are mentioned here. The most accessible (both in size and price) remains The Brown-Driver-Briggs Hebrew-English Lexicon (1906; reprint, Hendrickson, 1979). Because of its age, however, this lexicon does not take into account the textual finds of the twentieth century, such as Ugarit and the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Thus, the recently completed Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the Old Testament (translated from the third German edition of the Koehler-Baumgartner lexicon) is important. It has recently become more accessible, published in a two-volume study guide (the standard edition is five volumes), as well as being made available in electronic form.

On the other hand, Sheffield’s ongoing Dictionary of Classical Hebrew (edited by Clines) is promising to be a mammoth project—"bloated," in the words of one reviewer (O'Connor 204). A notable feature of this dictionary is that it does not restrict its corpus to the OT, but includes Hebrew epigraphs and the Dead Sea Scrolls in its database. Yet, at the same time, it does not include any comparative Semitic data. The entries are organized in concordance-like fashion, by morphological form and syntactic constructions.

Finally, we may mention that a semantic domains lexicon for the OT is currently under way, sponsored by the United Bible Societies, under the leadership of Reinier De Blois. In the meantime, the listing of semantic domains in the NIDOTTE's fifth volume is an aid in carrying out responsible theological word studies.

See also Biblical Theology; Concept; Etymology

Bibliography

Barr, J. The Semantics of Biblical Language. Oxford University Press, 1961; Botterweck, G., H. Ringgren, and H.-J. Fabry, eds. Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament. 14 vols. Eerdmans, 1974–2004; Clines, D. J. A., ed. The Dictionary of Classical Hebrew. Sheffield Academic Press, 1993–; De Blois, Reinier. Semantic Dictionary of Biblical Hebrew. United Bible Societies, forthcoming; Gesenius, W., E. Robinson, F. Brown, S. R. Driver, and C. A. Briggs. A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament. Houghton Mifflin, 1906; Harris, R. L., G. Archer, and B. Waltke. Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament. 2 vols. Moody, 1980; Jenni, E., and C. Westermann, eds. Theological Lexicon of the Old Testament. Hendrickson, 1997; Kittel, G., and G. Friedrich, eds. Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, trans. G. W. Bromiley. 10 vols. Eerdmans, 1962–76; Koehler, L., W. Baumgartner, J. J. Stamm, and M. E. J. Richardson, eds. The Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the Old Testament. E. J. Brill, 1994; O'Connor, M. "Semitic Lexicography: European Dictionaries of Biblical Hebrew in the Twentieth Century." Pages 173–212 in Semitic Linguistics, ed. S. Izre'el. Israel Oriental Studies 20. Eisenbrauns, 2002; VanGemeren, W., et al., eds. New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis. 5 vols. Zondervan, 1997.

John A. Cook

(p 453) Liberal Biblical Interpretation

In what ways does liberal biblical interpretation (LBI) differ from other forms of biblical interpretation? An obvious answer would be that LBI is essentially "critical." There is truth in this if it is recognized that biblical interpretation has always been critical. "Critical" scholarship is understood to include studying the transmission of the biblical text, the authorship of the books of the Bible, and the problems of relating the worldview of the Bible to contemporary historical and scientific knowledge. Origen of Alexandria and Caesarea (185–ca. 254) compiled a massive work (the Hexapla) on the Greek text of the OT. Papias of Hierapolis (ca. 110) discussed the transmission of the words of Jesus and their relation to the NT Gospels. In The City of God Augustine of Hippo (354–430) discusses problems such as the creation of light before the creation of the sun in Gen. 1:3, the lengths of the lives of those who lived to hundreds of years before the flood (Gen. 5), and the existence of giants in 6:4. What distinguished LBI as it began to emerge in the late eighteenth century was not so much its results as its relation to various forms of “rules of faith” that defined Christian orthodoxy. For example, Horne’s introduction to the Bible (1:545), while strongly defending the view that there were no errors or inconsistencies in the Bible, argued that passages such as 1 Sam. 17:23–50 were out of order in their present content. In other words, Horne used what many would later consider to be the methods and results of LBI (the detection of inconsistencies and the advocacy of textual rearrangement) in order to defend the infallibility of the Bible.

The essentially thin line dividing LBI from other forms of biblical interpretation can be seen in the case of William Robertson Smith, who was tried for heresy by the Free Church of Scotland, and dismissed from his post at the Free Church College in Aberdeen in 1881. In his defense, Smith maintained passionately that the biblical criticism he practiced (he accepted his own formulation of the so-called Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis) was the continuation and completion of what was begun at the Reformation (Smith 21–24). In his view, biblical criticism was God’s gift to the church, to make it possible for the Bible to speak to his generation (see further, Rogerson, Criticism). The fundamental issue for Smith’s opponents was whether his biblical criticism was compatible with the Westminster Confession of Faith, the basis of belief for the Free Church of Scotland.

Smith’s trial and conviction point up the central issue surrounding LBI. Within what doctrinal limits, if any, should biblical interpretation be carried on? The answer is simple, or should be simple, in institutions that have a basis of belief mentioning such things as the inerrancy of Scripture or salvation only through faith in the vicarious, atoning death of Jesus. Such bases of belief provide a broad Christian framework for biblical interpretation in a situation that can also be policed, if necessary. Yet they leave open whether belief in inerrancy commits scholars to accepting the Textus Receptus of the NT as the inspired Greek version of that part of the Bible, or requires scholars to accept, say, that Paul wrote Ephesians. In institutions such as state universities, which lack or prohibit such bases of belief, or in churches where there is no means of trying scholars for heresy or no desire to do so, biblical interpretation may take more diverse forms, some with an explicitly anti-Christian agenda. Examples of the latter would be the types of feminist and liberation scholarship that aim to show how the Bible has led to the silencing of women and to the maintenance of oppressive class structures. On the other hand, biblical interpretation can be carried on in such institutions by scholars who do not feel bound by any particular bases of belief, but who regard themselves as practicing Christians. They may also believe that no sincere search for truth can lead them away from God or be harmful to the Bible, while allowing that there is always a subjective element in ideas of what is true. At the personal level, biblical interpretation may be affected by a scholar's beliefs on whether revelation is propositional or relational, and on whether the Bible primarily reveals truths about God or primarily enables God to be encountered and in some senses to be "known." It crucially also depends on beliefs about the nature and extent of divine action, with special reference to claims about the miraculous.

It can be argued that LBI—interpretation unconstrained by bases of belief—whether undertaken by believers or not, has made discoveries that have benefited all biblical interpretation. Inevitably, it has sometimes followed paths leading to conclusions that have not stood the test of time (this is true also of "orthodox" interpretation!). Yet it has ensured that biblical interpretation did not become moribund and stifled by the constraints of orthodoxies. Two hundred years of the most rigorous critical examination to which (p 454) any set of texts has ever been subjected have not harmed the Bible. Instead, this critical study has brought to light the human circumstances of the Bible's production in such a way as to point to origins that both confound human expectations and confirm the deepest human hopes. The contribution to this process of LBI has been incalculable.

See also Historical Criticism

Bibliography

Horne, T. H. An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. 5th ed. 5 vols. T. Cadell, 1825; Morgan, R., with J. Barton. Biblical Interpretation. Oxford University Press, 1988; Rogerson, J. The Bible and Criticism in Victorian Britain. Sheffield Academic Press, 1995; idem. "An Outline of the History of Old Testament Study." Pages 6–24 in Beginning Old Testament Study, ed. J. Rogerson. 2d ed. Chalice/SPCK, 1998; Smith, W. R. The Old Testament in the Jewish Church. A. & C. Black, 1881.

John W. Rogerson

Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics

One key feature of the theologies of liberation from Latin America, where the movement started, was their proposal of a new way of reading Scripture from the perspective of the poor. Such a hermeneutical process was part of a new way of developing theology that was defined by Peruvian theologian Gustavo Gutiérrez: “The theology of liberation offers us not so much a new theme for reflection as a new way to do theology. Theology as critical reflection on historical praxis” (12). This critical reflection was the result of a new political alignment (praxis) of some Christians in Latin America during the 1960s, and their critical way of reading the history of the church in that region. The Vatican II Council brought to Roman Catholicism the novelty of placing Scripture back at the heart of the theological task; the new theologies added the novelty of reading Scripture “from the underside,” from the particular perspective of those who were experiencing political, social, economic, or cultural oppression. As this new form of doing theology made its way in the academic world, it connected with proposals coming from Black, Hispanic, and Amerindian theologies in the United States; theologies in Africa, Asia, and the South Pacific; as well as feminist theologies.

The publication of a revised edition of Gutiérrez’s classic work, fifteen years after the first, was an occasion to see the wide repercussions of this theology around the world (Ellis and Maduro), and the form in which it has been incorporated in a variety of church and missionary situations. Liberation theologians would argue that their own preunderstanding of the text of Scripture includes a commitment to change situations of oppression. With that approach they neither take oppression as an unchangeable given of social reality nor do they accept ways of interpreting the biblical text that do not take into account the facts of oppression.

This new way of reading Scripture may be better perceived, for instance, in the christological proposals of liberation theologies. The Christology of Jon Sobrino, a Jesuit theologian from El Salvador, intentionally starts from the biblical text rather than from the dogmatic statements of the church. He seeks to focus on the historical Jesus in order to provide a basis for Christian action: “The course that Jesus took is to be investigated scientifically, not just to aid in the quest for truth but also in the fight for truth that will make people free” (35). Reading the text of the Gospels, with due attention to the social and political context, Sobrino emphasizes the political dimension of the death of Jesus as the historical outcome of the kind of life he lived. His suffering for the cause of justice becomes the central challenge for discipleship today. Such an approach is to be questioned if, by overemphasizing the political significance of Jesus' death, it would not pay enough attention to the biblical material about the soteriological significance of that death. This is precisely the criticism raised by evangelical scholar René Padilla (Samuel and Sugden 28).

In the development of an ecclesiology from the liberation perspective, Franciscan theologian Leonardo Boff, from Brazil, tried to articulate the experience of the basic Christian communities, the grassroots small groups in which poor people started to revive their Catholic faith, relating it to their daily experience in Latin America. For Boff, "A true 'ecclesogenesis' is in progress throughout the world, a Church being born from the faith of the poor" (9). The concept of the church as the people of God, emphasized in Vatican II, has been an incentive for new pastoral practices. But according to Boff, "True ecclesiology is not the result of textbook analysis or theoretical hypothesis; it comes about as a result of ecclesial practices within the institution" (1). He has been very critical of hierarchical authoritarianism and clericalism, which he sees practiced in the Roman Catholic Church, and proposes "new ministries and a new style of religious life incarnated in the life of the people" (10). For Boff, the key elements (p 455) in all these proposals that come from praxis are characteristics of the model of church life that we find in the NT; on the basis of the biblical material, he questions some dogmatic assumptions.

A systematic evaluation of this hermeneutic has been offered by Padilla, who starts by acknowledging a fourfold contribution of liberation theologies to the interpretation of Scripture but also places a critical note at each point. Liberation theologies rightly emphasize the importance of obedience for the understanding of truth, but their pragmatic bent is in danger of seeking to use Scripture in order to justify any practice (provided it seems to work). Second, liberation theologies rightly call our attention to the importance of the historical situation of the interpreter but, turning that situation into "the text" or the primary point of reference, they subordinate Scripture to the context, thus falling into historical reductionism. Third, liberation theologies rightly point to the importance of the social sciences for a better understanding of our contemporary situation as well as some texts of Scripture, but frequently they fail critically to evaluate the ideological presuppositions that shape the social sciences and distort their understanding of biblical texts. Finally, liberation theologies emphasize the importance of recognizing that ideologies condition the theological task anywhere and everywhere, but they fail to hear the word from the biblical text that judges every ideology (Schipani 42–46).

Emphasis on the practice of discipleship as a precondition for true knowledge of God is a common point between Anabaptist and liberation theologies. Working from that starting point, John Howard Yoder has demonstrated that it is possible to approach the book of Exodus while using liberation insights but avoiding pragmatic or historical reductionism. He demonstrates that an understanding of the exodus story in its own context must avoid the ideological approach that dilutes its unique message. If the interpreter is to take seriously the centrality of Exodus in the Hebrew canon, it is impossible to distill from the text of Scripture a timeless idea of liberation that would then be used to ratify all kinds of liberation projects in all places and forms. He reminds us, “God does not merely ‘act in history.’ God acts in history in particular ways. It would be a denial of the history to separate an abstract project label like liberation from the specific meaning of the liberation God has brought” (Schipani 84).

See also Culture and Hermeneutics; Ideological Criticism

Bibliography

Boff, L. Church. Crossroad, 1985; Ellis, M. H., and O. Maduro, eds. The Future of Liberation Theology. Orbis, 1989; Gutiérrez, G. A Theology of Liberation, trans. C. Inda and J. Eagleson. 2d ed. Orbis, 1988; Padilla, C. R. “Liberation Theology.” In Freedom and Discipleship, ed. D. Schipani. Orbis, 1989; Samuel, V., and C. Sugden, eds. Sharing Jesus in the Two Thirds World. Eerdmans, 1983; Schipani, D., ed. Freedom and Discipleship. Orbis, 1989; Sobrino, J. Christology at the Crossroads. Orbis, 1978; Sugirtharajah, R. S., ed. Voices from the Margin. Orbis, 1991.
Samuel Escobar

Life See Holy Spirit, Doctrine of the; Human Being, Doctrine of

Lindbeck, George See Language-Game; Narrative Theology; Yale School

Literacy See Reading

Literal Sense

“Write in a book what you see and send it to the seven churches” (Rev. 1:11 NRSV). The Bible is written witness to what humans have seen and heard of the God of Israel. The question, of course, is how to read the text. The literal sense has been understood as the authoritative sense of the text on which understanding is based. In the Middle Ages it was understood as the main building block for the other three senses, which were often referred to as the allegorical, tropological or moral, and anagogical. According to the literal sense, Jerusalem is the city of the Jebusites, allegorically it is the church, tropologically it is the law, and anagogically the heavenly city. The literal sense has been alternately understood as the verbal sense (the givenness of the words) or the historical sense (what really happened) or the authorial meaning (what the author really meant). Yet, the three other senses were built up from reading the literal sense and depended upon its solidity and authority for their own fluidity.

During the last decades of the twentieth century, it was the trend to prefer “Antiochene” exegesis over against “Alexandrian” exegesis because Antiochene readings were understood to focus on the literal sense of the biblical text and Alexandrian readings were regarded as “fanciful,” not tied to the firm literal sense. Such a hard-and-fast distinction is now thrown into question. And modern literary theory, from structuralism to reader response to deconstruction, has questioned the stability, indeed, even the existence of (p 456) such a notion as the “literal sense.” Instead, the role of the reader and the broader communities of faith that cherish these texts have become of greater interest than any concept of fixity in the literal sense of the text as once understood. Even modern historical criticism of the Bible has begun to lose its authority as “scientific” and “objective,” as the sole arbiter of “meaning.”

The notion of the literal sense of Scripture has received some attention lately, most notably as it intersects with typological reading. That is, the literal sense, once seen as the “historical” sense, the factual or realistic sense, is now being treated in some quarters under the rubric of “plain sense.” Plain sense can mean anything from the community’s reading to the interplay between verbal meaning and ruled reading. This second definition bears more fruit for theology and the life of faith. Ruled reading is the reading of the text that lends ultimate authority to the Rule of Faith as outlined in Ignatius, Polycarp, and most notably Tertullian and Irenaeus, for examples. For Tertullian, in his Veiling of the Virgins, the Rule of Faith is altogether one, alone immovable and irreformable; the rule, to wit, of believing in one only God omnipotent, Creator of the Universe, and His Son Jesus Christ, born of the Virgin Mary, crucified under Pontius Pilate, raised again on the third day from the dead, received in the heavens, sitting now at the right (hand) of the Father, destined to come to judge the quick and the dead through resurrection of the flesh as well (as of the Spirit). The law of faith being constant, the other succeeding points of discipline and conversation admit the novelty of correction. (ch. 1)

This precreedal yet creed-like material disallows both the conflation and separation of the two Testaments of the Bible. That is, it theologically holds together God the Creator and Jesus Christ, and hermeneutically the OT and the NT. It itself is the “law of faith,” the fixity often sought in the “literal sense,” which allows the judgment of other points of discipline and theological reasoning. That is, when authoritative reading (formerly called “literal sense”) is sought, the plain sense disallows certain nonorthodox readings. As such, the Rule of Faith is a basic “take” on the subject matter and plot of the Christian story, which couples the confession of Jesus the Redeemer with God the Creator. Since it is generally understood to be drawn from Scripture, in biblical interpretation it is reapplied to Scripture.

Notice that what becomes important here is not “meaning” or even “sense” but reading. This means that the literal sense itself is no longer the sole authoritative sense. “Literal sense” is often confined to the rubrics of verbal meaning, and plain sense is the construction of reading that takes place in the interplay between verbal sense and ruled reading. Thus, plain sense itself is an authoritative reading that takes with utmost seriousness the confession of the church at one of its earliest points.

A related set of subconcepts to reading according to the plain sense is authority and authoritativeness. Here, the normativity of plain sense reading extends from the authority of the text to the authority of the religious leader, appealing to the plain sense and/or the community in teaching and religious formation of its adherents or members. When plain sense is appealed to as authoritative sense, leaders and teachers diverging from this may lose their extended authority. Likewise, the plain sense of the text functions to control that extended authority: the authority granted to the text can guide, correct, and undercut the authority of the religious leader or community. This was the importance of the plain sense, which played a crucial role in the Protestant Reformation, undercutting the authority of the Roman Catholic leaders by reading Scripture according to the Rule of Faith: Scriptura sui ipsius interpres (Scripture interprets itself). Instead of decoupling religious authority from the story line of Scripture, Martin Luther and the great Reformers thus read Scripture according to itself.

See also Allegory; Meaning; Rule of Faith; Typology

Bibliography

Barr, J. “Literality.” Faith and Philosophy 6 (1989): 412–28; Childs, B. “The Sensus Literalis of Scripture: An Ancient and Modern Problem.” Pages 80–93 in Beiträge zur alttestamentlichen Theologie, ed. H. Donner, H. Hanhart, and R. Smend. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1977; Frei, H. “ ‘The Literal Reading’ of Biblical Narrative in the Christian Tradition: Does It Stretch or Will It Break?” Pages 36–77 in The Bible and the Narrative Tradition, ed. F. McConnell. Oxford University Press, 1986; Froehlich, K. “‘Always to Keep the Literal Sense in Holy Scripture Means to Kill One’s Soul’: The State of Biblical Hermeneutics at the Beginning of the 15th Century.” Pages 20–48 in Literary Uses of Typology, ed. E. Miner. Princeton University Press, 1977; Halivni, D. Peshat and Derash. Oxford University Press, 1991; Loewe, R. “The ‘Plain’ Meaning of Scripture in Early Jewish Exegesis.” In Papers of the Institute of Jewish Studies London, ed. J. G. Weiss. Magnus, 1964; Tanner, T. “Theology and the Plain Sense.” In Scriptural Authority and Narrative Interpretation, ed. G. Green. Fortress, 1987; Williams, R. “The Literal Sense of Scripture.” Modern Theology 7 (1991): 121–34.

Kathryn Greene-McCreight

(p 457)Literary Criticism

Although literary criticism of the Bible is most obviously a hermeneutical issue, the purpose of this article is to explore the theological implications of the topic. The rubric of literary criticism has come to encompass a far-flung range of approaches, but the starting point for any legitimate use of the designation is an acknowledgment of the literary nature of the Bible itself. Literary criticism of the Bible approaches the Bible as literature. Accordingly, the discussion that follows defines what it means that the Bible is literary and then delineates the theological implications. The perspective offered is that of traditional literary criticism as practiced by literary scholars in the humanities, with an emphasis on the unity of complete texts, not the dissecting methodology that biblical scholars have tended to mean by literary criticism.

The Bible as Literature

The overall genre of the Bible is that of a literary anthology. This means that the texts comprising the Bible (the word that means “little books”) display characteristics that have traditionally been attributed to literature. Four main traits determine that a text is literary.

The Voice of Human Experience. The subject of literature is human experience. Literature aims to get a reader to share an experience, not primarily to grasp ideas. Literature is incarnational. It embodies its ideas or meanings concretely rather than abstractly; it enacts rather than states propositionally.

Instead of stating abstract propositions about virtue and vice, for example, literature presents stories of good and evil characters in action. The command “You shall not murder” is rendered in literary form with the story of Cain and Abel, where neither the word “murder” nor a prohibition against it is explicitly stated. When asked to define “neighbor,” Jesus instead told a story about neighborly behavior (the parable of the good Samaritan). Psalm 23 incarnates the reality of God's providence in the imagery of a shepherd's daily provision for his sheep, eschewing the word "providence" and never naming the dominant mood of contentment.

The truthfulness that literature conveys is thus not only ideational but also truthfulness to human experience. Literature always has a cognitive dimension, though its extracognitive dimension is what differentiates it as an art form.

Literary Genres. Through the centuries, literature has been defined by its genres. The theological implications of a literary approach to the Bible do not predominantly lie here, but it is a major consideration in identifying the literary nature of the Bible. We know that the Bible is a literary anthology by the sheer abundance of literary genres that we find in it.

The two largest categories are narrative and poetry. A host of subgenres appear under both master genres—hero stories and parables under narrative, for example, and praise psalms and psalms of lament under poetry. Additional genres fill out the Bible—satire, visionary writing, epistle, proverb, and oratory, to name some leading ones.

Artistry. Literature is an art form, displaying beauty, craftsmanship, and technique. The writer of Ecclesiastes claims that he arranged "proverbs with great care," and further that he "sought to find words of delight" (12:9–10, ESV). Here is tribute to the purely aesthetic side of literature—its attentiveness to artistry and beauty.

Everywhere we turn in the Bible we find evidence of a commitment to the "how" of an utterance and not simply the "what." Repeatedly we find such artistic qualities as pattern, design, repetition, unity, coherence, symmetry, balance, and contrast. The specific form that these artistic qualities take is often related to the genre in which they appear, so that, for example, balance in biblical poetry most obviously manifests itself in the verse form known as parallelism.

Form. The defining principle of literature is that meaning is communicated through form. The concept of form should be construed broadly here as including everything that touches on how a writer has expressed the content of an utterance. Form is primary and precedent in the sense that interpretation must begin with it. Before we can extract the theological meaning of a literary text in the Bible, we need to interact with the surface details. These details include the characters and emotions and human experiences that are put in front of us, the genre(s) in which an utterance is embodied, and the artistry that inheres in a text. At its heart literary criticism of the Bible is committed to explicating biblical texts in keeping with their literary nature.

Theological Implications

In turning to the theological implications of literary criticism of the Bible, we do well to note that the Bible itself combines three main authorial impulses and corresponding types of content—the literary, the historical, and the theological. Although one of these usually dominates a (p 458)given passage, aspects of the other two are usually discernible. For this reason, it is entirely logical that the literary nature of the Bible should produce theological meanings.

A second preliminary point is that the theological principles that flow from the literary nature of the Bible all prove that the medium is the message. All of the theological categories discussed below are rooted in the literary example of the Bible, though they can be buttressed by explicit doctrinal passages in the Bible as well. Above all, it is crucial to acknowledge that the Bible is emphatically not a systematic theology book with proof texts attached. It instead is a literary anthology.

Incarnational Theology. The Christian doctrine that has been most often invoked through the centuries as the basis for a Christian aesthetic has been the incarnation of Jesus—God embodied in human form. This incarnation of Jesus has been a convenient model for picturing what a work of literature is, and the Bible itself in its literary form has been offered as a prime illustration. In the Bible, we find the theological truths of the faith embodied in concrete settings, characters, events, and images. As C. S. Lewis noted in a discussion of the parallelism of the Psalms, “Poetry too is a little incarnation, giving body to what had been before invisible and inaudible” (5). The parables of Jesus illustrate incarnational theology in its pure form, inasmuch as they take something as spiritual as “the kingdom of heaven” and embody that theological reality in everyday images, characters, and actions.

The incarnational nature of the Bible serves as a curb against the tendency of theologians to create a system of abstractions when talking about God and spiritual experience. As we immerse ourselves in the literature of the Bible, we are led to see that belief in God does not whisk us away to some ethereal region; instead, we see that it is in the everyday details of life that the great theological issues are lived out and resolved.

Experiential Theology. A tradition extending from the Puritans through such figures as Jonathan Edwards and George Whitefield has made much of “experimental” theology, by which is meant experiential theology. In this tradition we find typical statements: “Saints have an experimental knowledge of the work of grace” (Thomas Shepard). “If we were well read in the story of our own lives, we might have a divinity [theology] of our own, drawn out of the observations of God's particular dealing toward us" (Richard Sibbes).

The literary nature of the Bible lends support to such experiential theology. There is no more basic literary principle than that the subject of literature is human experience. Accordingly, every literary text in the Bible is at its heart a specific person's experience of God. This does not mean that those experiences are anything less than normative and universally true at a principal level. It only means that biblical theology is not a collection of free-floating ideas. Instead, it is rooted in people's experiences of God and in God's self-revelation to people, involved in their everyday situations in life.

Narrative Theology. Narrative theology springs from awareness that narrative is the overarching structure of the Bible as a whole, and additionally that stories are the most numerous genre in the literary anthology that comprises the Bible. The phenomenon of narrative theology has consisted primarily of recasting the conventional theological categories in narrative terms, with a view toward viewing theology as the story of what God does in history rather than as a list of doctrines. This is congruent with the way in which we experience God as we assimilate the narrative parts of the Bible, where we primarily understand the nature of God through his role as a character in a series of stories.

Dorothy L. Sayers has expressed in kernel form the principle underlying narrative theology: Christianity "is not primarily an emotional experience, or a set of logical conclusions, or a code of ethics: it is a story.... It is the story of God's act in history. The whole emotional, rational and ethical structure which we associate with the phrase 'The Christian religion' has to be referred to that story for its explanation and sanction" (84). In the middle of the twentieth century, G. Ernest Wright, in a book whose title summarizes his argument (God Who Acts: Theology as Recital), popularized the idea that whatever we say about God is rooted in the actions of God.

Poetic Theology. The privileging of narrative over other genres in recent literary criticism of the Bible has virtually eclipsed nonnarrative forms, particularly as they impinge on theology. But if narrative has its unique way of incarnating people's experiences of God, with attendant theological meanings, poetry also has its distinctive way of embodying truth about God as well. Amos N. Wilder coined the term "theopoetic" to denote poetry's contribution to theology, with the term defined as doing justice "to the role of the symbolic and the prerational" (2). Theology based on the poetry of the Bible extracts the intellectual and (p 459)emotional meanings of the Bible's great images and metaphors, and it encompasses the mystical dimensions of theology, as (for example) in the biblical motif of God and Christ as light.

Theology of Beauty. The literary nature of the Bible implies an aesthetic dimension as well. The word "beauty" remains the best term by which to denote the qualities of artistry and craftsmanship that are important to works of art. In addition to statements about beauty in the Bible, the literary nature of the Bible itself represents an example of artistic beauty. From this example we can infer or deduce a theology of beauty whose main components are these: (1) God is the source of beauty. (2) Beauty is an attribute of God. (3) Beauty is one of God's gifts to the human race. (4) Beauty is a means by which people can experience and worship God. Hans Urs von Balthasar's magisterial seven-volume work on "theological aesthetics" proposes in the preface "to develop a Christian theology in the light of the third transcendental, that is to say: to complement the vision of the true and the good with that of the beautiful."

More specifically, the literary nature of the Bible has been rightly invoked through the Christian centuries among aesthetic theorists who have formulated a biblically based poetic (philosophy and defense of literature). At root, such a poetic participates in a theology of the word, based on the premise that the very fact of a literary Bible shows literature to be not merely legitimate but indispensable to the Christian faith. This conclusion is buttressed by the ways in which the parables and discourses of Jesus are literary in nature. Simply put, God chose to reveal himself and his truth through the medium of literature. A literary scholar has rightly claimed that "Christianity is the most literary religion in the world: it is crammed with characters and stories; much of its doctrine was enshrined in poetry—Job, the Psalms, Song of Solomon, Revelation.... It is a religion in which the word has a special sanctity" (Broadbent 101).

Theology of Culture. Attempts to reach an understanding of how Christians should relate to culture have long sailed under the banner of "theology of culture." The thrust of this has been to answer the question of how God views human culture and accordingly how he wants his followers to view it. Literature is a cultural form. Simply by being a work of literature, the Bible implicitly affirms not only the legitimacy of culture but also its indispensability to the Christian faith. To this we can add the way in which the Bible has been the most important literary source and influence on Western literature and indeed culture.

Additionally, it is well established that biblical writers imitated and adapted literary forms of surrounding ancient cultures. For example, the Song of Solomon bears resemblances to Egyptian love poetry, and the prologue to John's Gospel echoes the Greek hymn to Zeus. At least, the employment and adaptation of pagan literary forms by biblical writers stands as an endorsement of culture in principle. Yet, as a literary model the Bible also contains limits to cultural affirmation (as seen, for example, in the limits that the Bible sets to literary realism, or its prohibition of visual images of God).

Literary Theology

Literary criticism is the analysis of texts in terms of their literary qualities. While such analysis is the scholarly domain of literary specialists, all good expositors of the Bible practice an incipient literary criticism, defined as looking closely at the literary form and content of the Bible. When such analysis is pressed in theological directions as this article has done, it yields something that can accurately be called literary theology. Literary theology is rooted in literary analysis of the biblical text. The fact that the Bible itself is a literary anthology, coupled with the way in which Scripture is the definitive source of Christian doctrine, produces a theology rooted in literature. The final lesson that literary criticism of the Bible holds for theology, therefore, is that for the majority of the Bible, literary analysis must be respected as existing logically prior to any theologizing based on it. We cannot extract theology from a story or metaphor without first interacting with the story or metaphor.

See also Formalism; Narrative Criticism; Narrative Theology; Western Literature, the Bible and

Bibliography

Alter, R. The Art of Biblical Narrative. Basic Books, 1981; Balthasar, H. U. von. The Glory of the Lord. 7 vols. Ignatius, 1982; Broadbent, J. Paradise Lost: Introduction. Cambridge University Press, 1972; Delattre, R. A. Beauty and Sensibility in the Thought of Jonathan Edwards. Yale University Press, 1968; Dyrness, W. Visual Faith. Baker, 2001; Hauerwas, S., and L. G. Jones, eds. Why Narrative? Eerdmans, 1989; Jeffrey, D. L. People of the Book. Eerdmans, 1996; Lewis, C. S. Reflections on the Psalms. Harcourt, 1958; Lindsey, F. D. "Essays toward a Theology of Beauty, Part I: God Is Beautiful." BSac 131 (1974): 120–36; Ryken, L. Words of Delight. 2d ed. Baker, 1992; Sayers, D. "Types of Christian Drama: With Some Notes on Production." Seven 2 (1981): 84–99; Sternberg, M. The Poetics of (p 460)Biblical Narrative. Indiana University Press, 1985; Stroup, G. The Promise of Narrative Theology. John Knox, 1981; Wilder, A. N. Theopoetic. Fortress, 1976; Wright, G. E. God Who Acts. SCM, 1952.

Leland Ryken

Liturgy

"O come, let us worship and bow down, let us kneel before the LORD our Maker!” “My soul magnifies the Lord, and my Spirit rejoices in God my Savior.” These words from Ps. 95:6 (NRSV) and Luke 1:47 (NRSV) call our attention to a major dimension of the response to God found in both the OT and NT Scriptures. While an ethical response and commitment to a holy life are important, these and other dimensions of faith find their focus and rationale in liturgical worship, or liturgy. By liturgy is meant communal worship offered to God rather than private prayer, though these are closely connected. The Greek words leitourgein/leitourgia were used to refer to the public duty, or work, of citizens. The translators of the LXX used these words to describe priestly service of God. In the NT they are sometimes used with a meaning of service to others (2 Cor. 9:12), but also with cultic overtones (Luke 1:23; Rom. 15:16). Closely associated with the latter usage are proseuchē (prayer) and latreia (adoration).

In the NT, in the account of the temptations, Jesus reminds Satan (and implicitly, all, including Christian disciples) that “You shall worship the Lord your God, and him only shall you serve” (Luke 4:8 RSV; Deut. 6:13). The Gospels portray Jesus’ life as a perfect fulfillment of this. He is found in the temple, his Father’s house, which he must cleanse and then replace. He prays in synagogue and fulfills the prophetic readings. He teaches his disciples to pray and sets aside time for prayer. His commitment to the divine destiny is one of obedient worship. The letter to the Hebrews asserts that Christ is a high priest and minister (leitourgos) in the heavenly sanctuary, who has offered a single sacrifice for sins (chs. 8–10). The hymn in Phil. 2 proclaims that he has been given the Name that is above every name, so that every knee in heaven and earth should bow down to Jesus as Lord. Several NT letters bear testimony to communal gatherings where hymns and psalms are sung, and where thanksgiving, supplication, teaching, instruction, and exhortation all take place. Here at least the ekklēsia echoes, and in some sense joins with heaven, both the angelic beings and elders, as depicted in Revelation, worshipping the Father and the Lamb, in, with, and through the Holy Spirit. In other words, Christian liturgy is eschatological in nature; it is an occasion when time and eternity are elided. While liturgy takes the form of human language in all its multiplicity, the people of God nevertheless have their own divine vocabulary. In the events of Pentecost, although everyone heard in their own language, what they all heard and spoke were “the mighty works of God” (Acts 2:11 RSV). Salvation history is this special vocabulary.

Since the NT era, however, churches have evolved widely differing liturgical forms. Some, such as the Eastern and Oriental Orthodox, are quite complex and exotic in their style and content. Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and Anglicans, by comparison, seem to occupy an in-between form and style. Protestant worship through Presbyterianism, Congregationalism, Methodism, to Evangelicalism, Pentecostalism, Quakerism, and the American Shakers and serpent-handlers, by comparison all have simpler forms of worship. This means that any generic description or theology of liturgy becomes difficult. Shakers, for example, communally danced to the Lord, whereas the serpent-handlers have privileged the longer ending of Mark 16, in the King James Version.

Recent ecumenical debate among many of the major churches represented in Faith and Order of the World Council of Churches has respected the many liturgical differences. Yet, there has been concern to identify a common liturgical “ordo,” or undergirding structure, of what is to be perceived in the ordering and scheduling of the most primary elements of Christian worship. These are listed as Scripture readings and preaching, yielding intercessions; and, with these, eucharistia and eating and drinking together, yielding a collection for the poor and mission in the world. It is formation in faith and baptizing in water, and ministers and community doing these together. How does some of this work out in terms of Scripture and theology?

Liturgies have a beginning, and this may be a call to worship (“Our help is in the name of the LORD,” Ps. 124:8, was the old Reformed call), or a greeting or invocation in the name of the divine Trinity (2 Cor. 1:2; Matt. 28:19). Jesus promised that when two or three are gathered in his name, “there am I in the midst of them” (Matt. 18:20 RSV). Here we must not confine our interpretation to the historical Sitz im Leben, since at best this leads to binitarianism. Here, across the Scriptures, Jesus’ “I am” echoes the “I AM” of Yahweh, the one who causes to be. But since (p 461) Jesus returned to the Father so that the Spirit might come, “I am in the midst” can ultimately only be interpreted as the Father, Son, and Spirit being present both with and to the assembled ekklēsia. Likewise, in baptism, baptism into the name of Jesus Christ (Acts 2:38) is ultimately into the triune Name (Matt. 28:19). Praise is addressed to the Father, through the Son, and in the Holy Spirit, as well as to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as consubstantial. It is true that overly frequent use of the divine names can lead to an empty formula, and the divine persons can also be known by their works. However, the attempt to exclude the divine names as “mere metaphor,” in the interests of an inclusive language agenda, seems theologically naive and a cavalier handling of Scripture. Liturgy properly understood is the occasion of an epiphany of the divine Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and where God—who is Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier—may speak to the heart, soul, and mind.

Most worship services contain a confession and absolution, or declaration of forgiveness. Any encounter with God leads to fear and unworthiness (Isa. 6:3, 5; Luke 5:8). It is right and proper therefore that in liturgy sins should be confessed, in confidence of the divine grace. Scripture asserts that sin, even unintentional, alienates, and its concealment can render worship insincere or even diabolic. But the NT presents the perfect leitourgia of Jesus as being sufficient for the sins of the whole world. Confession and absolution put into words the free forgiveness of sins wrought by the one who gave his life a ransom for many. The ministers/priests never absolve in their own right, but as articulating to the church on its behalf the eternal message of God: “Your sins are forgiven.... Go in peace” (Luke 7:48, 50).

In liturgy Holy Scripture is present in many direct and indirect ways, for example, in the singing of psalms and canticles, as well as in the reading of Scripture and preaching. Here the assembly receives both didachē and kerygma, all in a context of doxology. But the Word heard always gives rise to response. In some assemblies this may be an “altar call,” rather like the response called for in some of the sermons in Acts—“What must we do?... Repent and be baptized...” Or it may give rise to intercessions, for the church is urged to pray in and out of season, for those of the household of faith, and for all, a concrete expression of which may be giving money or goods as charity. It may result in responding to the command at the Last Supper to do this in remembrance. Many churches have recaptured the full meaning of “thanksgiving,” using eucharistic prayers mirrored on those of the rites of the fourth and fifth centuries, and of the berakot prayers of Judaism. In such prayers the salvation history of God in Scripture is articulated in doxology, with thanks for creation, for the saving work of Jesus Christ, culminating on the cross, of which the Lord’s Supper is the anamnēsis (remembrance). It may include the calling of the Spirit on the elements of the bread and wine, that communion may indeed be an encounter with the divine presence and an occasion of divine self-disclosure. Often as immediate preparation the community will pray the Lord’s Prayer. Liturgies invariably conclude with blessing, for any worship with God is an occasion of blessing. But there is also usually a sending, for worship is part of the ebbing and flowing rhythm of the Christian life. The church assembles for leitourgia of praise only to be dispersed for leitourgia in the world, which God created and for which Christ died.

Liturgy encapsulates the good news and challenge of Holy Scripture. Although many Christians read and meditate on Scripture in private and in study groups, worship is the occasion when most Christians encounter Scripture together. It is not practical to read large portions, and not all passages of Scripture have the same urgency or edification. Therefore, a selection has to be made—a canon within a canon, a lectionary. Sometimes this is done by reading through a particular book in course (lectio continua); other times selection is made according to what has developed as the liturgical year, separating out the events of the gospel for commemoration and emphasis. In this instance, Scripture is selected according to its relevance. Sometimes readings are thematic, though the danger here is that a predetermined theme may impose itself on the selection and on how the Scripture is understood. Ministers' self-selection can also be a narrowing of the canon to a personal preference of favorite passages. Use of a lectionary such as the three-year Common Revised Lectionary, used in many English-speaking churches, at least enables a wide selection of Scripture to be read.

See also Worship

Bibliography

Allmen, J.-J. von. Worship. Oxford University Press, 1965; Bradshaw, P. F. The Search for the Origins of Early Christian Worship. Oxford University Press, 2002; Carson, D. A. Worship. Baker, 1993; Senn, F. C. Christian Liturgy. Fortress, 1997; Spinks, B. The Sanctus in the Eucharistic Prayer. Cambridge University Press, (p 462)2002; idem. "Trinitarian Theology and the Eucharistic Prayer." Studia liturgica 26 (1996): 209–24; Wright, N. T. "Freedom and Framework, Spirit and Truth: Recovering Biblical Worship." Studia liturgica 32 (2002): 176–95.

Bryan D. Spinks

Locke, John See Enlightenment

Locutionary Act See Speech-Act Theory

Logic

Logic is primarily concerned with (1) validity of arguments and (2) consistency of propositions. A valid argument is one in which, if the premises are true, the conclusion cannot fail to be true. Two propositions (factual assertions) are consistent if they can both be true at the same time. The science of logic seeks to understand what makes arguments valid or invalid, and what makes propositions consistent or inconsistent.

In the study of any text, including Scripture, logic is an important hermeneutical tool. If a text says that all men are mortal, and Socrates is a man, then we may validly infer from that text that Socrates is mortal. In a sense, the text asserts, not only that all men are mortal and Socrates is a man, but also that Socrates is mortal. The conclusion is implicit in the text, and the logical argument makes that conclusion explicit. Logic, then, is a way of understanding the meaning of texts. So the Westminster Confession of Faith (1.6) locates the “whole counsel of God” not only in the things “expressly set down in Scripture,” but also in the things that “by good and necessary consequence may be deduced from Scripture.”

Human beings have been thinking logically (validly, consistently) since creation. The science of logic, the formal study of logical thought, was largely invented by Aristotle and has continued through the work of such figures as Ockham, Leibniz, Bertrand Russell, and Willard Quine. Sometimes logical theorists have tried to teach logic as a formal system analogous to Euclid’s geometry. But these systems have their limitations. For one thing, they deal only with propositions expressed in language. But human beings draw inferences, not only from language, but also from states of affairs. If I keep my car keys in only three places, A, B, and C, and I see they are not in locations A and B, I infer they must be at location C. That is logical reasoning, but I may never think to express it in a syllogism or even in language. Psychologically, it may be nothing more than a feeling that impels me from one location to another. Logical thought, therefore (I am tempted to say “logical feeling”), precedes syllogisms, arguments, and systems. And we have no reason to assume that systems of logic today are rich enough to account for all logical thinking.

Does Scripture itself warrant logic? It does not contain or recommend any particular system of logic, but it does contain logical language, representing logical thought. Further, it recommends consistency and validity as virtues. When James tells us not only to hear God’s word but also to do it (1:22–25), he is recommending consistency between our professed beliefs and our actions. When Scripture tells us not to steal, but we steal anyway, we are not permitted to excuse ourselves by renouncing the virtue of consistency. God himself proclaims that his actions are consistent with his promises and threats. When someone claims to be a prophet of God, but events occur that are inconsistent with his prophecies, these events expose the claimant as presumptuous (Deut. 18:15–22). God does not lie or deny himself (2 Tim. 2:13; Titus 1:2). Biblical prohibitions of false witness (Exod. 20:16; Eph. 4:25) emphasize the antithesis between true and false language and the responsibility of God’s people to speak consistently with the truth. Passages in which God evidently approves of untruth (as Exod. 1:15–21; Josh. 2:4–6; 8:3–8; Heb. 11:31; James 2:25; etc.) are exceptions that prove the rule: deception of the wicked (not the “neighbor” of Exod. 20:16) in these cases maintains consistency with the purposes of God and the sanctity of human life. Certainly, none of these passages says anything to discourage logical thought and action.

As for inference, we should note that Scripture is often argumentative. It not only states the truth, but it also presents reasons for believing it and acting on it. Don’t worship idols, God says through Moses, because the Lord is jealous (Exod. 20:5–6) and because God chose not to reveal his form when he met with Israel on Mt. Sinai (Deut. 4:15). Paul tells the Colossians that they should seek the things that are above, because they have risen with Christ (Col. 3:1), that they should present their bodies as living sacrifices because of the “mercies of God” (Rom. 12:1 NRSV). So Scripture presents not only authoritative truths, but also authoritative logical inferences. It is not enough to seek the things that are above; we must seek those things for a particular reason, because we have been raised with Christ. So Paul endorses the syllogism: those raised with Christ should seek the things that are above. The Colossian believers (p 463) are raised with Christ. Therefore, they should seek the things above.

Logic, therefore, is a valuable tool for theology, a way of understanding meaning from Scripture and applying it to human life. Indeed, one way to look at theological hermeneutics in general is to see it as a group of methods by which we derive logical implications from biblical texts. An interpretation of Scripture is never a mere repetition. An interpretation always uses some words different from the biblical text. But the claim of an interpreter is, in effect, that his interpretation is an expression of meaning logically implicit in the text itself.

If the work of logic in interpretation is done well, the result will preserve the truth of the original text. A valid inference from Scripture will be as true as the texts that form the premises of that inference. So the Westminster Confession, as we have seen, locates divine authority both in the express words of Scripture and in truth deduced from Scripture by “good and necessary consequence.” One is almost inclined to think that one could greatly enlarge the biblical canon, simply by producing logical inferences from the current canon.

But it is not that easy. There are limitations and dangers in logical inference, sufficient to make clear that such ambitions to enlarge the canon are mere fantasies:

1. Although logic itself preserves truth, human users of logic are fallible. Logic preserves truth only when it is done rightly. But theologians and exegetes make mistakes in their efforts to reason logically. So believers in the infallibility of Scripture must make a sharp distinction between the authority of the biblical texts and that of postcanonical theology. Logical inference ideally preserves the truth of premises in its conclusions, but such inferring, as actually practiced, does not necessarily preserve truth. That limitation pertains to all methods of interpretation. In this respect, logic is no different from textual criticism, translation, paraphrase, commentary, or theological analysis.

2. The fallibility of the practice of logic extends also to logical systems. Like all sciences, the science of logic has a history. Aristotle's system of logic is different at points from those of Ockham, Russell, and Quine, and it sometimes generates different inferences than other systems. There is no reason to suppose that anyone has yet come up with a perfect system of logic.

3. As mentioned earlier, logicians have not yet systematized all forms of logical thinking under axioms, rules, and laws of thought. So there may be legitimate inferences (from Scripture or other texts) that cannot be justified by current logical theory.

4. Sometimes arguments that appear to be logically valid on closer inspection turn out to be invalid. An example would be: All human beings have sinned (Rom. 3:23); Jesus is a human being (1 Tim. 2:5); therefore, Jesus has sinned. The logic here appears valid. But a major rule of logic is that for such a syllogism to be valid the quantifier ("all" in this case) must include the objects to which the conclusion is applied. In this example, it is clear that Paul was not thinking of Jesus when he wrote that "all have sinned." Nor did he mean to deny the sinlessness of Christ, which he affirms in 2 Cor. 5:21 with other NT writers (John 8:46; Heb. 4:15; 7:26; 1 Pet. 2:22; 1 John 3:5). Here "all" does not have the universal force it would need to make the syllogism valid.

Another rule of logic is that in a valid argument the terms must preserve the same meanings throughout the argument. One might argue: everyone who believes in Christ has eternal life (John 3:16); some believers said that Jesus had a demon (8:31, 48); therefore, some who believe Jesus has a demon have eternal life. The argument appears valid, but on closer inspection we note that it equivocates on the word "believe," since the Gospel writer himself uses "believe" in several senses. So, determining logical validity is sometimes more complicated than it may appear on the surface.

5. Indeed, what the above examples prove is that the right use of logic presupposes the right use of other means of interpretation. In the first example, it is not enough to know the rules of logic. One must also understand the language well enough, and indeed know enough about biblical Christology, to know the likely range of “all” in Rom. 3:23. Likewise in the second example: to see what is wrong with it, we must understand that the meaning of “believe” varies in Johannine use, and that it likely has a different meaning in John 3:16 from the meaning it has in 8:31. Hence, right use of logic assumes a right understanding of language. Since I observed earlier that logic itself is a tool in the interpretation of language, we should draw the conclusion that knowledge of logic and language are mutually dependent.

6. Emerging from this discussion is the broader point that logic is in many ways dependent on other kinds of knowledge. Logic itself rarely supplies the premises of logical arguments. Those premises come from many sources, such as observation (p 464), reasoning, imagination, emotion, authority, and study. The use of logic, then, depends on empirical knowledge, among other things. Philosophers have often claimed that logic is entirely a priori, not dependent on experience. Even if that is true of logic as an abstract system, it is not true of logic in actual practice. A logical argument will not yield a true conclusion unless its premises (usually derived from some source other than logic) are true.

7. Is the Bible logical, then? Granted that God is logical, and that Scripture is God’s infallible word, the (logical!) conclusion follows that Scripture is logical. That is, its teaching is logically consistent, and its arguments are valid. But given the problems noted above in the actual practice of logic, we should not be surprised to find in Scripture what Cornelius Van Til called “apparent contradictions.” These apparent contradictions are due not to logical errors in Scripture itself, but to our fallibility in interpreting and applying Scripture. The examples of number 4 (above) may be reconceived as apparent contradictions: Christ is (Rom. 3:23) and is not (2 Cor. 5:21) a sinner; belief in Christ does (John 3:16) and does not (John 8:31–58) lead to eternal life. Better hermeneutics and logic can resolve these “apparent contradictions.” But other apparent contradictions may not be resolvable except in the mind of God. The most difficult logical problems are the doctrine of the Trinity, the relation of divine sovereignty and human responsibility, the goodness of our first parents and the sin they committed, and the problem of evil. I see no reason why theologians should not attempt to resolve these as they have resolved the others, but there is no guarantee that we will be able. Perhaps the resolution of some of these paradoxes awaits the next life, or perhaps only God’s perfect logic has the answers.

See also Epistemology; Philosophy; Proof Text; Truth

Bibliography

Clark, G. Logic. Trinity Foundation, 1985; Copi, I. Introduction to Logic. Macmillan, 1972; Frame, J. Cornelius Van Til. P&R, 1995; idem. Doctrine of the Knowledge of God. P&R, 1987; Quine, W. V. From a Logical Point of View. Harper & Row, 1961; Van Til, C. A Christian Theory of Knowledge. P&R, 1969.

John M. Frame

Logion      See Gospels; Jesus, Quest for the Historical

Logocentrism      See Deconstruction; Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation

Lord's Supper

The Lord's Supper—also known to theological discussion as the Mass, the Eucharist, and Holy Communion—has been a contentious practice in the history of the churches. A relatively few clear biblical references to the Supper have provided a platform for a large amount of varied theological superstructure. For example, a difference in understanding the Supper was one of the sticking points between the Reformers of the sixteenth century and their Catholic counterparts and even among themselves. The “Supper strife” between Luther and Zwingli over Hoc est corpus meum comes to mind (Mark 14:22 Vulg.). Indeed, some contemporary churches such as the Salvation Army do not celebrate the Supper.

The Lord's Supper in the Biblical Texts

Each of the Synoptic Gospels contains a Last Supper narrative (Matt. 26:17–30; Mark 14:12–26; Luke 22:7–23). In the context of a Passover meal, Jesus took bread, and having given thanks, he broke it and gave it to his disciples and commanded them to eat. Likewise, he did so with the wine and commanded them to drink. He referred to his body given and his blood shed. He spoke of the kingdom of God and his future in it, the forgiveness of sins, and of a new covenant in his blood. John's Gospel has no such narrative. Yet, many have seen, rightly or wrongly, a veiled reference to the Eucharist—from eucharistia, used in the NT with the general meaning of “thanksgiving,” and first appearing as a technical term for the Lord's Supper in the early-second-century Didache—in Jesus' claim to be the bread of life come down from heaven and the necessity of eating his flesh and drinking his blood to have eternal life (John 6:22–59). Some also have seen a eucharistic reference in the Lukan story of Cleopas and friend encountering the risen Christ on the road to Emmaus. The Lord was recognized in the breaking of the bread (24:28–31). There was something familiar about the pattern of the risen Christ’s activity.

Acts and Paul’s First Letter to the Corinthians are important additional sources. Acts contains three possible eucharistic references. The first is, so some argue, a result of Peter’s address at Pentecost. The first converts broke bread together, understood in this view as a regular celebration of the Lord’s Supper (2:42), and a later meal at Troas shows the continuation of the practice (20:7). The (p 465)third is even more allusive. Paul broke bread the night before the ship carrying him under guard to Rome was wrecked (27:35). The Corinthian reference is a fulsome one (1 Cor. 11:17–34). Paul states that in the Lord’s Supper—a term we owe to this passage (kyriakon deipnon)—Christ’s death is proclaimed until he returns. A further possible epistolary source is Jude 12. Jude writes of the abuse of love feasts, and if there is a parallel to the pastoral situation at Corinth with regard to the abuse of the Supper, then the Lord’s Supper took place in the context of a fellowship meal in these early churches.

The Theological Interpretation of the Lord’s Supper

Dominical command and subsequent Pauline practice suggest that the Lord’s Supper is no mere first-century curiosity but an ongoing ordinance of the church. The Pauline presentation in 1 Cor. 11 is of particular importance in showing how the Last Supper has become the Lord’s Supper. Paul spells out the moral concomitants of the Supper in a context of abuse. Gluttony and disregard of the body of believers have no place at the meal and had occasioned the Lord’s judgment at Corinth. Some of the Corinthians had actually died. The kerygmatic nature of the practice is also highlighted. In Augustine’s fine words, the Lord’s Supper is a “visible word.” The gospel is dramatized for believers in bread and wine as the consumption of the elements preaches (katangellein) to our senses the gospel of his once-and-for-all sacrifice for our sins. This kerygma is given an eschatological frame of reference as Christ’s death is so proclaimed until his parousia.

The content of the biblical testimonies makes it hard to see any justification for the idea of the Mass as a propitiatory sacrifice (a repetition or representation of Calvary) or notions of eucharistic sacrifice (the sacrifice of praise becoming a part of Christ’s eternal offering of praise to the Father, or the rite as a pleading of his sacrifice before the Father). Instead, the biblical accents fall on what God in Christ’s death has done for us rather than on what we do—except by way of remembrance. Not that the risen Christ is absent from the Supper. Now at the right hand of the Father, he relates to us by way of sign (sacrament), and we are to meet with him by faith. Over time, the discussion of Christ's words of institution—"This is my body" and "This is my blood"—has generated many sophisticated ideas of Christ's presence, such as the miracle of transubstantiation (as in Aquinas), consubstantiation (as in Luther), transvaluation (as in Spens), and transignification (as in Schillebeeckx). None of these ideas is obvious in the scriptural record.

At this point, a general challenge to the theologian is the nonpostulational character of Scripture. The biblical writers show no real interest in speculating about the essences of things. Much of the postbiblical theological discussion addresses this lack of interest. Specifically with regard to the Supper, the biblical record leaves much unanswered, such as the relationship between baptism and communion (with regard to ecclesiastical unity, Eph. 4:4–6 lists baptism but not the Lord's Supper, interestingly), the frequency of communion, who should preside at the Supper, and the nature of the wine to employ, to name but a few. Still further, there is surprisingly no explicit connection made in Scripture between the Spirit and the Supper. Yet for Calvin, for example, the Spirit is the key to understanding Christ's presence in the Supper. How the Supper is to be understood trinitarianly in a scripturally well-founded way remains a project.

See also Sacrament

Bibliography

Macquarrie, J. A Guide to the Sacraments. SCM, 1997; Marshall, I. H. Last Supper and Lord's Supper. Paternoster, 1980; Schillebeeckx, E. The Eucharist. Sheed & Ward, 1968; Spens, W. "The Eucharist." In Essays Catholic and Critical. SPCK, 1926; Stibbs, A. Sacrament, Sacrifice and Eucharist. Tyndale, 1962.

Graham A. Cole

Love

The idea that love should direct the interpretation of Scripture is distinctively Augustinian. Near the end of the first book of De Doctrina Christiana, Augustine links Jesus' twofold great commandment (Matt. 22:37–40) with Paul's claims in Romans that "Christ is the end of the law" (10:4) and "love is the fulfilling of the law" (13:10 NRSV). "It is to be understood that the plenitude and the end of the Law and of all the sacred Scriptures is the love of a Being [God] which is to be enjoyed and of a being [our neighbor] that can share that enjoyment with us" (Doctr. chr. 1.35.39). He then applies this insight to the interpretation of Scripture:

So anyone who thinks that he has understood the divine Scriptures or any part of them, but cannot by his understanding build up this double love of God and neighbor, has not yet succeeded in understanding them. Anyone who derives from them an idea which is useful for supporting this love but fails (p 466) to say what the writer demonstrably meant in the passage has not made a fatal error, and is certainly not a liar. (1.36.40)

Soon thereafter Augustine shows that he is not unconcerned about “what the writer demonstrably meant”:

[If the interpreter] is misled by an idea of the kind that builds up love, which is the end of the commandment, he is misled in the same way as a walker who leaves his path by mistake but reaches the destination to which the path leads by going through a field. But he must be put right and shown how it is more useful not to leave the path, in case the habit of deviating should force him to go astray or even adrift. (1.36.41)

This “going astray” often happens, says Augustine, in the following way. Disregarding the purposes of Scripture’s authors—and more importantly, disregarding the purposes of God as the true Author of the whole of Scripture—a reader can reach an interpretation that seems to build up love. But when he then reads further in the Bible, he may find “other things which cannot be reconciled with that original idea.” When this happens, he is extremely reluctant to abandon his interpretation, in which he takes prideful satisfaction, and “by cherishing his own idea he comes in some strange way to become more displeased with Scripture than with himself” (1.37.41).

For Augustine, then, love is the sovereign principle of interpretation; however, readers may easily misunderstand what love actually is. In order to grasp the nature of love properly, they must submissively seek to understand the whole of Scripture. Augustine is inscribing a kind of hermeneutical circle here: readers must read lovingly in order to receive the biblical message of love, but the more clearly they receive that message, the more lovingly they will be able to read. As Augustine explains in some detail later in On Christian Teaching, an interpreter experienced in charitable reading will be unlikely to attribute absurdity or malice to God, even if a particular passage might seem at first to indicate just that. Familiar, especially to readers of Luther, are the convictions that the meaning of Scripture is whole and unified, and that Scripture interprets itself. For Augustine, these convictions are corollaries or derivatives of the encompassing belief that love is “the end of the commandment” to love God and neighbor, and therefore the end of the whole of Scripture (summarized in Doctr. chr. 2.9.14).

Ideas similar to these may be found throughout the history of precritical exegesis, and also in accounts of literary reading. Philo of Alexandria’s allegorical interpretations of Genesis establish a pattern of reading (later widely employed among Christian scholars) that “saves” the biblical text from scandal and offense; likewise, Basil the Great counsels an “equitable” way of reading Homer that renders that authoritative text usable for the Christian reader. But Augustine’s explicit invocation of love seems to be unique among early theologians.

It has remained, strangely enough, one of the least explored of Augustine’s major ideas. “Charity” as a principle of interpretation returns in the twentieth century in the work of the philosopher Donald Davidson, but Davidson is not referring to caritas, Christian love; he simply means that we come to a conversation with the assumption that our interlocutor speaks intelligibly. Sometimes we abandon that assumption, but only with great reluctance and only after striving to find some way to reconcile our interlocutor’s words with what we take to be intelligible utterance. For Davidson, this is not a discipline we undergo but just what we all do, instinctively and universally. Therefore, Davidson’s “principle of charity” could scarcely be more different than Augustine’s model, which requires spiritual training and discipline and a commitment to obeying God.

Only a few recent scholars (e.g., Fortin; Glidden) have sought even to explore Augustine’s idea; still fewer have sought to consider what it might mean to put it into practice. Kevin Vanhoozer has done so in a comment on the interpretation of any text: “General hermeneutics is inescapably theological. Our polluted cognitive and spiritual environment darkens understanding—of all texts.... Understanding—of the Bible or of any other text—is a matter of ethics, indeed, of spirituality. Indeed, interpretation ultimately depends upon the theological virtues of faith, hope, and love” (“Spirit,” 161). Despite this welcome and important point, we must still wait for scholars to consider with full seriousness the idea that interpretation of Scripture—like all other human activities—must be governed by a commitment to Christian love, that love upon which, we should remember, depend all the Law and Prophets.

See also Augustine; Virtue

Bibliography

Augustine. On Christian Teaching, trans. R. P. H. Green. Oxford University Press, 1997; Basil. St. Basil the Great to Students on Greek Literature, ed. E. R. Maloney. American Book Co., 1901; Davidson, D. “Radical Interpretation.” Pages 125–40 in Inquiries into Truth and (p 467) Interpretation. Clarendon, 1984; Fortin, E. “Augustine and the Hermeneutics of Love: Some Preliminary Considerations.” Pages 1–21 in The Birth of Philosophic Christianity. Rowman & Littlefield, 1996; Glidden, D. “Augustine’s Hermeneutics and the Principle of Charity.” Ancient Philosophy 17 (1997): 135–57; Jacobs, A. A Theology of Reading.

Westview, 2001; Vanhoozer, K. “The Spirit of Understanding: Special Revelation and General Hermeneutics.” Pages 131–66 in Disciplining Hermeneutics, ed. R. Lundin. Eerdmans, 1997.

Alan Jacobs

Lubac, Henri de See Medieval Biblical Interpretation

Luke, Book of History of Interpretation

Early interpretation of Luke included meditation on its significance as one strand of the fourfold Gospel. Each Gospel was assigned a unique purpose, sometimes linked with a traditional symbol—in Luke’s case, the ox. Thus in Ambrose, Augustine, and Bede, a connection is made between the symbol of the ox and the Evangelist’s emphasis on the temple, the place of animal sacrifice (1:5–25; 2:22–52; 13:35; 24:53). This is seen as reflecting the truth of Christ’s mediation as sacrificial victim and high priest (Wright 68–69).

The discernment of pattern and purpose in Scripture, attributed to divine authorship, reached new sophistication in medieval times and is well represented by Bonaventure’s commentary on Luke. His reading of 4:18–21 treats Jesus’ “sermon” in Nazareth as not only programmatic for his ministry, but also descriptive of Luke’s purpose in writing. Thus, Luke’s Gospel itself is read as offering “good news to the poor.” Luke’s purpose is construed as manifesting truth, healing infirmity, and pointing to eternity. These three are interwoven: it is through knowledge of the truth that we find healing, a healing that will only be complete hereafter. Jesus’ ministry is thus represented as being recapitulated by Luke for a far wider public, whose eternal benefit, conversely, finds symbolic expression in the transformations wrought by Jesus while on earth. The traditional identification of the Evangelist with the “beloved physician” of Col. 4:14 assists this rich reading of the many-layered significance of the Gospel (Wright 71).

The historical interest of Luke, clearly stated in 1:1–4 and exemplified in his careful (if not completely accurate) dating statements of 2:1–2 and 3:1–2, naturally started to claim greater attention with the advent of modern historical sensibilities. Some conservative scholars have used this historical interest as an argument for Luke’s historical accuracy. Scholars who recognize Luke’s careful artistry, however, have tended to see the heavy hand of the theological interpreter in Luke’s “historiography.” Thus, Luke and its companion volume, Acts, have sometimes been taken as evidence for an “early Catholicism” that supposedly departed from the radical gospel of Paul, accommodating itself to the nonappearance of Christ in glory, and putting greater emphasis on the institution of the church and its organic relation to Judaism.

So Luke's "history" could be seen not so much as a sober record of the facts but as a placement of Jesus and the early church within a framework of "salvation history." This was the position of Rudolf Bultmann and Hans Conzelmann. Conzelmann read in Luke the portrayal of a Jesus who stood "in the middle of time" as the fulfillment of Israel's history and the seed of the church's.

More recently, both "conservative" and "liberal" approaches have given way to more nuanced appreciations of Luke's historical, literary, and theological achievements. The contours of "salvation history," which Conzelmann and others saw as Luke's artifice, Oscar Cullmann saw as, in essence, common to the perspective of early Christianity generally and indeed Jesus himself (Marshall 81–83). It is recognized that theological purposes do not necessarily conflict with historical ones: indeed, the "facts" of Jesus are of fundamental importance for theology, according to Luke. But neither does historical purpose necessarily imply complete accuracy according to modern canons. With literary skill (see esp. Tannehill) Luke weaves together the story as he has received it and its meaning as he believes it to be.

The Message of Luke

Luke's "message" is a story, an "orderly account" of events to give its recipients a secure basis for faith (1:1–4). "For Luke, ... narration is proclamation" (Green, Theology, 19).

The core of Luke's narrative is shared with Matthew and Mark, and its basic shape with John. Jesus of Nazareth proclaimed God's kingdom, called and taught disciples, restored the victims of spiritual, physical, and social dysfunction, encountered opposition, was crucified, and rose from death. We will concentrate on Luke's particular emphasis in telling this story.

The Setting: Jewish and World History. After the elegant Hellenistic prologue in 1:1–4, we are transported back into the world of the Jewish (p 468) Scriptures. Chapters 1 and 2 recount the births of Jesus and his precursor John in a manner reminiscent of marvelous OT birth stories (e.g., Judg. 13:2–25; 1 Sam. 1:1–2:10; Drury 46–66). Throughout the Gospel scriptural echoes underscore the continuity between Jesus' story and that of Israel, as well as contrasts (Jesus' virgin birth, for instance, is unique; Green, Theology, 24–28).

Luke 2:1–3 and 3:1–3 remind us of the contemporary political context in which these boys were born, that of Roman rule over Palestine. The genealogy (3:23–38), in which the “ancestry” of Jesus (via his foster father, Joseph) is traced all the way back not just to Abraham but to Adam, seals this emphasis. Jesus is the heir to human destiny as well as Jewish hopes (cf. 2:32).

The Anointed One. Like the other Evangelists, Luke testifies that Jesus is Israel’s Messiah. In common with Matthew and Mark, he records Jesus’ extreme reticence to claim this title for himself before his death, but acceptance of it on the lips of Peter (9:20–21) and of the closely related title “Son of God” from the Sanhedrin (22:70). Unique to Luke are the angels’ announcement that “Christ the Lord” is born (2:11), the revelation to Simeon that he would not die before he had seen “the Lord’s Christ” (2:25–38), and the explanation by the risen Jesus of how he has fulfilled the true destiny of the Messiah (24:25–27, 45–47). Jesus’ coming is the occasion for joyous celebration, the first taste of the longed-for messianic feast (2:10; 13:17; 15:1–2, 7, 10; 19:6, 37; 24:41).

The Vocation of a Prophet. For Luke, Jesus’ prophetic anointing and calling are central to his messiahship (Tuckett 61–62). By contrast, although Gabriel tells Mary that her child will have an everlasting throne (1:33), Luke’s portrayal of Jesus as King is ironic. The crowds cry, “Blessed is the king who comes in the name of the Lord!” (19:38), but Jesus is on a donkey, not a royal charger. Before Pilate, Jesus is accused of claiming “to be Christ, a king” (23:2)—just before he is led out to die.

But there is no irony in the portrayal of Jesus as the prophet par excellence. His link with the prophetic outpourings of the past is emphasized by the “prophecy” of Zechariah before his birth (1:67–79) and his own implicit self-comparison with Elijah and Elisha (4:25–27). His sense of uniqueness is seen in 4:21, where he declares that Isa. 61:1–2 is fulfilled “today” in his own Spirit-inspired proclamation. After his death he is recalled as “a prophet, powerful in word and deed” (24:19; cf. 7:16).

“Powerful in Word.” Jesus comes to “declare good news,” “proclaim freedom,” “proclaim the year of the Lord’s favor” (4:18–19). This “word” ministry is evident throughout the Gospel. Jesus’ announcements of what God is doing in salvation and judgment are combined with challenges to join in with God’s work.

Luke gives us the largest number of Jesus’ narrative parables. These sound a subversive note of both hope and warning. God is pictured at work in surprising ways, to vindicate those who cry out to him in their need for justice and mercy, and disturb those who think they are secure (e.g., 18:1–14). Like Second Isaiah, Jesus discerned light where many saw only gloom. He also, like Jeremiah, discerned judgment impending in the place where many pinned their hopes—the holy city and especially the temple (13:34–35; 19:41–44; cf. Jer. 7:1–11).

Jesus’ prophetic words not only concern God’s activity. They also contain an immediate challenge for radical generosity and forgivingness, going right against the grain of entrenched social positions and attitudes (Green, Theology, 16), as especially seen in 14:7–24.

“Powerful in Deed.” Jesus comes “to release the oppressed” (4:18). To reassure John’s messengers, he performed many cures there and then (7:21). A typical act was release of a crippled woman from her bondage—physical, social, and spiritual (13:10–17).

Jesus acts as Savior (2:11). Here there are overtones of the leadership and protection that God provided and promised to his people in OT times (cf. 1:69–71). But his “salvation” does not come through military prowess. It occurs as the physically weak, socially ostracized, and morally degraded find a new dignity and place in the community through relating to Jesus. “Your faith has saved you,” he says to the “sinful woman” who anoints his feet (7:50). In Jesus, “salvation” comes to Abraham’s children, even immoral folk like Zacchaeus, resulting in new justice and generosity (19:1–8).

The forgiveness of sins, especially evident in Luke as central to Jesus’ ministry (in particular see 7:41–49; 15:1–32), is much more than restoration of inward peace with God, though it is not less than that. It involves the establishment of a new state of fellowship in the community and signals Israel’s renewal. It is not “cheap grace” that demands no repentance, but a forgiveness propelled by a new “economy of grace, inspiring repentance” (Barton). This work of Jesus is to (p 469)continue, as “repentance and forgiveness of sins” are preached to all nations (24:47).

The Way to and of the Cross. Jesus’ calling is that of the lonely prophet. He meets rejection among his own countryfolk (4:28–30). In 9:51 he “set[s] his face to go to Jerusalem” (KJV)—for, as he wryly remarks, “no prophet can die outside Jerusalem!” (13:33).

There he will, indeed, meet a lonely death, fulfilling his “exodus” (9:31 Greek) and liberating his people. But Jesus’ literal “way to the cross” is mirrored in “the way of the cross,” which he calls the disciples to travel. Luke’s narrative of the journey to Jerusalem (9:51–19:27) includes much teaching on the nature of discipleship. Jesus takes his people with him out of bondage to a new promised land. The travels of Paul in Acts, and especially his final journey to Rome (chs. 27–28), recapitulate Jesus’ own journeying and suffering, suggesting the oneness of Christian disciples with their Master.

The disciples are presented in a positive light when compared to Mark and Matthew. Luke does not even mention Peter's objection to Jesus' talk of his death and Jesus' rebuke (cf. 9:18–27 with Mark 8:27–38//Matt. 16:13–18, 20–23). To some extent, therefore, disciples in Luke are exemplary figures for the church. They are those who are traveling the way of Jesus. According to Luke, discipleship means giving up “all” in a quite literal sense (5:11, 28; 14:33; 18:22; Tuckett 96–97). Jesus' way is lonely, but there are others who were at least beginning to accompany him, and Luke wants his readers to join in the journey, taking up the cross “daily” (9:23).

Luke's portrayal of Jesus' suffering and death is well summed up by the centurion's comment: “Surely this was a righteous man” (23:47). Luke accents not so much the anguish of the cross as the innocence and compassion of its victim (23:4, 15, 22, 28, 34). In his dying moments Jesus entrusts himself to the one he had always known as “Father” (23:46; cf. 2:49; Ps. 31:5). Like the other Evangelists, Luke is understated concerning the significance of Jesus' death. But he makes clear that it was utterly undeserved. Therein lies Luke's clue to the resurrection and all that would ensue (cf. Acts 3:14–15).

Luke in the Canon

The Biography of Jesus. To Luke we owe the stories of Jesus' birth in a manger and childhood (ch. 2), his meeting with two disciples on the Emmaus road (24:13–35), and his ascension (24:51). The inclusion of these events gives narrative completeness to his Gospel. It also grounds theological conviction about Jesus in the circumstances of his human life. It is true that belief in the incarnation does not depend on the story of the virgin birth, and that belief in the universal rule of Jesus does not depend on the story of the ascension. Yet these stories remain appropriate and enduring symbols of these truths, and are told with a lack of mythological elaboration that suggests they are based on faithful tradition.

Women. The prominent part played by women throughout the story is one of Luke's unique contributions to our vision of Christian discipleship.

Mary, Jesus' mother, is favored with an angelic visit (1:26–38), actively cooperates (1:38), and praises God (1:46–56). Women make an important contribution to the mission of Jesus and the Twelve (8:1–3). Jesus affirms the (normally male) role Mary of Bethany has chosen as a learner (10:42). A story of a woman is often paired with one of a man (e.g., 7:1–10, 11–17; 15:3–7, 8–10; Donahue 135).

Israel and Church: Continuity and Transformation. Luke's portrayal of the Jewish people and their leaders is in some ways more sympathetic than that of the other Gospels. Some Pharisees are friendly to Jesus (13:31), and he eats with them, even though he also castigates them (7:36–50; 11:37–54; 14:1–24). The disciples' worship in the temple is seen as continuous with that of godly Israelites before Jesus appears (1:8–10; 24:53). Jesus is viewed as respectful of traditions, bringing fulfillment and development rather than an overthrow of old ways (Thielman 135–67).

Nevertheless, Jesus' words and acts in Luke subvert any limitation of God's purposes, or God's people, to the Jewish race. Luke does not read back a full-blown "mission to the Gentiles" into Jesus' ministry. But Jesus suggests that a Samaritan might keep the law (10:30–37; cf. 17:15–18) and forbids the disciples to call down punishment on an unwelcoming Samaritan village (9:51–55). He welcomes those on the margins of Jewish society, tainted by their regular contact with Gentiles, in table fellowship (5:27–32; 15:1–2; 19:1–10) and in narrative (e.g., 15:11–32; 16:1–8; 18:9–14).

A Kingdom of Reversals. Luke's Jesus proclaims "the good news of the kingdom of God" (4:43). Luke, with his accounts of the "acts of Jesus" in both his earthly ministry and his Spirit-filled church, has been seen as toning down the austere apocalyptic expectation evident in Mark. He points to the reality of the kingdom in the present and supposedly makes its future consummation (p 470) a far-distant event (Conzelmann 101–25; critiqued in Marshall 130–31).

But the difference is simply one of degree. Luke indeed has the saying "the kingdom of God is within you" (or "among you," 17:21 NRSV). But he also has apocalyptic passages (17:22–37; 21:5–38), and as in Matthew and Mark, these have a clear first focus in the disaster that Jesus foresees coming on Jerusalem. Probably Luke's readers, unlike Mark's, would know that this prophecy had been fulfilled—so Luke could place more emphasis on the present evidence of the kingdom, in both judgment and grace. But the kingdom, Luke knew, had not yet come in final fullness (21:9), and in his own day he would have been well aware of the persecutions and temptations that signaled the urgency of the times (12:35–59).

So the distinctive Lukan insights concerning the kingdom of God lie not so much in the issue of the kingdom's timing. Rather, Luke particularly stresses the reversals entailed in the establishment of the kingdom (1:52–53).

Jesus' blessings and woes (6:20–26) starkly express these reversals: the kingdom belongs to the poor, while the rich have received their comfort. A new perspective on the present is offered in light of certain justice in the future. The parables of 12:16–21 and 16:19–31 warn that reversal may not be far off. Death itself is the first great leveler, and it may strike suddenly.

The kingdom's presence can leave none complacent. Prostitute and Pharisee alike need forgiveness (7:36–50). Yet if that presence is realized, repentance and reconciliation are possible. The rich man's brothers may obey the law, reach out to the poor at their gates, and stay with them on the right side of the great gulf (16:27–31).

Luke and Paul. The relationship between the theologies of Luke and Paul has been much debated. Undoubtedly the two have distinct perspectives. But we may note a fundamental connection.

Luke's emphasis on Jesus' welcome for those whom Israel's moral policemen pushed to the margins is, in Rom. 15:7, linked with Paul's exhortation, on the basis of the grace given to Jew and Gentile alike: "Welcome one another ... as Christ has welcomed you" (NRSV). The "New Perspective on Paul," by highlighting the social context and implications of Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, has shown that Paul is much closer to the thrust of the Gospels, and especially Luke, than has often been thought.

Luke and Theology

Narrative, History, and Theology. As an early "narrative theologian," Luke raised to new sophistication a genre with which Mark (and maybe Matthew) had already experimented. He does his "theology" through the story he tells of Jesus, carefully linked with that of Israel and the church (Green, Theology, 21). The fact that this narrative approach preceded the theological systematizing of later generations should not be lost on us.

Luke's skillful storytelling is not mere spinning of yarns to edify or entertain. His story centers on historical events. It is based on tradition from eyewitnesses and his own careful investigation (1:2–3). More than any other biblical book, Luke reminds us that theology not anchored in history is sub-Christian and docetic.

Supremely among the Evangelists, Luke shows us that Jesus' own "theologizing" was done largely in story. Unlike the Gospel itself, his parables do not depend for their force on any claim to represent actual events. But though they are often surprising and shocking, they depict realistic scenes from the world of Jesus' hearers, inviting them to reconfigure that world in mind and behavior (Wright 182–226). In fictional microcosm they have a similar purpose to Luke's historiographical macrocosm: to enable people to recognize God's activity in the world, and then fall in step with it.

The Plan of God. Luke's concern for the continuity of the story of Jesus and the church with that of Israel warns us to avoid preaching an individualistic gospel of "Jesus and me." Luke summons us to point to the great tradition into which disciples enter. By the grace of God, anyone may become part of his universal purpose, revealed and accomplished through Christ.

While this forbids the marginalization of the OT and/or the Jewish people in Christian theology, it equally forbids interpretations of the OT that regard its prophecies as fulfilled in present-day developments in Israel or elsewhere. With John the Baptist, “the Law and the Prophets” came to an end (cf. 16:16). What was glimpsed in the ministry of Jesus was to be made plain after the resurrection: God’s gospel was for “all nations” (24:47).

The immediate prospect for Jerusalem was terrible punishment (21:20–24). The Gentile aggressors would have their “times . . . fulfilled” (21:24)—God would punish them also, as he had promised to punish Israel’s aggressors in OT times—but the center of gravity of his plan was shifting. Jerusalem would be the starting (p 471) point of the disciples’ mission (24:47, 52–53). Nevertheless, from now on God’s plan would be centered not on a land, a city, a temple, and a nation, but on a message going everywhere, in the name of Christ, through a new multinational people empowered from on high—and all this as “it is written” (24:45–49 NRSV).

Luke does not allow us to underplay the uniqueness of Christ, his pivotal role in God’s plan, or the fact that he and all he set in train are the true fulfillment of the OT.

The Scope of the Gospel: The Whole Person and the Whole of Society. Luke does not merely state the universal thrust of the gospel in general terms. He grounds it in vivid portrayals of humans. He demonstrates in narrative that the gospel is for all kinds of people, in the longings, needs, and opportunities of their physical everyday lives, not merely for their “souls” or “spirits.” This is especially symbolized by Jesus’ coming to people in their homes (7:36; 10:38; 14:1; 19:5–6; 24:29).

So good news comes to an aged couple still bearing the stigma of childlessness (1:5–25), to a fisherman after a fruitless night’s fishing (5:4–6), to a bereaved mother (7:11–17), to a harassed cook (10:38–42), to a dying terrorist (23:40–43). But in addressing people where they are, the gospel lifts them far beyond the situation that preoccupies them. Above all, this is seen on the Emmaus road, where far from being merely comforted in their loss, Cleopas and his friend are fired with a new sense of the meaning of the Scriptures and of the one they thought they had lost (24:32).

Moreover, the gospel is for humans in relationship with each other. The vision communicated by Jesus in parable, miracle, and table fellowship is not merely of new persons, but of a new society.

Luke’s good news remains oriented to the future and offers no easy promises about the certainty of societal transformation in the present (16:19–31). Testing times are to come; ultimate “redemption” is not yet (21:5–36). But the gospel refuses to let the signs of the kingdom be indefinitely postponed. “Today this Scripture is fulfilled in your hearing” (4:21). “Today salvation has come to this house” (19:9). For Christian theology that seeks to articulate sensitively a gospel of future hope and present opportunity, Luke must surely be the primary resource.

Bibliography

Barton, S. “Parables on God’s Love and Forgiveness.” Pages 199–216 in The Challenge of Jesus’s Parables, ed. R. Longenecker. Eerdmans, 2000; Conzelmann, H. The Theology of St Luke. Faber & Faber, 1960; Craddock, F. Luke. Interpretation. John Knox, 1990; Donahue, J. The Gospel in Parable. Fortress, 1988; Drury, J. Tradition and Design in Luke’s Gospel. Darton, Longman & Todd, 1976; Evans, C., and J. Sanders. Luke and Scripture. Fortress, 1993; Green, J. The Gospel of Luke. Eerdmans, 1997; idem. The Theology of the Gospel of Luke. NTT. Cambridge University Press, 1995; Johnson, L. T. The Literary Function of Possessions in Luke-Acts. SBLDS 39. Scholars Press, 1977; Marshall, I. H. Luke: Historian and Theologian. Paternoster, 1970; Squires, J. The Plan of God in Luke-Acts. SNTSMS 76. Cambridge University Press, 1993; Tannehill, R. The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts. 2 vols. Fortress, 1986; Thielman, F. The Law and the New Testament. Herder & Herder, 1999; Tuckett, C. Luke. NTG. Sheffield Academic Press, 1996; Wright, S. The Voice of Jesus. Paternoster, 2000.

Stephen I. Wright

Luther, Martin

Born, on his mother’s side, into the pious Lindemann family, Martin Luther was baptized on November 11, 1483, the day after his birth. He grew up in a world where the words of the Bible were heard often: through preaching and the liturgy, through the psalmody and biblical verses one learned in school, and so on. Later, as an Augustinian friar in the Black Cloister in Erfurt, he listened as the Scriptures were read corporately many times each day, and he diligently studied the red-leather Bible he had received as a novice for personal study and reflection. Ordained a priest in 1507, he began expositing the Scriptures regularly as a preacher. At the insistence of his superior, Johannes von Staupitz, he then undertook academic preparations for a career as professor of Bible. He earned the so-called baccalaureus biblicus (“bachelor of Bible” degree) in 1509, after two years of lecturing on assigned biblical texts. In 1512, he was awarded the doctor’s cap and ring and installed as professor of Bible in the frontier town of Wittenberg. He began his teaching career with a course on the Psalms (Dictata super Psalterium, 1513–15), and lectured on the OT for all but three or four of his thirty-two years in the classroom, including ten years on Genesis (1535–45). More often, however, he preached on the NT. As an old man, he could boast that if the Bible was a forest, then he had shaken every tree in the search for edifying fruit.

Rehearsing the history of Luther's engagement with the Bible suggests continuity. Most fundamentally, he always encountered the text as a baptized Christian. Charged with responsibility for preaching on a regular basis (usually several (p 472) times each week), biblical exegesis remained for him a spiritual exercise performed in service to God and the church, a task for which one was fitted by the Holy Spirit and by living faith, given in baptism. His career as an expositor, on the other hand, suggests movement. First, he is the celibate young friar preparing biblical lectures in rhythm with the religious life of the cloister. Later, he is the married Hausvater leaving home early in the morning to meet a group of eager students, teaching them the Bible, and exhorting them to lives of heroic faithfulness through service in the emerging Protestant ministry. Within this changing and sometimes chaotic context, his classroom exposition slowly evolved from monastic meditation on the "sacred page" (sacra pagina)—in which prayer and exegesis were inseparable—toward something more akin to modern university lectures.

Asked how to pray, Luther showed his indebtedness to the sacra pagina, instinctively directing his questioner to the Bible. Prayer is human address to God, centered in the Spirit-inspired application of all one's powers to the biblical text, searching for authentic spiritual illumination. This illumination is inevitably followed, however, by testing, the trials faced by the struggling Christian. These trials drive one back to prayer, back to the text, and so on, in a lifelong cycle of prayer, meditation, and temptation (oratio, meditatio, tentatio). As the Holy Spirit works in unfailing agreement with Christ, the Word of God, so spiritual experience is tethered to the word in Holy Scripture. The consistent linkage between prayer and Scripture is one of the important links between Luther's biblical interpretation and the patristic traditions of "spiritual exegesis."

Nevertheless, Luther also insisted that interpretation centers on the plain meaning of the text (sensus literalis). Understanding requires attention to biblical languages and to history, a conviction he shared with other early modern biblical humanists. Indeed, working with the Wittenberg translation team, what he called his "Sanhedrin," he translated the entire Bible from Greek and Hebrew into German, a process that necessitated careful attention to grammar and history in order to discern the sense of the text. However, translation, and with it interpretation, is a distinctively Christian task, a work of the Spirit and of the mind shaped by Christian truth. Grammatical and historical knowledge alone are insufficient. Translation and interpretation depend on understanding not only the words of Scripture (verba) but also the substance (res scripturae sacrae). The reader dare not bracket out Christian beliefs when grappling with a difficult text, either for translation or for interpretation.

Luther often spoke negatively of allegorical interpretation, but his own exegesis remained strikingly sensitive to allegorical and tropological resonances in Scripture, particularly those that could be applied to Christ and faith. The sensus literalis is Christ, for the Scriptures are the “swaddling cloths” in which the Christ-child is laid. Interpretation is christocentric because the text unfailingly witnesses to the redemption accomplished by Christ. The exegete searches out the interpretation that emphatically urges Christ the Savior (was Christum treibet). Theological exegesis means interpretation in harmony with the loving purposes of the triune God, revealed in the Son’s assumption of our humanity, his passion, and resurrection. “Therefore, if the adversaries press the Scriptures against Christ, we urge Christ against the Scriptures” (LWorks 34:112). Luther is not speaking hyperbolically. Nor is christocentric interpretation based on the imposition of a presupposition somehow external to the text. To the contrary, it is founded on who God is and on the Christian’s experience of God in faith. In its central witness to Christ, moreover, the Bible is clear, and it authenticates its message without dependence on external human authority.

As a reader of the biblical narratives, Luther was remarkably observant and inventive, generously applying a kind of sanctified common sense when attempting to understand the behavior of the characters in biblical stories. He relied extensively on the remarkably thorough exegetical helps developed by his predecessors, particularly the patristic and medieval commentary tradition. Luther felt a deep kinship not only with biblical heroes and heroines, but also with the living tradition of Christian believers who were their faithful followers, the commentators. Together, these saints witnessed to Christ not only by means of their doctrine, but also in their very lives as God shaped them in living faith. One comes to truly understand their stories just as the church fathers did, through prayer, study, and the experience of judgment and grace (law and gospel). Faith, Scripture, and the authentic Christian experience reflected both in the Bible and in the church’s exegetical traditions thus illumine one another. This happens in the interplay between the struggle for faith on the part of the living, and the witness of the faithful dead extending in unbroken succession from Adam and Eve down to the present day.

(p 473)Bibliography

Luther's Works, ed. J. Pelikan and H. Lehmann. American Edition. 55 vols. Concordia/Fortress, 1955–; Bornkamm, H. Luther and the Old Testament, trans. E. W. and R. C. Gritsch, ed. V. I. Gruhn. Fortress, 1969; Ebeling, G. Evangelische Evangelienauslegung. Chr. Kaiser, 1942. 3d ed. Mohr/Siebeck, 1991; Hagen, K. Luther's Approach to Scripture as Seen in His "Commentaries" on Galatians, 1519–1538. Mohr/Siebeck, 1993; Kooiman, W. J. Luther and the Bible, trans. J. Schmidt. Muhlenberg, 1961; Mattox, M. "Defender of the Most Holy Matriarchs." Brill, 2003; Pelikan, J. Luther the Expositor. Concordia, 1959; Preus, J. S. From Shadow to Promise. Belknap/Harvard University Press, 1969; Steinmetz, D. Luther in Context. 2d ed. Baker, 2002; Wood, A. S. Captive to the Word. Paternoster, 1969.

Mickey L. Mattox

LXX See Relationship between the Testaments; Translation

(p 474) M

Magisterium See Catholic Biblical Interpretation

Malachi, Book of

The superscription (1:1) of the book identifies it as an oracle or massa' attributed to mal'aki, "my messenger/angel." The apparent simplicity of these assertions conceals the debates about the nature of the book and the identity of the one typically called Malachi. It also anticipates issues about the status and place of the book in the prophetic corpus and OT canon. In the Hebrew version, it is the last of the Book of the Twelve or Minor Prophets as well as the final book of Nevi'im, the "Prophets," the second section of the Hebrew Bible. It thus directly precedes the book of Psalms in the Ketubim, "Writings," the third section of the Hebrew Bible. In most English versions, it appears as the last book of the prophetic literature and of the OT, directly preceding the NT (some have the Apocrypha between OT and NT). Most often, the prophetic activity is dated to the fifth-century-BCE context of the Persian period.

History of Interpretation

While there are several notable issues in its interpretative history, the recurrent issues are the structure of the book and the identification of its genre that defines its organization; the function and place of 4:3–6 (3:21–24 MT); and the independent status of the book. These issues build on those of the church fathers. In particular, Tertullian (Marc. 4.8.1) observed the placement of the book as a representation of a transition from old to new covenant. Origen (Comm. Jo. 2:17; 6:13) saw Mal. 4:2–6 (3:20–24 MT) as the foreshadowing of John the Baptist and Jesus Christ (cf. Hill).

Internal Structure and Genre. The first decades of the twentieth century responded to the nineteenth-century classification of Malachi as prose (Torrey), with some affirming this classification (Smith) and others seeing it as largely poetic (Nowack). Most today affirm the prosaic nature of the book and the presence of question-answer schema as a characteristic feature. Thus, the characteristic format consists of (1) an assertion (e.g., 1:2a), and (2) a schema formed by a question (e.g., 1:2b) and an answer/response (e.g., 1:2c–5). Pfeiffer introduced this interpretative trend when he categorized the book as prophetic disputation and thus demonstrated his perspective that the book is constituted by one genre. Accordingly, he identifies the macrounits—1:2–5; 1:6–2:9; 2:10–16; 2:17–3:5; 3:6–12; 3:13–4:3 (3:13–21 MT), further noting that 4:4–6 (3:22–24 MT) is generically different from the rest. Inasmuch as its literary form is other than the prophetic disputation and its content is new, 4:4–6 is further classified as an additional rather than an integral part of the book.

While Petersen follows Pfeiffer's lead in asserting a common generic form, he denies that a tripartite structure forms the basic six units. First and foremost, he identifies the book as one of three oracles in the Zechariah–Malachi section of the Book of the Twelve (Zech. 9–11; 12–14). He proposes that the macrounits represent dialogues further identified as "diatribe-like discourses" comparable to Hellenistic diatribe. Petersen further identifies 4:4–6 (3:22–24 MT) as an epilogue that together with Hos. 14:9 (10 MT) is an element of demarcation and a link between the Book of the Twelve and the rest of the Hebrew Bible canon (cf. Hill).

Like Pfeiffer, O'Brien tried to identify common macrounits that exhibit the same generic features and are reflective of the genre. On the other hand, she differs from Pfeiffer in the macrounits and in categorizing the genre of these units and the book as covenant lawsuit with its distinctive parts. She names prologue (1:1–5), accusations (1:6–2:9; 2:17–3:5; 3:6–12; 3:13–4:3 [3:13–21 MT]), admonition (4:4 [3:22]), and an ultimatum (4:5–6 [3:23–24]).

Lescow observes that the form and function of the text are products of the redaction process that transformed the original Torah speeches for didactic and homiletic purposes (e.g., 1:6–2:9). (p 475) He takes the question-answer schema as an interchange between the prophet and the one(s) inquiring about a teaching. As to 4:4–6 (3:22–24 MT), he sees it as an appendix or conclusion of the prophetic corpus.

Floyd differentiates between stylistic and generic uniformity, further recognizing the various functions of generically similar units (e.g., 1:10b–14; 2:8–12). He challenges Pfeiffer and others and identifies two macrounits, a superscription (1:1) and the main body, categorized as massa' (oracle, 1:1, referring to 1:2–4:6 [3:24 MT]), which further consists of an introduction/prophetic disputation (1:2–5) and exhortation (1:6–4:6). As to the microunits, Floyd notes two units: the first looks at the “cultic corruption,” addressing both the priests and the people (1:6–2:16); the second, showing the change from corrupt practices, is addressed to the people (2:17–4:6 [3:24]).

Canonical Place. The first perspective is Malachi's interdependence on Zechariah, evidenced by the presence of the term massa' (oracle) in both Malachi (1:1) and Zechariah (9:1a; 12:1; e.g., Petersen; Mason). The second perspective is that Malachi's interdependence includes both Haggai and Zechariah—the latter corpus unified by its representation of the restoration community (e.g., Pierce; Lescow; Hill). With these two perspectives, the place of the book is also represented by the function of 4:4–6 as the conclusion of the Book of the Twelve and the Nevi'im—the prophetic corpus. In a third perspective, Floyd asserts the independent status of Malachi with 4:4–6 seen as an integral part of the microunit 2:17–4:6. It is best to read them as a unit and also as an example of God's interaction with the covenant community to address its concerns about God's love and what that entails for its practices.

Content and Theological Concerns

The fundamental message is God's love for Israel and Israel's response to that love. The book affirms that Israel's practices reflect its love for God. Through the question-and-answer schema, it challenges Israel to understand this and live accordingly. Consequently, the book encompasses several concerns, with multiple dimensions.

Malachi looks at various themes addressed elsewhere in the OT and in doing so suggests that there is an ongoing need to clarify God's requirement for the covenant community. It affirms that being the people of God carries responsibilities that encompass both correct understanding of God's requirements and aligning one's life with them. In particular, it holds the priests accountable for failure to uphold the covenant. Some of the concerns of Psalms and Proverbs concerning God's regard for the wicked (e.g., Pss. 37; 73; Prov. 10) and God's silence in the face of suffering reverberate through Malachi (cf. Ps. 37). These recurring themes signal the perpetual nature of the struggle to make sense of life in the midst of faith in God and the human responsibility to obey God.

God's Love. Israel's understanding of God's love was challenged by the experience of judgment. God's declaration of love for Israel addresses Israel's challenge for proof of that love in light of the turmoil that the restoration community suffered. Consequently, God highlighted love for Israel by contrasting two persons (Jacob, Esau) and the nations that ensued from them (Israel, Edom). The text echoes the Gen. 25:19–26 account of Jacob and Esau, where the choice between the brothers is noted without the stated criteria for the selection of who will serve whom. On the one hand, God loves ('ahab) Jacob/Israel and hates (sane') Esau/Edom. God behaves consistently as seen in his covenant with Israel and preservation of Israel as compared to his resolution to destroy Edom and ensure its perpetual demise (1:2–5).

Tithe and Offering. The matter of the tithe and the offerings (hamma'aser wehatterumah) addresses the apparent misfortunes of the community (3:8). As a corrective, the people are admonished to stop robbing (qaba) God by giving God the entire tithe (ma'aser; cf. Gen. 14:20; 28:18–22; Lev. 27:30–32; Num. 18:21–32; Deut. 14:22–29; Neh. 13:10–12). Several kinds of tithes are indicated: The general tithes of the produce of the land and livestock are designated for the Levites (Lev. 27:30–32; Num. 18:21). The tithe of the produce is annual and seasonal (Deut. 14:22–27). The third-year tithe is designated for the underprivileged (Deut. 14:28–29; cf. Hill; Petersen). Like Mal. 3:10, so also Num. 18:21–32 refers to the entire tithe (cf. Deut. 14:28) and stipulates that it be used to sustain the Levites, who are further required to present to God an offering (terumah) of the tithe that they receive. The pairing of the tithes and the offerings (hamma'aser wehatterumah) contributes to distinguishing the two (cf. Deut. 12:6, 11; 2 Chron. 31:12). Thus, Hill asserts that the offering (terumah) is a gift; others see the offering as a tithe of the tithe (ma'aser) or a tithe tax (Num. 18:26; Neh. 10:38; cf. Petersen; Glazier-McDonald).

Divorce. Malachi 2:16 declares that God hates (sane') divorce but does not explain why. It has been interpreted as figurative language representative (p 476) of the unfaithfulness in the covenant relationship. Some who render a literal interpretation concede that the intermarriage and divorce are the result of the priests' misteachings (cf. Hill). Others note various social and religious consequences of divorce as the reason for God's response. Among the reasons is the apostasy resulting from intermarriage with the foreign women (Ezra 9–10; Neh. 13).

In these cases, the prohibition against Israel's intermarriage with the daughters of other nations is a preventative measure against breaking the covenant with God (cf. Exod. 34:15–16; Deut. 7:3–4). When seen in the intertextual framework of the OT, Mal. 2:16 challenges the Deut. 24:1–4 representation of divorce as a recognized practice within the community (cf. Deut. 22:13–19, 28–29). Within the context of Mal. 2, God's response seems to be generated by the same force that underlies God's displeasure with other practices in the community (e.g., the sacrifices, tithing). In each of these instances, there is a greater ramification of the behavior than a misconstrued teaching. Rather, the practices are as much a detriment to the community as they are offensive to God.

Priests and Sacrifices. The priests are addressed as those who know torah and thus are able to discern and render sound teachings. Even so, they are also presented as deviating from God's requirement (e.g., 2:6–9). For example, God requires sacrifices that meet a specified standard (cf. animal sacrifice, Lev. 22:18–25; firstborn sacrifice, Deut. 15:19–23). Malachi 1:8 represents the unacceptable nature of the sacrifice as including blind, lame, blemished animals (cf. Deut. 15:21), which the priests were offering to God. They are challenged to keep the covenant by honoring God. The contrast is between their concern to please their rulers and the lack of regard for their Deity. Furthermore, their actions depict a disruption of a normative behavior within a relationship; as such, their utter disrespect for the Deity is highlighted.

God's Justice. Fundamentally, the issues in 2:17–3:5 are retribution and theodicy. Why do evildoers prosper? Why does God tolerate evil rather than punish it? While the lament attests to inquiries about God's justice (mishpat) and lack of response (cf. Pss. 13:1–3; 22:1; 74:1), there is also intertextual support for the belief in God's justice and response (Isa. 30:18–20). The book of Malachi challenges the character of God to respond in judgment to the evil (ra'; 2:17). In calling into question whether or not God is just, the community may have questioned (sarcastically or genuinely) whether God regards evil (ra') as good (tob). This attitude culminates in the perception of God's silence as a lack of judgment, as an overall lack of concern about the practices in the community, and as endorsement of evil (cf. Hab. 1:2–3, 12–13).

Hermeneutical Challenges

The challenges raised here concern the declarations or perspectives within the text that lead to multivalent positions within contemporary settings. These challenges are represented as questions meriting further consideration and reflecting the need to trust God in the midst of life's complexities, without the error of trying to control God or reduce God to ways of being that only conform to one's expectations.

God's Love. God's love and hate represent God's choice and capacity for both. In Mal. 1:2–5 God's hate is a mechanism for demonstrating the particularities of love for Israel. If nothing else, the hermeneutical challenge is to recognize that just as Israel had no choice in being chosen as the object of God's love, so Edom had no choice in being the object of God's hate (cf. Rom. 9:11–14). The quandary is that God's ways in choosing whom to love and hate are complex at best. Having God's love does not exclude one from punishment but is the reason for God's particular response to the covenant community, either to defer or to expedite punishment, and in some cases to use punishment as a form of discipline. Thus, Malachi reminds Israel that God's discipline is a manifestation of love (cf. Deut. 8:5; Pss. 38:2; 94:12; Jer. 31:18; Heb. 12:6, 10). On the other hand, not every form of suffering is either punishment for sin or discipline. Most take for granted that God spoke a word of confirmation to Israel about God's love. However, that God loves the world will remain a paradox for those who continue to experience suffering without such a verifiable confirmation that they are favored by God, that they are not rejected by God and thus experience God's hate. They wonder if God is concerned about their suffering and will rescue them because of the universality of God's love and concern for all.

Tithing and Blessing. Two aspects of the tithe are noteworthy. First, the purpose of the tithe is variously represented in the OT. The tithe was used to maintain the temple and its personnel and to provide for the underprivileged of the community. Do the designated purposes in the OT obligate the same purposes in the modern settings?

(p 477) Second, the relationship of the tithe to blessings and curses is a complex matter. While the text suggests that there is a relationship, the danger of asserting the numerical quantity and the assurance of that relationship must be met by a caveat. Prosperity is not necessarily a sign of righteous living since evildoers are sometimes prosperous while the righteous endure adversity. Is the relationship between tithing and blessings extended to everyone who tithes? Is there a quantitative requirement that ensures the receipt of positive returns? Are all required to give regardless of their economic resources and obligations? The challenge that the modern reader must face is that everyone addressed in the text should tithe. This is not a prescription for becoming wealthy by obligating God. Even with the observation that God responds to obedience and tithing in particular, the larger significance of this is that God is in control of the resources. That control entails that God may or may not respond according to a mathematical calculation. Fundamentally, the tithe is a response to God's love and not a way of winning that love.

Divorce. Within the OT, divorce is presented as a normative practice, used to address various marital circumstances, including the dissatisfaction of a husband with his wife (Deut. 24:1–4; cf. 22:13–19, 28–29), or a solution to intermarriage (cf. Ezra 9–10; Neh. 13:23–31). Does God hate all divorces; if so, does God hate them equally, regardless of the reasons for divorce? The OT context indicates that some divorces are sanctioned (Deut. 24:1–4) but that in other cases it is not an option (22:29). If the resulting circumstances are the reasons for God's hatred of divorce, would God's response differ based on different resulting circumstances? Whether or not one can justify or condemn modern divorces on the basis of this multivalent perspective, the inescapable consequences of divorce remain. God responds to divorces because they bear evil consequences for the community and reflect violation of commitments. The OT context also sanctions remarriage after divorce but regulates who may enter marriage with a divorced woman without viewing it as adultery (cf. Lev. 21:7, 14; Deut. 24:3–4; Ezek. 44:22 vis-à-vis Matt. 5:32; Luke 16:18).

Bibliography

Bosshard, E., and R. Kratz. "Maleachi im Zwölfprophetenbuch." BN 52 (1990): 27–46; Dumbrell, W. "Malachi and the Ezra-Nehemiah Reforms." RTR 35 (1976): 42–52; Floyd, M. Minor Prophets. Part 2. FOTL 22. Eerdmans, 2000; Glazier-McDonald, B. Malachi. SBLDS 98. Scholars Press, 1987; Hill, A. Malachi. AB 25D. Doubleday, 1998; Hugenberger, G.

Marriage as Covenant. VTSup 52. Brill, 1994; Lescow, T. Das Buch Maleachi. Calwer, 1993; Mason, R. The Books of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. CBC. Cambridge University Press, 1977; Nowack, W. Die kleinen Propheten. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1922; O'Brien, J. Priest and Levite in Malachi. SBLDS 121. Scholars Press, 1990; Petersen, D. Zechariah 9–14 and Malachi. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 1995; Pfeiffer, E. "Die Disputationsworte im Buche Maleachi." EvT 19 (1959): 546–68; Pierce, R. "Literary Connectors and a Haggai-Zechariah-Malachi Corpus." JETS 27 (1984): 277–89; Smith, J. M. P. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi and Jonah. ICC. T&T Clark, 1912; Snyman, S. "Antitheses in Malachi 1,2–5." ZAW 98 (1986): 436–38; Torrey, C. C. "The Prophecy of Malachi." JBL 17 (1898): 1–15; Verhoef, P. Haggai and Malachi. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1987; Wendland, E. "Linear and Concentric Patterns in Malachi." BT 36 (1985): 108–21.

Mignon R. Jacobs

Male See Male and Female

Male and Female

All humanity is embodied as either male or female. All individuals view the world from the perspective of either male or female. One cannot obtain a neutral or androgynous position outside of one's sex. Our identity as male and female stretches beyond our biological identification as beings of one sex or the other, for it is from within our position as persons of a particular sex that we encounter and live in the world around us. Christians have a certain way of understanding the nature of being male or female and the relationship of male and female to each other and to God. This understanding rests on our interpretation of the biblical text, the theology that informs our reading of the text, our experience, and our interaction with science.

The interaction between biblical interpretation and theology is crucial for understanding the topic of male and female. Many biblical scholars and theologians have assumed that collating a catalog of the biblical texts about male and female, men and women, husbands and wives would provide a sufficient understanding of the topic. The introduction of social background to the interpretative mix has been a significant step in showing that our understanding of male and female is deeply embedded in our knowledge of culture and the manner in which it shapes us (Keener). Recognizing that the Bible is a theological book that demands a theological reading is an additional significant directive, for it reminds us that our readings are always particularly situated not only in respect to gender but also in respect to interpretation (p 478)(Fowl). The theological stance that we take toward the nature of God and the biblical text significantly influences our understanding of male and female in the Bible and its relevance for contemporary discussion (Volf).

Male and Female in the Biblical Texts

The opening chapters of the Bible introduce humanity as male and female, drawing our attention to their relationship to each other and to God. The first creation account ends with the making of humanity in God's own image and instructions given in the plural to the human creation to be fruitful, to multiply, and to have dominion (Gen. 1:26–28). This opening scene portrays the human creature as created in a partnership of male and female, and made to be corulers of the world God created. The second creation account (Gen. 2) and the fall (ch. 3) have been read in multiple ways. Some have seen the creation of Eve after Adam as an indication of her inferior status, while others have seen her designation as “helper” as indicating her subordinate role in relationship to the male (Piper and Grudem). Neither the order of creation nor the designation as “helper” (used elsewhere in the biblical text to refer to God) must necessarily indicate a subordinate status for the female (Jewett). In addition, the argument that the fall and the curses that result from it in Gen. 3 are normative for understanding the relationship between the sexes pays little attention to the theological trajectory of redemption and restoration in the biblical text. In the NT vision Jesus bases the marriage union on the creation of humanity as male and female (Matt. 19:4–5), and Paul declares in Gal. 3:28 that there is no longer “male and female” in the body of Christ (NRSV). This affirms the first portrayal of male and female in the Genesis text. Throughout the canon, men and women are portrayed in partnership with each other and with God. Male and female go into the ark (Gen. 7). The patriarchs and their wives journey and participate in the promise for the future of Israel. The whole nation of Israel is called to be a priestly nation (Exod. 19). Men and women serve God as prophets (Judg. 4; 2 Kings 22; Acts 21; 1 Cor. 11). Men and women follow Jesus (Luke 8) and serve his church (Acts 18; Rom. 16).

Difficult Texts in the Canon. While the biblical text contains a trajectory that understands humanity as male and female corulers who participate equally in the purposes of God, this vision is sometimes obscured by difficult texts in the canon. A good portion of our contemporary difficulty is related to the patriarchal nature of the ancient culture to which Scripture was originally addressed. In a good many places the ancient culture is not called into question. So, for example, in much of the OT women are described in ways that make it clear they are legally subject to either fathers or husbands, and they are excluded from serving God as priests. In the NT, various texts enjoin women to submit to their husbands (Eph. 5; Col. 3), to be silent in the church (1 Cor. 14), and not to teach or exercise authority (1 Tim. 2). All these texts have been the subject of intense study and debate over the last century. This debate has often been focused around the normativity of the texts under discussion. Are these instructions for one time period and culture, or the norm for all cultures and times? These debates over specific texts are almost impossible to resolve solely on the basis of linguistics, genre, sociocultural criticism, or historical analysis. The tension between the trajectory of Scripture outlined above and these difficult passages is also one not easily resolved by recourse to specific interpretative techniques. Ultimately, both debates demand theological reading and response such as those that have been recently offered by Volf and Grenz.

Male and Female: Marriage, Metaphor, and Singleness. The partnership of male and female in marriage is rooted in the creation accounts. Genesis 1 declares the creation of humanity as male and female, and Gen. 2 gives an etiology for marriage. Male and female, men and women, husbands and wives—such language occurs not only in relationship to the literal partnership of male and female in marriage, but also in metaphorical language used to speak of God and his relationship to Israel in the OT and the church in the NT. The OT prophets portray Israel as a woman who is engaged to her bridegroom (Jer. 2:2) and delights God (Isa. 62:5), but the metaphor then develops to include the unfaithfulness of Israel to her covenant relationship (Jer. 3:8). This unfaithfulness is often portrayed as adultery—the breaking of the marriage covenant. God’s faithfulness does not depend on Israel’s faithfulness, and from his faithfulness comes the possibility of restoration in the relationship. In the NT, the church is portrayed as the bride of Christ (Rev. 21:2), and the union of Christ with his church is the image of ultimate service, love, joy, and unity. Grenz suggests that these metaphorical uses of the marriage relationship in the biblical text can point to one function of male and female partnership in marriage, the portrayal of the union of Christ and the church (63–65).

(p 479) It is important to recognize that the marriage relationship can be only a limited portrayal of the spiritual reality of Christ’s union with the church. In addition, this begs the question: What portrayal of Christ’s work is seen in those who remain unmarried? Although there are hardly any portrayals of unmarried people in the OT, singleness is portrayed in the NT as a state that can be good when used for the sake of the kingdom of God (e.g., 1 Cor. 7). While the unmarried state is affirmed in the NT, it is not used metaphorically as part of the description of God and his covenant.

However, Grenz argues that singleness resulting in the inclusion of others from a wide circle can be a metaphorical reenactment of God's inclusive calling of the whole world.

Male and Female in the Practice of Theological Interpretation

In the last two centuries, suffragists and feminists have raised anew for us issues related to sex, gender, and gender roles. While feminists have generally focused on issues related to women, their critiques raise significant issues for men as well (Mills). As Jewett writes, "The 'woman question' implies a 'man question.' The one cannot be discussed without the other" (149). It is difficult to answer this question if one of the members, either male or female, insists that their role in the male and female partnership is biblically self-evident. Those who hold that their position or role is self-evident claim the power to define the relationship. It is this very acquisition of power that is critiqued by feminists. This work shows that the prevailing definition of "maleness" as the powerful, patriarchal norm and "femaleness" as the subordinate derivative of that norm can no longer be accepted as the unquestioned standard for defining male and female.

Often biblical scholars and theologians begin their examination of male and female with biblical texts that specifically concern male and female and then proceed to a theological explanation. Volf begins differently by asking how the nature of God should inform the relationships between men and women. He then goes on to show that the generally agreed-upon claim that God is neither male nor female can lead us to the understanding that all of the duties and prerogatives that come from God are not for one gender or the other but for both (173). He follows this with an explanation of the doctrine of the Trinity, carefully retaining both the distinct but equal identities of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as well as their existence in constant, self-giving relationship to each other (180). This allows Volf to put forward a model of distinct but equal identity for the genders that is demonstrated and only understood in relationship to the other. "To be a woman means to be a human being of the female sex who is 'not without the man'; to be a man means to be a human being of the male sex who is 'not without woman' " (187). Volf argues that this should lead us to an egalitarian position not based in opposition to, or dominance of, the other sex. Volf's approach recognizes the embodied and subjective nature of our identity as male and female while allowing our understanding of male and female to rest squarely on our knowledge of God's nature.

Other theologians who have explored the relationship between male and female in light of the imago Dei have also made an argument for partnership, equality, and mutuality based on a reading of the biblical texts in light of trinitarian theology (Grenz). Those who understand the imago Dei as reflecting a social and relational Trinity are able to further the understanding of partnership between the sexes as humanity's means of reflecting the imago Dei. The Bible offers a portrayal of male and female created in God's image for the purpose of co-ruling the creation as servants of God's work and each other. Such a portrayal challenges the power paradigms of both ancient and contemporary eras, and calls us to lives of mutuality, respect, and servant-love—even or especially in the midst of our practices of interpretation, as they reflect upon God.

See also Feminist Biblical Interpretation; Image of God

Bibliography

Derksen, M. "The Divine Intention concerning the Role and Relationship of Male and Female as Created and Fallen." Didaskalia 11, no. 1 (1991): 31–56; Fowl, S. Engaging Scripture. Blackwell, 1998; Grenz, S. Sexual Ethics. Westminster John Knox, 1990; Hurley, J. Man and Woman in Biblical Perspective. Zondervan, 1981; Jewett, P. Man as Male and Female. Eerdmans, 1975; Keener, C. Paul, Women and Wives. Hendrickson, 1992; Mills, S., et al. Feminist Readings/Feminists Reading. Harvester Wheatsheaf, 1989; Piper, J., and W. Grudem. Recovering Biblical Manhood and Womanhood. Crossway, 1991; Volf, M. Exclusion and Embrace. Abingdon, 1996; Witherington, B. Women and the Genesis of Christianity. Cambridge University Press, 1990.

Ruth Anne Reese

Manuscripts See Textual Criticism

Maps of the Biblical World     See Geography

(p 480) Marcionism See Gnosticism; Patristic Biblical Interpretation; Relationship between the Testaments; Scripture, Unity of

Mark, Book of

Mark's Gospel is generally thought to be the earliest. Mainstream opinion is somewhat divided between assuming a date of origin just before the Jewish War or in its immediate aftermath. There is broad agreement that this Gospel became the literary basis for at least two others, Matthew and Luke, and possibly a third (John). Matthew and Luke have considerable overlap with Mark; John's Gospel does not. This is often explained on the assumption that the author wanted to avoid significant overlap with other Gospels, which already enjoyed wide circulation by the time John wrote. The language and the narrative architecture of Mark's Gospel is less sophisticated than those of the other Gospels, but in recent decades there has been a growing appreciation of the theological use of narrative techniques by this author as well. Clearly, Mark was as serious a theologian as any other NT author; characterizing his literary and theological awareness as that of a mere collector of early Christian tradition is no longer a viable option. His linguistic (Greek) capabilities may be limited at times, but his narrative-theological contribution is immense. Mark's significance for the Christian church becomes apparent when it is realized that this Gospel represents the move from oral Jesus tradition (gospel) to a written "Life of Jesus" (Gospel). The likeliest option for genre is that the canonical Gospels should be treated as ancient bioi. If so, the recent view that the Gospels did not have specific audiences in mind (Bauckham) ought to be viewed with some caution. There is little doubt that most ancient bioi were written to be read or "performed" orally (Bryan) and in specific contexts.

Interpretation and Approaches

Mark's history of reception is by far the least substantial compared to those of the other Gospels, to some extent lingering for centuries in the shadows, particularly of Matthew and John. The situation eventually changed, but not before the last decades of the eighteenth century with the emerging interest in historical questions. Markan priority began to be explored as a real possibility, for it was noticed that Luke and Matthew agree the most in their respective structures where they overlap with Mark. Ironically, this happened at around the same time (1835) when "Q" first emerged as a viable hypothesis. Along with Q, Mark came to be received as a crucial tool needed to rebut Strauss's evaluation of the Gospels as mythical accounts of Jesus. Later, the assumption that Mark preserves some kind of Urevangelium, or at least the basis for a definitive historical answer to Strauss, was challenged, but in the nineteenth century it helped propel the Gospel from relative anonymity to the center stage it still commands today.

With hindsight, this rise to prominence toward the end of the nineteenth century was based on positivistic assumptions and motivations that now appear questionable. Mark's Gospel was seen as a historical antidote to the "speculative" nature of John's. But from the perspective of those who enlisted Mark's help in reconstructing a solid "life of Jesus," it was unfortunate that this Gospel proportionally placed more emphasis on miracle stories than any other did. The two-source theory named Mark and Q as the main sources behind Matthew and Luke, with Q denoting the overlap between Matthew and Luke against Mark. Part of this theory's attraction was that Q, with its emphasis on Jesus' teachings, could balance Mark's preoccupation with the miraculous, which was regarded as incompatible with notions of historicity.

It is still against this background of Strauss's challenge to Mark's historical value and the attempt by others to find solid historical ground that Wrede developed his theory of the "messianic secret." According to that theory, the early church attempted to legitimize its understanding of Jesus as Messiah by projecting the secrecy motif back into Jesus' ministry. Historically, Wrede argued, Jesus did not regard himself as Messiah. The disciples' alleged lack of understanding and Jesus' reported enjoinders to them to keep his messianic role and status secret are said to have no historical basis. Instead, they supposedly were introduced into the pre-Markan tradition to explain why belief in Jesus' messiahship only came about as a consequence of the resurrection kerygma. If judged successful, Wrede's argument would undermine the historical value of Mark for reconstructing the life of Jesus, for it was the early church that introduced some of the most theologically significant aspects of this Gospel into the pre-Markan tradition.

In Germany, Wrede's historical skepticism was largely received with approval. Increasingly, Mark's Gospel was viewed as a theological reflection of the early church's perception of Jesus, not Jesus himself. Its role as a historically verifiable source to be used for legitimizing the church's (p 481) modern christological consciousness began to wane. Form criticism thus tacitly threatened the predominance of Mark in Gospels studies, but then a renewed interest in Mark accompanied the emergence of redaction criticism (Marxsen), though it soon became clear that Matthew and Luke proved more fertile for such studies. Mark's redaction-critical potential was subordinated by some to the continuing interest in the historical Jesus.

Marxsen's assumption that there was substantial continuity between Mark and the earliest days of Christianity meant for some that it would be compelling to compare Mark's theology with that of the early letters of Paul, especially if those letters are the oldest documents in the NT. As such, they present us with a so-called primitive eschatology, not far removed from that of Jesus himself. In addition, there are now significant efforts to reclaim "biography" as a valid category for exploring Mark's genre (Dihle; Hengel). Having said that, few would now want to reduce the theological contribution of Mark to matters of either historicity or "primitive eschatology."

In recent German scholarship the theological focus on the role of the suffering righteous one in the Gospel as a whole (as opposed to just being a component of the passion narrative) is noteworthy (Ruppert; Steichele). In contrast to diachronic and theological concerns, synchronic approaches seek to connect the world in the text with that in front of it and emphasize the likely impact of the text upon the reader. At the postmodern end the interpretative weight tends to be shifted so far in the direction of the reader that stability in interpretation becomes impossible and is perceived as largely undesirable.

Probably the most promising avenue into a theological reading of Mark's Gospel is one that takes its cue from the OT allusions in the opening three verses of the Gospel itself (Watts). At least some recent commentators have recognized the importance of Mark's OT allusions as interpretative keys to unlocking his theology (France; Marcus). The following section demonstrates the importance of this line of inquiry.

Text and Message

Given the relative simplicity of Mark's Gospel, it is ironic to note the sheer diversity of attempts at defining its core theological objectives. Among the obvious main candidates are the kingdom of God, Christology, and discipleship. They are self-evident to the extent that Mark emphasizes all three topics in his opening twenty verses. Form-critical as well as sociologically inclined scholars often focus on community instruction as an underlying theme (Kee). Gundry reads Mark as an apology for the cross. The list could easily be extended. The difficulty, however, is that none of these topics or approaches are wide enough to cover all of Mark, yet distinct enough to explain Mark's specific purpose. The best approach may well be that chosen by Watts. The starting point of this line of argument is the frequency with which Mark employs Exodus motifs such as the wilderness in the prologue, the two feeding stories, and the mount of transfiguration episode (cloud, dwellings), with its reference to Moses and the sea crossings. Once this is combined with the striking editorial combination of Isa. 40:3 with Mal. 3:1 and Exod. 23:20 in Mark's opening verses, what emerges is an important hermeneutical key to this Gospel. In its original context Isa. 40 is about the inauguration of the long-awaited new exodus (NE), including Yahweh's return. Malachi 3 and Exod. 23:30 are about Yahweh's threat that accompanies his coming at the culmination of the NE.

Isaiah 40 is a word of comfort about the nearing end of Israel's exile (cf. ch. 6, which is partially quoted in Mark 4:10–12), and Isaiah's message is inherently good: Yahweh will return to his people and be enthroned in a restored Jerusalem. Isaiah's comfort culminates in a messenger announcing to Jerusalem the good news

(40:9–11) of her redemption and rebuilding (44:26; 45:13; 54:11–12). The link between Mark’s prologue and Isaiah is further strengthened by the parallel acclamation of the son in whom God is well pleased (Isa. 42:1//Mark 1:11), for Jesus takes the place of true Israel, the “son.”

Malachi 3:1–3 gives the other side of the coin: The coming of the Lord to the temple also means judgment. The reasons are clear: “You are ignoring me” (Mal. 3:7–9). Malachi’s setting is the disappointment following the return from the exile; Isaiah’s grand promises have still not fully eventuated (cf. Isa. 40–55 and 66). The delay of the Isaianic NE would necessitate the preparation of “the way” in the desert by a messenger. Malachi puts the blame for the delay at the door of both the priests and the people, certainly not God (chs. 1–2), for God is faithful and will eventually return (2:17–3:5).

The middle ground between Isaiah’s and Malachi’s respective emphases is covered by the third OT component of Mark’s prologue, Exod. 23:20: The way of the Lord is being prepared, and Israel must make sure she is ready for it (vv. (p 482)21–31). The Exodus text belongs to the Book of the Covenant (20:22–23:33), which is set in the context of Israel’s account of her founding moment. The context of v. 20 has the classic covenantal duality of blessings for the obedient (vv. 25–26) and a threat for the disobedient (v. 33). Also, the sins listed in Mal. 3:5 are in breach of either the Decalogue or Exod. 23. In short: Mark quotes the very OT verse that links back to the prototype of the NE, the original exodus, and that emphasizes the duality of God’s redemptive faithfulness as opposed to Israel’s faithlessness. But there are also close parallels of warnings and promises between Isa. 40:3 and Mal. 3:1 and their respective contexts.

The major advantage of reading Mark in light of his use of OT motifs is that it does justice both to the prologue as well as numerous aspects that are otherwise difficult to fit into an overall purpose. Examples include Mark’s emphasis on Jesus’ wanderings around Galilee and Judea, which may well have the purpose of reliving the desert wanderings of Israel. The transfiguration is now linked to Sinai, Jesus being the eschatological equivalent of the giver of the law. To be sure, it is not that Mark appeals to the OT a lot. The only time he does so explicitly as narrator is in ch. 1. But his allusions to the covenant, the temple, the “way,” and the wilderness, along with the symbolism of story elements—such as “by the sea,” the point of Israel’s deliverance (1:16; 3:7); “on the mountain,” Sinai reflection on the renewal of the community (3:13–35); “at home,” the golden calf incident (6:1–6); “in the wilderness,” Israel’s place of rebellion (6:7–31)—all fit well with the exodus/NE scheme. The combination of quotations, allusions, and fragments of OT material (details in Watts) makes the case a strong one.

Mark consciously sets the appearance and ministry of Jesus in the context of the NE. For him, this is the story of the beginning of the renewal of God's covenant people, and Jesus is revealed not just as a protagonist in the NE story, but as Israel's returning God. Once it is set in this theological framework, it becomes clear that Jesus is the embodiment of Israel's returning God, in terms both of good news and ominous threat. Astonishingly, the messenger figure of Malachi is from Mark's perspective not just a prototype of John, but an anticipatory icon of Jesus as the bringer of the NE. Jesus embodies the very presence of Israel's Lord.

For Isaiah, the NE motif involves three main stages: Yahweh's deliverance of his exiled people, the journey along the "way" (away from captivity), and arrival in Jerusalem, resulting in Yahweh's enthronement. In light of Isaiah's and Mark's deliberate use of the "way" motif, it seems possible that Mark's threefold geographical progression (Galilee, journey, Jerusalem) is designed as a symbolic allusion to Isaiah's NE motif. This itself does not deny the historicity of his account, but it certainly provides a plausible and even powerful theological explanation of the evangelist's selectivity and narrative arrangement. More importantly, it gives the reader a much-needed framework for making sense of Jesus' death and resurrection. Paradoxically, the cross was "the way" of launching the long-promised NE of God's people—a way of seeming defeat but actual vindication.

Mark and Canon

Given the previous section, we are well on the way to situating Mark's Gospel within the biblical canon. It remains to explore its place within the NT. On grounds of probable dating, Mark's relationship with Paul's letters is especially intriguing. If John Mark is the historical author of the Gospel, a view accepted by most, it is interesting that he and Paul both experienced some tension with the Jerusalem church. The main bone of contention for both Paul and Mark was the initial lack of enthusiasm of the "pillars" toward subordinating Jewish tradition to the exalted Jesus (Mark 7:1–23), thus potentially hindering the progress of the gospel among the Gentiles. Together with Paul's letters, it gives us an excellent insight into the early days of Christianity.

The importance of Mark alongside Matthew's and Luke's Q material has been mentioned. Without the evidence of Mark, our appreciation of Jesus' miracles as signs of Israel's eschatological restoration would be significantly poorer, though Luke makes the same theological point. Both Matthew and Luke are deeply indebted to Mark, though Luke in particular replicates Mark's basic outline, possibly because he recognized Mark's allusion to Isaiah's NE. John seems to have taken care not to duplicate Mark's account, for even where he twice presents the same episode as Mark ("feeding" and "sea" episodes—Mark 6 and John 6), he offers different historical details and theological angles. It appears that he took the widespread existence of Mark's Gospel for granted.

Acts begins with what looks like an alternative to Mark's ending, and the theological rationale for the differences appears straightforward. Acts is (p 483) the second volume of Luke's Gospel and as such connects with Israel's eschatological expectations (such as spiritual restoration) in ways that are replete with Jewish allusions and themes that Mark considered too specific for his Gentile audience. However, both Mark (Isaiah's NE) and Luke-Acts (death-resurrection-ascension-Pentecost cycle) do share an emphasis on the present realization of the kingdom. Even Mark 13 is no exception to the evangelist's interest in pre-70 CE events. It is perfectly plausible to interpret the entire chapter with a first-century referent in mind (France gets close to this).

Peter's greetings in 1 Pet. 5:13 have given rise to speculations about connections between the historical Mark and the author of 1 Peter, even though most literary parallels link 1 Peter to Matthew, not Mark. Perceived ecclesiological (in the general sense of "God's people") differences between Mark and 1 Peter go beyond our purview, for they depend more on exegetical and historical assessments of 1 Peter than Mark's Gospel. Perhaps the most significant overlap between the two documents consists of their common emphasis on Jesus as Isaiah's Suffering Servant (Mark 9:35; 10:45) and their preoccupation with the relationship of faith and suffering.

This last point also closely connects Mark (10:29–30; 13:9–13) to Hebrews. Other common trajectories are their "interior" understanding of purity (Mark 7:1–23), their spiritualized Christian understanding of sacrifice (12:32–34), and their assessment of the Jerusalem temple as a human construction (14:58).

It was implied above that Mark 13 is in its entirety a discourse about the procession toward and climax of the Jewish War. The war and impending fall of the city and temple are presented as another "return" of Jesus, this time as judge (Son of Man; cf. Dan. 7:13). In light of Isaiah's NE motif, Jesus' entry into Jerusalem (Mark 11:1–19) was nothing less than God's return to his people to sacrificially complete Israel's failed mission on her behalf (10:45). The Son of Man's further return to the city as judge (70 CE) brought the negative side of Isaiah's NE to partial fulfillment. In recent scholarship the parousia-oriented eschatology of Revelation has increasingly been interpreted with reference to the first-century experience of the persecuted church, and to that extent Mark's eschatological concern with the first century and the suffering community seems compatible with and similar to that of Revelation.

Mark and Theology

In general terms, Mark's theological agenda can be described as a combination of affirming the faithfulness of Israel's God and the relevance of this for Gentiles. Jesus is the embodiment of Israel's returning God, and as such he enters the city and takes Israel's fate upon himself by becoming the sacrifice for the many (10:45). In the process he pronounces judgment on the corrupt establishment as represented by the temple (11:12–26) and is set to execute the judgment himself, as the Danielic Son of Man, by allowing Jerusalem and the temple to be reduced to rubble (Mark 13). This apparent paradox makes perfect sense once Mark's understanding of Isaiah's NE is taken seriously. Israel is redefined as the renewal movement of those committed to him: The remnant (= disciples) should be able to understand this, Jesus explains. Those outside of this christocentrically defined group, however, experience temporary hardness of heart, thus ensuring that they become subject to the Son of Man's imminent judgment (4:10–12; cf. ch. 13). The Isa. 6 quotation in Mark 4 lays the foundation for the more explicit judgment call of ch. 13. Neither of these texts is about the physical end of the world, yet both are about the end of the (Mosaic) age as humanity knew it. Jesus inaugurated his kingdom decisively, both in self-sacrifice and in judgment, and the clear implication is that his followers should live accordingly. This means readiness for suffering and unfailing loyalty to the One who alone is the defining center of Israel's—and in fact humanity's—renewal. The promise to Abraham is being fulfilled, despite Israel's failure. Jesus and those around him are Israel restored. The responsibility to model authentic creational humanity rests squarely on those who, despite their continuing failures, recognize Jesus as king of Israel and Son of God (15:32–39). Humanity is thus defined christocentrically; ethnicity, social standing, and so forth are transcended in Jesus.

In terms of contemporary relevance, the following selection is suggestive rather than complete (for more discussion, see Telford 214–41). (1) Mark's theology of the cross and self-denial in the name of Jesus stands in stark contrast to modern and postmodern definitions of success in life. Mark's first half (1:1–8:21), which concentrates on glory and success, is followed by an account of the disciples' bitter learning experience in the face of Jesus' self-sacrifice. (2) Jesus' repeated emphasis on the new wine's need for new skins (not always in these words) (p 484) challenges us to examine and reconfigure the role of religious tradition in our understanding of God's people following the Christ event. Yet, the debates about what was permissible on the Sabbath remind our 24/7 society of the important interplay between covenantal demands and creational values. (3) Politically, Mark's Gospel teaches us a healthy skepticism toward ethnically centered or even nationalistic understandings of God's people. Israel's task was not to overthrow the Roman Empire ("Give to Caesar what belongs to Caesar"), but to reform itself by rendering to God what belongs to him. The one who urges his hearers to pay attention (13:14) also informs us that Jesus' political stance seriously raised some eyebrows in Israel (12:17).

Our final question relates to the contribution Mark has to make in the arena of systematic theology. The most significant challenge falls in the areas of Christology and the Trinity. Traditionally, both have been approached in terms of Aristotelian-inspired substance metaphysics. The issue has often been compounded in NT scholarship by subjecting Mark's christological titles rather exclusively to a history-of-religions approach. It would be anachronistic to expect Mark to frame his theological concerns in this way. From his first-century perspective the most pertinent claim is that somehow Christ embodies the returning God of Israel. Along with his fellow writers, he stops far short of ontological speculations about either the natures of Christ or the inner-trinitarian position of Christ. More importantly for him, Christ is the sole definer of the remnant, the true people of God, for he alone is both the returning God of Israel and the fulfiller of Israel's true destiny. It is at this convergence of Christ as God and true man throughout Jesus' life that Mark anchors his implied incarnational Jesus theology. For him, this is not an end in itself, but the crucial component in redefining the centerpiece of the Abrahamic project: humanity—that is God's people—in light of the Son of Man's journey to the cross and beyond. Mark's christological titles should not be interpreted as substance-metaphysical indicators, but as powerful narrative ways of connecting Jesus as God with the remnant people (Son of Man), whose salvific mission he accomplishes on the cross and in resurrection.

Salvation for Mark is not strictly a concern for the future. In his "already/not yet" scheme, the focus is firmly on the "already." People are rehabilitated spiritually, physically, socially, and emotionally—clear indications that the kingdom has arrived. Life after death starts at the transforming encounter with Jesus, not after physical death. The latter is but a stepping-stone along the way. The disciples experience Israel's eagerly awaited restoration. Mark may not be as interested as Luke in linking Jesus' miracles to the power of the eschatologically awaited Spirit, but he is equally clear that the salvation Jesus brings to repentant sinners is nothing less than Israel's restoration. Consequently, for Mark eschatology is a matter of interpreting the present realization of the kingdom as the climactic renewal of Israel. The future matters primarily in its impact on the present, not as a "not yet" reality. Sinners repent not to await salvation, but to enjoy it by living authentically among God's people. Any systematic-theological correlation of eschatology and soteriology focused on a chronologically final sequence of events will do little justice to Mark's theology.

Mark bases his theological confidence squarely on his reading of the OT, especially the NE motif. His other main source for theological reflection on Christ and his people is the disciples' religious experience of Jesus' divine presence. The two are intimately connected throughout his narrative, for it is God's presence through Jesus with the disciples that, more than anything else, illustrates the arrival of the NE. Instead of walking away from his covenant with an unfaithful people, God through Jesus brings to successful completion the mission of Israel as the model people in the world. God is justified after all. For Mark, the communion meal is not only a powerful reminder of this, but a crucial and appropriate speech-act that re-creates among God's people and in creation this divine faithfulness manifested in Jesus. The Abrahamic recovery project of humanity is alive and well—indeed, it has reached a crucial climax, for "the Son of Man ... [has given] his life as a ransom for many" (10:45).

See also Exodus/New Exodus

Bibliography

Bauckham, R. "For Whom Were Gospels Written?" In The Gospels for All Christians, ed. R. Bauckham. Eerdmans, 1997; Bryan, C. A Preface to Mark. Oxford University Press, 1993; Dihle, A. "Die Evangelien und die biographische Tradition der Antike." ZTK 80 (1983): 33–49; France, R. T. The Gospel of Mark. NIGTC. Eerdmans, 2002; Gundry, R. Mark. Eerdmans, 1993; Hengel, M. Studies in the Gospel of Mark, trans. J. Bowden. SCM, 1985; Marcus, J. Mark 1–8. AB. Doubleday, 2000; Marxsen, W. Mark the Evangelist, trans. J. Boyce et al. Abingdon, 1969; Ruppert, L. Jesus als der leidende Gerechte? SBS. Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1972; Steichele, (p 485)H.-J. Der leidende Sohn Gottes. BU 14. F. Pustet, 1980; Strauss, D. F. The Life of Jesus Critically Examined. Translated from the 4th German ed. by G. Eliot. Fortress, 1972; Telford, W. The Theology of the Gospel of Mark. NTT. Cambridge University Press, 1999; Watts, R.

Isaiah's New Exodus in Mark. BSL. Baker, 2000; Wrede, W. The Messianic Secret, trans. J. C. G. Greig. J. Clarke, 1971.

Thorsten Moritz

Marriage     See Male and Female; Sexuality

Mary

In the NT, the texts in which Mary appears are Matt. 1–2; 12:46–50; 13:55; Mark 3:31–35; 6:3; Luke 1–2; 8:19–21; 11:27–28; John 2:1–12; 6:42; 19:25–27; Acts 1:14; and Gal. 4:4. Surely for our understanding of Mary in the Protestant wings of Christendom, the texts that bear Mary in the NT will be of greatest importance and authority for our embrace of her theologically. Mary thus tells the story of Jesus as his mother, as his disciple, as witness of his crucifixion, as grounding his humanity, as witness to his resurrection appearances.

The Roman Catholic Church adds four official dogmas about Mary. The first is Mary as the Bearer of God, or theotokos. This was first put forth at the Council of Ephesus in 431. This doctrine is important because it tells the story of Jesus' divinity and paradoxically his humanity as well. The second dogma is the Perpetual Virginity of Mary, accepted by the Lateran Council in 649, which declares that Mary was a virgin before, during, and after Jesus' birth. Here Protestants part with Catholics. The third dogma is the Immaculate Conception, promulgated by Pope Pius IX in 1854. This is often misunderstood to refer to Jesus' conception, but rather refers to Mary's sinless conception. In 1950 Pope Pius XII promulgated the fourth dogma, the Bodily Assumption. It declares that Mary was taken up into heaven and that her body is not under the laws of natural decay and corruption. In addition, there is a corpus of "pious beliefs" that are known as the Marian Theses, not dogmas binding on the faithful, but beliefs acknowledged by the Magisterium. These beliefs hold Mary to be (1) coredemptrix with Christ, (2) mediatrix, (3) the dispensatrix of all graces, (4) the Queen of Heaven, and (5) the prototype of the church.

But what does this mean for Protestants? To consider much of Protestantism alone, today one would think that Mary is nonexistent liturgically, devotionally, and theologically. Insisting that Mary not eclipse Christ, Protestant Churches have come to the almost complete suppression of Mary. However, we must hold on to her not just as a character in the story of Jesus but as the very Mother of God, while eschewing any devotion to Mary herself. Because any statement about Mary must be a christological statement, the Protestant wings of the church must, even while disavowing Mariolatry, hold to the confession of Mary as the “Mother of the Lord,” theotokos, as upheld by both Luther and Reformed Orthodoxy. Thus, Mary can tell the story of the very gospel of sola gratia.

A good illustration of this can be found in the first and largest church of Western Christianity dedicated to Mary, Santa Maria Maggiore, in Rome. It was founded ca. 350 CE by Pope Liberius, and Pope Sixtus III had the church restored in the fifth century to commemorate the declaration of Mary’s Divine Motherhood by the Council of Ephesus in 431. In the nave are some of the most spectacular early mosaics of Western Christian art portraying scenes from the OT.

Two particularly significant relics are at this building. One is the remains of Jerome, fourth-century Doctor of the Church, colleague of Augustine, with whom he carried out a vigorous correspondence, and translator of the Bible into Latin. Jerome was one of the only church fathers of his day to know Hebrew well enough (he admitted his knowledge was second only to that of Paula, his colleaguehis colleague) ) to to translate the Bible from the original Hebrew texts of the OT. He lived out his later life in Bethlehem, translating in a cell near the cave where Jesus was said to have been born and which was venerated as a holy place. Also in Sta. Maria Maggiore in Rome is another Bethlehem relic: a piece of the Holy Manger from that cave near Jerome’s cell. This network of images at Sta. Maria Maggiore is profound: Holy Mary, Mother of God, Bethlehem, the birth of God-with-us, Jerome’s study of the word in the OT, scenes from the OT flanking the nave, the crèche kept here inviting us to have our hearts be crèches ever anew, reminding us of Mary “keeping these things, pondering them in her heart.”

The mosaics of the nave of Sta. Maria Maggiore themselves tell a story, and a surprising one in a certain sense: these mosaics all are scenes from the OT. Why would a church dedicated to the Mother of God—the apse mosaic of which depicts Mary being crowned Queen of Heaven by Christ and her Dormition just below—why would these nave mosaics give such prominence to OT stories? The key is the content of the scenes. They are not just any scenes taken at random, but are (p 486) understood to be among the stories that weave the greater narrative of redemption: Noah, Abraham, Moses, Joshua. They are typologies that point to Christ, and that ultimately tell the story of sola gratia, grace alone.

This broad plan that these mosaics of Sta. Maria Maggiore present for us is a sort of family tree of Jesus, or maybe more appropriately a typological tree. And the fit between typology and history is profound: Mary grounds Jesus’ humanity and history, without which this typological foreshadowing would have no fulfilling. Yet just as grounding his humanity, she is the mother also of his divinity. Just as she is the Mother of the Son of Man, so she is the Mother of God, for Jesus is confessed to be “truly human and truly divine,” indivisibly so.

See also Jesus Christ, Doctrine of; Typology

Kathryn Greene-McCreight

Masoretic Text     See Translation

Matthew, Book of

The popularity of the Gospel of Matthew enhanced its influence on the theology of the early church and made it an important object of early Christian theologizing. Its Jewish slant combined with its interest in the discipling of “all the nations” to give it universal appeal (28:19 [all ET by author]). Its systematic organization lent it to heavy liturgical use. (To this day, its version of the Lord’s Prayer is regularly used instead of Luke’s.) And its featuring the ethical teaching of Jesus made it especially suitable for catechetical instruction.

Historical Examples of Interplay between Matthew and Theology

Without evaluation, here are some of the more important instances of interplay between Matthew and theology. The doctrine of the Immaculate Conception grew out of the story of Jesus’ virgin birth (1:18–25; also in Luke). The doctrine of Mary’s perpetual virginity marked a further development. John the Baptist’s saying he needs Jesus to baptize him has played into the doctrine of Jesus’ sinlessness, and Jesus’ insisting on baptism by John “to fulfill all righteousness” despite his (Jesus’) sinlessness played into the doctrine of Christ’s imputed righteousness (3:14–17).

The designation of Jesus as God’s Son at the baptism contributed to adoptionism, and the temptation of Jesus (4:1–11) raised the theological question whether he was able not to sin or was not able to sin. His affirmation of every jot and tittle of the Law and the Prophets (5:18) has been used to undergird belief in the verbal, plenary inspiration and inerrancy of Scripture. The nonabolishment of the Law and demand that it be taught and kept (5:17–20) have posed a theological confrontation with Paul’s rejection of law-righteousness. Jesus’ escalation of the law’s demands (5:21–48) led to perfectionism (as in the monastic and Anabaptist traditions), ethical idealism (as in the two-kingdoms doctrine of Lutheranism), the social gospel (as in Protestant liberalism), and limitation to a future millennium (as in dispensationalism).

Matthew's pervasive stress on the kingdom of heaven has gone in the theological directions of consistent eschatology (Jesus thought the end was about to come), ecclesiology (the church represents the kingdom), and millenarianism (Jesus offered the kingdom to the Jewish nation—"the gospel of the kingdom" differing from the Christian gospel—and most Jews refused it, so that the kingdom will arrive in a future millennium only after the interim of the church age). Consistent eschatology produced interim ethics (ethics for only the brief period before the expected end). An ecclesiastical kingdom put emphasis on the visible church as an institution, a mixture of the true and false, a mixture that also raised questions of church discipline. A millennial kingdom led to belief in a restoration of the Jewish nation, complete with a reinstitution of the OT law as interpreted by Matthew's Jesus. Indeed, dispensationalists have often regarded the Gospel of Matthew as not addressed to the church. Parables of the kingdom, such as those of the mustard seed and leaven (13:31–33), have been thought to support the dominance of the church in society at large (as in the Middle Ages), the eventual conversion of the whole world (as in postmillennialism), and the corruption of the institutional church (according to the dispensational understanding of leaven as symbolizing evil, and the birds that nest in mustard branches as symbolizing false teachers).

The prominence of Peter in Matthew, especially in the beatitude pronounced on him by Jesus (16:17–19), has been used to support the Roman Catholic doctrine of the papacy. Nevertheless, "the rock" on which Jesus said he would build his church has also been identified, not with Peter either as the first in a line of popes or by himself, but with his confession of Jesus as the Christ, with Jesus himself, and with Jesus' "words" (cf. 7:24–27). Peter's denying Jesus "before ... all" (p 487)(26:70) combines with Jesus' denying before his Father those who have denied him before others (10:33) and with Matthew's omission of Peter's name from the story of Jesus' resurrection (contrast 28:7 with Mark 16:7) to suggest in Matthew's portrayal of Peter the symbolism of a false disciple.

The eschatological discourse in chs. 24–25 has been referred to the Jewish War of 66–70 CE, to a future tribulation, and to a following return of Christ. The judgmental separation of the nations into sheep and goats has been theologically geared to general humanitarianism on the part of individuals, to true Christians' treatment of their persecuted fellows, and to treatment of the Jewish people by nations qua nations.

Matthew's Christology and Soteriology

A survey of Matthew's Christology and soteriology, with hamartiological, ecclesiological, and eschatological entailments, reveals the extent to which this Gospel and theology can contribute to each other.

Christology. Historic Christology speaks of humanity and deity in the one person Jesus and helps readers of Matthew to see in it just such a Christology, while a reading of Matthew contributes to its construction. Jesus' humanity appears clearly in the genealogy with which Matthew starts. In contrast with Luke's genealogy of Jesus, which goes back to God (Luke 3:38), Matthew's starts with the human being Abraham, gives prominence to David, and prepares for emphasis on Jesus' Davidic ancestry (1:1–2, 6, 17, 20; 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30–31; 21:9, 15). Apparently written for a Jewish audience, however, Matthew's Gospel lays at least equal emphasis on Jesus' deity, for to Jews this was more unbelievable and objectionable (cf. 26:63–66).

The designation of Jesus as "God-with-us" (1:23) is matched by the replacement of "God" with Jesus' "I" in the promise, "And behold, I am with you all the days till the consummation of the age" (28:20). This designation is also supported in the middle of Matthew's Gospel with Jesus' assurance that where two or three are gathered in his name, there he is "in their midst" (18:20). Because of his reference to "every word coming out through the mouth of God" (4:4, but lacking in the parallel, Luke 4:4), the opening of his mouth to teach (5:2) makes his teaching consist of the very words of God, in consonance with Jesus' being "God-with-us."

God the Father is the first to pronounce Jesus his Son (already in the OT; cf. 2:15 with Hos. 11:1), and in further such pronouncements adds both "beloved" to the designation and the command, "Hear him." This distinguishes Jesus from other sons of God (3:17; 17:5; contrast 5:9, 45), so that the relation between the Father and the Son is unique (11:27). Matthew's changing the baptismal voice from "You are my beloved Son" (Mark 1:11//Luke 3:22) to "This is my beloved Son" turns an assurance to Jesus into a pronouncement about him. Accordingly, his disciples prostrate themselves before him, even while they are in a boat, and say, "Truly you are God's Son" (14:33). Peter adds to his confession of Jesus as "the Christ" the further identification, "the Son of the living God" (16:16; lacking in Mark 8:29//Luke 9:20). Not as in Mark 15:39 and Luke 23:47, the guards at Jesus' crucifixion join their centurion to declare, "Truly this one was God's Son," upon seeing among other things "the earthquake" that occurred when Jesus "let go" his spirit, an earthquake being typical of theophanies in the OT. Likewise, Jesus has angels just as God does (13:41; 16:27; 24:31), and the kingdom is his as well as the Father's (13:41; 16:28).

At the climactic close of his Gospel, Matthew puts emphasis on Jesus' deity in an incipiently trinitarian passage by sandwiching Jesus as "the Son" between God "the Father" and "the Holy Spirit" in a baptismal formula that features "the name" (singular!) of the three. Even if "the name" were meant to be repeatedly supplied before "of the Son" and before "of the Holy Spirit," the very ellipses would draw the three closely together. The participation of the Father and the Holy Spirit at Jesus' baptism previewed this trinitarian climax.

Matthew does not mention Jesus' preexistence as God's Son, as John, Paul, and Hebrews do. But Matthew does narrate the virginal conception and birth of Jesus (1:18–25), as John, Paul, and Hebrews do not. Considering the whole of the NT canon, then, systematic theologians may legitimately interpret the virginal conception and birth of Jesus as the means by which the preexistent Second Person of the Trinity became incarnate. Thus, both Matthew on the one hand and John, Paul, and Hebrews on the other hand contribute to a larger theological picture. And though Luke mentions Jesus' preexistence no more than Matthew does, perhaps we have the beginnings of this picture already in Luke's tracing of Jesus' genealogy back to God, designating Jesus as God's Son at the annunciation to Mary, and attributing the virginal conception of Jesus to the work of the Holy Spirit (Luke 1:26–38).

(p 488)Soteriology. Right after presenting Jesus himself, Matthew introduces the topic of salvation, and his first mention of it indicates that salvation consists of deliverance from sins (1:21). The plural "sins" implies that Matthew does not conceive of sin as an external power that has enslaved its victims so as to make them sin against their will (contrast esp. Rom. 7:7–23). By modifying "sins," "their" fixes the blame for sinning on the sinners themselves, so that deliverance from sins means deliverance from punishment for sinful acts, such as those listed in 15:19: "evil designs, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false testimonies, blasphemies" (all plurals in this list). With this view of salvation agree Matthew's references to forgiveness of moral debts (release from having to pay them—6:12; cf. 18:27, 32, 35), forgiveness of trespasses (6:14–15), and forgiveness of sins (9:2, 5–6; 26:28), even every sin and blasphemy except for blasphemy against the Spirit (12:31–32). The plural of "debts," "trespasses," and "sins" is again notable, as is also the modifier "every" when "sin" and "blasphemy" occur in the singular.

On the other hand, salvation consists in rescue from "evil" (neuter) or "the evil one" (masculine, 6:13). The use of the masculine in 13:19 for the "evil one" who snatches the word of the kingdom out of hearers' hearts favors a reference to Satan in both passages (cf. also 5:37, where "the evil one" stands opposite "the Lord,” “God,” and “the Great King” in the preceding verses; and 13:38–39, where “the evil one” equates with “the devil”). So rescue from the evil one means rescue from the devil, Satan, as the one who tempts people to commit sins (4:1–11; 16:23).

Thus, Matthew portrays human beings as responsible for their sins rather than victimized by sin as a dominating force, as Paul does. But just as Paul does not negate human responsibility, so Matthew does not negate the satanic power of temptation. Systematic theology must take into account the tension between human responsibility and external influences in the matter of sin just as in the matter of repentance and faith.

To the woman who has an issue of blood, Jesus pronounces salvation (9:22); and at his crucifixion chief priests, scribes, and elders say, “He saved others; he cannot save himself!” (27:42). Since the supposed inability of Jesus to save himself has to do with physical deliverance from crucifixion, his antithetically parallel saving of others had to do with deliverance from the physical effects of their sins, just as the woman’s salvation had to do with stopping her issue of blood (cf. 4:23–24; 8:16–17; 11:4–5; and other stories of healings, exorcisms, and the raising of a dead person). Perhaps it is relief from these physical effects of sinning to which Jesus refers in promising rest to the weary and heavy laden who come to him (11:28–30; cf. his miracles mentioned in the earlier part of ch. 11). Such relief raises the question of “healing in the atonement” (as in Pentecostal theology; cf. 8:17) and links up with Paul’s description of a better body at the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:42–55; 2 Cor. 5:1–5; Phil. 3:21) and with John the Seer’s description of believers’ eternal state (Rev. 7:17; 21:4).

For Matthew, however, salvation goes beyond deliverance from the physical effects of sin. It extends to deliverance from condemnation (11:22–24), from being lost and perishing (18:14), from wrath (3:7), from being thrown into a furnace of unquenchable, eternal fire and thus from weeping and gnashing of teeth (3:10–12; 7:19; 13:30, 42, 50; 18:8–9). Positively, salvation extends to justification, being pronounced righteous because of one’s words (12:36–37), to entrance into life (18:8–9; 19:17) with the result of having life that is eternal (19:16). This entrance into life comes by way of entrance into the kingdom of heaven (18:3)—through bodily resurrection, if necessitated by prior death (12:41–42; 22:23–33; 27:51b–53). The result is participation in God’s heavenly rule on earth, a participation that brings with itself comfort in place of mourning, property in place of poverty, vindication in place of shame, mercy in place of judgment, a vision of God, acknowledgment as God’s sons and daughters, and great reward in place of persecution (5:3–12). The links with Johannine soteriology (e.g., John 3:16, 36; Rev. 20:11–15) are obvious, as also the link with Pauline justification. Yet, systematic theologians must forge an accommodation between justification by the quality of the words one speaks and justification by faith, just as they have to forge an accommodation between justification by the quality of one's works (James 2:14–26) and justification by faith. Presumably this accommodation rests on the distinction between an inward state of faith and the outward evidence of faith.

Jesus saves, as his very name indicates (1:21; cf. Peter's outcry in 14:30, "Lord, save me," though he was asking Jesus to save him from drowning). Since salvation includes forgiveness of sins, salvation by Jesus naturally includes his forgiveness of sins (9:1–7). And since he acts always in consort with God, salvation naturally includes forgiveness by the Father in heaven as well (6:12 with 6:9). Furthermore, since Jesus' baptizing of people in the Holy Spirit and fire appears in its Matthean (p 489) context to consist of his Spirit-endowed ministry, the Holy Spirit joins Jesus and God the Father in the act of salvation (3:11–17). This trinitarian cast accords with Matthew's trinitarian formula for baptism, discussed above (28:19; cf. the trinitarian cast of salvation in Eph. 1:3–14).

That Jesus, God the Father, and the Holy Spirit do the saving presents a vertical axis of salvation. But a horizontal axis appears, too. For disciples' restoration of a sinning fellow disciple counts as gaining that fellow disciple so that the straying one does not perish (18:12–18). Thus, we can say that in Matthew disciples save each other. Not only "the Son of Man" but also "human beings" (plural) have "authority" to forgive sins (9:8 with 9:1–7; cf. 18:21–35). Since salvation includes forgiveness, as already noted, and since the authority of human beings to forgive sins parallels the Son of Man's authority to do so, we can say once again that in Matthew disciples save each other.

Matthew does not stop with trinitarian and ecclesial salvation, however. His soteriology proceeds to self-salvation. Those who lose their lives for Jesus' sake will find—save—their lives (16:24–26). Such a losing of life counts as "one's own doing" (16:27), so that you save yourself (cf. Phil. 2:12–13, "With fear and trembling work out your own salvation," though Matthew has nothing corresponding to Paul's addition, "for God is the one working in you"; also John 6:29, , where believing is "the work" that God requires where believing is "the work" that God requires). ). Again, a systematic theological distinction between inward state and outward evidence is required to avoid synergism.

It is Jesus' "people" who are saved (1:21; cf. "my church" in 16:18). They are those who “call his name ‘Immanuel,’ ” those who confess that in him “God [is] with us” (1:23), and who make this confession in public despite the threat of persecution (10:32–33). The third person plural of “they will call” in Matthew’s quotation of Isa. 7:14 is text-critically unique. No other known text of the OT passage has the third person plural. Most likely, then, Matthew himself produced this reading by altering a different one so as to define the people whom Jesus saves as those who call his name Immanuel. They are a sinful people; at least they were sinning prior to his saving them from their sins. But he came to call sinners, not the righteous (9:9–13).

For the saved, Matt. 21:43 uses another collective term, “nation.” Jesus’ having saved them as a people from their sins, they are now a nation that produces the fruits of God’s kingdom: good deeds, righteous conduct (see, e.g., 5:16; 21:32). Comprising this nation are people of faith in Jesus, and of discipleship to him, from all nations (8:10–11; 28:19), plus holy ones, saints, from the past (27:51b–53). This makes an international nation of little people, social nobodies, and mental infants as to human wisdom and prudence (10:42; 11:25; 18:6, 10, 14; 25:40, 45). But the saved are few, the Monaco of nations as far as population is concerned (7:13–14), so few as to be a family (5:22–24, 47; 7:3–5; 10:21; 12:46–50; 18:15, 21, 35; 25:40; 28:10). These are the saved.

Because of their mental infantilism, Jesus’ people have to be saved by divine revelation (11:25–26), by God’s giving them to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven (13:11). Because of their sins, Jesus’ people have to be saved by divine mercy (5:7) and generosity (19:30–20:16), and by the service of Jesus in giving his life as a ransom in substitution for them (20:28), by the shedding of his covenantal blood “for the forgiveness of sins” (26:28; contrast the taunt, “Save yourself . . . and come down from the cross” [27:40–42], and Elijah’s not coming to save Jesus from death by crucifixion [27:49]). Thence comes the doctrine of substitutionary atonement. So much for what is done on behalf of Jesus’ people for salvation.

What do they need to do for themselves? They need to repent of their sins by being baptized, confessing their sins during baptism, and producing fruit worthy of repentance—speaking and acting in a way that shows their baptism in water to have been prompted by genuine repentance (3:6–10; 7:16–20; 12:33–35; 21:43; 28:19–20). They produce such fruit by learning and keeping the law as explained, commanded, and exemplified by Jesus (5:20–48; 11:29; 13:1–23, 51–52; 19:16–19; 28:19–20). Such learning and obedience mean leaving the way of wickedness and going the way of righteousness (21:28–32), speaking good words (12:33–35), doing good deeds (5:16; 16:27; 25:14–30), converting themselves into the lowly position of little children (18:3–4), not causing others to stumble into sin (18:6–7), and not stumbling into sin themselves (18:8–9). The list of specifics goes on and on: meekness, mercy, purity of heart, peacemaking, conciliation, avoidance of lust, maintenance of marriage, truthfulness, love of enemies, prayer for persecutors, secret charity, secret fasting, secret praying, forgiveness of debtors, forgiveness of those who have sinned against you, renunciation of earthly wealth, self-criticism, practice of the Golden Rule (see the whole of the Sermon on the Mount [chs. 5–7] and passages such as 18:21–35; 19:21–30, among (p 490)others). Matthew will not present salvation apart from these and other evidence—for example, the absence of vices opposite to the foregoing virtues—that repentance was genuine.

Repentance from sins and the practice of virtue do not suffice for salvation, however. One must also believe in Jesus (18:6; cf. 8:25–26; 9:2, 22; 14:31; 16:8; 28:17). Believing in him entails confessing him in public (10:32–33); calling him “Immanuel” (1:23); loving him more than one loves father, mother, son, or daughter (10:37); taking one’s cross and following him, which means risking persecution by open discipleship (10:38–39; 16:24–27); persevering under persecution (10:16–23; 24:9–13; cf. 13:18–23; and contrast the denials of Jesus by Peter [26:69–75] and Judas Iscariot’s betrayal of Jesus [26:47–57]). Because of double mention by Matthew, it bears emphasis that under persecution one must persevere to be saved: “But the one persevering to the end—this one will be saved” (10:22; 24:13). In contrast is the one who hears the word and receives it immediately and joyfully, but because of tribulation and persecution turns out to be “temporary” and stumbles into sin rather than bearing the fruit of good deeds (13:20–21). Matthew’s stress on the necessity of perseverance is not balanced by an equal stress on the comfort of eternal security, so that a systematic theology must supplement Matthew with John and Paul.

Belief in Jesus shows itself not only through perseverance under persecution, but also through endangering oneself by extending hospitality and charity to fellow disciples who are fleeing persecution (cf. 10:41–42; 25:31–46 with 10:11–13, 23, most of this material being unique to Matthew). More generally, genuineness of repentance and belief shows itself in faithful, prudent, and kind treatment of fellow disciples; otherwise, there awaits dichotomization, a fate shared with the hypocrites, and weeping and gnashing of teeth (24:45–51).

Negatively, Matthew takes pains to note that salvation does not come by baptism as such (3:7). To drive this point home, he shifts the phrase “for the forgiveness of sins” from John’s baptism (so Mark 1:4/Luke 3:3) to the words of institution (Matt. 26:28). Again negatively, Matthew notes twice that salvation does not come by virtue of Abraham’s ancestry (3:9; 8:11–12).

Forgiveness of sins takes place in the present. “Your sins are being forgiven,” Jesus says to a paralytic (9:2). Then he heals the paralytic to prove that as the Son of Man “on the earth,” he has authority to be forgiving sins (9:6). Inversely, blasphemy against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven “in this age” (12:31–32). But neither will it be forgiven “in the coming [age].” Since forgiveness of sins equates with salvation, then, salvation occurs both now and hereafter. By virtue of repentance and coming to hear the wisdom of Solomon, respectively, the men of Nineveh and the queen of the South will rise up “in the judgment” and condemn Jesus’ generation. Corresponding to the condemnation of Jesus’ generation, then, the salvation of the men of Nineveh and the queen of the South must take place in the day of judgment, which is also the day of resurrection. Since those who do not turn and become like little children “will by no means enter the kingdom of heaven” (18:3), the entrance of those who do convert will likewise occur in the future. And the going away of the righteous into eternal life (25:46) will occur “when the Son of Man comes in his glory, and all the angels with him,” at which time “he will sit on his throne of glory” and judge “all the nations.”

Notably, Matthew presents a catchall doctrine of salvation (cf. his catchall Christology: Jesus as the Christ, Immanuel, the Son of God, the Son of Man, Lord, and Wisdom). His is the soteriology of both-and rather than this-but-not-that. In 19:16–30, for example, having eternal life, inheriting eternal life, entering life, entering the kingdom, having treasure in heaven, and being saved—all carry the same soteriological meaning. Fine distinctions mean little to Matthew. Though he distinguishes between repentance and belief on the one hand and evidence (“fruit”) on the other hand, he does not distinguish cleanly between salvation as a gift and salvation as a reward, or clearly deny the latter in favor of the former, as Paul does. And it remains unclear what relationship, if any, exists between the covenant in which Jesus’ blood is shed for the forgiveness of sins (26:28) and the various covenants that the OT talks about. For answers to these questions, systematic theology requires the letters of Paul and Hebrews.

Within Matthew’s soteriological potpourri, however, we can discern certain emphases. For him, salvation consists primarily of forgiveness of sins (though this element is expressed in a variety of terms). But stress falls not so much on God's forgiving mercy, accepted through faith, as on human beings' saving themselves in the sense of demonstrating that they have truly repented of their sins. Thus, it is the righteous who are saved, and they are saved by persevering in the superiorly righteous conduct they have learned from Jesus' teaching and example. Because they (p 491) must persevere to the end, their salvation occurs mainly in the future.

Matthew's soteriological emphases seem to have grown out of circumstances in which he perceived Jewish Christians to be suffering persecution from fellow Jews who had not become Christians. As a result, and as always happens in times of persecution, some were falling away to save their necks. Matthew saw Christians, Judas-like, betraying other Christians to their persecutors (24:10). He saw Christians, Peter-like, falsifying their earlier profession with public denials of Christ (10:33). He saw their distinctively Christian conduct lapsing in such a way as to make them indistinguishable from their fellow Jews who made no Christian profession (24:12). He saw them failing to evangelize those fellow Jews and failing to make disciples of Gentiles as well, for such evangelistic efforts would mark them for persecution.

Warning! Your salvation depends on perseverance in the Christian life and witness. Otherwise you will be lost along with those who make no profession, many of them your very persecutors. Prove yourselves true. Do not let persecution lead you to hide your connection with Jesus. Flee if you must, but preach the gospel of the kingdom wherever you go. And do your good works as Christians in the full gaze of the public, even to the extent of endangering yourselves by openly ministering to persecuted fellow Christians. The day of judgment is coming. Show yourselves salty, not saltless; wise builders, not foolish ones; wheat, not tares; good fish, not bad; wearing a wedding garment, not lacking one; useful in service, not slothful and useless; wise virgins, not foolish ones. Do not slip into the category of goats rather than sheep. Your salvation is at stake. Make sure you are one of the few that will be saved.

If Matthew's emphasis on salvation by works of righteousness arises out of a need for persecuted Christians to prove the genuineness of their profession, we might ask whether a similar emphasis in the Letter of James arises out of the same need, or out of a different one. If out of a different one, has the difference in need made a difference in the emphasis? In James, the emphasis arises out of a need to quell contentiousness within local assemblies; hence, the works of righteousness have to do with the gaining, or regaining, of harmony in those assemblies. In Matthew, however, the emphasis arises out of a need to prove genuineness of Christian profession under persecution; hence, the works of righteousness have to do with the risks of open discipleship and Christian evangelism in the larger society.

If Matthew's emphasis arises out of a need for persecuted Christians to prove the genuineness of their profession, we might also ask whether the emphasis has a purpose of combating Paul's doctrine of salvation—or, as he prefers to say, justification—by faith apart from works, or of combating an antinomian aberration of Paul's doctrine. To ask the question in terms of persecution is to cast doubt on an affirmative answer. The same is true if we ask whether Matthew's emphasis has the purpose of combating, or competing with, the rabbinic Judaism that was evolving in the last quarter of the first century. For it is one thing to claim superiority over that Judaism for the purpose of keeping persecuted Christians true to the faith, but it would be quite another thing to claim superiority over that Judaism for the purpose of taking command of Jewish religious life. And to suppose a synergy of both purposes founders on the unlikelihood that a persecuted minority thought of taking over the large, persecuting body. On the contrary and as already noted, Matthew underlines the fewness of those who will be saved: "For the gate is small, and the way is narrow that leads to life, and few are those who find it" (7:14):

These emphases pose the danger of legalism and need balancing by the doctrine of the indwelling Spirit, through whose life and power alone Jesus' disciples can fulfill the righteous requirement of the law (Rom. 8:1–4). But it is good to have Matthew's emphases without that balance; for in some situations to introduce the doctrine of the Spirit quickly is to dull the edge of the demands made on Jesus' disciples. They might fail to feel the pain caused by the sharp edge of those demands. Only when that pain is felt will the Spirit's enablement amount to more than a comfortable sanctification open to the incursion of antinomianism. Wherever the church has grown large and mixed, wherever the church is polarized between the extremes of latitudinarianism and sectarianism, wherever the church feels drawn to accommodation with forces that oppose the gospel, wherever the church loses its vision of worldwide evangelism, wherever the church lapses into smug religiosity with its attendant vices of ostentation, hypocrisy, and haughty disdain for its underprivileged and correspondingly zealous members—there the Gospel of Matthew speaks with power and pertinence. (Gundry 9–10)

Bibliography

Blomberg, C. Matthew. Broadman, 1992; Burgess, J. A History of the Exegesis of Matthew 6:17–19 from 1781 to 1965. Edwards Brothers, 1976; Carlston, C. "Christology (p 492) and Church in Matthew." Pages 1283–1304 in The Four Gospels 1992, ed. F. Van Segbroeck et al. Leuven University Press, 1992; English, E. Studies in the Gospel according to Matthew. F. H. Revell, 1935; Green, H. The Gospel according to Matthew. Oxford University Press, 1975; Guelich, R. The Sermon on the Mount. Word, 1982; Gundry, R. Matthew. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1994; Hagner, D. "Apocalyptic Motifs in the Gospel of Matthew: Continuity and Discontinuity." HBT 7 (1985): 53–82; idem. Matthew 1–13. Word, 1993; Luz, U. Matthew 1–7. Augsburg, 1989; idem. Matthew 8–20. Fortress, 2001; idem. Matthew in History. Fortress, 1994; idem. The Theology of the Gospel of Matthew. Cambridge University Press, 1995; Meier, J. P. The Vision of Matthew. Paulist, 1979; Przybylski, B. Righteousness in Matthew and His World of Thought. Cambridge University Press, 1980; Simonetti, M., ed. Matthew 1–13. ACCSNT 1a. InterVarsity, 2001; idem. Matthew 14–28. ACCSNT 1b. InterVarsity, 2002; Suggs, M. J. Wisdom, Christology, and Law in Matthew's Gospel. Harvard University Press, 1970.

Robert H. Gundry

Meaning

Meaning is one of the most disputed notions in contemporary philosophy, and the questions raised about it range over a wide spectrum of topics. Indeed, philosophers from very different traditions have gone so far as to doubt the existence of meaning altogether or the possibility of making sense of it (Quine; Derrida; Oswald). The most pertinent topics in a scriptural context have to do with what meaning is, whether there are limits to it, and what determines textual meaning. These are relevant here in particular because they reveal the important role that theology plays in scriptural interpretation.

What Is Meaning?

There is a sense of meaning that is important in a religious context but that does not especially have to do with language or texts, and therefore with Scriptures. This is the notion of meaning as significance.

Meaning as Significance. In this sense, meaning is taken to involve importance, relevance, and consequences (Hirsch; Gracia, Theory). The meaning of X, for example, is the significance that X has for, say, Y. We speak of a particular event as having meaning because it had important historical repercussions, and we refer to something as being meaningful when it is considered to be relevant for something else. On the other hand, we dismiss the meaning of certain events because they have no important consequences or we consider them irrelevant in particular contexts. The sense of meaning as significance is easily applicable to Scriptures, although it is not particularly tied to them, or even to texts or language in general. Anything whatever can have meaning or be meaningful in this sense.

The notion of meaning is also, and particularly, used in the context of linguistic phenomena. We speak about the meaning of words, sentences, or texts, although there are important differences in the views that have been proposed to account for the meaning of these, and not every theory applies to all of them. For example, the so-called Causal Theory is intended to apply to names rather than sentences (Kripke 1987). And the Verificationist Theory proposed by the members of the Vienna Circle, according to which the meaning of a sentence is given in the account of the conditions under which it would be true, is not intended to account for the meaning of words (Ayer). Because of space limitations, this article ignores the differences between theories of meaning applicable to words, sentences, or texts in particular, and addresses meaning generally as it applies to all three kinds of linguistic entities. Most important in a scriptural context, however, are theories that have to do with the meaning of texts, for Scriptures are texts.

The general views of meaning most often proposed fall into at least four main classes, depending on whether they identify meaning with reference, intention, ideas, or use. All four have interesting implications for scriptural meaning.

Meaning as Reference. Some argue that the meaning of a word is the same as its reference or, as it is often put, its extension (Frege). The meaning of “Paul” is Paul, and the meaning of “human being” is the group of human beings. In the case of declarative sentences, their meanings are the facts expressed by the sentences. The meaning of “Christ was born in Bethlehem” is the fact that Christ was born in that town. In this sense, meanings are neither in the mind (psychologism) nor in the head (physicalism) unless they happen to be mental or neurological entities, as is the case with the meanings of “thought” or “neuron.”

The referential view of meaning appears to work well when applied to proper names that refer to existing persons. Something similar can be said about definite descriptions, such as “the mother of Jesus” whose meaning is Mary, or certain declarative sentences, such as the one given earlier. But it is more difficult to apply it to proper names of fictitious characters or of abstract nouns, because it is not clear what their reference would be. The case of sentences also poses difficulties, for the status of facts has never been established convincingly. Other troubling (p 493) cases are commands and exclamations insofar as these have meaning and yet there seem to be no things to which they refer.

Finally, there are cases in which two different words or phrases have the same reference but appear to have different meanings. Consider “the writer of the book of Revelation” and “the apostle who accompanied Mary to Calvary.” Assuming that the writer of the book of Revelation is also the apostle who accompanied Mary to Calvary, the reference of these expressions is the same, but still the meaning is quite different.

Meaning as Intention. An alternative to the referential view argues that the meanings of sentences in particular are reducible to the intentions speakers have to produce beliefs in listeners through the recognition of those intentions (Grice). In this sense, meanings are states of mind.

But does it make sense to say that the meanings of texts are intentions? Consider the text, “In the beginning was the Word,” which opens the Gospel according to John. Does it make sense to say that the meaning of these words is the intention John had when he wrote the words? Some would say that it is not for at least three reasons: First, the meaning seems to have to do with the words themselves, regardless of any intention John may have had. Second, how can anyone but John have any access to his intention except through the very words in question? And third, the meaning of the words does not seem to be anything in John’s mind, whether an intention or any other state; the meaning of “In the beginning was the Word” is that in the beginning was the Word, and this does not appear to be anything mental.

Meaning as Ideas. Other philosophers adopt an ideational view of meaning, according to which meaning consists of ideas, although some of them would object to the use of the terms “idea” and “ideational” to refer to their views. Those who hold versions of this position differ in particular in their understanding of what these ideas or entities are, and whether they are nonmental forms (Plato), abstract objects (Frege), mental concepts or images (Locke), mental or neurological states, or the result of the last two (Fodor).

This view of meaning encounters various difficulties depending on how ideas are interpreted. For example, if they are taken to be forms or abstract objects independent of the mind, then questions arise as to their status, origin, and relation to the mind. And if they are interpreted as mental concepts or images, or as mental or neurological states (or their results), then it is not clear that they account for meaning, as was evident in the intentionalist view. It does not seem to make sense to say that the meaning of “cat” is the idea of cat when this is understood as a mental or physical state, for the mental or physical state whereby I think of cat is something very different from a cat (Quine).

Meaning as Use. Some philosophers propose a conception of meaning as use (Wittgenstein), and this is sometimes taken to mean that understanding the meaning of a sentence, say, is to know the conditions under which it can be asserted (Dummett). One way to understand this view is in relation to an illocutionary act (Austin). Consider an example: When I say to Peter, "Peter, say the Lord's Prayer," I utter a sentence. The act of uttering the sentence is called locutionary. Apart from this act, the sentence may cause certain other acts, such as the act of getting Peter to say the Lord's Prayer, which is also an act I perform. This is called the perlocutionary act. Finally, I also perform the act of ordering Peter to say the Lord's Prayer, and this is an illocutionary act. Now, the meaning of a text may be expressed in terms of the notion of an illocutionary act as follows: The meaning of X is that in virtue of which one who performs a locutionary act also performs a certain illocutionary act. Unfortunately, philosophers disagree on what this is exactly (Searle).

One important disadvantage of this view is that it does not seem to work well with long texts. It is difficult to think of all the illocutionary acts that take place when the locutionary acts involved in reciting or writing the book of Revelation are performed, for example, and this raises questions of indeterminacy. Another is that in an effort to pinpoint the limits of meaning, some philosophers appeal to rules. But the status of these rules themselves and their source become points of contention.

The referential, intentional, ideational, and use views of meaning have interesting implications for the particular case of scriptural meaning, and some of them pose especial issues and problems. Consider, for example, the view that meanings are abstract objects separate from minds and brains. If this is so, then the question arises as to the ontological status and eternity of these objects and of their relation to God. If they are eternal realities, are they caused by God or not? The view that meanings are states of mind poses the questions of whether they are in the mind of God, in the human mind, or in both. If they are in God's mind, a further question arises as to how they are related to God and his attributes. (p 494) And if these meanings are considered to be brain states in humans, then one needs to determine what corresponds to them in God's mind insofar as God has no brain.

These questions illustrate how different views of meaning affect religious views and thus how important theology is for the determination of scriptural meaning. Clearly, certain theological doctrines require the adoption of certain understandings of meaning, and certain views of meaning have significant implications for theology.

Are There Limits to the Meanings of Texts?

Regardless of what one takes meanings to be, if one accepts that texts have meanings, one must address the question of whether there are limits to those meanings. Three different answers are generally given to this question. One argues that the meanings of texts have no limits, another that they have strict and narrow limits, and a third tries to find a compromise between these two.

Textual Meanings Have No Limits. According to the first view, there are no limits to the meaning of texts (Gadamer). This is not to say that texts have no meaning, which is a different position altogether. Texts, like words and signs, are polysemous: they are essentially ambiguous in that they do not have a single meaning but can be used to mean different things depending on the circumstances. It is impossible to pinpoint a meaning, or even a range of meanings, for a particular text that would exclude some other meanings for that text for all times and places. The meaning of a text is always open-ended. Indeed, no text can be understood to mean the same thing on two different occasions, for every understanding of it presupposes a different point of view from which the text is approached and its meaning is understood.

The strength of this position lies in the recognition that there is wide disagreement as to the meaning of certain texts, and that often texts are used to mean things their authors and their historical audiences could not have guessed. Frequently, texts are understood by different persons, or even by the same person at different times, to mean different and even contradictory things, and no determination can be reached concerning which is the correct meaning of the text on all occasions.

The weakness of this view is that it does not appear to reflect experience with respect to all texts. Although there is wide disagreement as to the meaning of certain texts, there is little disagreement as to the meaning of others. The NO SMOKING sign posted on my classroom wall means that no smoking is allowed in the room and not that smoking is permitted, a fact with which everyone who knows English agrees. Moreover, this position finds it hard to account for communication through texts, for communication involves the conveyance of meaning, and this in turn presupposes that the meaning in question be determinate in at least some ways.

Textual Meanings Have Strict Limits. The contrary view argues that there are indeed strict, and even narrow, limits to the meanings of texts (Hirsch). The advantage of this view is that, unlike the previous one, it accounts for communication. We communicate effectively because the texts we use have meanings with clear limits that the communicants understand. Indeed, the very use of texts seems to imply that those who use them have in mind specific meanings, with definite boundaries, that they wish to convey. When I say, "Smoking is not permitted," I mean that smoking is not permitted and not something else.

But this position also encounters difficulties. For one thing, it does not account for the mentioned and frequent disagreements we experience concerning the meanings of texts. And disagreements seem to arise because, even in very specific contexts, there appear to be some texts whose meanings are not determinate. Literary texts in particular are generally taken to be open to multiple and equally legitimate interpretations, reflecting the fact that their meanings are not narrow and limited.

Textual Meanings Have Some Limits. The difficulties encountered by the two views examined have led to attempts to find a compromise between them. In working out this compromise, three distinctions have been proposed, although they are not uncontroversial: essential and accidental differences in meaning, meanings and their implications, and meanings and intentions (Gracia, Theory). The first distinction helps to show that, although texts may have a well-delimited core of meaning (an essential meaning), they may have other meanings that are the result of contingent conditions, such as changes in context (accidental meanings). This in turn explains disagreements in the understanding of their meanings. The distinction between meanings and their implications is used to make clear that there can be a core of meaning for a text that does not include its implications. This also helps explain why audiences and even authors may disagree on the meaning of a text insofar as some persons may include in the meaning some (p 495) of its implications, whereas others do not. Finally, the distinction between meanings and intentions is meant to indicate how an author or user of a text may actually have the intention to use a text to mean things that are not part of the meaning of the text. This explains, again, why there are disagreements as to the meanings of texts. In all cases, the strategy is to grant that texts have a well-defined and limited core of meaning, but that they can also be used to mean something else (intentions), they can convey more than they mean (implications), and contextually (by accident) they can mean something more than, or different from, what they essentially mean.

There are interesting implications and questions that result from the three different views about the limits of meaning mentioned when applied to Scriptures. For example: Is the meaning of Scriptures open-ended, so that there is no definite meaning to them? Or is the meaning of Scriptures strictly limited? An affirmative answer to the first question would allow for the kind of flexibility some argue is necessary for the changing understanding of Scriptures throughout history. On the other hand, others object that to allow for so much flexibility would open the doors to complete chaos in interpretation, destroying any unity of message the Scriptures could have. The introduction of the distinction between essential and accidental meaning, meaning and its implications, and meaning and intention helps find a compromise between these views in some cases, but not all cases could be resolved in this way. In particular, the scriptural interpreter needs guidance in this matter, and it makes sense to argue that the source of that guidance can be properly found in theology.

What Determines Textual Meaning?

Regardless of the position one takes with respect to the nature of meaning and the limits of textual meaning, as long as one accepts that texts have meanings, one still needs to establish what it is that determines those meanings. And here again there is wide disagreement. At least eight factors, singly or in combination, have been identified as determining it: authors, audiences, contexts, communities, languages, texts, truth conditions, and cultural functions.

Authors. At first glance nothing would appear more obvious than that the author (utterer, speaker, user, or writer, as others put it) determines the meaning of a text, thus giving rise to the notion of authorial meaning (or utterer, speaker, user, or writer meaning; Grice; Schiffer; Hirsch). Indeed, because the author produces the text—so the argument goes—it must be the author who determines its meaning. After all, the author selects and arranges the words of which the text is composed in order to convey a specific meaning to an audience. Because the words authors use to compose texts are not naturally tied to particular meanings, or even to any meanings at all, many hold that it is the author's intended meaning that establishes the meaning of a text.

Matters are not so simple, however. Naturally, if the text produced by an author is the result of entirely new words invented by the author, which are stipulatively used to express a specific meaning, then one may be able to claim that the author is fully and singly responsible for both the text and its meaning. However, most texts produced by authors do not fall into this category, for the words authors choose for their texts are already in use prior to that choice, and they belong to natural languages in which they appear to have established meanings. Moreover, the arrangements in which those words are placed follow syntactical rules belonging to those languages and are not creations of the authors. This entails that authors may know less about the meaning of the words they use and the semantic import of the ways they can be arranged than their audiences, and this suggests in turn that texts may have meanings different from those their authors think or intend them to have.

When it comes to Scriptures, matters become more complicated, because not everyone agrees about who the author of these texts is. For some, it is God himself, who worked through individual human persons to produce the texts. But for others, the authors are human and the Scriptures are mere testimonies of their understanding of God's revelation. This, then, can in principle generate two meanings: God's meaning and the human authors' meaning. And this in turn raises questions as to how faithful to God's meaning is the meaning that the human authors understand, and whether these human authors are mere instruments in God's hands or are in fact the authors of texts through which they intend to convey their own understanding of divine revelation (Barth).

Audiences. That the audience (readers, listeners, or interpreters, as others put it) determines the meaning of a text makes sense insofar as it explains the existence of mutually incompatible, but equally acceptable, understandings of the same text, thus giving rise to the notion of audience meaning (or reader, listener, or interpreter (p 496) meaning; Schleiermacher). Moreover, it also explains how it is possible that in some cases an audience may know the meaning of a text better than its author does.

But there are difficulties. For one thing, the role of an audience appears to be primarily to understand a text, not to establish its meaning. An audience tries to get the point made by an author or user, not to impose a meaning on the text it reads or hears. Audiences feel constrained by the meanings they understand texts to have. This is why they often criticize the views expressed by texts, or modify them to fit their own views. Intentionally, the audience's role is not to create, or to impose, or even to convey meaning, but to grasp it. Moreover, if it were the job of audiences to create or determine meanings, then the purpose of communication would be thwarted. In that case an audience would not be seeking to understand what an author tries to communicate through a text, but rather to impose on a text whatever meaning it thinks fit.

Indeed, to say that audiences are responsible for determining textual meaning entails that the meanings of texts do not in fact have limits. Insofar as meanings would be up to audiences—and the number of possible audiences for any text is potentially infinite—there would be no way of establishing constraints.

In a scriptural context, the audience varies as much as in other contexts. In some cases, the texts themselves pick a particular audience, such as Pharaoh or Christ's apostles, but in most cases they do not. It makes sense, however, to think of the community of believers as the proper audience of Scriptures when these are taken as divine revelation, for the members of this community are the ones who take it to be so. But it makes no sense to say that this particular audience establishes the meaning of Scriptures when in fact they claim that Scriptures contain a divine message for them.

Contexts. It is obvious that context has much to do with the determination of the meaning of at least certain texts, thus giving rise to the notion of contextual meaning (Eco). The shout “Fire!” in a crowded theater means something different from what it means when uttered by an army officer on the front line of battle. But is context what determines textual meaning? A historicist might argue that indeed it is. But what exactly is context? Texts can be part of the context of other texts, and authors and audiences are certainly part of that context. Not to include the author and audience in it makes no sense, for part of the context of a text is brought in precisely by authors and audiences and their circumstances. On the other hand, if authors and audiences are included in the context, then it is not clear how this position would differ substantially from the previous two. Finally, context is such a broad and changing factor that this could amount to saying that texts have no particular meanings, a fact that seems to prevent effective communication.

The context of Scriptures can be as broad as that of any other text and therefore subject to the same conditions. If believers wish to put some limits on scriptural meaning, context cannot be the exclusive factor.

Communities. Another factor often mentioned as determining the meaning of texts is a community, giving rise to the notion of community meaning (Putnam; Fish). Sometimes the community is taken in general as the speakers of the language of the text in question, but at other times it is identified with a smaller group considered authoritative for purposes of textual understanding—whence the notion of institutional meaning.

A community, however, is nothing but a collection of individual persons who are related to texts as authors or audiences. There is no common entity or mind in a community to which could be assigned the intentions and understandings necessary for the determination of textual meanings. A community can be understood either as authors and audiences, as neither authors nor audiences, or as groups of people composed of authors, audiences, and those who are neither. To say the first is to recognize that texts have authors and audiences and that the limits of their meanings are imposed by them. To say the second entails that there is no relation of the community to the texts, although the community may be responsible for establishing the parameters of word meanings and the rules of grammar for the arrangement of those words. But it is difficult to maintain that a community understood thus establishes the meanings of particular texts, for it is not the community that composes the texts in question.

In the case of Scriptures, the pertinent community is not generally taken to refer to the linguistic community of speakers of the language in which the Scriptures are rendered insofar as the Scriptures are thought to have a special meaning for believers. The pertinent community, then, is identified with the group of believers, or even with a subgroup of persons considered to have the authority to determine scriptural meaning and (p 497) set the parameters of religious doctrine, such as a group of elders or a general council.

Languages. Language itself is sometimes regarded as sufficient to establish textual meaning, thus giving rise to the notion of linguistic or literal meaning (Katz; Barthes; Davidson). After all, a language is a set of words and a set of rules according to which the words can be legitimately organized so as to produce texts with meaning. In principle, then, one could argue that a language contains virtually all the possible arrangements of the words it has and thus all the possible texts that can be produced in it. If so, then, it would appear that it is the language—the vocabulary and grammatical rules—that establishes the meaning of texts.

However, for at least two reasons one may question the sufficiency of language by itself to establish the meanings of particular texts. In the first place, the meaning of texts, and thus of the words and arrangements that compose a language, depends also on context, and context is not always linguistic or textual. Second, language may virtually contain an infinite number of possible texts and corresponding meanings, but such virtual content does not entail any actual texts or meanings. Decisions are required for the choice of words and the implementation of rules. Languages by themselves are inert; they require users to be actualized into texts. Users are responsible for the production of texts out of languages, and users are not bound by languages, for they introduce modifications, violate rules, and develop innovations. Except for dead languages, or those that are the product of stipulation, languages are in a constant process of change and subject to modification by their users.

This view can easily be applied to scriptural interpretation: The languages used in Scripture determine textual meaning. But Scripture consists of particular texts that presumably are the result of divine revelation. So, the same objections voiced against the position in general apply also to this case.

Texts. The objections raised against the mentioned views lead some to argue that it is texts themselves that establish their own meaning, giving rise to the notion of textual meaning (Beardsley). This view sidesteps several of the problems identified so far. For example, unlike language, texts are not just sets of words that can be arranged in many possible ways in accordance with certain rules, but rather concrete arrangements of words that display particular organizations. Moreover, although this imposes certain limitations on textual meaning, the limitations are not such that the freedom of audiences to understand the same text in incompatible ways is ruled out. There is considerable latitude in the understanding of textual meaning, but not complete license.

This view also encounters difficulties, however. Most important is that it is difficult to see how in fact texts themselves can establish their meanings, for they have no natural connection to those meanings. Why can't a short text be held to mean exactly what a much longer one does? Or vice versa? And how can one choose between two or more equally feasible meanings? If these questions cannot be answered effectively in terms of the text, as they appear not as they appear not to be, then it would seem that the main purpose of the use of texts, the communication of meaning, is defeated.

The controversy between literal and contextual meanings clearly illustrates the difficulties. Some hold that the meaning of texts is what they say when they are understood in accordance with the common understanding of the terms and rules of arrangement prescribed by the languages in which they are rendered (Katz; Davidson). But others argue that context is essential for their meaning (Gibbs).

In the case of Scriptures this position has had its defenders from the very beginning. According to them, the Scriptures determine their own meaning by interpreting themselves. But does this really work? The controversy between literal and nonliteral meanings (or interpretations) of Scripture clearly indicates that they do not.

Truth Conditions. Truth conditions have been held to be what establishes the meaning of declarative sentences (Frege; Davidson). And this seems to make sense in that the conditions under which a sentence can be true seem to establish what it says. What else could do it?

However, scholars generally identify at least two objections to this position when considered as a general theory of meaning. One is that the meaning in question is only that of declarative sentences. The meaning of linguistic entities that cannot have truth value, such as words, cannot be explained in this way. This requires the elaboration of a more comprehensive view that accounts for the meaning of these entities as well, and it is not easy to relate the truth-conditions theory to this overall view. The second objection is that, even if one accepts that truth conditions determine the meaning of declarative sentences, one must establish, further, the basis on which those conditions are picked. So, clearly there is (p 498) something else at work in meaning than just truth conditions.

In short, objections can be raised to every one of the seven factors mentioned, taken as a means of establishing scriptural meaning, considered by itself. For example, one may object that the divine author cannot be regarded by a community of believers as determining the meaning of Scriptures for that community because believers have access to what God wishes to say to them only through the Scriptures. A mystical source of knowledge does not work insofar as different persons might claim different things about what Scriptures mean. The case of human authors poses problems because we have no direct access to their intended meaning except through the texts they produce. Context poses problems because Scriptures are read and understood in many different contexts, as their history easily illustrates, giving rise to an endless number of possible meanings. The linguistic community at large encounters difficulties because the Scriptures are supposed to contain messages that make sense only to believers. By itself, the community of believers is controversial unless that community accepts certain rules of understanding that establish the meaning of Scriptures. Language alone seems helpless because it is meaningful only when used, and its use is manifested only in texts. The Scriptures themselves fail because they are no more than certain inscriptions that are not naturally tied to any meanings and that are subject to different understandings. Finally, truth conditions do not work because they require a means of being established.

An alternative to these inadequate views is to combine some of these factors, but where do we find the criteria to pick the relevant ones and to determine the role that each plays? One possibility is to turn to the functions that a text has in a particular culture.

Cultural Functions. According to this view, the determining factor of textual meaning is to be found in the functions that a text has within a culture (Gracia, Theory). Texts can be used for a variety of purposes. A text can be used as religious Scripture, a historical source, a literary work, and so on, and it is the uses to which a text is put within a community that determine its meaning. Cultural function goes beyond the factors thus far considered, in that it establishes which of those factors take precedence over the others, and whether they are given any role in the determination of meaning. In particular, it should be distinguished from communities, audiences, and contexts. The cultural function of X within a culture is the use to which X is put in that culture. The culture is the complex system of values, customs, beliefs, and social norms that regulate activities within the community that has the culture, and the community is the group of people involved. Cultural function, then, needs to be distinguished from both the culture and the community. It should also be distinguished from audiences, which consist of any persons with actual or potential access to the text (not just members of the culture of production or use). Likewise, the context of a text is much broader than the cultural function it has in a particular culture, since it includes anything that can affect its meaning.

Like other texts, Scriptures have particular functions, but where do we find the criteria that establish how those functions are to be transformed into a set of rules that determine the meaning of the texts? And what are the roles that the various examined factors play in this determination? The answers to these questions lie in the answer to another more basic question: What establishes the criteria of scriptural meaning? That is, where do we find the rules that establish whether it is the author, audience, context, society, language, truth conditions, or the Scriptures themselves, that determines scriptural meaning? Or, to put it differently, what is the function that the Scriptures have within the community of believers, since that community regards them as Scriptures? The answer is found in theology.

Theology. A theology is primarily a view of the world based on an attempt to understand it in terms of both human knowledge and a particular divine revelation (Gracia, How?); theology is the understanding of a religious faith by those who have this faith. As such, theology contains not only interpretations of the world, but also rules that determine the legitimate meaning of the texts regarded as revealed. Consider, for example, the creation of the world as recorded in Genesis. Some Christian groups, committed theologically to the literal interpretation of Scriptures, interpret this description literally. Accordingly, for them creation took place in six days. Other Christian denominations, however, put weight on tradition in the understanding of Scriptures. In keeping with that tradition, they do not accept that scriptural texts need always be interpreted literally, opening the way for a nontemporal, evolutionary understanding of creation.

(p 499) Theology, then, establishes not only textual meaning, but also the degree to which other factors play roles in the proper interpretation of Scriptures. These rules are both epistemically and ontologically normative: epistemically, because they establish the proper method of finding out the true meaning of Scriptures; ontologically, because they establish legitimate meanings by distinguishing those that are so from those that are not. In this sense, theology is not only a hermeneutical tool for interpretation, but more importantly, it is the ultimate determining factor of scriptural meaning.

Conclusion

In conclusion, the role of theology in scriptural meaning is essential. Theology influences the view of meaning that is required when it comes to Scriptures, it establishes whether Scriptures have limits to their meaning or not, and finally it determines the meaning and the way to acquire it. Theology not only provides the rules for the correct interpretation of Scriptures, but also identifies their correct meaning. A theory of scriptural meaning, then, must begin in theology.

See also Authorial Discourse Interpretation; Exegesis; Hermeneutics; Intention/Intentional Fallacy; Speech-Act Theory; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

Bibliography

Austin, J. L. How to Do Things with Words, ed. J. Urmson. Harvard University Press, 1962; Ayer, A. J. Language, Truth, and Logic. Dover, 1952; Barth, K. Church Dogmatics, trans. G. Thomson et al. 4 vols. T&T Clark, 1960; Barthes, R. "The Death of the Author." Pages 142–48 in Image, Music, Text, trans. S. Heath. Hill & Wang, 1977; Beardsley, M. "The Authority of the Text." Pages 16–37 in Possibility of Criticism. Wayne State University Press, 1970; Davidson, D. Inquiries into Truth and Interpretation. Oxford University Press, 1984; Derrida, J. "Structure, Sign and Play in the Discourse of the Human Sciences." Pages 247–72 in The Structuralist Controversy, ed. R. Macksey and E. Donato. Johns Hopkins University Press, 1970; Dummett, M. Truth and Other Enigmas. Duckworth, 1978; Eco, U. The Limits of Interpretation. Indiana University Press, 1990; Fish, S. Is There a Text in This Class? Harvard University Press, 1985; Fodor, J. Psychosemantics. MIT Press, 1987; Frege, G. Collected Papers. Oxford University Press, 1984; Gadamer, H.-G. Truth and Method, trans. G. Barden and R. Cumming. 2d ed. Crossroad, 1975; Gibbs, R., Jr. Intentions in the Experience of Meaning. Cambridge University Press, 1999; Gracia, J. How Can We Know What God Means? Palgrave, 2001; idem. A Theory of Textuality. SUNY Press, 1995; Grice, H. P. "Meaning." Philosophical Review 66 (1957): 377–88; Hirsch, E. D., Jr. Validity in Interpretation. Yale University Press, 1967; Katz, J. Propositional Structure and Illocutionary Force. T. Y. Crowell, 1977; Kripke, S. Naming and Necessity. Harvard University Press, 1987; idem. Wittgenstein on Rules and Private Language. Blackwell, 1982; Locke, J. An Essay Concerning Human Understanding. Dover, 1959; Oswood, C. Focus on Meaning. Mouton, 1976; Putnam, H. Mind, Language and Reality. Cambridge University Press, 1975; Quine, W. V. O. Word and Object. Harvard University Press, 1960; Schiffer, S. Meaning. Oxford University Press, 1972; Schleiermacher, F. D. E. Hermeneutics and Criticism and Other Writings, ed. and trans. A. Bowie. Cambridge University Press, 1998; Searle, J. Expression and Meaning. Cambridge University Press, 1975; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998; Wittgenstein, L. Philosophical Investigations. Oxford University Press, 1953.

Jorge J. E. Gracia

Medieval Biblical Interpretation

The history of biblical interpretation between the fall of the Western Roman Empire in the fifth century and the Reformation is one of the most important and, until recently, also one of the most neglected areas of Christian thought. For a thousand years, Latin Christendom was shaped by a hermeneutical pattern that affected every area of life, and that has continued to exert considerable influence in the centuries since. But since the Renaissance and Reformation of the sixteenth century, the cutting edge of biblical interpretation has been elsewhere, and the medieval heritage has faded from the picture. The main reason for this neglect is the belief that medieval interpreters worked with a defective text in a series of inappropriate ways, of which allegory is but the most notorious example. Fanciful etymologies abound in the writings of medieval exegetes, as do digressions on subjects like witchcraft and alchemy, neither of which is in much favor among modern biblical scholars. The rediscovery of the original biblical languages in the fifteenth century has often been considered the decisive factor that renders most, if not all, medieval exegesis obsolete and unreliable. As a result, it has been ignored and abandoned, except by medievalists who study it for cultural, rather than theological, reasons.

That the traditionally negative view of medieval exegesis is unfair has only been perceived since the writings of Henri de Lubac, and others have revived a serious interest in it. The recent willingness of some scholars to broaden their horizons and consider alternatives to the historical-critical method has also worked in favor of medieval interpreters. They are sometimes seen as having a contribution to make toward a literary or spiritual interpretation of the text that does not depend on the criteria of historical criticism. Students of the (p 500)Reformation have also noticed that Luther and Calvin had more in common with their medieval forebears than we are accustomed to admit, and that too has played a part in stimulating renewed interest in them. However, it must be stressed that this revival of interest is partial and fairly restricted in its scope; there is no question of returning to the medieval outlook in any serious way, or of denying the quite considerable gains in our understanding that have been made since the sixteenth century.

Medieval interpretation is characterized by its virtually complete dependence on the Latin Vulgate translation of the Bible, most of which was made by Jerome in the years 375–400 CE. Jerome worked from original sources in both Hebrew and Greek, and disapproved of the apocryphal additions to the OT found in the Greek LXX, but his scientific spirit was not copied by later generations. They came to regard the Vulgate as an infallible text in itself and seldom made any effort to go behind it to the sources. Fortunately, it is an excellent translation, in some respects superior to the Greek “originals” used by Erasmus and the sixteenth-century humanists. But even so, it is still a translation and therefore unsuited to the minute analysis to which it was often subjected in the Middle Ages. A good example is the way in which Gregory the Great developed the words vir unus, used to describe Job. It means no more than “a certain man,” but Gregory was convinced that the apparently unnecessary unus must have a particular theological significance. To him, it was a pointer to the uniqueness of Christ, the true vir unus—an interpretation that obviously has no textual foundation.

In the early Middle Ages, the Latin world still lived in the shadow of ancient Rome, and it is difficult to know whether a writer like Gregory (d. 604) or even Bede (ca. 673–735) can really be called medieval. Bede, for example, despite his geographical isolation in northern England, was fully conversant with patristic exegesis, both Greek and Latin, and wrote commentaries based on it, which became standard works for nearly a thousand years. They are currently being translated into English, and in many instances, they can stand comparison with the most sophisticated modern opinion on textual and historical matters. Yet Bede was also quite clear on the need for maintaining the allegorical interpretation of the Bible, which in his time was acquiring a new lease on life in the monasteries. There, the threefold allegorical scheme of Origen had undergone a permutation, thanks to the work of John Cassian (360–435), who is generally credited with having added a fourth level of spiritual interpretation by dividing Origen’s “spiritual” sense into two distinct parts: The first was allegorical and related mainly to the life of the church militant here on earth. The second (anagogical) sense was proleptic and referred mainly to the life of the church triumphant in heaven. (The “tropological” sense deals with the moral life.) Thus, references to Jerusalem could be differentiated according to whether they applied mainly to the government of the earthly body, or to the blessed state of the redeemed. Which one should be preferred in any given instance was, of course, the task of the interpreter to decide.

The subsequent loss of Latin as a spoken language made grammatical study of the text even more important than it had been before, and medieval commentaries are full of remarks about points of grammar and vocabulary that would have been unnecessary in earlier centuries. From the eleventh century onward, a tradition of grammatical analysis grew up, based in the schools at Paris, that eventually produced the so-called Glossa ordinaria, a rambling commentary that by 1150 had become the standard work of biblical interpretation all over Western Europe. The main purpose of the Glossa was to remove mysteries in the text, and its authors displayed a remarkable knowledge of ancient law and the teachings of the church fathers. They became aware that there had been different hermeneutical approaches in ancient times, and that occasionally the fathers had contradicted one another, which forced them to make critical choices in their own interpretation.

Gradually commentators became bolder, and Peter Lombard (ca. 1100–1160) added a considerable amount of background detail in his own commentaries, mainly because he thought the Glossa was inadequate in that respect. On another front, scholars in the nascent universities launched a series of attacks on the allegorical tendency inherent in traditional monastic interpretation. Many of the leading lights of this development worked in or around the monastery of St. Victor in Paris, where the example of the abbot Hugh (ca. 1096–1141) provided a model for several generations of exegetes. Andrew of St. Victor (d. 1175) worked out a new synthesis of text and meaning; like many of the Victorines, he was English by nationality. Andrew said that because truth is unfathomable, we are not bound to the limited theories of the past, but are free to read and speculate on Scripture for ourselves. His (p 501)own preference was for the literal rather than the symbolic or allegorical interpretation, with which he had grown up. For example, it was commonly said in his day that Jeremiah and John the Baptist had been free of original sin, because God had “known” them both in the womb. Andrew rejected this on the ground that “know” did not necessarily mean “spiritually accept.” Furthermore, the common belief that the womb stood for the synagogue, he regarded as entirely wrong.

Andrew made a serious effort to learn Hebrew and consult Jewish rabbis about their reading of the biblical text. In this way, he came into contact with Talmudic interpretation, which he did his best to understand and integrate into his own exegesis. He had many disciples, of whom the most important was probably Stephen Langton (d. 1228), usually credited with dividing the biblical books into chapters (verse divisions came in the sixteenth century).

Another important interpreter of this period was Peter the Chanter (d. 1197), who compiled a manual for preachers in which biblical interpretation was divided into three parts, which he called lectio, disputatio, and praedicatio. Thomas of Chobham (fl. ca. 1190–1210) developed this structure and claimed that preaching was the highest form of exegesis because it was the application of divine teaching in human words. Thomas distinguished between the meaning of words and the meaning of things (including concepts), restricting his use of allegory to the latter. Thus, for example, he would not find figurative meanings in the name “Jerusalem” (e.g., city of peace, the blessed state of the believer), but he was prepared to use the physical characteristics of the earthly city as guides to its spiritual character (e.g., it was high, beautiful, etc.). Thomas defined lectio as the study of how a word is related to the thing it describes. A word like “dog” means only one thing, but a word like “focus” has many meanings. On the other hand, a word like “the” means nothing by itself, whereas a word like “leprechaun” means nothing in reality. Finally, some words have an implicit meaning, which is not self-evident, as when the expression “on high” is used to refer to God. In interpreting the Bible, it was essential to decide which of these categories any particular word fell into, before attempting to determine what its meaning might be in the context..

Disputatio, according to Thomas, was the process by which one part of Scripture was to be harmonized with others. The word of God could not contradict itself, so apparent discrepancies had to be resolved by logical deduction based on what he called the usus loquendi, or turns of speech characteristic of particular writers. Thomas concluded that these had changed over the centuries and from one writer to another, so that different usages had to be taken into account. For example, if some writers regarded the “soul” as mortal, and others as immortal, this was not because they disagreed about the nature of the soul, but because they were using the same word in two different senses—in the first instance “life,” and in the second “spirit.”

Praedicatio was the domain especially reserved for allegory. From this, it appears that Thomas regarded preaching as a means of bringing people to a deeper mystical experience of God, rather than as a form of moral exhortation, and so the connection with the literal sense of the text was less significant. As long as it was largely a monastic activity, that approach remained viable, but the urge to evangelize the laity forced a change of direction, associated primarily (though by no means exclusively) with the order of the preaching friars (Dominicans).

Under their influence, recourse to a special “spiritual interpretation” quite separate from the literal exegesis of a text became less and less common. The imitation of Christ, the ultimate goal of all spiritual reading of Scripture, was interpreted with ever greater literalism, as can be seen from the career of Francis of Assisi, who took the divine commandment to sell all that he had with the greatest seriousness. The new literalism reached its apogee in the movement toward a more extended form of commentary, known as the “postill,” whose great master was Hugh of St. Cher (fl. ca. 1230–35). The postillators adhered as closely as possible to the literal sense and frequently criticized the earlier glossators for their flights of fancy and allegory. The postills of Nicholas of Lyra (ca. 1270–1340) were especially popular with preachers and were the first biblical commentaries to be printed in the fifteenth century. They even influenced the early Reformers, whose own work in due course superseded them.

In this atmosphere, the traditional spiritual interpretation retreated into the background, though it enjoyed one last gasp in the eschatological prophesying of Joachim of Fiore (d. 1202). Joachim revived the chiliasm of the early church and gave it a new twist. He believed that the OT and NT represented the first two ages of revelation, and that in the coming third age, the letter of the Bible thus given would be cast aside by (p 502)the Spirit, proceeding from both Testaments. The book of Revelation would then be fulfilled in a more-or-less literal way, with the appearance of the antichrist and the beginning of the great tribulation of the church. Joachim’s theories went through many different recensions over the centuries, with the antichrist being identified with such diverse figures as Emperor Frederick II (1194–1250) and Pope John XXII (1316–34). Despite a history of repeated deception and failure, Joachim’s millenarianism has retained its vitality to an astonishing extent.

The separation of the literal from the “spiritual” interpretation of the Bible, so characteristic of the twelfth century, was to some extent arrested and corrected by the rediscovery of Aristotle’s writings. Although the church was quite suspicious of these at first, the new insights were eventually absorbed by the theological establishment, which created a new synthesis holding the literal and the spiritual together. Aristotle had taught that body and soul are a unity that cannot be sundered from one another, a doctrine applied to the Bible by saying that the letter and the Spirit must also be seen as a unity. Biblical theology could therefore no longer consist of a purely mechanical exegesis designed to facilitate an allegorical interpretation. Rather, it had to become a speculative science, according to which the spiritual meaning of a text was to be looked for in and through the literal sense—not beyond it.

The significance of this new development can be illustrated from the way in which Exod. 23:19 was interpreted at different times. This verse says: “You shall not boil a kid in its mother’s milk” (NRSV), an injunction that Augustine regarded as absurd and unworthy of Scripture as it stood. He claimed that the true meaning was allegorical and meant that the coming Christ would not perish in Herod’s slaughter of the innocents at Bethlehem. Andrew of St. Victor pointed out that as the Jews of his day continued the practice, it did have a literal application, however absurd that might have seemed to Augustine. Stephen Langton argued that the prohibition was primarily for hygienic reasons, thereby emptying it of any spiritual content. But Thomas Aquinas (1225–74), who became the leading spokesman of the new synthesis, argued that the prohibition was both to avoid cruelty and to distance the Jews from standard Gentile practice. In this way, it could be seen to have both a moral and spiritual application without departing from its literal meaning.

The emergence of this Thomist synthesis marks the beginning of a recognizably modern type of biblical interpretation, which was picked up and taken further by the Reformation. It also exposed the inadequacies of medieval hermeneutics in a way that would not be satisfactorily resolved before the sixteenth century. For one thing, renewed interest in the literal sense of Scripture underscored the need for a more accurate text, which would not be satisfied until the use of the original languages had been recovered. Similarly, Thomism raised the question of the church’s authority as the privileged interpreter of the Bible. If Word and Spirit were to be held together, the interpretative role (if any) accorded to extrabiblical or nonbiblical authorities had to be determined on a new basis. The issue was joined by John Wycliffe (ca. 1330–84), who did not hesitate to accuse the church of having added to the primitive deposit of faith, which was uniquely contained in the Holy Scriptures. He was the first person who specifically advocated the principle of sola scriptura, or Scripture alone, as the basis of biblical interpretation, and for this reason he is often regarded as the “morning star” of the Reformation. But Wycliffe’s “modernity” should not be exaggerated. He continued to use allegory on occasion, and his practice often fell short of his professed principles. He remained a man of the Middle Ages, and it is symptomatic that, although he wanted to translate the Bible into the vernacular (and his disciples succeeded in doing so), the translation was based on the Latin Vulgate and not on the original texts.

After Wycliffe’s time, exegetes came increasingly under pressure from advocates of Renaissance humanism, who demanded a return to the sources and a more critical approach to them. It is perhaps symptomatic of that age that in 1433 the council of Basel received a short treatise on the principles of biblical interpretation composed by John of Ragusa (Dubrovnik). John enunciated a series of maxims, most of which can be construed as an attack on traditional allegorizing. For example, he put great stress on the clarity and perspicuity of the literal sense of the Bible and reminded his hearers that it was this sense, not the figurative ones, that had been inspired by the Holy Spirit and was therefore infallible. This led John to advocate a more intense study of the grammar of the original texts, which in turn made him prefer the witness of the church fathers, who lived closer to the origins of the NT, to the speculations of more recent exegetes. His contemporary Lorenzo Valla (1407–57) was the (p 503)first person to introduce historical-critical methods of interpretation in a systematic way, and his researches demolished many of the standard assumptions of most medieval exegetes, particularly with regard to the claims of the Roman church. Finally Erasmus of Rotterdam (1466–1536) completed the process when he published his critical edition of the Greek NT, along with a fresh Latin translation, in 1516. This rapidly established itself as the authoritative text, and with the almost simultaneous outbreak of the Protestant Reformation, it signaled the end of the medieval era in biblical interpretation.

The contribution of medieval interpretation to the ongoing history of the church is difficult to assess and continues to be hotly debated. Nevertheless, certain basic features may be said to have survived all the ups and downs of subsequent exegesis, and remain as important today as they were then. The first of these is that it is essential to establish exactly what the text of Scripture is. Variant readings must be weighed and judged against the overall witness of the manuscript tradition, to ensure that we have the most accurate text available. Medieval interpreters lacked the resources needed to perform this task of textual criticism adequately, but when they were finally surpassed, it was by those whose work reflected their underlying principles.

The second fundamental principle is that scholars need to work from an agreed set of assumptions. For most medieval interpreters, that meant the doctrine of the church. But in the writings of the more radical theologians, like Wycliffe, it came to be said that Scripture itself provided the only reliable criteria for its interpretation, a view that continues to be the watchword of Protestant Christianity to this day.

The third lesson we have to learn from our medieval forebears is that the church must be spiritually edified by biblical teaching. To their great credit, they came to see with ever-greater clarity that this meant finding spiritual truth in, rather than under or beyond, the literal sense of the text, which led them to develop an extensive ministry of expository preaching. It was no accident that the friars, to whom this preaching was mostly entrusted, were among the most fervent exponents of the Reformation, which they saw as the fulfillment of their ministry in the wider church.

Finally, the medieval exegetes were aware that biblical interpretation relied on, and had to be integrated with, other branches of learning. There was not a “spiritual” realm totally disconnected from the material world in which we live, and so whatever was said of Scripture had to be consonant with what we know of the law, of history, and of the natural sciences. Harmony between all these disciplines is not always automatic or easy to achieve, but that it must be sought remains axiomatic to the present day. It is this aspect of medieval interpretation, more than anything else, that has inspired Henri de Lubac and his followers in their attempts to recover medieval interpretation for modern use. That the study of the Bible is now an academic discipline, rather than a pattern of mystical contemplation, owes much to the perception of the men who founded the universities in the Middle Ages. Perhaps here, more than anywhere else, their most fruitful legacy is to be found today.

See also Allegory; Literal Sense; Spiritual Sense

Bibliography

Evans, G. R. The Language and Logic of the Bible. 2 vols. Cambridge University Press, 1984–85; Lubac, H. de. Exégèse médiévale. 4 vols. Paris: Aubier, 1959–64; idem. Medieval Exegesis. Vol. 1 trans. M. Sebanc. Vol. 2 trans. E. Macierowski. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998–2000; Smalley, B. The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages. 3d ed. Blackwell, 1983; Steinmetz, D. “The Superiority of Pre-Critical Exegesis.” Pages 26–38 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997; Walsh, K., and D. Wood. The Bible in the Medieval World. Oxford University Press, 1985.

Gerald Bray

Messiah/Messianism

Definition

The term “Messiah” is often used in popular expression and in theological discussion to refer to the promised one of Jewish hope. In fact, the Hebrew term mashiakh, “messiah” (= the Greek christos), simply refers to “an anointed one” and need not point to the promised figure of the end time. Kings could be anointed (1 Sam. 9:16; 16:3), but so could the high priest (Lev. 4:3; 1 Chron. 29:22), priests in general (Exod. 28:41; Lev. 7:36), or prophets (1 Kings 19:16; TDNT 9:498–501). In fact, the term used in its later technical sense is rare in the Hebrew Scriptures. The roots of the usage may well be Ps. 2:2 and the hope of an ideal king in Jer. 23:5–6, drawing on the promise of a successful Davidic line of kings in 2 Sam. 7:11–17 (for the theme of regal hope, note also Gen. 49:10; Num. 24:15–19; Isa. 11:1–9; Ezek. 17:3–4, 22–23; 34:23–24; 37:24–25; Amos 9:11; Mic. 5:2–5; Zech. 9:9–10; 12:10). However, Jeremiah does not use the term “Messiah.” Otherwise, only Dan. 9:26 (p 504) uses it in this more technical sense. Thus, although the Jewish hope of a Messiah existed in the time of Jesus, drawing as it did on the end-time hope of the OT, the paucity of explicit texts meant that Judaism had various conceptions of this figure. This variation meant that Jesus had to explain his conception of the figure, for no single portrait was a given in Judaism, although two of the more dominant portraits (regal Messiah and one like a Son of Man) underscored the authority and victory this figure would bring.

Jewish Conceptions of Messiah

Jewish hope certainly was not uniform in the period of Second Temple Judaism. Some works seem to have given up the regal messianic hope. The book of Sirach seems to view the Davidic dynasty and hope as a thing of the past (Collins 33–34). On the other hand, a work like 1 Enoch looked forward to a transcendent figure of divinely bestowed authority who would share in the judgment of the last days (39–72). This work develops themes from Dan. 7 with its imagery of the authority of one like a son of man. Davidic hope remained expressed in a famous Jewish text, Pss. Sol. 17–18, where the hope is for a king who can reverse what Rome had done to Israel in 63 BCE and cleanse the nation of foreign presence. Here appears the term “Christ,” the Greek equivalent of “Messiah.” Psalm of Solomon 17:4 reads, “Lord, you chose David to be king over Israel, and swore to him about his descendants forever, that his kingdom should not fall before you.” This Davidic descendant will come and smash the opponents (17:21–25, a description that recalls language from Isa. 11:1–4). In yet another contrast, the hope seen at the Dead Sea community appears to include a political and a priestly Messiah (1QS 9.11), although the portrait of the various documents is highly variegated (Collins 56–67, discussing and rejecting a suffering Messiah image in 4Q285; Collins 74–84, treating the “two Messiahs”). A powerful collection of messianic texts is collected in Florilegium (= 4Q174), including 2 Sam. 7:10–14; Ps. 2:1; and Amos 9:11. A Davidic hope appears in 4Q252 1.5. Such a fusion may also appear in the non-Qumranian Jewish text Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. Levi 18:2–5; also T. Judah 21:1–4, where kingship and priesthood are distinguished). An eschatological teacher/prophet of the end is also discussed at Qumran (CD 6.11 and Florilegium), but the regal theme is not as prevalent. This expectation of an end-time prophetic figure has precedent in the Hebrew Scriptures (Mal. 3:1; 4:5) and was picked up in Judaism (Sir. 48:10; 1 Macc. 14:41). So we see four major figures of the end time expected by Jews of one sort or another: a regal, Davidic-like figure; a transcendent figure described as one like a son of man; a priestly figure; and a prophetic teacher. One can make a case that the Davidic and Danielic figures were the most prominent, looking to a political resolution of Israel's plight into a grand era of righteousness, but a uniform Jewish portrait did not exist. The title of one recent messianic work summarizes the situation well, Judaisms and Their Messiahs (Neusner, Green, and Frerichs). This variation meant that any messianic associations made by or to Jesus would need explanation, which is exactly what we see in the NT.

Jesus as Messiah-Christ in the Gospels

The title "Christ" is one all the Gospels use within their narratives to discuss Jesus (Matt. 1:16; 2:4; 11:2; Mark 1:1; Luke 2:11, 26; 4:41; 23:2; 24:26, 46; John 1:17, 41; 3:28; 4:29; 7:26–42; 10:24; 11:27; 12:34; 17:3; 20:31). The titulus on the cross marking Jesus as THE KING OF THE JEWS moves in this direction as well (Mark 15:26, 32; Matt. 27:37; Luke 23:38; John 19:19).

Here seven scenes are key. First is Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi, where the Synoptics share the christological core of the key disciple's confession. Jesus accepts this utterance, especially as it stands in contrast to the populace's view of him as only a prophet. However, Jesus also quickly redefines the confession in terms of his approaching suffering, so that the term is not merely one of glory but takes on overtones of the Servant who suffers as well (Matt. 16:13–23; Mark 8:27–33; Luke 9:18–22). This text may well show Jesus' innovative work on the concept of the Messiah. The one who would represent the hope of the nation would also suffer as the nation had suffered, only now on its behalf and on behalf of all who would identify with him. The need to explain who Messiah is, especially in his suffering, leads Jesus here and in several other places to restrict making a point of the title publicly (Mark 1:25//Luke 4:35; Mark 1:34//Luke 4:41; Mark 3:12//Matt. 4:16; Mark 1:44//Matt. 8:4//Luke 5:14; Mark 8:30//Matt. 16:20//Luke 9:21; Mark 9:9//Matt. 17:9; the parallel in Luke 9:36 only notes they said nothing but does not explain why). The public would be unlikely to appreciate the special way Jesus is using the term, especially given its already variegated use in Judaism.

Second is the Pharisees' attempt to get Jesus to rebuke his disciples for their confession of (p 505)him as King, a scene unique to Luke (19:39–40). Here Jesus refuses to stop them and says that if they do not speak, creation would. This text is an emphatic rebuke of the Pharisees for their failure to see who Jesus is. What creation sees, they fail to recognize.

Third is the scene at Jesus' examination before the Jewish leadership (Matt. 26:57–68//Mark 14:53–65//Luke 22:66–71). Here the question about whether Jesus is the Christ eventually evokes a positive though qualified response from Jesus in terms of exaltation, appealing to the Son of Man image and the picture of one at God's right hand from Ps. 110:1, another royal psalm. This affirmation not only of messianic authority, but also of exaltation to the side of God, implying his shared equality, is judged by the Jewish leadership as blasphemous. Thus, the public acknowledges Jesus' claim of a messianic role by the end of his ministry, even when they reject it. We also see here yet another element of fusion in Jesus' messianic portrait as Scripture presents it: Jesus is Messiah-Servant-exalted Son of Man.

Fourth is the emphasis that emerges at the examination of Pilate, whether one works with the Synoptics or John (Matt. 27:11–14, 25–26//Mark 15:1–15//Luke 23:1–5, 17–25; John 18:28–38). These accounts all focus on the discussion of Jesus as a "king of the Jews," a point reinforced by the charge hung over the cross. The discussion makes sense since Pilate would not be interested in a religious dispute over Jesus' claims, but if they have regal, political overtones, then his role as governor is to protect Caesar's interests.

As we turn to examples from John alone, Jesus' claims are more direct. Fifth is the discussion in John 4, where Jesus reveals himself as Messiah to the Samaritan woman. Sixth is the discussion with the blind man and his family in John 9, where the confession of Jesus as the "Christ" has yielded a reaction from officials to expel from the synagogue those who make the confession. Seventh is Martha's confession of Jesus to be the Christ, the Son of God, who comes into the world (John 11:27). This is her response when Jesus raises the issue of his authority over resurrection. The Johannine texts are all ways of affirming Jesus as the unique and promised one sent by God.

Put together, we see that Jesus regarded "Messiah" as a foundational term that brings together several portraits into one figure of hope. The confession of Peter that Jesus is the Christ, and not merely a prophet as the crowds claim, is a base from which Jesus can work to bring the disciples to understand who he really is. The disciples' strictly political and victorious preunderstanding of this term is immediately challenged; Jesus makes clear that this messianic figure must and will suffer (as his passion predictions indicate). Jesus is both a righteous and Suffering Servant as well as Messiah, but that suffering will lead to an exaltation to the right hand of God, which also recalls the picture of the Son of Man brought to God's throne. A Messiah who is as exalted as can be is also a Messiah who is humbled unto death. Other images in the Gospels reinforce this imagery, as Jesus speaks of himself as Son of Man in his favorite self-designation, as Shepherd (John 10), and in terms of the Servant (Mark 10:45). What does the rest of the NT do with this portrait?

Messiah in the Rest of the NT

The centrality of the messianic understanding of the early church emerges in its canonical letters and the Acts. Acts 2 presents Peter declaring that Jesus shows himself to be Lord and Christ by his distribution of God's Spirit upon disciples at Pentecost (Acts 2:16–36). In Acts 13, Paul preaches Jesus as the promised Son of David, the messianic figure promised to occupy David's throne and be Son of God (vv. 13–41). Part of the roots of Jesus being God's Son rests in the messianic relationship Jesus has to the Father, as the uses of Ps. 2 in Acts 13 and other NT texts suggest. Paul opens his most focused theological treatise of Romans by an appeal to the gospel promised in the Holy Scriptures (= the OT) concerning his Son, descended from David according to the flesh (1:1–3). This is an inherent messianic claim.

Perhaps nothing shows the centrality of a messianic mentality more than the name by which Jesus came to be referred, Jesus Christ. Jesus' messianic position had become so attached to him that it was the best way to refer to him.

There are communal implications to Jesus' messianic identity. It is this Jesus Christ who has made the community of believers into a kingdom (Rev. 1:4–6), functioning as the ruler of the kings on the earth as well as the provider of forgiveness through his suffering. It is this combination of authority, exaltation, and suffering that makes the messianic portrait of Jesus unique when set against its Jewish background. Jews expected a Messiah of authority and victory, who would come with full divine support, but there was no anticipation of his suffering. The preaching of Acts also highlights how this suffering of the (p 506)Christ was anticipated in the OT (Acts 3:18). Paul attributes redemption to the work of this Christ (Rom. 3:24–25; 5:8; 1 Tim. 1:15; 2:5–6; also Peter in 1 Pet. 2:24; and John in 1 John 2:1–2). The work of this messianic figure is so powerfully present in the Spirit that the Christ is said to be “in you” (Rom. 8:10; Gal. 2:20; Col. 1:27) and believers are in him (Col. 1:2). Such imagery is part of what allows Paul to call the church the Messiah's body (1 Cor. 12). This same Messiah is appointed to return and complete the program God has laid out (Acts 3:20; 26:23), as all things will be summed up in him (Eph. 1:10). It is this Christ whom the new community confesses as Lord with God the Father (1 Cor. 8:6). His exaltation allows us to be seated with him so that all hostile spiritual forces can be overcome (Eph. 1:15–23; 2:4–10). One day he as Messiah will transform us as the completion of our citizenship of heaven is made final (Phil. 3:20–21; 1 Pet. 5:10).

His life serves as an ethical example, so that we are said to learn Christ in a way that calls us to live differently from the world (Eph. 4:17–24; Col. 3:1–9). His example of sacrifice leads into a call to humility and working for the unity of the church, even in the face of persecution and rejection (Phil. 2:5–11; 1 Pet. 2:21–24; 3:14–15).

This multifaceted messianic role makes him superior to Moses (Heb. 3:1–6), as well as to any high priest (5:5–10; 9:24–28). The result is that to confess Jesus as the Christ is the testimony of the Spirit of God and is a central affirmation of faith (1 John 4:2–3; 5:1; stated negatively in 2 John 7 and Jude 4).

How do we put together what the NT does with the Messiah in OT texts that are not so explicit? When it comes to theological interpretation, it is important to appreciate how the NT builds on patterns and concepts the OT possesses, rather than simply using titles to describe the figure to come or only using straight prediction. All that a king in any generation should have been as a king of promise, Jesus in fact was, is, or will be. What Israel should have been as Servant, Jesus was in its place. Just as the righteous suffered, so Jesus suffered in a way that made him worthy to take our place. Thus, the messianic portrait of Jesus is not so much a matter of finding a title that is predicated of Jesus, but involves concepts that draw the shape of who he is. The NT puts these pieces together into a coherent whole.

Conclusion

The central role of Messiah is a view rooted in Jewish hope and yet represents an extension and development of it. Here is the central figure of God's promise, who brings righteousness through forgiveness and the Spirit. Messiah's suffering formed the basis for establishing a new relationship with God and with those who shared in the blessing of Messiah entering into their lives. Through faith in that messianic work, believers show themselves to be taught by God's Spirit, members of the messianic body, citizens of heaven, and members of a kingdom that will never end, as the return of Messiah leads to a transformation into full righteousness and immortality. See also Jesus Christ, Doctrine of; Relationship between the Testaments

Bibliography

Bock, D. Proclamation from Prophecy and Pattern. Sheffield Academic Press, 1987; Collins, J. The Scepter and the Star. Doubleday, 1995; Cullmann, O. The Christology of the New Testament. Rev. ed. Westminster, 1963; Grundmann, W., et al. “Χρίω ...” TDNT 9:493–580; Longenecker, R. The Christology of Early Jewish Christianity. SCM, 1970; Neusner, J., W. Green, and E. Frerichs. Judaisms and Their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era. Cambridge University Press, 1987; Van Unnik, W. “Jesus the Christ.” NTS 8 (1961/62): 101–16; Witherington, B., III. The Christology of Jesus. Fortress, 1990.

Darrell L. Bock

Metanarrative

“Metanarrative” became a standard term of intellectual discourse when Jean-François Lyotard famously circumscribed postmodernism as “incredulity toward metanarrative” (xxiv). In this usage, “metanarrative” refers to any overarching, universal account of reality and human life that purports to explain everything, and he has in view primarily the modernist claims of the Enlightenment, with its confidence in human reason as the infallible discoverer of universally valid, timeless truths. Lyotard’s quote became so widely used that Christian defenses of “metanarrative” have been accused of missing his specific meaning: a story that not only encompasses everything but seeks to explain and legitimate everything in a particular intellectual way.

In Lyotard’s (originally French) usage, “incredulity” also has overtones of religious “unbelief.” In a derived sense, the term “metanarrative” has been appropriated in biblical hermeneutics to refer to the overall story told by the Christian Scriptures, which is not totalizing or oppressive (Middleton and Walsh), and which makes possible the “redemptive-historical” level of biblical (p 507) interpretation (Wolters). In this usage, the term has been given a positive rather than a negative valuation, and it has close links with the idea of “worldview.”

See also Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation; Salvation, History of; Worldview

Bibliography

Lyotard, J.-F. The Postmodern Condition. University of Minnesota Press, 1984; Middleton, J. R., and B. Walsh. Truth Is Stranger Than It Used to Be. InterVarsity, 1995; Wolters, A. “Confessional Criticism and the Night Visions of Zechariah.” Pages 90–117 in Renewing Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2000.

Albert Wolters

Metaphor

The interpretation of metaphor is often overlooked. Nevertheless, it is one of the most crucial areas in the whole of hermeneutics since so much biblical theology hangs on metaphors, and metaphor is at the heart of philosophical problems with religious language.

At the outset it is worth noting that all language about “imagery” or “symbol” in Scripture is in fact referring to metaphor. Symbols and images belong to the extratextual world of things; their textual counterpart is the metaphor. For example, if I light a candle to express something about the presence of God, then that is a symbol. But if I describe Jesus as the light of the world, then that is a metaphor. For the purposes of this discussion, I will also treat the varieties of language use sometimes called metaphor (A is B), simile (A is like B), and synecdoche (A is used in the place of B, where A is part of B or vice versa, as in “England played France at rugby”) all simply as varieties of metaphor. After all, they share the same basic feature whereby two terms are brought together that have different, apparently distinct ranges of meaning to express something new.

The Problem of Metaphor

Aristotle famously declared the central importance of metaphor: “If one wants to master speech, one must master metaphor.” Metaphor was seen as a particular way of using language, a use that “carried meaning beyond” (the literal meaning of “metaphor”) what was usually meant. As such, it belonged to the arena of rhetoric, though this was in a context where sharp questions about epistemology were not always present.

Metaphor came to be seen as especially problematic during the Enlightenment. Under Kant’s separation of knowledge into the two mutually exclusive classes of the “aesthetic” and the “useful,” metaphorical language was seen to express the former, over against “literal” or scientific language, which expressed the latter. This had two consequences for metaphor, and by implication for much religious language. In the first place, it meant that metaphor had at very best a questionable claim to be stating “truth” in any form. Since this was the prerogative of “scientific” language, then whatever truth content there is in metaphor could be expressed more effectively in nonmetaphorical language. This led to the second consequence: that metaphor could be seen to be merely ornamental, an emotive (and therefore probably deceptive) and unnecessary addition to language, persuasive in the context of rhetoric, but distracting and unnecessary when it came to seeking truth.

It is worth noting, however, that over the centuries even metaphor’s detractors found the use of metaphor irresistible. One of them rejected metaphorical language and called, instead, for a “close, natural, naked way of speaking”!

The move to take language seriously within twentieth-century Western philosophy set the stage for a reconsideration of metaphor. If language is the vehicle of truth, rather than just a window into it, then the form in which language expresses truth needs to be taken into account in thinking about truth. Pioneering rehabilitators of metaphor included Monroe Beardsley, Philip Wheelwright, and Max Black. But the person who, building on their work, has done more than any other to set out the anatomy of metaphor and highlight its importance in language is the French philosopher and phenomenologist Paul Ricoeur.

The Paradox of Metaphor

Black proposed that within a metaphor, the “vehicle” (the term being used to describe the subject, such as “horse” in the phrase “my friend eats like a horse”) offers a “grid” through which the subject is seen. Black observed that this is not a simple one-way process; the metaphor could affect the way the vehicle was understood, as well as the subject. To say, for example, that “Man is a wolf,” affects my perception of “man” (as being more wolflike in some way), but also my perception of “wolf” (in perhaps embodying some aspect of what it means to be human).

Ricoeur took this idea one step further, by moving from the perceptual to the cognitive. He observed that within a metaphorical predication (p 508) there was a paradox. In asserting that “A is B,” the metaphorical statement is also at the same time claiming that “A is not B”—which is precisely the thing that makes it a metaphorical rather than a literal statement. For example, when I claim that my friend eats like a horse, I am both claiming that he is like a horse in some ways, but also, at exactly the same time, that he is unlike a horse in other ways. After all, I still set cutlery for him when he comes round for dinner, rather than filling a nosebag!

So the predication involved in metaphorical statements is only partial, in that only certain aspects of the vehicle are being identified with the subject in order to effect the tenor (the semantic content) of the metaphor. But Ricoeur argues that, far from being merely ornamental, or another way of making propositional statements, metaphor contains an irreducible cognitive content. Metaphors make real and substantial claims about reality that cannot be expressed in alternative propositional forms. This is not to do so much with the effect on individual words, but with the fact that the connections that metaphor makes actually reorganize the perceptive world. Once I begin to describe God as “Father,” then I make fundamental connections between human relations and experience and spiritual relations and experience that go beyond a mere collection of propositions about God being “caring” or “authoritative” or “provider.” The connection between two realms of life affects both, in this case the spiritual being made accessible, and the human being granted a new dignity and responsibility.

The Significance of Metaphor

Ricoeur’s characterization of metaphor in this way offers a convincing description of one of the key ways in which the world that language describes can expand. When new areas of knowledge arise, then the chief way in which language expands to explain this new area is by metaphorical extension of meaning. Until the nineteenth century in Britain, and the growth of the new discipline of “economics,” the meaning of the word “inflation” was restricted to the physical expansion of a balloon or other similar object. The term was then carried over (originally in a pejorative sense) to describe what is happening when the money supply increases and currency begins to lose its purchasing value. Nowadays, the use of “inflation” with reference to the economy is seen as within the normal semantic range of the term, and there is no sense of it being a metaphor.

By similar developments of language, our character is understood as being controlled to a large extent by “packets” of information in our body’s cells (genes), the universe started with a “big bang,” and when life is difficult we suffer from “depression.” Terms that started as metaphors have become at most figurative and certainly normal uses, which we will now find in dictionary definitions. But the expansion of semantic range leads to a corresponding expansion of the capacity of language to describe what was previously indescribable, in these cases in the areas of biology, physics, and psychology. Some have argued that this deep structure of metaphor is in fact akin to the process by which hypotheses are conjectured and tested in the development of scientific theory. Hence, the reconfiguration offered by metaphor is closely related to the function of models in science—bringing together the two categories separated by Kant.

This is especially pertinent for Christian theology. How do we describe an encounter with the Transcendent that has only been made possible by the Transcendent’s own self-revelation? The answer, at the level of language, is by metaphorical extension. And, in fact, the paradox of “is”/“is not” within metaphorical language corresponds to the tension within Christian thought between the idea that we can know God by analogy (as, e.g., in the work of Thomas Aquinas) and, on the other hand, apophatic theology (in the desert fathers and elsewhere). The latter believes that God is unknowable and can be defined only by negation.

The Context of Metaphor

Understanding the anatomy of metaphor in this way immediately raises two questions of context. The first is that of historical context. If I am to understand the tenor (the effect, the cognitive content) of a metaphor, then I need to understand something of the historical reality of the subject. I need to grasp the semantic range of the vehicle at the time when the metaphor was coined in order to have an idea of which parts of the metaphorical identification belong to the “is” and which belong to the “is not.” In Laodicea in Asia Minor, the only source of water was thermal springs, laden with calcium deposits, brought in aqueducts from Hierapolis (modern Pammukale). The hot spring water in Hierapolis was therapeutic; cold water, set aside in jars and from which the calcium deposits had settled out, was drinkable. But the water that arrived at Laodicea, now only lukewarm as a result of its journey but also (p 509) still full of the calcium that had not time to settle out, was good for neither. To be spiritually “hot,” “cold,” or “lukewarm” in first-century Laodicea (Rev. 3) meant something quite different from common contemporary use.

The second question of context is that of linguistic context. Some metaphors are coined less because of the actual meaning of the terms, but more because of rhetorical considerations (such as the use of alliteration) rather than actual implications. To “sleep like a baby” refers to something other than the frequent waking through the night that is the actual habit of babies (at least in my experience!). Do troopers really swear more than anyone else? Do horses actually have especially large appetites? The question to ask here concerns conventional usage, rather than historical reality. For biblical metaphors, this implies that we must examine the meaning of words in their wider canonical context as well as their historical context. In understanding what it means for Jesus to be the “good shepherd” (John 10), the biblical picture of leaders as shepherds in the OT will be as important as the historical reality of first-century shepherding.

The Power of Metaphor

Why are metaphors so powerful? How are they able to capture the imagination, even transcending time and culture? The answer is, as before, rooted in the paradoxical “is”/“is not” nature of metaphor. The coining of a metaphor implies selectivity. Certain features of the subject, which correspond to features of the vehicle, are identified, and other features are effectively ignored, at least in the context of the metaphor in question. When the connections are made at deeper levels of significance, particularities and details are left behind. It is important to know the historical context in order to see how the metaphor works. Yet, aspects of the historical particularity are often shorn away in revealing features of deeper significance. In Rev. 12 and 13, Roman imperial power is depicted as a beast from the sea, obsessed with image, opposed to the saints, bent on economic control, and acting with totalitarian control. We can see the particular, historical ways in which this might have been true of Rome in the first and subsequent centuries. But these things have also characterized other political systems in other ages, and with the historical details removed, readers have found in this metaphorization a potent description of their own situation.

In this way, the act of coining a metaphor is itself an act of interpretation, of selecting, emphasizing, and drawing attention to certain aspects of reality, but ignoring, sidelining, or passing over other aspects. This act has a visual counterpart in the drawing of caricatures and other political cartoons. In this respect, metaphor has much in common with narrative, which adds a temporal dimension to the interpretative reconfiguration of the world. Biblical metaphors do indeed often have a narrative context, and narratives in turn can function as metaphors “writ large.”

The Interpretation of Biblical Metaphors

The implication of all this is not to suggest a new, separate methodology for interpreting metaphor so much as to require a fresh bringing together of interpretative methods in a distinctively integrative way.

We need to understand the state of language and the historical realities of the subject and vehicle, which implies the need for a historical-critical methodology. But we also need to look at language use and structure, which implies the need for literary analysis. Because of the power of metaphor to transcend time and culture, we are invited to look for a correspondence of relations in our own world, so the horizon of the reader is also in view.

We can see how these elements might interplay by considering some examples.

Father. The metaphor of God as Father is a central one for Christian theology, but it is one that is largely misunderstood in popular reading. There are problems at both ends, as it were, of the reading process. On the one hand, dysfunctional experiences of being fathered can lead contemporary readers to project their perceptions onto the biblical text. On the other hand, positive experiences of being fathered, perhaps leading to an idealization of fatherhood as caring and providing, can displace the historical realities of fatherhood in biblical times. Both of these are engaged by ensuring that the historical dimension of the metaphor is adequately explored. A significant aspect of relations with the father in the family was that the sons engaged in the father's business—something evidenced in business signs today that include “and Son.” Addressing God as “Our Father” and asking for the kingdom to come is more like clocking in for work than engaging in a divine embrace.

The feminist and gay critique of gendered language about God asks different questions. Here, metaphor's irreducible cognitive content means that it is far from simple to reduce the metaphor of God as Father to a series of propositions that (p 510) might even be recast as an alternative metaphor, such as “Life-giver.” This is especially important for metaphors such as “father” that have an archetypal significance in human experience. Those wanting to argue for an alternative “root metaphor” for Christian understanding of God may use some other set of criteria to critique every aspect of Christian belief (as with feminist “revolutionaries” such as Mary Daly). Another tack is to use such criteria to prioritize other metaphors present in Scripture but not having such prominent significance (as with feminist “reformers” such as Sallie McFague). In both cases, other sources of authority (in this case, women's experience) need to become prior to Scripture within the hermeneutical circle (see also Soskice).

Bread. “Bread” does not have quite the same transcultural, archetypal significance as “father,” and so the question of “translating” or recasting the metaphor arises more sharply. Where another food is the staple source of sustenance, it may be argued that there is some equivalence in using a corresponding term, such as “rice.” Here the danger is that we may lose the contours of the original metaphor—in this case the difference between unleavened and leavened bread as an image of holiness and sin. Yet the same danger is present in cultures, like mine, in which only one sort of bread is popularly known.

Warrior. This metaphor is present in the phrase “LORD of hosts” (“Yahweh Sabaoth”) as well as being embedded or implied in OT language about God fighting for Israel. Here the horizon of the contemporary reader presents the most challenges, filled as it is both with changing Western ethical thinking about war, and also a quite different idealization of warfare in the Islamic concept of “jihad.” If we are to interpret this metaphor aright, we need to look carefully at all the ambiguities in Scripture surrounding this metaphor and how these ambiguities challenge a simplistic appropriation of it in our very different context.

Potter/Clay. This metaphor comes from a particular passage, Jer. 18, but also has echoes in the NT. It is influential in certain strands of Christian piety, but it is often removed from its particular literary context and so misconstrued. In Jer. 18 the metaphor serves to emphasize God's freedom to act as he will. But there is also a contrasting dimension (the "is not" of the metaphorical predication) by which the clay itself is responsible for whether it will be shaped by the potter—something that makes little sense in real-life pottery. The use of this metaphor to imply that faith is something passive, where we have little or nothing to do with our own shaping and growth, goes against the slightly counterintuitive but prominent aspect of the image in its literary context.

Thus, we can see that the different aspects of interpretation—issues to do with the world behind the text (the historical context), the world of the text (literary concerns), and the world in front of the text (the situation of the reader)—all have significant bearing on how we read biblical metaphors, though in different degrees in different instances.

Bibliography

Black, M. Models and Metaphors. Cornell University Press, 1962; Hesse, M. Models and Analogies in Science. Sheed & Ward, 1963; McFague, S. Metaphorical Theology. Fortress, 1982; Paul, I. How to Read the Book of Revelation. Grove Books, 2003; Ricoeur, P. Interpretation Theory. Texas Christian University Press, 1976; idem. The Rule of Metaphor. Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1978; Soskice, J. M. Metaphor and Religious Language. Clarendon, 1985.

Ian Paul

Metaphysics See Onto-Theology; Philosophy

Method

In the modern period, method has been perhaps the key theological concept. For a variety of reasons, those who sought to understand Scripture believed that ascertaining the correct method or approach was foundational. In the end, however, preoccupation with method in many ways has been seen as a hindrance to understanding Scripture rather than a help. Hans Frei expressed this problem in terms of "the eclipse of the biblical narrative." Focus on method has caused conservative and liberal Christians alike to neglect the theological meaning of the text itself. A theological approach to Scripture consequently involves a recasting of this role for method. It does not dismiss method, even the most critical, but it does displace critical methodology from being central.

Whether in biblical interpretation per se or in systematic theology, method concerns both the basic rational procedure for yielding and arranging results and, importantly, the presuppositions and conceptual framework that one brings to the task. Modernity itself represents the rise of historical-critical methodology for the interpretation of Scripture, which is consistent with the presupposition that a strict methodology should (p 511) be followed in any rational discipline. In placing the emphasis upon the text's formation and itself, method displaced the meaning of the text. Stress upon an objective and value-free approach worked against an understanding of the canonical text informed by faith because the latter approach was not methodically controlled.

The dismantling of the hegemony of this modern paradigm more recently has opened up a new intellectual space for a theological interpretation of Scripture and, correspondingly, for method to be understood in a different way. In what may be considered a metatheoretical or metamethodological perspective on method, we will first examine why method became so important in modernity and then how it can be reconceived.

Several features of modernity moved methodology to center stage. One of the most common characterizations of modernity is that it was foundationalist. In other words, in an almost unconscious way, it was assumed that knowledge was structured like a building, so that the foundation had to be secured before something could be built upon it (Murphy 1–2). In an unprecedented way in modernity, this led increasingly to concentration upon the nature of interpretation itself rather than upon the content of interpretation. Alvin Plantinga has more specifically termed this “classical foundationalism” in that the foundations had to be not just sturdy but also certain, indubitable, incorrigible (48). René Descartes's insistence upon truths that are “clear and distinct,” as well as beyond doubt, is a classical example (44). Descartes also portrays a classical requirement of a rigorous methodology that must be followed in laying and then building upon the foundation. Richard Bernstein has called the demand for a certain foundation and a rigorous method “objectivism” (8). This objectivism has led to an almost obsessive concentration upon finding and delineating a correct method, for unless the foundation is certain, all the rest is unstable.

A second and related feature of modernity is that in order to secure such a certain foundation, one needs to be rational and objective. This means that scholars must not allow tradition or presuppositions to shape their conclusions, which Hans-Georg Gadamer famously termed the Enlightenment “prejudice against prejudice itself” (270). Obviously, this approach functions itself as a presupposition virtually ruling out a theological interest in Scripture. A theological interpretation inevitably involves commitment and tradition, and thus could not be deemed “rational.” The result is that historical-critical methodology reveals great dexterity in uncovering the development and construction of the scriptural text—the world behind the text—but falls silent when it comes to the current theological meaning of the text (Vanhoozer 16–19). In different parlance, method could reveal to some extent what the text “meant,” but not what it “means.”

The criticism and virtual dismantling of modernity in contemporary thought undermines both of these moves, implying that classical foundationalism is not well founded and an objectivist understanding of reason is not warranted. It is increasingly recognized that an objectively clear foundation is an illusory chimera, and that there is no uninterested reason divorced from its place and tradition. The door is thus open for theologically interested interpretation related to a faith tradition without automatically being labeled as irrational or prejudicial (Thiemann). This does not mean simple fideism or relativism, either. While the public door may be ajar, there is no automatic reception. There is still a place, although chastened, for public evidence and critical methodology.

Moreover, the sharp distinction between what the text meant (traditionally understood as exegesis) and what it means (hermeneutics) is blurred but not abolished. The understanding of the former is already influenced by presuppositions shaped by the latter. Thus, there is no objective or innocent reading; in fact, in this sense all readings are “theological” readings. Methods do not thus stand alone but are shaped by our theological presuppositions. The point is not, as in modernity, to try to rid ourselves of our beliefs; rather, the point is to become more aware and thus self-critical of them. The claim to presuppositionless objectivity in modernity is now seen as ideological deception. Gadamer has pointed out that even the oft-neglected traditional third step of application already affects the first step (274–75). These huge shifts in contemporary thought give permission, in a way not possible since premodern times, for a self-conscious and unapologetic concern to read the scriptural text to discern what Nicholas Wolterstorff calls “divine discourse.”

The distinction between premodernity and what in this context we might term “postmodernity” is that critical methodology is not left behind. The gains of historical methods can be appropriated, but they are servants rather than masters of the interpretative task. The various criticisms can open up in intricate ways what Wolterstorff called the “first hermeneutic” of understanding (p 512) the meaning of the text in light of its time and its author, or authors. The “second hermeneutic” still remains, which is to read a scriptural text for its meaning, within its canonical context, as the word of God (Wolterstorff, chs. 11–12). The latter is not possible apart from some understanding of the entire canon (canonical criticism and biblical theology), the broad theological history of interpretation by the church (historical theology), and contemporary reflection upon the meaning of Scripture (systematic theology). Because of the recognition of the larger influence of one's situation, such reading involves, inevitably, one's own theological and faith tradition. This may be Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Lutheran, Reformed, free church, and so on, as well as larger contexts that are, for example, exemplified in various types of liberation theology, such as African-American, Latin American, and feminist. In addition, most traditions understand that this final discernment of a text's theological meaning includes not only all scholarly aids but also the illumination of the Holy Spirit. This spells the limitations of any method, which cannot ultimately take the place of an individual's and a faith community's personal configuration of meaning as they desire to be faithful to the Word and to the Spirit.

A helpful model for understanding this more subordinate role of methodology may be drawn from Ricoeur's idea of a hermeneutical arc ("Model"; Stiver, ch. 2). He suggests that our understanding is not absolute and certain in the beginning but stems from initial experiences of being grasped by meaning, which is a first naïveté. Rather than remain in an uncritical mode, we should, and usually do, move to a second, critical stage, where we reflect and test our understanding, as consistent with Paul's injunction to "test everything" (1 Thess. 5:21). This is the place not only of critical biblical methodologies but also of systematic theology. Theology itself is not a first-order understanding that takes the place of Scripture, but is second order. It reflects upon Scripture and also primary experiences of faith. Ricoeur, however, appeals for us not to make this critical stage the stopping point, as moderns have tended to do, so that we are caught fast in "the desert of criticism." Rather, we "wish to be called again" and move to a "post-critical naïveté" wherein we reappropriate, with the help of our critical reflection, our first-order sources of faith (Symbolism). This should be at the same time a practical application of our faith. In actuality, the hermeneutical arc becomes a hermeneutical spiral, where we continually reflect upon and reappropriate the substance of our faith.

In this model, method has a place, but it is not foundational nor does it have to be certain. Nor does it, as sometimes happens, become the focus rather than Scripture or the life of faith. For a Christian, any method should point to an understanding of the word of God and thus a theological interpretation of Scripture.

See also Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics; Objectivity; Ricoeur, Paul

Bibliography

Bernstein, R. Beyond Objectivism and Relativism. University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985; Descartes, R. Discourse on Method. In Descartes, Spinoza, ed. R. Hutchins. Great Books of the Western World 31. Encyclopaedia Britannica, 1952; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; Gadamer, H.-G. Truth and Method, trans. J. Weinsheimer and D. Marshall. Rev. ed. Crossroad, 1991; Murphy, N. Beyond Liberalism and Fundamentalism. Trinity, 1996; Plantinga, A. "Reason and Belief in God." Pages 16–93 in Faith and Rationality, ed. A. Plantinga and N. Wolterstorff. University of Notre Dame Press, 1983; Ricoeur, P. "The Model of the Text: Meaningful Action Considered as a Text." Pages 131–44 in Hermeneutics and the Human Sciences, ed. J. Thompson. Cambridge University Press, 1981; idem. The Symbolism of Evil, trans. E. Buchanan. Religious Perspectives 17. Harper & Row, 1967; Stiver, D. Theology after Ricoeur. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Thiemann, R. Revelation and Theology. University of Notre Dame Press, 1985; Vanhoozer, K. First Theology. InterVarsity, 2002; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Dan R. Stiver

Micah, Book of

Overview

The book of Micah is evidence that the size of a book does not determine its significance to scholars, the quantity of studies focused on its interpretation, or its place in theological discourse. Its content constitutes interpretative challenges to the extent that the various macrounits appear to have different historical contexts, different conceptual foci, and different types of elements signaling the interrelationship of these units.

Sequentially, Micah is sixth in the Book of the Twelve, sandwiched between Jonah and Nahum. Like others (e.g., Amos, Hosea), it opens with a superscription (1:1), a redactional element that relates the prophetic activity to a particular historical context by mentioning rulers of that period. Micah is designated as eighth-century-BCE activity, though some of its content (p 513) presupposes other historical settings, such as the mention of Babylon (4:10; seventh century BCE). It consists of two macrounits and their microunits: I. 1:1–5:15 (A. 1:2–16; B. 2:1–5:15); and II. 6:1–7:20 (A. 6:1–8; B. 6:9–7:20). Within its seven chapters, it moves from announcement of judgment on Samaria (1:6–7) to declaration of a promise of preservation, of forgiveness for a remnant (2:12–13; 7:18–20).

History of Interpretation

Like much of the OT, Micah has been the focus of various methodological approaches that yielded various interpretative conclusions. Some of the earliest studies centered on questions of authenticity—a question as reflective of the historical context of the interpreters as the apparent conceptual tensions within the book. As exemplified by Stade, in the nineteenth century, apparent inconsistencies in the extant form of the book (style, historical context, conceptual unity) became the basis for questioning its authenticity. Stade concluded that there are at least three distinct historical contexts—Mic. 1–3 (eighth century); 4–5 and 7:7–20 (sixth century); and 6:1–7:6 (seventh century).

While twentieth- and twenty-first-century scholarship acknowledges the inconsistencies within the book, the concern is not so much about authenticity as about the coherence of the whole. Among the first to look at redactional order of the constitutive units, Haupt observed that the extant order contributes to the incoherence of the book, and that restoration of an original order may restore coherence. Others, including Wolff, Lescow, and Wagenaar, later attempted to discern the composition history of the book through identification of the various redactional accretions, their historical contexts, and the redactional intent.

Mays addressed theological unity in his investigation of the historical context and redactional intention of the book's extant form. Willis and Hagstrom also voiced concerns about coherence and tried to define it by using literary and conceptual elements such as the alternation between judgment (chs. 1–3) and hope (chs. 4–5), and the recurrent concepts within the discernible macrounits (e.g., sin in chs. 1–3; 6–7). Jacobs notes these recurrent concepts in light of their semantic indicators (e.g., khatta'ah, “sin”; pasha, “crime/transgression”), genres (e.g., judgment speeches), inquiries about their interrelationship within the book, and also the conceptual framework of the OT.

Multicritical approaches are also part of the methodological orientation toward the book. These methods employ and acknowledge various critical resources in their analysis. Ben Zvi (Micah) addressed concerns about the form of the book, identifying the infractions of those against whom judgment is pronounced (“Wrongdoers”). He is also concerned about issues of “readership” as a decisive interpretative element. In this way, he exemplifies others who use the book of Micah to address issues of reader orientation, oppression, and class struggles. In delineating the composition history of chapters 2–5, Wagenaar identified the methodological parameters of her approach: form- and redaction-criticism. As a part of their historical critical analysis, Andersen and Freedman employed text criticism in addition to redaction criticism, resulting in a comparative analysis of the LXX and MT editions.

Within all of these approaches, one cannot miss the book's focus on judgment and hope. These are connected with the challenge to correct injustices and to know that God requires one's religious practices to be in line with godly social practices.

Content and Theological Concerns

The message of the book demands that Israel go beyond the external forms of worship and penitence to implement justice, but it does not promise to avert punishment. Rather, it promises to restore Jerusalem after the judgment. To further accentuate the severity of the sins, the priests' abuse of their role resulted in compromises in teaching Torah (cf. Mal. 1:1–9).

Sin and Forgiveness. The pervasive sin is presented through the repeated use of the terminology and depiction of practices: pasha ("crime/transgression," 1:5; cf. 6:7), khatta'ah ("sin," 1:5; cf. 3:8; 6:7), and awen ("wickedness") and ra ("evil," 2:1–2; cf. 3:1–2); 'awon ("iniquity" of the remnant, 7:18). The leaders and other accused are characterized as abusing their power (e.g., 3:1, 5–6) and seizing people's lands and possessions, thus reducing them to poverty (2:1–5). The judgment is extended to the whole nation: mishpakhah ("family," 2:3 NRSV). The Deity forgives all types of sins—the terminology may reflect the gamut of forgiveness—taking away iniquity (7:18), overlooking transgression (7:18), trampling upon iniquity (7:19), casting sin into the depth (7:19). Even so, forgiveness is particular to the remnant (she'erith—7:18–20), indicating God's selectivity in whom and when to forgive (cf. Jer. 31:34; 36:3; 1 John 1:9).

(p 514)God's Requirement. One of the challenges encountered by the people is their understanding of God's requirement. First, they assume that God's presence in their midst exempts them from adversity (3:10–11). Second, they believe that God's total requirement is giving sacrifices, and they view this requirement as burdensome (cf. Amos 5:21–25; Isa. 1:11). They thus give sacrifices and expect them to be sufficient to appease if not to please God, rather than seeing that God may be wearied by their sins and sacrifices (6:6–8; cf. 1 Sam. 15:22; Isa. 1:17; 43:22–24; Hos. 6:6; Mal. 1:13). Micah 6 clarifies that God requires doing justice, loving solidarity, and being circumspect in relationship with God (6:8). God does not reject religious rituals; but neither is God pleased simply by the external performances devoid of obedience manifested in repentance and justice (Isa. 1:17; 43:24; Jer. 6:20; Amos 5:21–24; cf. 2 Tim. 3:1–5).

Remnant and Hope. Unlike the book of Amos, which held out the possibility of changing God's resolve to bring judgment, in the book of Micah judgment is inevitable. The identity of she'erith (the "remnant") is as much a concern as its relationship to the judgment. First, God promises to restore Jerusalem and inaugurate a new age in the latter days (4:6–7; cf. Isa. 2:2–4). To that end, God promises to restore a remnant identified as those whom God has subjected to adversity (4:6–7). Second, the remnant will be formed without any concern to distinguish between the innocent and the guilty (cf. Isa. 10:20–22; 11:11). Third, the remnant will be forgiven of its sins and will be used to form the new nation in and through which Yahweh will rule. Fourth, the remnant is also identified as the she'erith ya'aqob ("remnant of Jacob," 5:7–8 [6–7 MT]), referring to those who survive from Judah, the southern kingdom (cf. Isa. 37:31–32). It appears that 2:12–13; 4:6–8; 5:9 (8); and 7:18–20 may also refer to this group rather than the northern kingdom. Fifth, the remnant is characterized both as a temporary and destructive presence in the midst of other nations (5:7–9 [6–8]), but not every remnant of Judah will be used in God's plan (cf. Jer. 44:12–14).

Through the concept of remnant, the issue of hope is raised. First, the hope is that through the experience of devastation the nation will be made aware of God's involvement in all phases of its existence (4:1–5:15 [14]). Second, in the eschatological perspective of actualizing the restoration, those to whom the promise is articulated may not live to experience it (cf. Jer. 24; 25:9–14). As with patriarchs waiting for the actualization of the promise, Israel's test of faith is to persist when the present circumstances bear no resemblance to the envisioned future.

Hermeneutical Challenges

Retribution. God punishes people. To some, this sounds like a manifestation of God's justice against the unjust; however, this concerns the nature of judgment, of a God who uses judgment to address sin, and judgment as a prerequisite for actualizing hope. Part of the challenge is that God not only punishes people (e.g., 3:4, 7) but also includes the innocent in the punishment (e.g., 2:3–5; 3:12; Hos. 13:16 [14:1 MT]; cf. Jer. 18:19–23). Consequently, those ravaged by the injustices committed against them are further ravaged by the manifestation of judgment. Additionally, while punishing a nation for its sins, God uses nations to punish each other—such as Babylon versus Judah (Mic. 4:10–11; Jer. 39), and Assyria versus the remnant of Judah (Mic. 5:8–9 [7–8]). This may be viewed as a manifestation of God's sovereignty in its prophetic literary context. Yet, it is problematic within the modern framework for several reasons, at least when it involves (1) discerning God's desires, plans, and involvement in any act that demolishes a nation (cf. Isa. 10:12–14; ch. 13; 43:14; Jer. 50); and (2) distinguishing God's acts and plans from human plans and motives to do harm. There is an inherent danger in unequivocally claiming God's approval for one's own violence.

God's Selectivity. While one may rejoice that in the book judgment is not the final word concerning Jerusalem's existence, one is also haunted by the representation of the remnant—the survivors. God will preserve a group of survivors and forgive its sins, without distinguishing between the innocent and the guilty in forming the remnant (7:18–20; cf. 2:12–13; 4:6–8). On the other hand, Jeremiah reflects God's selectivity in distinguishing between those who will be used to restore Jerusalem (good figs, 24:2–7) and those who will be perpetually rejected (bad figs, 24:8; 29:17; 44:12–14). This divine prerogative to choose or reject persons and nations is fundamental to the election and the covenantal relationship (Gen. 12; 15:2–4; Mal. 1:2–5). Yet God further distinguishes among those who constitute the covenant community: not all of them are to be part of God's chosen (cf. Ezek. 18; Rom. 9:6–9, 11–14). It epitomizes the tension among Christians—the nominal as compared to the committed Christian.

Second, God's selectivity is the timing of the judgment brought against nations, as perceived (p 515) in the gap between the devastation on Samaria (eighth century BCE) compared to Jerusalem (sixth century BCE). God seems to be more patient and tolerant toward some while readily punishing others. The third aspect of God's selectivity is the choice of nations to be used as instruments and subjects of devastation and the selection criteria—hence, the implications of belief in and pleasing such a Deity.

God's Requirements. The message of Micah confronts any community that extols the virtues of religion while fostering various forms of injustice. The people of Micah's day were accused of oppressing simply because they had the power to do so, and the injustices broke down trust in all arenas of the community. The family bonds are not enough to counter the mistrust in the community (Mic. 7:1–7). As in the Pentateuch, the concern is to protect those who are vulnerable within the community—the widow, orphan, poor (Exod. 22:21–24; Lev. 23:22; Deut. 15; Isa. 9:1–7; 11:1–9; Jer. 7:5–7; 22:3; Ezek. 22:7; Mal. 3:5). The justice accomplished is that those who abuse their power will be deprived of that power, but the modern settings including the church seem to tolerate abuse of power. It becomes difficult to discern God's voice in the midst of misteachings that have become the sanctioned beliefs among Christians and that allow persistent injustices (2 Tim. 4:3).

Bibliography

Andersen, F., and D. N. Freedman. Micah. AB 24E. Doubleday, 2000; Ben Zvi, E. Micah. FOTL 21B. Eerdmans, 2000; idem. “Wrongdoers, Wrongdoing and Righting Wrongs in Micah 2.” BibInt 7 (1999): 87–100; Hagstrom, D. The Coherence of the Book of Micah. SBLDS 89. Scholars Press, 1988; Haupt, P. “Critical Notes on Micah.” AJSL 26, no. 4 (1910): 201–52; Jacobs, M. Conceptual Coherence of the Book of Micah. JSOTSup 322. Sheffield Academic Press, 2001; Lescow, T. “Redaktionsgeschichte Analyse von Micha 1–5.” ZAW 84 (1972): 46–85; Mays, J. L. Micah. OTL. Westminster, 1976; Stade, B. “Bemerkungen über das Buch Micha.” ZAW 1 (1881): 161–72; Wagenaar, J. A. Judgement and Salvation. VTSup 85. Brill, 2001; Waltke, B. “Micah.” Pages 591–764 in The Minor Prophets, ed. T. E. McComiskey. Vol. 2. Baker, 1993; Willis, J. T. “The Structure, Setting, and Interrelationships of the Pericopes in the Book of Micah.” Ph.D. diss., Vanderbilt University, 1966; Wolff, H. W. Micah, trans. G. Stansell. Augsburg, 1990.

Mignon R. Jacobs

Midrash     See Jewish Exegesis

Millennium See Kingdom of God; Last Things, Doctrine of

Miracle

The topic of miracle in Scripture involves God showing his power on behalf of his people. Sometimes, especially in Jesus’ ministry, they function as an “audiovisual” of deeper spiritual reality. Miracles tend to be concentrated in three periods in Scripture: the exodus, the Elijah-Elisha period of Israel’s unfaithfulness, and the time of Jesus and the apostles, although miracles are scattered here and there throughout. In reaction to miracles, often the hearts of those not responsive to God are hardened, as in the case of Pharaoh. Often their impact is limited because they are not fully appreciated for all that they teach. Still, the Gospel of John can call them “signs,” an indicator of their role as a witness to God’s presence and activity. One’s judgment about the issue of whether miracles take place is a function of one’s worldview. However, for a God who actively creates the world and engages with it as Scripture insists, miracles are a natural consequence of his presence (Twelftree 38–53). In this article we focus on the theological significance of miracles for Jesus and his ministry, since they reveal all the characteristics of miracles in Scripture and are the key example of the category.

The Scope of Jesus’ Miracles

The array of Jesus' miraculous activity is significant because it points to the scope of divine concern. There are twenty miracle accounts in Mark alone, with a few summaries added to the list (Twelftree 57; Mark 1:21–28, 29–31, 32–34 [summary], 40–45; 2:1–12; 3:1–6, 7–12; 4:35–41; 5:1–20, 21–43; 6:30–44 [two miracles present], 45–52, 53–56 [summary]; 7:24–30, 31–37; 8:1–10 [two miracles present], 22–26; 9:14–29; 10:46–52; 11:12–24 with 20–26). They range from various types of healings (of leprosy, bleeding, paralysis, fever, blindness, deafness, withered hand, muteness, epilepsy) to exorcisms to miracles involving nature (calming the storm, cursing the fig tree, walking on the water, providing food) to resuscitation from the dead (Jairus's daughter). To this number, Matthew only adds two more, healing the official's son (Matt. 8:5–13) and supplying a coin in a fish's mouth (17:24–27; Twelftree 102). Luke also has twenty miracle stories and three summaries. Two of his miracles he shares with the Matthean tradition (Luke 7:1–10; 11:14), and six miracles are unique to his Gospel: large catch of fish (5:1–11), raising the widow of Nain's son (7:11–17), freeing a crippled woman on the Sabbath (13:10–17), healing a man with dropsy on the Sabbath (14:1–6), cleansing ten lepers (17:11–19), (p 516) and replacing the high priest's servant's severed ear (22:51; Twelftree 144). John has eight miracles: changing water to wine (2:1–12), healing the official's son (4:46–54) and the paralytic at Bethsaida (5:1–18), feeding the five thousand (6:1–15//Mark 6:32–44//Matt. 14:13–21//Luke 9:10–17), walking on the sea (6:16–21; cf. Mark 6:45–52//Matt. 14:23–33; cf. stilling the storm, Mark 4:35–41//Matt. 8:23–27//Luke 8:22–25), giving sight to the man born blind (9:1–7), raising Lazarus (11:1–57), and giving the large catch of fish (21:4–14; like Luke 5:1–11).

No other biblical figure has this scope of miraculous activity. The only other figures and periods that are close are the time of the exodus with Moses and the period of high apostasy with Elijah-Elisha. Only then do we see a combination of healing and exercise of authority over the elements. What these older parallels show is that human figures could perform any one of these classes of miracle, although in the OT no one ever gives the blind sight. However, what is impressive is the scope of Jesus' activity, which involves the creation, the healing of the blind, the cleansing of lepers, and the power to raise from the dead. In this variety we see an authority that is unique in scope, a figure who is Moses' equal and more.

However, when given the chance to confess who he is, Jesus points to the miracles as his "witness" and explanation. Several texts are important here.

In Matt. 11:2–5/Luke 7:18–23, when John the Baptist asks if Jesus is “the one who [is] to come,” the miracle-worker replies that John should be told what is being done: “The blind receive sight, the lame walk, those who have leprosy are cured, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the good news is preached to the poor.” Using the language of hope from Isaiah’s prophecies, Jesus claims that this is the promised period of God’s great work of salvation (Isa. 26:19; 29:18; 35:5–6; 42:18; 61:1). The fulfillment points out his identity and mission. What Jesus is doing shows who he is.

The second and third texts come from John’s Gospel, where Jesus’ works attest to his claims (John 5:36; 10:38). They represent the Father’s work giving attestation to Jesus’ claims and person. These Johannine texts conceptually parallel the Synoptics’ texts of Jesus’ reply to John the Baptist.

The fourth text is associated with Jesus’ nature miracles. Here the question is raised after the stilling of the storm: “What sort of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him?” (Matt. 8:27 NRSV). The question is raised because the creation was seen to be in the hands of God (Job 40–42; Ps. 107:23–29), a point underscored already by the miracles God performed at the exodus as a sign to Pharaoh. When Jesus walks on the water, the testimony goes beyond what the miracle shows about God; it also helps to show who Jesus is. The resulting confession combined with worship is, “Truly you are the Son of God” (Matt. 14:33).

The fifth text is tied to Jesus’ power over life itself. This is most dramatically developed in the story of Lazarus, where Jesus is portrayed as “the resurrection and the life” (John 11). Being the source of life is also another divine prerogative. The raising of Jairus’s daughter also points in this direction, but the Synoptics do not develop the idea as John’s Gospel does.

Sixth, there is a sequence of texts in Mark 4:35–5:43/Luke 8:22–56. Here the scope of Jesus’ miraculous power is summarized in a linked series of four miracles: calming of the sea, exorcism, healing of a woman with a hemorrhage, and raising from the dead. This sequence covers the whole scope of Jesus’ power from creation to supernatural forces to human well-being to life itself. It shows Jesus has the power to deliver comprehensively. The sequence points to the “audiovisual” nature of the miracles. It raises the question as well of what human is like this.

Seventh are the Sabbath healings, where God acts through Jesus on the day of rest to show his “support” of Jesus. One dispute closes by making the point, “The Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath” (Mark 2:28). So Jesus’ authority is seen over the most sacred day of the week as well as over the interpretation of the law. A miracle shows the way to the point.

Eighth is the discussion Jesus engenders about the significance of his miracles in Luke 11:14–23//Matt. 12:22–32. Here he says that if he casts out demons by the “finger” (Luke) or “power” (Matthew) “of God,” then the kingdom (promised rule) of God has come upon them. Miracles are signs that point to what God is actively doing and picture that deeper reality. Thus, they are event and metaphor.

Nothing shows this linkage more vividly than the miracle of the miraculous catch of fish in Luke 5:1–11. Here Jesus orchestrates a huge catch of fish and then tells his disciples they will be “fishers of men” (cf. 5:9; Mark 1:17). The miracle illustrates a deeper reality that points to God’s relationship to his disciples. In the same way, the healing from leprosy shows God’s power to cleanse through Jesus, the healing of a blind man shows Jesus’ ability to give sight, and the raising (p 517) from the dead shows his ability to give life. So miracles are both event and picture of God’s saving activity. Miracles that lead to death, as in the plagues of the exodus, underscore God’s authority to judge and our accountability to him. Interestingly, Jesus performed only a few miracles of judgment (such as the cursing of the fig tree) and his disciples used them rarely as well (such as the judgment of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts 5:1–11; Paul’s judgment of Bar-Jesus, 13:6–12).

Thus, the scope of these miracles suggests the comprehensive extent of God’s authority and, in the case of Jesus’ miracles, of Jesus’ authority as kingdom-bearer. The power over life, demons, and the creation suggests a scope of authority in one person that can exist only because one shares in divine power. So, ultimately miracles serve to reveal the presence, power, and authority of God and those through whom he works. In the case of Jesus, where the scale of miracle is so great, the miracles point to his uniqueness.

Bibliography

Twelftree, G. Jesus the Miracle Worker. InterVarsity, 1999.

Darrell L. Bock

Mission     See Church, Doctrine of the; Culture and Hermeneutics; Trinity

Model

If interpretation of Scripture is (and should be) theological, it must grapple with the nature, function, and status of models portraying God. In this age we do not know God face-to-face, nor is epistemic access to other theological realities altogether direct (1 Cor. 13).

Hence, models play a mediating role in the relatively adequate knowledge of the Christian faith that is presently possible by divine gift.

Models and Metaphors: Depicting Reality?

Models are crucial, not just in theology, but also in any field of abstraction. So Richard Rorty claims, “It is pictures rather than propositions, metaphors rather than statements, which determine most of our philosophical convictions.” The model of mind as mirror drove philosophers to conceive of knowledge as accurate representation. Study of models in science, though, has become even more important for their theological use, given the modern prominence of such analysis (Schner 10–12).

For we have learned that (even scientific) models do not speak literally, and they must be interpreted carefully. Even physical “models,” with evident points of correspondence, lose something in the change of scale—they would be useless if the originals were directly accessible. Models function precisely in mediation.

The frequent assumption, often made explicit, is that models differ from metaphors in degree but not kind: models are developed, sophisticated metaphors that possess considerable explanatory power (Black; Barbour). However, conflating these two categories, argues Janet Martin Soskice, risks not only a confusion of the linguistic (metaphor) and nonlinguistic but also a mistaken view of metaphor, which need not consist of one entity compared to another. “Angry wind” is clearly a figurative expression, yet it is not obvious that wind is being compared to something else, only implicit at most. Because the comparison theory is subject to counterexamples, Soskice defines metaphor instead as speaking of one thing in terms that suggest another. A model, meanwhile, is “an object or state of affairs ... viewed in terms of some other object or state of affairs” (54–55). It follows that metaphor is language use tied to a model.

For example, Luther unfolds the model of God (the subject: what the model is of) as father (the source: what the model is based upon) by specifying respects in which God is paternal—making specific demands of us and promises to us (146). Though Luther did not do so in this context, he could have added further implications: if God is Father, then sin is rebellion, and redemption is restoration to the status of child in good standing (McFague, Models).

Such classic models have recently become controversial, as especially feminist theologians have inquired into their workings. Sallie McFague suspects that traditional models of God put the world itself in danger: styling the Divine as almighty Father or King means God is distant from the world, his realm. So, if humans imagine themselves in roles parallel to God's, dominion results, whereas if they do not, escapism ensues.

The solution, for McFague, is to reenvision the God-world relation, but not in the sense of more accurate depiction: "What can be said with certainty about Christian faith is very little.... Theology is mostly fiction" (McFague, Models, xi). A theory of indeterminate metaphorical reference fosters this judgment, largely dropping truth from the picture. Specifically, metaphors and models are a matter of what is and is not (cf. Ricoeur 7). Just as chess is war (both require (p 518)strategy) and yet not war (only war involves death), for all we know, God both is and is not how models portray him. According to McFague, scriptural images are exemplars, but not the only possible images theologians may use. Her preferred model for God fosters peace, justice, and an understanding of creation's interdependence. If Christians think of the world as God's body, and act accordingly, they will deeply revere such a sacrament.

Many would agree that theological models motivate action, but are wary of such coyness over reality depiction. If models do not depict reality—or more precisely, if we cannot know they do—and theology is a matter of advancing a sociopolitical agenda, then Feuerbach's criticism that religious language simply projects human values has bite (Clayton 17). To be fair, McFague is indeed concerned about that problem, chiding traditional theologies for turning God as Father into something all too human, an "old man with a white beard" (McFague, Metaphorical, 97). But in her account, the problem remains unsolved.

From another angle, if models do not depict reality, how should they prompt and regulate action? Christian conduct presupposes the accurate, albeit indirect, reference of metaphorical theological predicates (Barbour; Soskice). Models seem interconnected with, even decisive for, a workable concept of analogy regarding our knowledge of God (McIntyre 58–68). For instance, if God is my shepherd, I can rely on God's provision. But nothing follows unless the "if" clause is true. The ambiguity of models in McFague's account is largely a function of their free creation apart from context. The contexts in which biblical authors unfold models help to disambiguate them.

In two ways, then, models are contingent on canonical—historical, literary, and theological—context: (1) For a model even to be a model, the figure must play a certain role in a text. Not just any features of the human body model the church, but the essence and extensions of Paul's reference in 1 Cor. 12. This viewing-as, or moment of interpretation, is what constitutes a figure as a model. (2) A biblical model's meaning also depends on the dynamics of the text in which it unfolds. Scripture itself must serve as a critical principle by which to check idolatrous use of models, such as confusing sexuality or gender with divine paternity (cf. Mary Daly's line: "If God is male, then male is God").

Models, Traditions, and So On: Construing the Divine?

A theological model, or set of them, drives a tradition. This is so because models suggest ways of seeing relationships as well as modes in which to pursue questions about God, the world, and Christian living. A theological tradition limits the range of acceptable models, although any living tradition will develop. Thus, communicating Calvin's twofold knowledge of God may develop continuities with predecessors, but also creates further discussions (e.g., Barth and Brunner). Yet drastic switches—such as from God as King to God as only a watchmaker who sets the world running—mean moving into a new or alternative tradition.

Meanwhile, in Thomas Kuhn's view science operates with a single model of an object. Since these paradigms are incommensurable, plurality cannot coexist; the new displaces the problematic old. Does this describe theological exegesis vis-à-vis tradition(s)? On the one hand, Robert Shedinger says "no" in his description of how biblical scholarship works. Moreover, theologically, a single model may yield insufficient explanatory power: for example, the church as body felicitously pictures interdependence among church members, and perhaps growth together, but is an awkward way to convey missionary expansion (Clowney). For that purpose, Paul's picture of grafting shoots into a vine is a helpful supplement. Or, for example, the Vatican II text Lumen gentium exemplifies a two-model account of the church, including both household of God and body of Christ. Regarding the doctrine of the church (and of revelation also), Avery Dulles pioneered the description of ecclesiological traditions, or their varieties over time, in terms of models. The distinctiveness of each type need not logically exclude others; in fact, it is necessary that all their core affirmations be treated as complementary.

On the other hand, there are reasons to press toward the simplicity of a single model. Some models are able to expand and organize a whole array (Pepper) of doctrines, while it may be jarring to juxtapose disparate models. For instance, God as King may fit with God as Shepherd, but how about God as tower and lion and nesting eagle and rock (Ramsey)? If one purpose of theology is to display the coherence of doctrines, then we must find (1) a model that is remarkably comprehensive (with humility about what remains poorly in focus), (2) an overarching framework such as (p 519)a symphony (Poythress) that shows how differences may blend harmoniously, or (3) perhaps a combination of these strategies.

Thus, theological models deploy our understanding of Scripture's unity. Ramsey's query illustrates the need to distinguish models (not directly literary) from the metaphors that imply them—from the literary images out of which they may be developed: probably “king” and “shepherd” approach “concept” status (habits of thinking in connection with certain words; Callow), while “tower” and “lion” do not. As regular canonical reality depictions despite particular historical and literary contours, models such as “king” develop to answer questions about, or to portray, particular givens. Within that scope they probably must seek the sort of comprehensiveness (Clayton), however unattainable, that is still true of modest metaphysical claims. But they also produce unintended consequences. We should neither overreach in our expectations of a model's coverage, nor overreact when a model must involve complementary elements (Kaiser) or qualification from other angles.

Thus, theology cannot function like a particular science with an encompassing paradigm, given the scope of its questions. The relation of models to traditions must be many to one, although a tradition might develop from a central model, whereas models increasingly allow conversation across traditions (McIntyre 65–68; e.g., Dulles). Likewise, theological systems must contain and connect multiple models, although dependent perhaps on one inquiry or imaginative act to start with—as a theologian or community tries to communicate and extend their tradition in a particular way.

Though biblical models should be central, and constrain ours, all models involve human construction even if the comparison is something concrete or suggested in the Bible itself (Goldingay 11). Since language becomes involved, theological systems can discern, connect, and deploy biblical models only with “relative adequacy”—no more relevant questions to answer, for a time (so Tracy, following Lonergan). New challenges will evoke ongoing construal of God's presence in relation to biblical patterns and to us (Kelsey). By a process of imagination, inference, hypothesis, testing, and revision (which is abduction more than induction or deduction), “biblical” models can arise and relate systematically across theological inquiry. Systems should be more tensile than traditionally the case, open to complementary models as questions connect and/or change. Such relative adequacy reflects biblical knowledge of God, which humbly looks forward to fullness of new life but also back to the cross—a scandal for so many theological models then and now. See also Concept; Critical Realism; Metaphor; Science, the Bible and; Scripture, Unity of; Systematic Theology; Tradition

Bibliography

Barbour, I. Myths, Models, and Paradigms. Harper & Row, 1974; Black, M. Models and Metaphors. Cornell University Press, 1962; Callow, K. Man and Message. University Press of America, 1998; Clayton, P. The Problem of God in Modern Thought. Eerdmans, 2000; Clowney, E. "Interpreting the Biblical Models of the Church: A Hermeneutical Deepening of Ecclesiology." Pages 64–109 in Biblical Interpretation and the Church, ed. D. A. Carson. Thomas Nelson, 1984; Dulles, A. Models of the Church. Rev. ed. Doubleday, 1987; idem. Models of Revelation. Doubleday, 1983; Goldingay, J. Models for Scripture. Eerdmans, 1994; Kaiser, C. "Christology and Complementarity." ReIS 12 (1976): 37–48; Kelsey, D. The Uses of Scripture in Recent Theology. Fortress, 1975. Reissued as Proving Doctrine. Trinity, 1999; Kuhn, T. The Structure of Scientific Revolutions. 2d ed. University of Chicago Press, 1970; Luther, M. The Sermon on the Mount and the Magnificat. Vol. 21 of Luther's Works, ed. J. Pelikan. Concordia, 1956; McFague, S. Metaphorical Theology. Fortress, 1982; idem. Models of God. Fortress, 1987; McGrath, A. Science and Religion. Blackwell, 1999; McIntyre, J. The Shape of Christology (ch. 3). 2d ed. T&T Clark, 1998; Murphy, N. Theology in the Age of Scientific Reasoning. Cornell University Press, 1990; Pepper, S. World Hypotheses. University of California Press, 1942; Poythress, V. Symphonic Theology. Zondervan, 1987; Ramsey, I. Models and Mystery. Oxford University Press, 1964; Ricoeur, P. The Rule of Metaphor, trans. R. Czerny et al. University of Toronto Press, 1977; Rorty, R. Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature. Princeton University Press, 1979; Schnier, G. "Metaphors for Theology." Pages 3–51 in Theology after Liberalism, ed. J. Webster and G. Schnier. Blackwell, 2000; Shedinger, R. "Kuhnian Paradigms and Biblical Scholarship: Is Biblical Studies a Science?" JBL 119 (2000): 453–71; Soskice, J. Metaphor and Religious Language. Clarendon, 1985; Tracy, D. The Analogical Imagination. Crossroad, 1981.

Daniel J. Treier with Darren Sarisky

Moltmann, Jürgen See Hope; Last Things, Doctrine of

Monotheism

As used here, "monotheism" designates the belief that one Deity is universally supreme and categorically unique from all other heavenly or "divine" beings, and that worship is properly to be given solely to this one Deity, with worship of any other beings regarded as idolatry. So defined, (p 520)monotheism can be distinguished from "henotheism," the preference for worshipping one Deity, but without the claim that the worship of other deities by other people or groups is invalid. The distinguishing feature of monotheism is the claim that the one Deity is properly to be recognized and exclusively worshipped universally.

This "monotheism" is the typical religious stance reflected in the Bible, both OT and NT. The God referred to as “Elohim” and “Yahweh” is portrayed as the sole Creator of all things heavenly and earthly (e.g., Gen. 1:1; Ps. 8; Isa. 40:12–17, 28; 44:24; 45:18), and the universal Sovereign, to whom all creation is responsible and from whom alone salvation is possible for all peoples (e.g., Isa. 45:22–25). There are emphatic warnings that God is “jealous” that worship be given to him alone (e.g., Deut. 5:8–9; 6:14–15). Moreover, not only is Israel forbidden to worship any other deity; in the most explicit expressions of monotheism, the biblical texts portray all other nations as misguided in reverencing any other gods, and hold out the aim that all nations should come to the light of the one true God (Isa. 56:6–8; 60:1–16), which the NT presents as fulfilled through the spread of the gospel (e.g., 1 Thess. 1:9–10).

On the basis of archaeological data (e.g., the Elephantine texts) and the witness of the OT itself, however, scholars (e.g., Day; Smith) rightly note that preexilic Israel and Judah were not really monotheistic in dominant belief or worship, although some scholars posit a preexilic “Yahweh-alone party” as a minority voice then (e.g., Lang). Indeed, condemnation of Israel and Judah for worshipping gods other than Yahweh is a major theme in writings such as Hosea (4:12–19; 8:4–6; 10:5–6; 13:1–8; 14:1–3) and the so-called Deuteronomistic narratives (e.g., 2 Kings 17:7–23).

But, whatever vestiges there may be of earlier Israelite religious views and practices, it is clear that the stance advocated in the OT texts in their “final form” as we know them is fiercely monotheistic. This is presupposed and implicit in the Gen. 1 creation account, for example, and is reflected more explicitly in texts such as Deut. 6:4, which forms the heart of what became the traditional Jewish confession of faith in the one God (the Shema). But probably the most sustained and emphatic declarations of monotheism in the OT are passages in Isa. 40–66. In this material Elohim/Yahweh is repeatedly declared to be unique over against all other objects of worship, including those revered as gods by other nations, which are mere “idols” (e.g., 40:18–20, 25–26; 43:10–13; 45:5–7, 18, 20–23). And from at least the fifth century BCE onward and increasingly thereafter, Jewish religion was characteristically expressed as this exclusivist monotheism. What might once have comprised a pantheon of divine beings (as reflected, e.g., in early Canaanite religion) was radically redefined as an entourage of the one God, who presides over them all (e.g., Job 1:6; 2:1; Ps. 82:1) as “the LORD of hosts” (e.g., Pss. 89:8 NRSV; 103:21). The beings of the divine council whose earlier designations were “sons of God” and “holy ones” came to be known more familiarly as “messengers” of God, reflecting their subordinate status and function (Hebrew:

mal'akim; Greek: angeloi).

In the NT as well, this exclusivist monotheism is everywhere presumed and affirmed (e.g., Matt. 4:10/Luke 4:8; Eph. 4:4–6; 1 Tim. 1:17; 2:5; Rom. 11:33–36), and is vigorously asserted in particular texts that more directly react against the wider polytheistic culture. In Rom. 1:18–32, Paul's principal indictment against human "ungodliness and wickedness" is that it began in, and continues to involve, idolatry (1:19–23), from which all other sin is depicted as flowing; here Paul echoes Jewish texts such as Wis. 12–15. In 1 Cor. 8 and 10, Paul consistently uses "idols" and "idolatry" to refer to other gods and the reverence given to them in the Roman-era culture; and he insists that Christians must shun the worship of other deities as completely incompatible with their participation in Christ (10:14–22). In Revelation, however, we have the most militant expressions in the NT. The author rails against the widespread idolatry of his time (9:20–21), and in particular warns sternly against worship of "the beast" (14:9–11), urging all to worship solely the true God (14:6–7; 19:10; 21:8–9).

Yet the monotheism reflected in the NT represents also a significant and novel "binitarian" form, in which the resurrected Jesus is confessed as the "Lord" who shares in God's glory and attributes (e.g., 2 Cor. 3:12–4:6), and who is linked with God as recipient of worship (e.g., Rev. 5; Hurtado, One). That is, Jesus is defined with reference to God, and God is (re)defined with reference to Jesus as unique agent of God's revealing and redemptive purposes. The roots of post-NT trinitarian thought lie precisely in this binitarian belief and devotional pattern.

Strangely for so central a theme in the Bible, the implications of monotheism have hardly been explored by scholars (but see Peterson; Niebuhr). In the ancient settings, biblical monotheism was expressed as a radical reservation of worship for the one God, a stance that could have profound (p 521) social consequences for devotees, especially those from Gentile backgrounds, including alienation from friends and family, accusations of antisocial and disloyal attitudes, and even violent persecution. As well, the sharp distinction between the one transcendent God and all creation opens the possibility of a religiously based demythologizing of the state, nation, and all other this-worldly objects for which reverence as divine is demanded.

Monotheism may even have been a major factor contributing to the central place of sacred texts in ancient Jewish tradition and then in Christianity and Islam, for which there is no true analogy in other ancient or contemporary world religions. The true/transcendent God of biblical monotheism cannot be comprehended adequately from nature and its powers (e.g., procreation, death/destruction, seasons, war, etc.), and is more adequately witnessed to in response to God's own acts and words. Perhaps as a consequence of this view, therefore, "Scripture"—as specific words from God (e.g., prophetic oracles) and as testimony to specific acts and attributes of God (narratives, psalms, wisdom)—preserved in written form acquired a unique status and role.

The radical distinction posited between one true God and all other purported divinities also entails the importance of accurate and faithful witness. Insofar as reliable witness to the one God is to be shaped by Scripture, it follows that conscientious exegesis is requisite. Biblical monotheism itself demands the hermeneutical effort and the questions it entails. All the same, however, the transcendent God cannot be fully captured even in Scripture; so, even when testimony about God is conscientiously based in Scripture, it can only amount to human knowledge that, though valid, remains partial (1 Cor. 13:12) and in principle corrigible. The distinctive claim made for Scripture is that it provides a basis for knowledge about the one God that is sufficient to guide believers to authentic worship and faithful loving service (1 Cor. 13:13), not that this knowledge is complete or incapable of being revised. To adapt a Reformation formula, theological interpretation shaped by biblical monotheism should be semper reformanda (ever reformable). Moreover, because the one God is witnessed to in Scripture, not captured within it, Scripture scholarship properly can only be one servant among others of God and the believing community, not a scribal hierarchy or hegemony over others. And, as inspired human witness to the one God, Scripture itself cannot rightly hold the divinized place given to the Qur'an in Islam.

Because the one God who is most adequately revealed to us in God's own free acts and words has really acted and spoken in historical events and personages, it is unavoidable that these events and the scriptural testimonies to them were historically conditioned by the circumstances in which they first occurred. It follows, therefore, that exegesis should respect and engage the historically conditioned features of the scriptural texts (e.g., language, literary genre, textual transmission, and other factors), and that adequate theological interpretation also involves the attempt to engage the contents of the scriptural texts from, and with concerns for, the specific historical setting of the interpreter and/or those whom the interpretation is meant to serve.

Bibliography

Bauckham, R. God Crucified. Eerdmans, 1999; Day, J. Yahweh and the Gods and Goddesses of Canaan. JSOTSup 265. Sheffield Academic Press, 2000; Hurtado, L. "First Century Jewish Monotheism." JSNT 71 (1998): 3–26; idem. One God, One Lord. 2d ed. T&T Clark, 1998; Klauck, H.-J., ed. Monotheismus und Christologie. QD 138. Herder, 1992; Lang, B. Monotheism and the Prophetic Minority. Almond, 1983; Lang, B., ed. Der einzige Gott. Köselverlag, 1981; Niebuhr, H. R. Radical Monotheism and Western Culture. Harper & Row, 1970; Peterson, E. Der Monotheismus als politisches Problem. Jakob Hegner, 1935; Smith, M. S. The Early History of God. Harper & Row, 1987; Thüsing, W. Per Christum in Deum. NTAbh 1. Aschendorff, 1965.

Larry W. Hurtado

Moral Sense See Ethics; Ideological Criticism; Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics; Medieval Biblical Interpretation

Mujerista Interpretation See Feminist Biblical Interpretation

Music, the Bible and

Although music and hermeneutics might at first seem to have little to do with each other, music can offer rich material for the theological interpretation of Scripture. First, biblical references to music can serve to highlight strong theological currents in Scripture, currents in which music is closely caught up. Second, Scripture itself can be interpreted musically. Musical treatments of biblical texts and themes abound, and a range of musical imagery and conceptuality can be (and (p 522)has been) employed to deepen and advance the hermeneutical task.

Music in the Biblical Texts

The Bible's many references to music need cautious treatment: they are largely in the form of passing comments and incidental allusions, granting only a fragmentary picture of how music was thought about and practiced. Care also needs to be taken not to "read back" assumptions about music drawn from modern Western traditions. For example, most music in biblical times probably took the form of a single line of notes (there was virtually no harmony as we know it), and followed the patterns and rhythms of speech far more closely than much of the music we hear today. Nevertheless, some aspects of musical culture in ancient Israel and the NT period are very clear.

Music in the OT as Social Action. Listening to a "work" of music purely for its own sake, for aesthetic delight, or privately (as we might listen to a CD) was relatively unknown in ancient Near Eastern culture. Music was made by someone (or by a group) for something, and most often was intended to happen between people, in a social setting. It was woven into the fabric of community living, with a huge range of social roles—to help people sleep, celebrate, rest, fight, sow seed, eat, and so on. When music served theological purposes, it did so largely by shaping and strengthening community life, in both cultic and noncultic settings. In Gen. 4:20–22, Jubal, “the ancestor of all those who play the lyre and pipe” (NRSV), is mentioned alongside the first smith (Tubal-cain) and the first cattle-breeder (Jabal), thus testifying to music’s embeddedness in daily life. Music was used for greetings and farewells, marriages and burials, coronations and processions, rallying troops and lamenting the dead. Among its more prominent functions was the intense outpouring of emotion, as when music accompanied prophecy and generated ecstatic states (1 Sam. 10:1–12; 2 Kings 3:9–20). The apotropaic use of music—to ward off evil forces and spirits—also finds frequent mention (e.g., Exod. 28:33–35; David’s playing to Saul, 1 Sam. 16:23).

Roughly three-quarters of the biblical references to music concern song. Ancient Israel was a singing culture, and the variety of songs seems to be as wide as the variety of human activity. Instruments certainly were available and in use (Braun 8–45). The kinnor (lyre) and nebel (harp) were the most important string instruments (e.g., Ps. 92:3 [MT, v. 4]). Wind instruments are also cited, especially the khalil (pipe or flute). By far the most significant were the shophar and khatsoțsera—both translated “trumpet.” The former, a long horn (of a goat or ram), is the most frequently cited instrument in the OT and was used most often as a signaling and gathering instrument, both culticly and nonculticly. The khatsoțsera was a tube of beaten or hammered silver with a bell-shaped end, in postexilic times a cultic and priestly instrument of the second temple. Despite these and other references, however, instrumental music seems to have played a relatively marginal role, something almost certainly due to the prominence of the word in Jewish faith, and to the associations of musical instruments with surrounding pagan culture. (In the Canaanite cult, with its strong sexual orientations, instruments seem to have played a conspicuous part.)

This relative lack of interest in musical instruments was later exploited by some early Christians in an effort to prohibit the use of instruments in worship. Also, they drew on a number of OT prophetic texts that seemed hostile to instruments (e.g., Isa. 5:11–12; Amos 5:23–24; 6:4–6). In fact, these passages are attacking music as part of an indulgent lifestyle that masked social injustice, not instrumental music per se. Yet, the church’s misreadings of them came to have profound and lasting effects on attitudes to music in Christian history (McKinnon).

Music came to figure prominently in some forms of OT corporate worship. The link between music and praise could be quite strong (exemplified many times in the Psalms). Liturgical music is reported to have become a regular institution in the Davidic and Solomonic eras, along with the establishment of professional musicians drawn from the Levites. John Kleinig has sketched some of the key theological dynamics of music as presented in 1 and 2 Chronicles (ch. 5). On the one hand, singing announced, and became a vehicle of, the presence of the Lord to his people (e.g., 1 Chron. 16:9–11); on the other, singing served to articulate a response of the congregation to the Lord's presence (e.g., 16:35). When instruments were used, they seem to have been caught up in this double movement: from God to his people and from the people to God, a dynamic that seems to have been integral to OT worship as a whole.

Music in the NT Churches. Not surprisingly, much of what applies to pre-Christian Jewish music applies to music in the NT. We can assume that music was intertwined with everyday life, and numerous references suggest that singing (p 523) was common in the emerging Christian community, with no sign of any negative attitude toward music as such. “The Christian Church was born in song” (Martin 39).

In worship, singing would likely have been relatively informal, involving the whole congregation. Many argue that the NT includes songs or fragments of songs used in worship (e.g., Col. 1:15–20; Phil. 2:6–11; 1 Tim. 3:16). It is probable that singing included the chanting of OT psalms, and fresh Spirit-inspired compositions patterned after the psalms, with a christological focus (Hurtado 88–89).

Ephesians 5:18–20 and Col. 3:16–17 are the two richest NT passages that mention music in the context of corporate worship, with their injunction to sing “psalms, hymns and spiritual songs.” Especially striking here is the lack of any negative comment about music, in a context of vigorous ethical concern. Theologically noteworthy is the two-dimensionality of song: it is addressed “to the Lord” but is also a means of addressing “one another”—in edification, instruction, and exhortation. Singing is a means of mutual upbuilding. This relates to Paul's stress in 1 Corinthians on intelligible singing, as part of a wider concern for intelligibility in worship to ensure the upbuilding of the church (14:14–15). This combination of humanward and Godward finds its main precedent in the Psalter: the writer can extol to others the greatness of God or celebrate what he has done, as well as address God directly in the second person (e.g., Ps. 30).

The christological center of these two passages is unmistakable. In Colossians, the pattern is “to God,” and “in the name of” as well as “through” Jesus; in Ephesians, singing is “to the Lord” (most likely the exalted Jesus). Jesus is both the object of worship, included in the identity of God, as well as the one through whom worship is offered. (A similar pattern is found in Hebrews; Christ is worthy of the worship due to God, and the leader of the congregation’s song; 1:1–4; 2:12.) In the Ephesians text, this widens into a trinitarian pattern: singing is to be “filled with the Spirit.” As with all worship, the personal presence of God the Spirit initiates and sustains the church’s singing. Music thus shares in the trinitarian dynamic of worship, which in turn is the dynamic of redemption (cf. Eph. 2:18). The Spirit unites us to Christ and him to us, so that with him, as well as through him, we have access to the Father.

In the NT, instrumental music is neither prohibited nor attacked, and there is no reason to believe that instruments were banned in worship. Nevertheless, references to musical instruments are few and far between, and are not mentioned in the context of the church’s regular worship. If instruments were scarce in worship, it would likely be because of their absence in the synagogue (with the exception of the shophar; Foley 48–50). In addition, the centrality of words in the life of the NT church would undoubtedly have played a part in privileging vocal music—it was, after all, a specific and urgent kerygma that had led to the formation and mission of the Christian community.

Musical Imagery. Along with literal references to music-making, musical imagery abounds in Scripture and does its own kind of theological work. Creation praises the Creator by “singing” (Pss. 96:12; cf. 65:12–13; 98:7–9). God’s covenant people “sing a new song” (Pss. 33:3; 40:3; 96:1; 98:1; 144:9; 149:1; Isa. 42:10)—a potent metaphor of the impact of salvation, and picked up in Revelation (14:3). In the NT, musical imagery frequently has strong eschatological connotations, the most prominent image being the trumpet (salpinx), an instrument redolent with overtones of the “last days” (1 Cor. 15:52 NRSV: “The trumpet will sound, and the dead will be raised”). Trumpet symbolism plays a leading part in the drama of the book of Revelation (e.g., 1:10–13; 4:1), evoking the interplay of heaven and earth, bringing together the devastation of earth, the call to penitence, the prophetic associations of judgment, and the announcement of the day of the Lord.

Musical Interpretation

Musical Settings. The interpretation of biblical texts by musicians has been practiced ever since the emergence of the NT writings. These range from direct musical settings of biblical texts (psalm chants, for example), through settings of biblical paraphrases (as with many hymns), settings of biblical texts interspersed among other texts (J. S. Bach's St. Matthew Passion or Tebelak and Schwartz's Godspell), settings of texts at times loosely connected to biblical writings (Benjamin Britten's Noye's Fludde), to purely musical pieces based to a greater or lesser extent on Scripture (Olivier Messiaen's Visions de l'amen).

When texts (whether biblical or derived from the Bible) are set by musicians, it is important to regard these as interpretations. It is often thought that music will “conform” in a relatively simple way to the meaning of the words it sets, at most adding a kind of transparent varnish, or merely amplifying what is already expressed in the words. If not simply assumed, this kind of (p 524) model is often urged as an ideal to attain. The Platonic tradition has been highly influential on the church in this regard, not least at the Reformation, when Calvin and others insisted that music must “hug the contours” of biblical texts with point-for-point rigor, especially in worship. This, however (as Calvin himself came to see), is clearly problematic. For music has its own quite distinctive capacities—to move us in particular ways, to create a sense of togetherness-in-distinction through overlapping sounds, to generate a sense of hopefulness through patterns of tensions and resolutions, and so forth. It is perhaps best to speak of music and words interacting with each other, music bringing its own distinctive powers to bear in the interpretation of texts (Begbie, “Unexplored”; Wright). When J. S. Bach sets the words “And Peter went out and wept bitterly” in St. Matthew Passion, the music exercises its own unique capacities as it interacts with the words, enabling us to access and participate in new ways in the reality of which the words speak—the dark depths of Peter's remorse.

Musical Imagery and Conceptuality. Music can also generate imagery, conceptuality, models, and metaphors to enhance the theological interpretation of Scripture. The singing of creation into being by Aslan in C. S. Lewis's The Magician's Nephew is an example (as is the musical-evolutionary overture to J. R. R. Tolkien's Silmarillion). In The Art of Performance, Frances Young compares our interpretation of Scripture to the performance of a musical work, exploring issues of textual authenticity, meaning, “authentic interpretation,” “improvisation” for different contexts, and with a firm theological interest throughout. This is an instance of a field sometimes called “performance” hermeneutics (Lash; Barton). The imagery of “polyphony” has been widely used to speak of the diversity-in-unity of the biblical writings (Gowler), and Jeremy Begbie has argued that the metrical wave patterns in music can generate a deeper understanding of patterns of hope, promise, and fulfillment in biblical eschatology (Theology).

See also Dialogism; Psalms, Book of; Worship

Bibliography

Barton, S. "New Testament Interpretation as Performance." SJT 52 (1999): 179–208; Begbie, J. Theology, Music and Time. Cambridge University Press, 2000; idem. "Unexplored Eloquencies: Music, Religion and Culture." Pages 93–106 in Mediating Religion, ed. J. Mitchell. T&T Clark, 2003; Braun, J. Music in Ancient Israel/Palestine. Eerdmans, 2002; Foley, E. Foundations of Christian Music. Grove, 1992; Gowler, D. "Heteroglossic Trends in Biblical Studies: Polyphonic Dialogues or Clanging Cymbals?" RevExp (2000): 443–66; Hurtado, L. At the Origins of Christian Worship. Eerdmans, 1999; Jones, I. "Music and Musical Instruments." ABD 4:930–39; Kleinig, J. The Lord's Song. JSOT, 1993; Lash, N. "Performing the Scriptures." Pages 37–46 in Theology on the Way to Emmaus. SCM, 1986; Martin, R. Worship in the Early Church. Eerdmans, 1975; Porter, W. "Music." Pages 711–19 in Dictionary of New Testament Background, ed. C. Evans and S. Porter. InterVarsity, 2000; McKinnon, J. Music in Early Christian Literature. Cambridge University Press, 1987; Wright, N. T. "From Theology to Music and Back Again." Pages 177–92 in Sounding the Depths, ed. J. Begbie. SCM, 2002; Young, F. The Art of Performance. Darton, Longman & Todd, 1990.

Jeremy Begbie

Mysticism, Christian

By the earliest era of Christianity, the Greek term mystikos had migrated from a particular usage in the Hellenistic mystery cults into common Mediterranean usage in the ancient world. It had come to mean that which is hidden, that which is beyond the surface level of reality (deriving from the Greek root my-, to close). Thus, Paul uses the cognate term mystērion (e.g., Rom. 16:25; 1 Cor. 15:51) to denote truth whose unimaginable significance is hidden from the world, apart from the revelation of Christ. The following generations also used the term in reference to Christ, specifically as a way of pointing to the hidden truth of Christ present everywhere in the Scriptures. This sense that the Scriptures testify to Christ, even when texts at the surface level may be speaking of something else, would of course develop into the range of figural and allegorical readings of Scripture that have been so central to the Christian understanding. More than this, however, early Christians held that this sense of a divine more or a hidden presence of Christ in the Scripture was not simply a matter of one text pointing to another or even to truths about Christ; rather, they understood the Spirit as accomplishing a real encounter between the believing community and the risen Christ precisely in the hearing and proclaiming of the word. So for figures like Origen of Alexandria (ca. 185–ca. 254), often identified as the father of Christian mysticism, scriptural exegesis is inherently a mystical process in which the praying community is transformed and through its exegesis of the written word drawn into the hidden or mystical presence of the crucified and living Word.

In the centuries that followed, this perspective was expanded to include other communal practices in which such mystical encounter with God (p 525) might take place: biblical reflection, worship, and dogmatic understanding all were held not only to point beyond themselves to deeper mysteries but also to open the believing community to the possibility of encounter with the living and hidden presence of God. Importantly, the mystical dimension of Christian life (“mysticism” per se is a term invented in modernity) operated within a fundamentally communal set of activities and referred above all to the hidden presence of God. The mystical dimension did not refer to unusual inner experiences of individuals or to a variety of psychological states among believers but to the reality of God always beyond the power of creaturely forms to express or conceive.

By the time of Maximus the Confessor (ca. 580–662), the process by which believers are fitted for some awareness of this hidden or mystical depth of God’s presence comes to be delineated according to stages of moral growth, deep perception of God’s handiwork in the world and in history, and finally a contemplation of the divine life itself (this develops into the stages of purgation, illumination, and union in many theories of the mystical life). The ultimate stage involves no achievement of the contemplative but is a gift of God allowing the contemplative to share intimately in God’s own knowing and loving. Not surprisingly, it became customary for later thinkers, attempting to direct others along the path of the spiritual life, to attempt some evocation of these stages, often in experiential terms that might give some sense of the unexpected and blessed quality of the contemplative dimension. Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153) famously remarked that unless his readers had some experience themselves of what he was explaining, they would never understand him. Sometimes—as in the case of many mystical writers of the later Middle Ages, often writing in the vernacular and outside the learned framework of the monastic or academic worlds—this experiential dimension would be emphasized to a quite high degree. It is this often startling language of such more-popular mystical texts that, in a post-Cartesian modern environment, has led to the mistaken impression that Christian mysticism was preeminently a kind of self-absorption with abnormal inner states.

But even so self-aware a mystical writer as Teresa of Avila (1515–82) constantly warns her readers against placing much emphasis on their spiritual experiences. In her view, what is solely significant is not the self but the transformation of the self into an obedient servant of God. It is this transformational element, intrinsic to any authentic encounter with God, which marks the heart of most mystical texts. For mystical writers as diverse as Bonaventure (ca. 1217–74), Ruusbroec (1293–1381), Julian of Norwich (ca. 1342–ca. 1416), or Catherine of Siena (1347–80), the commonly understood dynamism of the Christian mystical life is the transformation wrought through encounter with the Trinity. The gracious momentum of the trinitarian processions reaches into human existence in Christ and the Spirit, drawing humanity into a transfiguring share in God’s own life. Bonaventure, for example, specifically describes this process in terms of Jesus’ dying and rising, and identifies the mystical journey as an intensive participation in the paschal mystery.

Understood in this way, the mystical dimension of Christian life is clarified as in fact a way of living into the fullness of the baptismal life, in which believers are brought, through a share in Christ’s dying, into a share in his resurrection life (Rom. 6 and 8). The same Spirit who makes Christ alive in the vindicating joy of the Father also works this mystery within the heart of the believing community. What is important for the vast majority of Christian mystical writers is not the experiential “side effects” of this transformation, but the hidden presence of God, who graciously discloses the truth of the divine life precisely through the transformation of human life.

See also Spirituality/Spiritual Formation; Spiritual Sense

Bibliography

Some key primary sources: Bernard of Clairvaux. Sermons on the Song of Songs; Bonaventure. Journey of the Mind into God; Catherine of Siena. The Dialogue; Julian of Norwich. Revelations of Divine Love; Origen. Commentary on the Song of Songs; idem. Homilies on the Song of Songs; Maximus the Confessor. Centuries on Knowledge.

Mark A. McIntosh

(p 526) N

Nag Hammadi

In late 1945 just outside the village of Nag Hammadi (Egypt), a young man came across an earthenware jar containing thirteen leather-bound books. These books, dating from the mid-fourth century CE and fairly well preserved, proved to contain a large number of newly discovered texts. Although the codices—following an intriguing set of circumstances—were eventually made available to scholars for reconstruction and translation, it was not until 1977 that all fifty-two books of the Nag Hammadi library appeared in facsimile edition; the first complete English translation was also published in the same year. Given the relatively recent date of the collection’s publication, Nag Hammadi scholarship must still be regarded as being in its early stages. The literary and theological nature of these texts, their sociohistorical location, and their significance for the study of early Christianity and Gnosticism remain sub judice.

Perhaps the most striking feature of the Nag Hammadi library is the diversity of its contents. Some books are little more than translations of Greek philosophical literature; others, often involving elaborate mythologies, seem to derive from Hermetic (see, e.g., Discourse on the 8th and 9th; Prayer of Thanksgiving) or Sethian (Apocryphon of John; Hypostasis of the Archons) settings. By far the majority of texts appear to reflect a “gnosticized Christianity” (or “Christianized Gnosticism”) whereby traditional NT motifs and figures are reinterpreted so as to cohere with a certain sectarian worldview. The Nag Hammadi corpus also offers evidence for a purely Jewish Gnosticism. If the seemingly Jewish Apocalypse of Adam could be confidently dated to the first century CE, this would certainly constitute strong evidence for a pre-Christian Gnosticism. A first-century Sitz im Leben has been forcefully maintained for the core of Nag Hammadi’s most famous writing, the Gospel of Thomas. Drawing attention to putative comparisons between the sayings source Q and Gospel of Thomas, some (notably Koester and Robinson) have argued that the nature of the Jesus sayings and the relative absence of narrative in the Thomasine gospel indicate its early location in the formation of the canonical Gospels. But this is far from settled, for a renewed case for Gospel of Thomas’s second-century origins has also recently been made.

Although the Nag Hammadi find does little toward refining our concept of “Gnosticism” as a heuristic category (on the contrary, the broad array of perspectives contained in the corpus may persuade scholarship to dispense with the designation altogether), it remains the most important source for the study of early gnostic sects. Previously the vast majority of what could have been known about Gnosticism could only be culled from the early church fathers, who were of course its severest critics. Now we are in a position to hear the gnostic writers speak for themselves. Scholarship awaits further investigation into the sects’ relationship to mainstream Judaism and early Christianity, and their correspondingly different interpretative frameworks.

See also Gnosticism

Bibliography

Dart, J. The Jesus of Heresy and History. Harper & Row, 1988; Evans, C. A., R. Webb, and R. A. Wiebe, eds. Nag Hammadi Texts and the Bible. NTTS 18. Brill, 1993; Flory, W. The Gnostic Concept of Authority and the Nag Hammadi Documents. Mellen Biblical Press 33. Mellen Biblical Press, 1995; Hedrick, C., and R. Hodgson. Nag Hammadi, Gnosticism, and Early Christianity. Hendrickson, 1986; Pagels, E. The Gnostic Gospels. Random House, 1979; Perrin, N. Thomas and Tatian. Academia Biblica 5. Scholars Press/Brill, 2001; Robinson, J. M., ed. The Nag Hammadi Library in English. 3d ed. Harper & Row, 1988; Robinson, J. M., and H. Koester. Trajectories through Early Christianity. Fortress, 1971; Scholer, D. Nag Hammadi Bibliography, 1970–1994. NHS 32. Brill, 1997; Turner, J. D., and A. McGuire, eds. The Nag Hammadi Library after Fifty Years. NHS 44. Brill, 1997; Williams, M. A. Rethinking “Gnosticism.” Princeton University Press, 1996.

Nicholas Perrin

(p 527) Nahum, Book of

The book of Nahum is a “prophecy concerning Nineveh, the document of a revelation to Nahum the Elkoshite” (1:1 AT). The revelation concerns the downfall of Nineveh in 612 BCE. The prophetic exposition puts this downfall into a theological framework, focusing on the nature of God, especially his jealous anger and vengeance. Nahum depicts God as powerful and passionate but in a protective rather than possessive way.

The Argument of the Book

Following the superscription (1:1), a hymn describes Yahweh’s character and the different fates of two groups, depending on how they relate to Yahweh (1:2–8); to this is added a prophetic challenge (1:9–10) and a statement of the situation that gave rise to the prophecy (1:11). A divine declaration promising liberation from oppression and defeat of the enemy (1:12–14) forms a bridge to images of the fall of Nineveh (2:1–10), which are introduced by a picture of the announcement of victory (1:15). Appended to these images is a rhetorical question stressing defeat (2:11–12) and a prophecy of complete destruction (2:13). In chapter 3 an announcement of doom for a murderous city (3:1–4) precedes a prophecy of complete humiliation (3:5–7). The exposition denounces the city’s complacency (3:8–12) before depicting the uselessness of the city’s defenses (3:13–17) and the helplessness of the city’s ruler (3:18–19). Attempts to separate the message of restoration (for Judah) from the message of destruction (for Nineveh) go against the thrust of the book, which has them closely intertwined. Vengeance executed against the oppressor means liberation for the oppressed.

Addressee and reference of the text are frequently left undetermined (the ambiguity is removed in some translations by insertion of “Judah” and “Nineveh” in 1:7–2:1), suggesting that God’s “zealous ardour for the maintenance and promotion of his own legal claims” (Peels 203–4) applies without partiality. The real opposition is not between two nations, but between those who put their trust in a God who loathes injustice and those who are his enemies. The opening hymn ensures that Nineveh is seen as an illustration of God’s judgment against all human evil and injustice, an anticipation of God’s final triumph against his adversaries.

Nahum within the Canon

The condemnation of imperialism and injustice finds parallels elsewhere in Scripture, as in the judgment on Assyria in Isa. 10:5–15, on Edom in Isa. 34, on Babylon in Jer. 50–51, and on Tyre and Egypt in Ezek. 26–32. The theme is further developed in Rev. 17–18. Nahum makes the fullest link to God’s character. It has been argued that the allusion to Exod. 34:6–7 in Nah. 1 is part of a redaction of the Book of the Twelve (Nogalski; cf. Van Leeuwen). This may underestimate the number of links to the creedal language of Exod. 34:6–7 elsewhere in the OT, as well as the close relationship between Nahum and Isaiah, but it is helpful to reflect on the use of Exod. 34:6–7 in the Book of the Twelve. Appeal to God’s character functions in Joel 2:13–14 as a motivation for repentance. In Jon. 3:9–4:4, God’s compassion is the basis for a change of course regarding Nineveh, just as God is praised in Mic. 7:18 for his grace, which enables his people to be forgiven.

The book of Jonah—with its movement from divine anger to mercy, described with the root to which the name Nahum is related (nakhām, “relent”; Jon. 3:9–10; 4:2)—is often considered to have been written in response to Nahum, its message being interpreted as “an outright contradiction of Nahum’s prophecy” (Weigl 105). In traditional interpretation, it is commonly assumed that the repentance of the Ninevites was either superficial or short-lived. In any case, both within the Book of the Twelve and as far as the depiction of Nineveh’s history is concerned, Nahum speaks the final word on Nineveh. The book of Jonah is more about Israel’s vocation than the fate of Nineveh, especially so if the book was written after the demise of the Neo-Assyrian Empire. It reminds us that the judgment on Nineveh should not be reduced to the benefits it brings to Judah. The rhetorical question on which Nahum ends affirms God’s concern for other nations as much as the one that concludes Jonah.

The good news of victory of which Nahum speaks (1:15) is of course not limited to the downfall of the Assyrian Empire. Isaiah 52:7 indicates that the return from exile was another instance of God asserting his reign over evil. Supremely, God’s victory over evil was won on the cross so that Nah. 1:15 is again fulfilled in the proclamation of the gospel (cf. Rom. 10:15; Eph. 6:15).

Perspectives from the History of Interpretation

The section 1:14–2:1 was particularly popular in Christian interpretation. The traditional fourfold interpretation of the book is neatly summarized in an exposition (wrongly) attributed to Julian of Toledo: “The prophet Nahum is set in (p 528)the kingdom of the Assyrians. According to the historical sense, he speaks of the destruction of Nineveh, its capital; in the allegorical sense, of the world’s being laid waste; in the mystical sense, of the restoration of the human race through Christ; in the moral sense, of the restoring of his first dignified state, or to yet greater glory, of the sinner fallen into wickedness” (from Ball 212).

Modern historical-critical research has been concerned with distinguishing the words of the prophet from those of later editors, and with establishing the setting of the prophet. Particularly, denying Nahum’s authorship of the opening hymn would make the prophet’s message appear in a quite different light from that of the book. The view that Nahum was one of the false prophets condemned by Jeremiah (J. M. P. Smith) and the view that he was a cult prophet who wrote a liturgy for the celebration of the fall of Nineveh after the event (Humbert; Sellin) are no longer upheld in contemporary scholarship (see Childs; Weigl). Recently, Baumann has read the text as condoning sexual violence against women who are unduly self-confident. But Nineveh is not depicted as an ordinary prostitute making a living, let alone as a sexually liberated and self-confident woman. Rather, she is a source of ensnarement and thinks nothing of selling peoples for her pleasure. The picture of her paying out rather than receiving money (cf. Ezek. 16) distances the metaphor from “ordinary” prostitution and suggests that the text is not intended to be read as saying something about women.

Nahum and the Church Today

Nahum invites a celebration of divine sovereignty and justice, affirming that God’s retributive anger is good news. Traditional interpretation is certainly correct to claim that Nahum prefigures the final judgment that will end the cycle of violence: “Everything said to Nineveh is going to happen in the judgment on the devil and his associates” (Haimo of Auxerre, as quoted in Ball 214). This judgment is anticipated in historical events such as the demise of empires and the deconstruction of injustice, not least in the proclamation of the gospel, through which enemies of God become his children. Nahum at the same time expresses a challenge to trust and submit to God, and not to be counted among his adversaries.

Bibliography

Ball, E. “‘When the Towers Fall’: Interpreting Nahum as Christian Scripture.” Pages 211–30 in In Search of True Wisdom, ed. E. Ball. JSOTSup 300. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Baumann, G. “Das Buch Nahum: Der gerechte Gott als sexueller Gewalttäter.” Pages 347–53 in Kompendium feministische Bibelauslegung, ed. L. Schottroff and M. Wacker. Kaiser, 1998; Becking, B. “Passion, Power and Protection: Interpreting the God of Nahum.” Pages 1–20 in On Reading Prophetic Texts, ed. B. Becking and M. Dijkstra. Biblical Interpretation Series 18. Brill, 1996; Childs, B. Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture. Fortress, 1979; Nogalski, J. Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve. BZAW 218. De Gruyter, 1993; Peels, H. Vengeance of God. Brill, 1995; Van Leeuwen, R. “Scribal Wisdom and Theodicy in the Book of the Twelve.” Pages 31–49 in In Search of Wisdom, ed. L. Perdue et al. Westminster John Knox, 1993; Weigl, M. “Current Research on the Book of Nahum: Exegetical Methodologies in Turmoil?” CurBS 9 (2001): 81–130.

Thomas Renz

Narrative Criticism

Narrative is important to Christian theology because the revelation of Yahweh is entwined with the biblical metanarrative and its many subnarratives. There is a widespread recognition that the biblical storytellers were theologians—their tales are not just accounts of what happened but theological interpretations of what happened (Long). The study of biblical stories then cannot ignore theology. These narratives give content and nuance to the meaning of theological concepts such as “covenant,” “Messiah,” “atonement,” “love,” and “God.” For instance, John’s concept of “Messiah” cannot be understood simply by examining the cultural and linguistic background of the term. John radically reshapes the messianic concept through his story of the trial and crucifixion, presented as an enthronement ceremony with the cross as the “exaltation” of Jesus as King on his throne (Stibbe 105–13). John’s concept of “Messiah” has a narrative shape. Given the place of narratives in Christian theology, narrative criticism will be important in helping us to read them carefully and sensitively.

The Poetics of Biblical Narrative

Narrative criticism has played a key role in the welcome shift of biblical scholarship from the earlier, almost exclusive preoccupation with the sources (literary and oral) and historical events behind biblical stories to an interest in their final form. For Christians, whatever may be fruitfully said of the prehistory of biblical books, the finished texts we possess are the authoritative source for theological reflection (which is not to say that historicity is unimportant). Narrative (p 529) criticism has restored this (misleadingly named) “precritical” focus in academic scholarship.

Narrative criticism will help to clarify the theology of Genesis, Mark, or John, but it will not go far enough to create a biblical theology because the Bible as a whole is not a literary unity in the same sense that Genesis is (we cannot see it as having a single narrator’s voice, implied readership, etc.). So narrative criticism contributes to the task of a biblical theology but cannot do all the work required. It does, however, go far in helping us read biblical stories theologically.

Biblical studies, following general trends in literary studies, has seen narrative theories develop initially with a focus on the text and more recently with a focus on the reader. Defenders of the New Criticism, which originated in the United States in the 1920s and faded away after the 1960s, argued that it was a mistake to try to get behind a text to the sources or the author’s intentions. Instead, the text itself with its structure and form should be the object of interpretation and close reading. Although New Criticism itself has had little direct impact on biblical studies, it has indirectly stimulated fruitful work on the poetics of biblical narrative, sharing its focus on final form and close reading. Particularly worthy of mention are the works (in the 1980s) of Alter, Bar-Efrat, Berlin, and Sternberg. These Jewish scholars have shed considerable light on the grammar underlying the construction of OT narrative. Their work has clarified how dialogues work, the functions of repetition, the use of narrative time and space, the devices used in characterization and in structuring plots, the place of ambiguity, and so on. The art of the biblical storytellers has been revealed, and the exegetical payoff has been enormous.

Narrative criticism can help to identify the central themes of a work. This is so in single narratives and across vast sections of narrative. For instance, David Clines used early narrative-critical methods to identify the unifying theme of the whole Pentateuch: “The partial fulfilment—which implies also the partial non-fulfilment—of the promise to or blessing of the patriarchs” (Clines, Theme, 30). Literary devices, such as chiasms and repetition of key words, can help readers identify (the often theological) foci of the narrator. This guides readers away from majoring on minor issues and vice versa, helping interpreters to guard against the oversubjectivism of the “what it means to me” approach.

All the action and speech in a story are mediated via the narrator, and it is the narrator’s perspective on the characters and events that a narrative ultimately reveals (Sternberg). It is this narrator’s perspective that interpreters are, initially at least, seeking to uncover. A Christian theological interpretation may not end with exposition of a narrator’s perspectives but will not ignore it (Moberly). The biblical narrator is usually described as “omniscient.” There is no information in the world of the story to which they do not have access—even the inner thoughts of the characters (including God himself). Consequently, biblical narrators are “reliable”—they do not ever lie to readers although they often withhold information either temporarily or permanently for various reasons (see esp. Sternberg, ch. 7). Sternberg argues that the biblical narrators claim to speak with a prophetic-divine voice. This would sit comfortably with a traditional view of the inspiration of Scripture and would have theological implications for the use of narrative. However, it is controversial, and a traditional view of Scripture does not depend upon it.

Another benefit of attention to final form is that the locating of individual stories in wider narrative contexts allows tensions between parts to arise (e.g., on the appropriateness of a monarchy in 1 Samuel). The tensions are often deliberate and theologically significant (regardless of any source-critical explanations that may lie at hand). Sometimes a narrator may wish readers to take a certain stance on an issue and then will overturn it, subverting the readers’ judgments. Such strategies are lost when stories are read out of their literary contexts, and they become liable to misuse. Other times the tensions are ones that need preserving in our own theology, such as that running through the Deuteronomistic books between unconditionality and conditionality in Israel's covenant with God (McConville).

Narrative critics also highlight the importance of intertextual allusions in stories, allowing theological and ethical points to be made in subtle ways. Jesus' wilderness sojourn of forty days, by alluding to Israel's forty years, allows making the implicit theological point that Jesus represents Israel and succeeds where they have failed. The Solomon stories at the beginning of 1 Kings are far more critical of Solomon than is often realized once one sees the many allusions to Deuteronomy (Provan). Attention to intertextual allusions has shed considerable new theological light on well-known narratives.

Narrative criticism alerts us to the fact that the very narrative form itself, not simply the propositions that can be distilled from it, can communicate (p 530) theological points or reinforce the explicit theological content. Robert Alter draws attention to the use of "type scenes"—conventional ways in which scenes of certain types (e.g., betrothal scenes, deathbed scenes) were told (ch. 3). When a biblical narrator breaks with these storytelling conventions, the readers are intended to notice. For instance, the rape of Dinah in Gen. 34 could possibly be seen as a radically twisted telling of a betrothal type scene. The very distortion of the convention indicates the narrator's perspective. Gary Burge has argued that the narrator of John's Gospel employs different storytelling devices, such as withholding crucial information from the readers at key points, in order to tutor his readers in a theological matter: that revelation of Jesus is not accessible to the human mind unassisted by the Spirit of truth. John not only teaches this theology in his text, but also, his very storytelling techniques provide the reader with an experience parallel to that of the actors on stage, provoking them to come to grips with their own lack of understanding. Thus, John's rhetorical strategy reinforces his theology.

Structuralism

The above-mentioned accounts pay close attention to the surface structures of biblical stories. A different approach is embodied in structuralism, which in the field of literature manifested itself in the search to penetrate behind the details at the surface level of individual stories to uncover the so-called deep structures that they share with other stories. Influential in the literary field was the Russian folklorist Vladimir Propp (Morphology of the Folktale, in Russian, 1928). Propp argued that underlying all fairy tales was a simple structure like the grammar of a language that all fairy tales obeyed. There are, he wrote, only seven basic roles in fairy tales (villain, donor, helper, sought-for-person, his/her father, dispatcher, hero, false hero) and only thirty-one functions (actions a character can perform to further the plot). A. J. Greimas developed what has been the most influential kind of structuralism in biblical studies: the actantial approach (Sémantique structurale, 1966). Greimas sees six actants in narratives (subject, object, sender, receiver, opponent, helper) related along three axes (communication, power, and volition). The essence of narrative grammar is represented in the diagram below.

If we dig below the surface of stories, we have, along the axis of communication, a Sender who initiates an action that communicates a needed Object to a Receiver. The Sender gives a Subject the task of bringing the Object to the Receiver. The axis of volition focuses on the Subject's role in fulfilling this commission. The axis of power draws attention to the Opponent, who tries to thwart the Subject in the commission. A Helper provides power to fulfill the commission.

We can illustrate Greimas's relevance to biblical narratives with three brief examples, each of which illustrates a different benefit of the actantial model. First, the model can help in stripping away the details of a narrative to expose its basic structure, and this can be helpful in building up the theology of a text. Andrew Lincoln uses the actantial model to clarify the plot structure of John's Gospel (162–64). God the Father is the Sender, and the world (with Israel as its primary representative) is the Receiver. The Object God wishes to bring to the world is a trial that will issue in the judgment of either eternal life or condemnation. Jesus is the Subject sent to bring the world to trial. The Helpers are the other witnesses (e.g., John the Baptizer, God, Jesus' works, the Scriptures, the disciples, the beloved disciple, and the Holy Spirit). The Opponents are those who do not receive Jesus' witness (the world, the "Jews," Pilate) and the devil.

Second, the model can also help by highlighting when biblical stories take unusual twists that can have theological significance. Roland Barthes analyzed the story in Gen. 32, when Jacob wrestles a stranger. God is the Sender who sends the Subject, Jacob, on the quest of reconciliation with Esau (Object). The night wrestler is the Opponent, but quite unexpectedly, it is revealed that the Opponent is the Sender is the Helper! This rare twist exposed by Barthes is provocative and provides food for theological thought.

Third, the model can make visible the invisible elements in a story, and this can be theologically useful. David Clines ("Reading") shows how the lack of an explicit Sender in the book of Esther invites the reader to postulate one (God), and this feeds into an implicit theology of divine providence.

Fourth, the focus on binary opposition within plots (Subject-Object, Sender-Receiver, Helper-Opponent) can be helpful in understanding the (p 531)importance of “contradictions” within the dynamics of a literary work. The theological power of some biblical stories may come from the negotiation of themes in tension. Removing the “contradictions” may remove the message. Although structuralism as a comprehensive theory went into decline after the 1970s, it is still useful as a heuristic tool.

The Place of the Reader

Clearly, readers are free to resist the message of a text, but there is considerable disagreement about how much freedom readers have in the actual constitution of the meaning of a text. Some argue that texts have no meanings apart from the reading process, and that there are as many “meanings” in a text as there are readers. Others think that the role of the reader in constituting the meaning is fairly minimal. Sternberg pays considerable attention to the role of the reader and argues that narrators often leave gaps in their stories that readers need to fill in if they are to make sense of the story. The skill of the biblical narrator is such that, however the responsible reader fills these gaps, the same verdict on the characters will be produced. Thus, responsible readers can underread or overread a biblical story, but they cannot misread one (he calls this “foolproof composition”). This is a bold thesis, and it has been criticized by many other narrative critics who feel that readers have more scope for interpretation than Sternberg suggests (e.g., Fewell and Gunn).

Christian theological readers of stories have taken different stances on this issue. All recognize the importance of the reader, but some are inclined to give a greater role to readers in creating meaning through their interaction with stories (e.g., Fowl; Robert Wall) than others are (e.g., Kevin Vanhoozer). Biblical interpretation needs to navigate between “the Scylla of mechanical replication and the Charybdis of radical polyvalence and unconstrained textual indeterminacy” (Lundin, Walhout, and Thiselton 137). The work of narrative critics can guide readers in this voyage, enabling theological interpretations of biblical narratives to be grounded in close, sensitive readings of those texts.

See also Biblical Theology; Intention/Intentional Fallacy; Intertextuality; Literary Criticism; Metanarrative; Oral Tradition and the NT; Oral Tradition and the OT; Proposition; Reader-Response Criticism; Rhetorical Criticism; Scripture, Authority of; Source Criticism; Structuralism; Text/Textuality

Bibliography

Alter, R. The Art of Biblical Narrative. Allen & Unwin, 1981; Bar-Efrat, S.

Narrative Art in the Bible. Sheffield Academic Press, 1989; Barthes, R. "The Struggle with the Angel: Textual Analysis of Genesis 32:23–33." Pages 21–33 in Structural Analysis and Biblical Exegesis, ed. R. Barthes et al. Pickwick, 1974; Berlin, A. Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative. Almond, 1983; Burge, G. "Revelation and Discipleship in St John's Gospel." Unpublished paper presented at Tyndale NT Group, 2002; Clines, D. J. A. The Theme of the Pentateuch. 2d ed. Sheffield Academic Press, 1997; idem. "Reading Esther from 'Left to Right': Contemporary Strategies for Reading a Biblical Text." Pages 31–52 in The Bible in Three Dimensions, ed. D. J. A. Clines, S. Fowl, and S. E. Porter. Sheffield Academic Press, 1990; Fewell, D. N., and D. M. Gunn. Narrative in the Hebrew Bible. Oxford University Press, 1993; Fowl, S. "The Role of Authorial Intention in the Theological Interpretation of Scripture." Pages 71–87 in Between Two Horizons, ed. J. Green and M. Turner. Eerdmans, 2000; Lincoln, A. Truth on Trial. Hendrickson, 2000; Long, V. P. The Art of Biblical History. Zondervan, 1994; Longman, T., III. Literary Approaches to Biblical Interpretation. Zondervan, 1987; Lundin, R., C. Walhout, and A. Thiselton. The Promise of Hermeneutics. Eerdmans, 1999; McConville, J. G. Grace in the End. Zondervan, 1993; Moberly, R. W. L. "Christ as the Key to Scripture: Genesis 22 Reconsidered." Pages 143–73 in He Swore an Oath, ed. R. Hess, G. Wenham, and P. Satterthwaite. Baker, 1994; Provan, I. 1 and 2 Kings. NIBCOT. Hendrickson, 1995; Sternberg, M. The Poetics of Biblical Narrative. Indiana University Press, 1987; Stibbe, M. John as Storyteller. Cambridge University Press, 1992; Vanhoozer K. "The Reader in New Testament Interpretation." Pages 301–28 in Hearing the New Testament, ed. J. Green. Eerdmans, 1995; Wall R. "Reading the Bible from within Our Traditions." Pages 88–107 in Between Two Horizons, eds. J. Green and M. Turner. Eerdmans, 2000.

Robin Parry

Narrative Theology

"Narrative theology" refers to a constellation of approaches to the theological task typically joined by their (1) antipathy toward forms of theology concerned with the systematic organization of propositions and grounded in ahistorical principles, and (2) attempt to discern an overall aim and ongoing plot in the ways of God as these are revealed in Scripture and continue to express themselves in history.

A primary impetus for narrative theology comes from Scripture itself. This is true, first, in that the bulk of Scripture comes to us in the form of narratives. Although in the modern period theology has gravitated toward the rational essence of the faith, its dogmatic essentials, scriptural reflections on God's nature, have an altogether different flavor. Rather than enumerating the immutable attributes (p 532) of God, in the Bible "God's person emerges in a series of contexts. God is a creator, then a destroyer. God relates to a family in the concerns of its ongoing family life, such as the finding of a home, the birth of children, and the arranging of marriages; God then relates to a nation in the different demands of its life, which includes God's becoming a war-maker." That is, "the 'revelation' of God's person is inextricably tied to the events in which God becomes different things, in a way that any person does; it is thus inextricably tied to narrative" (Goldingay 131).

Second, in biblical texts we find the deliberate work of forming God's people by shaping their story. Israel's first "credo" took the form of a narrative: "A wandering Aramean was my father ..." (Deut. 26:5–10 RSV). The speeches in Acts interpretatively render the history of Israel so as to demonstrate the advent of Jesus as its culmination (e.g., Acts 7:2–53; 13:16–41). And John's Revelation portrays the whole of history from creation to new creation so as to transform the theological imagination of its readers.

Third, the particular narratives related in the biblical books, together with the nonnarrative portions of Scripture, participate in a more extensive, overarching narrative, or metanarrative. This is the story of God's purpose coming to fruition in the whole of God's history with us, from the creation of the world and humanity's falling away from God, through God's repeated attempts to restore his people, culminating in the coming of Jesus of Nazareth and reaching its full crescendo in the final revelation of Christ and the new creation. In an important sense, the Bible is nothing less than the record of the actualization (and ongoing promise) of this purpose of God in the history of the cosmos.

The importance of narrative theology is underscored by the recognition that narrative is central to identity formation; indeed, recent work in neurobiology emphasizes the capacity for and drive toward making storied sense of our experienced world as a distinguishing characteristic of the human family. We typically explain our behaviors through the historical narratives by which we collaborate to create a sense of ourselves as persons and as a people. The story we embrace serves as an interpretative scheme that is at once conceptual (a way of seeing things), conative (a set of beliefs and values to which a group and its members are deeply attached), and action-guiding (we seek to live according to its terms; cf. Flanagan 27–55).

In recent times, narrative theology is especially associated with the name of George Lindbeck (building on the thought of Hans Frei), for whom faith is a culture that shapes our individuality, experience, and emotions. Religion, he argues, is not primarily a collection of true propositions or a deeply personal experience of the transcendent, but a language or culture that enables us to characterize the truth and empowers us to experience the Holy. Being Christian therefore involves learning the story of Israel and of Jesus so as to interpret and experience the world on its terms. Hence, the Scriptures are essential in shaping the life-world of God's people. For Lindbeck, the Scriptures are a "world" that supplies the interpretative framework within which believers seek to live their lives and understand reality. The central stories of Scripture tell us who we are as we make the story of the Bible our own. Along similar lines, Gabriel Fackre discusses narrative theology as the linkage of the Christian story to the believer's story through biblical stories. "It is the Christian faith lived at the juncture of personal, ecclesial, and biblical narrative" (194).

Narrative theology has been criticized at various points, three of which invite brief reflection. (1) Some are concerned about Lindbeck's indifference to the historicity of the biblical story, whether externally referential events comprise the biblical narrative. This, of course, is not a problem solely for Lindbeck or biblical narrative in particular, but has been endemic to discourse on the narrative representation of historical events more generally in the last half of the twentieth century (e.g., White). Whether fictional or historical, what mattered most seemed to be the "meaning" provided within and by narrative. More recent work in the philosophy of history has urged that "narrative" need not be so much creation of significance through the imposition of interpretative frameworks, but rather the recognition of thematic and causal ties among events in the real world (cf. Carter). (2) Others are concerned with the ambiguity of the phrase, "to inhabit a narrative," so central to narrative theology's interest in theological embodiment and performance. This problem has been thoughtfully parsed by Nicholas Wolterstorff, who concludes that the notion of "inhabiting the world of the biblical narrative" is important when it claims that "the story that most decisively shapes our lives must be the biblical story" (212).

(3) Still others concern themselves with whether or how a particular narrative can be identified as "the" biblical or "the" Christian narrative. "Inhabiting (p 533)the story" would take on a haunting tone if, for example, the defining story were the direful conquest accounts of Joshua. Taken together, three considerations mitigate this issue. First, since Aristotle, descriptions of the "narrative cycle" have drawn attention to the importance of the narrative's beginning, middle, and end, three "moments" that determine the plot and structure of a narrative by identifying the narrative "need" that must be addressed and resolved. Second, narrative studies distinguish between "satellites" and "kernels"—a logic of hierarchy among narrative events, evaluated according to whether they play a crucial role in the direction the narrative takes, with “kernels” the more pivotal (e.g., Chatman). The question, then, is how one parses the “beginning,” “middle,” and “end” of the biblical narrative, and so identifies certain events over others as cruxes in the development of the narrative. Although certain constraints are unavoidable (since, by any reckoning, creation and new creation serve as the “beginning” and “end”), it is nonetheless possible to read the biblical narrative in a variety of ways. That not all of these ways would be “Christian” is evident from the intramural disputes among the Jewish people in the first century, leading eventually to the partings of the ways between Jews and Christians; and within the Christian movement, with some groups regarded as heretical even though they based their positions in thoughtful reading of authoritative Scripture. Third, then, the hermeneutical key for a Christian reading of the Scriptures is twofold: its recognition that what holds the two Testaments together is the one aim of God, and its recognition that the character of God (and thus the nature of God’s story) is paradigmatically manifest in Israel’s release from bondage in Egypt and decisively revealed in Jesus of Nazareth. Accordingly, the Rule of Faith and subsequent creeds of Christian orthodoxy served historically and continue to serve as theological boundary markers for Christian identity, setting the horizons within which the Bible may be read specifically as Christian Scripture (cf. Green; Wall).

One final insight from the study of narrative is crucial: narratives move forward in the service of a central aim, in relation to which all else is oriented. From this perspective, the Bible is not first and foremost “about” humanity, or even about a particular, identifiable segment of humanity, Israel. Nor is the Bible a christological book, in the narrow sense. Rather, its plot is theologically determined. Scripture’s subject and focus is God, enfleshed in Jesus Christ, active powerfully and formatively through word and Spirit. Yahweh’s purpose thus determines the shape of this narrative and call upon its readers to choose sides. Hence, engaging with this narrative involves us in a formative and decision-making process. How does this aim beckon us? How will we respond? In this important sense, “narrative theology” is less theological method and more an intrinsically self-involving theological vision of God, church, Scripture, and world, bound together within the economy of salvation, with the people of God cast as pilgrims on a journey whose destination is known and achieved only by indwelling the divine story—which cannot be reduced to principles and rules, but must be embraced and embodied.

See also Narrative Criticism; Ricoeur, Paul; Rule of Faith; Salvation, History of; Yale School

Bibliography

Carter, J. "Telling Times: History, Emplotment, and Truth." History and Theory 42 (2003): 1–27; Chatman, S. Story and Discourse. Cornell University Press, 1978; Fackre, G. "Narrative Theology from an Evangelical Perspective." Pages 188–201 in Faith and Narrative, ed. K. Yandell. Oxford University Press, 2001; Flanagan, O. The Problem of the Soul. Basic, 2002; Goldingay, J. "Biblical Narrative and Systematic Theology." Pages 123–42 in Between Two Horizons, ed. J. Green and M. Turner. Eerdmans, 2000; Green, G. Theology, Hermeneutics, and Imagination. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Green, J. "Scripture and Theology: Failed Experiments, Fresh Perspectives." Int 56 (2002): 5–20; Hauerwas, S., and L. G. Jones, eds. Why Narrative? Eerdmans, 1989; Lindbeck, G. The Nature of Doctrine. Westminster John Knox, 1984; Wall, R. "Reading the Bible from within Our Traditions: The 'Rule of Faith' in Theological Hermeneutics." Pages 88–107 in Between Two Horizons, ed. J. Green and M. Turner. Eerdmans, 2000; White, H. The Content of the Form. Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987; Wolterstorff, N. "Living within a Text." Pages 202–13 in Faith and Narrative, ed. K. Yandell. Oxford University Press, 2001; Yandell, K., ed. Faith and Narrative. Oxford University Press, 2001.

Joel B. Green

Nature      See Earth/Land; Grace; Worldview

Nehemiah, Book of

The book of Nehemiah was originally a continuation of the book of Ezra, with which it is linked both thematically and narratively (see further under "Ezra"). There is little justification for separating the two books apart from the fact that Neh. 1:1 begins a first-person narrative by Nehemiah, who has not previously received mention (the Nehemiah of Ezra 2:2 is a different character). The twelve-year gap between the last events of (p 534)Ezra 7–10 and Neh. 1:1 is not sufficient to warrant the break, since a much longer period separates Ezra 7–10 from Ezra 1–6. The separation into two books has done much to hinder a theological interpretation of the whole.

History of Interpretation* (see also "Ezra")

A good deal of precritical Christian interpretation focused on the personal qualities of Nehemiah: his humility, his devotion to God's suffering people in spite of his privileged position at the Persian court, and his ability to combine dependence on God with practical forethought. His success at rebuilding Jerusalem was sometimes seen as an example of how to revive the church while being prepared at all times for opposition.

More recently, theological interpretation has tended to be submerged beneath historical-critical issues. As Childs reports, many have approached Ezra-Nehemiah “with the assumption that its proper interpretation depends on establishing an accurate historical sequence of events” (630). To this end, a good deal of debate has centered on the chronological relationship between Nehemiah and Ezra. Many scholars have perceived difficulties with the traditional order of their arrival in Jerusalem, and have amended and reordered the text accordingly. In fact, other approaches to the perceived problems are available, making such drastic solutions unnecessary (Kidner 146–58; Williamson, Ezra, 55–69).

Much scholarly contention has surrounded the identity of the law book whose legislation is enacted in Ezra-Nehemiah. Since Ezra was “a scribe skilled in the law of Moses” (Ezra 7:6 NRSV), it is logical to assume that the legislation he set out to teach was contained in “the Book of Moses” referred to in Ezra 6:18 and (with slight variations) in Neh. 8:1, 14; 10:29; and 13:1. The traditional view is that this book was the Pentateuch, but some source critics have doubted whether the complete Pentateuch could have existed as early as the fifth century BCE. Even if the antiquity of the Pentateuch is accepted, questions remain. Some of the legislation enacted in Ezra-Nehemiah seems to have no exact counterpart in the Pentateuch, and this has led Houtman to argue that it was based on a different work, which has not survived. This conclusion would have obvious implications for Ezra-Nehemiah’s connection with other parts of the canon. However, it is possible to argue that the application of pentateuchal laws must have undergone development, to adapt them to changed circumstances (Williamson, Ezra, 90–98). If this is accepted, there is no good reason to doubt that the Pentateuch was the book that the postexilic community recognized as authoritative.

A refreshing attempt to read Ezra-Nehemiah as a literary whole is that of Eskenazi. She identifies a tripartite story structure: “potentiality” (Ezra 1:1–4, in which the objective is defined), “process of actualisation” (Ezra 1:5–Neh. 7:73), and “success” (Neh. 8:1–13:31, in which the objective is realized). The main theme is identified as “how the people of God build the house of God in accordance with authoritative documents.” Eskenazi goes on to argue that the concept of the “house of God” expands to include the community (175–76)—a suggestive but contentious reading of the text.

A recent interdisciplinary reading of the book of Nehemiah (Tollefson and Williamson) has also contributed to an understanding of the book as a whole. The authors apply a model of cultural revitalization formulated by anthropologist A. F. C. Wallace in the 1950s, thereby finding that the sequence of events in the book of Nehemiah corresponds closely to the six phases described by the model. This explains better than most previous attempts how the various sections of the book cohere, and it removes the ground for suspicion that the present text has suffered serious dislocation. For example, the sequence of events in Neh. 8–10 corresponds well to the “Cultural Transformation Phase” of Wallace’s model, and occurs exactly at the point predicted by the model. There thus is no reason to reposition these chapters, as many have suggested. On the other hand, the authors do not claim that the compiler of Ezra-Nehemiah recorded everything exactly as it happened. “Although the compiler may have altered the chronological order of certain specific events, his presentation may yet portray the social process taken as a whole more faithfully than any one of the sources at his disposal in isolation” (Tollefson and Williamson 65).

A recent study by Oded Lipschits, although focusing on Neh. 11, is also fruitful for theological interpretation of the book as a whole. Lipschits sees this chapter as a major climax, full of allusions to other parts of Ezra-Nehemiah, in which Jerusalem’s past glory foreshadows a utopian future.

Canonical Context

The book of Nehemiah not only concludes the narrative begun in the book of Ezra; it also contains the latest events to be found in the historical books of the OT (assuming that Esther’s \(p 535\)King Ahasuerus = Xerxes and not Artaxerxes I). In the Jewish arrangement of the OT books, Ezra-Nehemiah is usually followed by Chronicles, which concludes the canon. This is surprising in view of the fact that thematically (leaving aside matters of authorship), Ezra-Nehemiah is the sequel to Chronicles. Chronicles may have been placed last because it effectively reviews the whole sweep of OT history, from Adam to the return from exile.

Nehemiah provides an ambivalent conclusion to the OT’s historical narratives. On the one hand, Jerusalem has been furnished with a new wall, the population of the city has increased, and various reforms have been instituted to deal with religious and social problems. In view of these successes, the triumphant tone of chapters 8–12 seems entirely appropriate. On the other hand, the final chapter reminds us how easy it is for abuses and failures to recur, even after the most solemn act of dedication. Furthermore, the political context is viewed negatively: although God’s people are back in the land God promised to their ancestors, they are “slaves” there. The land’s rich yield, instead of being theirs to enjoy, “goes to the kings whom you have set over us because of our sins; they have power also over our bodies and over our livestock at their pleasure, and we are in great distress” (9:36–37 NRSV; cf. Ezra 9:8–9).

In short, many elements that characterized the Babylonian exile (the people’s sin, alienation from the land, and oppression by foreign rulers) are shown to be still continuing. This sense of ongoing “exile” also features in the intertestamental literature (e.g., Bar. 2:7–10; 2 Macc. 1:10–2:18), and many aspects of Jesus’ message are best understood against this background (Wright 268–72; Evans). In this sense the book of Nehemiah points us forward, as surely as any prophetic book, to God’s act of redemption in the NT.

Theology

To discern its theological message, it is important to read Nehemiah not merely as a literary whole but also as a continuation of the book of Ezra. To this end Williamson has helpfully discerned “the overall theological shape” of Ezra-Nehemiah (Ezra). He divides the work into five “chapters,” of which the book of Nehemiah comprises the last three: Ezra 1–6 has as its focus the rebuilding of the temple in the face of opposition. Ezra 7–10 moves on to a second stage of the restoration project, the definition of the community in accordance with “the law of your God and the law of the king” (7:26). Nehemiah 1–7 echoes these earlier stages, beginning with God at work through another Persian king (cf. Ezra 1:1; 7:27) and moving on to the completion of Jerusalem’s walls, again in the face of opposition. Then Neh. 8–12 brings us to what Williamson calls “the suspended climax” of the earlier achievements, culminating in a united celebration of the work of both Ezra and Nehemiah. However, Neh. 13, by illustrating subsequent setbacks, ends the work on a note of “now and not yet.” Williamson concludes: “The narrative structure of the book as a whole thus points to past achievements as a model for future aspiration” (Williamson, “Nehemiah,” 981).

The theological perspective of Ezra-Nehemiah explains why chronological concerns take a backseat. This is evident in the compiler’s preference for a thematic rather than a chronological ordering of material in Ezra 1–6, and the fact that he can leap almost six decades with the words “after these things” in Ezra 7:1. A twelve-year gap between the events of Ezra 10 and Nehemiah’s receipt of news from Jerusalem (Neh. 1:1; 2:1) is passed over in silence. The events of Neh. 1–12 occur within less than a year, and nothing is said of the remaining eleven years of Nehemiah’s first term as governor (13:6). Apart from a vague “after some time” (NRSV), no date is given for the events of his second term in 13:6–31. This is frustrating for the historian, but has its own significance for a theological reading. “Historically time-bound events are becoming detached from their chronological moorings in order to be viewed rather as divinely related steps in what may properly be regarded as a history of salvation” (Williamson, Ezra, 81).

Bibliography

Childs, B. Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture. SCM, 1979; Eskenazi, T. In an Age of Prose. SBLMS 36. Scholars Press, 1988; Evans, C. A. “Jesus and the Continuing Exile of Israel.” Pages 77–100 in Jesus and the Restoration of Israel, ed. C. Newman. InterVarsity, 1999; Houtman, C. “Ezra and the Law.” Pages 91–115 in Remembering All the Way, by B. Albrektson et al. Brill, 1981; Kidner, D. Ezra and Nehemiah. TOTC. InterVarsity, 1979; Lipschits, O. “Literary and Ideological Aspects of Nehemiah 11.” JBL 121 (2002): 423–40; Tollefson, K., and H. G. M. Williamson. “Nehemiah as Cultural Revitalization: An Anthropological Perspective.” JSOT 56 (1992): 41–68; Williamson, H. G. M. Ezra and Nehemiah. OTG. JSOT, 1987; idem. “Nehemiah: Theology of.” NIDOTTE 4:977–82; Wright, N. T. The New Testament and the People of God. SPCK, 1992.

John J. Bimson

(p 536)New Creation

“But a new creation is everything!” (Gal. 6:15b NRSV)

Paul’s exclamation indicates that we can hardly overemphasize the importance of “new creation.” It was established in the Son’s incarnation, human life, death, resurrection, and ascension. By it Christians are presently given new eyes through which to interpret the world: “If anyone is in Christ, behold—new creation!” (2 Cor. 5:17 AT). It is the hope to which we are called—a new heavens and new earth.

The new creation is implied in the gospel story about Jesus—that new human being who retraced the road of humanity, but this time in a new mode, without sin and so as to conquer death. So Luke introduces Jesus as “son of Adam, son of God” (3:38) and then proceeds to show his triumph over the tempter. The climax of the Fourth Gospel presents Jesus as “breathing” upon the apostles after the pattern of the creating God who breathed upon the Edenic couple; now they receive the Spirit, and not simply the gift of life. For explicit teaching, however, we look to the Prophets, Epistles, and Revelation.

Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel crescendo toward the new creation from the context of the plight of God’s people. Isaiah 40–66 envisions the “regathering” of the chosen people whom the Lord “created” (43:1–7), and their new state of blessing. In the final chapter, God’s people emerge through a “new birth” as a joyful nation, nurtured in the holy city, whose population is swelled by foreigners (66:18–21). There will be “a new heavens and a new earth” in which “all flesh” will continually worship God. Jeremiah’s vision is less sweeping, but every bit as profound. This prophet glimpses a time when “they shall be radiant over the goodness of the LORD” (31:12 NRSV), when a new covenant will be forged (31:31–34), and when God will create “a new thing” (31:22). Ezekiel pictures the new creation in terms of purity: the people are regathered under the true divine Shepherd (34:1–31), renewed by washing and the gift of a new heart (36:16–37), brought back to life “out of the grave,” “inbreathed” by God’s Spirit (37:1–28), and placed within an immense temple-garden filled with the divine glory (43:1–47:23).

This new creation is thus portrayed as the prerogative of God’s chosen, as a hope to those who suffer at the hands of Gentile superpowers, who long for an end to exile. However, the prophetic vision of the new creation cannot be contained; it overreaches itself beyond the boundaries of Israel: the glory and life-giving power of the LORD will shine upon the “aliens” (e.g., Ezek. 47:22). Thus, Ezekiel’s two rivers join to form a huge freshwater sea, adorned with trees supplying “leaves for healing” (47:12), and Isaiah’s Zion envisages a remade cosmos. Jeremiah, though not aware of the extent of the re-creation, knows of its depths: God intends to place his will within his people, so they will innately know his plans for this world.

Thus, the prophets paved the way for the re-creation that was to burst upon the world in Jesus. Paul speaks about the “new creation” as a reality made possible because of the New Man, and as a future hope, with Rom. 8 highlighting the latter. Some have followed Augustine (“Question 67”), who saw Rom. 8:18–25 as limited simply to the hope of the redeemed human “creature” (ktisis). It is better, however, to follow John Chrysostom (Hom. Rom. 14), who shows that ktisis is the “creation”—the created order. In 8:19 the personified creation is pictured as “frustrated” because of the fall (v. 20) but hopeful of deliverance (v. 21). Just as humankind’s shame has enslaved creation, so will humankind’s “apocalypsed” glory bring release. Sufferings are actually the “birth pangs” that herald the new creation (see also Mark 13:8; 1 Thess. 5:3; 1 En. 62:4). In particular, God’s suffering people play a role, for they are inhabited by the Spirit groaning alongside them as a kind of midwife (Rom. 8:23). Through our prayers, energized by the Holy Spirit, God will bring about a new birth of the whole of creation: all that he has made “will obtain the freedom of the glory of the children of God” (8:20 NRSV). Thus, the salvation that has come to our world in Jesus now through the Spirit is directed from the inside out. We “boast in our hope of sharing the glory of God” (Rom. 5:2), knowing that this will affect the entire creation!

Paul, then, is world-affirming, not world-denying. But does his view of renewal imply universalism in the contemporary sense of the word? Paul frequently uses the term “all” or “world” when speaking about the extent of salvation (e.g., Rom. 11:15; Col. 1:20). Certainly the scope of God’s action in Jesus involves the whole of the created order. However, Rom. 1:18–2:16; 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10; 2 Thess. 1:5–10 and other texts remind us of the judgment to come, just as texts such as 2 Cor. 5:17; Rom. 3:21–31; and Col. 2:9–12 remind us that reconciliation comes by way of faith and baptism, though on the basis of what Jesus has done. The Scriptures simply do not reconcile the universal scope of God’s salvation with God’s demand (p 537) for human response. Salvation cannot be automatic, since it includes a change in relationship; yet God is sovereign. Does the NT leave the issue deliberately “uncashed” for the sake of our salvation? Judgment must not be denied, or this would cut the nerve of the gospel and undermine the character of God’s faithfulness, righteousness, and integrity. Yet the hope for the reconciliation of all remains vivid, for the sovereign God’s purposes cannot be thwarted.

We move on to consider the character of the new creation offered to us in the NT—in some ways entirely new and in other ways in continuity with the best that we know. We look for “what no ... human heart [has] conceived, what God has prepared for those who love him” (1 Cor. 2:9); yet there is some connection with this world, since God himself has entered our physical world in the incarnation, renewed it in the resurrection, and glorified it by the ascension. Our understanding of the new creation must be informed by a thorough understanding of the incarnation, by which God the Son assumed humanity, body and all, not simply to redeem, but also to heal and glorify. So Paul recognizes that corruptible “flesh and blood” cannot inherit; yet he looks not to be disembodied, but to be “re clothed” more gloriously (2 Cor. 5:1–5). We expect neither resuscitation into the same fallible bodies that we now possess, nor a spiritualized existence that is void of the joy of the senses. When that time comes, we will have bodies vivified by the very Spirit of God (sōma pneumatikon, “en-Spirited bodies”) rather than simply by the breath of life (sō ma psychikon, “animated bodies,” 1 Cor. 15:44).

This is the wonder of the biblical story—that its victory must not be graphed as a “V” but as a check mark! Some still yearn for a return to Eden. The shape of the biblical narrative is otherwise: although the human couple begins in paradise, the final scene is that of an enfoliated, fruitful city, inhabited by a multitude (Rev. 21–22). Despite its condemnation of Babylon, the Apocalypse does not bring its seer or its reader back to an unretouched Eden. The full answer to godless society is not a razing of that city, but a new city, the new Jerusalem, that includes “the glory ... of the nations” (21:24 NRSV), while it excludes anything “unclean” (21:27 NRSV). Yet by the twelfefold fruits of the tree of life, there shall be “healing [and here John is more explicit than Ezekiel!] of the nations” (22:2).

In the end, God’s creation will itself mirror his unity and plurality: the final created order is seen in all fullness and fecundity as united in common life and worship (22:1–3). Human culture is bound for transformation so as to share in the glory of God himself; all that we call nature is no mere backdrop for our lives, but a reality of which we are, and will remain, a part. We will not become disembodied spirits, but will retain that link with the material world that God has declared to be “good”—though there will be more substance and glory than we can now imagine.

So we see that our God, who creates ex nihilo and who resurrects, intends to redeem his world. A firm grasp on the new creation will instruct us not to disparage the body, not to leash the Spirit of God, and not to despise the world that God has created. Instead, with new eyes we learn to see the beauty and final end of all God has made. Ecology is given a strong basis, healing is naturalized as part of God’s purpose, and salvation is recognized as having an immensely broad scope. Thus, we learn to be grateful not simply for our rescue from sin, but for the shining hope of a new creation: everything around us becomes the gift and sign of God’s promise. As Alexander Schmemmann puts it, “The world ... becomes an epiphany of God, a means of His revelation, presence and power.... We need water and oil, bread and wine, in order to be in communion with God and to know him.... There is no worship without the participation of the [human] body ... because the Holy Spirit ‘makes all things new’ ” (120–22).

See also Creation; Last Things, Doctrine of

Bibliography

Augustine. “Question 67.” Pages 149–57 in Eighty-Three Different Questions, trans. D. Mosher. Fathers of the Church 70. Catholic University of America Press, 1982; Chrysostom, J. “Homily XIV on Romans.” NPNF1 11:439–52; Schmemmann, A. For the Life of the World. St. Vladimir’s Seminary Press, 1973.

Edith M. Humphrey

New Criticism      See Formalism; Literary Criticism

New Hermeneutic See Hermeneutics; Literary Criticism;
Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

New Perspective on Paul See Justification by Faith; Pauline Epistles

Noncanonical Writings See Apocrypha; Canon;
Pseudepigrapha

(p 538)Numbers, Book of

According to Jewish and Christian tradition, Numbers is the fourth book of Moses, relating the history of Israel's desert journey from Mt. Sinai to the dawn of the conquest, a chronological span stretching from the second to the fortieth year after the exodus. Parsed geographically, the book begins with Israel's stay at Sinai (1:1–10:10), chronicles its travels from Sinai to the plains of Moab (10:11–22:1), and then narrates a series of events in Moab (22:2–36:13). The book is known by two Hebrew titles, Khomesh happequddim ("the fifth of the census totals") and the more common Bamidbar ("in the wilderness" 1:1 [MT/NRSV]). The first title, from the Talmud, corresponds to the Greek and Latin names (Arithmoi and Numeri), from which comes "Numbers." But both Hebrew titles reflect an important feature in the book: the story's setting in the wilderness (hence, Bamidbar) and the two censuses that frame the narrative in Num. 1 and 26 (hence, Khomesh happequddim).

A Survey of the Book

The book of Numbers is organized around a story that begins with one generation of Israelites (the "exodus generation") and ends with the next (the "conquest generation"). At issue for both generations is their willingness to undertake military operations against stronger, better-equipped forces living in the land that Yahweh has promised Israel. The first generation undertakes a military census in preparation for this engagement and even travels to Kadesh Barnea, a good staging point for the attack. However, after a gloomy reconnaissance report from twelve scouts sent into the land, the Israelites elect not to invade. As a result, God forbids that generation of Israelites from entering the land and condemns them to death in the wilderness. After forty years of nomadic life, during which these Israelites continually make trouble for Moses and thanklessly murmur against God, the last remnants of the exodus generation are destroyed after committing idolatry at Peor in Moab (Num. 25). This final act of disloyalty occasions no surprise since it follows their earlier idolatries at Mt. Sinai (see Exod. 32).

The next generation of Israelites, the conquest generation, immediately took another military census (Num. 26) and made preparations for an invasion of the land, which includes their initial successful military operations in Transjordan. At the same time, Joshua is appointed to succeed Moses as Israel's leader because of Moses' impiety at Kadesh Barnea (cf. Num. 20, 27). So, Numbers concludes with Israel on the plains of Moab in Transjordan, poised to enter the land under Joshua's leadership.

Numbers in Canonical Context

Because Numbers is only one chapter in the biblical story of Israel, its theological import cannot be properly appraised apart from its narrative context in the "Primary History," which runs from the book of Genesis through 2 Kings. This story has two beginnings, one that focuses on the estrangement between God and humanity (Gen. 1–11), and a second that introduces Yahweh's redemptive plan for humanity through his covenant with Abraham. Because Abraham was a man of faith in word and deed, he received a divine promise of land, progeny, and blessing, blessings that would extend not only to his own children but also to all nations (Gen. 12, 15, 17). The remainder of the Primary History highlights the sometimes happy and sometimes stormy relationship between God and Abraham's children, focused through Yahweh's additional covenants with Israel at Sinai (the Mosaic covenant in Exodus) and with Israel's king, David (2 Sam. 7). The people and their kings eventually broke these covenants, receiving in return the double punishment of exile in Babylon and the destruction of Jerusalem and its temple (2 Kings 25).

If the Primary History is a story of the "ups and downs" in Israel's capricious faith, then the books of Exodus and Numbers vividly portray one of these fickle cycles. According to Exodus, Yahweh has prospered and multiplied the people in Egypt, miraculously delivering them from slavery, providing for them in the desert, and speaking to them in a mighty theophany at Sinai. Israel's response to God's graciousness appears in the book of Numbers, and the response is neither faithful nor pretty. Israel responds no better to God's blessings than does humanity as a whole in the primeval history of Gen. 1–11. So, it appears that the editor of the Pentateuch wishes us to perceive the religious disposition of Israel and of humanity along the same lines: both Jews and Gentiles are rebels (cf. Rom. 1–3). God responds to Israel's rebellion in the wilderness by preserving the nation, but he does not prosper them as in Genesis and Exodus. The count of people in the first census of Numbers (603,550; see 1:46) is actually greater than in the second census taken forty years later (601,730; see 26:51). Numbers, then, is a story that juxtaposes the faithfulness of God with Israel's faithless rebellion.

(p 539) While the narrative contours of Numbers are clear enough, the unfolding story is generously interspersed with a broad range of ritual and legal materials, which seem to continue the priestly rules found in the book of Leviticus. Indeed, Leviticus also juxtaposes story with law, but its narratives invariably relate to the rituals and so do not seem like an interruption. In Numbers, however, these materials do seem to interrupt the book's narrative flow. The rites and laws are presented as divine prescriptions (Num. 5–10, 15–16, 18–19, 28–30, 35) or in narrative episodes that either illustrate these legal prescriptions (e.g., 15:32–36) or describe the occasion that prompts their creation (e.g., 17; 27:1–11; 36). While these materials cannot be easily integrated with the narrative of Numbers, they share a common focus on the concept of holiness, the special concern being to preserve Israel's purity, and hence to protect its sacred nexus with God.

Numbers presents readers with impressions of narrative unity as well as with diverse ritual and legal materials that do not easily satisfy our hermeneutical thirst for coherence. A good theological reading of this interesting book will need to account for this. Fortunately, our efforts can benefit from the penetrating exegetical and theological work done by our Jewish and Christian forebears.

The Theology of Numbers in Historical Purview

Our earliest theological readings of Numbers, or at least of the traditions now found in Numbers, appear in the Hebrew Bible itself. Deuteronomy relates a summary of Israel's wilderness experience in its first few chapters (1–3). This historical review implicitly accentuates God's faithfulness to Israel in the face of the nation's unfaithfulness, and it explicitly warns Israel not to duplicate the failures of the exodus generation—especially its idolatry—and so reap similar dire consequences (4:1–4). Nevertheless, in Deuteronomy, the piety of the conquest generation shines no brighter than that of its fathers (9:6), and the book predicts a gloomy future for the idolatrous people of Israel (4:30; 30:1–10; 31:14–32:47). The Hebrew prophetic books also allude to Israel's wilderness experience, but in strikingly different ways. Hosea and Jeremiah recall the wilderness with pleasant nostalgia (Hos. 2:14–15 [2:16–17 MT]; Jer. 2:1–7), while Ezekiel remembers it as the first in a litany of Israel's religious rebellions (ch. 20). These positive and negative appraisals of the wilderness also appear in the three psalms that relate Israel's history in hymnic style. Psalm 105 reads the wilderness as an example of God's kind provision for Israel, in contrast to Pss. 78 and 106, where Israel's desert wanderings are a period of ongoing mutiny. The later apocryphal book of 2 Esdras combines these contrasting images of the wilderness experience: "Thus says the Lord Almighty: When you were in the wilderness, at the bitter stream, thirsty and blaspheming my name, I did not send fire on you for your blasphemies, but threw a tree into the water and made the stream sweet" (1:22–23 NRSV).

Thus, the authors of the Hebrew Bible and Apocrypha attend to the wilderness story of Numbers and largely ignore its extensive ritual and legal material. This pattern of exegetical bifurcation, in which interpreters treat the two major genres of Numbers differently by ignoring one or the other, appears in later Jewish exegesis. Philo's work On the Life of Moses (first century CE) offers an extensive paraphrase of the wilderness story but touches on the rituals only briefly and under a separate heading (Colson 277–595). His preferred strategy for drawing out the implications of Moses' life is allegory, an interpretative method that suits not only his Hellenistic audience but also his own identity as a Hellenistic Jew. By way of contrast, Midrash Sifre, an early commentary on Numbers (second century CE), virtually ignores the narrative in favor of halakic (legal) interpretations of its ritual and legal prescriptions (Levertoff). The few instances of haggadah (illustrative narrative commentary) in Sifre only confirm this rule. Rashi's medieval Jewish commentary treats the entire book of Numbers, blending literal interpretation (peshat) with free homiletical exegesis (derash). But here again one detects an underlying theological concern to show how Numbers informs Jewish traditions of ritual and law.

Early Christian interpreters in the NT allude to Numbers rather sparingly. Two notable exceptions were the writer of Hebrews and Paul, for whom the faithless exodus generation illustrates the ever-present threat of Christian apostasy (Heb. 3–4; 1 Cor. 10:3–14). In briefer allusions, Acts remembers the wilderness as a time of God's divine provision for Israel (7:36), while John's Gospel sees in Moses' bronze serpent an image of the coming Christ (cf. 3:14; Num. 21:4–9). Similar exegetical patterns appear in the patristic evidence, where christological and tropological (moral/behavioral) insights were derived from Israel's story in Numbers (see Lienhard). Not surprisingly, neither the NT nor the church fathers (p 540) gave much attention to the ritual and legal materials in Numbers.

Two general observations can be culled from early Jewish and Christian readings of Numbers. First, Jewish and Christian interpreters were generally interested in different portions of Numbers. Jewish readers focused on its ritual and legal materials, while Christian readers drew moral and ethical content from its stories. As we will see, in certain respects this generic distinction anticipates modern critical readings of Numbers. Second, in spite of their differing generic interests, both Christian and Jewish commentators viewed Numbers as a manual for achieving holiness in their respective communities. Judaism expressed its holiness through ritual purity (hence the interest in ritual law), and Christian interpreters used Numbers as a guide for moral living (hence their tropological readings of the book's narrative).

Numbers in Modern Biblical Scholarship

Because of the book's ostensible disorganization, modern scholars have been preoccupied with the composition of Numbers rather than with its theology. Although there is continuing debate about the details (Sparks, Pentateuch, 22–36), the consensus is that the book was not composed by Moses, as tradition might suggest, but rather by several authors and editors working over a lengthy period of time and at some remove from the so-called Mosaic period. The standard theory is that Numbers owes much of its present shape to at least two major writers, the preexilic or exilic Yahwist (J) and the postexilic priestly writer (P). It is further believed that the basic narrative contours of Numbers were laid down by J (see 10:29–12:15; 20:14–21; 21:12–32; 22:2–25:5), while much of the remaining ritual, legal, and narrative materials—over three-quarters of the book—derives from P. This two-source theory explains the odd combination of law and narrative in the book. It has in its favor both critical and precritical evidence. Critical scholars find similar J/P distinctions elsewhere in the Pentateuch, and precritical Jewish and Christian interpreters focused on one or the other of these two generic segments of Numbers.

Some modern scholars, such as Douglas, Olsen, and Lee, have attempted to peer behind the putative structural confusion in Numbers to discern an underlying coherence in the book's stories and law. Douglas believes that she has discovered a ring structure that alternates between law and story in order to teach a theology of holiness and defilement.

Olsen argues that the final theological shape of Numbers reflects the coherent design of an editor, who has skillfully combined the narrative of J with the rituals, laws, and narratives of P. The resulting structure uses the two censuses in Num. 1 and 26 to frame the story as a tale of two generations, the disobedient exodus generation and the new generation of hope. This tale has as its central themes that God does not tolerate rebellion and that, on the other hand, Israelite rebellions would not frustrate God's plan to bless them according to his promises. Olsen avers that the legal and ritual materials in Numbers do not disrupt the presentation of these themes but rather are editorially integrated into the book to illustrate and reinforce them.

Lee's reading of Numbers is similar to Olsen's, inasmuch as it uses the narrative plot as its organizing principle. According to Lee, the book's conceptual structure is determined by God's responses to Israel, first in punishing the exodus generation because of its disobedience, and then in forgiving Israel and granting the conquest generation success against the Canaanites.

While it is indeed worthwhile to pursue a coherent understanding of the book's combination of law and story, one wonders whether our pursuit of coherence does not apply a modern, post-Enlightenment literary expectation to an ancient anthology of Jewish stories, law, ritual, and priestly lore.

Conclusions

As we have seen, there is a long-standing exegetical tradition in ancient and modern scholarship that either explicitly or implicitly bifurcates the book of Numbers along generic lines, focusing either on the narrative or the legal material. Christians have been interested predominantly in the narrative material because they naturally find themselves tropologically in its powerful story. Whether Israel lived in sin (the exodus generation) or in obedience (the conquest generation), God in all respects was faithful to his people and to his promises to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. So, God can be counted on, but we must choose our road. Healthy Christian living does not take the difficulties of life's "wilderness" as evidence for God's absence; rather, we notice God's power as he carries us through it.

Turning to the laws and rituals of Numbers, Christian interpreters have generally neglected this material, largely because of the uniquely Christian viewpoint that the people of God are no longer subject to the minutiae of Jewish law (p 541) and ritual. Consequently, early Christians did not attempt to directly integrate Jewish rituals and laws into their theology so much as they sought a theological explanation for this conundrum: Why would God command the Jews to observe rites and keep laws that would become obsolete? The standard explanation of the church fathers was that God had accommodated primitive and errant viewpoints of law and ritual in his revelation to Israel, viewpoints that were naturally subject to obsolescence and hence to elimination (Sparks, “Sun”). In some respects this solution only goes halfway, for it fails to assess the function of the laws and rituals in the life of ancient Israel and then to ask what import this function might have for Christians. The most obvious theme that appears in the laws and rituals is God’s holiness, which is vividly expressed in these portions of Numbers. Appreciation of divine holiness is, of course, essential to a healthy theological appraisal of what God has done for humanity—and for us—in the person of Jesus Christ.

Bibliography

Ashley, T. The Book of Numbers. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1993; Colson, F. H., trans. Philo. 10 vols. LCL. Harvard University Press, 1984; Davies, E. W. Numbers. NCB. Eerdmans, 1995; de Vaux, J. Les Nombres. Gabalda, 1972; Douglas, M. In the Wilderness. JSOTSup 158. JSOT, 1993; Drazin, I. Targum Onkelos to Numbers. Ktav, 1998; Lee, W. W. Punishment and Forgiveness in Israel’s Migratory Campaign. Eerdmans, 2003; Levertoff, P. P., trans. Midrash Sifre on Numbers. SPCK, 1926; Levine, B. Numbers. 2 vols. AB. Doubleday, 1993–2000; Lienhard, J., ed. Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy. ACCSOT 3. InterVarsity, 2001; Olsen, D. The Death of the Old and the Birth of the New, Scholars, 1985; Rashi. The Metsudah Chumash, trans. Y. Rabinowitz. Simcha, 2000; Sparks, K. The Pentateuch. IBR Bibliographies 1. Baker, 2002; idem. “The Sun Also Rises: Accommodation in Inscripturation and Interpretation.” In Evangelicals and Scripture, ed. D. Okholm et al. InterVarsity, 2004; Wenham, G. Numbers. OTG. Sheffield Academic Press, 1997.

Kent L. Sparks

(p 542) O

Obadiah, Book of

The history of Obadiah research mirrors OT studies in miniature. Early Christian interpreters used Edom’s fall as a type of the fall of Jerusalem. They also stressed the day of the Lord and final judgment, and treated Mt. Zion and Mt. Edom as types of the church (Ferreiro). Late-nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century historical-critical scholars tended to discuss the book's authorship and date along lines established in analyses of the Pentateuch. Thus, scholars debated how the book was shaped over time, since they did not think it probable that one writer included threats against Edom and hope for Israel's future in the same book (Wellhausen; Bewer). In the first three-quarters of the twentieth century, form-critical experts focused particularly on the book's setting and literary form. Most concluded that the book was a prophetic denunciation from shortly after the fall of Jerusalem in 587/6 BCE, though this opinion was by no means universally accepted (Wolff; Watts). Like historical critics, form critics struggled with the presence of threats and promise in the same short book. In the late twentieth century scholars debated whether Obadiah should be read as a unified construction (Raabe), as part of the Book of the Twelve as a whole (Nogalski), or as a redacted prophetic book (Ben Zvi). Such discussions reflected the trend toward treating the canonical text and reactions to this strategy. By the end of the twentieth century, Obadiah had been the subject of lengthy analyses, but it was still not analyzed as often as longer prophecies.

Even some of the excellent longer studies of Obadiah do not highlight the book's theology. Though understandable, this situation is somewhat regrettable, since a study of the final form of Obadiah provides examples of several of the OT's most significant canonical-theological issues (Barton). These include visionary prophecy as divine revelation, human pride and hatred of one's neighbor as great ethical problems, the day of the Lord, and the significance of Zion.

Visionary Prophecy and Divine Revelation (v. 1)

Of all the prophetic books, only Isaiah's and Obadiah's superscriptions identify the words that follow as "a vision." Isaiah conveys messages related primarily to the present and future of Judah and Jerusalem. In Obadiah's case, messages concerning Edom's current sins and future judgment unfold. The designation of these books as "vision" underscores their divine origins, for this term establishes the belief that Yahweh has given these words to the prophets. Further, having established the term "vision" in verse 1, Obadiah then uses quotation formulas in verses 1, 4, 8, and 18, and utilizes first-person recorded speech in most of 2–18.

Thus, despite the visual implications of "vision," Obadiah consists of words that express what has been seen. These words provide a permanent record of this prophet's personal experiences in a way that benefits the community of faith and calls the sinful into account. This movement from vision to speech (and possibly) to written word given to and accepted by faithful persons mirrors the canonical process of other OT books. Furthermore, Obadiah was considered part of the Book of the Twelve in the Hebrew tradition. As such, it is part of twelve connected prophecies that together express in written word prophecy's great themes: covenant, sin, judgment, renewal, and consummation.

Human Pride (vv. 2–10)

Like Isaiah, Obadiah considers pride the root of other sins. The Edomites' pride is based on their status among the nations (v. 1), their seemingly impregnable capital (vv. 3–4), their famous wise men (v. 8), and their valiant warriors (v. 9). These attainments have led to the self-deception that they are beyond the reach of any higher power (v. 3). Thus, they believe they can act as they wish against Israel (v. 10). In other words, Obadiah depicts Edom in a manner similar to Isaiah's description of Assyria (Isa. 10:1–19). If so, it is ironic (p 543) that small nations have the same delusions of self-sufficient grandeur as larger ones.

Hatred of Neighbor (vv. 11–14)

Edom's mistreatment of Israel is the reason Obadiah gives for their coming judgment. The Edomites have stood by when invaders ransacked Israel and took captives (vv. 11–12). Worse yet, they rejoiced in Israel's downfall and cut down those trying to flee (vv. 13–14). They did this despite the fact that they were Israel's "brother" (v. 12), a reference to the fact that Jacob and Esau, the patriarchs of Israel and Edom respectively, were brothers. Amos adds the fact that Edom was famous for slave trade (1:9) and for fierce wrath in battle (1:11–12). They have made money from hating their neighbor, and their status and security make them think they can do so forever.

The Day of the Lord and Zion Theology (vv. 15–21)

As in the rest of the prophetic corpus, Obadiah asserts that all nations will be judged on "the day of the LORD" (v. 15). This term signifies a certain, specific event at an unspecified time in the future. It also indicates the Lord's sovereignty over the whole of creation, not just the covenant nation, Israel. The belief that one God rules all nations is indicative of the OT's emphasis on monotheism, and as such it varies greatly from the ancient henotheistic and polytheistic attitudes of most, if not all, of Israel's neighbors. The day of the Lord will remove Edom's proud populace from their secure mountain home and exalt Judah's humble survivors. Edom will experience Yahweh's justice by having their deeds turned against them (v. 15). They will learn the fundamental fact made clear in Joel 3:16–19 and Amos 1:3–2:3 that Yahweh's justice is universal (v. 15).

Further, on the day of the Lord Edom will discover that Zion is special to Yahweh (v. 17), a point underscored in Isa. 4:2–6; Isa. 62; Jer. 30–33; and Ezek. 40–48. There will be deliverance on Mt. Zion, but none on Mt. Seir. There will be deliverance for the house of Jacob, but there will be none for his brother Esau's house (v. 18). Israel's captivity will end (v. 20), and Zion's deliverers will rule Edom (v. 21). Yahweh's rule in Zion on behalf of Israel's survivors constitutes the kingdom of God on earth (v. 21; cf. Isa. 25:6–8). Yahweh is sovereign, and Yahweh fights for Israel, which fulfills the promise made to Abraham to defeat his descendant's enemies (Gen. 12:1–3). Thus, in this last section of Obadiah it is clear that Zion is not simply Jerusalem. Nor is Edom simply a neighboring nation. Rather, Zion is the place where Yahweh lives with his faithful people in the absence of sin and danger. Similarly, Edom represents all nations that threaten Yahweh's redeemed ones. This long-term foe of Israel provides a pattern for what it means to have a determined, harsh enemy.

Like other prophets, Obadiah based his eschatological expectations on concrete historical events. Edom's real acts in history provided a paradigm for how sinful Gentiles behave, and Edom's eventual defeat served as a basis for belief in ultimate redemption for those who please Yahweh. Survival in historical circumstances became the impetus for theological reflection on the future. Therefore, Obadiah provides patterns for theological understanding, not just predictions about the future.

Conclusion

Obadiah's theological significance is at least twofold. First, its significance lies in its ability to present a vision in words that relate common historical events to the larger pattern of eschatology. Concrete events that take place repeatedly at an unspecified point in time prove typical enough to provide a paradigm for the future. Second, its significance lies in its ability to connect with significant OT themes and to adjoining books. One could not reproduce the entirety of prophetic theology from these verses, but one could make a good start. This brief prophecy should therefore be seen for what it is: a tightly packed, theologically rich essay on Yahweh's sovereignty over Israel and Israel's neighbors. When viewed this way, Obadiah highlights the transbiblical belief that Yahweh deserves and demands exclusive worship and service. There are no other gods, so there is no salvation outside of a relationship with Israel's God, who is the Creator and Judge of everyone. Those who deny this exclusive sovereignty place themselves in Edom's precarious position.

Bibliography

Barton, J. Joel and Obadiah. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Ben Zvi, E. A Historical-Critical Study of the Book of Obadiah. BZAW 242. De Gruyter, 1996; Bewer, J. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Obadiah and Joel. ICC. T&T Clark, 1911; Ferreiro, A., ed. The Twelve Prophets. ACCSOT 14. InterVarsity, 2003; Nogalski, J. Literary Precursors to the Book of the Twelve. BZAW 217. De Gruyter, 1993; idem. Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve. BZAW 218. De Gruyter, 1993; Raabe, P. Obadiah. AB 24D. Doubleday, 1996; Watts, J. Obadiah. Eerdmans, 1969; Wellhausen, J. Die Kleinen Propheten übersetzt und erklärt. (p 544)3d ed. G. Reimer, 1898; Wolff, H. W. Obadiah and Jonah, trans. M. Kohl. Augsburg, 1986.

Paul R. House

Objectivity

The history of the idea of “objectivity” has two phases. The first begins with ancient Greek philosophy and is dominant until the seventeenth century. In this phase questions about knowledge are overshadowed by the influence of Aristotle, whose Physics was a standard textbook for nearly two millennia. In this view the being or true essence of a thing determines how the thing is known: ontology dictates to epistemology the terms for objectivity.

In this arrangement, the “subject” refers to the true essence of the thing in itself. The “object” is the appearance of the thing as an expression of the essence that is presented to our mind or “intellect.” The “problem” of knowledge is how persons should align their intellect with the “object” that is given to it. Aristotle assumes that the objective presentation of the thing is an adequate presentation of its true essence. The dilemma is not whether we have access to the true essence of a thing, but how we should respond to its givenness. “Objectivity,” in this premodern view, is the proper aligning of the intellect to the object as the knower sorts out the essence of the thing given in the “objective” appearance. “Knowledge” is the successful alignment of the two.

The modern view begins to emerge in the medieval period and gains purchase in the course of the Renaissance through advancements in science, cosmology, mathematics, and physics (Cassirer). Signaling that the premodern view was being eclipsed was, for instance, the eventual replacement of Aristotle's Physics by Francis Bacon's Novum organum (1620; Solomon). René Descartes's Meditations (1641) is also considered a key work in this development. The full modern expression of objectivity would be made in Immanuel Kant's Critique of Pure Reason (1781).

In the modern view, "objectivity" is no longer defined by the essence of the thing as it presents itself to us. Things in themselves are now viewed as being either inaccessible to our senses and intellect (at worst, Kant) or difficult to discern (at best, Bacon). "Objectivity" came to connote the character of the epistemological stance a person assumes while struggling to seek out knowledge of things in their epistemological opacity. That stance is viewed as being, ideally, unaffected by prior beliefs or judgments—in some sense "neutral" or apart from any particular "perspective" (Nagel; Daston). In other words, whereas objectivity formerly was defined by the unproblematic giving of the thing to our intellect, it now is defined by the straining stance of our intellect as an act of "disinterested cognition" (Solomon 45).

This is, in one key respect, the opposite of the view of the premodern phase. In the premodern view, the action of knowledge ran from the essence of the thing to its objective appearance to our intellect. In the modern view, the act of knowing is perceived as running in the opposite direction—the negotiation of our senses to the thing, then the action of our reaching out and seeking the thing. Therefore, whereas ontology dictated to epistemology in the premodern phase, that relationship is reversed in the modern (Solomon; Cassirer). Thus, the problem of self-consciousness or self-perception becomes the initiating question. This "reversal" underlies many modern commentaries on the Enlightenment, and on the issues and problems that accompany its hegemony.

Influence of the modern ideal of objectivity reached its apex in the field of science and philosophy with the rise of logical positivism, which accords pure science the cumulative and monolithic authority in the collection and verification of facts and truth. The modern view was also influential on modern developments in history, hermeneutics, and the interpretation of Scripture. This is shown, for one, in that the evolution of modern biblical scholarship mirrors and follows the development of modern historiography and literary and linguistic studies, which all generally accepted modern objectivity as the ideal for knowledge.

In the course of the Enlightenment, modern "objective" readings of Scripture gradually became established as ideal readings (Kümmel). In this sense "objectivity" continues to be a central and controlling idea that underwrites contemporary debates about reading Scripture insofar as they accept the ideal stance of the reader as being on one hand in some sense neutral or impartial with respect to any metaphysical or ontological beliefs or influences, and on the other defined by the action of a reader toward a text. The contemporary adage is that, as far as one is able, one should read Scripture apart from any confessional or theological bias. Theological claims are only properly made if they are the subsequent distillation of an impartial reading of the Bible as a book like any other book.

(p 545)The acceptance of modern objectivity as an ideal also resulted in the linear arrangement of exegesis to biblical theology to systematic theology that still dominates most curricula of Christian colleges, seminaries, and graduate schools. It highlights the reversal we indicated above, observing that for most of the history of Christianity this line ran in the opposite direction; one studied theology extensively in order to become a capable and discerning reader of Scripture.

It is now generally acknowledged that the modern ideal of objectivity overreaches human capacities. Criticisms arise in the wake of the recognition of the person's location within certain untranscendable epistemological limitations, including time and space. Therefore, for the knower/reader there are only degrees of greater or lesser objectivity, which are always accompanied by a corresponding lesser or greater measure of subjectivity. Postmodernism, poststructuralism, and postphenomenalism focus on these limitations: They are expressions of modern objectivity's self-criticism (Vattimo). They demonstrate the limits and weaknesses as well as the "oppressive" hegemonies (real or otherwise) that modernism engenders. And they signal a crisis in the dominance of modern thought and the pending possibility of its alteration or replacement, but without proposing an alternative (Hutcheon; Vattimo).

Ideal objectivity has come under particular criticism from these late-modern traditions as being both inadequate to account for reading in general and particularly ill equipped to account for the event of reading Scripture. Regarding the former, poststructuralists and postmodernists raise the question of whether it is possible and even harmful to think about the ideal stance of a reader toward a text as being "objective." They draw attention to the social and political forces that shape and underwrite the reader's agency in the act of reading and seek to indicate the inescapable ways that reading is always shaped by the prior influence of these forces and traditions.

Theology and biblical hermeneutics responded by spawning a host of developments that explore the role of the subjectivity of the reader(s) in the production of meaning. Despite their significant differences, both the "Yale" and "Chicago" schools of theology are important moments in this history as it came to bear on the hermeneutics of reading Scripture. In biblical studies as well, a vast array of work has been produced that explores the subjective agency of reader(s), appropriating reader-response critical theories, social-rhetorical studies, and so on.

Critics of these movements have responded by arguing that they have swung the epistemological pendulum from an ideal objectivity to an ideal subjectivity, which hands the responsibility for determining meaning over to the reader or reading community tout court. Nevertheless, both advocates and critics of the exploration of subjective readerly action in the determination of meaning remain indebted to modern notions of objectivity insofar as they continue to construe the fundamental problem of reading Scripture in terms of the action of human reader(s) (knower[s]) toward a text (object).

Another result of recognizing the limitations of modern objectivity is reconsideration of the role of theological prejudgments in the reading of Scripture. This has a bearing, in turn, on the relationship between the various exegetical and theological disciplines (Bartholomew et al.; Green and Turner), theological and confessional reading of the Bible (Webster; Davis and Hays; Radner and Sumner), as well as new reflections on the positive roles of communities and traditions (Braaten and Jenson).

The gravity of these reconsiderations turns on the fundamental limitation of the modern ideal of pure objectivity for understanding the dynamics of agency involved in reading Scripture. When we read the Bible, we are not simply examining an object. Rather, we engage a person (author, God) and/or group of persons (reading traditions). That engagement carries with it all the ethical and moral implications that any encounter with others entails. Both we ourselves as readers and the person(s) we encounter in the text possess certain rights and responsibilities in this encounter (Wolterstorff). Modern notions of objectivity that trade on an ideal of neutrality or disinterest in the stance of the subject toward an inert passive object are, at this point, incapable of accounting for the ethical and moral connotations and responsibilities that pertain to the encounter and exchange between the personal voice(s) in the text and the interpretative action of the reader.

This limitation becomes more pronounced when we consider the broader implications of divine agency in the reading of Scripture. In the premodern phase the notion that God is actively speaking in, with, and under Scripture was a given assumption in the self-understanding of reading. In the modern phase this assumption became problematic and was viewed as a dogmatic imposition. The modern view is illusory, however, insofar as it believes that the setting aside of the assumption of God's speaking obtains (p 546) a nontheological stance. Whatever stance one assumes when one reads Scripture—that God speaks in this text, that God does not speak in this text, that God might speak or will speak—any and all are equally theological and dogmatic. With respect to the reading and hearing of God's Word, therefore, just as human creatures cannot remove themselves from the field of divine agency, so human readers cannot divorce their reading from judgments pertaining to the shape of divine speaking.

For example, the acceptance of the Christian canon as a uniquely authoritative collection entails beliefs regarding both God's action in electing and sanctifying this group of texts as well as the receptive action of the Christian tradition over four hundred years, as it struggled to recognize the canon's shape. Issues related to any kind of study or "criticism" of the origin and shape of Scripture will also entail certain affirmations or denials regarding divine and human action and their relationship. With respect to the recent attention to the role of the reader or reading community, the same implications hold. If one gives preference to the present communities' reading of Scripture over either an authorial-textual meaning or a traditional reading, one is also making a preferential claim regarding the present action of God in relation to the past action of God in either the composition or reading tradition of the Bible.

A refashioned role for objectivity in the theological interpretation of Scripture emerges as a result of these considerations. In the modern sense, objectivity becomes relevant in a necessary but limited and ad hoc fashion. It no longer pertains to an ideal relationship between the reader and text but suggests one aspect of the various relationships, encounters, and exchanges between the human and divine persons that variously inform the task of reading Scripture. Modern objectivity reminds us of the care and precision with which we should reflect on our theological presuppositions. Premodern notions of objectivity speak to another aspect, reminding us to account for the viva vox Dei in Scripture—a divine speech action that we acknowledge and receive. Both modes of objectivity only illuminate discrete features of the act of reading Scripture and do not exhaustively define it.

Finally, acknowledgment of the limits of any construal or system of objectivity, including both premodern and modern, for reading Scripture results in retrieval of the constructive role that confessions and theologies necessarily play in the hearing and reading of God's word. The negotiation of hermeneutical problems and disagreements ultimately turns on the recognition, comparison, debate, and resolution of the constructive, material theological assumptions pertaining to the encounter of divine and human persons in the reading and interpretation of Scripture, and not in the sorting out of formal or “objective” methodologies.

See also Method

Bibliography

Bartholomew, C., et al., eds. Renewing Biblical Interpretation et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2000–; Bordo, S. The Flight to Objectivity. SUNY Press, 1987; Braaten, C., and R. Jenson, eds. Reclaiming the Bible for the Church. Eerdmans, 1995; Cassirer, E. “The Subject-Object Problem in the Philosophy of the Renaissance.” In The Individual and the Cosmos in Renaissance Philosophy. Harper, 1963; Daston, L. “Objectivity and the Escape from Perspective.” Social Studies of Science 22 (1992): 597–618; Davis, E., and R. Hays, eds. The Art of Reading Scripture. Eerdmans, 2003; Green, J., and M. Turner, eds. Between Two Horizons. Eerdmans, 2000; Hutcheon, L. A Poetics of Postmodernism. Routledge, 1992; Kümmel, W. G. The New Testament, trans. S. M. Gilmour and H. C. Kee. Abingdon, 1972; Megill, A., ed. Rethinking Objectivity. Duke University Press, 1994; Nagel, T. The View from Nowhere. Oxford University Press, 1986; Radner, E., and G. Sumner, eds. The Rule of Faith. Morehouse, 1998; Solomon, J. R. Objectivity in the Making. Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998; Vattimo, G. Beyond Interpretation. Stanford University Press, 1997; Webster, J. Word and Church. T&T Clark, 2001; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Mark A. Bowald

Onto-Theology

Kant uses the term “onto-theology” to refer to any attempt to prove the existence of God that “believes that it can know the existence of such a being through mere concepts, without the help of any experience whatsoever” (Kant, A 632 = B 660). He obviously has in mind the ontological argument as developed, for example, by Anselm and Leibniz, against which a few pages earlier he had just developed his famous critique. But in current usage the term derives from Heidegger, sometimes in the form onto-theo-logy, and has a quite different meaning. It is widely bandied about, often with little or no attention to the specifics of Heidegger’s definition and critique, as if mere mention of the term were sufficient to discredit any theistic discourse. The matter is much more complicated than that.

(p 547)Heidegger’s Concept 1: The What of Onto-Theology

Heidegger derives the term from the text we know as Aristotle’s Metaphysics. It starts out to be the theory of being as such, not (like the other sciences) an investigation of this or that particular region of being, but reflection on the totality of being in its universal characteristics (categories). As such it is ontology. But to complete his project, Aristotle finds it necessary to posit a highest being, the Unmoved Mover. As such, metaphysics is theology; or rather, since the theory as a whole requires the two dimensions to cohere in mutual dependence, metaphysics is onto-theology (Introduction, 287; Identity, 58–61, 69). It is the affirmation and articulation of the Highest Being who is the key to the meaning of the whole of being.

But Aristotle's move is unique only in its details. When Heidegger speaks of the onto-theological "constitution" or "essence" of metaphysics (Identity, 42–73; Nietzsche, 4:210–11), he means Western metaphysics as such, stretching from Anaximander to Nietzsche (Introduction, 280), with Plato, Aristotle, Leibniz, and Hegel as especially important instances. To Nietzsche? Yes, his "Highest Being" is the will to power in its eternal recurrence. Once we see, by looking at these proper names, how many different actors have played the role of Highest Being under the direction of various philosophers, we will understand why Heidegger sees science and technology as the metaphysics of modernity, in which the human subject plays the role of Highest Being. We will also see why he thinks both (1) that onto-theology is older than Christian theology, which is onto-theological only because it is metaphysics (Concept, 147), and (2) that scholastic theology "is merely a doctrinal formulation of the essence of metaphysics" (Nietzsche, 4:209). Theistic discourse is an incidental target because it belongs to the history of metaphysics. The prime target is metaphysics in all its forms because it "determines the history of the Western era. Western humankind, in all its relations with beings, and even to itself, is in every respect sustained and guided by metaphysics" (4:205).

This is only the first part of Heidegger's concept of onto-theology, but it already leads to his first critique. He takes it to be the task of philosophy to think Being in its meaning and truth. He insists that Being is not to be confused with beings, even the Highest Being, and he holds "that beings are thanks to Being, and that Being never is thanks to beings" (4:201). If we object that it is quite unclear what this Being "is" that is to be distinguished from all beings, Heidegger will reply that this is precisely his point. Being is precisely what remains unthought in metaphysics, which occupies itself entirely with understanding beings in relation to various versions of the Highest Being. This is his first critique:

Onto-theology is the sustained and systematic forgetfulness of Being.

Obviously, this critique will be found forceful only by those who (1) wish their discourse to qualify as philosophy and (2) accept Heidegger's account of the philosophical task. Those who meet the second condition belong to the rather small church of Heideggerian true believers. The theist, whether academic theologian, clergy person, or lay believer, might well admit, or rather joyfully confess, that belief in God as Creator is belief in a Highest Being, who is the key to the meaning of the whole of being. The theist may well admit that the affirmation of this belief in creed, in witness, in preaching, in liturgy, and even in systematic theology need not worry whether it counts as philosophy in the eyes of a particular philosophical school. Moreover, the Christian philosopher who wants to think about God within a fully theistic framework might well articulate or at least presuppose an alternative conception of philosophy and claim to be doing philosophical theology. Heidegger will have a quarrel with the latter, but not with the former. In his own way he recognizes that theology has its own distinctive task.

Heidegger's Concept 2: The How of Onto-Theology

When talking about the more explicitly theological forms of onto-theology, we gather an important further specification of its nature, and it becomes clear that theistic discourse is not inevitably onto-theological. Heidegger asks: "How does the deity enter into philosophy, not just modern philosophy, but philosophy as such?" He answers: "The deity can come into philosophy only insofar as philosophy, of its own accord and by its own nature, requires and determines that and how the deity enters into it" (Identity, 55–56). Philosophy, which here means onto-theologically constituted metaphysics, only allows God, or perhaps "God," into its discourse on its own terms and in the service of its own project. It does not merely posit a Highest Being but does so in a certain, self-interested way.

What, then, is the project God must serve if metaphysics is to permit God-talk at all? It is (p 548) simply to render the whole of reality intelligible to human thought and understanding. Heidegger will often use the terms "calculative thinking" and "representational thinking" to signify the attempt to control the world, both conceptually and practically, through causal, explanatory thinking under the guidance of the principle of sufficient reason (esp. in Principle, 28: "God exists only insofar as the principle of reason holds"). We find an important clue to this project when Heidegger notes the abstract, impersonal language onto-theology uses for God, such as causa prima, ultima ratio, and causa sui (Identity, 60). But causal explanations set off regresses that threaten to become infinite. So God's task is to be the Self-Explanatory Explainer that brings the regress to a halt and renders comprehension complete. Only a causa sui could be a causa prima and provide an ultima ratio. We can now refine our earlier definition of onto-theology: It is the affirmation and articulation of the Highest Being, who is the ultimate explanation of the whole of being. By putting God to work in the service of its project, onto-theologically constituted metaphysics will become the possessor and dispenser of this comprehensive comprehension.

Heidegger can now offer a further critique of onto-theology, one that is no longer linked conceptually to the “ontological difference” between Being and beings. So, it may have a bite where the earlier critique does not. It consists in noting two consequences of the metaphysical project. One is the elimination of mystery from the world and our understanding of it, or at least the attempt to eliminate it, which involves flight from the sources of both anxiety and gratitude (Postscript, 235–38). Reality is (to be) compelled to show itself fully. The other consequence, closely related to the first, is that the God of onto-theology is religiously useless. “Man can neither pray nor sacrifice to [the god of philosophy]. Before the causa sui, man can neither fall to his knees in awe nor can he play music and dance before this God” (Identity, 72).

Here Heidegger sounds a lot like Pascal, contrasting the God of the philosophers with the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and like Kierkegaard, contrasting the God of the speculative system with the God of personal existence. His point is no longer just that philosophy should take a step back out of metaphysics (Identity, 49–52), but that theology should avoid this trap as well. One who really understands “both the theology of the Christian faith and that of philosophy, would today rather remain silent about God when he is speaking in the realm of thinking. For the onto-theological character of metaphysics has become questionable for thinking, not because of any kind of atheism, but from the experience of a thinking that has discerned in onto-theology the still unthought unity of the essential nature of metaphysics” (Identity, 54–55). If this silence is not to be permanent, Christian theology, like philosophy, needs to find a postmetaphysical way of thinking and speaking that overcomes its onto-theological tendencies. In the case of theology, this way is to signify a God who remains mysterious but who can evoke prayer and sacrifice and awe and singing and (heaven help us!) even dancing.

Here Heidegger seeks to save theology from itself. With reference to the confluence of Christian theology and Greek philosophy, he notes that whether this has been “for better or for worse may be decided by the theologians on the basis of their experience of what is Christian, in pondering what is written in the First Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Corinthians ... ‘Has not God let the wisdom of this world become foolishness?’ (1 Cor. 1:20) ...

Will Christian theology one day resolve to take seriously the word of the apostle and thus also the conception of philosophy as foolishness?" (Introduction, 287–88).

Heidegger clearly thinks that while Christian theology can be and sometimes has been onto-theological, its proper destiny is elsewhere. In the light of his Pascalian, Kierkegaardian, Pauline critique, theology can be postmetaphysical, not by abandoning the notion that God is Creator and as such an uncaused or self-caused cause, but by refusing to make God a means to our ends by subordinating all God-talk to our projects, our systems, and our methods.

Onto-Theology and Hermeneutics

So what does all this have to do with biblical hermeneutics? Quite a bit, if we focus on the How rather than the What of onto-theology. When biblical interpretation is in the service of some theological system, liberal or conservative, or when biblical interpretation is in the service of some hermeneutical method (historical-critical or historical-grammatical), it succumbs to the spirit of onto-theology. The text becomes an object to be mastered by the interpreting subject, individual or communal (Westphal 1–2). The system or the method becomes the Procrustean bed into which the text is required to fit. Its subject matter can enter the interpreter's discourse only on condition and to the degree that it conforms to the interpreter's a priori requirements. Because (p 549) the language is biblical rather than abstractly metaphysical, the God presented by interpretation may still be worshipped, and Heidegger's critique may seem to have missed its mark. But this God is an idol, created in the human image of a human system or method. It would be clear that "onto-theology" and "fundamentalism" are virtually synonymous if it weren't for the fact that this mode of interpretation can prevail at any point on the theological spectrum.

It is worth noting that Kevin Vanhoozer begins his introduction to this volume by explicitly denying that the theological interpretation of Scripture means subordinating the text either to a theological system or to a hermeneutical method. But interpretation is never free from this dual temptation. How can we guard against it? Doubtless, there is no magic formula (another method?). Perhaps the crucial task is constantly to remember that the Bible is the word of God, not in the Greek sense but in the biblical sense. (In other words, it is not so much logos as an intelligibility out there in the world—in this case in the text, to be discovered by the sufficiently clever interpreter—but rather the voice by whom we are addressed, called, commanded, welcomed, forgiven, guided.) As the word of God, the Bible is not the storehouse of King Midas, in which he hoards and admires his exegetical loot. It is the voice, at once disturbing and comforting, that says, “This is my Son, the Beloved; with him I am well pleased; listen to him!” (Matt. 17:5 NRSV). Systems and methods have their place, but they must always be subordinate to listening.

Bibliography

Heidegger, M. Hegel's Concept of Reason. Harper & Row, 1970; idem. Identity and Difference. Harper & Row, 1969; idem. “Introduction to ‘What Is Metaphysics?’ ” In Pathmarks, trans. and ed. W. McNeil. Cambridge University Press, 1998; idem. Nietzsche. 4 vols. Harper & Row, 1979–87; idem. “Postscript to ‘What Is Metaphysics?’ ” In Pathmarks, trans. and ed. W. McNeil. Cambridge University Press, 1998; idem. The Principle of Reason. Indiana University Press, 1991; Kant, I. Critique of Pure Reason. St. Martin's Press, 1961; Westphal, M. Overcoming Onto-Theology. Fordham University Press, 2001.

Merold Westphal

Oracle      See Prophecy and Prophets in the OT

Oral Tradition and the NT

Jesus announced and taught, the apostles proclaimed, and the gathered community of faith heard. It is thus generally recognized that much of the NT originated as a spoken word, that its formative material was first transmitted by means of oral teachings and traditions concerning Jesus' words and deeds, and that even in their final written form its various documents were delivered orally and received aurally within the common life of the early church. What is less clear, and thus still debated, is precisely how all this took place and what it might mean for any (not least theological) estimation of the NT today.

Jesus and Oral Tradition

Jesus and his first followers lived in the highly oral environment of first-century Judaism and its wider Greco-Roman world (Achtmeier; Wansbrough). As the Gospels well attest, he was a prophetic figure who proclaimed the kingdom of God. On many different occasions he addressed his listeners by using sayings and stories, dialogued with inquiring individuals and groups, and disputed with the increasingly perturbed Jewish authorities. Along the way he also gathered and instructed his disciples. What we know concerning these matters has come to us not because Jesus himself left any written record (apparently he did not), but because his first followers told and retold his message, initially orally and then in writing. Yet, precisely how this process took place, and the degree to which it reliably transmitted the words and voice of Jesus himself, has been the subject of several highly nuanced and often competing proposals.

With reference to folklore traditions, early proponents of form criticism (Bultmann; Dibelius) and recent participants in the Jesus Seminar and others have argued that Jesus traditions were transmitted orally over at least a twenty- to thirty-year period before being written down, and that they existed mainly in the form of (collected) wisdom sayings. Moreover, these traditions would have involved considerable local variation, and entailed the conflation of Jesus' own sayings with the faith-based interpretations and fabrications of the post-Easter church. So viewed, the "very communal, anonymous and changeable nature" of oral transmission (Henaut 15) does not inspire confidence concerning its reliability, notwithstanding more moderate positions balancing variability with reference to more uniform and stable features and patterns (Kelber).

Among early critics of form criticism were those who argued on analogy with rabbinic instruction that in fact oral Jesus traditions were carefully memorized and transmitted by the disciples in (p 550) formal, fixed, controlled, and corroborated ways (esp. Gerhardsson). Although initially and rather unfairly critiqued, this view has found support in more recent work. R. Riesner has contended that Jesus' proclamation and teachings stood within the Jewish prophetic and wisdom traditions, and were thus seen as reliable and to be safeguarded. Furthermore, like other Jewish rabbis and Greek teachers, Jesus would have prepared his disciples to perpetuate his instruction, with memorization playing a well-recognized role in this respect. S. Byrskog has applied modern studies in oral history to the eyewitness testimony of Greek and Roman historians and to the Gospels, noting the importance of oral recall and that writing was largely seen as a supplement thereto. He concludes that the Gospel narratives concerning Jesus are "the syntheses of history and story, of the oral history of an eyewitness and the interpretative and narrativizing procedures of an author" (305). It is in this nuanced way that we might speak meaningfully of the reliability and historicity of the Jesus tradition.

Other recent approaches have drawn upon K. Bailey's study of oral tradition within modern Middle Eastern village life, specifically his category of "informal, controlled tradition," designating the way in which such communities retain in quite fixed form the important elements in oral retellings. James D. G. Dunn finds this oral paradigm confirmed in his analysis of the combination of stability and flexibility evident in the narrative and teachings of the Jesus traditions in the Synoptic Gospels (Dunn 173–254). Therein may be discerned “a portrayal of the remembered Jesus, of the impact made by his words and deeds on the first disciples as that impact was ‘translated’ into oral tradition and as it was passed down in oral performance within the earliest circles of disciples and the churches, to be enshrined in due course in the written Synoptic tradition” (254). Dunn’s proposal, together with that of Byrskog, attests to the now highly sophisticated state of the discussion, and we hope that their constructive interaction will produce even more fruitful estimations of the crucial interrelated issues involved.

One final issue to be noted here concerns the extent of any interaction between oral Jesus traditions and written texts: How literate were Jesus’ disciples? Did they transcribe his words (e.g., using notebooks)? And is the shift from orality to written form to be seen as entailing the loss of a “living” tradition (so Kelber)? On balance, it seems likely that there was a lively and fluid interaction between oral and written elements, with both valued as together witnessing to the words and deeds of Jesus and their unique role in the formation of the new-covenant documentation of the church.

The Apostles, the Early Church, and Oral Tradition

Having been living witnesses to Jesus’ own words and deeds (Acts 1:21–22), the post-Pentecost apostles appropriated and applied the Jesus traditions in their own highly oral preaching and teaching of the gospel (Dibelius; Dodd; Bauckham, “Kerygmatic”). In so doing they attested to what God was accomplishing among them: The OT had been fulfilled in the ministry, death, and resurrection of Jesus. A now-exalted Jesus would be present by the Spirit among the messianic people of God until his return. And in the interim all were exhorted to repent and be redeemed (e.g., 2:22–36; 3:12–26). As such, their message bears some comparison to the content and form of the (later) Gospel narratives (cf. 10:36–43). And, given their prominent role, it is likely that the apostles, together with other eyewitnesses, took care to ensure that the Jesus tradition was properly remembered, represented, and retold.

That they did so to significant effect is indicated by Paul, who readily acknowledges the Jesus traditions he has received (1 Cor. 15:1–4; cf. Gal. 2:1–10). Paul’s letters also suggest that he was well aware of Jesus’ sayings (e.g., Rom. 12:14; 13:8–10; 14:14; 1 Cor. 13:2; 1 Thess. 5:2–3) and teachings (1 Cor. 7:10; 9:14; 11:23–25; 1 Thess. 4:15–17), drawing upon them for his own pastoral purposes. The Letter of James offers another interesting example of the way in which the sayings of Jesus were not simply cited or alluded to, but rather creatively reexpressed in relation to the matters being addressed (e.g., James 1:5–6; 2:5, 13; 5:12; so Bauckham, James, 74–93). Certain elements in 1 Peter might be similarly viewed (e.g., 2:7, 12; 4:13–14). From such examples it is evident that Jesus traditions were being impressed upon the lives of early believers and also woven almost imperceptibly into the non-Gospel NT writings.

Finally, it is also apparent that the gospel concerning Jesus found varied oral expression within the worship and common life of the early church. Again, Paul provides a notable case in point. Among various possible examples, reference can be made to confessions and acclamations (Rom. 10:8–9; 1 Cor. 12:3; Phil. 2:11), to songs or hymns (Phil. 2:6–11; Col. 1:15–20), and (p 551) perhaps to creedal formulations (Rom. 1:3–4; 1 Thess. 1:9–10; Dormeyer 140–54).

Oral Tradition, the NT, and Theology

It is evident that fundamental and wide-ranging issues attend any consideration of oral tradition in relation to the NT, not least the reliability of its witness to Jesus, the nature of its formation and role, and the correlation between Scripture and ecclesial tradition. From the foregoing it can be claimed with confidence that the NT does faithfully represent the words and voice of Jesus and the apostles' testimony thereto, for it is this which is fundamentally constitutive of its very substance and shape. Throughout, the NT indicates the collective and cohesive witness of its divinely governed sources and recipient contexts—from Jesus to the apostles to the early Christian community at large—who together authenticate its contents and urge its receipt as Scripture (cf. Luke 1:1–4; John 21:24–25). And all of this is in service of the unfolding purposes of the triune God, whose word is to be embodied within the lives of his Spirit-empowered people.

See also Form Criticism and the NT; Gospels

Bibliography

Achtemeier, P. “Omne verbum sonat: The New Testament and the Oral Environment of Late Western Antiquity.” JBL 109 (1990): 3–27; Bailey, K. “Informal Controlled Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels.” Them 20 (1995): 4–11; Bauckham, R. James. Routledge, 1999; idem. “Kerygmatic Summaries in the Speeches in Acts.” Pages 185–217 in History, Literature, and Society in the Book of Acts, ed. B. Witherington III. Cambridge University Press, 1996; Bultmann, R. The History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh. 2d ed. Harper & Row, 1968; Byrskog, S. Story as History—History as Story. WUNT 123. Mohr/Siebeck, 2000; Dibelius, M. From Tradition to Gospel, trans. B. Woolf. Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1935; Dodd, C. H. The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments. Hodder & Stoughton, 1936; Dormeyer, D. The New Testament among the Writings of Antiquity, trans. R. Kossov. Sheffield Academic Press, 1998; Dunn, J. D. G. Jesus Remembered. Eerdmans, 2003; Gerhardsson, B. Memory and Manuscript. Rev. ed. Eerdmans, 1998; idem. The Reliability of the Gospel Tradition. Hendrickson, 2001; Harvey, J. Listening to the Text. Baker, 1998; Henaut, B. Oral Tradition and the Gospels. JSNTSup 82. JSOT, 1993; Kelber, W. The Oral and Written Gospel. Indiana University Press, 1997; Riesner, R. Jesus als Lehrer. 3rd ed. WUNT 2.7. Mohr/Siebeck, 1988; Wansbrough, H., ed. Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition. JSNTSS 64. Sheffield Academic Press, 1991.

S. A. Cummins

Oral Tradition and the OT

This addresses the presence of oral material in the literature. To what extent did the OT originate as an oral composition, and to what degree was it composed in a written fashion? Traditionally, oral tradition has been characterized as a body of material with both form and content that was received as property of the community and passed along to the next generation in an oral manner (Knight). The tradition changed to meet new needs. Above all, it was cumulative in the sense that it experienced items added to it.

This question is debated among scholars. Given the wide variety of means by which oral composition could potentially take place, I review the dominant theories, beginning with the earliest, the development of tradition history by H. Gunkel and his students. As a German scholar working at the end of the nineteenth century, Gunkel was influenced by the epic poetry of the Germanic peoples, by the recent discoveries of Babylonian myths that many were comparing with the Bible, especially Gen. 1–11, and by source criticism. Thus, Gunkel compared Enuma Elish, the Babylonian creation myth, to the creation accounts found in the Bible. As a result, he felt that he could identify elements in Genesis that betrayed a foreign origin by their disconnected state. This was then traced back to a common origin with the ancient Near Eastern myths. Israel received the myth fragments and incorporated them into their own epic accounts. However, as a monotheistic people, they removed the elements of myth involving other deities: they demythologized the oral traditions. Thus, Gunkel was confident that he could isolate the smallest identifiable units of tradition, determine their origin and milieu, trace their oral composition and development from the earliest periods, and identify the stage at which they became part of the written compositions that formed the Pentateuch and other biblical books.

His students included R. Bultmann in the NT and A. Alt in the OT. The latter focused on the study of Israel's early history. Much of this was believed to have been preserved in the cult and especially in etiologies, legends used to explain the origins of well-known names or customs. Some figures, such as Abram and Jacob, were originally separate and eponymous leaders of tribal groups in various parts of Palestine. Others, such as Joshua, were artificial figures who provided organization to the composition. M. Noth reconstructed Israel's early history as evolving from (p 552) five tradition complexes transmitted orally: the exodus, the entrance into Palestine, the promise to the patriarchs, the revelations at Sinai, and the wilderness wanderings. These formed the common oral basis from which the composers of the documents drew, according to source criticism.

In Scandinavia, emphasis upon the oral tradition of the Bible was wedded to studies regarding the preliterate composition of northern European epics and stories. Scholars, including Pedersen, Mowinckel, and Engnell, among others, considered the importance of psychological characteristics upon the development of the oral tradition. They also emphasized the cult as the context for the transmission. In particular, Israel's kingship was seen as having a special holiness, at times interpreted in terms of the divine. Thus, the king was somehow recognized as divine.

Meanwhile, in America and elsewhere, there was a rejection of oral tradition as understood in terms of evolution from simpler units to more complex traditions. This was seen as contrary to anthropological findings. In particular, the investigation of Serbo-Croatian bards and their ability to memorize oral traditions on a level with that of the Homeric epics, as well as the discovery of epic poetic texts at Ugarit, from the time of Israel's origins, led some to understand the oral tradition as capable of passing along much larger collections of material without significant alteration. Narrative literature such as the Jacob account in Genesis and historical poems such as Judg. 5 were considered to be examples of oral transmission (Cross; Hendel).

This has led to new investigations into the oral traditions behind the biblical texts. Although many have touched upon this subject in various ways, S. Niditch has attempted to identify evidence for orality in some texts that possess what she calls an "oral register." She identifies evidence for oral traditions in texts that use repetition and certain forms or themes (such as those associated with creation or narratives of battle followed by enthronement). Behind these stated criteria, there is an interconnection with the assumption that writing was absent in ancient Israel before the Persian period (from 539 BCE), or possibly writing appeared in the late seventh century BCE, at the earliest. Thus, for Niditch early texts tend to exhibit oral traits, whereas later texts seem to be more conscious of the literary context in which they were written.

The theological implications for oral tradition have been explored primarily by critics who see the Israelite theology as undergoing a profound transformation that evolved from an early polytheism to a much later, and more literate, monotheism. Nevertheless, the identification of oral sources, particularly in poetry, has value in terms of theological understanding. For example, the early poems of Exod. 15 and Judg. 5 provide parallel accounts of the events found in the prose sections of Exod. 14 and Judg. 4. Perhaps this is an example of oral forms of the prose accounts. It certainly emphasizes the role of Israel's God as a warrior and his leadership of his people from the southern desert into the promised land and victory (Judg. 5:4–5). These theophanic motifs, coupled with the sovereign God as elector and protector of his people and as their defender against their enemies, can also be found in other poetic texts that may have an oral origin (e.g., Ps. 68; Hab. 3). Beyond these, other psalms as well as many proverbs may have had an oral origin. The former were used orally as praise for God's creation and redemption (Ps. 136) and as requests for his assistance (lament psalms, e.g., 13; 80). The proverbs provide a wisdom theology of the role of God in all of creation, and of the integration of nature and human experience within a single meaningful universe under the sovereign hand of its Creator (Prov. 1:7–9). This optimistic view that there is meaning in nature and the world allowed Israelites to live in a world not dominated by evil spirits or the chimera and fears that could be found in polytheism.

However, orality is difficult to prove where it is not explicitly attested. Thus, the repetition found in biblical genealogies may attest to oral origins. Poetry especially has evidence for oral background—as in the Song of the Sea (Exod. 15), David's lament over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1), and many psalms. On the other hand, the features of repetition and various themes may just as easily appear in what are fundamentally written compositions. The origins of biblical texts are notoriously difficult to identify where they are not explicitly stated. Furthermore, many assumptions about the absence of reading and writing in ancient Israel arise from reinterpreting early texts such as Judg. 8:14 and 1 Kings 21:11, ignoring the dozens of attestations from early in the biblical narrative to written sources (e.g., Josh. 1:8; 8:31–35; 10:13; 23:6; 2 Sam. 1:18; 1 Kings 11:41; et passim), or not evaluating the full implications of the extrabiblical evidence for writing from ancient Israel as well as surrounding cultures.

See also Form Criticism and the OT; Source Criticism

(p 553)Bibliography

Cross, F., Jr. Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic. Harvard University Press, 1973; Gunkel, H. The Legends of Genesis, trans. W. Carruth. Schocken, 1901; Hendel, R. The Epic of the Patriarch. Harvard Semitic Monographs 42. Scholars Press, 1987; Hess, R. "Literacy in Iron Age Israel." Pages 82–102 in Windows into Old Testament History, ed. P. Long, D. W. Baker, and G. Wenham. Eerdmans, 2002; Knight, D. Rediscovering the Traditions of Israel. 2d ed. Scholars Press, 1975; Millard, A. Review of S. Niditch, Oral World and Written Word. JTS NS 49 (1998): 699–705; Niditch, S. Oral World and Written Word. Library of Ancient Israel. Westminster John Knox, 1996; Noth, M. The Deuteronomistic History. JSOTSup 15. Sheffield Academic Press, 1981; Schniedewind, W. "Orality and Literacy in Ancient Israel." RelSRev 26 (2000): 327–32; Zevit, Z. "Clio, I Presume." BASOR 260 (1985): 71–82.

Richard S. Hess

Origen      See Allegory; Hermeneutics; Mysticism, Christian; Patristic Biblical Interpretation; Spiritual Sense

Original Sin

The doctrine of "original sin" conforms to the stereotype of "church dogma": a "rational" theory made authoritative by tradition and institutional decree; a heavy superstructure whose alleged biblical foundations most modern exegetes will not recognize; and literal propositions unpalatable to modern sensitivities (and even more so for late moderns), which can only be "saved" through reinterpretation. One can cite Paul Ricoeur as a model thinker about original sin who mercilessly criticized it as "pseudorational speculations" and as bordering on Gnosticism (Conflict, 271, 280, 283, 285), and he strove to retrieve its symbolic meaning on his hermeneutical way. The relationship of "original sin" to Scripture, however, may be seen differently from the current picture.

The heart of the matter is the interrelatedness of primeval event and present condition. As the phrase shows, the doctrine binds together the state of humankind, sin, and a reference to origins. Precisely, traditional theology distinguishes (but also combines) peccatum originale originans, the primeval catastrophe that caused the rest, identified with Adam's disobedience, and peccatum originale originatum, the innate condition caused by the former event and constituting the seedbed of "actual" sins. Three issues deserve close scrutiny: the extent and significance of the biblical evidence invoked (the "seats," sedes, of doctrine); the meaning (intentio) of the dogma and whether it is congruous with the "spirit" of Scripture; and the modes and means of sin's transmission, if it is affirmed (traditio).

Textual Origin

Critics of the traditional interpretation bemoan the use of very few passages as “seats” of the doctrine, basically Gen. 3 and Rom. 5:12–21, and complain that these are given a weight and signification they do not possess in the texts. It is an odd accident of history (in particular, Augustine’s reading of Rom. 5:12) that the Edenic story, that etiological tale (designed to explain why childbirth is painful, weeds grow faster than vegetables, snakes are unpleasant to women, etc.) with almost no echo in the OT, came to exercise such control of Christian thinking! Or, for critics more conservative, that such a skillful myth or symbol of humankind’s proneness to evil was (mis)read as teaching about causes. In Rom. 5, Paul is really interested in Christ; Ricoeur (Symbolism, 239) argues that Adam’s part constitutes “only a flying buttress,” “only a false column,” to serve homiletical symmetry.

Detailed arguments have been offered in reply. They would show that Paul’s logic implies his conviction of a historical Adamic fall and its decisive import; that canonical pride of place, for the Edenic story, reflects Adam’s role in the OT view of the human plight; and that reminiscences and allusions are by no means rare in both Testaments (Scharbert; Ligier). Beyond these, the sense of corruption from an early age (Gen. 6:5, raq ra , “only evil”; 8:21), of universal estrangement from God and dreadful subjection to his holy wrath—but for a special move of redemptive mercy—is widely attested indeed. The “natural” dimension of that sinfulness is not ignored, with the notion of “flesh” (in the NT, John 3:6; 1 Cor. 3:3–4; Eph. 2:3; etc.). Not seldom, the OT logic of genealogical continuity is being applied (Hos. 12:3–4; Ezek. 16:44–45; cf. 1 Pet. 1:18) and may reach back to the first patriarch, Adam, as it does in intertestamental writings (Wis. 2:23–24; Sir. 25:24; 1QH 9:13; 2 Bar. 18:2; 23:4; 54:15; 56:8–9; 2 Esd. 7:18–119) and is probably implied in Ecclesiastes. No clear statement, however, of the imputation of an alien sin appears (a predicate since Cyprian, Ep. 64.5 [58.5 in some editions]).

Dissent and debate bring out the importance of theological interest in detecting allusions, of the presupposition of homogeneity within canonical boundaries, of the continuing relevance of intertestamental literature, and of judgments (p 554) made on literary genres and the relationship of biblical texts to non-Israelite mythologies or wisdom books.

Intention

There is a vast agreement on the dogma’s truer intention: it recognizes the universal sway of sin, the deep-seated compulsion and inevitable expression, yet, paradoxically, its contingent character as the act of freedom (Brunner 50–51, 74, 100, 103–6; Suchocki 129–30; Ricoeur, Conflict, 282–84). If sinfulness equated with metaphysical necessity, sinners would appear as victims and God as the author of evil. In 1960, Ricoeur was able to emphasize the unique separation in the Bible (compared with myths) between the origin of being (goodness) and the origin of sin (abuse of created freedom). He saw the import of a historical fall—“Evil becomes scandalous at the same time as it becomes historical” (Symbolism, 203)—as the only way to preserve harmony with the prophetic preaching of ethical monotheism and repentance. Evangelical writers highlight the correspondence with a historical redemption (Rom. 5).

The knot of debate is this: while Brunner, Ricoeur, and others wish to maintain meaning without historical fact, through symbolic interpretation, more orthodox theologians (e.g., the symposium edited by Christoph Schönborn) argue that as if constructions cannot stand. Responsible theologizing cannot be satisfied. Involved is the role of theological reason in the interpretation of Scripture: How far is consistency a legitimate goal? Is it part of humility for reason to receive historical sequence (without exalting reason above history idealistically)?

Tradition

The spearhead of critiques of traditional dogma is directed against its account of transmission, from Adam to his descendants. Ricoeur denounces the mixture of juridical (ethical) categories with biological ones (Conflict, 270, 280). K. Barth (500) rejects the usual German word Erbsünde (hereditary sin). It must be recognized that orthodox worthies have made themselves vulnerable here, since they spoke of heredity as if original sin were a physical disability, a genetic disease. The intentio of the doctrine, as it preserves the dimension of freedom through historical linkage, opposes such category confusion.

Reflection might fruitfully investigate the complexity of human transmission and ponder the negative aspects of sin (humankind deprived as well as depraved) in a relational, covenantal, setting. Further work should also sharpen theological hermeneutics of metaphorical language.

Bibliography

Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Vol. IV/1, trans. G. Bromiley. T&T Clark, 1956; Blocher, H. Original Sin. Apollos, 1997; Brunner, E. Dogmatics. Vol. 2, The Christian Doctrine of Creation and Redemption, trans. O. Wyon. Lutterworth, 1952; Ligier, L. Péché d'Adam et péché du monde. 2 vols. Aubier, 1960–61; Ramm, B. Offense to Reason. Harper & Row, 1985; Ricoeur, P. The Conflict of Interpretations, ed. D. Ihde. Northwestern University Press, 1974; idem. The Symbolism of Evil, trans. E. Buchanan. Beacon, 1967; Scharbert, J. Prolegomena eines Alttestamentlers zur Erbsündenlehre. QD 37. Herder, 1968; Schönborn, C., et al., eds. Zur kirchlichen Erbsündenlehre. Johannes, 1991; Suchocki, M. The Fall to Violence. Continuum, 1994; Vandervelde, G. Original Sin. University Press of America, 1981.

Henri A. G. Blocher

Orthodox Biblical Interpretation

The interpretation of the Bible in harmony with the Bible's own nature and witness achieves its proper goal through the application of the following foundational principles (not necessarily in hierarchical order): (1) There must be fidelity to the witness of Scripture as the word of God, the supreme record of revelation. (2) There must be fidelity to the classical doctrinal tradition of the ancient church, as the tradition of apostolic truth, centered on the gospel of Christ, and enacted in the life of the church through worship, proclamation, teaching, practice, and mission. (3) There must be fidelity to earnest and critical study through the use of reason as a gift of God, yet operative within the horizon of active faith adequate to the apprehension of the transcendent realities testified by the biblical texts. And (4) there must be fidelity to the Holy Spirit, by whose grace alone is the ultimate aim of the reading of Scripture accomplished, that is, the transformation of human lives through the experience of God's holy presence and renewing power, the primary subject matter of Scripture. The integration and practice of the above principles form an authentic and comprehensive interpretative perspective that variously places readers, hearers, and interpreters of the Bible, and their spiritual quest, in unity with the communion of saints. These especially are the prophets, apostles, and great Christian teachers of the past, all faithful servants and authoritative witnesses of God's marvelous deeds for the salvation of the world.

(p 555)Fidelity to Scripture*

The Scriptures constitute "the oracles of God" (Rom. 3:2 NRSV) communicated through inspired men and women "in many and diverse ways" (Heb. 1:1 NRSV), including words, deeds, laws, rites, narratives, dreams, visions, symbols, images, and parables. By such various means God chose to disclose knowledge of his will, his saving wisdom, his summons to human beings, and ultimately personal knowledge of himself, in order freely to draw humanity to be his covenant people. The supreme expression of God's self-disclosure is through the incarnation, life, death, resurrection, ascension, and awaited glorious appearance of his Son, Jesus Christ, “the Lord of glory” (1 Cor. 2:8), who forms the center of revelation and marks the unity of the OT and NT. In view of its nature as the record of the self-disclosure of God and knowledge of his saving will—God himself being in this sense the primary author and subject matter of the Scriptures—the Bible bears intrinsic and undisputed authority for teaching, correction, and the life of righteousness. The church has acknowledged and formalized its authority by the process of its canonization. The primacy of Scripture entails that nothing in the life of the church must contradict the biblical message and spirit. Any usage or interpretation of the Bible apart from the principle of fidelity to the Scripture’s witness as the record of God’s self-disclosure will fall short of attaining its appropriate hermeneutical efficacy.

But the nature of Scripture also necessarily involves the paradox that the oracles of God are communicated through the words of human beings who spoke and wrote in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek. This paradox is an indispensable aspect of the nature of revelation itself that does not occur in a vacuum but rather involves free, willing, thinking, and acting human agents. The OT and NT, in their variety of books, authors, language, style, perspectives, depth of insight, as well as historical origins and development, amply demonstrate the truth of the “humanity” of the Bible. Biblical authors, for example the apostle Paul (2 Cor. 3:6), had some sense of this paradox in that they drew a distinction between letter and spirit in the sacred writings. The theologians of the ancient church—such as Origen, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa, John Chrysostom, and Cyril of Alexandria—were confronted by repeated questions of interpretation. They reflected more consciously on the human character of Scripture, a form of divine condescension to human weakness (synkatabasis), yet without compromising the authority and essential clarity of Scripture’s divine message. In modern times a vast scholarly tradition of literary and historical studies has thoroughly exposed the human contingencies of the biblical books to the extent that academic experts have often rejected the Bible’s unity and canonical authority, a cultural trend proved to be as unwise as it is fruitless.

However, grappling with the paradox of Scripture’s divine and human character is a necessary part of the interpretative task, a matter that can neither be ignored through pietism, nor evaded through clever answers by well-intentioned defenders of strict forms of verbal inerrancy. The parallel theological paradigm is the mystery of the incarnation—the revelation of the mystery of God in the person and ministry of the unique Son. God's eternal Son was born of a woman, grew in wisdom, suffered hunger and pain, and died a true death as a human being. But the Son also disclosed the reality of God's character and kingdom, rose from the dead in the power of the Spirit, and defeated the forces of evil and death. The challenge is how, by means of interpretative discernment, to keep in balance the divine and human aspects of the mysteries of Christ and Scripture. Interpreters must do so on the basis of and in harmony with the internal evidence of the sacred texts themselves according to their intrinsically bonded theological and historical testimony. This task cannot be fulfilled apart from a dynamic view of inspiration taking into consideration not only the rich variety of authors and texts themselves, but also the community of faith in which the biblical books were generated and gradually gained the status of sacred texts. For another definitive aspect of the nature of the Bible is its communal and traditional character.

Fidelity to Tradition

Just as theology cannot be separated from history, so also Scripture as a holy book cannot be disjoined from the communal context in which it originated, took shape, and was variously used, in Israel and church. The very idea of biblical revelation, indispensably involving active human partners, means that God's self-disclosure created covenant relationships and covenant community. Prior to the composition of texts, God's words and deeds were proclaimed and interpreted by communal leaders and prophets. They were then received and transmitted as oral tradition in the community of faith, and eventually recorded in documents. In Israel, no less than in the early (p 556) church, diverse claims concerning God's revelation had to be tested and resolved within the life of the community that possessed the discerning and normative criterion of true and false prophecy. The determining factor was not any single individual but the community and its faith tradition, acknowledging the witness of authentic leaders and prophets, preserving their writings, and eventually canonizing them as sacred books. Decisive new claims with extraordinary impact on people's lives, such as in the case of Jesus, created a new community, the early church. In either case, Israel or church, the functional principle remained the same: the ongoing community of faith was the living context of the proclamation, reception, interpretation, transmission, and application of revelation, whether oral or written.

Historical scholarship has indisputably demonstrated the organic bond between the community of faith and its revealed tradition. Already in the oral period, both gospel and sacred rite had attained the status of tradition in the life of the church (1 Cor. 11:23; 15:3). Thus, fidelity to the authority and witness of the Bible is fidelity to the community of faith, its tradition and life, its integrity and mission. Just as without the good news about Christ there could be no church, so also without the church there could be no viable proclamation of the good news. The creation and sustenance of community is a constitutive part of revelation and its interpretation. Moreover, the long process of the canonization of the Scriptures unambiguously attests to the mutually supportive and interdependent relationship between Bible and church. These considerations mean that Bible, church, and tradition cannot be played off against each other. Neither the Bible over church and tradition is a justifiable tradition, nor is church and tradition over the Bible. While the church through its tradition and active discernment gave rise to the biblical canon, the primacy of the biblical canon holds the church accountable to the scriptural witness as the standard of the church's faith and life. In the end, the true problematic of interpretation lies not at the level of formal principles pertaining to the relationships between text, community, and tradition, which are operative consciously or unconsciously in all religious communities. Instead, it lies in the specifics of interpretation at key points such as the understanding of the gospel and the definition of the normative tradition of truth, where critical judgment and discernment become preeminent.

Fidelity to Critical Study

The pursuit of truth necessarily requires discernment and critical judgment. The biblical authors themselves were engaged in discernment and critical assessment at the level of life. For example, the apostle Paul was wholly devoted to the advancement of the gospel and the care of the church through interpretative discernment in preaching and teaching, authoritative appeals to apostolic commission and received traditions, as well as persuasive argumentation and pastoral exhortation. All the NT authors were involved in a similar process of critical judgment, going beyond the mere announcement of the gospel and involving such matters as the christological interpretation of the OT, the formation of creedal confessions, the proper use of the gifts of the Spirit, the relations between Jews and Christians, the meaning of baptism and the Lord's Supper, the role of authority and order in the church, the resolution of internal and external points of conflict, as well as appropriate ethical conduct. These authors and interpreters came to the table with life-defining experiences and convictions that decisively influenced their interpretative stance. Along with their faith in the risen Lord and the guidance of the Spirit, however, they were necessarily engaged in critical reflection. With some disputes and diversity, they needed to work out patterns of faith and life in urgent concern about the truth of the gospel and the unity of the church (e.g., Matt. 18:15–18; Acts 15:22–29; Rom. 6:17; 1 Cor. 4:17; 8:4–6; Gal. 1:9; et al.).

The church fathers, equally faced with numerous theological and pastoral questions, exercised hermeneutical judgment in a more reflective way. At one level, while grounded in Christ and the Spirit as dynamic hermeneutical criteria, they made free and diverse use of known exegetical methods, such as allegorical, typological, grammatical, and textual, derived from both the Jewish and Greek traditions, and in some ways already found in the NT. At another level, having to contend with colossal gnostic distortions of the biblical texts, and much later with Arian and Eunomian rather sophisticated but nonetheless fundamentalist exegesis, the church fathers moved simultaneously toward historical, contextual, and doctrinal approaches to Scripture. They explicated such key principles as the centrality of Christ and the Spirit, the authority of the received apostolic tradition, the church's bond with the Scriptures, the doctrinal sense of the community as a whole (Rule of Faith), as well (p 557) as the closely related canonization of the Bible. Over against the gnostic and Arian alternatives, a preeminent achievement in patristic exegesis was the focus on the contextual theological meaning of the scriptural texts by means of critical study and discernment of their primary aim (skopos) and sequence of thought (akolouthia). They interpreted the parts in the light of the whole and the whole in the light of its parts. At stake were not just incidental or technical matters, but the theological core of the apostolic tradition of the gospel. This tradition involved the central teachings of the Bible regarding the Creator God, the true incarnation of his Word, the authenticity of the Spirit's workings, the understanding of salvation of soul and body, the role of sacred rites and unity in the church, the norms of ethical conduct, as well as the acknowledgment of the true Scriptures. The intent was not to stifle variety, with which the patristic literature is rich, but to maintain viable unity on the basis of the truth of the gospel and for the benefit of the nurture of the church, two abiding objectives of biblical interpretation. In this perspective the patristic tradition, largely a tradition of biblical study, through the formation of the scriptural canon and the interpretative tradition that closely accompanied the canon, marks a classic achievement and standard for all ages.

In modern times the dominant biblical criticism, a development of a long and complex academic tradition under the heavy influence of the Enlightenment, has produced a paradox. On the one hand, through formal and systematic studies, biblical criticism has yielded brilliant results, moving far beyond the exegetical work of the church fathers pertaining to the analysis of innumerable literary, historical, and theological aspects of the Bible. It has not only produced a rich array of tools and methodologies, but also elucidated a whole array of biblical institutions, concepts, and themes, such as election and covenant, prophecy and eschatology, kingdom and righteousness. In the process it has shed welcome ecumenical light on major divisive issues such as Bible and tradition, law and gospel, word and sacrament, faith and works. One of its strongest points, in both its modern and postmodern versions, is its insistence on fresh readings of the Scriptures. On the other hand, captivated by philosophical presuppositions and cultural trends, biblical criticism has also been marred by bias, hypercriticism, utterly conflicting proposals, as well as loss of the sense of the theological and spiritual grandeur of the Bible. Not the least among its flaws has been the arrogance of exclusive claims about “scientific” and “critical” study, judging all other approaches as either “precritical” or “noncritical.” The crux of the problem, created by philosophical assumptions as much as the diversity of methodologies, is that while the ideal of biblical criticism is to provide fresh access to the voice of the Bible, it seems to arrive at the chaotic result of dismantling the Scriptures, undermining the authority of their witness, and providing few commensurate benefits to either church or society. This virtual bankruptcy of academic biblical studies can be overcome only by vigorous self-criticism that leads to serious regard for the authority and theological claims of Scripture, the legitimacy of traditional approaches to the Bible such as kerygmatic, devotional, liturgical, and doctrinal, as well as an epistemological humility that autonomous reason and imagination do not necessarily have the last word in what the Scriptures are all about.

Fidelity to the Holy Spirit

Since the Bible calls for faith not in itself but in the living God, the goal of interpretation cannot reach its fullness by intellectual analysis alone, whether literary, or historical, or even theological at a conceptual level. Scripture itself teaches that salvation is by grace, by direct personal encounter with God in his mercy, and not by any privileged body of knowledge, including scholarly erudition. Salvation by grace, however, essentially entails the engagement not only of reason but also of faith, repentance, commitment, love, and holiness of life as ways of knowledge of and communion with the mystery of God. In this hermeneutical context, the usage and interpretation of the Bible requires prayerful fidelity to the Holy Spirit, who alone opens access to the reality of the redeemed life testified by the biblical texts, a vision that decisively qualifies an interpreter's view of the Bible, the church, and everything else.

Hermeneutically, therefore, several levels of interpretation must be distinguished, for example, historical, theological, and mystical, all closely related but having their own hermeneutical aspects and objectives. Historical exegesis, requiring extensive technical training, seeks the original meaning of texts by the canons of historical research, yet without the hidden bias of philosophical and cultural assumptions. The objectives are the analysis and reconstruction of the entire biblical world, its literature, history, theology, institutions, and manners, according to the historical context of each biblical book and (p 558)author. Such a task is in principle common to all scholars, Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Protestant, and interested and trained others, all mindful and self-corrective about their own presuppositions and the danger of improper interference in the pursuit of historical understanding.

Theological interpretation, also requiring technical training, concentrates on the theological claims and themes of the Bible as normative truth, a task bringing into play an interpreter's faith convictions, philosophical views, cultural sensibilities, and not least one's communal commitments. Although clearly related to the task of historical exegesis, the normative theological task involves its own hermeneutical context and problems, best engaged with awareness of one's presuppositions and an irenic spirit in order that the cogency of theological argumentation itself would provide the criterion of persuasion. For many, of course, what would be argued as the normative teaching of Scripture itself would be of preeminent importance. At this level the church fathers, whose theology was perceived not as an addition to but explication of biblical revelation, have much to teach interpreters about christological, spiritual, ecclesial, doctrinal, and pastoral considerations in essential continuity with the entire biblical tradition. In case of major theological disputes, the final hermeneutical word would belong to the community of faith, whose voice would prove as convincing as the integrity of its actual witness.

Mystical interpretation, a matter having nothing to do with esoteric technique, is related to the above approaches, yet is also of a different order. For one thing, it requires no technical preparation but another kind of training: nurture in the community of faith, where even a child can "interpret" the Bible and absorb its life-changing meaning through the hearing and reading of biblical stories. The paramount point here is neither exactitude in historical understanding, nor erudition in conceptual theological knowledge, but the spiritual receptivity of the believer embracing biblical images, symbols, narratives, and teachings, the Holy Spirit itself being the primary interpreter and teacher. Mystical interpretation is the illumination of grace actualizing the biblical witness in human hearts. The risk of subjectivity is countered by the believer's place in the community, the testing of one's personal faith and experience against the faith and experience of the community—ultimately the community of the biblical authors, as well as the great teachers and saints of the past. At this level, a huge amount of powerful interpretation and appropriation of the Bible's witness occurs in the ordinary stream of the living tradition, which is both conservative and creative, through worship, private devotions, preaching, group Bible studies, and mission outreach. Such activities are far more effective for the lives of ordinary Christians than exposure to the complex world of historical and theological scholarship.

Nevertheless, all three of the above approaches to Scripture are indispensable and mutually supportive. No single approach must be allowed to swallow up any other. The ideal would be the highest degree of integration between them in order that each interpreter at one's level of scriptural study may simultaneously grow as scholar, theologian, and saint in the presence of the living God encountered through Scripture.

Bibliography

Agourides, S. Hermeneutics of the Sacred Texts. Artos Zoes, 2000 [in modern Greek]; Breck, J. The Power of the Word in the Worshipping Community. St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1986; idem. Scripture in Tradition. St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 2001; Burton-Christie, D. The Word in the Desert. Oxford University Press, 1993; Florovsky, G. Bible, Church, Tradition. Vol. 1. Nordland, 1972; Gamble, H. "Canon: The New Testament." ABD 1:852–61; Greer, R. "Biblical Authority in the Early Church." ABD 5:1026–28; Hall, C. Learning Theology with the Church Fathers. InterVarsity, 2002; idem. Reading Scripture with the Church Fathers. InterVarsity, 1998; Hopko, T. "The Bible in the Orthodox Church." St. Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 14 (1970): 66–99; Louth, A. Discerning the Mystery. Oxford University Press, 1983; Panagopoulos, J. The Interpretation of Holy Scripture in the Church of the Fathers. Vol. 1. Akritas Pubns., 1991 [in modern Greek]; Pelikan, J. Christianity and Classical Culture. Yale University Press, 1993; Stylianopoulos, T. Scripture, Tradition, Hermeneutics. Vol. 1 of The New Testament: An Orthodox Perspective. Holy Cross, 1997.

Theodore G. Stylianopoulos

P

(p 559)

Palestinian Judaism      See Jewish Context of the NT

Pannenberg, Wolfhart      See Last Things, Doctrine of

Parables

Scriptural parables offer a fascinating study for theological interpretation. Their indirect form has laid them open to a variety of readings. Yet this same indirectness has—paradoxically—allowed them to speak with remarkable directness to successive generations of Bible readers.

Genre and Texts

“Parable” is a fluid term. Conventionally, it refers to a small number of moral tales or allegories in the OT (e.g., Judg. 9:7–15; 2 Sam. 12:1–7; Ezek. 17:1–10), and to between thirty and forty utterances of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels, couched in imagistic and/or narrative form. However, Hebrew, Greek, and English terminology does not allow neat demarcation of the genre. The Hebrew mashal, which lies behind the NT parabolē, is much wider than modern English “parable,” including riddles, proverbs, and taunts. (The term does, however, alert us to the family resemblance of parables with wisdom sayings.) Conversely, many of Jesus’ sayings generally called “parables” are not given any designation in the NT.

Rather than attempting to define the “ideal” parable genre, we do better trying to catch the force of the texts case by case. This article focuses on the parables of Jesus, upon which most attention has fastened.

No categorization of Jesus’ parables lacks arbitrariness. The following subdivisions form a simplified entry point, which will allow us to make some summary statements before proceeding to larger interpretative issues. Items in the bibliography (e.g., Jeremias; Scott) give fuller listings and various more detailed categorizations.

Short Comparisons. These are exemplified by the comparisons of the kingdom of God with a mustard seed (Matt. 13:31–32//Mark 4:30–32//Luke 13:18–19) and with leaven (Matt. 13:33//Luke 13:20–21). Issues of interpretation include the precise point of comparison (e.g., smallness? apparent insignificance? contrast between present and future?) and the extent to which the comparison reshapes standard understandings of God’s kingdom. Such sayings do not necessarily concern the kingdom, at least explicitly (cf. Matt. 7:24–27//Luke 6:47–49).

Implied Analogies. These are longer sayings in which Jesus puts a question, implying a similarity between a familiar situation and his own work, and/or the relationship of God to humans. Examples are the shepherd picture in Luke 15:3–7 and that of the friend knocking at midnight in Luke 11:5–10. An important issue here is how far to press the details: in the latter example, clearly no direct comparison between God and a grumpy householder is suggested.

Longer Narratives of the Triple Tradition. Two narrative parables appear in each of the Synoptic Gospels: the sower (Matt. 13:1–9, 18–23//Mark 4:3–9, 14–20//Luke 8:4–8, 11–15) and the wicked tenants (Matt. 21:33–44//Mark 12:1–11//Luke 20:9–18). Both can be interpreted as reflecting Jesus’ ministry as God’s final messenger, whose word meets resistance but bears ultimate fruit. Both can also be interpreted as pointing away from the speaker: hopefully, to the work of God in a land under judgment (the sower); and warningly, to the danger of rebelling against the Roman authorities (the tenants).

Narrative Parables of Matthew and Luke. Matthew and Luke each contain several longer narrative parables. Two are variations on the same basic story (Matt. 22:1–14//Luke 14:15–24; Matt. 25:14–30//Luke 19:11–27). Mostly, narrative parables are unique to one or other Gospel. Matthew’s have a strong focus on warning and judgment (e.g., 18:23–35; 25:1–13). This is not absent in Luke (e.g., 16:19–31), but he tends to present more positive scenes in which people respond aright to the challenge of their situation (e.g., 16:1–8; 18:1–8).

(p 560)The basic issue with the last two categories concerns how we are to “interpret” stories without losing their narrative essence. Although the Evangelists sometimes add interpretative comments, or introductions such as “the kingdom of heaven is like ...,” and always of course embed the parables in their wider narratives, the stories seem to contain a surplus of meaning that disallows reductive summarizing.

Although all the parables may be seen as fitting into Jesus' proclamation of God's kingdom, with the warning, hope, and present challenge entailed therein, we should be wary about treating them as mere illustrations of a known reality. The words in which they are couched and the literal scenes depicted should be allowed their full weight in communicating new understanding and vision.

History of Interpretation

Three overlapping phases are each characterized by a particular approach to the parables' reference and rhetoric, and the goal of interpretation.

The Early Period. Various elements of a parable were seen to refer "allegorically" to some hidden spiritual truth. Thus Luke 10:30–37 was interpreted in terms of the history of salvation: Christ (the Samaritan) rescues a victim of robbers (humanity seduced by the devil) and delivers him safely to an inn (the church). Moral implications were as important as doctrinal ones.

Rhetorically, the parables were regarded as having metaphorical force. Their key functions were felt to be revelation or illustration of truth to the initiated. According to Jerome, they were not to be used to establish doctrine (i.e., in argument).

This interpretative strategy was not simply a cultural preference. It was a function of belief in Scripture as God's word, to be plundered for its riches. Early interpreters were interested not in the intention of the historical Jesus, but in the divine significance of the parables.

Such readings flowered in the patristic period and were handed down through medieval times. The Reformers reacted against their excesses, though the approach is still seen in the mid-nineteenth century in Trench. In popular piety, it still flourishes. Allegory in some form has always been a useful preaching tool.

The Modern Period. For Adolf Jülicher (1857–1938), the parables' reference was single, not multiple: their "point" was a moral or religious ideal. C. H. Dodd and Joachim Jeremias followed Jülicher, but read the parables as proclaiming God's kingdom, seen in apocalyptic terms as the inbreaking of his reign.

Jülicher saw the parables' basic rhetorical structure as that of simile, not revealing hidden truth, but illustrating known truth in a way accessible to all. He also paved the way for the notion, developed fully by Jeremias, that the parables were argument.

Most importantly, it was Jülicher who first consistently applied to the parables the interpretative purpose of seeking Jesus' intention. Recently, readings of this intention have differed widely. The Jesus Seminar regards the parables as products of a quixotic, teasing sage rather than one who issued specific proclamations or commands. N. T. Wright sees them as vehicles of revelation about Jesus' mission, in guarded, allegorical form drawing on, but subverting, standard Jewish imagery. Drury prefers to keep the historical quest on the level of the Evangelists' intention, discerning allegorical patterning in the relationship of a parable to its Gospel context.

Recent Trends. Attention has increasingly turned away from the external reference of the parables to their inner structure (Via; Crossan; Hedrick). This has distanced, though not completely detached, the parables from their historical context. They are seen as reflecting existential questions, disclosures, or demands.

Rhetorically, the parables are now often seen as metaphorical narratives (Funk; Crossan; Ricoeur; Scott). Unlike the early period, when they were seen as strings of metaphors, they are now regarded as stories that as a whole invite hearers into a world in order to reshape their vision of reality. They are transformative rather than merely illustrative or argumentative. Or instead of reading them as "metaphor," which could imply that earthly scenes simply point to "heavenly" ones, one may read them as synecdoche (offering a "part" of this world, out of which hearers are to make a "whole"; S. I. Wright 182–226) or as an intersection of metonymy (the "horizontal" dimension) and metaphor (the "vertical"; Etchells).

Concurrent with these developments has been a further shift in interpretative goal: away from human intention to resonance for hearers. The parables are heard as provocative utterances for their original culture and for today. Bailey and Herzog have reimagined the social web of meaning that acts as their backdrop. Both help us to be attuned to likely original tones in the parables as well as to the contemporary challenge they issue. Neither claims hermeneutical neutrality: their readings are shaped by orthodox Protestant (p 561) doctrine (Bailey) and Paolo Freire's liberationist approach to pedagogy (Herzog).

Theological Interpretation of Parables Today

What might a properly theological interpretation of the parables look like? Our comments will relate to the three interpretative goals we have noted.

Divine Significance. To regard Scripture as mediating God's voice does not predetermine the manner in which any particular texts may do so. Parables therefore do not have to be interpreted allegorically, with God and his economy as referents. If parables as wholes allow us to glimpse God's kingdom, that is rich theological significance itself.

But this does not preclude us, like the early interpreters, reading the parables in the light of their canonical and doctrinal context. They contain scriptural echoes that are suggestive without the need to determine the extent of their deliberateness. They may also pattern the entire story of Christ. To see him in the Samaritan is not as far-fetched as many have thought. Jesus comes as the “outsider” and identifies with the marginalized, to rescue helpless humanity (McDonald). One does not need to attribute such a thought to Jesus to let the image illumine the meaning of his coming. Similarly, one can recognize the father in Luke 15:11–32 as a human figure in a realistic story, yet still see him as reflecting the character of God, disclosed elsewhere in Scripture and by Jesus himself.

Human Intention. The search for the parables’ original purpose is theologically necessary. A church that sees Jesus as God’s supreme speech-act must ask what he intended in his recorded utterances.

Historical-critical apparatus has often proved inadequate to the task. Yet we must still take seriously not only the Evangelists’ interpretation of the parables, but also their sense of bearing witness to Jesus’ words.

For example, the parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. 18:21–35) in canonical context supports teaching about relationships in the church. Theological interpretation will take this seriously. But it will also probe the significance of the parable in Jesus’ own setting, as a surprising glimpse of Jubilee in a society dominated by pagan, wealthy Romans. In this case, the impetus is to catch the spirit of the kingdom while it is here—in whatever surprising quarter it may be found.

But “intention” should not be conceived simplistically, as if parables could be decoded into nonparabolic language. Respect for Jesus and the Evangelists implies that our interpretations be grounded in the first-century context, but also that we grasp the importance of narrative as a medium for our own theology. We should further note Jesus’ high theology of creation: it was from the everyday world that he drew his scenes and stories.

Resonance for Hearers. Theological interpretation must reckon with the power of parabolic language to resonate differently in different contexts. Attempting to shield people from the parables’ puzzles and provocations by offering overly neat explanations is true neither to the text nor to the speaker—nor to the God by whose providence Scripture comes to us.

Theological interpretation will therefore seek to serve the parables’ dialectic of pointedness and indirection, rather than master it. Contemporary connections may be drawn out, though not labored, in order to link today’s world with the challenge of Jesus.

It is especially important that we allow the parables to continue to question us. We must not be content with fixed, “safe” “meanings” that favor “us” against “them.” Some early parable interpretation unfortunately bolstered anti-Judaism—for example, seeing in the parable of the wicked tenants (Mark 12:1–12 et par.) a decree against the Jewish people as a whole. Yet the Evangelists surely want the parable to challenge the church: not least Matthew, whose characteristic emphasis on fruit-bearing emerges here (21:43).

It is precisely a mode of parable interpretation that allows for a present hearing, sees ourselves as the objects of their penetrating address, that will most truly represent their intention. For they are not static revelations of truth, but dynamic invitations to transformation.

Bibliography

Bailey, K. Poet and Peasant. Eerdmans, 1976; idem. Through Peasant Eyes. Eerdmans, 1980; idem. Poet and Peasant; and, Through Peasant Eyes. 2 vols. in 1. Eerdmans, 1983; Crossan, J. D. In Parables. Harper & Row, 1973; Drury, J. The Parables in the Gospels. SPCK, 1985; Etchells, R. A Reading of the Parables of Jesus. Darton, Longman & Todd, 1998; Funk, R. Language, Hermeneutic, and Word of God. Harper & Row, 1966; Hedrick, C. Parables as Poetic Fictions. Hendrickson, 1994; Herzog, W. R., II. Parables as Subversive Speech. Westminster John Knox, 1994; Jeremias, J. The Parables of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke. Rev. ed. SCM, 1963; McDonald, J. I. H. “Alien Grace (Luke 10:30–36): The Parable of the Good Samaritan.” Pages 35–51 in Jesus (p 562) and His Parables, ed. V. G. Shillington. T&T Clark, 1997; Ricoeur, P. “Biblical Hermeneutics.” Semeia 4 (1975): 29–145; Scott, B. B. Hear Then the Parable. Fortress, 1989; Trench, R. C. Notes on the Parables of our Lord. 1840. John W. Parker & Son, 1853; Via, D. The Parables. Fortress, 1967; Wright, N. T. Jesus and the Victory of God. SPCK, 1996; Wright, S. I. The Voice of Jesus. Paternoster, 2000.

Stephen I. Wright

Passion Narratives

Oral Tradition and the Passion Narrative

Critics have long noted that the Passion Narrative (PN) constitutes the most closely articulated section in each of the Gospels. Elsewhere, we have series of episodes whose connection with each other in terms of narrative logic is often not obvious; in the PN, as Karl Schmidt famously observed, “with compelling logic and necessity one event succeeds another” (303). “The passion ‘from Gethsemane to the grave,’ ... is the longest consecutive action recounted of Jesus, quite different from the series of vignettes that constitute the ministry” (Brown, 1:11). What is more, the versions of the PN in the Synoptic Evangelists (Mark 14:1–15:47; Matt. 26:1–27:66; Luke 22:1–23:56) and John (18:1–19:42) all recognizably tell the same story, with the same characters playing the same roles, and the same general sequence of events—Last Supper, Gethsemane, Judas’s betrayal, the arrest, Peter’s denial, appearances before the Sanhedrin and Pilate, and the rest.

There is a reason for this coherence and uniformity. “We proclaim a Messiah crucified,” said Paul (1 Cor. 1:23a AT). That proclamation could never be divorced from another: “He has been raised” (Mark 16:6 NRSV). Yet, it was crucifixion, the shameful death of a slave or rebel, that was a “stumbling block” or “foolishness” to many (1 Cor. 1:23b), and that must therefore be narrated in full. And narrated it clearly was, orally narrated. As Paul said, writing in about 56 CE, “faith comes from what is heard” (Rom. 10:17 NRSV). The PN’s source in oral tradition is evident. As Albert Bates Lord (one of the pioneers of twentieth-century oral studies) pointed out, the overall form of the PN “resonates” with the patterns of oral heroic narrative: Jesus’ death is surrounded by motifs—such as betrayal by someone close and the failure of friends—that occur in other narratives of heroic death: Samson, Heracles, Arthur, and Roland, to name a few. Such heroes are always in some sense greater than the death that overtakes them, and always in some sense die for others (57–58).

But as students of orality also point out, those who listen to oral narrative, and therefore those who create or hand it on, tend to be conservative with regard to structure and content. In an oral or partly oral culture, no narrative intended to be heard can depart very far from accepted tradition—as anyone who has told stories to small children will know. It is likely, then, that when the Evangelists came to write down the passion of their Lord, in distinction from the rest of the story, they found themselves faced with a basic narrative pattern that brooked little change. Something like the Last Supper, the visit to Gethsemane, the arrest, the appearances before the Sanhedrin and Pilate, the scourging, and the crucifixion constituted a structure too familiar to be avoided and too sacred to be altered, even if they had wished to do so—and there is no reason to suppose that they did.

The Question of History

“Passus est sub Pontio Pilato. He suffered under Pontius Pilate.” So Christians claim, thereby linking their faith to history—the kind of history that could, in principle, be verified by ordinary historical method. What then actually happened on the first Maundy Thursday and Good Friday? Some would suggest that nothing happened—or nothing that we can know: the PN is a tale created by various members of the early Christian communities to justify their bids for power. So John Dominic Crossan: “It seems to me most likely that those closest to Jesus knew almost nothing of the details of the event. They only knew that Jesus had been crucified, outside Jerusalem, at the time of Passover, and probably through some conjunction of imperial and sacerdotal authority” (405). Why Crossan thinks this, he does not explain, and his notion that those closest to Jesus knew almost nothing (Did they simply lose interest? Were they bored?) may seem to place more strain on our credulity than the alternative. The PN does pose problems, and there certainly are points when we wish we knew more. (What, exactly, was the nature of the trial before Caiaphas? What was the relationship between that trial and the trial before Pilate?) Yet overall the PN is straightforward enough. This is not the place to examine in depth its historical problems and possibilities. As scholars such as Raymond Brown (Death of the Messiah) and N. T. Wright (Jesus and the Victory of God) have shown in massive detail, one does not have to be a fundamentalist or a literalist—one need only use the ordinary historical-critical criteria of coherence and multiple attestation—to (p 563) discern behind the PN a scenario that is both coherent and comprehensible.

The Meaning of the Cross

According to the Scriptures. Analysis of the PN in all four Gospels reveals example after example of OT quotation, allusion, or influence. Thus—to pick virtually at random—false witnesses stand up against Jesus at his trial (Mark 14:56–59 et par.), so setting him with the righteous sufferer of the psalms (Pss. 27; 109). Jesus is silent when accused (Mark 14:60–61 et par.; 15:4 et par.; Luke 23:9), as is the Lord’s Servant (Isa. 53:7). He is condemned to shameful death, as is the “just one” (Wis. 2:12–20). He is struck and spat upon (Matt. 26:65–68 et par.; Mark 15:7–20 et par.; John 18:22), as is the Servant (Isa. 50:6). Soldiers cast lots for his garment (Mark 15:24 et par.; John 19:24), passersby mock him (Mark 15:27–32 et par.), and when he thirsts, bystanders offer him vinegar (John 19:28–30), all again identifying him with the righteous sufferer (Pss. 22:7–8, 18; 69:3, 21; 109:25; Wis. 2:18). Skeptical critics have viewed this as evidence that the PN lacks historical basis, being merely tissues of invention based on Deutero-Isaiah, the Psalms, and Wisdom. That, of course, is to miss the point. Our choice of style and language is not primarily an indication of the truth or falsehood of what we say, but of the significance with which we wish to endow our words. Deutero-Isaiah spoke of Israel’s deliverance from exile in terms that recalled the exodus, not because Israel's exile was not real—manifestly it was—but to indicate the significance of its deliverance (Isa. 49:8–11). So it is with the PN. The evangelists use the language of Scripture (as, we may assume, did their sources: see 1 Cor. 15:3–4!) precisely to indicate that the PN is not simply the recital of one more execution of a deluded messianic pretender (of which, as is evident from Josephus, there were plenty). Instead, the PN is a description of events that took place, which “let the Scriptures be fulfilled” (Mark 14:49 NRSV//Matt. 26:56; Luke 22:37; 24:44; John 20:9; Acts 13:27), so that these events are in continuity with the story of God's dealing with Israel and the world, God's call and God's promise, from Adam to the exile.

The Son of Man Must Die. Nineteenth- and twentieth-century critics often noted that the various versions of the PN were all of “disproportionate” length in comparison to the rest of the Gospel narratives; and so, by the standards of nineteenth- and twentieth-century biography, they were. But the Gospels are not nineteenth- or twentieth-century biographies; they are Greco-Roman “lives”—and by the standards of Greco-Roman “lives,” the PN is not particularly long, for the ancients took great interest in how notable people died (exitus illustrium virorum). How one died showed who one really was. This is the literary tradition in which the Gospels stand (Bryan 27–64; Burridge 164–66, 208–9). So Jesus, facing his death, remains faithful, repeatedly knowing what will happen and that God will vindicate him (Mark 14:8, 18–21, 25, 27–31, 36, et par.). Caiaphas's question at the trial is to the point. “Are you the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One?” (Mark 14:61 et par.). Is it by you that God's kingdom will come? When Jesus replies, “I am,” and continues to look for God to vindicate him (Mark 14:62 et par.), it is (for all the ironic echoes of Wisdom) in one sense appropriate that the Sanhedrin hands him over to death. That is, they hand him over to God, to be vindicated or not. Is he the Messiah? “Let this Messiah, this King of Israel, come down now from the cross, that we may see and believe” (Mark 15:32 et par.). That, pace Nikos Kazantzakis, and not fantasies about married life with Mary Magdalene, is truly the last temptation of Christ. Will he, after all, seek the kingdom in a selfish way rather than God's way? Will he balk when he sees that God has “forsaken” him (15:34)? He will not. Therefore, “when the centurion, who stood facing him, saw how he breathed his last, he said, ‘Truly this man was the Son of God!’ ” (Mark 15:39 AT et par.; John 20:30). How you die shows who you truly are.

For Our Sins. Was that the only significance of Jesus' death? Not according to the PN. Nor is it the only reason why his death was (as the Gospels repeatedly say) “necessary [ dei ]” (RSV: Mark 8:31//Matt. 16:21//Luke 9:22; Luke 24:7, 44; John 3:14; 12:34; cf. Mark 9:31; 10:33–34, 45; 12:6–8; 14:24; Acts 2:23). Jesus himself, on the eve of his passion, says that he gives his life “as a ransom for many [ pollōn ]” (Mark 10:45 et par.), echoing Deutero-Isaiah: “Through his suffering, . . . my servant shall justify many [LXX: polloi], and their guilt he shall bear” (Isa. 53:11 MT/AT). In both cases, polloi implies, not “many as opposed to all,” but a contrast between the one who makes the offering and the “many” for whom it avails (cf. Rom. 5:15–19). The earliest forms of the Last Supper narrative—the one part of the PN that Paul tells as fully as do the Gospels—spell out this “ransom” theology (1 Cor. 11:23–26; Mark 14:22–26 et par.). According to Paul, Jesus tells (p 564) his disciples that his body is offered “for you” (1 Cor. 11:24); in Mark, Jesus’ “blood of the covenant” is shed “for many” (14:24 et par.). In both cases the image is still Deutero-Isaiah’s picture of the Lord’s Servant: “It was our infirmities that he bore, our sufferings that he endured; . . . he was pierced for our offenses, crushed for our sins; upon him was the chastisement that makes us whole; by his stripes we were healed” (Isa. 53:4–5 AT). “Blood of the covenant” implies the new community created by Jesus’ death, as was the old at Sinai (Exod. 24:4–8).

The PN, then, makes clear that Christ’s death is effective in this way. The question as to how it is thus effective—the matter of “theories of atonement”—is never raised, either by the PN or elsewhere in the NT. (Perhaps that is why, of the various theories devised throughout the centuries—juridical, mythical, psychological—the universal church has never recognized any in particular as the right one.) What the PN does do, however, is to show us how we may appropriate Christ’s death. It does this in two ways. First, it tells the story. What then? We are to listen, for “faith comes by hearing,” faith implies baptism, and baptism is “into [Christ’s] death,” wherein we are “buried with him . . . so that as Christ was raised from the dead, . . . we too might live in newness of life” (Rom. 6:3–4 RSV). That is how initially we appropriate Christ’s death. Second, our continuing appropriation is prescribed in Jesus’ instruction at the Supper, “Do this for my anamnēsis [EVV: remembrance/memorial]” (Luke 22:19; 1 Cor. 11:24–25 AT), that is, “that God may remember me” (Jeremias 159–65). That, Paul says, means the remembrance of Christ’s death: “For as often as you eat this bread and drink the cup, you announce the Lord’s death until he comes” (1 Cor. 11:26 AT). Throughout the Scriptures, when God remembers, God acts, with saving grace (Gen. 9:14–17; Exod. 2:24; 6:5; Lev. 26:42; Pss. 9:12; 98:3).

Bibliography

Brown, R. The Death of the Messiah. 2 vols. Doubleday, 1994; Bryan, C. A. Preface to Mark. Oxford University Press, 1993; Burridge, R. What Are the Gospels? SNTSMS 70. Cambridge University Press, 1992; Crossan, J. D. The Cross That Spoke. Harper & Row, 1988; Jeremias, J. The Eucharistic Words of Jesus. Blackwell, 1955; Lord, A. B. Oral Traditional Literature. Slavica, 1981; Schmidt, K. Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu. Trowitzsch, 1919; Wright, N. T. Jesus and the Victory of God. Fortress, 1996.

Christopher Bryan

Patriarchal Narratives

The narratives of Gen. 12–50, which portray the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph (and others, including the matriarchs, who play an important but smaller role) are among the most memorable and resonant in the whole of Scripture. They are also theologically crucial. For, despite the foundational role of Moses for the Torah as a whole, it is Abraham and his response to God's call that stand at the outset of Israel's story. Deuteronomy in particular reiterates that Yahweh's commitment to Israel is in fulfillment of his antecedent commitment to the patriarchs (Deut. 7:7–8; 9:4–5, 25–29; cf. Exod. 32:11–14). And Paul sees Abraham's response to God as embodying that which identifies Christian faith also (Rom. 4; Gal. 3).

Two common obstacles to theological interpretation of this material need brief mention. First is the ancient and recurring difficulty of the seeming immorality of at least some of what the patriarchs do (see Bainton; Childs 212–14, 218–21), which has recently been exploited to offer an overall negative portrayal of Abraham (Davies; Gunn and Fewell; evaluated in Moberly, Bible, 170–76). Part of the difficulty here lies in the lack of specific evaluation on the part of the narrator (so different from the evaluation of kings in 1 and 2 Kings); but, of course, narratives may be meant to invite disapproval as well as approval. More generally, the narratives show God working with recalcitrant material—most obviously, but by no means solely, Jacob/Israel—and slowly molding people to his purposes; this is moral since it involves growth in integrity and faithfulness, but it resists easy moralizing about the process (see Moberly, Old, 130–38).

Second, there is the question of genre: how far, and in what way, are the narratives historical, and what difference should this make to their theological interpretation? Even if Moses wrote the patriarchal narratives, their written form would be at a distance of several centuries from the events depicted. The scholarly consensus is that their composition is long after Moses (perhaps in the tenth century BCE, or subsequently; there is little consensus on the specifics).

Generally speaking, it seems clear that, although much of the patriarchal material most likely has ancient roots (Moberly, Old, 191–98), it has been developed and molded over time and has acquired the coloring of differing historical contexts—a kind of snowballing process that conventionally leads to the literature thus produced being called “legendary(p 565).” Since this kind of material is widespread and meaningful in most cultures, there need be no objection in principle to its presence in the OT—in theological terms, the validation and appropriation of “legend” by the Spirit. Von Rad (31–43) suggested that “legend” is characterized by deeper existential and symbolic dimensions than conventional history, and that specific narratives may concretize, in a single event, a process of life with God that in fact stretched over many generations, a factor that can give such narratives a sense of depth and lived wisdom.

One fundamental theological issue, felt particularly by Jews (see, e.g., Green), is posed by the pre-Moses context of the patriarchs. If Israel’s normative knowledge of God and way of life is given in Mosaic torah, how are those who live pre-torah to be understood? The Genesis narratives themselves do not depict the patriarchs as observant of, say, Sabbath or kashruth (distinguishing clean from unclean animals, and only eating the former), and in general they display a religious ethos with marked differences from that of Mosaic Yahwism (Moberly, Old, 79–104; Pagolu). Yet, the predominant Jewish instinct has been to see the patriarchs as religiously observant in accordance with Mosaic norms—as summed up in the rabbinic dictum: “Abraham our Father fulfilled the entire torah before it was given, even ‘eruv tavshilin [a rabbinic expedient for permitting the preparation of Sabbath food on the preceding festival day]” (b. Yoma 28b). Thus, the earliest retelling of the Genesis narratives that has come down to us, the book of Jubilees (probably ca. mid-second century BCE), introduces extensive Mosaic observances into the text. And it is likely that within the biblical texts themselves, despite their generally distinctive ethos, certain elements of Israel’s faith have been utilized to shape and interpret some of the narratives (in accordance with the “snowball” nature of some of the texts). This is most obvious in the explicit depiction of Abraham as keeping God’s “charge, commandments, statutes, and laws” (cf. Gen. 26:5 NRSV), but is also apparent in several Abraham narratives, especially Gen. 22 (see Moberly, Bible, 71–183).

Here the Jewish concerns are analogous to the Christian concerns as to how, if the normative knowledge of God and life is given in Jesus Christ, Israel’s pre-Christ literature should be understood from a Christian perspective (see Moberly, Old, esp. ch. 4). Just as the Jewish instinct has been to assimilate the patriarchs to later norms, so too there has been a strong Christian instinct to see key figures in the OT as, in effect, Christians even before Christ. Such a move is given supreme expression in Paul's account of Abraham's faith, which also exploits Abraham's pre-torah context (Gal. 3; Rom. 4). In general, Christians have developed two prime theological concepts for appropriating the OT as Christian Scripture. On the one hand, the notion of promise and fulfillment sees the OT as intrinsically looking beyond itself in terms of the divine purpose it depicts. On the other hand, typology/figuration enables the Christian reader to see OT figures and events as in some way modeling a Christian pattern. It is therefore striking that precisely these two moves seem to have been made by the writers of the Pentateuch when they preserved the patriarchal traditions within the context of Israel's Scriptures. On the one hand, the divine promise that sets the context for Abraham's story (Gen. 12:1–3) looks toward the (postpatriarchal) people of Israel, who are to be, in some sense, a blessing to the nations. On the other hand, Abraham is a type of Israel, whether in a kind of exodus from Egypt (12:10–20) or from Ur of the Chaldeans (15:7—which could resonate with Israel's return from exile in Babylonia), or in demonstrating the kind of total responsiveness to God that should characterize Israel in its obedience to the Ten Commandments (Exod. 20:20; cf. Gen. 22:1, 12, where the key terms “test” and “fear” recur). The theological problem of the appropriate Christian approach to the OT, together with the characteristic Christian resolution, can be seen to be anticipated in Israel's appropriation of the patriarchal traditions. This fact should increase confidence in contemporary renewed attempts to rearticulate the concept of figuration, with a view to the use of the OT within Christian faith (see Seitz; esp. Dawson, ch. 1).

Finally, what are the overarching theological concerns that characterize the narratives about the three prime human figures, Abraham, Jacob/Israel, and Joseph? Abraham's life is framed by the divine promise, primarily of descendants and blessing (Gen. 12:2–3), but also of a land where these are to be realized (12:7). His story can be read as exploring the dynamics of living with promises from God. This involves patience, waiting, endurance—living with apparent lack of fulfillment. As Martin Buber once put it (22), “To believe means to follow in the will of God, even in regard to the temporal realization of His will. (We only grasp the full vitality of the fundamental Biblical insight when we realize the fact of human mortality over against God's eternity).” Also necessary is a supreme trust and obedience (p 566) when God seems to contradict himself, as when Abraham is required to take Isaac, at long last born as his heir, and reduce him to ashes and smoke in a sacrifice (Gen. 22:1–19).

The most complex figure is Jacob, who from the womb is favored by God over his older twin, Esau, and explicitly personifies the nation/people Israel (25:23). Yet Jacob appears to be a heartless cheat and liar (25:29–34; 27:1–45), who only meets his match in trickery when he stays with his uncle Laban (chs. 29–31). But it is to a fearful Jacob on the run that God appears with promise and without rebuke (28:10–22). And when Jacob fearfully returns to face Esau, his mysterious encounter with God at the Jabbok gives him a new name and anticipates his gracious acceptance by Esau (32:3–33:11). Hereafter, Jacob/Israel at least begins to perform acts of devotion to God (33:20)—though he remains a poor father and a self-pitying old man. Here are some of the deep mysteries of grace and vocation.

The main concern within the lengthy account of Joseph and his brothers is explicitly divine sovereignty over human willfulness and malice: “Even though you [Joseph’s brothers] intended to do harm to me [Joseph], God intended it for good, in order to keep alive many people, as is being done today” (50:20 NRSV/AT; cf. 45:5–8). In this, the narrative is comparable to the NT passion narrative, where human fear, treachery, and brutal murder are what they are yet also serve God’s purposes (Acts 2:22–24). Yet, the narrative also presents the maturing of Joseph from a foolish and indeed priggish youth (Gen. 37:2–11), through a path beset by malice and abandonment (37:18–36; 39:1–40:23), into a wise and merciful man of power. For Joseph is able to learn to construe his youthful dreams, which at the time seemingly meant only self-promotion at the expense of others, as showing the responsibility of a power used for the benefit of others. Thus, 42:9 shows that Joseph’s memory of his dreams does not lead to crowing over his brothers but to his initiating a subtle process of reconciliation.

See also Passion Narratives; Typology

Bibliography

Bainton, R. “The Immoralities of the Patriarchs according to the Exegesis of the Late Middle Ages and the Reformers.” HTR 23 (1930): 39–49; Buber, M. Two Types of Faith, trans. N. Goldhawk. Routledge & Kegan Paul; Childs, B. Old Testament Theology in a Canonical Context. SCM, 1985; Davies, P. “Male Bonding: A Tale of Two Buddies.” Pages 95–113 in Whose Bible Is It Anyway? JSOTSup 204. Sheffield Academic Press, 1995; Dawson, J. D. Christian Figural Reading and the Fashioning of Identity. University of California Press, 2002; Green, A. Devotion and Commandment. HUCA Press, 1989; Gunn, D., and D. Fewell. Narrative in the Hebrew Bible. Oxford University Press, 1993; Moberly, R. W. L. The Bible, Theology, and Faith. Cambridge University Press, 2000; idem. The Old Testament of the Old Testament. Fortress, 1992; Pagolu, A. The Religion of the Patriarchs. JSOTSup 277. Sheffield Academic Press, 1998; Rad, Gerhard von. Genesis, trans. J. Marks. 3rd ed. SCM, 1972; Seitz, C. Figured Out. Westminster John Knox, 2001.

R. W. L. Moberly

Patristic Biblical Interpretation

Here the patristic period is taken to span the time from the NT to the early fifth century. John Chrysostom in the East and Augustine in the West left massive exegetical resources, which had a lasting influence, and their time provides a fitting terminus.

The Earliest Biblical Interpretation—the Fulfillment of Prophecy

Interpretation was first focused on the books that Christians came to recognize as the Old Testament—there were no other sacred books for them. In the earliest Christian writings—those that became the New Testament—the basic approaches that would shape patristic exegesis are already traceable. The fulfillment of prophecy is the fundamental theme, already present in the allusive way that Gospel narratives are articulated, bringing out for those with knowledge of the Jewish Scriptures the ways in which these narratives replay the stories or act out the prophecies to be found therein. It is made quite explicit in Matthew's Gospel, which repeatedly points out that this (event or saying) was to fulfill what was said by the prophet, followed by a quotation. There can be little doubt that the earliest Christian communities searched the Scriptures to discover the significance of Jesus. They needed to reinterpret traditional messianic prophecies to fit with the person and career of the one they claimed was Messiah; they also needed to find prophecies for the unexpected aspects of his life, such as his death by crucifixion. Rapidly a battery of proof texts was assembled.

Painting with a broad brush, we can state that the outcome of this was a divergence between the key interests of rabbinic and Christian interpreters of the same texts. Within the Jewish tradition halakah predominated, as rabbis sought to explicate the Law in a way that provided clear guidance about the minutiae of everyday life, so that the people would remain obedient to the God (p 567) who had called them his own and given them the Torah. Within the Christian tradition, however, the ethnic marks of the Jew (circumcision and Torah) rapidly ceased to occupy center stage. The Scriptures, taken over from the Jews in their Greek rendition (the LXX), became almost entirely a work of prophecy. In it could be traced the whole future that had come to pass in Christ, was being enacted in the life of the church, and would be fully consummated at the End. The fulfillment of prophecy was anticipated in Jewish tradition—indeed, the Dead Sea Scrolls have underlined the propensity for Jews of the period to be looking for such fulfillment, and reading the Scriptures in the way the Christians would. Christian reading had its roots in contemporary messianic movements within a diverse Jewish community. Yet the christological reading of the entire Scriptures, and the implied supersession of Judaism by Christianity, would sharply radicalize the outcome of methods adopted from Jewish predecessors.

In the mid-second century, Justin Martyr knew that “memoirs of the Apostles” were read at Christian gatherings; yet in his first Apology, he tells the story of Jesus through quotations from the prophetic Scriptures. The argument from prophecy was central to his apologetic enterprise. Another of his works was the Dialogue with Trypho. Trypho is the representative Jew who does not accept the Christian reading of the Jewish Scriptures. To neutralize this objection was crucial to Justin’s apologetic. Here then, we find examples of Christian prophetic reading that would become persistent throughout the period, such as the following (from Justin, 1 Apol. 32): In Gen. 49:8–12 Justin takes Judah, the lion, to represent Christ, from whom the scepter will not depart “until tribute comes to him and the obedience of the peoples is his.” The Gentiles coming to Christ fulfilled this word. “Binding his foal to the vine and his donkey’s colt to the choice vine, he washes his garments in wine and his robe in the blood of grapes.” How could this not be a reference to the passion narrative? Throughout the patristic period this text was taken to be christological and eucharistic.

This legacy shaped interpretation of the OT. Always it foreshadowed the truths of the NT. Sometimes it did this through riddling oracles, whose enigmas and symbols had to be teased out to see what they were pointing toward. Often, as in the case of the Delphic oracle, only hindsight revealed the true meaning. This encouraged a piecemeal reading of texts as pregnant sayings, to be lifted out of context and read in the light of a new reality. It also encouraged the treatment of words as tokens and their combination as a code to be cracked. A form of allegory was implicit in this approach.

Sometimes the text prefigured (or provided a “type” of) what was to come. “Typology” has been taken to presuppose the workings of providence in parallel events. The classic example, to be found in paschal homilies throughout the period, from Melito of Sardis to Gregory Nazianzus, is the way the exodus and Passover anticipates salvation in Christ. As the blood of the Passover lamb protected the Israelites from the angel of death and enabled their escape from Pharaoh, so the blood of Christ, “our Passover,” protects the church and enables redemption from the devil and his angels. The crossing of the Red Sea anticipates the water of baptism. Already in the Gospels the manna in the wilderness anticipated the stories of Jesus feeding the multitude. The basic reading of the exodus narrative along these lines was elaborated with more and more allegorical detail, but the core of it is a paralleling of saving events, which gives plausibility to the standard account of typology. However, “typology” is a modern coinage, and the ancients saw “types” and “symbols” all over the place, not just in parallel events. As long as Moses held up his arms, the Israelites prevailed against the Amalekites: his outstretched arms were a type of the cross. Ephraim would suggest that a bird could only fly when it made the sign of the cross with its outstretched wings, and call this a type. Job became a “type” of patience. In other words, types were various, but prophetic types were a distinctive feature of early Christian exegesis, with their roots in the Bible itself.

Thus, the fundamental approach to reading the OT was to treat it as prophecy, with symbols foreshadowing future fulfillment. But it was not the only way.

The Homiletic Imperative

The principal place in which the reading and interpretation of Scripture took place was worship. Early Christian worship owed much to precedents from the Jewish synagogue, including the reading and exposition of passages from the sacred texts. The letters and treatises of the earliest period suggest that this too would tease out prophecies and assert Christian truth against Judaism. However, homiletic reading also went in another direction: it was concerned both with detailing a Christian way of life, and with spelling out the consequences of failing to live according (p 568) to that way. The imminence of judgment and the all-seeing oversight (episcopē) of the God who could see even into the heart is a theme that figures strongly in the literature of the second century.

So, in this context the stories of God’s people in the OT Scriptures are often treated rather differently. Both the Epistle to the Hebrews and the work known as 2 Clement, probably the earliest homily we have, are cases in point. The Christian congregation is identified as liable to fall into the same dangers as beset God’s people in the past people in the past ((ee..gg., , HebHeb. . 33::77—44::1313). ). The prophetic warnings to Israel become warnings to the church. Christians should beware lest they deserve the words of Isa. 29:13: “This people honors me with their lips, but their heart is far from me” (2 Clem. 3.5). The predominant note is exhortation, enabled by identification with the text: “The Lord says, ‘Continually my name is blasphemed among the nations.’ ... Wherein is it blasphemed? In that you do not do what I desire. For when the nations hear from our mouth the oracles of God, they wonder at these good and great sayings; then learning of our [unworthy] deeds ..., then they are turned to blasphemy, saying this is some myth and delusion” (2 Clem. 13.2–3).

The reading of Scripture as exemplary was by far the most common approach in the patristic period. Obedience to God’s moral commands was the subject of most preaching, and God’s will was discerned in Scripture in a variety of ways. Injunctions in the Gospels and Epistles were set alongside the Ten Commandments and sayings from the Wisdom literature to spell out the way of life and the way of death. Characters in Scripture became “types” of particular virtues—Job as a type of patience has already been mentioned. Scripture became the warrant for the key Christian virtues of charity, humility, and asceticism. This tradition of “ethical reading” would reach its apogee in the two exegetes, John Chrysostom and Augustine, who mark the end of our period. Good examples of the range of tactics adopted to effect an ethical reading may be found in Chrysostom’s various homilies on the apostle Paul, as well as his persistent habit of tacking ethical exhortation to each homily in his great commentary series on the various books of the OT and NT.

Gnostic Reading and the Need for Criteria

The second century was a time when forms of early Christianity were very diverse. Toward the end of the century, Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons, found it necessary to try to articulate what was wrong with “gnōsis, falsely so-called.” Gnōsis is the Greek word for “knowledge,” but it came to be associated with a variety of sects eventually rejected as heretical. Christian Gnostics not only produced texts, including gospels such as the Gospel of Thomas and the Gospel of Truth, but also interpreted texts to suit their ideas. They were fascinated by Genesis as a cosmological text, and seem to have derived some of their ideas from the Epistles of Paul. The first commentary on the Gospel of John that we know of was written by a Gnostic, Heracleon. Marcion seems to have shared some of their ideas, but perhaps arrived at them differently. He thought the God of the Jews had nothing to do with the Father of Jesus Christ, and the Jewish books should be rejected, delimiting Scripture to the (edited) Epistles of Paul and an expurgated version of Luke’s Gospel. Prophecy and its fulfillment were not the main interests of Marcion and the Gnostics. Irenaeus had to deal with questions of what texts were authoritative and by what criteria they were to be interpreted properly.

Irenaeus correctly identifies as a major problem the decontextualizing involved in allegory and piecemeal interpretation. What the Gnostics did was to read their own system into the text by abstracting and rearranging the material. They ended up with something that the prophets did not announce, the Lord did not teach, and the apostles did not hand down. They attempted to make ropes of sand in applying the parables of the Lord, or prophetic utterances, or apostolic statements to their plausible scheme, altering the scriptural context and connection. “It is just as if there was a beautiful representation of a king made in a mosaic by a skilled artist, and one altered the arrangement of the pieces of stone into the shape of a dog or a fox, and then could assert that this was the original representation of a king. In much the same manner, they stitch together old wives’ tales and wresting sayings and parables, however they may, from the context, [and] attempt to fit the oracles of God into their myths” (Haer. 1.8.1). For Irenaeus, it was vital to recognize the unity of the one God revealed in the unity of the Scriptures. In order to ensure this, the diverse Scriptures must be interpreted in the light of the Rule of Faith. Irenaeus gives us the content of this in a variety of different forms—it is clearly not yet fashioned into a fixed creed. Yet the essential features of a creed are there, along with a number of stereotyped phrases. Irenaeus has realized that Scripture cannot simply interpret Scripture, but the theological traditions of the (p 569) church are necessary to establish a correct reading. He outlines the “overarching story” that the Bible tells in order to provide the right context for reading different scriptural passages. The story begins with creation, tells of the fall and of God’s remedies for the situation, and points toward the future. The one God, through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, foretells redemption in Christ. This is the key to discerning the king’s image in the scriptural mosaic.

Irenaeus and others, like Tertullian, challenged Marcion, pointing out that the Christian books becoming known as the NT presuppose the Creator of the world to which the books of the OT bear witness. There is only one God, and the key to God’s revelation is the story of promise and fulfillment. In ensuing doctrinal debates, appeal would be made to scriptural texts, often lifted out of context and formed into collages of proof texts. But in the end it would be “the mind of Scripture” that would shape interpretation of details (e.g., in Athanasius’s polemic against Arius), and that mind would be summed up in the creeds. Thus, these arguments, which are fundamentally theological, shape the patristic approach to interpretation.

As we have seen, the notion of prophetic fulfillment itself generated allegory, and arguments against heretics rarely appealed to more-literal readings. When methodological debates emerged, appeal is made to the same overarching story of creation and redemption. “Scripture” is a theological concept, and its interpretation was to be guided by theological and moral principles, rather than literary ones. This we find explicit in Augustine.

The Rise of Scholarship and of Questions of Methodology

Scripture is written in human language, and like any other text it requires careful attention from scholars trained in exegetical techniques. The social status of Christians meant that this development was largely deferred until the third century. Not surprisingly, it was in Alexandria, the home of both classical and Jewish scholarship, that the Christian equivalent was born.

The work of Origen was always controversial, and retrospectively many of his ideas were condemned, yet he was also profoundly influential. He was the first to produce commentaries on most of the books of the Bible. He accepted the Rule of Faith as fundamental but thought that it did not offer answers to every legitimate question. Some of his speculations were later treated as heretical doctrines, his allegorical methods of interpretation were also contested, and modern estimates have sometimes treated his theology as more Platonic than biblical. He was, however, Christianity’s first real scholar and intellectual.

In antiquity, education was through the study of classical texts, first with the grammarian as one learned to read, then with the rhetorician as one learned to compose speeches, then, for the privileged few, with the philosopher as one sought the truth about the way things are. What Origen did was to replace the classical texts of Greek culture with the Bible, adopting the philological methods used in the schools. To this day much commentary is concerned with the same questions: What is the original wording of the text? Can we gain understanding by going behind translations to the original Hebrew, or by comparing different versions? Are figures of speech, such as irony or metaphors, employed in the text? What does the text refer to? Is there background information that elucidates it? And so on. Even those who would criticize his allegory would use the same exegetical techniques. Origen professionalized Christian reading of the Bible, while incorporating and systematizing existing Christian traditions, such as the christological reading of the OT.

At bottom, Origen’s reading of Scripture was profoundly theological. The Bible being the word of God, the most important thing was to discern the intention of the Holy Spirit. The whole of Scripture was a unity, and not a jot or tittle was without its purpose.

Most of the Bible could be taken straightforwardly, and its moral commands were meant to be followed. However, the ceremonial prescriptions of the law, such as circumcision and the practice of sacrifice, were not: these foreshadowed the “bloodless sacrifices” of the new covenant. Indeed, most of the OT prefigured the NT. Thus, Origen adopted the traditional Christian approach to the Jewish Scriptures and took it further. He suggested that there was a deeper, spiritual sense to be read throughout the Bible, and the difficulties (aporiai) in Scripture were deliberately placed there to stimulate the soul to search for this deeper meaning. Indeed, using philological techniques, he identified metaphors, enigmas, and parables as signs that the text was not simply to be read “literally,” but constantly pointed beyond itself to spiritual realities. Every contradiction or inconsistency could likewise provoke one to discern some profound truth. This was the basis of his allegorical approach to meaning. The Bible was written in code, and (p 570) one needed the inspiration of the Holy Spirit to read it as intended.

A century later a group often known as the Antiochenes reacted against Origen’s position. Yet, they actually had a great deal in common with him. They used philological techniques and looked for “insight” (theōria) into the meaning of Scripture, but they insisted that allēgoria was but one figure of speech and only to be acknowledged where the text itself indicated it was present. They were most concerned that Origen’s allegorical reading of narratives in the Bible undermined the “overarching story” (historia). They were as concerned as he was not to take literally things like the talking serpent in Genesis, but they resisted spiritualizing away the event of the fall. God really was the Creator, who had providentially ordered everything; Redemption made no sense without the fall; God’s promises were fulfilled in the incarnation of the Son, and would be consummated in the eschaton. Their discernment of deeper truths meant finding correct doctrine and morality in the Scriptures. Origen (Comm. Matt. 11) had understood the feeding of the multitude in terms of spiritual feeding, the five loaves and two fish symbolizing Scripture and the Logos. John Chrysostom (Hom. Matt. 49, on Matt. 14:19) suggested that Christ looked up to heaven to prove he was from the Father; he used the loaves and fish, rather than creating food out of nothing, to stop the mouths of dualist heretics like Marcion and Manichaeus; and he let the crowds become hungry and only gave them loaves and fish equally distributed in order to teach the crowd humility, temperance, and charity. The debate about interpreting Scripture was partly methodological, but strongly colored by theological interest.

Augustine's *De doctrina christiana

Augustine's intellectual formation meant that he came under influences similar to those affecting Origen a century and a half earlier. He had embarked on a career as rhetor and so knew the philological methods of the schools. His conversion to Christianity came via Platonism. De doctrina christiana provides his considered approach to biblical interpretation. Most of the first three books were written thirty years earlier than the rest, but the whole has an impressive consistency.

In this work Augustine set out to give guidance to those who had to interpret Scripture in the church. He refuses to duplicate what people could get from textbooks or from school education, yet everywhere reveals his debt to the philological tradition. Indeed, he opens the discussion with a distinction that has its roots there. For in composition it was a commonplace that the subject matter (or inventio) should be determined first, and its appropriate verbal dress crafted later; in reading the same distinction was used in considering the intention of the author. So Augustine spends the first book of De doctrinachristiana determining the res of Scripture—the “things” Scripture is all about, and in the later books, this sense of what Scripture is all about provides a criterion for solving some of the verbal puzzles that the text presents.

Although Augustine approaches the whole thing in a somewhat novel way, treating language as “signs” pointing beyond themselves, his whole approach is in line with the trends we have observed. It is fundamentally theological and moral. For him, the subject matter of Scripture is love of God and neighbor. The interpretation of every text is to be judged by this criterion. Like Irenaeus, Origen, Athanasius, and the Antiochenes, Augustine affirms the unity of the Bible, and that unity is to be found in its underlying sense, the mind of Scripture, the intent of the Holy Spirit. Exegetical problems are meant to challenge our pride and lead to wisdom and humility. Without the tradition summed up in the creed and lived in Christian practice, it is impossible to discern aright what Scripture is about.

Conclusion

Patristic biblical interpretation was theological through and through. Christology and ethics were primary interests in reading the Bible. Some outcomes—such as the fathers' anti-Judaism, their tendency to assume prophecies were to be found everywhere and to take texts out of context, and their propensity toward allegory—are properly treated with caution in modern scholarship. On the other hand, we would know more about theological reading of Scripture if we could relearn from the fathers the notion that Scripture is a fountain. Many different readers can drink from it without it running dry (an image used by Ephraim the Syrian) because it is God's word, before which we sit judged rather than judging.

See also Allegory; Augustine; Gnosticism; Jewish-Christian Dialogue; Jewish Exegesis; Rule of Faith; Typology

Bibliography

Ackroyd, P., and C. F. Evans, eds. The Cambridge History of the Bible. Vol. 1, Cambridge University Press, 1970; Augustine. Teaching Christianity, trans. E. Hill. (p 571) In vol. 1.11 of The Works of St. Augustine, ed. J. Rotelle. New City, 1996; Campenhausen, H. von. The Formation of the Christian Bible, trans. J. A. Baker. Fortress, 1972; Dawson, D. Allegorical Readers and Cultural Revision in Ancient Alexandria. University of California Press, 1992; Droge, A. Homer or Moses? HUT 26. Mohr/Siebeck, 1989; Fishbane, M. Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel. Clarendon, 1985; Gamble, H. Books and Readers in the Early Church. Yale University Press, 1995; Grant, R., with D. Tracy. A Short History of the Interpretation of the Bible. 2d ed., revised and enlarged. SCM, 1984; Hanson, R. P. C. Allegory and Event. John Knox, 1959. Reprint, introduced by J. Trigg. Westminster John Knox, 2000; Pagels, E. The Gnostic Paul. Fortress, 1975. Reprint, Trinity, 1992; Simonetti, M. Biblical Interpretation in the Early Church, trans. J. Hughes, ed. A. Bergquist, M. Bockmuehl, and W. Horbury. T&T Clark, 1994; Skarsaune, O. The Proof from Prophecy. Brill, 1987; Young, F. The Art of Performance. Darton, Longman & Todd, 1990; idem. Biblical Exegesis and the Formation of Christian Culture. Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Frances M. Young

Pauline Epistles

The apostle Paul is considered by many to be the first and greatest Christian theologian. No first-generation Christian writings survive that articulate Christian belief to the extent and with the sophistication of Paul's. This article will focus on three crucial aspects of his thought in the history of the interpretation of Paul's letters—God's grace in Christ, Christ's saving death, and the dawn of the new creation in Christ (with illustrative references particularly to the undisputed letters, Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, 1 Thessalonians, and Philemon, as well as the disputed ones, 2 Thessalonians, Colossians, Ephesians, and the Pastoral Epistles).

Theologian of Grace

Paul's Letters. It is hard to identify a single theological theme that ties Paul's letters together. Indeed, their different occasions elicit precisely different thematic developments and emphases. The theme of divine grace in Christ, however, can stake a claim to being the most pervasive and central theological motif in Paul's thought, and has indeed been prominent in the interpretation of Paul's letters from earliest times to the present.

Paul's opening letter greetings and closing benedictions all contain a wish for this grace (charis) to the readers (cf. the customary Hellenistic "greetings" [chairein]), forming an inclusio and pointing to the main content of his preaching. For Paul "grace" is interchangeable with "gospel" (2 Cor. 4:15; 6:1–2; Col. 1:5–6) and the defining feature of each is Christ crucified and risen for sinners (Gal. 1:6–7). For instance, to imply that "Christ died for nothing" is to "set aside the grace of God" (Gal. 2:20–21); to "have been alienated from Christ" is to "have fallen away from grace" (Gal. 5:4; cf. Titus 2:11). Augustine's epithet for Paul, "theologian of grace," is thus not inappropriate (cf. also Rom. 3:24; 4:4, 16; 5:2, 21; 6:1, 14–15; 11:5–6; 2 Cor. 8:1, 9; 9:14–15; 12:9; Eph. 1:6–7; 2:5, 8; 2 Thess. 1:12).

Grace—defined through Christ's death and resurrection as proclaimed in the gospel—entails the utter unsuitability of its recipients and thus the total gratuity of the gift, attributable only to God's unconditional love. Paul urges the Corinthians not to "receive God's grace in vain," namely, the message that "God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, not counting people's sins against them" (2 Cor. 5:19; 6:1 TNIV). Those under sin "are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus" (Rom. 3:24). Those under condemnation and death for trespasses have received the life-bringing grace/gift that overflowed through Jesus Christ (Rom. 5:12–21). Christ made the "poor" "rich" by his gracious gift of becoming "poor" for them (2 Cor. 8:9). In terms of salvation, they are entirely on the receiving end: "What do you have that you did not receive?" (1 Cor. 4:7; cf. 1:4–7); "All this is from God" (2 Cor. 5:18; cf. 1 Cor. 15:9–10).

Paul's Earliest Interpreters. While the Pauline theme of divine grace echoes the OT theme of divine favor or mercy, some of Paul's contemporaries were unable to fit his particular slant on the issue together with other cherished Jewish beliefs. Paul echoes their objections in rhetorical questions: Doesn't grace (by his definition) encourage sin (Rom. 6:1)? Doesn't it make the law and the Messiah into sin's instruments by implying that even those under the law, God's people, were sinners in need of grace no differently than Gentiles (Rom. 7:7a, 13a; Gal. 2:17)? Doesn't this also deny the very advantages God has given to the Jews (Rom. 3:1)? And doesn't the Jewish majority's refusal of grace in Jesus Christ impugn God's own faithfulness (Rom. 9:6; 11:1)? At the very least, doesn't grace in Christ need to be paired with the works of the law (as evidence of membership in the covenant) for (p 572)justification (Gal. 1:6; 2:21)? Then there was the matter of the offensiveness and foolishness—to Jews and Greeks—of the message that a man shamefully crucified on a cross and under a curse was a Savior for mere believers (1 Cor. 1:18–4:13). Such grace appealed to few. Even those who accepted it had difficulty adhering to it. The Galatians were quickly captivated by “another gospel” requiring circumcision of Gentile believers and were in danger of “fall[ing] away from grace” (Gal. 5:4). The Corinthians began to gloat over their favorite leaders and became alienated from the unappealing, suffering apostle Paul, who warns them not to “receive God’s grace in vain” (2 Cor. 6:1). The Roman Gentile believers, forgetting their own dependence on God’s kindness, became boastful over Jews who were cut off from salvation and had to be told that these too will be shown mercy (Rom. 11:17–24, 30–32). Against all these objections Paul defends the grace of God as proclaimed in his gospel (not his opponents’; cf. Rom. 11:5–6) on the grounds that it alone is efficacious for salvation, and so truly in continuity with God’s ancient purposes.

Paul claims the mother church in Jerusalem agreed with his views on the sufficiency of grace in Christ and didn’t insist on Gentile circumcision, and he criticizes Cephas and Barnabas for acting contradictorily in Antioch (Gal. 2:1–14). Acts (stressing harmony in the early church) basically confirms this agreement (15:1–35), yet also presents Paul as occasionally law-observant (21:20–26). This nevertheless seems consistent with his self-description as a Jew to Jews, as one under the law to those under the law (though not himself under the law) in order to win them (1 Cor. 9:20). So radical grace did not rule out acts of law-observance (including Timothy’s circumcision, Acts 16:3) to remove obstacles to evangelism.

Through the third century CE, law-observant Jewish Christian groups opposed Paul. The Ebionites called him a “messenger of Satan” (see Preaching of Peter and the Ascents of James, excerpted in Eusebius and Epiphanius). Nevertheless, Paul’s teaching on grace apart from law-observance prevailed and the church soon became predominantly Gentile. As a result, the polemics over law and grace were replaced by concerns for the church’s survival, unity, and moral discipline, and Marcion stood alone as a vociferous proponent of Paul’s notion of grace. Harnack famously commented that Marcion was the only one in the second century to understand Paul—and he misunderstood him! Marcion took God’s grace in Christ as proclaimed by Paul to be incompatible with the retributive justice of the OT Creator and Lawgiver, and therefore rejected all texts that identified this God with the God of Jesus (Marcion's canon included only ten of Paul's letters purged of such references, a version of Luke's Gospel, and Marcion's own "Antitheses"). So the orthodox church branded Paul's champion a heretic and produced a counter-emphasis on the law's playing a positive role of preparing for Christ's coming, according to Paul, and on his (implicit) distinction between (nullified) ceremonial laws and (affirmed) moral laws.

Augustine. The Pauline theme of grace did not become prominent in church teaching—but was associated with heretics—until the fifth century CE with Augustine. He saw Paul's quintessential teaching as "justification by grace," which became the dominant view in Western Christianity. Appealing to Paul against Pelagius, Augustine argued that human beings are fallen, resulting in the perversion of the will and inability to believe and love God truly, or even desire to do so, apart from divine grace. Faith and good works are gifts of God (1 Cor. 4:7). Augustine's views carried the day and influenced medieval theologians such as Thomas Aquinas.

Luther. Luther appealed to Paul in challenging medieval Roman Catholic teaching that righteousness, though initially God's gracious gift, becomes believers' own possession: they are transformed by grace into the righteous, and having become righteous by grace, they earn God's favor through righteous deeds (for which the Church granted indulgences). Luther countered that believers remain sinners—simil iustus et peccator—and their righteousness is always alien righteousness; they are "reckoned as righteous" or permeated by the righteousness of the indwelling Christ (cf. Finnish Luther scholarship). Thus salvation is solely by grace, from start to finish. Any attempt to earn God's favor through obedience is refusal of grace and tantamount to the ultimate sin of disbelief.

Luther read Paul through the lens of his own experience of moral failure, although he was a conscientious monk. The more he tried to measure up to God's demands, the less certainty he had of God's approval and his eternal (p 573) salvation. He found release from fear and guilt only by casting himself, a sinner, on the grace of God for sinners in Christ. Whether Luther's understanding of Paul was shaped incorrectly (as much current scholarship holds) or correctly by his experience is a matter for debate. Newer Pauline interpretation sees Paul as arguing not against Jewish legalism but the attempt to use God's gracious gifts (e.g., election, the law) to establish a claim on God's favor (see below, on the New Perspective on Paul). Luther similarly criticized the Roman Catholic Church of his day not for works-righteousness that excludes grace but for a synergistic soteriology of grace and works that reduces the role of grace. Luther argued, in agreement with Paul, that grace is not “earned,” in the sense of being positively correlated with anything in human beings (including the results of God’s grace), but “free,” as most evident in the justification of the ungodly. Moral transformation also is the work of God/the Spirit that necessarily follows justification (Gal. 5:22–23; Phil. 2:12; Luther: a “good tree” necessarily bears “good fruit”), although not grounding final justification but authenticating faith (contrast Augustine: God rewards believers for the very same good works God grants; cf. Rom. 2:1–16).

The Modern Period. Developments in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries set the stage for a new emphasis on Paul’s view of grace by both Barth and, in a very different way, Bultmann. Protestant liberalism had come to see Paul as instantiating its own ideals: universal religion and deep religiosity typified by the yearning of the human spirit for God. When World War I crippled this vision, Barth challenged the prevailing theology with his exposition of Paul’s letter to the Romans. The cross represented a divine “No” negating human existence in its present form and destroying all hope of salvation emerging within this world. The resurrection constituted a divine “Yes” reconstituting human existence. This all happened “in Christ,” as God’s action entirely, apart from human involvement, simply to be accepted in faith. A stronger restatement of Paul’s teaching on grace can hardly be imagined.

Bultmann, viewing the biblical claims to God’s action in Christ and its salvific results as incompatible with a modern worldview, reinterpreted (in then popular existential categories) Paul’s notion of free grace to be received in faith as the demand to renounce all efforts to secure one’s own existence. Paul’s message, though directed to a Jewish audience, addresses a universal human tendency toward “self (produced)-righteousness” doomed to fail. “Authentic existence” can be realized only in the oft-repeated decision for faith. Bultmann’s program of demythologization and his reformulation of the gift of grace in terms of the demand for faith, however, turns Paul’s message into its opposite, “salvation” by works (of faith).

The New Perspective on Paul (NPP) and Its Critics. Anticipated by Wrede, Schweitzer, and others, E. P. Sanders brought an end to the dominance of the “Lutheran” Paul. Against the regnant caricature of Judaism as a legalistic, graceless religion—according to which works will be weighed in the balance to determine the covenant member’s final destiny, and entering the world to come depends on the good works outweighing the bad—Sanders defines rabbinic Judaism (200 BCE–200 CE) as “covenantal nomism”: a “pattern of religion” in which salvation is by grace, and works are the condition of remaining in, but do not earn, salvation. God chose Israel and established the covenant with it by grace. Israel's subsequent submission to God's commands was the appropriate response to God's favor, not the means of earning it. Thus Paul can have no quarrel with Judaism as fostering legalistic works-righteousness, self-righteous boasting, or a despairing uncertainty of salvation. The point of contention between Paul and his fellow Jews, Sanders avers, is the view that Christ is the one way of salvation (which includes Gentiles, whom the Jewish law excluded) in the end time and that other ways are obsolete. Paul may criticize some Jews for boasting in special privileges, but he has no substantive critique of Judaism. Paul agrees that getting in is by grace and staying in is by (the intention to do) works. Sanders summarizes, "This is what Paul finds wrong in Judaism: it is not Christianity."

Further, claims Sanders, Paul argues from solution (Christ as the way of salvation for all) to plight (all are under sin and the law's condemnation). This plight is invented to correspond to the solution instead of reflecting some real problem in Judaism. The Law was not impossible to do and did not fail to deal with sin, nor did it incite to sin or lead inevitably to self-righteous boasting. Jewish scholars (p 574) writing before the NPP (Montefiore, Schoeps) had objected that Paul (in his Lutheran guise) misunderstands or misconstrues Judaism (cf. Räisänen). Stendahl anticipated the NPP by labeling the regnant "Lutheran" reading of Paul and Judaism anachronistic and attributing it to Augustine and Luther and "the introspective conscience of the West." The Lutheran Paul mirrors the moral struggles of Augustine and Luther, which ended in dramatic conversions. The authentic first-century Jewish Paul, however, had a "robust conscience" and experienced no conversion away from Judaism, but a call to preach Christ to the Gentiles as their own way of salvation.

Other New Perspectivists who reject the Lutheran Paul argue that the real Paul does have a substantive critique of Judaism, namely, as ethnocentric, or characterized by boasting over other nations on the basis of the practices required by the law (especially circumcision and food laws) that distinguish Jews from Gentiles. Israel's privileges had come to be regarded as badges of superiority (Dunn). Boasting in national righteousness was Israel's meta-sin (Wright). From Paul's salvation-historical perspective such ethnocentrism is ruled out: God established the covenant with Israel in order to redeem all of humanity; the promise to Abraham included a blessing for the nations as well. Moreover, the covenant established faith as the principle of acceptance by God. The law served the interim purpose of defining and revealing sin, atoning for sin preliminarily through the sacrificial cult, and separating Israel from the surrounding nations and their immoral practices. Wright stresses the consequences of Israel's law-based ethnocentrism: although Israel was God's chosen instrument of blessing to the nations, it failed to fulfill this role and instead asserted superiority over them based on its privileges as the elect people. Christ had to assume Israel's role toward the nations and died to redeem Israel from the curse of the covenant incurred for unfaithfulness and return Israel from "exile," resulting in the renewal of the covenant and the fulfillment of God's promises to Israel and their extension to the Gentiles. Thereby Christ demonstrated the faithfulness of God in realizing the purpose of the covenant. Jewish Christ-believers who insisted that Gentiles be circumcised in addition to believing in Christ had fallen prey to the same ethnocentrism and misunderstanding of the law as other Jews: they assumed that race mattered for receiving the promised blessings, and failed to recognize that the law played an interim role that had come to an end in Christ.

Similarly, Boyarin argues that Paul confronts ethnocentrism based on the law with monotheistic universalism and in this way resolves a tension within Jewish tradition itself. Christ's (physical) death and (spiritual) resurrection represent the transcendence of universality (in spirit) over particularity (in the flesh), and thus the triumph of oneness and equality over division and inequality—attainable, however, only in a liminal state such as baptism.

For these interpreters the key question Paul is trying to answer is not how the individual can be saved—whether by works or by grace, as in the Lutheran paradigm—since Paul assumes agreement that salvation is by grace. Rather, the question is how to define the boundaries of the people of God, the terms of admission into the people of God. Did the old boundary markers drawn by the law remain valid? No, Paul is said to answer. Faith demarcates the people of God, as is now clear with the coming of Christ, indeed, as foretold in Abraham's righteousness by faith. Paul, in other words, reduces the works of the law to ethnic boundary markers. No believer who lacks such works qua identity markers is excluded from membership in God's universal people. Salvation is by grace through faith apart from the works of the law as identity markers of God's people, not as meritorious deeds that provide access to God's blessings. That is, salvation is ethnically undetermined. Grace is not restricted by race. For the people of God is (now) an entity comprised of different nations, not a Jewish people. The illusion that race matters is overcome. The Jewish sin of ethnocentrism is atoned for. Race-based division is replaced by faith-based unity, reflecting the oneness of God and attesting the faithfulness of God.

Yet some cracks in this reconstruction have appeared. Dunn admits that although the focus of Paul's polemics was the terms of membership in God's people and the extent of God's grace, the apostle also asserted, against his Jewish opponents, that faith rather than the works of the law is the sole means of sustaining the relationship to God—a key emphasis of the Lutheran Paul. Moreover, according to Longenecker, Paul found Jewish ethnocentrism problematic precisely because it underestimated the need for grace (p 575)(through an overly optimistic view of human beings under the law) and in this way was similar to legalism. Because Paul viewed existence in the “flesh” as bondage to sin, and obedience to the law as therefore always tainted by imperfection (cf. Rom. 7:7–25; Gal. 3:10, 21–22; 4:21–25; 5:16–18), he taught that redemption is through Christ apart from the works of the law, by grace alone, as a sovereign divine initiative. Cf. also Barclay's view that Paul's teaching on grace responds to a Judaism unduly wedded to human cultural and social values. As these scholars show, one can affirm both that grace played an important role in Judaism as such and that Paul himself construed grace and faith differently from many other Jews, not just formally but materially, namely, along the lines associated with the Lutheran Paul. Thus, while the NPP has contributed greatly to our understanding of the occasion for Paul's teaching on grace and law, faith and works—namely, pressure on Gentile Christ-believers to circumcise and identify with physical Israel—the NPP has not replaced, but in some important respects has supplemented, the old perspective.

It is precisely Paul's definition of grace as utterly gratuitous, working independently of, and in contrast to, present human identity and merit, that distinguishes Paul from rabbinic Judaism, argues Westerholm. Rabbinic Judaism correlated divine grace and human merit (e.g., the grace of election corresponds to Israel's acceptance of the covenant, in contrast to other nations' rejection of it). Rabbinic Judaism should therefore not be construed in terms of a grace/merit contrast, as in the designation “covenantal nomism” (getting in is by grace while staying in is by works). According to Westerholm, Sanders's reconstruction is an anachronistic reading of Judaism in terms of good Protestantism instead of its own terms. Rabbinic Judaism is more accurately characterized as “synergistic” and in some cases “legalistic” (Gundry)—Pauline value judgments aside. Indeed Scripture itself correlates human merit and final destiny: God placed Israel before the choice of obedience or disobedience, a choice that led to “life” or “death” (Lev. 26; Deut. 28–31; Thielman). Although a sense of failure to do one's part is attested in both Scripture and Jewish sources contemporary to Paul, and although Jewish apocalypticism (e.g., in Qumran) saw divine intervention as the only hope for God's people, Paul's awareness of total dependence on divine grace came to him through a revelation of Christ (Gal. 1:13–16) in which he experienced God's grace toward him as a persecutor of God's church (1 Cor. 15:9–10). Christ was revealed to him as the grace of God for offenders, to the exclusion of any role for their works, which were those of "sinners" (cf. Gal. 2:17). Hence Paul's apostolic mission to the uncircumcised (and so as such ill-deserving) and his polemics against the circumcised who still maintained that there was necessarily a positive correlation between divine grace and its human recipients.

In conclusion, Paul not only critiqued Jewish ethnocentrism and affirmed the universal extent of salvation—regardless of ethnicity—based on the covenant faithfulness of God and corresponding to God's oneness. Paul also asserted that grace is essential for individuals, not just communities, and is utterly gratuitous for Jews as well as Gentiles, and that faith accompanied by total non-self-regard is the only way of participating in such grace, not just a sign of membership. Paul's arguments about the law and sin support these claims. Even if his opponents themselves were no legalists, he explained that complete observance was the only option the law itself allowed and that it was a doomed one because of sin's dominion over those in the flesh (e.g., Rom. 2:17–3:20; Gal. 3:10–13; 5:1–5). Even the blameless lawkeeper—who also needed the law's provisions for atonement—found no definitive solution for sin through the law (as the universal reign of death over those "in Adam" attested, Rom. 5:12–21) and had to rely on "righteousness that comes from God" and "be found in him [Christ]," or transferred to the lordship of Christ in order to obtain "the prize for which God has called me heavenward," "the resurrection from the dead" (Phil. 3:4b–14). Whatever the gains of the NPP, it has obscured the key difference between Paul and many of his Jewish contemporaries which Luther captured: the nature of God's grace as utterly gratuitous, for sinners without any claim on it, and the crucified Christ as the demonstration of this (insulting) gift of grace.

Theologian of the Cross

Jesus's death (always in conjunction with his resurrection) is for Paul (in agreement with early Christian tradition) the central saving event (1 Cor. 15:3–8) and focus of preaching (1 Cor. 2:2). Precisely how that death and resurrection fulfilled such a crucial function and why it deserved such (p 576) a prominent role in Christian proclamation are matters of great importance for Paul. The cross is a theme on which he expatiates liberally. More than that, some have argued, it is the starting point for his theology.

The Cross, Justification of the Ungodly, and Revelation of God. Käsemann notes that Paul departs from received tradition by mentioning how Jesus died: on a cross, and thus utterly humiliated, cursed, and forsaken by God (1 Cor. 1:17; 2:2; 2 Cor. 13:4; Gal. 3:13). It follows that those for whom Jesus died are “the ungodly,” as the uniquely Pauline soteriological formulas state: “Christ died for the ungodly” (Rom. 5:6); God “justifies the ungodly” (Rom. 4:5). This is polemic against religious self-assertion before God (both legalistic piety and “enthusiasm”), according to Käsemann, whose own polemical intention is to refocus church theology and exegesis by means of the Reformation “theology of the cross” indebted to Paul’s teaching that the Son suffered and died on the cross for sinners and so reveals God as the One who loves and justifies the ungodly with faith (cf. Moltmann, Jüngel). For Käsemann, Paul’s theology is aptly described as a theology of the cross, and his theological center as justification by faith, or God’s victorious setting of a fallen world into right relation to God. This rules out a simple Christology of exaltation or a realized eschatology with no eschatological reservation, and rules in imitation of God’s love for the ungodly.

But, while striking some key notes in Paul’s theology, Käsemann excludes some important aspects of Pauline teaching on the death of Christ (Stuhlmacher).

The Death of Christ and Pauline Metaphors for Salvation. Paul positively cites early tradition on the atoning death of Christ: “Christ died for our sins” (the “dying formula,” 1 Cor. 15:3, etc.), “whom God put forward as a sacrifice of atonement [hilastērion] by his blood” (Rom. 3:25–26 NRSV). Hilastērion may denote “mercy seat” (where the blood of the sacrifice for sins was sprinkled and atonement was made) or means of atonement. Both imply that Christ’s death expiates, or removes, sins. Some argue that it is propitiatory, or averts divine wrath on account of sin. But since Paul explicitly states that Christ’s death demonstrates God’s love, providing assurance of future salvation from wrath (Rom. 5:8–9), propitiation would have to have the unusual sense of a divine (not human) act of love to avert divine wrath.

Death that atones for others’ sins belongs to the larger motif of beneficial death for others that was widespread in Paul’s milieu (for Greco-Roman and Jewish parallels, see Hengel). Paul can describe Christ’s death as a “righteous act/obedience” bringing “justification” and “life” to “all/many” (Rom. 5:17–19), as well as accomplishing atonement for sins: "... by his blood" (Rom. 5:9); "in my blood" (1 Cor. 11:25; cf. Eph. 1:7; 2:13; Col. 1:20); "God ... sending his own Son ... to be a sin offering [cf. Lev. 4 LXX]" (Rom. 8:3); the "surrender formulas," e.g., "delivered over to death for our sins" (Rom. 4:25; cf. Gal. 1:4; Eph 5:2); "Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed" (1 Cor. 5:7, implying atonement in the light of 11:24–25); "my body, which is for you" read together with "the new covenant in my blood" (1 Cor. 11:24–25). Other uses of the hyper-formula—Christ died "for" others (Rom. 5:6–8; 8:32; etc.)—are based on the words of institution. On Isa. 52:13–53:12 as background, see Janowski, ed.

What understanding of sacrificial atonement is presupposed in these interpretations of Christ's death? Gese explains that in postexilic times sacrificial atonement aimed at overcoming a completely forfeit life (due to sin) by bringing this life, represented in the shed blood, into contact (by application to the altar, or mercy seat on Yom Kippur) with the Holy One, who destroys all that is unholy and reconstitutes life as participation in God's glory. Differently, Finlan explains that the pure blood of the blameless sacrificial animal cancels the death charge of sins and purifies the people/temple (alternatively, the sin sacrifice is a tribute payment to a sovereign that liberates the offerers).

It is conceivable that Paul developed his important notion of participation "with Christ" (Rom. 6:3–8; Gal. 2:19–20; etc.) and being "in Christ" (passim) through reflection on Christ's death against such a cultic background. Gese argues that through the ritual of laying a hand on the sacrificial animal's head before slaughter, the offerer was identified with the animal so as to symbolize inclusion in its death as passage to new life in relation to God (depicted in the blood ritual). Sacrificial atonement supplies the notion of "inclusive substitution," which is crucial to Paul: Christ's death for sins includes sinners, who are co-crucified with him (Gal. 2:20) and so reconciled to God and made a "new creation" in him (2 Cor. 5:17; Hofius).

(p 577) Paul can also construe Christ's death as beneficial even though it is ignoble in that he died as a crucified criminal under the law's curse: "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us" (Gal. 3:13); "God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (2 Cor. 5:21). The benefit here occurs through an exchange and also has a cultic background, the annual scapegoat ritual, in which an innocent animal exchanged places with the sinful people. The scapegoat bore and removed the people's sin by being brutally victimized and sent out to die, and they assumed its status without sin. (Cf. the “objective” view of the atonement associated with Anselm: Jesus substituted for sinners and they escaped death.)

Paul’s cultic language and imagery are used metaphorically with respect to Christ’s death, which functions like a sin-sacrifice or scapegoat death. “Spiritualization” of literal cultic rituals (this occurred also outside early Christianity) reflects unease with the notion that they actually effect what they intend (Finlan). At best they supply a partial and preliminary solution to the problem of present sin-dominated existence, which must come to an end and be replaced by a new existence under God’s rule (cf. Barth: “Man could not be helped other than through his annihilation”). The full, end-time solution to sins/sin is supplied in an eschatological “new creation” through Christ. By his (inclusive) death “for all,” Paul says, “in Christ ... everything old has passed away; see, everything has become new!” (2 Cor. 5:17 NRSV). By this Paul means that believers “have died” (to sin as their master) and “no longer live for themselves but for [Christ],” “to God” in daily service to God/Christ (2 Cor. 5:14–15; Rom. 6:10–14; cf. 7:1–6). Paul’s so-called transfer-of-lordship motif is in service of his new creation motif. The “death” and “new life” won by Christ are appropriated individually in Christian baptism (Rom. 6:3–4). In Christ, not the cult, God’s grace works more powerfully than sin by effecting the end of the reign of sin and death over those in Adam and bringing about the new reign of righteousness and life for those in Christ, who have become a new humanity for all eternity (Rom. 5:12–21).

Paul also explains the salvific significance of Christ’s death metaphorically in terms of justification (acquittal in court, Rom. 3:24), liberation/redemption/purchase (manumission of slaves, with overtones of the exodus from Egypt, Rom. 3:24; 1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23; Gal. 3:13), adoption to become an heir (Gal. 4:5), reconciliation (sociopolitical language from Paul’s Greco-Roman milieu, which he links materially with OT atonement theology, Rom. 5:10–11; 2 Cor. 5:18–19; Eph. 2:16; Col. 1:20), new creation (a Jewish eschatological hope, 2 Cor. 5:17), and triumph (Col. 2:15). The economic metaphor (redemption/purchase) implies the “costliness” of Christ’s death both for God, who sends the beloved Son to death (Rom. 8:3, 32), and for Christ, who “became poor” (2 Cor. 8:9), “emptied himself” (Phil. 2:7 NRSV)—not a ransom payment to a particular individual (the devil, pace some classical interpretations).

Finally, Paul understands the cross as a divine-human act. Here God is seen demonstrating righteousness (i.e., moral rectitude and saving power congruent with God’s promises, Rom. 3:25–26) and love (Rom. 5:8), not sparing the Son (Rom. 8:3, 32), reconciling sinners and enemies to God (the converse of Greco-Roman reconciliation of the offended by the offenders; Rom. 5:10–11; 2 Cor. 5:19), and not counting transgressions (2 Cor. 5:19). Paul’s paralleling of God’s and Jesus’s actions in the cross is striking. Jesus “gave himself” (Gal. 1:4; 2:20), and God “gave him up” (Rom. 8:32); Jesus “loved me” (Gal. 2:20; cf. 2 Cor. 5:14), “sinners, lawbreakers” (Gal. 2:17–18), and God showed “love for us/sinners/enemies” (Rom. 5:8, 10). Jesus’s death on the cross is more than an act of obedience (Phil. 2:8); it enacts redemptive love of the kind that distinguishes God from human beings (Rom. 5:7 TNIV: “very rarely will anyone die for a righteous person ... but God demonstrates his own love”). Acceptance of this extraordinary revelation of God in the cross is enabled by the Spirit, without which it is deemed foolish (1 Cor. 2:6–16; cf. Rom. 5:5). Imitation through love for the “weak” attests genuine discernment of this divine love (1 Cor. 8:1–13; 11:27–34). Cf. the “subjective” view of the atonement associated with Abelard and represented by liberal nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century theology: divine love displayed in the death of Christ effects repentance and responsive love.

Is there a dominant soteriological model in Paul? A juridical model (“justify,” “condemn”) is prominent in Galatians and Romans (see also (p 578)Philippians), polemicizing against the works of the law for justification—but not elsewhere. A participationist model (“with Christ”/“in Christ”) has been thought more characteristic of Paul’s corpus. Yet his untidy blending of soteriological concepts—for example, Gal. 2:16–21 blends juridical with participationist models, and 2 Cor. 5:14–21 blends these with cultic, reconciliation and new creation models—suggests he treats them as interconnected and complementary. He may highlight one or the other, depending on the context. Thus we should probably not take “justification by faith” as merely forensic, that is, “reckoned” or declarative (the common understanding in Protestant orthodoxy through Melancthon’s influence). Rather, by virtue of believers’ relationship with Christ through the Spirit (cf. Rom. 8:9–11; 2 Cor. 3:16–18), we ought to allow for a broader sense of “righteousness by faith” with ethical or ontological connotations. Correspondingly, Luther could speak either of believers’ “alien righteousness” or their sanctification through the operation of God’s grace in Christ.

Theologian of the New Creation

When Paul received his “revelation of Christ” or Christophany on the road to Damascus, he concluded that despite Jesus’s shameful crucifixion he was God’s Messiah, and by raising him from the dead God had initiated the eschatological resurrection of the dead (Gal.

1:12, 16, 23): Christ is “the firstfruits of those who have fallen asleep” (1 Cor. 15:20). Other eschatological hopes were also coming to fulfillment: the gift of the Spirit to all (Gal 3:14; cf. Joel 2:28–29) and the Gentiles’ thronging to faith in the one true God (Rom. 11:11–12, 25; 1 Thess. 1:9). Thus Paul writes, “on [us] the ends of the ages have come” (1 Cor. 10:11) and “if anyone is in Christ, there is a new creation,” for “everything old has passed away; see, everything has become new” (2 Cor. 5:17 NRSV; cf. Gal. 4:4; 6:15). Of course, he had to account for the many inconcinnities: the Messiah’s death and resurrection, his heavenly rather than earthly rule, his rejection by most Jews, the non-necessity of circumcision for Gentiles, etc. Still, Paul is sure that future hopes have become present realities in Christ, and this conviction suffuses his thought. In short, he is a “theologian of the new creation.”

Paul’s sense of present eschatological fulfillment is paired with that of imminent completion. The parousia, last judgment, resurrection of the dead and eternal life are expected soon in 1 Corinthians (7:29; 10:11; 16:22) and 1 Thessalonians (4:13–17; 5:4–10). Later, as a prisoner, he envisions the possibility of his prior martyr death in Philippians (1:20–23). Yet he still pens the words, “the Lord is near” (Phil. 4:5), referring to an “imminent” parousia. It is not the case, therefore, that Paul’s eschatology undergoes spiritualization or dehistoricization, e.g., as expressed in the language of present union with Christ (pace Dodd, Bultmann). Union with Christ through the indwelling Spirit of Christ enables new life ethically in the present body, and so anticipates its future transformation into a “spiritual,” imperishable body (Rom. 8:2–11; 1 Cor. 15:44–49; Gal. 4:6; 5:16–26). Paul can speak of being with Christ immediately after death (2 Cor. 5:6–8; Phil. 1:23) while still affirming future, bodily resurrection (Rom. 8:11, 23; 2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:13–14; Phil. 3:11, 20–21). Colossians and Ephesians, on the other hand, speak of believers as already “raised with [Christ]” and “seated ... with him in the heavenly realms” (Col. 2:12–13; 3:1; Eph. 2:5–6)—one of the reasons for questioning their Pauline authorship. Yet they do not erase future eschatology (see Eph. 6:13–17; Col. 3:4, 6, 24; cf. Eph. 1:13–14). In sum, Paul stresses both present fulfillment and future completion of eschatological hope, with some variance in detail between the letters, possibly pointing to a developing eschatology.

Paul’s eschatology cannot be understood apart from Jewish apocalypticism, which Käsemann declared the mother of early Christian theology. Paul shares the Jewish apocalyptic view of the necessity and urgency of divine intervention to wrest control of the world from evil and restore creation under God’s sovereignty, marking the end of the present age and the beginning of a new age of blessing for God's people. But what the Jewish apocalypticist hoped for the future, Paul claimed to have taken place in Christ. Thus those in Christ are "no longer" enslaved to sin but "now" free from condemnation (Rom. 6:6; 8:1; etc.). For Beker, Paul has redefined Jewish apocalypticism through Christology: Christ's death and resurrection are the final triumph of God over sin and death. And this apocalyptic interpretation of the Christ-event, according to Beker, constitutes the coherent core of Paul's thought. Each letter is a contingent expression (p 579) of this interpretation, though the victory motif is not always explicit (e.g., Galatians, see Martyn). Paul is no Hellenizer of originally Jewish apocalyptic ideas (as the once dominant History of Religions School claimed) but himself an apocalyptic theologian. In this regard, it is important to see Paul's letters as a source for first century Judaism (Segal). At the same time, Paul drew on Hellenistic religious and philosophical traditions to communicate his gospel to a primarily Gentile audience familiar with such traditions (Malherbe et al.)—not surprisingly, since, as much recent scholarship has shown, the boundaries between Judaism and Hellenism of Paul's day were porous.

Despite Paul's stress on newness in Christ, he also affirms the continuity between the Christ-event and God's past dealings with Israel. Christ's death and resurrection are the "climax of the covenant" (Wright), the culmination in a series of divine saving initiatives beginning with the election of Israel, and thus the finale in the "sacred story" embedded in Paul's letters (Hays, Wright, Longenecker). Paul's use of Scripture through quotations and allusions emphasizes the connection between the gospel and Christ-believers, on the one hand, and the past saving initiatives of God and those who received them in faith, on the other (Hays). Through Christ Gentiles have become monotheists, participants in the holy "root" together with Jews, and now should live in conformity to God's will (Rom. 9–11; 1 Cor. 1:10–31; 10:1–13; Gal. 2:11–14; Eph. 2:11–22; 1 Thess. 4:3–12) rather than as a separate community apart from the doctrinal and moral impulses of OT-Jewish tradition. How Scripture functions for Paul as theologian is a matter for debate: is it the source of his theology (Watson) or does it shed light on the revelation of Christ (Kim)?

Some have argued that when Paul's converts overemphasized the new (as a result of the powerful experience of the Spirit) Paul tried to curb "enthusiasm" by stressing the "not yet" of salvation and discouraging social change, in the belief that the form of this world was soon to pass away. For example, he advises would-be celibates to have sex with their spouses or marry rather than “burn,” and male and female pneumatics to wear gender-specific headdress when they pray and prophesy (1 Cor. 7:2–7; 11:5–7). This has been taken as a retreat from the egalitarianism of the (probably) baptismal tradition in Gal. 3:28 NRSV that in Christ “there is no longer Jew or Greek, ... slave or free, ... male and female” (Wire). During the overlap of the ages, believers have to endure the conditions of the old as they live out the new life in Christ.

Yet Paul accepts social change when it is based on the gifts of the Spirit: celibacy based on a spiritual gift (1 Cor. 7:7), women’s leadership roles in his churches (Rom. 16; Phil. 4:2), and God’s giving greater honor (more prominent gifts) to the less seemly parts of the body of Christ (1 Cor. 11:18–31). What then does Paul rule out? Immorality by those who lack the Spirit’s power to resist Satan’s temptation (1 Cor. 7:5, 9). Shame incurred by ignoring the distinction between male and female headdress (1 Cor. 11:4–15). Not new social roles but behavior typical of the old age. He may tap Genesis for arguments against shameful behavior (1 Cor. 11:7–9), but he defends mutuality between man and woman “in the Lord” on the basis of his Christian understanding of the Creator’s intention (1 Cor. 11:11–12; Gundry-Volf, 1997). Paul calls for greater, authentic eschatological newness based on the Spirit’s activity, both individually and corporately, and rejects a “spirituality” which only perpetuates the old order (cf. Rom. 12:2; 1 Cor. 3:1–4; 2 Cor. 5:16; Gal. 3:3; Phil. 3:7–8). (Contrast 1 Tim. 2:11–15, where women are prohibited from teaching or exercising authority over men based on the created order apart from a realized eschatological perspective). Early twentieth-century Pentecostalism and its offshoots—which have emphasized charism-based roles in the body of Christ—reflect Paul’s intention.

Empowered by various social forces, the ascetic tradition continued in early Christianity influenced by Paul and armed with his own commendation of celibacy as superior, in the light of the present crisis (1 Cor. 7:26). In Col. 2:18, 21–22 and 1 Tim. 4:1–3 we find evidence of ascetic regulations concerning sex, diet, and wealth, which Colossians opposes as “a shadow of the things that were to come” in contrast to “the reality ... found in Christ” (consistently with Paul’s critique of under-realized eschatology; Col. 2:16–23), and which 1 Timothy opposes on creational (not eschatological) grounds (1 Tim. 4:4–5). The second century CE produced the ascetic follower of Paul, Marcion, and the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla, where Paul (p 580) plays the role of saving the virgin Thecla from the fate of marriage. Against Encratite Christianity’s advocacy of an ascetic ethic, the second-fourth-century CE heresiologists argued from Paul's own letters that celibacy is a special grace given to some and marriage is good for others, to satisfy sexual desire and for procreation (despite the fact that Paul himself fails to make the latter argument).

Conclusion. The theological interpretation of Paul's letters spans a variety of periods and circumstances that themselves influence interpreters' grasp of Paul's theological views and emphases. It can be argued that interpreters who have stood within contexts comparable to Paul's have articulated most clearly or persuasively the apostle's distinctive and central theological positions: the centrality of the cross for understanding God, the centrality of Christ for understanding divine grace, the sufficiency of faith for participation in grace, and the eschatological character of God's action in Christ transforming individuals, communities, and all of creation according to the promises of God now coming to fulfillment through the power of the Spirit.

The theological contours, focus, and unity of Paul's letters will doubtless continue to be debated, given the complexity of Paul's thought and difficulty of the issues he raises (cf. 2 Pet. 3:15–16). This discussion stands to be enriched by the fruits of newer methods (including the study of social history and ancient rhetoric; cf. Lampe's proposal of a multi-dimensional interpretation of texts).

Bibliography

Barclay, J. Obeying the Truth. Fortress, 1991; Barth, K. The Epistle to the Romans, trans. E. Hoskyns. Oxford University Press, 1933; Beker, J. C. Paul the Apostle. Fortress, 1984; Boyarin, D. A Radical Jew. University of California Press, 1994; Bultmann, R. Theology of the New Testament. 2 vols. Charles Scribner's Sons, 1951–55; idem. Kerygma und Mythos Vol. 1. Herbert-Reich Evangelischer Verlag, 1960; Carson, D. A., P. O'Brien, and M. Seifrid, eds. Justification and Variegated Nomism. 2 vols. Mohr/Siebeck/Baker Academic, 2001, 2004; Cousar, C. B. A Theology of the Cross. Fortress, 1990; Dunn, J. D. G. The Theology of Paul the Apostle. Eerdmans, 1998; Finlan, S. The Background and Content of Paul's Cultic Atonement Metaphors. Society of Biblical Literature, 2004; Gese, H. Essays on Biblical Theology, trans. K. Crim. Augsburg, 1981; Gundry, R. H. "The Inferiority of the New Perspective on Paul," The Old is Better (Mohr/Siebeck, 2005) 195–224; Gundry-Volf, J. Paul and Perseverance: Staying in and Falling Away. Mohr/Siebeck, 1990; idem. "Gender and Creation in 1 Corinthians 11:2–16. A Study in Paul's Theological Method." In Evangelium, Schriftauslegung, Kirche, ed. J. Adna et al. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997, 151–71; Hays, R. Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul. Yale University Press, 1989; Hengel, M. The Cross of the Son of God, trans. J. Bowden. SCM, 1986; Hofius, O. Paulusstudien. Mohr/Siebeck, 1989; idem. Paulusstudien II. Mohr/Siebeck, 2002; Janowski, B., et al. The Suffering Servant, trans. D. Bailey. Eerdmans, 2004; Jüngel, E. God as the Mystery of the World, trans. D. L. Guder. Eerdmans, 1983; Käsemann, E. Perspectives on Paul, trans. M. Kohl. Fortress, 1971; Keck, L. Paul and His Letters. 2d ed. Fortress, 1988; Kim, S. The Origin of Paul's Gospel. 2d ed. Mohr/Siebeck, 1984; idem. Paul and the New Perspective. Eerdmans, 2002; Lampe, P. From Paul to Valentinus, trans. M. Steinhauser. Augsburg/Fortress, 2003; Longenecker, B. The Triumph of Abraham's God. Abingdon, 1998; idem, ed. Narrative Perspectives on the Pauline Gospel. Westminster John Knox, 2002; Malherbe, A. Paul and the Thessalonians. Fortress, 1987; Martyn, J. L. Theological Issues in the Letters of Paul. Abingdon, 1997; idem. Galatians. Doubleday, 1998; Meeks, W., ed. The Writings of St. Paul. Norton, 1972; Moltmann, J. The Crucified God, trans. R. A. Wilson and J. Bowden. Harper & Row, 1974; Montefiore, C. G. Judaism and St. Paul. Max Goschen, 1914; Räisänen, H. Paul and the Law. Fortress, 1986; Sanders, E. P. Paul and Palestinian Judaism. Fortress, 1977; idem. Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People. Fortress, 1983; Schnelle, U. Apostle Paul, trans. M. E. Boring. Baker, 2005; Schoeps, H. J. Paul. Westminster, 1961; Schweitzer, A. The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle, trans. W. Montgomery. Seabury, 1931; Segal, A. Paul the Convert. Yale University Press, 1990; Stendahl, K. Paul among Jews and Gentiles. Fortress, 1976; Stuhlmacher, P. Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments. Vol. 1. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1999; Thielman, F. Paul and the Law. InterVarsity, 1994; Watson, F. Paul and the Hermeneutics of Faith. T&T Clark, 2004; Westerholm, S. Perspectives Old and New on Paul. Eerdmans, 2004; Wrede, W. Paul, trans. E. Lummis. American Unitarian Association, 1962; Wright, N. T. The Climax of the Covenant. Fortress, 1993.

Judith Gundry-Volf

Peace See Violence

Pentecostal Biblical Interpretation See Charismatic Biblical Interpretation

People of God See Church, Doctrine of the; Israel

Performance See Dialogism; Music, the Bible and; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

Perlocutionary Act See Speech-Act Theory

(p 581)Perseverance of the Saints See Apostasy; Assurance; Sanctification

Pesher See Jewish Exegesis

1 Peter, Book of

The First Epistle of Peter purports to be a letter from the apostle Peter to scattered Christians in Asia Minor, who are suffering for the name of Christ. Peter writes to remind them of their redemption through the death of Christ, their living hope through his resurrection, and their new status as God's own people. He encourages them to follow Christ's example and to maintain love for one another and good conduct toward outsiders. Most modern and postmodern commentators have challenged this picture, while some have continued to adhere to it in some form. Theological interpretation may offer a way through this interpretative impasse.

Recent Interpretation

Around the middle of the twentieth century, two important commentaries appeared that set the terms for subsequent interpretation of 1 Peter. E. G. Selwyn's commentary, with extensive additional notes, argued that the apostle Peter authored the letter, with Silvanus (5:12) as the amanuensis. Numerous similarities with other NT documents in catechetical and paraenetic material were presented as evidence that the letter represented mainstream apostolic Christianity at its formative period. For Selwyn, the likely situation that called forth the letter was the fire in Rome and the ensuing persecution of Christians by Nero (63–64 CE).

F. W. Beare, on the other hand, argued that the background to the letter is to be found in the situation described by Pliny the Younger, governor of Bithynia in 112, who wrote to the emperor Trajan about the policy of the empire concerning Christians. Beare saw the letter as a literary fiction, written in the name of the apostle to scattered subapostolic churches in Asia Minor. Beare's thorough textual, lexical, and background studies added weight to his arguments. Subsequent study has lined up behind one or the other, with the majority of commentators positing a pseudepigraphical work written toward the end of the first century (Goppelt; Michaels; Achtemeier; Elliott). Even J. H. Elliott's recent landmark commentary (AB), which posits a date between 73 and 90, does not offer a way beyond the stalemate.

Recent Studies

Compared to the Gospels and the Pauline Letters, 1 Peter has suffered relative neglect. Only a few important commentaries and studies have appeared since 1950. In the last half-century, studies in 1 Peter have demonstrated both the necessity and the opportunity for theological interpretation.

F. L. Cross. Cross argued that 1 Pet. 1:3–4:11 constituted the celebrant’s portion of a baptismal rite, and that the actual initiation takes place after 1:21. Cross’s view has not been widely accepted, due to forced exegesis and examples drawn from a later date (e.g., the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus). But his focus on the theme of exodus and Passover as a major emphasis in the letter has not been sufficiently explored. The paschal references in 1 Pet. 1 need to be placed in the context of developing Jewish exegesis of this most important text (Exod. 12) and event in the story of God’s people.

J. H. Elliott. Chief among contributors to the study of 1 Peter has been J. H. Elliott. Elliott’s The Elect and the Holy examines the term “royal priesthood” or “a kingdom of priests” (2:9, citing Exod. 19:6). Elliott concludes that the expression refers not to believers as individual priests, but only to the believing community as community. If Elliott’s exegesis and conclusions are sound, 1 Pet. 2 may not be used to support the notion of a priesthood of all believers. However, to insist on a corporate interpretation to the exclusion of an individual one is to miss a narrative element of fundamental importance. No OT passage is more formative for the narrative theology of 1 Peter than Ps. 34. A long quotation from the psalm occurs in 1 Pet. 3, and there are a number of allusions. A citation from Ps. 34:8 immediately precedes the relevant section (2:4–10). A curious and instructive feature of this psalm (and others, notably 130, 22, 69) is the interplay of the individual and the community (Ps. 34:1 “I will bless ...”; v. 3 “Let us exalt ...”). The individual righteous sufferer who cries to God for help finds that he or she is not alone. In the narrative movement of Ps. 34, both the individual and the community are distinctive and important. Both are in focus in the story told by the author of 1 Peter, who has meditated deeply on Ps. 34.

The last two decades of the twentieth century have witnessed the rise of social-scientific study of the NT. A pioneering study in 1 Peter has been Elliott’s A Home for the Homeless. He applies new insights from sociology to the letter, contending (p 582) that the recipients’ strangerhood, their condition of estrangement and alienation, remains social rather than cosmological. Their predicament as “resident aliens and visiting strangers” is contrasted not to having a home in heaven, but to having a home within the Christian community. The reference is more sociological than theological. The trials refer not so much to official persecutions from Rome, but more to local ostracism and pressure due to their strangeness as a new social group. Still, there are important grounds for retaining the NRSV translation “exiles” rather than Elliott’s “strangers” in 1:1. N. T. Wright has argued persuasively that the exile is a governing element in the metanarrative all Jewish groups shared in the NT era. The story of deliverance from exile, informed as that story itself is by the foundation of the exodus, is the theological backdrop of the Christian claim that through the death and resurrection of Jesus, Christians have been delivered from bondage into freedom. For early Christians, and especially the writer and recipients of 1 Peter, that deliverance was articulated in terms of Scriptures like Pss. 34 and 39 (v. 12, cited in 1 Pet. 2:11) and Isa. 52–53. Not only the language but also the logic of these passages shaped the theology of the letter. Thus, we must look to its varied use of the OT for an indication of its metanarrative and theology.

W. J. Dalton. Dalton's important monograph, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits, argues that Christ's journey to "preach to the spirits in prison" (3:19) refers not to his "descent into hell," which has been a common assumption from patristic times onward, but to Christ's ascension. During his ascension Christ proclaimed triumph over the rebellious angels, imprisoned in the third heaven of intertestamental Jewish cosmology. Dalton's view has found wide acceptance among commentators. The ascension is certainly fundamental to the whole passage (3:18–22); verse 22 says that Jesus Christ "has gone into heaven, and is at the right hand of God, with angels, authorities, and powers made subject to him" (NRSV). Dalton rightly notes that the influence of Ps. 110:1 is paramount, but he does not develop this line. Psalm 110:1, the most frequently cited OT text in the NT, is probably a conscious echo in 3:22 and fundamental to the theology and ethics of the letter. The same word for the subjection of hostile powers is used to urge slaves and wives to submit, in the household codes. Further study along this line would be fruitful for understanding the theology and ethics of the letter, and elsewhere in the NT.

L. Goppelt. In his commentary, Goppelt, like Elliott, pioneered a social-scientific approach. Surveying the household codes in their cultural setting, he concluded that they represent not the application of an OT and Jewish tradition, but the reworking of a Hellenistic ethos on the basis of principles developed by Jesus and Paul. But such a claim fails to reckon with the theological reflection on Scripture in 1 Peter. The ideas of good behavior are drawn directly from Scriptures like Ps. 34 and Prov. 3. Psalm 34:14 may even have contributed to the unique vocabulary of 1 Peter. His NT hapax legomenon for doing good (agathopoia), is probably his own coinage, resulting from meditation on Ps. 34.

D. L. Balch. Balch studied the domestic codes in 1 Peter in the context of attitudes toward husbands and wives in Greco-Roman culture and Hellenistic Judaism. His work, however, does not take sufficient account of the importance of the OT and its interpretation (despite his references to Philo) as the primary influence on the thought and shape of 1 Peter. His Scripture index does not even list Isa. 3:18–24 (as do most commentaries). Epictetus or Seneca may indeed have influenced the argument, but how much more the OT! So with Gen. 18:12 cited at 3:6. Hardly a proof text, this echo may offer some new clues to the background of the letter.

W. L. Schutter. Schutter's Hermeneutic and Composition in 1 Peter takes an important step forward. His sustained attention to the hermeneutical presuppositions, methods, techniques, and assumptions in the letter's use of the OT points the way for further study. Especially valuable is Schutter's focus on the OT as a formative influence. The section 1:13–2:10 he takes as a "homiletic midrash," and he offers several parallels from Philo and rabbinic literature for comparison. A sustained study of the use of the OT in 1 Peter, following the lines laid out by Schutter, is certainly needed, and it is likely from this direction that the most valuable work on 1 Peter will emerge in the future.

Theology and OT Hermeneutics

A thorough study of the use of the OT in 1 Peter will concentrate on at least the following five areas:

Form. Careful attention must be paid to places where the text form of the OT citations differs from the MT or LXX. The differences, sometimes slight, have been explained as stylistic, use of a different version, quotation from memory, or targumizing. A special focus on the textual variations (p 583) within quotations should prove fruitful, especially where the change may be theologically motivated (e.g., 3:14–15 using Isa. 8:12–13; did 1 Peter write "God" or "Christ"?). The reading Christos at 2:3 in Papyrus 72 may reflect an important interpretative tradition.

Introduction. First Peter contains both OT texts introduced with a formula (1:16; 2:6) and also passages without them (1:24–25, citing Isa. 40; 3:10–12, citing Ps. 34; 2:21–25, citing Isa. 53). The presence or absence of an introductory formula may indicate the degree of familiarity of writer and readers with the OT and something about background. A study of the formulas, or their absence, would indicate that both writer and recipients were more Jewish than is usually allowed. The echoes of Scripture abound in 1 Peter, and fragments of the OT have been woven artfully into the literary framework. In identifying echoes the interpreter will benefit from applying the criteria developed by R. Hays, which include availability, volume, recurrence, satisfaction, and thematic coherence.

Selection. Listed together, the OT texts in 1 Peter appear as a random selection of quotations. Is there any discernible logic to their selection? Here greater attention is needed to the purpose of 1 Peter as a treatise intended to encourage God's people undergoing persecution for their faith. Special attention to 4 Macc. 18:10–19 (a Jewish persecution document that features both Ps. 34 and Prov. 3) will prove fruitful. This passage holds a number of keys to understanding the letter. In addition, the exegete will ask why several verses were cited from Ps. 34, but surprisingly not 34:20: “He keeps all their bones; not one of them will be broken” (NRSV).

Application. Some OT texts used in 1 Peter are found elsewhere in the NT, where they are applied to other features of the Christian story. For example, phrases from Isa. 53 are employed in 1 Pet. 2:18–25 to encourage Christians to follow the example of Jesus' patient endurance of suffering. Both in 1 Peter and elsewhere in the NT, the passage is applied to the death of Christ and to his healing ministry.

History. OT texts in 1 Peter should be studied in the context of the developing exegesis in the Judaism of the period. Isaiah 28:16, for example, is combined with Isa. 8:14 by both 1 Peter and Paul (1 Pet. 2:3–10; Rom. 9:32–33). But the text has a developed exegetical history before its use by NT writers. It is found in the Qumran texts (1QS 8.7). So 1 Peter is participating in a developed exegetical tradition. This will also be true in the case of the allusions to Exod. 12 (and the probable allusion to Gen. 22 at 1:20).

Function. Often the OT is assumed to play a supportive or confirming role for the argument of 1 Peter. Texts are brought in, it is argued, as “proof texts.” However, careful study demonstrates that the OT has had a much more creative role in the theology of the letter. For 1 Peter, Scripture is not so much plundered as pondered. This proves to be as true for the quotations as for the allusions and echoes of the OT. Elliott has noted the “important and creative role” of Isa. 52–53 for the theology of the letter. Commenting on 2:18–25, Elliott writes, “In its fusion of biblical themes and motifs, kerygmatic formulas, and extensive use of Isaiah 52–53 this passage illustrates both an independence from Pauline thought and a theological formulation that is as creative as it is singular in the NT” (1 Peter, 504).

Elliott has called 1 Peter an “exegetical stepchild.” Perhaps its relative neglect can now work to its advantage. Sustained study of 1 Peter will bring fresh theological and practical perspective to a discipline that has concentrated primarily on the Gospels and Pauline writings. The letter, which contains more OT relative to its size than any other NT document, except perhaps Revelation, may have much to contribute at a time of renewed interest in the theological interpretation of Scripture.

See also Social-Scientific Criticism

Bibliography

Achtemeier, P. 1 Peter. Hermeneia. Fortress, 1996; Balch, D. L. Let Wives Be Submissive. SBLMS 26. Scholars Press, 1981; Beare, F. W. The First Epistle of Peter. 3d ed. Blackwell, 1970; Cross, F. L. 1 Peter. Mowbray, 1954; Dalton, W. J. Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits. 2d ed. Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1989; Elliott, J. The Elect and the Holy. NovTSup 12. Brill, 1966; idem. 1 Peter. AB 37B. Doubleday, 2000; idem. A Home for the Homeless. Fortress, 1981; Goppelt, L. A Commentary on 1 Peter, ed. F. Hahn. Eerdmans, 1993; Hays, R. Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul. Yale University Press, 1989; Michaels, J. R. 1 Peter. WBC. Word, 1988; Schutter, W. L. Hermeneutic and Composition in 1 Peter. WUNT 2.30. Mohr/Siebeck, 1989; Selwyn, E. G. The First Epistle of Peter. 2d ed. Macmillan, 1947; Wright, N. T. The New Testament and the People of God. Fortress, 1992.

Peter R. Rodgers

2 Peter, Book of

Often seen as one of the “ugly stepchildren” of the NT, 2 Peter has suffered neglect in the modern period. However, 2 Peter makes a significant contribution (p 584) to help us understand the relationship of eschatology and ethics, and recognize the enculturation of the Christian message in a different culture than the one in which it arose.

History of Interpretation

Second Peter has had a mixed reception in the church. Origen, the first expressly to cite it, had his doubts about the work, as did Eusebius, who said that the church in the East did not consider it canonical. As late as the end of the fourth century, Didymus of Alexandria could cite it as a forgery. On the other hand, it is clear that the work was circulating by the mid-second century, and it does appear along with 1 Peter in the Bodmer papyri. More importantly, not only did Jerome defend it, but also a number of the later church fathers used it, including Chrysostom, Augustine, Hilary of Arles, and Bede. However, for the most part these are brief citations, mined in the service of the teaching or controversies of the time. Martin Luther likewise quoted from the work, and Calvin, as usual, wrote a commentary on it, but for both men Paul was central and 2 Peter of peripheral interest. After the rise of biblical criticism, 2 Peter fell even more out of favor, because the work was viewed as early catholic and because of a rejection of its apocalyptic eschatology. Only in the last two decades of the twentieth century did 2 Peter come into its own as scholars began to appreciate its rhetoric and its theological contribution.

The Message of 2 Peter

The concern of 2 Peter is with licentious teaching that has arisen within certain house churches in one or more city churches of the Christian movement. This licentiousness was being supported by a denial of the parousia and the concomitant final judgment. Ethics and eschatology were going hand in hand negatively. It is also likely that they were using Paul's doctrine of grace to support their licentiousness, claiming that freedom from the law means freedom to break moral boundaries.

Second Peter points out, first, that when called by God to know him, one is freed from the power of desire and made a (p 585) participant in the divine nature, which should work itself out in increasing virtue. This confirms election and makes one's eschatological hope secure.

Second, the parousia is a secure doctrine in that its prophetic announcement has been confirmed by the proleptic vision given in the transfiguration. Any claim that delay indicates nonreality is negated by the evidence of the flood, where there was also delay before judgment, and an appropriate knowledge of God's nature. His view of time and therefore his patience are not the same as the finite human view of time or human patience. God is patiently waiting, because it is his will that everyone be saved (3:9; yet 2 Peter clearly implies that God will not realize this desire). The end will come, the world will be destroyed, the judgment will happen, and a new and totally righteous heavens and earth will be created (3:10, 12–13). This eschatological hope should motivate believers to moral earnestness (3:11).

The teachers of licentiousness, however, are apostates, for by their pursuit of sex, money, and power they have rejected the teaching of the very Master who bought them. Their doom is sure, as numerous OT examples show. In fact, it would have been better for them never to have been freed by Christ, for having experienced the freedom from desire referred to at the beginning of the letter, they have turned back and have become reenslaved, their last state being therefore worse than their pre-Christian state.

Second Peter and the Canon

Second Peter demonstrates conscious intertextuality within the NT. First, the author is aware of more than one of Paul's letters, which he classes with the "other scriptures" (likely including Pseudepigrapha and early Gospels as well as the canonical OT), demonstrating that Paul's writings have become influential in the church among both the “orthodox” and the “unorthodox.” Second, 2 Pet. 2 incorporates most of Jude, but does so by editing the work so as to remove explicit references to the Pseudepigrapha (but not the content drawn from those references, for example, the imprisonment of the fallen angels of Gen. 6) and by expanding some of the other narratives. Thus 2 Peter shows both canon formation and intracanonial interpretation, although both are happening before there is a developed canon consciousness.

Second Peter also witnesses to intertextuality between NT and OT writers. That is, it shows the nascent Christian movement interpreting and applying the Hebrew Scriptures and largely doing so through the lens of Second Temple Jewish tradition, traditions we know from apocalyptic works like 1 Enoch and Jubilees.

The writer’s contribution to canonical teaching is largely twofold. First, he explains the nature of the final judgment in different images from those found elsewhere. Second, he explains the idea of salvation as release from control by desire and a participation in the divine nature, which enables virtue. Despite its origin in the call of God, this release is apparently conditional, for one can turn from it and return under the control of desire. This complements teaching found in Paul.

Finally, 2 Peter reveals an early Christian translating received theological concepts into a Greek cultural context, which complements the more non-Hellenistic Jewish conceptual world of works such as Matthew and James.

Theological Significance of 2 Peter

Second Peter underlines the position found in James and Paul that traces the roots of the human predicament to desire. But given the Hellenistic tone of 2 Peter, one suspects that desire has shifted from the Jewish yetser (inclination) of the other two writers, which is evil only in that it has no boundaries, to the rejection of desire per se, as found in the Hellenistic world.

God is viewed as good and gracious, so he rescues believers through his promises, by which he makes them participate in the divine nature; this new nature makes human beings now capable of moral growth, since they are freed from the power of desire.

Such freedom is, however, conditional, for if someone fails in moral growth, which would confirm their election by God, he or she may stumble; that is precisely what the teachers 2 Peter condemns have done. Despite having once enjoyed the same freedom and cleansing from sin that the majority in the church still enjoy, these people have turned back to sin and are in a worse state than they were before they got to know Jesus. This conditionality is reminiscent of Hebrews and some teaching of Jesus.

Second Peter's author contributes to a high Christology with his reference to "our God and Savior Jesus Christ" (1:1), although for the most part he refers to Jesus as Lord, as in the parallel expression "our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (twice: 1:11; 2:20). This authority of Christ is underlined by his use of "Master," a term that in the NT outside of the Haustafeln (household codes) normally refers to God, but that 2 Peter follows Jude in referring to Jesus. While this "Master ... bought" believers (including the apostate teachers; 2:1 NRSV), the atonement is not otherwise referred to, showing that it was possible in the early church to speak about rescue and redemption without direct reference to the crucifixion.

While the focus of 2 Peter is avoidance of the licentiousness that Peter attributes to the teachers he opposes, his argument revolves around eschatology. Although parousia delay (Christ not returning during the first generation of Christians) is not the main issue, the teachers were using this delay as evidence that there was no final judgment and thus actions done in this world did not have a recompense in the coming one. Second Peter discusses the apparent delay in terms of God's patience. While God does not entirely have his purpose fulfilled (it is clear to 2 Peter that at least the apostate teachers are going to hell), his will is that no one should perish, but that all come to salvation (3:9). Furthermore, picking up on a theme found repeatedly in the OT, 2 Peter observes that God's sense of time is not equivalent to the human perception. The end will come, it will come unexpectedly (like a thief), and when it comes the world will be destroyed by fire. The elements themselves will melt (one cannot be sure whether the elements are earth, air, fire, and water, or whether, like Democritus, he thought in terms of some type of atoms). In this process all hidden things will be revealed: nothing will be shielded from judgment. Some, like the teachers 2 Peter refers to, will go to destruction (the nature of this state is not discussed), while the righteous will receive the new heavens and earth. Because nothing in this world is lasting, it therefore makes sense for the believers to live for the coming age and its values. Eschatology determines ethics.

It should be noted that in 2 Peter there is no reference to an intermediate period between the destruction of the world by fire that ends this age, and the establishment of the age to come. Thus, unlike Revelation, he has no millennium (however one interprets that symbol). His focus is on the destruction of this world (which the teachers apparently think is eternal) and the coming of the new.

Significant is the virtual absence of pneumatology in 2 Peter. While believing human beings participate or share in the divine nature, neither this nor the sanctification that it enables is attributed to the Spirit. The Spirit is mentioned, however, when 2 Peter mentions prophecy. In 2 Peter prophecy is probably OT prophecy, so long as one includes 1 Enoch and other similar literature along with the canonical OT (since 2 Peter accepts the content that Jude derives from 1 Enoch). This prophecy is the product of the Holy Spirit rather than human will, and thus it must be interpreted accordingly, which perhaps indicates that 2 Peter does believe that the Spirit is present in the teaching of the church. What is clear is that his other source of authority is (p 586) the teaching of Jesus and his apostles, including the church's witness to the life of Jesus. There is no evidence in 2 Peter that he knows written Gospels, but it is clear that he knows of several Pauline letters. These he groups with "the other writings," which is a term that 2 Peter uses for the writings that we call the OT (understanding that he likely includes other books that we would not include in this category). These writings, including Paul, are a means of revelation, but they can be twisted (the specific reference is probably to Paul's teaching on grace and freedom from the law), resulting in the destruction of those who do so, not because they twist the meaning of Scripture, but because this twisted meaning leads to behavior that destroys them.

Bibliography

Bauckham, R. Jude, 2 Peter. WBC 50. Word, 1983; idem. Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church. T&T Clark, 1990; Bray, G., ed. James, 1–2 Peter, 1–3 John, Jude. ACCSNT 11. InterVarsity, 2000; Charles, J. D. Virtue amidst Vice. JSNTSup 150. Sheffield Academic Press, 1997; Chester, A., and R. Martin. The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter, and Jude. NTT. Cambridge University Press, 1994; Kelly, J. N. D. A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and Jude. BNTC. Baker, 1981; Kraftchick, S. Jude, 2 Peter. Abingdon, 2002; Neyrey, J. 2 Peter, Jude. AB 37C. Doubleday, 1993; Vögtle, A. Der Judasbrief der zweite Petrusbrief. EKKNT 22. Benziger/Neukirchener Verlag, 1994; Wall, R. "The Canonical Function of 2 Peter." BibInt 9, no. 1 (2001): 64–81; Watson, D. Invention, Arrangement, and Style. SBLDS, 104. Scholars Press, 1988.

Peter H. Davids

Pharisees     See Jewish Context of the NT

Philemon, Book of

Because of its brevity and relative lack of extended theological reflection, Paul's letter to Philemon has often been overlooked or ignored by those interested in constructing a theology of Paul or the NT. It has not fared much better in the churches or in the devotional life of most Christians. At various times, however, when the political and societal setting was right, this short epistle, with its controversial subject matter, has become a storm center of debate. Some interpreters find in Philemon a liberating message of redemption, while others detect a capitulation to the status quo and a failure to realize the radical implications of the gospel.

Returning a Redeemed Slave

Likely written during Paul's Roman imprisonment, Philemon is a letter of intercession to accompany the return of a slave, Onesimus, to his master, Philemon, in Colossae. In the body of the letter, Paul uses various techniques of persuasion to win Philemon's compliance, including a subtle appeal to his authority as an old man and an apostle, his role in Philemon's salvation, his great love for Onesimus, and his impending visit. The crux interpretum is v. 16. Does Paul intend for Philemon to manumit Onesimus? Or is Paul simply telling Philemon to treat Onesimus not just as a slave, but also as a Christian brother (and thus not to pursue legal recourse against him)? The history of interpretation is mostly a record of scholarly grapplings with this question.

History of Interpretation

As early as the fourth century CE, Philemon had become a battleground for the dispute over abolitionism. In theological battles with the gnostic Carpocratians, as well as the Eustatians and the Donatist Circumcellions—all abolitionists—Chrysostom, Jerome, and Theodore of Mopsuestia used Philemon to defend slavery. Likewise, Luther and Grotius held that Paul was not advocating the abrogation of slavery, but the reconciliation of a slave and his master. This interpretation held sway, with notable dissenters (e.g., Calvin), until the nineteenth century, when abolitionists again read Philemon as urging Onesimus's manumission, or at least sowing the seeds of slavery's destruction.

The twentieth century witnessed a bewildering number of new interpretations. J. Knox, for example, questioned the traditional reading at almost every point. He argued that Archippus, not Philemon, was actually the owner of Onesimus, and that the Letter to Philemon is to be identified with the Letter to Laodicea mentioned in Col. 4:16. Paul's purpose in writing to Archippus, Knox contended, was to secure Onesimus's release in order that he might accompany Paul in his labors. Paul was successful, and Onesimus later became bishop of Ephesus (cf. Ignatius of Antioch, who mentions an Onesimus in this connection; Eph. 1.3). Philemon's inclusion in the canon was engineered by the grateful Onesimus, who collected the correspondence on his hero, Paul.

While Knox's contributions have met with considerable skepticism, many have followed him in radically rethinking the traditional interpretation. Some have suggested that Onesimus was not a runaway, but may simply have overstayed a leave of absence. Perhaps Philemon had commissioned Onesimus to carry out business in Rome, and (p 587) Onesimus had failed to return promptly when his task was completed.

Both P. Lampe and B. Rapske have made the case that Onesimus sought out Paul to serve as amicus domini and arbitrate a dispute between Onesimus and his master—a common practice in Roman slavery. This view has garnered many proponents among recent commentators (Dunn; Fitzmyer; Bartchy). S. Winter theorizes that Onesimus was sent as a messenger from the Colossian congregation and was converted during his stay with Paul, where he proved to be quite useful, and that Paul therefore wrote Philemon to request Onesimus's continued service. Others have questioned whether Onesimus was a slave at all (Callahan).

Also influential in recent interpretation has been careful historical research into the nature of slavery in the first century (Bartchy). Roman slavery was by no means equivalent to that of nineteenth-century America. Roman slaves varied widely in their social status, their treatment, and the tasks they performed. Manumission was commonplace, so much so that laws were passed in order to limit and regulate the influx of freed slaves into the economy.

Reading Philemon Theologically

Philemon addresses such a particular historical situation that one might legitimately question whether the letter has any contemporary theological significance. While Philemon is hardly a doctrinal treatise or a sustained theological argument, beneath its surface lies a profound conception of Christian community.

Although the letter is primarily for Philemon, it is also addressed to the church in his house, an indication that Paul saw the situation not merely as a private matter, but one that involved the larger church body, who would in turn encourage Philemon to carry out Paul's wishes. Paul stresses this relational dynamic by identifying Onesimus as his "child" (v. 10 NRSV) and his own heart (v. 12), as well as appealing to his koinōnia with Philemon (vv. 7, 17).

If the believing community is to be so integrally connected, it must be characterized, as a reflection of its Lord, by reconciliation and forgiveness. Paul encourages Philemon to go the second mile in receiving Onesimus back (v. 21). As an imitator of Christ, Paul offers to pay Onesimus's debts, if necessary, to effect reconciliation, but it is clear that he expects Philemon also to renounce his rights and make no such demands.

Most importantly, Paul manifests his conviction that, as a new society called forth by God's redemptive act in Christ, the church is to be markedly different from the surrounding society, most notably in the importance commonly attached to social and legal status. Paul's appeal in v. 16 is a natural corollary to his pronouncements elsewhere (Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). Within the body of Christ, social distinctions are radically relativized in the light of a common relation to Christ.

The troubling question remains: if Paul held to such a rigorous view of Christian community, how could he have failed to request Onesimus's manumission? Some scholars would argue that he does, in fact, make such a request, pointing to the "even more" of v. 21, as well as the seeming contrast between "brother" and "slave" in v. 16. But even if that is the case, such manumission would be limited to Onesimus and would be specifically in order that Onesimus could return to work with Paul (as Col. 4:9 suggests happened). Philemon was hardly intended to be a manifesto on slavery.

It is evident from Paul's other letters that he did not see ownership of slaves as intrinsically sinful at that moment or inimical to Christian fellowship and community (cf. 1 Cor. 7:21–24; Col. 3:22–4:1), so there would be no ideological reason for him to request Onesimus's manumission. Indeed, Paul's response to the situation can rightly be called "a practical outworking" of the household codes in his other epistles (Barth and Blanke 153).

For the believer, who accepts the letter to Philemon as the word of God, neither a tendentious reading of Paul as an egalitarian hero nor a facile dismissal of Paul as a culture-bound bigot will suffice. Some criticize Paul for shortsightedness or a lack of nerve in not applying his prior magnificent statement of Christian equality (Gal. 3:28) to the situation of Onesimus, but perhaps they have derived their fundamental convictions more from the Enlightenment than from the Scriptures. Such an attempt to be more Pauline than Paul is misguided.

In the final analysis, a focus on slavery has obscured the true theological message of Philemon: The church is to be a radically new society, where divisions founded upon race, gender, and social status are overcome by unity in Christ. In the church the reconciliation and forgiveness modeled by the Lord is manifested in a spirit of agapeic servanthood. Without dispute, this is a message the church in every age needs to hear.

See also Slavery

(p 588)Bibliography

Bartchy, S. Mallon Chrēsai. SBLDS 11. Scholars Press, 1973; Barth, M., and H. Blanke. The Letter to Philemon. ECC. Eerdmans, 2000; Callahan, A. Embassy of Onesimus. NTC. Trinity, 1997; Dunn, J. The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon. NIGTC. Eerdmans, 1996; Fitzmyer, J. The Letter to Philemon. AB 34C. Doubleday, 2000; Knox, J. Philemon among the Letters of Paul. University of Chicago Press, 1935; Lampe, P. “Keine ‘Slavenflucht’ des Onesimus.” ZNW 76 (1985): 135–73; O’Brien, P. Colossians, Philemon. WBC. Word, 1982; Rapske, B. “The Prisoner Paul in the Eyes of Onesimus.” NTS 37 (1991): 187–203; Winter, S. “Paul’s Letter to Philemon.” NTS 33 (1987): 1–15.

Daniel R. Streett

Philippians, Book of

Paul’s letter to the Christians in Philippi is a small gem. Though it covers a good many well-known theological topics, including particularly Christology, soteriology, and eschatology, its chief and largely unremarked value for theological interpretation is the way in which it hammers out a Christian view of what it means to live within a pagan society. “Let your public behavior be worthy of the gospel of the Messiah” (1:27 AT). This refers not simply to Christian ethics, but also to how Christians behave in the public arena. Most modern readers of Paul have not considered the extraordinary challenge facing the young church, of how to negotiate a totally new way of living. What would it mean to give allegiance, in a city like Philippi, to Jesus as the world’s true Lord (2:11)?

The letter is written from prison, to thank the Philippian church for their financial support. Those held in ancient prisons were not provided for by the authorities, and so were utterly dependent on family and friends. In Paul’s case, traveling from place to place, this meant that he had to rely on the churches he had founded, and Philippi had come to his help (1:5; 2:25–30; 4:10–19). Many suppose the prison to be in Rome; a good case can be made for Ephesus, though not much turns on this. (Ephesus had its own Praetorian guard; 1:13.) Paul, it seemed, was aware that the charges against him could result in his death (1:18–26), though in prayer he had glimpsed that he still had work to do and so reckoned that he would be released.

The word he uses to describe the “partnership” into which he and the Philippians have entered, the business partnership in which they will support him when he needs their help (1:5, 7), is koinōnia, often translated “fellowship.” As with some of Paul’s other key terms, this word has often been allowed, in the history of interpretation, to slide into referring simply to the way in which Christians feel toward and with one another; but for Paul it was severely practical. It meant a sharing in common life that resulted directly in mutual support; and also it meant that Paul and his supporters belonged to one another with a family identity. What happens to one, happens to all. The fact that in 1:7 it is not clear whether Paul means that he holds them in his heart, or that they hold him in theirs, tells its own story, as does the whole opening paragraph (1:3–11). Initial theological reflection on Philippians ought to focus on the nature of koinōnia and the strange fact that so many modern churches manage to ignore it.

So what does it mean for the Philippians that Paul is in prison? Most likely, some kind of threat: if that is what the authorities are doing to our apostle, what will happen to us? This threat was already well known in Philippi, judging from the hints in various parts of the letter (e.g., 1:28–30). Living as Christians in the pagan environment of northern Greece (on the main road from Rome to the East, with a well-established Roman colony supplying some of the leading citizens) must have posed all kinds of problems. Christians would not join in the regular pagan festivals, including those in honor of the emperor. They would not offer sacrifices at pagan shrines, or take part in the other street-level pagan practices. Some of them might already have suffered in business from their newfound faith, as clients became suspicious or scornful and went elsewhere. Others may have run into actual verbal or physical abuse. Does this mean they have made a dreadful mistake? No, replies Paul; but from here on, you need to think through how to live appropriately within the world that has suddenly become strange to you and in turn is likely to regard you as a stranger.

That is what he is praying for the church in Philippi (1:9–11). First, he prays that they will love one another more and more (like koinōnia, the word agapē refers first and foremost to something you do, not something you feel). Second, he prays that they will do so “with knowledge and all discernment, so that they may be able to make right judgments about things that differ, so that they may be blameless and innocent for the day of the Messiah” (AT). Since Paul more or less repeats and expands this in 2:12–16, it ought to be clear that we are here in touch with one of the key aims of the letter. He is not, again, simply talking about “how to live as good Christians (p 589)”; he is talking about how to work out what it means to live as a follower of Jesus Christ in a world where there are many things that are good and many things that are not. They are neither to reject everything in the surrounding world nor to embrace everything. They need to develop a keen sense of discrimination. If this set of questions fails to register as a topic in theological interpretation, it is a sign that the Scripture-reading church has forgotten part of its basic calling. It is much easier to decide either to go along with everything in the world or to reject everything in the world than to work out a mature, wise, and discriminating path of loyalty to Jesus as Lord amid the pressures and problems of life and society.

Paul brings them up to date with what has been happening to himself (1:12–26), and in doing so introduces one of the main themes of the letter: the union between the Messiah and his people. He is in prison because of his loyalty to the Messiah, and his life is so bound up with that of Jesus that his sole hope is for whatever happens to him to bring glory to his Lord. It is not entirely clear to whom he is referring when he speaks of some “announcing the Messiah because of envy and rivalry” in 1:15, 17 (AT). They may be rival Christian missionaries, but a good case can be made instead for seeing them as pagans who, affronted that Paul is declaring a crucified Jew to be the Lord of the world, are telling others that this is what he is saying. That, for Paul, would constitute “announcing the Messiah”; for him, “proclaiming Christ” (1:15) does not mean trying to persuade people to accept Jesus, but simply making the announcement, like a herald: Jesus, the Messiah, is Lord! As long as people are saying that, Paul declares, he will be content (1:18).

The main appeal of the letter is stated in 1:27–30. The Philippians must figure out how to live within their surrounding social and cultural world in a manner worthy of the announcement of the Messiah’s good news. Central to this will be the unity of Christians, a favorite theme in Paul; opposition and persecution might threaten to split the church, but they must stand firm. Paul then develops this appeal in 2:1–4, which heaps up what to us appear almost impossible demands: think the same thing, have the same love, share the same soul, always seek one another’s advantage and not your own. This is the radically different lifestyle that must characterize the Christian community and enable it to stand out, and stand firm, within the watching, curious, and potentially hostile world.

All of this is then undergirded and given specific focus and direction by the spectacular poem of 2:6–11. This is the point at which much of the history of the interpretation of Philippians has been concentrated, and especially on 2:6–7. These verses appear to give an account of the way in which Jesus can be identified with and as the preexistent divine being who became incarnate by “emptying himself” (2:7). Some nineteenth- and twentieth-century Lutheran and Anglican theologians have spoken of “kenotic Christology” (from the Greek ekenōsen, “emptied” [2:7 NRSV]) and have used this passage as a key to explore what aspect of Jesus’ divinity was abandoned or put on hold when he became a human being. This inquiry goes back to the patristic period, but no special theories were worked out then. However, this is not Paul's concern. For him, as for John, the point is not that we know in advance who "God" is and can then, as it were, fit Jesus into that definition, but that only when looking at Jesus himself do we discover who the true God really is. The second half of the poem (2:9–11) insists, with its opening "therefore" (dio, 2:9), that the honor given to Jesus in his exaltation is the result of what has been accomplished in incarnation and crucifixion: he has done what only God can do. For theological as well as grammatical reasons, the key phrase in verse 6 should be translated, "He did not regard his equality with God as something to exploit." Jesus was always equal with God, and, so far from compromising his divinity, expressed that equality in incarnation and crucifixion. This passage stands at the heart of the theological reinterpretation of Jewish traditions in early Christianity. To Jesus is now given the glory that Israel's one and only God declares he will not share with another (Isa. 45:23; 48:11; Phil. 2:10–11).

All this wonderful Christology is placed in the service of Paul's deeply subversive critique of Caesar and his world. The implicit contrast throughout the poem, as in Mark 10:42–45, is between the way in which earthly rulers normally rule and the way in which Jesus expressed his divinity and arrived at his world sovereignty. And this leads back to the appeal of 2:13–14. Over against many interpretative traditions worrying about Paul telling people to "work out your salvation," as though this might compromise justification by faith, Paul means precisely: Therefore, figure out, calculate, and reckon it up, what your kind of "salvation" will mean in practice. Caesar offered one kind of "salvation": live under my rule and I will look after you—a kind of global protection (p 590)racket. The salvation Jesus offered was of quite a different type, and it is up to communities of Christians to work out how to live within it. More particularly, they must bear in mind their calling to live as lights in the dark world.

The second chapter ends with an extensive recommendation for Timothy, and a warm passage about Epaphroditus, the Philippians' messenger to Paul. Both are held up as examples of the selfless service that Paul commends throughout.

The second half of the letter has sometimes been thought to be a separate composition, and certainly the link in 3:1 feels a bit jerky. But 3:2–21 has so many close thematic and linguistic connections to the earlier chapters, and to 2:6–11 in particular, that it looks as though Paul is consciously building on what he has just said. His appeal in chapter 3 is for the Philippians to be "imitating" him (3:17 NRSV), but this is initially strange. In 3:2–11 he describes in detail how he has abandoned his pride of ancestry and “righteousness under the law” (3:6 NRSV) so that he might find his identity and life as a member of the Messiah’s people. He himself follows the pattern of renunciation and resurrection foreshadowed in 2:6–11. This passage integrates closely with the more-developed statements of “justification by faith,” rather than by “the works of the law,” as in Romans and Galatians. It strengthens the argument for seeing justification not simply as a truth about how sinners get saved but also as a truth about how Jews and Gentiles come together in a single family. The Philippians have no such ancestry or background in the Jewish law. But they do have pride of civic status, as one of the premier Roman cities and colonies in northern Greece. Maybe Paul is saying—this, too, is something with which theological interpretation of Philippians needs to reckon—that they must be prepared to regard their social and civic privileges in the same way that he has regarded his. They need to look at the world in which they live, not in its own terms, but from the perspective of the gospel. According to the gospel, the Lord Jesus, the royal Messiah, will come from heaven with all power vested in him, and will transform both the present situation of the little beleaguered church, surrounded by the wicked and idolatrous world (3:18–19), and the frail, mortal bodies of individual Christians. Paul here applies 2:9–11 to the particular situation of the church in a pagan environment. This is what it means to give allegiance to Jesus, not Caesar, as the world’s true Lord.

This is what it means to “stand firm in the Lord” (4:1 NRSV). We should recognize, as a matter of urgently needed theological revision, that when Paul says “our citizenship is in heaven” in 3:20 (NRSV), he does not mean, “Therefore that is where we shall go when we die.” That is not how the logic of citizenship worked. Roman citizens living in Philippi would not expect to return to Rome upon retirement, but to be agents of Roman civilization in Philippi and the surrounding countryside.

The central appeal of chapter 4 is, once more, to live within the wider world, not in a state of nervous anxiety at what may happen, but in total trust in the Lord himself (4:4–7) and in readiness to pray about every concern. This leads to the remarkable double command of 4:8–9. On the one hand, they are to think about anything at all that has the stamp of truth, holiness, justice, and so on. Paul is well aware, and wants them to be so aware, that the world is full of beauty and truth, and that they must celebrate it and not pretend that it is all confined to the church. On the other hand, when they think about how to behave, they must once more, as in 3:17, reflect on Paul’s own modeling of Christian living in the world. Here is a point of theological interpretation that the twenty-first century church needs more than ever. Christian leaders have an awesome responsibility to model the life that the gospel produces. Others will follow their lead, for better and for worse.

The letter closes, as we saw, with further detailed thanks for the gift the Philippians have sent to Paul, and with reflections on the way in which God works strangely but powerfully to meet the needs of those who live and proclaim the gospel. Philippians, after all, is a severely practical letter, even though the Christology of 2:6–11 and the soteriology of 3:2–11 are among Paul’s finest pieces of condensed theology. But that, too, is part of the point. Theological interpretation of Scripture needs constantly to remind itself that we know what true theology is, just as we know who the true God is, by looking at what it means to take the form of a servant.

Bibliography

Bockmuehl, M. The Epistle to the Philippians. BNTC. Black/Hendrikson, 1998; Fee, G. Paul’s Letter to the Philippians. NICNT. Eerdmans, 1995; Oakes, P. Philippians. SNTSMS 110. Cambridge University Press, 2001; O’Brien, P. The Epistle to the Philippians. NIGTC. Eerdmans, 1991; Wright, N. T. The Climax of the Covenant. Fortress, 1992; idem. What St. Paul Really Said. Eerdmans, 1997.

N. T. Wright

(p 591)Philo See Jewish Context of the NT

Philology See Etymology; Language, Linguistics; Lexicons, NT; Lexicons, OT

Philosophical Theology See Philosophy

Philosophy

Philosophy, which etymology suggests to be “the love of wisdom,” is perhaps best thought of as the study of abstract and ultimate questions and their answers. What is meant by “abstract and ultimate”? To be philosophical, questions and their answers must be abstract, rather than particular questions of empirical matters of fact: philosophy does not ask what causes the rain to fall, but what causation is. Being abstract on its own is not sufficient for being philosophical, however. After all, pure mathematics is an abstract discipline, though not a philosophical one, because it lacks the required ultimacy or generality. Philosophy is not so much interested in the nature of a triangle as in the nature of geometric objects or of abstract objects in general. The nature of abstract objects is an ultimate question, since abstract objects themselves do not belong to any significant more-general sort save that of existent objects. Much of philosophy is conceptual analysis, the analysis of various abstract concepts, often cashed out in terms of the investigation of the necessary and sufficient conditions for something to fall under that concept. On the other hand, philosophers have also advanced arguments for and against the existence of things falling under particular concepts: the natural theologian's arguments for the existence of God constitute one example.

Philosophy is traditionally divided into different branches, according to the subject matter under investigation. Thus, metaphysics investigates the fundamental nature of reality, including asking what kinds of things are represented in existence (the subdivision of metaphysics known as "ontology"), and the fundamental categories of being: existence, substance, attribute, relation, causation, instantiation, space, time, and so on. Epistemology investigates the nature of knowledge and asks what sorts of thing, if any, feature in our knowledge. Ethics seeks to answer the question of how we should live and also to analyze the various moral notions of goodness and badness, rightness and wrongness. Aesthetics is on a similar tack: it seeks to analyze the aesthetic notions of beauty and ugliness, sublimity and ridiculousness, and to ask what sorts of things have these qualities. Logic seeks to analyze how we should think, and to codify rules of correct thought in a mechanical way that even a computer could follow. In addition to these subdisciplines, there are many subdisciplines concerned with abstract and ultimate questions raised by other disciplines. Thus, philosophy of science deals with the nature of scientific theories, whether science aims at truth, and how to demarcate science from other intellectual activities. Philosophy of mathematics deals with the nature and existence of mathematical entities and mathematical truth. Philosophy of language deals with the nature of language and the associated concepts of meaning, word, concept, and so on. Philosophy of logic, usually though misleadingly known as "philosophical logic," analyzes the fundamental concepts of logic, such as truth, predicate, name, validity, and so on. Political philosophy considers the question of how human society should be organized. And philosophy of religion deals with the meaning and truth of religious claims, such as whether God exists, what God is like, and so on. There are indefinitely many other special branches: the philosophy of history, the philosophy of law, the philosophy of psychology, and so on. Philosophy of mind is often singled out as a special branch, but in truth, since this consists in the study of the nature and existence of the mind, it is part of metaphysics.

Philosophy is usually thought to have begun with Thales in the sixth century BCE, as far as our records tell us. Our sources for these early philosophers, known as the “pre-Socratics,” since they precede (or are contemporaries of) Socrates, are largely fragmentary and incomplete until we reach fourth-century BCE Athens. Then we have Plato (and, through him, his mentor Socrates) and Aristotle; their works set the direction of philosophy for two thousand years and still exercise a pervasive influence. Initially, their legacy was taken up by competing schools: the Epicureans, the Stoics, and the Skeptics. In the third century CE these schools were largely transcended in influence by the rise of Neoplatonism, represented in Rome by Plotinus and his disciple Porphyry. In the fifth century this Neoplatonic tradition of thought combined with orthodox Christianity in the works of Augustine, who lived in North Africa. Boethius may fairly be called the last philosopher of the classical period; he died in Italy in 524 CE, five years before the closure of the Athenian schools. Philosophy in the medieval period may be said to have begun with the Irish John Scotus Eriugena in France in the ninth century (p 592). He was followed by the Arabic philosophers Avicenna (Ibn Sina) in the eleventh century and Averroës (Ibn Rushd) in the twelfth century, and the latter’s contemporary the Jewish philosopher Maimonides. Between Avicenna and Averroës appear the Christian philosophers Anselm and Abelard. The thirteenth century is the high point of medieval philosophy, beginning with Albert the Great and then achieving its acme in Bonaventure and his greater contemporary, Thomas Aquinas. Duns Scotus rounded off this remarkable century, and William of Ockham dominated the first half of the fourteenth century.

Bacon and Hobbes inaugurated the era of modern philosophy in the seventeenth century. But Descartes was its real founder and the first of the so-called rationalists, followed by Spinoza in the Netherlands and Leibniz in Germany. Opposed to the rationalists were the so-called empiricists: Locke from England, Berkeley from Ireland, and Hume from Scotland. It was Hume that awoke Immanuel Kant, the greatest eighteenth-century philosopher, from his “dogmatic slumbers.” After Kant came Hegel, Schopenhauer, and (later) Marx, who built their systems in Germany, though they achieved more lasting philosophical influence on the Continent than in Great Britain or North America. The reverse was the case with Gottlob Frege, who is now regarded in English-speaking circles as the founder of analytical philosophy, though he is barely known in his native Germany. Contemporary with Frege in Germany we have such diverse figures as the phenomenologist Edmund Husserl and Friedrich Nietzsche. In the twentieth century the cleavage between Britain and the Continent was embodied in the difference between Wittgenstein, an Austrian who worked in Cambridge under his mentor Russell, and Heidegger, who remained in his native Germany throughout the Nazi period and the Second World War. In the latter half of the twentieth century, after the brief flourishing of “Oxford ordinary language philosophy” and the earlier logical positivist movement, the spotlight of analytical philosophy moved to North America. Continental philosophy turned to France for its leaders: First appeared the existentialists, preeminently Sartre. Later came the deconstructionists and postmodernists, such as Foucault and Derrida, whose work tends to be most influential in English-speaking countries outside departments of academic philosophy, both in the public domain and in other academic disciplines, such as theology.

The divide between analytical and continental philosophy is not so much a difference of subject matter as one of style, though there has been a tendency for continental philosophers to concern themselves with the great questions of the meaning of life and the nature of love; analytic philosophers have tended to concentrate on smaller questions, such as the meaning of “if” and the nature of a name. The analytical tradition places great emphasis on clarity, precision, argument, and logic, whereas the continental tradition has greater affinities with literature and rhetoric. One consequence of this has been that the technical style of much analytical philosophy has prevented its diffusion into other academic departments, whereas continental philosophy has been eagerly embraced by many other such departments, particularly those with long literary associations, such as language and theology departments.

The relationship between philosophy and theology is as contested as anything in philosophy. Opinions range from Sir Alfred Ayer’s that theology is meaningless nonsense that philosophy had to expose as such, to the Barthian view that philosophy is captive to the infidel Reason and that theology has a future insofar as, by contrast, it consists in submission to Christ. Some philosophers see their role as being to analyze the concepts that theology makes use of: not just such straightforwardly religious concepts as that of God and the soul, but ancillary concepts such as that of causation, time, and knowledge. More ambitious philosophers think of philosophy as providing a system of ultimate reality, and of theology as the branch of the system that concerns God. Lately there has arisen a movement called “Christian philosophy,” centered around the University of Notre Dame and the figure of Alvin Plantinga. This movement consists in the attempt to provide substantive answers to traditional philosophical questions from a distinctively Christian viewpoint. A good example is Plantinga's answer to the age-old philosophical question "What is knowledge?" His answer is that knowledge is a true belief produced by mental faculties that are aimed at truth and working as God intended them to work. The last part of this definition obviously does not appeal to much of the secular philosophical world, but it is a mark of the Christian philosophy movement that its representatives do not care much about what the secular philosophical world thinks. As Plantinga puts it, Christian philosophers are called to do philosophy of the sort that will edify the church. The difference between this and another sort of (p 593) Christian philosophy, such as, for example, the work of Herman Dooyeweerd, is that the latter attempts to put forward a systematic interpretation of the whole of reality. Plantinga and his acolytes, however, are content to produce Christian philosophy piecemeal as individual Christian answers to pressing contemporary philosophical questions.

Of particular interest is the connection between philosophy and Scripture. Some Christians, "biblicists," insist that all religious knowledge is gained from Scripture's exact words or what may be inferred from them by "necessary consequence," which leaves no room for additional philosophy of religion. Others insist that human reason is powerless when it comes to the infinite and the transcendent. Others again have claimed that Greek philosophy has sullied the pure gospel truth, and they have attempted to reconstruct theology without the categories of Greek philosophy. At the other end of the spectrum, some Christians of a rationalistic bent, often called "Socinians" after a famous rationalist, insist that only the portion of revelation that is verifiable by human reason may be taken as gospel truth. It seems clear to the present writer that human reason is no match for divine reason. Thus, if there is a divine revelation, it behooves us to believe all of it, even those parts that we cannot justify. Nevertheless, it must also be conceded that the Bible does not define every term it uses, including the term "God." Philosophy comes into play because some terms used in the Bible, such as "free," are capable of more than one explanation, and because more than one philosophical outlook is compatible with the Scriptures. Hence, there is room for genuine philosophical debate among sincere Bible-believing Christians: Scripture in itself does not determine which is the correct philosophy. A cautionary note needs also to be sounded: the fact that the human authors of the Bible had a particular philosophical outlook does not necessarily make that outlook correct any more than the fact that they had a particular scientific outlook makes that correct.

Sometimes Christians misunderstand Paul's warning in Col.

2:8–10, “See to it that no one takes you captive through hollow and deceptive philosophy,” as being a declaration that philosophy in general is hollow and deceptive. In fact, Paul is warning the Christians of Colossae to beware of philosophies that are hollow and deceptive—such philosophies do not, alas, carry on them labels marked “hollow and deceptive,” so one should be wary of any philosophy lest it be hollow and deceptive. That Paul does not suffer from odium philosophicum is clear from his approving use of a quotation from the Greek philosopher Epimenides (Acts 17:28a). It may sound noble to say that one is being purely scriptural and adopting no philosophy at all, but such a statement betrays confusion: it is impossible to have any beliefs about abstract and ultimate matters without having “a philosophy,” even if an incomplete and unsystematic one. It is tempting to reply that one gets one’s philosophy solely from Scripture; but then one runs up against the point just mentioned that one needs an understanding of the concepts found in Scripture, including the philosophical ones, in order to understand Scripture’s overall message. One cannot do this without a prior understanding of the concepts any more than one ignorant of Hebrew and Greek could just sit down and read the original words.

Historically, many of the great philosophers have also been theological interpreters of Scripture: Thomas Aquinas wrote Bible commentaries, as did Augustine, and Bishops Berkeley and Butler also wrote theological as well as philosophical works. Every philosopher up till the time of Hume and La Mettrie believed in God (or the gods, in the case of most of the ancient philosophers). In addition, every Christian theologian was traditionally trained in philosophy, a requirement that was actually encoded in the Westminster Assembly’s Form of Church Government.

Since the modern age, philosophical analysis and positions have shaped both the form and content of biblical interpretation, especially via “hermeneutics.” While these often are theologically loaded (and the distinction between philosophy and theology is always tricky and tenuous), they may be labeled “philosophical” in the sense of being developed without positive reference to Christian doctrine.

For example, Frege’s distinction between “sense” and “reference” has been influential within grammatical-historical approaches, especially for conservatives who have held to Hirsch’s distinction between a text’s “meaning” and “significance.” Conversely, continental philosophies such as Gadamer’s, or those spawned by Derrida’s “deconstruction,” have generated other programs of biblical interpretation.

Thiselton in particular has chronicled such influence of Heideggerian existentialism on Bultmann and his followers during the twentieth century. At the dawn of the twenty-first, the interpretative pluralism (or even anarchy) of biblical scholarship no doubt owes in part to (p 594)philosophical sources (both intentionally borrowed and unintentionally swallowed).

Among theologically interested interpreters, the most influential alternatives may be an ad hoc use of philosophy (following Frei and a more literary emphasis on biblical narrative), and/or the selective integration of analytic and continental styles that characterizes Ricoeur, following up his interests in speech-act philosophy, narrativity, and metaphor. Both streams perhaps need more attention to philosophy of history (beyond the start of N. T. Wright), while both have made varied uses of Wittgenstein (and concepts such as “language-games”).

It is not practical for every Christian to be trained in both the theological interpretation of Scripture and in philosophy. This sad fact, however, should not be taken to encourage further diversification between the two disciplines: Christian philosophers need the work of theological interpreters of Scripture, and theological interpreters of Scripture need the work of Christian philosophers.

Bibliography

General Encyclopedias: Craig, E., ed. Routledge Encyclopedia of Philosophy. Routledge, 1998; Edwards, P., ed. Encyclopedia of Philosophy. 8 vols. Macmillan, 1967. Supplement, ed. D. Borchert. Macmillan Reference USA, 1996; Honderich, T., ed. The Oxford Companion to Philosophy. Oxford University Press, 1995; General Dictionaries: Blackburn, S., ed. Dictionary of Philosophy. Oxford University Press, 1996; Flew, A., ed. A Dictionary of Philosophy. Pan, 1975; Urmson, J. O., and J. Rée, eds. The Concise Encyclopedia of Western Philosophy and Philosophers. Routledge, 1975; General Introductions: Blackburn, S. Think. Oxford University Press, 1999; Hospers, J. An Introduction to Philosophical Analysis. Routledge, 1997; Russell, B. The Problems of Philosophy. Oxford University Press, 1959; Scruton, R. Modern Philosophy. Penguin, 1996; Histories: Copleston, F. A History of Philosophy. 8 vols. Burnes, Oates & Washbourne, 1946–66; Parkinson, G. H. R., and S. G. Shanker, eds. Routledge History of Philosophy. 10 vols. Routledge, 1993–99; Russell, B. A History of Western Philosophy. Allen & Unwin, 1961; Scruton, R. A Short History of Modern Philosophy. Routledge, 1984; Relation to Theology: Augustine. City of God; Plantinga, A. “Advice to Christian Philosophers.” Faith and Philosophy 1 (1984): 253–71; idem. Warranted Christian Belief. Oxford University Press, 1999; Thiselton, A. The Two Horizons. Eerdmans, 1980.

Daniel Hill with Daniel J. Treier

Phronēsis See Imagination; Practical Theology; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary; Wisdom

Play See Deconstruction

Plot See Narrative Criticism

Poetry

Poetry in the Bible

Even if many Bible translations set their text entirely in prose and do not indicate the presence of poetry in the visual appearance of the page, poetry is present in both the OT and NT—whether in complete poems, fragments, or sayings. In the OT, Psalms and Proverbs are all poetry, Job is largely poetry, and the prophetic books contain significant sections of poetry. Pentateuchal poems are found in Gen. 49, Exod. 15, and Deut. 32–33. In the NT, we find poems in Luke’s nativity account and a hymn in Phil. 2:6–11 (Longman 81). Add to these the many of Christ’s sayings that are poetic, and the book of Revelation, which contains multiple hymns and numerous figures of speech. Vast portions of the Bible are poems or reflect a poetic use of language.

Western scholars have recognized this for centuries, though not all have agreed on what constitutes biblical “poetry.” Modern discussions begin with Bishop Lowth’s Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (1753). Bishop Lowth identified parallelism as the essential characteristic of Hebrew poetry and identified several types of parallelism he found in the Bible. James Kugel established the parameters for the modern discussion of Hebrew poetry in general and parallelism in particular in his landmark book, The Idea of Biblical Poetry. Tremper Longman discusses semantic parallelism and grammatical parallelism, and in Words of Delight Leland Ryken lists four types of parallelism.

In recent years, modern scholars have taken Bishop Lowth’s initial definition in new directions. James Kugel galvanized contemporary study with his statements that there is no “poetry” in the Bible—at least no word for it (69)—and that using the term “poetry” “distorts” our understanding of parallelism and is even “damaging” in biblical scholarship (71). C. S. Lewis, on the other hand, claims that “all language about things other than physical objects is necessarily metaphorical” (“Is?” 102). Current scholarship demonstrates that poetry is not easy to define or identify, but that we must continue our work if we are to understand vast portions of the Bible.

Features of Biblical Poetry

Formulating a definition is not as easy as it seems. If we begin with literary glossaries and handbooks, we find only the most general of (p 595) definitions. The Bedford Glossary of Critical and Literary Terms begins by distinguishing poetry from prose, as “any rhythmical or metrical composition” (Murfin and Ray 290). William Harmon and C. Hugh Holman define poetry as “a term applied to the many forms in which human beings have given rhythmic expression to their most intense perceptions of the world, themselves, and the relation of the two” (398). Neither of these definitions takes us very far.

When we turn to biblical scholarship, we find that most scholars usually do not attempt a complete definition of biblical poetry. Rather, they identify a set of features characteristic of biblical poetry. Because most of the material available today relates to Hebrew poetry, I will list the characteristics that modern scholars identify in it and follow this information with a comment on the NT.

The first feature of Hebrew poetry is repetition, or what Robert Alter calls a “dynamics of repetition,” in which parallel phrases develop, rather than repeat (as Lowth suggested), an idea introduced in the first phrase (11). Alter emphasizes the subtle shifts in meaning that the parallelisms bring to bear upon the initial colon or phrase. J. P. Fokkerman asserts that repetition, or what he calls “quantity,” is the essential feature of biblical poetry, and that it applies at all levels in the poem—cola, strophes, stanzas (including acrostics), and the poem as a whole. A related concept is Kugel’s notion of “regularity” (69). These concepts of repetition go beyond Bishop Lowth’s idea of simple parallelism and apply to all levels of the poem. Second and third phrases in parallel structure, for instance, modify the initial meaning. Parallelism is no longer seen as a mechanical poetic repetition, as for Bishop Lowth.

The second feature of Hebrew poetry is its terseness (Longman 82; Berlin 5). Poetry is made terse by its simultaneous exercise of several devices, including conciseness, ellipsis, lack of connectives, and figures of speech. Unlike prose, poetry builds on the individual word and line, not the sentence. Much is said in little.

The third characteristic of Hebrew poetry is its “pattern of intensification” (Alter 11), or its “complex of heightening effects” (Kugel 94). Intensification in biblical poetry results from its terseness and parallelisms. Terseness concentrates attention, thereby intensifying poetry over prose, and parallelism arrests the reader’s thought, focusing it on one idea for a longer period of time than the rapid reading in prose typically allows. Rather than anticipating the next point in a propositional argument as we do in prose, the reader ponders and appreciates the idea or image evoked in the poem. When terseness and parallelism work together, as they often do in biblical poetry, the poem magnifies the effect on the reader, involving emotions as well as intellect.

Fourth, Hebrew poetry—like all poetry—uses figures of speech as its stock in trade. Of course, prose often uses figures of speech, but poetry employs them more frequently than prose. Figures of speech include metaphor, imagery, symbol, apostrophe, irony, prosopopoeia, and even the anthropomorphisms so common in the Psalms. Figures of speech are not decorations or crutches for illiterate people; rather, they convey meaning in terms that could not be communicated exactly the same in any other way. The familiar beginning of Ps. 23, “The LORD is my shepherd, I shall not want” (KJV), is more than a comforting image; it is a theological statement framed in terms of the image and its context in the psalm at large. Osborne rightly reminds us, “Theology rarely stems from the metaphor itself but rather from the whole context of which it is a part” (188). Indeed, the rest of Ps. 23 develops the variations on the theme of Yahweh as shepherd of his people.

The final feature of Hebrew poetry is again one that it shares with poetry in all languages—its concreteness. Poetry has a “tendency to concretization” (Alter 21), which allows the reader to see, taste, touch, smell, or hear. Poetry reifies theology, naming concrete objects and using them as images or symbols. Biblical poetry is rooted in the material world and points beyond this world to one that we apprehend by faith. Figures of speech are particularly apt devices in poetry because they are the forms of language in which the disparate is united—object and idea, vehicle and tenor synthesized in one.

A word is in order here about poetry in the NT, for all of the characteristics mentioned above are associated with Hebrew poetry. The NT does contain some poems, but it also uses language poetically even in the prose sections. The nativity hymns of Luke 1–2 derive from Hebrew models and even echo OT hymns. The book of Revelation contains several doxologies that are framed as poems (4:8, 11; 5:9–10, 12, 13; 15:3–4). Apart from these obvious poems, the NT writers often use language poetically. John writes poetically in the multilayered images of Revelation. Christ himself often speaks poetically in the parables, and also in his many “I am’s.” Leland Ryken comments, “The language of the New Testament is often poetic(p 596)” (441), and our hermeneutic will do well to account for its poems and poetic passages.

Implications for Interpreting Poetry in Scripture

The language of poetry functions differently than the language of prose and therefore must be examined with appropriate hermeneutical principles. If we read the Psalms the way we read the polemical sections of an epistle like Romans, we run serious risk of misinterpreting them. How then should we read biblical poetry? In Reflections on the Psalms, C. S. Lewis tells us that we must read the Psalms as poems: “Most emphatically, the Psalms must be read as poems; as lyrics, with all the licences [sic] and all the formalities, the hyperboles, the emotional rather than logical connections, which are proper to lyric poetry” (3). How then do we read poetry as poetry?

Let me suggest four questions to guide an active, engaged reading of biblical poetry (see Travers). Questions are preferable to rules, for questioning requires the reader to participate actively, and poetry of all modes of language requires active reading. The questions:

1. What is the overall effect of the poem? By overall effect, I mean the subject matter in the poem and the tone with which the poet approaches that subject.
2. What is the structure of the poem? As I use it here, “structure” relates to the macrocosmic patterning of the poem and to its genre.
3. What are the figures of speech in the poem? The poet develops his points in the terms of these figures of speech.
4. What are the themes and theology of the poem? This should be the final question we ask, for the answers to it come from developing accurate responses to the first three questions.

Take Ps. 97 as an example. The overall effect is the awesome glory of God and the call to praise him. The structure of Ps. 97 is the tripartite division of a hymn of public praise: a call to praise Yahweh (v. 1); Yahweh’s praiseworthy attributes and acts (vv. 2–9); and exhortation to praise Yahweh in the sanctuary (vv. 10–12). Moving from a macrocosmic view in the heavens to the microcosmic in man, Ps. 97 glorifies Yahweh and calls on readers to worship him. There are too many figures of speech to examine here, but we can take vv. 2–6 by way of illustration. The “clouds and thick darkness” (v. 2) show Yahweh to be separate from us, above us, and holy. Righteousness and justice are associated in a metonymy with Yahweh’s throne, underscoring the nature of Yahweh himself. The three images of fire, lightning, and melting mountains (vv. 3–5) all demonstrate Yahweh’s power over nature. Fire also suggests holiness, for it consumes Yahweh’s (unrighteous) enemies; lightning undoubtedly depicts Yahweh’s power over nature; and melting mountains emphasize his prerogative to “de-create” as well as create. In short, Yahweh is sovereign. Verse 6 concludes this picture of Yahweh, reiterating nature's declaration of his glory, and the obligation and privilege it is for all people to praise him. The themes of Ps. 97 relate Yahweh's sovereignty directly to human praise, making the attributes of Yahweh the reason for worship. As with all Scripture, Ps. 97 demands a response from the reader.

Hermeneutically, there is much more that needs to be said. Actively engaging these four simple questions in our reading, however, will go a long way toward helping us read poetry as it was written—and inspired.

Current Issues

Current scholarship on biblical poetry goes in at least two directions—the text and the reader. First, some scholars emphasize the close reading of the text, carried out in “linguistic analysis” (Howard 329). M. O'Connor insists that “syntactical requirements” determine Hebrew poetry. David M. Howard Jr. extends O'Connor's insights on syntax to include “semantics, phonology, and morphology” (350) as necessary elements in a fully developed understanding of the meanings of a biblical poem. Another dimension to the current interest in biblical poems comes from the study of traditional, time-transcending poetic devices as they are used in the Bible (e.g., Longman; Ryken). The reemphasis on the text in current biblical criticism reflects C. S. Lewis's idea in Reflections on the Psalms: “Poetry too is a little incarnation, giving body to what had been before invisible and inaudible” (5). Poetry demands close reading.

The second emphasis in modern scholarship is on the reader. This focus is reflected in two recent volumes—The New Literary Criticism and the Hebrew Bible (Exum and Clines) and The New Literary Criticism and the New Testament (Malbon and McKnight). These volumes demonstrate the increasing influence of such postmodern “literary” approaches in biblical scholarship as deconstruction, feminism, and new historicism.

These reader-centered hermeneutical approaches will provide significant information (p 597) for biblical scholars, but it is the text-centered interpretations that will extend our understanding of how biblical poetry works.

See also Imagery; Metaphor

Bibliography

Alter, R. The Art of Biblical Poetry. Basic Books, 1985; Berlin, A. The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism. Indiana University Press, 1985; Exum, J., and D. Clines, eds. The New Literary Criticism and the Hebrew Bible. JSOTSup 143. Sheffield Academic Press, 1993; Fokkelman, J. Reading

Biblical Poetry. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Harmon, W., and C. Holman, eds. A Handbook to Literature. 7th ed. Prentice Hall, 1996; Howard, D., Jr. "Recent Trends in Psalms Study." Pages 329–68 in The Face of Old Testament Studies, ed. D. Baker and B. Arnold. Baker, 1999; Kugel, J. The Idea of Biblical Poetry. Yale University Press, 1981; Lewis, C. S. "Is Theology Poetry?" In The Weight of Glory and Other Addresses, ed. W. Hooper, 1996; idem. Reflections on the Psalms. Harcourt, Brace, 1958; Longman, T., III. "Biblical Poetry." Pages 80–94 in A Complete Literary Guide to the Bible, ed. L. Ryken and T. Longman III. Zondervan, 1993; Malbon, E., and E. McKnight. The New Literary Criticism and the New Testament. JSNTSup 109. Sheffield Academic Press, 1994; Murfin, R., and S. Ray, eds. The Bedford Glossary of Critical and Literary Terms. Bedford Books, 1997; O'Connor, M. Hebrew Verse Structure. 2d ed. Eisenbrauns, 1980; Osborne, G. The Hermeneutical Spiral. InterVarsity, 1991; Ryken, L. Words of Delight. 2d ed. Baker, 1992; Travers, M. Encountering God in the Psalms. Kregel, 2003.

Michael E. Travers

Political Theology

The term "political" in "political theology" may be provisionally defined as "pertaining to the nature and purpose of the political community (or polis, or state)." The political community is an authoritative public legal institution responsible for securing justice across a whole society. Maintaining clarity on its nature and purpose is vital in properly grasping the subject matter of political theology.

What goes under the name of "political theology" has experienced a remarkable global resurgence during the last three decades. The fruit of this revival has been the proliferation of contrasting and contending interpretative and substantive perspectives, rather than any clearly discernible movement toward a scholarly consensus on how the Bible speaks politically. On whether the Bible speaks politically, there is now little doubt: few would any longer seek to defend a spiritualized, and thereby privatized, reading of Scripture, which arbitrarily confines its authoritative address to the spheres of doctrine, church order, or personal faith and morality. Confronted by twenty-first-century national, regional, and global political orders undergoing rapid transformations, many of them violent and destabilizing, the saliency and urgency of the enterprise of political theology can hardly be overstated.

If there were a contender for primacy among the polyphonous voices of contemporary political theology, it would of course be liberation theology. This school has done more than any other to establish the inescapably political character of the biblical message, and to expose the flawed hermeneutical and ideological factors at work in those who would privatize and thereby muzzle the Bible's prophetic public significance. As a result, many today take “political theology” and “liberation theology” to be synonyms. But there were other forms of political theology before liberation theology, and there have been many since. Liberation theology was forged in the context of widespread economic deprivation and political repression in the Latin America of the 1960s and 70s. Its early manifestations (Gutiérrez) can be seen as a contextualized, if profoundly radicalized, elaboration of the slightly earlier European movement that first took upon itself the name “political theology,” and which itself was the outcome of diverse sources (Kee). Since the 1970s liberation theology has spawned an array of regional expressions in Africa, Asia, and also the West. It has also been complemented, or indeed critiqued and superseded, by yet further variations of political theology such as neo-Anabaptism, black theology, feminist theology, postcolonial theology, ecotheology, deconstructionist theology, and, most recently, “Radical Orthodoxy” (Milbank; Bell).

Alongside this proliferation of professedly left-wing forms of political theology has also emerged a revival and renewal of politically more reformist or conservative manifestations, drawing variously on Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, or John Calvin. Thus far these have received much less appreciation from specialists in political theology—or indeed from the World Council of Churches, its national counterparts, and other ecumenical social activist networks, where liberation theology and its affiliates have established a position of clear dominance. Yet they include some of the most biblically responsive and theoretically sophisticated contributions (e.g., O’Donovan). Theological fault lines do not line up neatly with political ones: Many adherents to the radical neo-Anabaptist political theology of John Howard Yoder and Stanley Hauerwas would defend a (p 598) “conservative” view of scriptural authority. “Radical orthodoxy” is the fruit of a novel postmodern reading of Augustine. Neo-Calvinism began as a theologically conservative movement but has produced some decidedly progressive thinkers (such as Bob Goudzwaard). The “new natural law theory,” associated with orthodox Catholic philosophers such as John Finnis and Robert George, has proposed a variant of Thomist political thought justifiable independently of any theological premises. And the most prominent evangelical Augustinian, Oliver O’Donovan, eludes precise political categorization (Bartholomew et al.).

Contemplating the sheer pluriformity of contemporary political theologies can be both exhilarating and disconcerting for those seeking reliable biblical guidance on how to think and act politically in our turbulent times. We can be exhilarated by the richness and challenge of unexpected insights, unearthed by some of the newer forms of political theology, into the political meaning of long-neglected or sidelined scriptural passages or themes. Thus, Lev. 25 gives the meaning of “Jubilee” for economic justice. Daniel and Revelation show resistance in the face of “empire.” Luke depicts Jesus’ egalitarian attitude toward women. Such resources help in dealing also with other contemporary forms of marginalization and exclusion. Part of the value of these insights is to facilitate a searching ideological criticism of interpretative assumptions hitherto conspiring to silence the prophetic force of such biblical materials. Such contributions greatly enrich the enterprise of political theology.

Yet two aspects of the current pluriformity are disconcerting. First, the enormous diversity of interpretative schools of political theology increasingly threatens to slide from a quite legitimate plurality of foci and accents into a distracting and damaging fragmentation—a Babel of hermeneutical voices urging us in incompatible directions. Second, many of the newer schools proceed as if political theology were a late-twentieth-century invention. But the formidable output of the last thirty years is only a rehabilitation of the project of relating theology to politics as engaged in continuously by the church for two millennia (too often, of course, with profoundly flawed or frankly oppressive results).

Two assumptions ought to guide our response to this situation. The first is that Scripture offers a fundamentally unified testimony about politics and government (Chaplin, “Government,” in Atkinson and Field; Marshall; Bauckham). This means that the project of fashioning a truly biblical theology of politics—in which Scripture is unmuzzled and allowed to speak authoritatively to our own political context—is not only feasible but also urgent. The innovative work of O’Donovan, for example, is charting an exciting pathway in this regard. The second is that the leading—and indeed dissenting—historical traditions of reading Scripture politically must be fully reckoned with today.

Two corresponding challenges then follow. One is to work toward an interpretative framework that honors the unified testimony of Scripture by distinguishing between two kinds of proposals: Some genuinely open up the meaning of Scripture and thus disclose its fundamental unity more clearly than the church has hitherto seen. Others threaten to subvert the unity of Scripture by forcing a false choice between biblical materials taken to be supportive of one’s proposed reading and those seen as obstructing it. A second challenge is to engage in respectful, critical dialogue with the legacy of two thousand years of Christian political reflection (the first fifteen hundred years of which are magisterially represented in O'Donovan and O'Donovan). This implies, additionally, that such dialogue must be ecumenical in scope and sympathy.

An important initial step in meeting these challenges is to explore the definition of the term “political theology” more closely. The proliferation of its diverse schools has led to a progressive expansion of the territory claimed by the term, at the cost of obscuring its meaning. O'Donovan has rightly asserted that “theology must be political if it is to be evangelical” (O'Donovan 3; “evangelical” here means “faithfully responsive to the gospel,” rather than in continuity with the movement of that name arising in eighteenth-century Europe and America). All contemporary political theologians would affirm this assertion. A generation ago Alistair Kee stated the point more controversially by questioning “whether anything that is without political significance deserves the name of theology” (ix; a formulation that might be read as implying an illegitimate politicization of theology). But the immediate question arising is what the term “political” means in these statements. In fact, political theologians have attached diverse and sometimes divergent meanings to the term. Three clarifications are in order.

First, the assertion that theology is “political” has for many meant merely that it is “historical”: that is, theology is not rational speculation on timeless truths but reflection on and response to God's saving, liberating action in history with all (p 599)its implications for political societies. Nor is the gospel an appeal to “faith” as if this functioned in a different realm from the concrete reality of human history. Rather, it is both kerygmatic and eschatological. It is kerygmatic in calling for testimony to God's establishment of a historical people who will bear witness to his name through tangible acts of proclamation, community building, healing, and justice. It is eschatological in summoning us to live now in anticipation of experiencing the promised fullness of the kingdom of God. This twentieth-century rediscovery of the historical character of divine salvation—fatally eclipsed by the idealist and demythologizing liberal theology of the nineteenth—is salutary. But it seems misleading to designate it as “political.” Why assume a privileged relationship between “history” and “politics”? A possible explanation for this is a concealed assumption that, among all forms of human action, political action is the real motor of history. Yet this is not the case: historical change is multicausal, and to identify just one of the arenas in which humans collectively shape their environments and destinies as uniquely decisive is to fall into historical reductionism. Related to this is a second assumption, that history is the theatre of the assertion of human freedom over against nature, and that the political community is the primary conduit of such assertion. But this is a modernist myth (mediated to the political theology of the 1960s and 1970s through an insufficiently critical appropriation of Marxism). Human freedom can be cultivated as much in any other arena of human social life; and, in any arena, it consists not in “mastering” an inert and passive nature, but rather in respectfully acting to “till and keep it” (Gen. 2:15 NRSV). One contribution of postmodern approaches is to expose the dependence of some earlier schools of political theology on this modernist myth and to disclose its potentially violent consequences (Bell).

Second, the term “political” frequently seems to be used generically to refer to anything and everything related to human collective action, or alternatively, to any context in which power is employed. But such conflation occludes vital distinctions between discrete arenas of such action or distinctive types of power. Not everything that is “social,” “familial,” “economic,” “educational,” or “technological” (for example) is necessarily “political” in character (in the sense defined earlier; Stackhouse et al. style these arenas “spheres,” “powers and principalities,” “authorities,” and “regencies”). And not every use of “power” is an exercise of that unique type of political power—coercive legal power pursuant to public justice—which political communities alone enjoy. Nor are the above arenas primarily “public” in character, so that Stackhouse’s term “public theology” can also mislead. If theology can be qualified as “political,” can it not also equally be qualified by all those other terms? That this is indeed so is increasingly being registered in the emergence of a whole series of specialist subdisciplines referred to as a “theology of ...” economics, society (“social theology”), education, the family, technology, and so on. Calling for a respect of such boundaries is not to imply that these arenas are divorced from politics (or immune from legal regulation) but only that they are not essentially political: family, economy, education, and so on are neither parts of nor creatures of the political community. To subsume all arenas of human collective action under the rubric “political” is, perhaps unwittingly, to risk playing into the hands of modern statism. Statism sees the political community as the primary locus of human fulfillment or liberation, and its institutional expression—the state—as the chief guarantor of such goals. It is understandable why political theologies forged out of confrontations with oppressive states, such as liberation theology, might insist that such states, once democratized, should claim extensive powers to overcome social injustice. And where such regimes have supported rampant capitalist excesses, as was true of several Latin American states in the 1960s and 1970s, an extension of state power to regulate the economy is likely to be required. But this is not a necessary implication, as is made clear by the contrasting examples of John Paul II's "personalist" indictments of communism (John Paul II), or seventeenth-century Calvinist theories of resistance. Both insist on setting clear limits to political authority to protect the independent calling of nonpolitical arenas such as the family, "civil society," and the church.

Third, a distinction needs to be drawn between "political theology" and "Christian political philosophy," which have importantly different foci. The former involves systematic reflection on political material in—or the political implications of—biblical and theological sources (e.g., Gutiérrez; Moltmann; Forrester, Theology; O'Donovan). The latter is systematic reflection on political reality as informed by those sources (e.g., Maritain; Dooyeweerd; Mott; Song; Forrester, Christian; Plant). While many works quite legitimately engage in both, the distinction between the two enterprises is important because they have different objectives (p 600)(and may have different audiences). The objective of political theology is to clarify the meaning of revealed truth about politics as an arena of created, fallen, redeemed, and eschatologically destined human existence. It considers various questions: Is political authority grounded in one or another of these four fundamental biblical motifs? What was the normative shape of political order and social justice in Israel, and how might that shape inform what is normative for us today? What can we learn from the responses of the church to the Roman Empire or other forms of political idolatry? And so on. The objective of Christian political philosophy is to address—in the light of a perspective formed by revelation, and drawing on philosophy, history, and a range of empirical disciplines (esp. the social sciences)—the central and recurring problematics of political reality: What is the origin, nature, scope, and purpose of political authority? What is the meaning of law and rights? What are the requirements of distributive justice? What is the nature of representation and consensus? What is the legitimacy of violence and revolution? What are the conditions for civic virtue? And so on. There is a key point in drawing this distinction: it is just as hazardous to move directly from political theology to specific conclusions about the latter range of questions, as it is to embark on the enterprise of Christian political philosophy without a clear apprehension of the totality and coherence of biblical revelation.

See also Augustine; Calling/Vocation; Calvin, John; Deconstruction; Feminist Biblical Interpretation; Ideological Criticism; Justice; Kingdom of God; Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics; Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation; Powers and Principalities; Roman Empire; Thomas Aquinas;

Violence; Virtue

Bibliography

Atkinson, D. J., and D. H. Field, eds. New Dictionary of Christian Ethics and Pastoral Theology. InterVarsity, 1995; Bartholomew, C., et al., eds. A Royal Priesthood. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2002; Bauckham, R. The Bible in Politics. SPCK, 1989; Bell, D. Liberation Theology after the End of History. Routledge, 2001; Dooyeweerd, H. Roots of Western Culture. Wedge, 1979; Forrester, D. Christian Justice and Public Policy. Cambridge University Press, 1997; idem. Theology and Politics. Blackwell, 1988; Gutiérrez, G. A Theology of Liberation. Orbis, 1973; John Paul II. Centesimus annus. Catholic Truth Society, 1991; Kee, A., ed. A Reader in Political Theology. SCM, 1974; Maritain, J. Man and the State. University of Chicago Press, 1951; Marshall, P. God and the Constitution. Rowman & Littlefield, 2002; Milbank, J. Theology and Social Theory. Blackwell, 1990; Moltmann, J. On Human Dignity. SCM, 1984; Mott, S. C. A Christian Perspective on Political Thought. Oxford University Press, 1990; O'Donovan, O. The Desire of the Nations. Cambridge University Press, 1996; O'Donovan, O., and J. L. O'Donovan, eds. From Irenaeus to Grotius. Eerdmans, 1999; Plant, R. Politics, Theology and History. Cambridge University Press, 2001; Song, R. Christianity and Liberal Society. Clarendon, 1997; Stackhouse, M., et al. God and Globalization. 3 vols. Trinity, 2000–2002; Yoder, J. H. The Politics of Jesus. Eerdmans, 1974. 2d ed. 1994.

Jonathan Chaplin

Polyphony See Dialogism

Postcolonialism See Asian Biblical Interpretation; Culture and Hermeneutics; Ideological Criticism; Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics; Political Theology

Postliberalism See Narrative Theology; Yale School

Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation

Theological interpretation never takes place in a vacuum; it is always historically situated. Thus, theological interpretation requires a deep knowledge not only of Scripture and the tradition but also of the context in which the church lives today. The catchall phrase used to name our time and place in the West today is postmodernity or postmodernism.

The Contours of Postmodernity

“Post” indicates the reaction to modernity that is central to postmodernism and also raises the prospect of the demise of modernity and the arrival of a new era. Such large brushstroke cultural analysis is dangerous. Unless one is careful, it becomes the equivalent of doing surgery with a club rather than a scalpel. From a Christian perspective it also unhelpfully centers the analysis around “modernity,” with premodernity and postmodernity encompassing the analytical center of modernity. Provided we are sensitive to these dangers, the postmodern debate remains a helpful way of analyzing our context. “Postmodernism” may, however, be a better term for what we are describing since it names a cluster of tendencies evident today without necessarily suggesting that modernity is over and postmodernity here.

The specifically “postmodern” debate began as a reaction to modernism in the arts in the 1960s and was extended to a critique of Western culture in its entirety in the 1980s as philosophers joined the debate in earnest (Bertens). The social and cultural dimensions of postmodernism must be distinguished from the philosophical.

(p 601) At a social and cultural level, far from representing the demise of capitalistic modernity, postmodernism indicates its triumph. While the roots of contemporary consumer culture are located in the commercial revolution of early modernity, recent decades have witnessed a massive intensification of consumerism (Bartholomew). Jameson analyzes this cultural logic of late capitalism and argues that there have been three stages in capitalism: market capitalism, the monopoly stage, and our own stage of multinational or consumer capitalism. Increasingly the core values of Western culture derive from consumption rather than the other way around, so that in this respect “postmodernism is consumption” (Storkey). With the communications revolution and consequent technologization of all of life, postmodern Western culture, far from being postmodern, embodies the extension of capitalistic consumerism into all of life. Consumerism is the great characteristic of postmodern culture—appearance is everything, and all is for sale, the only qualifications being desire and profit (cf. Bartholomew and Moritz).

Although not unconnected to consumerism, philosophically postmodernism involves a reaction against modernity. Toulmin, for example, asserts: “If an historical era is ending, it is the era of Modernity itself.... What looked in the 19th century like an irresistible river has disappeared in the sand, and we seem to have run aground.... We are now stranded and uncertain of our location. The very project of Modernity thus seems to have lost momentum, and we need to fashion a successor program” (3). Lyotard defines postmodernity as “incredulity towards metanarratives” (xxiv). Smith sums up the feeling of malaise and crisis: “The Enlightenment is dead, Marxism is dead, and the author does not feel so well either”

(quoted in Harvey 325)!

In this respect postmodernity is perhaps better described as “late modernity,” for it can be read as the unraveling of tensions hid deep in modernity. In The Condition of Postmodernity, Harvey observes that modernity rejected tradition and religious authority but held on to the hope that reason alone would lead us to truth. Postmoderns have given up on the illusion that reason alone will lead us to truth, but they have not recovered tradition and authority. Instead, they courageously celebrate and play amid our limitations and finitude, in a sort of cheerful nihilism. Indeed, by the end of the twentieth century the hubris with which the twentieth century began had been seriously undermined.

The consumerist intensification of modernity and the philosophical reactions to modernity are deeply intertwined; indeed, the very problems of consumerism raise profound questions about modernity. Theorists of the postmodern analyze the problem of contemporary culture in different ways. For Baudrillard, consumer culture, tied in as it is to the communications revolution, has led to the hyperreal replacing and being indistinguishable from what is real so that he is deeply pessimistic about our situation today (via Bertens). Other analysts such as Habermas are more optimistic about getting modernity back on track, with reason playing the appropriate critical role. The important point to note is that postmodernism is a complex social, cultural, and philosophical entity that cannot be reduced to a philosophical reaction to modernity. Perhaps one could say that postmodernism represents a crisis of modernity, as is evident from its key thinkers, who nevertheless respond to this crisis in significantly different ways.

Key Postmodern Thinkers

The influence of the German philosopher Husserl, the father of phenomenology, on philosophical postmodernism should not be underestimated; to a significant extent, postmodernism philosophically amounts to post-phenomenology. Husserl’s phenomenology was a last-ditch attempt to secure the scientific nature of knowledge in human autonomy. Significant tensions appear in his work as a result and it fell to his student Heidegger to turn phenomenology in a hermeneutic direction, thereby subverting the strongly Enlightenment character of Husserl’s philosophy. Contra Husserl’s privileging of intuition as the means to true knowledge, Heidegger asserted that we are always already thrown into the world so that we explore it out of Dasein, rather than from a neutral, objective position. In this way Heidegger brought to fruition Dilthey’s emphasis on history and understanding. Central to postmodernism is a profound sense that knower and that which is known are historically embedded so that there is no neutral vantage point from which objective, neutral analysis is possible.

Gadamer, a student of Husserl and Heidegger, did the major work in developing phenomenology into a philosophical hermeneutics, particularly in his Truth and Method. Gadamer insists on the historical nature of understanding itself: “For Gadamer ‘any interpretations of the past, whether they were performed by an historian, philosopher, linguist, or literary scholar, are as (p 602) much a creature of the interpreter’s own time and place as the phenomenon under investigation was of its own time and period in history’ ” (Mueller-Vollmer 38). In contrast to Enlightenment attitudes, Gadamer sees all interpretation as always guided by its own prejudice. This prejudice is productive and not just negative. The Enlightenment manifests a prejudice against prejudice, whereas Gadamer refuses to set reason in opposition to tradition. Indeed, understanding takes place as an event within a tradition. What makes understanding possible is Wirkungsgeschichte. Thus, hermeneutics aims at prejudgments that will foster a fusion of the past with the present, which facilitates the miracle of understanding, the sharing of a common meaning by temporally distant consciousnesses. In this fusing of horizons, distance and critical tension are never completely obliterated; the hermeneutic task is to foreground the tensions. Nevertheless, interpretation always involves application.

Since Gadamer’s approach, no other really groundbreaking hermeneutical innovations have appeared, but his hermeneutics has generated numerous debates. Gadamer is definitely a pivotal figure between modern and postmodern paradigms of thinking. Thiselton (New, 314) draws attention to Gadamer’s role in focusing for hermeneutics and addressing a cluster of metacritical questions concerning the basis of understanding and of our possible relation to truth. Gadamer’s distinctive way of addressing these questions not only constitutes a point of transition toward a new paradigm of hermeneutical theory; it also places him firmly on the boundary line between modern and postmodern thought.

According to Thiselton, the focus on metacritical issues that one finds in Gadamer emerges from three directions. First is the problem of radical historical finitude. Second is the problem of the constitutive role of language in understanding. Third, unease has beset academic disciplines as they submit to reappraisal what have been regarded as foundations for their methods.

Ricoeur is particularly significant for his understanding of interpretation as a semantic event, of the fusion of text and interpreter through the interplay of metaphor and symbol in a reading along the lines of a second naïveté. In contrast to Gadamer, Ricoeur seeks to bring together explanation and understanding. In Ricoeur's view, Gadamer lets the two collapse into each other so that there tends to be no space for critical testings of understandings. For Ricoeur, "explanation" embodies a hermeneutic of suspicion: the willingness to expose and to abolish idols, which are mere projections of the human will. Ricoeur is critical of the Enlightenment insofar as it locates meaning in the subject; he professes a permanent mistrust of the pretensions of the subject in posing itself as the foundation of its own meaning. "The reflective philosophy to which I appeal is at the outset opposed to any philosophy of the Cartesian type.... The understanding of the self is always indirect and proceeds from the interpretation of signs given outside me in culture and history.... The self of self-understanding is a gift of understanding itself and of the invitation from the meaning inscribed in the text" (Phenomenology, xv).

However, Ricoeur has no desire to be premodern. We cannot, nor should we, try to escape the lessons of the masters of suspicion, Nietzsche, Marx, and Freud. Hence, "explanation" is an imperative part of interpretation. However, explanation alone is inadequate: "To smash the idols is also to let symbols speak" (Phenomenology, 219). Understanding involves a willingness to listen with openness to symbols and to indirect language in such a way that we experience being called again. Narrative orders scattered sequential experiences and events into a coherent structure of human time. This refigured world becomes revelatory and transformative. Narrative constructs a world of the possible.

There is good reason for the positive appropriation of Ricoeur by theologians. Ricoeur's positive stance toward symbol makes him open to religious experience, and although Ricoeur retains a commitment to the autonomy of "responsible thought" (Essays, 156), he also wants to secure a fundamental place for religion and theology. Not only has Ricoeur written extensively about literary theoretical and hermeneutical issues; he has also specifically focused on biblical interpretation. Ricoeur has addressed virtually every major theoretical issue in literary criticism, and his irenic approach mediates the interests of Gadamer and Habermas, redirecting hermeneutics away from Derridean extremes (see below).

Habermas has reacted strongly to the postmodern notion of the end of modernity, proposing instead that we think of modernity as an unfinished project. Modernity is in crisis, but the answer is to get it back on track, not to abandon it. Habermas has strongly criticized Gadamer's understanding of hermeneutics as a fusion of horizons leading to consensus because, in Habermas's view, it fails to take account of the possibility of systematic distortion in the communication process. This (p 603) has led to an ongoing debate between Habermas and Gadamer, which has highlighted the metacritical (or lack thereof) dimension of Gadamer's hermeneutics. Habermas proposes a project of universal pragmatics as he seeks to establish that the possibility of ideal speech is implied in the structure of language. In appealing to reasons, speakers assume that their claims could be substantiated through rational discourse alone. Thus, communication in general points to something like Habermas's ideal-speech situation.

Rorty has expounded a pragmatic version of postmodernity. What is required is not a new quest for legitimation but a detheoreticized sense of community. From such a position one could accept Habermas's privileging of undistorted communication without needing to ground it in a theory of communicative competence. Thus for Rorty, postmodern bourgeois liberalism is "the Hegelian attempt to defend the institutions and practices of the rich North Atlantic democracies without using [the traditional Kantian] buttresses" ("Postmodernist," 584–85). For such postmodern liberalism, morality is stripped of its transcendent grounding and becomes equivalent to loyalty to a society. Rational behavior is simply what conforms to the behavior of other members of a society.

Rorty uses Gadamer to support his view that all knowledge is traditioned and that the idea of the accurate representation of reality underlying the Western concern with epistemology is a myth (Philosophy). All forms of knowledge are closer to making than to finding and have this in common with creative enterprises in general. Consequently, the obsession of Western epistemology with legitimation is irrelevant and wedded to an outmoded metaphysics. In place of the epistemological concerns of the Western tradition, Rorty proposes the goal of "edification." Rather than trying to justify our beliefs, we should foster conversations in which we are exposed to and can explore other options and thus find better ways of coping. Rorty thus develops Gadamer's notion that there can be no determinate criteria of interpretation along thoroughly pragmatic lines. For Rorty, hermeneutics is not a way of knowing but a way of coping.

Derrida's type of postmodernism, which also develops out of phenomenology, is called "deconstruction." In response to Husserl and modernity, Derrida's great contribution is to have dismantled the fortress of consciousness through his close analysis of texts. Thereby he exposes in aporia the ever-present "metaphysics of presence." According to Derrida, we cannot ultimately escape metaphysics, and his hermeneutics of deconstruction always therefore operates in two modes at the same time. This is clear with Derrida's textual strategies. On the one hand, the guardrail of authorial intention is indispensable for interpretation. Simultaneously, the aporias in texts enable us to prod them into play, with the result that they are set in motion and flux so that textual meaning can never be saturated or finally constrained.

All these thinkers acknowledge the crisis of modernity, but their responses are plural and diverse; indeed, a significant characteristic of postmodernism is pluralism, as diverse epistemologies compete for attention.

Postmodernism and Textual Interpretation

The philosophical diversity of "the postmodern turn" has been powerfully experienced in biblical hermeneutics, as in virtually all disciplines. Within biblical studies this influence has often been mediated through literary theory, which has itself come to exercise a strong influence far beyond its disciplinary boundaries. The (postmodern) literary turn provides a radical challenge to traditional models.

The very possibility of determinate and true readings of texts has been called into question by much postmodern literary theory. Author, reader, text, and their interrelationships have come under fresh scrutiny, and a variety of positions have developed, particularly as the role of the reader in the construction of meaning has received fresh attention:

But this latter qualification—the enfranchisement of the viewer's perspective—is precisely the feature which introduces the subversive possibility that each term in the "total situation" is radically unstable or indeterminate, a product of the beholder's gaze.... The drift of the "pragmatic" or, as it is nowadays called, reader-response orientation in critical theory challenges the privileged position of the work of art and seeks to undermine its priority and authority not only by displacing the work from the centre and substituting the reader in its place, but [also] by putting in doubt the autonomy of the work and, in certain cases, even causing the work to "vanish" altogether. (Freund 2)

The result is that nowadays there is considerable disagreement over where to anchor textual meaning, if anywhere. Hirsch maintains that textual meaning is inseparable from authorial intention; Barthes, Foucault, and others have pronounced the author dead. Ricoeur and Gadamer see the text as loosed from the author but locate (p 604) its fixed meaning in its ideality (Wolterstorff, "Promise"). Burke has recently declared the return of the author. The reader and his/her role in the construction of meaning have in the process received close attention with a whole variety of proposals put forward.

In the process the very nature of textuality has become highly problematic. Until recently, the classical-humanist paradigm of textuality had dominated the history of biblical interpretation. According to this tradition, texts are stretches of language that express the thoughts of their authors, and they refer to the extralinguistic world. Texts were seen as mediating interpersonal communication. The new approaches have called every aspect of this tradition into question.

Postmodernism and Biblical Interpretation

As with other disciplines, postmodernism has arrived with a vengeance in biblical studies. It has undermined the dominance of historical criticism, introduced a smorgasbord of new approaches to reading biblical texts, and raised all sorts of foundational questions about biblical interpretation so that biblical studies has become fragmented and pluralistic. Rendtorff's assessment of the current state of OT scholarship rings true of biblical studies as a whole:

Old Testament scholarship at present is "in crisis." The Wellhausen paradigm no longer functions as a commonly accepted presupposition for Old Testament exegesis. And at present, no other concept is visible that could replace such a widely accepted position.... The shaking of this paradigm is part of a far-reaching shaking of the centuries-old fundamentals of Old Testament scholarship.... Almost half a thousand years have faded away. (44)

The methodological pluralism now widespread in biblical studies is the most obvious indication of the influence of postmodernism, with a huge variety of approaches and methods being applied in biblical interpretation (see Adam, Handbook; idem, Postmodern ... Bible). An example of this pluralist style in action is Clines's "Reading Esther from Left to Right," in which he performs a formalist, structuralist, feminist, materialist, and deconstructionist reading of Esther. He concludes: "I have been impressed in this study by the value of as many strategies as possible for reading a text. As a critic of the text, I should hate to be restricted by a methodological purism. What I have noticed is that different strategies confirm, complement or comment on other strategies, and so help develop an integrated but polychromatic reading" (51).

If a wild methodological pluralism is the surface manifestation of postmodernism in biblical studies, it is important to realize that at a foundational, depth level lies a philosophical and theological diversity informing the surface diversity. Clines's methodological pluralism (mentioned above) is related to his view of textuality and whether or not texts have meanings that can be discovered. Referring to Ps. 23, Clines ("Varieties," 20) concludes: "My experience with Psalm 23 was enough to convince me that ‘possible’ and ‘impossible’ are not categories to be applied to interpretations, that, as far as I could see, a text can mean anything at all, and that I myself was (oxymoronically) an absolute indeterminist.” Such radical indeterminism is connected philosophically to theorists such as Nietzsche, Derrida, and Foucault and their views of textuality, language, and historicity. Foucault, for example, speaks of the death of the author. The effect of this is to (over)empower the reader in interpretation, often at the expense of the text, which becomes a means for performative interpretation by the reader.

Many other views of language and texts coexist with the sort of radical view (described above) in biblical studies today. Ideological critique—whether of the feminist or postcolonial or queer sort—of the Bible is much in vogue nowadays, and it depends on determinate readings of the text. Thereby one is able to confidently discern the ideology in the biblical texts; from this angle such readers are often more concerned to assert that texts do indeed have meaning that can be discovered. Some experts in biblical hermeneutics such as Sternberg, Thiselton, and Wolterstorff have also resisted textual indeterminism by developing nuanced understandings of the role of the author in textual interpretation. Wolterstorff, for example, advocates authorial-discourse interpretation that aims to discern what the author did in fact say in his/her text. Sternberg appeals to embodied intentionality. Thiselton, Wolterstorff, and Watson have used the resources of speech-act theory to resist the excesses of much postmodern biblical interpretation. Some biblical scholars also lean heavily on Gadamer and Ricoeur, who locate the fixity of meaning in the ideality of texts.

Biblical scholars are not generally trained philosophically, and thus many are unaware of the foundational philosophical diversity informing the plethora of approaches today. However, it is vital in assessing postmodernism in biblical studies to note the swirling philosophical variety (p 605) that underlies what is going on at the surface. We are now in a situation where diverse epistemologies and anthropologies compete for attention in biblical interpretation.

The great diversity of approaches available today is related to our consumer culture with its supermarkets and endless range of products. In response to our changed context, Clines has even proposed a market theory of interpretation, which is overtly a manifestation of consumerism:

I want to propose a model for biblical interpretation that accepts the realities of our pluralist context.... First comes the recognition that texts do not have determinate meanings.... The second axis for my framework is provided by the idea of interpretative communities....

There is no objective standard by which we can know whether one interpretation or other is right; we can only tell whether it has been accepted.... There are no determinate meanings and there are no universally agreed upon legitimate interpretations.

What are biblical scholars then to be doing with themselves?... Biblical interpreters have to give up the goal of determinate and universally acceptable interpretations, and devote themselves to interpretations they can sell—in whatever mode is called for by the communities they choose to serve. I call this “customised” interpretation. (“Possibilities,” 78–80)

Such a consumer approach could entail recycling old wasted interpretations, which were thought to have been superseded by the progress model of modernity. These discarded interpretations could be revived in a postcritical form to stock afresh the shelves of the interpretative supermarket. Clines commends feminist and ideology criticism in particular. More than any other form, feminist criticism relativizes the authority of the Bible because it takes its starting point in an ideological position quite different from the patriarchal biblical text. Reading from “left to right” is Clines’s slogan for reading the text against its grain and insisting on addressing one’s own questions to the text.

Clines’s proposals are a good example of how consumerism and philosophical antimodernism come together in much postmodernism. Few scholars would be as up front about letting desire and the market control biblical interpretation, and some are vehemently opposed to such a move. Thus, Brueggemann, who is largely positive about postmodernity, says that the dominant infrastructure of consumerism contains little good news for biblical interpretation (27).

Postmodernism and Theological Interpretation

Potentially, at least, postmodernism creates space for theological interpretation. But what should such interpretation look like at this time and place? The diversity of postmodernism at the foundational level means that theological evaluation is crucial and would need to inform theological interpretation today at every point. Works with the range of Gunton’s The One, the Three and the Many are vital in this context. Gunton ranges across modernity and postmodernity as he seeks to read our times and discern appropriate ways forward from a trinitarian perspective.

Not surprisingly, in our fragmented context theologians articulate a diversity of views about postmodernism. Some are very positive about the ethical emphases of philosophers such as Derrida and Levinas, and they seek to bring theology into close relationship with postmodern emphases. Others are far more skeptical about postmodernism and some alert us to the underlying grip of Gnosticism on much postmodernism, so that caution and critique is where any theological assessment should begin (for postmodernism and Gnosticism, cf. Lundin; Jeffrey).

Graham Ward suggests that Derrida's philosophy of language complements and supports Karl Barth's theology and thus could be of great help to us in theological interpretation. According to Milbank, however, "if Derrida can give a gnostic hermeneutic of the human text in the light of the gnostic logos, then we should have the confidence to give a Christian hermeneutic in the light of the real one" (79). Brueggemann responds positively to the opportunities of postmodernism and suggests that we need a mode of reading the Bible able to fund postmodern imagination. Others are far more critical of postmodernism. Plantinga, for example, relates much of what is called postmodernism to a sort of creative antirealism stemming ultimately from Kant.

Positively, it must be acknowledged that postmodernism has disrupted the hegemony of historical criticism and created room for diverse approaches. In the process, space has been made for the ongoing renewal of theological interpretation. Now that it is acknowledged that all readers bring their interests to the biblical text, it is logically hard to discount all theological interpretation as unscientific and unsuitable for the academy. Indeed, in philosophy postmodernism has led to a renewal of interest in religion. As Vattimo has asserted, there is now no longer any (p 606)reason for keeping religion out of philosophy (oral comment). Derrida, Kristeva, and others readily engage with biblical texts in their writings, and philosophical conferences are convened on topics such as prayer and forgiveness.

All this is cause for encouragement, and theological interpretation needs to exploit these opportunities. But it is a mistake to interpret this renewed interest in religion necessarily as openness toward the revelation of God in Jesus Christ. Indeed, the historicism latent in so much postmodernism makes such openness unlikely. Vattimo, for example, seeks to recover a hollowed-out version of kenosis beyond Nietzsche. Rorty has come to take more of an interest in religion, yet it is anything but Christian (Boffetti). Derrida has appropriated many Jewish and Christian motifs in his work. Positively, he has contributed in a major way to dismantling the fortress of consciousness, but deconstruction is a long way from a Christian understanding of the world. Derrida's practice of (mis)handling texts, seen clearly in his reading of the tower of Babel narrative, militates strongly against Ward's suggestion that his philosophy of language fits with Barth's theology. And as Steiner rightly notes, deconstruction ultimately confronts us with a choice between nihilism or “In the beginning was the Word”:

It is Derrida’s strength to have seen so plainly that the issue is neither linguistic-aesthetic nor philosophical in any traditional, debatable sense—where such tradition and debate incorporate, perpetuate the very ghosts which are to be exorcized. The issue is, quite simply, that of the meaning of meaning as it is re-insured by the postulate of the existence of God. “In the beginning was the Word.” There was no such beginning, says deconstruction; only the play of sounds and markers amid the mutations of time. (120)

Some postmodern philosophers are, I suggest, far more compatible with Christian theism than Rorty and Derrida. Levinas, and Ricoeur in particular, have been found by theologians to be fertile thinkers in relation to Christian theology (Vanhoozer; Fodor; Tracy).

However, the different approaches taken to interpretation and hermeneutics by the Chicago (Ricoeur; Tracy) as opposed to the Yale School (Frei; Lindbeck) foreground an important issue for theological interpretation: the role of philosophy and general hermeneutics. The Chicago School is much more positive toward the role of philosophy in biblical hermeneutics than the Yale School. Thiselton, and here he stands with the Chicago School, has argued that transformative biblical interpretation must attend closely to philosophical hermeneutics. The Yale School, and here its Barthian legacy is clear, is suspicious of the hermeneutical detour and of generalized epistemologies and ontologies, preferring a regional epistemology and wanting to simply get on with reading the Bible for the church. However, it is a moot point as to whether philosophical issues can be ignored in this fashion. The challenge to theological interpretation will be to read the contemporary context aright and to forge theological ways of reading the Bible as Scripture in this context.

Conclusion

Postmodernism presents theological interpretation with tremendous opportunities and real challenges. It has created space for theological interpretation in the academy, but this space will have to be seized without succumbing to the relativism and secularism that is intrinsic to so much postmodernism.

Bibliography

Adam, A. K. M., ed. Handbook of Postmodern Biblical Interpretation. Chalice, 2000; idem. Postmodern Interpretations of the Bible: A Reader. Chalice, 2001; Bartholomew, C. “Christ and Consumerism: An Introduction.” Pages 1–12 in Christ and Consumerism, ed. C. Bartholomew and T. Moritz. Paternoster, 2000; Bertens, H. The Idea of the Postmodern. Routledge, 1995; Boffetti, J. "How Richard Rorty Found Religion." First Things 143 (May 2004): 24–30; Brueggemann, W. Texts under Negotiation. SCM, 1993; Burke, S. The Death and Return of the Author. Edinburgh University Press, 1992; Clines, D. J. A. "Possibilities and Priorities of Biblical Interpretation in an International Perspective." BibInt 1, no. 1 (1993): 67–87; idem. "Reading Esther from Left to Right: Contemporary Strategies for Reading a Biblical Text." Pages 31–52 in The Bible in Three Dimensions, ed. D. J. A. Clines, S. Fowl, and S. Porter. JSOT, 1990; idem. "Varieties of Indeterminacy." Semeia 71 (1996): 17–27; Fodor, J. Christian Hermeneutics. Clarendon, 1995; Freund, E. The Return of the Reader. Methuen, 1987; Gunton, C. The One, the Three and the Many. Cambridge University Press, 1993; Habermas, J. The Theory of Communicative Action, trans. T. McCarthy. 2 vols. Beacon, 1984–87; Harvey, D. The Condition of Postmodernity. Blackwell, 1989; Jameson, F. Postmodernism, or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism. Duke University Press, 1991; Jeffrey, D. L. People of the Book. Eerdmans, 1996; Lundin, R. The Culture of Interpretation. Eerdmans, 1993; Lyotard, J.-F. The Postmodern Condition. University of Minnesota Press, 1984; Milbank, J. The Word Made Strange. Blackwell, 1997; Mueller-Vollmer, K., ed. The Hermeneutics Reader. Continuum, 1992; Plantinga, A. "Two (or More) Kinds of Scripture Scholarship." Modern Theology 14 (April 1998): 243–78; Rendtorff, R. "The Paradigm Is Changing: Hopes—and Fears." BibInt 1, no. 1 (1993): 34–53; Ricoeur, P. Essays on Biblical Interpretation. Fortress, 1980; idem. "Foreword." In Hermeneutic (p 607) Phenomenology. By D. Ihde. Northwestern University Press, 1971; Rorty, R. Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature. Princeton University Press, 1979; idem. "Postmodernist Bourgeois Liberalism." Journal of Philosophy 80, no. 10 (1983): 584–85; Steiner, G. Real Presences. Faber & Faber, 1989; Sternberg, M. The Poetics of Biblical Narrative. Indiana University Press, 1985; Storkey, A. "Postmodernism Is Consumption." Pages 100–117 in Christ and Consumerism, ed. C. Bartholomew and T. Moritz. Paternoster, 2000; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. Zondervan, 1992; idem. The Two Horizons. Paternoster/Eerdmans, 1980; Toulmin, S. Cosmopolis. University of Chicago Press, 1990; Tracy, D. The Analogical Imagination. Seabury, 1975; Vanhoozer, K. Biblical Narrative in the Philosophy of Paul Ricoeur. Cambridge University Press, 1990; Watson, F. Text, Church and World. T&T Clark, 1994; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995; idem. "The Promise of Speech-Act Theory for Biblical Interpretation." Pages 73–90 in After Pentecost, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2001.

Craig G. Bartholomew

Poststructuralism

Although structuralism itself hardly qualifies as a unified movement, the views of poststructuralists are so diverse that it is difficult to speak of "poststructuralism." The term is often interchanged with "postmodernism" (which also defies definition); though there are many overlapping positions and figures, there is no exact congruency. Poststructuralists are probably best described by way of their reaction to the problems of structuralism: (1) its reductionistic tendencies, (2) the focus on formal structure instead of practice, (3) a lack of regard for history, and (4) the assumption of the universality and stability of binary oppositions.

Perhaps the earliest poststructuralist is M. M. Bakhtin (1895–1975), whose work has only become influential in the West in recent years. In his essay “Discourse in the Novel,” he speaks of overcoming the “abstract ‘formal’ approach” and does so by repudiating structuralism’s reductionism and emphasizing practice and history. The concept of “dialogue” is central for Bakhtin, since words are alive, constantly evolving, and closely related to both their referents and the persons who use them. As he puts it, “The living utterance ... cannot fail to brush up against thousands of dialogic threads, woven by socio-ideological consciousness around the given object of an utterance” (276). Bakhtin likewise speaks of the “heteroglossia” of language, that it has a multitude of speakers and contexts, none of which can claim primacy. A similar term for him is that of “carnival,” the intersection of language, history, meanings of author/speaker and reader/listener, and genres. But this play is grounded in what Bakhtin calls “answerability,” the ethical responsibility that dialogue partners have to each other (“Art”). And that ethical responsibility is in turn grounded in Bakhtin’s theism.

As is typical of Jacques Derrida (1930–2004) in so many respects, both structuralist elements and the questioning of those elements can be found in his thought. Derrida would agree with Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913) that language is a system of signs in which meaning is dependent upon difference. Indeed, Derrida elevates “différance” (a term of his own creation) to something like a fundamental metaphysical category, claiming that speaking, understanding, and concepts themselves are characterized by “difference.” Thus, interpretation is always a complex mixture that requires understanding words and texts in ways both similar to and different from what the author meant or previous usage or interpretation. Whereas for Saussure the play of signifiers is neat, unchanging, and self-contained, for Derrida it is complex, evolving, and without clear limits. Although he sounds much like a structuralist when he makes his famous claim “there is nothing outside of the text” (Of Grammatology, 158), Derrida later explains that this merely means that there is nothing outside of context (Limited, 136)—a markedly “poststructuralist” claim. Derrida is sometimes read as agreeing with structuralists that signifiers have their meaning apart from referents. But making context central to meaning and connecting signifiers to references seems to indicate a view that is the opposite of structuralism. Derrida claims that signifiers are problematic precisely because they do not give us a “full presence” of that signified. But Derrida uses the notion of the “trace” to indicate that there is still some sort of presence given by signifiers.

Derrida’s essay “Structure, Sign, and Play in the Discourse of Human Sciences” is a hallmark in the critique of structuralism; in it he claims that there is no place to “stand” outside of the structure to critique it. Thus, there is no possibility of a “neutral” or “objective” read of the structure itself, or the words and texts that compromise it. In contrast to Saussure, Derrida insists that words and texts are not ideal structures but are thoroughly connected to their historical contexts, and thus subject to temporal change. By way of what he terms “deconstruction,” Derrida undermines not only structuralism’s ahistoricity, reductionism, and the assumption that language is a closed (p 608) system, but also the very binary oppositions that provide structuralism’s “structure.” While Derrida is often read as simply denying binary oppositions (such as light/dark or male/female), it would be more accurate to say that he retains them but questions any simple disjunction between them. Deconstruction has often been construed as promoting hermeneutic and ethical relativism (and there are certainly grounds for such charges). But Derrida strenuously denies that deconstruction necessarily leads to such results, describing the common caricature of the deconstructionist as “skeptic-relativist-nihilist” as simply “false” (Limited, 146). Instead, he insists that deconstruction is the “unbuilding” of a complex structure, both to examine its component parts and to consider what is assumed but left unsaid.

Although Derrida claims that deconstruction is something that “happens,” it is often considered to be a method for reading texts, one that can be either helpful or highly destructive. In contemporary literary and biblical interpretation, one can find examples of both. An important difficulty in providing examples is that the term “deconstruction” is often either loosely appropriated or employed pejoratively for interpretations with which one does not agree. Considering Derrida’s own reading of the Abraham and Isaac narrative (Gen. 22) in The Gift of Death is one way around this problem. Following Søren Kierkegaard’s account in Fear and Trembling, Derrida sees Abraham as suspended between the binary opposition of the demand of universal law and the absolute singularity of responsibility to God’s call. For Derrida, it is only in this moment of the paradox that true ethical responsibility can be decided. Derrida in no way denies the universality of moral law (and in his later writings he goes so far as to claim that justice is so absolute that it cannot be deconstructed). Yet he resists any reduction of the ethical to universal law. Instead, he argues that the ethical exists precisely in the tension between—on the one hand—the universal, ahistorical, and theoretical and—on the other hand—the singular, historical, and practical.

The move from “archaeology” to “genealogy” in the later work of Michel Foucault (1926–84) also marks a decisive break from structuralism. Archaeology is the search for basic structures or “epistemes” (ways of thinking); genealogy is simply the attempt to trace the historical development of thought and practice. Much like human genealogies, it is assumed that there is no “overarching” structure, merely a set of ideas and practices that have no essential unity and usually are partially contradictory, overlapping, and constantly developing in ways that are unforeseen and disorganized. Strongly influenced by Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900), Foucault is particularly concerned with the ways in which practices and discourses are regulated: what can be said, what constitutes a discourse, and who controls discourses (see, e.g., “Discourse” and “Nietzsche”). Reading texts from a Foucaultian viewpoint involves seeking to discover what hierarchies, values, and implied prohibitions are at work both within and behind the text. Genealogy is decidedly diachronic (rather than synchronic) in nature, for it assumes that discourse develops not in a linear, purely rational way but by way of various forces that are diverse and always connected to power in one or more ways.

Although some have accused Foucault of envisioning a “power play” behind everything, he rightly reminds us that language, social practice, and even the search for truth are never simply benign. So images of the “objective scientist” or the “neutral hermeneut” (even of the biblical variety) are simply modern or Enlightenment fantasies. Interpretations, then, must always be subject to such questions: What is an interpreter’s point of view? Whose interpretations dominate in literary or biblical fields? What legitimates that dominance? And whose interpretations are excluded as “illegitimate”? One need not agree with Foucault’s particular stance or values to realize that such questions cannot simply be ignored. Foucault also reminds us that the very notion of the “author” has its own genealogy, shifting significantly from the Middle Ages to the present day. Although authorship was once taken to be key in scientific texts but not in literary ones, almost the opposite is true today (“What?”).

Further poststructuralists include Roland Barthes (1915–80), Jean-François Lyotard (1924–98), and Julia Kristeva (1941–). Barthes began his career as a structuralist but is probably best known for his poststructuralist views regarding the death of the author, the proliferation of textual meaning, and the radical openness of texts. In The Postmodern Condition (1979), Lyotard questions the very possibility of constructing an overarching “narrative” (and thus any kind of “universal structure”), though he actually finds support for this view in the decidedly “modern” Immanuel Kant (1724–1804). Along with other feminist poststructuralists, Julia Kristeva has turned attention toward “otherness.” For instance, Strangers to Ourselves is an examination of the phenomenon of the foreigner, as well as the experience of the (p 609) “strangeness” within ourselves. Like Derrida’s questioning of binary oppositions, such analyses challenge the structuralist assumption of a clear sense of identity of the self or the alien.

See also Deconstruction; Dialogism; Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation; Structuralism

Bibliography

Bakhtin, M. M. “Art and Answerability.” In Art and Answerability, ed. M. Holquist and V. Liapunov, trans. V. Liapunov. University of Texas Press, 1990; idem. “Discourse in the Novel.” In The Dialogic Imagination, ed. M. Holquist, trans. C. Emerson and M. Holquist. University of Texas Press, 1981; Derrida, J. The Gift of Death, trans. D. Wills. University of Chicago Press, 1995; idem. Of Grammatology, trans. G. Spivak. Corrected ed. Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998; idem. Limited Inc. Northwestern University Press, 1988; idem. “Structure, Sign, and Play in the Discourse of the Human Sciences.” In Writing and Difference, trans. A. Bass. University of Chicago Press, 1978; Foucault, M. “The Discourse on Language.” In The Archaeology of Knowledge, trans. A. M. Sheridan Smith. Pantheon, 1972; idem. “Nietzsche, Genealogy, History” and “What Is an Author?” In The Foucault Reader, ed. P. Rabinow. Pantheon, 1984; Frank, M. What Is Neostructuralism?, trans. S. Wilke and R. T. Gray. University of Minnesota Press, 1989; Kristeva, J. Strangers to Ourselves, trans. L. S. Roudiez. Columbia University Press, 1981; Lyotard, J. The Postmodern Condition. French, 1979, trans. G. Bennington and B. Massumi. University of Minnesota Press, 1984.

Bruce Ellis Benson

Power      See Ideological Criticism; Powers and Principalities; Racism; Violence

Powers and Principalities

The biblical portrayal of “the principalities and powers” has been badly misconstrued throughout church history. Interpretations have ranged from the extreme of medieval tendencies to confuse the powers with angels or demons to the Enlightenment arrogance of discarding the biblical terms entirely as silly fantasies from an “outdated cosmology” that nobody believes anymore. The first is demonstrated today by the popularity of apocalyptic novels of gruesome spiritual “powers”; on the opposite extreme, a major, current Bible dictionary includes only two sentences on this complex subject.

In contrast, biblical terms for various forces of evil are numerous and complex. Serious study of the relevant texts promotes a proper understanding of the powers’ existence and work—crucial for the active engagement of Christians in the world, especially in areas of justice-building and peacemaking.

Biblical Texts concerning the Powers

The language of other evil forces besides angels and Satan first developed in the NT, primarily in the Pauline Epistles. Colossians 1:16 emphasizes that the principalities and powers are created by God in, through, and for Christ. However, the powers share the fracturing of the fallen cosmos, participate in its destructions, overstep their proper vocation, and groan for deliverance (Rom. 8:19–22).

Until Christ’s kingdom is consummated, principalities contribute in multiple ways to the world’s disorders; yet, however strong they seem to be, they cannot separate us from God’s love (Rom. 8:38–39), for Christ has disarmed, exposed, and triumphed over them in the entire work of atonement (Col. 2:9–15). Ultimately, every principality, authority, and power (archē, exousia, and dynamis) will be abolished, including the last enemy, death (1 Cor. 15:24–26).

Meanwhile, Christians must not lose sight of the crucial battle against them, for the principalities were the ones who “crucified the Lord of glory” (1 Cor. 2:8). That text—referring to earthly rulers like Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate—suggests the powers’ functioning in religious, as well as political and economic, spheres. This should caution churches and spiritual leaders, for if they forget their proper vocation and lack essential vigilance, they, too, can become principalities for evil.

The dialectic is difficult to hold—and therefore all the more mandatory. Because we know that the powers and authorities have been made subject to Christ (Eph. 1:21; 1 Pet. 3:22), we can submit to them (Titus 3:1). Simultaneously, however, we must stand against and resist their illegitimate encroachments and enslavements by means of God’s armor (Eph. 6:10–20; Yoder Neufeld; the significance of these passages is elaborated in Dawn and Peterson 84–102, 112–19).

The Essence of the Powers

Remarkably, the Bible never examines the powers nor offers any description of their “being”; thus, what the cosmic powers or superhuman potentates are exactly is impossible to say. Rather, Scriptures recognize their mystery by simply naming or briefly displaying their functioning. They are not merely human beings gone amok, but they affect historical events and structures. Contrarily, they are distinguished from supernatural angels and demons, but instruments such as the state, money, the media, technology, and (p 610) various ideologies bear spiritual powers beyond themselves (Ellul, Humiliation).

In the context of 1 Cor. 8, the combination of “there is no such thing as an idol,” “no God but one,” and “many ‘gods’ and many ‘lords’ ” (8:4–6 AT/NIV) suggests how entities of God’s creation combine with human involvement and supernatural power to become forces for evil. That is, the principalities (since Christ’s defeat of them) have no power over us, unless we give it to them in our idolatries.

In this world they have immense scope. They are fallen and will act as fallen unless vigilantly guarded. They thrive in chaos and confusion, cause conflict and dehumanization, act aggressively, enthrall, enslave, and destroy (Stringfellow 77–94).

The Principalities in the Practice of Theological Interpretation

All the earliest formulations of faith (an objective criterion for verifying what the first Christians considered essential) invariably mentioned the powers decisively. The early church accentuated the consequences of Christ’s victory over them (Cullmann 103, 192).

However, during Reformation times, misunderstandings by various apocalyptic sects caused Luther and Calvin to avoid the language of “principalities and powers.” Later scholars such as Schleiermacher reduced both the powers and God in the trend toward a noncosmic and subjective conception of Christ’s kingdom. Both avoidance and subjectivized reductions continue today.

When theological discussions could not name the disastrous events of World Wars I and II in any other way than by restoring the vocabulary of “the principalities and powers,” three broadly influential leaders were Johann Christoph Blumhardt, Dietrich Bonhoeffer, and Karl Barth. In contrast to Bultmann, who “demythologized” the concept of “the powers,” Barth showed that the apostle Paul himself was demythologizing his culture’s notions of hierarchies of intermediaries—and thereby Barth turned the modern hermeneutical problem on its head (Barth, Church).

Barth’s lecture fragments describe the powers as “spirits with a life and activity of their own, lordless indwelling forces, ... entities with their own right and dignity ... as absolutes.” Their reality and effectiveness are vague, paradoxical, incomprehensible; they are transitory and assume a variety of forms in different historical epochs, cultural circles, and individuals’ lives (Barth, Christian, 214–15).

Chiefly, the NT authors, surmounting their contemporaries’ cosmology, saw and revealed the powers’ presence and potency more clearly than do we, who often ignore them or are hindered by our society’s overly rational, scientific worldview. Barth insisted Christians should demythologize not the concept of “the principalities,” but the myths that enable modern ones such as politics or mammon to exert their diverse tyrannies (20–33). Colossians 2 and Eph. 6 display this demythologizing: Christ’s victory on the cross “exposed” the powers and rendered them vulnerable, and our battle against them similarly begins with Christian truth about their functioning for evil (for examples of exposing and resisting the powers, see Ellul, Money; Dawn, Is?).

Recently Walter Wink highlighted the powers afresh, but he restricts them to violence, and his reductionistic Christology depreciates Christ’s work of atonement and resurrection as the means by which the powers are defeated (instead, see Ellul, Ethics; Dawn, Powers).

The Theological Significance of the Powers

Several themes in Christian anthropology and the doctrine of the atonement are lost if the power of the principalities is disregarded or reduced. First, our sense of the cosmic battle disclosed in world events is weakened (Stewart 293). Next, we dilute the NT focus on the demonic nature of the evil from which all humankind (and the rest of creation) must be redeemed. The cross was more than a mere “revelation of love and mercy”; rather, it embodied an “objective transaction” that radically transformed the entire cosmos by a “decisive irrevocable defeat of the powers of darkness.” Human designs, Christ’s will, and God’s predestination “met and interlocked” (294–95).

Religious leaders, Jewish and Roman politics, mammon, and the crowds as a social force all served as “agents of more sinister invisible powers” (295–96). Everything in Jesus’ life—incarnation, teaching, ministry—was essential to meet “the cosmic forces on the ground of history where they were entrenched” so that Jesus could shatter their power. Only by such lordship could God reconcile the whole universe in Christ (297–300).

The Necessity for Using “the Powers” Language. Since biblical times resemble the present era, biblical language spotlights current manifestations of the powers—an essential tool for fruitful ecclesiology. Similarities between the epochs include a world becoming too complicated too fast; a world in which “little people” feel like playthings of great historical forces; the revival (p 611) of superstition and religion, contrasted with an escalating sense of fatalism and reckless gambling upon wild chance; the distresses of advancements in warfare; enormous systems of power; immense numbers of people; colossal quantities of material; catastrophic situations that economists and politicians cannot understand; the inexorable bondage of peoples’ will; idealistic revolutionary movements; twisted and perverted solidarities and ideologies. Most important, both aeons have been characterized by pessimism, despair, nihilism, and hopelessness because so many approaches to solving the world’s problems have failed, so that today there seems to be no way out of the political, economic, and environmental messes (Rupp 13–26).

Theological Clarifications concerning the Powers. Different dominions must be distinguished to understand the powers clearly. Because the Trinity is Lord of the cosmos, in creation the powers were only good.

However, the fall of humankind was shared by the principalities. Now, just as human beings must guard their sinful nature lest it issue in specific sins, so the powers tend to overstep their proper calling unless confined to it. Thus, governments transgress their appropriate role and become tyrannical; technology controls us instead of serving our goals; money becomes the idol mammon; the media indoctrinate instead of inform.

How can this be if Christ’s cross and empty tomb decisively defeated the powers? Jesus’ historical victory can be compared to D-Day, which established a beachhead and broke Hitler’s sovereignty. Though Nazi forces continued to wreak havoc, the limit set to their working was the sign and promise of ultimate defeat (Berkhof 43).

At VE Day total victory was secured. Analogously, when Christ’s kingdom is culminated at the end of time, all evil powers will be abolished and the cosmos will be recapitulated.

Meanwhile, it makes an enormous difference in the way individuals and churches live if they remember Blumhardt’s cry: “That Jesus is conqueror is eternally settled: the universe is his!” (Yoder, Politics, 157). Then Christian political, economic, and social involvement operates not from the need to change things, but from the desire to make clear what really is the case.

An overly futurist eschatology undervalues Christ’s victory and makes him only a potential king. Contrarily, an overstatement of the victory already achieved underestimates the principalities' reality as adversaries and crushes hope if situations do not improve.

The complex relationship of Colossians (proclaiming Christ's creation lordship over the powers in 1:16 and redemption victory over them in 2:14–15) and Ephesians (warning about continuing warfare against the powers in 6:10–20) is rooted in a temporal, not metaphysical, dualism (Cullmann 199). Colossians is not referring to a "heavenly" situation, as opposed to Ephesians' description of an "earthly" struggle. Rather, Colossians displays the abundance of the new aeon, which has already broken into ours, while Ephesians alerts us to the dangers of the old aeon in and with which we still live.

The Church's Tasks in Opposing the Powers

The church proclaims the end of the principalities' dominion and displays the manifold wisdom of God that limits the powers' functioning (Eph. 3:7–10). It celebrates the signs of Christ's ultimate defeat of all evil.

The community seeking to follow Jesus will be the primary social structure by which other powers can be creatively transformed through "revolutionary subordination" (Yoder, Politics, 162–92). The powers are neither destroyed, nor "Christianized," but rather "tamed" (Yoder, He, 114) because Christ is already their Lord. Such taming requires knowing and loving the powers enough to challenge, resist, reject, or transform them.

Christian worship is crucial. Scriptures and sermons name the powers and expose their perversions. Offerings overthrow money's power. Prayers mobilize believers into their ministry of God's reconciliation. Faith confessions remind disciples of Christ's victory and commit them to living it with resurrection power. Sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper confer signs and seals of participation in Christ's triumph and the assurance that principalities have no ultimate control over anyone. Thus, the church's witness is primarily sacramental, rather than moralistic, pietistic, or religious (Stringfellow 138–46, 152).

Most important, the Christian community proclaims the gospel of hope. It does not turn away from darkness, but finds in its midst the light of Christ. The church's unique message is that the only source of hope is God and not the powers.

See also Angels, Doctrine of; Political Theology; Violence

(p 612)Bibliography

Barth, K. The Christian Life. Vol. IV/4 of Church Dogmatics. Eerdmans, 1981; idem. Church and State. SCM, 1939; Berkhof, H. Christ and the Powers. Herald Press, 1962; Cullmann, O. Christ and Time. Westminster, 1950; Dawn, M. Is It a Lost Cause? Eerdmans, 1997; idem. Powers, Weakness, and the Tabernacling of God. Eerdmans, 2001; Dawn, M., and E. Peterson. The Unnecessary Pastor. Eerdmans, 1999; Ellul, J. The Ethics of Freedom. Eerdmans, 1976; idem. The Humiliation of the Word. Eerdmans, 1985; idem. Money and Power. InterVarsity, 1984; Rupp, G. Principalities and Powers. Abingdon-Cokesbury, 1952; Stewart, J. S. "On a Neglected Emphasis in New Testament Theology." SJT 4, no. 3 (September 1951): 292–301; Stringfellow, W. An Ethic for Christians and Other Aliens in a Strange Land. Word, 1973; Wink, W. Engaging the Powers. Fortress, 1992; Yoder, J. H. He Came Preaching Peace. Herald Press, 1985; idem. The Politics of Jesus. 1974. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1994; Yoder Neufeld, T. Ephesians. Herald, 2003.

Marva J. Dawn

Practical Theology

In modern theology it was Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834) who first developed the area of practical theology. He was instrumental in the formation of a Protestant chair in that discipline at the University of Berlin in 1821. In this era practical theology first took the form of a theology of the subject. The first practical theologian in an empirical sense was Carl Immanuel Nitzsch (1787–1868), a disciple of Schleiermacher. He defined practical theology as the theory of the church's practice of Christianity. This led to a shift toward the social sciences and the second major emphasis on practical theology as a theology of the way in which the church functions.

Following Schleiermacher and Nitzsch, Philip Marheineke (1780–1846) began with faith as a unity of knowledge and action. He made a distinction between theoretical theology, which thinks from the possibility of a relation between life and action, and practical theology, which is based on the reality of that relation. As a result, the theory-practice relation became the object of reflection, and practical theology received its own independent status.

In the early twentieth century, drawing upon certain emphases in the Protestant Reformation, a model of practical theology developed more along the lines of pastoral theology. Eduard Thurneysen produced his classic work, A Theology of Pastoral Care, which focused on the role of preaching as mediation of God's word to humans so as to effect healing and hope. In North America, Anton T. Boisen (1876–1965) founded what became known as the Pastoral Counseling Movement, followed by the work of Seward Hiltner. In the late twentieth century the shift from pastoral theology to practical theology took place under the leadership of Don S. Browning, who published a series of essays under this title in 1983. The British scholars Paul Ballard and John Pritchard argue that practical theology must take on the characteristics of theology as such. It too must be a descriptive, normative, critical, and apologetic activity. Practical theology scrutinizes the everyday life of the church, in light of the gospel, in a dialogue that both shapes Christian practice and influences the world.

In his comprehensive survey of the history of practical theology and its most recent developments, Gerben Heitink suggests that practical theology base its method upon the paradigm of the social sciences rather than the humanities. He provides a model of interpretation that links the hermeneutical perspective of the human sciences with the empirical perspective of the social sciences, showing how practical theology can successfully bridge the gap between understanding and explaining. Practical theology, then, is more than mere applied theory; it is a strategic perspective, which links the hermeneutical with the empirical so as to achieve an integrative theological model that underlies the theological task as a whole.

The Relation of Theory to Practice

At the center of the discussion over the nature of practical theology is the relation of theory to practice. Practical theology is both value-directed and theory-laden, according to Browning; it is theory-laden because it includes theory as a vital constituent. It is not just reflective action, but also reflective action that is laden with belief. Practical theology is reflective because it not only engages in and examines actions that seek to achieve particular ends, but also reflects upon the means and the ends of such action to assess the validity of both in the light of its guiding vision. It is important to recognize that doctrine ought to shape the practical work of the church as the ongoing work of God's praxis. Yet, it is also right to say that reflection on the work of God through pastoral and ecclesial praxis leads to interpretation of Scripture and the reconstruction of doctrine.

All forms of ministry practice have some form of theory behind and within them. Thus, theory and practice are drawn together, with each inextricably connected to the other within human (p 613) praxis. The task of the practical theologian is to discover and lay bare the hidden layers of meaning that indwell the praxis of the church community. Praxis is quite different from the mere application of truth or theory. While the word "practice" ordinarily refers to the methods and means by which we apply a skill or theory, this tends to separate truth from method or action, so one assumes that what is true can be deduced or discovered apart from the activity that applies it. In this way of thinking, truth is viewed as existing apart from its manifestation in an event or an act. Praxis, as Aristotle originally defined it, is an action that includes the telos, the final meaning and character of truth. It is an action in which the truth is discovered, not merely applied or practiced. In praxis, one is not only guided in actions by the intention of realizing the telos, or purpose, but one also discovers and grasps this telos through the action itself.

Praxis reveals theology in its most tangible form. In this sense actions are themselves theological and as such are open to theological reflection and critique. Thus, the praxis of the church is in fact the embodiment of its theology, and is both performative and transformative. Aristotle used the Greek word phronēsis to speak of practical wisdom aimed at moral ends. The ministry of the church is grounded in the praxis of God and thus in the phronēsis of God's wisdom. Practical theology enables congregations to engage in critical moral reasoning so that the authenticity and moral appropriateness of their praxis can be assessed and tested.

Hence, theory and practice are united within this form of practical knowledge, which works itself out within the praxis of the church. This model of practical theology, with its emphasis on ecclesial praxis and the attainment of practical knowledge, seeks to overcome the rift between theory and practice.

The Hermeneutics of Practical Theology

Practical theology is inherently a hermeneutical discipline insofar as it attempts to interpret situations in terms of the presence and action of the Spirit of God with respect to the word of God. One might say that in practical theology the work of God interprets the word of God in the form of a hermeneutical circle. The practical theologian seeks to interpret Scripture, tradition, and praxis in order that the contemporary life of both church and world can be transformed.

In praxis, God's truth is revealed in the structures of reality by which his actions and presence are disclosed to us through our own actions. It is not our human actions that constitute the praxis of God. Rather, God acts through our human actions to reveal the truth.

The truth of God's word is not merely an idea that can be extracted from the Bible by the human mind so that one can possess this truth as a formula or doctrine. Rather, the purpose of God's word aims at bringing us into the truth in terms of its effect (Isa. 55:11). There is also true doctrine as opposed to false doctrine. But God's truth does not end with our concept of truth, nor is the human mind the absolute criterion for God's truth. Right interpretation of the word of God entails critical engagement with the work of God.

Theology, as an attempt to construct knowledge of God, is inherently practical theology in view of the subject matter, which only emerges through reflection on God's actions as Creator, Reconciler, and Redeemer. There is no knowledge of God that does not include an empirical component in the form of his actions within history as revealed to us through the witness of those who encounter God in his works, first as oral tradition, and then as Holy Scripture.

Theological reflection that begins in the context and crises of ministry seeks to read the texts of Scripture in light of the texts of lives that manifest the work of Christ through the Holy Spirit as the truth and will of God. Present interpretation of Scripture must be as faithful to the eschatological reality and authority of Christ as to the text of Scripture as word of Christ. This is why the hermeneutics of practical theology is a theological hermeneutic, and not merely a spiritual hermeneutic. Practical theology thus includes pastoral theology as those commissioned to practice pastoral care interpret actual human situations with respect to the theological meaning of baptism, the Eucharist, justification, and sanctification, as witness to God's saving activity with his people. The hermeneutics of practical theology seek what is normative in Jesus Christ, as the inspired source of the written word, and seek the objective reality of Christ, as the praxis of the Holy Spirit in the context of ministry.

As discerned in the ministry context, the criterion for the praxis of the Spirit is not determined by cultural relevance or pragmatic expediency. It is the work of the risen Jesus Christ, which becomes the criterion in the praxis of the Holy Spirit. It is this contemporary work (praxis) of Christ through the Holy Spirit that becomes normative and calls the church to repentance (p 614) where it has imposed its own binding rules. We, of course, are not apostles, nor is Scripture replaced as a normative text by our own experience of the Holy Spirit. Rather, the risen Christ as the true and continuing apostle, through the ministry of the Holy Spirit, binds the word of Christ in Scripture to the work of Christ through the Spirit.

The Mission Focus of Practical Theology

Practical theology maintains the link between God's mission in the world through Jesus Christ and the church's mission in the world through the power of the Spirit. Practical theology is thus inherently a mission theology. Practical theology recognizes the fundamental importance of missiology as a crucial component of ecclesiology.

The mission and nature of the church have their source in the mission of God through the incarnate Messiah, continuing in the world through the Spirit of Christ. This requires a theology that views the nature and mission of the church as a unity of thought and experience. The ongoing ministry of Christ through the power and presence of the Spirit constitutes the praxis of God's mission to the world through the church and its ministry. The context of human praxis in ministry works as a social coefficient with the praxis of God in history as the context for doing theology. This means that practical theology is a task belonging to the mission of the church and a function of those who are involved in that mission.

Practical theology therefore calls theology and the church back to its roots as a fundamentally missionary church with a particular vision and a specific task to perform in the world. One of the primary tasks of the practical theologian is to ensure that the church is challenged and enabled to achieve this task faithfully. The church's nature, as well as its mission and ministry, have their source in the life of the triune God: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

The practical theologian is the theologian of the Holy Spirit, who points to and participates in the creative indivisibility of the God who holds all things together. The Holy Spirit is the revelation to us of the inner being of God as constituted by the relations between Father and Son. For this reason, practical theology is grounded in the intratrinitarian ministry of the Father toward the world, the Son's ministry to the Father on behalf of the world, and the Spirit's empowering of the people of God for the work of God.

Bibliography

Anderson, R. "Reading Thomas F. Torrance as a Practical Theologian." Pages 161–84 in The Promise of Trinitarian Theology, ed. E. Colyer. Rowman & Littlefield, 2001; idem. The Shape of Practical Theology. InterVarsity, 2001; Ballard, P., and J. Pritchard. Practical Theology in Action. SPCK, 1996; Browning, D. A Fundamental Practical Theology. Fortress, 1996; Forrester, D. Truthful Action. T&T Clark, 2000; Heitink, G. Practical Theology. Eerdmans, 1999; Hiltner, S. Pastoral Counseling. Abingdon-Cokesbury, 1949; idem. Preface to Pastoral Theology. Abingdon, 1958; Mudge, L., and J. Poling, eds. Formation and Reaction. Fortress, 1987; Thurneysen, E. A Theology of Pastoral Care. John Knox, 1962.

Ray S. Anderson

Practice      See Practical Theology

Pragmatism

Pragmatism is a school of philosophy focused on a cluster of beliefs, attitudes, tendencies, and procedures. In particular, pragmatists have held, via one or the other of its central figures, that (1) the meaning of a concept is a function of its practical consequences, and (2) the truth of a concept is a function of its effects on action. The theory of meaning is foundational; the second proposal applies this thesis to our concept of truth.

Distinctives of Pragmatism

Classic American pragmatists made common cause in their critique of traditional philosophical systems. While drawing elements from their European predecessors, Charles Sanders Peirce, William James, and John Dewey each wrote in response to, first, the scientific achievements and, second, the social developments of the half century following the American Civil War. The sciences, particularly Darwin, highlight process, change, and indeterminacy; pragmatism extends these to human inquiry. Still, pragmatists gained a profound appreciation for progress through the experimental method. The pragmatist, according to Peirce, has “had his mind molded by his life in the laboratory.” At the same time, the war highlighted the need to (re)construct social and political structures, along with the devastating effects of absolutism and a priori certainty. Yet, it also suggested a vindication of the American experiment in democracy. In this context arose a method that emphasized the link between thought and action, required ongoing empirical validation of beliefs, construed language and concepts as tools for furthering human values, and recognized the limitations of the social embeddedness (p 615) of perceptions and judgments, while remaining thoroughly fallibilistic.

C. S. Peirce: The Pragmatic Method

Peirce, the son of renowned Harvard mathematician Benjamin Peirce, had one of the best scientific minds of his time. He considered obvious the superiority of the scientific method to other forms of inquiry, holding in high regard its many accomplishments. From scientific inquiry he learned an experimentalist’s respect for observable consequences. Peirce’s lasting philosophical contribution centers on problems of method. Philosophical concepts, he argued, have value for their practical role in establishing dispositions to act in specific, salutary ways. Inquiry, then, must begin by carefully examining the very meaning of its terms. “Consider what effects that might conceivably have practical bearings you conceive the object of your conception to have. Then your conception of these effects is the whole of your conception of the object.” By shaping expectation of experience, concepts govern the ways we act and respond to our environment. The goal of inquiry is to settle real doubts, those irritating uncertainties about how to act in the world. One must formulate new ideas and modify old ones; these ideas function as hypotheses bearing on future experiences, vindication coming in the form of empirical consequences.

Peirce described this process as abduction or retroduction; he insisted on its general efficacy, even equating this logical process with the essence of pragmatism. Rather than Cartesian or Leibnizian first principles, inquiry begins with a problem. When experience engenders a real doubt, one must draw from those beliefs already in one's possession to formulate a hypothesis that, once confirmed by experimental test, one tentatively accepts. The process is conjectural, and always comparative (recognizing the ubiquity of competing, rival accounts). Its goal is to forge beliefs one is convinced are true, for which one can find no reasons to doubt. To assuage all doubts, testing must involve the entire community of inquirers; satisfaction comes only when each member is satisfied with the adequacy of the proposal relative to his or her own experiences. The process is fully governed by the historical, cultural, social, and even personal contingencies of the community. Peirce believed in the eventual convergence of all belief upon a unified, coherent account. Thus, he proposed that by "true" we mean those beliefs on which the community settles at the end of inquiry. Furthermore, assuming the constraint of the world on inquiry, Peirce maintained that the resulting beliefs describe actual features of a mind-independent reality. While affirming a present fallibilism, he retained hope that community consent constitutes knowledge of the structure of the world.

William James: The Trail of the Human Serpent

James both modified and popularized the relatively obscure and opaque writings of his friend and sometimes colleague. With Peirce, James's pragmatism consisted primarily in "the attitude of looking away from first things, principles, categories, supposed necessities; and looking towards last things, fruits, consequences, facts" (Pragmatism, 55). His is a radical empiricism, eschewing abstract, fixed, and absolute principles for concrete facts and action. His most significant break with Peirce centered on the conception of truth; James was wary of the notion of inquiry proceeding along a singular path. He concurred that inquiry is foremost a matter of constructing and choosing beliefs with the greatest potential of utility; he disagreed, however, on the inevitable emergence of a uniquely promising path. His is an unabashed humanism whereby the human is the measure of all things and beliefs are constituted and affirmed for their "cash value" for a particular situation. James's pluralism stems from the variety of experiences that provide the backdrop of inquiry, the mix of prior concepts from which understanding must draw, the contingency of ongoing experiences that guide the process, and even the disparate goals and values that define its proper end. Truth, then, is best construed as neither singular nor fixed; he proposed the notion of truth as a “useful leading,” an expedient in the way of thinking. The mind actively selects and organizes experiences, carving out the world so as to fulfill our several needs and desires. Philosophy determines the practical outcomes, the definite differences, of each respective “world-formula,” choosing what works best in one’s particular circumstances. Evolving circumstances undermine the notion of a fixed or final world version.

John Dewey: Forging Instruments of Change

Dewey’s concern for social, political, and educational reform explains his focus on the fundamental role of both beliefs and actions in shaping the world. With James, he emphasized the notion of pragmatism as an attitude toward our beliefs, truth, and reality. On this construal, ideas have value in enabling one to cope with the strain and (p 616)stress of circumstances. As problems of the world press, one must respond. Yet, action predicated on the settled, staid beliefs of the tradition might not redress the tensions or conflicts one confronts. In a changing, growing, developing world, they may prove ultimately dissatisfying. One desires, rather, a true solution, one providing a satisfactory solution to the situation at hand. We do prize ideas not for their correspondence to reality, but rather for enabling us, in these times, to cope with our circumstances. On Dewey’s construal, there is no profit in a fixed reality and absolute truth; there is everything to gain, however, in constantly forging new and better tools for negotiating our practical, moral, and social lives. Once again, specific human consequences provide the provisional test for the very meaning and truth of our concepts. Where Peirce insisted on the democratization of the scientific method, Dewey found the path in democracy itself.

Pragmatics of Belief

While most contemporary Neopragmatist philosophers (Goodman, Davidson, Putnam, Rorty) adopt a nonrealist, social justification theory of truth, insights from pragmatism may shed light on the nature of Christian belief. For instance, the essential tie between belief and action comports well with biblical teaching on disingenuous faith without works. Its empiricism insists that experience, rather than prior intuitions or rationalistic principles, provides the touchstone for justified beliefs, an outlook echoed in the centrality of the historical biblical narrative to Christian theology. Disenchantment with transcendental reasoning and focus on the Word made flesh are foundational to biblical theology. Even while resting on historical truth, the biblical view concurs with pragmatism regarding the ineluctable interpretative effect of background beliefs, expectations, and attitudes. Its fallibilist attitude is reminiscent of Christian humility in belief; its future-oriented experimentalism resonates with Christ's call to a faith whose actions outpace evidence and whose end promises satisfaction. Even a minimalist theory of truth as a reliable, trustworthy way of living captures the frequent use of this notion in Scripture. Lastly, at its very heart, the pragmatist proposal that meaning turns on the definite difference a concept makes in action articulates the central organizing insight for a biblical interpretation.

Bibliography

Several single-volume selections of Peirce's writings include Buchler, J., ed. Philosophical Writings of Peirce. Dover, 1955; Wiener, P., ed. Charles S. Peirce: Selected Writings. Dover, 1966. James's writings are in Burkhardt, F., F. Bowers, and I. Skrupskelis, eds. The Works of William James. 17 vols. Harvard University Press, 1975–88, including Pragmatism (1975); The Meaning of Truth (1975); The Will to Believe (1979). A representative single-volume set can be found in McDermott, J., ed. The Writings of William James. Random House, 1967. A sampling of Dewey's work is in Stuhr, J., ed. Pragmatism and Classical American Philosophy. 2d ed. Oxford University Press, 2000.

Robert O'Connor

PraxisSee Liberation Theologies and Hermeneutics; Practical Theology

Prayer

Prayer is language used in relation to God. It is the most universal of all languages, the lingua franca of the human heart. Prayer ranges in form from “sighs too deep for words” (Rom. 8:26 NRSV), to petitions and thanksgivings composed in lyric poetry and stately prose, to “psalms, hymns and spiritual songs” (Col. 3:16), to the silence of a person present to God in attentive adoration (Ps. 62:1, 3).

The foundational presupposition of all prayer is that God reveals himself personally and by means of language. God creates the cosmos with words; he creates us with words; he calls to us, speaks to us, whispers to us, using words. Then he gives us, his human creatures, the gift of language; we not only can hear and understand God as he speaks to us, we can also speak to him—respond, answer, converse, argue, question. We can pray. God is the initiator and guarantor of language both ways, as God speaks to us, as we speak to God. It is a wonder that God speaks to us; it is hardly less a wonder that God listens to us. The biblical revelation is equally insistent on both counts: the efficacy of God's language to us, and the efficacy of our language to God. Our listening to God is an on-again, off-again affair; God always listens to us. The essential reality of prayer is that its source and character are entirely in God. We are most our true selves when we pray. But prayer is not a human-based activity. Psychology does not get us very far in either understanding or practicing prayer. Whether we are aware of it or not (and often we are not), it is theological or nothing.

The Scriptures, read and prayed, are our primary and normative access to God as he reveals himself to us. The Scriptures are our listening post for learning the language of the soul, the ways God speaks to us, and the vocabulary and (p 617)grammar that are appropriate as we in our turn speak to God. Prayer detached from Scripture, that is, from listening to God, is no longer biblical prayer. Our words to God disconnected from God's words to us short-circuit the relational language that is prayer. Christians acquire this personal and relational practice of prayer primarily under the shaping influence of the Psalms and Jesus.

The Psalms

In most of Scripture we hear God speaking to us; in the Psalms we hear men and women speaking to God. That is why the Christian community continues to use the Psalms as a school of prayer, praying these prayers to gain a feel for what is appropriate to say as we bring our lives into attentive and worshipping response to God. The first thing that we realize from the Psalms is that in prayer anything goes. Virtually everything human is appropriate as material for prayer: reflections and observations, fear and anger, guilt and sin, questions and doubts, needs and desires, praise and gratitude, suffering and death. Nothing human is excluded. The Psalms are an extended refutation that prayer is being "nice" before God. Not at all—it is an offering of ourselves, just as we are. The second thing is that prayer is access to everything that God is for us: holiness, justice, mercy, forgiveness, sovereignty, blessing, vindication, salvation, love, majesty, and glory. The Psalms are a detailed demonstration that prayer brings us into the welcoming presence of God as he generously offers himself, just as he is, to us.

Luther, in his preface to the German Psalter (1528), wrote: "If you want to see the holy Christian Church painted in glowing colors and in a form which is really alive, and if you want this to be done in a miniature, you must get hold of the Psalter, and there you will have in your possession a fine, clear, pure mirror which will show you what Christianity really is; yea, you will find yourself in it and the true 'gnōthi seauton' ('know thyself'), and God himself and all his creatures, too” (Weiser 20).

Jesus

If the Psalms are our primary text for prayer, Jesus is our primary teacher, the theological and personal center for a life of prayer. But Jesus is more than teacher; Jesus prays for us: “He always lives to make intercession for [us]” (Heb. 7:25). The verb is in the present tense. This is the most important thing to know about prayer, not that we should pray or how we should pray but that Jesus is praying for us right now (see also Heb. 4:16; John 17). Jesus, the Word that made us, is also among us, teaching us to direct our words personally to God. Mostly, he did this by example; Luke cites nine instances: 5:16; 6:12; 9:18, 28; 11:1; 22:32, 41, 44; 24:30. But we have only a slim accounting of his actual prayers. Some are inarticulate (Mark 7:34; 8:12; John 11:33, 38; Heb. 5:7). Some are quoted verbatim (Matt. 11:25–26; 26:39; 27:46; Luke 23:34, 46; John 11:41–42; 12:27–28; 17:1–26).

The single instance in which Jesus instructed us about prayer was in response to the disciples’ request, “Lord, teach us to pray” (Luke 11:1). His answer, “When you pray, say,” our so-called Lord’s Prayer (Luke 11:2–4/Matt. 6:9–13), is the church’s primary text (backed up by the Psalms) for guiding Christians into a life of personal, honest, and mature prayer. The simplicity and brevity of Jesus’ first lesson in prayer is striking, a standing rebuke against all attempts to develop techniques or discover the “secret” of prayer. As Jesus practiced and taught prayer, it was not a verbal tool for working on God, nor an insider formula for getting our way with God.

Prayer is shaped by Jesus, in whose name we pray. Our knowledge, our needs, our feelings are taken seriously, but they are not foundational. The God whom we address revealed in Jesus gives both form and content to our prayers. In prayer we are most ourselves; it is the one act in which we can, must, be totally ourselves. But it is also the act in which we move beyond ourselves. In that “move beyond” we come to be defined not by the sum total of our experiences but by the Father, Son, and Spirit to whom we pray.

Bibliography

Balthasar, H. U. von. Prayer. G. Chapman, 1963; Barth, K. The Christian Life. Vol. IV/4 of Church Dogmatics, trans. G. Bromiley. Eerdmans, 1981; Ellul, J. Prayer and Modern Man, trans. C. E. Hopkin. Seabury, 1973; Forsyth, P. T. The Soul of Prayer. Regent, 1995; Houston, J. The Lord’s Prayer, trans. G. Bromiley. Eerdmans, 1990; idem. Prayer. NavPress, 1996; Miller, P. They Cried to the Lord. Fortress, 1994; Peterson, E. Answering God. HarperSanFrancisco, 1989; Weiser, A. The Psalms, trans. H. Hartwell. Westminster, 1962.

Eugene H. Peterson

Preaching, Use of the Bible in Preaching, the oral proclamation of God's good news, has always been a central impetus and locus for the theological interpretation of Scripture.

(p 618)Beginnings

The background to the church's use of Scripture in its preaching lies in the use of Hebrew Scripture in the Jewish synagogues. The earliest extant example of this synagogue preaching is the "sermon" of Jesus in Nazareth (Luke 4:16–22). It is hard to deduce much from this occasion, upsetting as it was, about standard practices, but it is clear that it was customary for some passage of Scripture to be read in worship and for someone to comment on it. Thus were formed the targums, Aramaic renderings and expansions of the Hebrew Scriptures. An early precursor of such interpretation is the Levites' explanation of the book of the Law to the people in Neh. 8:7–8.

Jewish methods of interpreting Scripture influenced Christian preaching. These can be grouped under four headings (Longenecker 14–33): (1) literalist; (2) midrashic, disclosing "hidden" meanings in order to make clear the contemporary relevance of the text; (3) peshet, the form of exegesis known especially from Qumran, in which Scripture was read as referring directly to contemporary events; and (4) allegorical, seen in Philo's rereading of Scripture in Stoic and Platonic terms. Jesus' use of Isa. 61 in Luke 4:17–21 is an example of peshet interpretation.

Christian preaching, however, was markedly new. Its central subject was not a book but a person, Jesus Christ. It was the proclamation of an event before it was the explanation of any text. Nevertheless, one of the earliest summaries of Christian preaching (1 Cor. 15:3–8) twice includes the phrase "according to the Scriptures." The belief that Jesus had come to fulfill Israel's history and God's promises meant that preaching must deal not only with oral tradition about Jesus, but also with the written text of Scripture. Christian "theological interpretation of Scripture" was born when Christian preachers started to handle the Hebrew Bible as a text that pointed forward to Christ.

C. H. Dodd distinguished between public proclamation of the message about Jesus (kerygma) and "teaching" (didachē), which built up the Christian community by applying the teaching of Jesus and the apostles to current concerns. In the early days oral tradition plus the Hebrew Scriptures (often in their LXX form) would have been the staple of a regular teaching ministry. “Exhortation” (paraklēsis) gave more immediate encouragement and guidance to the church, based no doubt on Hebrew Scripture and the Jesus traditions, but equally coming in the form of direct Spirit-inspired prophecy.

The NT, as writing, does not give us a direct model for oral Christian preaching. However, in indirect ways it is very suggestive of the dynamic interplay of Scripture, tradition, and situational freshness that characterizes preaching-as-theological-interpretation at its richest.

First, it preserves much oral teaching of Jesus, with many echoes of Hebrew Scripture, both in content and in its styles of narrative, wisdom, and prophecy; but notably little direct biblical exegesis. The mark of Jesus’ teaching, for his hearers, was newness and authority (Mark 1:22, 27). Second, the “Gospels” received that name because they embody the proclamation about Jesus in written form. Explicitly and implicitly, each links the story of Jesus’ life to the Scriptures that he fulfilled. Third, Paul’s letters apply the proclamation to various pastoral situations, and are grounded in both the story of Jesus and the Scriptures that point forward to it (e.g., Rom. 1:1–5).

Central Issues

Worship and Mission. Scripture took shape as the bipartite collection we know today in the context of worship. The regular rehearsal of the narratives and teaching of both OT and NT kept the early Christian communities rooted in their identity and faith. The preaching of the word took the form of homilia, or “conversing,” about the texts that had been read, and thus became theological interpretation of Christian Scripture.

Dodd’s distinctions start to break down as the apostolic era becomes more distant and especially with the birth of Christendom after Constantine’s conversion. The homily in Christian worship became kerygma as well as didachē (or catechesis) and paraklēsis, for the Christian congregations needed not only teaching and encouragement, but also a continued grounding in the gospel.

But preaching has always also entailed the evangelization of unchurched peoples. Such preaching has often been characterized by boldness in translating the message of Scripture into the thought forms of the hearers, whereas in-church preaching has often promoted interpretations of Scripture that bolster the institution’s authority and make fewer concessions to the hearers (Buttrick 191, 196). This distinction between “worship preaching” and “mission preaching” reflects a basic tension among approaches to theological reading of the Bible. Does one seek to draw hearers into a “biblical” worldview that is (p 619) in part the construct of a church that sees itself as Scripture’s rightful interpreter? Or does one seek to relate the Bible to one’s cultural surroundings in such a way as to promote understanding, but risk diluting its message?

Canon and Content. The recognition of Scripture as “canonical” carried an inevitable consequence for its interpretation in the pulpit: its function as boundary marker would be highlighted. Especially in ages of controversy it is natural to find heavily “doctrinal” preaching of Scripture, which underlines a particular interpretation of the boundaries it sets in thought and practice.

The notion of “canon” is problematic if taken to imply that all parts of Scripture should be given equal weight. In practice, the churches have operated with a “canon within the canon” in their public reading of Scripture. They have recognized that some parts of the Bible are more suitable for use in worship than others, being more obviously and directly applicable to hearers. But it can then become too easy for individual churches and preachers to impose their standardized interpretative grid on Scripture, and to cease hearing it as the vehicle for God’s challenging address.

In the twentieth century Karl Barth issued a powerful call to the church to hear Scripture afresh in all its strangeness. More recently, Walter Brueggemann has argued for preaching to arise from fresh engagement with the texts, including forgotten or problematic ones, free of any systematizing theological grid. He summons the church to respect the contents of the entire canon but to be deeply aware of the danger that its canonical status be used as a tool of oppression or the covert imposition of a particular theology.

Literal and Figurative. Preaching has been the natural setting for figurative readings of Scripture. Figural interpretation enabled the OT to be read as pointing forward to Christ, and the entire Bible to be read as pointing forward to the climax of history (Auerbach). Thus, in the light of Scripture the present is made pregnant with meaning, and Christian preachers seek to declare the implications of Scripture for the circumstances of their day. The present is seen reflected in Scripture and vice versa, sometimes with prophetic immediacy.

Such figurative readings are susceptible to fossilization (Stuhlmacher 31), and at the Reformation the time was ripe for a fresh hearing of Scripture’s “literal sense.” The subsequent development of historical-critical methods of biblical study has given preachers opportunity to keep returning beyond safe, stale theological formulas to a new encounter with the words themselves.

But this emphasis on the literal has had a negative side. The old assumption of a unified world of meaning in which Scripture, the present, and the future were bound up together broke down; the application of Scripture to church and world became increasingly problematic. Preaching has been torn between an arid intellectualism that treats Scripture honestly but has increasing difficulty in hearing it as a living word from God, and a naive fundamentalism that pretends that the literal sense of Scripture can address us immediately without the aid of hermeneutical sensitivity.

It is now recognized that a theologically serious use of Scripture in preaching may invite a revived use of the old categories of figural interpretation (Wilson), without jettisoning all that has been learned through attention to the literal and historical sense.

Oral and Written. The most basic and fertile tension in the relationship of preaching to the Bible is that between the oral and the written word.

In one sense, the oral has priority. The spoken gospel preceded the written Scripture. God lives, and his speech cannot be confined to a written text. Hence, Luther said that the Bible exists for preaching, not preaching for the Bible. Yet, Scripture stands as the perpetual and necessary check on the possible vagaries of preachers.

On the one hand, not only current Roman Catholic teaching, but also distinguished twentieth-century Protestant voices such as P. T. Forsyth and Donald Coggan stress the real sacramental presence of Christ in the preached word. This lends immediacy to biblical interpretation as the congregation is invited to see themselves (for instance) as the very disciples called by Jesus in the Gospels, but invites the danger of simply repeating traditional readings and preventing fresh insights. On the other hand, many modern evangelicals place the written above the oral word, stressing the need for detailed teaching of the text from the pulpit. This lends objectivity to interpretation as the preacher seeks to let Scripture speak, but may make for dryness.

However, the renewed prominence of the Holy Spirit in both Catholic and Protestant thinking has been contributing to the breakdown of these distinctions. Rigid adherence to tradition as the mediator of biblical interpretation and hardened biblicism unwilling to acknowledge the vital role of the oral gospel messengers are both melting.

(p 620)*Contemporary Models

Commitment to the centrality of biblical interpretation in preaching issues today in a variety of homiletic ideals and related forms. Definitions vary, and the following categories should not be taken as watertight, mutually exclusive, or even entirely comparable.

Exposition. Expository preaching may or may not involve verse-by-verse study of a text, be heavily doctrinal in thrust, or be as concerned with the impact of a text as with its meaning. But fundamentally, it aims to “make plain” what is in the text, rather than “imposing” ideas upon it. In addition, exposition must be more than exegesis and is so by including application of the text to hearers’ lives. Yet, preachers who regard themselves as “expositors” often take a detached rhetorical posture with respect to the text, speaking about it rather than involving themselves in it.

Such preaching has been revived since the mid-twentieth century, in reaction to liberalism and to “topical” preaching that seemed to let the world’s concerns set preaching’s agenda. Its laudable ideal is faithfulness to Scripture. Its danger is the illusion that the “meaning” of Scripture is a readily discoverable entity that can be disclosed to a congregation with minimal self-involvement by speaker or hearer.

Re-Presentation. By contrast with “exposition,” “re-presentation” implies that the preacher’s task is not to talk about Scripture but in some sense to reenact it. Here, “to interpret Scripture” in the pulpit means not “discuss a text and apply it” but “allow its full power to be felt.” Whereas “exposition” is often closely associated with the ideal of a “teaching ministry,” “re-presentation” sits more comfortably with the proclamatory dimension of preaching. Many aspects of texts may go unexplained, but the attempt is made to let Scripture make its own impact on the minds and hearts of the hearers. Sermons are crafted to reflect the form of the text, not only to communicate its content (Long).

Such preaching often revolves around textual images or stories. The preacher may voice more than one standpoint, and thus set up a dialogue—perhaps between a biblical voice and a voice from the present. Contemporary interpretation is triggered as the former is allowed to address the latter, with minimal intrusion from the voice of a “detached” preacher. Re-presentational preaching is greatly assisted by the renewed emphasis on literary and rhetorical questions in biblical studies, though historical sensibility continues to play an important part in enabling texts to be heard with freshness.

Narrative. Narrative preaching may best be seen as a subset of re-presentational preaching, yet as a conception is important in its own right. It means not “preaching as a series of anecdotes,” but preaching constructed with narrative movement, including such elements as suspense, disclosure, and resolution.

It finds its basis in the narrative shape of Scripture and the desire to catch hearers up into the story. Interpretation of the text may happen through a variety of means. A scriptural answer to a contemporary problem, or the solution to a difficulty perceived in Scripture itself, may be disclosed through a sermon with a “plot” (Lowry). A biblical story may be told with allusions or direct references at various points to the contemporary world. Or contemporary stories may act as echoes or foils to a biblical one.

As with re-presentational preaching generally, much interpretative work is left for the congregation to do. The preacher’s task is to help the hearers see and feel the connection between Scripture and our world today, but it is for the hearers to go and work out the implications.

Liturgical. For some, the concept of preaching remains fundamentally shaped by its function within worship. Barth argued that theologically (if not always in practice) preaching takes place between the acts of baptism and Eucharist (Homiletics, 60). In the sermon the baptized are reminded of their identity in Christ, which is then enacted in the communion.

In this light, the preacher’s task is to take one or more of the appointed readings and to discern and proclaim the gospel that lies at their heart (Fuller). Such preaching is thus distinguished from teaching and exhortation, and also from the expository ideal that can tend toward a focus on Scripture for its own sake.

A re-presentational form often lends itself to “liturgical” preaching, for the sermon can then be felt as one “act” in the “drama” of a service. The theological interpretation of Scripture happens as the preacher helps the congregation see and respond to the “fit” between the readings, the gospel message, and the whole act of worship.

Local Theology. The model of preaching as “local theologizing” takes very seriously the fact that preaching happens in a particular context, and that its biblical interpretation must therefore be thoroughly contextualized (Tisdale).

It assumes that the preacher is becoming familiar with the local congregational culture and (p 621) yet is able to bring a broader and deeper perspective derived from the wider church and Christian tradition. It implies that it is meaningless to ask whether “text” or “context” should come first in constructing a sermon. Interpretation is a constant process of “negotiating the distance” between text and hearers (Craddock).

As compared with the “liturgical” preaching model, that of “local theology” allows greater latitude in subject matter. The gospel will certainly be informing the sermon, but textual interpretation will not have to focus so narrowly upon the paschal mystery. Scripture may be allowed to affirm, illumine, or challenge many aspects of communal and personal life. This may also turn out to be the most satisfactory umbrella concept for evangelistic preaching.

See also Jewish Exegesis; Liturgy; Oral Tradition and the NT; Targum

Bibliography

Auerbach, E. "Figura." Pages 11–76 in Scenes from the Drama of European Literature. Meridian, 1959; Barth, K. Homiletics, ed. D. Buttrick. Westminster John Knox, 1991; Brilioth, Y. A Brief History of Preaching, trans. K. Mattson. Fortress, 1965; Brueggemann, W. The Bible and Postmodern Imagination. SCM, 1993; Buttrick, D. "The Use of the Bible in Preaching." NIB 1:188–99; Craddock, F. Preaching. Abingdon, 1985; Dodd, C. H. The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments. Hodder & Stoughton, 1936; Fuller, R. What Is Liturgical Preaching? SCM, 1959; Long, T. Preaching and the Literary Forms of the Bible. Fortress, 1989; Longenecker, R. Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1999; Lowry, E. The Homiletical Plot. Rev. ed. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Old, H. O. The Reading and Preaching of the Scriptures in the Worship of the Christian Church. 4 vols. Eerdmans, 1998–2002; Stuhlmacher, P. Historical Criticism and Theological Interpretation of Scripture, trans. R. A. Harrisville. Fortress, 1977; Tisdale, L. Preaching as Local Theology and Folk Art. Fortress, 1996; Wilson, P. God Sense. Abingdon, 2001.

Stephen I. Wright

Presence     See Deconstruction

Presupposition     See Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics; Objectivity

Priesthood/Priests     See Jewish Context of the NT

Princeton School

The Princeton School refers to the major conservative theological movement in American Presbyterianism. Its center was at Princeton Theological Seminary, from its 1812 founding under Archibald Alexander's leadership, stretching to J. Gresham Machen's 1929 resignation.

Alexander defended a Protestant scholastic construal of Reformed doctrine derived largely from the eighteenth-century Swiss theologian François Turretin and filtered through the philosophical prism of Scottish Common Sense Realism. He reacted against the challenges of Deism and Unitarianism, centering his argument on the necessity of revealed theology based on Scripture (Evidences of the Authenticity, Inspiration, and Canonical Authority of the Holy Scriptures, 1836).

Charles Hodge dominated Princeton from 1822 to his death in 1878, using his editorship of Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review (founded in 1825) to advance his views. Hodge wrote informatively about German scholarship in historical criticism, American revivalism, and Darwinism. He defended Reformed doctrine and the plenary inspiration of Scripture in the objectivist manner of Common Sense Realism, and measured the validity of scientific theories by the Baconian method of observation and experiment. In Hodge's view, both liberal theology and emotional evangelicalism are to be treated as suspect because they rely on human experience rather than the clear teaching of the Bible. Darwin's theory of natural selection fails the test of rigorous science because it lacks a clear fossil record. It also contradicts the Christian doctrine of the providence of God.

In Hodge's son Archibald Alexander Hodge, and Benjamin Breckenridge Warfield, the Princeton School continued unabated into the first decades of the twentieth century. In 1881 (the same year that Westcott and Hort published their critical text of the NT), A. A. Hodge and Warfield argued jointly in the Presbyterian Review that the "original autographs" of the Bible were without error. This position became the hallmark of the doctrine of "inerrancy," a nineteenth-century neologism that was taken up by conservative Presbyterians during the 1890s and probably contributed to the emergence of fundamentalism in the first decade of the twentieth century.

Fundamentalism's chief (though somewhat ambivalent) defender was J. Gresham Machen, whose Christianity and Liberalism (1923) is an eloquent and widely read argument for traditional Reformed teaching against the unwarranted, humanist assumptions of modernist historical criticism. Liberal control of the board of trustees at the seminary led to Machen's resignation in 1929. Machen carried on the work of the Princeton (p 622) School at the newly formed Westminster Theological Seminary until his death in 1937.

Princeton continues to influence North American evangelicals today, although the legacy of its doctrine of Scripture is controversial, especially its interface with a primacy of "inductive method" in theological interpretation.

Bibliography

Abraham, W. Canon and Criterion in Christian Theology (ch. 12). Clarendon, 1998; Harrisville, R. A., and W. Sundberg. The Bible in Modern Culture (ch. 10). 2d ed. Eerdmans, 2002; Kelsey, D. Proving Doctrine (ch. 2). Trinity, 1999; Noll, M. Between Faith and Criticism. Harper & Row, 1986; Ward, T. Word and Supplement. Oxford University Press, 2002; Woodbridge, J., and R. Balmer. "The Princetonians and Biblical Authority: An Assessment of the Ernest Sandeen Proposal." Pages 251–79 in Scripture and Truth, ed. D. A. Carson and J. Woodbridge. Baker, 1992.

Promise     See Hope; Last Things, Doctrine of; Relationship between the Testaments; Speech-Act Theory

Proof Text

Upon investigation, precise origins of the term “proof text” remain unclear. In current parlance, however, the concept is unremittingly negative. (No one else wanted to write an article on the subject!) Hence, we hear the frequent axiom in many a course on biblical interpretation: “A text without a context is a pretext for a proof text.” Proof-texting is not only an accusation lodged against lay reading or preachers’ rhetoric (Eidemuller); it is also the increasing label of choice by which exegetes characterize biblical interpretation among theologians.

The Rise and Fall of Proof-Texting

Popular proof-texting followed the invention of the printing press and the increase of literacy. Lay Bible reading in the West and especially America probably owes much to the spread of inductive “scientific” (Baconian) methodologies coupled with the system of dispensationalism. This happened through the Bible and prophecy conferences of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries and the Scofield Reference Bible (Boone; Noll; Hatch and Noll).

Although in this way Bible reading and theological claims were democratized to an unprecedented (and unhealthy! so Hauerwas) degree, such inductive biblical theologizing has had its academic counterpart. Charles Hodge and Lewis Sperry Chafer, among other systematic theologians, famously wrote of their task as arranging scientifically the various biblical facts or data for any given topic. This proceeded with more or less sophistication depending on a theologian’s approach to language—how “literal” interpretation was understood and “word studies” were pursued.

Some theologies might not have lost (especially redemptive) history entirely. Yet, on all sides scholarship was excessively fascinated with a reductive analysis of words and concepts, at least until the “biblical theology movement” ran into the buzz saw of James Barr’s The Semantics of Biblical Language.

Today’s lexical resources are less amenable to such proof-texting (Reese), and theologians at least nominally attend to the linguistic complexity of concept formation. Yet, by induction they have often tried to move rather straightforwardly from the Bible as “propositional revelation” to doctrine in conceptual form. One example would be an actual review in which theologian A claims to have a more “biblical” theology than theologian B, based on counting up verses in parentheses (on a random page from each work) and claiming to have three times as many (I leave out names to protect the guilty).

Not only does such practice generate problems connecting Scripture to salvation history; portions of the canon also tend to be privileged at the expense of others, most especially the Pauline corpus at the expense of the Bible’s dominant feature, narrative. This accords with a “monolithic concept of revelation” (Ricoeur). Such privileges have typically been accorded due to a discrimen (imaginative construal of what is authoritative; Kelsey) that is pre- or extratextual: the Bible is authoritative as doctrine or as history or as myth, and so on.

The monolithic concept of revelation has then privileged a particular form of theological discourse, the propositional or conceptual. In Paul Ricoeur’s unflinching analysis, theologians are tempted thereby to “neutralize” biblical genres in order to “extract their theological content” and “transform these different forms of discourse into propositions.” So to interpret is to treat the Bible’s literary forms as a “rhetorical facade which it would be possible to pull down in order to reveal some thought content that is indifferent to its literary vehicle” (Ricoeur 75, 90–91; see also Tracy; Vanhoozer).

This resonates with the work of John Goldingay, who links the concept of “revelation” to a particular model: prophetic inspiration and (p 623)dual authorship—which pertains only to portions of Scripture. He claims that there are multiple models of authority within the biblical text, centrally witnessing tradition, authoritative canon, inspired word, and experienced revelation.

Respecting the Contexts of a “Biblical” Theology

For all its deserved derision, however, some concept of “proof text” seems essential to Christian theology. While their practice may not have been perfect, the Protestant scholastics rightly suggested that if God says what the Bible says, we logically pursue the development and defense of theological claims on such a basis (Muller, esp. 522–23). In addition, canonical practice itself supports the point, both in OT adaptation of earlier theology to later contexts (e.g., complex connections between Torah and Prophets) and in NT appeal to OT texts. A formula such as “it is written” often supports a theological claim, albeit with a richness of context and complex regard for the redemptive-historical situation (e.g., Paul’s discussions of the Abraham story), as opposed to simple isolation of word-concepts or “verses.”

To be sure, the identity relation between “God says” and “Scripture says” remains in need of careful ontological specification. Especially important is more consistent respect for literary genres as diverse forms of communication from and about God, replacing an exclusively oracular model of divine discourse. Speech-act philosophy, a helpful tool here, also suggests that a communicative act contains “presuppositions,” “implications,” and “entailments” (Austin 47–48). These will authorize theological development from the Bible beyond its explicit claims or arguments. Caution is required, though, in light of canonical relations to redemptive history and the role of divine vis-à-vis human authorship.

To speak of God we implicitly, if not explicitly, appeal to Scripture for support. In the end, however, “proof text” is probably not the best term. Not only should we avoid its accumulated cultural baggage; modern standards of “proof” carry a burden of certainty that neither we nor our fathers and mothers have been able to bear. Instead, to authorize a theological “judgment” would mean establishing which biblical patterns of communicative action about God ought to become ours, or how those patterns might preclude other possibilities. On the relation of such judgments to words and concepts, see David Yeago, who specifies: “We must ask (1) about the logical subjects of which predicates are affirmed and denied, (2) about the logical type of the particular predicates affirmed or denied within the conceptual idioms they employ, and (3) about the point or function of their affirmations or denials within their respective contexts of discourse” (94). On the authoritative roles that the Bible might play within such informal argumentation, see Kelsey (esp. ch. 6).

The selection of relevant biblical texts and their interpretation will be mutually reinforcing, which highlights that theologians must both select particular biblical judgments apropos to particular contexts and seek consistency or rough coherence between their various judgment-actions. Certain judgments do follow from what God says in Scripture; others are ruled out for inconsistency with what God has said. We must seek the wisdom to recognize the various cases for what they are, and to recognize when “relative adequacy” (frequently in writings from Tracy, following Bernard Lonergan) is reached for a time—when there are no more relevant questions to answer about an interpretation or judgment—until that situation changes.

The Christian reading of biblical texts as Scripture, somehow unified in relation to a redemptive history, will remain essentially contested, requiring an understanding of the Rule of Faith to be used (and perhaps reformed) during interpretation. Apologetics aside, we may nevertheless reach appropriate postcritical standards of public “proof” (1) even when we accept a measure of theoretical underdetermination but achieve the ongoing dialogue of practical reason. (2) We must resist a thoroughly ahistorical approach to the Bible and seek to give textual reasons for theological interpretations, (3) although such reasons will be at the level of canon and may appeal to the revelatory work of the Spirit in hearing the Word. This proper epistemic role of the Spirit—along with possible corollaries in human wisdom and/or Christian virtue—is perhaps the most complex and contested point in today’s conversations about “proving doctrine” from Scripture.

Ultimately, we must celebrate the increased attention of all scholars to literary context, and commend this to lay readers. We may concede the oft-inadequate attention of theologians to historical context. Meanwhile, though, it is perhaps the burden of this dictionary to call exegetes’ attention back to the theological context of biblical interpretation. What doctrine(s) a text might or might not “prove” can become a material consideration informing exegesis. See also Biblical Theology; Concept; Logic; Revelation; Systematic Theology

(p 624)Bibliography*

Austin, J. L. How to Do Things with Words. Oxford University Press, 1962; Barr, J. The Semantics of Biblical Language. Oxford University Press, 1961; Boone, K. The Bible Tells Them So. SUNY Press, 1989; Eidenmuller, M. “Evangelicalism, Rhetoric, and the Bible: ‘Proof-texting’ or ‘Scriptural Implant.’ ” Online: <http://www.uttyl.edu/meidenmuller/scholarship/scriptural-implant.htm>; Goldingay, J. Models for Scripture. Eerdmans, 1994; Hatch, N., and M. Noll, eds. The Bible in America. Oxford University Press, 1982; Hauerwas, S. Unleashing the Scripture. Abingdon, 1993; Kelsey, D. The Uses of Scripture in Recent Theology. Fortress, 1975. Reissued as Proving Doctrine. Trinity, 1999; Muller, R. Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics. Vol. 2, Holy Scripture. Baker, 1993; Noll, M. Between Faith and Criticism. Harper & Row, 1986; Reese, J. “Pitfalls of Proof-Texting.” BTB 13 (October 1983): 121–23; Ricoeur, P. “Toward a Hermeneutic of the Idea of Revelation.” Pages 73–118 in Essays on Biblical Interpretation, ed. L. Mudge, trans. D. Pellauer. Fortress, 1980; Tracy, D. “Literary Theory and the Return of the Forms for Naming and Thinking God in Theology.” JR 74, no. 3 (July 1994): 302–19; Vanhoozer, K. “The Semantics of Biblical Literature: Truth and Scripture’s Diverse Literary Forms.” Pages 49–104 in Hermeneutics, Authority, and Canon, ed. D. A. Carson and J. Woodbridge. Reprint, Baker, 1995; Yeago, D. “The New Testament and the Nicene Dogma: A Contribution to the Recovery of Theological Exegesis.” Pages 87–100 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997.

Daniel J. Treier

Prophecy and Prophets in the NT

While the significance of prophecy in the NT is affirmed by all, diverse approaches have been used to examine the evidence embedded in both narrative and discourse. Focusing on the source, some have examined prophecy within the broader category of pneumatology. Others have focused on the Jewish and Hellenistic contexts in an attempt to trace the trajectory of prophetic utterances through the Second Temple period. Related to this is emphasis on formal elements that at times leads to the narrowest definition of prophecy. A similar conclusion can be drawn with regard to the use of etymological investigation as the starting point of study. A potentially fruitful approach examines the content of prophetic speeches, but this approach is limited in value for the study of NT prophecy since the content of utterances is often not made explicit. Unsurprisingly, different definitions of prophecy arise respective to these approaches.

Inseparable from God's revelatory acts in history, prophecy naturally lends itself to theological interpretation. Prophecy necessarily assumes that God is able to speak and that the God who speaks is the one who acts (Wolterstorff). Any investigation of NT prophecy and prophets should, therefore, focus on both prophetic utterances and acts. These should in turn be examined within the wider history of God's involvement in history.

Prophecy and the Climax of History

Prophecy is one of the most important themes that highlight the continuity of God's salvific acts in history. The fulfillment formula, used in reference to the fulfillment of OT promises, can be found in Matthew (1:22–23; 2:15, 17–18; etc.). Its related forms also appear throughout the NT (John 13:18; 19:24, 28; Acts 1:16). These prophecies show that the entire history of salvation points to Jesus Christ himself, and in this sense all Scripture is fulfilled in Jesus (Luke 24:44) and he alone can be considered the telos of history (2 Cor. 1:20).

While scholars have pointed to the presence of various types of prophets in the Second Temple period (Aune; Webb), both the intensity and prevalence of prophetic activities in the NT point to the realization that God is acting in a new way. Surrounding the account of the birth of Jesus, one finds the prophetic voices of Elizabeth (Luke 1:42–45), Mary (1:46–55), Zechariah (1:68–79), Simeon (2:29–32), and Anna (2:36–38). These utterances point to the coming of God's salvation. The most significant figure is John the Baptist, who delivers the prophetic call to repentance and the prophetic act of baptism (Matt. 3:1–12; Mark 1:2–8; Luke 3:1–20; John 1:19–28). Many acclaimed John to be a prophet (Matt. 14:5); Jesus considered him to be the conclusion of the period of the Law and the Prophets (11:13). The significance of John as a prophet lies in the anticipatory nature of his ministry as he proclaims the arrival of “the Prophet.”

In the Gospels, Jesus is explicitly called a prophet (Matt. 13:57; 21:11; Mark 6:4; Luke 7:16; 9:8, 19; 24:19; John 4:19, 44; 6:14; 7:40; 9:17). Not only does he call the people of God to repentance, but also he is the prophet who will lead his people on the new exodus journey. He is the prophet like Moses (Acts 3:22–23; cf. Deut. 18:18–19), and his journey to Jerusalem is an “exodus” journey (Luke 9:31 Greek). In performing signs and wonders, Jesus embodies the presence of God. As with the prophets of old, he is also characterized by the rejection of his people that ultimately leads to his death on the cross (Luke 13:33). Through the cross and resurrection, he is able to lead his people into the promised “rest” (Heb. 4). In Jesus, therefore, all prophecies (p 625) find their fulfillment. As the significance of his words and deeds transcends the generation that he addresses, he is clearly recognized as one who is more than a prophet.

The power of the cross and the resurrection forms the center of the messages of many who followed Christ, arguably the most famous of which is the apostle Paul. In the account of his encounter with Christ on the road to Damascus, he uses the prophetic call formula to describe his mission as an apostle to the Gentiles (Gal. 1:15–16; cf. Jer. 1:5; Isa. 49:1). The prophetic message that he proclaims points to the new stage in salvation history: Jesus is now the Lord of all, and Gentiles will be able to participate as God’s elected ones (Rom. 16:26–27). His prophetic call to his own people to recognize the dawn of the messianic era also recalls the message of the classical prophets (Rom. 9–11).

Prophecy and the People of the Spirit

The new era initiated through the life and ministry of Jesus is characterized by the renewed work of the Spirit among God’s people, as promised in the classical prophets (e.g., Isa. 32:14–17; 44:1–4). The most explicit discussion appears in the context of the Pentecost account in Acts 2, where the quotation from Joel 2:28–32 has been understood as depicting the democratization of the Spirit experience, in which both young and old, male and female will prophesy. This quotation is preceded by a phrase from Isa. 2:2, describing the new era as “the last days” (Acts 2:17). The accounts of the prophetic activities of “maidservants” (Luke 1:38 AT), “daughters” (Acts 21:9), (young) men (11:27; 21:10), and old men (Luke 2:29) confirm the reality of such experiences. This age is one that “all prophets” have spoken of, and the early Christian community is to be considered as “sons of the prophets” (Acts 3:24–25 RSV).

In Paul, the experience of the prophetic Spirit is expressed in terms of the “gifts” of the Spirit. Prophecy appears in every list of gifts (Rom. 12:6; 1 Cor. 12:10, 28; Eph. 4:11). The ecclesiological significance of prophecy is highlighted when Paul claims that the one “who prophesies edifies the church” (1 Cor. 14:4).

The NT also expresses the understanding that the future consummation is yet to come in prophetic terms. As a prophet (Rev. 1:3), John wrote down the revelation of Jesus concerning “what must soon take place” (1:1). This predictive element is complemented by the prophetic call to be faithful as one lives in light of the future (chs. 2–3). Moreover, the presence of the false prophet heightens the need to be alert (Rev. 2:20; 19:20; cf. Matt. 7:15; 24:11; Mark 13:22; Acts 13:6; 1 John 4:1). Nevertheless, John’s message is christocentric in nature since prophecy itself is ultimately the testimony of the works of Christ (Rev. 19:10).

Prophecy and Contemporary Interpretation

Prophetic activities testify to the act of God in history. God is the one who reveals himself through words and deeds; prophetic utterances should therefore be considered together with prophetic acts. In terms of salvation history, NT prophecy has to be understood in reference to the definitive revelation in the person of Jesus Christ.

Prophecy cannot be separated from the community of believers. Prophetic utterances affect the life of the community, and the community in turn is responsible to discern the content of such utterances (1 Cor. 14:29). In a broader sense, the community is also called to participate in the prophetic act through witnessing of the person and work of Jesus Christ.

This leads us to the question of authority. With Christ being the goal of OT prophecies, one cannot simply equate the writings of the OT prophets with the utterances of the NT prophets. The distinction between prophets and apostles, on the one hand, and prophetic utterances and canonical witnesses, on the other, has to be articulated (Grudem; Carson).

A carefully constructed understanding of prophetic authority allows one to recognize the possibility of the continuation of the prophetic gift in our times. The fact that Paul affirms the continuation of the gift of prophecy, and the reality of prophetic activities in the early church—both force one to recognize the continuation of prophecy beyond the apostolic period. Whether one wishes to emphasize the kerygmatic (Gillespie), pastoral (Hill), or revelatory (Turner) aspects, one cannot deny that the church is living in the “last days,” where the presence of the prophetic Spirit is evident.

Bibliography

Aune, D. Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World. Eerdmans, 1983; Carson, D. A. Showing the Spirit. Baker, 1987; Ellis, E. E. Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity. WUNT 18. Mohr/Siebeck, 1978; Forbes, C. Prophecy and Inspired Speech in Early Christianity and Its Hellenistic Environment. WUNT 2.75. Mohr/Siebeck, 1995; Gillespie, T. The First Theologians.. Eerdmans Eerdmans, , 19941994; ; GrudemGrudem, , WW. . ((p p 626)The Gift of Prophecy in the New Testament and Today. Rev. ed. Crossway, 2000; Hill, D. New Testament Prophecy. Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1979; Spencer, F. S. “Out of Mind, Out of Voice: Slave-Girls and Prophetic Daughters in Luke-Acts.” BibInt 7 (1999): 133–55; Turner, M. “Spiritual Gifts Then and Now.” VE 15 (1985): 7–64; Vanhoozer, K. First Theology. InterVarsity, 2002; Webb, R. John the Baptizer and Prophet. JSNTSup 62. Sheffield Academic Press, 1991; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

David W. Pao

Prophecy and Prophets in the OT

Toward a Definition of Prophecy

The OT uses various terms to refer to the phenomenon of prophecy. The most-common expression, also the most difficult to define, is navi’. Its derivation is uncertain, but it is sometimes thought to refer to “someone who calls, proclaims” or to “someone who has been called.” The term “seer” (ro’eh) stresses the prophets’ receipt of visions, which frequently included auditions of the divine word (Num. 23:3–5; Jer. 38:21–23).

The term khozeh (seer) similarly reflects the visionary character of prophecy. Yet, since its cognate is used in the headings of some of the prophetic books, which contain prophetic words and visions, it appears to have a wider connotation, denoting a “recipient of divine revelation.”

The OT does not always distinguish between these terms (1 Sam. 9:9), nor are they the best guide to defining the nature of prophecy. For this, one needs to turn to the sweep of OT literature, which presents prophets as men and women mediating divine auditions and visions to their audiences (individuals, particular groups, Israel, or foreign nations) by means of speech or symbolic action.

The Ancient Near Eastern Context

Both the OT (Num. 22–24; 1 Kings 18:19; Jer. 27:8–11) and an increasing number of extrabiblical documents indicate that the phenomenon of prophecy was not confined to Israel but was widespread throughout the ancient Near East.

The most important evidence comes from Mesopotamia and includes references to various intermediaries in the Mari letters (eighteenth century BCE), the Old Babylonian Eshnunna oracles, and a variety of Neo-Assyrian documents (seventh century BCE). Additional cuneiform and West Semitic sources confirm the existence of intermediaries throughout the region of Syria-Palestine.

Similarities between Israel and the neighboring cultures—such as the terminology used to refer to prophetic figures, the attestation of professional and lay prophets, the receipt of divine revelation by means of auditions and visions, and prophetic speech forms—are counterbalanced by significant differences. These include the Israelite prohibition of divination (Deut. 13:1–5), the strong ethical drive of the “writing prophets,” and Israel’s unique corpus of prophetic literature.

The Early Prophets

The Pentateuch traces Israel’s history of prophecy back to Moses, the paradigm of the prophetic office (Deut. 34:10). The heirs of Moses’ prophetic mantle mentioned in the books of Samuel and Kings include Samuel, Gad, Nathan, Micaiah, Elijah, Elisha, and Huldah. Speaking in the name of Yahweh (2 Sam. 12:7; 1 Kings 21:19), these prophets continue the intermediating role first performed by Moses.

Some of these prophets were important political figures who anointed kings (1 Sam. 16:13; 1 Kings 19:15), acted as their military advisers (1 Kings 22; 2 Kings 3), assumed the role of their God-sent censors (2 Sam. 11–12; 1 Kings 21), and got involved in dethroning some of Israel’s rulers (1 Sam. 15:28; 1 Kings 14:7–18; 21:19). Until the mid-ninth century BCE, they were Israel’s most important oppositional force (Koch); and as agents and defenders of Yahweh, they opposed religious apostasy and syncretism.

The Prophetic Books

In the Christian canon, the corpus of prophetic books consists of the “major prophets” Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, and the smaller books from Hosea to Malachi. It also includes Lamentations, which was added here due to its association with Jeremiah. The period of these “classical” or “writing prophets” stretches approximately from the eighth to the fifth centuries BCE and covers the periods of Neo-Assyrian domination, Babylonian ascendancy, the exile, and the restoration under Medo-Persian rule.

With the exception of Daniel, the prophetic books are anthologies of prophetic oracles whose focus is not on the prophetic personae but on the prophets' divine message. While classical prophecy appears to have evolved out of earlier forms, its announcement of a divine punishment afflicting the entire nation and its production of collections of prophetic speeches are major new developments.

The prophets used a variety of speech forms, including vision reports (Amos 7:1–3), allegories (Isa. 5:1–7), and dirges (Amos 5:1–3). The two (p 627) main forms or genres, however, are “oracles of judgment,” usually consisting of the announcement of judgment and the reasons for it (Isa. 30:1–14), and “oracles of salvation” (Jer. 28:2–4). Many oracles are introduced by a formula such as “thus says Yahweh,” which expresses the prophets' claim to speak in Yahweh's name. This claim manifests itself also in “call narratives” like Amos 7:14–15; Isa. 6; Jer. 1; and Ezek. 1–3.

History of Interpretation. “Precritical” readings of the prophetic books, especially those of the early church, which was deeply influenced by the prophetic literature, showed great interest in the prophets' moral exhortations. Prominent examples include their words on fasting (e.g., Joel 1:13–15; 2:12–17) and their exhortations to the watchmen and shepherds of the people (Ezek. 3:17–21; 33:1–9; 34:1–24), which were applied to specific questions of church politics. Most significantly, however, early Christian interpreters adopted a christological model of interpretation, which read the prophets, even including passages that had not been understood christologically by the NT writers, with a view to their fulfillment in Christ (Dassmann).

Modern interpretation of the prophetic literature has followed the general tendencies of the historical-critical study of the OT, while pursuing issues germane to the investigation of prophecy. Important steps along the way include the perception of the “classical prophets” as religious innovators and advocates of an “ethical monotheism,” a monotheistic faith marked by ethical imperatives (Wellhausen, Duhm), and an interest in prophetic inspiration and ecstasy (Hölscher, Lindblom). An understanding of the prophets as religious geniuses is also reflected in the quest for their ipsissima verba, their original inspired words, which were thought to have been short poetic sayings (Gunkel).

The development of form criticism and tradition criticism led to a new image that saw the prophets as heirs, transmitters, and developers of traditional convictions and expressions. Various attempts were undertaken to understand the prophets against the backgrounds of the Israelite cult and covenant theology, Israel's legal traditions, or various wisdom circles.

Currently, redaction criticism, which seeks to reconstruct the redactional history of the prophetic books, provides one of the main tools for prophetic research. In offering a positive evaluation of the work of subsequent redactors, it continues to shift the focus away from the prophetic genius and his authentic words, and to the contribution made by Israel's educated elite in adapting the prophetic message to changed historical circumstances.

The postmodern fragmentation of biblical studies has led to the application of a variety of fresh approaches. In contradistinction to the historical-critical interest in the realities "behind the text," these recent approaches have tended to focus on the text itself or the contribution made to the interpretative process by the reader. Important developments include canonical approaches, which find the locus of authority in the final shape of the prophetic books read within the framework provided by the biblical canon as a whole. Rhetorical-critical readings, on the other hand, particularly those in the classical Aristotelian tradition of rhetoric, study prophetic rhetoric as argumentation, as an activity that seeks to alter reality, thus promoting a rhetorical view of religious language that values the communicative force of the biblical texts.

The Message of the Prophetic Books. The prophetic books record the mostly disregarded announcements of divine judgment to a sinful and complacent people together with proclamations of future salvation beyond the divine punishment.

Speaking in the name of Yahweh and against the background of Yahweh's covenant with Israel (Petersen 37), the prophets evaluate the life of God's people from a divine perspective. A characteristic feature of their powerful message is their insistence on love, righteousness, and justice as the proper expressions of Israel's relationship with Yahweh (Amos 5:21–24). Confronting the Israelites with their failure to live up to these standards, the prophets often turn into advocates for the weak and marginalized of society (Isa. 1:16–17; Zech. 7:8–10). Another recurring prophetic criticism concerns Israel's temptation to serve foreign gods (Jer. 7:9; Hos. 13:1–2).

The announcement of divine judgment was meant to induce the prophets' hearers to repentance or served to confirm the finality of Yahweh's decision. In either case, the lack of repentance resulted in tragedy and the conviction that only Yahweh could overcome the corruptness of the human heart (Jer. 31:31–34; Ezek. 36:26–27).

Israel's eventual restoration is another pervasive theme, stressing the reversal of exile (Jer. 3:18) and envisaging life in the land in abundance and prosperity (Amos 9:13–15) under the leadership of a just Davidic king (Isa. 11:1–10; Hos. 3:5).

(p 628) Yet, speaking in the name of the Creator of all human beings, the prophets' purview extended well beyond Israel. It included the nations, who are the object of both prophetic announcements of judgment (Isa. 13–23; Jer. 46–51; Ezek. 26–32; Amos 1–2; Obadiah) and proclamations of future salvation (Isa. 19:19–25).

The theological significance of the prophetic literature resides in the combination of the vertical and the horizontal dimensions of the prophetic message. As creative speakers and writers, the prophets furnished their contemporaries, as well as countless subsequent generations of readers, with powerful theological reflections and ethical directives. These, though inevitably influenced by their own circumstances, are ultimately based on the divine word (dabar, Jer. 1:4; Ezek. 3:16) and revelation/vision (khazon, Isa. 1:1; Obad. 1; Nah. 1:1).

Bibliography

Blenkinsopp, J. A History of Prophecy in Israel. 2d ed. Westminster John Knox, 1996; Dassmann, E. "Umfang, Kriterien und Methoden frühchristlicher Prophetenexegese." Jahrbuch für biblische Theologie 14 (1999): 117–43; Davies, P., ed. The Prophets. Sheffield Academic Press, 1996; Gordon, R., ed. "The Place Is Too Small for Us." Eisenbrauns, 1995; Gowan, D. Theology of the Prophetic Books. Westminster John Knox, 1998; Koch, K. The Prophets. 2 vols. SCM, 1982–83; Neumann, P. H. A., ed. Das Prophetenverständnis in der deutschsprachigen Forschung seit Heinrich Ewald. Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1979; Nissinen, M., ed. Prophecy in Its Ancient Near Eastern Context. SBL, 2000; Nissinen, M., et al., eds. Prophets and Prophecy in the Ancient Near East. SBL, 2003; Petersen, D. L. The Prophetic Literature. Westminster John Knox, 2002; Rofé, A. Introduction to the Prophetic Literature. Sheffield Academic Press, 1997.

Karl Möller

Prophetic Writings

History of Interpretation

The "prophetic writings" in the Christian canon comprise the fifteen books that bear the name of a prophet (Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, and the twelve Minor Prophets), and also Daniel and Lamentations. The Book of the Twelve was counted as a single book in ancient times (in the Babylonian Talmud, for example, B. Bat. 14b–15a reckons twenty-four books in the canon) and in some modern treatments (House; Collins). The Hebrew Bible counts only the three major and twelve "minor" prophets in its Nevi'im section.

In the earliest Christian interpretation, such as Justin Martyr's

Dialogue with Trypho, the prophets afforded an important key to understanding Christian theology, because of the powerful idea that Jesus Christ had fulfilled prophecy. Historical context tended to be secondary, and texts were instead taken as proofs that Jesus was the promised Messiah (Sawyer 42–49). A typological method allowed Jonah, for example, to be taken as a type of Christ (Sherwood, Biblical, 11–21). The Reformation saw a return of the historical sense, but this was still subject to a belief in the unified witness of Scripture. For example, Calvin can call the return of the Babylonian exiles “the restitution of the church.” And what was promised to Israel in that context is immediately applicable to Christian life (such as need for regeneration by God’s Spirit; Calvin 269, 271).

Early critical interpretation, no longer looking directly for Christian doctrine, had two main interests: the prophets’ experience and the extent to which they proclaimed a new kind of religion. Literary critics sought the “original” words of the prophets, typically in their poetry, as distinct from the prosaic sections (e.g., Duhm), believing there was a connection between poetic form and prophetic inspiration. Prophets were thought to have had a special religious experience, whether in the apprehension of divine messages, or in prophetic performance, an experience that some called “ecstatic” (Duhm; Lindblom 46). Many scholars believed that prophets introduced a profound new ethical and spiritual dimension to Israelite religion (e.g., Skinner; Eichrodt 345; von Rad 54–55).

Form criticism focused more on typical forms of prophetic speech than on the prophetic experience as such. The dominant forms identified were Oracles of Judgment and Oracles of Salvation. C. Westermann also found third-person accounts (including vision reports) and prayers (Westermann 90–98). The basic division between judgment and salvation oracles raised certain questions. For example, were oracles declarations of unalterable future events (Westermann 65–67), or could an oracle of judgment actually be a threat intended to lead to repentance (Tucker 55–56)?

The form-critical method of inquiry raised a number of other questions. Did the prophets function in the setting of temple worship (Johnson)? Did they originally preach judgment only (as many commentators thought about Amos, for example)? Form criticism therefore led back to questions about the prophets themselves and how their words produced effects. Its unanswered questions therefore led to a next phase, redaction (p 629) criticism, which focused more firmly on the prophetic book.

Redaction criticism examines the ways in which prophetic words were handed on, added to, and received into new contexts, until they finally took their place in finished books. The structure of certain books gives prima facie evidence for such redactional activity, for example, the alternation of judgment and salvation groups of texts in Isa. 1–12. One version of this process postulates a “rolling corpus” (McKane), in which a core of sayings is gradually expanded in an open-ended way (e.g., Jer. 3:6–11 develops 3:1–5). Another version posits the controlling hand of a final author or redactor, as in Williamson’s account of Isa. 1–55, which he thinks was brought to its present form by Deutero-Isaiah.

The redactional process itself is theologically rich. Clements, speaking of the composition of Isaiah, thinks that “through its many stages of growth, intentional connections and interrelationships between the parts were planned” (Hermeneutical, 204). The redactional process can explain why the major prophetic corpora, including perhaps the Book of the Twelve (Collins), exhibit similar structures, moving from warnings of judgment to judgment itself, and then announcements of salvation.

In the trend to redaction criticism, the older criteria for identifying “authentic” prophetic words no longer held. The distinction between poetry and prose has been blurred (Kugel; Andersen and Freedman). On some accounts the prophetic figure virtually disappears; for some, the biblical literature has transformed free-thinking “poets” into “prophets” (R. P. Carroll; contrast Duhm!). Others, however, maintain the connection between prophet and book, showing from the ancient world that prophets wrote down their sayings (Barstad 123–24). Some tried to identify the roles of Israel’s prophets and of the sociological groups that supported them (Petersen; Wilson).

“Rhetorical criticism” (Patrick and Scult) examines prophetic discourse (whether the prophet’s own or as deposited in the book) for its power to persuade an audience. This sheds light on some older questions (such as whether Oracles of Judgment aimed to produce repentance and therefore prevent the threatened evil). It also draws attention to the prophetic art: its poetry, metaphors, and other figures of speech (Sherwood, “Of Fruit”), its use of sound (alliteration, assonance), its specifically rhetorical techniques (such as drawing an audience in with an accepted proposition in order to induce acceptance of an unanticipated consequence, as in Amos 1:1–2:8). Such studies can consider the effects of prophetic speech and writing on both “original” and subsequent audiences. This is in keeping with the status of the prophetic writings as canonical literature.

Modern readings have returned to contemporary applications. Some draw out implications for the church’s life and ministry (Brueggemann); some have found new contexts, as in Latin America, to apply prophetic social critique in relation to religion and politics

(M. D. Carroll R.). Others have sought to identify power concepts inherent in prophetic language, alert to the dangers of using even these texts, so critical of power structures in their day, as pretexts for sustaining such structures today (Weems).

Recovery of the prophetic message does not require a return to precritical methods. Rather, by engaging with literary and historical questions highlighted by modern criticism, it needs to bring the prophetic message to bear on contemporary issues, both within the church and beyond. Such recoveries have to maintain a careful balance between hearing the word of judgment and announcing the hope of liberation.

Overview of Message

The Basic Pattern: Sin, Judgment, and Salvation. The main prophetic corpora share a common broad structure: judgment preached, judgment comes, salvation proclaimed. The first premise of this pattern is the sinfulness of Israel, namely its idolatry (Hosea) and perversion of justice (Amos). The distinction between these two strands is not watertight, and indeed, false worship and injustice are often expressly linked (Jer. 2:33–34; Amos 2:6–8).

The context of the accusation of sin is the expected loyalty of Israel to Yahweh their God. Such loyalty is not generally portrayed as covenantal, though Hosea and Deuteronomy place prophets close to covenantal theology (Nicholson; Andersen and Freedman). Isaiah uses the metaphor of rebellious children (Isa. 1:2–4). Hosea and Jeremiah recall a “golden” wilderness age of faithfulness, in contrast with present idolatry. Amos declares that God will punish Israel because he has “known” them, alone of “all the families of the earth” (Amos 3:2 NRSV).

The falseness of Israel to God leads to an analysis of sin as a powerful tendency to inconstancy. Jeremiah appeals to Judah to “return, faithless children,” where “faithless” is a term based on shub (turn, return). The moral life is depicted as (p 630)an intense struggle between turning toward God and turning away to other gods. For the community, the possibilities are either “truth” ( emeth) or profound falsehood (sheqer; Jer. 8:22–9:9; cf. Zeph. 3:13; Overholt). In the latter situation, the remedy is nothing less than a radical reorientation of loyalties, thought, and practice, or what the prophets call “returning” or “repenting.”

However, Israel fails to respond. The only canonical instance of repentance following a prophet’s preaching is that of Nineveh to the judgment oracle of Jonah (Jon. 3:4–5)! Otherwise, the prophetic books testify to inevitable judgment due to persistent sin. This, however, becomes a prelude to a dramatic solution—a new act of God, who not only saves the people out of their affliction, but also enables them to do what was previously impossible, to become faithful to God (typified by Jeremiah's new covenant; 31:31–34). The judgment-salvation pattern, therefore, comprises an analysis of the human moral condition, and a soteriology grounded in God's love and mercy.

This transformation from judgment to salvation comes because of God's own commitment to his people's salvation. The classic text expressing, anthropomorphically, God's inner conflict because of the impulse to punish yet overriding compassion is Hos. 11:8–9 (cf. Jer. 31:20). The “incarnational” tendency is expressed also in the “Immanuel” sign (“God with us”; Isa. 7:14). In the prophets, “image of God” becomes incarnational when God's image becomes merged with the prophet's (Mauser, linking Hosea, Jeremiah, and Jesus). Inasmuch as the Suffering Servant of Isa. 40–55 exhibits the divine suffering, this image also lies close to the picture in Jeremiah.

Critical Engagement with Tradition. The themes of the prophetic program may be subsumed under the heading of critical engagement with tradition. As we saw, the prophetic message is addressed to the nation Israel's past with God. Memories of patriarchal origins (Hos. 12:3), exodus from Egypt (Mic. 6:4), entry to the land (Amos 2:9–11), covenant at Sinai (obliquely at Jer. 15:1), and covenant with David (Amos 9:11)—all are found in the prophetic corpus. But either this tradition is used to exhort the people to obedience and gratitude, or their understanding of it is challenged.

A fundamental idea is the impossibility of being truly “Israel” in the absence of a love of righteousness and justice. Paradigmatic are Isa. 5:1–7; Hos. 6:6; Amos 5:24; and Mic. 6:6–8 (cf. Deut. 10:12–13). Temple and king, symbols of Israel's privileged status, have no intrinsic claim to endurance without these qualities. Jeremiah's “temple sermon” outrageously parallels the Jerusalem temple with that of Shiloh, which had succumbed to Philistine ravages generations earlier (Jer. 7:1–15; 26:2–6). Before him, Micah knew that it was vulnerable because of those who “build Zion with bloodshed” (Mic. 3:10, 12). Isaiah holds King Ahaz to account, as “house of David” (Isa. 7:13), to find safety in faith in Yahweh, rather than in alliance with idolatrous Assyria. Failure to be Israel in truth will result in loss of the land, once given in trust to a people who pledged to be faithful.

In this quest of the true Israel, its very boundaries are put in question. First, in a narrowing tendency, the true Israel is sometimes described as a “remnant” of the historic people (Isa. 10:2–23; Jer. 5:10; Joel 2:32 [3:5 MT]). Second, there is a broadening tendency toward an inclusive covenant, incorporating the other nations. The issue is sharply put in Jonah, where God's mercy and compassion—traditional elements in covenantal thought (Exod. 34:6)—are claimed to extend even to the hated Assyrians (Jon. 4:2). The prophetic corpus perhaps conducts an inner dialogue on this, with an echo in Jonah of Joel's more traditional "Divine Warrior" attitude (Joel 2:13). The book of Isaiah also moves toward inclusion of the nations in God's salvation. These will come in pilgrimage to Zion, to learn of God and his torah (Isa. 2:2–4; cf. Mic. 4:1–4). And in Isa. 40–55 the concept of "covenant" itself is reconceived so as to include the nations (Isa. 42:6; 49:6).

Behind the visions of the nations' future inclusion is the belief in God's sovereign power over all nature and history. Ezekiel's visions of Yahweh enthroned over Babylon (Ezek. 1; 10) assert that the God of Israel cannot be confined to one people or city. The universality of Yahweh is a general premise in the prophetic books (Jer. 4:23–26; Joel 3:1–8 [4:1–8 MT]; Amos 1–2; Zeph. 1:2–3).

A special aspect of the belief in God's universality is theodicy. The Oracles against the Nations, which appear in several of the prophetic books (e.g., Isa. 13–23), have at their heart the concept of God's justice. The idea of God bringing a foreign nation in judgment against his people prompts the further proposition that God will in turn punish those nations for their sin (Isa. 10:5–19; Jer. 25:11–12). The prophet Habakkuk laments the potential injustice involved in using a wicked nation to punish God's people (ch. 1). This protest prompts God's famous answer, that "the righteous shall live by his/their faith(fulness)" (Hab. 2:4 AT).

(p 631)The Shape of the Future. The future hope held out by the prophets is never simply a return to the status quo ante. Since the future always arises out of the catastrophe that destroyed the old order, the prophets visualize possible future communities in that context. The old promises will be fulfilled, but in unexpected ways. The precise concepts vary from prophet to prophet, but the following are found. Holy war is developed into images of total, final conflict, in which the God of Israel triumphs over all enemies (Ezek. 38–39; Joel 3 [4 MT]). In Ezekiel's ideal yet pragmatic vision, future Zion and temple are depicted in Edenic terms (Ezek. 47; cf. Joel 3:17–18 [4:17–18 MT]). In Isaiah, Zion takes on eschatological overtones, with its inclusion of non-Israelite nations, and its depictions of a renewed creation (Isa. 60:17–20). Knowledge of God is no longer confined either to Israel (Hab. 2:14) or to the traditional priestly and prophetic channels (Jer. 31:34; Joel 2:28–29 [3:1–2 MT]). Messianic images involving the Davidic king take diverse forms. He can have a subordinate role (Ezekiel's nasi, "prince," in chs.

44–48), come as a powerful king who establishes justice among the nations (Isa. 11:1–9), or come with both power and humility (Zech. 9:9–10).

Postexilic prophecy lies between two fulfillments, one accomplished already in the restoration from Babylon, and a greater one still in the future. Zechariah’s visions celebrate the first restoration (note its announcement that Jeremiah’s seventy-year exile is at an end; Zech. 1:12–17), yet that book also proffers further hope, in near-apocalyptic terms (chs. 12–14). In the interim, the currency of the community is justice and righteousness (Isa. 48:17–19; 60:21; Zech. 7:8–10).

Contribution to the Canon

In the canonical prophetic corpus, the location of the writings between fulfillments is definitive. The prophets are put on a par with the Mosaic law, by juxtaposing the expected coming of Elijah with an exhortation to keep the “statutes and ordinances” given at Horeb (Mal. 4:4–6). In this way the prophetic writings continue to call the community to repent, while proclaiming an indefeasible hope based on the faithfulness of God.

Their future orientation is essentially open. This is clear from their diversity on topics such as messianic expectation. Indeed, the canonical form apparently expresses and invites dialogue. An example is the repetition of the formula in Joel 3:16 [4:16 MT] (“The LORD roars from Zion / And utters his voice from Jerusalem”; NRSV) in Amos 1:2, which follows closely in the dominant canonical order. One context is judgment, the other salvation. Similarly, Isaiah’s peace text (“They shall beat their swords into ploughshares / And their spears into pruning hooks”; 2:4 NRSV) is precisely reversed in Joel 3:10 [4:10 MT], a text that points to an eschatological holy war. Jonah’s affirmation of God’s grace to the nations (4:2) echoes Joel’s more traditional claim (Joel 2:13). In these pairs of texts none is meant to trump another; rather, they convey diverse aspects of a larger truth.

The prophetic writings as a whole testify to the constant renewal of the grace of God. The “story” underlying them tells of God’s readiness to do new things in order to achieve his purpose of creating a faithful people. The trajectory of Jeremiah’s seventy-year exile (Jer. 25:11–12; Dan. 9:2; Zech. 1:12–17) traces this, and the new covenant symbolizes it. The NT’s re-appropriation of “Israel,” Davidic promise, tropes of exile and temple, Spirit (Joel 2:28–29 [3:1–2 MT]), new covenant, Jesus as Suffering Servant, Elijah (as John the Baptist)—all this is in line with the dynamic of development and reapplication that we find in the OT itself.

What the Books Say Theologically

The prophetic writings, along with the Torah, form part of the scriptural Rule of Faith and life. They testify to God's past faithfulness and his ever-present readiness to save again in whatever "day of small things" (Zech. 4:10) we find ourselves. As Zechariah's postexilic community could celebrate deliverance from Babylonian captivity, yet feel that God had greater things in store, so the church hears the prophets between the coming of Christ and his coming again. This invites reinterpretations. The term "exiles"—which can still be applied to the community even after the restoration (Jer. 24:4; cf. Ezra 6:19)—resonates among Christians, who celebrate Easter and yet await the parousia, and in the meantime are "in the world but not of it" (cf. John 17).

In tight tension with such encouragement, however, comes also the call to repent in order to avert judgment. The judgment-salvation pattern, raised to canonical status in the prophetic books, is a pattern of the reality within which we live. Thus, we are called to allow ourselves, individually and as church, to be addressed by the full force of prophetic critique, to explore restlessly the meaning of the call to be God's people, to examine well-established ways of thinking and acting, indeed to question radically all self-serving, complacent attitudes. Above all, we are (p 632) exhorted to hope in God, not in false objects of trust, to worship in spirit and truth, and to be like Simeon (Luke 2:25 NRSV), "looking forward to the consolation of Israel."

Bibliography

Andersen, F., and D. Freedman. Hosea. AB 24. Doubleday, 1980; Barstad, H. "No Prophets? Recent Developments in Biblical Prophetic Research and Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy." Pages 106–26 in The Prophets, ed. P. Davies; Barton, J. "The Canonical Meaning of the Book of the Twelve." Pages 59–73 in After the Exile, ed. J. Barton and D. Reimer. Mercer University Press, 1996; Brueggemann, W. Hopeful Imagination. Fortress, 1986; Calvin, J. Ezekiel I, ed. D. F. Wright. Eerdmans/Paternoster, 1994; Carroll R., M. D. Contexts for Amos. JSOTSup 132. JSOT, 1992; Carroll, R. P. "Poets Not Prophets: A Response to 'Prophets through the Looking Glass.'" Pages 43–49 in The Prophets, ed. P. Davies; Clements, R. "Prophecy as Literature: A Reappraisal." Pages 56–76 in The Hermeneutical Quest, ed. D. G. Miller. Pickwick, 1986. Reprint, pages 203–16 in Old Testament Prophecy. Westminster John Knox, 1996; Collins, T. The Mantle of Elijah. JSOT, 1993; Davies, P., ed. The Prophets. The Biblical Seminar. Sheffield Academic Press, 1996; Duhm, B. Das Buch Jeremia. Mohr, 1901; Eichrodt, W. Theology of the Old Testament. Vol. 1, trans. J. A. Baker. OTL. Westminster, 1961; House, P. The Unity of the Twelve. Almond, 1990; Johnson, A. The Cultic Prophet in Ancient Israel.

University of Wales Press, 1944; Kugel, J. The Idea of Biblical Poetry. Yale University Press, 1981; Lindblom, J. Prophecy in Ancient Israel. Blackwell, 1962; Mauser, U. Gottesbild und Menschwerdung. Mohr, 1971; McKane, W. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Jeremiah. 2 vols. ICC. T&T Clark, 1986–96; Nicholson, E. God and His People. Clarendon, 1986; Overholt, T. W. The Threat of Falsehood. SBT. SCM, 1970; Patrick, D., and A. Scult. Rhetoric and Biblical Interpretation. Almond, 1990; Petersen, D. L. The Roles of Israel's Prophets. JSOTSup 17. JSOT, 1981; Rad, G. von. Old Testament Theology. Vol. 2. SCM, 1965; Sawyer, J. F. A. The Fifth Gospel. Cambridge University Press, 1996; Sherwood, Y. A Biblical Text and Its Afterlives. Cambridge University Press, 2000; idem. "Of Fruit and Corpses and Wordplay Visions: Picturing Amos 8:1–3." JSOT 92 (2001): 5–27; Skinner, J. Prophecy and Religion. Cambridge University Press, 1922; Tucker, G. Form Criticism of the Old Testament. Fortress, 1971; Weems, R. Battered Love. Fortress, 1995; Westermann, C. Basic Forms of Prophetic Speech. Lutterworth/Westminster John Knox, 1991; Williamson, H. G. M. The Book Called Isaiah. Clarendon, 1994; Wilson, R. R. Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel. Fortress, 1980.

J. G. McConville

Proposition

Individual (token) sentences are physical entities: sound waves or marks on paper or sequences of colored flags. J. L. Austin drew attention, however, not just to the act of saying something, which he called the "locutionary act," but also to the act done in saying something, which he called the "illocutionary act," and to the act done by saying something, which he called the "perlocutionary act." When my wife performs the locutionary act of saying in English "Dinner is ready," she also performs the illocutionary act of affirming that dinner is ready, and the perlocutionary act of drawing me to come downstairs and eat it. There is no finite list of perlocutionary acts, since there is no end of things that one can bring about through speaking, and there are also many different illocutionary acts: we ask questions, express wishes, and issue commands. Even indicative sentences can be used for actions other than affirmation—promising, swearing, naming, apologizing, thanking, pronouncing sentence, and so on.

Nevertheless, affirmation is one of the most important illocutionary acts, since it represents a proposition as true. God cannot affirm a false proposition, so God's affirmation is a particularly important illocutionary act. The principal problem of biblical interpretation is, accordingly, to work out which propositions the divine author is affirming in the sentences of the Bible. Usually the human author and the divine author affirm one and the same proposition in an utterance, but sometimes, as in some cases of prophecy, the proposition affirmed by God may be beyond the understanding of the human author. It may even be the case that the proposition affirmed by the human speaker is false, as seems to be the case with Caiaphas's unwitting prophecy recorded in John 11:49–51.

Occasionally theologians try to contrast a set of propositions and the biblical narrative. This is misguided, for in a sense a narrative just is a set of propositions, albeit about events in time. It is, however, important to recognize that the Bible does not contain just propositions; the Bible also contains questions, injunctions, and wishes. Nor need it be slavishly maintained that every indicative sentence affirms a distinct true proposition: perhaps, for example, the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:30–35) is intended as a whole to affirm a single true proposition. In other words, the literary genre not only determines what proposition is affirmed—for example, in irony the proposition affirmed is the opposite of the one that the sentence expresses—but also what it is that affirms the proposition, whether an individual sentence or a larger passage. See also Speech-Act Theory; Truth

Bibliography

Austin, J. L. How to Do Things with Words. Oxford University Press, 1961; Searle, J. Speech Acts. Cambridge University Press, 1969; Vanhoozer, K. Is There (p 633)a Meaning in This Text? Apollos, 1998; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Daniel Hill

Protestant Biblical Interpretation

The rise of distinctive Protestant biblical interpretation in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries coincided with the humanistic advances in rhetoric and linguistics of the Renaissance and the Reformers' dogmatic assertions concerning theological authority. This is not to suggest that Protestant interpretation developed ex nihilo, for almost all the exegetical techniques employed by Protestant interpreters in the Reformation and post-Reformation eras have antecedents in medieval exegesis. The theological and ecclesiastical changes brought about by the Reformers did, however, lead to an increased emphasis on the literal sense of the sacred text. The literal sense had also been sought in medieval times by exegetes like Thomas Aquinas, Nicholas of Lyra, and Hugh and Andrew of St. Victor (Smalley; McKim), but it was increasingly important to the Protestant generation in light of the authority they invested in the Bible. The dramatic innovations in academic scholarship and the intellectual milieu of Renaissance humanism enabled Protestant exegetes to pursue that literal sense with increasing precision and confidence. Thus, Protestant biblical interpretation inherited the exegetical legacy of the medieval church and adapted it according to the Reformation's teaching on theological authority, aided by the linguistic and rhetorical insights of the Renaissance.

Development in Protestant Biblical Interpretation

The Reformation's insistence upon the sole authority of the written Word led to an outpouring of material, exegetical and dogmatic, positive and polemical, throughout the Protestant era. Early on, the biblical canon was defined and its integrity defended, the divinity and properties of Scripture were asserted, and its role as principium cognoscendi theologiae was clearly affirmed (Muller). In addition to these works that focused upon the nature of the Scripture, material has continued to appear that addresses the question of how the church is to interpret and then use the Bible in its theological reflection (Kelsey).

Protestant exegesis has evolved significantly from its precritical beginnings (1550–1700s), through the modern, historical-critical era (1700s–1900s), to the present postmodern time (1960s–present). The style, purpose, and even much content of biblical commentaries written during the Protestant era vary greatly. This variation is often thought to arise from the application of new exegetical techniques, unknown or ignored by earlier interpreters. However, there is great continuity in the actual practice of biblical interpretation throughout the Protestant era. The differences reflect changes in exegetical methodology (the manner in which interpretative skills and techniques are employed to seek meaning), rather than the creation and implementation of new, previously unknown exegetical practices. There has been some development in techniques and substantial growth in the availability of resources. Yet for the most part, the tools employed in the exegetical task (linguistic and lexical analysis, attention to scope and occasion, the application of the analogies of faith and Scripture, etc.) have not dramatically changed over the centuries.

What have altered are the governing presuppositions that guide the interpretative process—assumptions concerning the nature of the biblical text itself. These assumptions ultimately control how the text is examined for meaning and what authority that meaning eventually carries. As the Protestant community's understanding of the nature of the Bible has evolved, the goal of exegesis and the manner in which the exegetical techniques are used have changed as well.

Initially, in the roughly two centuries of Protestant orthodoxy, theologians shared the precritical conviction that meaning was found in the words of the Bible because it was divinely inspired. The nature of the text itself, being God-breathed, gave rise to its authorial force; Scripture was authoritative for faith and life precisely because it originated with the holy and perfect God. Consequently, the exegetical strategies employed by Reformation era exegetes and their immediate successors presumed a unified biblical message. The literal sense of the text was the sense that was intended by the divine Author and mediated by the words. Interpretative techniques that assumed a unified biblical message and focused primarily on linguistic aspects were decisive during this period.

With the rise of the Enlightenment and the ushering in of the modern era, precritical assumptions concerning the nature of Scripture slowly gave way to empirical and rational critique. It gradually became unacceptable to see absolute authority as grounded in either the divinely ordained Christian tradition (as in medieval times) or in the divinely authored Bible (as in the early (p 634) Protestant era). The meaning of Scripture derived, not from the divine origin of the received words, but from the “reality” of the persons and historical events to which it attested. The quest for the Bible’s “literal sense” became a search for the divine revelation disclosed through time; meaning was found behind the text, in the historical situations depicted by the biblical authors.

In modern historical-critical methodology, prominence is given to exegetical techniques that underscore scientifically testable data, where the meaning of the biblical message is to be found. Understanding a text means comprehending the entire world of the human author, using historical, economic, psychological, philosophical, and sociological means of analysis—even prioritizing this extrabiblical material to “correct” the text. In nineteenth-century German scholasticism, this became a search for the historicity of the events described (accurately or not) in the Bible, and the comparative-religions approach. With literary criticism, the focus shifted toward learning about the literary nature of the text and an emphasis on original source material and forms (Ramm). In the extreme, higher criticism came to stand, not just for the scientific examination of the biblical documents, but for the assumption that the exegete has the right to pass judgment upon their truth claims (Kaiser and Silva 236).

Finally, the collapse of modernity cast doubt upon the possibility of objective truth and, consequently, upon the claim that a single, stable meaning may be found in a text; ultimate authority and meaning were removed from the written form and located in its reader (Vanhoozer). Scriptural authority is present (if at all) because it is imputed to the text by the reader and/or community of faith. Postmodern exegesis is ideological and consists of deconstructing the text—identifying the prejudices and preconceptions of its writing and prior interpretation—and construing it along lines set by the reader. While there remains some continuity with previous eras, traditional exegetical tools have much less value in some versions of postmodern biblical interpretation.

Protestant Exegetical Techniques

While differing assumptions concerning the nature of Scripture have greatly influenced the manner in which the biblical text is examined, Protestants throughout the era have employed a fairly consistent set of exegetical skills and tools.

The Spiritual State of the Interpreter. Post-Reformation biblical commentators uniformly affirmed that the true sense of the Bible could only be discovered by the Christian believer who sought the Holy Spirit's assistance throughout the exegetical process. The necessity of the Spirit's role is directly tied to the nature of the text itself—since the Spirit inspired its writing, the Spirit is the most competent to explain its intended meaning. A godly state is also necessary for supernatural enlightenment of the human mind. This belief is rooted in Protestant anthropology and is in no way to be understood as a limitation of Scripture; illumination is needed, not to supply some lack in the character of the text, but due to the spiritual blindness of fallen humanity. Early Protestants recognized that, apart from the Spirit's illumination, one can learn, understand, be proficient, and even teach the meaning of the text to others, yet all the while remain ignorant of its salvific matters and the assurance they bring (Perkins).

The necessity of the Spirit's involvement is explicitly denied in modern historical-critical methodology. Since the text is merely a human record, uncovering its historical referent demands only the scientific examination of the text and related extrabiblical material. Similarly, postmoderns reject a necessary interpretative role for the Holy Spirit when they deem the Spirit to be an external authority insisting on some form of objective textual meaning. On the other hand, as an essential component of many faith communities, the Spirit's impact on that community's referential structure helps determine the reader's interpretative situation.

The Analogy of Faith. It would be difficult to overestimate the importance of the analogy of faith in post-Reformation hermeneutics. Protestant authors consciously followed it, expressed it, and defended it in their theoretical writings. Exegetically, the analogy of faith dictates that no true interpretation of a passage can be contrary to the overall expression of biblical faith. This fundamental presupposition is based on three assumptions concerning Scripture and the doctrine of God: (1) God cannot lie and is not self-contradictory; (2) the divinity of Scripture, its divine origin, means that it also is self-consistent; and (3) core Christian doctrines flow faithfully from the Scripture. As the analogia fidei is formulated from the clear, historically and universally accepted sense of the Bible, its exegetical influence ultimately depends upon Scripture itself.

The analogy of faith provides a clear boundary between acceptable and nonacceptable interpretations. Every conclusion is to be tested by (p 635) this presupposition, and whatever exposition is inconsistent with this analogy must be false. Of course, this does not mean that every possible interpretation of a text that faithfully corresponds to the analogy of faith is exegetically accurate. And, contrary to modern criticism, the analogy of faith does not dictate the interpretation of any particular text; what it does is limit the interpretative options that the exegete may consider as appropriate explanations of a passage; other potential meanings are excluded a priori by the analogia fidei assumption.

For early Protestants, the analogy of faith functioned as the framework for all biblical interpretation and served to limit reason's competence in divining theological truth. For these two reasons the analogia fidei was largely rejected in the modern era. The analogy was criticized by proponents of a more scientific exegetical strategy as being a restrictive paradigm imposed upon divine revelation by the church, a paradigm that dictates meaning rather than discovers it. Similarly, subjecting the Bible to the traditional theological framework of the Christian faith was perceived as an oppressive limitation upon the freedom of one's use of reason (Farrar). Though there was little reliance upon the analogy of faith in the modern era, assumptions similar to the analogy have paradoxically made an exegetical comeback in some forms of postmodernism. While postmoderns no longer assume an objective meaning or framework such as the analogy of faith, the reader's ideology and the formative structures of the reader's community and experiences do form a coherent framework within which interpretations and meaning are sought (Fish).

The Analogy of Scripture. The analogy of faith, based as it is on the clear and plain passages of the Bible, is simply an extension of the analogy of Scripture. According to the analogia scripturae, the truest guide for determining the meaning of a particular text is to seek its explanation within the rest of the Bible—Scripture is its own interpreter. In practice, the exegete, acting in accordance with the analogy of Scripture, analyzes a particular text in relation to other passages. One text is compared and collated with another—the more obscure places with the plainer or less obscure.

As with the analogia fidei, justification for the analogia scripturae principle is grounded in the assumption of the unity and coherence of the Bible, which itself derives from the divine origin of the written word. Since the Bible teaches a unified truth, one passage cannot logically contradict another. And, since God authored the text via his Spirit-inspired writers, then God himself speaking through his word is its best expositor. The analogy-of-Scripture principle is also intended in part to counter humanity's natural inclination to assert its own authority, and instead to foster looking to God through Scripture for ultimate direction (Flacius).

It is this presupposition of the "harmony and consent" within the biblical text that modern opponents of the analogia scripturae principle criticize. Thus, Frederic Farrar objects to this "obscure rule" that Scripture interprets Scripture, "a rule which exegetically considered has no meaning," insisting that "such a view is true only of the simplest essentials of the faith. There is no mechanical unity in the Bible" (332–33n1). Apparent contradictions are not harmonized as a presupposition of the historical-critical method; rather, they are generally seen as evidence of multiple authorship and development of, or even discontinuity within, the human witness to divine revelation.

Original Languages. The most obvious impact of humanism on the development of a distinctive Protestant biblical interpretation was the attention paid to the original source material for Scripture. Biblical study in the original languages allows one to arrive at a more "precise" meaning of a text. Translations are helpful since they provide access to the word for many, yet much of the emphasis, idioms, and nuance of biblical meaning would be evident only through the original languages (Terry). A working knowledge of Greek and Hebrew serves as a guard against misunderstanding and helps expose inadequate interpretations. Exegesis based upon the original languages is the norm for biblical studies in both precritical and modern interpretative methodologies.

In addition to advances in the study of Greek and Hebrew, the Renaissance also brought about a vibrant interest in cognate languages (Syriac, Chaldean, Aramaic, and others) and ancient Near Eastern cultures. Recognizing their value in assessing lexical meaning, uncovering historical data, exploring grammatical and syntactical nuance, and the like, Protestant exegetes urged the use of ancient translations and versions, limited by the assumption that such editions are reliable only insofar as they faithfully express the divine originals. Theologians and exegetes also became increasingly aware of the potential benefits of an in-depth knowledge of the postbiblical Jewish tradition (Weemse). The influence of Hebraic studies in exposing and clarifying the historical occasion (p 636) of the biblical writing is evident throughout the Protestant era.

These interests obviously increased with the shift toward modern historical-critical methodology. Knowledge of the ancient Near East and growth of the science of archaeology are essential in determining the historical events (and hence, the meaning) of the Bible. The more knowledge gained about the time period referenced in the biblical text, the greater the possibility of discovering the meaning of the event described. In the late modern period, with increased attention on literary issues, cognate languages and studies on Judaism became dominant means in interpretation as meaning was connected with the original, historical literary sources and forms of the text in question.

Linguistic and Contextual Concerns. Under the influence of humanist studies, linguistic and grammatical issues became of paramount importance. Protestant exegetes have universally acknowledged the need for mastering the grammar of the Greek and Hebrew, for in this, Scripture is like other writings and must be understood through the use of language. A vast bulk of exegetical material testifies to the awareness of different literary forms and styles in Scripture, and the need to handle them appropriately (Osborne). The advances in philology initiated by the Renaissance led to the production of lexicons, which, coupled with an increasing availability of classical works, enable the expositor to explore the nuance of individual words.

The context in which the biblical words are found greatly shapes meaning. In precritical and modern methodologies, the exegete seeks the meaning of the words, which the grammar of the passage, understood in its proper context, determines. Of course, that context is understood differently—the entire Bible for the precritical exegete, and the immediate literary and historical context for the modern interpreter. For postmodern studies that seek meaning in the reader, the linguistic character and grammatical nuances of a text are much less significant than in earlier times.

The History of the Biblical Text. The Renaissance heritage is also apparent in Protestant scholars' textual study—their examination of biblical manuscripts, ancient versions, and modern translations. The seventeenth-century debate about the value and role of text criticism, and its companion discussion about the origin of the Hebrew vowel points, has veiled the precritical exegetes' awareness of the need for an examination of the history of the text. Prominent Protestant exegetes like William Perkins, John Weemse, Johannes Buxtorf, and Louis Cappel were early advocates of a limited textual criticism, which acknowledged the existence of diverse textual variants and codified the steps to be taken in discerning an accurate reading. The most appropriate rendering was identified through a collation of existing texts, an analysis in light of the analogy of faith, the grammatical construction of the immediate context, and the occasion and scope of the passage.

The emerging modern approach to textual criticism, however, was resisted by precritical Protestants because of the perceived assault on the divinity of Scripture. Following the Enlightenment, exegetes accepted textual alterations on the basis of ancient versions (on the grounds that the ancient translations frequently preserved the original, uncorrupted reading), and increasingly, simply on arguments asserted by the scholarly application of reason. In addition, because modern interpretative theory sought the original historical events attested to by the biblical witness, the search for the “original” source material became more influential than the canonical text itself (Childs). In contrast, textual criticism has a limited role in postmodern exegetical strategies, save where such insight is useful in deconstructing the present form of the text.

Scope and Occasion. In precritical exegesis, the scope and occasion of a passage play a crucial role. The scope refers to the focus, design, aim, or intent of a passage, the human author’s main goal in writing in the first place. Individual verses and phrases must be interpreted in light of the purposes for which they were written and according to the intent of the whole work. The scope is determined by the immediate literary context of a passage ((what precedes and follows the text under examination), the historical occasion for the writing, and the role of the book in the overall redemptive story. As such, the scope and the analogia fidei are related; the scope describes how a book or text fits into overall Christian belief. The occasion and circumstance of the text refer to the historical situation that prompted the writing, which frequently includes analysis of the author, date, subject matter, and original recipients. Discovering, and then staying faithful to, the scope and occasion of a passage is crucial.

This precritical view of scope and occasion should not be confused with the modern, critical practice of seeking the author’s historic situation and finding the meaning of a text there. The modern (p 637) method looks at the texts in parts, seeking to discover the historical referent that lay behind the words, whereas the earlier view of scope placed a single passage or book within the larger context of the Bible as a whole. The precritical assumption was that the whole biblical witness determined an author’s intent; biblical context (somehow connected to the Rule of Faith) determines the scope, not the historical occasion alone, as in modern hermeneutics. A biblical author's intention was, as guided by the Holy Spirit, to complement the pattern, design, context, and purpose of the whole divine record, and it was this intention that the interpreter sought to explicate.

Contemporary Application. In the early period of Protestant biblical interpretation, it was understood that the scriptural text was directed not only to its original hearers, but also ultimately for the continual benefit of the whole church; the “great end” of the Bible lies in its perpetual witness to contemporary believers (Perkins). Consequently, the task of biblical interpretation was not complete until the text was communicated to the present Christian community. Proper exegesis in precritical hermeneutics demanded a contemporary exposition of the text. The historical information of a pericope was not seen as the ultimate goal, nor did a full understanding of the historical circumstances comprehend the true extent of the divine purpose of the sacred writing. The recognition and assessment of a book's historic circumstances is a necessary but limited step in the complete exposition.

This fundamental understanding—interpreting the biblical documents as containing God's present witness to contemporary situations, while maintaining the importance of the original historical context—was expressly rejected by modern exegetes. Proponents of a modern scientific approach saw prioritizing a contemporary message in the Bible as a denial of the historicity of the texts and a rejection of the pursuit of its “literal sense.” True meaning was found only in uncovering the original author's intent and circumstances; any application to modern situations was at best an effort in analogy.

Postmodern hermeneutics has returned with a vengeance to the belief that interpretation and modern application are intimately joined. Now, however, it is no longer viewed as God using the ancient text to communicate an objective message to a contemporary audience, but rather as the audience itself dictating meaning. Application in the present dominates interpretation, even if the application arrived at has no objective connection to the original production of the text.

Conclusion

Throughout the Protestant era, presuppositions concerning the nature of Scripture, its authority, and its location of meaning have changed, leading to an alteration in the methodology employed in the interpretative enterprise. There is significant continuity in the exegetical tools; variation comes because those tools are used toward different ends. Interpretative techniques based upon the presumption of a unified, coherent biblical message were exegetically decisive in early Protestantism; modern exegetes, relying on scientific analytical tools, focused on the historicity of the text; and interpretations that recognize the primacy of the reader predominate in postmodern thought.

The continued viability of a distinctively Protestant exegesis is directly tied to the Protestant view of the sacred text itself. Without a coherent, well-developed understanding of the origin and authority of Scripture, the conclusions reached by exegetes will likely become more and more diverse and possess little of value beyond the individual interpreter. On the other hand, reclaiming precritical assumptions concerning the authority of the biblical text, combined with the increasing technical proficiency in applying exegetical tools, will allow Protestant biblical interpreters to explore the meaning of Scripture in decisive and useful ways, for the good of the entire church.

Bibliography

Childs, B. Biblical Theology in Crisis. Westminster, 1970; Farrar, F. History of Interpretation. Dutton, 1886. Reprint, Baker, 1961; Fish, S. Is There a Text in This Class? Harvard University Press, 1980; Flacius Illyricus, M. Clavis scripturae sacrae. Jena, 1674; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; Kaiser, W., and M. Silva. An Introduction to Biblical Hermeneutics. Zondervan, 1994; Kelsey, D. The Uses of Scripture in Recent Theology. Fortress, 1975; Maier, G. Biblical Hermeneutics, trans. R. Yarbrough. Crossway, 1994; McKim, D., ed. Historical Handbook of Major Biblical Interpreters. InterVarsity, 1998; Muller, R. Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics. Vol. 2, Holy Scripture. Baker, 1993; Osborne, G. The Hermeneutical Spiral. InterVarsity, 1991; Perkins, W. The Arte of Prophecyng, or, A Treatise Concerning the Sacred and Onely True Manner and Methode of Preaching. (p 638) In The Workes of that Famous and Worthy Minister ... William Perkins. Vol. 2. London, 1616–18; Ramm, B. Protestant Biblical Interpretation. 3d ed. Baker, 1970; Smalley, B. The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages. 3d ed. Blackwell, 1983; Terry, M. Biblical Hermeneutics. Zondervan, 1974; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998; Weemse, J. The Christian Synagogue. In The Workes of Mr. John Weemse. Vol. 1. Thomas Cotes for John Bellamie, 1636.

Henry M. Knapp

Proverbs, Book of

Proverbs is the foundational wisdom book of the Bible, teaching the ABCs of wisdom and introducing more complex issues that are further elaborated in Ecclesiastes, Job, and the wisdom teaching of the NT, such as the Sermon on the Mount. In an extraordinary way, Proverbs raises the theological question of the relation of ordinary life in the cosmos to God the Creator. Moreover, the complexity of interpreting Proverbs has implications for biblical hermeneutics as a whole.

History of Interpretation

A history of reading Proverbs remains to be written, partly because the use of short sayings in Jewish and Christian literature is widely scattered, and systematic exposition of the book in Christian circles was rare until Melanchthon's translation and three commentaries in the sixteenth century (Sick). With rare exceptions, the Eastern and Western exegetical traditions suffered from a lack of Hebrew learning. In contrast, Jewish midrashim regularly interpreted the Torah by juxtaposing texts from Proverbs (e.g., Prov. 8:22, 30 and Gen. 1:1 in Gen. Rab. 1.1). Medieval Jewish commentaries richly mined the Hebrew text (cf. Fox 12–13). The twelfth-century Christian Glossa ordinaria, with its compilation of observations going back to the fathers, served as a commentary on Proverbs well into the Reformation period (cf. Froehlich).

Proverbs was often exploited for its pithy wisdom by writers ranging from Augustine and Chaucer to Erasmus and Shakespeare (Henry IV, 1.2.98–100), while its use in theological debate was sporadic if spectacular. Of particular note was Lady Wisdom's utterance in Prov. 8:22 ("Yahweh begot [qanah] me as the first of his way") as used in the Arian controversy of the fourth century. Both parties interpreted Wisdom as Christ: the Arians took the Hebrew term qanah to mean "created" (so LXX), so that Christ could not properly be God; the Orthodox took it as "possessed" (so other Greek versions and Vulgate; see Clifford 96, 98–99; Pelikan 191–200). Such a direct reading of female Wisdom as Christ was allegorical. In similar fashion, premodern Jewish tradition interpreted Wisdom in Prov. 8 as Torah (cf. Sir. 24:23).

Generally, allegorical reading of Proverbs (apart from the short sayings in chs. 10–29) dominated its use by the church and synagogue until the Reformation, when the great shift to exclusively "literal" reading began to take place (Wolters, Song). With the Enlightenment's focus on science and universally true principles, interest especially in the short sayings of Proverbs waned, partly because they seemed internally contradictory (a fact already noted in the Talmud concerning 26:4–5; b. Šabb. 30b) and not universally borne out by experience (e.g., the righteous sometimes do hunger, in spite of 10:3; cf. Van Leeuwen, "Wealth").

The 1923 publication of the Egyptian Teaching of Amenemope (with parallels to Prov. 22:17–23:14) gave rise to a resurgence of scholarly interest in Proverbs, focused on the international character of wisdom (Whybray 6–18). Yet ancient Near Eastern wisdom, especially as it appears in Mesopotamian nonwisdom genres, remains a largely ignored gold mine. In spite of gains from ancient Near Eastern studies, the most profound discussion of the theological and human significance of Proverbs remains G. von Rad's Wisdom in Israel, which focuses on the text of Proverbs within the biblical canon (unfortunately, the ET is often unreliable).

The Message of the Text

Discerning the “message” of Proverbs is complex because the book is a collection of collections (cf. 10:1; 22:17–20; 24:23; 25:1; 30:1; 31:1) that grew over time (cf. LXX). The book also contains a variety of genres: “lectures” and “speeches” (chs. 1–9), short “sayings” and “admonitions” (chs. 10–29), brief poems (including a prayer, ch. 30), maternal instruction and a “Hymn to a Valiant Woman” (ch. 31). Yet the book forms an edited whole, with an introduction (1:1–7) and a hermeneutical prologue (chs. 1–9), which provide the worldview within which the smaller genres that follow are to be understood. In addition, Prov. 10–15 teaches the elementary patterns of acts and consequences, while chs. 16–29 develop the exceptions to the rules (Van Leeuwen, “Proverbs”). But the complexity of the book’s interpretation, especially of the short sayings whose contextual relations are not always clear, has important implications for reading Scripture as whole, since the Bible itself is a collection of books composed over time. Consequently, not every word of the Lord is valid for every time and place (contrast the fate of Jerusalem according to Isaiah and Jeremiah!). Wise interpretation is always needed.

(p 639) It is generally acknowledged that 1:7 and 9:10 (“the fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge/wisdom”) form the thematic inclusio of chs. 1–9 and the motto for the entire book (cf. 31:30, an inclusio with 1:7 for the whole book). For Israel, knowledge (of the world and human affairs) and wisdom are inextricably related to God (von Rad, Wisdom, 53–73). The point is fundamental, for Wisdom concerns the relation of creation to God, in every aspect of creation, and the implications of this relation for human piety and conduct in the ordinary affairs of life, whether high (8:15–16; 16:1–15; 31:1–9) or low (25:11; 27:8, 14). This is an essential point of the “Hymn to a Valiant Woman” (31:10–31), whose fear of the Lord (her “religion”) is demonstrated precisely in her wise conduct in the areas of life considered by many moderns to be merely “secular” (Wolters, “Nature”; Wolters, Song).

The purpose of the whole book is stated in 1:2–7. It is to help the young become wise and the mature wiser, to help them interpret wise sayings, using them to think and act in real-life circumstances, and for general discipline and instruction (musar means both, as the Greek translation paideia suggests) in “righteousness, justice, and equity” especially in socioeconomic and judicial relations (1:3 NRSV; cf. 11:1; 14:31, 34; 16:11–13; 25:18; 28:5, 8–9; 29:4, 7, 12, 14; and the general opposition of “righteous” and “wicked” in chs. 10–15).

In addition to the general concern for justice and righteousness in all areas of life, the art of understanding “a proverb and a figure, the words of the wise and their riddles” (1:6 NRSV) suggests that the book itself is aware of the hermeneutical task (cf. 8:9; 26:7). The wise use of sayings requires interpretation of people and situations as well as of texts. In the modern period, proverbial wisdom has fallen into disrepute (except among advertisers) partly because of its contradictory, local, and “unscientific” character (cf. Toulmin). Moreover, its apparent generalizations do not always appear true to specific cases. But this fact is an essential characteristic of sayings and makes them hermeneutically significant. Vernacular proverbs of all cultures present patterns of reality that are frequently observed, but which have exceptions. One son is advised to “Look before you leap,” another is told, “He who hesitates is lost.” “Birds of a feather flock together,” but also, “Opposites attract.” Consequently, “He who knows one, knows none.” Proverbs is a repository of many observations, some of which are true in the majority of cases, others only in a minority or even exceptionally. The wise person knows which saying or admonition is “fitting” or proper for the right person at the right time, in the right circumstances, and in the right way.

In a certain sense, it takes wisdom to use wisdom. A few examples from Proverbs will illustrate. Proverbs 17:17–18 say contradictory things about “friends.” The contradiction is obscured in most translations because the word for “friend” (re‘a) in v. 17 is translated as “neighbor” in v. 18. Read instead, “A friend loves at all times, and a brother is born for adversity. A man who lacks sense strikes a deal, becoming a guarantor for his friend” (AT). The contradiction concerns the ambiguity of those we designate as “friends,” and how we relate to them, wisely or unwisely. It is not wise to cosign a loan for every “friend.” But other “friends” will lay down their life for you, and perhaps you for them, as Jesus showed in word and deed. The ambiguity of friendship is captured in English by other proverbial sayings: “He’s a fair-weather friend” (who will not stick with you in adversity) and “A friend in need is a friend indeed.” Similarly, 17:27–28 explores the contradictory and ambiguous character of silence.

The most famous contradiction in Proverbs is 26:4–5, which contains contradictory admonitions about whether to speak or be silent when dealing with a fool. The Talmud already wrestled with the problem, arguing whether Proverbs, containing such a contradiction, belonged among the sacred books. The medieval Glossa ordinaria solved the problem correctly by explaining that the verses apply to different matters. Most wisdom utterances are situational: they need to be applied fittingly to the contradictory and complex circumstances of life. One may compare the contradictory sayings of Jesus (Matt. 5:16; 6:1; 7:1, 6; Ridderbos) and Paul (Gal. 6:2, 5; Hays). Like many utterances of Scripture, the full truth of a saying like 11:4 will only be resolved eschatologically. This means that the promises of Proverbs (e.g., righteousness leads to prosperity and well-being) are not always realized in this life. The wicked sometimes do prosper, while the godly suffer unjustly (cf. Van Leeuwen, “Wealth”).

The range of topics covered in Proverbs, especially in the short genres of chs. 10–30, reminds us that wisdom and folly involve all of life. Every human endeavor from farming (12:10–11; 28:19) and metallurgy (17:3) to politics (16:10–15; chs. 25, 28–29), economics (11:1; 16:11), and psychology (12:25; 14:10, 13) is fair game. What is (p 640) more, these sayings have a metaphorical applicability far beyond their literal concerns.

Proverbs 1–9 is designed to provide the underlying worldview and theology for understanding the diverse sayings of chs. 10–29.

Here we find “lectures” addressed by a parent to a “son” (“child” in NRSV is misleading), who is on the verge of adult responsibilities, including marriage. There are also speeches by cosmic Wisdom herself, personified as a woman (1:20–33; 8:1–9:6). Rather than focusing on the complexities of life (as esp. chs. 16–29 do), these chapters show life as lived in a structured world of boundaries. This world has a fundamental opposition of good and bad, represented primarily by the opposition of two ways, and the two (types of) women and houses at the end of the ways, one a doorway to Sheol, the other to life. The opposition of wisdom and folly in 1–9 finds its correlate in the opposition of righteous/ness and wicked/ness in 10–15. One can be morally righteous without being wise, but one cannot be wise without being righteous, for sin is a fundamental breach of the cosmic order. The contrary ways, women, and houses are both literal and symbolic. The young man can be seduced by the “strange” (zarah) or “other” (nokriah) woman (“loose woman,” RSV; “adventuress/adulteress,” RSV/NRSV). But the literal wife (5:15–19; cf. 31:10–31) also symbolizes Lady Wisdom (cf. 8:35; 18:22), while the other woman represents the attractive seductions of Lady Folly (9:13–18). Especially significant are the passages where the imagery of ways, women, and houses come together. This happens usually with reference to folly and death (2:16–19; 5:3–6, 8; 7:24–27; 9:1–18), but also with reference to life (5:15–19, where cistern and well imply house, and water implies life; 9:1–6).

These passages, however, teach more than the contrast of deadly versus life-enhancing sexuality. The imagery of woman, ways, and houses implicitly teaches about the nature of the cosmic “house” that God created with wisdom (3:19–20; 8:22–31; 9:1–6; Van Leeuwen, “Book”), in which we humans live. The “ways” convey the communal and traditional character of life: humans follow good and bad paths laid down by previous generations, whether in the language they speak or the ethics they live. Moreover, life is ultimately a journey toward, and determined by, the object of our desire: godly wisdom or deadly folly. The desirable “women” that entice the young man on the way to their respective houses are metaphors for all created goods that humans desire, whether properly and within created bounds, or wrongly and out-of-bounds—like my neighbor’s property or good name.

Proverbs 1–9 presents our world as one of boundaries and limits, shown most powerfully by the division of sea and dry land (8:29; cf. Job 38:8–10; Ps. 104:9; Jer. 5:22). The waves of the sea may play within that limit, but when they flood dry land, death and destruction result. This cosmic principle has its cultural aspect as well, symbolized in the sexual teaching of 1–9. The “waters” of sexuality are good within the limits of marriage, but destructive outside of it (5:15–20). The worldview of Prov. 1–9 insists on freedom within form, life within law, and love within limits. Practically, this means that wise persons are constantly aware of the boundaries and limits that separate wise from foolish behavior and excess from enough. They are also aware that behaviors need to be appropriate to the specifics of situations, and to the nature and kinds of persons and things we relate to (Van Leeuwen, “Liminality”). In this world, the acts, habits, and eventually character that are a human “way” have consequences that lead ultimately to life or death (von Rad, Wisdom, 124–37).

Proverbs and the Canon

Modern scholarship has exaggerated the differences between Proverbs and the rest of Scripture. For example, the lack of salvation history in Proverbs is a function of its genre and purpose, rather than of differences in worldview and theology. And the affinities of Proverbs with other ancient Near Eastern literatures are by no means unique to this book (cf. Roberts). Proverbs thus forces us to think about the reality of “common grace” and the general human condition that is common to Christians and non-Christians alike. Wisdom “speaks” to all humans in the cosmos (ch. 8), even those who do not have special revelation, so that all human cultures respond with varying degrees of relative wisdom, much of which finds counterparts in biblical Proverbs. The attempt to deny the significance of the Wisdom literature for Christian theology (Preuss 186–90) has more to do with a fear of “natural theology” and a focus on salvation history narrowly conceived than it does with a proper understanding of Proverbs and its role in the canon. This view is belied by the NT’s frequent quotation of Proverbs and its use of Lady Wisdom to articulate Christ’s role in creation (cf. John 1:1–18; Rom. 1:18–20; 2:14–15; Col. 1:15–20). Similarly, Christ’s insistence that he (p 641) is “the way” cannot be understood except against the background of Proverbs. An adequate treatment of the NT’s use of Proverbs remains to be written.

Theology and Significance for the Church

Proverbs provides the church with a spirituality of the ordinary, not unlike Paul’s insistence that Christians “glorify God in your body” (1 Cor. 6:20 NRSV). Here, life’s daily actions take place in the presence of the Creator. Moreover, the creation is humanity’s partner, the correlate of our humanity. Israel did not separate reason and revelation, religion and knowledge. “Experiences of the world were for [Israel] always experiences of God as well, and experiences of God were for her experiences of the world”—without confusing God and world. Again, “Humans are always entirely in the world, yet are always entirely involved with Yahweh” (von Rad, Wisdom, 62, 95; my translation of Weisheit, 87, 129). Scholarly attempts, on form-critical grounds, to separate the cosmology of Prov. 1–9 from the anthropological focus of chapters 10–29 (Doll; Westermann) underestimate the wisdom of the book’s final redaction, which establishes the nature of the world as stage and criterion for human actions before dealing further with human conduct. Likewise, Gen. 1–3 does this for the Bible as a whole, and Rev. 21–22 for the world to come. Proverbs guides the church in serving God wisely and righteously in all its doings and interactions with creatures (12:10) and fellow humans alike (14:31).

See also Wisdom; Wisdom Literature

Bibliography

Clifford, R. Proverbs. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 1999; Doll, P. Menschenschöpfung und Weltschöpfung in der alttestamentlichen Weisheit. SBS. Verlag Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1985; Fox, M. Proverbs 1–9. AB 18A. Doubleday, 2000; Froehlich, K. “Glossa ordinaria.” Pages

449–50 in Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, ed. J. Hayes. Abingdon, 1999; Hays, R. “The Letter to the Galatians.” NIB 11:183–348; Pelikan, J. The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600). Vol. 1 of The Christian Tradition. University of Chicago Press, 1971; Preuss, H. Einführung in die alttestamentliche Weisheitsliteratur. Kohlhammer, 1987; Rad, G. von. Weisheit in Israel. Neukirchener Verlag, 1970. ET, Wisdom in Israel. Abingdon, 1972; Ridderbos, H. “The Significance of the Sermon on the Mount.” Pages 26–43 in When the Time Had Fully Come. Eerdmans, 1957; Roberts, J. The Bible and the Ancient Near East. Eisenbrauns, 2002; Sick, H. Melanchthon als Ausleger des Alten Testament. Mohr/Siebeck, 1959; Toulmin, S. Cosmopolis. Macmillan, 1990; Van Leeuwen, R. “The Book of Proverbs.” NIB 5:17–264; idem. “Liminality and Worldview in Proverbs 1–9.” Semeia 50 (1990): 111–44; idem. “Proverbs.” Pages 256–67 in The Complete Literary Guide to the Bible, ed. L. Ryken and T. Longman III. Zondervan, 1993; idem. “Wealth and Poverty: System and Contradiction in Proverbs.” HS 33 (1992): 25–26; Westermann, C. Roots of Wisdom. Westminster John Knox, 1995; Whybray, R. The Book of Proverbs. Brill, 1995; Wolters, A. “Nature and Grace in the Interpretation of Proverbs 31:10–31.” CTJ 19 (1984): 153–66; idem. The Song of the Valiant Woman. Paternoster, 2001.

Raymond C. Van Leeuwen

Providence

The doctrine of providence affirms an ongoing divine concern for and activity in the world subsequent to its original creation. The way in which one interprets Scripture theologically will have much to do with one’s view of the God-world relation, and vice versa. Biblical depictions of divine action will have one sense when interpreted in the context of classical theism, for example, and quite another sense when interpreted according to some other model of the God-world relation.

Theologians have traditionally formulated the doctrine in terms of a threefold distinction: conservatio (God is active in preserving creation and, according to Barth, the canon!); concursus (God is coactive in all that comes to pass); gubernatio (God orders all that comes to pass according to his final purpose). Apart from the doctrine of providence, the idea of God would be largely irrelevant to what is happening in the world. Though there is no single biblical term for providence, the doctrine is intimately connected to the way in which one conceives God’s relation to Scripture. Hence, it is connected to theological interpretation of Scripture since one’s doctrine of Scripture is inextricably tied up with one’s doctrine of God (Kelsey). Moreover, one’s doctrine of providence has a decisive bearing on the way in which Christians approach prayer and action. To affirm providence is to confess with the apostle that “in everything God works for good with those who love him, who are called according to his purpose” (Rom. 8:28 RSV).

Providence in the History of Christian Thought

Christian theologians have traditionally affirmed both general providence (God’s universal care and control of the cosmos as a whole) and special providence (God’s particular interaction with specific events and individuals).

(p 642)Augustine. Against the Epicurean notion that the universe is the result of chance, Augustine contends that the cosmos is an ordered whole. And against the Stoic conception of the cosmos as ordered by an impersonal, immanent ratio, he affirms the truth that the world is guided and governed by a personal transcendent being. God’s providence culminates in the event of Jesus Christ and in the subsequent history of the church, which establishes the city of God. Providence is to be distinguished from fortune and fate and identified with the form of Jesus Christ. God is at work on an eschatological project: forming a people for himself by conforming them to Christ through the Spirit. Note that Augustine was able to read secular history as well (e.g., the decline and fall of Rome) as an aspect of God’s overarching providential plan.

Thomas Aquinas. Thomas views providence as divine prudence—God’s wise plan for the world—and employs Aristotelian categories to explain how God acts and interacts with creatures. God is the “First Cause” of all things, but secondary causes (e.g., creatures) bring about specific events in nature and history. The concept of “First Cause” is not intended to insinuate God in a system of causality in which he would be the biggest cog. On the contrary, “the purpose of the distinction between First Cause and second cause was to avoid any pantheistic notion which might identify the two, making God a part of the causal system of nature” (Berkouwer 154). In Thomas’s words: “The one action does not issue from two agents on the same level” (Ia, q. 105). Noteworthy too is his insistence that God always works with things/persons according to their created natures.

Calvin. Calvin insists that God’s sovereign will holds sway over all things—natural occurrences (Matt. 10:29) as well as human freedom, including sinful human actions (Acts 2:23)—not as some blind force but as the result of personal deliberation and specific direction. Calvin does not take the easy way out of distinguishing divine permission from divine willing; he insists that God governs and even cooperates (in the sense of communicating the energy and opportunity) in human sinning while simultaneously remaining holy. The difference lies in the motive and the intended outcome: “you meant evil against me; but God meant it for good” (Gen. 50:20 RSV).

Modern and Postmodern Views. The doctrine of providence has not fared as well in modernity and postmodernity, where teleological accounts of the cosmos have given way to explanations in terms of scientific causality and historical consciousness. Schleiermacher viewed the doctrine of providence as an expression of our feeling of absolute dependence on God, specifically, our feeling that in nature—not a stage for God’s further interventions but a display of his original wisdom—all things are “interdependent.” Divine providence is simply a poetic-religious way of talking about causal occurrences. For Hegel, the world process is itself an unfolding of a purely immanent divine purpose.

Though some twentieth-century theologians continued to speak of God’s “mighty acts,” most modern theologians came to the conclusion that the notion of an “act” of God could not be taken literally (Gilkey, “Cosmology”). Liberal Protestant theologians declared the end of the “royal metaphor,” the idea that God rules the cosmos like a monarch (Hodgson), not least because the notion of an all-determining sovereignty runs counter to modern historical consciousness (Gilkey, Reaping, 242). While process theologians (see below, on “Divine Action and Science”) continued to preserve some measure of divine providence, postmodern theologians claimed that the demise of the theistic notion that God rules “over” the world entailed the end of meaningful history as well (Taylor).

Barth. K. Barth resists extrabiblical notions of providence as raw causal power, eschewing general concepts and preferring rather to let the revelation of God in Jesus Christ define this and every aspect of God’s being. Accordingly, a doctrine of providence must take its bearings not from philosophies, whether Stoic or process, but only from the event of loving freedom enacted in the incarnation, cross, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. God is preserving, cooperating with, and governing the created order and humanity in and through Jesus Christ. As in Augustine, the meaning and order of creation is a function of its being the stage for the theater of Christ—the performance of covenant grace.

Providence: Biblical Sources

Though there is no single technical term for providence in Scripture, the concept of the care and control of God for individuals, for Israel and the nations, and for the church is everywhere assumed and displayed.

The substance of the doctrine of providence is most clearly seen in the way in which God guides and superintends the lives of certain individuals who form part of God’s chosen people: Abraham, Moses, Joseph, David, Esther, and so on. The Joseph (p 643)narrative (Gen. 37–45) is exemplary in this regard.

Biblical Wisdom literature offers rich variations on the theme of divine providence. Proverbs defines wisdom as living in accordance with the created order that God actively sustains. Ecclesiastes goes further, suggesting that neither meaning nor purpose is immanent to life's processes but instead depends on God's active giving (Eccles. 2:24, 26; 3:13; 5:19; 6:2; 8:15). The book of Job affirms God's providence even when no pattern or purpose can be discerned in innocent human suffering. Scripture enjoins trust in the care and control of God despite the realities of evil and death, thus suggesting that some providential outcomes are eschatological, mysteries reserved for the last days, when evil will be no more (Rom. 8:28).

God's care and control of nature is a consequence of his being the Creator of all things. As Author of the universe, almighty God possesses both the authority, wisdom, and power to work his will. Similarly, the sense that history is teleological—linear rather than cyclic—is a function of the prophets' conviction that their covenant God keeps his promises, and that the Abrahamic promise will eventually result in a blessing to all nations (Gen. 12:2–3). That God cares for and controls history is the underlying assumption that fuels Israel's hope for the messianic age of the new kingdom of God.

Christ, we might say, is the wisdom and providence of God made flesh—the culmination of God's ongoing work with creation, the incarnation of the Father's distinctive care and control (Eph. 1:9–13). God works out his final purpose for Israel and the whole world through the life and fate of Jesus. The Spirit, too, is the providence of God. In the book of Acts in particular, it is the Spirit who superintends the spread of the gospel and the growth of the church, thus ensuring God's care and control for his new creation and his special people.

Providence as Material Principle: The Ongoing God-World Relation

Perhaps the main interpretative question raised by the doctrine of providence concerns the nature of the God-world relation. Does God control the world-historical process, and if so, how? Can the world-historical process frustrate the divine purpose?

Divine Action and Science. A number of models have been proposed for conceiving God's relation to the world. Some have marginalized God's role, locating him in the remaining gaps of an Einsteinian universe, working at the subatomic level as a determiner of quantum indeterminacies (Pollard; Murphy 119). Others, preferring an interactionist rather than interventionist model, liken the God-world relation to the inputting of information into a system (Peacocke). In chaos theory an infinitesimal input of information can produce higher-level structural changes in the system (Polkinghorne). Still others wonder whether the communication of the Logos is best conceived along the lines of information processing (Barbour 167).

Process theologians adopt a panentheistic model in which the world is in God, who nevertheless is greater than the world. God is both distinct from and necessarily related to the world, participating creatively (though noncoercively) in its processes. What God provides to the world process is not being or energy but aims and objectives. Process theologians contend that God's creative love (not causality) accounts for novelty in the world process. God's persuasive influence is but one factor in what happens, however; the other factor is an entity's "freedom." It follows that God's will is loving, but not efficacious.

Divine Action and Human Freedom. Scripture treats the theme of the freedom of the will not as an abstract philosophical problem (determinism) but in terms of the conflict between sin and grace. The biblical narrative encourages the belief that human beings make their own choices such that their actions are really their own. At the same time, Scripture also portrays God as being in control of everything that happens, including the nefarious work of Satan and the more pedestrian evil acts of characters such as Pharaoh and Judas. One aspect of divine control is foreknowledge, the concept captured by the Latin root of the term providence (providentia = "seeing before"). In some cases, the future is not only foreseen but also decreed by God.

In the broad interpretative framework of the history of redemption, however, divine action is essentially liberative, not coercive. General and special providence alike work to maintain creation's integrity, not against it. It is a caricature of providence, therefore, to construe it in terms of divine puppetry. God rules creation precisely by renewing it, releasing it from corruption, and enabling creatures to be all that they were supposed to be. Again, it is the divine nature that defines the nature of the divine determining. God's sovereignty is not that of an impersonal principle but of an infinitely wise, loving, and (p 644) just person. In sum, God's being and action is the basic reality behind the existence of the universe and its workings. It is this fundamental insight, rather than the details of the mechanics, that is the special interest of Scripture.

Providence as Formal Principle: The Doctrine of Scripture

Typology and inspiration are examples of special providence and provide a basis for affirming the special authority of Scripture as opposed to other texts. They contribute to the unity of redemption's drama and the concomitant notion of Scripture's unity, under the signs of the Son and Spirit respectively.

Typology: Providence and Redemptive-Historical Interpretation. The canonical connection between various types and antitypes (e.g., persons, things, events) finds its ground and justification in a belief in divine providence, in the continuity of God's plan as it unfolds in the history of redemption. The doctrine of providence does not justify interpreters' seeing Christ in every detail; it pertains not to the details but to the whole pattern of redemptive history, and in particular, to Christ's recapitulating the history of Adam and of Israel.

The importance of typology stems from its concern to interpret the OT and NT as a unity, as twin aspects of a single plan of salvation worked by the one God of Israel and of Jesus Christ. The OT is fulfilled in Jesus Christ because he is the full flowering of divine providence and the summation of the history of redemption. The two-beat rhythm of salvation history (judgment and restoration) reaches a climax in Jesus' death (his "exodus") and resurrection (his return from "exile"; his restoration to David's throne).

Inspiration: Dual Agency. One's understanding of inspiration and illumination—the way in which the Spirit is at work in the origin and reception of Scripture—is also closely connected to one's understanding of divine providence. Inspiration speaks of the divine activity in ordering the creaturely reality of Scripture—its composition, redaction, and canonization—to play a role in the divine economy of communicative action (Webster 30–39). Here too, the practical implication of the doctrine is to raise the interpreter's expectation that broad patterns unifying the Scriptures may indeed be discerned. The canon is the "providence of God put into writing," and as such displays God's preserving, cooperating, and governing purpose, especially in the relation of its parts to its center, the gospel of Jesus Christ.

As we have seen above, divine providence is not a matter of overriding human freedom but of guiding and governing it in a way that accords with its nature. Accordingly, there is no reason to associate verbal inspiration with a mechanical dictation theory, which wrongly construes providence in an interventionist rather than interactionist mode. The latter is well articulated by M.-J. Lagrange, who argues that God as the ultimate author of Scripture nevertheless respected the personalities and intellects of the human authors, the secondary means/agents of God's communicative will.

Scripture and Providence in the Triune Economy

Typology, inspiration, and illumination are not merely examples of divine providence but may themselves be paradigmatic instances of the way in which God cares for and controls the creature and creation. Their contrast with fate and chance (whether quantum or chaos) could not be greater. For they remind us that providence is best explicated not in terms of the Father's will alone (this way fate, causality, and Stoicism lie) but in terms of Word and Spirit. Providence is a triune work discerned with the eye of faith, especially when it is wearing the spectacles of faith (e.g., the Scriptures as framework for interpreting the world).

What is needed is a notion of the triune provider: the Father makes provision for the world through the Word in the power of the Spirit. Framing the doctrine in terms of Word and Spirit means contrasting a merely mechanical or causal view of providence with a richer and more personal communicative notion. It also follows that providence and Scripture, as both means and product of God's care and control of his covenant people, find their proper place in the triune economy of redemption.

Though almighty God has causal power, there is ample biblical evidence that, in working with human creatures, God does not manipulate from the outside so much as transform from the inside, for example, by converting natures, sanctifying spirits, and renewing minds. Process theology sees God's providence as always and only persuasive (e.g., never purely causal or coercive). Yet, the doctrine of the effectual call, wherein the Spirit efficaciously ministers the Word, suggests that God can act communicatively in a way that (p 645) does not violate human nature but nonetheless brings about the intended result (cf. Isa. 55:11).

To the extent that Scripture itself is our paradigm for understanding the workings of providence, the emphasis will be not on the divine causality but on the divine communicative action. Speech is a form of action, but not the sort of action that can by itself deprive another of his freedom. God's infinite freedom meets finite human freedom not primarily in terms of causal action and reaction (the latter is too impersonal), but rather in a communicative interaction that respects the integrity of the creature in addressing itself specifically to its rational and spiritual nature.

The ministry of the word in the power of the Spirit is a helpful way of understanding God's relation to human beings, and perhaps the doctrine of providence in general as well. Finally, an emphasis on providence as triune communicative action clarifies the way in which Christian disciples can participate in God's drama of redemption through their own ministry of the same word that the Spirit uses to create and govern the church.

Bibliography

Barbour, I. When Science Meets Religion. HarperCollins, 2000; Berkouwer, G. C. The Providence of God. Eerdmans, 1952; Calvin, J. Institutes. Book I, chs. 16–18; Farley, B. The Providence of God. Baker, 1988; Gilkey, L. “Cosmology, Ontology, and the Travail of Biblical Language.” Pages 29–43 in God’s Activity in the World, ed. O. Thomas. Scholars Press, 1983; idem. Reaping the Whirlwind. Seabury, 1976; Gorringer, T. God’s Theatre. SCM, 1991; Hodgson, P. God in History. Abingdon, 1989; Kelsey, D. Proving Doctrine. Trinity, 1999; Murphy, N. Anglo-American Postmodernity. Westview, 1997; Peacocke, A. Theology for a Scientific Age. SCM, 1993; Polkinghorne, J. Belief in God in an Age of Science. Yale University Press, 1998; Pollard, W. Chance and Providence. Faber & Faber, 1958; Saunders, N. Divine Action and Modern Science. Cambridge University Press, 2002; Taylor, M. C. Erring. University of Chicago Press, 1984; Thomas Aquinas. Summa Theologiae; Webster, J. Holy Scripture. Cambridge University Press, 2003.

Kevin J. Vanhoozer

Psalms, Book of Contemporary resources on worship generally describe readings from the Psalms as responses to the OT lesson, suggesting at least implicitly that the book of Psalms is something other than Scripture itself. This perspective is sometimes reinforced by homileticians who resist preaching on the Psalms because, in their view, the Psalms originated as liturgical materials and should be used accordingly. To be sure, the book of Psalms may well have been “the hymnbook/prayerbook of the second temple” (or the first temple) but, in addition, “it became eventually something like an instruction manual for the theological study of the divine order of salvation” (Seybold 27). Or, as Martin Luther put it, the Psalms are “a little Bible” (Luther 254), a prime source for learning about God, God’s will for the world, and life lived under God’s claim.

History of Interpretation

In all probability, the early church continued to sing and pray the Psalms (see Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16), but the extensive use of the Psalms in the NT indicates that they were also read as a source of illumination and instruction. In particular, the early church read the Psalms messianically, an interpretative practice that had already begun in postexilic Judaism. This makes sense, since David’s name is associated with seventy-three psalms, and since the “anointed” (the Hebrew mashiakh or, more usually, messiah = the Greek christos) is featured in the book as early as Ps. 2:2 (see also Pss. 18; 20; 21; 45; 72; 89; 110; 132; 144, often categorized as royal). In any case, it is clear that the early church could not understand or proclaim its faith in Jesus Messiah/Christ without frequent use of the Psalms (see esp. Pss. 22; 32; 69).

Like all Scripture in the precritical era of interpretation, the Psalms were read on more than one level. But in every instance, the Psalms functioned as Scripture, a source for theological illumination and proclamation. Augustine's Enarrations [Expositions] on the Psalms are a prime example, as are both Luther's and Calvin's commentaries. In the preface to his commentary, for instance, Calvin maintains not only that the Psalms teach us how to pray and how to praise God, but also that they "principally teach and train us to bear the cross" (Calvin xxxix). In a sense, Calvin and others read the Psalms historically, although not in the modern sense—they found in the Psalms information about David's life and trials. But Calvin and others also read the Psalms prophetically—finding the life and trials of David, the "anointed," prefigured the experiences of Jesus, the "anointed." From this perspective, Jesus could be heard praying the Psalms.

Early critical interpretation of the Psalms has been called "the personal/historical method" (Bellinger 15). Attempts were made (and are still being made) to date individual psalms and to discern in them information about David and (p 646) other persons, groups, or events. In the early twentieth century Hermann Gunkel, the pioneer of form criticism, took a decisive step beyond this personal/historical approach. Although he still maintained that the Psalms as we have them are products of pious individuals, he claimed that they are based on cultic prototypes. These prototypes can be described and classified; Gunkel suggested the following major types, along with several others: hymns (songs of praise), community laments, individual songs of thanksgiving, and individual laments (30–39). Gunkel's work still exerts a profound influence on contemporary Psalms scholarship. Sigmund Mowinckel took the next logical step, suggesting that the Psalms as we have them are the actual materials produced by and for use in the worship of Israel and Judah (with the exception of "The Learned Psalmography," or wisdom psalms). Like Gunkel, Mowinckel's cult-functional approach still influences contemporary scholarship, although his proposal that many psalms find their setting-in-life in a New Year festival no longer commands a consensus. More recent scholars have modified and extended the form-critical and cult-functional approaches, capitalizing especially upon advances made in the fields of sociology and cross-cultural anthropology. Erhard Gerstenberger, for instance, locates the life-setting of many psalms in small-group or familial settings rather than in large-group gatherings that would have taken place in the temple or later synagogues.

While the form-critical and cult-functional approaches continue to flourish, the most recent interpretation of the Psalms has partaken of the general movement in biblical studies toward more literary approaches. Rhetorical criticism attempts to explore and identify what is unique rather than typical; scholarship on the shaping of the Psalter investigates its possible meaningfulness, including how the placement of particular psalms may affect their message and the whole.

While any method may yield theological results, proponents of the literary approaches in recent years have shown the most interest in theological conclusions. For instance, in his commentary, James L. Mays refuses to provide the standard list of psalms by form-critical category, so as not to distract readers from matters of content and theology. In subsequent sections of this article, I shall rely heavily on insights derived from study of the Psalter's shaping.

Hearing the Message of Psalms

It is a nearly unanimous consensus that Ps. 1 was either written or very intentionally chosen to be the introduction to the Psalter, and many interpreters also conclude that Pss. 1–2 constitute a paired introduction. This conclusion is extremely important because it means that Pss. 1–2 provide an interpretative agenda for the entire book. More specifically, Ps. 1 invites attention to God's torah, "instruction" (twice in 1:2; NIV/NRSV "law"), claiming that genuine happiness derives from constant attentiveness to God and God's "instruction" (1:1–2). The traditional translation of torah as "law" has meant that Ps. 1 has often been understood to commend some form of legalism, but torah in the broadest sense connotes God's will. Not surprisingly, Ps. 1 features two Hebrew roots that constitute a concise summary of God's will—shapat and tsadaq, which underlie the words "justice" and "righteous(ness)." The interpretation of Ps. 1:5 is disputed, but it is possible to translate v. 5a as follows: "Therefore the wicked will not stand up for justice." In any case, the appearance of these two key roots, in a psalm that highlights God's "instruction" or will, serves to anticipate Pss. 93 and 95–99, which have aptly been described as "the theological 'heart' " of the Psalter (Wilson 92; see below).

These so-called enthronement psalms all address God as "King" (95:3; 98:6; 99:4) or explicitly assert "The LORD reigns" (93:1; 96:10; 97:1; 99:1) or "The LORD is king" (NRSV). In short, God's sovereignty is world-encompassing; what God wills for God's world is clear—"justice" (see the root shapat in 96:13 [2x]; 97:2; 98:9, 9; 99:4 [2x]) and “righteousness” (see the root tsadaq in 96:13; 97:2, 6, 11, 12; 98:2 [NRSV: “vindication”], 9; 99:4). The two descriptions of God’s “coming” (96:13; 98:9) are particularly revealing. God’s presence in the world is marked by justice and righteousness: God “is coming to establish justice (on) earth ... with righteousness” (96:13 AT; 98:9; NRSV: “is coming to judge the earth ... with righteousness”). To be sure, God’s intention to set things right in the world will mean opposition to those who oppose God’s will. From this perspective, the root shapat means “judgment”; but the translation “justice” captures in a positive sense the harmony and order that God intends among “the nations” (96:10; 98:2; see also “families of the peoples” in 96:7) and among the entire creation (96:11–12; 98:7–8), which participate joyfully in the celebration of God’s presence and the working out of God’s will in the world. Given the focus (p 647) on torah in Ps. 1, along with its anticipation of the enthronement psalms and their emphasis on God’s will for justice and righteousness, it is not surprising that Ps. 2 features God’s “anointed” (v. 2, messiah). God’s “anointed” is the Judean king, entrusted with the earthly implementation of God’s justice and righteousness toward the realization of God’s will for world-encompassing shalom, “peace.” This is especially evident in Ps. 72:1–7, which features the repetition of “justice/judge” and “righteousness” along with the repetition of shalom, which NRSV translates as “prosperity” in v. 3 and “peace” in v. 7. As Ps. 72:1–7, 12–14 make clear, the king’s vocation of establishing justice and righteousness gives him a special responsibility for “the needy” (vv. 4, 12–13), “the poor” (vv. 2, 4, 12), and “the weak” (v. 13). The establishment of God’s justice and righteousness takes the form of judgment only over against those who position themselves in relation to God and others as “the oppressor” (v. 4; cf. v. 14).

In any case, the king’s administration is to have creation-encompassing effects (see 72:5–6, 8, 16). It is to benefit not only the king himself (vv. 8–11, 15–17), along with the weak and poor and needy (vv. 1–4, 12–14), but also ultimately everyone: “May all nations be blessed in him” (v. 17 NRSV). This world-encompassing extension of the king’s vocation recalls Gen. 12:1–3, the beginning of Israel’s story with Abraham and Sarah that is set in a context affirming God’s sovereignty over the whole universe and all its people (Gen. 1–11). Not coincidentally, the king, whose administration of justice and righteousness will effect blessing for “all nations,” is to be pronounced by them as “happy” (v. 17 NRSV). ). Thus, , not only does the featuring of the king at the not only does the featuring of the king at the beginning of Ps. 72 recall Ps. 2, but also the conclusion of Ps. 72 recalls Ps. 1, especially 1:1–2. As Ps. 1 has already suggested, it is precisely the implementation of God’s will—the concrete embodiment of justice, righteousness, and peace—that makes one “happy.” The word “happy” also serves to link Pss. 1 and 2 with an envelope structure (see 1:1; 2:12). The occurrence of “happy” in 2:12 is explicitly associated with taking “refuge” in God. The necessity of taking refuge in God highlights another feature common to Pss. 1, 2, and 72—God, God’s “anointed,” and God’s people are persistently opposed. These opponents are variously named—“the wicked” in 1:1, 5–6; “the nations,” “the peoples,” “the kings of the earth,” and “the rulers” in 2:1–2; “the oppressor” in 72:4. As it turns out, these “foes” (3:1) or “enemies” (3:7) are a regular feature in the Psalter, especially in Pss. 3–72, which consist mostly of prayers generally known as psalms of lament or complaint.

In fact, the situation at the beginning of Ps. 3, the first prayer in the Psalter, is typical. The psalmist is surrounded by enemies, who say, “There is no help for you in God” (3:2 NRSV). This assertion, of course, is a direct contradiction of Ps. 2:12. The psalmists are sometimes tempted to join the wicked in their arrogant self-assertion and self-sufficiency (see Ps. 73:1–15, which includes a quotation of the wicked in v. 11; see also the speech of the wicked in 10:4, 6, 11, 13), but they always steadfastly resist this temptation. The conclusion of Ps. 3, again typically, demonstrates the commitment of the assailed psalmists to stand with God. Using the same Hebrew word that the foes had used in v. 2, the psalmist prays, “Help me, O my God!” (v. 7; “Deliver me . . .,” NRSV). Then the psalmist affirms, “Help comes from the LORD” (v. 8; “Deliverance belongs to the LORD,” NRSV). This confidence that God stands with the persecuted psalmist, and this commitment to continue standing with God, is what the Psalms mean by taking refuge in God. Given the predominance of prayers in Books I–II (Pss. 1–72), it is not surprising that “refuge” is a major theme (Creach; Pss. 7:1; 11:1; 14:6; 16:1; 17:7; 18:2, 30; 31:1–2, 19; 34:8, 22; etc.).

The fact that the prayers are typically composed of complaint (3:1–2; 13:1–2), petition (3:7; 13:3–4), and expressions of trust and/or praise (3:8; 13:5–6) is extremely important. In each prayer the effect is to juxtapose the realities of hurt and hope, pain and praise, suffering and glory. Of course, it is possible to conclude that pain and praise represent separate moments or movements in a psalm. For instance, some scholars conclude that the praise/trust sections of the prayers were spoken or written later than the complaint sections, after the threat had been removed or after conditions had improved. Others conclude that the psalmist moves through the pain and comes out safely, as it were, at the praise end of the psalm, perhaps with the assistance of some sort of cultic intervention that the psalm leaves unmentioned. But it is more likely that the pain and praise are meant to be understood as simultaneous realities. In other words, the psalmists complain and celebrate at the same time; the theological import is profound. As Mays concludes (“Psalm 13,” 282), the prayers thus teach us about what it means to live as people of God: “The agony and the ecstasy belong together as the secret of our identity.” In any case, as Mays (p 648) again concludes, Ps. 3 and the other prayers in the Psalter demonstrate that prayer is “the ultimate act of faith in the face of the assault on the soul” (Psalms, 53). Prayer, in essence, represents the renunciation of self-sufficiency and self-help as one fully entrusts life and future to God (see Ps. 31:5, 14–15). To be sure, one could conclude that praise too is an act of faith. The Hebrew title of the Psalter is Tehillim, “Praises,” and there are a significant number of psalms in which praise stands alone without the expression of pain. Even so, it is clear that the songs of praise should be heard in the context of the prayers, so as to avoid the temptation for praise to become merely a celebration of the status quo. Of course, the content of the songs of praise should be sufficient to avoid this temptation. As the central verse of Ps. 100 makes clear, praise is a matter of knowing “that the LORD is God ... and not we ourselves” (v. 3, NRSV margin). Not coincidentally, Ps. 100 follows the aforementioned enthronement collection (Pss. 93, 95–99) that explicitly asserts God’s universal sovereignty and celebrates God’s will for world-encompassing justice and righteousness. In essence, then, praise is both the liturgy and the lifestyle of those who, denying self-sufficiency and self-assertion, entrust themselves to God and commit themselves to God’s ways in the world. Praise is “lyrical self-abandonment” (Brueggemann 67) expressed in constant gratitude to God (see “thanksgiving/thanks” in the title of Ps. 100 and twice in v. 4) and constant commitment to the justice, righteousness, and shalom that God wills for individual lives and the life of the whole creation. Quite appropriately, the final verse of the Psalter envisions a world-encompassing community of praise: “Let everything that breathes praise the LORD!” (150:6 NRSV).

As we have seen, however, the Psalter is not naively optimistic about the existence of such a universal community of praise and obedience. From its very beginning in Pss. 1–2, the Psalter is well aware of the persistent opposition to God, God’s will, and the community that God has gathered to represent God’s purposes in the world. This persistent opposition serves to explain another prominent feature of the Psalter evident already in Pss. 1–3—namely, the request for God to destroy the wicked, or the confidence expressed that God does or will destroy the wicked (see Pss. 1:6; 2:8–12; 3:7; 5:10; 7:12–16; 9:5–6; 11:6; 12:3–4; passim). Indeed, the theme of retribution or vengeance is so prominent in some psalms that they have traditionally been known as imprecatory psalms, or more simply, as psalms of vengeance (Zenger; see Pss. 12, 44, 58, 83, 109, 137, 139).

This aspect of the Psalms often proves to be particularly problematic for Christian readers, who are genuinely and rightly troubled by the violent imagery and the portrayal of God as fiercely wrathful. Indeed, the psalms of vengeance are often effectively ignored in Christian circles; or sometimes, they are edited for use in Christian worship by removing the “objectionable” portions (e.g., Ps. 137:8–9). But a careful reading of the Psalter reveals that God simply does not act unilaterally to wipe out God’s enemies. If God did so, the enemies of God and God’s will would not be such a pervasive feature of the Psalms (or of contemporary life!). What message, then, is to be derived from the expressions of vengeance in the Psalms?

In the first place, these expressions function to communicate the pervasiveness of the opposition to God and God’s will, as well as the hurtful consequences of injustice and unrighteousness. Pastorally and ethically speaking, victimization needs to be acknowledged, articulated, and opposed. The worst possible response to evil would be divine and human silence. The psalms of vengeance thus voice both the human and divine objection to the injustice and unrighteousness that creates victimization. The vengeance psalms are the outcries of victims, the theological thrust of which is to affirm that God stands with the victimized. Or, as the conclusion to Ps. 109 puts it: “For he [God] stands at the right hand of the needy” (v. 31; also 9:8; 12:5; 40:17; 140:12).

From this perspective, the psalms of vengeance, as well as the pleas for vengeance throughout the Psalter, can be seen as essentially prayers for justice, righteousness, and shalom. In Christian terms, they amount to praying the prayer that Jesus taught his disciples, “Your will be done on earth as it is in heaven” (Matt. 6:10), a petition immediately following the request that also echoes the Psalter’s affirmation of God’s universal sovereignty, “Your kingdom come” (6:10). That the psalmists regularly pray for God to set things right in the world is entirely in keeping with the Psalter’s initial focus on the centrality of God and God’s will for the experience of human happiness (see above on Ps. 1:1–2). It is theologically revealing that at a key point the Psalter includes the end of Book III, a psalm that articulates God’s wrath against God’s “anointed” (Ps. 89, esp. vv. 38–51, noting the repetition of “anointed” in vv. 38, 51). In short, Ps. 89 indicates that God shows no partiality, except to stand with the victimized (see Pss. (p 649)72, 82). When God’s own “anointed” one fails to be a servant of God’s justice and righteousness, as he was supposed to be (Ps. 72), then the “anointed” one is as much a target of God’s wrath as anyone else is when they oppose God.

Historically and canonically speaking, the appearance of Ps. 89 at the end of Book III probably reflects the rupture represented by the Babylonian exile. In any case, it is almost certainly not coincidental that Book IV (Pss. 90–106) begins with the only psalm attributed to Moses, who presided over the people of God before they had a land, a temple, or a monarch. Not coincidentally too, Book IV goes on to feature the theological perspective first articulated explicitly by Moses and the people at the conclusion of the Song of the Sea: “The LORD will reign for ever and ever” (Exod. 15:18). This is precisely the message of Pss. 93, 95–99, the enthronement psalms. Because they follow and seem to respond to the crisis articulated in the pivotal Ps. 89, they constitute “the theological ‘heart’ ” of the Psalter (see above).

The remainder of the Psalter seems also to have been shaped to address the theological crisis of exile and its aftermath. For instance, Book V gives a prominent, pivotal place to the massive Ps. 119, as if to represent that matters pertaining to both exodus (Pss. 113–118, the Egyptian Hallel used at Passover) and Zion (Pss. 120–134, the Psalms of Ascents that focus attention on Jerusalem) find their focal point in relation to torah (the key word in Ps. 119, occurring twenty-five times). This is but one more way that the Psalter continues to indicate the pervasive significance of torah (see Ps. 1:1–2)—that is, God’s will, which directs human life toward the happiness (Ps. 1:1) or peace God desires for humankind and the creation.

Given the prominence of the “anointed” one as early as Ps. 2, plus at key points elsewhere in the Psalter (Ps. 72, at the end of Book II, and Ps. 89, at the end of Book III), it is also quite revealing that Ps. 149 recalls Ps. 2. After the exile, the monarchy never reappeared, thus raising the question of which earthly agency was to be responsible for the concrete enactment of God’s will in the world. Psalm 149 offers a response to this question, for here it is God’s “faithful” (vv. 5, 9), who, recognizing God as their “King” (v. 2), are entrusted with the vocation formerly assigned to the monarchy and articulated as such in Ps. 2 (cf. Ps. 149:7–9 and Ps. 2:8–9). To be sure, the imagery in both cases is shockingly violent; but as Ps. 149:9 makes clear, the issue is essentially mishpat, “justice” (“judgment,” NRSV). Particularly when heard in relationship to Ps. 89, with its reminder that God’s chosen agents are also subject to God’s wrath (see above), Ps. 149 is a crucial affirmation that God entrusts God's "faithful" with the enactment and embodiment of God's will in the world—in a word, with God's "justice." Thus, Ps. 149 maintains the Psalter's ubiquitous focus on God's torah—God's will for justice, righteousness, and shalom—that was introduced in Pss. 1–2 and celebrated at the Psalter's theological heart (Pss. 93, 95–99). Along the way, of course, the prayers protest the absence of God's justice and righteousness, articulate the hurtful effects of disobedience, and plead that God's will be done. The songs of praise invite all peoples and nations to submit themselves to the sovereign God, who wills their well-being and, indeed, nothing short of peace on a cosmic scale.

The Psalms and the Canon

Given Luther's description of the Psalms as "a little Bible," it is not surprising that the messages of the Psalms resonate throughout both the OT and NT. Indeed, Psalms is the OT book most quoted in the NT.

The affirmation at the heart of the Psalter—that God reigns, and wills justice, righteousness, and peace on a universe-encompassing scale—might itself be considered a sort of summary of the Bible's fundamental message. As suggested above, Israel understood the exodus from Egypt to be decisive evidence of God's eternal reign. But, as Terence Fretheim points out, the exodus event aims at the fulfillment of God's creational purposes. To affirm God as Creator of the universe (Gen. 1–11) already affirms God's sovereign claim, including all peoples and nations. When the story appears to narrow from all humankind to Abraham and Sarah and their descendants, the intent of God is still to effect a blessing for "all the families of the earth" (Gen. 12:3 NRSV). This creation-wide perspective is especially evident in the songs of praise, including not only in the enthronement psalms (Pss. 93, 95–99) that explicitly assert God's sovereignty, but also in other songs of praise that regularly invite "all the earth" (66:1; 100:1), "all you nations" and "all you peoples" (117:1), and ultimately "everything that breathes" (150:6) to praise God. The apostle Paul apparently understood the practical theological implications of this expansive view of God's claim on the world. As part of his warrant for including the Gentiles (nations) in the church, Paul cites Ps. 117:1 \(Rom. 15:11\).

Of course, the Psalter's representation of God's will for justice, righteousness, and peace, along (p 650) with its featuring of the "anointed" and his responsibility for enacting God's will (see esp. Pss. 2, 72, 89), puts the Psalms in conversation with major portions of the OT, including key texts like 1 Sam. 8 (Israel's request for a king and God's granting of this request) and 2 Sam. 7 (God's promise to David and his descendants; cf. Ps. 89). When the kings failed to do what God had entrusted to them, it fell upon prophets to call king and nation back to God's will. The prophets often articulated this call in terms of justice and righteousness (e.g., Isa. 1:21, 27; 5:7; 9:7; 32:1, 16–17; Jer. 22:13–17; Amos 5:24). Not surprisingly, a psalm like Ps. 82 sounds as if a prophet could have written it. As for postexilic prophecy, there are major connections between the enthronement psalms (Pss. 93, 95–99) and the material in Isa. 40–55, including the affirmation that God reigns (Isa. 52:7; Pss. 96:10; 97:1; 99:1) and the invitation to sing “a new song” (Isa. 42:10; Pss. 96:1; 98:1). Then too, the book of Isaiah as a whole portrays God in the same way as the Psalms—a God whose sovereign claim upon the whole creation means that God wills nothing short of universal peace on earth (Isa. 2:2–4; 42:1–9; 49:1–6).

This same complex of theological affirmations—God's sovereignty, God's will, and the agency of God's “anointed” in enacting it—plays a major role in the NT as well, especially in the Synoptic Gospels and their presentation of Jesus Christ (the Greek Christos is the translation of Hebrew Messiah, “anointed”). The titles for Jesus at the beginning of the Gospel of Mark, “Christ” and “Son of God,” are the same ones found in Ps. 2 (“anointed” in v. 2 and “son” in v. 7). When Jesus is baptized (Mark 1:11), the heavenly voice recalls Ps. 2:7, “You are my son.” Jesus' fundamental proclamation of “the kingdom of God” (Mark 1:15//Matt. 4:17) echoes the message that lies at the Psalter's theological heart; according to the Gospel of Matthew, Jesus' teaching begins with the same word that begins the Psalter: “Happy” or “Blessed” (Matt. 5:3). In fact, the Beatitudes of Jesus in Matt. 5:3–11 pronounce “happy” or “blessed” precisely the same kind of people who regularly appear as the pray-ers of the Psalms—the poor, the meek (cf. Matt. 5:5 with Ps. 37:11), the persecuted. In a real sense, the Beatitudes reinforce the affirmation of the Psalms that God stands with the dispossessed, the suffering, and the victimized, an affirmation further illustrated by the whole thrust of Jesus' ministry among the poor, weak, and needy. This whole direction, according to Matt. 5:17, serves to fulfill the Torah and the Prophets; it is the fullest expression of the will of God, the greater “righteousness” that “exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees” (Matt. 5:20 NRSV). As suggested above, the Psalter also begins with a focus on torah (Ps. 1:2), commending constant orientation to God's will, which is subsequently described as righteousness and justice (see esp. Pss. 96–99).

Not surprisingly, therefore, the Gospel writers cannot tell the story of Jesus, especially Jesus' passion, without using the Psalms as a major source. Jesus' entry into Jerusalem recalls Ps. 118, thus suggesting that Jesus' upcoming death and resurrection continue God's salvific activity in the exodus and other OT deliverances (Mark 11:9 cites parts of Ps. 118:25–26). And the passion narratives in all four Gospels echo Pss. 22 and 69. In Matthew and Mark, Jesus' words from the cross are drawn from Ps. 22:1 (Matt. 27:46//Mark 15:34). Luke's account differs, but it is another psalm that supplies Jesus' words from the cross (Luke 23:46; see Ps. 31:5).

Not coincidentally, Pss. 22, 31, and 69 are the three longest and most intense prayers in the Psalter. The canonical effect is to portray Jesus' passion as the fullest expression of one whose suffering communicates not divine punishment, but rather oneness with God. Indeed, as is the case with the psalmist in Ps. 69, it is clear that Jesus suffers precisely because he is faithful to God and God's purposes. The profound theological significance of this reality will be considered further below.

While Pss. 22, 31, and 69 are more clearly related to the story of Jesus' suffering and death, their hopeful and praise-filled conclusions may also have helped the Gospel writers appreciate the meaning of Jesus' ministry and even his resurrection. Psalm 22, for instance, portrays the psalmist gathering around himself a community of grateful praise, beginning with the afflicted (v. 24) and the poor (v. 26), but eventually extending to "all the families of the nations" (v. 27) and including the dead (v. 29) and "people yet unborn" (v. 31). While Ps. 22 should not be understood as a prediction of Jesus' ministry among the outcast or the reality of his resurrection, it certainly anticipates Jesus' expansive ministry to all people, as well as his proclamation and embodiment of a communion with God that even death itself cannot destroy (Davis).

Theology in the Psalms

The preceding sections have already begun to discuss theological dimensions, but it is appropriate in this concluding section to consider more (p 651) explicitly the Psalter's portrayal of God and some of its implications. Of paramount importance is the Psalter's affirmation of God's universal sovereignty and its simultaneous recognition that God has enemies (Ps. 2). This situation, of course, virtually forces the reader to explore the nature of God's sovereignty or power. If God's power is simply force, then God should have no enemies, at least not for long. But God always does, as do the people committed to God's justice, righteousness, and peace in the world. Thus, God's power must be understood not as sheer force, but rather as something like sheer love.

As contemporary Reformed theologians are pointing out, the Bible portrays a loving God who wills authentic relationship with humankind. Because love cannot be coerced, human beings must genuinely be able to choose to obey or disobey God (Hall 71–72; Placher). The Psalter’s portrayal of God conforms to this understanding. Because God loves the world and wills to be in relationship with it (note that justice, righteousness, and peace are all relational terms), God simply will not coerce obedience. This explains why opposition to God is possible, and indeed, why the Psalms are full of such opposition (even from God’s own people; see Pss. 32, 51, 130).

All this does not mean that God is powerless, however. The good news that God stands with the poor and needy (see Pss. 22:24; 31:21–22; 34:18; 109:31; 140:12) serves to energize and empower them to resist oppression, and to pursue for themselves and others the life that God wills. Such resistance and pursuit are powerful, and it is God’s power. But this is the power of incarnational love, not coercion or enforcement. God loves the world into obedience.

This portrayal of God certainly has profound implications for understanding the human situation, including suffering. Most dramatically, perhaps, suffering cannot simply be understood as divine punishment. Although the psalmists themselves sometimes seem to view their suffering as punishment (Pss. 6:1; 38:1), they actually undercut this view by claiming God’s presence with themselves and with other sufferers. Like the book of Job, the Psalter finally obliterates any comprehensive doctrine of retribution. The psalmists suffer, not because God wills or causes it; rather, they suffer because they themselves or their enemies have chosen not to enact and embody the justice, righteousness, and peace that God wills. Injustice and unrighteousness always have bad consequences; they hurt people, and they anger God. If the negative consequences of injustice and unrighteousness are considered divine “punishment,” then one must at least stipulate that such “punishment” does not necessarily correspond to what one might deserve, and that its occurrence is actually an indication that God’s will is not being accomplished.

To put it slightly differently, only when the doctrine of retribution has been obliterated is there any logical space for grace, which by definition means that the guilty do not get what they deserve. Thus, the Psalms finally participate with the rest of the canon in portraying God as essentially “merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness” (Exod. 34:6 NRSV). Given this portrayal of God, it is entirely understandable not only that certain psalms echo Exod. 34:6 \(86:15; 103:8; and less directly, 25:10; 36:5; 40:10–11; 57:3; 61:7; 85:10; 89:14; 115:1; 138:2), but also that God’s khesed, “steadfast love,” is regularly celebrated in the songs of praise (as in 33:5; 100:5; 103:11, 17; 106:1; 107:1, 8, 15, 21, 31, 43; 117:2; 118:1–4, 29; 136:1–26), appealed to in the prayers for help (6:4; 17:7; 25:7; 26:3; 31:16; 51:1), and cited as ground for trust in psalmic professions of faith (5:7; 13:5; 23:6 NRSV, “mercy”; 33:18; 63:3).

From the Christian perspective, the portrayal of a gracious God, whose love makes God vulnerable to the disobedience of humankind, reaches its culmination in the incarnation, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. As suggested above, the Gospel writers could not tell the story of Jesus without the Psalms. The Psalter’s regular juxtaposition of pain and praise, hurt and hope, suffering and glory anticipates the death and resurrection of Jesus, who then and now calls people to experience the glory of life by taking up a cross to follow him (see Mark 8:34–35). As Calvin discerned, the Psalms do finally “teach and train us to bear the cross.”

See also Messiah/Messianism; Music, the Bible and; Worship

Bibliography

Bellinger, W., Jr. Psalms. Hendrickson, 1990; Brown, W. Seeing the Psalms. Westminster John Knox, 2002; Brueggemann, W. “Bounded by Praise and Obedience: The Psalms as Canon.” JSOT 50 (1991): 63–92; Calvin, J. Commentary on the Book of Psalms. Vol. 1. Calvin Translation Society, 1845; Creach, J. Yahweh as Refuge and the Editing of the Hebrew Psalter. JSOTSup 217. Sheffield Academic, 1996; Davis, E. “Exploding the Limits: Form and Function in Psalm 22.” JSOT 53 (1992): 93–105; Fretheim, T. Exodus. Interpretation. John Knox, 1991; Gerstenberger, E. Psalms, Part 1, with an Introduction to Cultic Poetry. FOTL 14. Eerdmans, 1988; idem. Psalms, Part 2, and Lamentations. (p 652)FOTL 15. Eerdmans, 2001; Gunkel, H. The Psalms. Fortress, 1967; Hall, D. J. God and Human Suffering. Augsburg, 1986; Limburg, J. Psalms. Westminster Bible Companion. Westminster John Knox, 2000; Luther, M. Luther’s Works. Vol. 35. Fortress, 1960; Mays, J. L. The Lord Reigns. Westminster John Knox, 1994; idem. “Psalm 13.” Int 34 (1980): 279–83; idem. Psalms. Interpretation. John Knox, 1994; McCann, J. C., Jr. “The Book of Psalms: Introduction, Commentary, and Reflections.” NIB 4:641–1280; idem. A Theological Introduction to the Book of Psalms. Abingdon, 1993; Mowinckel, S. The Psalms in Israel’s Worship. Vols. 1–2. Abingdon, 1962; Placher, W. Narratives of a Vulnerable God. Westminster John Knox, 1994; Seybold, K. Introducing the Psalms. T&T Clark, 1990; Tate, M. Psalms 51–100. WBC. Word, 1990; Wilson, G. H. “The Use of the Royal Psalms at the ‘Seams’ of the Hebrew Psalter.” JSOT 35 (1986): 85–94; Zenger, E. A God of Vengeance? Westminster John Knox, 1996.

J. Clinton McCann Jr.

Pseudepigrapha

The word “Pseudepigrapha” refers to a vast body of literary works, a good number of which originate from the Second Temple period by Jewish writers/communities. “Pseudepigrapha” is a wholly artificial category; the texts contained therein are of diverse origins, spanning several centuries, and written for diverse purposes. Broadly speaking, what holds this voluminous corpus together is the fact that they all purport to be written by some figure of biblical stature (or that they are given through divine revelation), claim some level of authority, and are explicitly connected to some biblical idea, theme, event, and so on. Moreover, in modern Western thinking the term implies an element of deception on the part of the community of origin. This is almost certainly not the case. Rather, many of these texts should be understood as the products of believing communities, who, faced perhaps with some crisis or challenge, appeal to the authoritative past (their Scriptures) to substantiate their point. When defined in this way, one sees some similarities with a number of biblical books, including Ecclesiastes and Chronicles.

Moreover, how the genre of pseudepigrapha was understood in the ancient world can profitably come into play for certain NT books, such as 2 Peter. Given the popularity of pseudepigraphal writing in the ancient world, it should not be assumed that NT books cannot participate in the same literary convention. On the other hand, it must also be kept in mind that the appeal of a Second Temple writer to a long past figure like Solomon or Moses is qualitatively different from a contemporary—or near contemporary—appealing to the authority of Peter or Paul. In any event, purely ideological or doctrinal commitments cannot preclude the possibility that pseudepigraphal works exist in the Christian canon.

According to Charlesworth’s The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, sixty-three texts are included in this collection (Charlesworth counts 3 and 4 Maccabees and Prayer of Manasseh, which are often included among the Apocrypha). Some of the earliest texts are Jubilees (mid-second century BCE); Ahiqar (seventh to sixth century BCE); Letter of Aristeas (perhaps as early as 250 BCE); 1 Enoch (as early as second century BCE). Others are dated well into the Christian era: Greek Apocalypse of Ezra (second to ninth century CE); and Vision of Ezra (fourth to seventh century CE). Some of these later writings, although of Jewish origin, show clear indications of Christian influence at some later stage (e.g., Sibylline Oracles, second century BCE through seventh century CE).

In recent decades, the study of the Pseudepigrapha has taken on a new fervor. This can be attributed to two interrelated factors. First, the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls has brought subsequent generations of scholars into conversation with Second Temple Judaism. Many of the Pseudepigrapha are invaluable sources to filling out the picture of Jewish life and thought during this period (e.g., Jubilees, Pseudo-Philo's Book of Biblical Antiquities, 1 Enoch). What has become quite clear from these texts is that Judaism in the centuries following the exile was a diverse phenomenon: there are Judaisms but no "Second Temple Judaism." This is an important lesson for both Christians and Jews to keep in mind. The line from biblical Israelite religion does not run straight to either of its two heirs, Judaism or Christianity. Rather, the Second Temple evidence in general shows a number of varied and competing trajectories, all of which claim biblical precedent. The fact that these texts are noncanonical for both faiths is irrelevant to the point being made here. The Pseudepigrapha open windows through which to view the world out of which both Judaism and Christianity arose.

Study of these texts reveals a world where Jews demonstrated commitment to their past in the midst of changing cultures and conflict. The Israelites were a people whose fortunes were often at the whim of competing kingdoms; their struggles with self-identity vis-à-vis the influence of Persia, Greece, and later Rome are well known. Such struggles were felt on varied levels, such as religious ideology among competing Jewish groups, and political status in a world of the surrounding (p 653) superpowers. Any of these conflicts was answered differently by different groups, evidence of which is preserved for us in some of the Pseudepigrapha. For example, Jubilees offers a polemic in favor of a 364-day calendar, rather than the lunar month. For this community, it was evidently quite important to maintain a regular rhythm to the festal year, assuring that the festivals would occur on the same day each year. Although this is only one example, it illustrates a principle that can be extended to many of the Pseudepigrapha: they are categorized by varied attempts to answer the question "What does it mean to be a Jew here, today?"

Second, what many of the Pseudepigrapha share with other texts of antiquity is a close interaction with biblical texts and themes. In other words, in addition to their historical importance, these texts have also a profound hermeneutical importance. The ways in which both rabbinic Judaism and the NT authors interact with their Scripture did not arise in a vacuum. Rather, both demonstrate hermeneutical methods and conclusions that are demonstrable in many, many Second Temple texts, including the Pseudepigrapha. In fact, similar hermeneutical trajectories were already set within the Hebrew Scriptures (the Chronicler's interpretation of Israel's history; Daniel's interpretation of Jeremiah's seventy years as seventy “sevens” of years). How the rabbis and the apostles handled their Scripture must be understood within the context of earlier interpretative activity. With respect to the NT, for example, the Book of Biblical Antiquities (along with other Second Temple texts) contains the tradition of a well following the Israelites through the desert (Exod. 17; Num. 20–21). Such a tradition certainly informs our understanding of Paul’s “the spiritual rock that accompanied them” (1 Cor. 10:4). Jubilees reflects the notion of angels being actively involved in the revelation to Moses on Sinai, an event without explicit OT support but that also seems to find its way into Acts 7:53; Gal. 3:19; and Heb. 2:2. The Pseudepigrapha, therefore, contribute to the church’s own understanding of its Bible, insofar as they outline general interpretative trajectories adopted by NT authors.

In addition, a number of theological themes discussed in the Pseudepigrapha are of interest to anyone wishing to discuss the religious beliefs of postexilic Judaism. In view of the many struggles and conflicts mentioned above, it is not surprising to see theodicy as a recurring concern. The flip side of this coin is the question of Israel’s sin and what God is doing, or will do, to his people as a result. Current debates regarding the so-called New Perspective on Paul, which revolve around this question of sin and justification, are really derivatives of a larger issue, the New Perspective on Second Temple Judaism, specifically as it affects our understanding of the nature of sin and judgment. Related matters include the role of the Messiah in bringing to a closure the period of Israel’s expectation of God’s justice, and the use of the apocalyptic genre to portray those anticipated events.

See also Jewish Context of the NT; Pauline Epistles

Bibliography

Charles, R. H. The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English. 2 vols. Clarendon, 1913; Charlesworth, J. H., ed. The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. 2 vols. Doubleday, 1983–85; idem. The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha and the New Testament. SNTSMS 54. Cambridge University Press, 1987; idem. The Pseudepigrapha and Modern Research with a Supplement. SBLSCS 75. Scholars Press, 1981; Charlesworth, J. H., and C. A. Evans. The Pseudepigrapha and Early Biblical Interpretation. JSOT, 1993; Cohen, S. From the Maccabees to the Mishnah. Westminster, 1987; Nickelsburg, G. W. E. Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah. Fortress, 1981; Russell, D. S. Between the Testaments. SCM, 1960; Stone, M. E. Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period. CRINT 2.2. Van Gorcum/Fortress, 1984; idem. Scripture, Sects, and Visions. Fortress, 1980.

Peter Enns

Pseudonymity      See Pseudepigrapha

Psychological Interpretation

Psychological interpretation of the Bible is less a methodology or set of principles than a way of reading the Bible that is critically attentive to psychological factors. Psychology is the systematic study of human behavior, such as cognition, personality, and motivation. Every human encounter with the biblical text—in its origins and composition, its transmission and translation, its interpretation and expression—involves a psychological dimension.

Psychology and Theology

Psychology's roots lie in theology; its name derives from the Greek word for "soul." The Bible has much to say about the qualities, tendencies, and transformation of the psyche, and early theologians wrote extensively on the subject. Luther's student Philipp Melancthon brought the term "psychology" into general use. With the rise of modern scientific psychology in the late nineteenth (p 654) century came serious conflict between contemporary psychology and theology. Both study the nature of human beings and propose sometimes-competing norms for behavior.

Four general models of the relationship of psychology and theology have emerged. Some assert that the two disciplines simply are entirely different and cannot be meaningfully related to each other. Others are hostile; advocates on either side insist that one must choose and consider the other illegitimate and dangerous. A third approach involves setting one in subservience to the other—reading the Bible only as an illustration of a psychological theory, or summoning psychological theories to support biblical concepts. Finally, some seek to keep the two fields in a dialogue that can potentially inform and deepen both disciplines. One's attitude about the relationship between psychology and theology will determine to a great extent whether one finds psychological interpretation of the Bible valid or useful.

Psychology and the Bible

Wayne Rollins has outlined several broad areas for psychological interpretation (Soul). These include exploring biblical psychology, exegesis, hermeneutics, description of biblical phenomena, the effects of the Bible on readers and communities, and developing contemporary models.

Biblical Psychology. Though the Bible certainly deals with psychological phenomena, it does not offer a systematic exploration or explanation of them. From Tertullian and Augustine to present-day pastoral counselors, people have made an effort to systematize and correlate biblical psychology with contemporary understanding. In 1855, Franz Delitzsch suggested that biblical psychology was similar to secular theories, but was fundamentally revelational, rather than empirical. Others have argued that biblical psychology is entirely dissimilar, and that reference to secular sources is neither useful nor desirable.

Exegesis. The Bible is not “psychological” in the modern sense. There is scant material for psychobiography of biblical figures. Early psychological interpretation received a deservedly bad reputation for efforts to psychoanalyze the prophets, Paul, or Jesus, often concluding that they were pathological or that their faith could be explained in purely psychological terms.

Psychology has little to offer as a historical method; it can, however, illuminate how biblical characters are depicted and how they interact. Biblical imagery and symbolism may reveal unconscious connections and significance; psychological dynamics of narratives provide insight into human motivation and behavior. Psychological perspectives can illuminate the context of the biblical text—the social psychology of self-identity, family and group relations, the nature of human motivation and emotions. In exegesis, it is important to recognize significant differences between the world of the Bible and our own, and not to apply modern psychological models indiscriminately.

Hermeneutics. Scholars have long recognized the significance of presuppositions in interpretation. A psychologically informed hermeneutics will alert us to presuppositions that arise from the personality and are not conscious to the interpreter. Recognition of these unconscious dynamics has led to a “hermeneutics of suspicion,” which questions the objectivity of interpretation. In its most radical form, this suspicion is one of the underpinnings of postmodernism—the assertion that everything is only subjective, and there is no objective knowledge.

One need not accept such absolutism to acknowledge that people do bring themselves to the text in ways that affect understanding. Personality factors and psychological tendencies will lead readers to focus on different aspects of the Bible and to understand its authority differently. Without recognition of psychological factors in perception, cognitive processes, and social conformity, biblical interpretation can become little more than a projection of the reader’s own biases.

Human transformation rests ultimately with God’s initiative, yet it is still possible to discern how psychological dynamics in reading, cognition, memory, and interrelationships of individual and community may enable or hinder that transformation. Even those interpretative approaches that claim skepticism of psychological insight base themselves on assumptions about human reading, learning, and behavior that are fundamentally psychological.

Psychological Description of Biblical Phenomena.

Psychological interpretation may also help contemporary readers better to understand biblical experiences such as dreams, healing, speaking in tongues, or conversion. It can provide another avenue for grasping the meaning of biblical symbols and images, understanding that they are not merely reflective of ancient cultures, but are powerfully linked to our own inner psyches.

The Bible's Effect on Readers and Communities. Pastors and counselors have long been aware (p 655) of the Bible's healing power in guiding people through life's challenges. They may also notice how problems in an individual's self-image or relationships may be revealed in their interpretation of Bible passages. Recognition of psychological dimensions of interpretation can help in understanding why some misreadings of Scripture are destructive and yet so persistent and attractive.

Models for Psychological Criticism. For psychological interpretation to be fruitful, there must be a good fit between psychological insight and the biblical text. Psychological methods should be used in tandem with other exegetical and hermeneutical principles. A psychological interpretation that does not take into account the insights of linguistic, structural, genre, and historical study runs the risk of psychologizing the text.

It is impossible for interpreters in our psychological era to avoid psychological interpretation. From the sacred experience to the sacred text, from inspiration to writing to collecting and canon, the Bible engages, shapes, and interacts with human beings and their psyches. Psychological interpretation helps us to be conscious of those interactions and to journey further in understanding ourselves and our communities in the light of the Bible.

See also Human Being, Doctrine of

Bibliography

Delitzsch, F. J. A System of Biblical Psychology, trans. A. E. Wallis. 2d ed. Baker, 1966; Everding, H. E., Jr., M. Wilcox, L. Huffaker, and C. Snelling Jr. Viewpoints: Perspectives of Faith and Christian Nurture. Trinity, 1998; Francis, L. Personality Type and Scripture. Mowbray, 1997; Johnson, C. The Psychology of Biblical Interpretation. Zondervan, 1983; Kille, D. A. Psychological Biblical Criticism, ed. G. Tucker. GBS (OT). Fortress, 2001; Rollins, W. Jung and the Bible. John Knox, 1983; idem. Soul and Psyche. Augsburg Fortress, 1999; Theissen, G. Psychological Aspects of Pauline Theology. Fortress, 1987; Wink, W. The Bible in Human Transformation. Fortress, 1973.

D. Andrew Kille

Public Theology See Political Theology

(p 656) Q

Q See Gospels; Redaction Criticism; Source Criticism

Qumran See Dead Sea Scrolls; Jewish Context of the NT

Quotation See Intertextuality; Relationship between the Testaments

(p 657) R

Racism

A general definition of this social and personal vice can be framed as a belief that human groups can be validly grouped in races on the basis of their biological and cultural traits, which in turn determine their behavior and social value (Banks 74–75). The underlying assumption of this categorical organization of human groups by race is that some human groups are superior to others. This type of categorical distribution of human groups cannot (and should not) be understood without considering the connection between the social value assigned to each group and the social power of the group determining the categorical value—in this case, race. In other words, the roots of racism are found in the abuse of social power and location of the dominant group as, consciously and unconsciously, defining the value of certain human groups, categorized by race, by comparing them to the dominant group as the norm. In this way all other groups are judged based on the dominant group’s norm; thus, groups that do not fit the norm imposed by the dominant group are deemed inferior.

Interpretations of history and current practices show that some groups have had, and still have, unequal power in the decision-making process. For this reason, every decision made by the dominant group enhances, legitimizes, and reinforces their own norm, and in this case their categorical distribution of human groups by race disenfranchises, minimizes, and devaluates groups that do not fit the norm and/or are not part of the dominant group. Furthermore, the assumptions of the dominant group are not only false and morally pernicious; in a devastating way its evil manifestations also affect the identity and self-understanding of those who are considered inferior. Individuals in their process of self-construction and self-identity develop a picture of themselves primarily informed by their interaction with their social environment. Occasionally groups of individuals will be identified, either voluntarily or involuntarily, in subcategories, often named “ethnic” groups. A biblical example of this process is the naming and value distribution to the Israelites, Canaanites, Jews, and so on. In any case, persons’ social context and its interpretation heavily influence their identity and self-understanding. But when the interpretation of their social context is almost always defined and determined by the dominant group, the individual in this condition “accepts” this imposed reality and develops a self-consciousness, self-understanding, and identity of inferiority.

Sadly, Christians whose social location and power have placed them in a privileged position are not exempted from this self-centered and socially located practice. A clear example of the consequences of racism has been the use of the Scriptures in the affirmation of slavery as a valid Christian practice. This example shows that biblical interpreters and scholars, as well as Christian communities, are not exempt from falling into the trap of abusing their power and social location to determine the meaning and moral value of the Scriptures. They thus provide interpretations that affirm the practices of the dominant group and their self-centered motivations. Interpretations like these are often justified by allusions and exegetical work that intend to capture the “original” meaning of the text, by placing it in its social context and providing a careful examination of that context. But this approach does not consider the reader’s and interpreter’s social context and location, consequently imposing their own biases, and in this case their own categorical distribution of human groups by race. Perhaps a good way to avoid this self-centered practice is to spend the same amount of time and energy in exploring the social context and location of the person(s) in charge of the interpretative task, and in fostering reciprocal and meaningful dialogue with readers and interpreters from the global Christian community. In doing so, perhaps, one will become self-aware of one’s own limitations and bias.

Furthermore, contrary to this self-centered categorical distribution of human groups by race, the biblical creation narrative provides a solid ethical (p 658) foundation for the affirmation of all humans. In the creation narrative it is clear that humans were created equal (Gen. 1:26–27). As bearers of God’s image, humans have the capacity and responsibility to reflect divine moral attributes in every action and decision, but particularly in relating to each other. In the same way that the three persons of the Trinity relate to each other in a harmonious and egalitarian relationship we, as humans, are called to reflect this type of relationship as we relate to each other. Additionally, God’s creation is a concrete expression and reflection of God’s goodness and holiness, in which humans and God live in perfect harmony and humans reflect God’s character by living in an egalitarian and harmonious relationship with each other. Humans, male and female, are blessed and given equal responsibilities to care for the earth, preserving and replicating God’s harmonious relationship with it (Gen. 1:28–30). Humans are created and called to enter into a just and equal partnership with God and with each other, in this way providing a living testimony and a reflection of God’s character. Thus, harmony and equality are signs present in God’s creation and implicit in the image of God imprinted in all humans. When these signs and values are pursued and embraced by humans and expressed in their relationships with one another, they are striving to reflect God’s character and image as depicted in the creation narrative. But when these signs and values are ignored and/or neglected, global harmony and equality are replaced with systematic and structural oppression of certain groups by the dominant group. For this reason, racism is an anticreation tendency and a reality that has become inherent to our human condition and a manifestation of our sinful nature—selfishness and self-centeredness.

Nevertheless, the biblical narrative offers a solution to this inherent human tendency, by providing sufficient teaching that affirms the value of all races and the importance of equality among them, condemning self-centered interpretations and racial discrimination. Not only in the creation narrative do we find these affirmations; they are also present throughout Scripture and particularly in the morally shaping and formative stories. In the story of Abram's call, God promises him and his descendants that all nations will be blessed through them, not few nations or certain ethnic groups but all nations. Isaiah, later quoted by Gospel writers, reminds Israel that the temple, the house of prayer, should be called a house of prayer for all nations, a statement that is later affirmed by Jesus in the cleansing of the temple. Perhaps the conclusion of this trajectory and affirmation of all races and ethnic groups as equal and valuable is found in Gal. 3:28 and Eph. 2:11–19. There Paul clearly follows the trajectory that begins in Genesis and culminates in Revelation with the eschatological gathering of all nations before the Lord. In the light of this holistic narrative projection, some of the passages that seem to provide a justification for slavery and racism (ironically Paul's writings) should be read. Therefore, by exploring our own social-context location, by dialoguing with the global Christian community, and by following the trajectory of the all-nations-centered biblical narrative, we will be able to avoid the pitfalls of racist biblical interpretation. We will also be challenged to promote racial equality as we reflect God's character and holiness—by living in harmony and treating with respect and dignity all humans, regardless of their ethnic and cultural background.

See also Culture and Hermeneutics; Ideological Criticism; Slavery; Violence

Bibliography

Bailey, R., and T. Pippin. "Race, Class, and the Politics of Bible Translation." Semeia 76, no. 1 (2001): 1–40; Banks, J. Teaching Strategies for Ethnic Studies. Allyn & Bacon, 1991; Emerson, M., and C. Smith. Divided by Faith. Oxford University Press, 2000; Feagin, J., and H. Vera. White Racism. Routledge, 1995; Feagin, J., and C. Booher Feagin. Racial and Ethnic Relations. Prentice Hall, 1996; Felder, C. H., ed. Stony the Road We Trod. Fortress, 1988; Horsman, R. Race and Manifest Destiny. Harvard University Press, 1981; Mosala, I. "Race, Class, and Gender as Hermeneutical Factors in the African Independent Churches' Appropriation of the Bible." Semeia 73, no. 1 (2001): 43–57; Pagan, S. "Poor and Poverty: Social Distance and Bible Translation." Semeia 76, no. 1 (2001): 69–79.

Hugo Magallanes

Radical Orthodoxy

See Political Theology; Violence

Reader-Response Criticism

One over-simplified but useful narrative concerns the shift in twentieth-century literary theory away from a concern with authorial intention (textual meaning lying “behind the text”). Instead, readers focus on the text itself (textual meaning as encoded “within the text,” ready for them to “discover” it), and finally on readers’ present interest (readers actualize textual meaning “in front of the text”). Reader-response theory is not a single theory but a family of diverse hermeneutical (p 659) theories that share a focus on the active role of the reader (or communities of readers) in interpretation. The various theorists disagree on a range of issues: how much control texts exercise in interpretation, the role of communities within which readers live, the role of the interpretative histories of texts, whether the readers they speak of are experts or ordinary readers, and so on. We shall consider the theories in two broad categories, radical theories and moderate theories; but it must be understood that this categorization is only one way to cut the cake.

Radical Reader-Response Theories

Radical theories are those that emphasize the reader in the creation of meaning over against any constraints the text may place upon interpretation. The best-known radical is Stanley Fish. In his later work Fish came to believe that the idea that meaning resides “in” the text or that texts exercise control over interpretation was an illusion. Instead, reading communities determine what counts as an interpretation, and their response to texts is not a response to some preexistent meaning in those texts but rather is the meaning of those texts. Prior to such a response there is no meaning and there is no text. This does not mean that individual readers can do anything they like with texts because critical readers are trained and authorized to read texts by their communities. It does mean that there are as many meanings of a text as there are community responses to that text. Norman Holland’s psychological reader-response theory sees individual readers (not communities) as projecting themselves into texts and using literary works to symbolize and replicate themselves. The ego-unification achieved through reading texts is the meaning of the text.

Moderate Reader-Response Theories

Moderate theories desire to mediate between the claim that a text means only one thing and the claim that a text can mean anything. In the words of Paul Ricoeur: “It is true that there is always more than one way of construing a text, it is not true that all interpretations are equal.... The text is a limited field of possible constructions.... It is possible to argue for or against an interpretation, to confront interpretations, to arbitrate between them, and to seek for an agreement, even if this agreement remains beyond our reach” (175). For Ricoeur, texts have a “surplus of meaning” that goes beyond any authorial intentions. He says, “A text means all that it can mean” (176), but it cannot mean anything a reader wants. So interpretation takes place “in front of the text,” but the text places limits on legitimate interpretation.

Wolfgang Iser argues that potential meanings do reside within texts and readers “actualize” or “concretize” dimensions of meaning by reading the text. So actual meanings are neither in the text nor in the reader but are realized in the act of reading. Different readers may actualize different meanings, but all such meanings are guided by the structures of the text. Iser famously speaks of how all texts necessarily include “gaps”—missing information that readers need to fill in to “complete” the text. Different readerly gap-fillings actualize different meanings.

The “Reception Theory” of Hans Robert Jauss adds a crucial historical dimension to the mix. He opposes “timeless” reader-response theories that do not appreciate the role of traditions of interpretation inherited by readers. Christian readers of Romans cannot come to the text without its effect on them being shaped by its effect on past Christian interpretations of that text. Past reception history sets boundaries on interpretation but also creates fertile ground for innovative interpretations.

Reader-Response Theories and Theological Interpretation

Christian Bible-readers (who have thought about the issues) have been divided on quite what attitude to take toward reader-response theories. Some have hailed them as a breakthrough that creates space for Christian theological interpretations of biblical books to regain legitimacy alongside other interpretations (e.g., feminist, neocolonialist, Marxist); others have seen them as a major threat to biblical authority.

Radical theories do seem to be deeply problematic, for they are not merely philosophically implausible but, as Thiselton argues, they betray the function that hermeneutics arose to perform—they “collapse the ‘two horizons’ of hermeneutics [i.e., those of the text and the reader] into one single horizon. This violates the concern for listening, openness, and dialogue which stands at the heart of hermeneutical theory” (546). For Holland, the text is, at best, a trigger that sets self-discovery in motion. For Fish, there is no prophetic challenge from “beyond” the community. The inability of such theories to allow the text to confront us as “other” throws theological interpretation into crisis, for how can we conceive of God addressing and transforming the community through the text? “The Reformation then becomes a dispute over alternative community life-styles. (p 660)It has nothing to do with retrieving authentic meanings of biblical texts” (Thiselton 549)!

However, moderate reader-response theories do provide liberating insight. They allow “more Light and Truth to ... break forth out of [God’s] Holy Word” without yielding to extreme relativism. It is helpful to think of texts on a scale of varying degrees of openness, with some quite open to diverse legitimate interpretations while others are relatively closed to such diversity, allowing readers less room for maneuver. No texts would be completely open or completely closed.

The attempt to discern an author’s communicative intent is both perfectly intelligible and important (Vanhoozer). Another important task is to seek to discern the range of reader responses that one might expect of the text’s implied readers. Implied readers are not the original readers but a theoretical construct: “an imaginary set of people who may be assumed to read a given text in the way they are expected to read it, bringing to their reading experience the knowledge, competence, beliefs and values that appear to be presupposed for the text in question” (Powell 64). Such a project allows us to try to discern the range of responses we can say a text “expects” from its ideal readers, and it allows us to discern the grain of the text.

It may be thought that theological interpretation can stop with authorial intention or expected readings—that simply expositing the intentionality of a biblical text brings out the theological meaning. Things are not so simple. Real flesh-and-blood readers of texts, even the original audiences, are not the implied readers, and the greater the historical and/or social gap between a real reader and the implied reader, the less we are able to stand in those shoes. Obviously, the implied readers of biblical books are believers in Yahweh, as are Christian readers today, so we can stand closer to the implied reader than, say, an atheist can. However, the implied reader of Leviticus, for example, is Jewish and is expected to see the text as commanding him or her to keep the laws found there, but I cannot read the text in that way.

Odd as it may seem, the very creation of the canon as a controlling context for the Christian interpretation of any biblical book means that Christian theological interpretation cannot simply be collapsed into the expected reading of a text (i.e., with the implied reader). The human redactor of Leviticus did not have the completed canon of the Christian Bible in mind when he shaped his text, but a theological interpretation of Leviticus would not be Christian if it did not read from a different “location” than that of the implied reader. The canon-as-context opens up various potential directions for the interpretation of individual books and closes down others.

In the ways that NT authors read their Jewish Scriptures, one can see that the “meaning” of those Scriptures could not be limited to the intentions of the original (human) authors or to the expected readings of implied readers. If the meaning of a text was exhausted by authorial intention, then NT writers were doing something other than telling us what their Scriptures meant.

It is not simply that the canon creates a new literary and theological context for reading biblical texts. It is also that the historical, theological, and social location of actual readers is often very different from that of the implied readers. David Steinmetz famously defended the superiority of precritical exegesis on such grounds:

How was a French parish priest in 1150 to understand Psalm 137, which bemoans captivity in Babylon, makes rude remarks about Edomites, expresses an ineradicable longing for a glimpse of Jerusalem, and pronounces a blessing on anyone who avenges the destruction of Jerusalem by dashing Babylonian children against a rock? The priest lives in Concale, not Babylon, has no personal quarrel with Edomites, cherishes no ambition to visit Jerusalem (though he might fancy a holiday in Paris), and is expressly forbidden by Jesus to avenge himself on his enemies. Unless Psalm 137 has more than one possible meaning, it cannot be used as a prayer by the Church and must be rejected as a lament belonging exclusively to the piety of ancient Israel. (28)

The community of the church had reading strategies enabling such “alien” texts to be reappropriated as Christian Scripture in very different contexts. Although Ps. 137, taken in isolation, can be interpreted in many ways, legitimate Christian interpretations are constrained by the canonical context (including the biblical metanarrative), the Rule of Faith (Wall), the gospel (Powell), the interpretation’s discipleship-forming power (Fowl), the text’s Christian reception history (Lundin, Walhout, and Thiselton), and authorial intention (Vanhoozer). But even within such constraints considerable diversity of appropriation is legitimated by diverse sociohistorical contexts. People receive texts differently for many reasons, influenced by their race, gender, age, social class, income, education, personality, career, self-image, and so on. Such factors can open our eyes to some of the textual “surplus of meaning” not perceived by others. Mark Allan (p 661) Powell notes how in the West most people think that the point of the parable of the Good Samaritan is, “We should be like the Samaritan and help the needy.” In Tanzania people are more likely to think the point is, “People who are in need cannot afford the luxury of prejudice.” The Tanzanians empathize more readily than Westerners with the needy person in the story. In fact, the Tanzanian interpretation is closer to Luke’s intended meaning, but the Western reading is also surely a legitimate understanding even if Luke may not have foreseen it. Plurality in biblical interpretation is partly due to misunderstandings resulting from our lack of relevant knowledge or of appropriate interpretative skills, partly due to human sin but also partly to do with the very structures of God’s good creation. Interpretative pluralism is partly funded by the fact that God has created us as creatures who are finite and understand reality perspectively. There would have been some pluralism in interpretation before the fall, as there will be in the new heavens and earth (Smith). Resurrected and sinless humans will still be finite and bring their cultural distinctiveness with them to the never-ending task of interpretation.

One crucial question concerns the connection required between authorial intention and later Christian appropriations of texts in different sociohistorical contexts. I maintain that we ought ordinarily to seek a recognizable organic relationship between the intentionality of a text and the variety of theological interpretations that emerge from reader engagements with it (pace Fowl). Thus, NT readings of the OT are usually connected at deep levels with the structures and trajectories of the original texts. Those deep structures are reread in the light of developments in salvation history that reconfigure the original texts and draw out some of the “surplus of meaning,” but they do not do this, for the most part anyway, by sidestepping the structure or context of the original texts. Theological interpretations that run roughshod over authorial intention saw off the branch they are sitting on.

Christians can concede that different acts of reading are undertaken with different goals in mind and that theological interpretation is not the only goal a Bible-reader, even a Christian Bible-reader, may have. For instance, I may read Scripture in order to attempt a historical reconstruction of the events narrated, or to explore the gender relations encoded in the text. Such differing goals will yield different results and must be judged by criteria relevant to their goal. For the Christian, theological interpretation is the supreme goal for Bible-reading, and it too has its own rules of assessment (canonical context, the Rule of Faith, the gospel, etc.). Faith will also guide Christians in discerning which other goals may be legitimate subservient Christian projects (e.g., discerning a text's redaction history) and which produce inappropriate ways of handling Holy Scripture (e.g., materialist interpretations).

See also Authorial Discourse Interpretation; Community, Interpretative; Meaning; Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation; Reading; Text/Textuality

Bibliography

Aichele, G., et al., The Bible and Culture Collective. "Reader Response Criticism." Pages 20–69 in The Postmodern Bible, ed. E. Castelli et al. Yale University Press, 1995; Fish, S. Is There a Text in This Class? Harvard University Press, 1980; Fowl, S. "The Role of Authorial Intention in the Theological Interpretation of Scripture." Pages 71–87 in Between Two Horizons, ed. J. Green and M. Turner. Eerdmans, 2000; Fowl, S., and L. G. Jones. Reading in Communion. SPCK, 1991; Holland, N. Poems in Persons. W. W. Norton, 1973; Iser, W. The Act of Reading. Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978; Jauss, H. R. Toward an Aesthetic of Reception, trans. T. Bahti. University of Minnesota Press, 1982; Lundin, R., C. Walhout, and A. Thiselton. The Promise of Hermeneutics. Eerdmans, 1999; McKnight, E. "Reader Response Criticism." Pages 230–52 in To Each Its Own Meaning, ed. S. McKenzie and S. Hayes. Rev. ed. Westminster John Knox, 1999; idem. "Reader Response Criticism." Pages 370–73 in Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, ed. J. Hayes. Abingdon, 1999; Meadowcroft, T. "Relevance as a Mediating Category in the Reading of Biblical Texts: Venturing beyond the Hermeneutical Circle." JETS 45 (2002): 611–27; Powell, M. A. Chasing the Eastern Star. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Ricoeur, P. "Metaphor and the Central Problem of Hermeneutics." In Hermeneutics and the Human Sciences, ed. J. B. Thompson. Cambridge University Press, 1981; Smith, J. K. A. The Fall of Interpretation. InterVarsity, 2000; Steinmetz, D. "The Superiority of Pre-Critical Exegesis." Pages 26–38 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997; Stiver, D. Theology after Ricoeur. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. HarperCollins, 1992; Treier, D. "The Superiority of Pre-Critical Exegesis? Sic et non." TJ 24 NS (2003): 77–103; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan/Apollos, 1998; Wall, R. "Reading the Bible from within Our Traditions." Pages 88–107 in Between Two Horizons, ed. J. Green and M. Turner. Eerdmans, 2000.

Robin Parry

Reading

Reading is ordinarily understood as one component of the technical skill of literacy. When it is so understood, the reader is seen as someone who exercises the skill of interpreting (decoding) (p 662) a written text, ideally in silence and without intermediary or audience. Readers may read with ease or with difficulty, at speed or slowly; but reading is, for those who understand it as part of literacy, a single skill with a single purpose—the extraction of meaning from a written text. This assimilation of reading to literacy also typically carries with it the implication that the only way to understand a written text is by applying the skill of literacy to it.

These are not, at first blush, very sensible ideas. It is better to think that reading does and should vary according to the nature of what is read. For Christians, the Bible is not the same kind of book as any other: it is God's word in a sense that no other book is, and this means that it must be read with different expectations and in a different way than is the case for any other book. Christians also cannot easily assent to the claim that literacy is necessary (or even preferred) as a means for coming to understand a written text. This is because only a tiny minority of Christians have been literate or are so now (though it is probable that premodern Christians, as also Jews, had higher literacy rates than most other groups). Also, there is no good reason to think that those without literacy understand the Bible less well than those who are literate.

Understanding reading simply as the exercise of literacy has not helped Christians to grasp what it is they ought to be doing when reading the Bible. Quite the contrary: when biblical reading is assimilated to the exercise of literacy, and when it comes to be thought that the Bible is essentially a printed book to be read by the literate in silence and in solitude, the almost inevitable result is a decline in Bible-reading as Christians should do it. Fortunately, the idea that reading is essentially a component of literacy has been challenged and modified by recent scholarship on the practice of reading, and by specifically Christian attention to the history of Christian thought about and practice of reading. This body of work, while certainly not free from the lively disagreements that characterize all specialized scholarship, does exhibit some deep-going agreements.

Among these agreements is the view that there is no clear-cut distinction between the textual habits of cultures in which most are literate and those in which few are. Large and complex bodies of literature can be transmitted from mouth to ear to memory over long periods of time without use of literacy's skills. The memory has capacities that often seem incredible to those educated in Western schools and universities during the last century or so. What is held in the memory can be retrieved therefrom, meditated upon, and produce understanding of a depth that at least rivals and often exceeds that available to the literate. It is also now clear that successive technologies for composing, producing, storing, and displaying texts (voice, memory, pen, paper, print, book, computer) tend to coexist rather than serially to displace other technologies. Ours is, no doubt, a culture in which the two dominant technologies of text-composition and text-transmission are, first, paper- and print-based; and, second, electronic. But it seems unlikely that one or the other will vanish, and both coexist with methods of communicating and understanding texts that are largely or entirely oral and aural. These last will likely become more important as literacy in the West decreases. Technology, then, does not determine how texts will be transmitted and understood.

This scholarship opens some space for attention to, and partial recovery of, what premodern Christians have said about reading in general and biblical reading in particular.

Reading of biblical texts is sometimes depicted in the Bible. Such depictions usually present an individual reading aloud to a group, as part of a public act of worship. This is followed by interpretation or exhortation so that those who have heard the reading may grasp its meaning (see Ezra's reading of "the Book of the Law of Moses" in Neh. 8, and Jesus' reading from Isa. 61 in Luke 4). Coming to understand the Bible in such a context requires literacy of almost no one; it does require capacity to hear, attend, consider, and recall on the part of listeners; and it does presuppose that the biblical text requires interpretation by a community.

The private, solitary, silent reading of a biblical (or any other) text is rarely depicted in the Bible, and even when it is, the account tends to conform to the model just mentioned. In Acts 8:26–40, for example, an Ethiopian is alone in his chariot reading from Isa. 53; Philip approaches and asks him whether he understands what he's reading. The Ethiopian says he does not, and that without guidance he cannot. Philip explains that this chapter is about Jesus; the Ethiopian is illuminated and is at once baptized by Philip. The episode begins with solitary reading that produces puzzlement and ends with understanding produced by a community of interpretation in the person of Philip. It is an implication of this way of understanding biblical reading that not all meanings of the biblical text are easily or directly accessible; some require communal guidance if they are to be grasped.

(p 663) Christian theorists from late antiquity until the high Middle Ages wrote a good deal about scriptural reading, for which the standard Latin term is lectio. They were not, however, writing about the private exercise of the skill of literacy upon a printed book. They were writing about the repeated hearing of the Bible in the context of its exposition by a community of interpretation, the church, and about its memorization and repeated meditative consideration in order that its meanings should become increasingly apparent to the reader.

These premodern theorists took the Bible to be God's word and therefore fundamentally different from every other written text. This meant for them that the Bible had layers of meaning and an inexhaustible richness of content not found in any other text, and that reading it must take this into account. The text must be read and reread (heard and reheard), inscribed on the tablets of memory, meditated upon repeatedly like a cow chewing the cud (this image is everywhere in medieval works on reading). It must be incorporated into its readers. As this is increasingly done, they will be increasingly conformed to its meanings and thus to the will of God. . The Bible The Bible must therefore be read with the knowledge and love of God always in mind.

Biblical reading so understood is a transformative spiritual discipline practiced by a community. All other reading (of literature, philosophy, science, and so on) is ancillary to it. Hearing, memorization, and repeated contemplation are more important to such reading than literacy, and this is because they issue in a moral relation between reader and text, a relation in which the text is the main agent and the reader a humble, patient, and reverential recipient of a gift.

See also Reader-Response Criticism

Bibliography

Carruthers, M. The Book of Memory. Cambridge University Press, 1990; Gavrilov, A. K. "Techniques of Reading in Classical Antiquity." CQ 47 (1997): 56–73; Goody, J. The Interface between the Written and the Oral. Cambridge University Press, 1987; Griffiths, P. Religious Reading. Oxford University Press, 1999; Ilich, I. In the Vineyard of the Text. University of Chicago Press, 1993; Manguel, A. A History of Reading. Viking, 1996; Ong, W. The Presence of the Word. Yale University Press, 1967; Steiner, G. Real Presences. University of Chicago Press, 1989; Stock, B. After Augustine. University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001; idem. Augustine the Reader. Belknap, 1996; Vander Weele, M. "What Is Reading For?" ChrLit 52, no. 1 (2002): 57–83.

Paul J. Griffiths

Realism     See Critical Realism; Semiotics

Redaction Criticism

Redaction criticism is a literary discipline that studies the way a biblical author/editor altered his sources to develop his unique theological message. The school is best known for NT studies but is utilized in OT research as well. For instance, G. von Rad used it in his Genesis commentary to ascertain the theological threads of what he called the Yahwist editor. In NT studies it is used primarily on the Synoptic Gospels.

Origins of the Movement

There were several precursors. In 1901 W. Wrede wrote The Messianic Secret, saying the author of Mark changed his sources to explain why the disciples failed to realize Jesus was Messiah during his life (he told those who began to grasp this not to tell anyone). In his Bampton Lectures of 1934, R. H. Lightfoot traced Mark's theological reworking of his sources. In The Witness of Matthew and Mark to Christ in 1944, N. B. Stonehouse studied the christological emphases of each. Yet the movement proper did not begin until the late 1940s as a result of weaknesses inherent in form criticism. That movement, begun in 1919, studied the individual pericopes of each Gospel to ascertain which aspects went back to the historical Jesus and which were the result of changes introduced by the early church during the oral period as the stories and sayings developed. However, the Gospels themselves were seen as the end result of an artificial scissors-and-paste compilation of the traditions. The evangelists were virtually ignored. Redaction criticism brought back the evangelists themselves as the creative compilers of their respective works. G. Bornkamm was the first with his 1948 article on the stilling of the storm, later incorporated into his Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew (1963). For him, Matthew has changed Mark's miracle story into a discipleship episode centering on the "little faith" journey of the disciples in light of the trials of the church (the boat). Then came H. Conzelmann, Theology of Luke (German, 1954) and W. Marxsen, Mark the Evangelist (German, 1956). Marxsen was the first to use the term Redaktionsgeschichte ("history of redaction" or editing as Mark called the church to flee the terrible events of the Jewish War, 66–70 CE). But Conzelmann is generally considered the more important work, arguing that Luke explained the "delay of the parousia" by replacing Mark's imminent eschatology with (p 664) a salvation-historical scheme involving three stages—the time of Israel, the time of Jesus, and the time of the church. Thus the parousia is no longer the focus of Luke but is replaced by the timeless "kingdom of God" that is already here.

The Methodology Employed

In short, the student uses a Gospel synopsis and analyzes the passage by "reading horizontally" (comparing the way it is presented in other Gospels and noting the differences) and "reading vertically" (looking down the column to see how the author has composed the passage). Thus one may discover the writer's individual theological emphases (Blomberg, Jesus, 93). In so doing most critics assume the consensus view of source criticism, that Mark was the first Gospel and was used by Matthew and Luke along with Q (from the German Quelle [source], referring to a hypothetical document or oral tradition that contained the 250 verses with sayings of Jesus that are common to Matthew and Luke but missing from Mark). So redactional study is most relevant for Matthew and Luke and not as useful for Mark and John since we do not know their sources.

The goal of most such critics is to separate the tradition (inherited from their sources) from redaction (the changes made by the evangelist). This is accomplished by looking for several possible changes: (1) One may identify what has been added to the tradition (e.g., Matt. 14:28–32 adds Peter walking on the water to Mark’s account of stilling the storm) or subtracted from it (“their hearts were hardened,” omitted by Matthew from Mark 6:52), and then draw a theological conclusion (Peter as a model of “little faith” but also of the beginning of faith due to the presence of Jesus “the Son of God,” in Matt. 14:33). (2) One may study the seams (transitions), introductions, and conclusions to ascertain how the author arranges the pericope (e.g., Matt. 9:35–38, where Jesus asks the disciples to pray for workers, while in 10:1–2 the disciples become the answers to their own prayer as the “workers” for “the harvest”). (3) One may observe changes in the arrangement of the material (e.g., Luke 6:20–26 has four beatitudes followed by four woes [cf. Matt. 5:3–12]; they parallel each other exactly, showing that Luke is presenting a “reversal of roles” in which the poor will have everything and the rich nothing in the kingdom). (4) One may recognize changes in the setting or placement of a story (e.g., Mark 3:20–35 sandwiches the Beelzebub incident into the episode where Jesus’ family wants to take him home, believing he has lost his mind [stressing the extent of the opposition to Jesus], while Luke 11:14–26 has it much later, following the sayings on prayer [stressing the authority of Jesus]). (5) One may identify changes in the words used—this has to be done carefully, for in the past some scholars have assumed theological intent in every single difference, while in fact many changes are merely stylistic, so one must ask whether the terms have theological implications in their respective Gospels (e.g., “poor in spirit” in Matt. 5:3 stresses the spiritual aspect and “poor” in Luke 6:20 stresses the economic aspect of Jesus’ original speech [which stressed both aspects]). (6) One may discover how two traditions are combined in a single episode (e.g., the temptation narratives, where Matthew and Luke combine Mark [Matt. 4:1–2; Luke 4:1–2] with Q [Matt. 4:3–11; Luke 4:3–13]). (7) One may see how the evangelist provides explanations for readers (e.g., Mark explaining Jewish customs for Gentile readers in 7:3–4, 11). (8) One may find changes in order to avoid misunderstanding (due to the possible implications of Mark 10:18, “Why do you call me good?... No one is good—except God alone,” Matt. 19:17 alters it to “Why do you ask me about what is good?... There is only One who is good”).

In the early decades of the movement, scholars assumed the theology was inherent in the changes alone, so they would examine only the immediate context to see what the changes added. Now, however, it is realized that theology is also contained in the tradition accepted, for the author chose to keep that portion intact. In the 1970s this began to be called “Composition Criticism” because the emphasis was no longer just on the redactional changes but on the composition as a whole. So now theology is determined to combine the micro- and macrolevels. The student studies not only how the change affects the immediate context, but also how it fits into the whole context and how that theological point is developed through the book as a whole. For instance, take the beatitudes and woes of Luke 6:20–26 and the “reversal of roles” theme inherent in it. At the microlevel, it adds a sense of social concern to the “Sermon on the Plain” in Luke 6:20–49. There is a distinct countercultural air about this sermon, with the switch from rich to poor in 20–26, the command to “love your enemies” in 27–36, the injunction to forgive rather than judge in 37–38 and to look to one’s own sins rather than the sins of others in 41–42. At the macrolevel it is part of a major theme relating to material things and the poor in Luke (see 1:51–53; 3:8–14; 4:18–19; (p 665)6:20–26; 7:22; 9:3–5; 10:30–36; 11:39–42; 12:13–21, 22–34; 14:12–14, 21–24; 15:11–32; 16:1–14, 19–31; 18:18–25; 19:1–9, 12–27; 20:22–26; 21:1–4; 22:25–27). From this it is clear that the theme discovered in 6:20–26 is part of a major motif in the Gospel of Luke.

The Weaknesses of Redaction Criticism

The major problem with the discipline is its origins in a skeptical view of the historicity of the Gospels. Many practitioners are still controlled by form and tradition criticism, with an assumption that the Gospels are primarily the product of the early church and have only a minimal amount of historical data. So for them redaction means that the evangelist created material. However, expansion, omission, wording, and rearrangement are aspects of style; in and of themselves, they do not necessarily mean that the author is uninterested in history. This radical skepticism is fueled by a presupposition that theology must exclude history—claiming that if a writer is producing a theological point, that must involve a lack of interest in history. Yet there is no basis for such an assumption. It has long been realized that no one can study history without an interest in its implications for the current situation. In fact, the term “gospel” means not just “good news” but also (in its verb form) the proclamation of that good news for today. The Gospels in one sense are sermons about Jesus, or “history with a message.” That does not require a lack of interest in what happened but rather the significance of what happened for the church (see Blomberg, Reliability).

Next, the vast majority bases their approach on the two-document hypothesis (Mark and Q being the tradition behind Matthew and Luke). Though it is the consensus position today, it is still hypothetical, and many assume Matthean priority, resulting in quite different decisions. Therefore, it may be best not to depend too much on source-critical discussions and simply center on the differences between the Gospels, Mark and John as well as Matthew and Mark.

Redaction critics have often been so focused on the differences that they have assumed that the theology flows entirely from the changes made to the traditions. However, the theology of the Gospels actually flows from the whole story, tradition as well as redaction, and the interaction within the whole work. The movement in Gospels study has been from redaction to composition to narrative criticism, more and more from the parts to the whole. The redactional changes are quite helpful as a control on how the evangelist has shaped his material, but the theological emphases come from studying the theological threads that are woven together to form the whole tapestry of the individual Gospel.

Scholars have also assumed that a major goal of Gospels research is to discover the Sitz im Leben (situation in life) or the community each Gospel is addressing. The problem is that the entire pursuit is based on a false premise, that each evangelist was writing for a small group of churches that belonged to their peculiar circle of ministry. But studies to that effect are very speculative, stemming from the assumption that the Gospels do not reflect the situation of Jesus’ day but that of the evangelist’s time. Bauckham has shown that this is not true to the situation. Scholars assume the Gospels are like the Epistles, addressing an individual community, but there is no evidence for such. Rather, they were written to the church as a whole, meant for wide distribution.

The Strengths of Redaction Criticism

Of all the schools of criticism in the last two centuries, none have done better at developing the theology of the individual Gospels. Yet it must be done with great sensitivity, lest the theological task be reduced to subjectivity and speculation. The key is not to make redactional analysis an end in itself but to blend it with other disciplines, especially narrative criticism. The latter deals with the text as a whole and acts as a control against the tendency of redaction criticism to center only on the parts. Narrative criticism considers the plot and setting, the atmosphere within which the evangelist tells his story. Yet redactional analysis corrects the error of narrative criticism, that the author no longer is present in his story. So together they enable the student to discover the theology of the whole (tradition and redaction taken together) as intended by the author/evangelist.

While some critics consider redaction criticism a thing of the past along with form and tradition criticism, replaced by narrative and reader-response approaches, many still recognize the value of redactional analysis. It provides greater accuracy in determining the theological emphases, for it tells us how the biblical author has used his sources, which parts he has accepted and which parts he has altered to highlight different aspects of what Christ said and did. The evangelists did not just gather and string together the traditions they received, but interpreted them (p 666) and chose aspects that fit the theological nuances they wished to highlight.

Finally, redaction criticism properly construed is the friend rather than the enemy of historical investigation. There is no need for wholesale creation of sayings and events in the life of Jesus, for redactional analysis shows how each evangelist chose certain details to highlight and omitted other details to bring out their theological nuances. History and theology work together to produce the unique Gospels.

See also Form Criticism and the NT; Gospels; Narrative Criticism; Source Criticism

Bibliography

Bauckham, R. ed. The Gospel for All Christians. Eerdmans, 1997;
Blomberg, C. Historical Reliability of the Gospels. InterVarsity, 1987; idem. Jesus and the Gospels. Broadman & Holman, 1997; Carson, D. A. "Redaction Criticism: On the Legitimacy and Illegitimacy of a Literary Tool." Pages 119–42 in Scripture and Truth, ed. D. A. Carson and J. Woodbridge. Zondervan, 1983; Kelber, W. "Redaction Criticism: On the Nature and Exposition of the Gospels." PRSt 6 (1979): 4–16; McKnight, S. Interpreting the Synoptic Gospels. Baker, 1988; Osborne, G. "The Evangelical and Redaction Criticism: Critique and Methodology." JETS 22 (1979): 305–22; idem. "Redaction Criticism." Pages 662–69 in Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. J. Green, S. McKnight, and I. H. Marshall. InterVarsity, 1992; Perrin, N. What Is Redaction Criticism? Fortress, 1969; Stein, R. "Redaction Criticism (NT)." ABD 5:647–50; idem. "What Is Redaktionsgeschichte?" JBL 88 (1969): 45–56; Wenham, D., and S. Walton. A Guide to the Gospels and Acts. Vol. 1 of Exploring the New Testament. SPCK, 2001.

Reference See Critical Realism; Meaning

Relationship between the Testaments

“Old Testament” and “New Testament” are Christian terms that carry heavy theological connotations. They express a theology of a continuing purpose of God that runs through the history and religion of Israel as God’s chosen people, on into the life and ministry of Jesus Christ and the community that he founded, the Christian church. They presuppose a single salvation history within which pre-Christian Israel represents the first and preliminary stage, with Jesus and his church the second, climactic stage, the time of fulfillment. The term “Testament” (an old-fashioned translation of the Greek diathēkē, more usually translated “covenant”) speaks of the special relationship between God and his chosen people. But the addition of “Old” and “New” suggests that the pre-Christian phase of that relationship has now been superseded by a new and (by implication) final phase. In it, that relationship is focused not on the Israelite nation but on the person of Jesus and those, of whatever nation, who have been called to follow him. Jeremiah’s prophecy of a “new covenant” (Jer. 31:31–34) is taken up by Jesus’ words at the Last Supper, “This cup is the new covenant in my blood” (Luke 22:20), and expounded in Heb. 8:7–13 by the claim that the “old covenant” is now past its sell-by date. To speak of OT and NT at all is thus to commit oneself to a distinctively Christian view of salvation history; it is little wonder that Jews object to this apparently dismissive way of describing the Hebrew Scriptures. In this article, which has as its subject the relationship between the two Testaments, it would be too cumbersome to abandon the familiar terminology, but it must be understood that it is written from a self-consciously Christian perspective.

Not all Christians have been happy with this takeover of the Hebrew Scriptures to be part of a single “Christian Bible.” Ever since the Gnostic Marcion in the second century, there have been those who are hostile to or embarrassed by the OT, and who speak of the OT God as a stern and vengeful deity, unlike the loving God of Jesus. While today there are few theoretical Marcionites, there are many who in practice reflect his teaching, confining the reading of Scripture in public and in private almost entirely to the NT. (For a full study of the range of Christian attitudes to the relationship between the Testaments, see Baker.)

Among those who do acknowledge the two Testaments together as “Scripture,” however, there are two fundamentally different approaches to assessing the nature and extent of their relationship.

On the one hand, it is possible to take the Hebrew Scriptures as our starting point and to look for aspects of those Scriptures that have an inherently forward-looking character. This may be through explicit prediction of what is still to come or by displaying a provisionality that in itself cries out for future development in a new situation. This is an exegetical enterprise in which Jews and Christians can engage together, though they are likely to differ as to the nature of the fulfillments or extrapolations that are envisaged. But, on the other hand, we may note places in which the NT implicitly or explicitly draws on the OT, and trace elements of continuity and of discontinuity between the two phases of God's (p 667) work and revelation. This is a more specifically Christian enterprise. The two enterprises are not at all the same, since many of the NT's uses of the OT are of passages that in themselves carry no clear forward-looking dimension. Their relevance to the Christian situation has been perceived not by objective exegesis of the original sense of the OT text, but by hindsight in the light of the new situation that Christ has brought. At times this "heuristic" use of the OT by the apostolic Christian writers appears arbitrary and even irresponsible, and it raises questions as to the theology of "fulfillment" that has given rise to it. At such points modern Western interpreters of the NT tend to become embarrassed and apologetic. This article aims to explore how far such embarrassment is justified.

NT Use of the OT

There are nearly four hundred direct quotations of the OT in the NT. Not all of them are introduced by explicit quotation formulas ("As it is written," etc.), and not all are in verbatim agreement with the wording of the OT text as we know it, but all are clearly deliberate citations of a specific OT text. That statistic is relatively uncontroversial. But there is less agreement on the incidence of less-formal allusions, places where the NT writer's language echoes or apparently refers to that of the OT, but without quoting it directly. For instance, the book of Revelation contains not a single formal quotation from the OT, yet its language and imagery are totally impregnated with that of Ezekiel, Daniel, and so on, and whole sections of the book are clearly modeled on familiar OT visions. There is an inevitable subjectivity about how deliberate or how significant an interpreter judges such echoes to be: how long is a piece of string? But a representative listing of allusions and verbal parallels, which errs on the side of caution, gives well over two thousand. (These figures draw on the lists of OT quotations and allusions printed at the back of the United Bible Societies' Greek New Testament.)

The majority of these quotations and allusions are to what were then the familiar Greek translations of the OT books, which we now know collectively as the Septuagint (LXX). This was only to be expected, just as present-day writers in English normally quote a known English version of the Bible rather than go back to the original languages. The LXX translators varied in their approach, some being excessively literal while others were quite free in their renderings, and this range is reflected in the NT quotations. Where the NT version differs from extant LXX texts, there are a number of possible explanations. The NT writer may be using a Greek version that differs from what we now have in the LXX. Or he may be giving his own version of the Hebrew or Aramaic text with which he was familiar and that was not represented in the LXX. Or he may not be intending to quote verbatim at all, but giving a free rendering of what he takes to be the sense of the OT passage (or, sometimes, a combination of related passages). This last option is important and needs further elaboration.

The ideal of "accurate" quotation is quite a modern one. It belongs to a culture in which written texts are easily accessible for reference. But in the NT world, in which literacy was perhaps no higher than 20 percent, a scroll of a single OT book, whether in Hebrew or Greek, was an expensive luxury, available to few apart from the Hebrew texts kept in the synagogues. It was also more inconvenient to consult than the compact, paged books we know, and there were no chapters and verses to guide readers through the scroll. The Scriptures were therefore known and experienced primarily through oral repetition and quoted normally from memory.

In a preliterate society oral memory can be much more accurate and extensive than we would expect in our literate world today. But there is the further question whether exact quotation was always intended, even if it could be achieved. The Aramaic targumim, which represent the traditional versions of the Hebrew Scriptures as presented in the synagogues, are often far from literal translations. At times they are significantly expanded with explanatory material, and sometimes they "angle" the text in the direction of a preferred interpretation. Several of the LXX translators do the same. This is not a matter of "distortion" of the sense of Scripture, but rather a self-conscious attempt to help the reader to grasp its full meaning, as this has been perceived by the person who is translating and interpreting it (and all translation is, necessarily, interpretation). Many of the variations from the known OT text that we find in NT quotations are of this nature.

To take a simple example, when Matt. 2:6 quotes Mic. 5:2 in relation to the birth of Jesus in Bethlehem, Micah's description of Bethlehem as "little among the clans of Judah" becomes in Matthew "by no means the least among the leaders of Judah" (AT). This apparent contradiction of Micah's description is Matthew's way of pointing out to his readers that Micah's prophecy has been (p 668)fulfilled: the insignificant village has become "by no means the least" because it is now the birthplace of the Messiah. This is exactly what Micah was saying would happen; Matthew's wording neatly points out that now it has happened, not by an explanatory comment or footnote, but by a subtle adaptation of the quotation itself. This may not seem to follow our normal conventions for quotation. But anyone who listens carefully to the use of biblical quotations and allusions in the pulpit even today will notice that when the preacher is not actually reading directly from the open Bible, the quotation is often "angled" in such a way as to emphasize the interpretation which is being drawn from it. No one would dream of complaining that this is an illegitimate use of the biblical text—unless, of course, they disagree with the preacher's interpretation!

The modern reader needs to be prepared to recognize that simple verbatim quotation is not the only appropriate way to use Scripture, and to work within the communication strategies of the first-century world. Then the "embarrassing" uses of the OT by the NT become a fruitful field for uncovering the theological presuppositions of Christian leaders and thinkers in the apostolic period. Some examples from one of the more "creative" NT interpreters of the OT, Matthew, may help to illustrate this theme.

The Gospel of Matthew

An overriding theme of Matthew's Gospel is the fulfillment of the OT in the coming of Jesus the Messiah and in the new community that results.

Formal Quotations with Fulfillment Formula. This theme is most prominent in the formula repeated with minor variation ten times in the Gospel: "All this took place in order to fulfill what the Lord had spoken through the prophet." The OT texts that follow this formula vary considerably. Some are what we (but perhaps not all Jewish interpreters) would recognize as messianic: Matt. 2:6 (Mic. 5:2); 4:15–16 (Isa. 9:1–2); 8:17 (Isa. 53:4); 12:18–21 (Isa. 42:1–4); 21:5 (Zech. 9:9); others reveal a more "creative" approach.

Matthew 1:22–23 claims the fulfillment of Isa. 7:14 in the birth of Jesus from a virgin mother. But in its original context 7:14 belongs to a prediction of political events in the eighth century BCE. In that context it had already been fulfilled. The child was probably Isaiah's own son, Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz, and the "young woman" (so the Hebrew) who bore him was not a virgin. But in the wider context of Isa. 7–11, this specific birth is taken up into the developing theme of a wonder-child, Immanuel ("God with us"), who transcends all normal expectations and who will be hailed as "Mighty God" (9:6). It was probably to reflect this wider dimension that the LXX translated the rare word for "young woman" as "virgin," and Matthew uses this earlier interpretation as his basis for claiming a second fulfillment of the prophecy on a quite different level from the first. The recognition that a single OT prophecy may be seen to have more than one level of fulfillment casts light on several surprising NT quotations.

Matthew 2:15 finds in Jesus' childhood refuge in Egypt a fulfillment of Hos. 11:1, "Out of Egypt I called my son." The "son" in Hosea is Israel, and the OT passage is not a prediction of the future but a reminiscence of the past event of the exodus. But for Matthew, Israel's status as "son of God" finds its ultimate embodiment in Jesus, who is God's Son in a much fuller sense (see below, on 4:1–11). Hosea's words thus point (even though Hosea himself had no such thought) beyond their immediate reference to a new exodus and a new and greater Son of God.

The quotation attributed to Jeremiah in Matt. 27:9–10 is in fact most closely parallel to Zech. 11:12–13 with its "thirty pieces of silver" thrown to the enigmatic "potter" in the house of the Lord. For Matthew, this prophecy of the rejected shepherd and his derisory wages is fulfilled in Judas's betrayal of Jesus and his subsequent return of the money to the temple, together with the buying of "the potter's field." But where does Jeremiah come in? Jeremiah was famous for his visit to the potter (Jer. 18:1–11), his use of a potter's jug to prophesy Judah's destruction in the Valley of Hinnom, the site of Aceldama, the "potter's field" (19:1–13), and for his own purchase of a field (32:6–15). Echoes of these passages are woven into Matthew's free rendering of Zech. 11:12–13, as well as into the narrative that leads up to it, and the whole composite quotation is attributed to the greater prophet Jeremiah. This is not simple quotation of a proof text, but the result of some very subtle and sophisticated reflection on a variety of prophetic texts, related by key words and woven together into a creative prophetic package in which Matthew could see the events of his day foreshadowed. What we might have expressed by means of footnotes and cross-references, he has achieved by a single pregnant "quotation" that demands imaginative exploration on the part of his readers. It is the sort of use of the OT that Jewish interpreters of the time would have found (p 669) attractive and familiar, however much they might have disputed the specific application.

Typological Allusions. Such explicitly signaled quotations are only the tip of the iceberg. Among the many less-formal allusions to the OT, one prominent feature is what is often described as “typology,” though definitions of this term have varied. It is used here to mean an NT writer’s perception of models or foreshadowings of Jesus and his work in passages of the OT that in themselves have no predictive or forward-pointing intention. We have seen an example in Hos. 11:1, a reminiscence of the exodus, which Matthew sees “fulfilled” in Jesus. Again, a few examples must suffice.

Matthew 12:40 draws an explicit parallel between Jonah and Jesus: “As Jonah . . ., so the Son of Man . . .” The OT story of Jonah gave no hint of a future repetition, but Jesus makes the link on the basis not of the OT text itself but of a perceived parallel in his own experience. Yet it is not a simple repetition on the same level: rather, “something greater than Jonah is here” (Matt. 12:41 NRSV). The same formula is repeated in the next verse with regard to Solomon, and back in 12:6 Jesus has defended his authority to override legal convention with the observation that “something greater than the temple is here” (NRSV). Thus, in response to a challenge to justify his authority (12:38), Matthew’s Jesus places himself in the succession of the prophets (Jonah), the kings (Solomon, the wise man), and the temple and its priesthood. Yet he does so not as merely recapitulating their role as mediators between God and his people but rather as “something greater” (12:41 NRSV). Typology thus takes the people and institutions of sacred history and traces not only a repetition in principle of what God has done in the past but also its fulfillment. The patterns of God’s working in the OT have reached their climax in the coming of “something greater,” in which/whom the various strands of OT authority and mediation are finally brought together.

The account of Jesus’ testing in the wilderness (Matt. 4:1–11) focuses on three quotations from Deut. 6–8. This is Moses’ speech reminding Israel of their experiences in the wilderness and the lessons it had been designed to teach them: see Deut. 8:2–5, culminating in the statement that “As a man disciplines his son, so [Yahweh] your God disciplines you.” Now Jesus, who at his baptism has been declared “Son of God” (see the repetition of this title as the introduction to the devil’s proposals in vv. 3 and 6), in his turn undergoes a wilderness testing, and takes to himself the lessons that God’s “son” Israel should have learned. But where Israel failed to learn its lessons, and only partially succeeded in taking over the promised land, here is a “Son of God” who is fully in tune with his Father’s will and whose mission will succeed. The typological identification of Jesus with Israel already presupposed in 2:15 (“Out of Egypt I called my son”) is here more fully set out, again not simply as a repetition but as a climax. Here at last is the true Israel, and the new exodus spoken of by the prophets.

None of this could have been arrived at simply by an objective reading of the stories of Jonah and Solomon or of Israel’s wilderness experience. But as Jesus’ own awareness of his mission developed, and as his followers meditated on it, it was possible to perceive patterns running through God’s earlier dealings with his people that were now coming together in one great climactic act of deliverance. Such typological perceptions come to the surface repeatedly in Matthew’s story, and throughout the NT, coming to their climax in the argument of the Letter to the Hebrews—that in Jesus we have something even “better” than all that God’s people have rightly celebrated with pride in their OT heritage.

Interpreters have often spoken of a sensus plenior, a “fuller meaning” in the OT texts, which the NT writers are able to perceive. Perhaps that is not the best way to put it. This new meaning is not something inherent in the OT texts themselves, so that any objective exegesis, Jewish or Christian, ought properly to perceive it. Rather, it is a new level of relevance, going beyond what the OT writer and the original readers could have perceived, which is now discovered by retrospective reflection in the light of NT events. Typology depends not so much on exegesis of the original meaning as on a theological hindsight informed by commitment to Christ as the climax of God’s work of salvation. It proceeds from faith rather than from objective literary analysis.

Continuing Fulfillment. This concept of the repetition of God’s work on a higher level perhaps explains also the fact recognized above that the NT writers, and particularly Matthew, seem able to find more than one point of fulfillment for a given OT prophecy (see above, on Matt. 1:22–23). For instance, prophecies of the destruction and desecration of the temple, already fulfilled in the sixth or the second century BCE, remain as pointers to an even more devastating event still to come (Matt. 23:38, echoing Jer. 12:7; 22:5; Matt. 24:15, echoing Dan. 11:31; 12:11).

(p 670) Perhaps the clearest example of such multiple or continuing fulfillment of prophecy is seen in Matthew’s various allusions to the vision of “one like a son of man” in Dan. 7:13–14. It is already fulfilled in Jesus’ postresurrection authority (Matt. 28:18). It will be seen to be fulfilled in a variety of ways during the lifetime of Jesus’ contemporaries (Matt. 10:23; 16:28; 24:30 with 34; 26:64). But it is also a model for describing the ultimate sovereignty of the Son of Man at “the renewal of all things” (19:28) and at the final judgment (25:31–34).

So, Christian interpretation has traditionally thought of OT prophetic oracles as pointing forward to a single identifiable “fulfillment.” Yet it may be more appropriate to see the prophet as setting up a model that, even if specifically fulfilled in a given historical event or situation, remains as a continuing pointer to God’s way of fulfilling his purposes of judgment and of blessing. Like the nonpredictive models that are the traditional province of typology, predictions too can have a continuing relevance as God’s work moves forward toward its ultimate climax. In that ongoing process the climactic point is the coming of Jesus the Messiah, but there remains a “not yet” together with the “already” of Christian fulfillment. Since God does not change, neither do the principles of his working adumbrated in the OT and brought fully to light in the NT.

Jesus and God. The use of Dan. 7:13–14 in Matthew raises a significant issue in NT Christology. In Matt. 25:31–34 the Son of Man is “the King” acting as universal judge. In the OT these are the prerogatives of God himself, and indeed the wording of that vision includes also echoes of OT passages that speak of God himself as the judge (Joel 3:1–12; Zech. 14:5; Dan. 7:9–10, with the Ancient of Days sitting on the throne of judgment). The NT writers had become so used to thinking of Jesus as in the place of God that it seemed natural for them to apply to him passages that in the OT spoke of God. Thus, Malachi’s prophecy of a forerunner for God’s coming to judgment (Mal. 3:1; 4:5–6) is applied to John the Baptist as the herald of Jesus’ coming (Matt. 11:10, 14). Jesus justifies the children’s welcome to him by an OT text about the praise of God (Matt. 21:16; Ps. 8:2). He asserts the permanence of his own word in terms that recall what Isa. 40:8 said about God’s word (Matt. 24:35).

In Matthew this tendency is relatively undeveloped; in Hebrews it is blatant. Hebrews 1:6, 10–12 simply applies to “the Son” OT texts about God the Creator (Deut. 32:43; Ps. 102:25–27), and does not feel the need to explain. His way is eased by similar use of another quotation in 1:8–9, in which the OT text itself describes the king as “God” (Ps. 45:6–7). It is also eased by the fact that the Greek translation of “Yahweh” was Kyrios, the same title applied to Jesus as “Lord.” It seems that early Christians were so convinced of the divinity of Jesus that they found it natural to equate the one “Lord” with the other, and so to apply to Christ what the OT said of Yahweh (cf. Rom. 10:9–13).

A Theology of Fulfillment

Our study of Matthew has illustrated some significant features of NT use of the OT, and similar examples could have been drawn from many parts of the NT; but it remains to discuss their theological implications.

Continuity. Clearly, Marcion was quite wrong. The NT is full of the OT. It takes over the OT writers' understanding of God and his ways, and reasserts their ethical and spiritual norms. Jesus sums up the essential relationship in the words "not to abolish them but to fulfill them" (Matt. 5:17). The careful drawing of connecting lines between the OT and the Christian situation, not only in terms of specific predictions fulfilled but also in a more far-reaching network of typological interpretation, testifies to an overriding sense of continuity. The new covenant established in Christ is understood precisely as the successor to the old covenant under Moses, not as its repudiation. It is the next, and final, phase of the saving purpose of the same covenant God.

Discontinuity. But the covenant is new; Jeremiah had said it "will not be like the covenant that I made with their ancestors" (Jer. 31:32 NRSV). Things are going to be different. Not only is there a pervading sense of climax, of "something greater" about the new as compared with the old. There are also elements of the old covenant that will no longer apply. As Heb. 8:7–13 argues, the coming of the new means the pensioning off of the old. It has served its purpose and may now pass into honorable retirement.

The most obvious (and most uncontroversial) example of this discontinuity is the abandonment of the whole sacrificial system that was so central to the old covenant. But Jesus' illustrations of what it means to "fulfill the law" in Matt. 5:17–48 indicate that not only the ceremonial aspects of the law need to be rethought. The "greater righteousness" set out in that passage moves away from a legalistic concern with keeping rules and regulations to a more far-reaching ideal of being (p 671) "perfect ... as your heavenly Father is perfect." Paul rejoices in being no longer "under the law" (Rom. 8:2; Gal. 4:21; 5:1–18), which was our custodian to lead us to Christ (3:24), who is himself "the end of the law" (Rom. 10:4).

The focus has thus moved from a written code to a person, Jesus the Messiah; in relationship with him rather than in membership of a law-based community, God's purpose of salvation is now being fulfilled. This means that the people of God is no longer to be defined in terms of the national community of Israel, but will embrace people of all nations who have become disciples of Jesus the Messiah (Matt. 28:18–20). The change that has taken place, and the complementary elements of continuity and discontinuity that it involves, are explained in Paul's famous allegory of the olive tree in Rom. 11:17–24. Some branches of the olive tree (Israel) have been broken off because of unbelief, while branches from a wild olive tree (the Gentiles) have been grafted in. But it remains the same olive tree, and the broken-off branches may yet be regrafted into the parent stock “if they do not persist in unbelief.” Thus, by the amazing (and horticulturally impossible!) providence of God, “all Israel will be saved” (11:26), not now as an exclusive community of the descendants of Abraham, but as a worldwide community of all who by faith have become Abraham’s children (Rom. 4).

Supersessionism. The Letter to the Hebrews sets out an extended comparison of all that was best in the old covenant with the “better” things that have now taken their place with the coming of Christ. Its theology is often described as “supersessionist”: Jesus supersedes the OT, his church supersedes Israel. Such language must be used with care; its potential misuse to fuel anti-Jewish prejudice is clear. The more positive term “fulfillment” is more typical of the NT perspective. For all his dismissal of aspects of the old covenant (especially its priesthood and sacrifices) as no longer relevant, the writer of Hebrews is second to none in his love for the OT and his desire to do justice to its role in the ongoing purpose of God. The question is how its undoubtedly central role in God’s revelation of himself should now be taken forward.

By the first century CE the religion of the OT had come to a parting of the ways. After the destruction of the temple in 70 CE and the consequent cessation of sacrifice, it could not continue as it had been. Two contrasting visions emerged, each in their own way equally a development away from and yet a “fulfillment” of the traditional religion of Israel. On the one hand, what we call rabbinic Judaism developed a new law-based spirituality that remained largely within the ethnic boundaries of Israel. On the other hand, Christianity found the way forward in a personal focus on Jesus the Messiah, which opened the riches of Israel’s tradition to a worldwide community of faith. Each was a new way of religion, yet each was organically related to the OT, out of which it sprang. Each had a new set of religious texts to supplement the Hebrew Scriptures: on the one hand, the rich expansion of Talmud and midrash; on the other, the Christian NT. Modern Judaism and Christianity are each in their different ways “supersessions” of the OT.

A Move away from Literal Fulfillment. Three books published over a forty-year period and from different theological perspectives form an interesting and significant trilogy on the NT adaptation of OT images. R. J. McKelvey, The New Temple (1969), traces the NT concept of Jesus and his people as constituting “something greater than the temple,” which renders the building in Jerusalem theologically redundant. W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land (1974), shows how NT writers systematically transfer OT ideals and prophecies concerning the literal land of Israel to a nonterritorial and international people of God. P. W. L. Walker, Jesus and the Holy City (1996), demonstrates how the NT writers, following the lead of Jesus himself, see no future for the literal city as the center of God's purposes, but rather look for a new Jerusalem. There is a consistency about this aspect of NT biblical interpretation that Christians must not ignore in favor of a "Christian Zionism" that reads the OT as if nothing has changed with the coming of Jesus.

See also Anti-Semitism; Intertextuality; Jewish-Christian Dialogue; Jewish Exegesis; Targum; Translation; Typology

Bibliography

Baker, D. L. Two Testaments, One Bible. InterVarsity, 1976; Beale, G., ed. The Right Doctrine from the Wrong Texts? Baker, 1994; Carson, D. A., and H. G. M. Williamson, eds. It Is Written. Cambridge University Press, 1988; Davies, W. D. The Gospel and the Land. University of California Press, 1974; Ellis, E. E. Paul's Use of the Old Testament. 1957. Baker, 1981; idem. The Old Testament in Early Christianity. Mohr, 1991. Reprint, Baker, 1992; Evans, C. A., ed. The Interpretation of Scripture in Early Judaism and Christianity. Sheffield Academic Press, 2000; Evans, C. A., and J. Sanders, eds. Early Christian Interpretation of the Scriptures of Israel. Sheffield Academic Press, 1997; France, R. T. Jesus and the Old Testament. Tyndale, 1971; Goppelt, L. Typos. Eerdmans, 1982; Hanson, A. The Living Utterances (p 672) of God. Darton, Longman & Todd, 1983; Hawthorne, G., and O. Betz, eds. Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament. Eerdmans, 1987; Hays, R. Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul. Yale University Press, 1989; Juel, D. Messianic Exegesis. Fortress, 1988; Lindars, B. New Testament Apologetic. SCM, 1961; Longenecker, R. Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period. Eerdmans, 1975; McKelvey, R. J. The New Temple. Oxford University Press, 1969; Moo, D. The Old Testament in the Gospel Passion Narratives. Almond, 1983; Moyise, S., ed. The Old Testament in the New Testament. Sheffield Academic Press, 2000; Satterthwaite, P., et al., eds. The Lord's Anointed. Baker, 1995; Walker, P. W. L. Jesus and the Holy City. Eerdmans, 1996.

R. T. France

Relevance Theory See Language, Linguistics; Translation

Religion

"Religion" is a term of art now deeply woven into the fabric of our theological and political thought. This is perhaps especially true in the United States, where the term is enshrined in the country's Bill of Rights and therefore also in the jargon of legislative, bureaucratic, and judicial procedures. The First Amendment guarantees freedom of religion (or at least that Congress shall neither establish it nor prevent its free exercise). The IRS must often decide whether an institution is sufficiently religious to be granted tax privileges. And, most obviously, the state and federal courts must often rule as to whether some belief or practice is or is not religious.

Christians, too, are now likely automatically and naturally to think of themselves as religious people—people whose religion is Christianity. The same is true, mutatis mutandis, of Jews and Judaism, Buddhists and Buddhism, and so on. This kind of talk suggests that “religion” picks out a type of which there are many tokens such as Christianity, just like “currency” is a type whose tokens are dollars, pounds, yen, and so on. However, there is fairly widespread agreement about what makes it reasonable to say that dollars and deutsche marks are tokens of the same type (and about what type they are a token of). But there is much less about what makes it reasonable to say that Islam and Buddhism are tokens of the same type (and about what type they are a token of). This is why there are few impassioned arguments about whether something is or is not a currency, but many about whether something is or is not a religion and even more about whether some action, event, or belief does or does not merit the label “religious.”

At present there is no broad or deep agreement—either among those who would call themselves religious or among those who would not—about what the category “religion” should be taken to embrace. Disagreements about these things are in fact among the liveliest sources of difficulty in public life, both nationally and internationally. It is also the case that “religion” has not historically been of much importance to Christian self-understanding, and that the importance it did have before the fifteenth century is in many respects at odds with that it has now. A little history will explain both points.

The History of “Religion”

The Latin word religio, from which comes “religion,” was not an especially important term for pre-Christian thinkers who used that language, and there is no single Greek word for which it is the obvious translation. This lack of importance is reflected, too, in early Christian literature. Jerome’s fourth-century Latin version of the NT, for instance—the Vulgate which, with some revisions, was the standard text for Western Christians for a thousand years—uses religio and its derivatives only eight times (Acts 2:5; 10:2; 13:50; 26:5; Col. 2:18; James 1:26–27), rendering a number of different Greek words thereby. The word is simply not an important part of the biblical lexicon, and this is evident, too, in the decisions made by early translators of the Bible into English. The King James Version (1611), for instance, uses “religion” or “religious” only seven times in translating the NT from Greek (Acts 13:43; 26:5; Gal. 1:13–14; James 1:26–27), and for three different Greek terms (not always the same ones that Jerome chose to render with religio).

Christians sometimes used the term in late antiquity. Augustine, for instance, gave detailed attention to it at the end of the fourth century in his work De vera religione (On True Religion), and occasionally in other works as well. For him, religio meant worship, the patterns of action by which, in public, we self-consciously turn ourselves toward God in homage and praise. There could, he thought, be a right and proper (“true”) way of worshipping God, just as there could be improper and damnable (“false”) ways of doing so; and so there could be a true and many false “religions.” Since Augustine was a Catholic Christian, he also thought that Catholic worship was, on the whole, identical with true religion; and that, although true religion (proper public and communal worship) was not found only within (p 673)the bounds of the Catholic Church, it was found preeminently and most perfectly there.

This equation of religion with public and communal worship was not unique to Augustine (he adopted its essentials from Cicero). It was almost standard in the pre-Christian Mediterranean world, and it became the ordinary understanding of religio among the Christians of late antiquity who thought and wrote in Latin. This understanding of the word is evident, too, in the etymology of religio most commonly given by Latin-using intellectuals (Christian and otherwise) in late antiquity. They derived religio from re + ligare, “to bind back,” or “to rebind,” meaning to reestablish by worship a lost or broken intimacy between God and worshippers. There are other etymologies, defended by a minority both ancient and modern, the most interesting of which derives religio from re + legere, “to reread”; but this etymology has entered less deeply into the soul of the West.

Western Christians from the fourth century onward had little occasion to think or write about things we now usually call religions. Islam did not come into existence until the seventh century, and until the Renaissance, Christians most often thought of it as a Christian heresy rather than a non-Christian religion. The religions of India, China, Japan, Africa, and America were effectively unknown until the sixteenth century; and Judaism, in spite of the many lively Jewish communities in Europe, was a topic of interest to Christians largely as a precursor to Christianity, a praeparatio evangelica. So Christians rarely, if ever, thought of Christianity as one religion among many: the idea that there is a type called “religion” of which there are many tokens did not gain much currency until the sixteenth century. It is mostly a modern invention.

Insofar as there was a standard use of religio in Europe between the effective end of Roman hegemony in the fifth century and the cataclysm of the Reformation in the sixteenth, it was to denote the activities and members of the monastic orders. These were typically called “religious orders,” and their members were simply “the religious.” This usage has survived, in somewhat attenuated form, in the Catholic Church, where it is possible still to hear people speak of “the religious life” and mean by it life within a vowed monastic order.

Modern (post-Reformation) understandings of religion differ from these premodern uses most dramatically in that they see religion exactly as a type of which there are many tokens. One influence upon the acceptance of this idea was the pressing necessity in the seventeenth century to create political forms of life in Europe that could peacefully accommodate a wide variety of Christian groups. These groups had incompatible understandings of what it means to be a Christian, and often a deep hatred of one another. The Thirty Years’ War in Europe (1618–48) and the Civil War in England (1642–48), in which such differences showed themselves clearly in large-scale and long-lived violence, made it clear that the political forms that had served Europe fairly well for the preceding millennium would no longer do. Any new ones would have to find a way of dealing with the violent splintering of Christendom brought about by the Reformation.

The political solutions that emerged were of two kinds. The first affirmed the idea that a sovereign state could and should accommodate only one Christian group, and that one’s religion (now it began commonly to be called that) should therefore be determined by geography, by where one happened to live. Calvin’s Geneva provides one instance of this solution, as does the English settlement of 1688. Both use the idea that there are many religions, and that the state should establish and give special privileges to one among them. The second kind of political resolution preferred the idea that the state should be neutral with respect to religion (which usually meant neutral with respect to the various brands of Protestant Christianity; Jews and Catholics were typically beyond the pale, and Buddhists and Muslims did not enter into consideration). The passage of the First Amendment to the American Constitution in 1791 provides a paradigm here. This second kind of political resolution, like the first, required (usually in quite explicit terms) the view that religion is a type with many tokens—although in all these cases “religion” had Protestant Christianity as its ideal type.

But it was not only the division of Christianity into many different and often warring “religions” in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that contributed to the idea that religion is a type with many tokens. Almost equally important was the vast increase in European knowledge of the history, languages, and practices of non-European civilizations. Beginning in the fifteenth century (and increasing almost exponentially in the sixteenth and seventeenth), reports of the habits and practices of the Indians, the Chinese, the Japanese, and the inhabitants of Meso-America began to be available to the literati of Europe. Among these early reports, Catholic missionaries wrote the most extensive ones for the use of the church in its efforts to propagate itself. But these (p 674) were soon followed by work sponsored by the European states with interests in empire-building, first the Portuguese, Spanish, and Dutch, and later the English and French. By the seventeenth century, grammars and lexicons of hitherto exotic and unknown languages (Sanskrit, Chinese) began to become available, and throughout the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries works in these languages were translated in ever-increasing numbers into those of Europe.

Much of the information gathered in these ways seemed to European intellectuals, Christian and otherwise, to reveal forms of life and patterns of belief both deeply like and importantly unlike Christian forms and patterns. The Indians wrote hymns and prayers to many gods, and they seemed to worship images and statues of them; the Chinese had temples, sacred works, and a highly developed ritual system; and so on. It began to seem natural to European historians, philosophers, and theologians to think of these forms of life as the religions of India and China, and also to think of Christianity as the religion of Europe. Nicholas of Cusa in the fifteenth century is perhaps the first Christian thinker to approach this view. It was then not difficult to move to the more abstract theoretical view that there is a type called religion of which there are many tokens. This was effectively the standard position among Christians by the eighteenth century.

But here again “religion” meant “things like (mostly Protestant) Christianity.” The likeness often became quite strained. Yet the controlling power of the paradigm case can be seen clearly in the endless nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century debates about whether such things as Buddhism (no God?) or State Shinto (the Japanese Emperor as God and no theology?) are really religions—for they really are not much like Christianity. Such resolutely anti-Christian figures as David Hume (in the Natural History of Religion, 1757) or quasi-Christian thinkers as Immanuel Kant (in Religion within the Bounds of Reason Alone, 1793) and G. W. F. Hegel (in Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion, first delivered in 1821) analyzed “religion.” Yet they did so by a process of abstraction from features of Protestant Christianity.

Contemporary Difficulties about “Religion”

“Religion,” as should now be evident, is a term of art fraught with difficulties. For non-Christians, and especially for those who must administer states whose public life is ordered around the idea that there is a multiplicity of religions, what is needed is an understanding of religion that will discriminate the religious from the nonreligious. This needs to be done without appealing only to the particulars of Christianity. This continues to prove exceedingly difficult, as a glance at U.S. Supreme Court rulings on the religion clauses of the First Amendment will abundantly show.

For scholars of religion, what is wanted is an understanding of religion that is theologically neutral, and that will nonetheless be sufficiently substantive and interesting to make possible the development of an intellectual discipline. The historian of religion Jonathan Z. Smith puts the matter clearly: “ ‘Religion,’ ” he writes, “is not a native term; it is a term created by scholars for their intellectual purposes and therefore is theirs to define. It is a second-order generic concept that plays the same role in establishing a disciplinary horizon that a concept such as ‘language’ plays in linguistics or ‘culture’ plays in anthropology. There can be no disciplined study of religion without such a horizon” (281–82). Smith might have added, though he does not, that such a horizon is, as a matter of fact, largely lacking. Its lack explains why the scholarly study of religion shows one of two tendencies: to slip back into theology, which it was founded to avoid; or to devolve into anthropology and cultural studies.

For Christians, too, the term is deeply problematic. Thinking of Christianity as a religion almost inescapably tends, given the history just sketched, to carry with it the implication that Christianity is a species of a genus. Hence, this also implies that it is in some significant respects on a par with other “religions” such as Islam or Buddhism. This claim is rightly seen by many Christians as an offense against Christianity’s self-understanding as a sui generis phenomenon. They count themselves as the community of those gathered in public worship of the triune God, responsive in their worship to the incarnation, death, and resurrection of the Second Person of that triune God as Jesus the Christ. On this view what is significant about Christianity is not what it shares with the religions (in most of the ordinary understandings of that term), but precisely what it does not. One version of this point can be seen in John Wycliffe’s fourteenth-century objections to calling Christianity a religion (discussed in Despland 139–42). A more sophisticated one is argued by Karl Barth in his Church Dogmatics, who identifies religion (and Christianity insofar as it is a religion) with human piety. He opposes piety to God’s revelatory action, which has picked out the Christian religion (and perhaps also its (p 675) Jewish progenitor) for transfiguration into truth, but which has done so not because but in spite of Christianity’s religiosity..

Given all these difficulties, it may reasonably be doubted that a concept of religion usable for Christian thought can be salvaged. One is scarcely needed for biblical exegesis, and its introduction into Christian theological thought tends to create more problems than it solves. The usual premodern antonym of religio is superstitio (and its close relative, impietas). On this understanding, there are not many religions: there is only (true) religion and its simulacra, which are all characterized by superstitious impieties of various kinds. This is likely to prove a more productive understanding for Christian thought than the problematic modern synthesis. It leaves open and in fact makes pressing the vital question of whether the church’s worship is the only place piety is to be found. And it offers for consideration, as well, the even more fundamental question of how much of what the church itself does is true religion.

Bibliography

Augustine. De vera religione/On True Religion. Composed in the 380s, trans. J. H. S. Burleigh. LCC 6. Westminster, 1953; Barth, K. “God’s Revelation as the Sublation of Religion.” Section 17 (in part I/2) of Church Dogmatics, trans. G. Bromiley. T&T Clark, 1982; Cicero. De natura deorum/On the Nature of the Gods, ed. and trans. H. Rackham. LCL 268. Harvard University Press, 1994; Crawford, R. What Is Religion? Routledge, 2002; Despland, M. La religion en Occident. Éditions Fides, 1979. Gothóni, R. “Religio and Superstitio Reconsidered.” Archiv für Religionspsychologie 21 (1994): 37–46; Harrison, P. “Religion” and the Religions in the English Enlightenment. Cambridge University Press, 1990; Hegel, G. W. F. Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion. First delivered in 1821. Translated (from the 1827 version) by R. F. Brown et al., as Hegel: Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion. University of California Press, 1988; Hume, D. The Natural History of Religion. 1757. In Hume, Four Dissertations. Thoemmes, 1995 (facsimile ed. of the first printing); Kant, I. Religion within the Bounds of Mere Reason. 1793, trans. G. di Giovanni (from the 1794 ed.), in Immanuel Kant: Religion and Rational Theology. Cambridge University Press, 1996; Lash, N. The Beginning and the End of “Religion.” Cambridge University Press, 1996; Nicholas of Cusa. De pace fidei/The Peace of Faith. Composed in 1453, trans. J. Hopkins. In Nicholas of Cusa’s De pace fidei and Cribratio Alkorani. 2d ed. Banning Press, 1994; Smith, J. “Religion, Religions, Religious.” Pages 269–84 in Critical Terms for Religious Studies, ed. M. C. Taylor. University of Chicago Press, 1998;

Resurrection Narratives

Each of the four canonical Gospels (though not, significantly, the various noncanonical writings sometimes called “gospels,” such as Thomas) concludes with stories about the discovery of the empty tomb and of Jesus’ appearances to his followers. There is also a brief further mention at the start of Acts, and a summary statement, which must be seen in parallel with the other accounts, in 1 Cor. 15:3–8. These stories possess certain features making it more or less certain that, though they were written down as part of the Gospels a generation or so after the events, they are not late inventions. Instead, they likely go back largely unaltered, apart from a light editorial touch, to the quite early oral memory of the first disciples.

First, the portrait of Jesus is extraordinary and unprecedented. Despite the strong background presence of Dan. 12:3, Jesus is not described as “shining like a star,” but appears initially as an ordinary human being. However, even in those accounts (especially in Luke and John), which insist that he is real, physical, and capable of being touched, breaking bread, cooking breakfast, and eating fish, there is something strange about him. He is not immediately recognized; he can come and go at will through locked doors; he vanishes into thin air, and finally ascends into heaven.

Second, the stories are remarkably free of OT quotation, allusion, and echo. Whereas the accounts of Jesus’ entry into Jerusalem through to his death are full of interpretative biblical material, the resurrection stories are almost entirely empty of it. They read not as narratives that have been mulled over in the light of sustained scriptural reflection (which was already sophisticated by Paul’s day) but as breathless and unreflective.

Third, nobody inventing such stories would have allowed women pride of place, since women were not regarded as credible witnesses in that world. The formal, stylized account in 1 Cor. 15 has carefully removed them.

Fourth, in all other early Christian writings (and a good deal of later liturgy and hymnody), the connection is regularly made between Jesus’ resurrection and that of Christians. But the resurrection narratives themselves never mention this. Instead, they emphasize that a new stage has opened in God’s purposes, which the disciples must carry forward.

All this means that the stories are to be taken seriously as extremely early memories of what (p 676) happened at Easter. They make sense as the origin of the later, developed theology we find in Paul and elsewhere. But they cannot be explained as the back-projection of such developed thought—not least because all four accounts share all these features while being extremely unlike in other ways, so as to make it difficult to reconstruct the detail of the events. Even when they tell the same story, there is remarkably little overlap of words. The authors had certainly not colluded in making up a story and sticking to it.

The question of how the present narratives came to be written has become bogged down in the debate as to whether the stories of the empty tomb and those of the appearances of Jesus can be separated, and if so, whether one is primary and the other secondary and separate. Various theories have been advanced as to how the accounts might have grown up in response to needs and beliefs in the church. However, historical investigation of the rise of resurrection belief indicates that both the empty tomb and the appearances were necessary for that belief to begin and to be sustained. If the tomb had been found empty but Jesus had not appeared, it would have been assumed that someone had taken the body. If people had reported appearances of Jesus but his body had still been in the tomb, the disciples would have believed they had seen a ghost or a vision, such things being well known in their world. Only the combination—missing body plus appearing Jesus—would produce the early Christian belief. This makes it intrinsically unlikely that the stories would have developed with only one of these elements, and the other one becoming attached at a later stage.

Mark's resurrection account has almost certainly been cut short. Many have argued that he did indeed conclude his Gospel at 16:8, but there are good reasons to suppose that it originally continued beyond that (vv. 9–20 as we now have them are later attempts to fill in the gap). Mark has repeatedly stressed that Jesus will die and be raised; now, after a chapter on Jesus' death, he has written a chapter on the resurrection, of which we only have the first part.

Matthew's account (whose ending may perhaps reflect what stood originally in Mark) has the disciples go to Galilee, where they meet Jesus on a mountain and are commissioned to be witnesses of his rule on earth and in heaven.

Luke's account highlights the incomparable story of the disciples on the road to Emmaus, whose hearts burn within them while Jesus, incognito, expounds the Scriptures to them. Then they recognize him as he breaks bread. Luke's story, continuing in Acts, has Jesus commission the disciples to be his witnesses in all the world, in the power of the Spirit.

John 20 corresponds broadly to these, emphasizing that Easter is the first day of the week (20:1, 19) and hence the beginning of the new creation. The disciples are to share in this new creation by being equipped with the Spirit and sent into the world as Jesus was sent to Israel (20:19–22). There are vivid portraits of Jesus' meeting with Mary Magdalene and Thomas. In John 21, it is Peter's turn, with a lengthy exchange in which Jesus both forgives and recommissions Peter following his triple denial.

In all these stories, different though they are, the emphasis is the same. With Easter, God's new creation has begun; Jesus' followers are to be its agents, not merely its beneficiaries. The stories, clearly and often artlessly recounting the extraordinary memories of the first Easter itself, are told in such a way as to lay the foundation for the continuing witness and life of the church.

Bibliography

Alsup, J. The Post-Resurrection Stories of the Gospel Tradition. Calwer, 1975; Catchpole, D. Resurrection People. Darton, Longman & Todd, 2000; Dodd, C. H. "The Appearances of the Risen Christ." Pages 9–35 in Studies in the Gospels, ed. D. E. Nineham. Blackwell, 1967; Evans, C. F. Resurrection and the New Testament. SCM, 1970; Fuller, R. H. The Formation of the Resurrection Narratives. Macmillan, 1971; Lüdemann, G. The Resurrection of Jesus. SCM, 1994; McDonald, J. I. H. The Resurrection. SPCK, 1989; Moule, C. F. D., ed. The Significance of the Message of the Resurrection for Faith in Jesus Christ. SCM, 1968; Wright, N. T. The Resurrection of the Son of God. Fortress, 2003.

N. T. Wright

Resurrection of the Dead

In ancient pagan or Jewish thought, "resurrection" was never a synonym (as it often is today) for "life after death." It always denoted the idea that people once dead could subsequently be raised to new bodily life. This was regarded as ridiculous in ancient worldviews, as in modern ones. From Homer and Aeschylus to Plato and Pliny, pagan writers glanced at the idea, only to dismiss it with scorn. The discovery that dead people stay dead was not an achievement of modern science.

But in Second Temple Judaism, something different happened. Key passages like Dan. 12 and 2 Macc. 7, written in a context of persecution and martyrdom, built on the older celebration of Yahweh as Creator and Judge, and on ancient (p 677) Israel's insistence on the essential goodness of the material universe. Thereby they affirmed that all the dead, and especially those who had died in loyalty to God and his law, would be raised again. Since this belief encouraged zealous resistance to tyranny, it is not surprising that it was embraced and expounded by the Pharisees, a popular-level pressure-group insisting on law-based reforms. It was rejected by the Sadducees, the Jerusalem-based aristocracy. The rabbis (successors to the Pharisees) continued to discuss the coming resurrection as part of their vision of the promised “age to come.”

Belief in resurrection, though, was not a major element in their thinking—just as Jesus himself did not say much about it, with only occasional mentions in the Gospels apart from the one head-on discussion with the Sadducees (Mark 12:18–27 et par.). Nor is it clear within Jewish thought whether resurrection will mean a return to a body identical with the present one, or transformation into something different (a shining star, for instance). In these and other respects, the early Christian belief in resurrection marked a significant mutation in the Jewish belief.

Resurrection took center stage and would involve the transformation of the present body into a new type of physicality, incapable of corruption (and hence immortal; “immortality” need not mean, and as used in 1 Cor. 15:52–54 does not mean, “disembodied immortality”). Moreover, “resurrection” was no longer simply a large-scale, last-minute future event. It had already happened in one instance, that of Jesus himself, an event to be repeated at the last for all his people (1 Cor. 15:23).

The early Christian belief in future resurrection, then, was based on Jesus’ own resurrection, which they rightly saw as an event within history, bringing to birth God’s future world in advance of its full appearing. Paul drew out the significance of this, not least in terms of the renewal and redemption of the entire cosmos (Rom. 8:18–25). He understood baptism in terms of dying and rising with Christ, so that the Christian ethic consists not of rule-keeping from within the old creation, but of learning in the present to live the life that will characterize God’s new creation (6:1–11; 1 Cor. 6:12–20).

All this generates a view of the ultimate future with which the church has struggled to come to terms. The early fathers insisted on the bodiliness of the future life over against the spiritualizations of dualistic Gnosticism. Resurrection posed a threat to paganism, not least to empire, a threat that Gnosticism toned down completely. Resurrection, and the consequent theology and spirituality, have remained central in the Eastern Orthodox churches.

But in the Roman Catholic West, and in the churches of the Reformation, resurrection ceased to play a major role. Great theologians like Bernard, Thomas Aquinas, Luther, and Calvin all emphasized the bodily resurrection of Jesus and the future resurrection of believers. But the massive emphasis on Jesus’ death as the means of salvation, and the spirituality of passion-devotion that it engendered, pushed resurrection out of the frame. The development of an “equal and opposite” view of heaven and hell made it difficult to see what ultimate bodily resurrection might mean. What we miss in this period is the robust NT sense of renewed heavens and earth, of God's kingdom coming, and of Jesus' saving sovereignty being exercised, not in a remote "heaven," but throughout the whole creation. In this situation, the Deism of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and the skepticism of the Enlightenment began to suggest that Jesus' bodily resurrection had never happened, and that the future resurrection of believers was simply a metaphor for some kind of spiritual survival. Thus, the church found it difficult to do more than capitulate (in its liberal mode) or proceed with shrill reaffirmations unconnected to the central matters of the faith (in its conservative mode). In both cases the church failed to see how resurrection itself challenges the very split between faith and reality that has been endemic in post-Enlightenment worldviews, including those of much Western Christianity.

But then came renewed historical investigation of Jesus' own resurrection, and the reappropriation of the theology that the NT writers developed around it. This opened the way for the church to speak of God's ultimate future for his people in terms, not of "going to heaven," but of the two-stage future that first-century Jews would have assumed. Except for those still alive at the Lord's return, those who die go to be "with Christ," in a state of conscious and blissful rest (Luke 23:43; John 14:2–3; Phil. 1:23). But when the Lord reappears, joining heaven and earth into one, the dead will be given new bodies like the one he already has (Rom. 8:11; Phil. 3:20–21).

The hope for the resurrection of the dead is thus to be distinguished from the normal language about "life after death"; it denotes, instead, a new bodily life after "life after death." The fact that most Western Christians are unaware of this (p 678) indicates a serious weakness in the biblical formation of the modern church, which has corollaries in the difficulties often felt in imitating the early church's integration of faith and public life. Resurrection is about the Creator God reclaiming, judging, and renewing the created world. The Christian who believes in resurrection should also believe that working for God's kingdom in the present is therefore "not in vain" (1 Cor. 15:58).

Bibliography

Avemarie, F., and H. Lichtenburger, eds. Auferstehung—Resurrection. WUNT 135. Mohr, 2001; Bieringer, R., et al., eds. Resurrection in the New Testament. Peeters, 2002; Bynum, C. The Resurrection of the Body in Western Christianity, 200–1336. Columbia University Press, 1995; Davis, S. T., et al., eds. The Resurrection. Oxford University Press, 1997; Lapide, P. The Resurrection of Jesus. Augsburg, 1983; Longenecker, R., ed. Life in the Face of Death. Eerdmans, 1998; Moule, C. F. D., ed. The Significance of the Message of the Resurrection for Faith in Jesus Christ. SCM, 1968; O'Collins, G. Easter Faith. Darton, Longman & Todd, 2003; O'Donovan, O. Resurrection and Moral Order. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1994; Perkins, P. Resurrection. Doubleday, 1984; Porter, S., et al., eds. Resurrection. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Segal, A. Life after Death. Doubleday, 2004; Torrance, T. F. Space, Time, and Resurrection. Handsel Press, 1976; Williams, R. Resurrection. Darton, Longman & Todd, 1982; Wright, N. T. The Resurrection of the Son of God. Fortress, 2003.

N. T. Wright

Revelation

The word “revelation” can be used in a variety of ordinary, biblical, and theological senses. As a comprehensive theological category, “revelation” covers a variety of phenomena that we encounter in Scripture. There is divine speech and there are mighty acts of God in history; there is theophany, dream, prophecy, revelation in nature, revelation in Christ, the revelation of the gospel, and eschatological manifestation. This is neither an exhaustive nor an ordered account. It involves concepts that may deeply interlock or that are relatively separate. The concepts may be on the scriptural surface or the product of our broader theological construction; they may or may not be correlated with specific Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek words, whose semantic ranges may or may not be close to each other. A cluster of things in Scripture, therefore, can be put under the rubric of “revelation.” They are held together by the biblical claim that there is a God who has personally communicated with humanity, and this warrants talk of revelation in a comprehensive way.

“Communication” suggests speech, but the overarching concept of revelation that emerges from the biblical account includes action also in the sense of deeds. (Speech is a form of action, of course, and the point may be particularly important to make in relation to God, but I am distinguishing them familiarly for our purposes.) As regards the connection between speech and revelation, there is some analogy with human agency. In speech, humans disclose or reveal things, which may include facts unknown or unknowable in any other way. There can also be direct or indirect disclosure of one's identity or character. All this applies to God. Two things are peculiar in this case. First, since God is not accessible to the empirical senses in the way that humans are, particular importance attaches to the revelation that God is and who God is. Second, what God reveals is of unsurpassed and unsurpassable significance for everyone without exception, since the nature, purpose, and destiny of humankind is at stake, and salvation is at issue.

In reporting divine speech, the OT generally neither analyzes the concept nor even describes the experience underlying the predication. The experience may occasionally be similar to or even identical with the physical hearing of a physical voice, but there is no reason to assume that it is always or normally like this. Rather, there appears to be an inner conviction that God has spoken, an inward hearing, or a dream or vision in which the impression is unmistakably conveyed. Despite some disanalogies here with normal human experience of interhuman communication, the analogy between divine speech and human speech holds in relation to the concept of revelation—both are, or can be, its media.

It may be harder to apply analogy in the case of divine action. Human action can be described in a variety of ways, such as according to its external and manifest aspect or according to its scientifically precise physiological mechanism. Divine action is also known in its external, apparent aspect, but Scripture does not probe its ontological mode. This also applies to speech; however, the range of things covered by divine “action” appears greater. Scripture may not consistently distinguish, for example, between providential and miraculous activity. But there is a manifest difference between the external aspect of the action involved when God providentially gives children (which can apparently be described in purely natural terms) and when water is miraculously turned into wine (which apparently cannot). Extraordinary action is itself of different kinds. It may be explained in (p 679) terms that defy natural explanation or in terms of “coincidence” (the Israelites are able to cross the Red Sea on account of an unusual, but partially scientifically explicable occurrence, the rising of a mighty east wind). So divine action appears to be more varied in its outward aspects than divine speech, and analogy with human action is looser.

How exactly does revelation enter into this? Divine action, as well as divine speech, can be revelatory. Roughly speaking, acts take on a revelatory character when they are interpreted by the word of God. And belief that a divine word has been spoken is warranted by the concomitant act. The relations of word and event form a nexus of revelation. This pattern, established in the OT, is broadly maintained in the NT. It applies in the case of both the ordinary and the extraordinary event. The crucifixion of Jesus can be called an ordinary event, but its significance is ultimately revealed, so that God’s action in Christ is revealed. Resurrection is an extraordinary event per se, but its significance is unintelligible apart from the apostolic word that interprets it, so that it becomes a revelation of divine power.

Of the many questions that arise in connection with our broad concept of revelation, two in particular can be selected for comment, on account of their theological significance. The first concerns the centrality of Christ and of Christology. Karl Barth, whose influence on discussion of revelation (as of much else) has been so massive upon modern theology, appeared to rule out sources of revelation outside Christ, though this move was fundamentally integrated into, not separated from, a theology that gave centrality to Trinity, pneumatology, and Scripture. Irrespective of how we interpret Barth himself, the question of the relation of special revelation (in Christ or Scripture) to general revelation (in nature, by reason, or through religious experience) is hard to adjudicate in a short compass. If we may and should speak of a general revelation, it does not necessarily follow that we can construct a whole natural theology on its basis. And if we may and should speak of the possibility of salvation outside the explicit knowledge of God in Christ, it does not necessarily follow that this is because general revelation abounds.

Talk of revelation and talk of salvation are, in fact, inextricably connected. Oscar Cullmann, for example, in Christ and Time, did not want to distinguish significantly between Heilsgeschichte (salvation history) and Offenbarungsgeschichte (the history of revelation). These themes dominate the Gospel accounts of Jesus Christ, which lie at the center of the entire biblical narrative. This story conveys the public aspect of revelation. When Jesus pronounced blessed those “who have not seen and yet have believed” (John 20:29), he was not denigrating the importance of the empirical, nor of the empirical as the medium of revelation. He was attending to the fact that the generation of eyewitnesses will pass away, not suggesting that faith is not grounded in what that generation saw. Inasmuch as reason is implicated in seeing, hearing, and judging, revelation and faith are not set in opposition or in sharp contrast to reason.

In another respect, revelation is not public. Early in 1 Corinthians Paul makes the point with force. From the subjective point of view, the Spirit illuminates the believer, revealing the things of God; in the wider NT context, he reveals Christ. So a theological interpretation of Scripture compels us to distinguish roughly between the grounds for believing and the causes of conviction. The public aspect of revelation through Christ provides grounds for believing that are within the objective capacity of human reason to apprehend—this is the significance of the empirical emphasis in the Gospel reports. But the cause of personal conviction and certainty lies in the operation of the Spirit of God—he testifies to Christ, who is the revealer.

The second question concerns the connection between revelation and the scriptural text. The issues here are too many to enumerate, let alone to allow comment. From questions of canon, church, and tradition, arising in the patristic era, to questions of speech and writing, text and language, in postmodernity; from Enlightenment questions about faith and history to contemporary questions about discourses of truth and power—we are faced with the question of this connection. The massive shadow of the issue of hermeneutics, whose subject matter expanded particularly after the work of Schleiermacher in the early nineteenth century, is cast over the whole. That the broad question of revelation is somehow at the heart of all these issues shows its multidimensionality.

It is evident that Scripture bears witness to revelation. But we must go further than this. The word spoken by God to the prophets, for example, was transmitted in writing because its content was of divine, not human, origin and was revealed. From the perspective of the Bible itself, the text can and should be regarded as the word of God. Whether the Bible as a whole is to be considered (p 680) the word of God, and what we should make of ecclesiastical disagreements on what constitutes the Bible, are further questions. But the spoken word of God can be textually inscribed and enjoy in salient respects the same status of revelation, even when its originating accompaniments have disappeared. Indeed, speech and prophecy are just examples of revelation; the Pauline ascription of inspiration to Scripture (2 Tim. 3:16) offers a more comprehensive connection between revelation and text, however we interpret the notion of inspiration in detail.

Does it make conceptual sense to speak of revelation contained in a text with an objective and perspicuous meaning? It does. Objective meaning is not exhaustive meaning, as though all the meaningful layers and ramifications must be captured in the act of truly understanding a text. Rather, to ascribe objective meaning to the biblical text qua revelation is to say that an agent (God or prophet or scribe) intended to convey something determinate, disclosed by revelation. Perspicuity is logically assignable to textual meaning, though the relation of word and Spirit has to be teased out. The Bible invites us to connect revelation and text closely, and all we do here is to note the conceptual possibilities.

The theological discussion of revelation is completely unbalanced unless it keeps two connected things in view. First, the root of the matter is the conviction that God is to be conceived of as a personal agent. Jesus is the exegesis of that claim. His appearance confirms the fact that the personal attributes predicated of Yahweh in the OT are not personified ways of speaking of a deity who is unknowable or who is not personal in any sense remotely analogous to our own personal being. These ways of speaking may be literal, anthropomorphic, or metaphorical; Christian theologians have embarked on cataphatic and apophatic approaches to knowledge of and speech about God. However we elucidate matters, the Son reveals the nature of God as personal in terms of his character and ways, not the metaphysics of his form. Incarnation is the definitive disclosure of the personal reality of God; in that respect, incarnation is the heart of revelation.

Second, revelation aims not only at intellectual response or cognitive acknowledgment, but also at personal repentance and transformation. The broad line of a biblical theological anthropology is that active will and understanding, which are mutually conditioning, are rooted in the profound religious affection or disaffection of the heart. Both the disposition to obey and the exercise of obedience can be conditions of receiving disclosure (John 14:21). As John Baillie put it: “In the last resort the determining conditions of religious belief are moral conditions” (363), although “moral” is perhaps too weak a word here to describe our basic orientation. Revelation is a divine initiative in the sphere of interpersonal relations, and as such is ultimately ordered to the achievement of communion, not to the imparting of information. See also Analogy; Anthropomorphism; God, Doctrine of; Scripture, Authority of

Bibliography

Baillie, J. The Interpretation of Religion. Scribner, 1928; Barr, J. The Bible in the Modern World. SCM, 1973; idem. Biblical Faith and Natural Theology. Oxford University Press, 1993; idem. Old and New in Interpretation. SCM, 1966; Barth, K. Church Dogmatics Vol. I/1. T&T Clark, 1975; idem. Vol. I/2. T&T Clark, 1956; Fackre, G. The Doctrine of Revelation. Edinburgh University Press, 1997; Gunton, C. A Brief Theology of Revelation. T&T Clark, 1995; Jensen, P. The Revelation of God. InterVarsity, 2002; Pannenberg, W. Systematic Theology. Vol. 1. T&T Clark, 1991; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Stephen N. Williams

Revelation, Book of
 (“The Apocalypse of Saint John the Divine”)

Revelation and the Canon

The Christian Bible concludes with an apocalypse, but like Waterloo, the victory of this “last battle” was a close run. The vicissitudes of the canonization of John’s Apocalypse were related to three linked factors, (1) its authorship, (2) its tendency to inspire millennialist fervor, and (3) the question of how this strange vision fits into the NT. The Apocalypse is atypical in that, having achieved recognition as Sacred Scripture, it did not retain it, remaining peripheral to the Western canon until the late fourth century and being ejected from the Eastern canon until the fourteenth century.

An early-second-century Bishop of Hieropolis, Papias, thought the apostle John wrote the Fourth Gospel, (First) Epistle (of John), and Revelation. Irenaeus believed Papias to have been a “hearer of John and a friend of Polycarp,” who had also known John. On Papias’s say-so, Irenaeus considered Revelation and John’s Gospel as artifacts of the same personality. Justin Martyr (ca. 100–ca. 165) also thought Revelation was apostolic. The primitive church used two other apocalypses, the Shepherd of Hermas and the Apocalypse of (p 681)Peter. The Muratorian Canon/Fragment (ca. 170) describes the author of Revelation as Paul’s “predecessor,” identifying him with the “eyewitness and hearer” who wrote the Gospel. It rejects the Shepherd as written “recently” and accepts “the apocalypses of John and Peter, though some of us are not willing that the latter be read in church.”

Thirty years later, when Montanists turned to the Apocalypse for scriptural legitimation, their opponents discredited the apocalypticism of this Phrygian sect by disparaging the authorship of their favored text. In about 200, a Roman presbyter named Gaius attributed the Apocalypse to the Gnostic Cerinthus because of its teaching a “millennial” (thousand-year) worldly kingdom. Writing around 247, Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, contended that its stylistic differences from the Fourth Gospel, and its bad Greek, indicate that John the Presbyter wrote it, not John the Evangelist. Eusebius of Caesarea (ca. 260–ca. 339) quotes Dionysius’s queries in salacious detail. Eusebius undermines the evidence for Papias’s acquaintance with John the Evangelist-Apostle. He describes Papias as “a man of very little intelligence,” who taught that “there will be a millennium after the resurrection of the dead, when the kingdom of Christ will be set up in material form on this earth” (Hist. eccl. 3.39).

The notion of an earthly millennial kingdom derives from Rev. 20:1–6, in which an angel seized the dragon/devil and “bound him for a thousand years. He threw him into the Abyss, and locked and sealed it over him.... After that, he must be set free for a short time. I saw thrones on which were seated those who had been given authority to judge. And I saw the souls of those who had been beheaded because of their testimony to Jesus.... They came to life and reigned with Jesus for a thousand years.... This is the first resurrection.” Those who share in the first resurrection “will be priests of God and of Christ and will reign with him for a thousand years.” Like his Montanist adversaries, Gaius the Presbyter read Revelation literally, but he found the implication that Christ will return to set up an earthly kingdom of a thousand years' duration ridiculous.

The manuscript of the Codex Sinaiticus, contemporary with Eusebius, contains Revelation. Cataloging the texts aspiring to canonical status under three headings—"Recognized," "Disputed," and "Spurious"—Eusebius puts Revelation into both first and second categories: "For, as I said, some reject it, but others count it among the Recognized Books" (Hist. eccl. 3.25). Eusebius's empiricism binds him to recording that Revelation was widely read in churches; the rationalist in him deprecated millennial enthusiasm.

Eusebius speaks highly of Gaius's reasoning powers. Gaius had asked rhetorically: What "good does" Revelation "do me when it tells me of seven angels and seven trumpets, or of four angels who are to be let loose at the river Euphrates?" Theologians made sense of such images by allegorizing them. The Egyptian bishop Nepos wrote a Refutation of the Allegorists, which claimed, according to his critical friend, Dionysius of Alexandria, "that there will be a kind of millennium on this earth devoted to bodily indulgence." Dionysius did not follow those who "rejected and altogether impugned" Revelation because of its literalist interpreters. He "should not dare to reject the book, since many brethren hold it in estimation... For although I do not understand it, yet I suspect that some deeper meaning underlies the words."

The Apocalypse fell under a cloud in the East. It was rejected by Cyril of Jerusalem and Gregory of Nazianzus, and accepted by other bishops, including Athanasius, whose Festival Letter of 367 lists the canonical books. Jerome observed in 414 that "if the usage of the Latins does not receive [Hebrews] among the canonical Scriptures, neither indeed by the same liberty do the churches of the Greeks receive the Revelation of John. And yet we receive both in that we follow ... the authority of ancient writers, who for the most part quote each of them ... as canonical and churchly."

The author of Revelation insists on his work's inspired character. He claims that "the Spirit" speaks through him to the church (2:7, 11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, 22; cf. 22:6; etc.), and concludes with an anathema seldom matched by any framer of canonical lists. "I warn everyone who hears the words of the prophecy of this book: If anyone adds to them, God will add to him the plagues described in this book. And if anyone takes words away from this book of prophecy, God will take from him his share in the tree of life and in the holy city, which are described in this book. He who testifies to these things says, 'Yes, I am coming soon.' Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!" (22:18–20; cf. the injunctions in Deuteronomy, last book in the Torah: 4:2; 12:32). As the only apocalypse to overcome ecclesiastical resistance to apocalypticism, Revelation must have resonated with ecclesiastical needs. Who wrote it mattered to primitive and patristic Christians because John-the-Gospel-writer stood foursquare within the church. Revelation was canonized once exegetes (p 682) were able to read it synoptically with the rest of Sacred Scripture. Theologians analyzed Revelation alongside apocalyptic sayings in other NT books and in Daniel. So, for example, although “antichrist” does not figure in the Apocalypse, its dragon (12:3), sea beast (13:1), and earth beast (13:11) have been cross-identified with the figure of the Johannine Epistles. Irenaeus, Augustine of Hippo, and Bede understood the lion, calf, man-faced beast, and eagle (4:7) to represent the authors of the four Gospels: conversely, the church sees itself in the Apocalypse when finding it to inform the whole Christian drama. It is “like an onion,” said Mr. Tumnus, “except that as you go in and in, each circle is larger than the last” (Lewis 169). Western medieval manuscripts of the Apocalypse were often prefaced by a pictorial biography of John, emphasizing its ecclesial origin. Although the linguistic asymmetries are an obstacle to joint authorship of Gospel and Apocalypse, the uncovering of realized eschatology in both texts harmonizes the Apocalypse with the Johannine corpus.

History of Interpretation

Distinguishing Eschatology and Apocalyptic. A fourth-century scribe wrote “A Revelation of John” at the head of his page, and added in the margin, tou theologou, “the theologian.” A successor copyist moved the words to center page; ever since, the author has been known as “John the theologian,” or “John the Divine” in the Authorized Version (KJV). Today, most scholars see both Gospel and Apocalypse as works of theology. The theology of Revelation flows into two elements of Christian thought, eschatological historiography and apocalyptic. Do the two overlap? To what extent should the promises and threats of the Apocalypse be taken as predicting history-like events? Is the End datable, and will the world to come have a chronology?

Irenaeus’s Against Heresies concludes with an apocalyptic vision of the kingdom of Christ on earth. The Irenaean apocalyptic is pictorial and “millennial”: “It is fitting,” he writes, “that the creation itself, being restored to its primeval condition, should without qualification be under the dominion of the righteous.” During Diocletian’s persecution, Victorinus read the Apocalypse in a historical and millenary sense, and took its “things that must shortly come to pass” (1:1 KJV) to show that the End was imminent.

Commenting on Daniel, Jerome forswore a historical eschaton: “The saints will in no wise have an earthly kingdom, but only a celestial one; thus must cease the fable of one thousand years.” In his Isaiah commentary, Jerome indicated why there was “much difference ... among men ... about the way in which John’s Apocalypse is to be understood”: “To take it according to the letter is to Judaize. If we treat it in a spiritual fashion, as it was written, we seem to contradict the views of many older authorities: Latins such as Tertullian, Victorinus, and Lactantius; Greeks such as Irenaeus, to pass over the others.” Jerome rewrote Victorinus’s commentary, saving Victorinus’s insight that the Apocalypse’s eschatology is realized recurrently throughout the history of the church. As Victorinus and Jerome have it, Revelation’s seven trumpets blew over the Babylonian Empire and will sound again; its dragon/antichrist depicts Roman emperors and emperors yet to come. The eternity seen in Revelation becomes always when it is reflected back into history.

Eusebius of Caesarea compared Constantine’s construction of the church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem to the promise of 21:2 that the heavenly Jerusalem will come down to earth. Did he contradict his own aversion to apocalyptic when he noted God’s historical design in the Christianizing of the Roman Empire? Only if we fail to distinguish eschatology, or the philosophy of history, from apocalypse, the ending of time. To do so, one must grapple with the fact that Revelation is a dualistic text. Steeped in OT prophecy, the author summed up his book’s symbolic battle in the two cities: Babylon, whoring after power, and Jerusalem, the eternal city. Augustine (354–430) interpreted Babylon and Jerusalem as the city of man and the city of God. He traced their passage through biblical, extrabiblical, and postbiblical history. Stating that “the kingdoms of men are established by divine providence,” Augustine saw God’s benevolent plan in the reigns of Constantine and Theodosius (5, preface; 25; 26). Postbiblical history is no emptier of theological design for Augustine than for Eusebius. But Augustine is able to put the eschatological philosophy of history that he draws out of Revelation, and its apocalyptic, on different planes. The first is concerned with the “six days” of creation, the ages of history from its origins to the end of time. Christ’s Incarnation inaugurated the sixth day in which humanity will live until the end of time. The second coming of Christ, which brings with it the “seventh day,” the “eternal Sabbath,” ruptures the temporal, numbered series. All history is eschatological, but the Apocalypse is transhistorical.

Augustine stigmatizes the millenarians’ pictorialization of the kingdom as a round of “material (p 683) feasts in which there will be so much to eat and drink that not only will those supplies keep within no bounds of moderation but will also exceed the limits even of incredibility” (20.7). The uncharacteristic stylistic clumsiness indicates that millennialist literalism affected the bishop of Hippo’s digestion much as it did that of the bishop of Caesarea.

The Donatist Tyconius (330–90) devised a Book of Rules for interpreting Scripture. These exegetical principles enabled him to demillennialize Donatist proof texts. Rule 1 says that Scripture references to “the Lord” sometimes indicate Christ, sometimes his ekklēsia-body. Tyconius argues that biblical references to the “coming of the Lord” can mean the advent of the church. Rule 4 states that references to individuals sometimes have a wider application. Augustine used Tyconius’s Rules. Applying rule 4 to the binding of the devil in Rev. 20, he finds that the devil will not be “thrown into the abyss” just once, but is constantly driven into the “abyss” of the hearts of the impious. Rule 5 regulates for a nonarithmetical reading of biblical statements about time. Tyconius had used it against a literal-temporal reading of the thousand-year kingdom. Augustine likewise advised against taking the “thousand years” as a countable series: he took them to symbolize “totality,” since multiples of ten produce a “solid figure,” such as a “cube” (ibid.).

Augustine takes the “first resurrection” of Rev. 20 to refer to baptism. He distinguishes this from the resurrection to judgment that will occur after the end of time. “It follows,” he says, “that the Church even now is the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of heaven. And so even now his saints reign with him, though not in the same way as they will then reign; and yet the tares do not reign with him, although they are growing in the Church side by side with the wheat.... Ultimately, those people reign with him who are in his kingdom in such a way that they themselves are his kingdom” (20.9). The “city of God” is not in the temporal future: the eternal Jerusalem is folded into the past and present church on earth. Nor is the kingdom a cosmic “place,” but rather a state of being: “they themselves are his kingdom.” By detaching apocalyptic from chronology, Augustine deterred Christians from seeing endings, such as that of the Roman Empire, as signs of the End. Apocalyptic is more elusive than the philosophy of history, for Augustine: Constantine is part of God’s providence; the present-day church is and is not the kingdom of the saints.

Both the North African bishop of Justiniapolis, Primasius (540s), who knew Victorinus-Jerome’s commentary, and the Spanish Beatus of Liébanus (c. 780) treat Revelation as a book about Christ and the church. Where Primasius relates the woman giving birth (12:2) to the Virgin Mary, Beatus identifies her with a feminine Ekklesia. Beatus initiates a line of commentarial cross-reference of Revelation to the Song of Songs. Drawing on The Book of Rules and the commentaries of Jerome and Primasius, the Venerable Bede uses Tyconius's rule 1 to interleave Revelation and the Song. In his eighth-century Explanatio Apocalypsis, Bede states that it is the church that says, "I am dark and comely" (Song 1:5). For Bede, both the Song and Revelation are allegories of the church's mission. The woman in labor is "the Church, in a spiritual sense, bring[ing] forth those with whom it travails"; "she brought forth a man child" (12:5 KJV) means the church "ever" giving birth to Christ.

Bede notes that Tyconius's rule 6 concerns "recapitulation." Chronological "sequence" sometimes enfolds flashbacks to earlier events. Revelation does not progress in a straight line. After the seventh seal has been opened (8:1), Bede finds that "now he recapitulates from the beginning, as he is about to say the same things in another manner"; the "sequence" cycles around to begin again with the first of the seven trumpets (8:2).

Primasius had broken the text down into sections: (1) seven churches; (2) seven seals; (3) seven trumpets and the woman of Rev. 12; (4) beasts of land and sea, and seven bowls with seven plagues; (5) new heaven and earth. Such sectional divisions became standard. Bede read Revelation as the recurrent story of the "seven days" of history. He created seven sections within Revelation, adding two to Primasius's five by giving the woman's labor and conflict with the dragon its own section, and separating the fate of Babylon (Rev. 17:1–20:5; sec. 6) from the wedding of Jerusalem and the Lamb (chs. 21–22; sec. 7). For Bede, the sections of the book of Revelation are isomorphic with the divisions of time. He organizes the apocalypse into the sevenfold division of history. Although he quotes Augustine verbatim on Rev. 20, Bede smoothes the transition from eschatology to apocalypse. The Revelation commentaries of Charlemagne's court theologian, Alcuin (ca. 800), and Haimo (ca. 840) adopt Bede's septilinear periodization of history. Augustine's City of God inspired Charlemagne's desire that his empire would reflect the new Jerusalem. Medieval theologians were in line with Augustine (p 684) when Revelation informed their perception of history, as with Bede observing bad monks, heretics, and Arians in the four horses of Rev. 6:1–8. Reading the signs of the times providentially, or eschatologically, is Augustinian; reading history apocalyptically is not.

The Benedictine Berengaudus (840–92) builds on the sense of optimism that had accumulated within Western commentaries on Revelation. His Expositio super septem visiones libri Apocalypsis connects the Lamb of Rev. 5–7 and 21:9 with John the Baptist’s “Behold, the Lamb of God” in John 1:29 (RSV). John continues, “Happy are those who are called to his supper” (Rev. 19:9 AT). For Berengaudus, Revelation is a vision of the marriage feast of the Lamb and his Ekklēsia. He downplays its conflictual element to the extent of reading the four horses of Rev. 6 as figures of “the Lord,” rather than harbingers of the devil. Writing in the reign of Charles the Bald, Berengaudus positions the “persecutions” of Rev. 16 in the past; nowadays, he notes, emperors promote true worship.

A tenth-century Spanish illuminated copy of Beatus of Liébanus’s commentary states: “I have depicted the wonderful words of the story in sequence, so that those who know of them will be terrified by the events of the future judgment.” Revelation 3:12 promises, “Him who overcomes I will make a pillar in the temple of my God.” Following Bede, Berengaudus read Rev. 3:12 as a reminder that “the heavenly [city], ... unlike the old, is not built of stones but is daily constructed by the saints.” He found that promise fulfilled in the present, in the Saint-City of Rev. 21. Medieval Christians walked into church under the statue of Christ in Judgment in the west porch, where the damned departed to the left, the saved to the right; thus, the worshipper entered paradise. Bernard Guinée remarked that “Paradise was the Christian’s country in the Middle Ages.” Their ecclesiastical interpretation of Revelation came quite naturally. The number of surviving illuminated copies of Berengaudus’s commentary shows how popular it was. Illustrated versions of his commentary on Revelation influenced the churches on the pilgrimage route to Compostella. Romanesque sculptures represent John’s elders in burlesque postures, in which scholars struggle to find Christian value. In the choir frieze at Marignac, the elders of Rev. 4 frolic naked with domesticated dragons. Derk Visser suggests that this is the expression of Revelation as read beside the Song of Songs, indicating a “medieval mind-set which saw salvation promised as reality believed,” and which “therefore focussed less on the Last Judgement than on the blessed life that came after.” Revelation’s marriage feast, already enjoyed at Mass, was the basis not of fearful predictions of antichrist, but of “utopian expectation” (Visser 182–83).

Apocalypse as History. Joachim of Fiore (1135–1202) described the Apocalypse as “the key of things past, the knowledge of things to come; the opening of what is sealed, the uncovering of what is hidden.” Joachim’s Expositio in Apocalysism is the most influential work of biblical exegesis of all time. Historians of ideas have traced its spore from the Spiritual Franciscans to Hitler’s Third Reich. The Calabrian hermit’s long lineage is paradoxical, in that he retrenched himself against the intellectual developments of his time. He was a visualizer of Scripture when the figural syntheses of the patristic era were giving way to the discursive analyses of the scholastic Summae.

At Easter of 1183, Joachim's efforts to penetrate Revelation were rewarded: "Suddenly something of the fullness of this book and of the entire harmony of the Old and New Testaments was perceived with clarity of understanding in my mind's eye" (Expositio). For Joachim, Revelation is the wheel within the wheels of history, as mapped out by the two Testaments. The "seven times" that Joachim discerned in OT and NT are recapitulated in the seven epochs he pictured in the Apocalypse. These "epochs" correspond to a linear sequence of events in world history, down to his own time. Most earlier exegetes had seen correspondences between past or present events and those described in Revelation. Joachim made a science of theological historiography, using Revelation to predict future events and persons: the Apocalypse "embraces the fullness of history" (Expositio). The seven epochs of Joachim's Apocalypse depict three sequential "states": the Status of the Father (Rev. 1:1–11:18), the Status of the Son (Rev. 11:19–19:21), and the Status of the Spirit (Rev. 20:1–10). The third age of grace would commence around 1200–1260. It will be an age of "Spiritual men," in which the "everlasting gospel" (Rev. 14:6) shall be preached by a suprainstitutional church. The Sabbath will come on this earth, after the defeat of antichrist, anticipating the descent of the new Jerusalem. Joachim's eighth era, eternity, melts into the seventh temporal epoch; eschatology and apocalyptic are effectively equated. The "third status of the Spirit" will not last a thousand years; Joachim was not technically a "millennialist."

(p 685) Joachim related Revelation's twin cities to Scripture scholars, the Babylonian, bestial-carnal exegetes, and Jerusalem's spiritual interpreters. The first wave of Joachimism, from the thirteenth to the sixteenth century, addressed itself to separating the carnal and the spiritual within the church. In his 1297 Apocalypse commentary, the Spiritual Franciscan Peter Olivi enlarged upon Joachim, adding a fiercer conception of antichrist, with whom Revelation's true witnesses would soon be embattled. Olivi spoke of "spiritual" and "carnal" churches. A cult of Spiritual Franciscanism, with a special devotion to Olivi, emerged in Languedoc. In 1326, Pope John XXII had Olivi's commentary condemned. After studying Olivi and the Apocalypse, the Franciscan John of Rupescissa predicted the coming of antichrist in 1366, followed by a thousand-year kingdom. He claimed the right to reject Augustinian amillennialism on the basis of an "intellectual vision," revealing to him the meaning of Rev. 16–20. Thomas Aquinas observed: “Although the state [status] of the New Testament in general is foreshadowed by the state of the Old, it does not follow that individuals correspond to individuals.... [This] would seem applicable to the statements of the Abbot Joachim” (Summa theologiae III, Q. 77, Art. 2, Reply Obj. 3). Yet Aquinas’s comment did not deter the spread of Pseudo-Joachimite prophecies, identifying antichrist with this and that emperor.

Joachimism inspired the fifteenth-century Bohemian Taborites, who rose in rebellion against the church’s leaders. The Taborites were the first “Rapturists,” expecting that, once the earth had been cleansed by massacre, the elect would soar into the sky to greet their Christ, whereupon the third age of grace would dawn on earth. Thomas Müntzer (1488–1525) picked up Joachimite apocalypticism on his travels in Bohemia. Preaching on Daniel before Duke John of Saxony, he advised: “Drive Christ’s enemies out from among the Elect.... The sword is necessary to exterminate them.... At the harvest-time one must pluck the weeds out of God’s vineyard.... The angels who are sharpening their sickles for that work are ... the ... servants of God.” In response to Luther’s Letter to the Princes of Saxony, Müntzer denoted the author as the beast and Babylonian whore of Revelation. Luther reserved such appellations for the pope—not necessarily a mark of apocalypticism, since “antichrist” had become a general term of abuse. The Anabaptist Hans Hut identified Müntzer and Heinrich Pfeiffer as the two witnesses of Rev. 11. Hut used Revelation as a calendar to date the last judgment (Pentecost, 1528). The Anabaptist “calendarizer” Melchior Hoffmann applied Revelation to the events of 1520–30. Faced with the millennialism of Thomas Müntzer and the Münster Anabaptists, Luther relegated Revelation to the outskirts of his German NT, complaining that “this writer recommends his own book much too highly and does not show Christ clearly.” Seventeenth-century Protestant theologians like Cocceius nonetheless understood prophecy, like that of Revelation, as future-related historiography. The “innocently licentious” English Ranters and Muggletonians inherited the myth of the Apocalypse as predicting a third age of the Spirit (Kermode).

Joachim of Fiore entrenched history in sacral patterns at a time when the human sciences were gaining a measure of secularity. His was an evolutionist history, conceiving the three “states” as three trees growing from one root. His Apocalypse exegesis flowered in the secular utopias of the Enlightenment. Joachim’s “three ages,” culminating in earthly fulfillment, return in Comte’s theological, metaphysical, and positivist “states”; in Hegel’s idea of a growth of freedom from oriental despotism, through the aristocratic Middle Ages, to modernity, in which all are free; and in the Marxist-Leninist triad of primitive communism, bourgeois society, and the classless Jerusalem of communism. Gaius the Roman Presbyter might feel that his hypothesis of the Gnostic Cerinthus fathering the Apocalypse has been verified by its ideological progeny.

Time Shall Be No More? In The End of All Things (1794), Kant commented aversely on the angel's pronouncement "that there shall be time no longer" (Rev. 10:6). "If we are to assume that this angel ... was crying nonsense, he must have meant that there shall be change no longer." This, Kant felt, is "a contradictory notion that revolts the imagination." Notwithstanding his pessimistic conception of human nature, Kant translated the Joachimite Apocalypse tradition into a "rational" belief in humanity's temporal progress. One strand of contemporary Apocalypse commentary shares the pessimism of the German philosopher, and the sense that Revelation must be about time. In the 1830s, John Nelson Darby created a premillennial, "dispensationalist" theology. Dispensationalist Apocalypse interpreters were in the late twentieth and early twenty-first century as widely consulted as astrologers, identifying modern politicians with the agents of Revelation, as in Hal Lindsey's The Late Great Planet Earth (1970). With the Gnostics, and in some sense with (p 686) Revelation, Darby had divided humanity in twain. He believed that once having been beamed up into heaven, the "heavenly church" would reign over the "earthly people"—left behind after the rapture. Tim LaHaye's Left Behind series is a fictional account of events occurring during the rapture/millennium; with forty million volumes in print, these are the best-selling Christian novels in history.

Some contemporary biblical scholars employ the notion of recapitulation to make sense of Revelation's nonsequential "narrative." David Barr finds "three one-act plays" in the text: (1) Christ's dictation of seven letters, (2) the Lamb's opening of the sealed book, and (3) the war between the dragon and the faithful, culminating in the triumph of bride over whore. This manifests the "three dimensions" of Christ's work—(1) the salvific/judgmental, (2) the enabling of worship, and (3) the overthrow of evil—"not three consecutive actions" (Barr, "Transformation").

The Message of Revelation

Pictorializers and Hearers. Historically, Revelation exegetes have tended either to pictorialize the text or to listen to it. Jacques Ellul claimed, "The apocalypticist is first of all a seer while the prophet is a hearer.... The apocalypticist also receives words, but he is first of all the one who sees the personages, the scenes, the scenario, the events” (21). Most narrative “pictorializers” see John’s visions as weaving God’s design for history down to its conclusion, thereby providing a “sense of an ending,” the rounded rationale of history. On the other hand, there are those for whom the “orality of the book is an essential element of its hermeneutic” (Barr, “Enactment”). This takes account of the fact that Revelation is more like a dream than a progressive story. Its agents and objects are not set on a single visual plane; it builds up expectations of order by taking the reader through numbered sequences, and then abruptly spins off rhythm into nightmare. The nonrepresentationalists receive the book as primarily a rendition of eternity, in which created past, present, and future are heard simultaneously, or polyphonically, in the voices of the liturgy before the throne of God. In the Messiah, Handel’s librettist integrated Revelation with the resurrection themes of biblical prophecy. Treated as a self-standing lyric, Revelation is a popular source of Christian rock music. Are its choral hymns the home key of the Apocalypse? Somewhere in the middle, between pictoralizations and hearings, stand nonrepresentational picturings, such as the surreal features of the medieval Last Judgments, or the conception of Rev. 14 in Jan van Eyck’s Adoration of the Lamb (1420s), its horizon of seven church buildings indicating past, present, and future time. When painters view eternity scenically, they eschew visual narrative. Is Revelation analogous to a movie, a visual narrative of time and its close, or is it using quasi-musical modes to render timelessness?

Since the eighteenth century the techniques of Western music have expressed temporal progression. The French composer Olivier Messiaen (1908–92) abandoned them, replacing counterpoint with heterophony, progressive development with symmetry, ordered change with repetition, and resolved diatonic chords with tritones. His first organ work, Le banquet céleste, opens with a chord of seven seconds’ duration. Messiaen inscribed the score: “He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him” (John 6:56). The piece evokes the participation of Christ’s eternity in time, in what the Catholic Messiaen believed to be the supratemporal sacrifice of the Mass. Messiaen’s Quartet for the End of Time (first performed in a German prison camp in performed in a German prison camp in 1941) is dedicated “in homage to the Angel of the Apocalypse, who raises his hand heavenwards saying: ‘There will be no more Time.’ ” The effects of this musical exegesis of the Apocalypse work against unilinear clock time, and in favor of multitemporality or timelessness. It lets us hear eternity as stasis and as playfulness.

Resurrection. Revelation teaches that the end point of history is cosmic catastrophe. In his first words to the narrator, Christ announces that he has defeated death (1:18). Each of the promises made by the resurrected Christ to the seven churches in Rev. 2–3 is about eternal life. The message of Revelation is resurrection. From the seven days of Gen. 1, createdness in the Bible signifies temporality. With the “new heaven and new earth” of Rev. 21, the created cosmos is lifted into eternity. Resurrection to eternal life is the transposition of temporal-created life into eternal-created life. Revelation’s apocalyptic fulfills rather than overthrows its eschatological philosophy of history. According to Aquinas, “The being of the creature cannot wholly come to an end”; “even if it is transient, the creature will never fall back into nothingness.” Revelation’s “new Jerusalem” is made from the precious stones of paradise; resurrection is the regaining to eternity of what was given in the Garden of Gen. 1–3. The “kings of the earth” will bring “their glory into” the new Jerusalem (21:24 RSV). Christ says, “Behold, (p 687) I make all things new” (21:5 RSV), not “Behold, I make a new set of things” (von Balthasar, 5:200). “Our faith tells us that this ‘new’ reality was already present in the ‘old,’ in our drama,” the old Narnia present in the new (Lewis 170).

Fire. Exegetes from Augustine to the present have thought it appropriate that the Apocalypse brings history to a close in fire. “The Apocalypse, convulsed with lightning, blazing with conflagration, provides us only with final, perpendicular excerpts of the last stages of dramatic action between heaven and earth, God and his creation. There is no other way of portraying this final act. This drama, in which God’s absoluteness (understood as power of love) touches the sphere of the fragile creature, can only be a fiery event, a history of fire, made up either of devouring or of healing flames” (von Balthasar, 4:59).

Revelation and Theology

God. A 1422 Sienese antiphonal illustrates “[God] will wipe every tear from their eyes” (Rev. 21:4) with a picture of the Lord bending to wipe a pilgrim’s eye. The warmth of such depictions comes from their comicality. Revelation does not contain anthropomorphic images of God. But it does show God. The narrator sees, not only the throne of God, but also “one seated on the throne,” a multicolored being around whom is wrapped “a rainbow ... like an emerald” (4:2–3 RSV).

The Trinity. Revelation’s salutation makes reference to God (“who is, and who was, and who is to come”; cf. Isa. 44:6; 48:12), to “the seven spirits before his throne,” and to “Jesus Christ, ... the faithful witness” (Rev. 1:4b–5). It thus is the most “trinitarian” book in the Bible. In Rev. 22:13 Christ says, “I am the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End” (cf. 1:8; 1:17; 21:6; etc.). As divine self-designations, “Alpha and Omega,” “the First and the Last,” and “the Beginning and the End” occur seven times, a number that signifies completeness for the author. Primasius and Beatus of Liébanus used Revelation against the christological heresies of Arianism and Adoptionism. The angel of Rev. 19:10 refuses the narrator’s prostration, telling him to worship Christ alone. In his Revelation commentaries and God Crucified, Richard Bauckham contends that Revelation is pragmatically “trinitarian,” in that Christ is included in the “monotheistic liturgy” of the heavenly agents. In practice, Christ is worshipped as God.

Worship of the Lamb. Revelation was probably composed for oral reading at a Christian service of worship. Each of the three scrolls in Revelation mentions true worship of God. The “last battle” is not between good and evil as abstractly conceived but between worshippers of the beast and worshippers of God. The leitmotif of the Apocalypse is worship combined with judgment. The one who is thus worshipped is not simply a conquering hero, a symbol of power, but “a Lamb standing, as though it had been slain” (5:6 RSV). The “true witnesses” who participate in this triumphal paean are those who have “conquered [the devil] by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony, for they loved not their lives even unto death” (12:11 RSV). The judgment of the world is the sacrifice of the Lamb.

See also Apocalyptic

Bibliography

Augustine. Concerning the City of God against the Pagans, trans. H. Bettenson. Penguin, 1972; Balthasar, H. U. von. Theo-Drama. Vol. 4, The Action. Ignatius, 1994. Vol. 5, The Last Act. Ignatius, 1998; Barr, D. “The Apocalypse as a Symbolic Transformation of the World: A Literary Analysis.” Int 38, no. 1 (1984): 39–50; idem. “The Apocalypse of John as Oral Enactment.” Int 40 (1986): 243–56; Bauckham, R. The Climax of Prophecy. T&T Clark, 1993; idem. God Crucified. Paternoster, 1998; idem. The Theology of the Book of Revelation. Cambridge University Press, 1993; Bede. The Explanation of the Apocalypse, trans. E. Marshall. J. Parker, 1878; Campenhausen, H. von. The Formation of the Christian Bible. Black, 1968; Carey, F., ed. The Apocalypse and the Shape of Things to Come. British Museum Press, 1999; Cohn, N. The Pursuit of the Millennium. Secker & Warburg, 1957; Collins, A. Y. The Combat Myth in the Book of Revelation. Scholars Press, 1976; Ellul, J. Apocalypse. Seabury, 1977; Emerson, R., and B. McGinn, eds. The Apocalypse in the Middle Ages. Cornell University Press, 1992; Eusebius of Caesarea. The Ecclesiastical History, trans. K. Lake. LCL. Heinemann, 1926; Griffiths, P. Olivier Messiaen and the Music of Time. Faber & Faber, 1985; Kermode, F.

“Millennium and Apocalypse.” Pages 11–27 in The Apocalypse and the Shape of Things to Come, ed. F. Carey. British Museum Press, 1999; Lewis, C. S. The Last Battle. Bodley Head, 1956; Metzger, B. The Canon of the New Testament. Clarendon, 1987; Olson, C. “No End in Sight.” First Things 127 (November 2002); Peterson, E. Reversed Thunder. Harper, 1988; Pieper, J. The End of Time, trans. M. Bullock. Faber & Faber, 1954; Thomas Aquinas. Summa theologiae. Vol. IIIa, qq. 79–90; Visser, D. Apocalypse as Utopian Expectation (800–1500). Brill, 1996; Voegelin, E. Science, Politics and Gnosticism. H. Regnery, 1968.

Francesca Aran Murphy

Rhetoric

Detailed study of rhetoric, now commonplace in biblical studies, is not a modern phenomenon but a classical discipline going back to Aristotle (p 688)(384–322 BCE), whose Rhetoric is probably the most influential ancient textbook on the subject. However, what has come to be known as the ars rhetorica (the art of rhetoric) goes back even further, to the writings of Homer (ninth–eighth century BCE), whose heroes were masters of the rhetorikē technē (the Greek equivalent of ars rhetorica). Because Homer’s writings predate the formal study of rhetoric, his heroes’ skillful speech is best described as “preconceptual” rhetoric (Kennedy).

The English language makes a clear distinction between rhetoric, the art of composition by which written or spoken language becomes persuasive, and oratory, the art of effective public speech; but in Greek and Latin no such distinction is made. The terms rhetorikē technē and ars rhetorica both refer to the art of the public speaker, which includes both notions.

Conceptualized rhetoric first emerged in the handbooks on judicial rhetoric produced by Corax of Syracuse and his pupil Tisias (fifth century BCE). Their aim was to train orators for their tasks in the law courts by teaching principles of logic and persuasion as well as effective delivery. Tisias’s pupil Gorgias (483–378 BCE) was responsible for the development of “epideictic” or ceremonial rhetoric, with its focus on emotive appeal and rhetorical effects.

Plato’s (ca. 428–348 BCE) criticism of the lack of moral purpose in the relativistic oratory of Sophists such as Gorgias and Protagoras (ca. 485–410 BCE), which was aimed solely at persuasion, marks the beginning of the critical evaluation of the rhetorikē technē. But it was Plato’s pupil Aristotle who devoted himself to the detailed study of rhetoric and the development of a practical rhetorical theory. This included the distinction of three types of rhetoric (judicial, epideictic, and deliberative) and of three modes of persuasion (ethos, pathos, and logos), as well as a theory of rhetorical topoi, stock topics or arguments that could be employed in the speech.

By the beginning of the first century BCE, rhetoric was well established in Rome, having become an important part of Roman education. Its most important advocate and theorist was Cicero (ca. 106–43 BCE), who wrote seven books on rhetorical techniques. He is most remembered for his notion of the rhetorician's three "duties" and the concomitant "styles" appropriate to each. Thus, while the task to instruct (docere) required the "plain" style, the attempt to move one's audience (movere) was best accomplished by reverting to the "grand" style. If, however, the orator sought to delight (delectare), the most appropriate style would have been the "intermediate" one.

Another important Roman rhetorician was Quintilian (ca. 35–100 CE), whose Institutio oratoria is the most extensive treatise on rhetoric to have survived from antiquity. In subsequent centuries, however, especially from the fourth century onward, Roman rhetoric and oratory suffered a dramatic decline, due partly to the tendencies criticized by Plato several centuries earlier and partly to oratory's degeneration into mere declamation and entertainment. This degenerated form of rhetoric continued to be criticized by philosophers educated in the classical tradition.

In the Christian tradition, the influence of Greek rhetoric can be seen especially in the works of Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa, and Basil of Caesarea (fourth century). While these Cappadocian fathers excelled in the sophisticated application of rhetorical devices, the development of a theory of Christian rhetoric was left to Augustine of Hippo (354–430). Influenced by Roman rhetoric and especially by Cicero, Augustine's De doctrina christiana instructs Christian rhetoricians to be concerned with truth rather than mere persuasion, and with defending the Christian faith.

Yet, the Cappadocian fathers and Augustine were not the only Christian interpreters influenced by ancient rhetoric. Tertullian (ca. 160–220), Cyprian (ca. 200–258), Arnobius (ca. 248–327), and Lactantius (ca. 240–320) all had been professional rhetoricians before they were converted to Christianity (Kennedy 146). Many of the Greek church fathers were similarly trained in rhetoric and the "art of persuasion."

Despite the later decline of rhetoric, mention must be made of Judah ben Jehiel's Book of the Honeycomb's Flow, an important medieval ars rhetorica (published in 1475/76) that offers "a rhetorical interpretation of the 'plain meaning' ... of the Hebrew Scriptures" (Rabinowitz lx). Ben Jehiel's study indicates that ancient rhetoric was not completely neglected in medieval times, yet it was employed much more frequently during the period of the Renaissance and the Reformation.

The author of three handbooks on the subject, Philipp Melanchthon (1497–1560), who did much for the study of ancient rhetoric and its use for interpreting of the Bible, deserves particular mention (Classen 8–16, 99–177). Although Melanchthon was fully cognizant of the ancient tradition of rhetoric, he did not hesitate to modify (p 689)it, introducing new elements where he deemed the traditional concepts deficient. Before Melanchthon, Lorenzo Valla (1405–57) appears to have been the first humanist to apply the ancient resource of rhetoric to the study of the NT.

The modern application of rhetoric to the interpretation of the biblical texts is often traced back to two seminal lectures: OT rhetorical critics are much indebted to James Muilenburg’s 1968 presidential address to the Society of Biblical Literature, published as “Form Criticism and Beyond.” Hans Dieter Betz’s 1974 lecture “The Literary Composition and Function of Paul’s Letter to the Galatians” provided an important impetus to NT studies. But Carl Joachim Classen rightly stresses that the application of rhetorical categories to the study of the biblical literature had in fact never been given up completely (16).

See also Rhetorical Criticism

Bibliography

Andersen, O. Im Garten der Rhetorik. Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2001; Aristotle. The Art of Rhetoric, ed. and trans. J. H. Freese. Harvard University Press, 1926; Augustine. De doctrina christiana, ed. and trans. R. P. H. Green. Clarendon, 1995; Betz, H. D. “The Literary Composition and Function of Paul’s Letter to the Galatians.” NTS 21 (1975): 353–79; Classen, C. J. Rhetorical Criticism of the New Testament. Brill, 2002; Kennedy, G. A. New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism. University of North Carolina Press, 1984; Muilenburg, J. “Form Criticism and Beyond.” JBL 88 (1969): 1–18; Porter, S., ed. Handbook of Classical Rhetoric in the Hellenistic Period, 330 B.C.–A.D. 400. Brill, 2001; Quintilian. The Orator’s Education, ed. and trans. D. Russell. 5 vols. Harvard University Press, 2001; Rabinowitz, I. “Introduction.” Pages xv–lxx in The Book of the Honeycomb’s Flow (1475/1476), ed. and trans. I. Rabinowitz. Cornell University Press, 1983. See also the editions of Greek and Latin rhetoricians in the Loeb Classical Library.

Karl Möller

Rhetorical Criticism

The last three decades have seen a growing interest among biblical scholars in rhetorical-critical approaches. To some extent, this tendency reflects the increasing disillusionment with historical criticism. Yet, rhetorical criticism does not have to be construed as a complete move away from historical criticism’s interest in the realities “behind the text” (such as the author or the “real” events). Indeed, one of the approach’s defining features is that it promises to combine the three foci on the author (“the world behind the text”), the discourse (“the world of the text”), and the reader (“the world in front of the text”).

Rhetorical criticism, which goes back to the ancient study of the rhetorikē technē or ars rhetorica, also has the potential to contribute to the current endeavor to rejuvenate the discipline of biblical theology. Already the American classicist George A. Kennedy, one of the founding fathers of the rhetorical-critical revival, recognized that “all religious systems are rhetorical” (7). And Wilhelm Wuellner, whose 1987 article provided another important impetus for applying rhetorical-critical categories to study of the NT, called rhetoric “religion’s closest ally” (449).

The link with theology is clearest in Don Compier’s call for a “rhetorical theology,” but rhetorical criticism can also help biblical theology to adopt a view of religious language that appreciates the communicative force of the biblical texts.

Two Definitions of Rhetorical Criticism

Rhetorical criticism can take many different forms, but in biblical studies its two most dominant orientations are what have been called the “art of composition” and the “art of persuasion” (Trible 32, 41).

The former is associated with James Muilenburg and those following in his footsteps. Muilenburg’s conception of rhetorical criticism is largely an attempt to overcome the shortcomings of form criticism by paying increased attention to a text’s unique stylistic or aesthetic qualities. This focus on a text’s unique features was meant to complement and correct form criticism’s penchant for the typical and conventional.

Studies exemplifying an “art of persuasion” approach, by contrast, belong to the classical Aristotelian tradition and its modern revival in the “new rhetoric” (e.g., Perelman and Olbrechts-Tyteca), which combines the Greco-Roman model with modern approaches such as literary criticism, hermeneutics, structuralism, semantics, and linguistics. The focus of the “art of persuasion” approach is on rhetoric as argumentation, and its interest is properly characterized as sociolinguistic in nature, because it regards all discourse as social discourse, which is inseparable from the wider social relations between writers or orators and their audiences. In this model, human discourse is an activity that seeks to alter reality and is largely unintelligible outside the social purposes and conditions in which it originated (Eagleton, Theory, 179).

Rejecting the Muilenburg approach as “rhetoric restrained” and as “letteraturizzazione,” Kennedy (p 690) and Wuellner regard the “new rhetoric” as the revaluation and reinvention of rhetoric, which is finally being restored to all its ancient rights.

Rhetorical-Critical Procedures

In developing a rhetorical-critical approach to biblical interpretation, scholars have tended to adopt Kennedy’s scheme, which presents a lucid and systematic model for rhetorical-critical exegesis that is undergirded by classical erudition and proceeds in five distinct steps (Kennedy 33–38; Wuellner 455–60). First, based either on the final text or (less often in current biblical scholarship) on any of its supposed preliminary stages, the critic identifies the text’s rhetorical unit or rhetorical unit(s), understood as argumentative units that affect the audience’s reasoning and imagination. Next, the focus is on the specific rhetorical situation and the “imperative stimulus” or exigency that the discourse is designed to modify (Bitzer) and that determines the choices made by the rhetorician.

The third step consists in identifying the rhetorical genre(s) employed by the rhetorician. Following Aristotle, biblical rhetorical critics usually distinguish (1) judicial rhetoric, which expects hearers or readers to judge past events; (2) deliberative rhetoric, where the audience is invited to assess expedient or beneficial actions for future performance; and (3) epideictic rhetoric, which treats the audience as spectators, seeking to reinforce certain beliefs and values. The conventional concentration on these genres can become problematic, however, if the text in question is a hybrid or does not fit any of the argumentative genres identified by Aristotle (Black).

Following Kennedy, it is also too often taken for granted that the predominant rhetorical genre is indicative of the rhetorician’s major purpose (19). What is not usually considered is the possibility that the genre of the discourse may reflect not the purpose but the main communicative strategy of the rhetorician.

Fourth, the text’s style and rhetorical strategy, chosen by the rhetorician to address the specific rhetorical problem that occasioned the discourse, become the objects of investigation. Integral to Aristotle’s system of rhetoric are the “proofs,” among which he lists ethos, pathos, and logos. These correspond respectively to the rhetorician’s moral character, the ability to put the hearer into a certain frame of mind, and the speech itself (Rhet. 1.2.4). Rhetorical criticism thus investigates the whole range of appeals embraced by rhetoric: the rational and cognitive, the emotive and the imaginative (Wuellner 461).

In a final step, the critic then considers the discourse’s rhetorical effectiveness, seeking to establish whether, or to what extent, it is a fitting response to the original exigency.

Some Criticisms of Rhetorical Criticism

Rhetorical criticism has been criticized on various grounds. One pertinent objection concerns the disquieting tendency of some biblical rhetorical critics to press texts such as prophetic oracles or the NT epistolary literature into elaborate and sometimes rather contrived schemes of organization.

However, the oft-repeated criticism that rhetorical-critical study of texts such as the OT is anachronistic, because its authors would not have been familiar with the system of classical Greco-Roman rhetoric and thus could not have been guided by its conventions, is less convincing. Indeed, the use of “anachronistic” conceptual tools such as modern linguistics is the norm in the study of ancient literature. Rhetorical critics therefore rightly insist that any discourse, whether written or oral, ancient or modern, can be investigated and assessed using the categories of classical rhetoric, provided the critic is sensitive to the unique qualities of the discourse under investigation.

Rhetorical-Critical Interpretation of the Bible

NT. Rhetorical criticism understood as the “art of persuasion” has been applied to the NT, and especially the Pauline Epistles, since the mid-1970s. Hans Dieter Betz’s work on Galatians provided an important early influence, even though his conclusions have not gone unchallenged. Another significant impetus came from the studies of Kennedy and Wuellner. In recent years, the flood of rhetorical-critical studies has been unceasing, as the approach has been adopted by an increasing number of scholars and applied to the entire spectrum of the NT literature.

The following example, taken from The Postmodern Bible (see also Wuellner 458–60), illustrates how Kennedy’s five steps of rhetorical-critical inquiry might be applied to a passage such as 1 Cor. 9:1–10:13. This digression from Paul’s main argument in 1 Cor. 8–10 has often been subjected to source-critical operations. The whole passage constitutes a large-scale rhetorical unit consisting of an apology (9:3–27), an exhortation (p 691) or paraenesis (10:1–11), and a brief conclusion or peroration (10:12–13).

The rhetorical situation of 1 Cor. 8–10, where Paul deals with divisive social practices generated by the use of meat sacrificed to idols, “is a mixed one because he partly supports existing social behavior ... but seeks even more to ... promote changed behavior” (Bible and Culture Collective 151). The choice of Paul’s rhetorical genre, labeled an “apology” (apologia, 9:3), introduces an ironic mood because the speech in fact functions as a parody of an apology, “assigning praise and blame in the guise of offering a judicial defense” (152). In stressing that his response to Christ has led him to refuse payment for his teaching and thereby to reverse a universal cultural norm, Paul seeks to incite the Corinthians to follow his example and live by the eschatological norms that encompass all cultural ones.

Paul’s rhetorical style in 1 Cor. 9 is dominated by rhetorical questions, which aim at dissociation and the depreciation of accepted values. The effectiveness of Paul’s rhetorical strategy in 1 Cor. 9:1–10:13 is illustrated by the fact that it conforms to the educational intention of the epistle’s epideictic rhetoric, which urges the Corinthians to maintain unity in the face of all kinds of distractions or distortions.

OT. Muilenburg’s initial influence on OT rhetorical criticism was significant, but recent years have witnessed an increasing interest among OT scholars in persuasive rhetoric. Dale Patrick and Allen Scult’s Rhetoric and Biblical Interpretation illustrates this revival of the classical Aristotelian definition. But mention must be made especially of Yehoshua Gitay, who pioneered the application of classical rhetorical categories to the OT prophetic literature. As of now, the approach has also been applied to the study of the Pentateuch, OT narrative, the Psalms, and Wisdom literature, but it has not yet engendered quite the same profusion of analyses as in NT studies.

Rhetorical criticism’s potential to contribute to the theological interpretation of Scripture can be illustrated vis-à-vis traditional historical-critical readings of the book of Amos, which tend to regard the prophet as a messenger of unconditional doom. It has even been said that the radicalization of Amos’s message, achieved by means of literary-critical operations, has turned the prophet into the messenger of a nation-murdering God, who may safely be seen as theologically outdated.

However, historical criticism’s radical conclusions appear to be the result of its literalistic fixation on the surface text to the neglect of the text’s strategy and purpose. Applying a communication-theoretical perspective and paying attention to the exigency occasioning the discourse as well as the text’s rhetorical genre and strategy, rhetorical criticism transcends historical criticism’s literalism, thus opening up new possibilities of interpretation (see Möller).

Applying the aforementioned observation that a text’s predominant rhetorical genre may reflect the rhetorical strategy rather than the purpose of the discourse, Amos's chiefly judicial nature (notice the abundance of accusations and announcements of judgment) does not necessarily suggest that the prophet merely sought to bring his audience under judgment.

Combining rhetorical criticism with speech-act theory and investigating Jonah's diatribe against Nineveh (Jon. 3:4–9), Terry Eagleton ("Austin") and Walter Houston have shown that unconditional announcements of punishment could in fact be taken by the audience as warnings to repent. It is therefore conceivable that Amos focused on Israel's wrongdoings, painting a picture of unfolding death and calamity, in order to cause the people to repent in the face of the impending divine judgment. In this case, the rhetorician's purpose would be deliberative despite the judicial nature of the surface text.

The example illustrates rhetorical criticism's value for the theological interpretation of a book such as Amos. All too often, interpreters have naively assumed that the book's (supposedly utterly gloomy) theology can simply be read off the pages of the OT. However, this literalistic approach fails to do justice to the nature and function of human language. It also necessitates a variety of literary-critical and redaction-critical maneuvers in order to come to terms with the passages that do not fit the suggested interpretation.

Unleashing Rhetorical Criticism's Full Potential

Rhetorical criticism does not have to be construed along the lines suggested by the majority of biblical scholarship; nor does it have to follow Kennedy's five steps of rhetorical-critical inquiry. Indeed, Amador has criticized biblical rhetorical critics for their antiquarian outlook, which leads them to focus exclusively on ancient rhetorical textbooks. He also objected that the approach too often is synthetic, failing to distinguish between different ancient rhetorical theories, and that it is too preoccupied with the identification of argumentative structures and compositional styles.

(p 692)To unleash rhetorical criticism's full potential, Amador rightly urges that considerably more work is needed on genres, social movements, sociolinguistics, metaphor, narrative, argumentation theory, feminist critical rhetorics, critical rhetoric, and the rhetoric of inquiry, all of which receive sustained attention in university rhetoric and communication departments.

See also Rhetoric

Bibliography

Amador, J. D. H. "Where Could Rhetorical Criticism (Still) Take Us?" CurBS 7 (1999): 195–222; Betz, H. D. "The Literary Composition and Function of Paul's Letter to the Galatians." NTS 21 (1975): 353–79; The Bible and Culture Collective. "Rhetorical Criticism." Pages 149–86 in The Postmodern Bible, ed. E. Castelli et al. Yale University Press, 1995; Bitzer, L. F. "The Rhetorical Situation." Pages 247–60 in Rhetoric, ed. W. R. Fisher. Michigan State University Press, 1974; Black, E. Rhetorical Criticism. Macmillan, 1965; Compier, D. What Is Rhetorical Theology? Trinity, 1999; Eagleton, T. "J. L. Austin and the Book of Jonah." Pages 231–36 in The Book and the Text, ed. R. Schwartz. Blackwell, 1990; idem. Literary Theory. 2d ed. Blackwell, 1996; Gitay, Y. Prophecy and Persuasion. Linguistica Biblica, 1981; Houston, W. "What Did the Prophets Think They Were Doing?" Pages 133–53 in "The Place Is Too Small for Us," ed. R. P. Gordon. Eisenbrauns, 1995; Kennedy, G. A. New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism. University of North Carolina Press, 1984; Möller, K. "Words of (In-)Evitable Certitude?" Pages 352–86 in After Pentecost, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2001; Muilenburg, J. "Form Criticism and Beyond." JBL 88 (1969): 1–18; Patrick, D., and A. Scult. Rhetoric and Biblical Interpretation. Almond, 1990; Perelman, C., and L. Olbrechts-Tyteca. The New Rhetoric. University of Notre Dame Press, 1969; Tribble, P. Rhetorical Criticism. Fortress, 1994; Watson, D. F., and A. J. Hauser. Rhetorical Criticism of the Bible. Brill, 1994; Wuellner, W. "Where Is Rhetorical Criticism Taking Us?" CBQ 49 (1987): 448–63.

Karl Möller

Ricoeur, Paul

One of the most influential thinkers of the twentieth century, P. Ricoeur (1913–2005), "philosopher of the word," is along with H.-G. Gadamer best known for his hermeneutic philosophy. Dual appointments at the Universities of Paris (Nanterre) and Chicago through the 1970s and 1980s led Ricoeur to mediate the worlds of Anglo-American analytic philosophy, with its concern for clarity and conceptual precision, and Continental philosophy, with its concern for human subjectivity. Creative mediation is the operative term throughout Ricoeur's thought. He mediates between disciplines as diverse as psychology, social theory, history, literary theory, and religious studies—by demonstrating previously unseen connections, formal and material, between them—and he mediates between diverse interpretative approaches by finding a place for each in his hermeneutical arch, which spans explanation and understanding.

Ironically, the discipline for which Ricoeur appears to have the least sympathy is systematic theology, at least to the extent that this latter is guilty of rushing to conceptual abstractions (e.g., doctrines) too quickly, to the detriment of the original forms of biblical discourse. For example, Ricoeur thinks that Augustine's doctrine of original sin reduces the Adamic myth to a forensic concept: the concept, however, is nothing more than "pseudo-knowledge, grafted onto myth, interpreted literally, and dressed up in pseudo-history” (“ ‘Original Sin,’ ” in Conflict, 285).

Also of importance for the interpretation of Scripture is his mediation of suspicion and belief: in marked contrast to the historical, critical, and deconstructionist distrust of appearances, Ricoeur retrieves the power of creative language (e.g., metaphor, narrative) and makes possible a reading of the Bible that is existentially deep. There is some debate, however, as to whether Ricoeur’s respect for the limits of philosophy ever allows his interpretations of the Bible to move beyond anthropology to speak of God.

Hermeneutic Philosopher of the “I Am”

Ricoeur’s project is first and foremost one of philosophical anthropology. He stands squarely in the tradition of the philosophy of the subject, whose goal is ultimately self-understanding. While an ontology of the self is the goal, however, hermeneutical reflection is the means. Descartes’s “Cogito, ergo sum [I think, therefore I am]” errs in thinking that human subjectivity can be directly inspected, as it were. Hermeneutics is the “long route” to the “promised land” of ontology (Conflict, 24). The manifesto of hermeneutic philosophy is “existence via semantics”: self-understanding via textual interpretation.

Ricoeur’s fundamental conviction that language discloses human being leads him to engage the so-called “masters of suspicion” (e.g., Freud, Marx, Nietzsche), who argue that language conceals as much if not more than it reveals. Ricoeur concedes their critical point, but he insists that self-understanding remains possible; hence, “consciousness is not a given but a task.”

Ricoeur similarly incorporates Nietzsche’s and Feuerbach’s accusation that talk of “God” is (p 693) simply a projection of the human will to power. Ricoeur’s is a postcritical faith, one that has to endure the chastening effect of various forms of criticism, especially the suspicion that images of God are being used to serve some ideological project, such as enforcing a particular moral order.

Finally, Ricoeur transcends the historical-critical preoccupation with “the world behind the text.” He does this by bringing a variety of literary approaches to bear on Scripture’s diverse genres (“the world of the text”) and by focusing on the way in which the text engages and transforms the situation of the reader (“the world in front of the text”). “Beyond the desert of criticism, we wish to be called again” (Symbolism of Evil, 349). Called, yes: but by whom, and to what end?

The Second Naïveté: Appropriating the World of the Text

Ricoeur challenges Heidegger's decision to take anxiety as the fundamental "mood" of human being, arguing that joy and hope have equal claim to be regarded as the basic clue to the meaning of humanity. There is a positive charge to Ricoeur's hermeneutic philosophy: a belief in transcendence, a desire to say "Yes" in spite of the negative aspects of human existence.

Like Kant, who claimed to have abolished knowledge in order to make room for faith, Ricoeur abolishes the first naïveté, a faith in what the text literally says. He does this to make room for a second naïveté: "To smash the idols is also to let the symbols speak" ("Critique of Religion," in Philosophy, 219). A hermeneutical "wager" funds his philosophical work: "The symbol gives rise to thought.... I believe [in symbol] in order to understand [the self]."

For Ricoeur, the text, as written discourse (e.g., something said to someone about something), is neither a mirror to the past, nor a self-contained entity, but rather a world-bearing or world-projecting dynamism. Texts, by virtue of being written, gain autonomy from their authors and original situations and launch out on a career of their own. Textual interpretation must explain the text's structure (sense) and understand the text's world (reference). Interpretation is less a matter of recovering the author's original discourse than it is an exploration of a text's trajectory of meaning. (For an important critique of Ricoeur's preference for "textual sense" rather than "authorial intention," see Wolterstorff 130–52.)

Ricoeur's preferred texts range from metaphors to narratives. He discerns a parallel between the ways metaphors and narratives refer: both are types of creative language that project a meaning beyond any possible literal reference. Metaphors, for example, are not literally true, but they do open up new ways of seeing the real. They suspend the first-order reference to empirical actuality (the focus of the first naïveté) in order to liberate a second-order reference to new existential possibilities (the focus of the second naïveté). Narratives are like metaphors in that they do not simply picture empirical reality but configure it, emplotting persons and events in patterns in order to display possible ways of human being-in-time. Together, stories and histories display the full panoply of human possibilities. In his Gifford Lectures, Ricoeur completes his project by arguing that self-understanding comes precisely by appropriating a narrative identity (Oneself).

Philosophical or Theological Hermeneutics?

"I believe that the fundamental theme of Revelation is this awakening and this call, into the heart of existence, of the imagination of the possible. The possibilities are opened before man which fundamentally constitute what is revealed. The revealed as such is an opening to existence, a possibility of existence” (“Language of Faith,” in Philosophy, 237). The Bible, similarly, is revelatory to the extent that its being-in-the-world is a new kind of being, a creative possibility for human existence. If not only the Bible but also all poetic texts “reveal” the “transcendent”—in the sense that the worlds they project open up possible ways of being-in-the-world that, if appropriated, can transform the world of the reader—what then is unique about Scripture? And what might Ricoeur mean by “theological interpretation”?

Led by H. Frei, the erstwhile Yale School criticized Ricoeur for subjecting his biblical interpretation to an all-encompassing extratextual philosophical framework. All self-understanding is mediated through the ensemble of texts that refigure human existence; hence, for Ricoeur biblical interpretation is at one and the same time self-interpretation. The purpose of biblical narrative is not to convey knowledge about what God has done in Jesus Christ so much as to enlarge our understanding of human existence. On this view, biblical hermeneutics is merely a regional instance of general hermeneutics, a variation on the theme of self-understanding—with devastating consequences for Christology (Vanhoozer, chs. 7–9). Others, however, point out that Ricoeur seeks only to provide philosophical “approximations” of theology and that his hermeneutic philosophy (p 694) may be employed by a variety of theological perspectives (Stiver 245–46).

What distinguishes biblical interpretation from general hermeneutics in Ricoeur’s view is the particular referent of Scripture—“limit” or ultimate existential possibilities—and the concern of Scripture to “name” God. “God” is the referent of the medley of biblical genres, taken together in all their irreducible diversity. Yet God is not a univocal concept so much as the index of incompleteness of human discourse and hence of the ineluctable mystery of being.

Commentators disagree about the kind of theology to which Ricoeur’s hermeneutics give rise; some draw comparisons with Bultmann (Vanhoozer), others with Barth (Wallace) and Hauerwas (Fodor). What remains beyond dispute is Ricoeur’s belief that the human being is constituted by the “word” that summons it. The philosopher cannot ultimately say, however, whether this word—and the possibility of transformed life projected by the biblical text—is human or divine. More recently, Ricoeur has stressed the importance of the interpretative community for biblical interpretation: “The text exists, in the final analysis, thanks to the community, for the use of the community, with a view to giving shape to the community” (Thinking, xiii).

While Ricoeur scrupulously keeps theology and philosophy separate (the one arising from historical testimony, the other from universal experience), there are several aspects of his interpretation theory (e.g., the revelatory world-of-the-text, the wager of faith) that approximate Christian themes. Moreover, he has written provocative interpretations of the opening chapters of Genesis, the book of Job, the parables, and the Gospel narratives, as well as a number of essays on other biblical texts and themes (e.g., revelation, time, testimony). He treats Jesus’ parables as metaphoric narratives that redescribe the kingdom of God and hence open up new possibilities for human social existence (“Biblical Hermeneutics”).

Ricoeur describes his position as a “post-Hegelian Kantianism.” With Kant, Ricoeur carefully respects the limits of reason; with Hegel, he explores reason’s many forms, both figurative and conceptual (e.g., of history, poetry, culture, and religion). Against Hegel, however, Ricoeur refuses to let conceptual language swallow up figurative language. It is just here, in the rehabilitation of the imagination and the closely related notion of literary form, that Ricoeur advances beyond the Yale School’s preoccupation with narrative and makes what is perhaps his most significant contribution to the project of theological interpretation of Scripture.

As with narrative, each of the literary genres in Scripture “refigures” the world in its own irreducible manner, all of which “call for thought.” A hermeneutic philosophy does not try to prove the existence of God but instead attends to the diverse literary strategies for “naming” God in Scripture. Theological interpretation is not a matter of pure but of hermeneutic reason—of reason reflecting on historical testimonies to the divine in a way that does justice to the plurality of the literary forms in which these testimonies are embedded. The “language of faith” is not objectifying; unlike historical and scientific discourse, which describes empirical actuality, the language of faith awakens the imagination, that “prophet of our existence,” to “eschatological” possibilities.

Conclusion: Toward What Kind of Eschatological Possibility?

What are the consequences of Ricoeur’s “second naïveté” for the theological interpretation of Scripture? Ricoeur takes the literal reading of Scripture to yield what he calls a “moral vision” of the world in which human beings are caught in an economy of guilt and punishment. Ricoeur’s postcritical, metaphorical interpretation, by contrast, yields an “eschatological vision” that allows us to refigure existence as a gift from something greater than ourselves, to be cherished “in spite of” our fallibility and faults, “in spite of” suffering and evil.

Some have compared Ricoeur’s hermeneutics to Barth’s on the basis that each is fundamentally committed to the subject matter of the text (Wallace). However, it is not entirely clear just what Ricoeur thinks the Bible is fundamentally about. Is his “eschatological” vision about divinely inaugurated possibilities, or about human existential possibilities that have been forgotten and need to be recovered? Philosophy may approximate the eschatological event that is the object of Easter preaching, though what it knows and what it says must remain within the limits of reason.

Ricoeur’s own second naïveté is apparently compatible with his nonbelief in a literal resurrection. Despite his being a believing philosopher who trusts testimony, Ricoeur understands the resurrection to be about (1) the victory over death through service to others, and (2) Jesus’ acquiring a historical body in the church that continues his self-giving way of being-in-the-world. So, while theologians may helpfully employ aspects of (p 695) Ricoeur’s hermeneutic philosophy on an ad hoc basis, we must question the wisdom of a wholesale appropriation of an interpretation theory that proceeds from a “Christianity of the philosopher” (Critique, 152–53).

See also Hermeneutics; Method

Bibliography

Primary, by Ricoeur, in Chronological Order: The Symbolism of Evil. Beacon, 1967; The Conflict of Interpretations. Northwestern University Press, 1974; “Biblical Hermeneutics.” Semeia 4 (1975): 27–148; Interpretation Theory. Texas Christian University Press, 1976; The Philosophy of Paul Ricoeur, ed. C. E. Reagan and D. Stewart. Beacon, 1978; Essays on Biblical Interpretation. Fortress, 1980; A Ricoeur Reader, ed. M. J. Valdes. Harvester Wheatsheaf, 1991; Oneself as Another. University of Chicago, 1992; Figuring the Sacred. Fortress, 1995; Thinking Biblically. With A. Lacocque. University of Chicago Press, 1998; Critique and Conviction. Columbia University Press, 1998. Secondary: Fodor, J. Christian Hermeneutics. Clarendon, 1995; Kearney, R. On Paul Ricoeur. Ashgate, 2004; Laughery, G. Living Hermeneutics in Motion. University Press of America, 2002; Stiver, D. Theology after Ricoeur. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Vanhoozer, K. Biblical Narrative in the Philosophy of Paul Ricoeur. Cambridge University Press, 1990; Wallace, M. The Second Naïveté. Mercer University Press, 1990; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Kevin J. Vanhoozer

Roman Empire

Early Christianity began within the Roman Empire, and many of its early writings bear the marks of reflection on, and sometimes resistance to, what it was, how it operated, and what it stood for. Failure to recognize this leads not only to under-exegesis of the NT, but also under-application to subsequent imperial rhetoric, ideology, and demands.

Rome had an empire long before it had an emperor. The ancient Roman republic, proud of its refusal to grant anyone supreme power for more than a short emergency period, had steadily conquered lands in all directions from the capital. By the middle of the first century BCE, its large network of provinces and client regimes had become increasingly difficult to govern by the system of rotating magistrates, and it was vulnerable to the ambitions of powerful individuals. The best known of these, Julius Caesar, was effectively becoming sole ruler when he was murdered by angry republicans (44 BCE), precipitating factional civil wars. From these there emerged Caesar's adopted heir, Octavius, who took the name Augustus and ruled the entire Roman world from 31 BCE to his death in 14 CE.

Flattering poets like Virgil and historians like Livy told the story of the transition to imperial rule in terms of a long historical process coming at last to fulfillment. The older Roman ideology—according to which Rome was naturally free and had a responsibility to bring this kind of “freedom” to the rest of the world through its superior military might—was transferred to the claims of Augustus and his family. Rome believed that its own system of justice was the fairest in the world (“Iustitia” became a goddess during Augustus's reign). Rome also, of course, sat at the center of an economic empire, using its own “freedom” and “justice” to rake in profits from around the world. Since his accession followed the end of civil war, Augustus was hailed also as the bringer of peace and “salvation” (= rescue). His accession and his birthday were hailed throughout the empire as “good news” (euangelion in Greek). Most important for the rise of Christianity, a religious cult of Augustus began to spring up. This did not happen in Rome itself, where the citizens would have objected, but certainly in the Greek East, from Greece right round the eastern Mediterranean to Egypt, where local and international rulers had long been regarded as divine. Cities competed for the honor (and the tax-exemption status) of building and looking after temples to Augustus and his family. Statues were made of him and his family, often in the guise of some of the ancient pagan gods and goddesses. In Rome itself and on his coins, Augustus described himself as “son of the god Julius,” having conveniently declared his adopted father to be divine after his death.

Augustus's successor Tiberius (14–37 CE) carried on the same ideology, as did the mad Gaius (37–41) and the weak but crafty Claudius (41–54). Nero (54–68) copied Gaius in making the recognition of his own divinity mandatory and widespread. After his suicide, the “year of the four emperors” (69) saw Galba, Otho, and Vitellius come and go in quick succession, before Vespasian, who had been besieging Jerusalem, stopped the rot by marching to Rome and claiming the crown (69–79). He began a new dynasty, the Flavians, being succeeded by Titus (79–81), whom he had left to complete the capture of Jerusalem in 70. Titus was succeeded by his brother Domitian (81–96), who has had bad press from Roman as well as Christian sources. This gives the empire’s shape and something of its flavor, under which Christianity was born, spread, and—despite persecution—flourished.

(p 696) The Jewish people had a long tradition of theological and practical reflection on living under imperial rule. In exile in Babylon, Jeremiah had told them both that Babylon was wicked and ripe for God’s judgment, and that they should settle down there, pray for the city, and seek its welfare (29:7). The book of Daniel recounts the regular clashes between the pagan empire and those loyal to Israel’s God. Yet, when the Jewish heroes escape from pagan persecution, they resume their work as high-ranking imperial civil servants. In the political thought that follows from Jewish monotheism, the one God calls rulers to account but does not want the world to collapse into anarchy. Sometimes first-century Jews emphasized the first of these, not least in the various kingdom movements (“no king but God”) that flourished during Jesus’ boyhood. Sometimes they went for the second, hoping to live by their own laws and negotiate a truce with Rome. Julius Caesar had allowed the Jews to practice their own religion, and part of the tension within early Christianity concerned whether this privilege would be extended to followers of Jesus. This complex theological and political tradition, reshaped around Jesus and the Spirit, informs the early Christian thought and life under the Roman Empire.

This is the setting for Jesus’ cryptic saying about the tribute penny (Mark 12:13–17 et par.). “Pay back the pagans as they deserve,” said the rebel Mattathias to his sons (1 Macc. 2:68), “and keep the law’s commands.” “Pay Caesar what belongs to Caesar,” said Jesus, “and give God what belongs to God” (AT). This could be heard either as a cryptic call to revolt, or as an instruction to be a good citizen, or both. The clash between Jesus and Rome reaches its height in the remarkable conversation with Pilate (John 18:33–19:16). Jesus acknowledges that Pilate’s power over him comes from God, while continuing to challenge him with news about a kingdom from beyond the world (18:36).

Paul echoes the entire range of Roman imperial rhetoric in several passages. In Phil. 2:6–11 he tells the story of Jesus as the truth of which Caesar’s proud boast is a mere parody. And in 3:20–21 he ascribes to Jesus the titles King, Lord, and Savior, and credits him with the power to subject all things to himself, exactly as Caesar would have claimed for himself. In 1 Thess. 4:15–17 he draws a vivid picture of the reappearance of Jesus on the model of Caesar paying a state visit to a colony (coupled, confusingly for us, with language drawn from Dan. 7 about God’s people being vindicated, caught up on the clouds). In Rom. 1:3–5 he describes the “good news” of Jesus as being about God’s Son, raised from the dead by God’s power, claiming obedient loyalty from the whole world. And in 1:16–17 he declares that through this gospel “salvation” is available for all, because in it God’s “justice” is revealed (1:17 JB). At the end of the letter’s theological exposition, he speaks again of the root of Jesse, the royal Messiah “who will arise to rule the nations” (15:12). Paul’s implicit critique of Caesar, his empire, and all that he stood for is the foundation for the more explicit resistance we find a generation or two later in figures like Polycarp.

Romans 13:1–7 is not a charter for political quietism, but a warning against the wrong sort of resistance. In the NT, it corresponds to Jer. 29, as also does 1 Pet. 2:13–17. The book of Revelation articulates the most explicit early Christian critique of Roman imperial ideology and resistance to it. As a measure of the inability of the post-Enlightenment Western church to grasp the necessity for such critique, Revelation has been either a closed and puzzling book or merely a quarry for strange theories about the future. From the vision of the worship going on in heaven (Rev. 4–5) to the final vision of the new Jerusalem, the true eternal city, the book constantly and kaleidoscopically insists that God the Creator and Jesus the Lamb are the true objects of worship. Whatever human empire may do, God’s people must stay faithful. The NT remains rooted in the Jewish critique of pagan empire, articulating that critique afresh in the light of Jesus and the Spirit in the new circumstance of worldwide Roman rule, and thereby providing a model for the church in our own day.

Bibliography

Alexander, L., ed. Images of Empire. JSOTSup 122. JSOT, 1991; Bowman, A., et al., eds. The Cambridge Ancient History. 2d ed. Vol. 10, The Augustan Empire, 43 BC–AD 69. Cambridge University Press, 1996; Bowman, A., et al., eds. Representations of Empire. Oxford University Press, 2002; Goodman, M. The Roman World, 44 BC–AD 180. Routledge, 1997; Lintott, A. Imperium Romanum. Routledge, 1993; Millar, F. The Emperor in the Roman World (31 BC–AD 337). 2d ed. Cornell University Press, 1992; idem. The Roman Near East, 31 BC–AD 337. Harvard University Press, 1993; Price, S. R. F. Rituals and Power. Cambridge University Press, 1984; Zanker, P. The Power of Images in the Age of Augustus. University of Michigan Press, 1990.

N. T. Wright

(p 697)Romans, Book of Genre

The book of Romans is a Greco-Roman letter. It contains elements characteristic of a family letter, notably, Paul’s expressed desire to visit his addressees (1:1, 7, 8–10, 13) and his lengthy concluding salutations (16:3–16, 21–24); and it briefly takes the form of a letter of commendation when he speaks of Phoebe (16:1–2). But by far its greater part (1:16–15:13) consists of what the ancients would have called logos protreptikos—“a persuasive discourse.” In philosophical tradition, such discourse was associated with the choice of a particular school, or with the choice of philosophy itself. Philosophers used protreptic to strengthen believers and convert outsiders. Ever since Aristotle’s Protrepticus there had been a tradition of putting such discourses into letter form—as, for example, Lucian’s Nigrinus. Philon of Larissa (ca. 160–80 BCE) identified two main elements in protreptic: dissuasion or refutation (apelegmos), and demonstration (endeiktikos). To those we should probably add a third: normally, such discourses involved personal appeal and exhortation (parainesis).

Occasion, Place, and Date of Writing

Paul wrote Romans on the eve of his final visit to Jerusalem, where he intended to deliver in person a collection that he had taken up from Gentile churches (15:25; cf. 1 Cor. 16:1). Though he evidently viewed the outcome of the projected visit with some uncertainty (15:30–31), the gift would, he hoped, show to the Jerusalem church the solidarity in Christ that existed between her “poor” and the Gentile believers of Achaia, Galatia, and Macedonia (15:26–27). That visit aside, and having preached Christ “from Jerusalem all the way round to Illyricum” (15:19), Paul evidently considered that his apostolate in the area of the eastern Mediterranean was complete. He now contemplated a mission to Spain, and he planned to go there by way of Rome, partly so that he might use the Roman church as a base (15:22–24, 28). (Note that in 15:24 Paul hopes “to be sent on [his] way [propemphthēnai]” by the Romans; Paul uses the word propempein elsewhere to speak of being sent on by a community with its support, as in 1 Cor. 16:6; 2 Cor. 1:16.)

Paul refers to Gaius as his host (16:23), so it is likely that Romans was composed in Corinth or Cenchreae (see 1 Cor. 1:14), perhaps during the winter of 56–57. This date would also fit with the positive view of Roman imperium in 13:1–4: at this period Nero was still under the influence of Burrus and Seneca, and he was generally regarded with high hopes.

Outline

In tracing the outline of Romans, it is easy to discern the three main elements of protreptic identified above.

Following the epistolary opening (1:1–15), the first part of the document (1:16–4:25) is a dissuasive, or refutation (apelegmos). These chapters seek, on the basis of Scripture, to dissuade Paul's hearers from a view of God's relationship with the world or with Israel that would see it as ever at any time or in any situation founded on anything except God's justice and grace. This is the point, not only of the long discussion of Abraham that concludes the section (3:27–4:25), but also of the entire denunciation of human sin (Jewish and Gentile) that runs from 1:18 to 3:20. This denunciation culminates at 3:21–26 with the affirmation of God's saving justice/righteousness "manifested apart from the law, although testified to by the Law and the Prophets" (3:21 AT). In other words, Paul claims that what he refers to as "my gospel" (2:16)—the proclamation of a God who, through the long-promised coming of the Messiah, has chosen to be gracious to all, Jew and Gentile alike—manifests the saving justice/righteousness of God promised through the prophets. Paul's gospel says nothing about that justice that was not implicit in the law given to Israel from the beginning.

This dissuasive involves Paul in making two other points. (1) The proclamation of God's universal graciousness does not strip Israel of her "special relationship" with God. The unshakable basis of that relationship is clear in Israel's possession of the Law (3:1–4). (This is important, for if God's graciousness did strip Israel of her privilege, then the universally gracious God would not be trustworthy, since God promised a special relationship to Israel.) (2) The God who is gracious to all is not on that account a God who is morally indifferent, so that in proclaiming such a God, Paul is not saying, in effect, "Let us do evil, that good may come" (3:5–8 NRSV).

The second part of the letter (5:1–11:36) is a positive demonstration (endeiktikos) of God's justice and grace at work in the life of faith—a life lived at "peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ” (5:1). This demonstration involves defense, which means further reflection on the falsity of the two charges that Paul has already summarily denied. First, he considers the question (p 698) of moral indifference (6:1–8:39). One who is “in Christ” no longer lives under the dominion of sin (6:14), has been “put to death to the law” (7:4 AT), and is freed from “condemnation” (8:1). Far from leading, however, to a life of moral indifference (6:1, 15), this leads to being “led by the Spirit of God” (8:14). Thereby we “put to death the deeds of the flesh” (8:13 AT) on the basis of a new relationship, as “heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ” (8:17 NRSV). Even suffering may be endured cheerfully (8:18; cf. 5:1–5), for Christians know that nothing can finally separate them from “the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord” (8:39 NRSV). Second, Paul considers the question of God’s special relationship to Israel (9:1–11:36). Paul argues that the fulfillment of the law in Christ (10:4), far from meaning that God has abandoned the promised special covenant relationship with Israel, means on the contrary that God is being faithful to all the promises, including the promises to Israel. Despite the disobedience of all—Jew and Gentile—it is God’s will finally to “have mercy upon all” (11:32 RSV).

The third part of the letter (12:1–15:13) is taken up with appeal and exhortation (parainesis)—an exhortation springing directly out of the demonstration that preceded it. Those who know that they live only “by the mercies of God” (12:1 NRSV) certainly cannot lead lives of moral indifference. Far from conforming themselves “to this age,” those who live “by the mercies of God” will look to be “transformed” by the “renewal” of their minds (12:2–3 AT). Within the life of the Christian community, this is going to mean mutual acceptance among those who feel called to obey the law in one way, and those who feel called to obey it in another (14:1–12). The basis of their actions will be plain—the example offered by Christ himself: “Welcome one another, therefore, as Christ welcomed you, for the glory of God” (15:7 RSV; cf. 12:1; 15:2–3).

The remainder of the letter is taken up with Paul’s commendation of Phoebe, a deacon of the church at Cenchreae, his patron, and presumably the bearer of the letter (16:1–2), with final greetings and salutations (16:3–16, 21–24), and a note that was perhaps written in Paul’s own hand (16:17–20).

Style

Ever since Rudolf Bultmann produced his dissertation in 1910 (Der Stil der paulinischen Predigt und die kynisch-stoische Diatribe), it has been common to associate Romans with diatribe. This is helpful, if “diatribe” is understood in accordance with ancient usage—which, unfortunately, has not always been the case. In connection with the kind of literature we are considering, the word “diatribe” (diatribē: “a way of passing the time,” “an occupation”) is properly used with reference either to the activity of teaching in a school, or to texts describing that activity. Examples are Epictetus’s Discourses—records of his lectures, noted down “so far as possible in his own words” by his student Arrian. By extension, “diatribe” is also applied to texts using the rhetoric and pedagogy, which characterized education. As such, written diatribe has identifiable characteristics of both subject matter and style.

Regarding subject matter, diatribe is generally concerned with serious philosophical or moral issues. Clearly, Romans would be at home in such company. Regarding style, diatribe is marked by a whole battery of characteristics. Frequently there is discussion with an imaginary partner, whose role is to raise objections, offer false conclusions, and pose difficult questions. The teacher turns from his real audience to respond to such objections with direct, second-person discourse (9:19–20). False conclusions and suggestions may be set aside with a scornful mē genoito! “Of course not!” (3:4, 31; 6:2; 11:1). Suggestions and conclusions regarded as correct may be supported by citations from sources considered authoritative. In Epictetus, this means allusions to Homer, Plato, and others of the “canon” of Greek paideia; in Paul, naturally, it means appeals to Scripture. Some composers of diatribe like to personify abstractions, and so, at times, does Paul: “For Sin, seizing an opportunity in the commandment, deceived me and through it put me to death” (7:11 AT). Some use sarcasm, and so, at times, does Paul: “Will what is made say to its maker, ‘Why have you made me so?’ Or does not the potter have a right over the clay?” (9:20–21 AT). There are lists of virtues and vices (1:29–30).

This then is the style in which the Letter to the Romans is written: a style designed, above all, for leading those who heard it to the truth—often by correcting their assumptions or pretensions. It is a style not to be associated, as was at one time supposed, with public preaching on street corners to the masses, but with the lecture hall, the classroom, and the school—in other words, with education and instruction. It was a style, therefore, eminently suited to protreptic, which, as a genre, had the same associations.

(p 699) *Destination, Purpose, and Strategy

As his opening salutation shows (1:1–15), Paul is writing to a church that he does not know personally. On the other hand, if his closing salutations are to be taken seriously, he was acquainted with a good many individuals in it (16:3–16). There is no reason to suppose that he would not, through them, have come to know something of the situation at Rome, regarding both the believers' attitudes to each other, and their reactions to Paul or what they had heard of Paul's gospel. In addressing the Romans, then, Paul seems particularly to have been aware of two groups. First were some—mostly but not necessarily all of Jewish descent—who had accepted Jesus as Messiah but believed that Paul's admission of uncircumcised Gentiles to full fellowship simply on the basis of faith in Jesus was an abandonment of God's law. They saw in Paul's gospel of "grace for all" both an implicit denial of Israel's calling and a proclamation of moral indifference. Second were those—mostly but not necessarily all of Gentile origin—who resented the claims of the former group and felt, or claimed to feel, superior to those who were so hung up on questions of law and obedience. In Romans, Paul sought to address both groups, not with "a compendium of Christian doctrine" (as Philipp Melanchthon suggested), but with an account of how the gospel (which was also "my gospel" [2:16]) accorded with God's promises to restore creation (8:18–25) and redeem Israel (chs. 9–11), and how that should affect the attitude of believers to each other (12:1–15:13).

A strategic reason for Paul's undertaking to address the Roman congregations in this way is not difficult to see. He hoped for support from them for his projected mission to the West (15:23–24): clearly, the better they understood and accepted his apostolate, the sounder that support would be. Yet finally, it was more than a matter of strategy. Paul was convinced that an approach to the gospel that founded it on anything other than the justice and grace of God available for all who would put their trust in the Son of God amounted in fact to rejection of the gospel. "You who want to be justified by the Law," he wrote on another occasion, "have cut yourselves off from Christ; you have fallen away from grace" (Gal. 5:4 NRSV; cf. 1:6–9). Equally, Paul was convinced that those who did accept the gospel were committed by it to emulating the grace by which they were saved: "Welcome one another, therefore, just as Christ has welcomed you, for the glory of God" (Rom. 15:7 NRSV). In other words, not simply strategy, but the thing itself was at stake.

Genre is a tool of meaning. Protreptic was a form of address associated with the choice of a particular philosophical school, or with the choice of philosophy itself. Just why, then, did Paul choose to present his defense of the gospel in this form? Partly, he may have acted in the light of Jewish precedent. The Wisdom of Solomon, which appears to have influenced him in other respects (e.g., 1:24–32; cf. Wis. 14:22–27), certainly seems to have protreptic features. More decisive, however, was perhaps something in the nature of the gospel itself as the ancient world, including Paul, would have perceived it. The ancients generally seem to have understood what we call “religion” in terms of experience and ritual, whereas ultimate truth claims and demands for appropriate living were associated with philosophy. So Seneca:

Who can doubt, my dear Lucilius, that life is the gift of the immortal gods, but that living well is the gift of philosophy? Hence the idea that our debt to philosophy is greater than our debt to the gods, in proportion as a good life is more of a benefit than mere life, would be regarded as correct, were not philosophy itself a boon which the gods have bestowed upon us. They have given the knowledge thereof to none, but the faculty of acquiring it they have given to all....

[Philosophy’s] sole function is to discover the truth about things divine and things human. From her side awe of the divine (religio) never departs, nor duty, nor justice, nor any of the whole company of virtues which cling together in close united fellowship. (Ep. 90.3, altered)

Hence, joining a philosophical school involved many of the ideas, and even the emotions, that we associate with religious conversion. And so for the ancients, Christianity (like Judaism) was a confusing phenomenon. Insofar as it involved ritual and cult, it might naturally be described in Latin as superstitio—the usual disparaging term for a foreign cult in the first century, as used by Pliny in his rescript to Hadrian about Christians in Bithynia (Ep. 10.96.10). On the other hand, insofar as Christianity presented itself as teaching doctrines describing what is ultimately true and requiring appropriate activity, it appeared to be a philosophical school. This, no doubt, was precisely the point. Paul’s purpose in Romans was to persuade his hearers to a favorable view of his beliefs about God and God’s promise—“my gospel.” By using the protreptic form, he immediately declared to his contemporaries that he regarded what he was presenting not simply as an (p 700)invitation to religious experience, but rather, and much more importantly, as also a witness to ultimate truth. It is “the power of God for salvation” (1:16 NRSV), in response to which no “rational worship” is possible other than total obedience, the presentation of one’s whole being “as a living sacrifice” (12:1 AT; cf. NRSV margin).

In this connection, it is interesting finally to consider how Paul’s pagan contemporaries might have reacted to Romans. No doubt they would have found it very Jewish, full of “questions about words and names and your own law” (Acts 18:15). If they were like Galen a century or so later, they might have said that while its “philosophy” could lead people to behavior “not inferior to that of genuine philosophers” (Summary of Plato’s Republic: Fragment), yet it was full of “talk of undemonstrated laws” (On the Pulse 2.4). Nevertheless, in broad terms, they would not have been in any doubt about what Paul was trying to do. He was, in his own way, a “philosopher,” seeking to persuade hearers to his particular “school.”

Romans throughout Christian History

In August 386 a professor of rhetoric sat in his friend Alypius’s garden in Milan and heard a child singing in a neighboring house, “Take up and read, take up and read!” Taking the scroll that lay at Alypius’s side, he found himself reading Rom. 13:13b–14, “not in orgies and drunkenness, not in promiscuity and licentiousness, not in rivalry and jealousy. But put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the desires of the flesh” (AT). Augustine’s reaction was immediate. “No further would I read, nor did I need to: at once, at the end of this sentence, a clear light flooded my heart, and all the darkness of doubt vanished away” (Conf. 8.29).

In November 1515, Martin Luther began lecturing to his students at Wittenberg (Germany) on the Letter to the Romans. He went on with his expositions until the following September; and as he did so, his own understanding changed.

I greatly desired to understand Paul’s Letter to the Romans, and nothing barred the way, save one expression, “the righteousness of God”—for I understood it to signify that righteousness whereby God is righteous and acts righteously in punishing the unrighteous.... Night and day I thought about this, until ... I took hold of the truth, that the righteousness of God is that righteousness whereby, through grace and sheer mercy, he justifies us by faith. At which I felt myself to be born again, and to have passed through open doors into Paradise. The whole of Scripture took on a new significance, and whereas before “the righteousness of God” had filled me with hate, now it became for me indescribably sweet in greater love. This passage of Paul became for me a gateway to heaven. (WA 54:179–87)

In his journal John Wesley tells us how, in the evening of May 24, 1738, he “went very unwillingly to a society in Aldersgate Street [London], where one was reading Luther’s Preface to the Epistle to the Romans. About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for my salvation; and an assurance was given me that he had taken my sins away, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death.”

At the end of World War I, and in the chaotic years immediately following, Karl Barth, pastor in Safenwil (Switzerland), looked for a theology that might enable him to function amid the turmoil around him. “I sat under an apple tree and began to apply myself to Romans with all the resources that were available to me at the time. I had already learned in my confirmation instruction that this book was of crucial importance. I began to read it through as I had never read it before.... I read and read and wrote and wrote” (“Nachwort,” 294). The result was Der Römerbrief, Barth’s commentary on Romans. The first edition, published in 1919, fell (in Karl Adams’s well-known words) “like a bombshell on the playground of the theologians.”

These four vignettes may serve to illustrate the effect that Paul’s Letter to the Romans has had, and continues to have, on Christian history. Other major interpreters throughout that history have included Chrysostom, Origen, Theodore of Mopsuestia, John Damascene, Oecumenius, Theophylact, Ambrosiaster, Hugh of St. Victor, Abelard, and Thomas Aquinas. To this day Romans continues to challenge the finest minds in Christendom. Certainly, there are differences over details of interpretation. But in general, all who listen to Romans agree as to what it is overall: a proclamation of Christian freedom. Not surprisingly, then, it has again and again been a factor in the renewal of the church.

Theological Significance

Gratia sola: The Gift of Salvation. According to Paul, there is “no distinction; for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God, being justified [dikaioumenoi] by his grace as a gift, through the redemption [apolytrōseōs] that is in Christ Jesus: whom God set forth to be a propitiation [mercy seat; hilastērion], by his own blood, (p 701) through faith (dia pisteōs)” (3:22b–25a AT). It is possible, though not certain, that Paul was here adapting a formula already familiar to the Roman church. In any case, the three metaphors that now fly past us like changing images on a cinema screen enable him to make his point with a force that has echoed through the centuries.

The first metaphor, “justified,” is about law and judgment. “Justify” (Greek: dikaioō) means “to treat as just,” or more simply, “to acquit.” For Paul, “justification” (dikaiōsis) is God’s declaration that we are not condemned, even though we are sinners; and through that declaration we are holy (set apart for God), for by it we are set in a positive relationship with the One who is holy. Hence, the believer is, in Luther’s matchless phrase, simul iustus et peccator, “simultaneously justified and a sinner.” This, as Karl Rahner finely said, is “God’s justice, that in fact divinises us, [being] an unmerited gift of God’s incalculable favor” (6)—and this is the justification that is brought about “through the redemption ... in Christ Jesus” (3:24 NRSV).

“Redemption (apolytrōsis)” is a metaphor from the slave market, but has roots in Scripture. The cognate verbs apolytroō and lytroō (both meaning “obtain release on payment of a ransom”) are used in the Septuagint (LXX) to speak of God's redemption of Israel from Egypt (e.g., Exod. 6:6; Deut. 7:8) and from Babylon (Isa. 51:11). "Redemption" therefore speaks of those who have been handed over, or fallen, into the power of something they cannot control—the dominant metaphor of Rom. 1:18–32, which has repeatedly spoken of humankind "handed over" into the power of sin.

Finally, "propitiation" (RSV: "expiation"; NRSV: "sacrifice of atonement") involves a metaphor from the cult. Greek hilastērion is a neuter noun formed from the (somewhat rare) adjective hilastērios, meaning "propitiatory" or "offered in propitiation." In the LXX this noun occurs regularly—and in the context of very important passages—in reference to the mercy seat in the temple (e.g., LXX: Exod. 31:7; 35:12). Since this seems to have become an accepted usage in Greek-speaking Judaism of the early Christian era (cf. Heb. 9:5; Philo, Cher. 25), there seems little reason to question that Paul, too, uses it in this way. If there was one thing in Judaism that was evidently forbidden to uncircumcised Gentiles, it was to come anywhere near the holy of holies, the place of the mercy seat, where once a year the high priest entered to make atonement by the sprinkling of blood (Lev. 16:14–16). There was therefore a peculiar poignancy in Paul's seeing Christ himself as a true mercy seat, "set forth" by God the Father for Jews and Gentiles to approach together—and that, not by the blood of animal victims, but "by his blood," the blood of the Messiah.

On what basis is Christ so "set forth"? It is "through faith" (diapisteōs). Whose faith? God's faith? Christ's faith? Ours? Here is a question that continues to occupy the scholars. But the answer, as Barth saw, is surely "Yes," to all (42). Rooted in the faithfulness of God, the faithfulness of Jesus Christ invites our faithfulness in return: indeed, there is nothing else we can offer, no other basis on which we can stand with regard to God. Paul, as a good rhetorician, brings us full circle. In "his gospel," as he said from the beginning, "God's justice is revealed from faith for faith; as it is written, 'the just shall live by faith' " (1:17 AT).

We have, then, a hope of salvation, but it is solely on the basis of God's justice and mercy. Therefore, all human boasting is absurd—indeed, it is denial of the one God (3:27–30). Surely paganism—the deification of powers or forces within creation—undermines Hebrew monotheism from one side; but a claim to status before God that is based on something other than God's justice and God's mercy undermines it from the other side. It makes no difference whether the claim is (as among some whom Paul addressed at Rome) based on knowledge of God's law, or (as among some he addressed at Corinth) on knowledge of another kind, or on wisdom, or on gifts—any such claim undermines Hebrew monotheism. Any such claim asserts, by implication, that God is in some sense and in some measure not God of a part of the created order, or that there is something inherently wrong with a part of that order. In short, such a claim asserts a dualism (Rom. 3:27–31; 10:12; cf. 1 Cor. 8:4–6). Therefore, paganism and dualism alike must be confronted by the unyielding confession that none stand before God, save on the basis of God’s justice and mercy (3:30).

On this basis Paul declares (among other things) that “all Israel will be saved” (11:26)—not thereby claiming that every single Jew will go to heaven, but certainly affirming his conviction that Israel as a whole, ethnic Israel, will find there is a place for her in the final salvation. Indeed, Paul went further, for he claimed finally, and on the same basis, that “God has consigned all ... to disobedience, that he may have mercy upon all” (cf. 11:32). As to how that was to happen, Paul did (p 702) not say. Like Dame Julian of Norwich centuries later, his confidence was simply in God’s promise in Jesus Christ: “This is the great deed intended by our Lord God from the beginning, cherished and concealed in his blessed breast, known only to himself, through which deed he will make all things well” (Revelations of Divine Love 32).

Una ecclesia sancta: Unity in Christ. If none of us has any standing before God save on the basis of God’s justice and mercy, what does that say about our relationships with each other, within the fellowship of faith? Paul’s discourse to the Romans did not take only the form of a protreptic, but also that of a “family letter.” Why? Because he regarded those whom he addressed not merely as individuals, but also as a household, God’s household, and therefore unavoidably bound to each other, even if they disagreed with or disliked each other. For Paul, proclaiming and hearing the gospel led directly to forming communities “in Christ”—communities of the new age, which had begun with the Messiah’s victory (Gal. 3:13–14). In short, the gospel led to the church (Rom. 12:1–5). Therefore, the important question for Paul about behavior was always not, “Does this square well with your conscience?” but, “Does this serve to build up your brothers and sisters in the community?” Especially is this the case if you happen to consider your brothers and sisters to be weaker than you are (14:1–15:13). And in any case, “Who are you to pass judgment on someone else’s servant? Before his own master he stands or falls. And he will be upheld, for the Lord is able to make him stand” (14:4 RSV adapted).

The ancients, and presumably Paul among them, were as well aware as we are of the violence of the world (see 2 Cor. 11:24–25). Rome itself was a frightening and violent city. Yet Paul thought it possible for believers to create among themselves what François Bovon has called “zones of peace” (371)—caring for one another “with mutual affection” (12:10 NRSV). In Rom. 12:1–15:13 (and notably at 14:1–15:13) the apostle insists on continuing fellowship in the church among groups who evidently differed widely among themselves in a range of significant matters of faith and practice. This continues to challenge not only the behavior of Christians toward each other within congregations, communities, and denominations. It also challenges the feeble ecumenism that marks all major Christian denominations in their relationships toward each other at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

Vita venturi saeculi: Christian Hope. Protreptic is more than exhortation to a way of living. Protreptic bases its exhortation on a perception of how the world is and how it will be. “For you did not receive the spirit of slavery to fall back into fear, but you have received the Spirit of adoption, through whom we cry ‘Abba! Father!’ The same Spirit bears witness in support of our spirit that we are children of God, and if children, then also heirs, heirs of God and coheirs with Christ, given that we suffer with him, in order that we may be glorified with him” (8:15–17 AT). “For the creation waits with eager longing for the revealing of the children of God; for creation was made subject to futility, not of its own accord, but because of the one who subjected it, in hope—because the creation itself will be set free from the bondage of corruption and obtain the liberty of the glory of the children of God” (8:19–21 AT). Paul’s hope, we should recognize, is not merely for the individual, or the church, or even humanity, but for “the creation.” Only with the redemption and restoration of the whole creation will God’s promises be fulfilled (Isa. 11:6–9).

To be “in Christ” is therefore by definition to “live in this hope” (Rom. 5:1–5; 8:24–25). Such hope (eschatology) is not simply an interesting idea, to be contemplated when we have leisure from more-pressing business (as one might indeed suppose from much of our contemporary preaching, even in the season of Advent). We do not have two lives, one transient and one (later on) that will be eternal. We have a single life, designed from eternity to be life in Christ Jesus. Because of that, it is worthwhile now to engage in the creative subversion that is Christian witness. Because of that, it is already “high time for you to awake from sleep. For now is our salvation nearer than when we first believed” (13:11 AT).

Bibliography

Barth, K. The Epistle to the Romans, trans. E. Hoskyns. Oxford University Press, 1933; Bovon, F. “The Child and the Beast.” HTR 92 (1999): 369–92;

Bryan, C. A Preface to Romans. Oxford University Press, 2000; Byrne, B. Romans. SP 6. Liturgical Press, 1996; Cranfield, C. E. B. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. 2 vols. ICC. T&T Clark, 1975–79; Dunn, J. D. G. Romans. 2 vols. WBC 38A–B. Word, 1988; Fitzmyer, J. Romans. AB 33. Doubleday, 1993; Julian of Norwich. Revelations of Divine Love; Käsemann, E. Commentary on Romans, trans. G. Bromiley. Eerdmans, 1980; Moo, D. The Epistle to the Romans. NICNT. Eerdmans, 1996; Rahner, K. Theological Investigations. 23 vols. Darton, Longman & Todd, 1961–92; Seneca. Ad Lucilium epistulae morales. Vol. 2, Letters 46–92, trans. R. Gummere. LCL 76. Heinemann, 1920; Wesley, J. Journal from February 1, 1738–August 12, 1738. Online: (p 703)http://www.godrules.net/library/wesley/274wesley\_a6.htm; Wright, N. T. “The Letter to the Romans.” NIB 10:393–770.

Christopher Bryan

Rorty, Richard     See Epistemology; Hermeneutics; Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation; Pragmatism

Rule of Faith

Kanōn tēs pisteōs, or tēs alētheias, the regula fidei, or regula veritatis are the oldest terms used by the Ante-Nicene fathers, Ignatius, Polycarp, and in particular Irenaeus and Tertullian, to refer to the sum content of apostolic teaching. The Rule of Faith is a confession of faith for public use in worship, in particular for use in baptism, and it outlines the authoritative articles of faith. For the most part it was not written down, other than in the above authors for the purpose of its defense, and was not revealed until baptism. To be noted, “faith” here in the Rule of Faith does not refer to subjective, individual experience but the faith of the church, received from apostolic preaching. As such, the Rule of Faith functions as a hermeneutical key for the interpretation of Scripture.

We can find early kernels of the Rule of Faith, which expand upon NT statements about Jesus and his relation to the Father, in Ignatius’s Letter to the Ephesians and Letter to the Trallians, and in Polycarp’s Letter to the Philippians. References to and longer summaries of the Rule of Faith can be found in Tertullian’s (160–225) Veiling of Virgins (1), where we see the similarities between the Rule of Faith and the creeds:

The Rule of Faith, indeed, is altogether one, alone immoveable and irreformable, the rule, to wit, of believing in one only God omnipotent, Creator of the Universe, and His Son Jesus Christ, born of the Virgin Mary, crucified under Pontius Pilate, raised again the third day from the dead, received in the heavens, sitting now at the right of the Father, destined to come to judge the quick and the dead through resurrection of the flesh as well [as of the Spirit]. The law of faith being constant, the other succeeding points of discipline and conversation admit the novelty of correction.

Again, in the Prescription against the Heretics, Tertullian summarizes the Rule of Faith as that which prescribes the belief that there is one only God, and that He is none other than the Creator of the World, who produced all things out of nothing through His own Word, first of all sent forth; that this Word is called His Son, and under the name of God was seen in diverse manners by the patriarchs, heard at all times in the prophets, at last brought down by the Spirit and Power of the Father into the Virgin Mary, was made flesh in her womb, and being born of her, went forth as Jesus Christ; thenceforth He preached the new law and the new promise of the Kingdom of Heaven, worked miracles, having been crucified, He rose again the third day; having ascended into the heavens, He sat at the right hand of the Father; sent instead of Himself the Power of the Holy Ghost to lead such as believe; will come with glory to take the saints to the enjoyment of everlasting life and of the heavenly promises, and to condemn the wicked to everlasting fire, after the resurrection of both these classes shall have happened, together with the restoration of the flesh.

We also find similar material in Irenaeus, who as early as 180 in his treatise Against the Heretics declares the church's understanding of the faith. This understanding can be expressed in different words, but the content remains the same: a trinitarian creedal affirmation that later develops into the fixed forms like the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed. The Rule of Faith, says Irenaeus, is like a rich man who puts his money in a bank: so the apostles deposited in the church their faith by bequeathing to the church the Rule of Faith and the Scriptures (Haer. 3.4.1). Irenaeus illustrates the relationship between the Rule of Faith and Scripture by using the metaphor of a mosaic (Haer. 1.8.1), which can be arranged to form the portrait of a king or that of a dog. In the ancient world, unassembled mosaics were shipped with the plan or key (hypothesis) according to which they were to be arranged. The Rule of Faith is like the key, he says, which explains how the Scriptures are to be arranged, to render the portrait of the King, whereas the heretics arrange the Scriptures wrongly to form the picture of a dog or fox. Thus, the Rule of Faith assures a correct reading of Scripture, indeed a christological reading (in accordance with the "King").

In a subsequent passage, Irenaeus points out how the heretics are exactly like the readers of Homer's poetry who take bits and pieces of text and string them together in their own fashion, taking them out of context such that they now form a new narrative (Haer. 1.9.4). (Tertullian also refers to these Homeric textual distortions, in Praescr. 39.)

So the person who holds to himself unswervingly the Canon of Truth he received in baptism, will recognise the names and terms and parables as being from the scripture, but will not recognise this blasphemous hypothesis of theirs. Though he will detect the mosaic pieces, he will not accept the fox instead of the king's image. Restoring each of the expressions to its own rank, and accommodating it to the body of (p 704) truth, he will expose as naked and unsubstantiated their fiction. (Irenaeus, Haer. 1.9.4)

The hypothesis is characterized implicitly as the "king's face," or the christological referent. The "plan" is christological, as we see in Irenaeus's Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching. He links the Father and the Son, insisting that the Word is active in creation, that the Creator God is the God of both OT and NT (Epid. 6). This is precisely what the heretics do not acknowledge. The Rule of Faith, then, forms a hermeneutical circle, inside of which are many possible, not overdetermined, readings of Scripture, while outside are the readings of the heretics. Again, "The law of faith being constant, the other succeeding points of discipline and conversation admit the novelty of correction" (Tertullian, Virg. 1).

The Rule of Faith thus functions hermeneutically to hold together theologically the confessions of God the Creator and Jesus Christ the Son, and thus also to bring together in a dialectical relation the two Testaments. The Rule is thus a basic "take" on the subject matter and plot of the Christian story, which couples the confession of Jesus the Redeemer with the confession of God the Creator, and thus "rules out" heretical statements that do not honor the content of the Rule. Understood to have been drawn from Scripture (Tertullian claims that this rule was taught by Christ himself), in biblical interpretation it is reapplied to Scripture. Thus, it circumscribes a potential set of interpretations while disallowing others.

Later in the history of the church, the Rule of Faith came to be hermeneutically important again in defining the role and scope of what becomes known as the "literal sense" of Scripture, especially as we see it in Reformation interpretation. The literal sense for the Reformers, against any notion of multiple meaning of Scripture such as threefold or fourfold meaning, takes on the authority of the Rule of Faith. Where the Rule of Faith is not followed, the Reformers deem that reading of Scripture as inadequate and therefore as not adhering to the literal sense. All readings that (the "law of faith being constant") honor the Rule of Faith are therefore deemed authoritative or "literal." In this sense the Rule of Faith is key to the Reformation's reaction against Roman multiple meanings in its interpretation of Scripture, and is key to the sense in which Scripture is authoritative for the church catholic. Ultimately, it is the Rule of Faith that is behind the statement that Scripture is sui ipsius interpres, the conviction that Scripture is its own interpreter.

See also Literal Sense; Patristic Biblical Interpretation; Scripture, Unity of

Bibliography

Blocher, H. "The Analogy of Faith in the Study of Scripture." Scottish Bulletin of Evangelical Theology 5 (1987): 17–38; Blowers, P. "The 'Regula Fidei' and the Narrative Character of Early Christian Faith." ProEccl 6 (1997): 199–228; Countryman, W. "Tertullian and the Regula Fidei." Second Century 2 (1982): 208–27; Hägglund, B. "Die Bedeutung der 'regula fidei' als Grundlage theologischer Aussagen." ST 12 (1958): 1–44; Osborn, E. "Reason and the Rule of Faith in the Second Century AD." Pages 40–61 in The Making of Orthodoxy, ed. R. Williams. Cambridge University Press, 1989; Yeago, D. "The New Testament and the Nicene Dogma: A Contribution to the Recovery of Theological Exegesis." ProEccl 3 (1994): 152–64.

Kathryn Greene-McCreight

Ruth, Book of

The book of Ruth tells how a Bethlehemite family of Elimelech and Naomi, with sons Mahlon and Chilion, migrates to Moab to escape famine. All the males die there, leaving Naomi with two widowed daughters-in-law. The story develops around the return of Naomi with Ruth to Bethlehem, and the events leading to Ruth's marriage to Elimelech's kinsman, Boaz, and the birth of Obed, forming part of David's genealogy.

History of Interpretation

Various theories for the book's purpose have been proposed, such as the following:

In Praise of Khesed. This has ancient rabbinic support; according to R. Ze'ira, it was written to "teach how great is the reward of those who do deeds of kindness" (Ruth Rabbah 2.14). Some modern scholars concur (such as Würthwein; Rebera, "Ruth"; Bush). If khesed were the main theme, however, then the word might be expected at more focal points, particularly 2:11–12; 4:14–15. God is petitioned to do khesed (1:8), while Boaz (2:20) and Ruth (3:10) are praised for showing it. The actors are praised for behavior conforming to an accepted ideal, rather than the ideal itself being encouraged or praised. Khesed is an important but auxiliary motif to the purpose of the story.

To Encourage Performance of the Levirate. This is unlikely. Regardless of whether the story of Ruth is truly an instance of levirate marriage, we observe that the social customs are neither (p 705)evaluated nor praised but are simply background to the story.

As a Defense of Mixed Marriage. This would counter the exclusiveness of Ezra and Nehemiah by showing that even the great David had Moabite ancestry—suggested as long ago as 1816 by Bertholdt (Rowley 173n1) and widely accepted in the early twentieth century, but rarely today. Lacocque is a modern exponent (84–116). If this view were correct, then Ruth must be dated late; but many scholars believe the book is preexilic. Rowley explains that Ruth might as easily be read as supporting Ezra and Nehemiah, since Ruth is shown to be a true convert.

To Support Inclusion of Gentiles. Ruth is viewed not as a defense of mixed marriage per se, but as encouraging acceptance of believing Gentiles. Though it was considered important to uphold the exclusiveness of Israel's monotheism, the book of Ruth demonstrates the possibility of Gentiles truly converting to Yahwism (cf. Herbert 271). Sakenfeld (4) sees the story as "legitimizing an inclusive attitude towards foreigners, perhaps especially towards foreign women." Irrespective of whether we accept an inclusivist purpose for the book, Ruth's ethnicity and inclusion are clearly significant motifs. But it should be recognized that in contexts where her Moabite ancestry receives mention, it is followed by a corresponding note, either of her relationship as daughter-in-law of Naomi (Ruth 2–3 passim), or, in Ruth 4:5, 10, that she is wife of Mahlon. So, while Ruth's Moabite ancestry is seen as a problem, her marriage to Boaz is legitimated by its intention to continue Mahlon's lineage. Rather than defending mixed marriages in general, the book of Ruth is defending one particular marriage. Hence, the inclusion motif is important but is not the central purpose of the book.

To Demonstrate Divine Providence. The book may intend to show God's hand in events giving rise to the Davidic monarchy. Theological elements are certainly found in the story, such as the providential answering of prayer, the reversal motif, the practice of khesed, and so on (see "Theological Aspects of Ruth," below). But the paucity of narrative theological statements suggests that the theological dimension is in some respects auxiliary to the purpose.

Nontheological Readings. Various literary readings have appeared in the last quarter century, such as Sasson's formalist-folklorist approach, focusing on the literary artistry of Ruth while playing down "theology" (qualified in the foreword to Sasson's second edition). It is true that narrative statements of Yahweh's activity are rare in Ruth and the exceptions (1:6; 4:13) could be interpreted as part of Israelite belief in Yahweh's general providence over matters of fertility. Thus, Rebera's discourse analysis (esp. "Ruth," 181–244) shows that Ruth, like the author of the succession narrative, prefers to embed theological evaluation in dialogue. The author appears reluctant to show his or her own tendenz, if there is one.

“Realistic” Readings. Against a long tradition of interpreting Naomi, Ruth, and Boaz as “ideal” characters worthy to be emulated, some recent studies have highlighted the gritty realism of the story (e.g., Fewell and Gunn). Naomi is viewed as a self-centered character, whose silence after Ruth’s magnificent vow of loyalty indicates her hardness of heart. Moreover, she ignores Ruth when lamenting her emptiness before the women of Bethlehem, thus showing that she considers Ruth a liability. Likewise, Boaz has been portrayed as protective of his own interests in a self-righteous manner, needing a push before he is prepared to act as redeemer.

However, while the story is realistic, Naomi’s behavior in the first chapter conforms better to the effects of depression. It may be Naomi’s concern for Ruth that leads to her attempt to persuade her to stay in Moab, recognizing that a Moabite might not be welcome in Bethlehem. As for Boaz, he treats Ruth kindly enough, but in view of the age difference, he may have considered himself an unlikely candidate for Ruth’s amour. When she did signal her availability, he responded with alacrity, but also with restraint, out of respect for the nearer kinsman.

As an Apology for David. This may be necessary because of David’s Moabite ancestry. According to Deuteronomy, Moabites were prohibited from entering the congregation till the tenth generation (Deut. 23:3–6). However, Ruth shows that despite her Moabite ancestry, she was a person of great worth, loyal to Mahlon’s kinsfolk, loyal to his memory in seeking marriage to his kinsman Boaz, and a true believer in the God of Israel. Moreover, the events leading to the marriage of Boaz to Ruth, followed by the birth of Obed, were providential. The portrayal of the marriage as leviratic also served as part of its justification. The information that this concerned David’s ancestry is kept to the end so as not to arouse audience prejudice prematurely (cf. 2 Sam. 12:1–7).

The advantages of interpreting Ruth as “Davidic apologetic” are that it incorporates and accounts for the focus on khesed and explains the (p 706)preponderance of kin terms, especially where Ruth’s Moabite ancestry receives mention. Thus, in Ruth 2 the inclusion motif is emphasized, and Ruth 4 settles the legal basis of the marriage. Further, it accounts for the inclusion of theological elements, including providential answers to prayer and Ruth’s conversion, as well as the restraint of the author in making narrative theological statements. Finally, the apologetic interpretation accounts for a feature unique in Hebrew narrative—a genealogy placed at the end rather than the beginning.

Canonical Context

Ruth's canonical position was fluid. The MT locates Ruth in the Ketubim (Writings) but with divergent order. The Babylonian Talmud (B. Bat. 14b) places Ruth ahead of Psalms. The Ben Asher family of Masoretes (see BHS) place Ruth at the head of the Megillot, directly after Proverbs, perhaps answering the question, "Who can find a worthy woman?" (Prov. 31:10 AT). A later tradition found in the Ben Hayyim family of manuscripts has Song of Songs first, since it is read at Passover, followed by Ruth, read at the Feast of Weeks/Pentecost.

The LXX, followed by the Latin Vulgate and Christian tradition, sets Ruth between Judges and Samuel. This appears to be supported by Josephus (C. Ap. 1.8), who speaks of a twenty-two-book Hebrew canon. Jerome in his prologue to Samuel and Kings knows of a twenty-four-book canon but claims a twenty-two-book canon was accepted by most Jews, this being achieved by combining Judges with Ruth and Lamentations with Jeremiah. By contrast, the Babylonian Talmud (B. Bat. 14b–15a) and 2 Esd. 14:44–46 hold to a twenty-four-book canon; Ruth and Lamentations are separated from Judges and Jeremiah respectively and included with the Megillot.

These two traditions—one setting Ruth in the Former Prophets (so Moore 294–95; Linafelt xviii–xxv), the other among the Writings (so Campbell 32–36; Bush 5–9)—each have ancient support. Any preference must be tentative, but it is worth recognizing the interpretative consequences. The setting in the Writings would attribute to Ruth a liturgical purpose, including a fertility motif. Placing Ruth between Judges and Samuel sets Ruth in the transition from tribal federation to monarchy, emphasizing Ruth's role in salvation history.

The sorry tale of Judg. 17–18 is set in Ephraim, the territory of Jeroboam, and the terrible events of 19–21 relate to Gibeah, the home of Saul. Both stories are replete with cultic elements, but cult gone awry. By contrast, Ruth, set in Bethlehem, lacks cultic elements. Instead, we find a community of ordinary people serving Yahweh as they go about the business of everyday life and showing khesed to those in need. This reflects favorably on the origins of David, while showing us a better way.

Theological Aspects of Ruth

Prayer and Blessing. Ruth has been thought theologically sparse since only 1:6 and 4:13 provide narrative statements of Yahweh's activity, but as Rebera observes, Ruth mostly embeds theological evaluation in dialogue ("Ruth," esp. 181–244). This has significance for seeing that prayer constitutes a significant part of the “theology.” Prayers or blessings include (1) 1:8–9; (2) 1:20–21; (3) 2:11–12; 3:10; compare Gen. 15; 30:16, 18; and Ps. 127:3, where reward is linked with progeny; (4) 2:19–20; (5) 3:10–11; (6) 4:11–12; (7) 4:14–15. All these prayers/blessings have fulfillment in the marriage of Ruth to Boaz, and a lineage leading to David. The author of Ruth expected readers to be alert to the work of God in answering prayer, as should we today. Like Boaz, we too may be called to participate in answering our own prayers.

Providence. As well as the divine activity suggested by answered prayer, providence is discerned in the reversal of the famine (1:6), leading to Naomi’s return with Ruth. While chapters 2 and 3 lack overt narrative theological statements, chapter 2 first introduces us to Boaz and tells us that Ruth “happened” upon the field of Boaz, hinting at divine overruling. This echoes the meeting of Abraham’s servant and Rebekah (Gen. 24, also overruled by Yahweh). There is concurrency between divine and human activity. Although God is the unseen actor, this is very much a human story, about “people, living as they are to live under God’s sovereignty, who proceed to work it out” (Campbell 29). Thus, Naomi counsels Ruth to act boldly to achieve marriage with Boaz. Ruth plays her part, but after she returns home in the morning, Naomi counsels her to wait to see how the matter falls out. While Boaz can be relied on, ultimately the result is in the hand of God. Chapter 4 likewise points to concurrency. Boaz does his part by marrying Ruth, but we are told that it is Yahweh who gives conception (4:13).

Reversal Motif. In the OT, it is Yahweh who “sends poverty and wealth,” who “lifts the needy from the ash heap” (1 Sam. 2:7). In the book of Ruth, there is a movement from emptiness to fulfillment. Elimelech migrates to escape famine (p 707), but dies; his sons marry, and die. Naomi, widowed and childless, is left with two childless widows. News of Yahweh’s providence prompts her return, commencing a movement from deprivation to restoration. In the remainder of the story, Naomi’s immediate needs are met through Ruth’s industry and Boaz’s generosity. The levirate marriage of Boaz and Ruth plus the birth of Obed restores the lineage.

Conversion/Inclusion. Ethnicity is first mentioned when the sons of Elimelech marry Moabite women (1:4). Once Ruth arrives in Bethlehem, it becomes a key issue because there she is a foreigner (Rebera, “Ruth,” 156–59), being mentioned at 1:22; 2:2, 6, 10, 21, and twice during the legal case (4:5, 10). But it is important to observe a countermovement for Ruth’s inclusion. When Naomi counsels Ruth to return to her god(s) and people, Ruth vows allegiance to Naomi in life and death, declaring, “Your people shall be my people and your God my God” (1:16 NRSV), showing that she is a convert to Yahwism. Whenever Ruth’s Moabite origins are mentioned in the remainder of the story, there are kin terms linking her to her Judahite family. She is described as “daughter-in-law of Naomi,” and by both Naomi and Boaz as “my daughter” (2:2, 8). Chapter 2 highlights Boaz’s actions to include Ruth; he approves her actions and gives her protection (2:8–16). Ethnicity is not an issue in chapter 3 but arises again in 4. Twice in the legal case, Ruth is described as Moabite, but the countering fact of her marriage to Mahlon is then immediately mentioned. Hence, the marriage of Boaz and Ruth is viewed as leviratic and legally justified. When the women give their final blessing at the birth of a son, Ruth’s inclusion is complete. Now she is “your daughter-in-law who loves you, who is [worth] more to you than seven sons” (4:15 NRSV).

Kindness (Khesed). This motif has long been recognized (1:8; probably 2:11; definitely 3:10; 2:20, supported by Rebera [“Yahweh or Boaz?”]). Earlier studies of the Hebrew word khesed pointed to the loyalty expected in reciprocal relationships, implying obligation. But in the OT khesed contains a gracious element: in human relationships it “mainly describes exceptional acts of one human to another, meeting an extreme need outside the normal run of perceived duty, and arising from personal affection or goodness” (Andersen 81). The KJV comes close to this sense with “loving-kindness.” God in his grace and mercy shows such kindness to humans; he does not owe salvation but gives it freely. The nature of the divine-human relationship means we cannot give khesed to God. But if we have experienced God’s loving-kindness, we can, like Ruth and Boaz, demonstrate it in our relationships with others (cf. Mic. 6:8; Matt. 25:34–40; 1 John 4:7–12).

The Place of Women. Whether or not we posit a female author (cf. Campbell 22–23), Ruth’s story is unique among ancient literature in celebrating female friendship (cf. Daube 35–37). The power of the story lies largely in the hands of female characters. Elimelech, his wife, and sons commence the story, but the males soon die. Thereafter, Ruth and Naomi are the main characters, with Boaz being given third place. In a sense, his is a supporting role, and the heroine receives the larger role, highlighted by the fact that it is Ruth, not Boaz, who proposes marriage in 3:9. Boaz has the lead role in the legal case, but it is the women who again take the lead in 4:13–17. In the patrilineal genealogical material (4:18–22), Ruth drops from view, but this should not be viewed negatively. The outsider has now been integrated into Israelite history. The story of Ruth is a reminder of how much women with chutzpah can achieve even in a society that restricts their roles.

Davidic Messianic Role. The marriage of an Israelite to a Moabite and the genealogy of David are key elements in understanding the book of Ruth. The book seeks to justify the marriage of Boaz to Ruth, a believing Gentile, and hence to defend the claim of the Davidic line to the throne. There is a move in recent scholarship to favor some such view (e.g., Gerleman; Gow; Hubbard; Nielsen; Block), although with a variety of views as to the possible historical setting for such an apologetic. As part of the lineage of the Davidic king, the story becomes messianic in character, partially fulfilled in the Davidic monarchy, but widened out to bring blessing to the whole world through a future descendant of David (cf. Gen. 12:1–3; Matt. 1; Rom. 1:3).

Bibliography

Andersen, F. I. “Yahweh, the Kind and Sensitive God.” Pages 41–88 in God Who Is Rich in Mercy. Anzea, 1986; Atkinson, D. The Message of Ruth. InterVarsity, 1983; Block, D. Judges, Ruth. NAC. Broadman & Holman, 1999; Bush, F. Ruth, Esther. WBC 9. Word, 1996; Campbell, E. F. Ruth. AB 7. Doubleday, 1975; Daube, D. Ancient Jewish Law. Brill, 1981; Farmer, K. The Book of Ruth. NIB. Abingdon, 1998; Fewell, D. N., and D. M. Gunn. “‘A Son Is Born to Naomi’: Literary Allusion and Interpretation in the Book of Ruth.” JSOT 40 (1988): 99–108; Fisch, H. “Ruth and the Structure of Covenant History.” VT 32 (1982): 425–37; Gerleman, G. Ruth. Biblischer Kommentar, Altes Testament Bd. 18. Neukirchener Verlag, 1981; Gow, M. The Book of (p 708)Ruth. Apollos, 1992; idem. “Prayer and Providence in the Book of Ruth.” Journal of the Christian Brethren Research Fellowship 101 (1985): 9–25; Hals, R. M. The Theology of the Book of Ruth. Fortress, 1969; Herbert, A. “Ruth.” Pages 271–72 in Peake’s Commentary of the Bible, ed. M. Black and H. Rowley. T. Nelson, 1962; Hubbard, R., Jr. The Book of Ruth. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1988; idem. “Ruth, Theology of.” NIDOTTE 4:1153–57; Lacocque, A. The Feminine Unconventional. Fortress, 1990; Larkin, K. J. A. Ruth and Esther. OTG. Sheffield Academic Press, 1996; Linafelt, T. Ruth. Berit Olam. Liturgical Press, 1999; Merrill, E. “The Book of Ruth: Narration and Shared Themes.” BSac 142 (1985): 130–41; Moore, M. S. Ruth. NIBCOT 5. Hendrickson, 2000; Nielsen, K. Ruth. OTL. SCM/Westminster John Knox, 1997; Porten, B. “The Scroll of Ruth: A Rhetorical Study.” Gratz 7 (1978): 23–49; Prinsloo, W. S. “The Theology of the Book of Ruth.” VT 30 (1980): 330–41; Rebera, B. “The Book of Ruth.” Ph.D. diss., Macquarie University (Sydney, Australia), 1981; idem. “Yahweh or Boaz? Ruth 2.20 Reconsidered.” BT 36 (1985): 317–27; Rowley, H. H. “The Marriage of Ruth.” Pages 171–94 in The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the Old Testament. Blackwell, 1965; Sakenfeld, K. D. Ruth. Interpretation. John Knox, 1999; Sasson, J. M. Ruth. 2d ed. JSOT, 1989; Tribble, P. God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality. Fortress, 1978; Van Wolde, E. Ruth and Naomi. ET, SCM/Smyth & Helwys, 1997; Wegner, P. “Ruth.” EDBT, 694–96;

(p 709) S

Sacrament

The English word “sacrament” derives from the Latin word for “sign” (sacramentum) for the Greek word “mystery” (mystērion). In secular contexts, mystērion referred to a religious rite or oath, as sacramentum was used especially in military contexts when individuals were inducted into the army. It is difficult to locate a topic more illustrative of the deep inner connections of faith and practice.

The History of Exegesis

In understanding the sacraments, considerable latitude prevailed during the patristic period and the Middle Ages (between Bernard and Thomas Aquinas). The thirteenth century (Fourth Lateran Council and Thomas), however, saw the development of the sacramentology that would culminate in the decrees of the Council of Trent, when the doctrine of transubstantiation became settled and binding. Although the elements still retained the accidental properties of bread and wine, they were in reality transubstantiated into the substance of Christ’s body and blood. At Trent (1545–63), the sacraments (now formally established as seven in number) were regarded as conferring grace ex opere operato (by doing it, it is done). Baptism effects the “first justification” (regeneration and forgiveness), and the increase in grace occurs through penance, confirmation, the Supper, marriage, ordination, and extreme unction (last rites).

Martin Luther’s protest encountered two fronts: Rome and the “enthusiasts” or, as they came to be called (especially by their critics), Anabaptists. Against the former, Luther argued the importance of faith, denied that the Mass was a perpetual sacrifice of Christ, and affirmed only those sacraments that he believed had dominical sanction and were evangelical in character: baptism, the Supper, and absolution. With respect to the Supper, Luther so emphasized the union of the two natures in Christ that the properties of deity were transferred to the humanity of Christ (his understanding of the communicatio idiomatum). “Thus, what is true in regard to Christ is also true in regard to the Sacrament” (LWorks 36:35). This was extended to include the notion of the genus majestaticum (genus of majesty: according to his human nature Jesus possessed all the attributes of deity at birth). Thus, the ascended Christ can be physically present at every altar by means of an illocal rather than local presence. This last point is often overlooked by non-Lutheran theologians who erroneously attribute to the Lutheran view the doctrine of ubiquity (see Mueller).

The Zurich Reformer Ulrich Zwingli appealed to John 6 as a spiritual rather than carnal eating (in line with Augustine’s exegesis), and emphasized Christ’s bodily ascension. But it is evident from Zwingli’s writings that at least as fundamental as his exegesis was his commitment to a Neoplatonic body-soul dualism, which colored his Christology and his view of the Supper. For Zwingli, influenced in part by Erasmus’s interpretation, the sacraments were primarily pledges of the believer toward God, rather than vice versa.

Strasbourg’s Martin Bucer (who had also helped shift the Church of England from a Zwinglian to a more “Calvinian” view) embraced a mediating position, which reached its mature articulation in his disciple, John Calvin. Philipp Melanchthon, author of the Augsburg Confession and Apology, who had steadied Luther’s hand against Zwingli at the Marburg Colloquy (1529), nevertheless saw in the young reformer of Geneva a potential ally. Rejecting what it regarded as Melanchthon’s compromise, the Book of Concord (1580) returned to the unaltered version of the Augsburg Confession and added statements clarifying what became the orthodox Lutheran position.

Insisting that believers truly feed on Christ’s body and blood in the sacrament, Calvin had described Zwingli’s view of the Supper as “wrong and pernicious.” At the same time, he rejected both transubstantiation and Luther’s account of an illocal presence in and under the elements. He agreed with Zwingli about Christ’s ascension to the Father’s right hand but, unlike the Zurich (p 710) Reformer, emphasized the role of the Holy Spirit in bringing together mysteriously what is distant. Thus, the work of the Spirit in effecting union with Christ became crucial to Calvin’s eucharistic theology. “I would rather adore the mystery than explain it,” Calvin concluded (Inst. 4.17.32). As for baptism, God’s action was again central: “And as the instruments of the Holy Spirit are not dead, God truly performs and effects by baptism what he figures” (Second Defense 2.319; cf. Inst. 4.16.3). Sacraments were necessary because of our weakness, and here Calvin rejected Zwingli’s view that faith needed no props. Far different from Zwingli’s philosophical objection to the view that spiritual riches can be given or received through physical means, Calvin states, “Here our merciful Lord ... leads us to himself even by these earthly elements” (Inst. 4.1). To deny the real presence of Christ and a true feeding on his body and blood in the Supper “is to render this holy sacrament frivolous and useless—an execrable blasphemy unfit to be listened to” (Calvin, Short Treatise, 170).

The sixteenth-century Belgic, French, and Scots’ confessions and the Thirty-Nine Articles, as well as the Westminster Confession and Catechisms (1645), regard the sacraments as “effectual means of salvation ... only by the working of the Holy Spirit, and the blessing of Christ by whom they are instituted” (W. Larger Catechism, Q. 161). The reality, however, must be received. The sacraments are therefore “signs and seals” of God’s favor to us and, in the case of infant baptism, to our children. In the Supper believers receive nothing less than the true body and blood of Christ, with, though not in and under, the bread and wine. Consequently, Calvin, against the practice of infrequent communion, urged a weekly celebration.

Despite the modern rationalism that continues to downplay the importance of the sacraments, renewed attention and consensus have also been in evidence. Some (e.g., Bloesch; Webster) have explored the sacramental character of biblical interpretation (as a mediation of revelation), and others (e.g., Wolterstorff; Vanhoozer) have appropriated speech-act theory as a way of underscoring the performative function of the sacraments as divine discourse. Catholic as well as Protestant reflection is marked by a wide range of views. Although Karl Barth (1886–1968) seems to have preferred more Zwinglian views, the reforms of Vatican II and the exegetical studies generated during the height of the ecumenical movement have contributed to a greater consensus.

Biblical-Theological Issues

While no specific biblical passage identifies baptism or the Lord’s Supper by the word mystērion, Scripture does assign the terms “sign and seal,” as Paul referred to circumcision under the old covenant (Rom. 4:11). And although there is no set of passages defining the nature of a sacrament in general, there are many describing the nature of baptism and the Lord’s Supper. By working our way inductively from the exegesis of these passages, we are able to arrive at a broader understanding of sacraments.

Jesus, of course, was baptized by John (Matt. 3:13–17), but would himself baptize with the Spirit (v. 11). In his Great Commission, Jesus declared, “Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He who believes and is baptized will be saved; but he who does not believe will be condemned” (Mark 16:15–16 NKJV). The disciples are to baptize with water “in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 28:19). Baptism is described in the NT as the sealing of the promise to believers and their children, and indeed, even to strangers who will embrace it (Acts 2:39). When his audience asks what they must do to be saved, Peter replies, “Repent, and let every one of you be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins; and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit” (v. 38 NKJV). This seems to be a settled answer, since we meet with it again in Acts 22:16: “Be baptized, and wash away your sins, calling on the name of the Lord” (NKJV). The salvation of Noah and his family through water was a type of which baptism is the antitype (1 Pet. 3:20–22).

Similarly, the Lord’s Supper is described as the “body” of Christ and “new covenant in my blood” (Matt. 26:26–29; Luke 22:14–21), “a participation [koinōnia] in the blood ... and ... body of Christ” (1 Cor. 10:16). Those who eat and drink unworthily are guilty of sinning not simply against bread and wine but against “the body and blood of the Lord” (1 Cor. 11:27 NKJV). We dare not underestimate the realism in these declarations. Yet God’s freedom and sovereignty are checks on our tendencies to have God at our disposal (John 3:5, 8; Rom. 4:11; 9:6–18).

In the light of such passages, and a larger biblical-theological treatment, we may perhaps understand the sacraments first and foremost as covenantal rituals: a cutting ceremony (circumcision), with analogies in ancient treaty-making, and a bonding meal (Passover). In the Passover meal, even those descendants who were not themselves (p 711) present in the exodus from Egypt are united to their ancestors as one people liberated from bondage.

The NT explicitly picks up these redemptive threads in the institution of baptism and the Lord’s Supper. The unity of the church is found in “one Lord, one faith, one baptism” (Eph. 4:5). Jesus instituted the Supper with the words, “Take and eat; this is my body.... This is my blood of the new covenant” (Matt. 26:26–29 NIV margin; Luke 22:14–21). We have been baptized into Christ just as Israel had been baptized into Moses through the cloud and in the sea, and they “all ate the same spiritual food, and all drank the same spiritual drink. For they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ” (1 Cor. 10:1–4 NKJV). Paul appeals to baptism as a new circumcision (Col. 2:11–12), being buried and raised with Christ (Rom. 6:3–9; Gal. 3:27). Like the Passover, the Lord’s Supper is not merely a memorial of a past event but also participation in that event, and in the ongoing work of the Spirit.

This raises the importance of eschatology: the sacraments are signs and seals of God’s promise, which means the word of the gospel. It is not just the memory of a past event, but participation in its ongoing reality as well as a proclamation of Christ’s saving work until he returns (1 Cor. 11:26). Like Israel in the wilderness, the church in between the two advents experiences the “already” and “not yet” of redemption—the inbreaking of Christ’s new creation through word and sacrament (Heb. 6:4–5). Whichever view of the sacraments we embrace, it should be able to affirm the real tension between sign and reality, faith and sight, hope and presence.

See also Baptism; Lord’s Supper

Bibliography

Augustine. Of Baptism, Against the Donatists. Vol. 4 of NPNF<sub>1</sub>; idem. On Christian Doctrine. Vol. 2 of NPNF<sub>1</sub>; Calvin, J. Institutes of the Christian Religion. 1536, trans. F. L. Battles. John Knox, 1975; idem. Short Treatise on the Supper of Our Lord. Pages 163–98 in vol. 2 of Selected Works of John Calvin, ed. H. Beveridge and J. Bonnet. Baker, 1983; Cross, F., ed. St. Cyril of Jerusalem’s Lectures on the Christian Sacraments. St. Vladimir’s Seminary Press, 1995; Faith and Order Commission. Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry 1982–1990. WCC Publications, 1990; Kelly, J. N. D. Early Christian Doctrines. Rev. ed. Harper & Row, 1978; Kline, M. By Oath Consigned. Eerdmans, 1968; Luther, M. Word and Sacraments. Vols. 1–4 of LWorks; McDonnell, K. John Calvin, the Church, and the Eucharist. Princeton University Press, 1967; Melancthon, P. Loci communes, trans. J. A. O. Preus. Concordia, 1992; Mueller, J. T. Christian Dogmatics. Concordia, 1934; Schillebeeckx, E. Christ, the Sacrament of the Encounter with God. Sheed & Ward, 1963; Schlink, E. Theology of the Lutheran Confessions, trans. P. Koehneke and H. Bouman. Fortress, 1961; SchulteSchulte, , RR. . “Sacraments“Sacraments..” Pages ” Pages 378–84 in vol. 5 of Sacramentum mundi, ed. K. Rahner et al. Herder & Herder, 1968; Thomas Aquinas. Summa theologica, trans. Fathers of the English Dominican Province. Vol. 5. Christian Classics, 1981; Zwingli, U. Commentary on True and False Religion, ed. S. Jackson and C. Heller. Labyrinth, 1981.

Michael S. Horton

Sadducees See Jewish Context of the NT

Salvation, Doctrine of Salvation is a central concept within Christian theology, and a disputed one. Both the importance and the arguments have deep roots within the biblical tradition. Within the OT, at least one of the basic identifications of God is as the one who saved Israel: “Yahweh your God, who brought you up out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery.” While the “God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob” formula and the covenant formula (“I will be your God, and you will be my people”) are less straightforwardly about salvation than about election, the covenant, at least, should probably be seen in soteriological terms. For Israel to be God’s people means that God has saved and will save Israel. In the NT, the message of salvation is even more central. “You are to name him Jesus, for he will save his people ...” (Matt. 1:21 NRSV) is the fundamental announcement, and the Pauline corpus regularly describes Christians as those who are being saved. We need to take seriously the warnings that Jesus’ own teaching was less about salvation than the coming of the kingdom, and that the center of Pauline theology is incorporation in Christ, not some Lutheran account of guilt and forgiveness. Yet the kingdom and being in Christ are both, when examined, soteriological categories.

These reflections immediately raise the disputes. “Salvation” is a concept that demands further specification: people are not just “saved”; they must, it would seem, be saved from something; and mechanisms and agents of salvation also need identifying. Unquestionably, biblically, God saves, but this might mean many things. God’s salvation might mean that he delivers the oppressed from their captivity into a new socioeconomic situation in the exodus, or that he removes the disgrace of the barren woman who cries out to him for a child, as in the case of Hannah. Again, God’s saving acts can be an intervention on the (p 712)side of his people in political and military conflict, allowing them to be those who oppress others, forcing them to be “hewers of wood and drawers of water” (Josh. 9:21 NRSV); or it can be a deliverance of the nation from its ruler’s guilt (1 Chron. 21). The list could go on.

It is historically difficult to judge how widespread or varied Jewish messianic expectation was at the time of Jesus. But the Gospels certainly witness to a series of debates about the nature of the salvation that he will bring, and the way he will bring it. The temptation narratives (Luke 4:1–13 et par.) can be read in this light, as can John’s account of the people’s desire to make Jesus king (6:15), and even the mocking at the cross: “He saved others; let him save himself!” (Luke 23:35). In each case, what is in dispute is the nature of the salvation that God’s Christ will bring.

This complexity, combined with the recent fashion in certain schools of biblical studies for atomized readings of the canonical texts, leads to a multiplicity of accounts of salvation. On such readings, there is no biblical (and hence no theological) account of salvation; rather, there are competing accounts within the canon that witness to different visions of salvation, and to which different theological constructions may appeal. In this area the basic challenge for a theological reading of Scripture is to recognize the real diversity present in the Scriptures, which drives such particularizing tendencies, while seeking a rich account of the fundamental unity of all the different pictures and emphases.

Historical study of the OT suggests that the earliest understanding of God in the life of the people of Israel was an account of salvation: God is the God of the patriarchs, who brought up his people out of Egypt and rescued them from the land of slavery. This recognition is central to the worship of God's people in the Psalms, and to the regulation of their shared life in the law codes. The Decalogue itself begins with an announcement of this salvation, and the laws that follow flow from it. Notably, in the various canonical forms of the exodus narrative, there is no suggestion of a connection between salvation and morality: God's people are not in need of salvation because of their failings; they are not saved because of (or even through) their repentance. The covenant relation between God and Israel is presented in this foundational story as utterly amoral, in the sense that Israel's part is to be the passive recipients of God's promises. (God's actions are, of course, profoundly moral, in that he acts to keep his promises.) The giving of the law, which follows covenant and salvation, introduces the issue of Israel's faithfulness into the situation.

In the Deuteronomic history, Joshua and Judges (and, indeed, the later books) continue this message of God's salvation as a political, social, and economic reality, but it is now intimately linked to the obedience of God's people. Disobedience to the covenant stipulations, spelled out in explicitly moral terms ("Israel did what was evil in the sight of Yahweh"), brought military defeat and political subjection. Discovering and removing the source of pollution (e.g., in the case of Achan), or a national return to Yahweh ("Israel cried to Yahweh for help"—a repeated refrain in Judges), produced deliverance through military success and brought political autonomy. Within this narrative, however, the repeated implicit criticism of the charismatic theocracy of the judges ("In those days Israel had no king; everyone did as [they] saw fit" e.g., [Judg. 21:25]) perhaps suggests an awareness of a salvation less ephemeral than mere military success.

Many of the historical narratives demand and repay attention to the detail of their canonical forms in developing theological readings of Scripture. To take only one example, the way the exodus story is narrated in the canon has suggested a liturgical context to some, with stylized representations of a sequence of conflicts between God and Pharaoh, testing their power in a climactic battle for control of the world. The anonymity of Pharaoh marks him out as a type of every oppressive and unjust government, every temporal power that sets itself up against God. The final act of the drama, the parting of the sea, suggests that the cosmic forces of evil—which Hebrew writings commonly personify as the sea (see, e.g., Ps. 74:12–14)—are in league with Pharaoh. The final celebration of deliverance comes in the Song of Moses and Miriam as God’s power achieves total salvation by throwing the opposing evil alliance into such confusion that Pharaoh is destroyed by the sea.

Salvation in the pentateuchal and historical texts is not just on a national level, however. God’s saving action is also seen in the lives of the poor, forgotten, and oppressed. God is the one who sees and rescues Hagar and Ishmael, who guides Ruth and Naomi to their kinsman-redeemer, who hears the inarticulate prayers of barren Hannah. This theme too is prominent in the Psalms, where the poor and needy cry to God, their only savior. The writing prophets turn this belief in God’s deliverance (p 713) of those who suffer under oppression into an ethical demand: God’s people are called to be those whose laws and lives demonstrate an understanding of, and a commitment to, God’s salvation. This ringing proclamation of the prophets can be traced through the law, where concern for “the widow, the orphan, and the stranger in your midst” is repeatedly stressed, debtors and slaves are regularly liberated, the very land is given a Sabbath, and Jubilee is proclaimed for all once in fifty years.

Within the wider ancient Near Eastern wisdom tradition, salvation is perhaps not a central concern, but the particular emphases of the biblical Wisdom texts bring it more to the fore. The practical advice for right living is present but placed in a wider context suggesting that such right living is related to soteriological themes (Prov. 1–3 develops this context, as does Wisdom’s song in Prov. 8). Again, the speculative wisdom, examining existential conundrums, was common to the wider tradition, but the particular answers given within Israel’s canonical literature are often soteriological (Ps. 73 is an example of this, as is Job’s continued insistence that redemption, vindication, and salvation will eventually come to him from God).

The exile both refocused expectations of salvation into the future political, social, and economic prosperity of Israel and strengthened the sense of the linkage between the need for salvation and moral failure. The disappointing events that followed the return from exile led to the development of the final soteriological emphasis in the OT: eschatology. The final realization of salvation began to be seen as something both larger and more remote than previously. It was no longer merely individual or national, but also cosmic: the whole universe would one day be transformed, with natural relationships reordered to bring an end to violence even also in the animal kingdom, poverty, oppression, and all other manifestations of sin and evil. As a result, while moments of individual and national salvation could still be looked for and celebrated, the final reality of salvation was deferred to a coming “day of the LORD,” when a decisive intervention would result in the saving transformation of the entire cosmos. The development of apocalyptic writing, prefigured in Zechariah, parts of Daniel, Isa. 24–27, parts of Ezekiel, and so on, came to fullest flower in the intertestamental period (although one or two of the disputed books regarded as canonical by Roman Catholic and other traditions, such as 2 Esdras, are full-blown apocalypses). Apocalyptic pictures salvation as a climactic cosmic battle resulting in the final salvation and vindication of God’s people.

There are passages within NT books that are clearly apocalyptic in genre: Revelation, Mark 13 (and parallels), and 2 Thess. 2 are the most obvious. The influence of this apocalyptic tradition on the visions of salvation within the NT writings, however, is far more profound. In the resurrection of Christ, the decisive salvific events that will inaugurate the eschatological kingdom of God have begun, and although there is a deferral of their completion until the return of Christ, the final cosmic salvation has begun.

Within the Synoptic Gospels, the first theme of Christ’s preaching is the coming of this eschatological moment of conflict and salvation, and the need to choose sides within the conflict: “Repent, for the kingdom of God/heaven is at hand!” Miracles of healing and particularly exorcism are themselves moments of salvation, and also graphic illustrations of both the conflict and on which side decisive power lies. The forgiveness of sin, and moral transformation, are also decisive salvific events (e.g., Luke 5:17–32; 19:1–9). Acts develops similar themes. In the Fourth Gospel, salvation is central to the message of Jesus, who is sent by the Father to “save the world” (3:17). The gift of “life” and the promised relationship with the Father through Jesus are particular conceptions of salvation that are important in this Gospel.

In the Pauline corpus, salvation is understood as what God has done through Christ, and particularly his death and resurrection, to bring about deliverance from sin and death, wholeness, health, moral and physical transformation, and enduring new life. Believers are united with Christ, and so will share in his sufferings, and finally his glory. The Catholic Epistles and Revelation point to the eschatological cosmic salvation, presently made visible and available (at least in prospect) in the person of Jesus.

A theological interpretation of Scripture will, when faced with an issue like salvation, refuse the too-easy decision that these varying biblical pictures are simply incommensurate. Against the fashion for finding irreconcilable divergences, it is necessary to assert that God, who has one purpose, has one salvation, and so to seek a single vision of salvation that unites the biblical testimony. Equally, theological accounts of salvation that privilege one particular strand of the biblical witness (whether political and economic liberation or deliverance from sin), to the effective exclusion (p 714) of all others, must be challenged to take the genuine diversity of the canonical accounts more seriously, and so find a richer theology.

The assertion that God brings salvation in Jesus Christ will be foundational to adequate theological interpretation, as will the strong NT witness to the coming eschatological fullness of salvation. Within these overarching themes, other themes may take their proper place. Deliverance from sin and death, and a final end to oppression and injustice, are alike components of the promised eschatological wholeness. Miracles of physical healing and of political deliverance alike can be genuine moments of salvation, foretastes of what is to come. The place of the people of God, as those who experience a foretaste of salvation and so witness to its coming fullness, will also be central, although exactly how the relationship of Israel and the church will be constructed in this context is open to debate.

Bibliography

Dillistone, F. W. The Christian Understanding of Atonement. Westminster, 1968; Gunton, C. The Actuality of Atonement. T&T Clark, 1988; Wright, N. T. Jesus and the Victory of God. Fortress, 1996.

Stephen R. Holmes

Salvation, History of

Central to both the unity of the Bible and its theological interpretation is what is sometimes called sacred or redemptive history, but more commonly, salvation history. By any reading, salvation and history are both key facets of Scripture. God is portrayed preeminently as “a God who saves” (Ps. 68:20), in the OT above all at the exodus (Deut. 6:21–23) and in the NT at the cross (Col. 1:19–20). And attempts to summarize the Bible’s teaching as a whole frequently choose the theme of salvation (e.g., Caird). As for the second term, OT narratives regularly claim the status of history (Sternberg). In like manner, the NT Gospels are best compared with a recognized category of Hellenistic historical writing, the bios, or biography (Burridge), and the book of Acts similarly with Greek historiography (Sterling). Even those parts of the NT not overtly writing history evince a keen interest in history (Dodd).

Although linked in the nineteenth century with the German Protestant J. C. von Hofmann, attention to salvation history (Heilsgeschichte) can be traced back to the Reformers' rejection of Alexandrian allegorical exegesis and their recovery of the historical sense of the OT. Twentieth-century interest in the subject grew out of dissatisfaction with the reduction of biblical theology to the history of religious ideas, devoid of reference to events in human history.

Some authors who doubt the historicity of the biblical account of Israel and Jesus Christ use the term "salvation history" either to characterize the individual's personal journey to faith (e.g., Bultmann), or to understand the Bible as the history of the proclamation of salvation (e.g., von Rad), rather than as a history of the events themselves.

Nonetheless, for many the major tenets of salvation history are (1) that God has acted in human history; and (2) that the books of the Bible, while not uniformly historical in form, all relate to an unfolding narrative of these events. It follows not only that salvation is historic, but also that history is salvific, itself revelation.

Salvation History: A Theological Affirmation

The following selective survey seeks to trace the main lines of the history of salvation in both Testaments with an emphasis on the way the various strands of the NT relate to the OT.

The OT. In the OT, revelation is tied to a particular national history, the history of Israel as the chosen people. The key points include the covenant promises to Abraham, which eventually lead to his descendants being released from the Egyptian bondage in the exodus; the Mosaic covenant at Sinai, constituting them as the people of God; a new generation of Israelites entering the promised land under Joshua; the rule of the judges and the prophet Samuel, leading to the establishment of kingship; King David capturing the Jebusite city of Jerusalem, which becomes the holy city of Zion; God's covenant with David, establishing David's dynasty in relation to the temple and the throne; the "rest" in the land enjoyed under David and Solomon; the decline and division of the kingdom under Solomon's son, Rehoboam; the outworking of the covenant curses against both kingdoms through enemy invasion and eventual exile to Assyria (the northern kingdom) and Babylonia (the southern kingdom); and the return from Babylon under Nehemiah, Ezra, and Zerubbabel.

This account of biblical history is based on the narrative and prophetic books. The Psalms, with their many references to incidents in Israel's history, Zion, the king, and especially the figure of David could be used to complement the picture. Yet the relation of the Wisdom literature to salvation history, which hardly ever refers to (p 715) such persons or events, is less obvious. The answer may lie in the link between wisdom and Solomon, especially in 1 Kings 3–10, where in midpericope about Solomon's wisdom is the account of building the temple. Only when Israel is firmly planted in the land with God in the midst and the anointed king on the throne does wisdom flower (Goldsworthy).

The Gospels. When we come to the NT Gospels, the question salvation history urges us to ask is, How do Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John carry forward the narrative of God's saving activity? Even a cursory survey indicates that each of the Gospels is firmly yet distinctively embedded in Israel's story through its respective selection and use of OT texts.

Matthew. The Gospel's opening words allude to Israel's opening book (cf. 1:1 with Gen. 2:4), and a genealogy ensures continuity of "Jesus Christ the son of David, the son of Abraham" (1:1) with the story of Israel. Hence, Matthew can hardly be more explicit about the importance of Jesus to salvation history and vice versa. Jesus, the Davidic Messiah, has come to announce that "the gospel of the kingdom" (4:23 RSV), the promised rule of God, is now to be realized in history. Matthew includes more than sixty OT quotations to forge unmistakable links with God's saving activity in the past and to identify Jesus as the Christ, who must suffer. Ten of these are introduced with the slightly varied formula, "This took place to fulfill ...". More allusively, through intricate typology, discerning escalated patterns or analogies in history, Jesus is depicted as a new Moses, who demands a "higher righteousness" (Allison), and a new Israel. Jesus recapitulates the nation's history (rescued from Egypt, tempted in the wilderness, etc.), but without failure, and fulfills her destiny.

Mark. Mark describes the good news in terms of the fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy of a new exodus (1:2–3; cf. Isa. 40:3; Mal. 3:1; Watts). Less overt than Matthew, Mark has explicit citations of the OT only at the opening of his account, in the passion narrative, and occasionally on the lips of Jesus. Yet his message that the climax of Israel's story has been reached is no less compelling. Echoing the words of Ps. 2:7, "You are My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," Jesus' messianic identity is made clear at his baptism (1:11 NKJV). The “tearing” open of the heavens in this scene (only in Mark; in Matthew and Luke the heavens are merely “opened”) indicates that at last God has acted decisively to make good on his promises of salvation (cf. Isa. 64:1). OT passages and themes frequently underlie Mark’s narrative.

Luke(-Acts). Perhaps more than any other Gospel, Luke presents Jesus as the continuation of biblical history (Rosner). His style of Greek, especially at the beginning of the Gospel (and also Acts), is reminiscent of the LXX. Though the OT for Matthew is largely a book of prophetic predictions, Luke emphasizes that God has bound himself to Israel with words of promise (e.g., to David, 1:30–32, 68–71 [2 Sam. 7:14]; to Abraham, 1:54–55, 72–73 [Gen. 12:1–3; etc.]), which are being accomplished in Jesus. Jesus is also depicted as the interpreter of Scripture himself (24:25–49), for “all things which were written about [him] in the Law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms must be fulfilled” (cf. NKJV). In Acts, a salvation-historical approach to reading the OT is modeled in the speeches of Peter (2:16–36), Stephen (7:2–56), and Paul (13:16–41).

John. OT antecedents also define the shape of the Christ and his mission in John. The final revelation from God that Jesus brings and embodies is compared and contrasted with that received and mediated by Moses. The signs he performs, recalling the “signs and wonders” of Moses, point to a new exodus. Jesus eclipses the great Jewish feasts and institutions that marked God’s saving work in the past. As the “light of the world” and “living water,” he fulfills the torch-lighting and water-pouring ceremonies of the Feast of Tabernacles. He replaces the Jerusalem temple and, by dying during Passover week, is the ultimate Jewish Passover sacrifice. He is also seen as the long-awaited “prophet like Moses” (6:14; 7:40; cf. Deut. 18:15).

Paul. According to Paul (e.g., in Gal. 3:15–29), salvation history is rooted in God’s promise to Abraham, a promise fulfilled in Christ. The law of Moses was only a temporary stage used by God to preserve Israel until God would make good on his promise. God’s dealings with Israel recorded in the Bible lead to Christ, who is the turning point of history. In fact, for Paul, history divides into two epochs, the old age of sin, death, and the Torah; and the new age, which eclipses it (see esp. Ridderbos). From another perspective, the decisive act in the ending of Israel’s exile and the restoration of God’s people has now taken place in Christ (Wright).

Revelation. No book in the Bible underscores the sovereignty of God in the affairs of human history more profoundly than Revelation. It opens with a vision in chapters 4–5 of a heavenly world (p 716) where God and the Lamb's throne are at the center of everything. Gathering many themes of the rest of the NT, it closes in chapters 21–22 with a vision of a new Jerusalem and temple (21:2; 21:9–22:5), a new covenant (21:3–4), and even a new Israel. Both the “names of the twelve tribes of Israel” (21:12) and “the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb” (21:14) are found on the gates and walls of the city. However, the most comprehensive theme is the new creation, climaxing all of these as the goal of both salvation and history (Dumbrell).

Salvation History: A Principle of Scriptural Interpretation

The Unity of Scripture. As can be seen from this selective survey, a salvation-historical hermeneutic understands the later parts of the Bible to take the form they do by building on earlier parts. This is seen not only through the familiar schemas of the fulfillment of prophecy and promise. In addition, God has saved his people in the past by redeeming them through an exodus, raising up prophets (like Moses), establishing a Davidic dynasty, and instituting a temple and sacrifices. Therefore, his ultimate deed of salvation in Jesus Christ recalls and climaxes all of these.

The Knowledge of God. A salvation-historical perspective speaks about God in the concrete rather than relying on philosophical and abstract terms of reference. God can be known not as some impersonal prime mover or a vague creative force, but as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ. The knowledge of God comes not in a set of ideas or even via a mystical experience, but primarily by the great things he has done in human history, culminating in the gospel. The biblical account gives us a narrative framework, a continuing story, in which we may locate ourselves, come to know God, and find meaning in life.

Stages in the History of God's Saving Acts. In tracing the history of salvation, a number of dispensations or epochs, periods of history with distinctive characteristics, have been discerned. Hermeneutical significance is sometimes attached to these various stages, which can help open up the Bible's diversity as well as its unity. However, little consensus has been achieved. Proposals are numerous, ranging from twelve (Van Gemen) to seven (the Scofield Reference Bible [1917], representing classic dispensationalism) or six periods of redemptive history (Clowney).

To give a specific example, Donald Robinson's schema of three major epochs takes the kingdom of God as its unifying concept and is explicitly gospel-based. The first movement goes from the divine choice of Abraham, and the making of promises to him, to the realization of those promises in the kingdom of Solomon, and the subsequent decline. The second, the epoch of prophetic eschatology, sees the prophets from the eighth century onward proclaiming a message about a future salvation and a future coming of the kingdom. This future is to recapitulate what has already happened in the first phase (a new captivity, new exodus, new redemption, new covenant, new Davidic rule in a new Zion with a new temple). The third epoch is signaled by the appearance of Jesus, who preaches that the time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand.

The Corporate Dimension of Salvation. The framework of salvation history draws attention to the fact that it is God's intention to save a people and not just individuals. Christ and Adam have inclusive significance, representing new and old humanity respectively. The place of Jews and Gentiles in God's saving purposes is an important focus.

Salvation is thought of both individually and corporately. If Christ is in the individual believer, correspondingly all believers together are in Christ. The believer is a temple of the Holy Spirit, just as the church as a whole is such a temple. As well as a judgment of individuals, there will also be a judgment of nations. And if individuals long for salvation, no less does the whole creation. Salvation history makes it clear that God's purposes loom larger than my personal fulfillment, are bigger than me and my God, and embrace a universalistic vision.

A Tension with Eschatology? If eschatology is the end of history, this creates a potential problem for salvation history. A final cataclysmic intervention of "apocalyptic" proportions might seem to militate against an emphasis on God's less-dramatic activity in history. However, the conflict is only apparent. In the book of Revelation, as we saw above, God's determination to make Christ all in all in the future, even if more "earth-shattering," will be built upon and recall what he has done in the past. Furthermore, implicit in the whole notion of God's acting in history is the goal toward which this history is moving. Thus, as Cullmann insists, history, to be salvation history, must involve eschatology. Salvation history is heading somewhere, and the end is always in mind.

(p 717) See also Biblical Theology; Exile and Restoration; Last Things, Doctrine of; Metanarrative; Scripture, Unity of; Typology

Bibliography

Allison, D. The New Moses. T&T Clark, 1993; Bultmann, R. The Old Testament and Christian Faith, ed. B. Anderson. SCM, 1964; Burrige, R. What Are the Gospels? Cambridge University Press, 1992; Caird, G. B. New Testament Theology. Oxford University Press, 1994; Clowney, E. Preaching and Biblical Theology. P&R, 1961; Cullmann, O. Salvation in History. SCM, 1967; Dodd, C. H. History and the Gospel. Nisbet, 1938; Dumbrell, W. The End of the Beginning. Homebush West, 1985; Goldsworthy, G. Gospel and Wisdom. Exeter, 1987; Rad, G. von. Old Testament Theology. 2 vols. Harper & Row, 1962–64; Ridderbos, H. Paul. Eerdmans, 1974; Robinson, D. Faith's Framework. New Creation, 1985; Rosner, B. "Acts and Biblical History." Pages 65–82 in The Book of Acts in Its Ancient Literary Setting, ed. B. Winter and A. Clarke. Vol. 1 of The Book of Acts in Its First-Century Setting, ed. B. Winter. Eerdmans, 1993; Satterthwaite, P. "Biblical History." Pages 43–51 in New Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. T. D. Alexander and B. Rosner. InterVarsity, 2000; Sterling, G. Historiography and Self-Definition. Brill, 1992; Sternberg, M. The Poetics of Biblical Narrative. Indiana University Press, 1985; Van Gemeren, W. The Progress of Redemption. Zondervan, 1988; Watts, R. Isaiah's New Exodus and Mark. Mohr/Siebeck, 1997; Wright, N. T. The Climax of the Covenant. Fortress, 1992.

Brian S. Rosner

Samuel, Books of

Samuel was originally one book that was divided into two when the Hebrew text was translated into Greek, to accommodate the work to the length of scrolls typically used in classical antiquity. The books of Samuel are concerned primarily with the establishment of the monarchy in Israel under Saul, followed by the rise and reign of David. The prophet Samuel oversees the introduction of the monarchy, as kingmaker to both Saul and David. Through the actions of these three, the order of Israel's life and faith is fundamentally changed, with reverberations felt throughout the rest of the Bible.

Highlights in the History of Interpretation

A dominant approach of patristic and medieval exegesis was to seek out the "spiritual" senses of Scripture as a strategy for reading the OT as a prophetic Christian book. These methods entailed imaginative typological and eschatological interpretations of the text. Thus, David's career and rejection, then subsequent elevation as king in Jerusalem, were seen as prefiguring Christ, who was crucified, then enthroned in glory in heaven.

Reformation exegesis was much more restrained in any typological comparisons it drew between David and Christ. The Reformers essentially affirmed the Antiochene approach to Scripture, insisting that "the literal sense is the spiritual sense." Thus, in Calvin's Sermons on 2 Samuel the moral and theological meaning of the text is deduced primarily from historical exegesis and close attention to the literary context. For Calvin, of course, the OT's witness was to Christ, and the NT authoritatively interpreted the OT. David's kingdom and God's promises to him had their proper meaning within that context and anticipated their fulfillment in Christ's kingdom.

Much scholarly work in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries concentrated on literary source-critical approaches as a way of dealing with perceived tensions and doublets in the text. Thus, Wellhausen (1871) argued that an early promonarchic stratum (1 Sam. 9:1–10:16; chs. 11, 13–14) had been combined with a postexilic, antimonarchic stratum (1 Sam. 8; 10:17–27; chs. 12, 15) to produce a hybrid text of conflicting attitudes. The view that the present text has arisen from numerous expansions and elaborations of earlier sources has remained influential up to recent years (see, e.g., McCarter's commentary).

Rost (1926) strongly advocated the view that older, originally separate documents had been combined to produce the present work. Rost identified 1 Sam. 4:1b–7:1 + 2 Sam. 6 as an independent "Ark Narrative," 1 Sam. 16:14–2 Sam. 5 as an original "History of David's Rise," and 2 Sam. 9–20 + 1 Kings 1–2 as a "court history" (the "Succession Narrative" [SN]) detailing how Solomon became king. This last work Rost considered to be one of the world's earliest examples of eyewitness historiography.

Noth's (1943) hypothesis of a "Deuteronomistic History" (DH) understood 1–2 Samuel to be part of a continuous narrative (Deuteronomy–2 Kings) composed by a single exilic writer using traditional materials. The extent of pre- and postexilic redactions of DH and additions thereto (and even the existence of such a work) remains a hotly debated subject. In Noth's view, the underlying documents of 1–2 Samuel were incorporated into DH with comparatively little redaction. Noth held that 2 Sam. 21–24 was an "appendix" of miscellaneous Davidic materials added to the narrative after DH was divided into separate books.

Rost's basic identification of documents is still broadly accepted, although the precise boundaries (p 718), dating, genre, and theme of these postulated documents (especially SN) are now much more disputed. Gunn, for example, defines SN as a novella rather than historiography. Keys rejects the inclusion of 1–2 Kings in the narrative on grounds of style and content, and holds that the real theme of 2 Sam. 9–20 is not succession but David's sin and punishment. Complementary observations are made by Stoebe (2 Sam. 9–20 shows that despite David's failings, the kingship perdured under God's hand) and Provan (the narrative unmasks pretensions to "wisdom" that are not rooted in God and the divine Torah).

Gunn's work signaled a turn from a concern with source criticism and historiography to final-form literary approaches concentrating on the poetics and ideology of the book.

Brueggemann's postliberal commentary follows this approach in focusing on the imaginative force and rhetoric of the presentation, and the relationship between religious faith and political power. More adventurous is Jobling's postmodern handling of 1 Samuel, which presents an eclectic set of subversive readings engaged with contemporary issues (including class, polity, gender, ethnicity).

Recent writing in a more conservative vein argues against the older documentary theories (that differing outlooks in the text arose from the untidy growth and conflation of various traditions over time), holding instead that 1–2 Samuel should be read as a complex, intentional unity with a coherent theological message.

Long's study of Saul's reign rejects Wellhausen's thesis of conflicting pro- and antimonarchic documents underlying 1 Sam. 8–15 by distinguishing the narrator's voice from that of the characters (some of whom express anti-Saul rather than antimonarchic views). Following Halpern and Edelman, Long argues next that the complex account(s) of Saul's election as king is comprehensible and not confused, once we grasp the different stages involved in king-making in the ancient world. Finally, Saul's rejection as king makes sense as well, when we adopt the appropriate reading strategy for deducing the author's intent. Saul's rejection arises from his unwillingness to submit to the new authority structure of the theocracy, whereby the king must obey the word of the Lord mediated through God's prophet (cf. 1 Sam. 12:13–15, 24–25).

On the structural level, Klement concentrates on the ending (2 Sam. 21–24), arguing that it is no "appendix" or miscellany but a carefully composed conclusion to the work as a whole. The conclusion provides the key to the grand, chiasmic structure of the book and its basic theological message. Klement identifies other structural patterns throughout the book as evidence of a sophisticated and intentional artistic design.

The advantage of these recent approaches is that they support a final-form reading of the text that is not arbitrary but takes seriously the original literary integrity of the Samuel scroll. (In contrast, it must be remembered that DH is a scholarly postulate without any manuscript basis.) This allows the message of 1–2 Samuel to be heard on its own terms, and not just as an episode within a larger narrative.

Message of 1–2 Samuel

The two major themes of the work are monarchy and Yahweh's word. The offices of king and prophet (along with the priesthood in its oracular activity) exist by God's election and call (1 Sam. 2:28; 3:4; 10:24; 13:14; 2 Sam. 6:21; 7:8) for the protection and rule of his people.

On monarchy, Klement identifies the message at the center of the chiasm of 2 Sam. 21–24 (and thus the summative message of the book) as an affirmation of Yahweh’s covenant with David as an institution for Israel’s good. David utters the two poems in this section (2 Sam. 22:2–51; 23:1–7), which celebrate Yahweh’s “everlasting covenant” and “steadfast love to David and his descendants forever.” At its outset this work shows Israel to be afflicted both by the corrupt priesthood in Shiloh and the oppression of the Philistines. Yahweh acts to reverse the unhappy state of his people, first by answering Hannah’s prayer for a son. The birth of Samuel, the faithful prophet and kingmaker, sets in train the course of actions that will culminate in David’s kingship. Hannah’s song of thanksgiving (1 Sam. 2:1–10), with its prayer that Yahweh “will give strength to his king and exalt the horn of his anointed one,” has close verbal and thematic correspondences with the concluding poems. Thus, these two poetic sections function as chiasmic bookends for the whole work.

Hannah’s prayer is fulfilled in the achievements of David’s reign at its best (2 Sam. 5–10; cf. 23:3–4), where he appears as the ideal ruler. Monarchy as such is not really faulted in the book (cf. Deut. 17:14–20). The issue turns rather on the type of king. Shall he be a figure of human political conceiving and choice (“a king for ourselves,” 1 Sam. 8:18–20; 12:19 NRSV), or one of Yahweh’s choice and for his purpose (“I have provided for myself a king [David],” 1 Sam. 16:1 NRSV)? Saul is rejected as king because of his failure in the fundamental matter of obedience to God’s word (p 719) as mediated by his prophet Samuel. (A parallel theme to this is the rejection of the priestly family of Eli for dishonoring God; 1 Sam. 2:31.) With the departure of Yahweh’s spirit (1 Sam. 16:14), Saul declines into depression and madness. David, on the other hand, is presented as Yahweh’s chosen king, Spirit-endowed and Saul’s “better” (1 Sam. 13:14; 15:28; 16:13). Pious, brave, and innocent of treachery against Saul, David gains the throne through Yahweh’s choice and Israel’s willing assent (2 Sam. 5:1–3). He subjugates the neighboring states, thus securing “rest” for the people (2 Sam. 5:17–25; 8:1–14). David’s conquest of Jerusalem provides a capital for his kingdom and a final resting place for the ark of the covenant, uniting in one place the religious and political symbols of the nation (2 Sam. 5:6–14; 6:1–23). In turn, Yahweh’s commitment to David extends to his descendants in the gracious promise of a secure and enduring dynasty and kingdom (2 Sam. 7:16; 23:5).

David thus appears as a worthier and more effective ruler than Saul, whose reign ends in apostasy and national disaster (1 Sam. 28, 31). The apogee of David's obedient reign (and the sign of divine blessing upon it) is indicated in 2 Sam. 8:15–18, the brief note on his administration, and in 2 Sam. 9, his exemplary treatment of Mephibosheth. Overall, however, David's reign has an ambiguous character. Blessing turns to curse in the following chapters, where David's later disobedience and decline are candidly revealed, along with the destructive consequences these have, both for his family and for the nation (2 Sam. 11–20). Thus, David in his later years fails to realize the blessings promised to his own kingship. His rule is beneficial only insofar as he submits himself to Yahweh and his commands. The various intrigues involving a wayward David and his equally wayward sons indicate that politics (both sexual and power) posited on a calculating worldly wisdom leads only to disaster. Nevertheless, Yahweh's covenant grace prevails. Unlike Saul, David himself is not rejected (cf. 1 Sam. 15:26), nor is Yahweh's promise done away with.

The theme of Yahweh's word is presented in two major ways. First, the narrative shows that Yahweh's word, mediated by his prophets or the priestly oracle, determines the course of history, in declaring blessing or judgment. We are informed that early in this period "the word of Yahweh was rare" (1 Sam. 3:1 AT), but everything is changed for Israel by the time Samuel reaches adulthood (1 Sam. 3:19–4:1a). What Yahweh's messengers declare will surely happen (cf. Deut. 18:21–22). Thus, Samuel first anoints Saul as "leader" (nagid) in obedience to Yahweh's word, with confirming signs to follow (1 Sam. 9:16; 10:1–9), then David as his successor, again as Yahweh directs (1 Sam. 16:12, fulfilled in 2 Sam. 5:1–3). Through Nathan, David also receives the promise of a dynastic line and the assurance that his successor will build a temple (2 Sam. 7:11–16), matters whose fulfillment lie outside this book (1 Kings 2:12; ch. 6).

Conversely, the word of divine judgment is given in the declarations against Eli's house and descendants and fulfilled in subsequent events (1 Sam. 2:31–36; 3:11–14; cf. 4:11; 22:18–19); in the rejection of Saul (15:26, specifically for spurning Yahweh's word, v. 23; cf. 31:6; 2 Sam. 6:21); and against David (2 Sam. 12:10–12; 24:13; cf. chs. 13–20; 24:15).

Second, Yahweh's word is given to admonish and guide. Samuel reproaches the sinful people in Yahweh's name (1 Sam. 8:10; 10:18–19), as well as giving specific instructions to Saul (9:27; 10:3–8; 15:2–3, 17–19). Nathan and Gad are also specifically sent by Yahweh to counsel David or rebuke him with God's word (2 Sam. 7:4–5; 12:1; 24:11–12, 18), and David responds fittingly on each occasion. In addition, David inquires of God through the oracles given by Ahimelech and Abiathar (1 Sam. 22:10; 23:2, 4; 30:8; 2 Sam. 2:1; 5:19, 23), and enjoys success. By contrast, a disobedient Saul is denied a word from God and has recourse instead to necromancy (1 Sam. 28:6–7). In these ways, the book teaches that the exercise of kingship within Israel must be subject to Yahweh’s word.

Notwithstanding its final canonical location (within a history extending from Genesis to 2 Kings), 1–2 Samuel can be read on its own terms as a reflection of the early days of the Judahite monarchy (cf. 1 Sam. 27:6). The work holds up the Davidic covenant as the grounds for national and dynastic confidence, along with the necessity of royal obedience to the prophetic word. Hence, it perhaps sought to inculcate a similar response from the first descendants of David and his people, in the difficult days that followed the division of the kingdom (cf. 1 Kings 14:8).

1–2 Samuel and the Canon

The book has close connections with many other parts of the canon. First, whatever we make of Noth’s hypothesis (DH), 1–2 Samuel is the natural narrative bridge from Judg. 17–21, when “there was no king in Israel” (21:25 NRSV), to the history of the monarchy in 1–2 Kings. Kings also (p 720) reflects many of the themes in Samuel, such as the fulfillment of the dynastic promise (cf. 1 Kings 2:4; 8:25; 9:4–5), Solomon as the appointed temple builder (5:5), and the backward look to David as the standard for evaluating his successors (3:14; 11:6, 38; 2 Kings 14:3; 15:3; 18:3; 22:2).

The closest canonical connection is with 1 Chron. 10–21, which is directly dependent on 1–2 Samuel in recounting the narratives of Saul and David. The Chronicler significantly recast and modified his sources, omitting most of the material on Saul and on David’s rise to power and subsequent family problems. The Chronicler’s chief interest here was to extol the public role of David as king and cofounder with Solomon of the Jerusalem cult. At the same time, David’s sinful census, with its disastrous consequences for Israel (2 Sam. 24) has a pivotal place in the Chronicler’s presentation (1 Chron. 21)—recognition that David could be a source of ill for the nation as well as good.

The presentation of David as musician and composer of psalms (1 Sam. 16:18, 23; 18:10; 2 Sam. 22:1–51; 23:1–7) was no doubt a fountainhead of the tradition that ascribes large parts of the Psalter to David (whether by or about him). The superscriptions on many of the Psalms (3, 7, 18, 34, 51, 52, 54, 56, 57, 59, 60, 63, 142) associate these compositions with incidents in 1–2 Samuel and indicate how these psalms were anciently understood and related (perhaps midrashically) to David as the model worshipper of Yahweh.

1–2 Samuel and Theology

The historical development of messianism is especially dependent on this work. In its presentation of David and the Davidic covenant, the book provided the soil for later messianic hopes and conceptions. As Yahweh's "anointed" (mashiakh, 1 Sam. 2:10; 2 Sam. 22:51; 23:1), David is elected and upheld by God for the blessing of his people. As the ideal king and recipient of the promise, David becomes the archetype of prophetic hopes for a successor in the troubled later centuries of Judah's existence (Mic. 5:2–5; Isa. 11:1–2; Jer. 23:5; Ezek. 37:24). That trajectory continues throughout the NT in its expectation of a Messiah in David's line (cf. Matt. 1:1; 21:9; Luke 1:32; John 7:42; Rom. 1:3; Rev. 5:5). However, the NT goes beyond comparisons, emphasizing that Jesus as Messiah also surpasses and contrasts with David, a great but flawed human being (cf. Acts 2:25–36).

Historically speaking, 1–2 Samuel has played a significant role in the articulation of political theology, especially in medieval and early modern reflection on the meaning of Christian kingship. In portraying the (Davidic) king as the representative and mediator of God's own kingship, charged with securing the continued identity of the people through military leadership against external threats and by ensuring justice and right worship at home, 1–2 Samuel presents data on the political task with which Christians must constantly reckon. Yet the book is also skeptical (at least) about human kingship, which is not fundamental to Yahweh's rule or Israel's identity, and is sometimes inimical to these, especially when the prophetic word is spurned. Similarly, while no state today understands itself as a Christian theocracy, the exercise of political and judicial power must always be tempered by the church's proclamation of the gospel (which centers on the present and coming kingship of Christ). Otherwise, the state will lose sight of its own identity and the concept of right that it exists to defend.

See also History of Israel; Kingdom of God; Messiah/Messianism; Narrative Criticism; Source Criticism

Bibliography

Brueggemann, W. First and Second Samuel. John Knox, 1990; Edelman, D. King Saul in the Historiography of Judah. Sheffield Academic Press, 1991; Gordon, R. P. 1 and 2 Samuel. Zondervan, 1986; Gunn, D. The Story of King David. Sheffield Academic Press, 1978; Halpern, B. The Constitution of the Monarchy in Israel. Scholars Press, 1981; Jobling, D. 1 Samuel. Liturgical Press, 1998; Keys, G. The Wages of Sin. Sheffield Academic Press, 1996; Klement, H. II Samuel 21–24. P. Lang, 2000; Long, V. P. The Reign and Rejection of King Saul. Scholars Press, 1989; McCarter, P. K. I Samuel. Doubleday, 1980; idem. II Samuel. Doubleday, 1984; McConville, J. G. "Law and Monarchy in the Old Testament." In A Royal Priesthood?, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2002; Provan, I. "On 'Seeing' the Trees While Missing the Forest: The Wisdom of Characters and Readers in 2 Samuel and 1 Kings." Pages 153–73 in In Search of True Wisdom, ed. E. Ball. JSOTSup 300. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Rost, L. The Succession to the Throne of David. German, 1926, trans. M. D. Rutter and D. M. Gunn. Sheffield Academic Press, 1982; Stoebe, H. J. Das zweite Buch Samuelis. Chr. Kaiser, 1994.

Brian E. Kelly

Sanctification

Sanctification is a key element in the order of salvation (ordo salutis) and is usually placed between justification and glorification. Some theologians further distinguish between definitive or positional sanctification and progressive or conditional sanctification. The former concerns the believer's being set apart for God's service (p 721) and as God's person. The latter concept refers to the believer's growth in Christlikeness and has its ultimate completion in the believer's glorification in the age to come. In classic Protestant thought sanctification, in this second sense, is clearly distinguished from justification. In classic Catholic thought the distinction is not observed. This was an issue of theological dispute during the Reformation period and remains so. There are remaining disputes too concerning the role of the Holy Spirit in sanctification. The Holiness and Pentecostal traditions have often argued the importance of a second work of grace in the believer's life after conversion, before sanctification in the progressive sense may really proceed. Lutheran and Reformed theologians generally beg to differ.

Sanctification in the Biblical Texts

The Scriptures present a holy God, who is both set apart from the world as its Creator and is morally pure (Gen. 1:1; Hab. 1:12–13). God expects his people to be set apart for him and to exhibit his moral character. They are to be holy as he is holy. This idea appears in both Testaments (Lev. 19:2; 1 Pet. 1:16). The canonical plotline reveals the story of God's reclaiming a fallen world and establishing a new heavens and earth in which righteousness is at home (2 Pet. 3:11–13). That new world will see God's holy people living in God's holy presence in God's holy city in God's holy way (Rev. 21:1–4). The activity of God in sanctifying a people for himself is integral to that story.

In the OT presentation the idea of sanctification in the sense of being set apart to be God's holy people or for God's use is found in many different contexts. The tent of meeting could be sanctified as the setting for God's meeting with his people (Exod. 29:43). In Joel, a fast could be sanctified for the purpose of calling upon God in repentance (Joel 1:13–15). Indeed, in the OT, people, places, objects, and times could be so sanctified.

In the NT, Jesus is the sanctified one par excellence. In his humanity, as God's Holy One, he perfectly instantiates God's holy character and is perfectly able to bring others to the place where they too mirror God's holiness (John 6:69; 17:17–19; Acts 2:27; Heb. 2:10–11).

Paul's contribution to the theology of sanctification is particularly important. The Corinthians were saints ("holy or sanctified ones"). God had set them apart for himself. They were now located in Christ (1 Cor. 1:2–3). They belonged to him. Yet they were hardly sanctified in the progressive sense. In fact, the church was problematic in the extreme. The letter speaks of congregational disunity (chs. 1–4), sexual immorality within the congregation (ch. 5), lawsuits among believers (ch. 6), impropriety at the Lord's Supper (ch. 11), problems with the exercise of spiritual gifts (chs. 12–14), and wrong ideas about the resurrection (ch. 15). Some recent theological commentary suggests that positional or definitive sanctification is the major NT idea (Peterson).

With regard to the notion of progressive sanctification, Paul's Thessalonian correspondence is a rich source of instruction. In his brief ministry at Thessalonica he left the new converts with a gospel (1 Thess. 1:9–10) and an ethic (4:1–12). God's will is their sanctification (4:3). At the personal level such sanctification involves the maintenance of sexual purity. After all, they have God's Holy Spirit (4:8). In ever-widening circles, the sanctified life also involves love for other believers (1:9–10) and proper behavior toward outsiders (4:11–12). Paul urges the Thessalonians to live like this more and more (4:1, 10). This suggests progression. Paul recognizes that God needs to sanctify his people, and he prays for the Thessalonians to that end (5:23). The other main idea of sanctification as a definitive act of God in setting apart a people for himself is also in the Thessalonian correspondence (e.g., 2 Thess. 2:13).

Sanctification and the Theological Interpretation of Scripture

The Theological Interpretation of Scripture Recognizes the Need for Extrabiblical Distinctions to Make Sense of the Biblical Record. Paul, for example, does not write in terms of definitive and progressive sanctification per se. But the ideas are there as his Thessalonian correspondence, other Pauline texts, and the wider NT deposit show (1 Cor. 1:30; Phil. 3:12–14; Heb. 2:11; 12:14; 1 Pet. 1:15–16; 2 Pet. 3:18).

The Theological Interpretation of Scripture Acknowledges the Distinction between Biblical and Technical Usages of Words. The exegete's temptation is not to see ideas of sanctification in biblical texts because certain specific words are not used (e.g., "saint," "sanctification," "sanctified," "holy"). The theologian's temptation is to read back into the biblical texts one's more-complex understandings of sanctification and fail in the duty of exegetical care. An example of the latter is the theologian who cited 1 Cor. 6:11 as a proof text for the doctrine of progressive sanctification. Part of the problematic is that (p 722)translators—working with the qdash (Hebrew) and hagi- (Greek) word groups—use the same English words as the theological textbooks do. However, biblical literature is pretechnical; in contrast, the theological texts are products of a profession with a long history. And so the word "sanctification" in the latter refers to a master concept that the history of theological discussion has made both more complex (with its subcategories) and nuanced (with its distinctions) than the biblical concepts themselves.

The Theological Interpretation of Scripture Reckons with Double Agency. With regard to progressive sanctification, Paul tells a double story. There is a God story (1 Thess. 5:23), but also the story of believers' own efforts (4:12). The paradox of both God's agency at work and believers' work was captured beautifully by Paul when he wrote to the Philippians: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God who is at work in you, enabling you both to will and to work for his good pleasure" (2:12–13 NRSV). Progressive sanctification is a cooperative venture.

Bibliography

Alexander, D., ed. Christian Spirituality. InterVarsity, 1988; Boyd, G., and P. Eddy. Across the Spectrum. Baker, 2002; Dieter, M. Five Views on Sanctification. Academie, 1987; Peterson, D. Possessed by God. Eerdmans, 1996.

Graham A. Cole

Satan See Angels, Doctrine of; Powers and Principalities

Schleiermacher, Friedrich See Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics; Practical Theology

Science, the Bible and

There are any number of interpretative issues arising at the interface of Scripture and science. Clearly, specific findings of cosmology, origins, evolution, neuroscience, and genetics, among others, bear strongly on biblical theology. Some of these findings may actually serve as a resource for proper interpretation of Scripture, possibly contributing to a reformulation of traditional thought. In other cases, biblical teachings may provide grounds for formulating and assessing specific scientific proposals. In either case, the interpretative dynamic requires the reader to have a confident sense of the relative merits of the claims put forth in each respective discipline. Sound biblical interpretation demands at least a rudimentary grasp of the methodologies utilized in scientific inquiry in order to determine how much weight to grant their respective results. Apparent conflict between the teachings of science and the teachings of Scripture serves to raise, not to settle, the interpretative question of meaning and reliability. Even understanding an infallible word requires input from the fallible findings of science.

A New Humility

There are a number of reasons for caution regarding the specific results of scientific research. Recent work on the methods of science indicates several direct challenges to the objectivity, even reliability, of the process. For instance, it has become something of a truism to point out that perception, the very foundation of the discipline, requires the contribution of background concepts, beliefs, and expectations as well as the actions of the external world on sensory organs. Observational bias, in the form of prior experience, expectation, and training, indelibly skews sensory data, infecting the objectivity of research at the start. In its most radical form, personal, nonempirical, idiosyncratic beliefs appear to undermine the edifice of science at its very foundations. Although some forms of subjectivity may be ameliorated at the level of the broader scientific community, the initiation process for membership in that community must inevitably propagate certain biases.

The problem of the empirical base is compounded by problems central to the logic of theory confirmation. The very notion, for instance, that a fulfilled prediction verifies a hypothesis either requires untested assumptions, or simply commits the fallacy of affirming the consequences. With the persistent possibility of rival accounts, there can be no crucial experiment to provide definitive proof. Neither will an inductive approach help to save this notion of confirmation. Absent specific unsupported assumptions, a finite number of positive outcomes adds nothing in support of a universal law. Even falsification stumbles on the inherent complexity of scientific proposals; any hypothesis can be modified so as to save the appearances.

This latter observation has been generalized in the Duhem-Quine underdetermination thesis: however much evidence one gathers, there will always be more than one theory capable of accounting for that data. Since there will always be a competitor with equal empirical support, then the probability, construed as a function of observational (p 723) data, can never rise above 50 percent. There can never be sufficient empirical evidence to judge a theory, rather than some rival, more likely than not. Preference for a specific theory, then, must appeal to nonempirical, nonepistemic considerations such as the elegance, simplicity, beauty, familiarity, or internal coherence of the hypothesis. Such preference may simply reflect our aesthetic sensibilities, cultural tastes, or even the vested interests of the governing body. More charitably, preference may be conferred on accounts that merely promote such pragmatic virtues as prediction, manipulation, and technological power, with no particular concern for their truth.

Support for this severely chastened view of the sciences is available from historians and sociologists of science who, following T. S. Kuhn, insist that the numerous revolutionary changes in scientific theories, and especially the terms of scientific analysis, undermine its claim to rationality. Why suppose that contemporary science embodies a rational, truth-tracking procedure when the scientific community periodically and radically revises its understanding of the natural world? In fact, the internal dynamics of theory change, where even the very criteria of assessment undergo revision, suggest that these theory changes are more akin to conversion experiences than to careful, step-by-step, reason-guided developments. Furthermore, because these shifts are so comprehensive, there is no support for the assumption that this process is on a progressive track. If there were common grounds for comparing each successive framework, or stable standards of evaluation, we might speak of scientific progress. As it stands, the incommensurability of each distinct view of the world undermines the very notion of a cumulative or progressively better grasp of reality.

A Reasonably Similar Interpretative Task

These several considerations have served well to support the broader philosophical theses often cited by postmodern critiques of rationality, realism, and truth. If this analysis were to carry the day, then the authority of science would be so weakened as to completely undercut its interpretative relevance to Scripture. Nonetheless, even as the postmodern critique challenges the epistemic authority of the sciences, it invariably proceeds to completely defuse any normative force carried by Scripture.

Yet it should be noted that reasons exist to resist this pessimistic posture. One response takes the primary aim of the sciences as providing an explanatory account of experience, often by appeal to unobserved, even unobservable, entities, processes, mechanisms, forces, structures, and so forth. It also acknowledges the reciprocal dynamic between observational data and the theoretical commitments of the community, recognizes the often-vague and imprecise terms by which scientists judge the relative superiority of a hypothesis, and embraces the role of nonempirical criteria for theory appraisal. In spite of these features, scientific realists maintain that the ongoing historical success of the best of our scientific accounts suggests that to some extent they do represent some features of the natural world. While embracing the foibles of scientific inquiry, critical realists argue that the best explanation for the evident historical success of the very human endeavors of science is the proposal that its results do approximate a mind-independent world.

Taking scientific inquiry as primarily an explanatory, or interpretative, process also provides a framework for sorting out those cases where it interfaces with biblical scholarship. Scientists and theologians each face interpretative challenges. The interpretative accounts offered by each are likewise assessed according to similar standards and values. Each process constitutes a fallible endeavor to understand a broad range of experience, often by appeal to unobservable, explanatory posits—the existence of which would account for otherwise inexplicable phenomena. Judging the relative authority of their respective claims will be an extremely complex process; nevertheless, common terms of appraisal provide grounds for their mutual development. The trails blazed in various ways by figures such as theologian Bernard Ramm and scientist Michael Polanyi—and traveled more recently by Ian Barbour, John Polkinghorne, Arthur Peacocke, Nancey Murphy, and others—still seek destinations that are not obvious. But they may lead to greater convergence between biblical theology and science on matters such as divine action and physics, or human nature and genetics, or technology, bioethics, and the like.

Bibliography

Several texts present these proposals in accessible form: Brown, J. R. Who Rules in Science? Harvard University Press, 2001; Giere, R. Science without Laws. University of Chicago Press, 1999; Kitcher, P. The Advancement of Science. Oxford University Press, 1993 (with a sustained and detailed argument for a critical-realist interpretation of science);

Newton-Smith, W., (p 724)ed. A Companion to the Philosophy of Science. Blackwell, 2000 (analyzing many issues mentioned above). Among those exploring the relation between science and theology, John Polkinghorne's prolific writings spell out many of the details, as seen in his Gifford Lectures: The Faith of a Physicist. Princeton University Press, 1994. For a fine example of biblical scholarship drawing heavily and explicitly on scientific methodologies, see Wright, N. T. Christian Origins and the Question of God, esp. chs. 2–5 of vol. 1, The New Testament and the People of God. Fortress, 1992.

Robert O'Connor

Scribes      See Jewish Context of the NT

Scripture, Authority of

Talk of the authority of Scripture indicates that the texts of the Christian canon are normative for the speech, thought, and practice of the church, because these texts mediate God's self-revelation. As the instrument through which divine authority is present and operative in the church, Scripture is primary in the church's governance and fundamental to instruction in the Christian religion as well as to the church's theological self-articulation and its processes of discernment and judgment.

History

The literature of the patristic era contains little formal treatment of the nature of biblical authority. The normative character of Scripture is largely assumed; patristic attitudes to Scripture are visible primarily in exegetical practice and in recommendations about the virtues appropriate to knowing God through Scripture. Thus, the hermeneutical discussion in Augustine's On Christian Teaching includes reflections on fear of God, piety, and teachableness as the most fitting characteristics of the godly reader of the divine wisdom encountered in Scripture. Moreover, patristic theology does not generally treat Scripture as a juridical norm from which can be drawn exegetical warrants for theological proposals, since theology and exegesis are largely coterminous. Scripture is not so much a source or norm of theology as its idiom.

Systematic reflection on the nature of Scripture takes its rise in the latter part of the twelfth century; it should not be thought to begin with the sixteenth-century Reformation. Much Reformation and post-Reformation theology of Scripture is anticipated in the teaching of, for example, Alexander of Hales, Bonaventure, or Thomas Aquinas; the emphasis upon Scripture's authority in the magisterial Reformers is thus not a new departure. What is innovative in the Reformers lies rather in their insistence (with some appeal to humanistic methods of text-interpretation) on the priority of the grammatical sense of the Bible over elaborate fourfold exegesis. They had radical commitment to the supremacy of Scripture's authority over other claims to normativity in the church, whether those of ecclesiastical office or of individual spiritual experience. Thus, Calvin sees scriptural authority as standing against claims to immediate access to God on the part of Christian enthusiasts, and also against official church claims to have competence to "authorize" Scripture or to impose a particular interpretation. Scripture's authority, though it is exercised in the church, does not derive from the church. In this way, Scripture's authority consists in its capacity to outbid and relativize human judgment, and to deliver a normative revelation that overthrows idolatry. Knowledge of its authority is not a rational deduction from external evidences, but is rooted in Spirit-generated persuasion. Furthermore, though Scripture's authority is a basis of appeal in matters of controversy, it is primarily at work in the exegetical and homiletical tasks, through which Scripture is brought to bear on the life of the church. Thus, the authority of Scripture is seen in Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion not simply in formal affirmations of its primacy but also in the entire conception of the work as a guide to the content and implications of Scripture's testimony to the word and work of God. More formal conceptualization of Scripture's authority can be found in the theology of high Protestant orthodoxy. There the cognitive normativity of Scripture for theology is stated with considerable precision through an elaboration of the origin and properties of Scripture. Though it is common to judge Protestant orthodoxy as replacing a dynamic view of Scripture's authority with a static account, such a reading scarcely does justice to the Protestant scholastic texts.

From the end of the seventeenth century, mutations in European civic and intellectual culture had a profound effect on conceptions of the authority of Scripture. Among these changes, the rise of modern understandings of undetermined liberty as basic to intellectual and political responsibility is the most important. Premodern Christian theology assumed that the authority of Scripture is beneficent instruction in given truth; modern views of freedom came to regard that authority as implicated in malevolent theocratic practices that inhibit free inquiry and self-responsibility. "Authority" and "truth" are antithetical, (p 725) the former being the province of arbitrary power, the latter that of critical freedom. For Spinoza, one of the early formative figures in the history of critical biblical study, this political critique of biblical authority acts as one of the chief motivations for demoting Scripture by “naturalizing” it, regarding it as a humanly produced text bearing no intrinsic power to command assent. As historical study of the Bible gained currency, Scripture was drawn into the sphere of human religion, and no longer handled with the assumption of its mediation of divine authority. The remarkable explanatory power of historical study of the Bible in part depended upon a dualistic assumption that a historical text cannot mediate divine authority, so that claims to textual authority are in fact bids for power on the part of interpreters. This dualism was, of course, exacerbated by the heavy supernaturalism of some orthodox Protestant theology of Scripture, which appeared to leave little room for the historical and human character of the biblical materials.

Some strands of modern Christian theology responded to such critiques of biblical authority by grounding an account of that authority in considerations such as the moral or religious superiority of the biblical materials or their veracity in reporting history. Others sought to reason toward the authority of Scripture on the basis of a general notion of inspiration, of which the Bible is shown to be the supreme instance. Though formally similar to earlier Protestant positions, these strategies are primarily apologetic in character, and so differ substantially from more classical Reformation positions by appealing to external warrants for biblical authority.

The dominant contemporary conventions of historical biblical scholarship are mostly sophisticated variations on Spinoza’s “natural history” of the Bible, though allowing considerably more complexity about the nature of that history. On such accounts, affirmations of Scripture’s authority are generally considered to be religious or theological evaluations that do not indicate anything objective about the texts, and have no exegetical import. Libertarian critiques of the politics of biblical authority have been reinforced with especial stringency in feminist interpretation of the Bible. This interpretation has considered the authority of the canon to be an instrument of patriarchy, both in its enforcement of certain patterns of thought and practice, and in its exclusion of other traditions of experience from the church. Comparative studies of sacred texts in different religious traditions have commonly stressed that scriptural authority may be explained as a function of social practice, without any reference to the relation of authoritative texts to divine revelation. More drastically, deconstructive abandonment of textual determinacy makes Scripture into pragmatics on the part of readers, and so undercuts the possibility of any theological account of the Bible’s normativity. A somewhat different hermeneutical tradition has given greater attention to the authority of texts as classics that command attentiveness on the part of readers by their cultural resourcefulness and their ability to transcend any one reading. Some modern theological accounts of Scripture, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, have made much use of this tradition, and in particular have reflected on the ecclesial character of Scripture's authority as the source of the stock of common meanings in the Christian community.

Theology

The authority of Scripture lies in its reference to the church's God and his gospel. Scripture is authoritative because it is instrumental in bringing the word of God to bear upon the thought and practices of the church. In this context, God's "word" refers to God's self-communicative presence, through which he establishes the knowledge of himself in the face of defiance and ignorance; Scripture is the creaturely means through which the Word's activity is extended into the church.

Accordingly, a theological account of the authority of Scripture has to be located in the context of a wide spread of Christian doctrinal affirmations about God's communicative presence and activity. It may not be isolated as a quasi-independent topic in Christian doctrine, and should not be expounded prior to or apart from primary Christian doctrines. This isolation often happened in the post-Reformation era, when the theology of Scripture was caught up within the more general inflation of the theology of revelation. Teaching about revelation migrated away from the Christian doctrine of God to the beginning of dogmatics as the pretheological cognitive "foundation" of theological teaching. Over against this, the theology of Scripture is consequent upon the doctrine of God. Most of all, this means that Scripture is a function of the triune God's self-manifestation, especially his presence in the risen Christ, who through the Holy Spirit instructs the church. The primacy of christological and pneumatological doctrine prevents the detachment of the theology of Scripture from a wider account of the economy of God's dealings with creatures. (p 726) It does this by integrating teaching about the nature and authority of Scripture with substantive doctrine about God's saving self-manifestation to creatures. Moreover, a theology of Scripture is properly inseparable from soteriology, and especially Christian teaching about ignorance and idolatry as forms of human rejection of the given truth of God. This, in turn, means that a theology of Scripture is to be related to sanctification—the healing and renewal of human life through the work of the Holy Spirit—and of the doctrine of the church as the sphere in which God's communicative activity is encountered and confessed. Theological teaching about the authority of Scripture is thus best seen in relation to the full scope of a theology of God's fellowship with creatures. The adequacy of any such teaching about Scripture will in part depend upon its reference to all the elements outlined, and not simply to a partial selection of features.

Within such an account, Scripture's authority lies in its reference to God and the gospel. Its authority does not lie within itself, any more than the sacraments have any inherent effectiveness, but in its testimony to the authority of the one who appoints Scripture as his servant. Scripture's authority is therefore that of a commissioned witness or herald. One consequence here is that the authority of Scripture is the authority of its content, that which it sets forth in its function as witness to the Word. Only as the bearer of this particular truth is Scripture able to function as the "law" of the Christian community. That to which the church submits in its obedience to the authority of Scripture is not a contentless norm, a purely formal statute, but rather the commanding force of its truth-content.

As testimony to the self-manifesting truth of God in the gospel, Scripture is authoritative because it indicates the sovereignty and perfection of God's self-communication. This indication is reliable, and therefore authoritative, because God acts in, with, and over the human authors, ordering their acts of communication in such a way that they are caused to bear fitting and effective testimony. In the theological tradition, this divine oversight is usually termed "inspiration." By this is meant God's superintending of the processes of creaturely text-production. Though some restrict inspiration to the personality of the biblical authors, it may also be extended to all the processes of the composition of the text, including not only the choice of words ("verbal inspiration") but also preliterate tradition and such processes as canonization. Some prefer to distinguish between inspiration as a work of the Spirit in respect to the text, and illumination as the Spirit's work of enabling apprehension of and assent to divine truth in inspired Scripture. Alongside inspiration, Scripture is also usually affirmed to have other properties that bear upon its authority. Chief among these are clarity and sufficiency. The clarity of Scripture is not so much its self-evidence as its given capacity to illuminate the godly, meaning the Spirit-directed, reader; the sufficiency of Scripture is its adequacy as a presentation of the gospel, which renders other sources of instruction supplementary or superfluous.

The sphere of biblical authority is the church as the community that is generated and sustained by the Word. The church confesses Scripture's authority, but Scripture does not depend upon the church's approbation. One of the chief contentions of Reformation doctrines of Scripture was that the church has no competence to bestow authority upon Scripture or to command particular interpretations as universally binding, and that any such attempts subvert the primacy of the Bible. Hence, the process of canonization is properly to be understood, not as an act in which the church creates an authority for itself by determining a set of normative texts, but as an act of acknowledging antecedent authority imposed upon the church from without. Further, although the authority of Scripture is contextless and inoperative without the church as the sphere in which it is recognized, this should not be taken to mean that its authority is simply de facto and not de jure. The rule of Scripture is not simply the consequence of use or veneration, but it is legitimate authority because of its relation to the revealing acts of God.

However, this should not be stressed in such a way that Scripture's authority is conceived in purely formal terms, as if it were a property independent of the relation that the text has to the common life of the Christian community. Authority is not independent of use; the authority of Scripture is the lawfulness with which it may command and elicit patterns of thought and action on the part of the church. Hence, the demonstration of accepting the authority of Scripture is primarily practical, and only secondarily theoretical (in, e.g., a theological account of the nature and properties of Scripture).

Accordingly, the authority of Scripture stands in close relation to the practice of interpretation. The act of interpreting an authoritative text involves the adoption of specific attitudes (p 727) and virtues, as well as the performance of certain operations, as appropriate to the character of the text and its authoritative claim. Thus, for example, to interpret an authoritative text is not simply to be an agent acting upon a passive text that we summon before our minds and question; nor is it to handle the text as if it were an inert historical artifact. Because the text has authority, it makes certain claims upon the reader, claims to which the reader must attend if an appropriate response is to be made to the text. An appropriate response will be one of subordination, deference, or compliance as one stands beneath the claim that the text presents. Such a response will not exclude attention to the contingent features of the text (such as its historical matrix, linguistic or genetic features, or relation to other texts). Instead, it will also consider attention to these matters preliminary to the chief task of attending to the text as herald of its particular content. Further, because the text is authoritative, the text will be inexhaustible by any one reading, not only because it has a surplus of meaning, but also because the text's claim upon the church's attention is perpetual and cannot be disposed of in a single act of interpretation.

Nevertheless, the authority of Scripture is not such that no acts of interpretation are required: what is authoritative is a text, and texts elicit acts of reading. Scripture's authority is not exercised apart from the work performed upon the text by its readers; its authority is not a formal property, but an aspect of the interaction between God's self-revelation and its hearers. Authority quickens action, directing it in ways that are fitting to the truth that is declared. The authority of Scripture thus includes its capacity to stimulate and direct interpretative action. Interpretative action is, however, rarely an end in itself; it is engaged in order to enable other kinds of action and judgment—intellectual, moral, political. In this way, therefore, the authority of Scripture is formative of the life of the Christian community in which it presents the divine claim.

Scripture is authoritative for all the activities of the church. It has an especial authority with respect to the church's articulation of its beliefs in doctrine. This theological authority of Scripture is not first and foremost to be seen in formal statements about its authority, nor simply in a theological method that adduces biblical warrants for theological positions. It is chiefly evident in deference to Scripture, in which the Bible determines the range, content, and limits of Christian doctrine, and thus governs the overall shape of a theological account of Christian belief. Within such deference, patterns of interpretation may be quite varied; but they will find their center in a certain transparency to the biblical texts. Doctrines are not best understood as conceptual improvements upon or reorganizations of biblical material, nor is Scripture best thought of as a body of raw material awaiting theological conceptualization. Rather, doctrines are conceptual statements that both sum up tracts of the biblical materials and also enable fresh exegesis. Doctrines may guide the interpretation of Scripture; but they can do so only if they derive from and promote the authoritative Word that is encountered through Scripture's service.

See also Canon; Revelation; Scripture, Clarity of; Scripture, Sufficiency of; Word of God

Bibliography

Abraham, W. The Divine Inspiration of Holy Scripture. Oxford University Press, 1981; Barr, J. Holy Scripture. Clarendon, 1983; Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Vol. I/2. T&T Clark, 1956; Berkouwer, G. C. Holy Scripture. Eerdmans, 1975; Cantwell Smith, W. What Is Scripture? SCM, 1993; Ebeling, G. "The Significance of the Critical Historical Method for Church and Theology in Protestantism." Pages 17–61 in Word and Faith. SCM, 1963; Farley, E. Ecclesial Reflection. Fortress, 1982; Kelsey, D. Proving Doctrine. Trinity, 1999; Muller, R. Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics. Vol. 2, Holy Scripture. Baker, 1992; Preus, J. S. Spinoza and the Irrelevance of Biblical Authority. Cambridge University Press, 2001; Preus, R. The Inspiration of Scripture. Oliver & Boyd, 1957; Reventlow, H. G. The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World. SCM, 1980; Scholder, K. The Birth of Modern Critical Theology. SCM, 1990; Warfield, B. B. Revelation and Inspiration. Oxford University Press, 1927; Webster, J. Holy Scripture. Cambridge University Press, 2003; Wenz, A. Das Wort Gottes—Gericht und Rettung. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996; Young, F. Biblical Exegesis and the Formation of Christian Culture. Cambridge University Press, 1997.

John Webster

Scripture, Clarity of

The “doctrine” of Scripture’s clarity is associated with the Reformers, but the conviction that Scripture has the capacity to address and transform the human being, and to offer a reliable guide to human action, has permeated the Christian tradition. This conviction, however, has always been accompanied by an acknowledgment of the need for divine aid; Scripture is clear to the mind enlightened by the Holy Spirit to perceive the revelation offered in Christ. This does not obviate the need for interpretation or teaching within the church, but it does imply that Scripture stands (p 728) over rather than under its interpreters, academic or clerical. Behind the affirmation of the clarity, or perspicuity, of Scripture stands a conviction that, through the Holy Spirit, Scripture communicates sufficiently clearly to guide one with faith to knowledge of what is pleasing to God.

While the claritas or perspicuitas of Scripture was a key principle of the Reformers, similar concerns surface in the earliest strata of Christian tradition. The issue arises because, as Luther acknowledges, some texts are not immediately clear. Scripture is vulnerable to twisting by the unscrupulous, and to misunderstanding by the uneducated. Surfacing already in the NT are various ways of interpreting the OT and acknowledged complexity in interpreting what is now the NT. On the one hand, 2 Pet. 3:16 declares that some of Paul’s teaching is hard to understand and susceptible to misuse by insincere people. On the other hand, 2 Tim. 3:16–17 asserts that all Scripture is profitable for teaching that equips the disciple, even as it acknowledges a certain skill in handling the Scripture that makes the good teacher comparable to a workman. Paul asserts that the Holy Spirit unveils the meaning of the OT, which is Christ (2 Cor. 3:15–18). He sometimes appeals to the straightforward literal meaning of OT texts; but, reading in light of the coming of Christ, he also finds in the Hebrew Scriptures what he explicitly refers to as “allegory” (Gal. 4:24 NRSV). All this indicates that the NT itself gives a complex picture of the interpretative process.

The early commentator with perhaps the greatest impact on later debates over Scripture's clarity is Augustine. In On Christian Teaching, devoted to the principles of biblical exegesis, Augustine holds that Scripture is perspicuous, yet not easy to interpret. The difficulty of interpretation serves a divine purpose: "to wear out pride with hard work and to keep intelligence from boredom" (Doctr. chr. 2.14–15). The "hard work" for Augustine includes the rigorous employment of the most important exegetical tools: grammar, rhetoric, knowledge of languages, and the rudimentary "critical" tools (2.34–58). On one hand, he stresses grammatical and philological work to uncover the authorial intention of the text. On the other hand, he acknowledges the final author to be God, who may make one thing in salvation history a sign of another, and may allow for a multiplicity of meanings to enrich the text beyond the human author's conscious intention (3.84–86).

Augustine allows a certain flexibility in interpretation, distinguishing between lying and mistakenly failing to grasp the intention of the author. The true end of all Scripture is love of God and neighbor, issuing from a pure heart, genuine faith, and a good conscience (1.95). There is no danger in giving more than one interpretation of a difficult passage, as long as each finds backing elsewhere in the Scripture (3.83). Augustine's aim is the instruction and upbuilding of the church; so he moves easily from a christological interpretation to an ecclesiological or hortatory one (Simonetti 106).

In 1524 Erasmus of Rotterdam wrote a treatise entitled On Freedom of the Will, arguing that the Bible does not give sufficient grounds for certainty about whether human choice after the fall remains free or is bound by sin. In this, as in many disputes, he claims, Scripture does not speak clearly, so one does best to defer to the weight of tradition (De libero arbitrio 38–40). It is the method and presuppositions, as well as the material conclusions in Erasmus's diatribe, to which Luther objects. Against the claim that Scripture is inherently obscure, he asserts two ways in which the Bible is clear. The first of these is "internal" and results from the action of the Holy Spirit to enlighten the understanding obscured by sin; apart from such aid, the human interpreter has no capacity to grasp the truth that Scripture is intended to convey (De servo arbitrio 159). "External clarity" claims that the text itself, when interpreted according to the public rules of language, offers a clear account of the truth it is intended to convey (Vanhoozer 315). Luther maintains that apparently obscure passages become clear when viewed in the light of Scripture as a whole. Scripture is thus self-glossing. When disputes over doctrine arise, they may thus be settled "at the bar of Scripture” (Serv. arb. 159). While Luther derides Erasmus’s “skepticism” and “sophistry,” he objects most strongly to the potential of Erasmus’s argument to bolster papal authority by frightening people away from putatively obscure Scripture (Serv. arb. 159).

Luther thus does not deny the need for teachers or claim that Scripture is a matter of private judgment; this was the crux of his debate with the Schwärmer, “enthusiasts” who made inner experience the norm of interpretation (Serv. arb. 158; cf. Luther’s Against the Heavenly Prophets). Luther’s claim is that Scripture is clear enough that one need not rely on the official magisterium of the church to mediate its meaning. One can expect human beings guided by the Holy Spirit to arrive at consensus on the interpretation of the text. This has several consequences.

(p 729)First, Scripture is to be available to all. The spread of literacy and education of clergy are key planks in Luther’s reforming platform (Thiselton 189). Second, Luther holds to an ecclesiology that is not hung on bishops holding an authoritative teaching office in succession from the apostles. The church is rather an assembly of men and women holding right doctrine, expressed in right preaching and celebration of the sacraments. Third, against Erasmus, Luther insists that the Bible clearly teaches that the human will is in bondage to sin, and only divine grace frees the will at any moment; this issue is a test case for what one can affirm clearly on biblical grounds. Thus, Luther’s view of the clarity of Scripture goes hand in hand with a set of doctrinal commitments derived from the text of the Bible. The church, then, is where those who read the Bible in this way and preach in accord with those doctrines are gathered.

In a polemical context in which multiple senses were sometimes invoked in support of disputed doctrinal positions, on the grounds that Scripture is multivalent, Calvin responded that Scripture is simplex, bearing only a single sense (Commentary on Gal. 5:22). Its clarity is rooted in the accessibility of that single, literal sense. Calvin’s exegesis is marked by several important features: a humanist approach to the letter of the text, which prizes knowledge of the original languages, close attention to the historical context of any given passage, separation of doctrinal discussions from exposition of the text (“Epistle to the Reader,” in Inst., 2d ed., cited in Thiselton 189), and a christocentric narrative/historical framework for the whole of the Bible. He builds on a christocentric vision of salvation history drawn from Scripture as a whole, which enables him to draw a number of hortatory or theological implications from a text that looks much like the multiple “senses” of earlier theologians (Parker 44).

Thus, as Anthony Thiselton points out, the principle of Scripture's clarity has a fourfold function for the Reformers: christological; critical; epistemological; ecclesiological. By no means was it meant to sideline ecclesial tradition or disavow the need for the sometimes-messy work of interpretation. The better Catholic apologists, such as Peter Canisius, agreed with the Reformers in holding that Scripture is self-interpreting and invoked magisterial authority for interpretation sparingly, only as a necessary role of adjudication in the face of exegetical disagreements (Thiselton 404–8). Positions on both sides hardened in the following century, however, with many Protestants virtually eliminating the role of ecclesial interpretative tradition, and Catholic bishops shielding laypeople from the Bible and instead offering putative distillations of its message (Berkouwer 267–98; Callahan 156–59; Congar 177–221).

In light of the polemical context of much of the discussion of Scripture's clarity, it is worth recognizing some developments in Roman Catholic teaching over the last fifty years or so and also some philosophical developments that place this discussion in a new context. First, in the face of liberal historical-critical ideology, Pius XII strongly affirmed the inspiration of the Scripture in its entirety; this was coupled with active promotion of biblical studies making use of critical tools (Divino afflante Spiritu [1943]). Second, the Second Vatican Council's declaration that the bishops stand under the Word of God and serve it enshrines the principle that the official magisterium is subject to the word of God and accountable to it (Dei verbum §2.10). Third, that same council affirmed that access to the Bible is to be wide open to the faithful (Dei verbum §6.22), and that preaching is to take exposition of the Bible as its material focus (6.25). While disputes over doctrine remain, one can see a certain convergence in the approach to Scripture that has undergirded progress in doctrinal dialogues between Roman Catholics and representatives of Reformation traditions.

At the same time, the late twentieth century saw what Kevin Vanhoozer calls “the literary turn” in philosophy, often characterized by a deep suspicion of the capacity of any text to convey its object to a reader. The affirmation of Scripture's clarity in the present context is an expression of confidence that this text, like all human texts vulnerable to the misunderstanding and deception that mark communication among sinful human beings, will still be used by God to speak. In the present context, one may make a reasonable argument that the primary differences in approach to Scripture's clarity are no longer between Roman Catholics and descendants of the Reformation tradition. Instead, the basic differences are between those who hold that God speaks to the church through the Bible by the action of the Holy Spirit, and those varied postmodern theorists who hold a basic suspicion of the capacity of any text to communicate its object.

Bibliography

Beisser, F. “Claritas scripturae” bei Martin Luther. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966; Berkouwer, G. C. Holy (p 730) Scripture. Eerdmans, 1975; Callahan, J. The Clarity of Scripture. InterVarsity, 2001; Congar, Y. Tradition and Traditions. Burns & Oates, 1966; Constitution on Divine Revelation. In The Documents of Vatican Council II, ed. A. Flannery, OP. Costello, 1987; Lubac, H. de. Exégèse médiévale. 4 vols. Aubier, 1959–64; idem. Medieval Exegesis. Vol. 1 translated by M. Sebanc. Vol. 2 translated by E. Macierowski. Eerdmans, 1998–2000; Parker, T. H. L. Calvin’s New Testament Commentaries. SCM, 1971; Ramm, B. Protestant Biblical Interpretation. 3d ed. Baker, 1970; Simonetti, M. Biblical Interpretation in the Early Church. T&T Clark, 1994; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Biblical Hermeneutics. Zondervan, 1992; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998.

John Yocum

Scripture, Inerrancy of    See Scripture, Authority of; Truth

Scripture, Infallibility of    See Scripture, Authority of; Truth

Scripture, Inspiration of    See Scripture, Authority of

Scripture, Sufficiency of

The doctrine of the sufficiency of Scripture is at heart an assertion of the nature of God’s relationship to Scripture, and consequently of its authoritative significance. It is regularly distinguished into two aspects. “Material sufficiency” asserts that Scripture contains everything necessary to be known and responded to for salvation and faithful discipleship. This is so because God has identified himself and his communication with the meaning (or better: the actions—“speech acts”—performed by means of the words) of Scripture, in a way that he has done with no other text or speech in the world (see Vanhoozer; Ward; Wolterstorff). “Formal sufficiency” claims that Scripture as the word of God ought not ultimately to be subject to any external interpretative authority, , such such as the teaching authority of the church or a Spirit-filled individual, and so is significantly “self-interpreting.”

The Bible as “Sufficient”

Scripture claims its own sufficiency and witnesses to the theological bases of its sufficiency in a number of ways. It claims that its content is “breathed-out,” spoken by God (“breathed-out” being quite likely a better translation of theopneustos in 2 Tim. 3:16 than “inspired”), and is sufficient to equip one “for every good work” (2 Tim. 3:17). John warns that anyone who adds to or subtracts from his prophecy will be subject to divine judgment (Rev. 22:18–19), alluding to a similar charge given in the OT (Deut. 12:32). The OT assumes that to obey the Lord’s revealed law is to live blamelessly and to remain in close fellowship with him (Ps. 119:1, 8–10).

The latter observation leads us beyond individual references to the overall relationship between God and Scripture. God fundamentally relates to humankind as a covenant-making (promise-speaking) God. For God to be knowable, he must express his covenant in the words of human language. The nature of a covenant is such that for a person to put one’s trust in those words is simply to put trust in God (Wolterstorff). Thus, Abraham enters into covenant with God simply by responding to his command to leave Haran (Gen. 12:1–3), and Christ abides in his followers, and they in him, to the extent that his words abide in them (John 15:1–11). The canon of Scripture functions as God’s “book of covenant”: it is the semantic means by which he offers himself to the world as a covenant-making God. Scripture is therefore sufficient for the performance of the divine promise of salvation in Christ.

The doctrine of scriptural sufficiency claims neither that God has ceased to prompt, guide, and direct (“speak to”) disciples and the church, nor that he has told us everything about himself and every question we face. Rather, it asserts that, when responded to in trust and love by us, the revelatory, covenant-making act that God performs in and through Scripture can confidently be believed to be sufficient for salvation and for truthful, faithful discipleship of Christ.

Hermeneutical Implications of the Sufficiency of Scripture

The sufficiency of Scripture is sometimes thought, by both opponents and proponents, to entail more in practice than it really does. Such misunderstanding is so common that it is important to state clearly what the doctrine does not necessarily imply. First, it is a statement about the sufficiency of Scripture, not about the sufficiency of any single interpreter or community of interpreters. Thus, it does not entail the beliefs that interpreting the Bible is simple and that faithful doctrine and practice can easily be read off every page by a single interpreter or community. Nor does it exalt individualistic and sometimes eccentric biblical interpretation, neglecting the contributions of scholarship and of interpretative traditions. Groups of Christians who adhere strongly to scriptural sufficiency have often, it is true, been suspicious of both scholarship (p 731) and the traditions of biblical interpretation, but that is certainly not true of the mainline Reformation and post-Reformation theologians who expounded the doctrine with greatest clarity (Mathison). Second, the sufficiency of Scripture claims that Scripture is sufficient only for a particular divinely intended purpose. Thus, it claims neither that Scripture speaks directly to every conceivable question of faith and practice, nor that it speaks unequivocally on every topic it addresses. Nor does it imply that Scripture necessarily gives exhaustive knowledge of God, the world, ourselves, history, or protological and eschatological events.

To put it positively, to claim “the sufficiency of Scripture” is at heart to claim that (1) God is knowable. For the Protestant Reformers, Scripture provided, epistemologically, “a ground on which we may confidently proceed,” and theologically, “a witness to Christ to which we may confidently respond” (Thiselton 184–85). This is sometimes alleged, in its post-Reformation manifestations, to be a Christianized version of the modernist quest for reason-based certainty. However, at its best it is a faithful response to the fact that God has chosen to make himself known, and to communicate Jesus Christ to us, in comprehensible human language. (2) Text and interpretation are fundamentally separate. Interpreters and interpretative communities will always tend to use Scripture to legitimate their own beliefs and biases, thereby silencing some of what Scripture says. The Christian church stands in constant need of reformation—that is, in constant need of the God who indwells the church also to speak from outside in words that call it back to faithfulness to its head, Jesus Christ. The text through which God supremely does this, and whose content funds the meaning of every other means through which God does this, is Scripture. (3) Ultimately, the meaning of Scripture can at no point be definitively decided by the declaration either of a particular church magisterium or of an individual claiming special and decisive divine revelation, presenting themselves as the contemporary mouthpiece of the Holy Spirit. Instead, the Spirit’s ongoing speaking activity is consistent with the meaning of the biblical texts, which he once inspired. This is what is meant by the principle that “Scripture interprets itself”: again, not that every question of interpretation can be easily settled just by reading the Bible, but that no external institution or individual may impose final interpretative fiat on Scripture. Any act of biblical interpretation is only truly authoritative to the extent that it demonstrates its legitimacy with careful and thoughtful reading of Scripture itself.

See also Canon; Scripture, Authority of; Tradition

Bibliography

Helm, P., and C. Trueman, eds. The Trustworthiness of God. Apollos, 2002; Mathison, K. The Shape of Sola Scriptura. Canon, 2001; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. HarperCollins, 1992; Vanhoozer, K. First Theology. InterVarsity, 2002; Ward, T. Word and Supplement. Oxford University Press, 2002; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Timothy Ward

Scripture, Unity of

Christian faith faced two crucial external challenges from the modern age. Empirical commitments raised doubts about the Bible's purported history, especially of supernatural events. Rationalists raised doubts not only about access to such a (redemptive) history, but also about its significance for universal reason (Lessing's infamous ugly ditch) or even its consistency with such truths. These external challenges led critics either to reject the Bible's claims or else to rescue its truth by changing its meanings (as chronicled by Frei).

Just as crucial over the long haul, however, has been the internal challenge to Christian teaching from critical fragmentation of the Bible. Can Christians reach coherent theological claims on their own terms? Or does the legacy of the modern West show the impossibility of any Christian consensus based upon Scripture, apart from an ecclesiastical authority imposed somewhat arbitrarily? In response to this complex problem, we may suggest some key biblical texts and hermeneutical strategies, resulting in a confessional and post- (but not anti-) critical standpoint.

Unity in the Scriptural Texts?

The obvious diversity in the canon falls roughly along "synchronic" or literary lines, involving various genres and word-concept relationships, and "diachronic" or historical lines, involving various relationships between textual "sense" and extra-textual "reference." Thus, biblical texts not only can function differently in terms of authority across time; they also differ in proximity to the formation of theological concepts in the first place (as emphasized by Barr).

On the literary difficulties, see (among other articles herewith) "Proof Text," with its discussion (p 732) of Ricoeur and various models of biblical authority (Goldingay). As an illustration here, we may mention the constant tendency of “biblical theology” to marginalize the Wisdom literature in favor of an organizing theme such as salvation history, or conversely to focus Wisdom theology excessively upon creation.

We may also highlight texts that are prominent illustrations in current discussions of Scripture’s diversity (see, e.g., Fowl; Johnson; essays in Green and Turner). How are we to read Ps. 137, which pronounces a blessing on those who would dash Babylonian children against the rocks, in light of the Sermon on the Mount? Or to what extent is Acts 15, where at least certain OT laws are set aside in light of redemptive-historical progression (plus, as often neglected, in light of reading Amos 9!), a model for our own theological interpretation, even of the NT?

Hermeneutical Strategies That Support Scriptural Unity

Premodern interpreters were not unaware of the Bible’s diversity: Marcion should make that fairly obvious. Moreover, we must admit that some practiced allegory because they found the literal sense problematic in places. Nevertheless, biblical theology, as an academic discipline constituted by preoccupation with human authorship, has tended to canonize more extreme conclusions about that diversity than the church has traditionally accepted.

The most central problems concern whether or how Christians may read the OT with reference to the triune God’s self-revelation in Jesus Christ, whether or how those Scriptures of Israel relate to the church, and whether the NT can coherently support the teaching of the orthodox creeds about Jesus Christ or traditions of Christian ethics.

The Rule of Faith. A long-standing solution, from the days of Irenaeus’s opposition to Gnosticism onward, lies in the Rule of Faith, which has come into various creedal forms such as the Nicene. The Rule expresses certain central “judgments of identity” between the Testaments, the most important of which are

(1) that the one who sent Jesus, and raised him from the dead, is self-identically the God of Israel, the God attested in the Old Testament Scriptures; (2) that the church of Jesus Christ is continuous, to be sure across massive and radical transformation, with the covenant people of the Old Testament; and (3) binding these together, that Jesus Christ is the one word that God speaks to his people, so that whatever is “word of God” in the Old Testament must be read as a moment within the protracted utterance of what is conclusively articulated only in the paschal mystery of Good Friday and Easter—in “the resurrection which has now taken place.” ... [It is true that] there is no “method” of a formal kind—historical or literary, critical or allegorical or typological—by which the unity of the Christian canon can be set forth in abstraction from theological argument and judgment. (Yeago, “Bible,” 72)

It is also true that the Rule of Faith is considered a derivation from and description of the Bible’s own unity (Blowers).

Typology and/or Allegory? Moreover, the medieval fourfold sense, which developed from earlier Christian allegorizing, did not simply pursue spirituality, but more centrally a redemptive-historical unity in reading the Bible. Despite excesses, the approach was not entirely unlike Calvin’s method (cf. Steinmetz 29; Muller 11): we ought to read Scripture for what the church should believe (correspondence between the allegorical sense and the virtue of faith), for what Christians should do (correspondence between the tropological sense and the virtue of love), and for what we should hope (corresponding to the anagogical sense). As we seek these virtues today with more hermeneutical precision, evaluating typology vis-à-vis allegory is crucial. To what extent may the necessary redemptive-historical connections be discerned from within the Bible itself (typology)? Or must the narrative(s) be imposed partially from outside (allegory)? Depending on how one understands the historical distinctions involved, “figural reading” may be the more apt terminology for following in Calvin’s footsteps (so Frei 47; Dawson). Recovering such a reading strategy may be essential for contemporary church life, not merely for connecting the Testaments à la the ancients (Lindbeck, Interpretation, 31; Seitz, Figured Out).

The Analogy of Faith/Scripture. While in addition to the Rule of Faith Eastern Orthodox interpreters will then involve Tradition, and Roman Catholics the magisterium (tending also to accept allegory), Protestants confess Scripture’s basic clarity (tending to accept typology only). But Protestants can still deploy hermeneutical summaries of the Bible’s scope and coherence as well. Seeking to follow Augustine, Luther and Calvin held that one could interpret difficult passages in light of clearer texts or dominant ideas of biblical teaching. These two versions of an analogia fidei need not contradict but could supplement an apostolic version à la the Rule of Faith (Blocher 18–23).

(p 733) Expecting coherence between every part of Scripture, which has often been the developed “formal” Protestant understanding, seems like an even stronger version, challenging to accept. Arguably, though, it is a necessary safeguard against using the analogia fidei to privilege a passage or guard a doctrine that seems clear enough—but only to us (Blocher 27). Coherence with other parts of Scripture could be a criterion by which we prematurely flatten the historical unfolding or literary contours of God’s self-disclosure, or foist upon the Bible a plainly impossible standard of unity. Chastely applied, however, such a criterion need not force artificial coherence, but could function as a helpful gateway into the hermeneutical circle.

Cacophony or Polyphony? How then should we approach contemporary criticism? The problems and possibilities of “biblical theology” are discussed in depth elsewhere. B. B. Warfield’s analogy of an army—comparing exegesis to the work of a recruiting officer, biblical theology to the organization of companies and regiments and corps, and systematic theology to their combination as a fighting force (cited in Abraham 325–26)—is surely too optimistic. Yet his accusation that critics overemphasize biblical diversity is probably accurate. Hence, more dynamic concepts of unity are being sought (Welker 239), most prominently the “dialogical” borrowed from the Russian Mikhail Bakhtin: multiple voices may not contradict each other or compete chaotically. Instead, they cohere in a dialogue that balances and expresses together truths that cannot be held all at once in a single consciousness (Vanhoozer).

Thus, for instance, having raised the question of cacophony or polyphony regarding NT ethics, Richard Hays seeks a complex unity through complementary “focal lenses.” Or consider the practice of NT theology: we must take more seriously the need for four Gospels, not one, and the General Epistles vis-à-vis the Pauline. Perhaps this could be modeled after an “apostolic conference table” (Turner 54). Further, while appropriately sensitive to Judaism, a Christian biblical theology probably cannot or should not avoid reading the OT in relation to the NT (Watson, Truth; Watson, “Scripture”). Yet we must remember that the NT itself reveals an early struggle over Christian identity vis-à-vis Israel (Lindbeck, “Church,” 44), since they were reading the OT as their “canon” with its own integrity (Seitz, “Interpretation”). Thus, a concept of unified teaching is needed in which the complexity of revelation corresponds to the unity of divine action in history (Lints 74).

Concepts and Judgments. Accordingly, difficulties for biblical unity will constantly center on the identity of Jesus Christ. Continuing defenses will even be needed for the correspondence between the Rule of Faith and coherent NT teaching. In response to James Dunn on that point, David Yeago (“Dogma”; cf. Carson) demonstrates the possibility of similar theological “judgments” taking different conceptual forms. The judgments of Paul and John may be expressed differently, but both support the preexistence of God’s Son, thus sharing continuity with Nicene dogma.

Conversely, another question about diverse content arises when similar conceptual forms are involved. Consider Paul (Rom. 4) and James (ch. 2): they use the same vocabulary (“faith”), and indeed the same OT passage regarding Abraham (Gen. 15:6), in markedly different ways. Yet if each addresses different questions, it is plausible that their voices are complementary rather than contradictory.

Intracanonial Criticism. A hermeneutical strategy for diversity, then, might learn from Acts 15, or from our Lord’s example in handling divorce (Matt. 19:1–12). Such examples suggest that the doctrinal and/or ethical teaching of a passage must be set in canonical, redemptive-historical context, its authority shaped or perhaps even set aside by balancing it with other biblical truths. Such balancing will also be needed at broader literary levels, as in the ways Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes are read together. Still, intracanonial criticism of this sort must respect the finality of God’s self-revelation in Jesus Christ. Though the Spirit will not complete God’s perfecting work until the second advent ushers in the fullness of the kingdom, the NT may not be handled in all respects as early Christians read the OT.

Thus, it is doubtful whether intracanonial criticism licenses a “canon within a canon” (as alleged, e.g., of Luther or later of Käsemann), equals a largely unbridled “reading with the Spirit” (as, e.g., Fowl on Acts 15), or even functions exactly like more contemporary “law-gospel” hermeneutics (e.g., Watson, Church, part 3).

Scriptural Unity Confessed in “Faith Seeking Understanding”

If Scripture is not at all unified, then “the canon threatens to become a grab-bag in which searchers pick and choose according to whim or, less pejoratively, in accordance with extrabiblical principles” (Lindbeck, “Interpretation,” 38–39). Christians are committed by their Rule of Faith to reading Scripture as ultimately united (p 734) around God’s story in Jesus Christ. The strangely wonderful story of the disciples traveling to Emmaus in Luke 24, a passage so vital to this issue, makes tangible our tension. We only see the OT’s connection to Jesus of Nazareth with divinely opened eyes of faith, yet such faith is only possible if Christ is essential to understanding the OT (Moberly, esp. 51).

Combined elements of several hermeneutical strategies can explicate such a commitment. While Scripture’s unity is a conviction that Christians confess in faith, we seek to understand not only biblical texts in its light, but also implications of the conviction itself. For this, careful encounters with critical scholarship remain essential, even if we cannot be utterly subject to its skeptical excesses.

Contemporary struggles especially concern how to unfold an intracanonical criticism without question-begging. Even when Scripture's unity is embraced, challenges remain. Robert Gundry rightly wonders whether we should seek all-embracing systems of theology, or instead employ certain biblical texts or themes or truths in situation-specific ways (95). Perhaps that practice would often display a more "dialogical" and defensible concept of Scripture's unity—without denying its narrative coherence or the complementarity of its concepts. For these authorize continued exegetical interaction with theologies of a modestly "systematic" kind.

See also Allegory; Biblical Theology; Dialogism; Proof Text; Relationship between the Testaments; Rule of Faith; Systematic Theology; Typology

Bibliography

Abraham, W. Canon and Criterion in Christian Theology. Clarendon, 1998; Alexander, T. D., and B. Rosner, eds. New Dictionary of Biblical Theology. InterVarsity, 2000; Barr, J. The Concept of Biblical Theology. Fortress, 1999; Blocher, H. "The 'Analogy of Faith' in the Study of Scripture." Pages 17–38 in The Challenge of Evangelical Theology, ed. N. M. de S. Cameron. Rutherford House, 1987; Blowers, P. "The Regula Fidei and the Narrative Character of Early Christian Faith." ProEccl 6, no. 2 (1997): 199–228; Carson, D. A. "Unity and Diversity in the New Testament: The Possibility of Systematic Theology." Pages 65–95 in Scripture and Truth, ed. D. A. Carson and J. Woodbridge. Baker, 1992; Dawson, J. D. Christian Figural Reading and the Fashioning of Identity. University of California Press, 2002; Dunn, J. D. G. Unity and Diversity in the New Testament. Westminster, 1977; Fowl, S. Engaging Scripture. Blackwell, 1998; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; Goldingay, J. Models for Scripture. Eerdmans, 1994; Green, J., and M. Turner, eds. Between Two Horizons. Eerdmans, 2000; Gundry, R. Jesus the Word according to John the Sectarian. Eerdmans, 2002; Hays, R. The Moral Vision of the New Testament. HarperCollins, 1996; Johnson, L. T. Scripture and Discernment in the Early Church. Rev. ed. Abingdon, 1996; Lindbeck, G. "Postcritical Canonical Interpretation: Three Modes of Retrieval." Pages 26–51 in Theological Exegesis, ed. C. Seitz and K. Greene-McCreight. Eerdmans, 1999; idem. "The Story-Shaped Church: Critical Exegesis and Theological Interpretation." Pages 39–52 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997; Lints, R. The Fabric of Theology. Eerdmans, 1993; Moberly, R. W. L. The Bible, Theology, and Faith. Studies in Christian Doctrine. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Muller, R. "Biblical Interpretation in the Era of the Reformation: The View from the Middle Ages." Pages 3–22 in Biblical Interpretation in the Era of the Reformation, ed. R. Muller and J. Thompson. Eerdmans, 1996; Seitz, C. "Christological Interpretation of Texts and Trinitarian Claims to Truth: An Engagement with Francis Watson's Text and Truth." SJT 52, no. 2 (1999): 209–26; idem. Figured Out. Westminster John Knox, 2001;

Steinmetz, D. "The Superiority of Pre-Critical Exegesis." Pages 26–38 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997; Turner, M. "Historical Criticism and Theological Hermeneutics of the New Testament." Pages 44–70 in Between Two Horizons, ed. J. Green and M. Turner. Eerdmans, 2000; Vanhoozer, K. First Theology. InterVarsity, 2002; Watson, F. "The Old Testament as Christian Scripture: A Response to Professor Seitz." SJT 52, no. 2 (1999): 227–32; idem. Text and Truth. Eerdmans, 1997; idem. Text, Church, and World. Eerdmans, 1994; Welker, M. "Biblical Theology and the Authority of Scripture." Pages 232–41 in Theology in the Service of the Church, ed. W. Alston Jr. Eerdmans, 2000; Yeago, D. "The Bible: The Spirit, the Church, and the Scriptures." Pages 49–93 in Knowing the Triune God, ed. J. Buckley and D. Yeago. Eerdmans, 2001; idem. "The New Testament and the Nicene Dogma: A Contribution to the Recovery of Theological Exegesis." Pages 87–100 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997.

Daniel J. Treier

Scripture Principle See Scripture, Authority of; Word of God

Semantics See Meaning; Semiotics

Semiotics

Communication in all forms—whether between humans, plants, animals, or in other contexts—draws on a series of signaling systems. The study of these systems is semiotics, also known in European circles as semiology. Daniel Chandler points to the vast scope of this field: "Semiotics involves the study not only of what we refer to as 'signs' in everyday speech, but of anything which 'stands for' something else. In a semiotic sense, signs take the form of words, images, sounds, gestures and objects" (2).

(p 735) Semiotics comprises three broad disciplines. Semantics is based on a study of the signs themselves. Syntax studies relations between the signs, or rules of permissible combinations. Pragmatics is concerned with relating signs to their users, taking account of the effects of sociocultural and linguistic contexts.

The study of semiotics can be traced back to the ancient Greeks (BCE), who developed a strong interest in signs as a communication device. Key names were Plato (ca. 427–347), Aristotle (384–322), and the Stoic school of philosophers, pioneered in about 300 in Athens by Zeno (ca. 345–263) of Citium. These great Greek thinkers sought to explain the process by which signs acquired and transmitted meaning. Their debate surrounded an essentially realist position, whereby signs such as "man" and "table" were considered to represent extramental concepts that exist. Thus, their approach was based on an ontological construct. Objective universal concepts, such as “manness” and “tableness,” were connected by various means to the signs that made communication possible.

In response to the realist position emerged that of the nominalists, who took an epistemological view focusing on signs as a means of knowing the world. Key names in this regard were the medieval philosophers William of Ockham (ca. 1285–1349) and John Locke (1632–1704). The latter, in his Essay concerning Human Understanding (1690), first established semiotics as a science of signs. The nominalists insisted that sign names such as “man” were usually arrived at arbitrarily. There were no objective extramental universals; that is, there is no such entity as “redness,” but only red things.

The early Greek and medieval thinkers laid the foundations of the modern field of semiotics. The twentieth century witnessed the flourishing of this field within two major traditions. Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913) developed a theory of the linguistic sign that was key in stimulating the study of semiotics, which he proposed should be a discrete field of study in a way not previously conceived: “A science that studies the life of signs within society is conceivable; it would be a part of social psychology and consequently of general psychology; I shall call it semiology.... Since the science does not yet exist, no one can say what it would be; but it has a right to existence, a place staked out in advance. Linguistics is only a part of the general science of semiology” (16).

Saussure’s thinking, much developed by his disciples, is essentially nominalist. It insists that signs necessarily mediate our engagement with the world and prevent us from understanding reality in an absolute sense. In order to explain this method of engagement, Saussure proposed a dyadic relationship between a signifier and a signified. Thus, the sign “roses” calls to mind “passion” for Europeans; the roses are the signifier, passion is the signified, and the relationship itself is termed signification.

Importantly, Saussure pointed out that signification did not result from a direct connection between signifier and signified, but rather from the contrasts between signs. Thus, “white” acquires its meaning through contrast with “black,” “yellow,” and so forth.

The second major tradition within the modern study of semiotics emerged from the United States. Saussure’s contemporary, the American philosopher Charles S. Peirce (1839–1914), felt similarly challenged to explain the process by which signs acquired meaning. However, in contrast with the Saussurean view, Peirce worked on the basis of a triad. It is a triadic view that has come to predominate in modern semiotics, especially through the triangle of signification developed by Ogden and Richards (11), which depicts the relationship between sign, concept, and significatum or referent.

Peirce also developed a threefold classification of signs. A symbol is a sign for which the relationship between concept and form is arbitrary. This applies to most linguistic signs. For example, English “tree,” French “arbre,” and Indonesian “pohon” are all signs for the same concept. The link is arbitrary; none are naturally representative of characteristics of trees. Peirce’s second sign type is the icon, which is a nonarbitrary sign. A clear example of this is provided by the phenomenon of onomatopoeia, such as English “cuckoo,” French “coucou,” and Indonesian “tekukur.”

The third type of sign in the Peirce classification is the index. Like the symbol, this is an arbitrary sign, but it additionally expresses a material, factual correlation in space and time between sign and concept. So “smoke” is an index of “fire,” “footprints in snow” are an index of “walker,” “slurred speech” is an index of “a drunk speaker,” “black” is an index of mourning, and the color saffron is an index of detachment for Buddhists. So index tells us something about the source. The most common indexes in linguistics are deictic words pointing to referents: I, your, this, here, now.

During the second half of the twentieth century, the rise of functionalism in modern linguistics (p 736) had an impact on semioticians. Umberto Eco (b. 1932) was critical of Saussure’s approach in certain respects: “Saussure did not define the signified any too clearly, leaving it half way between a mental image, a concept and a psychological reality.” In this regard Eco is more inclined to Peirce’s ideas: “The definition given by Peirce seems to me more comprehensive and semiotically more fruitful” (14–15). Eco has devoted considerable attention to using semiotics in literary interpretation.

The pioneer of systemic functional linguistics, Michael Halliday (b. 1925), sought to move beyond the preoccupation of the structuralists with the workings of the mind to consider broader contextual issues. He pointed out that the early Greeks tended to study signs in isolation, while Saussure, in spite of his view of language as a network of relationships, still focused on “a rather atomistic conception of the linguistic sign” (Halliday and Hasan 3). Halliday reinforced semiotics as the study of sign systems, emphasizing that linguistics was merely one aspect of semiotics. Also included were other sign systems, especially cultural systems used to impart meaning: painting, sculpture, music, dance, modes of exchange, dress, and family structure. Thus, in order to understand how these sign systems operate, Halliday points to the importance of considering social context as a starting point. This has resulted in Hallidayan social semiotics emerging as a major approach within semiotics.

Applications to Scriptural Hermeneutics

Semiotics as a field of study has received some bad press over the years. Trask (271) comments that “in spite of its deliberate emphasis upon the social nature of the sign systems examined, semiotics tends to be highly abstract and at times seemingly impenetrable.” Nevertheless, the emerging scholarly rigor associated with semiotics has had a striking effect on the methods of those biblical scholars interested in exploring new approaches to Scripture.

James Barr’s forceful critique of traditional methods of interpretation in his Semantics of Biblical Language was influenced by advances in thinking from semioticians. His call for a more scientific method in analyzing biblical languages, taking account of findings from modern linguistics, was to have a major impact on applying a key subdiscipline of semiotics, that of semantics, to study of the biblical text. The fruit can be seen in the studies of lexical semantics (Louw; Silva; Cotterell and Turner).

At the level of lexis, Peirce’s threefold classification of signs bears consideration as one device for analyzing biblical words. As with all written texts, the Bible depends most heavily on the symbols that link sign and concept in an arbitrary fashion. However, icons can also be found. Examples from the Revised Standard Version are “wail” (Isa. 13:6; Matt. 2:18), “gnash” (Job 16:9; Matt. 13:42), and “roar” (1 Chron. 16:32; Luke 21:25). Furthermore, indexes are found prolifically in the biblical text. Several instances are “clouds,” which evoke theophany; “cross,” which evokes Christ; and “fire,” which evokes the punishment of hell.

Another semiotic principle providing potential for biblical analysis relates to the signs that depend not on individual words but on paralinguistic signals. This can include intonation patterns and stress, although it is not always possible to retrieve such clues from a text like the Bible, so far removed in time from the original communities that produced it. However, the biblical text provides important clues as to other paralinguistic signs, including facial expressions (smiling, frowning, raised eyebrows, winking, etc.) and gestures (nodding, pointing).

In Esther 5:1–2, multiple signaling systems are used by the main actors. Esther puts on her royal robes, signaling both her own status and her respect for that of the king. The locations where Esther stands and the king sits both significantly signal in themselves. The king’s holding out of the gold scepter, and Esther’s touching it, carry the nonverbal communication further. A semiotic analysis focusing on such data yields much information without a single spoken word having been considered. Similarly, Prov. 16:30 (“He who winks his eyes plans perverse things, he who compresses his lips brings evil to pass” [RSV]) clearly illustrates the communicative force of facial gestures.

The application of semiotics to scriptural hermeneutics does not stop at the level of lexis. The contribution of Halliday’s social semiotics to discourse-level research has direct relevance. Cobley and Jansz (165) summarize Halliday’s thinking: “It is here, between speaker and hearer, that language is generated, and the social context actually appears within the utterance rather than existing externally in a system.” So consideration of contextual features should not be an afterthought, but it should be fully integrated with any semiotic analysis at the discourse level.

This approach is making its mark on scriptural hermeneutics at the turn of the twenty-first century (p 737). Jeffrey Reed’s study of Philippians represents the first significant attempt to apply Hallidayan methods to the study of a whole book of the Bible. More studies of this type, based on both OT and NT, are currently under way.

There are also increasing scholarly efforts to develop analytical criteria for applying semiotic principles to wide-ranging text types. Daniel Chandler has developed a semiotic analytical framework that is helping to crystallize methods in what has at times been regarded as a field of “abstract and ‘arid formalism’ ” (209). Chandler identifies macrothemes that should be taken into account in conducting a semiotic analysis of text, including genre identification, modality, paradigmatic analysis, syntagmatic structure, rhetorical tropes, intertextuality, and social factors. Each of these is considered in terms of a set of guiding questions, which help the analyst to relate semiotic theory to real texts. This approach, though developed from study of secular materials, offers considerable potential for refining the application of semiotic theory to the biblical text.

See also Etymology; Language, Linguistics; Poststructuralism; Structuralism

Bibliography

Barr, J. The Semantics of Biblical Language. Oxford University Press, 1961; Chandler, D. Semiotics. Routledge, 2002; Cobley, P., and L. Jansz. Semiotics for Beginners. Icon Books, 1997; Cotterell, P., and M. Turner. Linguistics and Biblical Interpretation. InterVarsity, 1989; Eco, U. A Theory of Semiotics. Indiana University Press, 1979; Halliday, M., and R. Hasan. Language, Context, and Text. Deakin University, 1985. Reprint, Oxford University Press, 1989; Halliday, M. Language as Social Semiotic. E. Arnold, 1978; Louw, J. P. Semantics of New Testament Greek. Fortress, 1982; Lyons, J. Semantics. Vol. 1. Cambridge University Press, 1977; Ogden, C. K., and I. A. Richards. The Meaning of Meaning. Routledge &

Kegan Paul, 1923; Peirce, C. S. Collected Papers of Charles Sanders Peirce. Vols. 1–6, ed. C. Hartshorne and P. Weiss. Harvard University Press, 1931–35; Reed, J. A Discourse Analysis of Philippians. Sheffield Academic Press, 1997; Saussure, F. de. Course in General Linguistics. Rev. ed. Collins, 1974; Silva, M. Biblical Words and Their Meaning. 2d ed. Zondervan, 1994; Trask, R. L. Key Concepts in Language and Linguistics. Routledge, 1999.

Peter G. Riddell

Sense See Literal Sense; Meaning; Ricoeur, Paul; Spiritual Sense

Sensus Plenior See Allegory; Meaning; Medieval Biblical Interpretation; Spiritual Sense; Typology

Sentence See Language, Grammar and Syntax; Language, Linguistics; Proposition; Utterance Meaning

Sermon on the Mount

Genre and Setting

The most significant division among interpreters of the Sermon on the Mount (SM) has been between those who see it as a vision of life for all (e.g., the Didache; John Chrysostom, Hom. Matt. 16.3; 16.5; 18.4) and those who see it as counsel for those seeking “perfection” (poverty, celibacy, and obedience—e.g., Bonaventure, Apologia pauperum 3.8; Maldonatus, In Quattuor Evangelistas 1).

The evangelist’s intention lies broadly with the former group. SM is an address to “the crowds” (5:1a; 7:28); the “disciples” (5:1b) merely represent the church. SM is public teaching, wherein the Messiah points out the “road” for those calling him “Lord!” ((77::1313–1414, , 2121). ). That is why SM stands where it does in the narrative. That is why SM stands where it does in the narrative.

What precedes it prepares us to know who Jesus is and what grace he brings (1:1–4:25). Now we hear his first major teaching, wherein he begins to tell us of life in that sphere of grace, and the part we are called to play. Of course we will fail, and God is merciful: at SM’s center is the prayer, “Forgive us our debts” (6:12). But that does not dilute SM’s challenge.

It is not difficult to discern in SM’s structure what contemporaries would have heard as an exercise in deliberative rhetoric: it is designed to lead its audience to a decision for action (Kennedy 39–63). The evangelist is probably responsible for this structure, but the content mostly has its source in Jesus’ own teaching.

Structure and Argument

Proem. Matthew 5:3–16 functions to secure goodwill. It describes as “happy” or “fortunate” (makarioi; “blessed” in most ET) various groups—the poor in spirit, the merciful, peacemakers, the pure in heart, those persecuted for righteousness’ sake—with whom Jesus’ hearers will identify or wish to identify (5:3–12). Notably, the Proem is not exhortation, but proclamation. Those identified are “fortunate.” They may not seem fortunate in the world’s eyes, but they are, for “theirs is the kingdom of heaven” (5:10). The emphasis is not on “reward” but on God’s faithfulness: God will keep God’s promise. Similarly the passages on “salt” and “light” (5:13–16) are not exhortations to become those things but promises that those who seek to follow Jesus are these things. As always (p 738) with grace, however, response is invited. The essence of this response is stated immediately (5:16), and so prepares us for the next part of SM.

Proposition. Matthew 5:17–20 emphasizes that Jesus came to fulfill the law’s promises. Therefore, not only must his followers observe the least of Torah’s commands; their obedience also must exceed even that required by recognized authorities (the Pharisees). Matthew has specifically in mind Jewish followers of Jesus who, while supportive of the Gentile mission (28:19–20), remain committed to halakah as their way of response to God’s grace (see 23:1–3; cf. Acts 15:22–29). This qualifies our understanding of certain specific aspects of SM (see on 5:31–32, below), though not affecting its main challenge.

The Proposition stated, SM moves to Headings (5:21–7:27), the arguments and illustrations supporting the Proposition.

First Heading: How the Law Must Be Taken More Seriously Than Ever (5:21–48). First are pericopes interpreting the OT. Jesus’ method is similar to the rabbis: “You have heard ... [you might understand the Scriptures to be saying ...], but I say to you ... [you should understand like this ...].”

At 5:21–26, “judgment,” “council,” and “fire of hell” involve a climax, paralleled by being “angry,” calling someone “Raca” (an Aramaic term of abuse), and calling someone “Mōe.” Most ET render the third of these as if it were mōros (fool), but the Greek probably transliterates an Aramaic word meaning “rebel” (against God)—thus making this the most serious insult of the three. Matthew 5:23–24 speaks of a situation where your fellow has a just claim against you. R. Eleazar ben Azariah (ca. 80–120 CE) taught, “For transgressions between a man and his fellow the Day of Atonement does not effect atonement until he shall have first placated his fellow” (m. Yoma 8:9). Then 5:25–26 adds a note of urgency: it is the last hour!

Matthew 5:27–30 is not about sexual attraction, but desire without concern. The Greek word (also in the LXX) translated “commit adultery” frequently has the force of “debauch” and is so understood here. Hence, “causes you to stumble” (5:29 AT) focuses not on the man’s fate, but on what he has done to the woman and so also to himself.

With 5:31–32 compare Mark 10:10, noting, however, qualifications added in 5:32. Possibly these reflect views attributed to R. Zechariah ben ha-Katzav (ca. 80–120 CE): in cases of adultery, divorce is not only allowed but also commanded, and the adulteress may not marry her paramour. “Just as she is prohibited to the husband so she is forbidden to the adulterer” (m. Sotah 5:1). The Matthean community, looking for an obedience exceeding that of others, might have footnoted Jesus’ saying in this way. (Here then is an example of NT teaching, ad hoc and ad hominem, which cannot be applied without remainder to other Christian situations, and doubtless could not have been so applied even when the Gospels were written: both Mark and Luke lack the provision.)

At 5:33, “swear falsely” (RSV) is problematic: better would probably be “You shall not break your oath.” The attitudes implied at 5:34–37 resemble those of Essenes (Josephus, B.J. 2.135) and classical antiquity generally (Sophocles, Oed. col. 648–51).

Matthew 5:38–42 is (pace Horsley, Spiral) anti-freedom fighters. Under Roman law a Roman soldier had the right to require a noncitizen to carry his equipment one mile. Similarly, in the following pericope about loving the neighbor (5:43–48), a call to “hate your enemy” is not part of any known Jewish ethic, but would be understandable as an interpretation of Lev. 19:18 by freedom fighters. Matthew 5:48 echoes Deut. 18:13 and Lev. 19:2: the emphasis is not on “flawlessness” but on the parallel between God’s compassion and the compassion for enemies and strangers to which disciples are called (cf. 5:45). Pace Yoder theologically and Horsley (Empire), Jesus does not counsel rejecting Roman rule, violently or nonviolently (see Bryan).

Second Heading: Behaviors (6:1–18). Almsgiving, prayer, and fasting form a characteristically Jewish triad, particularly associated with penitence. Before and after 70 CE, Jews were enjoined in times of distress: “Three things cancel out the harsh decree: prayer, almsgiving, and repentance” (y. Ta’an. 2.1).

Matthew 6:1–18 stresses that Jesus’ disciples must not be “as the hypokritai” (6:2, 5, 16). The ET “hypocrites” (people pretending to be something they aren’t) may mislead here and makes scant sense at other places (e.g., 23:24–25). Matthew’s hypokritai probably means the same as the Qumran sectaries' doreshy khalaqot (interpreters of smooth/false things; cf. Isa. 30:10 MT/NRSV; 1QH 2.32; 4.7–12; CD 1.18–20). In both cases the accusation is that those referred to are wrongly interpreting Torah. Thus, those who give alms, pray, or fast only to be “praised” or “seen” (6:2, 5, 16) have forgotten the essence of these things, and so are disobeying Torah.

(p 739) Matthew 6:7–15 digresses, but appropriately. It places the Lord's Prayer and God's forgiveness at the heart of the SM. Since God's forgiveness is the basis of our hope, forgiving others must be the basis of our behavior (6:12, 14–15).

Third Heading: Other Examples of Righteousness (6:19–7:20). Sayings about treasure in heaven (6:19–21), the light of the body (6:22–23), and God and mammon (6:24) continue to revolve around getting priorities right. In rabbinic texts “mammon” denotes “property” and is not pejorative: what is criticized here is not the notion of property, but devoting such attention to property as is proper toward God alone.

At 6:22–23, “sound” (RSV; haplous) implies wholehearted commitment to God. “Evil eye” (KJV; ophthalmos ponēros) was an expression denoting meanness (cf. 20:15, RSV margin). Matthew 6:22–23 therefore contrasts wholehearted devotion to God with that spiritual niggardliness that always looks for ways to limit love's demands.

Matthew 6:25–34 assumes that those addressed do have something to wear, eat, and drink. The passage does not invite the oppressed to assume that God wills their suffering, nor invite oppressors to justify their oppressing actions. If oppressors take seriously Jesus' invitation here, they will not need to oppress.

Matthew 7:1, “Judge not!” (RSV), is hyperbole. Sometimes we must make judgments (cf. 1 Cor. 6:1–6). Priorities are still the issue: the danger is that we enjoy judging, and so indulge in it beyond what is necessary. At 7:3–5, “you that are mistakenly interpreting Torah” again makes good sense of hypocrita, “hypocrite.” Priorities are still the issue.

These Headings conclude with words about perseverance in prayer (7:7–11), and the Golden Rule, summarizing “the Law and the Prophets” (7:12).

Epilogue (7:21–27), Restating the Proposition and Encouraging Action. Matthew 7:13–14 echoes Deut. 30:15–20 and stresses the need for decision. Then 7:15–23 points to “fruits” as the mark of true prophecy. Mere “preaching” or “miracles” (the showier types of “Christian action”!) are not enough. Matthew 7:24–27 emphasizes the need to act upon Jesus' words, facing his hearers with the question, “What kind of disciple am I?”

Bibliography

Betz, H. D. Essays on the Sermon on the Mount, trans. L. L. Welbourne. Fortress, 1985; Bryan, C. Render to Caesar. Oxford University Press, forthcoming; Davies, W. D., and D. Allison. Pages 429–731 in vol. 1 of A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to Saint Matthew. 3 vols. T&T Clark, 1988–97; Fitzgerald, J. “The Problem of Perjury in Greek Context: Prolegomena to an Exegesis of Matthew 5.33, 1 Timothy 1.10, and Didache 2.3.” Pages 156–77 in The Social World of the First Christians, ed. L. M. White and O. L. Yarborough. Fortress, 1995; Horsley, R. Jesus and Empire. Fortress, 2003; idem. Pages 261–64 in Jesus and the Spiral of Violence. Fortress, 1993; Kennedy, G. Pages 39–63 in New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism. University of North Carolina, 1984; Luz, U. Pages 209–460 in Matthew 1–7, trans. W. C. Linss. Fortress, 1992; Schnackenburg, R. All Things Are Possible to Believers, trans. J. Currie. Westminster John Knox, 1995; Yoder, J. H. Pages 1–20 in The Politics of Jesus. Eerdmans, 1972.

Christopher Bryan

Setting      See Ancient Near Eastern Background Studies; Archaeology; Context; Culture and Hermeneutics

Sexuality

To say that sexuality is one of the most contested areas of biblical theology is to state the obvious. The chief reason is that societal views have undergone significant shifts.

Scripture regards the urge to gratify intensely pleasurable sexual desires as part of God’s good creation. Nevertheless, given their often-insatiable quality, Scripture also recognizes a constant threat to the Creator’s norms—even when there is clear communal consensus about proper behavior and strong social sanctions reinforce conformity, which today can no longer be assumed.

Truth claims about sexuality have suffered from the rise of various intellectual currents and values: historical-critical analysis, postmodernism, deconstructionist thought, and absolutist versions of pluralism, diversity, and tolerance. Beyond that and the obvious need to justify pleasurable desires, women’s roles, rights, and opportunities have expanded, challenging traditional patriarchal structures and beliefs. Birth control has made possible decoupling the pleasures of sexual intercourse from the responsibilities of childbearing. This in turn has minimized the importance of reserving sexual intercourse for marriage; no-fault divorce laws have challenged the permanence of marriage, further diminished by easy access to pornography, the welfare state, and even economic affluence.

A militant gay-rights movement has taken the ultimate step of demanding an end to “heterosexism.” This has called into question the very foundation of biblical sexuality: that sexual differentiation (p 740) matters for the complementary sexual merging of two persons into one. Fueled also by some radical feminist trends, this questioning has led further to arguments for bisexuality and even transgenderism.

The advancement of a homosexual agenda is not the originating cause for all of society’s sexual dysfunctions, but in many ways the unfortunate logical end result. In effect, the acceptance of homosexual practice heralds the eventual demise of any structural prerequisites for a sexual relationship (sex, number, degree of blood relatedness, age), inasmuch as homosexual practice is defended on the grounds of the self-validating character of affective bonds.

The current climate of confusion makes it essential that the church develop theological clarity regarding sexual expression. The appropriate starting point in any attempt at a biblical-theological definition of sexuality is Jesus. Jesus’ treatment of divorce and remarriage in Mark 10:2–12//Matt. 19:3–12 and in Matt. 5:31–32//Luke 16:18 (Q) is pivotal (cf. 1 Cor. 7:10–11, where Paul alludes to Jesus’ prohibition of divorce).

Jesus and Scripture on Sexuality

Making the Creation Model of Marriage Normative and Prescriptive. Jesus understood the stories about the creation of humans in Gen. 1–2 not merely as descriptive but also as texts that supplied a prescriptive model for subsequent human sexual behavior (Mark 10:6–9//Matt. 19:4–6, 8b). This is clear from his remark “From the beginning of creation it was not so” (cf. Mark 10:6; Matt. 19:8). It is also clear from his back-to-back citations of Gen. 1:27 (“The Creator ‘made them male and female’ ”) and 2:24 (NRSV: “For this reason a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined [attached, glued] to his wife, and the two shall become one flesh”). Jesus did not emphasize the openness of creation to change but rather a binding standard that critiqued all postcreation compromises. Malachi (2:15–16) may be making a similar normative allusion to Gen. 2:24, though there are difficult translation issues: “Did he [God] not make [you/them] one?... Do not act faithlessly against the wife of your youth. If one hates and divorces ..., he covers his garment with violence” (so Hugenberger 151–67, 341–43; ESV; alternatively: “Did not One [God] make [her/all]?... For he hates/I hate divorce ...”).

Closing Loopholes and Inconsistencies in the Law of Moses. Jesus believed that Moses had made concessions to human (chiefly male) “hardness of heart” (sklērokardia), thereby compromising the will of God as expressed in creation (Mark 10:5–6//Matt. 19:8 RSV). In the particular case of divorce, Moses had given men an exemption from God’s creation standard that for the most part had not been given to women. In view of the anticipative inbreaking of the kingdom of God (the end time is like the primal time [Endzeit = Urzeit]), Jesus was now revoking this concession.

In an important recent book, Instone-Brewer sees things a bit differently. Based on the occurrence of sklērokardia in Jer. 4:4 LXX (not the same sense as in MT), he understands “hardness of heart” as he understands “hardness of heart” as a reference to the stubbornness of the adulterous partner, who refuses to give up adulterous ways (144–46, 176–77). According to Instone-Brewer, who relies more on Matt. 19:3–12 than Mark 10:2–12, Jesus interprets Moses rather than overrides him. Against the Pharisees, Jesus insists that Moses did not “command” but only “permitted” divorce (Matt. 19:7–8); moreover, Moses did not allow divorce “for any ... reason” (19:3), but only when an adulterous spouse remained impenitent (142–43, 180–81). The Matthean exception clauses—“except for a matter of indecency [porneia]” (5:32 AT) and “unless for indecency” (19:9 AT)—reinforce that Jesus was essentially siding with the Shammaite interpretation. In Deut. 24:1, the Shammaites took the phrase ’erwat dabar (lit., “nakedness of a thing” or “indecency of a matter”) as adultery, and the Hillelites took it to mean “indecency or any matter” (m. Git. 9:10; Instone-Brewer 110–13, 158–59, 185–86).

While Instone-Brewer argues well, there are problems. First, the context for “your hardness of heart” in Mark 10:5 favors reading it as a reference to men who divorce their wives in spite of God’s will enshrined in creation. Second, a better echo than Jer. 4:4 LXX may be Mal. 2:14. Just before a possible allusion to Gen. 2:24 (above), Mal. 2:14 refers to “the wife of your youth, to whom you have been faithless [in divorcing her], though she is your companion and your wife by covenant” (NRSV). The critique is against the callousness of men who divorce their wives. Third, Mark 10:4–9, on which Matthew’s version depends, gives the impression that Jesus’ appeal to Gen. 1:27 and 2:24 is revoking the Mosaic permission, not just interpreting it in Shammaite fashion. While “Moses permitted a man to write a certificate of divorce and send her away,” God’s will “from the beginning of creation” was different, not permitting divorce (cf. Mark 10:4, 6; Matt. 19:8). Jesus apparently understood himself to be amending the Torah itself, to close a loophole (p 741) inconsistent with the Creator’s will (similarly, his stance against oaths in Matt. 5:33–37). This, in turn, raises a question as to whether the Matthean exception clause accurately reflects a permission Jesus would have granted.

Jesus' amendment strategy introduces an important theological principle. Regarding the sexual standards for men and women, OT law contains some inequities and double standards, and not just over the question of divorce. Although by Jesus' day Jewish women had some options for initiating divorce (Instone-Brewer 72–74, 85–90, 151–52), these were still limited in comparison to those granted men. For example, laws prohibiting men from committing adultery focus on having intercourse with another man's fiancée or wife, not with women unattached to other men (cf. the seventh and tenth commandments, Exod. 20:14, 17; Deut. 5:18, 21; also, Exod. 22:16–17; Lev. 18:20; 20:10; Deut. 22:22–29). Christians are not unfaithful to Scripture when they criticize such imbalances in OT law.

Intensifying Sexual Ethics. Rather than loosening the demands of the law in the area of sexual ethics, Jesus intensified them and closed loopholes. The sexual equity that Jesus established between men and women was equity in sexual restraint, not freedom. He took an already circumscribed sexual ethic given in the Hebrew Scriptures and narrowed it further, for both sexes.

In the sayings on divorce and remarriage, Jesus lifted up marriage's indissolubility over the principle of sexual "rights" and self-fulfillment. For Jesus, remarriage after divorce constituted adultery because, in God's eyes, the original marriage was still valid, irrespective of a divorce certificate. Jesus even warned against marrying divorced women, stating that a man who "marries a divorced woman commits adultery" (Matt. 5:32 NRSV//Luke 16:18). Sexual purity took precedence over gratification.

Paul and Matthew tinker with Jesus' prohibition of divorce, but not by much. Paul, who explicitly alludes to Jesus' "command" on divorce (1 Cor. 7:10–11), allows for an exception in the case of marriage to an unbelieving person—but only when the unbelieving spouse insists on leaving (7:12–16). A believer who initiates divorce is to "remain unmarried or else be reconciled" (7:11; cf. Rom. 7:3). Matthew, with his exception clause allowing divorce of an adulterous spouse and, presumably, remarriage, surmises that adultery dissolves the original union, at least potentially (Matt. 5:32; 19:9). Even with this exception, Matthew recognizes the intensity of Jesus' prohibition of divorce and remarriage (hence, the disciples' reported comment in 19:10: if marriage is this hard to dissolve, "it is not expedient to marry" [RSV]). In the end, both Matthew and Paul strongly maintain Jesus' radical opposition to divorce over against a broader cultural environment that is much more permissive.

What then should the church do today with believers who, in opposition to Jesus' teaching, divorce and remarry? There are reasons for believing that Jesus would not have insisted on dissolution of the second marriage, including the fact that such an insistence would replicate the problem of divorce (see further, Gagnon, "Sex Precepts?" 119–22).

The sayings on divorce and remarriage also imply a prohibition of polygyny (many wives). A man who "divorces his wife and marries another woman commits adultery against her" because the first marriage is treated as still intact (Mark 10:11//Luke 16:18). The underlying principle is that having two wives rather than one constitutes adultery. If this applies even when the husband thinks he has dissolved the prior union, then it certainly applies to a union not yet dissolved in the husband's eyes. In the OT, a man did not commit adultery against his wife by taking another wife or concubine. Rather, he committed adultery when he had intercourse with another's wife, and then the offense was against the other man. Here Jesus indicates that the wife has as much claim to her husband's monogamy as the husband to his wife's faithfulness (as in Mark 10:12). His emphasis on the number "two"—"so they are no longer two, but one [flesh]" (Mark 10:8//Matt. 19:6)—speaks against polygamous unions. Paul's discussions of marriage, including in 1 Cor. 7, presume a principle of monogamy. Even the OT, though permitting polygyny, foreshadowed a case against polygamy, not only in Gen. 2:20–24, but also in the implicit prohibition of polyandry (many husbands), the norm of one wife in Israelite society, and stories of internal disputes in polygynous households.

Jesus' intensification of sexual ethics also comes across in his saying about adultery of the heart (Matt. 5:27–28). The point is not to trivialize external acts of adultery by inferring that the heart's intent matters more than conformity to behavioral rules. Instead, Jesus expands the reach of God's will, from regulating outward behavior to interiorizing the demand as well (cf. Matt. 5:21–26). So adulterous behavior remains a serious offense, and even entertaining adulterous (p 742) thoughts violates God's will. Jesus' hyperbolic statement about what defiles a person at first glance seems to prioritize intent over behavior, but a closer look indicates otherwise (Mark 7:14–23//Matt. 15:10–20). It is not so much food entering the stomach from the outside that defiles a person, but rather the inward desires that lead one to commit what Scripture regards as "sexually immoral acts [porneiai] ... adulteries ... sexual licentiousness [aselgeia]" (Mark 7:21–22 AT). Jesus was not saying that the morality of an action is ultimately settled by a person's subjective motivation, as if persons could violate a command of God regarding sexuality without repercussion so long as their heart was “in the right place.” Instead, he was saying that sex is not like food; the former is never a matter of indifference (cf. 1 Cor. 6:12–20, where Paul makes a similar point). The active desire for what God deems to be immoral sexual activity is already defiling, even before the act is committed.

Jesus’ sayings about divorce and remarriage have implications for sexual purity in other areas. Fornication, sexual intercourse between unmarried persons, is obviously ruled out of bounds since Jesus’ sayings on divorce and remarriage aim at restricting sexual intimacy to one person in marriage until the death of the partner dissolves the union (cf. Rom. 7:1–3; 1 Cor. 7:39–40). Allowing premarital or nonmarital sexual intercourse would essentially inflict a “marriage penalty,” encouraging persons to stay unmarried so they could avoid Jesus’ rigorous expectations. This would be the same kind of hypocrisy based on the “letter of the law” that Jesus criticized in some of the Pharisees’ teachings (Matt. 23). Jesus’ own disciples, after hearing his rigorous teaching, did not conclude that it was expedient to form sexually intimate relationships outside of marriage, but rather that it was expedient to abstain from all sexual relationships (19:10). Jesus qualified this observation but still maintained celibacy or marriage as the only options open to the people of God (19:11–12). Similarly, Paul advised unmarried believers to get married if they did not feel capable of controlling desires for sexual intimacy (1 Cor. 7:9, 36; cf. 7:2, 5; also, Paul’s assumption that the engaged women believers are virgins, in 7:25–38).

Citing Gen. 2:24 (“the two shall become one flesh”), Paul warned that even the most impersonal and noncommittal of sexual “relationships,” sex with a prostitute, created a certain “joining,” a one-flesh bond (1 Cor. 6:15–16). Paul could say, albeit perhaps with hyperbole, that “every sin, whatever a person commits, is outside the body [perhaps in partial agreement with a Corinthian slogan], but the one who commits sexual immorality sins against the body” (6:18 AT). Sexual intercourse engages persons holistically, even when they pretend that the relational dimension is meaningless. In ancient Israel, women were expected to be virgins at the time of marriage. According to Exod. 22:16–17, a man who had intercourse with an unbetrothed virgin was expected to pay the bride-price and marry her, unless the father refused permission. In that case the man still had to pay (cf. Deut. 22:28–29, which says nothing about the father’s right of refusal, but adds “he shall not be permitted to divorce her” [NRSV]). Jesus’ practice of equalizing sexual purity requirements for men and women would speak for the same expectation of virginity for men at the time of marriage.

Obviously, the points raised above tell against prostitution and sex with prostitutes. It is possible that Jesus' statement about cutting off one's hand (Matt. 5:30; cf. Mark 9:43//Matt. 18:8) refers to masturbation. The inference is suggested by rabbinic parallels (e.g., b. Nid. 13b) and by the proximity of Matt. 5:30 to the saying about adultery of the heart (5:27–28). Certainly Jesus' views are clearly against masturbation facilitated by sexual fantasies about persons other than one's spouse.

Although there is no mention of incest in the extant sayings of Jesus, there can be no doubt about Jesus' acceptance of the incest laws in Lev. 18 and 20 (cf. Deut. 22:30; 27:20, 22–23). The basic problem with incest is implicit in the general prohibition stated in Lev. 18:6: “No one shall approach any flesh of his flesh to uncover nakedness” (AT). In other words, sexual intercourse with another who is too much of a familial “same” is inappropriate. A “one-flesh” union—establishment of kinship across bloodlines—cannot be created by a sexually intimate union of two people who are already of the same “flesh” (close blood relations). So seriously are incest laws taken that they extend to in-law relations. In dealing with incest between a man and his stepmother in 1 Cor. 5, Paul did not have to deliberate about “What would Jesus do [WWJD]?”—despite absence of an explicit saying of Jesus. He asserted “in the name of our Lord Jesus” that when the community at Corinth gathers together “with ... the power of our Lord Jesus,” they must temporarily disfellowship the incestuous believer in hope of reclaiming (p 743)him ultimately for the kingdom of God (5:3–5; cf. 6:9–10).

The issue of homosexual practice is dealt with separately (below).

Making Sexual Ethics a Life-and-Death Concern. Jesus plainly demonstrated that sexual purity was a major concern. In between Jesus' sayings on adultery of the heart and divorce/remarriage, Matthew sandwiches a dire warning: If your right eye or hand should threaten your downfall, cut it off. “For it is expedient for you that one of your members be lost/destroyed and that your whole body not be thrown into Gehenna [hell]” (5:29–30 AT; cf. Mark 9:43–48//Matt. 18:8–9; b. Nid. 13b). In Jesus' view, sexual misbehavior could send a person to hell. Although extant sayings of Jesus devoted to sexual matters are few in number, particularly compared with those against materialism and economic exploitation, their generally countercultural character underscores their significance. Jesus did not naively imbibe from the cultural well but made demands that in some respects exceeded even those of the Pharisees. That he did not say more about sexual matters can be attributed to the fact that first-century Jewish Palestinian society already maintained a fairly exacting standard.

Paul, however, operated in a Gentile milieu, where such standards could no longer be presumed. Consequently, his warnings about sexual conduct consume a more significant portion of his overall message. Pauline literature suggests that, soon after Gentiles converted, Paul gave them the commands of God regarding sexual purity. He repeatedly and solemnly warned that violating these commands would be tantamount to rejecting God, putting at serious risk their inheritance of God's kingdom (Rom. 1:24–27; 6:19; 13:12–14; 1 Cor. 5; 6:9–20; 10:8, 12; 2 Cor. 12:21; Gal. 5:19–21 [cf. 6:7–9]; Eph. 4:17–19; 5:3–6; Col. 3:5–10; 1 Thess. 4:1–8; 1 Tim. 1:9–11; outside the Gospels and Pauline literature: the apostolic decree in Acts 15; Heb. 12:16; 13:4; 1 Pet. 4:2–5; 2 Pet. 2:4–10, 13–16; Jude 7; Rev. 2:14, 20–21; 9:20–21; 21:8; 22:15).

Reaching Out in Love to Violators. For Jesus, the significance of sexual ethics goes hand in hand with loving outreach to sexual sinners (Matt. 21:31–32; Luke 7:36–50; John 4:16–18; 7:53–8:11). Jesus undertook the same type of outreach on behalf of the biggest economic exploiters of his immediate context, tax collectors (Mark 2:15–17; Matt. 11:19//Luke 7:34; Luke 15; 19:1–10). From Jesus' outreach to sexual sinners, the inference is often drawn that sexual sin is a relatively minor matter. However, Jesus' outreach to tax collectors suggests rather that outreach to sexual sinners correlates precisely with the seriousness of sexual sin. For his followers, Jesus modeled an intensified sexual ethic and warnings, combined with aggressive outreach in love to those who most violated this ethic. Moreover, he coupled this outreach with a joyous and generous readiness to forgive (Matt. 20:1–16; Luke 15:22–24; 18:9–14), even when professed repentance followed a ridiculously high number of repeat offenses (Matt. 18:21–22; Luke 17:3–4).

It would be a mistake, however, to regard such ministry as necessarily incompatible with ecclesiastical discipline for professed followers of Jesus (cf. Matt. 18:15–20 with 1 Cor. 5; 2 Cor. 2:6–11; 7:8–13; 2 Thess. 3:6, 14–15). For discipline, too, aims at recovery of the offender. . Jesus himself could pronounce harsh judgments on the impenitent and those who rejected his outreach (e.g., Matt. 11:22–24//Luke 10:13–15; Matt. 12:39–41//Luke 11:29–32; Mark 6:11; Matt. 10:14//Luke 9:5; 10:10–11).

The story of Jesus and the woman caught in adultery in John 7:53–8:11—probably not of Johannine authorship but rather a later insertion—has had enormous influence. Some have read Jesus' statements about not casting a stone (8:7, 11) as criticism of any judgment about another's sexual behavior. This assumption misreads the story. In context, "condemn" means to "execute the sentence of stoning," literal stoning, not mere judgment. The problem with stoning is that it has a terminal effect. Apparently, Jesus thought the risk of eternal forfeiture of God's kingdom was so serious that it required every last option for repentance in this life (cf. Matt. 10:28//Luke 12:4–5). Jesus' remarkable display of mercy, saving her from a punishment stipulated by the Mosaic law (Deut. 22:23–24), was designed to stimulate gratitude and obedience, lest a worse fate befall the woman on judgment day. "From now on sin no more" (8:11 AT). On love and righteousness in Jesus' ministry, see further works by Gagnon (Homosexual Practice, 210–28; Gagnon and Via, 50–52, 70–71).

The Value of Sexual Intimacy in Marriage. There are no sayings of Jesus that extol the joys of sex in marriage—perhaps not surprisingly, in view of Jesus' own celibacy. But he was slandered as "a glutton and a drunkard" (Matt. 11:19//Luke 7:34; cf. Mark 2:18–20) and did not view the command to procreate in Gen. 1:28 as binding on all (Matt. 19:11–12). Hence, it seems unlikely that (p 744) Jesus viewed sexual intercourse as serving the purpose solely of procreation.

The same is true of Paul. Some scholars argue, based largely on 1 Cor. 7 and 1 Thess. 4:4–5, that Paul thought sexual passion per se was dishonorable (e.g., Fredrickson 207–9, 222; Balch, passim). However, this confuses Paul's position on sexual desire with the ascetic stance of some Corinthian believers, who were arguing they had become so "spiritual" (pneumatikoi) that they could do without intercourse in marriage (1 Cor. 7:1; cf. 1 Tim. 4:3a). Perhaps they held conscious awareness of a saying of Jesus on the unmarried state of angels (Mark 12:25) and the baptismal formula "there is no 'male and female' " (Gal. 3:28 AT; cf. its omission in 1 Cor. 12:13; Col. 3:11). It was Paul who exhorted married believers not to abstain from sexual relations. Indeed, he contends, men and women owe it to each other equally to fulfill the other's sexual needs (1 Cor. 7:3; cf. 11:11). He repeatedly states that getting married, and thus satisfying sexual desires, is no sin (7:28, 36–38; cf. 1 Tim. 4:3b–5; 5:14). It is particularly significant that 1 Cor. 7 shows relatively little concern for procreation; satisfying the sexual desire of one's spouse has value in its own right. Paul's expressed preference for singleness was motivated more by pragmatic missionary considerations, particularly in light of perceived nearness of the end, than by antipassion bias (7:26–35).

Furthermore, Paul's promotion of sexual activity within marriage was probably conditioned, at least in part, by Corinthian arguments. Since they stressed that their exalted spiritual status had enabled them to transcend tempting sexual urges, Paul countered by focusing on marriage as an institution given by God for the responsible release of such desires. First Corinthians 7 probably does not record everything Paul believed about marriage. There are no substantial grounds for assuming he dispensed with the vibrant image of marital intimacy put forward by Gen. 2:18–24; 29:9–30; Deut. 24:5; Prov. 5:15–23; Eccles. 9:9; Mal. 2:13–16; and, of course, the sensual poetry of the Song of Solomon. Paul was not a strict ascetic (Phil. 4:12). It is not likely that he was unmarried, or promoted singleness, because he wanted to deny himself and others all sexual pleasures. Even 1 Thess. 4:4–5 is not an exhortation to passionless sex, but rather not to make physical beauty the paramount consideration for mate selection.

The Penultimate Value of Sex. Paul’s remarks about the value of single life given over to service underscore the penultimate significance of sexual intimacy. Jesus expressed a similar point in Matt. 19:11–12. Partly agreeing with his disciples that “it is not expedient to marry” (19:10 RSV), he also qualified their conclusion by saying: “Not everyone can accept this message, but only those to whom it has been given” (AT). This specifically means “those who [make] ... themselves eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom of heaven” (19:12 NRSV; cf. Luke 18:29). Paul agreed with Jesus (1 Cor. 7:7): God has given some persons special capacity to forgo marriage, with its attendant sexual pleasures and obligation to procreate. Jesus also noted that in their resurrected state people “neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like angels in heaven” (Mark 12:25 NRSV//Matt. 22:29//Luke 20:34–36; cf. 1 Cor. 7:29, 31). Even the human institution of marriage will one day be subsumed by the heavenly marriage of the people of God to Christ or God (Isa. 54:5; 62:4–5; Jer. 2:2; 3:20; Ezek. 16:8; Hos. 2:19–20; Matt. 22:1–14; 25:1–13; Mark 2:19–20; John 3:29; 2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:27, 31–32; Rev. 19:7–9; 21:2, 9).

None of this meant that sexual differentiation and sexual norms no longer mattered in this age. To the contrary: Precisely because sexual fulfillment was not a necessity, Jesus and his followers could maintain and even intensify OT prerequisites and rules. In the context of discussing sexuality issues in 1 Cor. 7, Paul, the apostle of grace, could insist that what counted was “keeping God’s commands” (v. 19). Even reference to celibacy as gift (v. 7) could not be turned into a wedge for prying loose binding prerequisites for sexual behavior. So long as one could not find a partner who met the prerequisites for marriage, one could assume God’s empowerment to chastity in singleness. There is a difference between imposing a celibacy requirement and maintaining prerequisites for a valid sexual relationship. Scripture provides a conditional opportunity for sexual intimacy, not an opportunity by right. Sexual purity is a necessity; sexual gratification is not.

Jesus and Scripture on Homosexuality

Jesus' View. There is little historical doubt about Jesus' view of homosexual practice. Although focused on the indissolubility of marriage, in Mark 10:5–9 he clearly presupposed that the presence of a “male and female” was an important prerequisite of marriage (Gen. 1:27). Only a “man” and a “woman” are structurally capable of being “joined” through a sexually intimate relationship into a one-flesh union (2:24). The explicit mention of a two-sex pairing in these texts is not incidental but rather expresses the most (p 745) essential intrahuman requirement for sexual relations. Of special note is Jesus' back-to-back linking of Gen. 1:27 and 2:24, which suggests that Jesus meant “for this reason” (in Mark 10:7) to introduce Gen. 2:24 as a back-reference to the gender differentiation established in 1:27. For this reason—because God made them “male and female,” complementary sexual beings (1:27)—man and woman may be joined in a permanent one-flesh union (2:24). For Jesus, then, the Creator ordained marriage—it was not just a social construct—as a lifelong union of one man and one woman. Both the Scriptures Jesus cited with approval and the audience addressed—indeed, the whole of early Judaism, so far as extant evidence indicates (Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 159–83)—presumed the male-female prerequisite as critical. Had Jesus wanted his disciples to think otherwise, he would have had to state such a view clearly. As it is, we know of no dissenting opinions on the issue in earliest Christianity.

In addressing marriage's permanence, Jesus was not making lifelong monogamy a more important consideration for sexual relations than the heterosexual or other-sex dimension. The latter remained the unalterable prime prerequisite for all considerations of fidelity. Certainly, no reasonable person would argue that Jesus prioritized monogamy and permanence over the nonincestuous and nonbestial character of normative sexual relationships. Because Jesus' conviction about a male-female prerequisite at creation was shared throughout early Judaism, he could focus on other facets over which disputes existed in his cultural context.

There are other sayings of Jesus besides Mark 10:6–9 that, taken in the context of early Judaism, implicitly forbade same-sex intercourse. For example, he speaks against “sexual immoralities” (porneiai) in Mark 7:21, a term that for Jews of the Second Temple period called to mind the forbidden offenses in Lev. 18 and 20, particularly incest, adultery, same-sex intercourse, and bestiality. This is reinforced in the prohibition of porneia in the apostolic decree in Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25, which was formulated with Lev. 18 in view (Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 435–36). In Mark 10:17–22 Jesus affirmed the seventh commandment, against adultery (Exod. 20:14; Deut. 5:18), which presupposes preservation of the male-female marital bond (cf. the tenth commandment, on not coveting a neighbor’s wife). Early Judaism could use this commandment as a rubric for treating sex laws in the Bible, including proscriptions of male-male intercourse (cf. Philo, Spec. 3). Jesus’ acknowledgment of Sodom’s role in Scripture is the prime example of abusing visitors in Matt. 10:14–15//Luke 10:10–12, which in the context of other early Jewish texts indicates special revulsion for the attempt at treating males sexually as females (cf. Philo, Abr. 133–41 and QG 4.37; Josephus, A.J. 1.194–95, 200–201 and B.J. 4.483–85; 5.566; T. Naph. 3:3–4; 2 En. 10:4; 34:1–2). Within Scripture, Ezek. 16:50; 2 Pet. 2:6–10; and Jude 7 also point in this direction (Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 79–91; Gagnon and Via 57–59, with online notes 33–36). Jesus warns against giving “what is holy to dogs” (Matt. 7:6 NRSV), a likely echo of Deut. 23:17–18 \(18–19 MT\). That text forbids any Israelite from using the wages of a “dog” or qadesh (the self-styled “holy man,” “sacred one,” but often translated “male temple prostitute”) to pay a vow to the “house of Yahweh” (for “dog,” cf. Rev. 22:15 with 21:8; on the subject of the qedeshim, cultic “men-women” who sometimes served as the receptive partners in male-male intercourse, see Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 100–110).

Jesus did not advocate that the law of Moses be abrogated (Matt. 5:17–18//Luke 16:17). He did not even abolish minute rules about tithing herbs (Matt. 23:23//Luke 11:42), to say nothing of sexual laws about which Jesus apparently cared a great deal. Jesus was a much less vigorous critic of the law of Moses than Paul, and we know what Paul’s view of same-sex intercourse was. (See further: Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 185–209; Gagnon and Via 68–74, with online notes 59–73, esp. 59.)

Paul’s View. Paul understood same-sex intercourse as an affront to the Creator’s stamp on gender in Gen. 1–2. In Romans, Paul cites two prime examples of humans suppressing the truth about God evident in creation/nature: idolatry and same-sex intercourse (1:18–27). Paul first talks about humans exchanging the Creator’s glory for worship of idols made “in the likeness of the image of a perishable human and of birds and animals and reptiles” (1:23 AT). Then he writes about “females [who] exchanged the natural use” and “males leaving behind the natural use of the female” to have intercourse with other “males” (1:26–27 AT). This obviously echoes Gen. 1:26–27. There are not only eight points of correspondence between Gen. 1:26–27 and Rom. 1:23, 26–27, but also a threefold sequential agreement: (1) God’s likeness and image in humans, (2) dominion over the animal kingdom, and (3) male-female differentiation. What is the point of this echo? Idolatry and same-sex intercourse oppose the work of the (p 746)Creator. Those who have suppressed the truth about God transparent in creation were more likely to suppress the truth about the complementarity of the sexes transparent in nature, choosing instead to gratify contrary innate impulses (on Rom. 1:24–27, see further Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 246–303, 361–80; Gagnon and Via 76–81, with online notes 76–95, esp. 76, 88; Gagnon, “Review Essay 2,” 182–87, 206–26).

Paul’s readers would pick up these echoes. But Paul’s argument goes further. Even Gentiles unaware of Scripture have enough revelation in creation/nature to know that males with females, not females with females or males with males, are complementary sexual beings. In effect, Paul is saying: Start with the obvious fittedness of human anatomy; when done with that, consider procreative design as a clue; then move to a broad range of interpersonal differences that define maleness and femaleness. These are much better clues to God’s will for human sexuality than preexisting, controlling passions—which can be warped by the fall and shaped by socialization factors.

In 1 Cor. 6:9 (AT; cf. 1 Tim. 1:10) Paul mentions “men who lie with a male” (arsenokoitai)—a term formed from the absolute prohibitions of men lying with a male in Lev. 18:22 and 20:13—in a list of offenders that risk not inheriting the kingdom of God. Just as Rom. 1:26–27 has Gen. 1:27 in view, so too 1 Cor. 6:9 has Gen. 2:24 in view about a “man” and a “woman” joining to become “one flesh” (partially cited in 1 Cor. 6:16). In the background of references to homosexual behavior, Paul lifts up the same two texts, Gen. 1:27 and 2:24, that Jesus cited as normative. Paul recognizes the obvious implication of these texts for prohibiting all forms of same-sex intercourse. Taken in the context of remarks in 1 Cor. 5 (a case of adult incest) and 7 (male-female marriage), there is little doubt that Paul understood the offense of “men who lie with males” in 1 Cor. 6:9 (AT) as substitution of another male for a female in sexual activity. Put differently, it is abandonment of an other-sex structural prerequisite to a holistic sexual union (on 1 Cor. 6:9 and 1 Tim. 1:10, see further Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 303–36; Gagnon and Via 81–88 [with online notes 96–111, esp. 97, 99]; idem, "Review Essay 2," 226–39).

That Paul did not limit his opposition to homosexual practice only to certain exploitative forms is evident both from his indictment of lesbian intercourse in Rom. 1:26 and from advocacy for nonexploitative homoerotic behavior that persisted in many quarters of the Greco-Roman world (Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 347–61). Moreover, modern views about "homosexual orientation" would have made little difference to Paul's critique. There were "pagan" moralists and physicians who both posited something akin to homosexual orientation and held such desires to be "contrary to nature" even when given "by nature" (Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 380–95; "Intrinsically Sinful?" 141–52). We know that Paul viewed sin as an innate impulse, operating in the members of the human body, passed on by an ancestor, and never entirely within human control (Rom. 7:7–23).

Genesis and Rationale. The main problem with same-sex intercourse is that it does not restore the original sexual unity portrayed in Gen. 1:27 and 2:21–24. Genesis 1:27 brings into close connection creation "in God's image" and creation as "male and female." When humans engage in sexual activity, they engage another in their sexual particularity, as only one incomplete part of a two-faceted sexual whole. Ignoring this particularity effaces that part of the divine image stamped on human sexuality. Procreative capacity (1:28) is an important dimension of male-female complementarity, but only one among others. The Priestly material gives attention to structural congruity or "kinds" (1:11–12, 21, 24–25; 6:20; 7:14) and likely would not have equated an infertile male-female union with a homoerotic union. In the Yahwistic material of Gen. 2:18–24, a binary, or sexually undifferentiated, human is split down the "side" (a better translation than "rib") into two constituent parts, man and woman. Sexual relations are pictured as reconstitution or remerger of these two parts into a sexual whole. Homoerotic unions are precluded as a matter of course. One's sexual counterpart, complement, or "other half" is still missing.

Men and women are different in ways that complement—fill in the gaps of and moderate—the sexuality of the other. It is one of the great ironies of the modern prohomosexual lobby that it often argues for the insignificance of sexual differentiation while insisting that most homosexual persons have an "orientation"—not mere tastes or preferences—solely toward persons of the same sex. If men and women are really not all that different, why is there little attraction to the opposite sex on the part of many who claim homoerotic attraction? Throw in exclusively oriented heterosexuals, and over 95 percent of the population in Western society limits selection of mates to persons of a particular sex. No other criterion for mate selection comes even close to (p 747) this consideration. Clearly, there is a basic human acknowledgment that a person's sex matters.

This brings us to the point. Sexual attraction for persons of the same sex amounts to sexual narcissism or self-deception. There is either conscious recognition that one desires in another what one already possesses as a sexual being (anatomy, physiology, sex-based traits) or self-delusion of sorts in which the sexual same is perceived as some kind of significant sexual other. Sexual intimacy is not just about more intimacy. If it were, Jesus' love commandment would imply that we should have sexually intimate relationships with all believers rather than restrict sexual relationships to lifelong monogamy. One should be intimate with parents, siblings, and children, but not sexually intimate. Sexual intimacy is a special kind that involves merging with another who is structurally compatible to oneself, manifesting the right degree of likeness and unlikeness to make the merger truly complementary. Homoerotic relationships represent a misguided attempt at completing the sexual self with a sexual same when true integration requires a complementary sexual "other." Concerns about fidelity, monogamy, permanence, and love come into play only once prerequisites for an acceptable sexual union have been met.

The Rest of Scripture. Given adequate space, it is possible to show, through examination of literary and historical contexts as well as the history of interpretation, that the stories of Sodom in Gen. 19:4–11, of the Levite at Gibeah in Judg. 19:22–25, and of Ham's act against Noah in Gen. 9:20–27—these all include an indictment of male-male intercourse per se, not just of coercive acts (Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 63–100; Gagnon and Via 56–62). One could show that the prohibitions in Lev. 18:22 and 20:13 are not antiquated purity laws (Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 111–46; Gagnon and Via 62–68, 100–101, online rejoinder to Via, 22–28). Indeed, every text in Scripture having anything to do with sexual relations (laws, moral exhortations, narratives, poetry, prophetic speech metaphors) presupposes a heterosexual requirement (Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 432–39). It is relatively easy to demonstrate that in ancient Israel, early Judaism, and early Christianity the only form of "consensual" sexual behavior consistently regarded as a more severe infraction than homosexual practice was bestiality (Gagnon and Via, online note 17). Historical evidence indicates that every author of Scripture, as well as Jesus, would have been appalled by homosexual relationships, committed or otherwise. This assessment does not absolve the church of obligation to love those who seek to gratify homosexual desire, but rather informs believers on how the church should love such persons.

The Hermeneutics of the Gentile Inclusion Analogy. The narrative in Acts 10:1–11:18 and chapter 15, which recounts the inclusion of Gentiles into the church apart from circumcision and, implicitly, some food laws, is often cited as precedent for disregarding the Bible’s prohibition of homosexual practice. The argument is that the Spirit contravened Scripture, and so why not now also be free from Scripture?

There are many reasons why the alleged analogy is unworkable, some of which have already been suggested. (1) Jesus grounded the two-sexes prerequisite for marriage in the will of God, established at creation—a fact that gave it preeminent significance for him. Circumcision is not grounded in creation structures. Paul correctly understood this (Rom. 1:24–27; 2:25–29; ch. 4; 6:19; 1 Cor. 6:9; 7:18–19). (2) The alleged analogy treats as comparable distinctively Jewish ritual requirements that affect the body superficially and universal standards for sexual ethics that affect the body holistically. While Jesus gave diminished significance to diet and Sabbath regulations, he intensified God’s demands in sexual ethics. He rejected an equation between food that enters the body and desires for prohibited sexual conduct that proceed from the body (Mark 7:14–23). Paul likewise contended that sexual behavior could not come unreservedly under the slogan “all things are permissible for me” (1 Cor. 6:12–20; cf. Rom. 13:13–14:23). Immoral sexual behavior—unlike Gentile failure to observe laws regarding circumcision, diet, and calendar—could lead to exclusion from God’s kingdom (1 Cor. 6:9; 7:18–19). (3) The alleged analogy confuses what Acts 15 clearly distinguishes: welcoming persons and accepting behaviors. The apostolic decree forbade continued participation in porneia (15:20, 29; 21:25) and did so with the Lev. 18 sex laws in view. Paul similarly welcomed Gentiles into the household of faith while commanding them not to live like (unbelieving) Gentiles, especially with regard to engaging in sexual behavior that Scripture categorically forbids (Rom. 6:19; 1 Thess. 4:3–8; cf. Eph. 4:17–24; 5:3–5).

(4) The alleged analogy between prescribing circumcision and proscribing homosexual practice overlooks the degree to which Scripture and the putative new work of the Spirit are in tension. Embrace of uncircumcised Gentiles has significant OT precedents and uniform NT support (p 748), whereas embrace of homosexual practice constitutes a radical departure from Scripture. (5) The justifications for such claims tend to be naive. Advocates of homosexual practice wrongly assume that evidence of the Spirit’s outworking in one area of a person’s life (for example, in exhibiting care for a same-sex partner) necessarily validates other areas (having sex with that partner). They also presuppose that any behavior that does not produce scientifically measurable harm to all participants in all circumstances must be acceptable in some circumstances, thereby ignoring the implication for some adult incest, polygamy, and even adult-child sex. (6) The alleged analogy sidesteps completely the reason why Scripture regards same-sex intercourse as wrong: a dishonoring of the sexual self's integrity through attempted completion with what one already is as a sexual being. Finally, (7) the alleged analogy disregards the significant differences between ethnicity and "sexual orientation." Whereas the former is culturally immutable and intrinsically benign, the latter is a condition that is neither genetically predetermined nor transparently neutral. As with alcoholism or pedophilia, there is good indication that macrocultural (society) and microcultural (familial, peer) influences, as well as incremental choices, can influence the intensity and even incidence of homosexual development. (On this analogy, see further Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 460–69; Gagnon and Via 43–44, with online notes; on the high rates of harm, see Gagnon, Homosexual Practice, 452–60, 471–85; Gagnon and Via online note 167.)

Bibliography

Allison, D. Jesus of Nazareth. Fortress, 1998; Balch, D., ed. Homosexuality, Science, and the "Plain Sense" of Scripture. Eerdmans, 2000; Brawley, R., ed. Biblical Ethics and Homosexuality. Westminster John Knox, 1996; Brooten, B. Love between Women. University of Chicago Press, 1996; Campbell, K., ed. Marriage and Family in the Biblical World. InterVarsity, 2003; Carr, D. The Erotic Word. Oxford University Press, 2002; Collins, R. Sexual Ethics and the New Testament. Crossroad, 2000; Deming, W. Paul on Marriage and Celibacy. Cambridge University Press, 1995; De Young, J. Homosexuality. Kregel, 2000; Fredrickson, D. "Natural and Unnatural Use in Romans 1:24–27: Paul and Philosophic Critique of Eros." Pages 197–222 in Homosexuality, Science ..., ed. D. Balch. Eerdmans, 2000; Gagnon, R. "Are There Universally Valid Sex Precepts? A Critique of Walter Wink's Views on the Bible and Homosexuality." HBT 24 (2002): 72–125; idem. The Bible and Homosexual Practice. Abingdon, 2001; idem. "A Comprehensive and Critical Review Essay of [D. Balch's] Homosexuality, Science, and the 'Plain Sense' of Scripture, Part 1" and "Part 2." HBT 22 (2000): 174–243; 25 (2003): 173–275; idem. "Does the Bible Regard Same-Sex Intercourse as Intrinsically Sinful?" In Christian Sexuality. Kirk House, 2003; Gagnon, R., and D. Via. Homosexuality and the Bible. Fortress, 2003. Online notes: <http://www.robagnon.net/TwoViews.htm> (additional articles by Gagnon online: www.robagnon.net); Greenberg, D. The Construction of Homosexuality. University of Chicago Press, 1988; Grenz, S. Sexual Ethics. Word, 1990; idem. Welcoming but Not Affirming. Westminster John Knox, 1998; Hays, R. The Moral Vision of the New Testament. HarperCollins, 1996; Hugenberger, G. Marriage as a Covenant. Brill, 1994; Instone-Brewer, D. Divorce and Remarriage in the Bible. Eerdmans, 2002; Keener, C. And Marries Another. Hendrickson, 1991; Nissinen, M. Homeroeticism in the Biblical World. Fortress, 1998; Satlow, M. Jewish Marriage in Antiquity. Princeton University Press, 2001; Schmidt, T. Straight and Narrow? InterVarsity, 1995; Scroggs, R. The New Testament and Homosexuality. Fortress, 1983; Swartley, W. Homosexuality. Herald Press, 2003; Watson, F. Agape, Eros, Gender. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Webb, W. Slaves, Women, and Homosexuals. InterVarsity, 2001; Winter, B. After Paul Left Corinth. Eerdmans, 2001.

Robert A. J. Gagnon

Significance See Meaning

Sin, Doctrine of Ancient Christian interpreters of the Bible developed a scheme to unify the heterogeneity of scriptural texts into a single, overall reading. Following suggestions in Paul's letters, early Christian readers understood the Bible as an account of the unfolding dispensation or economy of God. To use more modern terms, the Bible depicts an unfolding "salvation-history" (von Rad), "narrative" (Frei), or "drama" (Balthasar). In each case, theological interpretation involves placing individual texts into a temporal scheme structured by divine purpose. This method of interpretation has intrascriptural warrant. The structuring role of a historical or narrative scheme is already present in the Scriptures themselves (cf. Neh. 9; Deut. 6:20–24).

The schemes for framing a unified reading of Scripture are diverse. Modern scholars have noted, for example, that Greek patristic theology tends to view the drama of Scripture as an ascent to participation in God, while Latin patristic theology tends to treat the narrative as a story of justice and debt payment. Moreover, the conceptual techniques for describing the unfolding dispensations vary (e.g., promise/fulfillment, carnal/spiritual, shadow/substance). Within this diversity, however, Christian theological interpretation has consistently identified sin as the crucial inner-worldly reality that shapes the economy (p 749) presented in Scripture. Numerous patristic figures summarize the scriptural narrative according to a scheme of creation-fall-redemption (cf. Irenaeus). Like Macbeth's murder of Duncan, the transgression of Adam and Eve sets in motion the chain of events that stretches from Genesis through Revelation. Sin is the singular fact over and against which God acts.

The Essence of Sin

Although universally acknowledged by the tradition, theological interpreters have developed no consensus about the nature and root of sin, and there are no ecumenical doctrines that define the essence of sin. In the late patristic period, divergent accounts of the origin or foundation of sin developed. The Eastern monastic tradition identified eight “evil thoughts” that ascended from temptations of the flesh to spiritual dangers such as sloth and pride (Cassian). In contrast, the Western pastoral tradition formulated the sequence from a foundational pride to the outworkings of sin in lust and gluttony (Gregory the Great). In the post-Reformation West, definitions of sin were seen as church-dividing issues (cf. Trent, Sessio V; The Formula of Concord, art. 1).

The lack of consensus about the essence of sin reflects the diversity of scriptural terminology: hamartia (missing the mark), parabasis (transgression), adikia (unrighteousness), asebeia (impiety), anomia (lawlessness), ponēria (depravity), and epithymia (evil desire). Furthermore, the rich OT vocabulary of prostitution and other forms of idolatrous defilement adds distinctive color to biblical depictions of human sinfulness. Finally, the Scriptures offer divergent descriptions of the root or cause of sin: pride goes before the fall the fall ((Prov. 16:18); love of money is the root of all evil (1 Tim. 6:10); the evil tongue is the source of iniquity (James 3:6).

Two narrative moments in Scripture exemplify the difficulty of specifying the nature of sin. Genesis 3:1–7 depicts the original transgression of Adam and Eve. In a homily on this passage, the influential patristic interpreter John Chrysostom retells the story without settling on a single explanation for the fall. He moves from serpent, to Eve, to Adam, drawing in envy, negligence, ignorance, disobedience, and pride. The fall has no single, identifiable cause. The multiple directions of temptation are present in the threefold temptation of Jesus, which the patristic tradition linked to the triad of evil itemized in 1 John 2:16. An even greater plurality characterizes the Gospel accounts of Jesus’ passion. An atmosphere of blindness, deception, complicity, fear, greed, collective madness, and menace characterizes the scene in Jerusalem, and the narrative resists efforts to resolve sin into a single form or cause.

The diverse and allusive biblical witness to the reality of sin encourages a fundamentally negative definition. Sin is not an ontological category. It is not a function of embodiment or finitude. For Augustine, sin is disordered desire, not desire itself. Sin is perverse love. Nor can sin be reduced to a single, fundamental motive, such as pride. Instead, sin is a temporal category. Augustine uses the image of weight, describing human personality as dynamic and always moving either upward to God or downward toward corruption. This image captures a patristic consensus that sin is a direction of life away from God. For this reason, as Karl Barth has argued most forcefully, sin is most visible and evident in contrast to the righteousness and holiness of God, revealed in Jesus Christ. The idolatry described by Paul in Rom. 1 is revealed by the possibility of true worship.

Although sin is a personal and not ontological reality, a function of will and not nature, the role of sin in the drama of salvation has definite features.

The Universality of Sin

The universality of redemption presupposes the universality of sin. Paul's genealogy of sin in the first chapters of Romans sets the stage for the universal role of Christ. Neither Jew nor Gentile escapes the stain of sin. "There is no distinction, since all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:22–23 NRSV). The universality of sin even extends to the created order, which is subjected to futility and bondage to decay (8:20–21). The cosmic scope of sin sets the stage for a cosmic redemption: "Turn to me and be saved, all the ends of the earth" (Isa. 45:22 NRSV). The universal need for redemption, not particular passages in Scripture that suggest the ubiquity of sin (Ps. 14), presses theological interpreters to emphasize original sin. For Paul, the destiny of the entire created order turns on the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, and this entails presuming that sin penetrates all aspects of life.

Sin Is Unnatural

It is very tempting to imagine that sin is a consequence of embodiment. Paul warns of the "passions of our flesh" (Eph. 2:3 NRSV), speaks of "the law of sin that dwells in my members" (Rom. 7:23 NRSV), and consistently uses the word "carnal(p 750)" to describe the path of sin. Yet, a theological reading of the Scriptures blocks a "carnal reading" of these and other passages as indicating that sin is an upshot of our embodied, natural existence. Any suggestion that instinct or bodily needs cause sin is inconsistent with Gen. 1. The universality of sin cannot be linked to the shared, embodied condition of human beings (cf. Jenson's clear discussion in Human). On the contrary, sin is a perversion or disorder of human nature. For this reason, the reality of sin does not require a theological reading of Scripture that portrays the gospel as disembodied. The drama of redemption takes place within a created order that is intrinsically good and therefore fit for sanctification. The Roman Catholic rejection of the Reformation doctrine of total depravity was motivated by the fear that the Reformers were defining sin as destroying or replacing the human nature that God had created and called good. The concern is linked to criticisms of forensic justification, raising the objection that Reformation doctrines of sin and salvation do not permit an inner-worldly drama of salvation. Unless theological exegesis presumes that sin is unnatural, accounts of salvation will tend to become otherworldly or purely eschatological.

Sin Is Determinative

The universality of sin is not peripheral to human identity. Sin shapes life. To use Paul's language, sin enslaves, dictating the direction of human life. The direction is dynamic, gaining speed and intensity, leading to greater and greater iniquity (Rom. 6:19). However intrinsically good the created reality, sin has perverted life to its very marrow. For this reason, the very identity of the sinner is defined by sin, and that identity must be destroyed. Echoing Paul again, the old man must die and a new man must be born if one is to turn from a life defined by sin to a life of righteousness (Rom. 6:6–8). A redemptive change in direction will come as a blow of judgment that ends this perverted life. For this reason, theological interpretation of redemption must be structured by the radical disjunction of death and resurrection. The Reformation insistence on the doctrine of total depravity was motivated by the fear that Roman Catholic accounts did not make sin determinative of the identity of persons, softening the blow of judgment and eliminating the disjunction of new life in Christ. Unless one understands sin as determinative, theological exegesis cannot portray the life-and-death drama of redemption.

Sin Can Be Transferred

Each person rightly bears the consequences for his or her sin. Those who sin “deserve to die” (Rom. 1:32 NRSV). Here, the language of payment and debt is prominent in the theological tradition. When the Son of Man comes in glory, the Father “will repay everyone for what has been done” (Matt. 16:27 NRSV). We rightly merit punishment, for sin is determinative; it characterizes who we are. In the history of theology about original sin, its nature and transmission, a great deal of the debate stems from the desire to explain how each of us can be held accountable for the sinfulness that is universal and inescapable. Some explanations are more persuasive than others. The important point, however, is that a theological interpretation of Scripture must define sin as a personal liability, but also as a transferable liability, a debt that can be taken up by another. For the crux of the biblical drama of redemption is the pro-nobis (for-us) role of Jesus Christ. He can take the blow of judgment in our place. However determinative of each person's life, the weight and power of sin can be assumed by another.

The possibility of the transfer of sin is presupposed in the ritual dynamics of atonement, both in its OT (Leviticus) and NT (Hebrews) uses. This transfer is not limited to ritual contexts and language. Isaiah 53 and Rom. 4 presume the possibility of one assuming the sin of another, with Paul concerned about the even more important possibility of the transfer or “reckoning” of righteousness. The history of theology in the West has been characterized by extensive debate about the specific conditions for such a transfer (e.g., substitutionary atonement) and the proper vocabulary for expressing the currency of transfer (e.g., debt, punishment). This debate presumes that the most personal of realities—sin—can be assumed by another. This presumption must characterize theological interpretation. For without the possibility of transfer of sin, the redemptive economy of the entire sweep of the biblical witness cannot turn on the identity of one man, Jesus Christ, on whom is concentrated the sin of the whole world, that all might die to their sin and rise in his righteousness.

See also Human Being, Doctrine of; Original Sin

Bibliography

Augustine. On True Religion. In Augustine: Earlier Writings. Westminster, 1953; Balthasar, H. U. von. Theodrama. Vol. 1. Ignatius, 1988; Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Vol. IV/1, trans. G. Bromiley. T&T Clark, 1956; Bloomfield, M. The Seven Deadly Sins. Michigan State (p 751) Press, 1952; Cassian, J. The Conferences. Paulist, 1997; Chrysostom, J. Homilies on Genesis 1–17. Catholic University of America Press, 1986; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; Hodge, C. Systematic Theology. Vol. 2. Scribner, Armstrong, 1872; Irenaeus. Against the Heresies. Book 1. Newman, 1992; Jenson, R. On Thinking the Human. Eerdmans, 2003; idem. Systematic Theology. Vol. 2. Oxford University Press, 1999; Menke, K.-H. Stellvertretung. Johannes, 1991; Nellas, P. Deification in Christ. St. Vladimir's, 1987; Rad, G. von. Old Testament Theology. 2 vols. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Soulen, R. K. The God of Israel and Christian Theology. Fortress, 1996.

R. R. Reno

Slavery

The biblical texts dealing with slavery have much to teach the church about how to understand and apply the Bible. One must make a crucial distinction between (1) a redemptive-movement appropriation of Scripture, which encourages movement beyond the original application of the text in the ancient world; and (2) a more static or stationary appropriation of Scripture. The latter understands the words of the text in isolation from their canonical and cultural context and aside from, or with minimal emphasis upon, their underlying spirit. It thus restricts contemporary application of Scripture to how the words of the text were applied in their original setting. While beyond the focus of this article, it is important to note that both aspects of redemptive-movement meaning contained in canonical movement and cultural movement provide an essential, though often overlooked, part of textual meaning within the words of Scripture themselves (Webb).

An opening illustration from the slavery texts of these different approaches might be helpful. For instance, Deuteronomy instructs Israel to provide safety and refuge to slaves fleeing harsh treatment from a foreign country (Deut. 23:15–16). Upon crossing Israel’s borders, a fleeing slave was to be given shelter, was permitted to live in any of Israel’s cities, and was not to be handed over to his/her master. The redemptive dimension of this slavery legislation sparkles brightly in comparison to the surrounding nations. Most ancient Near Eastern countries had extradition treaties and administered severe punishment to runaway slaves, to their families, and to those who aided in their escape.

A static hermeneutic would apply this slavery-refuge text by staying exactly with the words on the page, words read in isolation from their movement meaning. It would not use the spirit-movement meaning in this text to cry out for the abolition of slavery today. Rather, it would permit slavery in our modern culture, but simply adopt some form of leniency toward runaway slaves within the church. Proponents of a stationary hermeneutic would support or at least permit the institution of slavery, but seek to give refuge to slaves in abusive relationships. Such an approach to applying the Bible emphasizes the words of the text in a highly isolated sense, while missing the spirit of the text.

Problems with the Slavery Texts

As one reads the biblical texts on slaves, an overwhelming impression emerges: a less-than-ultimate ethic in the treatment of slaves is a major part of our Bibles. If we clear away the technical language, we might simply say that there is a problem with the treatment of slaves in the Bible. There exist numerous “not so pretty” components within the slavery texts that illustrate a less-than-ultimate ethic in the treatment of slaves/people:

1. Human beings are considered to be property (Exod. 12:44; 21:20–21, 32; Lev. 22:11).
2. Foreign slaves in Israel did not experience the seventh year of release (Lev. 25:39–46).

3. Slaves within Israel were used to produce offspring for their infertile owners (Gen. 16:1–4; 30:3–4, 9–10; cf. 35:22).
4. Sexual violation of a betrothed slave woman led not to death, as in the case of a free woman (Deut. 22:25–27), but to a mere payment/offering for damages (Lev. 19:20–22).
5. Slave owners were permitted to beat their slaves without any penalty provided the slave survived by a couple of days (Exod. 21:20–21).
6. Biblical legislation contains inequality in the value placed on a slave’s life compared to a free person’s life (Exod. 21:28–32).

To call the biblical treatment of slaves “abusive” in terms of the original culture would be anachronistic. Relative to that culture, many of these texts were in some measure redemptive. Nevertheless, the above practices are problematic and in need of movement toward an ultimate ethic. A much more humane treatment of persons can be legislated and lived out in our modern civil-law settings. The theological implication is not that God himself has somehow “moved” in his thinking or that Scripture is in any way less than God’s (p 752)word. Rather, it means that God in a pastoral sense accommodates himself to meeting people and society where they are in their existing social ethic, and (from there) he gently moves them with incremental steps toward something better. Moving large, complex, and embedded social structures along on an ethical continuum is by no means a simple matter. Incremental movement within Scripture reveals a God who is willing to live with the tension between an absolute ethic in theory and the reality of guiding real people in practice toward such a goal.

Redemptive Movement Yields an Ultimate Ethic

Fortunately, there exists a “wonderful and inspiring” side to the biblical portrait of slaves. It is this positive side that establishes redemptive movement as crucial meaning within the biblical text. This movement meaning or redemptive-spirit meaning must profoundly shape the course of our contemporary appropriation of the Bible in a way that often carries us beyond the bound-in-time components of meaning within the biblical text. In the next set of examples the task of theological interpretation is to “listen” to the slavery texts within their cultural context (relative to the ancient world) and their canonical context (with movement to the NT):

1. The holidays for festivals and for the weekly Sabbath rest, compared to the ancient world, were generous (Deut. 16:10–12; Exod. 23:12).
2. In both Testaments slaves are included in the worship setting (Exod. 12:44; Deut. 12:12, 18; cf. Col. 3:22–4:6), and the NT church community profoundly raised a slave’s status yet further to equality “in Christ” (Gal. 3:28). Some ancient cultures (such as the Roman Empire) restricted slaves from involvement in the sacred rituals and religious festivals because they were thought to have a defiling or polluting influence.

3. No-interest loans within Israel were an attempt to reduce the occurrence of debt slavery (Lev. 25:35–36; Deut. 15:1–2, 7–11); this compares with loan rates within the surrounding nations that were often well in excess of 20 percent interest.
4. The release of Hebrew debt slaves after a certain number of years compared with the ancient world is unique (excepting the code of Hammurabi) and a highly redemptive aspect to biblical legislation (Lev. 25:39–43; cf. Jer. 34:8–22).
5. Material assistance for released slaves stands out as a generous act of biblical law (Deut. 15:12–18).
6. Limitations were placed upon the severity of physical beatings (Exod. 21:20–21), and freedom was granted to any slave who was physically damaged (21:26–27). Other cultures did not limit the slave owner’s power in this way; torturous abuse of select slaves often became an object lesson for others.
7. Masters are admonished to turn away from harshness and to show genuine care for their slaves (Col. 4:1; Eph. 6:9), transforming the slave-master relationship with a new sense of Christian brotherhood (Philem. 16).
8. Scripture denounces foreign countries (Gaza and Tyre) for stealing people in order to trade them as slaves (Exod. 21:16; Deut. 24:7; cf. 1 Tim. 1:10; Rev. 18:13).
9. In a radical departure from prevalent views, Israel became a safety zone or refuge for foreign runaway slaves (Deut. 23:15–16; cf. Isa. 16:3–4).

When the Bible’s slavery texts are read against their contexts, redemptive movement becomes increasingly clear. These biblical modifications to the existing social norms brought greater protection and dignity for the slave. This improvement in the conditions of slaves relative to the original culture was clearly a redemptive action on the part of Scripture. Admittedly, it was not redemptive in any absolute sense. Scripture only moved the cultural “scrimmage markers” so far. Yet, that movement was sufficient to signal a clear direction in terms of further improvements for later generations. Redemptive-movement meaning was (and is) absolutely crucial to contemporary application.

If Christians are willing to listen to the underlying spirit of the slavery texts, these passages will (as was the case in the 1800s in Britain and the United States) persuade God’s people toward the total abolition of slavery. Today the same redemptive spirit continues to speak to our modern work world even where slavery itself is no longer present. That voice calls for Christians to champion the cause of those less fortunate, to better the working conditions of those most vulnerable to abuse, and to be concerned in some collective way for the economic well-being of all people within our society.

See also Culture and Hermeneutics; Racism

(p 753)Bibliography*

Bradley, K. Slavery and Society at Rome. Cambridge University Press, 1994; Chirichigno, G. Debt-Slavery in Israel and the Ancient Near East. JSOTSup 141. Sheffield Academic Press, 1993; Garlan, Y. Slavery in Ancient Greece, trans. J. Lloyd. Cornell University Press, 1988; Giles, K. "The Biblical Argument for Slavery: Can the Bible Mislead? A Case Study in Hermeneutics." EvQ 66 (1994): 3–17; Meeks, W. "The 'Haustafeln' and American Slavery: A Hermeneutical Challenge." Pages 232–53 in Theology and Ethics in Paul and His Interpreters, ed. E. Lovering Jr. and J. Sumney. Abingdon, 1996; Mendelsohn, I. "Slavery in the Old Testament." IDB 4:383–91; Swartley, W. Slavery, Sabbath, War, and Women. Herald Press, 1983; Thompson, D. "Women, Men, Slaves and the Bible. Hermeneutical Inquiries." Christian Scholar's Review 25 (1996): 326–49; Tise, L. Proslavery. University of Georgia Press, 1987; Webb, W. Slaves, Women and Homosexuals. InterVarsity, 2001; idem. "The Limits of a Redemptive-Movement Hermeneutic: A Focused Response to T. R. Schreiner." EvQ 75, no. 4 (Oct. 2003): 327–42.

William J. Webb

Social-Scientific Criticism

Definition and Description

Social-scientific criticism of the Bible is "that phase of the exegetical task which analyses the social and cultural dimensions of the text and of its environmental context through the utilization of the perspectives, theory, models, and research of the social sciences" (Elliott 7). As such, it is part of the wider enterprise of historical criticism of the Bible. Its presupposition is that validity in interpretation of texts from the past like the Bible involves disciplined attention both to the intentions of the original author and to the meaning(s) of the text in its original historical setting.

However, whereas historical criticism focuses traditionally on questions of sources, dating, authorship, language, genre, history of tradition, historical background, and the history of the reception and interpretation of the text, social-scientific criticism attends to questions of a different but related kind. These are concerned not so much with diachronic aspects as with synchronic aspects, the typical social patterns and taken-for-granted cultural conditions and conceptions most likely to have characterized the biblical world and influenced the biblical writers. The kinds of questions posed in social-scientific interpretation include questions about (1) boundary markers and their role in the definition and preservation of individual and social identity; (2) authority and the interpretation and regulation of power in social relations, not least in the ordering and discipline of the human body; (3) status and role, including the ways these are played out in relation to wealth, education, age, gender, race, and class; (4) ritual as an aspect of the symbolic construction of meaning through time, especially in relation to moments of crisis or change; (5) texts and other media of communication and their production and social effects; (6) group functions, including the function of conflict and how the group deals with experiences of cognitive dissonance; and (7) the symbolic universe and the social construction of reality, including a society's understanding and representation of history and of the relation between worlds divine and human (Kee 65–69).

The claim of social-scientific criticism is that, by asking a different set of questions, aspects of the text usually hidden from view by the more traditional methods of historical interpretation are allowed to come to the surface. This is a significant aid to interpretations of the Bible that seek to take its embeddedness in time, space, and the lives of societies and cultures with full seriousness. Furthermore, since biblical interpretation involves readers as well as texts—the reading of Scripture by reading communities in time and over time (cf. Fowl and Jones)—the potential contribution of social-scientific criticism is greater still. Put differently, social-scientific criticism is able to deepen our understanding, not only of the world behind the text (the world of the author), but also of the world within the text (the world of narrated persons and events) and of the world in front of the text (the world of the readers of the text down through the ages, including ourselves; cf. Tate).

Impact and Roots

From at least the 1970s onward, social-scientific criticism has had a significant impact on biblical interpretation. Numerous bibliographies, surveys, and collections of essays testify to this (e.g., Barton; Elliott 138–74; Horrell; Lang), as do developments in professional scholarly organizations, such as the founding of the Context Group by Bruce Malina and other (primarily) North American scholars in 1986. Now there are entire biblical commentaries (e.g., Malina and Rohrbaugh) and scholarly monographs (e.g., Elser; Rogerson) written from a social-scientific perspective. Clearly, then, we have to do with a weighty development in academic biblical interpretation.

One reason for its considerable impact is that the roots of social-scientific criticism go deep and wide. Contributory factors include (1) the (p 754)relative failure of form and redaction criticism to deliver fully on their promise to correlate scriptural texts with historical and social contexts (Sitz im Leben) in the life of Israel and the early church; (2) the rise in prominence and prestige of the social sciences (sociology, anthropology, and psychology) and of the scientific study of religion from the nineteenth century onward, developments grounded in ways of seeing legitimated by models of scientific reason associated with the Enlightenment; (3) the influence on the Western intellectual and cultural tradition—including traditions of interpreting texts like the Bible—of the “hermeneutics of suspicion” characteristic of modernity and represented above all by Feuerbach, Nietzsche, Durkheim, Marx, Freud, and more recently by feminism; (4) shifts in historiography generally, away from the great-man view of history typical of Romanticism to one more attentive to history “from below,” with a much stronger popular, cultural, and social dimension; (5) the surfacing of different kinds of questions to put to the scriptural text in the light of developments in twentieth-century theology and history, not least the crisis in liberal theology and the urgent concerns (often of a social and political kind) raised by fundamentalism (of various kinds) on the one hand and by liberationist and feminist theologies on the other.

Strengths and Weaknesses

One of the main contributions of social-scientific criticism has been the revitalization of scriptural interpretation by enlarging the agenda so that the reality—human and divine, material and spiritual—to which the text bears witness may be grasped more fully. As Robin Scroggs put it in an early contribution:

To some it has seemed that too often the discipline of the theology of the New Testament (the history of ideas) operates out of a methodological docetism, as if believers had minds and spirits unconnected with their individual and corporate bodies. Interest in the sociology of early Christianity is no attempt to limit reductionistically the reality of Christianity to social dynamic; rather it should be seen as an effort to guard against a reductionism from the other extreme, a limitation of the reality of Christianity to an inner-spiritual, or objective-cognitive system. In short, sociology of early Christianity wants to put body and soul together again. (Scroggs 165–66)

This new “hermeneutics of social embodiment” (Meeks) has brought a new appreciation of the material and corporate dimensions of biblical faith along with their attendant implications for its appropriation today.

Such an approach does have potential or real weaknesses. Some argue that the danger of anachronism in using methods and models from a quintessentially modern discipline like sociology is too great and results in a necessarily reductionist account. Or alternatively, they argue that the tools of the social sciences are just too blunt to do justice to the startling novelty and historical particularity of aspects of Israelite religion or of the movement inaugurated by Jesus. On the other hand, Ernst Troeltsch's sect-church typology, Max Weber's theory of charisma and its routinization, Mary Douglas's interpretation of the social and religious significance of ritual purity, Edmund Leech's structural interpretation of sacrifice, or J. G. Peristiany's account of honor and shame as pivotal values in Mediterranean societies—any of these may nevertheless draw attention (working by analogy) to significant features of biblical and early Christian social dynamics that might otherwise go unnoticed (cf. Lang for OT examples; Rohrbaugh for NT examples).

A related concern arises from a particular construal of the genealogy of the social sciences in post-Enlightenment rationalism and atheistic positivism. Recently, John Milbank has argued powerfully that, historically speaking, the social sciences are attempts to “police the sublime.” They are parasitic on Christian orthodoxy and represent modern heretical deviations grounded in an ideological and methodological atheism (Milbank 51–143). However, not all theologians share Milbank's hostility to the social sciences nor his construal of the genealogy of the social sciences (e.g., Flanagan; Williams). It is also worth recognizing that significant analyses of biblical material from a social-scientific perspective have come from practitioners who are themselves religiously committed (e.g., Davies; Douglas; Theissen).

The Social Sciences and Theological Hermeneutics

A particularly robust defense of the role of social-scientific criticism in relation to theology, partly in response to Milbank's alternative and hostile narrative, has come from Richard Roberts. Acknowledging the problematic nature of the relation between theology and the social sciences, he traces no less than five “strategies of appropriation” that have pertained historically. (1) In the various forms of religious fundamentalism characteristic of modernity, the tendency is (p 755) for theology to repel the social sciences except when they can be used instrumentally to support the attempt to reconquer the world by bringing about personal conversion. (2) By contrast, the work of Ernst Troeltsch, one of the founders of the sociology of religion, represents sociology's conquest of theology resulting from Troeltsch's acceptance of the claims of historicism. As a consequence, in Troeltsch's church-sect typology and its elaboration, belief and religious behavior are liable to relativization as the (mere) corollaries of the social structure of the religious organization. (3) In the work of Dietrich Bonhoeffer, on the other hand, sociology is drafted into the service of theology in a way that preserves the dialectical tension between the disciplines.

This first appears in his study of what it means to be the church in the modern world (Sanctorum Communio, ET, 1963), and second, expressing his theological engagement with secularization, in his Letters and Papers from Prison (ET, 1967). (4) More recently, Edward Farley's phenomenological approach represents the "mutual absorption" of theology and sociology. In his two works, Ecclesial Man (1975) and Ecclesial Reflection (1982), social-scientific insights are assimilated into a method that overcomes what many would see as the necessary divergence between sociology and theology and (arguably) blunts their respective contributions in favor of a phenomenology of "ecclesial being." (5) The last strategy is that of John Milbank, in his Theology and Social Theory (1989). According to Roberts, Milbank is determined to drive a wedge between theology and the social sciences and to interpret the latter as heretical deviations from Christian truth and practice. This effort gives to his work the character of a "postmodern quasi-fundamentalism," whereby a fundamental choice has to be made between two competing, incompatible, totalizing practices: either Christianity or secular reason.

This typology of forms of engagement between theology and the social sciences is very apropos since social-scientific interpretation of the Bible is one of the arenas where that engagement takes place. If we repel social-scientific criticism in the theological interpretation of the Bible, we risk the cultural marginalization of the church and its Scriptures and blindness to "the real" in relation to changing understandings of, for example, power, wealth, and gender, not to mention transcendence itself. And if we allow theological interpretation to be supplanted by sociology or subsumed within phenomenology, we risk both the silencing of the Bible as witness to the Word-made-flesh and the emasculation of those vibrant faith communities who maintain and embody that witness. To sustain theological interpretation in critical dialogue with the social sciences (and with the human sciences generally), after the manner of Bonhoeffer, we need to refuse premature foreclosure on the truth and to keep alive the possibility of ongoing attention and obedience to the word. We can do this while disciplined by the resources and practices of the faith tradition on the one hand, and by the often-abrasive but sometimes exhilarating encounter with modernity on the other.

Bibliography

Barton, S. "The Communal Dimension of Earliest Christianity: A Critical Survey of the Field." JTS 43, no. 2 (1992): 399–427; Davies, D. Anthropology and Theology. Berg, 2002; Douglas, M. Purity and Danger.

Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1966; Elliott, J. Social-Scientific Criticism of the New Testament and Its Social World. SPCK, 1995; Esler, P. Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts. Cambridge University Press, 1987; Flanagan, K. "Sublime Policing: Sociology and Milbank's City of God." NBf 73 (1992): 333–41; Fowl, S., and L. G. Jones. Reading in Communion. SPCK, 1991; Horrell, D., ed. Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation. T&T Clark, 1999; Kee, H. C. Knowing the Truth. Fortress, 1989; Lang, B. Anthropological Approaches to the Old Testament. SPCK, 1985; Malina, B., and R. Rohrbaugh. Social-Science Commentary on the Synoptic Gospels. Fortress, 1992; Meeks, W. The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul. 2d ed. Yale University Press, 2003; Milbank, J. Theology and Social Theory. Blackwell, 1990; Roberts, R. H. Religion, Theology and the Human Sciences. Cambridge University Press, 2002; Rogerson, J. Anthropology and the Old Testament. Blackwell, 1978; Rohrbaugh, R., ed. The Social Sciences and New Testament Interpretation. Hendrickson, 1996; Scroggs, R. "The Sociological Interpretation of the New Testament: The Present State of Research." NTS 26 (1980): 164–79; Tate, W. R. Biblical Interpretation. Hendrickson, 1991; Theissen, G. The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity. T&T Clark, 1982; Williams, R. "Saving Time: Thoughts on Practice, Patience and Vision." NBf 73 (1992): 319–26.

Stephen C. Barton

Societies, Scholarly

Scholarly societies consist of members in diverse geographical configurations with a variety of missions and a fairly similar set of activities. These organizations have shaped, if not changed, the theological interpretation of Scripture since they began in the last half of the nineteenth century. They have flourished during the twentieth century, with signs of increasing strength at the beginning of the twenty-first. For their members they provide solidarity benefits, professional/(p 756)academic standards, and opportunities for intellectual debate. For the general public and the academic world they publish journals, books, and increasingly provide a variety of digital resources over the Internet. Indirectly, they promote the theological interpretation of Scripture for confessional communities.

Two definitional issues require comment. First, while definitions of "scholarly" exist, the use and meaning of the term is wide-ranging. "Scholarly" can describe a group or individual who has developed a specific set of methods, or it can refer to qualities or attitudes of the group or individual. Yet any taxonomy of these societies is shaped by an understanding of "scholarly." Individuals associated with universities and seminaries have developed the organizations that have flourished through the twentieth century. This academic context has played an important role in shaping the contributions of these scholarly societies to the theological interpretation of Scripture.

Second, the adjective “theological” also carries a variety of connotations and denotations. “Theological” can refer to specific confessional, religious, or praxis matters. Within one stream of American jurisprudence, in debates over the relationship between “church and state,” theology has been understood as only having to do with training for a specific religious group’s ministry. Some scholarly societies promote the interpretation of Scripture within a specific context of faith even though they may permit membership outside the particular confessional perspective. Other scholarly societies explicitly avoid any one context of faith, do not promote any particular confessional perspective, and understand “theological” as one approach to the interpretation of Scripture alongside a multiplicity such as historical and literary interpretations. The more-general practice of the scholarly societies and the academic world is to understand “theological” with this broader meaning.

Three factors influence the shape of scholarly societies: geographical makeup of the members, the relationship between mission and Scripture, and the activities promoted by the organization. One must remember that, just as all groups of people, scholarly societies are made up of individuals whose lives have been shaped by diverse intellectual, social, religious, political, and personal factors.

Geography

Currently scholarly societies may be geographically categorized into regional, national, and international. The regional organizations range from informal gatherings to formalized entities that maintain membership lists, and some have publications. In areas where one or more graduate programs in theology, religion, and Bible exist, there are frequently informal gatherings of professors and sometimes students. They come together to share research, so are usually focused on scholarly interests and in some social context. Other organizations such as the Chicago Society of Biblical Research were founded in a specific area, but over the years have come to include scholars who reside at some distance from the core geographical area. The regional groups of the Society of Biblical Literature and American Academy of Religion have met since the mid-twentieth century. Some of these gatherings have formed their own separate regional consortia of societies, such as the Southeastern Consortium for the Study of Religion.

Many scholarly societies are nationally based, such as the Finnish Exegetical Society and the Canadian Society of Biblical Studies/Société canadienne des Études Bibliques. Others have developed multinationally, such as among the Scandinavian countries and the Australian and New Zealand Society for Theological Studies. Outside the European and North American contexts, a growing number of groups have emerged in Asia, such as the Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians and the Congress of Asian Theologians.

Few if any scholarly societies began with an international constituency. However, since the last quarter of the twentieth century, the Society of Biblical Literature has encouraged international participation and seen a growing number of international members, culminating in the establishment of its international meeting in 1983. Some groups are established by invitation only and include senior scholars from several continents (e.g., Studiorum Novi Testamenti Societas/Society for the Study of the New Testament). The International Organization for Masoretic Studies and the International Organization for Septuagint and Cognate Studies are membership organizations that are international not only in name but also in outlook and membership. Their contribution to theological interpretation is viewed by some as minimal since their focus is narrowly defined to a specific text of Scripture.

New regional, national, and international scholarly societies continue to emerge. As new scholarly societies develop, they reshape the existing (p 757)ones, so the map of scholarly societies is in flux.

Mission

In addition to geographical factors, scholarly societies may be categorized by their missions. The intellectual distinctions and disciplinary/area studies concerns in the university and seminary world more heavily influenced the missions than the confessing communities' perspectives on Scripture. Nevertheless, a growing tendency to encourage interaction between the academic and confessional communities seems to be emerging.

No identification of "scholarly societies" that have shaped the theological interpretation of Scripture at the beginning of the twenty-first century is complete without recognizing that few, even those with a specific mission related to biblical studies, focus on all of Scripture. The Society of Biblical Literature is one of the few international organizations whose mission is to foster scholarship related to the entire Bible. The mission of many scholarly societies in biblical studies is on either the OT (Hebrew Bible) or the NT (Early Christian Literature). This fact can be noted in any list of their organizational names. The Catholic Biblical Association of America's mission does promote the study of the entire Scripture (and this includes the Roman Catholic understanding of canon) within a confessing community; the interdependence of the academy and a religious body can be seen in this type of mission.

A series of explicitly Christian theological organizations and institutes adds further weight to the remarkable richness, diversity, and complexity of persons gathered to advance the theological interpretation of Scripture. Among these groups one must mention the Evangelical Theological Society, Institute for Biblical Research, Academy of Homiletics, Society for Pastoral Theology, American Bible Society, Ecumenical Institute, Center of Theological Inquiry at Princeton, American Theological Society, and United Bible Societies.

Societies that interface with the theological interpretation of Scripture include those whose missions are focused in a variety of specializations seen in almost every discipline/area study of the university world. A list of nearly 1,500 organizations has occasional or standing groups that engage the interpretation of Scripture. These include the following North American organizations, many with counterparts in other regions of the world: North American Society of Christian Ethics, Association of Jewish Studies, the American Theological Library Association, American Academy of Religion, Society for the Scientific Study of Religion, American Schools of Oriental Research, Biblical Archaeology Society, American Society of Church History, American Society of Papyrologists, Middle Eastern Studies Association, North American Patristic Society, and even an enormous disciplinary organization like the Modern Language Association.

Activities

Another way to categorize the scholarly societies is to look at the range of activities they promote. These activities are diverse and depend almost entirely on the staff infrastructure of the organization. The influence of scholarly societies is frequently gauged by the quantity or range of activities they manage. Quantity and range of activities, however, do not address the quality of those activities, and quality is important to every scholarly society even if its measurement is diverse.

The range of scholarly society activities is incredibly broad and dynamic. Publication is often thought to be the hallmark activity of these scholarly societies. In fact, many of the organizations were founded for the purpose of publishing a journal. The range of societal publications has gone beyond journals to include books, reference works, translations of the Bible, and an increasing number of digital products available through organizational Web sites. The scholarly standards emerge from this activity of publications.

Increasingly, studies of the scholarly societies have indicated that another hallmark is the solidarity benefit, providing opportunities for members to gather socially and to share their work. Most have annual meetings that provide an opportunity for members to gather for the sharing of research, ideas, and the opportunity to see the latest books and software for the interpretation of Scripture.

Closely connected to this networking benefit is fulfilling the professional needs of members, whether teachers, religious leaders, students, or librarians. While these societies have central missions related to the interpretation of Scripture, they have increasingly recognized that members need jobs and seek advancement in their occupations. Professional and ethical standards have begun to develop as a central concern.

Finally, only a few of these scholarly societies are involved in public policy issues. Certainly, far (p 758) fewer of the scholarly societies entrusted with the theological interpretation of Scripture are as engaged in the significant contemporary public debate as their counterparts in other university and seminary disciplines/areas of study.

Conclusion

The scholarly societies involved centrally or peripherally in the theological interpretation of Scripture have extended the voices speaking on these texts and traditions beyond the confessing communities. The historical perspective of these scholarly societies is minimal compared to the long history of the confessing communities who have interpreted the Bible. Yet, since individuals often reside in both communities, a synergy has frequently emerged. As the twenty-first century begins, things look bright for interdependence, without loss of identities, among those involved in the theological interpretation of Scripture. More awareness and analysis of the interrelationships is needed, however, given the increasing hermeneutical prominence of “interpretative communities” after the work of Stanley Fish and others.

Kent Harold Richards

Song of Songs

From beginning to end, the Song of Songs contains poetic speeches of the most sensuous kind. An unnamed woman and an unnamed man speak lovingly to each other and also occasionally describe their love to an anonymous group of women, often referred to as the chorus. The topics of the poems are love and intimacy between a man and a woman, with no reference at all to God, the covenant, the history of Israel, or anything that has explicitly theological significance. What then does theological interpretation mean when it comes to the Song of Songs?

History of Interpretation

The history of the interpretation of the Song of Songs begins around 100 CE with the earliest preserved comments on the book. The voice that breaks the silence is that of Rabbi Aqiba, who famously stated: “Whoever sings the Song of Songs with a tremulous voice in a banquet hall and (so) treats it as a sort of ditty has no share in the world to come” (quoted from Murphy 13). Though brief, this statement says much about the early understanding of the book. First, those who were singing it with a tremulous voice obviously treated the Song’s sensual imagery literally, while Aqiba, certainly representative of institutional sentiments, sought to repress such readings.

Aqiba himself treated the Song in a manner similar to that which dominated synagogue and church until relatively recently, as an allegory. Approaching the Song as an allegory is a way of understanding its message as different from its surface meaning. The most commonly held form of allegorical interpretation of the Song in the synagogue understood the man to represent God and the woman to represent Israel. The story of the relationship of the man and the woman in the Song was actually a veiled way to present the history of God’s redemption of Israel.

The targum to the Song (ca. 700–900 CE) is a case in point. The targum paraphrases the first unit of the Song (1:2–4), in which the woman, understood as Israel, begs the man, God, to take her into his chamber; it interprets this request as Israel’s desire that God bring it into the promised land. In other words, the Song begins with the exodus from Egypt. From this point, the targum’s allegorical interpretation follows Israel through its history.

Christian interpretation followed this strategy, only making necessary adjustments for its distinctive religious beliefs. Interpreters such as Hippolytus, Origen, Jerome, and Bernard of Clairvaux read the Song as an allegorical expression of the love between Jesus (the man) and the church or individual Christian (the woman). Often the details of the text were pressed into the service of a theological reading. This is illustrated by Cyril of Alexandria’s comment on 1:13, that the woman’s two breasts represented the OT and NT, and the sachet of myrrh that lodges between them stood for Jesus Christ, who spanned the two parts of the Bible.

Historical allegory was the interpretative method of choice from the earliest witnesses down to the mid-nineteenth century, but it was not the only type of allegorical interpretation. Also popular, particularly among some Jewish interpreters, was a mystical or philosophical allegorical understanding of the book. From the medieval period we have the example of the interpretation of Levi ben Gershom (thirteenth century), an Aristotelian, who distinguished between the material intellect, the acquired intellect, and the Active Intellect (Kellner). The last stood for God, and the first was the capacity for God's creatures to learn. The acquired intellect was knowledge accumulated through life. Levi read the Song as an allegory on two levels. The man represents the Active Intellect and the woman the material (p 759)intellect; the Song shows them in dialogue, and their union is "a human being's highest perfection and greatest felicity" (Kellner xxi).

One further twist on the allegorical approach to the Song is provided by Don Isaac Abravanel, a rabbi from the sixteenth century (Pope 110–11). In his reading, the man is Solomon, and the woman stands for wisdom. Thus, their union represents Solomon.

No matter what the particular brand, the evidence is overwhelming that the dominant interpretative approach to the Song up to the mid-nineteenth century was allegorical. On the rare occasion that a theologian objected to the traditional interpretation and concluded that the Song was really about the intimate love of a man and a woman, this conclusion was typically accompanied by the argument that the book was not worthy of the canon. Theodore of Mopsuestia (350–428 CE) was such a theologian, and his interpretation was judged "not fitting the mouth of a crazy woman" by his own student Theodoret (Davidson 3).

Though allegorical interpretation of the Song held almost exclusive sway over the synagogue and church for many centuries, the nineteenth century saw a dramatic swing toward the position that the Song concerned human, rather than divine, love. Three factors led to this shift.

In the first place, allegory lost force as an interpretative strategy. To be sure, ancient and modern literature has allegories. Perhaps the best-known allegory, particularly to Christian audiences, is Pilgrim's Progress, by John Bunyan. As this book illustrates, however, true allegories do not hide their "deeper meaning." After all, the main character is a man named Christian, who is journeying toward the Celestial City, encountering obstacles like the Slough of Despond. On the other hand, the Song of Songs never hints at another level of meaning. Why take the two breasts of 1:13 as a reference to the OT and NT? For that matter, are there any indications within the text that the man represents God and the woman represents Israel? The answer is obviously negative. The allegorical interpretation was kept alive by the force of tradition, and in the post-Enlightenment period, this was not adequate to sustain it.

In the second place, the nineteenth century witnessed the rediscovery of ancient Near Eastern cultures, as the architecture and literature of Sumer, Babylon, Assyria, and Egypt, among others, were excavated and interpreted. Among that literature were a number of love poems that shared many of the themes, poetic devices, and metaphors of the Song of Songs. These texts were nonreligious, and this fact led many to conclude that the Song of Songs was also human love poetry (Watson; White; Fox; Westenholz; Cooper).

Finally, the nineteenth century was also a time of increased Western political involvement in the Middle East. In new ways biblical scholars became aware of Arab customs, and often connections were made. As relates to interpretation of the Song, there is a famous interchange between a German consul to Damascus named J. G. Wetzstein and the well-known Lutheran commentator Franz Delitzsch. Wetzstein attended weddings of local Arab leaders and noted in amazement that the songs they sang at their celebrations sounded similar to the Song. Delitzsch cites Wetzstein's correspondence in his commentary.

During this period the conclusion of most scholars was that the Song had been fundamentally misunderstood in the preceding centuries. It was read as an allegory when in reality it was love poetry. In retrospect, it appears that the synagogue and the church imbibed a form of Neoplatonic philosophy that created a contrast between spirituality and sexuality (so Davidson). The body and its desires were something to be repressed as inimical to one's relationship with God. If this is true, how could there be a book as sensual as the Song in the canon? To resolve the tension, an allegorical strategy of interpretation was adopted to shift the meaning of text from what it seemed to say to what it "really" said (Phipps). The Song of Songs is an unfortunate example of the tendency to use theology/philosophy to skew the interpretation of a text.

For the past century and a half, interpretation of the Song has moved away from allegory, but what has replaced it? Further, and more central to the purpose of this essay, if the Song is not about the relationship between God and his people, then what is the theological contribution of this book?

As the allegorical approach began to fade, most scholars adopted what has been called the dramatic approach to the Song. Delitzsch himself argued that the poetry of the Song told a story about Solomon and a woman named the Shulammite (6:13). He believes that the Shulammite is an actual historical figure. But, unlike many before and after him, he does not think she is the Egyptian princess or any prominent woman. Instead, he sees her as "a country maiden of humble rank, who, by her beauty and by the purity of her soul, filled Solomon with a love for her which drew him away from the wantonness (p 760) of polygamy, and made for him the primitive idea of marriage, as it is described in Gen. ii 23ff., a self-experienced reality” (Delitzsch 3). He treats the story as a drama consisting of six acts, each with two scenes.

While Delitzsch represents the so-called two-character dramatic approach, the more recent commentary by Provan argues in favor of another popular interpretation that sees three characters. The Song is not a story about the love between a man and a woman, pure and simple, but rather concerns a love triangle. In Provan’s own version of the story, the Shulammitte has already entered Solomon’s harem, but she has preserved her love for the young shepherd boy back home. The moral of the story is that true love overcomes coerced legal love.

Scholars have suggested other approaches to the book. The cultic interpretation of Pope (anticipated by Meek), the political interpretation of Stadelmann, and the psychological interpretation of Landy have not won many adherents. The main competitor to the dramatic approach today is the anthological interpretation of the Song. Since this view represents my own opinion (see Longman), I will describe it in the next section, though that discussion should be seen as completing our survey of the history of interpretation.

Hearing the Message of the Song of Songs

The problem with the dramatic approach is highlighted by its inability to settle on a single story. There are as many permutations of the drama, even to the point of disagreement over whether there are two or three main characters, as there are scholarly advocates. Every story has gaps that the reader must fill in, but the gaps in the Song are too large to be filled in with confidence. It appears that scholars are not reading a story from the text, but rather creating a story.

The Song of Songs is, thus, what its title implies: a single song constructed from a number of different songs. It is an anthology of love poems, bound together by a unity of purpose, consistency of character, and a few repeated refrains. The goal of the interpreter is not to describe the story, but rather to unpack the rich metaphors and explore the strong emotions expressed by the poet.

To be sure, those who recognize the anthological nature of the Song disagree about the number of individual poems. My own conclusion that there are twenty-three poems is closer to Falk than to Goulder, who believes there are only fourteen songs, or Landberger, who does not give us a full study but gives us the impression that virtually every verse is a separate song. But in reality it does not really matter how many poems there are since the number does not affect interpretation.

Whether there are fourteen or a hundred poems, the Song's primary significance relates to love and sexuality, an important aspect of our humanity. The Song affirms human love, intimate relationship, sensuality, and sexuality. According to the Song, love is mutual, exclusive, total, and beautiful (Hubbard 260–63). The Song not only celebrates love; it also warns its readers not to hurry love (2:7; 3:5; 8:4) because sometimes the desire for intimacy brings pain (5:2–6:3; so Schwab).

Song of Songs and the Canon

The Song is one of only a handful of OT books whose canonicity was questioned (Beckwith 1–2, 275–76, 279, 282–84, 308–22). Those questioning its authority did so because they doubted that a book of such sensuality could be sacred. The fact that God's name is not found in the book (the supposed occurrence in 8:6 is unlikely) added to the skepticism. Their doubts, as we have suggested above, rested on a problematic contrast between spirituality and sexuality. Even those early witnesses that demonstrate the Song was widely accepted as canonical (2 Esdras, Josephus, Aquila, Melito, Tertullian) did so based on a faulty understanding of the book's interpretation. Unfortunately, the book's immediate reception is lost in obscurity.

In any case, once the false dichotomy between body and spirit is rejected, it becomes clear why such a book might be found in the canon. God loves his human creatures as whole people, not just as temporarily embodied spirits. Love is a powerful emotion and sexuality a large part of the human experience, bringing great joy and pain. The book's affirmations and warnings about love express God's concern for his people. As the last section explains, the book also makes a powerful contribution to biblical theology.

Song of Songs and Theology

Contrary to preconceptions, the Song of Songs fits into the rest of the canon as an integral part of a biblical theology of love and sexuality. As Tribble has pointed out, the story begins in the Garden. Adam and Eve are there, naked, and feeling no shame. The implication is that, before sin, the two are completely open with one another, not only sexually, but also psychologically and spiritually. Genesis 3, however, narrates the fall, at which (p 761)time the alienation between God and his human creatures has repercussions in the relationship between Adam and Eve. They cover themselves from the gaze of the other, and God removes them from the Garden. Reading the Song of Songs, in which many poems present the man and the woman in the Garden, enjoying one another's nakedness, makes one think of Eden and understand that the Song is about the redemption of sexuality. However, it is an already-not yet redemption because of the continuing problems acknowledged by some of the poems (5:2–6:3).

Furthermore, when understood within the context of the canon as a whole, the Song makes yet another important theological contribution. To be sure, God is not named or even alluded to within the book. Nonetheless, by celebrating the intimacy of the male-female relationship, it reminds us of the pervasive use of the marriage metaphor to throw light on God's relationship with his people. In the OT, that metaphor is used negatively, in that Israel's apostasy is often likened to adultery (Ezek. 16, 23; Hos. 1–3), but behind this negative use stands the positive statement that God's relationship with his people is like a marriage (see Jer. 2:1). Accordingly, the more we understand the depth of desire and the power of marital intimacy, the more we will understand our relationship with God. The exclusivity of the marriage relationship, as opposed to other human relationships, also makes it an appropriate vehicle to give insight into the divine-human relationship. Of course, in the NT the Christian's relationship with Jesus is compared to the relationship of a husband and wife (Eph. 5:21–33), and our ultimate union with our Lord at the end of days is described as a wedding (Rev. 19:6–8).

See also Allegory; Sexuality

Bibliography

Beckwith, R. The Old Testament Canon of the New Testament Church. SPCK, 1985; Cooper, J. S. "New Cuneiform Parallels to the Song of Songs." JBL 90 (1971): 157–62; Davidson, R. "Theology of Sexuality in the Song of Songs: Return to Eden." AUSS 27 (1989): 1–19; Delitzsch, F. Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon. German, 1885, trans. M. Easton. Eerdmans, 1975; Falk, M. Love Lyrics in the Bible. Almond, 1982; Fox, M. "Love, Passion, and Perception in Israelite and Egyptian Love Poetry." JBL 102 (1983): 1–14; idem. The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Poetry. University of Wisconsin Press, 1985; Goulder, M. The Song of Fourteen Songs. JSOTSup 36. JSOT, 1986; Hubbard, D. Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon. Communicator's Commentary. Word, 1991; Kellner, M. Commentary on the Song of Songs: Levi ben Gershom (Gersonides). Yale University Press, 1998; Landsberger, B. "Poetic Units within the Song of Songs." JBL 73 (1954): 513–28; Landy, F. Paradoxes of Paradise. Almond, 1983; Longman, T., III. The Song of Songs. NICOT. Eerdmans, 2001; Meek, T. "Babylonian Parallels to the Song of Songs." JBL 43 (1924): 245–52; idem. "Canticles and the Tammuz Cult." AJSL 39 (1922–23):

219–28; Murphy, R. The Song of Songs. Hermeneia. Fortress, 1990; Phipps, W. “The Plight of the Song of Songs.” JAAR 42 (1974): 82–100; Pope, M. Song of Songs. AB 7C. Doubleday, 1977; Provan, I. Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs. NIVAC. Zondervan, 2001; Schwab, G. The Song of Songs’ Cautionary Message concerning Human Love. P. Lang, 2002; Stadelmann, L. Love and Politics. Paulist, 1990; Tribble, P. God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality. Fortress, 1978; Watson, W. G. E. “Some Ancient Near Eastern Parallels to the Song of Songs.” Pages 253–71 in Words Remembered, Texts Renewed, ed. J. Davies et al. Sheffield Academic Press, 1995; Westenholz, J. “Love Lyrics from the Ancient Near East.” Pages 2471–84 in vol. 4 of Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, ed. J. Sasson. Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1995; Wetzstein, J. “Die syrische Dreschtafel.” Zeitschrift für Ethnologie 5 (1873): 270–301; White, J. A Study of the Language of Love in the Song of Songs and Ancient Egyptian Love Poetry. Scholars Press, 1975.

Tremper Longman III

Soul See Human Being, Doctrine of

Source Criticism

Source criticism, which has also gone by the name “Literary Criticism,” is an attempt to uncover written documents lying behind a given text (e.g., 2 Kings 18:13–20:19; cf. Isa. 36:1–39:8), a biblical book (e.g., Isaiah), or several books (e.g., the Pentateuch, Joshua through 2 Kings, or the Synoptic Gospels). Source critics take as indicators of such documents the presence of alleged contradictions between texts (e.g., how many pairs of animals did Noah take on board the ark? cf. Gen. 6:19 with 7:2), of doublets or triplets (multiple versions of a narrative with the same basic plot: cf. Gen. 12:10–13:1 with 20:1–18 and 26:6–11), and of diverse styles (cf. the simple narrative style of 2:4b–25 with the more flowing style of 1:1–2:4a). Source critics also look for recurrences of these styles, finding the simple narrative styles of 2:4b–25 in places in the rest of Genesis, as well as in parts of Exodus and Numbers. The style of Deuteronomy is said to appear as well in Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, and Jeremiah, but not elsewhere (or else rarely) in the Pentateuch. Consequently, source critics offer as an explanation for these problems the Documentary Hypothesis, with its conclusion that as many as four (or more) narrative documents and a number of separate law codes stand behind the Pentateuch.

(p 762) Another well-known hypothesis from source critics is the so-called Four-Source Hypothesis, designed to explain the relationships among the Synoptic Gospels. It is well known that Matthew, Mark, and Luke (though not John) describe many of the same actions and teachings of Jesus. The question rises, therefore, of why the Synoptics share so much material (sometimes nearly word for word). The Four-Source Hypothesis provides answers.

The first source typically is said to be the Gospel of Mark, which provided the framework, many of the narratives, and some of the teachings of Jesus—the biblical texts common to the three Synoptic Gospels. Source critics note that Matthew shares about 90 percent of Mark and Luke about 55 percent. In the areas where they overlap, one sometimes diverges from the other two (cf. Mark 13:14 and Matt. 24:15 versus Luke 21:20). Matthew and Mark may agree against Luke, or Luke and Mark may agree against Matthew, but rarely if ever do Matthew and Luke agree against Mark. The remaining material in Matthew and Luke is ascribed typically to three sources. The first, called Q (for the German word Quelle, “well”), is a hypothetical source consisting mainly of sayings of Jesus, sometimes with short narratives providing the setting for the sayings. Accordingly, the teachings and narrative material common to Matthew and Luke but missing from Mark are attributed to Q (e.g., the Sermon on the Mount/Plain). In addition, both Matthew and Luke report sayings (cf. Matt. 18:23–35; Luke 10:29–37) and narratives (cf. Matt. 1:18–2:23; Luke 1:5–2:52) unique to each. Hence, scholars further hypothesize sources M and L for Matthew and Luke respectively. (Some scholars, however, think that the materials unique to Matthew and Luke also may have been taken from Q, so they speak of a Two-Source Hypothesis.)

Such theories are not theologically neutral. For one thing, they depend on a view of Scripture that allows for differences in presentation, and perhaps even outright contradictions between passages. Moreover, they argue that “contradictions” and diverse styles imply different authors for the different sources lying behind the received form of the biblical text. The theories cast doubt, therefore, on such widely held, traditional views as the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, single authorship of prophetic books (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and many of the Minor Prophets as well), and of the Psalter plus other books. Differences in style and theology within the Pauline corpus cause some source critics to question whether Paul wrote Ephesians, Colossians, 2 Thessalonians, 1 and 2 Timothy, and Titus. Thus, source criticism typically is not neutral toward traditional views about the authorship of books in the Bible. Further, the suggestion that the Bible contains “contradictions” (or historical or other kinds of errors) is incompatible with certain views of its inspiration. For some people, therefore, source criticism, or at least many of its results, is simply unacceptable.

It need not be, however. Since, for example, Gen. 6:19 records that God told Noah to take one pair of every kind of animal on board the ark and 7:2 records that God told Noah to take one pair of unclean animals and seven pairs of clean animals, that difference demands an explanation. By means of the Documentary Hypothesis, source critics offer a plausible explanation for the quandary, that the author of the Pentateuch (Moses or someone later) employed sources that did not always agree in detail though they were compatible at some other level. In this particular case both texts say Noah preserved representatives from each animal species. On the other hand, the distinction between clean and unclean animals in Genesis may foreshadow the distinction in Lev. 11. Hence, the final author preserved both versions of the Flood narrative and their distinctive insights into God's work without forcing the versions to agree. If the resulting Scripture is less tidy than modern readers might be comfortable with, the benefit in keeping all views would seem to source critics to outweigh the loss.

Another example is the suggested use of sources in 1 and 2 Samuel with conflicting views as to whether Israel should have a king like the other nations. Some narratives praise Saul as a man who stood head and shoulders above others (1 Sam. 10:20–27), God's choice for Israel's king (9:1–10:16; 11:1–15). Others condemn the monarchy in general (ch. 8; 10:17–19) and Saul in particular (13:1–15a). Why does this difference exist? Perhaps they derived from different hands. Why did the author use them both? Perhaps it was because the monarchy was a complex institution. On the one hand, kings could muster armies and lead them to battle against enemies, in particular the Philistines. On the other hand, kings would tax the people, take their sons for soldiers and their daughters for servants, concubines, or wives. The author of 1 and 2 Samuel, therefore, included narratives showing both sides of the issue, but came down in favor of the Davidic monarchy (2 Sam. 7). He had arrived at a compromise in which monarchy under God was acceptable, but (p 763) Israel's monarchy had gotten off on the wrong foot with the wrong king. Ultimately, of course, the NT sided with the author of 2 Sam. 7, seeing Jesus as the fulfillment of the Davidic dynasty.

See also Gospels

Bibliography

Beardslee, W. Literary Criticism of the New Testament. Fortress, 1970; Eissfeldt, O. "The Prophetic Literature." Pages 115–61 in The Old Testament and Modern Study, ed. H. H. Rowley. Oxford University Press, 1961; Farmer, W. The Synoptic Problem. Macmillan, 1964; Grant, R. Pages 59–73, 107–18, 171–202 in Historical Introduction to the New Testament. Harper & Row, 1963; Griesbach, J. "Inquisitio in fontes, unde evangelistae suas de resurrectione Domini narrationes hauserint." 1783. Pages 241–56 in vol. 2 of Griesbachii opus. Acad. Jena, 1789; Habel, N. Literary Criticism of the Old Testament. Fortress, 1971; Kee, H. C. Pages 81–101, 221–305 in Understanding the New Testament. 5th ed. Prentice Hall, 1993; Kümmel, W. G. Pages 33–59, 237–72 in Introduction to the New Testament. 14th ed. Abingdon, 1966; North, C. R. “Pentateuchal Criticism.” Pages 48–83 in The Old Testament and Modern Study, ed. H. H. Rowley. Oxford University Press, 1961; Soggin, J. A. Introduction to the Old Testament. 3d ed. Westminster John Knox, 1989.

Paul L. Redditt

Special Revelation See Revelation

Speech-Act Theory

The idea that language is fundamentally concerned with the stating of facts and the representing of “states of affairs” has exerted something of a stranglehold over the modern mind through the last two centuries, evidenced in the distinctively modern style of “historical-critical” commentary so beloved of professional biblical interpretation. In the words of Wittgenstein, it is almost as if “a picture held us captive. And we could not get outside it” (§115). In his 1955 William James lectures at Harvard, philosopher of language J. L. Austin began to work at undermining this picture. The lectures, posthumously published as How to Do Things with Words, gave birth to the contemporary study of “speech acts”: acts performed by, in, or with speech.

In particular, Austin sought to distinguish between the act performed in saying something and the act performed by saying something, labeling these “illocutionary” and “perlocutionary” acts respectively. When John Searle formalized Austin’s essentially oral tradition into a written theory of Speech Acts, he turned it into a logical structure of five fundamental kinds of illocutionary acts, whereby all language uses are, or are combinations of, assertive, directive, commissive, expressive, or declarative acts (Expression, 1–29).

Speech-act theory, the resultant subdiscipline of the philosophy of language, still encompasses a wide range of views on precisely how pragmatic, logical, formal, or rhetorical its concerns are supposed to be. Corresponding to such diversity, one finds an equally varied range of applications of the theory to the various hermeneutical and theological tasks of biblical interpretation.

The Central Concerns of Speech-Act Theory

The first point to clarify is just how far speech-act theory moves from the idea that all language is fact-stating. In an approach that guaranteed confusion on this issue, Austin's work begins by distinguishing between the descriptive (or "constative") use of language to describe states of affairs, and the "performative" use of language, which does a variety of other things, only to conclude that no such distinction could be maintained (91). The constative use turns out in fact to be a kind of performance after all, and "the class of exceptions thus swallows the supposedly normative class" (Fish 231). Austin concludes that there are five different kinds of language use, of which the constative is one, and this scheme is essentially adopted by Searle, albeit considerably tidied up. The point often missed here is that Austin and Searle are both allowing the "descriptive" use of language to be a performative act, like any other use of language, but demonstrating ways in which it is not the same type of performative act as other types. Differing views on this issue largely explain the differing uses of speech-act theory in biblical and theological studies.

A second feature of speech-act theory is its isolation of the illocutionary act as one of the most important aspects of language use. An illocution is an act performed in saying something, and examples might include "I promise to be there tomorrow," or "I believe in God the Father, maker of heaven and earth." The act in question is not so much the result of the spoken words, as an act performed instantaneously in the uttering of the words, by virtue of what the words are taken to mean in context. The person who says "I do" at the appropriate point in a wedding ceremony (in certain cultures only, of course) cannot follow it up moments later with "Actually, I don't." The conventions that make the first utterance a promise of marriage are not in place to make the second utterance an undoing of that promise.

The illocution is probably the most significant analytical tool offered by speech-act theory, but (p 764) again is interpreted in widely differing ways. Austin's first example of an illocution was "He urged me to shoot her" (102), although few would now accept that "urging" is an illocution. Austin also focused on heavily institutionalized instances of illocutions, such as the wedding ceremony or the conventions whereby a queen is entitled to name a ship. While these have had a memorable pedagogical value, they obscure the more fundamental point that most speech acts operate outside of institutionalized settings, and thus invite consideration of just how it is (and by whom) that words are taken in a certain way.

It is also clear that one "locution" (the simple uttering of certain words) can typically be the vehicle of several illocutions, whether intended or unintended. "It's hot in here" can be a statement, a complaint about the heating, a request to open the window, and so forth. Indeed, most locutions are multilayered in some way, and will often admit of unintended illocutions when approached from angles or agendas not envisaged. This is the bread and butter of historical criticism when it attempts to unravel “I permit no woman to teach or to have authority over a man” (1 Tim. 2:12 NRSV): one way to express the matter at stake is to ask which illocution(s) the text supports. Indeed, it has been argued that the meaning of a text is best understood as its “illocutionary act potential” (Alston), and this does clarify certain issues in interpretation, although debate will continue over the question of how far the speaker/author’s intended illocution should govern interpretation.

If there is any agreement on what illocutionary analysis achieves, it is that it draws together the issues of authorial (or speaker’s) intention and the audience’s understanding, by examining what conventions exist within the public domain of both the author and the audience. Speech-act theory insists that language does not exist idly to make certain sounds, but is always language in action, and usually communicative action. The conventions in place then set certain constraints within any given situation on how a communicative speech act can be understood or interpreted. It is in balancing the various elements of this communicative process that disagreement exists among speech-act theorists.

A third matter, of importance especially to biblical and theological critics, is the vexed question of how far the criteria of speech acts can be transferred to written texts. The greater “distance” introduced here between the author’s “act” and the reception of that act by some future reader clearly allows for a greater role to be played by the conventions in place in the reader’s situation. Different theological views typically view this as either a problem or an opportunity, but as the development of secular literary-critical “speech-act criticism” demonstrates, there are no reasons in principle why speech-act theory cannot apply to written texts (Briggs, Words, 73–103).

Once this has been established, a further distinction then occurs between those who focus on the text itself as a communicative act between the author and the reader, and those who utilize speech-act theory to examine the workings of performative acts that occur within the world of the text, such as from one character to another within a narrative (Buss 125). In theological circles this is the watershed between those seeking a communicative account of the nature of Scripture (Wolterstorff; Vanhoozer; Ward) and those seeking clarification of certain hermeneutically interesting qualities of particular illocutions that occur in Scripture (Evans; Thiselton, New Horizons, 272–312; Neufeld; Briggs). The dividing line between these two approaches is blurred, with most authors having an interest in both of them, but it is a significant methodological distinction, which results in an emphasis on different aspects of speech-act theory.

The notion that language is performative in some sense is now well accepted, but the significance of this insight remains widely disputed. It needs to be noted that an emphasis on the idea that “descriptive” speech acts are also performative finds itself very much at home in avowedly postmodern philosophies and criticisms. Both Stanley Fish and Jacques Derrida have found Austin’s work (though less so that of Searle) congenial to their own concerns. For Fish, the reading community determines what speech act was performed in the text (197–245, 268–92). For Derrida, the absence of the author to judge this issue allows performative acts to freewheel in the deconstructive space between conventionalized acts and readerly presence (1–23). Postmodernism pulls speech-act theory toward the perlocutionary, arguing that what matters with texts is what effect they have on readers, and in this connection biblical criticism has sometimes wanted to harness speech-act theory to aid the concerns of rhetorical criticism (e.g., Botha). It seems unlikely that the ever-burgeoning industry of reading the Bible rhetorically either needs or wants such help. One recent survey of the many and various uses of speech-act theory in biblical interpretation reveals an extraordinary diversity (p 765) of aims and achievements in this area (Briggs, “Uses”). Here we shall simply consider some of the ways in which the theological interpretation of Scripture might be served by speech-act considerations.

Speech-Act Theory and the Theological Interpretation of Scripture

As long ago as 1932 Karl Barth wrote of “The Speech of God as the Act of God” (Barth 143–62). Then throughout Church Dogmatics, he demonstrated what it would mean to take the biblical text as the vehicle of the word of God, at every point allowing God to be the one at work in and through the words of the text. In many ways, Nicholas Wolterstorff’s 1995 work Divine Discourse represents a long-overdue attempt to explore just how far the conceptuality of speech-act theory can clarify such concerns. Wolterstorff argues that divine illocutions can be carried by human locutions, and that since the performing of illocutions in the public domain is what it is to speak, it can thus be literally true that God speaks in Scripture (75–129). He in fact concludes that God’s speaking is a topic generally obscured (even in Barth) by the idea of God’s self-revelation, and he sets out something of a manifesto for viewing the biblical text as divine speech, understood as God's speech actions. Since Scripture is evidently also human speech actions, he advocates the notion of "double discourse" and calls for a corresponding double hermeneutic: to interpret the mediating human discourse for human illocutions, and also the mediated divine discourse for divine ones (183–222).

It is debatable how far this manifesto moves us forward in practice when confronted with the task of interpreting particular passages of Scripture, although it does certainly offer clearly articulated ways of understanding the Bible as God's own voice. Wolterstorff is weaker at explaining how (if at all) one should arbitrate between differing construals of what it is that God was intending to say through a scriptural passage. Arguing that "the goal of interpretation ... is to discover what counts as what," he ultimately appeals to the idea that the "speaker and audience ought to count X as Y" (84, 183); but the evidence of biblical interpretation, even within self-confessedly Christian communities, is that actual agreement can be thin here.

Working within a similar framework to that which Wolterstorff outlines, interest has turned in recent years to the notion of Scripture as God's communicative act with its readers. To this end Kevin Vanhoozer has pursued the idea of "Scripture acts": the communicative action of God in Scripture seen in "covenantal terms" (First Theology, 159–203). By this he means that the author and reader are parties to a "covenant of discourse," with all the rights and obligations which that covenantal language suggests.

These approaches frequently suggest that interpretation is an ethical act in which the interpreter is morally responsible for their use of the text, and their handling of the "rights" of the author. Such concerns situate texts within a communicative context of author, text, and reader, and this too invites a speech-act approach by way of correlating the textual locution with the authorial illocution, and even with the perlocutionary effect upon the reader. This approach is to some extent still a general theory of interpretation, albeit focused on the specific case of the Christian community reading the biblical text (thus Vanhoozer, Meaning, parts 1 and 2, an account entirely structured around this communicative triad).

Vanhoozer goes further in offering the intriguing, if speculative, possibility that the word of God as locution corresponds to the Father, while as illocution it corresponds to the Son, and in perlocutionary effect it is the domain of the Spirit (First Theology, 148–58; Meaning, 455–59). His concern to articulate an appropriate doctrine of Scripture as divine communicative action further allows him to explore various creative possibilities with respect to speech-act interpretations of actual texts. Moving increasingly toward an explicitly theological hermeneutic, he develops the idea of a “canonical illocution,” noting that different illocutions come into focus when a text is considered in its entirety rather than as a series of separate speech acts. For example, the book of Jonah as a whole may have the illocutionary function of critiquing ethnocentrism (First Theology, 192), which occurs not at the level of any specific locution but in terms of the whole text. John’s Gospel also proves to be fertile soil for such a consideration of theological communicative action (First Theology, 236–308). The doctrine of Scripture has most recently been treated in speech-act terms in relation to the notion of the “sufficiency” of Scripture. Speech-act theory provides sharp critical tools for examining in what sense a text can be sufficient in itself, and in what sense such sufficiency has necessarily to be seen within some communicative framework such as speech-act theory indicates (Ward).

A recent symposium on philosophy of language and biblical interpretation demonstrated both (p 766) this theological/doctrinal appeal of speech-act concerns as well as the relevance of speech-act theory for the interpretation of specific texts (Bartholomew et al.). It is evident that when scriptural texts concern themselves with performative utterances (in a “strong” sense, as other than assertions), speech-act theory will elucidate the hermeneutical issues involved. Work in this area has been sporadic, but includes the christologically oriented confessions, boasting, and slogans of 1 John (Neufeld); the speech acts of confession, forgiveness, and teaching (Briggs, Words); and the conventions surrounding blessing and cursing in the OT (Thiselton, “Power”).

On a hermeneutical level, it is significant to note that the successful performance of an illocutionary act requires an investment of the speaking/writing self in the communicative act, an investment with certain public commitments and entailments. This led Donald Evans to describe a “logic of self-involvement,” which commits the biblical interpreter to various theological claims. Reformulated as “a hermeneutic of self-involvement” (Briggs, Words, 147–82), it offers considerable scope for exploring how the illocutions remain effective among us in the process of personal involvement and transformation in the reading of Scripture.

As Anthony Thiselton has observed (“Promise,” 223–39), the suitably open-ended phrase “the promise of hermeneutics” invites us to hold together the biblical notion of divine promise, the paradigmatic role of promise as an illocutionary act, and readerly self-involvement. This is the task of an expectant reading of Scripture that can do justice to the many forms and functions of the speech acts, both divine and human, found within it.

Bibliography

Alston, W. Illocutionary Acts and Sentence Meaning. Cornell University Press, 2000; Austin, J. L. How to Do Things with Words. Oxford University Press, 1962; Barth, K. Church Dogmatics. Vol. 1, The Doctrine of the Word of God, Part 1. 1932. Reprint, T&T Clark, 1975; Bartholomew, C., et al., eds. After Pentecost. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2001; Botha, J. E. Jesus and the Samaritan Woman. NovTSup 45. Brill, 1991; Briggs, R. "The Uses of Speech-Act Theory in Biblical Interpretation." CurBS 9 (2001): 229–76; idem. Words in Action. T&T Clark, 2001; Buss, M. "Potential and Actual Interactions between Speech Act Theory and Biblical Studies." Semeia 41 (1988): 125–34; Derrida, J. Limited Inc. Northwestern University Press, 1988; Evans, D. The Logic of Self-Involvement. SCM, 1963; Fish, S. Is There a Text in This Class? Harvard University Press, 1980; Neufeld, D. Reconceiving Texts as Speech Acts. BIS 7. Brill, 1994; Searle, J. Expression and Meaning. Cambridge University Press, 1979; idem. Speech Acts. Cambridge University Press, 1969; Thiselton, A. "Communicative Action and Promise in Interdisciplinary, Biblical, and Theological Hermeneutics." Pages 133–239 in The Promise of Hermeneutics. By R. Lundin, C. Walhout, and A. Thiselton. Eerdmans, 1999; idem. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. HarperCollins, 1992; idem. "The Supposed Power of Words in the Biblical Writings." JTS 25 (1974): 283–99; Vanhoozer, K. First Theology. InterVarsity, 2002; idem. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998; Ward, T. Word and Supplement. Oxford University Press, 2002; Wittgenstein, L. Philosophical Investigations. Blackwell, 1967; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Richard S. Briggs

Spirituality/Spiritual Formation

The biblical word translated "spirit" in English means wind or breath. It is frequently used in the biblical languages as a metaphor for the life-giving God breathing life into his creation and creatures. It is the Invisible that is behind and gives energy to the visible: "The wind blows where it chooses, and you hear the sound of it, but you do not know where it comes from or where it goes. So it is with every one who is born of the Spirit [Wind]" (Jesus in John 3:8 NRSV). In the biblical revelation "Spirit" is the Third Person of the Trinity, God personally and creatively present and at work in his world. Three representative texts mark the contours of the formative work of Spirit in our world.

Genesis 1:1–3 (RSV): Creation by the Spirit accounts for everything there is, visible and invisible, "the heavens and the earth." The Spirit takes noncreation, or anticreation, that which is "without form and void," that which is without light ("darkness . . . upon the face of the deep”) and makes something of it, gives it form and content, and floods it with light.

Mark 1:9–11 (RSV): The same Spirit of God, so lavishly articulated in words that create everything that is, descends on Jesus as he comes up from the waters of baptism and is identified as God’s “beloved Son.” The baptism is a replay of the Genesis creation in the formation of salvation.

Acts 2:1–4 (RSV): After Jesus’ ascension, 120 of his followers wait to be “baptized with the Holy Spirit” (1:5 RSV), as he had instructed them. The continuity with God’s life-giving breath in the Genesis creation and the Markan baptism is evident but also augmented—the holy breathing becomes a holy wind, “the rush of a mighty wind” (2:2). It fills the room and then fills them. Then the sign of fire is added. For them, fire was altar fire, (p 767) associated with the active presence of God. Here each person is an “altar” signed with a tongue of fire, God’s active presence. The breathing of Genesis creation and Jesus’ baptism swells into a wind; old altar fires multiply into personalized fires above each waiting man and woman, each now a sign of God alive, present, and active.

The three texts are a tripod, grounding every aspect of life—creation, salvation, community—in the living (breathing) God: God alive makes alive, God the Spirit empowers our spirits. God’s Spirit is not marginal to the main action, but is the main action.

In discussing spirituality and spiritual formation, it is essential that God’s Spirit be understood as the root of the meaning of spirituality. “The Spirit is God’s way of being present” (Fee xxi). The human spirit exists in continuity with God’s Spirit but is not identical with it.

Spirituality

Spirituality was once used exclusively in religious contexts; it is now used indiscriminately by all sorts of people in all sorts of circumstances and with all sorts of meanings. This once pristine word has been dragged into the rough-and-tumble dirt of marketplace and playground.

In contemporary usage, that which has to do with spirit, that is, spirituality, has lost virtually all connection with God’s Spirit. The term “spirituality” has become a net that, when thrown into the sea of contemporary culture, pulls in a vast quantity of spiritual fish, rivaling the resurrection catch of 153 “large fish” that John reports (21:11). Spirituality, de-Spirited, has become secularized into a major business for entrepreneurs and a recreational pastime for the bored. For others, whether many or few (it is hard to tell), it is still a serious and disciplined commitment to breathe deeply and live fully in and by God's Holy Spirit.

The attempt to reclaim the word for exclusively Christian or other religious usage usually begins with a definition. But attempts to define "spirituality"—and they are many—are futile. The term has escaped the disciplines of the dictionary. The current usefulness of the term is not in its precision but rather in the way it names something indefinable yet quite recognizable—Transcendence vaguely intermingled with Intimacy. Transcendence: a sense that there is more, a sense that life extends far beyond me, beyond what I get paid, beyond what my spouse and children think of me, beyond my cholesterol count. And Intimacy: a sense that deep within me there is a core being inaccessible to the probes of psychologists or the examinations of physicians, the questions of the pollsters, and the strategies of the advertisers. "Spirituality," though hardly precise, provides a catchall term that recognizes an organic linkage between this Beyond (transcendence) and Within (intimacy) that is part of everyone's experience. As such, by throwing every intimation of Beyond and Within into one huge wicker basket, the term can still be useful.

The word "spirituality" is a relative latecomer to our dictionaries and only recently has hit the streets in common, everyday speech. Paul used the adjective "spiritual" (pneumatikos) to refer to actions or attitudes derived from the work of the Holy Spirit in all Christians, people of the Spirit. He never used it to refer to "the interior life of a believer" (Fee 28–32). It was only later, in the medieval church and primarily in the context of monasticism, that the word was used to name a way of life restricted to an elite class of Christians—monks and nuns vowed to celibacy, poverty, and obedience, who worked at a higher level than ordinary Christians. "Spiritual" Christians were viewed in contrast to the muddled lives of men and women who married, had babies, and got their hands dirty in fields and markets. In that context spirituality came to designate the study and practice of a perfect life before God, a specialized word having to do with only a small number of people and never a part of everyday life.

The word entered our everyday language more or less through the back door. A movement developed among Roman Catholics in seventeenth-century France with the then-radical notion that the monasteries had no corner on the Christian life well lived. They insisted that the ordinary Christian was quite as capable of living the Christian life as any monk or nun—and living it just as well. Archbishop Fenelon, Madam Guyon, and Miguel de Molinos, prominent voices in this movement, were silenced under the condemnation of "quietism." The official church attempted to silence them, but it was too late; the cat was out of the bag. The term la spiritualité was used by the detractors as a term of derogation for laypeople who practiced their devotion too intensely—a snobbish dismissal of upstart Christians who did not know what they were doing, writing, thinking, and practicing. These were things best left in the hands of the church’s religious experts. But it was not long before the word lost its pejorative tone. Among Protestants, lay-oriented spiritual seriousness came to be expressed in Puritan “godliness,” Methodist “perfection,” and Lutheran “pietism.” (p 768) Spirituality, a loose “net” word, is now used on the streets with general approval. Now anybody can be spiritual.

Interestingly, some are again using the term dismissively. Because there appears to be a widespread and faddish use of the term by men and women judged to be misguided, ignorant, and undisciplined, some critics and “experts” are once again taking a condescending stance toward spirituality in its popular forms.

Living and living well is at the heart of all serious spirituality. At this time in our history, spirituality seems to be the term of choice to refer to this vast and intricate web of “livingness.” It may not be the best word, but it is what we have. Its primary weakness is that in English it is an abstraction, even though the metaphor “breath” can be detected just beneath the surface. But the metaphor has been eroded into an abstraction so that “spirituality” frequently obscures the very thing it is intended to convey: God alive and active and present. The more the word is secularized, the less useful it is. Still, it does manage to convey a sense of living as opposed to dead. When we sense that the life has gone out of things and people, institutions and traditions, eventually, and sometimes this takes us a while, we notice the absence. We look for a file-drawer kind of word in which to store the insights and desires for just exactly what it is we are missing. “Spirituality” works about as well as anything for such filing purposes.

Spiritual Formation

The Christian community counters the vagueness associated with “spirituality” by addressing spiritual formation. Spiritual formation is not in the first place or for the most part what we do; it is what the Spirit of God does; it is the formation of life by the Spirit. God the Holy Spirit conceives and forms the life of Christ in us. Our spirits are formed by Spirit. Spirituality is never a subject that we can attend to as a thing-in-itself on our own, but requires formation by God’s Spirit, a complex and lifelong way of being. It is always an operation of God the Spirit in which our human lives are pulled into and made participants in the life of God, whether as lovers or rebels.

We give careful attention to spiritual formation because we have learned, from long experience, how easy it is to get interested in ideas of God and projects for God while at the same time losing interest in God alive, deadening our lives with the ideas and projects. It is the devil's work to get us worked up in thinking and acting for God and then subtly detach us from a relational obedience and adoration, substituting our selves, our god-pretentious egos, in the place originally occupied by God.

Spiritual formation places Jesus at the center to keep us out of the center. Jesus keeps us attentive to the God-defined, God-revealed life that we are created to live. The amorphous limpness so often associated with spirituality is given skeleton, sinews, definition, and shape by Jesus. The Spirit that conceived Jesus in Mary's womb (Luke 1:31, 35) will also conceive Jesus in us (Gal. 4:19). Jesus is the central and defining figure in spiritual formation.

By accepting Jesus as the final and definitive revelation of God, the Christian church makes it impossible to make up our own customized variations of the spiritual life—not that we don't try. But we can't get around him or away from him: Jesus is the incarnation of God, God among and with us. This is the life, this Jesus life, the Spirit forms in us.

When we become more interested in ourselves than in the Spirit forming the life of Christ in us, we typically attempt to take over the work of formation, which always results in malformation. Three forms in which these "takeovers" often express themselves are in projects of self-improvement, the imposition of codes of conduct, and ventures into spiritual technology.

When spiritual formation is a project in self-improvement, the narratives and prayers of Scripture, and the guidance of theology, are replaced by the insights of psychology. Ideas and insights are begged, borrowed, and stolen indiscriminately, put to use as the person sees fit. Spiritual is all about my spirit and has nothing to do with Holy Spirit. Narcissus on his knees.

When spiritual formation is the imposition of a code of conduct, a respectable, moral life is cobbled together in order to become good without dealing personally with God. The Ten Commandments is the usual place to start, supplemented by Proverbs, salted by the Golden Rule and then capped off by the Beatitudes. Or something of that order. The Pharisee in stereotype.

When spiritual formation is a venture into spiritual technology, in a culture defined by information and technology, our spirits are formed unawares by impersonal knowing and efficient doing. In seeming innocence, we venture into a world of abstract principles, depersonalizing programs, and functionalized roles empty of Spirit.

The devil in the desert.

(p 769)The fundamental inadequacy of these ways of formation is that they put us in charge (or, which is just as bad, put someone else in charge) of something that we know next to nothing about. The moment that we take charge, “knowing good and evil,” we are in trouble and almost immediately start getting other people in trouble, too.

But if we are not to turn spiritual formation into a project that we take over and manage, what do we do? This question needs to be delayed for as long as possible. We hold back on the question because spiritual formation mostly involves paying attention and participating in who God is—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—and what he does. If we get too interested too soon in what we do and are, we go off the rails badly. Still, we are part of it and need a term to designate the human side of spiritual formation, something that accurately names what we do, but does not make us the center of the subject.

The term of choice is “fear-of-the-Lord,” the stock biblical phrase for the way of life that is lived responsively and appropriately before God as he is and what he does as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Despite its prominence in the Bible, the term does not find wide use among Christians today. “Fear” apparently gets us off on the wrong foot. Grammarians help us regain our biblical stride by calling attention to the fact that fear-of-the-Lord is a “bound” phrase (syntagma). The four words in English (two in Hebrew) are bound together, making a single word. The bound word cannot be taken apart, analyzed, and then defined by adding up the meanings of the parts. But when biblical contexts provide the conditions for understanding the word, we find that it means something more like a way of life in which human feelings and behavior are fused with God’s being and revelation. There are upward of 138 occurrences of the term across a wide range of OT books (Waltke 17–33). God is active in the term; the human is active in the term. “Fear-of-the-Lord” is a new word in our vocabularies and a key to spiritual formation; it marks the way of life appropriate to our creation and salvation and blessing by God.

Question: So what is my part in spiritual formation?

Answer: “Fear the LORD, you his saints” (Ps. 34:9). Cultivate fear-of-the-Lord.

Fear-of-the-Lord is not studying about God but living in reverence before God; not specializing in “spiritual things” but attentively following Jesus where he leads; not merely maintaining moral standards, a subset of human behavior, but living the whole of life in prayerful conversation with God. Fear-of-the-Lord is the cultivation of everything we do as we are “breathing God.”

The primary way in which we cultivate fear-of-the-Lord is in prayer, worship, and obedience: personal prayer, corporate worship, and sacrificial obedience. We deliberately interrupt our preoccupation with ourselves and attend to God, place ourselves intentionally in Sacred Space, in Sacred Time, in the Holy Presence. We become silent and still in order to listen and respond to what and who is Other than us. This is spiritual formation. In actual practice we find that it can occur any place and any time. But prayer, worship, and obedience provide the base.

A world has been opened up to us by revelation; we find ourselves walking on holy ground and living in sacred time. The moment we realize this, we feel shy, cautious. We slow down, we look around, ears and eyes alert. Like lost children happening on a clearing in the woods, and finding elves and fairies singing and dancing in a circle around a prancing two-foot-high unicorn. We stop in awed silence to accommodate this wonderful but unguessed revelation. But for us it isn't a unicorn; it is Sinai and Tabor and Golgotha.

See also Holy Spirit, Doctrine of the; Human Being, Doctrine of; Religion; Sanctification; Spiritual Sense

Bibliography

Augustine. Confessions, trans. A. Outler. Westminster, 1955; Bass, D., ed. Practicing Our Faith. Jossey-Bass, 1997; Berry, W. A Timbered Choir: The Sabbath Poems, 1979–1997. HarperCollins, 1998; Bonhoeffer, D. Life Together, trans. J. Doberstein. Harper & Bros., 1954; Borgmann, A. Technology and the Character of Contemporary Life. University of Chicago Press, 1984; Buechner, F. Now and Then. Harper & Row, 1983; Fee, G. God's Empowering Presence. Hendrickson, 1994; Ford, D. The Shape of Living. Baker, 1997; Foster, R. Celebration of Discipline. HarperSanFrancisco, 1978; Hauerwas, S. A Community of Character. University of Notre Dame Press, 1981; Lewis, C. S. Till We Have Faces. G. Bles, 1956; Miles, M. R. Practicing Christianity. Crossroad, 1990; Rad, G. von. Wisdom in Israel. Abingdon, 1972; Tugwell, S. Ways of Imperfection. Templegate, 1985; Waltke, B. “The Fear of the Lord.” Pages 17–33 in Alive to God, ed. J. I. Packer and L. Wilkenson. InterVarsity, 1996; Williams, R. Christian Spirituality. John Knox, 1979.

Eugene H. Peterson

Spiritual Sense

The expression “spiritual sense” is the English equivalent of ancient designations that referred (p 770) to a Spirit-conferred understanding of the biblical text. In this way the biblical text could become the sacrament of a faith experience of the divine realities mediated by its words. A more technical understanding of the term “spiritual sense,” in use from the very beginning but codified in the Middle Ages, referred to the understanding of the events and personages of the OT that sees them in the light of Christ. In practice, especially in patristic exegesis, the term was also loosely employed to refer to other procedures that could range from moral application to exuberant fantasy.

An Epistemology of the Spirit

Hans-Georg Gadamer cites a relevant phrase of Martin Luther: “He who does not understand the realities cannot extract the meaning from the words” (frontispiece to part 2). After a detour of centuries Christian philosophy has retrieved and placed in a more profound context this type of critical and realistic epistemology. Knowledge, says Aquinas, is the effect of truth, and truth is the “assimilation of the knower to the thing known” (De veritate 1.1). In terms of revelation this means that, by the action of the Holy Spirit in and through the sacred text, divine reality, and ultimately the word of God himself, discloses God assimilating the believer to the divine truth and thus creating the effect of that truth: knowledge. And this “spiritual understanding,” according to Augustine, “saves the believer” (Enarrat. Ps. 33.1, 7). It is for this reason, according to the ancient adage referred to by Vatican II in Dei verbum §12, that Scripture must be read and interpreted “in the same Spirit in which it was written.”

The Spiritual Understanding of the OT

The inspired authors of the NT instinctively referred and alluded to the authoritative texts of what is now the OT. However, it took centuries before a beginning was made in a reflexive articulation of the manner in which the reality and mystery of Christ related to the Scriptures of Israel, and the task is not yet complete. Following the study of Joseph Lienhard, we can observe that the fundamental attitude of the NT writers was that of continuity and contrast. Paul accented the dimension of law without, however, ignoring the importance of prophetic teaching (Rom. 9–11), and even initiated the notion that the realities recounted in the OT had a figurative role in anticipating the realities of the NT (e.g., 1 Cor. 10:1–11). Once (Gal. 4:24) he adapted an expression (allēgoroumena) for this procedure that has often been pressed into service in ways unwarranted by his text (Young, ch. 8). The Gospels, while replete with allusions to events, themes, and persons in the OT, place most of their accent on the prophetic texts, which already in Israel were understood to refer to a work of God in the future. It is here particularly that we find the term “fulfill.” The subtlety and depth of the views of the Letter to the Hebrews would require a treatment of its own.

By the middle of the second century, the number of Gentile readers of the OT forced people to try to express fundamental questions regarding the relevance of the whole of the OT to Christian life and thought. At about this time rabbinic Judaism faced the same challenge in another way. Among Christians, two extremes of thought emerged: both paid minute attention to the OT, but both were unfaithful to the NT. On the one hand, Marcion read the OT literally and concluded that it was irrelevant, assigning its events and texts to the realm of an inferior and unstable god. On the other hand, the author of the Letter of Barnabas read the whole of the OT allegorically, using the text as a springboard for his own notions in a classical “this stands for that” reading of the OT text.

The foundational theoretical solution was elaborated by Irenaeus of Lyons (Lienhard; Simian-Yofre) with his notion of “recapitulation.” Irenaeus saw clearly that both the continuity and discontinuity between the two dispensations lay in the relationship between the events and the persons and their situation within God’s overall plan for history. For this relationship, he often used the term “recapitulation” (anakephalaiōsis), which he derived and developed from Eph. 1:10.

It was, however, Origen who developed this understanding of history and employed it in his exposition of the OT, and it is from him that we receive a consistent reading of the OT in the light of Christ. Whatever be made of Origen’s exaggerations and flaws, there is no doubt that the church owes to him a fundamental attitude toward the OT that, despite the eclipse of recent centuries, is still the most faithful to the viewpoint of the NT. This is true because the church reads with faith the mystery of Christ already present in an anticipated manner in the history of Israel.

In this technical sense just discussed, the development of the spiritual understanding of the OT was marked, as exegesis has always been, by figures of great genius, such as Augustine and Chrysostom, as well as by a generous number of solid scholars and much repetition and error. Finally, at one point Augustinus Dacius (1260) (p 771) summed up the tradition in a brief formula that found many imitators (de Lubac 1:1): “The literal meaning teaches you the events; how you are to understand them in faith is the allegorical (christological) meaning; the moral teaching in the text is its tropological meaning; while the as yet unfulfilled dimension of an OT or NT text is its anagogical (eschatological) meaning.” The scholar who finally expressed the heart of the insight in theological terms was Thomas Aquinas (de Lubac 2:2). In the Summa theologiae (I/1.10) Aquinas builds upon a phrase of Gregory the Great (Moral.

20.1) to the effect that “Scripture transcends other bodies of knowledge in its way of speaking since with one and the same expression it both tells an event and makes known its relation to God’s plan [dum narrat gestum, prodit mysterium].” The two words gestum and mysterium refer in turn to the literal sense, the event, and then the spiritual sense, the same event that is now seen to have been a participating anticipation of the mystery of Christ. Augustine has much the same to say: “We must seek out the plan of God in the event itself and not only in the text” (Enarrat. Ps. 68).

Aquinas’s own answer is basically the same. He responds that God is able to have not only words signify, as humans can do, but also “res ipsas,” which must be taken to mean “events” and not merely “things.” He then goes on to say that the first signification, that of the words, belongs to the first meaning (sensum) “which is its historical or literal meaning/understanding.” The signification by which “res [realities] signified by the words in turn signify other realities [the realities of the Christ event]” is called the “sensus spiritualis, which is founded upon the literal sense and presupposes it.” It is obvious that the context of this discussion is that of the relation between the OT and the NT. Yet, for Aquinas as for the tradition preceding him, the realities of the NT have their own way of signifying and containing the eschatological realities yet to come and thus have an analogical sense.

The West began its “passage to modernity” (Dupré) and began to be content with a nontranscendent understanding of history and of the act of thinking itself. In this transition, Christians lost the theological vision that provides the underpinning for the spiritual sense and considered it to be an arbitrary imposition from the outside on something that required only an immanent explanation. Thus, in achieving what is now called the “literal sense,” an understanding of texts hitherto unattainable, something was gained and something was lost. On the side of history, what was gained was the development of a “science” of history: an ordered and critical assembling of knowledge about the past that enables one to contextualize the text and its author. On the side of knowledge itself there has been a greater appreciation of the role of the thinking subject in the act of knowledge. What has been lost and must be recovered is a sense of the depth, the interior dimension, of history and the direction being given to it by God, as well as the metaphysical nature of the act of knowledge itself.

On the Way to Recovery

The widespread dissatisfaction with the historical-critical method is leading people to search more deeply for a way of defining the reality attained by this method and locating it within the spectrum of knowledge. This can only be achieved by the development of an understanding of the Word incarnate as the objective center, cause, and goal of history. In tandem with the deficiencies of the historical-critical method itself is the neo-Kantian bias of its approach to reality. This is so profound that “reading the text in the light of the paschal mystery” has come to mean comparing texts in the light of a concept, rather than comparing realities mediated by the Holy Spirit through the texts, happening in the context of a faith experience of Jesus Christ. Only the latter merits to be called spiritual meaning or understanding.

It is often objected that reading the OT in this way results in a superficial imposition of preexisting notions upon the text in a way that ignores the profound spiritual depths already present there. That such an error has been committed in both past and present is undeniable. Continued modern study of the OT by both Jewish and Christian scholars such as Levenson, Lohfink, and Beauchamp serves to reveal what Augustine called the mira profunditas of the text, what we may call, in this context, its ongoing religious sense. These depths, valuable in themselves, are also refractions of the white light of Christ, enabling us to grasp more of his mystery.

It is also objected that searching for resemblances serves to parcel out the text into fragments and lose its own intrinsic meaning. Again, this has happened and continues to happen. The more reflexive achievements of literary and historical criticism (Sternberg) enable us to appreciate the subordinate role of certain aspects of a text that contribute to its overall meaning, as well as images and symbols. This may enable us to respond to the question of Origen, that lover (p 772) of the OT who looked for Christ everywhere in its pages. Commenting on Gen. 18:8 (“Abraham ... stood under a tree”), he writes: “What does it help me to hear what the Holy Spirit teaches the human race, if I hear that ‘Abraham was standing under a tree’?” Our historical and epistemological knowledge has undoubtedly developed. It remains for us now to have that knowledge urged on by faith to mature into that living and experiential knowledge of divine realities that alone merits the name “spiritual sense.”

See also Allegory; Literal Sense; Medieval Biblical Interpretation; Mysticism, Christian; Patristic Biblical Interpretation

Bibliography

Beauchamp, P. L'un et l'autre Testament. Éditions du Seuil, 1976; Dupré, L. Passage to Modernity. Yale University Press, 1993; Gadamer, H.-G. Truth and Method, trans. J. Weinsheimer and D. Marshall. Seabury, 1989;

La Potterie, I. de. "The Spiritual Sense of Scripture." Comm 23 (1996): 738–56; Levenson, J. "The Universal Horizon of Biblical Particularism." Pages 143–69 in Ethnicity and the Bible, ed. M. Brett. Brill, 1996; Lienhard, J. "Origen and the Crisis of the Old Testament in the Early Church." ProEccl 9 (2000): 355–66; Lohfink, N., and E. Zenger. The God of Israel and the Nations, trans. E. R. Kalin. Liturgical Press, 2000; Lubac, H. de. Exégèse médiévale. 4 vols. Aubier, 1959–64; idem. Medieval Exegesis. Vol. 1 translated by M. Sebanc. Vol. 2 translated by E. Macieroweski. Eerdmans, 1998–2000; Martin, F. "St. Matthew's Spiritual Understanding of the Healing of the Centurion's Boy." Comm 25 (1998): 161–77; Michaud, J. "Des quatre sens de l'Écriture: Histoire, théorie, théologie, herméneutique." ÉgT 30 (1999): 165–97; Simian-Yofre, H. "Old and New Testament: Participation and Analogy." Pages 267–98 in Vatican II, ed. R. Latourelle. Paulist, 1988; Sternberg, M. The Poetics of Biblical Narrative. Indiana University Press, 1985; Young, F. Biblical Exegesis and the Formation of Christian Culture. Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Francis Martin

State See Political Theology

Structuralism

Simply put, structuralism is the view that meaning in language and culture is based upon internal relations within the linguistic or cultural system as a whole, rather than something outside the system that is substantial. As a methodology, structuralism can be applied to any cultural phenomenon, whether language, individual texts, or societal practices. Structuralist elements can be found in a wide variety of movements and figures, only a few of which can be mentioned here.

Structuralism and semiotics (the study of signs) can be traced back to Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913), who radically reoriented linguistics. His Course in General Linguistics (1916) defines language as a system of signs that have meaning only by way of relation to one another. Whereas previous linguists had studied the historical development of language (diachronically), Saussure proposes that language be studied primarily as a systematic whole (synchronically). Focusing on language as langue (an objective structure) rather than as parole (actual, historical language), structuralist linguistics is thus purely formal in nature, concerned with "signifiers" rather than "referents" (the object to which a signifier refers). From a structuralist viewpoint, the meaning of signifiers is based on arbitrary convention and the play of signifiers, so that "in the language itself, there are only differences" (166, French pagination).

Roman Jakobson (1896–1982), who coined the term

“structuralism,” developed Saussure’s ideas and applied them to literary texts. In his influential essay “Linguistics and Poetics: Closing Statement” (1960), Jakobson claims that all communication has the same structure. An addresser (speaker or writer) communicates a message (meaning) to an addressee (listener or reader) by way of a point of contact (speech or writing) that presumes a code (language) and context (which “frames” the message). Concentrating on any one of these elements gives an act of communication or interpretation a distinct orientation.

Lévi-Strauss expands structuralism by examining what he takes to be the universal code of cultures. In Structural Anthropology (1958), he claims (echoing Saussure) (1) that all languages share a structure that can be articulated in terms of binary oppositions (not only for such phonemes as “d” and “t” but also for such signifiers as “light” and “dark”) and (2) that this binary structure can be found in all cultures. In The Savage Mind (1962), he attempts to ground the structure of language and culture in what he takes to be the universal unconscious structure of the human mind. Lévi-Strauss’s most important claim is that, while myths clearly have diachronic elements, synchronically they have the same basic structure. He attempts to substantiate this claim in studies of a wide variety of cultures.

Roland Barthes (1915–80) and Michel Foucault (1926–84) are difficult to classify, in many ways. Both began as structuralists, even though they became increasingly uneasy with structuralism’s underlying assumptions. In “Introduction to the (p 773)Structural Analysis of Narratives” (1966), Barthes presents a conception of narrative that assumes a universal structure to all narratives. But there is a significant reversal of structuralist ideas in his later thought. For instance, he later came to think that individual texts were primary, instead of the linguistic system itself. Similarly, although Foucault explicitly opens The Order of Things (1966) by denying that the book has anything to do with structuralist methods, his attempt to articulate the epistemes—the limits or structures governing thought and speech in given eras—is very much a structuralist project. The Archaeology of Knowledge (1969) is likewise an attempt to describe the rules of a discourse. Foucault’s later texts, though, represent a sharp reversal, in which the genealogical (diachronic) method replaces archaeology (which is synchronic), and attention to the ways in which power is exercised becomes prominent.

One can easily apply structuralist methods to biblical texts, either as an exclusive way of interpretation or as merely one method among many. What distinguishes structuralist interpretations is the concern with structure over content and a particular (even though not necessarily exclusive) focus on the text itself. A text is read as exemplifying a narrative structure, linguistic pattern or genre, or cultural expression (such as the text's "story world"). For instance, an essay by Barthes presents a reading of Jacob's struggle in Gen. 32:22–32 that interprets the sequence of events as a pattern of passage, struggle, and nomination. Another example is the essay "Myth in Theology," in which Maurice Wiles claims that the four basic Christian myths are (1) creation, (2) fall, (3) incarnation and atonement, and (4) resurrection and judgment. Both "narrative criticism" and "form criticism" can be termed "structuralistic," at least to some degree.

The deficiencies of structuralism should be readily apparent, and it has come under increasing attack since the 1960s. First, structuralist analyses are inherently reductionistic, since particularity (of persons and entire cultures) is subsumed under the universal. But it is at least open to question whether such languages as Hebrew and English (for instance) are really structurally "the same," or whether the cultures that gave rise to those languages have—at root—an identical "deep structure." Second, whether the almost exclusive focus on langue instead of parole (formal structure over actual practice) gives us an accurate picture of either language or culture is likewise questionable. Third, although Saussure and other structuralists admit historical change in language and culture, structuralist analyses tend to be ahistorical in nature. Finally, the entire "structure" of structuralism depends upon the universality and stability of binary oppositions and "differences," a stability that may not be quite as rigid as structuralists assume. Not surprisingly, the recognition of these problems has given rise to what is known as poststructuralism.

See also Form Criticism and the NT; Form Criticism and the OT; Narrative Criticism; Poststructuralism; Semiotics

Bibliography

Barthes, R. "Introduction to the Structural Analysis of Narratives" and "The Struggle with the Angel: Textual Analysis of Genesis 32:22–32." In Image—Music—Text, ed. and trans. S. Heath. Hill & Wang, 1978; Caws, P. Structuralism. Humanities, 1988; Foucault, M. The Archaeology of Knowledge, trans. A. M. Sheridan Smith. Pantheon, 1972; idem. The Order of Things. French, 1966. ET, Vintage, 1970; Greenwood, D. C. Structuralism and the Biblical Text. Mouton, 1985; Jakobson, R. "Linguistics and Poetics: Closing Statement." In Style in Language, ed. T. Sebeok. Technology Press of MIT, 1960; Lévi-Strauss, C. The Savage Mind. University of Chicago Press, 1966; idem. Structural Anthropology. French, 1958, trans. C. Jakobson and B. Grundfest Schoepf. Basic, 1963; Saussure, F. de. Course in General Linguistics. French, 1916, trans. R. Harris. Open Court, 1986; Wiles, M. "Myth in Theology." In The Myth of God Incarnate, ed. J. Hick. Westminster, 1977.

Bruce Ellis Benson

Subjectivity See Objectivity

Symbol See Imagery; Metaphor; Semiotics

Synoptic Problem See Gospels; Source Criticism

Syntax See Language, Grammar and Syntax; Semiotics

Systematic Theology

Systematic theology is the cognitive and passionate enterprise that seeks to know and love the God of the gospel and to demonstrate its understanding in forms of obedient speech and practice.

Given the subject matter of the Bible—the words and works of God—it seems only fitting that systematic theologians would occupy a prominent role in conversations about Scripture’s meaning and truth. Such, however, has not generally been the case in the modern academy, where biblical studies is seen to be an enterprise of neutral (p 774) and objective historical description. In contrast, theology is thought to be a confession-based prescriptive activity that reads Scripture through the conceptual grid of doctrinal frameworks. The exegete says what people in the past—the biblical authors—thought about God; the theologian says what the church should believe about God today.

What for R. Bultmann was a question—Is exegesis without presuppositions possible?—has become the starting point for postmoderns, who contend that all interpretations show the signs of their historical, cultural, and political situatedness. The vaunted universal viewpoint of Enlightenment scholars has dissolved into a multiplicity of perspectives. Theology has not remained unaffected; once the queen of the sciences, theology has become as weak as any other form of tradition-based rationality, so much so that the very notion of “systematic” theology has become problematic.

Any adequate account of the role of systematic theology in the interpretation of Scripture must address the following issues: (1) the nature and method of theology as a form of God-centered biblical interpretation; (2) the way in which systems of theology seek to articulate the unity of the Scriptures; (3) the nature of doctrine, theology’s best-known product; (4) how theology best serves the church, as a theoretical science and form of knowledge (scientia), or as a practical wisdom and form of life (sapientia).

The Unity and Diversity of Theologia: Historical Overview

Theology is as old as the proclamation, explication, and application of the Scriptures as the word of God. The fragmentation of the theological disciplines into specialized compartments (biblical, systematic, historical, philosophical, practical) is, by contrast, a later development.

Patristic Theologies. Perhaps the most important theological development in the early church was the ecumenical creeds. They sought to summarize the main substance of the biblical “faith that was once for all entrusted to the saints” (Jude 3) and hence to define orthodoxy: “what is to be believed by everyone, everywhere, at all times,” said Vincent of Lérins. Creeds such as the Nicene (325) and Chalcedonian (451) helped to solidify the ancient Rule of Faith. The latter was itself a summary of the main story line of Scripture and a crucial hermeneutical tool for reading the OT and NT as referring to the words and acts of one and the same God, and for seeing Jesus Christ as part of the divine identity narrated in Scripture (Pelikan 369–96).

The creeds emerged from a process of following the biblical signa (signs) to the divine res (“thing,” subject matter) to which they point. From the first, however, theologians differed as to their readings of the fundamental Christian thing. Tertullian and the Latin fathers interpreted with a framework influenced by categories taken from Roman law. Greek-speaking Alexandrian theologians like Origen, by contrast, were influenced by Hellenistic philosophies and discovered metaphysical, not moral, principles in Scripture. Yet a third type of theology, represented by Irenaeus, was motivated by pastoral interest and conceived the unity of Scripture in terms of redemptive history rather than in a system of truths (González 3–16).

Medieval Theologies. The beginnings of a distinct discipline of systematic theology are concomitant with the birth of the university, where the hitherto informal reading of Scripture (lectio) was transformed into a formal method of argumentation on the basis of Scripture (disputatio). Abelard’s Sic et non demonstrated that it was not enough to cite the church fathers to settle theological questions because the authorities disagreed (for a detailed analysis of the twelfth-century origins of theology as an academic discipline, see Evans).

The academic lingua franca of the medieval university was Latin, but the categories were Aristotle’s. The latter were mediated to the West via Spain, courtesy of Arabic scholarship. Aristotle’s Categories set forth the universal principles of logic and a universal system of classification in terms of “substance” (a thing’s essential nature) and “accidents” (the nonessential qualities that characterize a particular thing’s actual existence). The challenge of theology, as the science of God, was to interpret the biblical description of God in terms of these metaphysical categories, a challenge that yielded several sophisticated accounts of the nature of theological language.

At this time theology was every bit as comprehensive and rational as the new philosophy, the main difference being that theology has recourse to the truths of special revelation, but natural philosophy does not. Such was the governing assumption behind the Summa theologiae of Thomas Aquinas, the crowning work of medieval “scholasticism” (a theological method that seeks the rational and systematic presentation of revealed truth on the basis of a set of concepts). His so-called golden synthesis combined classical (p 775) learning and biblical revelation, supplementing what can be known of God, the world, and ourselves by natural reason, with what can be known only through the revealed truths of Scripture. At the same time, he made the perhaps fateful decision to exposit these biblical truths largely through syllogistic reasoning and with categories drawn from Aristotle (such as substance, form, matter, cause).

Reformation Theologies. Reformation theologians, riding the crest of the Renaissance wave of scholarship into the original languages of the Bible, eschewed abstract speculation and examined anew the relation of theologies to the original sources on which they were supposedly based. Luther, for example, proposed to base his theology on the Bible and Augustine rather than on the scholastic tradition and Aristotle. The Reformers rejected tradition as a supplement to the Scriptures, viewing it instead as an authoritative interpretation of Scripture. Moreover, tradition’s authority was ministerial only; the Bible and the Bible alone enjoyed magisterial authority as the locus of the word of God written.

The Reformation emphasis on the clarity and authority of Scripture went hand in hand with its view of theology as a more or less direct exposition of the text. However, agreement upon the authoritative source of theology did not entail a necessary agreement as to how this source was to be interpreted. Accordingly, diverse theologies associated with the Lutheran and Reformed churches were set forth systematically, each with its own set of proof texts.

Historians of doctrine commonly portray post-Reformation Protestant theology as exchanging its birthright—the revealed truths of the gospel—for a mess of rationalistic pottage. Yet the scholastic character of confessionally driven Protestant theology in the seventeenth century may not be a function of indebtedness to Aristotle's metaphysics (or to any philosophical scheme, for that matter). Instead, it may be more committed to detailed analysis and to passing on the Reformers' insights to succeeding generations (Muller 17–27). Like tradition, reason played a ministerial, not a magisterial role: "Reason never proves faith, but only elaborates faith toward understanding" (Muller 93).

Modern and Postmodern Theologies. The success of science in the early modern era, counterpoised with the incessant wars of religion, prompted the following question: Is there a single universal method that can be employed by every intellectual discipline and religious faction? Descartes's method of "universal doubt"—not believing anything that was not based on an indubitable foundation—combined with Kant's inquiry into the limits of human reason resulted in the project of Enlightenment criticism: not "faith seeking understanding" but "reason seeking evidence." Critical reason was autonomous and neither tradition-based nor confession-bound.

Ironically, most "autonomous" liberal and revisionist theologians busied themselves commending Christianity to contemporary culture by interpreting the Bible in terms of the latest theories and intellectual movements. The result was systems of theology without dogma—isms for thinking about God on the basis of human religious experience, including the religious experience recorded in what was now generally thought of as a humanly authored Bible. R. Bultmann's demythologizing and P. Tillich's method of correlation, with their wholesale translation of biblical terms into concepts taken from existentialism, represent the high-water mark of modern theology's quest for a single universally applicable system of theological interpretation.

If modern theology sought a universal "view from nowhere," the first principle of postmodern theology is "location, location, location." The situatedness of the theologian trumps his or her supposedly neutral methodology. What was previously thought of as a candidate for metanarrative status is now seen as merely one more community narrative expressing a particular group's interpretative interest. From this vantage point, the whole history of Western theology is only a series of "local theologies" (Schreier).

Theological Systems

Whereas philosophical theology seeks to understand God truly on the basis of reason and universal human experience, systematic theology—a church-based rather than academy-based discipline—works with material provided by general and especially special revelation. Biblical theologies set forth the unity of Scripture by unfolding the single history of redemption or by tracing the historical development of certain biblical themes. Systematic theologies set forth the unity of Scripture in terms of a different kind of order—more suitable for displaying the overall conceptual consistency of the biblical witness as a finished and complete work. Traditionally, systematicians have claimed to provide a scientific ordering of the Bible's content.

The systematic understanding that faith seeks is nothing less than a grasp of the relation of the (p 776)parts to the whole, the inherent connections of the faith, where the whole is the completed story of God's relation to the world from its original creation to its final consummation. However, there is more than one system for configuring the various biblical parts.

On the Very Idea of a Theological System. The raw materials for building systems of theology—what E. Gilson called “cathedrals” of the mind—include Scripture, tradition, human experience (both individual and corporate, which is culture), and reason. A system is a way of ordering and coordinating these raw materials. The key question thus becomes this: What are the principles by which we will organize what the Bible says? Where do the categories that comprise one's interpretative framework come from? The task of biblical theologians is to discern such categories in Scripture itself, in apparent contrast to those systematic theologians who borrow categories from philosophy or who at the least order their accounts in some kind of logical rather than chronological fashion.

Theological systems may be “hard” and “strong,” or “soft” and “weak.” “Strong” theological systems resemble geometries and exposit Scripture with a comprehensive set of categories and a definite logic (Gunton 7). Typically, this means interpreting the meaning and truth of Scripture in terms of some comprehensive conceptual scheme. T. Aquinas, for example, interpreted the biblical depiction of God with categories taken from Aristotle (e.g., “uncaused cause”).

While “hard” theological systems enjoy a high degree of intelligibility vis-à-vis the intellectual framework of the day, the danger of such systems is that they are governed by a conceptual scheme—by some ism, like Platonism or existentialism—that ends up being imposed upon the text. H. Frei warns against such “extratextual” theologies, observing that they invariably end up distorting the identity of Jesus Christ and hence the gospel itself. There are thus properly theological reasons for heeding the prophetic warning of postmodern thinkers about the violence wreaked on the texts by such Procrustean conceptual schemes.

Not every theological system needs be totalitarian. A kinder, gentler version of systematicity requires only that one take responsibility for the overall consistency of one's beliefs. Such quests for coherence do not necessarily kowtow to a particular philosophy; they merely strive for intellectual honesty, where honesty means both being consistent within one's own thinking and doing justice to the particular subject matter. For example: "The intrasystematic relations with which Irenaeus is concerned are chiefly those of the economy of divine actions" (Gunton 9). Irenaeus's system consists in recognizing the distinction-in-unity of creation and redemption, along with the typological connections that bind the history of Israel to the history of Jesus Christ. As such, it is more intra- than extratextual, a (narrative) network of truths rather than a static and hierarchical structure.

Systems of Theology: A Brief Miscellany. Theologians differ as to starting points and the relative weight given to the various loci or doctrines. Some contend that there is a single order and a necessary hierarchy of truths (e.g., from divine cause to created effects). In general, disparate systems of theology emerge from one of three sources: (1) competing worldviews (e.g., rival metaphysics); (2) different privileged human experiences (e.g., rival anthropologies); (3) different interpretations of the main story line of the Bible (e.g., rival theologies).

Some authors use metaphysical interpretative frameworks. One need only compare and contrast the systems of classical and process theism to appreciate the difference an underlying metaphysics makes. Classical theism, using Aristotelian categories as modified by Aquinas, thinks of God as a being of infinite perfection, immutable, impassible, and eternal. The Westminster Shorter Catechism similarly weds biblical and Aristotelian categories when it defines God as "a Spirit—infinite, eternal, and unchangeable—in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justness, goodness, and truth" (Q. 4).

In contrast to classical theism, with its underlying substantial metaphysics, process theism conceives of God in terms of an underlying process metaphysics. For the latter, "event" and "becoming," not "being" and "substance," are the fundamental categories for thinking about and classifying reality, and for which "persuasion" and "influence," not cause and effect, characterize the God-world relation. On the process view, the world is God's "body," and God is the "creativity" of the world. As in classical theism, other Christian doctrines are worked out in terms of this overarching process metaphysic.

Other authors use anthropological interpretative frameworks..

F. Schleiermacher's fateful decision to view theology as the science of faith rather than the science of God gives rise to a very different tradition of system-making, this time based not on metaphysics but on analyses of human experience (p 777). For Schleiermacher himself, Christian doctrines are "accounts of the religious affections set forth in speech." R. Bultmann's theology is the epitome of such anthropological systems, providing as it does a comprehensive set of categories, taken from existentialist philosophy, for explicating the self-understanding that accompanies faith in the proclaimed word of God. In this view, theological statements are clarifications of inauthentic (e.g., sinful) or authentic (e.g., saved) human existence.

So-called advocacy theologies—done from the perspective (and for the benefit) of a certain social or ethnic group (e.g., women, the poor, Black, Native American) or combinations thereof (e.g., womanist, mujerista)—make race, gender, and class into lenses through which to filter theology. As such, they are anthropological; yet, unlike Bultmann, they do not attempt to describe the universal human experience of a particular people group. The experience of a particular community serves as a vantage point from which to read and critically reexamine Scripture and Christian tradition. The emphasis is less on doctrine and orthodoxy than on justice and orthopraxis. "System" in the present context thus refers more to a method than to a finished set of connected doctrines. Given the sheer scope of human diversity, there is almost no end to the proliferation of such systems. This fact renders increasingly problematic various expressions of the unity and catholicity of theological truth, not to mention criteria for truth.

Many authors use biblical/theological interpretative frameworks. Not all theological systems rely on conceptual or experiential frameworks. K. Barth departs from arbitrarily chosen starting points in sources outside Scripture on the basis that merely human standpoints fail to come to the real subject matter of theology—God in self-revelation—on its own terms: "If I have a system, it is limited to a recognition of what Kierkegaard called the 'infinite qualitative distinction' between time and eternity" (Barth, Romans, "Preface" to 2d ed.). The material insight behind the whole of Barth's theology is that everything there is to know about God is revealed in the event of Jesus Christ, in which we see that God is "for us" as Father, Son, and Spirit.

Some theological systems may similarly be distinguished on the basis of their different material insights into the logic governing the story line of the Bible. Reformed theology differs from its Arminian counterpart on the basis of their respective soteriologies, in particular, their rival conceptions of the relation between (and the relative priority of) human freedom and divine grace. In this connection, some have suggested that there are only two self-consistent systems of theology possible: Pelagianism and Augustinianism (Hodge 96).

Other material theological insights give rise to certain hermeneutical principles that generate still more systems. Luther's insight into justification by faith, for example, developed into a law/gospel distinction that became the key organizing principle of Lutheran theology. Similarly, classic dispensational theology is based on a hard-and-fast distinction between Israel and the church, and on a reading of Scripture that stresses the discontinuity of God's dealings with humans in different ages or dispensations.

The State of the Systematic Art: Doctrine in Contemporary Theology

The Bible is an indispensable resource in the theologian's attempt to set forth an orderly account of Christian belief. Accordingly, every theology must be prepared to give an account of the way in which it moves from Scripture to doctrine.

Doctrines of God and Doctrines of Scripture. D. Kelsey has convincingly demonstrated that not all theologians who profess biblical authority practice it in the same way. Even those who may agree on "what it meant" may disagree about "what it means" for the church today (Kelsey 202–3). In short, systems of theology differ not only in their basic material insights, but also in the formal patterns that distinguish their uses of Scripture. Various theologians construe the Bible "as" history or "as" myth or "as" doctrine in a way that correlates with their imaginative discernment of the mode of God's presence and activity in and with the believing community. Kelsey thus calls our attention to the importance of what we might term the "theological-hermeneutical circle": one's use of Scripture in theology is related to one's doctrine of God, and one's doctrine of God is related to the church's use of Scripture.

Doctrine and Narrative. As the title of Kelsey's work itself indicates, one of the most common uses of Scripture in systematics is to substantiate theological claims: to prove doctrine. How does Scripture generate and exercise control over doctrine? "The genesis of doctrine lies in the exodus from uncritical repetition of the narrative heritage of the past" (McGrath 7). On this view, one obtains doctrine by thinking through the logic and implications of the biblical story. (p 778) The doctrine of the atonement, for example, is not metaphysical speculation but an answer to the question "How is Jesus' death 'for us'?" Doctrine results from faith seeking understanding of the biblical narrative. The Reformation cry of sola scriptura is an assertion of “the primacy of the foundational scriptural narrative over any framework of conceptualities which it may generate” (McGrath 64). Yet certain doctrinal differences remain even between traditions that profess sola scriptura.

Doctrine and Church Practice. One recent development deserves special note. G. Lindbeck, in a much-discussed 1984 work, argues that doctrines are neither truth claims about objective realities nor symbolic expressions of subjective religious experience, but rather rules for intersubjective—which is to say, ecclesial—language and practice. Theology thus explicates the “grammatical” rules that govern Christian speech and action. Though Lindbeck defines “Christian” language in relation to the biblical narrative, what theology actually ends up describing is the logic of ecclesial practice.

This cultural-linguistic turn represents an important sea change in Protestant theology. The new focus for theology is not the Bible as such but the Bible-as-used-in-the-church, which is another way of saying tradition. On this, postliberals, Radical Orthodox, and Catholic-evangelical theologians appear to agree: “Knowing the triune God is inseparable from participating in a particular community and its practices—a participation which is the work of God’s Holy Spirit” (Buckley and Yeago 1). Being in a community of interpretation is, in this view, the only way to know what God means in Scripture (Gracia). The relevant question to be asked of this approach is whether such descriptions get us beyond sociology to theology proper.

Theodramatic Systematics

Too sharp a dichotomy between theory and practice (e.g., systems of doctrinal knowledge vs. forms of community life) is just as toxic to the project of faith seeking understanding as it is to the theological interpretation of Scripture. Accordingly, systematic theology needs to take its bearings by attending to (1) the subject matter of the history of redemption that culminates in Jesus Christ, and (2) the way in which the church can demonstrate its understanding of this subject matter by the way it continues to follow Jesus Christ in new cultural contexts.

The Gospel, the Theodrama, and the Script. At the heart of Christian theology is a series of divine words and divine deeds, historical sayings and enactments: a drama of redemption. Theology must respond and correspond to this prior divine speech and action, this theodrama (Balthasar). And it has. The earliest doctrinal reflection sought to clarify the divine dramatis personae. Subsequent doctrinal reflection sought to clarify the meaning and significance of the divine action.

The Bible is the normative specification of the gospel: a divinely authorized and commissioned account of the words and deeds that comprise the theodrama. For this reason Scripture is the church's authoritative script, the final criterion of theological understanding. At the same time, the script needs to be taken into new situations. What is called for is not mere repetition, but creative understanding.

Doctrine as Direction. Christian doctrine provides direction for the church's fitting participation in the drama of redemption (Vanhoozer, Drama). This "directional" model focuses on doctrine's role in enabling believers to be competent participants in the continuing theodrama.

Doctrinal claims about what is fit action for the church today rest on claims about what God has done. The directional model of doctrine thus integrates cognitive-propositional understanding with practical understanding (e.g., knowing what to say and do now as faithful disciples). Doctrine is a statement of "performance knowledge," a direction given for assuming one's proper place in the drama of redemption. Doctrine is direction for scripted and spirited performances of the gospel's truth in concrete contexts.

Conclusion: Toward a Sapiential Systematics

"Systems" of theology, at their best, are more than theoretical; they are "designs for living" (Gunton 11) that embody the wisdom of God revealed in Jesus Christ. A systematic theology oriented to practical wisdom rather than theoretical knowledge only seeks theodramatic understanding, a grasp of both the biblical script and the contemporary situation, in order to participate fittingly in the drama of redemption: "Given what we have heard and seen as the gospel, what shall we next say and enact?" (Jenson 21).

Systematic theology is a matter of understanding the church's situation in its cultural-historical context in light of the gospel in its canonical context. Though all systems this side of the eschaton (p 779) will be provisional (because the church's situation varies), Christian wisdom can be learned through an apprenticeship to Scripture that is attentive to the particularities of its canonical forms and cultural situations (Vanhoozer, Drama).

A Plurivocal Systematics. The polyphonic Scriptures speak in many and diverse ways of what God was doing in Jesus Christ. Systematic theology must resist reducing the many authorial voices and literary forms of Scripture to a single set of concepts. As M. Bakhtin has argued, literary genres are more than rhetorical packages that can be unwrapped to get their content; instead, genres are modes of experience and cognition that cannot be reduced without significant loss to the propositional information they convey. Some truths, for example, can only be articulated dialogically—an insight that casts new light on why the NT includes four Gospels.

Similarly, it is unlikely that a single interpretative community or scheme will discern all that there is to be gleaned from Scripture. A canonically bounded polyphonic tradition that includes Western and non-Western voices, ancient and modern, best corresponds to the nature of the Scriptures themselves. To acknowledge such plurality is not to leave systematic theology bereft of criteria. On the contrary, both the “canonic” and “catholic” principles that should govern theology are simultaneously plural and yet bounded.

A Phronetic Systematics. For much of its history, systematic theology has been conceived as a kind of science that aims at epistemē: theoretical knowledge. However, if doctrine is to exercise a directive and a pastoral function (Charry), it would do well to recover phronēsis: practical reason, the ability to deliberate well about what to say and do in particular situations to the glory of God. Scripture remains the supreme authority for systematic theology, not as an epistemic norm that caters to modernity’s craving for theoretical certainty and completeness, but as a sapiential norm that provides direction for fitting participation in the ongoing drama of redemption.

In conclusion, a sapiential systematics proceeds from faith seeking theodramatic understanding, displays both canonic sense and catholic sensibility, and aims at bearing faithful witness in word and deed to the truth of God, world, and self made known “in Christ.”
See also Biblical Theology; Model; Providence; Rule of Faith; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary; Truth; Word of God

Bibliography

Balthasar, H. Theo-Drama. 5 vols. Ignatius, 1988–98; Buckley, J., and D. Yeago, eds. Knowing the Triune God. Eerdmans, 2001; Charry, E. By the Renewing of Your Minds. Oxford University Press, 1997; Evans, G. R. Old Arts and New Theology. Clarendon, 1980; Evans, G. R., A. McGrath, and A. Galloway, The Science of Theology. Vol. 1 of The History of Christian Theology. Eerdmans, 1996; Ford, D., ed. The Modern Theologians. 2d ed. Blackwell, 1997; Ford, D., and G. Stanton, eds. Reading Texts, Seeking Wisdom. Eerdmans, 2003; Frei, H. Types of Christian Theology. Yale University Press, 1992; González, J. Christian Thought Revisited. Orbis, 1999; Gracia, J. How Can We Know What God Means? Palgrave, 2001; Green, G. Theology, Hermeneutics, and Imagination. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Grenz, S., and J. Franke. Beyond Foundationalism. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Gunton, C. “A Rose by Any Other Name? From ‘Christian Doctrine’ to ‘Systematic Theology.’ ” IJST 1 (1999): 4–23; Hodge, A. A. Outlines of Theology. Zondervan, 1972; Holmes, S. Listening to the Past. Baker, 2002; Horton, M. Covenant and Eschatology. Westminster John Knox, 2002; Jenson, R. Systematic Theology. Vol. 1.

Oxford University Press, 1997; Kelsey, D. Proving Doctrine. Trinity, 1999; Levering, M. Scripture and Metaphysics. Blackwell, 2004; Lindbeck, G. The Nature of Doctrine. Westminster, 1984; McGrath, A. The Genesis of Doctrine. Eerdmans, 1990; Muller, R. Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics. Vol. 1. Baker, 1987; Pelikan, J. Credo. Yale University Press, 2003; Schreier, R. Constructing Local Theologies. Orbis, 1985; Schwöbel, C. “Doing Systematic Theology.” King’s Theological Review 10 (1987): 51–57; Vanhoozer, K., The Drama of Doctrine. Westminster John Knox, 2005; idem, ed. Cambridge Companion to Postmodern Theology. Cambridge University Press, 2003; Wainwright, G. Doxology. Oxford University Press, 1980.

Kevin J. Vanhoozer

T

(p 780)

Targum

The Hebrew term “targum” (plural: “targumim”) literally means “translation,” but in the rabbinic period (ca. first–seventh centuries CE) the term came to refer specifically to the written Jewish Aramaic translations of the Hebrew Bible (OT). Targumim exist for every book of the Bible except Ezra, Nehemiah, and Daniel, possibly because these books already contain significant portions in Aramaic. Like the Septuagint, there are actually several different textual traditions within the corpus of targumim. Thus, there are three primary groups of targumim that are translations of the Pentateuch: Targum Onqelos, Targum Pseudo-Jonathan, and Targum Neofiti. Fragmentary targumim to the Pentateuch also appear in at least five different groups, in addition to the Cairo Geniza fragments. Targum Jonathan is the targum to the Prophets (within the Jewish canon these books include Joshua, Judges, 1–2 Samuel, 1–2 Kings, and the Major and Minor Prophets, but not Daniel). Finally, targumim exist for the Jewish canonical division of the Writings. These are often later translations (probably from the sixth–eighth centuries CE), and different textual traditions are sometimes attested for individual books, such as two quite different targumim to Ruth.

The origins of the targumim can probably be traced back to the liturgical practices in the synagogue. The Mishnah (ca. 200 CE) states that the reading of the biblical text in a synagogue is to be accompanied with an appropriate translation so that all might understand the text being read (m. Meg. 4:4). Rabbinic texts make it clear that the meturgeman, the one who translates the biblical text into Aramaic during the synagogal service, is not allowed to read from a written text. Thus, the congregation will not confuse the translation with the actual holy, written word. This leads to the possibility that the physical texts we study today may not, in fact, represent the actual targum as recited in the synagogue. Nonetheless, the written targumim that we can study share this same respect for the Bible as God's word and exhibit this in the nature of the genre.

The targumim are at once both translation and commentary. As translation a targum is engaged in the task of faithfully representing God's word by rendering into Aramaic every word of the biblical text in its proper order. (This is in contrast with midrash, rabbinic exegetical commentary, which often comments only upon select verses.) Yet in the targumim commentary is also frequently woven into the translation and thus moves targum beyond what we might define in modern terms as a "simple translation." This is most often found as simple glosses or additional words and phrases added to the text for explanation, but occasionally larger sections of material will be spliced into the text.

For example, Gen. 15:1 reads, "After this, the word of the LORD came to Abram in a vision." In one targum tradition, Targum Onqelos, the text reads, "After these matters, the word of the LORD was before Abram in a prophecy." (The italics indicate material added to the base translation of the Hebrew text.) Here the targumist has avoided referring to God's revelation to Abram as a vision, possibly to avoid an anthropomorphic attribution to God, while emphasizing that the message Abram received was indeed from God and was prophetic. Yet another targum tradition of the same passage, Targum Pseudo-Jonathan, is much more expansive. I offer only a small portion of it here. "After these words, when the kings had gathered together, and had fallen before Abram; and four kings had been slain, and nine hosts brought back, Abram reasoned in his heart, and said, Woe to me, because I have received the reward of my appointments in this world, and have no portion in the world to come...." In this targumic version several lines precede the actual translation of Gen. 15:1 and place the biblical passage of God reassuring Abram that his own child shall be his heir in what the targumist understands as the proper context. Even this brief example illustrates that the exegetical activity of the targum is similar to that of midrash, but its mode is significantly (p 781) different since it is confined within the context of translation.

See also Commentary; Jewish Exegesis; Translation

Christian M. M. Brady

Temple

Biblical tradition identifies the temple as the place of sacrifice and of vision. The connections among these three elements are so intimate that, not only is the temple the ordained site of offering to God and of seeing God disclosed, but this sacred space is also delineated by vision, by sacrifice.

When Moses ascends Sinai with Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, they see the God of Israel on his sapphire throne, and eat a meal in God's presence. The covenantal sacrifice of pouring blood on the altar and over the people prepares for that encounter (Exod. 24:3–11). Moses remains on the mountain; God gives him commandments for all the items necessary to worship in the temple.

The vision of God is fraught with danger. "You cannot see my face, for no one may see me and live" (Exod. 33:20), Yahweh tells Moses in the same book that also recounts Moses' vision of the divine throne and his specification of what he saw and heard on Sinai. Those who would prepare for a visionary encounter must be pure, and must be ready to understand that they see partially, not yet face-to-face (1 Cor. 13:12).

Prophetic vision often takes precedence over the assignment of any established site of God's temple. Jacob sees the entry to heaven at Bethel ("House of God," Gen. 28:10–22), for example, and Elijah's sacrifice on Mt. Carmel trumps all the nationalistic pretensions of Ahab and Jezebel's cultic innovations in Israel (meaning the northern kingdom; 1 Kings 18). Later, in this kingdom that has separated from Judah, Amos assails all worship—particularly at Bethel—as systematic oppression (Amos 2:6–5:27); he sounds the perennial prophetic warning that worship without justice is synonymous with idolatry.

Even the settled establishment of Solomon's temple is subjected to prophetic criticism. Isaiah sees the seraphim and God's royal apparel streaming into the sanctuary (Isa. 6:1–5), yet then disciplines a king whose role is to protect the temple (7:1–17). Jeremiah trenchantly insists (7:4 AT), "Do not trust in these lying words: 'This is the temple of the LORD, the temple of the LORD, the temple of the LORD!'" Prophetic wisdom insists that the site of offering is not a place with physical coordinates only, but also a focus of the sacrificial worship and dedicated vision that pleases God.

Acceptable sacrifice occasions divine pleasure. When Noah sacrificed of his clean animals, the “pleasing odor” delighted God (Gen. 8:21 RSV), and although it was obvious that imagination of the human heart was no better after the flood than before, this offering put humanity in a new light. They could not be perfect, but they could be pleasing. People felt honest enjoyment in the act of feasting—normally a vital aspect of sacrifice in Israel, especially during the great festivals of Passover, Weeks, and Booths. God also enjoyed a good sacrifice, the gathering of God’s people with the yield of their labor and appropriate concern for their ritual and ethical purity.

Vision and sacrifice not only made the temple, but also restored it. God’s presence went with his people into exile. His Spirit inspired Ezekiel, with the deported Judeans in Babylonia, to describe his vision of God’s chariot-throne in detail, and to specify the dimensions of the new temple that was to replace what the Babylonians had destroyed in 587 BCE (Ezek. 1, 40–48). God would move heaven and earth to have his house among his people again, and this time the prophetic ambition for worship there extended beyond historic Israel. This was to be a house of prayer for all nations (Isa. 56:6–7). People from outside Israel, non-Jews, would come to that temple and take part in sacrifice there, especially at the feast of Booths, the biggest, lushest sacrifice of the annual cycle (Zech. 14).

That vision of Zechariah, who promoted the building of the second temple, also played a pivotal role in Jesus’ actions in Jerusalem. Zechariah foresaw a time when, because peoples of the world were freely to enter the temple for sacrifice, there would be no trade, no merchants whatever involved in the sanctuary (14:20–21). When Jesus saw that the high priest Caiaphas had in fact permitted trade in the temple, he took action, clearing the outer court of animals and their vendors (Matt. 21:12–13; Mark 11:15–17; Luke 19:45–46; John 2:13–17), and prompting the mortal enmity of Caiaphas.

Jesus’ response to a temple that put trade in the place of purity was that it was a “cave of thugs,” in the words of Jeremiah (7:11 AT); it did not deserve to stand. In his vehement insistence on the priority of prophetic sacrifice and vision over literal place, Jesus also claimed that his meals with his disciples—which had long been designed as celebrations of God’s kingdom—amounted to better offerings than what Caiaphas sanctioned (p 782) in the temple. The meal became a visionary sacrifice, with wine taking the place of literal “blood” and bread replacing an animal’s “body” or “flesh” (Matt. 26:26–28; Mark 14:22–24; Luke 22:17–19; John 6:53; 1 Cor. 11:23–25). Jesus’ meals became a prophetic challenge to the temple establishment, which replied with Rome in executing Jesus and dispersing his followers.

Jesus’ resurrection emboldened his disciples to return to Jerusalem, despite the continuing opposition of the high priesthood. Every day they worshipped in the temple and “broke bread in their homes” (Acts 2:46). The living presence of the Lord was their assurance that Jesus’ vision of a universal sacrifice on Mt. Zion would be vindicated. Until then, his meals held the place of Zechariah’s prophecy. In addition to Peter, and eventually supplanting Peter in a position of leadership in the holy city, James (Jesus’ brother) occupied a prominent place in temple worship, especially in his encouragement of the Nazirite vow (Acts 21:17–26) among Jesus’ followers.

Paul was also involved in the support of the community that worshipped in the temple, and he saw this as his own priestly service for the “offering of the nations” (Rom. 15:16 AT). At the same time, Paul described Jesus as the hilastērion (Rom. 3:25), the place of delight where God meets his people. Commentators continue to dispute whether this word here means “mercy seat” (the throne over the ark of the covenant) or “propitiation” more generally. Either way, the focus on the delight God takes in meeting his people in Jesus is evident. Once the Roman army in 70 CE destroyed the second temple, the way was open for thinkers such as the author of Hebrews to see Jesus as the definitive replacement of any physical temple for all time. The vision of God and the giving of oneself in imitation of Christ’s sacrifice once-for-all (Heb. 9:23–28) took the place of any literal altar of sacrifice. There would be a new heaven, a new earth, a new Jerusalem, but one would see “no temple in the city, for its temple is the Lord God the Almighty and the Lamb” (Rev. 21:1–2, 22).

Bibliography

Anderson, G. A. Sacrifices and Offerings in Ancient Israel. HSM 41. Scholars Press, 1987; Brandon, S. G. F. The Fall of Jerusalem and the Christian Church. SPCK, 1957; Brown, J. R. Temple and Sacrifice in Rabbinic Judaism. Seabury-Western Theological Seminary, 1963; Büchler, A. Studies in Sin and Atonement. Ktav, 1967; Busink, T. A. Der Tempel von Jerusalem von Salomo bis Herodes. Brill, 1980; Caillois, R. L’homme et le sacré. Gallimard, 1989; Chilton, B. Redeeming Time. Hendrickson, 2002; Daly, R. J. Christian Sacrifice. SCA 18. Catholic University of America Press, 1978; Grappe, C., and A. Marx. Le sacrifice. Essais bibliques 29. Labor & Fides, 1998; Haran, M. Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel. Oxford University Press, 1978; Levine, B. In the Presence of the Lord. SJLA 5. Brill, 1974; Mazar, B. The Mountain of the Lord, trans. G. Cornfield. Doubleday, 1975; Milgrom, J. Studies in Cultic Theology and Terminology. Brill, 1983; Roth, C. "The Cleansing of the Temple and Zechariah XIV 21." NovT 14 (1960): 174–81; Smith, W. R. Lectures on the Religion of the Semites. Black, 1901; Westcott, B. F. The Epistle to the Hebrews. Macmillan, 1909; Yerkes, R. K. Sacrifice in Greek and Roman Religions and Early Judaism. Scribner, 1952.

Bruce Chilton

Tertullian See Patristic Biblical Interpretation; Rule of Faith; Scripture, Unity of

Testimonia See Intertextuality

Text Linguistics See Language, Linguistics; Text/Textuality; Utterance Meaning

Text/Textuality

Readers of any edition of the Bible are confronted with a canonical collection of texts. Although these texts have been heard and read since their composition and collection by every generation of Christians, only since the early nineteenth century has their textuality been explored in greater detail within the larger framework of hermeneutical thinking. Theologians, philosophers, text-linguists, and literary scholars have advanced this critical reflection upon the textuality of texts and its implications for their reception.

The aim of biblical interpretation is not to decipher particular sentences, though this task is a necessary part of the overall exercise, but understanding the meaning of larger communicative units: texts. A "biblical text" may refer to a particular book of the Bible or parts thereof (such as the readings in a church service or any other religious reading program); it may refer to the OT, the NT, the Apocrypha, or the entire Bible. In whatever extension a biblical text is heard or read, it is received as a text.

A text is more than the sum of its sentences. A text is a linguistic composition that is read or heard as a relatively coherent communicative unit, a structured whole (Schleiermacher); it invites recipients to become engaged in its communicative potential through an act of reading or hearing. The text has a surplus of meaning over against its constitutive parts. It opens a world for the reader (Ricoeur). Every text is organized on (p 783) three levels at once: on a semantic level of creating a meaning, on a syntactic level of structuring linguistic parts into a whole, and on a pragmatic level that indicates textual beginning and end. Hence, the pragmatic dimension of the text's textuality defines the external extension of the text, whereas the combination of syntactic and semantic dimensions produces the internal communicative dynamics of the text.

The discipline of text-linguistics, which pays special attention to general linguistic strategies in the production and reception of texts, could show how a number of different aspects—such as thematic progression, cross-referentiality, pronominal substitution, conventional genre, and particular style—together contribute to the emerging textuality of a text. The unfolding of the text's communicative potential in the act of reading or hearing can then be described as a dynamic process whose energy stems from the encounter between recipient and text. The text comes to life in a process that is always initiated by a recipient. Without recipients who are prepared to invest their skillful attention to this process, texts remain ink on paper—mere communicative potentials. The biblical text is no exception.

Biblical texts reach today's reader in the form of written texts. Even when read aloud during an act of personal or communal worship, they are still written texts, though performed now in this particular way. Written texts differ from oral texts insofar as the latter emerge in an actual meeting between people in a particular communicative situation. Biblical texts, however, are written texts that can be read at any time by anybody, individuals and communities, capable of deciphering the textual code and willing to enter into the world that these texts are evoking in the reader during the act of reading. The written text has been described as “a discourse fixed by writing”; as such, it now owns a communicative autonomy (Ricoeur). Knowledge of the text's author and of the situation of its origin is therefore not a necessary condition for a successful process of biblical reading. Yet these matters will be of particular interest to readers who wish to pay attention to the fact that these texts can function both as documents of significant religious developments in Israel and the early church, and as carriers of divine revelation for all generations to come.

The genre of a text refers to traditional rules and conventions of human communication (e.g., letter, psalm, historical account, aphorism, narrative, prophecy, law, apocalypse, etc.) according to which a textual expression is normally shaped. A text's style refers to the individual characteristics of the composition. Of course, stylistic decisions in text-composition and -reception are always conditioned as well by a complex network of circumstances and traditions that organize communicative expectations. Genre and style of a text provoke in the reader a corresponding genre and style of reading. In this encounter between general forms of communication and particular features of expression, a reader or group of readers can unfold a written communication. A text can thus be defined as an “individual universal” (Frank).

At times, the need for new ways of expression becomes so pressing that a mere change of style will no longer suffice. Then a new genre of expression may become necessary in order to allow for the realization of new communicative perspectives. The birth of the genre “gospel” was the result of the first Christians’ experience of God’s action and presence in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. The communication of their experience demanded a new genre of writing; this new genre in turn has been calling for a new genre of reading, a christological reading. However, no reader can be expected to relate adequately to totally new forms of expression. Hence, even a new genre, such as gospel, will always need to employ a sufficient measure of conventional aspects in order to achieve its communicative purpose for the reader and thus to be understood to be a new genre of expression in the first place.

The production of texts employs one or more textual strategies, such as narration, argumentation, description, and instruction, depending on the principal function of a text in a particular communicative situation. Readers need to identify a text’s overall communicative strategy in order to disclose the text’s meaning appropriately. Only following such a basic assessment, after developing an initial grasp of the text’s overall strategy as text, is the reader in a position to follow the concrete communicative dynamics of the text and to move toward the disclosure of meaning—which in turn may lead to a reassessment of the initial grasp. Thus, the concern for adequate reading of a biblical (or any other) text as text demands first of all the grasp and subsequent application of the most adequate reading perspective.

A reading perspective is adequate only when it corresponds to the text’s own communicative perspectives and potential. If it does not, the text will be misread. The communicative potential of (p 784)most biblical texts is theological: it reflects upon experiences of the creative and redemptive presence of God in Israel, the world, Jesus Christ, the church, and eternal life. Although all kinds of perspectives have been applied to read and examine biblical texts, no reading genre appears to be fully adequate that is not open to the texts’ own particular theological potential. Depending on the function of a biblical text in particular religious contexts, additional strategies of reading will be added to this basic approach to the textuality of the text.

See also Genre; Utterance Meaning

Bibliography

Frank, M. Das individuelle Allgemeine. Suhrkamp, 1977; Jeanrond, W. Text and Interpretation as Categories of Theological Thinking. Crossroad, 1988; idem. Theological Hermeneutics. Crossroad, 1991; Ricoeur, P. Hermeneutics and the Human Sciences, ed. J. Thompson. Cambridge University Press, 1981; idem. Interpretation Theory. Texas Christian University Press, 1976; Schleiermacher, F. Hermeneutics, ed. H. Kimmerle. Scholars, 1977; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. Zondervan, 1992; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998; Watson, F. Text and Truth. T&T Clark, 1997.

Werner G. Jeanrond

Textual Criticism

Textual criticism is the science of discovering where a document has been corrupted, and the art of restoring it (Housman 325). In the study of Scripture, textual criticism is the interpreter's response to the reality that there are thousands of manuscripts of the biblical texts with tens of thousands of variations, and no extant autographs to establish once for all the original readings. Textual criticism analyzes the available evidence in order to understand the transmission history of a text and to determine the most authentic reading where manuscripts differ. While the task of the textual critic is usually considered a step prior to interpretation, it is properly an integral part of that task. This article considers the textual criticism of both Testaments, first separately and then together. It also explores new directions in the discipline and their significance for exegesis and theology.

Role in the Interpretative Task

Textual criticism arises out of the need for a reasonably reliable text as the basis for interpretation. Most textual critics proceed both with a high degree of confidence that in many cases the original text is attainable, and awareness that often there are interpretative and theological issues at stake in decisions on the text. In addition to the primary goal of establishing the original text, textual critics have given increased attention to the history of interpretation, literary layers in the production of texts, theologically or ethically motivated changes, and the impact of canon on textual issues. None of these areas should be isolated; they are interdependent in the interpretative task. Epp is correct to insist on "expanding our horizons and making the discipline more broadly relevant than previously to related fields, such as literary-critical, hermeneutical and church historical studies" (Epp 270). To Epp's list we should add the terms "theological" and "ethical."

Traditionally OT textual critics have privileged the Masoretic Text (MT), but recent discoveries and research have challenged its position as a Textus Receptus. The discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls shows a pluriformity of the Hebrew Bible in the Second Temple period. Some Qumran readings agree with the Septuagint (LXX) against MT, while others are clearly superior to MT (Tov 24). The LXX itself often witnesses to interpretative traditions. The questions of the origins and textual variety within the LXX texts and versions (Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus) offer special challenges and opportunities for the textual critic. Another tradition is reflected in the Samaritan Pentateuch, which contains theologically motivated changes. Discoveries of divergent manuscripts for the MT itself (Leningrad Codex, the basis of the BH [Biblia Hebraica] and BHS [Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia] texts; the Aleppo Codex forms the basis of the Hebrew University Bible) further challenge the position of MT. Moreover, the Kethib-Qere practice (notes to ignore what is written and substitute the marginal reading) bears witness to ancient interpretative techniques in the rabbinic tradition. This situation of manuscript and textual diversity offers opportunity for creative engagement of the textual critic of the OT and the NT.

The NT textual critics work with an embarrassment of riches. From earliest times Christians have noted textual variations in the NT (Origen, Jerome, Ibn al-‘Assal). Since Erasmus produced the first modern critical edition (1516) by drawing on six manuscripts, the number of known Greek manuscripts of the NT has grown to almost six thousand. Together with lectionaries, versions, and patristic quotations, this constitutes a great mass of material to be collated and evaluated. Recent discoveries of more than 115 NT papyri, some (p 785) from the second century, enhance our knowledge of the earliest transmission of the text. The NT textual critics have sorted this mass of data into text types (Metzger 95–146). Of the three main groups of manuscripts, the Alexandrian is characterized by restraint, the Western by expansion, and the Byzantine by conflation. The standard critical editions, Nestle/Aland<sup>27</sup> and UBS<sup>4</sup>, with identical text but different apparatuses, offer the opportunity for truly scientific study of textual criticism. But debate over methods demonstrates that textual criticism is art as well as science.

The Methods

Textual critics of both the OT and NT face challenges in methodology and can learn from each other. For the OT, a primary challenge in method is the relation of textual to literary criticism in a situation where texts have developed over a long period of time and manifest different versions: Jeremiah, Joshua, Ezekiel, Proverbs (Tov 313–50). NT textual critics debate the relative value of external (manuscript) and internal (an author’s style and theology) criteria for making judgments (Kilpatrick; J. K. Elliott in Black; Ehrman and Holmes). Decisions are made on the basis of age and affinity of manuscripts, and on transcriptional and intrinsic probabilities. All follow an eclectic method. Kilpatrick and Elliott represent thoroughgoing eclecticism in which style, Atticism, and other features are more significant for making text-critical judgments (Elliott in Black 101–24).

Established rules for textual decisions—such as a preference for the more difficult or shorter reading, or the reading that best explains the rise of the others (Aland and Aland 275–77)—should be applied “sparingly and with full recognition of their subjective nature” (Tov 308). Tov states: “Common sense should be the main guide of the textual critic” (296). But sense is not necessarily common (Housman).

The Goals

Ancient and modern textual critics seek to discover the original reading where there is variation in a biblical text. Postmodern critics have questioned whether this is an attainable or desirable goal. NT textual criticism has been especially influenced by these developments. The focus has shifted to an interest in “subsequent forms of the text for understanding the history of exegesis” (Ehrman 29). Parker’s assertion summarizes the shift: “There is no original text, there are just different texts from different stages of production” (4). This shift of emphasis from the “original text” to the early transmitters and interpreters reflects the broader postmodern cultural shift away from the text, its meaning, and the author’s intent and toward the readers’ response to and use of the text. Recent philosophical and literary theories, such as proposed by Rorty, Derrida, and Fish, find meaning not in the author or in the text but in the reader (Vanhooser). The original text becomes an illusion; discerning the theological crosscurrents in early Christianity and their influence on the text has become the goal.

Ehrman assumes Bauer’s picture of diversity within earliest Christianity, with no single primitive stream, but competing Christian movements, more Gnostic or heretical than orthodox in some places. The party (and their scribes) represented by Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, and others, dubbed “proto-orthodox,” was not original, primitive, or true, but merely successful, and sealed its victory at Nicea. They not only won the struggle, but also changed the texts to make them say what they were known to mean. The addition of “The Son of God” at Mark 1:1 and the suppression of “the chosen one” at John 1:34 supply for Ehrman clear illustrations of this view. Bauer overstates his case, often making claims without evidence, but the phenomenon of textual diversity cannot be denied. The motive for an early Christian scribe’s selection or creation of a different reading is still much a matter of debate.

Parker’s incisive review of the sayings of Jesus on marriage and divorce leads him to conclude that recovery of an original saying of Jesus is impossible. What is available is not the original texts but “a collection of interpretive rewritings of the tradition” (92–93). The implications of these observations are of critical importance for the exegete, theologian, and church leader. Parker points to two facts, “that the Gospel texts exist only in a manuscript tradition, and that from the beginning the text grew freely. It is from these facts that all questions of interpretation and all theological formulations must start. Concepts of biblical inspiration, or any other doctrinal formulations, which fail to take account of these two key facts are based on a priori theorizing or prejudice, and not on the actual character of the writings” (203).

Did the text grow freely, or were there some controls and constraints? To answer this question, the student of the text must reckon with several factors that have recently surfaced in the study of early Christianity.

- (p 786)1. The relative ease of travel in the earliest Christian centuries meant that early Christians communicated with one another and knew each other’s manuscripts. Roman scribes knew Alexandrian readings and vice versa. A Greek fragment of Irenaeus, written in Gaul, around 200 CE, turned up in Egypt “not long after the ink was dry” (Roberts 53).
2. Most NT textual critics, not known to embrace each other’s views, agree that all significant variations in the NT textual tradition were in place before 200 CE (Ehrman 44). This means that the second century, from which our earliest papyri are dated, can provide clues as to how the NT (and OT) was copied and preserved in the context of the culture and its theological and ethical crosscurrents.
3. It is increasingly clear that the church remained more Jewish far longer than has formerly been allowed. Therefore, the attitudes toward the text and the motives and methods of textual alteration in the OT should be studied more closely in assessing changes in the NT text in the most critical period before 200 CE. For example, the two textual types in the Acts of the Apostles should be studied in light of similar phenomena in the book of Esther, with two distinct Greek versions, the LXX and the Alpha-Text (Jobes and Silva 227–35).
4. “Proto-orthodox” teachers and scribes retained in their texts some readings that were potentially embarrassing to them. P.Oxy. 405, a fragment of Against Heresies, and possibly from the hand of Irenaeus himself, shows that he cited a form of Matt. 3:17 (“You are ...” rather than “This is my beloved Son”) that would have been useful in the hands of the adoptionists. Luke 23:34a (“Father, forgive them ...”) is omitted in some early manuscripts (P75 B D W etc.). The omission accords with the common claim of the second and third centuries that the Jews were responsible for Jesus’ death, and thus denied forgiveness. Origen makes such a claim (Cels. 4.22). It is surprising that Origen quoted the contested words several times, though he must have known manuscripts that lacked the reading. These are words he would have preferred not to have in Scripture. Despite temptations to alter the text, Irenaeus, Origen, and others faithfully copied the Scriptures they had received. Controls to the free growth of the text are evident.

F. J. A. Hort had stated that there are no variations in the NT textual tradition that were altered by orthodox scribes for doctrinal purposes (Hort and Westcott 42); Ehrman, Parker, and others have demonstrated that such intentional theological and ethical changes did occur. However, there is no evidence of such intentional alteration being sanctioned by the church leadership or practiced by official scribes of the church. No doubt zealous scribes took matters into their own hands; Eusebius’s brief citations from Dionysius of Corinth (ca. 170 CE) show that church leaders were alert to such dangers. This very awareness indicates controls on the free growth of the texts. Despite undue pessimism regarding establishing the original text, Ehrman and Parker have done a valuable service by insisting that the textual critic is a necessary partner with the exegete, church historian, and theologian in the enterprise of interpreting Scripture.

The two parallel phenomena of control and freedom in the transmission of the text can be found in both OT and NT textual traditions. The two disciplines should therefore be studied together, especially where the material overlaps, as in the OT quotations in the NT. Claims that the NT text grew because it was not yet considered canonical must reckon with the reality that the canonical status of the OT within Judaism did not prevent continued interpretative rendering. Furthermore, from the privileged position of the MT the NT textual critic can gain respect for the Byzantine text.

The study of NT textual variations within quotations from the OT provides a useful point of departure for the practice of textual criticism with a theological focus. The following verses promise to be especially fruitful in this exploration: Matt. 3:3; 13:35; 27:43; Mark 1:3; 7:6; 10:7, 19; 12:36; 15:34; Luke 3:22; 4:4, 18; 19:38; John 10:34; 13:18; Acts 2:30; 15:18; Rom. 8:28; 9:28, 33; 10:5, 15; 13:9; 1 Cor. 15:55; Gal. 3:17; Eph. 4:8; 5:31; Phil. 2:11; 2 Thess. 2:4, 8; Heb. 1:8, 12; 2:7; 3:2; 10:38; 1 Pet. 2:3; 3:15; Rev.

4:7; 15:3.

The OT textual critic will be careful to assess a variety of aspects of the NT quotation (form, introduction, selection, application, history, and function) in the context of the range of developing interpretations in intertestamental Judaism. The NT textual critic should be careful to look beyond the confines of Christian manuscripts and developments in the early church. One needs to (p 787) assess the form and function of the text in the MT, LXX and versions, Qumran, Samaritan Pentateuch, and Hellenistic Judaism in Alexandria and elsewhere, and to view the NT's use of OT texts as a part of this larger stream of developing interpretations. What is shared with that stream and what is uniquely Christian will come clearly into focus. The textual critic, then, as full partner in the interpretative task, offers some of the earliest and best data for the theological interpretation of Scripture.

Bibliography

Aland, K., and B. Aland. The Text of the New Testament, trans. E. F. Rhodes. Eerdmans, 1987; Bauer, W. Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, trans. G. Strecker. Fortress, 1971; Black, D. A., ed. Rethinking New Testament Textual Criticism. Baker, 2002; Ehrman, B. The Orthodox Corruption of Scripture. Oxford University Press, 1993; Ehrman, B., and M. Holmes. The Text of the New Testament in Contemporary Research. Eerdmans, 1995; Epp, E. J. "The Multivalence of the Term 'Original Text' in New Testament Textual Criticism." HTR 92 (1999): 245–81; Hort, F. J. A., and B. F. Westcott. The New Testament in the Original Greek. Cambridge University Press, 1882; Housman, A. "The Application of Thought to Textual Criticism." In Selected Prose, ed. J. Carter. Cambridge University Press, 1961; Jobes, K., and M. Silva. Invitation to the Septuagint. Baker, 2000; Kilpatrick, G. The Principles and Practice of New Testament Textual Criticism, ed. J. Elliott. BETL 96. Louvain University Press/Peeters, 1990; Metzger, B. The Text of the New Testament. 3d ed. Oxford University Press, 1992; Parker, D. The Living Text of the Gospels. Cambridge University Press, 1997; Roberts, C. Manuscript, Society and Belief in Early Christian Egypt. Oxford University Press, 1979; Tov, E. Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible. 2d rev. ed. Fortress/Royal Van Gorcum, 2001; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998.

Peter R. Rodgers

Theme      See Language, Linguistics

Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

At its broadest, "hermeneutics" is an effort to understand the nature of human understanding. Often, though not necessarily, this takes the particular form of understanding the understanding of texts, or else all forms of understanding in terms of “texts”—whether a person, a poem, a play, or a painting, and so on is being understood, it is understood as a text. However, in the modern age focus shifted from the practice of textual interpretation to its ontological possibility via human historicity (Heidegger’s influence, especially via Gadamer).

The broader history and significance of that philosophical project is chronicled elsewhere. “Theological hermeneutics,” however, is fast becoming a term with its own history, which may designate at least two projects for Christians to undertake. (1) They need to develop an account of text interpretation or even human understanding in interaction with Christian doctrine(s). (2) They also need to develop an account of how biblical interpretation should shape, and be shaped by, Christian theology. For the former project, the adjective “theological” designates the mode in which general hermeneutics are pursued; for the latter, “theological” designates not only a mode of pursuit, but also the material aims of special hermeneutics regarding the Bible. The two projects may be undertaken simultaneously, or distinctly, or even separately—as if the interpretative interests of each are uninteresting to the other. The following chronicle leads to a suggestion for their interrelationship.

Appealing to Precedents

Theological hermeneutics frequently appeal to precedent(s) favoring their work. In particular, many concerned with “theological interpretation of Scripture” have been motivated by admiration for premodern exegetes, perhaps even by nostalgia for their “religious reading” (Griffiths) and adherence to a unified Bible.

Premodern Readers. Accordingly, many appeal to precritical models and to the Rule of Faith, championed by Irenaeus, Tertullian, and other patristic interpreters. Appeals are also made to the medieval fourfold sense (Steinmetz).

Origen has been frequently studied, given his influence upon allegorical exegesis as well as his general intrigue. However, the practices of Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, Martin Luther, and John Calvin have the most potential for present influence.

Augustine’s De doctrina christiana (On Christian Teaching) influenced Christian pedagogy and exegetical practice even into the Reformation period (examined, e.g., in English). As noted below, efforts have been made to recover a hermeneutic of charity that follows in his footsteps (Jacobs), while his understanding of Scripture’s “plain sense” has also been studied comparatively (Greene-McCreight). Augustine is sometimes said to be the father of semiotics (e.g., Jeanrond 22, who probably overemphasizes such traditional connections to general hermeneutics).

When appeals are made to the medieval fourfold sense, or conversely to the Reformers' rejection (p 788) of allegorical interpretation, we must remember that Thomas Aquinas (and others) had already begun to recover a priority upon the literal sense (Rogers's essay has become influential). The late medieval growth of grammatical exegesis, and of humanism generally, did indeed flower in the Reformers' hermeneutics, whether they lean more toward the premodern or the modern (about which there is much discussion). Their connection to the Protestant scholastics and the extent to which the latter are protomodern figure here. Whereas a certain consistency with the fathers is evident (so, e.g., Greene-McCreight), many fault the Reformation both for individualism (the "priesthood of the believer" run amok à la American democracy; e.g., Hauerwas) and "foundationalism," as an outgrowth of sola scriptura (Abraham) coupled with the modern turn to method (Louth). Conversely, however, Frei—no friend of modernity—seems to appreciate Calvin's approach to Scripture, differentiating the early Protestant "figural reading" (the literal sense extended to the whole canonical story) from a later, eighteenth-century shift.

Modern Reactions. If premodern interpreters have inspired theological hermeneutics (along with debates over the Protestant legacy), so has a perceived archenemy of the modern, whose appropriation of the Reformers was at points critical—Barth. Not only does Barth loom large in Jeanrond's chronicle Theological Hermeneutics, but he has also inspired studies such as Cunningham's What Is Theological Exegesis? and figures in Greene-McCreight's comparative study.

It would appear that Barth's understanding and use of critical biblical scholarship developed over time. Oddly enough, he "had no significant place for any such thing as 'biblical theology,' " yet stimulated certain of its forms (Barr 73). In any case, it appears that the early Barth held a generally negative theory of the compatibility between historical criticism and theological exegesis. However, his position grew toward a more ad hoc approach: historical criticism provides "a starting point for the interpretive exercise and at a later stage in the hermeneutical process helps to safeguard against subjective excess" (McCormack, cited in Cunningham 16n37).

Whereas much has been made of Barth's legacy, Bultmann's has been more modest or even negative within the "theological interpretation of Scripture" movement. Appreciative of Heidegger's existential philosophy, Bultmann distinguished "presuppositions" (indispensable) from "prejudice" (inappropriate) in study of the NT. Famously suggesting the impossibility of believing in miracles while using lightbulbs, he defended a program of "demythologization" in which the true theological significance of supernatural claims was the crux of interpretation. Thus would the gospel's claim on the modern human be clarified; Bultmann used supposedly historical criteria to separate faith from history (which would, in his particular Lutheran view, constitute reliance upon something besides the word of God). In any case, as Jeanrond notes, both Barth and Bultmann "tried to overcome the ideological limitations of historicist interpretation of the Bible" (157), but opposed each other concerning proper interaction with philosophy.

Addressing General Hermeneutics

Yet Bultmann seems to have set the stage for biblical scholarship to interact with general hermeneutics more intentionally, especially via the "New Hermeneutic." For a long time, however, such interaction meant basically adopting or adapting general hermeneutics to the task of biblical interpretation, albeit sometimes in the shadow of a "word of God" theology (e.g., Ebeling). More recently, efforts have been made in the reverse—to assess the influence of biblical interpretation upon general hermeneutics, or even to address general hermeneutics by way of understanding biblical interpretation.

Philosophy. Jeanrond, in fact, strongly advocates special hermeneutics only following, then contributing to, general hermeneutics: "Our narrative of the history of philosophical hermeneutics began with a theologian, Friedrich Schleiermacher, who discovered that theological interpretation needed a thorough foundation in philosophical hermeneutics. Now the development of philosophical hermeneutics by Ricoeur has revealed the need to include the interpretation of religious texts in an adequate human existential reflection. The symmetry between the theological endeavours of Schleiermacher and the philosophical enterprise of Ricoeur is striking!" (Jeanrond 77). Accordingly, Jeanrond celebrates the work of Tracy and others who follow in Schleiermacher's footsteps and lean heavily on Ricoeur. Meanwhile, he criticizes not only Barth but also the likes of Ebeling for their failure to interact with, or contribute to, philosophical hermeneutics (e.g., Jeanrond 158).

The British NT scholar Thiselton burst upon the scene with The Two Horizons. Critically appreciative of philosophers such as Gadamer and Ricoeur, he has maintained the possibility of (p 789) scholarly exegesis but also personal and theological engagement with the biblical text. He has written widely, from a significant commentary on 1 Corinthians to a hermeneutical recovery of "selfhood." Thiselton has drawn upon speech-act philosophy, especially its significance for divine “promising” in relation to the Bible.

Wolterstorff has also applied speech-act philosophy, defending the possibility of “divine discourse” and developing aspects of such a model. He suggests that God appropriates the human discourse of biblical texts, unless we have good reason to think otherwise (based on an exceptional principle, that God would only tell the truth and promote love for neighbor). We therefore approach the Bible with a first hermeneutic (for the human discourse), and then a second (for the divine). Perhaps this illuminates our larger point: Wolterstorff almost thoroughly borrows concepts from general hermeneutics for biblical interpretation, and then addresses its particularities. But he does not critically or constructively address general hermeneutics from a theological perspective, or with biblical interpretation in mind.

Literary Criticism. Besides philosophical hermeneutics, again the traffic moves largely one way with literary theory (e.g., the importance of Fish and Stout for Fowl’s Engaging Scripture, or the variety of literary influences upon Callahan’s The Clarity of Scripture).

Lundin and Walhout have, however, collaborated with Thiselton. In those projects, as well as his The Culture of Interpretation, Lundin offers theologically informed assessments of modern literary hermeneutics’ cultural history. The idea that Christian faith itself, by interacting with the Bible, developed a distinctive literary culture is demonstrated in Jeffrey’s People of the Book. Jeffrey seems intent on defending such a culture not only against deconstructionists who charge the West with “logocentrism,” but also against individualized Western Christians who internalize everything besides the word.

Likewise, Jacobs is concerned to recover the relationality of Christian reading. Unfolding a hermeneutic of charity that recalls Augustine, he appeals to Bakhtin as a resource for exploring the “dialogical” nature of reading practice. Largely eschewing theoretical procedure for charitable practical reason (see his prelude), in a rich tapestry of example and reflection he demonstrates that “we need not choose between a self-absorbed hedonism and a diligently politicized interpretation that gradgrindingly forces every text and every author into a fixed place in the political grid.” A hermeneutics of love “will be both flexible and responsible, ... will have universal obligations but highly particular forms of attention” leading to shalom (Jacobs 138).

The Bible. Vanhoozer shares the interest of Thiselton and Wolterstorff in speech-act philosophy, as well as the idea of a Christian literary culture and Augustinian hermeneutics of love. In Is There a Meaning in This Text? Vanhoozer pursues the development and defense of “the morality of literary knowledge” (his subtitle) by exploring biblical interpretation. He argues that readers are obligated to do justice to the communicative actions of authors, that texts do not contain but just are communicative actions. Vanhoozer seems intent on general hermeneutics, suggesting that Christians start with the Bible as a way to learn about interpretation. His subsequent work focuses more upon special hermeneutics, perhaps responding to worries about neglecting the specific problems and possibilities in reading the Bible as Scripture, with the Holy Spirit. His 1998 book is probably read too much for special hermeneutics—hence comes misunderstanding about what is not addressed.

Articulating Special Hermeneutics

We may assess specifically Christian contributions to hermeneutics as modest but promising, having begun to move from uncritical adoption of reigning general hermeneutics to (more recently) critical appropriations of them for biblical interpretation. Yet the legacy of a Christian literary culture, along with modern and postmodern reactions to it, is still assessed variously regarding its particular relevance for biblical interpretation.

“Canonical Approach.” The Yale OT scholar Childs, in some respects building on the tradition-historical approach of von Rad, responded to the demise of the so-called biblical theology movement by developing what has been called a canonical approach. While intricacies are treated elsewhere, we note here its importance. Childs’s practice (exemplified in a famous commentary on Exodus) has been to interact with precritical exegetes such as Calvin and theologians such as Barth, plus critical scholarship. The goal is treatment of the text’s final form, but in light of its canonical status, and thus what the traces of its formative processes shed on its meaning. He has tried to do biblical, not just OT or NT, theology, but still to grant the OT some integrity as canonical. Methodological shifts or inconsistencies have been traced even by the appreciative (e.g., Watson), while Barr has tenaciously attacked (p 790) idiosyncrasies. Perhaps Childs’s program could only achieve stability with a doctrine of biblical inspiration added (Noble). Regardless, his legacy of inspiring theological exegesis is secure, as a Festschrift evidences (Seitz and Greene-McCreight).

“Biblical Theology.” Watson has authored two daring catalysts to theological hermeneutics. The first, Text, Church, and World, tries to return theological questions to biblical interpretation, treating textuality (part 1) and hence postmodernism (part 2), feminist critique (part 3), and finally the relation of theology, hermeneutics, and exegesis more explicitly (part 4). Watson appreciates the synchronic and literary emphases often associated with the “Yale School”; he interacts with both Childs and Frei, whose critique of modern Gospels interpretation (Eclipse) has been influential. Yet he insists that the biblical texts themselves demand engagement with historical and especially ethical concerns. Thus the “intratextuality” called for by Lindbeck in The Nature of Doctrine must give way to an “intratextual realism,” which emerges from interactions with both postmodernism and feminism. In the resulting theological hermeneutics (Watson, Church, ch. 13), access to Jesus is textually mediated; work with the canonical form does not immunize the text from criticism, due to a law-gospel hermeneutic; thus, insights from the secular world may assist the church’s reading of its Scripture.

The second book, Text and Truth, has tried to redefine biblical theology (as the subtitle suggests) to be “an interdisciplinary approach to biblical interpretation which seeks to dismantle the barriers that at present separate biblical scholarship from Christian theology, ... a theological, hermeneutical and exegetical discipline” (Watson, Truth, vii). Watson claims that the demarcation between OT and NT studies stems from a similar line between biblical studies and systematic theology, which has become normative, not just pragmatic for dividing up labor. Opposing this requires that Watson respond to critics, as well as Barr at points. Contra Childs, Watson denies the OT integrity as a canon, a debate that has since continued (Seitz; Watson, “Response”). The book continues Watson’s trend of developing hermeneutical positions while practicing exegesis on particular issues—such as the Gospels as multiple narrated histories, and the doctrine of creation over against Barr’s defense of natural theology.

Others are pursuing a renewal of biblical theology as well. For instance, Moberly has written The Bible, Theology, and Faith, a captivating study of connections between Abraham and Jesus via a modified canonical approach increasingly characteristic of some OT scholars. The more traditionally critical Stuhlmacher and others are represented in a recent collection of essays (Hafemann), as is the salvation-historical emphasis of many Australian, British, and American evangelicals reflected in the New Dictionary of Biblical Theology (Alexander and Rosner).

“Underdetermined” Hermeneutics. Yet Hafemann’s Biblical Theology volume also contains a rejection of biblical theology by Fowl. Arguing partly from history, he sees its integrity as an academic discipline lying in a historical approach of the sort Barr champions. By contrast, Fowl’s Engaging Scripture illustrates three claims fairly common to “theological interpretation of Scripture” as a movement: (1) Scriptural exegesis belongs in the church. (2) Practical reasoning will be needed (which, like Watson, Fowl exemplifies by providing extended theological interpretations). (3) Thus, Christians are not compelled to accept the reigning practices and ideologies of critical biblical scholarship, which tends to splinter theology into discrete disciplines and the Bible into discrete Testaments.

Fowl’s own model, however, does not represent the entire movement, as he acknowledges. He tells three “stories of interpretation.” The “anti-determinate” approach of deconstruction is the parasitic opposite of “determinate” interpretation, (1) which has the aim of “rendering interpretation redundant.” (2) “It views the biblical text as a problem to be mastered” (32). (3) “It sees the biblical text as a relatively stable element in which an author inserts, hides, or dissolves (choose your metaphor) meaning.” (4) It assumes “that matters of doctrine and practice are straightforwardly determined by biblical interpretation and never the other way around” (34). (5) It trumps others by showing how “opponents have allowed theological concerns, prejudices, or preferences to determine their interpretation” (35). And (6) it is linked to “method,” implying a “professional ethic” that snatches the Bible from ordinary Christians (47). Fowl criticizes Watson and Childs for following this approach, but instead advocates “underdetermined” interpretation, believing that “there is no theoretical way to determine how these interactions [of Christians and biblical texts] must work in any particular context” (8).

Fowl’s composite “determinate interpretation” can only describe traditional biblical scholarship or even a worst-case modern scenario. Watson (p 791) and others who champion the literal sense of Scripture, often in connection with authorial discourse interpretation, also champion churchly reading and practical reason; they simply understand biblical authority and general hermeneutics somewhat differently.

A better-told story would connect three modes of “postcritical canonical interpretation” (Lindbeck, “Three Modes”) with three hermeneutical understandings of biblical authority (Buckley). (1) Advocates of authorial discourse interpretation tend to be “revelationalists” (emphasizing God’s presence related to the Bible’s subject matter). (2) Advocates of interpreting for the Bible’s witness to Jesus Christ tend to be “textualists” (emphasizing the final form). And (3) advocates of interpreting for narrationally structured symbolic worlds tend to be “functionalists” (emphasizing the interpretative context). Of course, these are generalizations; the first two categories tend to run together, as Lindbeck himself and probably Watson illustrate. Fowl seems to take functionalism as a thoroughly normative position, beyond its more descriptive analysis of how theologians use the Bible (Kelsey, Uses). Missing is any discussion of “word of God.” Many other theological hermeneutics, by contrast, are less enamored of Fish’s emphasis on interpretative communities, because they understand the Bible as Scripture to communicate divine discourse.

Precisely because of commitment to “canon,” Webster worries about correlating biblical interpretation with general hermeneutics. Ultimately the doctrine of the Trinity must be involved, and theories of textuality can have only ad hoc usefulness so as to avoid the secular anthropology underlying hermeneutics. The Bible and Word of God are related sacramentally: “God’s agency is real and effective yet indirect” (Webster 74). This enables a priority of divine action over the reading situation that, while embracing communal and ethical concerns over against hermeneutical domination, still depicts the church responding to an external word.

The preceding discussion illustrates the dependence of theological hermeneutics on dogmatic positions, in addition to disciplinary locations and practical concerns. For example, further specification of Webster’s sacramental theology would be needed, but might prompt rejection of this correlation with the nature of the Bible, unless scriptural warrant were provided. Though fraught with perils, the possible analogy between the human texts of the Bible as divine discourse and the hypostatic union of Jesus Christ, God’s final Word, deserves continued hermeneutical attention, in concert with the trinitarian doctrine Webster prioritizes. If Scripture is revelatory, then theology will be hermeneutically decisive; yet that can be defended as appropriate for such a text, without entailing iconoclastic relativism (Gracia).

Attempting to Connect the General and Special

This survey of theological approaches to biblical interpretation is scarcely comprehensive. While these are prominent in Western academic literature, openness is needed to postcolonial and non-Western insights. Perhaps more basic still is a certain personal openness to reading with and for the Christian virtues. One needs to be attentive via practical reason (phronēsis) or imagination not only to the particulars of the text but also to the context, especially the church’s historical commitments along with its call to serve in the contemporary world. Yet these persistent themes of special hermeneutics—now frequently tied to a “performance” model on analogy with music or drama (surveyed in Barton)—could perhaps be understood non-Christianly or undertaken nontheologically in “postmodern” fashion. Meanwhile, they also pertain when reading texts in general! So a fresh Christian contribution to hermeneutics is unlikely without deciding what is distinctive about reading the Bible as word of God.

Should we seek a hermeneutic that will cover understanding generally, and then apply this more specifically to how we understand God’s self-disclosure? Or should we seek a hermeneutic that applies only select insights from that special case to texts in general?

However we nuance, we tend to privilege one or the other. The burden on those who take very seriously general hermeneutics is “to do justice to what is essential for Christian communal identity, and avoid the reduction of Christian knowledge to a mere ‘case in point’ of some more general kind of knowing.” The burden on those who take very seriously a starting point in special hermeneutics is “to relate the singular Christian knowledge of God to other human knowing, and avoid the isolation of the knowledge of God in a special ‘religious’ sphere” (Buckley and Yeago 7). General hermeneutics, though, always foster our understanding of what is special about knowing God via the Bible, since they offer the languages within which, and the cultural “others” against which, we articulate Christian concerns.

(p 792) If the triune God chose to create others with whom to share the communion of the divine life, and if God communicates to fallen creatures through the redemptive action of Son and Spirit, then human understanding will be a relational affair intimately connecting knowledge and love. For ancients like Augustine, these were as inseparably related as their parallel in the Word and Spirit of the Holy Trinity (Williams). “Understanding” might then be characterized in terms of various “capacities for action in relation to something” (Kelsey, Understand, 124–29), specifically communicative action.

Consequently, we should be predisposed toward a Christian version of a “virtue epistemology,” in which understanding is dialogical, undertaken with our character formed in community—ultimately with the God who is love. This accords with the general but Christianly informed sensibilities of Bakhtin, but can be articulated in “virtue” categories according to the biblical theme of “discernment” or “judgment.” Wise Christian reading is possible in Christ, patterned after him, and then pursued as people develop in community the capacity to recognize what situations call for, and respond accordingly. Via phronēsis, virtue properly deploys sciences and skills.

A Christian hermeneutic for the Bible will nevertheless be special in at least two senses. (1) God in the person of Jesus Christ is freely communicated in Scripture, and forms our character through the active accompaniment of the Holy Spirit, as covenanted through no other book. (2) This communication takes the form of various writings that were composed spanning a complex history of revelation and redemption, yet are collected as human forms faithfully speaking one word. We read Scripture with a submissive, trusting expectation to encounter God in the truth, goodness, and beauty of Christ, as no other book can match. By God's grace the Christian virtues are necessarily conducive to grasping the meaning of biblical Truth in particular.

However, O'Donovan reminds us that people outside the Christian faith may understand and even obey many divine ordinances because God created with order, and has reaffirmed this in Christ's resurrection—hence, for example, the Wisdom literature and its connection to other cultures. In terms of special hermeneutics, these others fail to match the moral whole—they cannot respond with integrity (in the full sense Wisdom calls for) because they do not know and love the God of cruciform wisdom. Yet they may have insight into many particulars, and help us recognize how beautiful and good patterns of Truth cohere in Scripture; often we will mistake these connections or need criticism when we do not connect our own living with what we see.

The lesson is that strong similarity can obtain between special and general hermeneutics. Often non-Christian interpreters will understand—that is, develop various capacities for communicative action in relation to—texts far better than Christians will. With various virtues they will perhaps read charitably to a degree, even Scripture—but not in the fullest sense of integrity or imagination, for they do not know and love the One who is love, the form knowledge takes in its fullest connections and freedom. To the degree that the whole shapes the parts, there may be misunderstanding.

Such communicative action has not yet fully accounted for reaction to the Spirit over time and across place: God's communicative action takes human forms, with the Spirit giving freedom for our communicative actions to correspond fittingly with God's in Christ. Perhaps the most contested aspect of theological hermeneutics must concern the form our corresponding action takes in the church, and therefore the respective roles of Word and Spirit.

Human persons are agents; communities are not, except in a more abstract and complex sense. Ultimately, however, the NT teaches that the Spirit effects the new creation of one new humanity—that the local church, the concrete shape of catholicity, would correspond corporately to “the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ” (Eph. 4:13 RSV). The goal is a community united in growth to maturity, which connects truth and love. Given biblical texts regarding discernment, such as Phil. 1:9–11, for example, practical reason must be a gift in which we pray to grow together.

Our personal actions, and even the communication of congregations, are but subplots in the effect of God’s one act, in the growing creation of a new humanity conformed—with knowledge corresponding—to the Son. This does not disregard personal actions as unimportant, or deny that communities are unfaithful. Sometimes particular people (like Luther) must read against the grain. Yet doctrinal development, cultural difference, and therefore ethical discernment are not always problems but possibly a “Pentecostal plurality” in relation to Scripture (Vanhoozer, Meaning? 419–21; Smith).

The Spirit’s new creation has a developmental identity across time and a dialogical unity across (p 793)place that entails discernment—figuring out in what ways the church grows in faithfulness, free to take cultural form in correspondence to the Word. If this is right, then parallel to general hermeneutics, understanding and moral formation are possible in many particular ways for persons outside the Christian faith and communities outside the church. But parallel to special hermeneutics, the fullest sense of understanding and spiritual formation is not. General and special hermeneutics will therefore share much overlapping territory, including many scholarly criteria and reading skills, even as biblical interpretation constitutes a distinct province. Despite its church polis, Christian reading of Scripture may not have to address general hermeneutics either by “plundering the Egyptians” or by defending against a Trojan horse. Indeed, since its entire realm concerns living virtuously in communion with God, all understanding will have a theological component—and so the interpretation of Scripture may have abundant hermeneutical gifts to share, in a developing story of fair trade.

See also Hermeneutics; Virtue; Wisdom

Bibliography

Abraham, W. Canon and Criterion in Christian Theology. Clarendon, 1998; Alexander, T. D., and B. Rosner, eds. New Dictionary of Biblical Theology. InterVarsity, 2000; Barr, J. The Concept of Biblical Theology. Fortress, 1999; Barton, S. “New Testament Interpretation as Performance.” SJT 52, no. 2 (1999): 179–208; Buckley, J. “Beyond the Hermeneutical Deadlock.” Pages 187–203 in Theology after Liberalism, ed. J. Webster and G. Schner. Blackwell, 2000; Buckley, J., and D. Yeago, eds. Knowing the Triune God. Eerdmans, 2001; Callahan, J. The Clarity of Scripture.

InterVarsity, 2001; Cunningham, M. K. What Is Theological Exegesis? Trinity, 1995; English, E., ed. Reading and Wisdom. Notre Dame University Press, 1995; Fowl, S. Engaging Scripture. Blackwell, 1998; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; Gracia, J. How Can We Know What God Means? Palgrave, 2001; Greene-McCreight, K. Ad Litteram. P. Lang, 1999; Griffiths, P. Religious Reading. Oxford University Press, 1999; Hafemann, S., ed. Biblical Theology. InterVarsity, 2003; Hauerwas, S. Unleashing the Scripture. Abingdon, 1993; Jacobs, A. A Theology of Reading. Westview, 2001; Jeanrond, W. Theological Hermeneutics. Crossroad, 1991; Jeffrey, D. People of the Book. Eerdmans, 1996; Kelsey, D. To Understand God Truly. Westminster John Knox, 1992; idem. The Uses of Scripture in Recent Theology. Fortress, 1975. Reissued as Proving Doctrine. Trinity, 1999; Lindbeck, G. The Nature of Doctrine. Westminster John Knox, 1984; idem. "Postcritical Canonical Interpretation: Three Modes of Retrieval." Pages 26–51 in Theological Exegesis, ed. C. Seitz and K. Greene-McCreight. Eerdmans, 1999; Louth, A. Discerning the Mystery. Clarendon, 1983; Lundin, R. The Culture of Interpretation. Eerdmans, 1993; idem, ed. Disciplining Hermeneutics. Eerdmans, 1997; idem. The Promise of Hermeneutics. Eerdmans, 1999; Lundin, R., C. Walhout, and A. Thiselton. The Responsibility of Hermeneutics. Eerdmans, 1985; Moberly, R. W. L. The Bible, Theology, and Faith. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Noble, P. The Canonical Approach. Brill, 1995; O'Donovan, O. Resurrection and Moral Order. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1994; Rogers, E., Jr. "How the Virtues of an Interpreter Presuppose and Perfect Hermeneutics: The Case of Thomas Aquinas." JR 76, no. 1 (January 1996): 64–81; Seitz, C. "Christological Interpretation of Texts and Trinitarian Claims to Truth: An Engagement with Francis Watson's Text and Truth." SJT 52, no. 2 (1999): 209–26; Seitz, C., and K. Greene-McCreight, eds. Theological Exegesis. Eerdmans, 1999; Smith, J. K. A. The Fall of Interpretation. InterVarsity, 2000; Steinmetz, D. "The Superiority of Pre-Critical Exegesis." Pages 26–38 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997; Thiselton, A. Interpreting God and the Postmodern Self. Eerdmans, 1995; idem. New Horizons in Hermeneutics. Zondervan, 1992; idem. The Two Horizons. Eerdmans, 1980; Vanhoozer, K. First Theology. InterVarsity, 2002; idem. Is There a Meaning in this Text? Zondervan, 1998; Watson, F. "The Old Testament as Christian Scripture: A Response to Professor Seitz." SJT 52, no. 2 (1999): 227–32; idem. Text and Truth. Eerdmans, 1997; idem. Text, Church, and World. Eerdmans, 1994; Webster, J. Word and Church. T&T Clark, 2001; Williams, A. "Contemplation: Knowledge of God in Augustine's De trinitate." Pages 121–46 in Knowing the Triune God, ed. J. Buckley and D. Yeago. Eerdmans, 2001; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995; Wood, C. The Formation of Christian Understanding. Trinity, 1993.

Daniel J. Treier

Theology    See Doctrine; Systematic Theology

Theology, NT      See Biblical Theology

Theology, OT      See Biblical Theology

Theophany      See Revelation

Theory      See Practical Theology; Wisdom

1 Thessalonians, Book of

First Thessalonians holds a unique place among the writings of the NT in the view of many contemporary scholars because it is widely believed that 1 Thessalonians is not only Paul's first extant letter, but also the earliest extant writing of Christianity. If this is correct then 1 Thessalonians gives us our earliest window on the theology of nascent Christianity. Strikingly, this theology is communicated in the form of a letter and through the medium of apocalyptic discourse. Both of these points are significant. Beker (Paul; and "Recasting") argues that Paul's (p 794) letters are characterized by contingency and coherence. The contingency results from the unique situation addressed by each letter; the coherence derives from Paul's interpretation of the Christ event through the master symbolism of Jewish apocalyptic thought. A proper interpretation of 1 Thessalonians requires that both of these points be kept in mind.

History of Interpretation

The earliest extant commentaries on 1 Thessalonians come from the Antiochene school of theology in the fourth and fifth centuries. The school approached Scripture as a historical document and as a result sought the meaning intended by the inspired author. This posed a problem for them since in 4:15 Paul seems to place himself among the living at the time of the parousia, but if this is what he intended, history proved him wrong. As a result the tendency was simply to deny that Paul referred to himself in order to avoid the apostle being wrong. Some contemporary commentators follow the same approach.

During the Middle Ages commentators often merely reproduced the church fathers or resorted to allegorical exegesis. With the Protestant Reformation allegorical interpretation was replaced by grammatical and literal interpretations. The legacy of the early Reformers meant that scholars became interested in historical questions with respect to the Bible. In the case of 1 Thessalonians Hugo Grotius in the early seventeenth century raised questions regarding the order in which Paul wrote the Thessalonian letters, arguing for a reversed sequence to the canonical order. The issue that he first posed, the relation between the Thessalonians letters, has remained a significant part of Thessalonians studies to this day. Grotius's arguments for the priority of 2 Thessalonians have been developed significantly during the last two centuries. But others have claimed that 2 Thessalonians is a post-Pauline forgery.

In the nineteenth century Baur questioned the Pauline authorship of 1 Thessalonians, but his view failed to carry conviction. More recently some (e.g., Richard, Thessalonians) have claimed that it is a compilation of two or more letters based on form-critical considerations regarding the multiple thanksgivings. Several scholars (e.g., Pearson) have claimed that 2:14–16 is a Deutero-Pauline interpolation because of its anti-Jewish character. A recent debate has also emerged over whether 2:1–12 is an apostolic apology against opponents criticizing Paul (Weima), or whether the apostle was employing a self-description derived from the ideal philosopher (Malherbe, Paul). As with other Pauline letters, interpreters have been interested in the question of whether Paul was making use of various Jewish and Christian traditional materials in composing his letter. In the last twenty years rhetorical analysis has been employed extensively in the interpretation of 1 Thessalonians in order to understand Paul's persuasive strategy (e.g., Jewett), and Malherbe (Paul) has attempted to show that the pastoral nature of Paul's letter was indebted to the tradition of moral philosophers of antiquity.

Hearing the Message of 1 Thessalonians

The message of 1 Thessalonians originally addressed a community of recent converts from paganism (1:9–10). Following their acceptance of Paul's gospel, they experienced serious opposition from their fellow citizens (1:6; 2:14; 3:3). In spite of persecution and the premature departure of Paul (2:17), they remained faithful to Christ and loyal to Paul (3:6). In this situation the essential message of the letter served the twin pastoral functions of encouraging and exhorting the Thessalonians. Paul presented his message through a carefully constructed introduction (1:2–10) that introduces the main themes of the letter, an extended narrative of his relationship with the Thessalonians (2:1–3:10), and an exhortative section (4:1–5:22), which includes an eschatological clarification regarding the resurrection (4:13–18).

Much of 1 Thess. 1–3 reads like a narrative devoted to recounting aspects of Paul's and the Thessalonians' experience. Beneath the surface, however, Paul seeks to encourage his readers by reminding them of how they impressed other Christians by their response to persecution (1:4–10), and by showing them that through suffering they became imitators of himself and the Lord (1:6), as well as the Judean Christians (2:14–16). He also indicates that he has a special affection for them (2:7b–12, 19–20; 3:1–10). In 2:1–12 Paul’s account of his ministry among the Thessalonians functions to reconfirm the Thessalonians in the pattern of Christian behavior that they had seen him demonstrate in his ministry.

In the main exhortative section Paul introduces a discussion about how the readers should live as Christians. His first topic concerns sexual ethics appropriate for those called to holiness (4:3–8), while in 4:9–12 he directs them to love one another as God has taught them to do and to behave appropriately toward those outside the community of faith. Paul then offers an important theological clarification regarding participation (p 795) in the parousia of Christ (4:13–18), followed by an exhortation to ethical and religious vigilance as they wait for the coming of their Lord, through whom they are to obtain salvation (5:1–11). Before concluding the letter, Paul offers a series of short exhortations on how to live the Christian life (5:12–22).

1 Thessalonians and the Canon

Among the letters of Paul, 1 Thessalonians does not appear to be a very significant theological writing because it primarily served a pastoral function and as such contains little doctrinal material on topics like sin and the law, justification by faith, and the cross and resurrection of Christ. Nevertheless, 1 Thess. 4–5 does have theological importance within the context of the canon of Scripture. First, these chapters contain a great deal of ethical exhortation and community instruction that contribute to our understanding of what Christian identity is and how Christians should live lives of holiness in order to please God. Second, 4:13–17 contains an important discussion of the parousia, or return of Christ. In a number of respects 4:13–17 shows conceptual connections with the eschatologically charged passages of Mark 13, Matt. 24, and Luke 17. The fact is that Paul identifies what he is saying in 4:15–17 as “the word of the Lord” (NRSV). The close verbal similarities between these verses and Matt. 24:29–31 and 40–41, in particular, suggest that this passage may be a reference to the Jesus tradition regarding the coming of the Son of Man from heaven. The coming of the day of the Lord “like a thief in the night” (5:2) may also derive from the apocalyptic tradition of the coming of the Son of Man found in Matt. 24:23–27.

Although the OT is nowhere directly cited, there are allusions to it, particularly in the apocalyptic eschatological sections. For example, the expression “the day of the Lord” in 5:2 was taken over from the OT “day of Yahweh” (e.g., Amos 5:18–20; Joel 1:15;

2:31–32). Similarly, the metaphor of judgment coming like “sudden labor pains” in 5:3 is well attested in judgment passages in the OT (e.g., Isa. 13:6–8; Jer. 6:22–30), as is the light and darkness metaphor in 5:4–5 (e.g., Job 22:9–11; Ps. 82:5; Isa. 2:5; 9:2). Thus, Paul either directly or through Jewish apocalyptic traditions makes important use of the OT.

1 Thessalonians and Theology

At the center of the theological thought of 1 Thessalonians stands the belief that God elects (1:4) and then calls (2:12; 5:24) believers through the message of the gospel (1:5; 2:13), and that he appoints them to future salvation through Jesus Christ, who died for them so that they might live with him at his victorious coming from heaven (5:9–10). The future salvation to which they are called means that, unlike those who do not believe, they will not be subject to divine wrath on the day of judgment (1:9–10). From this central theological point flow several other key considerations.

First, faith represents the necessary response to the message of the gospel for those who would be saved (1:5–10). But it is more than this. It designates the trust, commitment, and loyalty that form the core elements in the Christian’s relationship with God and Jesus Christ. The Thessalonians demonstrated their faith in God by remaining loyal in the face of persecution by their fellow citizens. Such faith, maintained under adverse circumstances, can provide encouragement to others (3:7). But more importantly, God reciprocates with faithfulness toward those whom he has called. Therefore, those who trust in God may rely upon God to keep them safe and without blame until the parousia of the Lord Jesus Christ (5:23–24).

Second, God wills that believers should be holy or sanctified (4:3). Malherbe (Thessalonians, 343) identifies this theological theme, along with the election and call of believers, as the two main themes of the letter. Fundamental to the concept of sanctification is the idea of separation from what is impure (4:7). This separation involves both divine action and human effort. God’s call through the gospel of Christ involves believers’ sanctification by God (4:7). Nevertheless, God will only complete the process of sanctification at the parousia of Jesus Christ (3:13; 5:23). At the same time sanctification requires moral endeavor on the part of believers. In 4:3 sanctification, separation from all forms of immorality, constitutes the ethical response of believers as they seek to please God (4:1). It also serves to distinguish them from their pagan neighbors (4:5). To reject this requirement of the faith is to reject divine authority itself (4:7–8). Positively, sanctification is closely associated with the love that Christians are called to show toward fellow members of the community, as well as to outsiders (3:12–13). Just as much as maintaining ethical purity separates Christians from those who are not believers, so doing deeds of love toward one’s brothers and sisters in the faith also distinguishes and therefore separates Christians from outsiders (4:9–10; 1:3; Yarbrough 86–87).

(p 796)Third, the theme of hope suffuses the letter. In introducing the main topics to be covered, Paul twice alludes to his readers’ eschatological hope (1:3, 9–10). The main body of the letter, 2:1–5:22, is bracketed by 1:9–10 and 5:23, in which Paul stresses the eschatological hope of the Thessalonians. In 3:13 Paul invokes the theme of eschatological hope in the transition to the main exhortative section of the letter. Elsewhere in the letter Paul refers to eschatological hope in 2:12, 19; 4:13–18; 5:1–4, 9–10. With so many references, particularly at crucial points in the structure of the letter, it is clear that the eschatological hope of apocalyptic thought plays a fundamental role in the letter. Like moral purity and love for the family of God, Christian hope also serves to separate the followers of Christ from outsiders (4:13). First Thessalonians 4:15–17 offers a word from the Lord Jesus himself regarding the coparticipation in the parousia by both living and deceased Christians and the promise of eternal life in his presence. Knowledge of this hope means that death has lost its power for the believer in Christ, unlike those who lack this hope. The hoped-for salvation of Christians stands in complete contrast to the destiny of those without faith, who will be subject to divine wrath at the coming of the Lord. Theologically, hope for eternal life requires vigilance and ethical preparedness on the part of Christ’s followers (5:1–11).

Finally, and often unnoticed, 1 Thessalonians provides resources for a theology of ministry. Paul sets out the character of his own ministry in 2:1–12. The goal of his ministry was to declare the gospel in order to please God, not other humans (2:2–4), and to build up his converts in the faith (2:11–12). The passage also underscores the ethical qualities of his ministry as well as the exemplary character of his commitment to the Thessalonians (2:3–8, 10–11). All of this is every bit as relevant today as in Paul’s time, as is his instruction to the community to love and respect those who minister to them (5:12–13).

From this brief discussion of the themes in 1 Thessalonians, we may conclude that the theological value of 1 Thessalonians for Christians today is perhaps much greater than has often been recognized. It speaks to how Christians should live in the world while waiting with hope for the parousia of Christ.

Bibliography

Beker, J. C. Paul the Apostle. 1980. Reprint, T&T Clark, 1989; idem. "Recasting Pauline Theology: The Coherence-Contingency Scheme as Interpretive Model." Pages 15–24 in Thessalonians, Philippians, Galatians, Philemon, ed. J. Bassler. Vol. 1 of Pauline Theology. Fortress, 1991; Chapa, J. "Is First Thessalonians a Letter of Consolation?" NTS 40 (1994): 150–60; Collins, R., ed. The Thessalonian Correspondence. BETL. Leuven University Press, 1990; Donfried, K. Paul, Thessalonica, and Early Christianity. Eerdmans, 2002; idem. "The Theology of 1 Thessalonians." Pages 1–79 in The Theology of the Shorter Pauline Letters, ed. K. Donfried and I. H. Marshall. Cambridge University Press, 1993; Jewett, R. The Thessalonian Correspondence. FF. Fortress, 1986; Lyons, G. Pauline Autobiography. SBLDS. Scholars Press, 1985; Malherbe, A. The Letters to the Thessalonians. AB 32B. Doubleday, 2000; idem. Paul and the Thessalonians. Fortress, 1987; Marshall, I. H. 1 and 2 Thessalonians. NCB. Eerdmans, 1983; Meeks, W. "Social Function of Apocalyptic Language in Pauline Christianity." Pages 687–705 in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. D. Hellholm. Mohr, 1983; Pearson, B. "1 Thessalonians 2:13–16: A Deutero-Pauline Interpolation." HTR 64 (1971): 79–94; Plevnik, J. Paul and the Parousia. Hendrickson, 1997; Richard, E. J. "Early Pauline Thought: An Analysis of 1 Thessalonians." Pages 39–51 in Thessalonians, Philippians, Galatians, Philemon, ed. J. M. Bassler. Vol. 1 of Pauline Theology. Fortress, 1991; idem. First and Second Thessalonians. SP 11. Liturgical, 1995; Wanamaker, C. "Apocalyptic Discourse, Paraenesis and Identity Maintenance in 1 Thessalonians." Neot 36 (2002): 131–45; idem. The Epistles to the Thessalonians. NIGTC. Eerdmans, 1990; Weima, J. "The Function of 1 Thessalonians 2:1–12 and the Use of Rhetorical Criticism: A Response to Otto Merk." Pages 114–31 in The Thessalonians Debate, ed. K. Donfried and J. Beutler. Eerdmans, 2000; Wiles, G. Paul's Intercessory Prayers. SNTSMS 24. Cambridge University Press, 1974; Yarbrough, O. Not like the Gentiles. SBLDS 80. Scholars Press, 1985.

Charles A. Wanamaker

2 Thessalonians, Book of

In the modern period the interpretation of 2 Thessalonians has proved far more controversial than 1 Thessalonians because of three related uncertainties. First, the letter's relationship to 1 Thessalonians has been the subject of considerable debate. Second and closely related to the first, scholars have frequently contested the Pauline authorship of the letter. Third, because of the first two uncertainties and the limited information in the text, the precise situation addressed by the letter has proved elusive. Naturally, the position taken on these issues has a significant bearing on the general interpretation of the letter and more specifically on its theological interpretation (Bassler, "Peace").

History of Interpretation

The general history of commentating on 2 Thessalonians closely parallels the history for 1 Thessalonians. The elusive nature of the apocalyptic (p 797) discourse in 2 Thess. 2:1–12 has made it a fertile ground for exegetical speculation from the patristic period onward. Because most interpreters up until the modern period understood the passage to be prophetic, they linked their explanations of 2:1–12 to historical circumstances of their own period. The “man of lawlessness” (2:3–4) was early identified with the antichrist of the Johannine letters. Tertullian thought that the figure would arise on the ruins of the Roman state. He, like Chrysostom, believed the restraining force mentioned in 2:6–7 to be the Roman Empire, though Chrysostom mentions that some thought the restrainer was the Holy Spirit. The reference to the temple of God (2:4) was often taken literally, and some interpreters therefore believed that the temple in Jerusalem would have to be rebuilt for the prophecy to be fulfilled. Others understood the temple metaphorically as a reference to the church.

For the Reformers, 2:1–12 proved an invaluable scriptural weapon in their attack on the papacy. Calvin, for example, regularly referred to the pope as the antichrist, citing 2:3–4. He claimed that the papacy had arrogated to itself the honor and glory due to God alone, fulfilling the prophecy in 2:4. Some Protestants even claimed that the seat taken by the antichrist in the temple was the seat of the apostle Peter, usurped by the pope.

In the seventeenth century Hugo Grotius set the course for the modern study of 2 Thessalonians when arguing that 3:17, with its reference to Paul’s own signature, only made sense if written at the end of Paul’s first letter to the Thessalonians, not his second letter. His study raised the wider issue of the relationship of 1 and 2 Thessalonians.

Around 1800 J. Schmidt maintained that 2 Thess. 2:1–12 was an interpolation into an otherwise authentic letter. He based his conclusion on two points. First, he claimed that a contradiction existed between the sequence of events prior to the parousia of Christ in 2:1–12 and the suddenness of the parousia in 1 Thess. 4:13–5:11, and second that the antichrist fantasy in 2:1–12 was un-Pauline in character. The supposed tension between the eschatology of 1 and 2 Thessalonians has been a recurring feature in subsequent claims rejecting Pauline authorship of 2 Thessalonians.

In 1839 F. Kern rejected the authenticity of 2 Thessalonians. He maintained that 2 Thessalonians showed signs of literary dependence on 1 Thessalonians, and that 3:17 was part of the attempt by a forger to secure acceptance of his work in the name of Paul. At the turn of the twentieth century Wrede further developed Kern's literary approach. His work largely set the parameters of the debate for those rejecting Pauline authorship until the work of Trilling in 1972. Trilling consolidated and further developed the argument against Pauline authorship to the extent that, it is fair to say, a majority of critical scholars now reject the Pauline origins of 2 Thessalonians. Trilling's case, however, is far less compelling under scrutiny than is often appreciated (see Wanamaker, Epistles, 17–28; Malherbe, Letters, 364–70).

Hearing the Message of 2 Thessalonians

The starting point for hearing the message of 2 Thessalonians, like all of Paul's letters, begins with the recognition that the message of the letter is contingent upon the circumstances that Paul believed himself to be addressing. The message that we hear when listening to 2 Thessalonians depends heavily on the assumptions we make regarding the three uncertainties mentioned in the first paragraph. In this article I assume the following: (1) Paul wrote 2 Thessalonians. (2) He did so prior to writing 1 Thessalonians. (3) He did so at a time when he believed that the Thessalonian Christians were experiencing persecution on account of their new faith in God and Jesus Christ (see Wanamaker, Epistles, 17–28, 37–45).

The letter deals with three main issues. First, in 1:4–12 we find the theme of retributive justice, in which an eschatological reversal is promised. The current persecutors of the community are threatened with divine vengeance on the judgment day, while the persecuted are promised relief from their affliction. The promise of retributive vengeance to bring comfort and encouragement is unusual in Paul. Since he addressed it to a community that was powerless in the face of persecution and believed that God was just, it is at least understandable. Second, in 2:1–2 Paul exhorts the readers not to believe that the day of the Lord has already come. Presumably their experience of persecution may have led some to believe that the woes associated with the parousia of the Lord had come (Aus, "Relevance," 260–65). Paul presents evidence in 2:3–12 that the day of the Lord cannot have come yet by outlining an apocalyptic, eschatological scenario leading up to the day of the Lord. As part of this, Paul includes an etiology for the lawlessness or evil that has led to the persecution of the Thessalonians (2:7–12). The apocalyptic scenario in 2:3–12 is unparalleled in Paul or anywhere else in the NT for that matter (Malherbe, Letters, 427).

(p 798) Finally, in 3:6–15 Paul both instructs and exhorts regarding the problem of idleness among some members of the community who were not making any effort to provide for themselves. Russell has shown that the problem may have had its origins in the poor entering into client relations with better-off members of the community, thereby putting their Christian patrons under financial pressure. Paul begins by instructing the readers not to have fellowship with believers who are refusing to work for a living (3:6, 10–11). Such behavior, he indicates, runs contrary to the example that he set when preaching in Thessalonica (3:7–9). He then both commands and exhorts those who are living in idleness to mend their ways by working for a living and living quietly (3:12). In closing, he exhorts the hearers of the letter to break fellowship with any who do not obey what he has instructed, but also to continue admonishing such people to reform themselves (3:14–15).

Apart from the main points, Paul seeks to encourage and comfort his readers in their difficult circumstances through thanksgivings in 1:3–4 and 2:13–14, as well as through his wish-prayer in 2:16–17 and his prayer-request and promise of assurance in 3:1–5.

2 Thessalonians and the Canon

In the modern era 2 Thessalonians has not been considered a very significant writing. Its limited and highly contextual message, colored by apocalypticism, has marginalized it within the canon.

Not surprisingly, 2 Thessalonians is most closely related in vocabulary, content, and function to 1 Thessalonians. Several of its features, however, are connected to other canonical writings. The theme of the avenging retribution of God, which plays an important role in the book of Revelation (Collins), derives from the OT. Aus (“Relevance”), for example, has demonstrated a close relation between 2 Thess. 1 and Isa. 66, where the theme of divine vengeance occurs. Paul himself employs this theme in Rom. 12:17–21, although the context is quite different from 2 Thessalonians, and Rev. 6:9–17 and 19:2 utilize the theme of retributive vengeance specifically in relation to the persecution and martyrdom of the people of God. Although no OT passage is directly quoted, Bruce (149–53) has identified a number of OT passages parallel in thought or wording to various phrases and ideas found in 1:5–10. The judgment scene in 1:9–10 has some affinities with the coming of the Son of Man in the Gospel tradition (Wenham 347–49), and with the separation and destruction of the unrighteous in Matt. 25:31–46.

The eschatological gathering of Christians mentioned in 2:1 is redolent of a number of OT passages (e.g., Isa. 43:4–7), but the apocalyptic scenario of 2:3–12 is unparalleled in the canon. Nevertheless, several of the individual features of the scenario are connected to the OT. For example, the lawless one who defiles the temple of God should be read against Dan. 11:31, 36. His arrogation of divine status is perhaps modeled on Ezek. 28:1–10 and Isa. 14:4–20. The idea that God sends a deluding influence (2:11) is well known from the OT (e.g., 2 Sam. 24:1), and occurs in the NT (Rom. 1:24–32).

2 Thessalonians and Theology

The highly contextual and pastoral character of the letter means that Paul's theological thought is narrowly focused on addressing specific issues for his readers, issues that do not resonate very well with many Christians today. This naturally has limited the theological value of 2 Thessalonians for the contemporary church.

In relation to 1:4–12 and 2:8–12, Donfried points to a theology of divine justice, typical of Jewish and Christian apocalyptic thought, but this is a component of what Aus and Bassler ("Enigmatic Sign") have called a theology of suffering. In their account, the theology of suffering emerged in Judaism during the second and first centuries BCE. This theology believed in God's retributive justice and understood the present suffering of the righteous as the means by which they satisfied the just demands of God for their own sins in order to be made worthy of future salvation. Malherbe (Thessalonians, 408) suggests that Paul selectively employs this tradition. In 1:4–5 (part of the sentence running from 1:3–11 in the Greek) the suffering of the Thessalonians is not described as satisfying God's justice for their own sins; instead, it makes them worthy of the divine kingdom. In doing so it demonstrates God's justice toward them. A second component of this suffering theology maintains that God will send affliction to punish the godless, who currently afflict the righteous, leading to a just reversal of current unjust circumstances. In 1:6–10 Paul makes this very point. The combination of future blessing for the suffering righteous and punishment for evildoers because they afflict the righteous has often provided encouragement to the oppressed people of God, but Collins rightly (p 799) warns of the potential dehumanizing effects of the desire for vengeance.

The scenario in 2:3–12, which demonstrates that the day of the Lord has not come (2:1–2), takes us to the heart of Paul's own apocalyptically oriented eschatology. The obscure thought of the mythic-symbolic language occurring in the passage is theologically difficult for contemporary Christians to deal with at face value. For example, the temple of God (2:4) has not existed for nearly two millennia. If the mystery of lawlessness (anarchy) was already at work in Paul's day (2:7), and Paul expected the return of Christ during his lifetime (1 Thess. 4:17), what are we to make of the last 1,900 years of human history? One possibility is to look at what led to Paul's apocalyptic eschatology. The answer seems to be a sense of powerlessness and alienation caused by pervasive evil within the social, economic, political, and religious structures of the day. This same sense is not unknown to contemporary Christians in many parts of the world, as is the refusal of people to accept the truth of the gospel and instead to engage in evil without constraint (2:10–12). In the face of this, 2:3–12; 2:13–17; and 3:1–5 provide a reminder that God is ultimately in control of human destiny. Those who perpetrate evil will suffer God's recompense of condemnation; those who receive the gospel will share in the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ at his coming. Christian hope assures us that God's justice will ultimately triumph over all forms of evil, and that God's elect who already have "eternal comfort and good hope" in the present (2:16 NRSV) will be empowered for Christian living (2:17).

Bibliography

See also bibliography for "1 Thessalonians, Book of"; Aus, R. "God's Plan and God's Power: Isaiah 66 and the Restraining Factors of 2 Thess 2:6–7." JBL 96 (1977): 537–53; idem. "The Relevance of Isaiah 66:7 to Revelation 12 and 2 Thessalonians 1." ZNW 67 (1976): 252–68; Bassler, J. "The Enigmatic Sign: 2 Thessalonians 1:5." CBQ 46 (1984): 496–510; idem. "Peace in All Ways: Theology in the Thessalonian Letters: A Response to R. Jewett, E. Krentz, and E. Richard." Pages 71–85 in Thessalonians, Philippians, Galatians, Philemon, ed. J. Bassler. Vol. 1 of Pauline Theology. Fortress, 1991; Bruce, F. F. 1 and 2 Thessalonians. WBC 45. Word, 1982; Collins, A. Y. "Persecution and Vengeance in the Book of Revelation." Pages 729–49 in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, ed. D. Hellholm. Mohr/Siebeck, 1983; Donfried, K. "The Theology of 2 Thessalonians." Pages 88–113 in The Theology of the Shorter Pauline Letters, ed. K. Donfried and I. H. Marshall. Cambridge University Press, 1993; Giblin, C. The Threat to Faith. AnBib 31. Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1967; Jewett, R. "A Matrix of Grace: The Theology of 2 Thessalonians as a Pauline Letter." Pages 71–85 in Thessalonians, Philippians, Galatians, Philemon, ed. J. Bassler. Vol. 1 of Pauline Theology. Fortress, 1991; Krentz, E. "Through a Lens: Theology and Fidelity in 2 Thessalonians." Pages 71–85 in Thessalonians, Philippians, Galatians, Philemon, ed. J. Bassler. Vol. 1 of Pauline Theology. Fortress, 1991; Rigaux, B. Saint Paul les épîtres aux Thessaloniens. ÉBib. Gabalda, 1956; Russell, R. "The Idle in 2 Thess 3.6–12: An Eschatological or a Social Problem?" NTS 34 (1988): 105–19; Trilling, W. Untersuchungen zum zweiten Thessalonischerbrief. St. Benno, 1972; Wenham, D. "Paul and the Synoptic Apocalypse." Pages 345–75 in vol. 2 of Gospel Perspectives, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham. JSOT, 1981.

Charles A. Wanamaker

Thiselton, Anthony

See Hermeneutical Circle;

Hermeneutics; Speech-Act Theory; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

Thomas Aquinas

Thomas Aquinas (1225?–74) is recognized as one of the most influential philosophical and theological thinkers of the Middle Ages. Besides the Summa theologiae (ST) and the Summa contra gentiles, the two works for which he is best known, Aquinas's works include commentaries on Aristotle, biblical commentaries, and numerous treatises on particular topics. This entry will focus on Aquinas as an interpreter of Scripture (a subject often overlooked) rather than on his thought in general. (For the most current information on Aquinas's life and works, see Torrell. Also helpful in this regard: Weisheipl; Tugwell in Thomas Aquinas, Albert and Thomas; Kretzmann and Stump.)

Biblical Commentaries

While Aquinas is justly remembered for his contributions to philosophy and systematic theology, it is not often realized that the exposition of Scripture constituted one of his principal academic duties. Aquinas produced commentaries on Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Job, Matthew, John, all the Pauline epistles (including Hebrews), and the Psalms. He also compiled the Catena aurea (the Golden Chain), a verse-by-verse commentary on all four Gospels made up of exegetical passages from Greek and Latin church fathers. (Of these works, all that have been translated into English are indicated in the bibliography below. For translations into other modern languages, see Torrell.)

The commentaries on Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations are rather brief expositions, focusing on the literal sense of the text, together with references to related biblical passages. Parts of the Isaiah commentary, however, contain "great (p 800)riches on certain points" (Torrell 27). The commentary on Job is highly developed and is especially noteworthy for its treatment of divine providence. Quite developed, too, is the commentary on Matthew. The commentary on John, considered by Weisheipl to be unsurpassed among Thomas's writings on Scripture, includes lengthy reflections on the Trinity, the beatific vision, and the love of God, among other subjects (Stump, "Biblical," 254). Of the commentaries on Paul, those on Romans, 1 Corinthians, and Hebrews are especially rewarding. In Stump's words: "The commentary on Hebrews contains detailed discussion of Christ as the incarnate Savior, as the second person of the Trinity, and as the fulfiller of the Old Testament promises; and, besides the well-known discussion of the nature of love, the commentary on 1 Corinthians includes intriguing discussions of Christian relations within the family, within the church, and with secular authority” (“Biblical,” 255). According to Weisheipl, the Romans commentary “reveals how deeply he [Aquinas] was committed to the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith, gratuity of grace, predestination, merit, good works, and the doctrine of original sin” (Weisheipl 249). Aquinas’s Psalms commentary (which covers only Pss. 1–54) can accurately be described as christocentric, since Aquinas makes a special effort to indicate the ways in which the Psalms prefigure Christ and his church.

Characteristics of the Commentaries. Four characteristics of Aquinas’s biblical commentaries are worth mentioning: (i) the divisio textus, (ii) the copious references to other passages of Scripture, (iii) the frequent use of the church fathers, and (iv) the use of philosophy. First, Thomas’s commentary on a passage usually begins with a divisio textus (division of the text), a passage that sets forth the logical order in the text. Second, he uses Scripture to explain Scripture; his commentary on a given passage typically includes numerous references to passages from elsewhere in the Bible. Third, Aquinas draws heavily on the insights of the church fathers, both Greek and Latin. Among those cited most frequently are Augustine, Chrysostom, and Jerome. Fourth, Aquinas utilizes the terminology and insights of pagan philosophers (most notably Aristotle) in his exposition of the biblical text.

The Senses of Scripture. With his contemporaries, Aquinas holds that a text of Scripture can have a spiritual sense as well as a literal (or historical) sense (ST I.1.10). The spiritual sense is itself divided into the allegorical, moral (or tropological), and anagogical senses. The literal sense is signified by the words of Scripture. (On Aquinas’s view, the literal sense includes metaphor; when Scripture speaks of God’s arm, for example, the literal sense is not that God has an arm, but only that God has operative power [ST I.1.10 ad 3].) The spiritual sense is signified not by the words of Scripture but by the persons, things, or events described by those words (as when the Passover lamb described in the OT signifies Christ). The allegorical sense is present when a thing signified by the text in turn signifies something of Christ or his church. The moral sense is present when a thing signified by the text signifies something relating to right action. And the anagogical sense is present when a thing signified by the text signifies something relating to the next life.

Principles of Interpretation

When we seek the most general principles of scriptural interpretation to which Aquinas subscribes, the following four emerge. First, Aquinas holds that there are no contradictions in Scripture, and, in fact, that whatever is contained in Scripture is true (Questiones quodlibetales [QQ] XII q. 17; Commentary on Titus, ch. 3, lect. 2; Stump, “Revelation,” 172). Second, Thomas recognizes that Scripture is sometimes obscure, and that the successful interpretation of Scripture is aided by “long study and practice” (ST II-II.1.9). Third, the Holy Spirit can assist believers in understanding Scripture (QQ XII q. 17). For example, the gift of understanding (one of the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit) aids believers in penetrating or grasping whatever things come under the assent of faith (ST II-II.8.6), i.e., whatever is contained in divine revelation. Since the things that come under the assent of faith are manifested in Scripture and the teaching of the church (ST II-II.5.3), it follows that the gift of understanding aids believers in grasping the things contained in Scripture. (Furthermore, in some places Thomas indicates that the Holy Spirit can give to some members of the church a special [“gratuitous”] grace for the interpretation of difficult passages of Scripture [Commentary on 1 Cor. 12:10; QQ XII q. 17].) Sin, however, can block the assistance of the Holy Spirit (see, e.g., ST II-II.11.1); thus, it is not inaccurate to say that on Thomas’s view virtue is a hermeneutical aid. Fourth, the teaching of the universal church provides an interpretative guide. Because it is guided by the Holy Spirit, the universal church cannot err (ST II-II.1.9; 2.6 ad 3). The church, therefore, has the right interpretation of Scripture and of revelation (ST II-II.5.3 ad 2; see (p 801) also QQ III q. 4 a. 2). The sovereign pontiff, in whom the authority of the church chiefly resides, plays a special role in the church’s teaching (ST II-II.11.2 ad 3; II-II.1.10; II-II.39.1).

Bibliography

Johnson, M. F. “Another Look at St. Thomas and the Plurality of the Literal Sense of Scripture.” Medieval Philosophy and Theology 2 (1992): 117–41; Kretzmann, N. and E. Stump, eds. The Cambridge Companion to Aquinas. Cambridge University Press, 1993; Stump, E. “Biblical Commentary and Philosophy.” Pages 252–68 in The Cambridge Companion to Aquinas, ed. N. Kretzmann and E. Stump. Cambridge University Press, 1993; idem. “Revelation and Biblical Exegesis: Augustine, Aquinas, and Swinburne.” Pages 161–97 in Reason and the Christian Religion: Essays in Honour of Richard Swinburne, ed. A. Padgett. Clarendon, 1994; Thomas Aquinas. Albert and Thomas: Selected Writings. The Classics of Western Spirituality. Translated, edited, and introduced by S. Tugwell. Paulist, 1988; idem. Catena aurea, trans. and ed. J. H. Newman. Saint Austin Press, 1997; idem. Commentary on the Gospel of Saint John, Part I. Aquinas Scriptures Series 4, trans. J. Weisheipl and F. Larcher. Magi Books, 1980; idem. Commentary on Saint Paul’s Epistle to the Ephesians. Aquinas Scriptures Series 2, trans. M. Lamb. Magi Books, 1966; idem. Commentary on Saint Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. Aquinas Scriptures Series 1, trans. F. Larcher. Magi Books, 1966; idem. Commentary on Saint Paul's First Letter to the Thessalonians and the Letter to the Philippians. Aquinas Scriptures Series 3, trans. F. Larcher and M. Duffy. Magi Books, 1969; idem. The Literal Exposition on Job. AAR Classics in Religious Studies 7, trans. A. Damico. Scholars Press, 1989; idem. Thomas Aquinas—The Gifts of the Spirit: Selected Spiritual Writings, ed. B. Ashley, trans. M. Rzeckowski. New City Press, 1995; Torrell, J.-P. Saint Thomas Aquinas: Volume I: The Person and His Work, trans. R. Royal. Catholic University of America Press, 1996; Weisheipl, J. Friar Thomas d'Aquino. 2d ed. Catholic University of America Press, 1983.

Michael W. Rota

1 Timothy, Book of

With 2 Timothy and Titus, 1 Timothy is one of the three “Pastoral Epistles” addressed by Paul to his co-workers rather than to congregations. It deals with the task of Timothy as overseer of the congregation(s) in Ephesus and is largely concerned with the danger of opposition and heresy in the church, the need for measures to ensure the proper maintenance of congregational life (including care for widows and the conduct of elders), the development of reliable leadership (overseers and deacons), the responsibilities and personal life of Timothy as local pastor, and the curbing of disturbing influences (unacceptable teaching by both male teachers and women). It is not primarily concerned with articulating theology, but nevertheless has considerable theological importance.

History of Interpretation

The origin of the letter is disputed. Until modern times it was accepted as a letter of Paul, probably written toward the end of his life around the same time as 2 Timothy and Titus, with which it has close links in style and content. Recognition of its unusual style and the impression that it reflects a post-Pauline situation led to the hypothesis that it is a pseudonymous composition, possibly from the early second century. In it a partisan of Paul endeavors to call the church back to a Pauline position, although in so doing he presents a theology that has developed beyond Paul in an early catholic direction. Thus, it is counted as emphasizing the static reproduction of tradition; the creation of a fixed church order, with leadership by appointed officers replacing the less-structured, informal charismatic ministry of an earlier period; and the development of a way of life that conforms more to the patterns of secular society and wards off criticism and persecution.

Alongside this majority position that the document is substantially later and reflects interests around the turn of the first century, strong support is still being expressed for composition by Paul himself (perhaps with an active amanuensis). A related option is for the use of Pauline materials (oral or written) by a close associate in the immediate post-Pauline period via a letter intended to maintain Paul's influence without any attempt to deceive readers. Since in my view there is no compelling evidence for a late date, 1 Timothy should be read as a document that belongs to the period around the close of Paul's life, whether from his lifetime or soon afterward.

Hearing the Message of 1 Timothy

First Timothy reflects an understanding of the gospel that centers on God as Savior, who wants all people to be saved and to know the truth (2:4). The purpose of God makes universal provision for salvation even though it is clear that salvation becomes a reality only in the case of believers (4:10). The presupposition is that all people are sinners and therefore need to be delivered from sin and its consequences. Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; he is depicted as the mediator between God and humankind, the implication being that sinners stand under divine judgment (1:15; 2:5). The statement that Jesus gave himself as a ransom for all (2:6, echoing Mark 10:45) (p 802) constitutes the gospel to which people respond in faith. Paul himself is an example of such belief; he was shown mercy and forgiven because he had sinned ignorantly in unbelief (1:12–13). The clear implication is that to continue knowingly in sin and unrepentance leads to judgment. It is not stated whether people who have sinned ignorantly can be forgiven without hearing the gospel or coming to faith.

The letter is opposed to the kind of idle speculations that lead to heterodox views. Nevertheless, it contains an important statement enshrining the remarkable revelation by God that constitutes the truth at the heart of the faith. This is the cryptic description of Christ: "He was revealed in flesh, vindicated in spirit, seen by angels, proclaimed among Gentiles, believed in throughout the world, taken up in glory" (3:16 NRSV). This statement affirms the reality of Christ's incarnation (and so probably implies his preexistence) and then of God's affirmation of him, presumably in response to his humiliation and death, "in spirit" (which probably refers to the sphere in which it happened, in contrast to his earthly life "in flesh"). The vindication continues in that he was seen (acknowledged) by angels in heaven. Back on earth he was the object of preaching far and wide, and this led to people believing in him everywhere (possibly in contrast to the comparative lack of belief among the Jews). Finally, he was taken up to be with God in glory; although this clause comes after the mention of the worldwide mission, it can only refer to the ascension. The whole statement emphasizes the vindication of Christ in both heaven and earth, and implicit in it is the church's task of participating in that vindication by preaching Christ to the Gentiles, among whom there will be a positive response to him.

God's purpose for the church as "the pillar and bulwark of the truth" (3:15 NRSV) leads to the calling of specific people to be heralds, charged with making it known. This is the role of Paul himself, who emphasizes his mission especially to the Gentiles (2:7; cf. 2 Tim. 1:11). He also encourages the right people to take on responsibility in the congregations. Normative requirements for overseers (or bishops) and deacons (including "women,," who are " who are probably female deacons rather than the wives of deacons) are laid down (3:1–13). These are a mixture of freedom from anything that would give them a bad reputation in and outside the church, competence in leadership skills, and a firm hold on the faith (3:9 of deacons, and implicitly also expected of overseers). Later in the letter (5:17–25) instructions are given regarding proper recognition of the "elders" in the congregation and appropriate disciplinary measures if any fall into sin. It is to be presumed that the elders are identical with the overseers, or perhaps the term embraces both overseers and deacons.

The task of the church is to be faithful to the Christian message. Misguided teachers have been sidetracked into strange speculations based on Jewish myths and have developed commandments based on the Jewish law that they are promulgating as the conduct required of Christians. Paul regards all this as nonsense, with which it is difficult to have any useful debate (1:7); although pursuit of it is spiritually fatal (1:19), the victims are not beyond the hope of repentance and restoration (cf. 2 Tim. 2:23–26).

In place of fruitless controversy he advocates the place of prayer in the congregation, both for peaceful conditions in which evangelism is possible, and for people of all kinds to be saved (2:1–10). In this connection Paul warns against the danger of the men in the congregation behaving inappropriately by quarreling, probably as a result of the false teaching. He then warns against the women dressing extravagantly and possibly also seductively. As a kind of appendix to this (2:11–15), he further requires that a woman should not teach or have authority over a man but should be "silent" (or quiet).

1 Timothy and the Canon

First Timothy is part of a canon that includes the earlier letters of Paul. If the letter is genuinely by Paul, it forms part of the total evidence for his theology, and it can be argued that his other letters should be read in the light of it. Such a reading of both 1 Timothy and the other letters would need to bear in mind any special circumstances attaching to their individual composition. If, for example, 1 Timothy were the work of Paul in old age and there had been a decisive shift in his manner of thinking and theological position, then this would have a bearing on the exercise. However, there is no evidence whatever that Paul's age (still less an aging process) is a factor to be considered. If the letter is substantially distanced from Paul, then it can be interpreted on its own. The question that then arises is whether it differs from, or even contradicts, Paul. I see no signs that it is attempting to provide a normative reinterpretation of Paul for a much later situation. Rather, it provides appropriate teaching for a specific situation that (p 803) stands in the tradition of the earlier Pauline letters. It does lack much of the kind of theologizing that is characteristic of the earlier letters, and like Luke-Acts it might be thought to show less depth of theological thinking. But it does an appropriate job in its own setting.

1 Timothy and Theology

1. For a letter that is of necessity much concerned with false teaching and congregational order, 1 Timothy contains a warm theology of salvation that preserves the mystery of the gospel and emphasizes the primacy of grace. Like 2 Timothy and Titus, it inculcates an attitude to Christian living that stresses the need for obedience to a conscience operating in close conjunction with faith and on the basis of sound teaching. This lifestyle produces an orderly and self-controlled life that wins respect from non-Christians, commends the gospel, and gives us important insights into the character and duties of Christian leaders. The author holds to an essentially missionary theology in which apostles are church planters, but the responsibility of the church planter includes the continuing care of the church and its preservation from error. It can be safely assumed that, had it not been for the demands of this necessary task, the need for active evangelism would have been closer to the forefront of his concerns.

2. First Timothy significantly develops the concept of the church as the household of God. Whereas the metaphor of the body, as expressed in Rom. 12 and 1 Cor. 12, has little to say about leadership and structure in the congregation (though 1 Cor. 12:28 should not be overlooked), the household metaphor does recognize the need for direction in the church. It was perhaps inevitable that such structuring would resemble the pattern in the society of the time, but the letter does not imply that this particular form is appropriate for all time. A solution to the problems of congregational organization today will be found by holding together the concepts of the body and the household in a fruitful and creative tension, not by assuming that either is necessarily superior to the other and following either model exclusively.

3. The instruction to women to learn in silence remains controversial. Some congregations today accept women into “ministry,” specifically the ordained pastoral ministry, with the authority that accompanies it. There are debates over whether a woman can function as a priest in denominations where the ordained ministry is understood as a form of priesthood confined to males. Apart from that, there is strong resistance to women taking an active part in preaching and ordained ministry in some congregations where high regard is paid to what is regarded as the “plain teaching” of Scripture.

In the first-century situation with its generally patriarchal society, where women played little part in public affairs, teaching by women could be regarded as an unacceptable breach of behavior patterns, whether among Jews or also among some Gentiles. Accordingly, the restriction can be interpreted as a culturally shaped prohibition that is no longer binding in a different setting.

The difficulty is in the appeal to Scripture that is used to back up the prohibition. It has a twofold argument that Adam was created prior to Eve (and therefore is superior), and that it is Eve who was deceived by the serpent (with the implication that women are still more likely to be deceived than men). This seems to be a doctrinal rather than a cultural consideration and is decisive for those who believe that the authority of a passage of Scripture must be accepted even when it seems to run against the grain of NT teaching generally (e.g., Gal. 3:28).

Other factors must be brought into consideration. (1) If it were not for the presence of this passage (together with 1 Cor. 14:33–36, though its significance is not agreed upon), probably nobody today would hold that women should be prohibited from teaching. (2) In an ancient society, where illiteracy and lack of education were common, it was especially the women who would suffer from these disadvantages. (3) The evidence of 1 Tim. 5:13 and 2 Tim. 3:6–7 suggests that women were especially susceptible to the prevalent false teaching in these specific congregations. (4) The argument that women are for all time more likely to be deceived than men because Eve was deceived is groundless. In any case, there is no way of knowing whether, if the serpent had spoken to Adam rather than to Eve, he would not have fallen just as readily as she had. (5) The argument that priority in creation places men in such a position of superiority over women (or a husband over a wife) that a woman should not teach is untenable. (6) Eunice and Lois are commended for teaching the faith to the boy Timothy; evidently, therefore, it is not the teaching that is at fault, but rather the implication that the teaching woman is exercising authority over a man. (7) The very rare verb “have authority over” (Gk. authentēō) most probably expresses an unacceptable form (p 804) of dominance. (8) Some women may have been arguing that they needed to teach in order to be saved, whereas the writer insists that this is not so, and reminds them that bearing children (which may also have been an issue; see 4:3) was a proper fulfillment of their Christian calling.

One possible interpretation is that, even if a woman should not have authority over a man, the exercise of teaching or the holding of ministerial office in the church should not be regarded as infringing this principle in contemporary society. Another possibility is that there may have been women teaching that women were superior to men on the basis of a faulty interpretation of Genesis, and the author is concerned simply to refute this and to stop the women giving false teaching. Hence, nothing more may be involved than a correction of a false interpretation of Genesis in a specific situation.

Certainty in interpretation of this difficult passage is difficult to achieve, but there is at least sufficient doubt concerning the validity of the patriarchal interpretation as a ruling for practice today to make it very unwise to impose it upon the church.

4. There is no uncertainty, however, over the full-scale treatment of the dangers of wealth, both the desiring of it and the misuse of it (6:3–19; cf. 2:9–10; 5:6). The author is quite clear that these are real dangers, against which Christians must be extremely vigilant, and he is very serious about the right use of income and possessions and the dangers of greed and envy. In a world where many Christians cannot avoid earning relatively high incomes, where there are many opportunities for lavish expenditure, and where equally many people are living in various degrees of poverty—the lesson of 1 Timothy is uncomfortably relevant and challenging.

Bibliography

See also bibliography for “Titus, Book of”; Campbell, R. The Elders. Studies of the New Testament and Its World. T&T Clark, 1994; Donelson, L. Pseudepigraphy and Ethical Argument in the Pastoral Epistles. HUT 22. Mohr/Siebeck, 1986; Kidd, R. Wealth and Beneficence in the Pastoral Epistles. SBLDS 122. Scholars Press, 1990; Köstenberger, A., et al., eds. Women in the Church. Baker, 1995; Oberlinner, L. Die Pastoralbriefe. HTKNT 9/2. Herder, 1994; Quinn, J., and W. Wacker. The First and Second Letters to Timothy. ECC. Eerdmans, 2000; Roloff, J. Der erste Brief an Timotheus. EKKNT. Benziger/Neukirchener Verlag, 1988; Webb, W.

Slaves, Women and Homosexuals. InterVarsity, 2001.

I. Howard Marshall

2 Timothy, Book of

With 1 Timothy and Titus, 2 Timothy is classified as a “Pastoral Epistle”; it is addressed to an individual engaged in mission and oversight, dealing with his personal lifestyle as a pastor and his relationships with the congregations under his supervision. Unlike the other two letters, it has no formal material on congregational structures and leadership. It reflects Paul facing up to the impending end of his life and deals primarily with the future mission of his younger colleague Timothy without supervision. It considers the nature of apostleship, the incipient dangers from within the church, and the need to respond to them, plus the external threats of persecution and even martyrdom.

History of Interpretation

From earliest times 2 Timothy was accepted as the last surviving letter of Paul, written from imprisonment in Rome, whether that described in Acts 28 or a subsequent imprisonment after a presumed further period of missionary activity (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 2.22). Critical scholarship in the nineteenth century called into question the authenticity of all the so-called Pastoral Epistles on grounds of style and apparent reflection of a later period of composition. Some regard 2 Timothy as entirely fictitious. Others hold that it includes substantial fragments of Pauline material. Scholars who hold that it is fully Pauline generally hold to the traditional dating; some place it earlier (from prison in Ephesus or Caesarea), but the necessary reinterpretation of 1:17 is unconvincing. This is the Pastoral Epistle that has the strongest claims to be genuine or at least to be a reworking of Pauline material, including a letter from prison to Timothy. The closeness in style and content to 1 Timothy and Titus strongly suggests the final composition was from a hand other than Paul’s (whether an amanuensis in his lifetime or a later compiler).

On the traditional understanding, 2 Timothy is an authentic or near-authentic expression of the mind of Paul as he faces the end of his active career and is concerned for the continuation of his mission, possibly through Timothy as his successor. If it is a later fiction, it is thought to be patterned on Jewish testament literature, in which a godly person is represented as facing impending death and conveying memorable last instructions and encouragement to his family or successor. This context distinguishes 2 Timothy to some extent from 1 Timothy and Titus, which (p 805) convey instructions (“mandates”) from an active apostle to his colleagues in mission.

Hearing the Message of 2 Timothy

The message is summed up nicely as “do the work of an evangelist” (4:5). Timothy is a member of Paul’s mission team, which carried out evangelism, involving both the planting of congregations and their nurture. The letter is largely concerned with Timothy himself; the self-references by Paul function by way of example and stimulus, although in chapter 4 they are also concerned with his own situation and requirements.

Even in a letter to a close colleague and friend, Paul writes self-consciously as an apostle with a calling related to the “life that is in Christ Jesus” (1:1). Apostleship is the key to Paul’s self-understanding, the position of a missionary authorized by the risen Lord to preach and teach (1:11), but also called to the possibility of suffering for the sake of the gospel like any other believer (3:12). He therefore leads a life that should be exemplary for other missionaries, both in the things that happened to him but also in the way that he lived (3:10–11).

Timothy was apparently tempted to lack of courage and thus to maintaining a low profile. Paul still refers to him as his child, which may imply that he was comparatively young (2:1). He had a pious upbringing by his mother and grandmother; his father (Acts 16:1) is not mentioned. As a young believer, Paul took him along as a junior colleague. At some point Paul prayed and laid hands upon him for his work as a fellow missionary, so that he might have the appropriate gifts of the Spirit, in this case “a spirit of power and of love and of self-discipline” that needed to be kept burning brightly (1:6–7 NRSV).

Paul’s opening exhortation (1:3–18) is backed up by an appeal first of all to the power of God and to Timothy’s collegiality with Paul. Through participating with Paul in a ministry carrying the risk of suffering, Timothy shares in the power of God. The thought is developed through using a traditional formulation of the gospel that is quite similar to the teaching in Titus, with its correlation of what God did before ages began and what he has now revealed through the epiphany of Christ. Here the stress, however, is more on the “life and immortality” brought by the gospel (1:10), probably to provide an incentive in the face of threats of death against the missionaries (cf. 2:11–12). Paul comments on the suffering that he endures as a missionary but declares his trust in God, who delivers him from being “ashamed,” from the feeling of shame that results from failure. His concern is not for his own resurrection but for the safe preservation of the gospel, no matter what happens to himself. God will guard to the last day what Paul has entrusted to him: the gospel (rather than Paul's own self; but the interpretation of 1:12 is disputed).

Against this background, Paul appeals to Timothy to hold fast to the faith, in the sense of proclaiming and transmitting it faithfully, and especially of standing up to corrupting influences within the church. At the same time, he can be told to "be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus" (2:1). There is an irreducible tension between the appeals to human faithfulness and the promises of divine empowerment.

Timothy is called to total commitment to his pastoral work (2:1–26). His tough assignment demands self-denial, self-discipline, and self-commitment. There is a broad appeal to the example of Jesus, who was "raised from the dead" (2:8), an expression doubtlessly implying that first he submitted to death, but God was faithful in raising him. There is a further appeal to the pattern of Paul in his suffering and commitment, so that God's people may attain to salvation without falling away; here is the reminder that, although the messengers may be imprisoned, the word of God cannot be fettered. And there is the sure knowledge that those who are prepared to suffer with Christ will share in his resurrection and reign. This trustworthy statement also warns against the consequences of falling away and again insists that even if some of God's people are faithless, he will continue faithfully to uphold them, since that is his very nature (2:11–13). Further reassurance is provided by the fact that, despite the activity of false teachers, the church has a firm foundation laid by God himself. Here again the tension recurs. God knows his people and (it is implied) watches over them; at the same time it is their responsibility to turn aside from wickedness. Even if people do turn aside, nevertheless, the opportunity for repentance and escape from the shackles imposed by the devil remains, and the faithful pastor will continue to persuade them to repent.

In the remaining instruction (3:1–4:5), the context for Timothy's work is the further spread of godlessness and error in the church but with the assurance that it will not triumph. Once again, he is reminded of how Paul's mission was not free from opposition and persecution, but the Lord rescued him. The stress now is on the danger of error, into which even Timothy might fall. The (p 806)antidote lies in holding firmly and faithfully to the original Christian teaching received from people whom he knows to be reliable. It is rooted in the sacred writings, the Scriptures.

The conclusion of the letter (4:6–22) offers a further picture of Paul as the representative missionary, who is assured of his reward from the Lord. Deliverance in this situation is not only protection from the attacks of enemies, but also preservation of Paul in the faith so that he will reach God's heavenly kingdom.

2 Timothy and the Canon

This letter makes a distinctive contribution to the canon in various ways.

1. Even more than 1 Timothy, it is concerned with the personal life of the Christian and especially of the congregational leader. It may seem strange that a letter to a close colleague should be couched in this rather formal style and give advice with which Timothy would have been already familiar. However, Ignatius writes to Polycarp as a fellow Christian leader in a similar manner. And although the letter is addressed to Timothy himself, in its canonical form the letter is to be read by a wider audience, doubtlessly including both church leaders and members (cf. "you" [plural!], 4:22).

2. It gives a fuller picture of Paul himself, his own situation, and his self-consciousness. To some scholars it reads like an ideal picture of a missionary who is beginning to be a legend, an exaggerated portrait from a later date. Paul, it is said, has here become almost part of the gospel, a paradigm of conversion and perseverance. Certainly, the picture can be read exemplarily, just as Paul presents himself implicitly as an example in Philippians, but it may also well be authentic.

3. The importance of preserving the gospel unchanged and sharing Paul's message with a wider circle of teachers is appropriate at this later stage in the growth of the church. Although the admonition (2:2) has been interpreted solely in terms of passing on the message to the next generation of leaders, there is also a concern for widening the influence by equipping local congregations with leaders so that they are not dependent upon a teacher like Timothy himself.

4. The place of the Holy Spirit in equipping congregational leaders is stressed. With the growth of a leadership of people appointed to serve, perhaps with little previous Christian experience and no training, it was vital to emphasize the provision of divine enabling for leaders. Yet, although the leaders are doubtlessly especially in mind, the gift of the Spirit is common to all believers.

2 Timothy and Theology

1. A major contribution of this letter is its statement of the inspiration and usefulness of Scripture. It contains the only biblical use of the term theopneustos, "breathed by God," which is applied to "all" or "every [passage of] Scripture." There is no mention of the Holy Spirit in this connection (contrast 2 Pet. 1:21). Nor do we have the suggestion that God "played" on the human writers like a musician playing on an instrument. The point is rather that Scripture teaches the Christian understanding of salvation and provides whatever the believer needs for instruction in Christian living. The corollary of the inspiration of “all Scripture” is that any passage may have value for the Christian. Its origin in God implies its authority, truthfulness, and usefulness. The extension of applying the text to apply to the NT is fully justified, and there is at least the possibility that some early Christian writings were being regarded as Scripture by this date.

2. The Christian life is understood to be empowered and guaranteed by God and yet dependent on the faith and commitment of the believer. The author places these two facts side by side without saying anything to suggest that the believer is automatically brought safely through every danger and temptation to a heavenly reward, or that everything depends on the believer’s personal commitment and effort. Alongside the falling away of some Christians like Demas, there is the assured conviction of Paul himself. Perseverance to the end is expressed in terms of trust in God’s faithfulness.

Bibliography

See also bibliography for “Titus, Book of”; Oberlinner, L. Die Pastoralbriefe. HTKNT 11/2. Herder, 1995; Prior, M. Paul the Letter-Writer and the Second Letter to Timothy. JSNTSup 23. JSOT, 1989; Quinn, J., and W. Wacker. The First and Second Letters to Timothy. ECC. Eerdmans, 2000; Stott, J. Guard the Gospel. InterVarsity, 1973.

I. Howard Marshall

Titus, Book of

With 1 Timothy and 2 Timothy, Titus is one of three letters ostensibly addressed to missionary colleagues of Paul and collectively known since the eighteenth century as the “Pastoral Epistles.” Although its brevity and similarity in content to 1 Timothy have encouraged its neglect, it has (p 807)its own distinctive and valuable contribution to make to the theology of the NT.

History of Interpretation

Until the nineteenth century Titus was understood as a letter of Paul, written during the final period of his life to his junior companion, Titus, in charge of the congregations in Crete (1:5). They were less developed than those in Ephesus (as reflected in 1 Timothy). Negatively, the letter is concerned with the danger caused by “rebellious people” teaching material eccentrically based on Jewish mythology and commandments; they are criticized for their greed, deceit, and general immoral behavior (1:10–16). Positively, the letter advocates the appointment of local congregational leaders of good character and sound faith (1:5–9) and the inculcation of a respectable way of life characterized by self-control, submission to authority, abstention from time-wasting controversy, and devotion to good works (2:1–15; 3:1–11). This exhortation is backed up by two reminders of the way in which God acted graciously in Christ to achieve the redemption of believers and to save them personally from their previous sinful way of life (2:11–14; 3:3–7). The letter is a mature statement of Pauline theology and ecclesiology that encourages an orderly way of life but is redeemed from dullness by its inspirational teaching on the nature of salvation.

This traditional understanding has been challenged by a different view, based on the increasingly severe objections raised against Pauline authorship (especially by Holtzmann). Titus, along with its companion letters, was held to be a pseudonymous composition of a considerably later date (perhaps even from the early second century). Its general purpose was to rehabilitate Paul during a period of declining influence by presenting the kind of teaching that he would have given if still alive and encouraging people to be loyal to his brand of Christianity. However, the teaching actually presented is significantly different from that of Paul, it was alleged. Detachment from the hypothesis of Pauline authorship allowed modern critical scholars to emphasize the differences and see the three letters in their own light rather than to conform them to the pattern of the earlier Paul. At the same time there is the danger of seeing the letters as different facets of a common agenda, although some scholars are now recognizing that each must be appreciated for its own worth. Two things characterize the new outlook.

1. Later books of the NT were regarded as “early catholic” in their outlook. They represented and promoted the type of ecclesiology found in second-century Christianity, with an emphasis on fixed traditions handed down from the past. The theology has become static. Pauline creativity has disappeared. The church is the dispenser of salvation and is developing a fixed, hierarchical church structure, in which “office” has replaced the less-formal charismatic congregational ministry (e.g., prophecy) of an earlier period. The Holy Spirit’s activity is increasingly confined to the ordained leaders.

2. Dibelius characterized the way of life in the Pastoral Epistles as “bourgeois,” by which he meant that the church was adopting the patterns of Hellenistic-Roman society, living according to its ideals and becoming so innocuous as to avoid persecution. The ethic is characterized by sobriety, self-control, and good works. Orderliness and submission to authority are paramount. Slaves, in particular, are to be obedient and submissive. There is little that is specifically Christian.

Such an evaluation of Titus is essentially negative and pejorative. Superficially, it may seem to be plausible. For example, the actual amount of theological teaching in the letter is small in comparison with the ethical and ecclesiastical material. Nevertheless, there has been a justified reaction against it.

On the one hand, there is a continuing and vigorous defense of Pauline authorship (whether directly or through an amanuensis) by scholars who cannot be accused of a blind traditionalism (Fee; Johnson; Knight; Mounce; Spicq). They have demonstrated the essential harmony of the letter with Paul's earlier writings.

On the other hand, there has been recognition of the creative, theological character of the letter by scholars who find it hard to recognize the literary style and manner of thinking as those of Paul himself (so variously Marshall; Oberlinner; Quinn). One approach attempts to do justice to the Paulinism of the letter by seeing it as a nondeceptive presentation of what Paul would have said to the church in the period fairly soon after his death. It is conveyed by a follower who makes use of the kind of things that Paul actually did say to his colleagues. This view and that which attributes the letter to Paul himself, assisted by an amanuensis, are not far apart.

The result has been a recognition of a much more vigorous theology in Titus than earlier scholars detected, whether through their seeing Titus in the shadow of the major Pauline letters (p 808) or through assessing it as typical of early catholicism. At the same time there has developed recognition of the contribution that literary and social-scientific approaches can make to a fuller appreciation of the letter.

Hearing the Message of Titus

In the lengthy opening salutation (1:1–4), the self-description of Paul as an apostle becomes a mini-statement of the gospel, setting out the correlation between the eternal plan of God the Savior and its realization in the proclamation of the gospel. The apostle is concerned to promote knowledge of the truth and faith in God's people as leading to a life characterized by godliness and hope. The Father's character and purpose are summed up in his title of "Savior," and his purpose for humankind is salvation. Jesus Christ stands alongside him as "Savior" (1:4).

The "proclamation" is an integral part of the accomplishment of God's plan of salvation; the saving act is the revelation of God's grace (2:11), which includes both the coming of Christ and the apostolic mission. Special importance attaches to the work of the apostles and those who share in their work by continuing it where the apostles are absent, whether geographically or no longer active.

The growth of error leads to great emphasis on “sound doctrine” (2:1). Knowledge figures prominently alongside faith as a characteristic of God’s people, and there is a greater tendency than in earlier literature to see faith not only as a relationship of personal trust and commitment to God, but also as acceptance of the true teaching enshrined in Christian tradition.

The first doctrinal passage (2:11–14) complements the salutation. The word “grace,” which could have been dismissed as a formal element in a stereotyped greeting (1:4), is now forefronted as the key quality of God. The whole of what God has done and is doing to save people is “grace,” and in a remarkable statement it is “grace” that has been revealed rather than God’s Son (contrast Gal. 1:15–16). A further clarification appears in 3:4 \(NRSV\), where “the goodness and loving kindness” of God appears; the language of human benefaction is used to explain in simple terms the beneficence of God. The term “appeared,” related to the noun “epiphany,” picks up on language used to express the saving intervention of divine beings in the world. The same terms are used both for the future coming of the Savior to wind up God’s saving action in the world and for the historical action in the incarnation of Jesus and the associated events.

The saving action is also described in traditional language as redemption (2:14), quite deliberately echoing Ps. 130:8 and Mark 10:45. God acts to rescue people from a sinful life (rather than simply from the penal consequences of sin) to live a life of goodness worthy of himself.

Such a life looks forward to the end of the present age in which we live in a sinful world, and eagerly longs for the manifestation of the glory of Christ. But here there is a surprise: the awaited one is “our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ.” This explicit application of the term “God” to Jesus Christ has been challenged by some who would render the phrase “of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ,” but the evidence strongly favors the former interpretation. Although anticipated earlier (Rom. 9:5), this statement is the climax in the growing recognition that Jesus Christ is alongside the Father in the complex identity of God.

The second doctrinal passage (3:4–7) shifts the emphasis to the way in which God has acted savingly in the lives of believers. The Pauline stress on “not by works” is affirmed; this is probably in response to Jewish stress on the commandments as the means of salvation, and it reiterates that salvation is entirely dependent upon God’s action. A picture is painted of people living such sinful lives that they do not in fact have any goodness that might count in their favor; they are justified by divine grace. They are entirely dependent on divine mercy, and mercy is exercised in a radical change, like being born again, brought about by the agency of the Holy Spirit. The Spirit is said to be poured out on them, echoing the language of Pentecost, but acts inwardly to renew them. Thus, as in Romans, justification and regeneration by the Spirit are brought together as the two essential aspects of God's saving work. Out of this fundamental saving action of God, the obligation to a new way of life emerges. The practical teaching that Titus is to give is to be "consistent with sound doctrine" (2:1 NRSV).

Titus and the Canon

1. The doctrinal teaching in Titus, though expressed in new ways, is in fundamental agreement with that of the earlier Pauline letters in its teaching about the gracious saving action of God, justification by grace and not by works, and regeneration by the Spirit. The unity of the saving revelation in Christ and in the proclamation of the gospel is likewise already present (2 Cor. (p 809)5:18–21). The Christology, implicit and explicit, ranks God the Father and Jesus Christ together as the sources of salvation and draws the logical conclusion that the term "God" is equally applicable to both. Nevertheless, the term "Son" is not used.

2. Ethical teaching is addressed to the different groups in the congregation (rather than in the family): older men and women, younger women and men, and slaves. The instruction to slaves is particularly significant in that, while inculcating the need for submission to their masters, it nevertheless insists that the lowest class in society can be "an ornament to the doctrine of God our Savior" (2:10 NRSV).

3. There are the first detailed instructions regarding the choosing of local congregational leaders. Here only elders are mentioned, functioning as overseers or "bishops" (1:5, 7), with no mention of deacons (contrast 1 Tim. 3). The importance of their being able to teach positively and also to refute error is highlighted. However, the appointment of local leaders is nothing new (cf. Phil. 1:1). There is the risk here that addressing leaders like Titus and concentrating on the work of local church leaders could promote an early "catholic" type of ecclesiology; within the canon the teaching in the Pastoral Epistles must be balanced by the more "charismatic" ecclesiology found elsewhere.

Titus and Theology

Like its companions, the letter to Titus is brief and written in a specific situation. Therefore, care must be taken in appropriating its theological message for today, and it must be seen as part of Scripture as a whole. Nevertheless, it sets an important precedent in two ways.

1. Titus is an important example of recontextualizing the gospel within the NT and its first-century context. The author holds fast to the apostolic doctrine and institutes measures in the church to maintain it in pure form against the inroads of opposition and incipient heresy. Teaching based on the gospel is crucial. So too is the careful appointment of congregational leaders who are of sterling Christian character, possess the gifts of leadership, and are able to teach. It is probable that a plurality of leaders in each local situation is in mind rather than one for each Christian group.

2. While the author holds fast to the Pauline teaching, it is expressed in new ways, using a fresh vocabulary that will speak meaningfully and so communicate successfully in the Hellenistic world. Christian communication today not only takes over the language of Titus (as well as that of the NT generally) but also follows its example in searching out relevant ways of expressing the gospel and the imperatives of Christian living in the contemporary world.

Bibliography

See also bibliography for articles on “1 Timothy” and “2 Timothy”; Dibelius, M., and H. Conzelmann. The Pastoral Epistles. Hermeneia. Fortress, 1972; Fee, G. 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus. NIBCNT. Hendrickson, 1988; Harding, M. What Are They Saying about the Pastoral Epistles? Paulist, 2001; Holtzmann, H. Die Pastoralbriefe, kritisch und exegetisch behandelt. Engelmann, 1880; Johnson, L. T. Letters to Paul’s Delegates. NTC. Trinity, 1996; Knight, G., III. Commentary on the Pastoral Epistles. NIGTC. Eerdmans/Paternoster, 1992; Lau, A. Manifest in Flesh. WUNT 2.86. Mohr/Siebeck, 1996; Marshall, I. H. (with P. Towner). A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Pastoral Epistles. ICC. T&T Clark, 1999; Mounce, W. The Pastoral Epistles. WBC. Word, 2001; Oberlinner, L. Die Pastoralbriefe. HTKNT 22/2. Herder, 1996; Quinn, J. The Letter to Titus. AB 35. Doubleday, 1990; Spicq, C. Les Épîtres Pastorales. ÉBib. J. Gabalda, 1948, 1969; Stott, J. The Message of 1 Timothy and Titus. InterVarsity, 1996; Towner, P. The Goal of Our Instruction. JSNTSup 34. Sheffield Academic Press, 1989; Young, F. The Theology of the Pastoral Letters. NTT. Cambridge University Press, 1994.

I. Howard Marshall

Topical Preaching See Preaching, Use of the Bible in

Totality Transfer, Illegitimate See Etymology

Tradition

Tradition refers to the handing down of the Christian faith from generation to generation. At its broadest it is the sum total of the Christian heritage passed down from previous ages, of which Scripture is just one item. But since discussions of tradition usually concern its relation to Scripture, it is normal to exclude Scripture from the definition. This is not inappropriate since the NT predates almost every other surviving item of Christian tradition.

In the NT a twofold attitude to tradition can be discerned. The tradition of the (Jewish) elders is rejected, together with other human tradition (Matt. 15:1–9; Mark 7:1–13; Gal. 1:13–14; Col. 2:8). At the same time there is a good apostolic tradition, which is simply the Christian faith as proclaimed and transmitted by the apostles and their associates (1 Cor. 11:2, 23; 15:3; 2 Thess. (p 810)2:15; 3:6; 2 Tim. 2:2). The NT writings sprang out of this latter tradition at different stages in its history, as for example did Luke's Gospel (1:1–4). There thus is an important sense in which (apostolic) tradition precedes Scripture.

The emergence of the NT canon is a complex process, but by the last quarter of the second century the NT was seen as a more or less well-defined corpus of Scripture alongside the OT. This posed the question of the relation between Scripture and tradition, a question that always to a greater or lesser extent involves the current teaching of the church, as will become apparent below. In the early years tradition was primarily oral, but by the end of the second century, oral tradition had nothing reliable to offer, outside of long-standing liturgical practices. Apart from the liturgy, it was to written tradition that appeal was made from the third century.

The Relation between Scripture, Tradition, and Church

How do Scripture, tradition, and the teaching office of the church relate to one another? Over the course of history a number of different positions have been held.

The Coincidence View. The first clear position to emerge is found in Irenaeus and Tertullian, in their opposition to Gnosticism. Different gnostic groups each claimed to have received a secret tradition from one or another apostle. This raised the question of where genuine apostolic teaching was to be found. Irenaeus and Tertullian taught that the apostles committed their teaching to writing (the NT) and also committed it orally to their churches, in which it has been handed down in an open tradition of public teaching. These apostolic churches teach the apostolic message that has reached them both through apostolic tradition and through the apostolic Scriptures. The purpose of apostolic tradition is not to add to Scripture but to show how it is to be interpreted. Apostolic tradition in this context means the Rule of Faith, a basic outline of beliefs that later grew into the Apostles' Creed. Thus, there is a harmony or coincidence between Scripture, tradition, and the teaching of the church. This was the dominant position in the early church.

The Supplementary View. A rival position emerged that gave to tradition the role of supplementing Scripture, of adding to it. If liturgical and ceremonial tradition be included, the Supplementary View can be traced to the earliest times. The Didache (or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) and The Apostolic Tradition (of Hippolytus) both claim to derive from the teaching of the apostles, and Tertullian explicitly and at length argues for apostolic ceremonial traditions. The problem is that the innovation of one generation becomes the apostolic tradition of the next. Augustine argued that there are many practices observed by the whole church that can therefore fairly be held to have been enjoined by the apostles, although not found in their writings (Bapt. 5.23.31). This makes the church a de facto source of binding tradition.

Can one appeal to tradition for doctrines not found in Scripture? The first significant instance of this came when Basil the Great appealed to the liturgical tradition in defense of the deity of the Holy Spirit, although this was not the only argument that Basil used. Some of the beliefs and practices of the church are found in written teaching, he claimed, and others in a mystery (the liturgy) received by tradition from the apostles. Both have the same force (Holy Spirit 27.66–67; 29.71).

The Supplementary View gained ground throughout the Middle Ages. As time went on, the official teaching of the church included beliefs (about the Virgin Mary, for example) that were not found in that were not found in Scripture. Supplementary tradition was then invoked to make good the deficiencies of Scripture. In most cases the tradition appealed to was ceremonial: the principle of lex orandi lex credendi (worship guides theology) was the basis of the Supplementary View. But in due course it became clear that the problem was not just that the church taught more than was found in Scripture, but also that its teaching in places was contrary to Scripture. This realization gave rise first to medieval “heresy” and in due course to the Reformation.

Protestantism: The Ancillary View. The Reformation was at heart a dispute not about tradition but about the teaching of the church. The Reformers were convinced that the current Roman Church had perverted the gospel and accused it of heresy in the name of Scripture. They sought to recover the purity of the gospel and to reform the church by Scripture. The root issue was whether the church defines the gospel or vice versa. The Reformers were opposed not to tradition but to the teaching of the contemporary (Roman) Church. For support, they appealed extensively to the early church fathers in general and Augustine especially, but did not regard such tradition as infallible or irreformable. It had to be measured by the yardstick of God's word in the Bible. This was not a return to the Coincidence View of the early (p 811) church; instead, the unity of Scripture, tradition, and church teaching had been shattered. Nor did this view involve a rejection of either tradition or the teaching authority of the church. Both had a vital role to play, but ancillary or subordinated to the supreme authority of Scripture and open to correction in the light of it.

The Solitary View. The Reformation view is often identified by the slogan sola scriptura; but while sola fide was already a recognized slogan by the 1530s, sola scriptura did not emerge until the post-Reformation era. It means not that we have no need for tradition or for the teaching authority of the church, but rather that these are both subordinated to the supreme authority of Scripture. In due course, however, there arose an attitude in Protestantism that questioned the value of tradition with or without the teaching authority of the church. The Anabaptists in the sixteenth century and the Brethren in the nineteenth century were alike hostile to tradition—and repeated the crude second-century heresy that Mary was only Jesus' host mother. Many Protestant groups emerged that saw no value in tradition and sought to return to the NT as if nothing had happened since then. A similar position is taken by much modern theological study. The OT and NT are carefully studied in their original contexts, attention is devoted to studying today's context, and the biblical message is then applied to the current context—as if the Bible were a book recently discovered in the sands of Egypt!

The Catholic Reformation. The Roman Catholic Church fought to defend its teaching against the Reformers. Scripture and tradition alike could only be interpreted in line with the defined teaching of the (Roman Catholic) Church. The Council of Trent decreed that no one should presume to interpret the Scriptures contrary to Holy Mother Church. Faced with the need to defend doctrines whose connection with the Bible is tenuous at best, most Roman Catholics adopted the Supplementary View, appealing to tradition as a source for such doctrines. Until recently, the Council of Trent was widely held to have taught the Supplementary View in its Decree on the Canonical Scriptures (1546), but it is now widely recognized that the issue was left undefined. The Second Vatican Council, in its Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei verbum), took care to remain neutral on this question (§2.8–9).

The Unfolding View and the Contextual View. Hesitations about supplementary tradition in modern Catholic theology do not spring from a renewed confidence in the ability to prove Catholic doctrine from Scripture alone. With the rise of modern historical studies, it became clear that many Roman Catholic doctrines receive as little support from early tradition as from Scripture. Just as the failure of Scripture to validate Catholic doctrines required an appeal to supplementary tradition, so the failure of Scripture and early tradition alike to support some doctrines gave birth to the idea that doctrines develop over time. One of the first to wrestle with this issue was John Henry Newman in his Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (1845). He was aware of the difference between the primitive church and the contemporary Roman Catholic Church and explained this in terms of a process of development. The Second Vatican Council sanctioned the idea of the development of doctrine (Divine Revelation 2.8). Protestants would also recognize a process of development of some doctrines (e.g., the Trinity) but would require a more solid biblical foundation than can be claimed for doctrines such as the Immaculate Conception and Assumption of the Virgin Mary.

More recently, Protestants and Catholics alike have recognized the need to relate Christian teaching to specific cultural contexts by a process of contextualization. While for some this has involved making the modern context the norm by which to test doctrine, there is no reason why Scripture should not remain the final norm. There is nothing new about this process (except the name) and it can be seen in the outworkings of the Christian faith in the Platonist context of the early church and the Aristotelian context of the late Middle Ages. Both were serious attempts to relate the Christian faith to the context of the time and were remarkably successful, albeit not perfect.

The Role of Tradition

It is impossible to read Scripture without tradition, save in the rare examples of those with no prior contact with the Christian faith who pick up a portion of Scripture—hardly a paradigm for the Christian exegete! We bring to the Bible a preunderstanding of the Christian faith that we have received from others, thus by tradition. There is nothing wrong with this; in fact, it is God’s purpose: “The things you have heard me say in the presence of many witnesses entrust to reliable men who will also be qualified to teach others” (2 Tim. 2:2). Since, like it or not, we are molded by twenty centuries of Christian tradition, it is wisest to be aware of this influence, remembering (p 812) the adage that “those who are ignorant of history are condemned to repeat it.”

Valuable as tradition may be, it is not infallible and must be tested by Scripture. Scripture is well suited to this normative role since it remains fixed, while tradition is constantly changing. Scripture stands over against tradition as the norm by which it is to be tested. Karl Barth aptly saw the authority of both church and tradition in the light of the Fifth Commandment, to honor our father and mother. This authority is real but limited, in that both are subject to the word of God in Scripture. They are open to be reformed and corrected, while Scripture is not.

What practical use does tradition have in the task of hermeneutics? First, it should not be forgotten that we are indebted to tradition for the canon of Scripture. The one page of the Bible that is not the word of God is the contents page! Of course, the role of the church and of tradition was to recognize the various books as the word of God, not to make them such—any more than the church made Jesus God by recognizing his deity. Second, it must be acknowledged that earlier, precritical tradition is of limited value for the exegetical task of discerning the original meaning of the texts, though there are a few gifted exegetes like Calvin whose works are still valued today for this purpose. Third, when it comes to the application of Scripture, as in preaching, the insights of the past are of greater and more abiding value, as Steinmetz has argued. Finally, when it comes to the task of synthesizing the biblical message as a whole, the modern theologian would be foolish to ignore the fruits of past endeavors. There is no virtue in reinventing the wheel in every generation and even less in repeating the errors of the past. “Experience is the wisdom of fools”—the wise learn from others’ mistakes.

See also Creed; Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics; Patristic Biblical Interpretation; Rule of Faith

Bibliography

Bauckham, R. “Tradition in Relation to Scripture and Reason.” Pages 117–45 in Scripture, Tradition and Reason, ed. R. Bauckham and B. Drewery. T&T Clark, 1988; Bruce, F. F. Tradition Old and New. Paternoster, 1970; Bruce, F. F., and E. G. Rupp, eds. Holy Book and Holy Tradition. Manchester University Press, 1968; Congar, Y. Tradition and Traditions. Burns & Oates, 1966; Fourth World Conference on Faith and Order. “Scripture, Tradition and Traditions.” Pages 50–61 in The Fourth World Conference on Faith and Order, ed. P. C. Rodger and L. Vischer. SCM, 1964; Lane, A. N. S. “Scripture, Tradition and Church: An Historical Survey.” VE 9 (1975): 37–55; idem. “Sola scriptura? Making Sense of a Post-Reformation Slogan.” Pages 297–327 in A Pathway into the Holy Scripture, ed. P. Satterthwaite and D. F. Wright. Eerdmans, 1994; Steinmetz, D. “The Superiority of Pre-Critical Exegesis.” Pages 26–38 in The Theological Interpretation of Scripture, ed. S. Fowl. Blackwell, 1997; Thiselton, A. New Horizons in Hermeneutics, ch. 4. Harper Collins, 1992;

Williams, D. H. Retrieving the Tradition and Renewing Evangelicalism.
Eerdmans, 1999.

Anthony N. S. Lane

Trajectory See Culture and Hermeneutics; Ideological Criticism; Slavery

Translation

Because most Christians read the Bible in translation, and generally identify their translation with the word of God, the quality and character of the translations people read have an extraordinary importance for shaping worldview and theology—whether for good or ill. The last century has seen an explosion of Bible translations into many languages and multiple versions in the same language (Metzger 8–10). Thus, awareness of the nature of Bible translation and its limitations is crucial for the church’s well-being (Barr).

“Translation” is defined here as the attempt to communicate what was first expressed in one language by expressing it in another. The words of the target language (= TL; e.g., Dutch, English, or Kingandou) “map” the words of the source language (= SL; e.g., biblical Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek) so that readers may, as much as possible, discern what was said and infer what was meant in the original. Our discussion is focused on written translation of the Bible. We consider translation a communicative process in which the translator in effect “quotes” (directly or indirectly) what was first written in an SL in a TL. The communicative goal is that readers in the TL will understand what Isaiah, Matthew, or Paul wrote in a SL, and ultimately what God said over many generations to Israel and the human race through them. Crucial here is that readers of translated Bibles expect the translator to give them, as faithfully as possible, what God said through the human biblical authors (cf.

Wolterstorff). The relevance and power of Scripture is found not in its immediate address to a reader’s perceived needs, but rather in the fact that in times past God spoke in many and various ways by the prophets (i.e., in Scripture). Then he spoke to humanity in his Son, Jesus the Messiah (cf. Heb. 1:1; 2 Tim. 3:15–17). A Bible translation’s (p 813)relevance is found in its status as a quotation of the divine word across language barriers.

To understand translation itself, some basic principles of communication must be kept in mind. Verbal communication occurs when something is said or written with the intent of conveying some meaning, and the hearer or reader infers a meaning (rightly or wrongly) from what is said or written. When a communication is successful, we say something has been understood. With large, composite, complex artistic communications like the Bible, the process of inference and understanding is never complete. Nor is it immediate, for readers today live in a different cultural, historical world than Paul or Amos.

The task of biblical translation is thus an enormous responsibility. It is also extraordinarily difficult. In fact, it can never be perfectly done, given the nature of human languages and communication. Translation must always be supplemented by preaching, teaching, and commentary from those who know the original languages.

Thus, translation does not claim to say something original. Rather, translation implies a contract between the translator and the audience that the translator will faithfully communicate what the original author wrote (cf. Robinson 194–258). The faithful translator does not rewrite Amos to bring Amos into the present. Rather, she puts Amos's language into a TL so that, as much as possible, the reader can enter Amos's strange world and meet him as he is. The translator is a "secondary author" who speaks to her contemporaries in their own tongue. Strictly speaking, the translator has authority to write nothing but what the "primary author" has written, for the authority of Scripture resides in the original text. In practice, the cultural, contextual, and linguistic differences between the SL and the TL make it impossible to write in a TL exactly what was first written in the SL. Hence, the goal of a "literal translation" is a chimera. There are and can be no truly "literal" translations in which the TL reflects the SL "word for word." For nonlinguists, this statement may seem questionable, but for competent linguists it is an obvious fact, though they also are tempted to ignore its implications. We may suggest, instead, that TL words and phrases are verbal metaphors for the words and phrases of the SL (cf. Barnstone).

A Paradigm Shift in Translation

Discussion of translation today is made especially difficult because a "paradigm shift" (Kuhn) is occurring in translation theory and practice, and there currently seem to be two main models for translation (Smith). Over the last half century, one theory of translation has, with few exceptions, dominated the practice of Bible translation around the world. This theory is most prominently associated with the name of Eugene Nida, and has had a series of names: "dynamic equivalence," "functional equivalence," and most recently, “meaning-based” translation (Nida; Nida and Tabor; de Waard and Nida; Larson). The current paradigm conflict concerns how verbal meaning is communicated and appropriated. The Nida tradition believes that meaning and form are largely independent, and that translators must translate meaning rather than words. This tradition thus opposes “formal equivalence” (sometimes caricatured as “word-for-word” translation) and argues that one must translate meaning rather than words, so that the effect on the TL reader is “equivalent” to that of the SL on its first readers. Nida’s theories have been largely institutionalized in translation projects around the world (for critique, see Porter and Hess).

The other main translation paradigm is based on a linguistic model called “Relevance Theory” (Sperber and Wilson; cf. Goatly). In biblical translation, its main proponent has been E.-A. Gutt (cf. Smith). A simplified version of this theory is presented in the present article (cf. Van Leeuwen). Gutt argues that we are dealing with competing paradigms, and not merely with intraparadigm disputes, because practitioners of the older Nida paradigm appear not to understand essential aspects of the Relevance paradigm, much as Newtonian physicists were once hostile to the new Einsteinian theories (Gutt, Translation, 202–38).

What Translation Can and Cannot Do

Though our focus is on Bible translation, the general principles and problems of translation apply also to Sacred Scripture. Understanding is possible only when three types of relevant knowledge are present. That is, communication is relevant to us if it interacts with what we already know, believe, or assume. The three types of knowledge are

1. Knowledge of the language system
2. Knowledge of the context: situation and context
3. Background schematic knowledge: factual and sociocultural (Goatly 137–38)

Obviously, without knowledge of a shared language, we cannot understand what is said. Translation seeks to overcome this sort of knowledge (p 814) gap by “remapping” what was said in an SL in terms of the TL. Translation accommodates what was said to the “language system” of readers, because that is what they already know. Many readers of the Bible are unable or unwilling to learn the original biblical languages. Translation attempts to communicate what is written in the Bible by compensating for this lack of linguistic knowledge. But for understanding to take place, readers need knowledge of the immediate context (2, above) and of background schematic factual and sociocultural factors (3).

Translation by itself cannot make up for lack of the second and third types of knowledge. For example, when Jesus is called “Christ,” readers need to know that Christos is the NT Greek translation of Hebrew “mashiakh/messiah,” both meaning “anointed” (1 Sam. 16:6, 12–13; cf. Ps. 2:1–2; Matt. 26:63–64; Acts 4:25–6; etc.). They also need to know that anointing was the means through which God appointed and empowered a person by his Spirit to fill a particular office, whether of prophet, priest, or Davidic king, and that Jesus’ “anointing” occurred at his baptism by John. All this knowledge is necessary for understanding something as simple as anointing and the identity of Jesus the Christ. A major limitation of biblical translation is that translation by itself cannot provide such information, and without such information, understanding of what is meant is not possible. The letter by Rehum and Shimshai to the Persian king (Ezra 4:11–16) requires knowledge of Judah’s conflicted local situation and of Rehum’s dishonest agenda. Moreover, the letter is written in Aramaic—though most of the book is written in Hebrew—because Aramaic was the language of diplomacy in the Persian Empire. Finally, understanding of the letter in its historical and literary context requires knowledge of Israelite religion, in which Yahweh had promised the land of Israel and then the city of Jerusalem to the faithful descendants of Abraham and of David, characters found in Genesis, Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles! Since many Bible translations begin with a portion of Scripture, usually an NT Gospel, the crucial question becomes, How do readers acquire the necessary background knowledge to understand the texts they read?

Bible translations cannot avoid this central question. Two options exist. One may attempt to provide contextual and background material in the translated text itself. In a sense, this involves not only writing the original in a new language, but also actually rewriting, in the form of explanatory paraphrase, what was said in the original. This practice may give readers a text that is easily understandable, but it has the deficit of breaking the implicit contract between translator and reader that the former should say in the TL what was said in the SL. It also imposes the translator’s interpretation of the text on the reader, sometimes with serious theological consequences. For example, the NIV in Ecclesiastes (and only in Ecclesiastes) translates the important keyword hebel as “meaningless” (passim). Hebel is here a metaphor meaning something like “breath, vapor, mist.” To translate hebel as “meaningless” forces a certain interpretation of the book on the reader, an interpretation that many scholars consider incorrect (Van Leeuwen, “New Translation”). Alternately, one may provide help in the form of notes, commentary, teaching, or preaching on the translated text. The NT does something similar when it explains the meaning of Hebrew “Immanuel” by adding “which means, ‘God with us’ ” (Matt. 1:23; Isa. 7:14). Thus, it is fair to conclude that while translation is necessary, it is never enough. The church needs pastors, teachers, and laity who search the Scriptures in the original languages, to help translators and readers dependent on translations by bringing out of Scripture “treasures new and old” (cf. Matt. 13:52).

See also Culture and Hermeneutics; Hermeneutics; Language, Linguistics; Meaning

Bibliography

Barnstone, W. The Poetics of Translation. Yale University Press, 1993; Barr, J. “Modern English Bible Versions as a Problem for the Church.” QR 14 (1994): 263–78; Goatly, A. The Language of Metaphors. Routledge, 1997; Gutt, E.-A. Translation and Relevance. St. Jerome, 2000; idem. “Urgent Call for Academic Reorientation.” Notes on Sociolinguistics 5 (2000): 47–56; Kuhn, T. The Structure of Scientific Revolution. 2d ed. University of Chicago Press, 1970; Larson, M. L. Meaning-Based Translation. University Press of America, 1997; Metzger, B. The Bible in Translation. Baker, 2001; Nida, E. Toward a Science of Translating. Brill, , 1964; Nida, E., and C. Tabor. The Theory and Practice of Translation. Brill, 1969; Porter, S., and R. Hess, eds. Translating the Bible. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Robinson, D. The Translator’s Turn. Johns Hopkins University Press, 1991; Smith, K. G. “Bible Translation and Relevance Theory.” Diss., University of Stellenbosch, 2000; Sperber, D., and D. Wilson. Relevance. Harvard University Press, 1986; Van Leeuwen, R. “On Bible Translation and Hermeneutics.” Pages 284–311 in After Pentecost, ed. C. Bartholomew. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2001; idem. “We Really Do Need a New Translation of the Bible.” Christianity Today 22, no. 11 (October 2001): 28–35; Waard, J. de, and E. Nida. From One Language to Another. T. Nelson, 1986; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Raymond C. Van Leeuwen

(p 815)Trinity

The Christian faith is inalienably trinitarian. Baptism “in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit,” administered by command of the risen Christ (Matt. 28:18–20), is the ground and seal of a faith that responds to a gospel proclaimed from NT times in embryonically trinitarian terms (Acts 2:22–38). By the end of the second century the kerygma and the faith were formulated according to a “canon of truth” or “regula fidei” and expressed in early creeds. Thus Irenaeus in his Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching:

This then is the order of our faith, the foundation of our building, and the support of our conduct: God the Father, uncreated, uncontainable, invisible; one God, the creator of all things: this is the first point of our faith. The second point is this: the Word of God, Son of God, Christ Jesus our Lord, who appeared to the prophets, each characteristically and according to the Father's ways of disposing; through Christ all things were made, and he also at the end of the times, to complete and gather up all things, was made man among men, visible and tangible, in order to abolish death and show forth life and effect communion between God and man. And the third point is: the Holy Spirit, through whom the prophets prophesied, the patriarchs learned the things of God, and the righteous were led into the way of righteousness; and who in the end of the times was poured out in a new way upon the human race, renewing man in all the earth unto God. (Epid. 6 [SC 406:90–93, 242]; cf. Haer. 1.10.1 [SC 264:154–59]; 4.33.7–8 [SC 100:818–21]; and Tertullian, Praescr. 13.1–6 [SC 46:106]; Prax. 2 [in Tertulliani Adversus Praxean liber, ed. E. Evans (SPCK, 1948), 90–91, 131–32])

According to the Epistula Apostolorum, Christians profess faith “in the Father, the Ruler of the universe; and in Jesus Christ, our Savior; and in the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete; and in the holy church; and in the forgiveness of sins” (5 [16], in Duensing 7). What we know as the Apostles' Creed “betrays in its form and language its direct descent from the primitive apostolic Preaching” (Dodd 73–74). In the fourth century, to ward off Arian heresies, the ecumenical councils of 325 and 381 introduced more precise phraseology, drawing transformatively upon Greek ontology to achieve a sharper statement of what was to be taught and believed concerning the being, character, action, and purposes of God. These councils thus produced the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed, which has remained the most widely affirmed statement of trinitarian faith in both East and West.

The classic creeds were being formulated at the same time as the canon of the Scriptures was being recognized and determined; there was interaction between the two processes, and the Scriptures and the creeds continue to function reciprocally. In the one direction, the story that the Scriptures tell and the history they record find summary statement in the creeds. In the other direction, the creeds serve as the key to the interpretation of the complex Scriptures. The narrative begins, “In the beginning,” with the creative speech-act of God's Word and the life-giving energy of God's Spirit (Gen. 1:1–2:7; cf. Ps. 33:6–9). The narrative reaches its paradoxical climax when “the Word became flesh” as Jesus Christ (John 1:14), the “only Son,” who “for our salvation came down from heaven, and by the power of the Holy Spirit became incarnate from the Virgin Mary, and was made man” (Nicene Creed; cf. Matt. 1:18–23; Luke 1:30–35). On the cross Jesus offered himself to the Father through the eternal Spirit (Heb. 9:14), and by the same Spirit the Father raised him from the dead (Rom. 1:4; 8:11). The narrative looks forward to a conclusion when “the Spirit and the bride” will cry “Come, Lord Jesus” (Rev. 22:17, 20), and at his return Christ will inaugurate the definitive kingdom in which God will be praised and enjoyed by God’s people forever. In its preaching and its liturgical rehearsal of the narrative in Scripture readings, creeds, and eucharistic anaphoras, the church invites and enacts the participation of each new generation until the final denouement of the divine drama.

Given the trinitarian faith, traditional Christians see the historical composition of the Scriptures as a trinitarian work. Thus, John Wesley, for instance, in the preface to his Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament (1754–55), gives the following succinct account of the historical origins of the Scriptures:

Concerning the Scriptures in general, it may be observed, the word of the living God, which directed the first patriarchs also, was, in the time of Moses, committed to writing. To this were added, in several succeeding generations, the inspired writings of the other prophets. Afterwards, what the Son of God preached, and the Holy Ghost spake by the apostles, the apostles and evangelists wrote.... The Scripture, therefore, of the Old and New Testament is a most solid and precious system of divine truth. (Works 14:238)

The God of Israel, who “directed” the patriarchs and “inspired” the prophets, is the holy Trinity, who has now been clearly revealed as such in (p 816)the incarnation of the Son, the Word made flesh, and in the Holy Spirit. This Spirit was seen to rest upon Jesus and heard to speak through the apostles at Pentecost and beyond. Wesley clearly recognized a human role of various kinds—differing according to historical circumstances—in the writing down of God’s word by Moses and his successors, and by the apostles and evangelists. In his account of that role, Wesley, like much of the Christian tradition, oscillates between the reception of a divine dictation—whereby certain parts of Scripture at least were given to the human writer by “particular revelation”—and the allowance that the writers used their human judgment in a more general accordance with “the divine light which abode with them, the standing treasure of the Spirit of God” (Explanatory Notes, ad 1 Cor. 7:25).

The trinitarian origin of the Scriptures is to be matched in our appropriation of them. Correspondingly, traditional Christians go about their reading of the Scriptures in a trinitarian way. This is well expressed in The Catechism of the Catholic Church, drawing on the Vatican II Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei verbum). First, “Sacred Scripture must be read and interpreted in the light of the same Spirit by whom it was written” (Catechism §111). Here we may think of the prayer of Hilary of Poitiers. In his work On the Trinity, he asks the Father for “participation in the prophetic and apostolic Spirit, so that we may grasp their words in no other sense than (the prophets and apostles) uttered them” (De trinitate 1.38 [CCSL 62:36]). Second, “Scripture is a unity by reason of the unity of God’s plan, of which Christ Jesus is the center and heart, open since his Passover” (Catechism §112; cf. §134). Here we may think of Luther’s words concerning Christ himself as the res or “substance” of the Scriptures, now clearly revealed. “What more august thing,” he asks Erasmus, “can lie hidden in the Scriptures, now that the seals have been broken and the stone rolled away from the mouth of the tomb, and that the supreme mystery has gone forth, that Christ the Son of God became a human being, that God is one and triune, that Christ suffered for us and will reign eternally?... Remove Christ from the Scriptures and what more will you find in them?” (De servo arbitrio [WA 18:606]). Third, “In the sacred books, the Father who is in heaven comes lovingly to meet his children, and talks with them” (Catechism §104, citing Dei verbum §21).

The divine descent is for the purpose of lifting God’s human creatures (cf. 2 Cor. 1:18–22). The Scriptures play their part in this upward movement also in trinitarian fashion. Through Christ we have access to the Father in the Spirit (Eph. 2:18; cf. Rom. 8:14–17; Gal. 4:6). The ultimate consequence of that, as the Cappadocian theologians recognized, is that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are properly worshipped and glorified together, “three persons” of “one nature,” “one in essence.” Liturgically, that occurs, for instance, through the acclamation “Gloria Patri et Filio et Spiritui Sancto,” which concludes the recitation of psalms. It confirms an understanding of the Psalms as a prophetic telling of the entire story of God with the world, as the NT writers imply by their citations from the Psalter at crucial points. This move is endorsed and developed by traditional Christian commentators on the Psalms.

The present “praise of the Lord” as—according to a hymn of Isaac Watts—both our “duty” and our “delight” is a foretaste of our final salvation. Wesley’s sermon 43, “The Scripture Way of Salvation,” is trinitarian through and through. This is true from “the first dawning of grace in the soul” by the “drawings of the Father” (John 6:44), the “light” of the Son and Word (John 1:9), and the “convictions” of the Spirit (John 16:8). It continues through justification on account of the merits of Christ and sanctification by the renewing work of the Holy Spirit. And it finds fulfillment in the consummation in glory. “To crown all, there will be a deep, an intimate, an uninterrupted union with God; a constant communion with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ, through the Spirit; a continual enjoyment of the Three-One God, and of all the creatures in him” (Wesley, Sermon 64, “The New Creation”). The Scriptures are consonant with other elements in the church’s life, particularly preaching and the sacraments, and are norming in appropriate ways these other elements. They are God-given means for the Holy Spirit to bring us to Christ and through him to the Father.

In sum, by their content, their composition, their use, and their functions in worship and proclamation, the Scriptures are thoroughly trinitarian. In the aftermath of the deistic trends of the Enlightenment, twentieth-century Protestant theology was aided toward the recovery of this fundamental fact of the classic Christian faith by Karl Barth’s massively important Church Dogmatics. In it the threefold structure of the divine self-revelation—which occurs for us by the Son and in us by the Spirit—corresponds to the very being of the triune God and Lord, to whom the Bible bears permanent and normative witness. (p 817) In a rich and comprehensive treatment of “Scripture in the economy of salvation,” Telford Work sees the Scriptures at the service of the triune God, who employs them to reveal and achieve his purposes. Each person of the Trinity plays his appropriate part in and through them in the undivided work of salvation. “Christian Scripture reflects and accomplishes the will of the Father, through the ministry of the Son, in the power of the Holy Spirit and the humanity of God’s chosen people” (11; cf. 319–20).

The traditional trinitarian hermeneutic of Scripture, such as sketched thus far, has more recently been challenged on two fronts, particularly with regard to the OT. Historical critics bring the charge of anachronism against finding the Trinity in the OT; given the history of European anti-Semitism, there is now also a desire to avoid any supersessionistic account of the continuing Jewish people that would move from the level of theological judgment to that of racial hostility. In face of the first point, C. Kavin Rowe has argued that a genuinely canonical reading of the Bible will respect the sequential unfolding of the external story. Thereby the very newness of the incarnation and Pentecost will exert a “pressure” that gives Christians the clue for a christological and indeed trinitarian understanding of the internal story and its God from its very beginnings. There is no need to read conscious trinitarian thinking “anachronistically” into the minds of the OT authors. In face of the second point, Bruce Marshall realizes that to deny OT Israel access to the triune God would be to saw off the branch on which Christianity sits, since Christians have always claimed that the God revealed in Jesus Christ is “the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.” Nevertheless, he wishes to avoid the dangerous conclusion that the continuing Jewish people do not have such access. That would risk misinterpreting what the apostle Paul says in Rom. 11:25–32 concerning God’s fidelity to his promises and the salvation of “all Israel.” It also might be used to condone the unconscionable behavior of many historic Christians toward Jews over the centuries. Marshall observes that traditional Christian hermeneutics oscillates in its interpretation of “the LORD” in the OT between Christ as the Son or Word, the Father, the Spirit (occasionally), and the entire Trinity. From “the lack of referential fixity in Christian discourse about the God of Israel,” he concludes that “the Father is the God of Israel, the Son is the God of Israel, and the Holy Spirit is the God of Israel, yet they are not three Gods of Israel, but one God of Israel” (258). According to Marshall, “Knowledge of the Trinity, while not necessary in order to identify God, completes and perfects the identification of Israel’s God” (263). “By giving descriptions that enable us to distinguish and relate the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, Christian liturgy and Scripture render to us God’s very identity, his inmost personal reality. Themselves instruments of the eternal Spirit, they put us in touch with ‘the deep things of God’ (1 Cor. 2:10)” (263–64).

Augustine recognized the difficulties in a trinitarian distribution of the theophanies of the OT when he systematically explored the relevant passages (Trin. 2.7.12–2.18.35 [CCSL 50:96–126]). In my judgment, there is still a broad wisdom to be found in Augustine’s dictum that “the new testament lies latent in the old, and the old stands revealed in the new” (Quaest. Hept. 2.73 [CCSL 33:106]). This by no means excludes what the Orthodox theologian Boris Bobrinskoy calls “intimations” of the Trinity before the incarnation and Pentecost. Thereby OT saints and prophets may already have glimpsed what was to be more fully revealed of the Godhead later (John 5:46; 8:56–58; 12:41; 1 Cor. 10:4; 1 Pet. 1:10–12). In Eastern iconography, the scene from Gen. 18 depicting the three visitors to Abraham and Sarah under the oaks at Mamre becomes a visual means for offering worship to the triune God rendered present.

Patristically, it is possible to read the increasing clarity of trinitarian revelation in ways that may on the surface seem contradictory but which, in fact, each and together preserve the differentiated unity of the stages in one history of salvation. According to Gregory Nazianzus, “The Old Testament proclaimed the Father openly, and the Son more obscurely; the New manifested the Son, and suggested the deity of the Spirit; now the Spirit himself dwells among us, and supplies us with a clearer demonstration of himself” (Fifth Theological Oration 26 [SC 250:326–27]). In the reverse direction, Irenaeus declared that God, “having been seen in bygone days through the Spirit prophetically, and then seen through the Son adoptively, shall be seen in the kingdom of heaven paternally, the Spirit preparing man for the Son of God, the Son leading him to the Father, and the Father giving him the incorruptibility and eternal life that come from the vision of God” (Haer. 4.20.5 [SC 100:638–41]). This latter sequence corresponds to what, evangelically and experientially, is already the case as those who are being saved anticipate the “ascent through (p 818)the Spirit to the Son, and through the Son to the Father” (5.36.2 [SC 153:458–61]; cf. Epid. 7 [SC 406:92–93]). For it is also, according to Basil the Great, the direction of Christian prayer, being the counterpart to the bestowal of divine blessing from the Father through the Son in the Spirit (On the Holy Spirit 7 [16]; 16 [37]; 18 [47] [SC 17 bis:298–301, 374–77, 412–15]).

Bibliography

Blowers, P. “The Regula Fidei and the Narrative Character of Early Christian Faith.” ProEccl 6 (1997): 199–228; Bobrinskoy, B. The Mystery of the Trinity. St. Vladimir’s Seminary Press, 1999; Catholic Church. Catechism of the Catholic Church, §§101–41. Paulist, 1994; Davis, S., D. Kendall, and G. O’Collins, eds. The Trinity. Oxford University Press, 1999; Dodd, C. H. The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments. Hodder, 1960; Duensing, H., ed. Epistula Apostolorum. A. Marcus & E. Weber, 1925; Leslie, B. Trinitarian Hermeneutics. P. Lang, 1991; Marshall, B. “Do Christians Worship the God of Israel?” Pages 231–64 in Knowing the Triune God, ed. J. Buckley and D. Yeago. Eerdmans, 2001; Potterie, I. de la. “Interpretation of Holy Scripture in the Spirit in Which It Was Written (Dei verbum §12c).” Pages 220–66 in vol. 1 of Vatican II, ed. R. Latourelle. Paulist, 1988; Rowe, C. K. “Biblical Pressure and Trinitarian Hermeneutics.” ProEccl 11 (2002): 295–312; Wainwright, A. The Trinity in the New Testament. SPCK, 1962; Wainwright, G. “The Ecumenical Rediscovery of the Trinity.” OiC 34 (1998): 95–124; idem. “Psalm 33 Interpreted of the Triune God.” ExAud 16 (2000): 101–20; idem. “Wesley’s Trinitarian Hermeneutics.” Wesleyan Theological Journal 36 (2001): 7–30; Wesley, J. “The Scripture Way of Salvation.” Sermon 43. Online: <http://www.godrules.net/library/wsermons/wsermons43.htm>; idem. “The New Creation.” Sermon 65. Online: <http://www.godrules.net/library/wsermons/wsermons64.htm>; idem. The Works of John Wesley, ed. T. Jackson. 14 vols. Zondervan, 1958–59; Work, T. Living and Active. Eerdmans, 2002; Yeago, D. “The New Testament and the Nicene Dogma: A Contribution to the Recovery of Theological Exegesis.” ProEccl 3 (1994): 152–64; idem. “The Spirit, the Church, and the Scriptures: Biblical Inspiration and Interpretation Revisited.” Pages 49–93 in Knowing the Triune God, ed. J. Buckley and D. Yeago. Eerdmans, 2001.

Geoffrey Wainwright

TropeSee Imagery; Metaphor

Tropological Sense See Medieval Biblical Interpretation; Typology

Truth

To ascribe “truth” to a text or interpretation is to confer the ultimate accolade. On this, Scripture and philosophy agree, for truth is a prominent theme in each. No such consensus obtains, however, with regard to the nature and function of truth—to what kind of accolade truth is. Ancient and medieval philosophers were prone to think of truth in relation to goodness and beauty under the rubric of metaphysics (truth as a theory about ultimate reality). Modern thinkers cast lots for the concept according to their respective philosophical preferences. For science and epistemology in general, truth became a function of human methods for knowing facts. For existentialists, truth became a function of subjectivity in the throes of decision-making. For hermeneutics, the experience of the work of art became the paradigm for thinking about truth as an aesthetic experience and ontological event that enlarges one’s self-understanding (Gadamer). Postmoderns, following Nietzsche, are more likely to view the concept with suspicion, a Western subterfuge for various forms of ideological and social oppression (Foucault). Guilty by association with politics and power ploys, the concept of truth has now entered strange new philosophical territory, joined at the hip with the rhetoric and sophistry from which Plato had originally sought to distinguish it.

Philosophical Theories of Truth

J. Barr’s analysis of conservative theology aptly illustrates the effect of presuppositions about truth on biblical interpretation. The conservative tendency to tie the authority of the Bible to its inerrancy—its being without error in everything on which it speaks—results in a “fundamentalism” that insists on seeing the truth of biblical narrative in terms of its historical veracity. Barr opines that fundamentalism is less a strategy for reading the Bible literally than it is a program for ensuring the inerrancy of Scripture. Hence, a theory of truth as correspondence to empirical actuality is the presupposition that governs conservative exegesis (Barr 40–55). However, to presuppose inerrancy or historical factuality imposes a nonbiblical theory of truth on the Bible, leading conservatives to read the Bible wrongly—against the textual grain, against even the literal sense.

H. Frei generalizes Barr’s point in convincing fashion by displaying how modern theologians, conservative and liberal alike, let extratextual theories about the nature and criteria of truth govern their interpretations of biblical narrative (Eclipse). The truth of narrative was thought to refer either to the historical events behind the text or to existential truths about human nature. But to force Scripture to conform to modern ideas of what its truth should be is to make the biblical narrative as “weak” as any other history or myth. The challenge is to let the Bible present its truth in its own terms. Frei himself suggested that this (p 819) requires reading the Bible as realistic narrative (which means what it says), but later changed his mind and claimed that it required reading the Bible in the context of the community of faith (Theology, 94–116).

“Thy word is truth” (RSV: Ps. 119:160; John 17:17). Yes, but “What is truth?” asks Pilate (John 18:38). Aristotle captures our pretheoretical intuition about truth: “To say of what is that it is, or of what is not that it is not, is true” (Metaph. 4.7, 1011b.25–28). Truth names the relation that confers the authority of reality on what we say. We speak truly when an extralinguistic state of affairs “corresponds” to our linguistic formulations. Though intuitive, this view is not without its problems. First, interpreters must still determine to what language corresponds. To insist that language must always correspond to empirical actuality is to assume a modern reductionistic view of that to which true language corresponds. Second, and more significant, is the problem of describing the nature of such correspondence: how exactly does language correspond to the world? The so-called picture theory, where words name objects and sentences represent facts, is too severe and limited a theory of meaning and fails to account for what speakers and writers actually do with words.

While correspondence may be the intuitive meaning of truth, there is no shortage of alternative theories. Perhaps the chief rival in the context of theological interpretation of Scripture is the coherence theory, favored by nonfoundationalists, which focuses on reading in community according to the Rule of Faith and conceives of truth as a relation between statements. Some nonfoundationalists prefer a more pragmatic theory, in which the true is a matter of successfully serving some end (e.g., fostering love of God and neighbor).

Given the core Christian kerygma (“Christ is risen”), however, the best way forward is to follow those who advocate a minimalist correspondence/realist account of truth (Clark; Alston). Truth concerns the relation of a potential truth-bearer to a reality beyond itself: “Truth is always about something, but reality is that about which truth is” (Lewis 66). The distinguishing feature of a “chastened” correspondence view is that it leaves the exact nature of the correspondence relation unfinalized. Such minimalism, far from being a feeble evasion of the issue, is in fact the enabling condition of an enlarged sense of correspondence, one that actually does greater justice to the full panoply of biblical literature (see below).

Biblical Images of Truth

Scripture itself employs a rich and varied vocabulary of truth. The Hebrew term emeth connotes what is firm, reliable, trustworthy, and faithful and expresses the character of a person's speech, thought, or action. As such, truth is opposed to hypocrisy. The Greek term alētheia (used regularly in the LXX to translate emeth) carries these connotations into the NT as well as conveying the more cognitive Hellenistic sense of reality (as opposed to appearance). Truth in this sense is opposed to falsehood.

Note that faithfulness, reliability, and integrity are every bit as much properties or qualities of persons as well as propositions (Thiselton). We fail to do justice to the biblical use of terms for truth if we do not preserve the tie between factuality and faithfulness (Nicole). In biblical usage, promises as well as propositions are privileged truth-bearers. Accordingly, a true statement is not just accurate, a matter of mere intellectual assent; it is also reliable, deserving of personal commitment.

“But the LORD is the true God” (Jer. 10:10). Theologically, truth is first and foremost an attribute of God that emphasizes divine reliability and steadfastness. Truth is grounded in who God is, especially in relation to his covenant word. God is trustworthy just because he acts faithfully, and God's word is God's bond. God's word is true in the sense that it can be relied on, come hell or high water: “Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will not pass away” (Matt. 24:35; cf. 5:18).

No biblical books speak of truth more than the Johannine writings. The Fourth Gospel opposes the light of truth to the darkness of the world, thus situating truth eschatologically. The truth of the gospel belongs to the new age inaugurated by the advent of Christ and is perceived through faith only by those who have received the Spirit of truth. Jesus is God's embodied truth claim, a covenant proposition made personal (John 14:6), whose history displays how things ultimately are (or will be). In the meantime, those who seek to speak and do the gospel must be prepared to suffer for the truth, just as Jesus, God's embodied truth, suffered on the cross (Vanhoozer, “Trials”).

Truth and Theological Interpretation of Scripture: Further Issues

Three further issues are of particular relevance for the theological interpretation of Scripture.

(p 820)Can Interpreters Gain “Objective” Knowledge of Truth? The “traditional Western concept” of truth (Hicks 10)—with its stress on objectivity (truth is outside us), universality (truth is the same for all people), and eternity (truth lasts forever)—fails to address the postmodern emphasis on human situatedness and hence the inaccessibility of objective truth. If the issue is whether truth can be known in a value-neutral way apart from prejudices and presuppositions, the answer Scripture gives, at least with regard to the knowledge of God, is clearly “no.” The apostle Paul gives the lie to such objectivism when he states that the truth is actively suppressed in unrighteousness (Rom. 1). From a different angle, Gadamer has argued that human situatedness in history, language, and tradition, together with the prejudices that such situatedness entails, is not an obstacle but an enabling condition of understanding truth, which progressively comes to light during the course of an ongoing conversation.

Kierkegaard’s “truth is subjectivity” is not a capitulation to subjectivism, but rather a call to go beyond a mere intellectual apprehension of the truth; truth demands passionate commitment, or to use the biblical term, that truth be done. A desire for truth is necessary for one’s being motivated to cultivate the intellectual virtues, truth-conducive habits of the mind that are apt to result in cognitive contact with reality (Zagzebski). Accuracy and sincerity, for example, are twin “virtues of truth” (Williams 11). The point to appropriate for theological interpretation is that biblical truth is not merely a storehouse of propositional facts to be mastered, but also something that persons must desire and appropriate—something to which persons must wholeheartedly submit.

Must the Loss of Epistemological Objectivity Entail the Loss of Objective Truth? Truth theory has traditionally been a “metaphysical project” (Kirkham), an attempt to specify what it is for a proposition to be true. The trend among a good number of contemporary philosophers and theologians is to abandon the attempt to say how reality satisfies the condition for truth. Instead, they favor reducing truth to an “epistemic project,” according to which truth becomes a function of knowledge: what we are warranted in asserting or ideally justified in believing. The main appeal for the antirealist is that, in contrast to the correspondence view, truth—warrant, not world—becomes accessible.

Theological interpreters, however, must resist reducing truth to “our best efforts.” One should not confuse what it is for something to be true with how one comes to know something as true. Some things (e.g., that God is triune) are true, even though they are in principle beyond the reach of what Enlightenment thinkers require in terms of sufficient evidence or verifiability. The chastened correspondence view presented above does not depend on the assumption that truth is always susceptible of demonstration. The realist concept of truth nevertheless matters because it is important for human beings to relate their theoretical and practical concerns to the way things really are (Alston 235–40). Indeed, the biblical dichotomy between the way of the wise and the way of the foolish is not unrelated to the truth and falsity of their respective beliefs.

Are Statements the Primary Bearers of Truth? A third issue concerns the bearers of truth. Strictly speaking, individual words can be neither true nor false. Words are inert and say nothing until someone uses them to say something in a sentence or speech act. Moreover, not all sentences or speech acts make assertions. Accordingly, philosophers identify statements—or propositions, the technical name for the cognitive content of statements—as the primary truth-bearers (Alston 9–17).

The assumption that truth pertains to statements has far-reaching implications for the theological interpretation of Scripture. At one extreme, it is conducive to proof-texting—to abstracting individual statements of Scripture out of their historical, literary, and canonical context and insisting that they nonetheless are true. Second, the focus on statements makes it difficult to take seriously the contention of the Fourth Gospel that Jesus is the truth (John 14:6). Finally, to reduce truth to what can be stated in individual assertions is to lose the richness of truth’s expression through metaphors and through various forms of literature. Are the forms of biblical literature simply vessels into which is poured propositional content, or are the forms themselves statements? The issue is whether truth is always transparent to the indicative mood of reason, or whether some truths can be mediated only via certain forms of the poetic imagination (e.g., narrative, poetry, myth).

Truth and Theological Interpretation of Scripture: Contemporary Proposals

As we have seen, many modern theologians, conservative and liberal alike, tend to interpret Scripture theologically with some extratextual theory of truth already in hand. Other contemporary (p 821) theologians seek to do justice to theological truth on its own terms.

Karl Barth. For K. Barth, truth is not propositional, nor does it refer to a fixed state of affairs; rather, it is “a predicate of God’s own living reality as the Lord” (Hunsinger 67). Similar to Gadamer, who also insisted that truth cannot be limited to what is confirmable by method, Barth stresses the subject matter, or Sache, of Scripture—the living Word of God—which “commandeers” the human words so that they effectively and truthfully refer. Truth is not a static relation but a dynamic event of correspondence between human words and divine truth. Exegetical methods cannot master such truth; on the contrary, the exegete must prayerfully submit to the sovereignty of divine truth. Truth appears in theological interpretation, then, at the moment of personal encounter, when interpreters come both to recognize and actively to participate in the truth of Jesus Christ by becoming witnesses to the truth (Hunsinger 152–84).

Postliberal. G. Lindbeck’s cultural-linguistic theology sees truth as a function of coherence with the overall Christian system, which is constituted not merely by axioms and definitions but more centrally by stories and social practices (64). We cannot know whether or not first-order statements correspond to reality because we lack epistemic access. For all theological intents and purposes, “intrasystematic” truth (e.g., coherence) suffices. To the extent that theological statements do correspond to reality, such correspondence is a function not of the statements considered in and of themselves, but as a function of their role in an ecclesial form of life. It is the whole form of life, not merely the isolated statements, that corresponds to divine reality (65).

In response to criticisms that Lindbeck’s view fails to get beyond a version of social coherentism or consensus, where the truth is simply what people agree it is, other postliberals have turned to the doctrine of the Trinity. Thereby they give a distinctly Christian theological account of truth, in which Jesus is the primary truth-bearer and Christian doctrines are the primary criteria of truth (Marshall). To give primacy to any other set of truth commitments (e.g., science, existentialism, Marxism) determines the meaning one assigns to Scripture and hence inhibits the Bible’s making sense on its own terms. Theology must reject the “dependence thesis,” according to which Christian beliefs depend for their meaning and truth on some other set of beliefs (Marshall 98). An intratextual approach thus demands that the gospel enjoy epistemic primacy; the story of Jesus becomes the interpretative framework for making sense of all other beliefs. The Father’s will decides what is and what will be; the Son mediates what is and what will be; the Spirit, largely by empowering practices that are truth conducive, enables us to will true beliefs. In sanctifying us, the Spirit conforms us to the triune God. The correspondence that ultimately counts is that of self, not sentences, to God. Correspondence here means not theoretical mirroring but participatory likeness (cf. Milbank and Pickstock 1–18).

Postconservative. Finally, what for lack of a better term (and by way of contrast with the preceding) we may call postconservative theology continues to look to the biblical text as a bearer of theological truth, but not as a deposit of atomized statements. While postconservatives affirm the truth of Scripture, they understand language as other than primarily pictorial and theological truth as more than empirically factual. A postconservative theology recognizes the cognitive significance of literary forms other than assertorical statements and is thus less prone to reduce doctrine to propositional paraphrases of Scripture's content. On the contrary, it seeks to do justice to the multiple forms of Scripture (Vanhoozer, Drama), and above all, to the canonically attested form of Jesus Christ.

Postconservative theology works with a chastened correspondence view but also with an enlarged view of the correspondence relation. To take literary forms seriously, as more than mere rhetorical packaging, means affirming a multiform correspondence relation that takes account of the diverse ways in which different types of speech acts and types of literature engage and render reality. Together, the canonical texts map the way of truth and life, though not every biblical map highlights the same features of reality in the same way. As with maps, one must study the key and the legend in order to determine just how the text corresponds to reality.

Christ and Canon: Truth as Covenantal Relation

God's triune communicative action—whereby God's Word and Spirit correspond to the Father and to one another—is the paradigm of truth. God is true because his actions are consistent with his word—because he keeps his word. Jesus is the truth because he is God's "kept" word: "The truth ... is in Jesus" (Eph. 4:21). The primary form of theological truth is the person and history of Jesus Christ, the one in and through whom all (p 822)things have been created and redeemed. Christ is the splendor of truth: the finite human form of the infinite divine glory. Jesus is the light, and in his face is summed up the truth, goodness, and beauty of God himself.

God's truth made known in Jesus Christ goes hand in hand with his khesed or covenant love (Exod. 34:6). In Jesus, the reality of the covenant—and hence the truth of God, humanity, and the relation between them—is made manifest in an utterly reliable way. This truth is "the truth of the gospel" (Gal. 2:5), the truth that sets one free from the old order of sin and death for the eschatological flourishing of the created order. Truth in the context of theological interpretation must never be merely theoretical (a correspondence relation) but practical, transformative, and relational as well. In short, truth is not a bare correspondence but a covenantal relation. To say that truth is covenantal is to acknowledge that it is not simply something to be believed, but also something to be done (the good), appreciated (the beautiful), and adored. Note that truth as a covenantal relation between language and reality allows us to see propositions and persons alike as truth-bearers, for truth is a matter of keeping one's word.

In Jesus Christ, God, the infinite, assumes finite form, and it is precisely the particularities of this form, not some abstract universal principle, that disclose the nature of ultimate reality. Truth is what conforms to the form of Jesus Christ, the submission of language before the Word made flesh. Truth has commissioned its own authorized witnesses. The canon is ultimately the self-attestation of Jesus Christ, the most reliable word that is. The truth of Scripture is not a function of the genius of its authors but of its role in the triune economy of communicative action. The biblical texts are creaturely realities sanctified by the Spirit, co-opted for the sake of facilitating covenantal contact with the triune God. The splendor of truth revealed in Christ is diffused throughout the canon; the white light of the infinite divine form is refracted in a variety of canonical colors and literary forms: song, history, parable, apocalyptic, law, prophecy, and so forth. Hence “the truth of being is ‘poetic’ before it is ‘rational’ ” (Hart 132).

“Thy word is truth.” No other text is as truth-conducive as Scripture. No other texts are the normative specification of truth as those of the canon. If homiletics is a matter of speaking the truth in love, hermeneutics must surely be a matter of searching for the truth (of Scripture) in love. Nothing less than the desire for truth—the desire to know God as God has made himself known in Christ and in the Scriptures that attest him—is a sufficient motivation for cultivating the epistemic and interpretative virtues.

The Spirit employs the biblical texts to minister truth, to bring about covenantal contact with reality. To be in covenant relation with God, keeping his words in obedience as God keeps them in faithfulness, corresponding to the word of God in Christ, is to live in spirit and in truth. It is precisely in coming to know the truth of God in Christ and canon that humans are able to glorify God and enjoy him forever.

Bibliography

Alston, W. A Realist Conception of Truth. Cornell University Press, 1996; Barr, J. Fundamentalism. Westminster, 1978; Clark, D. To Know and Love

God. Crossway, 2003; Feinberg, J. "Truth: Relationship of Theories of Truth to Hermeneutics." Pages 3–50 in Hermeneutics, Inerrancy, and the Bible, ed. E. Radmacher and R. Preus. Zondervan, 1984; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; idem. Theology and Narrative. Oxford University Press, 1993; Gadamer, H.-G. Truth and Method. 2d ed. Continuum, 2002; Hart, D. B. The Beauty of the Infinite. Eerdmans, 2003; Hicks, P. Evangelicals and Truth. Apollos, 1998; Hunsinger, G. How to Read Karl Barth. Oxford, 1991; Kirkham, R. Theories of Truth. MIT Press, 1995; Lewis, C. S. "Myth Became Fact." Pages 63–67 in God in the Dock. Eerdmans, 1970; Lindbeck, G. The Nature of Doctrine. Westminster, 1984; Marshall, B. Trinity and Truth. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Milbank, J., and C. Pickstock. Truth in Aquinas. Routledge, 2001; Nicole, R. "The Biblical Concept of Truth." In Scripture and Truth, ed. D. A. Carson and J. Woodbridge. Zondervan, 1983; Thiselton, A. "Truth." NIDNT 3:874–902; Vanhoozer, K. The Drama of Doctrine. Westminster John Knox, 2005; idem. "The Trials of Truth." Pages 337–73 in First Theology. InterVarsity, 2002; Williams, B. Truth and Truthfulness. Princeton University Press, 2002; Zagzebski, L. Virtues of the Mind. Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Kevin J. Vanhoozer

Tübingen School

This intellectual movement, centered in Schwabian (southwest) Germany at the University of Tübingen, can be dated 1835–60. It is associated first of all with F. C. Baur (1792–1860). Other prominent figures include Eduard Zeller, Albert Schweigler, and Adolf Hilgenfeld. Baur's student David Friedrich Strauss (1808–74) also bears mention. For it was Strauss's The Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1835) that marked a clear break with the orthodox and supernaturalist reading of Scripture still widely affirmed at that time in Tübingen (p 823) and other German Protestant faculties. Strauss's work exemplified a mode of biblical interpretation that rejected cardinal Christian doctrines. Instead, the Bible was understood using categories provided by ethical and philosophical convictions rooted in German idealism. Controversy ensued, engulfing both Strauss (whose academic future was ruined) and Baur (whose university post was already secure). It continued until Baur's death, by which time theological fashion had turned in the direction of Albrecht Ritschl, who studied at Tübingen but then rejected many of Baur's key tenets. Yet even after Baur's passing, aspects of his method continued to develop. "As a practising historian Baur stands closer to ... Troeltsch than to Hegel" (Morgan 273). Among scholars who carried Baur's legacy into the twentieth century are Franz Overbeck (1837–1905), Otto Pfleiderer (1839–1908), and B. W. Bacon (1860–1932). The Tübingen School's legacy retains influence in NT study today.

Baur approached the NT based on a doctrine of God rooted in Hegel's dialectical panentheism. The NT message was the realization of a philosophical ideal, not the proclamation of God's incarnate self-disclosure through Jesus in accordance with Scripture (cf. Rom. 1:2; 16:26). The chief historical dynamic for the unfolding of this ideal, which covered the better part of two centuries, was internecine strife. An early Jewish (Petrine) Christianity focusing on Jesus' messianic consciousness was opposed by Gentile (Pauline) Christianity, which focused on Jesus' ethical idealism and universalism. Only the four Pauline Epistles that reflect this warfare are authentic (Romans, Galatians, 1–2 Corinthians); the sole first-century document reflecting the Petrine party's outlook is Revelation. Later, well after the apostles' time and into the second century, documents were produced that display a reconciliation between the two factions; these include Acts, Hebrews, James, 1 Peter, the Synoptic Gospels, and the rest of the (pseudo-) Pauline letters (but not the Pastorals). The apex of ecclesial and christological formation is found in the Pastorals, 2 Peter, and John's Gospel, all placed near the close of the second century.

Few of Baur's historical and literary judgments have stood the test of time. All the NT writings can be dated comfortably within the first century. The Petrine-Pauline controversy is too slender a cord to bear the whole weight of early Christian development. John's "high" Christology is ubiquitous in the NT, and the Fourth Gospel was not written in the late second century, since a papyrus attests its existence by around 125 CE. In other words, rationalistic German idealism provided an unsuitable platform for exegeting the NT either theologically or historically. Despite such miscues, Baur's work remains a monument to the power of an integrated hermeneutical vision. Theological interpretation of Scripture that avoids Baur's erroneous critical judgments and antitraditional animus would do well to strive for the erudition, clarity, and creativity of the synthetic reading of Scripture for which the Tübingen School is remembered.

Bibliography

Baird, W. History of New Testament Research. Vol. 1, From Deism to Tübingen. Vol. 2, From Jonathan Edwards to Rudolf Bultmann. Fortress, 1992–2002; Harris, H. The Tübingen School. Clarendon, 1975; Harrisville, R. A., and W. Sundberg. The Bible in Modern Culture. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 2002; Hodgson, P. The Formation of Historical Theology. Harper & Row, 1966; Köpf, U. "Ferdinand Christian Baur als Begründer einer konsequent historischen Theologie." ZTK 89, no. 4 (1992): 440–61; Morgan, R. "Ferdinand Christian Baur." Pages 261–89 in vol. 1 of Nineteenth Century Thought in the West, ed. N. Smart et al. Cambridge University Press, 1985; Neill, S., and T. Wright. The Interpretation of the New Testament, 1861–1986. 2d ed. Oxford University Press, 1988; Rollmann, H. "From Baur to Wrede: The Quest for a Historical Method.” SR 17, no. 4 (1988): 443–54; Strauss, D. F. The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, ed. P. Hodgson. Translated from the 4th German ed. by G. Eliot. Fortress, 1972.

Robert W. Yarbrough

Two Horizons      See Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics

Typology

Decisions about the definition and propriety of “typological” exegesis have decisive consequences for theological hermeneutics. Not only will they affect how we describe inner-biblical exegesis (NT use of the OT in particular). Such decisions will also affect how we prescribe a contemporary hermeneutic for moving between texts and theology or application. They will influence whether or not we should find in the interpretative practices of NT authors a pattern to follow for handling such “analogical” movement.

Definition among Biblical Scholars

Typology, according to a representative and concise definition, relates “the past to the present in terms of a historical correspondence and escalation in which the divinely ordered prefiguration finds a complement in the subsequent and greater event” (Ellis 106). Types in this strict (p 824) sense have to do with persons, institutions, or events (Baker, ch. 7; Davidson; Goppelt). For example, the NT seems to view persons such as Moses and David to pattern fulfillments in Jesus Christ as prophet, leader of Israel, Son of God, and so on. Institutions such as the tabernacle or sacrificial system foreshadow the substance of Christian realities. And as to events, the Noahic flood prefigures Christian baptism.

Not all scholars would agree that the prefiguration provides advance notice or leaves evidence in the “typical” text (as argued by, e.g., Davidson; and Kaiser; on the other side, France; for representatives of each, see Moo 196n63). Neither do all scholars accept the historicity of the types, so approaches to salvation history affect discussions about what would count as evidence for typological hermeneutics. For the moment, whatever modern convictions might be, we must admit that the NT authors took the precedents of the canonical salvation history to anticipate patterns of further divine action.

Development in the Bible and Church History

We should point out that “typology” is not really a biblical term, since it implies developed study of types, which may not really characterize the texts themselves (so Ostmeier; nonetheless, here I accede to common use). For a long time, the standard bearer on typos has been Goppelt, but his work is somewhat problematic due to its tendency to discover phenomena within the Bible that match an assumed definition (Davidson 53–55). Accordingly, Davidson has countered by seeking to provide a thoroughly inductive understanding. He shows that typos may basically denote (1) any matrix or Vorbild that leaves its impress; (2) an impression or Nachbild, the impression left by the matrix; or (3) a matrix or Vorbild that is at the same time an impression or Nachbild. Three cognates of typos also appear in the NT: antitypos, typikos, and hypotypōsis (131–33).

Among NT appearances of this vocabulary, Davidson argues for these hermeneutically relevant passages: Rom. 5; 1 Cor. 10; Heb. 8; Heb. 9; and 1 Pet. 3 (188). Several “structures” are common to them: historical, eschatological, christological-soteriological, ecclesiological, and prophetic. However helpful these are, (1) ironically enough (given the inductive effort), the appearance of each structure is probably not demonstrated adequately for all the texts. (2) Nor will word usage alone suffice to select texts for the NT’s “typological” hermeneutics if typos is not a technical term (which appears somewhat doubtful). (3) This is all the more true if it is correct that, for example, “typological” interpretations offered by Jesus, according to the Gospels, are often “most implicit,” involving a “far looser method” than type and antitype. “More often the parallels, though present, are unexpressed, and the typological intention must be inferred from the selection of that particular Old Testament passage for that particular occasion” (France 76). (4) Moreover, arguably Paul’s “allegory”—typological or not?—regarding Hagar and Sarah is a vital limit-case with which to assess his hermeneutic for canonical persons and events connected to salvation history.

Indeed, Gal. 4 and other texts became a basis for the early Christians’ recourse to allegorical interpretation, which few distinguished from typology in their need for Christian readings of the OT. Early on, such reading strategies were often apologetically motivated (e.g., Justin’s Dialogue with Trypho representatively dealing with Jewish objections to Christian claims). However, Origen and others were also pedagogically oriented to “spiritual” reading. Such exegesis was perhaps not intended to dismiss the particularity of the original so much as being dependent on a conception of history that moderns (such as Auerbach and others who accuse Origen of antihistorical allegorizing) do not understand (so Dawson).

Nevertheless, the “Alexandrian” school was perceived by the “Antioch” school, back in that very day, to read ahistorically. The Antiochenes were not really quibbling over whether to use the word “allegory” to describe what Paul does in Gal. 4, but wanted to defend its legitimate relation to the letter of the OT (Young 180). However, the influence of Origen, Augustine, and Gregory the Great won out, so that allegory was taken up into the medieval development of the Bible’s “fourfold sense”—literal, allegorical (corresponding to faith), tropological (corresponding to love), and anagogical (corresponding to hope). The Reformation’s rejection of this—in theory if not entirely in practice—followed by the development of critical biblical scholarship and its domination of the public square requires historical and theological assessments of typology in relation to allegory.

Distinction from Allegory?

Such theological assessments differ. At each end of a spectrum are those who find no substantial difference between typology and allegory, or find that unimportant.

(p 825)1. On what I shall call the “inspiration” end, some conservative scholars find many NT readings of OT texts unacceptable by current standards of “meaning” (usually, the human author’s “intention”), and may see such “allegorizing” or spiritual exegesis not really to be interpretative. Anyway, such uses of the text are covered by the privilege of divine inspiration, which leads us to accept the NT theological assertions without necessarily adopting their methods (e.g., Longenecker, who has clarified recently that NT readings of the OT are acceptable but distinct from their “methods,” which are unnecessary).

2. On what I shall call the “illumination” end, typically less conservative scholars also find many NT readings of the OT to be allegorical, or do not substantially distinguish typology and allegory. Whether or not the older Roman Catholic sensus plenior approach is adopted (in which there is a fuller divine or spiritual sense when biblical texts are read canonically), such churchly scholars permit contemporary imitation of NT interpretative practice. Claiming the leading of the Holy Spirit, they may go beyond or even against the verbal sense of a particular passage (e.g., Hays; Fowl).

Historical and/or literary approaches often fund such theological assessments. The literary truism of a New Critic such as Northrop Frye, that all reading involves a certain dimension of “otherness” (e.g., Young 3) intruding due to contextual differentiation, has helped to foster construals of all the “typological” as “allegorical” (which derives from the Greek word allos for “other”). Perhaps such a truism, however, becomes virtually tautological, which (so Whitman) should chasten many of us who have been guilty of repeating it as if the point were conceptually vital. Meanwhile, we must grant the historical fuzziness of the boundary between typology and allegory in practice, but not as if we know entirely better than the patristic (“Antioch” vs. “Alexandria”) or later (Reformers vs. various Roman Catholics) disputants that nothing was at stake. A rough distinction between “typology” and “allegory,” then, might be reformulated around different kinds of mimesis (representation of reality or “world”). An “iconic” version may correspond to typology and preserve a “narrative coherence” between referents. On the other hand, “symbolic” versions may correspond to allegory, which arbitrarily imposes a thoroughly ahistorical connection (so Young).

3. Some such distinction is theologically important for those toward the middle of our spectrum. They believe that we may imitate NT interpretative practices and that those practices may be construed as consistent with the OT verbal sense, at least when that is read as—and in the context of—a canonical whole. This whole canon shapes and is shaped by the narrative coherence just mentioned, and ties together the particular texts.

3a. More conservative scholars, who tend more toward emphasizing a doctrine of biblical inspiration, also tend toward an author-centered construal of “verbal sense.” They can be inclined to find (as much as possible) verbal evidence in particular OT passages of prophetic anticipation for NT typological fulfillment.

3b. Meanwhile, reader-oriented theories tend toward the “illumination” emphasis mentioned above, along with some text-centered theories. (Other, more centrist, text-oriented theories distinguish between [at least some that would count as] allegorical excess and canonically warranted typological or “figural” readings.)

Deployment in “Figural Reading”

Hans Frei’s influential The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative contrasts modern with pre-eighteenth-century hermeneutics in this way: “Figural reading had been literalism extended to the whole story or the unitary canon containing it. But now figural sense came to be something like the opposite of literal sense.... Literal reading came increasingly to mean two things: grammatical and lexical exactness in estimating what the original sense of a text was to its original audience, and the coincidence of the description with how the facts really occurred” (7). Figural interpretation for the Reformers held together the Bible as a book projecting the one coherent world/story as it really is. Something like typology allowed for biblical interpretation to be both literal and Christian. Calvin, Frei’s prime example, held both that the Spirit enabled Christian experience to illuminate (newly) the meaning of OT types, and that such interpretation “is in no sense a material contribution on the part of the interpreter” (Frei 34). This contrasts subtly but significantly with the characterizations in Hays and others of the Spirit’s influence over NT use of the OT—that this allowed a reading in what (in a sense) was not really there.

Arguably, we must admit that many NT typological readings were not fully possible until after Christ’s first advent, and the outpouring of his Spirit (so even Moo). But we need not stipulate experience as their interpretative warrant if, following Calvin broadly, we trust that God’s (p 826) speech in Scripture and actions in salvation history manifest a sort of unity and consistency with each other. Experience of Christ via the Spirit may have been necessary for recognition of the reality about which the biblical texts spoke—may in a sense have been the reality about which they spoke—without being the grounds for such recognition. When it comes to typological reading, experience may be hermeneutically significant, but not solely decisive.

The significance of experience also concerns an ethical dimension of NT readings, which may have been underdeveloped by scholars to date. According to George Lindbeck, “Traditionally expressed, one could perhaps say that typological tropology or tropological typology was the chief interpretative strategy for making the Bible contemporary, for absorbing one’s own world into the world of the text” (31). Paul’s reading of Israel’s story as “typical” for the Corinthians concerning testing and idolatry depends on aforementioned typological structures (e.g., the ecclesiology of 1 Cor. 10:1–4, along with the eschatology in 10:11) but is strikingly ethical in its focus. While his depiction of their reality is grounded in extrapolating from past to present divine action, what is typical for the Corinthian decision concerns Israelite patterns that they should or should not emulate. For an event to be written is to enable its encouragement of our proper response to God (Rom. 15:4).

Biblical “typology” cannot be treated, therefore, simply as a prophetic matter of extrapolating the indicative—divine action and associated realities (such as connections between Jesus, Israel, and church) that are already set. It also involves discerning the imperative: prudential discernment of such realities in light of their divinely prepared application to God’s people in the present. However important it is to distinguish divine action and human response, so that we respond with discernment about what God has really said and done, such realities may not be separated. Hebrews, perhaps the typological reader par excellence, is a prime example of this point (e.g., see the end of ch. 5). Our moral growth (or lack of it) affects discernment, which affects what relationships we will hear, taste, and see between God's covenant realities.

If Scripture indeed involves divine action, then we may not allegorize to our heart's content, as if determining or creating God's action in the present or downplaying the particular reality of the past with which the Spirit will somehow be consistent. (See, e.g., Seitz contra examples in Fowl and others concerning spiritual reading and Acts 15; while another interesting "figural reading," which may or may not live up to textual details, comes from Radner.) Moreover, it is entirely appropriate for scholars to attempt defenses of NT typological readings, describing their warrant in terms that might satisfy a modern public. This might work if that public were to apply historical and literary criteria with a heuristic openness to the plausibility of the readings, given a framework of Christian assumptions about salvation history.

Nonetheless, such "typology" might not do entire justice to NT reading strategies for discovery, with their ethical allowance—indeed necessity—for recognizing anew divine realities and authorized patterns of life via prudence in a given moment (previously those patterns would have been impossible to foresee). We may focus on warrant at one moment (especially when studying NT hermeneutics prescriptively), but then on strategies for discovery at another (which might do NT hermeneutics more descriptive justice); in any case, these reinforce each other. Thus, while we may want to distinguish between them, in the end they may not be separated because they are mutually implicating. If this broadens a "typological" hermeneutic to cover discovery as well as warrant, still it also constrains "analogical" moves from Bible to context, by tying such "applications" more tightly to textual realities.

For there is interrelationship between patterns of divine action we extrapolate typologically, and patterns of human response we should or should not emulate figurally. That we should expect, since NT "typology"—while deploying a pattern of interpretation with precursors in the OT itself—is fundamentally a Christ-centered development, and in him the divine and human connect. Both particular OT persons and Israel the people of God anticipate Christ by being divine action with a human vocation; OT events and institutions likewise foreshadow his work. Thus, the regathering Israel—both particular new covenant persons and the one people of God they comprise—may extrapolate divine action from biblical patterns read through Christ. Moreover, churchly readers find in Jesus the biblical pattern of human life to emulate. He is the measure of fullness to which a new humanity is being conformed and therefore through which all other scriptural patterns must be read.

Jesus Christ is both the fulfillment of promised divine action that precedes our discernment, and the faithful pattern through which humans discover afresh (p 827) our proper future. God has spoken the final communicative act—we now have all the patterns to emulate. Yet we await full realization of the happy ending, so we must continue to extrapolate from prior patterns how God is wrapping up our final scenes. This significance of Christology for ecclesiology and eschatology (as well as vice versa) answers why and how tropology and “typology” must work together for theological interpreters of Scripture: typoi have to do with the interrelation between reading of who God is for us and who we shall be. See also Allegory; Jewish Exegesis; Relationship between the Testaments

Bibliography

Auerbach, E. “Figura.” Pages 11–76 in Scenes from the Drama of European Literature. Meridian, 1959; Baker, D. L. Two Testaments, One Bible. Rev. ed. InterVarsity, 1991; Beale, G. K., ed. The Right Doctrine from the Wrong Texts? Baker, 1994; Davidson, R. Typology in Scripture. Andrews University Press, 1981; Dawson, J. D. Christian Figural Reading and the Fashioning of Identity. University of California Press, 2002; Ellis, E. E. The Old Testament in Early Christianity. Baker, 1991; Fowl, S. Engaging Scripture. Blackwell, 1998; France, R. T. Jesus and the Old Testament. Tyndale Press, 1971; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; Glenny, W. E. “Typology: A Summary of the Present Evangelical Discussion.” JETS 40, no. 4 (December 1997): 627–38; Goppelt, L. Typos, trans. D. Madvig. Eerdmans, 1982; Hanson, R. P. C. Allegory and Event. Westminster John Knox, 2002; Hays, R. Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul. Yale University Press, 1989; Johnson, S. L., Jr. The Old Testament in the New. Zondervan, 1980; Kaiser, W., Jr. The Uses of the Old Testament in the New. Moody, 1985; Lampe, G. W. H., and K. J. Woolcombe. Essays on Typology. SBT 22. A. R. Allenson, 1957; Lindbeck, G. “Postcritical Canonical Interpretation: Three Forms of Retrieval.” Pages 26–51 in Theological Exegesis, ed. C. Seitz and K. Greene-McCreight. Eerdmans, 1999; Longenecker, R. Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period. Rev. ed. Eerdmans, 1999; Moo, D. “The Problem of Sensus Plenior.” Pages 179–211 in Hermeneutics, Authority, and Canon, ed. D. A. Carson and J. Woodbridge. 2d ed. Baker, 1995; Ostmeier, K.-H. “Typologie und Typos: Analyse eines schwierigen Verhältnisses.” NTS 46 (2000): 112–31; Radner, E. The End of the Church. Eerdmans, 1998; Seitz, C. Figured Out. Westminster John Knox, 2001; Treier, D. “The Superiority of Pre-Critical Exegesis? Sic et Non.” TJ 24 NS (2003): 77–103; Whitman, J., ed. Interpretation and Allegory. Brill’s Studies in Intellectual History 101. Brill, 2000; Young, F. Biblical Exegesis and the Formation of Christian Culture. Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Daniel J. Treier

U

(p 828)

Ugarit and the Bible      See Ancient Near Eastern Background Studies

Underdetermined Meaning      See Meaning; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

Understanding      See Hermeneutical Circle; Hermeneutics; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

Unity See Church, Doctrine of the; Culture and Hermeneutics; Dialogism; Scripture, Unity of

Use of the OT in the NT See Intertextuality; Jewish Exegesis; Relationship between the Testaments; Scripture, Unity of; Typology

Utterance Meaning

At the very heart of modern debates about the meaning of texts, including biblical texts, is a threefold question: How are the words of such writings expected to relate to “reality” out there? How can we perceive what they say? And how, if at all, is what they say “meaningful” (= “significant”) to us? Here we deal only with the first two questions.

Introduction

The choice of the title “utterance meaning” requires some clarification. In linguistics and semantics it signals the sharp and useful difference between contextless sentences, and real, situationally embedded ones (Cotterell and Turner, chs. 1–3). A contextless sentence such as “Beautiful Virginia is in an awful mess!”—written on a blackboard merely as an example of English usage—tells us nothing about anything in the real world, because it refers to nothing in particular, nor anything in general. The same sentence could be used on countless different specific occasions with utterly different meanings. Spoken by a heckling politician, it may say “The State of Virginia is in serious financial danger; vote for me, instead!” Spoken in a different situation, it may say: “The yacht, Beautiful Virginia, is greatly storm-damaged (or its crew ‘close to mutiny,’ or ‘the boat is unforgivably untidy’),” and so forth. But when Mr. Black utters the same words to his wife, about the mistreatment of their beloved daughter, then the despairing conversation’s context in which he makes the statement (including, perhaps, the sad tone in which he says it, and the sorrowful shaking of his head as he does so) unambiguously clarifies that he thereby expresses a lament over the emotional turmoil of dear Virginia. And that is thereby conventionally established as “the determinate meaning” of what he has said.

An “utterance” is a particular, and contextually defined, communicative use of language, of whatever length (from the briefest exclamation to a book-long speech, or more), and whether written or spoken. Romans thus contains many utterances by Paul; but at a different level, the whole letter might be analyzed as a single utterance to the churches in Rome, introducing his gospel, and advocating related behavioral outcomes. To call Romans Paul’s “utterance,” then, is to make the significant claim that (unlike contextless sentences) this text had (at least at one stage) determinate meaning: the meaning that the apostle intended and can have reasonably expected to be conveyed by what he wrote to his first-century readers, given their shared presuppositions and conventions of language use. In short, the “utterance meaning” of Romans, understood as a speech event between the apostle and the congregations to which he wrote, is (by definition) neither more nor less than Paul’s meaning.

At another quite different level, confessing Christians may also wish to insist that in appropriating Paul’s Letters and giving them to the church as part of the canon, God has in some analogous way performed a new (and different) “utterance” of the text of Romans (and of everything else in Scripture). The difference between the original authorial utterance meaning and God’s might be seen as sharpest in, say, the imprecatory psalms; perhaps least in the apostles’ letters (once due allowance is made for the fact that God speaks only indirectly, through an authorized representative). (p 829) But such discussion would take us beyond the confines of this article (for different perspectives see, e.g., the essays by Fowl, Turner, and Wall in Green and Turner; also Wolterstorff; Vanhoozer; Ward).

In what follows, this article examines first the components that make up utterance meaning at sentence level; only subsequently will we turn to the higher levels of paragraph and above. It is surprisingly difficult to find agreement between linguistic experts on what a sentence is, but one criterion is that sentences should be grammatically complete (except for ellipsis) and independent. They may be simple and short (e.g., “Jesus wept,” John 11:35) or compound (coordinated) and/or complex (subordinated). Ephesians 1:3–14 is analyzed by the ESV translators as consisting of five sentences, and by GNT as no fewer than fifteen sentences. But in the Greek original, it is just one sentence: a striking cascade of coordinations and subordinations. In understanding the utterance meaning of even relatively simple sentences, a variety of factors interplay: both formal (lexical, grammatical, structural) and occasional (cotext, context).

Formal Factors in Sentence Meaning

Lexical. Sense is fundamentally communicated by stringing words together in linguistically competent ways. Precision of sense, however, is quite substantially afforded by lexical choice between partially synonymous terms. There are many verbs an author might use to say that “Stephen (of Acts 7) was ‘killed.’ ” Among them are put to death, stoned, lynched, executed, slaughtered, martyred, sacrificed, and so on. Choice of wording to fill the sentence-slot, here represented by the connotationally neutral verb “killed,” helps map the hearer/reader onto the speaker’s much more specific intended sense or spin about the death in question. So it is always important to understand the subtle network of closely related words available to biblical speakers in their particular language-system. It is then not entirely surprising that much scholarly energy has been put into “word studies,” though unfortunately many of these have been seriously flawed in method (see Barr; Cotterell and Turner, chs. 4–5).

The most common errors are (1) the assumption that word meaning is transparent from its formation (often partly true, e.g., for “blackbird”; but not for “ladybird,” “butterfly,” etc.; and what climber confuses a “hangover” with an “overhang,” despite the similarity of their formation?); (2) the assumption that a word’s “original meaning” is necessarily significant for its later usage (the fact is that, with time, words usually develop a plurality of new senses, and these are not necessarily closely related to original meaning, or to each other; cf. the seventy-or-so quite different senses of the English word “run” or, e.g., the misleading analysis of ekklēsia to mean that the church is the people “called out” of the world by God); (3) the confusion of word senses with “concepts”: John may have a clear “concept” of authentic love as selfless and Christlike, but we must not confuse that with the sense of the Greek noun agapē (“love”) or its corresponding verb (agapaō). When John says, “People loved darkness, rather than light” (John 3:19), he means quite the opposite of “selfless, Christlike love” (cf. also 12:43; 1 John 2:15; etc.).

Grammatical. The main verb lies at the heart of the sentence’s meaning. As in English, so also in Hebrew and Greek, the way the “verb” word is written can be coded for mood (indicative, imperative, or infinitive, etc.), voice (active or passive [but in Greek also “middle”]), tense (various forms of present, future, and past), aspect (how the writer presents the events: as complete or continuing, etc.), and person (I/she/they/you). The question of whether, say, “aorist” forms of the verb represent “tense” (expressing the event[s] as past-present-future) or “aspect” (viewing events either “completed” [aorist] or “in progress” [as in present and imperfect forms], or “with immediate consequences” [as in perfect and pluperfect forms]) is a major debate (see Porter, Aspect). The vast majority of sentences in all texts and many languages, however, involve the complexity of relating main to subordinate clauses.

Word Order. Since Hebrew and Greek are inflected languages, word order is less important for their sentences than for English. If one were to change the order of the words “One of the officers struck Jesus on the face” (cf. John 18:22) to “Jesus struck one of the officers on the face,” the result would be a completely different assertion. In Greek, however, the fact that the officer is the grammatical subject and Jesus is the object is marked by case endings, which we could represent as “Struck [verb] the officer [subject] Jesus [object].” These words could be placed in any order (such as this “unmarked” one [in the previous sentence]) without confusion concerning what happened. That said, we should not conclude that the order is arbitrary. Greek sentences place the most semantically prominent element first (usually the verb), and leave the least semantically marked to the end. The typical, (p 830)so neutral, word order would be Verb-Subject-Object and so on (as above). So the word order in the Greek of John 11:35, “Wept[-he] Jesus,” is neutral. If John had written the Greek words in the order “Jesus wept[-he],” that would make “Jesus” semantically prominent in ways that would raise questions in the mind of the hearer. Does it signal a change of topic or a contrast (as if the narrative had been saying, “The others were enjoying their meal, but what was Jesus doing? He was weeping”), or what? In Luke 13:16, most translations follow the Greek word order. But in English, leaving the words “on the Sabbath day” to the end of the sentence could mark emphasis: “especially on the Sabbath day” (i.e., the Sabbath is a particularly appropriate day for this poor woman to be released from Satan’s bondage). In Greek, however, to make that point the sentence would need to be written in an order more like “On the sabbath ... ought not be loosed ... this woman ...?”

Semantic Structure. Most real sentence utterances have relatively complex meaning relations between the parts (clauses, complement, prepositional phrases, etc.). In narrative, the relations are normally temporal and/or explicative, and so relatively transparent. In an argumentative letter, such as Romans, however, the “logic” may become quite dense. In such cases we map sentence “meaning” by trying to express the relationship of the subordinate clauses to the main verb. So Rom. 5:1–2 has a main clause: “We have peace with God,” with a satellite of dependent clauses, expressing “reason” (“since we are justified by faith”: 5:1 NRSV) and qualification (“through our Lord Jesus,” in turn qualified by “through whom we have ... access to this grace” [NRSV]). The analysis of the semantic structure of the sentence, where complex, is, to a comparative degree, subjective. For example, Eph. 3:14–19 might be analyzed (as it is by Hoehner’s massive commentary) as a prayer that believers may be strengthened in their inner being in order that Christ may dwell in their hearts, so that (as a result) they may be able to comprehend the dimensions of God’s love, so that (as a further consequence) they be filled with the fullness of God. Alternatively, we can (preferably?) read the prayer as expressing mutually explanatory/complementary outcomes: that the readers may be innerly strengthened, that is, that Christ may dwell in them, that is, that they may comprehend the dimensions of God’s love, that is, that they may be filled with the fullness of God. The kind of propositional and semantic analysis involved here is most conveniently elucidated in Cotterell and Turner (ch. 6).

“Occasional” or Situational Factors in Sentence Meaning.

Formal factors, such as discussed above, always contribute to the meaning of a sentence, but other factors may be just as important. If, in a particular situation, I say to my son, “Oh, I do like the look of your back!” he will correctly decode it not as a true assertion but as an ironical way of requesting that he move so that he does not block my view of the television. This request could hardly be deduced from the linguistic form. Irony is a relatively extreme example of how sentence meaning and utterance meaning may differ, and of how much of the latter depends on contextual factors. The utterance meaning of a sentence depends on a variety of cotextual (= surrounding “text”), contextual (= situational aspects), and “cooperative discourse-conventional” factors. Grice has summarized these last as: You are expected to speak as briefly, clearly, truthfully, and relevantly as possible (see Cotterell and Turner 259–66). When you flout any of these maxims, you are making a point. My son detects the true utterance meaning of my sentence because he knows (1) I do not normally make such an uninvited interjection while watching TV (flouting Grice’s criterion of relevance), and (2) I do not particularly admire his back, far less the sweaty T-shirt he is wearing (additionally flouting Grice’s criterion of truth). So he knows I must mean something else. And the context provides the meaning: he has just stood in front of me and his back obscures my view.

The most significant contribution to the utterance meaning of a sentence, or of any discourse, however long, is made by what is called its (shared) “presupposition pools”: the information, conventions, views, or understandings that the writer/speaker feels no need specifically to state, because one can assume they are common assumption. Arguably, most of our normal discourse rests on unstated information (see Cotterell and Turner 90–97; Green and Turner 47–52). For example, Mark’s brief sentence “And they crucified him” (15:24) does not need him to explain to his readers that it means they executed Jesus in the most public and degrading way possible. They nailed him naked to a cross-tree, a way usually reserved for the lowest form of political enemy. Mark can assume that everyone in the Roman Empire is aware of that form of execution (see further below).

(p 831) Utterance Meaning at the Level of the Paragraph/Pericope

The basic semantic unit in all our communication is the paragraph, rather than the sentence. What makes a paragraph is semantic cohesion and appropriate “closure.” A paragraph “talks” about a “concept” (an event or a topic) and closes in a way that says to the reader, “move on!” This sort of change is probably most obvious in the Gospels. For example, Luke 4:14–30 is a programmatic passage about Jesus’ teaching in Nazareth. The opening (4:14–15) has Jesus return to Galilee from his trial in the wilderness. The incident itself epitomizes his central teaching (4:18–19, 21). It closes with “he went ... on his way.” So the reader naturally switches to a new expectation. In the NT letters paragraphing is not quite so easy to detect. But, for example, Phil. 2:5–11 seems to be a semantically distinct portion that some regard as a pre-Pauline hymn, precisely because it seems not quite to fit the context, but to be a digression from it. In Galatians, the text of 1:18–24 is marked off, as a paragraph, by the initial “then” of 1:18 and the new beginning “then” of 2:1 (NRSV). But other paragraphs are marked by their relatively sharp change from the previous unit (e.g., “I am astonished ...” in Gal. 1:6; etc.). Within the paragraph, meaning is essentially provided by linguistic markers indicating sense relationships between the various “propositions” advanced, in the same way as it is within a sentence (for how this is analyzed, see Cotterell and Turner, ch. 6).

Utterance Meaning and Cotext

In linguistics, the term “cotext” has a usefully specialized sense. It means the total verbal “text” immediately and uniquely around the unit under consideration. Such cotext may help us understand the text in question, where its meaning is problematical. For example, some scholars take Luke 4:17–21 to mean the Spirit on Jesus is purely the “Spirit of prophecy,” and has nothing to do with healing or other works of power. Others would point out the “cotextual” evidence of such passages as Luke 7:21–23 and Acts 10:38 to suggest that Luke intentionally attributes Jesus’ healing miracles to the Spirit. In the case of Rom. 7:7–25, the cotext (7:4–6 and 8:1–4) strongly suggests this element is a parenthesis in Paul’s argument. A cotext establishes its own “world” and expects you to read its text within the worldview that it presents: real or imaginary.

Utterance Meaning and Context

“Context,” as opposed to “cotext,” refers to the outside world—the real one out there (or at least as we perceive it)! So while the cotext of Rev. 3:14–22 is about other churches in the area west of Turkey, the “context” is more specific. The town of Laodicea was between Hierapolis, which has hot cleaning and healing waters, and Colossae, which has cold refreshing streams. The water supply to the then newly industrialized Laodicea was piped in from several miles away. As a result it was like lukewarm sludge: it clogged the pipes, and was just fit to be spewed out. So Rev. 3:14–22, in its real context, unfavorably compares the church supply of that city with the healing warm waters and the refreshing cool ones of neighboring towns. The point is that the Laodicean church neither refreshes nor heals. The church would undoubtedly have hoped the risen Lord would compare it with the city’s rich banking facilities or its famous eye salves. Instead, with deep irony, the Lord says they need to come to him for gold and eye salve, and he compares their works not with any of the city’s strengths but with its most prominent weakness: its notorious water supply!

There is a fundamental difference between the variety of meanings any particular sentence “may” have, and what the same sentence definitely and concretely does actually mean when uttered by a particular person in a specified context.

Utterance Meaning and Argument

Theology has often been dominated by what is called the “argument” of an author. But it must be noted that most biblical books are not “argument(s)” in any formal sense. The large proportion is actually narrative, or “story,” depicting the “world” within which we live, and thereby implicitly or explicitly providing strong indications of how we should live within it. When scholars talk about the “argument” of Gen. 1–3, they are actually using that word as a very specialized and potentially misleading metaphor. They mean that the “story” narrated in those chapters is deliberately constructed so as (polemically) to contrast with the competing global stories of Near Eastern mythologies. When we are dealing with the narrational “histories” (including the Gospels and Acts), it is better to elucidate the utterance meaning in terms of “development of themes/characters,” than to speak of the “argument” of such works. The Psalms, Wisdom literature, the prophetic books, and the Apocalypse all contain arguments, but we need to analyze them with (p 832)the tools of “Discourse Analysis” (see below), not as “argument.” For example, anyone who tried to state the “argument” of Job by appeal to the many arguments of his “comforters” would find oneself utterly unwound in the last chapter, where God essentially says they were wrong. Similarly, the Psalms contain arguments but are not themselves arguments: indeed, their utterance meaning is perhaps deliberately left open so that users may take them over to express their own circumstances, feelings, and worship.

The writings that come formally closest to real argument are Romans and Galatians, and it is probably the historical centrality of these, in the thinking of the church, that has led scholars to speak of them and of other epistolary writings as “arguments.” But we need to note that most Pauline letters are not primarily argument: for example, Philippians, 1–2 Thessalonians, and 1–2 Corinthians are simply multitheme friendship letters (see esp. Reed); Philemon is a typical “request letter”; Ephesians is a celebratory exhortation. Even such a “logical” letter as Paul’s to the church in Rome is essentially not a brick-on-brick argument—not even in 1:17–3:31, where the apostle is rhetorically most tight (see Moores). Rather, Paul normally works more “as an artist, who covers the whole canvas quickly with very broad strokes and then returns to fill in the details” (Seifrid 107). The whole of the letter could be seen as a recurrent exploration of the themes adumbrated in 1:1–6, and, at a different level, chapters 9–11 may be analyzed as a more specific discussion of the apostle’s claims made in 3:1–8, and so on.

What is nevertheless perhaps fundamentally helpful about speaking of the “argument” and of its contribution to the understanding of “utterance meaning” is that it suggests a situationally conditioned, deep and very deliberate coherence between the various parts of the discourse. The parts may together constitute an internally coherent “message,” even if not precisely an “argument.”

Discourse Analysis and Utterance Meaning

Discourse analysis is a branch of the more general discipline of semantic linguistics, methodologically devoted to elucidating how spoken or written “texts” (whether “one-liners” or whole books) signify “meaning” to readers/hearers (see Cotterell and Turner; Hurford and Heasley; Brown and Yule; Halliday and Hasan; Reed; et al.). Surprisingly, it is largely ignored by biblical scholars, for whom the discipline should (arguably) be central. There are essentially two main (and entirely complementary) divisions in academic discourse analysis. One, “text-linguistics,” examines texts in terms of the strictly internal markers of textual meaning indicated in the actual wording: the explicit or implicit verbal indications of argument, indications of “cohesion,” of development of themes, of carefully parallel structuring, of deixis (indications like “here,” “those people”), or whatever (see Porter and Carson; Porter and Reed). The other, “pragmatics,” deals more with how utterances are (expected to be) understood to function in the world in which they are spoken/written, including the hermeneutically quite important theoretical area of speech-act theory (on which, see the related article, and Alston). From the perspective of text-linguistics, the quite complex sentence of Eph. 1:3–14 (Greek) can fairly objectively be divided into a cascading pattern of shorter and dependent strophes, each with similar structure marked by (e.g.) a main participle, qualifying “according to” clauses, the repetition of some variant of “to the praise of his glorious grace,” and so on. From the perspective of pragmatics, however, Eph. 1:3–14 is not merely a “statement” of Paul’s own blessing of God, but functionally also counts as a deliberate “invocation” corporately to share in the same eulogy, when Paul’s letter is publicly read in and to the congregation. That is its contextual utterance meaning, and, more important, that is (arguably) the utterance meaning of the same passage in its canonical context, which thus addresses us today.

See also Concept; Etymology; Language, Grammar and Syntax; Language, Linguistics

Bibliography

Alston, W. Illocutionary Acts and Sentence Meaning. Cornell University Press, 2000; Barr, J. The Semantics of Biblical Language. Oxford University Press, 1961; Brown, G., and G. Yule. Discourse Analysis. Cambridge University Press, 1983; Cotterell, P., and M. Turner. Linguistics and Biblical Interpretation. InterVarsity, 1989; Green, J., and M. Turner, eds. Between Two Horizons. Eerdmans, 2000; Halliday, M. A. K., and R. Hasan. Language, Context and Text. Oxford University Press, 1989; Hoehner, H. Ephesians. Baker, 2002; Hurford, J., and B. Heasley. Semantics. Cambridge University Press, 1983; Moores, J. Wrestling with Rationality in Paul. SNTSMS. Cambridge University Press, 1995; Porter, S. Ch. 20 in Idioms of the Greek New Testament. Sheffield Academic Press, 1992; idem. Verbal Aspect in the Greek New Testament. Lang, 1989; Porter, S., and D. A. Carson, eds. Discourse Analysis and Other Topics in Biblical Greek. JSNTS (p 833)170. Sheffield Academic Press, 1995; Porter, S., and J. Reed, eds. Discourse Analysis and the New Testament. JSNTS 170. Sheffield Academic Press, 1999; Reed, J. A Discourse Analysis of Philippians. JSNTS 136. Sheffield Academic Press, 1997; Seifrid, M. "Unrighteous by Faith: Apostolic Proclamation in Romans 1:18–3:20." Pages 105–45 in Justification and Variegated Nomism, ed. D. A. Carson, P. O'Brien, and M. Seifrid. Mohr/Siebeck, 2004; Vanhoozer, K. Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998; Ward, T. Word and Supplement. Oxford University Press, 2002; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Max Turner

V

(p 834)

Validity      See Exegesis; Hermeneutics; Logic; Meaning; Proof Text

Vanhoozer, Kevin See Speech-Act Theory; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

Violence

Violence as a Theological Issue

Disagreement over the justifiability of violence often goes back to different ways of defining or describing violence. Violence is perhaps best defined as “an act which causes injury to the life, property, or person of a human being” (Burt 162). As such, violence can be divine or human, physical or nonphysical, personal or institutional, incidental or structural. By this definition—one commonly used or at least assumed—an ethical stance of absolute nonviolence would require the renunciation of all right to cause any kind of injury to human beings. Such a position would imply the rejection of all punishment and of all coercion or force, ranging from military intervention to economic blockades, punishments, and enforcing speed limits (since these all injure people in some fashion, either physically or nonphysically). Therefore, we have two options: If we wish to legitimize any of these kinds of activities ethically, we must insist that some violence can be justified. If we are unwilling to do that, we are forced to employ a different definition of violence (for example, one that defines it as causing excessive injury or as unjustifiable injury). In either case, we recognize that it can sometimes be morally justified to cause some kind of injury. Using the common definition given above, the conclusion must be that most people recognize that violence can sometimes be morally justified.

Many Christians, of course, do not recognize the right to violence and so tend to define it (whether consciously or subconsciously) by qualifying the kind of injury that a particular activity causes. Although philosophical and theological issues surrounding violence have resurfaced with particular intensity over the last few decades, theological reflection on and objections to violence go back to the early church. The second-century heretic, Marcion, is well known for his rejection of divine violence. To protect God’s moral integrity, he sharply distinguished between the violent creator God of the OT and the peaceful God of the NT. Some of the early church’s allegorizing hermeneutics (particularly in Clement and Origen) tied in with their fears of attributing violence to God. Several of the church fathers rejected the idea that God used violence in order to accomplish human redemption (Irenaeus; Epistle to Diognetus; Gregory of Nyssa). Many in the early church rejected the use of the sword, at least in a literal sense, and in the sixteenth century, the Radical Reformation continued this tradition of disavowing military violence.

Several contemporary developments have resulted in renewed awareness of the pervasive character of the issue of violence and of its problematic nature. First, hermeneutical theory has emphasized the ubiquity of violence. Friedrich Nietzsche’s insistence that the “will to power” is the ultimate human drive, followed by Martin Heidegger’s position that interpretation is always violent, have left deep traces in recent postmodern philosophy. One of the most influential scholars in this regard is Emmanuel Lévinas, who has seriously critiqued the Western metaphysical tradition for its preoccupation with issues of being (ontology) instead of ethics. Lévinas argues that such imposition of rational categories on the external world implies a penchant for totality rather than infinity: in a totalizing fashion we have tended to interpret the world in ways that conform to our own standards, thereby doing violence to the integrity of others. Lévinas demands that we cease such attempts to reshape the world in our own image, and that instead we take our starting point in the infinity or absolute transcendence of the other. In this way, we would learn to respect their alterity and come to a renewed appreciation of hospitality: “The other facing me makes me responsible for him/her, and this responsibility has no limits” (Lévinas, Totality, 194). Of course, (p 835) such radical or boundary-less hospitality implies that others may, in turn, violate my personal integrity. Such interruption, Lévinas is forced to acknowledge, is a form of “good violence” that stems from my absolute obligation toward the other (Lévinas, Otherwise, 43).

Jacques Derrida’s understanding of deconstruction draws on Lévinas. In reaction against the history of the religious violence of the determinate messianic religions, Derrida wants to avoid violence by means of the demand for absolute or unconditional hospitality. At the same time, however, he is aware that this indeterminate messianic future remains unrealizable (always still to come, à venir; Boersma, “Irenaeus”). Derrida’s view that violence and narcissism are embedded in the very nature of things leaves little room for a possible future of peace (Smith) and has popularized the notion that we live in a “tragically violent” universe.

Second, minority voices have drawn attention to the violence and oppression that have been used to subdue them. In particular, the heritage of the West (e.g., in crusades, colonization, globalization) and of the church (e.g., regarding women, homosexuals, heretics) is often criticized for complicity in violence (e.g., Cone; Ray; Snyder; Weaver). Third, something of a theological consensus appears to be building that the use of military force is never a good way to solve our problems. Not only traditional Anabaptists but also the Roman Catholic Church and mainline denominations have spoken out forcefully in recent decades against the use of all military force (except, perhaps, for humanitarian reasons).

Theological Approaches to Violence

Among some of the most influential theological approaches to violence are the following:

Jesus as Example of Nonviolence. The tradition of nonviolence, most ably represented by John Howard Yoder and Stanley Hauerwas, regards Jesus as the ultimate revelation of God and as such the peaceful social and political model for us to imitate. Some, closely allying themselves with this tradition, would nonetheless insist that while God does indeed engage in violence, this does not necessarily make it right for human beings to do so; and that while it may not always be possible to avoid violence, when we do engage in it, we should not seek a religious legitimation for it (Volf 301–6). The strength of these approaches is that they take seriously God’s revelation in Jesus Christ and refuse to limit his significance to matters of personal salvation. Moreover, by taking the “politics of Jesus” as the ethical starting point, this tradition has tended to generate creative peace-building activities. Some of the problems with this approach, however, are the sharp disjunction that sometimes results between the OT and the NT. This may produce a one-sided picture of Jesus as nonviolent (cf., e.g., Mark 11:15; Matt. 8:12; 11:24; Luke 7:36–50; 11:37–52) and a tendency to oppose the Christian faith to politics and cultural involvement.

The Cross as Unmasking the Scapegoat Mechanism. René Girard’s theory of mimetic desire has become quite influential in the last few decades. Girard argues that a scapegoat mechanism lies at the origin of all human culture: by imitating other people’s desires, we end up in a mimetic spiral of confrontation that can only be broken when we substitute an innocent scapegoat and direct our violence against this scapegoat. Subsequent to the murder of the victim, we maintain the peace through ritualistic sacrifices, mythological accounts, and religious taboos. Girard sees Christ as the ultimate scapegoat, whose nonresistance and resurrection expose the violence of the scapegoat mechanism. Despite his genius and popularity, I believe Girard errs by rejecting (or, perhaps, radically reinterpreting) all traditional atonement models, by placing violence rather than peace at the origin of human culture (cf. Milbank, Theology, 395–96), and by insisting on absolute nonviolence as a distinct Christian possibility.

Participation in Divine Peace. John Milbank, as the most prominent spokesman for Radical Orthodoxy, believes that the violent nihilism of modern and postmodern accounts of reality stems from theological deviations in the thirteenth century. Starting with Duns Scotus, theologians began to separate nature and grace, and to grant a degree of autonomy to the former. The result was the loss of a participatory vision in which all of nature and all of humanity shared in the abundance of God's peace. Like Yoder and Hauerwas, Milbank regards Jesus' way of life as one founded on "non-rivalry, non-retaliation and mutual sharing" (Milbank, Word, 312), and he insists that the church is to continue Jesus' life of forgiveness. Milbank argues that his participatory vision is built on an "ontology of peace." Despite his apprehension about coercive power, however, Milbank realizes the need for at least some coercion for pedagogical reasons. But he always regards such use of violence as tragic. Milbank's theological opposition to modern and postmodern accounts of reality is eminently insightful. At the same time, his ambiguity on the (p 836)justifiability of violence remains unfortunate and ultimately does not answer questions regarding the relationship between violence and peace.

Opposing Authorial Intent. Phyllis Tribble, in dealing with what she terms "texts of terror," and Chris Heard, in his account of divine violence in Habakkuk, both insist that at times we need to read against the intentions of the narrator and the plot of Scripture. These postmodern readings of the text end up insisting that we need to see ethical obligations toward those whom the text has forced outside the margins. While such deconstructive approaches allow us to have a compassionate eye for the weak and marginalized in society, this comes at the cost of a loss of normative standards by which we determine which cause to take up and which one to reject. If Scripture loses its normative status in judging human violence, we are left with our own desire or will to power, which hardly represents a higher moral standard.

Augustinian Just-War Theory. The traditional Augustinian understanding insists that there are certain circumstances under which it is just to go to war (jus ad bellum), and certain criteria that determine whether a war is fought justly (jus in bello). The former criteria are those of a just cause, the right authority, the right intention, proportionality of ends, and last resort; the latter are those of the proportionality of means and the noncombatant protection/immunity (Johnson). Despite the fact that much of today's theological consensus seems to oppose the Augustinian view, and despite the difficulties in determining whether a particular act of violence fulfills the criteria, the Augustinian view rightly insists that violence should not be universally condemned, and that it can be redemptive in character. As we see below, the theology of Scripture appears to operate on the principle that under certain circumstances divine (as well as human) violence is justified.

Divine Violence: Election and Atonement

Biblically, the pervasive character of divine violence seems hard to avoid. Several scholars have recently pointed out that both the OT and the NT present God, at least some of the time, as a violent God (Boyd; Longman and Reid). This is not to say that, according to Scripture, God is a God of wrath in the same way that he is a God of love. Rather, it seems that according to the Bible, God expresses wrath precisely because he is passionately committed to the redemption of the world (Peels 293). Divine violence, in other words, accompanies divine redemption.

This is evident particularly in the two areas where divine violence appears most problematic: predestination and atonement theology. In Reformed theology, predestination has traditionally been interpreted as God's dual decree from eternity to save some people for eternal life (election) and to condemn others to eternal death (reprobation). Calvinism has often been criticized for the arbitrary divine violence that this framework appears to entail. Many scholars today would argue that election is better interpreted as a historical act of God to choose his people Israel for the sake of the world, and that we today are included in this election when we are in Christ as the representative of Israel (Wright). The latter interpretation regards election as a historical and corporate act of God. It does not, however, obviate all violence: the destruction of the nations around Israel is still the result of God's election of Israel. For example, the classic election passage of Deut. 7:6–8 is preceded by a passage insisting on the destruction of the nations around Israel by means of a ban (kherem) (7:2–5), leading several scholars to reject the violence of the Bible's election theology (e.g., Schwartz). Yet it seems impossible to remove all divine violence from election theology. Likewise, in atonement theology, each of the three traditional models regard God as involved in the death of Christ. In the classic or Christus Victor model, God is seen as either making a deal with the devil (paying him a ransom for the freedom of human beings), as deceiving him (tricking the devil into thinking that Jesus was merely human), or as actually fighting the principalities and powers. In the penal substitutionary model, God punishes his Son for the sins of the world. And in the moral influence model, God sacrifices his Son to evoke a human response of love. As a result, contemporary attempts to present nonviolent models of the atonement can only be successful by abandoning each of the traditional models (e.g., Weaver).

We can legitimately use several strategies to alleviate the difficulties. As noted above, it is not possible to avoid making decisions about the use of violence (causing injury) in concrete situations. In other words, we would be hard pressed to argue that all use of divine violence is necessarily wrong. Scripture itself gives indications of some of the criteria justifying the violence accompanying divine election in the OT: (1) Election is meant to safeguard the practice of monotheism as expressed in the Shema of Deut. 6:4–6 (cf. 7:3–4; (p 837)20:16–18). (2) The ban of destruction is meant to punish the nations for their immorality (Gen. 15:16; Deut. 9:5). (3) God’s election seems to favor Israel because of her marginalized status (Deut. 7:7; 8:17–18; 9:6). (4) God’s harsh treatment of the nations is not restricted to them; he can apply the same to his own people if need be (Lev. 18:24–28; Deut. 31:16–18). (5) And perhaps most significantly, God’s election of Israel was missiological in character in that it was ultimately intended for the salvific benefit also of the nations (Gen. 12:3). None of these five considerations gives a comprehensively adequate justification of the violence of “reprobation” that accompanies God’s election of his people. They do, however, give some insight into the mystery of God’s love, by which he also judges it just to engage in violence.

Much the same appears to be the case with God’s involvement in the cross. The traditional atonement models quite rightly emphasize God’s involvement not just in the life but also in the death of Jesus (Acts 2:23; 4:27–28). We must recall that the question is not How can any divine violence (any causing of injury) be justified? but How can this particular act of divine violence (this particular injury) be justified? The early church father Irenaeus interpreted Christ’s work of redemption in terms of recapitulation, meaning that Christ represented, faithfully retraced, and so healed the sinful and broken existence of human life (Boersma, “Redemptive”). N. T. Wright, using a similar imagery, reads Christ’s work of redemption in terms of reconstitution, meaning that Christ is the one who in representative fashion retraces the life, death, and resurrection of the nation Israel. Although punishment is part of this picture (with Christ on the cross suffering the exilic curse of the law), it is punishment as a last resort (not each of Israel’s transgressions leads to exile or to the cross). And it is punishment for the sake of restoration, healing, or shalom (restorative justice; Marshall 69). In short, we need to bracket our moral reservations regarding particular divine acts of violence because of our inability to comprehend God’s right intention and the proportionality of ends, or put differently, because we cannot fully grasp the glory of the resurrection life (cf. Rom. 11:33). God’s right to violence is not ours but is his to judge. Whether or not particular human acts of violence are justifiable depends on how they fit the Augustinian criteria.

The inevitably difficult questions, particularly surrounding the right intention and the proportionality of ends, can only be tentatively answered today; the ultimate justification of human violence can only be found in the resurrection. It is ultimately the resurrection glory that determines whether this or that particular act of violence has truly been redemptive and therefore justifiable.

See also Atonement

Bibliography

Boersma, H. "Irenaeus, Derrida and Hospitality: On the Eschatological Overcoming of Violence." Modern Theology 19 (2003): 163–80; idem. "Redemptive Hospitality in Irenaeus: A Model for Ecumenicity in a Violent World." ProEccl 11 (2002): 207–26; Boyd, G. God at War. InterVarsity, 1997; Burt, D. Friendship and Society. Eerdmans, 1999; Cone, J. God of the Oppressed. Rev. ed. Orbis, 1997; Derrida, J. Of Hospitality, trans. R. Bowlby. Stanford University Press, 2000; Girard, R. The Girard Reader, ed. J. Williams. Crossroad, 1996; Hauerwas, S. The Hauerwas Reader, ed. J. Berkman and M. Cartwright. Duke University Press, 2001; Heard, C. "Hearing the Children's Cries: Commentary, Deconstruction, Ethics, and the Book of Habakkuk." Semeia 77 (1997): 75–89; Johnson, J. T. Morality and Contemporary Warfare. Yale University Press, 1999; Lévinas, E. Otherwise than Being, trans. A. Lingis. Duquesne University Press, 1998; idem. Totality and Infinity, trans. A. Lingis. Duquesne University Press, 1969; Longman, T., and D. Reid. God Is a Warrior. Zondervan, 1995; Marshall, C. Beyond Retribution. Eerdmans/Lime Grove House, 2001; Milbank, J. Theology and Social Theory. Blackwell, 1993; idem. The Word Made Strange. Blackwell, 1997; Peels, H. G. L. The Vengeance of God, trans. W. Koopmans. Brill, 1995; Ray, D. K. Deceiving the Devil. Pilgrim, 1998; Schwartz, R. The Curse of Cain. University of Chicago Press, 1997; Smith, J. K. A. The Fall of Interpretation. InterVarsity, 2000; Snyder, T. R. The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Punishment. Eerdmans, 2001; Tribble, P. Texts of Terror. Fortress, 1984; Volf, M. Exclusion and Embrace. Abingdon, 1996; Weaver, J. D. The Nonviolent Atonement. Eerdmans, 2001; Wright, N. T. Jesus and the Victory of God. Vol. 2 of Christian Origins and the Question of God. Fortress, 1996; Yoder, J. H. The Politics of Jesus. 2d ed. Eerdmans/Paternoster, 1994.

Hans Boersma

Virgin Birth See Infancy Narratives

Virtue

There seem to be two basic ways of thinking about the relationship between virtue and theological interpretation of Scripture. The first has to do with the ways in which theological interpretation aids in the cultivation of virtue. The second has to do with the ways in which (p 838) virtue aids in the practice of theological interpretation. I will call the former virtue-through-interpretation and the latter virtue-in-interpretation.

Before discussing each of these, however, it will be important to say a few words about the ways in which virtue might be understood.

In fact, most of the scholarly literature in this area usually speaks of the virtues rather than virtue in the singular (MacIntyre; Hauerwas and Pinches). One might say that the person of virtue is someone who successfully displays the virtues over the course of his or her life. The virtues can be thought of, then, as those habits of seeing, feeling, thinking, and acting that, when exercised in the right ways and at the right times, will enhance one's prospects of both recognizing, moving toward, and attaining one's proper end. Thus, all questions of virtue and the virtues depend on prior answers to questions about the proper end of human life. Diverse and conflicting accounts of the proper end of human life will generate diverse and conflicting accounts of the virtues.

Virtue through Interpretation

The role of virtue in the theological interpretation of Scripture must be closely tied to the ends and purposes for which Christians are called to read Scripture (Fowl). Those ends and purposes are themselves tied to the ultimate end of the Christian life. When it comes to articulating a concise statement of the end of life in Christ, the Westminster Confession speaks in terms of glorifying God and enjoying God forever. Thomas Aquinas speaks in terms of ever-deepening friendship with God. Eastern Orthodox Christians tend to speak of being drawn up into the life of God. These formulations are really much less different than they may first appear. God's purpose in creating humans is that we might enjoy eternal fellowship with God. Despite the damages of sin, God has enabled this purpose to be fulfilled in and through the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. In Christ, Christians can ultimately be brought to their proper end. Thus, all Christian groups assume that the followers of Jesus are called into ever-deeper communion with God.

The Christian life, then, is a journey, guided and enabled by the Holy Spirit, into ever-deeper communion with God. If this, or something much like it, is the chief end of life in Christ, then it is not surprising that Christians have traditionally considered love (or agapē or charity) as the primary virtue. Of course, Scripture itself confirms this in such passages as Matt. 22:36–40, where Jesus affirms that the greatest commandments are those calling believers to comprehensive, self-giving love of God and neighbor; and 1 Cor. 13:13, where Paul is seen to identify love as the foremost virtue.

In this light, Scripture plays a dual role. It articulates the shape and nature of the virtues. Further, as Christians interpret and embody their interpretations of Scripture, Scripture becomes a vehicle to help in the formation of virtues so that Christians are moved ever closer to their true end. Perhaps the clearest statement of the relationship between scriptural interpretation and the formation of virtue is found in Augustine's On Christian Doctrine. There Augustine emphasizes both Scripture's role as a vehicle to move Christians toward their true end, and that all true interpretation of Scripture must cultivate the double love of God and neighbor.

Virtue in Interpretation

Given that Christians are called to interpret Scripture as part of their ongoing journey into ever-deeper communion with God, it is not surprising that those who have grown and advanced in virtue will tend to be masterful interpreters of Scripture. This is not to deny that the novice or the outsider will sometimes offer superior interpretations of any particular text. Rather, it simply stands to reason that those who have advanced in the Christian life will tend to offer the best interpretations for those whose primary aim is to advance in the Christian life.

In particular, those who are well practiced at interpreting Scripture in ways that enhance the love of God and neighbor will tend to demonstrate just such love in the very act of interpretation. Such demonstrations of love will appear in the way one's own position is formulated and presented, and will particularly appear in the ways in which one deals with the arguments of others (Fowl). This becomes crucial in the present time, when Christians "see in a mirror dimly" (1 Cor. 13:12 NRSV). Short of the eschatological perfection of our knowledge of God, Christians should expect that their interpretation and embodiment of Scripture will be matters of debate, discussion, and argument. If such argument is to advance and enhance Christians' prospects of deeper communion with God, then Christians must manifest love as well as all other virtues in their interpretation of Scripture.

See also Love; Wisdom

Bibliography

Augustine. On Christian Doctrine, trans. D. Robertson. Macmillan, 1958; Fowl, S. Engaging Scripture. Blackwell, 1998; Hauerwas, S., and C. Pinches. Christians among the Virtues. University of Notre Dame Press, 1997; MacIntyre, A. After Virtue. 2d ed. University of (p 839)Notre Dame Press, 1984; Rogers, E. "How the Virtues of the Interpreter Presuppose and Perfect Hermeneutics: The Case of Thomas Aquinas." JR 76 (1996): 64–81; Thomas Aquinas. Summa theologiae, Pt. I–II, esp. qq. 49–70.

Stephen E. Fowl

Virtue Epistemology     See Epistemology; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary; Virtue; Wisdom

Vulgate     See Medieval Biblical Interpretation; Translation

(p 840) W

War    See Violence

Warrant

Warrant is that quality or quantity enough of which makes the difference between knowledge and mere true belief. Imagine that you ask me to guess which playing card you are holding and I correctly guess that it is the ace of clubs. I could not truly be said to have known that you held the ace of clubs. On the other hand, if you hold it up so that I can see it, then I can correctly be said to know it, since my belief that it is the ace of clubs is true and warranted by my experience of seeing it. But what precisely is warrant?

Until the 1960s the standard answer was “justification.” Plato considers the definition of knowledge as true belief with a “logos” (Theaet. 201c–d; 202c). This definition, with “logos” understood in the sense of “justification,” was adopted as standard for two and a half thousand years. What does it mean to be justified in believing a proposition? A justified belief is a belief that one cannot be blamed for holding. Some beliefs are not justified for particular believers in particular circumstances. For example, we might say that somebody today who believed that the Earth was flat was not justified in holding such a belief since there is abundant available evidence to the contrary. But a peasant who in the Middle Ages believed that the Earth was flat might have been justified in holding that false belief since there was not so much evidence available then to the nonscholar. Clearly, one can be justified in holding a false belief, since sometimes there can be a lot of deceptive evidence for a falsehood.

This account of warrant in terms of justification went unchallenged until the 1960s, when Edmund L. Gettier published his seminal paper, “Is Justified True Belief Knowledge?” He answered the question of his title with a resounding “No,” putting forward cases of justified true belief that did not amount to knowledge. A simple example would be the following: I want to know what time it is, so I look at a clock. I see that it says it is noon, so I form the belief that it is noon. By a fluke the clock stopped exactly 24 hours previously, so my belief is true. But it is true by a fluke and does not qualify as knowledge, since it lacks warrant.

Most philosophers accepted that Gettier had disposed of the idea that warrant was justification, and so the search resumed for a more satisfactory analysis of warrant. In particular, there has been division between internalists and externalists over warrant: internalists claim that, whatever warrant is, it is something internal to the knower, a mental state of the knower. Historically, the leading example of internalism was classic foundationalism. This was the theory that a belief was warranted if it was either properly basic (not based on another belief, and did not have to be) or properly based on a belief that was itself warranted. A belief was properly basic if it was self-evident (e.g., the belief that two and two make four), incorrigible (e.g., the belief that I am now in pain), or evident to the senses (e.g., the belief that my lawn is green). All other beliefs, in order to be warranted, had to be deduced or induced from these. Recently, this theory has been rejected not just because of problems with Gettier-style counterexamples, but also because it has been seen to be self-referentially incoherent. In other words, the theory proclaims that belief in itself is not warranted.

Externalists, by contrast, claim that warrant is, at least in part, external to the knower: it is, at least in part, something outside the knower’s mind. The most recent externalist idea to come onto the market is one of particular interest to Christians. This is Plantinga’s idea, that a belief is warranted if and only if it is produced by a properly functioning mental faculty that is directed at truth. A cognitive faculty functions properly if and only if it functions as it was designed to do, and the matter of the design of a cognitive faculty is a matter that is external to the cognitive faculty itself. Most controversially of all, Plantinga claims that we have a “God module” or, as he calls it (following John Calvin), a sensus divinitatis. This is a cognitive faculty that is designed by God to produce beliefs in him. Plantinga applies the definition (p 841) to the case of this faculty and concludes that we can know God exists if indeed he does, and our belief in him is produced by a properly functioning sensus divinitatis.

Plantinga goes further and argues that specifically Christian beliefs are warranted if they are true and if they are produced by what he calls, again following Calvin, the internal instigation of the Holy Spirit. So, for example, my belief in the teaching of the Bible may still be warranted if it is produced by the Holy Spirit (and is true), even if unbelieving scholars say that such beliefs cannot be derived from a strictly “scientific” historical-critical reading of the text. The Christian in the pew has a source of belief open to him or her that may not be open to the scholar. This notion of warrant as proper function, however, does not tell us in itself, of course, which particular beliefs are warranted when it comes to Bible interpretation or any other area of life.

See also Epistemology

Bibliography

Gettier, E. “Is Justified True Belief Knowledge?” Analysis 23 (1963): 121–23; Plantinga, A. “Two (or More) Kinds of Scripture Scholarship.” Pages 81–116 in Theology and Scriptural Imagination, ed. L. G. Jones and J. Buckley. Blackwell, 1998; idem. Warrant. Oxford University Press, 1993; idem. Warrant and Proper Function. Oxford University Press, 1993; idem. Warranted Christian Belief. Oxford University Press, 1999; Plato. Theaetetus, trans. R. Waterfield. Penguin, 1987; Vanhoozer, K. Ch. 6 in Is There a Meaning in This Text? Zondervan, 1998.

Daniel Hill

Watson, Francis    See Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

Western Literature, the Bible and

It will be apparent that, from the earliest stages of Christian history, theological interpretation of Scripture has been the task not only of theologians in the formal sense, but also of fiction writers, poets, dramatists, and graphic artists. Just as from the eighteenth century certain Protestant theologies of original sin and the process of redemption and sanctification reveal the influence of Milton and Bunyan on the popular Christian mind, so too there is a kind of vernacular theology being done by novelists and filmmakers today. Like it or not, the Left Behind series of apocalyptic fictions, with their speculative and often eccentric Americanizations of biblical apocalyptic, are becoming formative for eschatology in many quarters of the contemporary church. Similarly, novels such as Dan Brown’s Da Vinci Code, a calculated attack on the divinity of Jesus and an attempt to subvert the canonical Gospel narratives, are significant shapers of theological interpretation for many. Films such as Jesus Christ Superstar, Jesus of Montreal, The Gospel of John, and Mel Gibson’s The Passion of the Christ are rather diverse. Yet each has an inherent theology, an informing conviction about the nature of God as revealed in Christ Jesus, which bids to inform (or deform) received understandings of Scripture, both in the church and in the dominant culture.

The role of the arts in relation to Scripture has generally been to interpret so as to enhance our sense of Scripture. In one respect Scripture, in which the language is generally terse and the narrative gaps frequent, may seem to invite this sort of imaginative elaboration. It has long been a tendency of Christian preaching to extrapolate somewhat speculatively upon the bare details of the text. But as with preaching, all such interpretative expansion entails a speculation informed by or productive of a theological position: fictive elaboration is typically predicated on some order of presumptive knowledge about the character of God and/or specific revelation concerning his purposes and action in history. Even putatively “playful” fictionalizing supra scriptura implies or makes explicit such predilections.

Thus, literature occasioned by a passage of Scripture becomes a “reading” (a lectio) of that Scripture, but one colored-in by a context and predisposition concerning the status of Scripture and the character of God as revealed in Scripture. For example, early Christian poets made much use of the erotic language of the Song of Solomon to allegorize the relationship between Christ as Bridegroom and the contemplative or mystically inclined poet as metonymically his bride. Thus, the resulting poem became a “love song” of the redeemed church—made poignant as well as intelligible because medieval theology, like some Jewish targums beforehand, had so “theologized” this Hebrew epithalamion. Certain songs of Bernard of Clairvaux (e.g., “Rosa sine spina”) elaborate the allegory of the church as bride (Rev. 19–22), fusing it with the Annunciation to Mary (Luke 1) and the incarnation. In so doing, he lets Mary represent the gathered and expectant church, awaiting the fullness of its redemption in the Bridegroom’s triumphant return to the Beloved. Similarly, the language of Thomas Aquinas in his “Adoro te devote,” a eucharistic hymn, is replete with analogies to the marriage (p 842) supper of the Lamb. The symbolic reach of the poet’s language depends absolutely on the poet’s typological reading of the OT in the light of the NT, and his anticipation that the historia humanae salvationis achieves its consummation in Christ the King’s return for his bride. Many vernacular medieval lyricists adapt this language, as does Dante most famously in his Paradiso.

During the Middle Ages in Europe, the process of translation into vernacular languages was in itself a way of doing theology. In an English example, the Anglo-Saxon poet of “Genesis B,” in a very loose paraphrase, treats the story of the fall. Along the way, he makes the conflict between God and Satan (much in the style of Job) central to his audience's understanding of the subversive temptation of Eve and Adam. His Satan is a strutting, arrogant exemplar of the "warrior hero" in the might-makes-right pagan Viking world, with which the audience is familiar. His purpose is to cause his audience, in the light of Christ, to deconstruct their notion of the "heroic," and to see the ruthless ambition of a crudely "Darwinian" politics as dark and demonic. So also Cynewulf, in "Christ and Satan," in which the temptation of Christ (Luke 4) reveals the overcoming strength of Christ to be expressed not in violence but in a firmly obedient understanding of the sovereign will of God. In the justly famous lyric "Dream of the Rood," this radical transposition of pagan notions of the heroic is further advanced. The poem presents the willingness to sacrifice oneself to death by torture—the utmost in repugnant shame for a Nordic culture—as essential to our understanding of what "almightig God" has done for us in Christ.

These examples, like the great medieval cycle dramas that vernacularize, paraphrase, and render dramatically the biblical narrative of human salvation (Genesis to Revelation), are all a species of theological interpretation of Scripture in which the text is more or less immediately present to the memory and imagination of the audience. The literary treatment is a kind of exposition, and the resulting text a free paraphrase in terms culturally comprehensible to medieval Europeans.

With the expansion of biblical translation of a more literal character, in England especially following Wycliffe and his heirs in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, other possibilities were occasioned. The printing of the Bible in translations by Tyndale, Coverdale, and eventually the committee who, under King James I, produced the 1611 Authorized Version, meant that the Bible itself could be read by laypeople like a book—or better, perhaps, a library of books. The result was a rise in biblical literacy, especially in England, to levels unapproached anywhere in Europe or North America today (perhaps only among Christians in China is there anything now like it). This meant that writers no longer needed so much to paraphrase Scripture (though some Protestant playwrights, such as John Bale, continued to do so for polemical and theological purposes), but were free to depend upon it as a literary foundation upon which their own fictions might with more freedom build. What is "learned" allusion for us was, in effect, commonplace allusion for a Renaissance dramatist, and Shakespeare, Johnson, or Marlowe could count upon even the "groundlings" (unsophisticated spectators) to "get it."

Thus, when the possibly atheist divinity student Christopher Marlowe wrote his Tragicall Historie of Doctor Faustus, he could incorporate a high order of theological critique in his dramatization of a Wittenberg professor's pact with the devil and subsequent damnation. It would seem that Faustus, like his Wittenberg "colleague" Luther, sets a high premium on personal freedom, including freedom to interpret the Bible as he chooses—however erratically. Though he claims, among other accomplishments, to have mastered theology, his reading of certain passages theologically crucial to all sides of the Reformation debate is partial and willfully incomplete. "The reward of sinne is death," Faustus reads. "That's hard." But he fails to read the rest of the verse: "but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 6:23 KJV). Then he flips the pages and reads, "If we say we have no sinne, we deceive ourselves, and there is no truth in us," and interjects without finishing the sentence, "Why then belike we must sinne, and so consequently die." On these grounds he rejects his calling as a theologian and proceeds to magic and sorcery. But the whole of his audience knows what he has left out: "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1 John 1:8–9 KJV). That is, they know Faustus has made a decision to foreclose on the grace held out to him, and that it was a real choice. Atheist or not, Marlowe has elaborated in his play a sound traditional soteriology and, in heightening the horror of Faustus's damnation, has made a strong theological case for the NT view of graceless consequences. Much the same sort of reflection is invited by Oscar Wilde in his novel The Picture of Dorian Gray.

In a similar way Milton depends upon familiarity with the Bible (not merely Genesis) to allow (p 843) him in Paradise Lost to write a theodicy, "to justifie the ways of God to man." He seems to have read the Anglo-Saxon "Genesis B" and to have understood its point about the inferiority of the triumphantly egotistical Satan to the self-effacing and obedient-unto-death Christ. The use of poetry or fiction to conduct a form of Christian apologetic is not, moreover, without high literary practice in more recent times. C. S. Lewis in his space trilogy, Till We Have Faces (notably in the Miltonesque Voyage to Venus), and in the Narnia tales for children, and also J. R. R. Tolkien in The Lord of the Rings—these works similarly engage in apologetics, that species of theological reflection that embraces theodicy and soteriology alike. They can depend much less upon biblical literacy than Reformation-era writers such as Marlowe, John Donne, or even eighteenth-century and nineteenth-century authors such as Samuel Johnson, Henry Fielding, Charlotte Brontë, or the Brownings. Hence, they tend to build in their theological interpretation through combinations of symbol, allegory, and deft, intermittent verbal recollection. One sees this also, for example, in G. M. Hopkins, Charles Williams, T. S. Eliot, W. H. Auden, R. S. Thomas, Richard Wilbur, and playwright/screenwriter Horton Foote (Tender Mercies).

Occasionally allegory emerges as a means of “coding” theology for those “within,” while leaving the possibility of a less-textual understanding for those “without” the community of informed Christian faith. This technique, highly developed in the Middle Ages as a means of reaching readers of varying stages of spiritual and theological maturity, is particularly exemplified in Dante, in whose Commedia is found also a kind of political allegory (or “coding”). For Dante, even where the Bible is not immediately visible in the weave of his text, it is a kind of “absent text” upon which his own poem is not greater than a “present gloss” or, as we might say, a situated reading. In a Christian perspective, all literature, for Dante, is “chiosata da altro testo,” glossed by another text (the Bible), until the ending of time.

In our time it may be that, for works such as C. S. Lewis’s Narnia tales or even (though less allegorically) Tolkien’s trilogy, the reading and “theological understanding” projected from the works for Christian readers is either invisible or, when made visible, entirely repugnant to secularist readers who enjoy the works on other grounds. This “two-level” option is not so available to readers of John Bunyan’s great allegory, Pilgrim’s Progress. Its secular readers and scholars (and they are many) are obliged to read the Bible and wrestle with Bunyan’s theology to comprehend and appreciate this book. After the English Bible, it is probably still the most influential work of literature in the English language.

No account of the theological interpretation of Scripture in Western literature (even one so introductory and partial as this must be) could be balanced without noting the contribution literary figures have made to a revisionist, secularizing, or even atheist antitheology. To take only two examples: William Blake’s elaborate myth is an antitheology (Marriage of Heaven and Hell, Four Zoas), even in some respects an infernal reading of both Scripture and earlier literary theologizing built upon it. Famously, he derides Milton for “being of the devil’s party without knowing it,” and praises Milton’s Satan in Paradise Lost for being in fact the true hero of the poem, more admirable than Jehovah (contra, e.g., “Genesis B”). Blake is unable to accept that the new Jerusalem is of God, not man, and must, as in Revelation and Milton’s Paradise Regained, descend to earth at God’s choosing. He demands (in “Jerusalem”) that the new Jerusalem be built now, by man, in “England’s green and pleasant land.” In this, he presages many a modern theologian (some of whom, ever since Cotton Mather, might substitute “America”).

Another figure at the threshold of modern literary studies is Matthew Arnold. For Arnold, literary theory and criticism was a substitute for theology, and great secular literature, in effect, a substitute for Scripture. In Literature and Dogma (1873), God and the Bible (1875), and St. Paul and Protestantism (1870) in particular, he sets out to demythologize (in almost precisely the same fashion as, later, would Rudolf Bultmann) the scriptural account of salvation and its representation of God. In so doing, he was influenced by Blake and the Romantics, particularly Shelley, but also (as were Coleridge and George Eliot) by German idealist philosophy and rationalist biblical criticism. Both Blake and Arnold are foundational for that species of contemporary literary criticism that sees itself as an enlightened substitute for a naively orthodox, Bible-based theology. This kind of “demythologizing” or “detheologizing” criticism of literature takes many forms, but in a figure like Northrop Frye (A Fearful Symmetry [1947], The Secular Scripture [1976], The Great Code [1981]), the confluence of Blake, Arnold, and Bultmann is transparent. Similarly, in Terry Eagleton, a leading British theorist and a prominent Marxist, a line from the (p 844)skepticism of Enlightenment Catholic thinkers to modern post-Catholic commentators is direct, and his own work is essentially a secularized version of liberation theology (e.g., Introduction to Literature [1982], After Theory [2003]). Frye was at one time ordained to the Methodist ministry, and Eagleton to the Roman Catholic priesthood. It might reasonably be argued that today the effort to counter orthodox Christian theological content in the canon of Western literature is at least as pronounced among critics and theorists as among the more sensational writers of fiction and filmmakers.

But that would be to tell only part of the story. Interest in the spiritual and theological dimensions of human reflection has, if anything, sharply increased in the past two decades. This is abundantly evident to the filmgoer and novel-reader alike. It is also clear that in much of this art there is bad theology. In some, there is arrestingly orthodox theological interpretation of Scripture, often indirect and imaginatively arresting to a degree that takes a thoughtful reader, on faithful trajectories, back into the Scriptures themselves most profitably. Some of the recent films on the life and passion of Christ, and novels—such as Michael O’Brien’s Father Elijah (1999), or Lief Enger’s Peace Like a River (2001), or short stories such as Wendell Berry’s volume Fidelity (1992)—move us into a realm of theological reflection. Their orthodoxy is as refreshing as it is radical—which makes it refreshing. A brief article of this nature can do little but hint at the riches of theological reflection contained in so many works, most necessarily unmentioned here, both past and present. The appended bibliography will assist in opening up a wealth of resources for theological reflection.

Bibliography

Bercovitch, S. The American Jeremiad. University of Wisconsin Press, 1978; Brantley, R. Locke, Wesley, and the Method of English Romanticism. University of Florida Press, 1984; Damrosch, L. God's Plot and Man's Stories. University of Chicago Press, 1985; idem. Symbol and Truth in Blake's Myth. Princeton University Press, 1980; Fisch, H. The Biblical Presence in Shakespeare, Milton, and Blake. Clarendon, 1999; Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; Frye, N. The Great Code. Routledge, 1982; Gunn, G., ed. The Bible and American Arts and Letters. Fortress, 1983; Jeffrey, D. L., ed. A Dictionary of Biblical Tradition in English Literature. Eerdmans, 1992; idem. Houses of the Interpreter. Baylor University Press, 2003; idem. People of the Book. Eerdmans, 1996; Prickett, S. Words and the Word. Cambridge University Press, 1986; Steiner, G. Real Presences. University of Chicago Press, 1989; Ziolkowski, T. Fictional Transfigurations of Jesus. Princeton University Press, 1972.

David Lyle Jeffrey

Wisdom

The theme of wisdom bears on the context, aims, and norms of interpreting Scripture theologically. Our postmodern age is suspicious of “ideologies” in traditional Christian texts, and of the modern critical “ideology” that rejects all tradition. Biblical wisdom is pertinent, both by ordering society around the communication of tradition formed in past experience, and by fostering inquiry about tradition’s ongoing viability in lived experience.

Indeed, the postmodern lure of the immanent and the local has pitfalls of its own, for biblical wisdom does not legitimize just any community or just any practice of a community. Biblical wisdom seeks to form a sensus communis around the fear of the Lord. Wisdom therefore bears not only on the current postmodern context but also on the aims and norms of biblical interpretation. Thus, consideration of wisdom in the practice of theological interpretation must follow a treatment of wisdom in the biblical texts.

Wisdom in the Biblical Texts

In manifold forms, the Bible evinces a tension over wisdom. Was the particularity of Israel’s covenant relationship with God through the Torah compatible with the exercise of human judgment—with prudence, or with reflection on the created order, or with the more universal “wisdom” gleaned from other cultures? After the primal fall, does a life wisely lived anticipate a just recompense in the here and now or a deferral to future hope? When the Bible speaks of “wisdom,” is it talking about cleverness or instrumental skill, about human moral judgment, about a quest to live in harmony with the order of creation, or about a prudence incorporating all of the above after beginning with “the fear of the LORD” (Prov. 1:7; 9:10)? Did seeking wisdom keep us from the tree of life (Gen. 2–3), or is wisdom itself a tree of life (Prov. 3:13–18)?

OT Wisdom Literature: Life in Israel and the Order of Creation. As a biblical genre, wisdom involves fairly stable forms of relating language to life. The degree to which this body of biblical literature reflects a particular wisdom “school” or “tradition” within Israel is a matter of ongoing debate. The corollary debate has concerned how distinctive is wisdom’s emphasis on creation when compared with the rest of the OT.

(p 845)Recent scholarship is acknowledging that the wisdom approach to reality was not alien to the typical Israelite, even if the people who composed the literature were distinctly literate and aware of other cultures. Indeed, Proverbs has affinities with a covenantal document such as Deuteronomy (e.g., in orienting wisdom to the “fear of the LORD”), whereas the Genesis narratives of creation and fall have both sapiential and covenantal motifs: Adam and Eve failed a test that paralleled Israel’s. In each case, God had intended that obedience would display the definitive wisdom (e.g., Deut. 4:5–6), but the covenanters failed by seeking life autonomously. Fusions of Torah and wisdom (e.g., in Sirach) make sense as a strong reaction against the tempting autonomy afforded by “wisdom.”

Obedying God’s law, however, requires character (the unifying theme of Wisdom literature, says William Brown, Character), so that people will choose wisdom over folly and thereby gain prudence. Consider Prov. 26:4–5 as a paradigm for law more generally: we must have a sense of which rule applies to which case. Prudent character, Proverbs emphasizes, must be formed in an ethos that is both communal and cosmic. Wisdom teaches subsequent generations that life flourishes in a harmony of societal and creation orders. When this order breaks down due to the folly of waywardness—when the adulteress is pursued rather than Woman Wisdom—the consequences are deadly. Success might still be found instrumentally in small parts of life because of the way God’s creation works, but life on the whole will be lost (O’Donovan).

Other wisdom material, especially Job and Ecclesiastes, wrestles with and qualifies this teaching. After the fall, the relationship between successful life and good character is not always direct. The person who expects to master creation by way of wisdom will often be disappointed; true wisdom knows its limitations.

NT Wisdom: Word and Spirit. Although its significance for Christology remains debated, wisdom is an NT theme as well, again pressing home human limitations. Jesus was partly a teacher of wisdom, as portrayed by the Gospel records of his parables and aphorisms. Moreover, the Gospel of John arguably presents him as Wisdom incarnate, and Matthew's Gospel seems to present Jesus as not only teaching but also somehow embodying wisdom. This extends the OT emphasis on wisdom (to whatever extent personified) as God's initiative of communication to humanity. The christological implications are complex and the problems knotty. Yet wisdom apparently figures on the divine rather than the human side of the divide between Creator and creature, the Worshipped and the not worshipped.

Paul's bracing critique of worldly wisdom in 1 Cor. 1:18–2:16 continues, in a Christ-centered key, the OT suspicion of autonomous human reason arrogating life to itself. Paul does not deny that God speaks in the created order, yet God will confound the worldly "wisdom" that picks and chooses strategic benefits from what is immanent. By a transcendent communicative action in Jesus Christ, God has broken into our world and brought a new Word near to us.

Jesus Christ is our God-given wisdom (1 Cor. 1:30), and he enables us to become wise as we have his mind by the Spirit (2:7–16). Unlike the Greek version focused on immanence, Christian wisdom is offered not to a heroic few, nor by way of recollection. Unlike the former Jewish version, wisdom has an aspect of transcendence, not as a gift of the law, but as a gift to people who have failed to follow the law. Christian wisdom is cruciform—the eschatological mystery of Christ revealed by the Spirit; the Christ fulfills the Torah as the embodiment of wisdom, while the Spirit fulfills the Torah as the enablement for wisdom. Yet the NT still contains "wisdom literature" as well, notably in James and in the Haustafeln that flesh out Paul's appeals for discernment.

The Bible finally manifests, therefore, a pluriform unity on the theme of wisdom. There is a redemptive-historical thrust, as the OT consolidation of wisdom toward the Torah gives way to NT fulfillment in the Word and the Spirit. Yet the theme of character formed in response to communication—communication of what prior generations have heard from God and learned of God's creation—persists. God's new communication, Jesus Christ, fulfills anticipations of OT wisdom and reorders our lives so that we will keep covenant and eat from the tree of life. This reordering includes a wholeness of vision that glimpses a unity of canonical teaching by which to live in God's world.

Wisdom in the Practice of Theological Interpretation

Contemporary appeals to wisdom may be energized less by these biblical themes than by the complexities of cultural change for the Christian tradition. Wisdom is a wedge against modernity's narrowly instrumental and procedural reason, which runs like the machines we build. It stands against modernity's excessively critical orientation (p 846), which (ironically) degenerates into parroting traditional criticisms. It is against modernity's persistent reduction of the natural order into observable parts, which loses the enchantment of the world's hidden structures, moral implications, and wholeness. And it critiques modernity's obsession with dilemmas of moral obligation, which precludes living by virtue of an orientation to the true, the good, and the beautiful. Especially for our purposes, wisdom turns us against the exclusively procedural, excessively critical, reductionist rationality of modern biblical scholarship.

Wholeness and Particularity in Theological Epistemology. In other words, wisdom pushes for wholeness while attending to the particular. We have learned that our lives are ongoing stories of exercising practical reason (prudence, or Aristotle's phronēsis) in a quest to envision the good (related to Aristotle's sophia, but not an unchanging abstraction that is contemplated; Christian sophia is embodied in Jesus Christ). One does not simply apply a Christian vision in particular situations; discernment in each case works back onto understanding of the rule, producing fresh construals of the vision. For theology, this accords with Ellen Charry's claim that premodern theological proposals took their shape due to situated pastoral concerns. In another sense, it accords with John Calvin that knowledge of God is mutually implicated with knowledge of our selves.

The way of wisdom might foster a Christian theism that maintains transcendence via doctrines of creation and prevenient divine action without ignoring the immanent. The postmodern hope is that, in this manner, tensions connected to biblical wisdom—transcendence and immanence, divine and human action, creation and redemption, command and common sense—might be embraced in their movement rather than denied by prioritizing one side or the other in some linear procedure. Usually, such procedures have made God remote to, or expelled from, what is rational.

Likewise, wisdom could hold together epistemology and ethics but, more pointedly, avert the modern fixation with epistemē (scientific knowledge) and technē (technique or skill).

Epistemologies that (attempt to) detach knowledge from other actions and dispositions of embodied and social beings should be rejected; the oscillation of sophia and phronēsis provides the Christian judgment whereby sciences and skills can be appropriated where needed.

Vision and Discernment in Theology's Hermeneutical Circle.

How, then, would Christian wisdom shape the aims and norms of biblical interpretation? Advocates for theological interpretation of Scripture can agree that its aim is knowledge of God, ingredient to which is the formation of Christian identity and virtue, unto human flourishing and God's glory. This aim might recover wholeness to the theological disciplines and to "theory" and "practice"—to whatever extent that theological scholarship can serve Christian living. To read the Bible with Christian vision ultimately means reading the corpora of the OT and NT together, against sometimes imperious practices of "biblical theology" as defined in the academic guild. And to read the Bible with Christian discernment means attending to the questions of church and world, against some "scholarly" claims that all particularity and subjectivity be avoided.

Yet if wisdom's "hermeneutical circle" oscillates between vision and discernment, what does that aim imply about the norms of biblical interpretation? On this question, advocates of theological interpretation are less agreed. Among several who advocate the recovery of practical reason (phronēsis), Stephen Fowl virtually equates the norms of biblical interpretation with Christian aims. Interpretation is theoretically underdetermined; the church must engage in ongoing discussion and debate concerning which interpretation(s) foster Christian virtue and human flourishing before God. Interpretations are to be measured by their fruitfulness rather than by textually based criteria.

Conversely, Kevin Vanhoozer retains a robust role for the human authors' enacted communicative intentions in norming biblical interpretation. Christian virtues are an interpretative aim and a necessity in approaching the Bible; practical reason is needed to indwell the worlds of canonical language, and to bear faithful witness about what God says in Scripture as canon.

Similarly, Nicholas Wolterstorff (in Divine Discourse and later articles) relates practical reason to two levels of biblical interpretation. First is the level of reaching judgments about the human discourse. Second is the level of reaching judgments about God's appropriation of that human discourse. These judgments involve imaginative construals about what an author would say. So to the principle “Scripture interprets Scripture” must be added a Christian vision—while taking the canon as a whole—of what God would be saying when we read some particular text.

(p 847) If theological interpretation of Scripture could be theoretically determined, then it would be an enterprise of epistemē and technē; wisdom would be (at best) an applied by-product. So to speak of sophia and phronēsis makes biblical interpretation partially underdetermined, taking up sciences and skills in ad hoc fashion; we trust the Spirit both to form and to free our imagination. Yet Christian virtue cannot be the only, or even primary, norm of interpretation, lest an immanent sensus communis preempt “hearing” God’s communicative action. For we do not love as we ought, nor would we know what love is, apart from God’s final Word in Jesus Christ and the Spirit’s witness to that Word in the texts of Holy Scripture. The scandal of Christian wisdom is not finally its communal but its cruciform character.

See also Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary; Virtue; Wisdom Literature

Bibliography

Barton, S., ed. Where Shall Wisdom Be Found? T&T Clark, 1999; Brown, W. Character in Crisis. Eerdmans, 1996; idem. The Ethos of the Cosmos. Eerdmans, 1999; Charry, E. By the Renewing of Your Minds. Oxford University Press, 1997; Ford, D., and G. Stanton, eds. Reading Texts, Seeking Wisdom. Eerdmans, 2003; Fowl, S. Engaging Scripture. Blackwell, 1998; Johnson, L. T. Scripture and Discernment in the Early Church. 2d ed. Abingdon, 1996; Kelsey, D. To Understand God Truly. Westminster John Knox, 1992; O’Donovan, O. Resurrection and Moral Order. 2d ed. Eerdmans, 1994; Vanhoozer, K. First Theology. InterVarsity, 2002; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995; Wood, C. Vision and Discernment. Scholars Press, 1985.

Daniel J. Treier

Wisdom Literature

In the nineteenth century, when Job and Ecclesiastes played a prominent role in intellectual life (Smend 254), the term “Wisdom Literature” came to designate Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes, in addition to Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon in the LXX. The grounds for this designation were laid in antiquity, partly because Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs were attributed to Solomon, Israel’s wisest king (Leanza). Wisdom Literature (WL) in this essay will refer to the canonical Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes. As a neutral designation, WL may designate the books that focus on “wisdom” (khokmah) and employ macro- and microgenres appropriate to that focus. In this regard, biblical WL is generically and conceptually unique in the ancient Near East, for nowhere else is the nature of wisdom itself made an object of reflection (Lambert 1; Fox, Proverbs, 346).

Unfortunately, the term “Wisdom Literature” has been theologically problematic because it isolated these books from the rest of Scripture. Though Job and Ecclesiastes were at times ignored or disdained, for most of church history the WL was considered an integral part of Scripture, essential for faith and practice. Among the church fathers, Christ was widely described as the Word and Wisdom of God, particularly with regard to his role in ordering the cosmos (e.g., Athanasius, C. Gent 40; Lantantius, Inst. 4.9; cf. John 1:1; Col. 1:15–20) or his role in salvation (e.g., Augustine, Doctr. chr. 1.11–14; cf. 1 Cor. 1:17–2:8). Proverbs 8:22–31 played a major role in the Arian controversy (Hanson 440–43; Pelikan 191–200).

In the last two hundred years, as WL was set over against the rest of the canon, so was Proverbs set against Job and Ecclesiastes. Proverbs was considered a simplistic dogmatism, in which good behavior resulted in prosperity and bad resulted in poverty and death. Job and Ecclesiastes, however, were presumed to result from a “crisis of wisdom” because history and innocent suffering proved the dogmatism of Proverbs false. Proverbs, however, presents the ABCs of wisdom, in which one generally reaps what one sows, while Job and Ecclesiastes present “graduate-school wisdom,” in which the “exceptions to the rules” and the limits of human life and knowledge are radically explored (Van Leeuwen, “Wealth”).

For Augustine and the Western tradition after him, the entire Bible was read as a “wisdom” book for humanity (Jeffrey 88). This ancient view of Scripture had its roots in the Bible itself, since the purpose of Scripture as a whole was in this life to make readers “wise (sophisai) for salvation” and to train them in righteousness, a requisite for wisdom (2 Tim. 3:15–16; cf. Prov. 10–15, 28–29). But with the triumph of historicism and the concomitant neglect or misconstrual of creation in theology (Wingren; Knierim), WL became isolated from the operative theological “canon within a canon” because it did not treat Israel’s historical traditions such as exodus, covenant, conquest, prophecy, and exile. In the twentieth century salvation history became the heart of the “biblical theology movement” (Childs). Theological interest in WL waned, even as scholars in the history of religions began a quest comparing Israelite wisdom texts with ancient Near Eastern and Egyptian literature, spurred by the probable use of Amenemope in Prov. 22:17–23:11 (Römhald). Some went so far as to claim that the WL (p 848) was a “foreign body” in Scripture, more akin to ancient Near Eastern literature than to the rest of the biblical canon (cf. Preuss). While scholars noted that WL was different in genre than most of the canon, they generally failed to notice that lack of reference to Israel's history was a function of its generic purposes. The WL did not mention history because it was not generically germane. Rather, WL in its final form presupposed "canonical" religion and its traditions, as is evident from many verbal and thematic links (pace Crenshaw 13). It provided a necessary complement, not duplicate, to the rest of the canon.

The term WL was also problematic because, though Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes focused on "wisdom," they were not of one type generically, nor was their purpose the same. Moreover, they employed a wide variety of generic subtypes, such as (autobiographical) instruction, prayer and hymn, admonition and saying. The question of the relation of various genres to wisdom as a concept remained unresolved, further clouding the problem of "wisdom" in the canon as a whole (Van Leeuwen, "Form Criticism").

Though the term WL rightly highlighted these books' focus on wisdom and their generic differences from other scriptural macrogenres, it concealed a more fundamental, unresolved question: "What is biblical wisdom?" An adequate answer must take into account the fact that wisdom is not genre bound, but appears in all areas of life and in various literary genres. Wisdom genres are not the same as wisdom per se. Thus, we must see how the OT actually uses wisdom terms and also how wisdom functions throughout the OT and in comparable ancient literatures. Scholarship is far from finished with these questions. What follows is necessarily a provisional attempt at a theory of OT wisdom, for the Bible itself does not provide such a theory.

Wisdom is difficult to define because it is a totality concept. That is, the idea is as broad as reality and constitutes a culturally articulated way of relating to the entire world. The absence of wisdom is "folly," which like "wisdom" is expressed in a variety of Hebrew terms (Fox, Proverbs, 28–43). Thus, in the OT good sailors, metalworkers, weavers, counselors, scribes, and builders—all may be described as "wise" (khokmah). Originally, concepts of "wisdom" generally referred to any human craft, skill, or competence. The WL did not abandon such usages, but focused on articulating the religion-based, sociomoral aspects of human competence and virtue in relation to Yahweh. Ancient wisdom thought and practice are never "secular," even where God is not mentioned. Thus, even farming is an aspect of religion (Isa. 28:23–29). Ancient Greece followed a similar, culturally specific development in the use of the term sophia, leading to philosophia (Gladigow). Human wisdom and folly are forms of action in the world, including actions of thought or speech—important topics throughout Proverbs and Job. The wide referential range of wisdom terms like khokmah is perhaps the most important clue to their meaning, a phenomenon for which any adequate description of biblical wisdom must account. To conclude from the wide range of “wisdom” that there are fundamentally competing notions in the OT overlooks the totality character of khokmah. Yet, the Hellenistically influenced works of Sirach (also in Hebrew) and Wisdom of Solomon make clear that the influence of worldviews (or philosophies) in the articulation of wisdom must also be carefully discerned.

The theological reason for the totality character of terms like “wisdom” and “folly” (like that of “good” and “evil”) is that they are rooted in divine creation. This is the import of Prov. 8, where cosmic wisdom, personified as a woman, addresses all humanity in the midst of life (von Rad, ch. 9). She has the right to do so because she was present with God at the creation of all things. The Lord has “built” the universe “with wisdom” (Prov. 3:19–20; Ps. 104:24). Thus, any human activity (including worship) can be done wisely or foolishly, well or poorly. Human activities are wise and good inasmuch as they are in harmony with the wisdom by which God created the world (cf. Prov. 3:19–20; 14:1; 24:3–4; Exod. 31:1–3; 1 Kings 7:13; Van Leeuwen, “Building”). Though the Wisdom of Solomon frames OT thought in a Platonic way, its comprehensive description of human wisdom rooted in God’s cosmic wisdom offers profound insight into the scope and character of biblical wisdom (Wis. 7:15–22).

For our purposes, wisdom may be described as the sum of several aspects, none of which may be lacking. First, wisdom presupposes the “fear of Yahweh/God” (Prov. 1:7; 9:10; Job 1:1; 28:28; Ps. 111:10; see above, on creation). This concept has its origins in numinous awe at God’s mighty works (cf. Exod. 14:31), but comes in time to be OT shorthand for “religion” in the sense of all of life, not just worship, as service to Yahweh, Creator and redeemer of the world through Israel. This concept, in various verbal formulations, appears throughout the OT (e.g., Deut. 10:12; Pss. 25; 86:11), and is one way in which the authors of the WL connected their works to the larger (p 849) biblical worldview, even when they did not take up historical themes so prominent elsewhere. The fear of the Lord is the key to Israel’s epistemology (von Rad, ch. 2), for knowing the Creator puts one in position appropriately to know the creation and humans with their divinely given possibilities and limits.

Second, wisdom entails insight into and practice of the generic patterns and norms for creation and creatures. Both natural and cultural things are to be dealt with according to their “kinds” (cf.

Wenham). In a very focused way, WL thinks resolutely in terms of biblical “creation theology” (Zimmerli), in which nature and culture are not split in a post-Kantian dichotomy. All human activities are delimited by conditions that God ordered in the beginning. Knowledge of the cosmic order requires the knowledge not only of how things work, but also of how all things fit together and relate in one whole, all to the glory of God. Cosmic order is a matter both of factually existing creatures, functions, and relations within the cosmos, but equally of the divinely ordained laws and norms that hold for them (laws for nature, norms and relative freedom for human culture). In Scripture, such laws and norms can take the form of God’s creative, governing word (“Let there be ...”). Secondly, Israel’s written law codes and wisdom are culturally specific articulations of cosmic norms, accommodated to treat the complications of sin and history (cf. Matt. 19:1–12). The created limits for human conduct permit a good deal of freedom within those limits for societies, groups, and persons alike. Such norms are also designated as the Wisdom of God, personified in Prov. 8 as a woman who addresses humankind (von Rad, ch. 9). In this regard, Israel’s wisdom thinking is comparable to ancient Near Eastern concepts of cosmosocial order such as the Sumerian ME and Egyptian Ma‘at (Schmid; contrast Fox, “Ma‘at”).

Third, wisdom entails knowledge of and appropriate action with reference to particular circumstances, institutions, persons, and other creatures. For example, to marry is a general human institution under created norms (Gen. 2:24; Prov. 5:15–19; Matt. 19:3–9). But to marry requires knowledge of individuals (both of self and the other) and of the circumstances in which marriage is good or not. Similarly, the human pattern of work is both general and particular: What calling is right for this person in these circumstances? Questions like “Whom shall I marry?” and “What work shall I do?” require knowledge both of culturally articulated creational patterns and of relevant particulars. Wisdom behavior is always “fitting” or appropriate to the concrete, particular circumstances (Van Leeuwen, “Proverbs,” on 26:1–12). Part of the folly of Job’s “friends” is that they know the general “rules” of theological wisdom, without recognizing that they do not apply to Job’s particular, indeed unique, case. It is possible to speak the truth in ways that are false.

Fourth, wisdom is traditional. Knowledge of generic patterns and their re-cognition in particular situations is mediated generationally, whether in a profession or the general affairs of life. Traditions permit humans to discern and deal with the “new” in terms of what was learned in the past, and to relate particulars to the generic patterns within which they fall. The biblical image for tradition is the “way” or the “path” (Ps. 1; Prov. 1–9). A “way” is an enculturated means of negotiating the human journey through created reality. “Ways” have traditional staying power because they seem to work; they effectively get us from point A to B, sparing those who come later the onerous task of clearing a path for the first time. Nonetheless, ways can be good or bad, inasmuch as they conform to the divine norms for reality or not (see Proverbs). Thus, in Acts “the way” designates the one true path of Christianity. Augustine appropriated this insight in a profoundly christological way: “(p 850) Though Wisdom [Christ] was Himself our home, He made Himself also the way by which we should reach our home” (Doctr. chr. 1.11.8).

This insight of Augustine reminds us that in Jesus Christ are found “all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge” (Col. 2:3). The NT as a whole shares in the general movement of early Judaism toward a sapiential understanding of revelation (1 Tim. 3:15–16). For the NT, the Redeemer of all things is the incarnate Word or Wisdom, through whom the Father created all things (John 1:1–18; cf. Prov. 8; Col. 1:15–20; Heb. 1:1–14; 1 Cor. 1:24, 30). Moreover, the life and teaching of Jesus embody and advance the principles of OT wisdom. Here only an example or two must suffice. Thus, the Sermon on the Mount is largely proverbial teaching in genre and content (cf. Eccles. 5:18–20 and 9:9–10 with Matt. 6:25–34; Ps. 37:11, 22 with Matt. 5:5; etc.). Jesus also repeatedly befuddles his opponents by answering and not answering fools according to their folly (Prov. 26:4–5; Matt. 19:3–9; 21:23–27; 22:15–22). On the ethical level, the NT repeatedly urges Christians not only to cross-bearing and virtue, but also to wisdom (Acts 6:3, 10; 1 Cor. 2:6; Eph. 1:9, 17; Col. 3:16; etc.). Though wisdom in the NT has become a topic of scholarly discussion, much more needs to be done to make it part of the pastor’s toolkit, so that the church may have the mind of Christ in all wisdom.

See also Wisdom

Bibliography

Childs, B. Biblical Theology in Crisis. Westminster, 1970; Crenshaw, J. “Murphy’s Axiom: Every Gnomonic Saying Needs a Balancing Corrective.” Pages 1–17 in The Listening Heart, ed. K. Hoglund et al. JSOT, 1987; idem. Old Testament Wisdom. Westminster John Knox, 1998; Fox, M. Proverbs 1–9. AB. Doubleday, 2000; idem. “World Order and Ma‘at: A Crooked Parallel.” JNES 23 (1995): 37–48; Gladigow, B. Sophia und Kosmos. G. Olms, 1965; Hanson, R. P. C. “Biblical Exegesis in the Early Church.” Pages 412–53 in The Cambridge History of the Bible, ed. P. R. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans. Cambridge University Press, 1970; Jeffrey, D. L. People of the Book. Eerdmans, 1996; Knierim, R. “Cosmos and History.”

Pages 171–224 in The Task of Old Testament Theology. Eerdmans, 1995; Lambert, W. G. Babylonian Wisdom Literature. Clarendon, 1960; Leanza, S. “Wisdom Books.” Pages 878–81 in vol. 2 of Encyclopedia of the Early Church, ed. A. Di Berardino. Oxford University Press, 1992; Murphy, R. The Tree of Life. Eerdmans, 2002; idem. “Wisdom—Theses and Hypotheses.” Pages 35–42 in Israelite Wisdom, ed. J. Gammie et al. Scholars Press, 1978; Pelikan, J. The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine. Vol. 1, The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600). University of Chicago Press, 1971; Preuss, H. Einführung in die alttestamentliche Weisheitsliteratur. Urban-Taschenbücher 383. Kohlhammer, 1987; Rad, G. von. Wisdom in Israel. Abingdon, 1972; Römheld, D. Wege der Weisheit. BZAW 184. De Gruyter, 1989; Schmid, H. Gerechtigkeit als Weltordnung. BHT 40. Mohr/Siebeck, 1968; Smalley, B. The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages. University of Notre Dame Press, 1964; Smend, R. “The Interpretation of Wisdom in Nineteenth-Century Scholarship.” Pages 257–68 in Wisdom in Ancient Israel, ed. J. Day et al. Cambridge University Press, 1995; Steiert, F.-J. Die Weisheit Israels—ein Fremdkörper im Alten Testament? FThSt 143. Herder, 1990; Van Leeuwen, R. “The Book of Proverbs.” NIB 5:17–264; idem. “Building God’s House: An Exploration in Wisdom.” Pages 204–11 in The Way of Wisdom, ed. J. I. Packer and S. Soderlund. Zondervan, 2000; idem. “Form Criticism, Wisdom, and Psalms 111–112.” In The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century, ed. M. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi. Eerdmans, 2003; idem. “Wealth and Poverty: System and Contradiction in Proverbs.” HS 33 (1992): 25–26; Wenham, G. The Book of Leviticus. NICOT. Eerdmans, 1979; Wingren, G. Flight from Creation. Augsburg, 1971; Zimmerli, W. “The Place and Limit of the Wisdom in the Framework of the Old Testament Theology.” SJT 17 (1964): 146–58.

Raymond C. Van Leeuwen

Wittgenstein, Ludwig    See Language-Game

Wolterstorff, Nicholas    See Authorial Discourse Interpretation; Speech-Act Theory; Theological Hermeneutics, Contemporary

Womanist Interpretation See Feminist Biblical Interpretation; Ideological Criticism

Word of God

At the core of theological interpretation of Scripture is the conviction that the Bible—the words of human authors—is somehow also the word of God. Many liturgical traditions have the reader of the OT lesson and epistle end with “the word of the Lord.” Other churches encourage their congregations to “listen for the word of God.” These diverse liturgical practices pose the central theological issue of the present article: Is the Bible itself the word of God written, or is it the vehicle through which the church may on occasion hear the word of God? To what extent do these liturgical expressions affirm the “Scripture principle”—that what Scripture says, God says—and to what extent do they carry over into theological hermeneutics?

There are three parts to this overarching question: (1) Is the Bible (a form of) the word of God? (2) What exactly do biblical authors and later theologians mean by “word of God”? (3) What ought theological interpreters of Scripture assume about the relation of the Bible to the word of God?

Scripture as a Form of God’s Word: Sic et non K. Barth. It is fitting to begin with a theologian who opens his dogmatics with a massive analysis of the word of God. For Barth, theology begins with the self-presentation of the triune God, a free and gracious act, never a static thing waiting to be discovered. Only God can make God known, and God remains the active sovereign subject of his revelation, regardless of the particular form it takes. The Son is the essential and objective form of God’s self-communication to the world; the Spirit is the subjective power of the word without which the word is not recognized or received. Hence, the word of God is not a static message, but a dynamic event—less propositional content than personal address.

Barth distinguishes the essential word (e.g., the Son as revelation of God’s being) from its two further forms, the only two forms in which the church today meets the word of God: Scripture and preaching. There is thus a (p 851)unity-in-differentiation of the one word just as there is a unity-in-differentiation of the one God: the revelation itself (the Son), the witness to that revelation (the prophetic and apostolic testimony), and the preaching of that witness. The Bible and human preaching become God’s word when God actively communicates himself to human recipients through the divinely appropriated human discourse: “The Word of God is God Himself in Holy Scripture” (Barth 457). At the same time, “A real witness is not identical with that to which it witnesses, but it sets it before us” (Barth 463).

In sum, the Bible becomes the word of God when it serves as the creaturely medium of the self-presentation of Christ through the Spirit and becomes a witness to revelation, when its substance or Sache—the living Word—graciously makes himself known. The witness indicates but is not identical with that to which it witnesses. The substance of the revelation—the Son—retains his sovereign freedom precisely by refusing to be equated with the human words. The Word of God is not an attribute of the biblical text (this would violate divine freedom) but commandeers the human words of the Bible and so directs readers to its true subject matter (Barth 513).

J. Barr and J. Barton. While Barth espouses an indirect identity thesis, most modern biblical critics hold to a nonidentity thesis. To insist that the Bible is the word of God is to invoke a dogmatic category, one moreover that alienates the Bible from the world of scholarly exegesis. For Barr, the authority of the Bible stems not from its divine origin but from its ecclesial function as a classic model for understanding God. As a humanly formulated model, however, the Bible is rife with imperfections—chronological, historical, even theological. In the final historical-critical analysis, the Bible is not the word of God but the “word of Israel” or “word of leading early Christians” (Barr 119–20).

Other modern biblical scholars worry that identifying Scripture with the word of God commits bibliolatry and elevates the Bible above Jesus Christ: “As long as we have the Bible (it seems) Jesus need not really have existed, for it is the text that reveals the truth about God, not Jesus himself” (Barton 37). Critics typically find it difficult to conceive of a literal communication from God: “The text of Scripture is not God’s word spoken to us; it reveals God as the one about whom, not by whom, various types of literature are written” (Barton 72; cf. Barr 131). Modern biblical criticism’s agnosticism as to the divine origin of Scripture is likewise agnosticism, or perhaps outright denial of God as a living, breathing, and speaking communicative agent. Such a critically emasculated Bible leaves us with only “human reflection on the mystery of God.... This literature is not of divine origin” (Barton 46).

“Word of God” in Scripture and Theology

The poet Goethe pictures his protagonist Faust puzzling over the translation of logos in the prologue to the Fourth Gospel: “In the beginning was the ...” Faust considers several possibilities—word, thought, power, deed—each of which seems to capture something of the biblical idea.

Biblical Sources. The OT is replete with hundreds of instances of God “saying” or “speaking,” from the command of bringing light into existence or the boy Samuel hearing an audible voice (1 Sam. 3:4) to messages mediated by various types of go-betweens (e.g., prophets, Balaam’s ass). The pentateuchal literature prefers more specific terms to describe the kind of divine speech (e.g., “covenant,” “command,” or “instruction”). The whole Deuteronomistic History presents a theology of the word of God at work in history and of Israel's response to it. The formula "the word of the Lord came" (dabar Yahweh) belongs especially to the prophetic literature, where Yahweh tends to speak through the prophets rather than directly to individuals. What is authoritative is not the human messenger but the divine message (Deut. 18:18–19).

Though God reveals himself in creation and history, his covenantal purposes are ultimately unintelligible apart from his accompanying interpretative speech acts (e.g., promises, commands, blessings, curses). The word of God is reliable and efficacious, not because words themselves contain magical power, but because the divine speech agent is faithful, wise, and able (Isa. 55:11). One of the telltale marks of false gods (idols) is that they are dumb: they cannot speak and so cannot bring about any effect through speech acts.

In the NT, as in the LXX, the word logos is often used to translate the Hebrew dabar. The NT speaks of the word of God, the words of Jesus, and of Jesus as the Word of God. In the parable of the sower, the seed sown is explicitly identified in Luke 8:11 as the word of God, thus linking the word and the gospel message about the kingdom coming in the person of Jesus. The term thus refers both to the teaching of Jesus and to the apostolic preaching and teaching about Jesus (1 Thess. 2:13). Moreover, this word about Jesus—the gospel—does more than convey propositional content; it is a dynamic word that acts upon the (p 852)lives of its listeners (Heb. 4:12; 1 Pet. 1:23), just as the words of Jesus themselves are "spirit and ... life" (John 6:63).

Most strikingly, John 1:1–4 and the whole Fourth Gospel identify the word of God with the preexistent Son of God made flesh in Jesus Christ, and identify Jesus' words with the word of God (Gundry 1–50; cf. Rev. 19:13). Jesus' person and work become the definitive mode of God's communication (Heb. 1:1–2). Nevertheless, the word of God is often identified with the words of Scripture as well (John 10:35; 2 Cor. 6:16–17; 2 Tim. 3:16–17; Heb. 3:7; 2 Pet. 1:19–21; 3:15–16).

Theological Formulations. From the rich storehouse of biblical images and instances of God's speaking, theologians have harvested what essentially amounts to a doctrine of revelation.

Given the virtually unquestioned conviction in the early church that the Bible is God's word, some patristic exegetes felt the need to offer allegorical interpretations in order to discover something worthy of God and applicable to new situations in texts that seemed either trivial or immoral. The Bible's status as word of God thus stimulated and legitimated a millennium and more of "spiritual" interpretation, based largely on the assumption that the whole body of biblical texts makes up a consistent message, thanks to the Spirit's authorship.

Renaissance and Reformation theologians were still precritical in their acceptance of the direct identity thesis between the words of the biblical authors and the word of God. Yet their “rediscovery” of the original languages of Scripture and their interest in philology led to a renewed interest in the grammatical-historical sense.

Some scholars contend that Luther maintained a distinction between the biblical text and the word of God. Nevertheless, later Lutheran and most Reformed theologians (together with their respective communities’ confessions of faith) agreed with Augustine, for whom theology consisted primarily in interpreting the Bible as God’s word. They likewise affirmed a strong version of the identity thesis. The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England, for instance, state that the Bible is “God’s word written” (art. 20).

Calvin argued that the main task of the interpreter consists in “lucid brevity”: the commentator should remain as inconspicuous as possible so as to unfold the mind of the author. The human authors retain their personal and intellectual integrity even though the Spirit so superintends the writing process that what the authors wrote could be said ultimately to proceed from God himself. Scripture deserves the epithet “word of God” not because the church decided to count it as such but because of the ministry of the Spirit, who enables the church to see the Bible for what it truly is (Calvin, Inst. 1.6–9).

It is precisely the direct identification between the biblical texts and the word of God that modern biblical scholarship has called into question. Biblical critics examine the grammatical-historical sense of the text in relation to historically reconstructed culturally conditioned contexts rather than the canonical context that had enabled earlier interpreters to read Scripture as the unified word of God. The privileged locus of biblical interpretation shifts from special to general hermeneutics, and from the church to the academy—so much so that we may now wonder what biblical studies has to do with theology (Barr).

Theologians of the so-called New Hermeneutic (Fuchs, Ebeling) espouse another version of the indirect identity thesis, following Bultmann (and before him, Heidegger). They claim that the word of God is an event of personal encounter (a “language-” or “word-event”), occasioned by the reading or preaching of Scripture, not an intrinsic property of the Bible itself. Theological conservatives, faced with this and other twentieth-century emphases on noncognitive revelation, have defended the Bible as God’s word under the rubric of propositional revelation (Henry).

The modern preoccupation with epistemology—the possibility, limits, and methods of knowledge—led theologians to elevate the doctrine of revelation into the virtual first principle of theology. Accordingly, the discussion about the Bible's relation to the word of God focused—in thinkers as diverse as Barr and Barth, Fuchs and Henry—on whether (and how) the Bible is revelatory of God. In postmodernity, the skeptical trend with regard to the possibility of knowledge through or about texts led to two results. First is an awareness that all texts, including the Bible, conceal as much (if not more) as they reveal. Hence comes the typical deconstructive strategy of exposing the multivalent signifiers and structural inconsistencies that undermine determinate textual meaning. Second is an aversion to a theological foundationalism that treats the Bible as divinely revealed propositional data.

The widespread connection between Scripture, “word of God,” and revelation in modern theology is telling. Yet there are lingering questions as to whether revelation is the fittest rubric. Designating the whole Bible as “revealed”—or for that (p 853) matter, “inspired,” “witness,” or “authority”—is problematic in that it fails to do justice to all that the Bible is (Goldingay).

Also problematic is the assumption that the basic unit of meaning is the individual word, an inert item in a system of langue, rather than a word-in-use, or parole. The latter better accords with the biblical depiction of the word of God as dynamic and transformative rather than merely static and informative. Yet, while we may welcome the recent emphasis on the performative rather than merely informative aspect of language, certain things that authors do with words depend upon the truth value of their cognitive content (Thiselton 326).

In light of these concerns, we do well to consider one option overlooked by Goethe's Faust for the translation of logos: discourse, “something someone says to someone about something.” Discourse includes more than “revealing.” It is needlessly reductionistic to insist that “revealing” is the only thing God does with biblical words. Strictly speaking, “revelation” pertains to the disclosure of something hidden. As such, it is a particular kind of discourse: a making known of something that would otherwise remain unknown (Wolterstorff 19–36). To be sure, there is revelation in the Bible. The relevant question, however, is whether “revelation” is the best concept with which to capture everything relevant that falls under the rubric “word of God.”

“Word of God” and the Theological Interpretation of Scripture

Interpreting Scripture theologically means assuming that there is something about Scripture that is “of God,” but what? Revealed information? Personal encounter? Disclosure of a new way of seeing the world? What dogmatic conclusions may we draw from the church's confessing "the word of the Lord" after the Scripture reading and from the Bible's own self-attestation?

Instead of asking whether the words of human beings might convey the word of God, perhaps we should ask, with Barth, whether the word of God employs words of human beings. An affirmative answer implies some notion of double agency in which God works in and with and through the human mind, not to violate but to perfect its natural capacities. Such sanctifying work includes making use of reason and imagination alike. Yet, to interpret Scripture theologically is ultimately not a matter of solving historical and intellectual puzzles about what certain people thought in the past, but of engaging in various ways with the many things that God does with the language and literature of the Bible. It is a matter of engaging the communicative economy of the triune God, whose word ministers and administers right covenantal relations and so brings about communion.

Divine Discourse. For those who continue to espouse the Scripture principle ("what Scripture says, God says"), the way forward is to move beyond the narrow identification of the Bible, and of God's word, with propositional revelation (e.g., the information conveyed). Divine discourse is the better rubric, and this is true for several reasons: (1) It overcomes the personal/propositional dichotomy inasmuch as discourse is both a "saying" and a "doing." (2) It corresponds to the biblical depiction of God as a communicative agent who does many things with words besides transmitting knowledge. (3) It better accounts for the diversity of Scripture itself, especially for the plurality of its literary forms. (4) It enriches the notion of canonical authority by insisting that the church attend not only to propositional content (e.g., revealed truths) but to all the things God is doing communicatively in Scripture to administer his covenant. (5) It encourages us to view the Bible as a means by which we relate personally to God and commune with God.

While interpreters may have other interests—for example, in reconstructing the historical context of the author or the history of the text's composition, or in examining the text's literary structure or rhetoric—those who have a theological interest will read to discern the divine discourse. As commissioned divine-human discourse, the Bible is not only authorized but, in providential fashion, authored by God. Illocutions—what one does in speaking—are the key discursive acts. The Bible is the word of God, not simply because of the information it conveys, but also because it is the means by which God promises, commands, warns, guides, and yes, reveals.

The fundamental principle in reading Scripture to hear the word of God is to assume that the human discourse is the divinely authorized and appropriated discourse unless there is good reason to do otherwise (Wolterstorff 204). Another important principle is to regard the Bible as one book whose parts are ultimately understood only in light of the larger unified whole. It follows that theological interpretation of Scripture will pay particular attention to the biblical texts in their canonical context.

Scripture in the Triune Communicative Economy: Illocutions Accomplished and Applied.* (p 854) The word of God is God in creative, communicative, and self-communicative action, doing things in and with the word written and the word made flesh. We need to distinguish the “internal” word of the Father from its “externalization” in the humanity of Jesus and in the spirited Scriptures. The eternal Son is the immanent Word that was with God and is God; Jesus and the Scriptures figure as “economic” words, the word of God as it enters created reality.

To be sure, the Bible is not a divine person, but a creaturely reality chosen by God to play a special role in the economy of the Word, an economy of triune communicative action. The theological significance of the Bible “is derived not from any of its immanent characteristics—its value as a historical source, its literary qualities, its religious insights, its influence on Western culture—but from the indispensable role assigned to it in the outward movement of the divine communicative action into the world” (Watson 61).

The Spirit is of special importance in the triune communicative economy of the Word. While the Father is the original speaker or locutor and the Son the decisive word-deed to whom the various biblical illocutions ultimately point, the Spirit is the “entelechy,” or power of completion, the “perlocutionary” efficacy and effect, the breath that ministers and applies the word to the listening/reading subject. The Word of God is thus a word incarnate (enfleshed), a word inscripturate (written), a word “incardiate” (taken to heart).

Trading on the key speech-act distinction between what one does in saying and the effect one brings about by saying, one could say both that the Bible, as comprised of divinely authorized illocutions, is the word of God, and that it becomes the word of God if and when the Spirit renders it perlocutionarily efficacious (Vanhoozer). Hence, one can agree with Barth that the being of the Bible in its richest sense—that of a full-blown divine speech act comprised of illocution and perlocution alike—is in its becoming (McCormack).

Conclusion. In its fullest sense the “Word of God” is something that God says, something that God does, and something that God is.

The Bible is the word of God in the sense that it is a field and form of divine communicative action. More precisely, it is a medium of divine illocutionary acts, the creaturely means that God has set aside (e.g., made “holy”) for his own use. Scripture therefore is the word of God, but this means more than divinely revealed information. For God does many things with words, not just transmit information. Scripture is the word of God because it is the chosen means through which the triune God presents Christ, ministers and administers the covenant of grace, and makes all things new through the ministry of the Word in the power of the Spirit.

Bibliography

Barr, J. The Bible in the Modern World. SCM, 1973; Barth, K. The Doctrine of the Word of God. Vol. I/2 of Church Dogmatics. T&T Clark, 1956; Barton, J. People of the Book? Westminster John Knox, 1988; Brueggemann, W. Theology of the OT. Fortress, 1997; Calvin, J. Institutes of the Christian Religion. Westminster, 1960; Fanning, B. “Word.” Pages 848848—53 53 in in New Dictionary of Biblical Theology New Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed ed. . TT. Alexander and B. Rosner. InterVarsity, 2000; Fretheim, T., and K. Froehlich. The Bible as Word of God in a Postmodern Age. Fortress, 1998; Goldingay, J. Models for Scripture. Eerdmans, 1994; Gundry, R. Jesus the Word according to John the Sectarian. Eerdmans, 2002; McCormack, B. “The Being of Holy Scripture Is in Becoming.” Pages 55–75 in Evangelicals and Scripture, ed. V. Bacote, L. Miguélez, and D. Okholm. InterVarsity, 2004; Packer, J. I. Fundamentalism and the Word of God. InterVarsity, 1958; Thiselton, A. “The New Hermeneutic.” Pages 308–33 in New Testament Interpretation, ed. I. H. Marshall. Eerdmans, 1977; Vanhoozer, K. “God’s Mighty Speech Acts.” Pages 127–58 in First Theology. InterVarsity, 2002; Warfield, B. B. Inspiration and Authority of the Bible. P&R, 1979; Watson, F. “The Bible.” Pages 57–71 in Cambridge Companion to Karl Barth, ed. J. Webster. Cambridge University Press, 2000; Webster, J. Holy Scripture. Cambridge University Press, 2003; Wolterstorff, N. Divine Discourse. Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Kevin J. Vanhoozer

Word Study See Concept; Etymology; Language, Linguistics; Utterance Meaning

Worldview

The English word “worldview” is a translation of the German Weltanschauung, a word first coined by Immanuel Kant. It has become a key term in Western intellectual discourse since the beginning of the nineteenth century, generally denoting a global outlook on life and the world—like philosophy in its scope, but without philosophy’s claims of universal rational justification. Since the end of the nineteenth century, it has also become common to speak of a specifically Christian worldview. This denotes an overall Christian view of things that is broader and less discipline-specific than “theology.” It also highlights aspects of Christianity where it provides an alternative to culture-transformative secular ideologies like Marxism and liberalism. As such, it has become an important category in Christian strategies of cultural engagement, both in the academy and (p 855) beyond. See Naugle, Worldview, for an extensive treatment of the term, its use, and its history.

As applied to biblical interpretation, “worldview” is significant in three principal ways. First, it fulfills a kind of deconstructive function in highlighting the foundational assumptions brought to the interpretative task. Much of classical historical criticism, for example, is based on a worldview that separates faith and reason, and postulates a closed universe that does not allow for miracles or prophetic prediction. In the tradition of avowedly Christian interpretation, by contrast, the undergirding worldview seeks to integrate faith and reason, and postulates an open universe. Examples of other significant worldview issues informing biblical interpretation are the questions of the determinacy of meaning, the hermeneutical role of gender and class, the relation of history and revelation, and the unity of Scripture. To a significant extent, worldview commitments on these and similar issues, whether openly acknowledged or not, shape the interpretative practices of biblical exegetes. In the interests of hermeneutical clarity and transparency, much is to be gained by foregrounding the worldview dimension of all interpretation, both in one’s own way of reading Scripture and in that of others.

Second, “worldview” has been used as a category for integrating the diverse aspects of first-century Judaism and first-century Christianity. Here we think especially of N. T. Wright in his The New Testament and the People of God and in subsequent writings. Wright defines worldview as being constituted by the answers to four basic questions: “Who are we?” “Where are we?” “What is wrong?” and “What is the solution?” For first-century Israel, the answers have to do with being the chosen people, residing in the Holy Land, having the wrong rulers, and looking to God to liberate them through his own kingship. For the church, the answers have to do with a modified form of the Jewish worldview, centered on the person of Jesus Christ. Who are we? We are a new group, but in continuity with Israel. Where are we? We are in the midst of a pagan world. What is wrong? Paganism still rules the world. What is the solution? The work of Jesus the Messiah, in his death and resurrection and coming again. By applying this kind of worldview analysis to the Judaism and Christianity of NT times, it is possible to make coherent sense of a wide array of symbols, practices, and writings that might otherwise appear diffuse and contradictory.

Finally, “worldview” can be used in a more specific sense to refer to differences among Christians with respect to their attitude to the “world” as a religious category. At bottom, this has to do with one’s paradigm for relating the classical Christian categories of “nature” and “grace.” “Nature” here is a shorthand formulation for everything involved in the “world” as God’s good but fallen creation (including human culture). “Grace” is a similar designation for everything involved with the redemption in Christ or the kingdom of God (including human culture). Within the tradition of historic Christian orthodoxy (defined in terms of adherence to the ecumenical creeds of the early church), it is possible to discern four such paradigms or worldviews. Three of these can be called dualistic, in that they conceive of grace as either opposing, supplementing, or flanking nature. In varying degrees, these Christian worldviews allow for a dichotomy or separation between a sacred and a secular realm of life. The fourth, in the tradition of Irenaeus, Augustine, and Calvin, construes grace as restoring nature, of entering into it as a medicine in order to reclaim its original health. For the interpretation of Scripture, worldview in this sense is especially important insofar as reason and faith (often aligned with “critical scholarship” and “theology”) are correlated with nature and grace in a dualistic way, thus providing a religious justification for the epistemological separation—à la Kant—of knowledge and belief. Alternatively, the more integral conception represented by the fourth worldview provides a religious critique of the Kantian legacy, and a spur to let faith play its role in the heart of the academic study of Scripture, from textual criticism to ideological criticism. In addition, an interpreter’s conception of the nature-grace relation is often projected onto the Scriptures themselves, so that, for example, “secular” proverbs are assigned to a different date from “religious” ones, or the entire category of Wisdom literature is considered secular as compared to prophetic and priestly literature. But it is doubtful whether “religion” or the service of God was something less than comprehensive for the Bible writers themselves. In fact, a strong case can be made for the view that the Scriptures themselves, taken together as a canonical whole, embody and promulgate a nondualistic worldview (see Wolters, Creation). If that is so, then in the dynamics of the hermeneutical circle, the Bible’s own worldview ought to inform the way it and its component parts are interpreted.

See also Grace

(p 856) Bibliography

Marshall, P. A., et al. Stained Glass. University Press of America, 1989; Naugle, D. Worldview. Eerdmans, 2002; Wolters, A. Creation Regained. Eerdmans, 1985; idem. "Nature and Grace in the Interpretation of Proverbs 31:10–31." CTJ 19 (1984): 153–66; Wright, N. T. The New Testament and the People of God. Fortress, 1992.

Albert Wolters

Worship

In common English usage, the word "worship" is typically used to refer to a public gathering of people to perform religious activities. For Christians, this will mean the regular assembly of the church, day by day or week by week, meeting to engage directly with the triune God of Jesus Christ, and with each other in God's name.

A theological interpretation of these occasions as referred to in Scripture, however, demands that we first consider a much wider and more general sense of "worship."

Worship in the Biblical Texts

The Whole-of-Life Setting. The importance of a broader context is evident in that the biblical words customarily translated "worship" (and associated terms) often have a reference far beyond what God's people are to do when they meet together, sometimes embracing all that humans are, say, think, and do before God. For example, in the OT the vocabulary of cultic worship can be picked up and used in a noncultic way to denote a lifestyle, flowing out of a heart humbled before God (Ps. 51:17), and there are frequent attacks on empty cultic acts divorced from appropriate behavior. In the NT, leitourgeō and its cognates, used of duties performed toward God, can be employed noncultically as well as cultically—of aid given to the poor (Rom. 15:27) or from one Christian to another (Phil. 2:25). The latreuō word group, connoting service, is not restricted to regular gatherings but can also be used of serving God in quite general ways (2 Tim. 1:3; Heb. 9:14). Paul uses sacrificial terminology ("present," "sacrifice," "holy," "acceptable") to speak of the people of God giving their entire lives to God as "reasonable worship" (Rom. 12:1; cf. Phil. 2:17; 4:18).

The Whole-of-Creation Setting. Interpretation of this "whole-life" worship demands taking account of even broader contexts still. In particular, it means the affirmation that creation as a whole offers worship and praise to God (Pss. 69:34; 98:7–8; 148). The vocation of human beings is not only to know this but also to gather and articulate creation's praise in God-dedicated lives. Humans are to "hallow God's name" as his representative vice-regents and image-bearers, exercising wise dominion over the earth (Gen. 1:26–31). Put differently, humans, as creatures, are called to render and reflect back to God, and to the world, the “holy love” God longs to share (Hart).

The tragedy of humankind issues from the catastrophe of misplaced worship, a refusal to hallow God’s name through lives of praise, a disobedient honoring of creature rather than Creator. Multiple calamities result (Rom. 1:18–32), affecting God’s chosen people as well as humanity at large (1:18–3:20). The whole creation, frustrated and groaning, longs for the liberation of the children of God, for Adam’s original calling as God’s faithful image-bearer to be restored (Rom. 8:19–23).

The Reversal of Idolatry in Christ. In Jesus Christ, this faithful one is provided, the true Israelite and child of God, the image-bearer par excellence (2 Cor. 4:4). Here the saving project initiated in Abraham’s faithful worship finds its climax. He is the true worshipper, from our side offering a life of unbroken, loving obedience to God, even to the point of death on a cross, where the root cause of humanity’s catastrophe is borne and taken away. In Christ, the idolatry of sinful humanity is reversed, sin defeated, and God’s name at last hallowed. Revelation 4 and 5 (echoing Gen. 1) offer a spectacular portrayal of this: the entire creation pours forth unending praise before God, and twenty-four elders (the people of God from old and new covenants) fall down and declare God the Creator as the only one worthy of worship. This corporate worship springs from, and is only possible because of, the victorious death of the Lamb, who occupies, alongside God, the center of the vision.

Christ is thus portrayed in the NT as the climactic fulfillment of all prior worship—in the narrow as well as in the wide sense. He belongs to the unique identity of the God of Israel (Bauckham), the God to whom exclusive reverence as Creator is due. He is the true temple, the “place” where God dwells in the midst of his people, and through whom worship of the Father in spirit and truth is possible (John 2:13–25; 4). He is both priest and sacrifice, affording access by his blood to the very throne room of God (Heb. 8:1–13; 10:1–10).

Only through Christ, then, by whose death and resurrection humanity is reconciled to the Father, (p 857) is genuine worship possible. Only through him can humanity’s original vocation as God’s image-bearer and vice-regent advance again, now with a redeeming dimension. Only through him can the self-destructive, downward-spiraling idolatry of Rom. 1 be reversed to generate the authentic worship of Rom. 12 (Thompson 124–27). Only through him can a reconciled community emerge that can truly honor God, the church of Jew and Gentile, slave and free, man and woman, embodying and reflecting back to God his own covenant love.

Worship as Trinitarian. In the NT, the repeated inclusion of Christ in the identity of God and an understanding of the Spirit as distinct divine agent (Fee) throw into question undifferentiated unitarianism, while at the same time being faithful to Jewish monotheism. The Fourth Gospel in particular opens up a vision in which the worship Jesus offers God is grounded in the eternal Son's loving communion with the Father. Here and elsewhere, the trinitarian "grammar" of worship begins to be evident (J. Torrance). The church's worship is united with the one perfect response of the incarnate Son, with his once-for-all offering of worship on the cross, and with his ongoing worship of the Father in our midst as High Priest (Heb. 4:14; cf. Rom. 8:34). This is possible through the same Spirit who enabled and undergirded Christ's own earthly self-offering. The Spirit is the enabler of worship, empowering God's people to be conformed to the image of his Son and cry "Abba, Father" (Rom. 8:15–17; Gal. 4:6–7; cf. Eph. 5:18–20). The dynamics of worship and salvation are thus seen to be inextricably intertwined (Hart).

Corporate Gatherings. There is every reason to understand the theological dynamic of "whole-life worship" as intrinsic to the regular, corporate and public gatherings of the church. To hold that mutual edification was the pivotal center of such gatherings in the NT (Richardson) is unconvincing (Thompson; Campbell). These occasions—in both OT and NT—are best interpreted as events when "whole-life" worship is concentrated in relation to God in a conscious and directed way, when the people of God are realigned with God and his purposes, and through this realignment, with each other. More fully, in Christian terms, the church faces and engages with God directly, being built up as a fellowship by sharing in the worship of Christ through the Spirit's indwelling. Thus, in the Spirit's communion with the Father, the church anticipates the end of creation, when the whole world will fulfill its telos in Christ and hallow the Father's name.

It is notoriously hard to determine the precise content of these assemblies in the NT period, not least because of their considerable diversity (Bradshaw). But the gatherings seem to have included praise of God and thanksgiving for all he had done, the reading of Sacred Scripture, speech in the name of God, mutual encouragement, prayer, singing, and (when required) baptism. Further, many would interpret the Lord's Supper as embodying worship's trinitarian dynamic in a particularly comprehensive way, both in the NT churches and today (Cocksworth, ch. 6). Through sharing as one people in bread and wine, the church is given to share in Christ, the risen High Priest. As the Spirit binds us to Christ in his offering of himself to the Father, the church is directed back to the once-made sacrifice of Christ, remembering his victory over sin and evil. In being drawn back, the church is also pointed forward: the risen and ascended Christ to whom the church is united is the one who is yet to come, offering now through his Spirit a foretaste of the final, messianic feast (1 Cor. 11:26; Luke 22:16).

The corporate assemblies, however, cannot be separated from worship in its wider sense. To insist that only the name of this God is to be hallowed is to refuse to give allegiance to any other god. And it is a commitment to honor this God (and no other) publicly—worship is potentially a political and costly act. To be realigned to God means being sent into the world. The church goes with Christ in the power of the Spirit, to fulfill the mission entrusted to him by the Father. It witnesses to Christ in word and deed, calls others to know him, serves all men and women in his name, and works unceasingly for the establishment of his love and justice. Regular corporate worship and ongoing mission are inseparable; worship generates mission just as mission drives the church to deeper worship.

Worship and Scriptural Interpretation

For the church, to read Scripture means interpreting it with a view to worship in its widest sense—the hallowing of God’s name through sharing in the life and mission of the triune God. Scripture is to inform, shape, and promote lives of faith and obedience in the world. Clearly, Scripture also shapes the church’s worship in the narrower sense, not only by providing instructive glimpses of the earliest Christian communities (p 858) as they gathered together, and some of the concerns that shaped such gatherings, but also and more centrally through its unique and unsurpassable testimony to the gospel. The reading and preaching of Scripture in worship (some would say, supremely in eucharistic worship) normatively “realign” the church to the gospel of the triune God.

In addition, many have argued that worship—in both wide and narrow senses—provides the primary and most appropriate hermeneutical “posture” and “situation” for the reading of Scripture (Fodor). To interpret Scripture faithfully entails an openness to being addressed and transformed through reading and hearing it. Much scholarship has been critical of a stance toward Scripture that aims to suspend commitment and defer obedience in the interests of “objective” truth. It is argued that to read Scripture aright is to be oriented to the God of whom Scripture speaks and who speaks through Scripture, and thus to be caught up in the trinitarian drama of God's self-communication, through which God claims his people and sustains their agency in the world.

A trinitarian account of worship in turn presses us to give an integrally theological account of scriptural language, centered in the true Worshipper, Jesus Christ. The adoption of fallen human words by the incarnate Son, their re-formation by him, their being-made-appropriate to God, is intrinsic to salvation, and thus to the establishment of true worship of the Father through him. Semantic adequacy is not a property of our language per se, but is realized in Christ alone, and given to the church inasmuch as it is incorporated into him by the Spirit, given to share in his eternal worship of the Father. Scripture arose within, embodies, and can be a vehicle of this doxological vehicle of this doxological, , dynamic transformation of languagedynamic transformation of language. .

“Doxological participation” and “semantic participation” through the language of Scripture are thus intrinsically related (A. Torrance).

See also Music, the Bible and

Bibliography

Bauckham, R. God Crucified. Paternoster, 1998; Bradshaw, P. The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship. SPCK, 1992; Campbell, A. “Once More: Is Worship Biblical?” Chm 110 (1995): 131–39; Cocksworth, C. Holy, Holy, Holy. Darton, Longman & Todd, 1997; Fee, G. “Paul and the Trinity.” Pages 49–72 in The Trinity, ed. S. Davis, D. Kendall, and G. O’Collins. Oxford University Press, 1999; Fodor, J. “Scripture Reading: Rehearsing Identity/Practicing Character.” In The Blackwell Companion to Christian Ethics, ed. S. Hauerwas and S. Wells. Oxford University Press, 2004; Hart, T. “Atonement and Worship.” Anvil 11 (1994): 203–14; Hurtado, L. At the Origins of Christian Worship. Eerdmans, 1999; Marshall, I. H. “How Far Did the Early Christians Worship God?” Chm 99 (1985): 216–29; Martin, R. “Worship.” Pages 982–91 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, ed. G. Hawthorne and R. Martin. InterVarsity, 1993; Peterson, D. Engaging with God. InterVarsity, 2002; Richardson, J. “Is Worship Biblical?” Chm 109 (1995): 197–218; Thompson, M. “Romans 12:1–2 and Paul’s Vision for Worship.” Pages 121–32 in A Vision for the Church, ed. M. Bockmuehl and M. Thompson. T&T Clark, 1997; Torrance, A. Persons in Communion. T&T Clark, 1999; Torrance, J. Worship, Community and the Triune God of Grace. Paternoster, 1996; Volf, M. “Worship as Adoration and Action: Reflections on a Christian Way of Being-in-the-World.” Pages 203–11 in Worship, ed. D. A. Carson. Baker, 1993.

Jeremy Begbie

Writing      See Deconstruction; Postmodernity and Biblical Interpretation

Y

(p 859)

Yale School

Never intended to describe a unified program and single hermeneutical method, the appellation “Yale School” usefully designates common themes and related approaches to biblical interpretation among various theologians at Yale University and Yale Divinity School. The immediate difficulty in employing the term is determining the roster of Yale School theologians and biblical scholars. At least, however, theologians Hans Frei, (p 860) George Lindbeck, and David Kelsey ought to be acknowledged as the key figures. The primary contribution made by these theologians of the Yale School is methodological, for although their seminal work provides noteworthy suggestions for theological exegesis, instances of the exegetical practice are few (although their colleague Brevard Childs is perhaps somewhat related). Briefly stated, the methodological proposals address three issues: first and foremost, the character of the text of Scripture; second, the role of the church in biblical interpretation; and third, the agency and activity of God in the church’s reading and interpretation of the Scripture.

Hans Frei (1922–88)

Hans Frei studied at Yale (B.D., 1945; Ph.D., 1956) under H. Richard Niebuhr and served in Yale’s department of Religious Studies from 1957 until his death in 1988.

Arguably, Frei may be considered the unintentional founder of the Yale School, given his groundbreaking and influential study of the history of biblical interpretation in modern theology (Eclipse) and numerous constructive essays addressing biblical interpretation. Frei’s basic contribution to theological exegesis is his insistence on reading Scripture as a realistic narrative centered on the particular story of Jesus Christ. Frei describes and seeks to correct the modern shift in the way the Bible is approached both in the church and in academic theology. Rather than beginning with contemporary human experience and determining the meaning of the biblical text on the basis of this experience, Frei insists that readers must begin with the particularity of the biblical text. They must focus interpretative investigation on its meaning, rather than on a search for general truths on the one hand or historical accuracy and reference on the other. In short, the text of Scripture must be interpreted on its own terms.

Frei resists allowing general theories of hermeneutics and anthropology to determine the shape and scope of biblical interpretation. He insists that the interpreter attend to the particularity of the biblical text as rendering the concrete and particular identity of Jesus Christ and, further, the identity of God. Frei's preference for the literal sense (the sensus literalis) of Scripture, as the consensus form of interpretation in the history of the church, corresponds to his insistence on the inseparability of meaning and truth. The meaning of the Gospel narratives, for example, cannot be separated from the formal structure of the narrative as narrative. The Gospel narratives, Frei maintains, are stories about Jesus, not something else. The Gospel narratives are unique testimonies to Jesus Christ and his unique relationship to God as the incarnate, crucified, and risen Savior. Given the uniqueness of Scripture and the uniqueness of the person to whom they witness, Frei contends that we cannot determine the meaningfulness and truthfulness of Scripture by extratextual categories and conceptual schemes. On this particular point, Frei concludes that the preoccupation of liberal biblical interpretation with uncovering universal moral lessons or insights, and that of conservative biblical interpretation with verifying historical accuracy, both distort the literal sense of Scripture. Although Frei acknowledges and highlights the importance of the church for biblical interpretation, his colleague George Lindbeck offers the most sustained and penetrating account of the communal context within which the biblical text is read and interpreted.

George Lindbeck (b. 1923)

George Lindbeck earned his B.D. (1946) and Ph.D. (1955) degrees from Yale. He taught in the areas of medieval philosophy, historical theology, and comparative doctrinal theology at Yale from 1952 until his retirement in 1993.

Lindbeck's contribution is an emphasis on the community of the church as the location for theological exegesis. While Lindbeck follows Frei in matters of the character of the biblical text, realistic narrative, canon, and precritical hermeneutics (which he dubbed “intratextuality”), his stress on the ecclesial context of biblical interpretation is his distinguishing feature. For Lindbeck, theological exegesis takes place by the community and in the community, leading to the constitution of the community as the church. By attending to the sensus fidelium, the consent of the faithful, the theological exegesis of the church seeks and achieves community-building consensus.

Lindbeck insists that the Bible is the community’s book, and that the reading and interpretation of this book is not to be reserved for a small elite class, whether academic or clerical. Consensus must be achieved through reading and interpretation that spans from bishops, priests, and academics to all faithful laity. His emphasis on the sensus fidelium coupled with his insistence on exegesis as constitutive of the church leads to pragmatic criteria for evaluating the church’s interpretation of Scripture. “What builds up the Church is what counts” (Lindbeck, “Scripture,” 221). The proof of any theological exegesis will not be theoretical but practical. According to Lindbeck, community-forming exegesis depends upon the existence of communities of interpretation “in which pastors, biblical scholars, theologians and laity together seek God’s guidance in the written word for their communal as well as individual lives” (Lindbeck, “Scripture,” 220). Lindbeck’s suggestions for theological exegesis risk being ecclesiocentric, with scant attention to divine agency and activity. Nevertheless, his colleague David Kelsey complements both Frei’s work on realistic narrative and Lindbeck’s emphasis on the communal character of biblical interpretation. Kelsey gives a constructive proposal for a properly theological account of the church’s exegesis.

David H. Kelsey (b. 1932)

Like Frei and Lindbeck before him, David Kelsey received both a B.D. (1958) and Ph.D. (1964) from Yale, and he has taught theology at Yale Divinity School since 1965.

Kelsey contributes to the Yale School emphasis on narrative, as seen in his depiction of the Bible as nonfiction narrative that renders the particular identity of Jesus Christ (Kelsey, Uses, 39–50). Additionally, he underscores the relationship between the Bible and church by describing how the Bible as Scripture functions within the common life of the church to shape and transform persons’ identities (Kelsey, Uses, 90–92). Further, though this aspect of his work has been overlooked and underdeveloped, Kelsey extends his descriptive (“functional”) analysis of how Scripture is in fact used by theologians and within the church by offering a constructive proposal for why Scripture ought to be used in the church. This proposal is Kelsey's distinct contribution, since it focuses the church's attention on the significance and necessity of God's action in theological exegesis. Kelsey suggests that attention be paid to God's use of the church's use of Scripture for the purpose of forming communal and individual identity. Here, a doctrine of Scripture is located within the doctrine of God. The authority of Scripture, which determines the shape of exegesis, is attributed specifically to the activity and agency of the Holy Spirit, who as sanctifier transforms and empowers human identities (Kelsey, "Bible," 396).

Conclusion

Focusing reflection on Scripture's use, the Yale School offers suggestive methodological guidance for theological exegesis centered on the Bible as a unique text, the church as a particular community, and the activity of God as a necessary component of the church's interpretation. The lasting significance of the Yale School has yet to be determined and will be decided by the actual practice of theological exegesis informed by these proposals.

See also Canonical Approach; Language-Game; Narrative Theology

Bibliography

Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. Yale University Press, 1974; idem. The Identity of Jesus Christ. Fortress, 1975; idem. Theology and Narrative, ed. G. Hunsinger and W. Placher. Oxford University Press, 1993; idem. Types of Christian Theology, ed. G. Hunsinger and W. Placher. Yale University Press, 1992; Hunsinger, G. "Postliberal Theology." Pages 42–57 in Cambridge Companion to Postmodern Theology, ed. K. Vanhoozer. Cambridge University Press, 2003; Kelsey, D. "The Bible and Christian Theology." JAAR 48 (1980): 385–402; idem. The Uses of Scripture in Recent Theology. Fortress, 1975. Reissued as Proving Doctrine. Trinity, 1999; Lindbeck, G. "Barth and Textuality(p 861)." ThTo 43 (1986): 361–76; idem. The Nature of Doctrine. Westminster, 1984; idem. "Postcritical Canonical Interpretation: Three Modes of Retrieval." Pages 26–51 in Theological Exegesis, ed. C. Seitz and K. Greene-McCreight. Eerdmans, 1999; idem. "Scripture, Consensus and Community." Pages 201–22 in The Church in a Postliberal Age, ed. J. Buckley. Eerdmans, 2003.

David Lauber

(p 862) Z

Zealots      See Jewish Context of the NT

Zechariah, Book of

The book of Zechariah has often been called one of the most difficult books of the Bible. With the exception of the middle section (chs. 7–8), which consists of a series of relatively straightforward ethical and religious exhortations, the book is obscure for a variety of reasons. The first section (chs. 1–6) is obscure because it consists largely of dreamlike visions accompanied by apparently unconnected oracles, and the third section (chs. 9–14) because it is composed almost entirely of a kaleidoscope of divine threats and promises regarding the future of Jerusalem, the nations, and the cosmos, but often having no clearly identifiable historical referents. On the other hand, the book has many messianic predictions, which in the light of the NT clearly find their fulfillment in Jesus Christ.

History of Interpretation

Much of patristic exegesis (e.g., the recently rediscovered commentary by Didymus the Blind) was characterized by an uninhibited allegorical interpretation. The great exception is Theodore of Mopsuestia, who espoused a more literal and historical reading. He and a number of Syriac commentators (notably Ephraim Syrus) interpreted the predictions of chapters 9–14 as referring primarily to the history of Israel before the coming of Christ, especially the time of the Maccabees. Jerome wrote an influential commentary on two levels: one “literal,” in which he drew on the Hebrew text and Jewish sources, and one “spiritual,” which was heavily dependent on Didymus’s allegorical commentary.

Jerome’s commentary overshadowed the interpretation of Zechariah in the Latin West until the time of the Reformation. Early modern interpretation is dominated by Protestant exegetes, and by a turn away from allegory toward a philological and historical understanding of the Hebrew text. Nevertheless, it was still characterized by great diversity, especially regarding the historical referents of chapters 9–14. Zechariah 14, for example, was taken to refer to the fortunes of God's people at the time of the Maccabees (Hugo Grotius), in the church age (Luther), in the period between the exile and Christ (Calvin), or in the end times and preceding the last judgment (Oecolampadius). Until the late eighteenth century, there nevertheless was broad agreement (also among those who, on the basis of Matt. 27:9, assigned part or all of Zech. 9–14 to Jeremiah) that the canonical book of Zechariah was a divinely inspired part of Holy Scripture, spoke the truth about future events, and portrayed the coming Messiah in terms that were fulfilled in Jesus Christ.

All of this changed with the rise of historical criticism, which began to exclude such confessional commitments from biblical scholarship, and to focus on questions of multiple authorship and dating. Zechariah 9–14, for example, was attributed to as many as four different authors, and assigned to dates ranging from the eighth to the second century BCE. The constituent parts of Zechariah were read, not with a view to hearing the voice of God, but to hearing a diversity of human voices, which each reflected its own milieu and agenda. Among confessional interpreters of Scripture in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the chief innovations have been the detailed defense of traditional positions (e.g., unity of authorship) against the results of mainline historical criticism, and the rise of a dispensationalist hermeneutic. The latter stressed literal fulfillment of Zechariah's prophecies and thus saw many of these as fulfilled, not in the church, but in a future separate group of converted Jews (Unger). Of significance in recent decades have been discussions of the category "apocalyptic" (variously said to apply to all, part, or none of Zechariah), the analysis of literary structure (leading to widely divergent results), and the softening of the classical dispensationalist hermeneutic (Merrill). A remarkable development in the tradition of historical criticism is the recent trend in dating chapters 9–14 ("Deutero-Zechariah"). After a time (most of the nineteenth (p 863) century) when these chapters were almost unanimously assigned a preexilic date, there had followed a time (from about 1880 to 1960) when almost all critical scholars assigned them to the Hellenistic period. Since then, a growing consensus has emerged that "Deutero-Zechariah" should be dated to the early postexilic period (Hanson; Meyers and Meyers; Petersen; Sweeney). Thus, there is currently widespread agreement that the entire book of Zechariah could have been written during the lifetime of the sixth-century prophet whose name it bears.

The Message of the Text

In coming to a theologically responsible reading of the message of Zechariah, we must take seriously its literary and canonical unity, its embeddedness in an authoritative canon that culminates in the Christ of the NT evangelists and apostles, and the historic Christian claim that Scripture in all its parts communicates the word of God to every generation of believers in their own situation.

Despite the obscurity and apparently jumbled character of much of Zechariah, there are broad themes that come through clearly. Among such themes we find the centrality of Jerusalem (“Jerusalem” and “Zion” occur a total of forty-seven times, quite evenly distributed throughout the book). It is to Jerusalem that Yahweh returns in mercy (1:16); it is Jerusalem that he chooses again (2:12), where his temple is to be rebuilt (1:16), and where he himself will take up residence (2:10). It is to Jerusalem that the remaining exiles are exhorted to return (9:12), and it is to Jerusalem that all nations will eventually come to serve Yahweh (14:16). Other themes are the future inclusion of all nations in Yahweh’s covenant (2:11 [15 MT]; 8:20–23), and the continuity with earlier prophecy (passim). As in so many of the prophets, overshadowing all these themes is the emphasis on the sovereignty of God in both judgment and grace. Terrible judgment is threatened both against the nations (1:21; 2:9; 6:7–8; 9:1–7; 12:3–4, 9; 14:3, 12) and against God’s own disobedient people (11:3, 6; 13:8–9; 14:1–2). Particularly chilling is the passage where God promises to send two shepherds to rule over his people, both of whom will eventually abandon and ruin them (11:4–16). But inexplicable grace is the dominant note. It is not only manifested in the present, as God returns in mercy to his people after the scourge of the exile (1:16–17), but also promised for the future (8:1–5, 12–13; 9:8, 16–17; 10:6). Especially prominent among these promises of grace are the predictions concerning a coming messianic figure called the Branch (3:8; 6:12–13), a figure later described in four remarkable passages (9:9–12; 12:1–2; 12:10–13:1; 13:7–9). These texts appear to echo and amplify Isaiah’s accounts of the Suffering Servant (Lamarque 125–47).

Zechariah and the Canon

Zechariah was one of the last OT prophets, and he wrote at a time when the OT canon was near completion. As a result, his prophecies are laced with allusions (sometimes direct quotations, as in 9:10b, citing Ps. 72:8) to the canonical writings that preceded him, especially the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. He clearly sees himself as standing in the tradition of what he calls “the former prophets” (NRSV: 1:4; 7:7, 12). At the same time he points forward to the NT fulfillment of the messianic prophecies that he has delivered, and to the ultimate restoration of all things. The NT often quotes Zechariah, especially with reference to the passion of Christ (Matt. 21:5; 26:31; 27:9–10; Mark 14:27; John 12:15; 19:37).

Theological Significance

In light of the foregoing, it is clear that the book of Zechariah is both deeply rooted in the preceding history of revelation, and is itself revelatory of the messianic and cosmic future. In it God promises to reclaim Jerusalem as the center of his empire, and to rebuild the temple as his royal dwelling. Meanwhile, he reassures his people that, through a long history marked by judgment and grace, the coming future Messiah will expand the significance of both Jerusalem and the temple into unprecedented and unimagined dimensions. In a word, Zechariah is all about the world-historical and indeed cosmic coming of the kingdom of God (Webb).

Bibliography

Baldwin, J. G. Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. TOTC. InterVarsity, 1972;
Hanson, P. D. The Dawn of Apocalyptic. Rev. ed. Fortress, 1979;
Lamarche, P. Zacharie IX–XIV. Lecoffre, 1961; Merrill, E. Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. Moody, 1994; Meyers, C. L., and E. M. Meyers. Zechariah 9–14. AB 25C. Doubleday, 1993; Petersen, D. L. Zechariah 9–14 and Malachi. OTL. Westminster John Knox, 1995; Sweeney, M. A., ed. Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. Vol. 2 of The Twelve Prophets, ed. D. W. Cotter. Berit Olam. Liturgical Press, 2000; Unger, M. Zechariah. Zondervan, 1963; Webb, B. G. The Message of Zechariah. InterVarsity, 2003; Wolters, A. “Confessional Criticism and the Night Visions of Zechariah.” Pages 90–117 in Renewing Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, (p 864)2000; idem. “Zechariah 14: A Dialogue with the History of Interpretation.” Mid-America Journal of Theology 13 (2002): 39–56; idem. “Zechariah 14 and Biblical Theology: Patristic and Contemporary Case Studies.” In Out of Egypt, ed. C. Bartholomew et al. SHS. Zondervan/Paternoster, 2004.

Albert Wolters

Zechariah, Book of

The concept of the day of Yahweh as a day of decisive punishment permeates the book of Zephaniah, which nevertheless ends on a note of joy for those who have come through the judgment. From the sweeping declaration at the beginning onward, Zephaniah is characterized by its use of comprehensive language for the scope of this judgment (see esp. 1:2–3, 18; 2:11; 3:8). This scope is reflected in twenty-three occurrences of the phrase “all/the whole” (the highest use of the phrase in relation to words in a book). Key issues in the interpretation of the book are the identification of the “people humble and lowly” (3:12 NRSV; cf. 2:3) and the historical setting with regard to Josiah's reforms in the seventh century.

The Argument of the Book

Zephaniah is often thought to follow a tripartite pattern, as also presumed for other prophetic books: punishment of Jerusalem and Judah (1:1–2:3), followed by punishment of other nations (2:4–3:8), and finally the promise of redemption for Jerusalem and the whole world (3:9–20). This pattern is understood to outline an eschatological sequence of events and is usually considered to be the product of a postexilic redaction. Yet the pattern does not do justice to the arrangement of Zephaniah (cf. Sweeney; Weigl). The book opens with an announcement of a comprehensive punitive action, which is subsequently focused on particular groups in Jerusalem (1:2–18). The call to Judah's humbled population in 2:1–3, to escape the judgment through submission to Yahweh, is supported by the observation that the Philistine cities will certainly be devastated (2:4; cf. 3:6–7). The words of doom over other nations are in two parts. The first is shot through with promises for the remnant (!) of Judah (2:5–11); the second is addressed against Assyria's claim to be the force that matters (2:12–15). The Assyrian defeat of the Cushite dynasty that governed Egypt until 663 BCE was in fact Yahweh's doing (2:12), and thus the word against Assyria (2:13–15) underlines the point that not Assyria but Yahweh is the force next to which there is no other.

Chapter 3 juxtaposes condemnation of Jerusalem's leadership with Yahweh's punitive intervention in other nations (3:1–7). Yet Jerusalem's punishment is only alluded to; it appears to be a consequence of Yahweh's universal decree to have the whole world experience his anger and be transformed to true worship (3:8–13). In isolation, the concluding section (3:14–20) could be read as a summons to rejoice after an oppressive enemy has been defeated. Yet in the context of the book, the victory is won not only against taunting Moabites and domineering Assyrians, but also against the oppressive regime of unbelief in Jerusalem itself. There is ambiguity within the book as to whom Judah regards as its king (cf. 1:5). The day of Yahweh is the day when Yahweh executes his decision and establishes himself as king (cf. 3:15).

Zephaniah within the Canon

There are numerous links between Zephaniah and other parts of the Bible, with literary influence going both ways (cf. Berlin 13–17, 117–24). The judgment in chapter 1 is reminiscent of the flood, survived by only a remnant. The claim on foreign land made in chapter 2 may be based on Gen. 10 and Deuteronomy as well as the contemporary political situation (cf. Berlin 117–24). The promise in 3:9 of unity and pure speech for the peoples may be considered a reversal of Gen. 11 (Berlin 14). What at first sight looks like complete annihilation is seen in the light of these links as a purifying judgment, which restores the original design. Zephaniah’s hope for the emergence of a spiritually humble remnant among those of a materially, or at least politically, humble background found an application among those left behind by the Babylonians (cf. 2 Kings 24:14; 25:12; Jer. 39:10; 40:7). It is part of the common biblical motif of God’s election of the disregarded. The restoration of Israel through a humble remnant was again enacted in Christ who, unlike Zephaniah’s poor, ensures this by taking the judgment upon himself. This enables the reversal of Babel’s confusion at Pentecost, and extends Yahweh worship beyond the confines of ethnic Israel; yet it affirms the division of humanity into the humble, who inherit the world, and the proud, upon whom the judgment remains. This judgment constitutes “the day of the LORD”—a time when God executes his decision about the fate of a community. Such a day is described in many other places as a cosmic upheaval, even when applied to specific historical events. Zephaniah’s universalistic language prepares the way for an (p 865) understanding of “the day of the LORD” (1:14) as an eschatological event, the day when God’s purposes for all peoples are executed.

Regarding the trappings of wealth and power, Zephaniah’s message is reflected in Jesus’ warning that it is hard for the rich to enter God’s kingdom (Mark 10:23 et par.). As elsewhere in Scripture, poverty is neither an ideal to aspire to nor a guarantee for favor with God, but wealth may well be a hindrance (cf. James 1:9–11; 2:5–6; 5:1–6).

Perspectives from the History of Interpretation

Luther thought that among the Minor Prophets, Zephaniah “makes the clearest prophecies about the kingdom of Christ” (319). He saw in the prophet someone who, like himself, proclaimed a divine message unacknowledged as such by the authorities. For Luther, Zephaniah ruthlessly rejects human righteousness and religion, preparing the kingdom of Christ. The gathering of kingdoms and nations he sees fulfilled through the spread of the gospel (355), which is a message declaring the outpouring of God’s wrath and calling for repentance (356). Zephaniah agrees with all of Scripture in its battle against “the powerful, the wise, and the holy” (326), and in addressing the promise to the “humble, oppressed, ... those who lack honor and wealth,” like Christ and Mary in the NT (339).

Key issues discussed in modern research are Zephaniah’s relationship to Josiah's reforms and the literary history of the book, which often affects the understanding of the "poor"—with the socioeconomic interpretation favored for an early date, a religious interpretation with a postexilic date. Along with the presumed tripartite structure (see above), talk of a remnant and return from exile are often thought to reflect a postexilic setting, but this need not be the case. The remnant motif is an integral aspect of the concept of inevitable disaster, and return from exile has been an issue ever since the deportation of northern Israelites by Assyria. Christensen's attempt to link 2:4–15 specifically to Josiah's policies has problems, but it is clear that Zephaniah's message fits with the aims of Josiah's reforms. Yet, with different emphases, it remains relevant for the postexilic community and beyond.

Zephaniah and the Church Today

The history of interpretation reminds us of the need to find our place within the drama that unfolds in Zephaniah, as well as the fact that the same message looks somewhat different from within different contexts, whether or not the book was reshaped after the exile. The church in the Western world is warned that being implicated in a syncretistic and oppressive regime makes it hard to escape the judgment of God, and that God may again choose to continue his history with those who are despised and rejected. The oppressed church is encouraged to trust God's ability to act on a large scale for those who belong to him who became poor so that we might become rich (2 Cor. 8:9). Together we are challenged to seek first God and his righteousness (2:3; cf. Matt. 6:33), and order all our doings accordingly.

Bibliography

Berlin, A. Zephaniah. AB 25A. Doubleday, 1994; Christensen, D. "Zephaniah 2:4–15: A Theological Basis for Josiah's Program of Political Expansion." CBQ 46 (1984): 669–82; Dietrich, W. "Die Kontexte des Zefanjabuches." Pages 19–37 in Der Tag wird kommen, ed. W. Dietrich and M. Schwantes. SBS 170. Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1996; Floyd, M. Minor Prophets: Part 2. FOTL 22. Eerdmans, 2000; Luther, M. "Lectures on Zephaniah." LWorks 18:317–64; Sweeney, M. "A Form-Critical Reassessment of the Book of Zephaniah." CBQ 53 (1991): 388–408; Veijola, T. "Zefanja und Joschija." Pages 9–18 in Der Tag wird kommen, ed. W. Dietrich and M. Schwantes. SBS 170. Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1996; Weigl, M. Zefanja und das "Israel der Armen". ÖBS 13. Österreichisches Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1994.

Thomas Renz

LIST OF ARTICLES BY CATEGORY

Biblical Texts

General

archaeology, 60–63
canonical approach, 100–102
commentary, 123–27
dictionaries and encyclopedias, 175–77 ideological criticism, 21, 314–16 intertextuality, 332–34 literary criticism, 457–60 narrative criticism, 528–31
poetry, 594–97
reader-response criticism, 658–61
redaction criticism, 663–66
rhetorical criticism, 689–92
social-scientific criticism, 753–55
source criticism, 761–63
textual criticism, 784–87

Old Testament

Amos, book of, 36–38
Chronicles, books of, 109–12 chronology and the OT, 114–15
Daniel, book of, 156–59
Deuteronomy, book of, 165–73
Ecclesiastes, book of, 182–85
Esther, book of, 194–96
Exodus, book of, 211–16
Ezekiel, book of, 218–23
Ezra, book of, 223–25 form criticism and the OT, 233–37
Genesis, book of, 246–52
Habakkuk, book of, 271–73
Haggai, book of, 273–74 history of Israel, 299–302
Hosea, book of, 307–10
Isaiah, book of, 336–44
Jeremiah, book of, 351–55
Job, book of, 384–89
Joel, book of, 389–91

Jonah, book of, 401–4
Joshua, book of, 404–8
Judges, book of, 410–15
Kings, books of, 422–25
Lamentations, book of, 426–28
law, 441–46
Leviticus, book of, 447–50
lexicons, OT, 451–52
Malachi, book of, 474–77
Micah, book of, 512–15
Nahum, book of, 527–28
Nehemiah, book of, 533–35
Numbers, book of, 538–41
Obadiah, book of, 542–44
oral tradition and the OT, 551–53
patriarchal narratives, 564–66
prophecy and prophets in the OT, 626–28
prophetic writings, 628–32
Proverbs, book of, 638–41
Psalms, book of, 645–52
Ruth, book of, 704–8
Samuel, books of, 717–20
Song of Songs, 758–61
Wisdom Literature, 847–50
Zechariah, book of, 862–64
Zephaniah, book of, 864–65

New Testament

Acts, book of, 27–31
chronology and the NT, 112–14
Colossians, book of, 119–23
1 Corinthians, book of, 133–38
2 Corinthians, book of, 138–41
Ephesians, book of, 186–91 form criticism and the NT, 232–33
Galatians, book of, 238–42
Gnosticism, 256–59
Gospels, 264–68
Hebrews, book of, 274–81 infancy narratives, 325–27
James, book of, 347–51
Jesus, quest for the historical, 355–58
Jesus and Scripture, 358–63
Johannine Epistles, 391–94
John, book of, 394–401
Jude, book of, 408–10
lexicons, NT, 450–51
Luke, book of, 467–71
Mark, book of, 480–85
Matthew, book of, 486–92

Nag Hammadi, 526
oral tradition and the NT, 549–51
parables, 559–62
Passion Narratives, 562–64
Pauline Epistles, 571–80
1 Peter, book of, 581–83
2 Peter, book of, 583–86
Philemon, book of, 586–88
Philippians, book of, 588–90
prophecy and prophets in the NT, 624–26
resurrection narratives, 675–76
Revelation, book of, 680–87
Roman Empire, 695–96
Romans, book of, 697–703
Sermon on the Mount, 737–39
1 Thessalonians, book of, 793–96
2 Thessalonians, book of, 796–99
1 Timothy, book of, 801–4
2 Timothy, book of, 804–6
Titus, book of, 806–9

Christianity and Judaism

anti-Semitism, 49–51 Apocrypha, 53–57
Dead Sea Scrolls, 159–63 exile and restoration, 206–11
exodus/new exodus, 216–18
Jewish-Christian dialogue, 371–73
Jewish context of the NT, 373–80
Jewish exegesis, 380–84
Messiah/messianism, 503–6 relationship between the Testaments, 666–72
targum, 780–81

Doctrines and Themes

angels, doctrine of, 45–48
anthropomorphism, 48–49
apologetics, 57–58
apostasy, 58–60
ascension, 65–68 assurance, 71–72 atonement, 72–76
baptism, 81–82 biblical theology, 21, 84–90 calling/vocation, 94–96
canon, 97–100
church, doctrine of the, 21–22, 115–19 community, interpretative, 128–29 covenant, 141–43 creation, 144–46 creed, 146–47 doctrine, 19, 177–80 earth/land, 181–82 ethics, 196–200 faith, 226–28

God, doctrine of, 21–22, 259–63 gospel, 263–64
grace, 268–70
historical theology, 293–95
Holy Spirit, doctrine of the, 302–5 hope, 305–7 human being, doctrine of, 310–13 illumination, 316–18
image of God, 318–19 incarnation, 323–25
Israel, 344–46
Jesus Christ, doctrine of, 363–71
justice, 415–16
justification by faith, 416–19
kingdom of God, 420–22
last things, doctrine of, 438–41
Lord’s Supper, 464–65
love, 465–67
male and female, 477–79
Mary, 485–86
miracle, 515–17
monotheism, 519–21
new creation, 536–37
original sin, 553–54
political theology, 597–600
powers and principalities, 609–12
practical theology, 22, 612–14
prayer, 616–17
providence, 641–45
racism, 657–58
resurrection of the dead, 676–78
revelation, 678–80
rule of faith, 703–4
sacrament, 709–11
salvation, doctrine of, 711–14
salvation, history of, 714–17
sanctification, 720–22
Scripture, authority of, 724–27
Scripture, clarity of, 727–30
Scripture, sufficiency of, 730–31
Scripture, unity of, 731–34
sexuality, 739–48
sin, doctrine of, 748–51

slavery, 751–53
spirituality/spiritual formation, 766–69
spiritual sense, 769–72
systematic theology, 773–79
temple, 781–82
tradition, 809–12
Trinity, 815–18
truth, 818–22
typology, 823–27
violence, 834–37
virtue, 837–39
wisdom, 844–47
Word of God, 850–54
worship, 856–58

Hermeneutics

Historical

ancient Near Eastern background studies, 40–45 culture and hermeneutics, 150–55
genealogy, 242–46
geography, 253–56
history, 295–99
Pseudepigrapha, 652–53

Literary

allegory, 34–36
apocalyptic, 51–53
biography, 90–93
context, 19–20, 130–33
etymology, 200–202
formalism, 230–32
genre, 252–53 hero story, 287–90 imagery, 319–21
imagination, 321–23 interpretation, history of, 330–31 irony, 334–36
language, grammar and syntax, 428–31
language, linguistics, 431–35
poststructuralism, 607–9
reading, 661–63
rhetoric, 687–89
semiotics, 734–37
structuralism, 772–73
text/textuality, 782–84
utterance meaning, 828–33

Philosophical

analogy, 38–40

authorial discourse interpretation, 78–80 concept, 129–30 critical realism, 147–50
deconstruction, 163–65
epistemology, 191–94
exegesis, 20, 203–6 hermeneutical circle, 281–82
hermeneutics, 283–87
historical criticism, 290–93 intention/intentional fallacy, 327–30
language-game, 435–37
literal sense, 455–56
logic, 462–64
meaning, 492–99
metanarrative, 506–7 metaphor, 507–10
method, 510–12
model, 517–19
objectivity, 544–46
onto-theology, 546–49
philosophy, 591–94
proof text, 622–24
proposition, 632–33
religion, 672–75
speech-act theory, 763–66
warrant, 840–41
worldview, 854–56

Interpreters and Interpretative Communities

African biblical interpretation, 31–34 art, the Bible and, 63–65
Asian biblical interpretation, 68–71
Augustine, 76–78
Barth, Karl, 82–84
Bonhoeffer, Dietrich, 93
Calvin, John, 96–97
Catholic biblical interpretation, 102–6 charismatic biblical interpretation, 106–9
dialogism, 173–75
Enlightenment, 185–86
feminist biblical interpretation, 228–30 liberal biblical interpretation, 453–54 liberation theologies and hermeneutics, 454–55
liturgy, 460–62
Luther, Martin, 471–73
medieval biblical interpretation, 499–503
music, the Bible and, 521–24
mysticism, Christian, 524–25
narrative theology, 531–33

Orthodox biblical interpretation, 554–58
patristic biblical interpretation, 566–71
postmodernity and biblical interpretation, 20–21, 600–607
pragmatism, 614–16
preaching, use of the Bible in, 617–21
Princeton School, 621–22
Protestant biblical interpretation, 633–38
psychological interpretation, 653–55
Ricoeur, Paul, 692–95
science, the Bible and, 722–24
societies, scholarly, 755–58
theological hermeneutics, contemporary, 19–25, 787–93
Thomas Aquinas, 799–801
translation, 812–14
Tübingen School, 822–23
Western literature, the Bible and, 841–44
Yale School, 859–61

TOPICAL INDEX

This index is an alphabetical listing of all topics discussed in the Dictionary for Theological Interpretation of the Bible. Each topic is followed by a list of all articles that provide substantive discussion of the topic. Boldface type identifies topics that are also titles of dictionary articles, which are accompanied by the relevant page numbers.

Acts, book of, 27–31
adultery. See sexuality aesthetics. See art, the Bible and; formalism; literary criticism; music, the Bible and; Western literature, the Bible and African biblical interpretation, 31–34. See also Augustine; culture and hermeneutics; liberation theologies and hermeneutics
Alexandrian interpretation. See allegory; hermeneutics; Jesus Christ, doctrine of; literal sense; patristic biblical interpretation allegory, 34–36. See also Jewish exegesis; medieval biblical interpretation; parables; patristic biblical interpretation; Scripture, unity of; Song of Songs; spiritual sense; typology allusion. See intertextuality; relationship between the Testaments
Amos, book of, 36–38. See also prophecy and prophets in the OT; rhetorical criticism

anagogical sense. See medieval biblical interpretation; spiritual sense analogy, 38–40. See also anthropomorphism; God, doctrine of analogy of faith. See Protestant biblical interpretation; rule of faith; Scripture, unity of analogy of Scripture. See Protestant biblical interpretation analytic philosophy. See philosophy ancient Near Eastern background studies, 40–45. See also archaeology; Genesis, book of; prophecy and prophets in the OT; worldview angel of the Lord. See angels, doctrine of angels, doctrine of, 45–48. See also powers and principalities anthropology, Christian. See human being, doctrine of anthropomorphism, 48–49. See also analogy; revelation

anti-Judaism. See anti-Semitism

Antiochene interpretation. See hermeneutics; Jesus Christ, doctrine of; literal sense; patristic biblical interpretation; typology anti-Semitism, 49–51. See also ideological criticism; Israel; Jewish-Christian dialogue; Jonah, book of apocalyptic, 51–53. See also 2 Corinthians, book of; Daniel, book of; hope; last things, doctrine of; Pauline Epistles; Revelation, book of;

salvation, doctrine of

Apocrypha, 53–57. See also relationship between the Testaments

Apollinarianism. See Jesus Christ, doctrine of

apologetics, 57–58

apostasy, 58–60. See also assurance; covenant; Hebrews, book of; 2 Peter, book of

Aquinas, St. Thomas. See Thomas Aquinas

archaeology, 60–63

argument. See rhetoric; rhetorical criticism; utterance meaning

Arianism. See Jesus Christ, doctrine of art, the Bible and, 63–65. See also literary criticism; Western literature, the Bible and ascension, 65–68

Asian biblical interpretation, 68–71. See also culture and hermeneutics assurance, 71–72. See also apostasy; covenant

Assyriology. See ancient Near Eastern background studies

atlas. See geography atonement, 72–76. See also Apocrypha; metaphor; Passion Narratives;

Pauline Epistles; sin, doctrine of; violence

Augustine, 76–78. See also Galatians, book of; human being, doctrine of; illumination; love; medieval biblical interpretation; patristic biblical interpretation; Pauline Epistles; providence; Romans, book of;
Scripture, clarity of; violence

authorial discourse interpretation, 78–80. See also intention/intentional fallacy; meaning; reader-response criticism; revelation; speech-act theory;
theological hermeneutics, contemporary; utterance meaning;
violence; Word of God

authorial intention. See authorial discourse interpretation; intention/intentional fallacy authority, scriptural. See Scripture, authority of authorship. See authorial discourse interpretation; Pseudepigrapha

Bakhtin, Mikhail. See dialogism

Balch, D. L. See 1 Peter, book of baptism, 81–82. See also sacrament

Barr, James. See biblical theology; concept; etymology; Word of God

Barth, Karl, 82–84. See also historical criticism; Jesus Christ, doctrine of; Pauline Epistles; postmodernity and biblical interpretation; providence; Romans, book of; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; truth; Word of God

Barton, J. See Word of God

Baur, F. C. See Tübingen School

Bayle, Pierre. See Enlightenment

Beatitudes. See Sermon on the Mount beauty. See art, the Bible and; literary criticism being. See onto-theology

Bevans, Stephen. See culture and hermeneutics biblical criticism. See form criticism and the NT; form criticism and the OT; historical criticism; ideological criticism; literary criticism; narrative criticism; reader-response criticism; redaction criticism; rhetorical criticism; social-scientific criticism; source criticism; textual criticism biblical theology, 21, 84–90. See also commentary; intertextuality; relationship between the Testaments; Scripture, unity of; systematic theology; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; Yale School

Biblical Theology Movement (BTM), 86–88

biblicism. See historical theology bibliolatry. See God, doctrine of biography, 90–93. See also Gospels; hero story; infancy narratives; Jesus, quest for the historical; Passion Narratives; patriarchal narratives; resurrection narratives body. See human being, doctrine of Boff, Leonardo. See liberation theologies and hermeneutics

Bonhoeffer, Dietrich, 93

Brown, Raymond. See infancy narratives

Bultmann, Rudolf. See form criticism and the NT; hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics; Pauline Epistles; theological hermeneutics, contemporary calling/vocation, 94–96. See also God, doctrine of; 1 Thessalonians, book of; 1 Timothy, book of; violence

Calvin, John, 96–97. See also allegory; calling/vocation; Galatians, book of; genealogy; James, book of; Jesus Christ, doctrine of; justification by faith; sacrament; Scripture, authority of; Scripture, clarity of canon, 97–100. See also Gospels; Jude, book of; preaching, use of the Bible in; reader-response criticism; relationship between the Testaments; Scripture, unity of; tradition canonical approach, 100–102. See also angels, doctrine of; chronology and the NT; narrative theology; relationship between the Testaments; rule of faith; Scripture, unity of; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; Yale School canonical-linguistic theology. See culture and hermeneutics canon within a canon. See canon; Scripture, unity of Catholic biblical interpretation, 102–6. See also Scripture, clarity of; spiritual sense; tradition catholic reading. See canonical approach; rule of faith causality. See biblical theology

celibacy. See sexuality

Cerinthus. See Johannine Epistles

Chalcedon, definition of. See Jesus Christ, doctrine of charismatic biblical interpretation, 106–9

Childs, Brevard. See biblical theology; canonical approach; Jewish-Christian dialogue

Christian interpretation of the OT. See anti-Semitism; relationship between the Testaments; rule of faith; Scripture, unity of Christian life. See ethics

Christus Victor. See atonement; powers and principalities

Chronicles, books of, 109–12

chronology and the NT, 112–14

chronology and the OT, 114–15. See also history of Israel church, doctrine of the, 21–22, 115–19. See also Catholic biblical interpretation; community, interpretative; Ephesians, book of; Israel; liberation theologies and hermeneutics; Luke, book of; Orthodox biblical interpretation; Philemon, book of; powers and principalities; practical theology; prophecy and prophets in the NT; Protestant biblical interpretation; Romans, book of; salvation, history of; sanctification; Scripture, authority of; systematic theology; 1 Timothy, book of; tradition; worship; Yale School circle, hermeneutic. See hermeneutical circle clarity, scriptural. See Scripture, clarity of clean/unclean. See Leviticus, book of Colossians, book of, 119–23. See also powers and principalities; Roman Empire commentary, 123–27. See also biblical theology; Calvin, John; concept; dictionaries and encyclopedias; Thomas Aquinas community, interpretative, 128–29. See also African biblical interpretation; Asian biblical interpretation; church, doctrine of the; commentary; context; culture and hermeneutics; meaning; reader-response criticism; reading composition, art of. See rhetorical criticism composition criticism. See redaction criticism concept, 129–30. See also biblical theology; etymology; systematic theology context, 19–20, 130–33. See also archaeology; canonical approach; chronology and the NT; culture and hermeneutics; geography; intertextuality; liberation theologies and hermeneutics; meaning; metaphor; preaching, use of the Bible in; Protestant biblical interpretation; reader-response criticism; utterance meaning contextual view. See tradition continental philosophy. See philosophy continuity (between the Testaments). See relationship between the Testaments continuum, causal. See biblical theology

1 Corinthians, book of, 133–38

2 Corinthians, book of, 138–41

cotext. See context; utterance meaning covenant, 141–43. See also Deuteronomy, book of; ethics; Ezekiel, book of; Haggai, book of; Hebrews, book of; history of Israel; Hosea, book of; Israel; Jeremiah, book of; Jewish context of the NT; Judges, book of; last things, doctrine of; law; Samuel, books of; truth covenant theology. See last things, doctrine of creation, 144–46. See also Colossians, book of; exodus/new exodus; Genesis, book of; God, doctrine of; Job, book of; John, book of; last things, doctrine of; new creation; providence; Psalms, book of; racism; science, the Bible and; sexuality; Song of Songs; Wisdom Literature; worldview; worship creed, 146–47. See also doctrine; incarnation; rule of faith; systematic theology; tradition; Trinity critical realism, 147–50. See also epistemology; objectivity; science, the Bible and; speech-act theory criticism, biblical. See form criticism and the NT; form criticism and the OT; historical criticism; ideological criticism; literary criticism; narrative criticism; reader-response criticism; redaction criticism; rhetorical criticism; social-scientific criticism; source criticism; textual criticism

Cross, F. L. See 1 Peter, book of cross, the. See 1 Corinthians, book of; Luke, book of; Passion Narratives; Pauline Epistles; violence cross-cultural interpretation. See culture and hermeneutics cross-textual hermeneutics. See Asian biblical interpretation cultural-linguistic view. See culture and hermeneutics; language-game; narrative theology; Yale School cultural studies. See culture and hermeneutics culture and hermeneutics, 150–55. See also African biblical interpretation; Asian biblical interpretation; community, interpretative; concept; context; creation; ideological criticism; literary criticism; meaning; objectivity; postmodernity and biblical interpretation; wisdom custom. See ancient Near Eastern background studies

Dalton, W. J. See 1 Peter, book of

Daniel, book of, 156–59. See also apocalyptic

David. See Messiah/messianism day of the Lord. See last things, doctrine of; Obadiah, book of; salvation, doctrine of; 2 Thessalonians, book of; Zephaniah, book of

Dead Sea Scrolls, 159–63

death. See creation; Genesis, book of; last things, doctrine of; original sin; sin, doctrine of Decalogue. See ethics; law

deconstruction, 163–65. See also postmodernity and biblical interpretation

Deism. See Jesus, quest for the historical demons. See angels, doctrine of; powers and principalities demythologization. See hermeneutics; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; Western literature, the Bible and Derrida, Jacques. See deconstruction; postmodernity and biblical interpretation; poststructuralism

Descartes, René. See epistemology determinate meaning. See meaning; theological hermeneutics, contemporary Deuteronomistic History. See Deuteronomy, book of; history of Israel
Deuteronomy, book of, 165–73
Dewey, John. See pragmatism diachronic approach. See etymology dialectic. See dialogism
dialogism, 173–75
Dibelius, M. See form criticism and the NT; James, book of dictionaries and encyclopedias, 175–77. See also commentary différance. See deconstruction; postmodernity and biblical interpretation;
poststructuralism discontinuity (between the Testaments). See relationship between the Testaments discourse interpretation. See authorial discourse interpretation dispensation(alism). See Daniel, book of; last things, doctrine of; Revelation, book of; salvation, history of diversity. See culture and hermeneutics; feminist biblical interpretation; racism; Scripture, unity of divorce. See Malachi, book of; sexuality Docetism. See Jesus Christ, doctrine of doctrine, 19, 177–80. See also creed; historical theology; Mary; Matthew, book of; original sin; rule of faith; systematic theology; Titus, book of;
tradition
dogma. See creed; doctrine; rule of faith; systematic theology; tradition double agency discourse. See authorial discourse interpretation; Word of God
Dulles, Avery. See faith; model dynamic equivalence. See translation earth/land, 181–82. See also Joshua, book of; Judges, book of Ebionism. See Jesus Christ, doctrine of ecclesial reading. See canonical approach; rule of faith Ecclesiastes, book of, 182–85
echo. See intertextuality; relationship between the Testaments effectual calling. See calling/vocation Egyptology. See ancient Near Eastern background studies eisegesis. See exegesis election. See apostasy; calling/vocation; church, doctrine of the; covenant;
Israel; violence
Elijah. See Kings, books of Elliott, J. H. See 1 Peter, book of encyclopedias. See dictionaries and encyclopedias Endzeit. See exile and restoration Enlightenment, 185–86. See also genealogy; historical criticism; history;
providence
Ephesians, book of, 186–91. See also Colossians, book of; powers and principalities epistemology, 191–94. See also critical realism; faith; method; objectivity; philosophy; truth; warrant; wisdom

Essenes. See Dead Sea Scrolls; Jewish context of the NT

Esther, book of, 194–96

ethics, 196–200. See also Colossians, book of; 1 Corinthians, book of; culture and hermeneutics; Ephesians, book of; Jude, book of; law; patristic biblical interpretation; Sermon on the Mount; sexuality; 1 Thessalonians, book of; 2 Thessalonians, book of; 1 Timothy, book of; 2 Timothy, book of; Titus, book of; typology; virtue; wisdom; worship etymological fallacy. See etymology

etymology, 200–202

Eucharist. See Lord's Supper

Eutychnianism. See Jesus Christ, doctrine of evangelical biblical interpretation. See charismatic biblical interpretation; Princeton School; Protestant biblical interpretation evil. See God, doctrine of; original sin; powers and principalities; sin, doctrine of; violence exegesis, 20, 203–6. See also canonical approach; commentary; context; etymology; genre; hermeneutics; historical theology; language, grammar and syntax; meaning; Orthodox biblical interpretation; sanctification; textual criticism; translation exhortation. See Hebrews, book of exile and restoration, 206–11. See also Chronicles, books of; exodus/new exodus; Ezekiel, book of; Ezra, book of; Haggai, book of; history of Israel; Jeremiah, book of; Jewish context of the NT; Lamentations, book of; Nehemiah, book of Exodus, book of, 211–16. See also exodus/new exodus exodus/new exodus, 216–18. See also history of Israel; liberation theologies and hermeneutics; Mark, book of explanation and understanding. See hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics expository preaching. See preaching, use of the Bible in externalism. See warrant

Ezekiel, book of, 218–23

Ezra, book of, 223–25. See also Nehemiah, book of faith, 226–28. See also baptism; Dead Sea Scrolls; gospel; hero story; Job, book of; justification by faith; Psalms, book of; rule of faith; 1 Thessalonians, book of; virtue female. See male and female feminist biblical interpretation, 228–30. See also ideological criticism; liberation theologies and hermeneutics; male and female figural reading. See allegory; literal sense; typology

figure of speech. See imagery; metaphor; poetry

Fish, Stanley. See community, interpretative; pragmatism; reader-response criticism folklore. See hero story; oral tradition and the NT; oral tradition and the OT

folly. See Wisdom Literature

formal equivalence. See translation

formalism, 230–32. See also deconstruction; intention/intentional fallacy; poststructuralism; psychological interpretation; reader-response criticism form criticism and the NT, 232–33. See also genre form criticism and the OT, 233–37. See also genre; prophetic writings

fornication. See sexuality
Forsyth, P. T. See doctrine
Foucault, Michel. See poststructuralism foundationalism. See epistemology; method fourfold sense. See literal sense; medieval biblical interpretation; spiritual sense fourth philosophy. See Jewish context of the NT
Fowl, Stephen. See theological hermeneutics, contemporary; virtue Frei, Hans. See narrative theology; typology; Yale School fulfillment. See prophecy and prophets in the NT; prophecy and prophets in the OT; relationship between the Testaments; salvation, history of functionalism. See language, grammar and syntax; Scripture, authority of; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; Yale School
fundamentalism. See Princeton School
Gabler, J. P. See biblical theology
Gadamer, Hans-Georg. See hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics; postmodernity and biblical interpretation; Ricoeur, Paul Galatians, book of, 238–42. See also justification by faith; Pauline Epistles
genealogy, 242–46 general revelation. See creation; ethics; philosophy; revelation; science, the Bible and Genesis, book of, 246–52. See also hero story; patriarchal narratives; sexuality genre, 252–53. See also form criticism and the NT; form criticism and the OT; Gospels; Lamentations, book of; literary criticism; poetry Gentiles, inclusion of. See creation; Pauline Epistles; racism; Ruth, book of; sexuality geography, 253–56. See also earth/land gloss. See hermeneutics; medieval biblical interpretation
Gnosticism, 256–59. See also Nag Hammadi; patristic biblical interpretation God, attributes of. See God, doctrine of
God, doctrine of, 21–22, 259–63. See also analogy; Ephesians, book of; John, book of; kingdom of God; metaphor; monotheism; onto-theology; providence; relationship between the Testaments; Revelation, book of; salvation, history of; Scripture, sufficiency of; systematic theology; Trinity
God, providence of. See providence
Goppelt, L. See 1 Peter, book of Gore, Charles. See doctrine gospel, 263–64. See also Roman Empire; 2 Timothy, book of; Titus, book of Gospels, 264–68. See also biography; canon; form criticism and the NT; Jesus, quest for the historical; Messiah/messianism; miracle; redaction criticism; salvation, history of; source criticism government. See political theology grace, 268–70. See also God, doctrine of; Jonah, book of; law; Pauline Epistles; Romans, book of grammar. See language, grammar and syntax grammatology. See deconstruction

Gregory of Nyssa. See human being, doctrine of Gruen, Erich. See exile and restoration

Gunkel, Hermann. See form criticism and the NT; form criticism and the OT; oral tradition and the OT

Gutiérrez, Gustavo. See liberation theologies and hermeneutics

Habakkuk, book of, 271–73

Haggai, book of, 273–74

Harnack, Adolf von. See doctrine; historical theology

Hasmonean dynasty. See Jewish context of the NT heaven. See last things, doctrine of Hebrews, book of, 274–81

Heidegger, Martin. See hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics; onto-theology hell. See last things, doctrine of

Hellenism. See Jewish context of the NT; Roman Empire

hermeneutical circle, 281–82. See also dialogism; hermeneutics; virtue; wisdom hermeneutics, 283–87. See also allegory; anthropomorphism; authorial discourse interpretation; creation; deconstruction; exegesis; Gnosticism; hermeneutical circle; literal sense; music, the Bible and; onto-theology; Orthodox biblical interpretation; postmodernity and biblical interpretation; reader-response criticism; spiritual sense; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; typology hermeneutics of suspicion. See grace; historical criticism; ideological criticism; psychological interpretation hero story, 287–90. See also biography

Hillel. See Jewish context of the NT

Hirsch, E. D., Jr. See intention/intentional fallacy historical criticism, 290–93. See also biblical theology; canonical approach; Protestant biblical interpretation historical theology, 293–95. See also tradition historicism. See history

historiography. See history history, 295–99. See also historical criticism; Passion Narratives; salvation, history of history of effects. See historical theology; interpretation, history of; tradition history of Israel, 299–302. See also Israel; salvation, history of history of religions school. See religion

Hittitology. See ancient Near Eastern background studies

holiness. See Leviticus, book of; sanctification

Holocaust. See anti-Semitism; Jewish-Christian dialogue; violence

Holy Spirit, doctrine of the, 302–5. See also assurance; charismatic biblical interpretation; church, doctrine of the; community, interpretative; Ephesians, book of; Galatians, book of; illumination; Orthodox biblical interpretation; prophecy and prophets in the NT; spirituality/spiritual formation; 2 Timothy, book of homiletics. See preaching, use of the Bible in homosexuality. See sexuality hope, 305–7. See also last things, doctrine of; Romans, book of; 1 Thessalonians, book of; virtue

Hosea, book of, 307–10

human being, doctrine of, 310–13. See also analogy; covenant; Galatians, book of; image of God; infancy narratives; Job, book of; Luke, book of; male and female; original sin; providence; psychological interpretation; sin, doctrine of; systematic theology

Hume, David. See epistemology hymn. See music, the Bible and; poetry; Psalms, book of ideality. See deconstruction; meaning ideological criticism, 21, 314–16. See also African biblical interpretation; Asian biblical interpretation; canon; feminist biblical interpretation; liberation theologies and hermeneutics; racism; Scripture, unity of; slavery ideology. See ideological criticism idolatry. See Colossians, book of; Hosea, book of; worship illocutionary act. See authorial discourse interpretation; meaning; speech-act theory illumination, 316–18. See also epistemology; Gnosticism; Holy Spirit, doctrine of the; typology image of God, 318–19. See also human being, doctrine of; male and female; sexuality imagery, 319–21. See also hero story; metaphor; music, the Bible and imagination, 321–23

incarnation, 323–25. See also Jesus Christ, doctrine of; Johannine Epistles; literary criticism; social-scientific criticism incest. See sexuality indeterminacy. See meaning; semiotics inerrancy, scriptural. See Scripture, authority of; truth infallibility, scriptural. See Scripture, authority of; truth infancy narratives, 325–27. See also Passion Narratives; patriarchal narratives; resurrection narratives inner-biblical interpretation. See intertextuality inspiration, scriptural. See Scripture, authority of intention/intentional fallacy, 327–30. See also authorial discourse interpretation; canonical approach; formalism; meaning interlocutionary act. See speech-act theory internalism. See warrant interpretation. See hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics interpretation, history of, 330–31. See also literal sense; spiritual sense; typology interpretation in the church. See Catholic biblical interpretation; church, doctrine of the; liturgy; mysticism, Christian; Orthodox biblical interpretation; Protestant biblical interpretation; spirituality/spiritual formation; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; virtue intertestamental period. See Jewish context of the NT intertextuality, 332–34. See also biblical theology; chronology and the NT; commentary; interpretation, history of; Jeremiah, book of; Jewish exegesis; literary criticism; 2 Peter, book of; relationship between the Testaments

intratextuality. See narrative theology; Yale School Irenaeus. See patristic biblical interpretation; rule of faith; Scripture, unity of irony, 334–36
Isaiah, book of, 336–44. See also exodus/new exodus; Mark, book of Israel, 344–46. See also anti-Semitism; Chronicles, books of; church, doctrine of the; covenant; history of Israel; Jewish-Christian dialogue; kingdom of God; prophetic writings; salvation, history of James, book of, 347–51
James, William. See pragmatism
JEDP. See history of Israel; source criticism
Jeremiah, book of, 351–55
Jesus, quest for the historical, 355–58. See also biography; chronology and the NT; Gospels; hero story; history; Jesus Christ, doctrine of;
liberation theologies and hermeneutics
Jesus and Scripture, 358–63. See also Jewish exegesis; relationship between the Testaments; targum; Word of God
Jesus Christ, doctrine of, 363–71. See also anti-Semitism; Apocrypha; Colossians, book of; 2 Corinthians, book of; Ephesians, book of;
ethics; Habakkuk, book of; Hebrews, book of; image of God;
incarnation; infancy narratives; Jesus, quest for the historical; Jesus and Scripture; Johannine Epistles; John, book of; liberation theologies and hermeneutics; Mark, book of; Mary; Matthew, book of; Messiah/messianism; miracle; prayer; prophecy and prophets in the NT; relationship between the Testaments; rule of faith; salvation, doctrine of;
Scripture, unity of; 1 Timothy, book of; violence; worship
Jesus Christ, return of. See hope; kingdom of God; last things, doctrine of Jesus Christ, titles of. See Jesus Christ, doctrine of Jewish-Christian dialogue, 371–73. See also anti-Semitism; Israel; relationship between the Testaments
Jewish context of the NT, 373–80. See also angels, doctrine of; Dead Sea Scrolls; exile and restoration; Hebrews, book of; James, book of;
Jewish exegesis; Messiah/messianism; Pseudepigrapha; Roman Empire
Jewish exegesis, 380–84. See also allegory; Pseudepigrapha; relationship between the Testaments; targum; typology Job, book of, 384–89. See also Proverbs, book of Joel, book of, 389–91
Johannine Epistles, 391–94
John, book of, 394–401. See also salvation, history of Jonah, book of, 401–4
Josephus. See Jewish context of the NT
Joshua, book of, 404–8. See also earth/land; political theology Jubilees, book of. See exile and restoration
Jude, book of, 408–10. See also Pseudepigrapha
Judges, book of, 410–15 judgment. See last things, doctrine of; prophetic writings; sin, doctrine of; violence; Zephaniah, book of justice, 415–16. See also ethics; Habakkuk, book of; ideological criticism; law; Malachi, book of; Micah, book of; political theology; Roman Empire; 2 Thessalonians, book of justification. See epistemology; warrant justification by faith, 416–19. See also faith; Galatians, book of; James, book of; Pauline Epistles; Romans, book of Kant, Immanuel. See Enlightenment; epistemology; worldview

Kelsey, David H. See Yale School

kerygma. See gospel; Jesus, quest for the historical; oral tradition and the NT; preaching, use of the Bible in kingdom of God, 420–22. See also covenant; ethics; Jesus Christ, doctrine of; last things, doctrine of; Luke, book of; Psalms, book of; salvation, doctrine of; Samuel, books of Kings, books of, 422–25. See also history of Israel; kingdom of God; Messiah/messianism knowledge. See epistemology; warrant; wisdom

Kuhn, Thomas. See epistemology

Lamentations, book of, 426–28

land. See earth/land language, grammar and syntax, 428–31. See also etymology; meaning; semiotics; structuralism; utterance meaning language, linguistics, 431–35. See also etymology; language, grammar and syntax; meaning; prayer; Protestant biblical interpretation; utterance meaning

language-game, 435–37

last things, doctrine of, 438–41. See also apocalyptic; covenant; Dead Sea Scrolls; Ephesians, book of; exile and restoration; hope; kingdom of God; new creation; Obadiah, book of; Pauline Epistles; 2 Peter, book of; powers and principalities; resurrection of the dead; Revelation, book of; salvation, doctrine of; salvation, history of; Zephaniah, book of Latin American biblical interpretation. See liberation theologies and hermeneutics law, 441–46. See also ancient Near Eastern background studies; covenant; Dead Sea Scrolls; Deuteronomy, book of; ethics; Galatians, book of; grace; Hebrews, book of; Jewish context of the NT; Joshua, book of; Leviticus, book of; Pauline Epistles; Psalms, book of; Sermon on the Mount; sexuality

Lectio Divina. See liturgy; medieval biblical interpretation

lectionary. See liturgy

Leviticus, book of, 447–50

lexicons, NT, 450–51. See also biblical theology; concept; etymology

lexicons, OT, 451–52. See also biblical theology; concept; etymology; language, grammar and syntax liberal biblical interpretation, 453–54. See also historical criticism liberation theologies and hermeneutics, 454–55. See also African biblical interpretation; Asian biblical interpretation; culture and hermeneutics; ideological criticism life. See Holy Spirit, doctrine of the; human being, doctrine of life, Christian. See ethics

Lindbeck, George. See language-game; narrative theology; Yale School linguistics. See language, linguistics

literacy. See reading

literal sense, 455–56. See also allegory; meaning; preaching, use of the Bible in; Protestant biblical interpretation; rule of faith; spiritual sense; typology literary criticism, 457–60. See also formalism; intertextuality; narrative criticism; narrative theology; source criticism; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; Western literature, the Bible and liturgy, 460–62. See also music, the Bible and; preaching, use of the Bible in; worship

Locke, John. See Enlightenment

locutionary act. See authorial discourse interpretation; meaning; speech-act theory logic, 462–64. See also epistemology; philosophy; proof text; truth

logion. See Gospels; Jesus, quest for the historical logocentrism. See deconstruction; postmodernity and biblical interpretation

Lonergan, B. See critical realism

Lord's Supper, 464–65. See also baptism; church, doctrine of the; 1 Corinthians, book of; covenant; Jesus Christ, doctrine of; liturgy; sacrament love, 465–67. See also Augustine; Johannine Epistles; Malachi, book of; virtue

Lubac, Henri de. See medieval biblical interpretation

Luke, book of, 467–71. See also salvation, history of Luther, Martin, 471–73. See also Galatians, book of; genealogy; James, book of; Jesus Christ, doctrine of; justification by faith; Pauline Epistles; sacrament; Scripture, clarity of; Zephaniah, book of

LXX. See relationship between the Testaments; translation

Maccabees, the. See Jewish context of the NT

MacIntyre, Alasdair. See epistemology

magisterium. See Catholic biblical interpretation

Malachi, book of, 474–77. See also Mark, book of male. See male and female male and female, 477–79. See also feminist biblical interpretation; image of God manuscripts. See textual criticism

maps of the biblical world. See geography

Marcionism. See Galatians, book of; Gnosticism; patristic biblical interpretation; relationship between the Testaments; Scripture, unity of

Mark, book of, 480–85. See also exodus/new exodus; salvation, history of marriage. See male and female; sexuality

Mary, 485–86. See also Jesus Christ, doctrine of; typology

Masoretic text. See textual criticism; translation

Mass, the. See Lord's Supper masturbation. See sexuality

Matthew, book of, 486–92. See also relationship between the Testaments; salvation, history of

McFague, Sallie. See model meaning, 492–99. See also authorial discourse interpretation; dialogism; exegesis; hermeneutics; intention/intentional fallacy; medieval biblical interpretation; speech-act theory; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; utterance meaning medieval biblical interpretation, 499–503. See also allegory; genealogy; literal sense; spiritual sense

Messiah/messianism, 503–6. See also Dead Sea Scrolls; Jesus Christ, doctrine of; Kings, books of; Mark, book of; Psalms, book of; relationship between the Testaments; Ruth, book of; Samuel, books of messianic secret. See Mark, book of metanarrative, 506–7. See also postmodernity and biblical interpretation; salvation, history of; worldview metaphor, 507–10. See also atonement; imagery; model; parables

metaphysics. See onto-theology; philosophy method, 510–12. See also hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics; objectivity; Ricoeur, Paul

Meyer, Ben F. See critical realism

Micah, book of, 512–15

midrash. See Jewish exegesis

millennium. See kingdom of God; last things, doctrine of

miracle, 515–17

mission. See church, doctrine of the; culture and hermeneutics; Trinity model, 517–19. See also concept; critical realism; metaphor; science, the Bible and; Scripture, unity of; systematic theology; tradition

Model Reader. See commentary modernity. See Enlightenment; postmodernity and biblical interpretation

Moltmann, Jürgen. See hope; last things, doctrine of monarchy. See Samuel, books of monotheism, 519–21. See also Jewish context of the NT; Trinity monothelism. See Jesus Christ, doctrine of moral sense. See ethics; ideological criticism; liberation theologies and hermeneutics; medieval biblical interpretation

morphology. See language, linguistics

Moses. See Deuteronomy, book of; Exodus, book of; hero story motif. See imagery

mujerista interpretation. See feminist biblical interpretation

Muratorian Fragment. See Gospels

music, the Bible and, 521–24. See also dialogism; liturgy; Psalms, book of; Revelation, book of; worship mysticism, Christian, 524–25. See also spirituality/spiritual formation; spiritual sense myth. See hermeneutics; history

Nag Hammadi, 526. See also Gnosticism

Nahum, book of, 527–28

narrative criticism, 528–31. See also biblical theology; intention/intentional fallacy; intertextuality; literary criticism; metanarrative; oral tradition and the NT; oral tradition and the OT; proposition; reader-response criticism; rhetorical criticism; Scripture, authority of; source criticism; structuralism; text/textuality; Yale School narrative theology, 531–33. See also God, doctrine of; infancy narratives; literary criticism; Luke, book of; narrative criticism; Passion Narratives; patriarchal narratives; Ricoeur, Paul; rule of faith; salvation, history of; Yale School nations. See creation; Pauline Epistles; racism; Ruth, book of nature. See creation; earth/land; grace; worldview

Nehemiah, book of, 533–35. See also Ezra, book of Nestorianism. See Jesus Christ, doctrine of new creation, 536–37. See also creation; last things, doctrine of; Pauline Epistles; Revelation, book of

New Criticism. See formalism; intention/intentional fallacy; literary criticism new exodus. See exodus/new exodus new hermeneutic. See hermeneutics; literary criticism; theological hermeneutics, contemporary

New Perspective on Paul. See justification by faith; Pauline Epistles

Nietzsche, Friedrich. See exile and restoration nominalism. See semiotics noncanonical writings. See Apocrypha; canon; Pseudepigrapha nonviolence. See violence

Numbers, book of, 538–41

Obadiah, book of, 542–44

objectivity, 544–46. See also critical realism; culture and hermeneutics; method; science, the Bible and; truth; Yale School offering. See Malachi, book of

onto-theology, 546–49

oracle. See prophecy and prophets in the OT

oral tradition and the NT, 549–51. See also form criticism and the NT; Gospels oral tradition and the OT, 551–53. See also form criticism and the OT; source criticism

Origen. See allegory; hermeneutics; mysticism, Christian; patristic biblical interpretation; spiritual sense original sin, 553–54. See also sin, doctrine of Orr, James. See doctrine

Orthodox biblical interpretation, 554–58

Padilla, René. See liberation theologies and hermeneutics

Palestinian Judaism. See Jewish context of the NT

Pannenberg, Wolfhart. See last things, doctrine of

parables, 559–62

parousia. See last things, doctrine of Passion Narratives, 562–64. See also atonement; biography; history; infancy narratives; patriarchal narratives; resurrection narratives; sin, doctrine of Pastoral Epistles. See 1 Timothy, book of; 2 Timothy, book of; Titus, book of pastoral theology. See practical theology patriarchal narratives, 564–66. See also Genesis, book of; infancy narratives; Passion Narratives; resurrection narratives; typology patristic biblical interpretation, 566–71. See also African biblical interpretation; allegory; atonement; Augustine; Gnosticism; Jewish exegesis; Jewish-Christian dialogue; rule of faith; typology

Paul. See Jewish Context of the NT; Pauline Epistles
Pauline Epistles, 571–80. See also Deuteronomy, book of; ethics; salvation, history of; sanctification; sexuality
peace. See violence
Pentecostal biblical interpretation. See charismatic biblical interpretation people of God. See church, doctrine of the; Israel performance. See dialogism; music, the Bible and; theological hermeneutics, contemporary perlocutionary act. See speech-act theory perseverance of the saints. See apostasy; assurance; sanctification persuasion, art of. See rhetoric; rhetorical criticism peshet. See Jewish exegesis
1 Peter, book of, 581–83. See also social-scientific criticism
2 Peter, book of, 583–86
Pharisees. See Jewish context of the NT
Philemon, book of, 586–88. See also slavery
Philippians, book of, 588–90
Philo. See allegory; Jewish context of the NT philology. See etymology; language, linguistics; lexicons, NT; lexicons, OT philosophical theology. See philosophy
philosophy, 591–94
phonology. See language, linguistics phronēsis. See imagination; practical theology; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; wisdom Pierce, C. S. See pragmatism play. See deconstruction
plot. See narrative criticism poetry, 594–97. See also genre; imagery; literary criticism; metaphor; Song of Songs political theology, 597–600. See also Augustine; calling/vocation; Calvin, John; deconstruction; Enlightenment; feminist biblical interpretation; ideological criticism; justice; kingdom of God; liberation theologies and hermeneutics; postmodernity and biblical interpretation; powers and principalities; religion; Roman Empire; Samuel, books of; Thomas Aquinas; violence; virtue polyphony. See dialogism postcolonialism. See African biblical interpretation; Asian biblical interpretation; culture and hermeneutics; ideological criticism; liberation theologies and hermeneutics; political theology postliberalism. See narrative theology; Yale School postmodernity and biblical interpretation, 20–21, 600–607. See also culture and hermeneutics; deconstruction; history; providence poststructuralism, 607–9. See also deconstruction; dialogism; postmodernity and biblical interpretation; structuralism power. See ideological criticism; powers and principalities; racism; violence powers and principalities, 609–12. See also angels, doctrine of; Colossians, book of; Ephesians, book of; political theology; violence practical theology, 22, 612–14

practice. See practical theology

pragmatics. See semiotics

pragmatism, 614–16

praxis. See liberation theologies and hermeneutics; practical theology prayer, 616–17. See also faith; Psalms, book of preaching, use of the Bible in, 617–21. See also gospel; Jewish exegesis; liturgy; oral tradition and the NT; patristic biblical interpretation; targum

presence. See deconstruction

presupposition. See hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics; objectivity pride. See Obadiah, book of priesthood/priests. See Hebrews, book of; Jewish context of the NT; Leviticus, book of; Malachi, book of

Princeton School, 621–22

promise. See covenant; hope; last things, doctrine of; relationship between the Testaments; speech-act theory proof text, 622–24. See also biblical theology; concept; logic; revelation;

systematic theology

prophecy and prophets in the NT, 624–26. See also Luke, book of; Mark, book of; patristic biblical interpretation; temple prophecy and prophets in the OT, 626–28. See also ancient Near Eastern background studies; ethics; Jonah, book of; justice; Kings, books of;

Nahum, book of; relationship between the Testaments; temple

prophetic writings, 628–32

proposition, 632–33. See also speech-act theory

prostitution. See sexuality

Protestant biblical interpretation, 633–38. See also Apocrypha; atonement; historical criticism; tradition

protreptic. See Romans, book of Proverbs, book of, 638–41. See also Job, book of; wisdom; Wisdom Literature providence, 641–45. See also Ruth, book of Psalms, book of, 645–52. See also Messiah/messianism; music, the Bible and; prayer; worship

Pseudepigrapha, 652–53. See also Jewish context of the NT; Pauline Epistles

pseudonymity. See Pseudepigrapha

psychological interpretation, 653–55. See also human being, doctrine of public theology. See political theology

Q. See Gospels; Mark, book of; redaction criticism; source criticism

quietism. See spirituality/spiritual formation

Quine, W. V. O. See epistemology

Qumran. See Dead Sea Scrolls; Jewish context of the NT

quotation. See intertextuality; relationship between the Testaments racism, 657–58. See also culture and hermeneutics; ideological criticism; slavery; violence

Radical Orthodoxy. See political theology; violence

Ranke, Leopold von. See history reader-response criticism, 658–61. See also authorial discourse interpretation; community, interpretative; meaning; narrative criticism; postmodernity and biblical interpretation; reading; speech-act theory; text/textuality reading, 661–63. See also community, interpretative; meaning; reader-response criticism

realism. See critical realism; semiotics

Reception Theory. See reader-response criticism

redaction criticism, 663–66. See also form criticism and the NT; Gospels; narrative criticism; prophetic writings; source criticism redemptive movement approach. See culture and hermeneutics; slavery reference. See critical realism; meaning

Reimarus, Hermann Samuel. See Enlightenment relationship between the Testaments, 666–72. See also anti-Semitism; Apocrypha; biblical theology; canon; canonical approach; Catholic biblical interpretation; 2 Corinthians, book of; covenant; Ezekiel, book of; Hebrews, book of; history of Israel; intertextuality; Israel; Jeremiah, book of; Jesus Christ, doctrine of; Jewish-Christian dialogue; Jewish exegesis; Joel, book of; Jonah, book of; Judges, book of; kingdom of God; literal sense; Luke, book of; Mary; Messiah/messianism; patriarchal narratives; patristic biblical interpretation; providence; Psalms, book of; Scripture, unity of; spiritual sense; targum; translation; Trinity; typology

Relevance Theory. See language, linguistics; translation

religion, 672–75. See also political theology; spirituality/spiritual formation remnant. See Micah, book of restoration. See exile and restoration resurrection narratives, 675–76. See also infancy narratives; Passion Narratives; patriarchal narratives; resurrection of the dead resurrection of the dead, 676–78. See also Apocrypha; 1 Corinthians, book of; last things, doctrine of; resurrection narratives; Revelation, book of retribution. See Micah, book of; Psalms, book of; 2 Thessalonians, book of revelation, 678–80. See also analogy; ancient Near Eastern background studies; anthropomorphism; apocalyptic; dialogism; God, doctrine of; Obadiah, book of; prayer; Scripture, authority of; Scripture, sufficiency of; truth; Word of God

Revelation, book of, 680–87. See also angels, doctrine of; apocalyptic; last things, doctrine of; salvation, history of rhetoric, 687–89. See also rhetorical criticism rhetorical criticism, 689–92. See also prophetic writings; rhetoric

Ricoeur, Paul, 692–95. See also hermeneutics; metaphor; method; postmodernity and biblical interpretation; reader-response criticism

Roman Empire, 695–96. See also Colossians, book of; Jewish context of the NT

Romans, book of, 697–703

Rorty, Richard. See epistemology; hermeneutics; postmodernity and biblical interpretation; pragmatism rule of faith, 703–4. See also canonical approach; Catholic biblical interpretation; faith; grace; liberal biblical interpretation; literal sense; meaning; Orthodox biblical interpretation; patristic biblical interpretation; Protestant biblical interpretation; Scripture, authority of; Scripture, unity of; spiritual sense; worship

Ruth, book of, 704–8

sacrament, 709–11. See also baptism; church, doctrine of the; Lord's Supper

Sadducees. See Jewish context of the NT

salvation, doctrine of, 711–14. See also Colossians, book of; Ephesians, book of; faith; gospel; Jeremiah, book of; Jesus Christ, doctrine of; last things, doctrine of; Mark, book of; Matthew, book of; Pauline Epistles; prophetic writings; Romans, book of; salvation, history of; sin, doctrine of; 1 Timothy, book of salvation, history of, 714–17. See also angels, doctrine of; assurance; biblical theology; covenant; exile and restoration; genealogy; history of Israel; Israel; last things, doctrine of; metanarrative; Nehemiah, book of; prophetic writings; salvation, doctrine of; Scripture, unity of; typology

Samaritans. See Jewish context of the NT

Samuel, books of, 717–20. See also history of Israel; kingdom of God; Messiah/messianism; narrative criticism; source criticism sanctification, 720–22. See also 1 Thessalonians, book of Sanders, E. P. See Pauline Epistles

Satan. See angels, doctrine of; powers and principalities

Schleiermacher, Friedrich. See hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics; practical theology scholarship. See societies, scholarly

Schreier, Robert. See culture and hermeneutics

Schutter, W. L. See 1 Peter, book of science, the Bible and, 722–24. See also creation; critical realism; Genesis, book of; providence

scribes. See Jewish context of the NT

Scripture, authority of, 724–27. See also ancient Near Eastern background studies; Asian biblical interpretation; Barth, Karl; canon; Catholic biblical interpretation; God, doctrine of; Orthodox biblical interpretation; proof text; Protestant biblical interpretation; revelation; Scripture, clarity of; Scripture, sufficiency of; 2 Timothy, book of; tradition; Word of God

Scripture, clarity of, 727–30. See also Scripture, sufficiency of Scripture, inerrancy of. See Scripture, authority of; truth

Scripture, infallibility of. See Scripture, authority of; truth

Scripture, inspiration of. See Scripture, authority of Scripture, Jesus and. See Jesus and Scripture

Scripture, sufficiency of, 730–31. See also canon; Scripture, authority of; Scripture, clarity of; tradition

Scripture, unity of, 731–34. See also allegory; biblical theology; canon; canonical approach; dialogism; proof text; Protestant biblical interpretation; providence; relationship between the Testaments; rule of faith; salvation, history of; systematic theology; typology; Wisdom Literature

Scripture principle. See Scripture, authority of; Word of God

semantics. See language, linguistics; meaning; semiotics; utterance meaning semiotics, 734–37. See also etymology; language, grammar and syntax; language, linguistics; poststructuralism; structuralism sense. See allegory; literal sense; meaning; Ricoeur, Paul; spiritual sense; typology sensus plenior. See allegory; meaning; medieval biblical interpretation; spiritual sense; typology sentence. See language, grammar and syntax; language, linguistics; proposition; utterance meaning Septuagint. See relationship between the Testaments; translation

Sermon on the Mount, 737–39 setting. See ancient Near Eastern background studies; archaeology; context; culture and hermeneutics sexuality, 739–48. See also Song of Songs Sicarii. See Jewish context of the NT
significance. See meaning signs. See semiotics simile. See imagery sin, doctrine of, 748–51. See also atonement; covenant; human being, doctrine of; Job, book of; Johannine Epistles; Micah, book of; Obadiah, book of; original sin; Passion Narratives; Pauline Epistles; prophetic writings; salvation, doctrine of; 1 Timothy, book of Sitz im Leben. See form criticism and the NT; form criticism and the OT slavery, 751–53. See also Colossians, book of; culture and hermeneutics; Exodus, book of; Philemon, book of; racism Sobrinho, Jon. See liberation theologies and hermeneutics social-scientific criticism, 753–55. See also incarnation societies, scholarly, 755–58. See also African biblical interpretation
Song of Songs, 758–61. See also allegory; sexuality Son of Man. See Jesus Christ, doctrine of; last things, doctrine of soteriology. See salvation, doctrine of soul. See human being, doctrine of source criticism, 761–63. See also Gospels special revelation. See revelation speculation, theological. See historical theology speech-act theory, 763–66. See also proposition; utterance meaning Spinoza, Baruch. See Enlightenment spirituality/spiritual formation, 766–69. See also Holy Spirit, doctrine of the; human being, doctrine of; religion; sanctification; spiritual sense spiritual sense, 769–72. See also allegory; literal sense; medieval biblical interpretation; mysticism, Christian; patristic biblical interpretation; relationship between the Testaments state. See political theology story. See narrative criticism; narrative theology structuralism, 772–73. See also form criticism and the NT; form criticism and the OT; language, grammar and syntax; narrative criticism; poststructuralism; semiotics subjectivity. See objectivity suffering. See Job, book of; Psalms, book of; 2 Thessalonians, book of sufficiency, scriptural. See Scripture, sufficiency of supersessionism. See relationship between the Testaments suspicion, hermeneutics of. See grace; historical criticism; ideological criticism; psychological interpretation symbol. See imagery; metaphor; semiotics

synchronic approach. See etymology
Synoptic Problem. See Gospels; source criticism syntax. See language, grammar and syntax; language, linguistics; semiotics systematic theology, 773–79. See also Barth, Karl; biblical theology; model; providence; rule of faith; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; truth; Word of God Tanner, Kathryn. See culture and hermeneutics targum, 780–81. See also commentary; Jewish exegesis; translation temple, 781–82. See also Chronicles, books of; Ezra, book of; Haggai, book of; history of Israel; Jewish context of the NT
Ten Commandments. See Exodus, book of; law
Tertullian. See patristic biblical interpretation; rule of faith; Scripture, unity of Testaments, relationship between. See relationship between the Testaments
testimonia. See intertextuality
text linguistics. See language, linguistics; text/textuality; utterance meaning text/textuality, 782–84. See also genre; language, linguistics; meaning; utterance meaning textual criticism, 784–87
theme. See language, linguistics
theological hermeneutics, contemporary, 19–25, 787–93. See also hermeneutics; virtue; wisdom theology. See biblical theology; doctrine; systematic theology theology, NT. See biblical theology
theology, OT. See biblical theology
theophany. See revelation
theory. See practical theology; wisdom
1 Thessalonians, book of, 793–96
2 Thessalonians, book of, 796–99
Thiselton, Anthony. See hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics; speech-act theory; theological hermeneutics, contemporary
Thomas Aquinas, 799–801. See also analogy; Galatians, book of; literal sense; medieval biblical interpretation; providence; spiritual sense
1 Timothy, book of, 801–4
2 Timothy, book of, 804–6 tithe. See Malachi, book of Titus, book of, 806–9
topic. See language, linguistics
topical preaching. See preaching, use of the Bible in torah. See law; patriarchal narratives; wisdom; Wisdom Literature totality concept. See Wisdom Literature
totality transfer, illegitimate. See etymology tradition, 809–12. See also Catholic biblical interpretation; creed; hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics; Orthodox biblical interpretation; patristic biblical interpretation; rule of faith; systematic theology; Wisdom Literature trajectory. See culture and hermeneutics; ideological criticism; slavery translation, 812–14. See also commentary; culture and hermeneutics; exegesis; hermeneutics; language, linguistics; meaning; targum

Trinity, 815–18. See also church, doctrine of the; creation; God, doctrine of; Holy Spirit, doctrine of the; John, book of; liturgy; monotheism; providence; Revelation, book of; Word of God; worship

trope. See imagery; metaphor

tropological sense. See medieval biblical interpretation; spiritual sense; typology truth, 818–22. See also Enlightenment; epistemology; history; meaning; metaphor; proposition

Tübingen School, 822–23

two horizons. See hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics

two-source hypothesis. See Gospels typology, 823–27. See also allegory; Jewish exegesis; patristic biblical interpretation; providence; relationship between the Testaments; Scripture, unity of

Ugarit and the Bible. See ancient Near Eastern background studies unclean. See Leviticus, book of underdetermined meaning. See meaning; theological hermeneutics, contemporary understanding. See hermeneutical circle; hermeneutics; theological hermeneutics, contemporary undetermined hermeneutics. See theological hermeneutics, contemporary unfolding view. See tradition unity. See church, doctrine of the; culture and hermeneutics; dialogism unity, scriptural. See Scripture, unity of Urzeit. See exile and restoration

use of the OT in the NT. See intertextuality; Jewish exegesis; relationship between the Testaments; Scripture, unity of; typology

Ussher, James. See genealogy

utterance meaning, 828–33. See also concept; etymology; language, grammar and syntax; language, linguistics validity. See exegesis; hermeneutics; logic; meaning; proof text

Vanhoozer, Kevin. See speech-act theory; theological hermeneutics, contemporary violence, 834–37. See also atonement; Habakkuk, book of; law; Psalms, book of virgin birth. See infancy narratives virtue, 837–39. See also calling/vocation; ethics; hermeneutical circle; love; wisdom virtue epistemology. See epistemology; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; virtue; wisdom vocation. See calling/vocation

Vulgate. See medieval biblical interpretation; translation

war. See violence

warrant, 840–41. See also epistemology

Warrior, R. See culture and hermeneutics

Watson, Francis. See theological hermeneutics, contemporary

Webb, W. See culture and hermeneutics

Western literature, the Bible and, 841–44

wisdom, 844–47. See also Apocrypha; Proverbs, book of; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; virtue; Wisdom Literature

Wisdom Literature, 847–50. See also Ecclesiastes, book of; ethics; Job, book of; Proverbs, book of; wisdom

Wisdom of Solomon, book of. See exodus/new exodus witness. See Barth, Karl

Wittgenstein, Ludwig. See language-game

Wolterstorff, Nicholas. See authorial discourse interpretation; speech-act theory; theological hermeneutics, contemporary womanist interpretation. See feminist biblical interpretation; ideological criticism

women. See feminist biblical interpretation; Luke, book of; male and female; Nahum, book of; 1 Timothy, book of

Word of God, 850–54. See also church, doctrine of the; Jesus and Scripture; Johannine Epistles; John, book of; Scripture, authority of; theological hermeneutics, contemporary; truth

word study. See concept; etymology; language, linguistics; utterance meaning worldview, 854–56. See also ancient Near Eastern background studies; Colossians, book of; grace; systematic theology worship, 856–58. See also 1 Corinthians, book of; God, doctrine of; Leviticus, book of; liturgy; music, the Bible and; patristic biblical interpretation; preaching, use of the Bible in; religion

Wright, N. T. See critical realism; exile and restoration

writing. See deconstruction; postmodernity and biblical interpretation

Wycliffe, John. See medieval biblical interpretation

Yale School, 859–61. See also canonical approach; language-game; narrative theology

zealots. See Jewish context of the NT

Zechariah, book of, 862–64

Zephaniah, book of, 864–65

Zerubbabel. See Haggai, book of

Zion. See Obadiah, book of; Zechariah, book of

SCRIPTURE INDEX

Genesis

1

41, 64, 144, 248, 251, 318, 320, 323, 445, 478, 686, 856

1-2	144, 257, 740, 745
1-3	66, 83, 184, 641, 686, 831
1-11	44, 244, 246, 247, 248, 538, 551, 647, 649
1-12	142
1:1	144, 247, 248, 520, 638, 721
1:1-2	259
1:1-3	766
1:1-2:3	247, 248, 259, 444
1:1-2:4	448, 761
1:1-2:7	815
1:2	144, 249, 303, 345
1:3	144, 453
1:3-5	216
1:6-8	41
1:9	249
1:9-10	216
1:11-12	746
1:20	583
1:21	746
1:24-25	746
1:26	248, 297, 310, 312, 314
1:26-27	141, 145, 311, 318, 344, 658, 745
1:26-28	157, 415, 478
1:26-31	856
1:27	251, 382, 444, 740, 744, 745, 746
1:28	212, 216, 244, 245, 248, 249, 259, 743, 746
1:28-30	658
1:29-30	445
2	251, 478
2-3	844
2-4	248
2:2	217
2:2-3	259
2:3	444
2:4	248, 715
2:4-25	761
2:4-11:26	248
2:8	283
2:15	599
2:17	73
2:18	245
2:18-24	744, 746
2:18-25	141
2:20-24	741
2:21-24	746
2:21-25	249
2:23	63
2:24	187, 251, 382, 740, 742, 744, 745, 746, 849
3	55, 58, 141, 251, 279, 301, 311, 344, 478, 553, 760

3-11	249, 250
3:1-7	63, 749
3:8	250, 283
3:15	71, 245, 248, 249, 251
3:17	259
3:18	249
3:19	249, 251
3:24	45
4	58, 111, 249, 250, 251, 311, 445
4-11	142
4:1-16	250
4:3-7	445
4:9	334
4:16-24	242
4:20-22	522
4:23-24	63, 445
4:24	195
5	242, 248, 453
5:1	248
5:1-2	202
5:1-3	318
5:30-32	187
6	311, 584
6-9	215, 247
6:1-4	46
6:4	453
6:5	215, 321, 553
6:5-6	249
6:5-8	259
6:5-13	215
6:6	48
6:8	215
6:9	248, 250, 445
6:11	249, 250
6:13	249, 250, 445
6:14	202
6:17	303
6:19	761, 762
6:20	746
6:22	215
7	478
7:2	761, 762
7:14	746
7:15	303
7:22	303
8	251, 259
8:1	215, 249
8:17	249
8:20	215

8:20–9:17	445
8:21	48, 215, 249, 311, 553, 781
9:1	216, 249
9:6	318, 445
9:7	249
9:8–17	120
9:11	445
9:14–17	564
9:19	244
9:20–21	249
9:20–27	248, 747
9:21–22	288
10	242, 244, 864
10:1	248
11	44, 259, 345, 864
11:1–9	63, 249
11:10	248
11:10–32	242
11:27	248
11:27–50:26	248
12	249, 514, 538
12–25	248
12–35	345
12–50	249, 564
12:1	249
12:1–3	71, 142, 197, 245, 248, 249, 259, 300, 438, 543, 565, 647, 707, 715, 730
12:2	212, 249
12:2–3	214, 225, 565, 643
12:3	217, 248, 249, 251, 649, 837
12:4	288
12:7	249, 565
12:10–20	249, 255, 288, 565
12:10–13:1	761
12:20–13:3	251
13:8–10	250
13:14–17	249
13:15	181, 249
13:15–16	249
13:16	250
14	278
14:14	115
14:14–16	288
14:15–24	249
14:18	383
14:18–20	278, 300
14:20	475
15	142, 438, 538, 706
15:1	780

15:2–4	514
15:5	245, 250
15:6	142, 227, 332, 416, 417, 733
15:7	224, 565
15:7–21	169
15:13	114
15:16	114, 407, 837
15:18–21	209
16:1–4	288, 751
16:7–14	181
17	142, 344, 438, 538
17:1	250
17:4–6	249
17:4–13	249
17:7	171
17:8	181
18	35
18–19	197
18:1–2	46
18:8	772
18:12	582
18:16–33	288
18:18	249
19	250, 413
19:1	46
19:4–11	747
19:15–29	58
19:30–38	242, 243
20	288
20:1–18	249, 761
20:17–18	249
21	300
21:1–7	249
21:3	245
21:6	245
21:22–24	249
21:22–33	249
22	142, 164, 165, 214, 251, 288, 372, 416, 565, 583
22:1	565
22:1–19	445, 566
22:12	565
22:15–18	438
22:16–18	250
22:18	249, 250
22:20–24	242
23	300
23:1–20	249
23:8–15	335
24	706

24:15–28	251
25–33	249, 250
25–35	248
25:11	300
25:12	248
25:12–26	242
25:19	248
25:19–26	475
25:21	249
25:23	566
25:24–26	245
25:29–34	58, 566
26	197
26:1–7	255
26:3	169
26:3–4	181
26:5	565
26:6–11	761
26:8	202
26:17–33	250
26:24	215, 245, 438
27:1–45	566
27:28–29	300
28:1–22	249
28:10–22	181, 288, 566, 781
28:13	181
28:13–15	438
28:14	245
28:18–22	475
29–31	566
29:1–14	251
29:9–30	744
29:23–27	288
30:1	249
30:3–4	751
30:9–10	751
30:16	706
30:18	706
30:27–28	197
31:19	335
31:33–35	335
31:36–37	335
32	530
32:3–33:11	566
32:22–32	288, 773
32:24–30	46
32:24–32	182
32:28	245, 288
32:30	48

33	251
33:4	250
33:19	249
33:20	566
34	530
34:1–35:5	249
35:10	245
35:22	751
36	242, 248
36:1	248
37	249, 300, 335
37–45	643
37–50	248, 250
37:2	248
37:2–11	288, 566
37:18–36	566
37:32–33	434
38	434
38:25–26	434
39	434
39–41	197
39:1–40:23	566
39:1–41:40	288
39:3–23	249
39:10	195
40:20	195
41:35	195
41:37	195
41:42	195
41:50–52	225
42:6–9	335
42:9	566
43:14	195
45:5–8	566
46:1–7	255
46:8–27	242, 243
46:27 LXX	243
47:13–25	249
49	169, 248, 594
49:8–12	567
49:10	503
50	251
50:20	245, 566, 642
50:20–21	250
50:24	250
Exodus
1	168
1–2	260
1–19	444, 447

1:1-7	216
1:1-2:22	212
1:7	212, 216
1:9	216
1:11	114
1:13-14	215
1:15-21	462
2	250
2:1-10	63
2:12	288
2:23-7:7	212
2:24	213, 564
3	211, 262
3-15	260
3:6-22	250
3:7-8	212
3:9-10	212
3:11-4:12	212
3:12	38
3:13-15	212
3:14	212, 215, 364
3:14 LXX	212
3:14-15	382
3:16	245
3:17	224
4:13-14	212
5:1-23	212
6:2-8	169, 213, 344
6:5	564
6:6	701
6:14-25	242
6:14-26	244
6:16-20	114
7:8-11:10	212
9:4	213
9:14-16	212
9:26	213
12	581, 583
12-15	345
12:1-15:21	213
12:2-6	224
12:37	114
12:40-41	114
12:44	751, 752
12:46	113
12:49	168
13:21	320
14	552
14-15	300

14:31	213, 848
15	272, 339, 406, 552, 594
15:1–18	63, 259
15:3 LXX	48
15:18	649
15:19–21	63
15:22–18:27	213
16	213
16:1–3	213
16:4–5	213
16:6–12	213
16:13	384
16:13–14	213
16:15	213
16:16–18	213
16:19–21	213
16:22–30	213
16:31–36	213
16:33	384
17	653
17:1–7	213, 383
17:11	384
19	478
19–24	142, 143, 213, 215, 438
19:4	211, 443
19:4–6	213
19:5	443
19:5–6	211, 225
19:6	443, 581
19:9	213
19:10–15	214
19:16–19	213
19:19–20	213
19:21–24	214
19:21–20:1	214
19:24	213
20	211, 445
20–23	442, 445
20:1	447
20:2	197, 444
20:3	444
20:3–17	197
20:4	48
20:5	444, 445
20:5–6	462
20:6	444
20:7	444, 445
20:8–11	144, 248
20:11	444

20:12	444
20:14	741, 745
20:16	462
20:17	741
20:18–19	214
20:20	214, 565
20:22	214
20:22–23:19	197
20:22–23:33	482
21–23	214, 442
21:2–6	215
21:16	752
21:20–21	751, 752
21:26–27	752
21:28–32	751
21:32	751
22	442, 445
22:13	38
22:16–17	741, 742
22:21–24	515
22:24	48
22:26	38
23	482
23:4	445
23:9	445
23:10–11	332
23:12	752
23:19	502
23:20	481, 482
23:20–22	46
23:20–33	405
23:21–31	482
23:25–26	482
23:33	482
24	117
24:1	214
24:2	214
24:3	214
24:3–11	781
24:4–8	214, 564
24:9–11	214
24:10	41
24:12	168
24:15–16	215
24:15–18	214
25–31	214
25–40	261, 445
25:1	216
25:9–40	63

25:17–22	214
25:22	214
25:22–33	197
25:31–40	214
28:33–35	522
28:41	503
29:20–21	214
29:38–46	214
29:43	721
30:11	216
30:17	216
30:22	216
30:34	216
31:1	216
31:1–3	848
31:1–11	63
31:7 LXX	701
31:12–18	216
32	58, 142, 289, 538
32–34	214, 215, 274, 445
32:1–6	214
32:4	335
32:7–10	214, 215
32:9	215
32:10	214
32:10–14	214
32:11–14	564
32:21–24	214
32:24	335
33	262
33:1	224
33:3	215
33:5	215
33:11	214, 215, 405
33:11–20	214
33:12	215
33:12–18	215
33:18	260
33:19	214, 215, 260
33:20	215, 781
33:21–23	215, 260
34	262
34:5–7	260
34:6	269, 630, 651, 822
34:6–7	215, 245, 262, 527
34:7	215
34:9	215
34:15–16	476
35–40	215, 274

35:4–36:7	215
35:12 LXX	701
36:35	216
39:32–43	215
40:16	215
40:33	217
40:34	215, 445
Leviticus
1–7	42, 445, 447, 448
1–10	448
1:1	448
1:1–17	448
1:1–2:16	449
2:1–16	448
3:1–17	448, 449
4 LXX	576
4–6	42
4:1–5:13	448, 449
4:3	503
5:14–6:7	448, 449
7:1	168
7:36	503
8–10	445, 448
9:7	449
11	447, 448, 762
11–16	446, 449
11:45	444
12	448
12:3	447
13–15	448
14:34–53	449
15:19–20	447
16	279, 365, 448, 449
16:2–14	449
16:14–16	701
17–26	197, 447, 449
17:11	74
18	251, 448, 742, 745, 747
18–20	446, 448
18:5	381
18:6	742
18:20	741
18:22	746, 747
18:24–28	837
18:24–30	449
18:28	181
19:2	448, 449, 721, 738
19:18	166, 382, 445, 446, 447, 738
19:20–22	751

19:34	166
20	251, 742, 745
20:10	741
20:13	746, 747
20:23	407
21	448
21–22	446
21:7	477
21:14	477
22:11	751
22:18–25	476
22:28	381
23	449
23–25	446, 448
23:22	515
23:23–43	449
23:26–32	279
23:42	449
24:15–16	59
24:20	449
25	121, 209, 598
25:1–7	449
25:3–7	332
25:8–12	158
25:35–36	752
25:39–43	752
25:39–46	751
25:55	215
26	273, 354, 444, 575
26:1–13	444
26:3–6	120
26:3–13	274
26:11–12	445
26:12	444
26:14–45	444
26:27–39	449
26:27–45	158
26:42	564
27	448
27:30–32	475
Numbers
1	538, 540
1:1 MT	538
1:1–10:10	538
1:46	538
2–10	446
3	242
4:1–15	405
5–10	539

6:3	236
6:7	236
6:8–16	236
6:19	236
6:24–26	236
10:10	447
10:11–22:1	538
10:11–36:13	447
10:29–12:15	540
10:35–36	63
11	213, 331
11:25–29	390
13–14	405, 406
14	58, 277, 289
14:6–9	289
14:12	289
14:17–19	262
15	446
15–16	539
15:30	448
15:32–36	539
16:31–32	181
17	539
18–19	539
18:21	475
18:21–32	475
18:26	475
19:14	168
20	538
20–21	653
20:1–13	383
20:2–13	213
20:10–12	288
20:14–21	540
21:4–9	63, 539
21:12–32	540
22–24	626
22:2–25:5	540
22:2–36:13	538
23:3–5	626
23:19	48
24:15–19	503
25	58, 538
26	242, 538, 540
26:51	538
27	538
27:1–11	539
27:12–23	405
28–30	539

29:7–11	279
32	61
33:38	114
34:17	405
35	539
36	539

Deuteronomy

1–3	444, 539
1–11	170
1:1–5	168
1:3	169, 170, 171
1:3 MT	171
1:5	168
1:6–8	168
1:8	172
1:9–15	173
1:9–3:29	168
1:30–33	171
1:45	171
2:15	669
3:12–17	406
3:23–29	405, 406
4–26	444
4:1	170
4:1–4	539
4:1–8	168, 171
4:2	169, 407
4:5–6	845
4:6	444
4:6–8	166, 171
4:7	171
4:8	443
4:9	412
4:9–12	410, 413
4:9–13	212
4:9–31	171
4:9–32	168
4:12	48
4:13	170
4:15	48, 462
4:15–28	413
4:15–31	121
4:20	166
4:21	172
4:24	171, 172
4:24–25	172
4:25–28	172
4:26	172
4:26–31	168

4:28	171
4:30	539
4:31	171, 172, 413, 414
4:32–36	171
4:32–38	171
4:32–39	171
4:32–40	168, 171, 412
4:35	169
4:37	168, 171
4:39	169
4:44–28:46	197
5:1	168
5:1–22	171
5:7–21	169
5:8–9	520
5:9	171
5:14	248
5:18	741, 745
5:21	741
5:22	170
5:29	172
5:31	407
6–8	669
6:3–4	168
6:4	168, 171, 188
6:4–5	166, 260, 382
6:4–6	836
6:4–9	172
6:5	166, 355, 444, 445
6:5–19	168
6:6–9	260
6:7–9	332
6:10–15	121, 171
6:13	460
6:14–15	520
6:15	171
6:20–24	748
6:20–25	166, 170, 171, 172
6:21–23	714
6:25	161
7:1	219
7:1–6	449
7:1–26	168
7:2–5	172, 836
7:3–4	476, 836
7:6	161, 171
7:6–8	168, 171, 836
7:7	837
7:7–8	171, 564

7:8	701
7:9	171
7:11-16	172
7:13	171
7:17-24	171
7:21	171
8:2-5	669
8:3	669
8:5	171, 476
8:6	669
8:7-14	171
8:11-20	121
8:15-16	171
8:17-18	837
8:17-20	172
9:1	168
9:1-23	171
9:1-24	172
9:3	171
9:4-5	407, 564
9:4-6	354
9:5	837
9:6	837
9:25-29	564
10:1-4	170
10:1-9	170
10:2	170
10:12	848
10:12-13	172, 630
10:12-21	166
10:12-11:1	168, 172
10:15	166, 171
10:16	354, 413
10:16-20	161
10:16-21	166
10:17	171
10:18	171
11	172
11:1	166
11:8-15	172
11:12	172
11:13	166
11:16-17	172
11:19	332
11:24	406
12	166, 170, 413
12-26	167, 170, 442, 446
12:1-16:15	169
12:2-3	172

12:5	171
12:6	475
12:11	475
12:12	752
12:18	752
12:29–32	407
12:32	681, 730
13:1–5	626
13:3	166
13:14	381
14:1	171
14:2	161, 166, 171
14:22–27	167, 475
14:22–29	475
14:28	475
14:28–29	475
15	515
15:1–2	752
15:7–11	752
15:12–18	752
15:19–23	476
15:21	476
16:10–12	752
16:18	173, 406
16:18–18:22	171, 173
16:22	48
17–25	446
17:14–20	173, 407, 412, 414, 718
17:14–18:22	173
17:15	171
17:18	166
17:18–20	407
17:19	168
18:1–8	382
18:2	406
18:5	171
18:13	738
18:15	166, 715
18:15–18	406
18:15–22	462
18:18–19	162, 624, 851
18:21–22	719
18:22	403
19–25	169
19:18	381
20:3	168
20:16–18	406, 837
21:5	171
22	251

22:8	169
22:13–19	475, 477
22:22–29	741
22:23–24	743
22:25–27	751
22:28–29	476, 477, 742
22:29	477
22:30	742
23:1	28
23:3–6	705
23:5	171
23:15–16	751, 752
23:17–18	745
23:18–19 MT	745
24:1	740
24:1–4	382, 476, 477
24:3–4	477
24:5	744
24:7	752
25:4	332, 382
26:5–9	167
26:5–10	532
26:16–19	171, 172
26:18	161
26:18–19	166
26:19	171
27	405
27–28	273, 444
27:1–10	168
27:20	742
27:22–23	742
28	170, 172, 354, 413
28–31	575
28:1–14	172, 273, 274
28:1–29:1	169
28:9	171
28:15–26	172
28:61	405
28:64–68	274
29–30	171
29:1	168
29:2–4	413
29:10–13	168
29:14–30:1	172
29:20 MT	168
29:21	168
30	170, 273
30:1	354
30:1–5	172

30:1–10	168, 172, 274, 539
30:3–5	354
30:6	166, 413
30:6–9	172
30:6–10	172
30:11–12	381
30:11–20	172
30:15–20	739
30:19	172
31:1–8	405
31:7	406
31:9	167
31:9–13	168
31:14–32:47	539
31:16–18	837
31:16–21	172
31:17	171
31:23	405
31:26	405
31:28	172
32–33	594
32:1–44	63
32:3	171
32:4	171
32:5–6	161
32:8–9	344
32:14–27	172
32:18	161
32:21	171
32:35	48
32:39	171
32:43	670
32:51	171
33	272
33–34	446
33:5	172
33:10	169
33:26	171
33:27	171
34	250
34:1–12	168
34:9	405
34:10	626
Joshua
1–12	289
1:1	406
1:1–9	405
1:1–5:12	405, 406
1:4	406

1:5	406
1:6	406
1:6–9	407
1:7	215
1:7–8	168, 406, 407
1:7–9	405
1:8	168, 552
2	289, 406, 408
2:4–6	462
2:14	406
3–4	182, 406
4:10	405
4:24 LXX	48
5:10–12	406
5:13–15	46
5:13–12:24	405–406, 406
6:17	407
6:21	406
6:25	225
8:3–8	462
8:30–35	168, 300
8:31	170
8:31–35	552
9	408
9:4–7	408
9:15	406
9:18	406
9:21	712
10	44
10:13	44, 552
10:14	45
11:23	405, 406
12	407
12:7–24	406
13:1	405, 406, 408
13:1–21:45	406
14:3–4	406
15:6	405
15:63	406
16:10	406
17:12	406
17:16–18	61
18:1	406
21	406
21:44–45	405
22	406, 408
22:1–24:33	406
23	170
23:2	406, 407

23:6	407, 552
24	169, 170, 300, 404, 406
24:2–18	197
24:19	408
24:25	407
24:25–26	406
24:26	407
24:27–31	413

Judges

1	412
1:1	406
1:1–2	412, 413
1:1–2:5	410
1:2–20	410, 412, 413
1:19	61, 412
1:21	413
1:21–36	412
2:1–4	414
2:6–9	413
2:6–10	410, 413
2:6–16:31	410
2:9–11	300
2:10	412
2:11	412
2:14	61
2:16–19	412
2:17	412
2:18–19	414
2:19	412
2:20–23	410
3:1–6	410
3:7–11	412
3:7–16:31	412
3:11	412, 414
3:19	335
3:22	335
3:24	335
3:30	414
4	254, 478, 552
4–5	289
4:3	61
4:8	254, 289
5	272, 552
5:4–5	552
5:31	414
6:7–10	414
6:11	412
6:13	410, 412
6:25	412

6:29	381
7-8	410
7:2-8	63
7:13 LXX	203
7:15 LXX	203
8:14	552
8:28	414
8:33	412
9	410
9:7-15	559
9:7-20	63
11:26	114
11:32-40	411
13-16	289
13:2-25	468
17-18	412, 706
17-21	410, 412, 719
17:6	410, 412, 413
18:1	410, 412, 413
18:29	115
18:30-31	413
19	410, 413
19-21	412, 706
19:1	410, 412, 413
19:22-25	747
20	413
20-21	300
20:18	413
21:25	410, 412, 413, 712, 719
Ruth
1:4	707
1:6	705, 706
1:8	704, 707
1:8-9	706
1:16	289, 707
1:20	245
1:20-21	706
1:22	707
2	706, 707
2-3	705
2:2	707
2:6	707
2:8	707
2:8-16	707
2:10	707
2:11	289, 707
2:11-12	704, 706
2:19-20	706
2:20	704, 707

2:21	707
3	706, 707
3:9	707
3:10	289, 704, 706, 707
3:10–11	706
4	706, 707
4:5	705, 707
4:10	705, 707
4:11–12	706
4:13	705, 706
4:13–17	225, 707
4:14–15	704, 706
4:15	707
4:18–22	242, 707

1 Samuel

1:1–2:10	468
2:1–10	718
2:7	706
2:10	720
2:28	718
2:31	719
2:31–36	719
3:1	719
3:4	718, 851
3:11–14	719
3:19–4:1	719
4:1–7:1	717
4:11	719
5:11	48
8	650, 717, 762
8–10	332
8–11	345
8–15	718
8:10	719
8:18–20	718
8:20	255
8:21	48
9:1–10:16	717, 762
9:9	381, 626
9:16	503, 719
9:27	719
10:1–9	719
10:1–12	522
10:3–8	719
10:17–19	762
10:17–27	717
10:18–19	719
10:20–27	762
10:24	718

11	717
11:1–15	762
12	170, 717
12:8–12	410
12:13–15	718
12:19	718
12:24–25	718
13	58
13–14	717
13:1–15	762
13:14	718, 719
13:21	62
15	289, 717
15:2–3	719
15:17–19	719
15:22	514
15:23	719
15:24	289
15:26	719
15:26–16:13	289
15:28	626, 719
15:29	48
16:1	718
16:3	503
16:6	814
16:12	719
16:12–13	814
16:13	626, 719
16:14	719
16:14–2 Sam. 5	717
16:18	720
16:23	522, 720
17	255
17:1	255
17:5–7	61
17:11	255
17:23–50	453
18:10	720
21:6	382
22:10	719
22:18–19	719
23:2	719
23:4	719
27:6	719
28	719
28:6–7	719
30:8	719
31	719
31:6	719

2 Samuel

1	552
1:18	552
2:1	719
2:8–5:10	413
3:2–5	242
5–10	718
5:1–3	719
5:6–10	412
5:6–14	719
5:13–16	242
5:17–25	412, 719
5:19	719
5:23	719
6	717
6:1–23	719
6:21	718, 719
7	142, 274, 345, 424, 438, 538, 650, , 762762, , 763763
7:4–5	719
7:8	718
7:10–14	504
7:11–16	719
7:11–17	503
7:12–13	106
7:14	715
7:16	719
8–23	109
8:1–14	719
8:14	61
8:15–18	719
9	719
9–20	717, 718
11	289
11–12	626
11–20	719
11:21	410
12	289
12:1	719
12:1–7	559, 705
12:7	626
12:10–12	719
12:18	289
13–18	289
13–20	719
21–24	717, 718
22:1–51	720
22:2–51	718
22:18	61
22:51	720

23:1	720
23:1-7	718, 720
23:3-4	718
23:5	719
24	720
24:1	798
24:1-10	33, 63
24:11-12	719
24:13	719
24:15	719
24:18	719
1 Kings
1-2	717
1-11	424
2:2-4	169
2:4	720
2:12	719
2:13-25	289
3	423
3-10	715
3:14	720
4	422, 423
5-6	63, 423
5-7	274
5:5	720
6	61, 719
6-7	422, 423
6:1	114, 115
6:2	224
6:36	224
7:1-12	63, 423
7:13	848
7:13-51	63
7:13-9:9	423
8	170, 274, 422
8:10-11	215
8:25	720
8:44-53	423
8:46-53	354
9-11	63
9:3-10	423
9:4-5	720
11	58, 422
11:1-13	289, 423
11:6	720
11:13	215
11:38	720
11:41	552
13:2	424

14:7–18	626
14:8	719
14:25–26	61
17	424
18	422, 424
18:19	626
18:27	335
19:15	626
19:16	503
21	626
21:11	552
21:19	626
22	626
22:8	381
22:19–38	424
22:39	61
2 Kings
3	626
3:4–27	61
3:9–20	522
3:11	381
5:20–27	424
6:17	46
13:21	424
14:3	720
14:6	169
15:3	720
16:5	342
17	58, 274, 379, 422, 423
17–25	424
17:7–23	520
17:19–20	354
18–19	62
18–20	301
18:1–8	63
18:3	720
18:4	261
18:13–20:19	342, 761
18:22	423
18:32–35	423
19	422
19:10–12	423
19:18	423
19:18–19	423
20:16–29	424
21	109
22	478
22–23	167
22:2	720

22:8	169
22:11	169
22:17	423
23:25	169
23:25–27	424
24:14	864
25	354, 538
25:8	115
25:12	864
25:27–30	274

1 Chronicles

1–9	109, 111, 242
1:1	242
2:1	242
2:10	242
2:21	244
3:10–16	242
3:17–24	109, 242
4:9	245
4:17–19	245
6:14	224
7:23–27	244
7:24	245
9:2–34	109
9:3–9	242
9:14–16	242
9:39–44	242
10–21	720
11:1	111
11:1–4	111
13–16	111
13:1–4	111
13:5–6	111
15:3	111
15:16–24	63
16:3	111
16:9–11	522
16:32	736
16:35	522
17:3–14	111
18–20	109, 111
21	712, 720
21:25	111
22–29	111
24:4	378
28:5	111
28:6	111
28:8	381
28:9	112

28:10	111
28:19	111
29:1	111
29:20–25	111
29:22	503

2 Chronicles

1–9	111
1:2	111
5	522
7:8	111
7:9–10	449
7:12–22	111
7:14	110, 112
9:30	111
10–12	345
10–28	111
10:16	111
11:3	111
11:13	111
12:1	111
12:5–8	112
13	111
13:4–12	111, 112
13:8–12	111
13:22	381
15:1–15	112
15:3	169
16:7–9	112
17:4	381
19:8	169
20:15–17	112
22:9	381
24:20–22	111
24:27	381
26:22	342
29–36	111
30:6–9	112
30:19	381
31:12	475
32	301
32:1–26	342
32:25–26	342
32:31	342
32:32	342
33	109
34–35	167
34:14	169
34:15	169
35:25	426

36:15–16 112
36:20–21 158
36:21 209, 353, 449
36:22 115
36:22–23 110

Ezra

1–2 273
1–6 534, 535
1:1 224, 225, 353, 535
1:1–4 225, 534
1:5–Neh. 7:73 534
1:7–11 224
1:11 224
2 224
2:2 533
2:68 224
3:3 224
3:5 449
3:12 302
4:6–23 223
4:11–16 814
5:1 224
5:15 224
6:1–12 225
6:3–4 224
6:7 224
6:14 224, 225
6:14–15 225
6:16 224
6:17 224
6:18 224, 534
6:19 631
6:21 224
6:22 224
7 223
7–10 534, 535
7:1 224, 535
7:1–5 242, 244
7:6 299, 534
7:9 224, 299
7:10 169, 381
7:26 535
7:27 225, 535
8 224
8:31 224
8:35 224
9–10 476, 477
9:8–9 224, 535
9:10–14 224

9:11 449
10 224, 535

Nehemiah

1-7 535
1-12 535
1:1 534, 535
2:1 535
2:8 299
2:18 299
7:73-8:18 128
8 662
8-10 534
8-12 534
8:1 534
8:1-13:31 534
8:7-8 618
8:14 534
8:14-15 449
9 748
9:22-37 410
9:36-37 535
10:29 534
10:38 475
11 534
13 476
13:1 534
13:6 535
13:6-31 535
13:10-12 475
13:23-31 477

Esther

1:1-8:17 194
1:3 195
1:10-12 196
1:21 195
2:3 195
2:5-6 242
2:21-23 196
3 194
3:4 195
3:10 195
4:13-14 195
4:14 195, 289
4:16 195
5:1-2 736
5:14 196
6:3-11 335
6:5 196
7:9-10 196

8	194
8:2	195
9:1–17	196
9:1–10:3	194
Job
1–2	384, 387
1–11	387
1:1	386, 387, 848
1:6	520
1:6–12	388
1:8	386
1:9	386, 388
2:1	520
2:1–6	388
2:3	386
3–31	386
4:17	386
5:7	386
5:12–13	387
5:17–27	386
6:4	386
7:20–21	386
8:3	335
8:3–7	386
9:5–10	388
9:32–35	386
10:1–2	386
10:3	388
10:8–12	388
10:18	388
11:6	386
11:7	335
11:13–16	386
12:2	335
12:7–10	388
13:3	386
13:15	386
13:15–19	386
13:21	386
13:22–24	386
14:7–12	388
14:15	386
14:18–19	388
16:9	736
16:11–14	386
16:18–22	386
19	63
19:23–27	384, 386
19:25–27	386

22:9–11	795
23:10–16	386
24:5	388
24:19	388
26:5–14	388
28	63, 64, 198, 385, 386, 388
28:28	386, 848
29–31	386
31	386, 388
31:1	388
31:9	388
31:24–25	388
31:26–28	388
31:29	388
31:35	386
32–37	386
34:3	386
34:5–6	386
34:9	386
34:35–37	386
35:7	388
35:16	386
36:27–37:24	388
38–39	388
38–41	386, 387, 388
38:1–38	388
38:8–10	640
38:8–11	387
38:21	335
38:26–27	388
38:39–40	388
38:39–39:30	388
39:1	388
39:13–14	384
39:13–16	388
39:19–25	388
40–41	63, 388
40–42	516
41:1–5	335
41:11	388
42:2–6	386
42:3	386
42:5	386
42:6	386
42:7–8	385, 386
42:8–10	386
42:10–15	388
42:10–17	386

Psalms

1	64, 169, 170, 320, 646, 647, 849
1-2	646, 648
1-3	648
1-54	800
1-72	647
1:1	381, 647, 649
1:1-2	646, 647, 648, 649
1:2	442, 646, 650
1:3	320
1:4	320
1:5	646
1:5-6	647
1:6	648
2	66, 277, 333, 364, 505, 647, 649, 650
2:1	503
2:1-2	647, 814
2:2	503, 645, 647, 650
2:4	48
2:7	278, 650, 715
2:8-9	649
2:8-12	648
2:12	647
3	647, 648, 720
3-72	647
3:1	647
3:1-2	647
3:2	647
3:7	647, 648
3:8	647
5:7	651
5:10	648
6:1	651
6:3	307
6:4	651
7	720
7:1	647
7:12-16	648
8	187, 277, 318, 415, 520
8:2	670
8:4-5	46
9:5-6	648
9:8	648
9:12	564
10:4	647
10:6	647
10:11	647
10:13	647
11:1	647
11:6	648

12	648
12:5	648
13	552
13:1–2	307, 647
13:1–3	476
13:3–4	647
13:5	651
13:5–6	647
14	749
14:6	647
16:1	647
17:7	647, 651
18	645, 720
18:2	647
18:30	647
19	170, 261
19:7–14	169
20	645
21	645
22	332, 333, 581, 645, 650
22:1	387, 476, 650
22:6–8	333
22:7–8	563
22:8	333
22:18	563
22:22–31	333
22:24	332, 650, 651
22:26	650
22:27	650
22:29	650
22:31	650
23	457, 595, 604
23:6	651
24	66
24:1	181
25	848
25:3	306
25:5	306
25:6	269
25:7	651
25:10	651
25:21	306, 307
26:3	651
27	563
30	523
31	650
31:1–2	647
31:5	469, 648, 650
31:14–15	648

31:16	651
31:19	647
31:21–22	651
32	645, 651
32:1–2	332
33:1–3	63
33:3	523
33:5	269, 651
33:6	145
33:6–9	815
33:11	245
33:18	306, 651
33:20	306
33:22	306
34	581, 582, 583, 720
34:1	581
34:3	581
34:8	581, 647
34:8–12	170
34:9	769
34:14	582
34:18	651
34:20	583
34:22	647
36:5	651
36:6	320
37	475
37:11	650, 849
37:22	849
38:1	651
38:2	476
39	582
39:7–9 LXX	279
39:12	582
40:3	523
40:6–8	279
40:10–11	651
40:17	648
42:4	306
42:5	306
42:6	306
42:11	306
44	648
45	645
45:6–7	670
47	66
49:14	320
51	312, 651, 720
51:1	651

51:5	312
51:17	856
52	720
52:8	320
54	720
56	720
57	720
57:3	651
58	648
59	720
60	720
61:7	651
62:1	616
62:3	616
62:5–6	306
63	720
63:3	651
65:5	306
65:12–13	523
66:1	649
68	187, 272, 552
68:20	714
69	581, 645, 650
69:3	563
69:21	563
69:34	856
71:5	306
72	645, 647, 649, 650
72:1–2	415
72:1–4	647
72:1–7	647
72:2	647
72:3	647
72:4	647
72:5–6	647
72:7	647
72:8	647, 863
72:8–11	647
72:12	647
72:12–13	647
72:12–14	647
72:14	647
72:15–17	647
72:16	647
72:17	647
73	475, 713
73:1–15	647
73:11	647
73:24	202

74:1	476
74:10	307
74:12–14	712
75:1 LXX	243
76:1	243
77	272
78	58, 414, 539
78:54–72	410
78:56–64	414
78:65–72	414
79:5	307, 320
80	236, 552
80:4	307
82	46, 649, 650
82:1	520
82:5	795
82:6	361
83	648
83:9–12	410
85:10	651
86:11	848
86:15	651
87	328
89	142, 438, 645, 648, 649, 650
89:8	520
89:14	651
89:38	648
89:38–51	648
89:46	307, 320
89:51	648
90	144
90–106	649
92:3	522
92:4 MT	522
93	646, 648, 649, 650
93:1	646
94:3	307
94:12	476
95	261
95–99	646, 648, 649, 650
95:3	646
95:6	460
95:7–11	383
96–99	650
96:1	523, 650
96:7	646
96:10	646, 650
96:11–12	646
96:12	523

96:13	646
97	596
97:1	596, 646, 650
97:2	596, 646
97:2-6	596
97:2-9	596
97:3-5	596
97:6	596, 646
97:7	121
97:10-12	596
97:11	646
97:12	646
98:1	523, 650
98:2	646
98:3	564
98:6	646
98:7-8	646, 856
98:7-9	523
98:9	646
99:1	646, 650
99:4	415, 646
99:7	415
100	648
100:1	649
100:3	648
100:4	648
100:5	651
102:12	245
102:25-27	670
103:6-14	262
103:8	269, 651
103:11	651
103:17	651
103:19	420
103:21	520
104	64, 181, 251
104:4	47
104:9	640
104:24	848
104:25-30	303
104:30	145
105	251, 306, 539
106	251, 306
106:1	651
106:20	121
106:34-46	410
107:1	651
107:8	651
107:15	651

107:21	651
107:23–29	516
107:31	651
107:43	651
109	563, 648
109:1 LXX	279
109:4 LXX	278
109:25	563
109:31	648, 651
110	66, 187, 277, 278, 364, 645
110:1	279, 382, 505, 582
110:1–4	278
110:4	278, 279, 383
111:2	381
111:10	170, 848
112:3–4	648
113–118	649
115:1	651
115:4	121
115:4–7	121
115:4–8	172
115:16	121, 181
117:1	649
117:2	651
118	650
118:1–4	651
118:22–23	383
118:25–26	650
118:29	651
119	169, 170, 649
119:1	730
119:8–10	730
119:10	381
119:18	261
119:44–45	215
119:45	381
119:64	269
119:94	381
119:155	381
119:160	819
120–134	649
121	146
121:4	48
124	146
124:8	460
127:3	706
130	581, 651
130:3–4	74
130:4	215

130:5	306
130:8	808
131:3	306
132	645
135:5–7	121
135:15–18	121
136	552
136:1–26	651
137	648, 660, 732
137:8–9	648
138:2	651
139	234, 648
140:12	648, 651
142	720
144	645
144:9	523
145	269
145:8	269
145:8–9	262
145:11–13	420
146	306
147:11	306
148	856
149	649
149–150	63
149:1	523
149:2	649
149:5	649
149:7–9	649
149:9	649
150:6	648, 649
Proverbs
1–3	713
1–9	236, 638, 639, 640, 849
1–24	236
1:1–7	638
1:2–6	63
1:2–7	639
1:3	639
1:6	639
1:7	57, 198, 261, 639, 844, 848
1:7–9	552
1:20–33	640
2–7	332
2:16–19	640
3	582, 583
3:9–10	387
3:13–18	844
3:19–20	387, 640, 848

3:34	350
5:3–6	640
5:8	640
5:15–19	640, 849
5:15–20	640
5:15–23	744
7:24–27	640
8	638, 640, 713, 848, 849
8:1–9:6	640
8:9	639
8:15–16	639
8:22	120, 638
8:22–31	387, 640, 847
8:29	640
8:30	638
8:35	640
9:1–6	640
9:1–18	640
9:10	57, 198, 639, 844, 848
9:13–18	640
10	475
10–15	638, 639, 640, 847
10–24	236
10–29	638, 640
10–30	639
10:1	638
10:3	638
10:12	350
10:27–32	387
11:1	639
11:4	639
12:10	641
12:10–11	639
12:25	639
14:1	848
14:10	639
14:13	639
14:31	639, 641
14:34	639
16–29	638, 640
16:1–15	639
16:10–15	639
16:11	639
16:11–13	639
16:18	749
17:3	639
17:17	639
17:17–18	639
17:18	639

17:27–28	639
18:22	640
20:23	259
22:6	201
22:17–20	638
22:17–23:11	847
22:17–23:14	638
24:3–4	848
24:15–16	387
24:23	638
25	639
25:1	63, 638
25:11	639
25:18	639
26:1–12	849
26:4–5	387, 638, 639, 845, 849
26:7	639
27:8	639
27:14	639
28–29	639, 847
28:5	639
28:8–9	639
28:19	639
29:4	639
29:7	639
29:12	639
29:14	639
30:1	638
31	638
31:1	638
31:1–9	639
31:10	706
31:10–31	639, 640
31:30	639

Ecclesiastes

1:2	183
1:3	184
1:9	145
1:13	183
2:3	183
2:24	643
2:26	643
3:13	643
4:9–12	245
5:18–20	849
5:19	643
6:2	643
8:15	643
9:9	744

9:9–10	849
9:10	183
11:8–10	184
12:1–8	184
12:8	183
12:9–10	457
12:12	145
12:13	198

Song of Songs

1:2–4	758
1:5	683
1:13	758, 759
2:4	35
2:7	760
3:5	760
5:2–6:3	760, 761
6:13	759
8:4	760

Isaiah

1–5	338
1–11	340
1–12	629
1–33	338, 340
1–39	58, 337, 342, 343
1–55	629
1:1	338, 628
1:1–2:4	338
1:2	338, 343
1:2–4	629
1:2–15	50
1:2–31	338
1:4	343
1:8	340
1:9	342
1:9–10	341
1:10	169
1:10–20	63
1:11	514
1:12–15	449
1:16–17	627
1:17	514
1:21	650
1:26	341, 410
1:27	344, 650
2:1	338
2:1–4	301, 338, 343
2:1–5	338
2:1–6	337
2:2	625

2:2-4	342, 514, 630, 650
2:3	342, 344
2:4	631
2:5	795
2:6-4:1	338
2:8	121
2:11-12	338, 343
2:17	338, 343
3:1-4	217
3:6-12	58
3:9	341
3:10-12	583
3:18-24	582
4:1	337
4:2-4	337
4:2-6	273, 338, 342, 543
4:6	339
5-7	345
5:1-7	120, 339, 381, 626, 630
5:1-30	338
5:3	339
5:4-6	343
5:7	650
5:8-25	344
5:11-12	522
5:15-16	343
5:18-30	342
5:19	343
5:24	169
6	221, 338, 340, 481, 483, 627
6-8	339
6:1-5	781
6:3	461
6:5	339, 343, 461
6:8-9	341
6:9	297, 342, 344
6:9-10	342, 362, 381
6:10	204
7	343
7-8	339
7-11	339, 668
7:1	342
7:1-17	781
7:3	339
7:4	339, 344, 781
7:9	339, 344
7:11	339
7:11-13	339
7:13	630

7:14	106, 325, 336, 337, 339, 342, 343, 630, 668, 814
7:17	341
7:18	48
7:20	343
8	158
8-9	345
8:7-8	339
8:8-9	343
8:12-13	344, 583
8:14	339, 342, 343, 583
8:14-15	158
8:15	339
8:17	339, 342
8:20	169
8:22	339
9	336, 339, 343
9-11	339
9:1-2	342, 668
9:1-7	515
9:2	344, 795
9:2-7	274
9:3	339
9:4	341, 410
9:6	668
9:6-7	342
9:7	343, 650
10-19	217
10:1-4	344, 345
10:1-19	542
10:2-23	630
10:5	343
10:5-15	527
10:5-19	630
10:10-11	344
10:12	343
10:12-14	514
10:15-19:22	217
10:20-22	344, 514
10:22	341
10:22-23	342
10:24	344
10:24-27	339
10:26	341, 410
10:27	336
11	187, 336, 339, 343
11:1	343
11:1-2	720
11:1-4	504
11:1-5	342

11:1-9	274, 503, 515, 631
11:1-10	627
11:2	343
11:2-3	344
11:5	343
11:6	337
11:6-9	142, 702
11:10	342
11:11	344, 514
11:16	341, 344
12	339, 340
12:2	339, 344
13	514
13-23	337, 339, 340, 343, 628, 630
13:1	338
13:1-14:23	273, 339
13:6	736
13:6-8	795
13:19	341
14	158, 342
14:4-20	798
14:12	46
14:12-15	342
14:28-17:14	339
14:32	339
15:1	217
16:1	336
16:3-4	752
16:5	336, 342
17-33	339
17:12-14	339
18-21	339
18:7	339
19:16	344
19:19-25	628
19:23	344
21:6	272
22:1-14	339
24	339
24-25	339
24-27	52, 337, 339, 340, 713
24:5-6	341
24:10	339
24:12	339
24:14-16	339
24:18	341
24:20	339
24:21-22	339
24:23	339, 344

25:1–5	339
25:2	339
25:3	339
25:4	339
25:6	343
25:6–8	339, 543
25:8	342
25:9	344
25:9–12	339
25:10–11	340
25:10–12	339
26	187
26–27	339
26:1	339, 344
26:1–19	339
26:2–4	339
26:3–4	344
26:5	339
26:5–6	339
26:8	344
26:12–13	344
26:14	339
26:15	339
26:16	339
26:17–18	344
26:19	440, 516
26:19–27:1	339
26:21	339
27:1	339, 343
27:2–5	339
27:3	339, 343
27:9	342
27:10	339
27:13	339
28	158
28–33	339, 340
28:1	339
28:5	336
28:11–12	342
28:13	339
28:16	339, 342, 344, 583
28:16–17	343
28:17–29	339
28:21	341, 343
28:23–29	848
29:1	341
29:1–15	339
29:9–10	339, 344
29:10	342

29:13	342, 568
29:14	342
29:18	339, 344, 516
29:22	341
30:1	339
30:1–2	339
30:1–14	627
30:9	169
30:10 MT	738
30:10–11	344
30:15	339
30:18–20	476
30:32	343
31:1	339
31:8	339
32	343
32–33	339
32:1	339, 342, 650
32:3–4	339, 344
32:14–17	625
32:15–20	342
32:16–17	650
32:17	339
33	343
33:1	339
33:2	344
33:6	344
33:17	339
33:22	339, 343
33:23	344
33:24	342
34	340, 527
34–35	337, 339, 340
34–66	338, 340
34:8	340
34:9	340
34:10	340
34:11	343
34:13	340
35	273, 340
35:1–39:8	761
35:4	340, 344
35:5–6	344, 516
35:6	337, 340
35:7	340
35:8	340, 344
36–38	340
36–39	301, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 342
36:2	339

36:14–20	343
37	158
37:1	339
37:6	339, 344
37:21–38	340
37:26	340
37:30	339, 340
37:31–32	514
37:32	340
37:33–37	343
37:35	341
38	340
38:5	341
38:5–6	340
38:7	339
38:9–20	342
38:22	339
39	340
39:1	339
39:5–7	339, 340
40	63, 338, 340, 481, 583
40–48	340
40–55	29, 100, 224, 260, 337, 340, 345, 373, 481, 630, 650
40–66	337, 342, 343, 520, 536
40:3	342, 344, 481, 482, 715
40:3–4	342
40:3–5	383
40:6–8	342, 350
40:8	670
40:9	263, 344
40:9–11	481
40:11	343
40:12–17	520
40:12–26	121
40:18–20	520
40:25–26	520
40:26	341
40:28	520
40:31	307
41	340
41:2	340, 341
41:6–7	121
41:8	251, 341
41:8–9	94
41:8–10	341
41:10	344
41:13–14	344
41:14	343
41:25	341

42	340
42:1	343, 481
42:1-3	342
42:1-4	668
42:1-9	650
42:2-3	341
42:3-4	343
42:4	342
42:5	341
42:6	341, 343, 630
42:6-7	341
42:7	344
42:8	121
42:10	523, 650
42:13	343, 344
42:16	344
42:18	516
42:18-20	341, 344
42:24-25	342
43-44	341
43:1	341, 344
43:1-7	536
43:4-7	798
43:5	344
43:8	297, 344
43:10	336, 344
43:10-13	520
43:14	217, 341, 514
43:14-19	217
43:14-21	341
43:15	217, 343
43:16-17	217
43:16-24	383
43:19	217, 344
43:20-21	342
43:22	749
43:22-24	514
43:24	514
44:1-2	344
44:1-4	625
44:1-20	259
44:2	344
44:6	341, 343, 687
44:8	344
44:9	121
44:9-10	344
44:9-28	121
44:11	121
44:15	344

44:17	344
44:18	344
44:18–20	121
44:22–24	341
44:24	520
44:24–45:25	341
44:26	481
44:28	341
44:28–45:1	273
45:1	341
45:4	341
45:5	258
45:5–6	343
45:5–7	520
45:7	341
45:12	121, 341, 342
45:13	481
45:18	121, 341, 520
45:20	121
45:20–23	520
45:21–24	364
45:22–23	343
45:22–25	520
45:23	342, 421, 589
46–47	341
46:1–2	121
46:1–4	341
46:10–11	343
46:13	344
48:11	121, 589
48:12	687
48:17–19	631
48:19	341
48:20	341
48:20–21	341
48:22	340
49–57	340, 341
49:1	341, 625
49:1–6	650
49:1–13	341
49:6	29, 225, 341, 342, 630
49:6–7	343
49:7	343
49:8	342, 343
49:8–9	341
49:8–11	563
49:8–13	383
49:11	344
49:14–50	341

49:18	342
49:18–21	341
50:4–11	341
50:6	563
50:10	344
50:11	381
51:1–2	341
51:1–52:12	341
51:3	341
51:4–7	342
51:7	169, 344
51:9	343, 344
51:9–10	341
51:11	701
51:12	344
52	187
52–53	582, 583
52:5	342
52:7	263, 342, 527, 650
52:11	342
52:11–12	341
52:13–53:12	55, 159, 336, 341, 345, 576
52:15	342
53	73, 74, 75, 341, 343, 583, 662, 750
53:1	342, 344
53:1–6	344
53:3	337
53:4	342, 668
53:4–5	564
53:7	563
53:7–8	342
53:9	342
53:10	74, 341
53:11 MT	563
53:12	342, 343
54	341
54–66	341
54:1	342
54:1–3	341
54:4	344
54:5	343, 744
54:9	341
54:9–10	341
54:11–12	481
54:13	342
54:14	344
55–66	52, 337
55:1	234, 341
55:3	341, 342, 343

55:6–8	341, 344
55:11	330, 613, 851
55:12–13	341
56	338
56–57	341
56–58	344
56–66	302
56:1–8	342
56:3–8	225
56:6–7	781
56:6–8	520
56:7	342
57	187
57:11	344
57:13	121
57:14	344
57:16	341
57:21	340
58–66	340
58:1	341
58:8	341
58:11	344
59	187
59:7–8	342
59:9–15	344
59:10	344
59:12–13	341
59:15–19	341
59:17	340, 343
59:19	341, 344
59:20	341
59:20–21	342
60	187, 341
60–62	63, 274
60:1–2	341
60:1–16	520
60:7	341
60:9	341
60:13	341
60:17–20	631
60:19	341
60:21	341, 631
61	618, 662
61:1	516
61:1–2	342, 468
61:1–3	341, 343
61:2	340
61:2–3	336
61:3	341

61:6	341
61:7	341
61:8	342
61:9	341
61:10	341
62	543
62:2	341
62:3	341
62:4–5	341, 744
62:5	478
62:6–7	214
62:10	344
62:11	342
62:12	341
63–66	338
63:1–6	341, 344
63:4	340
63:7–64:12	341
63:9–13	341
63:15–64:12	344
63:16	341
64:1	715
64:4	342
64:8	343
65–66	52
65:1–2	342
65:9	341
65:17	306
65:17–25	341
65:25	306
66	481, 798
66:1–2	342
66:11–12	341
66:18–19	341
66:18–21	536
66:18–23	341
66:19–21	343
66:24	338, 340, 341, 381
Jeremiah
1	627
1:1–19	352
1:4	628
1:4–10	94
1:5	353, 625
2	301, 352, 355
2:1	761
2:1–7	539
2:1–6:30	352
2:2	478, 744

2:5	121
2:11	121
2:33–34	629
3:1–5	629
3:6–11	629
3:8	478
3:14	354
3:14–18	352
3:18	627
3:20	744
4:4	320, 354, 355
4:4 LXX	740
4:19–22	352
4:23–26	630
5:5	361
5:10	630
5:22	640
6:16	355, 361
6:20	514
6:22–30	795
7:1–11	468
7:1–15	352, 355, 630
7:1–20:18	352
7:5–7	515
7:9	627
7:11	781
7:16	352
8:22–9:3	352
8:22–9:9	352, 630
9:22–23	332
10:1–10	121
10:10	819
10:11–16	121
11:3–4	354
11:11–20	352
11:14	352
11:18–23	351
12:1–6	351
12:7	669
14:8	306
14:22	306
15:1	352, 630
15:10–14	351
15:15–21	351
15:19	352
16:2–4	352
16:14–15	352
17:13	306
17:14–18	351

18	510
18:1-11	668
18:18	169
18:18-23	351
18:19-23	514
19:1-13	668
20:7-12	351
20:14-18	351, 352
21:1-25:38	352
21:2	381
22	352
22:3	515
22:5	669
22:13-17	650
23:1-8	220, 274
23:5	720
23:5-6	352, 503
23:29	381
24	353, 514
24:2-7	514
24:4	631
24:7	352
24:8	514
24:8-10	353
25	352
25:9-14	514
25:11-12	630, 631
25:12-14	353
26:1-36:32	352
26:2-6	630
27:8-11	626
28	353
28:2-4	627
29	696
29:1-14	273
29:7	696
29:10	427
29:14	353
29:17	514
30-33	273, 274, 353, 543
30:1-33:26	352
30:6	354
30:12-15	353
30:12-17	353
30:16-17	353
31	278
31:12	536
31:15	343
31:18	352, 476

31:20	630
31:22	536
31:27–34	142
31:31	446
31:31–34	140, 142, 172, 351, 353, 438, 536, 627, 630, 666
31:32	670
31:33	355, 446
31:33–34	279
31:34	513, 631
31:38–40	353
32	353
32:6–15	668
32:17	353
32:21–22	353
32:27	353
32:39–40	351, 353
32:40	142
34	353
34:8–22	752
35–36	353
36:3	513
37–39	353
37:1–45:5	352
37:13–16	353
38:21–23	626
39	514
39:10	864
40:7	864
42:18–22	353
43	353
44:12–14	514
46–51	353, 628
46:1–52:34	352
48:47	353
49:6	353
49:39	353
50	514
50–51	273, 353, 527
50:34	353
51:15–19	121
52	354

Lamentations

1:8	427
1:11	427
1:12	427
1:13	427
1:15	427
1:18	427
2:2	427

2:14	427
2:17	427
3	426, 427
3:23	301
3:25–33	427
3:43	427
4	426
4:20	427
5:22	427
Ezekiel
1	221, 630, 781
1–3	158, 627
1–7	219
1:1–3	219
1:22–26	41
1:26–27	221
1:27	320
1:28	140
2:8–3:11	219
3	219
3:1–3	330
3:16	628
3:17–21	221, 627
7:4	48
7:26	169
8–9	46
8–11	219, 301
8–13	219
8:1	219
9–10	158
9:4	221
9:8	220
10	630
11:16	196
11:19	354
12:21–13:23	219
14	221
14–19	219
14:1	219
14:1–12	219
14:14	387
14:20	387
16	219, 220, 528, 761
16:8	744
16:44–45	553
16:60	172
17	158, 220
17:1–10	559
17:3–4	503

17:22–23	503
18	219, 221, 514
18:1–32	219
18:15	429
18:32	220
19	158
20	539
20–24	219
20:1	219
20:5	344
20:32–44	220
22:7	515
22:30	214
23	219, 761
24:15–27	219
25	219
25–32	220
26–28	219
26–32	527, 628
28	342
28:1–10	798
29–32	219
31	158
33	219
33:1–9	221, 627
33:21	219
33:23–29	221
33:33	220
34	140, 220, 398
34–48	219, 220, 223
34:1–24	221, 627
34:1–31	536
34:20–24	274
34:23–24	220, 503
34:25	142
34:25–31	120, 172
34:27	142
35:1–36:15	220
36–37	273
36:16–37	438, 536
36:16–38	220
36:26–27	627
36:26–28	306
37	140, 218, 221, 222, 303
37:1–14	219, 220
37:1–28	536
37:5–6	306
37:9–10	303, 306
37:14	306

37:15–28	220
37:24	720
37:24–25	503
38–39	220, 631
40–48	162, 219, 220, 273, 274, 302, 543, 781
43–48	220
43:1–47:23	536
43:2	320
43:7	220
44–48	631
44:1–3	221
44:22	477
47	631
47:1–12	390
47:12	535
47:22	536

Daniel

1	157, 158
1–6	373
1:1–2	157
2	52, 156, 157
2:21	157
2:34	156
2:34–35	158
2:44	157
3	156, 157, 159
4	158
4:3	420
4:10–12	159
4:34	420
4:34–35	157
4:37	157
6	157
6:18 ET	430
6:19	430
6:19 ET	430
6:19–20	430
6:20	430
6:26	420
7	52, 66, 156, 158, 345, 362, 364, 696
7–12	157, 158, 374
7:1	156
7:9	382
7:9–10	156, 670
7:9–14	46, 157
7:13	66, 156, 158, 483
7:13–14	382, 439, 670
7:15–28	52
7:18	158

7:21–22	157
7:22	158
7:27	158
8	156, 157, 158
8:13	157
8:14	157, 158
9	157, 158
9–11	157
9:1–2	332
9:2	158, 353, 631
9:4–16	172
9:20–27	156, 332
9:24	74, 209
9:24–27	158, 440
9:26	503
10	158
10:6	320
10:13	46, 158
10:20–11:1	158
11	156, 157
11–12	156
11:3	157
11:16	157
11:24–45	156
11:27	157
11:29	157
11:31	669, 798
11:32	156
11:33	158, 159
11:33–34	156
11:36	157, 798
11:36–45	156, 157
11:40–45	158
11:45	157
12	159, 676
12:1–3	156, 158
12:2	440
12:2–3	440
12:3	158, 159, 675
12:10	156
12:11	669
12:12	156
12:13	440
Hosea
1	308
1–2	59
1–3	308, 761
1:1	308
1:2	310

1:9–10	308
2:1–5	310
2:3	320
2:7–8	310
2:9	404
2:14–15	539
2:15	308
2:16–17 MT	539
2:19	310
2:19–20	744
2:23	308, 333
2:25 MT	333
3	308
3:1–5	310
3:5	310, 627
4–13	308
4:2	310
4:6	121
4:6–9	308, 310
4:7	121
4:10–13	310
4:12–19	520
4:16	310, 320
5:4	120, 310
5:7	310
5:10	320
5:12	320
5:13	310
5:14	320
6:1–6	310
6:2	308
6:6	308, 310, 514, 630
7	308
7:1	308
7:8–12	310
7:16	121
8	50
8:2–6	310
8:4	121
8:4–6	520
8:6	121
9:7–9	308
9:9	410
9:11	310
10:5–6	520
10:9	410
11:1	94, 217, 308, 343, 487, 668, 669
11:1–3	310
11:1–4	59, 308

11:1-9	273
11:3	308
11:4	308
11:5	310
11:7-9	301
11:8-9	308, 630
11:8-11	310
11:9	48, 309
11:10-11	310
11:10-12	308
11:12	309
12	251
12:3	630
12:3-4	553
12:6	310
12:7-8	310
13:1-2	627
13:1-3	121
13:1-8	520
13:2	121
13:3	320
13:4-5	308
13:5	308
13:7-8	320
13:9-16	308
13:16	514
14	308, 353
14:1 MT	514
14:1-3	520
14:4	308
14:4-9	308, 310
14:5	320
14:5-8	320
14:9	308, 474
14:10 MT	474
Joel
1:1	389
1:1-14	389
1:4	389
1:5-7	389
1:6	389, 390
1:8-10	389
1:11-12	389
1:13-15	627, 721
1:15	795
1:15-18	389
1:19	390
1:19-20	389
2	303

2:1	389, 391
2:1–11	389
2:2	389, 390
2:2–11	389
2:3	389
2:3–8	389
2:4–5	390
2:10	389, 390
2:11	389, 391
2:12–14	262
2:12–17	627
2:13	390, 630, 631
2:13–14	527
2:16–20	389
2:18–27	389, 390
2:19	389, 390, 404
2:20	389
2:21–22	390
2:21–23	389
2:23	389, 390
2:24	389
2:25	389
2:25–27	389
2:26	389, 390
2:26–27	390
2:27	390
2:28	390
2:28–29	306, 578, 631
2:28–32	383, 390, 391, 625
2:29	389
2:31	390
2:31–32	795
2:32	390, 391, 630
3	631
3:1	390
3:1 MT	390
3:1–2	390
3:1–2 MT	631
3:1–5 MT	390, 391
3:1–8	630
3:1–12	670
3:1–16	390
3:2	389
3:2–4	390
3:4	389
3:4 MT	390
3:4–8	389, 390
3:5 MT	390, 391, 630
3:10	390, 631

3:12	390
3:13	390, 391
3:14	390
3:15	390
3:16	38, 389, 390, 631
3:16–19	543
3:17	390
3:17–18	631
3:18	390, 391
3:19	389
3:21	390
4 MT	631
4:1–8 MT	630
4:1–16 MT	390
4:2 MT	390
4:2–3 MT	390
4:4 MT	389
4:4–8 MT	389
4:4–8 MT	390
4:10 MT	631
4:10–13 MT	390
4:12 MT	390
4:14 MT	390
4:15 MT	390
4:16 MT	38, 389, 390, 631
4:17 MT	390
4:17–18 MT	631
4:18 MT	390, 391
4:19 MT	389
4:21 MT	390

Amos

1–2	38, 628, 630
1:1	37
1:2	37, 38, 389, 631
1:3–2:3	543
1:3–2:5	37
1:7	389
1:9	543
1:9–10	389
1:11	389
1:11–12	404, 543
2:4–11	332
2:6–8	629
2:6–16	37
2:6–5:27	781
2:8	38
2:9–10	37
2:9–11	630
3	37

3:1-2	37
3:2	213, 444, 629
3:3-8	37
3:8	36
3:9-11	37
4	37
4:4	36
4:4-5	37
4:6	36
4:6-12	37
4:13	36, 37, 342
5:1-3	626
5:1-17	37
5:8-9	37
5:10-13	37
5:14	37
5:18-20	36, 37, 438, 795
5:18-27	37
5:21-23	37
5:21-24	63, 197, 449, 514, 627
5:21-25	514
5:23-24	522
5:24	306, 415, 630, 650
5:25-27	38
5:26-27	36
6	37
6:1-3	37
6:4	61
6:4-6	522
6:12	37
7:1-3	626
7:1-8:3	37
7:8	37
7:10-17	37
7:14-15	627
8:2	37
8:4-14	37
8:9	36
8:11	37
9	732
9:1-4	37
9:5-6	37
9:6	36
9:7	37
9:8-10	37
9:10	37
9:11	36, 503, 504, 630
9:11-12	36, 38, 51
9:11-15	37, 38

9:12 404
9:13–15 627

Obadiah

1 542, 628
2–10 542
2–18 542
3 542
3–4 542
4 542
8 542
9 542
10 542
11–12 543
11–14 543
12 543
13–14 543
15 543
15–21 543
17 543
18 542, 543
20 543
21 543

Jonah

1 402
1:14–16 402
2 402
3 402
3:4–5 630
3:4–9 691
3:9–10 527
3:9–4:4 527
3:10 402, 403
3:10–4:3 262
4 402
4:1–2 262
4:2 527, 630, 631
4:6 402
4:9 402

Micah

1–3 513
1:1 512
1:1–5:15 513
1:2–16 513
1:5 513
2–5 513
2:1–2 513
2:1–5 513
2:1–5:15 513
2:3 513

2:3–5	514
2:12–13	513, 514
3:1	513
3:1–2	513
3:4	514
3:5–6	513
3:7	514
3:8	513
3:10	630
3:10–11	514
3:12	514, 630
4–5	513
4:1–3	342
4:1–4	630
4:1–5	120, 301
4:1–5:14 MT	514
4:1–5:15	514
4:6–7	514
4:6–8	514
4:10	513
4:10–11	514
5:2	667, 668
5:2–5	503, 720
5:6–7 MT	514
5:6–8 MT	514
5:7–8	514
5:7–8 MT	514
5:7–9	514
5:8–9	514
5:9	514
6	514
6:1–8	513
6:1–7:6	513
6:1–7:20	513
6:4	630
6:6–8	346, 514, 630
6:7	513
6:8	415, 514, 707
6:9–7:20	513
7:1–7	515
7:7–20	513
7:18	513, 527
7:18–20	513, 514
7:19	513
Nahum
1	527
1:1	527, 533, 628
1:2–8	527
1:6	320

1:7–2:1	527
1:9–10	527
1:11	527
1:12–14	527
1:14–2:1	527
1:15	263, 527
2:1 LXX	263
2:1–10	527
2:11–12	527
2:13	527
3	527
3:1–4	527
3:5–7	527
3:8–12	527
3:13–17	527
3:18–19	527

Habakkuk

1	271, 630
1–2	272
1:2–3	476
1:2–4	271
1:4	272
1:5	272
1:5–11	271
1:12–13	476, 721
1:12–17	38, 271
1:13	251
2	271
2:1	271, 272
2:1–20	273
2:2–3	271
2:2–5	271
2:2–20	271
2:3	272
2:3–4	301
2:4	161, 227, 271, 272, 630
2:4–5	271
2:5	271
2:6–20	271
2:13	271
2:14	271, 631
2:17	271
2:18	121
2:19	121
2:20	271
3	271, 272, 552
3:2	271
3:3–7	271
3:8–15	271

3:13–15 271
3:16 271
3:17–19 271

Zephaniah

1:1–2:3 864
1:2–3 864
1:2–18 864
1:5 864
1:14 865
1:18 864
2 864
2:1–3 864
2:3 864, 865
2:4 864
2:4–3:8 864
2:5–11 864
2:12 864
2:12–15 864
2:13–15 864
3 864
3:1–7 864
3:6–7 864
3:8 864
3:8–13 864
3:9–20 864
3:12 864
3:13 630
3:14–20 864
3:15 864
3:19–20 306

Haggai

1:1 115, 273, 274
1:2–6 274
1:2–11 273, 274
1:2–15 273
1:6 273
1:8 273
1:9 273
1:12–14 274
1:13–14 273
2:1–19 274
2:4–5 274
2:5 274
2:6–8 274
2:9 274
2:10–14 274
2:15–19 274
2:20–23 274
2:23 274

Zechariah

1-6	862
1-8	273
1:2-3	630
1:4	863
1:12-17	631
1:16	863
1:16-17	863
1:21	863
2:4-15	865
2:9	863
2:10	863
2:11	863, 864
2:12	863
2:15 MT	863
3:8	863
3:9	74
4:10	631
6:7-8	863
6:12-13	863
7-8	862
7:3-5	427
7:7	863
7:8-10	627, 631
7:12	863
8-14	52
8:1-5	863
8:1-16	120
8:12-13	863
8:20-23	225, 863
9-11	474
9-14	302, 862
9:1	475
9:1-7	863
9:8	863
9:9	668
9:9-10	503, 631
9:9-12	863
9:10	863
9:12	863
9:16-17	863
10:6	863
11:3	863
11:4-16	863
11:6	863
11:12-13	668
12-14	474, 631
12:1	475
12:1-2	863

12:3–4	863
12:9	863
12:10	503
12:10–13:1	863
13:1	390
13:7	383
13:7–9	863
13:8–9	863
14	781, 862
14:1–2	863
14:3	863
14:3–9	390
14:5	670
14:9	421
14:12	863
14:16	863
14:20–21	781
Malachi
1–2	481
1:1	474, 475
1:1–5	474
1:1–9	513
1:2	474
1:2–5	474, 475, 476, 514
1:2–4:6	475
1:6–2:9	474
1:6–2:16	475
1:6–4:6	475
1:8	476
1:10–14	475
1:13	514
2	476
2:6	169
2:6–9	476
2:8–12	475
2:9	169
2:10–16	474
2:13–16	744
2:14	740
2:15–16	740
2:16	475, 476
2:17	476
2:17–3:5	474, 476, 481
2:17–4:6	475
3	481
3:1	481, 482, 504, 670, 715
3:1–3	481
3:5	482, 515
3:6–12	474

3:7–9	481
3:8	475
3:10	475
33::1313—2121	MTMT	474474
3:13–4:3	474
3:20–24	MT 474
3:21–24	MT 474
3:22	MT 474
3:22–24	MT 474, 475
3:23–24	MT 474
3:24	MT 475
4:2–6	474
4:3–6	474
4:4	474
4:4–6	170, 474, 475, 631
4:5	504
4:5–6	474, 670

Tobit

3:3–5	54
3:7–8	55
3:16–17	55
3:17	55
4:8–11	56
8:1–3	55
12:12–15	55
12:13–14	54
12:18	55
13–14	54
14:4	54

Additions to Esther

13:9–11	55
13:15	196
13:15–17	54
13:16	196
14:5	196
16:16	55, 196

Wisdom of Solomon

1–5	54, 56
1:16	55
2:12–20	563
2:18	563
2:21–24	55
2:23–24	553
2:24	56
3:5	54
6:4	421
7:15–22	848
7:25–26	55
7:27	55

8:1	55
9:1–2	55
9:9	55
9:15	56
10:10	421
11–19	55
12–15	520
13:1–9	54
14:22–27	699
Sirach
15:11–15	56
21:16 LXX	203
24:1–23	54
24:19	361
24:23	638
25:24	553
29:9–12	56
33:10–13	55
33:11–13	56
36:13	54
36:16	54
39:16–21	54
39:33–35	54
46:11–12	410
48:10	504
48:17–25	336
48:22	336
48:23–24	336
51:23–27	361
Baruch
1:15–18	54
2:7–10	535
2:11	54
2:14–15	54
3:5	54
3:36–4:4	54
Prayer of Azariah
3–9	54
Susanna
44–46	55
1 Maccabees
1:41–64	374
2	374
2:68	696
4:36–61	374
14:41	504
2 Maccabees
1:10–2:18	535
6:1–11	374

6:12–16	54
7	54, 56, 676
7:18	54
7:28	54
7:37–38	54, 55
12:39–45	56
15:12–14	56

3 Maccabees

2:3–10	54
2:9	54
2:15–16	54
2:16	54
6:3–9	54
6:15	54
6:28	54
7:6	54
7:9	54

2 Esdras

1:22–23	539
3–14	55
3:20–22	55
4:30	55
7:18–119	553
7:50	52
7:92	55
7:118–119	55
7:127–129	55
11–12	156
11–13	52
13	156
14:44–46	706

4 Maccabees

2:4–6	54
2:21–23	54
6:27–29	55
6:28–29	54
11:12	54
17:21–22	54, 55
18:10–19	583

Matthew

1	343, 707
1–2	325, 343, 485
1:1	245, 715, 720
1:1–2	487
1:1–16	245
1:1–17	242
1:1–4:25	737
1:4	490
1:5	289

1:6	487
1:6–7	513
1:16	504
1:17	210, 244, 487
1:18–23	326, 815
1:18–25	486, 487
1:18–2:23	762
1:20	487
1:20–23	343
1:21	245, 488, 489, 711
1:22–23	106, 624, 668, 669
1:23	487, 489, 490, 814
1:25	326
2:4	504
2:6	667, 668
2:7–12	64
2:13–15	343
2:15	217, 487, 624, 668
2:16–28	343
2:17–18	624
2:18	736
2:19–23	343
3	345
3:1–12	624
3:3	786
3:6–10	489
3:7	488, 490
3:9	490
3:10–12	488
3:11	710
3:11–17	489
3:13–17	710
3:14–17	486
3:17	487
4	365
4:1–2	664
4:1–11	345, 486, 488, 668, 669
4:3–11	664
4:4	117, 487
4:10	520
4:15–16	668
4:16	504
4:17	439, 650
4:23	439, 715
4:23–24	488
5–7	489
5:1	737
5:2	487
5:3	161, 349, 421, 650, 664

5:3–10	421
5:3–11	650
5:3–12	488, 664, 737
5:3–16	737
5:5	650, 849
5:7	489
5:8	440
5:9	487
5:10	421, 737
5:13–16	737
5:16	489, 639, 738
5:17	169, 443, 650, 670
5:17–18	745
5:17–20	486, 738
5:17–48	670
5:18	486, 819
5:19	361
5:20	198, 650
5:20–48	489
5:21–26	738, 741
5:21–48	161, 486, 738
5:21–7:27	738
5:22–24	489
5:23–24	738
5:25–26	738
5:27–28	741, 742
5:27–30	738
5:27–44	302
5:29	738
5:29–30	743
5:30	742
5:31–32	738, 740
5:32	477, 738, 740, 741
5:33	738
5:33–37	349, 741
5:34–37	738
5:37	488
5:38–42	738
5:43–48	738
5:45	487, 738
5:47	489
5:48	381, 393, 738
6–7	365
6:1	639
6:1–18	738
6:2	738
6:5	738
6:7–15	259, 739
6:9	488

6:9–13	617
6:10	648
6:11	432
6:12	432, 488, 737, 739
6:13	488
6:14–15	488, 739
6:16	738
6:19–20	349
6:19–21	739
6:19–7:20	739
6:22–23	739
6:24	739
6:25–34	739, 849
6:26	382
6:33	865
7:1	639, 739
7:3–5	489, 739
7:6	639, 745
7:7	349
7:7–11	739
7:12	739
7:13–14	489, 737, 739
7:14	489, 491
7:15	625
7:15–23	739
7:16–20	120, 489
7:18	440
7:19	488
7:21	737
7:21–27	739
7:21–28	346
7:24–27	364, 486, 559, 739
7:28	737
8:4	504
8:5–13	439, 515
8:10–11	489
8:11	440
8:11–12	490
8:12	440, 835
8:16–17	488
8:17	488, 668
8:23–27	516
8:25–26	490
8:27	516
9:1–7	488, 489
9:2	488, 490
9:5–6	488
9:6	490
9:8	489

9:9–13	489
9:13	308
9:22	488, 490
9:27	487
9:35–38	664
10:1–2	664
10:5	379
10:10	382
10:11–13	490
10:14	743
10:14–15	745
10:16–23	490
10:21	489
10:22	490
10:23	490, 670
10:28	743
10:29	642
10:32–33	489, 490
10:33	487, 491
10:37	490
10:38–39	490
10:41–42	490
10:42	489
11	488
11:2	504
11:2–5	516
11:4–5	488
11:9	166
11:10	670
11:13	624
11:14	670
11:18–30	361
11:19	361, 743
11:22–24	488, 743
11:24	835
11:25	489
11:25–26	489, 617
11:27	487
11:28–30	488
11:29	489
12	404
12:6	669
12:7	308
12:8	245
12:18–21	668
12:22–32	516
12:23	487
12:28	421
12:31–32	59, 488, 490

12:32	245, 277, 439
12:33–35	489
12:36–37	488
12:38	669
12:39–41	404, 743
12:40	245, 401, 669
12:41	403, 669
12:41–42	488
12:46–50	485, 489
13	421
13:1–9	559
13:1–23	489
13:11	489
13:15	204
13:18–23	490, 559
13:19	488
13:20–21	490
13:23	120
13:24	320
13:30	488
13:31	320
13:31–32	559
13:31–33	486
13:33	65, 421, 559
13:35	786
13:38–39	488
13:41	421, 487
13:42	488, 736
13:42–43	440
13:44	320
13:44–46	421
13:45	320
13:47	320
13:50	488
13:51–52	489
13:52	363, 814
13:54–58	113
13:55	485
13:57	624
14:5	624
14:13–21	516
14:19	434, 570
14:23–33	516
14:28–32	664
14:30	488
14:31	490
14:33	487, 516, 664
15:1–9	809
15:2	375

15:10–20	742
15:14	297
15:19	488
15:21–28	439
15:22	487
16:1	377
16:4	404
16:6	377
16:8	490
16:11–12	377
16:13–18	469
16:13–20	64, 119
16:13–23	504
16:16	487
16:17–19	486
16:18	489
16:20	504
16:20–23	469
16:21	308, 563
16:23	488
16:24–26	489
16:24–27	490
16:27	487, 489, 750
16:28	421, 487, 670
17:2	320
17:5	487, 549
17:9	504
17:20	290
17:23	308
17:24–27	515
18:3	320, 488, 490
18:3–4	489
18:6	489, 490
18:6–7	489
18:8	742
18:8–9	488, 489, 743
18:10	489
18:12–18	489
18:14	488, 489
18:15	489
18:15–18	556
18:15–20	743
18:20	460, 487
18:21	489
18:21–22	743
18:21–35	489, 561
18:23	320
18:23–35	559, 762
18:27	488

18:32	488
18:35	488, 489
19:1–12	733, 849
19:3	740
19:3–9	849
19:3–12	63, 740
19:4–5	478
19:4–6	740
19:4–8	382
19:5	251
19:6	741
19:7–8	740
19:8	740
19:9	740, 741
19:10	741, 742, 744
19:11–12	742, 743, 744
19:12	744
19:16	488
19:16–19	489
19:16–30	490
19:17	260, 488
19:21–30	489
19:28	438, 670
19:28–30	345
19:30–20:16	489
20:1	320
20:1–16	743
20:15	739
20:27	336
20:28	336, 489
20:30–31	245, 487
21:5	668, 863
21:9	487, 720
21:11	624
21:12–13	781
21:15	487
21:16	670
21:23–27	849
21:28–32	489
21:31–32	743
21:32	489
21:33–44	559
21:43	489, 561
22:1–14	559, 744
22:2	320
22:13	440
22:15–22	849
22:23–33	361, 488
22:29	261, 361, 744

22:31	261
22:34–40	173
22:36–40	838
22:37–40	465
23	50, 376, 742
23:1–3	738
23:5	62
23:12	349
23:23	745
23:24–25	738
23:27	320
23:37–39	345
23:38	669
24	302, 795
24:2	333
24:9–13	490
24:10	491
24:11	625
24:12	491
24:13	490
24:15	669, 762
24:21	390
24:23–27	795
24:27	439
24:29	390
24:29–31	795
24:30	439, 670
24:31	439, 487
24:34	670
24:35	670, 819
24:40–41	795
24:42	390
24:45–51	490
24:51	440
25:1	320
25:1–13	559, 744
25:10	440
25:14	320
25:14–30	489, 559
25:30	440
25:31	439
25:31–34	421, 670
25:31–46	64, 490, 798
25:34	421
25:34–40	707
25:40	489
25:45	489
25:46	490
26:1–27:66	562

26:17–30	464
26:26–28	354, 782
26:26–29	710, 711
26:26–30	439
26:28	488, 489, 490
26:31	863
26:39	617
26:39–46	290
26:47	291
26:47–57	490
26:52	381
26:56	563
26:57–68	505
26:60	333
26:63–64	814
26:63–66	487
26:64	439, 670
26:65–68	563
26:69–75	490
26:70	487
27:9	862
27:9–10	668, 863
27:11–14	505
27:25	50, 51
27:25–26	505
27:37	504
27:37–46	332
27:40–42	489
27:41–43	333
27:42	488
27:43	786
27:46	387, 617, 650
27:49	489
27:51b–3	489
27:51–53	488
28:7	487
28:10	489
28:17	490
28:18	670
28:18–20	260, 671, 815
28:19	460, 461, 486, 489, 710
28:19–20	489, 738
28:20	487
Mark
1	482
1:1	504, 785
1:1–8:21	483
1:2–3	715
1:2–8	624

1:3	786
1:9–11	81, 766
1:10	53
1:11	345, 481, 487, 715
1:14	264
1:14–15	210
1:15	420, 421, 439, 650
1:16	482
1:17	516
1:21–28	515
1:22	618
1:25	504
1:27	618
1:29–31	515
1:32–34	515
1:34	504
1:40–45	515
1:44	504
2:1–12	515
2:8–12	345
2:15–17	376, 743
2:16	376, 382
2:18–20	743
2:18–22	376
2:19–20	744
2:23–28	376, 382
2:28	516
3:1–6	376, 382, 515
3:7	482
3:7–12	515
3:11	364
3:12	504
3:13–35	482
3:20–35	664
3:22	46
3:27	345
3:29	277
3:31–35	346, 485
4	421, 483
4:3–8	421
4:3–9	559
4:10–12	481, 483
4:11	421
4:11–12	362
4:12	381
4:14–20	559
4:20	120
4:26–29	421
4:29	391

4:30–32	421, 559
4:35–41	254, 387, 515, 516
4:35–5:43	516
5	33
5:1–20	515
5:7	364
5:21–43	515
5:25–34	447
6	482
6:1–6	113113, , 482482
6:3	485
6:4	624
6:7–31	482
6:11	743
6:30–44	515
6:32–44	516
6:45–52	515, 516
6:52	664
6:53–56	515
7:1–13	809
7:1–23	376, 482, 483
7:3–4	664
7:3–13	382
7:5	375
7:6	786
7:11	664
7:14–23	742, 747
7:21	745
7:21–22	742
7:24–30	515
7:27	335
7:31–37	515
7:34	617
8:1–10	515
8:11–13	376
8:12	617
8:22–26	515
8:27–33	504
8:27–38	469
8:29	487
8:30	504
8:31	563
8:34–35	651
8:38	46
9:1	421
9:9	504
9:9–13	345
9:14–29	515
9:31	563

9:35	483
9:43	742
9:43-48	743
9:47-48	381
10	421
10:2-9	376
10:2-12	740
10:3	166
10:4	740
10:4-9	740
10:5-6	740
10:5-9	744
10:6	740
10:6-9	740, 745
10:7	745, 786
10:8	741
10:10	738
10:11	741
10:12	741
10:17-22	745
10:18	664
10:19	786
10:23	865
10:29-30	483
10:30	439
10:31	198
10:33-34	563
10:42-45	421, 589
10:43-45	198
10:45	74, 345, 483, 484, 505, 563, 801, 808, 832
10:46-52	515
11:1-19	483
11:9	650
11:12-24	515
11:12-26	483
11:15	835
11:15-17	781
11:15-19	112
11:20-26	515
11:22-26	228
11:27-33	359
11:27-12:37	359
12:1-9	383
12:1-11	559
12:1-12	359, 381, 561
12:6-8	563
12:10-11	383
12:12	359
12:13-17	359, 376, 696

12:17	484
12:18–27	359, 361, 376, 677
12:19	166
12:24	361
12:25	744
12:26	382
12:28–34	92, 359, 382
12:32–34	483
12:35–37	359
12:36	786
12:37	359
13	51, 483, 713, 795
13:8	536
13:9–13	483
13:14	484, 762
13:22	625
13:24–27	345
14:1–15:47	562
14:3–9	64
14:8	563
14:12–26	464
14:18–21	563
14:22	464
14:22–24	354, 782
14:22–25	439
14:22–26	64, 563
14:24	142, 563, 564
14:25	421, 440, 563
14:27	383, 863
14:27–31	563
14:35–42	290
14:36	563
14:49	563
14:53–65	379, 505
14:56–59	563
14:58	483
14:60–61	563
14:61	563
14:61–62	345
14:61–65	364
14:62	382, 439, 563
15:1–15	505
15:4	563
15:7–20	563
15:24	563, 830
15:26	504
15:27–32	563
15:32	504, 563
15:32–39	483

15:34 563, 650, 786
15:39 487, 563
15:43 421
16 460
16:6 562
16:7 487
16:8 676
16:9–20 676
16:15–16 710

Luke

1 468, 841
1–2 325, 485, 595
1:1 203
1:1–4 27, 467, 551, 810
1:2–3 470
1:4 57
1:5–25 467, 471
1:5–2:52 762
1:8–10 469
1:23 460
1:26–28 487
1:26–38 469
1:30–32 715
1:30–35 815
1:31 768
1:32 720
1:33 468
1:34 326
1:35 29, 768
1:38 119, 469, 625
1:42–45 624
1:46–55 624
1:46–56 469
1:47 460
1:51–53 664
1:52–53 470
1:54–55 715
1:67–79 468
1:68–71 715
1:68–79 624
1:69–71 468
1:72 269
1:72–73 715
2 468, 469
2:1–2 467
2:1–3 468
2:10 468
2:11 468, 504
2:19 326

2:22–52	467
2:25	632
2:25–38	468
2:26	504
2:29	625
2:29–32	624
2:32	29, 468
2:43	428
2:49	290, 469
3:1–2	467
3:1–3	468
3:1–20	624
3:3	490
3:4–6	29
3:8–14	664
3:16	29
3:21–22	29
3:22	487, 786
3:23–38	242, 325, 468
3:38	243, 244, 487, 536
4	365, 662, 842
4:1	29
4:1–2	664
4:1–13	712
4:3–13	664
4:4	487, 786
4:8	460, 520
4:14	29
4:14–15	831
4:14–30	831
4:16–21	345
4:16–22	343, 618
4:16–30	113
4:17–21	618, 831
4:18	29, 468, 786
4:18–19	468, 664, 831
4:18–21	467
4:21	471, 831
4:25–27	424, 468
4:28–30	469
4:35	504
4:41	504
4:43	469
4:43–44	439
5:1–11	515, 516
5:4–6	471
5:8	461
5:9	516
5:11	469

5:14	504
5:16	617
5:17–32	713
5:27–32	469
5:28	469
5:30	376
6:12	617
6:15	712
6:20	349, 664
6:20–26	470, 664, 665
6:20–49	664
6:21	349
6:24	349
6:25	349
6:27–36	664
6:36	381
6:37–38	664
6:41–42	664
6:43–45	120
6:47–49	559
7:1–10	469, 515
7:11–17	469, 471, 515
7:16	468, 624
7:18–23	516
7:21	468
7:21–23	831
7:22	345, 665
7:34	743
7:36	471
7:36–50	469, 470, 743, 835
7:41–49	468
7:48	461
7:50	461, 468
8	478
8:1–3	469
8:4–8	559
8:11	851
8:11–15	559
8:15	120
8:19–21	485
8:22–25	516
8:22–56	516
9:3–5	665
9:5	743
9:8	624
9:10–17	516
9:18	617
9:18–22	504
9:18–27	469

9:19	624
9:20	487
9:20–21	468
9:21	504
9:22	308, 563
9:23	469
9:28	617
9:31	218, 260, 469, 624
9:36	504
9:51	469
9:51–55	379, 469
9:51–19:27	469
10:7	382
10:7–19	342
10:10–11	743
10:10–12	745
10:13–15	743
10:21	29
10:25–28	381
10:29	417
10:29–37	762
10:30–35	632
10:30–36	665
10:30–37	469, 560
10:38	471
10:38–42	471
10:42	469
11	404
11:1	617
11:2–4	617
11:3	432
11:5–10	559
11:9	349
11:13	29
11:14	515
11:14–23	516
11:14–26	664
11:20	439
11:27–28	485
11:29–32	404, 743
11:30	404
11:37–52	835
11:37–54	469
11:39–42	665
11:42	745
11:51	110
12:4–5	743
12:12	29
12:13–21	665

12:16–21	470
12:22–34	665
12:24	382
12:32	421
12:33	349
12:35–59	470
12:48	213
13:10–17	468, 515
13:16	830
13:17	468
13:18–19	559
13:19–21	320
13:20–21	559
13:31	376, 469
13:33	469, 624
13:34–35	468
13:35	467
14:1	471
14:1–6	515
14:1–24	469
14:7–24	468
14:11	336, 349
14:12–14	665
14:15–24	440, 559
14:21–24	665
14:24	359
14:25–33	418
14:33	469
15	743
15:1–2	468, 469
15:1–32	468
15:3–7	469, 559
15:7	468
15:8–10	469
15:10	46, 468
15:11–32	259, 469, 561, 665
15:22–24	743
16:1–8	469, 559
16:1–14	665
16:16	27, 470
16:17	745
16:18	477, 740, 741
16:19–31	470, 471, 559, 665
16:27–31	470
17	795
17:3–4	743
17:11–19	515
17:15–18	469
17:20–21	65

17:21	421, 470
17:22–37	470
18:1–8	559
18:1–14	468
18:9–14	418, 469, 743
18:13	72
18:14	336, 349
18:18–25	665
18:22	469
18:29	744
19:1–8	468
19:1–9	665, 713
19:1–10	469, 743
19:5–6	471
19:6	468
19:9	471
19:11–27	559
19:12–27	665
19:25–27	485
19:37	468
19:38	468, 786
19:39–40	505
19:41–44	468
19:45–46	781
20–26	664
20:9–18	559
20:18	158
20:22–26	665
20:27–40	361
20:28	166
20:34–35	439
20:34–36	744
21:1–4	665
21:5–36	471
21:5–38	470
21:9	470
21:20	762
21:20–24	470
21:24	470
21:25	736
21:36–38	624
22:1–23:56	562
22:7–23	464
22:14–21	710, 711
22:14–23	439
22:15–16	74
22:16	857
22:17–19	782
22:19	117, 564

22:20	172, 666
22:22	59
22:25–27	665
22:29–30	421
22:30	440
22:32	617
22:37	563
22:41	617
22:42	290
22:44	617
22:51	516
22:66–71	505
22:69	439
22:70	468
23	30
23:1–5	505
23:2	468, 504
23:4	469
23:9	563
23:15	469
23:17–25	505
23:22	469
23:28	469
23:34	469, 617
23:35	712
23:38	504
23:40–43	471
23:43	440, 677
23:46	290, 469, 617, 650
23:47	469, 487
24	363, 371, 734
24:7	563
24:13–35	469
24:19	468, 624
24:25–27	468
24:25–29	715
24:26	504
24:26–27	283
24:27	50
24:28–31	464
24:29	471
24:30	617
24:32	471
24:35	203
24:41	468
24:44	170, 563, 624
24:44–47	260, 261
24:45–47	468
24:45–49	471

24:46	504
24:47	469, 470, 471
24:49	29
24:51	469
24:52–53	471
24:53	457, 469
John
1	50, 130, 145, 316
1:1	395, 396, 847
1:1–2	397
1:1–3	55
1:1–4	387, 852
1:1–6	396
1:1–14	323
1:1–18	277, 397, 640, 849
1:2	397
1:3	297
1:3–4	397
1:4	323
1:5	397
1:6–7	397
1:7–21:25	396
1:8–11	397
1:9	816
1:10–13	55
1:12–13	397
1:14	323, 395, 397, 414, 815
1:15	397
1:16	397
1:17	262, 504
1:18	53, 203, 323, 360, 397
1:19–28	624
1:19–12:50	396, 397
1:21	166
1:23	399
1:24	376
1:25	166
1:29	113, 393, 398, 684
1:32	397
1:34	785
1:35–51	398
1:36	113, 393
1:41	504
1:46	298
1:51	399
2	50
2:1–12	398, 485, 516
2:6	62
2:13–17	781

2:13–22	398
2:13–25	856
2:17	399
2:22	399
3:1	376
3:1–21	398
3:2	398
3:3	81, 420, 429
3:5	81, 420, 710
3:6	553
3:8	304, 710, 766
3:14	539, 563
3:16	400, 463, 464, 488
3:16–17	269
3:19	132, 829
3:19–21	316
3:28	504
3:29	744
3:36	48, 272, 488
4	182, 379, 505, 856
4:1	376
4:1–42	398
4:13–14	304
4:16–18	743
4:19	624
4:20–24	181
4:24	261
4:29	504
4:35–38	379
4:44	624
4:46–54	398, 516
5	363
5:1–18	516
5:1–47	398
5:18	361, 376
5:24	71
5:28–29	440
5:36	516
5:39	359, 399
5:39–40	262
5:45	166
5:45–47	399
5:46	817
6	331, 482, 709
6:1–15	516
6:1–71	398
6:14	166, 624, 715
6:16–21	516
6:22–59	464

6:29	489
6:31	399
6:35	398
6:35–66	67
6:42	485
6:44	816
6:45	399
6:52–65	117
6:53	782
6:54	354
6:56	686
6:63	117, 852
6:69	721
7:1–9:41	398
7:17	204
7:23	361
7:26–42	504
7:32–52	376
7:37–39	304
7:40	166, 624, 715
7:42	720
7:53–8:11	743
8:7	743
8:11	743
8:12	398
8:13–30	376
8:28	398
8:30–35	405
8:31	463
8:31–58	464
8:31–59	288
8:39	221
8:44	47, 50, 51
8:46	463
8:48	463
8:56–58	817
8:58	268
9	376, 505
9:1–7	516
9:1–41	336
9:17	624
9:28	166
10	361, 505, 509
10:1–42	398
10:18	74
10:22	398
10:24	504
10:30	146, 398
10:34	361, 399, 786

10:35	361, 852
10:36	361
10:38	398, 516
11	516
11:1–57	398, 516
11:27	504, 505
11:33	617
11:35	429, 829, 830
11:38	617
11:41–42	617
11:46–47	376
11:47–50	379
11:49–51	632
12:1–8	398
12:12–50	398
12:13	399
12:15	399, 863
12:19	376
12:27	743
12:27–28	617
12:31	46, 74
12:34	504, 563
12:38	399
12:40	399
12:41	400, 817
12:42	376
12:43	132, 829
13–16	169
13–17	116
13–21	393
13:1	74
13:1–38	398
13:1–17:26	398
13:1–20:31	398
13:1–21:25	396
13:18	399, 624, 786
13:23	394, 395
14:1–31	399
14:2	399
14:2–3	677
14:3	440
14:6	399, 820
14:9	53
14:12	290
14:16	304, 393
14:16–18	302
14:21	680
14:25	399
14:26	304

14:28	146
14:31	399
15:1–11	730
15:1–16:3	399
15:13	74
15:25	399
16:4–33	399
16:8	816
17	617, 631
17:1–26	399, 617
17:3	504
17:6	40
17:8	40
17:17	819
17:17–19	721
18:1–19:42	562
18:1–20:31	398
18:3	376
18:6	399
18:11	290, 399
18:17	399
18:19–24	399
18:22	563, 829
18:26–19:16	336
18:28–38	399, 505
18:28–40	64
18:31	379
18:33–19:16	696
18:35	399
18:36	696
18:38	819
19:5	141
19:14	113
19:19	504
19:19–22	336, 399
19:24	399, 563, 624
19:28	624
19:28–30	563
19:34	82
19:36	74, 113
19:36–37	399
19:37	863
20	676
20:1	676
20:1–29	399
20:5	62
20:9	563
20:17	399
20:17–23	66

20:19	676
20:19–22	676
20:21–23	399
20:22	304
20:25	383
20:27	258
20:29	679
20:30	563
20:30–31	57, 399
20:31	198, 397, 399, 504
21	676
21:1–25	399
21:4–14	516
21:11	767
21:24	394
21:24–25	399, 400, 551
21:25	363
Acts
1:1	27
1:3	57
1:5	29, 766
1:6–7	210
1:8	28, 29, 30, 202, 210
1:9–11	66, 67
1:11	439
1:12–13	123
1:14	28, 30, 485
1:16	624
1:21–22	550
1:24	30
2	81, 439, 505, 625
2:1–4	29, 107, 766
2:2	766
2:5	672
2:5–11	28
2:11	460
2:14–21	302, 303
2:16–21	29
2:16–36	505, 715
2:17	162, 439, 625
2:17–21	383, 391
2:21	28
2:22	28
2:22–24	566
2:22–36	550
2:22–38	815
2:23	29, 74, 299, 563, 642, 837
2:24	29, 31
2:25–36	720

2:27	721
2:30	786
2:32	29
2:32–33	29
2:33–36	66
2:34	66
2:36	29, 31
2:38	28, 29, 31, 81, 461, 710
2:38–39	391
2:38–42	30
2:39	391, 710
2:39–42	28
2:40	28
2:42	30, 464
2:44	28
2:46	28, 782
2:47	28
3:1	30
3:1–10	28
3:11–26	28
3:12–26	550
3:13–15	29
3:14–15	469
3:15	29
3:16	28
3:17	29, 713
3:18	506
3:19–26	71
3:20	506
3:22–23	624
3:24–25	625
4	67
4:1–22	379
4:9	28
4:10	29
4:24	28
4:25–6	814
4:27	29
4:27–28	837
4:28	74
5:1–11	517
5:12	28
5:17–42	379
5:30	29
5:31	28
5:34–39	376
6:3	849
6:4	30
6:7	28

6:10	849
7	276, 829
7:2-53	532
7:2-56	715
7:20-22	63
7:36	539
7:41-43	38
7:43	383
7:45-47	411
7:51	51
7:53	653
7:56	67
8	379
8:12-17	30
8:14	28
8:14-17	29
8:14-24	29
8:25	29
8:26	28, 30
8:26-40	662
8:29	28
8:39	28
9:1-22	30
9:2	161
9:17	29
9:34	29
9:40	30
10-11	53
10:1-6	30
10:1-8	28
10:1-11:18	747
10:2	672
10:3-6	28
10:9	30
10:9-16	28
10:17-21	28
10:36-43	550
10:38	28, 831
10:39	29
10:40-41	29
10:43-44	29
10:44-46	107
10:44-48	28, 30
10:44-11:18	303
11:1	28
11:2	28, 30
11:15-17	29
11:15-18	28
11:18	29

11:27	625
12:5	30
12:24	28
13	272, 411, 505
13:1–3	28, 30
13:6	625
13:6–12	517
13:8	59
13:13–41	505
13:16–41	532, 715
13:19–20	411
13:23	28
13:27	28, 563
13:27–29	29
13:29	28
13:30	29
13:32–33	29
13:33–35	28
13:34	29
13:37	29
13:41	28, 272
13:43	672
13:45	59
13:47	29
13:49	28
13:50	672
14:2	59
14:9	28
14:15–18	58
14:17	34
14:23	30
15	103, 113, 732, 733, 743, 747, 826
15:1	29, 30
15:1–21	303
15:1–35	572
15:5	29, 30
15:6–29	30
15:7–11	29
15:8	29
15:11	28
15:12	29
15:12–14	203
15:13–18	38, 51
15:14–19	29
15:18	786
15:20	745, 747
15:22–29	556, 738
15:25	28
15:29	442, 745, 747

16:1	805
16:3	572
16:6–8	28, 30
16:6–10	30
16:9–10	28
16:13–16	28
16:15	81
16:19–24	30
16:25	30
16:31	28
16:31–32	28
16:33	28, 81
16:34	28
17:1–3	28
17:3	29
17:16–34	34, 64
17:22–31	58
17:24–28	270
17:24–31	261
17:26	297
17:28	593
17:30	31
17:30–31	29, 270
17:31	29, 31
18	478
18:4	28
18:6	59
18:15	700
19:1–7	29, 107
19:1–20	30
19:2	29
19:3–4	29
19:5	29
19:9	161
19:10	28
19:13–16	59
19:20	28
19:23	161
19:33	57
20:7	464
20:28	30, 161
20:36	30
21	478
21:5	30
21:9	625
21:10	625
21:17–26	782
21:19	203
21:20–26	572

21:25	745, 747
21:28	62
22:1	57
22:3	64, 375
22:4	161
2222::1616	2828, 81, 391, 710
22:30	379
23:5	379
23:6–8	375, 376
23:6–9	376
23:8	376
24:10	57
24:14	161
24:14–15	440
24:22	161
26:5	672
26:23	506
26:26	58
27–28	469
27:20	28
27:31	28
27:35	465
28	804
28:8	30
28:17–23	28

Romans

1	749, 820, 857
1–3	538
1–5	57
1–8	64, 144
1:1	215, 263, 697
1:1–3	505
1:1–5	618
1:1–6	832
1:1–15	697, 699
1:2	823
1:2–4	71
1:3	707, 720
1:3–4	286, 551
1:3–5	696
1:4	161, 815
1:7	697
1:8–10	697
1:13	697
1:15	264
1:16	198, 345, 700
1:16–17	263, 696
1:16–4:25	697
1:16–5:21	416

1:16–15:13	697
1:17	161, 227, 271, 696, 701
1:17–3:31	832
1:18–20	640
1:18–23	221
1:18–27	745
1:18–32	57, 520, 701, 856
1:18–2:16	536
1:18–3:20	697, 856
1:19–23	520
1:23	121, 745
1:24–27	743, 746, 747
1:24–32	699, 798
1:26	746
1:26–27	745, 746
1:29–30	698
1:32	750
2:1–16	573
2:4	269
2:5–6	161
2:5–11	418
2:6–10	55
2:13	417
2:14–15	640
2:16	697, 699
2:17–3:20	575
2:25–29	747
2:28–29	166
3	75, 227, 251, 269
3:1	571
3:1–4	697
3:1–8	832
3:2	555
3:4	698
3:5	161
3:5–8	697
3:20	161
3:21	161, 697
3:21–26	376, 697
3:21–31	536
3:22	161, 227
3:22–23	749
3:22–25	701
3:23	463, 464
3:24	571, 577, 701
3:24–25	506
3:24–26	75
3:25	72, 74, 782
3:25–26	576, 577

3:26	74
3:27–30	701
3:27–31	701
3:27–4:25	697
3:28	161
3:30	701
3:31	698
4	251, 288, 332, 345, 346, 564, 565, 671, 733, 747, 750
4:4	571
4:5	417, 576
4:11	710
4:16	571
4:18	306
4:25	71, 73, 576
5	251, 269, 553, 554, 824
5–8	311
5:1	431, 697, 830
5:1–2	830
5:1–5	698, 702
5:1–11:36	697
5:2	199, 536, 571
5:3	307
5:5	577
5:6	576
5:6–8	576
5:7	577
5:8	74, 506, 577
5:8–9	576
5:9	74, 576
5:10	577
5:10–11	577
5:12	553
5:12–21	55, 81, 218, 345, 553, 571, 575, 577
5:14	332
5:15–19	563
5:17–19	576
5:21	571
6	117, 525
6:1	571, 698
6:1–11	187, 677
6:1–8:39	698
6:2	698
6:3–4	81, 218, 564, 577
6:3–8	576
6:3–9	711
6:6	578
6:6–8	750
6:10–14	577
6:14	394, 698

6:14–15	571
6:15	698
6:17	556
6:19	743, 747, 750
6:23	220, 842
7	251
7:1–3	742
7:1–6	577
7:3	741
7:4	698
7:4–6	831
7:4–9	166
7:5–6	304
7:7	571
7:7–10	54
7:7–23	488, 746
7:7–25	575, 831
7:11	698
7:12	166, 241
7:13	571
7:14–25	355
7:23	749
8	59, 311, 391, 441, 525, 536
8:1	304, 578, 698
8:1–4	491, 831
8:1–27	260
8:2	671
8:3	74, 161, 576, 577
8:9–11	578
8:10	506
8:11	440, 578, 677, 815
8:13	698
8:14	308, 698
8:14–17	304, 816
8:15–17	702, 857
8:16	72
8:17	304, 306, 698
8:17–18	306
8:18	440, 698
8:18–25	260, 536, 677, 699
8:19	306, 536
8:19–21	702
8:19–22	609
8:19–23	856
8:20	184, 536
8:20–21	749
8:21	536
8:22	306
8:22–23	218

8:23	188, 536, 578
8:24	306
8:24–25	702
8:26	616
8:28	307, 641, 643, 786
8:28–30	71
8:29	306, 440
8:30	94, 440
8:32	576, 577
8:34	857
8:35–39	71
8:38	46
8:38–39	609
8:39	698
9–11	64, 187, 345, 579, 625, 699, 770, 832
9:1–5	345
9:1–11:36	698
9:4	359
9:5	808
9:6	71, 346, 571
9:6–9	514
9:6–18	710
9:7–8	288
9:8	346
9:8–16	221
9:11–14	476, 514
9:13	48
9:19–20	698
9:20–21	698
9:22	269, 440
9:24–25	94
9:25–26	308, 333
9:28	786
9:31	345
9:32–33	583
9:33	786
10	140, 227, 363, 381
10:1–13	416
10:3	161
10:4	376, 465, 671, 698
10:5	786
10:5–13	64
10:6–8	166
10:6–18	360
10:8–9	550
10:9	146
10:9–13	670
10:12	701
10:12–15	391

10:13	391
10:15	527, 786
10:17	562
10:19	166
10:19–11:12	51
10:21	345
11:1	571, 698
11:1–36	345
11:5	346
11:5–6	571, 572
11:8	166
11:9–10	51
11:11–12	578
11:15	536
11:17–24	572, 671
11:22	71
11:25	578
11:25–32	817
11:26	345, 671, 701
11:27	354
11:28	391
11:30–32	572
11:32	698, 701
11:33	837
11:33–36	520
11:35	388
12	803, 857
12–15	261
12:1	198, 462, 698, 700, 856
12:1–2	345
12:1–5	702
12:1–12	173
12:1–15:13	698, 699, 702
12:2	40, 57, 579
12:2–3	698
12:6	625
12:10	702
12:12	307
12:14	550
12:17–21	798
12:19	166
12:19–13:7	75
13	67
13:1–4	697
13:1–5	408
13:1–7	696
13:8–10	166, 550
13:9	786
13:10	465

13:11	702
13:12–14	743
13:13	76
13:13–14	700
13:13–14:23	747
14:1–12	698
14:1–15:13	702
14:4	702
14:7–12	418
14:10	536
14:14	550
15:2–3	698
15:4	261, 306, 826
15:7	470, 698, 699
15:11	649
15:12	696
15:13	306, 307
15:14	199
15:16	263, 391, 460, 782
15:17–19	304
15:19	263, 264, 697
15:22–24	697
15:23–24	699
15:24	697
15:25	697
15:26–27	697
15:27	856
15:28	697
15:30–31	697
16	478, 579
16:1–2	697, 698
16:3–16	697, 698, 699
16:17–20	698
16:21–24	697, 698
16:23	697
16:25	161, 524
16:25–26	71
16:26	823
16:26–27	625
1 Corinthians
1–2	370
1–4	135, 721
1:1	95
1:2–3	721
1:4–7	571
1:9	71, 135
1:10–31	579
1:10–4:17	134
1:10–4:21	134

1:11	134
1:12	133
1:14	697
1:16	81
1:17	576
1:17–2:8	847
1:18–2:16	845
1:18–3:23	134
1:18–4:13	572
1:19	134
1:20	134, 548
1:20–25	63
1:23	562
1:23–24	31
1:24	849
1:26	95, 332
1:29	332
1:30	57, 72, 572, 721, 845, 849
2	318
2:2	31, 135, 575, 576
2:2–13	73
2:4	135
2:4–5	304
2:6	134, 849
2:6–16	577
2:7	161
2:7–16	845
2:8	555, 609
2:9	134, 441, 537
2:10	817
2:12	134
2:13	135, 304
2:16	134
3	50
3:1	135
3:1–4	579
3:3–4	553
3:4	135
3:6–9	135
3:9–17	116
3:10–17	135, 364
3:12–15	418
3:16–17	190
3:19	134, 387
3:20	134
4:4–5	418
4:7	571, 572
4:8	133, 187, 335
4:9	320

4:10	335
4:10–13	135
4:15	264
4:16	134
4:17	556
4:18–6:20	134
5	721, 742, 743, 746
5:1	134
5:1–13	134
5:1–6:20	135
5:3–5	743
5:5	135, 418
5:7	74, 576
5:7–8	135, 213
5:9	138
5:13	166
6	721
6:1–6	739
6:1–11	134
6:2	135
6:9	418, 746, 747
6:9–10	743
6:9–11	81
6:9–20	743
6:11	81, 135, 721
6:12–14	138
6:12–20	134, 677, 742, 747
6:14	135, 440
6:15–16	742
6:16	746
6:18	742
6:19–20	135
6:20	74, 577, 641
7	190, 479, 741, 744, 746
7:1	134, 135, 744
7:1–40	133, 134, 135
7:2	742
7:2–5	135
7:2–7	579
7:3	744
7:5	579, 742
7:6–7	135
7:7	579, 744
7:9	579, 742
7:10	135, 550
7:10–11	740, 741
7:11	741
7:12	135
7:12–16	741

7:17–24	94, 135
7:18–19	747
7:19	135, 744
7:21–24	587
7:22–23	136
7:23	74, 577
7:25	135, 816
7:25–38	742
7:25–40	63
7:26	579
7:26–35	744
7:28	135, 744
7:29	578, 744
7:29–31	135
7:31	744
7:32	135
7:35	135
7:36	742
7:36–38	744
7:39–40	742
7:40	135
8	520, 610
8–10	690, 691
8:1–13	577
8:1–11:1	134, 136
8:2–11	578
8:4–6	556, 701
8:4–8	46
8:5–6	141, 188
8:6	136, 146, 166, 506
8:7–13	136
9	691
9:1–10:13	690, 691
9:1–10:22	135
9:3	57, 691
9:3–27	690
9:9	166, 382, 442
9:13	382
9:14	550
9:19–21	376
9:20	572
9:24–27	62
9:26	320
10	520, 824
10–15	117
10:1–2	217
10:1–4	383, 711, 826
10:1–11	691, 770
10:1–13	136, 579

10:2-4	82
10:3-14	539
10:4	653, 817
10:6	383
10:8	743
10:11	218, 261, 306, 383, 439, 578, 826
10:12	743
10:12-13	691
10:13	71
10:14-22	136, 520
10:16	354, 710
10:16-17	82
10:32	136, 187
11	465, 478, 721
11:2	809
11:2-16	134, 136
11:2-34	134
11:4-15	579
11:5-7	579
11:6	136
11:7	314
11:7-9	579
11:11	136, 744
11:11-12	579
11:13	136
11:17-34	134, 136, 465
11:18	134
11:18-31	579
11:19	72
11:22	136
11:23	556, 809
11:23-25	550, 782
11:23-26	133, 439, 563
11:24	564
11:24-25	564, 576
11:25	172, 354, 576
11:26	564, 711, 857
11:27	710
11:27-34	577
11:29	136
11:32	136
11:33	136
12	188, 506, 803
12-14	721
12:1-14:40	134, 136, 303
12:3	137, 304, 550
12:4-26	137
12:5	188
12:7-11	304

12:8–10	108
12:10	625
12:12–13	64
12:13	81, 744
12:27–31	304
12:28	187, 625, 803
13	298, 517
13:1–13	135, 137
13:2	550
13:4–7	137
13:7	307
13:9	298
13:12	298, 321, 440, 521, 781, 838
13:13	307, 521, 838
14	478
14:3–5	137
14:4	625
14:12	137
14:14–15	523
14:17	137
14:26	137
14:26–40	137
14:29	128, 625
14:33–36	803
14:35	136
15	57, 312, 675, 721
15:1–4	71, 550
15:1–5	264
15:1–11	58, 137
15:1–34	137
15:1–54	187
15:1–58	133, 134, 137
15:3	138, 556, 576, 809
15:3–4	563
15:3–5	146, 283, 286
15:3–8	418, 575, 618, 675
15:5–8	320
15:9	187
15:9–10	571, 575
15:10	269
15:12	137
15:12–19	137
15:14	298
15:17	138
15:19	306
15:20	306, 440, 578
15:20–28	137, 218
15:23	439, 440, 677
15:24–26	609

15:32–34	138
15:35–58	137
15:37	138
15:42–44	138
15:42–55	488
15:44	537
15:44–49	578
15:45	438
15::4747—4949	138138
15:49	440
15:51	524
15:52	523
15:52–54	677
15:55	786
15:58	138, 678
16:1	697
16:1–12	134
16:6	697
16:13	199
16:17–18	134
16:22	578

2 Corinthians

1:1	138
1:2	460
1:3	269
1:16	697
1:18	71
1:18–22	816
1:20	71, 624
1:22	578
2:3–4	138
2:6–11	743
2:9	138
2:12	263, 264
3	138
3–4	140
3:1–18	139
3:2–18	360
3:6	166, 555
3:7	359
3:12–4:6	520
3:13–14	140
3:14	359
3:15–18	728
3:16–18	578
3:17	141, 302
3:18	138, 139, 140, 440
4:1–6	64
4:4	319, 438, 856

4:6	139, 140
4:7	140, 363
4:11	140
4:13	306
4:14	440
4:15	571
4:17	140, 440
5	75
5:1–5	488, 537
5:4	571
5:5	578
5:6–8	440, 578
5:8	440
5:10	418, 536
5:14	577
5:14–15	577
5:14–21	578
5:16	579
5:17	128, 140, 306, 536, 576, 577, 578
5:18–19	577
5:18–21	809
5:19	571, 577
5:21	74, 161, 463, 464, 577
6:1	269, 571, 572
6:1–2	571
6:2	133
6:14–7:1	139
6:16–17	852
6:16–18	190
6:17–18	140
7:8	138
7:8–13	743
7:12	138
8:1	269, 571
8:9	140, 571, 577, 865
8:23	140
9	138
9:7	202
9:12	460
9:13	263
9:14–15	571
10	138
10–13	138, 139
10:1	138
10:14	263, 264
11:2	190, 744
11:5	139
11:7	263
11:14	139

11:24–25	702
12	139
12:1–9	138
12:7	139
12:9	571
12:21	743
13:4	140, 576
13:10	140
13:14	262
Galatians
1:4	576, 577
1:6	572, 831
1:6–7	571
1:6–9	264, 418, 699
1:7	263
1:8	103
1:9	556
1:11–12	263
1:12	53, 578
1:13	187
1:13–14	672, 809
1:13–16	575
1:14	375
1:15–16	625, 808
1:16	53, 578
1:18	831
1:18–24	831
1:23	578
2	113
2:1	831
2:1–10	550
2:1–14	572
2:2	103
2:5	822
2:11–14	579
2:15–21	240, 376
2:16	161, 205, 227, 271
2:16–3:24	416
2:16–21	578
2:17	571, 575
2:17–18	577
2:19	240
2:19–20	576
2:20	506, 576, 577
2:20–21	571
2:21	572
3	50, 73, 75, 564, 565
3:3	238, 579
3:6–9	71

3:6–14	345
3:6–29	288
3:10	575
3:10–13	575
3:10–25	166
3:11	161
3:11–12	271
3:13	74, 166, 576, 577
3:14	578
3:13–14	702
3:15–29	715
3:16	71, 332, 439
3:17	786
3:19	653
3:21–22	575
3:23	74
3:23–26	238
3:23–29	64
3:24	671
3:27	711
3:28	241, 345, 478, 579, 587, 658, 744, 752, 803
3:29	221
4:4	210, 379, 485, 578
4:5	577
4:5–7	304
4:6	578, 816
4:6–7	857
4:19	768
4:21	671
4:21–25	575
4:24	34, 97, 332, 728, 770
4:24–26	283
4:24–31	221, 383
5:1	215
5:1–3	74
5:1–5	575
5:1–18	671
5:2–6	71
5:4	572, 699
5:5	306
5:6	279
5:12	335
5:13	215
5:16–17	304
5:16–18	240, 575
5:16–26	578
5:17	240
5:19–21	418, 743
5:22	573

5:22–23 304
5:24 240
6:2 173, 639
6:5 639
6:7–9 418, 743
6:15 306, 536, 578
6:16 345

Ephesians

1–3 116
1:2 188
1:3 187, 188
1:3–4 187
1:3–5 188
1:3–12 259
1:3–14 187, 188, 189, 205, 489, 829, 832
1:4 188
1:5–6 188
1:6 188
1:6–7 571
1:7 188, 189, 576
1:9 189, 849
1:9–10 187, 188, 189
1:9–11 188
1:9–13 643
1:10 188, 189, 506, 770
1:11–14 188, 189
1:13 188
1:13–14 306, 578
1:14 188, 189
1:15–23 506
1:15–2:10 187
1:17 187, 188, 849
1:17–19 189
1:17–23 116
1:17–2:10 187
1:18 188, 189
1:18–2:8 187
1:20–23 187, 188, 439
1:21 439, 609
1:22 189
1:22–23 188
1:23 189
2 190
2:1–5 189
2:1–10 187
2:3 553, 749
2:4–10 506
2:5 571
2:5–6 187, 578

2:6	189
2:8	189, 429, 571
2:11	190
2:11–18	190
2:11–19	658
2:11–20	190
2:11–22	345, 579
2:12–13	190
2:13	576
2:14	62
2:14–15	189
2:14–18	187, 189
2:15	188, 190
2:16	577
2:16–17	189
2:18	189, 523, 816
2:20–22	190
2:22	189
3–4	118
3:1	187, 190
3:2	188
3:2–10	187
3:3–4	189
3:5	189
3:5–6	190
3:6–9	189
3:7	188
3:7–10	611
3:9–10	116
3:10	67, 189
3:11	188
3:14–19	187, 830
3:14–21	116, 187
3:16	187
3:16–19	189
3:17	188
3:18–19	187, 189
3:19	188, 215
3:20–21	187
3:21	245
4:1–3	190
4:1–6:17	187
4:3	189
4:4–6	82, 465, 520
4:5	711
4:5–6	188
4:6	188
4:7–10	66
4:7–16	190

4:8	786
4:8–10	187, 188
4:10	188, 189
4:10–12	188
4:10–16	189, 190
4:11	108, 625
4:13	188, 792
4:15	189
4:15–16	188
4:17–19	743
4:17–20	189
4:17–24	506, 747
4:17–31	190
4:18	297
4:20–21	190
4:20–24	188, 190
4:21	821
4:24	188
4:25	190, 462
4:27	189
4:29	190
4:30	189
4:32	190
4:32–5:2	190
5	478
5:11–22	188, 188, , 190, 190
5:2	576
5:3–5	747
5:3–6	743
5:3–15	190
5:11–14	189
5:14	117, 187
5:15	189
5:15–20	64, 190
5:18	187, 189
5:18–20	188, 523, 857
5:19	645
5:21–33	761
5:22–31	189
5:22–32	190
5:25	116
5:25–32	188
5:26	81
5:27	744
5:31	786
5:31–32	744
5:32	189
6	610
6:2–3	166

6:6	320
6:9	752
6:10–17	187, 189
6:10–20	190, 609, 611
6:11–12	46
6:13	189
6:13–17	578
6:15	527
6:17	189
6:18	189
6:19	189
6:21–22	187
6:23	188
6:23–24	188

Philippians

1:1	161, 809
1:3–11	588
1:5	588
1:6	71
1:7	57, 588
1:9–11	588, 792
1:12–26	589
1:13	588
1:15	589
1:16	57
1:17	589
1:18	589
1:18–26	588
1:20–23	578
1:23	440, 578, 677
1:27	198, 199, 263, 588
1:27–30	589
1:28–30	588
2	130, 369, 460
2:1–4	589
2:5–8	323, 414
2:5–11	143, 277, 506, 831
2:6	319
2:6–7	589
2:6–11	369, 439, 523, 550, 589, 590, 594, 696
2:7	577, 589
2:8	577
2:9	66, 439, 589
2:9–11	364, 589, 590
2:10–11	589
2:11	550, 588, 786
2:12	573
2:12–13	489
2:12–16	588

2:13–14	589
2:17	320, 856
2:25	856
2:25–30	588
3	590
3:1	590
3:2–11	590
3:2–21	590
3:4–14	575
3:5	375
3:6	187, 590
3:7–8	579
3:7–11	376, 416
3:8	103
3:11	578
3:12–14	721
3:17	383, 590
3:18–19	590
3:19	440
3:20	590
3:20–21	506, 578, 677, 696
3:21	440, 488
4	590
4:1	590
4:2	579
4:4–7	590
4:5	578
4:8–9	590
4:10–19	588
4:12	744
4:18	856

Colossians

1	67, 145
1:2	506
1:5	306
1:5–6	571
1:6	120
1:10	120
1:15	55, 119, 319
1:15–17	121
1:15–20	64, 119, 120, 121, 122, 260, 277, 523, 550, 640, 847, 849
1:15–23	387
1:16	609, 611
1:16–17	55
1:17	297
1:18	189
1:18–20	189
1:19–20	714
1:20	122, 189, 221, 536, 577

1:21–23	59
1:23	122, 306
1:24–29	116
1:27	306, 506
2	120, 610
2:3	57, 849
2:4	121
2:8	120, 121, 809
2:8–10	593
2:9–12	536
2:9–15	609
2:10	189
2:11–12	81, 711
2:11–13	187
2:12	121
2:12–13	189, 578
2:14	74
2:14–15	611
2:15	121, 122, 306, 577
2:16–23	579
2:17	121, 122
2:18	121, 672
2:19	189
2:20	121
2:20–23	122
2:21–22	579
2:23	121
3	478
3:1	121, 462, 578
3:1–3	67
3:1–4	189
3:1–9	506
3:1–17	121
3:2–3	121
3:3	118, 121
3:4	121, 189, 440, 578
3:5–10	743
3:5–11	64
3:6	578
3:10	122
3:11	122, 587, 744
3:12	122
3:12–17	64
3:13–15	122
3:16	616, 645, 849
3:16–17	523
3:18–4:1	119, 121
3:22–4:1	587
3:22–4:6	752

3:24	121, 578
4:1	752
4:5–6	64
4:7–8	187
4:9	587
4:14	467
4:16	187, 586
4:18	122

1 Thessalonians

1–3	794
1:2–10	794
1:3	795, 796
1:4	795
1:4–10	794
1:5	795
1:5–10	795
1:6	794
1:7	383
1:9	578
1:9–10	520, 551, 721, 794, 795, 796
1:10	306
2:1–12	794, 796
2:1–3:10	794
2:1–5:22	796
2:2	263
2:2–4	796
2:2–12	264
2:3–8	796
2:7–12	794
2:8–9	263
2:10–11	796
2:11–12	796
2:12	94, 795, 796
2:12–13	722
2:13	795, 851
2:14	794
2:14–16	51, 794
2:17	794
2:19	796
2:19–20	794
3:1–10	794
3:2	263
3:3	794
3:6	794
3:7	795
3:12–13	795
3:13	795, 796
4–5	57, 795
4:1	721, 795

4:1–8	743
4:1–12	721
4:1–5:22	794
4:3	721, 795
4:3–8	747, 794
4:3–12	579
4:4–5	744
4:5	795
4:7	795
4:7–8	795
4:8	721
4:9–10	795
4:9–12	794
4:10	721
4:11–12	721
4:12	722
4:13	796
4:13–17	578, 795
4:13–18	794, 795, 796
4:13–5:11	797
4:14–17	439
4:15	794
4:15–17	550, 696, 795, 796
4:17	440, 799
5:1–4	796
5:1–11	390, 795, 796
5:2	795
5:2–3	550
5:3	536
5:4–5	795
5:4–10	578
5:9–10	795, 796
5:12–13	796
5:12–22	795
5:21	512
5:23	721, 722, 795, 796
5:23–24	795
5:24	71, 795

2 Thessalonians

1	798
1:3–4	798
1:3–11	798
1:4–5	798
1:4–12	797, 798
1:5–10	536, 798
1:6–10	798
1:7	439
1:9	440
1:9–10	798

1:12	571
2	713
2:1	439, 798
2:1–2	797, 799
2:1–12	797
2:2	133
2:3	59
2:3–4	797
2:3–12	272, 797, 798, 799
2:4	786, 797, 799
2:6–7	797
2:7	799
2:7–12	797
2:8	439, 786
2:8–12	392, 798
2:10–12	799
2:11	798
2:13	721
2:13–14	798
2:13–17	799
2:15	103, 810
2:16	799
2:16–17	798
2:17	799
3:1–5	798, 799
3:3	71
3:6	743, 798, 810
3:6–15	798
3:7–9	798
3:9	383
3:10–11	798
3:12	798
3:14–15	743, 798
3:17	797
1 Timothy
1:7	802
1:9–11	743
1:10	746, 752
1:12–13	802
1:13	277
1:15	506, 801
1:16	383
1:17	520
1:18–20	71
1:19	802
2	478
2:1–10	802
2:4	801
2:5	463, 520, 801

2:5–6	260, 506
2:6	801
2:7	802
2:9–10	804
2:11–15	579, 802
2:12	764
3	809
3:1–13	802
3:2	161
3:9	802
3:15	116, 802
3:15–16	847, 849
3:16	66, 74, 523, 802
4:1–3	59, 579
4:1–5	63
4:3	744, 804
4:3–5	744
4:4	297
4:4–5	579
4:10	801
4:12	383
4:13	128
5:5	307
5:6	804
5:13	803
5:14	744
5:17–25	802
5:18	382
6:3–19	804
6:10	749
6:13	74
6:17	307
6:20	103
2 Timothy
1:1	805
1:3	856
1:3–18	805
1:6–7	805
1:10	440, 805
1:11	802, 805
1:12	805
1:12–14	103
1:13	383
1:17	804
2:1	269, 805
2:1–26	805
2:2	806, 810, 811
2:3	320
2:8	805

2:11–12	805
2:11–13	71, 805
2:12	440
2:13	71, 462
2:18	137
2:23–26	802
3:1–5	514
3:1–4:5	805
3:6–7	803
3:10–11	805
3:12	805
3:15–17	115, 812
3:16	199, 303, 680, 730
3:16–17	236, 728, 852
3:17	730
4	805
4:5	805
4:6	320
4:6–22	806
4:10	59, 71
4:22	806

Titus

1:1–4	808
1:2	306, 462
1:4	808
1:5	807, 809
1:5–9	807
1:7	161, 809
1:10–16	807
2:1	808
2:1–15	807
2:7	383
2:10	809
2:11	269, 571, 808
2:11–14	807, 808
2:13	306
2:14	808
3:1	609
3:1–11	807
3:3–7	807
3:4	808
3:4–7	808

Philemon

7	587
10	587
12	587
16	586, 587, 752
17	587

Hebrews

1	145, 363
1:1	555, 812
1:1-2	278, 439, 852
1:1-3	277, 359
1:1-4	261, 278, 523
1:1-14	66, 849
1:1-4:13	276, 277
1:2	276
1:2-3	55, 306
1:3	46, 55, 66, 275, 277, 319, 414
1:4	275
1:4-4:13	277
1:6	670
1:8	786
1:8-9	670
1:10-12	670
1:12	786
1:13	277
1:14	45
2:1-4	59, 276
2:2	277, 653
2:7	786
2:9	46, 279, 439
2:10	116, 277, 279, 440
2:10-11	277, 721
2:11	721
2:12	523
2:12-13	280
2:14	74, 279
2:14-15	278
2:14-26	279
2:16	280
2:17	72
2:17-18	277, 279, 449
3-4	539
3:1	277, 279
3:1-2	275
3:1-4	276
3:1-6	217, 449, 506
3:2	786
3:6	307
3:7	261, 852
3:7-4:11	277
3:7-4:13	59, 277, 568
3:12	59
3:13	277
4	624
4:1-13	217
4:7	261

4:8–11	404
4:12	852
4:12–13	261, 277
4:14	279, 857
4:14–16	278
4:14–10:25	276
4:15	279, 449, 463
4:16	67, 617
5	826
5:1	277, 278
5:1–10	278
5:1–7:28	278, 279
5:1–10:25	277
5:3	449
5:5–6	278
5:5–10	506
5:7	617
5:7–8	387, 449
5:7–10	277, 279
5:11–14	277
5:11–6:12	59, 277
5:11–6:20	276, 278, 279
6:1–8	142
6:4–5	277, 711
6:4–6	59, 275, 277
6:4–8	71
6:5	421, 439
6:6	277
6:13–15	288
6:13–20	280
6:18	306
6:18–19	307
6:19	306
6:19–20	277
6:20	277
6:20–7:1	279
7	51
7:1–10	278
7:1–28	278
7:11–19	278
7:20	306
7:20–25	278
7:25	278, 617
7:26	463
7:26–28	278
8	824
8–10	345, 460
8:1–2	278, 449
8:1–7	67

8:1–13	279, 856
8:1–10:18	278
8:3–10:18	278
8:5	279, 383
8:6	142
8:7–13	666, 670
8:8	142
8:8–10	345
8:8–12	278
8:8–13	172, 354
8:13	142
9	50, 75, 824
9:1–10:18	279
9:5	701
9:12–14	142
9:13–14	449
9:14	116, 815, 856
9:15	142, 172, 279, 354, 449
9:16–17	275
9:23–28	782
9:24	383
9:24–28	506
9:25–26	449
9:26	279, 439
10	117
10:1	142, 279
10:1–3	279
10:1–10	856
10:1–18	279
10:4–9	279
10:5–7	280
10:10	142
10:11–14	279
10:12	48, 279
10:14	142
10:15–18	279
10:16–17	354
10:18	278, 279
10:19–22	71
10:19–25	67, 278, 279
10:19–39	59
10:21	279
10:22	81
10:23	279, 306
10:23–25	276
10:25	276, 277
10:26–30	280
10:26–31	71, 279
10:26–13:25	276

10:29	142, 277
10:32–39	277
10:38	272, 786
10:39	280
11	226, 278, 289, 411
11:1	62, 277, 280
11:2–12:3	277
11:8–12	288
11:17–19	288
11:17–22	251
11:23–26	63
11:24–26	288
11:25–26	277
11:31	289, 462
11:32	289, 411
11:32–34	411
12	117
12:1–3	279, 290
12:1–29	59
12:2	290
12:2–3	277
12:3	277
12:4–11	277
12:6	476
12:10	476
12:14	277, 721
12:15	277
12:16	743
12:17	277, 280
12:22	440
12:24	172, 354
12:25–29	67
13:4	743
13:8	107, 275, 280
13:11–14	277
13:13	277
13:14	280
13:20	278
13:24	275
James
1	348
1:1	348, 350
1:2–4	63
1:5	349
1:5–6	550
1:6	320
1:9–11	350, 865
1:10	320
1:10–11	350

1:12	350
1:13	347, 350
1:17	320, 347, 348, 350
1:17–18	350
1:18	350
1:19	349
1:20–21	349
1:22–25	349, 462
1:25	347
1:26–27	349, 672
2	349, 733
2:1	348, 350
2:1–4	349
2:1–7	350
2:2	350
2:2–4	350
2:5	349, 550
2:5–6	865
2:6–7	38
2:8	350
2:13	550
2:14–26	71, 347, 488
2:21–23	251
2:21–25	416
2:25	462
2:26	348
3	349
3:2	347
3:6	749
3:9	319, 350
4	349
4:2–3	349
4:3	350
4:6	350
4:9	349
4:10	349
5:1	349
5:1–6	38, 350, 865
5:2–3	349
5:6	347, 348
5:7–8	350
5:7–9	350
5:9	350, 439
5:11	387
5:12	349, 550
5:13–20	350
5:14	348, 350
5:14–15	350
5:19	349

5:20	350
1 Peter
1	581
1:1	126, 582
1:3	306
1:3–4:11	581
1:5	71
1:10–12	817
1:11–12	53
1:13	306
1:13–2:10	582
1:15–16	721
1:16	583, 721
1:18	553
1:19	74
1:20	74, 439
1:21	581
1:23	852
1:24	320, 350
1:24–25	583
2	581
2:2	320
2:3	583, 786
2:3–10	583
2:4–10	116, 581
2:5	81
2:6	583
2:7	550
2:9	81, 166, 581
2:9–10	59, 345
2:11	582
2:12	550
2:13–17	696
2:18–25	583
2:21	74
2:21–24	506
2:21–25	583
2:22	463
2:24	74, 506
3	581, 824
3:6	582
3:12	48
3:13–22	67
3:14–15	506, 583
3:15	57, 786
3:18–19	188
3:18–22	582
3:19	582
3:20–22	710

3:21	383
3:22	582, 609
4:2–5	743
4:8	350
4:13–14	550
4:17	220, 365
5:1	440
5:5	350
5:6–10	387
5:8	320
5:10	506
5:12	581
5:13	483
2 Peter
1	365
1:1	585
1:5–11	72
1:9	297
1:11	585
1:19–21	852
1:20–21	116
1:21	806
2	584
2:1	585
2:4–10	743
2:12	320
2:13–16	743
2:19–22	71
2:20	585
3:1–13	261
3:9	272, 584, 585
3:10	584
3:11	584
3:11–13	721
3:12–13	584
3:13	438
3:15–16	580, 852
3:16	728
3:18	721
1 John
1:1	400
1:1–2	414
1:1–4	392
1:5–2:17	392
1:8	394
1:8–9	842
1:9	513
1:10	394
2:1	393

2:1–2	74, 506
2:2	72
2:3–6	72
2:7	400
2:15	132, 829
2:16	749
2:18	439
2:18–19	394
2:18–25	392
2:19	72
2:24	103, 400
2:26–27	393
2:28–3:10	393
3	394
3:1–3	260
3:2	71, 440, 441
3:4–10	394
3:5	393, 463
3:9	394
3:10	394
3:11	400
3:11–24	393
3:16–17	394
3:24	72
4	393
4:1	394, 625
4:1–6	393
4:2	258
4:2–3	506
4:7–12	707
4:7–21	393
4:10	72, 74
4:13	72
5:1	506
5:1–12	393
5:6	82
5:10–12	272
5:11–13	71
5:13–21	393
5:16–17	59, 277
2 John
5	400
6	400
7	506
3 John
3	103
4	506
7	743
10	320

12	465
13	440
Jude
24	60
Revelation
1:1	51, 52, 625, 682
1:1–11:18	684
1:3	625
1:4–5	687
1:4–6	505
1:5	306
1:6	81
1:8	687
1:9–20	67
1:10–13	523
1:11	455
1:13	320
1:14–16	320
1:17	687
1:17–20	117
1:18	686
1:20	53
2–3	62, 625, 686
2:7	128, 440, 681
2:9	51
2:11	681
2:14	345, 743
2:17	681
2:20	625
2:20–21	743
2:26–27	440
2:29	681
3	509
3:6	681
3:7	245
3:12	182, 684
3:13	681
3:14–22	831
3:21	440
3:22	681
4	52, 53, 684, 856
4–5	46, 52, 261, 696, 715
4–19	67
4:1	523
4:2	681
4:2–3	687
4:3	53
4:7	320, 682, 786
4:8	595

4:11	595
5	74, 143, 520, 856
5-7	684
5:1-10	360
5:5	720
5:6	52, 243, 687
5:9-10	595
5:10	81
5:11-14	387
5:12	595
5:13	595
6:1-8	684
6:9-17	798
6:10	307
6:12-13	390
6:17	391
7	67
7:14	440
7:15	440
7:17	488
8:1	162, 683
8:2	683
8:6	391
8:12	390
9:7-9	390
9:7-10	320
9:13-14	162
9:20-21	520, 743
10:6	685
11	52, 685
11:11-13	67
11:15	422, 439
11:19-19:21	684
12	74, 509, 683
12-13	52
12-14	46
12:1-5	47
12:2	683
12:3	682
12:5	683
12:7-9	342
12:9	46
12:11	687
13	509
13:1	682
13:1-4	158
13:5	158
13:11	682
14	67

14:3	523
14:6	684
14:6-7	520
14:9-11	520
14:15	391
15:3	786
15:3-4	595
16	684
16-20	685
17	52
17-18	527
17:1-20:5	683
17:9	53
17:18	53
18:13	742
19-22	841
19:1-8	46
19:2	798
19:6-8	761
19:7-9	744
19:9	440, 684
19:10	520, 625, 687
19:12	359
19:13	852
19:15	391
19:20	625
19:21	218
20	439, 683
20-22	67, 260
20:1-6	681
20:1-10	684
20:2	46
20:4	440
20:4-6	67
20:6	440
20:11-15	488
20:12-15	440
21	52, 162, 440, 684, 686
21-22	306, 387, 537, 641, 683, 716
21:1	218, 306
21:1-2	782
21:1-4	721
21:1-22:5	251
21:2	182, 478, 682, 716, 744
21:3	440
21:3-4	716
21:4	488, 687
21:4-5	306
21:5	687

21:6	687
21:7	440
21:8	743, 745
21:8–9	520
21:9	684, 744
21:9–22:5	716
21:11	320
21:12	716
21:14	716
21:21	320
21:22	782
21:22–23	387
21:22–27	64
21:23	320
21:24	537, 686
21:27	537
22:1	391
22:1–3	537
22:1–5	440
22:2	218, 537
22:3	440
22:4	53, 440
22:6	681
22:13	687
22:15	743, 745
22:16	245
22:17	303, 815
22:18	52
22:18–19	730
22:18–20	681
22:20	815

