which these vv. then affirm, echoing and extending 2.24–26.

11: One part of this control is the fact that God puts eternity into human minds, i.e., gives humans a sense that divine activity determines events beyond what they can see and understand, and so defines for them the limits of their reason. 12: By compensation, God allows humans, in another part of His control, to enjoy if not the "advantage" of their labor, then their labor while they are doing it.

16–22: God's control is further explored. Here it is applied to two new pairs of opposites, not mentioned in the earlier catalogue.

16–17: The first is wickedness versus justice, both of which God allows to occur, each in its own time and season. 18–22: The second pair is animals versus humans.

19–21: Here Koheleth questions the difference that evidently others in his community were asserting: that humans have an afterlife above (in heaven) and beasts only one below (in the netherworld). All Koheleth can see, however, is the same fate of the dust of death for both. He does not deny that there may be something more, and some rabbinic Sages, trying to harmonize Koheleth with their own beliefs, reinterpret all these lines to make Koheleth finally affirm a human afterlife with God. 22: Yet, once again, Koheleth says, the best thing is for humans to focus on enjoying what they have—here the familiar term, their "portion"—now in their lifetimes.

4.1–16: Futility and human relationships. This ch explores several kinds of human interactions and their consequences. There are five sections, vv. 1–3, 4–6, 7–8, 9–12, and 13–16. The clause of self-reference, "I have observed/noted" (1, 4, 7, 15), and of comparisons in the form "better than" (3, 6, 8, 9, 13) bind these together. Of these five sections, four describe negative interactions, only one positive. 1–3: The first negative is oppressor overwhelming oppressed, a constant occurrence that makes death, or even not

4 I have also noted that all labor and skillful enterprise come from men's envy of each other—another futility and pursuit of wind!

⁵ [True,]
The fool folds his hands together^a
And has to eat his own flesh.

⁶ [But no less truly,] Better is a handful of gratification Than two fistfuls of labor which is pursuit of wind.

⁷ And I have noted this further futility under the sun:
⁸ the case of the man who is alone, with no companion, who has neither son nor brother; yet he amasses wealth without limit, and his eye is never sated with riches. For whom, now, ^bis he amassing it while denying himself^b enjoyment? That too is a futility and an unhappy business.

^{9c} Two are better off than one, in that they have greater ^dbenefit from^d their earnings. ¹⁰ For should they fall, one can raise the other; but woe betide him who is alone and falls with no companion to raise him! ¹¹ Further, when two lie together they are warm; but how can he who is alone get warm? ¹² Also, if one attacks, two can stand up to him. A threefold cord is not readily broken!

¹³ Better a poor but wise youth than an old but foolish king who no longer has the sense to heed warnings. ¹⁴ For the former can emerge from a dungeon to become king; while the latter, even if born to kingship, can become a pauper.^e ¹⁵ [However,] I reflected about ^fall the living who walk under the sun with^f that youthful successor who steps into his place. ¹⁶ Unnumbered are the multitudes of all those who preceded them;^g and later generations will not acclaim him either.^h For thatⁱ too is futile and pursuit of wind.

^{17j} Be not overeager to go^j to the House of God: more acceptable is obedience than the offering of fools, for they know nothing [but] to do wrong.

a I.e., does not work; cf. Prov. 6.10; 24.33.

b-b Lit. "am I amassing . . . myself."

c 4.9-5.8 consists of a series of observations, each of which is introduced by some slight association with what precedes. The theme of 4.4-8 is not resumed until 5.9.

d-d Emendation yields "hope for"; cf. 2.20.

e Taking rash as a verb; cf. Ps. 34.11.

f-f I.e., "the contemporaries of."

g And so never heard of the gifted youth.

h For despite his wisdom, he too will be forgotten; cf. 2.16.

i I.e., the advantage of wisdom over folly.

j-j Lit. "Guard your foot when it [or, you] would go."

being born, better options (cf. 6.3 and Job ch 3, but, for the opposite view, Eccl. 9.4-6). 4-6: The second negative is envy leading to futile labor. 7-8: A person alone, and the futility, thus, of having no one to whom to bequeath the fruits of his labor, constitutes the third negative. 9-12: The one positive interaction comes in contrast to the person alone, and it celebrates the advantages and rewards of companionship. 12: The strength of such a relationship is compared to that of a threefold (three-ply) cord, an image that appears to go back to Sumerian literature of the late 3rd millennium BCE. Rabbinic commentary, however, took this cord to imply the advantages and greater strength of three persons functioning as companions, particularly in the matter of living and transmitting Torah, as against the two with which the section otherwise deals. 13-16: The fourth and final negative interaction: a poor, though wise youth who succeeds where an old, foolish king fails, but whose achievement does not last because it was never known by the many generations before him and will be forgotten by those coming after (cf. 2.16).

4.17-5.6: Responding properly to God. This unit contains a set of warnings against various kinds of behavior that might at first seem acceptable to God and humans, but when carried to extremes, without a balanced sense of context, become objectionable and even dangerous, as they could provoke God's anger. 4.17: The unit begins here, since 4.16 serves as a conclusion to the preceding discussion (cf. 2.26). It mentions first false sacrifice, which, as rabbinic commentary recognized, tries to cover up for sinful acts (cf., e.g., Amos 5.21-24).

5 Keep your mouth from being rash, and let not your throat^a be quick to bring forth speech before God. For God is in heaven and you are on earth; that is why your words should be few. ²Just as dreams come with much brooding, so does foolish utterance come with much speech. ³When you make a vow to God, do not delay to fulfill it. For He has no pleasure in fools; what you vow, fulfill. ⁴It is better not to vow at all than to vow and not fulfill. ⁵Don't let your mouth bring you into disfavor, and don't plead before the messenger^b that it was an error, ^cbut fear God;^c else God may be angered by your talk and destroy your possessions. ⁶For much dreaming leads to futility and to superfluous talk.

⁷If you see in a province oppression of the poor and suppression of right and justice, don't wonder at the fact; for one high official is protected by a higher one, and both of them by still higher ones. ⁸Thus the greatest advantage in all the land is his: he controls a field that is cultivated.^e

⁹A lover of money never has his fill of money, nor a lover of wealth his fill of income. That too is futile. ¹⁰As his substance increases, so do those who consume it; what, then, does the success of its owner amount to but feasting his eyes? ¹¹A worker's^f sleep is sweet, whether he has much or little to eat; but the rich man's abundance doesn't let him sleep.

¹²Here is a grave evil I have observed under the sun: riches hoarded by their owner to his misfortune, ¹³in that those riches are lost in some unlucky venture; and if he begets a son, he has nothing in hand.

¹⁴^gAnother grave evil is this: He must depart just as he came.^g As he came out of his mother's womb, so must he depart at last, naked as he came. He can take nothing of his wealth to carry with him. ¹⁵So what is the good of his toiling for the wind? ¹⁶Besides, all his days ^hhe eats in darkness,^h with much vexation and grief and anger.

¹⁷Only this, I have found, is a real good: that one should

5.1–2: Uncontrolled speech is a common motif in biblical and other ancient Near Eastern wisdom, where it is often juxtaposed to the virtue of silence; Rashbam here understands it as excessively long prayer. 3–5: Making rash vows that cannot, or are not intended to, be paid (cf. Deut. 23.22–24; Prov. 20.25; Sir. 18.21). 2, 6: The reference to dreams may stand as a negative image for anything ephemeral and unstable (e.g., Job 20.8 and ancient Egyptian literature). Alternately, the reference may be to the widespread Near Eastern, including biblical, appeal to dreams as a form of divine communication, here warning against undue reliance on them because they could be vague and misleading (cf. dreams of false prophets in Deut. 13.2, 4, 6; Jer. 23.25, 27, 28, 32; 27.9; 29.8; Zech. 10.2).

5.7–8: The virtues of authority. 7: The hierarchy of authority outlined here may well be modeled on the actual system of Koheleth's time, whether that be Achaemenid or early Hellenistic (see introduction). The system serves justice, it appears, because the possible failures of the lower ranks of officials are watched over and corrected by the higher ranks, as in the Egyptian wisdom story, "The Tale of the Eloquent Peasant." If the higher ranks here ultimately include God—though this is not specified—then the v. would connect with the preceding 4.17–5.6, where failures of human behavior are answerable to God. 8: This v. is difficult, though it seems to describe, as classical rabbinic tradition already saw, the value and "advantage/profit" that agriculture brings. More precisely, the emphasis may not be on owning land, which is criticized in 2.1–11, but on the enjoyment and value of toiling on the land, as in 5.11, 17–18 (and also 2.24; 3.22; 8.15).

5.9–20: The problem of wealth and the solution. 9–16: The main focus, the futility of accumulating wealth, stands in deliberate con-a Heb. leb, lit. "heart," sometimes designates the organ of speech; cf. Isa. 33.18; 59.13; Ps. 19.15; 49.4; Job. 8.10.

b Some ancient versions read "God."

c-c Moved up from v. 6 for clarity.

d Meaning of verse uncertain. Emendation yields "Much brooding results in dreams; and much talk in futilities"; cf. v. 2.

e I.e., the high official profits from the labor of others; but meaning of verse uncertain.

f Some ancient versions have "slave's."

g-g Moved up from v. 15 for clarity.

h-h Septuagint reads "are [spent] in darkness and mourning."

eat and drink and get pleasure with all the gains he makes under the sun, during the numbered days of life that God has given him; for that is his portion.¹⁸ Also, whenever a man is given riches and property by God, and is also permitted by Him to enjoy them and to take his portion and get pleasure for his gains—that is a gift of God.¹⁹ For [such a man] will not brood much over the days of his life,^a because God keeps him busy enjoying himself.

6 There is an evil I have observed under the sun, and a grave one it is for man: ²that God sometimes grants a man riches, property, and wealth, so that he does not want for anything his appetite may crave, but God does not permit him to enjoy it; instead, a stranger will enjoy it. That is futility and a grievous ill. ³Even if a man should beget a hundred children and live many years—no matter how many the days of his years may come to, if his gullet is not sated through his wealth, I say: The stillbirth, though it was not even accorded a burial,^b is more fortunate than he. ⁴Though it comes into futility and departs into darkness, and its very name is covered with darkness, ⁵though it has never seen or experienced the sun, it is better off than he—⁶yes, even if the other lived a thousand years twice over but never had his fill of enjoyment! For are not both of them bound for the same place? ^{7c}All of man's earning is for the sake of his mouth, ^dyet his gullet is not sated. ⁸What advantage then has the wise man over the fool, what advantage has the pauper who knows how to get on in life?^d ^{9e}Is the feasting of the eyes more important than the pursuit of desire? That, too, is futility and pursuit of wind.

¹⁰Whatever happens, it was designated long ago and it was known that it would happen; as for man, he cannot contend with what is stronger than he. ¹¹Often, much talk means much futility. How does it benefit a man? ¹²Who a The thought of which is depressing; see v. 16.

b Stillbirths were cast into pits or hidden in the ground in no recognizable graves; cf. v. 4 end.

c Cf. Prov. 16.26.

d-d Meaning of Heb. uncertain; emendation yields "And if the gullet is not sated, ⁸what advantage has the wise man over the fool, he who knows how to get on in life over the pauper?"

e Meaning of first half of verse uncertain.

trast with 5.8, on the value of toil. Some of the earlier reasons for the futility (chs 2, 4) are here resumed. 9: Added is the particular problem of accumulating money (5.9; lit. "silver" ["kesef"]), which once acquired leaves one insatiable for more. 11, 17–20: The contrasting situation, namely, the value of toil, is here reintroduced. As elsewhere in Koheleth (2.24–25; 3.12–13; 8.15; 9.7, 9; cf. 3.22; 11.8), it is God who is said to preside over the whole matter. But now the focus is on God's grant of the power to enjoy wealth and goods and the toil presumably associated with them, without worry about where it will lead or how much is to be accumulated. Some medieval commentators (e.g., Rashi and Sforno) added that God's gift of enjoyment is for those who earn it by meritorious deeds, and who would enjoy the blessing of their deeds not only on earth, but finally in the afterlife (cf. 3.9–22 n.).

6.1–12: Again wealth, toil, and the meaning of life. 1–6: The first unit continues the focus on the futility of accumulating wealth (5.12–16; 2.18–19; some of its language echoes that in 5.17–20). But here Koheleth adds a sharper and more negative twist to these earlier occurrences, noting that God can deny people the power to enjoy wealth. Indeed, He can give that wealth to a stranger, i.e., someone outside the kin group of the owner, who could thus alienate the wealth from the group. 3b–5: The sharpness of this first unit reaches its climax. Recalling the image of the unborn in 4.3, Koheleth here substitutes for it the uglier image of the stillborn, who is said to be more fortunate in his briefly earned rest than the living possessor of wealth who long accumulates it but is not allowed to enjoy it. The pessimism that all of this manifests is deepened in the remaining two units of the ch. 7–9: The second unit questions whether a human being can ever find satisfaction in toil, and so whether it makes any difference to be wise, foolish, or poor. 10–12: The third unit, going further, returns to the earlier theme of time's circularity and the lack of anything new (e.g., 1.9–10). It draws out of this circularity the conclusion, also found earlier (5.2, 6; 2.11–13), that human efforts are futile, in the light of God's strength in power and argument, to determine what sense life has or will lead to. Later interpreters (e.g., the Targum) sought to allevican possibly know what is best for a man to do in life—the few days of his fleeting life? For^a who can tell him what the future holds for him under the sun?

7^bA good name is better than fragrant oil, and the day of death than the day of birth.^c ²It is better to go to a house of mourning than to a house of feasting; for that is the end of every man, and a living one should take it to heart.

³Vexation is better than revelry;^d for though the face be sad, the heart may be glad. ⁴Wise men are drawn to a house of mourning, and fools to a house of merrymaking.

⁵It is better to listen to a wise man's reproof than to listen to the praise of fools. ⁶For the levity^e of the fool is like the crackling of nettles under a kettle. ⁷But that too is illusory; ⁷for cheating^g may rob the wise man of reason and destroy the prudence of the cautious.^h

⁸ The end of a matter is better than the beginning of it.

Better a patient spirit than a haughty spirit.

⁹Don't let your spirit be quickly vexed, for vexation abides in the breasts of fools.

¹⁰Don't say, "How has it happened that former times were better than these?" For it is not wise of you to ask that question.

¹¹Wisdom is as good as a patrimony, and even better, for those who behold the sun. ¹²For to be in the shelter of wisdom is to be also in the shelter of money,ⁱ and the advantage of intelligence is that wisdom preserves the life of him who possesses it.

¹³Consider God's doing! Who can straighten what He has twisted? ¹⁴So in a time of good fortune enjoy the good fortune; and in a time of misfortune, reflect: The one no less than the other was God's doing; consequently, man may find no fault with Him.^k a Lit. "according to the shadow that"; cf. Qur'an Aramaic betel and Syriac meṭṭol; and see 8.13.

b The author now offers a number of practical maxims, which, however, he concludes (vv. 23–24) are of limited value.

c Until a man dies, there is always danger that he may forfeit his good name.

d For empty revelry precludes real happiness; cf. 2.2.

e Emendation yields "praise" (shbl).¹

f This section, to end of verse 7, is apparently a continuation of the thought in vv. 11–12 and 19.

g Emendation yields "riches."

h Lit. "caution"; cf. postbiblical mathun, "cautious."

i Emendation yields "For the possessor of wisdom becomes a possessor of money."

j Vv. 13–14 continue the thought of v. 10.

k So Rashi; cf. the same thought in Job 1.22; 2.10.

ate this section's pessimism by supposing that the vv. teach that human meaning can come by devotion not to material pursuits, but to spiritual, such as study of Torah, and by understanding that the final reward is to be sought in the afterlife (cf. 3.9–22 n.).

7.1–29: Proverbial sayings and the problem of wisdom. The pessimism of ch 6 is here examined further. 1–10: The ch begins with a section of proverbs, the largest part of which, as in 4.3, 6, 9, 18, is arranged in a series of "better than" comparisons concerning wisdom and folly. Wisdom here, in line with 4.2 (cf. 4.3; 6.3–6), is what recognizes that the only certain thing in life is its end, death; fools, on the contrary, focus on life and its illusory pleasures of laughter and feasting. 10: It is also unwise to spend time longing for the better days that are now past, if indeed they were better. 7: Yet even wisdom is not always reliable, because of the capacity of wise men to be corrupted. 11–29: These reflections are enlarged in the next two sections, vv. 11–14, 15–29. On the one hand, in vv. 11–12, 19, 26, the power of wisdom and the punishment of the sinner are affirmed. Yet questions about the human practice of wisdom resurface and are elaborated. 20: Thus, in an echo of v. 7, righteous humans, who are equated with the wise (cf. v. 16), are said not to be immune from sin. 21–22: Warnings are also given against (excessive) reliance on the opinions of others. 15: Further, reward and punishment are observed not always to work as they should for righteous and wicked people. 16–18: This leads Koheleth to recommend that a person avoid being too righteous and wise, and too wicked and foolish. Exactly what is meant here is not clear, although the advice recalls the Greek philosophical adage (e.g., Theognis, Aristotle) to do "nothing overmuch." 14: Perhaps the point is more intellectual than practical: Do not act as if you know with certainty what is right and wicked; human beings do not ¹⁵In my own brief span of life, I have seen both these things: sometimes a good man perishes in spite of his goodness, and sometimes a wicked one endures in spite of his wickedness. ¹⁶So don't overdo goodness and don't act the wise man to excess, or you may be dumfounded. ¹⁷Don't overdo wickedness and don't be a fool, or you may die before your time. ¹⁸It is best that you grasp the one without letting go of the other, for one who fears God will do his duty^a by both.

¹⁹Wisdom is more of a stronghold to a wise man than ^bten magnates^b that a city may contain.

²⁰For there is not one good man on earth who does what is best^d and doesn't err.

²¹Finally, don't pay attention to everything that is said, so that you may not hear your slave reviling you; ²²for well you remember^e the many times that you yourself have reviled others.

²³All this I tested with wisdom. I thought I could fathom it,^d but it eludes me. ²⁴[The secret of] what happens is elusive and deep, deep down; who can discover it? ²⁵I put my mind to studying, exploring, and seeking wisdom and the reason of things, and to studying wickedness, stupidity, madness, and folly. ²⁶Now, I find woman more bitter than death; she is all traps, her hands are fetters and her heart is snares. He who is pleasing to God escapes her, and he who is displeasing is caught by her. ²⁷See, this is what I found, said Koheleth, item by item in my search for the reason of things. ²⁸As for what I sought further but did not find, I found only one human being in a thousand, and the one I found among so many was never a woman. ²⁹But, see, this I did find: God made men plain, but they have engaged in too much reasoning.

8 ^fWho is like the wise man,^f and who knows the meaning of the adage:

"A man's wisdom lights up his face,
So that his deep discontent^g is dissembled?"

a Cf. postbiblical yaša yede.

b-b Emendation yields "the riches of the magnates"; cf. Prov. 18.11.

c Apparently continuing the thought of v. 16.

d Refers back to 6.12.

e Lit. "your heart knows"; the same idiom occurs again in 8.5.

f-f Some ancient versions read "Who here is wise."

g Lit. "face"; cf. 1 Sam. 1.18; Job 9.27.

have that wisdom; only God does, who is the source of both good ("tov," good fortune) and evil ("ra'," misfortune). 18–28: At the most, then, human wisdom teaches the limits of what that wisdom can know (vv. 23–24, 27–28), and, therefore, the need for moderate, balanced behavior, which Koheleth connects with the fear of God (v. 18). 26: To underscore the point, the author introduces the image, known in other Near Eastern wisdom, both biblical (e.g., Prov. 2.16–19; 7.5–27) and nonbiblical (Egyptian and Mesopotamian), of the woman who waits to entrap the unwary and the sinner, that is, the one not favored by God. (For a more positive image of women, see 9.9.) 29: But wisdom's limits and moderation, Koheleth concedes, are something humans generally will not recognize and accept, tempted as they are to use their own "rational devices" (too much reasoning) to reach for certain truth. The difficult and troubling character of Koheleth's thoughts in this ch was, once more, recognized by the classical rabbinic interpreters, even as they sought to clarify and tame it. So the apparent pessimism of wisdom's focus on the end, not the beginning, of life (see vv. 1–4) was understood positively by the medieval philosopher Joseph Albo, among others: Death is to be celebrated because only then can a human being know and have realized his intellectual and spiritual potential. Similarly, for the pessimism of v. 14. This states that a human being cannot make sense of his life and of what will come after him (lit. "will not find anything after him"), given that he has to endure, evidently in a way difficult to predict, both fortune and misfortune, which God has created. In Rashi's view, however, followed by NJPS, v. 14 refers to God's creating good and evil, and the reward and punishment that go respectively with each; a human being cannot and should not find any fault with Him (i.e., God, not a human being) about unjust punishment.

8.1–17: Wisdom and its limits, again. The ch is framed by two statements about wisdom. 1: The first appears to be positive, affirming the power of wisdom to make sense of things (translating the end of 1a as "who knows the meaning of a thing?") and so to produce

2 I do! "Obey the king's orders—and ^adon't rush^a into uttering an oath by God."^b ³Leave his presence; do not tarry^c in a dangerous situation, for he can do anything he pleases; ⁴inasmuch as a king's command is authoritative, and none can say to him, "What are you doing?" ⁵One who obeys orders will not suffer from the dangerous situation.

A wise man, however, will bear in mind^d that there is a time of doom.^e ⁶For there is a time for every experience, including the doom; for a man's calamity^f overwhelms him. ⁷Indeed, he does not know what is to happen; even when it is on the point of happening, who can tell him? ⁸No man has authority over the lifebreath—to hold back the lifebreath;^g there is no authority over the day of death. There is no mustering out from that war; wickedness^h is powerless to save its owner.

⁹All these things I observed; I noted all that went on under the sun, while men still had authority over men to treat them unjustly. ¹⁰And then I saw scoundrels ⁱcoming from the Holy Site and being brought to burial,^j while such as had acted righteously were forgotten in the city.

And here is another frustration: ¹¹the fact that the sentence imposed for evil deeds is not executed swiftly, which is why men are emboldened to do evil—¹²the fact that a sinner may do evil a hundred times and his [punishment] still be delayed. For although I am aware that "It will be well with those who revere God since they revere Him, ¹³and it will not be well with the scoundrel, and he will not live long, becauseⁱ he does not revere God"—¹⁴here is a frustration that occurs in the world: sometimes an upright man is requited according to the conduct of the scoundrel; and sometimes the scoundrel is requited according to the conduct of the upright. I say all that is frustration.

¹⁵I therefore praised enjoyment. For the only good a man can have under the sun is to eat and drink and enjoy

contentment. 16–17: This contradicts the final vv., in which Koheleth argues yet again (7.14, 23–24, 27–28; 6.12; 3.11, 22) that his investigation of the nature of wisdom reveals wisdom's limits—its inability to find out the ultimate goal and meaning of the "activity" ("ma'aseh"; for this characteristic word of Koheleth, see also 3.11; 8.14, 17; 9.10; 11.5) of God and the world. This contradiction is not easy to resolve. One possibility is that v. 1 begins its affirmation of wisdom in a question form, suggesting uncertainty that would then be confirmed by the final vv. (16–17). Alternatively, this unit may reflect Koheleth's slow, ruminative approach, as he tries to figure out what value wisdom may have, changing his mind along the way. This would comport well with the vv. in between the two wisdom statements. 2–9: Thus, command or "power" (v. 4: "shilton") is first something positive and effective: the property of the king, who must be obeyed because with it he is irresistible and because his commands are even like oaths to God (vv. 2–4). 8: But, as Koheleth then observes (see Rashi, Rashbam, and others), no person, royal or otherwise, is "powerful" enough ("shalit," "shilton"), to hold on to his "lifebreath" ("ruah," the animating force) on the day of his death and to do battle, that is, with death. 9: Indeed, finally, a person can use his "power/authority" ("shalat") to do another harm. This progressive qualification of human "power," from royal authority commanding obedience to the evil ability to cause harm, leads to a second theme in which Koheleth also plays with different views. 9–14: The theme is the treatment of the good and wicked. On this theme Koheleth goes beyond what he has said earlier (e.g., 7.15) to express directly the tension between his personal conviction, following traditional wisdom, that the good are rewarded and the wicked punished (vv. 12–13), and his observation that in reality this does not always work out (vv. 10, 14). The a-a Moved up from v. 3 for English word order.

b The answer to the inquiry about the implications of the proverb in v. 1 is given in the form of another proverb, of which only the first half is relevant and is enlarged upon.

c-c Or "Give ground before him; do not resist."

d The same idiom as in 7.22.

e Lit. "time and doom"; cf. the synonymous "time of misfortune," lit. "time and misfortune," 9.11.

f Still another term for death; cf. "the time of calamity" for "the hour of death," 9.12.

g From leaving the body when the time comes; see 12.7; cf. Ps. 104.29; 146.4.

h Emendation yields "riches."

i-i Meaning uncertain; emendation yields "approaching [to minister]. They would come and profane the Holy Site."

j See note on 6.12.

himself. That much can accompany him, in exchange for his wealth, through the days of life that God has granted him under the sun.

¹⁶For I have set my mind to learn wisdom and to observe the business that goes on in the world—even to the extent of going without sleep day and night—¹⁷and I have observed all that God brings to pass. Indeed, man cannot guess the events that occur under the sun. For man tries strenuously, but fails to guess them; and even if a sage should think to discover them he would not be able to guess them.

9 For all this I noted, and I ascertained^a all this: that the actions of even the righteous and the wise are determined by God. ^bEven love! Even hate! Man knows none of these in advance—²none!^b For the same fate is in store for all: for the righteous, and for the wicked; for the good and pure,^c and for the impure; for him who sacrifices, and for him who does not;^d for him who is pleasing,^e and for him who is displeasing; and for him who swears, and for him who shuns oaths.^f ³That is the sad thing about all that goes on under the sun: that the same fate is in store for all. (Not only that, but men's hearts are full of sadness, and their minds of madness, while they live; and then—to the dead!) ⁴For he who is ^greckoned among^g the living has something to look forward to—even a live dog is better than a dead lion—⁵since the living know they will die. But the dead know nothing; they have no more recompense,^h for even the memory of them has died. ⁶Their loves, their hates, their jealousies have long since perished; and they have no more share till the end of time in all that goes on under the sun.

⁷Go, eat your bread in gladness, and drink your wine in joy; for your action was long ago approved by God.ⁱ ⁸Let your clothes always be freshly washed, and your head never lack ointment. ⁹Enjoy happiness with a woman you love all the fleeting days of life that have been granted to you under the sun—all your fleeting days. For that alone is what you can get out of life and out of the means you ac-

conclusion to this dilemma is Koheleth's favorite: It is all "hevel"—beyond human comprehension (cf. 1.2; etc.). 15: The consequent recommendation is likewise familiar (cf., e.g., 2.24–25): to enjoy the toil that one does while one is alive and doing it. 16–17: This conclusion and recommendation, then, are reinforced by the assertion that human wisdom cannot make any sense of the divine "activity" of the world.

9.1–12: Death is the final equalizer. Like ch 8, these vv. are also framed by two statements (vv. 1–6, 10b–12). In this instance the theme is death as the final end, or fate ("mikreh") for all humans, regardless of behavior, power, or ability. While this theme and language are familiar (2.13–16; 3.19–21), they have here some new emphases. 1: All righteous and wise people and their deeds are under God's control, but whether the deeds turn out to involve love or hate, humans cannot know beforehand. 4: Contrary to 4.2–3; 7.11, being alive is better than being dead, because (vv. 5–6, 10b) in Sheol, the netherworld, the place where all dead reside, no labor, reward, emotion, or thought is possible. 7–10a: These vv. offer a practical response to the situation just described, namely, to enjoy life while you live it (cf. 2.24–25; 8.15). Yet in this advice, again, are new motifs. 8: One of them connects enjoyment with symbols of purity, a white garment and the head anointed with oil. Some rabbinic sages (e.g., b. Shab. 143b; Ibn Paquda) understood this to mean that one's behavior in life should always be morally exemplary and spiritually elevated: ready at any time for death and God's judgment, and avoiding the excesses that would stain one's character as they would stain a white garment. 9: The other motif states that enjoyment should include having a wife to love—a sentiment that appears to differ from the negative image of women in 7.26, 28.

a Meaning of verb uncertain; construction as in Hos. 12.3; Ezra 3.12.

b-b Emendation yields "Even love, even hate, no man can know in advance. All ²are insignificant."

c I.e., those who observe the laws of ritual purity.

d Cf. 4.17. e I.e., to God; cf. 2.26; 7.26.

f Cf. 8.2. g-g Lit. "joined to all."

h Emendation yields "hope." i Cf. 2.24–25; 3.13; 5.18.

quire under the sun.¹⁰ Whatever it is in your power to do, do with all your might. For there is no action, no reasoning, no learning, no wisdom in Sheol, where you are going.

¹¹ I have further observed under the sun that

The race is not won by the swift,
Nor the battle by the valiant;
Nor is bread won by the wise,
Nor wealth by the intelligent,
Nor favor by the learned.

For the time of mischance^a comes to all.^b ¹² And a man cannot even know his time. As fishes are enmeshed in a fatal net, and as birds are trapped in a snare, so men are caught at the time of calamity,^a when it comes upon them without warning.

¹³ This thing too I observed under the sun about wisdom, and it affected me profoundly. ¹⁴ There was a little city, with few men in it; and to it came a great king, who invested it and built mighty siege works against it. ¹⁵ Present in the city was a poor wise man^c who might have saved^c it with his wisdom, but nobody thought of that poor man. ¹⁶ So I observed: Wisdom is better than valor; but

A poor man's wisdom is scorned,
And his words are not heeded.

¹⁷ Words spoken softly by wise men are heeded^e sooner than those shouted by a lord in folly.^e

¹⁸ Wisdom is more valuable than^f 'weapons of war,'^f but a single error destroys much of value.

10 Dead flies turn the perfumer's ointment fetid and putrid,^g so a little folly outweighs massive wisdom.

² A wise man's mind tends toward the right hand, a fool's toward the left.^h ³ A fool's mind is also wanting when he travels, and he lets everybody know he is a fool.

⁴ If the wrath of a lord flares up against you, don't give up your post;ⁱ for^j when wrath abates, grave offenses are pardoned.^j

⁵ Here is an evil I have seen under the sun as great as an

9.13–18: Again the problematic of wisdom. The challenge posed by deciding how to live in the face of death brings Koheleth back to the theme of wisdom and its limits. First in a parable (vv. 14–16) recalling 4.13 (cf. also 7.19), and then in a final statement (vv. 17–18), the author asserts the potential value of wisdom over royal authority and military prowess, and yet admits the vulnerability of that wisdom, of its effectiveness, to human neglect and sin. 15: Some traditional commentators (e.g., Rashi, Ibn Ezra) sought to mitigate the expression of vulnerability by proposing that nobody thought of that poor man does not refer to the time after he had saved the city, when people forgot his achievement, but to the time before, when his true wisdom was not yet known.

10.1–20: Maxims on wisdom and folly. The miscellany of maxims in this ch, a number of them expressed as oppositions between wisdom and folly, picks up several themes adumbrated earlier, but, again, with some new images. Thus, v. 1 links with the preceding 9.13–18 to describe how wisdom can be undone by just a little folly, but compares this now to flies that spoil fragrant oil. 4, 5–7, 16–17, 20: In turn, the recognition of, respect for, even fear of social and political hierarchy, and the rulers at its top, which was evident in 5.7–8; 8.2–5, reappears here. 5–7: But this recognition is formulated in a new image for Koheleth, though one well known elsewhere in the Bible (e.g., Prov. 30.21–23) and in other ancient Near Eastern traditions, esp. Egyptian and Mesopotamian, namely, the reversal of hierarchy as a sign of chaos and destruction and of the triumph of folly. This last point suggests that Koheleth in this ch has not given up on the rightness and power of wisdom. 8–11: Accordingly, Koheleth gives us a series of maxims appealing to the honored convention of wisdom born of experience to show that there are rules in the world which dictate that certain actions, here described a Euphemism for death.

b I.e., the insignificant duration of life renders all successes illusory; cf. 4.15–16.

c-c Others "who saved."

d Verses 9.17–10.19 constitute a group of loosely connected aphorisms.

e-e Lit. "than the scream of a lord [in the manner of] the fools."

f-f Emendation yields "everything precious."

g Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

h I.e., a wise man's mind brings him good luck; a fool's brings him bad luck.

i Emendation yields "hope."

j-j Lit. "abatement (2 Chron. 36.16) remits grave offenses." For hinniah, "to remit," cf. Abodah Zarah 13a; cf. hanahah, "remission of taxes," Esth. 2.18.

error committed by a ruler: ⁶Folly was placed on lofty heights, while rich men sat in low estate. ⁷I have seen slaves on horseback, and nobles walking on the ground like slaves.

⁸He who digs a pit will fall into it; he who breaches a stone fence will be bitten by a snake. ⁹He who quarries stones will ^abe hurt by them; he who splits wood will be harmed by ^a it. ¹⁰^bIf the ax has become dull and he has not whetted the edge, he must exert more strength. Thus the advantage of a skill [depends on the exercise of] prudence. ¹¹If the snake bites because no spell was uttered, no advantage is gained by the trained charmer.

¹²A wise man's talk brings him favor, but a fool's lips are his undoing. ¹³His talk begins as silliness and ends as disastrous madness. ¹⁴Yet the fool talks and talks!

^cA man cannot know what will happen; who can tell him what the future holds?

¹⁵^dA fool's exertions tire him out, for he doesn't know how to get to a town.

¹⁶Alas for you, O land whose king is a lackey and whose ministers dine in the morning! ¹⁷Happy are you, O land whose king is a master and whose ministers dine at the proper time—with restraint, not with guzzling!

¹⁸ Through slothfulness the ceiling sags, Through lazy hands the house caves in.

¹⁹They^e make a banquet for revelry; wine makes life merry, and money answers every need.

²⁰ Don't revile a king even among your intimates.^f
Don't revile a rich man even in your bedchamber;
For a bird of the air may carry the utterance,
And a winged creature may report the word.

11 Send your bread forth upon the waters; for after many days you will find it. ²Distribute portions to seven or even to eight, for you cannot know what misfortune may occur on earth.

³If the clouds are filled, they will pour down rain on the

7.16–18). What follows, then, is a statement that no one can know what the future will bring (e.g., 3.22; 6.12). This statement might be taken to undermine the confidence Koheleth has been showing in the present ch in the value of wisdom, unless one returns to the view that wisdom is above all the faculty of knowing clearly what one cannot know. On the other hand, various Jewish commentators (e.g., Yosef Ibn Yachya, Moshe Alshich) note that this statement about ignorance of the future follows directly on the rebuke of the fool's prattling, and is then itself followed (v. 15) by another rebuke of the fool's wearisome behavior. So connected, the statement becomes an example of the fool's prattling—and, consequently, an implied criticism of Koheleth's earlier affirmation of the view it expresses.

16–18: While these vv. take for granted the necessity of kingship, they sharply distinguish between wise and foolish rulers (cf. 4.13–14), between those who govern with propriety and restraint and those who endanger the community by acting as a simple, untested “young man” (“na’ar”; cf. its parallel with “simple-minded” in Prov. 1.4) and carousing lazily at all hours.

11.1–10: Seize the day, for the future is dark and uncertain.

Three sections take up this theme, vv. 1–6, 7–8, 9–10. 1–6: The initial advice, about casting bread and giving a portion, was understood by rabbinic Sages (e.g., Ecll. Rab.) to mean to act generously to others, because it may be repaid you, and even in a time of your own misfortune. The misfortune here, however, is probably the general uncertainty Koheleth has elsewhere expressed about the course of life, such that one should not be cowed by this uncertainty into avoiding a charitable deed. 2: The sequence seven-eight is a conventional expression, in biblical and Canaanite literature, for a significant quantity. 3: The following observations appear to move away from uncertainty as they describe a-a Emendation yields “profit . . . shall make use of.”

b Meaning of verse uncertain.

c The thought of this sentence is resumed at v. 20.

d This verse continues the thought of v. 3.

e I.e., the ministers of v. 16. f Others “thoughts”; meaning of Heb. uncertain.

as largely negative, will inevitably bring their negative consequences. 12–14: This is extended to an observation about speech, specifically about the contrast between a wise man's presumably measured speech and the favor it brings him, over against the fool's uncontrolled prattling and its disastrous results—all of this recalling earlier admonitions about the fool and the avoidance of excess (5.6; 6.11;

earth; and ^aif a tree falls to the south or to the north, the tree will stay where it falls.^a ⁴If one watches the wind, he will never sow; and if one observes the clouds, he will never reap. ⁵Just as you do not know how the lifebreath passes into^b the limbs within the womb of the pregnant woman, so you cannot foresee the actions of God, who causes all things to happen. ⁶Sow your seed in the morning, and don't hold back your hand in the evening, since you don't know which is going to succeed, the one or the other, or if both are equally good.

⁷How sweet is the light, what a delight for the eyes to behold the sun! ⁸Even if a man lives many years, let him enjoy himself in all of them, remembering how many the days of darkness are going to be. The only future is nothingness!

⁹O youth, enjoy yourself while you are young! Let your heart lead you to enjoyment in the days of your youth. Follow the desires of your heart and the glances of your eyes—but know well that God will call you to account for all such things—¹⁰and banish care from your mind, and pluck sorrow out of your flesh! For youth and black hair are fleeting.

12 So appreciate your vigor^c in the days of your youth, before those days of sorrow come and those years arrive of which you will say, "I have no pleasure in them"; ²before sun and light and moon and stars grow dark, and the clouds come back again after the rain:

a-a Emendation yields, "if a thunderbolt (lit. arrow, cf., e.g., 2 Sam. 22.15) falls . . . where the thunderbolt falls, only there will it strike."

b So many mss. and Targum; most mss. read "like."

c Cf. postbiblical bori; others "Remember thy Creator."

inevitable cause-and-effect actions in the natural world. Yet uncertainty can be detected here indirectly in the matter of timing—a matter that Koheleth has already discussed explicitly several times, especially in 3.1–11. The point seems to be that even if humans know that clouds bring rain and trees fall, they cannot predict when these actions will occur.

4–5: Thus, anyone who wastes too much time calculating the occurrence of meteorological phenomena will not get on with the basic activities of planting and reaping.

What humans do not know about nature, then, is confirmed by what they do not know about their own birth, and all of this only underscores that they do not understand the essential actions ("ma'aseh") of God, who is behind all of these and everything else. 6: Summing up the whole matter, Koheleth returns to the earlier agricultural theme and asserts that faced with uncertainty about the future, it is better to sow and till than to do nothing, because at least then there is a chance of success. 7–8: These vv. look at the "seize the day" theme by contrasting the pleasure of living, expressed as the sweet goodness of experiencing the light of the sun (cf. 6.6; 7.11), with the coming days of darkness and the nothingness ("hevel") they bring—the days here referring to death and the pains of old age that immediately precede it (cf. 12.1–2; 6.3–4). Given the darkness that is to come, Koheleth again emphasizes that humans must enjoy life while they have it. 9–10: This enjoyment is something best suited to the young, and so Koheleth advises them not to lose that opportunity, since youth is something fleeting ("hevel," echoing the "hevel" of v. 8, but in another of its senses). The observation that the way a young person behaves will eventually be judged by God has been regarded by some modern interpreters as an orthodox addition to the original text of Koheleth, since it presumably clashes with the uncertainty about knowing God that Koheleth otherwise expresses. But Koheleth's hope in the possibility of divine judgment was already stated in 3.17, where it seems natural to the context, and so it could be here.

12.1–8: The terrors of old age. A contrast with the previous unit about the pleasures of youth is made explicit in v. 1, the days of your youth and those days of sorrow. That vv. 1–8 is the last unit in the book attributed to Koheleth is signaled by the final v., 8; this is a virtual repetition of 1.2, which, following the introductory rubric, opens the book. To be sure, 1.2 gives the phrase Utter futility twice, while here, in the main Masoretic texts, it is given only once; it does, however, appear twice in some other Heb manuscripts and the ancient Syriac version. The virtual identity of 1.2 and 12.8 forms, thus, an inclusio and gives the book closure by symmetry; this is confirmed by the fact that the following vv., 9–14, function as an epilogue. That Koheleth's book ends, therefore, on the dark note of old age is no accident; rather, it reaffirms the transitory nature of

- 3 When the guards of the house^a become shaky,
And the men of valor^b are bent,
And the maids that grind,^c grown few, are idle,
And the ladies that peer through the windows^d grow dim,
4 And the doors to the street^e are shut—
With the noise of the hand mill growing fainter,
And the song of the bird ^fgrowing feebler,^f
And all the strains of music dying down,^g 5 When one is afraid of heights
And there is terror on the road.—
For the almond tree may blossom, ^hThe grasshopper be burdened,^h
And the caper bush may bud again;ⁱ
But man sets out for his eternal abode,
With mourners all around in the street.—
6 Before the silver cord snaps
And the golden bowl crashes,
The jar is shattered at the spring,
And the jug^j is smashed at the cistern.^k
7 And the dust returns to the ground
As it was,
And the lifebreath returns to God
Who bestowed it.
8 Utter futility—said Koheleth—
All is futile!

⁹A further word: Because Koheleth was a sage, he continued to instruct the people. He listened to and tested the a I.e., the arms. b I.e., the legs. c I.e., the teeth. d I.e., the eyes.

e I.e., the ears. ff Exact meaning of Heb. uncertain. g Cf. 2 Sam. 19.36.

h-h Emendation yields "The squill (postbiblical Heb. ḥaṣab) resume its burden," i.e., its blossom-stalk and its leaves.

i These plants, after seeming dead for part of the year, revive, unlike man; cf. Job 14.7–10.

j So in Punic; others "wheel." k Poetic figure for the end of life.

life, with no certainty of continuity or afterward, that has been stated throughout (e.g., 2.18–21; 5.12–16; 9.5–6). In the present instance we have a graphic picture of the decrepitude of old age in a variety of images. 2: The first is that of darkness and light, last discussed in 11.7–8. Here it is elaborated and intensified such that the darkness (of old age) envelops the light (of vigorous life), whether that light comes during the day (of the sun) or the night (the moon and the stars) (cf., e.g., Isa. 13.10; Ezek.

32.7–8). 3–4a: This darkness, in turn, is connected with the weakening of basic human vocations: house managers, men of wealth or warriors, grinders of flour, sequestered women who have to look through windows; and of basic human activities: doors opening on the bustling business of the street-market, and grinding. 4b–5a: All of these are finally linked up with nature—birds, almond trees, grasshoppers—and their decline or expressions of fear at the approaching darkness. What these images denote has been debated. Classical rabbinic thought (see, e.g., Ecc. Rab., Targum, Rashi) has suggested an allegory wherein the words for managers, men of wealth, etc. denote different parts of the human body, here thus in rapid deterioration. An alternative suggestion is that the images pertain to an estate of a wealthy landowner—echoing Koheleth's experiment in ch 2—which here is in serious decline. 5b–7: Whatever the precise solution, the imagery clearly points to human death, given the references to funeral mourning, to the breaking of a pitcher used to raise water from a well (so Ibn Ezra; cf. Zech. 4.2–3), and to the return of each human body to dust, so echoing 3.20 and Gen. 3.19. 7: Significantly, each human lifebreath ("ruah"; cf. 11.5) will return to God who gave it, thus suggesting a difference from what is expressed in 3.19–21 and Gen. 3.19.

12.9–14: Editorial reflections. Interpreters, whether traditional Jewish or modern critical, generally agree that these final vv. constitute an epilogue, after the conclusion of the book of Koheleth proper. Many traditional Jewish interpreters assume that Koheleth/Solomon is still speaking here, but some (e.g., Rashbam) suppose that it is an editorial addition, a common opinion of modern critics. The formal indications of the separation of these vv. from the core of the book are twofold: the framework, noted above, that encloses 1.2–12.8; and the shift here to third-person discussion of Koheleth from the first-person remarks by him within 1.2–12.8. Since this third-person discussion echoes the introductory rubric of 1.1, the two together provide a second, larger framework around the one within 1.2–12.8. A third formal marker breaks vv. 9–14 into two parts, reflecting perhaps two separate editorial additions: 9–11 and 12–14, for each begins with the phrase A further word. 9–11: These vv. identify Koheleth as a sage and describe his characteristic activity soundness^a of many maxims. ¹⁰Koheleth sought to discover useful sayings and recorded^b genuinely truthful sayings. ¹¹The sayings of the wise are like goads, like nails fixed ^cin prodding sticks.^c ^dThey were given by one Shepherd.^d ¹²A further word: ^eAgainst them,^e my son, be warned!

The making of many books is without limit

And much study^f is a wearying of the flesh.

¹³The sum of the matter, when all is said and done: Revere God and observe His commandments! For this applies to all mankind: ¹⁴that God will call every creature to account for ^geverything unknown,^g be it good or bad.

The sum of the matter, when all is said and done: Revere God and observe His commandments! For this applies to all mankind.

a A noun, like dibber (Jer. 5.13), which occurs in such postbiblical phrases as shanim kethiq(qe)nan, “normal years” (lit. “years according to their propriety”).

b Wekthathub is equivalent to wekthathob, an infinitive employed as in Esth. 9.16 and elsewhere.

c-c Meaning of Heb. uncertain. Others “are those that are composed in collections.”

d-d Meaning of Heb. uncertain. Emendation yields “They are accounted as a sharp ox goad” (post-biblical mardea’).

e-e Emendation yields “Slow, there!” Cf. Arabic mah and mah mah; so also mah (meh) in Prov. 31.2.

f Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

g-g Emendation yields “all their conduct.”

of teaching by means of wise sayings, emphasizing the careful construction of the sayings (v. 9c) and their provocative impact, like the goads and pricks of a shepherd (v. 11) to control the animals under his supervision. 11: Traditional interpretation identifies the Shepherd with Moses (e.g., Targum, Eccl. Rab., Rashi). 12–14: These vv. assert that with Koheleth’s sayings collected, it is not desirable to add anything more (cf. Deut. 4.2; 13.1). Further, this second part strives to sum up Koheleth’s teaching with the instruction (v. 13b) to fear (revere) God and to keep His commandments, a common trope in wisdom literature (cf. Prov. 1.7; Job 1.1; 28.28). 14: The reason for this instruction is that God will bring every action, even if kept hidden up to this point, into judgment, whether for good or for ill. Significantly, when read in Jewish liturgy,

v. 13 and its instruction to fear and to keep is repeated after v. 14. This prevents the book from ending on a negative note (see the similar practice in Isaiah, Malachi, and Lamentations); it also has the effect of highlighting v. 13 as central to the meaning of the book. Some modern critics, on the other hand, have understood this instruction to fear and to keep as the work of a later orthodox editor, who wished to tone down, if not to reshape, what he regarded as the radical challenge of Koheleth to the tradition of God’s covenantal demands with their assurance of a strict reward-and-punishment justice. It is true that the instruction here to keep God’s commandments does not appear as such elsewhere in Koheleth (but cf. 8.5, where, however, the reference is to the command of a human king), but the other clause, to fear God, is found (3.14; 5.6; 7.18; 8.12–13), as is the statement about God’s judgment (3.17, cf. 3.15; 11.9). Thus, this concluding instruction may in fact be congruent with the views in the rest of the book. The point would be, in sum, that just because human rational inquiry leads nowhere, in terms of demonstrating a system of reward and punishment or lasting achievements, it does not invalidate the power and sovereignty of God nor disprove the possibility that in some way He does call everyone and everything to account.

Esther

IN JEWISH TRADITION, THE BOOK OF ESTHER, megillat 'ester, “the scroll of Esther,” is inextricably bound up with the holiday of Purim. The book provides the raison d'être for Purim; it supplies the etiology (story of its origin) for the holiday, authorizes its annual observance, and models how it is to be celebrated. Purim, the only biblical festival not mentioned in the Torah, needed a reason and an authorization. It gets its reason in the pseudohistorical tale of how the Jews were saved from their archenemy, and it gets its authorization in the letter of Mordecai (and Esther) that this book includes. The book of Esther is the centerpiece of the observance of Purim; it is traditionally read publicly in the synagogue on Purim eve and the following morning, accompanied by the noisy blotting out of Haman's name by children and adults, many of them dressed in funny costumes. Purim is a carnivalesque holiday, replete with mock reenactments of the Esther story, partying and excessive drinking, carnivals and masquerades, and a general sense of frivolity uncharacteristic of Jewish festivals. The Talmud (b. Meg. 7b) encourages one to get so drunk that one cannot distinguish between “Cursed be Haman” and “Blessed be Mordecai.” Like Purim, the book is full of boisterous merrymaking—a comic farce for a carnivalesque holiday. The book sets the tone for the holiday, “days of feasting and merrymaking” (9.22). It also initiates the other customs of the holiday: sending (food) gifts to friends and neighbors and presents to the poor (9.22).

Esther is best read as a comedy. Rabbinic midrashim seem to have intuited this, and they add to the fun by their preposterous embellishments of the story and its characters, extending in the most unsubtle ways the farce or burlesque inherent in the book, with its bawdiness and slap-stick humor. The voyeurism of ch 1—drunken nobles hoping to ogle the queen—is made more explicit in the midrash (e.g., Esth. Rab.) on 1.11 that says that Vashti was bidden to appear “wearing a royal diadem” and nothing else, that is, naked. Ch 2, with its inside view of the harem, where the girls apply their cosmetics for a year in preparation for a night in the king's bed, is no less sexually suggestive. The lavishness of the Persian court and the ten drinking banquets in the story add to the aura of comic excess. The misunderstandings between Ahasuerus and Haman in chs 6 and 7, the climax of the plot, produce belly laughs. All of these attributes are characteristic of low comedy.

The story's plot is structured on improbabilities, exaggerations, misunderstandings, and reversals. Esther keeps her identity hidden although her relationship to Mordecai the Jew was known; an insignificant Jewish minority kills 75,000 of its enemies; Haman erects a seven-story stake for impaling his enemy. The characters are caricatures. Ahasuerus is a buffoon, never sure quite what to do, completely at the mercy of his ministers and servants, giving away his power without a thought. Haman is an erratic egomaniac, with wild mood swings, concerned only for his own honor and his enemy's disgrace. Even the heroes, Mordecai and Esther, seem one-dimensional and unrealistic. In fact, nothing about the events of the story is realistic, and therefore attempts to read history from it are misguided. The setting of the Persian court is authentic, but the events are fictional. There was no known Jewish queen of Persia. Moreover, the Persian empire was tolerant of its ethnic minorities and is an unlikely place for an edict to eradicate the Jewish population.

The story draws on conventional themes of ancient storytelling known from the Bible and from extrabiblical sources from the Persian period (especially Greek sources): a rivalry between courtiers (this one focusing on honor and shame), a woman who uses her charm to save her people, an ancient ethnic feud, hidden identities, and the triumph of the forces of good over the forces of evil. The portrayal of the Persian court is equally conventional, if at times made into a burlesque. Like the many Greek stories about Persia (in Herodotus and other contemporary works), Esther features royal luxury bordering on decadence, concern for protocol and legalities, wine parties, and the renowned communication system. Esther is, then, in tune with contemporary literary works about Persia. At the same time, it draws on biblical traditions, most significantly those about Saul and Agag, king of the Amalekites, who are reincarnated, as it were, in Mordecai and Haman. The stories of Joseph and Daniel also resemble Esther in that they feature Jewish courtiers in foreign courts. (The stories in Daniel chs 1–6 are roughly contemporary with Esther.) Finally, Esther echoes the book of Kings in its mention of royal annals, and some scholars have found other similar phraseology in the two books.

Noticeably absent is any mention of God or of religious observance (prayer, Jewish dietary restrictions, traditional modesty, and endogamous marriage). The Rabbis were troubled by Esther's marriage to a non-Jew, and solved the problem by explaining that she remained completely passive in the king's bed or that she never actually consummated the marriage. They also provide her with kosher food, although the Bible is silent about her diet (unlike Daniel, who became a vegetarian so as to maintain the Jewish dietary laws; see Dan. ch 1). Mordecai and the Jews mourn and fast, but do not pray—a most striking omission (Daniel also prays). In its omission of God and religion, the Hebrew text is highly unusual, so much so that in the Greek version of Esther there are prayers, the name of God occurs, and Esther desists from eating forbidden food and drinking forbidden wine. (There are other major differences in the Greek Esther as well, especially its tone.) It is not clear whether these religious items were part of the original story and then removed, or added to an original story that lacked them. The best explanation for their absence, especially the absence of God's name, is that, given that the story is so comic, at times bordering on lewd, such reticence about things religious is preferable, lest religion be debauched.

The book does have a serious side, and an important function as a Diaspora story, a story written about and for (and perhaps by) Jews of the Diaspora. As such, it promotes Jewish identity, solidarity within the Jewish community, and a strong connection with Jewish (biblical) tradition. It is more centered on the Diaspora than most Jewish works of its time; it does not refer to the land of Israel (other than the mention of the exile of Jehoia-chin) or to the Temple. It addresses the inherent problems of a minority people, their vulnerability to political forces and government edicts, their lack of autonomy, and their dependence on royal favor and on the sagacity of their own leaders. More specifically, Haman's false claim about the Jews is a prototype of anti-Semitism, which must have been familiar enough to resonate with the book's original audience. In the end, though, the message is positive: Good triumphs and evil is eradicated; the threat of Jewish annihilation is averted and the Jewish community is assured of continuity and prosperity. It is no wonder that Haman became the symbol of later enemies of the Jews, and that "minor Purims" were celebrated in medieval and early modern times in communities where great danger was averted. The psychological release that is embodied in a carnivalesque holiday like Purim and in the book of Esther lends itself to similar celebrations of the communal triumph over danger. The book succeeds in putting a serious message in a comic form.

The book was probably written sometime between 400 and 300 BCE, toward the end of the Persian period. It apparently adapted an earlier tale about Mordecai, Esther, and Haman and shaped it into an etiology of Purim, a holiday whose origin is lost in obscurity. The story appears in rather different form in the Greek version of Esther (LXX), where it has six major additions not found in the Masoretic version plus a number of other significant differences throughout the story. The Greek version is less comic and more melodramatic, and in its present form it reflects Hellenistic concerns (Jewish ritual observance, including circumcision) not found in the surviving Hebrew version. An ancient body of midrashic interpretation attaches to Esther, found in the Talmud (b. Meg. 10b–17a), in Josephus's paraphrase (Antiquity of the Jews, Book 11, ch 6), in the two Targumim (Aramaic renderings) to Esther, and in several midrashic collections. There is no consensus on the date of the book's canonization, partly because there is no consensus on the date of the canonization of the Kethuvim. Some scholars put it as early as the mid-2nd century BCE; others date it to the 1st century CE. Interestingly, Esther is the only biblical book of which no remnant has been found at Qumran; apparently the Dead Sea community did not preserve this book (although they seem to have had stories of the same genre), perhaps because they did not observe Purim, which according to their 364-day calendar would always fall on the Sabbath, creating a conflict of observance (according to the Jewish calendar now in use, Purim can never fall on the Sabbath).

[ADELE BERLIN]

1 It happened in the days of Ahasuerus—that Ahasuerus who reigned over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces from India to Ethiopia. 2In those days, when King Ahasuerus occupied the royal throne in the fortress^a Shushan, 3in the third year of his reign, he gave a banquet for all the officials and courtiers—the administration of Persia and Media, the nobles and the governors of the provinces in his service. 4For no fewer than a hundred and eighty days he displayed the vast riches of his kingdom and the splendid glory of his majesty. 5At the end of this period, the king gave a banquet for seven days in the court of the king’s palace garden for all the people who lived in the fortress Shushan, high and low alike. 6^b[There were hangings of] white cotton and blue wool, caught up by cords of fine linen and purple wool to silver rods and alabaster columns; and there were couches of gold and silver on a pavement of marble, alabaster, mother-of-pearl, and mosaics. 7Royal wine was served in abundance, as befits a king, in golden beakers, beakers of varied design. 8And the rule for the drinking was, “No restrictions!” For the king had given orders to every palace steward to comply with each man’s wishes. 9In addition, Queen Vashti gave a banquet for women, in the royal palace of King Ahasuerus.

10On the seventh day, when the king was merry with wine, he ordered Mehuman, Bizzetha, Harbona, Bigtha, Abagtha, Zethar, and Carcas, the seven eunuchs in attena i.e., the fortified city. b Meaning of part of this verse uncertain.

1.1–22: Wine and women. This ch is a prologue to the main story, setting the scene and the tone: luxury, bureaucracy, and bawdiness—all to excess. The Persian court is decadently lavish and mired in protocol. King Ahasuerus is all-powerful and totally inept. The dismissal of Vashti paves the way for Esther’s entrance. 1–8: Wine: partytime in Persia. We enter the opulent Persian court, filled from ceiling to floor with expensive and exotic furnishings, exquisite drinking-vessels, and then the wine, the cause of all that is to follow. 1: Ahasuerus, usually identified with Xerxes I (reigned 486–465 BCE), although the Septuagint and the Peshitta read Artaxerxes. But this Ahasuerus is a fictional character, a comic figurehead concerned with the trappings of power but exercising little of his own. From India to Ethiopia: The extent of his sovereignty shows how powerful he was. The Persian empire stretched from “Hi(n)dush”—the area in the Indus valley, in the modern province of Sind in southern Pakistan—to “Nubia,” south of Egypt, and is described in these terms in Persian documents. A hundred and twenty-seven provinces: This is one of several large numbers that add to the tone of exaggeration. 2: The fortress Shushan: Susa, one of the four Persian capitals (besides Ec-batana [Hamadan], Babylon, and Persepolis), was the main administrative capital and the king’s winter residence. The fortress refers to the acropolis, the seat of the government, and Shushan or

“the city of Shushan” refers to the lower city. 3–5: The king displays his wealth. This scene parodies the Persian institution of the “King’s Table,” an occasion for the bringing of tribute from the provinces and the bestowing of gifts from the king to high officials. Persian palaces at Persepolis and Susa had large assembly halls (Persian, “apadana,” Heb, “bitan”) separate from the palace. 7: Persian parties were famous for their wine-drinking. Herodotus (Histories 1.133) notes that the Persians decided important issues when they were drunk and reconsidered when they were sober, and vice versa. Ahasuerus will not have a chance to reconsider (cf. 2.1–2). 8: The rule for the drinking was, “No restrictions!”: The usual drinking practice was not followed. The best explanation is that the wine normally reserved “by royal law” for the exclusive use of the king was served to the guests. The phrase is then better translated “As for drinking according to the rule, no one enforced it.” Many commentaries, however, take the phrase as a reference to the amount of wine: Each man could drink as much or as little as he liked.

1.9–22: Women: the Vashti incident. 9: It was considered indecent for wives of the Persian nobility to attend male drinking parties; the only female attendees were dancing girls. Therefore the queen hosted a separate party for the women. 10: The tongue-twisting names of the servants are Persian-sounding, but probably fake. The names in v. 14 mirror this list (Mehuman/Memucan, and so forth). 11: Just as the king has displayed his wealth, so he wishes to display his queen. Just as the royal wine is not reserved exclusively for the king, so the king’s wife is not kept for his eyes alone. A royal diadem, a mark of belonging to the royal household. 12: Vashti tries to protect her own honor and her drunken husband’s, but must disobey a royal command to do so. 13: Ever concerned with the dance on King Ahasuerus,¹¹ to bring Queen Vashti before the king wearing a royal diadem, to display her beauty to the peoples and the officials; for she was a beautiful woman.¹² But Queen Vashti refused to come at the king's command conveyed by the eunuchs. The king was greatly incensed, and his fury burned within him.

¹³ Then the king consulted the sages learned in procedure.^a (For it was the royal practice [to turn] to all who were versed in law and precedent. ¹⁴ His closest advisers were Carshena, Shethar, Admatha, Tarshish, Meres, Marsena, and Memucan, the seven ministers of Persia and Media who had access to the royal presence and occupied the first place in the kingdom.) ¹⁵ "What," [he asked,] "shall be done, according to law, to Queen Vashti for failing to obey the command of King Ahasuerus conveyed by the eunuchs?"

¹⁶ Thereupon Memucan declared in the presence of the king and the ministers: "Queen Vashti has committed an offense not only against Your Majesty but also against all the officials and against all the peoples in all the provinces of King Ahasuerus. ¹⁷ For the queen's behavior will make all wives despise their husbands, as they reflect that King Ahasuerus himself ordered Queen Vashti to be brought before him, but she would not come. ¹⁸ This very day the ladies of Persia and Media, who have heard of the queen's behavior, will cite it to all Your Majesty's officials, and there will be no end of scorn and provocation!

¹⁹ "If it please Your Majesty, let a royal edict be issued by you, and let it be written into the laws of Persia and Media, so that it cannot be abrogated, that Vashti shall never enter the presence of King Ahasuerus. And let Your Majesty bestow her royal state upon another who is more worthy than she. ²⁰ Then will the judgment executed by Your Majesty resound throughout your realm, vast though it is; and all wives will treat their husbands with respect, high and low alike."

²¹ The proposal was approved by the king and the ministers, and the king did as Memucan proposed. ²² Dispatches were sent to all the provinces of the king, to every province in its own script and to every nation in its own language, that every man should wield authority in his home and speak the language of his own people.

2 Some time afterward, when the anger of King Ahasuerus subsided, he thought of Vashti and what she had done and what had been decreed against her. ² The king's proper way of doing things, the king consults sages learned in procedure, the legal experts, or better, the experts in protocol. Law, Heb "dat," from the Persian "data," occurs nineteen times in the book, with meanings ranging from "law" to "custom" to "practice." In later Heb, it means "religion"; there is no biblical word for "religion." 16-22: A domestic incident becomes a national crisis. The danger Memucan sees in Vashti's refusal is preposterous, as is his solution. His attempt to preserve the king's honor makes the king look even sillier and more vulnerable. 19: Vashti refused to appear, and now she may never appear again. Cannot be abrogated, generally understood to mean that a law cannot be revoked, but the expression more likely means "may not be broken" or "to which there is no exception." (Cf. 8.5, 8.) Memucan may have said this out of concern that the king himself will want to make an exception and take Vashti back. 22: Dispatches were sent: The Persians were noted for their excellent communications network. See also 3.12-13; 8.9-14, where the dispatches become progressively more urgent. To every province in its own script and to every nation [or "people"] in its own language: This would ensure that the edict could be understood by all in the multi-ethnic empire. The usual practice was for communications to be promulgated in Aramaic, the common language of the empire, and to be translated locally. That every man should wield authority in his home: This is not the wording of the edict but the reason for its publication. Cf. 3.14; 8.13; and perhaps 9.21. Speak the language of his own people, a difficult phrase, perhaps meaning that the dispatches were sent in vernacular languages so that every husband could readily understand the message and report the contents to his wife.

2.1-18: Mordecai enters the story and Esther enters the harem.

2: The advisers suggest a replacement for Vashti before Ahasuerus can decide to take her back.

^a Lit. "the times."

servants who attended him said, "Let beautiful young virgins be sought out for Your Majesty.³ Let Your Majesty appoint officers in every province of your realm to assemble all the beautiful young virgins at the fortress Shushan, in the harem under the supervision of Hege, the king's eunuch, guardian of the women. Let them be provided with their cosmetics.⁴ And let the maiden who pleases Your Majesty be queen instead of Vashti." The proposal pleased the king, and he acted upon it.

⁵In the fortress Shushan lived a Jew by the name of Mordecai, son of Jair son of Shimei son of Kish, a Benjamite. ⁶[Kish] had been exiled from Jerusalem in the group that was carried into exile along with King Jeconiah of Judah, which had been driven into exile by King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon.—⁷ He was foster father to Hadasah—that is, Esther—his uncle's daughter, for she had neither father nor mother. The maiden was shapely and beautiful; and when her father and mother died, Mordecai adopted her as his own daughter.

⁸When the king's order and edict was proclaimed, and when many girls were assembled in the fortress Shushan under the supervision of Hegai,⁹ Esther too was taken into the king's palace under the supervision of Hegai, guardian of the women. ⁹The girl pleased him and won his favor, and he hastened to furnish her with her cosmetics and her rations, as well as with the seven maids who were her due from the king's palace; and he treated her and her maids with special kindness in the harem. ¹⁰Esther did not reveal her people or her kindred, for Mordecai had told her not to reveal it. ¹¹Every single day Mordecai would walk about in front of the court of the harem, to learn how Esther was faring and what was happening to her.

¹²When each girl's turn came to go to King Ahasuerus at the end of the twelve months' treatment prescribed for women (for that was the period spent on beautifying them: six months with oil of myrrh and six months with perfumes and women's cosmetics,¹³ and it was after that that the girl would go to the king), whatever she asked for would be given her to take with her from the harem to the king's palace. ¹⁴She would go in the evening and leave in the morning for a second harem in charge of Shaashgaz, the king's eunuch, guardian of the concubines. She would not go again to the king unless the king wanted her, when she would be summoned by name. ¹⁵When the turn came for Esther daughter of Abihail—the uncle of Mordecai, 4: A beauty contest is hardly the way real queens of Persia were chosen. In fact, Persian queens had to be from the Persian nobility.

5–7: Mordecai is a prominent upper-class Jew of the Babylonian exile, with an obliquely expressed link to King Saul. 5: A Jew by the name of Mordecai: "Yehudi" does not refer to a member of the tribe of Judah (Mordecai was from the tribe of Benjamin), but to a Jew from the kingdom of Judah (where all the Babylonian exiles were from); this is the beginning of the usage of "Jew," in the sense that we now know it. "Mordecai" was a common personal name in the Persian period (cf. Neh. 7:7); "Marduka" was its Babylonian form. It is not a direct reference to the Babylonian god Marduk (just as Esther is not a reference to the goddess Ishtar). Shimei: According to rabbinic interpretation, this is Shimei son of Gera, the member of Saul's clan who supported him against David (2 Sam. 16:5–8); this book, in contrast to Samuel, reflects favorably on Saul and his household and on the tribe of Benjamin. 6: [Kish], better, "he." The reference is most likely to Mordecai, who, like Daniel, was exiled from Jerusalem—a sign of authentic Jewish pedigree in the Diaspora. Because this would make Mordecai incredibly old (115 years), traditional Jewish exegesis prefers to understand Kish as the person exiled. 7: Esther is introduced indirectly, through the introduction of Mordecai; her patronymic is not given until v. 15. "Hadasah" means "myrtle." "Esther" is probably derived from the Persian name for "star." It was not uncommon for Diaspora Jews to have both a Heb and a vernacular name, as did Daniel and his friends, and Judah Maccabee. If Mordecai had a Heb name, it is not mentioned. 10: It stretches credibility to imagine that Esther could keep her ethnic identity a secret, but it is vital to the plot. 12: Oil of myrrh: Myrrh is associated with love-making (Song 1:13; Prov. 7:17). The excess continues, along with the bureaucracy.

a Identical with Hege in v. 3.

who had adopted her as his own daughter—to go to the king, she did not ask for anything but what Hegai, the king's eunuch, guardian of the women, advised. Yet Esther won the admiration of all who saw her.

¹⁶Esther was taken to King Ahasuerus, in his royal palace, in the tenth month, which is the month of Tebeth, in the seventh year of his reign. ¹⁷The king loved Esther more than all the other women, and she won his grace and favor more than all the virgins. So he set a royal diadem on her head and made her queen instead of Vashti. ¹⁸The king gave a great banquet for all his officials and courtiers, "the banquet of Esther." He proclaimed a remission of taxes^a for the provinces and distributed gifts as befits a king.

^{19b}When the virgins were assembled a second time, Mordecai sat in the palace gate. ²⁰But Esther still did not reveal her kindred or her people, as Mordecai had instructed her; for Esther obeyed Mordecai's bidding, as she had done when she was under his tutelage.

²¹At that time, when Mordecai was sitting in the palace gate, Bigthan and Teresh, two of the king's eunuchs who guarded the threshold, became angry, and plotted to do away with King Ahasuerus. ²²Mordecai learned of it and told it to Queen Esther, and Esther reported it to the king in Mordecai's name. ²³The matter was investigated and found to be so, and the two were impaled on stakes. This was recorded in the book of annals at the instance of the king.

3 Some time afterward, King Ahasuerus promoted Haman son of Hammedatha the Agagite; he advanced him and seated him higher than any of his fellow officials. ²All the king's courtiers in the palace gate knelt and bowed low to Haman, for such was the king's order con-a Or "an amnesty." b Meaning of verse uncertain.

14: Second harem: Perhaps there was a second harem, but more likely the women return to the same harem, this time to be looked after by Shanshigaz. 16: The tenth month, which is the month of Tebeth: In Zechariah, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther a double system of naming months is used: the ordinal number of the more ancient Israelite calendar and the month name, adopted from the Babylonian calendar via Aramaic. 17: Women . . . virgins, all the women who have already come and all the virgins yet to come. A royal diadem, perhaps the same diadem that Vashti was bidden to appear with in 1.11. 19: This v. is difficult, and may be a scribal error. 21–23: Mordecai uncovers a plot against the king. 21: In the palace gate, "the king's gate." More than a physical location, this is Mordecai's official position at court. Mordecai is a member of the king's secret police. 22: Mordecai's job is to ferret out plots against the king. In Mordecai's name: Mordecai's loyalty to the king is demonstrated but he is not rewarded; the lack of reward will be remembered in 6.2. A rabbinic principle is derived from this verse: "A person who quotes something in the name of the one who said it brings about the redemption of the world" (m. 'Avot 6.6). 23: Impaled on stakes: Impalement was not the method of execution but a way of disgracing a person through the public display of his corpse. (Cf. Gen. 40.19; Deut. 21.22; Josh. 8.29; 10.26; 1 Sam. 31.10.) Herodotus (Histories 3.125; 7.238; cf. 9.79) also mentions the impalement of corpses as a sign of great disgrace. This is the first impalement in the story and foreshadows Haman's plot to impale Mordecai.

3.1–15: Haman plots to kill the Jews. The main plot, the rivalry between the two courtiers, begins here. The personal rivalry between Haman and Mordecai quickly takes on national implications. 1: Promoted Haman: Mordecai's good deed in saving the king's life goes unrewarded while Haman is promoted for no apparent reason. The Agagite, a descendant of Agag, the Amalekite king responsible for Saul's loss of the kingship (1 Sam. 15.8). The ancient enmity between Israel and Amalek informs the relationship between Haman and Mordecai. The Amalekite connection is reinforced in the synagogue lectionary cycle by the reading, on the Sabbath preceding Purim, of the passage in Deut. 25.17–19 ("Remember what Amalek did to you . . . you shall blot out the memory of Amalek") and the haftarah from 1 Sam. ch 15 (containing the story of Saul and Agag). On Purim itself the Torah reading is Exod. 17.8–16, the battle between Israel and Amalek. Both Targumim to Esther extend Haman's genealogy back to Esau, echoing Gen. 36.12, thereby extending the rivalry between Mordecai and Haman even further back to Esau and Jacob. 2: Would not kneel or bow low: Mordecai's refusal is not based on religious principles, for biblical Jews or Israelites may bow to superiors (Gen. 23.7; 43.28; Exod. 18.7; 1 Kings cerning him; but Mordecai would not kneel or bow low.

³Then the king's courtiers who were in the palace gate said to Mordecai, "Why do you disobey the king's order?"

⁴When they spoke to him day after day and he would not listen to them, they told Haman, in order to see whether Mordecai's resolve would prevail; for he had explained to them that he was a Jew.⁵ When Haman saw that Mordecai would not kneel or bow low to him, Haman was filled with rage. ⁶But he disdained to lay hands on Mordecai alone; having been told who Mordecai's people were, Haman plotted to do away with all the Jews, Mordecai's people, throughout the kingdom of Ahasuerus.

⁷In the first month, that is, the month of Nisan, in the twelfth year of King Ahasuerus, pur—which means "the lot"—was cast before Haman concerning every day and every month, [until it fell on] the twelfth month, that is, the month of Adar. ⁸Haman then said to King Ahasuerus, "There is a certain people, scattered and dispersed among the other peoples in all the provinces of your realm, whose laws are different from those of any other people and who do not obey the king's laws; and it is not in Your Majesty's interest to tolerate them. ⁹If it please Your Majesty, let an edict be drawn for their destruction, and I will pay ten thousand talents of silver to the stewards for deposit in the royal treasury." ¹⁰Thereupon the king removed his signet ring from his hand and gave it to Haman son of Hammedatha the Agagite, the foe of the Jews. ¹¹And the king said, "The money and the people are yours to do with as you see fit."

¹²On the thirteenth day of the first month, the king's scribes were summoned and a decree was issued, as Haman directed, to the king's satraps, to the governors of every province, and to the officials of every people, to every province in its own script and to every people in its own language. The orders were issued in the name of King Ahasuerus and sealed with the king's signet. ¹³Accordingly, written instructions were dispatched by couriers to all the king's provinces to destroy, massacre, and exterminate all the Jews, young and old, children and women, on a single day, on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month—that is, the month of Adar—and to plunder their possessions. ¹⁴The text of the document was to the effect that a law should be proclaimed in every single province; it was to be publicly displayed to all the peoples, so that they might be ready for that day.

1.23), but on ethnic grounds so as not to give honor to an enemy of Israel. Rabbinic interpretation recasts the refusal in terms of a religious prohibition, saying that Haman was wearing an image of an idol on his chest and that in bowing to him Mordecai would be bowing to an idol. Another rabbinic explanation (also found in the LXX and at home in the Hellenistic and Roman periods) is that it was improper to bow to anyone but God. 5: Filled with rage: The mercurial mood-swings of Haman begin. Haman is a glutton for honor, as will become more evident in ch 6. 6: Mordecai's people: Haman is motivated by both personal and ethnic reasons.

7: Pur, from Akkadian; the practice of casting lots by means of a small stone die is known from ancient Mesopotamia. Similar techniques were used in Israel and Greece. The propitious month is Adar but no date is given until v. 13.

8: Haman's accusation against the Jews contains the essence of what was later to grow into the classic anti-Semitic argument that the Jews are xenophobic and misanthropic. Haman is implying (falsely) that the Jews do not acknowledge the sovereignty of the king, and are therefore guilty of treason. The irony is that Mordecai demonstrated his loyalty to the king at the end of ch 2. It is not in Your Majesty's interest: Heb "shoveh" may also mean "profit," that is, there is no profit for the king in letting the Jews live.

9: Haman offers an inducement to the king in the form of revenue for the royal treasury. Perhaps it is to offset any loss of taxes that might have been paid by the Jews, or perhaps simply a bribe. Ten thousand talents of silver, estimated to be 333 tons or 302 metric tons of silver—an enormous amount, close to the total sum of the annual tribute of the entire Persian empire. Another exaggerated number in a story full of exaggerations.

10: Signet ring, the authority to sign and seal a royal edict. 12: Its own script . . . its own language, see 1.22. 13: To plunder their possessions, a i.e., that as a Jew he could not bow to a descendant of Agag, the Amalekite king; see 1 Sam. 15, and cf. Exod. 17.14-16; Deut. 25.17-19.

¹⁵The couriers went out posthaste on the royal mission, and the decree was proclaimed in the fortress Shushan. The king and Haman sat down to feast, but the city of Shushan was dumbfounded.

4 When Mordecai learned all that had happened, Mordecai tore his clothes and put on sackcloth and ashes. He went through the city, crying out loudly and bitterly, ²until he came in front of the palace gate; for one could not enter the palace gate wearing sackcloth.—³Also, in every province that the king's command and decree reached, there was great mourning among the Jews, with fasting, weeping, and wailing, and everybody lay in sackcloth and ashes.—⁴When Esther's maidens and eunuchs came and informed her, the queen was greatly agitated. She sent clothing for Mordecai to wear, so that he might take off his sackcloth; but he refused. ⁵Thereupon Esther summoned Hathach, one of the eunuchs whom the king had appointed to serve her, and sent him to Mordecai to learn the why and wherefore of it all. ⁶Hathach went out to Mordecai in the city square in front of the palace gate; ⁷and Mordecai told him all that had happened to him, and all about the money that Haman had offered to pay into the royal treasury for the destruction of the Jews. ⁸He also gave him the written text of the law that had been proclaimed in Shushan for their destruction. [He bade him] show it to Esther and inform her, and charge her to go to the king and to appeal to him and to plead with him for her people. ⁹When Hathach came and delivered Mordecai's message to Esther, ¹⁰Esther told Hathach to take back to Mordecai the following reply: ¹¹"All the king's courtiers and the people of the king's provinces know that if any person, man or woman, enters the king's presence in the inner court without having been summoned, there is but one law for him—that he be put to death. Only if the king extends the golden scepter to him may he live. Now I have not been summoned to visit the king for the last thirty days."

¹²When Mordecai was told what Esther had said, ¹³Mordecai had this message delivered to Esther: "Do not imagine that you, of all the Jews, will escape with your life by being in the king's palace. ¹⁴On the contrary, if you keep silent in this crisis, relief and deliverance will come to the Jews from another quarter, while you and your father's house will perish. And who knows, perhaps you have attained to royal position for just such a crisis." ¹⁵Then Esther sent back this answer to Mordecai: ¹⁶"Go, assemble all the Jews who live in Shushan, and fast in my

cf. 8.11; see 9.10 n. 15: The couriers went out posthaste, cf. 8.14. Sat down to feast, more partying, as if nothing out of the ordinary had happened, in contrast with the reaction of the city and of the Jews in 4.1. The city of Shushan was dumbfounded: The decree is shocking to normal people. The counterpart is in 8.15.

4.1–17: Mordecai and Esther plan to save their people. Mourning replaces partying, at least among the Jews. God's presence is most strongly felt in this ch, although His absence from the text is maintained. 1: Typical signs of grief (Jonah 3.6; Neh. 9.1), which also serve here as a public protest.

4: The harem, formerly a place of indulgence, is now a place of restriction for Esther. She cannot leave it and Mordecai cannot enter it. So that he might take off his sackcloth: This would mean he could enter the palace precinct, as in 2.11. 8: The book's emphasis on written texts is felt even here.

11: Esther takes the initiative, hinting at the strategy she will use to carry out Mordecai's instructions. Man or woman, even a woman of whom the king may be enamored. Esther has no special privilege in this regard. Enters the king's presence in the inner court: Mordecai said nothing about going to the inner court; this is Esther's idea. There were other ways to communicate with the king, as we know from 2.2. Esther is not refusing to plead for the Jews. Rather, she is outlining a daring plan to do so.

14: From another quarter: In Jewish tradition "mi-makom 'al'er" is interpreted as a reference to God, who is called "Ha-makom," i.e., "Omnipresent," in rabbinic writings. This is as close as the author can get to hinting at divine intervention in a book where God's name is studiously avoided. You and your father's house will perish: Mordecai is all that is left of Esther's father's house. The point is to personalize the danger to Esther (cf. Amos 7.17). 16–17: Esther now gives the orders and Mordecai carries them out; a reversal behalf; do not eat or drink for three days, night or day. I and my maidens will observe the same fast. Then I shall go to the king, though it is contrary to the law; and if I am to perish, I shall perish!" ¹⁷So Mordecai went about [the city] and did just as Esther had commanded him.

5 On the third day, Esther put on royal apparel and stood in the inner court of the king's palace, facing the king's palace, while the king was sitting on his royal throne in the throne room facing the entrance of the palace. ²As soon as the king saw Queen Esther standing in the court, she won his favor. The king extended to Esther the golden scepter which he had in his hand, and Esther approached and touched the tip of the scepter. ³"What troubles you, Queen Esther?" the king asked her. "And what is your request? Even to half the kingdom, it shall be granted you." ⁴"If it please Your Majesty," Esther replied, "let Your Majesty and Haman come today to the feast that I have prepared for him." ⁵The king commanded, "Tell Haman to hurry and do Esther's bidding." So the king and Haman came to the feast that Esther had prepared.

⁶At the wine feast, the king asked Esther, "What is your wish? It shall be granted you. And what is your request? Even to half the kingdom, it shall be fulfilled." ⁷"My wish," replied Esther, "my request—⁸if Your Majesty will do me the favor, if it please Your Majesty to grant my wish and accede to my request—let Your Majesty and Haman come to the feast which I will prepare for them; and tomorrow I will do Your Majesty's bidding."

⁹That day Haman went out happy and lighthearted. But when Haman saw Mordecai in the palace gate, and Mordecai did not rise or even stir on his account, Haman was filled with rage at him. ¹⁰Nevertheless, Haman controlled himself and went home. He sent for his friends and his wife Zeresh, ¹¹and Haman told them about his great wealth and his many sons, and all about how the king had promoted him and advanced him above the officials and the king's courtiers. ¹²"What is more," said Haman, "Queen Esther gave a feast, and besides the king she did not have anyone but me. And tomorrow too I am invited by her along with the king. ¹³Yet all this means nothing to me every time I see that Jew Mordecai sitting in the palace gate." ¹⁴Then his wife Zeresh and all his friends said to him, "Let a stake be put up, fifty cubits high, and in the morning ask the king to have Mordecai impaled on it. Then you can go gaily with the king to the feast." The proposal pleased Haman, and he had the stake put up.

from 2.10, 20. 16: Do not eat or drink for three days, an unrealistically long fast. The post-talmudic Fast of Esther lasts from sunrise until sundown on 'Adar 13, not the date given here. If I am to perish, I shall perish: Mordecai says she will perish if she doesn't go to the king (v. 14); here Esther is resigned to the possibility of perishing if she does go to the king.

5.1-8: Esther's audience with the king. Esther carries out the first part of her strategy. The happy mood returns and the partying resumes. 1: Put on royal apparel, dressed in her official garb as queen, for a formal audience with the king. Inner court, the area where it was forbidden to come unsummoned (4.11). 3: Even to half the kingdom, an idiom for a large gift, cf. "half your household" (1 Kings 13.8). 4: Esther's language is very formal but she deflects the king's magnanimous offer and instead invites him to a banquet. 7-8: On the verge of stating her request, Esther interrupts herself with another invitation—the result is comic. 8: I will prepare for them, cf. v. 4: "I have prepared for him." Now the party is as much for Haman as for the king—a clever rhetorical move to make Haman think he was the center of attention. And so he will be. The pronouns change to fit the audience. In v. 4, only the king was present; now both the king and Haman are present. Cf. the words of Potiphar's wife in Gen. 39.14, 17. 9-14: Haman's mood-swings. Seeing Mordecai spoils all the fun. 9: Did not rise or even stir: Worse than not bowing (3.2), here Mordecai makes no motion at all to acknowledge Haman. 11: His great wealth and his many sons, signs of success (cf. Job 1.1-3). Haman will lose both (8.1; 9.6-10). 12: The invitation to dine privately with the king and queen is the most recent and highest in a string of honors. 13: That Jew Mordecai: The person and his people continue to irritate Haman. Sitting in the palace gate: The very presence of Mordecai is enough to upset Haman. More-

6 That night, sleep deserted the king, and he ordered the book of records, the annals, to be brought; and it was read to the king.² There it was found written that Mordecai had denounced Bigthana and Teresh, two of the king's eunuchs who guarded the threshold, who had plotted to do away with King Ahasuerus.³ "What honor or advancement has been conferred on Mordecai for this?" the king inquired. "Nothing at all has been done for him," replied the king's servants who were in attendance on him.⁴ "Who is in the court?" the king asked. For Haman had just entered the outer court of the royal palace, to speak to the king about having Mordecai impaled on the stake he had prepared for him.⁵ "It is Haman standing in the court," the king's servants answered him. "Let him enter," said the king.⁶ Haman entered, and the king asked him, "What should be done for a man whom the king desires to honor?" Haman said to himself, "Whom would the king desire to honor more than me?"⁷ So Haman said to the king, "For the man whom the king desires to honor,⁸ let royal garb which the king has worn be brought, and a horse on which the king has ridden and on whose head a royal diadem has been set;⁹ and let the attire and the horse be put in the charge of one of the king's noble courtiers. And let the man whom the king desires to honor be attired and paraded on the horse through the city square, while they proclaim before him: This is what is done for the man whom the king desires to honor!"¹⁰ "Quick, then!" said the king to Haman. "Get the garb and the horse, as you have said, and do this to Mordecai the Jew, who sits in the king's gate. Omit nothing of all you have proposed."¹¹ So Haman took the garb and the horse and arrayed Mordecai and paraded him through the city square; and he proclaimed before him: This is what is done for the man whom the king desires to honor!

over, Mordecai is sitting; he did not rise or stir (v. 9). 14: Haman does not himself come up with the idea of impaling Mordecai, but quickly accepts it. Fifty cubits high: About seventy-five feet, as tall as a seven-story building. Not even Persian palaces were that tall; this is another exaggerated number. Impaled on it, the ultimate form of disgrace. See 2.23.

6.1–11: Haman designs a ceremony to honor himself, but must honor Mordecai instead. A comic misunderstanding makes this ch one of the funniest in the book.

1: That night, the same night that Haman erected a stake for Mordecai. The book of records, cf. 2.23. 2: Mordecai had denounced: The plot had been reported in Mordecai's name (2.22). 4: Haman had just entered the outer court: One could enter the outer court without a royal summons, but not the inner court (4.11). Haman had come to obtain approval to dishonor (impale) Mordecai. 6: The comic misunderstanding begins: Mordecai is on the king's mind and on Haman's, but for opposite reasons.

The king speaks first, as is proper, and Haman never gets a chance to state why he came. 8: The ceremony that Haman designs goes beyond the conventional ways of honoring those favored by the king. It is calculated to make Haman appear to be the king. Royal garb which the king has worn, clothing actually worn by the king. According to Gk sources (Plutarch, Artaxerxes 5), this is tantamount to asking for the kingship. A horse on which the king has ridden and on whose head a royal diadem has been set, the king's own horse, marked as such by a special diadem on its head. Another sign that Haman wants to replace the king. Cf. 1 Kings 1.32–49. The nexus between the throne and the horse (a portable throne, as it were) can be seen in m. Sanh. 2.5, which forbids one to ride on the king's horse, to sit on his throne, or to use his scepter. The only sign of a grab for the throne that is missing is taking the king's wife, and that is what Ahasuerus accuses Haman of in 7.8.

9: One of the king's noble courtiers: The king will choose the noblest, Haman himself. Be paraded: The Heb means "be mounted" or "be placed to ride." The honoree should be mounted on a horse in the city square, visible to all. If this is where Mordecai was stationed in 4.6, then Haman would be publicly honored right in front of Mordecai. 10: Mordecai the Jew, who sits in the king's gate: Ahasuerus's description of Mordecai includes exactly those characteristics that antagonize Haman. Haman hates the Jews, and gets upset every time he sees Mordecai sitting in the king's gate (5.9, 13). 11: The last time Mordecai was in the city square (4.6) he was dressed in mourning garb. What a reversal! Some midrashim embellish the scene, adding to Haman's subservience and dishonor, by imagining the preparations to include Haman's washing of Mordecai, since he was still covered in the ashes of mourning (and even having to wash the bath house), dressing him, and lowering himself so that Mordecai could step upon his neck

¹²Then Mordecai returned to the king's gate, while Haman hurried home, his head covered in mourning. ¹³There Haman told his wife Zeresh and all his friends everything that had befallen him. His advisers and his wife Zeresh said to him, "If Mordecai, before whom you have begun to fall, is of Jewish stock, you will not overcome him; you will fall before him to your ruin."

¹⁴While they were still speaking with him, the king's eunuchs arrived and hurriedly brought Haman to the banquet which Esther had prepared.

7 So the king and Haman came to feast with Queen Esther. ²On the second day, the king again asked Esther at the wine feast, "What is your wish, Queen Esther? It shall be granted you. And what is your request? Even to half the kingdom, it shall be fulfilled." ³Queen Esther replied: "If Your Majesty will do me the favor, and if it pleases Your Majesty, let my life be granted me as my wish, and my people as my request. ⁴For we have been sold, my people and I, to be destroyed, massacred, and exterminated. Had we only been sold as bondmen and bondwomen, I would have kept silent; for ^athe adversary^a is not worthy of the king's trouble."

⁵Thereupon King Ahasuerus demanded of Queen Esther, "Who is he and where is he who dared to do this?" ⁶"The adversary and enemy," replied Esther, "is this evil Haman!" And Haman cringed in terror before the king and the queen. ⁷The king, in his fury, left the wine feast for the palace garden, while Haman remained to plead with Queen Esther for his life; for he saw that the king had resolved to destroy him. ⁸When the king returned from the palace garden to the banquet room, Haman was lying prostrate on the couch on which Esther reclined. "Does he a-a Emendation yields "a trifle" (חֵיֶשֶׁת), lit. "little finger."

in order to mount the horse.

12-14: Haman is crestfallen. His head covered in mourning, ashamed and dejected. A covered head is a sign of mourning, despair, or humiliation (2 Sam. 15.30; Jer. 14.3). The reversal between Haman and Mordecai is complete; Mordecai has gone from mourning to splendor, and Haman has gone from splendor to mourning. His wife and friends understand that he is doomed, but the final step in Haman's fall remains for the next ch.

7.1-10: The villain is unmasked and dispatched. As in the preceding ch, a comic misunderstanding is the centerpiece. The rivalry between Mordecai and Haman will come to a permanent end, and the evil Haman will be dispatched. But it remains for the following ch for the plot against the Jews to be successfully countered. 3: Esther's words are heavy with formal language. She builds her case on her personal relationship to the king (cf. 8.5). My life . . . my people: Esther equates her life (self) with her people, but does not name them as the Jews. 4: We have been sold, perhaps a hint of Haman's attempted bribe, which Esther learned about from Mordecai in 4.7; or, perhaps, the sense is "handed over, betrayed" as in Judg. 2.14; 3.8. To be destroyed, massacred, and exterminated: The same three terms are used in Haman's edict in 3.13. Had we only been sold as bondmen and bondwomen: The hypothetical threat of slavery is ironic, part of the rhetorical buildup. But Esther may be subtly recasting Haman's offer of money as a treasonous act against the king. An entire people could become enslaved only if another political entity conquered them. The implication is that Haman was taking over the king's loyal subjects—an act of treason, trivial compared with the real danger. How ironic, for in 3.8 Haman had framed the Jews as traitors. Not worthy of the king's trouble: Heb "nezek" means "trouble, annoyance" (cf. Akkadian "niziqtu" and "nizqu"). There is, however, a tradition of interpreting "nezek" in its mishnaic Heb sense of "damage." 5: Who is he and where is he: The culprit is sitting right there. An alternative rendering, "which one is he" (cf. Jonah 1.8; Eccl. 2.3; 11.6; m. 'Avot 4.1), conveys Ahasuerus's sputtering in confusion. 6: The adversary and enemy, not only an enemy of the Jews, but of the queen, and hence of the king. 7: The king, in his fury, left: Instead of verbal reactions to Esther's accusation there are physical movements, as if a chain reaction pantomime is being enacted: Haman cringes, Ahasuerus rises, Haman stands, the king returns, and Haman falls. Haman remained: "amad" means "to stand, to take up a position." Haman had been reclining on his couch, as one did at ancient banquets, and now he stands to approach Esther to plead for his life. 8: Lying prostrate, lit. "to fall," the gesture of a supplicant, as in 8.3 (cf. 1 Sam. 25.24). In the mode of a comic farce, Ahasuerus misinterprets Haman's pose, casting the supplicant as a seducer. To ravish the queen in my own palace, mean," cried the king, "to ravish the queen in my own palace?" No sooner did these words leave the king's lips than Haman's face ^awas covered.^a ⁹Then Harbonah, one of the eunuchs in attendance on the king, said, "What is more, a stake is standing at Haman's house, fifty cubits high, which Haman made for Mordecai—the man whose words saved the king." "Impale him on it!" the king ordered. ¹⁰So they impaled Haman on the stake which he had put up for Mordecai, and the king's fury abated.

8 That very day King Ahasuerus gave the property of Haman, the enemy of the Jews, to Queen Esther. Mordecai presented himself to the king, for Esther had revealed how he was related to her. ²The king slipped off his ring, which he had taken back from Haman, and gave it to Mordecai; and Esther put Mordecai in charge of Haman's property.

³Esther spoke to the king again, falling at his feet and weeping, and beseeching him to avert the evil plotted by Haman the Agagite against the Jews. ⁴The king extended the golden scepter to Esther, and Esther arose and stood before the king. ⁵"If it please Your Majesty," she said, "and if I have won your favor and the proposal seems right to Your Majesty, and if I am pleasing to you—let dispatches be written countermanding those which were written by Haman son of Hammedatha the Agagite, embodying his plot to annihilate the Jews throughout the king's provinces. ⁶For how can I bear to see the disaster which will befall my people! And how can I bear to see the destruction of my kindred!"

⁷Then King Ahasuerus said to Queen Esther and Mordecai the Jew, "I have given Haman's property to Esther, and he has been impaled on the stake for scheming against the Jews. ⁸And you may further write with regard to the Jews as you see fit. [Write it] in the king's name and seal it with the king's signet, for an edict that has been written in the king's name and sealed with the king's signet may not be revoked."

⁹So the king's scribes were summoned at that time, on the twenty-third day of the third month, that is, the month of Sivan; and letters were written, at Mordecai's dictation, to the Jews and to the satraps, the governors and the officials of the one hundred and twenty-seven provinces from India to Ethiopia: to every province in its own script and to every people in its own language, and to the Jews in their own script and language. ¹⁰He had them written in the pretext to punish Haman, for Haman's real wrong, plotting to kill the Jews, had the king's official endorsement. An attempt to take a king's wife or concubine has the political connotation of attempting to take the kingship (see Ibn Ezra; 2 Sam. 3:7; 16:21–22; 1 Kings 2:15–17, 22; Gen. 35:22; Plutarch, Artaxerxes 26.2). Haman's face was covered: The meaning is unclear; perhaps it signals that Haman was condemned to death or perhaps even put to death. Alternatively, emend to "ashamed, downcast," (cf. Ps. 34:6). 9: Another touch of irony and reversal: The stake prepared by Haman for Mordecai will conveniently be used for Haman himself. Once again, a switch from the dishonor of Mordecai to the dishonor of Haman. 10: The king's fury abated: As in 2.1, a replacement will be needed for the person dispatched when the king was angry.

8.1–17: Haman's edict is countermanded. Esther will again step forward to save her people.

1–2: The reversal between Haman and Mordecai (and Esther) is complete. 3–14: Haman is gone but his decree remains in force. Esther has it revoked. The scene replays parts of chs 3 and 5. 3: Beseeching, cf. 4.8. Esther is now fulfilling Mordecai's instructions. 7: The king has done his part; now it is up to Esther and Mordecai to do the rest. 8: A new law is written to offset the old law. May not be revoked: Here the meaning is that the law truly may not be revoked (unlike at 1.19, see n.). A legal system in which this principle obtains is unwieldy, to say the least. This is another example of the lighthearted mocking of Persian culture, part of the comic farce. 9: To the Jews in their own script and language: The message affects the Jews in particular.

a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain. Emendation yields "blanched"; cf. Ps. 34:6.

the name of King Ahasuerus and sealed with the king's signet. Letters were dispatched by mounted couriers, riding steeds ^aused in the king's service, bred of the royal stud,^a ¹¹ to this effect: The king has permitted the Jews of every city to assemble and fight for their lives; if any people or province attacks them, they may destroy, massacre, and exterminate its armed force together with women and children, and plunder their possessions—¹² on a single day in all the provinces of King Ahasuerus, namely, on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, that is, the month of Adar. ¹³ The text of the document was to be issued as a law in every single province: it was to be publicly displayed to all the peoples, so that the Jews should be ready for that day to avenge themselves on their enemies. ¹⁴ The couriers, mounted on royal steeds, went out in urgent haste at the king's command; and the decree was proclaimed in the fortress Shushan.

¹⁵ Mordecai left the king's presence in royal robes of blue and white, with a magnificent crown of gold and a mantle of fine linen and purple wool. And the city of Shushan rang with joyous cries. ¹⁶ The Jews enjoyed light and gladness, happiness and honor. ¹⁷ And in every province and in every city, when the king's command and decree arrived, there was gladness and joy among the Jews, a feast and a holiday. And many of the people of the land professed to be Jews, for the fear of the Jews had fallen upon them.

9 And so, on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month—that is, the month of Adar—when the king's command and decree were to be executed, the very day on which the enemies of the Jews had expected to get them in their power, the opposite happened, and the Jews got their enemies in their power. ² Throughout the provinces of King Ahasuerus, the Jews mustered in their cities to attack those who sought their hurt; and no one could withstand them, for the fear of them had fallen upon all the peoples. ³ Indeed, all the officials of the provinces—the satraps, the governors, and the king's stewards—showed deference to the Jews, because the fear of Mordecai had fallen upon them. ⁴ For Mordecai was now powerful in the royal palace, and his fame was spreading through all the provinces; the man Mordecai was growing ever more powerful. ⁵ So the Jews struck at their enemies with the sword, slaying and destroying; they wreaked their will upon their enemies.

a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

10: Steeds used in the king's service, bred of the royal stud: Horses specially bred for speed were used in the Persian postal system. 11: To assemble and fight for their lives: Permission is given for defensive measures. Destroy, massacre, and exterminate its armed force together with women and children: The original edict in 3.13 contained similar wording, and so does its reversal. Together with women and children: Although distasteful to the modern reader, this was normal in the ancient world. Plunder their possessions, as in Haman's edict (3.13), but see 9.10, 15, 16. 13: Avenge themselves signifies justified retaliation. 14: Urgent haste, even more urgently than in 3.15. 15-17: Mordecai emerges triumphant and the Jews rejoice. 15: Royal robes of blue and white: Mordecai's outfit reminds us of Joseph and Daniel, two other successful Jewish courtiers (Gen. 41.42; Dan. 5.7, 29). The colorful textiles also recall the tapestries in 1.6. The city of Shushan rang with joyous cries, a reversal of 3.15. 16: This v. is recited (with the addition "so may it befall us") in the "havdalah" service, marking the conclusion of the Sabbath. 17: Holiday, "Yom tov," "good day"; also in 9.19, 22. Esther is the only place in the Bible where "yom tov" is used in its later sense of a set festival. People of the land, non-Jews. Professed to be Jews, or, identified with the Jews. There was not yet a process of formal conversion.

9.1-19: The Jews triumph over their enemies. The events of the story are connected with the institution of the festival of Purim; the ch provides the reason for the holiday and instructions for its celebration. The gleeful violence that permeates this ch is part of the carnivalesque character of the book, and should not be taken seriously; this is an "orgy," not a massacre. 2: To attack those who sought their hurt, in self-defense, not revenge. 3: The enemy masses were deterred by fear of the Jewish masses, and the officials were deterred by fear of an official.

⁶In the fortress Shushan the Jews killed a total of five hundred men. ⁷They also killed^a Parshandatha, Dalphon, Aspatha,

⁸ Poratha, Adalia, Aridatha,
⁹ Parmashta, Arisai, Aridai,
and Vaizatha,

¹⁰the ten sons of Haman son of Hammedatha, the foe of the Jews. But they did not lay hands on the spoil. ¹¹When the number of those slain in the fortress Shushan was reported on that same day to the king, ¹²the king said to Queen Esther, "In the fortress Shushan alone the Jews have killed a total of five hundred men, as well as the ten sons of Haman. What then must they have done in the provinces of the realm! What is your wish now? It shall be granted you. And what else is your request? It shall be fulfilled." ¹³"If it please Your Majesty," Esther replied, "let the Jews in Shushan be permitted to act tomorrow also as they did today; and let Haman's ten sons be impaled on the stake." ¹⁴The king ordered that this should be done, and the decree was proclaimed in Shushan. Haman's ten sons were impaled: ¹⁵and the Jews in Shushan mustered again on the fourteenth day of Adar and slew three hundred men in Shushan. But they did not lay hands on the spoil.

¹⁶The rest of the Jews, those in the king's provinces, likewise mustered and fought for their lives. They disposed of their enemies, killing seventy-five thousand of their foes; but they did not lay hands on the spoil. ¹⁷That was on the thirteenth day of the month of Adar; and they rested on the fourteenth day and made it a day of feasting and merrymaking. (¹⁸But the Jews in Shushan mustered on both the thirteenth and fourteenth days, and so rested on the fifteenth, and made it a day of feasting and merrymaking.) ¹⁹That is why village Jews, who live in unwalled towns, observe the fourteenth day of the month of Adar and make it a day of merrymaking and feasting, and as a holiday and an occasion for sending gifts to one another.

²⁰Mordecai recorded these events. And he sent dispatches to all the Jews throughout the provinces of King Ahasuerus, near and far, ²¹charging them to observe the 7–10: The list of foreign-sounding names is amusing, like the names in 1.10, 14; and the tradition of reading them all out in one breath when the megillah is read publicly on Purim (b. Meg. 16b) adds to the amusement. The killing of Haman's sons is one more way that Haman's glory is diminished. It also brings his line to an end; no future threat to the Jews will come from him. Amalek is at last wiped out. 10: They did not lay hands on the spoil: Taking spoil, a normal practice in warfare, was permitted in Haman's decree and in Mordecai's counterdecree. The notice that the Jews did not take spoil (also vv. 15, 16) reinforces the connection with 1 Sam. ch 15, where Saul took the Amalekite spoil, contrary to God's command. The Jews of Persia, led by Mordecai, apparently a descendant of Saul, "correct" Saul's error, permitting the descendants of Saul to triumph at last over the descendants of Agag. 16: Seventy-five thousand is another exaggerated number. These battles are not to be taken literally; they are the mock battles of carnivalesque literature. 18–19: There is some confusion about where Adar 14 was observed and where Adar 15 was observed. According to rabbinic tradition, Jews in all cities that had been walled since the time of Joshua (according to the Rabbis, e.g., Jerusalem) are to celebrate Purim on Adar 15—Shushan Purim—and Jews elsewhere were to celebrate on Adar 14. Thus, following rabbinic tradition, Purim is celebrated on Adar 15 in Jerusalem. 20–28: The festival is established in perpetuity. 20: Mordecai recorded these events: Rashi takes the book of Esther to be Mordecai's record of events; modern interpreters take it to be vv. 24–25. 21: To observe the fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar, whichever day was appropriate to the location of the celebrant.

^a Moved up from v. 10 for greater clarity.

fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar, every year—²² the same days on which the Jews enjoyed relief from their foes and the same month which had been transformed for them from one of grief and mourning to one of festive joy. They were to observe them as days of feasting and merry-making, and as an occasion for sending gifts to one another and presents to the poor.²³ The Jews accordingly assumed as an obligation that which they had begun to practice and which Mordecai prescribed for them.

²⁴For Haman son of Hammedatha the Agagite, the foe of all the Jews, had plotted to destroy the Jews, and had cast pur—that is, the lot—with intent to crush and exterminate them.²⁵ But when [Esther] came before the king, he commanded: ^a“With the promulgation of this decree,^a let the evil plot, which he devised against the Jews, recoil on his own head!” So they impaled him and his sons on the stake.²⁶ For that reason these days were named Purim, after pur.

In view, then, of all the instructions in the said letter and of what they had experienced in that matter and what had befallen them,²⁷ the Jews undertook and irrevocably obligated themselves and their descendants, and all who might join them, to observe these two days in the manner prescribed and at the proper time each year.²⁸ Consequently, these days are recalled and observed in every generation: by every family, every province, and every city. And these days of Purim shall never cease among the Jews, and the memory of them shall never perish among their descendants.

^{29b}Then Queen Esther daughter of Abihail wrote a second letter of Purim for the purpose of confirming with full authority the aforementioned one of Mordecai the Jew.³⁰ Dispatches were sent to all the Jews in the hundred and twenty-seven provinces of the realm of Ahasuerus with an ordinance of “equity and honesty.”^c ³¹These days of Purim shall be observed at their proper time, as Mordecai the Jew—and now Queen Esther—has obligated them to do, and just as they have assumed for themselves and their descendants the obligation of the fasts with their lamentations.^d a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

b Force of vv. 29–31 uncertain in part. Verse 29 reads literally, “Then Queen Esther, daughter of Abihail, and Mordecai the Jew, wrote with full authority to confirm this second letter of Purim.”

c I.e., of new holidays, the instituting of which is linked to love of equity and honesty in Zech. 8.19.

d The Jews had long been observing fast days in commemoration of national calamities; see Zech. 7.5; 8.19.

22: Feasting and merrymaking . . . sending gifts . . . presents to the poor: These elements, along with the recitation of the scroll of Esther, constitute the halakhic requirements for the celebration of the festival. 24–26: A summary of the story, emphasizing the etiology of the festival’s name, pur and Purim, and the defeat of Haman, with credit to the king. 26: Purim: Our earliest reference outside of Esther calls it “The Day of Mordecai” (2 Macc. 15.36). 28: The festival is to be celebrated by Jews in all places for all time. 29–32: The second Purim letter, further confirming the festival. The writer is either Esther, or Esther along with Mordecai. 31: Just as the Jews took upon themselves new fast days not mentioned in the Torah (Zech. 8.19), so will they now take upon themselves the celebration of a new festival, likewise not in the Torah. This first non-Torah festival needed to be authorized.

³² And Esther's ordinance validating these observances of Purim was recorded in a scroll.

10 King Ahasuerus imposed tribute on the mainland and the islands. ² All his mighty and powerful acts, and a full account of the greatness to which the king advanced Mordecai, are recorded in the Annals of the Kings of Media and Persia. ³ For Mordecai the Jew ranked next to King Ahasuerus and was highly regarded by the Jews and popular with the multitude of his brethren; he sought the good of his people and interceded for the welfare of all his kindred.

10.1–3: The accomplishments of the great king Ahasuerus and his Jewish courtier, Mordecai. 1: Tribute: Levying tribute signifies having sovereignty over the area. The mainland and the islands, a merism for the entire inhabited world (cf. Isa. 42.4, 10). Now Ahasuerus's control extends beyond the 127 provinces of 1.1. 2: Are recorded in the Annals of the Kings of Media and Persia, presumably the same annals mentioned in 6.1. This imitates the summary statements in the book of Kings (e.g., 1 Kings 14.19, 29; 15.31), lending a pseudo-historical tone to the story and official authority to the recounting of it. 3: In a story where honor is paramount, Mordecai has achieved the highest honor possible. At the end, it is Mordecai rather than Esther who is in the spotlight; he is a model of Jewish success in the Diaspora. The ending assures the reader that the Jewish community is secure.

Daniel

THE BOOK OF DANIEL, probably written in its final version in 164 BCE, is probably the latest composition of the Hebrew Bible. Its narrative, however, is set much earlier, during the reigns of the powerful kings of Babylonia, Media, and Persia in the 6th century BCE. The figure of Daniel, known from the Aqhat Epic found at Ugarit and mentioned in Ezekiel 14.14; 28.3 as a wise and righteous hero of the past, becomes here a new model of Jewish faithfulness to God. A member of the exile community in Babylonia, he soon rises to become an important Jewish courtier. The anonymous author thus uses the period of exile as a setting to address the challenging issues of Jews living under foreign kings.

Problems Encountered in Interpreting Daniel

THE BOOK PRESENTS to the reader a number of difficulties that render it a challenging yet fascinating text. First, it can be divided into two equal halves of different genres and different origins. Chs 1–6 are composed of six “court legends” that utilize third-person narration to recount the adventures of Jewish heroes in the highest court in the land (cf. the Joseph story in Gen. chs 37–50; Esther). The legends reflect an entertaining, humorous, even satirical side. Chs 7–12 are made up of four apocalyptic visions, told in the first person, that are revelations of the events that lead to the cataclysmic end and transformation of history. The two halves of the book appear to arise at different times in Israel’s history. Chs 1–6, probably originally oral, circulated most likely in the 4th to 2nd centuries BCE, when they were collected into a cycle of Daniel legends. Chs 7–12 are most likely written compositions, datable to the last year of the Maccabean revolt (164 BCE). In editing chs 1–12 together, the author of the visions made the whole into an apocalyptic book. (Apocalypses often mix different genres.) Despite their separate origins, several themes hold the two halves of the book of Daniel together: God’s sovereignty over history and foreign monarchs, the special wisdom and insight of the one devoted to God, and the ideal of heroic obedience, even to the point of death. Daniel is the only apocalypse in the Hebrew Bible; Ezekiel has some apocalyptic elements but is still within the genre of prophetic books. Jewish apocalypses were written earlier than Daniel (parts of 1 Enoch, Jubilees), and after Daniel (other parts of 1 Enoch, 4 Ezra [2 Esdras chs 3–14], and in the New Testament, Revelation), but these were not incorporated into the Hebrew Bible.

Another peculiar characteristic of Daniel is its use of two languages: 1.1–2.4a and 8.1–12.13 are in Heb, while 2.4b–7.28 are in Aramaic. (This does not correspond to the division by genre noted above.) Scholars have proposed two explanations for this: Either two languages were used in the original work, a combination that was retained in the multilingual world of the land of Israel in the 2nd century BCE; or the whole work was originally composed in one language, and one part was later translated into the other language. In this latter theory, Aramaic, the common international language of the ancient Near East at that time, is usually suggested as the original language of the whole. Neither explanation has met with complete scholarly agreement, but the most likely reconstruction is that chs 2–6 and separately, ch 7, were written in Aramaic, and chs 8–12, at a date slightly later than ch 7, in Hebrew. Ch 1 may have been written in Hebrew, or translated from Aramaic into Hebrew as a more appropriate language for the introduction.

Historical and Political Context of Daniel

THE MAJOR EMPIRES of the ancient Near East figure prominently in the book of Daniel. The narrative begins during the Neo-Babylonian empire. It was Nebuchadnezzar (also called Nebuchadrezzar), king of the Babylonians, who conquered Jerusalem and destroyed the first Temple in 586 BCE, inaugurating the period of the exile (2 Kings chs 24–25; Jeremiah). Contemporary with the Babylonian empire in the west was the empire of the Medes in the east. Cyrus of Persia arose in the mid-6th century BCE and conquered first the Medes and then the Babylonians in 539. In Judea the Medes and Persians were sometimes perceived as a joint kingdom, and at other times as following one after the other.

The Persian kings—the first four being Cyrus, Cambyses, Darius, and Xerxes—ruled the Jews more benevolently than the Babylonians. The first, Cyrus, encouraged the Judeans to return from their exile in 538, and allowed them to rebuild their Temple, which was constructed in 520–515 BCE. This state of affairs—limited autonomy under Persian rule—continued until the rise of Alexander the Great (356–323), the brilliant Macedonian-Greek king who defeated the Persians to found a new empire. Alexander conquered the land of Israel in 333. He died young, however, and his vast empire split into several Greek-ruled kingdoms, the most important of which for the book of Daniel were the Seleucid, centered in Syria and Babylonia, and the Ptolemaic in Egypt. Judea lay at the intersection between the two empires, and the influences of these empires over Jerusalem ebbed and flowed; Jews were often split in their allegiances to one or the other. After gaining control of Judea at the beginning of the 2nd century BCE, the Seleucid kings suffered reversals, and their king Antiochus IV Epiphanes turned his attention to the control of the Jerusalem Temple and the gold that was stored there. This is the background of the events indirectly described in the visions of chs 7–12.

Because of the detailed nature of apocalyptic timetables, the dating of at least the last chs of Daniel can be established precisely. Scholars consider the predictions in this book, as in other apocalypses, to be prophecies after the fact, purportedly written down centuries earlier and kept secret in order to give credence to other predictions about the end of history. The recounting of history, then, though symbolic, can be matched quite easily with the history of the ancient Near East in the Greek period. The predictions are detailed and accurate until the end of the Maccabean revolt in 164. At that point, however, they veer dramatically from what we know of the actions of the Seleucid king (see annotations to ch 11), and scholars assume that the author lived and wrote at the precise time when the predictions become inaccurate.

The scribal visionaries who produced Daniel were strongly opposed to Antiochus IV Epiphanes (whose name meant “god manifest”), yet they were probably not closely aligned with the Maccabees. The group is probably to be identified with those who are “knowledgeable” in 11.33, 12.3. (The same word in its verbal form, “to give understanding,” is used at 9.22.) Their instruction includes the knowledge of future events that is contained in the visions, and their role is one of guardian to the “many.”

Daniel in Jewish Tradition

THE BOOK OF DANIEL has been evaluated differently in Jewish and Christian tradition. Daniel was evidently considered a prophet at Qumran and elsewhere in early Judaism (Josephus, Antiquities 10.266–68), but because prefigurations of Christ and Christian resurrection were seen in Daniel by the early church, the rabbinic tradition hesitated to embrace the visions of Daniel. The Rabbis denied that Daniel was predicting events after the Maccabean revolt, and especially not the end of time, and assigned him a role as seer, not prophet (b. Meg. 3a, b. Sanh. 94a). Jewish tradition was also sometimes critical of what appeared to be a positive relationship between Daniel and Nebuchadnezzar. The different status of Daniel in Judaism and Christianity is thus reflected in the position of the book in the two canons. In the Christian Old Testament Daniel is placed with the major prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, while in the Jewish Scriptures it is placed with the Kethuvim, or Writings. Although the book of Daniel has not held central importance in Jewish tradition, it has had an influence on Jewish liturgy—probably because of its late date, when proto-liturgy was being formed—and it is significant in revealing a great deal about the social and theological world of Jews at the end of the biblical era. [LAWRENCE M. WILLS]

1 In the third year of the reign of King Jehoiakim of Judah, King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon came to Jerusalem and laid siege to it. ²The Lord delivered King Jehoiakim of Judah into his power, together with some of the vessels of the House of God, and he brought them to the land of Shinar to the house of his god; he deposited the vessels in the treasury of his god. ³Then the king ordered Ashpenaz, his chief officer, to bring some Israelites of royal descent and of the nobility—⁴youths without blemish, handsome, proficient in all wisdom, knowledgeable and intelligent, and capable of serving in the royal palace—and teach them the writings and the language of

1.1–6.29: Collection of court legends. Chs 1–6 probably circulated as independent stories before being collected and edited together (see introduction). Chs 2, 4, and 5 demonstrate that Daniel is superior to the king’s other courtiers, while chs 3 and 6 dramatically depict the persecution and vindication of the Jewish protagonists at the hands of the other courtiers. Ch 1 serves as an introduction to this collection. The positive resolution of the narrative in chs 1–6 and the sometimes humor-the Chaldeans.⁵ The king allotted daily rations to them from the king's food and from the wine he drank. They were to be educated for three years,^a at the end of which they^a were to enter the king's service.

⁶Among them were the Judahites Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah.⁷ The chief officer gave them new names; he named Daniel Belteshazzar, Hananiah Shadrach, Mishael Meshach, and Azariah Abed-nego.⁸ Daniel resolved not to defile himself with the king's food or the wine he drank, so he sought permission of the chief officer not to defile himself,⁹ and God disposed the chief officer to be kind and compassionate toward Daniel.¹⁰ The chief officer said to Daniel, "I fear that my lord the king, who allotted food and drink to you, will notice that you look out of sorts, unlike the other youths of your age—and you will put my life^b in jeopardy with the king."¹¹ Daniel replied to the guard whom the chief officer had put in charge of Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah,¹² "Please test your servants for ten days, giving us legumes to eat and water to drink.¹³ Then compare our appearance with that of the youths who eat of the king's food, and do with your servants as you see fit."¹⁴ He agreed to this plan of theirs, and tested them for ten days.¹⁵ When the ten days were over, they looked better and healthier than all the youths who were eating of the king's food.¹⁶ So the guard kept on removing their food, and the wine they were supposed to drink, and gave them legumes.¹⁷ God made all four of these young men intelligent and proficient in all writings and wisdom, and Daniel had understanding of visions and dreams of all kinds.¹⁸ When the time the king had set for their presentation had come, the chief officer presented them to Nebuchadnezzar.¹⁹ The king spoke with them, and of them all none was equal to Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah; so these entered the king's service.²⁰ Whenever the king put a question to them requiring wisdom and understanding, he found them to be ten times better than all the magicians and exorcists throughout his realm.²¹ Daniel was there until the first year of King Cyrus.

^{a-a} Or "and some of them."

^b Lit. "head."

ous tone indicate that the tension did not result from the national crisis of the Maccabean revolt, but rather from the more general conflict of loyalties that existed for Jews living in the Diaspora in the centuries preceding that.

1.1–21: Daniel and his three companions are introduced and tested. This chapter introduces the main Jewish characters—Daniel and his three friends—as well as Nebuchadnezzar and also the Temple vessels, which will figure in ch 5. In addition, though God's great power is emphasized, it is power that is exercised at a distance and through intermediaries, a theme that will be developed in terms of God's role in the court of the great foreign kings in chs 1–6 and in world history in chs 7–12. 1–2: The fall of Judah and the beginnings of exile are introduced quickly. To establish the pedigree of the hero, the book of Daniel does not dwell here on Nebuchadnezzar as the archvillain of ancient Jewish history, or on the exile as tragedy. The Lord still controls human events, even the successes of foreign kings over Judah. The dating of events is not accurate: The third year of King Jehoiakim was 606 BCE, but Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem in 597 BCE. Vessels, Ezra 1.7–8. Shinar, Babylonia. 3: The "history" of the exile quickly turns to the fortunes of the four Jewish protagonists at the court of Nebuchadnezzar. They are heroic and aristocratic in bearing. Compare the treatment of the fallen king Jehoiachin in 2 Kings 25.27–30, Jer. 52.31–34. 4: Chaldeans: A name for a region and language of Babylonia, it was also associated with the wisdom and learning of Eastern courtiers. In some passages in Daniel it refers to the ethnic group, in others it means courtiers. The language of the Chaldeans was Akkadian. 5: The training of courtiers in languages, court protocol, and international relations was common in the ancient world. 7–8: Belteshazzar, see 4.5 n. Prominent Jews sometimes took Babylonian names, and at Gen. 41.45 Joseph is given an Egyptian name. Although Daniel and his friends refuse the king's food, presumably because it violated the food laws in Lev. ch 11 and Deut. ch 14, there appears to be no objection to receiving Babylonian court names. The names Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego have not been satisfactorily explained. This v. also offers the only biblical indication of the later rabbinic law that Jews should not drink pagan wine. 8: In the Diaspora there arose a stronger

2 In the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuchadnezzar had a dream; his spirit was agitated, “yet he was overcome by” sleep. ²The king ordered the magicians, exorcists, sorcerers, and Chaldeans to be summoned in order to tell the king what he had dreamed. They came and stood before the king, ³and the king said to them, “I have had a dream and I am full of anxiety to know what I have dreamed.” ⁴The Chaldeans spoke to the king in Aramaic, “O king, live forever! Relate the dream to your servants, and we will tell its meaning.” ⁵The king said in reply to the Chaldeans, “I hereby decree: If you will not make the dream and its meaning known to me, you shall be torn limb from limb and your houses confiscated.^b ⁶But if you tell the dream and its meaning, you shall receive from me gifts, presents, and great honor; therefore, tell me the dream and its meaning.” ⁷Once again they answered, “Let the king relate the dream to his servants, and we will tell its meaning.” ⁸The king said in reply, “It is clear to me that you are playing for time, since you see that I have decreed ⁹that if you do not make the dream known to me, there is but one verdict for you. You have conspired to tell me something false and fraudulent until circumstances change; so relate the dream to me, and I will then know that you can tell its meaning.” ¹⁰The Chaldeans said in reply to the king, “There is no one on earth who can “satisfy the king’s demand,^c for great king or ruler—none has ever asked such a thing of any magician, exorcist, or Chaldean. ¹¹The thing asked by the king is difficult; there is no one who can tell it to the king except the gods whose abode is not among mortals.”^d ¹²Whereupon the king flew into a violent rage, and gave an order to do away with all the wise men of Babylon.

¹³The decree condemning the wise men to death was issued. Daniel and his companions were about to be put to death ¹⁴when Daniel remonstrated with Arioch, the captain of the royal guard who had set out to put the wise men of Babylon to death. ¹⁵He spoke up and said to Arioch, the royal officer, “Why is the decree of the king so urgent?” Thereupon Arioch informed Daniel of the matter. ¹⁶So Daniel went to ask the king for time, that he might tell the meaning to the king. ¹⁷Then Daniel went to his house and informed his companions, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, of the matter,¹⁸ that they might implore the God of Heaven for help regarding this mystery, so that emphasis on dietary laws as a way of living a pious life without (or away from) the Temple, reflected here and in many works in the Apocrypha (Tobit 1.10–11; Judith 10.5; 1 Macc. 1.62–63, 2 Macc. 5.27).

2.1–49: Daniel is able to interpret the king’s dream. 1: Second year is inconsistent with 1.1–4. 2: Lists of court officers—and other items as well—occur often in chs 1–6. The humorous tone of the pretentiousness of the list is meant to contrast with the understated power of Daniel’s abilities. Unlike 1.4, Chaldeans here means courtiers, since the king would have been a Chaldean as well. 4: With the words O king, the text switches from Heb to Aramaic. The interpretation of royal dreams was common in the ancient Near East (cf. ch 4; Gen. ch 41), but a twist is introduced when the king demands that the courtiers tell him the content of his dream as well as its interpretation. The king’s threat indicates the high stakes and potential danger to the life of the courtier (cf. 2.12). Although there are many records of dream interpretation from the ancient Near East, there is no record of a courtier recounting the content of someone else’s dream. The courtiers raise an objection on these grounds, setting the stage for Daniel, with the help of God (v. 30), to do what no ordinary human being could do. As in the other chs, Daniel serves as a vehicle for expressing God’s great power.

13–23: It is possible that these vv. were added to tie the chs together; the mention of the three friends connects this episode with chs 1 and 3, and the prayer is similar to those in chs 3, 4, and 6; see also Neh. 9.5; 1 Sam. ch 2, Prov. ch 8. Cf. 5.11–12 n. 18: Mystery, a Persian word, generally used in Jewish apocalypticism to mean the special, restricted knowledge of the heavens and what is to happen in the future. Daniel’s wisdom and knowledge provides another connection between chs 1–6 and 7–12: He is capable of receiving extraordinary revelations from God.

a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain; others “and he could not.”

b Meaning uncertain; or “turned into ruins.”

c-c Lit. “tell the king’s matter.” d Lit. “flesh.”

Daniel and his colleagues would not be put to death together with the other wise men of Babylon.

¹⁹The mystery was revealed to Daniel in a night vision; then Daniel blessed the God of Heaven. ²⁰Daniel spoke up and said:

“Let the name of God be blessed forever and ever,
For wisdom and power are His.

²¹ He changes times and seasons,
Removes kings and installs kings;
He gives the wise their wisdom
And knowledge to those who know.

²² He reveals deep and hidden things, Knows what is in the darkness,
And light dwells with Him.

²³ I acknowledge and praise You,
O God of my fathers,
You who have given me wisdom and power,
For now You have let me know what we asked of You;

You have let us know what concerns the king.”

²⁴Thereupon Daniel went to Arioch, whom the king had appointed to do away with the wise men of Babylon; he came and said to him as follows, “Do not do away with the wise men of Babylon; bring me to the king and I will tell the king the meaning!” ²⁵So Arioch rushed Daniel into the king’s presence and said to him, “I have found among the exiles of Judah a man who can make the meaning known to the king!” ²⁶The king said in reply to Daniel (who was called Belteshazzar), “Can you really make known to me the dream that I saw and its meaning?” ²⁷Daniel answered the king and said, “The mystery about which the king has inquired—wise men, exorcists, magicians, and diviners cannot tell to the king. ²⁸But there is a God in heaven who reveals mysteries, and He has made known to King Nebuchadnezzar what is to be at the end of days. This is your dream and the vision that entered your mind in bed: ²⁹O king, the thoughts that came to your mind in your bed are about future events; He who reveals mysteries has let you know what is to happen. ³⁰Not because my wisdom is greater than that of other creatures has this mystery been revealed to me, but in order that the meaning should be made known to the king, and that you may know the thoughts of your mind.

³¹“O king, as you looked on, there appeared a great statue. This statue, which was huge and its brightness surpassing, stood before you, and its appearance was awesome. ³²The head of that statue was of fine gold; its breast and arms were of silver; its belly and thighs, of bronze; ³³its legs were of iron, and its feet part iron and part clay.³⁴ As you looked on, a stone was hewn out, not by hands, and struck the statue on its feet of iron and clay and crushed them.³⁵ All at once, the iron, clay, bronze, silver, and gold were crushed, and became like chaff of the threshing floors of summer; a wind carried them off until no trace of them was left. But the stone that struck the statue became a great mountain and filled the whole earth.

20: The central words of the later Jewish kaddish prayer are based on the beginning of this v.

³⁶“Such was the dream, and we will now tell the king its meaning.³⁷ You, O king—king of kings, to whom the God of Heaven has given kingdom, power, might, and glory;³⁸ into whose hands He has given men, wild beasts, and the fowl of heaven, wherever they may dwell; and to whom He has given dominion over them all—you are the head of gold.³⁹ But another kingdom will arise after you, inferior to yours; then yet a third kingdom, of bronze, which will rule over the whole earth.⁴⁰ But the fourth kingdom will be as strong as iron; just as iron crushes and shatters everything—and like iron that smashes—so will it crush and smash all these.⁴¹ You saw the feet and the toes, part potter’s clay and part iron; that means it will be a divided kingdom; it will have only some of the stability of iron, inasmuch as you saw iron mixed with common clay.⁴² And the toes were part iron and part clay; that [means] the kingdom will be in part strong and in part brittle.⁴³ You saw iron mixed with common clay; that means: “they shall intermingle with the offspring of men,^a but shall not hold together, just as iron does not mix with clay.⁴⁴ And in the time of those kings, the God of Heaven will establish a kingdom that shall never be destroyed, a kingdom that shall not be transferred to another people. It will crush and wipe out all these kingdoms, but shall itself last forever—⁴⁵just as you saw how a stone was hewn from the mountain, not by hands, and crushed the iron, bronze, clay, silver, and gold. The great God has made known to the king what will happen in the future. The dream is sure and its interpretation reliable.”

⁴⁶Then King Nebuchadnezzar prostrated himself and paid homage to Daniel and ordered that a meal offering and pleasing offerings be made to him.⁴⁷ The king said in reply to Daniel, “Truly your God must be the God of gods and Lord of kings and the revealer of mysteries to have enabled you to reveal this mystery.”⁴⁸ The king then elevated Daniel and gave him very many gifts, and made him governor of the whole province of Babylon and chief prefect of all the wise men of Babylon.⁴⁹ At Daniel’s re-

31–45: Portentous dreams of the fate of kingdoms were common in the ancient world; cf. Herodotus, Histories 1.108, 7.19. Here, however, the author uses an older prediction of four world kingdoms—understood as Babylonia, Media, Persia, and Greece—and emphasizes their decreasing value. They are followed by a mixed kingdom of iron and clay, which signifies the divided Greek kingdom and the Ptolemaic and Seleucid kings who ruled in the eastern Mediterranean. Although Daniel predicts the demise of the Babylonian kingdom and its ultimate replacement by the kingdom of the God of Heaven, Nebuchadnezzar nevertheless reveres Daniel for his insight. 46: Prostrated . . . paid homage implies that the king worshipped Daniel, but Jewish interpreters assumed that Daniel declined this reverence (Gen. Rab. 96.5). The Rabbis were often quite critical of Daniel, however, for enjoying such a positive relationship with the tyrant who destroyed the first Temple (see 4.16–24 n.). The original narratives in chs 1–6 were probably oriented toward entertainment at the expense of the pagan kings.

a-a Meaning uncertain.

quest, the king appointed Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego to administer the province of Babylon; while Daniel himself was at the king's court.

3 King Nebuchadnezzar made a statue of gold sixty cubits high and six cubits broad. He set it up in the plain of Dura in the province of Babylon. 2 King Nebuchadnezzar then sent word to gather the satraps, prefects, governors, counselors, treasurers, judges, officers, and all the provincial officials to attend the dedication of the statue that King Nebuchadnezzar had set up. 3 So the satraps, prefects, governors, counselors, treasurers, judges, officers, and all the provincial officials assembled for the dedication of the statue that King Nebuchadnezzar had set up, and stood before the statue that Nebuchadnezzar had set up. 4 The herald proclaimed in a loud voice, "You are commanded, O peoples and nations of every language, 5 when you hear the sound of the horn, pipe, zither, lyre, psaltery, bagpipe, and all other types of instruments, to fall down and worship the statue of gold that King Nebuchadnezzar has set up. 6 Whoever will not fall down and worship shall at once be thrown into a burning fiery furnace." 7 And so, as soon as all the peoples heard the sound of the horn, pipe, zither, lyre, psaltery, and all other types of instruments, all peoples and nations of every language fell down and worshiped the statue of gold that King Nebuchadnezzar had set up.

8 Seizing the occasion, certain Chaldeans came forward to slander the Jews. 9 They spoke up and said to King Nebuchadnezzar, "O king, live forever! 10 You, O king, gave an order that everyone who hears the horn, pipe, zither, lyre, psaltery, bagpipe, and all types of instruments must fall down and worship the golden statue, 11 and whoever does not fall down and worship shall be thrown into a burning fiery furnace. 12 There are certain Jews whom you appointed to administer the province of Babylon, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego; those men pay no heed to you, O king; they do not serve your god or worship the statue of gold that you have set up."

13 Then Nebuchadnezzar, in raging fury, ordered Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego to be brought; so those men were brought before the king. 14 Nebuchadnezzar spoke to them and said, "Is it true, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, that you do not serve my god or worship the statue of gold that I have set up? 15 Now if you are ready to fall down and worship the statue that I have made when you hear the sound of the horn, pipe, zither, lyre, psaltery, and bagpipe, and all other types of instru-

3.1–33: Daniel's three companions are tested in the fiery furnace. Daniel himself is not mentioned in ch 3. The story about the three young men may have circulated as an independent oral legend and later been incorporated into the tradition of Daniel narratives because of thematic similarities. The religious intolerance depicted in the ch is very atypical of the ancient Near Eastern world. Although the king's demand that Jews worship a statue has parallels to the events of the Maccabean revolt, the parallels are not close, and this section of Daniel is likely pre-Maccabean. It is unclear whether this story is based on a real event or is created to illustrate the power of God. 1: Statue of gold: Herodotus 1.183 mentions a giant figure made of gold in the temple of Bel in Babylon. 2: In this ch, lists, which are characteristic of Daniel, are used particularly often, perhaps for satirical effect. Even the names of the protagonists in their Babylonian form, "Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego," are repeated often. The comic effect of the lists is even more marked if the narrative is read aloud, as it was probably originally recounted. The pomp and organization of officials, including the title satrap, seem to be more indicative of Persian administration, when the story may have been composed, rather than the Neo-Babylonian empire when the story is set. Ch 6 indicates that the editor of the collection is familiar with Persian administration. 8: The threat from other courtiers, who are presumably jealous, is emphasized here and at 6.1–5; cf. also Esth. ch 3.

ments, [well and good]; but if you will not worship, you shall at once be thrown into a burning fiery furnace, and what god is there that can save you from my power?"¹⁶ Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego said in reply to the king, "O Nebuchadnezzar, we have no need to answer you in this matter,¹⁷ for if so it must be, our God whom we serve is able to save us from the burning fiery furnace, and He will save us from your power, O king.¹⁸ But even if He does not, be it known to you, O king, that we will not serve your god or worship the statue of gold that you have set up."

¹⁹Nebuchadnezzar was so filled with rage at Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego that his visage was distorted, and he gave an order to heat up the furnace to seven times its usual heat.²⁰ He commanded some of the strongest men of his army to bind Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, and to throw them into the burning fiery furnace.²¹ So these men, in their shirts, trousers, hats, and other garments, were bound and thrown into the burning fiery furnace.²² Because the king's order was urgent, and the furnace was heated to excess, a tongue of flame killed the men who carried up Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego.²³ But those three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, dropped, bound, into the burning fiery furnace.

²⁴Then King Nebuchadnezzar was astonished and, rising in haste, addressed his companions, saying, "Did we not throw three men, bound, into the fire?" They spoke in reply, "Surely, O king."²⁵ He answered, "But I see four men walking about unbound and unharmed in the fire and the fourth looks like a divine being."²⁶ Nebuchadnezzar then approached the hatch of the burning fiery furnace and called, "Shadrach, Meshach, Abed-nego, servants of the Most High God, come out!" So Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego came out of the fire.²⁷ The satraps, the prefects, the governors, and the royal companions gathered around to look at those men, on whose bodies the fire had had no effect, the hair of whose heads had not been singed, whose shirts looked no different, to whom not even the odor of fire clung.²⁸ Nebuchadnezzar spoke up and said, "Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who sent His angel to save His servants who, trusting in Him, flouted the king's decree at the risk of their lives rather than serve or worship any god but their own God.²⁹ I hereby give an order that [anyone of] any people or nation of whatever language who blasphemes the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego shall be torn limb from limb, and his house confiscated, for there is no other God who is able to save in this way."

15: What god is there? Without realizing it, the king invokes the God who does have the power to save the three Jews, unlike the many gods whom the king worships.

19: The bluster of the king is emphasized, perhaps also for comic effect. 25: The fourth looks like a divine being, an angel. Angels become particularly important in this period; cf. 7.13–14 n.; 8.15–16 n.

31–33: The first doxology (praise of God) of the pagan kings; cf. 4.31–34; 6.27–28. The theme of all the doxologies is that God's kingship is superior to any earthly kingship. The implausibility of the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar blessing the God of Israel and making a decree of protection argues for a humorous interpretation of this ch. These vv. are sometimes taken as the introduction to ch 4 rather than concluding ch 3.

³⁰Thereupon the king promoted Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego in the province of Babylon.

³¹"King Nebuchadnezzar to all people and nations of every language that inhabit the whole earth: May your well-being abound! ³²The signs and wonders that the Most High God has worked for me I am pleased to relate. ³³How great are His signs; how mighty His wonders! His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and His dominion endures throughout the generations."

4 I, Nebuchadnezzar, was living serenely in my house, flourishing in my palace. ²I had a dream that frightened me, and my thoughts in bed and the vision of my mind alarmed me. ³I gave an order to bring all the wise men of Babylon before me to let me know the meaning of the dream. ⁴The magicians, exorcists, Chaldeans, and diviners came, and I related the dream to them, but they could not make its meaning known to me. ⁵Finally, Daniel, called Belteshazzar after the name of my god, in whom the spirit of the holy gods was, came to me, and I related the dream to him, [saying], ⁶"Belteshazzar, chief magician, in whom I know the spirit of the holy gods to be, and whom no mystery baffles, tell me the meaning of my dream vision that I have seen. ⁷In the visions of my mind in bed

I saw a tree of great height in the midst of the earth;

⁸ The tree grew and became mighty;
Its top reached heaven,
And it was visible to the ends of the earth.

⁹ Its foliage was beautiful
And its fruit abundant;
There was food for all in it.
Beneath it the beasts of the field found shade,
And the birds of the sky dwelt on its branches;
All creatures fed on it.

¹⁰In the vision of my mind in bed, I looked and saw a holy Watcher coming down from heaven. ¹¹He called loudly and said:

'Hew down the tree, lop off its branches,
Strip off its foliage, scatter its fruit.
Let the beasts of the field flee from beneath it
And the birds from its branches,

¹² But leave the stump with its roots in the ground.
In fetters of iron and bronze
In the grass of the field,
Let him be drenched with the dew of heaven,
And share earth's verdure with the beasts.

4.1-34: Daniel predicts Nebuchadnezzar's madness. 1: I, Nebuchadnezzar: The narrative begins in the first person, recounted by Nebuchadnezzar himself, which is typical of Neo-Babylonian royal inscriptions and of royal letters. Nebuchadnezzar was never absent from office for any extended period, but the king's temporary absence here likely suggests that the model for this story is not Nebuchadnezzar but Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king (556-539 BCE). He spent ten years at Teima, in the Arabian peninsula, allowing his son Belshazzar to reign as viceroy in his stead (see ch 5). The "Prayer of Nabonidus" (4Q242) from Qumran presents Nabonidus's first-person account of being cured by an unnamed Jewish seer after an affliction of seven years. 5: Belteshazzar . . . the name of my god, see 1.7 n. Although the author understandably assumes that the name is related to the Babylonian god Bel, it actually means "protect his life" or perhaps "protects the prince's life," and is not based on the god Bel. 6: Mystery, see 2.18 n. 7: The "world-tree" is often used in the ancient Near East as a symbol of a great empire; cf. Ezek. 17.1-10; 31.3-14; Herodotus 1.108; 7.19. 10: Watcher, an angelic figure, common in Jewish apocalyptic literature (Jubilees 4.15), who executes God's justice. In some texts watchers are fallen angels (1 Enoch chs 10-16).

13 Let his mind be altered from that of a man,
 And let him be given the mind of a beast,
 And let seven seasons pass over him.

14 This sentence is decreed by the Watchers;
 This verdict is commanded by the Holy Ones
 So that all creatures may know That the Most High is sovereign over the realm of man,
 And He gives it to whom He wishes
 And He may set over it even the lowest of men.'

15 "I, King Nebuchadnezzar, had this dream; now you, Belteshazzar, tell me its meaning, since all the wise men of my kingdom are not able to make its meaning known to me, but you are able, for the spirit of the holy gods is in you."

16 Then Daniel, called Belteshazzar, was perplexed for a while, and alarmed by his thoughts. The king addressed him, "Let the dream and its meaning not alarm you." Belteshazzar replied, "My lord, would that the dream were for your enemy and its meaning for your foe! 17 The tree that you saw grow and become mighty, whose top reached heaven, which was visible throughout the earth,¹⁸ whose foliage was beautiful, whose fruit was so abundant that there was food for all in it, beneath which the beasts of the field dwelt, and in whose branches the birds of the sky lodged—¹⁹ it is you, O king, you who have grown and become mighty, whose greatness has grown to reach heaven, and whose dominion is to the end of the earth. ²⁰ The holy Watcher whom the king saw descend from heaven and say,

Hew down the tree and destroy it,
 But leave the stump with its roots in the ground.
 In fetters of iron and bronze
 In the grass of the field,
 Let him be drenched with the dew of heaven,
 And share the lot of the beasts of the field
 Until seven seasons pass over him—

²¹ this is its meaning, O king; it is the decree of the Most High which has overtaken my lord the king. ²² You will be driven away from men and have your habitation with the beasts of the field. You will be fed grass like cattle, and be drenched with the dew of heaven; seven seasons will pass over you until you come to know that the Most High is sovereign over the realm of man, and He gives it to whom He wishes. ²³ And the meaning of the command to leave the stump of the tree with its roots is that the kingdom will remain yours from the time you come to know that Heaven is sovereign. ²⁴ Therefore, O king, may my advice be acceptable to you: Redeem your sins by beneficence and your iniquities by generosity to the poor; then your serenity may be extended."

16–24: The story slips into third-person narration with Daniel's role, but returns to first-person narration at v. 31. Daniel urges the king to reform his practices (v. 24), but in light of Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Judah and the destruction of the Temple, his repentance could not have been seriously maintained. Daniel's concern for Nebuchadnezzar did not always meet with approval in rabbinic tradition (b. B. Bat. 4a); some rabbis, however, assumed that "my lord" (v. 16) must refer to God and the "enemy" must be Nebuchadnezzar himself. The point of these episodes, though told whimsically, seems to be that even Nebuchadnezzar could be forced to recognize the sovereignty of the one true God (cf. the book of Jonah). 28: Voice, cf. Daniel 5. 31–34: Cf. 3.32–33; 6.27–28.

²⁵All this befell King Nebuchadnezzar. ²⁶Twelve months later, as he was walking on the roof of the royal palace at Babylon, ²⁷the king exclaimed, "There is great Babylon, which I have built by my vast power to be a royal residence for the glory of my majesty!" ²⁸The words were still on the king's lips, when a voice fell from heaven, "It has been decreed for you, O King Nebuchadnezzar: The kingdom has passed out of your hands. ²⁹You are being driven away from men, and your habitation is to be with the beasts of the field. You are to be fed grass like cattle, and seven seasons will pass over you until you come to know that the Most High is sovereign over the realm of man and He gives it to whom He wishes." ³⁰There and then the sentence was carried out upon Nebuchadnezzar. He was driven away from men, he ate grass like cattle, and his body was drenched with the dew of heaven until his hair grew like eagle's [feathers] and his nails like [the talons of] birds.

³¹"When the time had passed, I, Nebuchadnezzar, lifted my eyes to heaven, and my reason was restored to me. I blessed the Most High, and praised and glorified the Ever-Living One,

Whose dominion is an everlasting dominion And whose kingdom endures throughout the generations.

³² All the inhabitants of the earth are of no account.
He does as He wishes with the host of heaven,
And with the inhabitants of the earth.
There is none to stay His hand
Or say to Him, "What have You done?"

³³There and then my reason was restored to me, and my majesty and splendor were restored to me for the glory of my kingdom. My companions and nobles sought me out, and I was reestablished over my kingdom, and added greatness was given me. ³⁴So now I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise, exalt, and glorify the King of Heaven, all of whose works are just and whose ways are right, and who is able to humble those who behave arrogantly."

5 King Belshazzar gave a great banquet for his thousand nobles, and in the presence of the thousand he drank wine. ²Under the influence of the wine, Belshazzar ordered the gold and silver vessels that his father Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple at Jerusalem to be brought so that the king and his nobles, his consorts, and his concubines could drink from them.³The golden vessels that had been taken out of the sanctuary of the House of God in Jerusalem were then brought, and the king, his nobles, his consorts, and his concubines drank from them.

5.1-29: Daniel interprets the writing on the wall. 1-2: Belshazzar was the son of Nabonidus. He was never king, and only reigned as viceroy during his father's absence. Great banquet: Babylonian and Persian royal feasts were notorious for their excess; cf. Esth. ch 1. It is the sacrilege of drinking from the Temple vessels, however, especially by the concubines, that is most emphasized. According to rabbinic tradition (b. Meg. 11b-12a), Belshazzar was celebrating because he thought that the prediction of the demise of the Babylonian kingdom after seventy years (Jer. 25.11; cf. Dan. ch 9) had been proven wrong. He had miscalculated, however, by one year. Vessels, see 1.2.

⁴They drank wine and praised the gods of gold and silver, bronze, iron, wood, and stone. ⁵Just then, the fingers of a human hand appeared and wrote on the plaster of the wall of the king's palace opposite the lampstand, so that the king could see the hand as it wrote. ⁶The king's face darkened, and his thoughts alarmed him; the joints of his loins were loosened and his knees knocked together. ⁷The king called loudly for the exorcists, Chaldeans, and diviners to be brought. The king addressed the wise men of Babylon, "Whoever can read this writing and tell me its meaning shall be clothed in purple and wear a golden chain on his neck, and shall rule as 'one of three' in the kingdom."

⁸Then all the king's wise men came, but they could not read the writing or make known its meaning to the king. ⁹King Belshazzar grew exceedingly alarmed and his face darkened, and his nobles were dismayed. ¹⁰Because of the state of the king and his nobles, the queen came to the banquet hall. The queen spoke up and said, "O king, live forever! Let your thoughts not alarm you or your face darken. ¹¹There is a man in your kingdom who has the spirit of the holy gods in him; in your father's time, illumination, understanding, and wisdom like that of the gods were to be found in him, and your father, King Nebuchadnezzar, appointed him chief of the magicians, exorcists, Chaldeans, and diviners. ¹²Seeing that there is to be found in Daniel (whom the king called Belteshazzar) extraordinary spirit, knowledge, and understanding to interpret dreams, to explain riddles and solve problems, let Daniel now be called to tell the meaning [of the writing]."

¹³Daniel was then brought before the king. The king addressed Daniel, "You are Daniel, one of the exiles of Judah whom my father, the king, brought from Judah. ¹⁴I have heard about you that you have the spirit of the gods in you, and that illumination, knowledge, and extraordinary wisdom are to be found in you. ¹⁵Now the wise men and exorcists have been brought before me to read this writing and to make known its meaning to me. But they could not tell what it meant. ¹⁶I have heard about you, that you can give interpretations and solve problems. Now if you can read the writing and make known its meaning to me, you shall be clothed in purple and wear a golden chain on your neck and rule as one of three in the kingdom."

4: Gods of gold and silver: A common feature of Judaism at this time was the "parody of idols," usually focusing on their material origin and their inability to respond to prayer; cf. 5.23; Isa. 44.9-20; Ps. 115.4-8; in the Apocrypha, Wisdom of Solomon 13.1-15.17; Bel and the Dragon; and at Qumran, the "Prayer of Nabonidus." 5: The fingers of a human hand: Compare the finger of God that brings the plagues in Exod. 8.19, or writes the ten commandments in Exod. 31.18. 10: Queen, probably the queen-mother, the wife of Nebuchadnezzar. 11-12: Daniel's wisdom is spelled out by the queen-mother. Evidently she alone remembers his service to Nebuchadnezzar and his extraordinary abilities. This is one of the few places in chs 1-6 that connects the individual stories, and it is likely a redactional addition to make the book more coherent. See 2.13-23 n. 23: Because of the sacrilege of the Temple vessels, the sins of Belshazzar are more pointedly against the Lord of Heaven than was the case with Nebuchadnezzar. 25-28: The words are interpreted on two levels. They are weights: MENE in Aramaic is a mina (a little more than half a kilogram, about 20 ounces); TEKEL is a shekel (11 grams or less than half an ounce); and UPHARSIN (a dual form of "peres") is two half-minas. They also sound like verbs: MENE sounds like the verb "to number," TEKEL "to weigh," and UPHARSIN "to divide." The last is also similar to the word "Persians." It is possible that the words originally referred only to the decreasing "weight" or importance of particular Babylonian monarchs, and the dynasty was thereby condemned. A more explicit level of prophetic condemnation was then added in terms of the verbal meanings.

a-a Cf. Dan. 6.3; or "third in rank."

¹⁷Then Daniel said in reply to the king, “You may keep your gifts for yourself, and give your presents to others. But I will read the writing for the king, and make its meaning known to him. ¹⁸O king, the Most High God bestowed kingship, grandeur, glory, and majesty upon your father Nebuchadnezzar. ¹⁹And because of the grandeur that He bestowed upon him, all the peoples and nations of every language trembled in fear of him. He put to death whom he wished, and whom he wished he let live; he raised high whom he wished and whom he wished he brought low. ²⁰But when he grew haughty and willfully presumptuous, he was deposed from his royal throne and his glory was removed from him. ²¹He was driven away from men, and his mind made like that of a beast, and his habitation was with wild asses. He was fed grass like cattle, and his body was drenched with the dew of heaven until he came to know that the Most High God is sovereign over the realm of man, and sets over it whom He wishes. ²²But you, Belshazzar his son, did not humble yourself although you knew all this. ²³You exalted yourself against the Lord of Heaven, and had the vessels of His temple brought to you. You and your nobles, your consorts, and your concubines drank wine from them and praised the gods of silver and gold, bronze and iron, wood and stone, which do not see, hear, or understand; but the God who controls your lifebreath and every move you make—Him you did not glorify! ²⁴He therefore made the hand appear, and caused the writing to be inscribed. ²⁵This is the writing that is inscribed: MENE MENE TEKEL UPHARSIN. ²⁶And this is its meaning: MENE—God has numbered^a [the days of] your kingdom and brought it to an end; ²⁷TEKEL—^byou have been weighed^b in the balance and found wanting; ²⁸PERES—your kingdom ^chas been divided^c and given to the Medes and the Persians.” ²⁹Then, at Belshazzar’s command, they clothed Daniel in purple, placed a golden chain on his neck, and proclaimed that he should rule as one of three in the kingdom.

³⁰That very night, Belshazzar, the Chaldean king, was killed, and Darius the Mede received the kingdom, 6 being about sixty-two years old. ²It pleased Darius to appoint over the kingdom one hundred and twenty satraps to be in charge of the whole kingdom; ³over them were three ministers, one of them Daniel, to whom these satraps reported, in order that the king not be troubled. ⁴This man Daniel surpassed the other ministers and satraps by virtue of his extraordinary spirit, and the king

5.30–6.29: Daniel in the lions’ den. 5.30–6.1: These vv. were likely added to provide a smooth transition between the separate stories in chs 5 and 6. 1: Darius the Mede is unhistorical. Darius was a famous Persian king (522–486 BCE) responsible for organizing his empire into provinces headed by “satraps” or governors. According to Herodotus, Histories 3.89, Darius established twenty satrapies; contrast the exaggerated tradition of Esth. 1.1. The four-empires schema requires that Media be represented in chs 2 and 7, and it is possible that a story originally involving Darius of Persia has been altered to fit this schema. The events of 5.30 are likewise ahistorical. 3: In the stories of court conflict, an initial balance among the courtiers is disturbed when one of them is promoted above the others; cf. 2.49 (in reference to ch 3); Esth. 3.1.

a Aramaic mena. b-b Aramaic tekilta. c-c Aramaic perisat.

considered setting him over the whole kingdom. ⁵The ministers and satraps looked for some fault in Daniel's conduct in matters of state, but they could find neither fault nor corruption, inasmuch as he was trustworthy, and no negligence or corruption was to be found in him.

⁶Those men then said, "We are not going to find any fault with this Daniel, unless we find something against him in connection with the laws of his God." ⁷Then these ministers and satraps came thronging in to the king and said to him, "O King Darius, live forever! ⁸All the ministers of the kingdom, the prefects, satraps, companions, and governors are in agreement that a royal ban should be issued under sanction of an oath that whoever shall address a petition to any god or man, besides you, O king, during the next thirty days shall be thrown into a lions' den. ⁹So issue the ban, O king, and put it in writing so that it be unalterable as a law of the Medes and Persians that may not be abrogated." ¹⁰Thereupon King Darius put the ban in writing.

¹¹When Daniel learned that it had been put in writing, he went to his house, in whose upper chamber he had had windows made facing Jerusalem, and three times a day he knelt down, prayed, and made confession to his God, as he had always done. ¹²Then those men came thronging in and found Daniel petitioning his God in supplication. ¹³They then approached the king and reminded him of the royal ban: "Did you not put in writing a ban that whoever addresses a petition to any god or man besides you, O king, during the next thirty days, shall be thrown into a lions' den?" The king said in reply, "The order stands firm, as a law of the Medes and Persians that may not be abrogated." ¹⁴Thereupon they said to the king, "Daniel, one of the exiles of Judah, pays no heed to you, O king, or to the ban that you put in writing; three times a day he offers his petitions [to his God]." ¹⁵Upon hearing that, the king was very disturbed, and he set his heart upon saving Daniel, and until the sun set made every effort to rescue him. ¹⁶Then those men came thronging in to the king and said to the king, "Know, O king, that it is a law of the Medes and Persians that any ban that the king issues under sanction of oath is unalterable." ¹⁷By the king's order, Daniel was then brought and thrown into the lions' den. The king spoke to Daniel and said, "Your God, whom you serve so regularly, will deliver you." ¹⁸A rock was brought and placed over the mouth of the den; the king sealed it with his signet and with the signet of his nobles, so that nothing might be altered concerning Daniel.

¹⁹The king then went to his palace and spent the night fasting; no diversions were brought to him, and his sleep

8: The interdict is historically implausible. No king of this period who claimed divine status forbade the worship of other gods. Darius the Persian was supportive of local religions, including that of the Jews. The exclusive worship of one god was a Jewish view, and this exclusive notion is projected onto an Eastern divine monarch. The narrative thus reflects Jewish tensions about remaining monotheistic in a mixed Diaspora culture. 9: Some ancient authors believed that the law of the Persian king, once enacted, could not be altered (Esth. 1.19; 8.8; Diodorus Siculus 17.30). This is likely only a popular tradition, however, and is emphasized for dramatic effect (cf. 6.14–17). 11: Praying three times a day became a common Jewish practice by the mishnaic period, though it has earlier precedents (Ps. 55.18; Judith 9.1). Likewise, the Mishnah legislates praying toward Jerusalem (m. Ber. 4.5).

fled from him. ²⁰ Then, at the first light of dawn, the king arose and rushed to the lions' den. ²¹ As he approached the den, he cried to Daniel in a mournful voice; the king said to Daniel, "Daniel, servant of the living God, was the God whom you served so regularly able to deliver you from the lions?" ²² Daniel then talked with the king, "O king, live forever! ²³ My God sent His angel, who shut the mouths of the lions so that they did not injure me, inasmuch as I was found innocent by Him, nor have I, O king, done you any injury." ²⁴ The king was very glad, and ordered Daniel to be brought up out of the den. Daniel was brought up out of the den, and no injury was found on him, for he had trusted in his God. ²⁵ Then, by order of the king, those men who had slandered Daniel were brought and, together with their children and wives, were thrown into the lions' den. They had hardly reached the bottom of the den when the lions overpowered them and crushed all their bones.

²⁶ Then King Darius wrote to all peoples and nations of every language that inhabit the earth, "May your well-being abound! ²⁷ I have hereby given an order that throughout my royal domain men must tremble in fear before the God of Daniel, for He is the living God who endures forever; His kingdom is indestructible, and His dominion is to the end of time; ²⁸ He delivers and saves, and performs signs and wonders in heaven and on earth, for He delivered Daniel from the power of the lions." ²⁹ Thus Daniel prospered during the reign of Darius and during the reign of Cyrus the Persian.

7 In the first year of King Belshazzar of Babylon, Daniel saw a dream and a vision of his mind in bed; afterward he wrote down the dream. Beginning the account, ² Daniel related the following:

"In my vision at night, I saw the four winds of heaven stirring up the great sea. ³ Four mighty beasts different from each other emerged from the sea. ⁴ The first was like a lion but had eagles' wings. As I looked on, its wings were plucked off, and it was lifted off the ground and set on its feet like a man and given the mind of a man. ⁵ Then I saw a second, different beast, which was like a bear but raised on one side, and with three fangs in its mouth among its teeth; it was told, 'Arise, eat much meat!' ⁶ After that, as I looked on, there was another one, like a leopard, and it had on its back four wings like those of a bird; the beast had four heads, and dominion was given to it. ⁷ After that, as I looked on in the night vision, there was a fourth beast—fearsome, dreadful, and very powerful,

25: The importance of family identity in the ancient Near East could result in family members receiving the punishment of the male heads; cf. Num. 16.25–33; 2 Sam. 21.1–9; Esth. 9.13–14; but in contrast to this, Jer. 31.28–29; Ezek. ch 18.

26–28: A concluding doxology similar to 3.28, 32–33; 4.31–34. The story is told for dramatic effect. It is unlikely that Darius would invoke Daniel's God, although this has been the theme of chs 1–6, as it was in "Prayer of Nabonidus" from Qumran and Bel and the Dragon from the Apocrypha. Keeping lions in an underground den is unknown; this and the sealing of the stone with the king's ring heighten the drama. 29: Cyrus the Persian was the first Persian king (559–530 BCE). He was followed by Cambyses, Darius, and Xerxes; see 9.1.

7.1–12.13: Daniel's apocalyptic visions. This is the second half of the book; see the introduction on the difference in genre, date, and political situation of chs 7–12, and the difference in language between chs 7 and 8–12.

7.1–28: Vision of the four beasts. Ch 7, in Aramaic, may have been composed before chs 8–12. Like ch 2, it involves a dream interpretation and a four-kingdom schema, and like chs 2–6 it is in Aramaic. The depiction of the end of time in apocalyptic visions is often similar to biblical depictions of the beginning of time, that is, creation. The sea and monsters here are paralleled in many stories of creation (Gen. ch 1; Job 26.12–13; Pss. 33.6–7; 74.12–14; Isa. 27.1). 1: First year of King Belshazzar, 553 BCE. The author of ch 7, like the author of ch 5, incorrectly thinks of Belshazzar as king. 2–3: Four winds . . . four mighty beasts: The tumult of all four winds blowing at once and the violence of the sea portend threatening events. The recurrence of the number four evokes the four kingdoms of ch 2, and ch 7 will develop a four-kingdom schema further. 4–8: The animals are like the mythological figures of ancient with great iron teeth—that devoured and crushed, and stamped the remains with its feet. It was different from all the other beasts which had gone before it; and it had ten horns. ⁸ While I was gazing upon these horns, a new little horn sprouted up among them; three of the older horns were uprooted to make room for it. There were eyes in this horn like those of a man, and a mouth that spoke arrogantly. ⁹ As I looked on,

Thrones were set in place,
And the Ancient of Days took His seat.
His garment was like white snow,
And the hair of His head was like lamb's^a wool.
His throne was tongues of flame;
Its wheels were blazing fire.

¹⁰ A river of fire streamed forth before Him;
Thousands upon thousands served Him;
Myriads upon myriads attended Him;
The court sat and the books were opened.

¹¹ I looked on. Then, because of the arrogant words that the horn spoke, the beast was killed as I looked on; its body was destroyed and it was consigned to the flames.

¹² The dominion of the other beasts was taken away, but an extension of life was given to them for a time and season. ¹³ As I looked on, in the night vision,

One like a human being Came with the clouds of heaven;
He reached the Ancient of Days
And was presented to Him.

¹⁴ Dominion, glory, and kingship were given to him;
All peoples and nations of every language must serve him.

His dominion is an everlasting dominion that shall not pass away,
And his kingship, one that shall not be destroyed.

¹⁵ As for me, Daniel, my spirit was disturbed within me and the vision of my mind alarmed me. ¹⁶ I approached one of the attendants and asked him the true meaning of all this. He gave me this interpretation of the matter: ¹⁷ "These great beasts, four in number [mean] four kingdoms^b will arise out of the earth; ¹⁸ then holy ones of the Most High will receive the kingdom, and will possess the kingdom forever—forever and ever." ¹⁹ Then I wanted to ascertain the true meaning of the fourth beast, which was different from them all, very fearsome, with teeth of iron, claws of bronze, that devoured and crushed, and stamped the remains; ²⁰ and of the ten horns on its head; and of the Near Eastern art, but are also ferocious predators known to Israelite imagery, e.g., Hos. 13.7-8. (On the empires symbolized here, see the introduction.) The winged lion represents the Babylonian kingdom, the ravenous bear the Medes, the winged leopard the Persians, and the last beast the Greek empire of Alexander the Great, with the ten horns representing the Seleucid successors of Alexander in the Near East. The last beast is the most fearsome and chaotic, and the last horn represents the Seleucid Antiochus IV Epiphanes, who killed some of his rivals. The human transformation of the first beast may be an allusion to ch 4. The general cast of this scene is also like Ezek. ch 1, with its composite creatures and symbolic weight. 9-14: The chaos and destructive power of the beasts is followed by an even more awesome judgment scene. The model for the judgment scene is the ancient Near Eastern council of gods in heaven, often utilized in the Bible to depict God's council (Ps. 82.1; Job ch 1). The throne formed from tongues of flame echoes Isa. ch 6; Ezek.

1.25-28. 9: Ancient of Days: God is described in corporeal terms in the way that El is pictured in Canaanite myth, with the warrior-god Baal coming before him after slaying the sea-monster. It is significant, however, that combat is not mentioned here in Daniel, only judgment. As in Gen. ch 1, God has absolute sovereignty over the world, and does not need to establish authority through conflict. Cf. the role of angels in 10.20-21.

11: The arrogance of the last horn is now seen as provocation for the most severe punishment. In ch 5 it was the arrogance and sacrilege of the latecomer Belshazzar, not the destructive history of Nebuchadnezzar, that provoked the strongest condemnation.

13-14: Human being, lit. "son of man," which in the Bible is idiomatic for human being (Dan. 8.17; Ezek. 2.1; Job 25.6). Here, however, the celestial being is like a human being, i.e., has a human countenance. For the author it new one that sprouted, to make room for which three fell—the horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spoke arrogantly, and which was more conspicuous than its fellows.

^a Or "clean." ^b Lit. "kings."

²¹(I looked on as that horn made war with the holy ones and overcame them, ²²until the Ancient of Days came and judgment was rendered in favor of the holy ones of the Most High, for the time had come, and the holy ones took possession of the kingdom.) ²³This is what he said: “The fourth beast [means]—there will be a fourth kingdom upon the earth which will be different from all the kingdoms; it will devour the whole earth, tread it down, and crush it. ²⁴And the ten horns [mean]—from that kingdom, ten kings will arise, and after them another will arise. He will be different from the former ones, and will bring low three kings. ²⁵He will speak words against the Most High, and will harass the holy ones of the Most High. He will think of changing times and laws, and they will be delivered into his power for a ^atime, times, and half a time.” ²⁶Then the court will sit and his dominion will be taken away, to be destroyed and abolished for all time. ²⁷The kingship and dominion and grandeur belonging to all the kingdoms under Heaven will be given to the people of the holy ones of the Most High. Their kingdom shall be an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey them.” ²⁸Here the account ends.

I, Daniel, was very alarmed by my thoughts, and my face darkened; and I could not put the matter out of my mind.

8In the third year of the reign of King Belshazzar, a vision appeared to me, to me, Daniel, after the one that had appeared to me earlier. ²I saw in the vision—at the time I saw it I was in the fortress of Shushan, in the province of Elam—I saw in the vision that I was beside the Ulai River. ³I looked and saw a ram standing between me and the river; he had two horns; the horns were high, with one higher than the other, and the higher sprouting last. ⁴I saw the ram butting westward, northward, and southward. No beast could withstand him, and there was none to deliver from his power. He did as he pleased and grew a-a I.e., a year, two years, and a half a year.

most likely represents a heavenly figure who will exercise judgment, perhaps Michael (see 10.13 n.). Christian tradition, especially in the Gospels, saw this as a prediction of Jesus as a heavenly “son of man.” A messianic use of this title is also found in postbiblical Jewish literature (1 Enoch 46.1; 48.10; 4 Ezra [2 Esdras] ch 13; b. Sanh. 98a). Some Rabbis rejected the future messianic interpretation by arguing either that the predictions had all been fulfilled in the past (b. Sanh. 97b), or that Daniel’s predictions did not include the end of time (Gen. Rab. 98.2). Later in Jewish tradition the messianic interpretation faded and the one like a human being was seen as representing Israel (Ibn Ezra, Rashi). 14: Dominion . . . peoples and nations: The tone and the words used here and in 7.27 tie this ch to the doxologies of chs 1–6 (see 3.31–33 n.). 16: In chs 2 and 4 Daniel’s extraordinary spiritual insights, bestowed by God, allowed him to interpret the dreams successfully, but the apocalyptic genre typically included a divine interpreter; cf. 8.15–16; 9.21–23; chs 10–12; Zech chs 1–6. Interpretation: The word used here (“peshar”) is the Aramaic form of the word used later at Qumran for a type of biblical interpretation. (It is translated as “meaning” at 4.13; 5.15, 26.) 18: Holy ones of the Most High: Some scholars see here a reference to the pious Jews of Daniel’s circle, called “knowledgeable” in ch 12, but others argue, noting v. 27 and using the analogy of texts from Qumran, that the holy ones are the angelic host.

8.1–27: Vision of the ram and the he-goat. With the beginning of ch 8, the language changes from Aramaic back to Heb. and continues in Heb to the end. The symbolic visions of chs 8–12 are less poetic, more detailed, and more focused on recent events from the author’s perspective. 1: Third year . . . Belshazzar, see 7.1. 2: Shushan, Susa, the winter capital of the Persian empire. Ulai River: Daniel twice has visions by a river (cf. 10.4), as does Ezekiel (Ezekiel 1.1). Rivers create a natural boundary, and in the ancient world boundaries and crossroads were considered ideal locations for communication with the divine. 3–14: Ram . . . he-goat: The traditional four-kingdom schema is abandoned here in favor of one that is less compelling but better symbolizes the recent past from the author’s perspective. The two-horned ram represents the Medes and Persians, and the great. ⁵As I looked on, a he-goat came from the west, passing over the entire earth without touching the ground. The goat had a conspicuous horn on its forehead.

⁶He came up to the two-horned ram that I had seen standing between me and the river and charged at him with furious force. ⁷I saw him reach the ram and rage at him; he struck the ram and broke its two horns, and the ram was powerless to withstand him. He threw him to the ground and trampled him, and there was none to deliver the ram from his power. ⁸Then the he-goat grew very great, but at the peak of his power his big horn was broken. In its place, four conspicuous horns sprouted toward the four winds of heaven. ⁹From one of them emerged a small horn, which extended itself greatly toward the south, toward the east, and toward the beautiful land. ¹⁰It grew as high as the host of heaven and it hurled some stars of the [heavenly] host to the ground and trampled them. ¹¹It vaunted itself against the very chief of the host; on its account the regular offering was suspended, and His holy place was abandoned. ¹²^aAn army was arrayed iniquitously against the regular offering;^a it hurled truth to the ground and prospered in what it did.

¹³Then I heard a holy being speaking, and another holy being said to whoever it was who was speaking, "How long will [what was seen in] the vision last—^athe regular offering be forsaken because of transgression; the sanctuary be surrendered and the [heavenly] host be trampled?"^a ¹⁴He answered me,^b "For twenty-three hundred evenings and mornings; then the sanctuary shall be cleansed." ¹⁵While I, Daniel, was seeing the vision, and trying to understand it, there appeared before me one who looked like a man. ¹⁶I heard a human voice from the middle of Ulai calling out, "Gabriel, make that man understand the vision." ¹⁷He came near to where I was standing, and as he came I was terrified, and fell prostrate. He said to me, "Understand, O man, that the vision refers to the time of the end." ¹⁸When he spoke with me, I was overcome by a deep sleep as I lay prostrate on the ground. Then he touched me and made me stand up, ¹⁹and said, "I am going to inform you of what will happen when wrath is at an end, for [it refers] to the time appointed for the end.

²⁰"The two-horned ram that you saw [signifies] the kings of Media and Persia; ²¹and the buck, the he-goat—the king of Greece; and the large horn on his forehead, that is the first king. ²²One was broken and four came in he-goat represents Alexander the Great, who died at the peak of his power. The four conspicuous horns represent the four kingdoms that succeeded Alexander, one of which was the Seleucid, over which Antiochus IV Epiphanes came to rule. This vision thus overlaps to a large extent with ch 7. 9: Beautiful land, Judea.

11: Regular offering . . . abandoned: Antiochus IV suppressed the practice of Judaism and turned the Temple into a pagan worship site (1 Macc. 1.54–61; 2 Macc.

4.11–6.11). 14: Twenty-three hundred evenings and mornings, i.e., 1,150 days, about the same as the three and a half years of 7.25; 9.27; 12.7.

15–16: One who looked like a man: An expression different from 7.13–14 is used here, which is a play on the name of Gabriel. Angels appear in the Bible, but only in Daniel and postbiblical texts do they have names; see also 12.1.

17–19: Here and elsewhere (e.g., 8.26–27) a number of literary devices are used, typical of apocalypses, that increase the sense of awe, secrecy, and mystery, even though the events predicted seem very clear. The command to "keep the vision a secret" (v. 26) emphasizes that it was supposedly received by Daniel centuries earlier, but was not known until now at the time of the end when it finds its realization.

a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

b Several ancient versions "him."

its stead—that [means]: four kingdoms will arise out of a nation, but without its power.²³ When their kingdoms are at an end, when the measure of transgression^a has been filled, then a king will arise, impudent and versed in intrigue.²⁴ He will have great strength, but not through his own strength. He will be extraordinarily destructive; he will prosper in what he does, and destroy the mighty and the people of holy ones.²⁵ By his cunning, he will use deceit successfully. He will make great plans, will destroy many, taking them unawares, and will rise up against the chief of chiefs, but will be broken, not by [human] hands.²⁶ What was said in the vision about evenings and mornings is true. Now you keep the vision a secret, for it pertains to far-off days.”²⁷ So I, Daniel, was stricken,^b and languished many days. Then I arose and attended to the king’s business, but I was dismayed by the vision and no one could explain it.

9 In the first year of Darius son of Ahasuerus, of Median descent, who was made king over the kingdom of the Chaldeans—²in the first year of his reign, I, Daniel, consulted the books concerning the number of years that, according to the word of the LORD that had come to Jeremiah the prophet, were to be the term of Jerusalem’s desolation—seventy years.³ I turned my face to the Lord God, devoting myself to prayer and supplication, in fasting, in sackcloth and ashes.⁴ I prayed to the LORD my God, making confession thus: “O Lord, great and awesome God, who stays faithful to His covenant with those who love Him and keep His commandments!⁵ We have sinned; we have gone astray; we have acted wickedly; we have been rebellious and have deviated from Your commandments and Your rules,⁶ and have not obeyed Your servants the prophets who spoke in Your name to our kings, our officers, our fathers, and all the people of the land.⁷ With You, O Lord, is the right, and the shame is on us to this very day, on the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, all Israel, near and far, in all the lands where You have banished them, for the trespass they committed against You.⁸ The shame, O LORD, is on us, on our kings, our officers, and our fathers, because we have sinned against You.⁹ To the Lord our God belong mercy and forgiveness, for we rebelled against Him,¹⁰ and did not obey the LORD our God by following His teachings that He set before us through His servants the prophets.¹¹ All Israel has violated Your teaching and gone astray, 9.1–27: Daniel reinterprets Jeremiah’s prophecy of seventy years.

1: Darius . . . Ahasuerus: On Darius, see 6.1 n. Ahasuerus is Xerxes, like Darius a Persian and not a Mede, and was the son, not father, of Darius. Of Median descent, possibly an effort to harmonize the fact that Ahasuerus and Darius were Persian with the statement in 6.1 that Darius was a Mede. 2: The author grapples with the prophetic prediction in Jer. 25.11–12 that Babylon would fall after seventy years. This is one of the few explicit references in a biblical book to another biblical book; it does not necessarily reflect the canonization of the Prophets, but suggests that like the Torah, certain prophetic texts were studied intensively at this time. 3: Fasting, sackcloth, and ashes were aspects of ritual mourning in the Bible, but were also signs of penitence as well as preparation for fervent prayer and for visions (4 Ezra [2 *Esdra*s] 5.13; 9.24). The rise of penitential theology in postbiblical Judaism suggests that, although Daniel’s prayer is a response to particular historical events, it also reflects in Judaism a new personal, penitential religious life that is taken up in various ways by the Qumran sectarians, Pharisees, and Christians. This can also be found in some strands of rabbinic tradition (b. Ta’an. 11b–12a), but there is also found in the Talmud a tendency to rein in excessive penitential asceticism (b. Ta’an. 11a; b. B. Bat. 60b). 5: Later Jewish confessions share this structure of listing words for various prohibited activities in the first-person plural.

^a Lit. “transgressors.” ^b Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

disobeying You; so the curse and the oath written in the Teaching of Moses, the servant of God, have been poured down upon us, for we have sinned against Him. ¹²He carried out the threat that He made against us, and against our rulers who ruled us, to bring upon us great misfortune; under the whole heaven there has never been done the like of what was done to Jerusalem. ¹³All that calamity, just as is written in the Teaching of Moses, came upon us, yet we did not supplicate the LORD our God, did not repent of our iniquity or become wise through Your truth. ¹⁴Hence the LORD was intent upon bringing calamity upon us, for the LORD our God is in the right in all that He has done, but we have not obeyed Him.

¹⁵“Now, O Lord our God—You who brought Your people out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand, winning fame for Yourself to this very day—we have sinned, we have acted wickedly. ¹⁶O Lord, as befits Your abundant benevolence, let Your wrathful fury turn back from Your city Jerusalem, Your holy mountain; for because of our sins and the iniquities of our fathers, Jerusalem and Your people have become a mockery among all who are around us.

¹⁷“O our God, hear now the prayer of Your servant and his plea, and show Your favor to Your desolate sanctuary, for the Lord’s sake. ¹⁸Incline Your ear, O my God, and hear; open Your eyes and see our desolation and the city to which Your name is attached. Not because of any merit of ours do we lay our plea before You but because of Your abundant mercies. ¹⁹O Lord, hear! O Lord, forgive! O Lord, listen, and act without delay for Your own sake, O my God; for Your name is attached to Your city and Your people!”

²⁰While I was speaking, praying, and confessing my sin and the sin of my people Israel, and laying my supplication before the LORD my God on behalf of the holy mountain of my God—²¹while I was uttering my prayer, the man Gabriel, whom I had previously seen in the vision, was sent forth in flight and reached me about the time of the evening offering. ²²He made me understand by speaking to me and saying, “Daniel, I have just come forth to give you understanding. ²³A word went forth as you began your plea, and I have come to tell it, for you are precious; so mark the word and understand the vision.

²⁴“Seventy weeks^a have been decreed for your people and your holy city until the measure of transgression is filled and that of sin complete, until iniquity is expiated, and eternal righteousness ushered in; and prophetic vision

15–19: The penitential prayer and confession of Israel’s sins expresses Deuteronomistic theology, i.e., a view expressed often in the books from Deuteronomy through 2 Kings: Israel has sinned, and if it repents, God will act graciously once more. 24: Seventy weeks [of years], that is, 490 years, the true prediction of Jeremiah according to this interpretation (see v. 2 and n.). This interpretation is based on reading a single word in Jer. 25.11–12 in two different ways, as “shav’uim” (weeks) and “shiv’im” (seventy). Such close textual study and revocalization of texts for interpretive purposes would characterize later rabbinic interpretation. Holy of Holies anointed, finally accomplished by Judas Maccabee in 164 BCE (1 Macc. 4.26–59), shortly after the final editing of Daniel. 25–26: Anointed leader . . . anointed one: The word anointed in vv. 25 and 26 is the Heb “mashiah” (Messiah); thus these vv. have given rise to much Christian speculation. In the context of the other historical references, however, the anointed leader probably refers to either Zerubbabel or the high priest Joshua (Ezra 3.2; Hag. ch 1; Zech. 6.9–15), while the anointed one is most likely the high priest Onias III, killed in 171 BCE (2 Macc. 4.30–34). The prince is Antiochus IV Epiphanes. 27: Half a week, the three and a half years of the Maccabean revolt that had transpired to that time. See 7.25 n.; cf. 8.14. Appalling abomination, probably new altar stones placed upon the altar in the Temple, upon which pagan sacrifices were offered (1 Macc. 1.54; 2 Macc. 6.5).

^a Viz., of years.

ratified,^a and the Holy of Holies anointed. ²⁵You must know and understand: From the issuance of the word to restore and rebuild Jerusalem until the [time of the] anointed leader is seven weeks; and for sixty-two weeks it will be rebuilt, square and moat, but in a time of distress. ²⁶And after those sixty-two weeks, the anointed one will disappear and vanish.^b The army of a leader who is to come will destroy the city and the sanctuary, but its end will come through a flood. Desolation is decreed until the end of war. ²⁷During one week he will make a firm covenant with many. For half a week he will put a stop to the sacrifice and the meal offering. At the “corner [of the altar]”^c will be an appalling abomination until the decreed destruction will be poured down upon the appalling thing.”

10 In the third year of King Cyrus of Persia, an oracle was revealed to Daniel, who was called Belteshazzar. That oracle was true, “but it was a great task to understand the prophecy; understanding came to him through the vision.”^c ²At that time, I, Daniel, kept three full weeks of mourning. ³I ate no tasty food, nor did any meat or wine enter my mouth. I did not anoint myself until the three weeks were over. ⁴It was on the twenty-fourth day of the first month, when I was on the bank of the great river—the Tigris—⁵that I looked and saw a man dressed in linen, his loins girt in ^d“fine gold.”^d ⁶His body was like beryl, his face had the appearance of lightning, his eyes were like flaming torches, his arms and legs had the color of burnished bronze, and the sound of his speech was like the noise of a multitude.

⁷I, Daniel, alone saw the vision; the men who were with me did not see the vision, yet they were seized with a great terror and fled into hiding. ⁸So I was left alone to see this great vision. I was drained of strength, my vigor was destroyed, and I could not summon up strength. ⁹I heard him speaking; and when I heard him speaking, overcome by a deep sleep, I lay prostrate on the ground. ¹⁰Then a hand touched me, and shook me onto my hands and knees. ¹¹He said to me, “O Daniel, precious man, mark what I say to you and stand up, for I have been sent to you.” After he said this to me, I stood up, trembling. ¹²He then said to me, “Have no fear, Daniel, for from the first day that you set your mind to get understanding, practicing abstinence before your God, your prayer was heard,

10.1–12.13: Vision of the last days. Chs 10–12 constitute one extended vision that is much more detailed and focused on events contemporary with the author.

10.1–21: Daniel is strengthened by a heavenly being. 1: Third year . . . Cyrus, 536 BCE. 2–3: Daniel’s preparation is common for fervent prayer or visions (see 9.3 n.); here, however, it is particularly lengthy and detailed. 4: Bank . . . river, see 8.2 n. 5–6: The appearance of the man is described like other divine beings (Ezek. 1.4–14; 9.2–3).

a Lit. “sealed.” b Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

c-c Meaning of Heb. uncertain. d-d Or “gold of Uphaz.”

and I have come because of your prayer. ¹³However, the prince of the Persian kingdom opposed me for twenty-one days; now Michael, a prince of the first rank, has come to my aid, after I was detained there with the kings of Persia. ¹⁴So I have come to make you understand what is to befall your people in the days to come, for there is yet a vision for those days.”

¹⁵While he was saying these things to me, I looked down and kept silent. ¹⁶Then one who looked like a man touched my lips, and I opened my mouth and spoke, saying to him who stood before me, “My lord, because of the vision, I have been seized with pangs and cannot summon strength. ¹⁷How can this servant of my lord speak with my lord, seeing that my strength has failed and no spirit is left in me?” ¹⁸He who looked like a man touched me again, and strengthened me. ¹⁹He said, “Have no fear, precious man, all will be well with you; be strong, be strong!” As he spoke with me, I was strengthened, and said, “Speak on, my lord, for you have strengthened me!” ²⁰Then he said, “Do you know why I have come to you? Now I must go back to fight the prince of Persia. When I go off, the prince of Greece will come in. ²¹•No one is helping me against them except your prince, Michael. However, I will tell you what is recorded in the book of truth.”

11 “In the first year of Darius the Mede, I took my stand to strengthen and fortify him. ²And now I will tell you the truth: Persia will have three more kings, and the fourth will be wealthier than them all; by the power he obtains through his wealth, he will stir everyone up against the kingdom of Greece. ³Then a warrior king will appear who will have an extensive dominion and do as he pleases. ⁴But after his appearance, his kingdom will be broken up and scattered to the four winds of heaven, but not for any of his posterity, nor with dominion like that which he had; for his kingdom will be uprooted and belong to others beside these.

⁵“The king of the south will grow powerful; however, one of his officers will overpower him and rule, having an extensive dominion. ⁶After some years, an alliance will be made, and the daughter of the king of the south will come to the king of the north to effect the agreement, but she will not maintain her strength, nor will his strength endure. She will be surrendered together with those who escorted her and the one who begot her and helped her during those times. ⁷A shoot from her stock will appear in his place, will come against the army and enter the fortress of 13: Prince of the Persian kingdom, the guardian angel of Persia. Michael was a warrior angel, found in later Jewish and Christian literature (1 Enoch 9.1; Qumran War Scroll 9.15–16; Rev. 12.7). See also 8.15–16 n. 20: Prince of Greece, the guardian angel of the Seleucid empire. The guardian angels of Israel battle those of Persia and Greece in turn. The battle of the heavenly forces is also found at Qumran.

11.1–45: The heavenly being reveals future events. A detailed description follows representing events in the conflicted relations between the Seleucid empire of Syria and Babylonia and the Ptolemaic empire of Egypt. The symbolic aspect of the vision is less compelling than ch 7 or even ch 8; it also sometimes bogs down in historical correspondences. Apocalyptic writings, as well as some of those from Qumran (the Dead Sea Scrolls), typically refer to historical figures indirectly (as if in code), rather than by name. Daniel follows this practice. As the visions progress, and relate to the time of the author rather than to earlier times, they become more detailed. Thus, the detail allows a precise dating of the final composition and editing of Daniel. 1: First year of Darius the Mede, see 9.1 n. 2–4: It is unclear what Persian kings are intended; the fourth may be the last Persian king, Darius III (336–331). The warrior king is Alexander the Great, whose kingdom was broken up after his death, and ruled by various successor kingdoms. 5: The king of the south, Ptolemy I Soter (323–285), who established the Ptolemaic kingdom in Egypt; one of his officers is Seleucus I, who founded the Seleucid kingdom in Babylonia. 6: An alliance based on marriage was effected between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids. The daughter of Ptolemy II and others were murdered. 7–8: Her brother, Ptolemy III (246–221), a shoot from her stock, retaliated. 9: Seleucus II, the king of the north (v. 7), invaded Egypt, the realm of the king of the south, but returned north. 10–13: The sons of a-a Order of clauses inverted for clarity.

the king of the north; he will fight and overpower them.

⁸He will also take their gods with their molten images and their precious vessels of silver and gold back to Egypt as booty. For some years he will leave the king of the north alone, ⁹who will [later] invade the realm of the king of the south, but will go back to his land.

¹⁰“His sons will wage war, collecting a multitude of great armies; he will advance and sweep through as a flood, and will again wage war as far as his stronghold. ¹¹Then the king of the south, in a rage, will go out to do battle with him, with the king of the north. He will muster a great multitude, but the multitude will be delivered into his [foe’s] power. ¹²But when the multitude is carried off, he will grow arrogant; he will cause myriads to perish, but will not prevail. ¹³Then the king of the north will again muster a multitude even greater than the first. After a time, a matter of years, he will advance with a great army and much baggage. ¹⁴In those times, many will resist the king of the south, and the lawless sons of your people will assert themselves to confirm the vision, but they will fail. ¹⁵The king of the north will advance and throw up siege ramps and capture a fortress city, and the forces of the south will not hold out; even the elite of his army will be powerless to resist. ¹⁶His opponent will do as he pleases, for none will hold out against him; he will install himself in the beautiful land with destruction within his reach. ¹⁷He will set his mind upon invading the strongholds throughout his [foe’s] kingdom, but in order to destroy it he will effect an agreement with him and give him a daughter in marriage; he will not succeed at it and it will not come about. ¹⁸He will turn to the coastlands and capture many; but a consul will put an end to his insults, nay pay him back for his insults. ¹⁹He will head back to the strongholds of his own land, but will stumble, and fall, and vanish. ²⁰His place will be taken by one who will dispatch an officer to exact tribute for royal glory, but he will be broken in a few days, not by wrath or by war. ²¹His place will be taken by a contemptible man, on whom royal majesty was not conferred; he will come in unawares and seize the kingdom through trickery. ²²The forces of the flood will be overwhelmed by him and will be broken, and so too the covenant leader. ²³And, from the time an alliance is made with him, he will practice deceit; and he will rise to power with a small band. ²⁴He will invade the richest of provinces unawares, and will do what his father and forefathers never did, lavishing on them^a spoil, booty, Seleucus II grew in strength and attacked Egypt. One of them, Antiochus III the Great (223–187), finally defeated Ptolemy V. There were Jews sympathetic to both sides (2 Macc. chs 3–4). 14: The lawless sons of your people probably refers to the Seleucid sympathizers. 15–16: The Battle of Paneas in 200 BCE gave Antiochus III control of the beautiful land, Judea. 17: Another marriage is arranged to normalize relations, but it did not achieve its end. 18–19: Antiochus III turns his attentions elsewhere but is unsuccessful and ultimately dies. 20: Seleucus IV Philopator, who succeeded Antiochus III, sent Heliodorus to rob the Jerusalem Temple treasury. According to 2 Macc. ch 3, this attempt was unsuccessful because Heliodorus was chastised by a divine apparition, i.e., not by wrath or by war. 21–22: Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164) succeeds Seleucus IV. Under his rule the covenant leader, the high priest Onias III, was murdered (see 9.26). 24: Antiochus IV was notoriously lavish with sacrifices.

^a i.e., his followers.

and wealth; he will have designs upon strongholds, but only for a time.

²⁵“He will muster his strength and courage against the king of the south with a great army. The king of the south will wage war with a very great and powerful army but will not stand fast, for they will devise plans against him. ²⁶Those who eat of his food will ruin him. His army will be overwhelmed, and many will fall slain. ²⁷The minds of both kings will be bent on evil; while sitting at the table together, they will lie to each other, but to no avail, for there is yet an appointed term. ²⁸He will return to his land with great wealth, his mind set against the holy covenant. Having done his pleasure, he will return to his land. ²⁹At the appointed time, he will again invade the south, but the second time will not be like the first. ³⁰Ships from Kittim will come against him. He will be checked, and will turn back, raging against the holy covenant. Having done his pleasure, he will then attend to those who forsake the holy covenant. ³¹Forces will be levied by him; they will desecrate the temple, the fortress; they will abolish the regular offering and set up the appalling abomination. ³²He will flatter with smooth words those who act wickedly toward the covenant, but the people devoted to their God will stand firm. ³³The knowledgeable among the people will make the many understand; and for a while they shall fall by sword and flame, suffer captivity and spoliation. ³⁴In defeat, they will receive a little help, and many will join them insincerely. ³⁵Some of the knowledgeable will fall, that they may be refined and purged and whitened until the time of the end, for an interval still remains until the appointed time.

³⁶“The king will do as he pleases; he will exalt and magnify himself above every god, and he will speak awful things against the God of gods. He will prosper until wrath is spent, and what has been decreed is accomplished. ³⁷He will not have regard for the god of his ancestors or for the one dear to women; he will not have regard for any god, but will magnify himself above all. ³⁸He will honor the god of fortresses on his stand; he will honor with gold and silver, with precious stones and costly things, a god that his ancestors never knew. ³⁹He will deal with fortified strongholds with the help of an alien god. He will heap honor on those who acknowledge him, and will make them master over many; he will distribute land for a price. ⁴⁰At the time of the end, the king of the south will lock horns with him, but the king of the north will attack him with chariots and riders and many ships. He will invade lands, sweeping through them like a flood; ⁴¹he will invade the beautiful land, too, and many will fall, but these will escape his clutches: Edom, Moab, and the chief part of the Ammonites. ⁴²He will lay his hands on lands; not even the land of Egypt will escape. ⁴³He will gain control over treasures of gold and silver and over all the precious things of Egypt, and the Libyans and Cushites will follow at his heel. ⁴⁴But reports from east and north will alarm him, and he will march forth in a great fury to destroy and annihilate many. ⁴⁵He will pitch his royal pavilion between the sea and the beautiful holy mountain, and he will meet his doom with no one to help him.

25–27: Antiochus IV again defeats Egypt. 28: In the midst of his constant campaigns, Antiochus IV had designs once again on the gold in the Jerusalem Temple (1 Macc. ch 1). 29–31: When Antiochus IV invades Egypt once more, he is opposed by ships from Kittim, or Rome, now a Mediterranean power. Jewish sympathizers, along with Antiochus’s appointed high priest, will forsake the covenant and introduce new sacrifices, including the apalling abomination. 32–35: Some faithful Jews resist, and those who are knowledgeable will instruct the many (cf. 12.3). On the identity of the knowledgeable, see the introduction. Many will, for the first time in Jewish history, suffer martyrdom (1 Macc. 1.63), namely death due to their religious beliefs. The little help they receive perhaps indicates the lack of an effective alliance between the militant Maccabees and Daniel’s circle (cf. 1 Macc. 2.29–38). 36–39: The author depicts the arrogance of Antiochus IV as conflict in the divine council (cf. Isa. 14.12–21; Ezek. 28.1–10). The offense of Antiochus IV is not only against the God of gods, but also against his own ancestral god and the one dear to women, the Mesopotamian god Tammuz (Ezek. 8.14). It has been thought that Antiochus elevated the cult of Zeus Olympios above all other gods, but ancient authors saw him as active in the worship of many deities and divine heroes. To the author of Daniel, however, the installation of Zeus Olympios in the sanctuary was alien both to Jews and to the Seleucid dynasty, which had previously favored Apollo as a patron deity. 40–45: From this point, the predictions do not correspond to events as known from other sources, and scholars agree that the author must have been writing at the time of the events described in the preceding vv. (see introduction). What is described is a cataclysmic battle of the major powers that would mark the end of the present age (cf. Ezek. 38–39), but the campaigns predicted here did not occur. This helps to date

12 “At that time, the great prince, Michael, who stands beside the sons of your people, will appear. It will be a time of trouble, the like of which has never been since the nation came into being. At that time, your people will be rescued, all who are found inscribed in the book. ²Many of those that sleep in the dust of the earth will awake, some to eternal life, others to reproaches, to everlasting abhorrence. ³And the knowledgeable will be radiant like the bright expanse of sky, and those who lead the many to righteousness will be like the stars forever and ever.

⁴“But you, Daniel, keep the words secret, and seal the book until the time of the end. Many will range far and wide and knowledge will increase.”

⁵Then I, Daniel, looked and saw two others standing, one on one bank of the river, the other on the other bank of the river. ⁶One said to the man clothed in linen, who was above the water of the river, “How long until the end of these awful things?” ⁷Then I heard the man dressed in linen, who was above the water of the river, swear by the Ever-Living One as he lifted his right hand and his left hand to heaven: “For a ^atime, times, and half a time;^a and when the breaking of the power of the holy people comes to an end, then shall all these things be fulfilled.”

⁸I heard and did not understand, so I said, “My lord, what will be the outcome of these things?” ⁹He said, “Go, Daniel, for these words are secret and sealed to the time of the end. ¹⁰Many will be purified and purged and refined; the wicked will act wickedly and none of the wicked will understand; but the knowledgeable will understand. (¹¹From the time the regular offering is abolished, and an appalling abomination is set up—it will be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. ¹²Happy the one who waits and reaches one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days.) ¹³But you, go on to the end; you shall rest, and arise to your destiny at the end of the days.”

Daniel to the middle of the persecutions of Antiochus IV.

12.1–13: Vision of the end. 1: A judgment scene similar to ch 7. Michael, see 8.15–16 n.; 10.13 n. Book: The book of life, prominent in the Jewish liturgy of the high holidays, is borrowed from Mesopotamia and is found in the Bible (Exod. 32.32–33; Isa. 4.3). Here it is more eschatological, i.e., oriented toward the end of time, and may have inscribed only a small subset of the people Israel, as it does in other Jewish apocalyptic texts.

2–3: Many . . . will awake, i.e., not all; presumably some who deserve eternal life, others who deserve everlasting abhorrence. The doctrine of resurrection and judgment probably came about during the persecutions of Antiochus IV as a means to effect justice at a time when pious people, the knowledgeable, were being martyred. Unlike Ezekiel’s vision of dry bones (Ezek. ch 37), the resurrection here is not a metaphor for the rebirth of Israel, but individual resurrection for judgment. Whether bodily resurrection or some form of spiritual resurrection is intended is not stated. This is the only certain biblical reference to this doctrine, a doctrine that became central in Christian theology and remained a strong current in Judaism as well. It was a tenet of belief for the Pharisees, and Maimonides, centuries later, included it among his thirteen principles of Jewish faith. 4: See 8.26 n. 7: See 7.25 n. 11–12: Other time predictions are added, pushing the expected end slightly later than those that have come before. It is possible that the failure of the end to come prompted two successive adjustments.

a-a See note at 7.25.

Ezra

EZRA-NEHEMIAH, WHICH BEGINS where Chronicles ends, is written as a continuation of Chronicles. It contains historical traditions, records significant liturgical developments in the newly reconstituted Second Temple community, and preserves important genealogical lists of returnees, priests, Levites, and other leadership and Temple personnel. In presenting this material concerning the early postexilic period, Ezra-Nehemiah emphasizes repeatedly their continuity with the Israelite preexilic past. Ezra explicitly appropriates Mosaic authority as he is represented as regiving the Torah in a kind of repetition of the Sinai event. Indeed, Ezra and Nehemiah insist that their legal innovations are already part of Mosaic Torah, i.e., that they are accurate applications of Mosaic Torah and have authoritative Mosaic status. Furthermore, the narrative of Ezra-Nehemiah repeatedly invokes and identifies with the “conquest” of the land of Israel during the time of Joshua as a way of authorizing the returnees’ appropriation of Judah and their insistence on rebuilding the Temple and the wall of Jerusalem. The narrative of Ezra-Nehemiah thus represents the self-understanding of the reconstituted Second Temple community as fulfilling the Abrahamic covenant of promised land, a land which, in their textual memory, had been violently torn from them by the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar. Ezra-Nehemiah also repeatedly invokes the prophetic traditions of promise for return after the exile. They see themselves as part of the divine fulfillment of earlier prophecies for return and hope uttered by Isaiah, Jeremiah, and others. This identification was meant, in part, to encourage the returnees to identify with and revere their past textual history and overcome the profound disappointment that must have overwhelmed the exiles in Babylonia.

During the reign of Cyrus II (559–530 BCE), the king issued a proclamation encouraging nations to establish their own temples in their indigenous lands. At this time Sheshbazzar was the appointed governor (or leader) of Judah, now a province in the Persian empire, known as Yehud. As a result of Cyrus’s decree of 538, known in different forms in Ezra 1.1–4 (see 2 Chron. 36.22–23) and Ezra 6.1–5, some Judean exiles returned to Israel. Returnees began to reconstruct the Jerusalem Temple and resettle in Judah and surrounding environs. During the reign of Cambyses (530–522), Zerubbabel was governor of Judah and the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple continued. During the reign of Darius I (522–486) Haggai and Zechariah prophesied in Jerusalem, and the Jerusalem Temple was rebuilt and dedicated in 516. The rebuilding of the Jerusalem wall and surrounding areas continued under Xerxes I (486–465) and Artaxerxes I Longimanus (465–424). Ezra arrived in Jerusalem in 458. Nehemiah, governor of Judah, was sent to Jerusalem to rebuild the city in 445 and served under both Artaxerxes I and Darius II (423–405), who, following the general Persian policy of religious tolerance, continued to support Judah during his reign.

Date and Composition of Ezra-Nehemiah

MOST SCHOLARS DATE THE PRESENT VERSION of Ezra-Nehemiah to the 4th century BCE. Ezra-Nehemiah describes events that occurred, for the most part, in the 5th century BCE, but there are a number of references to later events and important figures. For instance, the Persian king Darius II (423–405) is mentioned in Nehemiah 12.22; this is the latest king mentioned and would support the claim that the traditions were compiled and completed by the early 4th century, and not later. Other significant details that would be expected in a late-4th-century or later composition are totally lacking.

Some scholars have suggested that Ezra-Nehemiah is produced by the same author(s) and editor(s) responsible for producing Chronicles, and thus Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah should be understood to form a single literary work. This proposal stems from the following arguments: The three share major themes; the conclusion of 2 Chronicles (36.22–23) overlaps with the introduction of Ezra (1.1–3); and 1 Esdras (in the Septuagint) combines parts of all three works. This thesis was first articulated in 1832 by the German-Jewish scholar Leopold Zunz and has since received wide support from other scholars. More recently scholars have challenged this theory on the basis of significantly different theological assumptions and differences in use of language in Ezra-Nehemiah and Chronicles; this newer position, which does not assign the same authorship to these works, is now widely accepted.

There is significant ancient debate surrounding the question of the unity of Ezra-Nehemiah. In rabbinic tradition Ezra-Nehemiah was recognized as a single work authored by Ezra (b. B. Bat. 15 a). Ezra-Nehemiah is considered a single unified work in early Hebrew biblical manuscripts, in the Greek version of the Bible (the Septuagint), and in later Jewish traditions.

The first formal division of Ezra-Nehemiah into two separate works appears in the 3rd century CE, among Christians, in the work of the early church father, Origen. This division is also reflected in Jerome's extremely influential Latin translation, the Vulgate, which was completed in the 4th century CE. The division of the book into Ezra and Nehemiah among Jews appears in the first printed editions of the Heb text in the 15th century CE. However, in spite of this borrowed division, Masoretic tradition reflects that the end of the book is at the conclusion of Nehemiah. Titles for Ezra-Nehemiah differ in the various translations. Ezra is titled 2 Esdras in the Septuagint and 1 Esdras in the Vulgate. Nehemiah is titled 3 Esdras in the Septuagint and 2 Esdras in the Vulgate.

The Septuagint and Vulgate also preserve books related to the Ezra-Nehemiah narrative. The Apocryphal work called 1 Esdras in the Septuagint (3 Esdras in the Vulgate;

1 Esdras in modern Bibles) preserves a translation of 2 Chronicles 35–36; Ezra 1–10; Nehemiah 8.1–13; and a major addition that is lacking in the Hebrew version in 1 Esdras 3.1–5.6. Another related book is called “the Apocalypse of Ezra” or 4 Ezra in the Vulgate and 2 Esdras in modern Bibles. These related versions preserve interpretations and alternate versions of the Ezra-Nehemiah narrative and are very important for acquiring a more complete understanding of this period and the development of Judaism.

Although Ezra-Nehemiah is presented as a single unified work in the Masoretic tradition, recent scholarship has debated its unity, suggesting that Ezra and Nehemiah are separate works, each drawn from various sources. The significant linguistic differences between Ezra and Nehemiah suggest that they were not written by the same author. The inclusion of overlapping but inconsistent genealogical lists also suggests that these two works were originally two independent texts. Finally, the entire book of Ezra focuses on the restoration of the Temple, establishing a community in Jerusalem, and the implementation of the Mosaic law. Nehemiah, on the other hand, focuses on resettlement of the returnees, rebuilding the Jerusalem wall, and insuring the economic stability of the people and of the Temple staff (the priests and Levites). These thematic differences further suggest that Ezra and Nehemiah were originally composed as two independent works.

Underlying Ezra-Nehemiah are earlier sources that were incorporated and then reworked into a largely coherent narrative. In fact, Ezra-Nehemiah, like other works of this period, is fond of quoting official documents. The authenticity of these documents, however, and their historical accuracy are debated by modern scholars. Below is a list of the likely sources that have been woven together to form the current book:

- Cyrus’s decree: Ezra 1.2–4 (Heb); Ezra 6.3–5 (Aramaic); Ezra 5.13–15 (paraphrase of the decree)
- List of returnees: Ezra 2.1–67, thought to be taken from Neh. 7.6–68, which is a combination of lists of different returns in the early Persian period
- Rehum’s letter to Artaxerxes and Artaxerxes’ reply: Ezra 4.7–22
- Tattenai’s letter to Darius and Darius’s reply: Ezra 5.6–17; 6.6–12
- Artaxerxes justifies the return and rebuilding: Ezra 7.12–26
- List of families who journeyed to Jerusalem: Ezra 8.1–14
- List of families who intermarried: Ezra 10.18–43
- Ezra’s confession: Ezra 9.6–15
- Nehemiah’s memoir: Neh. 1.1–7; 9.1–2; 12.27–43; 13.3, 31
- Authentic part of the Ezra narrative: Neh. 7.72b–9.5
- Confession: Neh. 9.6–37
- Temple archives material: Neh. 9.38–10.39
- Wall dedication: Neh. 12.27–33
- Purification of the Jerusalem community: Neh. 12.44–13.3

Ezra and Nehemiah are unique among biblical books in that they also include a genre identified as memoirs. These include both first-person and third-person narratives concerning Ezra and Nehemiah. The first-person narratives are typically considered to be authentic autobiographical accounts of Ezra and Nehemiah. The third-person parts of the memoirs are attributed to the editors of the final version of Ezra-Nehemiah. The Ezra memoir is thought to consist of parts of Ezra and Nehemiah and should be ordered in the following manner: Ezra 7–8; Nehemiah 8; Ezra 9–10; Nehemiah 9. Nehemiah’s memoir is thought to consist of Nehemiah 1.1–7.72a (although some scholars have excluded 3.1–32 and 5.14–19 from the Nehemiah memoir); 11.1–2; 12.31–43; 13.4–31.

Guide to Reading Ezra-Nehemiah

THE NARRATIVE OF EZRA-NEHEMIAH begins with a lengthy account of the returnees’ arrival in Jerusalem and the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple (Ezra 1–6). The memoirs of Ezra and Nehemiah follow. Ezra’s memoir consists of Ezra 7–10 and Nehemiah 8–10. Chs 7 and 8 of Ezra contain reports of the initial difficulties Ezra confronted when he first began to build and the repeated appeal he made to Cyrus’s initial decree. In addition, an elaborate account is presented of the legal crises that the returnees faced in light of the widespread practice of intermarriage. Finally, in ch 10 of Ezra, Ezra resolves the legal crisis and completes the rebuilding of the Temple. The conclusion of the Ezra memoir is preserved in the text of Nehemiah (7.27–10.40). Here Ezra conducts a public reading of the law, holds a celebration of the festival of the Booths, a delayed Yom Kippur, and finally presents a covenant that is signed by the leaders of the community with the entire community present.

The Nehemiah memoir (Neh. 1.1–7.72) begins by focusing on a different project of restoration, namely the challenge of rebuilding the wall around Jerusalem. Nehemiah was determined to rebuild the wall, despite extensive harassment from the local peoples. The final section of the book (11.1–13.31) recounts a number of political and religious measures taken by Nehemiah in order to ensure the economic and religious preservation of the returnees and of the Temple personnel.

Importance for Judaism

THE IMPORTANCE OF EZRA for the creation and formation of what came to be known as rabbinic Judaism cannot be overestimated. According to the Bible, Ezra was the one who brought the Torah to the returning exiles, read and interpreted it publicly, and oversaw the people’s solemn recommitment to its teachings (Neh. chs 8–10). Thus Ezra is like a second Moses. The Rabbis imply this by stating: “Ezra was sufficiently worthy that the Torah could have been given through him if Moses had not preceded him” (t. Sanh. 4.4). A number of ordinances called the ten takanot (regulations) are attributed to Ezra, although they are nowhere mentioned in the text of Ezra-Nehemiah. In addition, he is celebrated for other important accomplishments: He is said to be involved in the writing of the book of Psalms (Song Rab. 4.19), and he had the Torah restored to its “original Mosaic” Assyrian characters, thereby leaving the old Hebrew characters for the Samaritans (e.g., b. Sanh. 21b). These legal innovations, along with other notable accomplishments, reflect the way

Ezra is received and embraced by rabbinic Judaism. Ezra is both an authoritative scribe and priest, as well as a kind of proto-Rabbi who also has the authority of a prophet. His legal innovations are not seen as such, but are depicted as proper interpretation of eternally binding Mosaic law (see Ezra 7.10; Neh. 8.1). This principle is at the heart of rabbinic interpretation, and his authenticity is never called into question within rabbinic Judaism.

Summary of Contents

- I. Chs 1–6: Return from Babylonian exile and Temple restoration
 - A. Ch 1: Cyrus allows Jewish exiles to return and restore Temple
 - 1.1–4: Jeremiah’s prophecy and Cyrus’s decree
 - 1.5–6: Exiles prepare for return
 - 1.7–11: Cyrus returns Temple vessels to returnees
 - B. Ch 2: List of exiles who returned to Jerusalem and Judah
 - C. Ch 3: Jeshua and Zerubbabel restore Temple rituals and celebrate
 - 3.1–7: Temple sacrifice restored at festival of Tabernacles
 - 3.8–9: Priests and Levites appointed supervisors
 - 3.10–13: Temple foundations laid with a joyous celebration
 - D. Ch 4: Conflict concerning Temple restoration
 - 4.1–3: Locals offer to help and are rejected
 - 4.4–7: Locals try to undermine the Temple restoration

(Aramaic Narrative: 4.8–6.18)

 - 4.8–16: Letter from locals to Artaxerxes to stop the restoration
 - 4.17–22: Letter from Artaxerxes to locals
 - 4.23–24: Temple restoration interrupted
 - E. Ch 5.1–6.22: Temple restoration resumed and completed
 - 5.1–2: Temple restoration resumed with prophetic support
 - 5.3–5: Tattenai’s inquiry and God’s protection
 - 5.6–17: Letter from Tattenai to Darius
 - 6.1–2: Darius finds Cyrus’s decree in Ecbatana
 - 6.3–12: Letter from Darius to Tattenai ordering Temple restoration
 - 6.13–15: Temple restoration completed
 - 6.16–18: Dedication of the Temple
 - 6.19–22: Celebration of Passover in the first month (Hebrew)
- II. Chs 7–10: Ezra’s mission to Jerusalem
 - A. 7.1–10: Ezra joins the returnees (Hebrew)
 - B. 7.11–26: Artaxerxes’ letter commissioning Ezra’s mission (7.12–26 are Aramaic)
 - C. 7.27–9.15: Ezra’s memoir (the rest of the book is Hebrew)
 - 7.27–28: Ezra’s prayer
 - 8.1–14: List of returnees who accompanied Ezra
 - 8.15–30: Ezra’s preparations for the journey to Jerusalem
 - 8.31–36: Ezra’s arrival in Jerusalem

9.1–2: Crisis concerning intermarriage with foreigners

9.3–15: Ezra's public confession and prayer

D. 10.1–14: Covenant to renounce all intermarriages

E. 10.15–44: List of returnees who had intermarried

[HINDY NAJMAN]

1 In the first year of King Cyrus of Persia, when the word of the LORD spoken by Jeremiah was fulfilled,^a the LORD roused the spirit of King Cyrus of Persia to issue a proclamation throughout his realm by word of mouth and in writing as follows:

²"Thus said King Cyrus of Persia: The LORD God of Heaven has given me all the kingdoms of the earth and has charged me with building Him a house in Jerusalem, which is in Judah. ³Anyone of you of all His people—may his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem that is in Judah and build the House of the LORD God of Israel, the God that is in Jerusalem; ⁴and all who stay behind, wherever he may be living, let the people of his place assist him with silver, gold, goods, and livestock, besides the freewill offering to the House of God that is in Jerusalem."

⁵So the chiefs of the clans of Judah and Benjamin, and the priests and Levites, all whose spirit had been roused by God, got ready to go up to build the House of the LORD that is in Jerusalem. ⁶All their neighbors supported them with silver vessels, with gold, with goods, with livestock, and with precious objects, besides what had been given as a freewill offering. ⁷King Cyrus of Persia released the ves-a Cf. Jer. 29.10.

1.1–4: Jeremiah's prophecy is fulfilled through the decree of King Cyrus of Persia. This introductory section, until the words "let him go up," also appears as 2 Chron. 36.22–23. 1: In the first year of King Cyrus of Persia: Although Cyrus became king of Persia in 559 BCE, the v. refers to Cyrus's first year as the ruler of Babylonia, 539–538. Cyrus granted the nations under his control the right to worship their own gods and build their temples. This decree typifies the tolerant religious policy of the Persians. When the word of the LORD spoken by Jeremiah was fulfilled: Throughout the book of Jeremiah the people of Judah are instructed to accept as a divine decree Babylonian rule and exile from their land. In some of the Jeremianic prophecies Nebuchadnezzar is even identified as the servant of God. However, Jeremiah also prophesies that there will eventually be a return to Judah in which the people of Judah will rebuild the Temple (e.g., Jer. 29.4–10; 31.27–34; 32.36–44). In the Second Temple period Cyrus's decree was interpreted as the fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecy; it is possible that this was seen as a specific fulfillment of Jer. ch. 25, a widely cited ch in other books, that suggested that Babylonia would dominate the world for seventy years. The LORD roused the spirit of King Cyrus of Persia: The intimate relationship between the LORD and Cyrus is emphasized in Isa. 44.28, where the LORD says, "He is my shepherd; He shall fulfill all My purposes!" Josephus (Ant. 11.1.2) suggests that Cyrus knew this passage from Isaiah. Cyrus is also referred to as the anointed one of the LORD in Isa. 45.1. In rabbinic traditions Cyrus is praised as a sage for his decree of 538 which permitted the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple. Cyrus is also held up as a model in Gk writings of the Persian period. 3–4: The narrative of Ezra understands Cyrus's decree to rebuild the Temple to require all of the Jewish exiles to support the rebuilding of the Temple, but not necessarily to return to Judah. It appears from Ezra-Nehemiah that many exiles were reluctant to give up the lives they had established for themselves in Babylonia and to return to Judah where their sustenance and future seemed less certain. The God that is in Jerusalem: This follows the typical ancient Near Eastern pattern in which gods are viewed as national deities, localized at their capitals. In rabbinic traditions Cyrus's wisdom is said to be limited because he appears to confine to Jerusalem the power of the God of Israel and thereby to deny God's dominion over the world (Esth. Rab. proem 6 and 1.5).

1.5–11: The exiles return to Judah with the original Temple vessels. 5–6: Whoever shares Cyrus's divine inspiration returns. Those who choose to remain in exile, although they support the rebuilding project financially, are implicitly reproached. 7–11: Cyrus's return of the Temple vessels is also sels of the LORD's house which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away from Jerusalem and had put in the house of his god.⁸ These King Cyrus of Persia released through the office of Mithredath the treasurer, who gave an inventory of them to Sheshbazzar the prince of Judah.⁹ This is the inventory: 30 gold basins, 1,000 silver basins, 29 knives,¹⁰ 30 gold bowls, 410 silver "double bowls,"^a 1,000 other vessels;¹¹ in all, 5,400 gold and silver vessels. Sheshbazzar brought all these back when the exiles came back from Babylon to Jerusalem.

2^b These are the people of the province who came up from among the captive exiles whom King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon had carried into exile to Babylon, who returned to Jerusalem and Judah, each to his own city,² who came with Zerubbabel, Jeshua, Nehemiah, Seraiah, Reelaiah, Mordecai, Bilshan, Mispar, Bigvai, Rehum, Baanah:

The list of the men of the people of Israel:³ the sons of Parosh—2,172;⁴ the sons of Shephatiah—372;⁵ the sons of Arah—775;⁶ the sons of Pahath-moab: the sons of Jeshua and Joab—2,812;⁷ the sons of Elam—1,254;⁸ the sons of Zattu—945;⁹ the sons of Zaccai—760;¹⁰ the sons of Bani—642;¹¹ the sons of Bebai—623;¹² the sons of Azgad—1,222;¹³ the sons of Adonikam—666;¹⁴ the sons of Bigvai—2,056;¹⁵ the sons of Adin—454;¹⁶ the sons of Ater: Hezekiah—98;¹⁷ the sons of Bezai—323;¹⁸ the sons of Jorah—112;¹⁹ the sons of Hashum—223;²⁰ the sons of Gibbar—95;²¹ the sons of Bethlehem—123;²² the sons of Netophah—56;²³ the sons of Anathoth—128;²⁴ the sons of Azmaveth—42;²⁵ the sons of Kiriath-arim: Chephirah and Beeroth—743;²⁶ the sons of Ramah and Geba—621;²⁷ the men

a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

b This chapter appears as Neh. 7.6–73 with variations in the names and numbers.

reported in Ezra 5.14; 6.5. A corroborating account of Nebuchadnezzar's removal of the Temple vessels appears in 2 Chron. 36.10, 18. The removal is also reported in 2 Kings 24.13, but there it also notes that Nebuchadnezzar "stripped off" the gold from all of the Temple vessels. This is not mentioned in Ezra, which has as a major theme the continuity between the Second Temple and the preexilic past.

2.1–70: List of exiles who return to Jerusalem and Judah (= Neh.

7.6–72). Neh. 7.5 titles this list "the genealogical register of those who were the first to come up." Although both lists purport to record the same group of returnees, they exhibit significant differences. Scholars suggest that both lists were in fact compiled later than the first wave of return, on the basis of either censuses or tax registers. The present place of the lists thus exaggerates the extent of response to Cyrus's decree. The Rabbis ask why Ezra did not return to Jerusalem immediately following Cyrus's decree in 538 BCE, and suggest that Ezra delayed his return because he was deeply immersed in the study of Torah under the tutelage of Jeremiah's scribe, Baruch son of Neriah. Thus, according to the Rabbis, Ezra was correct to delay his return in order to better prepare himself in the area of Torah study, which takes precedence even over the rebuilding of the Temple (b. Meg. 16b; Song Rab. 5.5). This tradition reflects a general tendency in classical rabbinic thought to privilege Torah study over Temple service and worship, and to find virtue in situations that may raise questions. 2: The genealogical record is prefaced by a list of prominent returnees. It is unclear whether these leaders returned together. Zerubbabel is governor of the province of Judah during the reign of Darius I. Intimately involved in the rebuilding of the Temple, Zerubbabel is mentioned in the narratives of Haggai and Zechariah as the person who will finish the work of rebuilding the Temple. Yet he vanishes from the scene and is never heard of again. There is some speculation that he was removed by the Persians because he was perceived to be too powerful, especially since he was a descendant of the Davidic king Jehoiachin. In some rabbinic traditions, Zerubbabel becomes an Elijah-like figure who will explain the unanswered questions of Torah study in the time to come. Other rabbinic traditions identify him as one of the men of the great assembly, a group of sages imagined by the later Rabbis to have functioned as a judicial body in this period and who served as an important link in the transmission of the Torah from biblical to rabbinic times. Zerubbabel is also said to have succeeded Daniel in the service of Darius I and is said, like Daniel, to be an interpreter of secrets, signs, and dreams. In another tradition he is said to be identical with Nehemiah (b. Sanh. 38a). Jeshua is the head of a prominent priestly family who returns from exile with Zerubbabel. He is credited with reinstating the ritual functions of the of Michmas—122;²⁸ the men of Beth-el and Ai—223;²⁹ the men of Nebo—52;³⁰ the sons of Magbish—156;³¹ the sons of the other Elam—1,254;³² the sons of Harim—320;³³ the sons of Lod, Hadid, and Ono—725;³⁴ the sons of Jericho—345;³⁵ the sons of Senaah—3,630.

³⁶The priests: the sons of Jedaiah: the house of Jeshua—973;³⁷ the sons of Immer—1,052;³⁸ the sons of Pashhur—1,247;³⁹ the sons of Harim—1,017.

⁴⁰The Levites: the sons of Jeshua and Kadmiel: the sons of Hodaviah—74.

⁴¹The singers: the sons of Asaph—128.

⁴²The gatekeepers: the sons of Shallum, the sons of Ater, the sons of Talmon, the sons of Akkub, the sons of Hatita, the sons of Shobai, all told—139.

⁴³The temple servants: the sons of Ziha, the sons of Hasupha, the sons of Tabbaoth,⁴⁴ the sons of Keros, the sons of Siaha, the sons of Padon,⁴⁵ the sons of Lebanah, the sons of Hagabah, the sons of Akkub,⁴⁶ the sons of Hagab, the sons of Salmal, the sons of Hanan,⁴⁷ the sons of Giddel, the sons of Gahar, the sons of Reaiah,⁴⁸ the sons of Rezin, the sons of Nekoda, the sons of Gazzam,⁴⁹ the sons of Uzza, the sons of Paseah, the sons of Besai,⁵⁰ the sons of Asnah, the sons of Meunim, the sons of Nephusim,⁵¹ the sons of Bakbuk, the sons of Hakupha, the sons of Harhur,⁵² the sons of Bazluth, the sons of Mehida, the sons of Harsha,⁵³ the sons of Barkos, the sons of Sisera, the sons of Temah,⁵⁴ the sons of Nezhiah, the sons of Hatipha.

⁵⁵The sons of Solomon's servants: the sons of Sotai, the sons of Hassophereth, the sons of Peruda,⁵⁶ the sons of Jalah, the sons of Darkon, the sons of Giddel,⁵⁷ the sons of Shephatiah, the sons of Hattil, the sons of Pochereth-hazzebaim, the sons of Ami.

⁵⁸The total of temple servants and the sons of Solomon's servants—392.

⁵⁹The following were those who came up from Tel-melah, Tel-harsha, Cherub, Addan, and Immer—they were unable to tell whether their father's house and descent were Israelite:⁶⁰ the sons of Delaiah, the sons of Tobiah, the sons of Nekoda—652.

⁶¹Of the sons of the priests, the sons of Habaiah, the sons of Hakkoz, the sons of Barzillai who had married a daughter of Barzillai and had taken his^a name—⁶²these searched for their genealogical records, but they could not be found, so they were disqualified for the priesthood.⁶³ The Tirshatha^b ordered them not to eat of the most holy things until a priest with Urim and Thummim should appear.

priesthood and with rebuilding the altar. According to 1 Chron. 5.41, Jeshua is the descendant of Jozadak, the last high priest, who was exiled by Nebuchadnezzar to Babylonia. Thus, Jeshua's genealogical connection to the preexilic priesthood authorizes him to re-establish the rituals of the priestly practices. In Haggai and Zechariah, but not in Ezra-Nehemiah, he is called "high priest." Mordecai is named after the Babylonian god, Marduk. Some rabbinic sources suggest that this is the same Mordecai mentioned in the book of Esther and that he returned to Judah with the exiles mentioned in ch 2, though this is unlikely. Bigvai is the governor of the province of Judah 410–407 BCE, is also listed as the leader of a prominent family in Neh. 7.19, and is connected to the covenant in Neh. 10.17. 41: Asaph: The Asaphites are a group of musicians from the tribe of Levi. Pss. 50 and 73–83 are attributed to Asaph, and the Asaphites are also mentioned in 1 Chron. 6.24; 16.5–7, 37; 25.2, 9; 2 Chron. 5.12. 62: The search for accurate and convincing genealogical connection is a theme throughout Ezra-Nehemiah, reflecting the growing concern for preserving hierarchy and lineage that persisted throughout the exilic and postexilic periods. On the disqualification of questionable priests from the eating of "terumah" (sacred gifts belonging to the priests), see b. Ketub. 24b; b. Kid. 69b. 63: Tirshatha is an Old Persian term meaning "revered," often taken to mean governor in rabbinic traditions. 1 Esdras 5.40 and later rabbinic tradition understand Tirshatha to be referring to Nehemiah in his role as governor (see Rashi's commentary to b. Ketub. 24b in a discussion of Ezra 2.62). Urim and Thummim were used to divine the opinion of God and were consulted on a variety of matters. See, e.g., Exod. 28.30; Lev. 8.8; Num. 27.21; Deut. 33.8; 1 Sam. 28.6. Rabbinic tradition does not understand Ezra 2.63 to suggest actual postexilic use of the Urim and Thummim. It is unclear why this ⁶⁴The sum of the entire community was 42,360, ⁶⁵not counting their male and female servants, those being 7,337; they also had 200 male and female singers. ⁶⁶Their horses—736; their mules—245; ⁶⁷their camels—435; their asses—6,720.

^a Lit. "their." ^b A Persian title.

⁶⁸Some of the chiefs of the clans, on arriving at the House of the LORD in Jerusalem, gave a freewill offering to erect the House of God on its site. ⁶⁹In accord with their means, they donated to the treasury of the work: gold—6,100 drachmas, silver—5,000 minas, and priestly robes—100.

⁷⁰The priests, the Levites and some of the people, and the singers, gatekeepers, and the temple servants took up residence in their towns and all Israel in their towns.

3 When the seventh month arrived—the Israelites being settled in their towns—the entire people assembled as one man in Jerusalem. ²Then Jeshua son of Jozadak and his brother priests, and Zerubbabel son of Shealtiel and his brothers set to and built the altar of the God of Israel to offer burnt offerings upon it as is written in the Teaching of Moses, the man of God. ³They set up the altar on its site because they were in fear of the peoples of the land, and they offered burnt offerings on it to the LORD, burnt offerings each morning and evening. ⁴Then they celebrated the festival of Tabernacles as is written, with its daily burnt offerings in the proper quantities, on each day as is prescribed for it, ⁵followed by the regular burnt offering and the offerings for the new moons and for all the sacred fixed times of the LORD, and whatever freewill offerings were made to the LORD. ⁶From the first day of the seventh system of lot setting was not reestablished in this period, though the Rabbis suggest that the Urim and Thummim are akin to prophecy and are thus considered to have become unusable once prophecy ceased, after the latter prophets (Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi), or perhaps even after the former prophets (b. Sot. 48a). Although Ezra lived after the time of prophecy, he is nevertheless said by the Rabbis to have been worthy of receiving divine inspiration “ruah hakodesh,” the holy spirit (t. Sot. 13.3). Nevertheless, in rabbinic interpretation, even Ezra could not resolve genealogical questions about all those who claimed to be priests.

3.1–7: Resuming Temple ritual and sacrifice on Sukkot (festival of Booths). The returnees are preparing to celebrate the festival of Booths in Tishri, the seventh month. According to 2 Chron. 7.8, the dedication of Solomon’s Temple took place during the festival of Tabernacles. Ezra deliberately invokes preexilic Temple practice in order to authorize the second Temple as an authentic restoration of the first Temple. 1: The building begins under the governorship of Sheshbazzar (1.8–14; 5.14–16). After an interruption, the building resumes under the governorship of Zerubbabel and the priestly instruction of Jeshua. Some scholars identify Zerubbabel with Sheshbazzar because both are credited with building the Second Temple. However, it seems most likely that Sheshbazzar initiated the rebuilding and that Zerubbabel completed it. 2: The combination of Jeshua, the priest, and Zerubbabel, a governor of Davidic descent, establishes an authoritative link to preexilic times, though in preexilic texts such close cooperation between the Davidic king and the Aaronide (high) priest is rarely recorded. There is no king because Judah remained under Persian sovereignty. Teaching: The returnees understand themselves to live in accordance with the very same law and Temple ritual that governed the preexilic community in Judah. The exact nature of this Teaching or Torah is unclear from the texts in Ezra–Nehemiah, though it seems likely to be very similar to the current form of the Torah. 3: They set up the altar: In later midrashic traditions, the Rabbis point out that the altar was prioritized, not only in Ezra, but also when the Israelites first entered the land in Josh. 8.31 (Midr. Hagadol, Yitro [Exod.] 20.21). Ezra–Nehemiah repeatedly alludes to Joshua’s conquest in order to authorize the returnees’ claim to the land. Because they were in fear of the peoples: The returnees are intimidated by the hostile behavior of the local peoples, and are offering sacrifice to God in order to appeal for divine protection. This conflict between the returnees and the local people, many of whom were likely Judeans who were not exiled to Babylonia, is a major theme of the book. 1 Esdras 5.50, in contrast, mentions that some of the local peoples joined Ezra in the rededication. 4: See Num. 29.12–32 for a detailed description of the prescribed sacrifices. 7: Note the echoes of Solomon’s practices: 1 Kings 5.15–32; 2 Chron. 2.2–4.22.

3.8–9: Reappointing priests and Levites to conduct the service in the house of God. 8: Age of twenty: This age limit also appears in the divisions of the Levites in 1 Chron. 23.24, 27.

month they began to make burnt offerings to the LORD, though the foundation of the Temple of the LORD had not been laid. ⁷They paid the hewers and craftsmen with money, and the Sidonians and Tyrians with food, drink, and oil to bring cedarwood from Lebanon by sea to Joppa, in accord with the authorization granted them by King Cyrus of Persia.

⁸In the second year after their arrival at the House of God, at Jerusalem, in the second month, Zerubbabel son of Shealtiel and Jeshua son of Jozadak, and the rest of their brother priests and Levites, and all who had come from the captivity to Jerusalem, as their first step appointed Levites from the age of twenty and upward to supervise the work of the House of the LORD. ⁹Jeshua, his sons and brothers, Kadmiel and his sons, ^a“the sons of Judah,” together were appointed in charge of those who did the work in the House of God; also the sons of Henadad, their sons and brother Levites.

¹⁰When the builders had laid the foundation of the Temple of the LORD, priests in their vestments with trumpets, and Levites sons of Asaph with cymbals were stationed to give praise to the LORD, as King David of Israel had ordained. ¹¹They sang songs extolling and praising the LORD, ^b“For He is good, His steadfast love for Israel is eternal.” ^bAll the people raised a great shout extolling the LORD because the foundation of the House of the LORD had been laid. ¹²Many of the priests and Levites and the chiefs of the clans, the old men who had seen the first house, wept loudly at the sight of the founding of this house. Many others shouted joyously at the top of their voices. ¹³The people could not distinguish the shouts of joy from the people’s weeping, for the people raised a great shout, the sound of which could be heard from afar.

4 When the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin heard that the returned exiles were building a temple to the LORD God of Israel, ²they approached Zerubbabel and the chiefs of the clans and said to them, “Let us build with you, since we too worship your God, having offered sacrifices to Him since the time of King Esarhaddon of Assyria, who brought us here.” ³Zerubbabel, Jeshua, and the rest of the chiefs of the clans of Israel answered them, “It is not for you and us to build a House to our God, but we alone will build it to the LORD God of Israel, in accord with the charge that the king, King Cyrus of Persia, laid upon us.” ⁴Thereupon the people of the land undermined the re-

3.10–13: Laying the foundations for the Temple and the dedication. 10: As King David of Israel had ordained: David’s authority with respect to Temple sacrifice and practice is also invoked, e.g., in 1 Chron. 6.31; 15.1–24; 16.4–42; 25.1; 2 Chron. 29.25, 30; 35.4; Neh. 12.45. 11: They sang songs extolling and praising the LORD, “For He is good, His steadfast love . . . is eternal”: This phrase, found in several psalms (106.1; 107.1; 118.1, 29; 136.1) became particularly prominent in Second Temple liturgy (see 1 Chron. 16.34; 2 Chron. 5.13; 7.3). 12–13: Although continuity with preexilic practices is emphasized, the loss of the First Temple and its glory is still mourned. Compare the returnees’ response to the dedication of the walls in Neh. 12.43. Josephus emphasizes the irrevocable loss of the First Temple by interpreting the v. to mean that the sound of the elders and priests wailing was louder than the sound of joy and trumpets (Ant. 11.4.2). Similarly, the Rabbis interpret these vv. to suggest that the majority of the returnees could recall the First Temple and its glory.

4.1–5: Building is interrupted during the reign of Cyrus.

1: Adversaries of Judah and Benjamin: The adversaries are presumably the same peoples of the land who are harassing and intimidating the returnees. See 3.3. 2: King Esarhaddon of Assyria (681–669 BCE): This seems to reflect the resettlement of people from elsewhere in the Assyrian empire by Esarhaddon, after the exile of the Northern Kingdom of Israel to the Assyrian empire in 722, when Shalmaneser V was king. In subsequent Assyrian campaigns, foreign nations were resettled in northern Israel by Esarhaddon and later by Osnappar (see 4.10 n.). Cf. 2 Kings 17.6, 24–44. 3: In accord with the charge that the king, King Cyrus of Persia: The returnees use the decree of Cyrus in their struggle to preserve control over the rebuilding of the Temple and the wall, over the ritual practices, and over a-a I.e., Hodaviah of 2.40. b-b Cf. Pss. 106.1; 136.

solve of the people of Judah, and made them afraid to build. ⁵They bribed ministers in order to thwart their plans all the years of King Cyrus of Persia and until the reign of King Darius of Persia.

⁶And in the reign of Ahasuerus, at the start of his reign, they drew up an accusation against the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem.

⁷And in the time of Artaxerxes, Bishlam, Mithredath, Tabeel, and the rest of their colleagues wrote to King Artaxerxes of Persia, a letter written in Aramaic and translated.^a Aramaic:^b ⁸Rehum the commissioner and Shimshai the scribe wrote a letter concerning Jerusalem to King Artaxerxes as follows: (⁹Then Rehum the commissioner and Shimshai the scribe, and the rest of their colleagues, the judges, officials, officers, and overseers, the men of Erech, and of Babylon, and of Susa—that is the Elamites—¹⁰and other peoples whom the great and glorious Osnappar deported and settled in the city of Samaria and the rest of the province Beyond the River [wrote]—and now ¹¹this is the text of the letter which they sent to him:—“To King Artaxerxes [from] your servants, men of the province Beyond the River. And now ¹²be it known to the king that the Jews who came up from you to us have reached Jerusalem and are rebuilding that rebellious and wicked city; they are completing the walls and repairing the foundation. ¹³Now be it known to the king that if this city is rebuilt and the walls completed, they will not pay tribute, poll-tax, or land-tax, and in the end it will harm the kingdom. ¹⁴Now since we eat the salt of the palace, and it is not right that we should see the king dishonored, we have written to advise the king [of this] ¹⁵so that you may search the records of your fathers and find in the records and know that this city is a rebellious city, harmful to kings and states. Sedition has been rife in it from early times; on that account this city was destroyed. ¹⁶We advise the king that if this city is rebuilt and its walls are completed, you will no longer have any portion in the province Beyond the River.”

¹⁷The king sent back the following message: “To Rehum the commissioner and Shimshai the scribe, and the rest of their colleagues, who dwell in Samaria and in the rest of the province of Beyond the River, greetings.

the genealogical purity of the reconstituted community in Judah. Josephus explains that only the returnees, namely the Jews, were permitted to participate in the rebuilding of the Temple, while the local peoples were told that they were permitted to worship at the Temple once it was completed (Ant. 11.4.3). Rabbinic interpretations justify the exclusion of the local peoples by claiming either that they were not descendants of Israel but Cutheans (Pirqe R. El. 38), or that they were idol worshippers (b. 'Arak. 5b) and therefore prohibited from involvement in the rebuilding and rededication of the Temple.

4.6–24: Opposition to building during the reigns of Xerxes and Artaxerxes. The narrative shifts forward in time, giving a more extensive account of the complaints raised by local peoples against the recent returnees. The letter recorded here is dated to the period after Darius I (522–486 BCE), prior to Ezra’s mission. The section in 4.8–6.18, incorporating several official Aramaic documents, is in Aramaic, the lingua franca of this period. 6: In the reign of Ahasuerus: This is apparently Xerxes (486–465), who ruled over Persia after Darius I. Rabbinic interpretations identify Artaxerxes with the Persian king in the book of Esther. 10: The name Osnappar does not occur in the Assyrian chronicles, and is most likely a corruption of the name of the Assyrian king, Assurbanipal (669–627), who immediately succeeded Esarhaddon (681–669). Beyond the River: This large Persian province was west of the Euphrates River and extended as far as Egypt (including Judah). 11: King Artaxerxes: This is Artaxerxes I Longimanus (Long Hand), who ruled 465–424. 14: We eat the salt of the palace, an expression signifying the common interests of loyal allies. Apparently an oath was taken and solemnized through participation in a common meal. 15: Search the records of your fathers: The book relies heavily on official documents. Artaa Cf. below v. 18 and note d.

b A note indicating that what follows is in the Aramaic language.

c Vv. 9–11 amplify v. 8.

¹⁸ Now the letter that you wrote me has been read to me in translation.^a ¹⁹ At my order a search has been made, and it has been found that this city has from earliest times risen against kings, and that rebellion and sedition have been rife in it. ²⁰ Powerful kings have ruled over Jerusalem and exercised authority over the whole province of Beyond the River, and tribute, poll-tax, and land-tax were paid to them. ²¹ Now issue an order to stop these men; this city is not to be rebuilt until I so order. ²² Take care not to be lax in this matter or there will be much damage and harm to the kingdom."

²³ When the text of the letter of King Artaxerxes was read before Rehum and Shimshai the scribe and their colleagues, they hurried to Jerusalem, to the Jews, and stopped them by main force. ²⁴ At that time, work on the House of God in Jerusalem stopped and remained in abeyance until the second year of the reign of King Darius of Persia.

5 Then the prophets, Haggai the prophet and Zechariah son of Iddo, prophesied to the Jews in Judah and Jerusalem, ^b inspired by the God of Israel.^b ² Thereupon Zerubbabel son of Shealtiel and Jeshua son of Jozadak began rebuilding the House of God in Jerusalem, with the full support of the prophets of God. ³ At once Tattenai, governor of the province of Beyond the River, Shethar-bozenai, and their colleagues descended upon them and said this to them, "Who issued orders to you to rebuild this house and complete its furnishing?" ⁴ Then we^c said to them, "What are the names of the men who are engaged in the building?" ⁵ But God watched over the elders of the Jews and they were not stopped while a report went to Darius and a letter was sent back in reply to it.

⁶ This is the text of the letter that Tattenai, governor of the province of Beyond the River, and Shethar-bozenai and his colleagues, the officials of Beyond the River, sent to King Darius. ⁷ They sent a message to him and this is what was written in it: "To King Darius, greetings, and so forth. ⁸ Be it known to the king, that we went to the province of Judah, a I.e., from Aramaic to Persian.

b-b Lit. "with the name of the God of Israel upon them."

c The officials of v. 3; cf. v. 10. Greek and Syriac read "they."

xerxes (465–424) is asked to consult the Babylonian and Assyrian chronicles for records of the rebellions and eventual exiles of both the Northern Kingdom of Israel and the Southern Kingdom of Judah. He is asked, in particular, for records of the Judean rebellions against Babylonia and Nebuchadnezzar's eventual destruction of Jerusalem. 16: This is the crux of their argument: The province of Yehud will rebel, trying to assert its independence, and others will follow suit. 17–22: In rabbinic traditions both Darius I and Artaxerxes are identified with Cyrus (see 6.14 n.). Cyrus is therefore regarded as retracting the permission to rebuild the Temple which he had previously granted, hence losing his wisdom and becoming a fool (Eccl. Rab. 10.1). 23: Stopped them by main force: Neh. 1.3 suggests that the objectors not only prevented further rebuilding, but also destroyed what had already been built. 24: The second year of the reign of King Darius of Persia: Here Ezra-Nehemiah resumes the narrative of 4.5, returning to the resumption of building in the time of Darius.

5.1–2: Under Darius's reign the rebuilding of the Temple resumes and is completed. 2: With the full support of the prophets of God:

The rebuilding of the Temple by Zerubbabel and Jeshua is connected to the divine prophecy received by Haggai and Zechariah, which is preserved in the books by those names.

5.3–17: Tattenai writes to Darius and questions the authenticity of the returnees' claim. 3: Tattenai: During the reign of Darius, Tattenai is the governor of the province Beyond the River. As is clear from 6.13, Tattenai adheres to the ruling of Darius and does not interfere with the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple. Shethar-bozenai: This name always appears just after Tattenai. Some scholars suggest that this is an official title of Tattenai; others suggest that it was the name of Tattenai's official scribe. 6: King Darius: Darius I ruled the Persian empire 522–486 BCE. He is highly regarded for extending Cyrus's generous policy toward non-Persian peoples. 8–11: The great king of v. 11 is Solomon. God of heaven and earth, a very universalistic expression, appropriate when identifying God to non-Judeans. The narrative of Ezra recalls the building of the first, pre-exilic Temple in order to authorize to the house of the great God. It is being rebuilt of hewn stone, and wood is being laid in the walls. The work is being done with dispatch and is going well. ⁹Thereupon we directed this question to these elders, 'Who issued orders to you to rebuild this house and to complete its furnishings?' ¹⁰We also asked their names so that we could write down the names of their leaders for your information. ¹¹This is what they answered us: 'We are the servants of the God of heaven and earth; we are rebuilding the house that was originally built many years ago; a great king of Israel built it and completed it. ¹²But because our fathers angered the God of Heaven, He handed them over to Nebuchadnezzar the Chaldean, king of Babylon, who demolished this house and exiled the people to Babylon. ¹³But in the first year of King Cyrus of Babylon, King Cyrus issued an order to rebuild this House of God. ¹⁴Also the silver and gold vessels of the House of God that Nebuchadnezzar had taken away from the temple in Jerusalem and brought to the temple in Babylon—King Cyrus released them from the temple in Babylon to be given to the one called Sheshbazzar whom he had appointed governor. ¹⁵He said to him, "Take these vessels, go, deposit them in the temple in Jerusalem, and let the House of God be rebuilt on its original site." ¹⁶That same Sheshbazzar then came and laid the foundations for the House of God in Jerusalem; and ever since then it has been under construction, but is not yet finished.' ¹⁷And now, if it please the king, let the royal archives there in Babylon be searched to see whether indeed an order had been issued by King Cyrus to rebuild this House of God in Jerusalem. May the king convey to us his pleasure in this matter."

6 Thereupon, at the order of King Darius, they searched the archives where the treasures were stored in Babylon. ²But it was in the citadel of Ecbatana, in the province of Media, that a scroll was found in which the following was written: "Memorandum: ³In the first year of King Cyrus, King Cyrus issued an order concerning the House of God in Jerusalem: 'Let the house be rebuilt, a place for offering sacrifices, with a base built up high. Let it be sixty cubits high and sixty cubits wide, ⁴with a course of unused timber for each three courses of hewn stone. The expenses shall be paid by the palace. ⁵And the gold and silver vessels of the House of God which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away from the temple in Jerusalem and transported to Babylon shall be returned, and let each go back to the temple in Jerusalem where it belongs; you shall deposit it in the House of God.'

and justify the building of the Second Temple. 14: Sheshbazzar is the first governor of Judah under Cyrus. His appointment began at the time of Cyrus's decree in 538. See 3.1 n. 1 Esdras 6.18 inserts Zerubbabel in this v. as having received gifts along with Sheshbazzar.

6.1–5: Locating Cyrus's decree in the citadel of Ecbatana.

2: Citadel of Ecbatana, an important center for the Persian empire. Perhaps the phrase refers to the general area of Ecbatana (modern Hamadan) rather than a location within Ecbatana. The citadel of Ecbatana was a summer palace in the eastern part of the Persian empire. Although mentioned nowhere else in the Bible, Ecbatana is mentioned in three apocryphal traditions: 2 Macc. 9.3; Judith 1.1, 2, 14; and many times in Tobit. 4: The expenses shall be paid by the palace: In contrast, according to the Heb version in Ezra ch 1, the Temple is paid for by the Judean exiles, not by the Persian government. This is one of several discrepancies, sometimes irreconcilable, in Ezra-Nehemiah. These may reflect conflicting accounts or records.

6“Now^a you, Tattenai, governor of the province of Beyond the River, Shethar-bozenai and colleagues, the officials of the province of Beyond the River, stay away from that place. 7 Allow the work of this House of God to go on; let the governor of the Jews and the elders of the Jews rebuild this House of God on its site. 8 And I hereby issue an order concerning what you must do to help these elders of the Jews rebuild this House of God: the expenses are to be paid to these men with dispatch out of the resources of the king, derived from the taxes of the province of Beyond the River, so that the work not be stopped. 9 They are to be given daily, without fail, whatever they need of young bulls, rams, or lambs as burnt offerings for the God of Heaven, and wheat, salt, wine, and oil, at the order of the priests in Jerusalem, 10 so that they may offer pleasing sacrifices to the God of Heaven and pray for the life of the king and his sons. 11 I also issue an order that whoever alters this decree shall have a beam removed from his house, and he shall be impaled on it and his house confiscated.^b 12 And may the God who established His name there cause the downfall of any king or nation that undertakes to alter or damage that House of God in Jerusalem. I, Darius, have issued the decree; let it be carried out with dispatch.”

13 Then Tattenai, governor of the province of Beyond the River, Shethar-bozenai, and their colleagues carried out with dispatch what King Darius had written. 14 So the elders of the Jews progressed in the building, urged on by the prophesying of Haggai the prophet and Zechariah son of Iddo, and they brought the building to completion under the aegis of the God of Israel and by the order of Cyrus and Darius and King Artaxerxes of Persia. 15 The house was finished on the third of the month of Adar in the sixth year of the reign of King Darius. 16 The Israelites, the priests, and the Levites, and all the other exiles celebrated the dedication of the House of God with joy. 17 And they sacrificed for the dedication of this House of God one hundred bulls, two hundred rams, four hundred lambs, and twelve goats as a purification offering for all of Israel, according to the number of the tribes of Israel. 18 They appointed the priests in their courses and the Levites in their divisions for the service of God in Jerusalem, according to the prescription in the Book of Moses.

19^c The returned exiles celebrated the Passover on the fourteenth day of the first month, 20 for the priests and Le-

^a This introduces the text of the reply of Darius that doubtless contained the preceding narrative (vv. 1–5) as a preliminary.

^b Meaning uncertain; or “turned into ruins.” ^c Hebrew resumes here.

6.6–12: Response of Darius.

Darius’s reply to Tattenai seems not to reflect an actual historical event, but rather to be an elaboration of Cyrus’s decree of 538 BCE.

6.13–18: Completion of the Temple and its dedication. 14: By the order of Cyrus and Darius and King Artaxerxes of Persia: Rabbinic interpretations suggest that these three names refer to the very same king of Persia. This leads to a significant misrepresentation of Persian chronology in rabbinic traditions (Seder Olam R. 30; b. Rosh Hash. 3b). 15: The house was finished on the third of the month of Adar: 1 Esdras 7.5 and Josephus Ant. 11.4.7 mention the 23rd of Adar as the day of completion. 18: They appointed the priests in their courses and the Levites in their divisions for the service of God in Jerusalem, according to the prescription in the Book of Moses:

The courses of priests and divisions of Levites are not mentioned in any preexilic or exilic tradition, suggesting that this is an attempt to legitimate a later institution by false connect to the Torah. In 2 Chron. 35.4–5 the organization of the priests is also said to be preexilic, but is attributed to David and Solomon, not to Moses.

6.19–22: Celebration of the festival of Passover. The text returns to Heb from 6.19 through 7.11. In Josh. 5.10 the Israelites were able to offer the Passover sacrifice following their circumcision. Here too, purification is followed by the Passover sacrifice. Priestly texts in particular, which became particularly authoritative in this period, suggest the importance of eating the Passover offering in a state of ritual purity (Num. 9.6–13).

vites had purified themselves to a man; they were all pure. They slaughtered the passover offering for all the returned exiles, and for their brother priests and for themselves.²¹ The children of Israel who had returned from the exile, together with all who joined them in separating themselves from the uncleanness of the nations of the lands to worship the LORD God of Israel, ate of it.²² They joyfully celebrated the Feast of Unleavened Bread for seven days, for the LORD had given them cause for joy by inclining the heart of the Assyrian king toward them so as to give them support in the work of the House of God, the God of Israel.

7 After these events, during the reign of King Artaxerxes of Persia, Ezra son of Seraiah son of Azariah son of Hilkiah² son of Shallum son of Zadok son of Ahitub³ son of Amariah son of Azariah son of Meraioth⁴ son of Zerariah son of Uzzi son of Bukki⁵ son of Abishua son of Phinehas son of Eleazar son of Aaron the chief priest—⁶ that Ezra came up from Babylon, a scribe expert in the Teaching of Moses which the LORD God of Israel had given, whose request the king had granted in its entirety, thanks to the benevolence of the LORD toward him.

(⁷Some of the Israelites, the priests and Levites, the singers, the gatekeepers, and the temple servants set out for Jerusalem in the seventh year of King Artaxerxes,⁸ arriving in Jerusalem in the fifth month in the seventh year of the king.)⁹ On the first day of the first month the journey up from Babylon was started, and on the first day of the fifth month he arrived in Jerusalem, thanks to the benevolent care of his God for him.¹⁰ For Ezra had dedicated himself to study the Teaching of the LORD so as to observe it, and to teach laws and rules to Israel.

¹¹ The following is the text of the letter which King Artaxerxes gave Ezra the priest-scribe, a scholar in matters

21: On the Passover celebration, cf. Exod. 12.16–51; Lev. 23.4–8; Num. 28.16–25; Deut. 16.1–8. As in some of these texts, the practice here reflects a one-day Passover celebration, followed by a seven-day “Matzot” (unleavened bread) festival (see esp. Lev. 23.5–8). 22: They joyfully celebrated the Feast of Unleavened Bread: Compare this to 2 Chron. 30.21, describing Hezekiah’s Passover, and 2 Chron. 35.17, describing Josiah’s Passover—the continuity between First and Second Temple practice is again emphasized. The LORD had given them cause for joy by inclining the heart of the Assyrian king toward them: Just as Cyrus is said in Ezra 1.1 to be inspired by the LORD, so is Darius’s decree said to be under divine influence. Josephus refers to the “Persian king,” not to the Assyrian king, in his retelling of the Ezra narrative (Ant. 11.4.8). Perhaps the reference to Assyria here alludes to the continuity between the Assyrian empire which destroyed the Northern Kingdom (722 BCE), the Babylonian empire which destroyed the Southern Kingdom (586), and the Persian empire which now fulfills the divine promise of restoration.

7.1–10: Ezra joins the Jerusalem returnees. The introduction to Ezra’s mission illustrates what was considered necessary to preserve and perpetuate the newly reconstituted Jerusalem community. The information that is included is intended to demonstrate that Ezra possessed the required authority and sufficient preparation for the job. First, Ezra is included in the Aaronide line of priests and is therefore a priest with the highest pedigree, authorized to conduct Temple sacrifice and ritual, perhaps even a high priest himself. (It is odd, however, that Ezra is never included in any of the high priestly lineages.) Second, Ezra is a scribe who is an expert in the Teaching of Moses. He therefore provides an authoritative link to the returnees’ preexilic past. Third, Ezra is said to have dedicated himself to study the Teaching of the LORD. Thus, Ezra is prepared for the task of interpreting, explaining, and applying the ancient law to a new context in which Israel is ruled, not by a Davidic monarch, but by a Persian king. Finally, Ezra is said to be in the favor of the LORD (v. 6) and of God (v. 9). Ezra continues to be celebrated in later Jewish traditions, and is often compared to Ezekiel and Moses. See, for example, t. Sanh. 4.4: “Ezra was sufficiently worthy that the Torah could have been given through him if Moses had not preceded him.” 1–5: Ezra’s lineage establishes authentic priestly credentials. The Rabbis write that if Aaron had been living during the time of Ezra, he would have been considered inferior to Ezra (Eccl. Rab. 1.4). 6: Ezra will assume the position of instructor of the people in the Teaching of Moses; thus it is very important to establish his reliability as a scribe and knowledge of the text itself (see v. 10) early in Ezra’s memoir (Ezra chs 7–10). Came up: Rabbinic interpretation makes an analogy between Moses concerning the commandments of the LORD and His laws to Israel:

¹²“Artaxerxes king of kings, to Ezra the priest, scholar in the law of the God of heaven, ^band so forth.^b And now, ¹³I hereby issue an order that anyone in my kingdom who is of the people of Israel and its priests and Levites who feels impelled to go to Jerusalem may go with you. ¹⁴For you are commissioned by the king and his seven advisers to regulate Judah and Jerusalem according to the law of your God, which is in your care, ¹⁵and to bring the freewill offering of silver and gold, which the king and his advisers made to the God of Israel, whose dwelling is in Jerusalem, ¹⁶and whatever silver and gold that you find throughout the province of Babylon, together with the freewill offerings that the people and the priests will give for the House of their God, which is in Jerusalem. ¹⁷You shall, therefore, with dispatch acquire with this money bulls, rams, and lambs, with their meal offerings and libations, and offer them on the altar of the House of your God in Jerusalem. ¹⁸And whatever you wish to do with the leftover silver and gold, you and your kinsmen may do, in accord with the will of your God. ¹⁹The vessels for the service of the House of your God that are given to you, deliver to God in Jerusalem, ²⁰and any other needs of the House of your God that it falls to you to supply, do so from the royal treasury. ²¹I, King Artaxerxes, for my part, hereby issue an order to all the treasurers in the province of Beyond the River that whatever request Ezra the priest, scholar in the law of the God of Heaven, makes of you is to be fulfilled with dispatch ²²up to the sum of one hundred talents of silver, one hundred kor of wheat, one hundred bath of wine, one hundred bath of oil, and salt without limit. ²³Whatever is by order of the God of Heaven must be carried out diligently for the House of the God of Heaven, else wrath will come upon the king and his sons. ²⁴We further advise you that it is not permissible to impose tribute, poll tax, or land tax on any priest, Levite, singer, gatekeeper, temple servant, or other servant of this House of God. ²⁵And you, Ezra, by the divine wisdom you possess, appoint magistrates and judges to judge all the people in the province of Beyond the River who know the laws of your God, and to teach those who do not know them. ²⁶Let anyone who does not obey the law of your God and the law of the king be punished with dispatch, whether by death, corporal punishment, confiscation of possessions, or imprisonment.”

and Ezra and states that just as Moses went up to Sinai to receive the Torah, so too Ezra went up to Jerusalem to receive the Torah (b. Sanh. 21b). A scribe expert in the Teaching of Moses: Some rabbinic traditions attribute the special markings over selected words in the Bible to the hand of Ezra, who, as the expert scribe, was privy to secret interpretive traditions concerning Mosaic Torah (Num. Rab. 3.13). 7-8: The seventh year of Artaxerxes I Longimanus is 458 BCE. 9: Ezra is perhaps alluding to the exodus from Egypt, which also occurred in the first month of the year. If so, as in Deutero-Isaiah (e.g., Isa. 52.12), the return of the Babylonian exiles is implicitly connected to the Israelites' original journey to the promised land after their enslavement and years of wandering in the desert. In addition, the celebration of the first and subsequent Passovers also occurred in the first month (Exod. 12.2; Num. 33.3). 10: The language in this passage is highly influenced by Deuteronomy; cf., e.g., Deut. 4.14. Ezra is here envisioned as a lawgiver like Moses, who will provide the people with the law along with its “correct” interpretation. According to the Rabbis, Ezra restored the Torah to the Assyrian script (the Hebrew letters in their current form, not their older, paleo-Heb form) in which it was originally given to Moses (b. Sanh. 21b).

7.11-26: Artaxerxes' letter commissioning Ezra's mission. 12-26: The narrative at this point is written in Aramaic and purports to preserve the correspondence between the Persian kings and their officials in Judah. 26: The law of the king, imperial law of Persia, which all Persian subjects must obey. The Persian legal system permitted the observance of both local law (here called “the law of your God”) and imperial law.

^a Aramaic resumes here through v. 26. ^{b-b} Meaning uncertain.

²⁷*Blessed is the LORD God of our fathers, who put it into the mind of the king to glorify the House of the LORD in Jerusalem, ²⁸and who inclined the king and his counselors and the king's military officers to be favorably disposed toward me. For my part, thanks to the care of the LORD for me, I summoned up courage and assembled leading men in Israel to go with me.

8 These are the chiefs of the clans and the register of the genealogy of those who came up with me from Babylon in the reign of King Artaxerxes: ²Of the sons of Phinehas, Gershom; of the sons of Ithamar, Daniel; of the sons of David, Hattush. ³Of the sons of Shecaniah: of the sons of Parosh, Zechariah; through him the genealogy of 150 males was registered. ⁴Eliehoenai son of Zerariah, of the sons of Pahath-moab, and with him 200 males. ⁵Of the sons of Shecaniah son of Jahaziel; and with him 300 males. ⁶And of the sons of Adin, Ebed son of Jonathan; and with him 50 males. ⁷And of the sons of Elam, Jeshaiiah son of Athaliah; and with him 70 males. ⁸And of the sons of Shephatiah, Zebadiah son of Michael; and with him 80 males. ⁹Of the sons of Joab, Obadiah son of Jehiel; and with him 218 males. ¹⁰And of the sons of Shelomith, the son of Josiphiah; and with him 160 males. ¹¹And of the sons of Bebai, Zechariah son of Bebai; and with him 28 males. ¹²And of the sons of Azgad, Johanan son of Hakkatan; and with him 110 males. ¹³And of the sons of Adonikam, who were the last; and these are their names: Eliphelet, Jeiel, and Shemaiah; and with them 60 males. ¹⁴And of the sons of Bigvai, Uthai and Zaccur; and with them 70 males.

¹⁵These I assembled by the river that enters Ahava, and we encamped there for three days. I reviewed the people and the priests, but I did not find any Levites there. ¹⁶I sent for Eliezer, Ariel, Shemaiah, Elnathan, Jarib, Elnathan, Nathan, Zechariah, and Meshullam, the leading men, and also for Joiarib and Elnathan, the instructors, ¹⁷and I gave them an order for Iddo, the leader at the place [called] Casiphia. I gave them a message to convey to Iddo [and] his brother, temple-servants at the place [called] Casiphia, that they should bring us attendants for the House of our God. ¹⁸Thanks to the benevolent care of our God for us, they brought us a capable man of the family of Mahli son of Levi son of Israel, and Sherebiah and his sons and brothers, ¹⁸ in all, ¹⁹and Hashabiah, and with him Jeshaiiah of the family of Merari, his brothers

7.27–28: Ezra's prayer. 28: Ezra regards the gathering of some of Israel's leaders to return to Israel as partial fulfillment of the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah.

8.1–14: Returnees who accompanied Ezra on his mission to Jerusalem. Josephus maintains that the ten tribes (apart from Judah and Benjamin) are still living beyond the Euphrates and did not return with Ezra (Ant. 11.5.2). While by this time, these tribes had assimilated due to the Assyrian policy of forced population exchanges, the tradition of their continued existence is found in, for instance, Tobit. 2: Emphasis is placed on genealogical connections to the priesthood and to the Davidic line. These links are necessary if the preexilic and exilic Israelite prophecies of return are to be fulfilled. (See, e.g., Ezek. 37.24–28.) Moreover, authentic genealogies provide the returnees with the authority to oversee Temple ritual and to legislate to the people.

8.15–20: Ezra's examination and instruction of those who accompanied him. Ezra must check the genealogical links of those who accompany him, because of the importance of authentic lineage. These examinations also prepare the reader for the long discussion concerning the intermarriage crisis in chs 9 and 10. The crisis in finding Levites may be because they had a subsidiary role to the priests in the Temple service, and preferred to remain in Babylonia, without these Temple responsibilities. 15: These I assembled: The narrative resumes here from 7.28. To emphasize this resumption, Ezra uses the very same verb, "to assemble," used at the conclusion of the prayer in 7.28. Ahava: The precise location of this river (or, perhaps, town) is not known. It may have been one of Babylonia's waterways, and it appears to be located on the route of Ezra's return to Judah. 1 Esdras 8.41 and 61 mention the river "Thares" instead of the river Ahava. 17: Casiphia: This place-name occurs only a Hebrew resumes here.

and their sons, 20 in all; ²⁰and of the temple servants whom David and the officers had appointed for the service of the Levites—220 temple servants, all of them listed by name.

²¹I proclaimed a fast there by the Ahava River to afflict ourselves before our God to beseech Him for a smooth journey for us and for our children and for all our possessions; ²²for I was ashamed to ask the king for soldiers and horsemen to protect us against any enemy on the way, since we had told the king, “The benevolent care of our God is for all who seek Him, while His fierce anger is against all who forsake Him.” ²³So we fasted and besought our God for this, and He responded to our plea. ²⁴Then I selected twelve of the chiefs of the priests, namely Sherebiah and Hashabiah with ten of their brothers, ²⁵and I weighed out to them the silver, the gold, and the vessels, the contribution to the House of our God which the king, his counselors and officers, and all Israel who were present had made. ²⁶I entrusted to their safekeeping the weight of six hundred and fifty talents of silver, one hundred silver vessels of one talent each, one hundred talents of gold; ²⁷also, twenty gold bowls worth one thousand darics and two vessels of good, shining bronze, as precious as gold. ²⁸I said to them, “You are consecrated to the LORD, and the vessels are consecrated, and the silver and gold are a freewill offering to the LORD God of your fathers. ²⁹Guard them diligently until such time as you weigh them out in the presence of the officers of the priests and the Levites and the officers of the clans of Israel in Jerusalem in the chambers of the House of the LORD.”

³⁰So the priests and the Levites received the cargo of silver and gold and vessels by weight, to bring them to Jerusalem to the House of our God. ³¹We set out for Jerusalem from the Ahava River on the twelfth of the first month. We enjoyed the care of our God, who saved us from enemy ambush on the journey.

³²We arrived in Jerusalem and stayed there three days. ³³On the fourth day the silver, gold, and vessels were here. Since Ezra calls it the place, an expression used for places of Jewish worship in, e.g., Gen. 28.17; Deut. 12.5; 1 Kings 8.29, it may have been a religious center for Babylonians. Some scholars suggest that “Casiphia” may be related to “kesef,” the Heb word for silver, and that the place may have been associated with silver production. 18–19: Mahli son of

Levi: Mahli was one of Merari’s children (Num. 3.20). Sherebiah, Hashabiah, Jeshtaiah are all from the line of Merari, one of the three sons of Levi (Num. 3.14, 20), to whom was assigned the responsibility for carrying the Tabernacle and related objects (Num. 4.29–33). 20: David and the officers had appointed for the service of the Levites: Ezra’s mission will reinstitute preexilic Davidic and priestly authority.

8.21–23: Ezra proclaims a fast. Though he is designated by the king, Ezra, a religious functionary, is fearful; contrast Nehemiah, appointed as governor, in Neh. 2.7–9. 21: I proclaimed a fast: In the Second Temple period, fasting becomes a particularly important rite, and is generally accompanied by prayer and confession (see Zech. 7.1–7; 8.18–19; Esth. 4.15–16; Dan. 9.3–4; Neh. 9.1). A smooth journey: The phrase “derekh yesharah” appears in a number of exilic texts prophesying the return to Judah (see, e.g., Jer. 31.9; Isaiah 40.3).

8.24–30: Ezra appoints the priests and entrusts them with the Temple vessels. 28: “You are consecrated to the LORD, and the vessels are consecrated”: Here the Heb word “kadosh” signifies separation, distinction, and chosenness. The assertion that you are consecrated to the LORD recalls assertions of the consecrated status of the people throughout the Priestly narratives in the Torah. At the same time, the assertion that the vessels are consecrated serves as a warning that with consecrated status comes the responsibility to care for the Temple vessels and to ensure that they are not removed from their sacred place.

8.31–36: Ezra and returnees travel to Jerusalem. 32: The arrival occurred on the first day of the fifth month, Av, according to 7.8–9. Since, according to 2 Kings 25.8, it was in the fifth month that the first Temple was destroyed (see also Zech. 7.3), the occurrence of the return in Av may be therapeutic. This is also a solemn time for the returnees as they recall the lost glories of their past (cf. 3.12). In later Jewish traditions, the 9th of Av is the day when the Jewish community mourns the destruction of both the First and Second Temples. And stayed there three days: In Gen. Rab. 56.1, the Rabbis connect Ezra’s third day to the weighed out in the House of our God into the keeping of Meremoth son of Uriah the priest, with whom was Eleazar son of Phinehas. Jozabad son of Jeshua, and Noadiah son of Binnui, the Levites, were with them. ³⁴ Everything accorded as to number and weight, the entire cargo being recorded at that time.

³⁵ The returning exiles who arrived from captivity made burnt offerings to the God of Israel: twelve bulls for all Israel, ninety-six rams, seventy-seven lambs and twelve he-goats as a purification offering, all this a burnt offering to the LORD. ³⁶ They handed the royal orders to the king's satraps and the governors of the province of Beyond the River who gave support to the people and the House of God.

9 When this was over, the officers approached me, saying, "The people of Israel and the priests and Levites have not separated themselves from the peoples of the land whose abhorrent practices are like those of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Jebusites, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Egyptians, and the Amorites. ² They have taken their daughters as wives for themselves and for their sons, so that the holy seed has become intermingled with the peoples of the land; and it is the officers and prefects who have taken the lead in this trespass."

³ When I heard this, I rent my garment and robe, I tore hair out of my head and beard, and I sat desolate. ⁴ Around me gathered all who were concerned over the words of the God of Israel because of the returning exiles' trespass, while I sat desolate until the evening offering. ⁵ At the time of the evening offering I ended my self-affliction; still in my torn garment and robe, I got down on my knees and spread out my hands to the LORD my God, ⁶ and said, "O my God, I am too ashamed and mortified to lift my face to You, O my God, for our iniquities ^a are overwhelming^a and our guilt has grown high as heaven. ⁷ From the time of our fathers to this very day we have been deep in guilt. Because of our iniquities, we, our third day of Abraham's final trial at the binding of Isaac, on which Abraham received divine revelation. Cf. Exod. 19.16. Three days, used frequently in the Bible, may simply signify a short time. 35: The Rabbis are puzzled by the fact that the returnees, who were considered to have sinned willfully, were permitted to offer sacrifices. This is said to be a legal exception to the rule that would ordinarily allow only those who had sinned inadvertently to offer a sacrifice of atonement (b. Hor.; b. Tem. 15b).

a-a Lit. "are numerous above the head."

9.1–2: Inter-marriage crisis. According to rabbinic tradition (e.g., Num. Rab. 19.3; Eccl. Rab. 7.23, section 4) and many modern scholars, the prohibition of inter-marriage is rooted in Deut. 7.3: "Do not give your daughters to their sons or take their daughters for your sons." However, Ezra insists on two points that are not explicit in any earlier text. First, inter-marriage with any non-Israelite people is prohibited, not only inter-marriage with the Canaanite nations referred to in Deuteronomy (see also Deut. 20.16–18). Second, if one has intermarried, one must divorce one's foreign wife and expel any children resulting from the prohibited marriage. When Ezra says that the prohibition—including the aforementioned two points—is from the Teaching ("torah") and the commandment of our God (10.3), he seems to presuppose that Mosaic authority should be ascribed not only to the law explicitly stated in Deut. 7.3, but also to its interpretation or elaboration. This is similar to 1 Kings 11.1–2, an exilic text which suggests that Solomon's marriage to various foreign wives is a violation of Torah law. In b. Meg. 15a, Ezra is identified with the prophet Malachi because of the reference to a prohibition against inter-marriage in Mal. 2.11. 1: 1 Esdras 8.69 mentions the Edomites but does not mention the Ammonites or the Amorites. 2: It is the officers and prefects who have taken the lead in this trespass: For a list of the transgressors, see the conclusion of Ezra (10.18–44). Even the priest, Jeshua, is included in the list of offenders (10.18). Though other biblical texts prohibit inter-marriage to varying extents, nowhere else is it described in such highly charged theological language: the holy seed has become intermingled with the peoples of the land. This may be a reference to Isa. 6.13, which suggests that the exile will purify "the holy seed," making them unsuitable for mixture with anyone else, likely including those of Judean descent who did not experience the purifying power of the exile.

kings, and our priests have been handed over to foreign kings, to the sword, to captivity, to pillage, and to humiliation, as is now the case.

⁸“But now, for a short while, there has been a reprieve from the LORD our God, who has granted us a surviving remnant and given us a stake in His holy place; our God has restored the luster to our eyes and furnished us with a little sustenance in our bondage. ⁹For bondsmen we are, though even in our bondage God has not forsaken us, but has disposed the king of Persia favorably toward us, to furnish us with sustenance and to raise again the House of our God, repairing its ruins and giving us a hold^a in Judah and Jerusalem.

¹⁰“Now, what can we say in the face of this, O our God, for we have forsaken Your commandments, ¹¹which You gave us through Your servants the prophets when You said, ‘The land that you are about to possess is a land unclean through the uncleanness of the peoples of the land, through their abhorrent practices with which they, in their impurity, have filled it from one end to the other. ¹²Now then, do not give your daughters in marriage to their sons or let their daughters marry your sons; do nothing for their well-being or advantage, then you will be strong and enjoy the bounty of the land and bequeath it to your children forever.’ ¹³After all that has happened to us because of our evil deeds and our deep guilt—though You, our God, have been forbearing, [punishing us] less than our iniquity [deserves] in that You have granted us such a remnant as this—¹⁴shall we once again violate Your commandments by intermarrying with these peoples who follow such abhorrent practices? Will You not rage against us till we are destroyed without remnant or survivor? ¹⁵O LORD, God of Israel, You are benevolent,^b for we have survived as a remnant, as is now the case. We stand before You in all our guilt, for we cannot face You on this account.”

10 While Ezra was praying and making confession, weeping and prostrating himself before the House of God, a very great crowd of Israelites gathered about him, men, women, and children; the people were weeping bitterly. ²Then Shecaniah son of Jehiel of the family of Elam spoke up and said to Ezra, “We have trespassed against our God by bringing into our homes foreign women from the peoples of the land; ^cbut there is still hope for Israel despite this.^c ³Now then, let us make a 9.3–15: Ezra’s public repentance and prayer. 3: Ezra’s behavior is similar to that of earlier Jewish leaders who tried to avert a national disaster. For example, Josiah tears his clothing upon hearing the reading of the discovered Torah scroll (2 Kings 22.11); Mordecai and Esther fast and engage in mourning practices (Esth. 4.1–3, 16); and Jehoshaphat proclaims a fast and prays for deliverance from Israel’s enemies (2 Chron. 20.1–13). Josephus states that Ezra and the returnees were concerned that God would punish them as He did in the past and therefore they fast and repent (Ant. 11.5.3). 5: Ezra takes the typical position of the praying individual in the Bible (see, e.g., 1 Kings 8.22, 38). 6–7: Cf. Daniel’s prayer (Dan. 9.4–19), where the exiles’ responsibility for the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple is fully accepted. In Ezra’s view, if the crisis of intermarriage is not averted, the returnees will risk losing Jerusalem, Judah, and the right to practice Temple ritual. These confessions of communal guilt typify postexilic liturgy. 12: The concern for intermarriage in terms of both genders is unusual in the Bible; most texts emphasize the danger of foreign wives rather than husbands.

10.1–4: Community repents and empowers Ezra to act on their behalf. See 9.1–2 n. 2: Shecaniah speaks in the first person plural. For this reason, he is listed in rabbinic traditions as one of several exemplary leaders who take responsibility for the sins of the community and are thereby able to take the lead in resolving a problem (b. Sanh. 11a). 3: The decision to expel all foreign wives and the children who were born to them is understood in rabbinic traditions to be the basis for the laws concerning matrilineal descent as a defining marker of Jewish identity (Gen. Rab. 7.2); biblical narratives suggest the priority of patrilineal descent in matters of genealogy and inheritance.

^a Lit. “fence.” ^b Or “in the right.” ^{c-c} Or “Is there . . . ?”

covenant with our God to expel all these women and those who have been born to them, in accordance with the bidding of the Lord and of all who are concerned over the commandment of our God, and let the Teaching be obeyed. ⁴Take action, for the responsibility is yours and we are with you. Act with resolve!”

⁵So Ezra at once put the officers of the priests and the Levites and all Israel under oath to act accordingly, and they took the oath. ⁶Then Ezra rose from his place in front of the House of God and went into the chamber of Jehohanan son of Eliashib; there, he ate no bread and drank no water, for he was in mourning over the trespass of those who had returned from exile. ⁷Then a proclamation was issued in Judah and Jerusalem that all who had returned from the exile should assemble in Jerusalem, ⁸and that anyone who did not come in three days would, by decision of the officers and elders, have his property confiscated and himself excluded from the congregation of the returning exiles.

⁹All the men of Judah and Benjamin assembled in Jerusalem in three days; it was the ninth month, the twentieth of the month. All the people sat in the square of the House of God, trembling on account of the event and because of the rains. ¹⁰Then Ezra the priest got up and said to them, “You have trespassed by bringing home foreign women, thus aggravating the guilt of Israel. ¹¹So now, make confession to the LORD, God of your fathers, and do His will, and separate yourselves from the peoples of the land and from the foreign women.”

¹²The entire congregation responded in a loud voice, “We must surely do just as you say. ¹³However, many people are involved, and it is the rainy season; it is not possible to remain out in the open, nor is this the work of a day or two, because we have transgressed extensively in this matter. ¹⁴Let our officers remain on behalf of the entire congregation, and all our townspeople who have brought home foreign women shall appear before them at scheduled times, together with the elders and judges of each town, in order to avert the burning anger of our God from us on this account.” ¹⁵Only Jonathan son of Asahel and Jahzeiah son of Tikvah remained for this purpose, assisted by Meshullam and Shabbethai, the Levites. ¹⁶The returning exiles did so. Ezra the priest and the men who were the chiefs of the ancestral clans—all listed by name—sequestered themselves on the first day of the tenth month to study the matter. ¹⁷By the first day of the first month they were done with all the men who had brought home foreign women. ¹⁸Among the priestly fam-

10.6–11: Ezra takes legal action to resolve the intermarriage crisis.

Ezra requires the leadership of the returning community to take an oath to act in accordance with the law. Perhaps this is necessary in light of the charges that are made against the community leaders in 9.2. 6: The sin is seen as so extreme that, like Moses after the construction of the golden calf, Ezra fasts completely (see Exod. 34.28; Deut. 9.18). 8: The Rabbis take this v. as a legal precedent for their power to expropriate when it is beneficial for the community (b. Git. 36b).

10.12–14: Community accepts Ezra’s legal action. This section of the narrative is deeply influenced by numerous Torah narratives involving the Israelites’ willingness to accept the authority of Moses and to agree to obey particular laws.

10.15–44: Determining which returnees intermarried. Though this list would seem to be an odd conclusion to a biblical book, it is quite suitable for the middle of the larger book Ezra-Nehemiah, especially since the theme of intermarriage will return in Nehemiah.

15: Jonathan son of Asahel, who is mentioned first, is said by the Rabbis to have carried out the work with a special zeal (Exod. Rab. 50.5). 16: To study the matter: This apparently refers to the study of existing legal traditions and to the interpretation emerging from that study. The v. recalls Ezra’s priestly lineage (7.1–5), perhaps to authorize Ezra as an interpreter. He has already been authorized by being described as a scribe (chs 7, 6, 11), as one who is well versed in biblical interpretation (7.10), and as a priest whose known lineage qualifies him to participate in Temple rituals. See 7.1–10 n. 18: Jeshua’s intermarriage implicates even the priestly leadership in the intermarriage crisis. In 1 Esdras 9.19 only the descendants of Jeshua are said to have foreign wives, not Jeshua himself. 44: Who had borne children, cf. 1 Esdras 9.36.

ilies who were found to have brought foreign women were Jeshua son of Jozadak and his brothers Maaseiah, Eliezer, Jarib, and Gedaliah. ¹⁹They gave their word^a to expel their wives and, acknowledging their guilt, offered a ram from the flock to expiate it. ²⁰Of the sons of Immer: Hanani and Zebadiah; ²¹of the sons of Harim: Maaseiah, Elijah, Shemaiah, Jehiel, and Uziah; ²²of the sons of Pashhur: Elioenai, Maaseiah, Ishmael, Nethanel, Jozabad, and Elasa; ²³of the Levites: Jozabad, Shimei, Kelaiah who is Kelita, Pethahiah, Judah, and Eliezer. ²⁴Of the singers: Eliashib. Of the gatekeepers: Shallum, Telem, and Uri. ²⁵Of the Israelites: of the sons of Parosh: Ramiah, Izziah, Malchijah, Mijamin, Eleazar, Malchijah, and Benaiah; ²⁶of the sons of Elam: Mattaniah, Zechariah, Jehiel, Abdi, Jeremoth, and Elijah; ²⁷of the sons of Zattu: Elioenai, Eliashib, Mattaniah, Jeremoth, Zabad, and Aziza; ²⁸of the sons of Bebai: Jehohanan, Hananiah, Zabbai, and Athlai; ²⁹of the sons of Bani: Meshullam, Malluch, Adaiah, Jashub, Sheal, and Ramoth; ³⁰of the sons of Pahath-moab: Adna, Chelal, Benaiah, Maaseiah, Mattaniah, Bezalel, Binnui, and Manasseh; ³¹of the sons of Harim: Eliezer, Isshijah, Malchijah, Shemaiah, and Shimeon; ³²also Benjamin, Malluch, and Shemariah; ³³of the sons of Hashum: Mattenai, Mattattah, Zabad, Eliphelet, Jeremai, Manasseh, and Shimei; ³⁴of the sons of Bani: Maadai, Amram, and Uel; ³⁵also Benaiah, Bedeiah, Cheluhu, ³⁶Vaniah, Meremoth, Eliashib, ³⁷Mattaniah, Mattenai, Jaasai, ³⁸Bani, Binnui, Shimei, ³⁹Shelemiah, Nathan, Adaiah, ⁴⁰Machnadebai, Shashai, Sharai, ⁴¹Azarel, Shelemiah, Shemariah, ⁴²Shallum, Amariah, and Joseph; ⁴³of the sons of Nebo: Jeiel, Mattithiah, Zabad, Zebina, Jaddai, Joel, and Benaiah.

⁴⁴All these had married foreign women, among whom were some women ^bwho had borne children.^b

^a Lit. "hand." ^{b-b} Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

Nehemiah

FOR INTRODUCTION TO NEHEMIAH, see introduction to Ezra.

Summary of Contents

- I. 1.1–7.72a: Nehemiah rebuilds the walls of Jerusalem
 - 1.1–3: Nehemiah hears Jerusalem’s wall is destroyed
 - 1.4–11a: Nehemiah’s prayer
 - 1.11b–2.10: Artaxerxes authorizes Nehemiah to return and rebuild the wall
 - 2.11–15: Nehemiah inspects the Jerusalem wall at night
 - 2.16–18: Nehemiah encourages the rebuilding of the wall
 - 2.19–20: Nehemiah’s rebuilding is opposed by Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem
 - 3.1–32: List of returnees who worked on rebuilding the wall
 - 3.33–38: Sanballat tries to interfere with the rebuilding, but is not successful
 - 4.1–17: The people work on the walls and guard the wall
 - 5.1–13: Nehemiah resolves socioeconomic crises
 - 5.14–19: Nehemiah refrains from taking the governor’s allowance
 - 6.1–14: Nehemiah avoids murderous plots to interfere with the completion of the Jerusalem wall
 - 6.15–19: Nehemiah completes the wall amidst ongoing harassment from Tobiah
 - 7.1–3: Nehemiah appoints guards for the gates of Jerusalem
 - 7.4–5: Nehemiah makes plans for the repopulation of Judah
 - 7.6–72a: Genealogical register of those who returned from Babylonia
- II. 7.72b–10.40: Liturgical practices in the reconstituted community
 - 7.72b–8.12: Ezra reads from the Mosaic Torah and the people celebrate
 - 8.13–18: Celebration of the festival of Booths (Sukkot)
 - 9.1–5: Public confession of sins
 - 9.6–37: Confessional prayer
 - 10.1–40: Nehemiah’s covenant
- III. 11.1–13.31: Legislative acts of Nehemiah
 - 11.1–24: List of settlers in Jerusalem
 - 11.25–36: List of distribution of village settlers in Judah

- 12.1–26: List of priests, Levites, and gatekeepers of the Temple 12.27–43: The dedication of the wall
 12.44–47: Ensuring support of Temple clergy through tithing
 13.1–3: Prohibition against intermarriage
 13.4–9: Threat to Temple purity is resolved by Nehemiah 13.10–14: Nehemiah reestablishes Temple tithes
 13.15–22: Nehemiah emphasizes the observance of Sabbath laws
 13.23–27: Prohibition against intermarriage
 13.28–31: Purification of the returnees and concluding prayer

[HINDY NAJMAN]

1 The narrative of Nehemiah son of Hacaliah: In the month of Kislev of the twentieth year,^a when I was in the fortress of Shushan, ²Hanani, one of my brothers, together with some men of Judah, arrived, and I asked them about the Jews, the remnant who had survived the captivity, and about Jerusalem. ³They replied, “The survivors who have survived the captivity there in the province are in dire trouble and disgrace; Jerusalem’s wall is full of breaches, and its gates have been destroyed by fire.”

⁴When I heard that, I sat and wept, and was in mourning for days, fasting and praying to the God of Heaven. ⁵I said, “O LORD, God of Heaven, great and awesome God, who stays faithful to His covenant with those who love Him and keep His commandments! ⁶Let Your ear be attentive and Your eyes open to receive the prayer of Your servant that I am praying to You now, day and night, on behalf of the Israelites, Your servants, confessing the sins that we Israelites have committed against You, sins that I and my father’s house have committed. ⁷We have offended You by not keeping the commandments, the laws, and the rules that You gave to Your servant Moses. ⁸Be mindful of the promise You gave to Your servant Moses: ‘If you are unfaithful, I will scatter you among the peodan, the chief of the guards under Nebuchadnezzar some 140 years earlier. Nehemiah expresses an urgent need to prevent what threatens to be a second destruction of the Jerusalem Temple. Cf. 2 Kings 25.8–12.

1.4–11a: Prayer of Nehemiah.

4: Nehemiah’s behavior accords with mourning and supplication practices that are characteristic of exilic and Second Temple narratives. Cf. Ezra 9.3–15, where Ezra participates in mourning rituals, fasts, confesses his sins, and then offers an elaborate prayer to the LORD. Similarly, in Dan. 9.3ff., Daniel prays while fasting and wearing sackcloth and ashes, then confesses and offers an elaborate prayer to the LORD. 5: Petitionary prayers typically start with an invocation, often just “LORD” or “God.” The unusually long invocation of this v. is meant to remind God of both His power and His obligation to redress the situation.

6: Nehemiah employs the formula used by priests in the confession on Yom Kippur when he says: Confessing the sins that we Israelites have committed against You, sins that I and my father’s house have committed. See Lev. ch 16 and m. Yoma 6.2. 7–11: By recalling the history of Israel, Nehemiah reminds God of the promises made to Israel and also of God’s own compassion at times when the Israelites strayed from their course. Much of this passage is a paraphrase of sections of Deuteronomy, though concepa I.e., of King Artaxerxes; cf. 2.1.

1.1–3: News of Jerusalem in crisis. Although both the Masoretic tradition and the Septuagint present Ezra-Nehemiah as a single work, the transition from the conclusion of Ezra to the opening section of Nehemiah is awkward. 1: “Nehemiah” means “the LORD is compassionate.” Most date this to 445 BCE (the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I), shortly after some kind of attack on the returnees reflected in the narrative of v. 3. 3: Jerusalem’s wall is full of breaches, and its gates have been destroyed by fire. The language recalls the destruction and burning of Jerusalem under the direction of Nebuzaraples; ⁹but if you turn back to Me, faithfully keep My commandments, even if your dispersed are at the ends of the earth,^a I will gather them from there and bring them to the place where I have chosen to establish My name.’ ¹⁰For they are Your servants and Your people whom You redeemed by Your great power and Your mighty hand. ¹¹O Lord! Let Your ear be attentive to the prayer of Your servant, and to the prayer of Your servants who desire to hold Your name in awe. Grant Your servant success today, and dispose that man to be compassionate toward him!’

I was the king’s cupbearer at the time.

2 In the month of Nisan, in the twentieth year of King Artaxerxes, wine was set before him; I took the wine and gave it to the king—I had never been out of sorts in his presence. ²The king said to me, “How is it that you look bad, though you are not ill? It must be bad thoughts.” I was very frightened, ³but I answered the king, “May the king live forever! How should I not look bad when the city of the graveyard of my ancestors lies in ruins, and its gates have been consumed by fire?” ⁴The king said to me, “What is your request?” With a prayer to the God of Heaven, ⁵I answered the king, “If it please the king, and if your servant has found favor with you, send me to Judah, to the city of my ancestors’ graves, to rebuild it.” ⁶With the consort seated at his side, the king said to me, “How long will you be gone and when will you return?” So it was agreeable to the king to send me, and I gave him a date. ⁷Then I said to the king, “If it please the king, let me have letters to the governors of the province of Beyond the River, directing them to grant me passage until I reach Judah; ⁸likewise, a letter to Asaph, the keeper of the King’s Park, directing him to give me timber for roofing the gatehouses of the temple fortress and the city walls and for the house I shall occupy.” The king gave me these, thanks to my God’s benevolent care for me. ⁹When I came to the governors of the province of Beyond the River I gave them the king’s letters. The king also sent army officers and cavalry with me.

¹⁰When Sanballat the Horonite and Tobiah the Ammonite servant heard, it displeased them greatly that someone had come, intent on improving the condition of the Israelites.

¹¹I arrived in Jerusalem. After I was there three days ¹²I got up at night, I and a few men with me, and telling no one what my God had put into my mind to do for Jerusations from Priestly literature, such as Israel being unfaithful (v. 8) are mixed in, suggesting that the author was working from a complete Torah similar to our own.

1.11b–2.9: Nehemiah’s request to return to Jerusalem is granted. 6: Nehemiah either demonstrates quick thinking or he has planned this response in advance. Josephus seems to prefer the first option, reporting this event as occurring on the same day on which Nehemiah is informed of Jerusalem’s present situation. 1.11b: As the cupbearer, Nehemiah occupies a significant and trusted position in the palace of Artaxerxes. 2.8: This v. is adduced as proof that it is permissible to accept a gift for the Temple from an idol worshipper only if the gift is from the government (b. Arak. 6a).

2.10: Report of opposition to Nehemiah’s arrival in Judah. Sanballat the Horonite is mentioned in documents from Elephantine in Egypt as the governor of Samaria. This verse is anticipatory; a major theme of Nehemiah is the opposition of these people to his restoration of Jerusalem.

2.11–16: Nehemiah secretly assesses the damage to Jerusalem. The secret nighttime evaluation of the walls begins and ends at the Valley Gate.

^a Lit. “sky.”

lem, and taking no other beast than the one on which I was riding, ¹³I went out by the Valley Gate, at night, toward the Jackals' Spring and the Dung Gate; and I surveyed the walls of Jerusalem that were breached, and its gates, consumed by fire. ¹⁴I proceeded to the Fountain Gate and to the King's Pool, where there was no room for the beast under me to continue. ¹⁵So I went up the wadi by night, surveying the wall, and, entering again by the Valley Gate, I returned. ¹⁶The prefects knew nothing of where I had gone or what I had done, since I had not yet divulged it to the Jews—the priests, the nobles, the prefects, or the rest of the officials.

¹⁷Then I said to them, "You see the bad state we are in—Jerusalem lying in ruins and its gates destroyed by fire. Come, let us rebuild the wall of Jerusalem and suffer no more disgrace." ¹⁸I told them of my God's benevolent care for me, also of the things that the king had said to me, and they said, "Let us start building!" They were encouraged by [His] benevolence.

¹⁹When Sanballat the Horonite and Tobiah the Ammonite servant and Geshem the Arab heard, they mocked us and held us in contempt and said, "What is this that you are doing? Are you rebelling against the king?" ²⁰I said to them in reply, "The God of Heaven will grant us success, and we, His servants, will start building. But you have no share or claim or stake^a in Jerusalem!"

3 Then Eliashib the high priest and his fellow priests set to and rebuilt the Sheep Gate; they consecrated it and set up its doors, consecrating it as far as the Hundred's Tower, as far as the Tower of Hananel. ²Next to him, the men of Jericho built. Next to them,^b Zaccur son of Imri. ³The sons of Hassenaah rebuilt the Fish Gate; they roofed it and set up its doors, locks, and bars. ⁴Next to them, Meremoth son of Uriah son of Hakkoz repaired; and next to him,^c Meshullam son of Berechiah son of Meshezabel. Next to him,^c Zadok son of Baana repaired. ⁵Next to him,^c the Tekoites repaired, though their nobles would not ^dtake upon their shoulders^d the work of their lord. ⁶Joiada son of Paseah and Meshullam son of Besodeiah repaired the Jeshanah Gate; they roofed it and set up its doors, locks, and bars. ⁷Next to them, Melatiah the Gibeonite and Jadon the Meronothite repaired, [with] the men of Gibeon and Mizpah, ^eunder the jurisdiction^e of the governor of the province of Beyond the River. ⁸Next to them,^b Uzziel son of

2.17–18: Nehemiah charges his attendants to assist him in rebuilding Jerusalem. 17: Suffer no more disgrace: The term "disgrace" is used elsewhere to characterize the destruction of the Temple and the exile. See Isa. 4.1–3; 22.18; 25.6–8; Jer. 23.39–40; 24.8–10; 25.8–11; Lam. 5.1; Ezek. 16.52–58; 22.1–5; Dan. 9.16.

2.19–20: Confrontation between Nehemiah and local leaders: Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem. 19: Geshem or "Gashmu" (6.6) may be a king of Kedar, since a recovered bowl from the Persian period is inscribed: "Cain son of Gashmu king of Kedar." The Kedarites are referred to in Gen. 25.13; Ps. 120.5; Isa. 21.16–17; 42.11; 60.7; Jer. 2.10; 49.28–30; Ezek. 27.21; 1 Chron. 1.29; Song 1.5. They likely originated in the Arabian peninsula. By the middle of the 5th century BCE, they may have been a significant presence in the land of Israel. 20: The success of the small community due to divine support becomes an increasingly prominent theme in postexilic literature, especially in Chronicles.

3.1–38: Nehemiah and returnees repair the wall. 1: The high priest Eliashib was the grandson of the priest Jeshua. He is mentioned elsewhere in Nehemiah (12.10, 22; 13.4). 1–5: The northern section with eight work assignments. 6–13: The western section with ten work assignments.

^a Lit. "record." ^b Lit. "him." ^c Lit. "them." ^{d-d} Lit. "bring their neck into." ^{e-e} Lit. "of the throne"; meaning of Heb. uncertain.

Harhaiah, [of the] smiths, repaired. Next to him, Hananiah, of^a the perfumers. They restored Jerusalem as far as the Broad Wall. ⁹Next to them, Rephaiah son of Hur, chief of half the district of Jerusalem, repaired. ¹⁰Next to him,^b Jedaiah son of Harumaph repaired in front of his house. Next to him, Hattush son of Hashabneiah repaired. ¹¹Malchijah son of Harim and Hasshub son of Pahath-moab repaired a second stretch, including the Tower of Ovens. ¹²Next to them,^c Shallum son of Hallohesh,^d chief of half the district of Jerusalem, repaired—he and his daughters. ¹³Hanun and the inhabitants of Zanoah repaired the Valley Gate; they rebuilt it and set up its doors, locks, and bars. And [they also repaired] a thousand cubits of wall to the Dung Gate. ¹⁴Malchijah son of Rechab, chief of the district of Beth-haccerem, repaired the Dung Gate; he rebuilt it and set up its doors, locks, and bars. ¹⁵Shallun son of Colhozeh, chief of the district of Mizpah, repaired the Fountain Gate; he rebuilt it and covered it, and set up its doors, locks, and bars, as well as the wall of the irrigation^e pool of the King's Garden as far as the steps going down from the City of David. ¹⁶After him, Nehemiah son of Azbuk, chief of half the district of Beth-zur, repaired, from in front of the graves of David as far as the artificial pool, and as far as the House of the Warriors. ¹⁷After him, the Levites repaired: Rehum son of Bani. Next to him, Hashabiah, chief of half the district of Keilah, repaired for his district. ¹⁸After him, their brothers repaired: Bavvai son of Henadad, chief of half the district of Keilah. ¹⁹Next to him, Ezer son of Jeshua, the chief of Mizpah, repaired a second stretch, from in front of the ascent to the armory [at] the angle [of the wall]. ²⁰After him, Baruch son of Zaccai zealously repaired a second stretch, from the angle to the entrance to the house of Eliashib, the high priest. ²¹After him, Meremoth son of Uriah son of Hakkoz repaired a second stretch, from the entrance to Eliashib's house to the end of Eliashib's house. ²²After him, the priests, inhabitants of the plain, repaired. ²³After them,^c Benjamin and Hasshub repaired in front of their houses. After them,^c Azariah son of Maaseiah son of Ananiah repaired beside his house. ²⁴After him, Binnui son of Henadad repaired a second stretch, from the house of Azariah to the angle, to the corner. ²⁵Palal son of Uzai— from in front of the angle and the tower that juts out of the house of the king, the upper [tower] of the prison compound. After him, Pedaiah son of Parosh. ⁽²⁶The temple 14–15: The southern section with two work assignments. 16–32: The eastern section with twenty-one work assignments. 33–35: Sanballat and Tobiah discourage the building. Cf. Ezra 4.4. 36–37: Nehemiah offers a lament over the destruction. 38: Completion of the wall.

4.1–6: Repeated opposition by local people. 3: Nehemiah's response is both religious and pragmatic. 4: The people appear very disheartened in their lament.

a Lit. "son of," i.e., member of the guild of.

b Lit. "them." c Lit. "him." d I.e., the charmer.

e Following Kimhi; cf. Mishnaic Heb. bet hashelahin, irrigated field.

servants were living on the Ophel, as far as a point in front of the Water Gate in the east, and the jutting tower.)²⁷ After him, the Tekoites repaired a second stretch, from in front of the great jutting tower to the wall of the Ophel.²⁸ Above the Horse Gate, the priests repaired, each in front of his house.²⁹ After them,^a Zadok son of Immer repaired in front of his house. After him, Shemaiah son of Shechaniah, keeper of the East Gate, repaired.³⁰ After him, Hananiah son of Shelemiah and Hanun, the sixth son of Zalaph, repaired a second stretch. After them,^a Meshullam son of Berechiah repaired in front of his chamber.³¹ After him, Malchijah of the smiths repaired as far as the house of the temple servants and the merchants, [from] in front of the Muster Gate to the corner loft.³² And between the corner loft to the Sheep Gate the smiths and the merchants repaired.

³³When Sanballat heard that we were rebuilding the wall, it angered him, and he was extremely vexed. He mocked the Jews,³⁴ saying in the presence of his brothers and the Samaritan force, "What are the miserable Jews doing? Will they restore, offer sacrifice, and finish one day? Can they revive those stones out of the dust heaps, burned as they are?"³⁵ Tobiah the Ammonite, alongside him, said, "That stone wall they are building—if a fox climbed it he would breach it!"

³⁶Hear, our God, how we have become a mockery, and return their taunts upon their heads! Let them be taken as spoil to a land of captivity!³⁷ Do not cover up their iniquity or let their sin be blotted out before You, for they hurled provocations at the builders.

³⁸We rebuilt the wall till it was continuous all around to half its height; for the people's heart was in the work.

4 When Sanballat and Tobiah, and the Arabs, the Ammonites, and the Ashdodites heard that healing had come to the walls of Jerusalem, that the breached parts had begun to be filled, it angered them very much,² and they all conspired together to come and fight against Jerusalem and to throw it into confusion.³ Because of them we prayed to our God, and set up a watch over them^b day and night.

⁴Judah was saying,
 "The strength of the basket-carrier has failed,
 And there is so much rubble;
 We are not able ourselves
 To rebuild the wall."

a Lit. "him." b I.e., the workers on the walls.

⁵And our foes were saying, "Before they know or see it, we shall be in among them and kill them, and put a stop to the work." ⁶When the Jews living near them^a would arrive, they would tell us ^btime and again^b ^c"... from all the places where... you shall come back to us..."^c ⁷I stationed, on the lower levels of the place, behind the walls, on the bare rock—I stationed the people by families with their swords, their lances, and their bows. ⁸Then I decided to exhort the nobles, the prefects, and the rest of the people, "Do not be afraid of them! Think of the great and awesome Lord, and fight for your brothers, your sons and daughters, your wives and homes!"

⁹When our enemies learned that it had become known to us, since God had thus frustrated their plan, we could all return to the wall, each to his work. ¹⁰From that day on, half my servants did work and half held lances and shields, bows and armor. And the officers stood behind the whole house of Judah ¹¹who were rebuilding the wall. The basket-carriers were burdened, doing work with one hand while the other held a weapon. ¹²As for the builders, each had his sword girded at his side as he was building. The trumpeter stood beside me. ¹³I said to the nobles, the prefects, and the rest of the people, "There is much work and it is spread out; we are scattered over the wall, far from one another. ¹⁴When you hear a trumpet call, gather yourselves to me at that place; our God will fight for us!" ¹⁵And so we worked on, while half were holding lances, from the break of day until the stars appeared.

¹⁶I further said to the people at that time, "Let every man with his servant lodge in Jerusalem, that we may use the night to stand guard and the day to work." ¹⁷Nor did I, my brothers, my servants, or the guards following me ever take off our clothes, ^d[or] each his weapon, even at the water.^d

5 There was a great outcry by the common folk and their wives against their brother Jews. ²Some said, "Our sons and daughters are numerous; we must get grain to eat in order that we may live!" ³Others said, "We must pawn our fields, our vineyards, and our homes to get grain to stave off hunger." ⁴Yet others said, "We have borrowed money against our fields and vineyards to pay the king's tax. ⁵Now ^ewe are as good as^e our brothers, and a I.e., the foes. b-b Lit. "ten times."

c-c Heb. seems to be abbreviated; a possible restoration of the sentence, with the missing elements enclosed in brackets, is: [of their evil plan; and we would say to them,] "From all the places where [you get such information] you shall come back to us [and convey it]."

d-d Meaning of Heb. uncertain. e-e Lit. "our flesh is as good as the flesh of."

4.7-17: Nehemiah empowers the returnees. Nehemiah calls upon God as a divine warrior; thus Nehemiah's subjects seem to be participating in a religious war for the future of the returnees and their families. 8: Just a little over a century prior to Nehemiah, Jeremiah was exhorting the people to build homes in Babylonia and plant gardens there (Jer. 29.5, 28). Now, Nehemiah tells the people to fight for their recovered land and for their right to live in their land. 15: From the break of day until the stars appeared: This v. offers one definition of daytime; the Rabbis use it to argue that one can fulfill the commandment of reciting the evening Shema (Deut. 6.4) only once the stars appear (b. Ber. 2b). In addition, this v. is used to define the beginning of night for purposes of purification (b. Meg. 20b).

5.1-5: Economic crisis among the returnees. The claim is that the creditors are seizing property that the returnees pledged when they needed to take loans. This is forbidden in the case of the poor (see Exod. 22.24-26). In earlier periods, such concerns fell under the purview of the prophets such as Amos, but prophecy as an institution was weakened in the postexilic period, so Nehemiah takes control of the situation. 1: Outcry refers to a legal challenge as in Gen. 18.20-21; Job 34.28. 5: Daughters to slavery—some of our daughters are already subjected: According to Exod. 21.7-11, an enslaved female loses the possibility of liberation if she is taken as a wife by her master, excluding maltreatment by her new master.

5.6-13: Nehemiah resolves the economic crisis. Nehemiah uses this occasion to declare a jubilee. See Lev. 25.1-55; Deut. 15.1-18. Due to his great power, Nehemiah is heeded (contrast Jer. 34.8-22), the community is stabilized, and work on the walls is resumed. Both civic and religious leaders seem to have been involved in these crimes, according to 6.7, 12.

our children as good as theirs; yet here we are subjecting our sons and daughters to slavery—some of our daughters are already subjected—and we are powerless, while our fields and vineyards belong to others.”

⁶It angered me very much to hear their outcry and these complaints. ⁷After pondering the matter carefully, I censured the nobles and the prefects, saying, “Are you pressing claims on loans made to your brothers?” Then I raised a large crowd against them ⁸and said to them, “We have done our best to buy back our Jewish brothers who were sold to the nations; will you now sell your brothers so that they must be sold [back] to us?” They kept silent, for they found nothing to answer. ⁹So I continued, “What you are doing is not right. You ought to act in a God-fearing way so as not to give our enemies, the nations, room to reproach us. ¹⁰I, my brothers, and my servants also have claims of money and grain against them; let us now abandon those claims! ¹¹Give back at once their fields, their vineyards, their olive trees, and their homes, and [abandon] the claims for the hundred pieces of silver, the grain, the wine, and the oil that you have been pressing against them!” ¹²They replied, “We shall give them back, and not demand anything of them; we shall do just as you say.” Summoning the priests, I put them under oath to keep this promise. ¹³I also shook out the bosom of my garment and said, “So may God shake free of his household and property any man who fails to keep this promise; may he be thus shaken out and stripped.” All the assembled answered, “Amen,” and praised the LORD.

The people kept this promise.

¹⁴Furthermore, from the day I was commissioned to be governor in the land of Judah—from the twentieth year of King Artaxerxes until his thirty-second year, twelve years in all—neither I nor my brothers ever ate of the governor’s food allowance. ¹⁵The former governors who preceded me laid heavy burdens on the people, and took from them for bread and wine more than^a forty shekels of silver. Their servants also tyrannized over the people. But I, out of the fear of God, did not do so. ¹⁶I also supported the work on this wall; we did not buy any land, and all my servants were gathered there at the work. ¹⁷Although there were at my table, between Jews and prefects, one hundred and fifty men in all, beside those who came to us from surrounding nations; ¹⁸and although what was prepared for each day came to one ox, six select sheep, and fowl, all prepared for me, and at ten-day intervals all sorts

5.14–19: Nehemiah does not make use of the governor’s food allowance. Nehemiah leads by example even to the point of refusing what is legally his allotment. 14: Twelve years in all: Nehemiah served two terms as governor, according to 13.6. The first one lasts twelve years, while the second is not specified.

^a Lit. “after”; meaning of Heb. uncertain.

of wine in abundance—yet I did not resort to the governor’s food allowance, for the [king’s] service lay heavily on the people.

¹⁹O my God, remember to my credit all that I have done for this people!

6 When word reached Sanballat, Tobiah, Geshem the Arab, and the rest of our enemies that I had rebuilt the wall and not a breach remained in it—though at that time I had not yet set up doors in the gateways—²Sanballat and Geshem sent a message to me, saying, “Come, let us get together in Kephirim in the Ono valley”; they planned to do me harm. ³I sent them messengers, saying, “I am engaged in a great work and cannot come down, for the work will stop if I leave it in order to come down to you.” ⁴They sent me the same message four times, and I gave them the same answer. ⁵Sanballat sent me the same message a fifth time by his servant, who had an open letter with him. ⁶Its text was: “Word has reached the nations, and Geshem^a too says that you and the Jews are planning to rebel—for which reason you are building the wall—and that you are to be their king. ^bSuch is the word. ^b ⁷You have also set up prophets in Jerusalem to proclaim about you, ‘There is a king in Judah!’ Word of these things will surely reach the king; so come, let us confer together.”

⁸I sent back a message to him, saying, “None of these things you mention has occurred; they are figments of your imagination”—⁹for they all wished to intimidate us, thinking, “They will desist from the work, and it will not get done.” Now strengthen my hands!

¹⁰Then I visited Shemaiah son of Delaiah son of Mehetabel when he was housebound, and he said,

“Let us meet in the House of God, inside the sanctuary,

And let us shut the doors of the sanctuary, for they are coming to kill you,

By night they are coming to kill you.”

¹¹I replied, “Will a man like me take flight? Besides, who such as I can go into the sanctuary and live? I will not go in.” ¹²Then I realized that it was not God who sent him, but that he uttered that prophecy about me—Tobiah and Sanballat having hired him—¹³because he was a hireling, that I might be intimidated and act thus and commit a sin, and so provide them a scandal with which to reproach me.

¹⁴“O my God, remember against Tobiah and Sanballat

19: Remember to my credit: Similar prayers are found in 13.14, 23, 31. In the Bible, they typify Nehemiah, though similar requests are common in a variety of ancient Near Eastern prayers.

6.1–13: Opposition tries to distract and harm Nehemiah. 5–9: In a second attempt to stop the rebuilding, an unsealed—i.e., publicly accessible—letter accuses Nehemiah and his supporters of rebelling against Artaxerxes. Nehemiah is clear and direct in his rejection of these false claims: They are figments of your imagination.

6–7: The accusation is that Judah wants to become independent of Persia, with its own king, anointed by a prophet, as was the case before 586 BCE. There is no evidence to suggest that this ever was the intention of the returnees.

10–13: In the final attempt to distract Nehemiah, a false prophet is hired to lure him into a situation that would brand him as a transgressor of Temple law. Nehemiah uncovers the plot and escapes in time.

6.14: Nehemiah prays to God for protection. While Nehemiah has Persian authority to control the political situation in Jerusalem, he must rely completely on God to handle external conflict. Noadiah is one of a few named female prophets; others are Miriam (Exod. 15.20), Deborah (Judg. 4.4), and Huldah (2 Kings 22.14).

a Heb. Gashmu. b-b Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

these deeds of theirs,^a and against Noadiah the prophetess, and against the other prophets that they wished to intimidate me!"

¹⁵The wall was finished on the twenty-fifth of Elul, after fifty-two days. ¹⁶When all our enemies heard it, all the nations round about us were intimidated, and fell very low in their own estimation; they realized that this work had been accomplished by the help of our God.

¹⁷Also in those days, the nobles of Judah kept up a brisk correspondence with Tobiah, and Tobiah with them. ¹⁸Many in Judah were his confederates, for he was a son-in-law of Shecaniah son of Arah, and his son Jehohanan had married the daughter of Meshullam son of Berechiah. ¹⁹They would also speak well of him to me, and would divulge my affairs to him. Tobiah sent letters to intimidate me.

7When the wall was rebuilt and I had set up the doors, tasks were assigned to the gatekeepers, the singers, and the Levites. ²I put Hanani my brother and Hananiah, the captain of the fortress, in charge of Jerusalem, for he was a more trustworthy and God-fearing man than most. ³I said to them, "The gates of Jerusalem are not to be opened until the heat of the day,^b and ^cbefore you leave your posts^c let the doors be closed and barred. And assign the inhabitants of Jerusalem to watches, each man to his watch, and each in front of his own house."

⁴The city was broad and large, the people in it were few, and houses were not yet built. ⁵My God put it into my mind to assemble the nobles, the prefects, and the people, in order to register them by families. I found the genealogical register of those who were the first to come up, and there I found written:

⁶These are the people of the province who came up from among the captive exiles that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, had deported, and who returned to Jerusalem and to Judah, each to his own city, ⁷who came with Zerubbabel, Jeshua, Nehemiah, Azariah, Raamiah, Nahamani, Mordecai, Bilshan, Mispereth, Bigvai, Nehum, Baanah.

The number of the men of the people of Israel: ⁸the sons of Parosh—2,172; ⁹the sons of Shephatiah—372; ¹⁰the sons of Arah—652; ¹¹the sons of Pahath-moab: the sons of Jeshua and Joab—2,818; ¹²the sons of Elam—1,254; ¹³the sons of Zattu—845; ¹⁴the sons of Zaccai—760; ¹⁵the sons of Binnui—648; ¹⁶the sons of Bebai—628; ¹⁷the sons of 6.15–16: The rebuilding of the wall is complete. Fifty-two days: This incredibly short time indicates the blessing and protection of God over the work. Cf. Ezra 6.14–15.

6.17–19: Tobiah tries to intimidate Nehemiah. While most of the surrounding peoples are said to desist from opposition because they recognize that the work on the wall was the work of God, Tobiah is still trying to harass and intimidate Nehemiah. Tobiah is to be contrasted with the two men Nehemiah places in charge of Jerusalem because they are "God fearing" (7.2). Some scholars suggest that Tobiah's attempted intimidation may in fact have occurred prior to the completion of the wall.

7.1–3: Nehemiah appoints gatekeepers, singers, and Levites to protect the gates and the doors.

1: Hanani my brother: This is the same individual who brought word about the condition of Jerusalem in 1.2. And Hananiah: Some scholars suggest that, since the verb is singular, only one person known by two similar names (Hanani and Hananiah) is intended, not two people. Tasks were assigned: The service of these Temple personnel as protectors may have a precedent in the protection of Jehoash recorded in 2 Kings ch 11. The Levites are also charged with this duty in Neh. 13.22.

7.4–72a: The genealogical register. 4–5: Nehemiah assembles the people and discovers a genealogical register. 6–72a: See Ezra 2.1–70 n. According to the Rabbis, the genealogical list in Ezra reflects the initial return from Babylonia, and the list in Nehemiah reflects a return that is linked to the dedication of the Temple. According to b. Meg. 16b, Nehemiah's return occurs twenty-four years after the initial return of Ezra.

a Lit. "his." b Lit. "sun." c-c Lit. "while they are still standing."

d Vv. 6–43 appear as Ezra 2 with variations in the names and numbers.

Azgad—2,322; ¹⁸the sons of Adonikam—667; ¹⁹the sons of Bigvai—2,067; ²⁰the sons of Adin—655; ²¹the sons of Ater: Hezekiah—98; ²²the sons of Hashum—328; ²³the sons of Bezai—324; ²⁴the sons of Hariph—112; ²⁵the sons of Gibeon—95; ²⁶the men of Bethlehem and Netophah—188; ²⁷the men of Anathoth—128; ²⁸the men of Bethazmaveth—42; ²⁹the men of Kiriath-jearim, Chephirah, and Beeroth—743; ³⁰the men of Ramah and Geba—621; ³¹the men of Michmas—122; ³²the men of Bethel and Ai—123; ³³the men of the other Nebo—52; ³⁴the sons of the other Elam—1,254; ³⁵the sons of Harim—320; ³⁶the sons of Jericho—345; ³⁷the sons of Lod, Hadid, and Ono—721; ³⁸the sons of Senaah—3,930.

³⁹The priests: the sons of Jedaiah: the house of Jeshua—973; ⁴⁰the sons of Immer—1,052; ⁴¹the sons of Pashhur—1,247; ⁴²the sons of Harim—1,017.

⁴³The Levites: the sons of Jeshua: Kadmiel, the sons of Hodeiah—74.

⁴⁴The singers: the sons of Asaph—148.

⁴⁵The gatekeepers: the sons of Shallum, the sons of Ater, the sons of Talmon, the sons of Akkub, the sons of Hatita, the sons of Shobai—138.

⁴⁶The temple servants: the sons of Ziha, the sons of Hasupha, the sons of Tabbaoth, ⁴⁷the sons of Keros, the sons of Siah, the sons of Padon, ⁴⁸the sons of Lebanah, the sons of Hagabah, the sons of Shalmal, ⁴⁹the sons of Hanan, the sons of Giddel, the sons of Gahar, ⁵⁰the sons of Reaiah, the sons of Rezin, the sons of Nekoda, ⁵¹the sons of Gazzam, the sons of Uzza, the sons of Paseah, ⁵²the sons of Besai, the sons of Meunim, the sons of Nephishesim, ⁵³the sons of Bakbuk, the sons of Hakupha, the sons of Harhur, ⁵⁴the sons of Bazlith, the sons of Mehida, the sons of Harsha, ⁵⁵the sons of Barkos, the sons of Sisera, the sons of Temah, ⁵⁶the sons of Neziah, the sons of Hatipha.

⁵⁷The sons of Solomon's servants: the sons of Sotai, the sons of Sophereth, the sons of Perida, ⁵⁸the sons of Jala, the sons of Darkon, the sons of Giddel, ⁵⁹the sons of Shephatiah, the sons of Hattil, the sons of Pochereth-hazzebaim, the sons of Amon.

⁶⁰The total of temple servants and the sons of Solomon's servants—392.

⁶¹The following were those who came up from Telmelah, Tel-harsha, Cherub, Addon, and Immer—they were unable to tell whether their father's house and descent were Israelite: ⁶²the sons of Delaiah, the sons of Tobiah, the sons of Nekoda—642.

⁶³Of the priests: the sons of Habaiah, the sons of Hakkoz, the sons of Barzillai who had married a daughter of Barzillai the Gileadite and had taken his^a name—⁶⁴these searched for their genealogical records, but they could not be found, so they were disqualified for the priesthood. ⁶⁵The Tirshatha^b ordered them not to eat of the most holy things until a priest with Urim and Thummim should appear.

⁶⁶The sum of the entire community was 42,360, ⁶⁷not counting their male and female servants, these being 7,337; they also had 245 male and female singers. ⁶⁸^c[Their horses—736, their mules—245,] camels—435, asses—6,720.

⁶⁹Some of the heads of the clans made donations for the work. The Tirshatha donated to the treasury: gold—1,000 drachmas, basins—50, priestly robes—530.

⁷⁰Some of the heads of the clans donated to the work treasury: gold—20,000 drachmas, and silver—2,200 minas.

⁷¹The rest of the people donated: gold—20,000 drachmas, silver—2,000, and priestly robes—67.

⁷²The priests, the Levites, the gatekeepers, the singers, some of the people, the temple servants, and all Israel took up residence in their towns.

8 When the seventh month arrived—the Israelites being [settled] in their towns—¹the entire people assembled as one man in the square before the Water Gate, and they asked Ezra the scribe to bring the scroll of the Teaching of Moses with which the LORD had charged Israel. ²On the first day of the seventh month, Ezra the priest brought the Teaching before the congregation, men and women and all who could listen with understanding. ³He read from it, facing the square before the Water Gate, from the first light until midday, to the men and the women and those who could understand; the ears of all the people were given to the scroll of the Teaching.

⁴Ezra the scribe stood upon a wooden tower made for the purpose, and beside him stood Mattithiah, Shema, Anaiah, Uriah, Hilkiah, and Maaseiah at his right, and at his left Pedaiah, Mishael, Malchijah, Hashum, Hashbadanah, Zechariah, Meshullam. ⁵Ezra opened the scroll in the sight of all the people, for he was above all the people; as he opened it, all the people stood up. ⁶Ezra blessed the

7.72b–8.8: Ezra reads from the Mosaic Torah (“torat moshe”). Cf. the narrative of the discovered Torah scroll during the reign of Josiah, king of Judah, in 2 Kings chs 22–23 (esp. 23.1–3). This narrative’s use of exactly the same time description as Ezra 3.1 may indicate that the passage about the dedication of the altar and the passage about the reading of the Torah of Moses are to be read together. 8.1: Water Gate, on the east side of Jerusalem and directly opposite the Temple. 2: On the first day of the seventh month, later known as Rosh Ha-Shanah, the New Year festival (see also Lev. 23.23–25; Num. 29.1–6). The community here includes women, as in Deut. 1.12; contrast Exod. 19.14–15. 4: Elevated upon a wooden platform, Ezra reenacts the Sinai event and the people, like their ancestors, publicly accept the law. Whereas at Sinai Moses records what God reveals, Ezra now reads what Moses has written. Cf. the earlier, preexilic, public reading of the Torah of Moses in Josh. 8.30–35. Rabbinic traditions state that the wooden platform upon which Ezra stood was the Temple Mount (e.g., t. Sol., 7.13; b. Yoma 69b; b. Sol. 40b–41a). The Rabbis state that the six people called to read publicly from the Torah scroll on the Day of Atonement represent the six people who stand at Ezra’s left and the six people who stand at Ezra’s right during the public reading of the Torah. (The Rabbis take Meshulam as another name for Zechariah, so there are six, not seven people [see b. Meg. 23a]). 5: All the people stood up: The Rabbis use this v. to illustrate correct conduct during the public reading of a Torah scroll. The people’s standing is understood to reflect complete silence. A contemporary reflection of this v. is seen in synagogue worship: When the Torah scroll is raised, the congregation rises. 6: Ezra blessed the LORD, the great God: The Rabbis explain that the phrase the great God refers to Ezra’s use of the Tetragrammaton, the four-letter name of God (יהוה) (b. Yoma 69b). By the rab-

^a Lit. “their.” ^b A Persian title.

^{c-c} These words are missing in some mss. and editions; but cf. Ezra 2.66.

LORD, the great God, and all the people answered, "Amen, Amen," with hands upraised. Then they bowed their heads and prostrated themselves before the LORD with their faces to the ground. ⁷Jeshua, Bani, Sherebiah, Jamin, Akkub, Shabbethai, Hodiah, Maaseiah, Kelita, Azariah, Jozabad, Hanan, Pelaiah, and the Levites explained the Teaching to the people, while the people stood in their places. ⁸They read from the scroll of the Teaching of God, translating it and giving the sense; so they understood the reading.

⁹Nehemiah the Tirshatha, Ezra the priest and scribe, and the Levites who were explaining to the people said to all the people, "This day is holy to the LORD your God: you must not mourn or weep," for all the people were weeping as they listened to the words of the Teaching. ¹⁰He further said to them, "Go, eat choice foods and drink sweet drinks and send portions to whoever has nothing prepared, for the day is holy to our Lord. Do not be sad, for your rejoicing in the LORD is the source of your strength." ¹¹The Levites were quieting the people, saying, "Hush, for the day is holy; do not be sad." ¹²Then all the people went to eat and drink and send portions and make great merriment, for they understood the things they were told.

¹³On the second day, the heads of the clans of all the people and the priests and Levites gathered to Ezra the scribe to study the words of the Teaching. ¹⁴They found written in the Teaching that the LORD had commanded Moses that the Israelites must dwell in booths during the festival of the seventh month, ¹⁵and that they must announce and proclaim throughout all their towns and Jerusalem as follows, "Go out to the mountains and bring leafy branches of olive trees, pine^a trees, myrtles, palms and [other] leafy^a trees to make booths, as it is written." ¹⁶So the people went out and brought them, and made themselves booths on their roofs, in their courtyards, in the courtyards of the House of God, in the square of the Water Gate and in the square of the Ephraim Gate. ¹⁷The whole community that returned from the captivity made booths and dwelt in the booths—the Israelites had not done so from the days of Joshua^b son of Nun to that day—and there was very great rejoicing. ¹⁸He read from the scroll of the Teaching of God each day, from the first to the last day. They celebrated the festival seven days, and there was a solemn gathering on the eighth, as prescribed.

^a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

^b Heb. Jeshua.

binic period pronouncing this name had become taboo, and it begins to fall out of use in postexilic texts. 8: The exact meaning of each of these words is uncertain, though together they reflect the idea that the Torah text cannot simply be read and understood in a straightforward way, an idea that is particularly prominent within rabbinic culture. Translating it: Rabbinic interpretation understands the Heb "meforash" to refer to the Targum, the Aramaic translation of the verse, which was recited in public along with the verse. Unable to understand the Heb text, the returnees required both Aramaic translation and interpretation (b. Meg. 3a; b. Ned. 37b; Gen. Rab. 36.8).

8.9–12: The people celebrate the first of Tishri, a holy and joyful festival. Cf. the response following the laying of the foundations of the Temple in Ezra 3.10–13. Nehemiah's attitude is that this reenacted revelation must be characterized by joy, not mourning, as in 2 Kings 22.11, or fear, as in the Sinai revelation (Exod. ch 19).

8.13–18: Ezra and the people celebrate the festival of Sukkot (the feast of Booths). Compare Solomon's celebration of Sukkot in 2 Chron. 7.8–10. 14: See Exod. 23.16; 34.22; Lev. 23.33–43; Num. 29.1–38. 15: These four species (olive trees, pine trees, myrtles, palms and [other] leafy trees) differ from the four species (palm, myrtle, willow, etrog) understood from later tradition based on Lev. 23.40 (see 2 Macc. 10.7; Josephus Ant. 3.10.4; m. Sukkah 4.1–7; Lev. Rab. 30.15; b. Sukkah 12a and 38a, where the Rabbis attempt to resolve this inconsistency). Most remarkable, rabbinic tradition suggests that these four species should be taken in hand, while here, perhaps based on the contiguity of Lev. 23.40, 42, they are used for constructing the booths. 18: Cf. Lev. 23.33–36; Num. 29.35 regarding the festival of Sukkot, particularly the solemn gathering on the eighth day; this is lacking in Deut. 16.15; 1 Kings 8.66.

9 On the twenty-fourth day of this month, the Israelites assembled, fasting, in sackcloth, and with earth upon them. ²Those of the stock of Israel separated themselves from all foreigners, and stood and confessed their sins and the iniquities of their fathers. ³Standing in their places, they read from the scroll of the Teaching of the LORD their God for one-fourth of the day, and for another fourth they confessed and prostrated themselves before the LORD their God. ⁴On the raised platform of the Levites stood Jeshua and Bani, Kadmiel, Shebaniah, Bunni, Sherebiah, Bani, and Chenani, and cried in a loud voice to the LORD their God. ⁵The Levites Jeshua, Kadmiel, Bani, Hashab-niah, Sherebiah, Hodiah, and Pethahiah said, "Rise, bless the LORD your God who is from eternity to eternity: 'May Your glorious name be blessed, exalted though it is above every blessing and praise!'"

⁶"You alone are the LORD. You made the heavens, the highest^a heavens, and all their host, the earth and everything upon it, the seas and everything in them. You keep them all alive, and the host of heaven prostrate themselves before You. ⁷You are the LORD God, who chose Abram, who brought him out of Ur of the Chaldeans and changed his name to Abraham. ⁸Finding his heart true to You, You made a covenant with him to give the land of the Canaanite, the Hittite, the Amorite, the Perizzite, the Jebu-site, and the Girgashite—to give it to his descendants. And You kept Your word, for You are righteous. ⁹You took note of our fathers' affliction in Egypt, and heard their cry at the Sea of Reeds. ¹⁰You performed signs and wonders against Pharaoh, all his servants, and all the people of his land, for You knew that they acted presumptuously to-a Lit. "the heavens of the."

9.1–5: People fast and confess their sins.

1: This passage suggests that a festival similar to Yom Kippur is observed on the 24th day of Tishri, after the celebration of Sukkot, not on the 10th of Tishri as reflected in other biblical texts (Lev. 16.29; 23.27–28; 25.9; Num. 29.7) and later rabbinic traditions.

2: Separated themselves from all foreigners: This may refer to a crisis similar to the one recorded in Ezra chs 9–10; Neh. 10.31; 12.23–31.

3: This passage is cited in rabbinic literature as an example of how one should divide one's day between study and prayer. One should divide the period from midday until the evening into two parts. In the first part, one should study the weekly portion of the Torah and the haftarah. In the second part, one should confess one's sins to God (b. Meg. 30b; b. Ta'an. 12b). 4: And cried in a loud voice to the LORD their God: The Rabbis understand the people's cry as a confession for idolatrous practices that are said to have caused the destruction of the sanctuary, the burning of the temple, the murder of the righteous, and the Babylonian exile (b. Sanh. 64a; b. Yoma 69b). 5: Introduction to the confession. Cf. Dan. 2.20–23. The Rabbis comment that Neh. 9.5 reflects the fact that in the Temple liturgy the people did not respond to blessings with "Amen," but rather gave praise to God following each blessing (b. Ber. 63a; b. Sot. 40b; and the more extensive discussion of Temple liturgy in b. Ta'an. 16b).

9.6–37: Communal confession.

Cf. Nehemiah's prayer to Joshua's recounting of Israelite history in Josh. ch 24. Like all historical retellings, it is remarkably selective in what it narrates. For example, for the ancestral period, only Abraham is mentioned. This prayer is incorporated into the daily morning prayer in Jewish liturgy. 6: The prayer begins with a declaration of God as creator. This relies mainly on the Priestly account of creation in Gen. 1.1–2.4. The highest heavens, and all their host is found elsewhere, though these are not Priestly terms (see, e.g., Deut. 10.14; 1 Kings 8.27; 2 Chron. 6.18). The author of this prayer is thus combining concepts from originally separate sources that have become integrated in the Torah. R. Oshaia uses this verse as a proof that the "Shekhinah" (divine presence) is in every place (b. B. Bat. 25a). 7–8: The prayer alludes to the following events: Abraham was brought out of Ur (Gen. ch 12), God changed Abram's name to Abraham (Gen. ch 17); Abraham's heart was found to be faithful (Gen. ch 22); God made a covenant with Abram to give him and his descendants the land of the surrounding peoples (Gen. ch 15). As in later retellings of biblical events, the order of events may be rearranged. 9–12: The prayer continues with the retelling of the miraculous exodus from Egypt. The relatively extensive space given to the exodus reflects its general importance in biblical tradition and its special significance for those who have undergone an "exodus" of their own. 9: Here, the prayer alludes to God's speech to Moses at the burning bush in Exod. 3.7 and later in the exodus narrative, Exod. 14.10. 10: The language in Nehemiah ward them. You made a name for Yourself that endures to this day. ¹¹You split the sea before them; they passed through the sea on dry land, but You threw their pursuers into the depths, like a stone into the raging waters.

¹²“You led them by day with a pillar of cloud, and by night with a pillar of fire, to give them light in the way they were to go. ¹³You came down on Mount Sinai and spoke to them from heaven; You gave them right rules and true teachings, good laws and commandments. ¹⁴You made known to them Your holy sabbath, and You ordained for them laws, commandments and Teaching, through Moses Your servant. ¹⁵You gave them bread from heaven when they were hungry, and produced water from a rock when they were thirsty. You told them to go and possess the land that You swore to give them. ¹⁶But they—our fathers—acted presumptuously; they stiffened their necks and did not obey Your commandments. ¹⁷Refusing to obey, unmindful of Your wonders that You did for them, they stiffened their necks, and in their defiance resolved to return to their slavery. But You, being a forgiving God, gracious and compassionate, long-suffering and abounding in faithfulness, did not abandon them. ¹⁸Even though they made themselves a molten calf and said, ‘This is your God who brought you out of Egypt,’ thus committing great impieties, ¹⁹You, in Your abundant compassion, did not abandon them in the wilderness. The pillar of cloud did not depart from them to lead them on the way by day, nor the pillar of fire by night to give them light in the way they were to go. ²⁰You endowed them with Your good spirit to instruct them. You did not withhold Your manna from their mouth; You gave them water when they were thirsty. ²¹Forty years You sustained them in the wilderness so that they lacked nothing; their clothes did not wear out, and their feet did not swell.

²²“You gave them kingdoms and peoples, and ^aallotted them territory.” They took possession of the land of Sihon, the land of the king of Heshbon, and the land of Og, king of Bashan. ²³You made their children as numerous as the stars of heaven, and brought them to the land which You told their fathers to go and possess. ²⁴The sons came and took possession of the land: You subdued the Canaanite inhabitants of the land before them; You delivered them into their power, both their kings and the peoples of the land, to do with them as they pleased. ²⁵They captured fortified cities and rich lands; they took possession of houses filled with every good thing, of hewn cisterns, seems closest to Exod. 9.16. 11: In Nehemiah’s recounting of the splitting of the sea, Moses’ role is limited, as in Ps. 78.13. In the Exodus narrative Moses plays a much more active role (Exod. 14.16, 21, 27). 12: The language here is almost a verbatim quotation from Exod. 13.21. 13–14: Giving of the Torah at Sinai. This is lacking in the shorter historical retellings in Deut. 26.5–9; Josh. 24.2–13. 13a: Here Nehemiah preserves, side by side, two different accounts of the Sinai theophany. You came down on Mount Sinai reflects the tradition in Exod. 19.11, 20 where God is said to have come down on Mount Sinai. And spoke to them from heaven reflects the tradition in Exod. 20.19 that God communicated to Israel from the heavens and not from an earthly location. 13b: See Mal. 2.6; Ps. 119.137, 142. 16–21: The prayer emphasizes God’s compassion despite Israel’s continued transgression. 18: Nehemiah’s retelling of the golden calf episode omits the role played by Aaron. Cf. Exod. 32.1–4, 21–24. 22–25: Conquest of Israel and settlement. 22: See Num. 21.21–35; Deut. chs 2–3.

a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

vineyards, olive trees, and fruit trees in abundance. They ate, they were filled, they grew fat; they luxuriated in Your great bounty. ²⁶Then, defying You, they rebelled; they cast Your Teaching behind their back. They killed Your prophets who admonished them to turn them back to You; they committed great impieties.

²⁷“You delivered them into the power of their adversaries who oppressed them. In their time of trouble they cried to You; You in heaven heard them, and in Your abundant compassion gave them saviors who saved them from the power of their adversaries. ²⁸But when they had relief, they again did what was evil in Your sight, so You abandoned them to the power of their enemies, who subjugated them. Again they cried to You, and You in heaven heard and rescued them in Your compassion, time after time. ²⁹You admonished them in order to turn them back to Your Teaching, but they acted presumptuously and disobeyed Your commandments, and sinned against Your rules, by following which a man shall live. They turned a defiant shoulder, stiffened their neck, and would not obey. ³⁰You bore with them for many years, admonished them by Your spirit through Your prophets, but they would not give ear, so You delivered them into the power of the peoples of the lands. ³¹Still, in Your great compassion You did not make an end of them or abandon them, for You are a gracious and compassionate God.

³²“And now, our God, great, mighty, and awesome God, who stays faithful to His covenant, do not treat lightly all the suffering that has overtaken us—our kings, our officers, our priests, our prophets, our fathers, and all Your people—from the time of the Assyrian kings to this day. ³³Surely You are in the right with respect to all that has come upon us, for You have acted faithfully, and we have been wicked. ³⁴Our kings, officers, priests, and fathers did not follow Your Teaching, and did not listen to Your commandments or to the warnings that You gave them. ³⁵When they had their own kings and enjoyed the good that You lavished upon them, and the broad and rich land that You put at their disposal, they would not serve You, and did not turn from their wicked deeds. ³⁶Today we are slaves, and the land that You gave our fathers to enjoy its fruit and bounty—here we are slaves on it! ³⁷On account of our sins it yields its abundant crops to kings whom You have set over us. They rule over our bodies and our beasts as they please, and we are in great distress.

26–31: Repeated transgression of Israel in the land, following a pattern already established in the desert (v. 18). Nehemiah recounts the period of the judges and the kings. The main theme is God’s continued forgiveness and forbearance, which Nehemiah is invoking as paradigmatic for his own situation. (Ps. 106 has a similar function and structure.)

32–37: Returnees confess their sins. 32: The words and now mark a transition. Nehemiah turns his attention from the past to the present. This is common in many other biblical prayers, e.g., Num. 14.17; Dan. 9.15; Ezra 9.10. 34–35: List of people who are guilty and responsible for the exile. Cf. Jer. 24.1–10; 44.17; Dan. 9.6, 8; 2 Chron. 36.14–16; Zech. 1.5–6; 7.8–14.

10 “In view of all this, we make this pledge and put it in writing; and on the sealed copy [are subscribed] our officials, our Levites, and our priests.

² “On the sealed copy^a [are subscribed]: Nehemiah the Tirshatha son of Hacaliah and Zedekiah, ³Seraiah, Azariah, Jeremiah, ⁴Pashhur, Amariah, Malchijah, ⁵Hattush, Shebaniah, Malluch, ⁶Harim, Meremoth, Obadiah, ⁷Daniel, Ginnethon, Baruch, ⁸Meshullam, Abijah, Mijamin, ⁹Maaziah, Bilgai, Shemaiah; these are the priests.

¹⁰ “And the Levites: Jeshua son of Azaniah, Binnui of the sons of Henadad, and Kadmiel. ¹¹ And their brothers: Shebaniah, Hodiah, Kelita, Pelaiah, Hanan, ¹²Mica, Rehob, Hashabiah, ¹³Zaccur, Sherebiah, Shebaniah, ¹⁴Hodiah, Bani, and Beninu.

¹⁵ “The heads of the people: Parosh, Pahath-moab, Elam, Zattu, Bani, ¹⁶Bunni, Azgad, Bebai, ¹⁷Adonijah, Bigvai, Adin, ¹⁸Ater, Hezekiah, Azzur, ¹⁹Hodiah, Hashum, Bezai, ²⁰Hariph, Anathoth, Nebai, ²¹Magpiash, Meshullam, Hezir, ²²Meshezabel, Zadok, Jaddua, ²³Pelatiah, Hanan, Anaiah, ²⁴Hoshea, Hananiah, Hasshub, ²⁵Hallohesh, Pilha, Shobek, ²⁶Rehum, Hashabnah, Maaseiah,²⁷ and Ahiah, Hanan, Anan, ²⁸Malluch, Harim, Baanah.

²⁹ “And the rest of the people, the priests, the Levites, the gatekeepers, the singers, the temple servants, and all who separated themselves from the peoples of the lands to [follow] the Teaching of God, their wives, sons and daughters, all who know enough to understand, ³⁰join with their noble brothers, and take an oath with sanctions to follow the Teaching of God, given through Moses the servant of God, and to observe carefully all the commandments of the LORD our Lord, His rules and laws.

³¹ “Namely: We will not give our daughters in marriage to the peoples of the land, or take their daughters for our sons.

³² “The peoples of the land who bring their wares and all sorts of foodstuff for sale on the sabbath day—we will not buy from them on the sabbath or a holy day.

“We will forgo [the produce of] the seventh year, and every outstanding debt.

³³ “We have laid upon ourselves obligations: To charge ourselves one-third of a shekel yearly for the service of the House of our God—³⁴for the rows of bread, for the regular meal offering and for the regular burnt offering, [for those of the] sabbaths, new moons, festivals, for consecrations, for sin offerings to atone for Israel, and for all the work in the House of our God.

10.1–40: The covenant of Nehemiah and the returnees.

1–28: There is considerable overlap between this list and the priests listed in 1 Chron. ch 24.

29: The rest of the people do not sign the covenant, but take part in the oath to keep the law. 30: Josiah’s covenant, like Nehemiah’s, is preceded by a public reading of the text of the covenant, the Torah (2 Chron. 34.30–32). Hezekiah’s covenant, like Nehemiah’s, follows a communal confession (2 Chron. 29.5–10). 31: Intermarriage, mentioned first, is a major theme in Ezra-Nehemiah. 32: The Sabbath, mentioned second, became especially significant in the exilic period. This v. represents one of many attempts to develop and establish a coherent definition of the type of work that is prohibited on the Sabbath. (See also Ezek. 20.12, 16, 20, 24; Isa. 56.1–8; 58.13–14; Jer. 17.21–24.) We will forgo [the produce of] the seventh year, see Exod. 21.2–6; 23.10–11; Lev. 25.1–7; Deut. 15.1–18. 33–34: This is related to Torah law, which requires every Israelite to pay half a shekel (Exod. 30.1–16; 38.25–26). See also 2 Kings 12.2–16; 2 Chron. 24.4–14, where payment is required for repair of the Temple.

a Heb. plural.

³⁵ “We have cast lots [among] the priests, the Levites, and the people, to bring the wood offering to the House of our God by clans annually at set times in order to provide fuel for the altar of the LORD our God, as is written in the Teaching.

³⁶ “And [we undertake] to bring to the House of the LORD annually the first fruits of our soil, and of every fruit of every tree; ³⁷ also, the first-born of our sons and our beasts, as is written in the Teaching; and to bring the firstlings of our cattle and flocks to the House of our God for the priests who minister in the House of our God.

³⁸ “We will bring to the storerooms of the House of our God the first part of our dough, and our gifts [of grain], and of the fruit of every tree, wine and oil for the priests, and the tithes of our land for the Levites—the Levites who collect the tithe in all our towns ^asubject to royal service.”

³⁹ An Aaronite priest must be with the Levites when they collect the tithe, and the Levites must bring up a tithe of the tithe to the House of our God, to the storerooms of the treasury. ⁴⁰ For it is to the storerooms that the Israelites and the Levites must bring the gifts of grain, wine, and oil. The equipment of the sanctuary and of the ministering priests and the gatekeepers and the singers is also there.

“We will not neglect the House of our God.”

11 The officers of the people settled in Jerusalem; the rest of the people cast lots for one out of ten to come and settle in the holy city of Jerusalem, and the other nine-tenths to stay in the towns. ² The people gave their blessing to all the men who willingly settled in Jerusalem.

³ These are the heads of the province who lived in Jerusalem—in the countryside^b of Judah, the people lived in their towns, each on his own property, Israelites, priests, Levites, temple servants, and the sons of Solomon’s servants, ⁴ while in Jerusalem some of the Judahites and some of the Benjaminites lived:

Of the Judahites: Athaiah son of Uzziah son of Zechariah son of Amariah son of Shephatiah son of Mahalalel, of the clan of Periz, ⁵ and Maaseiah son of Baruch son of Col-hozeh son of Hazaiah son of Adaiah son of Joiarib son of Zechariah son of the Shilohite. ⁶ All the clan of Periz who were living in Jerusalem—468 valorous men.

⁷ These are the Benjaminites: Sallu son of Meshullam son of Joed son of Pedaiiah son of Kolaiah son of Maaseiah son of Ithiel son of Jesaiah. ⁸ After him, Gabbai and Sallai—928.

35: Torah laws concerning support of the Temple do not mention this tax. However, there is a requirement that the priests keep the fire burning continuously for the sacrifices in the sanctuary (Lev. 6.2–23). It may have been understood at the time of Nehemiah that this requirement could not be fulfilled unless a supply of wood was guaranteed. (See 13.31; m. Ta’an. 4.5; b. Ta’an. 28a.) 37: As in the case of the prohibition against intermarriage, the laws of tithing and priestly support are given in more detail than in the Torah. The claim that these laws are as is written in the Teaching (“torah”) should be understood to mean that the authoritative interpretation of Torah has the same authority as Torah itself. These stipulations of their covenant are violated by the people, and Nehemiah must reinforce them in 5.1–5; 13.1–3, 10–12, 15–17, 19–22, 23–28.

11.1–24: The list of those who settled in Jerusalem. 2: Who willingly settled: Despite its status as “the holy city,” for economic reasons settlement in Jerusalem was not attractive, as recognized by the Rabbis (b. Ketub. 110b).

a-a For this sense of ‘abodah, “service,” cf. 5.18. b Lit. “towns.”

⁹Joel son of Zichri was the official in charge of them, and Judah son of Hassenuah was the second-in-command of the city.

¹⁰Of the priests: Jedaiah son of Joiarib, Jachin, ¹¹Seraiah son of Hilkiah son of Meshullam son of Zadok son of Meraioth son of Ahitub, chief officer of the House of God, ¹²and their brothers, who did the work of the House—822; and Adaiah son of Jeroham son of Pelaliah son of Amzi son of Zechariah son of Pashhur son of Malchijah, ¹³and his brothers, heads of clans—242; and Amashsai son of Azarel son of Ahzai son of Meshillemoth son of Immer, ¹⁴and their brothers, valorous warriors—128. Zabdiel son of Haggadolim was the official in charge of them.

¹⁵Of the Levites: Shemaiah son of Hasshub son of Azrikam son of Hashabiah son of Bunni, ¹⁶and Shabbe-thai and Jozabad of the heads of the Levites were in charge of the external work of the House of God. ¹⁷Mattaniah son of Micha son of Zabdi son of Asaph was the head; at prayer, he would lead off with praise; and Bakbukiah, one of his brothers, was his second-in-command; and Abda son of Shammua son of Galal son of Jeduthun. ¹⁸All the Levites in the holy city—284.

¹⁹And the gatekeepers: Akkub, Talmon, and their brothers, who stood watch at the gates—172.

²⁰And the rest of the Israelites, the priests, and the Levites in all the towns of Judah [lived] each on his estate.

²¹The temple servants lived on the Ophel; Ziha and Gishpa were in charge of the temple servants.

²²The overseer of the Levites in Jerusalem was Uzzi son of Bani son of Hashabiah son of Mattaniah son of Micha, of the Asaphite singers, over the work of the House of God. ²³There was a royal order concerning them, a stipulation concerning the daily duties of the singers.

²⁴Petahiah son of Meshezabel, of the sons of Zerah son of Judah, advised the king concerning all the affairs of the people.

²⁵As concerns the villages with their fields: Some of the Judahites lived in Kiriath-arba and its outlying hamlets, in Dibon and its outlying hamlets, and in Jekabzeel and its villages; ²⁶in Jeshua, in Moladah, and in Beth-pelet; ²⁷in Hazar-shual, in Beer-sheba and its outlying hamlets; ²⁸and in Ziklag and in Meconah and its outlying hamlets; ²⁹in En-rimmon, in Zorah and in Jarmuth; ³⁰Zanoah, Adullam, and their villages; Lachish and its fields; Azekah and its outlying hamlets. They settled from Beer-sheba to the Valley of Hinnom.

³¹The Benjaminites: from Geba, Michmash, Aija, and Bethel and its outlying hamlets; ³²Anathoth, Nob, Ana-

11.25–36: The distribution of village settlements in Judah. Eleven of the listed settlements are said to be in territory known to be under Edomite-Arab control after the destruction of the First Temple, and scholars have questioned the historical reliability of this source. Some scholars have suggested that the settlement list reflects the conquest list in Josh. chs 14–15.

niah, ³³Hazor, Ramah, Gittaim, ³⁴Hadid, Zeboim, Nebal-lat, ³⁵Lod, Ono, Ge-harashim. ³⁶Some of the Judahite divisions of Levites were [shifted] to Benjamin.

12 These are the priests and the Levites who came up with Zerubbabel son of Shealtiel and Jeshua:

Seraiah, Jeremiah, Ezra, ²Amariah, Malluch, Hattush, ³Shecaniah, Rehum, Meramoth, ⁴Iddo, Ginnethoi, Abijah, ⁵Mijamin, Maadiah, Bilgah, ⁶Shemaiah, Joiarib, Jedaiah, ⁷Sallu, Amok, Hilkiah, Jedaiah. These were the heads of the priests and their brothers in the time of Jeshua.

⁸The Levites: Jeshua, Binnui, Kadmiel, Sherebiah, Judah, and Mattaniah, in charge of thanksgiving songs,^a he and his brothers; ⁹and Bakbukiah and Unni [and] their brothers served opposite them by shifts.

¹⁰Jeshua begot Joiakim; Joiakim begot Eliashib; Eliashib begot Joiada; ¹¹Joiada begot Jonathan; Jonathan begot Jaddua.

¹²In the time of Joiakim, the heads of the priestly clans were: Meriaiah—of the Seraiah clan; Hananiah—of the Jeremiah clan; ¹³Meshullam—of the Ezra clan; Jehohanan—of the Amariah clan; ¹⁴Jonathan—of the Melicu clan; Joseph—of the Shebaniah clan; ¹⁵Adna—of the Harim clan; Helkai—of the Meraioth clan; ¹⁶Zechariah—of the Iddo clan; Meshullam—of the Ginnethon clan; ¹⁷Zichri—of the Abijah clan . . . of the Miniamin clan; Piltai—of the Moadiah clan; ¹⁸Shammua—of the Bilgah clan; Jehonathan—of the Shemaiah clan; ¹⁹Mattenai—of the Joiarib clan; Uzzi—of the Jedaiah clan; ²⁰Kallai—of the Sallai clan; Eber—of the Amok clan; ²¹Hashabiah—of the Hilkiah clan; Nethanel—of the Jedaiah clan.

²²The Levites and the priests were listed by heads of clans in the days of Eliashib, Joiada, Johanan, and Jaddua, down to the reign of Darius the Persian. ²³But the Levite heads of clans are listed in the book of the chronicles to the time of Johanan son of Eliashib.

²⁴The heads of the Levites: Hashabiah, Sherebiah, Jeshua son of Kadmiel, and their brothers served opposite them, singing praise and thanksgiving hymns by the ordinance of David the man of God—served opposite them in shifts; ²⁵Mattaniah, Bakbukiah, Obadiah, Meshullam, Talmon, and Akkub, guarding as gatekeepers by shifts at the vestibules of the gates.

²⁶These were in the time of Joiakim son of Jeshua son of Jozadak, and in the time of Nehemiah the governor, and of Ezra the priest, the scribe.

12.1–26: Lists of priests, Levites, and gatekeepers of the Temple.

This list supplements 11.10–24. It postdates Nehemiah and is dated to the 4th century BCE. 1–7: This list of priests overlaps significantly with the list of priests who signed the covenant document in ch 10. 23: The book of the chronicles is not the book of Chronicles included in the Tanakh, but rather a collection of genealogical lists that was presumably preserved among the Temple documents. 24: David the man of God: Cf. Ezra 3.10, where David, who is traditionally viewed as the author of Psalms, is considered the author of the Temple liturgy. The title the man of God may reflect a tradition that David was a prophet, since he composed parts of the Bible. In rabbinic traditions David is listed as one of ten figures (e.g., Moses, Elkana, Elisha, Micha), each of whom is said to be a “man of God,” “Ish Elohim” (Sifre Devarim, piska 342 on Deut. 33:1; Avot R. Nat., version B, ch 37).

^a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

²⁷ At the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, the Levites, wherever they lived, were sought out and brought to Jerusalem to celebrate a joyful dedication with thanksgiving and with song, accompanied by cymbals, harps, and lyres. ²⁸ The companies of singers assembled from the [Jordan] plain, the environs of Jerusalem, and from the Netophathite villages; ²⁹ from Beth-hagilgal, from the countryside of Geba and Azmaveth, for the singers built themselves villages in the environs of Jerusalem.

³⁰ The priests and Levites purified themselves; then they purified the people, and the gates, and the wall.

³¹ I had the officers of Judah go up onto the wall, and I appointed two large thanksgiving [choirs] and processions. [One marched] south on the wall, to the Dung Gate; ³² behind them were Hoshaiah and half the officers of Judah, ³³ and Azariah, Ezra, Meshullam, ³⁴ Judah, Benjamin, Shemaiah, and Jeremiah, ³⁵ and some of the young priests, with trumpets; Zechariah son of Jonathan son of Shemaiah son of Mattaniah son of Micaiah son of Zaccur son of Asaph, ³⁶ and his brothers Shemaiah, and Azarel, Milalai, Gilalai, Maai, Nethanel, Judah, and Hanani, with the musical instruments of David, the man of God; and Ezra the scribe went ahead of them. ³⁷ From there to the Fountain Gate, where they ascended the steps of the City of David directly before them, by the ascent on the wall, above the house of David, [and onward] to the Water Gate on the east.

³⁸ The other thanksgiving [choir] marched on the wall in the opposite direction, with me and half the people behind it, above the Tower of Ovens to the Broad Wall; ³⁹ and above the Gate of Ephraim, the Jeshanah Gate, the Fish Gate, the Tower of Hananel, the Tower of the Hundred, to the Sheep Gate; and they halted at the Gate of the Prison Compound. ⁴⁰ Both thanksgiving choirs halted at the House of God, and I and half the prefects with me, ⁴¹ and the priests Eliakim, Maaseiah, Miniamin, Micaiah, Elieonai, Zechariah, Hananiah, with trumpets, ⁴² and Maaseiah and Shemaiah, Eleazar, Uzzi, Jehohanan, Malchijah, Elam, and Ezer. Then the singers sounded forth, with Jezrahiah in charge.

⁴³ On that day, they offered great sacrifices and rejoiced, for God made them rejoice greatly; the women and children also rejoiced, and the rejoicing in Jerusalem could be heard from afar.

⁴⁴ At that time men were appointed over the chambers that served as treasuries for the gifts, the first fruits, and the tithes, into which the portions prescribed by the Teaching for the priests and Levites were gathered from 12.27-43: The dedication of the wall. Scholars note that this section resumes the Nehemiah memoir from 7.5. After a long interruption from the Ezra memoir, which is inserted into the book of Nehemiah, the dedication of the Jerusalem wall provides closure. 27: Cf. Ezra 3.10-13; 2 Chron. 23.18; 29.26-30; 30.23. For additional mention of these musical instruments, see the postexilic 1 Chron. 13.8; 15.16; 25.1, 6; 2 Chron. 5.12; 29.25. 43: And the rejoicing in Jerusalem could be heard from afar: As at the beginning of the rebuilding, the sound of joy can be heard from afar. See Ezra 3.13.

12.44-47: Ensuring support of Temple clergy through tithing. 45: The Temple staff are authorized to dedicate, sacrifice, and continue the Temple service. Nehemiah emphasizes direct continuity with David and Solomon. 47: Zerubbabel and Nehemiah are treated as contemporaries, which is historically inaccurate.

the fields of the towns; for the people of Judah were grateful to the priests and Levites who were in attendance, ⁴⁵who kept the charge of their God and the charge of purity, as well as to the singers and gatekeepers [serving] in accord with the ordinance of David and Solomon his son—⁴⁶for the chiefs of the singers and songs of praise and thanksgiving to God already existed in the time of David and Asaph. ⁴⁷And in the time of Zerubbabel, and in the time of Nehemiah, all Israel contributed the daily portions of the singers and the gatekeepers, and made sacred contributions for the Levites, and the Levites made sacred contributions for the Aaronites.

13 At that time they read to the people from the Book of Moses, and it was found written that no Ammonite or Moabite might ever enter the congregation of God, ²since they did not meet Israel with bread and water, and hired Balaam against them to curse them; but our God turned the curse into a blessing. ³When they heard the Teaching, they separated all the alien admixture from Israel.

⁴Earlier, the priest Eliashib, a relative of Tobiah, who had been appointed over the rooms in the House of our God, ⁵had assigned to him^a a large room where they used to store the meal offering, the frankincense, the equipment, the tithes of grain, wine, and oil, the dues of the Levites, singers and gatekeepers, and the gifts for the priests. ⁶During all this time, I was not in Jerusalem, for in the thirty-second year of King Artaxerxes of Babylon, I went to the king, and only after a while did I ask leave of the king [to return]. ⁷When I arrived in Jerusalem, I learned of the outrage perpetrated by Eliashib on behalf of Tobiah in assigning him a room in the courts of the House of God. ⁸I was greatly displeased, and had all the household gear of Tobiah thrown out of the room; ⁹I gave orders to purify the rooms, and had the equipment of the House of God and the meal offering and the frankincense put back.

¹⁰I then discovered that the portions of the Levites had not been contributed, and that the Levites and the singers who performed the [temple] service had made off, each to his fields. ¹¹I censured the prefects, saying, "How is it that the House of God has been neglected?" Then I recalled [the Levites] and installed them again in their posts; ¹²and all Judah brought the tithes of grain, wine, and oil into the treasuries. ¹³I put the treasuries in the charge of the priest Shelemiah, the scribe Zadok, and Pedaiah of the Levites;

13.1–3: Prohibition against intermarriage with an Ammonite or Moabite. Cf. Ezra chs 9–10. 2: Cf. Deut. 23.3–5. Balaam, see Num. 22–24. 3: As in Ezra chs 9–10, not just Moabites and Ammonites are separated, but all foreigners.

13.4–9: Tobiah the Ammonite compromises the purity of the Temple and Nehemiah resolves the crisis. 6: Nehemiah returned to Artaxerxes for an unknown time, during which problems arose. Cf. 2.6.

13.10–14: Reestablishing the tithes.

a I.e., Tobiah.

and assisting them was Hanan son of Zaccur son of Mat-taniah—for they were regarded as trustworthy persons, and it was their duty to distribute the portions to their brothers.

¹⁴O my God, remember me favorably for this, and do not blot out the devotion I showed toward the House of my God and its attendants.

¹⁵At that time I saw men in Judah treading winepresses on the sabbath, and others bringing heaps of grain and loading them onto asses, also wine, grapes, figs, and all sorts of goods, and bringing them into Jerusalem on the sabbath. I admonished them there and then for selling provisions. ¹⁶Tyrians who lived there brought fish and all sorts of wares and sold them on the sabbath to the Judah-ites in Jerusalem. ¹⁷I censured the nobles of Judah, saying to them, “What evil thing is this that you are doing, profaning the sabbath day! ¹⁸This is just what your ancestors did, and for it God brought all this misfortune on this city; and now you give cause for further wrath against Israel by profaning the sabbath!”

¹⁹When shadows filled the gateways of Jerusalem at the approach of the sabbath, I gave orders that the doors be closed, and ordered them not to be opened until after the sabbath. I stationed some of my servants at the gates, so that no goods should enter on the sabbath. ²⁰Once or twice the merchants and the vendors of all sorts of wares spent the night outside Jerusalem, ²¹but I warned them, saying, “What do you mean by spending the night alongside the wall? If you do so again, I will lay hands upon you!” From then on they did not come on the sabbath. ²²I gave orders to the Levites to purify themselves and come and guard the gates, to preserve the sanctity of the sabbath.

This too, O my God, remember to my credit, and spare me in accord with your abundant faithfulness.

²³Also at that time, I saw that Jews had married Ash-dodite, Ammonite, and Moabite women; ²⁴a good number of their children spoke the language of Ashdod and the language of those various peoples, and did not know how to speak Judean. ²⁵I censured them, cursed them, flogged them, tore out their hair, and adjured them by God, saying, “You shall not give your daughters in marriage to their sons, or take any of their daughters for your sons or yourselves. ²⁶It was just in such things that King Solomon of Israel sinned! Among the many nations there was not a king like him, and so well loved was he by his God that God made him king of all Israel, yet foreign wives caused even him to sin. ²⁷How, then, can we acquiesce in your doing this great wrong, breaking faith with our God by marrying foreign women?"²⁸ One of the sons of Joiada son of the high priest Eliashib was a son-in-law of Sanballat the Horonite; I drove him away from me.

13.15–22: Observance of the Sabbath day. The closest parallel to this prohibition of business on the Sabbath day is Jer. 17.21–24 (cf. Amos 8.5). For other exilic and postexilic discussion of Sabbath observance, see Isa. 56.1–8; Ezek. ch 20. As is clear from the covenant in ch 10 and the discussion here, Sabbath observance is seen as inextricably linked to the fulfillment of the covenant between God and Israel. Violation of the Sabbath would result in the loss of Jerusalem and Judah again, as it did earlier, according to Jer. 17.1–24. 15: The Rabbis explain that this v. reflects an early stage in the application of Sabbath law, when lax observance demanded a strict response, and the use of all but three utensils on the Sabbath day was forbidden. Later on, as reflected in m. Shab. 17.4, the Rabbis were more lenient (b. Shab. 123b and Rashi ad loc.).

13.23–27: Prohibition against intermarriage. 23: Though the book draws to a conclusion by restating one of its main themes, the dangers of intermarriage, the conception here is quite different from Ezra 9.2. 26: See 1 Kings 11.1–13.

²⁹Remember to their discredit, O my God, how they polluted the priesthood, the covenant of the priests and Levites. ³⁰I purged them of every foreign element, and arranged for the priests and the Levites to work each at his task by shifts, ³¹and for the wood offering [to be brought] at fixed times and for the first fruits.

O my God, remember it to my credit!

13.28–31: Purification of the returnees and concluding prayer. The final vv. in Nehemiah reemphasize the careful exclusion of any person who compromised the purification of the returnees and the rebuilding of the Temple. 28: The perceived vulnerability of the newly constituted Jewish community in Jerusalem; even someone with authentic lineage must be banished because of a relation through marriage to Sanballat the Horonite. 29: Here there is an emphasis on the inextricable link between the defilement of the priesthood and the vulnerability of the renewed covenant with the recent returnees. The reestablished community still perceives itself to be vulnerable to destruction and defilement. 30–31: The final vv. are a repeated expression of the hope that the purification and the sacrifices will continue to be received as genuine and authentic by God and, furthermore, that God will consider the reestablished community to be genuine and authentic. Thus, the concluding vv. seem intended to link the reforms inextricably to the figure of Nehemiah. While the ending is certainly abrupt and arguably anticlimactic, it nevertheless seems to fit with the overall themes and focus of Ezra-Nehemiah.

I Chronicles

THE TITLE “THE BOOK OF CHRONICLES,” a reflection of the Hebrew divrei hayamim (e.g., 1 Kings 14.19, “Annals”), is a misnomer. The book is neither a dry chronicle nor an analytic work, but a complex theological-historical composition beginning with Adam and concluding with the Cyrus declarations (538 BCE). Chronicles should not be identified with the Annals of the Kings of Israel or the Annals of the Kings of Judah which are frequently mentioned in Kings, since Chronicles was written after Kings. Furthermore, even though in English Bibles, following the tradition of the Septuagint (the ancient Greek Bible translation), Chronicles is divided into two books like Samuel and Kings, in the Hebrew tradition, it is a single book. It is thus proper to speak of the book rather than the books of Chronicles.

Rabbinic tradition (b. B. Bat. 15a) assigns authorship of part, but not all, of Chronicles to Ezra the scribe; medieval Jewish commentators differed over the scope of the Ezran material. Modern scholarship remains divided over the book’s relationship to Ezra; through most of the 19th and 20th centuries scholars accepted the rabbinic position, based on several considerations, including linguistic similarities between Ezra-Nehemiah and Chronicles, similarity in outlook and theology, and the fact that the conclusion of Chronicles is identical to the introduction of Ezra. These scholars used the term “the Chronicler” to refer to the single author of Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah. Most scholars now reject this position, arguing that the two works, though similar because they were written in approximately the same period, differ substantively in matters of outlook and theology. Three key examples of this difference in outlook are: (1) the uncompromising stance of Ezra-Nehemiah regarding all forms of exogamy (marrying outside of the clan), as opposed to Chronicles’ relatively liberal attitude on the matter; (2) Chronicles’ inclusive definition of the true Israel, which contrasts sharply with Ezra-Nehemiah, in whose view only those Jews returning from the Babylonian captivity are viewed as the true Israel; and (3) the heightened place of the Davidic covenant in Chronicles, in contrast to the emphasis on the exodus-Sinai traditions found in Ezra-Nehemiah. In addition, there are significant linguistic and stylistic differences between the two corpora. Most scholars now use the term “the Chronicler” to refer to the author of Chronicles only and believe that he was likely a member of Levitical circles. Some suggest that the Chronicler was aware, and made use, of Ezra-Nehemiah in formulating his own positions.

The book's date of composition has also been the subject of considerable debate, with estimates ranging from approximately 500 (the early Persian empire) through the early 2nd century BCE (i.e., the Hellenistic age). All in all, the late middle or, possibly, early 4th century—i.e., mid-late Persian period (375–325)—appears the most likely. As for the literary growth of Chronicles—that is, the number of authors responsible for the book's final form—most scholars maintain that the main body of the book is the product of one author or circle. Nonetheless, some passages are commonly viewed as later additions to the book's basic stratum; therefore Chronicles probably reached its final form after the 4th century. Awareness of the Second Temple provenance of Chronicles has significant implications for understanding the purpose and methods of its author(s). The bulk of Chronicles is a retelling of the books of Samuel and Kings. The material selected or omitted, however, along with the new formulations and literary "spins" given to older material, indicate that the author imbues this material with new perspectives and meanings, in order to address the needs of his audience. In addition, the book's relatively late date of composition means that its author was familiar with the (completed, redacted) Torah in a form essentially identical to that preserved to our own day, and almost all of the prophetic, historical, and lyric works (e.g., Psalms) which comprise the present canon of the Bible. Accordingly, the author's understanding of a given subject or passage is likely to reflect not only the developed belief systems of his own period, but the influence of relevant passages from the earlier biblical corpus, as they were understood in his time. Indeed, the author's interest in harmonizing various biblical passages informs much of the author's novel, if perhaps idiosyncratic, reformulation of earlier texts.

Despite the large mass of material common to Chronicles and earlier biblical sources, particularly Samuel and Kings, there are many differences, both stylistic and substantive, between the two blocks of material. These may be the result of several factors. First, a deliberate change in the text may either be the creation of the author, reflecting his own tendentious concerns and perspectives or, alternatively, may indicate that the author has reformulated his text on the basis of source material not preserved in the canonical biblical corpus. On the other hand, the differences between the synoptic portions of Chronicles, namely those portions which have parallels elsewhere in the Bible, and the earlier compositions may simply indicate that the version of the older sources known to the author differed from that preserved in today's Bible (the Masoretic Text) or one of the ancient translations, such as the Septuagint. This latter scenario now seems more likely in light of the fluid and diverse textual forms displayed by the biblical texts found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. A somewhat different approach has been proffered by scholars who maintain that Chronicles and Samuel-Kings are wholly independent works which draw on a common source, but this remains a minority position. While the relationship of Chronicles to its sources has important implications for understanding the nature of Chronicles and its approach to its sources—i.e., its author's willingness to rework older sources—the book's final form presents a well-defined, and independent, view on a whole range of subjects.

Thus, any discussion of Chronicles must look at it as a complete and unified work as well as considering the sources that were likely utilized by the Chronicler.

Chronicles affords us evidence of the ways in which biblical authors utilized, interpreted, supplemented, and reformulated earlier source materials, evidence which has far-reaching implications for our understanding of biblical “historiography” and, more generally, inner-biblical exegesis (how later parts of the Bible interpret earlier parts). The numerous and substantive differences between Chronicles and earlier sources have led to widely divergent views concerning the quintessential nature and purpose of Chronicles. Many earlier scholars labeled Chronicles a tendentious falsification of Israel’s past. More recent students have viewed Chronicles as a kind of edifying fiction or “exegetical” companion to Samuel-Kings. Others, noting that the presence of much nonsynoptic and wholly rewritten material does not allow for application of the term “exegesis,” have argued that the work is an independent, genuine piece of historical writing—presented, like all “history,” through the (idiosyncratic) prism of its author. Each of these perspectives has some merit.

The existence of many discrepancies between Chronicles and Samuel-Kings was noted already by Jews living shortly after the book’s composition. Ancient readers of the Bible, as well as virtually all premodern exegetes, assumed as a matter of course that there could be no substantive contradictions between Chronicles and its earlier biblical sources. The Jewish translators responsible for the Septuagint translation, living in the pre-Christian era, thus called Chronicles “Paraleipomenon,” i.e., a “supplement to things omitted.” This title implies an exegetical stance, according to which the additional material of Chronicles is not the literary creation of the author of Chronicles; rather, it represents a genuine “historical” tradition which, for one reason or another, was not included in Samuel. While this approach is incorrect, it does reflect the fact that at points Chronicles presupposes the reader’s familiarity with earlier sources (see, e.g., 1 Chron. ch 10). Rabbinic tradition, which clearly indicates awareness of the numerous differences between Chronicles and its sources, tends to view the earlier biblical compositions as historically veracious, while viewing Chronicles as a kind of midrash to these works. (On the genre midrash, see “Midrash and Jewish Interpretation,” pp. 1863–75.) At the same time, it is important to note that the Rabbis of antiquity produced no systematic commentary to Chronicles, and there is little way to determine how they resolved the many discrepancies—or, for that matter, what they viewed as a true “discrepancy”—between Chronicles and its sources. This state of affairs improved only marginally in the post-talmudic and medieval periods, during which time this work was largely neglected. Indeed, one prominent medieval exegete openly acknowledged that he had never read the book prior to composing his commentary to Samuel (Isaac Abravanel’s Introduction to Samuel; see also Radak’s Introduction to Chronicles). In general, the available evidence suggests that, at least with respect to historical traditions, Jews of antiquity accepted the version of the accounts as preserved in the earlier Deuteronomistic sources of Samuel and Kings over that of Chronicles. The relative unimportance of Chronicles is also reflected by the fact that only a handful of copies of Chronicles have been uncovered among the literary finds of the Second Temple community at Qumran (the Dead Sea Scrolls).

Chronicles advances several major themes and religious perspectives. In some cases Chronicles has merely reworked and highlighted positions addressed, in different form, in other biblical books; in other instances, Chronicles charts a wholly new course. A brief overview of some of the salient issues follows. Other issues will be addressed in the commentary.

The central topic in Chronicles is the Temple cultus (service), the institution that lies at the center of Jewish/Israelite life, and around which Chronicles weaves its view of Israel's history. This position reflects the religio-political reality of Second Temple life, in which the cultus, rather than the (defunct) Davidic monarchy, occupied center stage. For much of this period the Temple remained a modest structure, and support for its personnel was not always forthcoming; accordingly, Chronicles' formulations reflect a call for rejuvenating the national cultus.

One of the principles long viewed as a hallmark of Chronicles is its strict notion of divine providence and retribution. On this view, virtuous deeds lead to a reward (wealth, children, etc.), while bad deeds bring punishment and suffering. Similarly, so it is held, Chronicles rejects the notion of vicarious punishment and/or reward; an individual is neither punished nor rewarded for the actions of another individual. This theodicy has generally been understood as largely, but not exclusively, retrospective in nature, accounting for national (and personal) misfortunes of the past, but also offering Jews of the Second Temple period theological guidance in their day-to-day lives. Indeed, some have argued that this position is Chronicles' raison d'être. However, there is inconsistency in Chronicles' application of this principle. This fact has led some scholars to suggest that Chronicles does not differ fundamentally from other biblical books in its understanding of vicarious punishment and retribution. Rather, the book's uniqueness lies in its view of divine compassion or grace as the operative principle. It is this quality, so it is argued, which allows for repentance and forgiveness of transgressions, thereby conveying the message of eternal hope. Chronicles' approach is thus seen as primarily forward-looking and hope-inspiring, rather than retrospective.

A potentially related issue concerns Chronicles' realpolitik and the place of messianic or eschatological expectations in the work. Scholarly views differ widely, largely as a result of differing uses of the term "eschatology." To be sure, Chronicles—perhaps because of its nature as a rewriting of First Temple material, perhaps out of fear of upsetting the contemporary hegemony—contains no explicit statement on either matter. This has led to the view that the author of Chronicles was a "pragmatist" who saw contemporary Jewish society, with its functioning cult, as the fulfillment of Israel's role; Persian hegemony is accepted with no monarchic or royalist expectations. However, Chronicles' glorified and expanded depiction of the Davidic dynasty—and denigration of all other monarchs, including David's predecessor, Saul—along with the book's emphasis on "all Israel" may suggest that anticipation of a Davidic, messianic figure is a central feature of Chronicles.

Indeed, some see this messianic/eschatological yearning as the driving force behind Chronicles' forward-looking notion of grace: Proper conduct, together with divine compassion, can bring about Israel's restoration with a Davidic king at its head.

Chronicles' view regarding the northern monarchy is quite clear: Its very existence is illegitimate, since the Davidic kings alone constitute the earthly expression of the LORD's kingdom. For this reason, Chronicles discusses the fortunes of the northern monarchy only to the extent that they impact on Judah. Positions differ, however, regarding the importance of the populace of the northern tribes. Many scholars now acknowledge that the book's frequent use of the expression "all Israel," and its references to "pan-Israelite" participation in various passages (both synoptic and otherwise) indicate that Chronicles' author, in contrast to that of Ezra-Nehemiah, viewed the unification of (northern) Israel and Judah as an issue of paramount importance. This contrasts with the view of earlier scholars, who understood these same passages to mean that the true claim to the title "Israel" rests with Judah and those northern tribes aligned with her or living within her borders, yielding a position close to that of Ezra-Nehemiah.

A notable feature of Chronicles is its reticence concerning several pivotal events in the nation's history, e.g., the exodus from Egypt, the theophany at Sinai, and the "conquest" of Canaan. Many scholars see in these omissions Chronicles' expression of the eternal connection between the people of Israel and its land as an unbroken chain, having no real starting point, nor involving a hiatus after the First Temple period. At the time of Chronicles' composition, Jews constituted only one part of a heterogeneous population in their ancestral land, while a significant proportion, perhaps even a majority, of Jews lived in foreign lands. Chronicles makes a clear statement regarding the true owners of the land as well as the need for all Jews to return to their homeland.

Several aspects of Chronicles' worldview are reminiscent of views encountered in rabbinic literature. Two examples are the importance of intention (e.g., joy, sincerity) as opposed to concrete deeds alone in the service of the LORD, and the view that people are legally culpable for wrongdoing only if duly warned prior to commission of the offense. In light of this, some scholars have described Chronicles as a bridge between the "classical period" of the Bible and later rabbinic society. While there is some truth in this depiction, the points of similarity between Chronicles and rabbinic thought may have other explanations. Chronicles' frequent insistence on warning the king and/or people of Israel as a sine qua non for religious culpability may simply be part of the book's view of grace, with its repeated attempts to steer Israel in the right path. Similarly, the importance of joy, appearing mostly in connection with the cultus, may be the author's way of highlighting the centrality of the cultus, rather than constituting a general theological principle regarding the importance of intentions. Hence, while Chronicles certainly reflects positions differing from those of other biblical works, the scope of views common to Chronicles and earlier biblical works places it squarely within the biblical matrix, rendering the depiction of Chronicles as a "bridge" somewhat exaggerated.

The following is a schematic description of Chronicles' structure.

1 Chronicles 1–9: The genealogical tables

1 Chronicles 10: The reign of Saul

1 Chronicles 11–29: The reign of David

2 Chronicles 1–9: Solomon's reign

2 Chronicles 10–36.16: Post-Solomonic kings

2 Chronicles 36.17–23: Destruction of Temple, exile, and Cyrus's proclamation

[DAVID ROTHSTEIN]

1 Adam, Seth, Enosh; ²Kenan, Mahalalel, Jared; ³Enoch, Methuselah, Lamech; ⁴Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth.

⁵The sons of Japheth: Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras. ⁶The sons of Gomer: Ashkenaz, Diphath, and Togarmah. ⁷The sons of Javan: Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Rodanim.

⁸The sons of Ham: Cush, Mizraim, Put, and Canaan. ⁹The sons of Cush: Seba, Havilah, Sabta, Raama, and Sabteca. The sons of Raama: Sheba and Dedan. ¹⁰Cush begot Nimrod; he was the first mighty one on earth.

¹¹Mizraim begot the Ludim, the Anamim, the Lehabim, the Naphtuhim, ¹²the Pathrusim, the Casluhim (whence the Philistines came forth), and the Caphtorim.

¹³Canaan begot Sidon his first-born, and Heth, ¹⁴and the Jebusites, the Amorites, the Girgashites, ¹⁵the Hivites, the Arkites, the Sinites, ¹⁶the Arvadites, the Zemarites, and the Hamathites.

¹⁷The sons of Shem: Elam, Asshur, Arpachshad, Lud, Aram, Uz, Hul, Gether, and Meshech. ¹⁸Arpachshad begot Shelah; and Shelah begot Eber. ¹⁹Two sons were born to Eber: the name of the one was Peleg (for in his days the earth was divided), and the name of his brother Joktan. ²⁰Joktan begot Almodad, Sheleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, ²¹Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, ²²Ebal, Abimael, Sheba, ²³Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab; all these were the sons of Joktan.

²⁴Shem, Arpachshad, Shelah; ²⁵Eber, Peleg, Reu; ²⁶Serug, Nahor, Terah; ²⁷Abram, that is, Abraham.

²⁸The sons of Abraham: Isaac and Ishmael. ²⁹This is their line: The first-born of Ishmael, Nebaioth; and Kedar, Abdeel, Mibsam, ³⁰Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadad, Tema, ³¹Jetur, Naphish, and Kedmah. These are the sons of Ishmael. ³²The sons of Keturah, Abraham's concubine: she bore Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Chs 1–9: The genealogies. Genealogies are important in many societies, especially those structured on familial relationships. They should not always be understood literally and are used in the Bible, as elsewhere, to express the relationships between various clans and peoples as well as to highlight the place of prominent individuals or to give them a pedigree. They play an especially important role in Priestly thinking, and are reflected in postbiblical literature as well, for example in Matt. 1.1–17. Given the interests of the Chronicler, it is not surprising that the genealogies of David and the descendants of Levi, the Levites and priests, play a particularly prominent role in this section. Some of these chs have their source in other biblical material, while other parts do not, reflecting the fact that the Chronicler had access to sources beyond what is now found in the canonical Bible.

1.1–2.2: Adam to Israel. Although this material follows Genesis, its selection and arrangement (e.g., placing secondary lines of descent before the primary) emphasizes the line culminating in Israel. There is no elaboration concerning Abraham, a point which, together with other hints in Chronicles, suggests that Chronicles views Jacob/Israel (consistently referred to as Israel in Chronicles) as the central patriarch; see 16.13. This may be part of the book's "inclusivist," pan-Israel tendency.

a With vv. 5–23, cf. Gen. 10.1–30.

b With vv. 28–33, cf. Gen. 25.1–16.

Shuah. The sons of Jokshan: Sheba and Dedan.³³ The sons of Midian: Ephah, Epher, Enoch, Abida, and Eldaah. All these were the descendants of Keturah.

³⁴ Abraham begot Isaac. The sons of Isaac: Esau and Israel.³⁵ The sons of Esau: Eliphaz, Reuel, Jeush, Jalam, and Korah.³⁶ The sons of Eliphaz: Teman, Omar, Zephi, Gatam, Kenaz, Timna, and Amalek.³⁷ The sons of Reuel: Nahath, Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah.

³⁸ The sons of Seir: Lotan, Shobal, Zibeon, Anah, Dishon, Ezer, and Dishan.³⁹ The sons of Lotan: Hori and Homam; and Lotan's sister was Timna.⁴⁰ The sons of Shobal: Alian, Manahath, Ebal, Shephi, and Onam. The sons of Zibeon: Aiah and Anah.⁴¹ The sons of Anah: Dishon. The sons of Dishon: Hamran, Eshban, Ithran, and Cheran.⁴² The sons of Ezer: Bilhan, Zaavan, and Jaakan. The sons of Dishan: Uz and Aran.

^{43a} These are the kings who reigned in the land of Edom before any king reigned over the Israelites: Bela son of Beor, and the name of his city was Dinhabah.⁴⁴ When Bela died, Jobab son of Zerah from Bozrah succeeded him as king.⁴⁵ When Jobab died, Husham of the land of the Temanites succeeded him as king.⁴⁶ When Husham died, Hadad son of Bedad, who defeated the Midianites in the country of Moab, succeeded him as king, and the name of his city was Avith.⁴⁷ When Hadad died, Samlah of Masrekah succeeded him as king.⁴⁸ When Samlah died, Saul of Rehoboth-on-the-River succeeded him as king.⁴⁹ When Saul died, Baal-hanan son of Achbor succeeded him as king.⁵⁰ When Baal-hanan died, Hadad succeeded him as king; and the name of his city was Pai, and his wife's name Mehetabel daughter of Matred daughter of Me-zahab.⁵¹ And Hadad died.

The clans of Edom were the clans of Timna, Alvah, Jetheth,⁵² Oholibamah, Elah, Pinon,⁵³ Kenaz, Teman, Mibzar,⁵⁴ Magdiel, and Iram; these are the clans of Edom.

2 These are the sons of Israel: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, ²Dan, Joseph, Benjamin, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher.³ The sons of Judah: Er, Onan, and Shelah; these three, Bath-shua the Canaanite woman

a With vv. 43–50, cf. Gen. 36.31–43.

1.43–54: The list of Edomite rulers from Gen. 36.31–43 is seemingly superfluous. Chronicles' point may be that physical descent alone is not determinative of one's worthiness; alternately, the list appears for the sake of completeness. 2.1–2: With the exception of Dan (the son of Bilhah), the children of Israel are listed according to their mothers, beginning with the children of Leah, then Rachel, then the concubines Bilhah and Zilpah.

2.3–9.1: The tribes of Israel and Judah. Although thought by some to be a later addition to the book, this listing of Israel's forebears is an integral part of Chronicles and its literary plan. It establishes the book's audience: pedigreed Jews of the Second Temple period, as the only genuine heirs to the ancestral covenant, which has its most tangible expression in possession of the land of Canaan and the functioning of the Temple cultus. The historicity of this list is far from certain. The issue is particularly acute in connection with several key figures, such as the priest Zadok, in ch 5, for whom Chronicles appears to have supplied an entirely new pedigree. The appearance in these chs of many otherwise unknown names was noted by the early Rabbis, who, consistent with their tendency attested elsewhere, employed midrash-type interpretations of these names in order to link them with individuals known from other biblical passages. In some cases the Rabbis' motive appears to have been to explain (away) the seemingly non-Israelite origin of many of these individuals; in other cases, the Rabbis are attempting to harmonize divergent traditions. The structure of this list has been variously explained. Two likely explanations follow. The list reflects geographical location; it begins with the southern tribe of Judah, the leading nonsacral tribe, and then proceeds in counter-clockwise fashion, moving to the east (trans-Jordan) before returning westward to address the northern and, then, central tribes. At the center of this list is the tribe of Levi, reflective of the tribe's central role in Chronicles. Because this geographical depiction is not fully accurate, some maintain that the author was primarily interested in Judah, Levi, and Benjamin, the tribes that remained loyal to the Davidic monarchy and the Jerusalem Temple. This accounts for the framework: Judah (at the beginning of the list), Benjamin (at the end), and Levi (in the middle). The order of the remaining tribes was deemed bore to him. But Er, Judah's first-born, was displeasing to the LORD, and He took his life. ⁴His daughter-in-law Tamar also bore him Perez and Zerah. Judah's sons were five in all.

⁵The sons of Perez: Hezron and Hamul. ⁶The sons of Zerah: Zimri, Ethan, Heman, Calcol, and Dara, five in all. ⁷The sons of Carmi: Achar, the troubler of Israel, who committed a trespass against the proscribed thing; ⁸and Ethan's son was Azariah.

⁹The sons of Hezron that were born to him: Jerahmeel, Ram, and Chelubai. ¹⁰Ram begot Amminadab, and Amminadab begot Nahshon, prince of the sons of Judah. ¹¹Nahshon was the father of Salma, Salma of Boaz, ¹²Boaz of Obed, Obed of Jesse. ¹³Jesse begot Eliab his first-born, Abinadab the second, Shimea the third, ¹⁴Nethanel the fourth, Raddai the fifth, ¹⁵Ozem the sixth, David the seventh; ¹⁶their sisters were Zeruah and Abigail. The sons of Zeruah: Abishai, Joab, and Asahel, three. ¹⁷Abigail bore Amasa, and the father of Amasa was Jether the Ishmaelite.

¹⁸Caleb son of Hezron had children by his wife Azubah, and by Jerioth; these were her sons: Jeshur, Shobab, and Ardon. ¹⁹When Azubah died, Caleb married Ephrath, who bore him Hur. ²⁰Hur begot Uri, and Uri begot Bezalel.

²¹Afterward Hezron had relations with the daughter of Machir father of Gilead—he had married her when he was sixty years old—and she bore him Segub; ²²and Segub begot Jair; he had twenty-three cities in the land of not particularly important. The tribes of Dan and Zebulun are missing from the list, possibly as the result of scribal error. Some maintain that Chronicles intentionally omitted Dan because of its association with apostasy (see Judg. chs 17–19; 1 Kings 12.29–30); this allows Chronicles to portray a religiously idealized Israel.

2.3–4.23: Judah. Judah was especially important since the majority of the Jews living in this period traced themselves to Judah, and because the Davidic king was descended from Judah. In addition to material preserved elsewhere, this list contains traditions without parallel; e.g., the claim that Caleb and Jerahmeel were brothers, and sons of Hezron. 2.3–4: A condensation of the narrative of Gen.

ch 38. 7: Chronicles' laconic formulation presupposes the reader's familiarity with the episode in Josh. 7.1–26—this suggests that Chronicles was not written to supplant the earlier Deuteronomistic History, but to offer a new interpretation of those events. The passage in Joshua expresses the importance of observing divine regulations, especially those pertaining to the realm of the sacred, and makes the point that possession of the promised land, one of Chronicles' central themes, is contingent upon compliance with biblical law. 10–17: David's ancestors. Chronicles' emphasis on David's genealogy reflects the monarch's central role within the book's theology. 12–15: David is the youngest of seven sons according to Chronicles, but 1 Samuel lists him as the youngest of either four or eight sons (see, e.g., 1 Sam. 16.7–11; 17.12–14, 17). Some scholars maintain that Chronicles reflects a mistaken understanding of 1 Sam. 16.10. More likely, placement as the seventh is meant to glorify David since the number "seven" signifies completion in the Bible. The literary (i.e., artificial) nature of this datum is buttressed by the typological number of seven generations from Ram to Jesse and by the use of a similar technique in connection with Solomon (see 3.5–6 n.). 9–13: Cf. Ruth 4.18–22. 16–17: Joab is listed as the son of David's sister, as are Abishai and Asahel. Neither Zeruah nor Abigail is ever identified as David's sister in the earlier biblical sources. This datum prepares the reader for ch 11, which credits Joab with the capture of Jerusalem. The description of Amasa as the son of an Ishmaelite is significant (see 2 Sam. 19.13, which indicates that Amasa was related to David). The MT of 2 Sam. 17.25 refers to Yether as an "Israelite," a difficult reading, which is emended by some scholars. Some medieval exegetes adopted a harmonistic approach: Yithra was an Israelite who lived in Ishmaelite territory. Chronicles' text probably indicates that its author was not bothered by Amasa's Ishmaelite descent nor by Abigail's marriage to an Ishmaelite, a position which differs markedly from Ezra-Nehemiah (see introduction). Some scholars argue that Ezra's hard-line position may have applied only to members of his generation, and that the presence of non-Israelite ancestors in Israel's (distant) past was not problematic. Rabbinic tradents were clearly aware of the difficulties posed by passages such as these. They resolved such passages by claiming that the foreign spouse had undergone religious conversion, an institution which is not attested in the biblical period, or by applying some other legalistic exegesis. 18–20: Bezalel was the most prominent member of Caleb's family, owing to his role as head

Gilead.²³ But Geshur and Aram took from them Havvoth-jair, Kenath and its dependencies, sixty towns. All these were the sons of Machir, the father of Gilead.²⁴ After the death of Hezron, in Caleb-ephraiah, Abijah, wife of Hezron, bore Ashhur, the father of Tekoa.

²⁵The sons of Jerahmeel the first-born of Hezron: Ram his first-born, Bunah, Oren, Ozem, and Ahijah.²⁶ Jerahmeel had another wife, whose name was Atarah; she was the mother of Onam.²⁷ The sons of Ram the first-born of Jerahmeel: Maaz, Jamin, and Eker.²⁸ The sons of Onam: Shammai and Jada. The sons of Shammai: Nadab and Abishur.²⁹ The name of Abishur's wife was Abihail, and she bore him Ahban and Molid.³⁰ The sons of Nadab: Seled and Appaim; Seled died childless.³¹ The sons of Appaim: Ishi. The sons of Ishi: Sheshan. The sons of Sheshan: Ahlai.³² The sons of Jada, Shammai's brother: Jether and Jonathan; Jether died childless.³³ The sons of Jonathan: Peleth and Zaza. These were the descendants of Jerahmeel.³⁴ Sheshan had no sons, only daughters; Sheshan had an Egyptian slave, whose name was Jarha.³⁵ So Sheshan gave his daughter in marriage to Jarha his slave; and she bore him Attai.³⁶ Attai begot Nathan, and Nathan begot Zabad.³⁷ Zabad begot Ephlal, and Ephlal begot Obed.³⁸ Obed begot Jehu, and Jehu begot Azariah.³⁹ Azariah begot Helez, and Helez begot Eleasah.⁴⁰ Eleasah begot Sisamai, and Sisamai begot Shallum.⁴¹ Shallum begot Jekamiah, and Jekamiah begot Elishama.

⁴²The sons of Caleb brother of Jerahmeel: Meshah his first-born, who was the father of Ziph. The sons of Mare-shah father of Hebron.⁴³ The sons of Hebron: Korah, Tap-puah, Rekem, and Shema.⁴⁴ Shema begot Raham the father of Jorkeam, and Rekem begot Shammai.⁴⁵ The son of Shammai: Maon, and Maon begot Bethzur.⁴⁶ Ephah, Caleb's concubine, bore Haran, Moza, and Gazez; Haran begot Gazez.⁴⁷ The sons of Jahdai: Regem, Jotham, Geshan, Pelet, Ephah, and Shaaph.⁴⁸ Maacah, Caleb's concubine, bore Sheber and Tirhanah.⁴⁹ She also bore Shaaph father of Madmannah, Sheva father of Machbenah and father of Gibeab; the daughter of Caleb was Achsah.⁵⁰ These were the descendants of Caleb.

The sons of Hur the first-born of Ephraiah: Shobal father of Kiriath-jearim,⁵¹ Salma father of Bethlehem, Haraph father of Beth-gader.⁵² Shobal father of Kiriath-jearim had sons: Haroeh, half of the Menuhoth.⁵³ And the families of Kiriath-jearim: the Ithrites, the Puthites, the Shumathites, and the Mishraites; from these came the Zorathites and the Eshtaolites.⁵⁴ The sons of Salma: Bethlehem, the Netophathites, Atroth-beth-joaab, and half of the craftsman of the Tabernacle; this explains the juxtaposition of vv. 18, 19 with v. 20. 42-49: Many of the children mentioned here (e.g., Hebron) are known as geographical locations in Judah; the genealogical language here connects the founding of these cities to descendants of Caleb (cf. Josh. 14.12-14; Judg. 1.10), emphasizing the role of this important Judean in the foundation of important cities throughout Judah. In Torah tradition, Caleb attains prominence as a loyal spy (see Num. chs 13-14), but as noted, Chronicles deemphasizes the exodus and "conquest," and thus his significance is given a different reason here.

Manahathites, the Zorites.⁵⁵ The families of the scribes that dwelt at Jabez: the Tirathites, the Shimeathites, the Sucathites; these are the Kenites who came from Ham-math, father of the house of Rechab.

3 These are the sons of David who were born to him in Hebron: the first-born Amnon, by Ahinoam the Jezreelite; the second Daniel, by Abigail the Carmelite;² the third Absalom, son of Maacah daughter of King Talmai of Geshur; the fourth Adonijah, son of Haggith;³ the fifth Shephatiah, by Abital; the sixth Ithream, by his wife Eglah;⁴ six were born to him in Hebron. He reigned there seven years and six months, and in Jerusalem he reigned thirty-three years.⁵ These were born to him in Jerusalem: Shimea, Shobab, Nathan, and Solomon, four by Bath-shua daughter of Ammiel;⁶ then Ithar, Elishama, Eliphelet,⁷ Nogah, Nepheg, Japhia,⁸ Elishama, Eliada, and Eliphelet—nine.⁹ All were David's sons, besides the sons of the concubines; and Tamar was their sister.

¹⁰The son of Solomon: Rehoboam; his son Abijah, his son Asa, his son Jehoshaphat,¹¹ his son Joram, his son Ahaziah, his son Joash,¹² his son Amaziah, his son Azariah, his son Jotham,¹³ his son Ahaz, his son Hezekiah, his son Manasseh,¹⁴ his son Amon, and his son Josiah.¹⁵ The sons of Josiah: Johanan the first-born, the second Jehoiakim, the third Zedekiah, the fourth Shallum.¹⁶ The descendants of Jehoiakim: his son Jeconiah, his son Zedekiah;¹⁷ and the sons of Jeconiah, the captive: Shealtiel his son,¹⁸ Malchiram, Pedaiah, Shenazzar, Jekamiah, Hoshama, and Nedabiah;¹⁹ the sons of Pedaiah: Zerubbabel and Shimei; the sons of Zerubbabel: Meshullam and Hananiah, and Shelomith was their sister;²⁰ Hashubah, Ohel, Berechiah, Hasadiah, and Jushab-hesed—five.²¹ And the sons of Hananiah: Pelatiah and Jeshaiiah; the sons of [Jeshaiiah]: Rephah; the sons of [Rephah]: Arnan; the sons of [Arnan]: Obadiah; the sons of [Obadiah]: Shecaniah.²² And the sons of Shecaniah: Shemaiah; and the sons of Shemaiah: Hattush, and Igal, and Bariah, and Neariah, and Shaphat—six.²³ And the sons of Neariah: Elioenai, and Hizkiah, and Azrikam—three.²⁴ And the sons of Elioenai: Hodaviah, and Eliashib, and Pelaiah, and Akkub, and Johanan, and Delaiah, and Anani—seven.

4 The sons of Judah: Perez, Hezron, Carmi, Hur, and Shobal.² Reaiah son of Shobal begot Jahath, and Jahath begot Ahumai and Lahad. These were the families of the Zorathites.³ These were [the sons of] the father of Etam: Jezreel, Ishma, and Idbash; and the name of their sister

3.1-24: David's descendants. See 2.10-17 n. 1: 2 Sam. 3.3 states that Abigail's son was named Kileab. Rabbinic and medieval commentators (Targum Chron., Radak; cf. b. Ber. 4a) maintained that the child bore both names; his given name was Daniel, meaning "God has judged me (innocent of any guilt in the death of Abigail's husband, Nabal)"; the name Kileab, meaning "like the father" (or "entirely the father"), was given later, when it became clear that the son bore a striking resemblance to David, thereby removing any suspicion of Nabal's paternity. (Note that this tradition views Chronicles as maintaining the original name.) The actual "facts" remain uncertain. Chronicles nowhere records the circumstances surrounding David's marriage to Abigail (1 Sam. ch 25), possibly because they present a less than flattering picture of David or because the author may not have been interested in purely personal aspects of David's life. 2: The author does not hesitate to mention David's marriage to a foreign woman, Maacah; see 2.12-15 n. Such marriages often served political purposes in antiquity. 5: Solomon appears as the fourth son born to David in Jerusalem, and the fourth son of Bath-shua (= Bathsheba). According to 2 Sam. 12.24, Solomon is the second of as many sons born to Bathsheba. Chronicles' version glorifies Solomon, by claiming that despite having three older brothers, he alone was chosen to be king. The "three-four" number scheme, where the fourth is climactic (as in Judah, the fourth son of Jacob), is common in the Bible. 17-24: Exilic and postexilic line, until Chronicles' time. This passage contains many otherwise unknown traditions, and there are substantive differences among the ancient versions. The updating of the genealogy of David likely reflects hopes that one of his descendants would again assume the throne.

4.1-20: Sons of Perez. The line which eventually produced David; was Hazleponi,⁴ and Penuel was the father of Gedor, and Ezer the father of Hushah. These were the sons of Hur, the first-born of Ephrathah, the father of Bethlehem.⁵ Ashhur the father of Tekoa had two wives, Helah and Naarah;⁶ Naarah bore him Ahuzam, Hepher, Temeni, and Ahashtari. These were the sons of Naarah.⁷ The sons of Helah: Zereth, Zohar, and Ethnan.⁸ Koz was the father of Anub, Zobebah, and the families of Aharhel son of Harum.⁹ Jabez was more esteemed than his brothers; and his mother named him Jabez, "Because," she said, "I bore him in pain."^a ¹⁰Jabez invoked the God of Israel, saying, "Oh, bless me, enlarge my territory, stand by me, and make me not suffer pain from misfortune!" And God granted what he asked.¹¹ Chelub the brother of Shuhah begot Mehira, who was the father of Eshton.¹² Eshton begot Bethrapha, Paseah, and Tehinnah father of Ir-nahash. These were the men of Recah.¹³ The sons of Kenaz: Othniel and Seraiah; and the sons of Othniel:¹⁴ Hathath and Meonothai. He begot Ophrah. Seraiah begot Joab father of Ge-harashim,^b so-called because they were craftsmen.¹⁵ The sons of Caleb son of Jephunneh: Iru, Elah, and Naam; and the sons of Elah: Kenaz.¹⁶ The sons of Jehallelel: Ziph, Ziphah, Tiria, and Asarel.¹⁷ The sons of Ezra: Jether, Mered, Ephraim, and Jalon. She^c conceived and bore Miriam, Shammai, and Ishbah father of Eshtemoa.¹⁸ And his Judahite wife bore Jered father of Gedor, Heber father of Soco, and Jekuthiel father of Zanoah. These were the sons of Bithiah daughter of Pharaoh, whom Mered married.¹⁹ The sons of the wife of Hodiah sister of Naham were the fathers of Keilah the Garmite and Eshtemoa the Maacathite.²⁰ The sons of Shimon: Amnon, Rinnah, Benhanan, and Tilon. The sons of Ishi: Zoheth and Benzoheth.²¹ The sons of Shelah son of Judah: Er father of Lecah, Laadah father of Mareshah, and the families of the linen factory at Beth-ashbea;²² and Jokim, and the men of Cozeba and Joash, and Saraph, who married into Moab and Jashubi Lehem (the records are ancient).²³ These were the potters who dwelt at Netaim and Gederah; they dwelt there in the king's service.

²⁴The sons of Simeon: Nemuel, Jamin, Jarib, Zerach, Shaul;²⁵ his son Shallum, his son Mibsam, his son Mishma.²⁶ The sons of Mishma: his son Hammuel, his son Zaccur, his son Shimei.²⁷ Shimei had sixteen sons and six daughters; but his brothers had not many children; in all, their this genealogy continues the end of ch 2, which has been disrupted by the insertion of the genealogy of David. 10: Such short notices, which interrupt the genealogies, are found throughout the introduction of Chronicles; this notice outlines a vow, a popular sign of biblical religiosity (see Judg. 11.30-31; 1 Sam. 1.11). 21-23: The presentation of Shelah's descendants suggests that Shelah and his descendants remained in Canaan and were not subjected to Egyptian bondage, a datum which contradicts Gen. 46.12; Num. 26.20; see 7.20-29 n. 22: The Hebrew text behind "married into Moab" is opaque and variously translated. The present translation follows the Aramaic Targum. LXX renders "settled in Moab"; others, "ruled in Moab" or "worked for Moab." 24-43: Simeon. This tribe was traditionally associated with Judah (so, e.g., Judg. 1.3), a fact which explains its position in the list.

a Heb. 'oseb, connected with "Jabez."

b Lit. "the valley of the craftsmen."

c Apparently Bithiah; cf. v. 18.

families were not as prolific as the Judahites.²⁸ They dwelt in Beersheba, Moladah, Hazar-shual,²⁹ Bilhah, Ezem, Tolad,³⁰ Bethuel, Hormah, Ziklag,³¹ Beth-marcaboth, Hazar-susim, Beth-biri, and Shaaraim. These were their towns until David became king,³² together with their villages, Etam, Ain, Rimmon, Tochen, and Ashan—five towns,³³ along with all their villages that were around these towns as far as Baal; such were their settlements.

Registered in their genealogy were:³⁴ Meshobab, Jamlech, Joshah son of Amaziah,³⁵ Joel, Jehu son of Joshibiah son of Seraiah son of Asiel.³⁶ Elioenai, Jaakobah, Jeshohai, Asaiah, Adiel, Jesimiel, Benaiah,³⁷ Ziza son of Shiphi son of Allon son of Jedaiah son of Shimri son of Shemaiah—³⁸these mentioned by name were chiefs in their families, and their clans increased greatly.³⁹ They went to the approaches to Gedor, to the eastern side of the valley, in search of pasture for their flocks.⁴⁰ They found rich, good pasture, and the land was ample, quiet, and peaceful. The former inhabitants were of Ham;⁴¹ those recorded by name came in the days of King Hezekiah of Judah, and attacked their encampments and the Meunim who were found there, and wiped them out forever, and settled in their place, because there was pasture there for their flocks.⁴² And some of them, five hundred of the Simeonites, went to Mount Seir, with Pelatiah, Neariah, Rephah, and Uzziel, sons of Ishi, at their head,⁴³ and they destroyed the last surviving Amalekites, and they live there to this day.

5 The sons of Reuben the first-born of Israel. (He was the first-born; but when he defiled his father's bed, his birthright was given to the sons of Joseph son of Israel, so he is not reckoned as first-born in the genealogy;² though Judah became more powerful than his brothers and a leader came from him, yet the birthright belonged to Joseph.)³ The sons of Reuben, the first-born of Israel: Enoch, Pallu, Hezron, and Carmi.⁴ The sons of Joel: his son Shemaiah, his son Gog, his son Shimei,⁵ his son Micah, his son Reaiah, his son Baal,⁶ his son Beerah—whom King Tillegath-pilneser of Assyria exiled—was chieftain of the Reubenites.⁷ And his kinsmen, by their families, according to their lines in the genealogy: the head, Jeiel, and Zechariah,⁸ and Bela son of Azaz son of Shema son of Joel; he dwelt in Aroer as far as Nebo and Baal-meon.⁹ He also dwelt to the east as far as the fringe of the wilderness this side of the Euphrates, because their cattle had increased in the land of Gilead.¹⁰ And in the days of Saul they made war on the Hagarites, who fell by their hand; and they occupied their tents throughout all the region east of Gilead.

5.1–22: Reuben, Gad, Transjordan. The author explains (vv. 1–10) why it is that Reuben, Jacob's first-born according to Genesis, did not occupy a leading role; see Gen. 35:22; 49:3–4. The formulation of vv. 1–2 highlights Judah's central role, while recognizing the significant role of the Joseph tribes (Ephraim and Manasseh). This picture neatly summarizes Chronicles' depiction of the true (i.e., pan-) Israel. Chronicles' emphasis on Judah is the reason that the genealogies do not begin with Reuben.

¹¹The sons of Gad dwelt facing them in the land of Bashan as far as Salcah: ¹²Joel the chief, Shapham the second, Janai, and Shaphat in Bashan. ¹³And by clans: Michael, Meshullam, Sheba, Jorai, Jacan, Zia, and Eber—seven. ¹⁴These were the sons of Abihail son of Huri son of Jaroah son of Gilead son of Michael son of Jeshishai son of Jahdo son of Buz; ¹⁵Ahi son of Abdiel son of Guni was chief of their clan, ¹⁶and they dwelt in Gilead, in Bashan, and in its dependencies, and in all the pasturelands of Sharon, to their limits. ¹⁷All of them were registered by genealogies in the days of King Jotham of Judah, and in the days of King Jeroboam of Israel.

¹⁸The Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh had warriors who carried shield and sword, drew the bow, and were experienced at war—44,760, ready for service. ¹⁹They made war on the Hagarites—Jetur, Naphtish, and Nodab. ²⁰They prevailed against them; the Hagarites and all who were with them were delivered into their hands, for they cried to God in the battle, and He responded to their entreaty because they trusted in Him. ²¹They carried off their livestock: 50,000 of their camels, 250,000 sheep, 2,000 asses, and 100,000 people. ²²For many fell slain, because it was God's battle. And they dwelt in their place until the exile.

²³The members of the half-tribe of Manasseh dwelt in the land; they were very numerous from Bashan to Baalhermon, Senir, and Mount Hermon. ²⁴These were the chiefs of their clans: Epher, Ishi, Eliel, Azriel, Jeremiah, Hodaviah, and Jahdiel, men of substance, famous men, chiefs of their clans. ²⁵But they trespassed against the God of their fathers by going astray after the gods of the peoples of the land, whom God had destroyed before them. ²⁶So the God of Israel roused the spirit of King Pul of Assyria—the spirit of King Tillegath-pilneser of Assyria—and he carried them away, namely, the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, and brought them to Halah, Habor, Hara, and the river Gozan, to this day.

²⁷The sons of Levi: Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. ²⁸The sons of Kohath: Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel. ²⁹The children of Amram: Aaron, Moses, and Miriam. The sons of Aaron: Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. ³⁰Eleazar begot Phinehas, Phinehas begot Abishua, ³¹Abishua begot Bukki, Bukki begot Uzzi, ³²Uzzi begot Zerariah,

5.23–26: Half-tribe of Manasseh. Significantly, Chronicles limits mention of the northern exile to that suffered by the Cisjordanian tribes of northern Israel. The implication is that the Assyrian exile of the northern tribes was limited in scope; cf. 2 Kings ch 17. This passage is an example of the intimate bond between Israel and its land in Chronicles; see 2 Chron. 30.1 n. For the expression “they trespassed,” see 9.1. Pul is a late Babylonian variant of the name Tiglath Pil(n)eser III, the great Assyrian expansionist king who reigned 745–727 BCE.

5.27–41: The high priestly line. Zadok's Aaronide pedigree does not appear in Samuel; many scholars thus assume that he was of foreign, possibly Jebusite, origin. The motive behind Chronicles' position is that Torah (Priestly) law requires that all priests be descendants of Moses' brother, Aaron (see esp. Num. ch 18). Since, according to Chronicles, David is the archpatron of all matters pertaining to Israel's sacrificial cult, Zadok had to be provided with an acceptable pedigree.

Zerahiah begot Meraioth, ³³Meraioth begot Amariah, Amariah begot Ahitub, ³⁴Ahitub begot Zadok, Zadok begot Ahimaaz, ³⁵Ahimaaz begot Azariah, Azariah begot Johanan, ³⁶and Johanan begot Azariah (it was he who served as priest in the House that Solomon built in Jerusalem). ³⁷Azariah begot Amariah, Amariah begot Ahitub, ³⁸Ahitub begot Zadok, Zadok begot Shallum, ³⁹Shallum begot Hilkiyah, Hilkiyah begot Azariah, ⁴⁰Azariah begot Seraiah, Seraiah begot Jehozadak; ⁴¹and Jehozadak went into exile when the LORD exiled Judah and Jerusalem by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar.

6 The sons of Levi: Gershom, Kohath, and Merari. ²And these are the names of the sons of Gershom: Libni and Shimei. ³The sons of Kohath: Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel. ⁴The sons of Merari: Mahli and Mushi. These were the families of the Levites according to their clans. ⁵Of Gershom: his son Libni, his son Jahath, his son Zimmah, ⁶his son Joah, his son Iddo, his son Zerah, his son Jeathrai. ⁷The sons of Kohath: his son Amminadab, his son Korah, his son Assir, ⁸his son Elkanah, his son Ebiasaph, his son Assir, ⁹his son Tahath, his son Uriel, his son Uzziel, and his son Shaul. ¹⁰The sons of Elkanah: Amasai and Ahimoth, ¹¹his son Elkanah, his son Zophai, his son Nahath, ¹²his son Eliab, his son Jeroham, his son Elkanah. ¹³The sons of Samuel: his first-born ^aVashni, and ^aAbijah. ¹⁴The sons of Merari: Mahli, his son Libni, his son Shimei, his son Uzzah, ¹⁵his son Shimea, his son Haggiah, and his son Asaiah.

¹⁶These were appointed by David to be in charge of song in the House of the LORD, from the time the Ark came to rest. ¹⁷They served at the Tabernacle of the Tent of Meeting with song until Solomon built the House of the LORD in Jerusalem; and they carried out their duties as prescribed for them. ¹⁸Those were the appointed men; and their sons were: the Kohathites: Heman the singer, son of Joel son of Samuel ¹⁹son of Elkanah son of Jeroham son of Eliel son of Toah ²⁰son of Zuph son of Elkanah son of Mahath son of Amasai ²¹son of Elkanah son of Joel son of Azariah son of Zephaniah ²²son of Tahath son of Assir son of Ebiasaph son of Korah ²³son of Izhar son of Kohath son of Levi son of Israel; ²⁴and his kinsman Asaph, who stood on his right, namely, Asaph son of Berechiah son of Shimea ²⁵son of Michael son of Baaseiah son of Malchijah ²⁶son of Ethni son of Zerah son of Adaiah ²⁷son of Ethan son of Zimmah son of Shimei ²⁸son of Jahath son of Ger-

6.1–81: Levi. The descendants of Gershom, Kohath, and Merari are each divided into “Levites” (vv. 1–15) and musicians/singers (vv. 16–31). Kohath contains a third group, the high priests, descended from Amram. The placement of this last group in the middle position (fourth among seven) reflects its central role. 13: The appearance of Elkanah and the prophet Samuel in the list of Levites is unparalleled in other sources. 1 Sam. ch 1 indicates that Samuel was of either Ephraimite or, less plausibly, Judahite origin. Chronicles’ revised position is informed by the fact that 1 Sam. chs 2–3 present Samuel as having ministered in the Shiloh Tabernacle, an activity typically identified with (later) Levitic service. Inasmuch as Torah law (e.g., Num. ch 18) proscribes cultic service by anyone not of Levitic descent, the author felt compelled to attach an explicit Levitic pedigree to Samuel. Some argue that 1 Samuel views Samuel’s family as a Levitical family hailing from Ephraim or Judah. 16–17: Outside of Chronicles, there is no indication that Levites were responsible for cultic music in the First Temple, and many scholars maintain that this institution is a Second Temple innovation. On this view, Chronicles’ claim is part of its broadly attested tendency to attribute the cultic practices of its day to hoary antiquity; antiquity implies authenticity and greater sanctity, and allows the Jews of Chronicles’ time to see their (modest) Temple as part of an illustrious tradition requiring their continued support. Scholars who hold this view also suggest that this section is to be connected to the narrative sections later in Chronicles (much of chs 15–29) that tendentiously suggest that David established the basic institutions and framework for the Temple though only Solomon his son built the actual structure. Other scholars, however, accept as authentic Chronicles’ tradition regarding a First Temple Levitical musical guild. In support of this position a-a Some ancient vv. read “Joel, and the second”; cf. 1 Sam. 8.2.

shom son of Levi. ²⁹On the left were their kinsmen: the sons of Merari: Ethan son of Kishi son of Abdi son of Mal-luch ³⁰son of Hashabiah son of Amaziah son of Hilkiyah ³¹son of Amzi son of Bani son of Shemer ³²son of Mahli son of Mushi son of Merari son of Levi; ³³and their kinsmen the Levites were appointed for all the service of the Tabernacle of the House of God.

³⁴But Aaron and his sons made offerings upon the altar of burnt offering and upon the altar of incense, performing all the tasks of the most holy place, to make atonement for Israel, according to all that Moses the servant of God had commanded. ³⁵These are the sons of Aaron: his son Eleazar, his son Phinehas, his son Abishua, ³⁶his son Bukki, his son Uzzi, his son Zerariah, ³⁷his son Meraioth, his son Amariah, his son Ahitub, ³⁸his son Zadok, his son Ahimaaz. ³⁹^aThese are their dwelling-places according to their settlements within their borders: to the sons of Aaron of the families of Kohathites, for theirs was the [first] lot; ⁴⁰they gave them Hebron in the land of Judah and its surrounding pasturelands, ⁴¹but the fields of the city and its villages they gave to Caleb son of Jephunneh. ⁴²To the sons of Aaron they gave the cities^b of refuge: Hebron and Libnah with its pasturelands, Jattir and Eshtemoa with its pasturelands, ⁴³Hilen with its pasturelands, Debir with its pasturelands, ⁴⁴Ashan with its pasturelands, and Bethshemesh with its pasturelands. ⁴⁵From the tribe of Benjamin, Geba with its pasturelands, Alemeth with its pasturelands, and Anathoth with its pasturelands. All their cities throughout their families were thirteen.

⁴⁶To the remaining Kohathites were given by lot out of the family of the tribe, out of the half-tribe, the half of Manasseh, ten cities. ⁴⁷To the Gershonites according to their families were allotted thirteen cities out of the tribes of Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, and Manasseh in Bashan. ⁴⁸To the Merarites according to their families were allotted twelve cities out of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Zebulun. ⁴⁹So the people of Israel gave the Levites the cities with their pasturelands. ⁵⁰They gave them by lot out of the tribe of the Judahites these cities that are mentioned by name, and out of the tribe of the Simeonites, and out of the tribe of the Benjaminites.

⁵¹And some of the families of the sons of Kohath had cities of their territory out of the tribe of Ephraim. ⁵²They gave them the cities of refuge: Shechem with its pasturelands in the hill country of Ephraim, Gezer with its pasturelands, ⁵³Jokmeam with its pasturelands, Beth-horon are the following considerations: (1) David is elsewhere portrayed as having a personal connection with music (1 Sam. chs 16–18; 2 Sam. 6.5; 23.1); (2) the evidence of other ancient Near Eastern cultures that suggests that music was an important part of the cult, often under royal patronage, from an early period. Chronicles' list suggests data differing from those reflected in the superscriptions to Psalms, suggesting different (possibly preexilic) traditions. Cf. Ezra ch 2; Neh. ch 7. 54–81: The list of dwelling places parallels Josh. 21.5–39, though there are several differences with respect to sequence. The chronological relationship between the passages is debated.

^a With vv. 24–51, cf. Josh. 21.3–42. ^b Josh. 21.13, "city."

with its pasturelands, ⁵⁴Aijalon with its pasturelands, Gath-rimmon with its pasturelands; ⁵⁵and out of the half-tribe of Manasseh: Aner with its pasturelands, and Bileam with its pasturelands, for the rest of the families of the Kohathites.

⁵⁶To the Gershomites; out of the half-tribe of Manasseh: Golan in Bashan with its pasturelands and Ashtaroth with its pasturelands; ⁵⁷and out of the tribe of Issachar: Kedesh with its pasturelands, Dobrath with its pasturelands, ⁵⁸Ramoth with its pasturelands, and Anem with its pasturelands; ⁵⁹out of the tribe of Asher: Mashal with its pasturelands, Abdon with its pasturelands, ⁶⁰Hukok with its pasturelands, and Rehob with its pasturelands; ⁶¹and out of the tribe of Naphtali: Kedesh in Galilee with its pasturelands; Hammon with its pasturelands, and Kiriathaim with its pasturelands. ⁶²To the rest of the Merarites, out of the tribe of Zebulun: Rimmono with its pasturelands, Tabor with its pasturelands; ⁶³and beyond the Jordan at Jericho, on the east side of the Jordan, out of the tribe of Reuben: Bezer in the wilderness with its pasturelands, Jahaz with its pasturelands, ⁶⁴Kedemoth with its pasturelands, and Mephaath with its pasture lands; ⁶⁵and out of the tribe of Gad: Ramoth in Gilead with its pasturelands, Mahanaim with its pasturelands, ⁶⁶Heshbon with its pasturelands, and Jazer with its pasturelands.

7The sons of Issachar: Tola, Puah, Jashub, and Shimron—four. ²The sons of Tola: Uzzi, Rephaiah, Jeriel, Jahmai, Ibsam, Shemuel, chiefs of their clans, men of substance according to their lines; their number in the days of David was 22,600. ³The sons of Uzzi: Izrahiah. And the sons of Izrahiah: Michael, Obadiah, Joel, and Isshiah—five. All of them were chiefs. ⁴And together with them, by their lines, according to their clans, were units of the fighting force, 36,000, for they had many wives and sons. ⁵Their kinsmen belonging to all the families of Issachar were in all 87,000 men of substance; they were all registered by genealogy.

⁶[The sons of] Benjamin: Bela, Becher, and Jediael—three. ⁷The sons of Bela: Ezbon, Uzzi, Uzziel, Jerimoth, and Iri—five, chiefs of clans, men of substance, registered by genealogy—22,034. ⁸The sons of Becher: Zemirah, Joash, Eliezer, Elioenai, Omri, Jeremoth, Abijah, Anathoth, and Alemeth. All these were the sons of Becher; ⁹and they were registered by genealogy according to their lines, as chiefs of their clans, men of substance—20,200. ¹⁰The sons of Jediael: Bilhan. And the sons of Bilhan: Jeush, Benjamin, Ehud, Chenaanah, Zethan, Tarshish, and Ahishahar. ¹¹All

7.1–12: Issachar and Benjamin. The Benjamin list occasions surprise: (1) It opens with the word “Benjamin” instead of “the sons of Benjamin” (NJPS supplies “The sons of”); (2) the detailed list of Benjamin appears in ch 8; and (3) there is little shared material with Torah sources (Gen. 46.21; Num. 26.38–42). These data suggest that this passage draws on a source that is no longer extant outside of the Torah.

The Levitical cities according to First Chronicles. The dashed lines show the approximate boundaries of the tribes.

these were the sons of Jediael, chiefs of the clans, men of substance—17,200, who made up the fighting force. ¹²And Shuppmim and Huppmim were the sons of Ir; Hushim the sons of Aher.

¹³The sons of Naphtali: Jahziel, Guni, Jezer, and Shalum, the descendants of Bilhah.

¹⁴The sons of Manasseh: Asriel, whom his Aramean concubine bore; she bore Machir the father of Gilead.

¹⁵And Machir took wives for Huppmim and for Shuppmim. The name of his sister was Maacah. And the name of the second was Zelophehad; and Zelophehad had daughters.

¹⁶And Maacah the wife of Machir bore a son, and she named him Peresh; and the name of his brother was Sheresh; and his sons were Ulam and Rekem. ¹⁷The sons of Ulam: Bedan. These were the sons of Gilead son of Machir son of Manasseh. ¹⁸And his sister Hammolecheth bore Ishhod, Abiezer, and Mahlah. ¹⁹The sons of Shemida were Ahian, Shechem, Likhi, and Aniam.

²⁰The sons of Ephraim: Shuthelah, his son Bered, his son Tahath, his son Eleadah, his son Tahath, ²¹his son Zabad, his son Shuthelah, also Ezer and Elead. The men of Gath, born in the land, killed them because they had gone down to take their cattle. ²²And Ephraim their father mourned many days, and his brothers came to comfort him. ²³He cohabited with his wife, who conceived and bore a son; and she named him Beriah, because it occurred when there was misfortune^a in his house. ²⁴His daughter was Sheerah, who built both Lower and Upper Beth-horon, and Uzzen-sheerah. ²⁵His son Rephah, his son Resheph, his son Telah, his son Tahan, ²⁶his son Ladan, his son Ammihud, his son Elishama, ²⁷his son Non, his son Joshua. ²⁸Their possessions and settlements were Bethel and its dependencies, and on the east Naaran, and on the west Gezer and its dependencies, Shechem and its dependencies, and Aiah and its dependencies; ²⁹also along the borders of the Manassites, Beth-shean and its dependencies, Taanach and its dependencies, Megiddo and its dependencies, Dor and its dependencies. In these dwelt the sons of Joseph son of Israel.

^a Heb. bera'ah.

7.13: Naphtali. This passage's brevity may indicate that material has been lost.

7.14–19: Manasseh. This passage claims that Manasseh and his son, Machir, were born in trans-Jordanian territory (with no indication that either ever left Egypt), consistent with the Chronicler's ideological de-emphasis of the exodus, whereas Torah tradition (Gen. 41.51–52; Num. 27.1–4; 32.39–42; Deut. 3.14–15) records their birth in Egypt. Similarly, the claim that Asriel was Manasseh's son contradicts Num. 26.31, which mentions Asriel as Manasseh's great-grandson. Some medieval commentators argued that the Asriel mentioned here is, in fact, consistent with Numbers, and that Chronicles mentions him first because only he was born to a full wife, whereas Machir was born to Joseph's concubine. The difficulties are plain; note, e.g., that the brothers of Asriel (according to Numbers) are not mentioned here. Recent attempts at textual reconstruction of the passage remain speculative.

7.20–29: Ephraim. This passage maintains that Ephraim and his family remained in Canaan, in contradiction to Gen. chs 41–50, which states that Ephraim and his brother, Manasseh, were born, and died, in Egypt. The Aramaic Targum along with several rabbinic sources (Mek. de R. Ishmael, beshallah (introduction); b. Sanh. 92b) resolved this contradiction by claiming that some members of Ephraim left Egypt and infiltrated Canaan before the divinely "appointed time" of redemption had arrived; their failure was a sign (especially for later generations) that one ought not to "play God" and try to expedite (messianic) redemption. Other traditional sources (b. Sanh. 92b; Tg. Ps.-J. and Frg. Tg. to Exod. 13.17) claim that the fiasco was the result of faulty computation of the period of enslavement imposed by Gen. 15.13, while some sources conflate the two explanations (Song Rab. to 2.7). Some medieval exegetes (Radak) argued that the words "born in the land" refer to the people of Ephraim and that the event described herein took place in either the desert or Transjordan. Some modern scholars simply emend the text, viewing the word "Ephraim" as a gloss, or maintain that the name refers to a later descendant. Others argue against emendation, claiming that this passage is part of Chronicles' portrayal of the eternal bond between Israel and its land.

³⁰The sons of Asher: Imnah, Ishvah, Ishvi, Beriah, and their sister Serah. ³¹The sons of Beriah: Heber and Malchiel, who was the father of Birzaith. ³²Heber begot Japhlet, Shomer, Hotham, and their sister, Shua. ³³The sons of Japhlet: Pasach, Bimhal, and Ashvath. These were the sons of Japhlet. ³⁴The sons of Shemer: Ahi, Rohgah, Hubbah, and Aram. ³⁵The sons of Helem his brother: Zophah, Imna, Shelesh, and Amal. ³⁶The sons of Zophah: Suah, Harnepher, Shual, Beri, Imrah, ³⁷Bezer, Hod, Shamma, Shilshah, Ithran, and Beera. ³⁸The sons of Jether: Jephunneh, Pispa, and Ara. ³⁹The sons of Ulla: Arah, Hanniel, and Rizia. ⁴⁰All of these men of Asher, chiefs of the clans, select men, men of substance, heads of the chieftains. And they were registered by genealogy according to fighting force; the number of the men was 26,000 men.

8 Benjamin begot Bela his first-born, Ashbel the second, Aharah the third, ²Nohah the fourth, and Rapha the fifth. ³And Bela had sons: Addar, Gera, Abihud, ⁴Abishua, Naaman, Ahoah, ⁵Gera, Shephuphan, and Huram. ⁶These were the sons of Ehud—they were chiefs of clans of the inhabitants of Geba, and they were exiled to Manahath: ⁷Naaman, Ahijah, and Gera—he exiled them and begot Uzza and Ahihud. ⁸And Shaharaim had sons in the country of Moab after he had sent away Hushim and Baara his wives. ⁹He had sons by Hodesh his wife: Jobab, Zibia, Mesha, Malcam, ¹⁰Jeuz, Sachiah, and Mirmah. These were his sons, chiefs of clans. ¹¹He also begot by Hushim: Abitub and Elpaal. ¹²The sons of Elpaal: Eber, Misham, and Shemed, who built Ono and Lod with its dependencies, ¹³and Beriah and Shema—they were chiefs of clans of the inhabitants of Aijalon, who put to flight the inhabitants of Gath; ¹⁴and Ahio, Shashak, and Jeremoth. ¹⁵Zebadiah, Arad, Eder, ¹⁶Michael, Ishpah, and Joha were sons of Beriah. ¹⁷Zebadiah, Meshullam, Hizki, Heber, ¹⁸Ishmerai, Izliah, and Jobab were the sons of Elpaal. ¹⁹Jakim, Zichri, Zabdi, ²⁰Elienai, Zillethai, Eliel, ²¹Adaiah, Beraiah, and Shimrath were the sons of Shimei. ²²Ishpan, Eber, Eliel, ²³Abdon, Zichri, Hanan, ²⁴Hananiah, Elam, Anthothiah, ²⁵Iphdeiah, and Penuel were the sons of Shashak. ²⁶Shamsherai, Shehariah, Athaliah, ²⁷Jareshiah, Elijah, and Zichri were the sons of Jeroham. ²⁸These were the chiefs of the clans, according to their lines. These chiefs dwelt in Jerusalem.

²⁹The father of Gibeon dwelt in Gibeon, and the name of his wife was Maacah. ³⁰His first-born son: Abdon; then Zur, Kish, Baal, Nadab, ³¹Gedor, Ahio, Zecher. ³²Mikloth begot Shimeah. And they dwelt in Jerusalem opposite

7.30–40: Asher. The numbers reflect a dramatic decrease when compared to Num. 1.40–41; 26.47.

8.1–40: Benjamin. Structural features have led some scholars to argue that this list portrays the period of Josiah (late 7th century) or the postexilic period. Indeed, the Saulide genealogy may reflect the socioethnic background of Gibeon at the end of the monarchy (see below). If so, the term “son” in much of the ch refers to clan, rather than immediate family affiliations. The present list of Jonathan’s descendants, comprising twelve generations, represents the family lineage until the Babylonian exile. This suggests that despite Chronicles’ heavily pro-David (and anti-Saul) slant, remnants of a positive attitude toward the Saulides lingered on. Note that 10.6 (cf. 1 Sam. 31.6) states that Saul died together with all of his household, a position which makes the present list impossible. Some scholars see this point as evidence that Chronicles has undergone several editions, and that the genealogical lists of chs 8 and 9 are of later provenance than the main body of the work; see 10.6 n. 6: A difficult verse. It may mean that part of Benjamin was exiled to Manahath in Edom; alternatively, Benjamin expelled the indigenous population to Manahath in Judah. 33: Eshbaal appears in Samuel as Ishbosheth (2 Sam. 2.8) and Yishwi/Ishvi (1 Sam. 14.49). The name Eshbaal means “man of Baal” (or, perhaps, “Baal exists”). The “revised” form Ishbosheth, meaning “man of shame,” reflects the ongoing threat posed by Canaanite religion in the preexilic period and the attempt by biblical authors and/or scribes to deprecate anything reminiscent of Baal worship. Chronicles preserves the original form of the name, since at this time the potential influence of Baal worship no longer constituted a threat. Some scholars argue that Chronicles’ preservation of a Baalistic name here is part of the book’s criticism of Saul, but this is unlikely, since their kinsmen, with their kinsmen. ³³Ner begot Kish, Kish begot Saul, Saul begot Jonathan, Malchi-shua, Abinadab, and Eshbaal; ³⁴and the son of Jonathan was Merib-baal; and Merib-baal begot Micah. ³⁵The sons of Micah: Pithon, Melech, Taarea, and Ahaz. ³⁶Ahaz begot Jehoaddah; and Jehoaddah begot Alemeth, Azmaveth, and Zimri; Zimri begot Moza. ³⁷Moza begot Binea; his son Raphah; his son Eleasah, his son Azel. ³⁸Azel had six sons, and these are their names: Azrikam, Bocheru, Ishmael, Sheariah, Obadiah, and Hanan. All these were the sons of Azel. ³⁹The sons of Eshek his brother: Ulam his first-born, Jeush the second, and Eliphelet the third. ⁴⁰The descendants of Ulam—men of substance, who drew the bow, had many children and grandchildren—one hundred and fifty; all these were Benjaminites.

9 All Israel was registered by genealogies; and these are in the book of the kings of Israel. And Judah was taken into exile in Babylon because of their trespass. ²^aThe first to settle in their towns, on their property, were Israelites, priests, Levites, and temple servants, ³while some of the Judahites and some of the Benjaminites and some of the Ephraimites and Manassehites settled in Jerusalem; ⁴Uthai son of Ammihud son of Omri son of Imri son of Bani, from the sons of Perez son of Judah; ⁵and of the Shilonites: Asaiah the first-born and his sons. ⁶Of the sons of Zerah: Jeuel and their kinsmen—690. ⁷Of the Benjaminites: Sallu son of Meshullam son of Hodaviah son of Hasenuah, ⁸Ibneiah son of Jeroham, Elah son of Uzzi son of Michri, and Meshullam son of Shephatiah son of Reuel son of Ibneiah; ⁹and their kinsmen, according to their lines—956. All these were chiefs of their ancestral clans.

¹⁰Of the priests: Jedaiah, Jehoiarib, Jachin, ¹¹and Azariah son of Hilkiah son of Meshullam son of Zadok son of Meraioth son of Ahitub, chief officer of the House of God; ¹²and Adaiah son of Jeroham son of Pashhur son of Malchijah, and Maasai son of Adiel son of Jahzerah son of Meshullam son of Meshillemith son of Immer, ¹³together with their kinsmen, chiefs of their clans—1,760, men of substance for the work of the service of the House of God.

¹⁴Of the Levites: Shemaiah son of Hasshub son of Azrikam son of Hashabiah, of the sons of Merari; ¹⁵and Bakbakkar, Heresh, Galal, and Mattaniah son of Mica son of Zichri son of Asaph; ¹⁶and Obadiah son of Shemaiah son of Galal son of Jeduthun, and Berechiah son of Asa son of Elkanah, who dwelt in the villages of the Netophathites.

the same phenomenon is attested in connection with David's sons and, possibly, Solomon's officials (see 14.7 || 2 Sam. 5.16; 2 Chron. 10.18 || 1 Kings 4.6; 12.18).

9.1–44: Identity of the community. 1: Note the key word "trespass" (Heb "ma'al"). In Priestly texts from the Torah, the term denotes encroachment upon (personal use of) sacred items; in Second Temple sources its semantic field expands to cover more general offenses. It appears frequently as part of Chronicles' theology, e.g., 10.13 (Saul's death); 2 Chron. 36.14 (Judah's exile). 2–17: Though parallel to Neh. 11.3–19, there are many differences; some may be the result of variant traditions, while others reflect Chronicles' revisions. 2: The opening words may refer to Second Temple society, requiring the translation "The first to settle again. . . ." On this reading, the v. emphasizes that First Temple Israel, with all of its tribes, is still alive and has its direct continuation in Second Temple society centered in Jerusalem, i.e., the Babylonian exile effected little change in the nation's structure. This is part of Chronicles' inclusivist approach to Israel's identity, as opposed to Ezra-Nehemiah, which privileges the returnees from the exile. Alternatively, the v. has been translated "The former settlers," referring to the (early) preexilic settlement in Jerusalem. On this approach, the concluding words of v. 1 (And Judah was taken into exile . . .) are a gloss added to restore the reality of exile which the original Chronicles had tried to avoid. 3: See Neh. 11.4, which makes no reference to Ephraim and Manasseh. Chronicles' version (if understood as referring to Second Temple society) underscores the inclusivist tendency of Chronicles vis-à-vis Ezra-Nehemiah.

^a With vv. 2–17, cf. Neh. 11.3–19.

¹⁷The gatekeepers were: Shallum, Akkub, Talmon, Ahiman; and their kinsman Shallum was the chief ¹⁸hitherto in the King's Gate on the east. They were the keepers belonging to the Levite camp. ¹⁹Shallum son of Kore son of Ebiasaph son of Korah, and his kinsmen of his clan, the Korahites, were in charge of the work of the service, guards of the threshold of the Tent; their fathers had been guards of the entrance to the camp of the LORD. ²⁰And Phinehas son of Eleazar was the chief officer over them in time past; the LORD was with him. ²¹Zechariah the son of Meshelemiah was gatekeeper at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. ²²All these, who were selected as gatekeepers at the thresholds, were 212. They were selected by genealogies in their villages. David and Samuel the seer established them in their office of trust. ²³They and their descendants were in charge of the gates of the House of the LORD, that is, the House of the Tent, as guards. ²⁴The gatekeepers were on the four sides, east, west, north, and south; ²⁵and their kinsmen in their villages were obliged to join them every seven days, according to a fixed schedule. ²⁶The four chief gatekeepers, who were Levites, were entrusted to be over the chambers and the treasuries of the House of God. ²⁷They spent the night near the House of God; for they had to do guard duty, and they were in charge of opening it every morning.

²⁸Some of them had charge of the service vessels, for they were counted when they were brought back and taken out. ²⁹Some of them were in charge of the vessels and all the holy vessels, and of the flour, wine, oil, incense, and spices. ³⁰Some of the priests blended the compound of spices. ³¹Mattithiah, one of the Levites, the first-born of Shallum the Korahite, was entrusted with making the flat cakes. ³²Also some of their Kohathite kinsmen had charge of the rows of bread, to prepare them for each sabbath.

³³Now these are the singers, the chiefs of Levitical clans who remained in the chambers free of other service, for they were on duty day and night. ³⁴These were chiefs of Levitical clans, according to their lines; these chiefs lived in Jerusalem.

³⁵The father of Gibeon, Jeiel, lived in Gibeon, and the name of his wife was Maacah. ³⁶His first-born son, Abdon; then Zur, Kish, Baal, Ner, Nadab, ³⁷Gedor, Ahio, Zechariah, and Mikloth; ³⁸Mikloth begot Shimeam; and they lived in Jerusalem opposite their kinsmen, with their kinsmen. ³⁹Ner begot Kish, Kish begot Saul, Saul begot Jonathan, Malchi-shua, Abinadab, and Eshbaal; ⁴⁰and the son of Jonathan was Merib-baal; and Merib-baal begot Micah. ⁴¹The sons of Micah: Pithon, Melech, Taharea;

18-33: These verses, which have no extant source, outline various functions of the gatekeepers, who may have attained added significance in the Second Temple period. 34-44: A repetition (with variations) of part of the Benjaminite genealogy of 8.28-38; it here serves to introduce King Saul, a Benjaminite.

⁴²Ahaz begot Jarah, and Jarah begot Alemeth, Azmaveth, and Zimri; Zimri begot Moza. ⁴³Moza begot Binea; his son was Rephaiah, his son Eleasah, his son Azel. ⁴⁴Azel had six sons and these were their names: Azrikam, Bocheru, Ishmael, Sheariah, Obadiah, and Hanan. These were the sons of Azel.

10^aThe Philistines attacked Israel, and the men of Israel fled before the Philistines and [many] fell on Mount Gilboa. ²The Philistines pursued Saul and his sons, and the Philistines struck down Jonathan, Abinadab, and Malchi-shua, sons of Saul. ³The battle raged around Saul, and the archers hit him, and he ^bwas wounded^b by the archers. ⁴Saul said to his arms-bearer, "Draw your sword and run me through, so that these uncircumcised may not come and make sport of me." But his arms-bearer, out of great awe, refused; whereupon Saul grasped the sword and fell upon it. ⁵When the arms-bearer saw that Saul was dead, he too fell on his sword and died. ⁶Thus Saul and his three sons and his entire house died together. ⁷And when all the men of Israel who were in the valley saw that they^c had fled and that Saul and his sons were dead, they abandoned their towns and fled; the Philistines then came and occupied them.

⁸The next day the Philistines came to strip the slain, and they found Saul and his sons lying on Mount Gilboa. ⁹They stripped him, and carried off his head and his armor, and sent them throughout the land of the Philis-

a With vv. 1–12, cf. 1 Sam. 31.1–13.

b-b Meaning of Heb. uncertain. c I.e., Israel.

10.1–14: Saul's death and transfer of the monarchy to David. 1 Samuel devotes approximately twenty chs to the reign of Saul; Chronicles deems one ch, focusing on Saul's death, sufficient. This fact, in itself, is a clear statement of Chronicles' primary interests, viz., David and the Davidic dynasty, and of the author's negative assessment of Saul. In addition to the paucity of material, Chronicles' overall depiction of Saul is decidedly different from that reflected in Samuel. The latter contains a block of material sympathetic to Saul, which emphasizes his courage and leadership and the esteem in which he was held. Overall, Samuel portrays Saul as a multi-dimensional, tragic figure. Chronicles knows none of this; Saul is a one-dimensional figure, whose de-meaning death is just desert for a host of offenses he committed. Chronicles' version of the circumstances of Saul's death and the readiness of some of the population to bury his mutilated corpse presents a far less flattering picture than that in Samuel. 6: See introductory comment to ch 8. In addition to the contradictions noted therein, the present v. clashes with 15.29, which indicates that (at the least) Saul's daughter Michal remained alive. Some scholars explain 10.6 as a compositional oversight on the author's part. Others argue that this inconsistency is the price that Chronicles had to pay in order to promote two distinct positions: The Chronicler wanted to show that David fulfilled his promise to Saul and his household concerning the continued well-being of Saul's descendants (1 Sam. 20.15; 24.22–23), but at the same time Chronicles was concerned that David not appear as a usurper—thus the notice that David ascended an heirless throne following Saul's death (vv. 1–3). 7: The words "they had fled" are ambiguous; the present translation understands them to refer to the Israelite forces, while others take them to mean that Saul and his sons first fled, before giving up all hope. This offers a sharp contrast to David's valor; see 14.8 n. Saul's demoralizing defeat, resulting in whole tracts of Israel's land being overrun by the enemy, must be seen against the backdrop of Chronicles' "land-theology" which, as noted, portrays a picture of continuous Israelite settlement in its land and, moreover, maintains that the entire territory of Canaan had already been settled by the patriarchs (see 13.5 n.). The message is thus clear: Saul's rule was disastrous. 8: For the connection between Saul and the people of Jabesh, see 1 Sam. ch 11. 1 Sam. ch 31 claims that Saul's corpse, with his head attached, was taken from the battlefield and impaled on the wall of Beth-shan. Retrieving the corpse entailed a dangerous operation: The people of Jabesh, operating by night, would have had to penetrate enemy territory under the very noses of the Philistine guards, suggesting that Saul was truly venerated by the people of Jabesh. By contrast, Chronicles states that Saul's head was taken to the temple of Dagon while the rest of his corpse was left at the battle site. According to this scenario, the people of Jabesh were willing to attend to Saul's corpse left on Mount Gilboa, but they were not prepared to endanger their own lives by approaching the (Philistine) temple of Dagon. Additionally, Saul was never buried fully and properly, a sign of distines to spread the news to their idols and among the people. ¹⁰They placed his armor in the temple of their god, and they impaled his head in the temple of Dagan. ¹¹When all Jabesh-gilead heard everything that the Philistines had done to Saul, ¹²all their stalwart men set out, removed the bodies of Saul and his sons, and brought them to Jabesh. They buried the bones under the oak tree in Jabesh, and they fasted for seven days. ¹³Saul died for the trespass that he had committed against the LORD in not having fulfilled the command of the LORD; moreover, he had consulted a ghost to seek advice, ¹⁴and did not seek advice of the LORD; so He had him slain and the kingdom transferred to David son of Jesse.

11 ¹All Israel gathered to David at Hebron and said, "We are your own flesh and blood. ²Long before now, even when Saul was king, you were the leader of Israel; and the LORD your God said to you: You shall shepherd My people Israel; you shall be ruler of My people Israel." ³All the elders of Israel came to the king at Hebron, and David made a pact with them in Hebron before the LORD. And they anointed David king over Israel, according to the word of the LORD through Samuel.

⁴David and all Israel set out for Jerusalem, that is Jebus, a With vv. 1–9, cf. 2 Sam. 5.1–10, and with vv. 11–41, cf. 2 Sam. 23.8–39.

grace. This reflects Saul's diminished image in Chronicles. 13–14: Chronicles routinely explains death as punishment for sins, and so here, unlike in 1 Samuel, attributes Saul's death to his sins. To do so, it must rewrite some of the material that is known from Samuel (e.g., 1 Sam. 28.8–23). Chronicles highlights Saul's failure to seek advice (Heb "darash") of the LORD before going to battle, in contrast to 1 Sam. ch 28, where Saul was prevented from receiving divine guidance. This also creates a clear contrast with David's conduct (see 14.10, 14). The concluding words emphasize that the transfer of power to David was both immediate and decreed in heaven, a point restated several times in the ensuing chs. For trespass, see 9.1 n.

Chs 11–29: David's rule. The portrait of David is greatly enhanced. Many unflattering episodes found in Samuel are deleted, while positive aspects of David's career are embellished. There is, however, no attempt to whitewash all of David's misdeeds. The most striking change in Chronicles' portrayal concerns David's role in the religious cultus. Whereas Samuel describes the political and personal experiences of David the warrior, Chronicles' David is, first and foremost, the patron of the cultus. This portrayal, together with David's association with (parts of) the book of Psalms, casts him as a spiritual figure, leading to the rabbinic depiction of David as a Torah scholar. This transition is also attested in the Dead Sea Scrolls of Qumran, where David is credited with the composition of more than 4,000 psalms.

11.1–3: David's ascension to the throne. The formulation conveys the unmistakable impression that the transition between Saul's demise and David's rule was both immediate and smooth; there was no void nor period of political instability. David's ascension to the throne was the result of divine decree and unanimous popular support. This differs dramatically from 2 Sam. chs 1–4, which describe the power struggle following Saul's death. Additionally, Chronicles never mentions David's having been a local chieftain; he is instead portrayed as going from private citizen to monarch over a united Israel-Judah. This, too, contradicts Samuel, which presents David as a local, Judahite leader, whose leadership over a united confederation of tribes comes about gradually, following years of friction between him and the regnant Saul. Chronicles thus avoids portraying David as a usurper since for the Chronicler, the "true" or "ideal" Israel consists of a unity of all the tribes headed by one legitimate monarch. 1: Whereas 2 Sam. 5.1 speaks of all the tribes coming to Hebron, Chronicles says that all Israel came, reflecting the outpouring of unanimous support for David. This point is reiterated at 12.24–41. The participation by the entire nation in important events is a recurring motif in Chronicles. 4–9: The conquest of Jerusalem. The appearance of this passage at this juncture is prompted by literary, rather than chronological, considerations—its placement conveys the impression that David's first official act consisted of capturing Jerusalem. It is true that, according to Chronicles, Jerusalem attains its special status only later (see 1 Chron. chs 21–22). Still, the centrality of Jerusalem was so deeply rooted by the time of Chronicles that his readers would probably have seen this story as suggestive of David's (prophetically) inspired leadership. According to biblical tradition, Jerusalem had been a Jebusite city, so that no Israelite tribe had any stronger claim to it than another—a sort of Washington, D.C. Viewed in the context of 2 Samuel, David's decision to establish Jerusalem as his new capital was designed to con-where the Jebusite inhabitants of the land lived.⁵ David was told by the inhabitants of Jebus, "You will never get in here!" But David captured the stronghold of Zion; it is now the City of David.⁶ David said, "Whoever attacks the Jebusites first will be the chief officer"; Joab son of Zeruiah attacked first, and became the chief.

The kingdom of David according to First Chronicles. The dashed line shows the approximate boundary of the kingdom at its greatest extent.

⁷David occupied the stronghold; therefore it was renamed the City of David.⁸ David also fortified the surrounding area, from the Millo roundabout, and Joab rebuilt the rest of the city.⁹ David kept growing stronger, for the LORD of Hosts was with him.

¹⁰And these were David's chief warriors who strongly supported him in his kingdom, together with all Israel, to make him king, according to the word of the LORD concerning Israel.

¹¹This is the list of David's warriors: Jashobeam son of Hachmoni, the chief officer; he wielded his spear against three hundred and slew them all on one occasion.¹² Next to him was Eleazar son of Dodo, the Ahohite; he was one of the three warriors.¹³ He was with David at Pas Dammim when the Philistines gathered there for battle. There was a plot of ground full of barley there; the troops had fled from the Philistines,¹⁴ but they took their stand in the middle of the plot and defended it, and they routed the Philistines. Thus the LORD wrought a great victory.

¹⁵Three of the thirty chiefs went down to the rock to David, at the cave of Adullam, while a force of Philistines was encamped in the Valley of Rephaim.¹⁶ David was then in the stronghold, and a Philistine garrison was then at Bethlehem.¹⁷ David felt a craving and said, "If only I could get a drink of water from the cistern which is by the gate of Bethlehem!"¹⁸ So the three got through the Philistine camp, and drew water from the cistern which is by the gate of Bethlehem, and they carried it back to David. But David would not drink it, and he poured it out as a libation to the LORD.¹⁹ For he said, "God forbid that I should do this! Can I drink the blood of these men who risked their lives?"—for they had brought it at the risk of their lives, and he would not drink it. Such were the exploits of the three warriors.

²⁰Abshai, the brother of Joab, was head of another three. He once wielded his spear against three hundred and slew them. He won a name among the three;²¹ among the three he was more highly regarded than the other two, and so he became their commander. However, he did not attain to the other three.

²²Benaiah son of Jehoiada from Kabzeel was a brave soldier who performed great deeds. He killed the two solidate his hold over a newly united entity (Israel and Judah), which emerged only after a lengthy period of political instability. In Chronicles, however, David's ascension to the throne receives unanimous support; there is no need to seek a capital that will give stability to his regime. Accordingly, the conquest of Jerusalem takes on a different meaning in Chronicles: David intuitively sensed Jerusalem's (future) importance. Chronicles again claims that all Israel participated in this venture, whereas 2 Sam. ch 5 states that David was accompanied by "his men"; David's venture in 2 Sam. is a private one, whereas Chronicles views it as a religious priority, involving the entire nation. 5: Chronicles deletes 2 Sam. 5.6b, 8, either because that passage was deemed incomprehensible or because it was seen as attributing to David a degrading prejudice toward the blind and lame. 6–8: The role of Joab in capturing and providing for Jerusalem does not appear in 2 Samuel. The mention of Joab here foreshadows the following chs, which list David's warriors and their achievements, requiring that Chronicles establish Joab's credentials. While it is unclear whether this datum is based on historical records or is the Chronicler's invention, the net result is a more positive image of Joab than that in the Deuteronomistic History (see 20.1; 21.3–6; cf. 1 Kings 2.5–6). The glorification of David's closest officers adds to David's glorification. In addition, Chronicles' version enhances the importance of Jerusalem: He who captures Jerusalem attains glory and leadership. Chronicles further claims that the name "City of David" was given to Jerusalem by the people of Israel, another sign of public support for David. 2 Samuel, however, suggests that David, who alone (without Joab) was responsible for the capture of Jerusalem, introduced the new name. This fits the personal nature of David's venture, according to Samuel, and also makes for a less modest David.

[sons] of Ariel of Moab. Once, on a snowy day, he went down into a pit and killed a lion.²³ He also killed an Egyptian, a giant of a man five cubits tall. The Egyptian had a spear in his hand, like a weaver's beam, yet [Benaiah] went down against him with a club, wrenched the spear out of the Egyptian's hand, and killed him with his own spear.²⁴ Such were the exploits of Benaiah son of Jehoiada; and he won a name among the three warriors.²⁵ He was highly regarded among the thirty, but he did not attain to the three. David put him in charge of his bodyguard.^a ²⁶The valiant warriors: Asahel brother of Joab, Elhanan son of Dodo from Bethlehem, ²⁷Shammoth the Hararite, Helez the Pelonite, ²⁸Ira son of Ikkesh from Tekoa, Abiezer of Anathoth, ²⁹Sibbecai the Hushathite, Ilai the Ahothite, ³⁰Mahrai the Netophathite, Heled son of Baanah the Netophathite, ³¹Ittai son of Ribai from Gibeah of the Benjaminites, Benaiah of Pirathon, ³²Hurai of Nahale-gaash, Abiel the Arbathite, ³³Azmaveth the Bahrumite, Eliahba of Shaalbon, ³⁴the sons of Hashem the Gizonite, Jonathan son of Shageh the Hararite, ³⁵Ahiam son of Sacar the Hararite, Eliphai son of Ur, ³⁶Hepher the Mecherathite, Ahijah the Pelonite, ³⁷Hezro the Carmelite, Naarai son of Ezbai, ³⁸Joel brother of Nathan, Mibhar son of Hagri, ³⁹Zelek the Ammonite, Naharai the Berothite—the arms-bearer of Joab son of Zeruiah—⁴⁰Ira the Ithrite, Gareb the Ithrite, ⁴¹Uriah the Hittite, Zabadi son of Ahlai. ⁴²Adina son of Shiza the Reubenite, a chief of the Reubenites, and thirty with him; ⁴³Hanan son of Maacah, and Joshaphat the Mithnite; ⁴⁴Uzziah the Ashterathite, Shama and Jeiel sons of Hotham the Aroerite; ⁴⁵Jedaiah son of Shimri, and Joha his brother, the Tizite; ⁴⁶Eliel the Mahavite, and Jeribai and Joshaviah sons of Elnaam, and Ithmah the Moabite; ⁴⁷Eliel, Obed, and Jaassiel the Mezobaite.

12 The following joined David at Ziklag while he was still in hiding from Saul son of Kish; these were the warriors who gave support in battle; ²they were armed with the bow and could use both right hand and left hand to sling stones or shoot arrows with the bow; they were kinsmen of Saul from Benjamin. ³At the head were Ahiezer and Joash, sons of Shemaah of Gibeah; and Jeziel and Pelet, sons of Azmaveth; and Beracah and Jehu of Anathoth; ⁴Ishmaiah of Gibeon, a warrior among the thirty, leading the thirty; ⁵Jeremiah, Jahaziel, Johanan, and Jozabad of Gederah; ⁶Eluzai, Jerimoth, Bealiam, Shemariah, and Shephatiah the Hariphite; ⁷Elkanah, Isshiah, Azarel, 11.10–46: Warriors who joined David. This material is largely similar to that of 2 Sam. ch 23, often viewed as part of an appendix to Samuel; this is one of several places where the Chronicler has rearranged his source material. Its placement at the end of Samuel allows for the reasonable inference that these warriors joined David over the course of his forty-year rule, while the Chronicler's sequence implies that these elite fighters joined the king at the very outset of his rule, supporting the notion that David enjoyed unanimous support. The historicity of the sixteen warriors in vv. 41b–47 added by Chronicles to the list in 2 Samuel has been the subject of differing views. 13–14: In contrast to 2 Sam. 23.10, the Masoretic Text of Chronicles indicates that the Philistines were routed by Eleazar and David; cf. Saul's conduct in 10.7 and see n. there. LXX and other ancient versions of Chronicles read the singular form, indicating that it was Eleazar alone who defeated the enemy. Both readings accomplish the same goal, namely, exaltation of David. The Masoretic reading does so by stressing that David's valor was a crucial factor in the victory; the other versions do so by highlighting the truly extraordinary abilities of the warriors who saw fit to join David. 16–19: Realizing that his actions needlessly endangered his men, and that drinking the water would be tantamount to drinking blood—an act proscribed by Lev. 17.11–12; Deut. 12.23–25—he offers it as a libation (offering) to God. 23: Chronicles' reformulation of 2 Sam. 23.21 includes elements patterned after 1 Sam. 17.4, 7, which describes the defeat of the Philistine hero Goliath. Chronicles' version magnifies Benaiah's ("Benayahu's") military prowess, a fact which ultimately exalts David's status.

12.1–23: Warriors who joined David at Ziklag. This nonsynoptic section emphasizes the broad-based support which David enjoyed among all tribes and seg-

^a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

Joezer, and Jashobeam the Korahites; ⁸Joelah and Zebadiah, sons of Jeroham of Gedor.^a ⁹Of the Gadites, there withdrew to follow David to the wilderness stronghold valiant men, fighters fit for battle, armed with shield and spear; they had the appearance of lions, and were as swift as gazelles upon the mountains: ¹⁰Ezer the chief, Obadiah the second, Eliab the third, ¹¹Mashmannah the fourth, Jeremiah the fifth, ¹²Attai the sixth, Eliel the seventh, ¹³Johanan the eighth, Elzabad the ninth, ¹⁴Jeremiah the tenth, Machbannai the eleventh. ¹⁵Those were the Gadites, heads of the army. The least was equal to a hundred, the greatest to a thousand. ¹⁶These were the ones who crossed the Jordan in the first month, when it was at its crest, and they put to flight all the lowlanders to the east and west. ¹⁷Some of the Benjaminites and Judahites came to the stronghold to David, ¹⁸and David went out to meet them, saying to them, "If you come on a peaceful errand, to support me, then I will make common cause with you, but if to betray me to my foes, for no injustice on my part, then let the God of our fathers take notice and give judgment."^b ¹⁹Then the spirit seized Amasai, chief of the captains:

"We are yours, David,
On your side, son of Jesse;
At peace, at peace with you,
And at peace with him who supports you,
For your God supports you."

So David accepted them, and placed them at the head of his band.

²⁰Some Manassites went over to David's side when he came with the Philistines to make war against Saul, but they were of no help to them, because the lords of the Philistines in council dismissed him, saying, "He will go over to the side of his lord, Saul, and it will cost us our heads"; ²¹when he went to Ziklag, these Manassites went over to his side—Adnah, Jozabad, Jediael, Michael, Jozabad, Elihu, and Zillethai, chiefs of the clans of Manasseh.

²²It was they who gave support to David against the band,^b for all were valiant men; and they were officers of the force.

^a Or, "the troop," reading Heb. gedud with several mss.

^b I.e., the band of Amalekite raiders; cf. 1 Sam. 30.8, 15.

ments of the people, including Saul's kinsmen. Indeed, the fact that these many warriors joined David before his accession to the throne attests to the depth of David's popularity. The list highlights two qualities of these warriors: unusual martial qualifications and extreme eagerness to join David at all costs, without delay. It is likely that this ch is based at least in part on older sources.

17–18: It is not immediately apparent why this group is singled out or, put differently, why David suspected them more than the others. Some note that this group parallels the one that remained loyal to the Davidic dynasty at the time of its schism; see 2 Chron. 10.16; 1 Kings 12.16. Because of this and other similarities and contrastive elements shared with those passages (see also, 2 Sam. 20.1), it is argued that this passage is Chronicles' way of reinforcing the divine election of David and his successors. Perhaps this section highlights the fact that even Benjaminites, of Saul's tribe, followed David (see v. 2). 19: This reflects Chronicles' innovative view on prophets and prophecy. Whereas many biblical books view prophecy as the exclusive prerogative of "professional" prophets whose activity centers on the monarchy, Chronicles maintains that any individual, even a non-Israelite, may, under the proper circumstances, serve as a conduit for conveying the divine will; hence, Amasai, a military man, experiences ad hoc prophecy. The possession formulae (the spirit seized) introduce the speeches of "non-prophets" only, indicating that Chronicles differentiates between this group and "professional" prophets.

12.24–41: Fighting forces at Hebron. Chronicles again stresses that the selection of David was by divine decree, both explicitly in v. 24, "in accordance with the word of the LORD," and through the structure and contents of the narrative. 25–39: The total number of the fighting men who arrived at Hebron, 340,822, does not take into account other (male) Israelites who supported David from afar. The incredible size of this number, and others in Chronicles, has led some scholars to argue that the Hebrew word "elef" in these passages does not mean "thousand," but denotes, rather, a clan-based militia unit consisting of perhaps fifteen members. Closer examination of the relevant passages, however, reveals that Chronicles did, in fact, have the meaning "thousands" in mind. The passage emphasizes the ²³Day in day out, people came to David to give him support, until there was an army as vast as the army of God.

²⁴These are the numbers of the [men of the] armed bands who joined David at Hebron to transfer Saul's kingdom to him, in accordance with the word of the LORD:

²⁵Judahites, equipped with shield and spear—6,800 armed men; ²⁶Simeonites, valiant men, fighting troops—7,100; ²⁷of the Levites—4,600; ²⁸Jehoiada, chief officer of the Aaronides; with him, 3,700; ²⁹Zadok, a young valiant man, with his clan—22 officers; ³⁰of the Benjaminites, kinsmen of Saul, 3,000 in their great numbers, hitherto protecting the interests of the house of Saul; ³¹of the Ephraimites, 20,800 valiant men, famous in their clans; ³²of the half-tribe of Manasseh, 18,000, who were designated by name to come and make David king; ³³of the Issacharites, men who knew how to interpret the signs of the times, to determine how Israel should act; their chiefs were 200, and all their kinsmen followed them; ³⁴of Zebulun, those ready for service, able to man a battle line with all kinds of weapons, 50,000, giving support wholeheartedly; ³⁵of Naphtali, 1,000 chieftains with their shields and lances—37,000; ³⁶of the Danites, able to man the battle line—28,600; ³⁷of Asher, those ready for service to man the battle line—40,000; ³⁸from beyond the Jordan, of the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, together with all kinds of military weapons—120,000.

³⁹All these, fighting men, manning the battle line with whole heart, came to Hebron to make David king over all Israel. Likewise, all the rest of Israel was of one mind to make David king.

⁴⁰They were there with David three days, eating and drinking, for their kinsmen had provided for them.

⁴¹And also, their relatives as far away as Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali brought food by ass, camel, mule, and ox—provisions of flour, cakes of figs, raisin cakes, wine, oil, cattle, and sheep in abundance, for there was joy in Israel.

13 Then David consulted with the officers of the thousands and the hundreds, with every chief officer. ²David said to the entire assembly of Israel, "If you approve, and if the LORD our God concurs,^a let us send far and wide to our remaining kinsmen throughout the territories of Israel, including the priests and Levites in the towns where they have pasturelands, that they should enormous number of Israelites who not only supported David but traveled from afar in order to demonstrate support for him. It is striking that the largest contingents hail from the most distant regions, indicating complete and far-reaching support for David.

13.1–14: Transferring the Ark: the failed attempt. 1 Chron. ch 13 reflects 2 Sam. ch 6, while 1 Chron. ch 14 reflects 2 Sam. ch 5, another example of the Chronicler's rearrangement of his source material (see 11.10–46 n.). The reason for this rearrangement is explored below (14.1–17 n.). 1–4: In 2 Sam. ch 6, David's transfer of the Ark to his new capital is intended to consolidate his position as leader of the newly unified nation; accordingly, he is accompanied by thirty thousand "picked men." Historically, this is a reasonable motive, inasmuch as the establishment of a functioning cultus was, in the ancient Near East, a measure of a monarch's success and stability. By contrast, Chronicles presents David's act as expressing genuine concern for the cultus (see Ps. 132), requiring the support and participation of the entire nation. Moreover, Chronicles' David seeks the nation's consent. This portrays Israel's only legitimate monarchy in a "democratized" fashion; David consults with his subjects or, more precisely, his kinsmen (v. 2). This utopian depiction may be an expression of Chronicles' messianic yearnings. In addition, the author again makes the claim that important historical events were approved, and attended, by the population at large—a clarion call to his contemporaries for similar support. 2: Heb "p-r-tz," lit. "to break forth," (here rendered "far and wide") recurs in various forms in this and the following ch. Its use in the present v. is particularly unusual, serving to alert the reader that David has "broken forth/out," i.e., acted impetuously. As emerges in ch 15, David's intentions were sincere, but his rash decision, which ignored critical cultic norms, resulted in disaster. See gather together to us³ in order to transfer the Ark of our God to us, for throughout the days of Saul we paid no regard to it.”⁴ The entire assembly agreed to do so, for the proposal pleased all the people.⁵ David then assembled all Israel from Shihor of Egypt to Lebo-hamath, in order to bring the Ark of God from Kiriath-jearim.^{6a} David and all Israel went up to Baalah, Kiriath-jearim of Judah, to bring up from there the Ark of God, the LORD, Enthroned on the Cherubim, to which the Name was attached.⁷ They transported the Ark of God on a new cart from the house of Abinadab; Uzza and Ahio guided the cart,⁸ and David and all Israel danced before God with all their might—with songs, lyres, harps, timbrels, cymbals, and trumpets.⁹ But when they came to the threshing floor of Chidon, Uzza put out his hand to hold the Ark of God because the oxen had stumbled.^b ¹⁰The LORD was incensed at Uzza, and struck him down, because he laid a hand on the Ark; and so he died there before God.¹¹ David was distressed because the LORD “had burst out” against Uzza; and that place was named Perez-uzzah, as it is still called.

^a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

¹²David was afraid of God that day; he said, “How can I bring the Ark of God here?”¹³ So David did not remove the Ark to his place in the City of David; instead, he diverted it to the house of Obed-edom the Gittite.¹⁴ The Ark of God remained in the house of Obed-edom, in its own abode, three months, and the LORD blessed the house of Obed-edom and all he had.

14^dKing Hiram of Tyre sent envoys to David with cedar logs, stonemasons, and carpenters to build a palace for him.² Thus David knew that the LORD had es-a With vv. 6–14, cf. 2 Sam. 6.2–11. b Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

c-c Heb. paraš . . . pereš. d With vv. 1–16, cf. 2 Sam. 5.11–25.

comments to ch 15. 4–6: Chronicles’ version reflects its portrayal of Solomon and David as parallel or continuous figures; David is in no way inferior to Solomon. This was important since only Solomon constructed the Temple itself, and thus he might be seen as more significant than David. Thus, since 1 Kings ch 8 (compare 2 Chron. 5.2) states that the elders and tribal heads participated in the relocation of the Ark into the Temple, the author provided a similar scene for David. 5: This v. conveys two important views. First, as understood by most scholars, Chronicles maintains a position attested only rarely in the Bible (see Josh. 13.3), that Israel’s southern border extends to the easternmost branch of the Nile (Shihor), i.e., Pelusium, located on the western coast of the Sinai peninsula. Second, in contrast to the early history, which portrays a gradual expansion of Israelite control culminating in the conquests of David, Chronicles claims that all of Canaan had already been populated by Israelites at an early stage in the nation’s history. This is another expression of Chronicles’ position regarding Israel’s continuous presence in its land. Most scholars identify Lebo-hamath with Lebweh in modern Syria. These borders are ideal; it is doubtful that Israel ever controlled such an extensive area. 6: Cherubim: Traditional Jewish sources, using an Aramaic wordplay, tend to view the cherubs as angel-like figures, having the face of a child (b. Sukkah 5b); several medieval exegetes, however, reject this position (e.g., Rashbam; Hezekiah ben Manoah [“Hizzequni”]). The cherubs were actually griffinlike or sphinxlike, composite creatures, similar to those attested in other cultures of the ancient Near East. Their role was twofold: to protect sacred or important precincts by warding off evil forces, and to serve as a throne for gods and/or kings (see Exod. 25.18–22; 26.31; Ezek. 1.5–27; 10.1–22; see notes to these vv.). This latter role explains why it is that the LORD is referred to as Enthroned on the Cherubim, as well as the Ark’s unique status: It symbolizes the presence of the LORD. 9–14: Obed-edom is a Gittite, probably hailing from the city of Gath, in Philistine territory. Nothing in 2 Sam. ch 6 suggests that he was a Levite. Nonetheless, the ample attestation of Levitical guards and musicians bearing this name in 1 Chronicles (e.g., ch 16) implies that Chronicles views him as a Levite. Some scholars defend this pedigree, arguing that Chronicles understood Gath to refer to Gath-rimmon, a Levitical city (Josh. 19.45; 21.24). It is more likely, however, that Chronicles could not portray David as abandoning the Ark in a house of a foreigner which just happened to be close to the site of Uzza’s death. Thus, the Chronicler reworked the genealogies to suggest that David placed the Ark in the hands of a person formally charged with this cultic task.

14.1–17: David’s palace, family, and battles. The material found in this ch appears in 2 Samuel in a different arrangement. 2 Sam. ch 5 places this material between David’s coronation and his capture of Jerusalem, allowing the infer-established him as king over Israel, and that his kingship was highly exalted for the sake of His people Israel.

³David took more wives in Jerusalem, and David begot more sons and daughters. ⁴These are the names of the children born to him in Jerusalem:^a Shammua, Shobab, Nathan, and Solomon; ⁵Ibhar, Elishua, and Elpelet; ⁶Nogah, Nepheg, and Japhia; ⁷Elishama, Beeliada, and Eliphelet.

⁸When the Philistines heard that David had been anointed king over all Israel, all the Philistines went up in search of David; but David heard of it, and he went out to them. ⁹The Philistines came and raided the Valley of Rephaim. ¹⁰David inquired of God, "Shall I go up against the Philistines? Will You deliver them into my hands?" And the LORD answered him, "Go up, and I will deliver them into your hands." ¹¹Thereupon David ascended Baal-perazim, and David defeated them there. David said, "God ^bburst out^b against my enemies by my hands as waters burst out." That is why that place was named Baal-perazim. ¹²They abandoned their gods there, and David ordered these to be burned.

¹³Once again the Philistines raided the valley. ¹⁴David inquired of God once more, and God answered, "Do not go up after them, but circle around them and confront them at the baca^c trees. ¹⁵And when you hear the sound of marching in the tops of the baca trees, then go out to battle, for God will be going in front of you to attack the Philistine forces." ¹⁶David did as God had commanded him; and they routed the Philistines from Gibeon all the way to Gezer. ¹⁷David became famous throughout the lands, and the LORD put the fear of him in all the nations.

15 He had houses made for himself in the City of David, and he prepared a place for the Ark of God, a With the list in vv. 4–7, cf. also 1 Chron. 3.5–8.

b-b Heb. paraš. c Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

ence that David occupied himself with personal matters (e.g., construction of his palace) before attending to the Ark. Chronicles, by placing this material between the two attempts at transferring the Ark, conveys the impression that the delay in attending to the Ark was not due to lack of motivation; rather, David was occupied with other matters. Chronicles deletes 2 Sam. 6.12, which indicates that David renewed his efforts only after being informed that Obededom had prospered as a result of the Ark's presence because this portrayal reflects poorly upon David and his veneration of the cultus—two important emphases of the book. Chronicles offers no clear explanation regarding the timing behind David's decision to again attend to the Ark; this implies that David returned to this task at the first opportunity following the activities described in ch 14. 1–2: The placement of this passage in Chronicles may indicate that, despite David's culpability in the failure of the first attempt to relocate the Ark and Uzza's death, he was still the object of divine favor, since his intentions concerning the cultus were sincere. 3–7: Having many wives and children is a sign of success and divine favor in Chronicles; hence the passage's juxtaposition to the preceding vv.

14.8–17: David defeats the Philistines. These vv. convey a fundamental difference between David and Saul: Unlike Saul, David inquires of God in time of need (war), thereby assuring victory. They also anticipate the reason (given in ch 15) for the disastrous results of David's first attempt to move the Ark. The Heb root "p-r-tz" in v. 11 serves to connect this ch with chs 13 (vv. 2, 11) and 15 (v. 13), indicating that when Israel follows the divine lead, all goes well; when they act rashly ("p-r-tz") and without due concern for the law, punishment follows. 12: Cf. 2 Sam. 5.21. The latter states that David and his men "carried off" the enemies' idols. Chronicles' formulation is designed to reconcile David's conduct with Deut. 8.25, which demands that such paraphernalia be burnt. Deuteronomy in its final form was not authoritative for the author of Samuel, but was for the Chronicler; given his interest in depicting David as righteous, the v. needed to be adjusted so David would follow "Mosaic" law. It is unclear whether the Chronicler simply changed his text or, as some aver, he interpreted the Heb term in 2 Samuel, "vayisa'em" "he carried them off," to mean "burnt them"; evidence from the Dead Sea Scrolls may also suggest that this particular change predated the Chronicler.

15.1–29: The Ark successfully moved to Jerusalem. The primary purpose of this ch is to explain, in theological terms, the reason(s) behind David's ultimate success in and pitched a tent for it. ²Then David gave orders that none but the Levites were to carry the Ark of God, for the LORD had chosen them to carry the Ark of the LORD and to minister to Him forever. ³David assembled all Israel in Jerusalem to bring up the Ark of the LORD to its place, which he had prepared for it. ⁴Then David gathered together the Aaronides and the Levites: ⁵the sons of Kohath: Uriel the officer and his kinsmen—120; ⁶the sons of Merari: Asaiah the officer and his kinsmen—220; ⁷the sons of Gershon: Joel the officer and his kinsmen—130; ⁸the sons of Elizaphan: Shemaiah the officer and his kinsmen—200; ⁹the sons of Hebron: Eliel the officer and his kinsmen—80; ¹⁰the sons of Uzziel: Amminadab the officer and his kinsmen—112.

¹¹David sent for Zadok and Abiathar the priests, and for the Levites: Uriel, Asaiah, Joel, Shemaiah, Eliel, and Amminadab. ¹²He said to them, "You are the heads of the clans of the Levites; sanctify yourselves, you and your kinsmen, and bring up the Ark of the LORD God of Israel to [the place] I have prepared for it. ¹³^aBecause you were not there the first time,^a the LORD our God burst out against us, for we did not show due regard for Him."

¹⁴The priests and Levites sanctified themselves in order to bring up the Ark of the LORD God of Israel. ¹⁵The Levites carried the Ark of God by means of poles on their shoulders, as Moses had commanded in accordance with the word of the LORD. ¹⁶David ordered the officers of the Levites to install their kinsmen, the singers, with musical instruments, harps, lyres, and cymbals, joyfully making their voices heard. ¹⁷So the Levites installed Heman son of Joel and, of his kinsmen, Asaph son of Berechiah; and, of the sons of Merari their kinsmen, Ethan son of Kushaiah. ¹⁸Together with them were their kinsmen of second rank, Zechariah, Ben, Jaaziel, Shemiramoth, Jehiel, Unni, Eliab, Benaiah, Maaseiah, Mattithiah, Eliphalehu, Mikneiah, Obed-edom and Jeiel the gatekeepers. ¹⁹Also the singers Heman, Asaph, and Ethan to sound the bronze cymbals, ²⁰and Zechariah, Aziel, Shemiramoth, Jehiel, Unni, Eliab, Maaseiah, and Benaiah with harps ^aon alamoth;^a ²¹also Mattithiah, Eliphalehu, Mikneiah, Obed-edom, Jeiel, and Azaziah, with lyres to lead ^aon the sheminit;^a ²²also Chenaniah, officer of the Levites in song;^b he was in charge of the song^b because he was a master. ²³Berechiah and Elkanah were gatekeepers for the Ark. ²⁴Shebaniah, Joshaphat, Nethanel, Amasai, Zechariah, Be-transporting the Ark. Two issues inform the Chronicler's reformulation of 2 Samuel: (1) the author's need to account for the failure of the first attempt at relocating the Ark, a point not addressed in 2 Samuel, and (2) the author's unwillingness to accept material concerning cultic norms which Samuel's version contains because these conflict with Torah texts and Second Temple practices. 2–11: The second attempt at bringing the Ark to Jerusalem is successful because David observes the cultic norms of the Torah; see Deut. 10.10 and Num. 7.9, which suggest that Levites and priests must lead all cultic events and ceremonies. 12: The holiness of the Ark requires that those handling it sanctify themselves; cf. Josh. 3.5–6. 13–15: David complies with Torah legislation; see Num. 6.9. 16, 19: The cymbals, like the trumpets, were not used for musical accompaniment; rather, they announced the beginning of a song; see 23.5 n.

a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

b Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

naiah, and Eliezer the priests sounded the trumpets before the Ark of God, and Obededom and Jehiah were gatekeepers for the Ark. ²⁵ Then David and the elders of Israel and the officers of the thousands who were going to bring up the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD from the house of Obed-edom were joyful. ²⁶ Since God helped the Levites who were carrying the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD, they sacrificed seven bulls and seven rams. ²⁷ Now David and all the Levites who were carrying the Ark, and the singers and Chenaniah, officer of song of the singers, ^b were wrapped ^b in robes of fine linen, and David wore a linen ephod. ²⁸ All Israel brought up the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD with shouts and with blasts of the horn, with trumpets and cymbals, playing on harps and lyres. ²⁹ As the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD arrived at the City of David, Michal daughter of Saul looked out of the window and saw King David leaping and dancing, and she despised him for it.

16 ^c They brought in the Ark of God and set it up inside the tent that David had pitched for it, and they sacrificed burnt offerings and offerings of well-being before God. ² When David finished sacrificing the burnt offerings and the offerings of well-being, he blessed the people in the name of the LORD. ³ And he distributed to every person in Israel—man and woman alike—to each a loaf of bread, ^b a cake made in a pan, and a raisin cake. ^b ⁴ He appointed Levites to minister before the Ark of the LORD, to invoke, to praise, and to extol the LORD God of Israel: ⁵ Asaph the chief, Zechariah second in rank, Jeiel, Shemiramoth, Jehiel, Mattithiah, Eliab, Benaiah, Obed-edom, and Jeiel, with harps and lyres, and Asaph sounding the cymbals, ⁶ and Benaiah and Jahaziel the priests, with trumpets, regularly before the Ark of the Covenant of God. ⁷ Then, on that day, David first commissioned Asaph and his kinsmen to give praise to the LORD:

a Vv. 25–29 are found also in 2 Sam. 6.12–16.

b-b Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

c With vv. 1–3, cf. 2 Sam. 6.17–19.

25: The recurring use of “joy” in Chronicles emphasizes the importance of the occasion. 2 Sam. 6.12 also mentions this element, but assigns it only to David. Chronicles apparently sought to apply 2 Chron. 8.1, which states that the elders and heads of tribes participated in the dedication of

Solomon’s Temple, to David’s celebration; see 13.4–6 n. 26–27: In contrast to the wording of 2 Sam. 6.13, Chronicles’ listing of sacrificial animals reflects the influence of Priestly formulations in the Torah. 28–29: Since Chronicles has deleted references to David’s excessive ecstasy and the subsequent confrontation between Michal and David (see 2 Sam. 6.20–23), the reference to Michal’s response might seem out of place. In fact, it is Chronicles’ way of saying that Michal resented David’s immense joy in attending to the Ark, a depiction which indicates that Saul’s disregard for the cultus was shared by other members of his family. Thus, the theme of Saul’s illegitimacy is continued.

16.1–6: The Ark is placed in the tent. 4–6: Following the Priestly tradition incorporated in the Torah (contrast Deuteronomy’s Levitical priests; see Deut. 17.9), Chronicles, here and elsewhere, insists on a strict separation between the roles of Levites and priests. The Levites are assigned the duties of singing, guarding the sacred precincts, and generally assisting the priests. The role of blowing the cultic trumpets is reserved for priests, in accordance with Num. 10.8. The trumpets have several functions: to proclaim the presence of the LORD/Ark (here and 15.24, 28), to call for the people to prostrate themselves (2 Chron. 29.27, 28), and to give the signal for prayer (2 Chron. 13.14). For a different function, see Num. 10.9–10. The role of Levites in connection to Temple song is very prominent in Chronicles, but is not clearly attested in earlier sources; it is thus unclear whether this is a new role developed during the Second Temple period.

16.7–36: A medley of parts of Pss. 96, 105, and 106. The exact relation between Chronicles and these psalms has been debated, though it is most likely that Chronicles had the book of Psalms more or less in the form we have it, and here copied out sections of psalms that were relevant to this occasion and were popular among Jews of his time. 7: Asaph is one of the leading Levitical figures and appears (as does Korah) in many superscriptions in the book of Psalms. Some consider him to be a founder of a guild of Temple singers, while others doubt that he was a historical figure; see

8^a "Praise the LORD;
 call on His name;
 proclaim His deeds among the peoples.
 9 Sing praises unto Him;
 speak of all His wondrous acts.
 10 Exult in His holy name;
 let all who seek the LORD rejoice.
 11 Turn to the LORD, to His might;^b seek His presence constantly.
 12 Remember the wonders He has done;
 His portents and the judgments He has pronounced,
 13 O offspring of Israel, His servant,
 O descendants of Jacob, His chosen ones.
 14 He is the LORD our God;
 His judgments are throughout the earth.
 15 Be ever mindful of His covenant, the promise He gave for a thousand generations,
 16 that He made with Abraham, swore to Isaac,
 17 and confirmed in a decree for Jacob, for Israel, as an eternal covenant, 18 saying, 'To you I will give the land of Canaan as your allotted heritage.'
 19 You were then few in number,
 a handful, merely sojourning there, 20 wandering from nation to nation, from one kingdom to another.
 21 He allowed no one to oppress them;
 He reproved kings on their account, 22 'Do not touch My anointed ones;
 do not harm My prophets.'
 23^c "Sing to the LORD, all the earth.
 proclaim His victory day after day.
 24 Tell of His glory among the nations,
 His wondrous deeds among all peoples.
 25 For the LORD is great and much acclaimed,
 He is held in awe by all divine beings.
 26 All the gods of the peoples are mere idols, but the LORD made the heavens.
 27 Glory and majesty are before Him; strength and joy are in His place.

6.16–17 n. 8–22: These vv. (= Ps. 105.1–15) describe the LORD's covenant with Abraham. Significantly, Chronicles deletes the subsequent vv. of the psalm, in which Joseph and then the Israelites are in Egypt. This excision is part of Chronicles' reticence concerning periods during which Israel was absent from its land. 23: Taken from Ps. 96.1–13a, these vv. invite the nations to recognize the LORD's glory and His actions on behalf of Israel. The "universalistic" approach is seen by some as a late biblical (i.e., Second Temple) phenomenon, reflecting the contact between Jews and other peoples; it is unlikely that such an appeal would have been made during David's days.

a With vv. 8–22, cf. Ps. 105.1–15.

b I.e., the Ark; cf. Pss. 78.61; 132.8.

c With vv. 23–33, cf. Ps. 96.1–13.

28 "Ascribe to the LORD, O families of the peoples, ascribe to the LORD glory and strength.
 29 Ascribe to the LORD the glory of His name, bring tribute and enter before Him, bow down to the LORD majestic in holiness.
 30 Tremble in His presence, all the earth!
 The world stands firm; it cannot be shaken.
 31 Let the heavens rejoice and the earth exult; let them declare among the nations, "The LORD is King!"

32 Let the sea and all within it thunder, the fields and everything in them exult; 33 then shall all the trees of the forest shout for joy at the presence of the LORD, for He is coming to rule the earth.
 34 Praise the LORD for He is good;
 His steadfast love is eternal.

35 *Declare: Deliver us, O God, our deliverer, and gather us and save us from the nations,
 to acclaim Your holy name,
 to glory in Your praise.

36 Blessed is the LORD, God of Israel, from eternity to eternity.
 "And all the people said, "Amen" and "Praise the LORD."^a 37 He left Asaph and his kinsmen there before the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD to minister before the Ark regularly as each day required, 38 as well as Obed-edom with their kinsmen—68; also Obed-edom son of Jedithun and Hosah as gatekeepers; 39 also Zadok the priest and his fellow priests before the Tabernacle of the LORD at the shrine which was in Gibeon; 40 to sacrifice burnt offerings to the LORD on the altar of the burnt offering regularly, morning and evening, in accordance with what was prescribed in the Teaching of the LORD with which He charged Israel. 41 With them were Heman and Jeduthun and the other selected men designated by name to give praise to the LORD, "For His steadfast love is eternal." 42 Heman and Jeduthun had with them trumpets and cymbals to sound, and instruments for the songs of God; and the sons of Jeduthun were to be at the gate. 43 Then all the people went every one to his home, and David returned to greet his household.

17^b When David settled in his palace, David said to the prophet Nathan, "Here I am dwelling in a house of cedar, while the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD

34: A common postexilic liturgical refrain; see v. 41; 2 Chron. 5:13; 7:3, 6; 20:21. Praise or "give thanks" (Heb "hodu") forms an inclusio with the opening, v. 8. 35–36: Conclusion of prayer (= Ps. 106:47–48). V. 35 is anachronistic: In Chronicles' time most Jews found themselves living in foreign lands, but in David's time all of Israel resided within the borders of its promised land, as understood by Chronicles; see 13:5. (Ps. 106 is generally viewed as an exilic or postexilic composition.) It is possible that the author was willing to allow for this inconsistency in order to tell his contemporaries that the rightful place of every Israelite/Jew is in the land of Israel. The entire medley is traditionally recited as part of the "pesukei dezimrah" ("verses of song"), the opening section of the daily morning prayers. 36–39: The reference to Gibeon is part of a tradition unique to Chronicles, though it may be based on 1 Kings chs 3, 4–5. In the earlier books, one finds either the Tabernacle or the Ark as the focus of cultic concern, but not both. Moreover, one hears nothing of the Tabernacle after its destruction in Shiloh. Chronicles maintains that both Ark and Tabernacle were concurrently important, with the Ark located in one place and the Tabernacle in another. No explanation is given as to how this situation came about. Some argued that this tradition is Chronicles' way of claiming that Lev. 17:8–9 was observed in every generation, but this explanation entails various difficulties (see vv. 1, 2). See also 2 Chron. 1:3–6.

17.1–15: Rejection of David's request to build an edifice for the Ark and the "dynastic oracle." This is a revision of 2 Sam. 7:1–17, often seen as the culminating center of Samuel. Many differences exist among the Masoretic Text of Samuel, the corresponding LXX, and Chronicles. Some explain Chronicles as reflecting an underlying Heb text different from Masoretic 2 Samuel; others claim that Chronicles used a proto-Samuel a-a Cf. Ps. 106:47–48. b With this chapter, cf. 2 Sam. 7.

is under tent-cloths.”² Nathan said to David, “Do whatever you have in mind, for God is with you.”

³But that same night the word of God came to Nathan: ⁴“Go and say to My servant David: Thus said the LORD: You are not the one to build a house for Me to dwell in. ⁵From the day that I brought out Israel to this day, I have not dwelt in a house, but have [gone] from tent to tent and from one Tabernacle [to another]. ⁶As I moved about wherever Israel went, did I ever reproach any of the judges of Israel whom I appointed to care for My people Israel: Why have you not built Me a house of cedar?

⁷“Further, say thus to My servant David: Thus said the LORD of Hosts: I took you from the pasture, from following the flock, to be ruler of My people Israel, ⁸and I have been with you wherever you went, and have cut down all your enemies before you. Moreover, I will give you renown like that of the greatest men on earth. ⁹I will establish a home for My people Israel and will plant them firm, so that they shall dwell secure and shall tremble no more. Evil men shall not wear them down anymore as in the past, ¹⁰ever since I appointed judges over My people Israel. I will subdue all your enemies.

And I declare to you: The LORD will build a house^a for you. ¹¹When your days are done and you follow your fathers, I will raise up your offspring after you, one of your own sons, and I will establish his kingship. ¹²He shall build a house for Me, and I will establish his throne forever. ¹³I will be a father to him, and he shall be a son to Me, but I will never withdraw My favor from him as I withdrew it from your predecessor. ¹⁴I will install him in My house and in My kingship forever, and his throne shall be established forever.”

a I.e., a dynasty; play on “house” (i.e., Temple) in v. 4.

source, and that 2 Samuel is secondary. At least some of the differences should be attributed to Chronicles’ creative reworking of its sources; Chronicles’ version of 2 Sam. ch 7 is consistent with its emphases in other parts of Chronicles. (LXX to 2 Samuel, while different from Chronicles, agrees with the latter on many substantive points, further suggesting that both result from tendentious reworking.) 1: 2 Sam. 7.1 concludes “the LORD had granted him [David] safety from all the enemies around him.” Chronicles’ deletion is informed by two considerations: David’s alacrity, leading to the request to build a Temple immediately and, second, the fact that David will have more battles to wage, a fact which contradicts 2 Sam. ch 7. See v. 10 n.; 22.9. 4: You are not the one to build a house for Me: Chronicles’ reformulation indicates that the construction of a Temple (by someone) is not in doubt (as in 2 Sam. ch 7; see below, v. 15) but that David will not be the builder. 10: 2 Sam. 7.11 reads: “I will give you safety from all your enemies”;

Chronicles’ reading again avoids the idea of David’s safety. 13: Most scholars understand the dynastic promise in 2 Sam. 7.14–16 to be absolute; should David’s successors sin they will be chastised, but the dynasty will remain intact. (This is a clear reference to the sins committed by Solomon and, perhaps, later Judahite kings; Chronicles omits any mention of such potential sins, so as to avoid even the hint of Solomon’s sinning.) Chronicles, by contrast, elsewhere explicitly adopts the position that the dynastic promise is contingent upon fidelity to the commandments (e.g., 28.9; 2 Chron. 7.17–20). The present passage, by its omission of part of 2 Sam. 7.14, 15, allows for the possibility that the promise is granted conditionally. The unconditional dynastic promise is seen by most scholars as chronologically prior; later biblical thinking, reflecting the reality of the cessation of the Davidic dynasty, claims that the divine promise was contingent upon proper religious conduct (e.g., 1 Kings 2.3–4). Some scholars, however, argue that the conditional and unconditional views of the dynastic promise are coeval. They argue that the present passage, with its deletion of part of 2 Sam. 7.14, 15, adopts the unconditional view, while other Chronicles passages endorse the opposing position. See also Pss. 89, 132. 14: Kingship (Heb “malkhut”) may refer generally to Solomon’s role as representative of the LORD’s kingdom or, more likely, to Solomon’s palace; see 2 Chron. 1.18; 2.11. Chronicles views the establishment of a dynasty as directed primarily toward Solomon, since he gives complete expression to divine rule in both cultic and political spheres. (Cf. 2 Sam. 7.16: “your house . . . your kingship . . . your throne.”) Chronicles claims that David’s dynasty is not his own; rather, he and his descendants sit on the LORD’s throne, i.e., they are His representatives on earth (see 1 Chron. 28.5; 29.11; 2 Chron. 13.8). 2 Sam. ch 7, however, views the dynasty as being David’s possession or grant, given ¹⁵Nathan spoke to David in accordance with all these words and all this prophecy. ¹⁶Then King David came and sat before the LORD, and he said, "What am I, O LORD God, and what is my family, that You have brought me thus far? ¹⁷Yet even this, O God, has seemed too little to You; for You have spoken of Your servant's house for the future. ¹⁸You regard me as a man of distinction,"^a O LORD God. ¹⁸What more can David add regarding the honoring of Your servant? You know Your servant. ¹⁹O LORD, ^afor Your servant's sake, and of Your own accord,^a You have wrought this great thing, and made known all these great things. ²⁰O LORD, there is none like You, and there is no other God but You, as we have always heard. ²¹And who is like Your people Israel, a unique nation on earth, whom God went and redeemed as His people, winning renown for Yourself for great and marvelous deeds, driving out nations before Your people whom You redeemed from Egypt. ²²You have established Your people Israel as Your very own people forever; and You, O LORD, have become their God.

²³"And now, O LORD, let Your promise concerning Your servant and his house be fulfilled forever; and do as You have promised. ²⁴Let it be fulfilled that Your name be glorified forever, in that men will say, 'The LORD of Hosts, God of Israel, is Israel's God'; and may the house of Your servant David be established before You. ²⁵Because You, my God, have revealed to Your servant that You will build a house for him, Your servant has ventured to pray to You. ²⁶And now, O LORD, You are God and You have made this gracious promise to Your servant. ²⁷Now, it has pleased You to bless Your servant's house, that it abide before You forever; for You, O LORD, have blessed and are blessed forever."

18 ^bSometime afterward, David attacked the Philistines and subdued them; and David took Gath and its dependencies from the Philistines. ²He also defeated the Moabites; the Moabites became tributary vassals of David.

³David defeated Hadadezer, king of Zobah-hamath, a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain. b With this chapter, cf. 2 Sam. 8.

to him and his descendants. Stated differently, Chronicles views the Davidic monarchy as a vehicle for the theocratic kingdom, and therefore, anyone who challenges (or does not await the renewal of) the Davidic dynasty rejects the LORD;

see, e.g., 2 Chron. 13.8, 12. 15: A close reading of 2 Sam. ch 7 suggests David's request is rejected because it stems largely from personal motives (2 Sam. 7.5: "Are you the one to build a house for Me to dwell in?"; cf. v. 4, above).

All successful dynasties in the ancient Near East were expected to establish and maintain a functioning cultic establishment. Accordingly, David is rebuffed and told that he has it backwards: It is the LORD who will grant him a stable dynasty. In other words, David cannot use God to further his own political ambitions; the Temple will be built only when the LORD deems fit. This explanation, as noted, will not suffice for Chronicles, for which tending to the cultus was paramount. Moreover, Chronicles' David has little reason to be concerned over lack of stability, since (in contrast to Samuel's David) he has never been the object of opposition and, indeed, was accepted by the entire nation. The reason that David cannot build the Temple is supplied by the Chronicler only at 22.8, 9: The Temple could not be built by one whose hands were sullied with the blood of human beings.

17.16–27: David's response. The unambiguous reference to the sojourn in Egypt (vv. 21–22) is relatively rare in Chronicles; see introduction. Chronicles, like other biblical texts, is not fully consistent in its editing or its incorporation of earlier traditions. Cf. Solomon's reticence concerning this issue and his emphasis on the Davidic covenant (2 Chron. ch 6), suggesting that the latter has surpassed the former in significance.

18.1–17: David's victories. This ch presents David's military victories and the extension of his empire, particularly to the north/northeast. 1: 2 Sam. 8.1 states "David attacked the Philistines and subdued them; and David took Metheg-Ammah from the Philistines." Chronicles' shorter version may indicate that its author found Samuel incomprehensible. 2: The Chronicler shortens the parallel v. at 2 Sam. 8.2, perhaps because David's orders that two-thirds of the Moabites be killed appear to be both ruthless and arbitrary. 3: Setting up a monument was a means of fixing the boundaries of who was on his way to set up his monument at the Euphrates River. ⁴David captured 1,000 chariots and 7,000 horsemen and 20,000 foot soldiers of his force; and David hamstringed all the chariot horses except for 100, which he retained. ⁵And when the Arameans of Damascus came to the aid of King Hadadezer of Zobah-hamath, David struck down 22,000 of the Arameans. ⁶David stationed [garrisons] in Aram of Damascus, and the Arameans became tributary vassals of David. The LORD gave David victory wherever he went. ⁷David took the gold shields^a carried by Hadadezer's retinue and brought them to Jerusalem; ⁸and from Tibbath and Cun, towns of Hadadezer, David took a vast amount of copper, from which Solomon made the bronze tank, the columns, and the bronze vessels.

⁹When King Tou of Hamath heard that David had defeated the entire army of King Hadadezer of Zobah, ¹⁰he sent his son Hadoram to King David to greet him and to congratulate him on his military victory over Hadadezer—for Hadadezer had been at war with Tou; [he brought with him] all manner of gold, silver, and copper objects. ¹¹King David dedicated these to the LORD, along with the other silver and gold that he had taken from all the nations: from Edom, Moab, and Ammon; from the Philistines and the Amalekites.

¹²Abshai son of Zeruiah struck down Edom in the Valley of Salt, 18,000 in all. ¹³He stationed garrisons in Edom, and all the Edomites became vassals of David. The LORD gave David victory wherever he went.

¹⁴David reigned over all Israel, and David executed true justice among all his people. ¹⁵Joab son of Zeruiah was commander of the army; Jehoshaphat son of Ahilud was recorder; ¹⁶Zadok son of Ahitub and Abimelech son of Abiathar were priests; Shavsha was scribe; ¹⁷Benaiah son of Jehoiada was commander of the Cherethites and the Pelethites; and David's sons were first ministers of the king.

a Or "quivers."

a ruler's sovereignty. The second half of this v. (in Heb) is syntactically ambiguous; it is unclear if David or Hadadezer was going to set up his monument. If Hadadezer is the subject of the second half of the v., it then describes David's response to Hadadezer's attempt to free himself from David's subjugation. 4: Hamstringing horses rendered them unusable for military (or other) purposes. This v. fits nicely with Chronicles' view of military success as determined by religious merit, not military prowess; see also Deut. 17.16, 20. 8-9: Chronicles' claim that the copper taken by David was used by Solomon in fashioning Temple appurtenances does not appear in 2 Sam. ch 8. This passage again suggests continuity between David and Solomon as Temple builders, and furthers David's image as the archpatron of the Temple, and as one whose personal wealth was of secondary importance. 10: Hadoram's name appears at 2 Sam. 8.9 as Joram. Hadoram means "Had(d)u (i.e., Baal) is exalted." Such a name would be natural among Arameans. By contrast, the typically Israelite Yoram, meaning "the LORD is exalted," is surprising. Samuel reflects a "censored" form of the name, whereas Chronicles retains the original form; see 8.33 n.

14: True justice (Heb "mishpat u-tzedakah") refers, in the Bible and the ancient Near East, to the establishment of social order ("law and order"), the sine qua non of any society. This, together with the establishment and maintenance of a functioning sacrificial cult, was the sign of a successful monarch who was fulfilling his divinely given mandate. 17: The Cherethites and the Pelethites were mercenary troops whose origin probably lay in the Aegean Sea. Sons . . . first ministers: 2 Sam. 2.18 states that "the sons of David were priests (Heb "kohanim")." Since Torah (Priestly) sources mandate that only descendants of Aaron, Moses' brother, could be priests, commentators have labored to explain the term "kohanim" in 2 Samuel as referring to some office other than priesthood, e.g., (leading) court officials or military advisers; others emend the text of 2 Samuel. The simplest explanation is that the Chronicler could not accept the idea that the sons of David, a Judean, functioned as priests, so he revised the tradition. This explanation also accounts for another difference between Chronicles and Samuel. 2 Sam. 20.26 refers to "Ira, the Yairite . . ."; no such notice appears in Chronicles. The gentilic "Yairite" probably refers to a clan within the Transjordanian tribe of Manasseh, or, possibly, to the town of Kiriath-jearim (see 13.6). Some traditional sources (Targum to 2 Samuel; Tosafists to b. 'Eruv.

19^a Sometime afterward, Nahash the king of the Ammonites died, and his son succeeded him as king. ² David said, "I will keep faith with Hanun son of Nahash, since his father kept faith with me." David sent messengers with condolences to him over his father. But when David's courtiers came to the land of Ammon to Hanun, with condolences, ³ the Ammonite officials said to Hanun, "Do you think David is really honoring your father just because he sent you men with condolences? Why, it is to explore, to subvert, and to spy out the land that his courtiers have come to you." ⁴ So Hanun seized David's courtiers, shaved them, and cut away half of their garments up to the buttocks, and sent them off. ⁵ When David was told about the men, he dispatched others to meet them, for the men were greatly embarrassed. And the king gave orders, "Stay in Jericho until your beards grow back; then you can return."

⁶ The Ammonites realized that they had incurred the wrath of David; so Hanun and the Ammonites sent 1,000 silver talents to hire chariots and horsemen from Aram-naharaim, Aram-maacah, and Zobah. ⁷ They hired 32,000 chariots, the king of Maacah, and his army, who came and encamped before Medeba. The Ammonites were mobilized from their cities and came to do battle.

⁸ On learning this, David sent out Joab and the whole army, [including] the professional fighters. ⁹ The Ammonites marched out and took up their battle position at the entrance of the city, while the kings who came [took their stand] separately in the open. ¹⁰ Joab saw that there was a battle line against him both front and rear. So he made a selection from all the picked men of Israel and arrayed them against the Arameans, ¹¹ and the rest of the troops he put under the command of his brother Abishai and arrayed them against the Ammonites. ¹² Joab said, "If the Arameans prove too strong for me, you come to my aid; and if the Ammonites prove too strong for you, I will come to your aid. ¹³ Let us be strong and resolute for the sake of our people and the towns of our God; and the LORD will do what He deems right."

¹⁴ Joab and the troops with him marched into battle against the Arameans, who fled before him. ¹⁵ And when the Ammonites saw that the Arameans had fled, they too fled before his brother Abishai, and withdrew into the city. So Joab went to Jerusalem.

¹⁶ When the Arameans saw that they had been routed by Israel, they sent messengers to bring out the Arameans 63a) understood Ira to be a court official or military adviser, a position adopted by some moderns. Another view found in traditional sources maintains that Ira's father, but not his mother, was a descendant of Aaron. Chronicles' omission of this datum indicates that its author probably understood 2 Samuel as maintaining that Ira was a priest.

19.1–19: More victories for David. This passage is a light reworking of 2 Sam. ch 10.

1–2: Nahash respected the terms of his treaty (performed "hesed," faith) with David and, for that reason, David saw fit to send his condolences. Rabbinic tradents, who understood the Heb term "hesed" to mean "acts of kindness," were perplexed by the absence of any unusual expressions of friendship on the part of Nahash. Accordingly, they claimed that David's family members had been killed while in the custody of the king of Moab, save for one brother; the brother found refuge with Nahash, who refused Moab's request to extradite him (Num. Rab. 14:3; Yelammedenu, Va-Yera). 13: The formulation of this v., like its parallel in 2 Samuel, expresses the generals' trust in God, the key factor, according to Chronicles, in assuring victory over the enemy. This is a good example of an idea that appears in the sources of Chronicles but gains new importance in Chronicles.

^a With this chapter, cf. 2 Sam. 10.

from across the Euphrates; Shophach, Hadadezer's army commander, led them. ¹⁷ David was informed of it; he assembled all Israel, crossed the Jordan, and came and took up positions against them. David drew up his forces against Aram; and they fought with him. ¹⁸ But the Arameans were put to flight by Israel. David killed 7,000 Aramean charioteers and 40,000 footmen; he also killed Shophach, the army commander. ¹⁹ And when all the vassals of Hadadezer saw that they had been routed by Israel, they submitted to David and became his vassals. And the Arameans would not help the Ammonites anymore.

20^a At the turn of the year, the season when kings go out [to battle], Joab led out the army force and devastated the land of Ammon, and then besieged Rabbah, while David remained in Jerusalem; Joab reduced Rabbah and left it in ruins. ² David took the crown from the head of their king; he found that it weighed a talent of gold, and in it were precious stones. It was placed on David's head. He also carried off a vast amount of booty from the city. ³ He led out the people who lived there and ^b he hacked them ^b with saws and iron threshing boards and axes; ^c David did thus to all the towns of Ammon. Then David and all the troops returned to Jerusalem. ⁴ After this, fighting broke out with the Philistines at Gezer; that was when Sibbecai the Hushathite killed Sippai, a descendant of the Rephaim, and they were humbled.

⁵ Again there was fighting with the Philistines, and Elhanan son of Jair killed Lahmi, the brother of Goliath the Gittite; his spear had a shaft like a weaver's beam. ⁶ Once a With vv. 1–3, cf. 2 Sam. 11.1; 12.30–31.

b-b Meaning of Heb. uncertain. 2 Sam. 12.31 has "set them to work."

c Heb. megeroth; cf. 2 Sam. 12.31 magzeroth, "axes."

18–19: The Chronicler expands the number found in 2 Sam. 10.18 to glorify David and to emphasize the power of divine assistance.

20.1–8: Defeating Ammon and the Philistines.

20.1–3: Capture of Rabbah.

2 Sam. 12.26–30 states that Joab sent a message reminding David that if he remained in Jerusalem, he would be denied the glory accompanying the impending capture of Rabbah. David then joins his troops and takes part in the conquest. 2 Samuel's version portrays David as a monarch guilty of adultery with Bathsheba and of the abuse of power (leading to the death of Uriah), who also takes the credit for a military victory whose groundwork has been laid by someone else. Chronicles presents a more flattering picture; it makes no mention of Joab's message or David's motive in joining his troops, and states simply that Joab captured and then destroyed Rabbah. See 11.7 n. Following v. 1, 2 Sam. 11.1 presents the story of David and Bathsheba. Chronicles deletes the entire episode, because of its damaging portrayal of David. The disturbing implications of 2 Sam. chs 11–12 were not lost upon rabbinic tradents and medieval exegetes who offered various attempts at mitigating the severity of David's deeds (see b. Shab. 56a-b; Isaac Abravanel to 2 Samuel). Some scholars maintain that, as in other instances of deletion, Chronicles is not attempting to deny the tradition of 2 Samuel, which would have been known to his readers; rather, the author has simply selected the material that best suited his interests and goals. 2: In place of Heb "malkam," "(the crown of) their king," several versions read "Milkom," i.e., the (crown of) the national god of Ammon. (The early Heb text was written without vowels, so the consonantal text may be read either way. Cf. Zeph. 1.5.) Rabbinic sources (b. A. Z. 44a) reflect the same understanding. Similar uncertainty attends 2 Sam. ch 12. A talent of gold: The immense weight, approximately 34 kg (75 lbs), has been variously explained. 3: The words he hacked them have been variously interpreted, e.g., "he ruled over them, placing upon them hewing of stones."

20.4–8: Battles with the Philistines. 2 Sam. 21.18–19. The term Rephaim, in various Semitic languages and biblical Heb, bears several meanings; here the reference is to "giants" or "megaliths." The Bible frequently ascribes Transjordanian provenance to these beings. This v. discusses one whose origin lay in the city of Gath (v. 8, below), along the coastal plain. 6: 2 Sam. 21.19 states: "Elhanan son of Jaare-oregim the Bethlehemite killed Goliath the Gittite, whose spear had a shaft like a weaver's bar." This seems to contradict 1 Sam. ch 17, which states that David killed Goliath. Although it is likely that Samuel preserves two variant traditions, a rabbinic tradition (Targum to 2 Sam. 21; Ruth Rab. 2.2) claimed that David and Elhanan were one and the same. A similar position is adopted by some again there was fighting at Gath. There was a giant of a man who had twenty-four fingers [and toes], six [on each hand] and six [on each foot]; he too was descended from the Raphah. ⁷When he taunted Israel, Jonathan son of David's brother Shimea killed him. ⁸These were descended from the Raphah in Gath, and they fell by the hands of David and his men.

21 ^aSatan arose against Israel and incited David to number Israel. ²David said to Joab and to the commanders of the army, "Go and count Israel from Beersheba to Dan and bring me information as to their number." ³Joab answered, "May the LORD increase His people a hundredfold; my lord king, are they not all subjects of my lord? Why should my lord require this? Why should it be a cause of guilt for Israel?"

⁴However, the king's command to Joab remained firm, so Joab set out and traversed all Israel; he then came to Jerusalem. ⁵Joab reported to David the number of the people that had been recorded. All Israel comprised 1,100,000 ready to draw the sword, while in Judah there were 470,000 men ready to draw the sword. ⁶He did not record

a With vv. 1–26, cf. 2 Sam. 24.

modern commentators, who argue that David was a throne name, while Elhanan was the king's given name. One medieval exegete (Isaiah of Terrani) argued that Goliath of 2 Sam. ch 21 was not the same warrior referred to in 1 Sam. ch 17. Chronicles' formulation probably reflects the author's attempt to reconcile the two different traditions preserved in Samuel; thus, David killed Goliath, while Goliath's brother was slain by Elhanan. Alternatively, Chronicles may result from textual corruption, or a different underlying text, of 2 Sam. 21.17.

21.1–26: David's census and consequences. The differences between Chronicles' version and 2 Sam. ch 24 are numerous and substantive, leading to divergent views regarding the textual history of both passages. Chronicles shares many features with 4QSam^a (one of the Dead Sea Scrolls from Qumran), yet still differs from it in fundamental respects. The following remarks relate to the Masoretic Text alone. In 2 Samuel this episode appears in a closing addendum or appendix to the book. It concludes with the notice that the plague has come to a close, with no hint of a logical nexus between this incident and the opening chs of 1 Kings. Indeed, the first chs in Kings deal with David's last days and the rocky transition to Solomon's rule. Finally, 2 Samuel does not indicate when in David's career this episode took place. In Chronicles this story, which takes place while David is relatively young (see 23.1), serves as a prelude to the choice of the Temple site. In the last century, several scholars saw the divinely guided selection of the Temple site as part of the book's polemic—and that of Second Temple Judaism, generally—against the Samaritans, who maintained that Mt. Gerizim (in Shechem), rather than Jerusalem, constituted the "chosen place." This position is unlikely, since tensions between Samaritans and Jews reached their height during the Hasmonean period and the establishment of the cultic site on Mt. Gerizim can be dated no earlier than the early 2nd century BCE, well after the accepted date(s) of Chronicles' composition. More likely, Chronicles' point is that all aspects of the Israelite/Jewish Temple and cultus are determined by the divine will, not human caprice, a theme repeated elsewhere. 1: 2 Sam. 24.1 states that "the anger of the LORD again flared up against Israel" and, consequently, incited David to sin so as to bring (further) guilt upon the people. There is no hint as to the cause of this state of affairs, however. Chronicles resolves some of the difficulty by eliminating reference to the LORD's anger. Furthermore, Chronicles mitigates the difficulties created by 2 Samuel by claiming that David was incited by an intermediary, Satan. Many scholars understand the Heb "satan" to refer to the infamous heavenly being, but it is more likely that it here refers to a human adversary. The ascription of David's incitement to a divine being accomplishes little, since he is submissive to the divine will; ultimately, then, the LORD stands behind David's offense. For these reasons, the term has been interpreted as referring here to a human (possibly, military) adversary, who sought to cause David harm by inciting him to execute the census. 3–5: Israel, like other ancient societies, viewed census taking, unless given explicit divine sanction, as taboo (e.g., Exod. 30.11–16). While the reasons for this taboo are not clearly explained in biblical texts, it is likely that Chronicles opposed this practice, frequently associated with military preparations, because it implies that martial strength, rather than religious merit and divine providence, is primarily responsible for victory in battle. 6: 2 Samuel makes no reference to the exclusion of Levi and Benjamin. The common denominator between the two tribes is their intimate connec-among them Levi and Benjamin, because the king's command had become repugnant to Joab. ⁷God was displeased about this matter and He struck Israel.

⁸David said to God, "I have sinned grievously in having done this thing; please remit the guilt of Your servant, for I have acted foolishly." ⁹The LORD ordered Gad, David's seer: ¹⁰"Go and tell David: Thus said the LORD: I offer you three things; choose one of them and I will bring it upon you." ¹¹Gad came to David and told him, "Thus said the LORD: Select for yourself ¹²a three-year famine; or that you be swept away three months before your adversaries with the sword of your enemies overtaking you; or three days of the sword of the LORD, pestilence in the land, the angel of the LORD wreaking destruction throughout the territory of Israel. Now consider what reply I shall take back to Him who sent me." ¹³David said to Gad, "I am in great distress. Let me fall into the hands of the LORD, for His compassion is very great; and let me not fall into the hands of men."

¹⁴The LORD sent a pestilence upon Israel, and 70,000 men fell in Israel. ¹⁵God sent an angel to Jerusalem to destroy it, but as he was about to wreak destruction, the LORD saw and renounced further punishment and said to the destroying angel, "Enough! Stay your hand!" The angel of the LORD was then standing by the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite. ¹⁶David looked up and saw the angel of the LORD standing between heaven and earth, with a drawn sword in his hand directed against Jerusalem. David and the elders, covered in sackcloth, threw themselves on their faces. ¹⁷David said to God, "Was it not I alone who ordered the numbering of the people? I alone am guilty, and have caused severe harm; but these sheep, what have they done? O LORD my God, let Your hand fall upon me and my father's house, and let not Your people be plagued!" ¹⁸The angel of the LORD told Gad to inform David that David should go and set up an altar to the LORD on the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite. ¹⁹David went up, following Gad's instructions, which he had delivered in the name of the LORD. ²⁰Ornan too saw the angel; his four sons who were with him hid themselves while Ornan kept on threshing wheat. ²¹David came to Ornan; when Ornan looked up, he saw David and came off the threshing floor and bowed low to David, with his face to the ground. ²²David said to Ornan, "Sell me the site of the threshing floor, that I may build on it an altar to the LORD. Sell it to me at the full price, that the plague against the people will be checked." ²³Ornan said to David, "Take it and let my lord the king do whatever he tion to Israel's cultic worship. The Levites were central to the cultus, and, according to Jewish tradition, the southern edge of Benjamin included part of Jerusalem. Moreover, Gibeon, the site of the Tabernacle (see 16.39), was also in Benjamin. Thus, Chronicles distances these tribes from any involvement in David's misdeed. Some see Chronicles' position as related to its view of theodicy: Jerusalem was spared because the Levites and Benjamin had no part in the census. The Jewish historian Josephus (late 1st century CE) claims that the exclusion of these two tribes was the result not of Joab's refusal, but of David's regret (over his decision) during the course of the census (Ant. 7.320). 6-17: David's request that he and his household alone be punished is surprising, if one attributes to Chronicles a strict view of retribution and personal accountability. What sin have the family members committed, not to mention the seventy thousand citizens who perished? It is possible that the taboo associated with census taking is sui generis. Alternatively, this passage may indicate that Chronicles, in principle, accepts the prevalent biblical notion of vicarious punishment; see introduction. The description of the angel in v. 16 is more detailed than that of Samuel, and may reflect more developed notions of angelology in Second Temple times. 18-27: 2 Sam. ch 24 states that David paid fifty shekels of silver. Chronicles' version may reflect a different economic system; alternatively, Chronicles is making the point that no amount is too great concerning the cultus. 28-30: This is part of Chronicles' view that the locus for sacrifice was the altar (made in Moses' day) located in the Tabernacle. See 16.36-39 n.

22.1: Selection of the Temple site. The heavenly fire pinpoints the precise location chosen by the LORD for construction of the Temple and also serves as a sign of divine favor; see Lev. 9.24; 1 Kings 18.38; 2 Chron. 7.3 n., in connecsees fit. See, I donate oxen for burnt offerings, and the threshing boards for wood, as well as wheat for a meal offering—I donate all of it.”²⁴ But King David replied to Ornan, “No, I will buy them at the full price. I cannot make a present to the LORD of what belongs to you, or sacrifice a burnt offering that has cost me nothing.”²⁵ So David paid Ornan for the site 600 shekels’ worth of gold.²⁶ And David built there an altar to the LORD and sacrificed burnt offerings and offerings of well-being. He invoked the LORD, who answered him with fire from heaven on the altar of burnt offerings.²⁷ The LORD ordered the angel to return his sword to its sheath.²⁸ At that time, when David saw that the LORD answered him at the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite, then he sacrificed there—²⁹ for the Tabernacle of the LORD, which Moses had made in the wilderness, and the altar of burnt offerings, were at that time in the shrine at Gibeon,³⁰ and David was unable to go to it to worship God because he was terrified 22 by the sword of the angel of the LORD.¹ David said, “Here will be the House of the LORD and here the altar of burnt offerings for Israel.”

² David gave orders to assemble the aliens living in the land of Israel, and assigned them to be hewers, to quarry and dress stones for building the House of God.³ Much iron for nails for the doors of the gates and for clasps did David lay aside, and so much copper it could not be weighed,⁴ and cedar logs without number—for the Sidonians and the Tyrians brought many cedar logs to David.

⁵ For David thought, “My son Solomon is an untried youth, and the House to be built for the LORD is to be made exceedingly great to win fame and glory throughout all the lands; let me then lay aside material for him.” So David laid aside much material before he died.⁶ Then he summoned his son Solomon and charged him with building the House for the LORD God of Israel.

⁷ David said to Solomon, “My son, I wanted to build a House for the name of the LORD my God.⁸ But the word of the LORD came to me, saying, ‘You have shed much blood and fought great battles; you shall not build a House for David’s image by suggesting that he did everything allowable for building the Temple short of constructing the structure itself. The Chronicler thus presents the construction of the Temple as a two-part venture, begun by David and completed by Solomon, again suggesting strong continuity between David and Solomon.

22.2–19: Chronicles repeatedly makes the point that, although David was denied the honor of building the Temple, he did everything in his power to lay its groundwork (see below, vv. 11–16). Accordingly, David prepares the labor force and raw materials which, because of the magnitude and majesty of the Temple, are described as being without limit (v. 16). This is a recurring theme in Chronicles. Since the Second Temple, for most of its duration, was a modest structure, this theme is Chronicles’ clarion to his contemporaries to “recreate” the Temple’s grandeur. 2: The term “gerim,” aliens, here refers to the indigenous peoples of Canaan who had been subdued, but retained a distinct identity. Chronicles does not address their legal status; their use as forced laborers may reflect Deut. 20.10–18 and, especially, Josh. 9.27. The claim that the arduous work was carried out by the labor of aliens may indicate that the ideal king spares his own people from such labor; see 2 Chron. 2.16–17; 8.8, 9.

4: For a similar statement concerning Tyrians and Sidonians, see 2 Chron. 2.1–15. The present v. implies that these northern neighbors donated their services and materials, a sign of their admiration for David or the importance that they attached to the Temple project; cf. 14.1. 5–10: This explanation of David’s disqualification from building the Temple, put in the form of a divine oracle (v. 8), is unique to Chronicles; Temple and bloodshed do not go hand in hand. True, David’s wars were justified and, moreover, a sign of David’s righteousness and success; still, tainted hands cannot build the Temple. Whereas 1 Kings 5.17 tion with Solomon’s dedication of the Temple. Chronicles again views David and Solomon as two parallel, continuous personalities. David’s reasoning here is simple: Since the altar and Tabernacle built in Moses’ day were located in Gibeon, the divine instruction concerning the locus for David’s offering (along with the heavenly fire) proves that Gibeon is merely a temporary phase; the permanent “chosen” site is in Jerusalem.

22.2–29.25: David’s preparations for the Temple, its service, and transfer of power to Solomon. This entire section has no parallel in other biblical sources. The Chronicler composed it to bolster

My name for you have shed much blood on the earth in My sight. ⁹But you will have a son who will be a man at rest, for I will give him rest from all his enemies on all sides; Solomon^a will be his name and I shall confer peace^b and quiet on Israel in his time. ¹⁰He will build a House for My name; he shall be a son to Me and I to him a father, and I will establish his throne of kingship over Israel forever.^c ¹¹Now, my son, may the LORD be with you, and may you succeed in building the House of the LORD your God as He promised you would. ¹²Only let God give you sense and understanding and put you in charge of Israel and the observance of the Teaching of the LORD your God. ¹³Then you shall succeed, if you observantly carry out the laws and the rules that the LORD charged Moses to lay upon Israel. Be strong and of good courage; do not be afraid or dismayed. ¹⁴See, ^cby denying myself,^c I have laid aside for the House of the LORD one hundred thousand talents of gold and one million talents of silver, and so much copper and iron it cannot be weighed; I have also laid aside wood and stone, and you shall add to them. ¹⁵An abundance of workmen is at your disposal—hewers, workers in stone and wood, and every kind of craftsman in every kind of material—¹⁶gold, silver, copper, and iron without limit. Go and do it, and may the LORD be with you.”

¹⁷David charged all the officers of Israel to support his son Solomon, ¹⁸“See, the LORD your God is with you, and a Heb. Shelomoh. b Heb. shalom. c-c With Targum; or “in my poverty.”

claims that David was engaged in warfare throughout his life, leaving no time for Temple building, Chronicles claims that David’s wars came to a close well before his demise (see 22.18). It was therefore necessary to account for David’s failure to establish a Temple. Deut. 12.9 indicates that the Temple is to be built only after Israel arrives at its “allotted haven.” Whereas Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic History mean by this “rest for the nation,” Chronicles emphasizes the notion that the LORD finds rest among His people. 9: This v. puns on Solomon’s name: “Shelomoh” expresses the idea that in his day peace (“shalom”) and quiet will prevail (see translators’ notes a, b). Chronicles employs this literary technique elsewhere. By calling Solomon a man at rest, Chronicles shifts the rest required for the Temple’s construction from David’s reign (as in 2 Samuel) to Solomon. Chronicles’ description, here and elsewhere, ignores 1 Kings chs 1–2, which states that Solomon’s accession involved subterfuge and elimination of competitors and other “undesirables.” Chronicles’ reformulation expresses the view that the two earthly expressions of divine sovereignty—the Temple cultus and the Davidic dynasty—were divinely determined, leaving no room for dissent. 10: The terms father and son here denote covenantal relationships between the two parties. The term son may also signify legal adoption, in which the son represents the interests of the family (Ps. 2.5–7). 11–16: This literary unit is framed by the words the LORD be with you. The use of such devices is common in Chronicles. David encourages Solomon, reminding him that success in executing construction of the Temple hinges on God’s granting him wisdom and on his observance of God’s Torah. Whereas Kings’ Solomon is renowned for his judicial wisdom and general knowledge, Chronicles focuses on Solomon’s wisdom as manifest, primarily, in connection with organization of all aspects of the Temple’s construction; see, e.g., 2 Chron. 2.11. This section anticipates many of the qualities of Solomon that are depicted in 1 Kings and 2 Chron. 12: The phrase observance of the Teaching (“torah”) of the LORD your God is reflective of Chronicles’ era, in which proper conduct was defined exclusively in accordance with the laws of the (authoritative form of the) Torah; cf. the less legal formulation at 1 Kings 8.25. These vv., especially 12–13, employ a Moses-Joshua typology in their depiction of the relationship of David and Solomon (see Deut. 3.28; 31.7–8; Josh. 1.5–9). This Moses-Joshua typology expresses the view that David, like Moses, laid the groundwork for Israel’s future life, though he himself did not live to see its realization. In addition, the smooth transition from Moses to Joshua, decreed by God and warmly endorsed by the people (Josh. 1.16–18), parallels Chronicles’ depiction of the transfer of power from David to Solomon. Finally, the days of Moses and Joshua constitute Israel’s classic “golden age,” much as the reigns of David and Solomon form the golden age of Judah’s monarchy. For Moses-David typology, see 2 Chron. chs 13–14. 14–16: David again claims that he has prepared building materials, as well as workers and craftsmen. This formulation is reminiscent of Exod. 31.1–6; 35.10ff. Chronicles, here and elsewhere, draws an analogy between the Mosaic Tabernacle and the First Temple, in order to accentuate the continuity, authen-

He will give you rest on every side, for He delivered the inhabitants of the land into my hand so that the land lies conquered before the LORD and before His people. ¹⁹Now, set your minds and hearts on worshipping the LORD your God, and go build the Sanctuary of the LORD your God so that you may bring the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD and the holy vessels of God to the house that is built for the name of the LORD.”

23 When David reached a ripe old age, he made his son Solomon king over Israel. ²Then David assembled all the officers of Israel and the priests and the Levites. ³The Levites, from the age of thirty and upward, were counted; the head-count of their males was 38,000: ⁴of these there were 24,000 in charge of the work of the House of the LORD, 6,000 officers and magistrates, ⁵4,000 gatekeepers, and 4,000 for praising the LORD “with instruments I devised for singing praises.” ⁶David formed them into divisions:

The sons of Levi: Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. ⁷The Gershonites: Ladan and Shimei. ⁸The sons of Ladan: Jehiel the chief, Zetham, and Joel—3. ⁹The sons of Shimei: Shelomith, Haziel, and Haran—3. These were the chiefs of the clans of the Ladanites. ¹⁰And the sons of Shimei: Jahath, Zina, Jeush, and Beriah; these were the sons of Shimei—4. ¹¹Jahath was the chief and Zizah the second, but Jeush and Beriah did not have many children, so they were enrolled together as a single clan. ¹²The sons of Kohath: Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel—4. ¹³The sons of Amram: Aaron and Moses. Aaron was set apart, he and his sons, forever, to be consecrated as most holy, to make burnt offerings to the LORD and serve Him and pronounce blessings in His name forever. ¹⁴As for Moses, the man of God, his sons were named after the tribe of Levi. ¹⁵The sons of Moses: Gershom and Eliezer. ¹⁶The sons of Gershom: Shebuel the chief. ¹⁷And the sons of Eliezer were: Rehabiah the chief. Eliezer had no other sons, but the sons of Rehabiah were very numerous. ¹⁸The sons of Izhar: Shelomith the chief. ¹⁹The sons of Hebron: Jeriah the chief, Amariah the second, Jahaziel the third, and Jekameam the fourth. ²⁰The sons of Uzziel: Micah the chief and Isshiah the second. ²¹The sons of Merari: Mahli and Mushi. The sons of Mahli: Eleazar and Kish. ²²Eleazar died having no sons but only daughters; the sons of Kish, their kinsmen, married them. ²³The sons of Mushi: Mahli, Eder, and Jeremoth—3.

²⁴These are the sons of Levi by clans, with their clan chiefs as they were enrolled, with a list of their names by ticity, and antiquity of Israel’s sacrificial cult. 17–19: David employs the same terms, used in the previous vv., when addressing the nation’s officers; compare Moses’ charge in Deut. 30.6–8. 19: Worshipping (Heb “lirdosh”), specifically, attending to the Temple cultus. As in Deuteronomy (e.g., 12.11), God’s name rather than God resides in the Temple.

23.1–27.34: David’s administration. On the basis of repetitions and contradictions, many scholars argue that parts of this section are secondary, disagreeing only on the particulars. Others, however, maintain that these chs are an integral part of the original, and explain the repetitions and contradictions as either intentional literary flourishes or the result of Chronicles’ incorporation of variant traditions. 23.1–2: David takes a census of the Levites. The Levites, who were not included in David’s earlier census, are now counted. This census was probably carried out in order to assess the organization of the Temple, not for David’s own sake; hence, there is no criticism of David. This separate census parallels the practice of Moses’ day; see Num. 3.14–39. The introduction to the ch suggests a smooth transition between David and Solomon, in sharp contrast to the end of 2 Samuel and the beginning of 1 Kings. 5: Chronicles credits David with another feature of Temple worship: fashioning the instruments; see 2 Chron. 7.6; 29.26, 27. Ch 29.25 claims that the use of these instruments was, ultimately, divinely ordained. 13: The end of this v. is reminiscent of Deut. 10.8 which, however, applies to the entire tribe of Levi (the “Levitical priests”); following Priestly norms found in the Torah, it is applied to priests only. The first part of Deut. 10.8 has informed the Levites’ role at 1 Chron. 15.2. 23–32: This passage involves a shift from v. 2, leading some scholars to posit different authorship for the vv.; this argument, however, is not compelling. David introduces an innovation by allow-heads, who did the work of the service of the House of the LORD from the age of twenty and upward. ²⁵For David said, "The LORD God of Israel has given rest to His people and made His dwelling in Jerusalem forever. ²⁶Therefore the Levites need not carry the Tabernacle and all its various service vessels." ²⁷Among the last acts of David was the counting of the Levites from the age of twenty and upward. ²⁸For their appointment was alongside the Aaronites for the service of the House of the LORD, to look after the courts and the chambers, and the purity of all the holy things, and the performance of the service of the House of God, ²⁹and the rows of bread, and the fine flour for the meal offering, and the unleavened wafers, and the cakes made on the griddle and soaked, and every measure of capacity and length; ³⁰and to be present every morning to praise and extol the LORD, and at evening too, ³¹and whenever offerings were made to the LORD, according to the quantities prescribed for them, on sabbaths, new moons and holidays, regularly, before the LORD; ³²and so to keep watch over the Tent of Meeting, over the holy things, and over the Aaronites their kinsmen, for the service of the House of the LORD.

24 The divisions of the Aaronites were: The sons of Aaron: Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar. ²Nadab and Abihu died in the lifetime of their father, and they had no children, so Eleazar and Ithamar served as priests.

³David, Zadok of the sons of Eleazar, and Ahimelech of the sons of Ithamar divided them into offices by their tasks. ⁴The sons of Eleazar turned out to be more numerous by male heads than the sons of Ithamar, so they divided the sons of Eleazar into sixteen chiefs of clans and the sons of Ithamar into eight clans. ⁵They divided them by lot, both on an equal footing, since they were all sanctuary officers and officers of God—the sons of Eleazar and the sons of Ithamar. ⁶Shemaiah son of Nathanel, the scribe, who was of the Levites, registered them under the eye of the king, the officers, and Zadok the priest, and Ahimelech son of Abiathar, and the chiefs of clans of the ing (or, perhaps, requiring) Levites to assume their duties at the age of twenty, rather than the age of thirty or twenty-five, as set forth in the Torah (Num. 4.3, 23, 39, 47). The rationale is that the age of thirty was necessary in the wilderness period, when carrying the Ark required stronger or more responsible and experienced cultic personnel; a permanent cultus made such age restrictions unnecessary. This is apparently an example of Chronicles attributing contemporary cultic norms to hoary antiquity and, in particular, to David. Historically, the change in policy may reflect the fact that a functioning cultic establishment demanded more personnel or, as indicated by biblical sources, that the number of Levites living in postexilic and Second Temple Judah was quite small (see Ezra 8.15–20); accordingly, it was necessary to enlist all those of adult age. David is presented as a legislator, again signaling a role parallel to that of Moses. 26: Need not: The Aramaic Targum understands this v. to mean that Levites were no longer allowed to move the cultic vessels. 28: The duties assigned to the Levites include tasks wholly unattested in earlier sources, as well as tasks mentioned in these sources but not assigned to any specific group (see, e.g., Lev. 24.5–9). Numbers (3.5–9; 18.2–6) does state that the Levites shall guard the Tabernacle and serve the priests, but the precise nature of their service is not explained; the Chronicler fills in this gap, most likely attributing practices of his period to that of David. The net result is that the Levites perform most of the Temple duties and make the daily Temple service possible. The priests are limited to sacrificing, blowing the trumpets, and "blessing" in the LORD's name. 30–31: The cultic songs accompany the morning and afternoon or evening services together with the burnt offering, i.e., they have no independent role. They are also performed on the Sabbath, new moon, and pilgrimage festivals; 2 Chron. 2.4; 8.13; 31.3. In Psalms, we only have a single psalm attributed to one of these occasions, to the Sabbath (Ps. 92), though liturgical texts found among the Dead Sea Scrolls reflect a more extensive liturgy. 32: Service (Heb "avodah") as a generic term for Levitical responsibilities is unattested in Torah texts, where it refers to physical labor (portage). This development continues in postbiblical Heb, where "avodah" means "prayer."

24.1–19: Sons of Aaron. Chronicles claims that the existence of twenty-four priestly divisions, a familiar part of Second Temple priests and Levites—^aone clan more taken for Eleazar for each one taken of Ithamar.^a ⁷The first lot fell on Jehoiarib; the second on Jedaiah; ⁸the third on Harim; the fourth on Seorim; ⁹the fifth on Malchijah; the sixth on Mijamin; ¹⁰the seventh on Hakkoz; the eighth on Abijah; ¹¹the ninth on Jeshua; the tenth on Shecaniah; ¹²the eleventh on Eliashib; the twelfth on Jakim; ¹³the thirteenth on Huppah; the fourteenth on Jeshbeab; ¹⁴the fifteenth on Bilgah; the sixteenth on Immer; ¹⁵the seventeenth on Hezir; the eighteenth on Huppizez; ¹⁶the nineteenth on Pethahiah; the twentieth on Jehezkel; ¹⁷the twenty-first on Jachin; the twenty-second on Gamul; ¹⁸the twenty-third on Delaiah; the twenty-fourth on Maaziah.

¹⁹According to this allocation of offices by tasks, they were to enter the House of the LORD as was laid down for them by Aaron their father, as the LORD God of Israel had commanded him.

²⁰The remaining Levites: the sons of Amram: Shubael; the sons of Shubael: Jehdeiah; ²¹Rehabiah. The sons of Rehabiah: Isshiah, the chief. ²²Izharites: Shelomoth. The sons of Shelomoth: Jahath ²³and Benai, Jeriah; the second, Amariah; the third, Jahaziel; the fourth, Jekameam. ²⁴The sons of Uzziel: Micah. The sons of Micah: Shamir. ²⁵The brother of Micah: Isshiah. The sons of Isshiah: Zechariah. ²⁶The sons of Merari: Mahli and Mushi. The sons of Jaaziah, his son—²⁷the sons of Merari by Jaaziah his son: Shoham, Zakkur, and Ibri. ²⁸Mahli: Eleazar; he had no sons. ²⁹Kish: the sons of Kish: Jerahmeel. ³⁰The sons of Mushi: Mahli, Eder, and Jerimoth. These were the sons of the Levites by their clans.

³¹These too cast lots corresponding to their kinsmen, the sons of Aaron, under the eye of King David and Zadok and Ahimelech and the chiefs of the clans of the priests and Levites, on the principle of “chief and youngest brother alike.”

25 David and the officers of the army set apart for service the sons of Asaph, of Heman, and of Jeduthun, who prophesied to the accompaniment of lyres, harps, and cymbals. The list of men who performed this work, according to their service, was:

²Sons of Asaph: Zaccur, Joseph, Nethaniah, and Asarelah—sons of Asaph under the charge of Asaph, who prophesied by order of the king. ³Jeduthun—the sons of Jeduthun: Gedaliah, Zeri, Jeshaiah, Hashabiah, Matti-life, was David’s innovation. This passage is viewed by many as secondary. 7: Order established by lot. The Maccabees trace their lineage to Jehoiarib, which has led some to argue that the list is of 2nd-century provenance; this is unconvincing.

24.20–31: More sons of Levi. This list is frequently thought to reflect an updated version of 23.6–23.

25.1–31: The musicians/singers. The placement of this group following the Levites reflects their related roles in the cultus. 1–3: Another facet of Chronicles’ views on prophecy. It is possible that the Levitical prophecy of these vv. is a kind of cultic and musically inspired prophecy, but more likely Chronicles viewed the musical performance itself as a form of prophecy, i.e., written or performed under prophetic inspiration. Chronicles claims that the musical aspects of the Levites’ activity are, like other features of Israel’s cultic service, the product of divine inspiration. (Even so, precisely what is intended by this position, viz., the “lyrics” or musical arrangement, etc., is uncertain.) For earlier examples of music as part of prophetic ecstasy, see 1 Sam. 10.5. 1: Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (elsewhere: Ethan) appear in the superscriptions (introductions) to several compositions in the book of Psalms (e.g., 50, 88, 39). These figures, about whom little (historically reliable) information is known, are viewed here as the founders of the cultic guilds bearing their names.

a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

thiah—6, under the charge of their father Jeduthun, who, accompanied on the harp, prophesied, praising and extolling the LORD. ⁴Heman—the sons of Heman: Bukkiah, Mattaniah, Uzziel, Shebuel, Jerimoth, Hananiah, Hanani, Eliathah, Giddalti, Romamti-ezer, Joshbekashah, Mallothi, Hothir, and Mahazioth; ⁵all these were sons of Heman, the seer of the king, [who uttered] prophecies of God for His greater glory. God gave Heman fourteen sons and three daughters; ⁶all these were under the charge of their father for the singing in the House of the LORD, to the accompaniment of cymbals, harps, and lyres, for the service of the House of God by order of the king. Asaph, Jeduthun, and Heman—⁷their total number with their kinsmen, trained singers of the LORD—all the masters, 288.

⁸They cast lots for shifts on the principle of “small and great alike, like master like apprentice.”

⁹The first lot fell to Asaph—to Joseph; the second, to Gedaliah, he and his brothers and his sons—¹²; ¹⁰the third, to Zaccur: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ¹¹the fourth, to Izri: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ¹²the fifth, to Nethaniah: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ¹³the sixth, to Bukkiah: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ¹⁴the seventh, to Jesarelah: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ¹⁵the eighth, to Jeshaiiah: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ¹⁶the ninth, to Mattaniah: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ¹⁷the tenth, to Shimei: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ¹⁸the eleventh to Azarel: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ¹⁹the twelfth, to Hashabiah: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ²⁰the thirteenth, to Shubael: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ²¹the fourteenth, to Mattithiah: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ²²the fifteenth, to Jeremoth: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ²³the sixteenth, to Hananiah: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ²⁴the seventeenth, to Joshbekashah: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ²⁵the eighteenth, to Hanani: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ²⁶the nineteenth, to Mallothi: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ²⁷the twentieth, to Eliathah: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ²⁸the twenty-first, to Hothir: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ²⁹the twenty-second, to Giddalti: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ³⁰the twenty-third, to Mahazioth: his sons and his brothers—¹²; ³¹the twenty-fourth, to Romamti-ezer: his sons and his brothers—¹².

26 The divisions of the gatekeepers: Korahites: Meshelemiah son of Kore, of the sons of Asaph. ²Sons of Meshelemiah: Zechariah the firstborn, Jediel the second, Zebadiah the third, Jathniel the fourth, ³Elam the fifth, Jehohanan the sixth, Eliehoenai the seventh. ⁴Sons of Obed-edom: Shemaiah the first-born, Jehozabad the sec-

4: This difficult v. has been emended and reconstructed by many scholars, resulting in a song of praise, rather than the present list of sons. 5: The description of Heman as the seer of the king (LXX: royal musicians) is an expression of the inspired nature of the cultic music and the activity of the leaders of the Levitical singers/musicians (see v. 1 n.). Contrary to some opinions, Chronicles does not portray all Levites as prophets. For abundance of children as sign of divine favor, see 14.3–7. 6–8: Some scholars understand v. 6 to mean that Heman’s daughters were part of the Temple orchestra (cf. Ezra 2.65; Neh. 7.67); the v. probably refers only to the sons listed in v. 4, however. 9–31: Chronicles again credits David with establishing cultic norms. Division of the Levites into twenty-four watches appears only in Second Temple sources. The Levites are assigned by Num. 18.4–6 to guard the Tabernacle against encroachment by outsiders, an act which unleashes the divine wrath. Chronicles assigns the Levite clans specific locations, but does not indicate whether their primary role is to prevent encroachment or simply as a kind of “honor guard,” a notion which appears in later Jewish sources (Sifre Zuta, Korah, Num. 18.4; Maimonides, Book of Commandments, 22). The Rabbis (Sifre Num. 116, b. Arak. 11b) understood the division of labor to be absolute, such that a Levite may not perform the task(s) assigned to another Levitical clan.

26.1–19: Gatekeepers. The gatekeepers follow the cultic singers.

ond, Joah the third, Sacar the fourth, Nethanel the fifth, ⁵Ammiel the sixth, Issachar the seventh, Peullethai the eighth—for God had blessed him. ⁶To his son Shemaiah were born sons who exercised authority in their clans because they were men of substance. ⁷The sons of Shemaiah: Othni, Rephael, Obed, Elzabad—his brothers, men of ability, were Elihu and Semachiah. ⁸All these, sons of Obed-edom; they and their sons and brothers, strong and able men for the service—62 of Obed-edom. ⁹Meshelemiah had sons and brothers, able men—18. ¹⁰Hosah of the Merarites had sons: Shimri the chief (he was not the first-born, but his father designated him chief), ¹¹Hilkiah the second, Tebaliah the third, Zechariah the fourth. All the sons and brothers of Hosah—13.

¹²These are the divisions of the gatekeepers, by their chief men, [who worked in] shifts corresponding to their kinsmen, ministering in the House of the LORD. ¹³They cast lots, small and great alike, by clans, for each gate.

¹⁴The lot for the east [gate] fell to Shelemiah. Then they cast lots [for] Zechariah his son, a prudent counselor, and his lot came out to be the north [gate]. ¹⁵For Obed-edom, the south [gate], and for his sons, the vestibule. ¹⁶For Shuppim and for Hosah, the west [gate], with the Shallecheth gate on the ascending highway. Watch corresponded to watch: ¹⁷At the east—six Levites; at the north—four daily; at the south—four daily; at the vestibule—two by two; ¹⁸at the colonnade on the west—four at the causeway and two at the colonnade. ¹⁹These were the divisions of the gatekeepers of the sons of Korah and the sons of Merari.

²⁰And the Levites: Ahijah over the treasuries of the House of God and the treasuries of the dedicated things. ²¹The sons of Ladan: the sons of the Gershonites belonging to Ladan; the chiefs of the clans of Ladan, the Gershonite—Jehieli. ²²The sons of Jehieli: Zetham and Joel; his brother was over the treasuries of the House of the LORD.

²³Of the Amramites, the Izharites, the Hebronites, the Uzzielites: ²⁴Shebuel son of Gershom son of Moses was the chief officer over the treasuries. ²⁵And his brothers: Eliezer, his son Rehabiah, his son Jeshaiiah, his son Joram, his son Zichri, his son Shelomith—²⁶that Shelomith and his brothers were over all the treasuries of dedicated things that were dedicated by King David and the chiefs of the clans, and the officers of thousands and hundreds and the other army officers; ²⁷they dedicated some of the booty of the wars to maintain the House of the LORD. ²⁸All that Samuel the seer had dedicated, and Saul son of Kish, and Abner son of Ner, and Joab son of Zeruiah—or 26.20–32: Officers and judges.

The listing of officials most removed from cultic responsibilities appears toward the end of the block extending from ch 23 through ch 27, following priests and Levites. It offers a bridge to the following ch that outlines non-cultic functionaries. 28: This passage offers a more positive view of Saul than that encountered earlier, suggesting that the author here may have drawn on popular tradition. More likely, the author means to say that if a person like Saul was aware of the importance of the cultus, it follows that any self-respecting Jew must do no less. Abner was the commander of Saul's army; Joab was the commander of David's.

[what] any other man had dedicated, was under the charge of Shelomith and his brothers.

²⁹The Izharites: Chenaniah and his sons were over Israel as clerks and magistrates for affairs outside [the sanctuary]. ³⁰The Hebronites: Hashabiah and his brothers, capable men, 1,700, supervising Israel on the west side of the Jordan in all matters of the LORD and the service of the king. ³¹The Hebronites: Jeriah, the chief of the Hebronites—they were investigated in the fortieth year of David's reign by clans of all their lines, and men of substance were found among them in Jazer-gilead. ³²His brothers, able men, 2,700, chiefs of clans—David put them in charge of the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh in all matters of God and matters of the king.

27 The number of Israelites—chiefs of clans, officers of thousands and hundreds and their clerks, who served the king in all matters of the divisions, who worked in monthly shifts during all the months of the year—each division, 24,000. ²Over the first division for the first month—Jashobeam son of Zabdiel; his division had 24,000. ³Of the sons of Perez, he, the chief of all the officers of the army, [served] for the first month. ⁴Over the division of the second month—Dodai the Ahohite; Mikloth was chief officer of his division; his division had 24,000. ⁵The third army officer for the third month—Benaiah son of Jehoiada, the chief priest; his division had 24,000. ⁶That was Benaiah, one of the warriors of the thirty and over the thirty; and [over] his division was Ammizabad his son. ⁷The fourth, for the fourth month, Asahel brother of Joab, and his son Zebadiah after him; his division had 24,000. ⁸The fifth, for the fifth month, the officer Shamhut the Izrahite; his division had 24,000. ⁹The sixth, for the sixth month, Ira son of Ikkesh the Tekoite; his division had 24,000. ¹⁰The seventh, for the seventh month, Helez the Pelonite, of the Ephraimites; his division had 24,000. ¹¹The eighth, for the eighth month, Sibbecai the Hushathite, of Zerah; his division had 24,000. ¹²The ninth, for the ninth month, Abiezer the Anathothite, of Benjamin; his division had 24,000. ¹³The tenth, for the tenth month, Mahrai the Netophathite, of Zerah; his division had 24,000. ¹⁴The eleventh, for the eleventh month, Benaiah the Pirathonite, of the Ephraimites; his division had 24,000. ¹⁵The twelfth, for the twelfth month, Heldai the Netophathite, of Othniel; his division had 24,000.

¹⁶Over the tribes of Israel: Reuben: the chief officer, Eliezer son of Zichri. Simeon: Shephatiah son of Maaca. ¹⁷Levi: Hashabiah son of Kemuel. Aaron: Zadok. ¹⁸Judah:

29–32: These vv. occasion surprise because they refer to secular duties of the Levites, a phenomenon which elsewhere appears only in the late biblical period (2 Chron. 19.8–11; Neh. 11.16). This section's historicity is debated.

27.1–34: Non-cultic arrangements. This ch deals with general organizational features of David's reign; it is likely of secondary origin. David's reign is depicted as one of order, with the nation centered on the Jerusalem cultus.

1–15: The monthly shifts. Chronicles' notion of monthly shifts is probably inspired by 1 Kings 4.7, which details the monthly arrangements for Solomon's household. Note the typological number twenty-four (thousand) in this passage. 16–24: A listing of tribal chiefs. The tribes of Asher and Gad are missing, perhaps in order to keep the number of tribes at twelve. The census of ch 21 is here presented in terms more favorable to David, less favorable to Joab. 25–31: Stewards of David's holdings. Like most kings in the ancient Near East, David acquired large tracts of property. The description of these holdings is part of Chronicles' glorification of David. 32–34: Important figures in the king's entourage; some but not all of these are known from the lists and narratives in Samuel.

28.1–21: David encourages Solomon and the people.

2: The footstool refers to the Ark. The expression reflects the belief that the LORD was seated upon a throne created by the (wings of the) cherubs—situated above the Ark—so that His feet rested on the Ark itself (cf. Lam. 2.1).

3–7: Davidic kings "sit on the LORD's throne"; see 17.14.

Elihu, of the brothers of David. Issachar: Omri son of Michael. ¹⁹Zebulun: Ishmaiah son of Obadiah. Naphtali: Jerimoth son of Azriel. ²⁰Ephraimites: Hoshea son of Azaziah. The half-tribe of Manasseh: Joel son of Pedaiah. ²¹Half Manasseh in Gilead: Iddo son of Zechariah. Benjamin: Jaasiel son of Abner. ²²Dan: Azarel son of Jeroham. These were the officers of the tribes of Israel.

²³David did not take a census of those under twenty years of age, for the LORD had promised to make Israel as numerous as the stars of heaven. ²⁴Joab son of Zeruiah did begin to count them, but he did not finish; wrath struck Israel on account of this, and the census was not entered into the account of the chronicles of King David.

²⁵Over the royal treasuries: Azmaveth son of Adiel. Over the treasuries in the country—in the towns, the hamlets, and the citadels: Jonathan son of Uzziah. ²⁶Over the field laborers in agricultural work: Ezri son of Chelub. ²⁷Over the vineyards: Shimei the Ramathite. And over the produce in the vineyards for wine cellars: Zabdi the Shiphmite. ²⁸Over the olive trees and the sycamores in the Shephelah: Baal-hanan the Gederite. Over the oil-stores: Joash. ²⁹Over the cattle pasturing in Sharon: Shirtai the Sharonite. And over the cattle in the valleys: Shaphat son of Adlai. ³⁰Over the camels: Obil the Ishmaelite. And over the she-asses: Jehdeiah the Meronothite. ³¹Over the flocks: Jaziz the Hagrite. All these were stewards of the property of King David. ³²Jonathan, David's uncle, was a counselor, a master, and a scribe: Jehiel son of Hachmoni was with the king's sons. ³³Ahitophel was a counselor to the king. Hushai the Archite was the king's friend. ³⁴After Ahitophel were Jehoiada son of Benaiah and Abiathar. The commander of the king's army was Joab.

28 David assembled all the officers of Israel—the tribal officers, the divisional officers who served the king, the captains of thousands and the captains of hundreds, and the stewards of all the property and cattle of the king and his sons, with the eunuchs and the warriors, all the men of substance—to Jerusalem. ²King David rose to his feet and said, "Hear me, my brothers, my people! I wanted to build a resting-place for the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD, for the footstool of our God, and I laid aside material for building. ³But God said to me, 'You will not build a house for My name, for you are a man of battles and have shed blood.' ⁴The LORD God of Israel chose me of all my father's house to be king over Israel forever. For He chose Judah to be ruler, and of the family of Judah, my father's house; and of my father's sons, He preferred to make me king over all Israel; ⁵and of all my sons—for many are the sons the LORD gave me—He chose my son Solomon to sit on the throne of the kingdom of the LORD over Israel. ⁶He said to me, ‘It will be your son Solomon who will build My House and My courts, for I have chosen him to be a son to Me, and I will be a father to him. ⁷I will establish his kingdom forever, if he keeps firmly to the observance of My commandments and rules as he does now.’ ⁸And now, in the sight of all Israel, the congregation of the LORD, and in the hearing of our God, [I say:] Observe and apply yourselves to all the commandments of the LORD your God in order that you may possess this good land and bequeath it to your children after you forever.

⁹“And you, my son Solomon, know the God of your father, and serve Him with single mind and fervent heart, for the LORD searches all minds and discerns the design of every thought; if you seek Him He will be available to you, but if you forsake Him He will abandon you forever. ¹⁰See then, the LORD chose you to build a house as the sanctuary; be strong and do it.”

¹¹David gave his son Solomon the plan of the porch and its houses, its storerooms and its upper chambers and inner chambers; and of the place of the Ark-cover; ¹²and the plan of all that he had by the spirit: of the courts of the House of the LORD and all its surrounding chambers, and of the treasuries of the House of God and of the treasuries of the holy things; ¹³the divisions of priests and Levites for all the work of the service of the House of the LORD and all the vessels of the service of the House of the LORD; ¹⁴and gold, the weight of gold for vessels of every sort of use; silver for all the vessels of silver by weight, for all the vessels of every kind of service; ¹⁵the weight of the gold lampstands and their gold lamps, and the weight of the silver lampstands, each lampstand and its silver lamps, according to the use of every lampstand; ¹⁶and the weight of gold for the tables of the rows of bread, for each table, and of silver for the silver tables; ¹⁷and of the pure gold for the forks and the basins and the jars; and the weight of the gold bowls, every bowl; and the weight of the silver bowls, each and every bowl; ¹⁸the weight of refined gold for the incense altar and the gold for the figure of the cherub—the cherubs—those with outspread wings screening the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD. ¹⁹“All this that the LORD made me understand by His hand on me, I give you in writing—the plan of all the works.”

²⁰David said to his son Solomon, “Be strong and of good courage and do it; do not be afraid or dismayed, for 7: Continuity of the monarchy is here contingent upon observance of the divine commandments; see 17.13 n. 8–9: The importance of serving the LORD wholeheartedly; see 29.9–19. 12: Spirit here refers to prophetic inspiration, as clarified in v. 19. 19: Chronicles’ David is not explicitly labeled a prophet or seer, but is the recipient of prophetic revelation or inspiration. This v. is consistent with Chronicles’ glorification of David, as well as the recurring theme of the divine source of all things pertaining to the Temple. David’s prophetic status is explicitly acknowledged in the writings of the Dead Sea Scrolls (11QPs^a) and some traditional Jewish sources (Tg. Chron.; Isaac Abravanel). Even so, other sources (y. Meg. 1.1 [70a], Rashi ad b. Sukkah 51b) claim that the Temple plans were given to David via the prophets Samuel, Gad, or Nathan; see above, 9.22, and 2 Chron. 29.25. Radak averred that David experienced not prophecy but, rather, a lesser degree of divine inspiration (Heb “ruah ha-kodesh”; compare y. Meg.). 20: Reminiscent of Moses’ exhortation to Joshua (Deut. 31.7, 8); David and Solomon are viewed like Moses and Joshua (22.12 n.).

the LORD God my God is with you; He will not fail you or forsake you till all the work on the House of the LORD is done. ²¹Here are the divisions of the priests and Levites for all kinds of service of the House of God, and with you in all the work are willing men, skilled in all sorts of tasks; also the officers and all the people are at your command."

29 King David said to the entire assemblage, "God has chosen my son Solomon alone, an untried lad, although the work to be done is vast—for the temple^a is not for a man but for the LORD God. ²¹I have spared no effort to lay up for the House of my God gold for golden objects, silver for silver, copper for copper, iron for iron, wood for wooden, onyx-stone and inlay-stone, stone of antimony and variegated colors—every kind of precious stone and much marble. ³Besides, out of my solicitude for the House of my God, I gave over my private hoard of gold and silver to the House of my God—in addition to all that I laid aside for the holy House: ⁴3,000 gold talents of Ophir gold, and 7,000 talents of refined silver for covering the walls of the houses ⁵(gold for golden objects, silver for silver for all the work)—into the hands of craftsmen. Now who is going to make a freewill offering and devote himself today to the LORD?"

⁶The officers of the clans and the officers of the tribes of Israel and the captains of thousands and hundreds and the supervisors of the king's work made freewill offerings, ⁷giving for the work of the House of God: 5,000 talents of gold, 10,000 darics, 10,000 talents of silver, 18,000 talents of copper, 100,000 talents of iron. ⁸Whoever had stones in his possession gave them to the treasury of the House of the LORD in the charge of Jehiel the Gershonite. ⁹The people rejoiced over the freewill offerings they made, for with a whole heart they made freewill offerings to the LORD; King David also rejoiced very much.

¹⁰David blessed the LORD in front of all the assemblage; David said, "Blessed are You, LORD, God of Israel our father, from eternity to eternity. ¹¹Yours, LORD, are greatness, might, splendor, triumph, and majesty—yes, all that is in heaven and on earth; to You, LORD, belong kingship and preeminence above all. ¹²Riches and honor are Yours to dispense; You have dominion over all; with You are strength and might, and it is in Your power to make anyone great and strong. ¹³Now, God, we praise You and extol Your glorious name. ¹⁴Who am I and who are my people, that we should have the means to make such a 29.1–9: The call to support Solomon in building the Temple. Chronicles describes the grandeur of the Temple, requiring participation of the entire population; for similar description, see 2 Chron. 2.3–8. The willing participation of the people mirrors the construction of the Tabernacle in Exod. 35.4–29.

29.11–19: David's thanksgiving prayer. This prayer is structurally and thematically similar to the Psalms anthology in ch 16; together they form an inclusio of David's cultic activity. Both passages contain the following themes: transition from landless patriarchs to landed society, the LORD's kingship, and a closing petition. Another significant element now appears: Deeds are truly virtuous only if accompanied by proper intentions. Humans cannot gloat in the act of contributing to the LORD's Temple, since all human success and wealth come from Him. But people can take pride in the fact that their donations are given with joy and not as a result of coercion; see introduction. This prayer, however, seems to be an original composition of the Chronicler, and it does not have any parallels in Psalms. Like 16.8–36, vv. 10–13 are traditionally recited as part of the "pesukei dezimrah" of the morning prayers.

^a Lit. "fortress."

freewill offering; but all is from You, and it is Your gift that we have given to You. ¹⁵For we are sojourners with You, mere transients like our fathers; our days on earth are like a shadow, with nothing in prospect. ¹⁶O LORD our God, all this great mass that we have laid aside to build You a House for Your holy name is from You, and it is all Yours. ¹⁷I know, God, that You search the heart and desire uprightness; I, with upright heart, freely offered all these things; now Your people, who are present here—I saw them joyously making freewill offerings. ¹⁸O LORD God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, our fathers, remember this to the eternal credit of the thoughts of Your people's hearts, and make their hearts constant toward You. ¹⁹As to my son Solomon, give him a whole heart to observe Your commandments, Your admonitions, and Your laws, and to fulfill them all, and to build this temple^a for which I have made provision."

²⁰David said to the whole assemblage, "Now bless the LORD your God." All the assemblage blessed the LORD God of their fathers, and bowed their heads low to the LORD and the king. ²¹They offered sacrifices to the LORD and made burnt offerings to the LORD on the morrow of that day: 1,000 bulls, 1,000 rams, 1,000 lambs, with their libations; [they made] sacrifices in great number for all Israel, ²²and they ate and drank in the presence of the LORD on that day with great joy. They again proclaimed Solomon son of David king, and they anointed him as ruler before the LORD, and Zadok as high priest. ²³Solomon successfully took over the throne of the LORD as king instead of his father David, and all went well with him. All Israel accepted him; ²⁴all the officials and the warriors, and the sons of King David as well, gave their hand in support of King Solomon. ²⁵The LORD made Solomon exceedingly great in the eyes of all Israel, and endowed him with a regal majesty that no king of Israel before him ever had.

²⁶Thus David son of Jesse reigned over all Israel; ²⁷the length of his reign over Israel was forty years: he reigned seven years in Hebron and thirty-three years in Jerusalem. ²⁸He died at a ripe old age, having enjoyed long life, riches and honor, and his son Solomon reigned in his stead. ²⁹The acts of King David, early and late, are recorded in the history of Samuel the seer, the history of Nathan the prophet, and the history of Gad the seer, ³⁰together with all the mighty deeds of his kingship and the events that befell him and Israel and all the kingdoms of the earth.

24: Chronicles is oblivious to 1 Kings chs 1–3. 25: Some scholars argue that this formulation indicates that Chronicles viewed Solomon as no less important a figure than David; others reject this, noting that David is Chronicles' king, par excellence. Alternatively, this formulation may reflect Chronicles' use of a Solomonic typology in its depiction of Hezekiah. 2 Kings 20.13 describes Hezekiah's magnificent wealth; accordingly, Chronicles applied this artificial note to Solomon in order to allow for this literary parallel. 26–27: Whereas 1 Kings 2.11 states that David ruled over Judah in Hebron, and over a united Israel in Jerusalem, Chronicles avoids this dichotomy. Chronicles' position carries a price: If David ruled from Hebron over all Israel for seven years, then his move to Jerusalem has no clear motive. Since Chronicles presents the capture of Jerusalem as a national-religious issue, one wonders why the move was postponed seven years; see 1 1.1–3, 4–9 n. 28–30: A recurring feature of Chronicles is the claim that the official royal chronicles were composed by prophets. This is another example of the changed role and nature of prophets in Chronicles; they are, among other things, historians who record, study, interpret, and assess past events. In addition, Chronicles' claim implies that everything contained in these official accounts—arid, by implication, the book of Chronicles itself—is fully accurate and credible. Many modern scholars, however, doubt that these works, typically mentioned at the end of the kings' reign, ever existed.

^a Lit. "fortress."

2 Chronicles

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE BOOK of Chronicles precedes 1 Chronicles.

[DAVID ROTHSTEIN]

1^aSolomon son of David took firm hold of his kingdom, for the LORD his God was with him and made him exceedingly great. ²Solomon summoned all Israel—the officers of thousands and of hundreds, and the judges, and all the chiefs of all Israel, the heads of the clans. ³Then Solomon, and all the assemblage with him, went to the shrine at Gibeon, for the Tent of Meeting, which Moses the servant of the LORD had made in the wilderness, was there. (⁴But the Ark of God David had brought up from Kiriath-jearim to the place which David had prepared for it; for he had pitched a tent for it in Jerusalem.) ⁵The bronze altar, which Bezalel son of Uri son of Hur had made, was also there before the Tabernacle of the LORD, and Solomon and the assemblage resorted to it. ⁶There Solomon ascended the bronze altar before the LORD, which was at the Tent of Meeting, and on it sacrificed a thousand burnt offerings.

a With vv. 3–13, cf. 1 Kings 3.4–15; with vv. 14–17, cf. 1 Kings 10.26–29.

1.1–9.31: Solomon’s reign. Chronicles presents a much more favorable depiction of Solomon than the books of Samuel and Kings, omitting any passages which reflect poorly upon him. In general, Chronicles portrays Solomon as a near mirror-image of David. Solomon’s reign is marked by the realization of David’s cultic preparations and economic growth. Thus, the continuity between David and Solomon in Chronicles is greater than in Samuel-Kings.

1.1–13: Solomon travels to Gibeon. In the “incubation” story of 1 Kings 3.4–14 Solomon makes a private pilgrimage to Gibeon in the hope of receiving divine communication. Chronicles views this pilgrimage as a sign of Solomon’s devotion to the cultus and, thereby, having national-religious significance. In line with the tendency to create greater continuity between David and Solomon, Solomon’s actions parallel those of David; see 1 Chron. 11.4–8 and esp. 13.1–5. 1: David’s prayers on behalf of Solomon have materialized (1 Chron. 28.20). 3: 1 Kings (3.2–3) acknowledges that Israel offered local sacrifices prior to the construction of Solomon’s Temple; Chronicles consistently avoids mention of any such possibility. The Tabernacle and altar were, for Chronicles, the mobile “chosen place” for cultic activity, in accordance with Lev. 17.8; Deut. 12.4–28. For this reason Chronicles claims that Gibeon was the site of the Mosaic Tabernacle (and sacred appurtenances), whereas 1 Kings 3.4 states only that the “great altar”—i.e., one of many—was there (see 1 Chron. 16.39). For Chronicles, but not for Kings, Leviticus as well as Deuteronomy was authoritative; this explains the revision here. Rabbinic tradition (m. Zevali. 14.4–7; t. Zevali. 13.19) reconciles the divergent biblical traditions (Lev. ch 17, Deut. ch 12, 1 Kings, Chronicles) by arguing that prior to the construction of the Temple, local cultic slaughter was permitted so long as there was no central tabernacle housing both the “great altar” and the Ark (as in Chronicles’ description of Gibeon); when such existed, as in the rab-⁷That night, God appeared to Solomon and said to him, “Ask, what shall I grant you?” ⁸Solomon said to God, “You dealt most graciously with my father David, and now You have made me king in his stead. ⁹Now, O LORD God, let Your promise to my father David be fulfilled; for You have made me king over a people as numerous as the dust of the earth. ¹⁰Grant me then the wisdom and the knowledge to lead this people,^a for who can govern Your great people?” ¹¹God said to Solomon, “Because you want this, and have not asked for wealth, property, and glory, nor have you asked for the life of your enemy, or long life for yourself, but you have asked for the wisdom and the knowledge to be able to govern My people over whom I have made you king, ¹²wisdom and knowledge are granted to you, and I grant you also wealth, property, and glory, the like of which no king before you has had, nor shall any after you have.” ¹³From the shrine at Gibeon, from the Tent of Meeting, Solomon went to Jerusalem and reigned over Israel.

¹⁴Solomon assembled chariots and horsemen; he had 1,400 chariots and 12,000 horses that he stationed in the chariot towns and with the king in Jerusalem. ¹⁵The king made silver and gold as plentiful in Jerusalem as stones, and cedars as plentiful as the sycamores in the Shephelah. ¹⁶Solomon’s horses were imported from Egypt and from Que; the king’s traders would buy them from Que at the market price. ¹⁷A chariot imported from Egypt cost 600 shekels of silver, and a horse 150. These in turn were exported by them^b to all the kings of the Hittites and the kings of the Arameans.

¹⁸Then Solomon resolved to build a House for the name of the LORD and a royal palace for himself.

2 ^cSolomon mustered 70,000 basket carriers and 80,000 quarriers in the hills, with 3,600 men supervising them. ²Solomon sent this message to King Hiram of Tyre, “In view of what you did for my father David in sending a-a Lit. “that I may go out before this people and come in.”

b That is, Solomon’s dealers. c Cf. 1 Kings 5.

binic understanding of the Shiloh Tabernacle (see Josh. 18.1; 1 Sam. 3.3), sacrificial activity was permitted only at the central site. This accounts for David’s sacrifices, in Jerusalem, at 1 Chron. 16.2. As previously noted, Chronicles omits reference to the dynastic struggle during David’s old age. Chronicles also defers mention of Solomon’s marriage to Pharaoh’s daughter (1 Kings 3.1) until 8.11. The reasons are twofold. First, Chronicles seeks to convey the impression that Solomon’s first act as monarch pertained to religious, Temple-related matters. Second, Solomon’s marriage to Pharaoh’s daughter is a “political” one, intended to consolidate his position; only after this stability is assured does Solomon, according to 1 Kings, go to Gibeon. Chronicles, however, maintains that Solomon’s rule was divinely ordained and had never been in doubt; hence, the diplomatic motive behind this marriage was irrelevant. 13: Chronicles omits Solomon’s sacrifice before the Ark upon his return to Jerusalem; cf. 1 Kings 3.15. This probably reflects Chronicles’ slant concerning cult centralization even before the construction of the Temple; see, however, 1 Chron. 16.2.

1.14–17: Economic growth. Almost identical wording appears at the close of Solomon’s life in 2 Chron. 9.27–28 (= 1 Kings 10.23–28); it is not unusual for Chronicles to rearrange source material for literary or ideological reasons. While some scholars see this use of inclusion (2 Chron. 1.14–17 || 2 Chron. 9.27–28) as nothing more than a literary device, others maintain Chronicles here portrays God’s promise as being realized without delay, such that the entire period of Solomon’s reign was marked by economic prosperity. There is no hint here of the hardships endured during the course of this economic boom; see 10.1. Note that Chronicles omits 1 Kings 3.16–28, Solomon’s first successful adjudication, because Chronicles maintains that Solomon’s wisdom was manifest, first and foremost, in executing the Temple project; see 2 Chron. 2.11.

1.18–2.17: Preparation of work force and Solomon’s negotiations with Hiram. There are many differences between this ch and 1 Kings ch 2. Kings calls the king Hiram, while in Chronicles he is Hiram. In Kings Hiram establishes diplomatic contact with Solomon, to continue the beneficial (and lucrative; see below) relations which he had enjoyed with David; he therefore does this only after Solomon’s rule has been fully stabilized. By contrast, Chronicles claims that Solomon initiates the him cedars to build a palace for his residence—³see, I intend to build a House for the name of the LORD my God; I will dedicate it to Him for making incense offering of sweet spices in His honor, for the regular rows of bread, and for the morning and evening burnt offerings on sabbaths, new moons, and festivals, as is Israel's eternal duty. ⁴The House that I intend to build will be great, inasmuch as our God is greater than all gods. ⁵Who indeed is capable of building a House for Him! Even the heavens to their uttermost reaches cannot contain Him, and who am I that I should build Him a House—except as a place for making burnt offerings to Him? ⁶Now send me a craftsman to work in gold, silver, bronze, and iron, and in purple, crimson, and blue yarn, and who knows how to engrave, alongside the craftsmen I have here in Judah and in Jerusalem, whom my father David provided. ⁷Send me cedars, cypress, and algum wood from the Lebanon, for I know that your servants are skilled at cutting the trees of Lebanon. My servants will work with yours ⁸to provide me with a great stock of timber; for the House that I intend to build will be singularly great. ⁹I have allocated for your servants, the wood-cutters who fell the trees, 20,000 kor of crushed wheat and 20,000 kor of barley, 20,000 bath of wine and 20,000 bath of oil."

¹⁰Huram, king of Tyre, sent Solomon this written message in reply, "Because the LORD loved His people, He made you king over them."

¹¹Huram continued, "Blessed is the LORD, God of Israel, who made the heavens and the earth, who gave King David a wise son, endowed with intelligence and understanding, to build a House for the LORD and a royal palace for himself. ¹²Now I am sending you a skillful and intelligent man, my master^a Hiram, ¹³the son of a Danite a Lit. "my father."

diplomacy shortly after his visit to Gibeon and his conscription of Temple workers; his alacrity demonstrates his commitment to executing the construction of the Temple. Second, the negotiations in 1 Kings are based on a quid pro quo; Solomon pays for needed services, while the terms of payment are dictated by Hiram. In Chronicles Solomon unilaterally dictates the terms, while Hiram is presented as a "believing," monotheistic Gentile, whose motive for assisting Solomon is largely, or even exclusively, religious. Third, the cost in Kings involves yearly provisions for Hiram's household; Chronicles speaks of a one-time payment. Fourth, in 1 Kings Solomon's description of the planned Temple is terse and businesslike; Chronicles' Solomon describes the magnitude of the Temple project in superlative terms and spells out the specific cultic activities (integrating Priestly perspectives) to take place in the Temple. Fifth, by having Hiram use the expression "my lord" to Solomon (v. 14), Chronicles portrays Solomon as the dominant monarch; see 8.1–6 n. Finally, according to 1 Kings 5.26, the wisdom that God bestowed upon Solomon is demonstrated by Solomon's execution of a treaty with Hiram. Chronicles makes no reference to this treaty nor to its constituting the realization of Solomon's wisdom. As noted above, Chronicles maintains that Solomon's wisdom was manifest primarily in connection with the Temple building, and only secondarily in other spheres. Chronicles' omission of the treaty reflects two factors. Since Chronicles presents Solomon as the most powerful and wealthy monarch in the region, there is no reason for Solomon to limit himself by a political treaty. Second, Chronicles' omission reflects an ideological stance of Chronicles, according to which a truly believing individual must trust in the LORD's ability to provide for all needs, making treaties with foreigners (and wicked Israelites) superfluous and even improper. 2.3: The addition of details of the sacrifices reflect Chronicles' incorporation of the Priestly perspective found in Leviticus and elsewhere. 5: Chronicles expresses the divine transcendence; the Temple does not actually "house" the LORD (contrast 1 Kings 8.13). This formulation may be informed by Deuteronomy's "name theology," according to which only the LORD's name is localized at the Temple (see, e.g., Deut. 12.5, 11). 10–13: Hiram's reply: The implication of Hiram's readiness to assist Solomon is that if a foreigner—albeit righteous—recognizes the importance of the Israelite Temple, how much more so should be the response of all Israelites/Jews. 11: A patent formulation of the view that the wisdom granted Solomon was realized primarily in the building of the Temple, not in domestic and international leadership. 12–14: The materials listed are reminiscent of the Tabernacle account in Exod. 25.3–7; 35.5–9; see the "continuity theme" in 1 Chron. ch 21. This motif also explains the woman, his father a Tyrian. He is skilled at working in gold, silver, bronze, iron, precious stones, and wood; in purple, blue, and crimson yarn and in fine linen; and at engraving and designing whatever will be required of him, alongside your craftsmen and the craftsmen of my lord, your father David. ¹⁴As to the wheat, barley, oil, and wine which my lord mentioned, let him send them to his servants. ¹⁵We undertake to cut down as many trees of Lebanon as you need, and deliver them to you as rafts by sea to Jaffa; you will transport them to Jerusalem."

¹⁶Solomon took a census of all the aliens who were in the land of Israel, besides the census taken by his father David, and they were found to be 153,600. ¹⁷He made 70,000 of them basket carriers, and 80,000 of them quarriers, with 3,600 supervisors to see that the people worked.

3^aThen Solomon began to build the House of the LORD in Jerusalem on Mount Moriah, where [the LORD] had appeared to his father David, at the place which David a With vv. 2-17, cf. 1 Kings 6; 7:1-22.

name and tribal background of the chief Temple craftsman. Whereas 1 Kings 7.14 assigns his mother to the northern tribe of Naphtali, Chronicles claims that his mother was from the northern tribe of Dan, while his father was a Tyrian; the (half-)Danite lineage of Huramabi thus parallels the Tabernacle account in Exodus, wherein one of the head artisans, Oholiab, was a Danite (Exod. 31.6). The Tyrian origin of the craftsman's father troubled Jewish exegetes. Josephus (Ant.) and some medieval commentators argued that his father was Jewish, by taking "Tyre" to refer to the mainland Tyre, apportioned to Asher (Josh. 19.29), rather than the Phoenician city. Others suggested that his father was originally from the fort-city of Ser, which formed part of Naphtali, but subsequently moved to Tyre. The Chronicler's statement here reflects his relatively moderate position on intermarriage and lineage; see introduction. 16-17: Solomon again prepares the work force. Significantly, he uses only aliens for the work force; Kings is ambivalent on this matter (cf. 1 Kings 5.27; 9.21). In addition,

Chronicles has omitted the covenant between Solomon and Hiram (1 Kings 5.26).

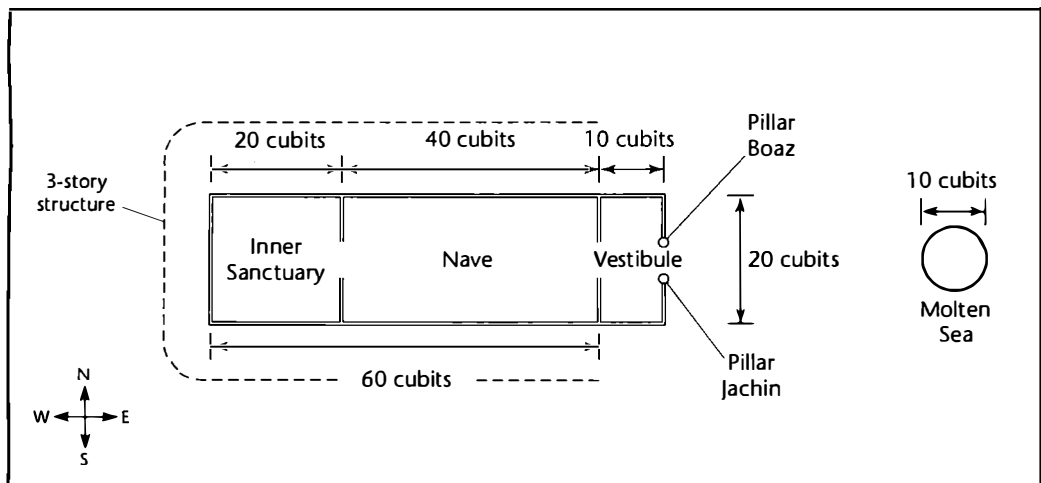

3.1-2: The Temple site. The "Land of Moriah" appears elsewhere only at Gen. 22.1 in connection with the 'Akedah, Abraham's binding of Isaac. Chronicles claims that David's altar was erected on the very spot on which Abraham prepared to sacrifice Isaac. Other allusions to Gen. ch 22 include the words "who was seen/appeared to David," (Heb "r-'h"), reminiscent of Gen. 22.4, 8, 13 and, esp. v. 14. Chronicles thus emphasizes the "chosen" nature of the Temple site, which reaches back to Israel's earliest forebear, suggesting that the site's uniqueness is almost ontological. This may also be another expression of the fulfillment of the divine promise to Abraham; see 1 Chron. 16.8-18. A rabbinic tradition (Pirqe R. El. 31; see, also y. Naz. 7.2 [56a]; Gen. Rab. 34; b. Zevah. 62a) further maintains that the locus of the Temple altar was the place from which Adam was created, and where Cain and Abel made their respective offerings (Gen. 4.3-4), suggesting that the locus of humankind's creation is also the locus of atonement (i.e., "rejuvenation"). The Samaritan community preserves a parallel tradition, wherein the binding of Isaac took place on Mt. Gerizim, the religious center of the Samaritans. 2: The delay in building the Temple at 1 Kings 6.1 is reasonable, since Solomon had been forced to first secure his throne. Chronicles, however, omits the entire episode (see 1.3 n.); indeed, Chronicles implies that Solomon's negotiations with Hiram took place immediately upon his return from Gibeon, i.e. within days of Solomon's accession to the throne. Furthermore, David had already laid most of the groundwork. Nevertheless, Chronicles depicts Solomon as waiting until the fourth year perhaps because the period of three years in Chronicles is typological, signifying a (relatively) short period (see 11.7; 17.7) and the magnitude of the Temple project, emphasized repeatedly in Chronicles, required two to three years of preparation. Note that Chronicles omits 1 Kings' reference to 480 years from the exodus (6.1); this omission is another instance of Chronicles' reticence concerning Israel's sojourn in, and deliverance from, Egypt (see introduction).

3.3-5.1: Solomon's Temple. Chronicles' description of the Temple and appurtenances differs considerably from that found at 1 Kings chs 6-7, in two respects. First, Chronicles' account is much shorter than that of 1 Kings. Second, Chronicles' version brings Kings' description into closer harmony with the Mosaic Tabernacle described in the Priestly source of the Torah, another example of the "continuity theme." Beginning with v. 8, and with the exception of 4.11-16, the syntactic subject of these vv. is Solomon, thus emphasizing Solomon's role as executor of David's preparations. 3.4: For the use of gold inlay, see 1 Kings 6.22, 30. 6: Parvaim is most likely a place name (so LXX and Targum), possibly located in northeastern had designated, at the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite. ²He began to build on the second day of the second month of the fourth year of his reign. ³These were the dimensions Solomon established for building the House of God: its length in cubits, by the former measure, was 60, and its breadth was 20. ⁴The length of the porch in front [was equal] to the breadth of the House—20 cubits, and its height was 120. Inside he overlaid it with pure gold. ⁵The House itself he paneled with cypress wood. He overlaid it with fine gold and embossed on it palms and chains. ⁶He studded the House with precious stones for decoration; the gold was from Parvaim. ⁷He overlaid the House with gold—the beams, the thresholds, its walls and doors; he carved cherubim on the walls. ⁸He made the Holy of Holies: its length was [equal to] the breadth of the house—20 cubits, and its breadth was 20 cubits. He overlaid it with 600 talents of fine gold. ⁹The weight of the nails was 50 shekels of gold; the upper chambers he overlaid with gold. ¹⁰He made two sculptured cherubim in the Holy of Holies, and they were overlaid with gold. ¹¹The outspread wings of the cherubim were 20 cubits across: one wing 5 cubits long touching one wall of the House, and the other wing 5 cubits long touching the wing of the other cherub; ¹²one wing of the other [cherub] 5 cubits long extending to the other wall of the House, and its other wing 5 cubits long touching the wing of the first cherub. ¹³The wingspread of these cherubim was thus 20 cubits across, and they were standing up facing the

Arabia. Others understand the term to mean "finest gold" (thus, apparently, Vulgate and Peshitta). Postbiblical and rabbinic sources understood the term as denoting either a mythical location or quality. 7: 1 Kings 6.22 makes no mention of cherubim being engraved on the walls of the Temple. Chronicles' position, informed by Exod. 26.1, 31, appears to be an artificial construct. In Exodus the curtain encloses the portable walls of the Tabernacle, but the permanence of the Temple made a curtain unnecessary. 8: The 600 talents, mentioned only in Chronicles, recalls the price paid by David for the Temple site (1 Chron. 21.25). This may be intended to highlight the central role of the "most holy," in which the Ark was housed. This number (= 12 × 50) may also be Chronicles' way of saying that the Temple site, along with the "most holy," is the rightful possession of all of Israel's tribes. 11-13: The winged cherubim: In Exodus 25.20 the cherubim in the Tabernacle faced one another. The Rabbis reconciled the positions by claiming that when Israel obeyed the LORD's will the cherubim faced one another, signaling harmony; when Israel veered from the path,

The Temple of Solomon according to Second Chronicles

House. ¹⁴He made the curtain of blue, purple, and crimson yarn and fine linen, and he worked cherubim into it. ¹⁵At the front of the House he made two columns 35 cubits high; the capitals^a on top of them were 5 cubits high. ¹⁶He made chainwork in the inner Sanctuary and set it on the top of the columns; he made a hundred pomegranates and set them into the chainwork. ¹⁷He erected the columns in front of the Great Hall, one to its right and one to its left; the one to the right was called Jachin, and the one to the left, Boaz.

4 ^bHe made an altar of bronze 20 cubits long, 20 cubits wide, and 10 cubits high.

²He made the sea^c of cast metal 10 cubits across from brim to brim, perfectly round; it was 5 cubits high, and its circumference was 30 cubits. ³Beneath were figures of oxen set all around it, of 10 cubits, encircling the sea; the oxen were in two rows, cast in one piece with it. ⁴It stood upon twelve oxen: three faced north, three faced west, three faced south, and three faced east, with the sea resting upon them; their haunches were all turned inward. ⁵It was a handbreadth thick, and its brim was made like that of a cup, like the petals of a lily. It held 3,000 bath.

⁶He made ten bronze lavers for washing; he set five on the right and five on the left; they would rinse off in them the parts of the burnt offering; but the sea served the priests for washing. ⁷He made ten lampstands of gold as prescribed, and placed them in the Great Hall, five on the right and five on the left. ⁸He made ten tables and placed them in the Great Hall, five on the right and five on the left. He made one hundred gold basins. ⁹He built the court of the priests and the great court, and doors for the great court; he overlaid the doors with bronze. ¹⁰He set the sea on the right side, at the southeast corner.

a Meaning of Heb. uncertain. b Cf. 1 Kings 7.23–50. c I.e., a large basin.

the cherubim faced outwards, toward the Temple courts (b. B. Bat. 99a). 14: There is no mention of a curtain, cherub-adorned or otherwise, separating the Holy from the Most Holy in either 1 Kings (6.21) or the (future) temple of Ezekiel. Indeed, 1 Kings 6.31–32 mentions doors at this juncture. The Heb word for veil, “parokhet,” appears twenty-four times in the Priestly source[s], and nowhere else in the Bible. Moreover, the very existence of such a curtain contradicts 4.22, and 1 Kings 7.50; 6.31–32, where permanent doors separate the courts. Chronicles’ account is, again, informed by the description of the Priestly Tabernacle (Exod. 26.31–37; 36.35). Despite the seemingly artificial nature of Chronicles’ position, several Second Temple sources (e.g., Josephus) mention the “parokhet” or veil as a feature of the Second Temple. 15–17: 1 Kings 7.15–22 states that Hiram had the pillars built; Chronicles implies that Solomon was responsible for them. The position of these pillars—on either side of the entrance to the sanctuary, a point not specified in the Kings account—corresponds to archaeological evidence afforded by the sanctuaries at Hazor and Arad. 4.1: The altar of bronze is missing in 1 Kings. Some scholars explain the reference here as a scribal error, while others maintain that Chronicles has added it under the influence of Exod. 27.1; 38.1. The dimensions probably describe the altar base, from which steps led to the altar itself. 2–5: The sea: The differences between this v. and 1 Kings 7.23–26 have generated many explanations. The difference in size may reflect a cylindrical shape (Chronicles) versus a hemisphere (Kings). Chronicles’ reference to oxen may result from Chronicles’ difficulty in understanding the Kings passage. Some postbiblical sources (Josephus, Ant.) maintained that production of the oxen violated the anti-ionic position of Deut. 4.16–18; see 9.18–19. 6–8: The purpose of the lavers, not found in 1 Kings, reflects the influence of Exod. 30.17–21; here too the Priestly description of the Tabernacle is used to fill in the depiction in Kings. 4.7: Cf. Exod. 25.31–39; 37.17–24. Rabbinic sources maintain that there were ten candelabra in addition to that fashioned in Moses’ day; the present v. was explained to mean that five were placed to the right of Moses’ candelabrum and five to its left. Some rabbinic tradents say that all ten candelabra were used (i.e., lighted) daily, like that of Moses (see 13.11), while others say that only Moses’ candelabrum was lighted (t. Menah. 11.10; y. Shek. 6.3 [50b]). Some commentators argue that the elevenfold increase in the number of candelabra corresponds, roughly, to the ratio of the area of the Temple court to that of Moses’ Tabernacle (12:1 ratio). 9: In contrast to 1 Kings (6.36; 7.12), Chronicles claims that the inner court was for priests and the outer for lay Israelites. This position, informed by Ezek. chs ¹¹Huram made the pails, the shovels, and the basins. With that Huram completed the work he had undertaken for King Solomon in the House of God: ¹²the two columns, the globes, and the two capitals on top of the columns; and the two pieces of network to cover the two globes of the capitals on top of the columns; ¹³the four hundred pomegranates for the two pieces of network, two rows of pomegranates for each network, to cover the two globes of the capitals on top of the columns; ¹⁴he made the stands and the lavers upon the stands; ¹⁵one sea with the twelve oxen beneath it; ¹⁶the pails, the shovels, and the bowls.^a And all the vessels made for King Solomon for the House of the LORD by Huram his master were of burished bronze. ¹⁷The king had them cast in molds dug out of the earth, in the plain of the Jordan between Succoth and Zeredah. ¹⁸Solomon made a very large number of vessels; the weight of the bronze used could not be reckoned. ¹⁹And Solomon made all the furnishings that were in the House of God: the altar of gold; the tables for the bread of display; ²⁰the lampstands and their lamps, to burn as prescribed in front of the inner Sanctuary, of solid gold; ²¹and the petals, lamps, and tongs, of purest gold; ²²the snuffers, basins, ladles, and fire pans, of solid gold; and the entrance to the House: the doors of the innermost part of the House, the Holy of Holies, and the doors of the Great Hall of the House, of gold.

5^bWhen all the work that King Solomon undertook for the House of the LORD was completed, Solomon brought the things that his father David had consecrated—the silver, the gold, and the utensils—and deposited them in the treasury of the House of God.

²Then Solomon convoked the elders of Israel—all the heads of the tribes and the ancestral chiefs of the Israelites—in Jerusalem, to bring up the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD from the City of David, that is, Zion.

³All the men of Israel assembled before the king at the Feast,^c in the seventh month. ⁴When all the elders of Israel had come, the Levites carried the Ark. ⁵They brought up the Ark and the Tent of Meeting and all the holy vessels that were in the Tent—the Levite priests brought them up. ⁶Meanwhile, King Solomon and the whole community of Israel, who had gathered to him before the Ark, were sacrificing sheep and oxen in such abundance that they could not be numbered or counted.

⁷The priests brought the Ark of the LORD's Covenant to 40–48, is reflected in postbiblical and rabbinic sources. The “Temple Scroll” from Qumran (11QTemple) speaks of three courts, the outermost being designated for women and minors under the age of twenty. 10–22: This passage is very similar to 1 Kings 7.39–50. The many apparent contradictions between it and other aspects of Chronicles' description have led many scholars to view this passage as a late addition to the book. 11: The wording is reminiscent of the completion of the Tabernacle at Exod. 39.32, again emphasizing the continuity theme. Similarly, the following vv. here parallel Exod. 39.33–41, which list the Tabernacle vessels.

5.1: For David's role, see, e.g., 1 Chron. 18.8, 10–11; 22.3–4, 14, 16; 29.2–9.

5.2–7.11: Dedication of the Temple. The culmination of all that has transpired since 1 Chron. ch 11. Patterned after 1 Kings 8.1–66, this section consists of three parts: (1) transfer of the Ark into the Temple, (2) Solomon's dedicatory prayer, (3) descent of divine fire and concluding ceremonies. Chronicles adds, at several points, descriptions of the Levitic choral rite, indicative of the enhanced role of Levitic service in Chronicles.

5.2–6.11: Transfer of the Ark. This section may also be titled “The Consecration of the Temple,” since the placement of the Ark in the Temple constitutes the latter's consecration.

^a Or “forks.” ^b Cf. 1 Kings 7.51–8.11. ^c I.e., of Tabernacles.

its place in the inner Sanctuary of the House, in the Holy of Holies, beneath the wings of the cherubim; ⁸for the cherubim had their wings spread out over the place of the Ark so that the cherubim covered the Ark and its poles from above. ⁹The poles projected beyond the Ark and the ends of the poles were visible from the front of the inner Sanctuary, but they could not be seen from the outside; and there they remain to this day. ¹⁰There was nothing inside the Ark but the two tablets that Moses placed [there] at Horeb, when the LORD made [a Covenant] with the Israelites after their departure from Egypt. ¹¹When the priests came out of the Sanctuary—all the priests present had sanctified themselves, without keeping to the set divisions—¹²all the Levite singers, Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun, their sons and their brothers, dressed in fine linen, holding cymbals, harps, and lyres, were standing to the east of the altar, and with them were 120 priests who blew trumpets. ¹³The trumpeters and the singers joined in unison to praise and extol the LORD; and as the sound of the trumpets, cymbals, and other musical instruments, and the praise of the LORD, “For He is good, for His steadfast love is eternal,” grew louder, the House, the House of the LORD, was filled with a cloud. ¹⁴The priests could not stay and perform the service because of the cloud, for the glory of the LORD filled the House of God.

6 ^aThen Solomon declared:
 “The LORD has chosen
 To abide in a thick cloud;
 I have built for You
 A stately House,
 And a place where You
 May dwell forever.”

³Then, as the whole congregation of Israel stood, the king turned and blessed the whole congregation of Israel. ⁴He said, “Blessed is the LORD God of Israel, ^bwho made a promise to my father David and fulfilled it. ^bFor He said, ⁵From the time I brought My people out of the land of Egypt, I never chose a city from among all the tribes of Israel to build a House where My name might abide; nor did I choose anyone to be the leader of my people Israel. ⁶But then I chose Jerusalem for My name to abide there, and I chose David to rule My people Israel.’

⁷“Now my father David had wanted to build a House

5.11–14: Based upon 1 Kings 8.10–11. Immediately upon transferral of the Ark, the Levites perform, whereupon the LORD’s glory appears, veiled in a cloud and hidden from the people’s sight. The coincidence of the sacred song with the divine cloud has been explained in several ways. Some see it as indicating divine approval of the choral song; others argue that it is the choral service, specifically mentioning the divine name and His virtuous acts, that evokes the divine Presence. This latter approach sees the daily recital of the choral service as serving to announce, and procure, the LORD’s protective presence in the Temple. See 7.1–3. On the phrase For He is good, for His steadfast love is eternal, see 1 Chron. 16.34 n.

^a Cf. 1 Kings 8.12–53.

^{b-b} Lit. “who spoke with His own mouth a promise to my father David and has fulfilled with His own hands.”

for the name of the LORD God of Israel. ⁸ But the LORD said to my father David, 'As for your wanting to build a House for My name, you do well to want that. ⁹ However, you shall not build the House; your son, the issue of your loins, he shall build the House for My name.' ¹⁰ Now the LORD has fulfilled the promise that He made. I have succeeded^a my father David and have ascended the throne of Israel, as the LORD promised. I have built the House for the name of the LORD God of Israel, ¹¹ and there I have set the Ark containing the Covenant that the LORD made with the Israelites."

¹² Then, standing before the altar of the LORD in front of the whole congregation of Israel, he spread forth his hands. ¹³ Solomon had made a bronze platform^b and placed it in the midst of the Great Court; it was 5 cubits long and 5 cubits wide and 3 cubits high. He stood on it; then, kneeling in front of the whole congregation of Israel, he spread forth his hands to heaven ¹⁴ and said, "O LORD God of Israel, there is no god like You in the heavens and on the earth, You who steadfastly maintain the Covenant with Your servants who walk before You with all their heart; ¹⁵ You who have kept the promises You made to Your servant, my father David; You made a promise and have fulfilled it—as is now the case. ¹⁶ And now, O LORD God of Israel, keep that promise that You made to Your servant, my father David, 'You shall never lack a descendant in My sight sitting on the throne of Israel if only your children will look to their way and walk in the [path] of My teachings as you have walked before Me.' ¹⁷ Now, therefore, O God of Israel, let the promise that You made to Your servant, my father David, be confirmed.

¹⁸ "Does God really dwell with man on earth? Even the heavens to their uttermost reaches cannot contain You; how much less this House that I have built! ¹⁹ Yet turn, O LORD my God, to the prayer and supplication of Your servant, and hear the cry and the prayer that Your servant offers to You. ²⁰ May Your eyes be open day and night toward this House, toward the place where You have resolved to make Your name abide; may You heed the prayers that Your servant offers toward this place. ²¹ And when You hear the supplications that Your servant and Your people Israel offer toward this place, give heed in Your heavenly abode—give heed and pardon.

²² "If a man commits an offense against his fellow, and an oath is exacted from him, causing him to utter an imprecation against himself, and he comes with his impreca-

6.12–42: Solomon's dedicatory prayer. This section, together with 7.1–11, may also be titled the "Consecration of the Altar."

Though fundamentally similar to 1 Kings 8.22–53, two differences stand out: 2 Chron. 6.12–42 contains fewer references to the exodus (it is omitted from 1 Kings 8.21, 51) and places greater emphasis on the role of the Davidic covenant. 16: 1 Kings 8.25 reads "to walk before me." Chronicles expresses the "Torah-centered" perspective, wherein proper service of God is defined, exclusively, by observance of the commandments. The Heb word "torah," in this and other contexts, has been rendered by some commentators teachings (as here) and by others as "the Torah (i.e., Pentateuch)"; in Chronicles, the latter is more likely.

^a Lit. "risen in place of." ^b Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

tion before Your altar in this House, ²³may You hear in heaven and take action to judge Your servants, requiting him who is in the wrong by bringing down the punishment of his conduct on his head, vindicating him who is in the right by rewarding him according to his righteousness.

²⁴“Should Your people Israel be defeated by an enemy because they have sinned against You, and then once again acknowledge Your name and offer prayer and supplication to You in this House, ²⁵may You hear in heaven and pardon the sin of Your people Israel, and restore them to the land that You gave to them and to their fathers.

²⁶“Should the heavens be shut up and there be no rain because they have sinned against You, and then they pray toward this place and acknowledge Your name and repent of their sins, because You humbled them, ²⁷may You hear in heaven and pardon the sin of Your servants, Your people Israel, when You have shown them the proper way in which they are to walk, and send down rain upon the land that You gave to Your people as their heritage. ²⁸So, too, if there is a famine in the land, if there is pestilence, blight, mildew, locusts, or caterpillars, or if an enemy oppresses them in any of the settlements of their land.

“In any plague and in any disease, ²⁹any prayer or supplication offered by any person among all Your people Israel—each of whom knows his affliction and his pain—when he spreads forth his hands toward this House, ³⁰may You hear in Your heavenly abode, and pardon. Deal with each man according to his ways as You know his heart to be—for You alone know the hearts of all men—³¹so that they may revere You all the days that they live on the land that You gave to our fathers.

³²“Or if a foreigner who is not of Your people Israel comes from a distant land for the sake of Your great name, Your mighty hand, and Your outstretched arm, if he comes to pray toward this House, ³³may You hear in Your heavenly abode and grant whatever the foreigner appeals to You for. Thus all the peoples of the earth will know Your name and revere You, as does Your people Israel; and they will recognize that Your name is attached to this House that I have built.

³⁴“When Your people take the field against their enemies in a campaign on which You send them, and they pray to You in the direction of the city which You have chosen and the House which I have built to Your name, ³⁵may You hear in heaven their prayer and supplication and uphold their cause.

³⁶“When they sin against You—for there is no person who does not sin—and You are angry with them and deliver them to the enemy, and their captors carry them off to an enemy land, near or far;³⁷ and they take it to heart in the land to which they have been carried off, and repent and make supplication to You in the land of their captivity, saying, ‘We have sinned, we have acted perversely, we have acted wickedly,’³⁸ and they turn back to You with all their heart and soul, in the land of their captivity where they were carried off, and pray in the direction of their land which You gave to their fathers and the city which You have chosen, and toward the House which I have built for Your name—³⁹ may You hear their prayer and supplication in Your heavenly abode, uphold their cause, and pardon Your people who have sinned against You.⁴⁰ Now My God, may Your eyes be open and Your ears attentive to prayer from this place, and now,

- ⁴¹ Advance, O LORD God, to your resting-place,
You and Your mighty Ark.
Your priests, O LORD God, are clothed in triumph;
Your loyal ones will rejoice in [Your] goodness.
- ⁴² O LORD God,
do not reject Your anointed one;
remember the loyalty of Your servant David.”

7^aWhen Solomon finished praying, fire descended from heaven and consumed the burnt offering and the sacrifices, and the glory of the LORD filled the House. ²The priests could not enter the House of the LORD, for the glory of the LORD filled the House of the LORD. ³All the Israelites witnessed the descent of the fire and the glory of the LORD on the House; they knelt with their faces to the ground and prostrated themselves, praising the LORD, “For He is good, for His steadfast love is eternal.”

⁴Then the king and all the people offered sacrifices before the LORD. ⁵King Solomon offered as sacrifices 22,000 oxen and 120,000 sheep; thus the king and all the people dedicated the House of God. ⁶The priests stood at their

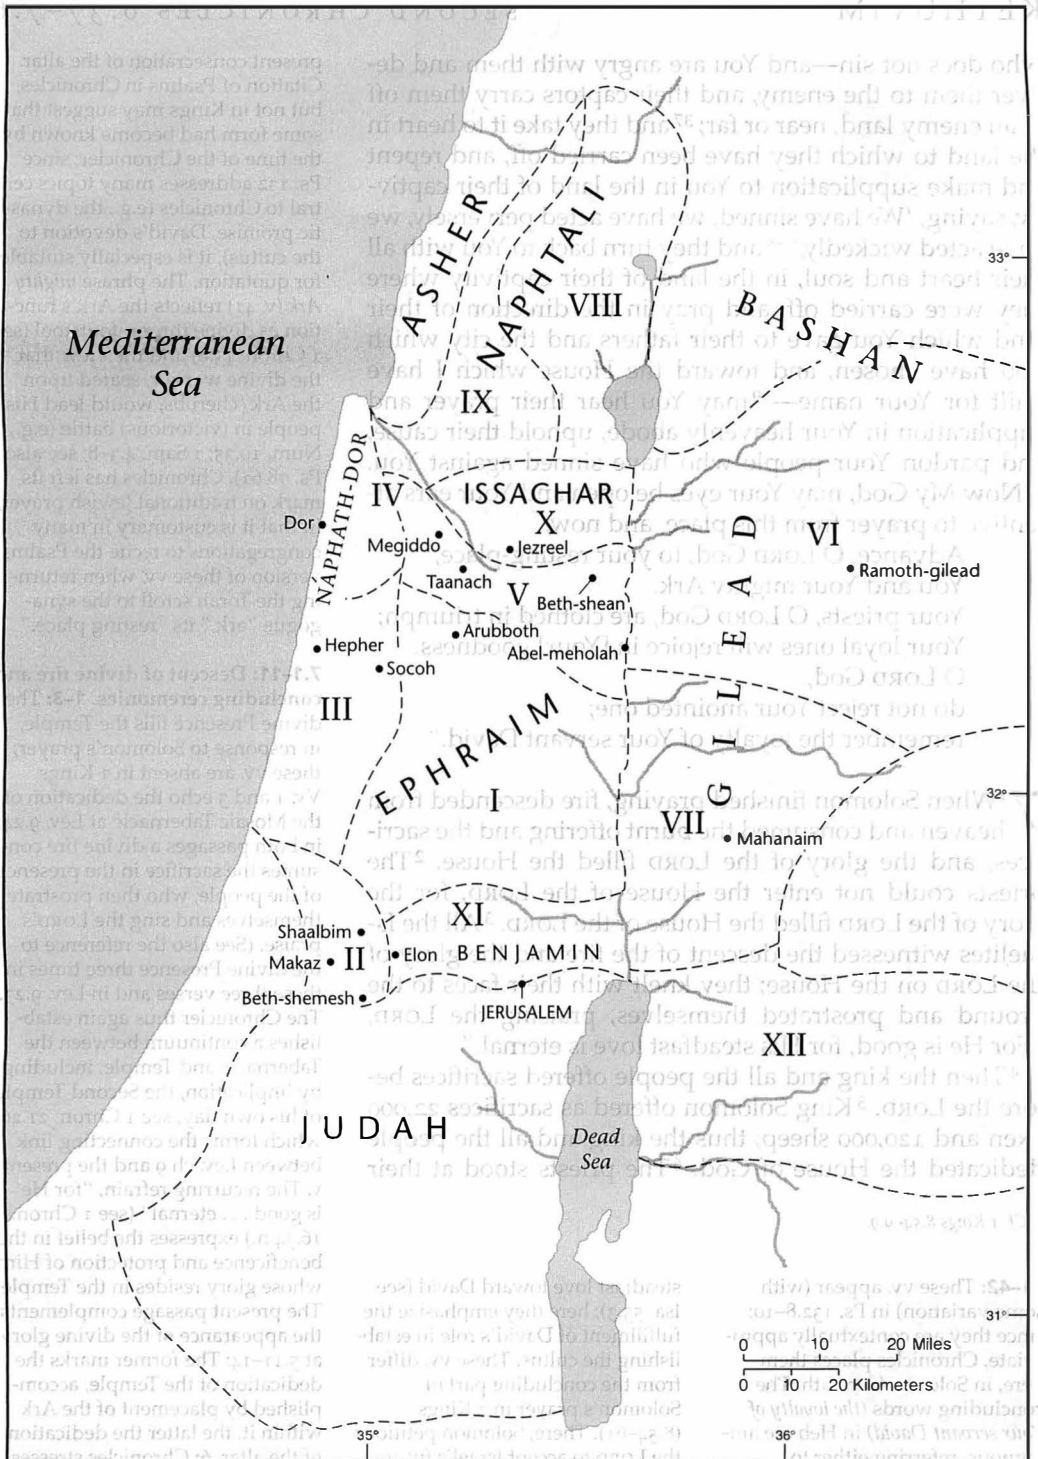

a Cf. 1 Kings 8.54–9.9.

41–42: These vv. appear (with some variation) in Ps. 132.8–10; since they are contextually appropriate, Chronicles places them here, in Solomon’s mouth. The concluding words (the loyalty of Your servant David) in Heb are ambiguous, referring either to David’s acts of steadfast love toward the LORD or the LORD’s steadfast love toward David (see Isa. 55.3); here they emphasize the fulfillment of David’s role in establishing the cultus. These vv. differ from the concluding part of Solomon’s prayer in 2 Kings (8.54–61). There, Solomon petitions the LORD to accept Israel’s future prayers in the Temple; here, Solomon’s words form part of the present consecration of the altar. Citation of Psalms in Chronicles, but not in Kings may suggest that some form had become known by the time of the Chronicler; since Ps. 132 addresses many topics central to Chronicles (e.g., the dynastic promise, David’s devotion to the cultus), it is especially suitable for quotation. The phrase mighty Ark (v. 41) reflects the Ark’s function as divine throne-footstool (see 1 Chron. 13.6) and the view that the divine warrior, seated upon the Ark/cherubs, would lead His people in (victorious) battle (e.g., Num. 10.35; 1 Sam. 4.3–8; see also Ps. 78.61). Chronicles has left its mark on traditional Jewish prayer, in that it is customary in many congregations to recite the Psalms version of these vv. when returning the Torah scroll to the synagogue “ark,” its “resting place.”

7.1–11: Descent of divine fire and concluding ceremonies. 1–3: The divine Presence fills the Temple, in response to Solomon’s prayer; these vv. are absent in 1 Kings. Vv. 1 and 3 echo the dedication of the Mosaic Tabernacle at Lev. 9.24; in both passages a divine fire consumes the sacrifice in the presence of the people, who then prostrate themselves and sing the LORD’s praise. (See also the reference to the divine Presence three times in these three verses and in Lev. 9.23.) The Chronicler thus again establishes a continuum between the Tabernacle and Temple, including, by implication, the Second Temple of his own day; see 1 Chron. 21.26, which forms the connecting link between Lev. ch 9 and the present v. The recurring refrain, “for He is good . . . eternal” (see 1 Chron. 16.34 n.) expresses the belief in the beneficence and protection of Him whose glory resides in the Temple. The present passage complements the appearance of the divine glory at 5.11–14: The former marks the dedication of the Temple, accomplished by placement of the Ark within it, the latter the dedication of the altar. 6: Chronicles stresses the Davidic origin of Levitic praise and music, which Solomon ap-watches; the Levites with the instruments for the LORD's music that King David had made to praise the LORD, "For His steadfast love is eternal," by means of the psalms of David that they knew. The priests opposite them blew trumpets while all Israel were standing.

The kingdom of Solomon according to Second Chronicles

⁷Solomon consecrated the center of the court in front of the House of the LORD, because he presented there the burnt offerings and the fat parts of the offerings of well-being, since the bronze altar that Solomon had made was not able to hold the burnt offerings, the meal offerings, and the fat parts. ⁸At that time Solomon kept the Feast for seven days—all Israel with him—a great assemblage from Lebo-hamath to the Wadi of Egypt.

⁹On the eighth day they held a solemn gathering; they observed the dedication of the altar seven days, and the Feast seven days. ¹⁰On the twenty-third day of the seventh month he dismissed the people to their homes, rejoicing and in good spirits over the goodness that the LORD had shown to David and Solomon and His people Israel.

¹¹Thus Solomon finished building the House of the LORD and the royal palace; Solomon succeeded in everything he had set his heart on accomplishing with regard to the House of the LORD and his palace. ¹²The LORD appeared to Solomon at night and said to him, "I have heard your prayer and have chosen this site as My House of sacrifice. ¹³If I shut up the heavens and there is no rain; if I command the locusts to ravage the land; or if I let loose pestilence against My people, ¹⁴when My people, who bear My name, humble themselves, pray, and seek My favor and turn from their evil ways, I will hear in My heavenly abode and forgive their sins and heal their land. ¹⁵Now My eyes will be open and My ears attentive to the prayers from this place. ¹⁶And now I have chosen and consecrated this House that My name be there forever. My eyes and My heart shall always be there. ¹⁷As for you, if you walk before Me as your father David walked before Me, doing all that I have commanded you, keeping My laws and rules, ¹⁸then I will establish your royal throne over Israel forever, in accordance with the Covenant I made with your father David, saying, 'You shall never lack a descendant ruling over Israel.' ¹⁹But if you turn away from Me and forsake My laws and commandments that I set before you, and go and serve other gods and worship them, ²⁰then I will uproot them^a from My land that I gave them, and this House that I consecrated to My name I shall cast out of my sight, and make it a proverb plied to the newly built Temple. 8-11: The conclusion of the ceremony. 1 Kings 8.65-66 seems unaware of both Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement/Purgation), which falls on the tenth of the seventh month (Lev. 23.26-32; Num. 29.7-11), and the eighth-day assembly, following the seventh day of Sukkot (Lev. 23.36; Num. 29.35-38). Kings' text is generally understood to reflect the festival cycle of Deut. ch 16, which recognizes only three pilgrimage festivals. Chronicles harmonizes Kings with all of the relevant Torah sources, especially the Priestly calendar, by claiming that the people returned on the twenty-third of the month, i.e., the day following the eighth-day assembly. The lack of mention of Yom Kippur remains surprising. Some scholars think that Chronicles, in opposition to 1 Kings, maintains that the two seven-day celebration periods (Sukkot and the Temple dedication) overlapped. This period would have extended from the fifteenth through the twenty-second of the month, i.e., after the fast and purgation rites of Yom Kippur. Alternatively, and less likely, Chronicles' terse style may reflect an attempt to simply skirt the issue. Rabbinic sources claim that Yom Kippur was not observed that year owing to the unique nature of the occasion (Gen. Rab. 35; b. Mo'ed Kat. 9a).

7.12-22: The LORD's reply to Solomon. Similar to 1 Kings 9.2-9, Chronicles' formulation creates a "tighter" correspondence between Solomon's prayer and the divine response through the addition of vv. 13-15. 17-18: Chronicles' formulation (cf. 1 Kings 9.5) highlights the assurance of an eternal dynasty, assuming Solomon's fulfillment of the necessary conditions. V. 18, ruling over Israel ("moshel 'al yisra'el"), echoes Mic. 5.1, highlighting the dynastic promise.

^a i.e., Israel; cf. 1 Kings 9.7.

and a byword among all peoples. ²¹ And as for this House, once so exalted, everyone passing by it shall be appalled and say, 'Why did the LORD do thus to this land and to this House?' ²² And the reply will be, 'It is because they forsook the LORD God of their fathers who freed them from the land of Egypt, and adopted other gods and worshiped them and served them; therefore He brought all this calamity upon them.' "

8 ^aAt the end of twenty years, during which Solomon constructed the House of the LORD and his palace—² Solomon also rebuilt the cities that Hiram had given to him,^b and settled Israelites in them—³ Solomon marched against Hamath-zobah and overpowered it. ⁴ He built Tadmor in the desert and all the garrison towns that he built in Hamath. ⁵ He built Upper Beth-horon and Lower Beth-horon as fortified cities with walls, gates, and bars, ⁶ as well as Baalath and all of Solomon's garrison towns, chariot towns, and cavalry towns—everything that Solomon desired to build in Jerusalem and in the Lebanon, and throughout the territory that he ruled. ⁷ All the people that were left of the Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, none of whom were of Israelite stock—⁸ those of their descendants who were left after them in the land, whom the Israelites had not annihilated—these Solomon subjected to forced labor, as is still the case. ⁹ But the Israelites, none of whom Solomon enslaved for his works, served as soldiers and as his chief officers, and as commanders of his chariotry and cavalry. ¹⁰ These were King Solomon's prefects—250 foremen over the people. ¹¹ Solomon brought up Pharaoh's daughter from the City of David to the palace that he had built for her, for he said, "No wife of mine shall dwell in a palace of King David of Israel, for [the area] is sacred since the Ark of the LORD has entered it."

a Cf. 1 Kings 9.10–28. b Lit. "Solomon."

8.1–16: Other projects. 1–6:

Solomon expands Israel's territory. 1 Kings 9.11–13 states that Solomon relinquished twenty cities to Hiram in payment for material. Hiram there addresses Solomon as "my brother," a technical term used in the ancient Near East between sovereigns of equal stature, and then reproves him for having made payment with land of poor quality. Some medieval and modern commentators adopt a harmonistic approach to the parallel passages, arguing that Kings and Chronicles complement each other. This view may be buttressed by the fact that Israel's northern frontier shifted during the early monarchy between Israelite and Phoenician rule. Others argue that Chronicles' text is tendentious. Chronicles could not accept the fact that Solomon, the wealthiest of kings, would be forced to relinquish land in payment. This is especially problematic for Chronicles, given its maximalistic approach to Israel's borders and its view that the entirety of Israel's territory had been settled before David's time (see 1 Chron. 13.5; cf. the critique of Saul at 1 Chron. 10.7). In addition, the absence of any apparent motive for Hiram's (unilateral) gesture suggests that Chronicles' position is tendentious. Furthermore, Hiram's reproof of Solomon as depicted in Kings is unacceptable to Chronicles (see 2.1–15 n.). Vv. 3–6, which have as their theme "Solomon as successful builder of Israel," then form a seamless continuation of v. 2. Indeed, this passage mentions only Solomon's achievements; setbacks mentioned in 1 Kings, e.g., Pharaoh's incursion into Israel and capture of the city of Gezer (9.16), are omitted by Chronicles. 3–10: Lebanon, the mountains of anti-Lebanon. 10: 250: 1 Kings 9.23 reads "550." Medieval commentators (Rashi, Radak) averred that the present v. refers only to Israelites, whereas 1 Kings ch 9 includes the foreign officials. Some have observed that the differential of "300" corresponds to a similar difference between 2.17 (3,600 overseers) and 1 Kings 5.30 (3,300 overseers); thus the total number is the same in each book. This explanation is problematic; Chronicles plainly states that Gentile overseers are involved at 2.17, Israelites here. The present v. may simply be the result of scribal error. 11: 1 Kings 9.10–13, Chronicles' source, functions as part of the "Solomon as builder" theme; he fortifies cities throughout his domain, including Jerusalem, and suggests that his wife's move was the result of personal motives. Chronicles gives the incident a religious motive; he moves his wife into another domicile, because her presence in the sacred precincts is improper. The juxtaposition of this v. to the following (reworked) passage, along with the shared Heb term "he'elah" (brought up, offered), suggests a shared theme: Solomon as guardian and patron of the Temple and its environs. Chroni-

¹²At that time, Solomon offered burnt offerings on the altar that he had built in front of the porch. ¹³What was due for each day he sacrificed according to the commandment of Moses for the sabbaths, the new moons, and the thrice-yearly festivals—the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the Feast of Weeks, and the Feast of Booths. ¹⁴Following the prescription of his father David, he set up the divisions of the priests for their duties, and the Levites for their watches, to praise and to serve alongside the priests, according to each day's requirement, and the gatekeepers in their watches, gate by gate, for such was the commandment of David, the man of God. ¹⁵They did not depart from the commandment of the king relating to the priests and the Levites in all these matters and also relating to the treasuries. ¹⁶And all of Solomon's work was well executed from the day the House of the LORD was founded until the House of the LORD was completed to perfection.

¹⁷At that time Solomon went to Ezion-geber and to Eloth on the seacoast of the land of Edom. ¹⁸Huram sent him, under the charge of servants, a fleet with a crew of expert seamen; they went with Solomon's men to Ophir, and obtained gold there in the amount of 450 talents, which they brought to King Solomon.

9^aThe queen of Sheba heard of Solomon's fame, and came to Jerusalem to test Solomon with hard questions, accompanied by a very large retinue, including camels bearing spices, a great quantity of gold, and precious stones. When she came to Solomon, she spoke to him of all that she had on her mind. ²Solomon had answers for all her questions; there was nothing that Solomon did not know, nothing to which he could not give her an answer.

³When the queen of Sheba saw how wise Solomon was and the palace he had built, ⁴the fare of his table, the seating of his courtiers, the service and attire of his attendants, his butlers and their attire, and the procession with which he went up to the House of the LORD, it took her breath away. ⁵She said to the king, "What I heard in my own land about you and your wisdom was true. ⁶I did not believe what they said until I came and saw with my own eyes that not even the half of your great wisdom had been described to me; you surpass the report that I heard. ⁷How fortunate are your men and how fortunate are these courtiers of yours who are always in attendance on you and can hear your wisdom! ⁸Blessed is the LORD your

cles' depiction of Solomon is at polar odds with that of Kings. The latter has Solomon tolerating and even supporting the foreign worship of his many wives (11.1). Chronicles not only omits this entire issue—Solomon's numerous wives as well as their cultic offenses—but stresses that Solomon exhibited cultic zeal precisely by "cracking down" on his wife. For discussion of Solomon's marriage to a foreigner, see introduction.

12–16: Chronicles elaborates on 1 Kings 9.25, bringing it into harmony with Num. chs 28–29 and Deut. ch 16. In general the Chronicler "updates" his sources by bringing them in conformity with Priestly and Deuteronomic Torah material; the Chronicler assumes that righteous kings such as Solomon certainly followed these laws.

14: Man of God, a title also applied to Moses (Deut. 33.1; Ps. 90.1) as well as to several other biblical figures. Its purpose here is to highlight the parallel between David and Moses as founders of Israel's cultus and its norms.

8.17–9.31: Solomon's grandeur.

8.17–18: Solomon is again depicted as the dominant monarch. That Hiram's ships were transported either by land or by a canal connecting the Red Sea and the Nile is historically improbable.

9.1–12: Queen of Sheba visits. This passage is largely identical to 1 Kings 10.11–13; it furthers Chronicles' depiction of Solomon's success and majesty. 8: This v. forms an inclusion with the blessing uttered by Hiram at 2.11. (Kings mentions this only once; see 1 Kings 10.9.) Hiram, a northern neighbor of Israel, and the queen of Sheba, from a country to the south, together symbolize universal recognition of Solomon's importance and, specifically, that the Davidic monarch is a concrete sign of the LORD's love for Israel. This is another expression of Chronicles' messianic aspirations. Note that Chronicles again claims that the Davidic monarchs are the earthly representatives of divine rule; see 1 Chron. 17.14.

^a Cf. 1 Kings 10; 11.41–43.

God, who favored you and set you on His throne as a king before the LORD. It is because of your God's love for Israel and in order to establish them forever that He made you king over them to execute righteous justice."

⁹She presented the king with 120 talents of gold, and a vast quantity of spices and precious stones. There were no such spices as those which the queen of Sheba gave to King Solomon—¹⁰also, the servants of Hiram and Solomon who brought gold from Ophir brought algum-wood and precious stones. ¹¹The king made of the algum-wood ramps for the House of the LORD and for the royal palace, and lyres and harps for the musicians, whose like had never before been seen in the land of Judah—¹²King Solomon, in turn, gave the queen of Sheba everything she expressed a desire for, exceeding a return for what she had brought to the king. Then she and her courtiers left and returned to her own land.

¹³The gold that Solomon received every year weighed 666 gold talents, ¹⁴besides what traders and merchants brought, and the gold and silver that all the kings of Arabia and governors of the regions brought to Solomon. ¹⁵King Solomon made 200 shields of beaten gold—600 shekels of beaten gold for each shield, ¹⁶and 300 bucklers of beaten gold—300 [shekels] of gold for each buckler. The king placed them in the Lebanon Forest House. ¹⁷The king also made a large throne of ivory, overlaid with pure gold. ¹⁸Six steps led up to the throne; and the throne had a golden footstool attached to it, and arms on either side of the seat. Two lions stood beside the arms, ¹⁹and twelve lions stood on the six steps, six on either side. None such was ever made for any other kingdom. ²⁰All of King Solomon's drinking vessels were of gold, and all the utensils of the Lebanon Forest House were of pure gold; silver counted for nothing in Solomon's days. ²¹The king's fleet traveled to Tarshish with Hiram's servants. Once every three years, the Tarshish fleet came in, bearing gold and silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks.

²²King Solomon surpassed all the kings of the earth in wealth and wisdom. ²³All the kings of the earth came to pay homage to Solomon and to listen to the wisdom with which God had endowed him. ²⁴Each brought his tribute—silver and gold objects, robes, weapons, and spices, horses and mules—in the amount due each year. ²⁵Solomon had 4,000 stalls for horses and chariots, and 12,000 horsemen, which he stationed in the chariot towns and with the king in Jerusalem. ²⁶He ruled over all the kings from the Euphrates to the land of the Philistines and to the border of Egypt. ²⁷The king made silver as plentiful in Je-

12: Gave [her] . . . everything she expressed a desire for: The exchange of gifts is a mark of cordial relations between sovereigns; Chronicles probably did not view it as signifying a formal treaty; see 2.16–17.

13–28: Miscellaneous notices. Following 1 Kings 10.14–28, with minor differences. 18–19: The use of twelve lions probably reflects the unity of Israel's tribes. Rabbinic sources deal extensively with the design and significance of Solomon's throne. Although the reticence of rabbinic sources implies no criticism of Solomon's use of iconography, Josephus (Ant.) states that Solomon's production of the lion images was sinful; see 4.2–5. 21–23: Solomon's commercial ventures. Elsewhere the Bible identifies Tarshish as a source of silver, iron, and lead—not gold, ivory, apes, etc. 1 Kings 10.22 refers to "Tarshish vessels," with no reference to the vessels' destination. Some scholars locate Tarshish in Africa, along the Red Sea, and historical sources indicate that Tarshish lay in the Mediterranean basin, not along the Red Sea, as emerges from Chronicles. Chronicles' text may reflect an ancient misunderstanding of a technical term, a phenomenon attested in LXX to 1 Kings 10.22, as well. Tarshish fleet or Tarshish ships originally denoted a type of maritime vessel, not the ship's destination or route; see 20.36–37. 25–28: Solomon's extreme wealth would seem to be in violation of Deut. 17.17 and may have led the translators of LXX to 1 Kings to bring Solomon's depiction more in line with Deut. ch 17. Indeed, rabbinic sources are critical of the excessive number of horses, in violation of the same v. (see b. Sanh. 21b). Some medieval Jewish scholars maintained that Deuteronomy's limitation on royal wealth refers only to wealth gained by levying of taxes (R. Meir Abulafia, Nissim Gerondi, b. Sanh. 21b). Alternatively, some explained that the monarch was prohibited only from amassing wealth for purely personal glory, whereas wealth used to bring honor to the kingdom was permitted (Maimonides, Laws of Kings and their Wars, Menahem ha-Meiri, b. Sanh. 21b). 29–31: No mention is made of Solomon's offenses; cf. 1 Kings ch 11. Following a model established with David, Solomon's official biography was composed by prophets; see 1 Chron. 29.28–30. Solomon's reign of forty years parallels that of David, a further example of the way these monarchs mirror each other for the Chronicler. Many scholars maintain, with Josephus's Ant., that Iddo (Jedo), the seer, is to be identified with the anonymous prophet of 1 Kings 13.1–10; see 12.15; 13.22. The mention of the prophet Ahijah the Shilonite is especially surprising, since according to 1 Kings 11.29–30; 12.15, sources omitted by Chronicles, he tells Solomon of the dissolution of the united monarchy.

Jerusalem as stones, and cedars as plentiful as sycamores in the Shephelah. ²⁸Horses were brought for Solomon from Egypt and all the lands. ²⁹The other events of Solomon's reign, early and late, are recorded in the chronicle of the prophet Nathan and in the prophecies of Ahijah the Shilonite and in the visions of Jedo the seer concerning Jeroboam son of Nebat. ³⁰Solomon reigned forty years over all Israel in Jerusalem. ³¹Solomon slept with his fathers and was buried in the city of his father David; his son Rehoboam succeeded him as king.

10^aRehoboam went to Shechem, for all Israel had come to Shechem to acclaim him king. ²Jeroboam son of Nebat learned of it while he was in Egypt where he had fled from King Solomon, and Jeroboam returned from Egypt. ³They sent for him; and Jeroboam and all Israel came and spoke to Rehoboam as follows: ⁴"Your father made our yoke heavy. Now lighten the harsh labor and the heavy yoke that your father laid on us, and we will

^a Cf. 1 Kings 12.1–19.

10.1–36.23: From Rehoboam to the exile. This section builds on the parallels in Kings, but offers much new information and many differing assessments of monarchs. The literary forms (topoi; sg. topos) in this section are: building reports, military stock and capabilities, sickness and death, military victories and defeats. With regard to each of these, arguments have been made in support of both their (purported) fictional character as well as their (purported) factual nature, based on authentic sources that Chronicles, but not the author of Kings, had. Perhaps the most salient topos of this section is that of war accounts. Fifteen such reports appear, all without parallel in Kings. Some scholars see the novel features of Chronicles' formulation as the creation of its author, who sought to portray the first four post-Solomonic kings positively, so as to establish the legitimacy of Judah over its northern neighbor, the Samaritans. It is further argued that the battles reported here reflect Second Temple reality, when Judah was surrounded by neighbors who posed a territorial and religious threat. The message of these reports is understood to be that salvation lies in cultic fidelity. Other scholars counter by noting that Chronicles' treatment of the first four post-Solomonic kings is not uniformly positive in nature. With regard to the battle accounts, these scholars acknowledge that they are all characterized by Chronistic style and moralizing, but argue that the numerous details (of geography, proper nouns, etc.) point to a genuine historical basis. In addition, it is argued that most of the battles involve Israelite military activity, such that Israel's victories cannot be attributed, exclusively, to religious fidelity. The bulk of this section, 10.1–28.27, describes a divided "house." Judah, and parts of the other tribes who identify with Judah, remain faithful to the Davidic monarchy and the Jerusalem Temple. The bulk of the northern tribes follow the illegitimate kings of (northern) Israel. As noted in the introduction, Chronicles focuses exclusively on Judah (and its supporters), mentioning the northern empire only where it affects Judah's fortunes. Though some scholars see the "anti-northern" critique as applying to the populace of the north, namely the Samaritans who were contemporaries of the Chronicler, most agree that the Chronicler inveighs only against the northern monarchs and their supporters.

10.1–11.4: Rehoboam's coronation and division of the monarchy. Shechem was an ancient religious center of the northern tribes. The choice of this northern site, rather than Jerusalem, for Rehoboam's coronation indicates that there was opposition among the northern tribes to Rehoboam's accession, most likely because they feared that he would continue Solomon's policies of conscription for forced labor. Thus, although Chronicles' description of Solomon's reign creates the impression of prosperity and almost utopian social harmony, this passage, along with the ensuing episode, indicates that the actual situation was quite different. 10.2–3: These vv. are problematic in Chronicles, since the relevant background material in Kings has been omitted. 1 Kings 11.29–40 relates the story of Jeroboam as told by Ahijah the prophet: Owing to Solomon's role in his wives' cultic offenses, the serve you." ⁵He answered them, "Come back to me in three days." So the people went away.

⁶King Rehoboam took counsel with the elders who had served during the lifetime of his father Solomon. He said, "What answer do you counsel to give these people?" ⁷They answered him, "If you will be good to these people and appease them and speak to them with kind words, they will be your servants always." ⁸But he ignored the counsel that the elders gave him, and took counsel with the young men who had grown up with him and were serving him. ⁹"What," he asked, "do you counsel that we reply to these people who said to me, 'Lighten the yoke that your father laid on us'?" ¹⁰And the young men who had grown up with him answered, "Speak thus to the people who said to you, 'Your father made our yoke heavy, now you make it lighter for us.' Say to them, 'My little finger is thicker than my father's loins. ¹¹My father imposed a heavy yoke on you, and I will add to your yoke; my father flogged you with whips, but I [will do so] with scorpions.' "

¹²Jeroboam and all the people came to Rehoboam on the third day, since the king had told them, "Come back on the third day." ¹³The king answered them harshly; thus King Rehoboam ignored the elders' counsel. ¹⁴He spoke to them in accordance with the counsel of the young men, and said, ^a"I will make^a your yoke heavy, and I will add to it; my father flogged you with whips, but I [will do so] with scorpions." ¹⁵The king did not listen to the people, for God had brought it about in order that the LORD might fulfill the promise that He had made through Ahijah the Shilonite to Jeroboam son of Nebat. ¹⁶When all Israel [saw] that the king had not listened to them, the people answered the king:

"We have no portion in David,
No share in Jesse's son!
To your tents, O Israel!
Now look to your own house, O David."

So all Israel returned to their homes.^b ¹⁷But Rehoboam continued to reign over the Israelites who lived in the towns of Judah. ¹⁸King Rehoboam sent out Hadoram, who was in charge of the forced labor, but the Israelites pelted him to death with stones. Thereupon, King Rehoboam hurriedly mounted his chariot and fled to Jerusalem. ¹⁹Israel has been in revolt against the house of David to this day.

northern tribes will be taken away from Solomon and Jeroboam will rule over these tribes. Thereafter, Jeroboam flees to Egypt and returns to the land of Israel following Solomon's demise. Chronicles deletes all of this material, for two reasons. First, it indicates that the period of Solomon's rule was not quite so idyllic, nor was his personal conduct exemplary. Second, Kings offers explicit legitimization for the existence of a northern, non-Davidic dynasty, provided that it observe God's laws. As already noted (introduction), Chronicles views the very existence of a non-Davidic dynasty as both treasonous and rebellion against God. Chronicles' omission of this material results in several problems. First, the reader of Chronicles has no prior acquaintance with Jeroboam, unless he has previously read 1 Kings. Many scholars therefore argue that Chronicles, here and elsewhere, presumes the reader's familiarity with the earlier sources. Indeed, v. 15, contains a clear allusion to 1 Kings 11.29-39. If correct, the Chronicler assumes that his readers know 1 Kings, but seeks to recast the information found there. 18: The name Hadoram appears in 1 Kings (12.18) as Adoram. This is another instance in which Chronicles has preserved the original form of a name; see 1 Chron. 18.10 n. 19: It is unclear whether Chronicles views Rehoboam as culpable for the division of the monarchy or, rather, as a victim of inexperience and bad counseling. Given Chronicles' view of retribution, and the fact that Chronicles makes no mention of Solomon's offenses and the punishment pronounced in 1 Kings, one would expect that the secession of the northern tribes would be attributed to Rehoboam's wrongful conduct. But v. 15 indicates that the entire episode was divinely guided so as to allow for fulfillment of Ahijah's royal oracle. Moreover, as explained below, Chronicles seems to exonerate Rehoboam by claiming that his miscalculations were the result of youthful inexperience in handling a-a Some mss. and printed editions read "my father made"; cf. 1 Kings 12.14.

b Lit. "tents."

11^aWhen Rehoboam arrived in Jerusalem, he mustered the house of Judah and Benjamin, 180,000 picked fighting men, to make war with Israel in order to restore the kingdom to Rehoboam.² But the word of the LORD came to Shemaiah, the man of God:³ “Say to Rehoboam son of Solomon king of Judah, and to all Israel in Judah and Benjamin: ⁴Thus said the LORD: You shall not set out to make war on your kinsmen. Let every man return to his home, for this thing has been brought about by Me.” They heeded the words of the LORD and refrained from marching against Jeroboam.⁵ Rehoboam dwelt in Jerusalem and built fortified towns in Judah.⁶ He built up Bethlehem, and Etam, and Tekoa,⁷ and Beth-zur, and Soco, and Adullam,⁸ and Gath, and Mareshah, and Ziph,⁹ and Adoraim, and Lachish, and Azekah,¹⁰ and Zorah, and Aijalon, and Hebron, which are in Judah and in Benjamin, as fortified towns.¹¹ He strengthened the fortified towns and put commanders in them, along with stores of food, oil, and wine,¹² and shields and spears in every town. He strengthened them exceedingly; thus Judah and Benjamin were his.

¹³The priests and the Levites, from all their territories throughout Israel, presented themselves to him.¹⁴ The Levites had left their pasturelands and their holdings and had set out for Judah and Jerusalem, for Jeroboam and his sons had prevented them from serving the LORD,¹⁵ having appointed his own priests for the shrines, goat-demons, and calves which he had made.¹⁶ From all the tribes of Israel, those intent on seeking the LORD God of Israel followed them to Jerusalem, to sacrifice to the LORD God of their fathers.¹⁷ They strengthened the kingdom of Judah, and supported Rehoboam son of Solomon for three years, for they followed the ways of David and Solomon for three years.

¹⁸Rehoboam married Mahalath daughter of Jerimoth son of David, and Abihail daughter of Eliab son of Jesse.¹⁹ She bore him sons: Jeush, Shemariah, and Zaham.²⁰ He then took Maacah daughter of Absalom; she bore him Abijah, Attai, Ziza, and Shelomith.²¹ Rehoboam loved Maacah daughter of Absalom more than his other wives and concubines—for he took eighteen wives and sixty concubines; he begot twenty-eight sons and sixty daughters.²² Rehoboam designated Abijah son of Maacah as chief and leader among his brothers, for he intended him to be his successor.²³ He prudently distributed all his sons throughout the regions of Judah and Benjamin and a northern “rebellion.” Although a definitive answer is not possible, it is likely that Chronicles does not view the divine decree regarding secession and Rehoboam’s own actions as mutually exclusive.

11.1: Chronicles omits Jeroboam’s election by the north (1 Kings 12.20), a point which typifies Chronicles’ reticence on matters concerning the northern monarchy. 2–4: Whereas v. 3 states that Shemaiah’s prophecy was to be addressed to all Israel in Judah and Benjamin, 1 Kings 12.23 reads “the House of Judah”; Chronicles here integrates Benjamin into the Southern Kingdom.

11.5–12: Rehoboam’s building projects. Building projects are a sign of a king’s success and divine favor. This favorable evaluation of Rehoboam suggests that he is not the cause of the secession but, rather, its victim. In addition, the juxtaposition of Rehoboam’s acceptance of the prophetic directive to refrain from warfare and his successful building ventures also expresses another Chronicles theme, viz., the importance of heeding the prophetic word. This section has no parallel in Kings.

11.13–17: Rehoboam’s support for the Levites. This section has no parallel in Kings.

11.18–23: Rehoboam’s family. This section has no parallel in Kings. Rehoboam’s many wives are further evidence of Chronicles’ positive evaluation of Rehoboam. Note that Kings focuses on Jeroboam, devoting only eleven vv. to Rehoboam (1 Kings 14.21–31); Chronicles devotes 11.5–12.16 to Rehoboam, a clear statement of its concern with Judahite kings at the expense of the northern monarchy. Many of the names appearing here are otherwise unattested (e.g., v. 19); others stand in tension with other passages, probably indicating that Chronicles has used an independent source. 20: Maacah, see 13.2 and 1 Kings 15.2, 10.

^a With 11.1–4, cf. 1 Kings 12.21–24.

throughout the fortified towns; he provided them with abundant food, and he sought many wives for them.

12 When the kingship of Rehoboam was firmly established, and he grew strong, he abandoned the Teaching of the LORD, he and all Israel with him.

²In the fifth year of King Rehoboam, King Shishak of Egypt marched against Jerusalem—for they had trespassed against the LORD—³with 1,200 chariots, 60,000 horsemen and innumerable troops who came with him from Egypt: Lybians, Sukkites, and Kushites. ⁴He took the fortified towns of Judah and advanced on Jerusalem. ⁵The prophet Shemaiah came to Rehoboam and the officers of 12.1–12: Shishak’s invasion. Chronicles expands upon the parallel passage found at 1 Kings 14.25–28. Chronicles’ explanation, seen by many as part of its view on providence and retribution, is that Rehoboam’s conduct was virtuous during the initial three years of his reign. During the fourth year he began to sin and, consequently, was punished in the following year. 1–8: Chronicles specifies that the king, his officers, and the people were all guilty; hence, all were punished—the nation cannot be punished for the acts of the

The divided monarchy according to Second Chronicles. The dashed line shows the approximate boundaries between Israel, Judah, and Philistia.

Judah, who had assembled in Jerusalem because of Shishak, and said to them, "Thus said the LORD: You have abandoned Me, so I am abandoning you to Shishak."⁶ Then the officers of Israel and the king humbled themselves and declared, "The LORD is in the right."⁷ When the LORD saw that they had submitted, the word of the LORD came to Shemaiah, saying, "Since they have humbled themselves, I will not destroy them but will grant them some measure of deliverance, and My wrath will not be poured out on Jerusalem through Shishak."⁸ They will be subject to him, and they will know the difference between serving Me and serving the kingdoms of the earth." King Shishak of Egypt marched against Jerusalem.⁹ He took away the treasures of the House of the LORD and the treasures of the royal palace; he took away everything; he took away the golden shields that Solomon had made.¹⁰ King Rehoboam had bronze shields made in their place, and entrusted them to the officers of the guard^b who guarded the entrance to the royal palace.¹¹ Whenever the king entered the House of the LORD, the guards would carry them and then bring them back to the armory of the guards.¹² After he had humbled himself, the anger of the LORD was averted and He did not destroy him entirely; in Judah, too, good things were found.

¹³ King Rehoboam grew strong in Jerusalem and exercised kingship. Rehoboam was forty-one years old when he became king, and he reigned seventeen years in Jerusalem—the city the LORD had chosen out of all the tribes of Israel to establish His name there. His mother's name was Naamah the Ammonitess.¹⁴ He did what was wrong, for he had not set his heart to seek the LORD.¹⁵ The deeds of Rehoboam, early and late, are recorded in the chronicles of the prophet Shemaiah and Iddo the seer, in the manner of genealogy. There was continuous war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam.¹⁶ Rehoboam slept with his fathers and was buried in the City of David. His son Abijah succeeded him as king.

13 In the eighteenth year of King Jeroboam, Abijah became king over Judah.² He reigned three years in Jerusalem; his mother's name was Micaiah daughter of a With vv. 9–16, cf. 1 Kings 14.26–31.

b Lit. "rumorms."

king alone. As soon as the king repents, he is forgiven. 9–12: The claim that good things were also found among the people may mean either that the people, too, repented, or that they had to their credit good deeds which offset their sins. Typically, Chronicles claims that contrition effects the LORD's immediate forgiveness, a sign of divine compassion or grace (see introduction). The invading force suddenly departs, with no apparent loss of life. Chronicles offers no details, military or otherwise. This is an example of Chronicles' use of "one-dimensional" causality.

12.13–15: End of Rehoboam's reign. By mentioning Rehoboam's mother, v. 13 acknowledges (at least some of) Solomon's foreign wives. For prophetic court biographers, see 1 Chron. 29.28–30. Chronicles' overall evaluation of Rehoboam is not one-dimensional. The assessment here is essentially negative. Yet, the following offers an apologia on his behalf; see 13.7; 11.3–17. In contrast, 1 Kings 15.3 offers no hint that Rehoboam or the people repented from their idolatrous ways.

13.1–23: Abijah's reign. Chronicles' account of Abijah shares virtually nothing with the much briefer account (eight vv.) in 1 Kings ch 15 (where his name is Abijam). Furthermore, Chronicles contains not the slightest criticism of Abijah, whereas 1 Kings 15.3–4 states that Abijam was evil and that his rule was preserved merely for the sake of the Davidic dynasty. Chronicles' reworking may have been informed by its theology of retribution; since Kings does not indicate that Abijam was punished for his misdeeds, Chronicles concluded that Abijah could not have been so bad. Alternatively, the tradition concerning Abijah's victory over the north, which many view as authentic, may have led Chronicles to conclude that Abijah was an upright king. (The details of that victory, however, reflect the Chronicler's terminology and ideology, and were likely his creation.) Still, Chronicles does not depict Abijah in the same laudatory terms typical of other righteous kings; the assessments of Kings and Chronicles are therefore not radically different. This position is buttressed by the reference to reforms executed by his son (e.g., 14.2–4), suggesting some shortcomings on Abijah's part. 1–3: The incredibly large military forces recorded here are typi-

Uriel of Gibeah. There was war between Abijah and Jeroboam. ³Abijah joined battle with a force of warriors, 400,000 picked men. Jeroboam arrayed for battle against him 800,000 picked men, warriors. ⁴Abijah stood on top of Mount Zemaraim in the hill country of Ephraim and said, "Listen to me, Jeroboam and all Israel. ⁵Surely you know that the LORD God of Israel gave David kingship over Israel forever—to him and his sons—by a covenant of salt. ⁶Jeroboam son of Nebat had been in the service of Solomon son of David, but he rose up and rebelled against his master. ⁷Riffraff and scoundrels gathered around him and pressed hard upon Rehoboam son of Solomon. Rehoboam was inexperienced and fainthearted and could not stand up to them. ⁸Now you are bent on opposing the kingdom of the LORD, which is in the charge of the sons of David, because you are a great multitude and possess the golden calves that Jeroboam made for you as gods. ⁹Did you not banish the priests of the LORD, the sons of Aaron and the Levites, and, like the peoples of the land, appoint your own priests? Anyone who offered himself for ordination with a young bull of the herd and seven rams became a priest of no-gods! ¹⁰As for us, the LORD is our God, and we have not forsaken Him. The priests who minister to the LORD are the sons of Aaron, and the Levites are at their tasks. ¹¹They offer burnt offerings in smoke each morning and each evening, and the aromatic incense, the rows of bread on the pure table; they kindle the golden lampstand with its lamps burning each evening, for we keep the charge of the LORD our God, while you have forsaken it. ¹²See, God is with us as our chief, and His priests have the trumpets for sounding blasts against you. O children of Israel, do not fight the LORD God of your fathers, because you will not succeed." ¹³Jeroboam, however, had directed the ambush to go around and come from the rear, thus "the main body was" in front of Judah, while the ambush was behind them. ¹⁴When Judah turned around and saw that the fighting was before and behind them, they cried out to the LORD, and the priests blew the trumpets. ¹⁵The men of Judah raised a shout; and when the men of Judah raised a shout, God routed Jeroboam and all Israel a-a Lit. "they were."

cal of Chronicles; see 1 Chron. 12.25–39 n. Note that some mss read 14,000 in place of 400,000. Some argue that the 800,000 of the northern forces is the same as the number of "warriors" mentioned at 2 Sam. 24.9, highlighting that Jeroboam mustered every available fighter and outnumbered the enemy but was, nonetheless, defeated. 4: The location of Mount Zemaraim is uncertain, but a Benja-minite town of that name appears at Josh. 18.21–24. LXX reads "Mount Samaria." The use of oration as a rhetorical device in the non-synoptic passages is a ubiquitous feature of Chronicles. Like Herodotus and other Hellenistic historians, the author uses these speeches to express his position on a variety of subjects. 5–12: This passage is a parade example of Chronicles' critique of the northern dynasty. The appeal to the populace of the north reflects the book's "inclusivist" slant; see introduction. This paradigmatic oration, with its emphasis on the Jerusalem cultus and Davidic monarchy, explains the basis for the divided kingdom and Judah's supremacy, as narrated through ch 28. 5–8: The Chronicler expresses his view that any monarchy other than the Davidic one is illegitimate. Moreover, since the Davidides are God's proxies, opposition to, and armed struggle against, their rule is tantamount to rebellion against God (see 1 Chron. 17.14 n.). V. 7 indicates that the inexperienced Rehoboam fell victim to a more powerful group of scoundrels. 7–8: Repetition (in Heb) of "become strong" at the end of v. 7 and the beginning of v. 8 (stand up to . . . opposing) is Chronicles' way of saying, "you are attempting to impose your monarchy upon God's representatives, just as you did at the inception of Rehoboam's rule"; see 12.13–15 n. 9–12: The only true and proper cult is that observed in the Jerusalem Temple, in accordance with the Torah, especially the Priestly laws; treason against the Davidic monarchy and cultic apostasy thus go hand in hand. 13–14: Chronicles is consistent that the trumpets are to be blown, in warfare and on religious occasions, by priests only; see 1 Chron. 16.4–6 n. The much larger Israelite force succumbs to Abijah's forces. Here, as in so many other instances, Chronicles jettisons any concrete physical description of the battle; what is recorded is not human military tactics, but the divine will, which responds to before Abijah and Judah. ¹⁶The Israelites fled before Judah, and God delivered them into their hands. ¹⁷Abijah and his army inflicted a severe defeat on them; 500,000 men of Israel fell slain. ¹⁸The Israelites were crushed at that time, while the people of Judah triumphed because they relied on the LORD God of their fathers. ¹⁹Abijah pursued Jeroboam and captured some of his cities—Bethel with its dependencies, Jeshanah with its dependencies, and Ephraim with its dependencies. ²⁰Jeroboam could not muster strength again during the days of Abijah. The LORD struck him down and he died. ²¹But Abijah grew powerful; he married fourteen wives and begat twenty-two sons and sixteen daughters.

²²The other events of Abijah's reign, his conduct and his acts, are recorded in the story of the prophet Iddo. ²³Abijah slept with his fathers and was buried in the City of David; his son Asa succeeded him as king. The land was untroubled for ten years.

14 Asa did what was good and pleasing to the LORD his God. ²He abolished the alien altars and shrines; he smashed the pillars and cut down the sacred posts. ³He ordered Judah to turn to the LORD God of their fathers and to observe the Teaching and the Commandment. ⁴He abolished the shrines and the incense stands throughout the cities of Judah, and the kingdom was untroubled under him. ⁵He built fortified towns in Judah, since the land was untroubled and he was not engaged in warfare during those years, for the LORD had granted him respite. ⁶He said to Judah, "Let us build up these cities and surround them with walls and towers, gates and bars, while the land is at our disposal because we turned to the LORD our God—we turned [to Him] and He gave us respite on all sides." They were successful in their building.

⁷Asa had an army of 300,000 men from Judah bearing shields and spears, and 280,000 from Benjamin bearing bucklers and drawing the bow; all these were valiant men. ⁸Zerah the Cushite marched out against them with an army of a thousand thousand and 300 chariots. When he reached Mareshah ⁹Asa confronted him, and the battle lines were drawn in the valley of Zephat by Mareshah. ¹⁰Asa called to the LORD his God, and said, "O LORD, it is all the same to You to help the numerous and the powerless. Help us, O LORD our God, for we rely on You, and in Your name we have come against this great multitude. You are the LORD our God. Let no mortal hinder You." ¹¹So the LORD routed the Cushites before Asa and Judah, and the Cushites fled. ¹²Asa and the army with him pur-human petition and trust in the divine. 19–21: The expansion, as well as the development, of territory is a sign of success and divine favor; see 8.1–3; 11.5–12. 22–23: Story (Heb "midrash," used only here and in 24.27): The term in postbiblical literature becomes a common term for exegesis and exposition; here it means simply "narrative." Still, the choice of this term reflects Chronicles' view that such stories are the product of prophetic exposition and interpretation; see 1 Chron. 29.29.

14.1–16.14: Asa's reign. Chronicles expands upon 2 Kings' version (15.9–24), dividing it into two periods: the period of fidelity (14.1–15.19) and the period of faithlessness (16.1–16.14). The reigns of Asa and Ahijah are bound by the shared motif of reliance upon the LORD.

14.1–8: Reform and prosperity. An expansion of 1 Kings 15.11–12. Chronicles' presentation is, at this stage, unambiguously positive, as emphasized by the repeated reference to his God (vv. 1, 10). 2–4: This passage is best viewed as an elaboration of Chronicles' independent source (but influenced by 2 Kings 18.4). Cf. 1 Kings 15.14 regarding shrines. The presence of paraphernalia of foreign cultic worship is assumed but never explained. Heb "ḥamanim" has been translated incense stands and shrines. 5–6: For building cities as a sign of monarchic success and divine favor, see 11.5–12. 7–14: Asa battles Zerah the Cushite. There is no extrabiblical evidence for this account, whose historicity is debated. Most of the scholars who see the account as factual agree that the expedition was led by a commander of Nubian extraction, supported by Nubian forces; others, less convincingly, maintain that the original confrontation involved Bedouin tribes south of Judah. The numbers of the enemy force are again fantastic, though. The Syriac translation (Peshitta) reads "thirty thousand chariots." On either reading, the point is the same: Asa's extremely large force, out-sued them as far as Gerar. Many of the Cushites fell wounded beyond recovery, for they broke before the LORD and His camp. Very much spoil was taken. ¹³All the cities in the vicinity of Gerar were ravaged, for a terror of the LORD seized them. All the cities were plundered, and they yielded much booty. ¹⁴They also ravaged the encampment of herdsmen, capturing much sheep and camels. Then they returned to Jerusalem.

15 The spirit of God came upon Azariah son of Oded. ²He came to Asa and said to him, "Listen to me, Asa and all Judah and Benjamin; the LORD is with you as long as you are with Him. If you turn to Him, He will respond to you, but if you forsake Him, He will forsake you. ³Israel has gone many days without the true God, without a priest to give instruction and without Teaching. ⁴But in distress it returned to the LORD God of Israel, and sought Him, and He responded to them. ⁵At those times, ^ano wayfarer^a was safe, for there was much tumult among all the inhabitants of the lands. ⁶Nation was crushed by nation and city by city, for God threw them into panic with every kind of trouble. ⁷As for you, be strong, do not be disheartened, for there is reward for your labor."

⁸When Asa heard these words, the prophecy of Oded the prophet, he took courage and removed the abominations from the entire land of Judah and Benjamin and from the cities that he had captured in the hill country of Ephraim. He restored the altar of the LORD in front of the porch of the LORD. ⁹He assembled all the people of Judah and Benjamin and those people of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Simeon who sojourned among them, for many in Israel had thrown in their lot with him when they saw that the LORD his God was with him. ¹⁰They were assembled in Jerusalem in the third month of the fifteenth year of the reign of Asa. ¹¹They brought sacrifices to the LORD on that a-a Lit. "one who goes out and one who comes in."

numbered nearly two-to-one and lacking a large chariot force, manages to defeat the enemy force by virtue of exclusive trust in, and supplication to, God. Chronicles does not explain the circumstances surrounding the incursion of the Cushites. 15.1-7: Azariah's address. This Azariah is otherwise unattested. Since the situation described in vv. 3-7 does not correspond to events of Asa's reign, some commentators view these vv.

as a prophetic pronouncement regarding the future, a view reflected in LXX. The Aramaic Targum interprets these vv. as alluding to the conduct of Jeroboam and his supporters. Alternatively, they may allude to the reigns of Rehoboam and Abijah or, less plausibly, the period of the judges (e.g., Judg. 2.11-13). Others maintain that the passage may, indeed, have Asa's reign in mind; the rhetorical style reflects Chronicles' thematic concerns, and need not refer to specific events of Asa's reign. Vv. 2-7 draw on several biblical passages; see Hos. 3.4 (v. 3); Amos 3.17 (v. 5b); Deut. 4.29-30 (vv. 2-4); and Zech. 8.9-11 (vv. 4-7). 1: For similar use of the "possession formula," see 1 Chron. 12.19 n.; 2 Chron. 20.14; 24.20. This formula appears only in Chronicles' nonsynoptic passages and only in connection with "nonprofessional prophets." Chronicles distinguishes between professional prophets, who address the monarchy exclusively, and other "temporary prophets/messengers," whose messages are directed at the people at large (including the king). 3: Some mediaevals (Radak, disciple of Saadia) interpreted Heb "'elohim," here rendered "God," to mean "magistrates"; hence, the phrase "without the true God" is to be rendered "without magistrates who judge honestly." 8-19: Religious reform. This passage, an independent doublet of 14.2-4, was probably taken from an independent source, which has not been fully harmonized with the surrounding passages. Note, specifically, that the reference to Asa's capture of territory in Ephraim (v. 8) has no antecedent, since Asa's reign is depicted as peaceful. The covenant described in this passage is reminiscent of the theophany and lawgiving related in Exod. chs 19-20; both take place in the third month. The present passage probably informs the book of Jubilees and other writings of the Qumran community, the earliest sources that view the festival of Shavu'ot, celebrated in the third month, as the annual occasion for renewal of the covenant and acceptance of new members. The presence of Simeon, the southernmost tribe, together with northern tribes remains anomalous; 34.6-7 n. 8: Oded the prophet. The words are syntactically problematic and have been variously rendered. In addition, attribution of the prophetic message to Oded contradicts v. 1. The ancient versions (LXX, Vulgate, Peshitta) harmonize with v. 1. The day; they brought 700 oxen and 7,000 sheep of the spoil. ¹²They entered into a covenant to worship the LORD God of their fathers with all their heart and with all their soul. ¹³Whoever would not worship the LORD God of Israel would be put to death, whether small or great, whether man or woman. ¹⁴So they took an oath to the LORD in a loud voice and with shouts, with trumpeting and blasts of the horn. ¹⁵All Judah rejoiced over the oath, for they swore with all their heart and sought Him with all their will. He responded to them and gave them respite on every side.

¹⁶^aHe^b also deposed Maacah mother of King Asa from the rank of queen mother, because she had made an abominable thing for [the goddess] Asherah. Asa cut down her abominable thing, reduced it to dust, and burned it in the Wadi Kidron. ¹⁷The shrines, indeed, were not abolished in Israel; however, Asa was wholehearted [with the LORD] all his life. ¹⁸He brought into the House of God the things that he and his father had consecrated—silver, gold, and utensils. ¹⁹There was no war until the thirty-fifth year of the reign of Asa.

16 ^cIn the thirty-sixth year of the reign of Asa, King Baasha of Israel marched against Judah and built up Ramah to block ^dall movement^d of King Asa of Judah. ²Asa took all the silver and gold from the treasuries of the House of the LORD and the royal palace, and sent them to King Ben-hadad of Aram, who resided in Damascus, with this message: ³“There is a pact between me and you, as there was between my father and your father. I herewith send you silver and gold; go and break your pact with King Baasha of Israel so that he may withdraw from me.” ⁴Ben-hadad acceded to King Asa’s request; he sent his army commanders against the towns of Israel and ravaged Ijon, Dan, Abel-maim, and all the garrison towns of Naphtali. ⁵When Baasha heard about it, he stopped building up Ramah and put an end to the work on it. ⁶Then King Asa mustered all Judah, and they carried away the stones and timber with which Baasha had built up Ramah; with these King Asa built up Geba and Mizpah.

⁷At that time, Hanani the seer came to King Asa of Judah and said to him, “Because you relied on the king of Aram and did not rely on the LORD your God, therefore the army of the king of Aram has slipped out of your hands. ⁸The Cushites and Lybians were a mighty army words may be a gloss. 16–19: Cultic reforms. Queen mother (Heb “gevirah”): Some maintain that the “gevirah” held an official position within the monarchy, and wielded significant political power, perhaps second only to the king. Others have gone further, arguing that the “gevirah” regulated aspects of the official Temple cult, as suggested by the fact that Maacah had been responsible for the production of “the abominable thing,” likely a (proscribed) cultic mask. Others believe that the “gevirah” enjoyed no formal status, and that the influence wielded by various queen mothers was a function of their personalities.

16.1–10: Asa’s fateful alliance. A reversal of Asa’s previous exclusive reliance on the LORD, and the resulting rebuke by the prophet Hanani. 7–10: Hanani, the father of Jehu the prophet; see 1 Kings 16.1, 7; 2 Chron. 19.2; 20.34. Chronicles thus has Jehu’s father prophesying during the reign of Jehoshaphat’s father. 7: Some mss of LXX read “Israel” in place of Aram, probably a secondary reading. According to the Masoretic Text, had Asa remained faithful he would have conquered Baasha as well as his confederates, the Arameans.

^a With vv. 16–19, cf. 1 Kings 15.13–16. ^b I.e., Asa.

^c Cf. 1 Kings 15.17–24. ^{d-d} Lit. “one who goes out and one who comes in.”

with chariots and horsemen in very great numbers, yet because you relied on the LORD He delivered them into your hands. ⁹For the eyes of the LORD range over the entire earth, to give support to those who are wholeheartedly with Him. You have acted foolishly in this matter, and henceforth you will be beset by wars.” ¹⁰Asa was vexed at the seer and put him into the stocks,^a for he was furious with him because of that. Asa inflicted cruelties on some of the people at that time.

¹¹The acts of Asa, early and late, are recorded in the annals of the kings of Judah and Israel. ¹²In the thirty-ninth year of his reign, Asa suffered from an acute foot ailment; but ill as he was, he still did not turn to the LORD but to physicians. ¹³Asa slept with his fathers. He died in the forty-first year of his reign,¹⁴ and was buried in the grave that he had made for himself in the City of David. He was laid in his resting-place, which was filled with spices of all kinds, expertly blended; a very great fire was made in his honor.

17 His son Jehoshaphat succeeded him as king, and took firm hold of Israel. ²He stationed troops in all the fortified towns of Judah, and stationed garrisons throughout the land of Judah and the cities of Ephraim which his father Asa had captured. ³The LORD was with Jehoshaphat because he followed the earlier ways of his father David, and did not worship the Baalim, ⁴but worshiped the God of his father and followed His commandments—unlike the behavior of Israel. ⁵So the LORD established the kingdom in his hands, and all Judah gave presents to Jehoshaphat. He had wealth and glory in abundance. ⁶His mind was elevated in the ways of the LORD. Moreover, he abolished the shrines and the sacred posts from Judah.

⁷In the third year of his reign he sent his officers Benhail, Obadiah, Zechariah, Nethanel, and Micaiah throughout the cities of Judah to offer instruction. ⁸With them were the Levites, Shemaiah, Nethaniah, Zebadiah, Asahel, Shemiramoth, Jehonathan, Adonijah, Tobijah and Tobadonijah the Levites; with them were Elishama and Jehoram the priests. ⁹They offered instruction throughout Judah, having with them the Book of the Teaching of the LORD. They made the rounds of all the cities of Judah and instructed the people. ¹⁰A terror of the LORD seized all the kingdoms of the lands around Judah, and they did not go to war with Jehoshaphat. ¹¹From Philistia a load of silver 16.11–14: Conclusion of Asa's reign. 12: Some see Asa's affliction as punishment for his alliance with Benhadad, though the text does not quite say as much. The episode involves another instance of paranomasia (wordplay or punning), here based on the name Asa ("asa"), since the Aramaic root "s-y/'-s-" means "heal." The use of Aramaic is hardly surprising in a book of the Second Temple period, given how widespread this language was throughout the Near East. The exact intent of the criticism leveled against Asa is not clear but certainly suggests that Asa failed to recognize God's power to cure illness. 14: The burial description is fuller than that of 1 Kings 15.24, yielding a fundamentally positive assessment of Asa's reign.

17.1–20.37: Jehoshaphat's reign. Chronicles' portrayal of Jehoshaphat differs dramatically from that in 1 Kings. The latter (quite reasonably) views Jehoshaphat's northern counterpart, Ahab, as the more important of the two kings; accordingly, Kings contains only occasional notices concerning Jehoshaphat. Chronicles, however, devotes a total of four chs to Jehoshaphat, with only passing reference to his northern counterparts. Several features reflect a Solomon typology, where features of Jehoshaphat are modeled after those of his illustrious forebear, since in Chronicles all good and successful monarchs embody the qualities manifest by David and Solomon. Despite Chronicles' critique of Jehoshaphat's alliance with the wicked, which apparently reflects the book's understanding of the parallel passages in Kings, Chronicles' overall assessment of the king is positive, leading some scholars to argue that Chronicles has drawn on extrabiblical material. 17.3–4: Chronicles presupposes the reader's familiarity with 1 Kings 17ff., which relate the prevalence of Baal worship in northern Israel. 5: The wording of this v. is reminiscent of Solomon. 7–9: Levites stand out was brought to Jehoshaphat as tribute. The Arabs, too, brought him flocks: 7,700 rams and 7,700 he-goats. ¹²Jehoshaphat grew greater and greater, and he built up fortresses and garrison towns in Judah. ¹³He carried out extensive works in the towns of Judah, and had soldiers, valiant men, in Jerusalem. ¹⁴They were enrolled according to their clans. Judah: chiefs of thousands, Adnah the chief, who had 300,000 valiant men; ¹⁵next to him was Jehohanan the captain, who had 280,000; ¹⁶next to him was Amasiah son of Zichri, who made a freewill offering to the LORD. He had 200,000 valiant men. ¹⁷Benjamin: Eliada, a valiant man, who had 200,000 men armed with bow and buckler; ¹⁸next to him was Jehozabad, who had 180,000 armed men. ¹⁹These served the king, besides those whom the king assigned to the fortified towns throughout Judah.

a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

18 ¹So Jehoshaphat had wealth and honor in abundance, and he allied himself by marriage to Ahab. ²After some years had passed, he came to visit Ahab at Samaria. Ahab slaughtered sheep and oxen in abundance for him and for the people with him, and persuaded him to march against Ramoth-gilead. ³King Ahab of Israel said to King Jehoshaphat of Judah, "Will you accompany me to Ramoth-gilead?" He answered him, "I will do what you do; my troops shall be your troops and shall accompany you in battle." ⁴Jehoshaphat then said to the king of Israel, "But first inquire for the word of the LORD."

⁵So the king of Israel gathered the prophets, four hundred men, and asked them, "Shall I march upon Ramoth-gilead for battle, or shall I not?" "March," they said, "and God will deliver it into the king's hands." ⁶Then Jehoshaphat asked, "Is there not another prophet of the LORD here through whom we can inquire?" ⁷And the king of Israel answered Jehoshaphat, "There is one more man through whom we can inquire of the LORD; but I hate him, because he never prophesies anything good for me but always misfortune. He is Micaiah son of Imlah." Jehoshaphat replied, "Let the king not say such a thing." ⁸So the king of Israel summoned an officer and said, "Bring Micaiah son of Imlah at once."

a Cf. 1 Kings 22.

among those sent to educate the people; Deut. 33.10 may inform the v. The historicity of this passage is debated; it may reflect Second Temple, rather than First Temple, reality. The itinerant instructors are sent only to the cities of Judah, not Ephraim; this may be the author's way of expressing Judah's religious superiority. Book of the Teaching ("torah") of the LORD: This term, used in 34.14 and Neh.

9.3, likely refers to the Torah.

10–19: The offering of royal tribute by foreign kings, a clear statement of geopolitical dominance, is reminiscent of Solomon and David. 12: The Heb words rendered greater and greater are virtually identical with those depicting Solomon; see 1.1.

18.1–34: Jehoshaphat joins forces with Ahab. The details are identical to 1 Kings ch 22, with a few notable exceptions. The primary difference concerns the episode's purpose in the context of Kings and Chronicles. Kings focuses on the question of true vs. false prophecy, while Chronicles' focus is on the impropriety of forging an alliance (military or political) with foreign or wicked entities (see 19.1–3). Thus the opening vv., unattested in Kings, explain that Jehoshaphat's error had its roots in the marriage between his son and Ahab's daughter. 1–2: An implicit rebuke: Jehoshaphat has wealth and honor in abundance—what enticement could there be for creating a family bond with a wicked northern king? The harsh indictment is reaffirmed by v. 2, Ahab persuaded ("hesit," lit. "enticed/incited") Jehoshaphat. Heb "incite" has, throughout the Bible, a decidedly negative connotation, generally involving sedition to idolatry. Moreover, this same verb appears at a crucial point later in the story, indicating that Jehoshaphat has become the victim of sedition. The enticement was apparently the abundance of animals slaughtered in honor of Jehoshaphat. Ramoth-gilead (lit. "heights of Gilead") is located on the eastern bank of the Jordan, south of the present-day Golan Heights.

3: In contrast to 1 Kings ch 22, Jehoshaphat here makes no mention of his horses joining the horses of Ahab, perhaps because Chronicles saw it as implying that victory is determined largely by one's military might, an unacceptable position in Chronicles' worldview, even for a king who has been "enticed." 4: On inquiring of the LORD before warfare as a sign of righ-

⁹The king of Israel and King Jehoshaphat of Judah, wearing their robes, were seated on their thrones situated in the threshing floor at the entrance of the gate of Samaria; and all the prophets were prophesying before them. ¹⁰Zedekiah son of Chenaanah had provided himself with iron horns; and he said, "Thus said the LORD: With these you shall gore the Arameans till you make an end of them." ¹¹All the other prophets were prophesying similarly, "March against Ramoth-gilead and be victorious! The LORD will deliver it into Your Majesty's hands."

¹²The messenger who had gone to summon Micaiah said to him, "Look, the words of the prophets are unanimously favorable to the king. Let your word be like that of the rest of them; speak a favorable word." ¹³"By the life of the LORD," Micaiah answered, "I will speak only what my God tells me." ¹⁴When he came before the king, the king said to him, "Micah,^a shall we march against Ramoth-gilead for battle or shall we not?" He answered him, "March and be victorious! They will be delivered into your hands." ¹⁵The king said to him, "How many times must I adjure you to tell me nothing but the truth in the name of the LORD?" ¹⁶Then he said, "I saw all Israel scattered over the hills like sheep without a shepherd; and the LORD said, 'These have no master; let everyone return to his home in safety.'" ¹⁷The king of Israel said to Jehoshaphat, "Did I not tell you that he would not prophesy good fortune for me, but only misfortune?"

¹⁸Then [Micaiah] said, "Indeed, hear now the word of the LORD! I saw the LORD seated upon His throne, with all the host of heaven standing in attendance to the right and to the left of Him. ¹⁹The LORD asked, 'Who will entice King Ahab of Israel so that he will march and fall at Ramoth-gilead?' Then one said this and another said that, ²⁰until a certain spirit came forward and stood before the LORD and said, 'I will entice him.' 'How?' said the LORD to him. ²¹And he replied, 'I will go forth and become a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets.' Then He said, 'You will entice with success. Go forth and do it.' ²²Thus the LORD has put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these prophets of yours; for the LORD has decreed misfortune for you."

²³Thereupon Zedekiah son of Chenaanah came up and struck Micaiah on the cheek, and exclaimed, "However did the spirit of the LORD pass from me to speak with you!" ²⁴Micaiah replied, "You will see on the day when you try to hide in the innermost room." ²⁵Then the king of teousness, see 1 Chron. 10.14; 14.10. 27–28: Come home safe (lit. "return in peace"): "In peace," Heb "beshalom," is a leading idea in this story. This v. anticipates v. 34, which states that the (basically) upright Jehoshaphat returned "in peace," whereas the wicked Ahab was killed, as prophesied by Micaiah. 27: The words Listen, all you peoples appear at Mic. 1.2, possibly indicating that Chronicles identified Micaiah, the prophet of the present episode, with the prophet Micah, one of the twelve "minor prophets." 31: 1 Kings reads "he cried out," which denotes either a shout of desperation or an attempt to muster the troops. Chronicles' text, which adds and the LORD helped him, explains this call as a shout of prayer, emphasizing that prayer and repentance are efficacious, even in seemingly hopeless situations. Jehoshaphat is thus implicitly contrasted with Saul who, in similar circumstances, chose to take his life, rather than engage in prayer. God diverted them (Heb "wayesitem," "he enticed them"): LXX's reading suggests the graphically similar "wayesirem," i.e., "he moved them away," but this is likely a secondary reading. The very strangeness of "wayesitem" however, is part of Chronicles' literary strategy. Chronicles applies a kind of talion (measure-for-measure) principle: He who was previously "enticed" to commit an egregious act by trusting in the might of alliances with the wicked (v. 2) is saved by the LORD, who "entices" the attacking force to suddenly desist, merely by virtue of his recognition that salvation comes only from trust in divine omnipotence. This is a further instance of Chronicles' one-dimensional perspective; there is no explanation of the military means by which Jehoshaphat's deliverance came about.

^a A shortened form of Micaiah.

Israel said, "Take Micaiah and turn him over to Amon, the governor of the city, and to Prince Joash, ²⁶and say, 'The king's orders are: Put this fellow in prison, and let his fare be scant bread and scant water until I come home safe.' " ²⁷To which Micaiah retorted, "If you ever come home safe, the LORD has not spoken through me." He said further, ^a"Listen, all you peoples!"^a ²⁸The king of Israel and King Jehoshaphat of Judah marched against Ramoth-gilead. ²⁹The king of Israel said to Jehoshaphat, ^b"I will disguise myself and go^b into the battle, but you, wear your robes." So the king of Israel disguised himself, and they went into the battle. ³⁰The king of Aram had given these instructions to his chariot officers: "Do not attack anyone, small or great, except the king of Israel." ³¹When the chariot officers saw Jehoshaphat, whom they took for the king of Israel, they wheeled around to attack him, and Jehoshaphat cried out and the LORD helped him, and God diverted them from him. ³²And when the chariot officers realized that he was not the king of Israel, they gave up the pursuit. ³³Then a man drew his bow at random and hit the king of Israel between the "plates of the" armor and he said to his charioteer, "Turn around and get me behind the lines; I am wounded." ³⁴The battle "raged all day long,"^c and the king remained propped up in the chariot facing Aram until dusk; he died as the sun was setting.

19 King Jehoshaphat of Judah returned safely to his palace, to Jerusalem. ²Jehu son of Hanani the seer went out to meet King Jehoshaphat and said to him, "Should one give aid to the wicked and befriend those who hate the LORD? For this, wrath is upon you from the LORD. ³However, there is some good in you, for you have purged the land of the sacred posts and have dedicated yourself to worship God."

⁴Jehoshaphat remained in Jerusalem a while and then went out among the people from Beer-sheba to the hill a-a Cf. Mic. 1.2.

b-b Infinitives used for finite verb; cf. note at 1 Kings 22.30.

c-c Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

19.1–20.30: This entire section has no parallel in Kings. 19.1–3: Prophetic rebuke. 2: Befriend (Heb "te'ehav," root "'h-v") connotes treaty or covenant fidelity; the same idea is present in give aid. These vv. are not present in the Deuteronomistic version in Kings, since that source focuses on the person of Ahab and, more fundamentally, because the Deuteronomist sees no religious dilemma in joining forces with a northern king (or other wicked individual) so long as one does not adopt his sinful ways. Chronicles, however, takes the position that the mere act of displaying tolerance toward the wicked is wrong, since it countenances the LORD's enemies (see Ps. 139.21). Moreover, such tolerance and cooperation signals a lack of exclusive trust in the LORD and His ability to provide for one's every need. Chronicles' view of separation from the wicked informed postbiblical literature (see, e.g., Avot R. Nat., A, 16). Chronicles explains the absence of punishment for this breach of faith—for which no remorse is expressed—by the fact that Jehoshaphat has many good deeds to his credit that offset the present offense. For this reason, Chronicles prefaces this story with an account of Jehoshaphat's worthy acts in ch 17. Since the question of differentiating true from false prophecy is not at issue in Chronicles, it is quite natural that Jehoshaphat is not blamed for having gone to battle, per se.

19.4–11: Establishment of judiciary. Jehoshaphat responds to the prophetic rebuke by promoting justice throughout the land. The historicity of this passage, unattested in Kings, has been debated at length. The formulation and content of this ch are highly reminiscent of Deut. 1.13–17; 16.18; 17.8–12. Some scholars appeal to the use of paranomasia—the name Jehoshaphat means "the LORD has judged" (Heb "shafat")—as evidence of this passage's literary, rather than historical, value. They thus view the passage as a type of midrash on Jehoshaphat's name: The king whose name includes the root "to judge" established the judicial system in Judah. Others, pointing to various differences between Chronicles and Deuteronomy (e.g., the cities in which courts were established, the absence of vocabulary characteristic of Chronicles), have argued that Chronicles' story is factual, and draws on pre-Chronicles, non-Deuteronomistic material. 4: In contrast to ch 17, here Jehoshaphat's reform was applied not only to Judah but up through the hill country of Ephraim; he brought them back to the LORD God of their fathers. ⁵He appointed judges in the land in all the fortified towns of Judah, in each and every town. ⁶He charged the judges: “Consider what you are doing, for you judge not on behalf of man, but on behalf of the LORD, and He is with you when you pass judgment. ⁷Now let the dread of the LORD be upon you; act with care, for there is no injustice or favoritism or bribe-taking with the LORD our God.” ⁸Jehoshaphat also appointed in Jerusalem some Levites and priests and heads of the clans of Israelites for rendering judgment in matters of the LORD, and for disputes. Then they returned to Jerusalem. ⁹He charged them, “This is how you shall act: in fear of the LORD, with fidelity, and with whole heart. ¹⁰When a dispute comes before you from your brothers living in their towns, whether about homicide, or about ritual, or laws or rules, you must instruct them so that they do not incur guilt before the LORD and wrath be upon you and your brothers. Act so and you will not incur guilt. ¹¹See, Amariah the chief priest is over you in all cases concerning the LORD, and Zebadiah son of Ishmael is the commander of the house of Judah in all cases concerning the king; the Levitical officials are at your disposal; act with resolve and the LORD be with the good.”

20 After that, Moabites, Ammonites, together with some Ammonim,^a came against Jehoshaphat to wage war. ²The report was brought to Jehoshaphat: “A great multitude is coming against you from beyond the sea, from Aram, and is now in Hazazon-tamar”—that is, Ein-gedi. ³Jehoshaphat was afraid; he decided to resort to the LORD and proclaimed a fast for all Judah. ⁴Judah assembled to beseech the LORD. They also came from all the towns of Judah to seek the LORD.

⁵Jehoshaphat stood in the congregation of Judah and Jerusalem in the House of the LORD at the front of the new court. ⁶He said, “LORD God of our fathers, truly You are a Probably for m'nym “Meunites” (1 Chron. 4.41); cf. Kimhi.

country of Ephraim, as well. (This action is described as “returning” the people to the LORD.) This is another example of Chronicles’ inclusivist position. This position may also reflect Deut 16.18, which refers to cities located in (all of) Israel’s tribes. 6: For similar phrasing and notions, see Deut. 1.17. 7: See Deut. 10.17. 10: See Exod. 18.16; Deut. 17.8.

20.1–21.1: Jehoshaphat defeats an eastern confederation. The historicity of this ch is, again, much debated. Some scholars argue that the entire account is a historical “midrash” on either 2 Kings ch 3 or Exod ch 14 and Isa 7.9b. Others accept a historical kernel to the account, seeing it as a magnified version of a local conflict (in the post-exilic period) or drawing on a credible local tradition. Still others see the reference to Meunites in v. 1 (see translators’ note a) as indicating that the attacking force involved Nabateans from Meun/Ma’anthe, near Petra, in the 4th or 3rd century BCE. Finally, some accept Chronicles’ claim that the battle occurred in Jehoshaphat’s time. Note that Chronicles does not offer any theological explanation for the outbreak of war during the reign of a (basically) righteous king. Chronicles thereby acknowledges that some wars come about not as punishments but, rather, as a means of testing the religious commitment of the king and his people, or for some other (unexplained) reason. This may be further proof that Chronicles does not maintain a rigorous theology of retribution. 20.1–2: The redundant some Ammonim has prompted several exegetes to read “Meunim.” On the basis of the biblical site Ma’on and Arabic Ma’an, it appears that the Meunites lived either in the southern Negev, i.e., west of the Arabah, or slightly to the Arabah’s east, near Petra. LXX reads here “Minaeans.” 2: The Masoretic Text entails a geographical difficulty: Peoples coming from beyond the sea (whomever this might refer to) and Arameans, whose territory lay to the northeast of Israel, would not be expected to gather at Ein-gedi, located at roughly the middle of the length of the Dead Sea. The old Latin translation renders “Edomites” in place of Arameans, a reading adopted by many moderns, especially since the two words are graphically similar in Heb. 3–5: These vv. again refer only to the cities of Judah, either because the impending battle was due to take place in Judah’s territory or, once again, as a sign of Chronicles’ preferential treatment of Judah, whose residents understand the importance of seeking out the LORD. 5: The new court, a third (outer) court or, alternatively, a newly formed division within Chronicles’ second (i.e., lay) court. 6–12: Jehoshaphat’s prayer contains a reprise of Israel’s early history. V. 9 portrays this public gath-

the God in heaven and You rule over the kingdoms of the nations; power and strength are Yours; none can oppose You. ⁷O our God, you dispossessed the inhabitants of this land before Your people Israel, and You gave it to the descendants of Your friend Abraham forever. ⁸They settled in it and in it built for You a House for Your name. They said, ⁹'Should misfortune befall us—the punishing sword, pestilence, or famine, we shall stand before this House and before You—for Your name is in this House—and we shall cry out to You in our distress, and You will listen and deliver us.' ¹⁰Now the people of Ammon, Moab, and the hill country of Seir, into whose [land] You did not let Israel come when they came from Egypt, but they turned aside from them and did not wipe them out, ¹¹these now repay us by coming to expel us from Your possession which You gave us as ours. ¹²O our God, surely You will punish them, for we are powerless before this great multitude that has come against us, and do not know what to do, but our eyes are on You." ¹³All Judah stood before the LORD with their little ones, their women-folk, and their children.

¹⁴Then in the midst of the congregation the spirit of the LORD came upon Jahaziel son of Zechariah son of Benaiah son of Jeiel son of Mattaniah the Levite, of the sons of Asaph, ¹⁵and he said, "Give heed, all Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem and King Jehoshaphat; thus said the LORD to you, 'Do not fear or be dismayed by this great multitude, for the battle is God's, not yours. ¹⁶March down against them tomorrow as they come up by the Ascent of Ziz; you will find them at the end of the wadi in the direction of the wilderness of Jeruel. ¹⁷It is not for you to fight this battle; stand by, wait, and witness your deliverance by the LORD, O Judah and Jerusalem; do not fear or be dismayed; go forth to meet them tomorrow and the LORD will be with you.' " ¹⁸Jehoshaphat bowed low with his face to the ground, and all Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem threw themselves down before the LORD to worship the LORD. ¹⁹Levites of the sons of Kohath and of the sons of Korah got up to extol the LORD God of Israel at the top of their voices.

²⁰Early the next morning they arose and went forth to the wilderness of Tekoa. As they went forth, Jehoshaphat stood and said, "Listen to me, O Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem: Trust firmly in the LORD your God and you will stand firm; trust firmly in His prophets and you will succeed." ²¹After taking counsel with the people, he stationed singers to the LORD extolling the One majestic in holiness as they went forth ahead of the vanguard, saying, ering as a fulfillment of Solomon's prayer at 2 Chron. 6.24–25, again linking Jehoshaphat and Solomon. 10: This v. adopts the tradition regarding Seir preserved in Deut. 21.2–8; cf. Num. 20.14–21. 12: Punish them (lit. "judge them," Heb "tishpot-bam") is another example of paranoia. The LORD is asked to judge (Israel's enemies), precisely as the literal meaning of "Jehoshaphat" indicates. 13–14: The leading role of the Levites is once again in evidence, as the critical oracle is delivered by one of the Temple minstrels. This v. should not be taken to indicate that "Levitic prophecy" always, or even generally, involved an oracular saying; instead it reflects the type of ad hoc prophetic activity favored by Chronicles. 15–17: The wording of these vv. draws on earlier works, most notably Exod. 14.13–14. Like Moses in the latter instance, Yahaziel tells Judah that the war is the LORD's battle. This passage is perhaps the clearest example of Chronicles' one-dimensional approach to human endeavors. 20: Jehoshaphat, the fundamentally good king, addresses his people, reminding them that trust in the LORD and his prophets brings success. Trust in God, along with proper cultic activity (including prayer) centered on the Temple, ensures victory. Indeed, in contrast to previous military encounters, this passage makes no mention of the number of the Judahite forces, for Israel's strength is not responsible for victory. True to form, the righteous monarch engages his people in the decision making, rather than dictating to them. The people's ready assent shows they are worthy of the LORD's intervention. Trust firmly . . . and you will stand firm ("ha'minu . . . vete'menu") reflects the similar paronomasia in Isa. 7.9. 21: Note the refrain "Praise . . . for His steadfast love is eternal." The One majestic in holiness: Others render "in holy attire," "his holy splendor," or "the holy place of his appearing"; see 16.29. The "democratization" theme appears at 1 Chron. 13.1–4 (see n.); 2 Chron.

"Praise the LORD, for His steadfast love is eternal." ²²As they began their joyous shouts and hymns, the LORD set ambushes for the men of Amon, Moab, and the hill country of Seir, who were marching against Judah, and they were routed. ²³The Ammonites and Moabites turned against the men of the hill country of Seir to exterminate and annihilate them. When they had made an end of the men of Seir, each helped to destroy his fellow.

²⁴When Judah reached the lookout in the wilderness and looked for the multitude, they saw them lying on the ground as corpses; not one had survived. ²⁵Jehoshaphat and his army came to take the booty, and found an abundance of goods, corpses, and precious objects, which they pillaged, more than they could carry off. For three days they were taking booty, there was so much of it. ²⁶On the fourth day they assembled in the Valley of Blessing—for there they blessed the LORD; that is why that place is called the Valley of Blessing to this day. ²⁷All the men of Judah and Jerusalem with Jehoshaphat at their head returned joyfully to Jerusalem, for the LORD had given them cause for rejoicing over their enemies. ²⁸They came to Jerusalem to the House of the LORD, to the accompaniment of harps, lyres, and trumpets. ²⁹The terror of God seized all the kingdoms of the lands when they heard that the LORD had fought the enemies of Israel. ³⁰The kingdom of Jehoshaphat was untroubled, and his God granted him respite on all sides.

³¹Jehoshaphat reigned over Judah. He was thirty-five years old when he became king, and he reigned in Jerusalem for twenty-five years. His mother's name was Azubah daughter of Shilhi. ³²He followed the course of his father Asa and did not deviate from it, doing what was pleasing to the LORD. ³³However, the shrines did not cease; the people still did not direct their heart toward the God of their fathers. ³⁴As for the other events of Jehoshaphat's reign, early and late, they are recorded in the annals of Jehu son of Hanani, which were included in the book of the kings of Israel.

³⁵Afterward, King Jehoshaphat of Judah entered into a partnership with King Ahaziah of Israel, thereby acting wickedly. ³⁶He joined with him in constructing ships to go to Tarshish; the ships were constructed in Ezion-geber. ³⁷Eliezer son of Dodavahu of Mareshah prophesied against Jehoshaphat, "As you have made a partnership with Ahaziah, the LORD will break up your work." The ships were wrecked and were unable to go to Tarshish.

1.2; 30.2; 32.3. 22–24: In contrast to other passages, where the priestly trumpet blasts lead the army into victory (e.g., Josh. 6.8–10,16), here the Levitic choral rite dominates. The victory begins as soon as the Levites break forth in chant; Judah engages in no military activity. No explanation is offered for how the internecine fighting broke out in the enemy camp (cf. Judg. 11.19–22). Since the Jewish community of Chronicles' time was in no position to wage war, the message of the Levitic role here seems to be that it is their cultic chant, whether performed in battle or in the Temple, which invokes divine favor and protects Israel.

25–30: All of the enemy force has been decimated, another feature appearing in Exodus (14.28). The only task left for Judah's "army" is scavenging and collection of the spoils. 35–37: The story of Jehoshaphat's joint maritime venture differs markedly from 1 Kings 22.49–50, either because Chronicles' text reflects a different source or due to its own tendentious reworking. Kings states that Jehoshaphat prepared ships for sailing but these were destroyed in Ezion-geber (near present-day Eilat) and did not sail. Jehoshaphat then refused Ahaziah's offer of assistance. No reason is offered there for Jehoshaphat's refusal. Chronicles' version results in a second offense on the part of Jehoshaphat, one that appears to be identical to his wrongdoing in ch 18. It is possible that this latter episode teaches that any form of cooperation with the wicked is forbidden, i.e., even where the upright individual participates purely for his own benefit and with no regard for the welfare of the wicked. Chronicles claims that the ships were intended to sail for Tarshish, whereas 1 Kings states that the ships' destination was Ophir, located in Africa, at the mouth of the Red Sea; see 9.21. As elsewhere in Chronicles, a prophet not known from other sources appears to offer a short speech to the king.

21 ¹Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers and was buried with his fathers in the City of David; his son Jehoram succeeded him as king. ²He had brothers, sons of Jehoshaphat: Azariah, Jehiel, Zechariah, Azariahu, Michael, and Shephatiah; all these were sons of King Jehoshaphat of Israel. ³Their father gave them many gifts of silver, gold, and [other] presents, as well as fortified towns in Judah, but he gave the kingdom to Jehoram because he was the first-born.

⁴Jehoram proceeded to take firm hold of his father's kingdom and put to the sword all his brothers, as well as some of the officers of Israel. ⁵Jehoram was thirty-two years old when he became king, and he reigned in Jerusalem eight years. ⁶He followed the practices of the kings of Israel doing what the House of Ahab had done, for he married a daughter of Ahab; he did what was displeasing to the LORD. ⁷However, the LORD refrained from destroying the House of David for the sake of the covenant he had made with David, and in accordance with his promise to maintain a lamp for him and his descendants for all time. ⁸During his reign, the Edomites rebelled against Judah's rule and set up a king of their own. ⁹Jehoram advanced [against them] with his officers and all his chariots. He arose by night and attacked the Edomites, who surrounded him and the chariot commanders. ¹⁰Edom has been in rebellion against Judah, to this day; Libnah also rebelled against him at that time, because he had forsaken the LORD God of his fathers. ¹¹Moreover, he built shrines in the hill country of Judah; he led astray the inhabitants of Jerusalem and made Judah wayward.

¹²A letter from Elijah the prophet came to him which read, "Thus says the LORD God of your father David: Since you have not followed the practices of your father Jehoshaphat and the practices of King Asa of Judah, ¹³but have followed the practices of the kings of Israel, leading astray Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem as the House of Ahab led them astray, and have also killed your brothers of your father's house, who were better than you, ¹⁴therefore, the LORD will inflict a great blow upon your people, your sons, and your wives and all your possessions. ¹⁵As for you, you will be severely stricken with a disorder of the bowels year after year until your bowels drop out."

¹⁶The LORD stirred up the spirit of the Philistines and the Arabs who were neighbors of the Cushites against Jehoram. ¹⁷They marched against Judah, breached its defenses, and carried off all the property that was found in 21.2–20: Jehoram's reign. An expanded version of 2 Kings 8.16–24; some of Chronicles' added material probably draws on additional written sources. 2–4: Jehoram establishes his rule. The placement of these vv. highlights the theme of the threat of extinction to the Davidic line which unites the following two chs (see 21.17; 22.8–9; 22.10–11). 5–11: The passage, aside from v. 11, is taken from 2 Kings 17–22. 6: Athaliah was probably a daughter of Omri, King of Israel, and hence sister of Ahab. 7: Chronicles' reformulation of 2 Kings 8.19 highlights the divine promise to the Davidic dynasty. 8–11: Chronicles suggests that Jehoram's troubles are the result of his religious infidelity. 10–19: These vv. have no parallel in Kings. 12–15: Letter from Elijah. The prevalent view maintains that this letter is Chronicles' creation. The choice of Elijah was probably informed by his role as zealous champion of the worship of YHWH against the influence of Baalism in northern Israel during the rule of Ahab and Ahaziah. Given Jehoram's marriage to Ahab's daughter, Elijah was the natural choice. Because of uncertainty surrounding the chronology of the period (see 2 Kings 1.17; ch 2; 3.11), it is unclear whether Chronicles thought that Elijah was still alive or had perished after composing the prophetic letter.

21.16–20: End of Jehoram's reign. The form "Jehoahaz" (v. 17) in place of the standard "Ahaziah" supports the likelihood that this v. is taken from an independent source. 17: LXX reads "daughters" in place of "wives."

a Cf. 2 Kings 8.17–24.

the king's palace, as well as his sons and his wives. The only son who remained was Jehoahaz, his youngest.¹⁸ After this, the LORD afflicted him with an incurable disease of the bowels.¹⁹ Some years later, when a period of two years had elapsed, his bowels dropped out because of his disease, and he died a gruesome death. His people did not make a fire for him like the fire for his fathers.²⁰ He was thirty-two years old when he became king, and he reigned in Jerusalem eight years. He departed unpraised,^a and was buried in the City of David, but not in the tombs of the kings.

22^b The inhabitants of Jerusalem made Ahaziah, his youngest son, king in his stead, because all the older ones had been killed by the troops that penetrated the camp with the Arabs. Ahaziah son of Jehoram reigned as king of Judah.² Ahaziah was forty-two years old when he became king, and he reigned in Jerusalem one year; his mother's name was Athaliah daughter of Omri.³ He too followed the practices of the house of Ahab, for his mother counseled him to do evil.⁴ He did what was displeasing to the LORD, like the house of Ahab, for they became his counselors after his father's death, to his ruination.⁵ Moreover, he followed their counsel and marched with Jehoram son of King Ahab of Israel to battle against King Hazael of Aram at Ramoth-gilead, where the Arameans wounded Joram.⁶ He returned to Jezreel to recover from the wounds inflicted on him at Ramah when he fought against King Hazael of Aram. King Azariah son of Jehoram of Judah went down to Jezreel to visit Jehoram son of Ahab while he was ill.⁷ God caused the downfall of Ahaziah because he visited Joram. During his visit he went out with Jehoram to Jehu son of Nimshi, whom the LORD had anointed to cut off the house of Ahab.⁸ In the course of bringing the house of Ahab to judgment, Jehu came upon the officers of Judah and the nephews of Ahaziah, ministers of Ahaziah, and killed them.⁹ He sent in search of Ahaziah, who was caught hiding in Samaria, was brought to Jehu, and put to death. He was given a burial, because it was said, "He is the son of Jehoshaphat who worshiped the LORD wholeheartedly." So the house of Ahaziah could not muster the strength to rule.

¹⁰ When Athaliah, Ahaziah's mother, learned that her son was dead, she promptly did away with all who were 18–20: The king's disease is not recorded in Kings; it is unclear whether Chronicles draws on a genuine source or has created this account in fulfillment of v. 15. Chronicles' version highlights the ignominious nature of Jehoram's demise; cf. 2 Kings 8.23–24.

22.1–9: Ahaziah's reign. 1–9: This account, not preserved elsewhere, is reminiscent of 14.9–15 and may derive from the same source. Two features continue from Jehoram's reign to Ahaziah's: the influence of Athaliah and the threat to the Davidic line. The passage contains several allusions to the disastrous reign of Saul (1 Chron. ch 10); compare, esp., vv. 7 and 9 with 1 Chron. 10.6, 13–14. 1–3: The age, forty-two, is impossible, since it would make Ahaziah older than his father. Many LXX mss read "twenty"; Peshitta reads "twenty-two," as does 2 Kings 8.26. 4–5: Added by Chronicles; contacts with the north bring disaster. 7–9: A condensed and reworked version of 2 Kings 9.1–28; 10.12–14, provided with an introductory sentence explaining that the events befalling the dynasty are the result of backsliding. Chronicles differs from 2 Kings in the following respects: The princes of Judah die before Ahaziah (cf. 2 Kings 10.12–14); the circumstances of his death are different (cf. 2 Kings 9.27); the circumstances surrounding his burial are different (cf. 2 Kings 9.28). Chronicles' text may be based on an independent source, or it may be the creation of its author. The emphasis on God's complete control of history (v. 7, God caused the downfall of Ahaziah) is consistent with Chronicles' theology, as is the emphasis on the impropriety of association with northern monarchs.

22.10–24.27: Joash's reign. With the possible exception of parts of ch 24, Chronicles is based on 2 Kings 11–12. Joash's reign consists of three periods: (1) the Davidic dynasty at its lowest point; (2) a period of revitalization, echoing the upswing upon Joash's asa Following Septuagint; cf. Arabic ḥamada, "praise."

b With vv. 1–6, cf. 2 Kings 8.25–29; with vv. 8–9, cf. 2 Kings 9.27–28; with vv. 10–12, cf. 2 Kings 11.1–3.

of the royal stock of the house of Judah. ¹¹ But Jehoshabeath, daughter of the king, spirited away Ahaziah's son Joash from among the princes who were being slain, and put him and his nurse in a bedroom. Jehoshabeath, daughter of King Jehoram, wife of the priest Jehoiada—she was the sister of Ahaziah—kept him hidden from Athaliah so that he was not put to death. ¹² He stayed with them for six years, hidden in the House of God, while Athaliah reigned over the land.

23^a In the seventh year, Jehoiada took courage and brought the chiefs of the hundreds, Azariah son of Jeroham, Ishmael son of Jehohanan, Azariah son of Obed, Maaseiah son of Adaiah, and Elishaphat son of Zichri, into a compact with him. ² They went through Judah and assembled the Levites from all the towns of Judah, and the chiefs of the clans of Israel. They came to Jerusalem ³ and the entire assembly made a covenant with the king in the House of God. He^b said to them, "The son of the king shall be king according to the promise the LORD made concerning the sons of David. ⁴ This is what you must do: One third of you, priests and Levites, who are on duty for the week, shall be gatekeepers at the thresholds; ⁵ another third shall be stationed in the royal palace, and the other third at the Foundation Gate. All the people shall be in the courts of the House of the LORD. ⁶ Let no one enter the House of the LORD except the priests and the ministering Levites. They may enter because they are sanctified, but all the people shall obey the proscription of the LORD. ⁷ The Levites shall surround the king on every side, every man with his weapons at the ready; and whoever enters the House shall be killed. Stay close to the king in his comings and goings." ⁸ The Levites and all Judah did just as Jehoiada the priest ordered: each took his men—those who were on duty that week and those who were off duty that week, for Jehoiada the priest had not dismissed the divisions. ⁹ Jehoiada the priest gave the chiefs of the hundreds King David's spears and shields and quivers that were kept in the House of God. ¹⁰ He stationed the entire force, each man with his weapons at the ready, from the south end of the House to the north end of the House, at the altar and the House, to guard the king on every side. ¹¹ Then they brought out the king's son, and placed upon him the crown and the insignia. They proclaimed him king, and Jehoiada and his sons anointed him and shouted, "Long live the king!"

cension; (3) religious backsliding, including rejection of the prophetic word, leading to military defeat and the king's death.

22.10–23.21: Joash takes power.

22.10–12: Following Kings, the standard opening and closing formulae are lacking, indicating that the period of Athaliah is not formally recognized. It is uncertain whether, as a matter of principle, Judah recognized female monarchs. 23.1–21: Joash's coronation and removal of Athaliah. Cf. 2 Kings 11.4–20. Two key alterations appear: (1) Joash's rule is welcomed and supported by the populace (it is a personal affair in Kings); this is reminiscent of Chronicles' depiction of David and Solomon. (2) Chronicles adjusts the cultic details to its view of proper cultic procedure, as it pertains to priests and Levites.

1–16: Blessings. The period focuses on restoration of the Temple.

^a Cf. 2 Kings 11.4–20.

^b I.e., Jehoiada.

¹²When Athaliah heard the shouting of the people and the guards and the acclamation of the king, she came out to the people, to the House of the LORD. ¹³She looked about and saw the king standing by his pillar at the entrance, the chiefs with their trumpets beside the king, and all the people of the land rejoicing and blowing trumpets, and the singers with musical instruments leading the hymns. Athaliah rent her garments and cried out, "Treason, treason!" ¹⁴Then the priest Jehoiada ordered out the army officers, the chiefs of hundreds, and said to them, "Take her out between the ranks, and if anyone follows her, put him to the sword." For the priest thought, "Let her not be put to death in the House of the LORD." ¹⁵They cleared a passage for her and she came to the entrance of the Horse Gate to the royal palace; there she was put to death.

¹⁶Then Jehoiada solemnized a covenant between himself and the people and the king that they should be the people of the LORD. ¹⁷All the people then went to the temple of Baal; they tore it down and smashed its altars and images to bits, and they slew Mattan, the priest of Baal, in front of the altars. ¹⁸Jehoiada put the officers of the House of the LORD in the charge of Levite priests whom David had assigned over the House of the LORD to offer up burnt offerings, as is prescribed in the Teaching of Moses, accompanied by joyful song as ordained by David. ¹⁹He stationed the gatekeepers at the gates of the House of the LORD to prevent the entry of anyone unclean for any reason. ²⁰He took the chiefs of hundreds, the nobles, and the rulers of the people and all the people of the land, and they escorted the king down from the House of the LORD into the royal palace by the upper gate, and seated the king on the royal throne. ²¹All the people of the land rejoiced, and the city was quiet. As for Athaliah, she had been put to the sword.

24^aJehoash was seven years old when he became king, and he reigned in Jerusalem forty years. His mother's name was Zibiah of Beer-sheba. ²All the days of the priest Jehoiada, Jehoash did what was pleasing to the LORD. ³Jehoiada took two wives for him, by whom he had sons and daughters.

⁴Afterward, Joash decided to renovate the House of the LORD. ⁵He assembled the priests and the Levites and charged them as follows: "Go out to the towns of Judah and collect money from all Israel for the annual repair of 24.1–2: Joash's reign begins. Chronicles' depiction is more favorable than that of 2 Kings ch 12; it omits the notice about sacrifice at the local shrines or high places ("bamot"; 2 Kings 12.4).

24.4–14: Temple restoration. The passage differs substantially from 2 Kings 12.4–16 and conveys several of Chronicles' recurring themes. The claim that there was a surplus of money for other purposes (cf. 2 Kings 12.13–14) due to generosity of the people is to be expected; see 1 Chron. 29.11–19.

^a Cf. 2 Kings 12.1–22.

the House of your God. Do it quickly.” But the Levites did not act quickly. ⁶The king summoned Jehoiada the chief and said to him, “Why have you not seen to it that the Levites brought the tax imposed by Moses, the servant of the LORD, and the congregation of Israel from Judah and Jerusalem to the Tent of the Pact?” ⁷For the children of the wicked Athaliah had violated the House of God and had even used the sacred things of the House of the LORD for the Baals. ⁸The king ordered that a chest be made and placed on the outside of the gate of the House of the LORD. ⁹A proclamation was issued in Judah and Jerusalem to bring the tax imposed on Israel in the wilderness by Moses, the servant of God. ¹⁰All the officers and all the people gladly brought it and threw it into the chest till it was full. ¹¹Whenever the chest was brought to the royal officers by the Levites, and they saw that it contained much money, the royal scribe and the agent of the chief priest came and emptied out the chest and carried it back to its place. They did this day by day, and much money was collected. ¹²The king and Jehoiada delivered the money to those who oversaw the tasks connected with the work of the House of the LORD. They hired masons and carpenters to renovate the House of the LORD, as well as craftsmen in iron and bronze to repair the House of the LORD. ¹³The overseers did their work; under them the work went well and they restored the House of God to its original form and repaired it. ¹⁴When they had finished, they brought the money that was left over to the king and Jehoiada; it was made into utensils for the House of the LORD, service vessels: buckets and ladles, golden and silver vessels. Burnt offerings were offered up regularly in the House of the LORD all the days of Jehoiada. ¹⁵Jehoiada reached a ripe old age and died; he was one hundred and thirty years old at his death. ¹⁶They buried him in the City of David together with the kings, because he had done good in Israel, and on behalf of God and His House.

¹⁷But after the death of Jehoiada, the officers of Judah came, bowing low to the king; and the king listened to them. ¹⁸They forsook the House of the LORD God of their fathers to serve the sacred posts and idols; and there was wrath upon Judah and Jerusalem because of this guilt of theirs. ¹⁹The LORD sent prophets among them to bring them back to Him; they admonished them but they would not pay heed. ²⁰Then the spirit of God enveloped Zechariah son of Jehoiada the priest; he stood above the people and said to them, “Thus God said: Why do you transgress the commandments of the LORD when you cannot succeed? Since you have forsaken the LORD, He has forsaken you.”²¹ They conspired against him and pelted him with stones in the court of the House of the LORD, by order of the king. ²²King Joash disregarded the loyalty that his father Jehoiada had shown to him, and killed his son. As he was dying, he said, “May the LORD see and requite it.”

24.15–16: The death of Jehoiada. The burial notice indicates Chronicles’ positive evaluation of Jehoiada, Joash’s mentor.

24.17–27: Judgment. 2 Kings 12.17–21 states that Joash submitted to the Arameans and was assassinated, but offers no theological explanation. Chronicles provides it by claiming that Joash’s death resulted from his refusal to heed the teachings of Jehoiada, who had just died. This passage exemplifies Chronicles’ view of the divine capacity for forgiveness, and of the importance of prophetic forewarning before punishment. Much of the core material, especially that concerning Zechariah and the Aramean invasion, may be taken from earlier sources.

17–22: Unknown from other sources. Zechariah here is a foil to Joash and highlights the difference between the several periods in Joash’s reign. The sermonic style is typical of Chronicles.

²³At the turn of the year, the army of Aram marched against him; they invaded Judah and Jerusalem, and wiped out all the officers of the people from among the people, and sent all the booty they took to the king of Damascus. ²⁴The invading army of Aram had come with but a few men, but the LORD delivered a very large army into their hands, because they had forsaken the LORD God of their fathers. They inflicted punishments on Joash. ²⁵When they withdrew, having left him with many wounds, his courtiers plotted against him because of the murder^a of the sons of Jehoiada the priest, and they killed him in bed. He died and was buried in the City of David; he was not buried in the tombs of the kings. ²⁶These were the men who conspired against him: Zabad son of Shimeath the Ammonitess, and Jehozabad son of Shimrith the Moabitess. ²⁷As to his sons, and the many pronouncements against him, and his rebuilding of the House of God, they are recorded in the story in the book of the kings. His son Amaziah succeeded him as king.

25^bAmaziah was twenty-five years old when he became king, and he reigned twenty-nine years in Jerusalem; his mother’s name was Jehoaddan of Jerusalem. ²He did what was pleasing to the LORD, but not with a whole heart. ³Once he had the kingdom firmly under control, he executed the courtiers who had assassinated his father the king. ⁴But he did not put their children to death for [he acted] in accordance with what is written in the Teaching, in the Book of Moses, where the LORD commanded, “Parents shall not die for children, nor shall children die for parents, but every person shall die only for his own crime.”^c ⁵Amaziah assembled the men of Judah, and he put all the men of Judah and Benjamin under officers of thousands and officers of hundreds, by clans. He mustered them from the age of twenty upward, and found them to be 300,000 picked men fit for service, able to bear spear and shield. ⁶He hired 100,000 warriors from Israel for 100 talents of silver. ⁷Then a man of God came to him and said, “O king! Do not let the army of Israel go with you, 21–22: Jehoiada is killed in the very place where he crowned Joash; see also 23.14, where Jehoiada refuses to allow Athaliah’s killing in the sacred precincts. 23–24: Aramean invasion. Other than the mention of war spoil, this passage differs markedly from 2 Kings 12.7–18. There, the Aramean king, Hazael, is bought off and does not attack. Here, it appears that the Aramean force attacks while Hazael remains at home. Finally, the two versions of the battle differ substantively. Chronicles’ text is probably a re-formulation of earlier material. Note how Chronicles’ formulation indicates that (only) those who sinned were now being punished. 25: Chronicles explains the king’s assassination as retribution for his treatment of Zechariah, highlighting the explanation through several key words shared by this v. and vv. 21–22; cf. 2 Kings 2.20. The problematic phrasing of 2 Kings 12.20 is replaced here by “on his bed,” perhaps indicating that Chronicles no longer understood the reference in Kings. The “bed” may also be an allusion to the bedroom mentioned above (22.11), indicating a total lack of appreciation on Joash’s part. Chronicles’ statement regarding Joash’s burial is likely tendentious, suggesting a more negative evaluation of Joash. 26: Cf. the names at 2 Kings 12.21. The claim that two of the conspirators were foreigners may bear a talionic or measure-for-measure message: When Israel turns to foreign gods their (divinely ordained) punishment comes at the hands of foreigners. 27: On story, “midrash,” see 13.22 n.

25.1–28: Amaziah’s reign. Amaziah’s reign, like that of Joash and others, is divided into periods of fidelity and infidelity. As in other cases, divine forbearance and grace require that a prophet be sent to warn Amaziah, but to no avail. 1–4: Chronicles’ less than fully positive evaluation reflects the book’s criticism of Amaziah’s dependence on mercenaries. V. 4 is for the LORD is not with Israel—all these Ephraimites. ⁸But go by yourself and do it; take courage for battle, [else] God will make you fall before the enemy. For in God there is power to help one or make one fall!" ⁹Amaziah said to the man of God, "And what am I to do about the 100 talents I gave for the Israelite force?" The man of God replied, "The LORD has the means to give you much more than that." ¹⁰So Amaziah detached the force that came to him from Ephraim, [ordering them] to go back to their place. They were greatly enraged against Judah and returned to their place in a rage.

a Lit. “blood.” b Cf. 2 Kings 14. c-c Cf. Deut. 24.16.

¹¹Amaziah took courage and, leading his army, he marched to the Valley of Salt. He slew 10,000 men of Seir; ¹²another 10,000 the men of Judah captured alive and brought to the top of Sela. They threw them down from the top of Sela and every one of them was burst open. ¹³The men of the force that Amaziah had sent back so they would not go with him into battle made forays against the towns of Judah from Samaria to Beth-horon. They slew 3,000 of them, and took much booty.

¹⁴After Amaziah returned from defeating the Edomites, he had the gods of the men of Seir brought, and installed them as his gods; he prostrated himself before them, and to them he made sacrifice. ¹⁵The LORD was enraged at Amaziah, and sent a prophet to him who said to him, "Why are you worshiping the gods of a people who could not save their people from you?" ¹⁶As he spoke to him, [Amaziah] said to him, "Have we appointed you a counselor to the king? Stop, else you will be killed!" The prophet stopped, saying, "I see God has counseled that you be destroyed, since you act this way and disregard my counsel."

¹⁷Then King Amaziah of Judah took counsel and sent this message to Joash son of Jehoahaz son of Jehu, king of Israel, "Come, let us confront each other!" ¹⁸King Joash of Israel sent back this message to King Amaziah of Judah, "The thistle in Lebanon sent this message to the cedar in Lebanon, 'Give your daughter to my son in marriage.' But a wild beast in Lebanon passed by and trampled the thistle. ¹⁹You boast that you have defeated the Edomites and you are ambitious to get more glory. Now stay at home, lest, provoking disaster you fall, dragging Judah down with you." ²⁰But Amaziah paid no heed—it was God's doing, in order to deliver them up because they worshiped the gods of Edom. ²¹King Joash of Israel marched up, and he and King Amaziah of Judah confronted each other at Beth-shemesh in Judah. ²²The men of Judah were routed by Israel, and they all fled to their homes. ²³King a reformulation of 2 Kings 14.5–6, itself based on Deut. 24.16. Whereas Deuteronomy and Kings employ the Heb form meaning "execute" ("yumtu"), Chronicles employs the form meaning "die" ("yamutu"). This may be merely a textual or linguistic variant, although some see it as proof of Chronicles' strict theory of retribution: An innocent individual cannot be punished, whether in human court or divine justice, for the offense of another. 5–13: Campaign against Edom. Chronicles expands greatly upon 2 Kings 14.7. 6: The tradition regarding mercenaries may be historically authentic. 7: The reference to Ephraimites probably indicates that the mercenaries were hired from territory bordering on Judah. 12–13: Sela is identified by some as Petra, in southern Jordan, but this remains uncertain. 14–16: Worship by a victorious Judean king of the gods of a defeated enemy is unparalleled elsewhere in the Bible and quite surprising. This is likely Chronicles' creation, intended to explain Amaziah's defeat at the hands of Joash; see v. 20. 17–24: These are largely identical to 2 Kings 24.8–14, with the addition of the phrase it was God's doing, in order to deliver them up because they worshiped the gods of Edom (v. 20), which makes explicit the Chronicler's theology. This v. also anticipates 26.5, below; Chronicles stresses the difference between father and son, and, accordingly, the vastly different outcomes (cf. 26.6–8).

Joash of Israel captured Amaziah son of Joash son of Jehoahaz, king of Judah, in Beth-shemesh. He brought him to Jerusalem and made a breach of 400 cubits in the wall of Jerusalem, from the Ephraim Gate to the Corner Gate. ²⁴Then, with all the gold and silver and all the utensils that were to be found in the House of God in the custody of Obed-edom, and with the treasuries of the royal palace, and with the hostages, he returned to Samaria.

²⁵King Amaziah son of Joash of Judah lived fifteen years after the death of King Joash son of Jehoahaz of Israel. ²⁶The other events of Amaziah's reign, early and late, are recorded in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel. ²⁷From the time that Amaziah turned from following the LORD, a conspiracy was formed against him in Jerusalem, and he fled to Lachish; but they sent men after him to Lachish and they put him to death there. ²⁸They brought his body back on horses and buried him with his fathers in the city of Judah.

26 Then all the people of Judah took Uzziah, who was sixteen years old, and proclaimed him king to succeed his father Amaziah. ²It was he who rebuilt Eloth and restored it to Judah after King [Amaziah] slept with his fathers.

³Uzziah was sixteen years old when he became king, and he reigned fifty-two years in Jerusalem; his mother's name was Jecoliah of Jerusalem. ⁴He did what was pleasing to the LORD just as his father Amaziah had done. ⁵He applied himself to the worship of God during the time of Zechariah, instructor in the visions^a of God; during the time he worshiped the LORD, God made him prosper. ⁶He went forth to fight the Philistines, and breached the wall of Gath and the wall of Jabneh and the wall of Ashdod; he built towns in [the region of] Ashdod and among the Philistines. ⁷God helped him against the Philistines, against the Arabs who lived in Gur-baal, and the Meunites. ⁸The Ammonites paid tribute to Uzziah, and his fame spread to the approaches of Egypt, for he grew exceedingly strong. ⁹Uzziah built towers in Jerusalem on the Corner Gate and the Valley Gate and on the Angle, and fortified them. ¹⁰He built towers in the wilderness and hewed out many cisterns, for he had much cattle, and farmers in the foothills and on the plain, and vine dressers in the mountains and on the fertile lands, for he loved the soil.

¹¹Uzziah had an army of warriors, a battle-ready force who were mustered by Jeiel the scribe and Maasseiah the 26.1–23: Uzziah's reign. The treatment of Uzziah's reign is divided into two parts: the king's lengthy reign and his affliction with skin disease. This division is an attempt to deal with the source material: 2 Kings 14.21–15.4 depict Uzziah in a positive fashion, while 15.5–7 describe his affliction. Perhaps using some additional sources, Chron. fills in both periods, and explains why the king is punished. 1–4: 2 Kings generally employs the name Azariah. This difference is explained either as a regnal, rather than personal, name; or, since the Heb roots “-z-z” (the root of Uzziah) and “-z-r” (the root of Azariah) both mean “strong,” as an interchangeable alternate form of the name. 5: Zechariah, not otherwise attested, may have appeared in an earlier source available to Chronicles. Some exegetes argued that he is synonymous with Azariah, the priest, of 26.17. 6–8: The literary features connecting these vv. with 25.20 have led some to doubt the historicity of 26.6–8; see above.

a Some Heb. mss. read byr't; compare ancient versions, “fear.”

adjutant under Hananiah, one of the king's officers.¹² The clan chiefs, valiants, totaled 2,600;¹³ under them was the trained army of 307,500, who made war with might and power to aid the king against the enemy.¹⁴ Uzziah provided them—the whole army—with shields and spears, and helmets and mail, and bows and slingstones.¹⁵ He made clever devices in Jerusalem, set on the towers and the corners, for shooting arrows and large stones. His fame spread far, for he was helped wonderfully, and he became strong.

¹⁶When he was strong, he grew so arrogant he acted corruptly: he trespassed against his God by entering the Temple of the LORD to offer incense on the incense altar.¹⁷ The priest Azariah, with eighty other brave priests of the LORD, followed him in¹⁸ and, confronting King Uzziah, said to him, "It is not for you, Uzziah, to offer incense to the LORD, but for the Aaronite priests, who have been consecrated, to offer incense. Get out of the Sanctuary, for you have trespassed; there will be no glory in it for you from the LORD God."¹⁹ Uzziah, holding the censer and ready to burn incense, got angry; but as he got angry with the priests, leprosy broke out on his forehead in front of the priests in the House of the LORD beside the incense altar.²⁰ When the chief priest Azariah and all the other priests looked at him, his forehead was leprosy, so they rushed him out of there; he too made haste to get out, for the LORD had struck him with a plague.²¹ King Uzziah was a leper until the day of his death. He lived in "isolated quarters"^a as a leper, for he was cut off from the House of the LORD—while Jotham his son was in charge of the king's house and governed the people of the land.

²²The other events of Uzziah's reign, early and late, were recorded by the prophet Isaiah son of Amoz.²³ Uzziah slept with his fathers in the burial field of the kings, because, they said, he was a leper; his son Jotham succeeded him as king.

27 Jotham was twenty-five years old when he became king, and he reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem; his mother's name was Jerushah daughter of Zadok.² He did what was pleasing to the LORD just as his father Uzziah had done, but he did not enter the Temple of the LORD; however, the people still acted corruptly.³ It was he who built the Upper Gate of the House of the LORD; he also built extensively on the wall of Ophel.⁴ He built towns in the hill country of Judah, and in the woods he built 18–19: The consequences of cultic infractions are severe. The punishment is equally severe, since this skin affliction (traditionally translated as leprosy, but actually relecting a range of skin lesions) renders the afflicted person so contaminated that he or she must dwell outside of the city (see Lev. 13.44–46). Another instance of retributive justice may be seen here: He who treads upon forbidden soil—the inner sanctum—is ultimately removed beyond the physical bounds of society (owing to skin disease). The theme of "trespass" (Heb "ma'al") recurs throughout the remainder of Chronicles. Some have noted similarities between this passage and the Korah rebellion of Num. ch 16. 23: Instead of 2 Kings 15.7, "in the City of David," Chronicles here reads in the burial field of the kings. A burial inscription was found in Jerusalem describing the transport of Uzziah's bones. No similar inscriptions have been found for other kings, suggesting that the tradition found here that Uzziah was not buried with his ancestors is accurate.

27.1–9: Jotham's reign. Jotham's reign is depicted in decidedly positive terms. His religious obedience brings prosperity; even the notice at 2 Kings 15.37 concerning the military campaign by Aram and the northern king Pekah are omitted here, being diverted to the reign of Ahaz. This contrasts markedly with the reign of his son, Ahaz, whom Chronicles portrays as wicked in the extreme (see ch 28). This pattern may reflect the influence of Ezek. ch 18. 3–4: Chronicles adds details to the terse description in 2 Kings 15.32–38.

a-a Meaning of Heb. uncertain.

fortresses and towers.⁵ Moreover, he fought with the king of the Ammonites and overcame them; the Ammonites gave him that year 100 talents of silver and 10,000 kor of wheat and another 10,000 of barley; that is what the Ammonites paid him, and [likewise] in the second and third years.⁶ Jotham was strong because he maintained a faithful course before the LORD his God.

⁷The other events of Jotham's reign, and all his battles and his conduct, are recorded in the book of the kings of Israel and Judah.⁸ He was twenty-five years old when he became king, and he reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem.⁹ Jotham slept with his fathers, and was buried in the City of David; his son Ahaz succeeded him as king.

28 Ahaz was twenty years old when he became king, and he reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem. He did not do what was pleasing to the LORD as his father David had done,² but followed the ways of the kings of Israel; he even made molten images for the Baals.³ He made offerings in the Valley of Ben-hinnom and burned his sons in fire, in the abhorrent fashion of the nations which the LORD had dispossessed before the Israelites.⁴ He sacrificed and made offerings at the shrines, on the hills, and under every leafy tree.⁵ The LORD his God delivered him over to the king of Aram, who defeated him and took many of his men captive, and brought them to Damascus. He was also delivered over to the king of Israel, who inflicted a great defeat on him.⁶ Pekah son of Remaliah killed 120,000 in Judah—all brave men—in one day, because they had forsaken the LORD God of their fathers.⁷ Zichri, the champion of Ephraim, killed Maaseiah the king's son, and Azrikam chief of the palace, and Elkanah, the second to the king.⁸ The Israelites captured 200,000 of their kinsmen, women, boys, and girls; they also took a large amount of booty from them and brought the booty to Samaria.

⁹A prophet of the LORD by the name of Oded was there, who went out to meet the army on its return to Samaria. He said to them, "Because of the fury of the LORD God of your fathers against Judah, He delivered them over to you, and you killed them in a rage that reached heaven.¹⁰ Do you now intend to subjugate the men and women of Judah and Jerusalem to be your slaves? As it is, you have nothing but offenses against the LORD your God.¹¹ Now then, listen to me, and send back the captives you have taken from your kinsmen, for the wrath of the LORD is upon you!"¹² Some of the chief men of the Ephraimites—Azariah son of Jehohanan, Berechiah son of Meshille-

5–9: The historicity of this campaign, not recorded elsewhere, is debated. Some scholars emend "Ammonites" to "Meunites" (see 20.1), believing that Jotham continued his father's policy (see 26.7).

28.1–27: Ahaz's reign. The low point of the preexilic Judahite monarchy. Besides the sharp contrast with his father, Ahaz's wickedness creates a foil for his son, Hezekiah, the most righteous of the post-Solomonic Davidides. In many ways, this reign marks a complete reversal of 2 Chron. ch 13 and the lessons of Chronicles' Abijah. Thus, the present ch portrays the northern tribes in a most positive light, including a (veracious) self-reckoning of their sinful ways (cf. 2 Chron. 13.4–12). Chronicles maintains that the Northern Kingdom fell to Assyria during this reign. This paves the way for a single sovereign (Hezekiah) to reunify Judah and the northern tribes, another key theme of 2 Chron. ch 13. 1–4: Ahaz's idolatrous ways are more pronounced than in 2 Kings 16.12–18; this leads to exile for much of the population. 5–7: Chronicles' description of the Syro-Ephraimite war differs from other biblical versions (2 Kings 15.37; 16.5; Isa. ch 7; Hos. 5.8–6.6). Chronicles probably draws on earlier sources, but formulates them in accordance with its overall depiction of Ahaz; cf. 2 Kings 16.5. 5: A complete reversal of 13.15–17. 6: While the numbers and time frame may reflect literary embellishment, the defeat of Judah is quite plausible; see 2 Kings 16.5, where the confederation puts Jerusalem to siege. 8–15: The names in v. 12, along with the (unexpected) mention of Jericho, further the likelihood that Chronicles has drawn on an earlier source. The description of the prophetic activity of Oded (v. 9) and its aftermath, however, comports with the theology of Chronicles and was likely composed for illustrative purposes, filling in gaps in the story line. 16–17: An Edomite attack is consistent with historical evidence of Edomite expansion at moth, Jehizkiah son of Shallum, and Amasa son of Hadlai—confronted those returning from the campaign¹³ and said to them, “Do not bring these captives here, for it would mean our offending the LORD, adding to our sins and our offenses; for our offense is grave enough, and there is already wrath upon Israel.”¹⁴ So the soldiers released the captives and the booty in the presence of the officers and all the congregation.¹⁵ Then the men named above proceeded to take the captives in hand, and with the booty they clothed all the naked among them—they clothed them and shod them and gave them to eat and drink and anointed them and provided donkeys for all who were failing and brought them to Jericho, the city of palms, back to their kinsmen. Then they returned to Samaria.

¹⁶ At that time, King Ahaz sent to the king of Assyria for help.¹⁷ Again the Edomites came and inflicted a defeat on Judah and took captives.¹⁸ And the Philistines made forays against the cities of the Shephelah and the Negeb of Judah; they seized Beth-shemesh and Aijalon and Gederoth, and Soco with its villages, and Timnah with its villages, and Gimzo with its villages; and they settled there.¹⁹ Thus the LORD brought Judah low on account of King Ahaz of Israel,^a for he threw off restraint in Judah and trespassed against the LORD.²⁰ Tillegath-pilneser, king of Assyria, marched against him and gave him trouble, instead of supporting him.²¹ For Ahaz plundered the House of the LORD and the house of the king and the officers, and made a gift to the king of Assyria—to no avail.

²² In his time of trouble, this King Ahaz trespassed even more against the LORD,²³ sacrificing to the gods of Damascus which had defeated him, for he thought, “The gods of the kings of Aram help them; I shall sacrifice to them and they will help me”; but they were his ruin and that of all Israel.²⁴ Ahaz collected the utensils of the House of God, and cut the utensils of the House of God to pieces. He shut the doors of the House of the LORD and made himself altars in every corner of Jerusalem.²⁵ In every town in Judah he set up shrines to make offerings to other gods, vexing the LORD God of his fathers.

²⁶ The other events of his reign and all his conduct, early and late, are recorded in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel.²⁷ Ahaz slept with his fathers and was buried in the city, in Jerusalem; his body was not brought to the tombs of the kings of Israel. His son Hezekiah succeeded him as king.

this time. 24–25: Chronicles repeats every to emphasize the extent of Ahaz’s cultic sins, which go beyond those attested in 2 Kings ch 16.

a Some mss. and ancient versions read “Judah.”

29 Hezekiah became king at the age of twenty-five, and he reigned twenty-nine years in Jerusalem; his mother's name was Abijah daughter of Zechariah. ²He did what was pleasing to the LORD, just as his father David had done.

³He, in the first month of the first year of his reign, opened the doors of the House of the LORD and repaired them. ⁴He summoned the priests and the Levites and assembled them in the east square. ⁵He said to them, "Listen to me, Levites! Sanctify yourselves and sanctify the House of the LORD God of your fathers, and take the abhorrent things out of the holy place. ⁶For our fathers trespassed and did what displeased the LORD our God; they forsook Him and turned their faces away from the dwelling-place of the LORD, turning their backs on it. ⁷They also shut the doors of the porch and put out the lights; they did not offer incense and did not make burnt offerings in the holy place to the God of Israel. ⁸The wrath of the LORD was upon Judah and Jerusalem; He made them an object of horror, amazement, and hissing^a as you see with your own eyes. ⁹Our fathers died by the sword, and our sons and daughters and wives are in captivity on account of this. ¹⁰Now I wish to make a covenant with the LORD God of Israel, so that His rage may be withdrawn from us. ¹¹Now, my sons, do not be slack, for the LORD chose you to attend upon Him, to serve Him, to be His ministers and to make offerings to Him."

¹²So the Levites set to—Mahath son of Amasai and Joel son of Azariah of the sons of Kohath; and of the sons of Merari, Kish son of Abdi and Azariah son of Jehallelel; and of the Gershonites, Joah son of Zimmah and Eden son of Joah; ¹³and of the sons of Elizaphan, Shimri and Jeiel; a See note at Jer. 18.16.

29.1–32.33: Hezekiah's reign.

Hezekiah is, after David and Solomon, the outstanding Judean monarch in Chronicles, equivalent in stature to Josiah in Kings. In addition to the bulk of material devoted to his reign, several features and lexical links suggest that Chronicles sought to portray him as a second Solomon or, possibly, a combination of David and Solomon. Most fundamentally, Hezekiah symbolizes the reunification of all Israel around the Jerusalem Temple, as in the days of David and Solomon. Other typological features will be noted below. The high esteem in which Hezekiah was held is reflected in the rabbinic statement that, despite some failings, he had been worthy to be Israel's messiah (b. Sanh. 94a). The key difference between Kings' treatment of Hezekiah and that of Chronicles is that while the former concentrates on Hezekiah's military and geopolitical engagements, especially with Assyria, the latter minimizes these in favor of Hezekiah's religious achievements. (This is reminiscent of Chronicles' treatment of David.)

Chronicles' treatment may be divided into two units. Chs 29–31 address Hezekiah's religious reforms, a topic that Kings treats in one v. The remaining ch, 32, is a condensed, and radically rewritten, description of the fortunes of the faithful king. The form Jehezekiah, Heb "Yehizkiyahu," (lit. "the LORD is strong") is the standard form in Chronicles—which, in fact, preserves almost all of the attestations of this form—whereas Kings prefers the shorter form Hezekiah (Heb "Hizkiyahu" [lit. "the LORD is my strength"]). Cuneiform evidence, which preserves the vocalization "ḥa-za-qi-ya-u" and similar formulations, indicates that the form preserved in Kings is older. The form in Chronicles fits patterns of names in later Heb, and is secondary.

29.1–26: Purging and rededication of the Temple. Aside from the first two vv., there is no extant source for this account; it is unclear if Chronicles has drawn on an independent source. The beginning of this ch, claiming that Hezekiah attended to the cultus immediately upon ascending the throne, together with its conclusion, are part of the Solomonic typology applied to Hezekiah. 3–11: Charge to the Levites. V. 3 contains two novel points. Chronicles claims that the king opened the doors to the Temple. No such datum appears in 2 Kings; the closest source is found at 2 Kings 18.16, though the reference there is quite different. (See also 2 Kings 16.18, in connection with Ahaz.) Second, Chronicles makes the highly improbable and tendentious claim that this action was undertaken during Hezekiah's first year—indeed, first day—of rule (see v. 17). Chronicles' date means that Hezekiah attended to the cult on the very day on which he ascended the throne and, moreover, that the priests gathered and sanctified themselves on this same day. Chronicles portrays Hezekiah as wasting no time in attending to cultic matters—a clear echo of David and Solomon. The first and of the sons of Asaph, Zechariah and Mattaniah;¹⁴ and of the sons of Heman, Jehiel and Shimei; and of the sons of Jeduthun, Shemaiah and Uzziel—¹⁵and, gathering their brothers, they sanctified themselves and came, by a command of the king concerning the LORD's ordinances, to purify the House of the LORD. ¹⁶The priests went into the House of the LORD to purify it, and brought all the unclean things they found in the Temple of the LORD out into the court of the House of the LORD; [there] the Levites received them, to take them outside to Wadi Kidron. ¹⁷They began the sanctification on the first day of the first month; on the eighth day of the month they reached the porch of the LORD. They sanctified the House of the LORD for eight days, and on the sixteenth day of the first month they finished. ¹⁸Then they went into the palace of King Hezekiah and said, "We have purified the whole House of the LORD and the altar of burnt offering and all its utensils, and the table of the bread of display and all its utensils; ¹⁹and all the utensils that King Ahaz had befouled during his reign, when he trespassed, we have made ready and sanctified. They are standing in front of the altar of the LORD."

²⁰King Hezekiah rose early, gathered the officers of the city, and went up to the House of the LORD. ²¹They brought seven bulls and seven rams and seven lambs and seven he-goats as a sin offering for the kingdom and for the Sanctuary and for Judah. He ordered the Aaronite priests to offer them on the altar of the LORD. ²²The cattle were slaughtered, and the priests received the blood and dashed it against the altar; the rams were slaughtered and the blood was dashed against the altar; the lambs were slaughtered and the blood was dashed against the altar. ²³The he-goats for the sin offering were presented to the king and the congregation, who laid their hands upon them. ²⁴The priests slaughtered them and performed the purification rite with the blood against the altar, to expiate for all Israel, for the king had designated the burnt offering and the sin offering to be for all Israel. ²⁵He stationed the Levites in the House of the LORD with cymbals and harps and lyres, as David and Gad the king's seer and Nathan the prophet had ordained, for the ordinance was by the LORD through His prophets.

²⁶When the Levites were in place with the instruments of David, and the priests with their trumpets, ²⁷Hezekiah gave the order to offer the burnt offering on the altar. When the burnt offering began, the song of the LORD and the trumpets began also, together with the instruments of King David of Israel. ²⁸All the congregation prostrated themselves, the song was sung and the trumpets were month of the Heb year (roughly April) marks not only the renewal of the festal cycle but, according to Exod. ch 40, also the time when Moses' Tabernacle was erected; thus, typologically, Hezekiah is depicted as a new Moses. 4–6: The only sin cited in v. 6 is rejection of the cultus (not idolatry), succinctly expressing the central role of the cultus in Chronicles. 12–14: The fourteen Levites fall into two groups. The first eight consist of Kohathî, Merari, Gershon, and Elizaphan; a similar ordering appears at 1 Chron. 15.5–6. The second group consists of Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun; this grouping appears in 1 Chron. chs 15–16 and 25.1. The message here is that all Levitic clans responded with equal alacrity. 16: Informed by Torah law, Chronicles emphasizes that the innermost Temple precincts were accessible only to priests; Levites served in the other precincts. 17: Completion of the Temple purification on the eighth day (of the first month) is unmistakably reminiscent of Exod. 40.17, which, together with Lev. 8.33–9.24, indicates that the Tabernacle dedication ceremonies lasted eight days. 18–29: Chronicles' description of the purification and rededication reflects the terminology of the Priestly source. 21: This evokes the Tabernacle dedication ceremony of Num. 7.9ff. A similar arrangement of cultic offerings appears at Ezra 8.35, which also echoes Num. ch 7 (see b. Menahî. 45a); see v. 31, below. 24: This may contain an allusion to the ordination rites of Exod. 29.12, 36–37. All Israel may refer to those exiled as well as those remaining in the land, or may indicate that the king made the offerings on behalf of a wider group than that envisaged by the priests and Levites above. The reference to the cultic vessels here, following their desecration by Ahaz (28.24), may allude to the pristine conditions of Solomon's reign. 25–30: Hezekiah's reestablishment of the choral rite casts him as a second David, who was, according to Chronicles, the composer of psalms and the fashioner blown—all this until the end of the burnt offering. ²⁹When the offering was finished, the king and all who were there with him knelt and prostrated themselves. ³⁰King Hezekiah and the officers ordered the Levites to praise the LORD in the words of David and Asaph the seer; so they praised rapturously, and they bowed and prostrated themselves.

³¹Then Hezekiah said, “Now you have consecrated yourselves to the LORD; come, bring sacrifices of well-being and thanksgiving to the House of the LORD.” The congregation brought sacrifices of well-being and thanksgiving, and all who felt so moved brought burnt offerings. ³²The number of burnt offerings that the congregation of musical instruments employed in the Temple. 31: The reference to “consecration” and all who felt so moved (lit. “those of a generous heart”) echoes the Tabernacle project; see Exod. 36.3–7. 34: The author treats the Levites preferentially. 36: As with David (1 Chron. 29.9), cultic activity is synonymous with joy.

30.1–27: Celebration of the Passover festival. The historicity of this ch, along with its literary development, is much debated. Some scholars maintain that Chronicles brought was 70 cattle, 100 rams, 200 lambs—all these for burnt offerings to the LORD.³³ The sacred offerings were 600 large cattle and 3,000 small cattle.³⁴ The priests were too few to be able to flay all the burnt offerings, so their kinsmen, the Levites, reinforced them till the end of the work, and till the [rest of the] priests sanctified themselves. (The Levites were more conscientious about sanctifying themselves than the priests.)³⁵ For beside the large number of burnt offerings, there were the fat parts of the sacrifices of well-being and the libations for the burnt offerings; so the service of the House of the LORD was properly accomplished.³⁶ Hezekiah and all the people rejoiced over what God had enabled the people to accomplish, because it had happened so suddenly.

Assyria and Israel and Judah in the book of Chronicles

30 Hezekiah sent word to all Israel and Judah; he also wrote letters to Ephraim and Manasseh to come to the House of the LORD in Jerusalem to keep the Passover for the LORD God of Israel.² The king and his officers and the congregation in Jerusalem had agreed to keep the Passover in the second month,³ for at the time, they were unable to keep it,^a for not enough priests had sanctified themselves, nor had the people assembled in Jerusalem.⁴ The king and the whole congregation thought it proper⁵ to issue a decree and proclaim throughout all Israel from Beer-sheba to Dan that they come and keep the Passover for the LORD God of Israel in Jerusalem—not often did they act in accord with what was written.⁶ The couriers went out with the letters from the king and his officers through all Israel and Judah, by order of the king, proclaiming, “O you Israelites! Return to the LORD God of your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, and He will return to the remnant of you who escaped from the hand of the kings of Assyria.⁷ Do not be like your fathers and brothers who trespassed against the LORD God of their fathers and He turned them into a horror, as you see.⁸ Now do not be stiffnecked like your fathers; submit yourselves to the LORD and come to His sanctuary, which He consecrated forever, and serve the LORD your God so that His anger may turn back from you.⁹ If you return to the LORD, your brothers and children will be regarded with compassion by their captors, and will return to this land; for the LORD your God is gracious and merciful; He will not turn His face from you if you return to Him.”

¹⁰ As the couriers passed from town to town in the land of Ephraim and Manasseh till they reached Zebulun, they has drawn upon earlier sources, based on the anomalous date and duration of the festival, along with various other details, which would hardly have been concocted by Chronicles, for whom proper cultic procedure was paramount. Some argue that Chronicles reflects a pre-Priestly tradition of the Unleavened Bread festival, as preserved in Exod. 34.18. Others view the ch as Chronicles' creation, which combines the Unleavened Bread festival with the Passover feast; this reflects Deuteronomic (hence, Josianic) influence. Accordingly, Chronicles' version cannot be historical; it is intended to highlight the cultus as observed in the postexilic era, and Hezekiah's status (cf. Chronicles' treatment of Josiah, below). Chronicles' pan-Israel orientation is evident at several points in the episode. While scholars disagree on the historicity of Hezekiah's attempt to unite north and south at this juncture, as well, there is good reason to accept this depiction. First, the Assyrians, following their conquest of the northern tribes, were occupied for a short period with other matters, thus creating a window for Hezekiah's expansion. Second, Hezekiah's son is named Manasseh; this name, together with the name Ephraim, forms a recurring pair which together connote the confederation of northern tribes in Chronicles. 1–3: In addition to expressing Chronicles' pan-Israel view, this passage also conveys the importance of the cultus. The inclusion of all segments of the population in the decision-making process is typical of upright “democratic” kings; see 1 Chron. 13.1. 1: Sent word: The use of letters for royal proclamations reflects the practice of the Persian period, and is thus anachronistic here. 5: From Beer-sheba to Dan, i.e., the full expanse of Israelite settlement in the ancestral land; this is consonant with Chronicles' view of the ongoing Israelite presence in the land. 6: Measure-for-measure reward is expressed: If the people return to the LORD . . . He will return to the remnant. V. 9 continues this motif a i.e., on its proper date; cf. Num. 9.1–14.

were laughed at and mocked. ¹¹Some of the people of Asher and Manasseh and Zebulun, however, were contrite, and came to Jerusalem. ¹²The hand of God was on Judah, too, making them of a single mind to carry out the command of the king and officers concerning the ordinance of the LORD. ¹³A great crowd assembled at Jerusalem to keep the Feast of Unleavened Bread in the second month, a very great congregation. ¹⁴They set to and removed the altars that were in Jerusalem, and they removed all the incense stands and threw them into Wadi Kidron. ¹⁵They slaughtered the paschal sacrifice on the fourteenth of the second month. The priests and Levites were ashamed, and they sanctified themselves and brought burnt offerings to the House of the LORD. ¹⁶They took their stations, as was their rule according to the Teaching of Moses, man of God. The priests dashed the blood [which they received] from the Levites. ¹⁷Since many in the congregation had not sanctified themselves, the Levites were in charge of slaughtering the paschal sacrifice for everyone who was not clean, so as to consecrate them to the LORD. ¹⁸For most of the people—many from Ephraim and Manasseh, Issachar and Zebulun—had not purified themselves, yet they ate the paschal sacrifice in violation of what was written. Hezekiah prayed for them, saying, “The good LORD will provide atonement for ¹⁹everyone who set his mind on worshiping God, the LORD God of his fathers, even if he is not purified for the sanctuary.” ²⁰The LORD heard Hezekiah and healed the people.

²¹The Israelites who were in Jerusalem kept the Feast of Unleavened Bread seven days, with great rejoicing, the Levites and the priests praising the LORD daily with powerful instruments for the LORD. ²²Hezekiah persuaded all the Levites who performed skillfully for the LORD to spend the seven days of the festival making offerings of well-being, and confessing to the LORD God of their fathers. ²³All the congregation resolved to keep seven more days, so they kept seven more days of rejoicing. ²⁴King Hezekiah of Judah contributed to the congregation 1,000 bulls and 7,000 sheep. And the officers contributed to the congregation 1,000 bulls and 10,000 sheep. And the priests sanctified themselves in large numbers. ²⁵All the congregation of Judah and the priests and the Levites and all the congregation that came from Israel, and the resident aliens who came from the land of Israel and who lived in Judah, rejoiced. ²⁶There was great rejoicing in Jerusalem, for since the time of King Solomon son of David of Israel nothing like it had happened in Jerusalem. ²⁷The Levite priests rose with a slight twist: The captives will be returned to the land.

18–20: This is a remarkable deviation from Priestly norms, which are punctilious concerning matters of ritual purity. Sincere prayer from a righteous king (v. 20) trumps typical concerns. 21: Some exegetes take the words kept the Feast . . . seven days as an ellipsis for “consumed the festal offerings.” 23: Note the popular nature of this decision. 24–26: The celebration of the festival in the second month (see v. 13), contrary to the first month legislated in Torah sources (e.g., Exod. 12.2–3; Deut. 16.1–8) is explained by some as reflecting a northern calendar, which lagged behind the Judahite calendar by one month. Others explain Chronicles as applying to the community the legislation concerning an individual in Num. 9.6–12, which addresses the “Second Passover,” i.e., the paschal sacrifice offered by those unable to participate in the regular paschal offering due to ritual impurity or other legitimate reasons; see t. Pisha 8.4, where this point is debated. Some rabbinic sources (m. Pes. 4.9; t. Pisha 8.5) explain Hezekiah’s controversial move as based on intercalation, in which an additional (i.e., thirteenth) month is added to the concluding year; thus he did not really change the month of the festival. Some Israelites accepted Hezekiah’s intercalation, while others did not, and so refrained from participating. 25: The reference to resident aliens recalls Num. 9.14; some medieval exegetes (Gersonides, pseudo-Rashi) averred that aliens refers to northerners who had relocated in Judah. The reference to Solomon’s period is a clear example of Chronicles’ Solomon typology (see 29.1–32.33).

and blessed the people, and their voice was heard, and their prayer went up to His holy abode, to heaven.

31 When all this was finished, all Israel who were present went out into the towns of Judah and smashed the pillars, cut down the sacred posts, demolished the shrines and altars throughout Judah and Benjamin, and throughout Ephraim and Manasseh, to the very last one. Then all the Israelites returned to their towns, each to his possession.

²Hezekiah reconstituted the divisions of the priests and Levites, each man of the priests and Levites according to his office, for the burnt offerings, the offerings of well-being, to minister, and to sing hymns and praises in the gates of the courts of the LORD; ³also the king's portion, from his property, for the burnt offerings—the morning and evening burnt offering, and the burnt offerings for sabbaths, and new moons, and festivals, as prescribed in the Teaching of the LORD.

⁴He ordered the people, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, to deliver the portions of the priests and the Levites, so that they might devote themselves to the Teaching of the LORD. ⁵When the word spread, the Israelites brought large quantities of grain, wine, oil, honey, and all kinds of agricultural produce, and tithes of all, in large amounts. ⁶The men of Israel and Judah living in the towns of Judah—they too brought tithes of cattle and sheep and tithes of sacred things consecrated to the LORD their God, piling them in heaps. ⁷In the third month the heaps began to accumulate, and were finished in the seventh month. ⁸When Hezekiah and the officers came and saw the heaps, they blessed the LORD and his people Israel. ⁹Hezekiah asked the priests and Levites about the heaps. ¹⁰The chief priest Azariah, of the house of Zadok, replied to him, saying, "Ever since the gifts began to be brought to the House of the LORD, people have been eating to satiety and leaving over in great amounts, for the LORD has blessed His people; this huge amount is left over!" ¹¹Hezekiah then gave orders to prepare store-chambers in the House of the LORD; and they were prepared. ¹²They brought in the gifts and the tithes and the sacred things faithfully. Their supervisor was Conaniah the Levite, and Shimei his brother was second in rank. ¹³Jehiel and Azaziah and Nathath and Asahel and Jerimoth and Jozabad and Eliel and Ismachiah and Mahath and Benaiah were commissioners under Conaniah and Shimei his brother by appointment of King Hezekiah; Azariah was supervisor of the House of God. ¹⁴Kore son of Imnah the Levite, the keeper of the 31.1–21: Cultic arrangements. The cultic reform is executed by the entire population, both Judah and the northern regions. The overwhelming response of the people indicates the nation's worthy and upright nature. This state of affairs offers a theological explanation for the miraculous deliverance depicted in the following ch. This is summarized in the ch's final verse, which emphasizes that "he prospered" because of his concern for the Temple and for the "torah" (Teaching).

East Gate, was in charge of the freewill offerings to God, of the allocation of gifts to the LORD, and the most sacred things. ¹⁵Under him were Eden, Miniamin, Jeshua, She-maiah, Amariah, and Shecaniah, in offices of trust in the priestly towns, making allocation to their brothers by divisions, to great and small alike; ¹⁶besides allocating their daily rations to those males registered by families from three years old and up, all who entered the House of the LORD according to their service and their shift by division; ¹⁷and in charge of the registry of priests by clans, and of the Levites, from twenty years old and up, by shifts, in their divisions; ¹⁸and the registry of the dependents of their whole company—wives, sons, and daughters—for, relying upon them, they sanctified themselves in holiness. ¹⁹And for the Aaronite priests, in each and every one of their towns with adjoining fields, the above-named men were to allocate portions to every male of the priests and to every registered Levite. ²⁰Hezekiah did this throughout Judah. He acted in a way that was good, upright, and faithful before the LORD his God. ²¹Every work he undertook in the service of the House of God or in the Teaching and the Commandment, to worship his God, he did with all his heart; and he prospered.

32^aAfter these faithful deeds, King Sennacherib of Assyria invaded Judah and encamped against its fortified towns with the aim of taking them over. ²When Hezekiah saw that Sennacherib had come, intent on making war against Jerusalem, ³he consulted with his officers and warriors about stopping the flow of the springs outside the city, and they supported him. ⁴A large force was assembled to stop up all the springs and the wadi that flowed through the land, for otherwise, they thought, the king of Assyria would come and find water in abundance. ⁵He acted with vigor, rebuilding the whole breached wall, raising towers on it, and building another wall outside it. He fortified the Millo of the City of David, and made a great quantity of arms and shields. ⁶He appointed battle officers over the people; then, gathering them to him in the square of the city gate, he rallied them, saying, ⁷“Be strong and of good courage; do not be frightened or dismayed by the king of Assyria or by the horde that is with him, for we have more with us than he has with him. ⁸With him is an arm of flesh, but with us is the LORD our God, to help us and to fight our battles.” The people were encouraged by the speech of King Hezekiah of Judah.

^a Cf. 2 Kings 18–20; Isa. 36–39.

32.1–33: Assyrian invasion and Hezekiah’s faithfulness. A highly revised version of 2 Kings chs 18–19 and Isa. chs 36–39. The negative features of Hezekiah’s conduct, e.g., pride and removal of Temple vessels, surrender to the Assyrians, are omitted. Similarly, Hezekiah’s military preparations, severely criticized by Isaiah, are here presented as being accompanied by the king’s hortatory speech stressing trust in the LORD; this results in a positive assessment of Hezekiah’s preparations. In v. 1, Chronicles omits the reference in 2 Kings 18.4 to the bronze serpent fashioned by Moses—which later became a source of cultic offense—presumably out of respect for Moses and Mosaic law. 1–6: 2 Kings 18.13 and Isa. 36.1 state that Sennacherib’s invasion took place in the fourteenth year and that the Assyrians managed to capture (many of) the cities of Judah, but not Jerusalem (see v. 10 n.). Chronicles omits the date; in its place it employs a connective link, after these faithful deeds, whose function is to explain theologically the reason for the Assyrians’ defeat. The invasion by a foreign army at this juncture would appear to undermine Chronicles’ strict view of retribution. This passage’s purpose may be to teach what should be the proper response to “trials”: Trust and piety are more potent than military might. Cf. 14.9–15. 3: The democratization principle at work. Rabbinic sources differ over the propriety of the decision to stop the springs: m. Pes. 4.9 expresses criticism, while ’Avot R. Nat. A, 2, informed by v. 30, below, lauds the move (see, also, Pirqe R. El. 9). 7–8: The words be strong and of good courage are highly reminiscent of David and Solomon; see 1 Chron. 22.13. These vv. are a potent expression of one of Chronicles’ main themes, a theme that would have resonated deeply with his audience in the postexilic period, when Israel lacked military power. 10: As noted above, some understand Chronicles’ text to mean that the Assyrian forces did ⁹Afterward, King Sennacherib of Assyria sent his officers to Jerusalem—he and all his staff being at Lachish—with this message to King Hezekiah of Judah and to all the people of Judah who were in Jerusalem: ¹⁰“Thus said King Sennacherib of Assyria: On what do you trust to enable you to endure a siege in Jerusalem? ¹¹Hezekiah is seducing you to a death of hunger and thirst, saying, ‘The LORD our God will save us from the king of Assyria.’ ¹²But is not Hezekiah the one who removed His shrines and His altars and commanded the people of Judah and Jerusalem saying, ‘Before this one altar you shall prostrate yourselves, and upon it make your burnt offerings’? ¹³Surely you know what I and my fathers have done to the peoples of the lands? Were the gods of the nations of the lands able to save their lands from me? ¹⁴Which of all the gods of any of those nations whom my fathers destroyed was able to save his people from me, that your God should be able to save you from me? ¹⁵Now then, do not let Hezekiah delude you; do not let him seduce you in this way; do not believe him. For no god of any nation or kingdom has been able to save his people from me or from my fathers—much less your God, to save you from me!” ¹⁶His officers said still more things against the LORD God and against His servant Hezekiah. ¹⁷He also wrote letters reviling the LORD God of Israel, saying of Him, “Just as the gods of the other nations of the earth did not save their people from me, so the God of Hezekiah will not save his people from me.” ¹⁸They called loudly in the language of Judah to the people of Jerusalem who were on the wall, to frighten them into panic, so as to capture the city. ¹⁹They spoke of the God of Jerusalem as though He were like the gods of the other peoples of the earth, made by human hands. ²⁰Then King Hezekiah and the prophet Isaiah son of Amoz prayed about this, and cried out to heaven.

²¹The LORD sent an angel who annihilated every mighty warrior, commander, and officer in the army of the king of Assyria, and he returned in disgrace to his land. He entered the house of his god, and there some of his own offspring struck him down by the sword. ²²Thus the LORD delivered Hezekiah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem from King Sennacherib of Assyria, and from everyone; He provided for them on all sides. ²³Many brought tribute to the LORD to Jerusalem, and gifts to King Hezekiah of Judah; thereafter he was exalted in the eyes of all the nations.

²⁴At that time, Hezekiah fell deathly sick. He prayed to the LORD, who responded to him and gave him a sign. ²⁵Hezekiah made no return for what had been bestowed not reach Jerusalem, a position which comports with 2 Kings 19.32–33 (= Isa. 37.33–34). This v., however, does suggest that Jerusalem was under siege. Chronicles’ depiction thus magnifies the miracle of Jerusalem’s remaining unharmed. Extrabiblical data supports the historicity of a limited Jerusalem siege. 19: An added summary v., accusing Sennacherib and his officials of blasphemy, thus justifying their defeat. 20: Chronicles conflates 2 Kings 19.2–4 and 19.14, while omitting the specific content of Hezekiah’s prayer and Isaiah’s message at 2 Kings 19.15–33. Chronicles also omits 2 Kings 19.34, which implies that Hezekiah’s own merit would not have sufficed to save Jerusalem and its environs. 21–23: The LORD provided for them (the people) and exalted Hezekiah in the eyes of all the nations, acts that are reminiscent of Jehoshaphat and especially Solomon (1 Chron. 22.9) and David (1 Chron. 14.17). The stark contrast between Hezekiah’s fate and that of Sennacherib could hardly be clearer: One is exalted in the eyes of the entire world, the other is murdered by his own offspring. 24–26: This passage contains but a fleeting allusion to 2 Kings 20.1–11, which states that Hezekiah, stricken by illness, beseeched the LORD; he requested and was shown a portent signaling his recovery, and his life is extended by fifteen years. Chronicles’ omission of the substance of this passage may indicate that Chronicles viewed Hezekiah’s request for an explicit sign as indicating less than full trust in the prophetic word (2 Kings 20.8). Also, Hezekiah’s petition contains self-descriptions that do not reflect the submissive stance that Chronicles requires. 25–26: This may reflect an understanding of the previously narrated siege of Jerusalem as punishment for Hezekiah’s arrogance, but as a result of proper penitence, the siege was not successful.

upon him, for he grew arrogant; so wrath was decreed for him and for Judah and Jerusalem.²⁶ Then Hezekiah humbled himself where he had been arrogant, he and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and no wrath of the LORD came on them during the reign of Hezekiah.²⁷ Hezekiah enjoyed riches and glory in abundance; he filled treasuries with silver and gold, precious stones, spices, shields, and all lovely objects;²⁸ and store-cities with the produce of grain, wine, and oil, and stalls for all kinds of beasts, and flocks for sheepfolds.²⁹ And he acquired towns, and flocks of small and large cattle in great number, for God endowed him with very many possessions.³⁰ It was Hezekiah who stopped up the spring of water of Upper Gihon, leading it downward west of the City of David; Hezekiah prospered in all that he did.³¹ So too in the matter of the ambassadors of the princes of Babylon, who were sent to him to inquire about the sign that was in the land, when God forsook him in order to test him, to learn all that was in his mind.

³²The other events of Hezekiah's reign, and his faithful acts, are recorded in the visions of the prophet Isaiah son

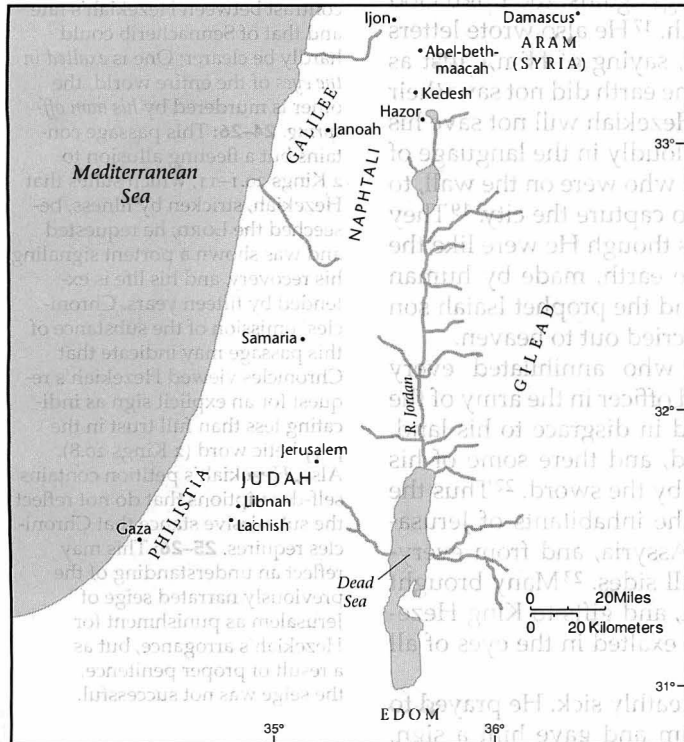

27–29: Solomon typology: great wealth and honor. Chronicles' text presupposes the reader's familiarity with 1 Kings 1–2 Kings 19.

30: This action guaranteed a constant water supply for Jerusalem. This may refer to the construction of the Siloam tunnel, though the inscription from the middle of that tunnel does not mention any king by name. See v. 3 n.

31: Chronicles radically transforms 2 Kings 20.12–19. The entire episode is a test of Hezekiah's faith, made necessary by his faltering and repentance in vv. 25–26. Hezekiah's successful performance may have been suggested by the account of Hezekiah's confession at 2 Kings 20.19. 32: Chronicles' note that the people accorded him much honor is unique to Hezekiah—he is exceptional even at his death.

33.1–20: Manasseh's reign.

Chronicles' presentation of Manasseh is the subject of widely divergent views. Some maintain that vv. 11–19, the story of Manasseh's captivity and repentance, are the creation of Chronicles, intended to resolve the theological difficulties engendered by the Kings version. The portrayal of this monarch in 2 Kings ch 21 is unambiguously negative. He exceeded all previous Judahite kings (and the kings who lived in the land before Israel came there, as well) in his wickedness. His fostering of idolatry is cited as the reason for the ultimate destruction of Jerusalem (2 Kings 21.12–16; 24.3). Chronicles knows none of this. Chronicles' radical revision is generally explained as reflecting the author's theological stance; his view on retribution left no room for the notion that the most wicked of kings managed to rule longer than any other monarch—and, apparently, enjoyed a peaceful life, to boot!—or that Manasseh's egregious sins could be visited upon a later generation. Hence, Chronicles simply had to delete these troublesome issues, while creating a much more positive image of the king. According to others, however, Chronicles' portrayal is to be explained on the of Amoz and in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel. ³³Hezekiah slept with his fathers, and was buried on the upper part of the tombs of the sons of David. When he died, all the people of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem accorded him much honor. Manasseh, his son, succeeded him.

Places associated with Sennacherib's invasion of Judah

33^aManasseh was twelve years old when he became king, and he reigned fifty-five years in Jerusalem. ²He did what was displeasing to the LORD, following the abhorrent practices of the nations that the LORD had dispossessed before the Israelites. ³He rebuilt the shrines that his father Hezekiah had demolished; he erected altars for the Baals and made sacred posts. He bowed down to all the host of heaven and worshiped them, ⁴and he built altars [to them] in the House of the LORD, of which the LORD had said, "My name will be in Jerusalem forever." ⁵He built altars for all the host of heaven in the two courts of the House of the LORD. ⁶He consigned his sons to the fire in the Valley of Ben-hinnom, and he practiced soothsaying, divination, and sorcery, and consulted ghosts and familiar spirits; he did much that was displeasing to the LORD in order to vex Him. ⁷He placed a sculptured image that he made in the House of God, of which God had said to David and to his son Solomon, "In this House and in Jerusalem, which I chose out of all the tribes of Israel, I will establish My name forever. ⁸And I will never again remove the feet of Israel from the land that I assigned to their fathers, if only they observe faithfully all that I have commanded them—all the teaching and the laws and the rules given by Moses." ⁹Manasseh led Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem astray into evil greater than that done by the nations that the LORD had destroyed before the Israelites.

¹⁰The LORD spoke to Manasseh and his people, but they would not pay heed, ¹¹so the LORD brought against them the officers of the army of the king of Assyria, who took

a Cf. 2 Kings 21.

basis of divine compassion, which allows even the most wicked of individuals to repent and start anew (see introduction). Later Jewish tradition understood the two accounts as complementary. See vv. 10–13 n. 1–6: Unlike 2 Kings 21.16, Chronicles refers only to cultic offenses, and makes no reference to Manasseh's execution of innocents. (Rabbinic sources [y. Sanh. 10.2; b. Yebam. 49b] state that, in addition to the offenses cited herein and at 2 Kings ch 21, Manasseh had the prophet Isaiah killed.) Chronicles' reticence may reflect its highlighting of cultic issues; it may also reflect discomfort with the notion that a Davidic monarch guilty of executing many innocents could be forgiven so easily and continue his rule as a leading proponent of religious fidelity. 6: Chronicles enlarges Kings' sin by changing "his son" to his sons; either is a violation of Deut. 18.10–13. 7: Manasseh places the forms in the very Temple wherein the LORD has "placed" his name. 9: Chronicles states that Manasseh and the people at large were guilty of foreign worship. Accordingly, both the king and the people are the object of the Assyrian assault. 10–13: Some scholars view the story of Manasseh's exile as wholly artificial, while others accept the story's historicity, suggesting that it transpired between 677 and 648 BCE. The "true" reason for his presence in the Assyrian court is also debated, with some arguing that, in fact, Manasseh actually came to proclaim his fidelity to the throne. Whether true or not, the style of these vv., which ignore any attention to geopolitical and military details (e.g., who governed Judah in Manasseh's absence), is typical of Chronicles' one-dimensional perspective, which emphasizes only religious/theological factors. Finally, Chronicles implies that the people of Judah were not punished, despite their role in the foreign worship. It is possible that their eventual return to proper religious worship atoned for their misdeeds; cf. 2 Chron. 12.12. Chronicles' terse formulation of Manasseh's prayer and contrition, along with his seemingly immediate pardon, was problematic for Jews in antiquity. LXX traditions preserve an apocryphal "prayer of Manasseh"; the Dead Sea Scrolls preserve a different prayer attributed to him (4Q381). A rabbinic tradition states that Moses had prayed that Manasseh's prayer be accepted (Sifre Deut. 348). Similarly, rabbinic (and early Christian) sources attempt to explain the means by which Manasseh (miraculously) managed to return to Jerusalem. 11: The detail that Manasseh was led off to Babylon by the Assyrian king is impossible; the Assyrian king would have led him to an Assyrian rather Manasseh captive in manacles, bound him in fetters, and led him off to Babylon. ¹²In his distress, he entreated the LORD his God and humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers. ¹³He prayed to Him, and He granted his prayer, heard his plea, and returned him to Jerusalem to his kingdom. Then Manasseh knew that the LORD alone was God. ¹⁴Afterward he built the outer wall of the City of David west of Gihon in the wadi on the way to the Fish Gate, and it encircled Ophel; he raised it very high. He also placed army officers in all the fortified towns of Judah. ¹⁵He removed the foreign gods and the image from the House of the LORD, as well as all the altars that he had built on the Mount of the House of the LORD and in Jerusalem, and dumped them outside the city. ¹⁶He rebuilt the altar of the LORD and offered on it sacrifices of well-being and thanksgiving, and commanded the people of Judah to worship the LORD God of Israel. ¹⁷To be sure, the people continued sacrificing at the shrines, but only to the LORD their God.

¹⁸The other events of Manasseh's reign, and his prayer to his God, and the words of the seers who spoke to him in the name of the LORD God of Israel are found in the chronicles of the kings of Israel. ¹⁹His prayer and how it was granted to him, the whole account of his sin and trespass, and the places in which he built shrines and installed sacred posts and images before he humbled himself are recorded in the words of Hozai.^a ²⁰Manasseh slept with his fathers and was buried on his palace grounds; his son Amon succeeded him as king.

²¹Amon was twenty-two years old when he became king, and he reigned two years in Jerusalem. ²²He did what was displeasing to the LORD, as his father Manasseh had done. Amon sacrificed to all the idols that his father Manasseh had made and worshiped them. ²³He did not humble himself before the LORD, as his father Manasseh had humbled himself; instead, Amon incurred much guilt. ²⁴His courtiers conspired against him and killed him in his palace. ²⁵But the people of the land struck down all who had conspired against King Amon; and the people of the land made his son Josiah king in his stead.

34 ¹Josiah was eight years old when he became king, and he reigned thirty-one years in Jerusalem. ²He did what was pleasing to the LORD, following the ways of his father David without deviating to the right or to the left. ³In the eighth year of his reign, while he was still than a Babylonian city. Some scholars therefore view the text symbolically, with Manasseh prefiguring the later exile of the Judeans to Babylonia. The story thus emphasizes the efficacy of repentance, for even the wicked Manasseh is returned to Judah after he is contrite. 14–17: Signs of divine favor and monarchical success; see 2 Chron. 8.3–8; 11.5–12. 18: Chronicles emphasizes the point that Manasseh had been forewarned by the LORD's messengers; hence, his failure to heed them justified his punishment. The claim that explicit warning is a sine qua non for punishment is seen by many scholars as a forerunner of the rabbinic view that courts may punish offenders only if the latter had been warned of the sinful nature of their actions prior to commission of their offense. More likely, Chronicles' position may be viewed as part of its notion of divine grace (see introduction). 19–20: Chronicles' omission of Manasseh's culpability in Judah's exile demands an alternate explanation or justification for this national catastrophe. Chronicles addresses this point in ch 36.

33.21–25: Amon's reign. Humbling oneself (or not; see 1 Kings 21.29) is the theme that emphasizes the fundamental difference between Amon and Manasseh: Amon is killed in his palace, whereas Manasseh enjoyed an honorable burial in the same place. These vv. imply a retributive punishment.

34.1–35.27: Josiah's reign. Although Chronicles incorporates much material here from Kings, its depiction of Josiah differs in significant ways, both in detail and in overall assessment. Kings claims that Josiah ascended the throne at age eight; discovery of the "scroll" took place ten years later and was followed by Josiah's cultic and religious reforms, which were undertaken in response to the warnings of divine wrath and punishment that Josiah found in the discovered scroll. Chronicles, young, he began to seek the God of his father David, and in the twelfth year he began to purge Judah and Jerusalem of the shrines, the sacred posts, the idols, and the molten images. ⁴At his bidding, they demolished the altars of the Baals, and he had the incense stands above them cut down; he smashed the sacred posts, the idols, and the images, ground them into dust, and strewed it onto the graves of those who had sacrificed to them. ⁵He burned the bones of priests on their altars and purged Judah and Jerusalem. ⁶In the towns of Manasseh and Ephraim and Simeon, as far as Naphtali, [lying] in ruins on every side, ⁷he demolished the altars and the sacred posts and smashed the idols and ground them into dust; and he hewed down all the incense stands throughout the land of Israel. Then he returned to Jerusalem.

^a Or "seers." ^b Cf. 2 Kings 22; 23.1–20.

⁸In the eighteenth year of his reign, after purging the land and the House, he commissioned Shaphan son of Azaliah, Maaseiah the governor of the city, and Joah son of Joahaz the recorder to repair the House of the LORD his God. ⁹They came to the high priest Hilkiyah and delivered to him the silver brought to the House of God, which the Levites, the guards of the threshold, had collected from Manasseh and Ephraim and from all the remnant of Israel and from all Judah and Benjamin and ^athe inhabitants of Jerusalem.^a ¹⁰They delivered it into the custody of the overseers who were in charge at the House of the LORD, and the overseers who worked in the House of the LORD spent it on examining and repairing the House. ¹¹They paid it out to the artisans and the masons to buy quarried stone and wood for the couplings and for making roof-beams for the buildings that the kings of Judah had allowed to fall into ruin. ¹²The men did the work honestly; over them were appointed the Levites Jahath and Obadiah, of the sons of Merari, and Zechariah and Meshul-

a-a With kethib and ancient versions; qere, "they returned to Jerusalem."

however, offers a different chronology, portraying Josiah as having sought the LORD at the age of sixteen, while he was still young, and undertaking cultic purification at the age of twenty, prior to the discovery of the (missing) scroll. This version creates a more flattering image of this righteous king, employing motifs familiar from the David, Solomon, and Hezekiah episodes. Some scholars, in support of Chronicles' version, argue that the prophets Zephaniah and Jeremiah exerted influence on Josiah before 621 BCE, the year in which the scroll was found. Others have attempted to correlate each step of Josiah's reform in Chronicles with a corresponding wane in Assyrian influence. No consensus exists as to which version is more reliable, and whether or not Chronicles has rearranged these events for theological reasons. Chronicles' enhanced image of much of Josiah's reign highlights the ultimately less than positive assessment of Josiah, as indicated by Chronicles' description of his death. Overall, Chronicles' Josiah is a less significant monarch than Kings' Josiah. Whereas Josiah is the leading monarch in Kings, in Chronicles it is Hezekiah.

34.3: The eighth year of his reign, i.e., when Josiah was sixteen years of age. Some premodern commentators (Josephus, Ant.; Radak) maintain that Josiah began his reform at the age of eight, the age at which he ascended the throne. It is generally agreed that the scroll discovered by Hilkiyah in 2 Kings is some form of the book of Deuteronomy. There is less unanimity regarding Chronicles' position. Some scholars maintain that Chronicles understands the referent to be the entire Torah; this would explain Chronicles' omission of 2 Kings' claim (22.8) that Shaphan read the scroll (see also 35.6). 6–7: Chronicles' version entails a serious difficulty: Since Josiah had already purged the Temple and people of illicit practices, what remained for him to correct following discovery of the scroll? This passage provides the answer: Josiah now extended his reform even to more distant points within the northern tribes, following his illustrious ancestor Hezekiah. 8–13: Cf. 2 Kings 22.3–7; there the Temple repairs simply set the stage for discovery of the scroll. Chronicles maintains that the repairs were part of Josiah's religious reform, already underway, during which the scroll was discovered. 8: The date, the eighteenth year, marks one stage in the activities begun in v. 3. Chronicles' formulation suggests that discovery of the scroll was a reward for Josiah's cultic zeal, which the king displayed from an early age. Chronicles makes limited mention of Josiah's cleansing of the Temple, since Chronicles claims that such action had already taken place under Manasseh (33.15–16); cf. 2 Kings 23.4–6. 9: The reference to Manasseh, Ephraim, et al., is another example of Chronicles' inclusivist slant; see v. 21. 12: Chronicles expands the role of the Levites; cf. 2 Kings 22.7.

lam, of the sons of Kohath, to supervise; while other Levites, all the master musicians, ¹³were over the porters, supervising all who worked at each and every task; some of the Levites were scribes and officials and gatekeepers.

¹⁴As they took out the silver that had been brought to the House of the LORD, the priest Hilkiyah found a scroll of the LORD's Teaching given by Moses. ¹⁵Hilkiyah spoke up and said to the scribe Shaphan, "I have found a scroll of the Teaching in the House of the LORD"; and Hilkiyah gave the scroll to Shaphan. ¹⁶Shaphan brought the scroll to the king and also reported to the king, "All that was entrusted to your servants is being done; ¹⁷they have melted down the silver that was found in the House of the LORD and delivered it to those who were in charge, to the overseers." ¹⁸The scribe Shaphan also told the king, "The priest Hilkiyah has given me a scroll"; and Shaphan read from it to the king. ¹⁹When the king heard the words of the Teaching, he tore his clothes. ²⁰The king gave orders to Hilkiyah, and Ahikam son of Shaphan, and Abdon son of Micah, and the scribe Shaphan, and Asaiah the king's minister, saying, ²¹"Go, inquire of the LORD on my behalf and on behalf of those who remain in Israel and Judah concerning the words of the scroll that has been found, for great indeed must be the wrath of the LORD that has been poured down upon us because our fathers did not obey the word of the LORD and do all that is written in this scroll."

²²Hilkiyah and those whom the king [had ordered] went to the prophetess Huldah, wife of Shallum son of Tokhath son of Hasrah, keeper of the wardrobe, who was living in Jerusalem in the Mishneh,^a and spoke to her accordingly. ²³She responded to them: "Thus said the LORD God of Israel: Say to the man who sent you to Me, ²⁴'Thus said the LORD: I am going to bring disaster upon this place and its inhabitants—all the curses that are written in the scroll that was read to the king of Judah—²⁵because they forsook Me and made offerings to other gods in order to vex Me with all the works of their hands; My wrath shall be poured out against this place and not be quenched.' ²⁶But say this to the king of Judah who sent you to inquire of the LORD: 'Thus said the LORD God of Israel: As for the words which you have heard, ²⁷since your heart was softened and you humbled yourself before God when you heard His words concerning this place and its inhabitants, and you humbled yourself before Me and tore your clothes and wept before Me, I for My part have listened, declares the LORD. ²⁸Assuredly, I will gather you to your fathers, 21: Those who remain in Israel and Judah replaces "all Judah" of 2 Kings 22.13, and the word of the LORD replaces "the words of this scroll" in 2 Kings 22.13. The first change reflects the inclusivist tendency of Chronicles. The "word of the LORD" refers in other biblical books to prophecy, but Chronicles employs it also in connection with Torah legislation (see 1 Chron. 10.13; 15.15; 2 Chron. 35.6). This probably indicates that for Chronicles, and the postexilic period generally, Torah replaced prophecy; stated differently, the prophet was a transmitter or interpreter of Mosaic law. 24: Some explain Chronicles' reference to *curse*s as an allusion to Deut. 29.20, thus indicating that Chronicles understood the discovered scroll to be Deuteronomy. 27: 2 Kings 22.19b reads: "... I decreed against this place and its inhabitants—that it will become a desolation and a curse." The word "place" may refer to either Jerusalem or the Temple. In either case, Chronicles could not tolerate the "place" being cursed and so omitted these words. 30: Chronicles reads Levites in place of 2 Kings' "prophets" (23.2). This change reflects the social makeup of Second Temple society and/or Chronicles' view of Levites as involved in prophetic activity; see 1 Chron. 25.1–4, 5.

^a A quarter in Jerusalem; cf. Zeph. 1.10.

and you will be laid in your grave in peace; your eyes shall see nothing of the disaster that I will bring upon this place and its inhabitants.’ ” They reported this back to the king.

²⁹Then the king sent word and assembled all the elders of Judah and Jerusalem. ³⁰The king went up to the House of the LORD with all the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem and the priests and the Levites—all the people, young and old—and he read to them the entire text of the covenant scroll that was found in the House of the LORD. ³¹The king stood in his place and solemnized the covenant before the LORD: to follow the LORD and observe His commandments, His injunctions, and His laws with all his heart and soul, to fulfill all the terms of the covenant written in this scroll. ³²He obligated all the men of Jerusalem and Benjamin who were present; and the inhabitants of Jerusalem acted in accord with the Covenant of God, God of their fathers. ³³Josiah removed all the abominations from the whole territory of the Israelites and obliged all who were in Israel to worship the LORD their God. Throughout his reign they did not deviate from following the LORD God of their fathers.

35^aJosiah kept the Passover for the LORD in Jerusalem; the passover sacrifice was slaughtered on the fourteenth day of the first month. ²He reinstated the priests in their shifts and rallied them to the service of the House of the LORD. ³He said to the Levites, consecrated to the LORD, who taught all Israel, “Put the Holy Ark in the House that Solomon son of David, king of Israel, built; as you no longer carry it on your shoulders, see now to the service of the LORD your God and His people Israel, ⁴and dispose yourselves by clans according to your divisions, as prescribed in the writing of King David of Israel and in the document of his son Solomon, ⁵and attend in the Sanctuary, by clan divisions, on your kinsmen, the people—by clan divisions of the Levites. ⁶Having sanctified yourselves, slaughter the passover sacrifice and prepare it for your kinsmen, according to the word of God given by Moses.” ⁷Josiah donated to the people small cattle—lambs and goats, all for passover sacrifices for all present—to the sum of 30,000, and large cattle, 3,000—these from the property of the king. ⁸His officers gave a freewill offering to the people, to the priests, and to the Levites. Hilkiah and Zechariah and Jehiel, the chiefs of the House of God, donated to the priests for passover sacrifices 2,600

35.1–19: The Passover celebration. With the exception of the last two vv., none of this material is found in Kings. When compared to 2 Kings 23.21–23, Chronicles’ version involves two important developments: the prominence of Levites in cultic affairs and the transformation of the Paschal offering into a Temple sacrifice like all others. Chronicles’ much extended treatment, which involves elements from various Torah sources (see below), reflects Chronicles’ view that the scroll found by Hilkiah was the entire Torah (more or less), whereas Kings maintains that only “a scroll of the Teaching,” which most scholars identify as an early form of Deuteronomy alone, had been discovered. 1: Chronicles omits the words “as it is written in this book of the covenant” found in Kings, avoiding the inference that the religious reforms were based exclusively on the discovery of the scroll and, hence, that before that discovery such reforms had not taken place. 2–15: Another example of inner-biblical legal interpretation, in which earlier legal texts are, in this case, harmonized. (The translations of the various texts somewhat obscure this harmonization.) Exod. 12.3–5 specifies that the Paschal offering may be brought only from sheep or goats and must be roasted, not cooked in water (“b-sh-l”) or consumed raw. By contrast, Deut. 16.2 states that cattle, as well as sheep and goats, are acceptable. Furthermore, Deut. 16.7 specifies that the offering must be boiled (“b-sh-l”—the NJPS translation there, “cook,” is imprecise). Chronicles reconciles the two sources. The result is that the Paschal offering must be either lambs or goats, following Exod. ch 12; Deuteronomy’s reference to “cattle” is interpreted as denoting a distinct offering—which Chronicles calls simply sacred offerings (v. 13)—and is intended as an adjunct to the Paschal offering. Chronicles further claims that Deuteronomy’s use of the term “boil” means “boiled [as in Deuteronomy] in fire [as in Exodus].” This incorporates

^a Cf. 2 Kings 23.21–30.

[small cattle] and 300 large cattle. ⁹Conaniah, Shemaiah, and Nethanel, his brothers, and Hashabiah and Jeiel and Jozabad, officers of the Levites, donated 5,000 [small cattle] and 500 large cattle to the Levites for passover sacrifices.

¹⁰The service was arranged well: the priests stood at their posts and the Levites in their divisions, by the king's command. ¹¹They slaughtered the passover sacrifice and the priests [received its blood] from them and dashed it, while the Levites flayed the animals. ¹²They removed the parts to be burnt, distributing them to divisions of the people by clans, and making the sacrifices to the LORD, as prescribed in the scroll of Moses; they did the same for the cattle. ¹³They roasted the passover sacrifice in fire, as prescribed, while the sacred offerings they cooked in pots, cauldrons, and pans, and conveyed them with dispatch to all the people. ¹⁴Afterward they provided for themselves and the priests, for the Aaronite priests were busy offering the burnt offerings and the fatty parts until nightfall, so the Levites provided both for themselves and for the Aaronite priests. ¹⁵The Asaphite singers were at their stations, by command of David and Asaph and Heman and Jeduthun, the seer of the king; and the gatekeepers were at each and every gate. They did not have to leave their tasks, because their Levite brothers provided for them. ¹⁶The entire service of the LORD was arranged well that day, to keep the Passover and to make the burnt offerings on the altar of the LORD, according to the command of King Josiah. ¹⁷All the Israelites present kept the Passover at that time, and the Feast of Unleavened Bread for seven days. ¹⁸Since the time of the prophet Samuel, no Passover like that one had ever been kept in Israel; none of the kings of Israel had kept a Passover like the one kept by Josiah and the priests and the Levites and all Judah and Israel there present and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. ¹⁹That Passover was kept in the eighteenth year of the reign of Josiah.

²⁰After all this furbishing of the Temple by Josiah, King Necho of Egypt came up to fight at Carchemish on the Euphrates, and Josiah went out against him. ²¹[Necho] sent the language of both Exodus and Deuteronomy, while the accompanying sacred offerings may, like most sacrifices, be boiled or poached, following Deuteronomy. (The beginning of v. 13, translated literally, is "They boiled the passover sacrifice in fire.") Chronicles' formulation reflects a bold step: Chronicles has changed the simple, straightforward meaning of Deuteronomy and, moreover, his interpretation creates a heretofore nonexistent accompanying sacrifice. Chronicles' innovations were adopted, in varying form, in later Second Temple compositions (e.g., the book of Jubilees) as well as rabbinic circles (see the variant traditions in Sifre Deut. 129; Mek. R. Ishmael, Pisha, 4; y. Pes. 6.1 [33a]; b. Pes. 66b; Tg. Ork. and, especially, Tg. Ps.-J. to Deut. 16.2.) (For more on this type of inner-biblical interpretation, see "Inner-biblical Interpretation," pp. 1829–35.) 12–13: As prescribed in the scroll of Moses and as prescribed signify Chronicles' claim of authentic legal interpretation. 16–19: Summary of events. 18: The phrase no Passover like that one cannot refer, as in 2 Kings, to cult centralization, since such had taken place during Hezekiah's reign. Rather, it probably refers to the prominence of the Levites or to the performance of the offerings in this precise fashion.

35.20–27: Josiah's death. 2 Kings 23.28–31 offers a laconic account, whose historical background and veracity are uncertain. Chronicles' longer text probably reflects an elaboration upon Kings or perhaps a slightly longer text of Kings that has not been preserved. Chronicles' formulation suggests that the incursion of the Egyptian forces took place shortly after the Passover celebration. The formulation of v. 20 is reminiscent of 32.1, appearing in connection with the Assyrian assault on Hezekiah's kingdom. By emphasizing the achievements of both monarchs in the cultic realm, and the polar differences in their respective fates, the author emphasizes that despite his many meritorious deeds, Josiah died because of his failure to heed the LORD's word conveyed by Necho. The episode is reminiscent of Ahab's death in ch 18: He died because of his failure to heed prophetic warning. Chronicles thus portrays Josiah, a symbol of piety in Kings, in a more negative fashion. He must do so to explain Josiah's surprising death.

20–21: While the details of this incident are not certain, it is likely that Necho was on his way to assist his Assyrian allies who had been driven to Carchemish by the messengers to him, saying, "What have I to do with you, king of Judah? I do not march against you this day but against the kingdom that wars with me, and it is God's will that I hurry. Refrain, then, from interfering with God who is with me, that He not destroy you."²² But Josiah would not let him alone; instead, ^ahe donned [his armor]^a to fight him, heedless of Necho's words from the mouth of God; and he came to fight in the plain of Megiddo.²³ Archers shot King Josiah, and the king said to his servants, "Get me away from here, for I am badly wounded."²⁴ His servants carried him out of his chariot and put him in the wagon of his second-in-command, and conveyed him to Jerusalem. There he died, and was buried in the grave of his fathers, and all Judah and Jerusalem went into mourning over Josiah.²⁵ Jeremiah composed laments for Josiah which all the singers, male and female, recited in their laments for Josiah, as is done to this day; they became customary in Israel and were incorporated into the laments.²⁶ The other events of Josiah's reign and his faithful deeds, in accord with the Teaching of the LORD,²⁷ and his acts, early and late, are recorded in the book of the kings of Israel and Judah.

36^bThe people of the land took Jehoahaz son of Josiah and made him king instead of his father in Jerusalem.² Jehoahaz was twenty-three years old when he became king and he reigned three months in Jerusalem.³ The king of Egypt deposed him in Jerusalem and laid a fine on the land of 100 silver talents and one gold talent.⁴ The king of Egypt made his brother Eliakim king over Judah and Jerusalem, and changed his name to Jehoiakim; Necho took his brother Joahaz and brought him to Egypt.

⁵Jehoiakim was twenty-five years old when he became king, and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem; he did what was displeasing to the LORD his God.⁶ King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon marched against him; he bound him in fetters to convey him to Babylon.⁷ Nebuchadnezzar also brought some vessels of the House of the LORD to Babylon, and set them in his palace in Babylon.⁸ The other a-a With Targum.

b With vv. 1–13, cf. 2 Kings 23.28–37; 24.1–20.

Babylonians (cf. formulation of 2 Kings 23.29). The use of Necho as a conduit for the LORD's word constitutes the clearest statement of Chronicles' view on "spontaneous" prophecy: Even a foreign king may be chosen to convey the divine message, putting him (temporarily) on the same footing as an Israelite prophet. The anomalous nature of this episode is reflected in postbiblical works. 1 Esd. 1.26 replaces Necho's words with "the words of Jeremiah" (a position reflected in Radak's commentary), while the Aramaic Targum (35.23) offers the generic formulation, "Josiah died because he did not seek instruction from the LORD."

22–24: He donned [his armor]: Heb "hit'papes" is the term employed at 18.29 with Ahab, where it means "disguise," so its use here may be intended to connect Josiah to Ahab's folly. 2 Kings 23.29 states that Josiah was slain at Megiddo; this is not repeated in Chronicles, perhaps in an attempt to minimize (but not resolve) the discrepancy between 2 Kings 23.29 and the prophecy of Huldah, which promised that the king would be gathered unto his grave in peace (2 Kings 22.20 || 2 Chron. 34.28). 25–27: The laments were understood by rabbinic tradents (i. Ta'an. 2:10) and, possibly, Josephus (Ant.), as referring to part of the book of Lamentations (in their view, composed by Jeremiah). Alternatively, the reference is to another (unknown) collection of laments. For Teaching ("torah") of the LORD, see 34.1–3.

36.1–21: Judgment and exile.

Chronicles' depiction of the stages of Judah's exile differs in several significant respects from the Deuteronomistic version in Kings. Chronicles abbreviates the parent text (2 Kings chs 23–24), omitting the death notices of each king, while highlighting the ever-worsening state of the cultus.

1–4: A condensed version of 2 Kings 23.30–34; Chronicles omits the negative appraisal of Jehoahaz. Chronicles also omits discussion of the fate of the kings and Temple spoils following their removal from the land; this may be another expression of the centrality of Israel's attachment to its land in Chronicles. 5–8: The description of Jehoiakim being bound and led to Babylon in v. 6 contradicts 2 Kings 24.1. Some explain the Heb to mean that the king need not have actually been taken to Babylon, merely that he was bound and threatened with such a punishment. Others aver that he was taken to Babylon as a vassal to events of Jehoiakim’s reign, and the abominable things he did, and what was found against him, are recorded in the book of the kings of Israel and Judah. His son Jehoiachin succeeded him as king.

⁹Jehoiachin was eight years old when he became king, and he reigned three months and ten days in Jerusalem; he did what was displeasing to the LORD. ¹⁰At the turn of the year, King Nebuchadnezzar sent to have him brought to Babylon with the precious vessels of the House of the LORD, and he made his kinsman Zedekiah king over Judah and Jerusalem.

¹¹Zedekiah was twenty-one years old when he became king, and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem. ¹²He did what was displeasing to the LORD his God; he did not humble himself before the prophet Jeremiah, who spoke for the LORD. ¹³He also rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, who made him take an oath^a by God; he stiffened his neck and hardened his heart so as not to turn to the LORD God of Israel. ¹⁴All the officers of the priests and the people committed many trespasses, following all the abominable practices of the nations. They polluted the House of the LORD, which He had consecrated in Jerusalem. ¹⁵The LORD God of their fathers had sent word to them through participate in the victory celebrations. On this approach, the removal of Temple vessels (v. 7), not mentioned in Kings, was carried out in order to serve as royal tribute. 9–10: Chronicles’ text is terse, focusing on the exile of Jehoiachin and the spoiling of the Temple; cf. 2 Kings 24.8–17. 11–23: Zedekiah and Chronicles’ justification of the destruction of Judah and the exile. As noted above, 2 Kings claims that the main cause of the destruction and exile of Judah was the foreign worship sponsored by Judah’s kings, Manasseh in particular. Chronicles, however, minimizes the role of Manasseh’s sins, claiming that the exile was (primarily) the result of the sins of Zedekiah’s generation. 12–14: Specific significant sins (not heeding prophets, false oaths) are attributed to Zedekiah, as well as the people as a whole—the king’s sins alone cannot explain the national disaster. In v. 14, Chronicles places blame on the priests as well as laity, but notably omits reference to the Levites. 15–17: Another instance of warn-a Viz., a vassal oath.

Babylonia and Judah ca. 600 BCE

His messengers daily without fail, for He had pity on His people and His dwelling-place. ¹⁶ But they mocked the messengers of God and disdained His words and taunted His prophets until the wrath of the LORD against His people grew beyond remedy. ¹⁷ He therefore brought the king of the Chaldeans upon them, who killed their youths by the sword in their sanctuary; He did not spare youth, maiden, elder, or graybeard, but delivered all into his hands. ¹⁸ All the vessels of the House of God, large and small, and the treasures of the House of the LORD and the treasures of the king and his officers were all brought to Babylon. ¹⁹ They burned the House of God and tore down the wall of Jerusalem, burned down all its mansions, and consigned all its precious objects to destruction. ²⁰ Those who survived the sword he exiled to Babylon, and they became his and his sons' servants till the rise of the Persian kingdom, ²¹ in fulfillment of the word of the LORD spoken by Jeremiah, until the land paid back its sabbaths; as long as it lay desolate it kept sabbath, till seventy years were completed.

²² And in the first year of King Cyrus of Persia, when the word of the LORD spoken by Jeremiah was fulfilled, the LORD roused the spirit of King Cyrus of Persia to issue a proclamation throughout his realm by word of mouth and in writing, as follows: ²³ "Thus said King Cyrus of Persia: The LORD God of Heaven has given me all the kingdoms of the earth, and has charged me with building Him a House in Jerusalem, which is in Judah. Any one of you of all His people, the LORD his God be with him and let him go up."

ing preceding divine punishment. Chronicles' formulation is intended to emphasize the extent of the people's sin: Despite the numerous opportunities for repentance, the people persist in their sinful ways. The absolute decadence is highlighted by the use of three verbs in v. 16 to express the people's disdain for the prophetic word. 21: In a midrashic fashion, Chronicles' formulation of the exile is informed by combining Jeremiah (25.10–12; 28.3; 29.9) and Leviticus (26.19–21). Chronicles accepts Jeremiah's pronouncement that the exile will last seventy years, but explains the significance of this period on the basis of Leviticus's claim that exile will befall Israel because of its neglect of the sabbatical and jubilee years (Lev. 25.1–13). Whereas seventy years signifies in Jeremiah a lengthy stay in captivity, Chronicles views this period as a brief hiatus in Israel's history, which did not significantly alter the nature of Israel's bond, and claim, to its land. It does not repeat 2 Kings 25.21, which states that Judah was exiled from its land, referring instead to the destruction of Jerusalem and the fate of its exiled inhabitants, with no attention given to those who remained in Judah. Chronicles' reference to (the veracity of) Jeremiah's warning, along with Chronicles' depiction of the people as mocking the divine messengers, is another expression of the importance that Chronicles attaches to heeding the prophetic message. This likely reflects a situation in which prophetic books, along with Torah literature, were seen as authoritative for the Chronicler's community.

36.22–23: Conclusion. Chronicles' conclusion overlaps Ezra 1.1–3a. The numerous explanations proffered depend, to some extent, on the question of the unity of Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, and their relative dates of composition (see introduction). Some scholars who accept the unity of the two works argue that these common vv. join the two works together. Others, rejecting the works' unity, argue that these vv. were added to the original conclusion to avoid ending on a pessimistic note. Unlike Ezra 1.3, which says "May his God be with him," Chronicles adds the LORD. The attribution of monotheism to foreign nations and their leaders is attested above (1 Chron. 16.23; 2 Chron. 1.18–2.15). Finally, the grammatical form of the concluding Heb word, and let him go up, is taken by some to indicate that the process of redemption is ongoing. Cyrus's edict is depicted as the fulfillment of prophecy; with it, Israel's sins have been required and the brief period of Israel's rupture from its land has ended.

Introduction to the Essays

THE TWENTY-FOUR ESSAYS in this section set the annotations to the biblical books in a broader context, enhancing our goal of representing Jewish academic scholarship on the Bible. They offer a wealth of supplementary material, not easily accessible elsewhere, and they represent the best of current scholarship. Inevitably, there is some overlap from essay to essay, but we view this as a positive feature. As in the case of the annotations, we have given our authors free rein to shape their material, and their essays manifest, as do the annotations, the variety of approaches that is typical of Jewish biblical interpretation.

The first set of essays, “Jewish Interpretation of the Bible,” surveys, in chronological order, Jewish biblical interpretation in various periods, from earliest times to the present. These essays explain and model what is quintessentially Jewish about Jewish interpretation. They convey a flavor of each age, its distinctive modes of interpretation. Taken as a whole, they form a study in the continuities and discontinuities that mark the history of Jewish biblical interpretation.

The second set of essays, “The Bible in Jewish Life and Thought,” gives some intimation of the importance of the Bible for Judaism and the Jewish community, an importance that cannot be overstated. The Bible is the key text of Jewish life. The essays in this section are largely arranged chronologically, from antiquity to the present. They describe the place of the Bible in different communities and intellectual contexts, from the Jewish community that composed and preserved the Dead Sea Scrolls through the modern State of Israel, and in the Jewish philosophical and mystical traditions as well as in the scholarly writings of contemporary Jewish women. No description of the Bible in Jewish life would be complete without a discussion of the role of the Bible in the synagogue and in the liturgy, or the making of Jewish translations of the Bible from antiquity to modern times.

The third set of essays, “Backgrounds for Reading the Bible,” provides contemporary scholarly background material for understanding the Bible. Unlike the previous two sections, the emphasis here is not specifically Jewish. The topics addressed reflect the editors’ sensibilities of what an informed reader might want to know about important biblical concepts and about how contemporary scholars study the Bible. About half of this material has been reworked by the editors from essays previously published in The New Oxford Annotated Bible. Newly commissioned essays are “The Religion of the Bible,” “Concepts of Purity in the Bible," "Languages of the Bible," "The Development of the Masoretic Bible," and "Reading Biblical Poetry."

In the final section of this volume, following "Tables and Charts," the "Translations of Primary Sources" and the "Glossary" are of particular importance. The Translations offer an introductory English bibliography of many primary sources mentioned in the annotations and the essays, including ancient Near Eastern, early postbiblical, classical rabbinic, medieval, philosophical, and mystical works. The Glossary explains both Hebrew and Jewish terms, as well as technical terms used in modern biblical scholarship. The material in all five sections following the annotated biblical books—the essays, charts, and other supplementary materials—is intended to inform the reader, concisely but without sacrificing high academic quality, about the Bible and its world, from both Jewish and academic perspectives.

[ADELE BERLIN AND MARC ZVI BRETTLER]

JEWISH INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE

Inner-biblical Interpretation

The interpretation of the Bible begins in the Bible itself. Biblical authors frequently commented on other biblical texts; they revised them, they argued with them, and they alluded to them. In so doing, they conveyed an understanding of the texts they utilized—in short, they interpreted earlier biblical writings. This tendency became especially prominent at the end of the preexilic period and during the exilic and postexilic periods, in other words after an early protocanonical set of texts became sacred. These reader-writers understood older texts in original ways, applied their principles to new situations, or borrowed from their prestige. In this respect the biblical authors resemble later Jewish (and Christian) writers, who constantly look back to biblical models as they create new texts, ideas, and practices. Thus the religion that generated the Bible foreshadows the religions generated by the Bible: Israelite thinkers, like those of various forms of Judaism and Christianity, constructed their works by recasting language and themes found in earlier ones. Biblical authors bequeathed their successors not only a text, but ways of relating to that text, reacting to that text, recreating that text, and allowing that text to remain alive.

It will be helpful to discuss both the forms that inner-biblical revision takes and the effects of those revisions at the level of ideas—both how and why biblical authors borrow from their predecessors. In examining both these issues, this essay will also compare the ways biblical authors used biblical texts with the ways postbiblical authors did so.

To begin, then, with the rhetoric of reuse and rereading: Biblical authors utilized the work of their predecessors in several ways. Some biblical passages use a formula when they quote an older text, thus making the borrowing explicit. (This practice resembles the modern footnote.) 2 Kings 14.5–6 tells us of King Joash, “Once he had the kingdom firmly in his grasp, he put to death the courtiers who had assassinated his father the king. But he did not put to death the children of the assassins, in accordance with what is written (kakatuw) in the Book of the Teaching of Moses (torat moshe), where the LORD commanded, ‘Parents shall not be put to death for children, nor children be put to death for parents; a person shall be put to death only for his own crime.’” The formula “in accordance with what is written” (or, more simply, “as it is written”) introduces a nearly word-for-word quotation from Deut. 24.16. In other instances this formula introduces quotations or refers to ideas found elsewhere in the Torah (1 Kings 2.3; Ezra 3.2; 2 Chron. 23.18). This formula (kakatuw or kemo shekatuw) is also used to introduce quotations from Scripture in rabbinic literature, the Dead Sea Scrolls, and (in Greek translation) the New Testament.

In a much larger number of cases, however, biblical texts borrow phrasing or imagery without citing the source explicitly; rather, the shared items help the knowledgeable reader identify the source. The prophet responsible for the latter part of the book of Isaiah (see the introduction to Isaiah) comforted Judeans after the destruction of Jerusalem with these words:

The LORD comforts Zion, comforts all her ruins. He makes Zion's wasteland an Eden; her desert, a garden of the LORD . . . Listen to Me, My people, and My nation, give ear! For teaching goes forth from Me, and I will give My judgment as a light of the peoples . . . My arms will judge peoples. Islands will look eagerly to Me, and in My arms they will have hope. Lift up your eyes towards heaven and look at the earth below! For the heaven can melt away like smoke, and the earth can wear out like a garment . . . But My salvation will endure forever (Isa. 51.3–6, author's translation).

In issuing this prediction, the exilic author borrows from a passage found in the work of two prophets who lived more than a century and a half earlier, (First) Isaiah and Micah:

In the future, the mountain of the LORD's House will be established as the greatest of mountains and lifted up above the hills. All nations will flow towards it, and many peoples will come and say, "Let us go up to the LORD's mountain, to the House of Jacob's God," . . . For teaching goes forth from Zion, and the LORD's word from Jerusalem. And God will judge the nations, . . . and they will beat their swords into plowshares and their weapons into pruning forks; nation will not lift up sword against nation, and they will learn war no more (Isa. 2.2–4, author's translation; Mic. 4.1–4 is almost identical).

The author of Isa. ch 51 borrowed the items printed in italics above. In addition, harvotaha ["her ruins"] in Isa. ch 51 is an intentional pun, hinting at harvotam ["their swords"] in Isa. ch 2 and Mic. ch 4, a word that has a different meaning but sounds nearly identical. The passages share several images as well. The idea of peoples gathering appears in both passages, and both predict that the LORD will teach nations and judge them at His mountain. In both passages agricultural images (plowshares and pruning hooks in Isa. ch 2 and Mic. ch 4, gardens in Isa. ch 53) take the place of figures of destruction. The new text reworks the old one. It repeats the earlier prediction, but it shifts attention from the nations who come in pursuit of instruction and peace to the benefits that Jerusalem will gain from her newly exalted position. The later author does not use a citation formula to tell the reader that the new text depends on the older one, but the many items they share indicate their relationship. We may characterize this relationship as a literary allusion. A great many biblical texts utilized their predecessors in this way, and some postbiblical writers continued the tradition of allusion. Based on similarity of vocabulary and phraseology, it is clear that many of the Dead Sea Scrolls borrow and rework texts from the Bible; the same is true of the New Testament. On the other hand, the central works of rabbinic literature (the Talmuds and the midrashim) allude to the Bible much less frequently. They tend instead to cite the Bible explicitly by using citation formulas like "as it is written" or "as it was said." Other rabbinic works, however, often borrow vocabulary and images from the Bible in a style that recalls the Bible itself; these rabbinic works include prayers found in the Siddur (prayerbook), moralistic books, and some mystical texts. Allusions to the Bible continue throughout the development of Hebrew literature; they are very frequent in medieval Hebrew poetry and in the work of modern Israeli writers such as Bialik, Agnon, Amichai, and others.

Some biblical works borrow whole sections from older texts. For example, the book of Chronicles repeats, more or less verbatim, large parts of Samuel and Kings. The legal collection in Deut. chs 12–26 includes laws similar to those in Exod. chs 21–23. According to most modern source-critical biblical scholars, the books of Genesis through Numbers incorporate several older texts that are no longer available to us in their original form. In all these cases, the new works make small but highly significant changes in the borrowed material. Thus the theological and historical outlook of Chronicles differs from that of Samuel-Kings, even as Chronicles reports the same events using many of the same words (see the introduction to Chronicles). Some modern scholars maintain that a group of priests copied an older form of the festival law now found in Lev. ch 23, but they added verses 9–22 and 39–44 when they did so (see notes there). By making the additions, these priests radically altered the religious outlook of the original document. They acknowledged the validity of popular ritual observances deliberately shunned by the more elite priests responsible for the older version of the chapter. Revising a text by copying it with significant variations or additions remained a common form of Jewish writing in the period immediately following the completion of the Bible. Works such as Jubilees and some of the Dead Sea Scrolls retold the stories of the Torah or repeated and modified laws found there. These works were not preserved by later Jewish groups, however, and they did not continue to be studied, read, or chanted in Jewish communities. The Rabbis did not incorporate large sections of the Bible into new works that they wrote; instead, they typically compiled collections of interpretive comments on the Bible (known as midrashim), included interpretive comments in legal works (such as the Talmud), and, beginning with the Middle Ages, wrote verse-by-verse commentaries on the Bible.

Finally, some later comments on biblical passages occur within those passages themselves, at least in the text of the Bible that has been in use for the past two millennia. Like modern readers, ancient readers penned explanations or reactions to the text they were reading in margins or between the lines. Some of these marginal comments were subsequently inserted into the text itself by scribes who copied the scroll containing the marginal comment. (It is also possible that some of these comments were inserted to begin with by scribes who made them as they were copying a scroll.) For example, 1 Kings 15.5 originally limited itself to a comment praising King David, and one important manuscript of the ancient Greek translation of Kings preserves that original text. A later scribe found the fulsome praise of David inconsistent with the story in 2 Sam. ch 11. That story is exceedingly critical of David for committing adultery with the wife of Uriah the Hittite (one of his own soldiers) and for having Uriah murdered to ensure that the adultery was not discovered. Therefore, the scribe added a qualification in 1 Kings 15.5: “except in the matter of Uriah the Hittite.” These words became part of the Masoretic Text, which thus contains both the original author’s evaluation of David and a later reader’s reaction to that evaluation. Similarly, Exod. 22.24 originally read, “If you lend money to My “am,” do not act toward them as a creditor; exact no interest from them.” Now, the Hebrew word “am” usually means “people,” but it can also mean “the poor” or “common folk, peasantry” (see Isa. 3.15; Ps. 72.2; Neh. 5.1). To make clear that in this case the second of these meanings was to be understood, a later scribe added the words “to the poor among you” immediately after “am.” Since the meaning of “am” as “people” was more common, the scribe worried that without clarification the verse would be misread.

The goals of other biblical authors and scribes who borrowed material from older biblical texts were varied. As we can see from the scribal insertion in Exod. ch 22 just discussed, they sometimes wanted to explain a passage that seemed ambiguous, problematic, or somehow relevant to their own situation. In other words, they wrote an interpretation. A famous example occurs in Dan. 9.2: “I, Daniel, consulted the books concerning the number of years that, according to the word of the LORD that had come to Jeremiah the prophet, were to be the term of Jerusalem’s desolation—seventy years.” In this verse the author of Daniel cited a passage from the book of Jeremiah explicitly. Jeremiah wrote that passage shortly after the Babylonians deported many of Jerusalem’s leaders in 597 BCE: “Thus said the LORD: When Babylon’s seventy years are over, I will take note of you, and I will fulfill to you My promise of favor—to bring you back to this place” (Jer. 29.10). The author of Daniel wrote at a time when the Second Temple was being desecrated and Jerusalem’s status as a holy city was in peril (in the middle of the 2nd century BCE.) Therefore, that author felt that the redemption and favor promised in Jer. 29.10 had still not materialized, even though seventy years had long passed. How, then, to understand Jeremiah's prophecy as a true prophecy? Daniel reports that the angel Gabriel answered this question: "Seventy weeks have been decreed for your people and your holy city until . . . eternal righteousness [is] ushered in; and prophetic vision ratified" (Dan. 9.24). According to Gabriel's interpretation, Jeremiah's words were really a sort of code. When Jeremiah said "seventy (shiv'im) years" he meant "seventy weeks" or "seventy sevens" (shavu'im shiv'im) of years; the consonants shv'ym had to be read twice, with slightly different vocalization each time. As a result what seems like one word is really two. The redemption would occur not seventy years after Jeremiah issued the prophecy, but four hundred and ninety years afterwards. This interpretation of Jer. ch 29 confirms the prophecy as a true one, and makes it applicable to a current situation. The interpretation is certainly a novel one, and not what Jeremiah himself meant; it makes it seem that Jeremiah was speaking for the benefit of the audience at the time of Daniel, not for Jeremiah's own audience. Nevertheless, Daniel's reading of Jeremiah follows a recognizable logic. The word of God is not like the word of a human; divine speech is infinitely more meaningful. When a human utters the consonants of the word shiv'im, it means only one thing ("seventy"), but when God does so they have (at least) another layer of meaning, and thus they can be read twice in two different ways (shavu'im shiv'im), to mean seventy sevens. Precisely the same theory of divine language as supercharged with meaning underlies biblical interpretations found in postbiblical Jewish literature, such as the midrashim (see "Midrash and Jewish Interpretation," pp. 1863-75). Indeed, this passage in Daniel is an early case of classical Jewish scriptural interpretation. Midrash, then, is not just a postbiblical invention used by the Rabbis to revise the Bible as they saw fit. It is a biblical means of relating to the Bible, which the Rabbis inherited from the biblical authors themselves.

One more case in which a biblical author explicitly interprets older biblical texts: Both Exodus and Deuteronomy provide regulations concerning the Passover sacrifice, but these regulations differ in several respects. According to Deut. 16.7, the Passover sacrifice should be boiled. The law concerning the Passover sacrifice in Exod. 12.9 takes issue with Deuteronomy on this point, warning its audience, "Don't eat it raw or boiled in water; rather, [eat it] roasted in fire" (author's translation; the NJPS translation obscures this point by translating the verb "cook" in Deuteronomy). That such a disagreement (ma'iloket) occurs in this ancient Jewish literature is not surprising: Two groups in the biblical period agreed that the Passover sacrifice was important but disagreed on its precise details. Such disagreements over the precise requirements of a ritual are a regular feature of Jewish law in all ages. Classical rabbinic authorities, for example, agree that one should not eat dairy products for some time after eating meat but disagree concerning the exact length of the waiting period (some say it should be three hours; others, six); contemporary Jewish groups agree that communal prayers are important but disagree concerning whether women should be allowed to lead them. The authors of the book of Chronicles, however, cannot tolerate disagreement between two texts in the Torah; unlike most modern scholars, they view the Torah not as an anthology of differing opinions (comparable to the Talmud), or as a compendium of different sources, but as a single work, written by Moses (comparable to a law code such as Maimonides' Mishneh Torah). Consequently, they deny that a legal disagreement or ma'iloket can occur in the Torah. When narrating the Passover observances during the reign of the righteous King Josiah, Chronicles tells us that "they slaughtered the Passover sacrifice . . . according to what is written in the Book of Moses . . . and they boiled the Passover sacrifice in fire, in accordance with the law" (2 Chron. 35.11–13, author's translation). Precisely what Chronicles means by the phrase "boiled in fire" is not clear. What is evident, however, is that Chronicles insists the sacrifice was performed in accordance with the Torah as a whole: somehow the priests simultaneously boiled it (as per Deuteronomy) and roasted it in fire (as per Exodus). The interpretive principle that the book of Chronicles advocates here is shared by classical rabbinic commentators: The Torah is a single document, and therefore what seem to be contradictions within it must be explained away through harmonization. (Rabbinic interpreters on these passages in Exodus and Deuteronomy devised several ways of showing that they do not really disagree with each other; see, for example, the Talmud's explanation in b. Pes. 70b.)

In the cases just examined, the goal of the later passage is to illuminate the earlier one. In many other instances of inner-biblical borrowing, however, the new text presents an innovative variation of the older text's ideas or even argues against it. Instead of saying, "Here is how you ought to understand the older text," the new composition tells the reader, "There are some ideas in the older text that need to be revised or extended or discarded. Here's my proposal for a replacement." Exod. 34.6–7 informs us that God sometimes punishes children for their parent's sin—indeed, even grandchildren and great-grandchildren can be punished:

The LORD! the LORD! a God compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, abounding in kindness and faithfulness, extending kindness to the thousandth generation, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin; yet He does not remit all punishment, but visits the iniquity of parents upon children and children's children, upon the third and fourth generations.

According to this formulation (which appears in condensed form in Exod. 32.1–6, 34; Num.

14.1–20; 2 Kings 20.12–19; Ps. 99.8), God punishes children for the sins of their parents, apparently as a sign of mercy to the parents: When sinners repent, their punishment is deferred to their offspring. Other biblical writers, however, rejected this notion. Ps. 103.8–10, for example, notes: The LORD is compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, abounding in kindness. He will not extend his anger forever, nor will He fight for all time (author's translation).

The psalmist quotes the text from Exod. ch 34, which was already an authoritative and holy text, but revises the morally troubling part: Where the older text informed us that God punishes a sin for generations, the psalm maintains that God does not contend forever. A similar quotation-with-revision occurs in Deut. 7.9–10, Jonah 4.2, and Joel 2.12. These texts do not attempt to tell us how to read Exod. ch 34; that is, they do not argue that Exod. ch 34 somehow means something other than what it seems to say. Rather, they repeat it while also disagreeing with part of it. The same phenomenon occurs in rabbinic liturgy. During the introduction to the Torah service on festivals and throughout the Yom Kippur service, the first part of the statement from Exod. ch 34 is quoted, but the section at the end describing the intergenerational punishment is omitted. In purposefully misquoting the scriptural passage, then, the Rabbis who created the festival liturgy follow a scriptural precedent.

Sometimes it is difficult to be sure whether a later biblical author means to interpret an earlier text or to revise it. Exod. 23.9 reads, "Do not oppress the foreigner. You experienced the life of the foreigner, for you were foreigners in the land of Egypt" (author's translation). Deut. 10.19 echoes but amplifies the verse from Exodus: "Love the foreigner, for you were foreigners in the land of Egypt." Does Deuteronomy intend to explain that "not oppressing" really means "loving," and that Exod. 23.9 at a deeper level commands us to love the foreigner? Or does Deuteronomy rather mean to say that not only is what Exodus commanded right, but we should go further and actively love the foreigner? It is difficult to be sure, but given the many other cases in which Deuteronomy clearly disagrees with Exodus (for example, the law of the Passover sacrifice discussed above, or the law of the slave in Deut. 15.12–18, which revises Exod. 21.2–7), the latter explanation seems more likely.

Biblical writers often use older texts to bolster their own writing or to help make some claim in a particularly clear or lively fashion. According to Jer. 2.3, Israel is the LORD's holy item, the first-fruits He produced. All who consume Israel will incur guilt; disaster will befall them (author's translation).

In making this assertion, Jeremiah relies on the ritual law found in Lev. 22.14–16:

If a man consumes a holy item by mistake he must give a holy item to the priest plus one fifth of its value. The priests must not let the holy items donated to the LORD by the Israelites be defiled, nor may they allow the Israelites to incur punishment by consuming holy items (author's translation).

Jeremiah suggests an analogy in order to make his own point more vivid: According to ritual law, certain agricultural products (especially first-fruits, according to Num. 18.11–13) are holy items. They belong to the Temple and cannot be consumed (i.e., eaten) as regular food; those who do so incur guilt. So too the nation Israel is sacred to the LORD; the nation is, metaphorically, a holy item. Therefore, any who would consume (i.e., attack or destroy) that nation will incur guilt and suffer disaster. This sort of literary allusion differs from the examples of inner-biblical interpretation and revision we saw above. Jeremiah neither explains the passage from Leviticus nor repeats it while modifying its message. He does not claim that the older passage is really a geopolitical warning to Israel's enemies rather than a law concerning the sacrificial rites. Nor does he suggest that the text ought to be such a warning and needs to be rewritten. In fact, Jeremiah's statement does not affect the meaning of the older text at all. Rather, Jeremiah evokes the law from Leviticus in order to make his own message readily understood by analogy. In so doing, he also aligns himself with an authoritative text and thus bolsters his own status as prophet.

The following case of inner-biblical allusion, on the other hand, at once enriches the text that makes the allusion and illuminates the source. When two Israelite spies venture into Jericho at the outset of the book of Joshua, the Canaanite harlot Rahab allows them to hide in her house, thus disobeying an edict of her own Canaanite king. She explains her reasons to the Israelite spies:

I know that the LORD has given you the land. Indeed, fear of you has overtaken us, and all the inhabitants of the land are trembling because of you (Josh. 2.9, author's translation).

Rahab's words closely resemble a line from the song Moses and the Israelites sang at the Reed Sea after they escaped from Egypt:

All the inhabitants of Canaan will tremble; fear and terror will overtake them (Exod. 15.15–16, author's translation).

The allusion in Joshua (which was written after the poem in Exod. ch 15) works on several levels. It establishes a link between the events described in the first chapters of Joshua and the exodus from Egypt, a link that other passages in Joshua strengthen. (For example, the crossing of the River Jordan in Josh. chs 3–4 reenacts the crossing of the Red Sea in Exod. chs 14–15.) This brief allusion helps the author make a central point: The grand act of salvation that the LORD performed for Israelite slaves in the past was not the last such act; in each and every generation Jews should see themselves as participating in that miracle, because similar miracles may well save them, too. By repeating vocabulary from Exod. ch 15, the author of Joshua forges a parallel between two moments in time and hence expresses a philosophy of history: History repeats itself, and the activities of earlier generations are a sign for what will happen to their offspring. At the same time, this allusion also tells us something about the song in Exodus. It is possible to read that poem as prophetic, and to view the line describing the Canaanites' fear as a prediction made by Moses well before the Canaanites actually heard of the Israelites' good fortune. By paraphrasing that line in the past tense, the author of Joshua confirms the accuracy of the older prediction and thus reinforces Moses' prestige. Allusions to biblical texts occur with enormous frequency in later Jewish literature. One cannot move through a page of the Dead Sea Scrolls' Community Rule, a paragraph from the rabbinic liturgy, a poem by Yehudah Halevi or Nathan Zach or Dan Pagis, or a novel by A. B. Yehoshua or Amos Oz without finding vocabulary and images that evoke particular passages from the Bible. Indeed, the constant reworking of biblical material is a hallmark of Jewish literature, a hallmark that is already prominent in the Bible itself.

It is often stated that postbiblical Judaism is a religion of the Book, and that interpretation and debate are quintessentially rabbinic activities. In light of the phenomenon of inner-biblical exegesis and allusion, it becomes evident that these characteristics of Jewish creativity did not begin with the Rabbis. Biblical authors themselves regarded older biblical texts as authoritative, sacred, and worthy of study. Close examination of some biblical documents, especially those composed toward the end of the biblical period but including some from the preexilic era, shows something extraordinary: Priests and prophets, psalmists and scribes composed Scripture by recycling Scripture, by turning it and turning it to find new truths in it. For many biblical writers, new words from God emerged from intense examination and reordering of old ones. The interpretation of a sacred text could yield revelation, as much as revelation yielded a sacred text. If this is so, then the gulf that separates the Bible or Torah shebikhtav ("Written Torah") from rabbinic tradition or Torah shebe'al peh ("Oral Torah") is smaller than one might think. The Rabbis stand alongside their biblical forebears when they interpret the Bible, even when they interpret the Bible in surprising or radical ways. It is perhaps for this reason that they portrayed biblical figures as the first biblical commentators. "Moses wrote many things in an obscure way [in the Torah], and then came King David [in the book of Psalms] who explained them," we read in a midrash on Exodus (Exod. Rab. 15:22). By reading and revising, explaining and debating, the authors of the Bible as well as those who follow them demonstrate that many different texts, biblical and otherwise, contain the living words of God.

[BENJAMIN D. SOMMER]

Early Nonrabbinic Interpretation

A variety of extrabiblical texts preserve ancient interpretations of biblical law and narrative. Many motifs from these interpretations are found in later rabbinic (as well as Christian and Islamic) sources. But the interpretive texts were, for the most part, not preserved within rabbinic corpora and libraries, and they often represent legal and theological views that diverge sharply from those found within rabbinic Judaism. Scholars use these texts—recovered from Christian libraries and from the Dead Sea Scrolls at Qumran—both to reconstruct the diverse character of the Second Temple community before the emergence of rabbinic Judaism and Christianity, and to illuminate later interpretations. (For an explanation of the Dead Sea Scrolls and the ways in which they are named and referenced, see "The Bible in the Dead Sea Scrolls," pp. 1920–28.)

These interpretive texts vary greatly in the way they present their relationship to the biblical texts they interpret. At one extreme are interpretive texts that efface themselves, presenting themselves as nothing more than editions, retellings, or translations of biblical passages. Translations and interpretations that claim divine authority are less self-effacing, but claim to present nothing but the one true meaning of biblical passages. At the opposite extreme are the interpretive writings of individuals such as Josephus and Philo of Alexandria, who self-consciously occupy particular points of view, which they know to be at some distance—perspectively, historically, linguistically—from the biblical passages they interpret.

Biblical Retellings

Examples of self-effacing texts, which present themselves as editions or retellings of biblical texts, include Jubilees, the Genesis Apocryphon (1QapGen^a), Reworked Pentateuch (4Q158, 4Q354, 4Q365, 4Q366, 4Q367), and the Temple Scroll (11QT). These texts are often characterized as “pseudepigrapha”—as writings falsely attributed to earlier authoritative figures, such as Moses, Ezekiel, or Ezra. However, this term is misleading and anachronistic. It is misleading because it presupposes that, in contrast to these extrabiblical texts, the biblical texts are authentically attributed to certain authors—a presupposition that biblical scholars no longer maintain. In addition, the term is anachronistic, because it assumes a conception of authorial attribution—as marking a historical and proprietary fact—which was operative in some Greek-speaking circles in late antiquity, long after the last scriptural works had been written and, indeed, canonized. There is no evidence, however, that this conception was operative for Second Temple writers and readers.

Self-effacing texts rewrite traditions familiar from the Bible, sometimes in strikingly unfamiliar ways, in order to resolve interpretive questions and to serve particular theological and legal agendas, of which there were many in the diverse atmosphere of Second Temple

Judaism. Since their authors do not identify themselves, they seem more like inner-biblical than like rabbinic interpretations (which generally ascribe interpretations to a named Rabbi). In fact, it is anachronistic to apply the distinction between inner-biblical and extrabiblical interpretations to Second Temple reworkings because, when these works were composed, there was no rigidly defined and universally accepted biblical canon. These works aspired not to replace, but rather to accompany traditions already regarded as authoritative, and thus to provide those traditions with their proper interpretive contexts. Just as the Deuteronomic law collection came to be accepted within the Torah alongside the earlier Covenant Collection in Exod. chs 20–23, so it is possible to see the aforementioned extrabiblical works as accompanying the Torah texts at Qumran, where they have been found.

It was in this spirit that Jubilees, a work written in the land of Israel during the first third of the second century BCE, rewrote Genesis and the first part of Exodus. These sections of the Torah appear to be concerned exclusively with narratives about the patriarchs and matriarchs and about Israel’s sojourn in Egypt. The absence of legal significance was problematic for Jubilees, as it would be, centuries later, to Rashi, the great medieval commentator (see “Medieval Interpretation,” pp. 1876–1900). Rashi’s solution was the suggestion, derived from classical rabbinic sources, that the initial, nonlegal sections of the Torah serve to establish the Jewish people’s right to the land of Israel. In contrast, the solution of Jubilees was to rewrite the narratives as stories with legal implications. These implications were explained in accordance with a particular (nonrabbinic) view of law, especially regarding the calendar, which Jubilees insists should be solar. For example, Jubilees was bothered—like many other ancient, medieval, and modern interpretations—by a narrative in Genesis ch 38 in which Judah, son of Jacob, has sexual relations with his daughter-in-law, Tamar. To make matters even worse, according to Ruth ch 4, the line of David springs from this illicit union! Jubilees offers an exegetically ingenious solution. In its version of the story, neither of Judah's sons, Er and Onan, consummated his marriage with Tamar (Jub. 41.2–5):

He hated (her) and did not lie with her because his mother was a Canaanite woman and he wanted to marry someone from his mother's tribe. But his father Judah did not allow him. That Er, Judah's firstborn, was evil, and the Lord killed him. Then Judah said to his brother Onan: "Go in to your brother's wife, perform the levirate duty for her, and produce descendants for your brother." Onan knew that the descendants would not be his but his brother's, so he entered the house of his brother's wife and poured out the semen on the ground. In the Lord's estimation it was an evil act, and He killed him.

Consequently, although Judah transgressed, he did not, strictly speaking, commit the serious sin of adulterous union with his daughter-in-law. He therefore did not deserve the death penalty, and was able to achieve atonement through his remorse and through his expression of commitment to the law (Jub. 41.27–28):

We told Judah that his two sons had not lain with her. For this reason his descendants were established for another generation and would not be uprooted. For in his integrity he had gone and demanded punishment because Judah had wanted to burn her on the basis of the law which Abraham had commanded his children.

Interpretations of this kind were not presented by Jubilees merely as plausible solutions to exegetical problems, which would have allowed them to compete with other possible solutions. Instead, Jubilees purports to be a text dictated to Moses; at God's command, by the angel of the Presence at Sinai. In some ways, this is similar to the notion of an authoritative Oral Torah that would become so central to rabbinic theology (see "Classical Rabbinic Interpretation," pp. 1844–63). Here is the prologue to the book of Jubilees:

These are the words regarding the divisions of the times of the law and of the testimony, of the events of the years, of the weeks of their jubilees throughout all the years of eternity as He related (them) to Moses on Mt. Sinai when he went up to receive the stone tablets—the law and the commandments—on the Lord's orders as He had told him that he should come up to the summit of the mountain.

Toward the end of the first chapter Moses receives his command to record what is dictated to him (Jub. 1.26):

Now you write all these words which I will tell you on this mountain: what is first and what is last and what is to come during all the divisions of time which are in the law and which are in the testimony and in the weeks of their jubilees until eternity—until the time when I descend and live with them throughout all the ages of eternity.

Many of the laws expounded in Jubilees were also said to be inscribed on heavenly tablets (following Mesopotamian models), and to have been transmitted by angels to a select line of humans, beginning with Enoch. Clearly, the stakes were very high in Second Temple contests of biblical interpretation. How else may we explain the need for so many modes of self-authorization?

In addition to solving exegetical problems, another function of ancient reworkings was to spell out in detail what older traditions had expressed with great concision. For example, in Genesis 12.11, Abram briefly acknowledges his wife's beauty: "[Hineh na] I know what a beautiful woman you are." The first two words are left untranslated by NJPS, but may be translated as "now." This immediately raises the question: What event had brought about Abram's recognition now? To answer this question the Genesis Apocryphon, a Dead

Sea text written in Aramaic, expands the biblical passage as follows (column 20.1–12):

1 . . . [. . .] How . . . and pretty is the shape of her face, and how [l]ovely and how smooth the hair of her head! How lovely are her eyes; how pleasant her nose and all the blossom of her face . . . How graceful is her breast and how lovely all her whiteness! How beautiful are her arms! And her hands, how perfect! How alluring is the whole appearance of her hand[s]! How pretty are the palms of her hands and how long and supple all the fingers of her hands! Her feet, how lovely! How perfect her thighs! No virgin or wife who enters the bridal chamber is more beautiful than her. Above all women her beauty stands out; her loveliness is far above them all. And with all this beauty there is in her great wisdom. And everything she does with her hands is perfect. When the king heard the words of Hirqanos and the words of his companions, which the three of them spoke in unison, he desired her greatly and sent immediately for her to be fetched. He saw her and was amazed at all her beauty, and took her for himself as a wife. He wanted to kill me, but Sarai said to the king: He is my brother, so that I could profit at her expense. I, Abram, was spared on her account and I was not killed. But I wept bitterly that night, I, Abram, and my nephew Lot with me, because Sarai had been taken away from me by force.

The language of praise used here is from the Song of Songs. Use of traditions from other biblical books, which presupposes that all the biblical books bear one on the other, is characteristic of ancient reworkings, as well as of later rabbinic interpretations. But the above passage does more than expand Abram's remark. It justifies Abram's lying to Pharaoh, while also providing the careful reader of Genesis with a more complete picture of Abram's own inner spiritual struggles. The continuation of the passage challenges God to "do justice for me against him and show your mighty arm against him." Such boldness is not out of character for Abram, as his challenges to God in Gen. chs 15 and 18 show. But it is not to be found in Gen. ch 12. Motifs are thus moved from one section to another where they might appropriately belong. Clearly, one motive for the reworking is to emphasize central features of Abram's personality. Thus ancient reworkings seek to explain not only the legal, but also what we might call the literary aspects of the text, giving insights into character and plot.

Translations

Ancient translations of the Torah into Greek, Aramaic, and Latin are governed by the original texts in ways that reworkings are not. Nevertheless, these translations were often interpretive; they solved interpretive problems, took sides in theological and legal controversies, and expanded narrative and legal material, while purporting merely to convey the meaning of the texts they translate. That this phenomenon was originally connected to the linguistic and cultural difficulties facing those who returned from Babylonia to reconstruct the Temple is suggested by Neh. 8.1–8:

All the people gathered together . . . They asked Ezra the scribe to bring the book of the Torah of Moses . . . Ezra the priest brought the Torah before the assembly, men, women, and all who could hear with understanding . . . He read aloud from . . . dawn until midday facing the men, women, and the interpreters, and . . . all the people were attentive to the book of Torah . . . Ezra the scribe opened the book before the eyes of the entire people . . . When he opened it all of the people stood. Ezra blessed the LORD, the great God and the entire people answered: "Amen, Amen" while raising their hands, bowing down, and prostrating themselves before the LORD with their faces upon the ground . . . Those interpreting the Torah . . . read aloud from the book of the Torah of God, explaining, applying insight, and making the reading comprehensible (author's translation).

Evidently, the audience could not understand the text without some help, and translators (later called meturgemanim) continued to provide such help in rabbinic times. The Rabbis dated the earliest Targumim (plural of "Targum," Aramaic "translation") to the time of Ezra (b. Meg. 3a and b. Ned. 37b) and, in even the earliest rabbinic sources, refer to the public reading of Targum alongside the recitation of the weekly Torah portion. Thus, for example, the halakhot associated with reading and translating are discussed in the Mishnah (Meg. 4:4): "The reader of Torah is not to read less than three verses. He is to read to the meturgeman not more than one verse at a time, or in a reading from the Prophets [i.e., haftarah] not more than three." It was the responsibility of the meturgeman (translator) not only to translate the text, but to render it comprehensible. The Aramaic Targumim (e.g., Targum Onkelos, Targum Neofiti, Fragmentary Targum, and Targum Pseudo-Jonathan) often supplement and gloss biblical narratives, and they take special pains to avoid any suggestion of inappropriate anthropomorphism. For example, in Exod. ch 33, Moses asks God to see His Presence (33.18). Here is the NJPS translation of God's response (Exod. 33.19–23):

And He answered, "I will make all My goodness pass before you, and I will proclaim before you the name LORD, and the grace that I grant and the compassion that I show. But," He said, "you cannot see My face, for man may not see Me and live." And the LORD said, "See, there is a place near Me. Station yourself on the rock and, as My Presence passes by, I will put you in a cleft of the rock and shield you with My hand (kapi) until I have passed by. Then I will take My hand away and you will see My back; but My face must not be seen."

Here kapi is translated "My hand." For the Targumim, however, such a translation would have been problematic, because it suggested that God is embodied and anthropomorphic. Accordingly, the Targumim wanted to emphasize that kapi is used metaphorically to mean "my instrument." They differ, however, in their views about the instrument used. Thus Targum Onkelos writes, "I will shield you with My Memra," understanding Memra (Aramaic for "word" or "utterance") to be a mediating power through which God communicates with human beings. In other Targum traditions (Targum Neofiti, Pseudo-Jonathan, and the Fragmentary Targum) kapi is translated as "the group of angels who stand and minister before Me."

Commentary

Some ancient interpretations are more forthright about what they are doing than these reworkings and translations, such as the pesharim found at Qumran, e.g., Pesher Habakkuk [1QpHab]; Pesher Psalms [4Q171]; Pesher Nahum [4Q169]; Pesher Hosea [4Q166 and 4Q167]; Pesher Isaiah [4Q161–165]. These compositions clearly distinguish between the biblical texts and their interpretations. In this respect, they differ from Genesis Apocryphon, Jubilees, 1 Enoch, 4 Ezra, and many other Second Temple interpretive texts, and they anticipate later rabbinic midrash. To describe themselves, they use the word (p-sh-r), which has a biblical precedent in Daniel, where this verb is used (Dan. 2.5 ff.) to refer to the authorized interpretation of dreams. Consider, for example, this passage from Pesher Habakkuk (1QpHab VII, 1–8):

And God told Habakkuk to write what was going to happen to the last generation, but he did not let him know the consummation of the era. Blank And as for what he says: "So that /may run/ the one who reads it." (Hab. 2.2) Its interpretation concerns the Teacher of Righteousness, to whom God has made known all the mysteries of the words of His servants, the prophets. (Hab. 2.3) For the vision has an appointed time, it will have an end and not fail. Blank Its interpretation: the final age will be extended and go beyond all that the prophets say, because the mysteries of God are wonderful.

Note that the authority of divine revelation is claimed, not only for the prophetic text, but also for its interpretation, which has been given to the Teacher of Righteousness, a figure of great importance to the Qumran community. In Second Temple biblical interpretation, even when interpretation and text were distinguished, interpretations were not presented as personal opinions, or as plausible solutions to exegetical problems. Instead they were presented as having an authority based on divine revelation, thus as originating in the very same source as the text itself. Thus it might be most appropriate to refer to Second Temple writings not as extrabiblical, but rather as authoritative literature. To be sure, many of the interpretive texts which are contemporaneous with some of the exilic texts in the Bible, although not ultimately included in the Jewish canon, were considered to be inspired and to have assumed scriptural stature in various late Second Temple Jewish communities. However, this cannot be stated as a general characterization of all of the materials from Qumran or from Greek-speaking Jewish communities of the late Second Temple period.

Inspired Interpretive Texts by Named Individuals

Philo of Alexandria (ca. 20 BCE–50 CE) left behind a rich legacy of writings including theological essays, allegorical interpretations, explications of biblical laws, and questions and answers on Genesis and Exodus. Composed in Greek within the Hellenized community of Alexandria, which never recovered from its decimation in the 2nd century CE, his works, which interpret the Septuagint (Greek) rather than Hebrew texts, were apparently lost to later Jewish exegetes and philosophers. Indeed, he was appropriated so completely by some Christians that he was retrospectively regarded as a Christian. Only centuries later, during the Reformation, was it recalled that Philo Christianus had in fact been Philo Judaeus. This recognition generated renewed interest by Jewish scholars and repudiation by some Christian theologians. To this day, some scholars interpret Philo as a proto-Christian, while others view him as a proto-rabbinic Jew.

Philo's challenge was different from the challenge confronting the authors of Jubilees or the Genesis Apocryphon. They had to authorize, to an exclusively Jewish audience, what they took to be authentic Judaism, in the face of rival practices and interpretations. Philo, in contrast, had to authorize Judaism itself to both Jews and non-Jews, within the relatively new context of the Hellenistic competition of cultures, a competition that was at the same time political, especially in light of the even newer Roman empire's quest to authorize itself through the appropriation of the Greek philosophical and literary heritage.

The place of Judaism within this new Roman world was far from clear. On the one hand, the significance of the Greek heritage was now as universal as the empire itself sought to be. Near Eastern cultures, which enjoyed the mystique of antiquity and exoticism, could legitimize themselves by identifying their gods with Greek gods and their teachings with Greek teachings. On the other hand, religious syncretism did not cohere easily with Jewish monotheism, and the Mosaic law, which seemed primarily to address Jews alone, was in danger of appearing parochial, thus rendering it potentially threatening to Rome and potentially insignificant to Hellenized Jews.

Thus, in Philo's world, the authority of Mosaic law itself was a live issue. One of his primary objectives was to show through interpretation that biblical texts have universal significance. Philo claimed (Mos. 2:12):

That Moses himself was the best of all law-givers in all countries, better in fact than any that have ever arisen among either the Greeks or the barbarians, and that his laws are most excellent and truly come from God . . .

To be sure, Mosaic law is particular in the sense that it is binding in all its details only for the particular people of Israel. This law does, however, have universal significance in virtue of its special relation to natural law (Mos. 2:14):

But Moses is alone in this, that his laws, firm unshaken, immovable, stamped, as it were, with the seals of nature herself, remain secure from the day when they were first enacted to now, and we may hope that they will remain for all future ages as though immortal, so long as the sun and moon and the whole heaven and universe exist.

Philo used a variety of methods to demonstrate this point. For example, he read the creation story in Genesis as a treatise on philosophical cosmology, akin to Plato's Timaeus, and he interpreted many laws and rituals as having an allegorical level of meaning, at which they signify philosophical doctrines of importance to Gentiles as well as Jews. Philo's immediate influence seems to have been greatest upon Christian interpreters, such as Origen and Clement of Alexandria. But his methods and ideas, transmitted through various intermediaries, resurfaced among medieval Jewish philosophers, for whose biblical interpretation his works serve as a paradigm, although it is likely they did not directly know his writings.

As in Jubilees, Philo perceived the need to explain why the Torah begins not with the revelation of the law at Sinai, but with the stories of creation and the ancestors (Abr. 5):

First he [Moses] wished to show that the enacted ordinances are not inconsistent with nature; and secondly that those who wish to live in accordance with the laws as they stand have no difficult task, seeing that the first generations before any at all of the particular statutes was set in writing followed the unwritten law with perfect ease, so that one might properly say that the enacted laws are nothing else than memorials of the life of the ancients, preserving to a later generation their actual words and deeds.

The point of the narratives was not to convey laws written on heavenly tablets, as it was for Jubilees. Instead, their point was to convey the unwritten law of nature, which was embodied in the exemplary lives of the ancestors. Indeed, the enacted laws peculiar to Israel had to be understood solely as memorials of the lives of these sages. This universalistic interpretation was intended to emphasize, not to undermine, the need for Jews to preserve their particular traditions and observances. But it implied that Jews could only observe the law properly if they understood it not only legally, but also philosophically.

In this spirit, Philo found in biblical narratives a meaning that was both cosmological and psychological. For example, he read the conflict between Cain and Abel as a conflict between the archetype of evil and the archetype of holiness, hence as an allegorical representation of moral conflict within a single human soul. Every detail related about the brothers—their names, their chosen professions, their conceptions of God and their actions—conveyed a moral lesson about the impression of vice or virtue. Thus Cain's name, which Philo derives from the Hebrew verb meaning "to possess," shows that the root of all evil is the belief that humans are possessors of what properly belongs to God. In contrast, Abel's "name means 'one who refers (all things) to God'" (Sacr. 2). Similarly, Cain chose to till the soil, a profession that involved him with earthly and inanimate objects, not with preparation for a future life. In contrast (QG 1:59): "Abel's choice of work as a shepherd is understood as preparatory to rulership and kingship." It is hardly surprising, then, that God preferred Abel's sacrifice. Cain's reaction—the jealous fratricide—only exacerbated his problem by removing the possibility of coming under Abel's virtuous influence (Det. 68):

It would have been to the advantage of Cain, the lover of self, to have guarded Abel; for had he carefully preserved him, he would have been able to lay claim only to a mixed "half and half" life indeed, but would not have drained the cup of sheer unmitigated wickedness.

Thus vice is self-destructive. To be sure, Abel died while Cain survived (Post. 39):

But in my judgement and in that of my friends, preferable to life with impious men would be death with pious men; for awaiting those who die in this way there will be undying life, but awaiting those who live in that way there will be eternal death.

But hope never perishes. When God asks Cain, "Where is your brother?" this shows, according to Philo, that repentance is always possible and that we are consequently responsible for our actions (QG 1:68):

Why does he who knows all ask the fratricide, "Where is Abel, your brother?" He wishes that man himself of his own will shall confess, in order that he may not pretend that all things seem to come about through necessity. For he who killed through necessity would confess that he acted unwillingly; for that which is not in our power is not to be blamed. But he who sins of his own free will denies it, for sinners are obliged to repent. Accordingly he (Moses) inserts in all parts of his legislation that the Deity is not the cause of evil.

Philo's philosophical approach to biblical narratives differed significantly from the approach of Jubilees and kindred works. But Philo also repeatedly connected these narratives to laws mentioned later in the Torah. For example, he connected the story of Cain and Abel to the law that requires that first fruits be brought as an offering. The point was not to show, as Jubilees intended, that the narratives were implicitly legal texts, but that Mosaic law provided solutions for the moral problems confronting all humans. The law is designed to implant healthy theological convictions, to efface evil impressions and to reinforce good ones. Thus, for example, the tiller of soil is commanded to bring the first fruits as an offering to God, and to profess God's dominion over a land to which the farmer is ultimately foreign. Philo's analysis of Cain brings out the wisdom of this law, which is shown to manifest a deep understanding of the human soul.

Thus Philo's interpretations are not wholly unlike the reworkings of biblical traditions found in Jubilees and similar works. But Philo does not present his interpretations as versions of the texts they interpret. Indeed, he could not "rewrite the Bible," since he accepted the story told by the Letter of Aristeas to authorize the Septuagint (see "Jewish Translations of the Bible," pp. 2005–20). According to the Letter, Ptolemy Philadelphus had commissioned a Greek translation of the Bible, which was then produced by seventy Jewish elders who worked in isolation on the island of Pharos, but miraculously produced a single text. Thus, in his relationship to the biblical texts, Philo was more like interpreters after canonization than like his Second Temple contemporaries in the land of Israel.

Philo occasionally presented his interpretations as results of his own insight, but he did this only on occasion, and more frequently appealed to other sources of authority. He invoked "the traditions of the fathers" and claimed divine inspiration. He even insisted, when he interpreted the creation story in Genesis as a philosophical cosmology, that "it is Moses who lays this down, not I" (Opif. 24–25). On the one hand, Philo's self-conscious use of the first-person pronoun exhibits his sense of his own independent activity as an interpreter. On the other hand, he continues to efface himself.

Another important source for pre-rabbinic Jewish interpretations is the voluminous writings of Flavius Josephus, or Joseph bar Matthias (37–100 CE). From the age of 30, Josephus spent his life in Rome during the reigns of Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian. He devoted his life to retelling the history of the Jewish people from the creation of the world (i.e., retelling the history of the Jews beginning with the beginning of Genesis) until the destruction of the Second Temple and the Roman conquest, focusing on the Jewish war with Rome, in which he had participated. At a time when the Jews were under severe attack and criticism, he sought to explain and glorify those who lived in accordance with the law of Moses.

Josephus himself was a member of the priestly aristocracy and was well educated in the traditions of Jewish interpretation. Scholars have noted his extensive supplementation and interpretation of biblical passages. Yet he claimed only to present Scripture itself (Ant. 1.17):

The precise details of our Scripture records will, then, be set forth, each in its place, as my narrative proceeds, that being the procedure that I have promised to follow throughout this work, neither adding nor omitting anything.

This self-effacing claim is, perhaps, best understood in light of Josephus's understanding of what it means to "read" Scripture, i.e., interpret the authoritative texts in the context of the wealth of authoritative interpretation. It is clear that, by the time of Josephus, there was already an extant body of interpretive material that shaped the way Jews read and transmitted the books of Tanakh. When Josephus promised neither to add nor to omit, he did not mean that he would convey only the letter of these books, without also conveying the expansions and interpretations which he considered authoritative.

For example, while in Gen. ch 18 we are told only of Sodom's wickedness, Josephus provides his readers with an extensive gloss on the nature of that wickedness (Ant. 1.194–95):

Now, about this time the Sodomites, overweeningly proud of their numbers and the extent of their wealth, showed themselves insolent to men and impious to the Divinity, insomuch that they no more remembered the benefits that they had received from Him, hated foreigners and avoided any contact with others. Indignant at this conduct, God accordingly resolved to chastise them for their arrogance, and not only to uproot their city, but to blast their land so completely that it should yield neither plant nor fruit whatsoever from that time forward.

Other Second Temple texts—e.g., Wisd. 19.14 and Sir. 16.8—reflect the tradition that arrogance was the principal sin of the Sodomites. In addition, Josephus often explains and justifies actions that may have seemed morally questionable. So, for example, Josephus explained or even justified Joseph's concealment of his own identity (Ant. 2.99):

It was in order to discover news of his father and what had become of him after his own departure that he so acted; he moreover desired to learn the fate of his brother Benjamin, for he feared that by such a ruse as they had practiced on himself, they might have rid the family of him also.

This expansion resembles other Second Temple attempts to explain the characters and motivations of biblical personalities. But, living in Rome immediately after the Roman conquest, Josephus had an additional reason to cast Jewish tradition in a light that was morally favorable.

Like Philo, Josephus sometimes claimed divine authority for his writings. Thus he claimed to be a divine messenger who had to present the inspired word of God (J.W. 3.392–408; Ant. 10.78–79). Indeed, as an eyewitness to the destruction of the Second Temple, he implicitly and repeatedly identified himself with the prophet Jeremiah, who both prophesied and witnessed the destruction of the First Temple. Like Josephus, Jeremiah was also a priest—hence one of those entrusted with the faithful preservation of the records of the history of the Jewish people, which, as Josephus adds, “will continue to be preserved with scrupulous accuracy” (Ag. Ap. 1.29). Clearly, Josephus understood himself to be exercising this priestly and prophetic office, carrying on the work of Scripture transmission through his own inspired interpretations.

Conclusion

While nonrabbinic interpretive texts of the Second Temple period varied significantly in form, they shared two basic assumptions: a commitment to render the Scriptures relevant to the communities they addressed, and a belief in the inspired status of their own interpretations. [HINDY NAJMAN]

Classical Rabbinic Interpretation

By the 1st century CE, Jewish interpretation was beginning a long process of standardization and development. The Rabbis who carried out this program clearly believed that sacred texts contain timeless wisdom; but when preserved in writing, this timeless wisdom becomes in time obscure or difficult to understand, and must therefore be explained. This necessity is the origin of commentary, which can run along a continuum between “pure” types: from the effort to explain the text as it is in itself—what might be called the “original intent” or “plain sense” of the writing—to the effort to interpret the text in contemporary terms in the commentator’s day—the “application” or “practical intent” of the writing. In this sense, rabbinic interpretation functions much as other interpretation does.

The Classical Rabbinic Period

Covering nearly a millennium (1st century–11th century), the rabbinic period is a lengthy and complex era, during which exegetical approaches and traditions developed that link up with inner-biblical and early post-biblical interpretation at one end and with medieval interpretation at the other. Rabbinic tradition developed primarily in two centers: the land of Israel and Babylonia, with the latter gradually becoming more important and influential. In many ways the rabbinic approach to interpretation—comparison of texts, inference according to established procedures, and intense argument over approaches and outcomes—established the “ground rules” for most of subsequent Jewish exegesis until the modern era.

The Historical Background

The Roman empire ruthlessly put down two Jewish efforts at rebellion, in 70 and 135 CE. These events were not the sole cause of the increasing emphasis on study in Judaism, but the first put an end to Temple worship and the second crushed any hope of its restoration. Thereafter, Jewish religious practice was marked to an even greater extent by study of the Bible, and comment on it, as a major religious activity. There had been study before, of course; rabbinic tradition had been handed on. The concerns and universe of discourse of MMT, the halakhic letter from Qumran, indicate that such debates date back to the 2nd century BCE, even in detail and language. Hillel and Shammai and their schools (1st c. BCE to 1st c. CE) argued points of law during the late Second Temple period, up to the time of the Temple’s destruction in 70. That date is a convenient marker for the start of the classical rabbinic era, which is conventionally divided into four periods, with overlapping beginnings and endings for each. Periods are subdivided into generations, with a “generation” generally indicating the passing of a school of teaching from master to student.

SOME TANNAITIC RABBIS

First generation

Gamaliel (sometimes called "the Elder"; late 1st century BCE)

Shimeon ben Gamaliel (1st century CE)

Yoḥanan ben Zakkai (1st century CE)

Second generation

Elder

Gamaliel II (of Yavneh; son of R. Shimeon; born ca. 50 CE)

Eliezer ben Hyrcanus (pupil of R. Yoḥanan ben Zakkai; 1st–2nd century)

Yehoshua ben F̄lananiah (pupil of R. Yoḥanan ben Zakkai; 1st–2nd century)

Younger

Akiva ben Yosef (ca. 40–135)

Ishma'el (or Yishma'el) ben Elisha (early 2nd century)

Third generation

Students of Akiva

Meir (2nd century)

Shimeon bar Yoḥai (2nd century)

Yose ben F̄halaftha (2nd century)

Yehudah bar Ilai (2nd century)

Shimeon ben Gamaliel II (2nd century)

Fourth generation

Judah ha-Nasi ("Rabbi"; ca. 135–220)

Eleazar bar Shimeon (2nd century; son of Shimeon bar Yoḥai)

Fifth generation

Gamaliel III (2nd century)

Rabbinic Periods

The early period, beginning from the followers of Hillel, is that of the tanna'im. A tanna' is one who "repeats" [traditions], i.e., a transmitter or tradent of oral teaching. This period began around 70 CE and extended into the early 3rd century. Prominent in the tannaitic period are Rabbis Gamaliel, Akiva, and Judah ha-Nasi (the last being the rabbi credited with the redaction of the Mishnah; see below). There are five generations of tanna'im, beginning with the schools of Hillel and Shammai and extending to the era of Gamaliel III.

The second period is that of the 'amora'im. An 'amora' is a "speaker" or interpreter. This period, beginning in the 3rd century, lasted until about the 6th. The amoraic period was the talmudic era (see below). The Babylonian 'amora'im are divided into seven "generations" and the land of Israel 'amora'im into five.

The third, little-known period is that of the savora'im. A savora' is an "expositor." These rabbis were members of academies in Babylonia in the 6th century.

The fourth period, which at its end crosses over into medieval interpretation, is that of the ge'onim. A ga'on is the leader of one of the academies in Babylonia; ga'on means "pride" and is a short form of the title ro'sh yeshivat ga'on Ya'akov "head of the academy [that is] the pride of Jacob." The geonic period extends from the mid-6th century to the 11th century, and saw the first efforts at systematic legal commentary of the Talmud. The greatest among these Rabbis was Saadia ben Joseph Gaon (10th century), who began rabbinic study of philosophy and literature, as well as

SOME AMORAIC RABBIS

Land of Israel	Babylonia
First generation
Elder
Ḥiyya (2nd–3rd century)
Bar Kappara (3rd century)
Levi bar Sisi (3rd century)
Ḥaninah bar Ḥama (2nd–3rd century)
Younger
Yannai (known as Rabbah, “the Great,” or Sabba, “the Elder”; 3rd century)	Rav (Abba Arikha, “the Tall”; died ca. 248)
Yehoshua ben Levi (of Lydda; 3rd century)	Mar Shemuel (died ca. 254)
Second generation
Yohanan (ca. 240–279)	Yehudah ben Yeḥezkel (d. 291)
Simeon ben Lakhish (d. ca. 275)
Third generation
Yosi bar Ḥanina	Rabba bar Naḥmani (d. ca. 321)
Abbahu (ca. 300)	Yosef (d. 333)
Eleazar ben Pedat (3rd century)
Ammi bar Natan (ca. 279)
Assi (3rd century)
Ze’era (3rd century)
Fourth generation
Ḥaggai	Abbayei (ca. 278–338)
Yirmiyahu ben Abba (4th century)	Rava (Abba ben Yosef bar Ḥama; 4th century)
Yonah (4th century)
Yosa Aḥa
Fifth generation
Mana	Papa (d. 376)
Yose bar Abin Ḥizkiya
Sixth generation
	Ashi (ca. 335–427)
Seventh generation Yemar
	Mar bar R. Ashi

study of the Bible (rather than only study of the Talmud).

The Texts of the Rabbinic Periods

The major works of the rabbinic period are of two types: those arranged topically, of which the main ones are the Mishnah and the Talmud; and those arranged around the biblical text, Midrash, including the ten collections in the so-called Midrash Rabbah. We will describe these works, noting their types and approximate dates of composition or compilation.

Works arranged topically. The Mishnah is a compilation of the written records of oral discussions of various laws. “Mishnah” means “oral instruction” (from Heb shanah, “repeat,” equivalent to Aramaic teni, from which tanna is derived). It is divided into six "orders," each of which has numerous subsections, called "tractates." The orders are: Zera'im, "Seeds" (rules about agriculture); Mo'ed, "Appointed Times" (rules about Sabbaths and festivals); Nashim, "Women" (primarily marriage laws); Nezikin, "Damages" (rules about money and legal disputes); Kodoshim, "Holy Things" (Temple procedures); and Teharot, "Purities" (ritual impurities and purification). The Mishnah is believed to have been compiled in its final form by Rabbi Judah ha-Nasi ("the Prince," or more correctly, "the Patriarch," the title of the head of the Jewish community in the land of Israel; he is known as "Rabbi") around 200 CE, though it contains material from generations before Rabbi's time.

Other material from the same period, more or less, is contained in the Tosefta ("addition"), a collection of further rabbinic comments on most of the topics covered in the Mishnah. The structure of the Tosefta parallels that of the Mishnah, though it is composed of extra-Mishnaic material.

The Talmud, the major work of Jewish rabbinical interpretation, exists in two forms: "Talmud Yerushalmi," the Jerusalem Talmud (sometimes more accurately called the Talmud of the land of Israel or the Palestinian Talmud) and "Talmud Bavli," the Babylonian Talmud. In references these are abbreviated y. and b. respectively. The Talmud consists of pericopes of the Mishnah, accompanied by a commentary called the Gemara ("learning"). The Talmuds were compiled during the 3rd through the 6th centuries CE, first in Israel (until 370), and later in Babylonia (6th century).

Works organized around the biblical text. The Midrash Rabbah ("Great Midrash") is a collection of rabbinic comments on the biblical text, which in its final form (Venice, 1545) contains ten midrashim: the five books of the Torah, Genesis through Deuteronomy, and the Five Scrolls, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther. Individual sections are referred to by their biblical title, for instance, Genesis Rabbah (or Bereshit Rabbah), Lamentations Rabbah, and so on. Despite their final publication in one volume, however, these works arose at widely different times, with Genesis Rabbah generally regarded as the earliest (ca. 5th century CE), followed by Leviticus Rabbah (slightly later). The latest are Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. To complicate matters further, some of these works are composite arrangements of works from different periods.

Halakhah and Aggadah. Cutting across the categories of separate works are the two main descriptive types of rabbinic comment: halakhah, or legal comment, and aggadah, or non-legal comment. Halakhah (from halakh, "go, walk") refers to the "way" of Torah; halakhah itself is concerned with explicating, applying, and in general making sense of the legal materials in the Bible. Aggadah is a much more amorphous category: it includes theology, lore, legend, sayings, prayer and praise—in fact, it seems to be a catch-all for whatever is not halakhah.

Principles of Rabbinic Interpretation

Rabbinic interpretation is characterized by several methods, the principles and illustrations of which we will examine below. The Rabbis themselves proposed various descriptive lists of types of interpretation, of which the shortest and best-known is attributed to Hillel (1st century BCE). Hillel found seven types of interpretation:

- Kal vahomer: the deduction from a minor case to a major case.
- Gezerah shavah: drawing an analogy between texts based on a word in common
- Binyan 'av mikatuv 'ehad: applying a principle derived from one verse
- Binyan 'av mishenei ketuvim: applying a principle derived from two verses
- Kelal uferat uferat ukelal: modification of a general principle derived from a particular principle; modification of a particular principle derived from a general principle
- Kayotze' bo bemakom 'aher: principles derived from similar passages

• Davar halamed me'inyano: deduction from context

Rabbinic method also included such ancient types as notarikon, where each consonant of a Hebrew word was taken as an abbreviation for a different word. The Rabbis, for example, parsed the first word of the Decalogue, 'anokhi, "I," as an acronym of the (Aramaic) words 'ana' ketavit yehavit—"I [God] wrote it [and] gave it." This method was employed by Babylonian and Assyrian scribes long before the rabbinic era.

The earliest texts containing rabbinic interpretation were edited after 200 CE, and the origins of the system that gave birth to these texts must be inferred from texts of earlier groups (see "Early Nonrabbinic Interpretation," pp. 1835-44).

For two reasons we will concentrate on halakhah rather than aggadah. First, the Talmuds were much more explicitly consistent in their presentation of such texts, their methods are easier to understand, and consequently their development is also easier to trace. Second, these texts and methods are relatively unexplored in modern academic discourse. Nevertheless, more purely homiletical methods will also be described at the end of this essay.

Broadly speaking, rabbinic exegesis may be explained in three ways: historically, phenomenologically, and functionally. The historical approach looks at the development of interpretation. The functional approach seeks to understand the purposes of interpretation. Finally, the phenomenological approach studies methods of interpretation. This study combines all these perspectives.

Omnisignificance

James Kugel has proposed the term "omnisignificance" to describe the essential stance of rabbinic interpretation. These interpreters assume that there is no detail of the text, however insignificant it may seem, that does not carry meaning. Further, this meaning is not merely a matter of emphasis or rhetorical variation; the text intends to teach, and it intends this with every part of itself. The interpreter must find the correct analytical tool to make the teaching clear.

This is a restatement of the rabbinic interpretation of Deut. 32:47: "'For it is not an empty thing for you, it is your very life,' and if [it appears] devoid [of moral or halakhic meaning]—it is you [who have not worked out its moral or legal significance]" (y. Ketub. 8:11 [32c]). In rabbinic terms omnisignificance has a sharply limited and highly focused range: It is restricted to moral, theological, or legal interpretations. A rabbinic comment attributed to the mid-3rd century scholar in the land of Israel, R. Simeon ben Lakhish, will illustrate this: "There are verses which are worthy of being burnt, but they are [after all, when properly understood,] essential components of Torah" (b. Hul. 60b). "Omnisignificance" is not only a fundamental assumption of the rabbinic view of Scripture, it also guides interpretation into well-defined channels and establishes a hierarchy of exegetical alternatives.

It also presents a challenge. Having claimed such profundity for all of Scripture, the rabbinic program should deliver on its promise. But the Bible contains a great deal of material which, by rabbinic standards, is not legal, ritual, moral, ethical, or theological: stories of Israelite ancestors, genealogies, poetry (not all of it religious), census lists, geographical and dynastic information of dubious interest to a legal scholar. Thus the Mekhilta (a halakhic midrash on Exodus) runs only from Exod. 12.1 to 35.3, and skips long passages about the construction of the Tabernacle in Exod. chs 25-40, except for brief sections relating to 31.12-17 and 35.1-3. There is no halakhic midrash on Genesis at all. A truly omnisignificant program would fit in all the non-legal and non-edificatory passages. It would also cover what is missing. For instance, the Torah lacks explicit mention of matters that the Rabbis—and most Jews—would consider essential, such as the obligation to pray regularly. True, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob pray, Moses prays, Joshua prays, but regular prayer is not mandated, nor is its structure laid down. The Rabbis settled on Deut. 11.13, "serving Him with all your heart," as referring to prayer, which is "the service of the heart" (b. Ta'an. 2a), but this reference is very vague.

Thus the promise was never totally fulfilled. Omnisignificance is a rabbinic view of Scripture rather than a complete exegetical program, and an ideal which was never actually realized. Not every scriptural text has been interpreted as a strictly "religious" one. The available collections of classic rabbinic texts do not constitute an omnisignificant corpus; not only do they fail to deal with many verses, and even whole biblical chapters, but features which are considered significant—legally or morally—in one context are ignored in others. The rabbinic program or programs do not even attempt to provide a complete commentary, in whatever mode, to any biblical book, chapter, or passage, though in some heavily halakhic chapters in Leviticus something resembling a complete commentary could be composed (an attempt to do so was the Vilna Gaon, in 'Aderet 'Eliyahu). Indeed, the statement quoted above, "if [it appears] devoid [of moral or halakhic meaning]—it is you [who have not worked out its moral or legal significance]," which is reported in the name of the fifth-generation authority, R. Mana, is an admission of this failure and a rebuke to his colleagues or disciples.

There is another aspect to this problem. The doctrine of omnisignificance assumes a uniform narrative or expository density in Scripture; the biblical text is presumed to be uniformly informative on some level. The preserved rabbinic exegetical materials available to us do not bear out this assumption, however. For example, the phrases 'ish 'ish, "every man," (Lev. 15.2; 17.3, 8, 10, 13; 18.6; 20.2, 9; 22.4, 18; 24.15; Num. 1.4; 4.19, 49; 5.12; 9.10) and 'ish, "a man," (Lev. 19.20) are sometimes interpreted as including women (b. Zevah. 108b), but at other times not, since the verse itself includes them within its purview when it employs the phrase, 'ish 'o 'ishah, "a man or a woman" (Lev. 13.29, 38). Why does Scripture employ these variations? The impression one receives is that rabbinic exegesis reflects a concerted effort to harmonize such expressions and level their applications. Women are included in the expression "every man," as they are in the expression "a man," and of course explicitly in the expression "a man or a woman." The Rabbis never raise these questions in a systematic way.

The omnisignificant imperative proceeds directly from the view of the Torah and the entire Bible as divine revelation; it serves to justify interpretive approaches to biblical texts. Nevertheless, in practice this principle was not universally applied to all biblical texts nor was the meaning restricted to narrow halakhic or moral categories. Indeed, plain-sense interpretations are not excluded, so long as they have legal, ritual, or edificatory value. At times, then, the interpretation borders on what we would consider the plain sense of the text, so long as it has omnisignificant ramifications.

Goals and Methods of Rabbinic Interpretation

Rabbinic interpretation was concerned to increase the understanding of the text and its acceptability. The Rabbis also aimed to define legal requirements more exactly. The resulting explanations were primarily concerned with interpreting biblical passages in terms that were more understandable or palatable to their contemporaries, and to provide exact definitions and interpretations for biblical verses that had legal or ritual significance.

An example of the first is found in the rabbinic dispute over whether the case of a "rebellious son" of Deut. 21.18–21 ever occurred, or whether it was presented as part of the Deuteronomic legislation merely as an object lesson.

R. Judah said: If [the "stubborn and rebellious" son's] mother is not like his father in voice, appearance and stature, he does not become a stubborn and rebellious son [and thus subject to the death penalty]. Why so? Scripture said: "he will not obey our voice" (Deut. 21.20), and since they must be identical in voice, they must also be [identical] in appearance and stature. . . . There never has been a "stubborn and rebellious" son, and never will be. Why then was the law written? That you may expound it and receive a reward. . . . [This may agree with R. Simeon, who said:] Because one [= the son] eats a tartemar (about 180 grams) of meat and drinks half a log (about a cup) of Italian wine, shall his father and mother have him stoned? But it never happened and never will happen. Why then was the law written? That you may expound it and receive a reward (b. Sanh. 71a).

R. Judah interprets the biblical description of the parents' complaint that their son does "not obey our voice" as mandating that their voices be identical, and the Talmud takes this as an impossible condition. How often will a father and mother have the same "voice, appearance and stature"?

Precise interpretation of a grammatical element is commonly used for legal or ritual texts which are intended to be carried out. Indeed, in other cases, the requirement that two elements of the act be identical is not absolute: for instance, the Mishnah prescribes that the sin offerings brought on the Day of Atonement be alike, but that requirement may be waived (m. Yoma 6:1). It is clear, however, that the imperatives of the two cases are different. Sacrifices must be offered, but executing a rebellious son for being a glutton and a drunkard seemed excessive to R. Simeon. This insistence on the exactitude of biblical expressions is typical of rabbinic interpretation of biblical texts, even when there is no apparent cultural disparity between the biblical and rabbinic worlds. It is bound up with the rabbinic view of Scripture's exceedingly precise mode of expression. While it was in all likelihood Scripture's divine origin that allowed such a mode of interpretation to gain sway, once established, this mode was adopted for rabbinic texts as well, and we find 4th- and 5th-century Rabbis applying similar modes of interpretation to the Mishnah and other rabbinic texts, and later authorities doing the same to the Talmuds and later texts.

Duplications and Redundancies

Of particular concern to the Rabbis were two challenges to the omnisignificant view: duplications and contradictions. How could an omnisignificant text tolerate either of these departures from the precision posited of it? If every letter were weighed, how could Scripture seemingly contradict itself, repeat itself, or deal with matters that seemed not terribly significant to the Rabbis? We will examine their methods for dealing with duplications, which probably concerned them as much as contradictions, if only because, from their point of view, there were so many of them.

Generally speaking, redundancies and duplications are interpreted as they may be applied to actual cases, so as to draw distinctions between apparently similar, identical, or contradictory passages. While the Babylonian Talmud states this principle only for legal texts (as in b. Bek. 6b), it clearly also applies, though with different methods, to nonlegal passages. This method of dealing with redundancies expanded to include all sorts of interpretation, and became typical of the traditional approach to most of the problems outlined above. As the medieval tosafists (commentators on the Talmud during the 12th–14th centuries) noted, only when these methods fail should one fall back on the plain sense (see Tosafot Sot. 3a, s.v. lo).

Examples of the Rabbis dealing with duplicate passages are numerous in the interpretive material from the 2nd century onward. One example is found in the various Torah passages regarding the law of a "Hebrew slave." The Mekhilta on Exod. chs 21–22 includes a section on the laws pertaining to a "Hebrew slave" in Exod. 21.4–7, which must be coordinated with another passage relating to slavery in Lev. 25.39–46, and, ultimately, to Deut. 15.12–18. It does so by distinguishing between the application of each of these passages.

You say that Scripture here deals with one sold into servitude by the court for stealing, telling us that such a one must serve not only the one who bought him but also the latter's son after him. Perhaps however it deals only with one who sells himself? When it says: "And if thy brother be waxen poor with thee and sell himself unto thee" (Lev. 25.39), behold the one selling himself is here spoken of. Why then should Scripture say here: "If thou buy a Hebrew slave?" It must therefore deal with one sold into slavery by the court for stealing, telling that such a one must serve not only the one who bought him but also the latter's son after him. (Mekhilta, ed. Lauterbach, vol. III p. 3)

Since the Exodus passage does not specify the cause of the sale into slavery while the Leviticus passage does, the Rabbis might have simply harmonized the two. The essential difficulty, that Exod. 21.2 specifies a six-year term of servitude, while Lev. 25.40 mandates a variable term, depending on when in the jubilee cycle the sale took place, could perhaps have been reconciled in some way; for example, the six-year term could have been required, while serving until the jubilee would have applied to a case in which the slave wanted to continue with his master, as, indeed, the Mekhilta itself does suggest in the case of an Israelite sold by the court. No new category would have had to be created. But by creating a new distinction, the Rabbis accounted not only for the overlap between the two passages but the very existence of two separate passages ostensibly dealing with but one topic: the Hebrew slave.

Finally, there is the third passage, Deut. 15.12–18, which specifies a term of six years, with the slave going out in the seventh loaded down with gifts. Sifre Deut. 119 deals explicitly with the relationship of this passage to the two categories of Hebrew slave already established, and to the Hebrew maidservant of Exod. 21.7–12.

When you set him free, do not let him go empty-handed. Furnish him out of the flock, threshing floor, and vat. . . . Perhaps we only furnish the one who goes out in six years (Exod. 21.2); whence [do we know that this applies also] to the one who departs in the jubilee (Lev. 25.40) or with the death of the master (referring to Exod. 21.2–6) and the Hebrew maidservant with her displaying signs of puberty (Exod. 21.7–12)? Scripture says: "You shall set free" (Deut. 15.12), "when you shall set free" (Deut. 15.13), "when you shall set him free" (ibid.)—[thus applying to all three cases].

This passage thus harmonizes and distinguishes among the various Torah texts referring to Hebrew servitude. These texts display differing emphases and phraseology, and thus offer opportunities for both means of exegesis.

What then do the Rabbis do when the repetition or repetitions are identical? Such a problem is posed by the threefold appearance of the prohibition of seething a kid in its mother's milk in Exod. 23.19, 34.26, and Deut. 14.21.

Why is this law stated in three places? To correspond to the three covenants which the Holy One, blessed be He, made with Israel: One at Horeb (Exod. 24.7–8), one in the plains of Moab (Deut. 29.11), and one on Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal (Deut. 28.69). . . .

R. Jonathan says: Why is this law stated in three places? Once to apply to domestic animals, once to apply to wild animals, and once to apply to fowl.

Abba Ḥanin states in the name of R. Eliezer: Why is this law stated in three places? Once to apply to large cattle, once to apply to goats, and once to apply to sheep.

R. Simeon ben Eleazar says: Why is this law stated in three places? Once to apply to large cattle, once to apply to small cattle, and once to apply to wild animals.

R. Simeon ben Yoḥai says: Why is this law stated in three places? One is a prohibition against eating it, one is a prohibition against deriving any benefit from it, and one is a prohibition against the mere cooking of it.

Here the threefold mention is interpreted by means of standard matrices involving three classes, either of animals or of prohibited actions (eating, drinking, or deriving benefit). In the nature of things, as we might expect, not all of these matrices are equally compelling. In rabbinic literature, the animal world is regularly divided into domestic animals, wild animals, and fowl, and domestic animals in turn are subdivided into large and small cattle, so that R. Simeon ben Eleazar's division into large and small cattle, and wild animals, while somewhat unusual, is certainly in line with convention (though Abba Ḥanin's statement dividing animals into large and small cattle, and then subdividing small cattle into goats and sheep, does seem simply to be an effort to use the three repetitions). Thus, rabbinic exegesis combines the attempt to relate scriptural texts with rabbinic categories (which are often based on Scripture in any case; e.g., Gen. 2.20 for domestic animals, wild animals, and fowl) with the modification of those categories to fit a particular distribution of verses. This can often result in an elaborate series of arguments designed to demonstrate that each verse, though seemingly redundant, is intended to counter a particular hypothetical argument.

Though it is not explicitly stated, these examples illustrate the use of a principle attributed to R. Ishmael, an authority of the first half of the 2nd century and colleague of R. Akiva: "Every passage that is said and repeated is repeated only for the sake of the new information [contained] in it." This principle underwent an interesting and characteristic metamorphosis in the course of time. Originally it seems to have been intended as a "cap" on expositions: In the case of the duplicate passages, only the differences, or more precisely the pluses in the duplicate passage, are expounded, not the repetitions themselves, which by definition contain no new information. Thus, in the case of the duplicate lists of animals forbidden to be eaten in Lev. 11.1–28 and Deut. 14.3–21, the Babylonian Talmud first cites a view which explains the repetitive mention of the camel (in Deut. 14.7 as opposed to Lev. 11.4) as an animal which is forbidden to be eaten as coming to include as forbidden the offspring of a camel which resembles a clean animal. Later in the discussion, the following teaching is quoted:

Why is [the list of clean and unclean animals] repeated? Because of the shesu'ah [according to rabbinic interpretation, an animal with two backs and two spinal columns, which is mentioned only in the Deuteronomic passage]. Why with regard to birds? Because of the ra'ah [a bird mentioned only in Deut. 14.13].—Then, perhaps, [the repetition of] "camel," "camel" [in both books] comes for the same purpose [that is, the camel "comes along for the ride" in order to provide a context for the two additions, and not for any other purpose]?—Nevertheless, whenever we can derive [a lesson from the biblical text], we do so (b. Bek. 6b).

The ideal here is to derive a lesson from every repetition. Every part of it is subject to interpretation, if only we can interpret it. If we cannot, a lacuna exists, which may be filled later or in messianic times, in accord with R. Yoḥanan's fervent wish as expressed in b. Menahot 45a: "This passage will be interpreted by Elijah in the future [in the messianic era]." Maimonides (1135–1204), on the other hand, rejected such amplifications; he seems to have been of the opinion that post-talmudic authorities could not multiply "counts" on their own, but only when they had already been made by a talmudic source.

This is not to say that the Rabbis did not have other methods of dealing with such problems. But for all their ingenuity, a not insignificant amount of Scripture escaped their treatment, at least as we may judge from the surviving compilations of late antiquity. We may understand the well-known rabbinic story of b. Menahot 29b in this light.

R. Judah said in the name of Rav: When Moses ascended on high he found the Holy One, blessed be He, engaged in affixing coronets [small strokes on the tops of certain letters in a Torah scroll] to the letters. Said Moses: "Lord of the Universe, who prevents You [from giving the Torah without these coronets]?" He answered: "There will arise a man at the end of many generations, Akiva ben Joseph by name, who will expound heaps and heaps of laws upon each stroke." "Lord of the Universe, let me see him." He said: "Turn around." Moses went and sat down behind eight rows [of R. Akiva's disciples and listened to his expositions of the Torah]. He was not able to follow the arguments and was depressed, but when they came to a certain subject and the disciples said to the master, "How do you know it?" and [R. Akiva] replied: "It is a law given to Moses at Sinai," he was comforted. He then returned to the Holy One, blessed be He, and said, "Lord of the Universe, You have such a man and you give the Torah through me?" He replied: "Be silent, for such is My decree." Moses then said, "Lord of the Universe, You have shown me his Torah [teaching], show me his reward." "Turn around," said He. Moses turned around and saw them weighing out [R. Akiva's] flesh in the market stalls [after his martyrdom in the Hadrianic persecutions]. "Lord of the Universe! Such Torah, and such a reward!" He replied: "Be silent, for such is My decree."

We have no legal expositions based on the coronets of the letters of the Torah in the name of R. Judah or Rav, or, indeed, any earlier or later authorities. Unless we posit a tremendous ("heaps and heaps") amount of lost interpretation, we must assume that this story refers to those parts of the Torah which still lacked a definitive rabbinic exposition.

Argument by Analogy and the Ribbuy ("Extension")

The argument by analogy is characteristic of rabbinic interpretation as a whole. For example, the common biblical Hebrew phrase 'ish 'ish, "a man, a man," i.e., "every man," "each man," by extension "every person," is often interpreted as including classes of people other than males. This is because the phrase is considered redundant, since 'ish alone may mean the same. From that phrase the Rabbis derive, in various contexts, the applicability of the relevant rule to women, children, proselytes, their wives, non-Jews, or, in some cases, people of indeterminate sex or hermaphrodites. The fact that all of these are derived by analogy does not mean that there is a uniformity of choice, though. The form the analogy takes depends on the context. Thus, the prohibition of incest (Lev. 20.2) includes non-Jews:

"And say (to'mar) to the Children of Israel," "and speak (tedaber) to the Children of Israel," "say ('emor) to the Children of Israel," "speak (daber) to the Children of Israel," "instruct (tzav) the Children of Israel," "and you shall instruct (tetzaveh) the Children of Israel"—R. Yose says: "The Torah speaks in the human language in many expressions, and all must be expounded (lehidaresh): 'Israel'—this refers to Israel (i.e., male Jews); 'sojourner' (ger)—this refers to the proselyte (ger); "the proselyte"—this includes the wives of proselytes; 'in Israel'—this includes women and slaves. If so, why does [Scripture] say 'ish 'ish? To include non-Jews" (Sifra Kodoshim 10:1–2, ed. Weiss 91b).

Nevertheless, 'ish is always taken to exclude minors, even when some other means is employed to bring them within the applicability of the rule in question. Thus, in regard to the skin diseases commonly rendered as "leprosy" in Lev. 13.44, we find the following:

'ish, "a man"—From where [do we know this] to include a woman or a minor? Scripture states: "tzaru'a," "one suffering from a skin disease," whether a man or a woman or a minor. If so, why is 'ish stated? For a matter [stated] below: a man unbinds his hair and undoes his clothes but a woman does not unbind her hair or undo her clothes (Sifra Tzri'a 12:1, ed. Weiss, 67d).

Minors are included by means of an interpretation of the word tzaru'a, despite the exclusion signalled by 'ish. Note also that the definite article, which in Hebrew is registered by a one-letter prefix, may also be used as a hook on which to hang an analogical interpretation. The word ha-ger, "the sojourner," or rather the "ha-" prefix, is taken to include the wives of proselytes, while the word be-Yisrael, "in Israel" is taken to include women and slaves. Ordinarily, the category of "women" is included by the repetition of the word 'ish, as in the expression 'ish 'ish noted above. Here there is only one 'ish, and, instead, women are included in this way.

Rava and the Omnisignificant Revolution

Over time these inconsistencies in the application of methods became a matter of concern to later scholars, especially the great fourth-generation Babylonian 'amora' of the second quarter of the 4th century, Rava, and some of his predecessors in the land of Israel as well, particularly the third-generation tanna' R. Ilai. Both were concerned with inconsistent uses of analogy, but Rava was concerned with the inconsistent use of the omnisignificant principle itself. Rava's concern manifested itself in a systematic research program into the limits of the application of omnisignificance, motivated, it would seem, both by his own powers of systematization, his apparently strong interest in the subject of halakhic interpretation, and by challenges to rabbinic interpretation and authority in his own time and place. Unlike most other rabbinic authorities, he seems to have had wide communal responsibilities in the city of Mahoza, which was located on the west bank of the River Tigris directly across from the Persian capital of Ctesiphon. The political head of Babylonian Jewry, the Head of the Exile, who also had standing as a Persian nobleman, was headquartered there, and adjacent to Mahoza was the catholicos, the head of the Nestorian Church, in Seleucia, then known as Veh-Ardaxshir. The cosmopolitan population that Rava ministered to was skeptical of rabbinic authority and exegesis, and this undoubtedly helped lead him to searching examinations of its aims and methods.

Rava was concerned with why the Rabbis interpreted some words and phrases in certain texts but not in others. Beyond that, he was concerned with why Scripture itself expends greater effort in expounding certain matters while leaving others relatively unexamined. In all these ways, and others, Rava explores the limits of omnisignificant interpretation as it existed in his day. In ten passages in the Babylonian Talmud (nine attributed to Rava [b. Kid. 9a, B. K. 77b, Mak. 8a, Tem. 6b, Yoma 63b, 'Arak. 30b, Ned. 80b; the tenth, Tem. 28b, is anonymous and may be redactional]), and in four similar cases in the Talmud of the land of Israel (all attributed to R. Ilai [y. Yoma 3.6 (40c), Meg. 1:12 (72a) = Hor. 3.3 (47c-d), Yebam. 6.4 (7c)]), the inconsistency of the application of rabbinic exegetical principles to specific texts is examined. For example, in b. Kid. 9a we have the following:

Our Rabbis taught: [A woman is acquired in marriage] by a document: How so? If A writes for B on a paper or a shard, even if not intrinsically worth a perutah: "Your daughter be consecrated to me," "your daughter be betrothed to me," [or] "your daughter be my wife," she is betrothed.

R. Zera ben Memmel objected: But this document is unlike a deed of purchase: there the seller writes: "My field is sold to you," while here the husband [i.e., the "acquirer"] writes: "Your daughter be consecrated to me."

Rava replied: There [the form is determined] by scriptural context, and here

[likewise it is determined] by scriptural context. There it is written, "and he sell some of his possessions" (Lev. 25.25), thus Scripture made it dependent on the seller; while here it is written "when a man [takes a woman]" (Deut. 24.1), thus making it dependent on the husband."

Thus, legal rules based on scriptural texts are expected to be consistent, and their inconsistencies must be accounted for.

This insistence on consistency extends to a demand for a minimally uniform density of scriptural interpretation even within one passage. For example, in Deut. 22.1, 3, Scripture states: "If you see your fellow's ox or sheep gone astray, do not ignore it; you must take it back to your fellow. . . . You shall do the same with his ass; you shall do the same with his garment; and so too shall you do with anything that your fellow loses and you find: you must not remain indifferent."

Said Rava: Why does the All Merciful mention "an ox, a donkey, a sheep and a garment" [in Deut. 22.1, 3]?

For had the All Merciful mentioned "garment" [alone], I would have thought [that] that applies only if the object [can be identified] by witnesses or the object itself has a mark [of distinction by which it may be identified], but not in the case of a donkey [for which these means of identification do not apply]. [That is,] if its saddle [can be identified] by witnesses or its saddle has a mark [of distinction by which it may be identified], I might think that it need not be returned to him. Therefore the All Merciful mentioned "a donkey" to show that even the donkey [too is returned] by virtue of the mark of the saddle.

Why did the All Merciful mention "ox" and "sheep"? "Ox"—that even the shearing of its tail, and "sheep"—that even its shearings [must be returned]. Then the All Merciful should have mentioned [only] "ox" for the shearings of its tail, and the shearings of a sheep would follow a fortiori!

But, says Rava, "donkey" mentioned in connection with a pit [in Exod. 21.33: "And if a man should open a pit . . . and an ox or a donkey should fall therein. . . ."] on R. Judah's view [which rejects the rabbinic use of the term to exclude vessels damaged in such a case] and "sheep" in connection with a lost article [in Deut. 22.1, 3] on all views, are difficult [in that they do not seem to serve any exegetical purpose] (b. B. M. 27a).

Clearly, Rava's concern with the interface of rabbinic interpretation and the formulation of biblical laws borders onto questions involving the construction of the biblical text itself.

According to geonic tradition, Rava was the head of the combined Babylonian academy, so that most of the authorities of the fifth generation were his disciples and continued to carry on this program. The Babylonian Talmud contains long passages working out the details of Rava's concerns, passages that have almost no parallels in the Talmud of the land of Israel.

Other Developments in Rabbinic Interpretation

Taking Contradictory Verses into Account

Various passages in both Talmuds show methodological concerns that parallel those of Rava. For instance, there is the phenomenon of a sort of "round-robin" of queries designed to elucidate how an interpreter deals with the verses or phrases which seem to counter his own interpretation, or for which his own interpretation does not account. The Talmud of the land of Israel presents a dialogue between the schools of Shammai and Hillel. The school of Shammai maintains that not only is labor on the Sabbath prohibited, but one may not even initiate a process that proceeds automatically, on its own, during the Sabbath. The school of Hillel, however, permits this. The Talmud inquires into the scriptural support for the two positions.

Mishnah: The school of Shammai say: Ink, dyes and alkaline plants may not be steeped [in water in order to further the dyeing process] unless they can be dissolved while it is still daylight [before the Sabbath begins], but the school of Hillel permit it.

Talmud: And what is the reason of the school of Shammai [to prohibit]? "Six days shall you labor and do all your work" (Exod. 20.9)—complete all your work while it is still daylight [before the Sabbath, that is, during the six days of the week, and not on the Sabbath].

And what is the reason of the school of Hillel? "Six days shall you labor . . . and [the seventh] day" (Exod. 20.9–10)—[that is, you may complete your work on the seventh day—the Sabbath—so long as it is done as the automatic continuation of a process that began before the Sabbath] (y. Shab. 1:5 [3d–4a]).

How do the school of Hillel interpret the [verse used by the school of Shammai to justify] their reason? "Six days shall you labor and do all your work" [but not on the Sabbath]—this refers to working actually done by hand [and not automatically].

And how do the school of Shammai interpret the [verse used by the school of Hillel to justify] their reason? "Six days shall you labor . . . and on [the seventh] day"—this refers to [the following permitted process]: One may open a water-canal to a garden on the eve of the Sabbath [that is, before the Sabbath begins,] and [the garden] is watered [automatically] on the Sabbath.

Thus, each position must not only be justified on the basis of its own independent interpretation of the relevant biblical verses, but it must account for the verses or phrases employed by its opponents. This form of debate eventually made its way into nonlegal contexts, more often in the Babylonian Talmud. Ultimately, the legal point was seen to hinge on a methodological disagreement as to the proper interpretation of the biblical verse. This formal disagreement served to underline the essential biblical basis of these disputes.

Assessing Analogies

Since much of rabbinic interpretation is based on some form of analogy, there are cases in which the Rabbis were faced with competing analogies, and had to decide which to choose. When these choices were made early on, and appear later without explicit justifications, redactors must somehow account for them. Thus, for example, one midrashic text on Deut. 15.12 and Exod. 21.2 ("six years must he serve") proposes that a Hebrew slave may serve not only his master but his master's son, but not his master's heir.

Who whispered to you to include the son [in the "he shall serve" of the verse, as one whom the slave must serve] and to exclude the heir? I include the son who takes his father's place in regard to affiancing a Hebrew maidservant [as laid down in Exod. 21.9–10] and a field of inheritance [as per Lev. 25.25–28], and I exclude the heir who does not take the father's place [that is, the place of the master, who in this case is not the son of the father but merely his heir] and for a field of inheritance (Sifre Re'eh 118, ed. Finkelstein, pp. 177–178).

Thus, the rule regarding whom a Hebrew slave must serve may be likened to one in which only the son has a part, or to one in which (as in the case of Num. 27.6–11, which sets out the order of inheritance, though the son has priority) other heirs have a place. In this case, since the son has an exclusive right in the cases enumerated, he is assumed to have exclusive rights here too, and not merely priority as in the case of inheritance.

The Beginning of the End

Ironically, by the time Rava began his efforts at systematization, some of the options available were already being eliminated. A Babylonian version of an anecdote about the great second-generation 'amora' of the land of Israel, R. Yoḥanan, the most frequently cited authority in either Talmud, whose disciples made up the greater part of the third generation of 'amora'im, is depicted as declaring that the exposition of the letter vav was no longer possible.

R. Yoḥanan was [once] sitting and expounding: "Notar [a portion of a sacrifice left over beyond the prescribed time for eating it and which must be burnt on the third day, see Lev. 7:17] must be burnt in its [proper] time during the day; when not in its proper time, it may be burnt during the day or at night."

R. Eleazar [ben Pedat] raised an objection to R. Yoḥanan: "I only [know] that a child which must be circumcized on the eighth day must be circumcized during the day; how do I [know this of] a child circumcized on the ninth, tenth, eleventh or twelfth? It is stated: "And on the day" [Lev. 12:3]. And even one who does not expound a vav will expound a vav-heh ("and" and "the")."

[R. Yoḥanan] remained silent. After [R. Eleazar] left, R. Yoḥanan said to Resh Laqish: "Did you see [Eleazar] ben Pedat sitting and expounding like Moses in the name of the Almighty!"

Said Resh Laqish to him: "Is it then his [teaching]? It is really a baraita."

"Where is it taught?"

"In Torat Kohanim [= Sifra, the halakhic midrash on Leviticus]."

[R. Yoḥanan] went out, memorized it in three days and mastered it in three months (b. Yebam. 72b).

The parallel in the Talmud of the land of Israel is couched in different terms (y. Shab. 2:1 [4c]), but the essential point is that neither Talmud records any such exposition of a vav by any authority after R. Yoḥanan's time. (See b. Yebam. 68a,b for Rav and b. B. M. 8b, both first-generation Babylonian 'amora'im and senior to R. Yoḥanan.) R. Yoḥanan's decision thus seems to have marked a turning point in amoraic midrashic exposition.

This does not mean that 'amora'im abandoned the field of ribbuy—expounding extensions based on Hebrew particles or single letters. Though we do not find the letter vav expounded for this purpose, R. Yoḥanan himself does expound other Hebrew prepositions and conjunctives: 'o, "or" (b. Shab. 63b), 'im, "if" (b. B. K. 43b), gam, "also" (b. 'Arak. 7a). But over time the 'amora'im did less and less of this type of exposition. On the other hand, we find authorities of the fourth generation, both in Israel and Babylonia, treating duplications in the Mishnah not too differently from the way they treated biblical verses. One example, which is expounded in both Talmuds, will illustrate the point.

Mishnah Shabbat 11:4: If one throws [an object over a distance of] four cubits in the sea, he is not liable [for transgressing the Sabbath law]. If there is a water pool and a public road traverses it, and one throws [an object] four cubits therein, he is liable. And what depth constitutes a pool? Less than ten handbreadths. If there is a water pool and a public road traverses it, and one throws [an object] four cubits therein, he is liable.

Gemara: One of the rabbis said to Rava: As for "traversing" [mentioned] twice, that is well, [as] it informs us this: (1) traversing with difficulty is designated "traversing" [for purposes of the Sabbath laws]; (2) use with difficulty is not designated use. But why state "pool" twice?—One refers to summer and one to winter, and both are necessary. For if only one were stated, I would say: That is only in summer, when people walk therein to cool themselves, but in winter [this is] not [the case]. And if we were told [this] of winter, [I would say that] they do not object [to wading through the pool], but not in summer.

The Talmud of the land of Israel on this Mishnah also adverts to this problem, and expounds the duplicate text in a similar way, and also in the name of a fourth-generation authority, R. Pinḥas (y. Shab. 11:4 [13a]).

Why was it taught twice? R. Ḥanina in the name of R. Pinḥas: [This text refers to a case in which there were] two pools, one through which people walked and one through which people did not walk, except when they were forced to, so that you do not say that since people do not walk through [it] except when they are forced to, it is not [considered] public ground but private ground; accordingly, you must say that it is public ground.

Thus, in the course of time, less and less recourse was made to the midrashic exposition of biblical verses, and more and more emphasis was given to extracting what information was available—even quasi-midrashically—from early rabbinic sources themselves. By the geonic period, under challenge from the Karaites, the system of halakhic midrash had closed down. Rava's work is to be dated closer to the beginning of this process than to its end, and he does make use of particular rabbinic exegetical principles. But, as we have seen, and as he admits, he cannot fill in every gap.

Nonlegal Interpretation

There is nothing like this systematic concern for nonlegal or "aggadic" interpretation in rabbinic literature, though here too the principle of omnisignificance holds sway. On the whole, the rabbinic collections of aggadic material were directed at the common people, and reflect their interests and concerns. Judging from this huge literature, theosophic and mystical concerns were then, as later, esoteric and limited to small numbers of adepts. Thus, the problems of interpreting the Bible as an omnisignificant text as described above were shaped by yet another concern: making the Bible relevant not only to rabbinic disciples but also to the nonscholarly audience who heard the Torah in synagogue rather than studying it in the bet midrash.

The Rabbis acknowledged the relative disproportion in the biblical text between rabbinic concerns and other material, as in this comment from R. Aha, perhaps the fourth-generation 'amora' in Israel of that name:

The conversation of the servants of the Patriarchs is more pleasing before the Holy One, blessed be He, than the Torah[learning] of the[ir] descendants, for the passage [dealing with the journey] of Eliezer, [the servant of Abraham, in seeking a wife for Isaac takes up] two or three columns [of text in a Torah scroll], is said and repeated [i.e., the passage describes the journey and then quotes Eliezer describing the journey], while the [rule that] the blood of a [dead] creeping thing causes impurity as does its flesh, [which is] among the essential parts of the Torah (migupei Torah) [but is derived] from an inclusion [of one letter] (Gen. Rab. 60:32, ed. Theodor-Albeck, p. 650).

Later on another comment by the same sage is quoted, even more poignantly:

The foot-washing of the servants of the Patriarchs is more pleasing before the Holy One, blessed be He, than the Torah[learning] of the[ir] descendants, for even the washing of [his] feet [in Gen. 24.32] must be recorded, [while the rule that] the blood of a [dead] creeping thing causes impurity as does its flesh, [which is] among the essential parts of the Torah (migupei Torah) [but is derived] from an inclusion [of one letter] (p. 651).

R. Aha's comment clearly calls attention to the disparity in Torah's treatment of halakhic matters versus the detail in the patriarchal narratives—and by extension, the non-halakhic parts of the Torah. But his intent is less clear. To his successors, the Torah could hardly be conceived as intending to devalue the halakhot derived by one letter, or the halakhic process in general. The case of the patriarchs, or the subjects of biblical narratives in general, must have an importance in God's scheme of things that warrants such attention to their doings.

This led, in later times, to the idea that the lives of the patriarchs prefigured the history of their descendants. The kernel of this idea may be seen in the Genesis narrative of the Covenant Between the Pieces, where God informs Abram of the future Egyptian bondage, the exodus and the entrance into the land of Israel (Gen. ch 15). Thus, R. Aḥa (4th century), in describing the creation of Adam, concludes that God gives Adam his discharge after Adam's sin and says:

This is a sign for you: just as you have come in judgment before Me and been discharged, so too your descendants will come in judgment before Me and I will give them their discharge. When? On Rosh Hashanah, [the Day of Judgment] (Lev. Rab. 29:1, ed. Margoliot, p. 669).

Without specifying this principle of patriarchal anticipation of the history of the people of Israel, R. Joshua of Sikhnin (4th century, a younger contemporary of R. Aḥa) comments on Abraham's battle with the Mesopotamian kings in Gen. ch 14:

The Holy One, blessed be He, gave a sign to Abraham that whatever would befall him would befall his descendants. How? He chose Abraham from among his entire father's house . . . and he chose his descendants from the Seventy Nations (Midrash Tanḥuma).

On the whole, typical rabbinic midrash was intended to attract people and inculcate moral, ethical and religious values, particularly in preaching. In the process, a good deal of folkloric material was incorporated. At times, however, the folklore is brought in for its own sake, in order to appeal to the preacher's listeners. Thus, for example, in Lev. Rab. 19:6 (ed. Margoliot, p. 438), we find the following discussion regarding the name of Nebuchadnezzar's wife.

What was the name of the wife of Nebuchadnezzar? R. Hananiah said: Semiram was her name; R. Abin said: Semiramis was her name; and the Rabbis said: Semira'am was her name, because she was born in ra'am during an earthquake [or, in thunder].

While the names come from Hellenistic sources, and at least one partly Hebrew folk-etymology was provided for one name, no moral lesson is drawn. The motive for the explanation of the names would seem to be the need to satisfy the curiosity of the listeners. In contrast, Noah's (scripturally anonymous) wife is identified with another biblical woman, and the name is expounded homiletically.

"And the sister of Tubal Cain was Naamah" (Gen. 4:22). Said R. Abba ben Kahana: Naamah was the wife of Noah [the assonance of Noah and Naamah should not be overlooked], and why was she called Naamah? Because her deeds were pleasant (ne'imim). The rabbis said: [She] was another Naamah, who would play her tambourine sweetly for idol worship (Gen. Rab. 23:22, p. 224).

The purpose of this identification is more complex. It serves to connect two verses which are otherwise disconnected; it also serves to explain why Naamah is mentioned at all, since she plays no role in the events depicted by Scripture. And, finally, the identification allows the Rabbis to comment obliquely on the nature of the sinfulness of the generation before the flood. According to R. Abba ben Kahana, Noah, the righteous man, married a righteous woman, whose deeds were pleasant. According to the Rabbis, this Naamah was typical of her sinful generation, and her deeds helped bring on the flood. Needless to say, these identifications would also have satisfied the curiosity of the people who came to hear the scriptural portion expounded. Indeed, the Bible itself provides a precedent for such exegetical elaboration. The prophet Jehu ben Hanani is mentioned in 1 Kings 16:1–12, and his father, Hanani, appears only in his patronym. But in 2 Chron. 16:7, we find the father playing a more active role: "At that time Hanani the seer came to King Asa of Judah and said to him, 'Because you relied on the king of Aram and did not rely on the LORD your God, therefore the army of the king of Aram has slipped out of your hands.' " This then illustrates the rule expounded by R. Yoḥanan, that every prophet's father who is mentioned along with his son was also a prophet (b. Meg. 15a, Lev. Rab. 6:6, pp. 142–143). Such an assumption made sense in a society where sons most often followed their fathers' occupation. It also illustrates the idea that a person or family is to be judged as a whole: If a family is known for its piety, it (or, for that matter, a nation) is judged by its reputation. The result is the far-ranging rabbinic principle that "one attributes meritorious behavior to the meritorious (megalgin zekhut 'al yedei zakai), and sinful acts to the sinful" (Sifre Num. 114, p. 123) and its closely associated principle that if a person or nation performs a certain (minimally) meritorious or sinful deed, it is accounted as though she or they had performed a much greater one (ma'aleh 'alav/alehen ke'ilu) (Sifre Deut. 253, p. 279).

In particular, when Scripture attributes a sinful act to an otherwise righteous character, or one whose reputation was considered, for one reason or another, sacrosanct, the Rabbis did not hesitate to reinterpret the relevant verse or verses. A case in point is David's adulterous relationship with Bathsheba and his plotting the death of her husband, Uriah the Hittite (a story omitted in Chronicles because it does not comport with David as an ideal king). A long disquisition on David is included as one of a long series of defenses of biblical characters to whom sin is imputed (b. Shab. 55b–56b).

R. Samuel ben Naḥmani said in R. Jonathan's name: Whoever says that David sinned is merely in error, for it is said, "And David behaved wisely in all his ways: and the LORD was with him" (1 Sam. 18.14). Is it possible that sin came to his hand, yet the divine Presence was with him? Then how do I interpret [the verse] "Wherefore have you despised the word of the LORD, to do that which is evil in His sight?" (2 Sam. 12.9)—he wished to do [evil] but did not.

Rav observed: Rabbi, who is descended from David, seeks to defend him! [Not so, for] the "evil" [mentioned] here is unlike any other evil [mentioned] elsewhere in the Torah. For of every other evil [mentioned] in the Torah it is written, "and he did," whereas here it is written, "to do"—this means that he desired to do, but did not (b. Shab. 56a).

The various verses that accuse David of adultery and murder are thereby reinterpreted; Uriah was guilty of disobeying the king's order to go home, and was therefore worthy of death as a rebel (see 2 Sam. ch 12). David was criticized for arranging his death in battle rather than having him arraigned before the Sanhedrin; again, his relationship with Bathsheba was not adulterous because all of David's soldiers gave their wives divorces before setting out to battle. Thus, Bathsheba was a divorced woman when David had his affair with her, and her husband was guilty of traitorous insubordination.

Unlike much of rabbinic midrash, which adds further layers of interpretation onto the plain meaning of the verse, the Rabbis' treatment of such incidents and verses run counter to that plain meaning. For the Rabbis and for the communities they represented, the stakes were simply too high to allow the plain sense to stand.

Similarly, at least for some Rabbis, the theological stakes were too high to maintain the plain sense of those verses which express an anthropomorphic view of God.

"And rested on the seventh day" (Exod. 20.11). But is He subject to such a thing as weariness? Has it not been said: "The creator of the ends of the earth is not faint or weary" (Isa. 40.28)? And it says, "He gives power to the faint" (Isa. 40.29). And it also says, "By the word of the LORD were the heavens made" (Ps. 33.6). How then can Scripture say, "And rested on the seventh day"? Rather, so to speak, God allowed it to be written about Him that He created His world in six days and rested on the seventh. Is it not an a fortiori argument? If He, for Whom there is no weariness, allowed it to be written about Him that He created His world in six days and rested on the seventh, how much more should man, of whom it is written, "But man is born to toil" (Job 5:7), rest on the seventh day (Mekhilta Yitro, 7, end, ed. Lauterbach, vol. 2, pp. 255–256).

In this interpretation the Rabbis accomplish two objectives. First, any suggestion that weariness may be attributed to God is rejected, but, equally important, the verse in question is turned into one which stresses the importance of the Sabbath for humans.

Nevertheless, some Rabbis seem to have reveled in these anthropomorphic depictions of the Deity, and even added to them (b. Ber. 6a):

R. Abin son of R. Adda in the name of R. Isaac says: How do we know that the Holy One, blessed be He, puts on phylacteries (tefillin)? For it is said, "The Lord has sworn by His right hand, and by the arm of His strength" (Isa. 62:8). "By His right hand"—this [refers] to the Torah, for it is said, "At His right hand was a fiery law to them" (Deut. 33:2). "And by the arm of His strength"—this [refers] to the phylacteries, as it is said, "The Lord will give strength to His people" (Ps. 29:11). And how do we know that the phylacteries are a strength to Israel? For it is written, "And all the peoples of the earth shall see that the name of the Lord is called upon you, and they shall be afraid of you" (Deut. 28:11), and it has been taught: R. Eliezer the Great says: This refers to the phylactery of the head.

This is not meant as a metaphysical statement, however, for the Talmud goes on to inquire as to what verses are written on the parchments of God's phylacteries. According to R. Hiyya ben Abin, "And who is like Your people Israel, a unique nation on earth" (1 Chron. 17:21). The phylacteries become a visible symbol of the relationship of God and Israel, and God's love for His people.

God's love for Israel is one of the constant themes of aggadic interpretation. In a sense, we have seen it at work in the interpretation of the ancestral narratives as foreshadowings of the future history of the Jewish people. It also serves as a powerful exegetical tool for other nonlegal or nontheological passages. Any passage that has some relation to Israelite history, sociology, demography (as the various census lists), etc., may be viewed as a manifestation of God's love for His people. Such a love is expressed as a concern for anything that relates to the beloved.

"These were the marches of the Israelites" (Num. 33:1). A parable; to what may this be compared? To a king whose son was ill; he took him to one place to cure him, and on the way back, the father began to recount all the marches [they had undertaken], saying to him: Here we slept, here we were cold, here your head hurt. So too did the Holy One, blessed be He, say to Moses: Re-count for them all the places they had angered Me. For that reason it is written: "These were the marches of the Israelites" (Tanḥuma Mas'ei 3).

Thus is a rather bare-bones list of camping places in the wilderness converted into an expression of God's love for Israel. This interpretive tool serves several functions: It explains the omnisignificant worth of many biblical passages by allegorizing them as reflecting in some way the relationship of God the Father to the Israelites; and in doing so, it responded to an urgent need for the reassurance of God's love for Israel and Israel's chosenness at a time when Christianity challenged both notions.

Conclusion

Scripture, according to the Rabbis, is the abiding evidence of God's presence and continued love for His people, but the rabbinic relationship to Scripture is not one of passive acceptance. Scripture provides the basic material and some of the ground rules for rabbinic interpretation, but the elements of Scripture—passages, verses, words, even individual letters—are integrated in a way that is both scriptural and rabbinic. One consequence of this mutuality is the assumption that a reasoned argument has the force of a scriptural decree [b. Pes. 21b, Ketub. 22a, B. K. 46b, Hul. 114b, Nid. 25a]. The sovereignty of reason and of rabbinic authority is thereby affirmed.

It has been taught: On that day R. Eliezer brought forth every imaginable argument, but they did not accept them. [Finally, in frustration,] he said: If the law follows my opinion, let this carob-tree prove it! Thereupon the carob-tree was torn a hundred cubits out of its place—others affirm, four hundred cubits. No proof can be brought from a carob-tree, they retorted. Again he said to them: If the law agrees with my opinion, let the stream of water prove it! Thereupon the stream of water flowed backwards. No proof can be brought from a stream of water, they rejoined. Again he urged: If the law agrees with my opinion, let the walls of the school-house prove it! Thereupon the walls inclined to fall. But R. Joshua rebuked them, saying: When scholars are engaged in a legal dispute, what have you to interfere? Hence [the walls] did not fall, out of deference to R. Joshua, nor did they resume standing, in deference to R. Eliezer, and they still stand inclined. Finally he said to them: If the law follows my opinion, let it be proved from Heaven! Thereupon a heavenly echo cried out: Why do you dispute with R. Eliezer, seeing that in all matters the law agrees with his opinion? But R. Joshua arose and exclaimed: "It is not in Heaven!" (Deut. 30.12).

What did he mean by that? Said R. Jeremiah: Since the Torah has already been given at Mount Sinai, we pay no attention to a heavenly echo, because You have long since written in the Torah at Mount Sinai: "After the majority must one incline" (Exod. 23.2).

R. Nathan met Elijah [the Prophet] and asked him, What did the Holy One, blessed be He, do at that time [in response to this statement]? He laughed [with joy], he replied, saying: My sons have defeated Me, My sons have defeated Me! (b. B. M. 59b.)

Appendix: The Orders and Tractates of the Mishnah

Zera'im ("Seeds"):

Berakhot
Pe'ah
Demai Ki'ayim
Shevi'it
Terumot Ma'aserot
Ma'aser Sheni
Hallah
'Orlah
Bikkurim

Mo'ed ("Season" or "Festival"):

Shabbat
'Eruvin
Pesahim Shekalim
Yoma Sukkah Betzah
Rosh Ha-Shanah
Ta'anit
Megillah
Mo'ed Katan
Hagigah

Nashim ("Women"):

Yebamot
Ketubbot
Nedarim
Nazir
Sotah Gittin Kiddushin

Nezikin ("Damages"):

Bava Kamma
Bava Metzi'a
Bava Batra
Sanhedrin

Makkot
Shevu'ot
'Eduyyot
'Avodah Zarah
'Avot Horayot Kodoshim ("Sacred Things"):
Zevahim
Menaḥot Hullin
Bekhorot
'Arakhin
Temurah
Keritot Me'ilah
Tamid

Middot
Kinnim
Teharot ("Purifications")
Kelim
'Ohalot
Nega'im
Parah Teharot Mikva'ot
Niddah
Makhshirin
Zavim
Tevul Yom Yadayim
'Uktzin

[YAAKOV ELMAN]

Midrash and Jewish Interpretation

It is often remarked that what is Jewish about the Bible is not the Bible itself, not even the Hebrew text of the Bible, but the Jewish interpretation of the Bible. And of all the types of Jewish biblical interpretation, none have been identified so closely with the Jewish Bible as midrash. Indeed, the two have been so closely identified that for some, midrash has become a virtual trope for Judaism, a figure for all that is distinctive and different about the Jews, their religion, and culture.

Midrash is the specific name for the activity of biblical interpretation as practiced by the Rabbis of the land of Israel in the first five centuries of the common era. The Hebrew word derives from the root, d-r-sh, which literally means "to inquire" or "to search after." In the earlier books of the Bible, the root is used to refer to the act of seeking out God's will (e.g., Gen. 25.22; Exod. 18.15), particularly through consulting a figure like Moses or a prophet or another type of oracular authority. By the end of the biblical period, the locus for that search appears to have settled on the text of the Torah where, it was now believed, God's will for the present moment was to be found. Thus the scribe Ezra, we are told in the book by his name, "had dedicated himself to study the Teaching (torah) of the LORD so as to observe it" (Ezra 7.10). The Hebrew word for "study" used in the verse, lidrosh, has the same root as midrash. By late antiquity, midrash had come to designate Bible study in general. The Rabbis called their academy a bet midrash, literally "a house of study," and from such usage, midrash came to be the term the Rabbis themselves employed to designate the way they studied Scripture and interpreted its meaning.

In its primary sense, then, midrash refers to an activity, a mode of study. Somewhat confusingly, the same word is also applied to the products of that activity, namely, individual interpretations—a specific midrash of a verse or word, for example. These midrashic interpretations originally circulated and were transmitted orally, both in rabbinic schools and through synagogue sermons. Around the 3rd or 4th century CE, the oral traditions of the Rabbis began to be collected in literary anthologies, and these collections also came to be known as midrashim, as in Midrash Rabbah, the folio-sized collection of homiletical midrashim on the Torah which was first published in Constantinople in 1512. For the past hundred years, however, some scholars have appropriated the word “midrash” as a collective term to describe ancient biblical interpretation in general. For example, the French scholar Renee Bloch used the term “midrash” to describe any ancient “meditation on the sacred texts,” an activity that could be found equally in the Aramaic translations of the Bible, in many of the books of the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, and in the New Testament, as well as in later rabbinic texts. And still more recently, the term has passed into popular circulation as a name for all “creative” interpretations of the Bible that seek to move beyond the historical, “original” sense of the biblical text. In this usage, the word “midrash” stands for everything from novelistic retellings of biblical episodes to post-modernist essayistic explorations of Genesis and Exodus, New Age homilies, and contemporary poems that re-imagine the biblical text.

Language, of course, follows usage, not the strictures of scholars. Even if the latter (including myself) would prefer to restrict the use of the word “midrash” to the ancient biblical interpretations of the Rabbis—who, if they did not invent the term, nonetheless were the first ones to use it extensively—scholars do not control the fates of words. On the other hand, while contemporary efforts at “neo-midrash” are not direct descendants of the classical midrashic tradition of the Rabbis, it is also not entirely inappropriate to call these latter-day compositions living examples of the midrashic “spirit,” motivated by some of the same desires that inspired the Rabbis to interpret the Bible. Yet precisely how to define that “spirit” is not an easy task. Perhaps the closest thing to a definition might be the classical midrashic statement attributed to the early sage Akiva (died ca. 135 CE), a comment on Deut. 32.47, “[This law] is no empty thing for you (lo’ davar reik mekem).” Exploiting the fact that the preposition mekem literally means “from,” not “for,” you, Akiva explained: “If it seems empty, it is from you—on account of your own failure—for you do not know how to study (lidrosh) its meaning properly” (Gen. Rab. 1:14). The imperative facing every Bible interpreter is, to paraphrase E. M. Forster, to connect, to find the text’s significance for the present moment, to make it speak to us now. Nothing in the Bible is without such significance. If the interpreter can’t find it, the fault is his or her own, not the Bible’s. Akiva’s elaboration might be called the credo of Jewish biblical interpretation.

In fact, the precise relation of midrash to other types of Jewish biblical interpretation and to Jewish tradition at large involves a truly complex set of questions, and these become even more complicated if the relationship of midrash is considered in connection with the competing traditions of Christian and Islamic interpretation. Ultimately, these questions boil down to some of the most fundamental issues that involve the study of biblical interpretation in general, and Jewish interpretation in particular. What does it mean to call a type of interpretation like midrash “Jewish”? Is there a distinctively or uniquely “Jewish” way of reading the Bible? Is a Jewish reading of the Bible distinguished merely by its content and by the theological beliefs it brings to its reading, or is there something intrinsically different about the very procedures of interpretation that Jews employ as opposed to those of, say, Christian readers of the Bible?

Within the context of this Jewish Study Bible, it would seem especially opportune to consider these questions even if there are no definitive answers to them. We may begin with a historical sketch of midrash’s development. The origins of midrash lie in biblical tradition itself where many biblical passages self-consciously look back upon earlier passages and, in one way or another, reinterpret their meaning. The book of Chronicles, for example, consciously recasts the history of the earlier books of Samuel and Kings, adding some episodes and omitting others, and generally spinning the earlier narrative in the course of retelling it in a politically tendentious direction amenable to its author. Elsewhere, many “later” verses in the Bible recycle allusions and imagery from “earlier” biblical texts in order to apply them to new contexts and situations. The laws of marital divorce become the imagery to describe God’s punishment of the people of Israel (cf., e.g., Deut. 24.1–4 and Jer. 3.1); the exodus from Egypt (Exod. chs 1–15), the paradigm for all future redemptions (see, for example, Isa. 43.16–20; 51.9–11; Ezek. ch 20).

In a very few cases it is possible even to see how certain textual “problems” are solved within the Bible itself. For example, in the year 605 BCE, some twenty years before the destruction of the First Temple and the exile of the Judeans to Babylonia, the prophet Jeremiah prophesied that Judea “shall be a desolate ruin, and those nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years” (Jer. 25.11). In a second prophecy, somewhat later, he went on to prophesy that “when Babylon’s seventy years are over, I will fulfill to you My promise of favor—to bring you back to this place” (29.10). And some seventy years later, in 538 BCE, when the Judean exiles did indeed return to Judea from Babylonia, they must doubtless have believed that Jeremiah’s prophecy had been fulfilled. Some 370 years later, however, around the year 165 BCE, in despair over the Hellenistic persecution of their religious practices, Jews had greater difficulty believing in the fulfillment of Jeremiah’s promise of redemption even if they were physically living in the land of Israel. The author of the book of Daniel, in order to bolster faith in the apocalypse he believed was imminent, reinterpreted Jeremiah’s earlier prophecy so that seventy years became seventy “weeks” of years—490 years, in other words—a date that brought the ancient prophecy close enough to his own time so as to convince his audience of its truth. Or to give a second example of a different type of “interpretation,” here is a case where two earlier verses seemed to a later biblical author to contradict each other: Exod. 12.8 stipulates emphatically that the Passover sacrifice must be roasted (tzli ’esh). Speaking about the same sacrifice, however, Deut. 16.7 says, “You shall cook (wishalta) it”—a verb implying that the meat should be boiled (as in a stew). 2 Chron. 35.13, obviously troubled by the discrepancy between the two Torah verses, “solved” the textual problem (if not the culinary one) by maintaining both locutions: The Jews “cooked the paschal sacrifice in fire” (vay-vashlu hapesaḥ ba’esh)—“they boiled the paschal sacrifice in fire” (which probably means that they braised it).

The scholar Michael Fishbane, who has exhaustively studied these and similar cases in the Bible, has described them as part of a larger phenomenon which he calls inner-biblical exegesis (see “Inner-biblical Interpretation,” pp. 1829–35). Although most of these examples are not, strictly speaking, exegeses (insofar as they do not explain or clarify anything about the earlier verse), they nonetheless exhibit certain tendencies—inner dynamics, as it were—that are, at the least, exegetical reflexes. These include the tendencies (as we have seen) to harmonize conflicting or discordant verses; to reemploy and reapply biblical paradigms and imagery to new cases; to reinvest “old” historical references with “new” historical contexts; and to integrate nonhistorical portions of the Bible within the larger context of biblical history (for example, by giving individual psalms historical superscriptions that “identify” the precise biblical episode during which David composed the psalm; e.g., Pss. 18 and 34).

Once the Bible was closed, Fishbane argues, these inner-biblical tendencies emerged as full-fledged, consciously applied interpretive techniques (demonstrating, if nothing else, the deep continuity of early postbiblical interpretation with the preceding tradition). Our earliest genuine commentaries on the Bible are the peshtarim, or apocalyptic commentaries, found among the Dead Sea Scrolls at Qumran, and the allegorical treatises on the Bible written by Philo of Alexandria. The vast amount of early postbiblical interpretation is found, however, not in formal commentaries but in nonexegetical works that span the entire range of ancient postbiblical Jewish literature. These include the Aramaic Targumim (or translations); the various works of the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha which claim to "fill in" missing episodes or accounts from the Bible; and the various types of compositions sometimes called "the Re-Written Bible," works like the Genesis Apocryphon, the book of Jubilees, and Pseudo-Philo's Biblical Antiquities. These last works claim merely to "retell" the biblical narrative. They do so, however, by adding in, without comment, numerous details and events nowhere to be found in the Bible itself that are really implied interpretations, that is, solutions to "problems" ancient readers may have had with the biblical text.

Such is the context within which rabbinic midrash emerged in Roman Palestine as one type of Jewish exegesis among many others in the first centuries of the common era. We know very little about the inner history of midrash or about its practice, presumably in schools, academies, and synagogues. The one thing we do know is that, with a few scattered exceptions, the Rabbis did not explicitly theorize about their mode of interpretation or formally legislate its procedures. As a result, nearly everything we can say about midrash must be adduced from the texts themselves.

Generally speaking, the underlying interpretive assumptions that the Rabbis brought to midrash were not different from those of their nonrabbinic contemporaries, Jewish or Gentile. As scholars have shown repeatedly over the last century, the Rabbis shared hermeneutical techniques and procedures with their Greco-Roman neighbors as well as with the larger and more ancient Near Eastern culture into which ancient Judaism was born. Midrash dealing with halakhah, or legal matters, uses many of the same hermeneutical principles used by Greek and Roman jurists, and the Rabbis seem to have borrowed at least the names for some of those principles from their pagan contemporaries. In the realm of aggadah—narrative and lore—midrash applied to the Bible techniques known to be used in ancient literary and dream interpretation. Such, for example, seems to be the origin of gematria, perhaps the most "notorious" type of hermeneutical technique in midrash wherein the numerical sum of a word's letters is used to decode its meaning. A good example of this type of technique is an interpretation attributed to R. Levi for the word 'ekhah ("alas"), the first word in the book of Lamentations, a book that the Rabbis read not only as a lament but also as a prophecy of the destruction of the Temple. The numerical sum of the word's four letters (alef = 1; yod = 10; kaf = 20; heh = 5) is 36, and this number, according to R. Levi, points to the 36 transgressions punishable by excommunication that the Jews committed, thereby bringing upon themselves the destruction of the Temple. The unusual word 'ekhah, with its archaic elongated form (rather than the shorter, more common 'ekh) was understood, in other words, to be the hermeneutical key to the meaning of the entire scroll of Lamentations—the reason the Jews were forced to lament their fate. Along the same lines, in a related but different form of interpretation—notarikon (literally, stenographic interpretation), or interpretation by acrostics—ben Azzai used the same word's four letters as a key to showing that the Jews were not punished until they had denied the One (alef) God; transgressed all Ten (yod) Commandments; spurned circumcision (which was given after twenty [kaf] generations), and—on top of everything else!—rejected all the commandments in the Five (heh) Books of Moses. Both types of hermeneutical principles are attested in ancient handbooks for dream-interpretors.

Beyond these particular techniques, however, nearly all ancient readers of the Bible also shared four basic beliefs about the nature of Scripture, as James Kugel has cogently argued. First, they believed that the Bible was essentially a cryptic document—that its true meaning was not to be found on the surface but had to be discovered within the text, and that this discovery required special skills and wisdom. (In this, ancient readers of the Bible would have found themselves in agreement with ancient philosophers for whom it was no less axiomatic that all truth is obscure, never obvious or manifest to all; otherwise, anybody could be a philosopher or, for that matter, a scriptural exegete!) Second, the Bible was believed to be a perfect document, without contradiction, inconsistency, or superfluity. What might seem to be a contradiction or to be superfluous, even a word or phrase, was really an occasion—for some, a tip-off—for interpretation. Third, the Bible is always relevant—that is to say, its true meaning is always one that has import for the present moment. Nothing in the Bible—neither genealogies nor prophecies—is in Scripture for purely historical reasons, preserved for its antiquarian interest alone. Fourth, the Bible was believed to be of divine origin. As Kugel notes, however, this last feature was probably the least simple, since the Bible's divinity was not seen necessarily to preclude Moses' authorship. Furthermore, attributing divinity to the Bible means little if one does not define the nature of that divinity more closely. The God whom the Rabbis believed authored the Bible was hardly the same author as the God of an early Christian reader of the Bible like Origen.

Still, while the Rabbis shared these assumptions about the Bible with other ancient readers, Jews and Christians alike, they also brought some distinctive convictions of their own to their study. First and foremost, the Rabbis believed that the Bible—or what they called the Written Torah—was only one of two revelations God had given to the children of Israel at Mt. Sinai. Alongside the Written Torah, they believed, God had also revealed to the Israelites an Oral Torah which, as its name indicates, was delivered and transmitted orally. Precisely how to define the Oral Torah is one of the great debates among Jewish scholars. For our present purposes we may say that it comprises everything that the Rabbis believed was "Judaism" that is not explicitly written in the Torah; admittedly, this is a vast and heterogeneous body of material that encompasses everything from the many laws not spelled out in the Bible to the Rabbis' own beliefs and theology as well as all their folk wisdom and lore. Midrash itself is part of the Oral Torah, but the most important fact for understanding the role of the Oral Torah in midrash is that, for the Rabbis, these two Torahs—the Written and the Oral—were understood to be complementary. The "relevance" of the Written Torah for the Rabbis lay, we may say, in its application as Oral Torah; the two were not only in absolute agreement but deeply intertwined and mutually embedded. As a result, a great part of the Rabbis' midrashic efforts are devoted either to finding the roots of the Oral Torah in the Written Torah, or to elucidating the hidden truths of the Written Torah so as to make it yield the insights of what they already knew to be Oral Torah.

Nowhere is this more evident than in midrash halakhah, or legal exegesis. One passage will suffice to illustrate the point—a series of interpretations connected with the laws of kashrut, the dietary laws, and specifically the regulations pertaining to the separation of meat and milk products. Few laws are more closely associated with classical Judaism. Yet the source of these laws is a single injunction in the entire Bible, "You shall not boil a kid in its mother's milk" (Exod. 23.19) which, as we know today, was originally a cultic regulation, not a dietary rule. Curiously, that injunction also happens to be repeated verbatim twice more in the Bible (Exod. 34.26; Deut. 14.21), raising the additional problem of the verses' superfluity: Why say the same thing three times? Not surprisingly, the Rabbis exploited the multiple appearances of the injunction in order to expand the range of the single law. In the Mekhilta (Kaspa 5, Lauterbach III, 187–190), the earliest collection of midrashim on the book of Exodus, nine interpretations are offered to explain why the verse is repeated, and seven more simply to explain the full significance of the Exodus verse alone. Here is a small sampling of the interpretations:

R. Jonathan says: Why is this law stated in three places? Once to apply to domestic animals, once to apply to the beast of chase, and once to apply to fowl.

Abba Ḥanin said in the name of R. Eliezer: Why is this law stated in three places? Once to apply to large cattle, once to apply to goats, and once to apply to sheep. . . .

R. Simon ben Yoḥai says: Why is this law stated in three places? One is a prohibition against eating it, one is a prohibition against deriving any benefit from it, and one is a prohibition against the mere cooking of it. . . .

R. Yosi the Galilean: Scripture says, "You shall not eat anything that dies a natural death" (Deut. 14.21), and in the same passage, it is said, "You shall not boil a kid in its mother's milk." [From this it follows that] the flesh of any animal which is forbidden to be eaten if the animal dies a natural death [and is not ritually slaughtered according to the laws of kashrut] is also forbidden to be cooked with milk. Now one might think that fowl, since it becomes forbidden to eat if it dies a natural death, should also be forbidden to be cooked with milk. Scripture, however, stipulates, "in its mother's milk." This excludes fowl because it has no mother's milk. And the unclean animal [an animal like pig that Scripture forbids one to eat in any case] is also excluded from the prohibition [of cooking it with milk] because it is forbidden to be eaten whether it is ritually slaughtered properly or whether it dies a natural death.

The first two opinions in the passage use "the extra verses"—the multiple occurrences of the verse—to extend its application from a goat, the actual subject of the verse, to other species of animals. R. Jonathan and Abba Ḥanin both adopt the same interpretive strategy, but they divide the animal kingdom in different cuts, as it were. The third opinion, of Rabbi Simon ben Yoḥai, uses the extra verses to extend the prohibition from cooking milk and meat together (which is itself already an interpretation, since the biblical verse prohibits only cooking a kid in its mother's milk) to eating it and even deriving benefit from it (by, for example, selling meat and milk cooked together); this interpretation takes the biblical verse even closer to the complete dietary regulation in its full rabbinic form.

Now clearly, these opinions are being used to justify and to legitimate existing practices, which must have developed out of their own logic. The interpretations were not invented to derive the practices anew or for the first time. There is simply no way that any interpreter could have looked at the three identical verses and extrapolated from them the different prohibitions that, say, R. Simon bar Yoḥai proposes. With the fourth and final interpretation of R. Yosi the Galilean, however, the interpretations take a very different turn. The very form and style of Yosi's interpretation is of a very different nature than the first three—not only more expansive but also more academic in tone. The interpretation is based on the fact that Deut. 14.21 contains not only the prohibition against boiling a kid in its mother's milk but also the additional prohibition against eating an animal that has died a natural death and not been ritually slaughtered. From the fact that the two prohibitions are stated in the same verse, R. Yosi initially hypothesizes that all animals that fall under one prohibition should fall under the other one as well. This would seem to be a completely unexceptionable assumption, but R. Yosi himself immediately argues against it—and here the real gist of his interpretation emerges. For the verse prohibiting boiling a kid in milk explicitly states that the milk must be "its mother's," thereby excluding fowl from the prohibition since, as R. Yosi explains, they do not give milk. Similarly, he continues, an unclean animal—that is, an animal like pig that cannot be eaten under any circumstances—also does not fall under the prohibition, which is to say, it could be boiled in its mother's milk as long as one didn't eat it!

The structure of argument in this interpretation is very different from that in the first three. Essentially, R. Yosi builds upon the contiguity of the two prohibitions in the same verse to draw a general principle, and then uses that generalization to highlight a specific detail in the same verse ("its mother's milk") to prove an exception to the generalization. This technique (in Hebrew known as kelal uferat, a general rule followed by a particular) is one of the legal principles that the Rabbis share in common with ancient jurists in general. Yet even more striking about Yosi's interpretation, which excludes fowl from the prohibition, is the fact that it conflicts with that of R. Jonathan, who did include fowl under the prohibition. Exactly what is at stake in this disagreement is intriguing but unclear—whether their dispute really extends to practice (for some contemporary Jewish readers, it would be wonderful news to learn that a great sage like R. Yosi ate chicken with dairy products!), or whether it is a purely theoretical, academic argument. The more relevant observation to make is that the editor of the midrashic collection himself makes no note of the disagreement. He records the two interpretations along with the others as though there were absolutely no significant difference between them, no disagreement, no inconsistency.

This feature is common to the editing of many midrashic collections, but nowhere is it more the case than in midrash aggadah, that is, interpretations dealing with legend and lore, the vast terrain of nonlegal and homiletical material which effectively includes everything in rabbinic tradition from narrative to theology. In theory, midrash aggadah does not differ substantively or methodologically from midrash halakhah, and most midrashic collections mix halakhah and aggadah indiscriminately. As rabbinic literature developed, however, midrash became increasingly identified with aggadah, and it is for its aggadic interpretations that midrash has become most famous (or infamous, depending on your perspective) for its creative, playful, and multiple interpretations.

As a typical example of such multiple interpretations, consider the following passage. Gen. 25.19–36.42 is largely devoted to the story of Jacob and Esau and their rivalry from the time of their conception to their mature middle age. This rivalry began in utero. Rebekah, like all the matriarchs, cannot initially conceive, but once she does become pregnant with the two boys, Scripture tells us, vayitrotzetzu habanim bekirbah, "the children struggled in her womb" (Gen. 25.22). On this phrase, Gen. Rab., the classical midrash on Genesis, offers the following four interpretations:

R. Yoḥanan and R. Shimon ben Lakhish [both offered opinions]. R. Yoḥanan said: This one ran (ratz) to kill the other, and the other ran (ratz) to kill the first one. [Namely, R. Yoḥanan associates the word vayitrotzetzu with the word for "run" (ratz).]

R. Shimon ben Lakhish said: This one permitted [what was forbidden] by command (hitir tzivuyav) to the other, and the other one permitted [what was forbidden] by command to the first [meaning, in other words, that from the beginning each one's laws and practices seem to have been diametrically opposed, in conflict with each other. The interpretation puns vayitrotzetzu and hitir tzivuyav; say the two words quickly, and they'll begin to sound alike.]

R. Berechyah said in the name of R. Levi: Lest you think that it was only after they left the womb that the one attacked the other, [this verse teaches us] that even while they were in the womb [Esau] raised his fist (zeirteih) against [Jacob]. This is what is written, "The wicked are defiant (zoru) from the womb" (Ps. 58.4) [playing on the word zoru and the Aramaic word for fist. This interpretation seems to emphasize the word bekirbah, "in her womb" as the basis for its interpretation.]

"Vayitrotzetzu habanim bekirbah" ("the children struggled in her womb") means that they tried to run out of her womb. When Rebekah passed by a pagan temple, Esau would kick her to let him leave; this is what is written, "The wicked are defiant (zoru) from the womb" (Ps. 58.4) [playing on the word zoru and the second half of the term 'avodah zarah, literally "strange worship," i.e., idolatry]. And when Rebekah passed by a synagogue and a study-hall (bet midrash), Jacob would kick her to let him out, this is what is written, "Before I created you in the womb, I knew you (yedatikha)" (Jer. 1.5) [probably reading the last phrase as yidatikha, "I caused you to know"] (Gen. Rab., ed. J. Theodor and H. Albeck, 63:6, pp. 682–83).

Each of these four interpretations offers a slightly different though equally typical midrashic way of reading the word vayitrotzetzu: Some break it up into smaller words like ratz ("run"), or pun it with a similarly sounding phrase like hitir tzivuyav ("permitted the commands"), or connect the Genesis base-verse with another verse in Scripture (e.g., Ps. 58.4) which, through more punning interpretations, is enlisted to gloss the meaning of the base-verse. In the very last interpretation of Jer. 1.5, the anonymous Rabbi exploits the fact that the Hebrew text of the Bible in a Torah scroll records only consonantal letters, and no vowels—a fact that, somewhat ironically, now allows the midrashic reader to change the vowels of certain biblical words and thus their meaning, as here from the active form, yedatikha ("I knew") to the causative yidatikha ("I caused you to know").

What leads the Rabbis to base so many of their interpretations on phonetic puns, on associations between the sound of a word like vayitrotzetzu and other similarly sounding words and phrases? In part, this strongly aural dimension of midrash may derive from the Bible's own use of oral puns and sound-play—a habit facilitated by the very nature of spoken Hebrew—but it also probably reflects the way the Bible was learned by the Rabbis. Most likely, Jews in the land of Israel during the rabbinic period did not study the Bible by reading it directly in scrolls, which were doubtless scarce and, because of their size, rather unwieldy; rather, they learned Scripture from hearing it read aloud during the synagogue service or in classes in the academy. From such repeated auditory experiences, one assumes the Rabbis memorized the scriptural text and carried it around in their heads as a heard text. As we now know, a text learned this way is "known" differently than one learned from having read it on a page (or scroll). For one thing, the page itself does not figure as a primary unit in one's memory of the text. Another thing is that one "hears" the text rather than "sees" it (even in the mind's eye), and as a consequence, one is more likely to associate like-sounding words or phrases or verses (the latter probably having been the main units of memorization) rather than those connected by visual elements (either physical proximity in the written text or on a page, or matters of orthography). And while it may seem paradoxical, it is in fact perfectly explicable why the Rabbis tend to atomize verses or words into their constituent sounds, and simultaneously to associate otherwise unrelated verses or phrases on the basis of shared phonetic elements; in both cases, they are responding to the phonetic/aural element of the text. This is not to say that the Rabbis did not know the Bible as a written text; it was, in fact, the only text normatively written down in rabbinic culture. It was, however, also the only text in rabbinic culture to be regularly read aloud from the written scroll. Indeed, the Bible's most common name in rabbinic Hebrew is miqra', "that which is read aloud."

Midrash, then, is very much an exegesis of the heard text. This does not, of course, explain everything in midrash. For while they are willing to take the boldest liberties in interpreting Scripture, the Rabbis are also the closest "readers" of Scripture imaginable, with an almost preternatural sensitivity to the least "bump" in the scriptural text—an unnecessary repetition or superfluity, any kind of syntactical or lexical peculiarity, a mere hint at something unseemly in the way of behavior, or the smallest possibility of an inconsistency between verses or even between a verse and what the Rabbis believed must be the case.

Since we have been considering Jacob and Esau, let us look at an interpretation of another verse from their narrative, from the story in Gen. ch 27 of Jacob's deception of Isaac, where he fools his aged blind father into giving him the blessing intended for Esau, the first-born son. Jacob's wiliness (of which this episode was not the first case) may or may not have been in itself a cause for embarrassment to the Rabbis, but Gen. 27.19 posed a very concrete problem for them: In response to Isaac's question, "Which of my sons are you?" Jacob tells his father an outright lie, "I am Esau, your first-born." How does the midrash deal with this problem?

The answer is quite simple: By rereading the verse so that it no longer says, "I am Esau, your first-born" but "I am [that is, Jacob]; Esau is your first-born" (Tanḥ., ed. S. Buber, Genesis, p. 131). Now this interpretation may seem overly clever, especially as an attempt to whitewash Jacob's reputation, but in fact the interpretation exploits a genuine "problem" in the verse. For why does Jacob need to tell his father that Esau is his first-born son? As an answer to Isaac's question, the detail is irrelevant; and as a piece of familial information, it is obviously something Isaac knows. Further, the Hebrew word that Jacob uses in the verse to identify himself, 'anokhi, "I," is itself noteworthy as a somewhat archaic locution that every Rabbi would have instantly recognized as the opening word of the Decalogue—indeed, as the word with which God introduces Himself: "I am/'anokhi the LORD your God" (Exod. 20.2). (In fact, another, somewhat more expansive version of this midrash states that Jacob said, "I am he who will receive the Decalogue, but Esau is your first-born" [Gen. Rab. 65:18, p. 730].) Faced with all these textual "facts," along with the ethical problem raised by Jacob's outright lie, the midrashic reading might appear almost inevitable.

Almost, but not quite. Did the Rabbis believe that this was the "real" meaning of the verse, or what Jacob actually meant to say? This question takes us to the very heart of midrash and its hermeneutics. Some scholars have suggested that midrashim like this are midrashic "jokes," the humor lying in the self-conscious dissonance between what the Rabbis know the Bible is saying, and what they wish it to say. This is undoubtedly true: What midrash continually demonstrates is the possibility that Scripture may mean something other than what it says. But there is also a way in which the playfulness of midrash may be interpreted as the Rabbis' sense of the playfulness of Scripture itself. After all, could God have ever really allowed Jacob to mislead Isaac and let the blessing be given to the wrong son? Could Isaac, our ancestor, have been so easily misled? Must he not have known to whom he was giving the blessing? Were not Isaac and Jacob merely pretending to deceive and to be deceived? Isn't this pretence at deception the subtext of the story in which Isaac and Jacob act out their roles of deceiver and deceived so that providential history, the history of Israel and of the Jews, can take place despite history?

The Rabbis, after all, fully knew who Jacob and Esau really were—not just biblical figures, not merely their ancestors. They were also the progenitors of Israel and Rome—the latter was almost as ancient an identification as the former—and, in a certain sense, they were Judaism and Rome. "The voice is the voice of Jacob, yet the hands are the hands of Esau," Isaac announces as the disguised Jacob approaches (Gen. 27.22). On which the midrash comments: "Jacob attains domination through his voice [i.e., the power of language], and Esau through [the power of] his hands." R. Yehuda bar Ilai is said to have added that R. Judah the Prince interpreted the latter verse in even more contemporary terms: "The voice of Jacob cries out for what the hands of Esau have done to him" (Gen. Rab. 65:21, pp. 733–34, 740). The Rabbis knew that the story of Jacob and Esau and their rivalry was not simply biblical history. It was also their own history, the contemporary reality in which they had to struggle daily merely to survive.

With this understanding of the hermeneutical background behind midrash, let us return to the question with which we began this essay: What is Jewish about midrash? It would be tempting to say that interpretations like the preceding one, identifying Jacob with Judaism and Esau with Rome, point to the inherently Jewish nature of midrash. This is certainly true of the content of the interpretation, but it is worth recalling that ancient and medieval Christian students of the Bible used the same hermeneutical principle to identify Jacob with the church and Esau with Judaism. The same is true by and large of the ancient Jewish and Christian interpretations of the Song of Songs; both traditions interpret the poem as a love song between God and His chosen nation—the major difference being that in one case the beloved nation is Israel, in the other Christianity (or the church). Is the difference between Jewish and Christian interpretation then merely one of theological preferences?

Some scholars have posited the differences between the two interpretive traditions as being that between midrash and allegory. In fact, over the past twenty years, as they have awakened to the existence of midrash, literary theorists in particular have sought to see in rabbinic hermeneutics an alternative mode of interpretation to allegory. Where the latter is said to posit the existence of a reference or meaning “behind” the text as a kind of static metaphysical presence, midrash has been celebrated for seeing meaning “in front” of the text, in the intertextual play between verses, in the deferral of a single absolute meaning in favor of a multiplicity of provisional and possible meanings, and not least of all, for its far more open complicity between the interpreter and the act of interpretation as a subjective exercise whose interest lies less in the outcome of interpretation than in the process itself. Some scholars have even identified midrash with a kind of uniquely Jewish “ontology,” or at least a mode of thinking whose difference from the so-called Greco-Christian logocentric tradition, usually identified with allegory, has been seen as closer to that of poststructuralism.

The difficulty with this comparison is not only that its view of midrash is overly romanticized but that it fails to take into account the fact that midrash is itself a form of allegory—not philosophical allegory, to be sure, but nonetheless a form of interpretation that seeks to show how the text means something other than what it says. In this, midrash is not different from other types of ancient interpretation. There is, in fact, much in early Christian interpretation from the New Testament itself through Augustine and the Antiochene fathers that is midrash-like. The main hermeneutical difference between the two is that Christian exegesis is far more systematic. Because of its greater intimacy with classical philosophical culture, Christian interpretation is heavily theorized and more programmatic (and to that extent, more obviously tendentious than rabbinic interpretation). It is also driven, as it were, by a different set of anxieties. The main anxiety for Christian interpreters is the knowledge that the New Testament is indeed a belated document, a late-comer, as it were, and hence the main challenge faced by Christian exegetes is to prove that the New Testament is in fact the key to understanding the Old Testament, and that the latter cannot properly be understood without the full knowledge afforded by the New Testament. In contrast, the anxiety driving the Rabbis is the worry that the Bible itself foresees their rejection and obsolescence; hence the constant challenge they face is to find through midrash a way for God to address them anew, to prove through the study of Scripture that they remain His chosen people, and that their interpretation, as embodied in the Oral Torah, is in fact the true and legitimate interpretation of the Bible’s meaning.

The other feature that truly distinguishes rabbinic midrash is its singular literary form, the modes of discourse in which its hermeneutics are articulated. These literary forms show the close connection between rabbinic interpretation of the Bible and synagogue homilies. The most characteristic of all these forms is the poem or petihta, a form that may have served (as Joseph Heinemann has suggested) as a kind of mini-sermon that introduced the initial verse of the weekly Shabbat Torah reading. Instead of beginning with that verse, however, the proem opens with another verse taken from a completely different part of Tanakh; this verse is typically called the “remote” verse because it is, for all practical purposes, unrelated to the weekly Torah reading and its opening verse. It is this verse that the proem actually “interprets,” building in the process a kind of exegetical bridge that eventually culminates in its true subject, the opening verse of the weekly reading.

As a brief example of the form, consider the following petihta for the weekly Torah reading that begins with Lev. 24.2, “Command the Israelite people to bring you clear oil of beaten olives for lighting, so as to maintain lights regularly.”

Bar Kapparah (d. 230 CE) recited a petihta: “It is You who light my lamp; the LORD, my God, lights up my darkness” (Ps. 18.29).

The Holy One, blessed be He, said to man: Your lamp is in my hand, as it is said, “The lifebreath of man is the lamp of the LORD” (Prov. 20.27). And my lamp is in yours: [this is the meaning of the phrase] “so as to maintain lights regularly” (Lev. 24.2). To which the Holy One, blessed be He, added: If you light my lamp, I will light yours. That is the meaning of “Command the Israelite people . . .” (Lev. 24.2).

Perhaps the most remarkable thing about this particular petihta is the speech the author of the proem puts into God’s mouth—a speech that is actually an interpretation of Ps. 18.29; God Himself confirms, as it were, the meaning of the verse in the psalm, but it is also through God’s “interpretation” that the preacher or author of this sermon speaks to his audience. While the interpretation itself, as well as that of Prov. 20.27, are independent exegeses, the proem joins them in order to make its own point about Lev. 24.2. Contrary to how it looks in Scripture, this verse is not simply a commandment from God to the Israelites to light a special candelabrum in the sanctuary. Rather, it is testimony to the reciprocity of the deeds of God and man: If Israel lights God’s lamp in the sanctuary, then He will light man’s lamp, namely, his soul. Or to put the same point in more general terms, human life is God’s response to human observance of the commandments!

The petihta epitomizes the characteristic type of midrashic literary form that exists precisely in the gray area between pure commentary, on the one side, and an original, creative composition. Indeed, it is precisely in this gray area between the two separate realms of commentary and literature that midrash takes seed and grows, never crossing over entirely into either realm, flourishing in the space precisely in-between. The petihta is also only one among several literary forms of this kind that come into existence in midrash as the discourse of its exegesis. These relatively short literary units—which include the parable, the extrabiblical legend, pronouncement and fulfillment stories (in which interpreted biblical verses serve as punchlines or prophetic realizations of unusual narratives), and various types of lists and testimony forms—are the real literary units of rabbinic midrash.

Unlike their contemporaries, the Rabbis did not write treatises on the Bible and its meaning (as did Philo, for example), nor did they initially compose tracts in which they sought to “rewrite” the Bible (although such works do come into existence in the early post-rabbinic period). It is not even clear that they wrote commentaries as did the members of the apocalyptic community at Qumran. We know very little about the composition or process of editing of the various midrashic collections, but from their contents and overall skeletal style, it would seem that they were compiled to serve as source-books for “professionals”—that is, rabbinic preachers and teachers who used them to prepare sermons and lessons. There is little indication that they were originally meant to serve as commentaries to be studied alongside the Bible nor were they, as were a number of early Christian exegetical texts, transcripts of actual sermons or lessons in Scripture. As anthologies of interpretations, with multiple interpretations recorded side-by-side with no comments and few attempts to navigate between them, these midrashic collections embody the delight of midrash in always yet another additional interpretation. Yet unlike their postmodern descendants, in which polysemy signifies an indeterminacy that reflects the fundamental instability of meaning, multiple interpretation as found in midrash is actually a sign of its stability, the guarantee of a belief in Scripture as an inexhaustible fount of meaningfulness.

That the Rabbis preferred this type of anthropological composition to systematic treatises or formal commentaries is in itself a revealing fact about the way they saw biblical interpretation. For them, Bible study was an ad hoc activity directed essentially to an audience hungry for a response to its immediate needs and to the desire to have Scripture speak in the present moment. This feature of midrash is also one that seems to have troubled some later rabbinic authorities and even led them to dismiss midrash as at best a poetic form of speech that need not be taken too seriously. Partly because of such ambivalence, midrash's fortunes following the rabbinic period decidedly waned. The high point of classical midrashic creativity was reached in the first five centuries in the common era, but while encyclopedias of midrash continued to be composed throughout the Middle Ages, original midrashic composition declined until, ultimately, the new forms of peshat-oriented exegesis—so-called contextual or plain-sense interpretation—emerged in the late 10th century in the Islamic world and the 11th century in Europe. What has survived in the popular Jewish tradition of Bible study from the classical midrashic traditions are primarily those interpretations that were selected by Rashi (R. Shlomo Yitzhaki, 1040–1105) for inclusion in his commentary to the Bible. Finally, in the 12th and 13th centuries, the literary forms of classical midrash were appropriated and revived by the fledgling kabbalistic movement in such works as the Sefer Bahir and the Zohar, where they were infused with a new mystical content and thereby transformed into a medium for esoteric teachings. At this point, however, another literary tradition had begun.

For much of the past two centuries, since the beginnings of the Jewish Enlightenment and of modern critical study of the Bible among Jewish scholars, most interest in pre-modern Jewish biblical interpretation has centered upon the peshat interpreters of the Middle Ages, with their more contextual, grammatically informed, and rationalistic exegesis of the biblical text. And yet, as has become increasingly clear in the last half-century, peshat exegesis has been more of an exception, almost a blip, in the long history of Jewish biblical exegesis. If there has been a dominant mode of Jewish reading of the Bible, it has been more in the "spirit" of midrash—if not classical midrash itself—with its imperative to connect to the biblical text, its irrepressible playfulness, and its delight in multiple, polyvalent traditions of interpretation. And nowhere is this more visible than in the very page layout of what becomes the true Jewish study Bible—that is, the Rabbinic Bible, the Miqra'ot Gedolot—as it was first published in 1516 by the Christian printer Daniel Bomberg and then successively built upon and expanded by subsequent publishing houses. On this page, as one can see from Figure 1, the biblical text is surrounded by commentaries and para-exegetical works—the Aramaic Targum next to the biblical text, with the commentaries of Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Nahmanides, Sforno, and others below. Although most of these commentaries are peshat commentaries, each one explicitly or implicitly insisting upon the univocal truth of its particular interpretation, here they all lie next to each other on the same page, as though there were no significant difference or disagreement between them, awaiting the reader who will study them all, gleaning each for its own contribution and added significance. In Medieval Jewish Interpretation

The Way of the Peshat

The Bible has been the focus of a rich exegetical tradition, which began to evolve even before the canonization process was completed. The techniques of inner-biblical exegesis, peshet-type interpretation as practiced at Qumran, and rabbinic midrash are all examples of the application of the Bible to the changing spiritual needs of a faith-community. (See "Inner-biblical Interpretation," pp. 1829–35; "The Bible in the Dead Sea Scrolls," pp. 1920–28; and "Midrash and Jewish Interpretation," pp. 1863–75.) Rabbinic midrash treated the entire Bible as an organic whole, whose parts were infinitely significant and ripe for interpretation. This led to atomizing the text, reading words and verses out of context, and making connections between verses from various biblical books. Halakhic midrash attempted to anchor current practice in the biblical text, while aggadic midrash shed light on the character of biblical personalities and derived moral, educational, and theological lessons from biblical narrative through a variety of creative techniques, which often had little regard for the literary coherence or earlier meanings of the text. The midrashic method adequately satisfied the community's needs well into the early Middle Ages, when significant forces came to bear which called for new approaches to the biblical text and gave birth to the commentary genre. In contrast to midrashic collections, which are anthologies of comments by various sages, arranged either as a commentary on a biblical book or as a collection of sermons, the commentary bears the distinct stamp of a single author. From the 8th century onward, in Iraq, Judeo-Arabic paraphrases of biblical texts begin to appear, replacing Aramaic works of a similar nature. These are the precursors of the commentary genre. By the middle of the 9th century, a steady stream of commentaries begins to flow through the veins of the Jewish body politic, nourishing and invigorating it, and providing instruction and inspiration for each succeeding generation.

Karaites and Geonim (9th–11th Centuries)

Jewish scholars were doubtless aware of the importance of the Bible for Christians and its use as a source of inspiration and prooftexts. Indeed, Christians were already producing commentaries on biblical books in the 3rd century. However, only with the rise of Islam and the challenge posed by its claim of religious superiority did new approaches to the study of the biblical text seem imperative for Jewish scholars. The engagement of Muslim scholars in Quranic exegesis directly influenced the approach of their Jewish counterparts to the Hebrew Scriptures. The exposure to Islamic philosophy, especially rationalist Mutazilite Kalam, was also a powerful factor and left a distinct stamp of rationalism on the works of the period. Under the influence of Arabic philology and linguistics the serious study of the Hebrew language was undertaken, dictionaries were written, and rules, often derived from the Arabic grammarian's study of Quranic grammar, began to be defined for Hebrew grammar. One of the distinctive features of the commentary genre is the recognition that language follows specific rules and that these must be taken into account when explaining the text. Thus, although the message of the Bible is still seen as divine, the medium is human, and follows the conventions of human speech and communication.

It was at this time in Iraq, newly conquered by the Arabs from the Persians, that the Karaite movement began to take shape. By questioning the validity of the oral law and its supremacy over the written, and its sometimes idiosyncratic interpretations and occasional contradictions of the biblical text, this movement challenged the authority of the rabbinic leadership of the period. The Karaites advocated a return to Scripture and ridiculed the rabbinic readings of the text, which indeed were often difficult to justify on rational grounds. The movement's founding father, or better, precursor, was Anan ben David (mid-8th century), who according to recent scholarship, was not really the first Karaite, but rather the founder of a rival legal school which promoted a different interpretation of the halakhah, while using the same techniques of midrash halakhah as the Rabbis. Anan promoted an extreme ascetical form of religion, which he buttressed with midrashic exegetical methods, and many of his views were rejected by later Karaites. Anan, at least according to later tradition, seems to have coined the slogan "search diligently the Scriptures and do not rely on my opinion," thus inspiring an efflorescence of biblical scholarship in both the Karaite and Rabbanite (the term used for Rabbinic in Karaite contexts) camps that would reach its zenith in the 10th and 11th centuries.

The Karaites, who coalesced into a movement in the 10th century, were the first Jewish group to produce full-fledged scriptural commentaries. The earliest exegete seems to have been the Karaite Benjamin al-Nahawandi (first half of the 9th century), who wrote commentaries on the Torah and several other biblical books, of which only fragments remain. The earliest extant complete Jewish commentary is Daniel al-Qumisi's commentary on the Minor Prophets, the only part of his oeuvre to have survived intact. Al-Qumisi flourished in the last quarter of the 9th century, during which time he emigrated to Jerusalem where he helped found the Karaite community of Mourners of Zion. His commentary, written in Hebrew, bears a distinct authorial stamp, and presents a running verse-by-verse exposition of the biblical text, incorporating occasional Arabic and Persian glosses. Al-Qumisi demonstrates a distinct awareness of the literary nature of the biblical text, pointing out connections between verses and sections, and offering philological analysis where necessary. On occasion he will apply certain prophetic statements to his own era, specifically engaging in polemics against the Rabbanites. But such interpretations are always offered as a second level of meaning after the verse has been subjected to philological and literary analysis. Take for example, Hos. 2.8-9: "Assuredly, I will hedge up her roads with thorns and raise walls against her, and she shall not find her paths. Pursue her lovers as she will, she will not overtake them; and seek them as she may, she shall never find them. Then she will say, 'I will go and return to my first husband, for then I fared better than now.'" After explaining the difficult words in the text and placing the verses in the general context of Hosea's prophecy, al-Qumisi then applies these verses to the Karaite-Rabbanite controversy, explaining that many will seek enlightenment through the teachings of the Rabbanites but will be disappointed ("seek them as she may, she shall never find them," 2.8) and as a result, there will be some who wish to "return to the first husband" (2.9), i.e., to the proper worship of God as prescribed in the Bible (the Karaite way), while there are those who "pursue their lovers" (ibid.), i.e., engage in improper acts, as did the early nations, in which men would marry their nieces and sisters-in-law and perform other forbidden unions, use candlelight on the Sabbath, etc., as did the Rabbanites. But the shepherds who mislead their flocks (i.e., the Rabbanites) will be dismissed and Israel will not find them, as it is written "I will dismiss them from tending the flock" (Ezek. 34.10). While this type of exegesis is somewhat reminiscent of the pesharim of the Dead Sea sectarians, there is a wide gap between the latter, which use the biblical text as a key for predicting the future, particularly the fate of their community, and those Karaites like al-Qumisi, who occasionally offer a midrashic type of gloss applying the text to their present situation. In general, in contrast with the Sages, who spoke of the multivalency of Scripture, al-Qumisi insisted that every word in the Bible had but one true interpretation. Unfortunately, this interpretation was not always immediately obvious. Therefore, multiple meanings could vie with each other, until the true meaning would be clarified at the End of Days when the Teacher of Righteousness (moreh tzedek), a messianic figure who is also prominent in Qumran pesher texts, would clarify ambiguities and decide on the one true interpretation.

The most prominent Rabbanite exegete of this period is Saadia Gaon (882–942), a polymath, who did pioneering scholarly work in many areas, including grammar and exegesis. Saadia was born in Egypt and later moved to Iraq, where he was eventually chosen to be gaon, or head of the Sura academy, the leading talmudic academy of his time. Saadia translated most of the Bible into Arabic and wrote commentaries on many books including the Torah, Isaiah, Proverbs, Job, and some of the Five Scrolls. He prefaced his commentaries with detailed introductions discussing grammatical, exegetical, and philosophical issues and polemicizing extensively against the Karaites. Saadia set down several principles of interpretation, which guided him in his work of translation and exegesis. These are most explicit in the introduction to his Torah commentary, where he affirmed the necessity of understanding the biblical text according to the plain meaning of the words, with the following exceptions: (1) if experience and sense perception contradict the plain meaning (e.g., that Eve was the mother of all living things [Gen. 2.20]); (2) if reason contradicts the plain sense (e.g., Deut. 4.24, that “the LORD your God is a consuming fire,” which must be interpreted metaphorically); (3) when verses contradict each other (e.g., Mal. 3.10, “thus put me to the test,” which must be interpreted so as not to contradict Deut. 6.16, “do not test the LORD, your God,” which takes precedence); (4) when a verse contradicts established tradition (e.g., in the prohibition against seething a kid in its mother’s milk [Exod. 23.19; 34.26; Deut. 14.21]). In the last case, an oral tradition (the complete separation of meat and milk products) was transmitted by the people, who saw how the prophets behaved in this matter. One of Saadia’s key exegetical principles was maintaining a balance between the freedom of the interpreter and the authoritative tradition. This issue must have been heatedly discussed in Islamic circles as well, but for Saadia it was probably primarily motivated by the need to defend the oral tradition from the attacks of the Karaites. For Saadia unlimited freedom of interpretation, which the Karaites advocated, was unthinkable, since it would lead to religious anarchy. Exegetical freedom had to be limited by the dictates of tradition, which sometimes led to interpretations far from the plain sense.

Another important rabbinic exegete of this period was Samuel ben Ḥofni (d. 1013), gaon of Sura, who wrote an extensive commentary on the Torah in Judeo-Arabic, only part of which survives. This commentary follows in Saadia’s footsteps but has its own unique features as well. It takes a rationalistic approach to the text and features extensive excursuses on various topics, which go far beyond the explication of the text and for which he was criticized by later exegetes. For example, his comment on Gen. 41.49 (“So Joseph collected produce in very large quantity, like the sands of the sea”) includes a lengthy discourse on hoarding, and he appends to his commentary on the death of Jacob a long discussion of the laws of death and burial (Gen. 47.29).

One of the most prominent Karaite scholars of the period was Ya‘qub al-Qirqisani, a native of Iraq and a younger contemporary of Saadia, who wrote two major works in Arabic, a legal code called Kitab al-anwar wa’l maraqib (Book of Lights and Watchtowers), and a commentary on the Torah titled Kitab al-Riyad wa’l ḥada’iq (Book of Gardens and Parks). These two works constituted a unified exegetical project encompassing the legal and narrative portions of the Torah. In the latter work he sets down thirty-seven principles of exegesis and explains his exegetical aims and methods. Examples include the Mosaic authorship of the entire Torah and the necessity to interpret Scripture literally unless this would lead to a contradiction. Another important principle is that "Scripture addresses human beings in a manner accessible to them and about matters familiar to them from their own experience," which is reminiscent of the rabbinic principle "Scripture speaks in human language" (e.g., b. Ber. 31b). His works demonstrate a wide knowledge of contemporary philosophical and intellectual trends, as was typical for his time and environment.

In the 10th century Jerusalem became the spiritual center of Karaism. The greatest Karaite exegete was Japheth ben Eli, who flourished in the second half of the 10th century and was part of this Jerusalem school of Karaite scholars. He is the only exegete to have translated and commented on the entire Bible. He seems to have undertaken this task in order to provide the Karaite community with an adequate treatment of Scripture, which could hold its own against traditional rabbinic exegesis, especially the sophisticated treatment of his formidable Rabbanite opponent Saadia Gaon. While not as sophisticated and well developed in his understanding of Arabic linguistics and Mutazilite (rationalist Islamic) philosophy as his 11th-century successors, such as Yusuf al-Basir, Jeshuah ben Judah, and Abu'l-Faraj Harun, his originality and literary-contextual approach set the tone for succeeding generations of exegetes and were profoundly influential. Japheth's Karaite successors used his commentaries as the foundation for their remarks, expanding and elaborating upon them, and his comments also found their way into the rabbinic peshat tradition, mainly through the mediation of Abraham Ibn Ezra.

Japheth's commentaries are divided into two sections. Each biblical book begins with a programmatic introduction, followed by a section-by-section translation and commentary. The translation and commentary are intimately related: The translation represents the distillation of the exegete's understanding of the meaning of the text, while the commentary discusses in depth the various options for its interpretation. Like Daniel al-Qumisi, Japheth also interpreted the text according to two methods, one the linguistic-contextual, the other, the peshet-like or prognostic, in which allusions are sought in the text to the exegete's own time, and to the struggle of the Karaite movement against its opponents. For Japheth and other Karaite members of the Mourners of Zion, such as Salmon ben Jeroḥam (mid-10th century), this second method, which had a strong messianic tone to it, replaced the rabbinic method of midrash, which they had rejected. However, this method was used selectively, only on works or verses deemed appropriate for such treatment (e.g., the poetic passages in the Torah and Early Prophets, Psalms, Daniel, Song of Songs).

In the late 10th century the Karaite Abu Ya'aqov Yusuf Ibn Nuḥ published a grammatical commentary on the Bible, the Dikduk (Grammar), which bears witness to an early Karaite tradition of Hebrew grammatical thought which originated in Persia and Iraq in the 8th to 9th centuries and was at first shared by Rabbanites and Karaites alike. The intention of this work was to use the tools of grammar and linguistics to elucidate the biblical text; it is thus distinguished from the grammars of Saadia and the Karaite Abu'l-Faraj Harun, which were more theoretical grammars arranged systematically. Ibn Nuḥ also wrote a long commentary on the Torah, only part of which survives.

The most important Karaite exegete of the 11th century is Jeshuah ben Judah, author of several exegetical works, including long and short commentaries on the Torah, and Genesis Rabbah, a theological commentary on the opening chapters of Genesis (not to be confused with the rabbinic midrash of the same name). His commentaries, scholastic in nature, are imbued with the teachings of Mutazilite Kalam and include lengthy halakhic discussions. They also include extensive quotations from rabbinic literature, some of them cited approvingly.

By the 11th century a Karaite community had taken hold in Byzantium, and soon Karaites from this community were traveling to Jerusalem to study at the feet of the great sages of the Jerusalem school. Led by Tobias ben Moses, these Byzantine sectarians translated into Hebrew and epitomized large portions of the Karaite exegetical and halakhic tradition of the time and brought them back to Byzantium. Thus were the Arabic works of Japheth, Jeshuah, and the great theologian Yusuf al-Basir salvaged and transmitted to new generations of students, albeit in rather inferior translations that did not do justice to the eloquence of their authors.

The geonim and their Karaite contemporaries are the pioneers of Jewish biblical exegesis, the first to produce systematic biblical commentaries. They influenced succeeding schools of interpretation, especially those in the Arabic sphere: e.g., exegetes such as Judah Ibn Bal'am and Abraham Ibn Ezra (Muslim Spain), Abraham Maimonides (Egypt) and the Yemenite midrashic commentaries such as Midrash ha-gadol.

The Spanish School (10th–11th Centuries)

In the late geonic period (10th–11th centuries), the intellectual and spiritual center of medieval Jewry moved to Muslim Spain, where the grammatical and exegetical work begun by Saadia Gaon and the Karaites was continued and reached new levels of sophistication. The first significant work to be produced in Spain was the Mahberet (Notebook) of Menaḥem ben Jacob Ibn Saruq, (mid-10th century) the secretary of Ḥisdai Ibn Shaprut (ca. 915–ca. 970), a prominent minister in the court of the Caliph 'Abd al-Raḥman. The Mahberet is a Hebrew dictionary of biblical roots, the first of its kind to be produced in Hebrew. Though not a commentary, this work elucidated many difficult biblical verses, and represented the purest form of philological exegesis. The Mahberet proved to be controversial and elicited a spirited response from Menaḥem's contemporary Dunash ben Labrat. The students of these grammarians carried on the discussion in a series of exchanges. They focused on the basic meaning of biblical roots and verses, many of which had theological and doctrinal implications. For instance, Dunash accused Menaḥem of preferring Karaite interpretations to those of the Rabbanites. Indeed, Menaḥem is single-minded in his devotion to the biblical language and text, insisting that they needed to be understood on their own terms, without recourse to other sources. Thus, he avoids comparative philology as much as possible, even shunning Aramaic and Mishnaic Hebrew for the most part. Dunash is much more of a traditionalist, relying on the Masorah, comparative philology (Arabic, Aramaic), and traditional rabbinic interpretation. The works of these early grammarians would soon be surpassed by their successors, but the fact that they were written in Hebrew made them accessible to and extremely influential among the Northern French exegetical school of Rashi and his disciples.

One of the weaknesses of the grammatical theories of Menaḥem and Dunash was their adherence to the biliteral theory of "weak" Hebrew verbs (instead of the triliteral root theory that was later accepted). Indeed, in the case of some weak verbs, Menaḥem assigned them only one root letter. This understanding of the verbal root and other linguistic matters was improved considerably by the important grammatical work of Judah Ḥayyuj (ca. 945–ca. 1000) and Jonah Ibn Janaḥ (11th century), who raised the scientific study of Hebrew grammar to new heights. Ḥayyuj wrote three grammatical treatises, including Sefer ha-Shorashim (Book of Roots), and a grammatical commentary on the Prophets entitled Kitab al-Nutaf (Book of Plucked Feathers). These works contain a great deal of exegetical material, which greatly influenced subsequent exegetes. Ḥayyuj is credited with introducing the concept of the triliteral Hebrew root, which he applied to the weak verbs and which revolutionized the study of Hebrew grammar.

Ibn Janaḥ refined Ḥayyuj's theories in several grammatical treatises, including Kitab al-Luma (Sefer ha-Riqmah, Book of Variegated Flowerbeds) and Kitab al-Usul (Sefer ha-Shorashim, Book of Roots). Much of the former deals with exegetical tools, including various kinds of substitutions, perhaps the most daring and controversial of his methods. For example at Eccl. 1.8, he explains kol ha-devarim yege'im (lit., "all things are weary") as kol ha-devarim meyage'im ("all things make one weary, are wearisome," substituting a verb for an adjective). At Exod. 21.8, "he shall not have the right to sell her to a foreign people ('am nokhri), he substitutes 'ish (man) for 'am. Similarly, when Abimelech pleads with God, "will you slay a nation (goy) though it be innocent?" (Gen. 20.4), Ibn Janaḥ insists that one must substitute 'ish (man) for goy (nation). Many believe that Ibn Janaḥ is here anticipating the conjectural emendation, a significant tool of modern biblical scholarship, but it is more likely that these interpretations are based on established exegetical principles, many borrowed from Quranic exegesis. Most of these substitutions were accepted by his contemporaries, but some were criticized for exceeding the limits of the acceptable. For instance, Ibn Janaḥ proposes that in 1 Kings 2.28, "for Joab sided with Adonijah, and did not side with Absalom," Absalom should be replaced with Solomon, which makes more sense in the context. However, most of Ibn Janaḥ's critics accept the Masoretic Text and interpret the text as referring to Joab's lack of support for Absalom in the past. Ibn Janaḥ was also a pioneer in comparative philology and solved many an exegetical difficulty through recourse to Rabbinic Hebrew, Aramaic or Arabic. Some of his solutions have been proposed by modern Bible scholars who were unaware that Ibn Janaḥ had anticipated them. An example of his technique is his explanation of Num. 16.1: vayikah korah, "and Korah took." Exegetes throughout the ages, beginning with the Targumim and midrashim, have puzzled over what it was that Korah took and made various proposals for filling the gap. Ibn Janaḥ, on the basis of comparison with the Arabic equivalent of the word lakah (the root of vayikah), suggests that the word here means "to begin" and does not require a direct object. It is rather connected to the verb in the following verse vayakumu, "they rose up," and means Korah and his men began to rise up against Moses.

In another important contribution, Ibn Janaḥ applied rhetorical principles to biblical usage, especially with regard to poetic repetition or parallelism. Thus, for example, one finds synonyms in Isa. 41.4, "Who has made and done?" and in Isa. 43.7, "I have created, fashioned and made him." Are these synonyms to be explained as having different meanings? The midrashic tradition and many medieval exegetes saw a distinct meaning in each word, assuming that since in the Bible no words are superfluous, each word had its own meaning. Ibn Janaḥ argued that the use of such synonyms and repetitions is rhetorical, to add elegance and beauty to the language; they do not add further meaning. If one should ask, then, why bother repeating the same idea in different words, Ibn Janaḥ would respond that in the art of rhetoric, elaboration is more elegant and artistic. This view was adopted by many Spanish and Provençal exegetes, especially Abraham Ibn Ezra and Radak, and was criticized by others who favored the midrashic method. In recent times, this question has again become a topic of dispute among interpreters of the Bible.

The two most important exegetes in Muslim Spain were Moses ben Samuel Gikatilla of Saragossa and Judah ben Samuel Ibn Bal'am of Toledo and later Seville, who were both active in the second half of the 11th century. Gikatilla translated the Arabic grammar books of Ḥayyuj into Hebrew and wrote a commentary on the Bible; most of it is lost. From the extant fragments of his commentary one can see that he was heavily influenced by Ibn Janaḥ in matters grammatical, but did not confine his exegesis to grammar and philology; he also commented on matters of content and general meaning. Notable is his severe rationalism, especially in dealing with miracles. He was also the first exegete to assign the second part of the book of Isaiah (chs 40–66) to a second prophet (called by modern scholars Second Isaiah or Deutero-Isaiah).

Judah Ibn Bal'am's works have fared better than Gikatilla's and most have survived, although, until recently, few had been published. His commentaries are very selective, focusing on verses about which he disagrees with his predecessors. In his introduction to the Prophets, he spells out his exegetical method, explaining that he will treat difficult words in three ways: by translating them into Arabic, by comparing them with cognate words in the Bible, and, wherever possible, by relating them to equivalents in Rabbinic Hebrew, Aramaic, or Arabic. Although some have considered him an epigone (a follower of lesser abilities) of Ibn Janah, he was clearly an independent thinker, who struggled with the text, rejected opposing views, and offered many innovative interpretations. In some cases, if he was not satisfied with previous solutions to a problem and could not provide a better solution of his own, he preferred to leave the problem unsolved. Only in matters of halakhah did he bow to tradition, as did most of the peshat (contextual) exegetes of the Middle Ages. Like his mentor Ibn Janah, he was concerned with identifying geographical names, objects, flora, and fauna.

Abraham Ibn Ezra (1089–1164)

The commentaries of Abraham ben Meir Ibn Ezra mark the culmination of the Spanish-Arabic period of exegesis. Ibn Ezra lived in Spain most of his life, but in 1140 he abandoned his homeland, probably for personal reasons, and set out on a journey that would take him to Rome and through much of France, arriving finally in England, where he died in 1164. As he traveled, he produced, often by commission, commentaries on various biblical books; in some cases, such as Exodus, Minor Prophets, Psalms, Esther, and Daniel, he produced two commentaries, one considerably longer and more detailed than the other. Ibn Ezra, in the Spanish tradition, based his methodology on the twin pillars of grammar and reason. He argued that only an exegete thoroughly grounded in Hebrew grammar and lexicography could properly understand the meaning of the biblical text. For him the text had but one meaning, which could be obtained only through the application of the rules of grammar. Furthermore, an acceptable interpretation had to be logically consistent and stand up to the test of reason.

In the introduction to his Torah commentary, he discusses four earlier approaches to biblical exegesis which he found wanting: (1) the geonic, which tended to stray from the matter at hand and lapsed into lengthy discussions of matters not germane to the text; (2) the Karaite, which rejected the oral tradition of the Sages, allowing every exegete to interpret according to his own understanding, even in matters of halakhah, thus undermining rabbinic authority; (3) the Christian, which tended to allegorize the text, including matters of halakhah, thus robbing it of its basic meaning and calling into question the necessity for religious observance; and (4) the midrashic, the way of the Sages, whose interpretations defied logic and reason and ignored context. This lack of exegetical control was totally unacceptable.

Ibn Ezra then articulates his own methodology: he will explain the grammar of each word only once, at its first occurrence, and then explain its meaning in context. He also declares that he will ignore the comments of the Masorettes, which he claims have no exegetical value, though they provided much material for homilists.

Ibn Ezra's exegesis represents a distillation of the finest achievements of the Spanish philological school of exegesis, avoiding its more radical elements such as Ibn Janah's methods of lexical and consonantal substitution. He adopted Moses Ibn Ezra's stance (see below) that Scripture uses human language and therefore must conform to the rules of syntax and rhetoric; this led him to reject midrashim which tampered with the syntax, or interpretations based on plene or defective spellings since these had no effect on the meaning of the text. Furthermore, the Bible speaks of God and the elements of nature in human terms, so that human beings can understand what it is saying. Expressions such as the "mouth of the earth" (Num. 16.32) or "the heart of the sea" (Exod. 15.8) are figures of speech and should not be understood literally.

Ibn Ezra fully accepted the Spanish exegetical tradition that did not assign significance to changes in spelling or wording if the meaning was not affected. As a result, he paid little attention to textual nuance, unusual spellings, and stylistic variation, which are popular now among modern students of the Bible. He ignored the differences in parallel passages, e.g., the two versions of the Decalogue, or Pharaoh's two dreams, and, saw no significance in the unusual form 'oholoh (Gen. 9.21), instead of 'oholo, which Rashi as well as the midrash interpreted to refer to the fall of Samaria (called 'Oholah), brought down by drunkenness and depravity.

In his firm belief that Scripture could not contradict the demands of reason, he was a faithful follower of Saadia Gaon, invoking the method of tikun (correction or adaptation, based on the tawil of Quranic exegesis) in order to make a verse conform to reason by means of allegory or metaphor. But in order to avoid undermining the validity of the commandments, the historicity of the patriarchal narratives, or the truthfulness of the prophetic messages, he insisted, as did Saadia, that the method of tikun had to be applied only when absolutely necessary.

Ibn Ezra also followed Saadia in his steadfast defense of the oral tradition (kabbalah) of the Sages, particularly in matters of halakhah. In practical terms this meant that Ibn Ezra could not accept a peshat interpretation that contradicted halakhah, in contrast to other peshat exegetes, such as Rashbam, of the Northern French school, or Radak. Thus, for example, Exod. 13.9 and other passages which provide the scriptural basis for tefillin (phylacteries) are accepted as referring to the ha-lakhic requirement to actually bind copies of these passages on the arm and place them on the head in leather boxes (phylacteries, or tefillin). Ibn Ezra argues that since the literal interpretation does not contradict reason and that the commandment it entails can be carried out, it must be accepted, unlike the verse "and you should circumcise the foreskin of your heart" (Deut. 10.16), which cannot be interpreted literally. The Karaites and Rashbam, on the other hand, interpret both these verses metaphorically as merely urging constant vigilance in remembering the commandments. But while the oral tradition of the Sages, the vast body of halakhah gathered in the Mishnah and Talmud, was sacrosanct, the same authority was not ascribed to the midreshei halakhah, the halakhic midrashim of the Sages meant to provide scriptural justification for the actual laws themselves. He felt no compulsion to defend these in the same way he defended the halakhic decisions of the Talmud (see, e.g., his short commentary to Exod. 21.8). Similarly, despite his respect for the halakhic decisions of the rabbinic Sages, Ibn Ezra feels no compulsion to accept their assignments of authorship to the various biblical books (e.g., he questions whether Jeremiah wrote Lamentations), or the midrashic identification of biblical characters (e.g., contra Rashi, he rejects the midrashic view that the prophet Joel was the son of the prophet Samuel).

Ibn Ezra had a very conservative view of the biblical text and rejected all attempts at emendation. On the other hand, he did have a penchant for higher criticism, pointing to later additions in the text (e.g., Gen. 12.6; 22.14; Deut. 3.11), and especially the last twelve verses of Deuteronomy ("the secret of the twelve"), which he claims were written prophetically by Joshua. Similarly, following Moses Gikatilla, he advocates the postexilic dating of the second part of Isaiah and of some of the psalms (e.g., Ps. 69).

Ibn Ezra was a serious philosopher, a Neoplatonist, heavily influenced by astrology. Although he never wrote any systematic theological or philosophical treatises, his thought may be gleaned from his biblical commentaries. Indeed, many of Ibn Ezra's allusions to secrets (sodot) refer to his views on central issues of Jewish theology, such as God's relation to the land of Israel, the people of Israel, and the role of the sacrificial cult, especially the scapegoat (Lev. 16.8) in determining the fate of the Jewish people. His referring to these views as secrets, and alluding to them obliquely, may be an indication that they might be threatening to the religious well-being of the Jewish masses and could only be tolerated and properly understood by the intellectual elite.

Ibn Ezra was one of the main conduits of Spanish-Jewish culture to the rest of Western Europe, and as such his legacy is of inestimable value. Despite the impression given by his "modern" critical allusions and his tendency to be overly critical of his predecessors and contemporaries, he was not a radical exegete. His importance lies in his position at the end of a productive period in Jewish intellectual history and his ability to summarize in Hebrew the exegetical achievements of this period clearly, succinctly, and judiciously. Nevertheless, his commentaries presented challenges to the reader because of their concise, difficult nature, and scattered cryptic comments, which stimulated the production of a whole corpus of super-commentaries that elucidate and elaborate upon them.

Interest in Ibn Ezra has continued down through the ages, making him one of the most influential cultural icons in Jewish history. In the Late Middle Ages, he was appropriated by nearly every intellectual school. Though he was a Neoplatonist, Maimonidean Aristotelians found common ground in him. Though he polemicized fiercely against the Karaites, these sectarians also claimed him as one of their own, perhaps because he often cited works by Karaite scholars. Baruch Spinoza cited him as the first biblical critic, making much of his so-called higher-critical comments and using his name to justify his own much more radical views. He was also much admired by the Christian Hebraists in the early modern period, who translated many of his works and quoted him approvingly. In the modern period, Jewish reformers and biblical critics saw him as a precursor of their views, as someone who was dedicated to the pursuit of truth but could not express his views openly, and as someone, who, like Maimonides, was open to the outside world, willing to accept the truth from whatever source it came.

Aesthetics and Philosophy

At the same time that grammarians were refining their tools to better explain the biblical text, another school of thought was approaching the Bible from a different direction. Scholars trained in philosophy were using their newfound knowledge to reexamine the biblical text and then reinterpret it in the light of their philosophical insights. While none utilized the commentary genre, their works are full of comments on the biblical text, which they attempt to harmonize with their philosophical teachings. (See "The Bible in the Philosophical Tradition," pp. 1948–75.) Although he did not write biblical commentaries as such, Moses ben Jacob Ibn Ezra (ca. 1055–1138), a relative and friend of Abraham Ibn Ezra, made an important contribution to biblical hermeneutics by developing a literary exegetical theory based on Arabic theories of aesthetics. His Arabic treatise, Book of Discussion and Conversation, provides guidelines for writing Hebrew poetry in the Arabic style. To illustrate his points Ibn Ezra brings examples from the Bible and thereby indirectly provides an analysis of biblical stylistics in comparison with the ideal of Arabic poetry. Applying his theory to prophecy, he portrayed biblical prophets as poets, who supplied the literary form for the divine message. The implications for exegesis are obvious, since this means that biblical prophecies can be analyzed like any other poetry. Furthermore, if the ideas expressed are paramount, then the stylistic embellishments of these ideas do not have interpretive significance and can be ignored. This leads to the principle, characteristic of the Spanish school of peshat exegesis, that the Bible may repeat the same idea in different words for stylistic, aesthetic purposes, and that such repetition is not exegetically significant. Thus, for example, in "Abraham breathed his last and died" (Gen. 25.8), "breathed his last" (vayigva') renders "and died" (vayamot) superfluous. As part of his theory, Ibn Ezra enumerates literary ornaments of poetry, known in Arabic as badi, which he proceeds to identify in the Bible. Some, such as metaphor, simile, and allegory, were commonly recognized; for others, he could not find good examples. Nevertheless, in the attempt, he revealed many characteristics of biblical style, which had hitherto not been recognized. Ibn Ezra's aesthetic exegesis, written in Arabic, towards the end of the Golden Age of Spanish-Jewish culture (10th–12th centuries, when Muslims controlled most of Spain), remained untranslated until recently, and thus had little impact on subsequent generations, living in Christian Europe with limited exposure to Arabic language and culture.

Bahya Ibn Pakuda (ca. 1100) in his Duties of the Heart, elaborates a theory of biblical exegesis in which he identifies several levels of understanding, from the basic linguistic to the lexical to the contextual and finally to the esoteric, which is only attainable by those who have intellect and understanding. Bahya was greatly influenced by the Sufi mystics of his time. Moses Maimonides (1138–1204) devoted much of his major philosophical work, the Guide of the Perplexed, to the interpretation of particular biblical texts. His primary purpose is to demonstrate that the inner meaning of the biblical text is compatible with Aristotelian philosophy. The whole first section is devoted to the elucidation of equivocal terms in the Bible, and sections of the Bible are interpreted or explained at various points in the work. Another major concern of his was the elucidation of parables, which he viewed as having two levels of meaning, revealed and hidden. Maimonides spends a great deal of effort in elucidating the biblical prophecies as well as the book of Job. For the former, a major concern was harmonizing the biblical text with reason and logic; the latter he read as a parable on divine providence and the problem of evil. He often uses midrashic interpretations as an aid for his exegesis, interpreting them philosophically as well. Maimonides' exegetical approach was very influential on succeeding generations of scholars. He was the prime representative and major spokesman for the Aristotelian school in Jewish philosophy, and subsequent Jewish philosophical exegesis shows strong signs of his influence.

Provençal School (12th–13th Centuries)

The lore of the Spanish peshat tradition was brought to Provence by the Kimḥi family. The father Joseph (ca. 1105–1170) moved his family, which already included his elder son Moses, from Spain to Narbonne in Provence around 1150, in the wake of the Almohade persecutions. His second son David (ca. 1160–1235) was born in Narbonne. David lost his father at the tender age of ten years and was raised by his brother. The Kimḥis were an impressive family, all steeped in the Sephardic tradition of philosophical rationalism and scientific study of the Hebrew language. All wrote biblical commentaries and grammatical works. Joseph is probably best known for his anti-Christian polemic Sefer ha-Berit (The Book of the Covenant), which contains much material of an exegetical nature, Moses for his grammatical work, Mahlakhi shevilei ha-da'at (The Course of the Paths of Knowledge), which was translated into Latin in 1508 and became a favorite of 16th-century Christian Hebraists. Both Joseph and Moses left commentaries on Proverbs and Job; the latter's Proverbs commentary was attributed until recent times to Abraham Ibn Ezra. But the family's most distinguished exegete was David (better known by the acronym Radak), who surpassed his father and brother in celebrity. He produced commentaries on the Torah, Prophets, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, and Chronicles. These commentaries along with his grammatical works, Sefer ha-Shorashim (Book of Roots) and Sefer Mikhlol (Comprehensive Hebrew Grammar), became standard works in the field and epitomized the best of the Spanish peshat tradition. Growing up in Provence, with its history of midrashic exegesis, Radak was exposed to the positive aspects of this tradition; and in his commentaries he does justice to both peshat and midrash, quoting derashot (homiletical interpretations of the Sages) and also incorporating midrashic methods and sensibilities into his peshat exegesis. For instance, while Radak opposes the midrashic tendency to glorify the patriarchs and matriarchs, preferring to view them as having human strengths and weaknesses, he does derive moral encouragement and religious inspiration from their actions. For example, at Gen. 21.15, concerning Hagar and Ishmael, he teaches the lesson of patience and fortitude in the face of adversity, for if God can perform a miracle for Abraham's maid-servants, anyone may benefit from such divine attention.

In similar fashion, Radak does not shy away from applying biblical prophecies and psalms to the situation of the Jews in their present exile and to the long awaited messianic salvation. Thus, in commenting on Isa. 52.1, "Awake, awake, O Zion! Clothe yourself in splendor; put on your robes of majesty, Jerusalem, holy city! For the uncircumcised and the unclean shall never enter you again," he explains "the uncircumcised and the unclean" as referring to the two nations of Edom (Christianity) and Ishmael (Islam) who have fought incessantly over Jerusalem, but who will eventually have to surrender it when the Messiah comes. In this contemporizing tendency he reacts against the extreme historicization of those exegetes such as Moses Gikatilla, who, perhaps for apologetic reasons, explained all the biblical prophecies as referring to past events.

A philosophically trained Maimonidean, Radak introduces philosophical ideas into his commentaries and vigorously defended the Maimonidean position both in writing and orally, participating in his later years in the first Maimonidean controversy. Radak also had a keen historical sense, which he applied judiciously to various biblical issues. For example, he explains the existence of variant readings for the same words, called ketiv (written) and qere (to be read) as the result of the confusion generated by the first exile (6th century BCE), when books were lost and traditions forgotten. In cases when the men of the Great Synagogue (a group believed by the Sages to have begun functioning in the early postexilic period) could not determine which of two variants was the correct one, they recorded both. In general, on matters concerning the transmission of the biblical text, he is relatively progressive.

The works of Radak, alongside those of Ibn Ezra, exerted tremendous influence in subsequent generations. His grammar books became the standard in the field, and were copied and printed numerous times. His grammatical works and his commentaries were very popular among Christian Hebraists of the 16th–19th centuries, and are consulted and cited by modern Bible scholars to this day.

Northern France (11th–12th Centuries)

During the heyday of the Spanish school (the second half of the 11th century), there developed in northern France another school of peshat exegesis, with similar goals and slightly different results. Anonymous glossators called poterim, who taught the Bible through the vernacular and are the school's precursors, were active during the early part of the century. In the middle of the century Menahem ben Helbo (1015–1085) was writing complete commentaries on the Prophets and Writings, characterized by, among other things, a concern for the plain meaning, the interpolation of foreign words (le'azim), and an attempt to show connections between various passages. Unfortunately very little of his work has survived. The true inspiration for this efflorescence in biblical scholarship was the 11th century scholar, R. Shlomo Yitzhaki (Rashi [an acronym for Rabbi Shlomo son of Isaac], 1040–1105). Rashi wrote commentaries on almost the entire biblical corpus as well as on the Talmud. They draw heavily on the rabbinic tradition and also display a newly discovered sensitivity to context, which influences his choice of midrashic material. The genius of Rashi's commentaries lies in their clarity, concision, felicity of expression, and skillful selection and editing of sources. On numerous occasions, Rashi modifies midrashic sources to accommodate his exegetical goals. In one of his few methodological statements (at Gen. 3.8), he states, "there are many aggadic interpretations, and our Sages have already arranged them in their proper place in Genesis Rabbah and other midrashic collections. I, however, am only concerned with the contextual meaning of Scripture (peshuto shel miqra', from the same root as peshat) and with such 'aggadot that properly explain the word and meaning of Scripture." Rashi is thus saying that he will be very selective in his choice of rabbinic material and will not include rabbinic comments which read the text out of context. One puzzling aspect of Rashi's commentaries is the double comment, in which he explains a verse according to context and then follows this with a citation from a midrashic source. It has been the generally accepted opinion that Rashi adds these rabbinic comments only if he is not completely satisfied with his peshat explanation. Thus, a weak midrash is used to strengthen a weak peshat. Recently, however, it has been suggested that each part of these double interpretations is actually complementary, representing a dualistic approach to the biblical text. The two interpretations when combined, produce a fuller, more satisfying picture, enabling the reader more fully to grasp the meaning of Scripture in all its complexity. Rashi was very sensitive to the nuances of biblical language, and though he lacked the training of his Spanish colleagues who read and wrote in Arabic, he knew the work of Menahem ben Saruq and Dunash ben Labrat, whom he quotes in his commentaries. In addition his commentaries are replete with hundreds of le'azim, or word definitions in Old French. Although he does not reveal a great deal about himself in his commentaries, he does refer occasionally to realia or to social conditions in his own time. Rashi was a brilliant Hebrew stylist; this feature, as well as his ability to create a commentary with a didactic and moral thrust that had popular appeal, have helped assign his commentary pride of place in the Ashkenazi canon of classic Jewish texts which are still studied widely today. His commentary on the Torah became immensely popular, achieving near-canonical status, as an acceptable substitute for the required weekly reading of the Targum in preparation for the Torah reading on Sabbath mornings. Rashi's commentary also spawned an impressive number of super-commentaries, beginning with the commentary of Ramban (see below). Among the most famous are those of Judah Khalatz (Spain-Morocco, 15th century), Abraham Bukarat (late 15th–early 16th century, Spain, Tunis), Elijah Mizraḥi (Constantinople, ca. 1450–1526), Judah Loew ben Bezalel (Maharal) of Prague (ca. 1525–1609), and Shabbetai Bass (Prague, 1641–1718). Indeed the production of translations and super-commentaries continues to this very day. Rashi's blend of contextual exegesis and ethical homiletics was a winning combination. His reputation as a talmudist further strengthened his authority and assured that his Bible commentary would never be neglected.

Rashi's sense of peshuto shel miqra', the plain or contextual sense of scripture, developed over the course of his lifetime. He reworked some of his commentaries and was constantly looking for new insights into the text. His grandson, Samuel ben Meir, relates that he admitted to him that if he had more time he would write new commentaries "based on the insights into the contextual meanings of Scripture which are being thought up every day" (commentary to Gen. 37.2). This indicates that there was a great deal of activity in biblical study at the time in the school of Rashi and the trend was away from the exclusive use of rabbinic material. For Rashi, peshat and derash coexisted in a state of tension and derashot that did not violate the integrity of the text and taught an important lesson were still favored.

With Rashi's students and younger contemporaries in the peshat school, the balance shifted away from the rabbinic in favor of the biblical. This can be seen already in the work of Joseph Kara (1050–1125), who applied the principles of contextual exegesis to the biblical text with greater rigor and consistency. The name Kara indicates that he dealt with the Bible (miqra') in his professional life, either as a teacher or an exegete, or both. Kara produced commentaries for most of the books of the Bible, of which the commentaries on the Former and Latter Prophets, Psalms, Job, and the Five Scrolls have survived. Recently significant portions of his Commentary on the Torah have been discovered. Kara was also an important exegete of religious poetry (piyyut), his commentaries attaining great renown. In Kara, we find considerable progress away from the reliance on midrashic sources for exegesis, a fact which sets him apart from Rashi. In a lengthy programmatic statement in his commentary on 1 Sam. 1.17, Kara makes a strong case for the independent integrity of the text and its ability to stand alone without midrashic embellishment: "One should know that when the prophecies were written they were written complete, with nothing missing and with adequate interpretation, so that subsequent generations would not be led astray by them. It is not necessary to bring a proof from anywhere else, including the midrash, because the Torah was given and recorded in perfect form, lacking nothing. The purpose of the midrash of our Sages is to exalt and glorify the Torah." He compares someone who inclines towards the midrash to a drowning person desperately grabbing for something to hold on to. Had he heeded God's word and made the effort to grasp the contextual meaning, he would have been rewarded by deeper insight. For Kara, then, the contextual meaning of the text has religious significance, in that it brings one closer to the true word of God. Kara was an independent thinker, not afraid to criticize his predecessors or to find fault with the interpretations of the Rabbis. He was concerned with methodology and his commentaries abound with statements proposing various hermeneutical rules. He was particularly sensitive to literary issues and pointed out instances of parallelism, metaphor and other aspects of biblical style. Kara was also noted for his rationalism, which manifests itself in his quest for reasons for the commandments, and rational explanations for characters' actions and for seemingly miraculous events.

The school of peshat exegesis reached the zenith of its achievements with the commentaries of Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam) (ca. 1080–ca. 1160), the grandson of Rashi. His greatest achievement was his Torah commentary, in which he diligently persevered in elucidating the contextual meaning of Scripture (peshat) without regard for the interpretations of the Sages. He took his grandfather Rashi to task for his deviations from the peshat; indeed, his commentary may be seen as a reaction and critical response to that of Rashi. In most cases, he provides a peshat explanation only if he feels that Rashi's comment does not do the job. In an interesting methodological statement, Rashbam makes it clear that his goal in his commentary is only to understand the text as it was written. This includes texts of a legal nature which supposedly govern Jewish practice.

Rashbam sees the halakhot (legal pronouncements) as primary, but recognizes that their connection with the text is often not that easy to justify. Nevertheless this does not detract from their primary importance: "All those with wisdom should know and understand that I have not come to explain halakhot, even though they are primary . . . Since from the superfluity of Scripture one derives halakhot and aggadot; some of these are found in the comments of R. Solomon, my mother's father. But I have come to explain Scripture contextually" (Exod. 21.1). In other words, Rashbam recognizes two legitimate modes of exegesis. The rabbinic mode is legitimate in its own right and does not need justification; in this context, it is noteworthy that Rashbam (in contrast, e.g., to Abraham Ibn Ezra) was an important halakhic scholar. But the peshat mode is also valid in and of itself and operates within its own methodological confines. The two are complementary. Rashbam was the most consistent exegete in insisting on a strict separation between the two. In some cases, he even interpreted the text in opposition to the halakhah. E.g., at Exod. 21.6 he explains that after having his ear pierced, the servant is bound to his master for life, even though the halakhah determines that he goes free in the jubilee year, following Lev. 25.40. At Exod. 21.34, in the case of an animal that falls into an open pit, Rashbam's interpretation is that the carcass should go, according to peshat, to the owner of the pit, while pointing out that the halakhah determines that it goes to the owner of the animal. Regarding the famous prohibition against seething a kid in its mother's milk (Exod. 23.19 and elsewhere), Rashbam offers a historical, cultural explanation: "Goats generally give birth to two kids at the same time. It was customary to slaughter one of them. Since goats produce much milk . . . it was the custom to boil the kid in its mother's milk. The text deals with the most likely case [which can be applied to other animals]. It is disgraceful, voracious and gluttonous to consume a mother's milk together with her offspring. . . . The intention of the text is to teach civilized behavior." At the end of his lengthy comment, he adds, however, that "this is the case for all meat and milk, as our Sages have explained in the Talmud Tractate Hullin."

Rashbam showed interest in linguistic and literary matters and had the most sophisticated approach to grammar of all the members of his school. He even wrote a book, called Sefer Dayekut (Book of Precision), which deals with grammatical questions in the Bible.

But like other members of his school, his efforts were hampered by a lack of familiarity with the major Arabic works of grammar produced by the Spanish school. Only the works of Menaḥem and Dunash were available to him. Rashbam was the first medieval exegete to point out the literary technique of foreshadowing, providing information in anticipation of the later need for it. For example, Gen. 9.18, "Ham was the father of Canaan," is seemingly out of place in its context. However, it prepares the reader for the cursing of Canaan later on. Similarly, Num. 13.20 "Now it happened to be the season of the first ripe grapes," prepares the reader for the return of the spies with a cluster of grapes (Num. 13.23, 27). Rashbam points out many other instances of this feature of biblical stylistics.

The last major representative of the peshat school is Eliezer of Beaugency (mid-12th century), who may have been a student of Rashbam. He wrote commentaries on most of the books of the Bible, but only a few, on the Latter Prophets, have survived; therefore our knowledge of his methodology is scant. Eliezer is extreme in his avoidance of midrash; one finds few references to it in his writings. His style is paraphrastic, creating a seamless weave of text with his own words intermingled with the text of Scripture. He stressed the importance of context for explaining difficult words and passages (davar lamed me'inyano, [the meaning of] a word is learned from its context). Like Joseph Kara, he proposed many rules for understanding the biblical text, and many of his comments deal with literary issues. He shows a sensitivity to nuance and devotes much more attention than his colleagues to matters of redaction and the ordering of the biblical books.

Joseph Bekhor Shor (1130–1200) was the last member of this school and his work already shows signs of a decline. He can be seen as a transitional figure situated between the most important members of the peshat school (Kara, Rashbam, Eliezer) and the tosafists (see below). His Torah commentary has characteristics of both schools. Although mainly devoted to peshat exegesis, his commentary includes more midrashic material than those of his predecessors. He also makes use of gematria (the numerical value of letters), which was in vogue among the Pietists in Germany. Among his most significant contributions was his psychological insights into the motivations of the characters in the Bible. He is also concerned with literary structure and connections between passages. His interpretations are often innovative, and even fanciful.

By the turn of the 13th century, just as the mini-renaissance of the 12th century died out and rationalism lost its luster, so too did the peshat school fade away. It may very well have been that the radical nature of the enterprise contributed to its lack of appeal to future generations of scholars and laity. The study of Scripture, as opposed to Talmud, was never primary in the curriculum in Ashkenaz, and an exegetical enterprise which could be seen as undermining the authority of rabbinic interpretation and halakhic rulings based on Scripture was simply not sustainable. The influence of this school, with the exception of Rashi, whose commentary managed to strike the right balance between peshat and derash, was minimal. The small number of surviving manuscripts of the commentaries of Rashbam and Eliezer bears this out. Joseph Kara fared slightly better, although much of his oeuvre was also lost. It seems that these types of commentaries had little appeal to the masses, and even among the intellectuals, changing currents in thinking and an anti-rationalist movement contributed to the neglect of the works of this school for the rest of the Middle Ages.

The Northern French School's Encounter with Christianity

Biblical exegesis among the Northern French was influenced by the Jewish encounter with Christianity in several ways. The interest in the biblical text shown by this school of Northern French exegetes has invited comparisons with similar trends in Christian scholarly circles at the time, notably the School of St. Victor in Paris, where the canon, Andrew of St. Victor, pursued the hebraica veritas with the same assiduousness as Rashbam and his colleagues pursued the peshat. Though names are not mentioned, Andrew, who was not well-versed in Hebrew, consulted Jews regularly and cites Jewish exegesis frequently in his commentaries. Some of the sources he cites can be traced to members of the Northern French School. It is not unreasonable to assume that the winds of influence blew in the other direction as well. Indeed it has been argued convincingly that the focus of the exegetes of this school, especially Rashi, on the construction of a narrative that the Jewish people could identify with and be proud of was a primary concern, and was stimulated by the competing narrative presented by the Christian side in what was an ongoing debate and struggle for legitimacy. So, while there is definitely evidence of shared concerns and techniques, made possible by the atmosphere of tolerance and open rationalistic inquiry fostered by the 12th century renaissance, there is also evidence of competition, rivalry, and struggle for supremacy, which can be seen clearly in the polemical aspects of these exegetes' commentaries.

Indeed, it is likely that the exigencies of polemic and disputation stimulated study of the biblical text unencumbered by traditional non-literal interpretation. The New Testament interprets many verses in the Hebrew Bible christologically, as referring to the life or significance of Jesus of Nazareth. This method was continued in the writings of the Church Fathers and in the medieval Christian commentaries, and such comments loom large in the polemical works written by Jews and Christians in the later medieval period. One area which received special attention was the interpretation of the legal parts of the Torah. Christians argued that many of these laws, such as the dietary laws, were no longer applicable as they had been abrogated by the advent of Jesus as Messiah. Jews contended that all the laws remained valid, even if they lacked a rational explanation, since their fulfillment was an act of faith in God. Another issue was the status and interpretation of the words of the prophets, many of which the Christians applied to Jesus. Jewish exegetes tried to put these prophecies in their historical context, applying them to events in the past, either in the time of the prophet or immediately thereafter. Another important strategy of the Jewish polemicists was to argue from context, showing the indefensibility of the Christian interpretation if the context was considered. This approach, of course, militated against midrashic interpretation as well and contributed to the decline in its use during the Middle Ages. Many of the exegetes of the Northern French School were involved in polemics with Christians and these are alluded to in their commentaries either directly or obliquely. The impact of the Crusades is especially felt in Rashi's commentary on Psalms, written after 1096, in which he applies numerous verses to the struggle of the Jewish people in exile with Christianity (symbolized by Esau or Edom), in many cases reading these verses against the thrust of traditional commentary, in order to avoid any possible misuse of them by Christians. On the other hand his commentary on Song of Songs, in which on numerous occasions he uses the term dugma' in the sense of figure, shows the influence of contemporary Christian exegesis, where typology was an important exegetical tool. Joseph Kara's comments on the meaning and dates of prophecies of comfort, the meaning of the exile, and the continuing value of the observance of the commandments are apologetically motivated. He was also sensitive to comments that Christians might use for their own polemical purposes. Thus, he criticizes Rashi for explaining ma'aseh merkavah, the chariot vision in Ezek. ch 1, as wheels being held together by crossed bars, for fear that this explanation might be used by Christian polemicists to argue that God's chariot was supported by a cross (1 Kings 7.33). Another tendency evident in Kara, but especially in Rashbam and Joseph Bekhor Shor, is to explain the actions of the patriarchs in as positive a manner as possible. Thus according to Rashbam, Abraham had given enough water to Hagar to last her and Ishmael until they reached the next inn. But because she lost her way in the desert, the water ran out (commentary to Gen. 21.14). Jacob dealt honestly with his brother and bought the birthright from him outright at its fair market value. He served him a meal of bread and lentil soup afterwards in order to confirm the transaction (commentary to Gen. 25.31-33). An especially sensitive topic was the despoiling of the Egyptians (Exod. 3.22). Rashbam explains that the Israelite women asked the Egyptians to give them the vessels as outright gifts, and adds that this is the literal meaning and an answer to the sectarians (teshuvat ha-minim). This last comment is a clear indication of the direct relationship between the contextual meaning and anti-Christian polemic. This type of interpretation was the best response to Christian allegorization, which tended to read a reference to Jesus and his life into every verse possible. Nevertheless, not all of these Jewish interpreters were equally engaged in anti-Christian polemic, and the development of peshat interpretation should not be seen entirely as a reaction to Christianity.

Ashkenaz in the Late Middle Ages

Biblical commentary in Ashkenaz in the later Middle Ages was produced by the tosafists, a school of students of the Talmud, which flourished between the 12th (from the time of Rashbam and his brother Jacob Tam) and 14th centuries, and German Pietists (I-Iasidei Ashkenaz), a pietistic school, which flourished from the mid-12th to the mid-13th centuries. The tosafist commentaries, mostly produced in the latter part of the tosafist period, were almost all anonymous and have only recently begun to be studied. Many were largely compilations. Very little attention was paid to linguistic matters. Rabbinic midrash was again favored, as were numerological techniques such as gematria (explaining a word or group of words according to the numerical value of the letters) and notarikon (interpreting every letter in a particular word as the first letter of a whole word, or interpreting a word by breaking it up into its components). The commentaries produced in this period were influenced by the methods of Talmud study of the tosafists, but did not neglect the peshat entirely. The best known is that of Hezekiah ben Manoah (Ḥizekuni; mid-13th century), which incorporates a good deal of commentary by Joseph Bekhor Shor and other members of the peshat school. The commentaries of the German Pietists are of two types. Some, such as the commentary of Judah ben Samuel (ca. 1150–1217) as recorded by his son Zaltman, are rather undisciplined peshat commentaries intended for a wide audience; others, especially those of Eleazar ben Judah of Worms (ca. 1165–ca. 1230), are full of gematriot, notarikonim, and other esoteric methods of exegesis, and were intended for the small circle of initiates schooled in the particular brand of mysticism practiced by this group.

Nahmanides (1194–1271)

Nahmanides (Moses ben Nahman; Ramban) marks a new stage in the history of exegesis, since he was the first scholar who wrote his commentaries under the influence of both the Sephardic Andalusian (the region of southern Spain) and Ashkenazic traditions. Nahmanides was a product of Christian Spain, but he unquestionably felt himself to be in the line of the Andalusian exegetical tradition and indeed advanced the cause of peshat exegesis with many insightful comments. At the same time he had absorbed the work of Rashi and the Northern French school and held it in high regard. He also did not hesitate to utilize the vast resources of rabbinic literature—Talmudim, halakhic and aggadic midrashim, as well as geonic and mystical works. In his introduction he speaks of his attitudes to both Abraham Ibn Ezra and Rashi, the dean of Northern French exegetes. He shows respect for both of his predecessors, but also is not afraid to criticize what he found wanting. Though certainly trained in grammar and philology, he found the Spanish approach as exemplified by Ibn Ezra to be excessively philological and therefore limiting. He was sympathetic to Rashi and his judicious selection of midrashic material, but here too, he did not hesitate to criticize a choice of midrash that he felt was too distant from the peshat. Thus he sought to strike a balance between the two approaches and to adopt a more holistic approach to the text. His commentaries are substantially longer than those of Rashi or Ibn Ezra, as he expanded the exegetical enterprise to encompass issues of theology, mysticism, ethics, history, or character analysis, thus weaving a particularly colorful and variegated tapestry which operated on several levels. His commentary is famous for its psychological insights and deep understanding of human nature. Although most Jewish exegetes avoided typology and pre-figuration, because of their extensive use by Christian exegetes and theologians, Nahmanides uses them extensively in his Torah commentary, connecting the deeds and travels of the patriarchs with subsequent events in Jewish history. To a larger extent than most exegetes, he was concerned with problems of structure, order, and thematic unity, explaining the reasons for the sequence of the books in the Torah and also for sequences of sections, verses, or even items in lists. For instance he invests a great deal of effort in explaining the order of the verses and sections in the parashah of Mishpatim (Exod. chs 21–23), a section of laws in no apparent logical order. Scholars have identified at least fourteen categories of hierarchies in his Torah commentary, including birth order, order of importance, order of preference, and increasing or decreasing order of severity (for sins). In this tendency he follows the rabbinic mind-set for which nothing in the Torah is arbitrary or haphazard, but rather, as the word of God, has significance on multiple levels. Nahmanides was also a kabbalist, steeped in mystical traditions of the Provençal school of kabbalah. He included in his commentary, which was intended for a popular audience, numerous allusions to hidden meanings of the verses of the Torah and interpretations of obscure, difficult midrashim, thereby stimulating kabbalistic activity and lending an aura of legitimacy to the esoteric understanding of the Torah as propounded by kabbalistic theology.

Kabbalistic Exegesis and Pardes

Naḥmanides was active in Gerona, Spain, in the second half of the 13th century, in the generation preceding Moses de Leon and his circle who composed or compiled the zoharic corpus of mystical texts. (See "The Bible in the Mystical Tradition," pp. 1976–90.) While one can distinguish levels of interpretation in Naḥmanides' commentary, it is in the last quarter of the 13th century, particularly in the Zohar and other writings often attributed by modern scholars to Moses de Leon that one first encounters the acronym pardes to refer to the four levels of interpretation of the biblical text, peshat, remez, derash, and sod, or historical, philosophical, homiletic, and mystical. This usage is primarily restricted to kabbalistic writings and did not achieve the almost universal application that the four senses achieved in medieval Christian exegesis. The first three methods of interpreting the text—the peshat, philosophical, and homiletical—already existed and were widely applied by exegetes of various persuasions up until that time. By introducing a fourth level and presenting it as the culmination of the exegetical process, the most profound understanding of the biblical text attainable, the kabbalists were validating the work of their predecessors while at the same time claiming pride of place for their own innovative approach to the text. The commentary of Naḥmanides' student Bahya ben Asher (late 13th century) was more formally organized along the lines of the commentaries of the medieval Christian exegetes, with several levels of interpretation, although there are few verses which are interpreted on all four levels. But with the exception of Bahya, there are few examples of exegetes who analyze a book using all four methods consistently as did the Christians. Rather than being a methodology, pardes is a convenient way of describing the four approaches that medieval exegetes took in commenting on a biblical book. Some exegetes would use only one approach, some would combine two or three, but seldom would all four be consistently applied.

Eastern Post-Maimonidean School (13th Century)

Exegesis in the Middle East after Maimonides bears the unmistakable imprint of the thought of this greatly revered sage. Of great significance are the commentaries of Abraham, Maimonides' son (1186–1237), who was a great scholar, theologian and mystic in his own right. Abraham had hoped to fulfill his father's dream of producing a commentary on the Torah, but succeeded in completing only the first two books. His commentaries are eclectic, devoted in the main to peshat exegesis, in the tradition of scholars and grammarians of Andalusia, but also incorporating philosophical insights, and taking a critical stance vis-à-vis midrashic homilies. Abraham was greatly influenced by the pietistic Sufi (Muslim mystical) movement, which spread through Egypt in his day, and his commentaries are suffused with pietism. Indeed, he goes so far as to portray the patriarchs and the prophets as engaging in Sufi-style meditation and the pursuit of spiritual perfection. Abraham's commentaries, written in Judeo-Arabic, did not fare well, and survived in a single manuscript, published only in the mid-20th century.

The last significant peshat exegete in the Middle East was Tanḥum ben Joseph Yerushalmi (ca. 1220–1291, originally from the land of Israel; died in Egypt). Tanḥum was an anthologist, who compiled the best of the contextual exegesis of his predecessors, including Ibn Ezra, Radak, and Japheth ben Eli and other Karaites, often expressing his preferences. In his Kitab al-Bayan (Book of Explanation), he commented on the entire Bible, but only sections on the Former Prophets, Latter Prophets (except Isaiah), Five Scrolls, Daniel, and parts of Psalms have survived. This work is preceded by an introduction which deals with many principles of scriptural exegesis, such as grammatical issues, textual difficulties, internal contradictions, and problems in chronology. In his commentaries he identifies many rhetorical devices, following in the tradition of Moses Ibn Ezra and other Spanish exegetes. Like Maimonides' son, Abraham, he too was profoundly influenced both by Maimonidean rationalism and by Sufi mysticism. Although primarily concerned with peshat exegesis, he often gives both exoteric and esoteric interpretations to specific passages. In the case of the book of Jonah, he deviates from his normal practice and interprets the entire book as an allegory of the soul.

The Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries

In the 14th and 15th centuries, commentaries tended to veer away from the peshat to follow homiletical, philosophical, or mystical lines. Nevertheless, peshat commentary was never completely abandoned. Jacob ben Asher (1270?-1340), who immigrated to Toledo, Spain, with his family in the early 14th century and was the author of a famous law code, Sefer ha-Turim (The Book of Columns), wrote a lengthy peshat commentary in which he anthologized many of his famous predecessors, but also included many original comments. He prefaced each section with gematriot and explanations of the Masoretic tradition, in order to whet his reader's appetite. Ironically, it is these comments that proved to be most popular, and were frequently reprinted, while his long commentary languished in manuscript until 1806 and has never gained a wide readership. This is an indication of the low level of interest in peshat commentary in the later Middle Ages.

Exegetes of a philosophical bent tended to interpret Scripture through the prism of the philosophical school to which they adhered. (See "The Bible in the Philosophical Tradition," pp. 1948-75.) Two important examples are Levi ben Gershom (Rabag; 1288-1344) and Joseph Ibn Kaspi (1279-1340), both Aristotelian rationalists, who followed the teachings of Maimonides. Rabag was probably the most significant and original Jewish thinker of the later medieval period. He was also a prolific exegete, writing lengthy commentaries on the Torah, Early Prophets, Five Scrolls and Job. While his exegesis is certainly informed by his philosophical worldview, there is much in it that can be characterized as peshat. To give but one example of his rationalistic exegesis, he offers a daring interpretation of Joshua's miraculous victory at Gibeon (Josh. 10.12): the miracle that occurred was not that the sun actually stood still for Joshua and the Israelites, but that the Israelites enjoyed such a swift victory that it made it seem as if the sun stood still. In general, except for his commentary on Song of Songs, Rabag did not engage in philosophical allegory. He typically divided his commentaries into three sections: (1) an explanation of the difficult words in a passage; (2) an expanded paraphrase of the text; and finally, at the end of the section, (3) a list of lessons, both moral and philosophical, which could be derived from it. Rabag was the first exegete to provide such lessons in his commentaries, and in this he may have been influenced by Christian exegesis.

Ibn Kaspi, who hailed from Argentière in Provence (hence his name, meaning "silver"), wrote commentaries on almost the entire Bible. While primarily devoted to an understanding of peshat, these display his philosophical learning and his knowledge of Christian sources as well. He stresses numerous times in his commentaries the importance of a thorough knowledge of Hebrew grammar and a mastery of the science of logic in order to properly understand the Bible. For example, his entire commentary on the book of Esther is a critique of a comment by Ibn Ezra, which he refutes through logical analysis.

In this period, the Karaite community in Byzantium continued to develop biblical studies as it struggled to maintain its identity in the face of the overwhelming influence of the great medieval Rabbanite thinkers such as Maimonides and Ibn Ezra. The two great Karaite exegetes of the period were Aaron ben Joseph, the "elder" (ca. 1250–1320), and Aaron ben Elijah, of Nicomedia, "the younger" (ca. 1317–1369). Aaron ben Joseph produced commentaries on the Torah (Sefer ha-Mivḥar; The Book of the Most Select), on the Former Prophets, Isaiah, and Psalms (Mivḥar yesharim; The Most Select of the Righteous), and on Job (lost), while Aaron ben Elijah produced, inter alia, a commentary on the Torah (Keter Torah; The Crown of the Torah). Both authors cite Rabbanite sources extensively, including Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Maimonides, Radak, and Ramban. Ibn Ezra was especially popular, as he was among Rabbanite authors of the period. The commentaries of these exegetes follow in the Spanish tradition, relying on grammar and reason, rejecting aggadah, and, in halakhic matters, highlighting the differences between Rabbanites and Karaites.

In rabbinic circles, the sermons on the Torah ('Akeidat Yitzhak; The Binding of Isaac) and the commentaries on the Five Scrolls of Isaac Arama (ca. 1420–1494) are exemplary models of homiletic exegesis, blending exegetical innovation and homiletic genius with psychological and philosophical insight. Arama was one of the first exegetes to use the method of problematization consistently, whereby the exegete raises a number of issues at the beginning of a passage, and then proceeds to solve the problems in the course of his discussion. This method was also followed by Don Isaac Abravanel (1437–1508), Arama's student, undoubtedly the greatest exegete of the 15th century. Abravanel produced voluminous commentaries on the Torah, Prophets, and Daniel, which are thoughtful, thought-provoking, and challenging. Abravanel was very much concerned with peshat exegesis, which he declared to be his primary focus. He also grapples seriously with the rabbinic midrashic tradition, displaying a nuanced approach to midrashic interpretations, carefully selecting those that he found acceptable and rejecting others. More traditional in his theology than the rationalists of the later Middle Ages, he advocated a faith-based religious position which he considered to be more in line with the rabbinic tradition. For instance, he rejects Ralbag's rationalization of Joshua's miracle (10.12; see above) and declares that this was a divinely decreed deviation from the natural order. A true child of the Renaissance, he was open to the cultural innovations being articulated in his times and introduced much contemporary thought into his exegesis. He was particularly well-versed in Christian theological and exegetical literature, often quoting approvingly from Christian sources. Especially important are his ideas on the monarchy, expressed in his commentaries on Samuel and Kings. Drawing on his experience as a courtier and his deep familiarity with medieval history and political theory, he made a strong case against the monarchy, which he considered to be an inferior form of government.

Midrashic Exegesis

In the Middle Ages, the midrashic tradition was attacked on several fronts, especially by Karaites and Christians. As a result of these attacks, and because of the increased preference for peshat, many exegetes avoided rabbinic midrash as much as possible, while others incorporated it into their commentaries only sparingly, or else interpreted it philosophically or kabbalistically. Nevertheless, a strand of midrashic exegesis was maintained throughout the Middle Ages, quite possibly as a reaction to the elimination of such commentary from the medieval commentary tradition and out of a desire to hold up the standard of the rabbinic tradition and assure that it not be forgotten among Jews. Another reason could be the utility of midrashic material as a source for sermons, the demand for which seemed to increase as the Middle Ages waned. After the classical period of midrashic creativity during the late talmudic and geonic periods, the Middle Ages witnessed the production of many midrashic compilations. The largest and most comprehensive was the 13th century Yalkut Shim'oni (attributed to Simeon the Preacher of Frankfurt), an attempt at producing a comprehensive verse-by-verse midrashic anthology for the entire Bible. Others in this vein were Midrash ha-Gadol (The Great Midrash) by David Ha-Adani (Yemen, 14th century), Yalkut (ha)-Makhiri on the Latter Prophets and Writings by Makhir ben Abba Mari (Spain? 14th century?), and Yalkut Re'uvevi (17th century), a kabbalistic-midrashic compilation by Reuben Ha-Kohen. There were also commentaries produced in the midrashic style, which included a great deal of peshat interpretation as well as midrashic material. Examples are the Lekah Tov (Good Instruction) by Tobiah ben Eliezer (11th century, Byzantium) and Sekhel Tov (Sound Understanding) by Menaḥem ben Solomon (12th century, Italy?). Some anthologists had very ambitious goals for their work; for example, Jacob Sikili (Sicily, Damascus), stated in his anthology Talmud Torah (1366) that he included in it all halakhic and aggadic statements from all available sources, thus obviating the need to consult any other work.

Midrashic-style commentary was especially popular in Yemen, which witnessed the production of, among others, Me'or ha-'afelah (The Luminary of the Darkness) by Netanel ben Isaiah (1328–29), Midrash ha-ḥefetz (The Midrash of Desire) by Zekhariah ha-Rofe (1430), and Midrash ha-be'ur (The Midrash of Explanation) by Saadia ben David (1441). These editors were not mere compilers, but often edited their texts and added comments of their own, including many of a philosophical nature. Also unique to the Yemenite midrashim are numerous citations from Muslim lore and literature, as well as folkloristic material. Anthological commentaries such as these remained popular through the late Middle Ages and into the early modern period.

The Sixteenth Century

The upheaval of the expulsion from Spain (1492) and its aftermath scattered much of Spanish Jewry across Turkey, Greece, Italy, and North Africa. Biblical exegesis was produced in great abundance in all of these countries as well as in centers in Central and Eastern Europe. In Italy, the most famous exegete of the 15th century was Obadiah Sforno (ca. 1475–1550). He produced commentaries on the Torah and Psalms, which are dedicated above all to elucidating the peshat. Sforno, a rabbi, was also a trained physician and a cultured individual, a fine product of the world of Renaissance humanism, whose values infuse his exegesis. His Torah commentary became one of the mainstays of the biblical commentary tradition.

In the Ottoman Empire, important centers of study arose in Salonika and Constantinople. Rabbi Isaac ben Joseph Karo, a Spanish Jew, survived the Spanish and Portuguese exiles, ending up in Constantinople. In 1518 he published his commentary on the Torah, Toledot Yitzḥak (The Story of Isaac), which proved to be one of the most popular and influential commentaries of the 16th century. The commentary is eclectic, incorporating comments in all four of the traditional modes of interpretation, and reveals the author's cultural sophistication. Its immense popularity is indicated by the fact that it went through four editions in fourteen years and is often quoted by later exegetes.

In Salonika, the yeshiva of Joseph Taitatzak flourished between 1525 and 1540, training many rabbis and scholars who produced vast quantities of biblical commentary, which far surpassed those produced in the Middle Ages in quantity if not in quality. For the book of Esther and other scrolls, for example, more commentaries were written in the 16th century than in all the centuries preceding. This surge in commentary production can be explained by the needs of the various communities for relevant biblical commentary; most arose out of sermons preached in public on the Sabbaths and holidays which were later committed to writing. Many of the commentaries produced are characterized by their prolixity, tendentiousness, inconsistencies, and homiletical nature. Yet there is still much of value that can be gleaned from them, and they deserve more attention than they have received in the past. Of particular interest is Eliezer Ashkenazi (1513–1586), a student of Joseph Taitatzak's who was one of the leading scholars of his generation. Ashkenazi was a talmudist and rationalist who knew many languages and was scientifically trained. He advocated the unfettered search for truth in Scripture. His greatest work is Ma'asei 'Adonai (Acts of God), a four-part commentary on the narrative portions of the Torah. In this work, he urges the student to search diligently for the truth without regard for the opinions of the Sages or previous exegetes, especially the latter, since they may have become corrupted over time. He develops a theory concerning the nature and purpose of the biblical stories, according to which the events narrated in the Torah actually occurred, but the stories which relate these events are parables. The plain sense of the text can be found in the parables and not in the events themselves. In his commentary, Ashkenazi grapples with important theological issues, such as divine providence and the influence of astrology over Jewish destiny.

Other contemporary exegetes worthy of mention are Moses Alshekh (d. 1593) and Solomon ben Moses ha-Levi Alkabetz (ca. 1505–1584), both members of the Safed school of mystics. The exegetes of this period took a particular interest in the Kethuvim, especially the Five Scrolls, Psalms, and Job. Alshekh, a talmudist and kabbalist, had studied at Joseph Taitatzak's yeshiva in Salonika and later moved to Safed. Like many of his contemporaries, he preached on the Sabbaths and holidays on the weekly Torah readings and other biblical books and later edited his sermons for publication. He produced commentaries on almost the entire Bible. Solomon Alkabetz, another student of Taitatzak, and one of the more important members of the kabbalistic circle of Safed, produced compendious commentaries on the Minor Prophets, Song of Songs, Esther, Ruth, Psalms, and Job, incorporating the comments of many of his contemporaries and predecessors. His commentaries are characterized by their extreme reverence for the words of the Sages, which he considered to be authentic traditions reflecting the true meaning of the text, and not mere homiletical interpretations, which could be accepted or rejected at will.

Meanwhile, in Aleppo, Syria, Samuel ben Abraham Laniado (d. 1605) was composing an impressive body of commentary, covering most of the Bible (Torah, Prophets, Psalms, Lamentations). Laniado's commentaries are especially noteworthy for their sensitivity to literary nuance and structural patterns in the text, thus making them quite "modern" in their orientation.

In Eastern Europe at this time, talmudic studies were dominant and biblical studies were in a state of decline. The output of biblical commentary, while significant, was dwarfed by the production in other fields. Even so, much of the commentary literature of this period was written in homiletic style, with constant recourse to rabbinic sources, and often to philosophical and mystical sources as well. Particularly popular as sources were the commentaries of Isaac Arama and Isaac Karo. Peshat commentaries were relatively uncommon. Among the better known commentaries was the Gur Aryeh by Judah Loew ben Bezalel of Prague (Maharal; 1525–1609), a super-commentary on Rashi, which combines concern with the peshat with reference to rabbinic sources as deep peshat, the true meaning of the text, which goes deeper than the literal. He also does not neglect mystical traditions. In general, however, Maharal and other exegetes of the period did not innovate methodologically and did not advance Bible study beyond the stage it was at by the end of the Middle Ages.

The Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

In the 17th century, several noteworthy commentaries were produced. In Poland, Ephraim Solomon ben Aaron of Luntshits (1550–1619), a gifted darshan, or sermonizer, produced several collections of sermons and a commentary on the Torah in the homiletic style, called Keli Yakar (1st ed. Lublin, 1602), which enjoyed immense popularity and was included in many editions of the Rabbinic Bible. More than a century later, Ḥayyim ben Moses Ibn 'Attar (1696–1743), a rabbi and kabbalist of Moroccan origin, who led a group of rabbis and students to settle in the land of Israel in 1740, wrote a commentary titled 'Or ha-ḥayim, first published in Venice in 1742. This commentary was often published alongside that of Ephraim of Luntshits in East European editions of the Rabbinic Bible (Miqra'ot Gedolot, see below) and was especially popular among the Ḥasidim.

In Jaworow, Galicia, David Altschuler began to produce a commentary on the Prophets and Writings in order to promote the study of the Bible. His work was continued by his son, Jehiel Hillel, who in 1780–82 published the entire commentary. It was divided into two sections, Metsudat Tsiyon (Fortress of Zion) and Metsudat David (Fortress of David). The former explains the meanings of individual words, the latter the meaning of the text. The commentary, based for the most part on the medieval peshat exegetes such as Radak and Ibn Ezra, was very popular and has been frequently republished. (It appears in most editions of Miqra'ot Gedolot, see below.)

This period also saw the production of vernacular commentaries on the Bible in various parts of the Jewish world. At the end of the 16th or beginning of the 17th century, Jacob ben Isaac Ashkenazi, of Janow (d. 1623), produced a Yiddish translation with commentary on significant liturgical portions of the Tanakh, namely the Torah, Haftarot (Prophetic Readings) and Megillot (Five Scrolls). The book, Tzene-rene (i.e., Tze'enah u-re'enah, or Go Forth and Gaze [based on Song of Songs

3.11, which is addressed to the daughters of Zion]), proved to be the most popular work in the history of Yiddish literature. Over 210 editions of this work have appeared to date. The oldest extant edition, which is not the first, appeared in Basel in 1622. At least three others had preceded it. The book was written in a popular style, intended for Yiddish-speaking Jewish men and women who lacked the education necessary for understanding the Bible in the original. In this work, the author does not provide a word-for-word translation of the text, but rather weaves together the biblical text, midrashim, medieval commentaries, elements of halakhah, and ethical admonition into a pleasing, harmonious whole. The author drew on a wide variety of rabbinic and medieval sources, not only commentaries, but also ethical (Sefer Ḥasidim, Sefer ha-Mevakesh), philosophical (Saadia, Ibn Gabirol, Maimonides), and mystical works (Zohar, Cordovero's Palm Tree of Deborah). The author's major medieval source seems to have been the commentary of Bahya ben Asher. He also drew heavily on Isaac Karo's Toledot Yitzhak. The work became especially popular with women, who would read it religiously every Sabbath. Its success can be attributed to the author's skill in selecting his material and finding those sources which would appeal to his unschooled readers. He was especially successful in selecting sources that would appeal to his female readers, injecting comments of a midrashic and moralistic nature, relating to marital relations and child-rearing. Tzene-rene went through numerous editions, first in Western, then in Eastern Europe, and some editions bore the ideological stamp of the maskilic rationalists or their Hasidic opponents. Editions, translations, and adaptations of this ever-popular work are still being produced. A similar work on the Prophets and Writings, called Sefer ha-Magid (The Book of the Storyteller) mistakenly attributed to Ashkenazi, also attained considerable popularity, but nothing approaching that of Tzene-rene.

In the 18th century, a parallel phenomenon to Tzene-rene was the publication in Constantinople of Me'am Lo'ez (From a Foreign People), a Ladino (Judeo-Spanish) commentary on the Bible, which is considered to be the outstanding work of Judeo-Spanish literature. Conceived by Jacob Culi as a response to the havoc wrought by the Sabbatean heresy of the previous century (Shabbetai Tzevi was followed by many as Messiah, but converted to Islam in 1666, precipitating a great crisis), it was aimed at the masses who had strayed from observant Judaism and could no longer read the texts in Hebrew. Culi produced the volume for Genesis, which wove together in a pleasing and appealing manner a variety of sources dealing with the text, including much ancillary material such as anecdotes, ethical admonitions, folklore, and historical narratives. After Culi's death, his work was continued by others. The rest of the Torah was completed and published by 1772, and other volumes, published in a similar style, were produced over the following centuries. In recent years a Hebrew translation has been produced. It is difficult to overstate the importance of Me'am Lo'ez in Sephardic culture. It spread all over the Sephardic world and for many families it was the only literature that they read. Unlike Tzene-rene, it was never considered only suitable for women, and so was equally popular among men, women, and children.

By the mid-18th century, the winds of change were blowing through the Jewish communities of Europe, and the stage was being set for the Haskalah and the revolution in study that would follow in its wake. (See "Post-medieval Jewish Interpretation," pp. 1900–1908, and "The Bible in the Jewish Philosophical Tradition," pp. 1948–75.)

Miqra'ot Gedolot

The production of Bibles with the biblical text surrounded by a number of commentaries and translations began in the late Middle Ages, as scribes copied for themselves or patrons commissioned such works for their own use. With the introduction and spread of the printing press, commentaries were first produced individually, or accompanying the biblical text. The first Rabbinic Bible was published by Daniel Bomberg in 1516 in Venice and included the commentaries of Rashi, Ibn Ezra, and Ramban. Other editions soon followed (Venice, 1524–25, 1544). The second Rabbinic Bible (1524–1525), edited by Jacob ben Ḥayyim ben Isaac Ibn Adonijah (ca. 1470–ca. 1538), an apprentice of Bomberg's who converted to Christianity late in life, is especially important, because of the editor's attention to the accuracy of the text, seeking out manuscripts to help in this task, and his attempt to produce an edition faithful to the Masoretic tradition. (See "The Development of the Masoretic Bible," pp. 2077–84.) He also succeeded in printing more commentaries than had his predecessors. His edition set the standard for generations to come and served as the basis for many subsequent editions. Another important edition was Kehilat Mosheh (The Congregation of Moses; Amsterdam, 1724–1727), edited by Moses Frankfurter, which had sixteen commentaries never before included, such as those of Ralbag. In the 19th century in Eastern Europe, the production of such editions of the Bible became extremely popular and publishers in Warsaw, Vilna, and Cracow vied for customers' attention, competing for the distinction of having the greatest number of commentaries in their editions. It was early in the 19th century that the title Miqra'ot Gedolot (Great Scriptures) for such editions was first introduced. Besides the classical triumvirate of Rashi, Ibn Ezra, and Naḥmanides, the Keli yakar (Precious Vessel) by Ephraim of Luntshitz and Or ha-Ḥayim (Light of Life) by Ḥayyim Ibn 'Attar seem to have been immensely popular and gained a wide readership. For Prophets and Writings, the Metzudot of the Altschulers were constant companions of Rashi. Depending on the book, they were usually joined by Ibn Ezra, Radak, Ralbag, and Sforno. There can be no doubt that these editions had a tremendous influence on which commentaries were read and which were neglected. Inclusion in an edition of Miqra'ot Gedolot would ensure a wide audience. The juxtaposition of commentaries from different locations and periods also influenced how the Bible was studied (see p. 1875). Such editions facilitate a dialogue across generations and cultures mediated by the reader, who thus becomes another link in the ongoing tradition of biblical study and interpretation.

[BARRY D. WALFISH]

Post-medieval Jewish Interpretation

The period between 1650 and 1900 forms a particularly rich and variegated chapter in the history of Jewish biblical interpretation, particularly within the European Ashkenazic communities. Over the course of these two and a half centuries, hundreds of Bible commentaries and super-commentaries were written and published, and although the vast majority have fallen into obscurity, a few have exerted considerable influence and continue to be studied to this day. The substantial scholarly output of this period was broadly due to three historically related factors: the growth and relative stability of communities in both Western and Eastern Europe, a flourishing religious and scholarly life, and an active Jewish printing industry.

The biblical scholarship of this period is particularly important because of the way in which it reflected and even shaped the far-reaching historical, religious, and cultural shifts taking place within European Jewry. Through most of the 17th and 18th centuries, the interpretation of the Bible was largely derivative of medieval exegesis, particularly the didactic and homiletical modes of late medieval scholarship. As the 18th century progressed, the textual and linguistic interests of medieval Spanish exegesis began to be revived, and by 1800 biblical interpretation was given new impetus by the Jewish Enlightenment and, to a lesser degree, by the reinvigorated scholarly circles that emerged in Lithuania in opposition to the spread of Hasidism. In the 19th century, as the cultural and religious insularity of traditional Jewish life gave way to the external pressures of emancipation, and as internal divisions weakened the authority of rabbinic Judaism, the interpretation of Scripture became a central factor in the struggle to determine the meaning and relevance of inherited Jewish traditions.

Despite the large numbers of Bible commentaries that appeared in the 17th and 18th centuries, almost all of them were methodologically unoriginal and substantively unremarkable. In the Sephardic communities of North Africa, the Middle East, and Western Europe (e.g., Amsterdam and Hamburg), there seems to have been some effort to maintain the study of the Bible and Hebrew language pioneered by medieval Spanish scholars, but with few linguistic or exegetical advances. Among the Ashkenazic communities of Western and Eastern Europe, the reality was more complex. On the one hand, biblical commentaries were a time-honored scholarly endeavor, and a great many of them centered around the careful parsing of midrashic texts and Rashi's commentary, which had attained near-canonical status. On the other hand, there was a pronounced ambivalence, if not indifference, toward Bible study, and especially any kind of scholarship that focused on the philological or grammatical aspects of the text. The study of rabbinic literature, both the Talmud and the long line of codes and commentaries that followed in its wake, was given intellectual and spiritual pride of place, and the study of the Bible was relegated to a respectful, honored, but distinctly secondary position. These realities are reflected in the fact that some of the best and most enduring writings of this era emerged from non-Ashkenazic Mediterranean communities: Me'am Lo'ez, the mid-18th-century popular Ladino compilation of rabbinic writings (Constantinople, 1730–1772); Hayyim ben Moses Ibn ‘Attar’s ’Or ha-ḥayim (Venice, 1742) which became very popular among Ashkenazic Jewry; and David Samuel Pardo’s Maskil le-David (Venice, 1761), a super-commentary to Rashi.

Modern students of the Bible have often credited a group of 17th-century thinkers, among them Benedict Spinoza (1634–1677), for anticipating the emergence of modern biblical criticism by eschewing traditional modes of interpretation and by raising questions concerning the reliability, authenticity, and even authorship of the Bible. In his Theologico-Political Treatise (1670) Spinoza set out to employ “the true method of scriptural interpretation,” which would entail examining the Bible afresh “in a careful, impartial, and unfettered spirit, making no assumptions concerning it” (Benedict Spinoza, Theologico-Political Treatise, transl. R. H. M. Elwes, New York: Dover Publications, 1951; preface and pp. 98–119). Spinoza’s intention was to undermine the presumption of a seamless, consistent text that could be ascribed to the hand of Moses and to convince his readers that the Bible was so confused and beset with problems that a clear understanding of its meaning was often beyond reach. A careful reading of the Theologico-Political Treatise, however, belies the scholarly value of his biblical insights by revealing the arbitrary nature of his methods and the capricious quality of many of his conclusions. Spinoza’s discussion was far less interested in the interpretative difficulties and challenges of the Bible than in undermining the authority of Scripture for a variety of philosophical and political reasons. Moreover, since it was written in Latin, Spinoza’s handling of the Bible had absolutely no impact on 17th- and 18th-century Jewish interpretation of the Bible. It is generally believed that European scholars who launched the serious critical study of the Bible drew upon Spinoza’s writing, although a careful examination of their scholarship might suggest more limited influence.

The Ashkenazic ambivalence toward the Bible began to change slowly in the 18th century, as some rabbinic authorities and scholars increasingly complained about the neglect of Bible study, particularly the pedagogic inattention to sound grammatical and textual skills. A small number of new books, most notably those of Solomon Hanau (1687–1746), tried to revive interest in the study of Hebrew grammar and to recapture some of the vibrancy of earlier generations. There was a re-discovery of the peshat-oriented commentary of Rashbam, and later in the century, a renewed interest in the writings of David Kimḥi (Radak) and Abraham Ibn Ezra.

By far the most important development in this regard was the appearance of the Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment) in late 18th-century Prussia and its impact on the culture of European Jewry. As part of their effort to promote the integration of Jews into European society, these Jewish Enlightenment figures, or maskilim as they came to be known, were highly attuned to the achievements of contemporary German culture and sensitive to the perceived deficiencies of Jewish education and scholarship. The maskilic interest in the study of Scripture was thus shaped by a double orientation. On the one hand, maskilim were attracted by some of the universalism and literary-aesthetic sophistication of the German and European Enlightenments, and they sought to infuse Jewish Bible study with the same textual sensibilities. On the other hand, embarrassed by the state of biblical scholarship within their own communities, they wanted to showcase the wealth of inherited textual traditions and advance the study of Scripture in distinctly Jewish terms.

Both tendencies were evident in the new edition of the Torah published by Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1786), a highly regarded German philosopher and man of letters who was also the most prominent individual associated with the Berlin Haskalah. Appearing in Berlin between 1780 and 1783 as Sefer Netivot ha-Shalom, Mendelssohn’s Bible was a collaborative affair that came to include two of the finest scholars associated with the Haskalah, Naftali Herz Wessely (1725–1805) and Solomon Dubno (1738–1813). Sefer Netivot ha-Shalom included a new German translation, an extensive Hebrew commentary, and a series of highly technical Masoretic notes that attempted to fix the precise morphology and pointing of the text. The German translation, printed in Hebrew script and rendered into a good contemporary Hochdeutsch (“high,” or “literary,” German), served the same function as earlier Bible translations, namely, to make the text accessible to a growing number of Jews who felt less comfortable with Hebrew than with their native tongue. More importantly, the translation also set out to capture the prosaic and poetic qualities of the Hebrew original in order to offer Jews a text that was as aesthetically sophisticated as any German Bible in circulation, but without christologically-informed readings and interpretations, and without the textual emendations being introduced by contemporary German scholars. In this regard, Mendelssohn offered his co-religionists a Bible translation that conformed to both Jewish textual traditions and rabbinic interpretations.

The Hebrew commentary to this Bible embraced the same twofold orientation. On the one hand, the Bi'ur (Heb b-ʿ-ur) or “explanation,” as this commentary was simply titled, culled the medieval exegesis of Rashi, Rashbam, Ibn Ezra, and Naḥmanides (see “Medieval Interpretation,” pp. 1876–1900 and “Jewish Translations of the Bible,” pp. 2005–20) for the best of their peshat-oriented interpretations, while also contributing its own linguistic and literary insights. In the face of broad European disregard for the scholarly value of rabbinic literature, on the other hand, Mendelssohn and some of his fellow commentators tried to demonstrate the exegetical acuity of midrashic interpretations by pointing to the sound philological, syntactical, and narrative insights exhibited by the Sages of late antiquity. This commentary, in fact, went out of its way to incorporate rabbinic literature, both midrash halakhah (legal interpretation) and midrash aggadah (interpretation of narratives), and to explain its relationship to peshuto shel miqra—the “plain” sense of the text. Mendelssohn and his fellow contributors adopted differing strategies with regard to the articulation of this relationship: Mendelssohn viewed peshat (the plain sense) and derash (rabbinic-homiletical interpretation) as eliciting two hermeneutically distinct yet equally veracious layers of the text, while Wessely was more inclined to conflate the two by suggesting that the rabbinic reading represented nothing but the true depths of peshat. In either case, their commentaries displayed serious regard for the linguistic qualities of Scripture, using it to elicit fresh approaches to the biblical text as well as a better appreciation for the substantive exegetical legacy of rabbinic Judaism. The Bi'ur was reprinted in dozens of 19th-century editions, making it by far the most popular Jewish Bible and second only to the traditional texts published with Targum and Rashi.

In Eastern Europe, meanwhile, many Jewish communities had been swept up by the social and religious revivalism of Hasidism, and with it came a number of scholarly and popular commentaries to the Bible. The opposition to this movement, centered in the leadership of R. Elijah ben Solomon Zalman (the Vilna Gaon; 1720–1797) and his Lithuanian-based disciples, was no less intensely committed to the study of kabbalistic traditions, and they too incorporated these scholarly pursuits into their study of Scripture. R. Elijah and his followers, however, also cultivated an interest in the Bible that roughly paralleled, and may even have been informed by, maskilic developments in Western Europe. In his 'Aderet 'Eliyahu, first published posthumously in an 1804 edition of the Torah, R. Elijah called attention to the importance of peshat-oriented readings of Scripture, while at the same time probing the nature of rabbinic exegesis. His expression of concern for the biblical text and its traditional rabbinic interpretation, however, was aimed at underscoring the far-reaching, even radical, nature of rabbinic de-rashot (homiletical expositions). This commentary did not in itself set out to advance fresh approaches to the biblical text, nor did it substantively explicate the exegetical discernment of the Sages. With this emphasis on the distinction of peshat and derash, R. Elijah sought to highlight the interpretative creativity and profundity of rabbinic Judaism, an endeavor that would shape the intellectual and spiritual character of Lithuanian scholarship well into the 20th century.

The most significant developments in Jewish biblical scholarship, however, took place among 19th-century Jews concentrated in German-speaking Europe. As the Jews of these regions began their century-long struggle to gain civic equality and social integration, the contemporary study of the Bible came to reflect the cultural and religious vicissitudes of the age. One can discern three different though somewhat overlapping trends, all of them cognizant of the relationship of Bible study to the broader challenges of modernity, and all of them staking out a set of assumptions regarding Scripture and its religious and cultural meaning to contemporary Jews.

In the wake of the German Haskalah, there was a discernible revival of Hebrew and Bible study among European Jews. Within a decade after the publication of Mendelssohn's Bible, a group of younger maskilim had extended the project to cover the books of the Prophets and Writings. Sefer Netivot ha-Shalom was eagerly studied in some circles, and over the next half-century there appeared a number of super-commentaries to the Bi'ur. In 1810, Judah Leib ben Ze'ev (1764–1811), one of the last contributors to the German Haskalah before its dissipation, wrote a set of introductory essays to the Prophets and Writings that drew upon contemporary German scholarship, in which he laid out their respective historical and literary features, including some critical notions regarding authorship. More importantly, the interest in Hebrew and Bible study was also taken up by those not directly identified with the Haskalah, but who shared some of its cultural predilections. Solomon Pappenheim (1740–1814), a rabbinic court judge in Breslau, wrote a multi-volume study of Hebrew synonyms, while Wolf Heidenheim (1757–1832), an important publisher and editor of liturgical texts, penned a series of commentaries on the Masorah and a super-commentary to Rashi.

As the Haskalah spread into other regions of Europe, a younger generation of traditionally trained yet maskilically oriented scholars also took up the study of the Bible. Much of this scholarship did not appear in the classical form of the commentary, but rather as essays and studies published in leading maskilic journals such as Bikurei ha-Itim and Kerem Hemed. In Galicia, Nachman Krochmal (1785–1840) addressed questions regarding Isaiah, Ecclesiastes, and Psalms, embracing the late dating of sections of this literature and arguing that such critical awareness was already evident in rabbinic literature. His one-time student and friend Solomon Rappoport (1790–1867) also included in his writings similar critical ideas regarding the books of Isaiah and Psalms. In Italy, Isaac Samuel Reggio (1784–1855) produced an extensive Hebrew commentary alongside his Italian translation of the Torah, as well as a number of essays on biblical issues. Samuel David Luzzatto (1800–1865), Reggio's contemporary and colleague, wrote at least two Hebrew grammars, a study of Targum Onkelos, and various articles on Hebrew philology. His lectures on the Torah, including introductions to issues regarding the biblical text and modes of interpretation, were collected and published posthumously. Paralleling but somewhat independent of these endeavors, there also emerged a group of Lithuanian maskilim who produced a number of commentaries, super-commentaries, and journal articles that took up various linguistic and exegetical issues pertaining to the study of the Bible.

Taken together, these writings exemplify the increased pedagogic and scholarly attention to biblical scholarship as part of an endeavor to expand the intellectual, religious, and cultural horizons of European Jews. This body of literature, however, was also largely traditionalist in its commitments and sensibilities, and did not broadly engage the critical-scholarly ideas emanating from the German universities. Critical notions regarding the text, its editing, and its historical context were raised only with regard to the non-Torah books of the Bible, and largely where medieval scholars had either opened the door to such notions or where there existed sufficient ambiguity to allow for new ideas. While these writings did not generally have enduring value, they did make the engagement with Scripture a far more central part of European Jewish culture.

The second salient trend that characterized the 19th-century study of Scripture emanated from a group of Jews far more receptive to the academic methods and intellectual discourse of contemporary German scholarship. Emerging in the 1810s, this group began to promote the Wissenschaft des Judentums, the critical-academic ("scientific") study of Jewish history and literature, with particular emphasis on texts, languages, and philosophical issues not generally studied in traditional settings. Two of the most important members of this movement, Leopold Zunz (1794–1886) and Abraham Geiger (1810–1874), contributed substantively to the scholarly study of the Bible. Zunz edited a German translation of the Bible and wrote critically about the books of Psalms and Chronicles, later even turning his attention to issues in the Torah as well. Geiger focused his Urschrift und Übersetzungen der Bibel (Breslau, 1857) on the originally fluid nature of the biblical text and the presence of competing versions, a phenomenon that he substantiated by pointing to the varying translations of Scripture that emerged in late antiquity.

Although Geiger's critical insights went beyond those of Krochmal, Rappoport, and Luzzatto, these scholars formed a broader circle in which the distinctions between maskil and proponents of Wissenschaft were considerably blurred. Still, those associated primarily with Wissenschaft who had at the same time disencumbered themselves of traditional practices and beliefs had far more social and intellectual freedom to pursue a wide variety of questions regarding the Bible. In the case of Geiger, one of the most important and active Reform leaders, one might have expected a concerted effort to apply new historical-critical methods to the Bible to counter traditionalist beliefs and to help bolster some central historical assertions of the nascent Reform movement. In fact, proponents of Wissenschaft des Judentums engaged the Bible in a rather limited way; they appeared less interested in the development of new critical perspectives relating to the origins of the Bible or to the serious study of biblical history or philology, than in the textual and interpretative reception of the biblical text. This was evident in Geiger's Urschrift and its attention to early Bible translations. Underlying his scholarly thinking was the notion that the Bible was not a "sealed book of antiquity, whose meaning the student had to unlock in order to acquaint himself with the ideas of a day long past." Rather, "every age, every movement and every personality in history has brought its own ideas to bear upon the Bible" (Abraham Geiger, Urschrift und Übersetzungen der Bibel, Breslau, 1857, p. 72). This unobjectionable observation, a staple of intellectual history, was not merely a programmatic outline of an important subfield of biblical scholarship; Geiger's statement that the Bible was all things to all people was predicated upon his insistence that an objective interpretation of Scripture could not be achieved, and therefore was not a particularly valuable endeavor to pursue. For Geiger, as for other contributors to the Wissenschaft des Judentums, the cultural and religious needs of the moment manifested themselves in an almost exclusive focus upon the manifold ways in which the Bible had been read—pointing clearly to the possibility of other, more contemporaneous readings—rather than on the original meaning of the text. Jewish critical scholarship would eventually free itself of these constraints, but at this juncture the social and cultural bases upon which to develop such interests were as yet undeveloped.

The third trend that characterized the 19th-century study of the Bible arose out of the most traditionalist element of European Jewry, that which came to be identified by its orthodoxy. Traditionalist leaders were largely unwilling to deal with scholarly advances in biblical criticism, but they were acutely sensitive to other 19th-century developments that they perceived to be far more pressing: the growing abandonment of traditional Jewish practices, and the Reform eschewal of rabbinic authority in general, and ancient rabbinic readings of Scripture in particular. Alongside their communal and polemical activities against the burgeoning Reform movement, a number of these traditional defenders of rabbinic Judaism also sought to buttress their orthodoxy by turning to the Bible and trying to demonstrate the fundamental accord between Scripture and its rabbinic elucidations. The resulting commentaries, lengthy and extensive as they are, contributed an important and lasting corpus of traditional scholarship to the history of biblical interpretation.

The first of these commentaries, expressly written to address the relationship of the Oral Torah to Scripture, was Ha-Ketav veka-Kabalah (The Written Text and [Rabbinic] Tradition), published in 1839 by R. Jacob Zvi Meklenburg (1785–1865) of Königsberg. This exegete exhibited an impressive scholarly range that included not only rabbinic and medieval texts, but also a rudimentary knowledge of classical languages and a familiarity with maskilic and Wissenschaft writings. Meklenburg was most concerned about the perceived inauthenticity of oral traditions, particularly the idea that rabbinic readings were foisted unnaturally upon Scripture. In response, he suggested that a refined grasp of the biblical language and idiom would demonstrate that “the Written Torah and the Oral Torah are twins, stuck one to the other such that they could not be sundered” (Ha- Ketav veka-Kabalah, Leipzig, 1839, introduction, p. xiii). Meklenburg, however, did not intend to collapse the distinction between peshat and derash. His aim, rather, was to defuse any apparent tension between them and to legitimate midrashic and talmudic readings by grounding them in the biblical text with subtlety and sophistication.

In the body of the commentary itself, this particular concern for rabbinic exegesis actually played a secondary role. His explication of the rabbinic interpretations of Scripture was undertaken only on a selective basis, and his limited attempts at laying out a systematic approach to the problem relied substantially on Mendelssohn’s writings. Ha-Ketav veka-Kabalah was devoted first and foremost to an explication of peshto shel miqra’ (the plain sense of the biblical text), drawing extensively and in an undifferentiated manner on Mendelssohn’s Sefer Netivot ha-Shalom, the Vilna Gaon’s ’Aderet ’Eliyahu, and the scholarly contributions of Pappenheim, Heidenheim, Luzatto, and others. In many ways, this commentary served as an excellent anthology of late 18th- and early 19th-century peshat exegesis, a collection that reflected the reinvigoration of Jewish Bible study. Ha-Ketav veka-Kabalah was published again in 1852 with a number of substantial additions and deletions, and material was again added to the edition that appeared in 1880; this latter edition was subsequently reprinted numerous times.

Responding to similar religious challenges and drawing upon some of the same scholarly traditions, R. Meir Leibush ben Yehiel Michel (1809–1879) also set out with the scholarly aim of joining the Written and Oral Torahs, but he approached the undertaking in a far more systematic and substantive fashion. More commonly known by his acronym, Malbim, he served as a communal rabbi in the Posen region of eastern Prussia through the 1850s, at a time when proponents of reform began to articulate their positions with greater forcefulness. By mid-century he had authored commentaries to Isaiah, Song of Songs, and Esther, and in 1866 he produced a commentary to the Prophets and Writings. In 1860 he published an edition of the Sifra, the early rabbinic midrash to Leviticus, which interpolated the relevant biblical verses at the head of each midrashic segment, and to which he wrote a commentary titled Ha-Torah v'eha-Mitzvah. It is most significant, in terms of understanding Malbim's methods and aims, that it was this rabbinic commentary that appeared with the full text of the Sifra as the Leviticus section of his Bible commentary. Over the next two decades Malbim applied this approach to the other books of the Torah, producing a commentary to the Mekhilta (Exodus) and Sifre (Numbers and Deuteronomy); for sections of the Bible without midrash halakhah, Malbim posed a series of questions to which he supplied lengthy answers, somewhat reminiscent of the style employed earlier by Abravanel and other late medieval scholars. Judging by its numerous reprintings, this work proved to be one of the most popular Bible commentaries of late 19th-century European Jewry.

In his extensive two-part introduction to the original Sifra commentary, Malbim was unequivocal about his overarching objective: to develop tools that would demonstrate the veracity of rabbinic traditions. The Sages, he asserted, had a profound knowledge of Hebrew that included a firm grasp of grammatical principles, sensitivity to the subtlest of differences among apparently synonymous nouns and verbs, and an appreciation of biblical style and idiom, all of which he detailed in a separate section of the introduction. Malbim explicitly rejected the notion that rabbinic teachings were merely traditions that used scriptural verses as props or as a kind of subscript. Moreover, unlike Mendelssohn and Meklenburg, and more akin to the approach taken by Wessely, he insisted upon the linguistic profundity of rabbinic literature, which resulted in the blurring of the distinction between peshat and derash. After all, if the Sages were superb linguists and readers of texts, then all their interpretations could be identified with peshuto shel miqra'. The words of the Oral Torah, he wrote, "are compelled by and ingrained in the Scriptural peshat and in the depths of the language. Derush [sic] alone is the simple peshat that is based upon the true and clear rules of language" (Malbim, Sifra devei Rav . . . im Peirush Ha-Torah v'eha-Mitzvah, Bucharest, 1860, p. 2a).

The reawakened interest in Hebrew and Bible study and the need to reinforce the integrity of traditional Judaism shaped the writing of a number of other Bible commentaries worthy of note. In the late 1860s, R. Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808–1888) began publishing a translation and lengthy German commentary to the Torah (Der Pentateuch, übersetzt und erläutert, Frankfurt am Main, 1867–1878). As one of the most prominent and outspoken leaders of German Orthodoxy, Hirsch was no less committed to the defense of normative rabbinic Judaism than Meklenburg and Malbim, but he took an entirely different approach to the interpretation of Scripture. In his view, the corpus of rabbinic teachings could not—and for polemical purposes, should not—be derived from the biblical text. Although the Bible served as a kind of a mnemonic primer that elicited the particulars of the Oral Torah, this was possible only in the presence of a revealed tradition that Moses and the Israelites had already absorbed (see Hirsch's commentary to Exodus 21.2). Instead, highly sensitive to the prevailing European-Protestant depreciation of Judaism, Hirsch used his commentary to demonstrate the thoroughly integrated spiritual and ethical worldview of the Torah. Utilizing a mix of philology and homiletics, Hirsch produced what could best be described as a theosophical commentary which made heavy use of biblical symbolism and which mined biblical narratives and strictures for their sublime moral teachings. In tenor and substance, as in language and style, Hirsch's commentary remained a distinct contribution to 19th-century biblical interpretation.

More than a generation later, R. David Zvi Hoffmann (1843–1921), rector of the Orthodox rabbinic seminary of Berlin and an important leader of German Jewry in his own right, produced German commentaries to the books of Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Das Buch Leviticus, übersetzt und erklärt, Berlin, 1905–1906; Das Buch Deuteronomium, übersetzt und erklärt, Berlin, 1913–1922). His biblical commentaries combined overlapping traditionalist elements of Haskalah and Wissenschaft scholarship with the orthodox apologia of scholars like Meklenburg. Academically trained and well versed in contemporary European biblical scholarship, Hoffmann was as concerned with defending the integrity of the Bible as displaying its ultimate concordance with rabbinic oral traditions. Like Malbim, he devoted a considerable amount of scholarly attention to the study of midrash halakhah, but the methodological conclusions he drew were different. Hoffmann allowed that in many instances rabbinic traditions either preceded or appeared concurrently with their scripturally based articulation in midrashic literature and could not be independently derived from the biblical text. Nevertheless, the task of the modern exegete was to connect the Bible with tradition, even if retrospectively. Hoffmann's biblical writings, however, were not focused solely on this issue, and their scholarly range was broader than any other 19th-century commentary, incorporating linguistic and scientific insights alongside philosophy and comparative anthropology.

The revival of Bible study took root and flourished in Eastern Europe as well, and although the commentaries that emerged from there shared the traditionalist concern for the integrity of rabbinic interpretations, they tended to approach the problem in a more selective and discerning fashion. The head of the prestigious Volozhin yeshivah, R. Naftali Zvi Yehudah Berlin (1817–1893; known by his acronym as the Netziv), penned a commentary to the Torah titled Ha-Amek Davar which first appeared in an 1879–1880 Vilna edition of the Bible. Like Malbim and Hoffmann, Berlin had elsewhere devoted significant scholarly energy to the study of early rabbinic midrash, but his Bible commentary engaged both Scripture and rabbinic literature in ways that tried to develop an appreciation for their independent literary qualities. Berlin spoke incisively about the limitless interpretative possibilities that inhered in the biblical text, and at the same time allowed that earlier rabbinic modes of interpretation had been independently and creatively derived. At the end of the 19th century, Barukh Ha-Levi Epstein (1860–1942) also set out to show the fundamental accord between the Bible and the oral law in an edition of the Torah named Torah Temimah (Vilna, 1904). Epstein went about this task by anthologizing rabbinic uses of Scripture and appending a series of notes which proved to contain original and insightful comments regarding the rabbinic interpretation of Scripture. In many ways, the real scholarly achievement of this work may have been the anthology itself, in which Epstein culled a large corpus of rabbinic literature and edited and condensed his findings with masterful scholarship. Perhaps the most original of the late 19th-century traditionalist commentaries, however, was the posthumously published Meshekh Hokhmah (1927) of R. Meir Simhah Ha-Kohen of Dvinsk (1843–1926). Like Berlin, this exegete was an outstanding rabbinic scholar who appreciated not only the quality of rabbinic scriptural interpretation, but also its ongoing creativity. As such, he asserted the right of rabbinic scholars of all generations to venture beyond attested readings in order to derive new halakhah from scriptural peshat.

Conclusion

While the beginning of our survey clearly marked a new chapter in the history of Jewish biblical interpretation, the point we have reached here at the end of this overview does not represent its closing or conclusion. Rather, with the end of the 19th and beginning of the 20th centuries, we leave behind only the first stages of the Jewish encounter with modernity and its concomitant reengagement with the Bible. By the end of our period, to be sure, the traditionalist attempt to demonstrate the textually grounded nature—and hence presumed correctness—of rabbinic exegesis had effectively run its creative course. The 19th-century scholarship of the maskilim and the Wissenschaft des Judentums, which was groundbreaking and innovative for its time, nevertheless remained in many ways stunted and undeveloped. With few exceptions, the scholars we surveyed here did not seriously engage European biblical scholarship and some of its most challenging and critical developments (see “Modern Study,” pp. 2084–96). As such, while Jewish biblical interpretation of the 18th and 19th centuries forms a distinct and historically important corpus, that time must also be seen as a period that cultivated new cultural and intellectual commitments that would express themselves fully only in the next century.

[EDWARD BREUER]

Modern Jewish Interpretation

The most distinctive feature of the modern study of the Bible is its emphasis on history: the attempt to uncover what the biblical texts meant at the time they were composed rather than what they came to mean in later tradition, or how they might inspire the believer. Although a number of premodern scholars pursued the “original sense,” these practicing Jews and Christians were constrained by personal and institutional loyalty to limit the scope of their inquiries. For these reasons, what seem to us to be obvious contradictions and anachronisms within the texts were explained in ways that did not undermine the traditional authority of the Bible.

Among Jews, the return to serious study of the Bible is a modern phenomenon, having been neglected in many European Jewish communities during the medieval and early modern periods (see “Medieval Interpretation,” pp. 1876–1900, and “Post-medieval Interpretation,” pp. 1900–1908). Beginning with Saadia Gaon (882–942) and continuing for the next several centuries, medieval Jewish scholars had made the Bible a major focus of study. Sephardim (Jews of Spanish and Portuguese origin) and Italian Jews continued that tradition, but on the eve of modernity most Jews lived in Central and Eastern Europe. In contrast to the Sephardim who studied the Talmud only as a source of law, the Ashkenazim (Jews in Franco-German communities) viewed study of the Talmud as a religious end in itself, deserving undivided scholarly attention. Much like Catholics, Ashkenazim treated the Bible as a liturgical and homiletical text. Premodern Jewish communal life was based not on the Bible but on laws, customs, and traditions derived in the main from the Babylonian Talmud and codified in the 16th-century Shulhan 'Arukh legal code and its commentaries. Although these documents of rabbinic Judaism derived their ultimate authority from the Bible, in practice, Rabbis, who served their autonomous communities more as judges than as spiritual leaders, required very little biblical learning. The 17th-century Rabbi Joseph Hahn of Frankfurt (d. 1637) wrote, “In our generation there are rabbis who never studied the Bible.” Germany saw some improvement in the next century thanks to the Bible translation project initiated by Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1786), which was accompanied by contemporary commentaries (Bi'ur). But even in Germany, and all the more in Russia and Poland, talmudical study carried greater prestige than biblical, and bright students were moved to Talmud by age seven or eight. (The small number of girls given schooling studied more Bible than did boys.)

If Bible study was largely ignored, “higher criticism” of the Bible (the identification of sources behind the biblical text; see “The Modern Study of the Bible,” pp. 2084–96) as practiced in universities and some Christian seminaries beginning in the late 18th century was condemned. Pious Jews (and many of their Christian counterparts) were horrified that Bible "critics" questioned the reliability of the received biblical texts, denied the historicity of their contents, and detected numerous sources in books attributed by Jewish (and Christian) tradition to a single author. It is true that some features that characterize modern criticism had surfaced much earlier. Abraham Ibn Ezra (1092–1167) noted several anachronisms in the Torah; Joseph Bekhor Shor (12th century) observed contradictory parallel narratives in the Torah; some members of the Hasidei Ashkenaz (12th- to 13th-century German Jewish Pietists) challenged Davidic authorship of certain psalms and Mosaic authorship of sections of the Torah; and Jonah Ibn Janah (ca. 990–ca. 1050) may have emended biblical texts. But none of these scholars, every one of them steadfast in the observance of the Jewish communal laws, developed a systematic critical approach. (The nascent biblical criticism of the excommunicate Baruch Spinoza [1632–1677] written in Latin had little influence on 17th-century Jews.) With the advent of Emancipation, adherence to Jewish law and membership in the Jewish community became voluntary. Just as the Protestant Reformation had made it possible for Christians to study the Bible directly without the authorized interpretations of the Church, Emancipation gave Jews an opportunity to study Bible outside of traditional circles. Those who began to study the Bible in the newer setting tended to sympathize with the Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment) Movement or with Zionism rather than with old-style religious observance and belief.

Particularly odious to the faithful was the Documentary Hypothesis, especially as codified by Julius Wellhausen (1844–1918). The Wellhausen theory, which came to dominate biblical scholarship by the close of the 19th century, claimed that the Torah or Pentateuch (Genesis through Deuteronomy) had been written not by Moses but by authors who composed "documents" over a period of centuries. These documents, or sources, were combined to form the Torah, which owed its final shape to the priests of the Jewish "church" of the late first millennium BCE. Because of its priestly orientation, declared Wellhausen, the Torah, in contrast to the prophetic books of an earlier age, was a "legalistic" work obsessed with ritual purity and scrupulous observance of ceremonial minutiae. Wellhausen's view of the development of Judaism, therefore, saw it as inferior to the prophetic faith that scorned the legalistic requirements of Temple observance; this made it easier to embrace the New Testament polemic against "Judaism" (i.e., legalism) while still accepting the Old Testament (as recommending, in its highest development in the prophets, "faith," not ritual "works").

In the less-than-pious circles of Wissenschaft des Judentums (scientific study of Judaism) critical study of the Bible was also unpopular, but for different and sometimes contradictory reasons. Jewish scholars with university training sought to modernize Judaism, gain general acknowledgment of their own academic legitimacy, and secure broad rights of European citizenship for their people. As such, their research gave priority to Jewish intellectual creativity in the Gentile world. The study of the Jewish philosophers or of the great medieval poets demonstrated that Greek and Arabic speaking Jews had contributed to general intellectual life. Philo, Maimonides, and Judah Halevi could serve as models for 19th-century European Jews. The study of historic Israel in its own land, in contrast, underscored Jewish separateness. Certainly, the research agenda of the German reformer and scholar Abraham Geiger (1810–1874) was shaped by such concerns. Geiger's exemplary work on ancient translations of the Bible barely engages the literary history of the Bible proper. For his part, the eminent historian and Bible scholar Heinrich Graetz (1817–1891) was willing to study most of the Bible critically, but clung to a traditional view of the Torah's composition. Within some Zionist circles of the East European Haskalah, biblical criticism was unwelcome because it was too "European" and could lead to assimilation rather than to Zionism. The pleas of such spokesmen as Max Soloweitschik (1883–1957) and Zalman Rubashov [Shazar] (1889–1974; later president of Israel) that the study of the Bible was essential to Zionism went largely unheeded. Finally, it must be observed that many enlightened Jews including the American immigrants I. M. Wise (1819–1900), founder of the (Reform) Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, and Solomon Schechter (1847–1915), the driving force at the (Conservative) Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, were deterred from serious study of the Bible by the triumphalist tone of Christian Bible criticism. Schechter, not without justification, referred to higher criticism as "higher anti-Semitism" (see discussion of J. Wellhausen, above). After all, Wilhem de Wette (1760–1849), the first to date the composition of Deuteronomy to the time of King Josiah (d. 609 BCE), thus providing a fixed date for the composition of a book of the Torah, had written that Judaism was a "misfortune" for which Christianity provided "consolation." The pioneering Semiticist and grammarian H. F. Wilhelm Gesenius (1786–1842) observed that the postexilic books Esther, Daniel, and Jonah were the products of "debased Jewish taste." Wellhausen himself had declared that the Torah's system of commandments turned God into the "manager of a petty scheme of salvation." The (Priestly) law, he asserted, "takes the soul out of religion and spoils morality." In studies on the Pentateuch in particular, Christian Bible scholars tended to denigrate "pharisaical" Jews and a "legalistic" Judaism so far removed from the elevated teachings of the great early Hebrew prophets that a completely new revelation was required in the advent of Jesus.

Nonetheless, there were Jewish scholars who saw the necessity for modern scientific Bible study. One such pioneer was the Italian Samuel David Luzzatto (acronym Shadal; 1800–1865). Luzzatto, who was schooled in the earlier Jewish and Christian translations of the Bible, suggested that the vowel points were secondary to the received Hebrew text. (He was here influenced by the earlier Italian Elija Levita [1468/9–1549].) He was the first modern Jewish scholar to propose textual emendations in biblical texts, so long as these were outside of the Torah. With regard to higher criticism he denied the attribution to David of many psalms and to Solomon the authorship of Ecclesiastes, while upholding Mosaic authorship of the Torah. As part of his philosophical program, Nachman Krochmal (1785–1840), an Eastern European Jewish intellectual, wrote The Guide for the Perplexed of This Time (Moreh Nevukhei Ha-Zeman) and accepted the view of general biblical scholarship that the latter half of Isaiah and the book of Koheleth (Ecclesiastes) were products of Diaspora Judaism in the latter first millennium BCE. In opposition to Christian scholarship, however, Krochmal held that lateness demonstrated not decay but rather continuing Jewish creativity and spiritual innovation. In further defense of Judaism, Krochmal asserted that the great Rabbis of the talmudic period (2nd–6th century) had reached the same conclusions about the lateness of some biblical books but concealed their findings out of concern that their laity had not reached the necessary level of sophistication.

Of particular interest is Markus M. Kalisch (1828–1885), who had rabbinical training and a degree from the University of Berlin (Friedrich-Wilhelms Universität). Thanks to his employment in England by the Rothschild family, Kalisch was able to devote himself to scholarship. Whereas most 19th-century Jewish scholars, even nonobservant ones, eschewed critical analysis of the "iconic" Torah, Kalisch wrote a two-volume commentary on Leviticus (1867, 1872), in which he examined the biblical sacrificial systems and determined that the document that was designated as the Priestly Code ("P") was later than Deuteronomy ("D"). He thus anticipated Wellhausen both in method and in some of his conclusions.

Leopold Zunz (1794–1886), founder of Wissenschaft des Judentums, had studied at the University of Berlin during the tenure there of Wilhelm de Wette. Zunz, though, did not direct his primary early research to the Bible, arguing that postbiblical literature as part of Jewish culture not shared with Christians was in need of scholarly attention, whereas the Bible had many Christian students. Nonetheless, his ground-breaking study of ancient Jewish preaching, Die gottesdienstlichen Vorträge der Juden, historisch entwickelt (The Worship Sermons of the Jews Historically Developed; 1832) revealed the late date of many psalms, dated Ezekiel to the 5th century BCE, outlined the ideological concerns of Chronicles and argued for its shared authorship with Ezra-Nehemiah, and claimed that the Jewish canon had not been completed until shortly before 70 CE. In his old age Zunz turned to the central concerns of 19th-century biblical scholarship. He supported de Wette's 7th-century BCE dating of Deuteronomy with supplementary linguistic evidence. In agreement with Wellhausen, Zunz argued that Leviticus was written after both Deuteronomy and Ezekiel, under the influence of the Jewish priesthood of the later first millennium BCE.

Solomon Mandelkern (1846–1902), born in Russia, rabbinically educated and holding degrees in Semitics and law, provided the single most important scholarly tool for Bible study with his Hekhal Hakodesh (1896). This concordance was the standard work until the advent of computer concordances at the end of the 20th century. It took twenty years to complete, and made it possible to study every biblical word in context so that a scholar need not rely on memory or inadequate dictionaries.

The United States for most of the 19th century had a small Jewish population, with a correspondingly low level of Jewish knowledge. The major American Jewish contribution to biblical studies was the Bible translation written by Isaac Leeser (1806–1868). A Prussian immigrant, Leeser was employed as a hazan (cantor) in Philadelphia. Although Leeser's formal training was sparse, historical circumstances combined with his own sense of purpose and remarkable vision made him the primary architect of American Jewish institutional life. Leeser's Hebrew-English Bible (1853) was essentially a Jewish version of the King James with its christology removed and some Jewish traditional interpretation inserted. Despite the severe judgment rendered by some critics, the Leeser Bible met the needs of American Jewish life in the mid-19th century quite well (see "Jewish Translations of the Bible," pp. 2005–20).

The political revolutions that roiled Western and Central Europe in 1848, followed later in the century by the decline of the state of the Jews of Eastern Europe, encouraged Jewish immigration to the United States and raised the intellectual level of American Jewry. One such immigrant, Benjamin Szold (1829–1902), a rabbi in Baltimore, wrote a Hebrew commentary on Job (1886) drawing on the Jewish exegetical tradition and, conservatively, on 19th-century Christian scholarship. Szold attempted to resolve the controversy over the date of Job by arguing that an early form of the book was originally composed in the time of Moses, while our extant book is a much later reworking of the original.

Arnold B. Ehrlich (1848–1919), a younger contemporary of Szold, was a unique figure. Born in Wlodawa in Russian Poland and married at an early age, Ehrlich divorced his wife and moved to Leipzig in Germany. There he converted to Christianity and taught at the missionary Institutum Judaicum headed by the eminent biblicist Franz Delitzsch (1813–1890), helping to translate the New Testament into Hebrew for the purpose of converting Jews. In 1876 Ehrlich reached America and quickly returned to Judaism. Although unable to obtain a regular academic post, Ehrlich managed to produce two major scholarly works: the Hebrew Miqra' Kifshuto (The Bible in its Plain Sense; 1899–1901) and the seven-volume German Randglossen zur hebräischen Bibel (Marginal Notes to the Hebrew Bible). Both works show their author's knowledge of philology and his ear for biblical language.

Although Ehrlich does not refer to the Documentary Hypothesis, he employs arguments based on linguistic usage, concepts, and institutions to assign relative "late" and "early" dates to specific passages. Numerous historical comments, such as his denial of the historicity of Egyptian enslavement and exodus are buried in notes to specific passages. Ehrlich wrote Miqra' in Hebrew for the express purpose of introducing Jews to the critical study of the Bible. His work has been highly influential on Jewish scholarship, as can be seen in the Bible translations produced by the Jewish Publication Society: the JPS Bible of 1917 and its replacement NJPS (1962–1982).

Because of the Christian orientation of Bible study in American colleges and universities, it was not easy for Jewish scholars with research interests in the Bible to find academic posts directly in that area. In addition, much biblical research at that time was done in the context of Protestant seminaries rather than in secular institutions. Departments of Semitic or Oriental Languages were more hospitable to Jewish scholars. For example, Morris Jastrow (1861–1922) received the Ph.D. in Semitics at Leipzig and then taught at the University of Pennsylvania from 1885 until his death. Although his primary fields were Assyriology and Mesopotamian religion, Jastrow published books on Ecclesiastes, Job, and Song of Songs. He served as editor of the Bible division for the twelve-volume Jewish Encyclopedia (New York, 1901–1906; most of the contributors to the Bible division were Christians). Jastrow served as the first Jewish president of the professional society, the Society of Biblical Literature, in 1916, and was an outspoken proponent of higher criticism.

Max Margolis (1866–1932) likewise earned a degree in Semitics. His doctoral thesis on text-criticism of the Talmud was written in Latin under Richard Gottheil at Columbia in 1891. Margolis began his scholarly career at Hebrew Union College (1893–1897) where I. M. Wise persuaded him to move into biblical studies. He left HUC for Berkeley and taught Semitics there until 1905, when he returned to HUC, which he once again left after a disappointing two years. In 1908 Margolis became editor-in-chief of the Jewish Publication Society's Bible translation. Published in 1917, the JPS Holy Scriptures became the quasi-official Bible of Jewish anglophones for the next half-century. An outstanding textual critic with special interest in the Septuagint (the ancient Jewish translation into Greek), Margolis was quite conservative in his attitude toward higher criticism. He served as president of the Society of Biblical Literature in 1923 and editor of its Journal of Biblical Literature (JBL) from 1914 to 1922. Margolis served as Professor of Biblical Philology at the non-sectarian Dropsie College (later the Annenberg Research Institute for Judaic and Near Eastern Studies and now the Center for Judaic Studies of the University of Pennsylvania) from 1909 until his death.

The first American Jewish Bible scholar to practice higher criticism systematically was the long-lived Julian Morgenstern (1881–1976). Morgenstern, ordained at HUC in 1902, earned the Ph.D. in Assyriology at Heidelberg. He not only championed the Documentary Hypothesis but expanded it by claiming to have identified an additional "document" in the Torah. As a professor at HUC from 1907 to 1960 and as its president from 1921 to 1947, he was the first Jewish scholar to make critical study of the Bible central to the curriculum of an American Jewish seminary. Over the years Morgenstern came to the conclusion that the Documentary Hypothesis, although necessary, was insufficient. In his presidential address to the Society of Biblical Literature in 1941, Morgenstern called for a synthesis of classical criticism with archeology, folklore studies, and religious phenomenology.

The modern Hebrew Torah, Nevi'im Ukhetuvim im Perush Mada'i (The Bible with a Critical Commentary), edited by A. Kahana (1874–1946) in collaboration with scholars from all over the world, was a conscious product of the editor's Jewish nationalism. Although the full series was never completed, the seven volumes published over a period of twenty-six years (1903/04–1929/30) made use of the ancient versions, ancient Near Eastern sources unearthed by archeology, comparative Semitics, and the Documentary Hypothesis. Among the contributors were H. P. Chajes, F. Perles, Max Margolis and Kahana himself. Until 1990 the series was the only multi-volume critical Bible commentary in Hebrew.

The period between the First and Second World Wars had a great impact on Jewish Bible scholarship. The opening of the Hebrew University in 1925 meant that the Bible would be studied in Hebrew in the land of its origin. Zionist successes and the rise to power of the Nazis encouraged the immigration of European Jews to Palestine and the United States. The foundations of what was to become Israeli Bible scholarship were laid by such scholars as Tur-Sinai (Torczyner), Cassuto, Kaufmann, and Segal.

N. H. Tur-Sinai (Torczyner; 1876–1973) was an ingenious, sometimes overly ingenious, philologist who uncovered the meaning of many a biblical passage that had long eluded interpretation. Especially noteworthy are his three different commentaries on Job, in which he argues that most of the textual difficulties of the book can be solved by treating the Hebrew as a faulty translation from an Aramaic original. Rather than employing source-criticism, Tur-Sinai argued that our surviving biblical literature comes from compilations that were originally organized around the lives of ancient heroes, such as David, Moses, or Samuel. The title of Tur-Sinai's multi-volume Peshuto shel Miqra' (The Plain Sense of the Bible; 1962–1968) is an acknowledgment of the author's indebtedness to Ehrlich.

Umberto Moshe David Cassuto (1883–1951) was an Italian Jew trained as a rabbi at Collegio Rabbinico Italiano. His doctoral studies at the University of Florence brought him under the influence of the critical Bible scholar H. P. Chajes (1876–1927). Cassuto devoted his early scholarship to the history of the Jews of Italy. Appointment to the faculty at the University of Rome caused him to redirect his efforts into Semitics. Cassuto's studies of the Ugaritic literature of the late second-millennium BCE Syria led him to realize the cultural continuity between ancient Israel and the wider ancient Near East. A lover of Dante, Cassuto's background in literature impelled him to view the Documentary Hypothesis as unsound. Instead, Cassuto advocated what would later be called "synchronic" or "holistic" reading of the biblical text with an eye to its inner unity, an approach which has since become extremely popular in the "Bible as literature" movement. Cassuto moved to Israel (then Palestine) from Fascist Italy in 1939 and became a professor of Bible at Hebrew University. He was the founding editor of the Entziklopediah Miqra'it (Encyclopaedia Biblica; 9 volumes; 1950–1989).

Moses Hirsch (Zevi) Segal (1876–1968) was born in Lithuania, where he pursued a rabbinical education. His university studies in London and Oxford led to an appointment as lecturer at Hebrew University in 1926, where he became professor in 1939. Orthodox opposition to biblical study restricted the initial appointment to Parshanut (exegesis) rather than Miqra' (Bible) proper; this despite Segal's opposition to the Documentary Hypothesis. (H. P. Chajes, a stronger candidate, failed to get the post because of his critical stance.) Though rejecting most aspects of the critical study of the Torah, Segal clung to the newer tradition that biblical criticism was legitimate outside the Torah, and his commentary on Samuel (1956) is full of observations concerning the complex layers of composition of that book. In several articles and the book The Pentateuch: Its Composition and Authorship and Other Biblical Studies (1967), Segal attempts to demonstrate the essential Mosaic authorship of the Torah, but allows for numerous additions by later authors. Segal also wrote the widely read Introduction to the Bible (4 Hebrew vols. 1946–1950), and contributed much to the study of Mishnaic Hebrew, the Apocrypha, and the history of interpretation.

Yehezkel Kaufmann (1889–1963), best known for his opposition to Wellhausen, was, ironically, the most enthusiastic proponent of the Documentary Hypothesis among the pioneering Israeli biblicists. Kaufmann challenged the chronological order of the sources of the Torah proposed by Wellhausen. Tacitly accepting the view of Christian Bible scholarship that "earlier is better," Kaufmann argued that the P(riestly) source was a preexilic composition and not a late, inferior "Jewish" development. Kaufmann challenged as well Wellhausen's chronology of Israelite religion. From his dating of the sources Wellhausen had concluded that Israelite monotheism evolved out of polytheism over centuries as the teachings of the prophets finally took hold among the masses. Kaufmann in his magnum opus, Toledot ha'Emunah ha-Yisra'elit (8 vols. 1937–1957; English: Religion of Israel, translated and abridged by Moshe Greenberg, 1960), asserted that Israelite monotheism began as an original religious intuition in the time of Moses. Ancient Israelites, common folk and religious elite alike, were united by the monotheistic worship of the god YHWH. The Bible's repeated references to Israelite worship of "wood and stone idols" were to be explained as denunciations by religious zealots of what in reality were vestiges of superstition from pre-Mosaic times. Kaufmann's thesis stripped Torah criticism of its animus to Judaism and found eager acceptance among non-Orthodox Israelis and American religious moderates, particularly at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary. Especially attractive was Kaufmann's description of monotheism as an original religious intuition, which supported Jewish claims to religious genius without appealing to supernaturalism.

During the 1st century of modern biblical scholarship, the field was largely restricted to source-critical examination of the biblical books themselves. The expansion of ancient Near Eastern archeology in the period between the World Wars heightened interest in comparative studies, both linguistic and cultural. To some extent the recovery of the world in which the Bible had been produced mitigated opposition to critical study by producing "positive" results. Through "biblical archeology" (as it used to be called, since it was done in conjunction with, and usually in support of, the biblical text), some textual emendations were vitiated by the discovery that a biblical text thought corrupt actually preserved a hitherto unknown word. Other discoveries substantiated the existence of biblical figures or provided background to biblical institutions. Jewish scholars such as the founder of Israeli archeology, Benjamin (Maisler) Mazar (1906–1995), learned from W. F. Albright (1891–1971) to combine field researches with biblical text-study. Nelson Glueck (1900–1971) was the only American Jew centrally involved in the "biblical archeology" movement. Glueck was president of HUC from 1947 to 1971 and the founder of its archeology school in Jerusalem, which now bears his name. Bold syntheses of text and archeology were also undertaken by a student of Margolis, E. A. Speiser (1902–1965) of the University of Pennsylvania, notably in his influential commentary on Genesis (Anchor Bible, 1964). Somewhat similar was the approach of Cyrus Gordon (1908–2001), a far-ranging comparatist who included the Aegean world within the purview of biblical and Near Eastern studies, and trained several generations of students. Within this same generation the most far-reaching comparative work was done by Theodor H. Gaster (1906–1992), whose Myth, Legend and Custom in the Old Testament (1969), based on the methods of the anthropologist James Frazer, attempts to gather "all that can be derived from comparative folklore and mythology for the interpretation of the Old Testament."

Perhaps the greatest of American Jewish biblicists trained between the wars was Harold Louis (or H. L.) Ginsberg (1903–1990). Born in Montreal, Canada, Ginsberg earned his doctorate at the University of London and moved to mandatory Palestine where he worked closely with Benjamin Mazar, concentrating on ancient Semitics. In 1936 he published a pioneering Hebrew translation and grammatical study of ancient Ugaritic tablets unearthed in Syria in 1929. Ginsberg was one of the first to employ Ugaritic to recover forgotten grammatical features and "lost" words in biblical Hebrew. He also demonstrated the value of Ugaritic in textual criticism of the Bible. Ginsberg's arrival at Jewish Theological Seminary in 1936 transformed the seminary's role in Jewish Bible studies. Although JTS had no Ph.D. program at that time, at least two generations of Jewish Bible scholars received their "basic training" and inspiration while studying Bible at JTS with Ginsberg. Ginsberg employed philology both for itself and as a clue to reconstructing inner-biblical literary and ideological development. For most of his scholarly career Ginsberg championed and publicized the view of Yehezkel Kaufmann that "D(euteronomy)" was later than "P(riestly Code)." As he began to concentrate on Torah, however, his research in biblical diction demonstrated to him that Wellhausen had been substantially correct. The results of much of Ginsberg's work are available to the larger public because he served as an editor and translator of the first two sections of the NJPS. He was also Bible editor of Encyclopaedia Judaica (1971), to which he contributed original articles far more documented and detailed than is usual in contemporary encyclopedias. These are characterized by brilliant intuition and occasionally, by excessive ingenuity.

Another outstanding figure trained between the wars was Harry M. Orlinsky (1908–1992), likewise Canadian by birth. Orlinsky earned his Ph.D. at Dropsie and spent most of his teaching career at HUC in New York City (at the time the independent Jewish Institute of Religion). His 1967 study on the "Suffering Servant" in Deutero-Isaiah is a classic of modern scholarship, and is significant for its use of scholarly method to polemicize implicitly against Christian theological interpretation of the Bible. Most of Orlinsky's work, however, was in textual studies and translation. Especially noteworthy are his numerous articles on the Greek Septuagint translation. Orlinsky crusaded for years in behalf of a Jewish translation to replace the 1917 JPS. His wishes were fulfilled when he served as editor-in-chief of the New JPS Torah (1961) and as an editor for the Prophets and Megillot (scrolls) sections (1985). Orlinsky was the only Jewish scholar involved in the Protestant Revised Standard Version translation of the Old Testament (1952) and its revision, the New Revised Standard Version (1989); no Christian scholars participated in the New Jewish Publication Society Bible (1985).

In the period between World War II and the late 1960s, Jewish scholarship became increasingly productive as a significant number of Jewish scholars entered the mainstream of biblical scholarship. The increased number of Jewish biblicists led to the emergence of a "Jewish School" with a common educational profile. At the time there were few university-supported programs in Judaic Studies. Almost all the scholars of this period (they were all men; no seminaries admitted women at that time), mostly now emeriti or deceased, had studied or taught at rabbinical seminaries, notably the Jewish Theological Seminary, and all were conversant with the Jewish exegetical tradition, even when they ignored it. Unlike Christian seminaries, the Jewish institutions emphasized historical method rather than theology. The Christian orientation of advanced biblical studies led most of these men to pursue their education in secular graduate schools, in Near Eastern Studies departments, where they studied the ancient languages and cultures of Western Asia, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. A crucial development unifying Jewish biblical scholarship was the rise of the State of Israel (1948), which led to interaction between American and Israeli scholarship. United in their common knowledge of modern Hebrew, Americans and Israelis studied and taught in each other's countries. A number of American scholars emigrated to Israel, most maintaining their American connections. A smaller number of Israeli biblicists settled in America, but maintained Israeli connections. Jewish Bible scholars on both sides of the globe were the foremost advocates of interpreting difficult biblical Hebrew texts in the light of other languages, particularly Ugaritic and Akkadian, and of interpreting biblical institutions, laws, and narratives in light of "parallels." In their approach to ancient Israelite religion, many were influenced by Yehezkel Kaufmann.

Of special note was the engagement of the Jewish scholars trained before the late 1960s in Torah-criticism, often avoided in earlier Jewish biblical scholarship, and absent from the curriculum of JTS until 1966. All the Torah volumes in the nonsectarian Anchor Bible are by Jews: E. A. Speiser (1902–1965; Genesis), Jacob Milgrom (b. 1923; Leviticus), Baruch Levine (b. 1930; Numbers), Moshe Weinfeld of Israel (b. 1925; Deuteronomy). The most recent volume, Exodus, is the work of a younger Jewish scholar, William Propp. In the JPS Torah Commentary, also all written by Jews, Genesis and Exodus are by Nahum Sarna, (b. 1923), Leviticus by Baruch Levine, Numbers by Jacob Milgrom, and Deuteronomy by Jeffrey Tigay. Both Milgrom and Levine are known for their studies of the Israelite cult.

Most influential have been Moshe Greenberg and Nahum Sarna. Greenberg, a student of E. A. Speiser, left the University of Pennsylvania, where he had been a young star, for Hebrew University. Greenberg was a pioneer in employing rabbinic midrash and medieval commentaries in pursuit of the original sense of the text. Over thirty years ago Greenberg called for emphasis on the individual books of the Bible as literary units. Greenberg's call heralded the new emphasis on "Bible as literature" and legitimated literary-aesthetic study among mainstream biblicists. In addition, his emphasis on the integrity of the Hebrew text offered an important corrective to much (German) biblical scholarship, which often corrects the Hebrew on the basis of the Greek Septuagint. Greenberg authored the Ezekiel commentary in the Anchor Bible (2 volumes published, a third to follow). He co-edited Miqra' le-Yisra'el, a multi-volume commentary in Hebrew designed to bring biblical scholarship to the Israeli public as well as to scholars. Sarna, a student of Gordon, was originally interested in rabbinic literature; he thus shares with Greenberg a great appreciation of the rabbinic and medieval commentary tradition. Again like Greenberg, Sarna is a born teacher. His pedagogical skills, evident in all of his writing, come to the fore in the JPS Torah Commentary, particularly in Genesis, which masterfully synthesizes textual study, archeology and rabbinic tradition. A prescient essay on Psalm 89 (1963) brought the notion "inner-biblical exegesis" into scholarly consciousness. At Brandeis University Sarna trained large numbers of students, including Michael Fishbane, who has developed "inner-biblical exegesis" (see "Inner-biblical Interpretation," pp. 182–9–35). Jeffrey Tigay has aptly written: "No scholar has done as much as Sarna to educate English-speaking Jewry about the Bible."

Another significant figure was the Israeli expatriate Moshe Held (1924–1984), who taught at Dropsie College and then at Columbia University. Held was an outstanding philologist and comparative Semiticist with a commanding personality. Held's years of teaching at nearby JTS brought "cuneiform-consciousness" to students in his Bible classes and attracted many of them into the advanced study of Bible and comparative Semitics. In Israel the figure of Menahem Haran (b. 1924) looms large. A student of Kaufmann, Haran's work has concentrated on biblical religion and cult within Kaufmann's model that the Priestly tradition is early. More recently his work has been on the formation of the biblical canon and its scribal transmission. Other highly influential Israeli figures are the late I. L. Seeligmann and the late S. E. Lowenstamm, as well as Abraham Malamat (b. 1922) and Moshe Weinfeld (b. 1925). Malamat has a comparative approach to Israelite institutions such as prophecy and monarchy. Weinfeld, a wide-ranging comparatist with a strong interest in institutions, was an early advocate of using Assyrian vassal treaties to understand the Bible, especially Deuteronomy; he is opening new vistas in his work comparing Israelite settlement patterns with ancient Greek colonization.

The last thirty years have been momentous for Jewish Bible scholarship in both numbers and diversification of approaches. In the United States the academic legitimation of ethnic studies enabled the creation of programs in Jewish Studies in private and public institutions of higher learning. Court decisions permitting the teaching of religion in publicly funded schools were an additional stimulus to growth. The influence of feminism brought women into a field that had been completely male. Women scholars regularly addressed questions that had been ignored, influencing men to do the same. Prominent women scholars of this first generation include: Adele Berlin, Tikva Frymer-Kensky, Susan Niditch, Carol Meyers, Tamara Eskenazi, and in Israel, Sara Japhet, Yaira Amit, and the late Sara Kamin. Some Jewish scholars, notably Jon Levenson at Harvard and the late M. H. Goshen-Gottstein (1925–1991) have engaged biblical theology, heretofore mostly restricted to Christians.

Additional diversity has come from Orthodox Judaism. In the past, Orthodox Jews were on the periphery of Jewish biblical studies. Their most important contributions were critical editions of medieval Jewish Bible commentators, famous and (undeservedly) obscure alike. An outstanding example is the ongoing M. Cohen (ed.) Miqra'ot Gedolot Haketer (Bar-Ilan University, 1992ff.) based on the Aleppo Codex of the Bible and accompanied by a comprehensive selection of medieval commentaries edited from the best texts. Notable exceptions are two Israeli scholars, Meir Weiss and Uriel Simon, who pioneered the literary study of the Bible. At the present time scholars personally affiliated with Orthodox Judaism engage the central questions of textual criticism, literary history, and historicity, applying critical method even to Torah literature.

The changing profile of the biblical field has implications for the future of Jewish biblical scholarship that are hard to predict. The founders of Jewish biblical scholarship had acquired much of their learning in Europe. The scholars who trained the current senior generation received a grounding in Jewish studies in seminaries. The experience of both groups differed significantly from that of more recent scholars whose background is more pluralistic. Precisely because the Jewish approach is not self-evident, and training in rabbinics and Talmud is not as strong, the newer crop has worked harder to articulate the ways in which their work is distinctively Jewish. At the same time the newer generations come with new disciplines and approaches, thereby moving the study of Bible beyond literary and historical criticism, and comparative philology. "Biblical archeology" has declined in popularity. The need to articulate the theoretical basis of one's approach became itself a trend beginning in the 1970s. Some of the newer approaches including ideological criticism, structuralism, deconstruction, and narrative criticism have come from comparative literature. Several younger Jewish scholars have also been involved in the serious application of sociological theory to biblical studies.

Jewish scholars have certainly benefited from the opportunity to study the Bible outside of departments with a Christian orientation, but the blessing is not unmixed. The earlier Christian orientation of biblical studies forced Jewish biblicists to earn degrees in the larger disciplines of text-criticism and ancient literary languages. This is no longer the case. Ironically, the attentive reading of a text as literature demands mastery of these disciplines. Fortunately, there have been countervailing trends. The American Michael Fox (b. 1940) has in particular broadened the application of Egyptology to biblical study. Jonas Greenfield (1926–1995) performed a similar service for Iranian languages. William Hallo (b. 1928), recently retired from Yale, and his student Peter Machinist (b. 1944) of Harvard have brought new sophistication to the study of the Bible in the light of Assyriology. Adele Berlin's (b.

1943) NJPS commentary on the book of Esther (2001) exemplifies the disciplined synthesis of philology, text, and historical criticism with the literary approach. In Israel, Alexander Rofé (b. 1932 in Pisa, Italy) makes extensive use of the ancient versions to combine classical source criticism with the literary-aesthetic approach. Emanuel Tov (b. 1941 in Holland) is the leading textual critic of the Hebrew Bible, and produced the indispensable Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible (first edition, 1992). He also spearheaded the completion of the standard scholarly publication of the Dead Sea Scrolls. The Hebrew University Bible Project, whose driving force was the late Moshe Goshen-Gottstein, has thus far (2003) provided the critical editions of Isaiah (1995) and Jeremiah (1997). Avi Hurvitz (b. 1936) has attempted to establish the history of biblical Hebrew on a solid linguistic basis.

In concluding this essay we turn our attention to a number of important collaborative projects, scholarly as well as popular, under Jewish sponsorship in the United States and Israel. The ongoing Hebrew University Bible Project has as its primary aim the publication, at long last, of a true critical text of the Hebrew Bible. HUBP is based on the authoritative 10th-century Aleppo Codex and its accompanying scribal notes (Hebrew: masorah). The base text is accompanied by variations attested in the Dead Sea Scrolls, the ancient translations, medieval Hebrew manuscripts, and in biblical citations in early rabbinic literature.

Several significant Israeli projects are aimed at larger audiences. In general the Israeli projects reflect the greater emphasis of Israeli scholarship on the realities of fauna, topography, and geography with which Israelis have direct experience. The Miqra' leYisra'el series (A Bible Commentary for Israel), begun in 1990, is the first multi-volume Hebrew language critical commentary on the Hebrew Bible in over fifty years. The target audience, like that of the American nondenominational Anchor Bible, is not only the scholar, but the educated nonspecialist. The members of the Israeli target audience come to the Bible with a general knowledge of its language and content. More popular is the Entziklopedya 'Olam ha-tanakh (The World of the Bible; 1982–1996), a 24-volume illustrated running commentary on the individual books of the Hebrew Bible, with particular attention paid to the realia of the ancient world in which the Bible was produced. The project combines the talents of biblicalists and archeologists with those of specialists in such areas as ancient technology, military history, and the natural sciences.

The multi-volume Da'at Miqra' series (Knowledge of the Bible) is especially intriguing. Produced by the Rabbi Kook Institute, the Hebrew volumes written between 1970 and 2001 boldly walk the narrow line between solid popularized scholarship and commitment to Orthodox beliefs. "Corroborative" archeological data and numerous illustrations orient the reader to the material world of ancient Israel and its surroundings. Parallels between biblical and other ancient Near Eastern literature are often noted. Interestingly, the commentary on Ezra which inaugurated the series in 1970 included Gentile critical commentaries in its bibliography, a feature abandoned in subsequent volumes.

As is the case with its Israeli counterpart, American Jewish biblical scholarship has not neglected the Jewish public. The JPS Torah Commentary, completed in 1996 provides the New Jewish Publication Society translation of the Torah with running semi-popular commentaries by leading Jewish Bible scholars. Periodic references to earlier Jewish scholarship and discussions of relevant postbiblical Jewish beliefs and practices provide a Jewish flavor. The continuation of the series, the JPS Bible Commentary, edited by Michael Fishbane, will cover the Haftarot, Five Megillot (or scrolls)—Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther—as well as the book of Jonah, each of which is read within the liturgical cycle of the Jewish year. The commentaries to Jonah by Uriel Simon (1999) and Esther by Adele Berlin (2001) have also appeared in Hebrew in the Miqra' leYisra'el series.

More popular works have been produced with the needs in mind of the different Jewish denominations and synagogues. American Orthodoxy is less centralized than its Conservative and Reform counterparts, so one cannot speak of an official Orthodox Bible commentary. Nonetheless, one cannot ignore the beautifully produced Artscroll Series (1976–2001) edited by Rabbis Meir Zlotowitz and Nosson Scherman. Noteworthy more as a sociological and publishing phenomenon than as a Bible commentary, Artscroll is largely aimed at Jews without strong Jewish educational backgrounds seeking what they perceive to be “authentic” Judaism. Unabashedly obscurantist, Artscroll proudly eschews data drawn from archeology, Gentile scholarship, non-Orthodox scholarship, and suspect-Orthodox scholarship. As a result, the richness of traditional and Orthodox commentary is reduced in this series to harmonization, continuous apologetic, and pietistic moralizing.

The Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) of the Reform movement produced the Torah: A Modern Commentary in 1981. Written primarily by Rabbi Gunther Plaut, who completed the work several years before he was able to get it published, the UAHC commentary is an excellent synagogue Bible, less detailed than the JPS commentary. Though now a bit dated, “The Plaut,” as it is popularly known, brings the results of scholarship through the early 1970s before a wide audience.

The Etz Hayim: Torah and Commentary edited by David Lieber of the University of Judaism was published in 2001 by the rabbinical and synagogal arms of Conservative Judaism. Long delayed, Etz Hayim’s appearance immediately generated controversy in the movement and outside of it. Although biblical criticism is taught at Jewish Theological Seminary, University of Judaism, in Conservative seminaries around the world and in Conservative Jewish day-schools, the de facto Bible in most Conservative synagogues has been the Hertz Pentateuch completed in 1936. Edited by Joseph Hertz (1872–1946), Chief Rabbi of the British Empire, this literate but apologetic commentary is theologically committed to the notion that Moses himself authored the historically accurate Torah, a notion which most Conservative congregational rabbis (though not all) had failed to dispel. As a result their congregants were shocked to learn, among other things, that the exodus from Egypt and the conquest of Canaan might have (p. 1342) “little or no historical basis.” Outside the movement some ultra-Orthodox rabbis equated Etz Hayim’s questions about the Bible’s factuality with the blood libel. A calmer perspective reveals Etz Hayim to be a highly useful digest of the JPS Torah Commentary in one volume, with the addition of homiletical comments, and notes and essays of special interest to Conservative Jews.

Thus, the status of Jewish Bible scholarship at the beginning of the 21st century is quite different from that at the beginning of the 20th century. A significant number of scholars at Israeli universities are part of the mainstream of biblical scholarship, and Jewish Bible scholars now teach in many North American academic departments that previously had strong Protestant biases. In addition, the methods of critical study of the Bible are no longer perceived as anti-Semitic, and are entering into the Jewish consciousness, even into the new Bibles used liturgically by some Jews. Jewish Bible scholarship, for its part, including concern with traditional Jewish interpretation, has likewise entered mainstream academic scholarship, and is studied by Jews and non-Jews alike. One can only ponder what further developments the coming century will bring. [s. DAVID SPERLING]

The Bible in the Dead Sea Scrolls

Until the discovery in the Judean Desert, near the Dead Sea, of more than 200 scrolls containing various parts of the Bible, historical and textual analysis of the biblical text relied on ancient translations and medieval manuscripts. The Judean Desert discoveries brought to light Hebrew manuscripts older by 1,000 years than the ones previously known, and document a period of pluriformity in the biblical text. Although no original copy of any biblical text has survived, these manuscripts not only greatly enhance our knowledge of textual features in general but also have a significant impact on central issues in biblical scholarship.

Before proceeding to a discussion of their effect on biblical scholarship, a brief aside to explain the conventional scholarly signs or sigla commonly used for Qumran and Judean Desert scrolls is in order. The elements included comprise the number of the cave (for Qumran, 1–11); identification of the site (Q = Qumran, Mas = Masada, Hēv = Naḥal Hēver); an abbreviated name of the biblical book (e.g., Gen = Genesis); number of the copy (in superscript; the first copy is ^a, the second is ^b, etc.). Other details sometimes indicated include the material on which the scroll is written (pap = papyrus), the language (gr = Greek; ar = Aramaic), the script (paleo = Paleo-Hebrew [the ancient Hebrew script]), or the literary genre (p = peshet). For example, 11QP^a is a scroll from Qumran Cave 11 and contains material from the book of Psalms. A provisional list of documents from the Judean Desert, containing text numbers, sigla, and names is found in the Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls (Oxford, 2000). For a categorized list of the biblical texts and an index list of all passages preserved in biblical manuscripts from the Judaean Desert, see The Texts from the Judaean Desert: Indices (DJD 39; Oxford 2002).

Finds

The story of the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in the mid-20th century needs no retelling. What is significant are the large numbers of biblical and especially Torah books preserved in the Judean Desert. The bulk of these mainly fragmentarily preserved biblical scrolls come from caves located near Qumran, a site occupied from ca. 150 BCE to 68 CE. Smaller numbers of scrolls were found elsewhere in the Judean Desert: at Masada, Naḥal Hēver, and Wadi Murabba'at. Of a total of 900 separate scrolls found at Qumran, 200 are biblical. At Masada, seven of the fifteen literary texts found, that is, nearly half, are biblical. Within the biblical corpus itself, proportionally more copies of Torah books were found: at Qumran they comprised 43.5 percent of the biblical corpus, and at other sites in the Judean Desert a full 64 percent of the biblical scrolls. Paleographical analysis shows that the script of the Qumran scrolls dates from 250 BCE (the earliest scroll is 4QExod^f) to the mid-1st century CE, with most of the manuscripts dating from the 1st century BCE to the 1st century CE. In addition, two types of Hebrew scripts were found at Qumran: Thirteen texts were written in paleo-Hebrew ("archaic" Hebrew, used mainly in the First Temple period and on Second Temple coins), but the overwhelming majority of the texts were written in square script (also called Assyrian or Jewish, borrowed during the Babylonian exile; used from the Second Temple period on). The non-Qumran Judean Desert scrolls were written exclusively in square script and date to the 1st and 2nd centuries CE.

The table on p. 1922 summarizes the data for the numbers of biblical scrolls found in the Judean Desert. A brief glance at the table not only reveals the prominence of Torah books in general, but also the greater popularity of specific biblical books, as evidenced, for example, by the relatively large number of copies of Deuteronomy, Psalms, and Isaiah. These latter works are also the ones most often cited in sectarian compositions at Qumran as well as in the New Testament and later rabbinic literature.

A small number of the scrolls found at Qumran contained more than a single book; thus two scrolls from Cave 4 contained Genesis and Exodus, one combined Exodus and Leviticus, and another Leviticus and Numbers. This perhaps suggests the writing of the books of the Torah on one scroll, but there is too little evidence to prove it. On the other hand, essential to any consideration of the Judean Desert finds is the rarity of a fully preserved text of any biblical work; fragmentary preservation is the rule. Most of the 200 biblical scrolls from the eleven Qumran caves contain no more than one-tenth of a biblical book; the complete Isaiah scroll (1QIsa^a) is the exception.

The table also indicates that, excluding Esther (but see discussion below), all the books of what was to become the Hebrew canon are represented in the Judean Desert corpus. Direct evidence for Nehemiah is also missing; however, as Ezra-Nehemiah was perceived as a single book in antiquity, scholars posit its presence at Qumran indirectly, from the Ezra scroll from Qumran Cave 4.

Text Type Classification

Although higher concentrations of biblical texts were found in Qumran Caves 4 and 11, almost without exception the finds in the caves are not homogeneous; thus no one cave contained the "biblical library shelf" at Qumran. Nor does it necessarily follow that a text found at Qumran was written or copied there; it is now widely held that many of the texts found at Qumran were imported from elsewhere. Thus, these finds have important implications for our general understanding of the biblical text and the canon in the late Second Temple period.

Even prior to the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, scholars were aware of the existence of more than one biblical text type. Scholarly division of biblical texts according to three main types—the Masoretic Text (MT) as reflected in medieval manuscripts; the Septuagint (LXX), the ancient Greek translation of the Bible; and the Samaritan Pentateuch (SP), that is, the version preserved by the Samaritan community—received confirmation from Qumran finds. Ancient Hebrew exemplars of each of these three later text types were found at Qumran. As they predate the above-mentioned exemplars, in speaking of these text types at Qumran, they are more aptly labeled proto-Masoretic, proto-Septuagintal, and pre-Samaritan (or harmonistic; see below). The Qumran biblical texts shed light on the formation and the relationship between these types. They do not, however, represent the full variety of texts discovered at Qumran. A quarter of all of the biblical texts discovered there cannot be assigned to a type and are best referred to as independent or nonaligned texts, raising questions about the earlier scholarly tripartite division. Some Qumran texts display distinctive orthography (spelling), morphology (grammatical word formation), and scribal practices, and it has been suggested that they represent particular scribal habits or even a scribal school of the Qumran community itself.

Proto-Masoretic Scrolls

The largest group of biblical scrolls at Qumran, about 40 percent, resembles the consonantal text in medieval Masoretic manuscripts, as documented in some of the earliest medieval codices; for example, in Codex

BIBLICAL BOOKS FROM JUDEAN DESERT FINDS

Biblical Book (some scrolls contain two books)	Scripts at Qumran			Other Judean Desert Sites
	Qumran	"Square"	Paleo-Hebrew
Genesis	19	16	3	4
Exodus	15	13	2	1
Leviticus	12	8	4	2
Numbers	5	4	1	4
Deuteronomy	30	28	2	3
Joshua	2	2		1
Judges	3	3		1
1-2 Samuel	4	4
1-2 Kings	3	3
Isaiah	21	21		1
Jeremiah	6	6
Ezekiel	6	6		1
Minor Prophets	8	8		1
Psalms	36	36		3
Proverbs	2	2
Job	4	3	1
Song of Songs	4	4
Ruth	4	4
Lamentations	4	4
Ecclesiastes	2	2
Esther	0			0
Daniel	8	8
Ezra-Nehemiah	1	1
Chronicles	1	1
Total	200	187	13	22

Leningrad (dated 1009) and the 10th-century Aleppo Codex. (Both of these codices are authoritative copies of the Bible with vocalization and cantillation traditions; all Qumran texts lack these signs, which developed in the late first millennium CE.) Some scholars prefer the label "proto-rabbinic" for this category. The high proportion of texts belonging to this type at Qumran, as opposed to the lesser representation of other text types there, evidently reflects their dominant, though not exclusive, status. The proportionate predominance of this text type perhaps reflects a crucial stage in the process that resulted in its emergence as the authoritative text (see below). Among the Qumran texts the ones that bear the most remarkable affinity to medieval ones are 4QGen^b and 1QIs^b. Other closely related texts are 4QJer^a and 4QJer^c.

Proto-Septuagintal Texts

A significant legacy of the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls is related to their attestation to the reliability of ancient translations. It is no longer possible to argue that differences from the MT preserved in the ancient translations all reflect intentional changes introduced by the translator rather than a different underlying text (Vorlage); it is clear that multiple text types circulated at the same time. One small group of texts found at Qumran, four in number, includes scrolls closely resembling the presumed Hebrew parent (Vorlage) of the Septuagint translation. Of the texts found at Qumran, 4QJer^b and 4QJer^d are closest to LXX, resembling both its shorter text and its verse arrangement. Other texts exhibiting close affinities to LXX are 4QDeut^g and 4QSam^a. Readings from the ancient translations hitherto regarded as questionable have now been shown to preserve authentic Hebrew ones.

Harmonistic Editing

A few texts are often called pre-Samaritan, since they share certain features of the Samaritan text, but lack the distinctive ideology of the Samaritans (references to Mount Gerizim, for example). This small group of five texts from Qumran—4QPaleoExod^m, 4QPaleoExod-Lev^f, 4QNum^b, 4QDeutⁿ, and 4Q364 (Reworked Pentateuch^b; see below)—is better characterized by a different feature: the presence of harmonizing alterations, that is, changes or additions that create concord between two separate but parallel Torah texts. The two texts undergoing harmonization can be contextually close, such as the addition to Exod. 7.8 based on 7.15–18, or remote, such as the two versions of the Decalogue (Exod. ch 20 and Deut ch 5). Alterations can be of different kinds: additions of a “source” for a quotation, mostly insertions from Deuteronomy to the parallel sections in the earlier books of the Torah, or provision of a missing command or its fulfillment. Harmonistic editing is also found in some nonbiblical texts from Qumran, including quotations in Reworked Pentateuch, excerpts cited for liturgical purposes, phylacteries, and mezuzot.

As compared to some of the later Qumran biblical scrolls, the Samaritan Pentateuch (SP) itself reflects a limited degree of harmonization, a fact that has bearing on the question of its dating. SP includes, in addition to harmonizing alterations, particularistic changes introduced by the Samaritans—related mainly to the sanctity of Mount Gerizim—before the destruction of the Samaritan temple on Mt. Gerizim in 111 BCE. On this basis, it appears that the specifically sectarian changes and additions now found in the SP were introduced during the 2nd century BCE to pre-Hasmonean Jewish harmonizing texts of the Torah. Although biblical texts continued to undergo harmonistic editing at Qumran, the Samaritans did not continue to update their texts with the more extensive changes attested in Qumran texts from the final two centuries of the Second Temple period.

Nonaligned Texts

The remaining texts, about 25 percent of the biblical corpus, may combine readings belonging to one or more traditional categories alongside independent variants; they are not easily assigned to a particular text type and are therefore classified as independent or nonaligned. To this group also belong the so-called vulgar (in the sense of popular) texts, exemplified by 1QIs^a, which exhibit a freer approach to the text. The scribal changes introduced into vocabulary and grammar reflect, on the whole, an attempt either to simplify the difficult biblical text, or to remove grammatical and contextual difficulties.

In addition, also related to this group are some texts of doubtful biblical nature, among them the so-called Reworked Pentateuch. This group is composed of six Hebrew manuscripts, in which a running biblical text is reworked by scribal intervention, characterized by omissions of, additions to, and rearrangements of biblical passages, and, in some cases, the introduction of nonbiblical passages as well. We must also bear in mind that no external features or headings distinguish between biblical and nonbiblical texts at Qumran. Scholars debate these texts’ classification: Some assign them to the biblical corpus, others define them as Reworked Pentateuch, whereas still others view them as nonbiblical. These texts stand on the boundary between text and interpretation.

Translations

Also of notable importance as witnesses to the development of the biblical text during the late Second Temple period are the Greek and Aramaic translations of the Bible. Among the Qumran scrolls Greek translations were found: two scrolls of Leviticus and one scroll each of Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. These texts are reliable witnesses to an early stage of the transmission of LXX, preceding the one in which revisions bringing LXX into line with MT are attested. In addition, a Greek copy of the Minor Prophets was found in Naḥal Ḥever (8J.levXII); it belongs however to the latter type, being the earliest extant revision bringing LXX into line with MT (mid-1st century BCE). Aramaic Targumim, of lesser importance than LXX as witnesses to an early stage of the Hebrew biblical text, were also found at Qumran. The oldest extant Targum texts (to Lev, 4QtgLev; and Job, 4QtgJob and 11QtgJob) are extremely literal in contrast to the exegetical expansions characteristic of later Targumim.

Quotation and Use of Scriptures

Other biblically related texts found at Qumran, which will not be discussed at length here, are excerpted and abbreviated texts probably used for liturgical purposes, such as phylacteries (tefillin) and mezuzot. (There is a significant amount of variation in the texts found in these, and many do not agree with the later rabbinic prescriptions concerning their content.) Texts such as 4QExod^d which contains Exod. 13.15-16 and 15.1, and 4QDeut^a where Deut. ch 8 precedes Deut chs 5-6, also belong to this category. Also found in Qumran texts, both sectarian and nonsectarian, are free quotations of and allusions to biblical texts. Another genre found at Qumran, peshet, also incorporates biblical quotations. The works in question take selected biblical texts and apply them to the contemporary sectarian setting. From the formal viewpoint they resemble later medieval commentaries; the basic structure includes citation of a biblical text (the lemma), an introductory formula containing the word peshet (actualized interpretation), and the interpretation, which is an application of the text to a contemporary reality typically unrelated to its original context. Thus the lemmata of the pesharim also serve as witnesses to the biblical text of the mainly prophetic books they interpret. In some cases, more than one text to the same verse seems to be interpreted. In other cases, the biblical lemma may have been changed to fit the peshet interpretation. In addition to these obvious uses of biblical texts, there are, scattered throughout the sectarian writings of the Qumran community, many allusions to and citations of biblical verses or parts of verses. The Qumran community was "Bible-centric"; its literature was saturated with biblical phrases.

Literary Development and Textual Transmission

Higher Criticism

Of the contributions made by the discovery of the Qumran scrolls, one of the most telling belongs to the realm of higher criticism (see "Modern Study of the Bible," pp. 2084-96). The scrolls brought to light unambiguous witnesses to textual differences belonging to earlier stages of the literary growth of various biblical books; before their discovery, these differences were only attested indirectly, especially in the ancient translations or versions. The discovery of the Qumran scrolls has had a particularly significant impact on our understanding of the text of Judges, Samuel, Jeremiah, Esther, and Daniel. The examples below demonstrate how Qumran texts bear witness to what is believed to represent an earlier editorial stage of a biblical work. Qumran texts also support hitherto unattested variants or different readings found in LXX. Additionally, some texts found at Qumran are believed to represent possible sources for biblical books.

Additions Not Found in MT

As witnessed by MT (and Vulgate, Syriac, and the Targum), Nahash, king of Ammon, agreed to make a treaty with the people of Jabesh-gilead on condition that he gouge out their right eyes (1 Sam. 11.1–2). In the context of these textual witnesses this seems an unusually brutal act. An additional passage preserved in 4QSam^a, which unfolds the story of how Nahash oppressed the tribes of Gad and Reuben, inflicting terror by gouging out their right eyes, and how 7,000 men escaped mutilation by fleeing to Jabesh-gilead, provides a more natural link between the election of Saul as king in Mizpah (1 Sam 10.27a) and his Ammonite campaign (10.27b). Moreover, the reading found in 4QSam^a, “it was about a month’s time” (k-m-h-d-sh), provides a more logical connection between the additional passage and the one following than MT’s “he pretended not to mind” (k-m-h-r-sh, 11.1). (In Hebrew script, d and r are almost identical and easily confused.)

Although some scholars explain the additional passage in 4QSam^a as a secondary midrashic addition, it is more likely that 4QSam^a has preserved the original reading and that MT’s reading is based on scribal error, that is, an accidental omission during an early stage of the book’s literary development or transmission. In general, the text of Samuel as reflected by MT is problematic, and LXX and the fragments discovered at Qumran reflect a better-preserved text.

Witness to an Earlier Editorial Stage

Judg. 6.7–10 is missing from a text found at Qumran, 4QJudg^a. Evidently not the result of scribal error, this omission can be seen as reflecting an earlier stage in the editing of the book of Judges. The section found in MT, in which a prophet tells the Israelites that God will save them even though they have sinned in the past, has clear parallels to vv. 11–24, in which the angel of the LORD appears to Gideon; it is also very similar to other texts found in Deuteronomy and related literature. It appears, then, that Judg. 6.7–10 was a later addition by the so-called Deuteronomistic Historian, the editor of Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, 1–2 Samuel, and 1–2 Kings, who focused on the centralization of the cult in Jerusalem.

Attestation to LXX

The organizational complexity of Jeremiah and the relationship between MT and other ancient versions, especially LXX, enhances the importance of the Qumran finds. Two of the six fragmentary manuscripts of Jeremiah found there (4QJer^b and 4QJer^d) are close in nature to the so-called original Septuagint version of Jeremiah (to be distinguished from later revisions correcting the translation to reflect MT and from Syriac, Vulgate, and the Targumim). LXX to Jeremiah differs from MT in two ways: first, in chapter and verse order; second, in the length of the text, where the Septuagint is one-eighth shorter than MT, missing words, phrases, or even entire sections. Evidently, the Septuagint was translated from a Hebrew text close in nature to these two manuscripts, which reflects a first, short edition of the book of Jeremiah that differs from the longer, differently ordered text documented in MT and other related versions. The Qumran texts support the view that LXX reflects an authentic Second Temple period variant tradition of the biblical text.

Possible Sources for Biblical Books

As opposed to the above examples, the following ones do not reflect stages in the editing of a biblical work; rather they relate to possible sources for biblical books.

Esther. As mentioned earlier, all the books of the Hebrew canon were represented among the Qumran scrolls, with the exception of Esther. The different explanations for its absence range from the vagaries of chance, to suggestions that the Qumran community did not observe the holiday of Purim and/or the book had not yet achieved “canonical” status. The exact nature of a text from Cave 4 labeled Proto-Esther (4Q550–550e) is also a matter of debate. Some identify it as an Aramaic prototype or source underlying the various Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and even Armenian versions of Esther, while others find only a general resemblance between the book of Esther and this composition, and still others argue that this text has very little in common with the Hebrew story of Esther, and is simply a hitherto unknown Aramaic text. Even if this Qumran text has no direct relationship to Esther, it is another example of a story with a Persian court setting.

Daniel. Cave 4 at Qumran contained some Hebrew and Aramaic texts exhibiting varying degrees of connection to Daniel. The most clear-cut link is that between Daniel and 4QPrayer of Nabonidus (4Q242). Long before the latter text's publication, the resemblance between the story of Nabonidus's illness while in exile at Teima and the legend of Nebuchadnezzar's madness in Dan. ch 4 was noted. The author of Dan. 4 adapted this material to his worldview, most significantly by changing the name of the king to that of the better-known one—Nebuchadnezzar—and by identifying the anonymous Jew who assisted the king with Daniel.

Another fragmentary text found at Qumran, labeled 4QHistorical Text A (4Q248), resembles Dan. ch 11. This text mentions, in an extremely condensed manner, a number of events pertaining to Antiochus IV Epiphanes, also referred to in Daniel. These chronologically arranged events start with Antiochus IV's first invasion of Egypt (170–169 BCE) and end with his second inroad into Egypt in 168. Following the last event mentioned in the Qumran text, which is the second invasion of Egypt, words parallel to Dan. 12.7 appear: "and when the shattering of the power of the ho[ly] people [. . . comes to an end, then shall all] these things [be fulfilled]." The absence of references to Antiochus's religious persecutions, as compared with ample references of this nature in Daniel (7.25; 11.30–33; 12.1), makes it clear that 4Q248's composition preceded 167 BCE. If so, this work was composed before the completion of the final edition of Daniel, commonly dated to ca. 165 BCE, and may have been part of an apocalyptic work that served as a source for this book.

Finally, another possible source for Daniel is found in the throne-theophany of the Book of Giants (4Q530, col. ii). Comparison of this text to Daniel 7.9–10 shows that the book of Daniel preserved a more expanded form of the vision.

Text Criticism

Another important aspect of the contribution of biblical Dead Sea Scrolls to biblical studies belongs to text criticism (sometimes called "lower criticism"). As opposed to the literary-historical bent of higher criticism, this field relates to the technical aspect of establishing the best readings of the wording of the text. The examples demonstrate how the scrolls enhance our understanding of the development of variants created in the course of textual transmission. On occasion the Qumran texts preserve superior readings; in other instances, they represent vulgarization of the text.

Haplography

1QIsa^a, which is the oldest manuscript of Isaiah that has been preserved, dated ca. 125 BCE, is of a vulgar or popular text type (see above). Its fifteen surviving fragments contain about forty, mostly minor, variants from MT, some of which shed light on the development of variants in the biblical text.

1QIsa^a usually has the secondary variant, that is, scribal changes and "corrections" made to proto-MT not based on ancient witnesses. Two instances of haplography (an erroneous omission of one or two identical or similar adjacent letters or words) include the omission by the original copyist of 1QIsa^a of part of Isa. 40.7–8 because of the double repetition of "grass withers, flowers fade," or Isa. 26.3–4, where 1QIsa^a has reduced the double occurrence of trust to a single one. In both these cases MT has the superior reading.

Nevertheless, 1QIsa^a also provides an example where MT's reading reflects haplography. MT (Peshitta and Vulgate) reads Isa. 40.12 as: "Who measured the waters (mayim) with the hollow of his hand, and gauged the sky with a span?" This question seems out of place in the context of a rhetorical list with negative answers. 1QIsa^a has a slightly different but superior reading: "Who measured the waters of the sea (mei yam) with the hollow of his hand. . . ." A similar reading is also attested in a paraphrase found in an apotropaic prayer, 4Q511, which reads: "Can the waters of the sea (mei rabah) be gauged in the hollow of a man's hand?"

Another original reading preserved in the Dead Sea Scrolls comes from 4QSam^a. MT to 1 Sam. 1.24 has the double reading ve ha-na'ar na'ar: "And though the boy was still very young" whereas 4QSam^a has an expanded reading: ". . . and the boy (ve ha-na'ar) [with] them. And they went before the LORD, and his father slaughtered the sacrific[ce as] it happened [every year to the LORD. And she brought the boy (ha-na'ar)]. . . ." MT reflects a case of parablepsis (or homoiarcton), that is, the identical beginning ("the boy") caused the erroneous omission of a section.

Matres Lectionis

In its most ancient form the Hebrew alphabet contained only consonants. It is well known that matres lectionis, literally "mothers of reading," that is consonants used to indicate vowel length and quality, were secondarily introduced into the text, sometimes relatively late in its development. Variants in the use of matres lectionis usually do not affect the biblical text, but in some cases they provide evidence for a different scribal understanding. Such is the case in 1 Sam. 1.24, where MT reads three bulls (parim sheloshah), while 4QSam^a reads: three-year-old bull (be par meshulash). Both MT and 4QSam^a presumably derive from the same common consonantal source: b-p-r-m-sh-l-sh, with a difference of opinion about where to divide the words. The Qumran scroll's variant seems more reasonable contextually, as the following verse refers only to an offering of one bull. When matres lectionis were later introduced, 4QSam^a (and LXX and the Peshitta) were in a better position to indicate the proper reading, while MT (Targum and Vulgate), lacking matres lectionis, have a corrupt reading.

Original Reading Preserved in a Qumran Text

4QTestimonia (4Q175) is one of the few almost completely preserved texts found at Qumran. Written on one sheet of skin (parchment), this text is a collection of quotations directly linked to each other without quotation formulas or interpretations.

A superior reading is documented in the quotation of Deut. 33.9 in 4QTestimonia. Where MT has the singular "him" following a reference to mother and father, a reconstructed reading of 4QTest restores the original parallel structure: "Who said of his father, 'I consider you not' and to his mother 'I ignore you.' His brother he disregarded, ignored his own children."

Canon at Qumran

The discoveries at Qumran, while shedding light on the pluriformity of biblical texts in the Second Temple period, do not provide the means to definitively establish which books the sect held sacred. Nor do the finds of large numbers of copies of particular biblical alongside other apocryphal (Jubilees, Enoch, etc.) or sectarian works necessarily indicate their sanctification in the eyes of the Qumran sect. Moreover, as not all of the texts found at Qumran were copied there and it is impossible to establish who wrote or copied them, we cannot determine their canonical status.

Nonetheless, the biblical scrolls found at Qumran do bear on the question of the growth of the Hebrew canon, which was, according to many scholars, fixed only at a later period. The presence at Qumran of all of the books found in the Hebrew canon (with the exception of Esther) may support the inference that these books already had canonical status. What was not yet agreed upon was the exact boundaries of the canon as well as the final textual form of the individual works. Thus it is that we find proto-Septuagintal and harmonistic texts alongside the prevailing proto-Masoretic type. In the course of less than a century after the scrolls were hidden, however, the proto-Masoretic text type emerged as the accepted one.

On the other hand, using the multiformity of the biblical texts found at Qumran as evidence, some scholars argue that the canon was not yet fixed and even postulate a broader canon. Some claim that the examples of Reworked Pentateuch reflect a free approach to the Bible. Others base their argument against a fixed canon at this date on the existence of various editions of Psalms at Qumran, including some with additional psalms (some of which are attested in the LXX and other versions), submitting that this indicates the fluidity of the collection at that time. However, many of these psalm texts may have been liturgical rather than biblical texts, and reflect a different order for this reason, just as we find a different ordering of psalms in the present-day siddur. We must also bear in mind that multiple copies of a text can testify to alternative uses: liturgical, for study, for copying, and so on. Therefore, notwithstanding the variety of text types preserved in the Qumran library, it seems that at that period the canon itself, that is, the identity and number of biblical books it encompassed, was already well on the way to becoming fixed.

The Emergence of MT as the Authoritative Text

There is no scholarly consensus regarding the history of the biblical text. Some argue for a gradual development between the 5th and 1st centuries BCE in three geographical areas: the land of Israel, Egypt, and some third locality, in all probability Babylonia. Others suggest that the Rabbis, the Samaritans, and the Christians each preserved a particular collection of biblical texts, derived from a larger variety of text forms, which were lost with the disappearance of the groups that had presumably saved them.

The presence of diverse texts and text types at Qumran led other scholars to argue for a paradigm reflecting textual variety, based on three main text types but including texts with a free approach to the biblical one. Clearly, based on the Qumran evidence, plurality of texts was the rule from the 3rd to the 1st century BCE. The additional finds from the Judean Desert document a shift in this state of affairs, however. At Masada, the much more limited number of biblical finds represents only the so-called proto-Masoretic (or proto-rabbinic) type, as is the case for the later finds from the Bar Kokhba Revolt refuge caves. This supports the view that this text type achieved authoritative status during the period between the Great Revolt and the Bar Kokhba Revolt (between 70 and 135 CE), pushing the other variants out. Thus, by the end of the Bar Kokhba Revolt, the textual pluriformity attested in the pre-destruction period gave way to the exclusive choice of the already prominent proto-Masoretic text type as binding. Thus, the destruction of the Temple and its aftermath served as a strong impetus for creating a more unified text. Given the lack of evidence for the biblical libraries in the possession of the different groups in Second Temple Judaism—with the Qumran library serving as perhaps only a sampling of biblical texts circulating among various groups—it is impossible to establish a definite link between particular groups and specific text types. The sole known exception is the Samaritan community, which chose harmonistic texts for its Holy Writings at a date preceding the acceptance of MT as the authoritative text version. It is possible that, in the absence of a tradition similar to rabbinic oral law, the Samaritans preferred a text relatively free of internal contradictions as the basis for their Holy Writings.

In sum, the discovery of biblical texts in the Judean Desert has been of inestimable value for biblical scholarship. By significantly enlarging the number of ancient witnesses to the biblical text, the finds shed light on manifold aspects of the development of the biblical canon and text as represented by MT and the other variants and facilitate better understanding of when MT emerged as the authoritative witness to the biblical text.

[ESTHER ESHEL]

The Bible in the Synagogue

During the period of the Second Temple (from the return to Zion [538 BCE] until the destruction of the Temple [70 CE]), and in particular after the conquest of the entire Near East by the armies of Alexander the Great (ca. 330 BCE), numerous upheavals occurred in the religious-spiritual world of the Jewish people. Two of the fundamental changes caused by these upheavals are important for our discussion, having left their mark on Judaism, in all places, in every era, and upon the various forms of Jewish expression, up to the present day: the growth and establishment of the synagogue, and the central role played by the Bible in the religious and spiritual existence of the Jewish people. Since then, a Jewish community without a synagogue at its center is unimaginable, nor could one conceive of a synagogue in which a central place was not reserved, both physically and in terms of its activities, for the three sections of the Tanakh: the Torah, the Prophets, and the Writings.

During the era of the First Temple (until its destruction in 586 BCE), and to some extent during the ensuing two or three centuries, the word of God was perceived to be revealed to humanity in numerous ways. First and foremost, it came through the prophet through whom God revealed His will or His plans. God also answered the people's questions, both by way of the priests, using the Urim and Thummim, as well as through dreams (see 1 Sam. 28.6: "But the LORD did not answer him, either by dreams or by Urim or by prophets"). Thus the prophet, the priest, and the interpreter of dreams served as intermediaries between God and human beings. In this respect, a major upheaval occurred when it was believed that prophecy had departed from Israel after the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi (b. B. Bat. 14b), that the Urim and Thummim had disappeared (y. Mak. 5:2), and that dreams are not divine messages from heaven but a result of human self-reflection (b. Ber. 55b). All of these methods of discovering the divine will were then replaced by texts, the Holy Scriptures. The nation of Israel became what was later termed the "People of the Book." The intermediary between God and humanity was henceforth the Rabbi, the wise man who knew how to read Scriptures and to hear through them God's voice. Instead of one-time divine revelations through dreams or prophets or priests, the Jewish people were given a book which was understood to contain God's revelation for all time. The era of revelation to individuals at appointed times came to a close, and was replaced by a new era with continuous revelation for all, by way of the Holy Scriptures. From this point on, the religion and culture of Israel developed around the twenty-four books of the Tanakh: in Houses of Study and in schools, at particular events such as eulogies or festive religious celebrations, but first and foremost in the synagogues.

It would appear that, as the prestige of the Temple began to decline, the need to continue hearing the word of God was among the central factors leading to the ascent of the synagogue as an institution, or perhaps even to its creation. Parallel to the sacrificial service which was practiced in the Jerusalem Temple only, it became necessary to create an institution in which Jews, wherever they might be, could gather on special occasions, to listen together to the word of God and to discover what it implies (as is described in the Bible itself, in Neh. ch 8). In the course of time these gatherings became formalized in fixed, obligatory forms, but the exact process through which they took shape is for the most part unknown, due to the dearth of extant sources from the Second Temple period. However, aided by the Jewish philosopher Philo (De Somnis 2:127), by the historian Josephus Flavius (Against Apion 2:175), and by early Christian literature (Acts 15.21), we can pinpoint some early stages of this process in the 1st century CE, though the origin of the synagogue may be several centuries earlier. We may reasonably assume that slowly and gradually, the idea of the synagogue began to crystallize. That which eventually coalesced during the period of the rabbinic Sages (from the first century CE until the Islamic conquest [ca. 640 CE]) attained its ultimate form in the geonic period (which ended just beyond 1000 CE). It was at that time that the first Jewish prayer books were compiled. Despite all the social and cultural metamorphoses that the Jewish people have undergone subsequently, the position of the Bible in the synagogue has remained basically unchanged. There are regular readings from the Torah, fixed readings from the Prophets, reading of the Five Scrolls on specific days, explication of Scriptures during or close to their public reading, including their translation into different languages, and extensive use of Scripture in the liturgy. Liturgical use includes the recitation of various psalms, reading of additional scriptural excerpts such as the Song of the Sea (Exod. ch 15) or the story of the binding of Isaac (Gen. ch 22) in the daily morning prayer, recitation of piyyutim (liturgical poetry) that draws on Scripture in various ways, as well as extensive use of biblical Hebrew and its expressions within the prayers (see "The Bible in the Liturgy," pp. 1937–48).

Reading from the Torah

According to a tradition recorded in the Talmud (b. B. K. 82a), a custom had already been established during the time of Moses—and later re-affirmed by Ezra the Scribe—to read from the Torah every Monday, Thursday, and Sabbath, so that the Jewish people would not remain without Torah for three consecutive days. This tradition, even if it cannot be substantiated, confers great antiquity and considerable importance on the custom of reading from the Torah. It seems likely that initially people gathered for the reading and study of selected sections of the Torah on festivals or other special days, but that during the Second Temple period the custom of a weekly reading from the Torah, in order, from beginning to end, was gradually established.

The reading of the Torah in most Jewish communities (at least until the 19th century, when some modern movements introduced changes) follows the custom consolidated by Babylonian Jewry during the period of the Sages and the geonim. There is some indication that this custom originated in the land of Israel, but even if this is so, it was the Babylonian Jewry that granted it pivotal status. According to this custom, the Torah is read in an annual cycle, divided into 54 fixed sections, called "parashiyot" (singular: "parashah"). The full parashah is read in the synagogue on Sabbath morning, between the Shaharit and Musaf prayer services. On Sabbath afternoon (during the Minhah service) and during Shaharit on Monday and Thursday mornings, the beginning verses from the parashah that will be read in full on the following Sabbath are read. Designated sections of the Torah whose themes are appropriate are also read on special days such as festivals, Rosh Hodesh (the new moon), and public fast days, as well as other special occasions. For example, the passage describing the religious precept of blotting out the remembrance of Amalek (Deut. 25.17–19) is read on the Sabbath preceding Purim, due to the connection between Haman and the Amalekites (Esth. 3.1). Most of these special excerpts were already selected for this purpose during the rabbinic period (b. Meg. 31a–b, etc.).

The division of the Torah into 54 parashiyot (instead of the expected 52) stems from the fact that in certain years there are 54 Sabbath days. This is possible only in a leap year, which contains 13 lunar months, and even then provided that hardly any festivals occur on Sabbath. (When a festival does occur on Sabbath, the passage which is read from the Torah is one associated with that festival rather than the weekly parashah.) In a year that has fewer Sabbath days, as is the case in most years, two consecutive parashiyot are joined in accordance with predetermined rules (e.g., Mattot and Mas'ei from the book of Numbers [30.2–32.42 and 33.1–36.13], or Nit-savim and Va-yelekh from Deuteronomy [29.9–30.20 and 31.1–30]), so that the entire reading will be concluded within one year and by a fixed date in the calendar. This date is the day after the Sukkot festival, which is called Simḥat Torah (Rejoicing of the Torah); on the following Sabbath, referred to as Shabbat Bereshit (the sabbath of the parashah of Bereshit, the first parashah), the Torah reading recommences with Genesis. The division of the Torah into parashiyot and the assignment of each parashah to a given week are essentially identical in all Jewish communities throughout the world. They are predictable and follow a fixed routine.

The Torah is read in the synagogue from a parchment scroll and seven (or more) people are called up to the Torah for the reading, one after the other. The parchment scroll contains the unvocalized text of the Torah without the diacritical marks (for chanting), so that the reading requires skill and preparation. In antiquity, each person called to the Torah would read his own passage (b. Kid. 49a), but as time passed, it became customary for each person called up to the Torah (who had an 'aliyah) to recite only the blessings before and after the reading, while another individual designated for this task, and who had prepared himself for it, would read the parashah. The regulations for reading from the Torah were fashioned by halakhah and custom into clear rules: the order of those called to the Torah, their number, the passages apportioned to each of them, the blessings recited by those called up, the manner in which the congregation congratulates them, etc. The blessings recited by each honoree before and after the reading are noteworthy (b. Ber. 11b). Their main emphasis is on the choosing of the Jewish People, expressed among other things, in the giving of the Torah, the "Torah of truth" with its promise of "everlasting life."

It becomes apparent that in the land of Israel during the period of the Rabbis or Sages and that of the geonim (as well as in some communities outside the land of Israel that assumed its custom), a different mode of reading from the Torah was widespread, referred to inaccurately as the "triennial cycle" (cf. b. Meg. 29b). Here, too, the Torah was read in sequence, but it was divided into a greater number of readings (called "sedarim" [singular: "seder"]). The length of each seder and the overall number of sedarim in the Torah varied from one synagogue to another. That which was read in one synagogue on Sabbath was not necessarily identical to that read on the same Sabbath in another synagogue. Moreover, even the seder read in a particular synagogue on a certain Sabbath did not have to be identical in length with what would be read in later years in the same synagogue when the same Torah portion was reached.

Each synagogue and community on each Sabbath would determine for itself the length of the Torah reading, according to its custom or requirements: the desire to honor more people with the Torah reading, the presence of a groom in the synagogue, the time available, and so forth. The earliest halakhah (m. Ber. 4:4) requires that each reader recite at least three verses from the Torah, but it does not specify the maximum number permitted. The Mishnah (ibid., 4:1) further requires that at least seven people should read from the Torah every Sabbath, but it allows additional participants. In other words, at least twenty-one verses were read on each occasion, but apparently the reading would often be extended, in accordance with the desires of the readers and their number, or in order to conclude the reading at an appropriate point, rather than in the middle of a subject. If we assume that eight or nine people read from the Torah each Sabbath, and that each of them would read about four or five verses, we can conclude that at this pace each synagogue completed its Torah reading in approximately three years. The evidence we possess (mostly from discoveries over the past century, primarily from the Cairo Genizah) indicates numerous Torah reading cycles that extended over 141–175 Sabbaths. Thus, it is also clear that it would have been impossible to set any fixed date in the annual calendar at which the Torah reading would either conclude or recommence. The festival we now call Simḥat Torah was celebrated in the land of Israel at the very most on the Sabbath on which the Torah reading was concluded, approximately once in three years, and at a different time in each synagogue because in the land of Israel there was no fixed date to conclude the Torah reading in the annual calendar.

A person attending a synagogue in the land of Israel in ancient times, who had not been present there on the previous Sabbath, could not know beforehand which seder he was about to hear. Reading over a cycle of three years resulted in a particular story in the Torah being read at one time in winter and at another in the summer; or in a legal portion such as our parashah of Mishpatim (Exod. chs 21–24) being subdivided in different ways in different years. A preacher who came to the synagogue to give a sermon on a subject arising from the Torah reading and who had not previously enquired as to where the congregation stood in their Torah reading cycle would likely find himself more than surprised or even totally unprepared—a situation not entirely unknown (see Lev. Rab. 3:6). A person who wandered from one synagogue to the next would read about the birth of Moses on one Sabbath, mourn his death with another congregation on the following Sabbath, and then hear of Moses walking upon the face of the earth if he came the next Sabbath to a synagogue in the process of reading from Leviticus or Numbers. Flexible reading systems like these may possibly fit the customs of smaller congregations permanently located in one place, but it would be most difficult to utilize them to construct a national religious system extending over distant locations. This, then, would seem to be the reason why the Babylonian custom eventually won out, replacing the customs of the land of Israel in a process which reached its final stages around the 12th century. From then on, all those attending synagogue would hear the entire Torah every year, and this undoubtedly was sufficient to forcefully instill the Torah into the cultural agenda.

The Haftarah

The last of those called up to the Torah on Sabbath and festivals remains on the podium after the reading has concluded, and then reads (usually from a printed vocalized text, not a scroll) an additional portion from Scripture, taken from the Prophets. This reading is termed “haftarah” (a word that means conclusion), as it brings the readings from Scripture on Sabbath and festivals to their end.

The haftarah section is often connected either linguistically or in content with the weekly parashah, e.g., the haftarah which begins with the verse “King David was now old and advanced in years” (1 Kings 1.1) is read on the Sabbath when the passage “Abraham was old and advanced in years” is read (Gen. ch 24); or the Prophet Isaiah’s mention of the flood (ch 54) is read on the Sabbath when the story of the flood is read from the Torah. At other times, however, the haftarah has a particular connection with the occasion upon which it is read, such as the haftarah beginning with the words “Comfort, oh comfort my people” (Isa. ch 40), which is always recited on the Sabbath after Tish‘ah be’av (a day of national mourning), or the haftarah which begins “Return, O Israel, to the LORD your God” (Hos. 14.2ff.), which is read in the Sabbath preceding Yom Kippur.

It is most likely that the institution of the haftarah was created at the close of the Second Temple era, during the great dispute between the Jews and the Samaritans, the latter deeming the Torah to be holy, but not accepting the sanctity of the prophetic books. The decision to read something from the Prophets every Sabbath was apparently part of the polemic against the Samaritans, as though the Jews wished to state: The books of the Prophets are also holy, and are also the word of God, so it is appropriate to read them publicly and to recite a blessing upon their reading. The blessings recited before and after the haftarah ("... Who has chosen good prophets, and desires their words, which are spoken in truth..." "... Who has chosen the Torah and His prophet Moses and His people Israel and prophets of truth and righteousness") clearly emphasize this point. Evidence for the reading of the haftarah may already be found in the Apocrypha (2 Macc. 15:9) and in the New Testament (Luke 4:16–30). The subject is also discussed extensively in various contexts in the literature of the Sages (e.g., m. Meg. 4:1–3; 3:5–6).

It seems that initially the choice of passage to be read from the Prophets and its precise length was made by the reader of the haftarah himself (called the maftir), or according to the custom of his congregation. As time passed, however, these readings also became formalized, attaining permanent status. Here, too, halakhah and custom brought about orderly, fixed lists of haftarot. But certain differences are notable even today among the various communities of the Jewish people—Ashkenazic, Sephardic, Yemenite, and Italian Jews—being the heritage of those flexible and dynamic times in antiquity. Needless to say, in ancient times in the land of Israel, where the extent of the Torah readings was irregular and flexible, there were numerous alternative customs for the haftarot. (A modern commentary on the haftarot is Haftarot: The Traditional Hebrew Text with the New JPS Translation, commentary by Michael Fishbane [Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society, 2002].)

Thus, with regard to the manner in which reading from the Torah and the haftarah were consolidated, the land of Israel and Babylonia reveal two opposite conceptions concerning uniformity and permanence, the quantity of Torah and prophetic readings to which the synagogue congregation was exposed on Sabbath and festivals, and the total annual extent.

The Five Scrolls

On five occasions during the year, one of the five scrolls is read in the synagogue: The Song of Songs (during the week of Passover); the Scroll of Ruth (Shavuot); Lamentations (Tish'ah be'av); Ecclesiastes (during the week of Sukkot); and the Scroll of Esther (Purim). Evidence shows that during the geonic period some parts of the scrolls were also read on the Sabbaths prior to these occasions, in preparation for them.

The reading of the Scroll of Esther on Purim appears to be the most ancient of all (see m. Meg. 1:1). This is self-evident, since the whole story of the origin of Purim is contained in this scroll. The second scroll to be introduced into the synagogue would appear to be Lamentations, which relates to the story of the destruction of the Temple. Evidence of its recitation on Tish'ah be'av may already be found in the writings of the Sages (e.g., Lam. Rab., petihta 17). The other three scrolls, which are read on the three pilgrimage festivals, apparently were not read liturgically in the synagogue until the end of the period of the Sages, or even until the geonic period (see Tractate Soferim 14:3). An adequate explanation has yet to be offered as to why a certain scroll is read on a given festival. The links between the scrolls and the festivals on which they are recited are vague and mainly of a homiletic nature. Apparently, once Esther and Lamentations came to be read in the synagogue, because of their close ties with the occasions on which they were read, a need was felt to grant the other three scrolls a similar status. Thus, for reasons we cannot fully discern, they slowly entered the world of the synagogue. The result was that those attending synagogue on the three festivals were exposed to all portions of Scriptures (Torah, Prophets, Writings), which marked the synagogue activities in an especially vigorous and emphatic manner.

The Bible in "The Literature of the Synagogue": Translation, Sermon, Piyyut

The regular reading of Torah, Prophets, and the Scrolls served as a permanent basis for relating to Scriptures within the framework of synagogue life. We can point to three types of literary activities which accompanied the Bible as it reached the synagogue congregation (as noted, besides the prayers): (1) translation of Scripture into the vernacular (in the ancient context, primarily into Aramaic); (2) homilies and explication of the passages read; (3) extensive use of their themes and content for composition of piyyutim (liturgical poems).

The Translation

Once part of the synagogue congregation had a limited command of Hebrew, and especially once the Rabbis began to find multiple and varied halakhic and aggadic meanings in Scriptures, it became impossible to separate the reading of the holy texts (the Torah and probably the haftarot and scrolls as well) from their fixed companion: the translation into Aramaic (in its various dialects) in the land of Israel and Babylonia, or into Greek in Hellenistic centers such as Alexandria. The Aramaic translations (the Targumim), as described below, preserved the vitality of the ancient texts and prevented them from becoming merely a fossilized heritage of the past (regarding the translation of Scripture, see also "Jewish Translations of the Bible," pp. 2005–2020).

Based on the sources (e.g., m. Meg. 4:6), it appears that next to the readers of the Torah a man stood translating the reading into Aramaic: the meturgeman (translator). The reader and the translator alternated, verse following verse (but in the haftarah several verses could be translated together). They were required to respect each other by not beginning to speak before the other had concluded his words (b. Sof. 39b). This ensured that there was no overlap or confusion between the Torah text and its translation. The meturgeman may possibly have been a professional who earned his living from this work, but he could also have been a learned member of the congregation who knew how to fulfill the religious duty of translation.

In the same way that there was a difference between the land of Israel and Babylonia regarding the customs of Torah and haftarah readings, there was a difference concerning the translations into Aramaic that were customary in both places. The Targum that was customary in Babylonia (Targum Onkelos on the Torah and the Targum by Yonatan ben 'Uzi'el on the Prophets) tended to be a literal translation, adhering as closely as possible to the biblical text. In passages containing poetry (such as Gen. ch 49), in ambiguous verses, and in a few other cases, the Babylonian Targum permitted minor additions or even deviations from the Scriptural source, for exegetical or theological purposes, such as the removal of what seemed to be contradictions in the biblical text and anthropomorphic expressions relating to God or the need to preserve the honor of the fathers of the nation. But even more important is the fact that these two translations were the exclusive, authorized translations of Scripture, and on every Sabbath those attending the synagogue would be exposed to their single, fixed text. Although there was a clear risk of monotony and routine, this was the way in which the Babylonian rabbis sought to present the biblical text to its listeners.

Such was not the practice of Jews in the land of Israel. The meturgeman wove into the words of the Torah a long series of exegetic, literary, haggadic, and halakhic traditions, remonstrations or words of encouragement for the congregation. He thus brought to their ears the biblical text, readapted and refashioned in many ways, in accordance with the intellectual competence of different congregations, current and local occurrences, and the meturgeman's own tendencies. It is also worthy to note that in the land of Israel—as opposed to Babylonia—no single biblical verse was translated in an identical, uniform manner in every place or at all times. The metur- man was permitted to choose the manner of translation that seemed proper to him, to add his own comments to the traditions he had imbibed from his teachers, to omit or to expand on words, and thus to emphasize one or other aspect of the translated text. This picture of variation and flexibility is clearly reflected in the Aramaic translations of the Torah and Prophets that have come down to us from the land of Israel. They are referred to by name, such as the "Targum Yerushalmi," "Targum Yonatan ben 'Uzi'el on the Torah" (even though its composer is not the same person of similar name who composed the Targum on the Prophets), and so on. If we recall that in the land of Israel a reading of about forty verses was deemed adequate for any occasion, it would seem that ample time remained for the meturgeman to expand on the passage. Indeed, the amount of material inserted by the meturgeman is often greater than the text itself. The translator would sometimes even weave a long poem into his translation, if he thought that it would add majesty and beauty to his words and enhance their dramatic potential (e.g., within the narrative of the Parting of the Red Sea [Exod. chs 14–15], or the Binding of Isaac [Gen. ch 22]). The aggadic traditions embedded in the various translations are frequently colorful and exciting, with a distinct educational and popular tone, and shed new light on the text that was just read. These traditions stress the importance of prayer or extol the patriarchs of the nation, describe in bold colors the days of redemption or emphasize the principle of reward and punishment, and so forth. Not only was the length of the passages read from the Torah and Prophets variable and flexible, but even the manner in which these passages were presented to the congregation by way of the Aramaic translation was constantly changing. The audience in the land of Israel could not then be lulled by feelings of familiarity and routine.

The Sermon

Besides the Torah reading and its translation, there was often a public sermon, given on various occasions, festivals, and Sabbaths, usually during the Shaharit (morning) prayer or in the afternoon, sometimes prior to the Torah reading and sometimes afterwards. The preacher, either a local sage or a guest, an elder of the congregation or one of their teachers, dealt with various and sundry topics, educational, academic, and issues of contemporary concern, according to his understanding of the task at hand.

Naturally, the sermons differed from one Sabbath to the next and from festival to festival, adding another dimension to the use of the Bible in the synagogue. In nearly every case the preacher dealt with the subject of the Torah reading, together with the haftarah or the scroll for that day, contributing his part to what the congregation had learned from the reading and its Aramaic translation.

There are thousands of literary units in the literature of the Sages, especially in midrashic literature (e.g., Gen. Rab. or m. Tanh.) that originally served as public sermons offered prior to scriptural readings. These literary units demonstrate the remarkably rhetorical character of the public sermon, relating various topics that would be of concern to its audience: the reason for suffering, the nature of religious life without the Temple, relations between Jews and Gentiles, the difficulty of observing the commandments, the hope for redemption, and others. Such sermons were studded with innumerable biblical verses, together with their explication, so that the realm of Scriptures was broadened to include excerpts from texts that were not read on that Sabbath or festival.

In the land of Israel—but seemingly hardly ever in Babylonia—the preachers would often expound on an issue arising from the biblical reading, through the use of a widespread literary pattern referred to as petihta (usually translated as "proem"). According to this pattern the preacher would first choose a verse from the Prophets or the Writings, a verse that appeared to have no connection whatsoever with the topic in the Torah, haftarah, or scroll read that day. He would then spiral from this verse, from topic to topic, until he arrived at the opening verse of the reading and by that gave closure to his sermon. This pattern, which connected two unrelated verses, allowed the preacher to illuminate different issues while piquing the congregation's curiosity. The listeners knew from the outset what the preacher's concluding verse would be, and they must certainly have attempted to surmise how the preacher would eventually make the connection between the opening and the concluding verses of his sermon. The choice to open the sermon with verses from books that were usually not read in the synagogue (those Prophets that were not used as haftarot, the book of Proverbs, the book of Job, etc.) was another way to expose all portions of Scripture to the synagogue congregation, and to emphasize that the entire Bible is interconnected. On Sabbath and festivals they would then read from the Torah and the Prophets, and would hear a sermon based to a large extent on the Writings. Thus all portions of Scripture would be reviewed once again, and the audience would see the full extent of Scripture.

The Piyyut

Piyyut refers to the poetical religious compositions, nearly all in Hebrew, recited in liturgical contexts in the synagogue or outside it, such as at wedding ceremonies or at festive meals. These compositions maintain the various characteristics of poetry in general, such as rhythm, meter, refrains, and acrostics of various kinds.

During the era of the Sages and the geonic period, the piyyut blossomed primarily in the land of Israel, mainly for use in the synagogue. The piyyutim were not composed as adornments for the prayers or as supplements to them, but rather, first and foremost, as lyrical alternatives for the fixed and obligatory prayers. If the congregation or its leaders desired, the standard prayer would be recited by the cantor in prose (as it is recited to this day), but if they wished to vary the expression of their feelings through a piyyut, this option was also open to them. For this reason hundreds and even thousands of piyyutim were composed by many poets, only some of whom are known to us by name: Yose ben Yose (4th to 5th century); Yannai (5th to 6th century); Rabbi Elazar Ha-Kalir (6th to 7th century); and others. Those attending synagogue could occasionally hear, for example, a one-time lyrical substitution for the 'Amidah or for the blessings enveloping the reciting of the Shema. At times, the poet was accompanied by a small choir, contributing a further dimension to the experience the piyyutim brought with them.

Since the piyyut was essentially a lyrical substitute for prayer, its themes were primarily drawn from that realm, but it appears that the poets frequently dealt as well with the topics of the Torah reading, the haftarah, or, when appropriate, one of the five scrolls. Thus we can also view their words as a kind of poetic sermon on the themes associated with that day. For example, through his poetic substitute for the second blessing of the 'Amidah, the blessing of "He who revives the dead," the poet could relate in his own way to the story of the Binding of Isaac, who according to a rabbinic tradition was slain by Abraham, but revived; or through his poetic version of the blessing before reciting the Shema, the blessing of "Who creates the heavenly lights," he could relate to the story of the creation of the world and the heavenly lights in his own way. Within the piyyutim, the poet was also permitted to introduce explicit quotations of verses from the entire Bible, as many did. Since the number of poets and piyyutim was virtually unlimited, the person listening to them in the synagogue could on nearly every occasion sample another new composition, different from those he recognized, and in this way he would also come to know many varied scriptural passages.

As time went on, and in no small part due to the opposition of Babylonian Sages to the use of the piyyut in the synagogue, the status of the piyyut as a substitute for prayers was reduced to a mere embellishment, recited in various Jewish communities primarily on Rosh Ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur, and in a minority of congregations on festivals and other occasions as well. We see, therefore, another example of the triumph of the Babylonian view over that of the land of Israel in regard to the reading of Scripture in the synagogue and to matters associated with it (Targum, sermon, and piyyut).

Conclusion

It is difficult to know whether on any given Sabbath or festival, the Targum, sermon, and piyyut would all have been heard together in the synagogue. It would seem logical that when one was expanded, the others would have been curtailed. But needless to say, the existence of these three components in proximity to the scriptural texts that were read in the synagogue made Scripture into a magnet, which attracted various literary forms through which it was presented to the community.

No synagogue lacks a central and impressive place designated to house the Torah scroll(s), or a special spot assigned for the reading of the Torah, haftarah, and the five scrolls. There is no Sabbath or festival when the congregation does not hear portions of Scripture, as the focus of synagogue activity and its climax. In the light of what we have seen, there is no way whatsoever to comprehend the history of the synagogue and what was taking place within its walls without fully comprehending that the foundation of all synagogue activity is the Bible.

[AVIGDOR SHINAN]

The Bible in the Liturgy

For much of Judaism's history, one of its central means of liturgical expression has been the traditional rabbinic prayerbook or Siddur. The Siddur (understood in the sense of prayerbooks from many times and places) deserves close attention when considering the role of the Bible in Jewish religious thought and practice, since biblical texts figure prominently in it. While the reading, translation, and interpretation of biblical texts in the synagogue are also integral parts of Jewish liturgical practice, they receive attention elsewhere in this volume (see "The Bible in the Synagogue," pp. 1929–37); this article concentrates on biblical texts found in the Jewish prayers.

The word siddur ("order") refers to the established "order [of prayer]" in any prayerbook. Such "orders" were created from as early as the 9th century CE, and efforts to create a standard book continued during the succeeding centuries, but there is no "standard" Jewish prayerbook. Nevertheless, those in use contain certain common elements, and these form the basis of this discussion.

The prayers described here are those recited in the morning, afternoon, and evening on a daily basis. They consist primarily of the Shema (Deut. 6.4–9; 11.13–21; Num. 15.37–41, recited morning and evening), with its introductory and concluding benedictions; the weekday 'Amidah ("standing prayer") with its nineteen benedictions of praise, entreaty, and thanksgiving; and a set of varied items that are prefixed and appended to these two central pieces. Brief reference is also made to the Sabbath and festival prayers, which abbreviate some of the central weekday prayer-texts and expand others to take account of the special nature of these days, and to communal, domestic, and personal rituals that have gradually been incorporated into the medieval and modern liturgies. The essay focuses on how the rabbinic tradition relates to the Bible and how the prayerbooks of the various periods engaged the problem of this relationship. There are sections on the language and theology of the prayers vis-à-vis their biblical connections, and on some of the best known biblical passages included in the liturgy. The importance of mysticism and the needs of contemporary prayer also feature briefly.

Is Jewish Liturgy Biblical?

Biblical texts are so prominent in many parts of the Siddur that the immediate impression is that the Jewish liturgy is borrowed directly from the Tanakh. A mere glance at the traditional prayers confirms that the language is predominantly Hebrew, that the theology rings biblical bells, and that the relationship presupposed is that between God and Israel. Following biblical models, gratitude is expressed, praise offered, and supplication made, and there is no lack of special requests for divine assistance in matters mundane as well as spiritual. The names of biblical heroes frequently occur and topics such as sacrifice, Temple, priest, and Levite are also to be found. Yet it must be emphasized that the quotations and citations of the Bible in liturgy are not fully representative of the Bible. For example, the reason why a verse such as Ps. 51.7, "Indeed I was born with iniquity; with sin my mother conceived me," was not included is perhaps because it was regarded as too close to Christian notions. Liturgical tradition does not favor the rather complex notions of theodicy and retribution found in Job. Thus, although the use of the Bible in the liturgy is extensive, it is also selective. There is a partial tendency to favor late biblical texts that are closer temporally and conceptually to rabbinic theological notions.

The index to the use of the Psalms appended to the edition of the Anglo-Jewish Authorised Daily Prayer Book, edited by Simeon Singer and first published in London in 1890, indicates that no less than 74 out of a total of 150 biblical psalms occur in the context of the standard prayers. Might we not suppose that the Siddur is the direct continuation of trends represented by Abraham's entreaty for Sodom (Gen. 18.23–25), Jacob's bargaining with God (Gen. 28.16–22), Moses' request for the healing of Miriam (Num. 12.13), Samson's appeal for vengeance through his death (Jud. 16.30), Hannah's prayer for a child (1 Sam. 1.10–16), the Temple ritual, and the composition of psalms? Some of the roots of the Jewish prayers are indeed to be found in the biblical soil, but historical accuracy forces us to draw a distinction between the notions of "liturgy in the Bible" and "the Bible in Jewish liturgy." Both historically and thematically, the story is a more complicated one.

Pre-rabbinic Traditions

The biblical passages just cited, and many similar to them, indicate that the earliest biblical sources provide later Jewish practice with the inspiration for personal, improvised prayer, in prose format, with patterns using common speech forms. This type of prayer constituted a democratic and egalitarian way of approaching God, not at all similar to the formal, sacrificial cult of the Jerusalem Temple. During the Second Temple period, the tendency developed to link the personal prayer and the formal liturgy. From prayers incorporated into Hellenistic apocryphal and pseudepigraphical sources, it is apparent that there was an increasing number of benedictions, hymns and praises, mystical formulations of considerable variety, a concern for the absorption of Torah knowledge, and a growing use of the Temple precincts on special liturgical occasions.

The Hellenistic Jewish authors Philo and Josephus make clear that Jews prayed and studied in various contexts, at times with priestly guidance and involvement, especially on the Sabbath, and that biblical texts played a part in such rituals. Though unquestionably devoted to the Temple cult in the 2nd century BCE, ben Sirach (author of the Wisdom book of that name, also called "Ecclesiasticus") linked Torah and wisdom with prayer. He also used words and phrases that are essentially biblical but take on special forms and meanings. The Qumran scrolls provide clear evidence of a practice, at least among some groups, to recite regular prayers at specific times. Some of these were linked to the calendar, some to special events, and some to penitential themes, but there is no obvious consistency of text and context.

Rabbinic Innovation and Development

Rabbinic prayer incorporated material from a broad set of prayer traditions known at Qumran, as well as from various other contexts of the Second Temple period, among them the Temple, the priesthood, communal gatherings for Biblical readings (ma'amadot), pietistic and mystical circles with eschatological and angelological interests, and popular practice. Among the themes that they shared with earlier Jewish groups were the election of Israel, the status of Zion, the holiness of Jerusalem, the return of the Davidic dynasty, and the manifestation of God's great power now and in the future. The Rabbis imposed upon inherited traditions a fresh order, style, and distinctive formulation, and they transmitted them in oral form until the compilation of the first written texts of the Siddur in the 9th century. They absorbed the earlier elements but effectively created a new structure that represented a formal liturgy. In essence, this constituted a collection of personal prayers and benedictions, which had been given a communal flavor and dimension, and a preferred synagogal context.

There was never total agreement about the precise place of prayer in the theological hierarchy of Judaism, but there certainly existed a universal consensus about the need for the observant Jew to pray. As the rabbinic tradition progressively committed its liturgical traditions to short and simple codices, to larger and more elegant manuscripts, to printed volumes, and ultimately to the contemporary formats of photocopies and digitized images, so the Siddur grew in its independence, authority, and centrality for the practitioners of the faith. Use of the Bible was always part of these developments but found its expression in the traditional Jewish liturgy in a number of interesting and novel ways.

By the time that the talmudic Rabbis of the early common era were debating the matter of the inclusion of biblical verses and chapters in their standard prayers for daily, Sabbath, and festival use, a number of these verses were well established by popular tradition within the liturgical context. Minor examples are the sets of verses that were included in the Musaf ("additional") 'Amidah for Rosh Ha-Shanah and illustrated the three themes of kingship, remembrance, and shofar (ram's horn) that stand at the center of that prayer. More common and more major examples are the Shema, the Ten Commandments, the Hallel ("praise"), the Passover Haggadah, the Song at the Sea, the Priestly Benediction, and the Kedushah, and these will shortly be examined in more detail. This examination will indicate that the issue of the role of biblical material in the liturgy was a lively and controversial one.

There is evidence that rabbinic formulations were regarded as preferable to biblical precedents, and that biblical verses were to be differentiated from rabbinic prayers (y. Ber. 1:8, 3d). Could, for instance, the verses from Isa. 12.6 and/or Ps. 22.4 be employed at any point in the Kedushah benediction of the 'Amidah without valid halakhic objection being raised? The early Rabbis sometimes even made changes in liturgical formulations out of polemical considerations. A good example is the use of the biblical Hebrew word 'olam (meaning "world" as well as "eternity" in postbiblical Hebrew) in such a way as to ensure that the notion of a future world was not excluded (m. Ber. 9:5). Nevertheless, the liturgical preexistence of such specific items as the Shema, and others mentioned above, provides positive proof that earlier attitudes were more tolerant concerning the direct quotation of biblical texts. Perhaps the Rabbis feared the potential influence of some groups whom they regarded as sectarian and who had opted for the inclusion of biblical texts among their prayers. The Jews whose literary works were found at Qumran, by the Dead Sea, were of such an ilk, and medieval Karaites, whose prayers were exclusively composed of biblical texts, pursued a similar liturgical philosophy. The situation among the Rabbanite Jews changed from the beginning of the Islamic period when, instead of merely a few favorite verses (such as Pss. 51.17; 84.5; 144.15) and entire Psalms (such as Ps. 145), substantial blocks of biblical verses, groups of chapters, and individual verses came to be incorporated into the traditional daily prayers, and then into the first prayerbooks. Perhaps the popular urge to include biblical selections was so powerful that the halakhic authorities had to submit to it, or perhaps the authorities determined that this attractive religious practice should not be left exclusively to the theological opposition.

The Early Prayerbooks

In the early prayerbooks, therefore, the introduction of the morning prayers by the recitation of Pss. 145–150 (called the pesukei dezimra, or “biblical verses of praise”), a custom known in earlier times, was not the only use of that biblical book. Sets of psalms made up of such chapters as Pss. 19, 33–34, 90–93, 98, 100, 121–124, and 135–136 came to be added, in different groupings according to the various rites, for use on Sabbaths and festivals. *Catena*e (“chains” or selections) of verses were similarly used to preface the central liturgy. They included late biblical passages from 1 Chron. chs 16 and 29 and from Neh. ch 9, as well as from a variety of Torah, prophetic, and Kethuvim books. They were often strung together by a common theme such as God’s salvation and protection or His gifts, including the revelation of the Torah. As the prayerbook and the synagogal ritual became progressively more formalized in the high and later Middle Ages, other biblical texts were introduced. An examination of the earliest known versions of the “grace after meals,” for instance, reveals that some rites were eager to conclude the body of each benediction with a biblical verse while others preferred to restrict the content to rabbinic formulations. In later texts of the same prayer, the passages appended to the final benediction include a significant number of biblical verses, especially at the conclusion.

Conscious as they were of these tendencies and of the need to stress that rabbinic Judaism was not in any sense rejecting the Bible in favor of the Talmud, leading scholars such as Saadia ben Joseph, the rabbinic leader (gaon) in the 10th-century Babylonian center of Sura, and Maimonides, his counterpart in 12th-century Cairo, made statements on the matter. Saadia (in his introduction to the Siddur) attempted to demonstrate that all the rabbinic prayers were merely formulations of liturgical genres that already appeared in the Bible. Maimonides, for his part, argued (in his code, Mishneh Torah) that it was only because the Jewish people’s knowledge of Hebrew had deteriorated severely after the Babylonian Exile that they could no longer be left to their own liturgical devices, but had to be guided by being provided with rabbinic structures. Thus, these two leading authorities set about merging the two major sources of Judaism, the Bible and the Talmud, in theological terms, just as this had been achieved by practical religious custom in the ritual context.

Medieval Additions

It was decided that when the worshippers entered the synagogue, they should recite verses from such sources as Num. 24.5 (“How fair are your tents, O Jacob”) and Pss. 5.8 (“I, through Your abundant love, enter Your house”), 26.8 (“O LORD, I love Your temple”), 55.15, 69.14, and 95.6. Similarly, biblical verses were added when the Torah scroll was taken out of the Ark for public reading, and when it was returned to the Ark. Some of these verses did not even appear in the text of the prayerbook until well after the invention of printing. The most common of these on a weekday were Num 10.35 (“Advance, O LORD”) and Isa. 2.3 (“Come, Let us go up to the Mount of the LORD”) before the biblical reading, and Ps.

148.13–14 (“Let them praise the LORD”) and Num. 10.36 (“Return, O LORD”) after it. Among other verses introduced in connection with the synagogal use of the Torah scroll were Pss. 86.8 and 132.8–10, Prov. 4.2 and 3.16–18, Lam. 5.21, and Deut. 4.35. Many of these make no direct reference to the Torah (e.g., Prov. 4.2, “I give you good instruction”), but were understood by postbiblical Judaism as referring to the Torah. Later (more voluntary) additions to the conclusion of the formal service were the Binding of Isaac (Gen. ch 22) and the Manna (Exod. ch 16). One of the contributions of the early modern mystics was to champion the recitation of the entire Song of Songs as an introduction to Friday evening prayers and to follow that by the recitation of Pss. 95–99 and 29 and of Prov. 31.10–31 before the Sabbath meal. The early Reform movement was more attached to biblical passages than to rabbinic texts, and they consequently removed the rabbinic benedictions that talmudic tradition had attached to the reading of the lectionaries and to the recitation of such items as Hallel.

The Language of the Liturgy

The Hebrew of the Siddur is very reminiscent of its biblical counterpart but by no means identical with it. The basic vocabulary and phraseology of praise and supplication is borrowed from Psalms, and there are occasionally linguistic usages that are characteristic of biblical rather than rabbinic Hebrew. The overall style, syntax, and linguistic flow are, however, very much dependent on rabbinic literature, and there is no doubt that the early talmudic leaders were anxious not to confuse the two forms of the language. Perhaps one of the ways in which rabbinic Judaism created its own identity was by rejecting a preference for the biblical Hebrew style in the formulation of its traditions and committing itself to its own linguistic usage.

Throughout its history of almost two millennia, the language of rabbinic prayer underwent a long and complicated development from a format that may well have been oral in origin, through a process of literary improvement and linguistic selection, toward the establishment of independent parameters. It achieved a status that ultimately exercised a formative influence on the reemergence of contemporary, spoken Hebrew in the modern period. The process was always accompanied by a tension between those who were anxious to reforge the link with the Bible and those who saw the need for the language of rabbinic prayer to grow independently, whatever its deepest roots. The “bibilicizers” of each generation made their stand. They fought off the challenges of Greek, Aramaic, and later vernaculars and expressed preference for wording the prayers in a style that followed the biblical precedent more closely. When the ben Asher text of the Bible became the standard in the second millennium CE, it was their circles that fought valiantly to apply its principles to the language of the liturgy. They were not averse to the employment of strange strategies to achieve their aims.

The 16th-century Polish rabbinic scholar Solomon Luria argued that the Sabbath day should be termed shabbat and not manoah in Hebrew, because Manoah in the Bible is not used for “rest” but as the name of Samson’s father, about whom the Talmud makes derogatory remarks. Similarly, the verse in Num. 24.5 should not be used in the synagogue because it originates in the words of the Gentile pseudo-prophet, Balaam. Though leaving an impact, particularly at times and places that had a need for a stronger identification with the Bible (as, for instance, in Central and Western Europe immediately after the Reformation or during Jewish emancipation), their efforts were neither intended nor destined to remove parts of the rabbinic liturgy from their place in traditional Jewish literature. Such a result was achieved only by the nontraditional movements beginning in the late 18th and early 19th centuries.

The Theology of the Siddur

A similar situation pertains to the theology of the Siddur. The common prayers undoubtedly reflect, for example, the religious ideology of rabbinic Judaism. They reflect postbiblical, rabbinic notions of the world to come. The divine authority of Oral Torah is presupposed in many contexts, and the obligation to perform the 613 mitzvot (religious precepts), as formulated by rabbinic interpretation, underlies various texts. There is a conviction that goodness will be rewarded and evil punished and that repentance brings forgiveness. The study of Torah makes its appearance both as one of the observant Jew's duties and in the form of texts that are cited from rabbinic literature. Torah study is so successfully welded into the body of the prayerbook that it is effectively treated as liturgy rather than education. The ideology underlying its inclusion is that the absence of the Temple ritual prescribed in the Torah (since the Temple was destroyed) can be compensated for by the recitation of the biblical and talmudic passages that describe its detailed requirements (so b. Ta'an. 27b).

Having first been formulated in the period following the destruction of the Temple, the expulsion from the holy city of Jerusalem, and the loss of the independent Jewish homeland, the rabbinic prayers lay powerful stress on Israel's appeal to God for the restoration of these religious and national symbols. Much is made of God's choice of Israel for a special religious role, and there are polemical undertones in some prayers that appear to be aimed at Christianity or Islam. At the same time, there is an enthusiasm for the "righteous proselyte" and a fervent hope (following biblical eschatological models) that the whole world will ultimately come to recognize God's sovereignty. The ultimate redemption, like that of Israel from Egypt, will be an impressive manifestation of God's power and will include the arrival of the Messiah and the resurrection of the dead. The assumption is frequently made that the worshipper can enjoy a close relationship with God and that practical matters in human life require God's blessing for them to flourish. Formal catechisms are not a feature of rabbinic prayer although there are certainly texts such as the Shema that include the relevant theological principles. A poetic summary of Maimonides' "Thirteen Principles of Faith," known from its opening word as the Yigdal hymn, is included for recitation before formal prayer in the morning and for singing after the Friday evening service, but this is late, optional, controversial, and an exception rather than the rule. In some communities, Maimonides' thirteen principles of faith were also recited in their prose form at the conclusion of the morning prayers.

Most of the religious ideology just charted is either represented in an earlier form in the Bible or has a basis in some of its texts. Sometimes, the only change in a phrase is the adjustment of the singular to the plural to take account of the change from individual request to communal petition. The notions of a special relationship between God and Israel, of direct access to His favor, and of revelation and redemption from the divine source, are all familiar features of the biblical books. By the same token, the nature of rabbinic theodicy, eschatology, and religious law is largely shaped by ideas to be found in the Written Torah.

Shema and Decalogue

What is widely regarded as rabbinic Judaism's most famous prayer, the Shema, is in fact a section borrowed from Deut. 6.4–9, with a second paragraph from Deut. 11.13–21 and a third from Num. 15.37–41. In the Bible, these are prose passages that are not marked as prayers. In a Hebrew papyrus inscription from the 2nd century BCE named the Nash Papyrus after W. L. Nash, who purchased it in Egypt in 1903, the text of the first two verses of the Shema appears after the Decalogue in a formulation that corresponds closely to the Greek translation of the Exodus version.

Whether that papyrus is to be identified as an amulet or as a piece of liturgy, it testifies to a Jewish use of these two biblical texts as something other than a direct quotation, since they do not occur together in the Torah. Such a use was therefore being made before the earliest manifestation of either Christianity or rabbinic Judaism, and further evidence is provided by the Hellenistic Jewish writers, as well as from the Mishnaic traditions of the 2nd century CE. They indicate that both the Shema and the Decalogue had already by then a special and well-established liturgical significance, apparently because they gave expression to the most central religious ideas of the Jews. Attempts were indeed made to draw parallels between the occurrences of such ideas in the two passages.

In the case of the Shema, there appears to have been a gradual development from the use of one paragraph to the acceptance of three, and to its recitation, in some (as yet unclear) form of special chant, in both the morning and evening prayers. On the other hand, the independent status of the Decalogue led to controversy and a diminution of its liturgical function. It was once so central to liturgical use that it was often included among the biblical texts inserted in the tefillin ("phylacteries") boxes by such sects as those who lived by the Dead Sea. Later, it came to be regarded with suspicion when it was polemically cited by groups that rabbinic Judaism regarded as heretical. Their argument was that such a central liturgical use permitted the conclusion that only such parts of the Torah were authoritative. Such a challenge encouraged the Rabbis to rule against the liturgical recitation of the passage in spite of its impressive pedigree, a ruling that was widely followed at least in Babylonian Jewry. The finds from the Cairo Genizah, however, document a continuing use of the Decalogue among the Jews in the land of Israel, in a place of honor in the prayerbook just before the commencement of the Shema benedictions. Having apparently brought the practice with them from the Holy Land when they fled the Crusades, they were loath to abandon it in favor of the dominant Babylonian custom, but their rite ultimately all but disappeared. Some authorities in Spain proposed its inclusion but it was not until the early modern period that the passage was again included in the Siddur on a regular basis, and then not as an integral part of the prayers but as an appendix to the morning service for those few Jews who might wish to add voluntarily to their daily recitation of biblical passages.

For its part, the Shema was, by the end of the talmudic period, already surrounded by rabbinic benedictions and liturgical poems, and inextricably bound together with the 'Amidah' both evening and morning. (The texts of these prayers, however, were not yet fixed in this period.) Given that its recitation in the communal context might not therefore take place immediately after rising in the morning, or just before settling down to sleep at night, which had been part of the original intent (see Deut. 6.7; 11.19), a secondary use of the prayer for those purposes was adopted. Its two manifestations were referred to respectively as the "Shema of Rabbi Judah the Patriarch" and the "Shema by the Bedside" and they were inserted into the prayerbook. The custom of remaining seated for the Shema, which was initially that of the Babylonian communities, in contradistinction to the requirement to stand for the 'Amidah', was perhaps a way of expressing the conviction that rabbinic prayers still had a higher liturgical status than the recitation of Scripture. Moreover, the 13th-century controversy in Spain about whether to recite the Shema aloud or silently might again have had to do with approaches to its communal liturgical significance. The earliest Reform prayerbooks retained the Shema in Hebrew, but there were some more radical versions in which it was severely truncated. In the more recent versions produced by the progressive movements, various options are offered. Since its recitation does not require a minyan (quorum of ten men), Orthodox women's prayer groups include it in their services without major controversy.

Hallel

Tracing in the rabbinic prayerbook the fate of other pieces of Scripture that have a Jewish liturgical history going back for at least two millennia may also be profitable for seeing the overall picture. Although the word "Hallel" does occur with reference to other biblical passages, its oldest liturgical definition relates to the recitation of Pss. 113–118. Such a collection of Scripture is reported by the Mishnah to have been part of the Temple ritual during the offering of the paschal lamb (Pes. 10.6–7). Whether or not the custom is, from a critical, historical perspective, as ancient as Temple times, it was incorporated into the domestic ritual on the first night of Passover in post-Temple times, and the nature of its recitation is the subject of early rabbinic discussion. Three teachers from the tannaitic period compared its declamation with that of the Song at the Sea (Exod. ch 15), namely, responsively by prayer-leader and community, but each had a different concept of the precise form taken by such an exchange (Mekhilta of R. Ishmael on Exod. 15.1). Such a fluidity of view about the precise nature of the recitation of Hallel had its equivalent in the later rules about its use in the standard prayers. In spite of its more than respectable origins, it was limited to certain festivals, and even then with an abbreviated format for the new moon. Even with regard to the first night (or, according to some rites, first two nights) of Passover, some communities incorporated it into the synagogal services while others restricted it to domestic use in the Haggadah (the Exodus story and exposition recited at home, at the Passover seder). It was, however, important enough for a benediction to be formulated (perhaps not in early talmudic times) to precede and to follow it and, consequently, for some of the 19th-century Reform prayerbooks to allow its retention as a biblical passage but without such a benediction.

Passover Haggadah

The earliest rabbinic sources take for granted that there is a domestic liturgy on the first Passover night, but its earliest format was not lengthy. It constituted the usual festival benedictions relating to the wine and the meal, some references to the unleavened bread, the paschal lamb and the bitter vegetables of Exod. 12.8, the exposition of the passage from Deut. 26.5–8 summarizing the Egyptian bondage and the exodus, and ending with a special redemption blessing and the Hallel. This domestic celebration generated a large number of additional liturgical and pedagogical offshoots, many of them with biblical content. Already in talmudic times, the early rabbinic interpretations of the Exodus story and of the requirement to relate it (Exod. 12.26; 13.8, 14; Deut. 6.20) were incorporated and expanded, as were the references to the meal and the special foods. In the Middle Ages, the persecution of the Jews elicited a liturgical response in the form of the recitation of biblical verses calling for divine retribution, as in Pss. 79.6–7; 69.25 (and other verses in that chapter); and Lam. 3.64–66. The secular Zionists of the 20th century created novel texts that stressed the themes of springtime and of national freedom, already recorded in the Exodus story, but with a contemporary application.

Song at the Sea

Talmudic discussion of the antiphonal recitation of the Song at the Sea revolved around what the Rabbis presupposed to have been its original format in the mouths of Moses and the Children of Israel. One is led to wonder whether the authors of these comments had in mind a liturgical use in their own day. If there was such a use, it was evidently a ritual originally reserved for the Sabbath afternoon service and only in post-talmudic times made its way into the Sabbath morning and even the daily prayers. It then took a place of honor at the conclusion of the block of Psalms known as the pesukei dezimra (Pss. 145–50; see above), that linked the morning benedictions and readings with the Shema and its benedictions.

Priestly Benediction

A silver amulet dating from the 7th-century BCE contains a version of the Priestly Benediction closely resembling that recorded in Num. 6.24–26 and demonstrates that even at that early period some special liturgical significance was already attached to the benediction. It certainly played a role in the worship performed in the Second Temple, and there is no doubt that elements of priestly liturgy were absorbed into the proto-rabbinic prayers. At the same time, the extensive talmudic sources record tensions about whether priests are to retain their privileged position or are to be succeeded by the Rabbis. For the tanna' R. Simeon, it was not priesthood but a good reputation that had maintained an attractive religious standing (Eccl. Rab. 7.1.3), and a Mishnaic statement (Ber. 5:4) seems to regard the Priestly Benediction as separate from the standard prayer context. Other teachers, however, preferred a compromise to such a categorical differentiation. What is clearly attested (b. Sot. 37b–39b) are changes in the use of the divine Name, the custom of raising the hands in blessing, the nature of the accompanying ritual, and the Jewish constituency to whom the Priestly Benediction is addressed. Although biblical privileges were to a large extent retained, and the priestly genealogy and role continued to be recognized, intellectual and halakhic leadership became more democratically available.

As the rabbinic liturgy became more formal in the early medieval period, the congregational recitation of the Priestly Benediction was permitted only in restricted circumstances to the priests (that is, descendants of the priestly line who had almost no function and little status after the destruction of the Second Temple), and there were some arguments for weakening even that privilege, especially among the Jewish communities in Christian lands. The Benediction even came to be part of the biblical readings of the daily “morning benedictions” that were originally recited by every pious individual at home and were later absorbed into the synagogal ritual. The halakhic authorities in the Middle Ages generally maintained the biblical restrictions and some of the special honor that applied to the priests, but they were content to leave the matter of the restoration of their total power to the messianic age. The priests did at times mount counterattacks in attempts to restore their earlier authority but generally with only limited success. The recitation of the Priestly Benediction by the father (not necessarily a priest) to bless his children in the domestic service preceding the Friday evening meal was promoted by the 16th-century mystics and amounted to a further process of democratization. With the rise of the modern progressive movements, even those last few ceremonial roles and restrictions left to the priests were abolished in all but Orthodox communities. In the latter, there were doubts about the priestly role in the 19th and early 20th centuries, but these seem to have been widely overcome in more recent decades, as reflected in current editions of Orthodox prayerbooks.

Kedushah

Although the recitation of the Kedushah, or trisagion (Gk., “thrice holy”), from Isa. 6.3 (“kadosh, kadosh, kadosh”) is accorded importance in the Talmud, it is not clear precisely what piece of liturgy is intended by the term and on which occasions and at what time it was employed in the prayers. In the post-talmudic period, however, it was certainly used regularly in a number of different contexts in the prayers, especially together with such verses as Ezek. 3.12 (“Blessed is the Presence of the LORD”), Ps. 146.10 (“The LORD shall reign forever”), and Isa. 5.16 (“the LORD of Hosts is exalted”). It was employed in connection with the study of Torah, as well as in the prayer-leader's repetition of the 'Amidah and in the first benediction preceding the morning Shema, as a description and emulation of the angelic choir praising God. Since there are precedents in the Qumran literature, the custom might well have been transmitted by pietistic groups, at that time and later, and thus incorporated into the rabbinic liturgy. They found the close description of what they regarded as the heavenly liturgy as a mystical activity that extended their religious experience and sharpened their spiritual sensitivity.

Whether or not such groups were initially based in the land of Israel, there is a report from Pirqoi ben Baboi in the 9th century that the communities there did not recite the pre-Shema' Kedushah on a daily basis until the Babylonian Jews living in Jerusalem and some other cities created contention about its omission. In the 10th century, Saadia ben Joseph made a point of including the Kedushah only in the communal, and not the individual, context, but gradually it became the widespread custom to allow its recitation even by the individual in at least the non-'Amidah contexts. It need hardly be pointed out that the 19th-century rationalists were no happier with this mystical item than they were with any others.

Mystical Input

Later mystics also played a part in the expansion of the biblical dimension in the rabbinic Siddur. The major impact was made by those of the city of Safed in the 16th century, but they had predecessors in North Africa, Spain, and Germany two and three centuries earlier, as well as successors in Eastern Europe several centuries later. The achievement of blissful communion with God required special levels of devotion and these could be reached by the recitation of special prayers and of biblical verses. These latter were often borrowed from the Psalms, but it was not always the actual content and simple sense that was being recalled. The number, the enunciation, and the special combination of certain letters was held to have a mystical effect and the belief was that the first letter of each verse recited could contribute to this effect. If, for example, verses from Lam. 3:56, Pss. 119, 106, 122, 162, 66, and 108 were recited before the sounding of the shofar, the relevant letters (kr' stn) made up a Hebrew phrase that invited a diminution of Satan's powers. Similar uses of verses were made as additions to prayers and in amulets to protect the living and to entreat for the souls of the dead.

Psalms for Special Days

The Siddur also contains biblical chapters and verses which, though not as central as those noted earlier, were placed there for more contextual reasons. On the Sabbath, an obvious choice was Ps. 92 (see v. 1, "for the sabbath day"), on Hanukkah it was logical to opt for Ps. 30 (see v. 1, "for the dedication of the House"), the sounding of the shofar could be introduced by Ps. 47 (see v. 6), and the themes of Pss. 24, 27, and 130 matched the mood of the days before and after New Year and the Day of Atonement. Since there was a rabbinic tradition that claimed that certain psalms (Pss. 24, 48, 82, 94-95, 81, and 93) had been recited in the Temple on particular days, it was natural to follow such an alleged precedent, although it is not clear that such a ritual had been adopted in the daily version of the earliest talmudic liturgy (m. Tamid 7:4). Some authorities, such as the early medieval Seder Rav Amram, recorded objections to the tendency to extend the use of these psalms beyond the morning services.

Miscellaneous Addition of Verses

The study (subsequently no more than the recitation) of passages from talmudic literature, to which was appended a special doxology titled "kaddish," inevitably provided an opportunity of citing verses that stressed the importance of Torah and the eternal bliss its study was said to guarantee. Among such texts were Deut. 33.4, Isa. 42.21, 60.21, and Ps. 29.11. When the custom arose of inserting supplicatory prayers after the recitation of the morning Amidah, there were many verses, especially from Psalms, that were regarded as suitable for such a context, and both Ps. 6 and the Thirteen Divine Attributes (Exod. 34.6-7) were pressed into service. At nightfall, God's protection was invoked by the recitation of such verses as Pss. 20.10; 46.8; 78.38; and 84.13. Verses from Exod. ch 15 (e.g., 11 and 18) were obviously appropriate for the theme of the redemption from Egypt. The domestic rituals that preceded the Sabbath meals and marked its conclusion (kiddush and havdalah), though they began as purely popular rabbinic customs, fairly distinct from anything in the Bible, eventually attracted to themselves the addition of verses regarded as relevant to the topic or to the atmosphere.

New Prayers

One of the trends that was typical of the Jewish communities of the land of Israel in the pre-Crusader period was to follow up references to past events in the Jewish religious experience with hopes for similar developments in the future. Although such a liturgical expansion met with the opposition of those authorities who preferred the prayers to deal with one discrete theme at a time, it was broadly adopted in a number of instances, and in those cases the hope for the ideal future was tied to the citation of a biblical verse that predicted it. Examples are to be found in the various rites at the conclusion of the ge'ulah (redemption) benediction before the Amidah, the relevant verse being Ps. 147.2. Where novel prayers were introduced into the liturgy in the late medieval and early modern period, biblical verses were added to them in order to give them a more authentic flavor and an additional degree of authority. In the case of the prayer for the secular ruler, use was made of Pss. 144.10; 145.13; Isa. 43.16; and Jer. 23.6, but a glance at the total original contexts of each of these verses reveals an emphasis on God's supreme power and the ultimate kingdom of David rather than on their temporal, secular equivalents.

The English Chief Rabbinate's prayerbook of 1890 included a number of new prayers for such events as childbirth, charity collection, the house of mourning, and taking up residence in a new house, as well as some for young children to recite. All of these were richer in psalms and other scriptural quotations than they were in traditional liturgical phraseology. The same philosophy was adopted by those in the progressive movements when they formulated new pieces of liturgy for events and circumstances that had previously lacked them. Twentieth-century prayers introduced in communities of various religious hues for the State of Israel and its Defense Forces, though less biblically dominated, also incorporate such verses as Deut. 20.4 and 30.3-5, and the last part of Isa. 2.3. Here too, the earlier tension between subservience to biblical quotations and the use of newer liturgical language and forms is evident. The clear indication, however, is that the biblical quotation, though by no means ubiquitous, continues to be indispensable.

Addendum: Some Liturgical Uses of Psalms in Jewish Tradition

- Ps. 1: unveiling of tombstone
- Ps. 3: recitation of the Shema before going to sleep
- Ps. 6: vv. 2-11 are in Taḥanun
- Ps. 8: daily evening service
- Ps. 15: dedication of a new house; unveiling of a tombstone
- Ps. 16: funeral; unveiling; in a house of mourning
- Ps. 19: introductory prayers (pesuqei de-zimra) in the morning service for Sabbath and festivals
- Ps. 20: daily morning service
- Ps. 23: for the sick; funeral; unveiling
- Ps. 24: psalm for Sunday; on festivals when the Torah is returned to the Ark

Ps. 27: from 1 Elul through Hoshana Rabbah
 Ps. 29: Friday evening service; on Sabbath when the Torah is returned to the Ark
 Ps. 30: introductory prayers for the daily, Sabbath, and festival morning service; dedication of a new house
 Ps. 33: introductory prayers for the Sabbath and festival morning service
 Ps. 34: introductory prayers for the Sabbath and festival morning service
 Ps. 39: house of mourning
 Ps. 47: before the blowing of the shofar (ram's horn) on Rosh Ha-Shanah
 Ps. 48: psalm for Monday
 Ps. 49: house of mourning; funeral
 Ps. 63: consecration of a cemetery; funeral
 Ps. 67: evening service at the conclusion of Sabbath
 Ps. 81: psalm for Thursday
 Ps. 82: psalm for Tuesday
 Ps. 83: daily morning service when Tahanun is recited
 Ps. 90: introductory prayers for the Sabbath and festival morning service
 Ps. 91: recitation of the Shema before going to sleep; before going on a journey; introductory prayers for the Sabbath and festival morning service
 Ps. 92: Friday evening service; introductory prayers for the Sabbath and festival morning service

Ps. 93: psalm for Friday; Friday evening service; introductory prayers for the Sabbath and festival morning service
 Ps. 94: psalm for Wednesday
 Ps. 95–99: Friday evening service
 Ps. 100: introductory prayers for the daily morning service
 Ps. 102: consecration of a cemetery
 Ps. 103: for the sick; consecration of a cemetery
 Ps. 104: new moon; Sabbath afternoon service (fall and winter); consecration of a cemetery
 Ps. 113–118: Hallel on new moon, festivals, and Hanukkah
 Ps. 120–134: Sabbath afternoon service (fall and winter)
 Ps. 126: introduction to grace after meals on Sabbath and festivals
 Ps. 130: morning service of Ten Days of Repentance
 Ps. 135–136: introductory prayers for the Sabbath and festival morning service
 Ps. 137: introduction to grace after meals on weekdays
 Ps. 139: for the sick
 Ps. 144: evening service at the conclusion of Sabbath
 Ps. 145–150: introductory prayers for the daily, Sabbath, and festival morning service
 [STEFAN C. REIF]

The Bible in the Jewish Philosophical Tradition

Understanding what the Bible says and means has been the central concern of the Jewish philosophical tradition. Jewish philosophers have assumed that the biblical text, as God's revealed word, is true. In principle, then, what is true in the Bible must cohere with what is known to be true from other sources of knowledge. Given the limitations of human knowledge, however, no one philosophical reading of the Bible can be definitive; all readings are necessarily partial, incomplete, and amenable to correction. Committed to the pursuit of truth, Jewish philosophers "translated" the Bible into other languages, composed commentaries on the Bible, expounded the particularly difficult or significant sections of the Bible, and theorized about the relationship between knowledge discovered by human reason and knowledge revealed by God. All of these activities were regarded as expressions of the religious obligation to love God.

Although the Bible played an important role in all phases of Jewish philosophy, the philosophical tools for reflections about the Bible have changed over time, reflecting the transformation of Jewish culture as influenced by its general surroundings. In ancient Alexandria, medieval Spain, Provence, and Italy, modern Germany, and contemporary America, Jewish philosophers have engaged diverse philosophical schools, including Platonism, Stoicism, Kalam, Aristotelianism, Enlightenment, Kantianism, Existentialism, Phenomenology, and Post-Structuralism. By thinking about Judaism in light of these philosophical traditions, Jewish philosophers not only fathomed the depth of the Bible anew but also acted as cultural mediators between Judaism and surrounding cultures.

The Greco-Roman World

The Bible itself laid the foundation for the pursuit of wisdom in Judaism, even though the Bible is not a philosophical text. Fusing ancient Israelite wisdom with covenantal theology, the book of Deuteronomy stated that the laws given to Israel are wisdom that the people of other nations can appreciate and the torah or teaching (understood in postbiblical Judaism as the Torah) is wisdom proper to Israel (4.5–8). The identification of Torah and wisdom meant that the scholar of Torah is also the carrier of the sapiential tradition and that to stand in a proper relationship with God, the wise person must fathom the truth of the Torah. As attested in the Wisdom of Ben Sirach, by the 2nd century BCE, the fusion of Torah and wisdom was fully in place: The Torah was understood to contain not only divine commands that regulate social relations and Israel's relationship with God, but also information about God's created world. Since Torah is revealed wisdom, the pursuit of wisdom about the world, which is the task of philosophy, would have to be linked to the interpretation of the divinely revealed text.

Jewish philosophy began in earnest during the Hellenistic period, when Diaspora Jews encountered Greek philosophy. As Greek-speaking Egyptian Jews lost their facility in Hebrew, they translated the Bible into Greek—the Septuagint—and began to study it in light of Greek philosophy. The first Jewish philosopher known by name, Aristobulus (ca. 180–145 BCE), wanted readers to understand the Torah philosophically in order to demonstrate the rationality of the Jewish religion. (A few extant fragments of his work are in The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha [ed. James Charlesworth, Garden City: Doubleday, 1985], pp. 831–42.) Writing in Greek to Jews and Gentiles, Aristobulus presented Judaism as a type of philosophical school. He did not wish to assimilate the Jewish religion into Greek philosophy, but rather to argue that Judaism is superior to other philosophical schools because “Plato and the philosophers borrowed from Moses.” Though Aristobulus equated the God of the Jews and the God of the Gentile philosophers, his teachings were thoroughly Jewish because he also identified the rational wisdom of the philosophers with “Torah.” Precisely because the Torah teaches philosophical truths, it must not be taken literally. Through allegorical reading of the Septuagint, Aristobulus and other educated Jews could explain to themselves and to non-Jews the meaning of Jewish practices, beliefs, and sacred texts that kept the Jews a people apart in the Greco-Roman world. Allegory would typify much of the early Jewish Hellenistic philosophical tradition.

Another typical example of Judeo-Hellenistic philosophical writing was the author of the Wisdom of Solomon, who was conversant in Middle Platonism (a philosophical school that flourished from 80 BCE to 220 CE and was steeped in Stoicism), as well as in Israelite Wisdom tradition. The Wisdom of Solomon was an attempt to place the Jewish religion within a broad philosophical text, intelligible to educated contemporaries who are at home in Hellenistic philosophy. The author identifies himself with King Solomon and, on the basis of 1 Kings ch 3, presents King Solomon as achieving a union with Wisdom through searching and praying (7.7–9; 9.1–8). For the duration of Jewish philosophy, the be-belief that King Solomon was the prototype of the sage and patron of arts and sciences would legitimize the study on philosophy and science and would make Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs, two works attributed to him, central texts for philosophical commentaries.

The most important and prolific Jewish philosopher of the Hellenistic period was Philo of Alexandria (15 BCE–50 CE). At home in the culture of the Greek polis and thoroughly proficient in the philosophy of the major Greek schools of Plato, Aristotle, the Stoics, and the Pythagoreans, Philo's allegiance to Scripture was never in question. He rejected a radical allegorical reading of the Bible and argued that those who advocated it merely wished to assimilate into Hellenistic Roman society and abandon Judaism. For Philo true philosophical life is to be found in the divine law of Moses, which leads its adherents to the attainment of the ultimate end of human life—the seeing of God. Philo's exposition of Scripture's truths was meant to prove the uniqueness and epistemological superiority of the Jewish tradition over other intellectual and religious traditions.

The prophecy of Moses plays an important role in establishing the perfection of the Hebrew Scriptures. For Philo, Moses was the most perfect of men with reference to his priestly piety (Mos. 2:66) and his constant and unbroken nobility of life and other virtues (Mos. 1:24; 29; 2:58). With no sin and imperfection, Moses was "king, lawgiver, high priest, prophet," and "in each function he won the highest place" (Mos. 2:292). Philo provides a highly idealized account of Moses' life, illustrating his outstanding moral and religious qualities. Moses' prophecy itself proved his intellectual perfection since he comprehended the incorporeal, intelligible world of Ideas. Using the language of allegory to do it, Moses wrote down what he had seen of the incorporeal world of real essences. The intellectual study of "mental things and real existences" is the allegorical study of Scripture. In accordance with the Platonic schema of the Repub- lic, Philo portrays Moses as the philosopher-king who "attained the very summit of philosophy," and he is credited with discoveries wrongly attributed to others (Mos. 2:2). While Moses was not God, he was not merely human either. Philo applies to Moses the same title—theos—that he applies also to the Logos. Indeed, Moses receives a "divine communication," meaning that "all that follows in the wake of God is within the good man's apprehension while he himself is beyond it." As the embodiment of Logos, Moses is called "the law-giving Word," by which humanity could be rescued from the bondage of matter. Thus Moses is the supreme high priest, who bestows "a blessing which nothing in the world can surpass" (Mos. 2:67). Moses rescued mankind from the bondage of matter.

Philo adapted to Scriptures the same method that the Stoics used to interpret Homer and Greek mythology. The Hebrew Scriptures for him are the inspired word of God. Moses' utterances were "absolutely and entirely signs of the divine excellence, conduct and particularly the nation of his worshippers, for whom he opens up the road which leads to happiness" (Mos. 2:189). The Bible was composed in a state comparable to that of the philosopher when he is inspired to recall intelligible ideas beyond the world of sense and matter. That means that for Philo, the Torah is inspired, but Moses and not God was its author, a daring notion indeed as far as later rabbinic Judaism is concerned. The same inspiration also filled the Septuagint translators who preserved the true meaning of the mysteries conveyed by Moses.

At Sinai Moses' purified soul was engraved or inscribed by God. By virtue of this divine impression of knowledge, Moses was a "living law" even before he composed the written laws. In his own person Moses functioned as a kind of seal designed to impress the law in the shape of his life on those who would become his followers (Mos. 1:158–59). Moses expressed his extraordinary knowledge through the act of writing (rather than speaking) when he composed the Torah, which contains laws of proper conduct and facts about the structure of the cosmos. The language at his disposal, however, was post-lapsarian; it was no longer the original Adamic language, which had been mimetic. Whereas Adamic language presented reality by giving names to things on the basis of direct apprehension of the essences of things, Moses could only use an imperfect language. Moreover, since Moses addressed all Israelites, who by definition were imperfect and ill prepared, he had to use audio-visual aids to convey his conceptual message. The result was the anthropomorphic language of the Bible, which requires allegorical interpretation.

The upshot of Philo's analysis is that only the Mosaic law enables those who follow it to live by the Stoic mandate of life in accordance with nature. The zenith of the well-lived life is an individual, ecstatic, unmediated experience of coming to know the transcendent and immaterial God. This is a contemplative, mystical experience in which the "eye of the mind" or the soul comes "to see God." As the goal of human life, this mystical experience governs the direction of the happy life, organizing all human activities to attain it. Since for Philo the revealed law of Moses is the ideal law, which God implanted in nature at creation, the universal goal of "seeing God" is achievable only for those who live by the law of Moses, since it alone guides humanity in accordance with nature. Hence the experience of "seeing God" constitutes the community of "Israel" which for Philo is a nonethnic intellectual-religious category ("those who see God") rather than an ethnic or national category. This view would enable Christian readers to adapt Philo for their own needs, making him into a Church Father, and explains why the works of Philo were preserved in the church rather than in the synagogue.

Philo illustrates the extent to which a Jewish intellectual in 1st-century Alexandria could creatively reconcile the Greek philosophical tradition with Scripture-based religion. Yet Philo did not chart the future development of Judaism. Instead, the Rabbis of the land of Israel and Babylonia articulated what became normative Judaism. Although the Rabbis reflected on the same themes of concern to Philo, they did not adopt his allegorical method of interpretation. Similarly, while the rabbinic academy shared many features with Greco-Roman philosophical schools, including the total commitment to the love of wisdom (which the Rabbis equated with Torah), and the life-long cultivation of moral and intellectual virtues, rabbinic speculations about God, the universe, the problem of evil, and the purpose of human life proceeded hermeneutically and homiletically rather than systematically and demonstratively. In addition, rabbinic views developed from the Hebrew text, rather than from the Septuagint. These views, found in a wide variety of early and late rabbinic texts, are extremely diffuse and diverse and are extremely difficult to categorize and to compare to the oeuvre of a single individual like Philo.

Medieval Jewish Philosophy

The Greco-Roman period in Jewish history ended with the redaction of the Talmud, the Jerusalem Talmud (ca. 400 CE) and the Babylonian Talmud (after 500 CE). Soon afterwards, with the rise and expansion of Islam, the life of Jews in the Middle East radically changed. The new religion recognized the Bible as revealed Scripture and granted Jews the status of protected subjects (dhimmi). As a monotheistic religion, Islam did not pose a theoretical challenge to Jews. But when Greek and Hellenistic philosophy and science were translated into Arabic during the 8th and 9th centuries, Islamic civilization gave rise to a new systematic philosophy (falsafah) and speculative theology (kalam). The latter two did pose an intellectual challenge to which Jewish thinkers, who were conversant in Arabic language and culture, had to respond. In the new rationalist climate, which sets up reason as a judge of religion, Judaism had to be proven to be a rational religion.

Most problematic were the anthropomorphic depictions of God in the Bible and in rabbinic texts. In the ecstatic and visionary strand of rabbinic thought, known as the Hekhalot and Merkavah literature (see "The Bible in the Jewish Mystical Tradition," pp. 1976–90), God was not only imaged as a king seated on the Throne of Glory as in the Bible, but the limbs of God's body were given precise (albeit fantastic) measurements. In the new intellectual climate of the 9th century, the corporeal depiction of God in rabbinic Judaism became an intellectual embarrassment and a target of severe criticism from rationalist skeptics such as Hiwi al-Balkhi (whose "Two Hundred Questions concerning Scripture" are known only through Saadia's response to them). The most scathing critique of rabbinic Judaism came from the Karaites, who denied the validity of the oral tradition and regarded only Written law as sacred. But how is Scripture to be interpreted without the rabbinic tradition? Following the Kalam theologians of the Mutazilite school, the Karaite thinkers posited human reason and the sciences of grammar and philology as the way to fathom the meaning of divinely revealed Scripture. The Karaites' exposition of the biblical text would give rise to their articulation of the dogmas of Judaism and to the formal distinction between ceremonial and rational commandment. The Karaites were thus the first Jewish philosophers in the Middle Ages. Their critique of rabbinic Judaism put them outside normative Judaism, but their influence on the way normative Judaism formulated its philosophical beliefs was profound.

It was the great foe of Karaism, Saadia Gaon (882–942), who articulated the philosophic defense of rabbinic Judaism. Like the Karaite philosophers, Saadia Gaon's theology was shaped by the Mutazilite Kalam, but he applied its claim that human reason is compatible with a divinely revealed religion not only to Scripture but to the entire rabbinic tradition. There is nothing in rabbinic Judaism that is contradictory to reason, provided the written law and the oral law are properly interpreted. To prove the first claim, Saadia translated almost the entire Bible into Arabic. This literal translation (Tafsir) was accompanied by an extended paraphrastic commentary on the biblical text (Sharh) intended for the more learned reader. To prove the latter claim, Saadia composed thematic monographs on rabbinic law. In his main theological treatise, Kitab al Amanat wa'l itiqadat (Book of Doctrines and Beliefs), Saadia delineated the circumstances that legitimized a nonliteralist understanding of the biblical text.

Saadia's Book of Doctrines and Beliefs had a clear polemical intent: to reject all forms of Jewish skepticism and disbelief rife in his time and to place rabbinic Judaism on a firm rationalist foundation. Saadia's method of reasoning was not significantly different from that of the Karaites, but his conclusions were. Like the Karaites, he regarded the rationalist inquiry into the meaning of the received tradition by the tools that God implanted in humans (namely, human reason) to be a religious obligation. Saadia believed that his method of exposition could help turn religious belief, affirmed on the basis of tradition, into firmly held convictions that are corroborated by rational proofs. For Saadia, the revealed tradition is a source of valid knowledge that complements what can be known through the other three sources: sense perception, self-evident truths, and logical inference. A revelation from God is necessary because human beings are not intellectually equal; some are more gifted than others. Furthermore, the pursuit of truth by natural human reason is very arduous, time-consuming, and prone to errors. Divine revelation is necessary to compensate for human limitations, making truth available to all, including women and children.

A superb close reader of the Bible, Saadia found scriptural support for almost every detail of rational argument. Saadia's rationalist exposition of Scripture demanded that whenever Scripture appears to be in conflict with what is known to be true from the other three sources of knowledge, it is necessary to submit the text to careful examination and interpret the scriptural text in question allegorically. This is especially necessary in regard to the corporeal depiction of God in the Bible. Since reason independently demonstrates that God is the creator of the universe and that, therefore, God is not corporeal, it follows that the literal meaning of the biblical text cannot be true. Saadia proposes how to decode the corporeal language of the Bible. For example, when the term head is applied to God it must mean "excellence and elevation"; eye means "supervision"; ear "denotes acceptance"; mouth and lip mean "teaching and command"; heart "signifies wisdom"; bowels "denote amiability"; foot denotes "coercion." Since these words are used in the Bible also in nonanthropomorphic senses, it is most appropriate that the nonanthropomorphic sense will be used in scriptural utterances about God. Thus the rationalist conception of God recommended the allegorical interpretation. After Saadia, the allegorical interpretation of the text was applied not only to divine attributes but also to human agents in biblical narratives.

The intellectualization of rabbinic Judaism reached its zenith in Muslim Spain during the 11th and 12th centuries. The unique cultural symbiosis between Judaism and Islam flourished under the Ummayyad Caliphate in Cordoba and its successor petty kingdoms, where outstanding Jews rose to power in the administration of the Muslim state, creating a Jewish culture suffused with the sensibilities and ideals of adab, namely, the broad scientific and rhetorical learning that made one courteous and urbane. The adib (the man schooled in adab) was a highly refined person who was expected to know a little about many topics in order to add brilliance to the court. The key for success in the court was possession of rhetorical skills, poetic eloquence, and calligraphic excellence, all of which were cultivated through the study and production of prose and poetry. The adib culled his knowledge from prose books that encompassed tales, fables, anecdotes, practical advice, and popularization of scientific information, all gleaned from the philosophical-scientific heritage of the Hellenistic world, interspersed with some material from India.

Jewish culture in Muslim Spain changed profoundly as Jewish courtiers absorbed the adab program, but without compromising their Jewish identity or their conviction about the spiritual superiority of Judaism. Indeed, the Bible anchored the Jewish response to the attraction of the dazzling Islamic civilization in Andalusia. Fully aware of Islamic claims about the Quran's divinity and perfection, including the superiority of Quranic Arabic to all other languages, Jewish scholars asserted the uniqueness of the Tanakh and its pure language and applied the sciences of grammar and philology to prove the perfection of the Bible. This perfection was not merely linguistic or rhetorical; it was scientific and philosophical as well. The linguistic analysis of the Bible by grammarians such as Judah ben David Ḥayyuj (ca. 950–ca. 1000), Isaac ben Levi Ibn Mar Shaul, Samuel Ibn Naghrella (933–1056), Judah ben Samuel Ibn Bal'am (d. ca. 1090), Moses ben Samuel Ibn Gikatilla (or Chiquitilla) (d. ca. 1080), Jonah Ibn Janah (ca. 985–c. 1040) and Shmuel Alkanzi (1050–1130), enabled a deeper philosophical understanding of the Bible to emerge. It was through the literal meaning of the text (later called peshat) that the deeper philosophical meaning could be accessed.

The most outstanding exponent of the link between the linguistic analysis of Hebrew and the philosophical exposition of the Bible was Abraham Ibn Ezra (1089–1167). A poet, liturgist, grammarian, translator, mathematician, astronomer, astrologer and philosopher, Abraham Ibn Ezra's interpretation of Judaism was naturalist and rationalist. Regarding the Jews as unique mediators between cultures, Ibn Ezra was committed to imparting knowledge of Greek and Arabic cultures to his Jewish audience and even wrote scientific works in Latin to make the work of Jews known to Christians. He began to comment on the biblical canon rather late in life after migrating from Muslim Spain to Italy with the intention of teaching the correct reading of the Bible to Jews who were not yet familiar with the Jewish rationalist tradition and Judeo-Hispanic biblical exegesis. Though Ibn Ezra composed commentaries to the entire Bible, the extant texts include commentaries (some preserved in two versions) on the Torah, Isaiah, the Twelve Minor Prophets, Psalms, Job, the Five Scrolls, and Daniel. The style of the commentary is terse and cryptic, full of allusions to philosophical and scientific (especially astrological) theories, purportedly contained in the Bible, but which should not be expounded in full in the context of the biblical commentary.

Ibn Ezra claimed that the Bible itself attests to the fact that ancient Israelites were versed in the sciences, so that the study of the sciences is an inherently Jewish activity. Therefore, only a scholar who is deeply proficient in the sciences, especially astronomy and astrology, can properly understand the meaning of the biblical text. For Ibn Ezra the exposition of the text by means of astrological references does not mean imposing science on the Bible, but rather showing how the biblical text itself actually enlarges the scope of the scientific discourse known to him from extrabiblical, Muslim and Hermetic sources. At times the biblical text is used by Ibn Ezra to address questions that are raised by other sciences or resolve tensions between various scientific theories, for example between the assumption of astrology that ascribes to celestial bodies the physical properties such as hot and cold, and the Aristotelian views according to which the celestial bodies are made of a refined substance that does not carry physical properties. The Bible can also remove a contradiction between the assumptions of astrology and the physical view that Ibn Ezra accepted as correct. For example, Ps. 148 teaches not only about the cosmological differentiation between the lower and supernal worlds, but also about the physical composition of objects in the supra-lunar world and the fixed cyclical motion.

For Ibn Ezra, the science of astrology captures the fixity of natural laws, even though he maintained that the predictive power of astrology is not perfect. Although Ibn Ezra did not consider astrology to be practically useful, he made many allusions to astrological theories when he explained animal sacrifices, the festivals, the scapegoat ritual, and the uniqueness of the Holy Land, among other aspects of Israelite religion. The prevalence of astrology in the exposition of the biblical text, however, should not obscure the main claim of Ibn Ezra about the relationship between astrology and the Torah. Precisely because Israel is in possession of the revealed Torah, Israel alone can be free from the influences of astral forces, provided Israel studies the Torah and observes its commandments. As Ibn Ezra teaches in the commentary on Exod. 3.21, the very commitment to Torah study and the life that flows from it ensures that Israel is not subject to astrological influence.

Ibn Ezra's naturalism went hand in hand with his esoteric style of biblical commentaries and, in turn, with his intellectual elitism. He made a clear distinction between the masses, who lack the capacity to engage in philosophy and science, and the few who possess the "heart," which is the seat of reason in Ibn Ezra's psychology. Only the very few who are scientifically educated can attain the ultimate end of human life and enjoy the bliss of immortality reserved to the individual soul. For the educated reader, laconic allusions are sufficient to direct him to the deep philosophic and scientific matters taught by the Torah. These are the "secrets" (sodot) of the Torah that remain obscure to the masses. In the 14th century, as we shall see below, several Jewish philosophers composed supercommentaries on Ibn Ezra's commentaries, spelling out (not always correctly) the precise meaning of these secrets.

Until the second half of the 14th century it was Moses Maimonides, Rambam (Rabbi Moses son of Maimon; 1138–1204), rather than Abraham Ibn Ezra who dominated the Jewish philosophical approach to the Bible. Although Maimonides perpetuated many ideas of Ibn

Ezra, Maimonides also vigorously rejected the science of astrology, highlighted the limitation of human knowledge in metaphysics, and recognized naturalist causality only as far as the sublunar world is concerned. At the heart of Maimonides' approach to the Bible stood his theory of prophecy, which is remarkably similar to that of Philo, even though the immediate source of inspiration for Maimonides was not Philo but the Muslim philosopher Abu Nasr Alfarabi (d. 950). Adopting Plato's political theory to the case of Islam, Alfarabi portrayed the founder of the true religion as a philosopher-prophet-legislator-imam whose perfect law contains the translation of philosophic truths into figurative speech.

Following Alfarabi, Maimonides understood prophecy as a cognitive activity by an intellectually perfect person. All prophets must be philosophers, though not all philosophers are endowed with the imaginative faculty that can translate philosophic knowledge into figurative speech characteristic of prophecy. Maimonides, however, took pains to differentiate between the prophecy of Moses and the prophecy of all other prophets: Moses received his prophecy in broad daylight, and he prophesied whenever he wished, without fear or trembling, and without any input from his senses or the imagination. Moses' prophecy was qualitatively different because he transcended human corporeality and "attained the angelic." Suppressing his senses, appetites, and desires to the utmost minimum, Moses transcended human embodiment, and his body no longer functioned as a "veil" between him and God. Mosaic prophecy was, therefore, purely intellectual, the result of the conjunction between Moses' perfected intellect and the Active Intellect. In knowing what the Active Intellect knows, Moses apprehended the pattern of the law of nature. Therefore, the Torah of Moses "enters into what is natural" (Guide II:40), that is to say, it fits the structure of reality. The perfection of the Torah is thus completed in the perfection of the agent that received the Torah—the prophet Moses.

Moses was not only cognitively perfect; his imaginative faculty was also the most perfect. While Moses' prophecy was itself strictly conceptual or cognitive, the transmission of its content to the Israelites required the use of the imagination, since this faculty is the difference between philosopher and prophet. Because of Moses' perfect imagination, the Torah of Moses is the most perfect poetic text, one in which there is a perfect fit between the cognitive, esoteric core of the philosophic truths and figurative language of Torah narratives, a fit that justifies allegoresis. In Aristotelian language this is to say that the narratives, poetic imagery, and laws of the Torah function as Matter for the cognitive truths that are their Form. In its figurative language, the Torah teaches the sciences of physics and metaphysics. The task of the philosophic reader of the Bible is to remove the figurative veils of the Torah in order to fathom its philosophic content.

For the philosophically inclined reader, Maimonides composed The Guide for the Perplexed, whose first part contains a philosophical dictionary of the most problematic terms in the Bible. For example, Scripture uses the terms image and likeness to refer to God. These terms, Maimonides explains, are equivocal terms: When applied to natural things they refer to shapes of natural bodies, but when applied to God they mean something altogether different, because God is noncorporeal. Maimonides proceeds to explain the meaning of other terms such as figure, shape, place, throne, to descend, to ascend, sitting, standing, rising, to stand, to approach, to rise, and others, all in order to teach the reader how to read the Bible correctly in a manner that does not violate the radical otherness of God.

Maimonides held that there is an unbridgeable ontological gap between God, the Necessary Existent, and all other things. It is therefore impossible for humans to know the essence of God. Human beings can only know who God is not, although from the observation of the natural world and the science of physics, human beings can know a lot about the actions of God. The radical negative theology of Maimonides entails that all terms applied to God in the Torah are either equivocations or absolute equivocation, which would suggest that the term "prophecy" as applied to Moses and any other prophet is also absolutely equivocal. Maimonides, however, does not go that far, because he could not make Moses into a deity; Moses can only be a unique human being. Because Maimonides insisted that Moses remain a human being and the Torah rationally intelligible, he had to explain in what sense the Torah of Moses is from God. This is the purpose of talking about "divine ruse" (Heb: "ormah" Arabic: "talattuf") in the Guide III:30 and 32.

The "divine ruse" was to give Israel the Torah through the intermediacy of Moses who communicated with Israel at a level that Israel could accept. Since God is an absolute unity, in God will and wisdom are the same: What God wills and what God knows are the same, and both are manifested in the way God governs the world. And since God governs through natural causes, divine management of human affairs takes into consideration the particular conditions of humanity. Given the prevalence of idolatrous practices and beliefs, the "divine ruse" was evident both in forcing Israel to live in the desert in order to improve its character, and in using Moses as the intermediary to address Israel at a level at which it could comprehend God's word. Concomitantly, in order to make sure that we will not conclude erroneously that the Torah of Moses is merely contingent, the Eighth Principle of Maimonides' Thirteen Principles of Jewish Faith specifies dogmatically that the Torah cannot change.

The cognitive perfection of Moses yielded a perfect text, but the divinity of the Torah can also be determined by an examination of its function. The Torah is divine because it can be shown that the Torah brings about the perfection of the body (tikun ha-guf) and perfection of the soul (tikun ha-nefesh). The Torah is a prescription for human well-being, because the inner meaning of the Torah corresponds to the structure of reality. By living according to the regimen articulated in the Torah, human beings can attain well-being of body and soul, when the former is understood as a means to the attainment of the latter. By observing the commandments of the Written Torah as interpreted by the Oral Torah, one ensures physical health, the acquisition of the requisite virtues, culminating in the perfection of the intellect. It is the perfection of the intellect through cognition of intelligibles that constitutes the immortal life that the Jewish tradition denotes as "world-to-come." Whether this cognitive state constitutes personal immortality and whether this is the correct interpretation of rabbinic Judaism would become a major theme in the debate about Maimonides's legacy during the 13th century.

Maimonides did not compose a linear commentary on the Bible, but only articulated general hermeneutical principles. The application of Maimonides' hermeneutical principles to the Bible was carried out by his followers, beginning with Samuel Ibn Tibbon (d. 1232), who translated the Guide from Arabic into Hebrew, composed a glossary of philosophical terms in the Guide, explained the esoteric meaning of Ecclesiastes, and composed a systematic exposition of the biblical creation narrative in light of Aristotle's physics. To master the latter and make it accessible to Jewish seekers of wisdom, Ibn Tibbon also translated Aristotle's Metaphysics into Hebrew in 1210. Samuel Ibn Tibbon inaugurated the tradition of philosophical biblical commentaries that read the Bible as an encoded Aristotelian, philosophical text.

Jewish philosophers in 13th century Spain vacillated between two conflicting goals: On the one hand, the philosophers wished to teach philosophy to the many in order to raise the intellectual level of Jews and enable them to perfect their soul so as to attain immortality. On the other hand, the philosophers believed that ordinary Jews lacked the intellectual preconditions to engage in philosophy; they may misunderstand philosophic teachings and harbor erroneous views. The followers of Maimonides attempted to bridge the gap between the philosophers and the public by composing summaries of philosophical texts, popularizing philosophy in prose studied with rhymed poetry, and by writing philosophical commentaries on the Bible in which they made clear what Maimonides only hinted at in the Guide. With the treatment of the Bible as a philosophic-scientific text, opposition to rationalist philosophy was unavoidable. Throughout the 13th century, Jewish communities in Spain, Provence, France, Italy, the land of Israel, Egypt, and Iraq were engaged in a bitter controversy about the status of philosophy within Jewish traditional society.

R. David Kimḥi (Radak; 1160–1235), a biblical exegete, grammarian, and translator, whose family migrated from Muslim Spain to Provence, played a major role in what we now call the Maimonidean Controversy of the 1230s. He is an example of a militant rationalist commentator on the Bible for whom the Torah was intentionally written by Moses with a “double meaning, one obscuring the other . . . the exoteric for the masses and the esoteric for the Sages” (Frank Talmage, David Kimhi: The Man and the Commentaries [Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1975], p. 120). Although Radak retains the peshat level of the biblical text and contributed greatly to its understanding, his commentaries also provided an elaborate allegorical reading. For example, “the Garden of Eden represents the Active Intellect and the Tree of Life the human Intellect, while the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil symbolized the material intellect” (Talmage, p. 121). Radak goes on to interpret biblical personae allegorically. Cain, for example, was a farmer and devoid of intellectual accomplishments, whereas Abel was occupied with the vanities of life, even though he was endowed with material intellect. In Radak’s reading, it was the third son, Seth, who ate from the Tree of Life and was created in the image of Adam. It was he who shared with Adam the human intellect. Seth was the good seed and the true founder of mankind. In this allegorical fashion Radak explicates the two main bodies of esoteric teachings in the Torah, the Account of Creation (ma’aseh bereshit), based on the creation narrative of Genesis, and the Account of the Chariot (ma’aseh merkavah), based on the first chapter of Ezekiel. Based on Maimonides’s reading of the latter, Radak was even more elaborate and specific than was Maimonides in reading this chapter as expression of Aristotelian cosmology whose principles are explained in “chapter headings” in the Guide.

The rationalist philosophers insisted that to worship God correctly Jews must know philosophy. Therefore, the controversy during the 13th century concerned the cultural boundaries of Judaism and the degree to which the Bible contains truths articulated in other sources. Yet, if the Torah is indeed divine Wisdom, as the philosophers argued, then one could argue that there is no need to consult philosophy and science at all since Scripture already contains all the knowledge necessary for its correct interpretation. Kabbalists (see “The Bible in the Mystical Tradition,” pp. 1976–90) such as Jacob Ibn Sheshet (13th century) advanced that claim and rejected the Maimonidean interpretation of the creation narrative. Yet the kabbalists too developed their ideas and exegetical strategies through familiarity with Jewish philosophy, and like the philosophers the kabbalists endorsed the distinction between the exoteric (nigleh) and esoteric (nistar) levels of the biblical text. Likewise, the kabbalists accepted Maimonides’ claim that the Torah is the prescription for human well-being, or happiness, culminating in personal immortality. For this and other reasons, the impression often given of an absolute difference between the medieval philosophical and kabbalistic tradition is incorrect.

The primary difference between the rationalist philosophers and the kabbalists concerned the nature of the Hebrew language. Whereas to the Maimonidean philosophers Hebrew was a conventional, human language, the kabbalists maintained that Hebrew is literally the language of God whose elements—the Hebrew letters—are the “building blocks,” so to speak, of the created universe. The revelation of the Torah and the creation of the universe are two sides of the same coin. For the kabbalists, then, ma'aseh bereshit and ma'aseh merkavah refer not to the physical universe of the sublunar and supra-lunar worlds, respectively, but to processes within the Godhead. In other words, Scripture, according to the kabbalists, is a symbolic manifestation of God's essence, the very thing that Maimonides claimed lies beyond the ken of human knowledge. Although both rationalist philosophers and kabbalists asserted that the Hebrew Scriptures contain salvific truths about God, for the philosophers these truths concern the created world and its relationship with God, whereas for the kabbalists these truths are of God's very essence.

The final phase of the Maimonidean Controversy took place in 1303–1305 and ended on July 31, 1306, when R. Solomon Ibn Adret imposed a ban on the study of philosophy for men under twenty-five years of age. The ban signaled the complex status of philosophy within traditional Jewish society, but it by no means ended the philosophical interpretation of the Bible. In the first half of the 14th century, especially in Provence, additional philosophical commentaries on the Bible were composed in which rationalist philosophers, such as Joseph Ibn Kaspi (1279–ca. 1331) and Nissim ben Moses of Marseilles (active 1320s), expounded the philosophic import of the biblical text and attempted to solve various exegetical problems that arise by reading the Bible in light of Aristotelian philosophy. The most extensive and philosophically sophisticated of these commentaries are those composed by Rabbi Levi ben Gershom, known as Ralbag or Gersonides (1288–1344).

Gersonides was a first-rate scientist, specializing in astronomy, who mastered the Aristotelian corpus by writing supercommentaries on commentaries of Averroes (1126–1198). Intimately versed with the legacy of Maimonides, Gersonides took issue with his Jewish predecessor on many points, radicalizing the intellectualist tenor of Jewish rationalist naturalism. Most importantly, Gersonides rejected Maimonides' esoteric method of teaching philosophy. Philosophy need not and must not be kept secret from the masses but must be taught openly, systematically, and without allusions and hints. Accepting Aristotelian philosophy wholeheartedly, Gersonides was determined to teach the Jewish public at large the correct meaning of the doctrines of creation, prophecy, providence, miracles, and the chosenness of Israel in his systematic philosophical work Milhamot ha-Shem (The Wars of the Lord) as well as in his biblical commentaries. Like Ibn Ezra, Gersonides launched his philosophical exegesis only after composing scientific-philosophic works; proficiency in philosophy was a necessary condition to the proper understanding of the revealed text.

In agreement with Maimonides, Gersonides held that “the Torah is the written record of Moses' prophetic revelation, and, therefore, its value for guiding the Israelites to perfection is determined by the nature and quality of Moses' prophetic capabilities” (Robert Eisen, Gersonides on Providence, Covenant, and the Chosen People: A Study in Medieval Jewish Philosophy and Biblical Commentary [Albany: State University of New York, 1995], p. 73). But unlike Maimonides, Gersonides considered the prophet's ability to predict the future as the major difference between philosophers and prophets. The predictive capacity of the prophets follows from their perfect knowledge of causal relations in the natural world governed by astral forces. Contrary to Maimonides, who vehemently rejected the science of astrology, Gersonides, like Ibn Ezra, was an expert astrologer who attempted to shed light on the remote past on the basis of his astrological and astronomical knowledge. This knowledge is especially relevant to the interpretation of the commandments, whose allegorical meaning Gersonides spells out. Contrary to Maimonides, for whom the masses at the time of Moses were incapable of philosophical sophistication, Gersonides held that Moses taught the entire nation of uneducated Israelites the full range of philosophical doctrines, natural science, and metaphysics after their exodus from Egypt.

The pedagogic function of the Torah and the need to teach philosophy openly do not mean that Gersonides renounced the elitism characteristic of the Jewish philosophical tradition. He too believed that different audiences understand the Torah on different levels in accord with their level of intellectual perfection. Because of their lack of philosophical training the masses cannot appreciate the deep philosophical meaning of the Torah. Yet Gersonides was much more optimistic than Maimonides and Ibn Ezra about the ability of the philosopher to bring the masses to a higher level of knowledge. His philosophical commentaries accomplished that task for the general Jewish reader, but they did not simply rehash his philosophical-scientific views. Sometimes the exposition of the biblical text provided Gersonides an opportunity to offer new insights and revisions of what he said in his earlier philosophical text The Wars of the Lord.

Gersonides' commentaries on the Torah were written to be accessible, and followed a rigid structure: He first explained the meaning of the words, then provided a statement of the import of the section under consideration, and concluded the discussion with a summary of the "lessons" (to'aliot) to be derived from the Torah portion. In his Commentary on the Song of Songs Gersonides departed from that style. Writing for a generally educated reader who has just embarked on the study of philosophy, Gersonides presented the Song of Songs as a philosophical allegory about the path toward ultimate felicity. From Abraham Ibn Ezra, through Joseph Ibn Aqnin (ca. 1150–1220), Moses Ibn Tibbon (active 1240–1270), and Immanuel of Rome (ca. 1261–ca. 1328), Jewish philosophers read the Song of Songs as a philosophical allegory about the human path of spiritual improvement. But unlike his predecessors, who interpreted the Song of Songs as an intellectual process culminating in the conjunction between the human rational soul and the Active Intellect, Gersonides interpreted the text to refer to internal processes, namely, the relationship between the human rational soul and the imagination. Reviewing the fundamentals of philosophy for his reader, Gersonides instructs the reader of the Song to understand the obstacles to the attainment of felicity and the ways to overcome them. Though relatively few could reach the lofty goal of spiritual perfection by which humans attain personal immortality, the goal is in principle attainable by the students of science and philosophy.

Gersonides' commitment to the dissemination of scientific knowledge was shared by Jewish philosophers in Spain and Provence during the second half of the 14th century. By then, however, what were considered sound scientific theories included not only the teachings of Aristotle, but also Neoplatonic and Hermetic theories about the natural world. This syncretistic mixture was used as a new interpretative grid for the Bible, deriving its inspiration from Abraham Ibn Ezra. In Spain during the second half of the 14th century, Samuel Ibn Motot, Joseph Tov Elem, Ezra Gatingo, Shlomo Franco, and Shem Tov Ibn Shaprut composed super-commentaries on Ibn Ezra's biblical commentaries, openly using astrology and astral magic to decode the hints of Ibn Ezra so as to explain ancient Israelite practices such as the tabernacle, the sacrifices, and the priestly vestments.

The main claims of their astral theology include the following: The Torah was given at Sinai on the basis of astrological calculation. Biblical events reflect the influences of the stars, and biblical personalities and rabbinic sages were expert astrologers. Prophecy is predicated on knowledge of astrology. Miracles are understood to be the results of the prophet's intellectual perfection. Moses was able to overcome Egyptian magicians because he was a superior astrologer. His intellectualist perfection included the knowledge of astrology, culminating in the conjunction of his intellect with the Active Intellect. He was a practicing magician who correctly understood the link between earthly and celestial powers. The knowledge of astrology enables the intellectually perfect to extricate themselves from astral causality. Moreover, the uniqueness of the people of Israel is explained in its ability to transcend the impact of astral influences through Israel's mastery of the astrological sciences. Most importantly, the commandments themselves function as tools in the manipulation of astral forces. The commandments either manifest the influence of a given celestial body, or were given as techniques to draw spiritual energy from the celestial spheres into the corporeal world. In this regard, the commandments are effective tools in the attempt to prosper in this world. The performance of the commandments mitigates the destructive forces of the corporeal world that are regulated by the celestial bodies. Observance of the commandments thus has an instrumental value, for the more consistently one performs them the more one can extricate oneself from the impact of astral forces.

In short, by the turn of the 15th century the scientists-philosophers proposed a strictly naturalistic interpretation of Torah on the basis of astral determinism. As Judah Halevi in the 12th century rejected such a naturalist approach to the Bible, so in the early 15th century did Hasdai Crescas (d. ca. 1412), who set out to extricate Judaism from the clutches of philosophy. Crescas himself was a well-trained philosopher, but he was convinced that the intellectualization of Judaism by the rationalists was responsible for the mass conversion of Jews to Christianity during and after the anti-Jewish riots and massacres of 1391. To rejuvenate Iberian Jewish life, Crescas subjected Aristotle's physics to minute critique, manifesting familiarity with contemporary scholastic critique of Aristotle's conception of motion. If Aristotle's philosophy can be proven to be either nondemonstrative or patently mistaken, Aristotle's philosophy could not constitute the true meaning of the Torah. Crescas, however, advanced his critique of Aristotle by using Aristotelian logic so that the novelty and full implications of it were either not fully understood by Jewish philosophers, or dismissed outright as evidence of his philosophical limitations.

Crescas was not alone in his displeasure with the naturalist exposition of the Bible, in which the Torah was viewed as a means to an end. Similar claims were voiced by other Jewish thinkers in Spain and Portugal in an attempt to rethink the relationship between Torah and philosophy. Continuing to uphold the Aristotelian worldview, Jewish philosophers in the 15th century increasingly acknowledged that the Torah is not identical with philosophy, but is rather superior to it. Whereas philosophy is grounded merely in knowledge of created things, Torah is revealed knowledge that can be explained by reason but not exhausted by it. Thus Simon ben Tzemach Duran (1361-1444), who was well versed in Aristotelian philosophy, maintained that it only serves to shed light on the meaning of Torah and that philosophy alone could not possibly lead to the attainment of ultimate felicity. A similar position was espoused by Joseph Ibn Shem Tov (ca. 1400-ca. 1460), who composed commentaries to Aristotle and who interpreted the ultimate end of human life in terms of Averroes's theory of cognition.

The philosophers' own admission that knowledge of philosophy alone fails to secure personal immortality and that it must be complemented by revealed knowledge gave 15th century Jewish philosophy its conservative posture as much as this viewpoint served an important polemical purpose against Christianity. As Spanish Jewry was fighting for its physical and spiritual survival, Jewish intellectuals were increasingly engaged in philosophical polemics against Christianity either through systematic exposition of Jewish dogmas, or through philosophical examination of Christian readings of the biblical text. The gist of this defense was that Judaism is superior to Christianity because Judaism is a rational religion. The God of Judaism does not do what is logically impossible; only what is naturally impossible. Whether rational arguments sustained Jewish believers is hard to determine; what is clear is that by the 15th century in Spain allegiance to Judaism became harder and harder.

In the 15th century, the philosophical defense of Judaism became more difficult because the opponents were often Jewish apostates with illustrious rabbinic backgrounds. Thus the Jewish delegation to the forced disputation in Tortosa (1413–1414) performed rather poorly against the apostates Jeronimo de Santa Fe and Pablo de Santa Maria who presented the Christian understanding of the messianic meaning of biblical and rabbinic texts. The rivalry between the two religions in Spain ended with the mass expulsion of Jews from Spain and the possessions of the Spanish Crown (1492), whose main goal was to end any contacts between professing Jews and conversos (Jewish converts to Christianity), to make Spain a unified, Catholic kingdom.

The Early-modern Period

The traumatic expulsion from Spain, and soon thereafter from Portugal, did not extinguish Jewish culture. In the Sephardi diaspora in North Africa, Italy, and the Ottoman Empire, Jewish culture continued to flourish and even experience a Renaissance of sorts. The interpretation of the Tanakh stood at the center of the cultural renewal, although there were two distinctive approaches to the Bible. On the one hand, there was the growing familiarity with Renaissance humanism and a willingness to adopt its historical sensibility to the interpretation of the Bible. The science of history was added to the list of sciences relevant to tease out the true meaning of Scriptures. On the other hand, the historical approach of kabbalah influenced Jewish philosophers who were seeking to fathom the infinite, eternal meanings of the canonical text, which could be penetrated but not exhausted by human reason.

The most innovative interpreter of the Bible in the generation of the expulsion from Spain was Isaac Abravanel (1437–1508), the illustrious diplomat, financier, and royal adviser to the kings of Portugal, Spain, and Naples. Familiar with Renaissance humanism (which had penetrated Iberia in the 1440s and flourished under the patronage of Queen Isabella during the 1480s), Abravanel introduced historical sensibility to the exposition of the Bible, while defending the inviolability of the rabbinic tradition. Abravanel's biblical commentaries are replete with quotations from Greek, Roman, Christian, and Muslim sources along with references to medieval Jewish biblical interpreters such as Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Radak, Gersonides, Nahmanides, and Ibn Kaspi, and philosophers such as Maimonides and Crescas. Paying due respect to his predecessors, Abravanel also criticizes Maimonides for harmonizing the Torah with Aristotelian philosophy, chides Ibn Ezra for speaking in riddles, and rebukes Gersonides for deducing moral lessons from the Bible. The Torah must not be read reductively or allegorically.

Under the influence of contemporary humanists, Abravanel was the first to ponder the historical process that brought about and shaped the making of the biblical texts qua texts. He began his commentaries with extensive introductions in which he discussed the character of the book, the author, the date of composition, the content, and the structure of the book under consideration. Abravanel also noted textual problems such as inconsistencies and discrepancies in a given biblical text or between biblical books. Abravanel's novel literary criticism of the Bible broke new ground in regard to questions about the structure and divisions of the biblical canon as a whole and the interrelationship of its parts. Thus Abravanel attempted to account for divergences between the books of Samuel and Chronicles, suggested that the author of Chronicles was Ezra, paid attention to the human dimension of biblical narratives, assessed the stylistic differences between various prophetic books against the psychological makeup of the prophets as reflecting their particular historical circumstance, discussed biblical geography, investigated chronological quandaries, and examined the actual political circumstances at a given time in order to shed light on the narrative. Abravanel's astute historical observations yielded many insights that anticipated the biblical criticism of Spinoza in the mid-17th century. But unlike Spinoza, Abravanel remained deeply committed to the tradition and was aware of the potential danger that critical thinking could pose to Judaism. To address this danger Abravanel developed the construct of the "Torah of Moses" as a "central theological prop" (Eric Lawee, Isaac Abravanel's Stance toward Tradition: Defense, Dissent, and Dialogue [Albany: SUNY Press, 2001, p. 185]), often endorsing views that were even more conservative than those of his medieval predecessors.

Similarly, Abravanel's exposure to humanism did not come at the expense of his familiarity with scholastic philosophy. He quotes directly from Thomas Aquinas (ca. 1225–1274), Albertus Magnus (1206–1280), and Nicholas de Lyra (ca. 1270–1340), and from the Christian scholastics Abravanel derived the distinction between human government and divine government which parallels the scholastic distinction between temporal and spiritual authorities. The scholastic philosophers developed their political theory on the basis of Aristotle's Politics, though most Jewish thinkers did not use it. Abravanel, by contrast, made massive use of the third book of the Politics in his commentary on 1 Sam. ch 8, although he did not quote the text directly. With Aristotle's analysis of political regimes and his own experience in European courts, Abravanel could read the biblical text as a political document, but without concluding that the Bible as a whole is a human document.

The inquiry into the literary and historical dimensions of Scriptures continued throughout the 16th century, especially in Italy. The Hebrew grammarian Elija Levita (d. 1549) was the first Jew to show that the vocalization of the biblical text and the system of accents were the work of the Masoretes of Tiberias, after the Talmud had been completed in the 6th century. The Masoretes concretized the tradition of how the Bible should be read, how it should be transmitted in writing, and, concomitantly, how the Bible should be understood. Since prior to the Masoretes the biblical text was handed down without vocalization, punctuation, or other signs, the lateness of the Masoretic text indicates that the biblical text itself has a history. Levita's grammatical studies added yet another rationale for studying the Bible as any other ancient, human, literary text.

The best example of the historical awareness of Italian Jewish intellectuals was Azariah di Rossi (1512–1575). Familiar with classical and Renaissance historiography, Azariah composed his Me'or 'Einayim (Light of the Eyes) "to advance the legitimacy of objective historical inquiry into the Jewish past by establishing the total adequacy of religious tradition for purposes of moral edification, independent of any outside sources" (Lester A. Segal, Historical Consciousness and Religious Tradition in Azariah de Rossi's Me'or Einayim [Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1989], p. 30). Committed to the pursuit of truth, which Azariah regarded as "the seal of the truthful God, the quality of the beautiful soul, and it is well that all pursue it" (Segal, p. 32), Azariah moved to examine some of the problematic aspects of biblical chronology, such as "the uncertain duration of the First Temple period" (Segal, p. 31). Azariah did not intend to challenge the validity of the rabbinic tradition but rather to provide new evidence to prove the uniqueness of the people of Israel and their spiritual superiority in all aspects of human culture. Along with other Jewish apologists who argued for the doctrine of the divine election of Israel by showing that the Jews were the creators of music, di Rossi claimed that Moses was the author of the book of Job and the composer of the first known dialogue. While Azariah (like Abravanel before him) validated the authority of rabbinic tradition, his examination of the rab-binic past with references to non-Jewish texts and his observation about the historical origins of Jewish philosophy in the Greco-Roman world gave rise to a heated public controversy. Other contemporaries of di Rossi, such as Abraham ben David Portaleone (1542–1612), also affirmed the authority of the rabbinic tradition and the ideals of Torah study while at the same time providing rich historical and scientific information about aspects of the biblical text.

Awareness of the history of the biblical text itself was common among Jewish thinkers exposed to Renaissance humanism, especially in Italy. In the Ottoman Empire, however, most Sephardic intellectuals shared the kabbalistic notion that the revealed Torah is the manifestation of a supernal, primordial Torah that has infinite meanings. The task of the Jewish philosopher was to fathom the endless meaning of the Torah, knowing full well that it cannot be exhausted. In the Ottoman Empire, even more than in 15th century Spain, the Bible became the focus of philosophical midrash. Applying the analytic procedures of talmudic scholars to the biblical text, the philosopher-preachers attempted to penetrate the meaning of Scripture with scientific precision. The homilies of Isaac Karo (1458–1535) illustrate this tendency.

Assuming that his audience was fully familiar with the biblical text, Karo did not provide a running commentary but aimed at explicating Scripture in its complexity. In accord with the medieval assumption that Scripture is a scientific text, Karo held that the role of the commentator is to elucidate the practical and theoretical wisdom in the Bible because such understanding enables the soul of the learner to cling to God and to enjoy the bliss of immortality. Other contemporaries and successors of Karo, such as Joseph Taitatzak (ca. 1477–1545), Moses Almosnino (ca. 1515–1580), Isaac Aderbi (16th century), Isaac Arroyo (16th century), and Moshe Alshekh (d. after 1593) also considered the scrutiny of the Bible a religious activity par excellence leading to the attainment of immortal life. The philosophical exegesis of sacred texts reflects the theological postures that the exiles brought with them from Iberia, namely, that revealed religion perfects natural human reason and that the divinely revealed Torah contains all human wisdom because it is identical with the infinite wisdom of God.

The exegetical unveiling of the infinite meanings of Scripture required linguistic sophistication and rhetorical versatility. The Sephardic philosophers in the Ottoman Empire selectively adopted the Renaissance cult of rhetorica. Though the exiles did not boast a recovery of the ancient sources, living either in the land of Israel itself or merely getting closer to it did inspire the Jewish exegete to present the Bible as a perfect text, aesthetically, morally, and intellectually, measuring or surpassing the achievements of the classics. Thus Moses Almosnino (ca. 1515–1580), for example, presented King Solomon as the embodiment of Renaissance homo universalis and the wisest of all ancient sages, and the religious poetry of King David was favorably compared to Greek and Roman poetry. By the same token, the moral teachings of King David and King Solomon recorded in Psalms, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, and interpreted by the rabbinic sages, were claimed to have surpassed the moral wisdom of Aristotle, Cicero, and Seneca, along with other ancient moral philosophers.

During the 16th century, then, the historical-literary investigation of the Bible coexisted with the philosophical-homiletical approach. If the first approach regarded the Bible as a text like all others, the second approach accentuated the exceptionality of the Bible and its divine perfection. In the mid-17th century, especially in the Dutch Republic, the tension between the two approaches could not be glossed over, but resulted in open doubts about the divinity, authority, and exceptionality of the Bible. The most consistent and radical critic of the Bible and of the Jewish philosophical exposition of the Bible was Baruch (Benedict) Spinoza (1632–1676). A child of ex-conversos who received traditional Jewish education, Spinoza was familiar with the biblical commentaries of Abraham Ibn Ezra and Maimonides' Guide. Spinoza praised Ibn Ezra's linguistic insights, but vehemently rejected the philosophical hermeneutics of Maimonides. It is doubtful that Spinoza was informed of the biblical commentaries of Isaac Abravanel or that he was familiar with Azariah di Rossi's work. Yet Spinoza's challenge appears less radical if it is viewed in light of his Jewish predecessors.

Spinoza argued that the Bible could not be proven to be a divinely revealed text, and even if the Bible was revealed by God, its meaning is accessible only through human interpretation. Spinoza applied the historical-philological method to demonstrate inconsistencies—logical and temporal—in the Bible. The Bible, according to Spinoza, is a human document that must be studied like any other ancient text, a product of the imagination of its human authors. With a thorough knowledge of the Hebrew language and an understanding of the historical past, the Bible can be seen precisely for what it is: a book that teaches morality and politics rather than philosophy and science.

Rejecting Maimonides' claim that the Bible contains philosophical truths expressed in figurative language, Spinoza argued that the Bible has nothing to do with philosophy and science because it is a product of prophetic imagination. The prophets were neither scientists nor philosophers; they were people with limited knowledge of nature who were endowed with vivid imaginations, very much like poets. Unlike natural knowledge, prophecy cannot be taught and cannot be imitated; it is a special gift. Prophecy must not be regarded as the "highest degree of men" or the "ultimate term of perfection," as Maimonides held, for which reason prophecy requires an external "sign" to verify its authenticity. With his critique of prophecy Spinoza not only denied the epistemic superiority of the biblical text, which has been presupposed by all Jewish philosophers since Philo, he also rejected the Maimonidean attempt to interpret the Bible esoterically. Because there is no hidden truth behind the surface of the Bible, Spinoza charged Maimonides and his followers with an attempt to make Scripture present the same teachings as pagan philosophers.

For Spinoza truth is not a property of Scripture, as Jewish philosophers since Philo had maintained, but a characteristic of the method of interpreting Scripture. Differentiating between the meaning of Scripture and its truth, Spinoza asserted that the meaning must be found solely from the usage of language, for which mastery of Hebrew grammar is absolutely necessary. The Bible does not accommodate itself to human limitations; rather, radicalizing earlier ideas found in rabbinic literature, the Bible speaks the only language it can speak, namely, a human language. To the extent that the Bible does have a universal message, it has nothing to do with philosophy or science but with morality, namely, the commandment to love one's neighbor. This message, Spinoza believed, is the reason why the Bible is still politically relevant, even though the political order established by Moses in the Bible no longer exists. The Bible teaches against religious intolerance and persecution, and in this regard the Bible is the basis of universal ethics; yet the Bible is not an exceptional, or privileged text. To treat the Bible as such is itself the result of "prejudice," a harmful habit of thought that hinders clear thinking. In short, the Bible has no cognitive significance or authority. It rather reflects the ordinary conception of God as imagined by common people of the time, among whom were the prophets.

Spinoza regarded the editorial work of the Bible, which he ascribed to Ezra, as far from perfect, because the text of the Bible was put together at a considerably later time from the events recorded. Through close reading of the text, Spinoza attempted to show that biblical religion developed over time. Spinoza portrayed Moses strictly as a legislator and political leader who single-handedly ruled a mass of ex-slaves who were incapable of self-governance. The law that Moses gave Israel left no free choice for individuals, and Moses could induce the Israelites to observe the law only by promising material benefits. Spinoza then rehashed some of the Christian arguments about the nature of Mosaic law, which highlighted its earthly nature of biblical rewards and the absence of spiritual rewards. Biblical religion then deals only with temporal matters and has nothing to do with ultimate felicity, even though biblical religion provided a universal, ethical basis to a society.

Spinoza's devastating critique of the Bible undermined the foundation of rabbinic Judaism. Though Spinoza articulated his biblical criticism after he was excommunicated on July 27, 1657, his challenge was correctly assessed by the leaders of the Jewish community who expelled him. Refusing conversion to Christianity, Spinoza socialized with the Collegiants, an offshoot of a radical Calvinist group whose liberal theological and political views had been condemned by official Calvinism early in the century and who were hospitable to people alienated from their own religious communities. Spinoza also rejected a post at the University of Heidelberg in order to maintain his intellectual freedom, preferring to correspond with contemporary scientists such as Henry Oldenburg, the secretary of the Royal Society in London. Spinoza's critique of the Bible became known in England and inspired the English Deists of the late 17th and early 18th centuries. Some Deists attacked the Bible for its lack of a doctrine of immortality, whereas for others the dubious moral character of the prophets and other biblical heroes was a sign of the inferior quality of the Bible.

Spinoza's challenge to traditional Judaism would continue to reverberate throughout the modern period as biblical criticism became prevalent, especially among Protestant scholars. That challenge of biblical criticism, on the one hand, and the determination of Jews to integrate into European society, on the other hand, necessitated a reinterpretation of Judaism. The traditional belief in the revealed status of Scripture would have to be rethought with new philosophical tools during the modern period. Modern Jewish philosophy would be articulated on the basis of Judaism's conversation with the Enlightenment, Kantianism, Hegelianism and Romanticism, affecting the approaches to the Bible. In modern times, as in the Middle Ages, the Bible continued to serve as the bridge between the particularistic beliefs of Judaism and non-Jewish cultures.

Modern Jewish Philosophy

Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1786) captures the transition from premodern to modern philosophy. Although he was a staunch advocate of Jewish emancipation and a proponent of the Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah), Mendelssohn remained deeply committed to traditional Jewish life. At the same time, he also socialized with the leading intellectuals in Germany, who regarded him as spokesman of the German Enlightenment. Mendelssohn's views were shaped by German philosophers such as Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646–1716), Christian Wolff (1679–1754), and Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–1781) no less than by Maimonides and Spinoza.

Endorsing the Enlightenment concept of natural religion, Mendelssohn maintained that reason alone can prove that God exists, that God governs the universe through providence, and that the human soul is immortal. These three universal propositions are accessible to the human mind without a special revelation from God. In contrast to Jewish medieval philosophers, Mendelssohn held that revelation does not disclose any ideas that cannot be discovered by human reason. In terms of truth, there is only one source (viz. reason) rather than two (viz. reason and revelation). If natural religion requires no additional revelation, what then is Judaism? Mendelssohn answers that Judaism is not a revealed religion but a "revealed legislation." At Sinai God did not reveal any truths or doctrines, but only laws. Prior to the Sinaitic event, the ancient Israelites already reached a level of intellectual development resulting in the knowledge of three pillars of natural religion. What distinguishes Jews from non-Jews is not religion, which is common to all humans endowed with reason, but a specific legislation obligatory to Jews only. The revealed legislation charts the particular path that Israel alone must follow in order to attain the felicity to which all human beings aspire. And since the laws were revealed by God rather than discovered by humans, they could neither be changed nor abrogated. In Mendelssohn's mind, loyalty to the laws of Judaism was fully compatible with the rationalist universalism of the Enlightenment.

The Bible stood at the center of Mendelssohn's attempts to modernize the Jews and prepare them for integration into European society. He translated parts of the Bible into German but printed the translation in Hebrew characters in order to make it accessible to Yiddish-speaking Jews whom he wished to wean away from the language that symbolized Jewish cultural backwardness. In addition to the translation of the Bible, Mendelssohn composed and edited commentaries in Hebrew in order to offer Jews an alternative to Protestant biblical commentaries. Like his medieval predecessors, Mendelssohn began his exegetical endeavor by composing a commentary on Ecclesiastes (1768–1769), but in contrast to them Mendelssohn saw Ecclesiastes in a philosophical light that attributed its skepticism to imagined conversation partners. On the basis of medieval commentaries, especially by Rashi, Radak, and Abraham Ibn Ezra, Mendelssohn focused on the literal meaning of the biblical text and on the accent marks of the Masoretic Text in order to clarify Ecclesiastes' philosophical stance. Ecclesiastes, Mendelssohn argued, taught no theoretical knowledge but only practical knowledge conducive to moral improvement and in accord with contemporary science. Nonetheless, Mendelssohn still defended the traditional Jewish view that King Solomon was the author of Ecclesiastes and perpetuated the notion that the ancient king was the source of all known sciences. Hence, there is no surprise that even Harvey's theory of blood circulation (1628) is alluded to, according to Mendelssohn, in Eccl. 12.6: "Before the silver cord snaps and the golden bowl crashes, the jar is shattered at the spring and the jug is smashed at the cistern" (David Sorkin, Moses Mendelssohn and the Religion of Enlightenment [Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1996], p. 43). While few Jews paid attention to Mendelssohn's commentary on Ecclesiastes, German biblical scholars translated it into German and published it in 1771.

During the 1770s Mendelssohn worked on the German translation of the Psalms, which he regarded as a seminal biblical text for moral and spiritual edification. Familiar with the aesthetic theories of the 18th century, Mendelssohn considered the Psalms the highest exemplar of the sublime and believed that the Psalms illustrate how theology and aesthetics are intertwined. He translated the Psalms into German in order to show the glory of Hebrew lyric poetry alongside classical and Nordic poetry and also in order to replace existing German translations of the Psalms, especially Luther's, even though Mendelssohn held that translation in great esteem and retained some of its most elegant parts. The translation of the Psalms was published in 1785 and was well received by Jews throughout Europe.

The crown of Mendelssohn's biblical studies and educational activities was the translation of the Torah into German with an accompanying Hebrew commentary (known as Bi'ur, 1780–1783). With the help of the grammarian Solomon Dubno (1738–1813), Mendelssohn focused on the literal meaning of the text (peshat), often relying on the commentary of Abraham Ibn Ezra, in an attempt to respond to the challenges of contemporary biblical criticism. While Mendelssohn considered the literal meaning to be primary, he still defended the legitimacy of rabbinic homiletical exegesis (derash). Mendelssohn's translation and commentaries on the Torah was a true group effort. Dubno departed from the project before completing the assigned commentary on Genesis, but other Jewish Enlightenment figures joined it. Naphtali Hertz Wessley (1725–1805) wrote the commentary on Leviticus, and Hertz Homberg (1749–1841) and Aaron Jaroslav commented on Numbers and Deuteronomy. When the five volumes were reissued as one volume, under the title Sefer Netivot ha-Shalom (The Book of the Paths of Peace), Mendelssohn composed a new introduction, titled 'Or Netivah (Light for the Path), spelling out the principles of the entire enterprise.

According to Mendelssohn the Bible is not about revealed truth but about “trust and faith that result in Israel’s obedience through the Commandments, which are the preeminent form of practical knowledge” (Sorkin, p. 55). Since Mendelssohn understood the Bible as a record of the unique covenantal relationship between God and Israel, his views were closer to Judah Halevi’s than to Maimonides’s. With Halevi, Mendelssohn held that Sinai was a historical, collective event in which Moses directly heard God’s speech and wrote it down. Contrary to Maimonides, Mendelssohn regarded the Hebrew language not as a conventional human language but as a divine language. Even the accents of the Masoretic texts, said Mendelssohn, have a divine source. Moses could transmit divine communication to Joshua so accurately because of the unique features of the Hebrew language: It is the only language whose written form retains the oral nature of all languages. The task of the translator and commentator is to capture the sense of the text, and Mendelssohn took as his model the ancient Aramaic translator of the Bible, Onkelos, regarded as authoritative by the rabbinic tradition. The emphasis on the unique orality of the biblical text was Mendelssohn’s best proof against the Documentary Hypothesis, which was based on the lateness of the Masoretic Text. In Mendelssohn’s view the oral tradition preserved the way God had spoken, which Moses duly recorded. Mendelssohn was not oblivious to the historical study of the Bible, but he believed that it could only help establish the traditional Jewish faith.

Mendelssohn’s idiosyncratic blend of Jewish traditionalism and Enlightenment rationalism was difficult to perpetuate to the next generation. Traditional Jews, suspicious of the Emancipation and its perils, were critical of his biblical translation and commentaries; and the more radical disciples who desired full integration into German culture found his observance of Jewish law a hindrance to their goal. Even Mendelssohn’s own children failed to reconcile the two worlds of their father; all but one of his six children converted to Christianity. Ironically, Christian contemporaries of Mendelssohn understood his claim that Judaism is a revealed legislation to mean that Judaism is a legalistic, obsolete fossil of an ancient era, a ceremonial law that has no vitality. This view was accepted by Immanuel Kant and through him became commonplace among German intellectuals of the 19th century.

For Jews in Germany and Central Europe, the 19th century consisted of the relentless struggle to gain civil rights and social acceptance, the rise of Wissenschaft des Judentums (the scientific study of Judaism), and the drive to reform Judaism from within. Whereas the emancipation of the Jews was possible because of the French Revolution, the defeats of Napoleon rolled the process back as anti-Jewish fulminations swept through Germany. The violence against Jews in Bavaria during the Hep!Hep! riots of 1819 accentuated Jewish insecurity and manifested the unwillingness of German society to see Jews as equals. In response, a group of Jewish scholars convened in Berlin in November 1819 to found the Society (Verein) for the Culture and Scientific Study of the Jews. Its agenda was to examine the entire records of the Jewish past—biblical and rabbinic—from a scientific perspective and aided with new tools of contemporary science, especially history and philology. The members of the society had different interests and agendas: Some wished to show how Judaism contributed to Western civilization, in order to secure a position in German academia, while others were mostly interested in ameliorating the situation of the Jews and improving Jewish education. Still others were primarily concerned with determining what is subject to change in Judaism, and hence obsolete, as opposed to the eternal essence of Judaism that is not subject to change. Although their research into the Jewish past was of highest academic quality, it did not lead to university posts. In frustration, the Jewish scholars created their own institutions of higher learning, that is, rabbinical seminaries in which Jewish students studied the entire gamut of Jewish literary heritage scientifically and objectively.

The critical stance of Wissenschaft des Judentums scholarship was mainly directed toward postbiblical Judaism, but the Bible could not remain immune to it. In 1810 a student of Mendelssohn, Yehuda Leib ben Ze'ev, published his Mavo' 'el Mikra'ey Kodesh (Introduction to Holy Scriptures), which was modeled after J. C. Eichhorn's study by the same title, in which he established the composite nature of the book of Isaiah, among other critical observations. Leopold Zunz (1794–1886) in his The Religious Teachings of the Jews, Historically Developed (Die gottesdienstlichen Vortraege der Juden, historisch entwickelt [1832]) advanced daring new theses regarding the books of Chronicles and the Psalter. Isaac Samuel Regio (1784–1855) and Shlomo Yehudah Rapoport (1790–1867) also advanced critical theses regarding Isaiah and Psalms. What was commonplace among Protestant biblical critics of the 19th century was beginning to make inroads in Jewish scholarship. A new Jewish philosophy was needed to integrate contemporary historical research into a new schema. It was provided by Nachman Krochmal (1785–1840).

Krochmal was the first modern Jewish philosopher to make not only the Jewish religion but also the Jewish people a subject for philosophic investigation, thereby providing a philosophic explanation of Jewish history. His philosophic model was Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831), though he was also deeply influenced by Giambattista Vico (1668–1744), Johan Gottfried Herder (1744–1803), and the German Idealists, Friedrich von Schlegel (1772–1829) and Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von Schelling (1775–1854). No less central to Krochmal's reinterpretation of Judaism were the views of Maimonides, Ibn Ezra, Spinoza, and Mendelssohn, as well as the teachings of kabbalah. Krochmal's Moreh Nevukhei Ha-Zeman (The Guide for the Perplexed of This Time) was written in 1840 and published posthumously in 1851, edited by Leopold Zunz. The title, a play on Maimonides' great work, was no accident: Krochmal wished to accomplish for the Jews of his generation what Maimonides did for his contemporaries: a comprehensive reconciliation of Judaism with the reigning philosophy. Since the Aristotelianism of Maimonides was now obsolete, and Maimonides' emphasis on God's radical otherness was religiously unsatisfying, a reconceptualization of Judaism in terms of the reigning Idealist philosophy was now in order. The Neoplatonic ontology of Ibn Ezra's philosophy and the teachings of kabbalah served Krochmal to prove that Judaism is a metaphysical system that is not only compatible with German Idealism, but that Judaism is the most refined expression of the Absolute Spirit.

Writing in Hebrew to the proponents of Jewish Enlightenment in Galicia, Bohemia, Moravia, and Italy, who were disoriented by modernity but who had not lost their Jewish commitment, Krochmal introduced the post-Kantian understanding of the relationship between religion and philosophy. For Krochmal "religion and philosophy are essentially identical, in that both represent processes of speculation, which are equal in their apprehension of truth" (Jay M. Harris, Nachman Krochmal: Guiding the Perplexed of the Modern Ages [New York: New York University Press, 1991], p. 26). But whereas philosophy conceives of Spirit in the form of concepts, religion does so through representations (Vorstellungen). The representation is a form of consciousness higher than that of sensation and observation but lower than that of concept. The representations of religion (i.e., the metaphors and symbols) "are not expressions of poetic genius and creativity; rather, they are rooted in the universal mind—the essence of human spirituality—and therefore virtually all metaphors are equivalent in many different languages" (Harris, p. 27). Krochmal's view of prophetic activity would thus place him between Maimonides and Spinoza. While agreeing with Maimonides that there is a relationship between theology and truth, Krochmal also was in agreement with Spinoza that prophets and theologians cannot be considered philosophers.

For Krochmal, who defined religion as the belief in spiritual powers, biblical religion is the highest form of religion; it contains the same faith in the Absolute Spirit which is present in the ultimate truth of philosophy. Krochmal's biblical studies and his philosophy of history were to document this claim. Krochmal was fully aware that much of biblical criticism was at odds with prevailing Jewish traditional ideas, but he believed that proper understanding of the Bible and postbiblical history could show both the continuity of Jewish faith and its evolution over time. With detailed knowledge of rabbinic Jewish exegesis and modern biblical criticism, Krochmal was intent to prove that the Rabbis in fact shared the assumptions of the modern critics. Thus in regard to the book of Isaiah, Krochmal argues that the Rabbis themselves were aware of the composite nature of the book and its rather late date of composition. To his satisfaction, he manages to prove that critical conclusions about Isaiah are compatible with traditional sensibilities.

Similarly, Krochmal uses the rabbinic debate about the doubtful sanctity of Ecclesiastes (m. Yad. 3:5) to prove that "wisdom, and especially Solomon's wisdom, is acknowledged to be a gift from God, and therefore the Rabbis could not have denigrated Qohelet [Ecclesiastes] for being simply a product of Solomon's mind, for this would, in fact, confer upon it sufficient status to be worthy of canonization" (Harris, p. 176). The very fact that the Rabbis debated it proved to him that they entertained the possibility that the book was not authored by Solomon but by a later author. The Rabbis, Krochmal maintains, were equally aware of the late date of composition of some of the psalms, even as late as 2nd century BCE, notwithstanding the fact that the tradition ascribed them to King David. Traditional Jews, then, should not ignore contemporary biblical scholarship but rather incorporate it into their own understanding of the tradition since it is in many ways consonant with earlier traditions. Krochmal believed that contemporary modern biblical scholarship proves his philosophy of history: Jewish creativity and vitality is eternal and ever-evolving. Unlike any other nation that exhibits the finite cycle of growth, maturation, and disintegration, the Jewish people is eternal. Due to its special relationship with God, the Absolute Spirit, the Jewish people repeatedly renews its national life, manifesting the eternal Absolute Spirit.

Whereas Krochmal articulated a Jewish philosophy that addressed the perplexity of East European Enlightened Jews who wished to remain loyal to Judaism, in Germany the dominant secular philosopher who shaped Jewish thinking was not Hegel and other Idealist philosophers, but Immanuel Kant (1724–1804). His claim that human beings are in principle unable to have certain knowledge about God, the soul, and the origin of the universe was intended not to abolish faith, but to make room for it. For Kant, faith was rational, an apprehension of the greatest good and striving toward it. Although Kant denied the possibility of metaphysics and limited the scope of theoretical, demonstrative knowledge to the phenomenal world of sense perception, he did not deny the existence of God. Indeed, reason must postulate the existence of God, but the "only content we can ascribe to our idea of God is moral." God is not the giver of the moral law but the "necessary condition for the possibility of the summum bonum," i.e., for the "distribution of happiness in exact proportion to morality" (Critique of Practical Reason, trans. Beck [1956], p. 129). The existence of God is postulated in order to fulfill a fundamental requirement of the moral law, namely, that the virtuous man is worthy of happiness. True religion, in contrast to clericalism, is, therefore, an ethical religion in which the kingdom of God is nothing else than the ethical commonwealth: "If God is to be found at all, it is not behind nature but behind moral law" (Kenneth Seeskin, Jewish Philosophy in a Secular Age [Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990], p. 58). So long as we think about God as a moral agent, we cannot be accused of anthropomorphism, since morality has no empirical content. God cannot do otherwise than act as is morally required. Yet Kant also showed that historical religion did not develop in ignorance of the moral law. He wants to claim that actual religions have in one way or another approached the ideal of the pure founded on a universal conception of humanity and a commitment to its moral improvement. Unless actual religion approached this ideal it would be impossible for Kant to argue that it is engraved on each of our hearts. Not surprisingly, Kant's depiction of Judaism was anything but complimentary. Following Spinoza and Mendelssohn, Kant viewed Judaism as a mere national-political entity, contending that it fails to satisfy the essential criteria of religion in that it fails to inculcate the appropriate inner morals, demanding only external obedience to statutes and law. Judaism, Kant said in accord with traditional Christian perception, is concerned only with things of this world and lacks any formulation of the concept of immortality.

Kant's philosophic formulation of religion accorded with the orientation of modern liberal Judaism. Seeking to distill the essence of Judaism that remained constant throughout the process of change over time, Reform theologians defined the essence of Judaism as ethical monotheism. Kant's understanding of the moral law as rational self-legislation was believed to be totally congruent with the biblical emphasis on "duty" and "right." The Jewish followers of Kant reinterpreted Judaism in such a way that it would conform to Kant's formulation of religion, while at the same time rejecting Kant's critique of Judaism.

Hermann Cohen (1842-1918), the towering Jewish philosopher of the late 19th century, was able to show how a Neo-Kantian reading of Judaism leads to universalizing the revealed message of the Bible. Benefiting from the final success of the Emancipation in Germany, Cohen held a regular academic post at the University of Marburg, reformulating the principles of Kantian philosophy. While rethinking Kant during the 1870s, Cohen also witnessed the rise of modern anti-Semitism as a backlash to the Emancipation. In his A Public Declaration Concerning the Jewish Question (Ein Bekenntnis zur Judenfrage [1880]), Cohen called for the total integration of German Jewry into German society, but while calling Jews to take their religion seriously. Cohen got involved in a public defense of Judaism against anti-Semitic charges that according to the Talmud the laws of the Torah apply only to Jews and not to relations between Jews and Christians. He rejected this reading and published his view that Israel's chosenness by God from the outset had universal scope: Since God is the one who loves the stranger, Israel is chosen as a mission to mankind.

Cohen did not write a commentary on the Bible, but his main exposition of Jewish philosophy—Religion of Reason out of the Sources of Judaism—takes most of its data from the Bible. Rejecting Kant's portrayal of Judaism, Cohen argued that when properly understood "the ancient sources and their received interpretation are much closer to a morally pure faith than Kant thought" (Seeskin, Jewish Philosophy, p. 160). Cohen does not say that Judaism is the religion of reason, but rather that the ideas of a purely rational faith can be found in Jewish sources, first among them the Bible. At the University of Marburg, Cohen's colleagues included Julius Wellhausen, the most important biblical scholar of the time. Cohen's reformulation of biblical religion could be viewed as an attempt to reject some of the claims of Wellhausen and his followers. Cohen's religion is strictly ethical religion or religion of ethics. Morality is an infinite task of self-sanctification, precisely as Lev. 11.44 ("For I the LORD am your God: you shall sanctify yourselves and be holy, for I am holy") teaches. For Cohen, however, the laws of ancient Israel are of universal scope. Precisely because there is only one God, there can be only one law applicable to all people who share a common dignity (Lev. 19.34; 24.22). The social legislation of the Bible is not restricted to Jews only but applies to the "stranger," namely to all humans. Cohen interpreted the command to love the stranger along the lines of Kantian philosophy: It is not a commandment forced on us by a supernatural being but a duty that we in our better moments would impose on ourselves. The Bible itself, especially the book of Deuteronomy, spells out the need to bridge the gap between what is and what ought to be.

Following a Protestant model, in the teachings of prophets Cohen found the most refined expression of the relationship between humanity and God. The prophets made pity and sympathy for others the cornerstone of their moral teachings. Through empathy with the suffering of my neighbor I am able to encounter the person as a Thou rather than merely as an instance of humanity. The main challenge to humanity is not impending death but the experience of poverty, about which the prophets were deeply concerned (Cohen, Religion of Reason, tr. Kaplan [New York, 1972], pp. 135–136). Ethics, then, needs the idea of a perfect being to guarantee that our effort to perfect the world has some hope of succeeding. God does not only sustain the world but shows compassion for those who suffer and forgives those whose quest for self-sanctification falls short. The forgiveness of sin brings God into relation with each person, who remains a sinner in constant need of God. Thus, religion goes beyond ethics; religion does not negate our duties as moral agents but provides us with a richer conception of the task of fulfilling them.

Hermann Cohen influenced an entire class of German Jewish philosophers, including Ernest Cassirer (1874–1945), Julius Guttman (1880–1950), Leo Baeck (1873–1956), Joseph B. Soloveitchik (1903–1993), and Steven Schwarzchild (1924–1989), as well as the work of the biblical scholar Yehezkel Kaufmann (1889–1963). After resigning from his post in Marburg, Cohen joined the Academie für die Wissenschaft des Judentums in Berlin, calling on Jewish scholars not to divorce scientific study from inner piety. His aim was to encourage Jewish scholars to establish an intimate bond between their scholarly and spiritual interests. Cohen's disciple Franz Rosenzweig would later perpetuate the fiction that in later life Cohen renounced his commitment to religion of reason; in truth Cohen remained consistent throughout his life, advocating the idealization of Judaism through a correct reading of the Bible.

After Cohen's death in 1918, Jewish philosophy in Germany would be dominated by two main figures—Martin Buber (1878–1965) and Franz Rosenzweig (1886–1929)—who also collaborated on a new translation of the Bible into German. The goal of that translation was precisely the opposite of Mendelssohn's enterprise a century and a half earlier: Whereas Mendelssohn wanted the Jews of his day to master the German language in order to integrate into German society, the Buber-Rosenzweig translation of the Bible intended to Hebraicize the Bible for German Jewish readers who had been thoroughly integrated into German culture and who had been emotionally and practically distanced from Judaism. The translation begun in 1925 was completed in 1961 by Buber alone after many intermissions, and long after Rosenzweig's untimely death in 1929. Tragically, when that new translation of the Bible into German was completed, German Jewry, for whom it was intended, was no longer in existence.

Despite their collaboration and deep respect for each other, Buber and Rosenzweig did not share the same understanding of the Bible. For Buber the language of the Bible was inseparable from the living Hebrew language and the foundational stratum of Jewish culture. Along with other Jewish biblical scholars such as Simon Bernfeld (1860–1940), Abraham Kahana (1874–1946), Benno Jacob (1862–1945), Moses David Cassuto (1883–1951), Yehezkel Kaufmann (1889–1963), Moses Hirsch Segal (1877–1968), and Naphtali Herz Tur-Sinai (1886–1973), Buber rejected the dominant readings of the Bible by Protestant theologians. Instead of theologizing the Bible, these scholars attempted to listen to the Bible's own unique voice, emphasize the rhythm of living utterance reflected in it, trace the associative elements that lead the attentive listener to the original meaning of the living utterance, and explore the concrete meaning and original dynamics of basic words. Unlike some of his Jewish cohorts, Buber had no difficulty maintaining a critical distance from the biblical text or sorting out the seeming contradictions and inconsistencies of the Bible without feeling apologetic about it. At the same time, Buber developed distinctive linguistic tools that enabled him to wrest the lived experience from the biblical text.

With Rosenzweig, Buber introduced the search for key-words (Leitwörter) repeated in a given text with stubborn consistency, conveying its meaning. The key words force the listener not only to concentrate in a particular manner but also to participate in the experience evoked by the biblical text. Buber's translation attempted to retain the identity of each Hebrew root without blurring its manifold associations; if the semantic field of German words was too narrow in scope, Buber created new compound words in which the added word or root explained the particular development of a basic root. Through this message, Buber attempted to penetrate the primordial life of the spoken word as it reflected the unique otherness of the speaker. In this regard, Buber's translation/interpretation of the Bible stood in diametrical opposition to medieval philosophical commentaries that highlighted the abstract, philosophical content of the Bible.

Buber's attempt to recapture the concrete, living, unique human utterance of the biblical text differed from the approach of his collaborator, Franz Rosenzweig. For him, the goal of the translation was to break through the linguistic particularity of the text to the supra-linguistic language without word. He did not compose a commentary on the Bible but his philosophical magnum opus, Der Stern der Erlösung (The Star of Redemption), presented his biblical theology as an alternative to Western philosophy. For Rosenzweig, not only is revelation an encounter with the Other, revelatory speech is dialogical. Rosenzweig states: "The ways of God are different from the ways of man, but the word of God and the word of man are the same. What man hears in his heart as his own human speech is the very word which comes out of God's mouth" (The Star of Redemption, trans. William W. Hallo [Boston: Beacon Press, 1972], p. 151). Accordingly Rosenzweig reinterpreted the prophetic speech: "The prophet does not mediate between God and man. He does not receive revelation in order to pass it on; rather, the voice of God sounds forth directly from within him, God speaks as 'I' directly from within him." (Star, p. 178). In the Bible Rosenzweig found the "I" addressed by God. Biblical literature is unique because it authenticates the renewal of the divine word.

Buber, by contrast, did not believe that through the Bible one can still hear the voice of the living God, because he considered the Bible itself to be a human response to the encounter with God. Though we cannot hear the voice of God, we can hear the voice of those who were in the presence of God. In doing so, the listener/reader stands again in the presence of God. The encounter with God, according to Buber, is a content-less experience that cannot be rendered propositionally. Developing Cohen's emphasis on correlation, Buber highlighted the relational nature of reality. All existence has two relational modalities: an I-It or an I-Thou. In Kantian terms, the former modality treats the other as a means to an end, whereas the latter treats the other as an end for its own sake. The I-Thou is the ideal relationship that, alas, cannot be maintained over time, since it necessarily disintegrates into I-It, objectifying the other. The only Thou that cannot be objectified is God, the Eternal Thou. Revelation, for Buber, is not a single event in the remote past, but an ongoing encounter with the presence of God. Similarly, the revelation at Sinai did not signify the disclosure of a legal code but a living experience of God's immediate presence. The spokenness (Geschprochenheit) of the Bible captures that direct encounter between God and the people of the time. The intent of the new German translation was to come as close as possible to the raw spokenness of the Bible. For Buber the engagement in biblical studies in Nazi Germany was an act of spiritual resistance. He finally departed from Germany in 1938 and settled in Israel (then called Palestine) where he continued the translation enterprise and went on to compose various essays on the Bible, the most important of which was Moses, written in 1944 and published in 1946. These mid-rashic essays illustrated Buber's own dialogical relationship with the biblical text, attempting to retrieve the past experience in order to stand once again in the presence of God.

In 1937, just a year before he departed from Germany, Buber appointed Abraham Joshua Heschel (1907–1972) to succeed him as supervisor of adult education in Germany and director of the Jüdisches Lehrhaus at Frankfurt am Main, the main institutional context for the revitalization of Jewish life in Germany since the 1920s. The Nazis, however, deported Heschel (who was a Polish Jew) back to Poland in 1938, and after several months of teaching in Warsaw he was able to emigrate to England and from there to the United States in 1940. What Buber attempted to accomplish for the Jews of Germany, Heschel attempted to accomplish, with partial success, for American Jews. It was a dialogical reinterpretation of Judaism that addressed the predicament of modernity, its gnawing doubts and rootlessness. The tragedy of the modern person is the loss of the ability to ask the right questions to which the Bible is the answer. Heschel powerfully stated the challenge facing humanity in the second half of the 20th century: "Our problem . . . is how to share the certainty of Israel that the Bible contains that which God wants us to know and to hearken to; how to attain a collective sense for the presence of God in the biblical words. In this problem lies the dilemma of our fate, and in the answer lies the dawn or the doom" (God in Search of Man: A Philosophy of Judaism [New York: Farrar Straus and Giroux, 1955], p. 246). In the return to the Bible lies the solution to the modern predicament of Jews and non-Jews alike.

In continuity with Buber, Heschel denied that the Bible is a philosophical text or that the God of the Bible is a philosophical abstraction or a psychological projection. Rather, God is a living reality who takes passionate interest in the life of His creatures, or as Heschel's celebrated title put it, God is in search of man. Indeed, "the Bible is not primarily man's vision of God, but God's vision of man" (Man Is Not Alone: A Philosophy of Religion [New York: Farrar Straus and Giroux, 1951], p. 129). Heschel then placed God at the center of the divine-human drama told in the Bible, a long story of God's active pursuit of a rebellious Israel. The biblical text itself came into being as a response to God's revealing power. In Heschel's understanding of the Bible, the question of authorship, which exercised so much of modern biblical scholarship, is a moot point. The Bible is a product of divine and human authorships.

Heschel viewed attachment to the Bible to be essential to continued Jewish existence. The destiny of the Jewish people is to be a "community in whom the Bible lives on." Israel must remain dedicated to the Bible in order for the Bible to remain "a sublime challenge and source of illumination for the world." Since the Bible is "the frontier of the spirit" that "shows the way of God with man and the way of man with God," had the Bible not been preserved, an invaluable pathway to God would be lost. The current spiritual poverty throughout the world is due largely to a "growing alienation from the Bible" (God in Search of Man, pp. 252, 238). Heschel viewed the Bible as the deepest alternative to the spiritual malaise of the 20th century, the only hope for the revival of divine wisdom, justice and compassion. Heschel was committed to reengagement with the Bible in order to preserve the Jewish faith for the future.

In his doctoral dissertation at the University of Berlin, Die Prophetie (1933), which was later published in an expanded form in The Prophets (1962), Heschel articulated the doctrine of divine pathos according to which "God does not reveal himself in an abstract absoluteness, but in a personal and intimate relation to the world. . . . God is also moved and affected by what happens in the world, and reacts accordingly" (Heschel, The Prophets [New York: Harper and Row, 1962], pp. 223–224). "It is precisely because God is filled with pathos for human beings that they may respond with sympathy to God. . . . The prophetic faith is thus a sympathetic response to divine pathos" (John C. Merkle, "Heschel's Theology of Divine Pathos," in John C. Merkle (ed.), Abraham Joshua Heschel: Exploring His Life and Thought [London and New York, 1985], p. 81).

Heschel's uncanny ability to present the biblical faith as the answer to the modern predicament was partially responsible for the spiritual revival of Judaism in America during the 1960s and 1970s. Yet it is hard to gauge whether Heschel's enormous fame as a cultural icon actually led American Jews in search of Jewish renewal back to the study of the Bible. Jewish Studies programs began to sprout in the 1970s at the same time that Religious Studies departments were established in secular universities. Courses in the Bible were then offered as part of the academic study of religion, and the Bible was now studied either as an ancient Near Eastern document, or as sophisticated "literature" that illustrated many of the linguistic subtleties of contemporary literary theories, or as a source of information about the socio-cultural setting of the framers of the biblical canon. For Jewish Studies professors in American universities, the philosophic import of the Bible has become neglected, presumably because taking the biblical text as Scripture, namely, as an existentially meaningful text, is perceived as belonging in the denominational seminaries but not in the secular university.

Three contemporary Jewish philosophical theologians—Norbert M. Samuelson (b. 1936), David R. Blumenthal (b. 1938) and Judith Plaskow (b. 1947)—challenge this convention, illustrating the continued relevance of the Bible for contemporary Jewish thought and the indebtedness to Buber and Heschel. Samuelson illustrates how the Bible is engaged in the context of the dialogue between science and religion. Though his academic training was in analytic philosophy and medieval Jewish philosophy, Samuelson regards the task of Jewish philosophy to be predominantly constructive rather than historical or analytical. Since what is true in the Bible must be in accord with what is known to be true in contemporary science, if the literal meaning of the biblical text is in conflict with contemporary science, it could not be the correct reading of the text. Samuelson's reading of the creation narrative shows how the biblical story of creation accords with contemporary physics. (See Norbert M. Samuelson, The First Seven Days: A Philosophical Commentary on the Creation of Genesis [Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992]; Judaism and the Doctrine of Creation [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994].) Samuelson's theory of revelation is very much in accord with Buber's, but his approach to the biblical text is similar to medieval biblical exegesis, in that it pays close attention to contemporary science.

Like Samuelson, David Blumenthal was trained as a historian of medieval Jewish philosophy, but has devoted his efforts to writing constructive Jewish philosophy. If for Samuelson contemporary science is the main challenge to the meaning of the Bible, for Blumenthal the point of departure is the trauma of the Holocaust. Applying post-Structuralist strategies to the Psalms, Blumenthal attempts to construct a post-Holocaust Jewish theology by therapeutically confronting the personal God of Israel as an abusive deity (David R. Blumenthal, Facing the Abusing God: A Theology of Protest [Louisville: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1993], esp. pp. 57–192). Selecting Pss. 128, 44, 109, and 27 for close reading, Blumenthal offers not only his own new translation of the psalms but also four simultaneous commentaries. The first commentary is a philological commentary based on existing biblical scholarship. The second commentary is written under the influence of Heschel, Blumenthal's teacher, in an attempt to capture the spiritual tradition of Hasidism. The third commentary focuses "on the emotional attitudes which the psalmist tradition wishes us to cultivate," and the fourth commentary attempts "to respond to Jacques Derrida, Michel Foucault, Sigmund Freud, Alice Miller, Carol Gilligan, Jessica Benjamin, Elie Wiesel and others in the calling-reading-proclaiming of the psalms" (pp. 58–60). By writing four simultaneous glosses on the biblical text, Blumenthal intentionally mimics the medieval Jewish exegetical tradition, clearly implying that he sees his work in continuity with medieval predecessors no less than an attempt to respond to psychoanalysis, deconstruction, feminism, and the Holocaust. It remains to be seen whether this reading will catch the imagination of American Jews.

At present the one contemporary Jewish theologian who has succeeded in influencing how some American Jews approach the Bible is Judith Plaskow, perhaps the best-known Jewish feminist (see "Women's Scholarly Writings," pp. 2000–2005). She has argued that Judaism is in need of healing not because of the Holocaust but because of the systematic and pernicious exclusion of women from the activity of scriptural interpretation. (See Judith Plaskow, Standing Again at Sinai [San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1990].) Women were present at Sinai but it was the male-centered rabbinic tradition that ignored, silenced, and marginalized women. A new reading of the Bible is necessary if Jewish women are to be restored to their rightful place within the tradition and become creative readers of their own sacred texts. Plaskow inaugurated an insightful feminist engagement with the Bible and rekindled a feminist midrashic discourse, but since most of those who engage in this enterprise are not philosophically trained, feminist biblical interpretations to date lack philosophical rigor.

Conclusion

In sum, our survey of the Bible in the Jewish philosophical tradition makes it clear that the Bible stood at the center of the Jewish philosophical enterprise. Through translations, interpretations, and commentaries, Jewish philosophers were able not only to negotiate the differences between Judaism and other cultures, but also to rethink Judaism anew by using new philosophic tools and theoretical paradigms. As each generation of Jewish philosophers asked, "What does the Bible say and what does it mean?" they were able to respond flexibly to changing historical circumstances and ponder the meaning of Judaism. Premodern and modern Jewish philosophers approached the Bible quite differently. Whereas the former presupposed that the Bible contains abstract, universal truths that are either identical to philosophy or can be explicated by philosophy, most (though not all) modern Jewish philosophers regarded the Bible as the record of divine-human direct, unmediated encounter. Accordingly, whereas the premodern Jewish philosophers composed philosophical commentaries on the Bible, modern Jewish philosophers have regarded the Bible as the source from which springs their Jewish theology. For all Jewish philosophers the pursuit of wisdom to which Israel is called by God can be accomplished through the encounter with the Bible itself.

[HAVA TIROSH-SAMUELSON]

The Bible in the Jewish Mystical Tradition

Background to the Jewish Mystical Tradition

Early Sources

The mystical tradition in Judaism is a multifaceted phenomenon whose early roots reach back to the time of the Rabbis and that exerted religious influence well past the medieval era, when its full flowering occurred. It is not possible here to survey this tradition fully; it is a complex and by no means completely unified movement. Rather, this essay will concentrate on how the medieval mystical tradition, referred to as kabbalah, used the text of the Bible both as source and as guide for the mystical path. It is necessary first to define "mysticism," particularly as it developed in Judaism. Mysticism can be seen as the quest, either by individual adherents to a religious tradition or by groups of the like-minded, to experience the presence of God directly. The yearning to know God sometimes takes the form of an effort to recover such experiences believed to have been given to earlier figures in the tradition—Moses, the prophets—who were granted direct access to God. It can also be an effort to "see" the imageless God without the aid of images, in keeping with the commandment that God may not be represented by any image. Finally, the goal of this quest is sometimes the direct experience of God, while remaining oneself; sometimes, however, it is the individual's effort to return to the source of being to reunite with the Godhead even to the point of subsuming one's individuality in the infinite being of God. Mystical movements often arise when God is seen as most transcendent, and therefore most removed from ordinary human life: separate from the natural and human world, unknowable, incomprehensible.

Although specific influences on Jewish mysticism are often uncertain, one philosophical school did provide some of its leading ideas (as it did also for some forms of Christian and Islamic mysticism). That philosophy was Neoplatonism, especially as expressed in the writings of Plotinus (ca. 204–70 CE) who taught that there were three realms of being, designated by the technical term hypostases: the One, the unknowable, utterly simple, and self-sufficient source of all being; Mind (Nous), the determinative foundation of all existents that, by virtue of contemplating the One, manifests the unified power in the multiplicity of intelligible objects or Ideas; and Soul, the potency that contemplates Mind and thereby extends by acting upon its own ideas into the realm of difference and indeterminacy, the location within which the cosmos takes shape as a determinate, physical form. Soul mediates between the intelligible world, the world of Mind, and the material world. Physical matter, at the furthest remove from the One, is the lowest form of existence, and is the eternally receptive substratum in and by which all determinate existents receive their discrete form. The universe is balanced between emanation, or movement outward from the One, and contemplation or return, movement back toward the One. The One itself is indescribable, beyond all thought and transcending all efforts to speak of it. The individual soul, by the practice of contemplation, can attain union with the One, but this involves a series of purifications and renunciations to detach the soul from matter, from images, from ideas, and finally from all discursive reason, until it is able to achieve a vision of the invisible and union with the One. The stages of contemplation are often pictured as ascents or steps away from the world of matter and toward the One, and the process itself is described as "apophatic," literally, "speaking-away," that is, achieving an understanding of the One through negation—the One is not this, the One is not that—until every possible identification has been eliminated and the contemplative is left only with a void of thought in which the One can be indescribably experienced. This "apophatic" or negative way is contrasted with the affirmative, "kataphatic" way in which positive attributes are ascribed to the deity: God is good, loving, merciful, just, and so on.

The first major expression of mysticism within postbiblical Judaism can be found in the writings that make up the so-called merkavah ("chariot") or heikhalot ("palace") corpus. These terms are used to designate those texts, composed and redacted over a period of several centuries, that describe in detail the ascent of an individual through the heavenly realms, culminating with an ecstatic vision of the luminous form on the throne located in the seventh palace of the seventh heaven. The details of a vision of the divine chariot were first recorded in the book of Ezekiel, a prophet living in Babylonia in the sixth century BCE. The first use of the technical term merkavah to refer to Ezekiel's vision of the enthroned glory is found in the apocryphal Ecclesiasticus 49:8: "It was Ezekiel who saw the vision of glory, which God [lit. he] showed him above the chariot of the cherubim" (NRSV). While many of the themes in the biblical prophecy served as the exegetical basis for the visionary experiences elaborated in the Merkavah corpus, the essential difference between the prophetic theophany and mystical vision is evident. Closer to the spirit of the Merkavah works are remnants of heavenly ascents recorded in Jewish and Christian apocalyptic literature from the second century BCE to roughly the third century CE. It has been argued by some scholars that Merkavah mysticism is an outgrowth of Jewish apocalypticism, though some important differences are found as well. Another important link in this chain is the so-called Angelic Liturgy of the Qumran sectarians, otherwise known as the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice, as well as other liturgical fragments found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. While there is some uncertainty regarding the appropriateness of the term "mystical" to refer to the poetic descriptions of the angelic realm and the throne contained in these documents, there can be little doubt that the motifs discussed in these sources bear a striking resemblance to the main concerns of the Heikhalot literature.

One work that specifically had a deep and lasting influence on the development of the mystical tradition is Sefer Yetzirah, Book of Formation, which is dated anywhere from the third to ninth centuries. Properly speaking, the work should not be described as a single composition but rather as a composite of distinct literary strands that have been woven together through a complicated redactional process whose stages are not clearly discernible. (The title is derived from the verb yatzar, "form," in Gen. 2.7, 8, 19.) According to Sefer Yetzirah, the creation of the world was based on the "thirty-two paths of wisdom," the ten numbers and twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet. According to one section in Sefer Yetzirah the sefirot ("ciphers" or numbers) are interpreted as the ten dimensions of the universe: north, south, east, west, up, down, beginning, end, good, evil. The individual letters of the alphabet each control various aspects of the creation, in the cosmos, in time, and in the body.

Sefer Yetzirah is a short work—less than 2,000 words—but it had great influence, especially because of commentaries on it, both scientific and mystical. Among those who wrote a scientific commentary on it was Saadia Gaon, in the 10th century (see the essay "Medieval Jewish Interpretation," pp. 1876–1900). Later, in the 12th century, mystics would take up many of its ideas and develop them.

Another seminal work, of uncertain date, is Shi'ur Komah, a mystical writing that consists of a physical description of God as a being of immense size. Although later writers, particularly Maimonides, condemned the work because of its anthropomorphic treatment of God, its defenders maintained that it was not meant to be taken literally, but was rather trying to convey a sense of God's infinite majesty.

The Medieval Period

Beginning in the 12th century, the kabbalistic movement grew within the Jewish communities in northern Spain and southern France, particularly in Provence. Kabbalah is a system of hidden or secret tradition that is seen as handing on from teacher to student the inner meaning of the biblical text. (The word "kabbalah" means "tradition.") It is not strictly speaking a mystical tradition; rather it is an esoteric one, meaning by that a teaching that is intended for only a small group, and thus one that is difficult to understand and master. (The opposite of esoteric is exoteric, teaching intended for a general audience.) Nevertheless, since the goal of kabbalah involves achieving a contemplative vision of divine reality, and therefore a closer approach to God, it has many elements of mystical thought as well. Rather than seeking an ascent to the divine throne, as the earlier mystics of the heikhalot and merkavah schools did, the kabbalists are now concerned with discovering the hidden nature of the divine reflected in the meaning of sacred texts. Along with this emphasis, the activity too has changed: from the mystical praxis of visual ascent to esoteric hermeneutics or scriptural interpretation. This leads to an intensified concentration on the text, even on its individual words and letters, that is unique to Jewish mysticism.

An influential work that began to circulate in the late 12th century, Sefer ha-Bahir or Book of Brightness, is generally regarded as the first work of kabbalistic symbolism. It bases itself partly on Sefer Yetzirah, in which the ten sefirot were seen as constitutive of the order of creation. In some sections of Sefer ha-Bahir, these ten attributes are expressive of the divine pleroma or fullness: They are emanations of the divine nature, and are expressive of the balance and harmony within the divine being. God contains various attributes, even opposites; and God contains both male and female aspects. The female aspect is the shekhinah or "Presence" of God; this Presence is where the divine realm and creation meet, the "Gate of Heaven" that permits contact with God. God's fullness or completeness includes the union between masculine and feminine aspects.

The most influential mystical writing, however, is Sefer ha-Zohar, Book of Splendor. This text, written largely in medieval Aramaic, purports to be biblical midrash from the 2nd century; it was actually written in the late 13th century, largely by Mosheh de Leon (d. 1305) and other kabbalists from the region in northern Spain known as Castile. It is therefore akin to an anthology, a collection of writings, rather than a work with a single author. The Zohar is presented as a mystical commentary on the Bible and fictional depictions of scenes from the life of the 2nd century Rabbi Shimeon bar Yoḥai and his disciples, whose discussions present the biblical interpretations. It also contains other material of a speculative nature.

The Zohar develops the idea of the sefirot or divine emanations into a full-fledged presentation of the nature of God and creation, and the relationship between them. The mysterious Godhead, 'Ein Sof ("no end," the infinite, unknowable divine being) manifests itself through the ten sefirot, the realms of the divine world. These are: Keter ("crown"), the unknowable Godhead; Ḥokhmah ("wisdom"), the first stirring of creation, primal Torah; Binah ("understanding"), creation's first form; Ḥesed ("benevolence," "mercy," "loving-kindness"), divine love; Gevurah ("might"), the strength to control and punish; Tif'eret ("beauty"), the balance of opposites; Netzaḥ ("victory"), God's loving action; Hod ("majesty"), God's judging action; Yesod ("foundation"), the divine principle within creation; and Malkhut ("sovereignty"), the link between God and creation that is also called Shekhinah ("presence"). An additional aspect of these realms is the differentiation amounting to opposition between the left side (Binah, Gevurah, Hod), God's judgment, and the right side (Ḥokhmah, Ḥesed, Netzaḥ), God's love. God descends through these realms until the final manifestation in the Shekhinah. This Presence of God, the feminine aspect of the divine being, is also the ideal representation in the divine realm of the people Israel. The differing aspects of God, as represented in the sefirot, must come into balance—for instance, Hesed and Gevurah must reconcile with each other—and when they do the feminine Shekhinah can be in harmony with the masculine, higher sefirot and the fullness of God pours out into the world.

[THE EDITORS]

The Glorious Name and the Incarnate Torah

The place occupied by the Bible in the mystical imagination cultivated by various fraternities of kabbalists in the high Middle Ages, is, as one can imagine, enormous in scope, thematically, chronologically, and geographically speaking. Although one must be careful not to offer a definition of mysticism that would obscure the complexity and multifaceted nature of the phenomenon of Jewish mysticism, it is valid to suggest that a current that runs through the mystical landscape in Jewish history has been the quest to see God. Within the aniconic tradition of Judaism, this quest took the form of the paradoxical imagining of the imageless. The iconoclastic reverberations of biblical faith fostered a prodigious imaginative representation of the non-representable in Jewish mystic circles through the centuries where specific meditational practices were cultivated for the stated aim of attaining a vision of the invisible, the locus of that vision situated in the heart/imagination of the visionary, the site where the normative epistemic divisions between external and internal dissolved in the play of double mirroring.

A unique feature of Jewish mysticism in all of its historical manifestations has been the convergence of light and letter symbolism: The emanation of God's light coincides with the revelation of the divine name. It follows, moreover, that the experience of God's presence consisted of both an ocular and auditory dimension, that is, seeing and hearing are intertwined in mystical envisioning, to behold the invisible is to heed the ineffable. Even within the Bible—see Deut. 28.58 and Ps. 72.19, for instance—the idea of “glory,” kavod (lit. “weighty,” that which impresses), was merged with the notion of the “name” (shem), that is, the most sacred of names, YHVH. Hence, in place of the indwelling of the glory in the Tabernacle, mikdash, or Tent of Meeting, ’ohel mo’ed (Exod. 25.8; 29.44–45; 40.34–35), there are references to God causing His name to dwell, leshaken shemo (Deut. 14.23; 16.2, 11; 26.2; see also 12.11: lasum et shemo sham leshikhno), in the place (makom) of his choosing, the Jerusalem Temple. In these biblical contexts, shem represents the divine Presence by metonymy, and thus shem and kavod were virtually synonymous: To speak of God causing His name to dwell is effectively to speak of God causing His glory to dwell. Nevertheless, the change in locution was not lost on subsequent mystical writers, for whom the substitution of terms meant a convergence of realities: a conception of the name that is embodied, the body that is the name.

The phrase kevod YHVH, accordingly, is read esoterically not as a genitive phrase (i.e., the X of Y), “the glory of the LORD,” but as an appositive, “the glory [that is] the LORD.” Just as the concept arose during the Second Temple period that the God of Israel had no visible, manifest form, so YHVH became the ineffable name, the name that cannot be vocalized as it is written, the name that demarcates the Presence that cannot be represented. The metaphysical assumption behind this mythopoetic belief—a belief that was expressed in Heikhalot texts, Shi’ur Komah fragments, early Jewish Neoplatonic writings, and kabbalistic works—is that body is letter, and letter body. This premise knits together the disparate strands of Jewish esotericism. The kabbalistic tradition, particularly by the 13th century, goes a step further and identifies the name with Torah. Moreover, since kabbalists assumed that the Tetragrammaton (YHVH) comprises within itself the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet, the mystical identification of Torah as the name, ha-Shem, incorporates the older notion that Torah consists of a polyphony of names that effectively make the divine present in the text. By assuming the identity of these different ideas, it is possible to substitute one for another: If the name is the glory, and the Torah is the name, it follows that the glory is the Torah. For kabbalists, the interchangeability of these terms meant that Torah was the incarnate form of divine Presence, which, at the height of prophetic vision, assumes a human shape (anthropos) in the heart of the visionary. This is the hermeneutical foundation for the kabbalistic understanding of Scripture: The scroll, rendered hyperliterally, constitutes the scriptural body of the divine.

The equation of the name and Torah thus yielded the notion of the textual body in which, or from which, those who read were led toward the text of the body. This incarnational theme, very significant for understanding the mystical approach to Scripture, is quite ancient, though the precise formulation is not attested until the 12th and 13th centuries. By the late Middle Ages, moreover, Neoplatonic influence had impacted the Jewish religious philosophies promulgated by elitist rabbinic circles throughout Europe, North Africa, and the Mediterranean countries, to the point that it was no longer tenable to conceive of presence and absence as antithetical; on the contrary, since God was widely conceived as the existence whose essence could not be fathomed by the human mind, the apophatic (negative) and kataphatic (positive) responses could not be credibly dissociated: The "absence" of all positive attributes, including "presence" itself, was the manifestation of the divine, and thus "absence" equals "presence," presence signifies absence in the absence of presence.

The unique contribution of medieval kabbalists is to view YHWH , the most sacred of divine names, as comprising all the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. In line with the philosophical stance articulated by Judah Halevi (see "The Bible in the Jewish Philosophical Tradition," pp. 1948–75), kabbalists considered Hebrew to be the one "natural" or "essential" language in contrast to all other languages, which are "conventional" or "contingent." One of the better known, and surely most lucid, formulations of this idea is offered by the 13th-century Castilian kabbalist Joseph Gikatilla (1248–ca. 1325), a likely member of the fraternity responsible for the zoharic anthology, in the introduction to his Sha'arei 'Orah, a systematic delineation of the symbolic names associated with each of the ten emanations progressing from the bottom to the top of the sefirotic ladder: The twenty-two letters are portrayed as branches stemming from a tree whose trunk is inscribed with YHWH , the root-word of the "original" language, the mystical essence of Torah. Thus Torah is the blueprint of creation, and furthermore by studying Torah one can gain knowledge, both historical and natural, of all that takes place in the world. From the vantage point formulated textually by kabbalists beginning in earnest in the 13th century, everything that exists in the cosmos may be perceived as a permutation of the name, elicited from the linguistic matrix of Torah. The permutation both says and unsays the ineffable name, as a garment both hides and reveals the body it clothes.

Inner and Outer Meaning are Ultimately Identical

In great measure, as scholars have long noted, the kabbalistic approach to Scripture takes its cue from the analogy in the introduction to the Guide for the Perplexed by Maimonides. Maimonides utilizes the image of the apples of gold covered in the lattice of silver (Prov. 25.11) to convey the idea that there are two levels of meaning in Torah, the external (zahir) and internal (batin). In Maimonides this approach is not applied to every verse of Scripture. Rather, it is limited to those where the literal meaning contradicts natural reason and it becomes necessary to interpret the text figuratively so that the potential conflict is resolved. To be sure, Maimonides uses an image that conveys a sense of an organic whole, an indissoluble bond between inner and outer: Just as the golden apples encased in silver settings appear from a distance as silver but from up close as gold, the literal and the figurative must both be preserved even though one comes to discern that the literal meaning is but appearance cloaking a reality embedded within the text. This hermeneutic, therefore, is decidedly hierarchical, clearly privileging the internal over the external as the more appropriate articulation of truth. The external meaning is but a shell that covers and thereby shows the internal meaning.

Many kabbalist exegetes similarly begin by presuming Torah encompasses two layers of meaning, the exoteric and esoteric. In contrast to Maimonides, however, for kabbalists the entirety of Tanakh must be read in this way, not just words or verses that ostensibly conflict with the dictates of reason. In other words, all Scripture yields a twofold meaning irrespective of conformity with what is considered to be rational truth. In content there is clearly a distinction between what is called prophetic kabbalism and theosophic kabbalism. The secret (sod) for prophetic kabbalists is the inner life of God, believed to have been made known to the prophets, reached through the scriptural language contained in the letters of the name, which constitute the ideational forms of the Active Intellect, the repository of the intelligible forms that govern the sublunar world. For theosophic kabbalists the secret is the inner meaning of the text, in which each word has a literal and symbolic sense, the literal dealing with matters of the mundane realm, the "world of differentiation" (olam ha-perud), and the symbolic expressing the sefirotic realm, the "world of unity" (olam ha-yihud).

Although at times kabbalists do seem to be articulating a hierarchical view akin to that of Maimonides, privileging the figurative over the literal, in fact the mystical perspective is predicated on discerning that exoteric and esoteric, peshat and sod, are indistinguishable. In the philosophical esotericism espoused by Maimonides, the two must be set in binary opposition, for the inner truth might undermine the literal meaning; in kabbalism, there is overlap or convergence of the two and thus the hermeneutic path of kabbalah is more like a circular journey than a linear process, although at times linear language is inevitable. The influence of sequential language is no doubt indebted in part to the well-known motif of the hierarchy of sciences in medieval scholasticism (shared alike by Muslims, Jews, and Christians): Logic and mathematics are preparatory disciplines at the base, followed by physics or the science of natural phenomena, and culminating with metaphysics, the science of ideal forms (in the Platonic view) or of being as such (in the Aristotelian view). In kabbalah which followed the Platonic tradition, in which the world of unity was perceived to be superior to the world of particularity, the esoteric meaning, corresponding to the world of unity, is privileged since it discloses the truth compared to the exoteric sense, dealing with the world of ephemeral appearance. In kabbalah influenced by the Aristotelian approach, God was the necessary Being and all else is contingent. Whether this influence was present or not, the kabbalists, even when they used linear language, portrayed the goal of the linear process as coming full circle; when one reaches the core at the end and returns thereby to the surface from the beginning, one realizes that where one ended up was where one had begun, and consequently one comes to see that the innermost secret was folded within the initial allusion, leading to the hermeneutical maxim that peshat is sod, the literal spiritual, the exoteric esoteric.

Nahmanides (Ramban, 1194–1220; see "Medieval Jewish Interpretation," pp. 1876–1900), the Spanish rabbinic leader, talmudic and halakhic scholar, biblical exegete, and kabbalist, states in the introduction to his commentary on the Torah that the Torah given to Moses had two aspects. The first was the written text (the rabbinic term is miqra' from the root q-r-r, "to call out," "to invoke," "to read," whence the word qeri'ah, "recitation"), which relates to the "way of our reading," derekh qeri'atenu, also described as the "division according to the ritualistic reading," derekh hilluk qeri'at ha-mitzvah. The second was the oral text, which is not a reference to the standard rabbinic Oral Torah but an occult reading by "way of the names," derekh ha-shemot. There are thus two ways of reading Scripture anchored in the Sinaitic epiphany, the mystical way of shemot transmitted orally and the ritual way of torah and mitzvah inscribed in written form; the textual ground of both is the primordial Torah, which as Naḥmanides describes, citing an ancient tradition (kabbalah), was written in black fire on white fire. This aggadic image conveys the underlying unity of the literal and symbolic, a theme to which Naḥmanides returns on several occasions in his commentary when he discusses the kabbalistic intent marked by his signature al derekh ha-'emet, "by way of truth."

The kabbalist strategy of reading relies on the recognition that signifier discloses the nature of signified, and signified the nature of signifier, precisely because the two are, though different, identified with one another. Even Abraham Abulafia (13th century kabbalist of Spain)—who contrasts the Written Torah as a compendium of commandments with the Oral Torah as the names of God that are all contained in the Tetragrammaton, which is further identified as the Active Intellect—makes a point of emphasizing that the truth of both the revealed (nigleh) and concealed (nistar) dimensions of Torah must be upheld. Thus, Abulafia articulates the matter after attempting to affirm, in a blatantly acknowledged challenge to the Aristotelian law of contradiction (Sitrei Torah, MS Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, fol. 149b), the veracity of both the traditional account of creation and the philosophically sanctioned view of eternity, the former conveyed by the literal sense of Scripture and the latter by the allegorical: "With regard to the Torah its revealed aspects without doubt are completely true ('emet gamur) and its concealed aspects are absolutely true ('emet muhlal), and both of them are one unified matter in truth" (ibid., fol.

150b). Reiterating the dual meaning of the text at the conclusion of this section, Abulafia writes that it would be a "complete heresy" (kefirah gemurah) if one were to deny the literal facticity of Torah on account of the figurative interpretation (the example he gives is the splitting of the Reed Sea). The assault on the law of contradiction maintains the paradox that both the exoteric and esoteric meanings are true even if they seem to be in conflict. In Abulafia's own words:

The truth is, as I have indicated to you in the secret previous to this, the secret of the creation of the world, that the Torah in its truth comprises two types of existence, and the two of them are equally good, and they are the revealed and the concealed, and both are true. And this you may understand from the matter of the existence of the body [and the soul] together, for they are two, the one created and the other eternal, the one revealed and the other concealed, and it is as if the one is the exemplar (ma-shal) and the other the exemplum (nimshal), but the two are found together (ibid., fol. 151a).

In other treatises, Abulafia employs different exegetical classifications. For example, in 'Igeret Zo't li-Yehudah and 'Otsar 'Eden Ganuz, he distinguishes seven paths of interpretation (literal, halakhic, homiletical, and allegorical, letter-permutation, restitution of letters to their primary matter, and prophecy or the way of the divine names), whereas in Mafteah ha-Ḥokhmot, he demarcates three levels of meaning (literal, allegorical, and prophetic, which correspond respectively to the righteous, pious, and prophets). As he states in 'Igeret Zo't li-Yehudah, in the final analysis, scriptural reading is not possible unless one minimally possesses both "knowledge of how to read" the written text, yedi'at ha-mikhtav, that is, the "literal reading," ha-keri'ah ha-peshutah, and "knowledge of how to interpret," yedi'at ha-perush, "for this is like a matter of the dream itself, as a dream needs an interpretation, and any dream that is not interpreted is like a parable and an enigma that are written and not explicated" (Adolph Jellinek, Philosophie und Kabbala: Erstes Heft [Leipzig: Heinrich Hunger, 1854], p. 13). The meaningfulness of the text resides in the interstices between the literal and figurative, the document that is to be read and the reading that is to be interpreted. Tellingly, in the description of the seven paths, Abulafia resorts to the image of the sphere to describe the relationship of one path to another, beginning with the "sphere of the literal," galgal ha-peshat, and culminating with the seventh path, which is compared to the "all-encompassing sphere," galgal ha-makif (ibid., pp. 2–4). The use of the standard medieval image of the concentric heavenly spheres to describe the hermeneutical paths is meant to convey that the linear progression of the paths and the hierarchical stratification that they imply gives way in the end to the mystical insight that breaks the binary opposition between literal and figurative, exoteric and esoteric, revealed and hidden.

The matter is similarly expressed in the Zohar:

Come and see: The supernal world and the lower world are balanced on one scale. Israel below and the angels above. Concerning the supernal angels it is written, "He makes his angels into spirits" (Ps. 104.4). When they descend below they are garbed in the garment of this world, and if they were not garbed in the garment that is in the likeness of this world, they could not exist in this world and the world could not endure them. If this is so with respect to the angels, how much more so with respect to the Torah, which created them and all the worlds, and they exist on account of it, when it descends to this world, if it were not garbed in the garments of this world, the world could not endure. Thus the narrative of Torah is the garment of Torah. The one who thinks that the garment is the Torah itself, and not another matter, let his spirit deflate, and he will have no share in the world to come. Therefore, David said, "Open my eyes that I may perceive the wonders of your Torah" (Ps. 119.18), what is beneath the garment of Torah (Zohar 3:152a).'

In the continuation of the passage, the exegetical layering of Scripture is expanded from two to four levels: garment, body, soul, and soul of souls, which correspond respectively to stories, laws, esoteric wisdom, and messianic secrets. The standard reference to this idea was by the acronym PaRDeS: peshat (contextual sense), remez (allegorical sense), derash (homiletical sense), and sod (mystical sense). Pardes was apparently first used by Mosheh de Leon but applied more systematically by Bahya ben Asher (d. 1320) in the second part of the 13th century. It was formulated as an elaboration of the principle of dual meaning, the internal and external, esoteric and exoteric, revealed and concealed, the garment and what is beneath it. The hermeneutical principle of dual meaning in the text is based on the parallel between the supernal and lower worlds. In the zoharic idiom, the image of two worlds "balanced on one scale," be-had matkela 'itkalu, conveys the notion of similitude through difference, that is, two dissimilar things rendered equal in their incongruity. The zoharic kabbalists maintained that the spiritual is discerned through the physical, the invisible through the visible, a cosmological principle that shaped their hermeneutical disposition. The hidden meaning of the text, the "mystery" (raz) or "light" ('or)—an equivalence of terms that was substantiated on the basis of their numerical equivalence, both equaling 207—was discoverable through its literal body, the letter; mystical cognition thus entails a seeing of the secret "through the garment" (migo levusha) rather than by removing the garment (Zohar 2:98b). In inverse emulation of the dissimilitude of Torah to conceal in the charade of revealing, the master of esoteric gnosis reveals in the display of concealing. The capacity to divulge secrets, attributed in the zoharic passage to Simeon ben Yoḥai, is traced to the "skilled tongue," leshon limudim (Isa. 50.4), which is identified as the "holy tongue," leshon ha-kodesh, or the "holy spirit," ruah ha-kodesh. In the divine outpouring to the world through Shekhinah (compare Zohar 1:228a and 2:236b), the lower wisdom (ruah) receives the overflow from the upper wisdom (kodesh) and is thereby transformed from passive female to active male (Zohar 3:60b–61a). This suggests that the word leshon, "tongue," is to be interpreted phallically; indeed the phallus empowers the "skilled tongue" of the holy spirit to talk.

The intent of the passage above comes into sharper focus when seen with another text from the Zohar, a dramatic section that chronicles the discourse of the elderly donkey driver focused on the mystery of conversion and the doctrine of transmigration of souls (metempsychosis), the voyage of the soul from one embodiment to another. The old man lures other members of the fraternity (and, by implication, the reader) onto his path with three seemingly incomprehensible parables. In time, through the unfolding of the narrative—which presents the tension between the urge to reveal and the need to conceal—the donkey driver, outwardly foolish, discloses himself to be a true master. The point of the narrative is that by plumbing the depths of the mystery of conversion of the Gentile (which implies for these thinkers the existence of a Jewish soul in a non-Jewish body), one is led to a mystical understanding of the ontological identification of God and Torah, two seemingly disparate realities, one delimited and beyond semantic demarcation and the other comprised of the twenty-two letters that are the names branching off the root YHWH. Conversion suggested to the Castilian kabbalists a crossing of the boundaries of being that seemingly challenged the overtly dualistic view that Israel was aligned with the holy right side of God, mercy, and the nations of the world (Gentiles) with the unholy left side, judgment.

Part of the text (Zohar 2:98b) articulates the assumption regarding the Torah and mystical secrets, an assumption that is, at once, ontological and hermeneutical (the two cannot be separated in the thinking of these kabbalists). The explanation of the garbing of a Jewish soul in a non-Jewish body, the key factor to understanding the mechanics of conversion, is interrupted, so it seems, by the observation of the old man that God hides secrets in the garments of Torah. Only the wise that are replete with eyes are capable of apprehending these secrets, a vision that is designated as seeing through rather than discarding the garment. Shortly after the reader encounters this principle, the old man offers a parable of the beautiful maiden in a castle, which recounts the erotic relationship that pertains between Torah and the mystical exegete (Zohar 2:99a–b). Four levels of meaning are delineated: remizu, "sign"; derashah, "homily"; hidah, "allegory," or hagadah, "narrative"; and razin setimin, "hidden mysteries." These four levels are presented sequentially as stages of ever-increasing disclosure: In the first meaning is offered through the barrier of the wall, in the second from behind a curtain, in the third through a more subtle veil, and, finally, in the fourth the reader encounters the text face to face, which, in the zoharic vernacular, signifies union of a most intimate and erotic sort. When the Torah removes her veil and exposes her face fully to her lover, he comes to realize that the secret was already present in the first stage when the initial hint was offered. At that moment he understands that peshatei dikera', the literal sense of the text—the text in its literal embodiment, the mien of the letters—must be as it is, no word added or subtracted, precisely in accord with the halakhic ruling. To discern the initial insinuation at the end confirms the point that the secret can be seen only through the garment of the letters, the body of the text, the face unmasked in effacing the mask. The uncovering of the innermost meaning at the culmination of the journey is thus a recovery of the overt sense allusively disclosed in the beginning.

The somewhat curious choice of the term remizu ("sign") to denote the peshat in the initial delineation underscores that in the mystical understanding of the revealed word, the literal is metaphorical and the metaphorical literal. To be sure, on the face of it, the final disclosure—the fourth level—bears the intimacy of the face-to-face encounter, a showing that ostensibly does away with the previous barriers, the wall, curtain, and veil; but when one understands that the secret exposed at the end was contained in the hint offered at the beginning, it then becomes apparent that the face itself is a veil, indeed the greatest of veils, since it can be unveiled—appear in the flesh—only by being veiled—remaining en-fleshed. What is revealed in the final hermeneutical disclosure, therefore, is the veil of presuming there is an unveiling that results in a vision of the divine without the veil of the text, to apprehend the essence of God without the shibboleth of the name, which is the Torah. As the matter is expressed in another zoharic context, “The letters are inscribed in the supernal mysteries, for they all emerge from the mystery of the supernal Wisdom by way of the thirty-two paths that come forth from Wisdom. . . . All the letters are inscribed in a mystery and they are the bodies of Torah (gufei torah) for they exist to instruct and to notify about the supernal mysteries” (Zohar Hadash, 73b). The author of this comment appropriates the rabbinic expression gufei torah—which in the older sources that use guf (body) metaphorically denotes the rudiments of law—to formulate the idea of a mystical body of God, taking guf literally, a body that is composed of letters, which are at one and the same time linguistic signs and numeric ciphers of divine wisdom.

Poetic Incarnation and the Embodied Text of Textual Embodiment

In the kabbalistic tradition, the anthropomorphic shape of God refers not to humanity in general but specifically to the Jew, a point often expressed in the relevant texts in terms of the rabbinic dictum (linked exegetically to Ezek. 34.31) that the title 'adam (“person”) applies to Israel and not to the nations of the world. In particular, the ethnocentric dimension of the incarnational myth, which has profoundly informed the kabbalistic orientation, is captured in the symbolic identification of God, Torah, and Israel implied in the zoharic comment that “there are three gradations bound one to the other, the holy One, blessed be He, Torah, and Israel” (Zohar 3:73a). The full implication of this symbolism is shown in the obligation incumbent upon every male Jew to write his own Torah scroll, a theme found in other kabbalistic texts such as the anonymous Sefer ha-Yihud:

The reason for this commandment by way of kabbalah alludes to the fact that the Torah scroll is the holy of holies . . . for the entire Torah is . . . the name of the holy One, blessed be He . . . and His Torah is within the holy One, blessed be He, and within Him is His Torah, and this is what the kabbalists say the holy One, blessed be He, is in His name and His name is in Him. “His name” is His Torah and the Torah is made through the pure and holy chain in the supernal image, and it is verily the shade of the holy One, blessed be He . . . Therefore He commanded that each man should make a Torah scroll for himself to discern and to know that he cherishes the Torah and to allude to the unity and to demonstrate the pattern of the Creator, blessed be He. When the holy One, blessed be He, sees that each and every one in Israel has a Torah scroll that is precisely in the likeness of His pattern, blessed be He, the holy One, blessed be He, immediately causes His Presence to dwell upon Israel, verily in his pattern, in the Torah scroll. Therefore God, blessed be He, commanded each and every man from Israel to make a Torah scroll for himself . . . this alludes to the fact that all of Israel is one form, as the sages, blessed be their memory, said all Israel is one body. . . . Since all of Israel is one supernal pattern, and each and every one from Israel is a limb of the chariot, each and every man from Israel must take a Torah scroll for himself so that the limb will cleave to the limb in the pure and holy chain (Sefer Ta'amey ha-Mizvot, pp. 78–80).

The incarnational theology that informs the kabbalistic standpoint is predicated on a distinctive understanding of corporeality. "Body" does not denote physical mass that is quantifiable and measurable, but the phenomenological sense of the corporeal as lived presence. Medieval kabbalists, due to the influence of philosophical thinking that had informed the general cultural trends of European societies in the high Middle Ages, adopted a negative view toward the corporeal body (indeed, according to some passages in zoharic literature, for example, 3:170a, the physicality of the human is linked to the demonic "left" side) and thus considered the contemplative life as a way to escape the bonds of carnality. (There are many other strong connections between the philosophical and mystical traditions; these traditions should not be depicted as opposites, as they often are.) This explains the adoption of ascetic forms of piety on the part of kabbalists with special emphasis placed on sexual abstinence. On the other hand, the positive value accorded the body in kabbalistic symbolism, reflected in the repeated use of anthropomorphic images to depict God, images that on occasion embrace an intense erotic tone, is related to the textual nature of bodiliness, which, in turn, rests on an assumption regarding the bodily nature of textuality. The linguistic aspect of embodiment accounts as well for the kabbalistic understanding of ritual as participation in divine energy, epitomized in the saying "limb strengthens limb"; that is, the performance of ceremonial acts by human limbs fortifies the divine attributes, which are envisioned as bodily limbs. Alternatively expressed, insofar as Torah is the name $\Upsilon\text{H}\text{V}\text{H}$, and the latter takes the form of an anthropos (an idea buttressed by the numerical equivalence of the four letters of the name written out in full and the word 'adam, "person"), it follows that each commandment can be represented as a limb of the divine body. The kabbalistic representation of Torah as body is supported by the idea that the 248 positive commandments correspond to the 248 limbs and the 365 negative commandments to the 365 sinews. This formulation is a modification of the tradition attributed to R. Simlai (b. Mak. 23b) according to which the 248 positive commandments correspond to the limbs and the 365 negative commandments to the days of the year. The kabbalistic perspective reverses the generally assumed allegorical approach to scriptural anthropomorphisms promoted by medieval rabbinic exegetes, for instead of explaining anthropomorphic characterizations of God as a figurative way to accommodate human understanding, the attribution of corporeal images to an incorporeal God indicates that the real body, the body in its most abstract tangibility, is the letter, which is the principle of poetic incarnation. Anthropomorphism in Scripture therefore indicates that human and divine corporeality are entwined in a mesh of double imaging through the mirror of the text that renders the divine body human and the human body divine. For kabbalists, life revolves about the axis of the embodied text of textual embodiment.

Flesh Made Word and the Body as Text

There is no escaping the incarnational implications of the esoteric identification of Torah and the name, since the latter is the divine essence, a point made explicitly in several zoharic passages (2:60b, 87a, 90b, 3:13b, 19a, 21a, 35b–36a, 73a, 89b, 98b, 159a, 265b, 298b) and confirmed by other kabbalists contemporary with the Zohar, for instance, Gikatilla. Thus, in one zoharic passage we read, "It has been taught that the holy One, blessed be He, is called Torah" (2:60b). In a second passage, the matter is laid out in more detail based on the symbolic correspondence between the ten commandments revealed at Sinai, which contain the whole Torah, and the ten divine utterances, the emanations comprised within the Tetragrammaton ($\Upsilon\text{H}\text{V}\text{H}$):

The Torah is the name of the holy One, blessed be He. Just as the name of the holy One, blessed be He, is inscribed in ten utterances so Torah is inscribed in ten utterances; these ten utterances are the name of the holy One, blessed be He, and the Torah is entirely one name, verily the holy name of the holy One, blessed be He. . . . The one who is meritorious with respect to Torah is meritorious with respect to the holy name. R. Jose said that he is indeed meritorious with respect to the holy One, blessed be He, because He and His name are one (2:90b).

The Castilian kabbalists whose views are preserved in the zoharic homilies make even more explicit the assumption of their predecessors. The equation of Torah and the name implies that God is embodied in Torah and, consequently, engagement in study and fulfilling the commandments serve as the means by which one is conjoined to the divine. In the words of another zoharic homily: "He who is occupied with Torah it is as if he were occupied with the holy One, blessed be He, for Torah is entirely the name of the holy One, blessed be He" (3:89b). But how can we speak of God being embodied in the text? Can light that is without limit be contained in letters that are limited by their very shape? The mystery that is basic to zoharic kabbalah (though by no means unique to its fraternity) is that God is absent from the text in which God is present, since for God to be present in the text God must be absent.

The Significance of the Single Letter

Kabbalistic interpretation sees every unit of the text as significant, including individual letters; this builds upon a method of interpretation of some of the classical Rabbis (see "Classical Rabbinic Interpretation," pp. 1844–63). As an example, an explanation (attributed to R. Ḥiyya) is offered for why the first letter of Torah is bet, ב, the second letter of the alphabet, a query that appears in classical rabbinic literature: This letter signifies the dual Torah, oral and written, a doctrine that is also used in this context to explain the plural in "Let Us make Adam in Our image," that is, Adam was created by means of the oral and written Torah, reflected in the mentioning of image and likeness in tandem with his creation, the former correlated with the masculine and the latter with the feminine. According to R. Isaac, the orthographic structure of bet as the letter that is opened on one side and closed on three sides, already attested in older mystical sources, is interpreted as a sign that Torah receives those who seek to be conjoined to her but she is closed from the other side in relation to those who close their eyes and turn away from her. It is at this point in the homily that, for our purposes, the critical passage appears:

R. Judah said: Bet has two sides and one that connects them. What do they come to teach? One for heaven, one for earth, and the holy One, blessed be He, connects and receives them. R. Eleazar said: These are the three holy, supernal lights bound as one, and they are the totality of Torah, and they open an opening to everything. They open an opening to faith and they are the abode of everything. Thus they are called bet for they make up the dwelling (beit). And thus the beginning of Torah is bet, for it is the Torah, the remedy for the world. Therefore, whoever is occupied with Torah it is as if he were occupied with the holy name . . . for Torah is entirely the one supernal holy name. And since it is the holy name, it begins with bet, for it is the totality of the holy name in three knots of faith. Come and see: all those occupied with Torah are conjoined to the holy One, blessed be He, and they are crowned in the crowns of Torah, and they are beloved above and below (Zohar 3:36a).

According to R. Judah, bet means heaven, earth, and God who unites them. The further, theosophic explication is offered in the name of R. Eleazar. The three lines of bet refer to three holy, supernal lights that are bound as one, and they are the totality of Torah (kelala de'oraita'). Insofar as the three potencies are the opening for faith, which may here denote the lower seven emanations, they are characterized as the abode (beitā') of all that exists, and hence they are the three lines that make up beit, the letter that is the "totality of the holy name in three knots of faith" (kelalā' dishema' kadisha' bitelat kishrei meheimanuta'). All of Torah is the name and thus its first letter must encompass the totality of the name; the three lines by which the letter is drawn are the knots of faith. The three knots of faith—faith is the fourth side that is the opening created by the three closed sides—may be the three letters, YHV, contained in the four-letter name, YHWH. Alternatively, the knots of faith may allude symbolically to Ḥokhmah, Binah, and Tif'eret, "Wisdom," "Understanding," and "Beauty," three configurations of the divine that are imaginably depicted in some zoharic passages as father, mother, son and demarcated as YHV; the last letter of the name, the fourth party of the quaternity, the daughter, Malkhut ("Sovereignty") or Shekhinah, is represented by the second he, the letter that has already appeared, a duplicate of the second.

The beginning of Torah, therefore, is the letter that marks the mystery of the threefold unity, the totality of the name, the secret abode of faith. The trinitarian resonance in the zoharic locution telat kishrei meheimanuta, "three knots of faith," has been noted by Yehuda Liebes. Reinforcing this, the author of the homily has combined the motif of Torah as the incarnation of the divine name and the trinitarian symbol of the three knots of faith. In this matter, as with regard to a number of crucial themes, the kabbalists whose ideas and interpretations are preserved in zoharic literature reflect a complex relationship to Christianity, which was viewed as the major competitor in the arena of salvation history: This is an instance of the perennial struggle between synagogue and church, Jacob and Esau, with its concomitant attraction and repulsion. On one hand, zoharic kabbalists adopted a harsh stance and portrayed Christianity as an earthly manifestation of the demonic potency, the idolatrous religion that seduces Jews (men are especially vulnerable) both in the form of spiritual enticement (particularly in the guise of magic) and sexual temptation. On the other hand, these kabbalists were duly impressed with aspects of this faith, including trinitarian and incarnational symbols, as well as imagery derived from devotions to Mary, the mother of Jesus, and attempted to appropriate them as authentic esoteric tradition, perhaps even modeling the fraternity of Simeon ben Yoḥai and his comrades on the pattern of Jesus and his disciples. Medieval kabbalists sought to divest christological symbols of their Catholic garb and re-dress them as the mystical truths of Judaism. The zoharic understanding of text as body, which provides the mechanism by which the body is understood as text, is a stunning illustration of this strategy.

One final zoharic text demonstrates the subtle and complex relationship that pertains between kabbalistic and christological symbolism:

"As for the tabernacle, make it of ten strips of cloth" (Exod. 26.1). Here is the mystery of unity, for the arrayment of the tabernacle was from several gradations, as it is written with respect to it "and the tabernacle was one" (ibid., 6). This is to illustrate that all the parts of the body are all the mystery of one body. In a man, there are several upper and lower parts, the ones interior and the others revealed on the outside, and all of them are called one body, and the man is called one composition. So here, all the parts of the tabernacle are in the pattern of what is above and when all of them are joined as one, then it is written "and the tabernacle was one." The commandments of Torah are all parts and limbs in the mystery above, and when all of them are joined together, then all of them add up to one mystery. The mystery of the tabernacle, which consists of the parts and limbs, all compute to the mystery of Adam in the manner of the commandments of Torah, for the commandments of Torah are all of them the mystery of Adam, male and female. When they are joined together, they are one mystery of Adam (Zohar 2:162b).

In this homily, the images of the Tabernacle, the human body, the androgynous Adam (created "male and female," Gen. 1.27), and the Torah are linked together like pearls in a necklace of symbolic equivalences. The thread that ties these images together is the linguistic conception of embodiment, that is, what the four compositions share in common is the assumption that they are constructed from the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. In older rabbinic sources, one can find the notion that the Tabernacle, the earthly residence of the divine glory, which is depicted as a microcosm of the universe, was built by means of the letters (b. Ber. 55a). What the zoharic author has added is that the Tabernacle assumes the shape of an anthropos. The Tabernacle symbolically stands for the totality of the divine pleroma, a secret alluded to in the hyperliteral rendering of the verse that dictates the making of the Tabernacle from ten strips of cloth, which correspond to the ten emanations. The mystery of the Tabernacle's construction, therefore, imparts the wisdom that the multiplicity of divine powers cohere in a unified whole, that is, God's unity may be represented organically, as a composite of discrete elements the infinity of which denies the possibility of fixed enumeration.

The organic unity of the Tabernacle is illustrated further by comparing it to the human body. The anthropomorphic representation is illumined by a similar characterization of Torah, for the commandments are the limbs of the body of Torah, which is envisioned as the mystery of the androgynous Adam, the positive commandments being masculine aspects and the negative commandments feminine ones. The conjunction of the two facilitates the constitution of the mystery of the divine anthropos, which is envisioned both as the textualization of the Tabernacle and the materialization of Torah: Parallel processes in the hidden disclosure of the divine name. The secret of poetic incarnation imparted by masters of Jewish esoteric lore, beholding the luminous flesh from the word, may be seen as a countermyth to the Christian image of the word/light made flesh in the prologue to the Gospel of John, which played an inestimable role in fashioning the hermeneutical aesthetic of medieval Christendom. In the history of Christian devotion the incarnational theme also expressed itself in terms of textual embodiment, but the basis for this form of embodiment in Christianity is always the incarnation of the Word in the person of Jesus. As a consequence, medieval Christian piety has been informed by the exegetical supposition that incarnation of the word in the flesh had the effect of removing the veil of the letter, the literal meaning that kills the spirit, the carnal law that obstructs the true knowledge of the Last Things. By contrast, in the kabbalistic wisdom that materialized in the course of the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries, incarnation of the flesh in the word preserved the veil of the letter. The only credible means to apprehend the inner meaning of the law was thought to be through its outer covering, to behold the mysteries of Torah underneath the garment, to see the image of God embodied iconically in the text that is the textual embodiment of the name. The ultimate secret of Scripture in the kabbalistic imagination embraces the paradox that the revealed word is the mirror whose visibility consists precisely in its invisibility, and, as such, the task of revisioning remains constant, as the invisible can never be seen once and for all. Since the task of scriptural reading is presented primarily as the eye-centered image of lifting the veils to see the face hidden beneath, it can be said that this task is never complete, as the mandate to lift the veils does result in discarding all possible veils; indeed, there can be no "final" veil to lift as there is always another veil through which the nonmanifest will be made manifest. Therein lies the soteriological hope (the hope concerning salvation) fostered by the soteric approach to Scripture advocated by kabbalists. The uncovering of secrets by their recovery, and their recovery by uncovering, infuses the act of reading with the redemptive mandate to see again and hear anew, interpretive gestures that have the potential to transform text and reader to the point that the latter may adopt the mantle of writer and study provides the quill, ink, and tableau for rewriting the text that is yet to be scripted through the hermeneutical glance.

[ELLIOT R. WOLFSON]

The Bible in Israeli Life*

The Bible, once at the center of the cultural scene in Israel, has become marginalized; its magic has faded. A new Israeli generation no longer believes that, to be considered educated, one must be well-versed in the canonical national literature; to a greater or lesser degree, it rejects Bible study as a required subject. Pride in the greatness of the Bible is giving way to alienation; instead of proficiency in Scripture one finds unashamed ignorance of its content. Before we can measure the depth of the change and trace its causes, we must examine the situation as it was until recently, when the Bible proudly held sway over the Israeli scene.

Early Days: The Holy Scripture of Secular Zionism

The Zionist endeavor defined itself from the start in biblical language, as the "return to Zion" (Ps. 126.1), and by placing Bible study at the center of the school curriculum made it an integral component of national rebirth, rebuilding the ancestral land, and revival of its language. The return to the land, cultivation of the land, national independence, military valor, speaking the tongue of Amos and Isaiah, received quasi-religious inspiration from the Bible; it embodied that generation's tasks and visions as if the present were recapturing the past. Leaders, authors, and teachers all believed that the Bible legitimized Zionism: It testified to Jewish ownership of the land and foretold the return, the rebuilding, and the ingathering. Conversely, Zionism enhanced Scripture: It was realizing prophecy and thereby confirming the Bible's eternal truth. The Bible was an inspiring commentary on the present, and the present was a concrete interpretation of the Bible. The immediacy and reality of the biblical saga—from the immigration of individuals in obedience to the command, "Go forth from your native land" (Gen. 12.1) and the mass exodus from the house of bondage, through the frailty of the "desert generation" and the virility of the conquerors of Canaan, culminating in the defensive wars waged by the Judges and the establishment of the monarchy—invested the present with an aura of ancient splendor. Biblical history gave the Zionist endeavor roots in time; geography, with its memory-laden sites, confirmed its ties to place; and archeology provided the newcomers with material proof of their "nativity" in this old-new land.

Literature, particularly poetry, played a major role in this two-way association of Zionism with the Bible. The power of poetry can be seen in two poems about Saul's heroic death by Natan Alterman and Amir Gilboa, both published in the first decade of the State of Israel. Alterman's ballad, "The Day of Battle and Its Eve are Ended" (Ir ha-Yonah, Tel Aviv, 1957, pp. 184–185) begins with a brief reference to the biblical story of the overthrow of Israel's army on Mount Gilboa: defeat, flight, and King Saul's suicide. The poet then goes on to describe in detail how the wounded herald rides a whole night from the battlefield to the queen mother's home and, upon arriving, falls to the ground, speechless. His blood, staining her feet, and the news of the king's death implied by his silence, have brought the battlefield to her doorstep. Her heroism is no less impressive than Saul's in this struggle for the national spirit. "Rise, my son," she commands the herald, and upon hearing his tearful description of the king's falling on his sword, she responds, expressing the heroism of mothers:

* A longer version of this article appeared in Hebrew in Yeri'ot 1, 1999; an English translation by Mr. David Louvish was published in Modern Judaism, 19.3, 1999, pp. 217–239. This adaptation is published with the kind permission of Modern Judaism.

Then spake she to the youth: Blood
Will cover mother's feet,
But the nation will rise seven times
If it be defeated on its own land.
Judgment has been visited upon the king,

But a successor will arise in due time,
For it was upon his own land that He leaned the sword upon which he died.

Thus she spake and her voice trembled.
And so it was. And David heard.

She neither weeps nor holds her tongue, but her voice trembles. David, and with him the readers, heard in her words the essence of Zionism: A defeat in Exile is final, but a defeat in the homeland is temporary. The blood-soaked soil of the land strengthens the resolve of its sons and their mothers: Vanquished in exile by death and its terror, here they will prevail over both.

Alterman speaks through the mouth of a fictitious biblical character, whereas Amir Gilboa in his poem "Saul" (Keḥullim va-Adummim, Tel Aviv, 1963, p. 216) bridges the time gap by having a contemporary speak to Saul. While the courage of Saul's mother is superhuman (in a sense even inhuman), Gilboa's narrator expresses amazement at Saul's awe-inspiring death by describing his own weaknesses and doubts:

Saul! Saul!

I do not know whether it was shame or fear of a bodiless head—

But upon passing by the wall of Beth-Shean

I turned my head away.

Then, when your arms-bearer refused you the sword you commanded,
I stood dumb, speechless, and my blood flowed from my heart.
I really cannot say what I would have done in his place
had I been your arms-bearer.

And you are the king.

And it is your honor as king when you command.

I really cannot say what I would have done in his place.

Saul, Saul, come!

In Beth-Shean the Children of Israel now live.

Saul's head is impaled upon the (Roman) wall of Beth-Shean at this day (1952), and the speaker, averting his gaze, admits that he does not know whether he did so out of shame at what the Philistines did to his king or out of fear of the terrible sight. Uncertainty as to the real reason for his behavior is also expressed in a further, even more heartrending, quandary: He is present at Gilboa when Saul's arms-bearer disobeys the king's command to bring him his sword so that he can commit suicide. The speaker does not know whether he himself would have been brave enough to disobey his monarch, or whether he would have obeyed, recognizing that the king's honor required him to obey even unto death. The solemnity of the biblical scene is expressed through the narrator's insignificance and doubts: It does not occur to him to identify with the king, and while he is identifying with the arms-bearer, he is still no more than a silent observer, his heart bleeding at the gravity of the dilemma. Only toward the end of the poem does a new certainty seize him, enabling him to address the live Saul and inform him of the great Zionist message of comfort; the story of Israel's defeat on Mount Gilboa and the abuse of Saul's body has a happy ending: Beth-Shean is being rebuilt and settled by new immigrants!

Alterman delivers the message in loud, resonant tones; Gilboa whispers: By virtue of national continuity, geographic identity, and Scripture's eternal truth, we are living in the Bible and the Bible lives in us. Thus the Bible had become the Holy Scriptures of Zionism, but there was a profound difference between those who considered it a heroic epos, to be released from the heavy shackles of prophetic ethics, and those for whom it was a source of ethical lore and Jewish spiritual life. The latter considered the ethical values underlying the laws of the Torah, as well as the courageous social censure and vision of national redemption pronounced by the prophets, as a firm basis for a new version of Judaism: neither halakhic, traditional, nor exilic; but authentic by virtue of being neo-biblical.

In addition to these groups of writers, however, there were radical discreditors of Judaism, for whom clinging to the national heritage and accepting authority, excess spirituality, moral scruples, the claim to national uniqueness, were obstructions on the path to a natural, free life. They rejected the Bible entirely, or expressed their adoption of alternative values by such means as giving poetic expression to the false prophets or explicitly rejecting David.

Method of Interpretation:

Derash Claiming to Be Peshat

Accompanying the return to the Bible was an enthusiastic devotion to peshat (contextual and philological interpretation). Peshat alone would reveal the text's authentic meaning, extricating it from talmudic midrash (homiletics) and medieval commentaries, and from the confining authority of the Rabbis. Part of the magic of peshat was that it extended the secular hegemony (already effective in society, politics, and culture) to the realm of Bible commentary, freeing it from religious tradition. David Ben-Gurion does not say this ex-PLICITLY in his article, "The Bible Shines with Its Own Light" (Iyyunim ba-Tanakh, Tel Aviv, 1969, pp. 41-45) but conveys it indirectly by three examples of the superiority of peshat: "an eye for an eye" cannot possibly refer to payment of damages, as taught by the Rabbis; the biblical David was no scholar, poring night after night over the oral law, but an intrepid warrior-king, capable of committing grave sins; and "the truth obliges us" to recognize that "The Song of Songs is (in its plain meaning, as a love song) one thing, while the midrash of the Song of Songs is another." But then Ben-Gurion declares, "The books of the Bible declare the glory of Israel. As to the glory of God—that is declared by the heavens, and the 'heavens' belong not to our nation only, not even to humankind, but to infinity. . . . The Bible is our own creation. . . . The Holy One, blessed be He, does not need an identity card." With that he abandons a contextual, philological reading of innumerable passages that speak in God's name or magnify and glorify Him; through radical midrash, he ignores the active, clearly manifest deity, and replaces Him by the spirit of the nation or the soul of the universe.

Indeed, although Zionism promoted understanding of the Bible (through biblical realia and analogy between the two periods), it also obstructed understanding (since the modern Return responded to a national, not divine, imperative). The secular generation, eager to find its reflection in the text and guide itself by its light, could ardently embrace such verses as "doing work with one hand while the other held a weapon" (Neh. 4.11), but was puzzled and repelled by "you shall be holy, for I, the LORD your God, am holy" (Lev. 19.2). To bridge the gap, they had to resort to quasi-midrashic interpretation, which sanctified biblical values while rejecting the plain meaning of divine revelation. "Thus says the LORD" and "I the LORD am your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt" (Exod. 20.1), were metaphorical, archaic expressions that actually represented a psychological reality: an ethical imperative emerging from the depths of the soul, or the national spirit inspiring the liberators. But since midrash was considered invalid, contrary to peshat, and identified with the disparaged pilpul (hair-splitting, legalistic reasoning), such naïve explanations had to obscure their remoteness from peshat.

By using one of the most characteristic tools of midrash, metaphor, the authors of the Declaration of Independence of Israel could substitute for the transcendent "God of Israel" the national "Rock of Israel" (this too purged of its plain religious meaning, as in 2 Sam. 23:3: "The God of Israel has spoken, the Rock of Israel has said . . ."). Similarly, midrashic license divorced the words "the guardian of Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps" from their context in Ps. 121 (where the name of God occurs five times), interpreting "guardian of Israel" not as the omnipotent heavenly guardian but as the brave human guards on earth. One popular Hanukkah song used the quite radical technique of al tikre (substitution of one word for another) to transform "Who can tell the mighty acts of the LORD" (Ps. 106.2) into "Who can tell the mighty acts of Israel." A song for the fifteenth day of Shevat (the New Year for trees) took the first phrase of the verse "When you enter the land and plant any tree for food, you shall regard its fruit as forbidden . . ." (Lev. 19.23) and made of it a separate commandment by cutting the verse in half, the syntax in Hebrew allowing the remaining words to be understood as: "When you enter the land, you shall plant every tree. . . ." The song then added a rhyme in biblical Hebrew: ". . . / And the tree shall give its fruit and the land its yield." Even the injunction to donate money to the Jewish National Fund was traced to the Torah by a kind of modern halakhic midrash, so convincing that everyone was sure that the words "redemption shall be granted to the land" (Lev. 25.24) are an imperative to purchase Gentile land by peaceful means; the context of the phrase, however, calls for restoring a family's ancestral holdings, sold to strangers because of poverty, to the family's ownership. Similarly, the emblem of the Reali School in Haifa urged its students, "Walk modestly," dropping the words, "with your God" (Mic. 6.8); and the words "Let My people go" were likewise taken from the ritual context "that they may worship Me in the wilderness" (Exod. 7.16), thereby severing them from context, detaching them from their history, and obscuring the identity of the divine speaker. Anyone could thus claim that the rousing challenge to a tyrannical government had sprung from the nation's spirit, uttered by its heroic fighters.

One might think that this Zionist midrash had no place in academia, which is committed to philological and historical study of the biblical text. Nevertheless, despite the detachment of the academy from the social world and its resistance to any ideological manipulation of the Bible, scholars also have reinforced the Zionist-worldly conception of the Bible. Engagement in critical study of the Bible in itself is an expression of the Zionist ambition to normalize all aspects of our life and resume our place in the family of nations. Owing to these efforts, the Bible is studied in Israel, too, in light of scientific criteria developed in the last few centuries, mainly by Protestant scholars, thus breaking free of the Jewish study tradition (which subordinates the written law to the oral). Bible research in Israel has become an active partner in international Bible study, as noted with pride by the editors of the Hebrew-language Encyclopedia Biblica (preface, Vol. I, 1950): "The nation that created the Bible is gradually taking its rightful place in the study of its eternal book" (p. 9). The critical study of Scripture, with no prior assumption of sanctity or overt superiority, makes its own contribution to the national midrash, undermines the perfection of Scripture, and considerably dims its brilliance; but it also provides a scientific-rationalistic justification for the secular view of the Bible as a human, national creation. Moreover, the academic definition of Bible studies agreed with the spirit of the times, treating the oral law as irrelevant to understanding the Bible. In the early 1950s, when I was pursuing my studies in the Hebrew University's Bible Department, one could not study midrashic exegesis there, as it ran counter to peshat. Nor was any course devoted even to those of the medieval commentaries that were based on peshat, as they were not sufficiently critical (the situation has since changed quite radically). The spirit of the times also molded the scientific principles guiding the Encyclopedia Biblica; it, too, reinforced the secular-material view. The encyclopedia was indeed committed to "the original meaning of the texts, in accordance with the intentions of the authors, as they were understood at the time of writing and by the audiences for whom they were originally written" (preface, p. 11). But the editors' understanding of peshat was so one-sided that the ancient authors would probably have been amazed at the extraordinary emphasis on realia, archeology, and the world of the ancient Near East, and the utter neglect of theological, ideological, and literary aspects (as evident, for example, in the almost complete disregard for the writings of the Israeli scholars Yehezkel Kaufmann and Martin Buber). As the times changed, this distortion, too, was somewhat mitigated in the last volumes; but the encyclopedia still lacks entries on memory, labor, property, peace, and remnant, on the one hand, and speech, humor, satire, and narrative, on the other. In sum: Bible scholars, high in their ivory towers, who had no part in the creation of the national midrash, were influenced by it unawares and indirectly helped to buttress it.

The secularizing national midrash also gave schoolchildren a social motive to study the Bible: it prepared them for "life," because minimal knowledge of the Bible was necessary for participation in the collective discourse. The Bible was not only one of the founts of Israel's literary and artistic creation, its inventory of associations (as it still is to some extent), but also the key to the values and ideas current in society. Incoming immigration is referred to in Hebrew, contrary to geography, as 'aliyah,' "coming up," while outgoing emigration is yeridah, "going down," to take one example; and native-born Israelis, looking down upon the so-called primitive culture of the new immigrants, could invoke the term "desert generation" to justify their attitudes (and their budgetary priorities). A person who did not study the Bible was a stranger in Israeli society.

Religious Zionism, too, was an integral part of this collective discourse. Children in religious schools also "granted redemption to the land" with their mothers' pennies; they marched on the fifteenth of Shevat, holding saplings and singing "When you enter the land"; and at Hanukkah parties they sang "Who can tell the mighty acts of Israel," entertaining no doubts that the words had religious validity. Clearly, despite religious Zionism's efforts to contend with the predominantly secular bent of Zionism, it, too, was charmed by the national midrash. Perhaps this was because of the remarkable ability of that midrash, on the one hand, to provide biblical confirmation for the truth of Zionism, and, on the other, to guarantee on behalf of Zionism that the Bible would continue to occupy a central position in Jewish society. Thus, a fierce controversy raged as to the religious sanctity of the Bible, but at the same time no one denied that it belonged to the entire nation—a shared, unifying, and inspiring possession.

The Crisis of Secular Zionism Undermines the Validity of the National Midrash

One does not have to be a "post-Zionist" to realize that Zionism, as an ideology and a mass movement, is in deep trouble, and this has implications for the place of the Bible in contemporary Israeli society.

The establishment of the State of Israel brought about major changes in the country: Voluntarism gave way to state-run action, donations to taxation; governmental relief labor made tree-planting on the fifteenth of Shevat an anachronism, and the Land Administration took over "redemption of the land" from the Jewish National Fund. Manual labor has become the province of foreign workers. Finally, the Yom Kippur War (1973) revealed for all to see that the institutionalized Israel Defense Forces could no longer be compared to the Israelite army of the time of the judges and the early monarchy.

Along with social, economic, and political change has come a mental revolution: Romantic dreams and utopian aspirations have given way to concrete, short-term realism; a self-assured ideology, ignoring anything that clashed with its all-embracing concepts and not averse to shallow conformism, has become unfashionable. There is a strong bias for skepticism and open-mindedness, avoiding bombastic phraseology (embellished with biblical quotations) and preferring understatement—a descent from declamation to stammering; a systematic demythologization of Zionism is underway in the name of one's right—and obligation—to know the complex truth underlying appearance and pretension. The cult of heroism, with its implied contempt for human weakness and disregard for the enemy's suffering, has been discredited. The collective vision, which demanded bravery and self-sacrifice, has been supplanted by personal goals, in which individuals make their own choices and decide what demands to make on themselves. Spontaneity and permissiveness are preferred to normativity and moderation; education has shifted from nurturing values to developing aptitudes, advocating extracurricular studies rather than youth-movement activities. The humanities and natural sciences are neglected in favor of social and applied sciences, law, and business administration. The ambition of the second-generation sabra [native Israeli] is no longer to put down roots in this country but to spread his or her wings and explore the world.

Some consider this crisis to be the beginning of the end of Zionism, for better or for worse. I, however, see the process not as disintegration but as maturation, which is a precondition for any new growth. At any rate, Zionism is gradually losing its power as a secular religion, and the Bible is no longer the Scripture of that religion. The allure of romantic Zionism has dimmed, the sensation of miracle in Israel's revival has faded, and feelings of national pride have weakened; the abyss between the real present and the mythological past has deepened. As a result, the national midrash has lost its potency, no longer able to bridge the chasm between life and the Book. We increasingly lack a link with the Bible; it is no longer a source of inspiration and guidance. It has lost its magic.

A brief hermeneutic excursion will explain. The interpretive power of peshat derives not from religious common ground but only from philological credibility. In contrast, the interpretive validity of a midrashic system, the confidence that the content attributed to the text is indeed concealed between its lines, is limited a priori to believers. For the members of that audience to embrace the proposed midrashic commentary as an authentic, binding interpretation, they must agree on:

1. The overall truth of the values, ideas, and ideals that they are supposed to believe: Zionism as renaissance and redemption; Eretz Israel as the promised land; the duty of self-sacrifice to pioneering and security goals; and so on.

2. The supreme position of the Book in the community, its ability to reinforce the beliefs, precepts, and hopes to which it is committed: the Bible as the peak of creativity in the era of our national splendor and an embodiment of eternal truths.

3. The capacity of quasi-homiletical exegesis—despite its relative methodological freedom—to reveal an inner truth behind the linguistic exterior.

The first two assumptions taken together—the truth of the values the audience embraces and their acceptance of the eternal truth of the Book—clearly justify an interpretive technique flexible enough to adapt those eternal truths to the needs of the times: The secularizing national midrash is indeed revealing and faithfully representing the message of Scripture to our generation, which is once again implementing, “for the first time in two thousand years," the injunction to return to Zion and to rebuild the land. But once the force of Zionist values has faded, their brilliance dimmed, with the concomitant weakening of the need to connect with the Bible as the values' source of inspiration, the methodological weakness of the national midrash is clear: It is artificial, empty, meaningless. Interpretive flexibility, tolerated because it was necessary to bridge the gap between the Bible and its readers, is now seen as illusion, repugnant manipulation. Once the national midrash has lost its allure, it has also lost its creative power.

These days, appeals to the Bible for inspiration or motivation are rare indeed, and they are generally low-key; perhaps the only instance in recent years was the use of the anti-pharaonic call "Let my people go" as a unifying slogan in the struggle for liberation of the Soviet Jews. Another echo of biblical language is the Hebrew name of the Israeli association for the protection of human rights in the Occupied Areas, Be-Tzelem, "in the image" ("in the image of God," Gen. 1.27), implying that the association's work is a true expression of the biblical ethic. The secular nature of this midrash is brought out by divorcing the word from its context—whose "image"?—but the link with the Bible is highlighted by printing the word with the traditional vowel points and cantillation accents. A similar technique is employed on the title page of Arieh (Lova) Eliav's anthology, On Peace in Jewish Tradition (Heb.: Tel Aviv, 1975), where the word shalom is printed in the same way. In this book, however, even the sympathetic reader senses that the author is seeking in the Bible not inspiration but "proofs" for his values. Similarly—though the differences are greater than the comparison—Member of Knesset (Israel's Parliament) Yael Dayan's attempt to anchor her campaign for gay rights in David's lament for Jonathan was seen not as authentic, merely provocative. On the other hand, Meir Shalev's humorous midrash, The Bible Now (Heb.: Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, 1985), was received enthusiastically and widely circulated because, in contrast to the traditionally adulatory attitude, he has brought the Bible down to our own level. His readers willingly swallow even his entirely imaginary additions (such as the idea that Abigail poisoned her husband Nabal in order to marry David) because the humorous midrash provides us with a kind of biblical confirmation for a realistic, forgiving view of ourselves.

In contrast to Ben-Gurion's ideals, not only has the Bible lost its hold on young people but Israeli youth has rallied to the Diaspora's characteristic issue: the Holocaust. This may be an attempt to atone for early condescending sabra-Zionist attitudes to the Diaspora and the hasty judgment of the millions of victims as "lambs led to slaughter"; it may also represent a desire to exchange the imperative of Return implicit in the biblical promise, grounds for fervent, ideological Zionism, for the imperative of preventing a further Holocaust, grounds for pragmatic Zionism. Perhaps it also expresses a craving for a national ideal protected by a universal, unchallenged taboo, uniting the entire nation in the face of a calamity whose uniqueness and exclusiveness are vehemently defended.

None of these revolutionary developments have affected the haredi [ultra-Orthodox] community. One component of that community's opposition to Zionism is a firm refusal to detach the Bible from the oral law and make it shine "with its own light" in the center of national existence. The talmudic worldview considers the written law first in sanctity but not in authority. That privilege is reserved for the oral law, which, as the authoritative interpretation of the Bible, also determines which of its contents are effective today. The hierarchy is also reflected in the curriculum of the haredi schools: The Bible is studied by children, both boys and girls, but when the boys are ready to study Talmud they no longer study the Bible (except for the weekly Torah portion). The Talmud itself, it is true, lists the Bible as a subject for study in its own right, binding for adults: "Man should always divide his time into three: a third [spent] studying Bible, a third Mishnah, a third the Talmud" (b. Kid. 30a). In the Middle Ages, however, it was ruled that that injunction is fulfilled—in all three parts—by studying the Babylonian Talmud, since it includes all three.

With the Talmud occupying center stage, contextual, philological interpretation of the text, peshat, is not a challenge (except for the two centuries between Rashi and Ḥizkuni, the Golden Age of the French school of peshat, which flourished in the explicitly talmudic culture of northern France); besides, over the last few generations, the creativity of homiletic interpretation in general has declined. As a result, contemporary haredi society has raised the exclusivity of Talmud study to an unprecedented level, and accordingly has not been affected by the changing attitudes to the Bible in the Zionist camp. One cost of this stability has been a loss of creativity: There are among this group no new commentaries on the Bible; they prefer instead to publish anthologies of classical commentaries. Examples are the eclectic commentaries published in English in the United States by the haredi Art-Scroll Publishing House, and the popular book by Yehudah Nashoni, Hagut be-Parshiyot ha-Torah, i.e., Meditation on the Portions of the Torah, subtitled "Original Exegesis according to Pardes, as directed by Early and Late Authorities, with the Addition of Innovations and Insights" (2nd ed., Benei Berak, 1979).

The national-religious public, too, believes in the unity of the oral and written law, while insisting that this principle in no way bars its participation in the Zionist return to the Bible. On its face this should be easy: it requires a clear differentiation between peshat and midrash, as taught by the great exponents of peshat, mainly in medieval Spain and northern France. Since both modes of exegesis are legitimate, each can be considered for its specific purpose: midrash explains the written law in accordance with the oral, while peshat extracts the primary meaning of the biblical text. In fact, however, the paths blazed by the medieval commentators cannot simply be resumed, for in modern biblical studies the peshat method is immeasurably more critical than in the medieval period: It challenges not only the unity of the written and oral law but even the sanctity of the Bible itself—at least, in the traditional definition.

Orthodox Bible scholars, therefore, who teach at Bar-Ilan University and other academic institutions, must contribute to the development of peshat while meeting the double criterion of scientific method and religious faith. In answering this challenge they are motivated, among other things, by the belief that the quest for truth is a religious duty—a mitzvah—and that intellectual integrity is an ethical-religious virtue. In this endeavor they indeed require no little courage to face opposition from both right and left.

The great majority of religiously observant Bible teachers, however, prefer not to confront the tension between peshat and derash, or the critical bent of modern peshat, instead adopting various pragmatic solutions. Quite typical, for example, is the inclusion of Bible lessons in almost all the yeshivah high schools, in the category of "secular" rather than "sacred" studies. Moreover, most Bible teachers in these schools—and in the parallel girls' ulpenot—are not university graduates with degrees in Bible studies, but yeshivah graduates whose studies have centered on the Talmud. Not only are they unqualified, having professionally studied neither the Bible itself nor the related tools; but, lacking the aptitude to explain the peshat consistently and systematically (particularly as they sometimes view it contemptuously as overly "simple" and superficial), they tend to offer their own fanciful interpretations in the spirit of derash. Even when teaching the Torah with the standard commentators, they generally fail to distinguish between peshat and derash, preferring to present their students with a harmonistic hodgepodge of "pretty" explanations, unsystematic and uncontrolled.

Observant Jews are exposed in the synagogue to significant sections of the Bible: the weekly Torah portions, the haftarat, and the Five Scrolls; and a good many psalms in the prayers. They regard study of the Torah (including the Written Torah) as a major religious duty (mitzvah). Consequently, their sons and daughters rival each other in the worldwide Bible Quiz for Youth, with no secular competitors on the scene. Nevertheless, whether they are slowly edging to the right and adopting haredi ways, or maintaining their involvement in society as a whole, they cannot evade their part in the process of the deterioration of the Bible's status.

Now that the Bible has been divested of the colorful cloak created by the national midrash, it emerges in its primary light, as a religious document. As long as the national midrash ruled, the secular public thought it understood the Bible better than did the religious public, which was still shackled by the bonds of rabbinic midrash. Now, however, with the religious nature of the Bible rediscovered, secular Israelis have seemingly renounced such pretensions, and are perhaps even willing to relinquish possession, and restore the Bible to the believers in its sanctity. The latter, for their part, are quick to cite the relative short-livedness of the secular interpretation as historical proof of its illegitimacy; intoxicated by this newfound power, they are inclined to arrogate to themselves the exclusive right to interpret and explain the Bible. Moreover, as religiosity is generally perceived today from the outside and from a distance, in its fundamentalist-nationalist guise, secular Israelis are increasingly distancing themselves from the Bible. This has been reinforced by yet another development: As the secular-national midrash has lost its cogency, it has been supplanted by a new national midrash, which places the values of a maximalist—at times brutal—religious Zionism on what seems like the plain meaning of the biblical text. Thus, exclusive Jewish ownership of the land is justified by Rashi's comment on the first verse of the Torah; commitment to the territorial integrity of Greater Israel is derived from Abraham's "Covenant of Pieces" with God in Gen. ch 15; triumphalist isolationism is substantiated by Balaam's blessing, "A people that dwells apart, not reckoning itself among the goyim" (Num. 23.9); and the taking of excessive political and military risks is based on "Israel, trust in the LORD! He is their help and shield" (Ps. 115.9); not to mention the Kahanist glorification of Simeon's and Levi's killing in Shechem (Gen. ch 34) and the topical espousal of the book of Joshua and the war against Amalek. If this is indeed the true message of the Bible, little wonder that many secular Israelis, who believed with all their heart that justice and humanity, if applied only to our own people, are no better than injustice and inhumanity, draw back and reject the Bible. It has lost its universality; once a unifier, it has become divisive.

Existential Peshat as a Possible Response to Current Needs

The time is not ripe for a new collective midrash. We have only just emerged from an era of collective certainties, and a time of searching may follow the current transitional period of alienation. Peshat is essentially an open-ended quest. While derash is generally founded on a priori acceptance of certain truths, peshat depends on the credibility of method. The seeker of peshat is not supposed to know in advance what may be found in the text; the only prerequisites are philological exactitude, common sense, intellectual honesty, an open mind, and an awareness of the distinctiveness of the ancient text. If its religious nature, which can no longer be denied, is not to erect a barrier between an avowed nonbeliever and the Book, he or she must be on guard against secular arrogance toward religious faith, and perhaps also overcome the fear of being bewitched by its charms, and listen with an open mind and heart to the direct voice of the text. Intelligence, imagination, and empathy will help to understand the meaning of the words "says the LORD" when uttered by a prophet, as well as their implications for the messenger's attitude to his Master and to his mission. On the other hand, one can understand a biblical passage properly without having to accept it as factual truth or normatively binding. One must refrain from negating the text a priori, enter into a dialogue with the text, and thereby enhance one's ability to listen to it on its merits.

The national midrash built an educational analogy between past and present, but the seeker of peshat, in the quest for the primary meaning of the text, does not ignore the differences between past and present. A heightened awareness of passing time teaches one that even religious values and institutions are dependent on historical context. This historical sense can protect us from the fundamentalism that uncritically embraces biblical norms (such as political violence) in utterly changed circumstances. The seeker of peshat must also scrutinize the Bible against the background of its environment, gaining a broad perspective that indicates the limits of our national uniqueness, the relationship between adoption (say, of Canaanite language and poetics) and rejection (for instance, of Babylonian ethical and legal norms). Identification with biblical heroes, too, is no longer romantic but critical, in the spirit of the fervent inner criticism discernible in the Bible itself. This sober realism of peshat is accompanied by the quest for truth, and this may enhance the attraction of peshat for those who have lost trust and interest in the high-flown idealism of the national midrash.

Peshat is inconceivable without methodological awareness: It is relative, derived from scant information (because of the extreme brevity of biblical historiography and the scarcity of contemporary extrabiblical documentation), and constrained by the scholar's scientific school and personality. This methodological awareness must go hand in hand with hermeneutic awareness that a text may tolerate more than one interpretation. The time of arrogant peshat, professing to be the supreme, exclusive, scientific truth, is over; the time has come for peshat which, though conscious of its advantages—rigorous discipline, rationality, consistency, independence, immediacy—is also acutely aware of the attendant disadvantages—clinging to the past, exclusive attention to the rational, and aversion to ambivalence. This peshat, far from disdaining midrash, recognizes its contribution. It is therefore vital that departments of biblical studies at universities and high schools introduce the thorough, systematic study of rabbinic midrash. Students at all levels should be capable of evaluating the nature of creative, nonphilological exegesis and thereby of understanding the sterling value of midrash down through the generations, from those remote times when religious creativity shifted from revelation to interpretation, to the recent times when a modern national movement found it necessary to connect with its ancient source of inspiration. The attraction of Bible studies will be enhanced if students realize that they demand not only proficiency and understanding of the text, but also methodological sophistication. One cannot simply say anything that comes to mind; but differences of opinion and variant exegetical methods are legitimate, each generation having its own interpreters.

Existential peshat is based on critical peshat, but the two are not identical. While many scholars must keep the text at a distance, behind a barrier, an interpreter seeking to make the Bible relevant to his or her personal existence is thereby regarding him- or herself as one of those to whom it is addressed. The Bible's role as the foundation text of the Jewish people is not dissimilar to the role of parents: One can develop relationships of all kinds toward them, but one cannot relate to them as strangers. Just so, a member of the Jewish people may respect the Bible, love it, obey it; but may equally well disobey it, rebel against it, or feel estranged from it. Whatever the case, that person cannot view the Bible as "just another book." This is aptly demonstrated by a recent show, "Va-yo'mer va-yelekh" ("And he said, and he went"), staged by the Ittim ensemble under the direction of Rina Yerushalmi, who writes in the program notes that, after staging two Shakespeare plays, "we felt that the time had come to reach out to our own text, and the Bible is our primeval text." As a prodigal son returning to his parents, this powerful show comes back to the Bible, with admiration, love, anger, bitter mockery, and pain.

Existential peshat will never be able to place the Bible at the center of public life. Instead of struggling in vain to recreate a bygone situation, it is more realistic to promote understanding of the Bible as it is, with its beliefs, inner tensions, and chronological and geographical contexts; and, at the same time, to bring out the relevance of the Torah, the Prophets, and the Writings for our own time. No exegetical technique, however, can create unassisted the motivation for its use. Lacking thirst, there is no sure need for the well or the pump. Good teachers are capable of provoking thirst, but their numbers are steadily decreasing for lack of a supportive public atmosphere. Nevertheless, if we can believe the many signs that herald the beginning of a new era, marked by reaction to the prevalent cynicism and nihilism, by growing awareness of the benefit inherent in a definition of personal and collective identity, in a commitment to norms and values, and in the awe confronting spiritual greatness—if we can trust these signs, there are good prospects that all these will be sought first and foremost in that wonderful book which rests, well-nigh forgotten, on the bottom shelf of the "Jewish bookcase."

[URIEL SIMON]

Jewish Women's Scholarly Writings on the Bible

Recent biblical scholarship has been witness to the growing visibility of women scholars, and the profound impact of feminist criticism. Jewish women have participated actively in these trends, and there now exists a corpus of Jewish women's biblical scholarship, some of which also partakes of and contributes to the area of feminist criticism. What follows is a brief survey that outlines its range of subject matter and methodologies, examines its presuppositions, and assesses its place in the field of biblical studies in general and feminist biblical criticism more specifically. The works cited are only a small sample of an ever-growing library, but they illustrate the diversity of current approaches and interests that are addressed in Jewish women's writing on the Bible.

Subject Matter

The studies undertaken by Jewish women address a range of topics similar to that found in women's biblical scholarship more generally. First and foremost, Jewish women's writing on the Bible had focused on the representation of women both within and outside of their family contexts. Countertraditions in the Bible: A Feminist Approach, by Ilana Pardes (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992), for example, analyzes stories about women as well as the female imagery in the Song of Songs, while Taboo or not Taboo: Sexuality and Family in the Hebrew Bible, by Ilona N. Rashkow (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000) explores incest and other aspects of sexuality within the family unit. Athalya Brenner's study, The Intercourse of Knowledge: On Gendering Desire and "Sexuality" in the Hebrew Bible (Leiden: Brill, 1997), examines both the semantics and the narratives of gender and sexuality, including the broad range of what she refers to as "deviations from socio-sexual boundaries." Yet not all books by women scholars pay special attention to issues of gender and the representation of women. For example, From Father to Son: Kinship, Conflict, and Continuity in Genesis, by Devora Steinmetz (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1991), focuses primarily on male relationships and pays little attention to the presence and absence of women in the Genesis narratives.

By contrast, other works incorporate a strong emphasis on gender issues into their treatments of topics that extend beyond women, family, and female imagery. Susan Niditch's study, War in the Hebrew Bible: A Study in the Ethics of Violence (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993), is not explicitly a feminist reading of the Bible; indeed, it is much more concerned with addressing the anti-Jewish interpretations in which biblical Israel, and, by extension, Judaism, are viewed as war-mongering and parochial. Nevertheless, Niditch examines such female figures as Jael (Judg. chs 4–5) and Esther, and addresses issues such as the fate of women in time of war. Adele Reinhartz's Why Ask My Name? Anonymity and Identity in Biblical Narrative (New York: Oxford University Press, 1992) focuses on the unnamed characters in the Bible, both male and female, but it too pays special attention to issues related to gender, particularly because so many of the Bible's anonymous figures are women.

Whereas the above studies focus primarily on biblical texts as such, others place them within the broader context of the ancient Near Eastern world. Tikva Frymer-Kensky's In the Wake of the Goddesses: Women, Culture, and the Biblical Transformation of Pagan Myth (New York: Fawcett, Columbine 1992) examines the biblical transformation of ancient Near Eastern goddess mythology and its impact on sexuality, gender, and wisdom as expressed in the Bible. Other writers look at biblical women as a starting point for a broader discussion of the role of women in Judaism or in Jewish literature. Nehama Aschkenasy's book, Eve's Journey: Feminine Images in Hebraic Literary Tradition (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1986), for example, traces the ongoing influence of female archetypes back to the "otherness" of women in ancient Hebrew literature. Helena Zlotnick's Dinah's Daughters: Gender and Judaism from the Hebrew Bible to Late Antiquity (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002) looks at the ways in which Judaism contrasts Jewish and Gentile women in the context of national identity. Leila Leah Bronner's From Eve to Esther: Rabbinic Reconstructions of Biblical Women (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1994) examines the treatment of key biblical women in rabbinic literature. These studies are based on the assumption that the biblical portrayal of women has profoundly informed the ways in which women are described in later Jewish literature, and in the laws and customs that have determined women's roles in postbiblical Jewish law and everyday life.

Finally, there is a growing body of literature that takes biblical narratives about women as a basis for more personal responses, in the form of meditations and creative retellings. For example, Alicia Suskin Ostriker's book, The Nakedness of the Fathers (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1994), combines poetry, biblical interpretation, and autobiography in a uniquely refreshing and illuminating way. In doing so, she also exhorts Jewish women to do their own interpretations of biblical texts, thereby engaging in their own acts of discovery and creativity. Such works mark the intersection of scholarship and creative literature. They do not so much elucidate the possible meanings of the Bible in its original context as they explore its possibilities for contemporary Jewish women. Yet in the very process of doing so, they often draw attention to the ways in which, and the degree to which, these narratives themselves reflect a particular time and place.

Methodologies

In contrast to the field of biblical studies more generally, Jewish women's biblical scholarship does not focus very much on source analysis and other historical-critical issues, nor is there much concern about "what really happened," an issue that is of great interest in feminist New Testament scholarship (for example, concerning the role of female disciples of Jesus, and the role of women as deacons in early Christian worship). One exception is the work of Savina Teubal (Sarah the Priestess: The First Matriarch of Genesis [Athens, OH: Swallow Press, 1984]; Hagar the Egyptian: The Lost Tradition of the Matriarchs [San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1990]), which attempts to treat Hagar and Sarah as historical figures and account for their biblical representations on the basis of the history, politics, and demographics of Israelite society. Most scholars, however, refrain from such specific historical reconstructions, due to the paucity of evidence (but see the discussion below on social-scientific methodologies).

If the Bible does not provide a clear window into Israelite history, it does provide ample basis for other types of approaches. Most prevalent among women writers on the Bible have been literary-critical methodologies, either on their own or in combination with other methods. From Adele Berlin's Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative (Sheffield: The Almond Press, 1983) to Yairah Amit's introduction, Reading Biblical Narratives: Literary Criticism and the Hebrew Bible (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001), a central concern has been to explore the workings of biblical narrative by employing the categories and methods applied to the genres of narrative and poetry. Such works consider the fundamental building blocks of narrative, including plot, character, and setting, as well as more subtle dimensions such as narrative point of view and linguistic elements such as morphological and syntactical parallelism (e.g., Adele Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985]).

In most cases, literary approaches are seasoned with a strong dose of historical consciousness. Exemplary in this regard is the work of Susan Ackerman (Warrior, Dancer, Seductress, Queen: Women in Judges and Biblical Israel [New York: Doubleday, 1998]). While Ackerman does not assume a historical reality for the stories or characters of the book of Judges, she does take seriously the historical reality of the authors and their audiences. In analyzing Judges' stories about women, she discerns six character types and compares their stories to others from the ancient Near East in order to discern the ways in which they were imagined and developed over the thousand-year period of Israelite history.

Other scholars explicitly combine literary approaches with social-scientific methodologies. Athalya Brenner (The Israelite Woman: Social Role and Literary Type in Biblical Narrative [Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985]) draws on biblical narratives in order to examine the social roles available in ancient Israelite society outside of the family and household contexts. Carol Meyers (Discovering Eve: Ancient Israelite Women in Context [New York: Oxford, 1988]) uses a socio-historical method that draws upon archeology, feminist criticism, anthropology, and social-scientific theory more generally to discern the social world of ancient Israel, in particular women's lives within the household in relation to the larger community.

Another fruitful combination has involved literary studies and psychoanalysis. For example, Ilona N. Rashkow draws on psychoanalysis in The Phallacy of Genesis: A Feminist-Psychoanalytic Approach (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1993) and, more recently, Taboo or not Taboo: Sexuality and Family in the Hebrew Bible. In a category all its own is the work of Aviva Gottlieb Zornberg (Genesis of Desire: Reflections on Genesis [Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1995]; Particulars of Rapture: Reflections on Exodus [New York: Doubleday, 2001]), which draws both from traditional Jewish sources and from a broad range of philosophical, literary, and psychoanalytical works in her struggles with the meaning of the biblical text.

On the whole, these varied approaches and areas of investigation coexist amicably within the field of biblical studies. This state of affairs may reflect not only the desire of women to be supportive of women's study of the Bible generally, but also a postmodern ethos that validates the notion that a given text may be subject to a plurality of interpretations. Nevertheless, there is one contentious issue that also makes its way, at least occasionally, into the literature, and that is the extent to which Jewish women's writings on the Bible may confirm rather than resist or subvert the biases of mainstream biblical criticism, whether of "secular" scholars or traditional Jewish interpretation. In particular, the literary critical enterprise is sharply criticized by Esther Fuchs in her book Sexual Politics in the Biblical Narrative: Reading the Hebrew Bible as a Woman (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000). Fuchs argues that literary-critical works are often fundamentally androcentric; by admiring "the virtuosity of the biblical narrator" they "ignore the patriarchal ideology that inspires so much of what they glorify" (Fuchs, p. 7). She is similarly dismissive of postmodern approaches that, in her view, implicitly or explicitly condone patriarchal readings (p. 9). Fuchs advocates a resistant reading that "questions the ways in which the biblical narrative universalizes and legislates its hierarchical endorsement of the power relations between male and female characters" (p. 9). Despite these views, her own approach is literary, in that it focuses on the Bible as a literary text or texts, at the same time as it is also ideological, in that it exposes the ideological tendencies within these literary texts.

The questions raised in these works, the approaches they take, and the audiences that they address, all place them firmly within the spectrum of biblical studies more generally, including feminist biblical criticism. The participation of Jewish women in the larger enterprise is illustrated by the multi-volume anthologies titled A Feminist Companion to the Bible (edited by Athalya Brenner, first series, 11 volumes [Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993–1997], second series, 7 volumes [Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998–2000]), in which chapters by North American and European authors—Christian, Jewish, and neither—sit side by side and often engage in dialogue with one another. These collections provide readers from many different social locations and levels of knowledge with access to the range of feminist scholarship, including the European and Jewish voices that are often not well known to North American and non-Jewish readers.

In keeping with this broad range of approaches, Jewish women's writings on the Bible draw upon a wide variety of sources, from the classics of biblical scholarship, to works in other fields that develop the methodologies that women apply to the Bible, to a range of religious and other literature from which parallels can be drawn and to which connections can be made. While some women situate their work firmly within the spectrum of critical biblical scholarship, others draw liberally from traditional Jewish sources. This is apparent not only in the apologetic works, in which traditional Jewish exegesis is often seen as the key to the meaning of the text, but in a number of other creative works, including the work of Elyse Goldstein (ReVisions: Seeing Torah through a Feminist Lens [Woodstock, VT: Jewish Lights, 1988]), Norma Rosen (Biblical Women Unbound [Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1986]), Alicia Ostriker (The Nakedness of the Fathers), and Ellen Frankel (The Five Books of Miriam: A Woman's Commentary on the Torah [San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996]).

All four of these books evoke the genre of midrash, that is, classic Jewish biblical interpretation, as a resource for their own creative approaches. Goldstein and Frankel both intend their books as contributions to the Jewish commentary genre that has its roots in rabbinic midrash and is exemplified in medieval Jewish interpretation. Frankel's book reflects this genre not only in its content but also in its formal structure, in which biblical passages are quoted, and then the imagined responses of a range of collective ("our daughters," "our mothers," "our bubbes," "the rabbis") and individual (such as Lilith, Sarah, Hagar, Dinah, and Miriam) commentators are recorded, in a way that imparts a sense of lively dialogue. Books that fall more squarely into the genre of critical biblical scholarship, however, draw much less frequently upon classic Jewish sources such as midrash or medieval exegesis. Some refer occasionally to specific midrashim (Reinhartz, Steinmetz, Pamela Tāmarkin Reis, Reading the Lines: A Fresh Look at the Hebrew Bible [Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002]), or discuss midrash as a genre (Berlin, Meyers, Steinmetz), but their primary frame of reference is critical biblical scholarship.

Basic Assumptions

Despite these diverse interests and approaches, Jewish women's writings on the Bible share a number of presuppositions. Most important is the need to include women and gender issues in the overall study of the Bible. Implicit in this assumption is the view that biblical scholarship, while not ignoring women entirely, has generally overlooked the presence and importance of women. Thus to some extent women's biblical scholarship aims to correct a bias in mainstream scholarship. Second, while few of these works concern themselves directly with textual or literary reconstruction, many of them, with the exception of those taking a very traditional stance, do presume the results of standard source criticism, that is, they agree that the Bible in its present form took shape over a number of centuries and drew upon several written sources. They also agree that it is important to situate biblical writings within their context in the ancient Near Eastern world, and to consider social and historical circumstances to the extent that these can be ascertained.

Most controversial, perhaps, is the degree to which Jewish women writers accept or reject the fundamental assumptions of feminist biblical scholarship more generally: that the society reflected in the Bible was patriarchal in that it privileges men, and that the Bible itself is an androcentric text, written from the perspective of male interests, concerns, and activities. On one end of the spectrum we find apologetic works, often written by Orthodox women (e.g., Tamar Frankiel, The Voice of Sarah: Feminine Spirituality and Traditional Judaism [San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1990]) with the intention of affirming the traditional separation of gender roles according to which women are relegated to the private, domestic sphere and hence excluded from public roles, particularly within the synagogue service. Such works reflect the influence of feminism insofar as they focus on the role of women in a way that is not usually apparent in traditional Jewish men's writings on the Bible, but they reject the feminist emphasis on liberation due to its implied critique of traditional Judaism. Such works will argue that traditional women's roles stem from the Torah and hence are divinely mandated; furthermore, they do not oppress women or imply their secondary status, but, on the contrary, affirm their elevated spiritual status.

Many other works, whether written by secular women (e.g., Pardes) or by women who affiliate themselves with the established Jewish denominations (Goldstein, Reinhartz), either implicitly or explicitly accept the feminist argument regarding the Bible's androcentrism and patriarchy. Rashkow (Taboo or not Taboo), for example, views biblical patriarchy and androcentrism as mechanisms by which heterosexual males defined themselves as the norm (p. 10). Niditch ("Portrayals of Women in the Hebrew Bible," in Judith R. Baskin, ed., Jewish Women in Historical Perspective [Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1991], p. 28) and Pardes both acknowledge the Bible as patriarchal and androcentric, but argue for the presence of "nuances" (Niditch) or "countertraditions" (Pardes) that subtly subvert or undermine the predominant patriarchal ideology.

Context in Biblical Scholarship

Jewish women writers on the Bible differ fundamentally from non-Jewish women to the extent that they relate in some way to classical Jewish sources as being part of their own heritage; that they in some way or another incorporate Jewish sensibilities or experiences, however these may be defined, into their scholarship and writing; and that they envisage Jews, or more specifically Jewish women, as an important part of their audiences. In other ways, however, the concerns and perspectives of Jewish women parallel those of non-Jewish women, particularly women who explicitly identify themselves as Christian, who examine issues that arise in Christian contexts and address their studies primarily to Christian women. In both cases there are interpreters who read the Scriptures with a “hermeneutics of suspicion” (Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza) in order to identify patriarchal and androcentric tendencies, those who creatively fill the gaps of the text to create new texts, those who find “countertraditions” in the Bible that can be used as a basis for subverting or correcting the text’s patriarchal biases, and those who believe that the Bible is beyond redemption. These similarities exist because of mutual influence, but also because Jewish and Christian women are engaged in parallel struggles against the ways that the biblical text has been used to restrict women’s activities and possibilities.

The value of Jewish women’s writings on the Bible as scholarship can be measured by their contributions to the understanding of the Bible, its narrative, theology, ideology, and all other aspects. In the context of feminist scholarship, however, their value can be measured in terms of their liberative potential. The latter can be seen most clearly in those works that draw on the creative imagination of the author. These works may fall at or outside the margins of the scholarly world, but as personal reflections that attempt to address contemporary women through ancient texts, they have the potential to reach a general audience that may also be open to a new way of reading the Bible. Nevertheless, the proliferation of Jewish women’s writing on the Bible, in its very diversity, is a force for liberation and transformation. It exemplifies women’s access to education and to the institutions of higher education and publication, and allows women’s views to stand alongside those of male scholars in shaping the field of biblical studies. Whether they do or do not view the Bible as a positive force in women’s lives, women writers on the Bible themselves model the possibilities for Jewish women to become engaged and make strong contribution in the form of works that will be read and have influence both within the academy and in the broader community.

[ADELE REINHARTZ]

Jewish Translations of the Bible

Jews first translated the Bible approximately 2,300 years ago, and Jews continue—as individuals and as members of committees—to translate the Bible to the present day. The first translation was the Septuagint or Old Greek version of the Bible, produced in Alexandria for use by Greek-speaking Jews. Translations such as the Jewish Publication Society’s new Tanakh, therefore, on which this study Bible is based, have a considerable lineage.

In spite of a rich and varied heritage, Jewish translations have not received the attention accorded to Christian versions. This has only partly to do with the relative sizes of the Jewish and Christian communities. It has much more to do with the role of translation in the history of Christianity. Translation was present from the beginning: Although Jesus (presumably) primarily spoke Aramaic, his words were preserved and disseminated in Greek. Translation, therefore, as a function of mission, was present in Christianity from the beginning.

In Judaism, by contrast, respect for the original Hebrew wording has been maintained through the intervening centuries. Even when substantial numbers of Jews have not understood Hebrew—as occurred during the Hellenistic period, when many adopted Greek as their primary language—those who translated the Hebrew text produced a version that was markedly influenced by Hebrew phrasing, idiom, and syntax. This points to a distinctive feature of Judaism: the desire to preserve some familiarity with the Hebrew text and language in at least some part of the community. Thus, for instance, chanting of the Bible in Hebrew remains a part of liturgical practice in almost all contemporary synagogues—whether or not most worshippers can understand the text in its original tongue.

Thus for Jews a translated Bible is an accompaniment to, not replacement for, the original Hebrew. This helps explain the prominence of Jewish versions that display the Hebrew and English (or other foreign language text) on facing pages. Even when the Hebrew text is not physically present in its entirety, it is typically brought to the reader's attention through numerous notations and references.

On the other hand, another tradition attempted to make the Bible available in more idiomatic versions to the increasing number of Jews who had little or no acquaintance with Hebrew and no desire to learn it. These two impulses have continued in the history of Jewish translation to the present.

From these remarks it can be deduced that for many in the Jewish community Bible translations have had an ambivalent status: The Bible has needed to be translated so it would be understood; at the same time, this translation typically pointed to the importance of the original Hebrew. These translations have followed the Jewish tradition in terms not only of contents and order, but with familiar divisions into weekly Torah portions, inclusion of haftarat (the readings from the Prophets that accompany the weekly Torah readings), and other features associated with synagogue usage. Moreover, such a version reflects the richness of the exegetical traditions, both halakhic and midrashic; christological interpretations have no place in such editions.

Early Versions

The earliest Jewish Bible translation, the Torah translated into Greek, dates to approximately 275 BCE in Alexandria, the Egyptian capital city. As recorded in the Letter of Aristeas, which was composed at least a century after the events it purports to narrate, the second ruler of Hellenistic Egypt, Ptolemy II Philadelphus, was persuaded by his librarian to initiate and support a Greek translation of the Jewish laws or torah. This text was to occupy a place of honor at the great library Ptolemy was assembling at Alexandria. Ptolemy arranged for seventy-two elders—each renowned for his scholarship and unblemished morality—to be brought in from Jerusalem to ensure that the translation would meet the highest standards of both Hellenistic and Jewish scholarship. Ptolemy welcomed them with lavish entertainment, after which they set about their task. They finished their work in seventy-two days, dividing themselves into subcommittees and consulting with each other. This story has parallels, with variants and embellishments, in rabbinic literature, as well as in Josephus, Philo, and other ancient Jewish sources.

The last part of the Letter of Aristeas narrates a formal ceremony during which the Jews of Alexandria accepted this Greek translation of the Torah as Sacred Writ. Details of this ceremony call to mind, intentionally so, the account of Moses' giving of the law in the biblical book of Exodus. To underscore the seriousness of this action, a curse was uttered against anyone daring to alter the wording of this Greek version.

It is unlikely that this lofty view of translation accords with what its translators actually had in mind. If we examine the Septuagint version of the Torah, we find a fairly literal reflection of its Hebrew Vorlage (underlying text). It is not difficult to see in this approach the desire to produce something on the model of a Hebrew-Greek interlinear version, which would presuppose at least rudimentary knowledge of both languages on the part of its originally intended audience.

Such a Greek text, especially when it circulated independently among people who had little or no knowledge of Hebrew, could well become a substitute for the original, as the Letter of Aristeas envisions. That is not necessarily the case, however. In fact, numerous revisers of this earliest version of the Greek, of whom Aquila (2nd century CE), Theodotion (2nd century CE), and Symmachus (2nd–3rd century CE) are the best known, regularly displayed their acceptance of the subservience of the Greek to the Hebrew when they “corrected” older Greek texts to accord with the Hebrew wording in use within their community. In this way they reflected the view, described above, of the foreign-language text as at most the next-best thing to the Hebrew. At the same time, the care with which they fashioned their Greek version demonstrates the seriousness with which they carried out their craft.

We cannot know for certain what led the author of the Letter of Aristeas to promote the Septuagint as a document with sanctity and authority equal to the original. The fact that Jewish revisers, presumably active before and during the period when the Letter was composed, continued their work in spite of the threats of anathema might lead to the conclusion that the Letter’s author was an idiosyncratic or at least ineffective proponent of his point of view. But that is certainly not so. The 1st-century CE Jewish philosopher Philo, himself a native of Alexandria, equated the Septuagint translators with the biblical prophets, thus according their words—and especially the differences between the Greek and the Hebrew texts—the status of inspired revelation. Philo knew no Hebrew; for such an individual, the Bible in translated form assumed preeminent importance.

While Philo was undoubtedly not the sole Jew to feel this way, his point of view is more characteristic of early Christians. It was in their communities that the relatively sober account of Aristeas acquired its miraculous characteristics: Each scholar worked alone to produce, under divine intervention, exactly the same text as his colleagues. And until Jerome (ca. 345–420 CE), hardly any church leader studied Hebrew or sought to learn the language so as to read the Old Testament in its original formulation. The Greek text served that purpose, as it continues to do for Orthodox Christians to this very day.

Was this earliest Greek version the result of internal Jewish concerns about the need for authoritative interpretation as the Hebrew grew increasingly foreign to the community? Or was the impetus, as asserted in the Letter of Aristeas, external, the result of intellectual curiosity on the part of the Ptolemaic leadership? As is so often the case, the response need not be either/or. Rather, it is perfectly understandable that a convergence of compatible motives led to this development.

The Letter of Aristeas deals only with the translation of the Torah. In the absence of external evidence, even sources as problematic as the Letter of Aristeas, it is difficult to speak with certainty about the order, provenance, and tendenz (ideological slant or general orientation) of other books or blocks of material for the Septuagint. We can note, nonetheless, that some later translators consciously modeled their renderings on the generally literal approach taken by the translators of the Torah, while other translators apparently felt free to modernize, harmonize, and otherwise modify the underlying Hebrew text, presumably to accord with their perception of audience needs. Among revisers such as Theodotion and Aquila, there is a noticeable tendency toward more literal representation of the Hebrew, not only in quantitative terms, but also qualitatively, whereby even the fairly limited freedom of lexical and stylistic variation in the Torah yielded to standardization. No matter what we may think of the literary value of the resultant Greek, such texts were popular, as witnessed by the continued use and development of the extremely literal version of Aquila by Greek-speaking Jews throughout the Byzantine period.

The sources cited above witness to differing views about the value of the Greek version, but none condemns translation per se. Such condemnations are found in rabbinic sources, along with positive statements, often directed specifically at the Greek text, about biblical versions in languages other than Hebrew. Such divergent opinions likely reflect deep divisions among rabbinic authorities, linked to factors such as chronology (pre- or post- 70 CE), geography (in the land of Israel or the Diaspora), and ideology. Although Christians disputed—sometimes heatedly, as in the case of Jerome and Augustine—about which text to translate, the question of whether to translate never arose.

In the formal sense the Septuagint does represent the earliest recorded enterprise aimed at producing a written version of Scripture in a language other than Hebrew. But it is likely that Bible translation or interpretation is several centuries older. As depicted in Nehemiah ch 8, Ezra, standing before the people at Jerusalem's Water Gate, read from the Book of the Law (essentially the Torah) in Hebrew, with others providing an explanation. (The exact meaning of the Hebrew terminology used in Neh. 8.8 is debated; see notes there.) It is likely that this explanation or interpretation was in Aramaic, by then the lingua franca of the Middle East, for the benefit of the populace, who were no longer fluent in Hebrew. If this scenario is correct, interpreters were utilizing Aramaic to supplement and explain, but not replace, the Hebrew original, and in an oral rather than scribal context.

At some point in the pre-Christian era, scribes put Aramaic renderings of the Bible into written form; the term Targum (plural: Targumim or Targums) designates such texts. Traditional Jewish sources identify the Torah as the earliest portion translated into Aramaic. Among the Dead Sea Scrolls are indeed two small Aramaic Leviticus fragments, alongside a far longer Targum of Job. The most important Targumim date from the early centuries of the Christian era, although the materials they contain are often much older. There are several important Targumim for the Torah, the Former Prophets, the Latter Prophets, and the Writings. The most influential Targumim were composed in Babylonia.

It is often asserted that the texts of the Targumim, which initially functioned liturgically as supplements to the Hebrew, were essentially paraphrases. This is not so. For the most part, translators into Aramaic were relatively restrained in parting from whatever underlying Hebrew text they had. When they did depart from it, however, it is the case that they exercised considerably more freedom than most Septuagint translators in introducing extensive blocks of "nonbiblical" material in both narrative and legal sections. Among the techniques they adopted were circumlocutions for the name of God. They also incorporated a broad range of updatings to conform to their perceptions of both communal needs and the Oral Tradition. Parallel to developments in the transmission of the Septuagint, later Targumists allowed fewer and fewer paraphrases.

As part of Christian Scripture, the books of the Old Testament also circulated in Syriac, or Eastern Aramaic, and Latin. Jews may well have been responsible for some of the early (3rd century CE and before) Syriac versions that played a part in the later development of the standard Syriac Bible or Peshitta. On the other hand, there is no sure evidence that Jews produced Latin versions of the Bible, in spite of their presence in North Africa, where Christians prepared their earliest biblical texts in Latin. As noted above, Jerome made a point of learning Hebrew and of consulting Jewish teachers to produce the Latin text ultimately adopted by the Catholic Church as the Vulgate. For this, he was roundly attacked on philological, theological, and religious grounds; in terms of the latter, he was almost universally condemned for consorting with Jews who would infect him with their perverse interpretations (or rather misinterpretations) of sacred Scripture. It is nonetheless true that almost all subsequent translators (for example, Martin Luther) and translation committees (such as those responsible for the King James Version) made use, often extensive use, of Jewish sources.

The Medieval and Renaissance Periods

The preeminence of the Arabic language accompanied the rapid rise of Islam in the mid-7th century CE. Jews living in the East and in North Africa quickly adopted it, as they had earlier Latin, Greek, and Aramaic. Several centuries passed before Saadia ben Joseph, a gaon (head of a Babylonian rabbinic academy) in the early 10th century, took it upon himself to prepare an Arabic translation of the Bible. Originally written in Hebrew characters (as was most Judeo-Arabic), Saadia Gaon's version was destined to be the standard biblical text for Arabic-speaking Jews—a status it still retains for certain Yemenite communities. Saadia's goal, which he magnificently achieved, was to produce a clear, unadorned Arabic rendering of what he understood the Hebrew original to mean. Where this practice came into conflict with the presentation of distinctive features of Hebrew grammar or syntax, he readily jettisoned the latter.

As Jews settled throughout Europe, they did not at first translate the Bible. Their adherence to the Bible in Hebrew ran parallel to, albeit at some distance from, the aversion of the Catholic Church to vernacular versions (the official Bible of the Roman Catholic Church is the Latin Vulgate). In fact, Jewish translations of the Bible were rarely among the earliest literary achievements of European Jewry.

In the case of the Spanish Jews, for example, the most influential version, the Ferrara Bible, postdates the expulsion of 1492 by half a century, taking its name from the northern Italian city to which many prominent Jews had fled. Although this text ultimately formed the basis for other Spanish-language Bibles in wide use among Catholics, its Jewish origins are securely fixed by a number of distinctive features: use of Hebrew characters in its first printings, close adherence to Hebrew grammar, transcription of proper names, and its division according to traditional synagogal practice.

Among German-speaking Jews translation of the Hebrew Bible goes back to the 1200s. These early exemplars, shaped primarily for the home and school, were often excruciatingly literal representations of a single book or block of biblical material. The implicitly "female" orientation of such versions—after all, women had charge of the home and elementary education, but no public role in the synagogue—became explicit in the Deutsch Humash of Jacob ben Isaac of Yarnow, from the mid-1600s. Better known as the Tzena Ure'ena or "Women's Bible" (see "Post-medieval Jewish Interpretation," pp. 1900–1908), this rendering incorporated an enormous amount of extra-biblical, largely aggadic, material. This development seems to support the prevailing view of the time that women could comprehend the Bible only when it was augmented with stories and concrete examples; men, on the other hand, could be trusted with the Hebrew original.

A century before Jacob ben Isaac, and unnoted by him, Martin Luther had produced his landmark German version of the Bible, laboring on the Old Testament from 1522 to 1534. As part of his efforts to reform Christianity, he shaped a German text characterized by forceful language and direct diction. A literary masterpiece against which all subsequent German Bibles would be measured, Luther's version, like Jerome's some 1,100 years earlier, reflected the Jewish interpretive tradition—in Luther's case, Rashi, as refracted through Christian sources, influenced him more than he would probably have been comfortable admitting.

Early Modern Translations

Two and a half centuries later, it was to Luther, or at least to the language of Luther, that the Jewish intellectual Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1796; see "Post-medieval Jewish Interpretation," pp. 1900–1908) turned. He was not happy with the simpler German used in Jewish Bible translations and, more generally, in Jewish society. He looked to language, in this case the higher form of German that prevailed in cultured circles, as a means to bring his fellow Jews into closer contact with German society, its ideas and ideals. To achieve this end, he adopted the language, but not the theological outlook or presuppositions, of Luther. Only Jews, Mendelssohn argued, could produce a proper version for Jews. Moreover, in common with Saadia Gaon and the Ferrara Bible, Mendelssohn's text at first circulated in Hebrew characters. From his perspective, it was a singular mark of success that the Mendelssohn translation was soon thereafter printed in German script, facilitating for Jews even greater familiarity with that language and for Christians a firsthand acquaintance with an elevated Jewish view of Scripture.

Successive editions of Mendelssohn's translation bear witness to a growing market that he both reflected and stimulated. The rise of Reform and neo-Orthodox communities among German-speaking Jews was a further impetus to the preparation and publication of biblical versions in German and Judeo-German or Yiddish. While Orthodox constituencies favored renderings that adhered to traditional Jewish sources, others were receptive to editions that incorporated the fruits of the new, critical schools then taking hold among Protestants. Increased sales also resulted from the packaging of some editions as family Bibles.

Mendelssohn's efforts, like those of many translators before and after him, resulted in a translation that in effect brought the biblical text to the contemporary reader. For Mendelssohn, this movement from antiquity to the modern world served to acquaint both Jews and non-Jews with traditional Jewish interpretation in a style that was already familiar to Christians and, it was hoped, in which cultured Jews would also immerse themselves.

Other Translations

The 20th century witnessed another major Jewish translation into German that took a decidedly different approach to the entire enterprise of Bible translation. This version grew out of a collaboration between the philosophers Martin Buber (1878–1965) and Franz Rosenzweig (1886–1929) (see "The Bible in the Jewish Philosophical Tradition," pp. 1948–75). The resultant text, begun before World War I but completed only after World War II and the Holocaust, did not read like anything else in German literature—and this was precisely the point. The Bible was a product of an ancient society, chronologically and geographically far removed from 20th century Europe. In order to experience it in an authentic way, the reader needed to be transported, as it were, back into antiquity. For those without the knowledge of Hebrew, precisely the audience for a Bible translation, the best way to do this was to experience a modern language text that sounded, looked, and functioned as much as possible like the ancient original. Reading Buber-Rosenzweig was not intended to be an easy task, but the rewards—in terms of discovering many literary and theological features otherwise obliterated through translation—were well worth the struggle, at least for some.

By the time Buber-Rosenzweig appeared in its entirety, most of European Jewry, including the Jews of Germany, had been destroyed. A similar, though not identical circumstance occurred in connection with Yiddish translation, in that perhaps its most notable achievement did not appear until well after the high point of Yiddish cultural and linguistic dominance. In this case it was one individual, Solomon Bloomgarden—better known by his pen name Yehoash—who was responsible for the text. Beginning in 1910, he published his version in serialized form, revising and perfecting it until he died in 1927. It was the eve of World War II, however, before his work appeared as a whole. By that time, Yiddish had lost or was soon to lose its prominence as a living language.

Jews had been preparing Yiddish translations long before Yehoash's time. But Christians, or more precisely Jews who had converted to Christianity, were also active in this field during the 19th century. Supported by the British and Foreign Bible Society, among others, such individuals produced Yiddish-language Old Testaments compatible with Christian theology that missionary societies distributed widely throughout Eastern Europe and among immigrant Jewish communities in the West. Together with Yiddish versions of the New Testament, these Yiddish Bibles were intended to provide the Good News in an attractive and accessible format. Bible Society records indicate that such theological motivations were accompanied by the desire to raise the quality of Yiddish from jargon to a standardized, recognized language.

English Translations

The history of Jewish translation of the Bible into English shares many of the features of Jewish versions in other modern languages. At the same time, distinctive elements mark its development, culminating in the proliferation of texts during the past several decades.

In some ways, the King James Version (KJV) of 1611 functions for English speakers as Luther's version has for those who speak German. Although not the earliest English rendering, KJV is by far the most influential. The members of its translation committee resemble Luther's individual effort in two other respects: They were deeply indebted to Jewish scholarship, in their case the work of David Kimḥi (Radak); but they themselves had no recorded contact with Jews who, having been expelled from England several centuries earlier, were not officially welcomed back until the mid-1600s.

The cadence, vocabulary, and overall structure of KJV strongly resemble the Hebrew original. Any number of memorable turns of phrases ("tender mercies," Ps. 25.6 and elsewhere) or lingering verbal pictures ("the face of the waters," Gen. 1.2, and "the LORD make his face shine upon thee," Num. 6.26) we associate with KJV are in fact quite literal renderings of the Hebrew lost in freer translations into English or other modern languages.

Whether through recognition of this indebtedness, a desire to fit in, a lack of interest in making a new English translation, or a combination of such factors, KJV apparently served the needs of England's growing Jewish community for the first century of its post-expulsion existence.

The first Jewish versions of the Bible in English appear in the 1780s and are limited to the Torah. They are not in fact new translations: A page of Hebrew text faces the corresponding version of KJV, with a scattering of notes (in English and Hebrew) from traditional Jewish sources such as Rashi. Such editions may represent a reaction to Hebrew-English texts published in the preceding decades under Protestant auspices. In any event, the materials in these versions, consciously shaped as they are for English-speaking Jews, represent an important step—and not an isolated one.

Earlier in this essay, both internal and external causes or stimuli were identified for the Greek translation of the Torah (the Septuagint). A similar complex of concerns was operative in England at the turn of the 19th century. It is clear that by that time most Jews, those who immigrated from Spanish-speaking lands as well as those from German and Yiddish backgrounds, were becoming increasingly familiar and comfortable with English. Synagogues established by both German and Spanish communities made use of prayerbooks with some English, and it was not uncommon to hear at least a few sermons in English. Under such circumstances the appearance of "Jewish Bibles" that combined English with Hebrew (and some traditional Jewish exegetical annotation) is not surprising.

External forces were active that would slowly propel the Jewish community in the same direction. Missionary societies had existed for some time, but by the early 1800s their number, and especially their focus on the conversion of Jews, increased considerably. Most notable in this respect was the London Society for Promoting Christianity among Jews, generally referred to simply as the London Jews Society. Their proselytizing was in turn greatly abetted by the British and Foreign Bible Society, founded in 1804. Although not a missionary society per se, this organization (and others founded throughout the world, including the American Bible Society), had as one of its principal goals the mass production of inexpensive Bibles that were useful in acquainting non-Christians with the New Testament gospel and the Old Testament as Christian texts. (Yiddish Bibles of this sort were noted above.) In what might appropriately be termed a measure of self-defense, the Jewish community would come to see the value of producing its own English-language versions.

An additional feature marks the introduction of English Bibles into London's Jewish community and from there throughout the Empire and to North America: the few known pre-1800 editions came not from the Jewish establishment, but from individuals on the periphery of the organized community or even at odds with its leadership. Perhaps Jewish leaders of this period thought it imprudent to challenge, if only implicitly, the unique status of KJV. On the other hand, they may have been resisting the incursion of English into precincts where Hebrew and German (Yiddish) or Spanish had previously reigned unchallenged.

In any case, by the mid-1800s, individuals well connected by profession, relation, or both were preparing English versions, typically of the Torah or specific books rather than the entire Bible, for Jews. In an unmistakable sign that these versions had "arrived," the Chief Rabbi of the British Empire sanctioned two of them. Perhaps the better parallel is the term "authorized," as in the Authorized Version, another name for KJV. We must, nonetheless, be careful to distinguish the procedures, and especially the goals, envisioned in these two cases. When the Church of England "authorizes" a translation of Scripture, it signifies its suitability for liturgical use in a church. When the Chief Rabbi "sanctioned" Jewish versions, he pointedly did not refer to the synagogue, but to their use in schools and homes. It was not conceivable that the Chief Rabbi would have bestowed similar recognition for liturgical usage, where the Hebrew text retained its central role. Still, it is worthy of note that he at least tacitly recognized the increasing role of the home and school in transmitting and inculcating Jewish values as enshrined in the Bible.

By the end of the 19th century, the Jews of England had their choice of more than a dozen English-language versions specifically marketed to them. The translations themselves are admittedly not distinguished nor do they differ markedly from KJV. Efforts were made to excise christological language and to (re-)introduce traditional Jewish interpretations. Nevertheless, at the very time Protestants themselves were beginning to experiment with rather radical (for Victorian society) departures from KJV, Jews departed but rarely from its linguistic heritage and overall format. This may have stemmed from the desire "to be more English than the English," or (as noted above for the 18th century) from the recognition of KJV's "Jewish" roots. It was left to the Jews of the United States, and then not until the middle of the 20th century, to devise new approaches to Bible translation.

Even with communal recognition, Jewish translators in England had, as had Jews in German-speaking lands, worked as individuals—unlike the committees that produced KJV and its successors (or the Septuagint, for that matter). This pattern prevailed throughout most of the 19th century in the United States as well. One man, Isaac Leeser, is responsible for the most influential English-language translation on either side of the Atlantic. Like Saadia, Leeser was a communal leader of prodigious accomplishment and not a little controversy. Despite his notoriety in some circles, Leeser's Torah translation of the 1840s, followed a decade later by his rendering of the entire Bible, attracted considerable interest and resulted in a series of new editions and republications over seven decades.

Unlike Saadia's flowing Arabic, Leeser's English was rather wooden and at many points essentially devoid of literary distinction. It is perhaps the existence of Leeser's work rather than its merits that marks it as a noteworthy achievement.

By the end of the 19th century, the American Jewish community had become sufficiently sophisticated to support a growing number of cultural organizations in addition to synagogues and other communal structures. Among the most important organizations is the Jewish Publication Society (JPS) of America. Founded in Philadelphia in 1888, JPS attracted the financial support of some of America's wealthiest Jews and the involvement of some of the country's leading Jewish intellectuals and writers. In 1917, JPS organized and published the first committee-produced English-language version of the Bible for Jews. The idea for such a version, which was to function as a replacement for Leeser, originated with the Central Committee of American Rabbis, made up of Reform clergy. Their plan, put into action in the 1890s, was to enlist individual rabbis and scholars to work on a given book or block of biblical material. An editorial committee was to ensure some measure of consistency and quality. But these procedures were difficult to implement, and by the early 20th century little progress had been achieved.

At that point JPS took charge, having secured the cooperation and support of most of those involved in the earlier project. Rather than farming out sections of the text to individuals, they established a committee that would be responsible for the translation. This committee was composed of six men, two each from the three major Jewish institutions of higher learning: Hebrew Union College (HUC) in Cincinnati, affiliated with the Reform movement; the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) in New York City, part of the Conservative movement; and Dropsie College in Philadelphia, which was not a rabbinical seminary but a nondenominational graduate school that provided instruction in fields, such as biblical studies, that were not readily accessible to Jews elsewhere. No representative from an Orthodox institution was part of the committee. In terms of their ideological or theological stances, these men ranged from quite liberal to fairly traditional. None of the six, however, was a biblical scholar of any distinction.

In addition to these six translators, JPS selected as editor-in-chief the biblical scholar Max L. Margolis, who was among the best qualified, in terms of temperament as well as training, for the task at hand. He had taught at HUC in Cincinnati as well as at the University of California at Berkeley before being selected in 1908 as one of the original faculty members at Dropsie. He was thoroughly grounded in traditional Jewish learning, as might be expected, but was also well trained in the classics and in the critical approaches to biblical study then in vogue (in terms of the latter, he was generally skeptical, although appreciative). In one respect, the choice of Margolis was unusual: He had been born in Eastern Europe, educated there and in Berlin, and came to the United States only in the late 1880s. As it happened, the selection of an immigrant rather than a native speaker of English helped shape both the process that produced this version and the translation itself.

As an immigrant, Margolis was acutely aware of distinctions in English diction and the negative effects of improper language or slang as a newly arrived populace sought to improve its status in America. To Margolis, the language of King James, albeit lexically antiquated and stylistically out-of-date, was nonetheless the best possible model for his fellow immigrants. In his desire to inculcate the best of English, along with a Jewish understanding of the Bible, Margolis consciously emulated Moses Mendelssohn, whom he greatly admired.

Margolis's efforts were entirely consistent with the approach prescribed by JPS. Although most readers of its 1917 English translation did not know it, this version adhered quite closely to the (British) Revised Version of 1885, which constituted the first major revision of the 1611 KJV. Verse-by-verse comparisons between the Jewish Version of 1917 and the Revised Version reveal agreement, typically word-for-word agreement, in most passages. Where it was necessary to incorporate materials not found in KJV or its revision, Margolis deliberately chose KJV-sounding language, so as to achieve a text that seamlessly combined the "new" with the "old."

Margolis, of course, excised overtly christological renderings and introduced some traditional Jewish exegesis. But a well-educated early 20th-century Protestant would in no way have been put off by the JPS translation, and the same might well have been true for any Jewish reader of the Revised Version. This harmonious picture, which carried over to formatting and even binding, was surely consistent with the goals of the JPS leadership. Margolis, like Mendelssohn over a century earlier, could also derive considerable satisfaction from the recognition that one could learn to be a better Jew and a good citizen through one and the same process.

It was biblical scholar Harry M. Orlinsky who aptly remarked that the shelf life of translations for English-speaking Jews has averaged half a century. That was the case with Leiser and also, so it turns out, for the JPS version of 1917. That JPS itself initiated the project which resulted in a replacement for its earlier translation is due primarily to the energetic advocacy and leadership of Orlinsky. A long-time faculty member at New York City's Jewish Institute of Religion, later merged with Hebrew Union College, Orlinsky was singularly well placed to head the new translation project. He had been selected in the 1940s as the first Jewish member of the Revised Standard Version translation committee; in fact, he was the first Jew to serve on any committee to prepare a mainstream (that is, Christian) Bible translation. His experience in this regard led to his subsequent selection as the only Jewish editor for the New Revised Standard Version. By the late 1950s, when he began to lobby for a new Jewish translation, Orlinsky was well known and respected among a wide range of rabbis and Jewish scholars.

Moreover, Orlinsky had a clear vision of what a Jewish translation should look and sound like, a vision that marked a definite departure from the King James-type language characteristic of earlier Jewish versions. For Orlinsky, the effectiveness of any Bible translation was linked to its easy intelligibility by contemporary readers, who can be readily put off by antiquated or obscure words and stilted or foreign-looking syntax. The question translators should always have before them is this: What did the original authors intend to say to their audience and how can we convey that meaning to our audience? In short, this approach to translation seeks to bring the text to the reader. Although an admirer of Mendelssohn and Margolis, Orlinsky's model from within Judaism itself was Saadia Gaon. More broadly, Orlinsky was allying himself with a number of (mostly Protestant) scholars associated with the American Bible Society, who promoted and practiced a dynamic or functional equivalence approach to translation in two popular versions of the post-World War II era: Today's English Version (The Good News Bible) and the Contemporary English Version.

Orlinsky of course approached his task from what he understood to be a thoroughly Jewish stance. In his opinion, sensitivity to distinctively Jewish interpretations and exegetes produced a text that was not only more suitable for the Jewish community, but that often presented a more accurate rendering than those offered by other translations. When published in a volume that dispensed with hard-to-read type and the two-column-per-page format traditionally associated with Bibles, the New Jewish Publication Society translation (NJPS) was positioned to take its place among the other accessible, readable, and attractive English Bibles of the mid- to late 20th century.

Orlinsky served as editor-in-chief of the committee that prepared the NJPS translation of the Torah, which initially appeared in the mid-1960s; he was also part of the group that worked on the Prophets. Other scholars from North America and Israel composed the committee for the Writings. Their efforts were first published as separate volumes, 1962 (first edition of Torah, revised 1967), 1978 (Nevi'im), and 1982 (Kethuvim). It was 1985 before the entire Tanakh appeared, incorporating in revised form the efforts of all three translation committees. Until 1999, volumes of the Tanakh contained only the English version; in that year, a Hebrew-English language edition first came out, thereby facilitating comparison between text and translation.

It is instructive to compare the two JPS versions, 1917 and 1985, in order to gauge both the distance that separates them and the features they hold in common:

Genesis 1.1–2

1917: In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. . . . And the spirit of God hovered over the face of the waters

1985: When God began to create heaven and earth. . . . And a wind from God sweeping over the water

The 1917 version retains the wording of KJV; it parts company with the Protestant text by replacing the upper case "s" of Spirit, a reference to the Trinity, with a lower case "s." In addition to rendering Hebrew "ruah" with "wind" rather than with a form of "spirit," Orlinsky (in the 1985 version), in keeping with one line of Jewish exegesis, renders the notoriously difficult wording of Genesis' (and the Bible's) beginning as "When God began to create." In so doing, he excludes the theological doctrine of creatio ex nihilo, to the extent that this belief is dependent on the traditional English text. Moreover, it reflects the opening of the Babylonian creation story, Enuma Elish, which also begins with a "when" clause. It is also characteristic of Orlinsky's approach that the literal "face of the waters" yields to the simpler, more modern-sounding "the water."

Genesis 11.5 (Tower of Babel)

1917: And the LORD came down to see the city and the tower, which the children of men builded.

1985: The LORD came down to look at the city and tower that man had built.

It is characteristic of almost all post-World War II versions to update archaic verb forms, such as "had built" for "builded" in this passage. More noteworthy is the use of the generic "man" (but not "human" or "humankind" as in gender-neutral texts like the roughly contemporary New Revised Standard Version or NRSV) for the literal, but perhaps misleading, "children of men." In like manner, "Israelites" consistently replaces "children of Israel" in the 1985 version.

Exodus 21.15

1917: And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death.

1985: He who strikes his father or his mother shall be put to death.

"He who strikes" sounds far more natural to today's readers than "he that smiteth." The retention of the third singular masculine pronoun, a precise reflection of the Hebrew wording, is avoided in certain other modern translations, most notably the NRSV. As mentioned above, Orlinsky played a role in the development of the NRSV as well as the JPS version of 1985. Although his sympathies in such passages lay with the gender-neutral approach taken by the NRSV, in these instances the NJPS Torah tended to resist any innovation. An important innovation, from Orlinsky's perspective, is found at the beginning of this verse (as in Gen. 11.5 and many other places), where the conjunction vav—typically translated as "and" in traditional English versions (esp. KJV)—is omitted. Elsewhere, its presence is signaled through the use of subordination where the paratactic structure of Hebrew favored coordination.

Deuteronomy 24.16

1917: The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers; every man shall be put to death for his own sin.

1985: Parents should not be put to death for children, nor children be put to death for parents: a person shall be put to death only for his own crime.

In this case, NJPS shows considerable, although not consistent, sensitivity to gendered language. The version understands that “fathers,” although a literal translation of the Hebrew, does not reflect the more inclusive meaning of the term here, hence “parents.” In like manner, “every man” is more accurately rendered by “a person.” The NRSV, although not the NJPS, manages to eliminate all vestiges of male-oriented language by the use of “their own” after “persons.” Although more consistent in terms of gender language, such an approach involves more restructuring of the Hebrew than the NJPS Torah editors apparently found desirable.

Judges 12.9

1917: And he had thirty sons, and thirty daughters he sent abroad, and thirty daughters he brought in from abroad for his sons.

1985: He had thirty sons, and he married off thirty daughters outside the clan and brought in thirty girls from outside the clan for his sons.

In his own distinctively insightful way, Orlinsky used to point out how misleading the traditional rendering “abroad” is here. It is not that the judge Ibzan sought foreign spouses for his sons and daughters, but that he went “outside the clan” for prospective sons- and daughters-in-law. A small point perhaps, but instructive for showing what were, for Orlinsky, some of the benefits of the approach he championed.

Isaiah 7.14

1917: Behold, the young woman shall conceive, and bear a son.

1985: Look, the young woman is with child and about to give birth to a son.

With the rendering “a virgin,” the KJV translation of this passage has been central to a christological interpretation of the Old Testament. In keeping with a long-standing Jewish understanding and with the philologically more correct meaning, both JPS and NJPS have “the young woman.” For the rest, JPS 1917 retains the traditional KJV rendering, which places conception and child-bearing in the (distant) future. Although such a rendering of Hebrew present participles is possible, NJPS is surely on more solid ground, syntactically and contextually, when it portrays the women as pregnant and soon to give birth. It is noteworthy that the Revised Standard Version (RSV) Old Testament of 1952 was the first mainstream Christian translation to place “the young woman” in the text itself, relegating “a virgin” to the margins. Orlinsky’s presence as an RSV editor did not go unnoticed by that translation’s conservative critics.

Jeremiah 31.29–30 (similar expression found in Ezekiel 18.14)

1917: In those days they shall say no more: The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children’s teeth are set on edge. But every one shall die for his own iniquity; every man that eateth the sour grapes, his teeth shall be set on edge.

1985: In those days they shall no longer say: The parents have eaten sour grapes, and the children’s teeth are set on edge. But all shall die for their own sins; the teeth of everyone who eats sour grapes shall be set on edge.

It is instructive to compare the NJPS text here with a passage from the Torah, such as Deut. 24.16 above. In the earlier example, NJPS retained the singular (with “person”; cf. “man” in traditional English versions), leading to the retention of the masculine singular pronoun “his.” In the Prophets, NJPS, in a move that could be characterized as quite bold if nonetheless consistent with NRSV, eliminates all exclusively male references. Such a practice, while less literal than the 1917 JPS version, does more accurately reflect the meaning of the Hebrew original, as understood by the committee responsible for the Prophets.

Ezekiel 2.1 (and frequently elsewhere in the book of Ezekiel)

1917: Son of man

1985: O mortal

Ben 'adam is the characteristic way in which God addresses the prophet Ezekiel throughout his book. The literal translation of this Hebrew phrase is “son of man,” which the 1917 JPS version shares with many traditional and even modern English-language versions. The NJPS editors responsible for the Prophets determined that the main point of this appellation was not Ezekiel’s maleness, but his humanness or mortality, vis-à-vis the divinity and immortality of the Lord. Hence, they decided to dispense with tradition, a decision found in several other contemporary versions as well.

Proverbs 31.10

1917: A woman of valour who can find?
For her price is far above rubies.

1985: What a rare find is a capable wife!
Her worth is far beyond that of rubies.

The expression “a woman of valour” is one of the few memorable phrases coined by the JPS 1917 translators. To this day, it is used to describe women of noteworthy achievement within the Jewish community. It is a rather literal rendering of the Hebrew, 'eshet hayil. The NJPS editors for the Writings discarded this expression in favor of “a capable wife,” which is to be sure a possible rendering of the Hebrew. Nonetheless, in this case it is difficult to see this newer wording as either a closer reflection of the Hebrew or a sensitive application of the ancient text to the modern world.

Other English Versions

The post-World War II period has witnessed the proliferation, some might call it explosion, of new, often competing English-language versions, especially among Protestants. The number of such versions is in effect multiplied by the seemingly endless variety of editions, often aimed at niche markets (recent widows, virgin teenagers, recovering alcoholics, for example) in which these translations appear. In comparison, the corresponding market for Jewish versions is quite limited, even when interested non-Jewish scholars, ministers, and laity are taken into account. Nonetheless, the NJPS is far from alone in finding supporters (as well as detractors!) in the contemporary English-speaking Jewish community, or better, communities.

Among the most widely advertised and beautifully produced versions is the ArtScroll’s Tanach (Tanach, an alternate spelling of Tanakh, is an acronym reflecting the traditional tripartite Jewish division of the Bible: Torah, Nevi'im [Prophets], Kethuvim [Writings]), a product of Mesorah Publications of Brooklyn, New York. It is aimed primarily at more traditional or Orthodox segments of the Jewish community, but its appeal has gone beyond that market, in common with many of Mesorah’s other publications in the ArtScroll series. For the Torah, its translators relied on the interpretations of the medieval exegete Rashi; elsewhere, they are more eclectic—but they never range beyond traditional sources. This leads to a number of distinctive English renderings, among which are:

Genesis 2.2: By the seventh day God completed His work which He had done, and He abstained on the seventh day.

For the first prepositional phrase, the Hebrew reads “on the seventh day,” which is contextually difficult, given the fact that creation is elsewhere portrayed as a six-day event.

Exodus 12.15: For a seven-day period shall you eat matzos, but on the previous day you shall nullify the leaven from your homes.

The highlighted prepositional phrase is, literally in the Hebrew, “on the first day,” which creates confusion when compared to other biblical passages in which the leaven was to be “nullified” before the Passover began.

Exodus 20.7: You shall not take the Name of HA-SHEM, your God, in vain, for HA-SHEM will not absolve anyone who takes His Name in vain.

Here, as frequently elsewhere, the tetragrammaton (“YHWH”)—which in most English-language versions is represented by the title, the LORD—is replaced by an expression that literally means “the Name,” reflecting the ineffability of God’s proper name. Ha-Shem as a surrogate for YHWH is frequently used in Orthodox contexts.

Exodus 22.24: When you lend money to My people . . . do not lay interest upon him.

The Hebrew word rendered here as “when” is the common Hebrew conjunction, im, which in the vast majority of instances is translated literally as “if.” The use of “when” here, paralleled in two other places in the Torah, is in accordance with the tradition that in Judaism charity is not a matter of “if,” but “when.”

Leviticus 23.11: He shall wave the Omer before HA-SHEM to gain favor for you; on the morrow of the rest day the Kohen shall wave it.

This verse describes a ceremony, still maintained among traditional Jews, in which the days from Passover to Shavuot (the Festival of Weeks or Pentecost) are enumerated by an offering called the Omer. The Hebrew text specifies that the counting of the Omer starts with the day after “the Shabbat.” But rabbinic Judaism understands “Shabbat” here not in its usual sense, but as “the day of rest,” that is, the first day of Passover. As in several examples above, the ArtScroll Tanach follows rabbinic interpretation rather than a more literal rendering of the biblical text itself, especially when the more literal rendering might create confusion on halakhic matter.

Another version intended primarily for Orthodox and other traditional Jews is The Living Torah, by Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan, and the Living Nach, three successive volumes covering the Prophets and the Writings, translated by Kaplan’s followers after his death. Kaplan was a prolific writer on Jewish topics and often emphasized mystical elements in Jewish thought and practice. The volumes influenced by Kaplan reflect traditional Jewish sources—for legal interpretation especially the philosopher Maimonides—and also display a demonstrable interest in matters of spiritual import. Among characteristic Kaplan renderings are:

Exodus 20.8–10: Remember the Sabbath to keep it holy. You can work during the six weekdays and do all your tasks. But Saturday is the Sabbath to God your Lord.

Lest there be any doubt about when the “seventh day” falls, Kaplan explicitly introduces the modern-sounding expression “Saturday” into the ancient text.

Leviticus 17.14: Tell the Israelites not to eat any blood, since the life-force of all flesh is in its blood. Whoever eats it shall be cut off [spiritually].

The translation of this passage, along with Kaplan’s rendering of Deut. 12.23 below and elsewhere, explicitly introduces a spiritual element into the biblical text that is, at best, implicit in the literal wording of the Hebrew text.

Leviticus 18.7: Do not commit a sexual offense against your father or mother. If a woman is your mother, you must not commit incest with her.

There is no specific Hebrew word for “incest” as opposed to the more general term translated here as “sexual offense.” As in other examples, Kaplan’s practice leads to modification of the literal text in the direction of specificity or explicitness.

Leviticus 19.14: Do not place a stumbling block before the [morally] blind.

Leviticus 19.29: Do not defile your daughter with premarital sex.

As elsewhere, Kaplan renders a fairly general term with a specific one; in this instance, “premarital sex.” In a sense, he may be responding to those who, with some justification, make statements like, “there is no specific prohibition against premarital sex in the Old Testament.” While that may otherwise be quite true, the explicit prohibition does appear in The Living Torah!

Deuteronomy 12.23: Be extremely careful not to eat the blood, since the blood is associated with the spiritual nature, and when you eat flesh, you shall not ingest the spiritual nature along with it.

Working on his own, the Jewish scholar Everett Fox has produced an English-language version of the Torah that draws its distinctive inspiration from the German translation of Buber-Rosenzweig. Like them, Fox endeavors to draw the contemporary reader into the world of antiquity through a modern-language version that incorporates many aspects of the ancient Hebrew text absent in most other English renderings. The flavor, as it were, of his Schocken Bible: The Five Books of Moses, can be appreciated through the following examples:

Genesis 1.1–2: At the beginning of God’s creating of the heavens and the earth, when the earth was wild and waste, darkness rushed over the face of Ocean, rushing-spirit of God hovering over the face of the waters—

Genesis 1.8: God called the dome: Heaven!

There was setting, there was dawning: second day.

Genesis 17.5: No longer shall your name be called Avram, rather shall your name be Avraham, for I will make you Av Hamon Goyyim/Father of a throng of Nations!

Fox chooses to present the biblical names in their Hebrew form, thereby allowing English readers to hear more clearly what the ancient listener would have heard and to enjoy something of the wordplay hitherto accessible only to readers of Hebrew.

Genesis 25.30–31: Esav said to Yaakov: Pray give me a gulp of the red-stuff, that red-stuff, for I am so weary! Therefore they called his name: Edom/Red-One. Yaakov said: Sell me your firstborn-right here-and-now.

Although other versions note wordplays, here and elsewhere, in their notes, Fox presents wordplays associated with names in the text itself. It is also characteristic of Fox to use dashes to indicate that what takes more than one “word” to say in English required only one word in Hebrew.

Genesis 27.36: He [Esav] said: Is that why his name was called Yaakov/Heel-Sneak? For he has now sneaked against me twice.

Genesis 30.24: She [Rahel] became pregnant and bore a son. She said: God has removed/asaf my reproach! So she called his name: Yosef, saying: May YHWH add/yosef another son to me!

Genesis 42.7: When Yosef saw his brothers, he recognized them, but he pretended-no-recognition of them and spoke harshly with them.

Genesis 43.10: The man [Yosef] warned, yes, warned us, saying: You shall not see my face unless your brother is with you.

Where the Hebrew uses the same root (here, “warn”) twice in proximity, most English translations either ignore it or paraphrase, as “surely” or “really warned us.” Here and elsewhere, Fox represents this verbal repetition as literally as possible.

Genesis 45.12–13: Here, your eyes see, as well as my brother Binyimin’s eyes, that it is my mouth that speaks to you. So tell my father of all the weight I carry in Egypt, and of all that you have seen, and make haste, bring my father down here!

Exodus 5.17: But he [Pharaoh] said: Lax you are, lax.

Exodus 12.42–43, 48: It is a night of keeping-watch for YHWH. . . . YHWH said to Moshe and Aharon: This is the law of the Passover-meal. Any foreign son is not to eat of it. . . . But any foreskinned-man is not to eat of it.

Exodus 13.1: Hallow to me every first-born, breacher of every womb among the Children of Israel, of man or of beast, it is mine.

These are among the most important English-language Jewish versions available today. They are by no means the only ones. Especially among Orthodox Jews, individual rabbis or groups of rabbis are preparing their own translations, reflecting both distinctive elements in their teaching and the need for instruction in English even within the most traditional communities. In many ways, the production of such versions parallels developments within the far larger Protestant communities, where distinctive theologies stimulate an ever increasing number of translations.

In today's world there are many factors that promote the production and publication of Bible translations. Theological, literary, social, even fiscal forces have come to play their role in this phenomenon, which is as old as the Septuagint and as new as the latest version. For Jews, the questions that arise are ancient and perennial, modern and immediate: What is it that makes a Bible translation Jewish? Should a Jewish translation ever supplant, rather than supplement, the Hebrew original? Who, if anyone, should determine which mode of translation, or presentation, or annotation is best? Do differing versions serve to divide Jews, and, if so, should there be one unifying version? In the past, diverse responses have met such queries, giving rise to present circumstances. For the future, even greater diversity is likely. Nonetheless, it is possible to be optimistic that Jewish Bible translators will remain true to their task of finding and perfecting distinctive ways to link their communities with the sacred text of the Torah, the Prophets, and the Writings.

[LEONARD J. GREENSPOON]

BACKGROUNDS FOR READING THE BIBLE

The Religion of the Bible

We must first understand that biblical religion is not, strictly speaking, “biblical” because, unlike Judaism and Christianity, it is not a religion based on the Bible—i.e., the canonized record of past divine revelation—but on that revelation itself. Also, it is not a “religion,” in the sense of the beliefs and practices of an actual community. Rather, biblical religion was a minority, dissident phenomenon, always at odds, as the Bible itself states, with the actual religions of the small kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The religion of the latter might better be termed Israelite-Judean religion. For more than a century the difference between biblical and Israelite-Judean religion has been an axiom of modern biblical studies (see discussion below).

Moreover, biblical religion is not a unity but rather a congeries of differing and often competing opinions and traditions. Historical scholarship has isolated at least three major forms of biblical religion in the Bible:

1. Deuteronomic-covenantal religion, based on the legal form of a treaty between Israel and its deity, emphasizing Israelite loyalty and the performance of divine commandments, viewed as stipulations of the treaty.
2. Priestly religion, centering on the cult and emphasizing purity and punctilious observance of rituals.
3. Wisdom religion, focusing on understanding the cosmos and the laws of human nature, and dealing with such general problems of human existence as suffering and theodicy.

Despite considerable mutual influence and interpenetration, these three major types of biblical religion are best examined individually.

We shall first summarize the little that is known, or surmised, about Israelite-Judean religion, and then take up each of these major streams of biblical religion in turn.

Israelite-Judean Religion

The actual religion of the states of Israel and Judah from ca. 900 to 600 BCE can be partially reconstructed from archeological and inscriptional evidence and from some evidence in the biblical text, which must be interpreted with caution, because the Bible stands in a polemical relationship to the contemporary religions of Israelites and Judeans, consistently distorting the real meaning of such features as the “high places” (bamot, translated “open shrines” in NJPS [e.g., 1 Kings 3.2]). Northern, Israelite religion was especially misrepresented by the propaganda of the predominantly southern, Judean authors and editors of most of the Tanakh. For these reasons the following sketch is conjectural, but represents the generality of current scholarly opinion.

There is no question that the national deity of both Israel and Judah was YHWH (LORD in NJPS), but the relationship to this deity might be better called monolatrous, the worship of one god without denying the existence of others, rather than strictly monotheistic. YHWH is the name regularly, but not exclusively, appearing as the theophoric or divine element in Israelite-Judean names. YHWH’s attributes, as expressed in the oldest examples of Israelite poetry, such as the Song of Deborah (Judg. ch 5) and the Blessings of Jacob (Gen. ch 49) and Moses (Deut. ch 33) seem to be a mixture of features attested in Canaanite and Ugaritic religions for the ancient creator god El, the "old god" ('ilu du 'alami = Heb 'el 'olam, "Everlasting God" [Gen. 22.33]) and the young vigorous fertility-storm god, Baal. YHVH is usually portrayed as seated on His heavenly throne, surrounded by the angelic host waiting in attendance, like Canaanite El; or, like Baal, either mounted in the divine chariot, or riding on the "wings of the wind/cherubim." Derived from the latter deity is the pervasive theophanic imagery, namely depictions of the deity appearing with storm clouds, thunder, lightning, earthquake, etc., so familiar to Bible readers. Holy war themes, in which YHVH leads His hosts in battle, are also similar to those elsewhere in the ancient Near East. YHVH is often portrayed as setting out for battle, armed with the divine spear, bow and arrows, against Israel's foes (Ps. 18.7-16; Deut. 32.22-25, 41-42; Hab. 3.3-13; etc.).

Perhaps mingled with, and partially absorbed by, YHVH was a type of god reflecting an older type of religion centering on a familial deity, often referred to simply as the "god of X" (X being the name of an ancestor of the family or clan) or, more generally, as the "god of the fathers." Evidence for this kind of religion comes mainly from the patriarchal narratives of Genesis ("God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob") and is otherwise attested in the Near East from Mesopotamia in the second millennium BCE to, much later, the region of the Nabatean Arabs (centered in Jordan) in Roman times.

In sum, the major attributes of YHVH that continued in biblical religion were already found in Israelite-Judean religion: king, creator, father, warrior, provider of fertilizing rain. Since many of the oldest texts (e.g., Judg. 5.4) refer to YHVH as "coming from the south" (Seir, Paran, Sinai/Horeb), He originally may have been a god of one of the regions south of Judah. But even in old texts He has already absorbed the attributes of several kinds of ancient Near Eastern deities, to become a kind of over-arching deity. The name YHVH may be attested in pre-Israelite documents from the Amorite region of upper Mesopotamia. In the Bible the name is explained as referring to His ability to protect Israel ('ehyeh asher 'ehyeh, "I shall be what I shall be" [Exod. 3.14]) interpreted in context as "I shall be with you." The original sense of the name may refer to God as creator (taking "YHVH" as causative hiphil, "He brings into being") or it may have some other, lost connotation.

One of the most discussed issues in recent years is whether YHVH had a female consort, the ancient Canaanite mother/fertility goddess Asherah, identified with the tree of life. Two Hebrew inscriptions contain benedictions in the name of "YHVH and his Asherah." Scholars are divided in opinion whether Asherah here referred to the goddess herself, or whether the term has been reduced to an abstract hypostatization of YHVH's power to provide fertility. More evidence is needed, but in any case it is certain that biblical religion, in possible contrast to Israelite-Judean religion, viewed Asherah simply as a Canaanite deity and her symbol, reduced to a wooden pole, as idolatrous.

YHVH was worshipped at "high places" scattered around the country, which varied from simple hilltop shrines with stone or earthen altars, cultic pillars (matzevot), and wooden poles ('asherim), to larger structures such as the main high places in the Northern Kingdom, Dan and Bethel, where YHVH was worshipped as a calf. In biblical religion the high places are viewed propagandistically as totally idolatrous from the time of Solomon on, since all "legitimate" worship was to be confined to the Jerusalem Temple. Ironically, the latter itself was a typical Canaanite shrine, built by the Phoenicians, with three divisions, the last of which was the "Holy of Holies," with altar, cultic pillars, elaborate decoration of palmettes, lotus, bulls, and cherubim. According to the main traditions of the Bible, the Holy of Holies contained no divine image, as in typical ancient shrines, but only the Ark of the Covenant containing the stone tablets given by YHWH to Moses. The Ark seems to have had its origin in the kind of box-like paladium still used by some Bedouin tribes. Mounted on a camel, it leads their migrations, as the Israelite Ark is said to have led Israel in the desert (Num. 10.33). The Ark also led the army into battle according to texts describing the early period. Its capture by the Philistines caused a major religious crisis (1 Sam. chs 4–6). According to the Bible, the Ark was brought to newly conquered Jerusalem by David and was placed by Solomon in the Temple, where it was viewed by many as the throne of YHWH. It is not mentioned thereafter, and its later fate is unknown.

Israelite-Judean religion seems to have had aniconic tendencies; it avoided depicting YHWH through any image or icon. Later biblical religion condemns images of deities vehemently, and has suppressed all evidence of their legitimate use, except for the cryptic reference to human-like statues called teraphim, attested in a few places, like Gen. 31.34 and 1 Sam. 19.13, which seem to have been family deities, or talismans. It is possible that the strange story in Judg. chs 17–19 of the image stolen by the Danites, which became the center of a cult served by a priesthood descended from Moses, preserves the memory of an image of YHWH worshipped in some circles. Archeological evidence has as yet turned up no divine images in an excavated shrine, though of course such valuable objects probably would have been removed or looted in antiquity. Israelite-Judean sites do contain large numbers of different types of female figurines, some of which probably represent the fertility goddess Asherah. Such images are usually viewed by scholars as amulets, and as belonging to “popular,” not “official,” religion (see below).

Worship of YHWH consisted of sacrifices, the oldest of which seem to have been the “whole offering” (olah), the “communal offering” (shelem) and, probably, the “sin (or purification) offering” (hattat). Pilgrimages were made to local shrines on sacred occasions. Old biblical texts show that the three major festivals, two in the spring, one in the fall (later called Passover-Matzot, Shavuot, and Sukkot), along with the new moon and Sabbath were occasions for such visits, though it is unclear if in Israelite-Judean religion the Sabbath was already associated with the seven-day week. A yearly pilgrimage is also attested at which a communal offering was made and consumed by the family (1 Sam. ch 1). The elaborate cultic establishment described in the Torah, especially in Leviticus, is held by most scholars to be a development of later biblical religion projected back into the past, but it undoubtedly contains elements reflecting the actual cults of Israel and Judah, such as the scapegoat ritual on the Day of Atonement, itself probably originally a shrine-cleansing rite.

Curiously, the Bible contains no reference to a New Year festival (the references in Lev. 23.24 and Num. 29.1, later taken to refer to the New Year festival, do not mention that name); yet it is scarcely likely that Israel was the only Near Eastern people without such an event, so crucial to ancient thinking and the actual lives of people. It is likely that biblical religion has expunged all reference to the New Year festival, except for an enigmatic reference to a “Day of Acclaim” (yom teruah). Some scholars have hypothesized a New Year festival based on the evidence of some biblical psalms, especially the so-called “enthronement psalms” (Pss. 93, 96–98), and comparative evidence, primarily the Babylonian akitu festival. The event might have proclaimed YHWH’s victory over cosmic chaos (see below), and His kingship as creator. Certainly, the themes of creation and kingship survive in the later Jewish Rosh Ha-Shanah; but that Israel also had such a festival remains conjectural. If the new year rituals were as close to those of the ancient Near East as suggested by some scholars, biblical religion may have edited the festival out as too redolent of idolatrous practices. Some scholars have also suggested a festival celebrating covenant renewal, held every seven years, based on Deut. 31.10–11; but the exist-tence of such a cultic event is even more conjectural than that of a New Year festival.

Prophets played a prominent role in both Israel and Judah. Prophecy of various kinds is attested in practically all ancient cultures. In the ancient Near East prophets are found in Egypt and Mesopotamia, where their function was secondary to the dominant oracular means employed. But in western Asia ecstatic prophecy seems to have had a more central significance. The closest parallels to biblical prophecy are found in the Mari texts (in modern Syria on the Euphrates) of the middle second millennium BCE, reflecting an Amorite (West Semitic) culture related to Israel in many respects. There, as in the Bible, prophets, both men and women, are sent to kings to deliver messages, and sometimes rebukes, from deities. Prophets are well attested from areas around Israel, from Phoenicia to Transjordan, where texts have been found mentioning a seer Balaam, evidently the prophet described in Num. 22–24.

But in Israel and Judah prophets seem to have been even more important than in neighboring cultures. Mechanical forms of divination played a less significant role; there is reference to what were probably a sort of sacred dice, the Urim and Thummim, which could give a simple yes-or-no answer to questions. Later, they are said to be stones set in the breastplate of the high priest. There are also references to consulting the spirits of the dead, such as Saul's visit to the woman of Endor, who raised the ghost of Samuel (described as a "god" [ʾelohim]) (1 Sam. ch 28). But from an early period, the standard means of "inquiring of God" was through a prophet (navi'), also called "seer" (ro'eh), "visionary" (hozeh), and "man of God" ('ish ha-'elohim).

Prophets were characterized by a non-normal psychological state, ecstasy. When the "spirit of God" entered them they fell (sometimes literally) into a trance and received messages from God. They might appear to be asleep, or babble uncontrollably. Prophecy might be stimulated by music (1 Sam. 10.5; 2 Kings 3.15) and was always related to music through the art of poetry, because much biblical prophecy was composed in rhythmical parallelistic discourse, that is, poetry. The early prophets traveled in bands with a leader in their midst, who might be called their "father"; they themselves were "sons of the prophets." They delivered oracles on everything from lost asses (1 Sam. ch 9) to campaigns in war to the appointing of kings. It is likely that groups of cultic prophets were found at shrines, and royal prophets at the courts of kings. In all of this the role of prophets was probably similar to that in surrounding cultures.

However, some prophets took on a more exalted, and isolated, function in Israel and Judah. Prophecy, represented by the seer Samuel, seems to have been centrally involved in the founding of the monarchy, in the transition from charismatic to royal leadership in the 10th century BCE. The Bible attests to prophetic figures who claim to be empowered to appoint kings, and who presume to remain censors of monarchy and state. They deliver unbidden oracles, often unwelcome to rulers, on state policies, both religious and military. They criticize the people for lack of social concern and for oppressing the poor. Such independent prophets, great figures like Samuel and Nathan in the 10th century, Elijah and Elisha in the 9th, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah in the 8th, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and others in the 7th and 6th centuries, far surpass the prophets in the surrounding cultures and are of great importance in the biblical tradition.

The prophets' dominant literary form was the "messenger speech," a discourse purporting to be the direct words of the deity—in structure these were often similar to the message a messenger might deliver on behalf of a king. Many genres were used: laments, parables, hymns, etc., but the central type of speech was the "lawsuit" (riv), which used legal forms to excoriate Israel. The basic outline was a statement of the crime, of an individual, like a king or priest, or of the people as a whole, followed by the sentence passed by the divine court in heaven (of which prophets seem to have been viewed as human members, transported there in their visions). One often finds also a call to "heaven and earth" to serve as witnesses. Lawsuit oracles were delivered not only against Israel and Judah, but also against surrounding peoples (sometimes called "oracles against the nations"). Although the implied audience is the other nations, the actual audience was Israel-Judah, who were to learn a lesson from these speeches. Most prophets also gave "salvation oracles," predictions of weal and assurances of divine protection, a function that may originally have belonged to cult prophets at shrines. It has also been suggested that many psalms reflect an oracle of salvation delivered by priests, or cult prophets, at the shrine. We shall see below that it was the independent, fearless brand of prophecy that provided the stimulus for the growth of biblical religion out of Israelite-Judean religion, but that prophecy itself eventually became effectively outlawed by later biblical religion.

Did Israelite-Judean religion practice child sacrifice, as surrounding Canaanite religions did? To be sure, the Bible condemns "passing children through the fire to Molech" (probably a form of Baal), but Israelites were acquainted with the practice, and recognized its numinous terror when performed by others (2 Kings ch 3). The prophets condemn those who sacrifice their children at the tophet outside Jerusalem, a place of such horror that it gave its name, Gehenna (ge' ben hinom), to the later concept of hell. Biblical religion recognized that the first-born "belong" to YHVH and must be "redeemed." The story of Abraham's binding of Isaac implies that child sacrifice has been superseded, but it also recognizes the significance of the rite as the supreme test of loyalty to YHVH. The story of the unhappy fate of Jephthah's daughter (Judg. ch 11) suggests that the practice of child sacrifice in connection with a strong oath was not unknown in Israel. Certain prophetic texts as well suggest that it was practiced (see, e.g., Mic. 6.7).

Very little is known about the official cult of the Northern Kingdom, beyond the establishment of two royal shrines in Dan and Bethel by Jeroboam I in the 9th century, where worship centered on the images of two calves set up by him, mentioned above. Jeroboam is also said to have established a festival in the eighth month to replace the festival in the seventh month (the New Year festival?) in Judah (1 Kings 12.33).

More is known about the state cult of Judah, which centered in the shrine on Mt. Zion in Jerusalem. Judean religion seems to have reflected a royal theology, or ideology, based on a covenant (berit), an unconditional divine promise to David that his dynasty would rule forever, "as long as the sun and moon exist" (Ps. 89.37-38). The king was viewed as the "son" of God (Pss. 2.7; 89.27; 2 Sam. 7.14), though whether this implied actual royal divinity is questionable. There is little doubt that this royal religion was imported into Judah from primarily Egyptian and Phoenician sources. The terms used to describe the king in the biblical texts that most directly reflect Judean royal tradition, the "royal psalms" (Pss. 2, 20, 21, 45, 72, 89) are used elsewhere only of God. Also prominent in this royal cult were notions of unconditional divine protection of Zion and Jerusalem, amounting to what has been termed a doctrine of the "inviolability of Zion." (This notion is also expressed in Isa. chs 1-39.) It was believed that no enemy could capture the city in which was located God's sacred house, the Temple built and maintained by the king, which was viewed as the royal chapel. The "Zion Psalms" (Pss. 46, 47, 48) are possibly early expressions of this doctrine, which also figures prominently in later prophetic messianic visions (see below). The aim of this political, religious, and cultic complex was undoubtedly to strengthen the claim of the monarchy to legitimacy. It seems to have succeeded, because Judean dynastic kingship remained stable for over three centuries (the brief usurpation by Athaliah is the only exception, and she was a northerner, the daughter of Phoenician Jezebel). Northern Israel, by contrast, probably lacking such a royal ideology, saw the rise and fall of many ruling houses. The main ideas of royal religion became transmuted in biblical religion into messianic eschatology (see below).

What can reasonably be conjectured about the belief system of ancient Israel and Judah? If one relies only on the biblical evidence, very little can be extrapolated that is not dependent on the dating of the texts—a highly debated enterprise—so that any interpretation must remain to some extent circular. For example, was covenant already a feature of early Israelite religion, or did it rise to prominence only later, in biblical religion? The answer to this question depends on how one dates the biblical covenantal traditions, a topic with little scholarly consensus. The only religious complex of ideas that is more or less unanimously accepted for ancient Israel is the “monomyth” of the primeval battle between YHWH and the dragon-like Sea (Yam, also called Rahab, Serpent, Leviathan, River[s], etc.). This myth is found throughout biblical literature and is usually connected with creation (cf. Pss. 74.13–15; 89.10–11; Isa. 51.9–10; Job 26.12–13, etc.; chapter 1 in Genesis reflects biblical religion and has been largely demythologized, with the exception of a reference to sea monsters in 1.21). But what did the myth mean to ancient Israel? Was it reflected, even reenacted in the cult? Had it been reduced to merely a literary motif? We have no answer for such questions.

The extrabiblical archeological and epigraphic evidence points to little overt difference between Israelite-Judean religion and the religions of surrounding peoples. The religious picture that emerges from the great Moabite inscription of the mid-9th century BCE does not differ from what is described in, and may reasonably be extrapolated from, the older texts of the Bible; except that it is Chemosh, national deity of Moab, who wages holy war on YHWH and puts Israel itself to the ban of extermination (herem). Iconography points in the same direction. Israel and Judah made unrestrained use of the typical Levantine Egypto-Phoenician and Mesopotamian repertoire of motifs: winged sun discs, scarabs, moon god symbols, sacred trees of life, paradise imagery, cherubim (a composite beast with the body of a lion, the wings of eagles, and a human head), winged cobras (seraphim?), etc. Many of these symbols were used on seals, the most personal representation of individual identity, and it is therefore difficult to dismiss them as mere “art.” But it is a mystery what such things meant to the Israelites. The full significance of the amulets, especially female figurines, abundant at Israelite sites also escapes us.

Amulets and “pagan” visual symbols are commonly ascribed to “popular” rather than to “official” religion, which supposedly shunned them. Worship at the high places and consultation with the spirits of the dead (’ovot veyid’anim) are similarly ascribed to “folk religion.” But the opposition of “popular or folk vs. official” is inherently polemical and is dependent on individual interpretation; this dichotomy may not reflect the reality of Israelite-Judean religion. For example, it is well known that the Bible presents only a gloomy picture of the afterlife in Sheol, as a shadowy, listless realm cut off from contact with God. But it is becoming ever clearer that the high places, and especially the cultic pillars (matzevot) associated with them, point to a belief in some kind of active contact with long-dead ancestors, perhaps even a cult of dead heroes. The communal marzeah drinking bouts, condemned by the prophets as “pagan,” may also have been thought to enable one to commune with ancestors. Is one to label such things as reflecting only “popular religion”? Or is it more likely that developed biblical religion has edited these practices out and declared them to be “idolatrous”? Similarly, biblical religion reduced the heavenly assembly of divine beings, called “sons of God” (Ps. 29.1), “holy ones” (Ps. 89.6–7) and even “gods” (Ps. 82.1) in older biblical texts, to colorless and nameless “messengers” (angels). But there is every reason to suspect that in Israelite-Judean religion the angels were the same type of potent, named heavenly forces so prominent in postbiblical religion, especially apocalyptic, and also in rabbinic midrash.

The general picture of Israelite-Judean religion that emerges is of a cult along the same pattern of other cults in the ancient Near East. If the surface conceals some “elusive essence” of an already totally monotheistic, covenantal, Torah-oriented faith, scholarship has not yet discerned it with certainty (see below). It is likely not in Israelite-Judean, but rather in biblical religion—what might be termed the Biblical Revolution—that the essential developments lie.

Biblical Religion

Revolution or Reform?

The complexes of traditions in edited texts that form the evidence for biblical religion date, for the most part, from the 7th to 5th centuries BCE: the Torah, the historical works, the beginnings of the compilation of the prophetic books, the chief wisdom books. Embedded in these works are materials that reflect older stages of biblical religion—its prehistory, as it were—and many traditions of Israelite-Judean religion that have, in the main, been altered to reflect later viewpoints.

A key question is whether biblical tradition is merely a later, more developed stage of Israelite-Judean religion, continuing the same basic religious ideas and tendencies, a viewpoint that posits essential continuity; or whether, conversely, biblical religion marks a basic shift in religion, a reinterpretation of older traditions so radical as to be revolutionary. Continuity or revolution?

The Bible claims continuity from Moses on, with no meaningful development. This single authentic tradition was constantly violated by apostasy, but was also restored in a series of “reforms” by figures such as Josiah and Ezra. Modern critical scholarship overturned the traditional viewpoint by emphasizing the principle of change and development. The classic late 19th century synthesis of Julius Wellhausen posited discontinuity between older Israelite and later biblical traditions. The former was a “nature” religion, not essentially different from the cults of surrounding ancient peoples; the latter was a new kind of faith, rooted in prophetic inspiration. Later, according to Wellhausen, it became a fossilized text-centered religion dominated by Priestly ritual and petty legalism. Such value judgments, reflecting Social Darwinist prejudices, seemed to invalidate Wellhausen’s synthesis to many 20th century scholars. William F. Albright and his students tried to show that archeology could demonstrate substantial continuity between Israelite and biblical religions. For example, the covenant traditions were held to go back to recently discovered second millennium models. Some of the patriarchal traditions were demonstrated to have had early roots. Monotheism was related to trends in the late Bronze Age Near East, and so on. A similar attempt at demonstrating essential continuity was made by the Israeli scholar Yehezkel Kaufmann, who attacked Wellhausen’s synthesis and tried to show that Israel’s religion reflected the same basic ideas from beginning to end. By the end of the 20th century a revisionist reaction against the claims of continuity set in, with claims of discontinuity much stronger than those made by Wellhausen. Some claimed that biblical religion was mainly a product of the Persian and even Hellenistic eras, and that the existence of Israelite-Judean religion, and even of “Israel” itself was chimerical. Some revisionist scholars were justly accused of having political goals.

Which approach is the most justified, on the basis of the biblical and extrabiblical evidence, including archeology? This is not a matter in which one can simply allow the “facts” to speak for themselves, because interpretation plays a key role at every stage of the discussion. But it is possible to list a few major differences between what scholarship generally considers to be typical of earlier vs. later religion:

1. Monotheism. Older, especially poetic, texts portray the deity as seated among the assembly of divine beings, who are sometimes, as noted above, called bene 'el(im), ("sons of gods"), kedoshim ("holy ones"), among other terms. Statements of divine incomparability echo those commonly found also in extra-biblical hymns; for example "Who is like you among the gods?" (Exod. 15.11). Now, monotheism is really a complex philosophical idea that is very hard to express in biblical language, but later texts, especially Deuteronomy, do seem to be struggling to make overt statements about God's oneness and uniqueness, most famously in Deut. 4.35: "It has been clearly demonstrated to you that the LORD alone is God; there is none beside Him." and (depending on one's interpretation) in the Shema: "Hear, Israel, the LORD, our God, the LORD is one" (Deut. 6.4). In the Bible, key ideas are generally expressed peripherally, especially by concrete, often ritual actions. A probable sign of real monotheism is the active polemic against idolatry one finds in Deuteronomic texts and in late prophets, like Jeremiah and, especially, Second Isaiah. It (mis)represents other ancient religions as mere fetishism, the foolish worship of images of "wood and stone."

2. Centralization of worship. A potent ritual expression of absolute monotheism is the attempt to reflect God's oneness by insisting on one legitimate shrine, the Jerusalem Temple. This is a cultic development of the Deuteronomic movement, perhaps first attempted by Hezekiah in the late 8th century (1 Kings ch 18), and later effected by Josiah in his famous "reform" in 621 BCE (2 Kings chs 22–23). Earlier religion tolerated a multiplicity of altars, a fact obscured by the Deuteronomic editing of most of the historical books. But actions speak louder than words. The fact that Josiah, the paragon of militant piety, did not kill the priests of the "high places" (except for Bethel, the main rival of Jerusalem), but rather allowed them to share the Priestly income of the Jerusalem shrine (2 Kings 23.9) is a tacit admission that local shrines had been considered quite legitimate before. In the context of ancient religion, centralization of worship, which is also reflected in the contemporary Priestly writings (despite some signs of earlier decentralization), was an extremely radical step that deserves to be viewed as revolutionary in the extreme.

3. Myth vs. history. It is often said that biblical religion broke with the kind of mythical thinking characteristic of the religions of the ancient Near East in favor of history. God was praised for His great acts of national redemption, such as the exodus from Egypt and the conquest of Canaan ("salvation history"). It is true that biblical religion has ousted most of the mythology of the ancient world, with the exception of a few stock themes, like creation, the garden of Eden and YHWH's cosmic battle in primeval times with the sea. Especially the sexual aspects of mythology, involved with the birth and procreation of the gods, have been eliminated (except for a few relics like Gen. 6.1–4). Indeed, it can fairly be stated that the processes of demythologization and desexualization of religion are related to each other and go hand-in-hand in biblical religion.

But it is less certain that biblical religion broke with the concept of myth itself. If one defines myth as narrative that expresses a culture's deepest attitudes and emotions about the origin and nature of the world in which it lives, it is correct to say that biblical religion created new but potent myths of its own. And it is certainly incorrect to hold that biblical religion is historical in any modern, scientific sense. Rather, the unique creation of biblical religion is a blend of history and myth that might best be termed typology, the cyclical recurrence of a few historical patterns, such as national apostasy and repentance, which serve as the basis of a vital historiography. Events are made to reflect, anticipate, and explain each other typologically. For example, the patriarchal narratives foreshadow later Israelite settlement in many ways (a fact the Rabbis recognized and expressed in the principle that "the deeds of the fathers prefigure what will occur to their descendants" (ma'ase 'avot siman levanim). Disparate events are united by extended and intertwining typologies of creation and redemption. So, the return from exile in Babylonia is viewed as a second exodus from Egypt; the exodus itself is described in such a way as to evoke creation typology, as is the Sinai theophany, and so on. History is valued not for the unique, but for the recurrence of these repeated patterns. It is in this sense that biblical religion may be termed a historical faith.

Was Israelite-Judean religion already historical in this sense? The answer depends on the dating of the texts. Numerous typical ancient Near Eastern mythological themes are, however, prevalent in creation accounts outside Gen. ch 1. Moreover, texts that reflect the royal theology of Judah, which are mostly very old, are also replete with language and themes drawn from ancient mythology. Indeed, that tradition does not even shrink from calling the king the "son of God" (albeit adoptive). Such facts lead one to suspect that the characteristic use of historically rooted typology is likely a feature of biblical, not earlier, religion.

4. Individualism. Older religion viewed the individual as a member of society: family, clan, tribe, and nation. Corporate, transgenerational responsibility for sin was the rule, as in the Decalogue ("punishing children for the crime of their fathers to the third, even the fourth generation" [Exod. 20.5]). This notion is often evident even in Deuteronomy, where the Hebrew text often refers to the plural rather than the singular Israelite, suggesting that he or she will be punished or rewarded with the larger group (see e.g., Deut. 11.13–21). Evidence of an overt challenge to this doctrine first appears in the prophets of the late 7th and 6th centuries BCE, Jeremiah and, especially, Ezekiel (Ezek. ch 18). In late texts individual responsibility for sin has become the standard doctrine, as in the book of Chronicles. The belief in individual responsibility for sin went along with an elevated position for women and a new formulation of the nation Israel as a community of committed believers ('edah, kahal).

The change was also reflected in new models of piety. Older psalms remain more or less on the level of similar compositions from the ancient Near East. But a new inwardness, focused on individual relationship to God, appears prominently in later psalms, like Pss. 139 and 119. A new concept of the religious individual, totally devoted to God, is especially a feature of developed Deuteronomistic religion, and is linked to the new emphasis on the oneness of God. It will be remembered that the Shema continues: "You shall love the LORD, your God, with all your heart, and all your life" (Deut. 6.5). Another sign of the new individualism is a much heightened concern with the problem of individual suffering and the concomitant theological issue of theodicy. It finds expression mainly in later texts such as the "confessions" of Jeremiah (e.g., Jer. 11.18–12.6) and, above all, the book of Job.

5. Text religion and canon. The older forms of Israelite religion probably were mainly oral, especially prophecy (at least before the 7th century). But Deuteronomistic religion introduced a new text-centeredness by insisting on the unchangeability of the written form of the torah ("instruction") given to Moses on Horeb (Sinai). More than any other Torah book, Deuteronomy emphasizes the sefer or written document. Nothing may be added or taken away (Deut. 4.2; 13.1). This is the beginning of the notion of immutable canon, an approach to sacred texts quite at variance with the liberal attitude toward textual transmission of most ancient cultures. Indeed, despite this injunction, even biblical traditions remained astonishingly fluid for several centuries after Deuteronomy. But eventually the process of codification, standardization, and canonization set in, beginning with the Torah (probably in the 5th century) and extending gradually to the Prophets and the Writings, a development that was completed by the 1st century CE (or several centuries earlier, according to several scholars). Along with the increasing textualization and literariness of biblical religion went an intertextual aspect of internal commentary and inner-biblical interpretation.

6. Forms of piety. A new kind of piety also arose, fostered especially by Deuteronomy, focused on prayer and study. Ritual was not ignored, but it became secondary to teaching and meditation. Attitudes and themes native to the older wisdom tradition were adapted to this new piety, which emphasized study of the written record of divine revelation. It should be noted that biblical religion makes no claim for Mosaic authorship of the Torah as a whole, but only of Deuteronomy (Deut. 31.9). In addition, the older liturgical tradition was revised to make it compatible with strict monotheism, resulting in the type of prayer found in most of the book of Psalms (see discussion below).

These developments fit the general historical and cultural context of the centuries between about 800 and 400 BCE. It was a time of extreme change and uncertainty in the Near East, marked by the rise of a radically new form of political organization, the empire, first of the Assyrians, later of the Neo-Babylonians and the Persians. These world empires made imperial religious as well as political claims, and the policies of mixing of populations through exile and resettlement weakened the old polities of the region. The chief gods of the imperial states were raised to supremacy over other deities. Henotheism, if not true monotheism, and syncretism were tendencies of the age. But uncertainty led to its opposite: cultural, including religious, conservatism, a focus on ancient traditions, and an attempt to present the new as authentically old. The typical literary production of the time is the pseudonymous fraus pia, a document that claims to have been written by a sage in hoary antiquity, but which actually fulfills some current need. The "finding" of the book of Deuteronomy in the Temple in 621 BCE, corresponds nicely to this contemporary model. In sum, biblical religion fits the period in question in a general way, and sometimes very specifically.

To return to the original question: Do all of these new developments of the 7th to 5th centuries BCE mark a radically new departure, or only a later stage in the development of Israelite religion? The explosion of new features in the period in question is undeniable, from the scholarly point of view. But at what point does a difference in degree become a difference in kind? At what point is one justified of speaking of something as revolutionary, as radically new, especially if the tradition in question keeps insisting it is really very old, and merely being stripped of later accretions, "reformed"? Probably the claims of continuity vs. discontinuity cannot be judged only on the basis of logic. Rather, one must choose the answer one judges to be best supported by the evidence one accepts, and, it must be admitted, one's private religious convictions. To me, it seems clear that biblical religion possesses such a cohesiveness, even in its disparity of traditions; so clearly reflects the needs of its times; and, above all, so evidently represents a heightening and sharpening of traditional ideas, that it deserves to be viewed as revolutionary. The following discussion reflects this judgment.

The Development of Biblical Religion: From Prophecy to Text

Whether biblical religion marks a radical break with older Israelite-Judean religion, or only a new, heightened phase, its formative stimulus seems to have been in the Northern Kingdom of Israel in the 9th century BCE. The attempt of Jezebel to import the worship of Tyrian Baal, along with its rites and coterie of prophets, into Israel stirred the violent opposition of the prophets of the native deity YHVH. The leaders of the "YHVH-only" party, as Morton Smith called it, Elijah and his disciple Elisha, inspired a military coup against the northern monarchs, the Omrides. Elijah was filled with exclusive "zeal" (kin'ah) for God, an intolerance of other deities, that remained one of the hallmarks of biblical religion. The struggle with Baalism in the North continued into the 8th century, as evidenced by the activity of Hosea, who seems to have introduced a number of other key ideas, such as the use of pungent sexual terminology to describe apostasy ("whoring after foreign gods"). Biblical religion was thus Northern in origin, which explains why, as a religious reference (as opposed to political and cultural), the name of the community that accepted biblical religion was to remain "Israel" long after the late 8th-century demise of the historical kingdom of Israel.

After the fall of the Northern Kingdom in the 8th century, this prophetically rooted, exclusive faith migrated south to Judah, perhaps already at the end of the 8th century, when it may have inspired the reforming efforts of King Hezekiah. By the late 7th century biblical religion had become consolidated into the Deuteronomic "movement," probably a loose confederation of priests, prophets and their disciples, and royal officials. King Josiah was induced, by the "finding" of a "Book of the Instruction" (sefer hatorah—probably a form of Deuteronomy) in the Temple, and by political motives (the weakening of Assyria) to undertake the great revolutionary "reform" of 621 BCE. The traditional high places were proscribed, worship was centralized in Jerusalem; images, stelae (matzevot), wooden poles (asherim), and the other paraphernalia of "idolatry" were destroyed (2 Kings chs 22–23); and the worship of the "Queen of Heaven" (Astarte) was forbidden (Jer. 44.18).

The reform, or revolution, lapsed after Josiah's ignominious death in battle, which could hardly have been interpreted by most contemporaries other than as divine judgment on his impiety in uprooting so many traditional forms of worship (see Jer. 44.15–19). But the ruling classes of Judah were soon exiled to Babylonia. The exile community of the 6th century BCE, centered near Nippur in southern Babylonia, was a crucible of religious activity: prophetic (Ezekiel, Second Isaiah) and historical (the work of the Deuteronomistic Historian, editor of the first edition of the Former Prophets, the historical books from Joshua to Kings). The basic theological ideas of the Deuteronomic and Priestly tradition began to take their classic written forms, as did the first editions of some of the prophetic writings.

The most active period in the establishment of biblical religion thus took place in the exile, and it was this religion that was transplanted back into the tiny Judean community of returned exiles in the late 6th and mid-5th centuries BCE. The first attempts at return were feeble and indecisive. The final reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah (after 450 BCE) imposed the standards of developed biblical religion on the community, with the Torah, probably in more or less its present form, as the constitution. The development of biblical religion was therefore gradual, stretching from at least the late 9th or 8th to the 5th centuries. In its final form it marks an attempt to restore pre-exilic Judah, reinterpreted as a religious community of Israel, by restructuring old institutions and formulating new theological ideas projected back into a Mosaic age that was now viewed as uniquely authoritative. Contemporary prophecy was demoted and all but abolished in favor of the written documents that contained past revelation, so that biblical religion became a completely textual religion, requiring a body of approved interpreters, the scribes. Interpretation of the old revelation displaced the new revelations of contemporary prophets. The final form of biblical religion was supported by the Persian state, which may have stimulated the formation of the Torah, a compromise document of the two major ongoing traditions of biblical religion, the Deuteronomic-covenantal and the Priestly-cultic, both of which will now be briefly described.

Deuteronomic-covenantal Religion

The dominant stream of biblical religion is the Deuteronomic, or covenantal tradition. It conceives of the relationship between God and Israel as a legal form, a berit or 'edut, a covenant, i.e., a contract, or treaty, made between God and the escapees from Egypt at Horeb (in other traditions, Sinai) with the mediation of the prophet Moses. The people had a direct mass revelation of the divine Presence for the announcement of the Decalogue; the rest of the laws, the terms of the covenant, were transmitted privately to Moses on the mountain and read to the people later. The people agreed to the treaty freely, binding themselves and their descendants by an oath and covenant ceremony. By this treaty YHWH became Israel's God, with an obligation to give them the land of Canaan and otherwise protect them and provide for their needs; and Israel became God's people, with a permanent obligation to fulfill the divine commandments, the laws of the covenant. Horrendous curses are threatened for Israel's breach of the contract (see esp. Deut. 28.15–68). The Horeb/Sinai covenant is therefore conditional, unlike the covenant with David, which is strictly promissory. The most explicit and complete form of the covenant is in the book of Deuteronomy, whose core is a work of the 7th century BCE. Fragmentary and perhaps older covenantal traditions are found in Exod. chs 19–24 and 32–34.

It is now known that the conditional covenant between God and Israel generally follows the form of the treaty between a suzerain and his vassals, attested from the second millennium on. The covenant patterns of Deuteronomy have been shown to follow most closely later, Assyrian, treaty forms of the first millennium. Whether other covenant traditions can be shown to go back to earlier forms, attested among the Hittites of the late Bronze Age, is a matter of scholarly dispute. It is possible that covenant (berit) was first applied in the Judean royal tradition to the divine promise of protection to the House of David, as the unconditional, promissory type of covenant (itself based on ancient royal grants by kings to favored vassals). It was later said to have been prefigured by a similar "covenant," a promise to the national patriarch Abraham (Gen. chs 15, 17). Finally, the covenant idea, in its conditional form, was extended to the whole nation as a unique mass divine revelation. It is also possible that some traditions of the conditional type of national covenant precede the monarchy, and that the two types of covenant, conditional and unconditional, competed with each other already in Israelite-Judean religion. But the virtual absence of references to the Horeb/Sinai event in definitely old, especially poetic, texts, suggests the greater likelihood of the sequence described above.

Whatever its age and provenance, the covenant idea, as expressed in the Deuteronomistic tradition, now dominates the Bible, not only the Torah, but also the work of the historical books, which have undergone a Deuteronomistic edition, and some of the prophets, especially Hosea and, above all, Jeremiah (though, curiously, the covenant with Israel is hardly mentioned at all outside the Torah). The leading religious ideas of this tradition, in their classic Deuteronomistic form, may be summarized as follows:

Deuteronomistic religion is strictly monolatrous and probably monotheistic; i.e., not only insisting on the worship of one God, but positing the effective existence only of this deity. Other gods are mere breaths, nothings (hevel); all idols are but material objects. Monotheism was an abstract idea difficult to express in ancient language, but it is palpable in Deuteronomistic theology, if only by inference. As noted above, the abstract notion of monotheism is manifested in the strong Deuteronomistic insistence that God be worshipped at only one shrine.

Deuteronomistic religion places central stress on the name of God, and for this reason has been called by scholars a "name theology." The name (rather than the deity!) is said to "rest" (shakan) on the place God has chosen, i.e., the sole legitimate shrine (Jerusalem). It is a religion that implies divine transcendence. Direct divine contact with the world is strongly denied, except for the Horeb/Sinai revelation (and Deut. ch 4 seems to deny that God appeared on earth even then). Rather, God remains in heaven, from which He hears human prayer (1 Kings 8.30–49). This type of religion placed great stress on the word, both as name and prayer; and concomitantly on the sense of hearing, as manifested not only in God's hearing of prayer, but also in human hearing of the words of the covenant and transmitting them to the young through teaching. The divine instruction (torah) must be the sole topic of human religious thought and meditation; it is Israel's true "wisdom" (Deut. 4.6). Deuteronomy places great emphasis on mind and inner thought. It contains a certain rationalizing, even rationalistic tendency, often offering reasons and explanations for the commandments of the covenant (Deut. 5.15; 15.18; etc.).

The focus on the oneness of God, shrine, and thought, extends also to emotion. Israel is enjoined not only to fear and obey, but also to love God, with total, singular inner devotion. The commandment to love, a seeming paradox, has its roots in the legal language of the ancient Near East, as an expression of volition, insuring that the terms of an agreement are entered into freely; for example, a vassal king may be commanded to "love" his overlord. But in Deuteronomy, loving God has become more than a legal metaphor. It is a total commitment, expressive of the emotion of kin'ah, which not only means "zeal," but also "jealousy." Stemming from this deep emotional bond between deity and individual (for Deuteronomic religion has a pronounced focus on the individual in the group) is a certain tendency toward intolerance and even totalitarianism, which has manifested itself often in later, biblically-based religions. But it is also true that covenant religion is the locus of an implicit doctrine of free will, because Israel is always confronted with the choice to obey or not obey, even if the promised reward for the former is life and the threatened punishment for the latter is death (see esp. Deut. 30.15-20).

Covenant faith is also a militant religion. It draws upon and reinterprets the holy war traditions of the ancient Near East and of Israelite-Judean religion, but focuses them not on any actual national foe but on what must be regarded, in Deuteronomy's day, as a quite fictitious enemy, the Canaanites, demanding their complete destruction (see esp. Deut. 20.16-18). Since the latter no longer existed as a group in the period in question, it is difficult to escape the impression that by "Canaanites" is meant an inner foe, Canaanizers, as it were, most likely adherents of older Israelite-Judean religion.

Covenant religion is a text religion, limiting itself to the written record of the contract between God and Israel. Creation themes are practically absent; reference to nature as "heaven and earth" is limited to invoking them as witnesses to the covenant, a literary survival of the list of gods in ancient treaties. Although it has prophetic roots, and reveres Moses as a unique super-prophet, Deuteronomic religion all but abolishes future prophetic revelation, lest new divine communications compete with the single authoritative written revelation at Horeb/Sinai (see below).

Deuteronomic religion has little interest in the cult, apart from insisting that it be limited to one spot. Otherwise, its major interest in ritual is in linking observance with the exodus, as it does with the Sabbath (Deut. 5.15), or in highlighting the Passover, by its nature already linked with the exodus. Passover seems to have played a key role in Deuteronomic-covenantal religion, since the "reforms" of Hezekiah and Josiah are described as being accompanied by special Passover ceremonies.

Priestly-cultic Religion

The Priestly tradition, the core of which is the mass of cultic legislation including the end of Exodus, all of Leviticus, and parts of Numbers, represents a type of religion that, like Deuteronomic faith, is also monotheistic and centered on one place of worship. It, too, presents itself as the result of revelation in a covenant, which it also terms berit, although, unlike Deuteronomic texts, it does not avoid adding the word "eternal" (berit 'olam). It views the sacrificial cult as an unconditional and permanent establishment, like the Davidic covenant, and unlike the Sinai/Horeb covenant, which was dependent on Israel's obedience and was therefore conditional. Like the Deuteronomic tradition, the Priestly tradition uses the term "rest" (shakan) to describe God's link to the shrine (mishkan), but what "rests" on it is not the divine name, but the "glory" (kavod). For this reason it is often said that the Priestly texts reflect a "glory" theology, in opposition to Deuteronomic "name" theology, expressive of an implied idea of divine immanence rather than transcendence. Kavod is the term already used in Israelite-Judean religion to describe the manifestation in theophany of the divine presence as storm cloud, lightning, earthquake, and, above all, as refulgent radiance. These ideas are rooted in the ancient Near East; a similar light surrounded the gods (a late relic of this belief is the halo around saints' heads in Christian art, prefigured by the light that streamed from Moses' face [Exod. 34.30]). But in Priestly thinking the ancient concepts and images have become more systematic. The divine glory, which was the main manifestation of the Sinai experience (Exod. 24.16–18) in the Priestly worldview, is said to have entered the completed Mosaic Tabernacle, model of future shrines, at its dedication (Exod. 40.34–35) and to return each year on the Day of Atonement to the Holy of Holies in the Temple, where it appeared over the cherub lid of the Ark (Lev. 16.2) (an alternative interpretation is that it was always immanent in the shrine but became visible only on that day). To be sure, it was seen only by the high priest on that day, but Priestly religion is nevertheless in general a religion of seeing, not hearing, like Deuteronomic religion. It is also a religion of touching, and smelling of the propitiating odor (reah; nihoah) of sacrifice and of the sweet savour of incense and spices. In other words, it is a religion of the physical, in which language, even prayer, plays little role, being quite absent from Torah texts reflecting this tradition. The contrast with Deuteronomic religion on this point could not be greater.

The Priestly tradition includes not only cul-tic texts dealing with sacrifice and ritual, but also the Priestly narrative source, responsible for the creation account of Gen. 1.1–2.4 and other key stories in Genesis and later in the Torah. If the narrative materials are viewed in conjunction with the cultic ones, it is possible to extrapolate an implicit Priestly theology that blends ritual and theology. The central ritual substance is the blood of sacrifice, and the central religious idea is atonement. The only explicit statement of the connection between the two is Lev. 17.11, where it is said that the blood of sacrifice effects atonement for the lives of Israelites. The underlying theology is not explained, since, unlike Deuteronomy, the Priestly authors eschew explanation and rationalization; but in the preceding chapter, Lev. ch 16, it is said that the high priest is to attain atonement for Israel by entering the Holy of Holies and sprinkling sacrificial blood before the divine presence. The link between atonement and blood is therefore quite firm. According to another Priestly text, Gen. ch 9, avoiding consumption of blood is part of a complex of themes, in which the eating of the meat of animals is presented in the context of a divine concession to inherent human sinfulness. But the preceding chapter (Gen. ch 8) contains an eternal divine promise never to allow human sin to lead to another catastrophic flood. It may perhaps be extrapolated that blood is a reminder to God both of human sin and of His promise to forgive. Perhaps it is safer to say that the link between sacrificial blood and forgiveness for sins is a mystery, because the Priestly tradition cultivates mystery and a sense of the immanently numinous. The Priestly complex of blood and atonement was to have a great effect on Christian theology. After the destruction of the Temple, the Rabbis stated that prayer, rather than blood, attains forgiveness for Israel; this reflects a melding of Deuteronomic and Priestly worldviews.

Priestly religion has reinterpreted the old cult of Israelite-Judean religion to focus less on the ancient whole, communal, and thank offerings ('olah, shelem, todah), than on the expiatory sacrifices, the "sin offering" (ḥata't) (better translated "purification offering") and "trespass offering" ("guilt offering") ('asham). Old festivals were reinterpreted, the ancient probable New Year, as noted above, all but disappearing in the process.

The Priestly tradition also continues the ancient insistence that worshippers be morally as well as ritually pure. It has been suggested that some psalms, especially Pss. 15 and 24, reflect ancient "entrance liturgies," declarations of moral purity pilgrims were obliged to make before they could enter the sacred precincts of the shrine. The moral aspect finds expression in the Priestly tradition of later biblical religion primarily in the "Holiness Collection" (Lev. chs 17–26), especially in Lev ch 19 (the command to "love thy neighbor as thyself" comes from Lev. 19.18). In these chapters, worshippers are enjoined to be "holy as the LORD, your God is holy." To the developed Priestly tradition holiness means not just the numinous "other," or moral perfection, but physical and spiritual separation from the impure: clean from unclean, sinner from wicked, Israel from the nations. Gen. ch 1 represents creation itself as a series of separations and distinctions by means of which primeval chaos became ordered. Similarly, the Temple consists of a complex of precincts of increasing holiness. This reclusive, segregating notion of the holy is derived from ancient Near Eastern, ultimately mythically rooted models, like much of Priestly thinking. But in its final form this definition of holiness as separation and exclusion fits especially well with the milieu of postexilic Judah in the 5th century BCE, in which, as the books of Ezra and Nehemiah show, separation from other groups was the key issue. Gone is the broad view of holiness as the divine presence that fills the whole earth (Isa. 6.3). Also reflecting postexilic circumstances is the ritual prominence in the Priestly codes of the Sabbath as a weekly day of rest memorializing creation, and the rite of circumcision as a sign of the Abrahamic covenant, distinguishing Jews from their neighbors.

Other Traditions of Biblical Religion

The Liturgical Tradition

As noted above, the Deuteronomistic tradition exalts prayer (though mainly in the deuteronomistic historical books of Former Prophets), while the Priestly tradition seems to all but ignore it (the high priest's confession on the Day of Atonement is a notable exception). Prose prayer plays a prominent role in the historical works edited by the Deuteronomistic school, as well as in the later book of Chronicles. Poetic prayer is mainly found in the book of Psalms, the history and development of which is very complex and poorly understood. Chronicles states that liturgical pieces, such as hymns and petitions, were composed by Levitical guilds in Second Temple times (1 Chron. chs 15–16). This may also have been true in earlier periods as well, but the only liturgical situation that can definitely be reconstructed for Israelite-Judean religion is the one associated with the large genre of the "petitions of the individual." A worshipper in distress vowed to make a sacrifice of thanksgiving (todah) if rescued by God, and to declare God's praise to those assembled for the communal sacrificial meal. There is evidence that in some cases the prayer and praise would be written down, sometimes on a stele. This form of prayer is also attested elsewhere in the ancient Near East, but is most highly developed in the book of Psalms. Doubtless the cult of Israelite-Judean religion included hymns to the deity, of which old psalms like Pss. 29 and 68 may be examples. Prayers were also offered at the Jerusalem Temple on behalf of the king, of which the small number of "royal psalms" are probable survivors (Pss. 20, 21, 45, 72, 89).

The canonical book of Psalms reflects biblical religion and was collected in the postexilic period of the 5th and 4th centuries. Many psalms are assigned pseudepigraphically to David, others to Levitical figures such as Asaph, Ethan, and Korah. Many are unascribed. The work is divided into five "books," likely on the model of the Torah. The old traditions of Israelite-Judean prayer have been reinterpreted and reworked to supply models of approved monotheistic piety. Prayers are addressed only to YHWH; there is no mention of the mediating angelic figures that seem to have played a role in "popular" religion (Job 33.23; Ps. 91.11). Numerous genres are represented: petitions of the individual (the largest group), communal petitions and complaints, historical hymns, nature hymns, "enthronement psalms" (describing God as king), "royal psalms" (praise and petition for the Davidic king), "Zion psalms" (hymns about Jerusalem and the Temple mountain), "songs of ascent" (for pilgrimages), wisdom and Torah psalms. There is a scholarly debate about the extent to which the canonical psalms represent actual liturgical pieces written for and used in the cult. Opinions range from the view that practically all of the psalms, except for wisdom and Torah, were used in the cult, to the view that almost all psalms have been freed from their cultic roots and have become "spiritualized" literary expressions of a dominantly individual, Temple-focused piety. There is little doubt the "royal psalms" are intended by the editors to be taken eschatologically, as referring to the future messianic (not, as they originally did, the current Davidic) king. It is likely that the other genres had many functions; as is often the case with liturgical texts, actual usage and inner meaning are not always apparent from the bare text, because the same words can be applied to many, and ever-changing, circumstances. This fact, though inconvenient for scholarship, no doubt partially accounts for the great popularity of the book of Psalms to this day.

Prophetic Tradition in Biblical Religion

The role of prophets in Israelite-Judean religion was sketched above, as well as the prophetic background to the development of biblical religion, specifically, the Deuteronomic-covenantal tradition. Strangely enough, however, biblical religion has a divided attitude toward the phenomenon of prophecy. On the one hand, prophecy was exalted in the figure of Moses, and revelation, by origin a purely prophetic phenomenon and limited to individuals, was made a constitutive national experience at Horeb/Sinai, albeit limited to that one occurrence. On the other hand, prophecy as a living phenomenon was discouraged. Future prophets had to prove they were "true" and not "false" by producing prophecies that came true before their messages would be heeded (Deut. 18.21), a tautologous condition that effectively abolished prophecy as a living institution after the 5th century BCE, at least in "official" religion. No future revelation could compete with Moses or amend what he had said.

The books of the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, the Twelve), which purport to be a record of the great literary prophets of the past, were composed and edited in such a way that the viewpoint of developed biblical religion was dominant. The ecstatic aspect of the prophetic experience was downplayed, and visions were usually reported in some detail only for the inaugural of the prophet. Otherwise, the visual aspect, while definitely present, is secondary to the auditory. This produces the impression that the prophets were motivated by some vague kind of "inspiration" akin to that experienced by artists or writers, and that they were mainly preachers of morality, rather than the strange, antisocial, conflicted, and—if we can judge from the "Confessions" of Jeremiah—doubt-tortured individuals they often were. Jeremiah rails against his prophetic mission, but feels an irresistible inner compulsion ("a burning fire imprisoned within my bones, which I struggle to contain but cannot") to deliver God's words (Jer. 20.9). Biblical religion has flattened the prophets (a process continued by later tradition) but could not obliterate all evidence of their powerful personalities.

The Latter Prophets were also edited with much interpolation of later tradition, so that it is often difficult to tell in a book like Isaiah which speeches go back to the prophet himself (chs 24–27, 40–66 are definitely non-Isaianic). Many of the later additions are eschatological and messianic. Eschatology, "the doctrine of the end," is the prophetic tradition that expresses hopes for the coming of an era of perfect peace, often brought about by a messianic ruler. The ancient Near Eastern background seems to have been in a type of oracle that predicted the coming of such a ruler after a time of troubles and disorder. The royal tradition of Judah (and perhaps even of Northern Israel) may already have contained such visions of a future king, but the attestations of messianism are in the literary prophets, especially Isaiah of Jerusalem, who seems to have been the first to introduce eschatology in a major way. The oracles in Isaiah from chs 7–11 predict the birth of several royal or royal-like children. The paradigmatic oracle is Isa. ch 11, which describes the reign of the future king in terms of a return to paradise. Peace will reign over the whole earth; even predatory animals will lose their urge to harm. Edenic themes dominate the developing messianic tradition in the later prophets, so that messianic oracles have been said to express an underlying belief in the cyclical, or at least circular nature of history, reflected in the dictum that "the end of time will be like the beginning of time" (Hermann Gunkel, the great German biblical scholar active in the late 19th and early 20th centuries). The messianic age will witness the submission of the nations to Israel, its king and its God, the cessation of war, the exaltation of the Temple on Mount Zion, and so on. The eschatological tradition became the focus of the hopes of an exiled and subjected people. This accounts for its popularity after the exile, and the fact that the prophetic books were edited with many eschatological additions. Contemporary prophecy after the 5th century may have been viewed as dangerous, but the prophets of the past, now made into canonical texts, could be studied for their glowing predictions, actual or interpolated, of the reversal of Israel's lowly state among the nations. Some scholars have tried to find a social milieu for the development of messianism, and posited an opposition in the postexilic period between conservative and privileged Priestly circles, who eschewed messianic enthusiasm, and oppressed circles of "visionaries," who cultivated it as a form of protest. In fact, messianism is entirely absent from the Torah, the central document of postexilic official religion; but it is uncertain that one is justified in positing a societal opposition of the type just described to explain the cultivation of messianic themes. Even the rich can long for the coming of the messiah.

By the 3rd to 2nd centuries BCE eschatology had developed into apocalyptic (a Greek term meaning "to uncover"), a form of literature combining many strands of tradition. The only representative of apocalyptic in the Bible is Dan. chs 7–12, but it was the subject of a vast literature from the 3rd century BCE to the 3rd century CE, eventually becoming a Christian genre. The Dead Sea community is held by most scholars to have been the Essenes, an apocalyptic sect; and Christianity grew from apocalyptic roots as well. Apocalyptic differs from earlier prophetic eschatology in being deterministic, hermetic, and systematic; it typically also uses an intermediary angelic figure as a conduit for its revelations. The pattern of history was fixed by God at creation; free will is therefore an illusion. A great crisis, in the form of the persecution of the righteous, viewed as a small group of the faithful who are "in the know" and who can interpret the meaning of the strange and wild imagery that fills apocalyptic texts, will trigger divine intervention and the final cosmic battle between good and evil, waged on an earthly and angelic plane. The holy war traditions of the ancient world find their apotheosis in Armageddon. Apocalyptic literature has a definite concept of an afterlife, linked to reward and punishment, unlike biblical religion: The dead will be resurrected on the Day of Judgment, some for eternal punishment, others for eternal bliss in paradise. The apocalyptic concept of resurrection and judgment was accepted by the Rabbis and by Christians as a dogma.

The Wisdom Tradition

The wisdom tradition is found in many places in the Bible, but it especially dominates the Writings, not only "proper" wisdom books like Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes, but also some psalms (1, 19, 37, 119, etc.) and other texts. Wisdom (hokhmah) is the term used to describe the intellectual and educational tradition of the ancient Near East, the province of scribal schools, teachers and students, but also elders, wise fathers and mothers. Wisdom was a determinedly international and humanistic tradition. The wise of all nations communicated with each other; genres, themes, and even language crossed boundaries freely. Parts of the book of Proverbs are virtually translations of an Egyptian work of wisdom; and biblical wisdom texts are replete with themes and language drawn from foreign wise men. The themes of traditional wisdom were the training of the young, expressed in maxims for correct living that would produce prosperity and esteem, so called "practical wisdom." But there also was so-called "speculative wisdom," which dealt with philosophical and religious issues, above all the problem of suffering and theodicy, the justifying of the ways of God: Why do the righteous often suffer and the wicked prosper? There are Babylonian and Egyptian "Jobs" as well as the biblical figure; and even the latter, in consonance with the international focus of wisdom, is portrayed not as an Israelite but as an Aramean from Uz. Wisdom was also a tradition interested in creation, in the workings of nature. Natural imagery abounds in wisdom texts, like proverbs and fables; and Solomon is said to have delivered parables about plants, animals, fish, and trees (1 Kings 5.13).

Many scholars hold that there was a kind of incipient natural philosophy in the ancient world shared also by Israel. The world was created by wisdom, and reflects an underlying unity of natural and moral orders, called ma'at, "truth," in Egypt, mesharum, "right," in Mesopotamia, and by various terms in Israel, among them 'emet, "stability, truth," and tzedek, "righteousness, order." In Israel, it was believed that the world was created by God with the help of wisdom (Job ch 28, Prov. ch 8), so that His plan is manifested in the order of the cosmos.

Up to the 7th century the wisdom tradition seems to have shown little interest in the particular religious traditions of Israel-Judah (though the prophets make increasing use of wisdom themes, especially Jeremiah, Second Isaiah, and Ezekiel); this explains the absence of references to cultic worship and to covenant in wisdom books. The development of full biblical religion, in the form of the Deuteronomic-covenantal complex, created a crisis of the wise. Deuteronomy rejects wisdom that does not concern itself with revelation and covenantal law. In the exile and afterwards, some of the wise began to accommodate their views to biblical religion, in varying degrees. Some refused all but superficial adherence to the new order. Although it is a very late book, Ecclesiastes remains almost wholly on the level of traditional old wisdom, except for the last verses (probably added by an editor). The book shows no concern for covenant religion and in its gentle cynicism is close to the ancient Near Eastern wisdom tradition (especially in regard to its carpe diem philosophy) and also to contemporary Epicurean philosophy.

But much of wisdom compromised with biblical religion by combining themes of traditional wisdom with the new faith. A strange deterministic theology of retribution developed that dominates much of Proverbs, some Psalms (especially 37) and, most strikingly, the speeches of Job's "friends": The righteous are always rewarded, the wicked always punished. Combined with this belief in strict reward and punishment was a doctrine of absolute cause and effect, derived from the nature interest of old wisdom, but now distorted into this new deterministic theology. Since only the wicked suffer, Job's friends say, Job must have committed some crime since he is clearly suffering. This doctrine is really a hybrid wisdom-covenantal faith, though it avoids explicit mention of covenant and presents itself as a form of natural law.

The greatest rebel against this deterministic and pitiless pseudo-piety was the author of Job, who rejects the arguments of the friends. Job is a radical rebel, who refuses to admit he is being punished for sin. With astounding hubris he demands that God appear to justify His ways. Job forces the deity to intervene to save His reputation. In a set of great speeches (Job chs 38–41), some of the most magnificent poetry of the Bible, God challenges Job to explain the works of creation. The problem with the divine “answer” is that God does not seem to address Job’s challenge that He must explain why He is making Job suffer. Interpretations of the meaning of the book are numerous. Some maintain that God is simply overwhelming Job by confronting him with his human ignorance of the ways of God. Who are you to challenge the deity? A more modern reading holds that God is confirming the lack of congruence between natural and moral realms, a total rejection of traditional wisdom philosophy. A more positive interpretation is that God, even as He reminds Job of his human weakness, rouses him to awe and wonder at the greatness of nature, so that human suffering, even Job’s, sinks into relative insignificance, at least temporarily. Probably the meaning of the book, like the meaning of Hamlet or any great work of literature, will always remain a riddle. Eventually wisdom’s focus on nature gave way entirely to a focus on covenant, with results we see in the “Torah psalms,” of which Ps. 119 is the longest, if not the most stirring, example.

Conclusions and Synthesis

Can one summarize biblical religion in a way that will organize its disparate traditions? The Bible is the most unsystematic of sacred texts, representing 1,000 years of textual development from different areas and social and religious groups. The several traditions of biblical religion we have listed, and the added complication of their superimposition on an earlier, and in many ways quite different, stage and type of religion, are so complex and confusing that one despairs of finding meaning in the whole, rather than in the parts. The historical discipline of source criticism has isolated the traditions and strands, without explaining their presence combined in the same work, often next to each other, in a way that seems intended to bewilder the reader. The traditional Jewish strategy in dealing with the multifariousness of the Bible is midrash, with its joyously insouciant ability to connect both the similar and the contradictory with a leap of imagination. However, historical scholarship, more limited in its agility than midrash, seems to be faced with two stark choices: to renounce interpretation of the whole and consider only the parts; or, conversely, to overlook the diversity and deal only with the whole on the canonical level. Indeed, canonical criticism, which views the Bible in the light of the communities that regard it as their Scripture, is one of the most important hermeneutical developments of recent years.

Yet there is a middle way: to recognize in the multiplicity of viewpoints not the result of incompetent editing, but the intent to express new religious insights in a culture that had as yet developed no theological, philosophical language adequate to describe them—a culture that, in addition, was conscientious about preserving old texts and traditions. In place of a harmonized, systematized theology, the Bible presents conflicting traditions, often next to each other: two creation narratives in Gen. chs 1–3; two forms of covenant tradition in the Torah, Deuteronomic and Priestly; two forms of prophetic speech, excoriating riv and comforting eschatology, and so on. Since biblical religion is textual, the believer is also necessarily a reader and an interpreter. Therefore a literary approach, a reading of God, as it were, may be preferable to a systematic theological approach that seeks to reconcile contradictions. Sympathy, not sophistry or scholasticism is required. The Bible must be read with the same freedom one has in all literary, especially poetic, interpretation, with concern for language and nuance, with awareness of the device of the juxtaposition of opposites, with delight in the kind of ambiguities that give texts deeper meaning. The later Rabbis recognized this freedom in midrash, and even in matters of halakhic disagreement sometimes allowed that both opinions were the "words of the Living God," a God made living precisely by the play of debate.

Indeed, biblical religion seems to go out of its way to cultivate and display disunity, to express religious ideas in terms of paired themes in tension, even opposition. For example, it can speak of God in one verse in a way that emphasizes the austere transcendence of the Deity; in the next verse it can use the most earthy and explicit anthropomorphism. The Bible is the least ecclesiastical, scholastic, and dogmatic of texts. As a transitional form of religion, biblical traditions had the luxury not to systematize, which is precisely what made the Bible the fertile ground from which its daughter religions could grow.

Yet there is an underlying unity in the varying traditions: the development of the characteristically biblical notion of faith in God. Faith is a much more complex idea than it is commonly held to be, so accustomed are we to speaking of "simple" faith. In fact it is a very complicated concept, the result of a long process of development. Its roots are probably in the ancient institution of holy war. Warriors were commanded to have confidence in God's protection, not to fear or let their hearts become weak (Deut. 20.3). This idea of trust or confidence in God's protection in battle did not become the truly biblical concept of faith until it was taken over by prophecy, from which it passed into the Deuteronomico-covenantal tradition and from thence into the other major traditions of biblical religion. Diagnostic of the idea of faith in its biblical form is that it has not only a primary object, God, but also a secondary one, the prophet. Moreover, the trust it demands is total and unconditional. This is the sort of faith Isaiah demanded of King Ahaz (Isa. 7.9): "If you do not have faith you will not be established!" (The Hebrew is a play on words, and says literally, "If you do not display firmness you will not be made firm.") The faith demanded here is not only that God will rescue Judah in a time of grave peril, but that Ahaz must also believe Isaiah is a true, not a false prophet. The sign of Immanuel (Isa. 7.14-17) that Isaiah gives Ahaz is unique, a test rather than a confirmation of confidence. Biblical faith involves absolute trust in the prophet as well as in God. This was later transmuted into faith in the authenticity of the textual record of past revelation. This mediated type of faith is the essential uniting core of all forms and all major traditions of biblical religion, and the unique contribution of biblical religion to world religion.

Faith, in the sense just described, pervades the whole Bible. Genesis has been edited to represent a struggle for faith on the part of the patriarchs, especially Abraham, who proves his faith only with the binding of Isaac. The narratives of the rest of the Torah record the people's struggle to maintain absolute trust in God, a test they repeatedly fail, despite the prevalence of overwhelming miracles. The prophets wrestle with faith constantly, especially with faith in the fact that they themselves are true and not deluded false prophets. Job, whatever the exact meaning of the book, certainly implies faith in divine Providence, despite all evidence to the contrary. The Psalms, especially the petitions of the individual, represent the struggle for firm, if not unquestioning, conviction despite suffering, doubts, and inner weakness. This biblical faith has as its locus a new kind of religious individual, the believing self, united in its devotion to the Deity. The tension between the faith-filled self, its own doubts, and the new type of community of believers posited by biblical religion as the true "Israel," is what gives the Bible its paradoxical unity in disparity, and its great religious power.

[STEPHEN A. GELLER]

Concepts of Purity in the Bible

As in many religious traditions past and present, ancient Israelites categorized persons, places, and other things as “holy” (kodesh) or “common” (hol) and as “pure” (tahor) or “impure” (tame’) (Lev. 10.10). These sets of categories are not identical: What is pure is not necessarily holy, nor is the common necessarily impure. Moreover, ancient Israel had multiple conceptions of purity, each of which developed over time, possibly under the influence of distinct religious ideologies. One notion of impurity, moral impurity, concerned the dangers of defilement associated with grave sins such as idolatry, incest, and murder. Another notion of impurity, ritual impurity, concerned contact with various natural substances relating to birth, death, and genital discharges. Contact with ritual impurity had serious consequences in one’s religious life, rendering one temporarily unfit to encounter holy space and objects. To understand and appreciate these distinctions is a challenge for modern readers who are accustomed to looking down on hierarchy in general and to scoffing at seemingly irrational avoidances, especially when they pertain to death and sex.

In the early days of modern biblical scholarship, conceptions of defilement were treated with outright scorn. James Frazer (1854–1941) and William Robertson Smith (1846–1894), two founders of modern anthropology, could barely conceal their disgust for the avoidance behaviors of the Bible. Smith, Frazer, and others approached purity rules as if they were a random collection of primitive taboos. Their origin lay in savage fears of blood and demons; their preservation by Israel was simply a matter of perpetuating ancient custom. Making matters worse, Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) in Totem and Taboo famously compared religious avoidances with the obsessive behavior of psychotics. Whether they were seen as the products of primitive fears or primeval obsessions, ritualized avoidances were dismissed by many as irrational, pointless, and just plain foolish.

The situation changed dramatically only in the 1960s. Under the influence of structural anthropology in general and the works of Mary Douglas (b. 1921) in particular, biblical scholars began approaching purity rules in new ways. Scholars came to recognize that avoidance behaviors could no longer be dismissed as something inherently or distinctly primitive. Many societies draw boundaries around certain behaviors (especially when it comes to death and sex), and these boundaries are certainly not always rational. Second, scholars also began to recognize that the avoidances of any religious tradition or culture had to be treated systemically or structurally. While earlier scholars would collect and analyze taboos in an encyclopedic fashion—comparing, for instance, various cultures’ attitudes toward blood or hair—scholars would now focus on how the avoidance rules of any single culture work together to form a coherent conception of things permitted and prohibited, of things sacred and defiled.

A third important development was the willingness of scholars to recognize that a system of avoidance behaviors may be symbolic in nature. Where earlier scholars had assumed that the laws must be connected to primitive notions of health or hygiene, scholars now recognize that there might be more to these rules than a simple desire to avoid dirt or disease. In line with this perspective, scholars are increasingly translating the Hebrew terms tame’ and tahor as “impure” and “pure,” instead of as “unclean” and “clean.”

Yet some interpretive challenges remain. One error introduced under the influence of some anthropologists is the assumption that the ancient Israelite purity system was put in place in order for priests to subordinate Israelites and for Israelite men to subordinate their wives and daughters. Yet it is increasingly recognized that the ancient Israelite purity system affects men and women, priests and Israelites. While Israelite society was hierarchical and patriarchal, the ritual purity system did little to enforce these social demarcations; in any case, this certainly was not the system's primary purpose. Another common error is the identification of ritual impurity with sinfulness. The distinction between ritual and moral purity—also increasingly recognized by scholars—allows us to see better the complex relationship between impurity and sin.

Ritual Impurity

The bulk of the biblical purity laws concerns the situations and substances that render one ritually impure, and therefore temporarily unfit to encounter the sacred. Ritual impurity results from direct or indirect contact with any one of a number of natural sources or processes including childbirth (Lev. 12.1–8), certain skin diseases (13.1–46; 14.1–32), fungi in clothes (13.47–59) and houses (14.33–53), genital discharges (15.1–33), the carcasses of certain impure animals (11.1–47), and human corpses (Num. 19.1–22). Paradoxically, ritual impurity also comes about as a by-product of some sacrificial procedures (Lev. 16.28; Num. 19.7–8). The durations of these impurities differ, as do the requisite cleansing processes. In general, however, there are three distinct characteristics of ritual impurity: (1) The sources of ritual impurity are natural and more or less unavoidable. (2) It is not sinful to contract these impurities. (3) These impurities can convey an impermanent contagion to people (priests and Israelites) and to many items within close proximity.

That the sources of ritual impurity are natural is really quite clear. Birth, death, sex, disease, and discharge are part of life. Ritual impurity is also generally unavoidable. While certain defiling substances are relatively avoidable (e.g., touching carcasses), others are inescapable (discharge, disease, and death). Some ritual impurities are not just inevitable, but obligatory. All Israelites (priests included) are obligated to reproduce (Gen. 1.28; 9.7). All Israelites (except the high priest) are required to bury their deceased close relatives (Lev. 21.10–15; cf. 21.1–4). Priests are also obligated to perform cultic procedures that result in their defilement (Lev. 16.28; Num. 19.8).

It is not a sin to contract these ritual impurities. This idea proceeds logically from the observations drawn above. While priests must limit their contact with corpse impurity (Lev. 21.1–4), they are not prohibited from contracting other impurities (22.3–7). To be sure, priests and non-priests alike are sternly warned against eating sacred food or entering sacred precincts when in a state of ritual impurity (Lev. 7.19–21; 22.3–7), lest they defile holy food or space. Yet the primary concern incumbent upon the priests is not to avoid ritual impurity at all times, but to safeguard the separation between ritual impurity and purity (Lev. 10.10; cf. Ezek. 44.23). By extension, Israelites are obliged to remain aware of their ritual status, lest they accidentally come into contact with the sacred while in a state of ritual impurity (Lev. 15.31). Because ritual impurity is contagious, the danger here is that defilement if left unchecked will accumulate and defile the Tabernacle or Temple, rendering it impure and unfit for divine habitation. It is for this reason that the refusal to purify oneself would constitute a transgression (Num. 19.20). But this does not make being ritually impure sinful in and of itself. As long as Israelites remain aware of their status and avoid contact with the Temple and holy objects while impure—and do what is necessary to ameliorate the situation—there is little chance of danger or transgression.

A few biblical narratives nevertheless view at least one form of ritual defilement as a punishment for moral shortcomings. Miriam was afflicted with a “leprosy” or “scale” ailment when she spoke against Moses' Cushite wife (Num. 12.10); the Judean King Uzziah was similarly afflicted when he sinfully asserted priestly prerogatives (2 Chron. 26.16–21). But viewing one particular skin disease as a possible punishment for sin is not tantamount to viewing ritual impurity as sinful in and of itself. If it were, the sinner would be defiling even without the manifestation of a defiling affliction. Thus the following claim still stands: It is not sinful to be ritually impure, and ritual impurity does not result directly from sin.

The third characteristic of ritual impurity is that it conveys to persons (priests and Israelites, men and women) an impermanent contagion. This is obviously true of the ritual impurity that Israelites contract from direct or indirect contact with a ritually impure carcass or another ritually impure Israelite. In such a case, the period of defilement can be as brief as less than one day, until the setting of the sun (Lev. 11.24; 15.7; Num. 19.22). The same holds for persons who engage in permitted sexual relations (Lev. 15.16–18). A man who has sexual contact with a menstruant or a person who comes into contact with a corpse will be ritually impure for a week (Lev. 15.24; Num. 19.11). Other defiling conditions can result in even longer periods of defilement; for example, the ritual impurity following childbirth lasts, in its less severe form, either thirty-three or sixty-six days (Lev. 12.1–8). Finally, irregular genital flows (for both men and women), scale disease, and house funguses last an unspecified amount of time. But even these forms of impurity are conceived of as impermanent—that is why the biblical tradition records purificatory procedures for all of them. There is no form of ritual impurity that does not have purificatory procedures; they may include waiting until sundown, bathing, washing clothes, and performing sacrificial rites. Even when long-lasting, the status of ritual defilement is an impermanent one.

Clearly, ritual impurity cannot be understood simply as a concern with health or hygiene. There is no direct correspondence between what is unhealthy or unclean and what is impure. Some sources of impurity (such as a pig's carcass) may strike some as dirty in some way. But some things that even ancient Israelites considered to be dirty were not necessarily ritually defiling: Excrement, human and animal, is not impure according to the Priestly system described in the Torah, despite the fact that it was recognized to be dirty and contrary to holiness (Deut. 23.13–15; but cf. Ezek. 4.12–15).

The idea that ancient Israelites viewed what is unhealthy as impure finds only scant support in Lev. chs 13–14, which discuss the ritual impurity that results from various obscure skin diseases and other funguses. Other biblical texts suggest that ancient Israelites knew about all sorts of diseases. If the concern with purity were the concern with health, we would expect all known diseases to be defiling. Yet only one kind of illness is defiling, and it defiles even when it affects a house or clothing, without affecting people. The concern in Lev. chs 13–14 is not with the spreading of the disease so much as with the spreading of impurity. All who come into contact with what is deemed “leprous” are impure, and are so for a day, whether or not they show signs of the disease.

It is also commonly believed that the dietary prohibitions extend from rules concerning health. (This view can be traced back, in part, to the medieval Jewish philosopher and physician Moses Maimonides.) This is nowhere explicit in biblical texts. Furthermore, while this is arguably true of certain defiling foods (e.g., pork), there is no known health risk associated with the majority of defiling land animals and birds. On the other hand, there are many known health risks associated with the consumption of various plants, but not even poisonous plants are viewed as defiling. There is, in the end, no direct association between health and purity, or between disease and defilement.

It can also be clearly seen now that ritual impurity is not a system put into place in order for priests to subordinate Israelites or for men to subordinate women. The subordination of classes—where it exists—needs to be supported by permanent or at least long-lasting social stigmas that are selective in such a way as to support the intended social agenda. Ritual impurity, however, is impermanent and applies to all Israelites—men and women, priests and laypersons. The system is therefore not well suited to reinforce any specific social hierarchies.

Traditional Judaism—in both the medieval and modern periods—has been primarily interested in the ritual impurity associated with menstruation. For a variety of reasons, this remains the only aspect of the biblical ritual impurity system that was maintained for very long after the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE. But the Bible knows of no such selective focus. In Leviticus, genital flows from both men and women are sources of ritual defilement. “Leprous” impurities affect men and women equally, and the corpses of men and women equally constitute the most severe form of ritual defilement.

Even in the case of defilements pertaining to women, it is difficult to understand the rules as intending to subordinate them or exclude them. One must bear in mind that women would only experience menstrual impurity after puberty, before menopause, and when not pregnant or lactating. For most ancient Israelite women, periodic ritual defilement was probably not a monthly affair. Moreover, the procedures of ritual purification require women to come into the sanctuary and to actively participate in sacrificial procedures (Lev. 12.6–8). If the rules were meant to exclude women, one should wonder why rituals of purification serve to bring women into the sanctuary.

If ritual impurity is not directly related to sin, health, or hygiene, or the desire to subordinate laypersons or women, what then is its basis?

The common denominators of the varied sources of ritual defilement are death and sex. Concerns with death-avoidance explain the defilements associated with corpses, carcasses, and the loss of reproductive genital fluids. Death-avoidance can also explain the concern with the skin disease, which is explicitly described as decomposition of the flesh (Num. 12.12). Yet death-avoidance on its own does not explain why sex and birth defile. The only substances that flow from the body and defile are sexual/genital in nature. (Even blood flowing from the veins of a dying person is not ritually defiling.) The dual concerns with death and sex provide the basis for understanding all of the ritual purity rules.

The ritual purity system of ancient Israel serves to force a separation between the experience of encountering God’s sanctity and matters pertaining to death and sex. Because God is eternal, God does not die. Because God has no consort, God does not have sex. Therefore, by separating from sex and death—by following the ritual purity regulations—ancient Israelites separated themselves from what made them least God-like. Only a heightened God-like state—the state of ritual purity—made one temporarily eligible to approach the sanctuary, God’s holy residence among the Israelites (Exod. 24.8). Following the ritual purity laws is yet another way of behaving in accordance with the theological underpinning of the Holiness Collection: imitatio Dei (Lev. 11.44–45; 19.2; 20.7, 26).

Ritual impurity is for these reasons diametrically opposed to holiness. And as noted, ritual purity—the established absence of any ritual defilement—is the prerequisite for encountering God’s holy presence, as manifest in the tabernacle or the Temple. But this formula is not reversible: The lack of holiness does not necessarily constitute ritual impurity. There are in fact four possible states. At either end of the spectrum are the diametrically opposed statuses of ritual impurity and holiness. In between the extremes are two intermediary—and in many cases, overlapping—positions. Working in from one end, in the absence of impurity one can be considered to be pure (tahor). Working in from the other end, in the absence of holiness one can be considered to be “common” (hol) (Lev. 10.10). It has been emphasized that the prohibitions related to ritual impurity primarily involve the dangers associated with bringing what is impure into contact with what is holy. It remains permitted for pure and impure persons and things to commingle in non-holy, “common” space. For instance, when Israelites consumed food that was permitted but not sacrificial (and thus not holy), ritually pure and impure persons were permitted to consume such food together (Deut. 12.15).

It is difficult to know how widely these regulations were followed in ancient Israel. They are reflected in detail only in Priestly literature, and in related texts such as Ezekiel. Priestly material is particularly concerned with these issues, since priests were responsible for the ritual purity of the Temple. References to ritual impurity can nonetheless be identified in a variety of other texts (e.g., Deut. 23.11–12; 2 Sam. 11.4; Isa. 52.11). Ritual purity should not therefore be understood as an issue of concern only to priests.

Moral Impurity

As noted above, the Bible is concerned with another form of purity and impurity, often referred to as “moral.” (Some scholars draw this distinction in different terms, speaking of “permitted” [ritual] and “prohibited” [moral] impurities.) Moral impurity results from committing certain acts so heinous that they are considered defiling. Such behaviors include certain sexual sins (e.g., Lev. 18.24–30), idolatry (e.g., 19.31; 20.1–3), and bloodshed (e.g., Num. 35.33–34). These “abominations” bring about an impurity that morally—but not ritually—defiles the sinner (Lev. 18.24), the land of Israel (Lev. 18.25; Ezek. 36.17), and the sanctuary of God (Lev. 20.3; Ezek. 5.11). This defilement, in turn, leads to the expulsion of the people from the land of Israel (Lev. 18.28; Ezek. 36.19). The bulk of the references to these ideas can be found in Priestly traditions (especially the Holiness Collection) and in the most Priestly of prophetic books, Ezekiel. Additional articulations of the notion or echoes of it can be found in various strands of biblical tradition, including Gen. 34.5; Deut. 24.1–4; 1 Kings 14.24; Jer. 2.7, 23; 3.1; Hos. 5.6; 6.10; and Ps. 106.34–40.

There are seven important differences between moral and ritual impurity.

1. While ritual impurity is generally not sinful, moral impurity is a direct consequence of grave sin.

2. A characteristic feature of moral impurity is its deleterious effect on the land of Israel. Ritual impurity, in contrast, may threaten the sanctity of the Temple, but poses no threat to the land.

3. While ritual impurity often results in a contagious defilement, there is no personal contact-contagion associated with moral impurity. Moral impurity does defile the sinners themselves (Lev. 18.24; 19.31; cf. Gen. 34.5; Deut. 24.1–4). But one need not bathe subsequent to direct or indirect contact with an idolater, a murderer, or an individual who committed a sexual sin.

4. While ritual impurity results in an impermanent defilement, moral impurity leads to a long-lasting, if not permanent, degradation of the sinner and, eventually, of the land of Israel.

5. While ritual impurity can be ameliorated by rites of purification, that is not the case for moral impurity. Moral purity is achieved by punishment, atonement, or, best of all, by refraining from committing morally impure acts in the first place.

6. Since moral impurity does not produce ritual defilement, sinners—in contrast to those who are ritually impure—are not excluded from the sanctuary. In the case of the suspected adulteress (Num. 5.11–31), the woman is brought into the sanctuary itself in order to determine her moral status. It also appears that Israelite murderers sought sanctuary in the sanctuary (Exod. 21.14; cf. 1 Kings 1.50–53; 2.28–30). Moral impurity does indeed defile the sacred precincts (e.g., Lev. 20.3), but the effect of moral impurity does not penetrate the holy realm by the entrance of sinners into it. Moral impurity is a potent force unleashed by sinful behavior that affects the sanctuary even from afar, in its own way.

7. In addition to these phenomenological differences between ritual and moral defile-

BIBLICAL IMPURITIES

Type	Source	Effect	Resolution
Ritual	Bodily flows, corpses, etc.	Temporary, contagious defilement of persons and objects	Bathing, waiting
Moral	Sins: idolatry, sexual transgression, bloodshed	Long-lasting defilement of sinners, land, and sanctuary	Atonement or punishment, and ultimately, exile ments, there are also terminological distinctions drawn in the texts themselves. Although the term “impure” (tame’) is used in both contexts, the terms “abomination” (to’evah) and “pollute” (hianaf) are used with regard to the sources of moral impurity, but not with regard to the sources of ritual impurity. For all of these reasons, it is imperative to distinguish between moral and ritual impurity.

Ritual and Moral Impurities

For reasons that are not entirely clear, the passages that articulate the idea of moral impurity are often understood as metaphors. Metaphor is a complex phenomenon; even its definition is still debated by linguists and philosophers. According to some, metaphor is so pervasive that it could accurately be argued that all rituals involve metaphor on one level or another. But when scholars refer to moral impurity in particular as metaphorical, the implication is that the passage is not to be taken literally: The defilement in question is not real. There is, however, no reason why the defilement of the land by blood shed upon it (Num. 35.33-4) ought to be a metaphor, while the defilement of a person who merely enters a tent in which a corpse lies is real (Num. 19.14). Though the sources and modes of transfer of moral and ritual impurity differ, we are dealing, nonetheless, with two analogous perceptions of contagion, each of which brings about effects of religious, legal, and social consequence. There are indeed differences between ritual and moral defilements. But the difference between ritual and moral defilement is not accurately understood by describing one (ritual impurity) as literal and the other (moral impurity) as metaphorical.

The ritual impurity rules constitute a set of avoidances that symbolically express the notion of imitatio Dei. The moral impurity rules constitute a set of danger beliefs, and the symbolism involved here works differently. When ancient Israelites believed that the land and sanctuary were defiled by idolatry, sexual sin, and murder, they believed that God finds these behaviors so abhorrent that He would not and could not abide on a land that is saturated with residue left by their performance. It is precisely this ramification of moral defilement that is depicted quite dramatically in Ezek. chs 8-11. Upon Israel’s performance of grave sins, God’s “glory” departs from the sanctuary and Israel’s exile then ensues. The doctrine of moral defilement underscores the fact that grave sins affect not only their perpetrators and victims, but also Israelite society as a whole. If God cannot abide in His earthly sanctuary because it has been defiled, then all Israel will suffer exile together.

Purity Disputes in Ancient Judaism

Disputes among Jews with regard to the nature and force of the purity laws are in evidence throughout the Second Temple period. Purity debates among Pharisees and Sadducees are preserved in the Mishnah (m. Yad. 4:6-7), and heightened concerns with purity are also characteristic of the sectarian literature discovered at Qumran. In the Dead Sea Scrolls we find stricter rules concerning ritual impurity in the Temple Scroll, and stricter rules concerning moral impurity in, especially, the Community Rule. Early Christianity was characterized, among other things, by a heightened interest in certain aspects of moral purity over and against a reduced focus on ritual purity (e.g., Mark 7.1–23). The Rabbis, in contrast, exerted much more effort in discussing the rules of ritual purity (to which much of the Mishnah is devoted), while exhibiting relatively little interest in moral defilement (but see Sifra on Lev. 18.24–30).

One purity dispute in particular is already reflected in the early Second Temple period, and the documents pertaining to the dispute can be found within the Bible. During the Persian period, both Ezra and Nehemiah confronted situations in which a number of the Jews had married local non-Jewish women. Both Ezra and Nehemiah urged the dissolution of these marriages (Ezra 9.1–10.44; Neh. 13.23–31). It is rather clear that purity in some form was at issue. Terms of defilement are used with reference to the problem (Ezra 6.21; 9.1, 11–14), and the proposed solution—divorce—is referred to as a purification (Neh. 13.30). This has led many scholars to the view that these books considered the foreign wives to be ritually impure, presumably as the result of their status as Gentiles. The passages in question, however, echo not the Priestly traditions relating to ritual impurity, but the Holiness Collection traditions relating to moral impurity: What is being said here by Ezra, Nehemiah, and their supporters is that the foreign women are in an inherent state of moral defilement and that inevitably the defilement will be passed to their progeny as well.

The view of Ezra and Nehemiah met with considerable opposition. The book of Ruth, according to some interpretations, effectively counters the prejudiced perspective of Ezra-Nehemiah, as do various Second Temple prophetic passages (Isa. 56.3–8). When one looks back at the Priestly traditions on these matters, it also becomes clear that Ezra's position is by no means clearly articulated there. One can find in the Torah limited prohibitions of intermarriage (e.g., Deut. 7.1–5) and even passages ascribing moral impurity to foreigners (e.g., Lev. 18.24). Yet one cannot find a clear, Priestly prohibition of intermarriage, justified by appeal to the notion of moral defilement (cf. Ezra 9.11–12). This may reflect the fact that the prohibition only emerged in the Second Temple period. Alternatively, this may reflect the continuing influence of Ezra's Priestly opponents, who certainly had a more welcoming attitude toward foreigners. Looking back on the Torah from the vantage point of Ezra ch 9, one can imagine a group of priests maintaining strong systems of ritual and moral purity while at the same time establishing a society with relatively open social boundaries.

The biblical traditions, from Leviticus to Ezra, leave a legacy that is not only challenging to contemporary scholars, but was likely equally challenging to ancient Jews themselves—giving rise to the purity disputes of the Second Temple period. When evaluating purity disputes among various ancient Jewish groups (early Christians included), it is imperative to understand well the complex and symbolic character of the purity systems, and it is equally important to appreciate the distinct natures of the ritual and moral purity systems. The purity rules are often disparaged as blunt instruments of social control, put in place by the priestly few to enforce their hegemony over laypersons and women. Alternatively, some still see purity rules as vestiges from primitive times. The challenge is to recognize purity rules (of the ritual and moral sort) as meaningful and yet nuanced ways of highlighting issues of social and theological significance. [JONATHAN KLAWANS]

Historical and Geographical Background to the Bible

Some Methodological Considerations. It is not easy to reconstruct the history of ancient Israel. Although many of the texts in the Bible have been characterized as historical texts, they certainly are not historical in our sense. The biblical authors, unlike modern professional historians, made no attempt to be objective or complete in recording events from the past; instead, they constructed narratives of the past for religious and/or didactic purposes. Certainly, these narratives incorporated many facts, but it is often difficult to disentangle fact from fiction, truth from myth or legend. Unfortunately, relatively little writing outside the Bible has been preserved that might help us confirm what is historically accurate or fill in historical gaps. Though much archeological effort has gone into studying ancient Israel, the evidence is often ambiguous and open to different interpretations. In some cases, a careful combination of analysis of biblical texts, archeological finds, and records about ancient Israel from its neighbors may yield a detailed description of a period or an event. This, however, does not occur as often as we would like. For this reason, much of the history summarized below, though based on the best information currently available, should be considered tentative.

Beginnings

By the time Israel appeared on the stage of the ancient Near East, civilization and the patterns of empires and of the larger shared culture of the Levant were already well established. Before the end of the fourth millennium BCE, full urbanization had developed in the great river valleys of Egypt and Mesopotamia. The development of sophisticated technology to exploit the flooding of the Nile and to channel the waters of the Euphrates and Tigris enabled the production of regular food supplies and led to regional hegemonies. In Egypt, oriented about the south-to-north direction of the Nile's flow, this culminated in the unification of Upper (southern) and Lower (northern) Egypt, at the onset of the Early Dynastic Period toward the end of the fourth millennium. In southern Mesopotamia the kings of Sumer ruled that region (now southern Iraq) from a succession of dominant city-states beginning at about the same time.

The stages that had preceded urbanization are prehistoric in the sense that they antedate the development of writing. Archeologists have been able to trace the slow, and often independent, progress from hunter-gatherer economies throughout the Near East to stable cultures that relied on domesticated crops and animals for their sustenance. Dependable supplies of food led to increases of population, and ultimately competition for resources. These factors combined to necessitate specialization of tasks, centralized control, and record-keeping. For these purposes, writing was invented, again toward the end of the fourth millennium, and once introduced, was widely adopted in different systems in Egypt and Mesopotamia. By 3000 BCE, then, written history may be said to have begun.

As a result of nearly two centuries of discovery, excavation, and deciphering of ancient texts, a detailed chronology of the ancient Near East has been established. While there are occasional gaps in the sequence of rulers for Egypt and for the various Mesopotamian city-states, those sequences are relatively complete. For regions peripheral to the centers of power the historical record is more spotty, but still substantial. Allowing for minor scholarly disagreements, the chronology is secure and is the framework for the history of the entire ancient Near East, including Israel. Nor is the knowledge of the historical record restricted to kings and princes. Hundreds of thousands of non-elite texts have been found. These are not great myths and royal inscriptions, but mundane business and commercial records which shed valuable light on the lives of ordinary men and women and have begun to make possible a reconstruction of the social world of the ancient Near East.

Ancient cultures were as intrigued as we are by beginnings, and they constructed elaborate myths to explain their own prehistory. The establishment of the natural and social orders is typically presented in these myths as the work of a deity, usually the principal god or goddess of the political entity in which they were written. Both Egyptian and Mesopotamian literatures have a large number of such creation myths, many features of which have parallels in biblical traditions. It should not be surprising that Israel, a latecomer to the area, would be influenced so significantly by the older, more dominant cultures of its neighbors. Israel's accounts of its origins were ultimately collected and edited in the book of Genesis. The early chapters of Genesis deal with prehistory. In these Israelite expressions of the origins of the world, of society, and of civilization, the principal agent is the god of Israel. And, although intended as the prologue to a larger historical narrative, they are not historical in any modern sense, that is, they do not accurately represent what the archeological record shows to have taken place, whether in terms of chronology, or the origin of species, or a universal flood.

Egypt and Mesopotamia have their own complex histories during the third millennium, now relatively well known thanks to textual and archeological data. In the Levant this is the period known as the Early Bronze Age, when northern Syria was largely in the orbit of Mesopotamia, and Egypt exercised direct control over Canaan. For complex reasons not fully understood, toward the end of the third millennium Egypt experienced some internal disruption, reflected in the decline of city-states in Canaan but not farther to the north. By 2000 BCE, however, centralized control had been reestablished, and the textual and artifactual evidence is abundant. Trade flourished, as is indicated by both the archelogical record and commercial and diplomatic correspondence among larger urban centers, and between them and Mesopotamia and Egypt. The Levant was spanned by a cultural continuum, with Syria and northern Canaan being more closely linked with Mesopotamia, and southern Canaan with Egypt. Canaan itself had a relatively homogeneous culture, and its inhabitants, especially in rural and village settings, went about their lives with relatively few changes despite the struggles of the urban centers with each other. From as far back as the end of the fourth millennium, and into the first, there appears to have been continuity of population, whose patterns of material culture develop rather than being replaced by successive waves of invaders, as earlier historical reconstructions suggested.

It is in this larger context that Israel placed its own beginnings, centered on the lives of four generations of ancestors: the families of Abraham and Sarah, of Isaac and Rebekah, and of Jacob and Leah, Rachel, Bilhah, and Zilpah, and their offspring.

The Historicity of the Ancestral Narratives in Genesis

In the biblical account of the origins of Israel, narratives concerning Israel's ancestors in Gen. chs 12–50 follow the mythic material in chs 1–11. The chronology of the narratives themselves is set in the early second millennium BCE, but there are no direct connections between the biblical traditions and nonbiblical sources. No person or event known from Egyptian, Mesopotamian, or other sources is even mentioned in the biblical narrative. At the relatively few points where the Bible does name rulers (as in Gen. ch 14; 20.2; 26.8), none of them are found in any nonbiblical sources. Moreover, at many points in the narrative the Bible is tantalizingly vague. If the biblical writers had just named, for example, the pharaoh who took Sarah into his house (Gen. 12.15), or the pharaoh in whose court Joseph rose to power (Gen. ch 41), we would at least know when the biblical writers thought those events took place, and could correlate them with Egyptian chronology.

The biblical narratives themselves are the result of a lengthy and complicated process of the formation, transmission, and editing (see the Introduction to the Torah, pp. 1–7). Although the reconstruction of that process is hypothetical, there is no doubt that the process itself has led to the inclusion of a large number of anachronisms. The stories reached the written form in which we have them long after the purported events that they recount, and they often reflect the times when they were written or edited rather than the times in which their stories are set. For this reason, it is unlikely that these stories can be useful in reconstructing any particular period in the second millennium. The ancestral stories in Gen. chs 12–50 may preserve some authentic historical memories, but these have been so refracted by the processes of transmission and the idealization of the ancestors that it is impossible to designate any of the individuals mentioned in Genesis as historical or to establish anything resembling a precise chronology.

The Historicity of the Exodus from Egypt

As with the ancestral narratives in Genesis, there is no direct connection between biblical traditions in Exodus and other ancient sources. Egyptian records contain no mention of the major individuals and events of the narrative in Exod. chs 1–15: Moses, Aaron, the plagues, and the defeat of the Egyptian army at the sea are completely absent from the extensive documentation we have for ancient Egypt. Again, the biblical sources are frustratingly unspecific and at places contradictory. Neither the pharaoh “who did not know Joseph” (Exod. 1.8) nor the pharaoh of the exodus itself (Exod. chs 5–15) is named. The only precise detail in the narrative is the store cities named in Exod. 1.11, but both their precise location and the dates when they were founded and occupied are uncertain, and their inclusion could also be anachronistic. As with the ancestral narratives in Gen. chs 12–50, the exodus narrative has been shaped by centuries of transmission and redaction, and should not be taken at face value as a historical record, although it is clearly central to the self-identity of Israel.

The first fixed datum, one of great importance, is a victory stele of Pharaoh Merneptah (1213–1203). In it he claims to have defeated various enemies in Canaan, including the identifiable cities of Gezer, Yanoam, and Ashkelon, and in the same geographical region, a group identified as Israel. Though it is doubtful that the victory celebrated on the stela is as complete as claimed, it is clear that by the end of the 13th century BCE the Egyptians knew of the existence of a geopolitical entity called Israel in the land of Canaan.

That some type of exodus took place may be a reasonable inference, given the persistence of the exodus tradition in the Bible and its presence in the earliest biblical poetry (notably Exod. ch 15), and some smaller details, such as the Egyptian names of Moses, Aaron, and Phinehas. The event must have involved fewer people than the exaggerated biblical numbers (see Exod. 12.37) indicate, and may have constituted little more than the escape of a relatively small group of Hebrews from forced labor in the eastern Nile delta, most likely in the 13th century. Given the lack of historical data, it is impossible to say more.

That group, whatever its size, interpreted its escape as the direct intervention of its god YHWH on its behalf, to be celebrated in hymns and magnified in importance as it was told and retold. When the group eventually entered Canaan, at a time when there was no centralized power to oppose it, it joined with others and eventually became the twelve-tribe confederation of Israel.

The Early History of Israel in the Land of Canaan

The beginning and end of this era are framed by two synchronisms: the mention of Israel in the Merneptah Stele in the late 13th century

(see above), and the campaign of the Pharaoh Shishak in Western Asia in 925 (see below), an event documented both in Egyptian sources and in the Bible. During the intervening three centuries, according to the chronology accepted by the majority of scholars, Israel developed from a loose confederation of tribes into a relatively stable dynastic monarchy. But of the principal events and individuals that figure in biblical narratives, none occurs in other sources.

One reconstruction of the beginning of this period, following the biblical narrative, is that of conquest. Much of the book of Joshua describes how the large group of Israelites crossed the Jordan under the leadership of Joshua and in a series of swift and relentless campaigns defeated the kings of the major Canaanite cities and annihilated most of the indigenous population. In the first part of the 20th century, this view seemed to be confirmed by the presence of destruction layers at key sites, all dated to the very end of the Late Bronze Age.

Reexcavation of many of those sites and more refined ceramic chronology, however, made it clear that some of the sites had not in fact been occupied at that time, and that the destructions were not all contemporaneous. Moreover, the opening chapters of the book of Judges, which also describes Israel's conquest of Canaan, presented a very different picture. While some Israelite tribes were apparently successful in defeating their Canaanite neighbors, many others coexisted alongside them. This is apparently confirmed even in the book of Joshua, where such Canaanite groups as the family of Rahab (Josh. 6.25) and the Gibeonites (Josh. ch 9) were incorporated into Israel. Thus the conquest model has largely been abandoned by scholars, but no other reconstruction has gained general acceptance.

One plausible scenario is to combine elements of various models to suggest that Israel as we know it emerged in the land of Canaan, and was comprised of diverse groups. One of these was the exodus group, whose allegiance to the god who had brought them out of Egypt, YHVH, would become the central religious tenet of the confederation. They were joined by others, some who were apparently their kin who had never gone down to Egypt, and some who may have been Canaanites disaffected from the centers of power. These disparate elements eventually united in a confederation or league, whose primary principles of worship of YHVH and mutual support were expressed in a social compact or covenant. The elements are called tribes, and they are associated with specific subregions in the land. While the number of twelve tribes is constant, both the names of the tribes and the territories with which they were associated shifted in response to historical vicissitudes. The religious symbol of the confederation was a moveable shrine, the Ark of the Covenant, which seems to have been based at different tribal centers at different times. The confederation was decentralized, with no overarching authority, and the tribes were relatively independent. In time of crisis, however, tribes were expected to come to the assistance of a beleaguered member, as in the very ancient poem in Judg. ch 5, or to punish one of their own for breach of the compact, as in the account of the Benjaminite war in Judg. chs 19–21. In situations like these a volunteer militia was mustered.

This reconstruction takes into account a variety of biblical data which are admittedly embedded in a later historical work, the Deuteronomistic History (see the Introduction to the Nevi'im, pp. 451–61). It also incorporates recent archeological evidence, including both significant elements of cultural continuity between the Late Bronze Age and the Iron Age, and the proliferation of small rural settlements in the hill country both west and east of the Jordan. Not all of these settlements would have been Israelite, nor would tribal territory necessarily entail complete control.

At the beginning of the Iron Age (ca. 1200 BCE), shortly after the likely date for the pattern of settlement described in the previous paragraph, another group arrived in Canaan. These were the Philistines, one component of the "Sea Peoples" well documented in Egyptian sources and in the archeological record. Of Aegean origin, they had repeatedly failed in their attempts to invade Egypt, and one or more of these Sea Peoples, including the Philistines, settled in Canaan along the Mediterranean coast. According to the biblical account, they formed a pentapolis in the five cities of Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron, and the four of these cities that have been securely identified (Gath is the exception) show a remarkably homogenous material culture at this time.

The broad outline of the biblical account, in Judg. chs 13–16 (the Samson stories) and in 1 and 2 Samuel (the stories of Samuel, Saul, and David), and the archeological record are in considerable agreement. The Philistines had a superior technology, especially in metallurgy (see 1 Sam. 13.20) and military hardware, and a professional standing army. By the mid-11th century they had considerably expanded their territory to the north and east, and their presence is evident at important centers beyond it, including Beth-shan in the Jordan Valley, and at military outposts in the heart of Judah, the dominant southern tribe, and in the north as well. The Philistines and the Israelites were thus on a collision course, both vying for control of the same region.

The United Monarchy (ca. 1020–928 BCE)

The emergence of Israel as a nation-state is part of a larger pattern of the development of regional geopolitical and ethnic entities throughout the region, such as those of the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites in Transjordan, the Arameans in Damascus and other centers in central and northern Syria, and the Phoenicians in Tyre. In the case of Israel, there was an additional stimulus. At least in part because of the Philistine threat, toward the end of the 11th century Israel profoundly changed its form of government from a loose confederation of tribes to a monarchy. The first ruler, Saul, seems to have been more a military chief than a full-fledged king (and he is thus a transitional figure from the "judges" to the monarchy). And despite initial successes, he was unable to check the Philistine advance, and died in a battle with them deep in Israel's territory in the Jezreel Valley. He was succeeded by a former commander in his army, David, who moved swiftly to contain the Philistines within their original territory and to unite Israel around himself and a newly chosen capital, Jerusalem.

Biblical historians describe additional military successes, which enabled David, and his son and successor Solomon, to subject kingdoms adjacent to Israel to vassal status, including the Edomites, the Moabites, the Ammonites in Transjordan, and the Arameans in Damascus. Whether the extent of the territory controlled by David and Solomon is as large as biblical sources suggest is questionable. Clearly the biblical historians have magnified the period of the United Monarchy, the reigns of David and Solomon, viewing them in many respects as an ideal age, made possible by divine favor. Underlying the sometimes hyperbolic and often ideologically motivated biblical accounts, however, is authentic historical memory of increasing centralized control and concomitant administrative complexity, a picture indirectly confirmed by the archeological record.

The most important synchronism between biblical and extrabiblical sources for this period comes just after the death of Solomon. The Egyptian pharaoh Shishak (Sheshonq I) undertook a campaign in Western Asia in 925, a date based on established Egyptian chronology. Mentioned in 1 Kings 14.25–26 (cf. 2 Chron. 12.2–9), this campaign is further documented in Egyptian sources and is confirmed by destruction layers at key cities in Israel. This synchronism is the basis for the chronology of the first three kings of Israel, Saul (ca. 1025–1005, the exact length of his reign is unclear), David (1005–965), and Solomon (968–928, allowing for a coregency with David at the beginning of his reign).

To be sure, the biblical account of the reigns of these three kings, found in 1 and 2 Samuel and 1 Kings chs 1–11, is shaped by theological and ideological concerns, and also displays a pervading interest in the characters of the narrative—the tragically inadequate Saul, the heroic David, the ambitious but flawed Solomon—and in the intrigues of the royal court. But it is also significantly different from narratives about earlier periods in Israel's history. Divine intervention is minimal, with most events taking place largely on the human plane. Moreover, a careful reading of the biblical text discloses some archival and other details that can be correlated with the archeological record and are consistent with the framework of events presupposed by the narrative. Thus, the skepticism of some modern historians, who argue that the biblical accounts of the United Monarchy are totally fictional retroversions from a much later time, seems unwarranted.

David also seems to have initiated the transformation of the monarchy into a dynastic kingship, which, consistent with other Near Eastern models, was understood to be the result of divine choice. With the establishment of the monarchy came social and religious innovation. The older structures of the decentralized premonarchic confederation were now coopted by royal institutions. The Ark of the Covenant was enshrined in the Temple in Jerusalem built by Solomon, providing in effect divine sanction for the monarchy. Priests became royal appointees, and there was a growing movement toward centralization of worship in the capital. Yet this centralized administration formed a kind of overlay, a veneer, on the social systems of the nation as a whole. Individuals still identified themselves as members of a family, clan, and tribe, and disputes between them were usually settled at the local level. Apart from the requirement of paying taxes and providing personnel for royal projects (corvee) and for the army, life in the villages probably proceeded much as it had for centuries.

The establishment of the monarchy, however, had entailed the formation of an elite, wealthy class. Life in the capital of Jerusalem, and after the split of the kingdom into two, in the northern capital of Samaria as well, was characterized by conspicuous consumption. This is evident in accounts of Solomon's court (1 Kings 4.22–28; 10.14–22) and in the description of the Temple and royal palace complex he constructed (1 Kings chs 6–7). That the extravagances documented in these accounts are not entirely an exaggeration is evident from archeological data at Samaria, and at royal cities such as Megiddo, Hazor, Gezer, and Dan. With the concentration of political power in the hands of a ruling aristocracy came abuse. One of the constants of the biblical traditions is opposition to the exploitation of the poorer classes. This opposition was frequently expressed in prophetic rebukes of the aristocracy, as in the admittedly legendary traditions concerning Elijah (2 Kings ch 20), and in the books of the prophets themselves. While their own relationship to the centers of power was not always antagonistic, prophets such as Amos, Isaiah, and Micah in the 8th century and Jeremiah in the late 7th to early 6th centuries were harsh in their denunciation of social injustice. In a sense they were conservatives, even perhaps reactionaries, insisting that the older premonarchic tradition of covenant was still binding, a tradition that commanded not only exclusive worship of YHWH but also fair treatment of every Israelite.

The Divided Monarchies

(ca. 928—the Late 7th Century BCE)

The split into the Northern and Southern Kingdoms is based on geographical distance and differences. The union of north and south had been fragile, even during the United Monarchy, and it disintegrated at Solomon's death. The reason implied in 1 Kings ch 12 is the northerners' anger at the cost of the extravagances of the capital, and this must have been at least part of the motivation. Solomon's son and successor Rehoboam was unable to gain the allegiance of the ten northern tribes, who seceded and formed a separate kingdom. This inaugurates the period called the Divided Monarchy, with the kingdom of Israel in the north and the kingdom of Judah in the south. The dynasty that David had established remained in power in Judah for nearly four centuries, while Israel (the Northern Kingdom) was ruled by a succession of royal families, many of whose rulers came to power in military coups. The parts were less than their sum had been, and the two kingdoms had mixed relations, sometimes friendly, sometimes hostile. Neither was able to control effectively the regions that bordered them, and the Davidic-Solomonic empire, such as it was, ceased to exist.

Changes on the larger international scene would increasingly affect these two kingdoms. Pressure from a revived Egypt is already evident in the above-mentioned campaign of Shishak to the north in 925. Meanwhile, in northern Mesopotamia, the kingdom of Assyria had consolidated its control over Babylonia in the south and adjacent regions to the north and east, and by the 9th century was poised to expand into the west. At this point the fairly complete Assyrian annals enable the construction of a relatively exact chronology and provide numerous synchronisms with biblical texts. Beginning with Ahab, king of Israel in the mid-9th century, many of the rulers of both Israel and Judah are mentioned in Assyrian sources, an indication of the growing Assyrian interest in the region that was of ominous significance.

The Assyrians were establishing an empire, a process which reached its zenith with the Assyrian king Esarhaddon's subjugation of Egypt in 671. They accomplished this by virtue of a technologically sophisticated army which in relatively rapid advance overwhelmed the smaller kingdoms to its west, usually incorporating their territories into the empire as provinces and deporting the elite of their populations to other regions, destroying their national identity and thereby suppressing their desire to rebel. By the late 8th century this subjugation was virtually complete. The Aramean kingdoms had been taken, including that of the Arameans in Damascus in 732. In 722 Samaria fell, its ruling class was exiled to Assyria, and the Northern Kingdom of Israel became an Assyrian province. Judah's territory was curtailed, and in part because of the remote location of Jerusalem, was allowed to exist in vassal status. Toward the end of the 8th century the Judean king Hezekiah attempted to reassert Judean independence, but was ruthlessly quashed by the Assyrian king Sennacherib in a campaign (701) which is well documented in both biblical and Assyrian sources. Most of the cities and towns of Judea were razed; Jerusalem avoided destruction only by payment of a heavy tribute, and the Davidic dynasty survived.

Beginning with Amos and Hosea in the mid-8th century, the prophets and the later authors of the Deuteronomistic History (Joshua–2 Kings) interpreted these events as a deserved punishment inflicted by YHWH on his rebellious people. For them, the repeated experiences of attack, siege, and exile were ultimately caused not by the inexorable progress of the Assyrian armies, but by divine agency, imposing the fulfillment of the curses attached to the covenant. Yet, other prophets, especially Isaiah, focused on the preservation of Jerusalem and advocated the notion of Jerusalem's inviolability.

The End of the Kingdom of Judah (Late 7th–Early 6th Centuries BCE)

By the late 7th century the Assyrian empire was overextended, and was unable to prevent first independence and eventually overthrow by a resurgent Babylonia to its south. The Babylonians captured the Assyrian capital of Nineveh in 612, and in effect took over the Assyrian empire. In the initial years, Egypt and Judah attempted to take advantage of the transfer of power by reasserting their independence. This was the time of the reign of the Judean king Josiah (640–609), whom Kings compares to David and whose accomplishments are magnified like those of his illustrious predecessor. It seems likely that Judah was able to reestablish control over some of the territory to the north and west that had been under direct Assyrian rule; Josiah's religious reforms of 621 (see 2 Kings chs 22–23) should be understood in this context. This autonomy, such as it was, was short-lived. After Josiah's death in battle at Megiddo in 609, in a failed attempt to prevent the Egyptians from moving north to reinforce the tottering Assyrians, Judah was again reduced to the status of a vassal, first to Egypt, and then, by the end of the 7th century, to Babylonia. Caught between two greater powers, the Judean kings Jehoiakim and Zedekiah successively allied themselves with Egypt, which proved to be the weaker partner. Under Nebuchadnezzar (also called Nebuchadrezzar) II, the Babylonians laid siege to Jerusalem in 597 and 586, in the second instance destroying the city, burning down the Temple, and ending the Davidic dynasty. Thus came the demise of the kingdom of Judah.

It was the end of an era. Despite the extravagant propaganda of the royal establishment, neither the Davidic dynasty nor its capital city were impregnable. Jerusalem was destroyed, its Temple burned, and its population decimated by death and exile. Although a significant number of Judeans remained in Judah, autonomous control of the promised land became only a memory. And despite partial restoration later in the 6th century, exile in Babylonia transformed the religion of Judah into what would later be called Judaism. From this point on, a significant proportion of Jews would be living outside of the land of Israel, without king, Temple, or priesthood. The Torah and other texts that would eventually comprise the Bible gained new importance in this period, filling the vacuum left by the destruction of these core institutions. The preservation and compilation of older texts, and the creation of new ones during and after the exilic period, preserved and developed the national identity of the Jews. It may not be putting it too strongly to say that had it not been for the cataclysmic event of the destruction of Judah, there would be no Bible.

The Persian Period (539–333 BCE)

The Babylonian exile and the period of Persian domination that followed was a time of great transformation for Judean institutions, religious practices, and culture; but it was equally a time in which the fundamental continuity with preexilic traditions was reaffirmed and secured. When Nebuchadnezzar put down the rebellion of Judah in 586 BCE, he exiled to Babylonia a portion of the population, especially the ruling class and the skilled artisans. Most, however, remained in Judah, where a subsistence economy was soon reestablished. Although the system of regular sacrifices at the Temple was disrupted, the ruined Temple remained a focus for religious observances. The book of Lamentations may preserve liturgical poems used on days commemorating the destruction of Jerusalem and its Temple. Little is known about the circumstances of those who went into exile, although it appears that the exiles were settled in a number of local communities in Babylonia, where they were able to oversee their own internal and cultural affairs under the leadership of Jewish elders and prophets (see Ezekiel; Isa. chs 40–55). Other exiles, it would seem, viewed the exile not as a sign of God's displeasure, but of divine weakness, and likely assimilated into the mainstream Babylonian culture (see Jer. ch 44).

The conquest of Babylon by the Persian king Cyrus the Great in 539 BCE brought significant changes. In keeping with his policy of respecting the various deities worshipped throughout the empire, a decree by Cyrus in 538 (see Ezra 1.1–4; 6.1–5) authorized the rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem and the return of the Temple vessels captured by Nebuchadnezzar. In addition, Cyrus allowed any of the exiles who wished to return to Judah to do so. Within the exilic community in Babylonia the anonymous prophet known as "Second Isaiah" (Isa. chs 40–55) strongly supported Cyrus and urged the exiles to return to Judah. Although historical sources are few and not always easy to interpret, it appears that only a small minority of the exiles and their descendants returned to Judah, most choosing to remain in Babylonia. This latter group became the nucleus of a large and highly significant Jewish Diaspora community (Jews of "the dispersion," that is, living voluntarily outside the land of Israel), which strongly influenced the development of Judaism and Jewish culture during the following centuries. A less numerous Diaspora community also developed in Egypt, formed originally of Judeans who fled during the last days of Judah.

Despite the decree of Cyrus, the Temple in Jerusalem was not rebuilt until 520–515 BCE. The reasons for the delay were various. Persian control over the western territories may actually have been tentative until after the Persians conquered Egypt in 525. The economy of Yehud (the name by which the Persian province of Judah was known) was weak, and there appears to have been friction between the population that had remained in the land and the small but powerful group who returned from exile with the authorization and financial backing of the Persian king. Conflicts with the neighboring territories of Samaria and Geshur and Ammon in Transjordan also complicated the situation. Within the Bible the prophetic books of Haggai and Zechariah and portions of Ezra chs 1–6 refer to this period, but these sources have to be read and interpreted critically, for they are neither consistent with one another nor easy to understand on their own terms. At least during the early part of Persian rule the governors of Judah appear to have been prominent Jews from the Diaspora community, one of whom, Zerubbabel, was a member of the Davidic royal family. Davidic kingship, however, was not reinstated because Yehud was not an independent country but a province of the Persian empire. The province of Yehud itself was very small, consisting of Jerusalem and the territory surrounding it within a radius of about 24–32 km (15–20 miles).

Once the Temple was rebuilt, it became the nucleus of the restored community, and consequently a focus of conflict (Isa. chs 56–66; Malachi). The high priestly family, which had also returned from the Diaspora, became very powerful, and at least on occasion was in conflict with the governor appointed by the Persian king. Although the details are often unclear, there appears to have been continuing conflict during the 5th century between those Jews whose ancestors had been in exile and those whose ancestors had remained in the land. Those who returned from the Diaspora styled themselves the "children of the exile" and referred rather contemptuously to the rest as "people of the land," as though their very status as Jews was in question. In fact, the question of the limits of the community was one of the most contentious issues of the period, reflected both in the controversy over mixed marriages between Jewish men and ethnically foreign women (Ezra ch 10; Neh. ch 13) and also in conflicts within the Jewish community over who had the right to claim the traditional identity as descendants of "Abraham" and "Israel" (see Isa. 55–66, esp. 63.16). Although the conflicts between various contending groups in early Persian period Yehud are largely cast in religious terms, there is no question that they were also in part socioeconomic (see Neh. ch 5). All of these conflicts and efforts toward redefinition of the community, however, took place within the reality of Persian imperial control. Thus it is not by accident that the two most prominent figures involved in various reforms of mid-5th century Yehud, Ezra and Nehemiah, were Diaspora Jews of high standing, carrying out tasks that had been specifically authorized by the Persian kings.

Because this was a period of self-conscious reconstruction, it was also a time of immense literary activity, as traditional materials were collected, revised, and edited, and new works composed. Although much of the Torah may have existed in various forms during the time of the monarchy, it was probably reworked during the Persian period into something close to its final form. Indeed, some have suggested that this revision may have been undertaken under the sponsorship of the Persian government, reflecting Persia's interest in achieving stability throughout its empire by means of religious and legal reforms in the provinces. Although a history of Israel and Judah called by modern scholars the Deuteronomistic History (Deuteronomy through 2 Kings) had been composed during the latter years of the monarchy and updated during the exile, a new version of that history, 1–2 Chronicles, was prepared during the Persian period (ca. 350 BCE). It clearly reflects the concerns of the postexilic community, focusing almost exclusively on the history of Judah and giving particular emphasis to the institution of the Temple. The book Ezra-Nehemiah interprets events from the decree of Cyrus in 538 until the late 5th century.

In addition to the prophetic books composed at this time (Isa. chs 56–66, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, and perhaps Joel), there is evidence that the texts of older prophets were also edited and reinterpreted. Psalmody had been an important element of worship at the First Temple, but appears to have taken on an even more significant role in the Second Temple. Although the expansion and revision of the book of Psalms may have continued into later periods, an important shaping of the psalter, perhaps including its division into five "books," was part of Persian period activity. Wisdom writing, too, flourished during this time. The book of Job, parts of the book of Proverbs, and perhaps Ecclesiastes were likely composed then.

The Hellenistic Period (333–63 BCE)

The westward expansion of the Persian empire into the area of Asia Minor had brought it into conflict with Greece, since many of the cities of Asia Minor which came under Persian control had been founded and populated by Greeks. Twice the Persians had even invaded the Greek mainland, but were defeated on both occasions. Eventually, Philip of Macedon developed a plan to free the Greek cities of Asia Minor from Persian domination. Although he died before he could undertake the campaign, it was taken up by his son Alexander the Great in 334 BCE. Alexander, however, did not stop with the accomplishment of that initial goal. In 333 he continued down the Phoenician coast, subduing any city that resisted, conquered Egypt, then turned to the Persian heartland, defeating Darius III, the last Persian emperor, in 331. Alexander continued his conquest into the eastern reaches of the Persian empire before returning in 324 to Babylon, which he apparently intended to establish as the capital of the empire he now controlled. He died in 323, however, before he could successfully organize his enormous territory. After Alexander's death, his generals fought for control of portions of the empire. By 301 an agreement gave Egypt to Ptolemy and Mesopotamia and the Levant to Seleucus. Ptolemy, however, occupied most of the Levant. Through a series of five wars extending over more than 100 years the Ptolemaic kings managed to hold onto their Levantine territory, finally losing it to the Seleucids in 198 BCE.

Jerusalem had surrendered to Alexander in 333 and was relatively undisturbed by the events of his conquest. Samaria, too, surrendered, but rebelled in 332 and was severely punished, its inhabitants killed or sold into slavery, and the city refounded as a Macedonian military colony. Documents belonging to a group of Samaritans who fled and were later tracked down and killed by Alexander's troops have been excavated from the Wadi Daliyeh in the Jordan Valley. In contrast to the relatively settled conditions following Alexander's conquest, however, the dispute between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids over territorial control had serious consequences for Jerusalem and Judea. Not only did the wars sometimes affect Judean territory, at the border between the two, but the nation's leaders had to make difficult choices concerning which power to support. The conflict between pro-Ptolemaic and pro-Seleucid factions within the Judean community was a significant factor in internal politics during the 3rd century BCE.

Although the high priest was the primary representative of the Judeans, the Ptolemaic system of government and taxation had significant effects on the power structure of the country. The Ptolemies considered their territories primarily as a source of revenue. Rather than collecting funds directly, they employed "tax farmers," often local persons who bought the right to collect taxes for a specified area. Their profit was the difference between the amount they raised and the amount they had pledged to the government. Some of these positions were quite lucrative. Moreover, the Ptolemies also engaged prominent landowners to keep the peace as the heads of locally organized military villages. The 1st-century CE Jewish historian Josephus preserves a long account of the Tobiad family, which served the Ptolemaic government in both capacities. From his lively narrative one has a sense not only of the power and wealth such positions could afford but also of the dangers and conflict they often entailed.

Culturally, the most significant effect of Ptolemaic rule was the establishment of a large Jewish Diaspora community in Egypt, centered in the new city of Alexandria, founded by Alexander the Great. Jews had often migrated to Egypt during times of economic or political trouble (see Jer. chs 42–44). In the 5th century a Jewish military colony in the service of the Persian army was established at Elephantine (Hebrew: Yev; near modern Aswan). They had their own temple, though they did not offer animal sacrifices there, and remained in correspondence with Jerusalem concerning various religious matters, including the proper celebration of Passover and assistance in securing Persian permission for the rebuilding of the Elephantine temple after it was destroyed by local Egyptians. The various Aramaic documents found there (letters, contracts, marriage documents, records of legal disputes, etc.) provide an important glimpse into the daily life of this Jewish community in Egypt. Among the papyri was a copy of the book of Ahikar, a legendary story about an official in the Assyrian court at the time of Sennacherib and Esarhaddon (late 8th to early 7th century). Although the story was not Jewish in origin, it became popular among the Jews. The book of Tobit in the Apocrypha makes reference to Ahikar, even calling him Tobit's nephew (Tob. 1.21–22).

The Hellenistic-era Egyptian Diaspora, however, was much larger and more influential than the previous small communities of Jews living in Egypt. Its origins are not clear, but during the initial Ptolemaic conquest of the eastern Mediterranean territory, Ptolemy I apparently captured Jerusalem and took many prisoners back to Egypt, where they settled. Later many other Jews migrated there, presumably for economic reasons. The community continued to grow, both in numbers and in prosperity, until in the Roman period the Jewish population numbered in the hundreds of thousands, including many wealthy and prominent families.

By the middle of the 3rd century BCE the Jewish community in Egypt had translated the books of the Torah into Greek, and over the next century or so, the other books of the Bible were also translated. A legendary account of this project is contained in the Letter of Aristeas. According to that narrative, the impetus for the project came from the king himself, Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285–246 BCE), who wished to have a copy for the library of Alexandria. Seventy-two Jewish translators were brought to Egypt from Jerusalem for the task; hence the translation came to be known as the Septuagint, from the Greek word for "seventy." All the translators miraculously agreed on the wording of the translation. Similar stories about the origin of this important translation are found in rabbinic literature. Scholars largely reject these accounts as unhistorical and maintain that the translation was undertaken for the religious needs of a Jewish community that no longer understood Hebrew. The stories do show, however, that the first translation of the Torah needed justification, both in terms of its being of no less literary merit than Greek literature and in terms of its accuracy and authority. (See "The Canonization of the Bible," pp. 2072–77, and "Jewish Translations of the Bible," pp. 2005–20, for more information about the Septuagint.) In addition to the translation of the Scriptures, the Jewish Diaspora in Egypt produced a rich and varied literature in Greek. One should not assume, however, that every Jewish writing in Greek originated in Alexandria, for during the Hellenistic period Greek became the most important international language. Educated Jews in the land of Israel and in the eastern Diaspora were nearly as likely to speak Greek as their counterparts in Egypt, as the language and customs of the Greeks influenced much of the Jewish community in profound ways. Nevertheless, Alexandria remained unparalleled in the richness of its intellectual culture.

Less is known about the Jews of the eastern Diaspora who remained under Seleucid control than about the Jews of Egypt and the land of Israel, but it appears that peoples of various ethnic groups had access to economic and political advancement within the Seleucid empire. Several writings from this time—Tobit and Dan. chs 1–6—suggest something of the outlook of Jews in the eastern Diaspora. Written originally in Hebrew or Aramaic, and later translated into Greek, these books are works of fiction, edifying entertainments that tell the stories of Jews who achieved high status in foreign courts, were threatened by jealous rivals, and yet succeeded in securing personal power and the good will of the king. Though the stories are all set in the pre-Hellenistic period (Tobit in the Assyrian empire, Daniel in the Babylonian exile), they were probably written during the Seleucid period. While they acknowledge that faithful Jews may be vulnerable because of their religion, on the whole these are optimistic stories with a positive view of the Gentile kings.

The eastern Diaspora was also the conduit for important religious developments that arose from the contact between Judaism and the religions of Babylonia and Persia. This influence is most clearly seen in the development of apocalyptic literature. Although it is more difficult to trace the path of influence in its earliest stages, the dualistic religious beliefs of Persian Zoroastrianism almost certainly contributed to the development of Jewish apocalyptic and to some of the ideas of the later sectarians at Qumran.

The eventual triumph of the Seleucid kingdom over the Ptolemies in the fifth Syrian war (198 BCE) obviously had a greater significance for the Jews of Judea than for those of Egypt. The Seleucid ruler Antiochus III treated the Judeans generously in appreciation for the support he received from the pro-Seleucid faction, granting an allowance for the Temple and various tax concessions, as well as confirming the Judeans' right to live "according to the laws of their country." Although relations began well, the difference in the way the Seleucid empire governed its territories set the stage for a terrible conflict. Unlike the Ptolemaic system of centralized government administered with the cooperation of local leaders, the Seleucid regime was more decentralized. It derived some unity, however, from a network of Greek cities established throughout the empire. These were not necessarily ethnically Greek but were cities that had received a charter to organize as a polis, the Greek form of city government. Cultural prestige and economic advantages often led the leadership of Near Eastern cities to request such a charter.

The events leading up to the conflict between Judea and the Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164 BCE) are complex and not fully understood. In part they involved a struggle for succession to the high priesthood and the attempts of various contenders to secure the support of the king by paying him large sums of money. The first of the contenders, Jason, also paid to have Jerusalem established as a Greek polis, Antioch at Jerusalem. Neither of these acts in itself seems to have aroused much opposition in Jerusalem. The conflict was not a cultural conflict between Judaism and Hellenism, for Jews had already incorporated significant elements of Hellenistic culture, which they considered quite compatible with their religious identity.

The crisis was sparked by the attempt by another contender, Menelaus, to buy the office of high priest. When he promised the king more than he could pay, he attempted to raise the money by taking golden vessels from the Temple. At this, a riot broke out in Jerusalem. Subsequent fighting between the forces of Jason and Menelaus convinced Antiochus that Judea was in revolt, and he retook the city and plundered the Temple, either in 169 or 168. Sometime later there were further disturbances, and Antiochus sent Syrian troops, which remained garrisoned in Jerusalem. Whether the status of Jerusalem at this point was a polis or a military colony is uncertain, but in either case in 167 the Temple was reorganized to accommodate the religious needs of the Syrian troops. A dedication was made to Zeus Olympius, the Greek name for the Syrian god Baal Shamem, and an altar established for sacrifice. Though Menelaus continued to preside as high priest, most Jews considered these actions to have profaned the Temple. In addition, the traditional practices of Judaism such as circumcision and observing the Sabbath were suppressed by Antiochus, perhaps with the cooperation of Menelaus. Since religious persecution was virtually unknown in antiquity, it is difficult to know how Antiochus understood this repression and what he hoped to accomplish by it. Its actual result was to ignite the resistance known as the Maccabean revolt. Knowledge of this period is reflected in Dan. chs 7–12, most likely the latest composition in the Tanakh.

The Hasmoneans, Mattathias and his sons Judas Maccabeus, Jonathan, Simon, John (Hebrew: Yoḥanan), and Eleazar, were the leaders of the revolt. Although Judas managed to retake control of the Temple in 164 (its rededication being the occasion for the institution of the festival of Hanukkah), it was not until 142 that the last of the Seleucid army was expelled and actual independence was secured by Simon. From then until the Roman conquest of Judea in 63 BCE the small kingdom was ruled by the Hasmonean family, who in addition to ruling as kings also assumed the office of high priest. The Romans would destroy the Second Temple in 70 CE, in response to a series of Jewish revolts.

The Geographic Background

The geographical territory encompassed by the Bible (if one includes all identifiable places that are at least mentioned) includes most countries that border the Mediterranean Sea as well as those to its east. The majority of the narratives of the Bible are set in that subregion of the Middle East known as the Levant and now governed by Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, Israel, and the Palestinian Authority. Egypt to the southwest and Mesopotamia (largely modern Iraq and parts of Syria) and Persia (Iran) to the northeast are also part of the biblical landscape.

In Mesopotamia—the Greek term for the region between the Euphrates and Tigris Rivers (Color Maps 1 and 3)—as in Egypt, urban civilization developed by the fourth millennium BCE in the river valleys that provided the essential water for a region where rainfall was at best seasonal. The regular summer flooding of the Nile Valley enabled the early and continuous existence of a remarkably long-lasting culture in Egypt. In Mesopotamia the inhabitants had harnessed the two rivers to provide, by means of an elaborate irrigation system, sufficient water for agriculture as well as for consumption. The several successive imperial powers that originated in Mesopotamia were able to use this productive region as a base for expansion, especially to the west, over which they exercised control throughout most of the first millennium BCE, until the Hellenistic period.

Although surrounded by vast deserts, there is a narrow stretch of land where agriculture can flourish that extends from the Nile Valley around to the Persian Gulf. The western part of this “Fertile Crescent,” the Levant is characterized by almost ideal growing conditions for grapes and olives and for raising sheep and goats; grains and legumes and other fruits can also be grown in much of the region.

Its climate is moderate, without excessively high or low temperatures for the most part, and with abundant rainfall that occurs mainly during the winter months. Jerusalem, for example, receives on average about 550 mm (22 in) of rain annually, almost all of it falling between November and February, with January being the rainiest month. Higher elevations to the north receive still more rainfall, and the southern and easternmost regions considerably less.

Within the Levant itself, the primary focus of biblical narratives, there is a wide variety of environments, the result of the geological substructure of the region, which presents dramatic changes in a relatively small area. Moving from west to east, the Mediterranean coast is occupied by a coastal plain that is about 25 km (15 mi) wide in the south but narrows as one moves north. It is interrupted by Mount Carmel, which juts into it, and virtually disappears in northern Israel and Lebanon. The coast itself has several excellent harbors in the north, from which the Canaanites and their successors the Phoenicians conducted a flourishing maritime trade. Farther south, the coast is relatively even, and there are few natural harbors. Phoenician influence eventually extended to such port cities as Acco, Dor, Joppa, and Ashkelon. Along the coastal plain was a major route, known as "the way of the sea" (Isa. 9.1), used by traders and by armies of conquest between Egypt and Damascus. This route ran to the point where the coast narrows below Mount Carmel, from which passes led from the coastal plain to the Jezreel (Esdraelon) Valley; from there, several routes could be taken to the northeast. To the north of the Jezreel Valley lies the Galilee. Because of its abundant springs, Galilee was dotted by settlements from prehistoric times, but it plays little role in biblical narratives.

Adjacent to the coastal plain in the south is an uplift of smaller, gentler hills called "the Shephelah" ("lowland"). As the natural western boundary of the kingdom of Judah in the Iron Age, and of other entities in the same region before and after, it was protected by a number of important cities, including Lachish and Gezer. The Shephelah forms the foothills of the mountainous region immediately to its east. This is the "hill country" of the biblical writers, with higher elevations to the north. For example, Jerusalem, about 55 km (35 mi) east of the Mediterranean, is some 760 m (2,500 ft) above sea level, and many mountains in northern Galilee have elevations of over 1,000 m (3,300 ft). The highest peak in the region is Mount Hermon, which is some 2,800 m (9,200 ft) high and for that reason is snow-covered year round. The hill country is the setting for many of the key locales in biblical narrative, including the relatively inaccessible sites of Jerusalem, the capital of the kingdom of Judah (later Judea), and Samaria, the capital of the Northern Kingdom of Israel and later of the province with the same name. This central mountainous ridge is bisected by the broad, fertile Jezreel Valley, the major route to the interior and hence the location of a number of important ancient cities, including Jokneam, Megiddo, Taanach, Ibleam, and Jezreel.

Just east of the central mountainous region is the Rift Valley. This major depression in the earth's crust extends from southern Turkey into East Africa, and in Israel and Jordan is almost entirely below sea level. Included in it are the Huleh Basin in northern Galilee, some 70 m (230 ft) above sea level, where the site of Hazor was a major fortified city from early in the 2nd millennium BCE until its destruction by the Assyrians in 732 BCE. Some 20 km (12 mi) south of Lake Huleh (now drained) is the Sea of Kinneret, or the Sea of Galilee (also called the Sea of Tiberias), a large lake about 20 km (12 mi) long that fills the valley. It lies some 210 m (700 ft) below sea level and is fed by the Jordan River, which flows into it from the north. It is habitat to nearly two dozen species of fish, and the fishing industry has been an important part of the local economy since prehistoric times.

The Jordan River continues its flow south from the Kinneret some 105 km (65 mi) to the Dead Sea. The valley itself is about 20 km (12 mi) wide, and is entirely below sea level, with a semi-tropical climate that produces lush vegetation, even though it receives relatively little rain. Important cities in the valley include Beth-shan in the north and Jericho in the south.

The Dead Sea, lying some 400 m (1,300 ft) below sea level, is the lowest point on the land mass of the earth. Because of evaporation due to the high temperatures (a record 51° C [124° F] was measured here), the composition of the water is about 25 percent salt and other minerals, making organic life impossible and giving this lake its ancient Hebrew name, yam ha-Melaḥ, “the salt sea” (Num. 34.3, 12; NJPS “Dead Sea”). The desolate region that surrounds it is the narrative setting for the legendary cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. On its western shore are Qumran, where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found, and Masada, a palace constructed by Herod that was the last Jewish outpost to be captured in the First Jewish Revolt.

East of the Rift Valley there is a rapid rise to the relatively level Transjordanian plateau to the east, with the elevation of modern Amman (ancient Rabbah) at ca. 820 m (2,700 ft) about average. This region too receives sufficient rainfall to sustain agriculture, and moreover is watered by two tributaries of the Jordan, the Yarmuk and the Jabbok, and by the Arnon, which flows into the Dead Sea. The northern part of the plateau, biblical Bashan, was famous for its cattle and for its oak forests. Traversing the Transjordanian plateau from south to north is a major route, called in the Bible the “King’s Highway” (Num. 20.17), used throughout antiquity as a conduit for the incense and spice trade from Arabia to Damascus. East of the plateau is a vast desert region, a continuation of the Arabian desert that extends northward to the Euphrates Valley, and thus limits the Fertile Crescent on both east and west. Apart from a few oases, especially Tadmor (later Palmyra) northeast of Damascus, this desert was essentially uninhabited in historic times.

South of the hill country of Judah lies the Negev, a region of limited rainfall and hence marginal agriculture. The city of Beer-sheba is located in the extreme northern Negev, just south of the Judean hill country. The Negev merges into the Sinai peninsula, which is formed by the two northern arms of the Red Sea, separating the Sinai from the North African desert to its west and the Arabian desert to its east.

The size of Israel, approximately the same as that of the state of Vermont, is inversely proportionate to its importance in ancient times. Israel found itself in a strategic position between the two great powers of Egypt and Mesopotamia. It would thus be influenced by these great powers, and in later times, Israel’s central location on major sea and land routes would allow rapid dissemination of ideas to and from the outside world.

[Adapted by ADELE BERLIN
AND MARC ZVI BRETTLER]

Languages of the Bible

Hebrew and the Semitic Languages

The bulk of the Bible was originally composed in Hebrew, the language of the biblical Israelites, and the language that was spoken in the land of Israel until the end of the tannaitic period (the time of the Mishnah, ca. 200 CE). During the amoraic period (the time of the later talmudic Rabbis, ca. 200–500 CE) it ceased to be a living language, although for Jews it remained the language of liturgy and literature until its revival as a spoken tongue at the end of the 19th century. Hebrew is a member of the Semitic family of languages, which on the basis of geography can be divided into three groups: Northeastern Semitic (Akkadian and its dialects of Assyrian and Babylonian, and Eblaite), Southern Semitic (Old South Arabian and its modern descendants, Ge'ez and the modern Ethiopic dialects, and Classical Arabic and its pre-classical and modern dialects), and Northwest Semitic (Ammonite, Aramaic, Deir Alla, Edomite, Hebrew, Moabite, Phoenician and Punic, and Ugaritic).

Within the Northwest Semitic family of languages, Hebrew is part of the "Canaanite" branch of languages. Other members of the Canaanite branch include Ammonite and Edomite, both of which are attested in a few poorly preserved inscriptions; Moabite, the language of the Mesha Stele erected by King Mesha, which boasts of Moab's victory over Israel (see 2 Kings 3.4–27 for the biblical account); and Phoenician and Punic (the form of Phoenician in the western Mediterranean), which are attested in inscriptions and in Greek and Latin transcriptions. These languages share several linguistic features that distinguish them from the other branches of Northwest Semitic: Aramaic, Ugaritic, and Deir Alla (attested in a text from biblical Succoth that mentions Balaam the Seer).

Alphabet

The earliest Hebrew inscriptions are written in a consonantal script that was probably borrowed from the Phoenicians at the beginning of the 1st millennium BCE. This script, like its Phoenician ancestor, was at first purely consonantal and did not mark vowels. The use of a script that does not indicate vowels can create ambiguity for the reader since a sequence of consonants can often be read in different ways with different meanings, e.g., km can represent kam "he arose," kama "she arose," kamu "they arose," kum/kumi/kumu/kuma "arise!," kom/kum "arising." Inscriptions from different centuries show that certain letters known as 'amot kerī'ah, matres lectionis, or vowel letters (alef, heh, vav, and yod) were gradually employed to represent vowels, at first at the end of words, and then in the middle, too. In the consonantal text of the Bible one can find both final and medial matres lectionis.

The Hebrew script that developed from the Phoenician is known as the Paleo-Hebrew script. Sometime in the centuries before the Common Era it was replaced by a descendant of the Aramaic square script, which also originally developed from the Phoenician. It is known as the Jewish square script or ketav 'ashuri (Assyrian script), the latter name pointing to its origins in the Aramaic speaking East. By the time of the Dead Sea Scrolls (mid-3rd century BCE to 1st century CE), almost all manuscripts were written in the square script, though a few were still written in the Paleo-Hebrew script, and in some documents the Tetragrammaton (יהוה) alone was written in Paleo-Hebrew. The Jewish square script is used today in printing modern Hebrew, and the Paleo-Hebrew script continues to be used by the Samaritan community.

There is evidence of graphic confusion of consonants in the Bible. Some of the confusion can be attributed to the similarity in form of letters in the Paleo-Hebrew script, and some is due to the similarity of letters in the square script. For example, it appears that resh and dalet, which are similar in the square script, have been confused in two parallel passages: 'adikem "(Like dirt of the streets) I crushed them" (2 Sam. 22.43) vs. 'arikem "(Like dirt of the streets) I cast them out" (Ps. 18.43).

Pronunciation of Biblical Hebrew

Evidence for the pronunciation of Hebrew during the biblical period comes from three main sources:

Transliterations of Hebrew into Akkadian, Greek, Latin, and Arabic. Some Hebrew proper nouns are transliterated into cuneiform in Akkadian tablets, e.g., Ḫa-za-qi-a-u Ya-u-dai "Hezekiah the Judean" in Sennacherib's annals from the very beginning of the 7th century BCE. The Septuagint (3rd century BCE) is a rich source for transliteration of proper nouns, though, as is the case with all transliterations, there are many unknown variables including the lack of a one-to-one correspondence between the Hebrew alphabet and the Greek alphabet and the possibility that the Hebrew tradition underlying the transliteration into Greek differs chronologically and possibly dialectically from the Hebrew of the Tiberian tradition that is found in Bibles currently used. See, e.g., the difference in pronunciation between the Greek transliteration Rebekka and Tiberian Hebrew Rivka. The Hexapla of the church father Origen, a six-column work from the 2nd to 3rd centuries CE, is also of importance since column two (the "Secunda") contains the Biblical text (not only proper nouns) transliterated into Greek. Unfortunately, only fragments from the Psalms have survived. Transliteration of Hebrew into the Roman alphabet is attested in the 5th century in the Latin works of Jerome. Biblical Hebrew transcribed into Arabic can be found in medieval Karaite works.

Vocalized Manuscripts. The oldest extant manuscripts of the Bible are the Dead Sea Scrolls from Qumran, which are purely consonantal and have no vowel signs. The oldest manuscripts with vowel signs (and cantillation signs that serve as musical notes and also mark word stress and punctuation) are attested only about a thousand years later toward the end of the first millennium. Four different vocalization systems were in use during the Middle Ages. The most prestigious system and the one that is still used today is that of the Tiberian Masoretes (see "Masoretic Bible," pp. 2077–84), who devised vowel and cantillation signs in order to preserve an ancient tradition of reading that had been passed down orally for centuries. There were also Masoretes in Babylonia who developed a separate graphic system of pointing, which reflects a slightly different pronunciation. The discovery of the Cairo Genizah at the end of the 19th century revealed another system, known today as the "Palestinian," which appears to be the ancestor of the Sephardic pronunciation of Hebrew (both the kamatz and the patah are pronounced as a, and both the tzere and segol are realized as e). A fourth system known as "the expanded Tiberian" or "Tiberian-Palestinian" makes use of Tiberian vowel signs to represent a "Palestinian" pronunciation.

Oral Traditions of the Recitation of the Bible. The oral traditions of the recitation of the Bible that have survived into the present also deserve mention, in particular that of the Yemenite Jews, whose reading tradition preserves many old features, e.g., the hard/soft (stop/fricative) pronunciation of all six consonants bgdkpt (in contrast to Modern Hebrew where one finds an alternation of b/v, k/kh, and p/f, but not g/gh, d/dh, and t/th). Additional phenomena in the Yemenite reading tradition conform to what is described in the medieval treatises of the Tiberian Masoretes and thus demonstrate the antiquity of the tradition.

Dialects

It is widely assumed that there were different dialects of Hebrew during the biblical period. The biblical narrator at Judg. 12.6 notes a difference between the Gileadites and Ephraimites in pronouncing the sibilant (sh/s) in shibboleth/sibboleth. Scholars have suggested that stories that take place in the north (e.g., the Elijah and Elisha narratives in Kings) sometimes display dialectal forms that differ from the biblical norm, which is thought to reflect southern Hebrew, i.e., the Hebrew of the Judean kingdom. See, e.g., the spelling of the second feminine singular independent pronoun "you" 'ty (= 'atti) in northern stories as opposed to normal biblical 'at (see, e.g., 2 Kings 4.16). The Samaria ostraca from the 8th century BCE provide clear extrabiblical evidence of a northern Hebrew dialect. "Year" is written as sht (= shat) as against shannah in Judea, and "wine" spelled yn reflects yen as against southern yyn (yayin). On the basis of the contraction of ay to e in yn, scholars have suggested that the prophet Amos, who prophesied in the north, makes a linguistic pun (8.1–2) that is understandable only if one realizes that northern Hebrew contracted ay to e: He rhymes kayitz "summer fruit" and ketz "end" (probably pronounced the same).

Chronology and Periodization of Biblical Hebrew

All spoken languages develop over time and thus it is only natural that Hebrew too underwent changes during the lengthy biblical period, which stretches from sometime in the second millennium BCE almost down to the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE. In addition to differences in style and language between some biblical books, and between the literary sources (J, E, P, and D) that make up the Torah, scholars are able to discern four linguistic periods:

Early Biblical Hebrew. It is not known when Hebrew was first spoken and when it developed into a language that was distinct from other Canaanite languages. The earliest stories in Genesis, e.g., the account of creation and the flood, are not datable linguistically, since they are written in the same language as other stories from the First Temple period. The earliest datable Hebrew is an agricultural calendar found at Gezer, which is assigned to the latter part of the 10th century BCE. There are two sources from the 15th to 13th centuries BCE that hint at what proto-Hebrew may have looked like—the language of the Ugaritic tablets from Ras Shamra in Syria and the Canaanitisms in the El-Amarna tablets found in Egypt. The former tablets include mythological stories of Canaanite gods that are echoed in motifs and language in the Bible. The latter include letters written by Canaanite-speaking scribes in the area of modern-day Lebanon, Syria, and Israel to the Pharaoh in Egypt; the language of the tablets is Akkadian, yet the scribes inadvertently inserted features of their own Canaanite tongue and sometimes deliberately glossed Akkadian words with their Canaanite equivalents. Neither Ugaritic nor El-Amarna Canaanite, however, is a linear ancestor of Hebrew.

The oldest Hebrew in the Bible is found in several poems that are replete with archaic-looking features of morphology (e.g., the remains of case endings such as the final o-vowel in hayto 'eretz “wild beasts” [Gen. 49.11]), syntax (the frequent absence of the definite article and the relative pronoun), and vocabulary. Among the most striking archaic poems are the Blessing of Jacob (Gen. ch 49), the Song of the Sea (Exod. ch 15), the Balaam parables (Num. chs 23–24), the Song of Moses (Deut. ch 32), the Blessing of Moses (Deut. ch 33), the Song of Deborah (Judg. ch 5), as well as some psalms (e.g., Ps. 29). Many terms in these poems occur only once in the entire Bible (hapax legomena) and thus it is often difficult to pinpoint their precise meaning.

Classical Biblical Hebrew. This language, which includes most of the books of the Bible from Genesis through Kings as well as portions of the Latter Prophets and the Writings, is the Hebrew of the First Temple period. In general, when one talks of biblical Hebrew, one refers to the language of this period. Perhaps the most salient feature of the language is the use of verbal forms with the vav conversive (vav ha-hipukh), e.g., va-yakom va-yelekh “and he arose and went” (Gen. 24.10), ya'aleh . . . ve-hishkakh “would go up . . . and water” (Gen. 2.6). Other noteworthy features include lengthened and shortened modal forms, e.g., 'eshmera “I want to keep, allow me to keep” as opposed to regular 'eshmor “I shall keep,” yehi “let there be” as opposed to regular yihyeh “there will be.”

Transitional Period between Classical and Late. The destruction of the First Temple and the Babylonian Exile are a watershed in the history of biblical Hebrew. Postexilic Hebrew differs markedly from preexilic Hebrew. The language of the books of Jeremiah and Ezekiel demonstrates features of Hebrew from both the First and Second Temple periods, and thus reflects a period of linguistic transition, e.g., Ezekiel's use of both classical Hebrew shesh and late biblical Hebrew butz for the cloth “byssus.” One of several grammatical peculiarities of this period that is particularly noticeable in the language of Jeremiah and Ezekiel is the frequent spelling in the consonantal text of the 2nd-person feminine perfect ending in -ty, e.g., lmdty (= limmadti) “you taught" (Jer. 2.33) as opposed to regular -t: lmdt (= limmadt).

Late Biblical Hebrew. The Hebrew of the Second Temple period, the language of Esther, Ezra, Nehemiah, Daniel, and Chronicles, clearly reveals a late composition. The contrast in language is apparent when comparing passages in Chronicles to parallel passages in Samuel and Kings. The verbal system of Late Biblical Hebrew is marked by the gradual disappearance of the classical verbal forms with vav conversive and the lengthened and shortened verbal forms. The language is also characterized by the adoption of loanwords from Aramaic (e.g., zman "time" as opposed to classical Hebrew mo'ed; madda' "knowledge" as against classical da'at) as well as some from Persian (e.g., pardes "park," pitgam "decree"). The Hebrew of the period also evidences features that reflect Tannaitic Hebrew, the early stratum of Mishnaic Hebrew, e.g., nulledu "they were born" (1 Chron. 20.8) reflecting the stem nuf'al, a combination of nif'al and pu'al as against classical biblical noledu (nif'al).

Extrabiblical Hebrew Sources

Our knowledge of the Hebrew of the biblical period is limited almost entirely to what is attested in the Bible. There is a relatively small corpus of Hebrew inscriptions from different sites in the land of Israel (e.g., Gezer, Samaria, Jerusalem, Arad, and Lachish) whose grammar corresponds to that of biblical Hebrew. These inscriptions have also slightly enriched our knowledge of the vocabulary of the biblical period. The Siloam inscription (8th to 7th centuries BCE) describing the digging of a water tunnel (also mentioned in 2 Kings 20.20 and 2 Chron. 32.30) contributes a previously unattested word zdh, whose pronunciation is unknown since there is no internal mater lectionis to inform us what the medial vowel was (the final heh probably represents a). The word seems to mean "crack, fissure" since it occurs in a context in which something in a rock allowed masons wielding picks on either side of the rock to hear each other. A Lachish ostracon (6th century BCE) also reveals a new form tsbh (= tesibbah?) "course" (from the root s-b-b, "to turn") in the phrase tsbt hbkr (= tesibbat ha-boker) "during the course of the morning."

In addition to inscriptions, archeological digs have turned up seals and bullae (seal impressions on clay) that contain names known from the Bible, e.g., lbrkyhw bn nryhw hspr "belonging to Berekhyahu son of Neriyaahu the scribe" (the amanuensis of Jeremiah known as Baruch ben Neriyaahu in Jer. 36.32). A few seals bear the title 'asher 'al ha-bayit, "who is over the house," an official in charge of the royal palace mentioned several times in the Bible, e.g., 1 Kings 4.6; 16.9; 18.3. Many of the seals and bullae reveal names from the ancient Hebrew onomasticon (inventory of names) that are not attested in the Bible.

The Qumran caves next to the Dead Sea have yielded hundreds of Hebrew documents. Multiple copies of biblical texts have been discovered (all books are attested except for the book of Esther) as well as sectarian writings of the Qumran community. (See "The Bible in the Dead Sea Scrolls," pp. 1920–28.) The linguistic contribution of the Dead Sea Scrolls is considerable. Frequently one witnesses the linguistic modernization of biblical texts: Older, archaic forms found in the Masoretic Text are replaced by more modern ones, e.g., the archaic case ending on the first word of the Masoretic hayto ba-saday "beasts in the field" (Isa. 56.9) has been deleted in the Great Isaiah Scroll from Qumran (1QIsa^a), and the archaic form of the second word (saday) has been changed to the classical sadeh. Some features in the language of the Dead Sea Scrolls are representative of Late Biblical Hebrew, e.g., the expression beshel she- "so that," and even Tannaitic Hebrew phenomena crop up, e.g., the idiom nasa' ve-natan "carried and took" (= "traded"). From the slightly later period of the Second Jewish Revolt one finds that the Hebrew of the Bar Kokhba letters from nearby Naḥal Hever and Wadi Murabba'at no longer reflect biblical Hebrew, but rather a Tannaitic-like Hebrew, e.g., the use of final nun and the negative particle lo' in wP d'gyn l'hykhn (ve-lo' do'agin le-'al'ekhon) "you do not care for your brethren" as against what in biblical Hebrew would have final mem and the negative particle 'en (ve-'en do'agim le-'al'ekhem).

Aramaic in the Bible

There are a few passages in the Bible that were written in Aramaic and not Hebrew. Aramaic is attested in the Bible in two words in Gen. 31.48, yegar sahaduta (glossed into Hebrew as gal 'ed "the heap of witness"), one verse in Jer. 10.11, four chapters in Ezra (4.8–6.18 and 7.12–26) and six chapters (2.4–7.28) in Daniel. The use of Aramaic in each of these sources is not surprising. In Gen. ch 31 Aramaic is put into the mouth of Laban, who is an Aramean. The biblical narrative explicitly links the patriarchal families with the Arameans. By the time of Jeremiah, Aramaic had already become a language of trade and diplomacy in the Neo-Assyrian and Neo-Babylonian empires. During the time when Ezra and Daniel were composed, Aramaic had become the undisputed lingua franca of the ancient Near East. Biblical Aramaic belongs to the period of Aramaic known as "Official" or "Imperial" Aramaic (ca. 700 BCE–200 BCE), the latter term emphasizing that Aramaic was used throughout the Achaemenid Persian empire for communication and administration. Documents written in the Aramaic of this period have been found in Egypt (Elephantine, Hermopolis), Mesopotamia, and even farther afield (Spain, Afghanistan, India). Although belonging to Official Aramaic, the one Aramaic sentence in Jeremiah reveals a sign of older Aramaic in the form 'arka' "land" alongside the Official Aramaic form 'ar'a. The Aramaic of Ezra shows signs of being older linguistically than the Aramaic of Daniel (the pronouns with final -m in Ezra are older than the corresponding pronouns with final -n in Daniel).

The use of Aramaic in the land of Israel spread with the return of the exiles from Babylonia, where Aramaic was in the process of replacing Akkadian. Even when using Hebrew, scribes of this period typically employed the Aramaic script rather than the paleo-Hebrew script, as noted above. During the Second Temple period it was spoken and written together with Hebrew, as evidenced by the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Bar Kokhba letters, both of which were written in Hebrew and in Aramaic. Aramaic completely supplanted Hebrew as the spoken language by the end of the tannaitic period.

[STEVEN E. FASSBERG]

Textual Criticism of the Bible

No original manuscript of any biblical book has ever been discovered. This situation, which may seem surprising, is actually quite common for ancient writings, and even for those from only a few centuries ago. For instance, none of Shakespeare's plays is available in the original manuscript from Shakespeare's hand, and for most of them there are two or more early printed versions with many differences between them. For the biblical books, numerous copies or partial copies, varying greatly in age and quality, have been preserved in various parts of the world. Occasionally, as with the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in the mid-20th century, new copies come to light (see "The Bible in the Dead Sea Scrolls," pp. 1920–28). Nevertheless, for the entire text of the Bible, scholars are faced with a situation in which they have multiple manuscripts that have been copied by hand so that each is a unique product, unlike a modern printed book, and therefore the copies differ among themselves in many places, some differences trivial and some important. The differences among manuscripts range from a single letter to words or lines, to the absence or presence of entire sections, or to the presentation of the same material in a different order. Some of these differences are of little consequence for meaning; others have significant impact on the meaning. Some of the latter may have been intentional changes or may have arisen through an error, and been preserved over time. Given this situation, scholars have had to develop a methodology for comparing and accounting for the differences in wording in cases where the copies disagree. This methodology is called textual criticism.

Textual criticism involves, first of all, the collection of all the differences between copies of any text. The manuscripts may be in several forms. The earliest were scrolls (like those found at Qumran, near the Dead Sea), long strips of parchment (animal skin) or papyrus rolled up. Scrolls can accommodate a book or a few books, but not the entire Bible. In the late first millennium CE, collections of biblical books in book form, called codices (the plural of codex), came into use. Another source for the biblical text is citations, or quotations in ancient writings, such as the Dead Sea Scrolls or rabbinic literature. These sources, taken all together, are called witnesses or authorities, and the differences among them are called variant readings or simply variants. The ancient translations, or versions, of the Bible, which provide indirect evidence for the Hebrew text on which the translation was based, are a final important source for variants.

There is no unanimity concerning the theoretical goal of textual criticism. Some, following the older school, aim to reconstruct the original text of the Bible, what it looked like when it was first written. Others are less certain that we can or should speak of an "original" text, since the evidence suggests that some biblical books may have circulated in different editions (or recensions) from a very early period. Texts, even once written, may have been fluid, with sections being added or subtracted. In addition, ancient copyists may have had a very different notion from ours of what it meant to copy a text; for example, it was acceptable to update the spelling of a word, to substitute a synonym for a word, or to gloss a word with a brief explanation. Thus, the "best" text in a certain time and place may not have been the "original" text. Those who espouse this second approach do not consider the task of textual criticism to be the reconstruction of the original text, but rather the analysis of differences among texts, the investigation of the significance of those differences, and in some cases, the determination of which textual variant is better or preferable, though it may not be original.

Reasons for Variants

Variants can be of several kinds. The copyist may have misseen or misheard a word, producing a simple spelling error, or perhaps a different word. For example, in Gen. 22.13 the Hebrew text, which reads 'ayil 'aḥar, "a ram afterwards" or "behind," is almost certainly an error for 'ayil 'eḥad, "one ram"; the two letters resh and dalet are nearly identical and are easily confused, and many of the ancient versions translate this phrase as "one ram" or "a ram." Scribes may also accidentally skip a line or two, omitting a phrase from their manuscript. This was done, for example, by the scribe of the Great Isaiah Scroll from Qumran, who skipped the end of Isa. 40.7 and the beginning of 40.8; this was facilitated by the phrase "grass withers, flowers fade," which is repeated in these two verses. Conversely, the copyist may inadvertently have written a phrase twice, producing a repetition. Both internal evidence from the Hebrew text, and comparison of that text to the versions, has suggested that many variants are of this kind.

It is also likely, as noted above, that the attitude of early copyists of biblical texts was fundamentally different from ours. They probably did not feel the need to transcribe exactly, letter for letter. This explains why many ancient manuscripts and versions reflect a range of minor variants, where, for example, synonyms are used. Thus, one manuscript might use the word 'eret for land, and another its synonym, 'adamah. The order in which phrases might be copied was also somewhat flexible in this period. "Variant" traditions which the author knew might also have influenced his copying. For example, it is clear that in antiquity there were two traditions concerning the number of descendants of Jacob who went down to Egypt: 70 and 75. While the number 70 is preserved in what crystallized as the Masoretic Text to Exod. 1.5, the variant 75 is found in the Septuagint and in two Qumran manuscripts.

Sometimes copyists seem to have tried to improve the text they were reproducing. They might have done this in several ways. They may have tried to "correct" a word or phrase that was unacceptable for one reason or another, by substituting a more acceptable word or phrase. This might be related to what the Rabbis later called Tikunei Soferim, "corrections of the scribes," where a locution that might be read as offending God was corrected so it would not be understood as offensive. Early copyists might also have tried to make the text support a particular theological view or belief. For instance, at Deut. 32.8, some versions and a Dead Sea Scroll fragment read "according to the number of the sons of God," while the Masoretic Text reads "in relation to Israel's numbers." There is general agreement that the second variant was introduced by a scribe trying to avoid a polytheistic wording. Copying a manuscript, then, was not necessarily just a mechanical process, but could involve deliberate changes.

Ancient Translations

Another source of information that scholars turn to is very early translations of the Bible. These early translations are called versions, and they were in use among Jews or Christians who could no longer understand the Bible in its original languages. (See "Jewish Translations of the Bible," pp. 2005–20.) They include translations of the Bible into Greek (for instance, the Septuagint), Syriac (the Peshitta), Aramaic (the Targumim [singular "Targum"]), and Latin (the Vulgate).

These versions are useful in ascertaining what early Hebrew texts of the Bible might have looked like. The earliest complete manuscripts of the Septuagint are centuries earlier than our first complete Hebrew manuscripts of the Bible, and it is clear that the Septuagint was translated from a Hebrew text that differed in significant ways from the Masoretic Text. (There are many cases where this is now confirmed, where the Septuagint agrees with a Dead Sea scroll fragment against the Masoretic Text.) The versions can therefore be consulted, with care, for determining an earlier stage of the biblical text or an alternate tradition of its wording. In many modern translations, including the NJPS Tanakh, these ancient versions are sometimes cited in the footnotes to provide explanations or alternate solutions to difficulties in the Masoretic Text. The translators' notes in NJPS call attention to many of these matters. These notes are keyed to the text by superscript letters, and can be found at the bottom of the translation. The abbreviations used in these notes are listed on pp. xix–xx. NJPS, however, on principle follows the Hebrew Masoretic Text, which is discussed, along with the versions, in the section below, "The Bible: Texts and Versions," and in greater detail in "The Development of the Masoretic Bible," pp. 2077–84.

While not all scholars approach textual criticism in the same way, there are some guidelines that are generally agreed upon. First is the importance of collecting all the significant variants and information about the manuscripts in which they occur. Manuscripts must be evaluated as to their reliability and age. When it comes to choosing among different readings, in general, shorter readings are preferable to longer ones, since scribes are more likely to add to a text than to delete materials (though, in the case of offensive or theologically challenging texts, deletion must be considered); difficult readings, including awkward phrases, coarse words, and poor grammar, are preferable to smoother ones, since scribes might try to "correct" such difficulties; and stylistic considerations can help judgments about how a particular author would have written. There are cases where none of the variants seem to be satisfactory, or where the text does not make sense as far as current scholarship can determine. In such cases scholars must assume that the wording of the text has been lost or distorted in the course of the copying process. They then have several options open to them. One (called conjectural emendation) is to conjecture, based on the text as it now stands, what the lost or corrupted wording might have been. This can often be based on a scholar's general knowledge of the ancient languages, just as an English speaker can notice, and mentally correct, a typographical error in a modern book without having access to the author's manuscript. Finally, scholars may have to admit defeat and acknowledge that, given the current state of our knowledge, it is impossible to determine what the wording might have been. For instance, at 1 Sam. 13.1, the translation shows, by the use of ellipsis, that a word (the age of Saul when he began to reign) is missing; the Hebrew text literally translated would read: "Saul was one year old when he became king," a chronological impossibility. In this case, unfortunately, the Septuagint does not include any part of the verse, and there are no Dead Sea Scrolls which preserve the missing data. It is therefore impossible to recover the lost words.

The Bible: Texts and Versions

The Masoretic Text

The basic text for the Bible in both the Jewish and scholarly communities today is the Masoretic Text (MT), an edition of the Hebrew that was standardized in the second half of the first millennium CE by rabbinic scholars (called "Masoretes," from masorah, probably "what is handed down," that is, "tradition"). The Masoretic Text accomplished two main things: It settled upon a consonantal text, that is, it established specific choices for the letters of the Hebrew words in the text; and it pointed those consonants with a system of markings that indicated which vowels should be read with the Hebrew consonants. It also offered cantillation and accentual marks, showing how words were to be sung or chanted and grouped together into phrases; and it included a set of marginal notes to assure that the text would be copied properly. (See "The Development of the Masoretic Bible," pp. 2077–84.) The decision to add vowel points was necessary because biblical Hebrew writing was in effect a system of consonants, with only a few ways of indicating vowel sounds. Words with the same consonants but different vowels would look the same, as would the English words "untrained" and "interned" if they were both spelled "ntrnd." Modern text critics are sometimes less hesitant to emend the vocalization of the text, on the theory that the vowel points are more recent than the consonants, and therefore less venerable, even though they may represent an ancient tradition of pronunciation.

All Hebrew copies of the Tanakh that were known until recently reflected the Masoretic Text. With a few exceptions (most notably biblical texts found in the Cairo Genizah), this remained the case until the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls (the documents of the Qumran community) in 1947. Among the scrolls were manuscripts of most books of the Bible that were over a thousand years older than the oldest manuscripts available up to that point. These more ancient copies of the Hebrew text have shed light on some passages in the traditional form of the biblical text. For example, at 1 Sam. 10.27–11.1 in the MT there is no indication of the background to the conflict between king Nahash of Ammon and the men of Jabesh-gilead. But in a Qumran manuscript of 2 Samuel (4QSam^a) there is a continuation of 10.27 and an opening phrase for 11.1 that explains the context. The New Revised Standard Version (NRSV) translates this as follows:

Now Nahash, king of the Ammonites, had been grievously oppressing the Gadites and the Reubenites. He would gouge out the right eye of each of them and would not grant Israel a deliverer. No one was left of the Israelites across the Jordan whose right eye Nahash, king of the Amorites, had not gouged out. But there were seven thousand men who had escaped from the Ammonites and had entered Jabesh-gilead. (11.1) About a month later, . . .

This text, which most scholars believe to be more original than the preserved MT, is found in the NRSV, but is absent from NJPS, which follows the MT.

The Ancient Versions

The ancient versions are used in several ways by biblical scholars. Particularly in cases where these versions are not translating literally, they provide important evidence for the early interpretation of biblical texts. In addition, because these versions predate the creation of the Masoretic Text, they are suggestive about the earlier state of the Hebrew text, and even choices of wording at the time of their translation. Of course, these ancient translations are themselves preserved only in copies, so that all of the considerations that apply to the original language texts of the Bible also apply to them: it is necessary to establish a critical text for them by comparing variant readings, and they must therefore be used with caution. This is, of course, a standard of comparison at one remove from the text itself: scholars must look at the Greek, for instance, in the Septuagint, and conjecture or assume what the Hebrew text before the translator (the Vorlage) would have been ("retrovert") in order to result in a particular rendition into Greek. Nevertheless, it is a valuable source of clues.

Names and Character of the Ancient Versions

The ancient versions of the Bible are referred to in a variety of ways by scholars. Following is a list, by language, of the chief versions (see also "Jewish Translations of the Bible," pp. 2005–20).

Greek. The most prominent Greek version, and the oldest surviving translation of the Bible, is the Septuagint, which was translated for use of Greek-speaking Jews who were living in the Diaspora in Alexandria, Egypt, and other places around the Mediterranean in the centuries after the conquests of Alexander the Great. The Septuagint, from a word meaning "seventy" because of a legend that seventy or seventy-two scholars worked on it, is abbreviated LXX (the Roman numeral for seventy). Three later Greek versions—by Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion—were produced for the use of Jews after Christians had taken over the Septuagint and the increasing conflict between Jews and Christians about the interpretation of the Jewish Scriptures had led Jews to stop using the Septuagint. These versions are also sometimes used by translators, though none of them has survived in its entirety.

Aramaic. The Aramaic language was the official language of the Persian empire, and the Jews who lived under Persian domination spoke Aramaic, which eventually largely supplanted Hebrew as the ordinary language of Jews. Aramaic is a Semitic language, like Hebrew, and shares some vocabulary with it, but Aramaic speakers cannot easily understand Hebrew. It was therefore necessary to provide translations of the Bible for Aramaic speakers. Read aloud in liturgical contexts, after the Hebrew had been read (see Neh. 8.7 for an early example), these translations, called Targumim (sg. Targum), reflect a wide variety of translation styles (See "The Bible in the Synagogue," pp. 1929–37 and "Jewish Translations of the Bible," pp. 2005–20.) Some, like Targum Onkelos, are relatively literal, while others, like the Targumim of the Torah from the land of Israel, or the late Targum to Song of Songs, are much freer.

Syriac. The Syriac language is a form of Aramaic, and was spoken by Jews in northern Syria. The Peshitta (which means "simple," that is, a plain translation) was prepared for the use of these Jews and later taken over by Syriac-speaking Christians.

Latin. Two Latin translations are used by scholars. The first, the "Old Latin" version, was actually a Latin translation of the Septuagent and of the New Testament dating from before the 4th century CE. More useful is the Vulgate, the translation prepared in the 4th century by the great biblical scholar and early church father Jerome. Jerome worked directly from the Hebrew text of the time, and his version therefore can be helpful in determining how his Hebrew text might have read.

It cannot be emphasized sufficiently that textual criticism is as much an art as a science. For this reason, and because the Masoretic Text has been the favored Jewish text for the Bible for over a millennium (the consonantal basis for this text is clearly ancient—it is the predominant text-type found at Qumran), the translators of the NJPS have based their translation on the MT. Yet the MT is not perfect, nor is it the only ancient reflection of the text that has come down to us. Therefore at times notes to the NJPS text and various annotations call attention to other possible ancient readings that deserve the reader's attention.

[ADELE BERLIN AND MARC ZVI BRETTLER]

The Canonization of the Bible

Canonization, broadly construed as the process through which the Bible became the Bible, is only vaguely understood. We do not know exactly how various books were chosen to be part of the Bible to the exclusion of others, how these books were put into a particular order, and how their text was established. Since there are no contemporaneous documents that describe this process, it needs to be reconstructed from indirect evidence, namely, from the variety of biblical texts from different periods and places that have survived, and from later traditions in rabbinic and other sources that discuss canonization. Thus, the reconstruction suggested below should be viewed as tentative.

Definitions

"Canon" is a Greek word meaning "reed," and came to refer to any straight stick that could be used for measuring. This basic meaning was extended to refer to any rule or standard by which things could be compared or judged. The Alexandrian grammarians, classical Greek writers who were not simply grammarians but also what we would call literary critics, used "canon" as their term for the list of standard or classic authors who were worthy of attention and imitation. This was not a closed category, and there were disputes about adding or removing works from the list. Furthermore, inclusion on the list merely recognized a work's quality; it did not confer upon it any new status. Nevertheless, a canon of writings came to denote those texts that were of central importance to a given group. The term is used somewhat imprecisely for the Bible, since the earliest evidence we have for understanding the development of the Tanakh does not come from book lists. Furthermore, when used in reference to the Bible, canon has an even stronger significance: Not only is a given set of texts included, but all other texts—no matter how worthy otherwise—are excluded. This sense is expressed in a rabbinic comment on Eccl. 12.12. The biblical text reads:

Of anything beyond these [Heb mehemah], my child, beware. Of making many books there is no end.

The rabbinic comment states:

Those who bring more than twenty-four books [the standard number in the Tanakh; see below] into their house introduce confusion [Heb mehumah] into their house (Eccl. Rab. 12:12).

This suggests not only that the works in the canon are important, but that they, along with their authoritative interpretation, are sufficient in and of themselves. Once the biblical canon was fixed, there could be no additions to it or subtractions from it. More important, books in the biblical canon, unlike those in the canons of the Greek grammarians, came to be thought of as divinely inspired.

The Tanakh

It is extremely difficult to trace how this conception of canon developed, and how it is connected to related notions, such as the eventual stabilization of the biblical text. Until the mid-20th century, many scholars thought that the canon of the Tanakh was established at Yavneh (Jamnia), a city near the Mediterranean coast, west of Jerusalem, that was a center of Jewish learning after the destruction of the Second Temple (70 CE). According to this theory, a group of Rabbis met there in about 90 CE and voted on whether or not certain books are canonical; at the end of this meeting, the official contents of the Bible were supposedly established. It is now acknowledged that this overly neat reconstruction is wrong and was based on a misunderstanding of rabbinic texts. The rabbinic texts that tell of this are no longer understood as granting canonical status, but are now viewed as reflecting certain ambivalences toward particular biblical books, such as Song of Songs, which were already in the canon, and whose canonical presence needed to be justified. Unfortunately, evidence is not available to offer a clear picture of how the canon of the Bible was formed, since much of the material from early Jewish sources (including the Dead Sea Scrolls, rabbinic texts, and the 1st century CE historian Josephus) and Christian sources, is ambiguous or biased.

This much is clear: the canon of the Bible did not develop at a single moment in time but rather in stages. There is general agreement that the Torah was the first section of the Bible to be canonized, that is, to be recognized as central by the community. Exactly when this happened is uncertain. Many scholars had associated this development with Ezra, and they saw the “law of your God” (Ezra 7.14), with which Ezra was entrusted in the 5th century BCE, as the Torah. We now recognize, however, that this assertion goes beyond the evidence of the text. Though the Jewish community had recognized the Torah as central to its identity by the Persian period (6th to 4th centuries), a conclusion suggested by citations of Torah material as authoritative in biblical books from this period (for example, Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah), it is unclear exactly how this happened, or whether this development should be associated primarily with a single individual such as Ezra, or should be seen as part of a larger, more complicated process that likely began during the Babylonian exile.

According to rabbinic tradition, the Torah is the first part of a tripartite (three-part) canon, followed by Nevi'im (Prophets) and Kethuvim (Writings), forming a work that much later was known by the acronym Tanak(h), Torah, Nevi'im, Kethuvim. Nevi'im is composed of Joshua, Judges, Samuel (seen as one book), Kings (seen as one book)—historical works known as “the former prophets”—and “the latter prophets,” consisting of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets (Hosea through Malachi, seen as one book). The order of these eight books has been relatively stable. Kethuvim is composed of the following eleven books, which, by contrast, appear in a wide variety of orders in various book lists and biblical manuscripts: Psalms, Proverbs, Job; the “five scrolls,” whose order has been especially variable, Ruth, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, and Esther; Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah (seen as one book), and Chronicles (seen as one book). The number of canonical books according to traditional Jewish sources is thus twenty-four (five in the Torah, eight in Nevi'im, eleven in Kethuvim).

The time of origin of the name “Tanakh” is not clear. Rabbinic texts recognize a tripartite canon, where the names we know of, Torah, Nevi'im and Kethuvim, are used for each part of the canon. Their Aramaic equivalent ʿoraita, nevi'ei ukhtivei (b. Kid. 49a) could be used as a general term for the Bible as a whole though in classical rabbinic literature this cumbersome locution is not generally employed for the Bible. (Rabbinic literature prefers the terms miqra' [that which is read] and kitvei ha-kodesh [the holy writings].) The acronym Tanakh is first found in Masoretic literature in the form of 'n"k (from the Aramaic 'oraita, nevi'ei ukhtivei—Masoretic notes are typically in Aramaic). Tanakh, a Hebrew reflection of this Masoretic term, is also found in Masoretic literature. It would thus seem that the term originates in the late first millennium, with the flourishing of the "Masoretic movement." In contrast to earlier Jewish terms for the Bible which did not explicitly distinguish between different parts of the canon, the term Tanakh may be understood as creating clearer dividing lines between the canonical sections, in some cases even (explicitly) suggesting priority of Torah over Nevi'im and Nevi'im over Kethuvim.

The origin of the tripartite canon has been a topic of recent dispute, with several scholars suggesting that a two-part canon, the Torah and other works, was the original form, and that only later was it divided into three parts. It is more likely, however, that the tripartite canon is primary, and evidence for it appears in such sources as the prologue to the Wisdom of Jesus ben Sirach, which says that "many great teachings have been given to us through the Law and the Prophets and the others (or, other books) that followed them" and Luke 24.44, which refers to "the law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms," and in parallel expressions in the Dead Sea Scrolls. The tripartite canon likely reflects the gradual nature of the canonization process, with Nevi'im canonized before Kethuvim. This would explain why the Kethuvim contain the book of the prophet Daniel (dating from the 2nd century BCE), and several late historical books, such as Ezra-Nehemiah and Chronicles, which would seem more appropriately to belong with similar works such as Joshua and Kings. The tripartite canon most likely suggests, therefore, that Torah was canonized in the Persian period, followed by the canonization of Nevi'im in the late Persian or early Greek period, while the Kethuvim were canonized last, around the time of the destruction of the Second Temple (70 CE).

The tripartite order is not the only one known in antiquity, nor is the number of twenty-four books the only number mentioned in ancient Jewish sources. Josephus, the Jewish historian of the 1st century CE, refers to twenty-two biblical books (Against Apion 1.42). It is not clear if he simply had a smaller canon or if, instead, his canon had the texts in a different order, combined in different ways. Some traditions put Ruth after Judges and Lamentations after Jeremiah, treating these smaller books as appendices to the ones they follow, rather than as independent works. Such an arrangement would yield twenty-two books, a number which conveniently corresponds to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet; some early Christian sources also cite this as the number of books in the Bible. The arrangement of Ruth and Lamentations mentioned above is found in the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Bible begun in Alexandria, Egypt, in the 3rd century BCE (see "Jewish Translations of the Bible," pp. 2005–20). According to this originally Jewish tradition, mentioned in some early church fathers and reflected in the arrangement of the earliest comprehensive Septuagint manuscripts (4th century CE), the Hebrew Bible is divided into four parts: Torah, Histories, Poetical and Wisdom books, and Prophets. This order continues to be used by Christians in their organization of the Hebrew Bible (Old Testament) materials (see chart at the end of this essay). Older scholarship spoke of this four-part, twenty-two book arrangement as the Alexandrian canon, in contrast to the tripartite, twenty-four book Palestinian canon, but scholars now recognize that such a clear dichotomy never existed and therefore avoid the use of those terms.

Scholars also now recognize that even when canonization took place, the contents of the Bible did not absolutely freeze. Yet, some evidence suggests that by the 2nd century CE the text had largely stabilized—this is reflected in the (few) manuscripts we have from this period, as well as the development of early rabbinic midrash, much of which presupposes a stable text. The destruction of the Second Temple and the Hadrianic persecution of the early 2nd century CE may have also caused a type of conservatism which was responsible for establishing “the” biblical text. These were gradual processes. It is important to remember that other groups, too, had their ideas about the canon; for instance, it is unlikely that the Qumran community, most of whose texts date from a century or so immediately before and immediately after the Common Era, viewed Esther as canonical, since no manuscript of that biblical book has been found among the thousands of fragments discovered. In contrast, many manuscripts of Jubilees, a work similar to Genesis and Exodus, have survived, and given this work’s affinities with the practices of the Dead Sea community, it was probably a canonical text for them. Within rabbinic literature, the Wisdom of Jesus ben Sirach (Sirach or Ecclesiasticus) is sometimes cited with the same formula used for biblical texts and was thus, in some sense, canonical for some Rabbis. Therefore, although we may speak of “the” canon forming in the 1st century CE, there was a certain amount of flexibility or variability around the fringes.

This flexibility may also be seen in the extensive divergence with respect to the wording of the biblical text as shown in manuscripts from Qumran, in translations of the Bible in the Septuagint and elsewhere, and to a lesser extent in early rabbinic citations (see “Textual Criticism of the Bible,” pp. 206–72). These differences are not just small, such as a variant spelling here or there, but are often major, and affect the meaning of the text. There are cases where the text is found in two or more different recensions—identifiably different versions, revisions, or critical texts, not merely two different copies of the same original with minor variants—which may simply vary the order of materials or may exhibit fundamentally different text-types (for example, short types versus expansive types, as with the text of Jeremiah; see the introduction to Jeremiah). This evidence suggests that, at least in the early stages of the canonization process, it was quite acceptable for a book to circulate in different versions and that different communities may have canonized different versions of the same book.

The most basic question is why particular texts were canonized while others were not. Canonized texts within Jewish tradition were considered part of miqra—“that which is read (aloud)” or kitvei ha-kodesh—“the holy Scriptures” (to use rabbinic designations). Excluded texts in some cases had been translated in the Septuagint and were therefore canonized in the Christian community; others were lost, or survived as pseudepigrapha (writings falsely attributed to major biblical figures), or were preserved only in fragmentary form in the Dead Sea Scrolls. Some of these excluded texts date from after the Persian period (later than 332 BCE), and thus were seen as too recent to be eligible for inclusion in the canon.

In various ways, canonical status for a book or group of books has to do with the community’s views of their centrality, authority, sacredness, and inspiration. Over time these characteristics have become connected, inseparably so in some traditions; yet they are not identical, and though they overlap, they must still be viewed distinctly. The Song of Songs, for instance, was originally an erotic love poem; by the early rabbinic period, it came to be interpreted allegorically as a love poem between God and Israel. It was also seen as the inspired composition of Solomon himself. Why was it canonized? Was it canonized before it was seen as a holy, allegorical text? In that case, its canonization might reflect a central role that it held in culture or ritual. Or was it canonized only after it was viewed as allegorical and as a composition of Solomon? In that case its significance, whether of author-

CANONS OF THE BIBLE

Jewish Canon	Protestant Canon	Roman Catholic/Orthodox Canon
Torah (LAW)	PENTATEUCH	PENTATEUCH
Genesis	Genesis	Genesis
Exodus	Exodus	Exodus
Leviticus	Leviticus	Leviticus
Numbers	Numbers	Numbers
Deuteronomy	Deuteronomy	Deuteronomy
Nevi'im (PROPHETS)	HISTORIES	HISTORIES
FORMER PROPHETS -	Joshua	Joshua
Joshua	Judges	Judges
Judges	Ruth	Ruth
Samuel (1 and 2)	1 and 2 Samuel	1 and 2 Samuel
Kings (1 and 2)	1 and 2 Kings	1 and 2 Kings
	1 and 2 Chronicles	1 and 2 Chronicles
LATTER PROPHETS	Ezra	Ezra
Isaiah	Nehemiah	Nehemiah
Jeremiah	Esther	Tobit
Ezekiel		Judith
The Twelve	POETICAL/WISDOM BOOKS	Esther
Hosea	Job	1 and 2 Maccabees
Joel	Psalms
Amos	Proverbs	POETICAL/WISDOM BOOKS
Obadiah	Ecclesiastes	Job
Jonah	Song of Solomon	Psalms
Micah		Proverbs
Nahum	PROPHETS	Ecclesiastes
Habakkuk	Isaiah	Song of Solomon
Zephaniah	Jeremiah	Wisdom of Solomon
Haggai	Lamentations	Sirach
Zechariah	Ezekiel
Malachi	Daniel	PROPHETS
	Hosea	Isaiah
Kethuvim (WRITINGS)	Joel	Jeremiah
Psalms	Amos	Lamentations
Proverbs	Obadiah	Baruch
Job	Jonah	Ezekiel
(Five Scrolls)	Micah	Daniel
Song of Songs	Nahum	Hosea
Ruth	Habakkuk	Joel
Lamentations	Zephaniah	Amos
Ecclesiastes	Haggai	Obadiah
Esther	Zechariah	Jonah
Daniel	Malachi	Micah
Ezra-Nehemiah		Nahum
Chronicles (1 and 2)	THE APOCRYPHA	Habakkuk
	1 and 2 Esdras	Zephaniah
	Tobit	Haggai
	Judith	Zechariah
There is no Apocrypha in the Hebrew Bible	Esther (with additions)	Malachi
	Wisdom of Solomon
	Ecclesiasticus (Sirach)
	Baruch	Orthodox canons generally include
	Letter of Jeremiah (Baruch ch 6)	1 and 2 Esdras
	Prayer of Azariah and Song of Three	Prayer of Manasseh
	Daniel and Susanna	Psalms 151
	Daniel, Bel, & Snake	3 Maccabees
	Prayer of Manasseh	4 Maccabees (as an Appendix)
	1 and 2 Maccabees

ship or of ideas, could have played a more important part. There is no way to judge between these two paths to canonization, and the resulting difficulty is characteristic of the problems in dealing with issues of canonization in general.

Despite such major uncertainties in our understanding of the process of canonization, however, several points seem fairly certain. First, it is likely that the final stages of canonization were a reaction to the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE and its aftermath. This crisis intensified a development which had begun over half a millennium earlier, with the destruction of the First Temple (586 BCE). Through this development Israel gradually became the People of the Book (a term first found in the Quran in reference to Jews and Christians). Second, it is unlikely that canonization represents a purely top-down process, through which a small group of leaders (Rabbis) determined the canon; instead, the designation of certain works as canonical was more like the official recognition of the works that a large segment of the community had already held to be central, holy, or authoritative. Finally, the act of canonization was remarkably inclusive, creating a body of works richly textured by a wide variety of genres, ideologies, and theologies. This is, fundamentally, a typical ancient Near Eastern process: Instead of creating a small, highly consistent text, as we perhaps would now do, those responsible for the process made efforts to include many of the viewpoints in ancient Israel, incorporating differing and even contradictory traditions into this single, and singular, book. [MARC ZVI BRETTLER]

The Development of the Masoretic Bible

The transmission of the Bible may be divided into four broad periods: (1) the era of Qumran (3rd century BCE–1st century CE); (2) the era of the Sages until the Masoretic codices (2nd century–8th/9th century); (3) the era of the Masoretic codices (9th/10th century–15th century); (4) the era of the printed editions (15th/16th century–21st century). We will survey these periods below, briefly summarizing the first two eras, and concentrating on the latter two.

The Era of Qumran

Our knowledge of the early history of the transmission of the Bible was greatly expanded with the discoveries in the mid-20th century in the Judean Desert (Qumran and other sites) of Bible manuscripts ranging from the 3rd century BCE to the 1st century CE (and beyond); there are no extant manuscripts before this era, though some manuscripts predate the actual Qumran community. (See “The Bible in the Dead Sea Scrolls,” pp. 1920–28.) All the books of the Bible (except Esther) were found, typically in fragmentary manuscripts, with the books of Genesis, Exodus, Deuteronomy, Isaiah, and Psalms most frequently represented. These discoveries caused a reexamination and reevaluation of other early witnesses of the biblical text, such as the text of the Septuagint (LXX; the Greek translation of the Bible) and the Samaritan Pentateuch. Hebrew variants which had been surmised on the basis of the Greek in LXX were now shown to have actually existed. Many scholars tried to categorize the Qumran material in its relationship to these known versions, as well as to the current standard Bible text, MT (Masoretic Text). Some noted that the Qumran material does not always fit into the categories of the previously known witnesses. The Qumran era reflects a multiplicity of texts (i.e., of variants), with witnesses for all three of the previously known text-types (MT [at that time: the proto-Masoretic text-type, which seems to have been the dominant text-type then, and which later attained exclusivity among the Hebrew texts], LXX, SP), as well as other previously unknown variants. It is this era that preserves substantial variants in the reading of a word, a phrase, a verse, or larger units.

Notwithstanding the multiplicity of texts, it seems that within the Jerusalem Temple circles there was a clear preference for the one textual tradition that we call the proto-Masoretic text-type (because of its close affinities to the later Masoretic Bibles). Thus, the consonantal text of fragments of biblical manuscripts found at Masada (brought there by the fighters) conform closely to MT. Some rabbinic evidence may substantiate this conclusion (see y. Ta'an. 4:2 [fol. 68a] and b. Ketub. 106a).

The current text of the Bible (MT) preserves evidence of variant texts from an early period. This can be seen especially in the transmission of parallel texts in the Bible, which preserve early variants of the same text (e.g., in the list of names of David's warriors [2 Sam. 23.8 ff.; 1 Chron. 11.11 ff.], or in various parallel psalms [e.g., Pss. 14 || 53]). Another phenomenon that preserves early variants is "double readings," where two variants appear consecutively in the text (e.g., 1 Sam. 28.3, lit. "they buried him in Ramah and in his city"); this phenomenon also occurs in LXX and the Aramaic Targumim.

The Era of the Sages till the Masoretic Codices

It is especially difficult to reconstruct this period because we lack direct witnesses to the Hebrew text; i.e., we do not have Hebrew Bible manuscripts from most of this period. (We have some evidence from the Bar-Kokhba period, found in Wadi Murabba'at and Naḥal Ḥever, and perhaps some from its end.) Instead, the vast literature of the Sages serves as a significant secondary witness to the Bible text in this period, both in its constant citations of biblical texts and its various statements about the text. For example, b. 'Eruv.

13a/Sot. 20a admonishes to be careful while copying biblical texts, for even one letter added or omitted can destroy the world. We also have many statements of R. Naḥman ben Yitzḥak, noting explicitly "x ketiv," that a word in the Bible is to be spelled in a specific way (usually defective spelling; this spelling, e.g. without a yod or a vav, serves as the basis for his midrashic re-vocalization of the word); e.g., b. Shab. 28b; 55b.

Once we enter the era of the Sages, the quality and quantity of variants of the Bible, as known from the prior period, disappear almost entirely. This is due to the fact that the Sages rejected both the Septuagint and the Samaritan text (accepted by the Christians and the Samaritans, respectively), and accepted the proto-Masoretic text-type as their Bible text. So, in effect, we are now left with only one text-type for the Bible. Although within this text-type there still remains a range of variants, they are minor; they are almost never of the substantial type known from the earlier era.

During this period the Sages continued to develop the concept of the sanctity of the biblical text which included the details of its spelling (including whether it was plene or defective, that is, written, e.g., with a vav, or without it). This can be seen in the numerous derashot, or expositions, both halakhic (legal) and aggadic (nonlegal), that hinge on the details of the spelling, and which assume only one correct way of spelling. (For examples, see Gen. Rab. 12:6 [Theodor-Albeck edition, Jerusalem 1965, pp. 101–102, 104], on the exact spelling of toldot in the Bible and b. Menah. 34b/Zevaḥ. 37a/Sanh. 4b on the plene/defective spellings of (u)le-totafot in Exod. 13.16; Deut. 6.8; 11.18.)

According to the conception of the Sages there was one accurate text—in all its details. Nevertheless, a range of (minor) variants in the texts that circulated continued to exist, though these now all belonged to one text-type. Occasionally, these variants are reflected in the literature of the Sages itself (see, e.g., the list of R. Akiva Eiger in his Gilyon Ha-Shas to b. Shab. 55b; V. Aptowitzer, Das Schriftwort in der Rabbinischen Literatur; and the apparatus in the Hebrew University Bible).

The Era of the Masoretic Codices

The third period differs from the earlier ones in a number of ways. First, the form of transmission changed. Previously, all Hebrew texts were written in scroll format; now, in addition to the continued use of scrolls for ritual reading (e.g., the Torah scroll), the codex—a manuscript in book form—was introduced. The earliest extant dated Hebrew biblical codex is from 916 CE; however, the Hebrew codex format had apparently been in use since the 8th century CE (when it was mentioned by R. Yehudai Gaon).

Second, nekudot (vowel points) and te'amim (cantillation marks) were introduced into the text. These signs—reflecting the pronunciation and accentuation that had previously been transmitted orally—were the work of the Masoretes. Scholars in the 19th and 20th centuries have shown, especially based on manuscripts in the Cairo Geniza, that in addition to the well-known system of vocalization and accentuation currently in use, which was developed in Tiberias, there were two other systems that were developed, but which were later abandoned. All three systems differ in the choice of signs. One was developed in Babylonia, and the other in the land of Israel, though perhaps not in Tiberias. Both of these latter systems (which place their signs on top of the letters) reflect a slightly different pronunciation than that of Tiberias. For example, the other systems have only five, and not seven, vowels; i.e., only one sound for pataḥ-qamatz; tzere-segol; akin to current “Sephardi” pronunciation. In addition to these three major systems, other subsystems, variants of the major systems, developed.

The introduction of the different systems of signs in different geographical areas at about the same time (apparently the 7th–8th centuries CE) seems to reflect the need felt by various experts to preserve in written form the oral tradition of pronunciation and accentuation of the biblical text before it would be lost. It is possible that the upheavals associated with the Arab conquests in this period served as a major impetus for this development.

The third difference between the third period and the previous ones was the introduction of the Masorah, an extensive system of notes intended to preserve the written text of the Bible. This Masorah was recorded in both biblical codices and in independent works. The scholars who composed these notes, and who are also responsible for the introduction of the vocalization and cantillation marks, are called Masoretes. Here, too, as in the case of the systems of vocalization, different Masorahs developed in different locations; in addition to the Tiberian Masorah, there was an independent development of Masorah in Babylonia. These Masorahs have as their goal the preservation of a sanctified text, accurate in all its details, including plene-defective spelling (as noted above, this view developed in the second era, with roots in the Temple circles in the first era). In short, the goal of the Masorah apparatus is to preserve the one correct or authoritative biblical text.

Two stages were usually involved in producing a Masoretic codex: First a scribe would write the biblical text, and then the Masorete would add the vocalization, accentuation, and the Masorah. The Masorah on the page was of two types. The first type was the Masorah Parva or small Masorah—short notes in between the columns (usually three) of the page, which referred to specific words in the text (those words were marked by a little circle above them). The note would often just note “l” (Aramaic “leita” = there is no other; it is unique), opposite a given word. At other times, it would note the number of times a word occurs in a particular form, e.g., “b”; “d” (it occurs twice; it occurs four times). As a rule, the Masorah would take note of the exceptions in any given case, preventing a copyist from normalizing an odd form to a more common one. The second type was the Masorah Magna—longer notes on the top and/or bottom of the page, repeating select phenomena marked in the Masorah Parva, and adding the references to the verses involved. This was done by quoting a few words of the given verses, since verse and chapter numbers were not yet used. Due to space limitations, there were many more Masorah Parva notes on the page than there were Masorah Magna notes.

Two main types of masoretic lists were compiled: (a) elaborative Masorah (masorah mefaretet)—this is the type noted above, e.g., elaborating how many times a word occurs in a given form, e.g., six times with defective spelling; (b) collative (or cumulative) Masorah (masorah metzorefet)—which collates the various unusual forms or words that appear (but not plene-defective spelling), and arranges them according to the alphabet or the order of biblical books. For example, a well-known list organizes all cases of words in the Bible that occur once without, and once with, a vav at their beginning (for example, 'okhlah [1 Sam. 1.9], ve'-okhlah [Gen. 27.19]). As the lists of the collative Masorah are sometimes very long, they cannot be copied in full on a given page in a Bible codex, but are usually copied there only in part (in those codices that bring these types of lists). In addition, the lists of the collative Masorah were edited early-on as a separate work, sometimes called 'Okhlah ve-'Okhlah, based upon the first example of the first list.

The sources available to the Masorete were sometimes different from those of the original scribe who wrote the consonantal text. If the Masorete found a contradiction between his source (Bible manuscript or Masorah note) and the Bible codex he was working on, he would correct the codex (sometimes adding a corresponding Masorah Parva note). At first, both the Masorah Parva and the Masorah Magna played a role in the correction of the codices, and were copied diligently. With time, however, the Masorah Magna took on a formalistic function, with the scribe filling up a set number of lines, e.g., two lines on top and three lines on the bottom, with Masorah Magna, thereby giving the codex the “masoretic codex format”—but without using it for correcting the biblical text. (In fact, in some manuscripts the copyist would on occasion simply cut off the list to fit the space available). Occasionally, the Masorah Magna was written in micrography, using the letters of the Masorah Magna decoratively to form different shapes, both geometrical (Sefarad) and even zoomorphic (animals and other shapes; Ashkenaz). At this later stage of transmission, then, the Masorah Parva was still often used for text-critical purposes, but the more complex Masorah Magna had, in effect, lost its original purpose, and had become decorative.

The medieval Masoretic codices may be divided into various groups based on geographical areas: (1) accurate Tiberian manuscripts (10th–11th centuries); (2) Sephardi manuscripts (13th–15th centuries); (3) Ashkenazi manuscripts (12th–15th centuries); (4) Italian manuscripts (12–15th centuries); (5) Yemenite manuscripts (15th–16th centuries). Most of these manuscripts are now held in state and university libraries around the world.

The accurate Tiberian manuscripts (manuscripts from the land of Israel and Egypt, with Tiberian Masorah) form a group whose text accurately reflects the Bible as reflected in the Tiberian Masorah. The most accurate manuscript among this group is the Aleppo Codex (= A) (ca. 930), whose Masorete was Aharon ben Asher, the last and most famous of the renowned ben Asher family of Masorettes. The other manuscripts in this group are close to this text.

The Sephardi manuscripts can be subdivided into three subgroups: those whose text is very close to A; those close to A (these were called “accurate Sephardi manuscripts” in the Middle Ages); those further away from A.

The Ashkenazi manuscripts can generally be divided into two groups: those whose text is far from A; those whose text is very far from A. (At least in the Torah, however, there are some that are close to A.)

The Italian manuscripts show somewhat similar characteristics to those in the Ashkenazi manuscripts.

The Yemenite manuscripts are very accurate in the Torah text, as they reflect A, because they conformed to the rulings of Maimonides, who followed A.

The Bible text in any medieval ms depended on the sources available to the scribe and to the Masorete; i.e., on the Bible manuscripts and on the Masorah. Throughout the Middle Ages, there were often minor differences between the various sources available. There is clear evidence of places where manuscripts are corrected (usually differences in plene-defective spelling) based upon another Bible manuscript or upon a Masoretic note; we can still see in the manuscripts cases where a letter is erased and an adjacent letter is extended to fill in, or a letter is erased by crossing it out, or a letter is added above the line. This is seen most often in Ashkenazi manuscripts, where the original text represents an alternate subtradition in spelling, whereas the Masorah represents the "accurate" tradition. The extant evidence points to the second half of the 13th century as the beginning of the awareness among certain Ashkenazim that the Sephardi manuscripts are accurate and differ from their own. These adaptations continued until the era of the printed Bible, and all reflect minor variants, very rarely affecting meaning.

The Torah was always regarded with special care and attention. In addition to the Masoretic codices, Torah scrolls continued to be written for ritual use. Special halakhic regulations legislated issues, such as where different types of paragraph spaces should be inserted (parshiyot petuliyot u-setumot) and song layout (Exod. ch 15; Deut. ch 32). Indeed, Maimonides legislated in his Code (Hilkhot Sefer Torah 10:1) that deviations in spelling, in section division, and in song layout render a scroll unfit for ritual use.

Given the many variants that Maimonides was confronted with, he had to decide what, in fact, was the accurate Torah text; i.e., what should be the standard text that others must copy. Maimonides chose the Aleppo Codex. He wrote a Torah scroll based upon it, and he included in his Code (Hilkhot Sefer Torah 8:4) a list of the sections and the layout of the songs based upon it. As we now know, he chose wisely; for the Aleppo Codex is, in fact, the most accurate among the accurate manuscripts in that it reflects the Tiberian Masorah most accurately. The Yemenites followed Maimonides, first basing themselves upon his Code, and then apparently making a model based upon his Torah scroll. Therefore, their Torah scrolls by and large reflect the Aleppo Codex in the text, sections and songs (excluding some minor variants).

Others, however, followed different options. R. Jacob Tam (France; 12th century), a significant French halakhist, wrote a work that determined the sections and song layout based on French sources (he also attended there to unique letters and special tagim [titles]). Ramah, R. Meir ha-Levi ben Todros Abulafia (d. 1244), a major Spanish halakhist, though he mostly followed Maimonides in the layout of sections and songs, decided on a different tactic for the text. He chose to follow the well-known halakhic rule of following the majority, and thus followed a selective majority of Sephardi manuscripts (using only ancient "accurate" ones, rather than a single manuscript). In addition, he made use of the Masorah. In the 13th century, we have evidence of Ashkenazi scholars coming to Spain (1250; 1273) to make an accurate copy based on Ramah's work, in order to serve as a model in Ashkenaz. R. Menahem ha-Meiri, a significant Provençal halakhist, also used the method of majority when determining the text in his Kiryat Sefer (1306), but allowed a wider selection of sources. (In addition, he attended to unique letters and special tagim.) He also allowed himself to deviate from Maimonides in various section divisions, basing himself on French/Ashkenazi sources as well as logic. Later, R. Yom Tov Lipman Muelhausen (15th century; Ashkenaz) reverted to exclusively following Maimonides concerning the sections and the layout of the songs.

Thus, we see that there were different tactics used by different decisors in determining the proper text, sections, and song layout. Some followed a single manuscript, while others decided on the basis of several manuscripts. Regional variation was significant. The net result was that there was no absolute unity during the Middle Ages concerning the details of the Torah scrolls, even though the halakhah required unity.

The Era of the Printed Editions

The fourth era differs from the previous three by the change in medium—from handwritten manuscripts to print. This eventually gave rise to a major change in the transmission of the text, as totally identical volumes could be printed in multiple copies and distributed to diverse geographical areas. At the outset of printing, different Bible editions reflected the different types of sources available to the editors. Thus, for example, the first dated edition of the complete Bible in Hebrew, Soncino 1488, reflected Ashkenazi sources (e.g., with many variants in the text, mostly plene-defective variants, but also other types of variants).

Printing proceeded apace, each editor relying on the sources at hand, until the first edition of the Rabbinic Bible (Miqra'ot Gedolot), Venice 1517 (referred to as RB1517), edited by the convert Felix Pratensis for the Christian publisher Daniel Bomberg. This edition not only included the complete Bible (there had previously appeared four or five other complete editions and over fifty partial editions, e.g., just Torah), but also the Aramaic Targum to each book (excluding Ezra, Daniel, Chronicles), and one or two commentaries to each book. The editor also often listed in the margin variants in the biblical text or vocalization that he found in the manuscripts. He also listed in the margin cases of qere (where a word is to be read differently than it is written), but omitted the term qere; this made it impossible to distinguish between cases of qere and cases of other variants. The introduction and the closing remarks to the work highlight that the editor and publisher were very proud of this edition and felt that it reflected the accurate Bible text. In reality, the editor created a new hybrid biblical text, of the Sephardi tradition mixed with certain Ashkenazi phenomena.

Eight years after this first edition of the Rabbinic Bible, Bomberg issued a second edition of the Rabbinic Bible, this time edited anew by Jacob ben Ḥayyim Ibn 'Adoniyahu, a Jew (who later converted to Christianity) learned in Talmud, halakhah, and kabbalah. This Venice 1525 edition (referred to as RB1525) differed from the first in a number of areas. First, it presented two or three commentaries on each book. Second, it presented for the first time the apparatus of the Masorah on every page: Masorah Parva and Masorah Magna; it presented the masorah finalis—over 5,000 masoretic lists at the end of the edition, arranged alphabetically, and cross-referenced to the lists in the edition; it also included at the end of the edition the variants between various Masoretic schools, namely between ben Asher and ben Naphtali, and the textual variants between the West and the East (Eretz Israel and Babylonia; beginning with the Prophets). Third, this edition was more accurate in its marking of the qere-ketiv, adding q[ere] to the variant, thus clearly identifying it as such; and was more accurate in marking other phenomena, such as majuscular (large) and minuscular (small) letters, etc. Fourth, this edition differed from the first in details of the text, vocalization, and accentuation.

This edition is based upon Sephardi manuscripts; unlike the first Rabbinic Bible, it does not reflect a hybrid edition. RB1525 was the initiative of Jacob ben Ḥayyim Ibn 'Adoniyahu who convinced Bomberg that the first edition, RB1517, could not serve as a model edition, unlike other editions of basic works undertaken by Bomberg, e.g., the Babylonian Talmud; Maimonides' Mishneh Torah. Jacob ben Ḥayyim felt that the first edition contained inaccuracies in the text, vocalization, and accentuation. Furthermore, it was not accurate enough concerning Masoretic issues. These matters were important to him especially because of his kabbalistic background. Though at first glance these were minor variants (e.g., plene-defective spelling), which did not affect the meaning of the text, in kabbalistic terms these were often of major importance. The kabbalists envisaged the Torah text as the name(s) of God, and any variant would thus cause damage to the name. Therefore, they venerated the work of the Masoretes in preserving the accurate text. So, too, the various unique phenomena of the biblical text, e.g., majuscular and minuscular letters, all had kabbalistic import; it was therefore, important to reproduce these, too, accurately in the Bible edition.

Using these kabbalistic arguments, Jacob ben Ḥayyim was able to convince Bomberg of the importance of undertaking a new Bible edition with the Masorah. Bomberg, as a Christian Hebraist (he had learned Hebrew from Pratensis), was aware of the newer phenomenon of Christian kabbalah (using the kabbalah for Christian purposes), and in fact wished to promote it. A few vestiges of the kabbalistic factor can be found in RB1525 itself. Thus, we find that Jacob ben Ḥayyim in his introduction to the edition explained the qere-ketiv in a kabbalistic vein; we find him bringing a few references to kabbalistic issues in the Masorah Parva; and we even find one note in the Masorah Magna (Exod. 10.5) where Jacob ben Ḥayyim uses the kabbalah as a criterion to decide between two conflicting masoretic notes.

RB1525 together with its Masoretic apparatus became the standard for the accurate Bible text for the next four centuries. This edition was reproduced again in Venice in 1548; 1568; 1618, and Basel 1618; and later in Amsterdam 1724; and still later in Warsaw 1860–1866.

The medium of print allowed this text to become the standard text (textus receptus), for now there was the ability to distribute one text in many copies among many geographical areas. Furthermore, now it was possible to refer to this work as a standard, even when suggesting that it must be modified. For example, Menahem di Lonzano's 'Or Torah (in: Shetei Yadot; Venice 1618) was devoted to corrections in the Torah, and Yedidya Norzi's Minḥat Shai (Mantua 1626; first published Mantua 1742–1744; and later republished e.g., in RB1860–1866; introduction—Vienna 1876) was devoted to corrections in the whole Bible. Both of these critics, following the lead of Ramah (Abulafia), and somewhat similar to Jacob ben Ḥayyim, used Sephardi manuscripts and Masoretic notes as their criteria of accuracy. Using these criteria they corrected various cases of textual variants, mostly plene-defective spelling, and certain cases of vocalization and accentuation. This corrected text, Jacob ben Ḥayyim-(Ramah)-Lonzano-Norzi, then became the textus receptus.

With time, this text also became the standard in Torah scrolls both for Sephardim and Ashkenazim. Only the Yemenites continued to follow the tradition of Maimonides (i.e., the Aleppo Codex). As it turned out, these two crystallizations (the joint text; the Yemenite text) are very close in the Torah, with only a few variants between them.

A new era in the printed Bible began with the Stuttgart 1937 edition of the Biblia Hebraica. Here P. Kahle abandoned the RB1525 text (which had still served C. D. Ginsburg in his London 1926 edition), and in its place used the text of manuscript Leningrad B19a (1008 CE), which belongs to the accurate Tiberian manuscripts. This manuscript is quite close to the Aleppo Codex, and in some cases is corrected to agree with it. (Kahle had wanted to reproduce the Aleppo Codex, the manuscript of Aharon ben Asher, then still in Aleppo, Syria, but was unable to do so.) Kahle also printed there for the first time the Masorah Parva (but not the Masorah Magna) of manuscript L.

The Aleppo Codex arrived in Israel in 1958 and became the spur for renewed activity in this field. It was chosen as the base text for the Hebrew University Bible Project's Bible edition, a critical edition of the Bible incorporating variants from the ancient translations, Dead Sea Scrolls, and rabbinic literature. So far, only a small part of this important edition, which also reproduces the Masorah Parva and the Masorah Magna in A, has appeared. In addition, various complete Bibles have appeared that are based on A (edited by M. Breuer); so, too, M. Cohen's CD Rom of the Bible (with vocalization and accentuation searchable; to be augmented in 2003 with both Masorahs of A, as well as a selection of medieval Jewish commentators), and his Miqra'ot Gedolot Ha-Keter (which will encompass the complete Bible [8 vols. to date], and which also reproduces the Masorah Parva and the Masorah Magna of A). All of these editions involve some reconstruction and conjecture, since the Aleppo Codex is now missing almost all of the Torah (except for the last eight chapters), as well as the end of the manuscript, and several leaves in between. This material is filled in by using Yemenite Torah manuscripts, which are believed to represent the Aleppo Codex closely, and the extant Masoretic notes from the Aleppo Codex. After 500 years of printing the Bible, we can thus turn back from the textus receptus based on Sefardi manuscripts to the accurate Tiberian manuscripts, and indeed to the most accurate of these manuscripts, the Aleppo Codex.

Using the many manuscript sources available today, it is now possible to trace the vicissitudes of the Bible from the era of Qumran to today. The earliest period shows significant textual variation, but by the second period, once one text-type was accepted, the many variants in the Bible manuscripts that continued to circulate were mostly of a minor nature. By the third period, the sanctity of the Bible text, as well as the apparatus of the Masorah, kept the biblical variants in a minor mode. This was even more the case in the fourth period, under the influence of printing, but most especially in the modern period, where ancient reliable manuscripts can be reproduced with great accuracy and disseminated widely. [JORDAN S. PENKOWER]

The Modern Study of the Bible

The Historical-Critical Method

General philosophical developments of the 17th and 18th centuries prompted an approach to the Bible that is often characterized as "critical." It was critical in the sense that it was free of presuppositions, especially those derived from either theology or tradition. To fully understand the Bible, scholars increasingly adopted an inductive approach, interpreting the Bible as they interpreted secular literature, setting aside received views of its authority and authorship. By and large, Jews, who continued to work within a traditional framework, did not participate in this early stage of critical scholarship. This critical approach, an outgrowth of attitudes fostered during the Enlightenment, was very much in the spirit of the times, and was, like other legacies of the Enlightenment, influenced by larger intellectual currents, such as Romanticism and the theory of evolution.

The overriding goal was historical: to determine what had actually taken place, and to recover the actual persons and events of the Bible as they had been preserved in the various stages of biblical tradition. The nature and development of these stages were to be understood through the historical-critical method. This was the aim of "higher criticism," as distinguished from "lower," or textual criticism (see "Textual Criticism," pp. 2067-2072). With its many subdisciplines, the historical-critical method dominated biblical interpretation through the mid-20th century and continues to be influential. The scholars whose work is surveyed in the following pages were immensely learned, often experts in a variety of fields, including philology, textual criticism, comparative literature, and the study of ancient Near Eastern cultures contemporaneous with the biblical traditions. Moreover, also in keeping with the intellectual mood of the 19th and early 20th centuries, they were optimistic, in retrospect even overconfident, operating on the assured conviction that with sufficient data and careful analysis of the data an objective, accurate, and complete understanding of the Bible was possible.

Source Criticism

The critical study of the Bible began in the 17th century with Hobbes, Spinoza, and Richard Simon, and continued to gain momentum during the Enlightenment. The emphasis was on history, and the way to get at history was to begin with a careful analysis of the sources. This was done, first of all, in the analysis of the Pentateuch (the term used by Christian scholars) into several literary strands. Jean Astruc had proposed in 1753 that the different names used for God in different parts of the book of Genesis were evidence of different sources that antedated the final composition of the book. Astruc's insight was elaborated and refined mainly by German scholars, especially W. M. L. de Wette and K. H. Graf, who extended the analysis of sources to the rest of the Pentateuch (and in some cases to the book of Joshua, leading to the term "Hexateuch"; see below).

The results of more than a century of this source criticism were brilliantly synthesized in 1878 by the German scholar Julius Wellhausen, in his book (Prolegomena to) The History of Israel. Wellhausen's goal, which he never completed, was to write a history of ancient Israel, especially its religion. He followed an evolutionary model, arguing that the religion of Israel had developed in three stages, from a primitive, spontaneous phase in the era before the monarchy, to its high point in an ethical monotheism, from which it degenerated into a sterile legalism (this reflected a Christian view of rabbinic Judaism). To support this reconstruction he engaged in a careful analysis of the biblical traditions, and, drawing especially on the earlier work of de Wette and Graf, gave the classic formulation to what is called the Documentary Hypothesis. According to the Documentary Hypothesis as elaborated by Wellhausen, the Hexateuch was an unreliable source for reconstructing the history of the time periods it narrated, but the "sources" that comprised it, identified as J, E, D, and P, were datable and important evidence for the periods in which they were compiled. These "documents," reconstructed from the Hexateuch in its current form, were hypothetical constructs, that is, they did not now exist as separate documents, but they were the best explanation of the evidence—the parallels, repetitions, and inconsistencies in the final form of the Hexateuch.

Wellhausen's historical reconstruction is clearly a product of its time, and reflects the biases of the late 19th century. His view of early Israel as a fresh, undefiled religious spirit has a Romantic flavor, and his characterization of postexilic Judaism as a decline into dead legalism has an anti-Semitic cast, which caused Jewish scholars to ignore it or to polemicize against it. But his formulation of the Documentary Hypothesis became a classic statement, the theory that subsequent scholars up to the present have built upon, accepted, modified, or rejected. Though the exact contours of the sources identified by Wellhausen and his simplistic reconstruction of their development are rejected by many, the general picture that he popularized—the image of the Hexateuch developing through the combination of different strands from different periods—is widely accepted by biblical scholars.

Source criticism was not an end in itself, but a method to be used in historical reconstruction for the entire Bible. It recognized the inherent complexity of biblical traditions, and attempted to disentangle the prior stages of their development. Among the many significant results of source criticism was the recognition that the book of Isaiah is a composite work. The isolated insights of earlier scholars, including Rabbi Abraham Ibn Ezra in the 12th century, and J. G. Eichhorn and others in the 18th, were expanded and elaborated in the commentary on Isaiah by Bernhard Duhm in 1892, who argued that the book of Isaiah was in effect an anthology spanning several centuries. A similar argument was developed concerning Jeremiah, suggesting that a poetic core by the prophet was supplemented by prose sections authored under the influence of Deuteronomy. The same was found to be true of other biblical books, such that almost all of the traditional authorship ascribed by rabbinic and church tradition was questioned.

The Recovery of the Ancient World

The recovery of extensive written remains from the ancient Near East coincided with the development of the disciplines of anthropology, sociology, linguistics, and folklore. Both new data and new methods were applied to the Bible, resulting in works of extraordinary insight, and, in retrospect, often of a certain naïvete. As a result of these discoveries, which helped to place ancient Israel within the ancient Near Eastern world, Biblical studies, however labeled, became a subject not just in theological curricula, but a discipline recognized in larger university contexts as well, often as part of religious studies or ancient Near Eastern studies, and later, also as part of Jewish Studies.

The process of recovery began with the deciphering of ancient Egyptian hieroglyphic writing in the early 19th century, made possible when a member of Napoleon's army, in Egypt in 1799, discovered the Rosetta Stone. The vast literature of Egypt was opened up, including valuable historical texts that provided synchronisms with biblical data relating especially to the first millennium BCE, and provided the basis for what would eventually be a comprehensive absolute chronology of the ancient Near East. Egyptian literature also provided parallels to such biblical genres as love poetry and wisdom literature.

In the mid-19th century, British and French explorers began to unearth hundreds of thousands of cuneiform texts in Mesopotamia, and these too were rapidly deciphered, giving access to the literature and written remains of ancient Babylonia, Assyria, and Persia. Like the Egyptian texts, they could often be correlated with biblical history. But their impact on biblical studies was more profound. In 1872, George Smith, working in the British Museum, discovered on one of the tablets that had been sent to London a flood narrative remarkably similar to the account in Genesis. While some took this as a simple historical confirmation of the flood, it soon became clear that the biblical account was a literary descendant of earlier Mesopotamian accounts. Further discoveries provided many other parallels between Babylonian and Israelite literature, law, institutions, and beliefs, and in most cases Babylonia again appeared to be the source. Sparked by a series of lectures by the German Assyriologist Friedrich Delitzsch in 1902–1904, a heated controversy developed, pitting "Babel" against the Bible. Ultimately many of the simplistic conclusions concerning the priority, and the superiority, of the traditions of "Babel" were rejected, and in retrospect they seem clearly anti-Semitic. But the controversy not only marks the emergence of Assyriology (the study of the cultures of ancient Mesopotamia) as an independent discipline, but also established the importance of a wide variety of nonbiblical materials for the understanding of the Bible.

Form Criticism

While source criticism became a dominant interpretive method, the influx of nonbiblical data, along with the rise of folklore and a growing awareness of oral literature, prompted a more nuanced investigation of the prehistory of the written biblical traditions. The pioneer in this work was the German scholar Hermann Gunkel (1862–1932), perhaps the most influential biblical interpreter of the 20th century. While accepting Wellhausen's analysis as valid, Gunkel incorporated evidence both from Babylonian literature and from comparative folklore to propose a shift in emphasis from history to the history of literature. Prior to the formation of the Hexateuchal "documents" there was discernible a long process of development and transmission of "forms," or genres, which both had parallels in nonbiblical sources, and, coincidentally, were vehicles for preserving very ancient traditions. These forms have their own history and diachronic continuity, and similarities across cultures.

Central to form-critical method was the identification of the Sitz im Leben ("setting in life"), the original and subsequent contexts in which the forms were developed and used. Gunkel applied form criticism himself to the book of Genesis, in his commentary first published in 1901, where he isolated such forms as saga, legend, taunt, curse, hymn, etiology, and proverb. His studies on the Psalms (1928–1933) were also groundbreaking, setting the terms of the discussion for the rest of the century by his classification of the various genres (hymn, individual and communal laments, individual and communal thanksgivings, royal psalms, wisdom psalms, etc.). Although there is a kind of idealism about the definition of the forms, parallels from outside the Bible confirmed their applicability and enhanced the understanding of the particulars of biblical traditions.

Archeology

Serious exploration of the Levant began in the early 19th century, and notable advances were made in mapping the region and in identifying ancient sites. In the decades before World War I extensive, and by the standards of the time scientific, excavations were undertaken by British, German, French, and American archeologists. Attention was focused on the major cities of ancient Israel, and Jerusalem, Samaria, Megiddo, Shechem, Jericho, Taanach, and Gezer were all partially excavated. An overriding preoccupation of the excavators was historical, even apologetic: to verify, by independent data, the historicity of biblical traditions.

In the 1920s and 1930s many more projects were initiated, and excavation techniques were improved. Greater accuracy in dating excavated remains became possible through the refinement of ceramic typology, especially as elaborated by the American scholar W. F. Albright in his excavations at Tel Beit Mirsim. But very little of the vast amount of material that was excavated and published could be related directly to the Bible, and debates often ensued about how to synthesize archeological and biblical data. When work resumed in the 1950s and 1960s, new projects were undertaken and many sites that had been earlier, and fortunately only partially, excavated were redug, especially by British, American, and Israeli archeologists. In part because of the flood of material from periods long before and after biblical times or with little direct relevance to the Bible, archeology began to develop as an independent discipline, as had already happened in the study of the classical world. More attention was given to what archeology actually produced, the material culture of the region in various periods, and in some circles there developed a theoretical tension between archeology and biblical studies.

Many earlier archeologists were also biblical scholars. Now, more and more archeologists were acquiring interest and expertise in periods and regions not directly relevant to biblical history, and in methodologies (like urban planning and soil analysis) that were far removed from the methods for studying the Bible. The result, by the late 20th century, was that some archeologists lacked sufficient textual and historical expertise to connect what they excavated with the written sources, and in any case, they considered it a virtue to work independently of biblical scholarship. On their part, many biblical scholars simply ignored the potential contributions of archeology to the interpretation of the Bible, a situation exacerbated by the fact that, at the end of the 20th and the beginning of the 21st centuries, several archeologists, in a reversal of the Albrightean school, became interested in showing how the archeological record conflicts with the Bible. Thus, a century after the beginning of serious archeological study of ancient Israel, the relation between the biblical text and archeological finds remains problematic.

Ethnography, Sociology, and Anthropology

As explorers and archeologists began to make the ancient Near East known, they also observed those living there in the present. While many of the descriptions published were little more than naïve catalogues of perceived parallels between Arab customs and details of life in biblical times, there were serious works of scholarship, including W. Robertson Smith's Lectures on the Religion of the Semites (1889) and Gustaf Dalman's extensive survey of Palestinian social life and customs (Arbeit [work] und Sitte [customs] in Palästina, 1928–1939). At the same time, the disciplines of sociology and anthropology were becoming more sophisticated. An early sociological interpretation of the Bible was Max Weber's Ancient Judaism (1917–1919), though sociological studies of the Bible began to proliferate only in the late 20th century.

Anthropological research had an earlier impact. Typical of early efforts was the encyclopedic work of James G. Frazer. In The Golden Bough: A Study in Comparative Religion (1890; revised and abridged by Theodor Gaster in 1959), and subsequent works, such as Folklore in the Old Testament (1919), Frazer organized a staggering amount of data in support of his understanding of the evolution of society from primitive beginnings to civilization. His principal focus was on myth and rituals, especially the essential role of the king in the welfare of the larger society, and he included both the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament in his analysis.

While Frazer's work was subsequently criticized for its failure to pay sufficient attention to specific cultural contexts and for his cavalier treatment of the data to fit his theories, his influence was considerable. In particular, both in Britain and in Scandinavia, many scholars developed and refined his approach, developing what has been characterized as a "myth and ritual" school. The work of Sigmund Mowinckel of Norway is representative. Using form criticism as a method (he had been a student of Gunkel) and the function of the king as an organizing principle, and drawing heavily on Babylonian sources, his study of the Psalms (1921–1924) focused on their use in what he suggested was an annual enthronement festival of God, like the Babylonian New Year festival. Most scholars now find Mowinckel's reconstruction overly conjectural.

Redaction Criticism

The impression left by source criticism was that the final forms of the Pentateuch and other biblical books or collections for which multiple sources were hypothesized were pedestrian compilations with little literary merit. Beginning in the 1930s, again mainly in Germany, attention began to be paid to the larger units as creative works in their own right. In a number of influential essays, and in his commentaries on Genesis and Deuteronomy, Gerhard von Rad argued that the Hexateuch (the Pentateuch plus Joshua) was itself a literary form. This observation was extended at the end of the 20th century, as a variety of scholars posited structural and thematic patterns that were used by redactors to create a finely crafted, aesthetic final product. Ultimately these discoveries helped to influence a branch of biblical scholarship called Canonical Criticism (see below), which emphasized the role of the text in its final form within the canon as a whole. They also bore some relationship to the newly developing literary approaches to the Bible, which also emphasized the final form of the text, its coherence, and its aesthetic merits.

Discoveries of Texts between the World Wars

The discovery and deciphering of cuneiform texts of ancient Assyria and Babylonia during the second half of the 19th century had profoundly changed the understanding of the Bible. On the historical level, the repeated references especially in Assyrian annals to kings of Israel and Judah and to events mentioned in the Bible enabled the construction of a detailed chronology. But for the most part connections between the cuneiform texts and biblical traditions were indirect. This is not surprising, given the distance and often the time that separated those Mesopotamian cultures from ancient Israel. And apart from a scattering of inscriptions in Hebrew, Phoenician, Aramaic, and Moabite, there were no significant written remains from Israel itself or its most immediate neighbors. That changed in the 1920s and 1930s, as excavations uncovered more collections of ancient texts, and further deciphering shed light on more distant groups such as the Sumerians, the Hittites, and the Hurrians. While there were seldom direct correlations with the Bible, the tablets from Nuzi in northern Iraq and Mari and Ugarit in northern Syria were especially important in expanding the knowledge of the larger world to which ancient Israel belonged.

In many respects the mythological texts from Ugarit are the most important because of their geographical proximity to ancient Israel and the direct light they shed on the Bible. Written in a previously unknown Semitic language belonging to the same subfamily as Hebrew, they are composed in poetry that is often remarkably close in diction and in form to biblical poetry. The myths feature gods and goddesses such as El, Baal, and Asherah, all frequently mentioned in the Bible but hitherto incompletely known, largely because of the biblical writers' antagonism toward other gods. Moreover, similar motifs—for example, the childless patriarch, the theophany of the storm god, the council of the gods, the sacred mountain—and innumerable smaller details illustrate the shared commonalities between the culture of Israel and those of its neighbors. Despite undeniable chronological and geographical discontinuities, the literary, religious, and institutional traditions of the Levant, including ancient Israel, are best understood as part of a cultural continuum that, allowing for local particularities, is remarkably consistent and pervasive.

The Dead Sea Scrolls

Another discovery that sent scholarship in new directions was that of a cache of manuscripts in caves near Qumran at the northwest corner of the Dead Sea (see "The Bible in the Dead Sea Scrolls," pp. 192–28). Over the course of several years, beginning in 1947, the remains of hundreds of manuscripts were discovered, first by local Bedouin and subsequently by archeologists. Some of the manuscripts were largely intact, including an almost complete scroll of the Hebrew text of the book of Isaiah, and others were preserved only in fragments. Written mostly in Hebrew and Aramaic, with a few in Greek, they are generally agreed to have been a library deposited in the caves for safekeeping during the First Jewish Revolt (66–73 CE) by the inhabitants of the nearby settlement. Most scholars identify these inhabitants as Essenes, one of the major groups within Judaism in the Roman period, according to the 1st-century CE Jewish historian Josephus. Among many important aspects of the scrolls, three may be highlighted here. First are the manuscripts of the Bible, more than a thousand years older than any previously known, giving new evidence concerning the history of the biblical text and greater impetus to text criticism and the history of canonization (see above). Second is their contribution to the understanding of both Hebrew and Aramaic in the Roman period, and the histories of these two biblical languages. And third is the glimpse they provide of one community within Judaism around the turn of the era. Through what have been termed "sectarian documents," that is, various community regulations, hymns, eschatological texts, and biblical commentaries (peshtarim; see "The Bible in the Dead Sea Scrolls," pp. 192–28)—we learn the beliefs and practices of this one group and we get insight into how they used and interpreted various books of the Bible. It turns out that the variety of early Judaisms and the early history of the textual transmission and interpretation of the Bible are much more complex than earlier imagined.

The Historical-Critical Method through 1950

Various aspects of the historical-critical method, which aimed to reconstruct the history of ancient Israel and the history of the biblical text, were immensely influential through much of the 20th century, and they continue to serve as the basis of much scholarship. However, with the change in intellectual currents at the end of the second millennium, the consensus that the historical-critical method was the only legitimate method began to fragment, and it ultimately shattered with the proliferation of new methods and approaches for investigating biblical texts. Beginning in the 1970s many biblical scholars have questioned the adequacy of an almost exclusive orientation to questions with a historical focus. Also, in keeping with a trend characteristic of most of the humanities and social sciences, there has been a strong movement toward interdisciplinary conversation. Although it is difficult to give a simple overview of the proliferating approaches to biblical studies since the 1970s, they can be roughly grouped under the categories of literary, social-scientific, and cultural hermeneutical approaches.

Literary Approaches

A popular appreciation of the narrative art of the Bible has always existed. Its stories were represented in the sculpture and stained-glass windows of medieval churches, and Western literature has been profoundly influenced by its characters, themes, and symbols. In both Judaism and Christianity the reading and retelling of the stories in devotional and liturgical contexts made them deeply familiar. Yet even though biblical Hebrew poetry had been the subject of academic study since the 18th century (most notably in Bishop Robert Lowth's Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews), little attention had been paid to the poetics of biblical narrative. One impetus to the interest in biblical narrative that developed in the 1970s can be traced to a development in American higher education: the creation of departments of religious studies in non-denominational colleges and public universities in the 1960s and 1970s. In such contexts the study of the Bible "as literature" was deemed especially appropriate to a secular curriculum. Such interest was not restricted to scholars in secular contexts, however. In 1968 James Muilenberg, who for much of his career had been a professor at Union Theological Seminary, delivered a presidential address to the Society of Biblical Literature titled "Form Criticism and Beyond." In this lecture he called for a type of literary-theological approach to the poetry and prose of the Bible which he referred to as "rhetorical criticism." Giving further impetus to literary study of the Bible was the work of several scholars of English and comparative literature, who extended their expertise in the analysis of literature to biblical texts. Most prominent were Northrop Frye (The Great Code: The Bible and Literature) and Robert Alter (The Art of Biblical Narrative and The Art of Biblical Poetry). Much work was done in this area in Israel, especially by Meir Weiss in Jerusalem (The Bible from Within) and his students, as well as scholars who were influenced by the work of Meir Sternberg (The Poetics of Biblical Narrative) and his circle at Tel-Aviv.

This literary approach differed from historical study in significant ways. Whereas historical study tended to be concerned with the prehistory of the text (oral traditions and written source materials) and with its development through successive redactions, literary study focused on the final form of the text. Whereas historical study was interested in the world referred to by the text, literary study directed its attention to the world constructed in the text. Nevertheless, there were certain historical dimensions to this early work in biblical literature. Both Alter and Meir Sternberg attempted to isolate distinctive features of ancient Israelite narrative art (e.g., modes of characterization, the use of type-scenes, techniques of repetition, forms of plot development) which set the Bible apart from modern Western narrative.

Much of the early literary study of the Bible was influenced by the "New Criticism," an approach that had dominated Anglo-American literary scholarship from the 1930s through the 1950s. In New Criticism the literary text was considered an autonomous work of art, an "artifact," to be studied independently of its author's intentions and of the sociopolitical currents of the time in which it was produced. New Criticism was a reaction both to a methodology arising out of the history of literature, in which new literary movements are seen as developing from those of previous eras, and to biographical criticism, which reads literary texts as expressions of the life experiences of the writers. The focus in New Criticism is rather on the way in which the text itself is structured so as to produce the observed or expected effects and understandings. Thus, the plot, characters, setting, point of view, and other aspects of the story's rhetoric are analyzed. As the literary study of the Bible was gaining ground, however, rapid changes were taking place in the larger field of literary study, changes that were quickly reflected in biblical studies.

Structuralism was the first of these new movements to make its impact. The origins of structuralism are in the work of the early 20th-century linguist Ferdinand de Saussure, who attempted to analyze the system of relationships within a language that make acts of speech possible. In particular, he stressed that meanings are produced not so much by simple definition as by a network of contrasts (e.g., a tree is a woody plant that is not a bush or a shrub). The anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss argued that symbolic structures within human societies, including their kinship systems and their mythologies, could be analyzed in the same way, as systems of differences structured according to binary oppositions (e.g., life/death; male/female; hunting/farming; outside/inside). In a parallel development A. J. Greimas attempted to use Saussure's insights to develop a "grammar" of narrative in much the same way as Saussure attempted to develop a grammar of sentences. Biblical scholars, anthropologists, and literary theorists were quick to apply these approaches to the Bible. The mythic narratives and genealogical accounts of Genesis, and the legal material in the Torah offered opportunities for analyzing the patterns of binary opposition that structuralists argued were the key to the meaning of the texts.

Even as structuralism was being adapted for the study of biblical literature, its assumptions and claims were being challenged in the wider world of philosophical and literary studies. Structuralism claimed that the binary oppositions that structure human thought are essentially universal and unaffected by culture or history. Though the surface features of texts might vary with different societies and over time, the underlying structures did not. Such claims proved difficult to sustain. Just as structuralism dispensed with history, so it also had no place for the individual reader in the production of meaning. Structuralism understood itself as a kind of scientific method. Yet different readers regularly reached different understandings of the same text. Finally, though structuralism seemed to lend itself well to myths, folktales, laws, and highly formulaic narratives, it seemed unable to deal with more complex narratives.

Against the focus on a supposedly objective and stable text in narrative criticism and against structuralism's focus on impersonal and universal codes, reader-response criticism argued for the essential role of the reader in the process of making meaning. Structuralism tended to display its results in terms of charts, an implicitly spatial understanding of the text. But reader-response theory insisted that reading is essentially a temporal affair. In reading, one only gradually gathers information that is progressively organized and reorganized by the reader to produce meaning.

Moreover, the text often contains "gaps" which the reader, consciously or unconsciously, fills in (e.g., details concerning characters, aspects of motivation or causality, connections between events). As the reader becomes actively involved in the process of reading, what the reader engages is not simply the issues of plot and character but also matters of norms and values, which the reader may embrace or resist. Reader-response criticism thus accounts for the different understandings of and reactions to the "same" text by different readers by claiming a necessary place for the subjective element in reading. Personal subjectivity is limited, however, by what the reader's community considers to be a plausible or implausible inference. Thus it is not so much individual readers as "interpretive communities" who set the parameters according to which interpretation takes place. Although a number of reader-response studies of Hebrew Bible texts have been produced, the method found its most enthusiastic reception in the study of the New Testament Gospels, where texts can be dated with greater precision, and we know more about the early communities that produced them.

If reader-response criticism represented one reaction to the limitations of traditional narratology and to structuralism, a more pervasive criticism emerged under the rubric of post-structuralism, or deconstruction. This movement, associated with the French philosopher Jacques Derrida, is above all a critique of the metaphysical assumptions of Western philosophy, and only secondarily an analysis of the nature of texts and the interpretive process. Derrida noted the attempt of philosophy to posit a central term (God, reason, the human being) in relation to which all of reality can be organized. This organization characteristically takes place by means of binary oppositions (e.g., rational/irrational, oral/written, presence/absence), in which the first term is accepted as superior to the second. Deconstruction attempts to dismantle such structures in order to show their articiality and the inevitable ways in which any such structure of thought implicitly "decenters" its central term and undermines itself through internal inconsistency and contradiction. When applied to texts, deconstruction begins with the perception that language is inevitably incomplete and surprisingly fluid. (In this respect it resembles rabbinic midrash.) It then analyzes how even a text's ostensible argument is rendered problematic and even self-contradictory by extraneous details or slippages in meaning which at first appear peripheral and unimportant. For deconstruction the point of reading is not to restate the meaning intended by the author but, like many midrashic texts, to engage the text in creative thought, often by means of punning play with the text. Deconstruction's very style serves to undermine the binary opposition serious/frivolous, for its aim is in part to uncover the ways in which various forms of thought attempt to inscribe power and privilege.

The perspectives of deconstruction have been combined with other intellectual currents (most notably Freudianism and Marxism) to produce a variety of related approaches that are often referred to comprehensively by the term postmodernism. Along with Derrida's deconstruction, Michel Foucault's study of the complex nature of power and truth and Fredric Jameson's neo-Marxist analysis of ideology have been deeply influential on postmodernism in biblical studies. For an overview of these trends as well as other forms of postmodernism, see The Postmodern Bible by The Bible and Culture Collective.

Since one of the features of postmodernism is its tendency to dissolve boundaries, it is scarcely surprising that its characteristic approaches have combined with a wide variety of other impulses within biblical studies, most notably feminist criticism, but also various forms of ideological criticism (see below under cultural hermeneutics). Similarly, postmodern analysis is not restricted to narrative but employed in relation to all sorts of texts. Indeed, the self-conscious study of the literary artistry of the Bible, such a controversial novelty in 1970, has been all but put aside in the rapidly shifting mix of methods and approaches that have been developed alongside the classical forms of biblical interpretation.

Social-scientific Criticism

Social-scientific criticism, another form of biblical criticism that has arisen in more recent years, applies insights and methods from the fields of sociology, anthropology, and ethnography to describe aspects of ancient social life manifested in the biblical texts and to reconstruct the social worlds behind the text. To a certain extent historical criticism has always had a social dimension, since the objects of its interest included nations, states, social groupings, and religious movements. Yet self-conscious social-scientific investigation, though not unknown in earlier stages of biblical studies, has come into its own since the 1960s.

As early as the Renaissance, students of the Bible were concerned to make cross-cultural comparisons between ancient Israel and the nations of the ancient Near East. With the development of critical biblical study in the 19th century, this interest in cross-cultural study focused particularly on the comparison between Israel and the pre-Islamic Bedouin Arabs, as well as with contemporary Bedouin society, especially in the work of Julius Wellhausen and William Robertson Smith. Similarly, Martin Noth compared Israel's premonarchical tribal confederacy with ancient Greek tribal leagues. In retrospect, these early attempts at social-scientific analysis were hampered by a lack of rigorous method, by erroneous assumptions about the economic and social organization of ancient Israel, and by an overly static model of ancient culture. More sophisticated was the work of the sociologist Max Weber, whose Ancient Judaism (compiled from lectures given in 1917–1919) attempted to incorporate the dimensions of historical and institutional change in his account of the social organization of ancient Israel. Certain features of Weber's analysis, such as viewing some prophets as "charismatic" figures, continue to be influential within biblical studies.

These early attempts at social-scientific criticism were largely displaced by interest in other questions and methods, and for almost forty years little was published in this field. By the 1960s and 1970s, however, interest in it revived. The first issue to be examined, and one still sharply debated, is that of the socioeconomic and political nature of the formation of the Israelite tribal confederacy. Social historians rejected the conquest model of Israel's entry into Canaan as it is described in the biblical narrative. Both George Mendenhall and Norman Gottwald argued that Israel's origins were to be sought instead in a peasant revolt against urban Canaanite overlords. The peasant movement was a revolt against the hierarchical socioeconomic structure and developed as a retribalization along egalitarian lines in the central highlands. What differentiated Mendenhall and Gottwald, however, was Gottwald's explicit use of Marxist social theory. Although both of their proposals have been sharply criticized for reliance more on presupposed models than on textual or material evidence, they served to open the question of Israel's origins for fresh investigation. Since the 1970s archeology has also generated increasing information concerning population patterns, forms of domestic architecture, agricultural practices, and trade patterns for the period preceding the monarchy. This information, together with a wider array of possible comparative models for the development of noncentralized peasant societies, has begun to generate new ways of understanding early Israel, though none has yet achieved consensus. Unlike the earlier studies, which concentrated on comparisons with Middle Eastern peoples, these newer studies looked at a variety of groups that were distant from Israel, but believed to have similar social structures.

Similarly, attempts to understand the movement from a loose tribal confederation to the eventual formation of royal states has been aided by comparative social analysis. Social anthropologists have documented the development of chieftanships as an intermediate stage between these two forms of social organization. A chiefdom is a hierarchically organized society that lacks the strong central governmental apparatus characteristic of a true state. Though some aspects of the process are still debated, it is now generally thought that Saul's "kingship" and at least the early stages of David's rule should be thought of as chieftanships.

Prophecy is another area of Israel's religious and social life that has proven fruitful for social-scientific analysis. In addition to looking at prophetic oracles recovered from neighboring nations, the biblical texts have been analyzed in light of sociological models and comparative ethnographic evidence. Though the limited evidence makes many conclusions elusive, it has proven possible to clarify to a certain extent the social location of the prophets and their relationship or nonrelationship to established religious institutions and to the monarchy. How a prophet secures legitimation, the role of ecstasy and other phenomena of abnormally heightened consciousness, and the relation of oral and written communication have all been examined in social-scientific perspective. The later development of apocalypticism and the question of its social location—whether it was, for example, an outgrowth of prophecy, a scribal phenomenon, or a movement of the social margins or of the priestly elite—has been debated as the biblical texts are reread in light of apocalyptic and millenarian movements in the medieval and modern periods.

The biblical text also contains significant information about purity laws and kinship and family patterns, topics which lend themselves to comparative social analysis. In the 1960s the anthropologist Mary Douglas pioneered such studies with her analysis of the food laws in Leviticus and Deuteronomy, interpreting them as a symbolic system for organizing the world and correlating purity laws in general with the social concern for boundaries. There is currently a growing interest in purity and impurity, especially as it pertains to women, and in general as it relates to the social and religious dimensions of ancient Israel. More recently the narratives in Genesis, the family laws in Deuteronomy, and the reports on the postexilic community in Ezra-Nehemiah have been investigated in an attempt to discern the basic structures of family organization, as well as changes over time in the patterns of family life. As modern interest in gender constructs and roles has grown, so has the investigation of such issues in ancient Israel. Through the application of social-science theory, especially theories of gender, to the texts of the Bible, and in some cases also calling on the findings of archeology, we are learning more about the patterns of life and activity characteristic of males and females in biblical times.

Cultural Hermeneutics

Modern biblical studies, as it emerged from its Enlightenment roots, understood itself as a form of critical analysis that was objective, disinterested, and even "scientific." Though biblical theology might make normative claims, even those claims were based on a preliminary act of interpretation that was grounded in objective scholarship. In recent years the claim of biblical scholarship to be a quasi-scientific enterprise has been questioned by those who insist that the enterprise of historical criticism of the Bible is unconsciously shaped and informed by cultural assumptions specific to the time and place in which that method was developed. Pure objectivity is an illusion. In the interpretation of texts and cultures there is no "view from nowhere." All interpreters, whether or not they are aware of it, frame their questions and perceive the data from some perspective, which helps to shape their understanding of the text or culture in question. Rather than seeing the influence of the interpreter's social and cultural location as a problem, some have claimed it as a positive value. Thus the term "cultural hermeneutics" serves as an umbrella term for a variety of approaches to biblical interpretation (e.g., liberationist, feminist, postcolonial) in which the social location of the interpreter is not only made explicit but serves as a normative principle in interpretation. The primary categories which have figured in such interpretation are those of class, ethnicity, and gender.

The earliest and most methodologically self-conscious of these approaches is that of Latin American liberation theology, which emerged in the 1960s and 1970s. This approach did not begin as an academic perspective but rather emerged out of the concrete experience of the poor and of those pastors and other religious professionals who lived and worked with them. They insisted that the starting point for reading and interpreting the Bible must not be a stance of "objectivity" but rather the experience of the crushing poverty and oppression of the lowest social classes. Interpreted from the perspective of material poverty, the Bible discloses itself as a text of liberation and serves to further a revolutionary process of emancipation. The exodus narrative and various prophets have been key texts within this movement. In the wake of Latin American liberation hermeneutics, religious communities and academics in the various countries of Africa and Asia have developed analogous forms of biblical interpretation that work from the particular experiences of those nations. These are sometimes grouped under the rubric of postcolonial hermeneutics. Much of this work has taken place within the Christian community, and it has not had a widespread impact on general or specifically Jewish biblical studies. However, in light of the trend to validate the ways in which different ethnic or racial communities read the Bible, Jewish scholars are looking to their traditional modes of biblical interpretation. Traditional Jewish exegesis, examined from a scholarly perspective, is increasingly appearing on the interpretive scene, and has gained some attention among non-Jewish scholars.

Whereas, for the most part, the various perspectives discussed so far under the rubric of cultural hermeneutics are distinctively Christian, the same cannot be said for feminist biblical hermeneutics. Here, although Christian feminist biblical interpretation emerged slightly earlier, Jewish and Christian feminist interpretation has largely developed in tandem, and the critical conversation between Jewish and Christian feminists has been one of the distinctive features of this movement (see "Jewish Women's Scholarly Writings on the Bible," pp. 2000–2005). In the 1950s and 1960s Protestant seminaries began to admit women in significantly larger numbers than before, followed soon after by an increase in the number of Catholic and Jewish women pursuing seminary education. The emergence of the women's movement in the 1960s and its criticism of the role of the Bible in the oppression of women posed a challenge to those who identified themselves as both Christian or Jewish and feminist. One early position is to affirm that the Bible, when correctly interpreted, affirms women's full humanity. Other feminists, more critical of the Bible itself, have attempted to expose and analyze the patriarchal elements in the biblical text itself in order to show how the patriarchal values can be separated from the essentially liberating values that form its primary message. More radical feminists, however, have attempted to show that the biblical traditions are thoroughly and irredeemably anti-feminist.

Feminist interpretation of the Bible has embraced a variety of methodologies. Some of it utilizes the approaches of historical-critical and sociological biblical scholarship, since it attempts to recover and reconstruct the historical reality of women's lives in ancient Israel.

Not all feminist interpretation has been concerned with historical reconstruction, however. A significant strand of feminism has used literary methods, exploring the ways in which biblical texts construct and represent an image of women that may function in the service of particular ideologies. In many instances this literary approach has involved reading against the grain of the text. For instance, a character whom the text treats as a subsidiary character may become for feminist analysis the central character of the text (e.g., Jephthah's daughter in Judg. ch 11 or the Levite's concubine in Judg. ch 19). Of particular concern to feminists has been the issue of women and violence, for many of the biblical texts do represent violence against women, and a smaller but significant number represent women engaged in violence. The influence of these various types of feminist approaches to the Bible has been significant, and has had an important impact on how both scholars and the laity approach biblical texts.

Finally, canonical criticism, which often describes itself as a theological mode of interpretation, may also be considered as a form of cultural hermeneutics, since it also puts the community context within which the text was created and from which it is to be read into the foreground. Though the forms of canonical criticism developed by its two major proponents, Brevard Childs and James Sanders, differ, one can identify common elements. Specifically, canonical criticism is concerned with how Scripture's final form was created within a believing community and how the meanings created by that final form continue to guide the reading practices of the community. The canonical shaping of the Jewish Bible, for instance—which places the writings in the final position and concludes in many editions with the call of 2 Chronicles for the exiles to go up to Jerusalem to rebuild the Temple—tells a different story from that produced by the shaping of the Christian Old Testament, which places the prophets last and concludes with Malachi's reference to the return of the prophet Elijah to announce the coming Day of the Lord.

In one sense canonical criticism is an extension of historical criticism's interest in the development of traditions. But in contrast to historical criticism's tendency to investigate the earliest stages of development, canonical criticism explicitly privileges the latest stage, the canon in its final form. This concern with reading the text of Scripture in its final form gives canonical criticism some similarity to the literary approaches of the "New Criticism." Thus, where historical criticism, reading the book of Isaiah, tries to distinguish which materials come from the 8th-century prophet, the 6th-century prophet, and the 5th-century prophet, literary and canonical critics focus on how the final form of the book has created the context within which all of its materials are now to be read, as a movement from destruction to hope. While canonical criticism's self-conscious attention to what it means to read Scripture as a member of a religious tradition links it with cultural hermeneutics, it also differs from some of the other forms of cultural hermeneutics discussed above. Just as those forms of interpretation make repeated reference to the specific experience of the reader as a guide to interpretation, canonical hermeneutics finds the clues to a proper reading in the ways in which the text of Scripture was shaped by the believing community at the time its canon was fixed.

If anything ties together the various strands of newly developing approaches to biblical interpretation, it is a concern for the relationship of language, meaning, and power. More historically oriented literary and social methods increasingly examine the ways in which issues of conflict and access to power can be traced, as there is a new awareness that people, typically elites functioning within a power-group, are responsible for writing and preserving biblical texts. Cultural hermeneutics, though not uninterested in historical reconstruction, also focuses on the ways in which access to the power to interpret the text and construe its meaning serves to empower those who have traditionally been marginalized. And postmodernism has attempted to underscore the ironies of all such strategies, since in its view a stable and definitive meaning always eludes the interpreter.

[Adapted by ADELE BERLIN AND MARC ZVI BRETTLER]

Reading Biblical Poetry

Most literary works from the ancient Near East are in the form of poetry. Prose narrative, which dominates in the Torah and the Former Prophets, as well as in several books in Kethuvim (the Writings), is a distinguishing feature of biblical literature. Yet while biblical narrative is mainly in prose (there are a few narrative poems, e.g., Ps. 136), biblical hymns, laments, victory songs, love poems, wisdom instruction, prophetic speeches, and several other types of discourse are in poetry. About one-third of the Bible is poetry, including the books of Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Lamentations, and Ecclesiastes. Modern scholars also consider most of the speeches of the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, the Twelve) to be poetry. In addition to these large blocks of text, poems are interspersed in the prose narrative; examples are the Testament of Jacob (Gen. ch 49), the Song of the Sea (Exod. ch 15), the Sayings of Balaam (Num. 23.7–10, 18–24; 24.3–9, 15–24), the Song of Moses (Deut. ch 32), the Testament of Moses (Deut. ch 33), the Song of Deborah (Judg. ch 5), the Prayer of Hannah (1 Sam. ch 2), the Elegy over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. ch 1), and David's Song in 2 Sam. ch 22 (= Ps. 18). Shorter poems or fragments of poems have been identified in, for example, Gen. 4.23–24; 1 Kings 8.12–13; Ruth 1.16–17.

Poetry is a form of elevated discourse that differs in certain formal properties from prose (which is also somewhat elevated discourse, not a record of everyday speech). Some argue that these differences are a matter of degree rather than of kind, but at a certain point quantitative difference becomes qualitative difference. The attributes of poetry will be discussed below.

The identification of biblical poetry and the definition of what constitutes poetry in the Bible has been a vexed issue since early post-biblical times. Each generation of scholars has applied its own criteria, usually drawn from its own vernacular poetry, be it the classical meters of Greek and Latin poetry, the medieval Arabic systems of rhyme and meter, or the accentual meter of English poetry—but none of these fit biblical poetry. The Bible itself has little to say about its poetry, other than offering some terms that may indicate types of poems.

The most general term is shir or shira, "song." Shir may stand alone, as in Judg. 5.12; Ps. 65.1, or may be qualified, as in shir hama'alot, "song of ascents" (Pss. 120–134); shir yedidot, "a love song" (Ps. 45.1); shir hanukat habayit "a song for the dedication of the House" (Ps. 30.1); shir tziyon, "Zion song" (Ps. 137.3); shir tehilah, "song of praise" (Neh. 12.46). The feminine form, shira, is found in Exod. 15.1; Deut. 31.30; Num. 21.17; Isa. 5.1; and elsewhere, and appears to be synonymous with shir. Another frequent term is mizmor, "psalm, a song sung to the accompaniment of a stringed instrument," commonly found in the superscriptions to psalms, sometimes in combination with shir (e.g., Pss. 67.1; 68.1). A third term, qinah, "lament, dirge" is known from 2 Sam. 1.17; Amos 8.10; etc. These terms are suggestive of ancient notions of poetic genres, but they do not occur in every passage that a modern reader would consider poetry.

Aside from these terms, a suggestive feature of the Masoretic Text is the traditional scribal convention of stichography, whereby certain passages are written in verse-like lines (e.g., Exod. ch 15; Deut. ch 32; Judg. ch 5; 2 Sam. ch 22). This scribal convention, discussed in rabbinic literature, sets off certain sections from the blocks of surrounding text. There are two forms, called by the Rabbis "small brick over large brick, large brick over small brick" and "small brick over small brick, large brick over large brick." Small brick over large brick looks like

Small brick over small brick looks like

The stichographic writing, too, is not a sufficient criterion by which to identify poetry by today's standards because it was used for only a fraction of passages that we would consider poetry (for example, most manuscripts do not use this stichography for Psalms); moreover, it is occasionally used for nonpoetic lists (Josh. 12.9-24; 1 Sam. 6.17; Esth. 9.7-9).

A third potential indicator of poetry, in the Masoretic Text, is the system of accents (tropes, or cantillation marks) used in the Tiberian Masorah, whereby the books of Psalms, Proverbs, and most of Job are given a different system of accents from the other twenty-one books of the Bible. These three books are referred to as sifrei 'emet, 'emet (meaning "truth") being an acronym from the initials of 'iyov (Job), mishlei (Proverbs), and tehilim (Psalms). Again, while we consider these three books to be poetic, there are additional poetic books and passages for which these accents are not used. It seems that this system of accents indicates only the cantillation and says nothing about poetry per se.

Since the Bible does not define or describe its poetry, scholars have offered their own descriptions. Most would accept the following description: Biblical poetry is a type of elevated discourse, composed of terse lines, and employing a high degree of parallelism and imagery. Other tropes and figures may also be present, most commonly, word and sound repetition and patterning. There is no scholarly consensus regarding meter (see below).

Terseness is a feature of many of the world's poetries, whether or not there are metrical constraints on the length of lines; lines of poetry tend to be shorter and more concise than prose clauses. Lines of biblical poetry are generally no longer than three or four words. Their terseness is further enhanced by the omission of the definite article, the accusative marker 'et, and the relative pronoun 'asher. This tendency toward terseness operates both within a single line and over the composition as a whole. Biblical poems are relatively short, about thirty verses or less on average; there are no epic-length poems in the Bible. (The longest single poem is Psalm 119, with 176 verses. The book of Job is poetry from 3.2 to 42.6, but is actually a series of poems set in a prose frame.) Accompanying the terseness of the lines is the paratactic style by which lines are joined together. In parataxis, the connectives between lines may be missing altogether or may consist of the multivalent conjunction vav, "and, but, or." Thus the relationship between lines is often not explicit, opening up both difficulties and opportunities for interpretation. Terseness and parataxis make poetry seem more intense; they give the impression that each word is heavily laden with meaning.

Biblical poetry is characterized most of all by its binary form of expression known as parallelism. Parallelism is the pairing of a line (or part of a line) with one or more lines that are in some way linguistically equivalent. The equivalence is often grammatical—that is, both parts of the parallelism may have the same syntactic structure, as in

The LORD is my light and my help; whom should I fear?

The LORD is the stronghold of my life, whom should I dread? (Ps. 27.1).

Often, though, the grammatical structure is not identical, at least on the surface, as in

... before I created you in the womb ...
Before you were born (Jer. 1.5).

In this example, "you" (the prophet) is the grammatical object in the first line and the subject in the second. In Prov. 6.20, a positive clause is paired with a negative clause.

My son, keep your father's commandments,
Do not forsake your mother's teaching.

Grammar has many facets and any one of them can be brought into play in parallelism.

Another form of equivalence is semantic equivalence; the meaning of the lines is somehow related: perhaps synonymous, perhaps reflecting the converse or reverse (sometimes called antithetical), or perhaps extending the meaning in any one of a number of ways. Equivalence does not imply identity. The second line of a parallelism rarely repeats exactly the same words or exactly the same thought as the first; it is more likely to echo, expand, or intensify the idea in the first line in any one of a number of ways. For example,

Women in Zion they raped; Maidens in the towns of Judah (Lam 5.11).

The parallelism intensifies from “women” (women in general) to “maidens” (women of marriageable age), making the second line a more poignant image of rape. It expands from “Zion” to “towns of Judah,” making the atrocity more widespread—not only in the capital but throughout the country. Such intensification of the first line by the second is common.

Grammatical and semantic equivalence account for most parallelisms (both are present in Lam. 5.11), but because there are so many equivalent permutations for any given line, the number of potential parallelisms is enormous, if not infinite. By shaping the parallel line, that is, by narrowing the potential choice to a single statement, the poet clarifies the first line and moves the poem forward. Compare, for example, two couplets that differ in only one word:

But you, O LORD, are enthroned forever,
Your fame endures throughout the ages
(Ps. 102.12)

But you, O LORD, are enthroned forever,
Your throne endures through the ages (Lam. 5.19).

Both verses open with the image of God enthroned as a king. The slight difference in their second lines changes the thrust of the thought in their first lines. Ps. 102 is concerned with God’s permanence, which it contrasts with the fleeting life of humans; it therefore focuses on God’s fame, literally, the mention of His name, symbolizing His being. Lamentations has a different concern: the existence of God when He has no Temple, no earthly locus for divine worship, no earthly throne to symbolize His kingship. The author of Lamentations claims that God’s throne is independent of the Temple and continues to exist despite the loss of the Temple. In parallelisms like these, the first line presents a picture and the second line shines a spotlight on a certain part of it.

Parallelism helps to bind together the otherwise paratactic lines. In this sense it works as a counterweight to the parataxis, creating a relationship between the lines that is otherwise unexpressed. The basic structuring unit of the poem is not a single line, but a set of parallel lines (a two-line set is sometimes called a couplet or a bi-colon, and a three-line set is a tri-colon), as these examples demonstrate.

Another by-product of parallelism is the balance that it creates. Scholars have long sought metrical regularity in biblical poetry, but no metrical system—be it syllable counting, stress counting, thought-rhythm, or constraints on the number of syntactic units in a line—has met with unanimous acceptance. If biblical poetry has a metrical system, it has been eluding us for 2,000 years. More likely, the ancient Hebrew poets embraced a looser system—one in which many lines of a poem are more or less the same length and partake of the rhythm of their parallelism, but without the requirement of precise measurement.

Beyond the level of sets of parallel lines it is possible to find larger structural units, sometimes called strophes or stanzas. These are not units of a required number of lines, but merely a subdivision of a poem, not indicated formally, that modern readers make on the basis of the poem’s contents or its structural or lexical repetitions. Some translations indicate subdivisions by leaving space between sections. The strophe is less well-defined than a couplet, and less basic to the overall poetic structure. The principles whereby couplets are combined into longer segments or entire poems is not well understood, but it is clear that poems have movement and development, and that their lines and couplets cohere as unified compositions. A dramatic example is the "scene" at the end of the Song of Deborah (considered to be one of the oldest poems in the Bible), with a dialogue in which Sisera's mother answers her own question (Judg. 5,28-30).

Through the window peered Sisera's mother,
 Behind the lattice she whined:
 "Why is his chariot so long in coming?
 Why so late the clatter of his wheels?"
 The wisest of her ladies give answer;
 She, too, replies to herself:
 "They must be dividing the spoil they have found:
 A damsel or two for each man,
 Spoil of dyed cloths for Sisera,
 Spoil of embroidered cloths,
 A couple of embroidered cloths Round every neck as spoil."

In these verses some words repeat while others are echoed by words related in meaning. Redundancy is raised to an art-form. The terse lines—snapshots, as it were—grow into a larger moving picture as we imagine, through the eyes of Sisera's mother, that Sisera is bedecking himself with damsels and beautiful cloths obtained as the spoils of war (even as we know all the while that he lies dead in Jael's tent).

The unity of a poem is sometimes, but far from always, promoted by a formal device like an acrostic, an inclusio, or a refrain. Occasionally, an alphabetic acrostic forms the unifying structure of a poem, marking it as ordered and complete, from A to Z. Acrostics may have served also as a pedagogic or mnemonic device. Alphabetic acrostics (sometimes incomplete) are present in Pss. 9-10, 25, 34, 37, 111, 112, 119, 145; Prov. 31.10-31; Lam.

chs 1-4. A more common unifying device is "inclusio" (also called inclusion, frame, envelope, or ring-composition), in which the poem begins and ends with a similar line, as in Ps. 104.1 and 35: "Bless the LORD, O my soul." Compare also Ps. 8.2, 10: "O LORD, our LORD, how majestic is Your name throughout the earth." Inclusio provides a strong sense of closure to a poem. Less common is refrain, the repetition of a chorus-like line which, in the case of psalms, may have been sung antiphonally (e.g., Ps. 136); sometimes refrains are not repeated exactly.

We can see terseness and parallelism in operation, as well as larger structuring devices, in a segment of Psalm 136. The segment also illustrates how poetry differs from prose, since it is a poetic rendering of a prose narrative in the Torah.

Who made the heavens with wisdom
 His steadfast love is eternal;
 Who spread the earth over the water,
 His steadfast love is eternal;
 Who made the great lights,
 His steadfast love is eternal;
 the sun to dominate the day,
 His steadfast love is eternal;
 the moon and the stars to dominate the night,
 His steadfast love is eternal (Ps.
 136.5-9).

Immediately evident is the refrain, which unambiguously separates each line of poetry, and also gives cohesion to the whole, as well as rhythm. Even in English translation (and more so in Hebrew) each line seems terse, and about the same length, so that reading the lines one after another creates a rhythm, although not a precise meter. Compare the Genesis account of the creation of the celestial bodies that the psalm encapsulates in vv. 7-9: "God made the two great lights, the greater light to dominate the day and the lesser light to dominate the night, and the stars" (Gen. 1.16). The prose account also has parallelism, but it is not as obvious or as pervasive as in the psalm. The psalm has broken up the prose verse into poetic lines, by the use of, and clearly marked by, the refrain.

In addition to terseness and parallelism, biblical poems may employ the repetition and patterning of words and sound clusters, sometimes producing word- or soundplay. An ABBA or chiasmic word pattern occurs in Song of Songs 2.14:

Let me see your face, let me hear your voice;
 for your voice is sweet, and your face is comely.

A classic example of soundplay is found in Isa. 5:7:

vayekav lemishpat vehineh mispah litzdakah vehineh tze'akah, "And he hoped for justice, but behold injustice; for equity, but behold, iniquity."

(Cf. also Isa. 61.3; Zeph. 2.4.) Repeated words may be key words, words that recur often and point to the message of the poem; for example, in Ps. 121 the word "guard/guardian" occurs six times within the eight verses of the psalm, and indeed the psalm is about God as Israel's guardian. In Ps. 122 the topic is Jerusalem, and the name of the city occurs three times. In addition, combinations of the letters that make up the name "Jerusalem" occur frequently throughout the poem; many words in the poem echo Jerusalem's name.

These are a few samplings of the myriad repetitions of words and sounds that enhance the poeticalness of biblical poetry, and often its rhetorical force as well. Poetry is an auditory medium. Sound—be it the repetition of sounds or the rhythm of lines—and the nexus of sound and meaning contribute to the heightening of the discourse and to the effect on the listener. Poetry is related to music. The psalms were probably recited or sung to musical accompaniment, as were other poems (cf. Exod. 15.20–21; Ps. 137.2). Musical instruments are called kelei shir, "instruments of song/poetry" (Neh. 12.36). David, the psalmist par excellence (according to tradition), is a musician (1 Sam. 16.23). At the same time, poetry (shir) is associated with "speaking, reciting" (Ps. 137.3; Judg. 5.12.) The combination of music and words, sound and meaning, is epitomized in poetry.

No discussion of poetry can omit imagery, or metaphor, often thought to be the essence of poetry. It is not merely a question of inserting metaphors here and there for decoration; imagery, like parallelism, is pervasive in poetry. Poetry envisions the world metaphorically; it offers an alternative way of seeing reality. As medieval Jewish scholars put it, "The best part of poetry is its falseness (that is, its figurativeness)." (They got this idea from Arabic sources, who in turn got it from Aristotle.) Poetry, in this view, is not only elevated language, it is elevated vision.

A small example is in Ps. 136.6. We looked at this psalm earlier, noting how it poeticizes the creation story in Gen. ch 1. But the poetry of Ps. 136 is not merely a matter of breaking up prose sentences into terse, parallelistic poetic lines; it is a matter of re-envisioning the account of creation. Ps. 136.6 says that God "spread (Heb roka') the earth over the water." Genesis does not say this; in fact, according to Gen. 1.9, the water was gathered to one place so the dry land could appear—the land was actually under the water, visible when the water was removed. Moreover, the word that the psalm uses for "spread" is the same word that Genesis uses for "firmament." The psalmist has a different conception, or a different interpretation, of how the world was created. He sees the earth being spread, like a firmament, upon the water. The earth is a firm expanse set permanently in place over the waters (the forces of chaos, which cannot now escape); the earth is made analogous to the firmament of Genesis that separates the upper and lower waters. The psalm's conception of the creation of the earth is more mythological than that of Genesis, more like, for instance, Ps. 24.2: "He founded it [the world] upon the ocean, set it on the nether-streams." Poetry can retain more mythological concepts than prose, not because it is earlier or more primitive (Ps. 136 is probably exilic, after 586 BCE), but because it is free to call upon more imaginative views of the universe than can be tolerated in the “logical” or “theological” discourse of prose.

Metaphor, rather like parallelism, juxtaposes similarities and differences in such a way that a relationship between them is created. In metaphor, two things that do not generally occur together are brought together; they collide, or explode, leaving in their wake a new way of seeing. Metaphors come in many shapes and sizes. Some take but a line, others inform an entire poem. Some are deeply embedded in the culture of Israel, like the parent-child relationship or the husband-wife relationship used to portray the relationship between God and Israel; others may be the new creation of the poet; and still others may be “dead metaphors,” commonplace idioms that have lost their impact. Much of the difficulty in understanding poetry arises from the difficulty in recognizing what is metaphoric (and what is not) and in perceiving the meaning of the metaphor.

Ps. 133.1: “How good and pleasant it is that brothers dwell together,” contains a metaphor that is often overlooked. The verb “dwell together,” shevet yahad, is a legal term that means to live in joint tenancy; that is, to hold land in joint ownership without dividing it up among separate owners (cf. Gen. 13.6; 36.7; Deut. 25.5). The psalm is not about harmonious family life (a common reading based on a misunderstanding of the verb and adverb), but is about brothers holding land together. This is a metaphor for the (re)unification of Israel and Judah, as observed in Metzudat David, an 18th century commentary written by David Altschuler (and printed in most editions of Miqra’ot Gedolot), which explains:

How very good and how very pleasant is the thing when the whole house of Israel will dwell on its land; they are called “brothers” for the great affection that is among them. . . . And they will be together in one kingship and will not be divided into two kingdoms any more.

Metaphors, again like parallelisms, can have many permutations. A common metaphor for human beings is a tree, with its leaves and fruit. The water that nourishes the tree/person is God’s torah or trust in God. Prov. 11.28 and 30 capture the idea in pithy statements: “The righteous shall flourish like foliage” and “The fruit of the righteous is a tree of life.” More embellishment is found in the following examples.

The righteous bloom like a date-palm;
they thrive like a cedar in Lebanon;
planted in the house of the LORD,
they flourish in the courts of our God.
In old age they still produce fruit;
they are full of sap and freshness (Ps.
92.13–15).

The image is of beauty and stature; the date-palm has beautiful flowers and the cedars of Lebanon are tall and massive. They are also long-lived trees, and the righteous will be similarly long-lived, vigorous in old age.

More famous is the tree imagery in Ps. 1.3, applied to the man who delights in God’s teaching (torah).

He will be like a tree planted beside water channels,
which produces its fruit in its season,
and whose foliage does not wither;
And all that he does will succeed (author’s translation).

Just as the tree is nourished by water, more specifically, by irrigation canals that provide a constant supply of water, so the man is continually nourished by God’s teaching (torah), a constant source of life, which he studies day and night (v. 2). Just as the tree flourishes and accomplishes its purpose in life, so will the man succeed in his purpose. The rootedness and productiveness of the righteous man is contrasted with the transience and worthlessness of the wicked, who are like the chaff, the husks that are blown away in the winnowing process.

There may be a further implication in the description of the tree’s fruit and foliage, if they are taken not merely as an enhancement of the tree image but as part of the analogy between the man and the tree. The man, like the tree, will have fruit (= children) in its season (year after year) and unwithering foliage (= a long life). Children and long life are the ideal blessing in ancient Israel (cf. Job 42.16–17), and that blessing is achieved, says the psalm, through devotion to God's teaching.

Often compared to Ps. 1 is Jer. 17.5–8, which contrasts the man who trusts in humans with the man who trusts in God. The former will be like a tamarisk, a desert shrub with small, narrow leaves.

He shall be like a tamarisk in the desert, which does not sense when good (= rain) comes.

It dwells in the parched wilderness, in salt-lands, without inhabitants.

As for the man who trusts in God,
He will be like a tree planted beside water,

sending forth its roots by a stream.

It does not sense when heat comes,

Its leaves remain fresh,

And in a drought year it does not worry;

It does not cease to produce fruit.

(author's translation)

The man who trusts in humans lives in a permanent desert, without nourishment; even when a bit of water reaches him, he cannot make use of it. On the other hand, the man who trusts in God is constantly nourished, and because he has sunk his roots deep into water sources, he can easily survive a drought with no loss of productivity.

These tree metaphors show how the same basic image may be altered or embellished to fit different contexts. Now let us see how the same concept may be conveyed through different images. Wisdom is an abstract concept that is expressed metaphorically in different ways in Proverbs and in Job. Prov. 1.20–33 personifies Wisdom as a woman calling aloud in the public square, scolding those who reject her and warning them that she will be gleeful when they fail in life (cf. also Prov. chs 8–9).

Lady Wisdom, while not quite a prostitute, is certainly advertising her availability and urging everyone to pay heed to her. This is firmly in keeping with the main purpose of the book of Proverbs, to provide Wisdom to everyone so that all may prosper.

Job, on the other hand, has a very different notion of Wisdom. Wisdom is desirable but elusive, unattainable. Job ch 28 compares it to precious metals and gems hidden in deep mines, showing that Wisdom is more precious than metals and gems and more difficult to find. Like the other poems in Job, this chapter employs difficult language and develops its images in detail. It opens with a picture of metal mining, deep in the dark earth, far from human habitation, where men dig shafts to retrieve ore. Especially evocative are vv. 5–6:

Earth, out of which food grows,
Is changed below as if into fire.
Its rocks are a source of sapphires;
It contains gold dust too.

The world below the surface is a very different place from the world above. Above is the soil that provides bread, below is a hot colorful fantasy-world of potential riches. The poem moves on to its main point, that, unlike any other creature—even the sharp-eyed birds of prey and the hunter par excellence, the lion—humans are capable of finding these sources of wealth; and by prodigious construction projects—overturning mountains and carving out channels through rock (vv. 10–11)—they extract these precious ores and bring them to the surface, “so that hidden things may be brought to light” (v. 11). This last phrase is, of course, suggestive of more intangible “hidden things” that need to be brought to light, and it leads directly to the main topic: Wisdom.

But where can wisdom be found?

Where is the place of understanding?

(v. 12).

Humans may be able to bring hidden treasures from under the ground to light, but they are not able to find wisdom, the greatest treasure of all. The link between the first section (v. 1) and the second section (v. 12) is forged by the repetition of two words.

There is a source (motza') for silver And a place (makom) where gold is refined (v. 1).

But where can wisdom be found (timatze');

Where is the place (makom) of understanding? (v. 12).

Verses 13–19 echo the first section by saying that no one can put a price on wisdom; its value is beyond all the precious materials in the world. Moreover, its location is not anywhere in the natural world, nor even in the mythological world of the “deep” and the “sea” (the primordial waters).

Where, then, does wisdom come from? asks the third section of the poem (vv. 20–28).

It is hidden from the eyes of all living,
Concealed from the fowl of the sky.
Abbadon and Death say,
“With our ears we have heard a rumor of it” (vv. 21–22, author’s translation).

A number of parallels are invoked: earth, sky, and the netherworld; the living and the dead; eyes and ears and seeing and hearing—to the effect that no creature, earthly or not, alive or dead, anywhere in the cosmos, has perceived Wisdom.

Only God knows where it is and how to reach it, for He is all-seeing, and in the course of creating the world He saw and gauged Wisdom. The poet here borrows the well-known idea that Wisdom was present at creation—compare Prov. 8.22–31. But the picture of creation in vv. 25–26 is not at all like Gen. ch 1, or like Ps. 136, or even like Prov. ch 8.

When He fixed the weight of the winds,
Set the measure of the waters;
When He made a rule for the rain
And a course for the thunderstorms.
(Job 28.25–26)

This description focuses on God’s power over meteorological, or mythological forces. The creation is not centered on the earth, or below the earth where the mines are (where men can penetrate to), or in the watery deep, or in the realm of Death (below the ground), but far above the earth, the place of wind and water. Wisdom was and remains in the domain of God, not in the domain of human beings. How, then, can humans achieve wisdom? Only through the fear of the Lord (v. 28). “Fear of the LORD” is the essence of wisdom according to most biblical conceptions, but Job ch 28 puts that principle in a special light.

It is not easy to sum up what biblical poetry is. More than just a set of formal features or structures, poetry is sound and vision compressed for intensity and expressed with potency. Biblical poetry struggles to probe and stretch the important cultural concepts and issues of ancient Israel in exquisitely distilled Hebrew. In that sense, it is the purest, most rarefied, expression of biblical thought.

[ADELE BERLIN]

Weights and Measures

Modern equivalents for biblical weights and measures are presented in the following tables.

WEIGHTS

HEBREW	NJPS	EQUIVALENCE	U.S. AVOIRDUPOIS	METRIC UNITS
kikar	talent	60 minas	75.558 pounds	34.3 kilograms
maneh	mina	50 shekels	20.148 ounces	571.2 grams
shekel	shekel	2 bekas	176.29 grains	11.42 grams
pim (or payim)	pim	.667 shekel	117.52 grains	7.61 grams
bekal'	half-shekel	10 gerahs	88.14 grains	5.71 grams
gerah	gerah		8.81 grains	.57 gram

The practice of weighing unmarked ingots of metal used in commercial transactions prior to the invention of money explains that the names of the units of weight were used later as indications of value, and as names for monetary standards.

LENGTH MEASURES

HEBREW	NJPS	EQUIVALENCE	U.S. MEASURES	METRIC UNITS
'amah	cubit	2 spans	17.49 inches	.443 meter
zeret	span	3 handbreadths	8.745 inches	.221 meter
tofah, tefah	handbreadth, hand's breadth	4 fingers	2.915 inches	.074 meter
'etzba'	finger		0.728 inch	.019 meter

The cubit described in Ezekiel 40:5; 43:13 is equal to seven (not six) handbreadths, namely 20.405 inches.

CAPACITY: LIQUID MEASURES

HEBREW	NJPS	EQUIVALENCE	U.S. MEASURES	METRIC UNITS
kor	kor	10 baths	60.738 gallons	230 liters
bat	bath	6 hins	6.073 gallons	23 liters
hin	hin	3 kabs	1.012 gallons	3.829 liters
kav	kab	4 logs	1.4349 quarts	1.276 liters
log	log		0.674 pint	.32 liter

CAPACITY: DRY MEASURES

HEBREW	NJPS	EQUIVALENCE	U.S. MEASURES	METRIC UNITS
homer	homer	2 lethechs	6.524 bushels	229.7 liters
kor	kor	2 lethechs	6.524 bushels	229.7 liters
letekh	letech	5 ephahs	3.262 bushels	114.8 liters
'efah	ephah, measure	3 seahs	20.878 quarts	22.9 liters
se'ah	seah	3.33 omers	6.959 quarts	7.7 liters
'omer	omer	1.8 kabs	2.087 quarts	2.3 liters
'isaron	tenth of a measure	.1 ephah	2.087 quarts	2.3 liters
kav	kab		1.159 quarts	1.3 liters

Timeline*

DATE	PERIOD	EGYPT
Ca. 3300–2000 BCE	EARLY BRONZE AGE
3300–3100	Early Bronze I	Earliest forms of writing
3100–2700	Early Bronze II	Political unification; Early Dynastic period
2700–2300	Early Bronze III	Old Kingdom; Dynasties 3–5
2300–2000	Early Bronze IV	First Intermediate Period
Ca. 2000–1550 BCE	MIDDLE BRONZE AGE
2000–1650	Middle Bronze I–II	Middle Kingdom; Dynasties 11–12
1650–1550	Middle Bronze III	Second Intermediate/ Hyksos Period
Ca. 1550–1200 BCE	LATE BRONZE AGE	New Kingdom; Dynasties 18–19: Thutmose III (1479–1425), Akenhaten (1352–1336), Seti I (1294–1279), Rameses II (1279–1213), Merneptah (1213–1203); Sea Peoples (groups including Philistines) invasions begin
Ca. 1200–586 BCE	IRON AGE
Ca. 1200–1025	Iron I	Rameses III (1184–1153)
Ca. 1025–586	Iron II
Ca. 1025–928	Iron IIA
Ca. 928–722	Iron IIB	Shishak I invades Palestine (925)

* Many dates before 1000 BCE are highly uncertain.

 For a more complete list of rulers, see “Chronological Table of Rulers,” pp. 2110–2113.

LAND OF ISRAEL

MESOPOTAMIA, ASIA MINOR

	Earliest forms of writing; Full urbanization; Sumerian culture develops
In Egyptian sphere	High point of Sumerian culture
Flourishing city-states	Sargon of Akkad; Naram-Sin of Akkad; Gudea of Lagash
Decline/abandonment of city-states	Third Dynasty of Ur

Revival of urbanism; Invention of alphabet	Amorite kingdoms: Shamshi-Adad of Assyria (ca. 1813–1781); Hammurabi of Babylon (ca. 1792–1750); Rise of Hittites
--------------------------------------------	-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------

In Egyptian sphere; Rise of Mitanni in north; Ugarit flourishes; Presence of Israel in land of Israel	Hittites challenge Egypt for control of Western Asia
Collapse of city-states	Hittite empire collapses; Trojan War

Israel emerges in Canaan; Philistines settle on SW coast; Small city-states develop in Phoenicia, Aram, Transjordan	Resurgence of Assyria: Tiglath-pileser I (1114–1076)
------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------------------------------------------------------

United monarchy in Israel:
Saul (1025–1005); David (1005–965); Solomon (968–928)

Divided monarchy:
JUDAH:	ISRAEL:
Rehoboam (928–911)	Jeroboam I (928–907) Omri (882–871); Capital at Samaria Ahab (873–852)	Rise of Neo-Assyrian empire Shalmaneser III (858–824); Battle of Qarqar (853)
Jehoshaphat (867–846)	Prophet Elijah (mid-9th century) Prophet Elisha (mid- to late 9th century)
Athaliah (842–836) Jehoash (836–798)	Jehu (842–814) Jehoash (800–788) Jeroboam II (788–747) Prophet Amos (mid-8th century) Prophet Hosea (mid-8th century)	Adad-nirari III (811–783)
Ahaz (743/735–727/715)	Hoshea (732–722)	Tiglath-pileser III (745–727); Assyrian conquest of the Levant Shalmaneser V (727–722) Samaria captured (722)

TIMELINE (continued)

DATE	PERIOD	EGYPT
Ca. 722–586	Iron IIC	Egypt conquered by Assyria (671) Psammetichus I (664–610) Neco II (610–595)
Ca. 586–539	NEO-BABYLONIAN
539–333	PERSIAN	GREECE AND ROME Greeks repel Persian invasions Peloponnesian War (431–404)
333–63	HELLENISTIC	Alexander the Great (336–323); Defeats Persians at Issus (332); Occupies the Levant and Egypt Rome gains control over Greece (ca. 188–146) Sack of Carthage and Corinth (146)
63 BCE–330 CE	ROMAN	Julius Caesar named dictator (49); assassinated (44) Octavian (Augustus) defeats Antony at Actium (31); (Emperor 27 BCE–14 CE) Tiberius (14–37 CE) Gaius (Caligula) (37–41) Claudius (41–54) Nero (54–68) Vespasian (69–79) Titus (79–81) Domitian (81–96) Nerva (96–98) Trajan (98–117) Hadrian (117–138)

LAND OF ISRAEL

JUDAH:

Prophet Isaiah (late 8th to early 7th centuries)
Prophet Micah (late 8th century)
Hezekiah (727/715–698/687)
Manasseh (698/687–642)
Josiah (639–609)
Prophet Zephaniah (late 7th century)
Prophet Jeremiah (late 7th–early 6th centuries)
Jehoaahaz (609)
Jehoiakim (608–598)
Jehoiachin (597)
Prophet Ezekiel (early 6th century)
Zedekiah (597–586); Capture of Jerusalem (586)

MESOPOTAMIA, ASIA MINOR

Sargon II (722–705)
Sennacherib (705–681); Attack on Judah and seige of Jerusalem (701)
Esarhaddon (681–669)
Ashurbanipal (669–627)

Rise of Babylonia
Assyrian capital of Nineveh captured (612)

Nebuchadrezzar II (604–562) of Babylonia

Nabonidus (556–539)

EASTERN MEDITERRANEAN

Some exiles return from Babylonia (538)
Second Temple built (520–515)
Prophet Haggai (520); Prophet Zechariah (520–518)
Nehemiah governor of Judah (ca. 445–430)
Mission of Ezra the scribe (mid-5th [or early 4th] century)

Cyrus II (the Great) (559–530);
Capture of Babylon (539)
Cambyses (530–522); Capture of Egypt (525)
Darius I (522–486)
Xerxes I (486–465)
Artaxerxes I (465–424)
Artaxerxes II (405–359)

Seleucus I (312/311–281) controls Syria and Mesopotamia
Ptolemy I (323–282) controls Egypt, Palestine, Phoenicia Antiochus III (223–187) gains control of southern Syria, Phoenicia, and Judea from Ptolemy IV (202–198)
Ben Sira (Sirach) (early 2nd century)
Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164)
Revolt of the Maccabees (167–164)

HASMONEAN RULE OF JUDEA (165–37):

John Hyrcanus (135–104); Alexander Janneus (103–76);
Salome Alexandra (76–67)

Pompey conquers the Levant (66–62); Enters Jerusalem (63)
Herod the Great king of Judea (37–4);
Rebuilds Second Temple

First Jewish Revolt in Judea against Rome (66–73);
Jerusalem is captured; Second Temple destroyed (70)

Jewish revolts in Egypt, Libya, Cyprus (115–118)
Second Jewish Revolt in Judea against Rome (132–135)

Chronological Table of Rulers

DATE	EGYPT	ASSYRIA	BABYLONIA
1300 BCE	DYNASTY 19 (1295–1186): Seti I (1294–1279) Rameses II (1279–1213) Merneptah (1213–1203)
1200	DYNASTY 20 (1186–1069)	Tiglath-pileser I (1114–1076)
1000	DYNASTY 21 (1069–945)
	DYNASTIES 22–24 (945–715): Shoshenq I (Shishak) (945–924)
		Shalmaneser III (858–824)
		Shamshi-Adad V (824–811)
800	DYNASTY 25 (780–656):	Adad-nirari III (811–783)
		Shalmaneser IV (783–773)
		Ashur-dan III (773–755)
		Ashur-nirari V (755–745)
		Tiglath-pileser III (Pul) (745–727)
		Shalmaneser V (727–722)	Marduk-apal-iddina II (Merodach-baladan) (721–710, 703)
		Sargon II (722–705)
700	Taharqa (Tirhakah) (690–664)	Sennacherib (705–681)
	DYNASTY 26 (664–525):	Esarhaddon (681–669)
	Psammetichus I (664–610)	Ashurbanipal (669–627)
	Neco II (610–595)	Ashur-etil-ilani
	Psammetichus II (595–589)	Sin-shum-lishir } (627–612)	Nabo-polassar (625–605)
	Apries (Hophra) (589–570)	Sin-shar-ishkun }	Nebuchadrezzar II (Nebuchadnezzar) (605–562)
	Amasis II (570–526)	Ashur-uballit II (612–609)	Amel-Marduk (Evil-merodach) (562–560)
	Psammetichus III (526–525)		Neriglissar (560–556)
			Labashi-Marduk (556)
			Nabonidus (556–539)
			Belshazzar (co-regent 553–543)
400
325 BCE

Note: Names in boldface occur in the Tanakh. Overlapping dates indicate co-regencies. Date ranges are reigns, not life spans. Many dates are uncertain or approximations.

DATE	PERSIA	ISRAEL
1300 BCE
1200
1000		UNITED MONARCHY: Saul (1025–1005); David (1005–965); Solomon (Yedidiah) (968–928) DIVIDED MONARCHY: JUDAH: Rehoboam (928–911) Abijam (Abijah) (911–908) Asa (908–867) Jehoshaphat (870–846) Jehoram (Joram) (851–843) Ahaziah (Jehoahaz) (843–842) Athaliah (842–836) Jehoash (Joash) (836–798) Amaziah (798–769) Azariah (Uzziah) (785–733) Jotham (759–743) Ahaz (743/735–727/715)* Hezekiah (727/715–698/687)*
800		ISRAEL: Jeroboam I (928–907) Nadab (907–906) Baasha (906–883) Elah (883–882); Zimri (882) Omri (882–871) Ahab (873–852) Ahaziah (852–851) Jehoram (Joram) (851–842) Jehu (842–814) Jehoahaz (817–800) Jehoash (Joash) (800–784) Jeroboam II (788–747) Zechariah (747); Shallum (747) Menahem (747–737) Pekahiah (737–735) Pekah (735–732) Hoshea (732–722)
700		Manasseh (698/687–642)* Amon (641–640) Josiah (640–609) Jehoahaz (Shallum) (609) Jehoiakim (Eliakim) (608–598) Jehoiachin (Jeconiah, etc.) (597) Zedekiah (Mattaniah) (597–586)
	Cyrus II (559–530) Cambyes (530–522) Darius I (522–486) Xerxes I (Ahasuerus) (486–465) Artaxerxes I (465–424) Darius II (423–405) Artaxerxes II (405–359) Artaxerxes III (359–338) Artaxerxes IV (338–336) Darius III (336–330)
325 BCE

*Data are inconsistent for the dates of the reigns of Ahaz, Hezekiah, and Manasseh.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE OF RULERS (continued)

DATE	EGYPT	SYRIA
	HELLENISTIC PERIOD Alexander (the Great) (336–323)
300 BCE	Ptolemy I Soter (305–282) Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285–246)	Seleucus I Nicator (305–281) Antiochus I Soter (281–261) Antiochus II Theos (261–246)
	Ptolemy III Evergetes (246–221) Ptolemy IV Philopator (221–204) Ptolemy V Epiphanes (204–180); Cleopatra I (180–176)	Seleucus II Callinicus (246–225) Seleucus III Soter Ceraunos (225–223) Antiochus III (the Great) (223–187) Seleucus IV Philopator (187–175) Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164)
	Ptolemy VI Philometor (180–145); Cleopatra II (175–116) Ptolemy VII Neos Philopator (145) Ptolemy VIII Evergetes II Physcon (170–116)	Antiochus V Eupator (164–162) Demetrius I Soter (162–150) Alexander Epiphanes (Balas) (150–145) Demetrius II Nicator (145–141 and 129–125) Antiochus VI Epiphanes (145–142) Trypho (142–138) Antiochus VII Sidetes (138–129) Cleopatra Thea (126–121) Antiochus VIII Grypus (125–121 and 121–96) Seleucus V (125)
	Cleopatra III (116–101) Ptolemy IX Soter II (116–107 AND 88–80) Ptolemy X Alexander I (107–88)	Antiochus IX Cyzicenus (115–95) Seleucus VI (95) Antiochus X Eusebes (95–83) Antiochus XI Philadelphus (95) Demetrius III Eukairos (95–88) Philip I Epiphanes Philadelphus (95–84) Antiochus XII Dionysus Epiphanes (87–84) Philip II (67–66)
100 BCE	Cleopatra Berenice (101–88)	Antiochus XIII Asiaticus (69–68 and 65–64)
	Ptolemy XI Alexander II (80)
	Ptolemy XII Auletes (80–59 and 55–51) Cleopatra VII (51–30) Ptolemy XIII (51–47) Ptolemy XIV (47–44)
50 BCE
25 CE
50 CE
100 CE

300 BCE

HASMONEAN RULERS

[Mattathias d. 166]

Judas Maccabeus, son of Mattathias (165–160)

Jonathan, son of Mattathias (160–142)

Simon, son of Mattathias (142–135)

John Hyrcanus I, son of Simon (135–104)

Judah Aristobulus I, son of John Hyrcanus (104–103)

Alexander Janneus, son of John Hyrcanus (103–76)

100 BCE

Salome Alexandra, wife of Alexander Jannaeus (76–67)

Aristobulus II, son of Alexander Jannaeus and Salome Alexandra (67–63)

Hyrcanus II, son of Alexander Jannaeus and Salome Alexandra (63–40)

50 BCE

Mattathias Antigonus, son of Aristobulus II (40–37)

HERODIAN DYNASTY

Herod the Great, king of the Jews (37–4)

Herod Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, ethnarch of Judea, Samaria, Idumea (4 BCE–6 CE)

Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (4 BCE–39 CE)

Herod Philip, son of Herod the Great, tetrarch of Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis (4 BCE–34 CE)

Herod Agrippa I, grandson of Herod the Great, king of Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis (37–44) and of Judea,* Galilee, and Perea (41–44)

ROMAN EMPERORS

25 CE Octavian (Augustus) (27 BCE–14 CE)

Tiberius (14–37)

50 CE Gaius Caligula (37–41)

Claudius (41–54)

Nero (54–68)

Galba (68–69); Otho (69); Vitellius (69)

Vespasian (69–79)

Titus (79–81)

Domitian (81–96)

Nerva (96–98)

Trajan (98–117)

Hadrian (117–138)

Herod Agrippa II, son of Herod Agrippa I, king of Chalcis (50–53), king of Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, Galilee, Perea (53–ca. 93)

100 CE *In 41 Judea was made part of the kingdom of Herod Agrippa I, grandson of Herod the Great (see Herodian Dynasty, above). At his death in 44 it became a province again.

Calendar

The year was composed of twelve lunar months (beginning on the day of the new moon), with an intercalary month added periodically (see perhaps 1 Kings 12.33). In some traditions, and perhaps originally, the year began in the fall, at the autumnal equinox (see Exod. 23.16; 34.22). In others, following Babylonian practice, the new year was celebrated in the spring. The fall new year became standard in postbiblical Judaism.

Months in the Bible are usually identified by ordinal numbers, beginning with the spring new year. Some months (in boldface in the following list) are also designated with names derived either from a Canaanite calendar or, in postexilic texts, from a Babylonian one; the names of months not found in the Bible are known from other ancient sources.

	CANAANITE NAME	BABYLONIAN/ARAMAIC NAME	MODERN EQUIVALENT
First	'Aviv	Nisan	March–April
Second	Ziv	'Iyar	April–May
Third		Sivan	May–June
Fourth		Tamuz	June–July
Fifth		'Av	July–August
Sixth		'Elul	August–September
Seventh	'Etanim	Tishri	September–October
Eighth	Bul	Marḥeshvan	October–November
Ninth		Kislev	November–December
Tenth		Tevet	December–January
Eleventh		Shevat	January–February
Twelfth		'Adar	February–March

The Jewish calendar is based on the lunar month, which is a bit longer than 29½ days, so Jewish lunar months are 29 or 30 days long. Twelve lunar months usually amount to 354 days, 11 days short of a solar year. In order for the festivals to stay in the correct season in relation to the solar year, an extra month is added every few years. Following ancient Babylonian models, the calendar runs on a 19-year cycle: years 3, 6, 8, 11, 14, 17, and 19 of the cycle are intercalated or “leap” years, containing an extra month of Adar, sometimes called Adar Sheni (second Adar). Adar was chosen for intercalation because it is the last month of the Babylonian year and of the biblical year beginning in Nisan (an alternate calendar, the one now in use, begins the year in Tishri with Rosh Ha-Shanah). The next 19-year intercalation cycle will begin in 5768 (2007–2008 CE).

Observances fall within the calendar as follows:

Rosh Ha-Shanah (the New Year)	1-2 Tishri
Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement)	10 Tishri
Sukkot (Booths) begins	15 Tishri
Hanukkah begins	25 Kislev
Purim	14 Adar (15 Adar in Jerusalem and other ancient walled cities)
Passover begins	15 Nisan
Shavuot (Weeks) begins	6 Sivan
Tish'ah be' av	9 Av

Table of Biblical Readings

TORAH

NEVI'IM

WEEKLY SABBATH READINGS

Genesis
בראשית	Bere'shit	1.1–6.8	Isaiah 42.5–43.10 (42.5–21)*
נח	Noah	6.9–11.32	Isaiah 54.1–55.5 (54.1–10)
לך לך	Lekh Lekha	12.1–17.27	Isaiah 40.27–41.16
וירא	Va-yera'	18.1–22.24	2 Kings 4.1–37 (4.1–23)
חיי שרה	Hayyei Sarah	23.1–25.18	1 Kings 1.1–31
תולדות	Toledot	25.19–28.9	Malachi 1.1–2.7
ויצא	Va-yetse'	28.10–32.3	Hosea 12.13–14.10 (11.7–12.12)
וישלח	Va-yishlah	32.4–36.43	Hosea 11.7–12.12 (Obadiah 1.1–21)
וישב	Va-yeshev	37.1–40.23	Amos 2.6–3.8
מקץ	Mikkets	41.1–44.17	1 Kings 3.15–4.1
ויגש	Va-yiggash	44.18–47.27	Ezekiel 37.15–28
ויחי	Va-yehi	47.28–50.26	1 Kings 2.1–12
Exodus
שמות	Shemot	1.1–6.1	Isaiah 27.6–28.13; 29.22, 23 (Jeremiah 1.1–2.3)
וארא	Va-era'	6.2–9.35	Ezekiel 28.25–29.21
בא	Bo'	10.1–13.16	Jeremiah 46.13–28
כשלה	Be-shallah	13.17–17.16	Judges 4.4–5.31 (5.1–31)
יחרו	Yitro	18.1–20.26	Isaiah 6.1–7.6; 9.5, 6 (6.1–13)
משפטים	Mishpatim	21.1–24.18	Jeremiah 34.8–22; 33.25, 26
תרומה	Terumah	25.1–27.19	1 Kings 5.26–6.13
תצוה	Tetsavveh	27.20–30.10	Ezekiel 43.10–27
כי תשא	Ki Tissa'	30.11–34.35	1 Kings 18.1–39 (18.20–39)
ויקהל	Va-yakhel	35.1–38.20	1 Kings 7.40–50 (7.13–26)
פקודי	Pekudei	38.21–40.38	1 Kings 7.51–8.21 (7.40–50)
Leviticus
ויקרא	Va-yikra'	1.1–5.26	Isaiah 43.21–44.23
צו	Tsav	6.1–8.36	Jeremiah 7.21–8.3; 9.22, 23
שמיני	Shemini	9.1–11.47	2 Samuel 6.1–7.17 (6.1–19)
חזריע	Tazria'	12.1–13.59	2 Kings 4.42–5.19
מצרע	Metsora'	14.1–15.33	2 Kings 7.3–20
אחרי מות	'Aḥarei Mot	16.1–18.30	Ezekiel 22.1–19 (22.1–16)
קדשים	Kedoshim	19.1–20.27	Amos 9.7–15 (Ezekiel 20.2–20)

Local practice may differ from the selections listed. * Parentheses indicate Sephardi ritual.

Leviticus (continued)

אמר	'Emor	21.1–24.23
בהר	Be-har	25.1–26.2
בחקתי	Be-ḥukotai	26.3–27.34

Ezekiel 44.15–31
Jeremiah 32.6–27
Jeremiah 16.19–17.14

Numbers

במדבר	Be-midbar	1.1–4.20
נשא	Naso'	4.21–7.89
בהעלך	Be-ha'alotekha	8.1–12.16
שלח לך	Shelah-Lekha	13.1–15.41
קרח	Korah	16.1–18.32
חקת	Ḥukat	19.1–22.1
בלק	Balak	22.2–25.9
פינחס	Pinḥas	25.10–30.1
מטות	Matot	30.2–32.42
מסעי	Mase'ei	33.1–36.13

Hosea 2.1–22
Judges 13.2–25
Zechariah 2.14–4.7
Joshua 2.1–24
1 Samuel 11.14–12.22
Judges 11.1–33
Micah 5.6–6.8
1 Kings 18.46–19.21
Jeremiah 1.1–2.3
Jeremiah 2.4–28; 3.4 (2.4–28; 4.1, 2)

Deuteronomy

דברים	Devarim	1.1–3.22
ואתחנן	Va-'ethanan	3.23–7.11
עקב	'Ekev	7.12–11.25
ראה	Re'eh	11.26–16.17
שפטים	Shofetim	16.18–21.9
כי תצא	Ki Tetze'	21.10–25.19
כי תבוא	Ki Tavo'	26.1–29.8
נצבים	Nitzavim	29.9–30.20
וילך	Va-yelekh	31.1–30
האזינו	Ha'azinu	32.1–52
וזאת הברכה	Ve-zo't Ha-berakha!	33.1–34.12

Isaiah 1.1–27
Isaiah 40.1–26
Isaiah 49.14–51.3
Isaiah 54.11–55.5
Isaiah 51.12–52.12
Isaiah 54.1–10
Isaiah 60.1–22
Isaiah 61.10–63.9
—
2 Samuel 22.1–51
Joshua 1.1–18 (1.1–9)

READINGS FOR SPECIAL SABBATHS

Sabbath coinciding with Rosh Ḥodesh

Weekly portion and Numbers 28.9–15

Isaiah 66.1–24

Sabbath immediately preceding Rosh Ḥodesh Weekly portion

1 Samuel 20.18–42

Shekalim Weekly portion and Exodus 30.11–16

2 Kings 12.1–17 (11.17–12.17)

Zakhor Weekly portion and Deuteronomy 25.17–19

1 Samuel 15.2–34 (15.1–34)

Parah Weekly portion and Numbers 19.1–22

Ezekiel 36.16–38 (36.16–36)

Ha-Ḥodesh Weekly portion and Exodus 12.1–20

Ezekiel 45.16–46.18 (45.18–46.15)

Ha-Gadol Weekly portion

Malachi 3.4–24

First Sabbath Hanukkah Weekly portion plus the verses relating the prince (nasi') of the day corresponding to the day of Hanukkah

Zechariah 2.14–4.7

Second Sabbath Hanukkah Weekly portion and Hanukkah portions as above

1 Kings 7.40–50

READINGS FOR THE DAYS OF AWE

Rosh Ha-Shanah

First Day	Genesis 21.1–34; Numbers 29.1–6
Second Day	Genesis 22.1–24; Numbers 29.1–6

1 Samuel 1.1–2.10
Jeremiah 31.2–20

TORAH		NEVI'IM
Sabbath Shuvah	Weekly portion	Hosea 14.2–10; Micah 7.18–20; Joel 2.15–27 (Hosea 14.2–10; Micah 7.18–20)
Yom Kippur
Morning	Leviticus 16.1–34; Numbers 29.7–11	Isaiah 57.14–58.14
Afternoon	Leviticus 18.1–30	Jonah 1.1–4.11; Micah 7.18–20
READINGS FOR THE FESTIVALS
Sukkot (Tabernacles)
First Day	Leviticus 22.26–23.44; Numbers 29.12–16	Zechariah 14.1–21
Second Day	Leviticus 22.26–23.44; Numbers 29.12–16	1 Kings 8.2–21
Sabbath during the Middle Days	Exodus 33.12–34.26; Daily portion from Numbers 29	Ezekiel 38.18–39.16
Eighth Day	Deuteronomy 14.22–16.17 (15.19–16.17); Numbers 29.35–30.1	1 Kings 8.54–66
Simḥat Torah	Deuteronomy 33.1–34.12; Genesis 1.1–2.3; Numbers 29.35–30.1	Joshua 1.1–18 (1.1–9)
Pesah (Passover)
First Day	Exodus 12.21–51; Numbers 28.16–25	Joshua 5.2–6.1; 6.27
Second Day	Leviticus 22.26–23.44; Numbers 28.16–25	2 Kings 23.1–9, 21–25
Sabbath during the Middle Days	Exodus 33.12–34.26; Numbers 28.19–25	Ezekiel 37.1–14
Seventh Day	Exodus 13.17–15.26; Numbers 28.19–25	2 Samuel 22.1–51
Eighth Day	Deuteronomy 15.19–16.17; Numbers 28.19–25	Isaiah 10.32–12.6
Shavuot (Pentecost)
First Day	Exodus 19.1–20.23; Numbers 28.26–31	Ezekiel 1.1–28; 3.12
Second Day	Deuteronomy 15.19–16.17;* Numbers 28.26–31	Habakkuk 3.1–19 (2.20–3.19)
READINGS ON WEEKDAY OCCASIONS
Purim	Exodus 17.8–16	—
Ninth of Av
Morning	Deuteronomy 4.25–40	Jeremiah 8.13–9.23
Afternoon	Exodus 32.11–14; 34.1–10	Isaiah 55.6–56.8
Public Fast Days
Morning	Exodus 32.11–14; 34.1–10	—
Afternoon	Exodus 32.11–14; 34.1–10	Isaiah 55.6–56.8
READINGS OF THE FIVE MEGILOT
The Song of Songs		Sabbath during Pesah (Passover)
Ruth		Shavuot (Pentecost)
Lamentations		Ninth of Av
Ecclesiastes		Sabbath during Sukkot (Tabernacles)
Esther		Purim

* On the Sabbath, 14.22–16.17.

Chapter/Verse Differences

Chapter/verse differences between standard English numbering and Hebrew text numbering used in NJPS. Books are listed in Hebrew canonical order.

ENGLISH	HEBREW	ENGLISH	HEBREW	ENGLISH	HEBREW
Gen. 31.55	Gen. 32.1	Jer. 9.1	Jer. 8.23	Ps. 13.1-5	Ps. 13.2-6a
Gen. 32.1-32	Gen. 32.2-33	Jer. 9.2-26	Jer. 9.1-25	Ps. 13.6	Ps. 13.6b
Exod. 8.1-4	Exod. 7.26-29	Ezek. 20.45-49	Ezek. 21.1-5	Ps. 14. title	Ps. 14.1a
Exod. 8.5-32	Exod. 8.1-28	Ezek. 21.1-32	Ezek. 21.6-37	Ps. 15. title	Ps. 15.1a
Exod. 22.1	Exod. 21.37	Hos. 1.10-11	Hos. 2.1-2	Ps. 16. title	Ps. 16.1a
Exod. 22.2-31	Exod. 22.1-30	Hos. 2.1-23	Hos. 2.3-25	Ps. 17. title	Ps. 17.1a
Lev. 6.1-7	Lev. 5.20-26	Hos. 11.12	Hos. 12.1	Ps. 18. title	Ps. 18.1-2a
Lev. 6.8-30	Lev. 6.1-23	Hos. 12.1-14	Hos. 12.2-15	Ps. 18.1-50	Ps. 18.2-51
Num. 16.36-50	Num. 17.1-15	Hos. 13.6	Hos. 14.1	Ps. 19. title	Ps. 19.1
Num. 17.1-13	Num. 17.16-28	Hos. 14.1-9	Hos. 14.2-10	Ps. 19.1-14	Ps. 19.2-15
Num. 26.1a	Num. 25.19	Joel 2.28-32	Joel 3.1-5	Ps. 20. title	Ps. 20.1
Num. 29.40	Num. 30.1	Joel 3.1-21	Joel 4.1-21	Ps. 20.1-9	Ps. 20.2-10
Num. 30.1-6	Num. 30.2-17	Jon. 1.17	Jon. 2.1	Ps. 21. title	Ps. 21.1
Deut. 12.32	Deut. 13.1	Jon. 2.1-10	Jon. 2.2-11	Ps. 21.1-13	Ps. 21.2-14
Deut. 13.1-18	Deut. 13.2-19	Mic. 5.1	Mic. 4.14	Ps. 22. title	Ps. 22.1
Deut. 22.30	Deut. 23.1	Mic. 5.2-15	Mic. 5.1-14	Ps. 22.1-31	Ps. 22.2-32
Deut. 23.1-25	Deut. 23.2-26	Nah. 1.15	Nah. 2.1	Ps. 23. title	Ps. 23.1a
Deut. 29.1	Deut. 28.69	Nah. 2.1-13	Nah. 2.2-14	Ps. 24. title	Ps. 24.1a
Deut. 29.2-29	Deut. 29.1-28	Zech. 1.18-21	Zech. 2.1-4	Ps. 25. title	Ps. 25.1a
1 Sam. 20.42b	1 Sam. 21.1	Zech. 2.1-13	Zech. 2.5-17	Ps. 26. title	Ps. 26.1a
1 Sam. 21.1-15	1 Sam. 21.2-16	Mal. 4.1-6	Mal. 3.19-24	Ps. 27. title	Ps. 27.1a
1 Sam. 23.29	1 Sam. 24.1	Ps. 3. title	Ps. 3.1	Ps. 28. title	Ps. 28.1a
1 Sam. 24.1-22	1 Sam. 24.2-23	Ps. 3.1-8	Ps. 3.2-9	Ps. 29. title	Ps. 29.1a
2 Sam. 18.33b	2 Sam. 19.1	Ps. 4. title	Ps. 4.1	Ps. 30. title	Ps. 30.1
2 Sam. 19.1-43	2 Sam. 19.2-44	Ps. 4.1-8	Ps. 4.2-9	Ps. 30.1-12	Ps. 30.2-13
1 Kings 4.21-34	1 Kings 5.1-14	Ps. 5. title	Ps. 5.1	Ps. 31. title	Ps. 31.1
1 Kings 5.1-18	1 Kings 5.15-32	Ps. 5.1-12	Ps. 5.2-13	Ps. 31.1-24	Ps. 31.2-25
1 Kings 18.33b	1 Kings 18.34a	Ps. 6. title	Ps. 6.1	Ps. 32. title	Ps. 32.1a
1 Kings 20.2b	1 Kings 20.3a	Ps. 6.1-10	Ps. 6.2-11	Ps. 34. title	Ps. 34.1
1 Kings 22.22a	1 Kings 22.21b	Ps. 7. title	Ps. 7.1	Ps. 34.1-22	Ps. 34.2-23
1 Kings 22.43b	1 Kings 22.44	Ps. 7.1-17	Ps. 7.2-18	Ps. 35. title	Ps. 35.1 (1st word)
1 Kings 22.44-53	1 Kings 22.45-54	Ps. 8. title	Ps. 8.1	Ps. 36. title	Ps. 36.1
2 Kings 11.21	2 Kings 12.1	Ps. 8.1-9	Ps. 8.2-10	Ps. 36.1-12	Ps. 36.2-13
2 Kings 12.1-21	2 Kings 12.2-22	Ps. 9. title	Ps. 9.1	Ps. 37. title	Ps. 37.1 (1st word)
Isa. 9.1	Isa. 8.23	Ps. 9.1-20	Ps. 9.2-21	Ps. 38. title	Ps. 38.1
Isa. 9.2-21	Isa. 9.1-20	Ps. 11. title	Ps. 11.1a	Ps. 38.1-22	Ps. 38.2-23
Isa. 63.19	Isa. 63.19a	Ps. 12. title	Ps. 12.1	Ps. 39. title	Ps. 39.1
Isa. 64.1	Isa. 63.19b	Ps. 12.1-8	Ps. 12.2-9	Ps. 39.1-13	Ps. 39.2-14
Isa. 64.2-12	Isa. 64.1-11	Ps. 13. title	Ps. 13.1	Ps. 40. title	Ps. 40.1

ENGLISH	HEBREW	ENGLISH	HEBREW	ENGLISH	HEBREW
Ps. 40.1-17	Ps. 40.2-18	Ps. 73. title	Ps. 73.1a	Ps. 124. title	Ps. 124.1a
Ps. 41. title	Ps. 41.1	Ps. 73.1	Ps. 73.1b	Ps. 124.1	Ps. 124.1b
Ps. 41.1-13	Ps. 41.2-14	Ps. 74. title	Ps. 74.1a	Ps. 125. title	Ps. 125.1a
Ps. 42. title	Ps. 42.1	Ps. 74.1	Ps. 74.1b	Ps. 125.1	Ps. 125.1b
Ps. 42.1-11	Ps. 42.2-12	Ps. 75. title	Ps. 75.1	Ps. 126. title	Ps. 126.1a
Ps. 44. title	Ps. 44.1	Ps. 75.1-10	Ps. 75.2-11	Ps. 126.1	Ps. 126.1b
Ps. 44.1-26	Ps. 44.2-27	Ps. 76. title	Ps. 76.1	Ps. 127. title	Ps. 127.1a
Ps. 45. title	Ps. 45.1	Ps. 77. title	Ps. 77.1	Ps. 127.1	Ps. 127.1b
Ps. 45.1-17	Ps. 45.2-18	Ps. 77.1-20	Ps. 77.2-21	Ps. 128. title	Ps. 128.1a
Ps. 46. title	Ps. 46.1	Ps. 78. title	Ps. 78.1a	Ps. 128.1	Ps. 128.1b
Ps. 46.1-11	Ps. 46.2-12	Ps. 78.1	Ps. 78.1b	Ps. 129. title	Ps. 129.1a
Ps. 47. title	Ps. 47.1	Ps. 79. title	Ps. 79.1a	Ps. 129.1	Ps. 129.1b
Ps. 47.1-9	Ps. 17.2-10	Ps. 79.1	Ps. 79.1b	Ps. 130. title	Ps. 130.1a
Ps. 48. title	Ps. 48.1	Ps. 80. title	Ps. 80.1	Ps. 130.1	Ps. 130.1b
Ps. 48.1-14	Ps. 48.2-15	Ps. 80.1-19	Ps. 80.2-20	Ps. 131. title	Ps. 131.1a
Ps. 49. title	Ps. 49.1	Ps. 81. title	Ps. 81.1	Ps. 131.1	Ps. 131.1b
Ps. 49.1-20	Ps. 49.2-21	Ps. 81.1-16	Ps. 81.2-17	Ps. 132. title	Ps. 132.1a
Ps. 50. title	Ps. 50.1a	Ps. 82. title	Ps. 82.1a	Ps. 132.1	Ps. 132.1b
Ps. 51. title	Ps. 51.1-2a	Ps. 82.1	Ps. 82.1b	Ps. 133. title	Ps. 133.1a
Ps. 51.1-19	Ps. 51.2b-21	Ps. 83. title	Ps. 83.1	Ps. 133.1	Ps. 133.1b
Ps. 52. title	Ps. 52.1-2a	Ps. 83.1-18	Ps. 83.2-19	Ps. 134. title	Ps. 134.1a
Ps. 52.1-9	Ps. 52.2b-11	Ps. 84. title	Ps. 84.1	Ps. 134.1	Ps. 134.1b
Ps. 53. title	Ps. 53.1	Ps. 84.1-12	Ps. 84.2-13	Ps. 138. title	Ps. 138.1a
Ps. 53.1-6	Ps. 53.2-7	Ps. 85. title	Ps. 85.1	Ps. 138.1	Ps. 138.1b
Ps. 54. title	Ps. 54.1-2	Ps. 85.1-13	Ps. 85.2-14	Ps. 139. title	Ps. 139.1a
Ps. 54.1-7	Ps. 54.3-9	Ps. 86. title	Ps. 86.1a	Ps. 139.1	Ps. 139.1b
Ps. 55. title	Ps. 55.1	Ps. 86.1	Ps. 86.1b	Ps. 140. title	Ps. 140.1
Ps. 55.1-23	Ps. 55.2-24	Ps. 87. title	Ps. 87.1a	Ps. 140.1-13	Ps. 140.2-14
Ps. 56. title	Ps. 56.1	Ps. 87.1	Ps. 87.1b	Ps. 141. title	Ps. 141.1a
Ps. 56.1-13	Ps. 56.2-14	Ps. 88. title	Ps. 88.1	Ps. 141.1	Ps. 141.1b
Ps. 57. title	Ps. 57.1	Ps. 88.1-18	Ps. 88.2-19	Ps. 142. title	Ps. 142.1
Ps. 57.1-11	Ps. 57.2-12	Ps. 89. title	Ps. 89.1	Ps. 142.1-7	Ps. 142.2-8
Ps. 58. title	Ps. 58.1	Ps. 89.1-52	Ps. 89.2-53	Ps. 143. title	Ps. 143.1a
Ps. 58.1-11	Ps. 58.2-12	Ps. 90. title	Ps. 90.1a	Ps. 143.1	Ps. 143.1b
Ps. 59. title	Ps. 59.1	Ps. 90.1	Ps. 90.1b	Ps. 144. title	Ps. 144.1 (1st word)
Ps. 59.1-17	Ps. 59.2-18	Ps. 92. title	Ps. 92.1	Ps. 145. title	Ps. 145.1a
Ps. 60. title	Ps. 60.1-2	Ps. 92.1-15	Ps. 92.2-16	Ps. 145.1	Ps. 145.1b
Ps. 60.1-12	Ps. 60.3-14	Ps. 98. title	Ps. 98.1 (1st word)	Song of Songs	Song of Songs
Ps. 61. title	Ps. 61.1	Ps. 100. title	Ps. 100.1a	6.13	7.1
Ps. 61.1-8	Ps. 61.2-9	Ps. 100.1	Ps. 100.1b	Song of Songs	Song of Songs
Ps. 62. title	Ps. 62.1	Ps. 101. title	Ps. 101.1a	7.1-13	7.2-14
Ps. 62.1-12	Ps. 62.2-13	Ps. 101.1	Ps. 101.1b	Eccl. 5.1	Eccl. 4.17
Ps. 63. title	Ps. 63.1	Ps. 102. title	Ps. 102.1	Eccl. 5.2-20	Eccl. 5.1-19
Ps. 63.1-11	Ps. 63.2-12	Ps. 102.1-28	Ps. 102.2-29	Dan. 4.1-3	Dan. 3.31-33
Ps. 64. title	Ps. 64.1	Ps. 103. title	Ps. 103.1 (1st word)	Dan. 4.4-37	Dan. 4.1-34
Ps. 64.1-10	Ps. 64.2-11	Ps. 108. title	Ps. 108.1	Dan. 5.31	Dan. 6.1
Ps. 65. title	Ps. 65.1	Ps. 108.1-13	Ps. 108.2-14	Dan. 6.1-28	Dan. 6.2-29
Ps. 65.1-13	Ps. 65.2-14	Ps. 109. title	Ps. 109.1a	Neh. 4.1-6	Neh. 3.53-58
Ps. 66. title	Ps. 66.1a	Ps. 109.1	Ps. 109.1b	Neh. 4.7-23	Neh. 4.1-17
Ps. 66.1	Ps. 66.1b	Ps. 110. title	Ps. 110.1a	Neh. 9.38	Neh. 10.1
Ps. 67. title	Ps. 67.1	Ps. 110.1	Ps. 110.1b	Neh. 10.1-39	Neh. 10.2-40
Ps. 67.1-7	Ps. 67.2-8	Ps. 120. title	Ps. 120.1a	1 Chron. 6.1-15	1 Chron. 5.27-41
Ps. 68. title	Ps. 68.1	Ps. 120.1	Ps. 120.1b	1 Chron. 6.16-81	1 Chron. 6.1-66
Ps. 68.1-35	Ps. 68.2-36	Ps. 121. title	Ps. 121.1a	1 Chron. 12.4	1 Chron. 12.4-5
Ps. 69. title	Ps. 69.1	Ps. 121.1	Ps. 121.1b	1 Chron. 12.5-40	1 Chron. 12.6-41
Ps. 69.1-36	Ps. 69.2-37	Ps. 122. title	Ps. 122.1a	2 Chron. 2.1	2 Chron. 1.18
Ps. 70. title	Ps. 70.1	Ps. 122.1	Ps. 122.1b	2 Chron. 2.2-18	2 Chron. 2.1-17
Ps. 70.1-5	Ps. 70.2-6	Ps. 123. title	Ps. 123.1a	2 Chron. 14.1	2 Chron. 13.23
Ps. 72. title	Ps. 72.1 (1st word)	Ps. 123.1	Ps. 123.1b	2 Chron. 14.2-15	2 Chron. 14.1-14

Translations of Primary Sources

ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN DOCUMENTS

- Coogan, Michael David, ed. Stories from Ancient Canaan. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1978.
- Dalley, Stephanie. Myths from Mesopotamia: Creation, the Flood, Gilgamesh, and Others. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Foster, Benjamin R. Before the Muses: An Anthology of Akkadian Literature. 2 vols. Bethesda, Md.: CDL Press, 1993.
- . From Distant Days: Myths, Tales, and Poetry of Ancient Mesopotamia. Bethesda, Md.: CDL Press, 1995.
- Hallo, William W. and K. Lawson Younger, eds. The Context of Scripture. Vol. 1, Canonical Compositions from the Biblical World. Vol. 2, Monumental Inscriptions from the Ancient World. Vol. 3, Archival Documents from the Biblical World. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997; 2000; 2002.
- Lichtheim, Miriam. Ancient Egyptian Literature: A Book of Readings. 3 vols. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973–1980.
- Parker, Simon B., ed. Writings from the Ancient World. A series produced by the Society of Biblical Literature (Atlanta, Ga.), with each volume devoted to a particular genre and language. Volumes include: Ugaritic Narrative Poetry (ed. S. B. Parker, 1997); Law Collections from Mesopotamia and Asia Minor (M. F. Roth; 2nd ed., 1997); Hittite Myths (H. A. Hoffner, Jr.; 2nd ed., 1998); Hittite Diplomatic Texts (G. M. Beckman; 2nd ed., 1999); Hittite Prayers (I. Singer, 2002); Ritual and Cult at Ugarit (D. Pardee, 2002).
- Pritchard, James B., ed. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament. 3rd ed. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1969.

ANCIENT TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE

Greek

- Brenton, Lancelot C. L. The Septuagint with Apocrypha: Greek and English. 1851. Reprint, Peabody, Ma.: Hendrickson, 1986.

- International Organization for Septuagint and Cognate Studies. A New English Translation of the Septuagint. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000– .

Aramaic

- McNamara, Martin J.; Kevin Cathcart; Michael Maher. The Aramaic Bible: The Targums. Collegeville, Mn.: Liturgical Press, 1987– .

DEAD SEA SCROLLS

- Abegg, Martin, Jr.; Peter Flint; and Eugene Ulrich, eds. The Dead Sea Scrolls Bible: The Oldest Known Bible. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1999.
- Charlesworth, James E., ed. The Dead Sea Scrolls: Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek Texts with English Translations. Vol. 1, Rule of the Community and Related Documents. Vol. 2, Damascus Document, War Scroll, and Related Documents. Vol. 4A, Pseudepigraphic and Non-Masoretic Psalms and Prayers. Vol. 4B, Angelic Liturgy: Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice. Vol. 6B, Pesharim, Other Commentaries, and Related Documents. Louisville: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1994– .
- García Martínez, Florentino, ed. The Dead Sea Scrolls Study Edition. 2 vols. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998.
- Vermes, Geza. The Complete Dead Sea Scrolls in English. New York: Penguin Press, 1997.

APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHA

- Charles, R. H., ed. The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament. 2 vols. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1913.
- Charlesworth, James H., ed. The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. 2 vols. New York: Doubleday, 1983–1985.

PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA

- Colson, F. H. and Whitaker, G. H., trans. Philo. Loeb Classical Library. 10 vols. Cambridge, Ma.: Harvard University Press, 1961–1991.

- Williamson, Ronald. Jews in the Hellenistic World: Philo. Cambridge, Eng.: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Yonge, C. D., trans. The Works of Philo. 1854. New updated edition. Peabody, Ma.: Hendrickson Publishers, 1993.

JOSEPHUS

- Thackeray, H. St. J. and Ralph Marcus, trans. Josephus. Loeb Classical Library. 9 vols. Cambridge, Ma.: Harvard University Press, 1976–1981.
- Whiston, William, trans. The Works of Josephus Complete and Unabridged. 1736. New updated edition, Peabody, Ma.: Hendrickson Publishers, 1987.
- Williamson, G. A., trans. Josephus: The Jewish War. New York: Penguin Books, 1984.

RABBINIC TEXTS

Mishnah

- Danby, Herbert. The Mishnah: Translated from the Hebrew with Introduction and Brief Explanatory Notes. Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1933.
- Neusner, Jacob. The Mishnah: A New Translation. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988.

Talmud

- Epstein, I. The Babylonian Talmud. 30 vols. London: Soncino Press, 1935–48.
- Steinsaltz, Adin. The Talmud. New York: Random House, 1989– .

Midrash

- Bialik, Hayyim N. and Y. H. Ravinsky. The Book of Legends: Sefer Ha-Aggadah. New York: Schocken Books, 1992.
- Freedman, H. and M. Simon, eds. Midrash Rabbah. 10 vols. London: Soncino Press, 1961.
- Ginzberg, Louis. The Legends of the Jews. 8 vols. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1968.
- Hammer, Reuven. Sifrei Deuteronomy: A Tannaitic Commentary on the Book of Deuteronomy. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1986.
- Kasher, Menahem. Encyclopedia of Biblical Interpretation, A Millennial Anthology. 9 vols. New York: American Biblical Encyclopedia Society, 1953–1979.
- Lauterbach, J. Z. Mekhilta of Rabbi Ishmael. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1976.

Medieval Jewish Commentaries

- Baker, Joshua and Ernest Nicholson, trans. The Commentary of Rabbi David Kimhi on Psalms 120–150.

- Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973.
- Chavel, Charles B., trans. Ramban (Nachmanides): Commentary on the Torah. 5 vols. New York: Shilo Publishing House, 1971–1976.
- Gruber, Mayer, Rashi's Commentary on the Psalms. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1998.
- Japhet, Sara and Robert B. Salters, The Commentary of R. Samuel ben Meir, Rashbam, on Qoheleth. Jerusalem: Magnes, 1985.
- Lockshin, Martin I., trans. Rashbam's Commentary on Genesis: An Annotated Translation. Jewish Studies, vol. 5. Lewiston, N. Y.: E. Mellen Press, 1989.
- . Rabbi Samuel ben Meier's Commentary on Exodus: An Annotated Translation. Brown Judaic Series, no. 310. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997.
- . Rabbi Samuel ben Meier's Commentary on Leviticus and Numbers; An Annotated Translation. Brown Judaic Series, no. 330. Providence, R. I.: Brown Judaic Studies, 2001.
- Silbermann, A. M. and M. Rosenbaum, trans. Pentateuch with Targum Onkelos, Haphtaroth and Rashi's Commentary. 5 vols. New York: Hebrew Publishing Co., 1969.
- Strickman, H. Norman and Arthur M. Silver, trans. Ibn Ezra's Commentary on the Pentateuch. 5 vols. New York: Menorah Publishing Co., 1988– .

Medieval Jewish Philosophy

- Feldman, Seymour, trans. Levi ben Gershom: The Wars of the Lord. 3 vols. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1999.
- Frank, Daniel H., trans. The Book of Doctrines and Beliefs. Indianapolis: Hackett Publishing Co., 2002.
- Lewy, Hans. Three Jewish Philosophers: Philo, Saadya Gaon, Jehuda Halevi. New York: Macmillan Publishing Co., 1972.
- Pines, Shlomo, trans. The Guide of the Perplexed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963.

Mystical Texts

- Cohen, Martin Samuel. The Shi'ur Qomah: Texts and Recensions. Tübingen: Mohr, 1985.
- Kaplan, Aryeh. The Bahir: An Ancient Kabbalistic Text Attributed to Rabbi Nehuniah ben HaKana, First Century, C. E. New York: S. Weiser, 1979.
- Matt, Daniel C., trans. Zohar: Annotated and Explained. Woodstock, Vt.: SkyLight Paths Publishing Co., 2002.
- Sperling, Harry and Maurice Simon. The Zohar. London: Soncino Press, London, 1931–34.

Glossary

Abarbanel an alternative pronunciation of Abravanel.

Abraham Ibn Ezra see Ibn Ezra, Abraham.

Abravanel, Isaac (1437–1508) a medieval philosopher and biblical commentator. He fled from Portugal to Spain to escape a sentence of death in a supposed plot against the king; in 1492, with the expulsion of Jews from Spain, he was forced to flee again and lived in Venice. His works include commentaries on the Torah and the Prophets, as well as philosophical works that followed, and were partly intended to correct, Maimonides. His biblical commentaries were, unlike most medieval commentary, not verse-by-verse or word-by-word, but were concerned with larger passages united by a single theme; he opens each unit with a set of questions that he answers in great detail. In philosophy he insisted on the primary importance of religion and wrote against efforts to explain biblical events in naturalistic terms; he also opposed efforts to formulate a set of dogmatic principles for Judaism.

Abravanel, Judah (1460–1521) physician, poet, and philosopher, and son of Isaac Abravanel. His Dialogue on Love (published posthumously) argued that love was the structural principle of the universe, and that the soul therefore sought and could reach God through love.

Abulafia, Abraham ben Shemuel (13th century) a leading kabbalist and mystic of Spain. Abulafia taught a method of mystical insight that involved contemplating the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, seen as the elements of the names of God. His method was therefore called “The Path of the Names” (Shemot), in contrast to other kabbalistic methods called “The Path of the Numbers” (Sefirot).

acrostic a literary device in which the first letter of each line of poetry occurs according to a predetermined pattern. In the Bible acrostics only occur as alphabetical acrostics, in which the individual lines of a poem (or occasionally small groups of lines) begin with the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet in order. (This would be equivalent to the first line of an English poem beginning with A, the second with B, etc.) The acrostic form, besides giving the aesthetic pleasure of a pattern, may have been intended to make memorization easier. It may also have been intended as a way of expressing completeness: In Lamentations, for instance, the acrostic format of the individual chs might have been used to express both the completeness of the outpouring of grief and its finality. The following poems in the Bible are acrostics: Pss. 9–10, 25, 34, 37, 111, 112, 119, 145; Prov. 31.10–31; Lam. chs 1, 2, 3, 4; Nah. 1.2–8 (or 9) (incomplete).

Active Intellect in mystical thought, the repository of the intelligible forms that govern the sublunar world.

Adar the twelfth month (February–March) in the Jewish year. In order to bring the lunar calendar into alignment with the solar year, a leap year, in which there are two months of Adar, occurs seven times during each nineteen-year cycle of years (see p. 2114). This added month is called either 'adar sheni, “second adar,” or ve'adar, “and adar.”

Adonai (Heb “my Lord”) a divine title and the word generally substituted for the Tetragrammaton, יהוה, when the Bible is read aloud.

aggadah (or “haggadah,” possibly from Heb haggad, “things said” or “what is told”) the nonlegal portions of the Talmud and Midrash (see halakhah). Aggadah is concerned with explicating the meaning of Scripture in the moral sense, and with elaborating on the stories in the Bible. As such it is more akin to preaching than to legal analysis, and many aggadic collections are homiletical in character. The legal sections, halakhah, are concerned with understanding the obligations placed on the believer by the biblical text; aggadah, by contrast, contains ethical teaching as well as illustrative narrative, prayers, legends, and folklore.

Aḥad Ha'Am (Heb “one of the people” or “the people are one”) pen-name of Asher Ginzberg (1856–1927), Zionist writer.

Ahikar the hero of an ancient Near East court story who is deprived of his position through a false accusation.

‘Akedah (Heb “binding”) the story of the binding of Isaac (Gen. ch 22).

Akiva (Aqiba) ben Yosef, R. (ca. 50–135 CE), rabbi at Lydda, martyred in the Hadrianic persecutions. He played an instrumental role in the task of beginning to assemble and organize the oral law, which was continued by his pupil R. Meir and concluded by R. Judah ha-Nasi’ (Judah the Prince), resulting in the Mishnah (see).

Akkadian the language of the Assyrian and Babylonian empires. Akkadian is a Semitic language related to Hebrew, and is written in cuneiform, wedge-shaped writing, typically on clay tablets.

‘aliyah (Heb “ascent”) pilgrimage or emigration to the land of Israel; being given the honor of “ascending” to read the Torah in synagogue worship.

allegory an extended comparison in which an author, while speaking directly of one reality, intends to mean, and is understood by the reader to be speaking indirectly about, something entirely different. Allegory uses action, setting, and character to point to a symbolic level. Some texts, e.g., the “Song of the Vineyard” in Isa. ch 5, expressly mark themselves as allegorical. “Allegorical interpretation,” such as that used by Philo to draw out the meaning of the Bible, is an effort to make an allegory out of a writing that was not originally intended to be one, but that is, in the view of the interpreter, presenting a hidden meaning that the allegorical interpretation will reveal.

Amarna Letters Akkadian cuneiform tablets from the period of 1350 BCE or slightly earlier, containing diplomatic correspondence from the reigns of Pharaohs Amenophis III and Akhenaton and providing scholarly insight into the language of and the situation in Canaan in the period preceding the rise of the Israelite tribal confederation.

‘Amidah (Heb “standing”) the main prayer in Jewish worship. Also called the Shemonah ‘Esrei (eighteen [blessings]), although on regular weekdays (not Shabbat or festivals), it now consists of nineteen blessings: three at opening, followed by thirteen petitions and three at closing. For Shabbat and festivals, the three initial and final blessings frame a special blessing that focuses on the special day.

‘amora’ (Aram. “speaker”; pl. ‘amora’im) a rabbinic teacher of the talmudic period. The name is used in both Babylonia and the land of Israel.

Amorites according to the Bible, one of the native nations of Canaan. Amorites are attested in other ancient Near Eastern documents from the third millennium and onwards as residents of Western Asia who migrated to Mesopotamia and other areas. They spoke a language related to Hebrew.

amphictyony a social organization in ancient Greece where tribes are united around a central sanctuary and service this sanctuary on a rotating basis. Some scholars believe that a similar system existed in Israel in premonarchic times.

anaphora the repetition of a word or phrase at the beginning of successive lines or sentences. “As the eyes of slaves follow their master’s hand, / as the eyes of a slave-girl follow the hand of her mistress, / so our eyes are toward the LORD our God, awaiting His favor” (Ps. 123.2).

anastrophe the repetition at the beginning of one line of the word or phrase concluding the previous line. “The voice of the LORD convulses the wilderness; / the LORD convulses the wilderness of Kadesh” (Ps. 29.7).

Anat a Canaanite goddess often depicted as a warrior.

anthropomorphic (Gk “human form”) language that presents God in human or human-like terms. “Your right hand, O LORD, glorious in power, / Your right hand, O LORD, shatters the foe!” (Exod. 15.6).

antithesis the contrast of ideas through closely contrasted words. “A gentle response allays wrath; / A harsh word provokes anger” (Prov. 15.1). See parallelism, “Reading Biblical Poetry” (pp. 2097–2104).

antithetic parallelism two parallel lines related to one another by opposition, e.g., Prov. 10.4, “Negligent hands cause poverty, / But diligent hands enrich.”

apocalypse (Gk apokalypsis, “revelation”) a narrative literary genre in which an angel or other heavenly being communicates to a human being the divine plan for history and the arrangement of the supernatural order. Many apocalypses are a series of visions of heaven and earth that are then explained. Apocalypses are a feature of late biblical religion.

apocalyptic a worldview that assumes the disclosure of heavenly secrets, most typically to or for a community that perceives itself as suffering or victimized. Communities that espouse this worldview often interpret biblical passages (especially in the Prophets) as pertaining to their own time.

Apocrypha (Gk “hidden things”) a group of about 20 mostly Jewish writings (e.g., Ben Sirach, 1 Maccabees), many of which were included in the Septuagint, but that were ultimately not included in the Bible. They are, however, part of the canon of the Orthodox Christian churches, and most (though not all) of them are included in the canon of the Roman Catholic church.

apodictic law law stated absolutely, as in the Decalogue’s “you shall not,” rather than casuistically, “if a person” (see casuistic law).

apophatic (from Gk for “deny”) the theology that works by denying likenesses between God and anything that can be conceived, since God transcends all human thought and experience; the nature of God is thus inferred only negatively, by what God is not.

apostrophe an address to an absent person or personified object. There is an apostrophe to Assyria in Isa. 10.5.

Aquila (lived 2nd century CE) a Jewish reviser of the Greek Bible; Aquila tried to make the text, which had become the Bible of the early Christian church, less favorable to some christological exegesis. The translation follows the Hebrew very closely. According to tradition, he was a convert and a student of Akiva.

Aramaic a Semitic language used widely in Mesopotamia and the land of Israel during the Persian period, though it developed earlier. In the mid-first millennium, it eventually replaced Akkadian as the lingua franca of the ancient Near Eastern world. It became the ordinary language of Jews and is the language of much rabbinic literature. The Aramaic translation of the Bible is the Targum.

Arameans a Semitic people living in the area of modern Syria from the second millennium onwards. Some biblical texts suggest particular kinship between Israel and the Arameans (see esp. Deut. 26.5). Damascus was their main city.

Ark (for the Torah) a box or cabinet, typically of wood, in which the Torah scrolls are stored at the front of the synagogue. It is often finely decorated, reflecting the centrality of the Torah scrolls to Judaism.

Ark of the Covenant the chest (Heb ’aron) in the Tabernacle or Temple that contained the Pact (Heb ’edut) (Exod. 40.20), or the tablets (Deut. 10.2), or that served as the throne of the LORD (1 Sam. 4.4).

Asherah (pl. Asherim) Canaanite goddess, wife or consort of El; her sacred symbol, a pole or tree, was the object of prophetic condemnation.

Ashi, Rabbana (ca. 335–427) Babylonian ’amora’ of the Sura academy; one of the primary editors of the Babylonian Talmud.

Ashkenazi the name Ashkenaz appears in Gen. 10.3, as a descendant of Gomer, son of Japheth, son of Noah. In geonic tradition (ca. 9th century CE) Ashkenaz became identified with Germany, and Jews living in the Rhineland, and their descendants in France and Bohemia, were called Ashkenazi(m). See Sephardim.

Ashtoreth the Canaanite goddess of love and fertility; worship of Ashtoreth is condemned in Judg. chs 2 and 10.

Assyria a Mesopotamian world power, in addition to Babylonia. Its capital cities included Ashur and Nineveh. The Assyrian empire conquered the Northern Kingdom of Israel in 722 and exiled its people. The Assyrians were well-known for their massive building projects and for their cruelty in war.

Astarte see Ashtoreth.

’atbash a form of cipher in which a word is transformed into a code by letter substitution, in which the last letter of the alphabet is substituted for the first, the next-to-last for the second, and so on: alef becomes tav, bet becomes shin, gimel becomes resh, etc. (In English, A would become Z, B would become Y, etc.) Using this method, Jeremiah transforms Babylon into Sheshach (Jer. 25.26; 51.41): b-b-l or bet-bet-lamed becomes sh-sh-k or shin-shin-kaf.

atonement the expiation for sin, or reparation for an injury committed against another. Heb kapparah (with possible root meaning “to cover”) refers to ritual cleansing of the Temple precincts.

Atrahasis hero of the Mesopotamian epic of Atrahasis, who survives the god Enlil’s efforts to destroy humankind by, among other means, a flood (with some parallels to the story of Noah in Gen. chs 6–9). Sections of the epic are reworked in tablet 11 of the Gilgamesh Epic, which also recounts a flood story.

’Avot (Heb “fathers”) the name of the first blessing in the ’Amidah, from its reference to “the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob”; also the name of a tractate in the Mishnah; see Pirkei ’Avot.

’Avot de Rabbi Nathan A rabbinic midrash on the mishnaic tractate of ’Avot; see Pirkei ’Avot.

Baal the Canaanite storm god; also a word meaning “lord” or “master, owner.”

Babylonia a Mesopotamian world power. It often competed against Assyria, which it conquered in 612 BCE. Its major city was Babylon, Akkadian for “gate of the gods.” Its main god became Marduk, and its religion and literature were extremely influential, even on its arch-rival Assyria. Babylonia destroyed the First Temple in 586, and was conquered by Cyrus the Great in 539.

Babylonian exile the forced relocation of some of the population of Judah, perhaps the ruling portion of it, after the conquest by Babylonia in 597–586 BCE. The exile ended with the permitted return to the land under Cyrus (beginning ca. 538 BCE).

Babylonian Talmud see Talmud.

Bahya ben Asher (d. 1320) biblical commentator of Spain. He used the Zohar’s method of distinguishing four levels of meaning in Scripture: peshat (contextual sense), remez (allegorical sense), derash (homiletical sense), and sod (mystical sense). These were known by the acronym pardes.

ban (Heb herem) the devotion of war booty (including people) in its entirety to the deity (see esp. Deut. 20.17), or the forfeiture of goods (e.g., idols) from which no benefit is permissible. See herem.

Baraita (Aram. "outside," i.e., external to the Mishnah) a section of rabbinic material with a ruling or interpretation like that in the Mishnah, that is from the tannaitic period but not contained in the Mishnah.

Bar Kappara 3rd century CE scholar; he lived in the land of Israel.

Bar Kokhba, Shimeon (Aram. "son of a star") sobriquet of Shimeon Bar Kosiba (d. 135 CE), leader of the second Jewish revolt against Rome.

Bavli, Talmud the Babylonian Talmud; see Talmud.

BC Before the Common Era, an alternative to BC.

Bedouin an Arab nomad; in general, a member of a nomadic desert tribe.

Bel Akkadian "master," (cognate to Baal) alternative name for Marduk, head of the Babylonian pantheon.

ben Asher, Aaron (9th–10th centuries) Masorete of Tiberias. Ben Asher was one of the primary scholars who established the Hebrew Masoretic Text.

berit (Heb "treaty") a term that may be used of a treaty between two individuals, groups, or nations, or between God and Israel (see covenant).

bet midrash (Heb "house of study") a place with a traditional Jewish library where people study Jewish texts together and listen to classes on these texts. Along with the synagogue, to which it is often connected, this is the central Jewish institution.

bicolon unit of Heb poetry composed of two cola, or lines (sometimes called a distich).

binding (of Isaac) see 'Akedah.

Bonfils, Joseph 11th century rabbi of Limoges, France; tosafist, biblical scholar, and author of liturgical poetry who introduced such poetry (piyyutim) into the synagogue service.

Booths, Festival of see Sukkot.

bull a clay seal with the impression of a signet ring or other symbol of authority.

Cairo Genizah the storeroom (see genizah) of the synagogue of Fostat in Old Cairo (built 882 CE). In it were discovered many thousands of fragments of texts, including a portion of Ben Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) in Heb, and many early rabbinic documents, translations of the Bible, liturgical texts, poetry, letters, and other writings.

calendar see chart on p. 2114.

Cambyses son of Cyrus and king of Persia 529–522 BCE. He conquered Egypt in 525.

Canaan a designation for the area roughly equivalent to the land of Israel in prebiblical Mesopotamian and Egyptian documents. In the Bible, it most often refers to the pre-Israelite land of Israel.

canon (Gk "reed" or "measuring stick") the group of writings considered to be holy or authoritative by a particular community. The canon of the Bible is the list of books in the Tanakh.

cantillation the practice of chanting or intoning the biblical text in public reading, according to traditional systems of tone, pitch, and length; also, the written system of marks in the biblical text that serves as a guide to the systems of recitation.

casemate wall a double wall, usually the outside of a larger house or of a city wall, that is filled up with dirt or rubble.

casuistic law (also called "case law") the form of law dealing with the treatment of specific cases. It is frequently in the form of "if/when . . . then" formulae. Most ancient Near Eastern law collections are formulated this way.

CE Common Era; equivalent to the christological term AD.

charismatic (Gk "gifted, graced") characterized by the ability to influence or lead others; personally magnetic; talented.

Chemosh the chief god of Moab.

cherubim (pl. of kerub) composite, winged creatures; two carved cherubim guarded the Ark in the Temple, where they may have served as guardians of sacred places and attendants on YHVH.

chiasm, chiasmus (from Gk chi, the letter that resembles an "X") inverting the second pair of terms in a parallel structure, so that the corresponding terms, if laid out in a square, would form an X. The resultant pattern is ABBA, ABCBA, ABCCBA, etc. For example: "Truthful speech (A) wins the favor of kings (B); / They love those (B) who speak honestly (A)" (Prov. 16.13). Chiasmus can also describe the structure of an entire passage, and it can involve several terms or parts of a passage, each of which has an analog that occurs in the reverse order of the original list of terms or sequence of parts.

Christian Hebraists Christian scholars, inspired by the examples of Origen and Jerome, who taught the importance of returning to the Hebrew text of the Christian Old Testament, and who therefore studied Hebrew with rabbinic scholars and influenced Christian Bible translation and commentary to rely on the Hebrew and not on the Latin Vulgate text. The beginnings of Christian Hebraism are generally traced to Andrew of St. Victor (d. 1175), a monk at the Abbey of St. Victor in Paris, where Hugh of St. Victor (d. 1141) had established a school specializing in biblical exposition. There was a significant renaissance of Christian Hebraism during the Renaissance.

citadel a stronghold or fortress, whether standing alone or serving as the inner fortification of a city.

Classical Biblical Hebrew the main dialect of biblical Hebrew, reflected in over half of the Bible. This dialect was used in Judah through the Babylonian exile of 586. Classical Hebrew was then replaced by Late Biblical Hebrew, comprised of Exilic and Postexilic Hebrew. Both of these latter forms were significantly influenced by Aramaic.

colon, (pl. cola) a single line of poetry (also known as a stich).

colophon (Gk “summit,” by extension “finishing touch”) an inscription at the end of a writing giving information about authorship.

Community Rule (or Rule of the Community) a scroll from the Dead Sea community, 1QS, that sets out the communal arrangements under which the community functioned, or at least those that they held up as an ideal: holding property in common; eating, blessing, and advising one another in unity; preparing for the eschaton; and training new members of the community in their responsibilities. Also called The Manual of Discipline.

concordance a word index to a given text, listing each occurrence of a given word along with a context line so that scholars may better see how a particular word is used.

concubine a woman who is the sexual partner of a man, and is legally recognized as such, but who does not have the full status of a wife.

Cordovero, Moses ben Jacob (Moshe ben Ya‘akov; 1522–1570) kabbalist, of Spain. Cordovero wrote commentaries on the Bible and on kabbalistic works; his interests were philosophical, but ultimately his views were mystical and esoteric.

corvée forced labor for the state cosmology any account (mythical or otherwise) of the origin of the world.

covenant (Heb berit) a treaty between God and Israel. Some covenants have specific conditions or treaty stipulations, while others are covenants of grant. The biblical notion of covenant between God and Israel, especially as it appears in Deuteronomy, may reflect a theologized reworking of treaties between Assyrian kings and their vassals.

cult, cultus the religious ritual and practice of a particular group; the rules governing worship, sacrifice, etc.

Cyrus king of Persia (559–530 BCE). He defeated Media in 550 and conquered most of the ancient Near East, including Babylonia, allowing the Jewish exiles in Babylonia to return to the land beginning ca. 538.

Cyrus Cylinder an Akkadian inscription describing the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus.

D the Deuteronomic source, which covers almost the entire book of Deuteronomy (except for sections of the last few chapters).

Davidic dynasty the direct descendants of King David, who reigned in Jerusalem from the 10th century through the 6th. An attempt to reinstitute this dynasty after the return from exile was not successful.

Day of Atonement (Heb Yom Kippur) commemorated on the tenth day of the seventh month in the fall. It was a day of fasting and abstinence, as well as performance of certain key Temple rituals (see Lev. ch 16).

Day of the Lord a time mentioned in many prophetic books where God appears as a warrior, sometimes fighting against Israel, sometimes against Israel’s enemies. The earliest text to mention this Day is Amos 5.18.

Dead Sea Scrolls a group of texts, mostly from the 2nd century BCE through the 1st century CE found in the area of the Dead Sea. Most are from eleven caves at Qumran. These scrolls, mostly preserved in fragmentary form, include biblical texts, ancient texts which were known in translation before the scrolls were discovered, and new texts. Often the nonbiblical texts are divided into sectarian documents, namely those unique to the group that lived in this area, and nonsectarian documents that were in the group’s library, but were not unique to this group, often understood as the ancient Essenes (see essay, “The Bible in the Dead Sea Scrolls,” pp. 1920–28).

defective spelling the form of a word in the Heb text that is missing one or more optional vowel letters. See plene spelling.

defilement a state of ritual impurity caused by contact with a corpse or other impure object. Priestly literature in the Torah is especially concerned with defilement and removing defilement (see essay, “Concepts of Purity,” pp. 2041–47).

derash (Heb d-r-sh, “inquire”) interpretation (see midrash).

derashah (pl. derashot) interpretation, particularly in a homiletic context; a sermon.

Deutero-Isaiah the general term for the portion of Isaiah beginning with ch 40. Most scholars consider Deutero-Isaiah to consist of chs 40–55 (or 40–54). These chapters are primarily concerned with the promise of return from exile and the events leading up to the decree of Cyrus (538 BCE) permitting the exiles to return to Judah and rebuild their city and Temple. See Trito-Isaiah.

Deuteronomistic History the account in the books Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, that portrays the history of Israel as a partial failure to keep the covenant faithfully, and the consequences of that failure in the subsequent history of the people. These books show significant theological and linguistic similarities, suggesting that they have a common editor or editors.

Deuteronomistic having the qualities or the theology of the Deuteronomistic History.

Diaspora (Gk "dispersion") the places outside the land of Israel where Jews live.

diatribe an argument against a position or critical of a person holding it. Diatribe often includes an imagined dialogue between opposing viewpoints.

dittography (Gk "twice written") a copying error in which a word or phrase is written twice; see haplography.

divination the effort to learn about the future or the current situation, particularly such an effort undertaken by occult means, such as consulting mediums.

Documentary Hypothesis the theory that the Torah (Pentateuch) is a combination of sources or documents from different eras and different geographical or social groups: J or the Yahwist source, possibly reflecting the traditions of Judah during the monarchic period; E or the Elohist source, possibly from the Northern Kingdom; D or the Deuteronomistic source, possibly from a group involved in the reforms undertaken by Josiah and his successors; and P or the Priestly source, the groups that maintained Temple worship and the ritual and other practices, and who assembled these materials during or after the exile (see "Torah," pp. 1–7).

Dov Baer (1710–72) a Hasidic leader and follower of Isaac Luria; he became well known as a preacher (maggid) and is therefore known as "the Maggid."

E one of the four sources or traditions in the Torah, which characteristically refers to God as 'elohim. More recently, as scholars have examined the texts more closely, they speak of a JE tradition, since E as a separate source is difficult to isolate entirely. It may represent the traditions and practices of the inhabitants of the northern areas of Israel.

Edom/Edomites the territory and people to the south-east of Judah, first attested in late second millennium texts. Edom is identified in Gen. ch 36 with Esau, Jacob's brother. The enmity between these brothers and between Judah and Edom mirror each other.

El a Canaanite deity popular in the second millennium. In the texts from Ugarit, he is a significant deity, but is often depicted as old and is largely supplanted by Baal.

Elephantine Papyri Aramaic documents, mostly from the 5th century BCE, found on the island of Elephantine, near Syene (modern Aswan) in Egypt. The papyri show that among those who inhabited the colony on Elephantine were Jews who kept up religious observances, such as Passover, and had their own temple.

Eliezer, Rabbi two tanna'im are named Eliezer: Eliezer ben Hyrcanos (1st–2nd century), teacher of R. Akiva ben Yosef; and Eliezer ben Yosei ha-Galili (2nd century), a pupil of R. Akiva.

Elijah a biblical prophet and miracle worker living in the 9th century in northern Israel. Much postbiblical folklore collected around Elijah, who is depicted as ascending to heaven rather than dying in 2 Kings ch 2. He was later thought of as the forerunner or announcer of the messiah.

Elijah ben Solomon Zalman (1720–1797) the "Vilna Gaon," scholar of Vilna, Lithuania. He studied religious and secular subjects (such as mathematics and philosophy), arguing that knowledge in these areas was necessary for Torah study. For eight years he wandered throughout Europe, meeting with and teaching local rabbis and establishing his reputation for learning. He then returned to Vilna, where he spent the rest of his life expounding the Talmud. He strongly opposed the nascent Hasidic movement.

Elohim the Heb word 'elohim is usually translated "God," though its plural form is sometimes translated "gods" (e.g., Gen. 6.2, "sons of elohim," NJPS "divine beings"). It is originally a common noun (a god), though it is often used as a proper noun for The God of Israel, even though it is a plural form.

Elohist the putative author of the E source (see E).

Enki the Mesopotamian god of wisdom.

Enlightenment the philosophical movement that flourished in the 18th century in continental Europe (primarily Germany and France) and England. It was characterized by an emphasis on the importance of human reason and reflection on actual experience, a tendency to favor materialist as opposed to religious views, optimism about human progress, and pragmatic approaches to politics and ethics. The movement within Judaism corresponding to the Enlightenment, and influenced by it, is called Haskalah.

Enlil a chief Mesopotamian god, ruler of earth and sky; he also decreed the fate of human beings and the other gods.

Enoch, books of writings dating from the 3rd century BCE to the 6th century CE, attributed to Enoch (Gen. ch 5). They contain apocalyptic visions, describe visits to the heavenly places, and make use of the character of Enoch (who, according to the Genesis account, was believed to have been taken directly to heaven without dying) as a guide to and interpreter of the meaning of history. Portions of some of these works have been discovered among the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Enuma Elish a Babylonian creation epic, in which the god Marduk becomes king of the gods after creating the cosmos from the body of the goddess of the deep, Tiamat.

ephod the priestly garment similar to a tunic. It held the breastplate that contained the lots Urim and Thummim, used in casting lots to determine the divine will; this led to the use of the term ephod to mean the agency of divination.

eponym the use of a representative figure to stand for an entire group; the "Table of Nations" in Gen. ch 10 contains eponyms such as Canaan (v. 6).

eschatological, eschatology (Gk eschata, "last things") a concern with the end time, or the end of the world as we know it, whether that involves a new historical era radically discontinuous from this one, or an entirely new cosmos after the destruction of the current one.

Essenes a Jewish group that flourished from around the 1st century BCE to the 1st century CE. They kept the Jewish law with utmost rigor, living apart from other Jews in their own communities. Most scholars believe that the members of the Qumran community (where the Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered) were Essenes.

etiology (Gk aition, "cause") an explanation for a word, an event, or a natural phenomenon. An etiological story is one that posits a particular cause (not necessarily the right cause) for some event. For example, the story at the end of Gen. ch 32 explains why Israelites do not eat the thigh muscle.

euphemism the substitution of an inoffensive word for one that is too explicit. The word "legs" in Isa. 6.2; 7.20 is a euphemism for "genitals."

exegesis (Gk "lead into") the explanation or interpretation of the meaning of a written text, especially a biblical text.

exilarch (Heb resh galuta') the title of the head of Babylonian Jewry.

exile the forced removal of a people from its land, and the community in which they lived in the foreign land. The Israelites of the Northern Kingdom were exiled by the Assyrians in the late 8th century, and the Judeans were exiled by the Babylonians in the early 6th century. Specifically, "the exile" is the period from 586 to approximately 539 BCE. During this time the ruling classes of Judah were forced to leave Judah and live in Babylonia. See Babylonian exile.

exodus the journey that Israel took from Egypt toward the land of Israel, according to the book of Exodus.

fable an illustrative story in which animals or plants have speaking parts. Judg. 9.8–15 is a fable told against the proposal to establish a monarchy in Israel.

Fertile Crescent the agriculturally fertile areas of Egypt, Israel, and Mesopotamia, forming a rough arc from the Nile through the coastal regions of Israel to the Tigris-Euphrates basin.

Festival of Weeks see Shavuot.

First Temple the Temple in Jerusalem from Solomon's time (10th century) until the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 586 BCE. The First Temple period extends from the 10th to 6th centuries BCE.

form criticism a method of studying biblical texts that developed in Germany in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. This method isolates structures or forms of particular types or genres of biblical literature, and attempts to connect these forms to a particular social setting (Sitz im Leben) (see "Modern Study," pp. 2084–96).

Former Prophets the subdivision of the Nevi'im section of the Bible that includes the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings (Heb title nevi'im ri'shonim). See also Latter Prophets.

Galilee the northernmost geographical area of Israel.

galut (Heb "exile") most often used of the Babylonian exile (see).

gaon, pl. geonim title of heads of rabbinic academies in Babylonia from the mid-6th to 11th centuries. The title is taken from the phrase, ro'sh yeshivat ga'on Ya'akov, "head of the academy [that is] the pride of Jacob."

Gehenna Gk spelling of Heb ge'hinnom, "valley of Hinnom," the area outside Jerusalem where trash was burned. By metaphoric extension it came to mean a place of torment, and in postbiblical literature meant "hell."

Gemara (Aram. "completion") the commentary on the Mishnah that supplemented and extended the Mishnaic material, although not all of the Mishnah is treated in the Gemara. The Mishnah and the Gemara together form the Talmud.

gematria, pl. gematriot (gimatriya, likely from Gk geometria) a procedure for interpreting a word or phrase by its numerical value. Heb letters may represent numbers (alef = 1; bet = 2, etc.), and the letters of a word or phrase are added up and equated with other words having the same total. For example, according to Gen. 14.14, Abraham musters 318 retainers. Some rabbinic commentaries suggest that he merely mustered Eliezer, since the numerical value of Eliezer's name is 318 ($'-l-y-'z-r$ is $1+30+10+70+7+200$).

genizah a storeroom in a synagogue used for keeping old books and objects, especially those that are too sacred to be thrown away. See Cairo Genizah.

geonic period the period characterized by the teachings of the academies in Babylonia that extended from roughly the mid-6th to the mid-11th century CE. See gaon.

ger (Heb) in biblical usage, a resident alien, a foreigner who sojourns in Israel. In rabbinic literature, the word means a convert; conversion did not exist in the biblical period.

Gersonides see Ralbag.

Gikatilla, Yosef ben Abraham (1248–ca.1325) kabbalist of Spain. He was a student of Abraham Abulafia, and later was associated with Moshe de Leon, author of much of the Zohar. Gikatilla was one of the main formulators of the kabbalistic view that the divine name, YHWH, implicitly contained all the letters of the Hebrew alphabet.

Gilgamesh the Babylonian and Assyrian epic whose hero, Gilgamesh, travels the world in search of immortality. Among the characters he encounters is Utnapishtim, whose tale of the flood has parallels with the biblical account of Noah (Gen. chs 6–9).

God, names for see Adonai, Elohim, YHWH.

God, titles for see Tzevaot, Melekh ha-'Olam, ha-Shem (see Shem).

Graf-Wellhausen Hypothesis the hypothesis developed in the 19th century (primarily by the German biblical scholar J. Wellhausen) that the Torah is comprised of four more or less complete documents, J, E, D, and P, in that order. See Documentary Hypothesis.

Greek Bible a general term for the variety of ancient translations of the Bible into Greek in antiquity, including the Septuagint and the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion.

Guide of the Perplexed (Moreh Nevukhim) the philosophical work by Maimonides (Rambam) that interpreted the Torah mainly in the light of Aristotelian philosophy with the aim of removing contradictions between the teaching of Torah and the understandings of philosophy.

H the Holiness Collection (imprecisely called the Holiness Code), the ritual and ethical laws found in Lev. chs 17–26. The author of these laws was affiliated with the Priestly school, but was probably writing after that school penned the bulk of its material that now appears in the Torah. The authors of the Holiness Collection likely wrote small sections dispersed throughout the first four books of the Torah. The collection is so named from the exhortation, "You shall be holy, for I, the LORD your God, am holy" (Lev. 19.2).

haftarah (Heb "conclusion") the reading from a prophetic book that follows the Torah reading in the Sabbath or festival service.

Haḡ Sameaḥ good wishes for a holiday: "joyous festival."

Haḡ festival, particularly one of the three Pilgrim Festivals (shalosh regalim: Passover [pesaḥ], Shavuot, Sukkot).

Haggadah of Pesah ("telling of Passover") the liturgical recitation used at the Passover Seder; also the book that contains the recitation and instructions of the Seder.

haggadah see aggadah.

halakhah (Heb "way," from halak "go"; pl. halakhot) the legal portions of the Talmud, or any legal ruling according to Jewish law.

Halevi, Judah (ca. 1075–ca. 1141; also Yehudah ha-Levi) Hebrew poet, of Spain, and author of the Arabic philosophical work, The Kuzari, a defense of Judaism.

Hallel (Heb "praise") Psalms 113–118, which are recited on major Jewish festivals.

Hammurabi Babylonian monarch (reigned 1792–1750 BCE), responsible for the formulation of a legal collection (the Code [or Laws] of Hammurabi) that is one of the earliest collections of case law on various subjects.

haplography (Gk "writing once") the unintentional omission of a repetition—letter, syllable, word, or phrase—from a written text because the scribe's eye went to the second occurrence; see dittography.

ha-Shem see Shem.

Hasidic, Hasidim (Heb. Hasid, "pious one") a renewal movement that began in the mid-18th century in Eastern Europe under the influence of the Ba'al Shem Tov ("master of the good Name"), R. Yisrael ben Eliezer (ca. 1700–1760).

Haskalah see Enlightenment.

Hasmonean Revolt the uprising led by the family of Mattathias Heshmon against the Seleucid ruler Antiochus IV Epiphanes beginning in 166 BCE, particularly by Mattathias's son Judah (or Judas) Maccabeus ("the hammer"), which succeeded in liberating Jerusalem and the surrounding territory from Seleucid rule in 164. When the Temple, which had been desecrated by Antiochus, was retaken by the Jews it was rededicated, an event commemorated in the festival of Iḥanukkah ("dedication").

Hebrew Bible a term used to refer to what Christians call the Old Testament. Though the two terms refer to basically the same body of writings, the order of books in the Hebrew Bible (that is, the Jewish Bible) differs from that found in the Old Testament.

heikhalot rabbati ("greater halls") mystical writings probably dating from the 3rd to 7th centuries CE. The "halls" (or "palaces, temples") are heavenly realms through which the narrative moves.

heikhalot zutarti ("lesser halls") mystical writings of the same type as the heikhalot rabbati.

Hellenism a general term for the spread of Greek culture, politics, and language around the Mediterranean in the period after the conquests of Alexander the Great (d. 323 BCE).

hendiadys figure of speech that expresses a compound idea by two words linked by a conjunction. E.g., "pain and childbearing" (Gen. 3.16) means "pangs in childbearing."

ḥerem (Heb "ban") the total dedication of conquest to God; later, the exile or suspension of someone from the community ("excommunication").

hermeneutic principles the rabbinic types of interpretation. A list attributed to Hillel (1st century BCE) includes: kal vaḥomer (deduction from minor to major); gezerah shavah (analogy between texts based on a common word); binyan 'av nikatuv 'ehad (applying a principle derived from one verse); binyan 'av mishenei ketuvim (applying a principle derived from two verses); kelal uferat uferat ukelal (modifying the general from the particular; modifying the particular from the general); kayotze' bo bemakom 'aher (principles developed from similar passages); davar halamed me'inyano (deduction from context). See "Classical Rabbinic Interpretation" (pp. 1844–63.)

Hexapla the compendium of six Bible versions (in columns: 1. Hebrew, 2. Hebrew transliterated into Greek, 3. Greek [Aquila], 4. Greek [Symmachus], 5. Septuagint, 6. Greek [Theodotion]) compiled by the early Christian scholar Origen (d. 254). The original Hexapla, which ran to 7,000 pages, was lost, but quotations from it exist in various early writings and a Syriac translation of column 5 (known as the Syriac Hexapla or Syro-Hexapla), prepared by a Christian bishop, Paul of Tella (who held office in 618–619), is an important witness to the transmission of the text of the Septuagint.

Hexateuch (Gk "six scrolls") a grouping of the first six books in the Bible—Genesis through Joshua—to complete the Torah narrative with the conquest of the land that is in Joshua. See Pentateuch, Tetrateuch.

high places places of worship or sacrifice, often at the top of a hill or mountain. Under the influence of the centralization of worship in Jerusalem at the Temple, particularly in the Deuteronomic reform carried out under Josiah, the high places were vilified as idolatrous, though in earlier writings, and even in the narratives in Kings, there are clear indications that sacrifice and worship took place in numerous locations throughout the land of Israel.

higher criticism the effort to distinguish among the sources of biblical documents, and to trace them back to their origins, so far as that is possible; distinguished from textual criticism ("lower criticism"), which is concerned with establishing the most accurate text in its final form. See Documentary Hypothesis.

Hillel an important early rabbinic sage of the 1st century BCE; according to tradition, he migrated from Babylonia to Israel. Tradition also suggests that he set up a "house" or scholarly school. The House of Hillel often differs with the House of Shammai in halakhic rulings, and is typically more lenient.

Holiness Collection see H.

homoioteuton (Gk "similar ending") a copying error in which the scribe omits words or phrases between a word that is repeated or between words with similar endings.

hortatory characteristic of writing or speech that aims at changing the behavior of the hearers or inspiring them to a particular course of action.

ḥumash (from ḥamishah ḥumshei Torah, "five fifths of Torah") a synonym for the Torah, or the book used by a synagogue congregation to follow the Torah reading.

Hyksos the mostly Semitic rulers of Egypt during the period 1665–1560 BCE (approximately).

hyperbole exaggeration for effect. "Would the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, / With myriads of streams of oil?" (Mic. 6.7).

hypostasis (Gk "that which stands under," i.e., the real nature or essence of anything; pl. hypostases) a Greek philosophical term, meaning both "essential being" or what defines a thing as a member of a class of things and "individual being" or what a thing is in itself. It was used by, among others, the neoplatonist mystics. It refers to the three constitutive orders of reality, the One, Mind, and Soul, each of which is an hypostasis. See "The Bible in the Jewish Mystical Tradition" (pp. 1976–90).

Ibn Akin, Yosef ben Yehudah (ca. 1150–1220) philosopher and biblical commentator, of Spain and Morocco. His commentary on the Song of Songs treated it as an allegory of the soul's effort to free itself from matter and unite with the intellect that emanates from God.

Ibn Bal'am, Yehudah (11th century) biblical commentator and grammarian, of Spain. His commentary on the Torah and the Prophets is a link between the work of Saadia Gaon and Abraham Ibn Ezra.

Ibn Daud, Abraham (ca. 1110–1180) philosopher and historian, of Spain. His work was concerned to show the consonance of science and religion, and particularly of Aristotelianism and Judaism.

Ibn Ezra, Abraham (1089–1164) poet, biblical commentator, translator, philosopher, who lived in Spain, N. Africa, Italy, France, and England. His biblical commentaries cover large portions of the text, and provided Hebrew readers with their first chance to read the comments of Saadia Gaon, which Ibn Ezra translated from Arabic.

Ibn Ezra, Moshe (1070–1138) philosopher and poet of Spain. He wrote on philosophical matters such as the nature of the divine, the intellect, and nature, but his best-known works are poems, particularly those sacred poems in the Sephardic prayer book.

Idumea Gk form of the name “Edom”; province in the land of Israel during Persian, Hellenistic, and Roman times, located south of Judah (Yehud), between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean.

impurity a ritual state which forbade the impure individual to partake in Temple rituals (see defilement, and “Concepts of Purity,” pp. 2041–47).

Inanna Sumerian goddess of fertility and war; equivalent to the Babylonian Ishtar. She was similar to the Greek Persephone in being captive in the underworld, later released.

inclusio the use of the same word or phrase at the end of a passage as appeared at the beginning, thus rounding off or completing it. Inclusio may have been used to mark subsections of a work. It is also called inclusion, frame, and envelope structure.

incubation the practice of sleeping in a particular place, or in contact with particular things (animal skins, the ground) in order to induce dreams that might provide divine guidance.

Ingathering (kibutz galuyot, “ingathering of the exiles”) the belief that the people will ultimately return to the land of Israel from their places of exile.

intercalation adding an extra time unit (day or month) to a calendar to compensate for the inexact fit between the solar year and the daily or lunar cycle. In the Jewish calendar, an extra month (a repetition of Adar) is intercalated in seven years of the nineteen-year cycle. See Adar; see also p. 2114.

interpolation an insertion of material into a previously existent text. In the absence of textual evidence—e.g., differing forms of a manuscript for a given text—interpolation must be inferred and is often the subject of scholarly disagreement.

interregnum an interruption or gap between the end of one reign or dynasty and the beginning of the next.

intertextuality the interrelationship between one part of a text (or collection of texts) and other parts. Intertextuality can take the form of recurrent images (the vineyard in Isa. 5:1–10 and 27:2–4), quotation and/or inner biblical interpretation (Jer. 25:11–12 is partly quoted in Dan. 9:2 before it is reinterpreted), or allusion (Isa. 54:8 alludes to the promise made to Noah in Gen. 9:11).

Ishtar the Mesopotamian goddess of fertility and war (the Gk spelling was Astarte); the Canaanite version of her name is Ashtar. See Inanna.

Isis the Egyptian mother-goddess, wife of Osiris, the god of vegetation and hence of regeneration.

J the posited document or narrative tradition that is one of the constituent parts of the Torah (Pentateuch), according to a scholarly hypothesis codified by J. Wellhausen and subsequently developed by numerous biblical researchers. J is usually understood to be the earliest source, and is Judean; it frequently depicts God, for whom it uses the Tetragrammaton (יהוה, misvocalized Jehovah, thus J), in very anthropomorphic terms. See introduction to the Torah (pp. 1–7).

Jerome (ca. 340–420) Christian theologian and translator. Beginning in 382, he produced a Latin version of the Bible, the Old Testament of which was based not on a previous Latin version nor on the Greek text (Septuagint) but on the Hebrew. In order to do this Jerome studied Hebrew with rabbis of the time, an unusual step for a Christian. His version, which became known as the Vulgate (“common”) because it was the translation into commonly used Latin in the Western world, was completed in 405.

Jerusalem Talmud also called the Palestinian Talmud or the Talmud of the land of Israel, although none of these titles is fully accurate. This Talmud, mostly reflecting traditions of the Galilean ’amora’im of the 3rd and 4th centuries CE, is a commentary on several tractsates of the Mishnah. It was ultimately seen as less authoritative than the longer, more comprehensive, and more carefully edited Babylonian Talmud. See Talmud.

Josephus Hellenistic Jewish historian (ca. 37–ca. 100 CE). Four of his writings have survived: The Jewish War (an account of the rebellion against Rome in 66–70 CE, with background information starting at about 200 BCE); The Antiquities of the Jews (a history from creation up to the start of The Jewish War); Against Apion, a defense of Judaism; and an autobiography. Josephus provides invaluable historical information about Judaism and its background from 200 BCE to 100 CE; his account of the rebellion, in which he was a participant, is partly that of an eyewitness. He also provides first-hand information about the Essenes and the Pharisees (he was at one time or another associated with both), as well as information about the Sadducees. Josephus is important in understanding Second Temple Judaism and the context in which rabbinic Judaism developed.

jubilee (Heb yovel, perhaps “ram” from the sounding of the ram’s horn to mark the beginning of the observance) the year of release for slaves and return of ancestral lands to their original owners (or descendants of the owners), to occur every fifty years (after seven sabbaths of years) (Lev. ch 25). It is a cornerstone of Priestly ideology, but it is uncertain if it was ever practiced.

Jubilees, book of a pseudepigraphic book, retelling much of Genesis and Exodus, representing itself as a hidden revelation to Moses. It was most likely written in the 2nd century BCE in the land of Israel. The book gets its name from its concern with cycles of time. Jubilees was apparently considered authoritative by the Qumran community. It is attributed to Moses and purports to be a revelation to him from the angel of the Presence.

Judah the area of southern Israel. According to the biblical text, after the death of Solomon, the kingdom was divided into two, with Judah in the south and Israel in the north. The capital of Judah was Jerusalem.

Judah Halevi see Halevi, Judah.

Judah the Prince R. Judah ha-Nasi, the prince or patriarch (Heb nasi) of the community in Israel in the late 2nd century CE. He was very powerful, and had close relation with the Roman rulers. He played a central role in editing the Mishnah, and tradition sees him as the editor of that work.

Judea the Roman name for the area of Judah.

kabbalah “what is received,” i.e., matter handed to one. In the 12th century and later, however, kabbalah came to mean esoteric or in some sense mystical teaching. Kabbalah taught that God was inaccessible by direct experience, and could only be apprehended through emanations of the Godhead; Torah in kabbalistic teaching had a hidden meaning, and meditation on texts was a method of ascent to a mystical vision.

kaddish (Aram. “holiness, sanctification”) prayer in praise of God that is recited at the conclusion of the principal section of the synagogue service; a special type of kaddish is also recited in memory of the deceased.

Kalam (Arabic “speech, reason”) Islamic scholasticism, dating from the 8th century CE, a theology that developed in response to the rediscovery of Aristotelian philosophy in the Islamic world. The earliest proponents of this school were called Mutazilite (“separatist”) because they were seen as separate from orthodox Islamic teaching. The Kalam movement influenced both Karaite and rabbinic teaching, including among the latter the work of Saadia Gaon.

kapparah see atonement.

Karaites (lit. “Scripturists”; from Heb Miqra) the theological movement in Judaism dating from Babylonia in the 8th century CE. Karaites claimed to be restoring an original form of Judaism from the Second Temple period, and were opposed by the rabbis of their time, particularly Saadia Gaon. Karaite calendars, festivals, dietary restrictions, and other practices differed in various ways from rabbinic norms. The movement reached its height around the 11th century though a small Karaite community is still in existence today in Israel.

kashering the process of making a permissible food kosher or fit for consumption, esp. soaking and salting meat to remove blood.

kashrut the system of dietary laws and restrictions; see kosher.

kataphatic (from Gk for “affirm”) the theology that works by ascribing positive attributes to God, through which one understands the divine nature.

Kedushah (Heb “holiness”) prayers of sanctification of God, especially the third blessing of the ‘amidah, including the words “Holy, holy, holy” from Isa. 6.3.

kere see qere.

ketiv (“what is written”) the biblical text in its written form, in contrast, in certain cases, to the way it is to be read aloud. See qere.

Kiddush short for kiddush ha-yom, “sanctification of the day;” both the ceremony and the prayer that proclaims the holiness of the Sabbath (or festival), recited over wine before the Sabbath (or festival) meal.

Kimḥi a family of grammarians and exegetes in medieval France (originally from Spain); the three great scholars of this family were Yosef Kimḥi (ca. 1105–1170), who defended Jewish interpretation against Christian criticism in Sefer ha-Berit, and his two sons, Moshe and David. The latter, a prolific biblical commentator and grammarian, was known as Radak.

kitvei hakodesh (Heb “holy writings”) a rabbinic term for the Bible; the Holy Scriptures.

kohen (Heb “priest”) a member of the hereditary group within the Levites, traditionally supposed to be descended from Aaron or Zadok, who alone were allowed to serve as Temple priests.

kosher (Heb “fit” or “proper”) a general term used in postbiblical texts for dietary laws; usually applied to food, but also to other ritual objects and practices. Most dietary laws apply to meat: It may not be consumed with blood in it, certain kinds of internal fat are not to be eaten, it may not be consumed along with dairy products, and some meats (e.g., pork), sea creatures (e.g., shellfish), and “creeping things” (e.g., snails) are not permitted.

Latter Prophets the canonical division of Nevi'im that includes the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve (Heb title nevi'im aḥaronim).

Laws of Eshnunna the legal collection of a Mesopotamian city-state, about 50 km (30 mi) from present-day Baghdad, that flourished in the early part of the 2nd millennium BCE. These laws include parallels to those found in the legal collections in the Torah.

LBH Late Biblical Hebrew, the dialect spoken during and after the Babylonian exile, when Aramaic influenced Hebrew significantly.

Lekha Dodi the mystical 16th-century hymn or song that is sung at the beginning of the Sabbath. The title means “Come, my friend,” and the first line is: “Come, my friend, to meet the bride; let us welcome the presence of the Sabbath.”

Letter of Aristeas an apocryphal work, the supposed eyewitness account of the translation of the Torah into Greek. It is the origin of the story that the translators numbered 72 (rounded off to 70 and therefore the reason that this Greek translation of the Bible is called the Septuagint [Gk “seventy”]) and is abbreviated LXX).

Levi ben Gershon, R. see Ralbag.

Leviathan the monster of the sea in Canaanite mythology, who is defeated by Baal. This has echoes in Ps. 74.14–17 and elsewhere.

levirate marriage (from Latin levir, “husband’s brother”) the provision that if a man died without an heir to carry on his name, his brother would marry the widow, and the first son she bore would be regarded as the dead brother’s heir. This practice is dealt with in Deut. 25.5–10, but it is unclear whether it was actually carried out to any extent; by rabbinic times ḥalitza, the ceremony that released the levir from this obligation, was preferred.

lex talionis (Latin “law [of retribution] in kind”) punishment fitting the crime; see talion.

liminal (Latin limina, “threshold”) the term for rites or practices that governed life passages, such as entry into puberty or marriage.

lingua franca a common tongue or shared language that enables people with different native languages to converse, carry on commercial relationships, etc. In the Persian period Aramaic replaced Akkadian as a lingua franca around the Near East; during the Hellenistic period Greek did the same for the lands surrounding the Mediterranean.

littoral a region lying along the shore of a large lake or sea.

liturgy the form or rite for communal, public worship.

lower criticism, textual criticism, as distinguished from source criticism (“higher criticism”). See “Textual Criticism of the Bible” (pp. 2067–72).

Luria, Itzhak (1534–1572) halakhic and kabbalistic teacher, active in Safed, Israel. Though he wrote little or nothing himself, his followers after his death produced a large amount of writing presenting his teaching, which basically stated the goal of all creation to be the gradual perfection of all realms, divine and human. This perfection was to be sought not just individually, but communally, and therefore fit with messianic expectations and other movements for renewal.

Lurianism the teachings of Itzhak Luria or based on the writings of his followers.

LXX the Roman numeral 70, the standard abbreviation for the Septuagint.

Ma’ariv (from ‘erev, “evening”) the evening prayer service, held after nightfall. See Minḥah, Shaḥarit.

Ma’at Egyptian goddess of reason and order; her name literally means “truth.”

maftir (Heb “completer”) the reader who completes the Torah portion by repeating the last three or so verses of it, reciting the Torah blessing, and reading the haftarah (see).

“Maggid, the” see Dov Baer.

Maimonides, Moses (also Moshe ben Maimon) see Rambam.

malediction curse; opposite of benediction, “blessing.”

manumission release from servitude.

Marduk chief god of Babylon; according to Enuma Elish, a Babylonian epic of creation, he formed the cosmos from the corpse of Tiamat, goddess of the deep.

maskil, maskilim (lit. “knowledgeable”) a title for an educated person; later, a kabbalist; still later, an adherent of Haskalah (Enlightenment).

Masorah the system of markings (vowel signs, marginal notes, cantillation and accent marks, etc.) that were added to the consonantal Hebrew text by scribal scholars (Masoretes) in the early Middle Ages.

Masorete a scholar of the scribal schools that in the early Middle Ages established the basic Heb text for the Bible, fixed its accepted pronunciation, and ensured its accurate copying and transmission by a system of markings (Masorah).

Masoretic Text (MT) the Heb text as established by the Masoretes.

matrilineal tracing descent through female ancestors; see patrilineal.

matzah, matzot unleavened bread, associated with Passover, but also used with certain sacrifices.

Megillot (Heb “scrolls”) the five books of Kethuvim that are read during various festivals: Song of Songs in Pesah, Ruth on Shavuot, Lamentations on Tish’ah be’av, Ecclesiastes on Sukkot, and Esther on Purim.

Meir, R. 2nd century pupil of Akiva who helped to reconstitute the Sanhedrin after the second (Bar Kokhba) revolt. R. Meir’s teachings were partly aimed at organizing the oral law, and led to the compilation of the Mishnah under R. Judah ha-Nasi (Judah the Prince).

Mekhilta two halakhic midrashic commentaries on sections of Exodus, one attributed to R. Ishmael and the other to R. Shimeon bar Yoḥai.

Melekh ha-‘Olam Heb “ruler of the universe,” a title for God.

Mendelssohn, Moses (1729–1786) German scholar, defender of Judaism against Christian argument, and leader of the Haskalah or Enlightenment movement. He led the efforts of a team of scholars to translate the Bible into German (printed in Hebrew characters).

merism a figure of speech in which opposing terms, e.g., “good and bad,” are combined to convey the idea of including both terms and everything in between. The “tree of knowledge of good and bad” (Gen. 2.17), therefore, may mean the tree of knowledge of everything.

merkavah a name for mystical writings, inspired by Ezek. ch 1, in which the visionary is conducted through the heavenly realms by a chariot (merkavali).

Merneptah Stele an Egyptian inscribed stone that includes the first mention of Israel outside the Bible. It celebrates the victories of Pharaoh Merneptah (ca. 1200 BCE) in the area of Canaan.

Merodach Heb version of Marduk, chief god of Babylon (Jer. 50.2).

Mesha Stele (also called the “Moabite Stone”) a commemorative stone dating from about 830 BCE with engraved text celebrating the reign of King Mesha of Moab (2 Kings 3.4–5). Besides an account of the dealings of Mesha with the descendants of Omri, king of Israel, the text deals with the god of Moab, Chemosh, and the favor that Chemosh has shown to Mesha in contrast to his predecessors in allowing Mesha to reclaim territory from Israel. It also contains a reference to the herem or ban, indicating that this idea was not unique to Israel.

Mesopotamia (Gk “between the rivers”) the area between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers.

messiah (Heb mashiah, “anointed [one]”) a title for the king or other servant or agent of God (priest, prophet, or even non-Israelite Cyrus in Isa. 45.1). In the Tanakh, mashiah never refers to the future ideal king.

metaphor a direct comparison between two unlike things: “The LORD is my shepherd” (Ps. 23.1). See simile.

metonymy a figure of speech in which a word is used in place of another word to which it is closely related. In Isa. 41.5 “the coastlands” is a metonymy for “the inhabitants of the coasts,” i.e., foreigners.

meturgeman (Aram. “interpreter”; cf. Targum) the one who provided a running translation into the language of the congregation—Aramaic, in the origin of the practice—of the Torah reading (and other Scripture readings) in the synagogue service.

mezuzah (Heb “doorpost”) a parchment on which are written the paragraphs of the Shema (Deut. 6.4–9; 11.13–21), and on the back of which sh-d-y (“Shaddai,” “Almighty”) is written, often so as to be visible through a small opening in the case. Sh-d-y is interpreted as an acronym for shomer delatot Yisra’el, “guardian of the doors of Israel.”

midrash, midrashic (Heb derash, “inquire”) interpretation to draw out meanings from a text that are other than, or go beyond, the “plain sense” (see peshat).

Milcom Heb form of the name of the god of Ammon. See Molech.

Minḥah (Heb “offering”) the second of the daily prayer services. It occurs during the period between noon and sunset. See Shaharit, Ma’ariv.

miqra’ (“that which is read [aloud]”) the standard rabbinic way of referring to the biblical text.

Miqra’ot Gedolot the Rabbinic Bible, an edition of the Masoretic Text accompanied by the Aramaic translation (Targum) and various commentaries such as Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Ramban, and Rashbam.

Miqṣat Ma’aseh ha-Torah (“matters of the Torah”) one of the Dead Sea Scrolls (4QMMT), in the form of a letter from the Qumran sect to its opponents, explaining, among other things, the differences in legal interpretation and application between the Qumran community and the Jerusalem establishment of the time.

Mishnah (Heb “oral instruction,” from shannah, “repeat”) the compilation of oral law and rabbinic commentary, edited ca. 200 CE, that is the basis of the Talmud. The Mishnah in its final form is generally attributed to R. Judah ha-Nasi (Judah the Prince, ca. 135–220), though it contains material that may go back centuries before R. Judah’s time.

Mishneh Torah the first codification of Jewish law, by Maimonides (Rambam).

mitzvah (Heb “commandment”) a religious obligation; by extension, any good deed.

MMT see Miqṣat Ma’aseh ha-Torah.

Moab/Moabites the territory and inhabitants south-east of the Dead Sea.

Moabite Stone see Mesha Stele.

Molech the title—"king"—of the Ammonite god. The worshippers of this god were accused of child sacrifice.

Moshe ben Maimon, R. see Rambam.

Moshe ben Naḥman, R. see Ramban.

Moshe de Leon (ca. 1240–1305) kabbalist of Spain. He wrote kabbalistic books in Hebrew, but also wrote (in Aramaic) large parts of the Zohar, a purported compendium of 2nd-century rabbinic teachings that is the main work of kabbalistic commentary.

Mot the Canaanite god of death.

motif an image or character type that recurs throughout a literary work. The Servant motif occurs in Isa. at 42.1–4; 49.1–6; 50.4–11; 52.13–53.12.

Musaf ("addition") the extra service on a Sabbath or festival, after Shaharit (see).

Musar Movement a 19th-century Lithuanian movement to promote piety and ethical behavior; its founder was R. Yisrael Salanter (1810–1883). Its practices continue in yeshivas influenced by followers of the movement.

Mutazilite Kalam see Kalam.

Naḥmanides Moshe ben Naḥman, known as Ramban (see).

narrative a connected account of an incident, or a longer account including many incidents. Narratives can be historical, fictional, legendary, mythical, or a combination of types.

necromancy the practice of divination by communication with the dead, who are presumed to have knowledge of the future.

Negev the high plateau south of the central hill country of Israel.

Neoplatonism the philosophical movement, originating with Plotinus (ca. 204–270), that saw the universe as a series of emanations flowing out from the One, the causeless, unknowable source of all that is. The emanations, Mind (nous) and Soul, are, along with the One, called hypostases. The individual's task is to return to the One by contemplation, involving a progressive detachment from the world of matter and sense and ultimately from all categories of thought until the One can be grasped in an indescribable void of thought.

new moon see Rosh Ḥodesh.

Ninth of Av see Tish'ah be'av.

Noahide laws the basic commandments laid upon Noah, and therefore seen as binding upon all human beings, Jews and Gentiles alike: They prohibited blasphemy, idolatry, sexual immorality, murder, robbery, and eating blood; and they commanded justice.

notarikon, pl. notarikonim (from Gk notarikon, "short-hand") a method of interpretation that takes each letter of a word as the initial letter of another word, thereby creating a phrase that is treated as the full meaning intended by the word; also breaking a word into constituent parts and interpreting those parts in order to reveal a hidden meaning within the original word. For example, rabbinic interpretation treated the first word of the Decalogue, 'anokhi (the longer word for "I"), as an acronym for the Aramaic sentence 'ana' ketavit yehavit, "I [God] wrote it [and] gave it."

obelisk a four-sided stone shaft, usually tapered and topped with a pyramid, characteristic of ancient Egypt.

'Olam the biblical Heb term for unending (time), extended in postbiblical Heb to mean all space, i.e., the world or universe.

oracle a unit of prophetic speech; usually translates masa' ("burden").

Oral Torah a synonym for the Mishnah and Talmud. According to traditional rabbinic belief, the oral law was given to Moses on Mount Sinai along with the written law, the Torah. The oral law was, however, as its name suggests, originally transmitted orally alongside the Torah, as the authoritative interpretation of the Torah. As a result of historical exigencies, it was committed to writing by the Rabbis, in stages, in the first millennium CE.

Ovadiaḥ of Bertinoro (ca. 1450–1509) commentator on Mishnah, from Bertinoro (Italy). By treating the Mishnah itself, in isolation from its treatment in the Talmud, Ovadiaḥ encouraged the study of Mishnah independently of the Talmud.

P the Priestly document in the Torah, comprised of both narratives and laws. It is concerned, among other things, with laws and regulations, ritual practices, the proper conduct of Temple worship, holiness and purity, and genealogies. P may also have had a hand in the shaping or redaction of the Torah. See introduction to the Torah (pp. 1–7).

Palestine a name derived from the Roman designation Provincia Syria Palaestina, "Syro-Palestinian Province," which replaced Provincia Judaea after the revolt of 135 CE; Palaestina was the Roman spelling of "Philistine," and the designation was probably intended as a derogation of Jewish claims to the territory.

Palestinian Talmud the Jerusalem Talmud or Talmud Yerushalmi; see Talmud.

parallelism a characteristic feature of biblical Hebrew poetry in which the second line of a unit in some way echoes the meaning or grammatical structure of the first line. This can take the form of a repetition of the meaning, or of a statement of opposites, or of a further statement that serves to extend or modify the first line in some way. See “Reading Biblical Poetry” (pp. 2097–2104).

parashah the portion of Torah designated to be read publicly for each week of the year. There are 54 parashiyot, to provide for the maximum possible number of Sabbaths in a year (that can only occur in an intercalated or leap year). In years with fewer Sabbaths, the readings are combined to produce fewer portions. The weekly portion is also sometimes improperly called the Sidrah, “arrangement.”

pardes a Late Biblical Hebrew word borrowed from Persian, meaning “park, garden, orchard.” It was later employed as an acronym for the four levels of meaning in Scripture according to the Zohar: pešhat (contextual sense), remez (allegorical sense), derash (homiletical sense), and sod (mystical sense).

Paschal pertaining to the Passover (ultimately from the Gk pascha, derived from Heb pesah).

Passover Haggadah, Haggadah of Pesah the “telling” of the Passover story in the context of the household liturgy of Pesah, which accompanies the ritual meal, the Seder.

Passover see Pesah.

patriarchs the founding fathers (avot) of Israel: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

patrilineal tracing one’s descent through male ancestors; see matrilineal.

Pentapolis the five cities of the Philistines (see): Ashdod, Ashkelon, Ekron, Gath, Gaza.

Pentateuch (Gk “five scrolls”) the first five books of the Bible—Genesis through Deuteronomy—regarded as a unit after its final editing during or after the exile. The traditional term in Judaism for this collection of books is Torah, “teaching.” Although these five books are traditionally grouped together, they contain markedly different kinds of writing—prehistory, narrative, law, ritual instruction, etc.—and scholars have investigated the materials of which they are composed. Deuteronomy is largely a separate work that was probably attached to the first four books at a later stage, leading some scholars to speak of a Tetrateuch consisting of Genesis through Numbers; and it is also the case that the actual narrative climax of the story, the conquest of the land of Israel, is given in the book of Joshua, leading other scholars to speak of a Hexateuch consisting of Genesis through Joshua. See introduction to the Torah (pp. 1–7).

Persian period ca. 539–333 BCE, from the time of Cyrus the Great until the Greek conquest by Alexander.

Pesah (probably “protection”; others “pass over”) the name of the festival commemorating the exodus from Egypt. The first day involves the sacrifice of the lamb, which took place on the eve of the exodus (14 Nisan); the rest of the festival, Hag ha-Matzot or “festival of unleavened bread,” was probably originally a festival marking the beginning of the spring barley harvest. Pesah is the first of the shalosh regalim or “three pilgrim festivals.”

pešhat (Heb “simple”) the “plain sense” or “contextual sense” of a text, often contrasted with derash, the homiletical meaning.

pesher, pesharim (Heb “interpretation”) a type of commentary on the Bible from the Qumran community in which the biblical text is understood to be actualized or fulfilled in the interpreter’s time period. Some are comments on verses in biblical order, while others group verses by subject; typically, the comment contains the word pesher.

Peshitta (Syriac “simple”) a translation of the Bible into Syriac (a dialect of Aramaic) for the use of Syriac-speaking Jewish communities; it was largely taken over by Syriac-speaking Christians, who added a Syriac translation of the New Testament.

Pesikta de Rav Kahana and Pesikta Rabbati (Aram. pesikta, “section”) two collections of midrash that deal with selected biblical passages, the first dating from the 5th–7th century, the second from the 9th–13th.

petihta (“opening”) an introduction to a midrashic unit, often begun with a verse unconnected to the biblical text being interpreted. Sometimes termed “proem.”

Pharisees a movement among Jews in the 1st century CE, according to Josephus and the writings in the New Testament. The Pharisees were concerned to extend Jewish practice into all areas of life, and followed the tradition of interpretation (Oral Torah) associated with the schools of Hillel and Shammai. They were thus proponents of a Jewish identity separate from the larger non-Jewish culture that surrounded Judea, but were also opponents of the more conservative Sadducees, who did not accept their traditions of oral law. See Sadducees.

Philistines a group from the Sea Peoples, who invaded and settled on the coastal region of Canaan. They had been repulsed from an invasion of Egypt (ca. 1190 BCE). The five major Philistine cities (the Pentapolis) were Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, Gath, and Gaza.

Philo Judaeus (ca. 20 BCE–50 CE) Hellenistic Jewish philosopher of Alexandria, Egypt. Philo worked out a system that tried to interpret biblical concepts and beliefs in terms of the philosophy of Plato and his followers. In this system, God cannot be known directly, but only through intermediate beings; the soul, the higher element in the human person, is always attempting to return to God, its origin, although if this task is not far enough along at the time of the individual's death, the soul may have to transmigrate into another body and try again. In trying to make this philosophy compatible with Judaism, Philo developed a highly allegorical exegesis of the Bible.

Phoenicians the people who lived in the area north of Israel, in part of what is present-day Lebanon. Their chief cities were Tyre and Sidon. The Phoenicians were known throughout the eastern Mediterranean region as merchants, and for producing a reddish-purple dye, from which they apparently got their name (phoinix is the Gk word for the color of the dye).

phylacteries see tefillin.

pilpul dialectical argument; superseded in talmudic study in some locations by logical argument promoted by the followers of the Vilna Gaon.

Pirkei 'Avot ("chapters of the Fathers") a tractate of the Mishnah (called 'Avot) that begins by tracing the transmission of the oral law from Moses to the Rabbis; emphasizes the strong link between Torah study and ethical behavior; and contains non-legal, moralistic sayings of various Rabbis. 'Avot is included in the traditional prayerbook and is made part of the liturgical recitation in many communities.

piyyut (formed from payyetan, the creator of a liturgical poem; from Gk poietes, "thing made," "poem") a liturgical poem accompanying the prayers in the synagogue service. Piyyutim began to be composed around the 5th century in the land of Israel, and new ones continued to be created up until the 18th century.

plene spelling (from Latin "full") the form of a word in the Heb text that includes all of the vowel letters. See defective spelling.

primogeniture the social arrangement by which the eldest son inherits a father's title or the bulk of the father's property.

proem a short introduction or preface to a literary text. See petihta.

proleptic anticipatory; literary device of foreshadowing or anticipating a later development in a narrative, or anticipating and answering an argument from an opponent.

prophet (Gk prophetes, "speak out" or "speak forth") the LXX translation of navi ("one who is called"), the standard Heb term for prophet. Synonyms include "seer," "man of God," and "visionary." See the introduction to Nevi'im (pp. 451–461).

prophetic lawsuit see riv.

Pseudepigrapha (Gk "things falsely attributed") the name for a class of writings not included in the canon, many of which are ascribed to figures of antiquity like Enoch, Moses, and Solomon. Most of these works, which were not canonized by any community, were written by Jews in the Hellenistic period.

Purim the festival that commemorates the delivery of the Jews in Persia from destruction, as recounted in the book of Esther. It is celebrated on 14 or 15 Adar.

qere ("what is read") a biblical word as it should be pronounced, in contrast to what is written in the text. See ketiv.

qinah Heb "lament."

qinah meter a metrical pattern consisting of a line with three stresses followed by a line with two stresses; it is primarily used in psalms of lament or complaint, and in the book of Lamentations, though it can also express joy (Ps. 65).

Qumran community the settlement near Wadi Qumran at the Dead Sea, most likely composed of Essenes. The Qumran group was a sectarian Jewish community that kept its own practices in opposition to the established community in Jerusalem and Judea; the library of this group was discovered in 1947 and is known as the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Rabbanite an adherent of the rabbinic teaching tradition, in contrast to the Karaites, who questioned or denied many halakhic interpretations of the Rabbis.

Radak acronym for Rabbi David Kimḥi (ca. 1160–1235), son of Yosef Kimḥi, biblical commentator, of France. He wrote commentaries on Genesis, Psalms, Proverbs, Chronicles, and the Prophets, as well as a Hebrew grammar and lexicon.

Ralbag acronym for R. Levi ben Gershon, Gersonides (1288–1344), medieval talmudic scholar of France. Ralbag wrote on philosophy, astronomy, and mathematics, in addition to his biblical exegesis and talmudic explanations; his conception of God was philosophical, particularly Aristotelian. He wrote commentaries on most of the books of the Bible.

Rambam acronym for Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon (Moses Maimonides) (1135–1204), a philosopher and rabbi—also a practicing physician—was probably the greatest medieval Jewish philosopher. His writings include Sefer ha-Mitzvot ("Book of the Commandments"), Mishneh Torah, a code of Jewish law, and the philosophical work Guide of the Perplexed. Originally from Spain, he lived part of his life in Egypt.

Ramban acronym for Rabbi Moshe ben Nahman (1194–1270), or Nahmanides, rabbi and scholar, of Spain. He defended Judaism against Christian arguments so effectively that he was persecuted and fled to Israel (Acre); his writings on the Torah and on early kabbalistic works were influential in the later kabbalistic movement.

Rashbam acronym for Rabbi Shemuel ben Meir (ca. 1080–1160), talmudic and biblical commentator, of France. His biblical commentaries concentrated on explicating the literal sense of the text; he often disputed the commentary of his grandfather, Rashi.

Rashi acronym for Rabbi Shlomo ben Isaac (ca. 1040–1105), French talmudic and biblical scholar. He was the author both of a commentary on the whole Bible and of a commentary on the Talmud Bavli (Babylonian Talmud), both of which became extremely popular. His scriptural interpretation, largely taken from earlier sources, favored the contextual sense of the text rather than a set of atomistic interpretations to each phrase; his talmudic commentary was part of a greater effort to interpret Jewish law for an increasingly far-flung population.

Rav a 3rd century Babylonian 'amora' whose real name was 'Abba ben 'Aivu. "Rav" means "great" and is a tribute to the regard in which he was held by his students at the academy in Sura, which he founded. Rav and Mar Samuel are seen as the main teachers in the tradition that became the Babylonian Talmud. Rav's specialty was issues relating to religious law and interpretation.

redaction criticism the study of how already existing textual units—narratives of incidents, laws, proverbs, or other isolatable pieces that can be disentangled by source criticism—were combined into larger texts by the activities of editors, called "redactors." Redaction criticism concentrates on the perspective of the editor, trying to deduce what editorial intentions can be understood from the way smaller units are arranged, expanded, and combined.

redactor an editor who works with already existing units to combine them into larger wholes.

riv (pronounced "reev") the literary form in the Prophets and elsewhere of a "covenant lawsuit."

Roman period the period from 63 BCE onwards, marking the beginning of Roman rule of Judea.

Rosh Ha-Shanah (Heb "head [i.e., beginning] of the year") the fall New Year in the Jewish calendar, 1 Tishri. (Rosh Ha-Shanah is now observed for two days.) The beginning of the religious calendar is 1 Nisan.

Rosh Hodesh (Heb "new moon") the beginning of the month, celebrated as a festival in biblical times (e.g., Isa. 1.13–14).

Saadia Gaon Saadia ben Joseph (882–942) was the gaon (head of the academy) of Sura in Babylonia and the greatest of the geonim. He translated the Torah and other books of the Bible into Arabic, along with a short commentary.

Sadducees a movement among Jews in the 1st century CE, according to Josephus and the New Testament. They held to a strict application of Torah and to maintaining Temple worship according to its mandate; in order to continue the Temple practices without interference, the Sadducees were apparently willing to collaborate with the occupying Roman power to some extent, including accepting Roman interference in the choice of high priest. They were opposed to the Pharisees in not accepting the traditions of oral law as a guide to Torah practices, and they were also opposed to the political activists who wished to rebel against Roman rule, fearing that any rebellion would bring an end to the limited autonomy under which they could maintain Temple worship. See Pharisees.

Samaritan Pentateuch a text of the Torah in Hebrew used by the Samaritans. This text disagrees with the Masoretic Text at many points. Some of these disagreements reflect Samaritan beliefs (e.g., in the religious importance of Mt. Gerizim), but others are supported by the Dead Sea Scrolls and reflect an alternate textual tradition.

Samaritans the descendants of the population of Samaria (Northern Kingdom) after the invasion of that kingdom and the deportation of the inhabitants in 722 BCE. The Samaritans regard themselves as descended from the Jewish remnant after the deportation, but the returning exiles from the Southern Kingdom (after the Babylonian exile) did not regard them as Jews, seeing them rather as descendants of foreigners who had been settled there after the Jewish population had been removed. Therefore, beginning with Ezra and Nehemiah, the leadership forbade intermarriage between Samaritans and Jews. The Samaritans maintained worship (with a temple on Mt. Gerizim) and the Torah (but not the rest of the Bible), although their calendar is not the same as the Jewish calendar.

Samuel ben Hofni (also Shemuel ben Hofni) gaon of the Sura academy in Babylonia from ca. 997 until his death in 1013. He wrote commentaries in Judeo-Arabic on parts of the Torah (including a translation), and also philosophical and theological works.

Samuel, Mar 2nd–3rd century Babylonian 'amora', a contemporary of Rav and founder of the other great Babylonian academy at Nehardea. Samuel and Rav are the two sources of the teaching that became the Babylonian Talmud; Samuel specialized in issues related to civil law.

Sanhedrin (ultimately from Gk synedria from syn- and hedra, "with seat," i.e., "council") the religious court that held ruling authority over the Jewish people during the Roman period and into the Byzantine era; also, a tractate of the Mishnah dealing with issues of the law courts in general.

scroll a long strip of parchment (treated leather) or papyrus (reeds split, moistened, and pressed together), on which a text was written in columns. The scroll was read by unrolling one side while rolling up the other, to expose successive columns of text.

Sea Peoples remnants of the Mycenaean or Aegean civilizations, which collapsed towards the end of the second millennium BCE. Some of these people sailed eastward on the Mediterranean and attacked those living along the littoral; they were repulsed from Egypt (ca. 1190) and settled along the coast of Canaan at about the same time the Israelites were entering the land from the other direction. The biblical Philistines are among the Sea Peoples.

Second Isaiah see Deutero-Isaiah.

Second Temple the Temple constructed ca. 515 BCE by the returning exiles, and continued and expanded over the course of time, until its destruction by the Romans in 70 CE.

Seder, Sedarim (Heb "order") the ritual meal and recitation of Passover eve. Also, the major divisions of the Mishnah.

Seder 'Olam ("order of the world") a rabbinic history of the world and the Jewish people up to the 2nd century CE.

Sefirot ("ciphers" or numbers) the ten numbers that formed part of the basis of creation in mystical thought; primarily the emanations from the Godhead that correspond to these numbers.

Seleucid empire the political entity that ruled over Syria and (at times) Judea after the death of Alexander the Great. The Seleucid ruler Antiochus IV "Epiphanes" desecrated the Temple in 167 BCE, leading to the Maccabean revolt and the rededication of the Temple in 164 BCE, an event commemorated in the festival of Hanukkah.

Sephardim based on Sepharad, the early Jewish name for Spain (based on a misunderstanding of Obad. 1.20, which refers to Asia Minor, specifically Lydia); by extension the name of Jews living in Iberia or descended from those who did.

Septuagint the Gk translation of the Heb text of the Bible, begun with the Torah in Alexandria in the 3rd century BCE. According to a legend repeated in the Letter of Aristeas, 72 scholars gathered to translate and finished their work in 72 days; this number, rounded to 70 and represented in Latin as LXX, became the standard symbol for the Septuagint.

Sforno, Ovadiah ben Yaakov (1475–1550) philosopher and Bible commentator of Italy. Sforno was concerned to explicate the plain meaning of the text, and was opposed to kabbalistic interpretation.

Shabbat (Heb "cessation") the Sabbath day; also, a Tractate in the Mishnah (order Mo'ed), in the Tosefta and in the Talmuds, dealing with the laws of Shabbat.

Shaharit (Heb "morning") the morning prayer service. See Minhah, Ma'ariv.

shalosh regalim "three pilgrimages," the three Pilgrim Festivals—Pesah, Shavuot, Sukkot, when all Israelite males were expected to go up to the Jerusalem Temple.

Shavuot the festival of "Weeks" (also "Pentecost," Gk for "fiftieth" [day]), the spring harvest, occurring according to Priestly texts fifty days (seven full weeks) after Pesah. It is the second of the shalosh regalim.

Shekhinah a postbiblical term for the "dwelling" or "presence" of God with Israel; by extension, the divine manifestation in the community's life, or the sense of divine immanence within the world. In kabbalistic thought, Shekhinah is the feminine aspect of God that must be reconciled with the masculine, higher aspects so that God's love can be manifested in the world.

Shem, ha-Shem "name" or "the Name," a locution for YHVH to avoid saying the actual name of God (see Deut. 28.58).

Shema the first word, used as a title, of the exhortation (Deut. 6.4), "Hear, O Israel, the LORD our God is one LORD" (or, "the LORD our God, the LORD is one"); also the name of perhaps the most important and best-known prayer in Judaism, comprised of Deut. 6.4–9; 11.13–21; Num. 15.37–41.

Shemini 'Atzeret "eighth [day] of assembly," following the seven days of Sukkot; in the Diaspora it is celebrated as two days, the second of which is Simhat Torah.

Shemoneh 'Esrei "the Eighteen," rabbinic name for the 'Amidah, from the number of benedictions in the original prayer.

Shemuel ben Meir see Rashbam.

Sheol the underworld or abode of the dead. In the Bible, all deceased descended to Sheol; there is no concept of a separate heaven and hell.

Shephelah the foothills leading to the central hill country of the land of Israel.

Shimeon bar Yoḥai (also Simeon ben Yoḥai) a 2nd century Rabbi, pupil of R. Akiva ben Yosef and teacher of R. Judah ha-Nasi' (Judah the Prince). R. Shimeon began the classification of halakhah. He was the subject of legendary tales based on the period of his life in which he was in hiding from Roman persecution, reportedly living in a cave. The medieval kabbalists claimed that during this sojourn in the cave the doctrines of mysticism were revealed to him, and thus the Zohar is presented as teachings of, and tales about, R. Shimeon.

Shi'ur Komah mystical work from the 10th century CE or earlier, which tries to convey a sense of God's infinite greatness by a description of God's immense size.

shiv'ah (Heb "seven") the seven days of mourning following the death of a near relative.

Shlomo ben Isaac, R. see Rashi.

shofar the ram's horn for ceremonial use. In ancient Israel it was sounded to announce the anointing of a king or as a summons to war or to sound an alarm; today, in the synagogue, it is sounded on the High Holy Days.

Siddur (Heb "order") the traditional Jewish prayer-book.

signet ring a ring bearing a personal seal or impression, used to make an indentation in clay as a sign of authenticity of authorship.

Simhat Torah "rejoicing of Torah," the second day of Shemini Atzeret, marking the completion of the annual Torah reading cycle.

simile a comparison between two unlike things in which one is compared with the other on the basis of a posited similarity, usually using the terms like or as: "My heart is like wax, melting within me" (Ps. 22.15).

sod (Heb "secret") in mystical interpretation, the hidden or inner meaning of a text; the hidden or inner life of God.

source criticism the effort to discover the written sources or documents behind a text and to explore how the sources were combined into larger units. See Documentary Hypothesis.

Spinoza, Baruch (Benedict) (1632–77) philosopher. Spinoza was born a Jew, but as his philosophy developed he became increasingly at odds with traditional Jewish teaching, and he was excommunicated at the age of 24. Besides his philosophical writings, Spinoza engaged in biblical criticism (see esp. his "Of the Interpretation of Scripture" in his Theological-Political Tractate), and in some respects anticipated critical findings that did not become established until well after his death, including the assertion that someone other than Moses wrote the Torah.

Sukkot (Heb "booths") the autumn harvest festival (hag ha-asif, "festival of ingathering"), during which it is customary, following Lev. 23.42–43, to dwell in temporary booths. It is the third of the shalosh regalim.

Sumer the civilization that arose in southern Mesopotamia during the late 4th millennium BCE. Organized around city-states, the Sumerian culture held sway for most of that time until it was finally superseded by Hammurabi in 1750 BCE. The Sumerians developed cuneiform writing, which involved using a wedge-shaped reed to press marks into wet clay. The clay was then baked and the resulting tablet could be stored. Many cuneiform tablets have been recovered from archeological sites in Mesopotamia, from Sumer and from later civilizations, such as Babylonia, that adopted the cuneiform method of writing.

Sura the southern Babylonian city that was the site of one of the two academies (the other was in Pumbedita) that were centers of rabbinic and geonic study. Sura was founded by Rav in the 3rd century CE and continued in existence for more than 800 years.

suzerain the lord or ruler to whom loyalty is due in a covenant relationship. (Although the term is actually Old French for "sovereign," and originally applied to the feudal relationship of lord to peasant or subsidiary, it has been adapted for the ancient Near Eastern covenant system.)

Symmachus a 2nd–3rd century translator of the Bible into Greek, whose translation was included in Origen's Hexapla (a compendium of six Bible versions). Most of the Hexapla, and therefore most of Symmachus's translation, has been lost, and nothing is known about Symmachus as a person.

syncretism the incorporation into one religion of practices and teachings derived from another, or the effort to combine two different religious traditions into a third, composite religion.

synecdoche figure of speech in which a part of a thing or concept is used to represent the whole—e.g., "hand" for "worker"—or the larger whole is used to represent the part—e.g., "the law" for "police."

synonymous parallelism an imprecise term used for the type of parallelism (see parallelism) where the second line or colon of a bicolon echoes the meaning of the first in different terms, e.g. Isa. 1.3, "An ox knows its owner, An ass its master's crib: Israel does not know, My people takes no thought." See "Reading Biblical Poetry" (pp. 2097–2104).

Tabernacle the temporary sanctuary for containing the Ark of the Covenant, and for worship and sacrifice in the wilderness according to Priestly tradition. Exod. chs 25–30 contain instructions for building it; the construction is narrated in Exod. chs 35–40.

tablet a slab, typically of clay, with a smoothed surface that can be inscribed with a text.

talion (Latin talio, "in kind" from talis, "like," "such like") a punishment that is of the same kind as the crime: exacting an equivalent penalty, such as an equal economic loss for theft, or death for murder, or "an eye for an eye." Talion is well-attested in Mesopotamian law, and in some biblical legal collections.

tallit four-cornered fringed shawl worn during prayer; also called tallit gadol, "large tallit," in contrast to tallit katan, "small tallit," worn throughout the day beneath the clothing by observant Jewish men (see Num. 15.38–39; Deut. 22.12).

Talmud (Heb “teaching”) the title of the two great collections of rabbinic teaching, the Jerusalem Talmud or Talmud Yerushalmi and the Babylonian Talmud or Talmud Bavli. The Talmuds were compiled beginning after 200 CE, as an extensive commentary on the Mishnah; they consist of comments on, and extensions of, the Mishnah sections to work out the application of Jewish teaching to everyday life, but they also include much other material, and information and teaching on a wide range of topics. The form of the Talmuds is that passages of the Mishnah are commented on by rabbinic teachings (called Gemara). The Mishnah is not treated in its entirety. At the beginning of the Talmud’s formation, the two centers of rabbinic study (the land of Israel and Babylonia) were in contact with each other and the commentary therefore reflected a common effort; later, especially with the completion of the Talmud in Israel (ca. 400 CE), the Babylonian effort continued to refine and extend the applications, and it was the Talmud developed in Babylonia (completion after 500 CE) that was distributed worldwide, under the auspices of the academies that continued to work in Babylonia until the beginning of the second millennium CE.

tanna’ (Aram. “repeat” [traditions]) a rabbinic teacher during the period from the destruction of the Second Temple (70 CE) to the final form of the Mishnah (ca. 200 CE).

Targum, Targumim Aramaic translations of the Bible. There are two main texts on the Torah: Targum Onkelos, used by Babylonian Jews, and Targum Yerushalmi or the Jerusalem Targum (often mistakenly called Targum Jonathan), used in the land of Israel.

tefillin small black leather boxes containing biblical passages from Exod. 13.1–10; 13.11–16; Deut. 6.4–9; 11.13–21. Two are worn during weekday morning prayer: one on the head (above the space between the eyes, just below the hairline) and one on the (left) arm (see, e.g., Deut. 6.8).

tel a mound formed by repeated occupation and destruction on a particular site.

teshuvah (Heb “return”) repentance.

Tetragrammaton (Gk “four letters”) the divine name, YHWH (see).

Tetrateuch the first four books of the Bible, Genesis through Numbers, regarded by some scholars as an edited collection to which Deuteronomy was then attached. See Pentateuch.

textual criticism the effort to establish, by scholarly assessment of manuscript copies and other sources, an accurate version of a text. See “Textual Criticism of the Bible” (pp. 2067–72).

Textus Receptus (Latin “received text”) the standard text in a tradition. For the Hebrew text the “received text” is understood to be the Masoretic Text, particularly that in the Rabbinic Bible (Miqra’ot Gedolot) in the 1525 edition published in Venice.

theodicy the theological effort to justify the goodness of God in the face of suffering.

Theodotion (ca. 2nd century CE) a translator of the Bible into Greek and reviser of the Septuagint.

theophany (Gk “appearance of god”) the temporary appearance or manifestation of a divine being in a form that can be apprehended by the human senses.

Third Isaiah see Trito-Isaiah.

threshing floor a location where the usable portion of grain is separated from its outer covering. Grain is threshed by being beaten to crack the husks and separate the grain from the stems. It is then winnowed by being tossed in a flat basket in a breeze, allowing the husks (chaff), which are lighter, to blow away. A good location for this process is a flat area on a hilltop; this was also an ideal spot for offering sacrifice (see 1 Chron. 21.18–27).

Tiamat goddess of the deep and mother of the Babylonian pantheon; she is sometimes portrayed as a dragon.

Tish’ah be’av 9 Av, the day of mourning commemorating the destruction of the two Temples. 2 Kings 25.8–9 says that the First Temple was burned (by the Babylonians) on 7 Av, while Jer. 52.12 dates it on 10 Av; the Talmud places it on 9 Av. The Second Temple was destroyed (by the Romans) on 10 Av.

tosafist author of tosafot (see).

tosafot brief commentaries on the Talmud (12th–14th century) by rabbis in France and Germany, which are printed in the outer columns. The tosafot carry on the talmudic traditions of conversation and interaction with the text and with previous commentators, including resolving contradictions, extending applications, and revisiting matters previously discussed.

Tosefta (Aram. “addition”) a compilation of oral law, of uncertain provenance and date, that follows the arrangement of the Mishnah.

tradition criticism the investigation of the development of a text from its earliest stages (oral or original source documents) to the latest (canonical) stage.

Transjordan the area to the east of the Jordan River.

Trito-Isaiah the scholarly term for chs 56–66 (or 55–66) of Isaiah. These chs are primarily concerned with the life of the returned exiles in the province of Yehud (the Persian name for Judah) after 538 BCE. Some scholars doubt the separate existence of Trito-Isaiah; others maintain that it is not the product of one author, but a collection of diverse oracles by different members of a “school of Isaiah” collected during the Persian period.

Tzevaot, YHVH “LORD of Hosts,” a title for God as leader of the heavenly armies (Ps. 89.6–9).

tzitzit the fringes attached to the four corners of a garment (Num. 15.38); also the entire garment that has such fringes, usually identical to the tallit katan (see tallit).

Ugarit city near the Mediterranean coast (Ras-Shamra in present-day Syria), source of an important store of Canaanite myths. Beginning in the 1920s archeological excavations in and around the area led to the discovery of a large number of cuneiform tablets in Akkadian, and others in a previously unknown language (subsequently named Ugaritic) which was related to Hebrew. The tablets also provided an archive of the political and economic activities of the rulers of Ugarit during the second half of the second millennium (1500–1200 BCE).

unleavened bread (Heb matzah, pl. matzot) bread made without yeast; also the festival, Ḥag ha-Matzot, that follows Pesaḥ (see).

Urim and Thummim a method of divination (the details of which are unclear) that the high priest used to discover God’s response to yes-or-no questions.

Vassal Treaty of Esarhaddon an Assyrian treaty document from the reign of the Assyrian king Esarhaddon (681–669 BCE), with parallels to parts of Deuteronomy.

vassal the underlord in a covenant relationship, who is granted power and control over people in a particular area in return for loyalty to the suzerain.

Vilna Gaon see Elijah ben Solomon Zalman.

Vorlage (German “preceding position,” i.e., pattern) the underlying text of a translation.

Vulgate (Latin “common”) the Bible translated by Jerome (completed 405 CE). The Old Testament of the Vulgate was translated directly from Hebrew, unlike that of the previous Latin version (the “Old Latin” or “Vetus Latina”), which was translated from the Septuagint.

wadi a seasonal watercourse, dry in the summer and full of water during the winter rainy period.

Weeks, Festival of see Shavuot.

Wisdom literature modern scholarship has identified the books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Job, and certain Psalms (e.g., Ps. 37) as examples of a type of literature with analogues in other ancient Near Eastern literatures. Wisdom is concerned with matters of insight and meditation on the meaning of life, moral exhortation, and the identification of recurrent patterns in nature and human life. Wisdom generally focuses on the individual rather than the nation, and therefore does not examine many of the events and teachings central to biblical literature, such as the exodus, Temple worship and sacrifice, the covenant, the monarchy, or prophecy.

Yehud designation of the province of Judah during Persian times.

Yerushalmi, Talmud the Jerusalem (sometimes called Palestinian) Talmud. See Talmud.

YHVH the name of God, which conventionally remains unpronounced and is represented in the text by the Heb letters yod-he-vav-he and the vowels for the title Adonai, “my Lord.” In standard English translations, including NJPS, YHVH is represented by the word LORD written in capital and small capital letters. The original vocalization and meaning of this name is unknown, though it is connected to the verb h-y-h, “be” or “become,” most likely in a causitive sense, “he who causes to be.”

Yom Kippur (Heb “day of atonement”) the solemn fast observed each year on 10 Tishri, according to the command recorded in Lev. 23.26–32. The observance involves abstention of various kinds and focuses on personal and communal repentance (teshuvah). The prayer services begin with the evening service and continue through the next day, with a morning service, an additional service, an afternoon service, and a concluding service.

Yose (Yosi, Yossi) ben Ḥalafta mid-2nd century tanna. He was a pupil of R. Akiva and one of the Rabbis frequently quoted in the Mishnah.

ziggurat a temple-tower in ancient Mesopotamia. Ziggurats are presumed to represent a mount, on the top of which the earthly and divine realms merged.

Zohar (“Splendor”) kabbalistic writing of the late 13th century, partly the work of Moshe de Leon (d. 1305).

Index

This index contains entries to important, extended, or recurring persons, places, and subject matter in the study material.

A

- Aaron: communication of ritual laws to, 229, 234, 247; death of, 324–25, 339, 350, 352; denial of entry to promised land, 323–24; Exodus, 109, 112, 114, 117, 140, 147–48, 162, 165, 182, 185; Ezekiel, 1055; genealogy, 338; God speaking directly to, 319; Korah rebellion, 288, 315–19, 336, 338–39; Leviticus, 222–28; Moses, speaking against, 308–9; Nadab and Abihu consumed by fire, 225, 227, 288, 317, 338; Numbers, 288; Psalms, 1412, 1414, 1432
- Aaronide priesthood, 5 (see also individual high priests); Chronicles, 1724, 1756–57; Exodus, 162, 171; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1674, 1680, 1686; high priest and governor/king sharing power in postexilic period, 1432; Leviticus, 203, 222–28; Numbers, 288, 334, 335
- Abaddon, 1471, 1491
- abandonment by God, 1049, 1056–76, 1108, 1305, 1598
- Abarbanel, Isaac, see Abravanel (Abarbanel, Abrabanel), Isaac
- Abel and Cain, 18–19, 57, 209, 248, 1059, 1264, 1526
- Abiathar, 566, 604, 605, 634, 646, 654, 672, 676, 679, 917, 921
- Abigail, 608–10, 621, 1719, 1721
- Abijah/Abijam (son of Rehoboam), 706, 707, 1785–87, 1806
- Abimelech, 31, 42–43, 45, 54, 55, 60, 637, 1318, 1399
- Abiram and Dathan, rebellion of, 315–16, 336, 389, 1402
- Abishag the Shunammite, 671, 675–76
- Abishai, 611, 626, 648, 654, 659
- Abner, 622–25, 657, 1760
- abominations, see idols and idol-worship
- abortion, 25, 154
- Abraham: 1 Chronicles, 1717; Deuteronomy, 359; Ezra-Nehemiah and, 1666, 1701; Genesis, 8, 10, 30–52, 54, 92; Isaiah, 864, 887; Jeremiah, 932, 990; Job more virtuous than, 1505; Leviticus, 207, 251, 270, 276–77; Psalms, 1399
- Abram's name changed to Abraham, 8, 37–38
- Abravanel (Abarbanel, Abrabanel), Isaac: biblical interpretation and study, 1895, 1906; Chronicles, 1714; Hosea, 1144; Jeremiah, 1008; Joel, 1168; Judges, 554; Kings, 672, 676, 707, 771; Obadiah, 1197; philosophy, 1961–62, 1964; Psalms, 1299; Samuel, 606, 626
- Absalom, 638–53, 656, 671, 1287, 1335
- abstinence, see fasting and abstinence
- Abulafia, Abraham ben Shmuel, 1982–83
- Abulafia, Rabbi Meir (Ramah), 1780, 2081, 2083
- “accidental” or every-day occurrences, God's will manifested in (providence), 575, 577, 705, 724
- Achan, sin of, 474–75, 502
- Achsah, 462, 490, 492, 511
- acrostics, 2100; Lamentations, 1588; Proverbs, 1497; Psalms, 1291, 1293, 1309, 1310, 1318, 1319, 1322, 1409, 1415
- Adam and Eve, 9, 14–18, 30, 851, 1276, 1507, 1717
- Adonai, 112, 137, 1206
- Adonijah, 638, 671–76
- adoption, 94–95, 100
- adultery: Deuteronomy, 377, 417; Esther, Haman believed to be attempting to seduce, 1634–35; Exodus, 149, 150, 156; Ezekiel's allegory of, 1067–71, 1084–86; Genesis, 78; Hosea, 1143–52; Isaiah, 897; Jeremiah, marriage motif in, 923, 926–28, 952–54, 958, 963, 971, 973, 988, 990, 995; Jeremiah's false prophets attempting to commit adultery with Nebuchadnezzar's daughters, 984; Job, 1536, 1544–1545; Leviticus, 254; Numbers, 294–95; Proverbs, 1452, 1456, 1458–60, 1496; 2 Samuel, David and Bathsheba, 635–39
- Adversary, the (Satan/Ilu-Satan), 329, 665, 698, 1253, 1502–6
- African-American understanding of exodus, 107
- afterlife/personal resurrection: Daniel, 1665; Ecclesiastes, 1610, 1621; Ezekiel, valley of dry bones in, 1114, 1665; Isaiah, 834; Job, 1523; Proverbs, 1452, 1468; Psalms, 1289, 1292, 1314, 1337, 1369; Rabbinic Judaism, 834, 1114, 1665; 1 Samuel, 563
- afterworld, see Sheol
- Agag, 333, 589, 590, 1624, 1629
- age at death/life span, 20, 72, 100, 438, 1385, 1562 (see also elders/elderly)
- aggadah, 1847, 1848, 1858–62, 1876, 1895, 1934, 2009
- agricultural festivals, 159–60, 263, 703, 1156–57 (see also specific festivals)
- Ahab: Chronicles, 1790–93, 1797, 1822, 1823; Kings, 710–26, 741, 743, 745, 772; Micah, 1216; Psalms, 1332; Samuel, 635
- Ahasuerus, 1245, 1623–39, 1659, 1676
- Ahaz, 757, 771, 797–802, 1806–7, 1809
- Ahaziah of Israel, 725–27, 741
- Ahaziah of Judah, 742, 744, 745, 747, 1797–98
- Ahijah, 699, 701, 705, 708
- Ahimelech, 529, 530–34, 602–4, 611
- Ahiathophel, 647, 648, 649, 650
- Ai, destruction of, 474–78, 552
- ‘Akedah (binding of Isaac), 45–47, 54, 1768, 1936
- Akitu or New Year Festival, Babylon, 877
- Akiva (Aqiba) ben Yosef, R., 1845, 1852–53, 1864; Malachi, 1272; Zechariah, 1257
- alcohol and intoxication (see also wine, grapes, vineyards, vines, and winepresses): Amos, 1181; cup of God's wrath/water of bitterness, 185, 295, 977, 1347, 1365, 1532, 1596; Daniel, 1643;

- alcohol and intoxication (continued)
 Esther, 1623, 1624, 1626, 1631; Ezekiel, 1129; Genesis, 25; Isaiah, 794, 836, 837; Jeremiah, 953, 998–99; Job's slurred speech, 1512; Judges, 540; Kethuvim, 1279; 2 Kings, 745; Leviticus, 228; Nahum, 1224; Numbers, 295; Proverbs, 1478, 1484, 1497; Psalms, 1357; 2 Samuel, 637, 642; Zechariah, 1263
- Aleppo Codex, 1411, 1563, 2081, 2083
- Alexander the Great, 1641, 1655–58, 1662, 1929, 2057
- Aleynu (Aleinu), 1516
- alienation resulting from suffering in Job, 1528
- aliens, see entries at foreign
- allegory, see parable/allegory
- alliteration, 783, 1426, 1598
- allocation of land, see entries at apportionment
- allusion, literary, 1834–35
- 'almanali, 1545 (see also widows and orphans)
- Almighty, The, 333
- almonds and almond trees, 319, 922
- alphabetical characters, 1669, 1681, 2063
- altars (see also Tabernacle/Ark of the Covenant): Ahaz's altar in 2 Kings, 757; Amos, 1191; building of Second Temple in Haggai, 1246; Chronicles, altar of bronze in, 1770; Daniel, 1660; David's altar on the site of the Temple, 665–67; Deuteronomy, 426; Exodus, 143, 151–52, 162, 169–70, 175, 177, 196; Ezekiel, 1058, 1059, 1124, 1126–27; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1674; Gideon in Judges, 524; incense altar, 170, 178–79, 180, 195, 196, 227, 245, 962; Joshua, 478; Judges, 539, 541; table in Jewish home as substitute for, 1124; Transjordanian tribes, 502–3
- Amalekites: Esther, 1624, 1629, 1637; Exodus, 142–43; Genesis, 73; Judges, 523; Numbers, 333, 334, 350; Samuel, 588–89, 604, 616, 617, 619–20
- Amarna Letters, 68
- Amasa, 654, 656, 1719
- Amaziah, 752–53, 1189, 1802–3
- ambidextrousness, 553
- Amen, 295
- Amenemope*, Instruction of, 1448, 1472, 1482, 1488
- America, see United States
- Amherst Papyrus, 1304
- 'Anidali prayer (see Eighteen Benedictions): 1937, 1939, 1947; Deuteronomy, 389; Exodus, 110; Ezekiel, 1100; Isaiah, 796, 834; Jeremiah, 961; Numbers, 297; Psalms, 1303, 1340
- Ammon and Ammonites: Amos, 1179; Chronicles, 1806; Deuteronomy, 366, 369, 418–19; Ezekiel, 1081, 1089–90; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1684, 1708; Genesis, 42; Jeremiah, 981, 1008, 1024; Joshua, 485; Judges, 534–38; 1 Kings, 697; 2 Kings, 754, 756, 775; 1 Samuel, 580–81; 2 Samuel, 635–39
- Amnon, 638, 640–41, 644, 651, 671, 770, 1296
- amoraic rabbis, 1845, 1846, 1857
- Amorites: Deuteronomy, 366; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1684; Genesis, 36; Jeremiah, 1020; Joshua, 466, 475, 480, 481, 505; Judges, 512, 534, 535, 536; 2 Kings, 769; Numbers, 326; 1 Samuel, 574; 2 Samuel, 658
- Amos: biographical information, 1177, 1189; dating, compilation, and redaction, 1176; introduction, 1176–77; Job compared, 1535; structure, 1176–77; text and annotations, 1177–92
- amulets, 297, 325, 381, 2026
- anagrams, 1289
- Anakites, 310, 484, 489, 511, 512
- analogy, 1856
- ancestor worship, 2022; household idols (teraphim), 64–65, 88, 547, 599–600, 1260, 1346, 2022; Isaiah, 911
- ancestral houses, heads of (groups smaller than tribes), 488
- androcentrism, 2004, 2005
- angels: Daniel, 1648, 1649, 1655, 1656–58, 1661–62, 1665; Deuteronomy, 441; Exodus, 110, 128, 135, 137, 160, 186, 187, 188; Ezekiel, 1058; Genesis, 14, 39, 40, 47, 66, 67; Isaiah, 796, 831, 848–49; Job, 1506, 1510, 1513; Joshua, 472–73; Judges, 513, 523–24, 539–41; Proverbs, 1475; Psalms, 1291, 1318, 1320, 1334, 1389, 1396, 1444; Samuel, 615, 644, 655, 666; wrestling of Jacob with divine being, 67–68; Zechariah, 1251
- anger, temper, and self-control, 1454, 1458, 1474, 1478, 1481, 1488, 1489, 1493, 1496, 1497
- Anglo-Jewish prayerbook, 1938, 1947
- animals (see also specific animals): creation of, 14; cutting animals in half and passing between them, 35–36, 998; human dominion over, 16, 25; humane treatment of, 416, 422; naming of, 16; Proverbs, 1496; pure and impure, 22, 205 (see also dietary laws); sacrificial animals required to be without blemish, 125; sexual relations with, 251; yoke imagery, 1285
- "annals" mentioned as sources, 669, 700, 776, 1712, 1764
- anointing: Daniel, 1660; Kings, 673, 743, 748; Psalms, 1285, 1312, 1332, 1377, 1383; Samuel, 578, 592, 599; Tabernacle oil, 175, 178, 181, 196, 222, 224, 297, 1432
- anthological interpretations, 1874
- anthological nature of Proverbs, 1448, 1449
- anthological psalms, 1314, 1412–13, 1414, 1415, 1433, 1443
- anthropology, 2041, 2088, 2093–96
- anthropomorphic God, 5; Daniel, 1656; Exodus, 111, 149, 152, 162–63, 187, 188; Ezekiel, 1017, 1068; Genesis, 9, 10; Leviticus, 209; medieval philosophy, 1952; mysticism, 1985, 1989; Numbers, 297, 340, 443; Psalms, 1287, 1298; Zechariah, 1252; Zephaniah, 1237
- Antiochus III the Great, 1663, 2059
- Antiochus IV Epiphanes, 38, 1641, 1642, 1656, 1658, 1660, 1663–64, 2059–60
- anti-Semitism, 5, 142, 1625, 1630, 1910, 1914
- ants, 1496
- Aph-Beri, 1517, 1554
- Aphrodite/Venus (morning star), 813, 939–40, 1014, 1452
- 'Apiru (Hapiru), 103, 108
- Apocalypse of Ezra, 1668
- apocalypticism/eschatology: afterlife/personal resurrection beliefs, 834; Chronicles, 1715–16; Daniel, 461, 1276, 1640, 1641, 1644, 1649, 1655–65; development of religion of Bible, 2037; different genres mixed together typical of, 1640; divine interpreters common in, 1657; Ezekiel, 1115, 1118, 1142; Haggai, 1247; historical figures, indirect reference to, 1662; Isaiah (Deutero-Isaiah), 867; Isaiah (First Isaiah), 782, 787–88, 792, 807, 829, 834–36, 844–46, 848, 849; Job, 1560; Joel, 1166; Malachi, 1268, 1274; Nevi'im (Prophets), 460–61; prophecy and, 2037; Psalms, 1286, 1333, 1334, 1352, 1365, 1386, 1388, 1408; Twelve Minor Prophets, 1142; Zechariah, 1251
- Apocrypha, 1000, 1277, 1279, 1507, 1640, 1644, 1655, 1667–68, 1839, 1866
- apodasis, 1544
- apoditic vs. casuistic styles of law and legal material, 374
- Apollo, 1664
- apophatic way, 1976–77
- apostasy, see idols and idol-worship
- apotropaic powers and devices, 113, 126, 174, 179, 325
- apple/fruit trees in Song of Songs, 1568, 1576
- apportionment of Canaan: Deuteronomy, 369; Joshua, 462–64, 486–501; Leviticus, 251–54; Numbers, 283–84, 335, 337, 338, 351–54
- apportionment of land for Levites/levitical towns, 352–53, 406–7, 486, 487, 497–99, 1130, 1136, 1728
- Aqhat epic, 424–25, 1067, 1640
- Arabia and Arab tribes, 165, 824–25

- Arabic law, 152, 153
 Arabic translations of Bible, 2009
 Aramaic, 2067, 2071; Daniel, 1641, 1657; Deuteronomy, 429; Esther, 1627; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1668, 1676, 1681, 1700; Genesis, 66; Jeremiah, 946–47; Job, 1533; Kethuvim, 1276; 2 Kings, 743, 754, 763; Psalms, 1304; translation of Bible into, 1924, 2008, 2067, 2071 (see also Targum)
 Aram/Aram Damascus (Syria): Amos, 1178; Exodus, 165; Ezekiel, 1071; Hosea, 1151, 1154; Isaiah, 797, 818; Jeremiah, 1027; Numbers, 315; Psalms, 1347; Zechariah, 1258
 Arameans: Amos, 1178; Chronicles, 1794, 1801, 1802; Deuteronomy, 423–24; 1 Kings, 694, 696, 699, 708, 718–20, 722–24; 2 Kings, 737, 738, 741, 743, 752, 753, 755, 756, 757, 775; 2 Samuel, 635; “wandering Aramean” creed, 423–24
 Ararat, 23
 Araunah, threshing floor of, 666–67
 archaeological evidence, 2048–62; critical scholarship and, 2086–96; Dead Sea Scrolls and other Judean Desert scrolls, 1920–21; Ezekiel, 1055; Hebrew as language, 2066–67; Jeremiah, 922, 1012; Job, 1538; Joshua, 463, 466, 473–74; Judges, 510; 1 Kings, 622, 683, 685, 689, 703, 706, 707, 708; 2 Kings, 727, 728, 743, 754, 763, 772–73, 778; modern biblical interpretation, 1914–15; Nevi'im (Prophets), 455; Samuel, 568, 622; tels (mounds of ruins), 484
 Ariel and Ariellites, 839, 848
 Aristens, Letter of, 2006–7, 2058
 Aristobulus, 1949
 Aristotle and Aristotelianism, 1614, 1884, 1894, 1960, 1961, 1962, 1980 ark: ʾaron (synagogue Ark), 464; Covenant, Ark of (see Tabernacle/Ark of the Covenant); flood story, 21–24; use of word translated as, 21 arrogance, see pride/hubris vs. humility Artaxerxes I Longimanus, 1667, 1676–1677, 1679, 1681, 1689, 1696, 1709 artificial respiration, 713
 ArtScroll Tanach, 2017
 Asa, 707–8, 724, 757, 769, 773, 1787–90
 Asahel, 622, 625
 Asaphites and Asaphite psalms: Chronicles, 1743, 1757; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1673; Psalms, 1280, 1282, 1337, 1344, 1362, 1363, 1365, 1366, 1371, 1372, 1376, 1424
 Ascents, Songs of, 1281, 1424–33
 Asenath, 83, 95
 'Aseret Yemei Teshuvah (“Ten Days of Repentance”), 1167
 'asham, see reparation offerings
 Ashdod, 822–23
 Asher (son of Jacob/tribe): Chronicles, 1730; Genesis, 61, 72, 96; Joshua, 493, 496; Judges, 520, 521, 529
 'Asherah/asherim, see pillars and posts, sacred ashes: dust (and ashes) as metaphor, 564, 889, 1314, 1383, 1384, 1511, 1561, 1610; sackcloth and ashes (see mourning rituals)
 Ashkenazi tradition: Amos, 1177, 1194; Ezekiel, 1082; Genesis, 26–28, 77; interpretation and study, 1891–92, 1900–1901, 1908; Isaiah, 784; Masoretic Text, 2080–83
 Ashtoreth/Ashtaroth, 513, 573, 582, 618
 Ashurbanipal, 769, 1224, 1676
 “Asiatics,” 103–4
 assembly of Israelites, 354, 418–19, 1244
 Assyria and Assyrians (see also names of specific rulers, and see Mesopotamian mythology, history, and religion for Assyrian culture generally): Chronicles, 1808, 1814–18; Deuteronomy, 357–58; Egyptian conflicts, 758, 765–66, 769; Exodus, 128; Ezekiel, 1069, 1084; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1680; Hosea, 1144, 1151, 1154; Isaiah, 781, 782, 785, 792, 797–800, 804–6, 814, 819, 823, 836, 844, 845, 846, 853–58; Jonah, 1198–1204; Judges, 549–50; 1 Kings, 722–23; 2 Kings, 752, 755–69, 773, 774; Lamentations, 1601; map, 756; Micah, 1207, 1213; Nineveh (see Nineveh); Northern Kingdom, end of, 758–60, 2054–55
 Astarte/Ishtar, 384, 939–40, 944, 959, 1289, 1452, 2031 astrology and astral theology, 1958–60 asylum: cities of refuge, 352–54, 373, 409–10, 486, 493, 497, 498, 723; sanctuary, claims of, 153, 352–54, 674, 676
 'atbashi, 978, 1037
 Athaliah, 708, 742, 747, 748, 1797, 1799, 1802 atheism, 1293, 1362 atonement, concept of, 204, 205, 276 (see also confession, Day of Atonement [Yom Kippur], and sacrifices related to atonement) Atrahasis, 9
 Augustine of Hippo, 1507, 2008
 authorship: Chronicles, 1712, 1713; Deuteronomy, 358, 363, 367, 375; Ecclesiastes, 1563, 1604–6; Esther, 1563, 1637; Exodus, 104–5; Ezekiel, 1043; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1667, 1668, 1669; Genesis, 11; Isaiah, 781, 782, 783; Jeremiah, 918–19; Job, 1502, 1546; Joshua, 462–64, 483; Judges, 509; Kethuvim (“Writings”), 1276; Kings, books of, 669–71; Lamentations, 1282, 1563, 1589; law and legal material, God as author of, 148; megillot (five scrolls), 1563; Moses, 2–3, 11, 281, 363, 375; Numbers, 281; Proverbs, 1282, 1447–48, 1494, 1497; Psalms, 1281–82, 1283, 1669; Ruth, 1563, 1579; Samuel, books of, 560–61; Song of Songs, 1564, 1566; Torah, 2–3, 363, 375 autobiographical works: Ezekiel, 1043, 1046; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1668–69 avoidance behavior, 2041–47 (see also purification and purity) Azariah (son of Amaziah of Judah), 753, 754–55, 1788
 Azariah (son of Zadok), 679, 1804
 Azazel (scapegoat), 244–45, 246

B

- Baal and Baalim, 2031; 2 Chronicles, 1797; Ezekiel, 1056; Hosea, 1147–48; Isaiah, 813; Jeremiah, 940, 944, 959; Job, 1514, 1517, 1538; Judges, 513–14, 524–25; 1 Kings, 711, 714–16, 725; 2 Kings, 730, 746, 748, 772; Psalms, 1300, 1304, 1312, 1335, 1387; 1 Samuel, 573, 582
 Baal-peor, 283–84, 334–35, 344, 370–71, 487, 944, 1157, 1402
 Baal-zebul, 726–27, 741
 Baasha, 708–9, 720, 724, 744, 756
 Babel, tower of, 13, 29
 Babylonia, 2055; Arabian tribes allied with, 824; Carchemish, Babylonian defeat of Egyptians at, 968, 1000, 1002, 1016; Daniel's predictions regarding, 1645, 1655–57; fall of, 809–14, 823–24, 860, 870, 879, 1226–33; Genesis, 28; Jeremiah's call for submission to, 976–85; Jeremiah's offer of protection from rulers of, 1006, 1007; Jeremiah's oracle against, 1028–39; Jeremiah's support for alliance with, 924, 926, 970; magicians and soothsayers of, 880; rise of, 773, 774; Sheshuch as cipher for, 978, 1037
 Babylonian Chronicle, 774, 775, 776
 Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem, 2055; Daniel, 1643; Ezekiel, 1042, 1043, 1056–59, 1081–82, 1087–91; Jeremiah, 917, 919, 948, 951, 955, 956, 968, 981, 993, 998–1007, 1039–41; 2 Kings, 775–79; Lamentations, 1589–95, 1599; Psalms, 1363–64, 1371–72, 1383, 1394, 1401–3
 Babylonian exile, 775–79, 2055; Amos, 1183, 1192; Chronicles, 1818–25; Daniel, 1643; Deuteronomy, 359, 360–61, 370, 372–73, 375, 400, 403, 427–29, 434, 436; disgrace, characterized as, 1691; Esther, 1625, 1628; Ezekiel, 1042, 1046, 1062–63; Isaiah (Deutero-Isaiah), 861–62, 882–90; Isaiah (First Isaiah), 782–83, 797, 808, 850, 858, 860; Jeremiah, 917, 919, 942, 956, 975–76;

Babylonian exile (continued)

Judges, 509, 510, 549; Kings, books of, 668, 670, 694, 768, 769, 771, 775–79; Lamentations, 1595; Micah, 1205, 1206, 1212; names of Babylonian origin, exiled/Diaspora Jews taking, 1628, 1643; numbers of exiles for three deportations, 1040; Obadiah, 1193; prophecies of, 768, 774; prophecy, development of, 459–60; Psalmic theme, 1296, 1305, 1354, 1356–58, 1363–64, 1366, 1377, 1380, 1384, 1394–95, 1399, 1401–3, 1428, 1435; religion of Bible largely developed in, 2031; return from (see return from Babylonian exile); Ruth, 1579; Sabbath's importance during, 1077; Song of Songs, 1571

Babylonian names, exiled/Diaspora Jews taking, 1628, 1643

Babylonian Talmud: biblical interpretation and study, 1847, 1854, 1997; Isaiah, 904; Job, 1508, 1539; Kethuvim, 1275; 1 Kings, 671, 703; medieval philosophy, 1951; megillot (five scrolls), 1563

Babylonian Theodicy, 1415 backs, treading on, 449

badgers, 1496

Balaam: Deuteronomy, 487; Ezekiel, 1050; Jeremiah, 987; Joshua, 505; Leviticus, 207; Micah, 1205, 1214; Numbers, 283, 327–34, 345; Proverbs, 1494

Balak, 327–34, 505, 1205, 1214

“baldhead,” taunting of Elisha as, 730 balm of Gilead, 943 bankruptcy, 399

Barak, 517–22, 582

Bar Kokhba period, 333–34, 1107, 1928, 2064, 2078

barrenness, see fertility/infertility

Baruch (son of Neriah), 918, 919, 992, 1000, 1001, 1015, 1039, 1672

Barzillai, 650, 655, 675

Bashan (Golan Heights), 327, 368, 448, 485, 1183, 1216, 1306, 1791

Basileiai (title for books of Kings), 668 bathing, purification by (Mikveh), 146, 175, 233, 242, 243, 322, 636, 687

Bathsheba, 635–39, 672–73, 676, 1338, 1721, 1750

bat kol (qol), 301, 1244

bears, 730

Bedouin, 127, 129, 139

Behemoth, 1559, 1560

Bekhor Shor, Joseph, 1889–90, 1891, 1892, 1909

Bel, 877, 1028, 1647

Belshazzar, 1651–53, 1656

Ben Gurion, David, 1176

Ben-hadad of Aram, 718–20, 743, 752

Benjamin (son of Jacob/tribe): Chronicles, 1727, 1730–31, 1732, 1751–52; Genesis, 60, 72, 77, 84, 85, 86, 88, 89, 96; Joshua, 494; Judges, 511, 512, 520, 521, 550–57; 1 Kings, 702; Psalms, 1372, 1373; 1 Samuel, 577, 578, 580; 2 Samuel, 624–25

Ben Sirach, Wisdom of, 562, 784, 1277, 1416

berit, see covenant between God and Israel berit milah, 38

Be-shallah, 517

Bethel: Amos, 1176, 1182; Genesis, 58–59, 66, 71–72; Hosea, 1150; Joshua, 476, 485; Judges, 512, 513, 547, 553, 556, 557; Kings, 703, 728, 759, 774; Samuel, 578; Zechariah, 1256

Bethlehem, 72, 539, 550, 578, 664, 665, 1578, 1580–81

Beyond the River, Persian province of, 1676, 1677

Bezalel, 181, 193, 197, 686, 1425, 1719

Bildad, 1500, 1515, 1520, 1527–28, 1537–38

birds or fowl: dietary laws, 230; sacrifice of, 207, 208, 215 birth stories: Moses, infancy and young adulthood of, 108–10; Samson, 539–41; Samuel, 561–65

birthright and blessing of Esau, Jacob's taking of, 53–58 bitter herbs, 126

bitterness, water of, 185, 295

blasphemy, see curses and cursing blessings: covenant between God and Israel, ratification of, 427–32, 479; doxologies in Psalms (see doxologies in Psalms); Exodus, 128–29; Genesis, 55–58, 69, 93, 94, 95, 98; Moses, Blessing of, 437, 445–49; new moon, 599; Numbers, 331; priestly, 297; royal psalm calling for, 1440; Sabbath blessing of children, 297; Songs of Ascents (Psalms), 1430, 1432 blindness and deafness as metaphors, 840, 846, 868, 911 blood: apotropaic powers of, 113–14, 125–26; bloodguilt and blood-vengeance, 153, 155, 248, 257, 409–10, 416, 444, 497, 643, 658, 1174, 1339; covenant between God and Israel, ceremony establishing, 160, 161–63; dietary laws, 392–94, 398, 587; distinction between ritual sacrifice and secular slaughter for food, 392–94; divine warrior in Isaiah, 908; Ezekiel, 1082, 1102, 1127, 1131; Job, 1526; menstruation (see menstruation and menstrual blood); priestly consecration/ordination, 176, 1127; prohibition on consumption of, 211, 221, 229, 247, 248, 255; sacrifice, 207–8, 210, 212, 213, 238, 239, 249

Bloomgarten, Solomon (Yehoash), 2010

blowing kiss onto hand as gesture of worship, 1546

Blumenthal, David, 1973–74

Boaz (in Ruth), 1578–79, 1580, 1581–86

Boaz (pillar of First Temple), 687, 748, 982 bodily discharges, impurity from, 232–33, 241–43, 2047

body language of scoundrels, 1457, 1459, 1474 body parts, psalms listing, 1298, 1318 body parts, wasf celebrating, 1570, 1573, 1574, 1575

Boethusians, 264

Bombarg, David, 1899, 2082

bonded service, 62, 152–53, 270, 272–73 (see also slavery)

Book, Judaism as religion of, 1835, 2029–31

Book of Jashar, 326, 481

Book of Jubilees, 379, 978, 1822, 1836–37, 1839, 1840, 1866

Book of the Covenant: Deuteronomy, 375, 379, 397, 399, 400, 403, 409, 427; Exodus, 145, 151, 160, 162, 163

Book of the Dead, 1349, 1544 book of the Lord/scrolls of remembrance/book of life, 434, 609–10, 1254–55, 1274, 1327, 1344, 1437, 1665

Book of the Wars of the Lord, 326

“book/scroll of the Teaching”: Joshua, 465, 468, 478, 506; Josiah's discovery of, 462, 770–72, 1699, 1818–20, 2031

Booths, Feast of, see Sukkot booty, distribution of, 70, 346, 411, 412, 465, 476, 478, 520, 522, 529, 707, 1637 boundaries and order: animal types, purity and impurity of, 397–98; concern with not transgressing, 416; cross-dressing, 415–16; dietary laws reflecting desire for, 397–98; field boundaries, shifters of, 1151; importance to Israelite thought, 5; Israelite territory, boundaries of, 351–52, 462, 465; Joshua, apportionment of Canaan in, 486–97; purity, 2041 (see also purification and purity) bowing or kneeling before a human being, 1629–30 bread cast upon the waters, 1619 bread dough offering (hallel), 313–14 bread of display/Bread of Presence/showbread, 167, 179, 201, 267, 1124 bribes, 1082, 1475, 1476, 1480

brickmaking without straw, 114 bride-price, 64, 156, 416, 418

brother, concept of, 324, 412, 1571, 1576

brother of deceased man marrying widow, 77, 251, 422–23, 1580–86

- Buber, Martin, 1971–73, 1994, 2010 bubonic plague, 570 building of Temples, see entries at Temple, building of; Temple, rebuilding of buildings, see houses and buildings bundle of life, 609–10 (see also book of the Lord/scrolls of remembrance/book of life) burial services, passage from Job recited at, 1507 burning bush, 110–12, 303, 1701 burns, 236
 burnt offerings: Deuteronomy, 392, 394; Exodus, 144, 160, 162, 175–76; Ezekiel, 1131; Jeremiah, 962; Job, 1561–62; Joshua, 478, 487; Judges, 553; 1 Kings, 693; Leviticus, 206–8, 218, 226, 234, 239; Numbers, 314; Psalms, 1327; 2 Samuel, 667
- C
- Cain and Abel, 18–19, 57, 209, 248, 1059, 1264, 1526
 Caleb: Chronicles, 1719–20; Deuteronomy, 309, 311, 352; Joshua, 485, 488–89, 490, 495, 499; Judges, 511, 548; Samuel, 608
 calendar, 125, 132, 190, 262, 264, 340–43, 400–403, 1131, 2114
 calves, worship of, 2022; cutting calves in half and passing between them, 35–36, 998; Hosea, 1155, 1156; Jeroboam's golden calves, 183–84, 702–3, 773; Sinai, golden calf worshipped by Israelites at, 102, 103, 165, 182–87, 191, 203, 334, 944, 1056, 1115, 1402, 1702
 Cambyases, 869, 1012, 1098, 1641, 1655, 1666
 Canaan, Canaanites, and Canaanite conquest (see also promise and possession of the land of Israel): apportionment of land (see apportionment of Canaan); archeological evidence for, 455; central campaign, 473–80; Chronicles' reticence regarding conquest, 1716, 1720; corruption of Canaan allowing for, 386; ethnic diversity of, 468; Exodus, 111, 137–38, 157, 160–61, 187, 189–90; Genesis, 26, 31, 36, 48, 69, 97; herem (see herem); historicity, 2050–52; illegitimate divination associated with, 407–8; inheritance (nahlah) of Israel, 463, 486–387; Isaiah, 812–13; Israelite differentiation from Canaanites rather than conquest, 1068; Israelite popular religion, Canaan standing in for, 407; Joshua, 462, 463, 473–78, 479–85; language of Canaan, 822; Leviticus, 249–52, 272–73; map of, 468; northern campaign, 483–84; Numbers, 283–84, 325, 328, 351–54, 352, 356; Psalmic theme, 1353; rhetorical/perjorative use of Canaan/Canaanite, 382–83; scouting/spying out (see scouting/spying out of Canaan); southern campaign, 480–83; summary of conquest, 484–85; survey of land after conquest, 494; Torah, 3
 Canada, biblical source for official title of, 1259
 cannibalism, 431, 738, 1595 canonical criticism, 2096 canonization of Biblical books, 1, 1927–28, 2029, 2072–77 cantillation marks, 375, 797, 914, 2064, 2079, 2098 capital punishment: Deuteronomy, 354, 396, 409, 415, 417; Exodus, 147, 153, 154, 155, 182; Job, 1532; Leviticus, 254, 257, 260, 268; 2 Samuel, 639 Carchemish, Babylonian defeat of Egyptians at, 968, 1000, 1002, 1016 carrion, 398
 casting lots, 475–76, 488, 494, 552, 580, 1474, 1630 “cast your bread upon the waters” (Ecclesiastes), 1619 casuistic vs. apodictic styles of law and legal material, 374 ceasing from work: holy days, 262, 263, 265, 266; Sabbath, 127, 149–50, 182, 191–92; sabbatical year, 269–70 cedar and cedar trees, 531, 627, 631, 682, 969, 971, 1071–72, 1101, 1387, 1445 censuses: David, 665–66, 1751–52, 1755; Ezra-Nehemiah, list of returnees from exile in, 1672; Israelites in the wilderness, 179–80, 197–98, 282–93, 335–38, 346 central sanctuary, justice dispensed at, 404–5 centralization of worship, 2028; Bethel, 1176; Chronicles, 1813, 1817; Deuteronomic reform, 391–94, 398–400, 402, 403, 406–7, 426; Exodus, 152; Ezekiel, 1053, 1057; Hosea, 1156; Kings, books of, 669, 677, 711, 724, 745, 754, 761, 772; Leviticus, 248; 1 Samuel, 573; Transjordanian tribes, altars of, 502–3 cereals, see grains and cereals Chaldeans: Daniel, 1644; Ezekiel, 1069, 1084; Habakkuk, 1226, 1227; Isaiah, 775, 810, 828, 870, 881; Jeremiah, 972, 1002, 1029; Job, 1506–7; 2 Kings, 775 chaltzah, see halitzah
challah, see halah
channesh megillot (the five scrolls), see hamesh megillot champions in single combat, 593, 622 chaos: Ecclesiastes on reversal of hierarchy as sign of, 1618; Genesis, creation story in, 13; Isaiah's eschatological prophecies, 829–30, 835; Job, 1538; Nahum, 1220; primeval battle between YHWH and the dragon-like sea, 2026 (see also Leviathan); Proverbs, Wisdom personified in, 1462; Psalmic theme, 1283, 1300, 1313, 1317, 1333, 1351, 1363, 1364, 1366, 1382, 1397, 1435; Zechariah, 1252 chapters, division of biblical books into, 1167 chariots: Ahab in 1 Kings, 716, 722–23; Ammi-nadib, 1574; Elisha, 738, 751; Ezekiel, divine throne chariot in, 1043, 1045–48, 1059–60, 1119, 1335; Joshua and Canaanites, 483, 485; Judges, conquests of Judah in, 511; “mare in Pharaoh's chariot,” Song of Songs, 1567; Pharaoh's army, 133–38; Psalms, 1367; royal chariot, privilege of running alongside, 716; 1 Samuel, Philistines in, 568, 583; 2 Samuel, David's conquests in, 633; Solomon, 681, 696, 699; Zechariah, 1255
 Chemosh (chief god of Moab), 327, 536, 537, 732, 1021, 1347, 2026
 Cherethites, 616, 634, 646, 656, 673, 1238, 1748 (see also Philistines and Philistia) cherubim: Chronicles, 1740, 1769–70; Exodus, 166, 195; Ezekiel, 1046–47, 1060, 1123; 1 Kings, 685, 687; Psalms, 1300, 1392; 1 Samuel, 568
chesed, see hesed chiasm, 392, 393, 414, 429, 446, 658, 2102 chieftains, see Judges (book); judges, period of; tribal chieftains childbirth: crouching for, 570; God giving birth to world, 1384; Hosea's use as metaphor, 1164; impurity after, 233–34, 1522; Isaiah's use as metaphor, 915; Jeremiah's use as metaphor, 938, 953, 971, 986, 1024; Job's “man born of woman,” 1522, 1524, 1537; knees, birth upon, 61, 72, 100; Micah's use as metaphor, 1213; pain of, 17 children (see also parent-child relationship): abandoned child, Ezekiel's allegory of, 1067–71; adulterous mothers/illicit sexual relations, children of, 1145, 1158; exodus Haggadah, 128; fetus, status of, 154; guilt of parents visited upon children (see communal guilt); Isaiah's use of children as metaphor for Israel, 885, 894, 915; Jacob's children, 60–62, 72; Leviticus, study of, 205; parent-child relationship (see parent-child relationship); Psalms, 1291, 1330, 1396, 1428–29, 1430; rebellious sons, treatment of, 415, 1160; revivification of, 713, 732–34, 740; Sabbath blessing of, 297; smashing of babies on rocks, 1224, 1438; Solomon's judgment of the child and two prostitutes, 678–79; weaning, 562, 1430–31 child sacrifice, 2025; Ahaz's sacrifice of son, 757; 'Akedah (binding of Isaac), 45–47, 54, 1205, 1768; Deuteronomy, 394, 407; Ezekiel, 1078, 1086; first-born, dedication and redemption of, 131–33, 157, 190, 279, 289, 290, 398, 400, 1078; Jephthah and his daughter, 537–38; Jeremiah, 940, 991; Leviticus, 249–52, 256; Manasseh of Judah's sacrifice of sons, 1817; Meshah's sacrifice of first-born son, 732; Psalms, 1402; Zephaniah, 1236

- Chinnereth (Kinnet) (Lake), 448 (see also Sea of Galilee)
- Christian tradition and Western history: afterlife/personal resurrection, 1665; apocalyptic books, 1640; Baal-zebul, Jesus' denial of healing in name of, 726–27; canonical books, Protestant and Roman Catholic, 1595; chapters, division of biblical books into, 1167; Daniel, 461, 1140, 1642, 1657, 1659, 1660, 1662, 1665; Davidic authorship of Psalms, 1281; Decalogue, enumeration of, 375, 376; Easter, 126; Ecclesiastes, title of, 1603; Edom associated with Christianity, 850–51, 1174, 1193, 1196, 1891; Esau as cipher for Christendom, 57, 1891; Exodus and, 107; Ezekiel's new covenant, 1062; feminist/women's scholarship, 2005; genealogies, 1717; Ibn Ezra's critique of Christian exegesis, 1882; identification of unnamed with known characters, 1507; inner-biblical interpretation, 1829; Isaiah's prophecies, 798–99, 802, 807, 891; Jeremiah's new covenant, 991; Jerusalem, holiness of, 629; kabbalah and mysticism, 1988–89, 2083; liberation theology, 1176; “love your neighbor as yourself,” 254; Malachi and John the Baptist, 1273; manumission of slaves, 399; medieval Jewish biblical interpretation and, 1876, 1890–91, 1895; Melchizedek, 1408–9; messianism, 1961 (see also messianism); Michael (archangel), 1657, 1662; midrash and, 1864, 1867, 1872; modern Jewish biblical interpretation and, 1910, 1911, 1912, 1914, 1915, 1917; original sin, 1339; penitential theology, 1659; Philo, importance of, 1840; philosophical polemics against, 1960–61; Psalms, 1281, 1286, 1305, 1332, 1408, 1409; Rahab as ancestor of Jesus, 466; Samuel, division into two books of, 558; Siddur, polemical overtones of, 1942; son of man in Daniel, 1657; “strange woman” as symbol of heresy in Proverbs, 1452; synagogues, origins of, 1929–30; tablet of Decalogue, depiction of, 163; Torah, view of, 1, 3, 5; translations of the Bible, 2005–20; Wisdom as personified in Proverbs, 1461
- Chronicles: annals mentioned as sources, 1712, 1764; authorship, 1712, 1713; composition, compilation, and redaction, 1713; dating, 1713; division into two books, 1276, 1712; early sources used by, 1806, 1811; Ezra-Nehemiah, authorship of, 1667; Ezra-Nehemiah, continuation of Chronicles, 1666, 1667; Ezra-Nehemiah, relationship to, 1667, 1712, 1716, 1731, 1825; introduction to, 1712–17; Israelite identity, exclusivist nature of, 1731, 1819, 1820; Kings, relationship to, 1713; modern source theories, 1713–14; Psalms, relationship to, 1713, 1743–45, 1757; Samuel, correction of books of, 560; Samuel, relationship to, 1713; single book, 1 and 2 Chronicles viewed in Jewish tradition as, 1276, 1712; structure and divisions, 1712, 1716–17; text and annotations, 1717–64; themes and perspectives, 1715–16; title of, 1712, 1714; topoi of 2 Chronicles, 1781; Torah, 1713, 1754, 1773, 1791, 1809, 1812; Zerubbabel associated with line of David, 1248
- circumambulation of city walls, ceremony of, 1336
- circumcision: Deuteronomy, 436; Esther, 1625; Exodus, 113–14, 127; Ezekiel, 1096; Genesis, 37–38, 44, 70; heart, “circumcision” of, 436, 929, 945; Jeremiah, 929, 945; Joshua, 463, 471–72; Leviticus, 233; “uncircumcised persons” as insult, 585, 594, 618
- cities of refuge, 352–54, 373, 409–10, 486, 493, 497, 498, 723
- clean and unclean, 2041 (see also purification and purity)
- clothing, tearing of, see mourning rituals
- cloth laws in Leviticus, 237–38, 254
- cloud, God in: 2 Chronicles, 1772; Exodus, 135, 163, 187, 202; Ezekiel, 1046, 1060; 1 Kings, 690; Numbers, 303; pillar of cloud, 135, 187, 1393, 1400; Psalms, 1354, 1393
- Cohen, Hermann, 1970–71
- collective guilt, see communal guilt
- comedy, see humor and comedy
- Commandments, Ten, see Decalogue
- communal guilt: Daniel, 1655; Deuteronomy, 376–77; Exodus, 149; Ezekiel's theory of individual righteousness and responsibility, 1066–67, 1073–75; Isaiah, 892; Jeremiah, 990; Job, 1532; Lamentations, 1601; Numbers, 312; Psalms, 1372, 1407
- communal laments, 1595, 1597–98, 1600–1602
- communal psalms, 1283, 1330, 1333, 1335, 1347, 1426
- communications system of Persians, 1624, 1627, 1635
- Community Rule, Qumran, 2047
- comparative social analysis, 2093–94
- compassion/pathos/grace, divine, 1207, 1715, 1785, 1817
- compilation, see composition, compilation, and redaction
- complaining of Israelites wandering in the wilderness: Deuteronomy, 364, 365, 386, 433; Exodus, 135, 138–40, 142; Jeremiah, 940; Numbers, 306–12, 315–19, 323–24, 325–26; Psalms, 1389, 1402
- complaints, see laments
- composition, compilation, and redaction: Amos, 1176; Chronicles, 1713; critical scholarship, redactive, 2088; Daniel, 1640; Dead Sea Scrolls representing early editorial stages and source materials, 1925–26; Deuteronomy, 358–61; Exodus, 104–5; Ezekiel, 1043; Jeremiah, 918–19, 948; Job, 1500–1503, 1546; Joshua, 462; Judges, 509; Kings, books of, 669–71; Lamentations, 1589; Nevi'im (Prophets), 456–57; Samuel, books of, 560–61; Song of Songs, 1564; Torah, 6–7; Twelve Minor Prophets, 1140–141
- concubines and concubinage, 52, 72, 73, 153, 254, 550–52, 1651
- confession: Daniel, penitential theology in, 1659–60; Ezekiel, 1118; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1683, 1685, 1689, 1701, 1703; Isaiah, 902; Jeremiah, 949; Lamentations, 1592, 1597–98, 1601; Leviticus, 276; Numbers, 293; Psalms, 1324–25, 1339
- confidence in God, see trust/confidence in God
- “consecutive judges,” 534, 539
- conversion to Judaism, 83, 1008, 1579, 1581, 1582, 1636
- corporate guilt, see communal guilt
- corpse exposure, 415, 482, 813, 1117
- corpse pollution, 205, 232–47, 234, 241, 321–22, 345–46, 2041–47
- correction, see discipline and correction, acceptance of
- corvée (forced labor), 107–8, 412, 575, 639, 683, 694, 702
- Covenant, Ark of, see Tabernacle/Ark of the Covenant
- Covenant, Book of, see Book of the Covenant
- covenant between God and Israel: Abraham, 30, 35–36, 37–38, 1701; Book of the Covenant, 145, 151, 160, 162, 163; ceremony establishing, 160, 161–63; Davidic dynasty (see Davidic dynasty, God's assurance of continuation of); Decalogue, 148; Deuteronomy, 356, 358, 372–73, 381–86, 389–91, 396–98, 425–37; Exodus, 102, 103, 106–7; Ezekiel, 1048, 1062, 1066, 1071, 1109–10, 1113, 1114, 1118, 1127; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1669, 1701–5, 1710; freedom from enslavement in Egypt, 110, 115–16; friendship, Ezekiel's covenant of, 1109, 1114, 1118; Hezekiah, 1704; holiness of whole people required to maintain, 146; Isaiah, 785, 867, 893, 894, 895–96, 902; Jacob going down to Egypt, 91; Jeremiah, 948–54, 963, 991, 994; Joshua, 462, 478–79, 501, 504, 505; Josiah, 1704; 2 Kings, 748, 758, 772; land, promise of (see promise and possession of the land of Israel); Leviticus, 203, 206; Malachi, 1273; Mt. Sinai, theophany on, 145, 146; Noah and the flood, 22–25; Numbers, 281; promises and threats regarding, 273–77; Psalmic theme, 1283, 1318, 1331, 1381, 1392, 1396, 1399; rainbow as symbol of, 22–25, 1048; ratification ceremony, 425–37; religion of Bible and, 2031–33; Sabbath observance as sign of, 182; sabbatical year, covenant ceremony to be held in, 439; 2 Samuel, 632; The Song at the Sea, 137; Tabernacle, divine Presence in, 178, 274; “they shall be my people and I will be their God,” 1066; Torah, 1; violation and restoration of, 182–91, 435–36
- Covenant Collection, 5, 427, 1836

- covetousness, 150–51, 190 creation, 2, 4; Amos, 1185, 1191; Daniel, 1655; Exodus, 150, 165; Ezekiel, 1047–48, 1110, 1116, 1133; Genesis, 9–10, 12–16; Jeremiah's depiction of suffering of, 931; Job, 1516–18, 1538, 1552, 1555–61; Leviticus, 229; Psalmic theme, 1283, 1291, 1302, 1308, 1317, 1363, 1364, 1366, 1382, 1386, 1387, 1389, 1397, 1398, 1425, 1433, 1434, 1443, 1444; renewal of, 913; Wisdom of personified in Proverbs, 1461–62
- cremation, 618
 Crescas, Hasdai, 1960
 Crete, 568, 616, 634, 673, 1020, 1238
- critical scholarship, 2084–96; anthropology, sociology, and ethnography, 2088, 2093–96; archeological evidence and written remains, 2086–96; canonical criticism, 2096; comparative social analysis, 2093–94; cultural hermeneutics, 2094–96; Dead Sea Scrolls, role of, 1924–27, 2089–90; form criticism, 1283, 2086–87; goals of, 2068; "higher criticism" and Dead Sea Scrolls, 1924; historical-critical scholarship, 11, 2001–2, 2084–85, 2090, 2095–96; holistic reading approach to Bible, 7, 281; illusory nature of objectivity, 2094; liberation theology, 2095; literary critical scholarship, 1914, 2001–3, 2090–93, 2095–96; post-structuralism/deconstruction, 2092; postmodernism, 2092–93, 2096; psychoanalysis, 2002, 2092; reader-response criticism, 2091–92; redaction criticism, 2088; social-scientific criticism, 2093–94; source-critical method, 6, 7, 85, 124, 1914, 2085–86; structuralism, 2091; text criticism ("lower criticism"), 1924, 1926, 2067–72; Torah and Nevi'im, relationship between, 1142; women's scholarly writings and feminist Jewish exegesis, 147, 1975, 2001–5, 2095–96
- crocodiles, 1102, 1559
- cross-cultural comparisons, 2093 cross-dressing, proscription of, 415–16 crucifixion, 46
 cubits, 22, 166, 170, 468, 683, 1254
 Culi, Jacob, 1899
- cultic prostitution, 77, 335, 419–20, 706, 707, 724
 cultural hermeneutics, 2094–96
 cup of deliverance, 1413 cup of God's wrath/water of bitterness, 185, 295, 977, 1347, 1365, 1532, 1596
- curse and cursing: covenant between God and Israel, ratification of, 427–32, 433–35, 479; effectuation, 1408; Jericho, curse on rebuilder of, 374; Job, 1503–8, 1538–39, 1544; Leviticus, 267–69; Numbers, 328–34; Saul's curse on troops who eat while pursuing Philistines, 586–88; Saul's cursing of Jonathan, 601; self-imprecation, 1290, 1544
- Cush (Kush) and Cushites (Ethiopia and Ethiopians): Ezekiel, 1100; Isaiah, 819–20, 876; Jeremiah, 954, 1004; Job, 1540; Nubia, 819, 876, 1540, 1626; Numbers, 308; Psalms, 1355, 1380; 2 Samuel, 652–53; Zephaniah, 1235, 1241
- Cyprus, 827, 924
 Cyrus of Persia and decree of Cyrus, 2055–56; 2 Chronicles, 1825; Daniel, 1641, 1665; Ezekiel, 1103; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1666, 1669, 1675, 1677–78, 1679, 1680; Haggai, 1243; Isaiah, 783, 810, 860, 864, 866, 867, 869, 870, 874–76, 881; Jeremiah, 1030, 1033; Kethuvim, 1276
- D
- D or Deuteronomic source, 3–6, 105, 124, 1910 (see also Deuteronomistic History)
 Dagon, 126, 546, 570, 1733
 Daily Hallel, 1442
 daily offering (tamid), 177, 218, 226, 340, 1131–32, 1168 damages, payment of, 216–17
 Damascus, see Aram/Aram Damascus (Syria)
- Dan (son of Jacob/tribal group): Deuteronomy, 448, 495; Genesis, 34, 61, 72, 76, 97; Judges, 512, 520, 521, 548–50; Kings, books of, 708 dancing, 546, 557, 596, 1314, 1574–75
 Dan-El, 1066–67, 1095
 Daniel: apocalypticism of, 461, 1276, 1640, 1641, 1644, 1649, 1655–65; Dan-El, 1066–67, 1095; dating, 1640, 1641–42, 1664–65; Dead Sea Scrolls, 1926; dreams, interpretation of, 1644–46, 1649–50, 1672; Ezra-Nehemiah echoing, 1672, 1689; Greek influence on, 1276; historical fiction, viewed as, 1278–79, 1642, 1662; introduction, 1640–42; Mordecai in Esther compared to, 1636; prophetic book, viewed as, 461, 1140, 1642; Rabbinic Judaism's critique of, 1642, 1646, 1650; text and annotations, 1642–65; Zerubbabel as successor of, 1672
 Darius of Persia: Daniel ("Darius the Mede"), 1641, 1653–55, 1659, 1662; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1666, 1676, 1677, 1679, 1680; Haggai, 1243, 1244, 1245, 1247; Zechariah, 1251 darkness and light, motifs of, 12, 123, 953, 1102, 1508, 1518, 1519, 1596, 1620, 1621, 1979 (see also lamps/lampstands) Dathan and Abiram, rebellion of, 315–16, 336, 389, 1402 dating of texts: Amos, 1176; Chronicles, 1713; Daniel, 1640, 1641–42, 1664–65; Deuteronomy, 363, 367, 412; Ecclesiastes, 1605; Esther, 1625; exodus from Egypt, 683; Ezekiel, 1043; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1667, 1689; Habakkuk, 1226; Haggai, 1243–44; Hosea, 1144; Isaiah, 781, 782, 783, 784; Job, 1502, 1503; Joel, 1167, 1168; Jonah, 1199; Joshua, 462–63; Judges (book), 509–10; Kethuvim ("Writings"), 1275, 1276; Kings, books of, 669–71; Lamentations, 1589; Leviticus, 205; Micah, 1206; Nahum, 1219; Obadiah, 1193; Proverbs, 1447; Psalms, 1282; Ruth, 1579; Samuel, books of, 560–61; Song of Songs, 1564–65; Torah, 5–6, 363, 367, 412; Zechariah, 1249, 1250; Zephaniah, 1234
 "daughter of the Voice" (bat kol/qol), 301, 1244
- David, 57, 97, 1187; Abigail and Nabal, 608–10; Absalom's vengeance for rape of Tamar, revolt, and death, 640–53; administration of, 633–34, 652, 1575, 1758, 1760; Ammon, war with, 635–39; Ark brought to Jerusalem by, 629–32; Bathsheba and Uriah, 635–39, 1750; censuses held by, 665–66, 1751–52, 1755; Chronicles' emphasis on, 1712, 1715, 1719, 1721, 1733–64; conquests and heroic feats, 633, 658–60, 664–65, 1737–39, 1747–51, 1753–54; death of Saul and Jonathan, reaction to, 619–21; dirges, 620–21, 625; Elhanan as alternative name for, 659, 1750–51; Goliath, fight with, 592–96, 1750–51; Hezekiah compared to, 1809; historicity, 2052–53; Israel, kingship over, 627, 656–58; Jerusalem, flight from and return to (Absalom's revolt), 645–54; Jerusalem, taking of, 627, 1365, 1734–36, 1764; Jonathan and, 596, 598–601, 605; Judah, kingship over, 621–26, 656–58; Judges favoring, 551, 557; lamp as metaphor for, 699; last words of, 663; magnanimity towards Saul, 606–8, 611–12; maps, 591; Mephibosheth, 626, 634–35, 647, 650, 654–55; Moses, paralleling, 1755, 1779; musical skills, 592, 1281, 1734; old age and death of, 671–75; palace, 631, 1740–41; Philistines, dwelling with, 602–3, 612–18; Philistines, liberation of Israelites from, 629, 838, 1737, 1742, 1747, 1750–51; as prophet, 1707, 1762; Psalms, 1281–82, 1286, 1344, 1349, 1376; returnees from Babylonian exile, genealogies of, 1681; Ruth and Boaz's son Obed linked to, 1578, 1586; Samuel, depiction in books of, 558–59; Samuel, discovery by, 590–92; Saul's jealousy and persecution of, 592, 596–618; Solomon and David as parallel figures in Chronicles, 1753, 1754, 1762, 1765; song of thanksgiving, 660–63, 1763; Temple cultus, Chronicles' stress on role in, 1734, 1753–55, 1758; Temple, proposal to build, 631–32, 1745–47, 1748; as Torah scholar, 1734; usurper, Chronicles' concern that David not appear as, 1733; warriors joining with, 1737–38; wives and concubines,

David (continued)

597–99, 610, 621, 623, 627, 635–39, 648, 656, 671, 1740–41;
Zerubbabel as descendant of, 1672, 1674

Davidic dynasty, God's assurance of continuation of: Chronicles, 1712, 1715, 1745–47, 1777, 1779, 1786, 1797; Ezekiel, 1063, 1064, 1071–72, 1075, 1100, 1109, 1114; Isaiah (Deutero-Isaiah), 867, 894, 895; Isaiah (First Isaiah), 782, 783, 798, 801–2, 804, 806, 849; Jeremiah, 953, 968–76, 996, 1041; 1 Kings, 669, 674, 694, 698; 2 Kings, 779; Psalms, 1283, 1360, 1373, 1381–83, 1394, 1431; Ruth, 1579; 2 Samuel, 631–32

Dawn (Canaanite deity), 812–13

Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur): Chronicles, 1777; Exodus, 164, 179, 186; Ezekiel, 1050, 1082, 1118, 1127; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1669, 1689, 1699, 1701; Jeremiah, 1010; Job, 1510, 1524, 1525; Jonah, readings from, 1199; Judges, 557; 1 Kings, 689, 716; Lamentations, 1597; Leviticus, 204, 238–39, 244, 246, 263, 265; Micah, 1205, 1218; Numbers, 322, 342, 434; piyyutim, 1937; Proverbs, 1479; Psalms, 1311, 1395

Day of the Lord, the: Amos, 1186; Ezekiel, 1054–55, 1100, 1102; Isaiah, 826; Jeremiah, 1032; Joel, 1169; Lamentations, 1591; Zechariah, 1265; Zephaniah, 1237

Day of Revelation, 224–28, 244

Days of Awe (High Holidays), 189, 963, 1378, 1596–97, 1665

Dead Sea, 3–34, 42, 351, 2061–62

Dead Sea Scrolls, see Qumran community and Dead Sea Scrolls

deafness and blindness as metaphors, 840, 846, 868, 911

death and dead persons: Book of the Dead, 1349, 1544; consulting the dead (necromancy), 407–8, 533, 613–14, 774, 801, 1402, 1817, 2026; cremation, 618; dirges for the dead (see laments); Ecclesiastes theme, 1603–4, 1610–11, 1614, 1615, 1617, 1620–21; exposure of dead bodies, 415, 482, 813, 1117; food offerings to the dead, 424–25; impurity of dead bodies, 205, 232–47, 234, 241, 321–22, 345–46, 2041–47; Job passage recited at burial services, 1507; marzeah feast, 959, 1402; Mot (Canaanite god of death), 944, 1517, 1528; praise of God, death as inhibition to (“keep me alive to praise you” argument), 1345, 1347, 1359, 1408, 1412, 1413, 1440, 1515 death penalty, see capital punishment

Debir, 481, 482, 490

Deborah relative of Abraham, 71

Deborah the prophetess, 138, 144, 326, 517–22, 771, 782, 1065, 1348 debt cancellation, 159, 270–73, 398–400, 997–98, 1584–85, 1694–95

Decalogue: Abraham's story foreshadowing, 35; Deuteronomy, 371–72, 374–82; Ezekiel's individual righteousness theory, 1073, 1074; Jewish tradition and, 106–7; Leviticus, 253; liturgy and prayers, 1942–43; Psalms, 1283, 1338, 1349, 1374, 1444; revelation of, 148–52; Shavuot, festival of, 106; Tabernacle narrative, 166, 203; tablets, Moses' reception of, 162, 163, 189–91; theophany, 145, 227

deconstruction/post-structuralism, 2092

decree of Cyrus, see Cyrus of Persia and decree of Cyrus dedications: first-born, 131–33, 157, 190, 279, 289, 290, 398, 400, 1078; First Temple, 689–93, 1771–77; Hezekiah's purging and rededication of Temple, 1808–10; home dedication, lack of rituals for, 412; Judah Maccabee, rededication of Temple following victory of, 1313; monetary dedications, 277–78; wall around Jerusalem rebuilt by Nehemiah, 1708

Dedanites, 824

deformities, see disabilities and deformities

Deir 'Alla inscription, 328

Delilah, 544–45

demons/spirits, 126, 408, 442

Demotic, 1304

deportation, see exile depths, cry of despair from, 1380, 1430 (see also Sheol) derash exegesis, 939, 1902, 1903, 1906, 1983, 1992–94, 1997, 1998

derashah, see sermons desert: Hamsin/Sharav/Sharab (desert wind), 964, 1034, 1076; Israelites' wandering in (see wilderness, Israelites' wandering in); Negev/Negeb desert, 1054, 1080, 2062

Deutero-Isaiah (Isaiah 40–66), 782–84; Ezekiel, 1103; Jeremiah influenced by, 946, 947, 960, 972, 974, 986; Micah, 1217; Obadiah, 1197; Psalms, 1339, 1352, 1370, 1390, 1391, 1393, 1404; Trito-Isaiah (Third Isaiah), chs 54/56–66, 783

Deuteronomistic source (D), 3–6, 105, 124, 1910

Deuteronomistic History: Chronicles, 1719, 1736, 1777, 1779, 1793, 1811, 1820, 1823; Daniel reflecting, 1660; divine Presence, understanding of, 691; historical background, 2057; interpretation and study, 1836; Jeremiah, 1007; Joshua, 462–63, 474; Josiah's discovery of book/scroll of the Teaching, 462, 770–72, 1699, 1818–20; Judges, 509–10; Kethuvim (“Writings”), 1276; Kings, books of, 669, 676, 690, 691, 752, 759; Nevi'im (Prophets), 453–54; Psalms, 1367, 1401, 1416, 1420, 1426; religion of Bible and, 2031–33; Samuel, books of, 561, 581, 631

Deuteronomy: anachronisms regarding date of writing of, 363, 367, 412; authorship, 358, 363, 367, 375; composition, compilation, and redaction, 358–61; conclusion, literary structure of, 438; Ecclesiastes in opposition to, 1603; Ezekiel, 407, 1054; Ezra-Nehemiah influenced by, 1681, 1689; historical and literary context, 357–61, 363, 367; holiness, view of, 6, 146, 428; incorporation into Pentateuch, 437, 445, 449, 450; interpretative reading of, 361–62; Isaiah's use of, 844, 900; introduction to, 356–63; Jeremiah's adherence to, 918, 959; Jewish tradition and, 356, 358–61; Joshua's continuity with, 462–64, 501, 502, 504; Josiah, 357–58, 372, 380, 391, 403, 405, 407, 770–71; 1 Kings referring to, 674; law and legal material, 5, 151, 358, 362, 370–71, 374, 379, 391, 403, 425; modern issues, involvement with, 356; modern source theories, 358–61; narrative structure, 356, 362–63; origins of name, 357, 406; Psalms, 1367, 1401, 1416, 1426; religion and law, division of, 379, 391; Second Temple Judaism, 360–61; text and annotations, 363–450

de Wette, Wilhelm, 1910, 1911

dialects of Hebrew, 763, 2064

Diaspora Jews, 2058–60; 1 Chronicles, 1716, 1745; Deuteronomy, 361, 429; Ecclesiastes, 1910; Esther, 1625, 1628, 1639; Hellenistic philosophy, 1949; history of, 2058–59; Isaiah, 780, 821, 869; Jeremiah, 1012–13; Kethuvim, 1279; 2 Kings, 756 dietary laws: Chronicles, Hezekiah's reforms regarding Paschal lamb in, 1821–22; Daniel, 1643–44; Deuteronomy, 396–98; Esther, 1624; Exodus, 158, 160; Ezekiel, 1052, 1129; Genesis, 25, 68; health and hygiene, 397–98, 2043; Leviticus, 205, 211, 221, 228–32, 247, 248; midrash and, 1867; milk and meat, prohibition on combining, 160, 229, 398; purification and purity, 229–32, 397–98; 1 Samuel, 587

Dikduk, the, 1879

Dinah, 62, 69–71, 91

direct view of or speech with God, 373, 378 direct vs. indirect knowledge of God, 1561

dirges, see laments disabilities and deformities: blind and lame paraded before warriors, 627; deafness and blindness as metaphors, 840, 846, 868, 911; giant with six fingers and six toes, 660; Mephibosheth, crippled son of Saul, 626, 634; priesthood, physical defects and, 259–60 disciples of the prophets, 727–28, 733, 737 discipline and correction, acceptance of: Job, 1511, 1512, 1547; Lamentations, 1597, 1600; Proverbs, 1453, 1455, 1469, 1490, 1493

- disease/plague/pestilence: Abner, death of, 625; Assyrian plague in 2 Kings, 766; bubonic plague, 570; disobedient peoples scourged with, 504; Egypt, plagues sent against, 113–29, 569, 571, 944, 957, 1059, 1102, 1173, 1184, 1400, 1433, 1434; Ezekiel, 1054, 1055; Habakkuk, theophany of, 1331; Hezekiah, illness and healing of, 858–60, 1815; Israelites suffering from, 275–76, 312, 335, 432, 442, 665–66, 1166–68, 1172–73, 1188; Jehoahaz in Chronicles, disease of bowels of, 1798; Jeremiah, 956, 964, 986; Job, 1507; Philistines, capture and return of Ark by, 570–71; Psalms, 1305, 1306, 1314, 1315, 1316, 1324, 1328, 1360, 1363, 1380, 1386, 1394, 1400, 1412–13, 1430; sexually-transmitted diseases, 241, 625; sinfulness, as punishment for, 1324, 1362; skin conditions (tzara'at) or “leprosy,” 232, 234–41, 308–9, 421, 625, 735–36, 759, 1804–5
- dishonesty, see honesty / dishonesty
- disloyalty to God, see loyalty / disloyalty to God
- disputation format of Malachi, 1269
- distress, seeking God in, 1152, 1168, 1199
- divination, see dreams; magic and sorcery; prophets and prophecy
- divine court: Daniel, 1656; Isaiah, 796, 861; Job, 1502, 1506, 1513; 1 Kings, 723
- divine grace/pathos/compassion, 1207, 1715, 1785, 1817
- divine jealousy, 149, 506
- divine justice in Ecclesiastes, 1610, 1614, 1616, 1620, 1622
- divine justice in Jeremiah, 964
- divine justice in Job: God accused of watching people too closely, 1522; God's power as implying God's justice, 1511, 1519, 1520, 1523, 1537, 1551, 1552, 1554–61; inability of humans to prevail in argument against God, 1510, 1516, 1517, 1525; incapacity of humans to understand how world is governed, 1516, 1517, 1551, 1552, 1555–61; theme of deserved / undeserved human suffering, 1499, 1504, 1509–15, 1530–37, 1544–46, 1555; vindication of righteous, 1528, 1529, 1539, 1561–62
- divine justice in Lamentations, 1592, 1597, 1599
- divine justice in Psalms, 1310, 1346, 1360, 1364, 1366, 1375, 1382, 1388, 1390, 1394, 1438
- divine justice in Ruth, 1579, 1582
- divine kingship, see kingship, divine
- divine kiss, death of Moses and Aaron by, 350
- divine names, 3–4 (see also specific divine names); Deuteronomy, 364, 377, 432, 441; Esther, 1631; Exodus, 110–12, 115; Genesis, 33–34, 98; Job, “One” as possible divine name for God in, 1545; Joshua, 468; Micah, 1206; Numbers, 301, 306; Psalms, 1336, 1445
- divine Presence, see theophany
- divine righteousness, see righteousness
- Divine Warrior: Deuteronomy, 444–46, 448–49; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1694; Isaiah, 868, 908; Joshua, 481; Psalmic theme, 1283, 1289–90, 1319, 1330, 1334, 1364, 1440
- divine witness, 536, 600
- divisions and subdivisions of Bible: Amos, 1181; canonical divisions, 1; chapters, division of biblical books into, 1167; Chronicles, 1712, 1716–17; Daniel, 1640; Ezekiel, 1044–45; Ezra-Nehemiah divided into two books, 1667; internal subdivisions of texts, 1181; Isaiah, 781, 782, 783–84; Lamentations, 1587; Nevi'im (Prophets), divisions of, 451; Numbers, 281–84; Proverbs, 1448–49; Psalms, 1280–81; Samuel and Kings divided into two books, 451, 558, 619, 668, 726
- divorce: Deuteronomical laws regarding, 416–17, 420; Ezekiel's marriage allegory, 1067–71, 1084–86; Jeremiah, marriage motif in, 923, 926–28, 952–54, 958, 963, 971, 973, 988, 990, 995; Malachi, 1272
- Djefai-hapi, 1496
- Documentary Hypothesis, 3, 1909, 1912, 1913
- doe as metaphor for woman, 1456
- Doeg the Edomite, 601, 604, 1340
- dogs, Israelite view of, 624, 634, 648, 1355
- doorposts and mezuzot, 381, 1924
- double entendre, 1564 (see also puns and punning)
- double expression, 1590
- doubling, see multiple versions of same event
- Douglas, Mary, 2041, 2094
- doves in Song of Songs, 1568
- doxologies: Daniel, 1648, 1655, 1657; kaddish prayer, 1537, 1645, 1947; Psalms, 1280–81, 1328, 1361, 1384, 1403, 1443, 1445
- dragons, see monsters
- drama, Song of Songs as, 1565
- dreams: Daniel as interpreter of, 1644–46, 1649–50, 1672; Deuteronomical prophecy laws, 395; Ecclesiastes' warnings about, 1612; Gibeon, Solomon's dream at, 677, 691, 694; Gideon and the dream of the Midianite soldier, 526; Jacob's dream of the staircase or ziggurat, 58; Jeremiah on false prophets, 974; Job, dream vision in, 1501–2, 1510–11, 1515, 1516, 1524; Job, God speaking in dreams in, 1548; Joel, old men dreaming dreams in, 1172; Joseph, 75, 79–82, 88; Song of Songs' dream scenes, 1569, 1572; Zerubbabel as interpreter of, 1672
- drought, 138, 142, 323–24, 325, 335, 711–16, 954–63
- drowning as metaphor, 1356, 1598
- drunkenness, see alcohol and intoxication
- “dry bones” in Ezekiel, 834, 1042, 1113–14, 1117, 1665
- Duachety, 1450
- dual leadership, rebuilding of Temple under, 1244–45, 1248, 1249, 1253–54, 1256
- Dumah, 824–25
- Dumuzi, 818, 959
- dung(hill) as metaphor, 564, 1052, 1066
- dust as metaphor, 564, 889, 1314, 1383, 1384, 1511, 1561, 1610

E

- E or Elohist source, 3–6; Exodus, 105, 108, 110, 111, 124, 134, 145, 183; Genesis, 11, 42, 45, 58, 64, 76; JE (Yahwist/Elohist) source, 6, 105, 107, 115, 305, 309, 323, 334; Psalms (Elohist Psalter), 1281, 1296, 1328–29, 1338, 1341, 1358
- eagles: dietary laws regarding, 441; Ezekiel, 1042, 1071–72; God as, 441; Nebuchadnezzar, associated with, 1071–72, 1155
- earth as flat surface resting on pillars, 564, 1364
- earthquakes, 519, 660, 685, 788, 802, 803, 1177, 1312, 1313, 1411 (see also theophany)
- earth's surface floating on ocean, 149, 372
- Easter, 126
- Ecbatana, 1678
- Ecclesiastes: Aramaic influence, 1276; authorship and dating, 1563, 1604–6; introduction, 1603–6; Job and, 1514, 1519, 1539; Sukkot liturgy, 1276; text and annotations, 1606–22; wealthy, envy of, 1336; wisdom and wisdom literature, 1276–77, 1603, 1605, 1607–8, 1614–19, 1622
- Ecclesiasticus (Wisdom of Ben Sirach), 562, 784, 1277, 1416
- echo, 301, 1244
- economic justice, poverty, and social welfare (see also widows and orphans): Deuteronomy, 399, 420–22; duty to assist poor, 158; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1694–95; Isaiah, 780, 781, 789, 793, 804, 899; Jeremiah, 935; Job, 1536, 1544–45; monarchy, establishment of, 2053; Proverbs, 1336, 1410, 1466, 1471, 1472, 1481, 1482, 1484, 1492, 1497; Psalms, 1292, 1293, 1295, 1319, 1327, 1354, 1358, 1360, 1375, 1378, 1407, 1411, 1430, 1432, 1442; Ruth, 1581–82; sacrificial means for poor, 208, 215–16, 234, 243
- ecstatic prophets, 578, 579, 599
- Eden, garden of, 15, 1096, 1101, 1113, 1123, 1133, 1322, 1546

- editing of Biblical books, see composition, compilation, and redaction
- Edom and Edomites: Amos, 1180; Chronicles, 1718, 1794, 1803, 1806; Deuteronomy, 366, 418–19; Esau, descendants of, 72–74, 1193, 1270; Ezekiel, 1071, 1080, 1090, 1105, 1110–11; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1684, 1706; Genesis, 53, 57, 72–74; Isaiah, 824, 850–51, 908; Israelite kinship with, 1193, 1195; Jeremiah, 981, 1025–26, 1033; Job set in Edom, 1503, 1505, 1507; Joel, 1174; 1 Kings, 697, 698, 722, 724; 2 Kings, 731, 741, 752, 754; Lamentations, 1600; Numbers, 323, 324, 334; Obadiah, 1193–97; Psalms, 1347, 1366, 1376, 1435; Roman empire and Christianity associated with, 850–51, 1174, 1193, 1196, 1891
- ’edut*, 748
- efficacy of prayers, 767, 1284, 1305–6, 1338, 1340, 1353, 1438, 1442
- Eglon, 515–17
- Egypt, 2049, 2050 (see also individual pharaohs); Abraham, 31; Assyrian conflicts, 758, 765–66, 769; aversion to shepherds/Hebrews, 87, 92, 120; Book of the Dead, 1349, 1544; Carchemish, Babylonian defeat of Egyptians at, 968, 1000, 1002, 1016; Daniel, 1641, 1645, 1662–64; Ecclesiastes echoing “The Tale of the Eloquent Peasant,” 1612; enslavement and freeing of Israelites (see enslavement in Egypt); Ethiopian dynasty, ruled by, 1100; Ezekiel, 1072, 1098–1102, 1104–5; forced return due to disobedience to God, 431–32; Hosea, 1154; Instruction of Amenemope, 1448, 1472, 1482, 1488; Isaiah, 782, 819, 820–23, 842, 845, 846, 869; Israelite abhorrence of Egyptians, proscription on, 419; Israelite longing for, 306, 311, 317; Israelite return to, 406; Jeremiah’s criticism of alliance with, 924, 966, 970, 1011, 1016; Jeremiah’s exile and death in, 917–18, 976, 1010–12; Jeremiah’s oracle concerning, 1016–18; Jeremiah’s oracle on the exile in, 1012–15; Jewish Diaspora communities, 361, 821, 2058–59; Joseph and, 74, 76, 78–101; Judah, collapse of, 775; Lamentations, 1600, 1601; Lot’s choice of land compared to, 33; love poetry, Song of Songs paralleling, 1564, 1571; plagues of, 113–29, 569, 571, 944, 957, 1059, 1102, 1173, 1184, 1400, 1433, 1434; Psalms, 1304, 1380, 1397; Ptolemaic Dynasty, 1641, 1645, 1662–63, 2057–59; sexual perversities of, 249–52; Solomon’s marital alliances, 677; Tabernacle structure and, 165; uraeus, 325; weighing deeds or hearts/Book of the Dead, 1349; wisdom literature, 1473 (see also Instruction of Amenemope)
- Egyptian Hallel, 1410
- Ehud, 515–17, 539
- Eighteen Benedictions (see ‘Amidah prayer), 1537
- Eilat, Gulf of (Ezion-geber), 133, 161, 695, 698, 724, 1798
- ’ekhal*, see Lamentations; laments
- El, 69, 331, 441, 468, 814, 1375
- Elah, 709, 744
- Elam, 823, 1028, 1105
- elders/elderly: age at death/life span, 20, 72, 100, 438, 1385, 1562; Deuteronomy, 403, 415, 417; Joel, old men dreaming dreams in, 1172; Judges, 510–11, 534–36, 557; Numbers, 307, 354; terrors of old age in Ecclesiastes, 1620–21; value placed on old age, 1480; wisdom literature and respect for, 1547
- Eleazar (high priest): Chronicles, 1737; Joshua, 484, 486, 501, 506–7; Numbers, 324, 339, 345, 352
- Elegies, see Lamentations
- Elephantine, Egypt: Jewish community of, 821, 1012–13, 2058–59; papyri found at, 420
- Elhanan (possible alternative name for David), 659, 1750–51
- Eli and his sons, 561, 562, 564–68, 570
- Eliab, 591, 594
- Eliakim (son of Hilkiah), 826, 827
- Eliashib the high priest, 1691
- Elide priesthood, 917, 921, 956, 1128
- Eliezer of Beaugency (Rabbi), 1067, 1200, 1889, 1890
- Eliezer servant of Abraham, 34, 35, 48
- Eliezer (son of Moses), 13, 110, 143
- Elihu, 1500, 1503, 1526, 1546–54
- Elijah: 2 Chronicles, 1797; development of biblical religion and, 2030; Gideon in Judges, 525; heavenly assumption, 727, 1337; Jeremiah passage used when opening door on Passover for, 948; Jonah, 1203; 1 Kings, 710–18, 722, 723; 2 Kings, 726–28, 742; Malachi, 1274; Numbers, 339; Zechariah, 1264; Zerubbabel identified with, 1672
- Eliphaz, 1500, 1507, 1509–12, 1520, 1524–25, 1533, 1544, 1547
- Elisha: “baldhead,” tauting of Elisha as, 730; calling of Elisha by Elijah, 717–18; clairvoyance of, 736, 737, 741; death of, 751; development of biblical religion and, 2030; Hazeael, prophecy to, 741; Jehu, anointing of, 742; map of stories, 729; Numbers, 339; recognition as prophet, 728–30; Samaritan siege, 737; signs, 730, 732–37, 751; story cycles, 728, 730, 732
- Elkanah father of Samuel, 561–65
- Elohim, 3, 110, 143, 184, 331, 1206, 1281, 1338, 1375
- Elohists Psalter, 1281, 1296, 1328–29, 1338, 1341, 1358
- Elohists source, see E or Elohist source
- Elon the Zebulunite, 539
- El Shaddai/Shaddai, 37, 58, 71, 94, 98, 115, 1313, 1385, 1581
- Elyon (Most High), 441, 1290, 1292, 1375, 1385
- end of days, see apocalypticism/eschatology
- Endor, Witch of, 408, 613–14
- En-Gedi, 1567
- English Chief Rabbinate prayerbook (1890), 1938, 1947
- English translations of Bible, 2011–20
- enjoyment of life’s toil as theme of Ecclesiastes, 1603, 1604, 1608–10, 1612–14, 1617
- Enlightenment, Jewish (Haskalah, maskilim), 1901–2, 1903, 1905, 1907, 1909, 1910, 1965–69
- Enoch, 20, 1337
- enslavement in and redemption from Egypt, 107–30 (see also exodus from Egypt); Deuteronomy, 431–32; Exodus, 102, 103–4, 107–30; Genesis, 36, 37; Joel, 1172–73; Lamentations, 1590; Numbers, 315, 332, 341; Psalms, 1374
- enthronement psalms, 1334–35, 1387–88, 1392
- Enuma elish*, 9, 24
- ephod, 529, 547, 565, 585, 601, 604, 605, 621, 630
- Ephraim (alternative name for the Northern Kingdom), 1150
- Ephraim (tribal group): Chronicles, 1723, 1729; Deuteronomy, 447; Genesis, 61, 94, 95; Joshua, 488, 492; Judges, 520, 527, 529, 538–39; 1 Kings, 700; 2 Kings, 752; Psalms, 1372, 1373
- Ephrathah/Bethlehem, 72 (see also Bethlehem)
- Ephrathites, 1580
- epigrams in Proverbs, 1448
- equivalent retribution, law of, see talion
- Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, 766, 767, 769, 1675, 1676
- Esarhaddon, Vassal Treaty of, 358, 395, 427, 431
- Esau: Christendom and Romans, as cipher for, 57, 1891; Edomites as descendants of, 72–74, 1193, 1270; genealogies of Esau/Edom, 72–74; Genesis story of, 53–58, 66–69, 71, 72–74, 90; Malachi, 1269, 1270, 1272
- eschatology, see apocalypticism/eschatology
- Esdras, books of, 1667–68
- Eshnunna, Laws of, 154, 405
- Essenes, 2089 (see also Qumran community and Dead Sea Scrolls)
- Esther, 1305; authorship, 1563, 1637; comic farce, viewed as, 1279, 1623–25; dating, 1625; Dead Sea Scrolls, 1925–26; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1673, 1676; Haggai, 1245; historical fiction, viewed as, 1278–79, 1624, 1639; introduction, 1623–25; omission of

- God and religion by, 1624, 1631; principles and themes, 1279; Purim, 1276, 1279, 1933; text and annotations, 1625–39
- eternity, see afterlife/personal resurrection; Sheol
- Ethan the Ezrahite, 1282, 1381, 1757
- ethical monotheism, 1186
- ethics and morality: Amos, 1176, 1185–86; David and Bathsheba, depiction of, 636; Deuteronomic moral responsibilities, 415–16, 419–23; liturgy and prayers, morality as necessary accompaniment to, 1471; Malachi, 1271–72; Micah, 1205, 1208–9; neighbors, moral duties towards, 415; pattern and repetition in nature applied to moral life in wisdom literature, 1277; Psalmic theme, 1297, 1308, 1360, 1382; purity/impurity, moral vs. ritual, 2045–46; ritual actions, morality's primacy over, 955; sacrifice, morality's primacy over, 590, 785, 871, 914, 1153, 1176, 1186, 1215, 1287, 1338, 1471; theological foundation for, 389
- Ethiopia, see Cush
- ethnography, 2088, 2093–96
- eunuchs, 418, 575, 896
- Eve and Adam, 9, 14–18, 30, 851, 1276, 1507, 1717
- evil and good, knowledge of, 16–18
- evildoers of Psalms, 1288, 1293, 1321, 1350, 1388, 1407, 1438
- Evil-merodach, 779
- excavations, see archeological evidence
- exclusivist nature of later Israelite identity: Chronicles, 1731, 1819, 1820; exilic descent as sign of Jewish pedigree in Diaspora, 1628; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1673, 1676, 1701, 1711; purity/impurity issues, 2047; Ruth, 1579, 1585
- exile: Amos, 1183; Assyrian exile of northern tribes, 758–60; Assyrian threat to and siege of Judah, 764; Babylon (see Babylonian exile); common Near Eastern practice of, 430; Moses in Midian, 109–10; objectives of, 776–77
- Exodus (book): date, composition, authorship, and sources, 104–5; Genesis, transition from, 107; history and historiography, 103–4, 452, 2050; introduction, 102–7; Jewish tradition rooted in, 106–7; law and legal material, 102, 103, 105, 106–7; Leviticus and Numbers as direct continuation of, 204, 281; narrative structure and focus, 102–3; origins of names, 102; Psalms quoting, 1396; text and annotations, 107–202
- exodus from Egypt (see also enslavement in and redemption from Egypt; wilderness, Israelites' wandering in): Chronicles' reticence regarding, 1716, 1720, 1729, 1744, 1747; dating of, 683; death of exodus generation, 367, 370, 374, 379; Ezekiel, 1063, 1077, 1079, 1089, 1103; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1681, 1701–2; historicity, 2050; Isaiah, 852, 871, 882, 888, 890, 972; Jeremiah, 944, 960, 964, 972, 986, 1010, 1013, 1016, 1017 (see also wilderness, Israelites' wandering in); Jordan, echoes of exodus in crossing of, 468–71; march through the desert from Sinai to Moab, 282–83; metaphorical use of, 1172–73, 1217; Philistines' knowledge of, 570, 571; Psalmic theme, 1283, 1307, 1308, 1352, 1353, 1354, 1366, 1367, 1368, 1373, 1374, 1400, 1411, 1433, 1434, 1435; Song of Deborah echoing elements of, 517; Song of Songs tied to events of, 1565; story of, 124–30, 274, 277, 377; undoing of, 431–32
- exogamy, see intermarriage
- exposure of corpses, 415, 482, 813, 1117
- “eye for an eye,” see talion
- eyes, gouging out of, 580
- Ezekiel: authorship, 1043; calculation of years of punishment of Israel in, 1051; chronological scheme, 1044, 1098; composition, compilation, and redaction, 1043; dating, 1043; Deutero-Isaiah, 1103; Deuteronomy, 407, 1054; divine throne chariot and attendant creatures, 1043, 1045–48, 1059–60, 1119; “dry bones,” valley of, 834, 1042, 1113–14, 1117, 1665; Ezra compared to, 1680; Gog and Magog, 115–18, 1043; introduction, 1042–45; Isaiah, use of, 1067, 1100, 1101, 1103; Jeremiah influencing, 1061, 1062; Josiah's reforms of priesthood confirmed, 773; Leviticus, 207, 259, 1042; moral purity/impurity, 2045; Moses, compared to, 1042, 1043, 1050, 1059; Numbers, 303, 320, 341; people of the land, 748; priesthood and (see priesthood); reputation of God as theme of, 1112, 1293; scroll eaten by, 1049; structure and divisions, 1044–45; Temple (see Temple); text and annotations, 1045–1138; theologically challenging nature of, 1042, 1043, 1045; wife of Ezekiel, death of, 1088
- Ezra: Ezion-geber (Gulf of Eilat), 133, 161, 695, 698, 724, 1798
- Ezra (person): Aaronide priesthood, inclusion in, 1680, 1686; apocryphal works attributed to, 1667–68; Chronicles, Ezra as author of, 1712; Ezekiel, compared to, 1680; Malachi, identified with, 1684; Moses, compared to, 1669, 1680–81; reading of Torah to people by, 1699–1700; return to Jerusalem by, 341, 1672, 1680–84; Torah knowledge of, 1672, 1680
- “Ezra, Apocalypse of,” 1668
- Ezra-Nehemiah (book): Aramaic and Hebrew, use of both, 1668, 1676, 1681, 1700; authorship, 1667, 1668, 1669; Chronicles, as continuation of, 1666, 1667; Chronicles, authorship of, 1667; Chronicles, relationship to, 1667, 1712, 1716, 1731, 1825; dating, 1667, 1689; division into two books, 1667; early sources underlying, 1668; foreigners, 896; Haggai and Zechariah associated by, 1249; intermarriage crisis, 1669, 1682, 1684–86, 1704, 1709–11, 2047; introduction, 1666–71; Malachi, 1268; memoirs, 1668–69; narrative structure, 1669, 1670–71, 1688–89; Psalms, 1675; purity issues, 2047; single book, viewed in Jewish tradition as, 1276, 1667, 1689; text and annotations, 1671–87, 1688–1711; title, 1667; Torah, understanding of (see Torah); unity/separateness of Ezra and Nehemiah, debate over, 1667–68, 1689

F

- fabric laws in Leviticus, 237–38, 254
- fairness and justice, see divine justice; justice, human
- faith and faithfulness (see also hesed; trust/confidence in God; unfaithfulness, punishment, repentance, and return to the Lord): Exodus, 136, 137, 189; Lamentations, 1596–97; Psalms, 1287, 1332, 1339, 1349, 1350, 1367, 1371, 1394; unity of religious traditions in Bible regarding, 2040
- fallow land, 399–400 (see also sabbatical year)
- false gods, see idols and idol-worship
- false prophecy, see true and false prophecy
- falsehood and lying, see honesty/dishonesty
- family idols (household idols or teraphim), 64–65, 88, 547, 599–600, 1260, 1346, 2022
- family life (see also children; gender roles/differences; marriage; parents): basic social unit, family as, 475; patriarchal family structure, 1269, 1271–72; Proverbs on family and friends, 1490; punishment of whole family for actions of male head, 1655; Ruth, family continuity as principle of, 1279; social-scientific analysis, 2094
- famine: Amos, 1183–84, 1190; Exodus, 139; Ezekiel, 1052, 1054, 1055; Genesis, 82–94; Jeremiah, 956; 2 Kings, 734, 738, 740, 763, 777; Lamentations, 1599; Leviticus, 275–76; Proverbs, 1466; Psalms, 1318, 1400; Ruth, 1578, 1580; 2 Samuel, 658
- farce, Esther viewed as, 1279
- fasting and abstinence: Daniel, 1659; Esther, 1632, 1638; Exodus, 127, 159, 191; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1683, 1685, 1686, 1689, 1701; Gedaliah, Fast of, 1009, 1257; Isaiah, 889–900; Jeremiah, 954; Joel, 1168; Judges, 553; Leviticus, 246, 265; Malachi, 1275–76; Psalms, 1394; rain, fasting tradition associated with, 954; 1 Samuel, 618; 2 Samuel, 625; Temple destruction (see Tish'ah be'av); Zechariah, 1256–57
- fat/suet, 210–11, 221, 229

- fathers: God as father, 1269, 1271–72; patrilineal descent, 268, 345, 1685
- fear of the Lord: Ecclesiastes, 1615, 1622; Habakkuk, 1230; Job, 1505, 1540; Leviticus, 254; Proverbs, 1451, 1463, 1471, 1498, 1540; Psalms, 1306, 1319, 1410, 1412, 1414, 1429, 1444
- fear, wicked living in, 1491
- feet on necks as sign of conquest, 482
- feet uncovered as euphemism for sexual relations, 1583
- females, see gender roles/differences
- feminist Jewish exegesis, 147, 1975, 2001–5, 2095–96
- Ferrara Bible, 2009, 2010
- fertility/infertility: Deuteronomy, 383–84, 428; Exodus, 107, 108, 127, 128, 190; Genesis, 14, 26, 36–38, 57, 61–62, 83, 94; Hosea, 1148; Proverbs, 1495; Samuel, 561–62; Song of Songs, 1574, 1576
- festivals and holidays generally (see also specific festivals): Amos, 1190; Chronicles, 1756, 1777, 1788; Deuteronomy, 400–403; Exodus, 106, 159, 190; Ezekiel, 1131; Leviticus, 205; Numbers, 247, 262–67, 283–84, 304, 340–43; Psalms, 1374; 1 Samuel, 561, 599–601; Saul, kingship of, 581; Shiloh festival in 1 Samuel, 561
- fetishes, 1065–66
- fetus, status of, 154
- fiery furnace, Daniel's companions tested in, 1647–48
- figs, Jeremian vision of, 975–76
- fire: burnt offerings (see burnt offerings); God in, 110, 303, 378, 716, 727, 1046, 1337; hilltop signals, 935; judgment by, 1189; Tabernacle, 218; victory fires, 1117
- first-born (see also younger sons, God's choosing of): blemished first-borns, 400, 404; covenant, establishment of, 162; dedication and redemption, 131–33, 157, 190, 279, 289, 290, 398, 400, 1078; double portion of eldest son, 728; eldest brother, authority of, 594; exodus and dedication linked, 190; Joseph given status of, 447; Levite service to God in place of, 289, 290; Meshah's sacrifice of first-born son, 732; plague slaying first-born sons of Egyptians, 113, 118, 124–28, 944; succession to kingship, 671, 727
- first fruits: bread-dough offering compared to, 315; crops considered as, 264–65; feast of (see Shavuot); fruit from tree's first years, 255, 412; sacrifice of, 210
- First Isaiah, see Isaiah
- Five Books of Moses, see Torah
- five scrolls, the (hamesh megillot), 1275–76, 1563, 1933 (see also Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther)
- Flavius Josephus, see Josephus
- fleece, Gideon's sign of, 525
- flogging, 417, 422
- flood story, 4, 21–24
- flying insects, dietary laws regarding, 230–31
- flying scroll, Zechariah's vision of, 1254–55
- food: abstention from (see fasting and abstinence); dead, offerings to, 424–25; gift offerings/food-gifts ('ishel), 208–11, 223; lack of (see famine); laws regarding (see dietary laws)
- footstool of God, Ark as, 1760, 1775
- forced labor (corvée), 107–8, 412, 575, 639, 683, 694, 702
- foreign allies: Chronicles, 1789; Ezekiel, 1068, 1084–86; Isaiah, 781, 797, 825–26, 837, 842, 845, 846, 849; Jeremiah's criticism of alliance with Egypt, 924, 966, 970, 1011, 1016; Jeremiah's support for alliance with Babylonia, 924, 926, 970
- foreign gods and religious syncretism, see idols and idol-worship
- foreign nations (see also specific foreign nations): Amos's oracles against, 1177–80; Ezekiel's oracles against, 1049, 1071, 1089–1106, 1110–11; herem (see herem); invasion of Israel due to disobedience to God, 431, 436, 442–43, 573, 796, 897, 1166, 1169–75, 1371; Jeremiah's oracles against, 946, 977, 1015–39; Psalmic praise of God by, 1355, 1379, 1390, 1413; reliance on, 1154; Ruth's view of, 1579; universalism regarding (see universalism); Zechariah's oracles against, 1249, 1258–59; Zephaniah's oracles against, 1238–40
- foreign/strange/wicked women: Ecclesiastes, 1615; Proverbs, 1451, 1456
- foreigners/strangers/resident aliens: adopting Jewish beliefs, practices, and ethnicity, 872, 896, 904; Job, 1545–46; Jonah, 1202–1024; Micah, 1211–12; Temple, foreigners not allowed to enter, 1128
- foreigners/strangers/resident aliens, treatment of: Chronicles, 1812; Deuteronomy, 364, 377, 389, 398, 419, 420, 421, 439; Exodus, 110, 131, 150, 152, 155, 158; Ezekiel, 1082, 1128, 1135; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1669, 1682, 1684–86, 1701, 1709–11; Isaiah, 896; 1 Kings, 695; Leviticus, 246–47, 248, 252, 253, 255–56, 273; Numbers, 303, 314, 353; Psalms, 1326, 1336, 1388, 1443
- forgetfulness, see remembering/forgetting
- forgiveness, 214, 435–36, 1309, 1311, 1316, 1324, 1378, 1430 (see also unfaithfulness, punishment, repentance, and return to the Lord)
- form criticism, 1283, 2086–87
- Former Prophets, 451, 453–54, 455, 668
- forty, see number forty
- four (as number), 1252
- fowl or birds: dietary laws, 230; sacrifice of, 207, 208, 215
- foxes used to damage fields, 542–43
- framing devices, literary (inclusio), 446, 786, 1291, 1396, 1400, 1754
- France: French Revolution, 1967; Northern French School of medieval interpretation, 1886–91; Provençal School of medieval interpretation, 1885–86, 1892–93
- frankincense, 1571
- Franklin, Benjamin, 107
- fraud, 'asham for, 217
- Frazer, James, 2041
- freewill offering (nedavah), 206, 208–11, 220, 253, 261, 262, 343, 749, 1132, 1342
- French Revolution, 1967
- Freud, Sigmund, 2041, 2092
- friendship: Ecclesiastes on, 1611; Ezekiel's covenant of, 1109, 1114, 1118; Jonathan and David, 596, 598–601, 605
- fringes (tzitzit), 254, 313–14, 315, 317, 356, 379, 416
- frontlets, 132, 174
- fruit trees in Song of Songs, 1568, 1576
- funeral dirges, see laments
- funeral services, passage from Job recited at, 1507
- futility (hevel) as theme of Ecclesiastes, 1603, 1604, 1606–7, 1609–14, 1617, 1620, 1622

G

- Gaal, 532–33
- Gabriel (archangel), 1658
- Gad: Chronicles, 1723; Deuteronomy, 448; Genesis, 61, 72, 96, 98; Judges, 520, 521; Numbers, 326, 347–49, 352
- Galilee, Sea of (Kinneret), 448, 2061
- gaon, geonim*, 1845, 1876–80
- Gaon, Saadia ben Joseph, see Saadia ben Joseph, Gaon
- garden as representative of sexuality, 1571, 1573, 1577
- garden of Eden, 15, 1096, 1101, 1113, 1123, 1133, 1322, 1546
- garrison cities, 108
- gatekeepers of Temple, 1697, 1707, 1732, 1758
- gates of city as public forum, 415, 497, 520, 1185, 1357, 1415, 1482, 1485, 1545, 1584
- Gath, 484
- Gaza, 133, 161, 484, 512, 544, 570, 1179, 1238

- gazelles in Song of Songs, 1568, 1577
- Gedaliah, Fast of, 1009, 1257
- Gedaliah (son of Ahikam, son of Shaphan), 1006, 1007–12, 1041
- Gedaliah (son of Pashhur), 668, 778–79, 966, 968, 1003
- Gehazi, 734, 736, 740
- Gehinnom/Gehenna, 916, 940 (see also Hell; Sheol)
- gemilut lasadim*, 1215
- gender roles/differences: abduction of women at festivals, 557; androcentrism, 2004, 2005; association of grain with males and new wine with females, 1260; birth stories, predominance of woman character in, 540, 561; bodily discharges, impurity from, 241–43; childbirth, impurity after male vs. female child, 233; circling of groom by bride, 990; concubines and concubinage, 52, 72, 73, 153, 254, 550–52, 1651; critical scholarship by women, 147, 1975, 2001–5, 2095–96; cross-dressing, proscription of, 415–16; death of man at hands of woman, shamefulness of, 522, 534, 637; Deuteronomy's use of women as metaphorical themes, 879, 884, 885, 892–93, 903, 914; Deuteronomy's view of, 378, 399, 402, 404, 414, 416, 434, 439; doe as metaphor for woman, 1456; Ecclesiastes, value of having wife to love in, 1617; Ecclesiastes, woman waiting to entrap in, 1615; Eve and Adam, 9, 14–18, 30, 851, 1276, 1507, 1717; Ezekiel's wife, death of, 1088; feminist Jewish exegesis, 147, 1975, 2001–5, 2095–96; fertility and barrenness (see fertility/infertility); First Isaiah's use of women as metaphorical themes, 791, 798–99, 847; foolish women in Proverbs, 149, 1466; foreign/strange/wicked woman of Ecclesiastes, 1615; foreign/strange/wicked woman of Proverbs, 1451, 1456; Hosea, metaphors of domestic violence used in, 1143–44; idol-worship, women's involvement in, 1014, 1058, 1664; inheritance by women, 337–39, 354–55, 492; Job's wife, 1503, 1504, 1505, 1507, 1529, 1538; king in Proverbs urged not to give strength to women, 1497; Lamentations' portrayal of Jerusalem as shamed woman, 1587, 1589–92; lamenting woman, association of Judah with, 1168, 1207, 1224; loathsome woman in Proverbs, 1496; matrilineal descent, 1685; Micah, metaphors used in, 1206–7; mothers (see mothers and motherhood); mourning rituals, women's role in, 944, 1102; nagging wife in Proverbs, 1477; Nahum, metaphors used in, 1223, 1224; patriarchy, 2004, 2005; patrilineal descent, 268, 345, 1685; praise of capable woman in Proverbs, 1467, 1497–98; prophets, women as, 771, 782, 1140, 1696 (see also individual female prophets); Psalms, 1333, 1426, 1428, 1429; purity concepts and social subordination of women, 2041–42, 2043–44, 2094; queen mothers, 707–8, 747, 953, 983, 1652, 1789; Ruth and Naomi's relationship, 1578, 1580, 1581; sacrifice and sacrificial worship, 207, 218, 220; sacrifice of male vs. female animals, 1271; slavery, 152–55, 254, 399, 414, 1694; social-scientific analysis, 2094; Song of Songs interpreted as male and female aspects of God, 1566; Song of Songs interpreted as relationship between God and Israel, 1566; Song of Songs, prominence of female figure in, 1564, 1565; Temple singers and musicians, Heman's daughters as, 1758; towns as female, 1207, 1259; translations of Bible aimed at women, 2009; vows and oaths of women vs. men, 343–44; wisdom depicted as woman in Proverbs, 1449, 1450–51, 1460–62; wives' abandonment of birth family practices and beliefs on marriage, 1333; woman in love with man, only incident in Bible involving, 597; Zechariah, woman in tub representing wickedness in, 1255
- genealogies, 1717; Adam to Noah, 20–21; Chronicles, 1717–31; Esau/Edom, 72–74; Ezra-Nehemiah, returnees from exile in, 1666, 1672–74, 1682, 1697, 1705, 1707; Jacob and descendants going into Egypt, 91–92; Moses and Aaron, 116, 338; Numbers, census of tribes and Levites in, 284–93; patrilineal de-
- scent, 268; Ruth, 1578, 1579, 1586; Shem to Abraham, 29–30; sons of Noah, 26–28
- generosity, 1410
- Genesis: authorship and sources, 11; Chronicles and, 1717; Exodus, transition to, 107; historical nature of, 11, 2049–50; introduction, 8–11; narrative, role of, 8–11; origin stories, 2049; origins of name, 8; text and annotations, 12–101
- Genesis Apocryphon*, 1836–38, 1839, 1866
- genital defects (male), 259–60, 418
- genocide, 463
- geography of Bible, 2060–62 (see also maps, and specific geographic features)
- geonic period, 1845–46, 1876–80, 1882, 1933, 1936
- gerah, 290, 2105
- Germany, 28, 1890–92, 1901–7, 1965–75, 2009–11
- Gershom (son of Moses), 13, 110, 549
- Gershonites, 288, 289, 292, 297, 305, 499
- Gersonides (see Ralbag), 1524, 1812, 1958–60
- geviral* (queen mothers), 707–8, 747, 953, 983, 1652, 1789
- Gezer, 482
- ghosts, summoning (necromancy), 407–8, 533, 613–14, 774, 801, 1402, 1817, 2026 (see also magic and sorcery)
- giants, 310, 367, 484, 485, 511, 512, 659–60, 1750 (see also Goliath)
- Gibeah, 550–52, 554, 555, 580–81, 1157
- Gibeon, Solomon's dream at: Chronicles tradition regarding, 1745, 1752, 1765–66, 1768; Kings account of, 677, 691, 694
- Gibeonites, 462, 479–81, 658–59
- Gideon, 522–29, 539, 582
- gift offerings/ food-gifts ('ishleli), 208–11, 223
- gifts given to prophets, 577
- Gihon, spring of, 627, 673, 761, 768, 827, 1133, 1333, 1409, 1816
- Gilead, 66, 485, 520, 521, 943, 969, 1180, 1216, 1347
- Gilgal, 472, 1150, 1185
- Gilgamesh*, Epic of, 9–10, 541, 1427
- Ginsberg, Haro Id Lewis, 1914–15
- gittith*, 1291, 1377
- the glory of the Lord, 1048, 1979–80
- gluttony, 1491
- "the God of your fathers," 364
- Gog and Magog, 115–18, 1043
- Golan Heights (Bashan), 327, 368, 448, 485, 1183, 1216, 1306, 1791
- golden calves, see calves, worship of
- golden decorations of First Temple, 684, 689, 707
- the golden ephod, 529
- golden hemorrhoids, 571
- golden mice, 571
- Goliath, 310, 484, 560, 592–96, 603, 604, 659–60, 1750–51
- Gomer, 1144, 1145, 1148, 1149
- Gomorrah, see Sodom and Gomorrah
- gonorrhoea, 241
- good and evil, knowledge of, 16–18
- Goshen, 92, 107, 119, 483
- governors of Yehud/Judah, 1432 (see also Nehemiah; Zerubbabel)
- grace after meals, 385, 662, 1428, 1435, 1940
- grace/pathos/compassion, divine, 1207, 1715, 1785, 1817
- graduated offerings, 215
- grains and cereals: association of grain with males and new wine with females, 1260; first fruits, sacrifice of, 210; impurity, 231, 239; sacrificial offerings (see minḥa [cereal or grain offering]); Shavuot (see Shavuot)
- grapes, see alcohol and intoxication; wine, grapes, vineyards, vines, and winepresses
- Great Assembly, 1244

Great Hallel, 1434
 greed, 1483, 1495
 Greek language, 1276
 Greek period, 1057–2060
 Greek philosophy, 1949–51
 Greek version of biblical texts, see Septuagint Greeks (Ionians) in Bible, 1094, 1166, 1173, 1645 guardian, God as, 1425 guilt, communal, see communal guilt guilt offering, see reparation offerings

H

Habakkuk: dating, 1226; introduction, 1226–27; structure, 1226–27; text and annotations, 1227–33
 Hadadezer, 633, 696, 1747–48 haftarah, 784, 1932–33
hag, see pilgrimage
 Hagar, 36–37, 44–45, 52, 61, 716, 1376
Haggadah of Pesah, 128, 129, 132, 137, 1939, 1944
 Haggai: dating, 1243–44; introduction, 1243–44; Malachi, Haggai, and Zechariah, association of, 1249, 1250; rebuilding of Temple connected to prophecy of, 1677; structure, 1243–44; text and annotations, 1244–48

Hag ha-Matzot, see unleavened bread and Festival of Unleavened Bread hailstones, 481

hair, 295–96, 519, 545, 546, 562, 644, 651, 727, 999, 1129

halakhah, 1847–58, 1867, 1876, 1877, 1895, 1934

halizah, 77

halah (bread dough offering), 313–14

Hallel prayer, 1939, 1944; Daily Hallel, 1442; the Egyptian Hallel, 1410; Great Hallel, 1434

Hallelujah, 1398, 1403, 1410, 1445

Ham, sin of, 25–26, 42

Haman, 142, 1305, 1465, 1623, 1624, 1629–39 hamesh megillot (five scrolls), 1275–76, 1563, 1933 (see also Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther) hammer shattering rock, 975

Hammurabi, Laws of: Deuteronomy, 370, 374, 377, 405, 410, 413, 416, 419, 421, 423, 427; Exodus, 153, 154, 155; Numbers, 294

Hamor, 69–71

Hamsin (desert wind), 964, 1033, 1076

hamstringing horses, 1748

Hanani, 1697

Hananiah ben Hezekiah, Rabbi, 1043, 1118

Hananiah the prophet, 976, 981–83, 1001, 1003, 1697

the hand of the Lord, 570, 574, 716

Handel's Messiah and Isaiah, 780 hands, laying on of, 55, 339–40, 450

Hannah, 53, 61, 62, 309, 561–65, 1245

Hansen's disease or "leprosy," 232, 234–41, 308–9, 421, 735–36, 738, 754, 1803

Hanukkah, 298, 1250, 1313, 1410, 1993

hapax legomena (unique words), 1500, 1587

Hapiru ('Apiru), 103, 108

haplography, 584, 587, 1926–27

ha-Qallir, Eliezer, 1510, 1525, 1554

haredi, 1996

harem in Esther, 1623, 1627–29, 1631

harlotry, see prostitution harmonized editing in Dead Sea Scrolls, 1923 harvest: Jeremiah's inversion of positive images of, 942; Psalms, 1351, 1353; Ruth, 1578, 1581–85; Shavuot (see Shavuot); Sukkot (see Sukkot) ha-Satan/Satan, 329, 665, 698, 1253, 1502–6

ḥasid, 1287, 1295, 1298, 1391

ḥasidic tradition, 1046, 1902–3, 1909

Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment), 1901–2, 1903, 1905, 1907, 1909, 1910, 1965–69

Hasmoneans, 2060

hat'at, see purification offerings

Hazeel, 717, 741, 743, 750, 1802

Hazor, 483, 484, 485, 517, 1027, 1331 heads of ancestral houses (groups smaller than tribes), 488 health and dietary laws, 397–98, 2043

health and ritual purity/impurity, 2041, 2043

heard text, early interpretation of scripture based on, 1870 heart: "circumcision" of, 436, 929, 945; Israelite conception of, 521, 578, 1349; new heart and spirit (Ezekiel), 1062, 1075, 1112; Torah written on, 960, 1062; weighing deeds or hearts (Egyptian Book of the Dead), 1349

heat, metaphor of animals in, 926 heaven, see afterlife/personal resurrection; Sheol heavenly host: Daniel, 1656; Job, 1502, 1506, 1513

Hebrew as a language, 763, 1668, 2062–67

Hebrews as a people, 108

Hebron: Chronicles, 1738–39, 1764; Genesis, 33, 47, 99; Joshua, 481, 482, 489, 495, 499; Judges, 511; Numbers, 310; Samuel, 617, 645 heightening of first half of psalm by second, 1294–95

heikhalot, 1977

helek/heleq (portion) granted to humans in Ecclesiastes, 1604, 1608, 1610

Heliodorus, 1663

Hell, 442, 916, 940, 1337 (see also Sheol)

Hellenism, 1625

Hellenistic period, 1057–2060

Hellenistic philosophy, 1949–51

Heman the Ezrahite, 1282, 1380, 1757, 1758

hemorrhoids, 570–71

henna, 1567

Hep! Hep! Riots of 1819, 1967

Hercules, 541

herem (proscription): Deuteronomy, 370, 382, 411–13; Joshua, 463, 467, 473, 474, 478, 480; Judges, annihilation vs. subjugation/assimilation in, 511, 513, 526; 1 Samuel, 588–89; 2 Samuel, David's driving out of the Philistines in, 629

Herodotus, 319, 557, 929, 1019, 1626, 1645, 1647, 1653, 1786

Heschel, Abraham Joshua, 1207, 1973–74

hesed: David and Nahash, 1749; Psalmic theme, 1288, 1289, 1298, 1316, 1332, 1335, 1339, 1349, 1350, 1371, 1389, 1394, 1434; Ruth, 1279, 1578–79

Heshbon, ballad of, 326

hevel (futility) as theme of Ecclesiastes, 1603, 1604, 1606–7, 1609–14, 1617, 1620, 1622

Hexateuch, 3, 462, 506, 1279

Hezekiah: Amos, 1192; attempt to unite northern and southern kingdoms, 1811; Chronicles, 1806, 1808–16; covenant between God and Israel, 1704; cultic reforms of, 1808–10, 1813; David, compared to, 1809; Deuteronomy, 391; development of biblical religion and, 2031; Hosea, 1144; illness and healing of, 858–60, 1815; Isaiah (book), 792, 801, 823, 842, 849, 855–60; Isaiah (prophet) consulted by, 761, 763–64; 2 Kings, 761–69, 772, 773, 774; Moses' bronze serpent, 761, 1814; Numbers, 325, 341; Passover (Pesah), 1821–22; Proverbs, 1487; Solomonic typology in depicting, 1764; Temple, purging and rededication of, 1056, 1808–10; Zephaniah, 1235

- higher criticism and Dead Sea Scrolls, 1924 (see also critical scholarship)
- High Holy Days, 189, 963, 1378, 1596–97, 1665
- high places, 2022, 2026, 2031 (see also centralization of worship; pillars and posts, sacred)
- high priests (see also Aaronide priesthood, and individual high priests): Antiochus IV Epiphanes, 2059–60; postexilic period, 1432
- Hilkiah, 771, 826, 921, 1819, 1821
- Hillel, House of, 1272, 1844–45, 1847, 1855, 1856
- hinneni* (“Here I am”), 45, 55, 75, 110, 890
- Hinnom Valley, 394
- hippopotamus in Job, 1559
- Hiram of Tyre (Huram in Chronicles), 682, 685, 686, 687, 694, 696, 711, 1766–67, 1778, 1779
- historical-critical scholarship, 11, 2001–2; 2084–85, 2090, 2095–96
- history and biblical material, 2028–29, 2048–62; Babylonian exile and return, 2054–57; Canaanite history and conquest, 2050–52; Daniel, 1278–79, 1642, 1662; Deuteronomistic History, 453–54, 462–63; Deuteronomy, 357–61; Esther, 1278–79, 1624, 1639; Exodus, 103–4, 452, 2050; Ezekiel’s review of Israelite history, 1076–79; fiction, historical, 1278–79; Genesis, 11, 2049–50; God of Israel as Lord of history, 864; God’s role in history, Judges’ concern with, 508–9; Hellenistic period, 1057–2060; Isaiah, 780, 781, 783; Jewish belief based on historical experience, 146, 148; Joshua, 463, 464, 485, 2050–52; Judges, 508–9, 510, 2050–52; Kethuvim (“Writings”), historical books of, 1277–79; Kings, books of, 669, 770; modern biblical interpretation, 1908; Near Eastern history generally (see Meso-potamian mythology, history, and religion); Nevi’im (Prophets), history books of, 451–55; original biblical texts, nonsurvival of, 1920; Persian period, 2055–57; prophecy, development of, 458–61; Psalmic didactic theme of Israelite history, 1283, 1367, 1399–1404, 1433, 1434; Psalmody, rise of, 2057; Psalms’ use of history, 452–53, 1282, 1376; Ruth, 1278–79; Twelve Minor Prophets, 1139–40, 1141; united and divided monarchies, 2052–54; versions of the Bible texts, 2067–72 (see also specific versions)
- Hittite Laws, 413, 419, 421, 422
- Hittites, 47, 55, 58, 382, 465, 611, 627, 636, 696
- Hivites, 69–71, 73, 280, 479
- Hobab, 305 (see also Jethro, Reuel)
- Hobbes, Thomas, 3, 2085
- Hoffmann, Rabbi David Zvi, 1906–7
- hokhmah* (wisdom), 1447, 1451 (see also wisdom and wisdom literature)
- holidays, see festivals and holidays generally
- holiness: Deuteronomic view of, 6, 146, 428; God’s holiness, nature of, 253, 572; ritual purity and, 2044–46; whole people of Israel, 146, 232, 247–58, 428, 1266
- Holiness Collection, 5, 6; Deuteronomy, 397, 400, 402, 418, 422, 427; Exodus, 165, 178; Ezekiel, 1073, 1082, 1083; Leviticus, 205, 247–77; purity/impurity issues, 2045, 2047
- holistic reading approach to Bible, 7, 281
- Holocaust (Shoah), 949, 1048, 1320, 2010
- Holy of Holies, 164, 166, 167, 1053, 1055, 2022–23
- holy war, see herem
- home dedication, lack of rituals for, 412
- homicide: Deuteronomy, 405, 409–10, 413–14; Exodus, 150, 152–54; Genesis, 18–19, 25; Joshua, 497; Numbers, 353–54; 2 Samuel, 622–25, 635–39, 641–44
- homiletic literature, see sermons
- homosexuality, 26, 251–52
- honesty/dishonesty: Leviticus, 150, 253, 255–56; Proverbs, 1453–54, 1457, 1468, 1471, 1474, 1475, 1479, 1486, 1489, 1493
- honey: Isaiah, 799; Leviticus, 209–10; milk and honey, land flowing with, 111, 187, 258, 310, 317, 472, 587, 1571; Psalms, 1375; Song of Songs, 1571
- honeydew, 140
- honor as theme of Esther, 1639
- hope as theme: Amos, 1191–92; Ecclesiastes, 1620; Hosea, 1143, 1145, 1147, 1149; Isaiah, 784, 786, 838; Jeremiah, 984; 2 Kings, 779; Lamentations, 1596–97; liturgy and prayers, 1947; Malachi, 274, 1269; Micah, 1206, 1217–18; Psalms, 1318, 1428; Zechariah, 1249, 1257; Zephaniah, 1236, 1241–42
- Hophra (Pharaoh), 1002, 1014, 1098, 1101
- Horeb, see Sinai/Horeb
- horn (see also shofar [ram’s horn]): Daniel, 1656; Exodus, 170, 191; Ezekiel, 1047, 1054; Kings, 674, 676; Lamentations, 1592; Psalms, 1252, 1365, 1382, 1432, 1443; Zechariah, 1252
- horses: Esther, 1633–34, 1635; hamstringing horses, 1748; theophany in Job, 1558; visions of horses and horsemen, 1251, 1255
- Horus, 109
- Hosea: dating of, 1144; development of biblical religion and, 2030–31; introduction, 1143–44; Isaiah confirming prophecy of, 892; structure, 1144; text and annotations, 1144–65
- Hosts, Lord of, 306, 1309, 1331, 1334, 1377
- household idols (teraphim), 64–65, 88, 547, 599–600, 1260, 1346, 2022
- houses and buildings (see also Temple): David’s proposal to build Temple, use of “house” in, 632; donation of, 278; flat roofs, use of, 466, 578, 636; mold or mildew, 240; negligence in construction of, 416; Psalmic metaphor, house as, 1428; sale of, 271; Solomon’s palace, 686; woman’s body in Song of Songs represented by house, 1572
- hubris, see pride/hubris vs. humility
- Huldah the prophetess, 138, 466, 771–72, 774, 782, 996, 1063, 1696, 1823
- human capacity/incapacity to understand how world is governed: Ecclesiastes, 1603–4, 1609–10, 1617, 1619–20, 1622; Job, 1516, 1517, 1551, 1552, 1555–61
- human imitation of God (imitatio Dei), 2044, 2047
- human life, meditations on brevity and nature of: Ecclesiastes, 1603, 1613–14, 1620–21; Job, 1510, 1522, 1524–25, 1537, 1561; Psalms, 1325–26, 1339, 1359, 1384–85, 1395
- human race and human culture generally, 8, 9, 19–20 (see also creation)
- human sacrifice (see also child sacrifice): ‘Akedah (binding of Isaac), 45–47, 54, 1205, 1768; dedication of self, household member, or slave, 279; Jephthah, 537–38; validity of human sacrifice in Micah, 1215
- human sinfulness, inherent nature of, 1339, 1525
- humility, see pride/hubris vs. humility
- humor and comedy: Daniel, 1642–43, 1644, 1648; Esther viewed as comic farce, 1279, 1623–25; irony, 567, 676, 838, 1635; laughter of God, 1323; parody, 1203, 1460, 1514, 1520, 1652; puns (see puns and punning); riddles, 542, 1071, 1080, 1319, 1456; sarcasm (see sarcasm); satire, 1187, 1647
- Hur, 142, 162, 181
- Hushai, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 654
- hygiene: dietary laws, 397–98, 2043; military camps, 419; ritual purity/impurity, 2041, 2043
- Hyksos, 92
- Hymn to Wisdom in Job, 1503, 1539–40
- hymns of praise in Psalms, 1283–84, 1436
- hypocrites, 1489
- hyssop, 1339

- I
 “I the Lord am your God,” 252, 253
 Ibn Bal’ām, Judah, 1880, 1882
 Ibn Ezra, Rabbi Abraham, 1880, 1882–84, 1885; Amos, 1171; Daniel, 1657; Deuteronomy, 412; Ecclesiastes, 1618; Esther, 1635; Exodus, 128, 148; Genesis, 3, 28, 31, 43, 44, 59, 74; Haggai, 1245; Hosea, 1144; Ibn Kaspi’s critique of, 1894; influence of, 1893, 1895, 1964; Isaiah, 781, 867; Job, 1533, 1545; Leviticus, 245; Malachi, 1268, 1271; Micah, 1207, 1209; Miqra’ot Gedolot, 1874, 1899; modern interpretive features, foreshadowing, 1909; Nahum, 1235; Numbers, 287, 297, 301, 306, 309, 313, 316, 330; Obadiah, 1197; philosophy, 1853–54; Psalms, 1281, 1287, 1291, 1295, 1318, 1320, 1330, 1332, 1334, 1336, 1340, 1346, 1347, 1348, 1364, 1389, 1402, 1409, 1415, 1425, 1428, 1437; Ramban compared to, 1892; Zechariah, 1251, 1253, 1256
- Ichabod, 570, 585
- iconoclasm, 148–49, 370, 372, 376, 1057, 1780, 1979, 2023
- identity of Israelites: exclusivism (see exclusivist nature of later Israelite identity); local people contrasted with returnees from exile (see people of the land); people of Israel, early development of, 1, 6, 8, 102, 107
- idols and idol-worship, 2020–27 (see also pillars and posts, sacred [asherim], and specific gods); Chronicles, 1779, 1789, 1803, 1807, 1813, 1817, 1824; Daniel, 1647, 1652, 1654, 1660, 1664; defeated enemy, Judean king’s worship of gods of, 1803; Deuteronomy, 370, 372, 376, 382–83, 385, 391, 394–96, 404, 406, 437, 442; Esther, 1630; Exodus, 102, 103, 107, 126, 148–49, 151–52, 157, 159–61, 182–87, 189–90; Ezekiel, 1053–59, 1066, 1068, 1077, 1086, 1128; Ezra–Nehemiah, 1676, 1701; Genesis, 59; Hosea, 1143, 1155–56; household idols (teraphim), 64–65, 88, 547, 599–600, 1260, 1346, 2022; Isaiah (Deutero-Isaiah), 862–64, 866, 872–78, 897, 911, 915; Isaiah (First Isaiah), 783, 801, 818, 844; Jeremiah, 923, 934, 939–40, 944, 946, 960, 961, 1013; Job, 1545–46; Joshua, 505–6; Judges, 513–14, 515, 520, 524–25, 529, 535, 547, 549; 1 Kings, 697–98, 702–3, 707–8, 711, 724, 725; 2 Kings, 730, 746, 748, 754, 760, 761, 769, 772; kiss of the hand as gesture of worship, 1546; Lamentations, 1590, 1591, 1592; Leviticus, 249–52, 253, 256, 276; Malachi, 1271, 1272; Micah, 1206; Numbers, 283, 334, 354; Psalms, 1363, 1370, 1374, 1390, 1401–3, 1411–12; 1 Samuel, 573; 2 Samuel, capture of Philistine idols in, 629; sexual impropriety as metaphor for, 1086, 1363, 1590, 1591, 2031; women’s involvement in, 1014, 1058, 1664; Zechariah, 1262, 1264
- I-It and I-Thou relationships, 1972–73
- Iliad*, 593, 595
- illness, see disease/plague/pestilence
- imagery as stylistic device, 1283, 2101 (see also metaphor)
- imitatio Dei*, 2044, 2047
- Immanuel passage, Isaiah, 798
- immortality, see afterlife/personal resurrection; Sheol
- impalement, 334–35, 415, 478, 482, 618, 659, 1624, 1633, 1635
- impulsiveness, 1470
- impurity, see purification and purity
- incarnation and mysticism, 1985–87
- incense and incense altar, 170, 178–79, 180, 195, 196, 227, 245, 962
- incest, 26, 42, 249–52, 257, 418, 640–41, 1082
- inclusio, 446, 786, 1291, 1396, 1400, 1754
- incubation rituals, 677
- indentured service, 62, 152–53, 270, 272–73 (see also slavery)
- indirect reference to historical figures in apocalyptic literature, 1662
- indirect vs. direct knowledge of God, 1561
- individualism in the Bible, 2029
- individual laments, 1595–97, 1698–1700
- individual psalms, 1283, 1286, 1287, 1289, 1291, 1295, 1297, 1298, 1338, 1341–44, 1346, 1348, 1350, 1356, 1378, 1421, 1423, 1424, 1430
- individual responsibility, Ezekiel’s theory of, 1066–67, 1073–75, 1080
- infertility, see fertility /infertility
- Ingathering, Feast of, see Sukkot
- inherent sinfulness of humans, 1339, 1525
- inheritance: Canaanite conquest as inheritance (nahalah) of Israel, 463, 486–387; female inheritance patterns, 337–39, 354–55, 492; man with no sons with wife but with sons by a harlot, 535; priesthood, 1129
- injustice, living under: Habakkuk, 1226, 1227–33; Malachi, 1272–73
- inner-biblical interpretation, 1822, 1829–35, 1863
- innocence, Psalmic protestations of, 1290, 1298, 1301, 1310, 1330, 1345, 1388, 1394, 1430
- innocent persons and judicial system, 410, 413, 721
- Instruction of Amenemope*, 1448, 1472, 1482, 1488
- instruction or teaching, “Torah” understood as, 2
- instruction, psalms of, 1296, 1297, 1345, 1367, 1409, 1428
- intention, Chronicles’ stress on, 1716
- intercessors/mediators, prophets as, 184, 378, 713, 772, 1059, 1392–93
- interest/usury, 157, 420, 1082, 1491
- intergenerational guilt, see communal guilt
- intermarriage: Chronicles and Ezra–Nehemiah, 1712, 1721; Deuteronomy, 394, 406, 418; Esther’s marriage to non-Jew, 1624; Exodus, 190; Ezra–Nehemiah’s intermarriage crisis, 1669, 1682, 1684–86, 1704, 1709–11, 2047; Genesis, 48, 55, 70; Isaiah, 897; Joshua, 504; Judges, 530, 541–43; Malachi, 1268, 1271–72; Numbers, 308; purity issues, 2047; Ruth, 2047; Solomon’s wives, 677, 694–96, 697, 1766, 1779, 1785
- interpretation and study, 1827, 1829–1919, 2030; American history and interpretation of exodus, 107; classical rabbinic interpretation, 1844–63; Daniel’s interpretation of Jeremiah’s prophecy of 70 years, 1659–60; Deuteronomy, 361–62; division of day between study and prayer in Ezra–Nehemiah, 1701; early non-rabbinic interpretation, 1835–44; Ecclesiastes, 1614, 1621–22; Ezra’s study of Torah, 1672, 1680; hammer shattering rock, importance of metaphor of, 975; heard text, early experience of scripture as, 1870; inner-biblical interpretation, 1822, 1829–35, 1863; medieval interpretation, 1876–1900; midrashic interpretation, 1863–75; modern interpretation, 1908–19, 2084–96; multiple re-reading and study, prophetic books meant for, 1140, 1165, 1176, 1193, 1234, 1250–53; post-medieval interpretation, 1898–1908; prophecy replaced by, 461; prophetic books meant for multiple re-reading and study, 1140, 1165, 1176, 1193, 1234, 1250–52; Song of Songs, allegorical/theological understanding of, 1565–66; study of prophetic books in antiquity, 1211; text-based biblical criticism, 2067–72; Twelve Minor Prophets, 1140, 1141, 1165; vernacular commentaries on the Bible, 1898–99; women’s critical scholarship and feminist exegesis, 147, 1975, 2001–5
- intoxication, see alcohol and intoxication
- Ionians (Greeks), 1094, 1166, 1173, 1645
- irony, 567, 676, 838, 1635
- Isaac, 38, 39, 44–58, 276–77
- Isaac, binding of (“Akedah”), 45–47, 54, 1205, 1768
- Isaac, Solomon ben, see Rashi
- Isaiah: authorship, 781, 782, 783; dating, 781, 782, 783, 784; divisions and subdivisions, 781, 782, 783–84; earlier biblical writings, borrowing vocabulary from, 783, 844, 861, 886, 892, 900; First Isaiah (son of Amoz), chs 1–39, 781–82; Hezekiah, consultation of Isaiah by, 761, 763–64; introduction on, 780–84;

- Jeremiah influenced by, 918, 922, 934, 937, 938, 946, 955, 957, 977, 1013, 1028 (see Jeremiah [book]); 2 Kings, material probably originally belonging to, 853; Manasseh's assassination of, 1817; Numbers, 325; Psalms quoting, 1396, 1415; Second Isaiah, chs 40–66 (see Deutero-Isaiah); text and annotations, 784–916; Third Isaiah (Trito-Isaiah), chs 54/56–66, 783; universalism, 784
- Ish-bosheth, 622, 623, 624, 626
- 'isheli (gift offerings/food-gifts), 208–11, 223
- Ishmael assassin of Gedaliah, 779, 1008–9
- Ishmael (Rabbi), 34, 105, 1852
- Ishmael (son of Hagar), 37, 38, 44–45, 53, 57
- Ishtar/Astarte, 384, 939–40, 944, 959, 1289, 1452, 2031
- Isis, 1451
- Islam: Arabia and Arab tribes, 165, 824–25; Arabic law, 152, 153; Arabic translations of Bible, 2009; identification of unnamed with known characters, 1507; Jerusalem, holiness of, 629; linguistic and philological analysis, 1876, 1879, 1953; medieval Jewish biblical interpretation and philosophy, 1876, 1950, 1953; midrash and, 1864; Sabbatean heresy, 1899; Sufi mystics, 1885, 1890, 1894
- Israel as name for Jacob, 71, 1717
- Israel (kingdom) (see also individual kings): Amos, 1176–92; Assyrian invasion, end of kingdom, and Assyrian exile, 758–62; Chronicles' listing of tribes of, 1718–19; Chronicles' view of, 1716, 1786, 1806, 1811; David's kingship, 627, 656–58; division of Israel and Judah, 701, 1783, 1784; historicity of biblical account, 2053–54; Hosea, 1144, 1146, 1149–65; Isaiah's references to Northern Kingdom, 792, 794, 797, 802–4, 808, 818, 836; Jeremiah, 923, 985, 986, 990, 1009; Judah, biblical overlap with, 581, 1269, 1365; Judges, composition of, 510; Kings, books of, 668, 681, 700–702, 754; Psalms, 1347, 1367, 1371, 1372, 1374, 1411, 1432; religion of, 2021–27; secession and creation of, 1 Kings, 700–702
- Israel, land of, see promise and possession of the land of Israel
- Israel, modern state of: Amos as inspiration, 1176; Hebrew language, 763; modern biblical interpretation, 1915–19; psalm used to celebrate independence day of, 1410; role of Bible in, 1990–2000
- Israelite camp in wilderness, plan of, 286–87
- Israelite identity: exclusivism (see exclusivist nature of later Israelite identity); local people contrasted with returnees from exile (see people of the land); people of Israel, early development of, 1, 6, 8, 102, 107
- Issachar: Chronicles, 1277; Deuteronomy, 448; Genesis, 62, 72, 96, 97, 98; Joshua, 493, 496; Judges, 520, 521
- Italian Masoretic Codices, 2080–81
- Ithamar, 228, 292
- "I Will Be What I Will Be," 111
- J
- J or Yahwist source, 3–6; Deuteronomy, 363; Exodus, 105, 108, 110, 124, 132, 134, 145, 183; Genesis, 11, 22, 38, 39, 52, 58, 76; JE (Yahwist/Elohist) source, 6, 105, 107, 115, 305, 309, 323, 334; Numbers, 281; Psalms, 1367
- Jabesh-gilead, 556–57, 580, 582, 618, 622
- Jabin, 463, 483, 517, 519, 521
- Jachin (pillar of First Temple), 687, 748, 982
- jackals, 1599, 1602
- Jacob: Chronicles, 1717; Exodus, 107; Genesis, 10, 53–101; Hosea, 1162; Isaiah, 872, 910; Israel as name for, 71, 1717; Jerusalem, 985, 986; Leviticus, 251, 276–77; Malachi, 1269, 1270–73; Psalms, 1367, 1370
- Jael and Sisera, 517–22
- Jashar, Book of, 326, 481
- javelins, 477
- jawbone of an ass used by Samson, 543
- JE (Yahwist/Elohist) source, 6, 105, 107, 115, 305, 309, 323, 334
- jealousy, divine, 149, 506
- jealousy, human, 249
- Jebus, Jerusalem known as, 551
- Jebusites, 382, 468, 489, 505, 511, 627, 1259, 1724
- Jeduthun, 1325, 1349, 1366, 1757
- Jefferson, Thomas, 107
- Jehoahaz (son of Jehoram), 1797
- Jehoahaz (son of Jehu), 7570
- Jehoahaz (son of Josiah), 775, 777, 938, 968, 970, 1016, 1054, 1075, 1823
- Jehoiachin: Esther, 1625; Ezekiel, 1044, 1046, 1071–72, 1076, 1080; Jeremiah, 968, 971, 982, 983, 1002, 1040, 1041; Kings, books of, 669, 671, 776, 779
- Jehoiada (Jehohiada), 748, 772, 985, 1801, 1802
- Jehoiakim: 2 Chronicles, 1823; Ezekiel, 1051, 1016; Jeremiah, 917–18, 938, 968, 970, 971, 996, 1000–1003, 1080; 2 Kings, 775–76, 777
- Jehoiarib, 1757
- Jehonadab, 745, 746
- Jehoram (Joram), 725, 730, 741, 743, 1797–98
- Jehoshaphat of Judah, 722–25, 731, 1789, 1791–97
- Jehosheba, 747
- Jehovah, 112 (see Tetragrammaton)
- Jehu (king), 742–46, 755, 1145, 1189, 1789
- Jehu (prophet), 709
- Jephthah, 534–39
- Jeremiah (book): Aramaic in, 946–47; authorship, 918–19; Chronicles, 1823, 1825; chronology, lack of, 919; composition, compilation, and redaction, 918–19, 948; Daniel's interpretation of prophecy of 70 years, 1659–60, 1831–32; decree of Cyrus, prophecy fulfilled by, 1671; Deutero-Isaiah, influence of, 946, 947, 960, 972, 974, 986; introduction, 917–20; Isaiah, influence of, 918, 922, 934, 937, 938, 946, 955, 957, 977, 1013, 1028; Job echoing, 1508, 1531; laments in, 948–54, 964, 966, 967, 1022; marriage/divorce/adultery metaphors, use of, 923, 926–28, 952–54, 958, 963, 971, 973, 988, 990, 995; narrative themes and structure, 917, 919–20; north, obsession with, 922–23, 929, 988, 1029; Obadiah's similarities to 49.7–22, 1193; people of the land, 748; Psalms, 947, 949, 967; Psalms quoting, 1415; rhetorical questions, use of, 924, 960; text and annotations, 921–1041
- Jeremiah (prophet): Babylon (see Babylonia); Baruch, oracle to, 1015; burning of scroll of, 1000–1001; celibacy of, 958, 977; commissioning as prophet and early oracles, 921–38; consolation, book of, 985–91; covenant between God and Israel, lamentation of breaking of, 948–54; Davidic house and prophets, oracles on, 968–76; Egypt (see Egypt); family and background of, 917–18, 921, 956; family property, attempt to redeem, 992; great drought, 954–63; Hananiah, confrontation with, 981–83; illiteracy of, 993, 1000; Jeremiah (book), authorship of, 918–19; Josephus self-identifying with, 1843; Kings, authorship of, 671; Lamentations, authorship of, 1282, 1563, 1589; letter to first exiles, 983–85; life as model for Jerusalem's and Judah's suffering, 958; loss of prophetic status and recommissioning, 958; Micah, compared to, 980; Moses, compared to, 917, 921; nations, oracles against, 946, 977, 1015–39; persecuted victim, portrayal of self as, 950, 964, 966; Rahab the Jericho prostitute and Joshua, descent from, 921; Sabbath observance, 962; sedition and treason, 938, 968–69, 979, 998–1003; slavery, oracle on, 997–98; symbolic acts, 952–53, 963–67, 981–83, 992, 1039; Temple sermon of, 938–48; Zedekiah, oracle on, 996–97

- Jericho: David's war with Ammonites, 635; disciples of the prophets, 727–28; Ehud, 515; Joshua, 462, 466, 473–75, 482
- Jeroboam I: 2 Chronicles, 1782, 1783, 1786; Exodus, golden calf worship in, 183–84; Hosea, 1155; Kings, books of, 699, 700–706, 707, 725, 746, 759, 773, 774
- Jeroboam II, 753, 1144, 1145, 1176, 1189, 1200
- Jerome, 191, 1286, 2008, 2009, 2072
- Jerubaal (Gideon), 522–29, 539, 582
- Jerusalem: Amos, 1176, 1177; Ark brought to, 629–32; Assyrian threat and siege of, 762–66, 806, 826, 853–58, 1333, 1365, 1814–17; Babylonian destruction of (see Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem); beauty ascribed to, 1574; Chronicles' emphasis of, 1786; circumambulation of city walls, ceremony of, 1336; David's capture of, 627, 1365, 1734–36, 1764; David's flight from and return to (Absalom's revolt), 645–54; Deutero-Isaiah's emphasis on, 882, 892–94; Deuteronomy, 391, 392; Ezekiel on restoration of, 1042, 1061–62, 1071, 1097, 1107–18, 1135–38; Ezra-Nehemiah, returns from exile settling in Jerusalem in, 1705; First Isaiah's view of centrality and inviolability of, 780, 785, 787, 800, 806, 825–26, 836–41, 849, 850, 852–60; fortification by Azariah, 754; Genesis, 34–35; Haggai, 1243–48; Jeremiah on rebuilding of, 987; Joshua, 480, 481, 489, 490, 494; Judges, 511, 551; Micah, 1205–18; Obadiah, 1193, 1195; praying towards, 1654; Psalmic theme, 1283, 1333, 1334, 1335–36, 1338, 1363–64, 1371, 1377, 1426, 1435, 1443, 1444; Roman destruction of, 1371; Rabbi Akiva's joy at, 1257; 1 Samuel, 596; walls, circumambulation of, 1336; walls, rebuilding of, 1667, 1669, 1689–92, 1696–97, 1708; Zechariah, 1252, 1256–59, 1263, 1265; Zephaniah, 1236–37, 1240–42
- Jerusalem Talmud, 1847, 1854, 1855, 1857, 1950
- Jeshua, see Joshua (Jeshua), high priest
- Jeshurun, 442, 446
- Jesse, 591, 592, 593, 596, 807
- Jesus, see Christian tradition and Western history
- Jethro, 109–10, 113, 143–45, 305, 511 (see also Hobab, Reuel)
- Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah, maskilim), 1901–2, 1903, 1905, 1907, 1909, 1910, 1965–69
- Jewish Publication Society (JPS), 2013–20
- Jewish tradition: Deuteronomy, 356, 358–61; Exodus, 106–7; Leviticus, 205–6; Rabbinic Judaism (see Rabbinic Judaism); role of Bible in, 1827, 1920–2019; Second Temple Judaism (see Second Temple Judaism)
- Jezebel, 708, 711, 713, 716, 722, 723, 725, 743–44, 1332, 2030
- Jezreel, 743, 745, 1145
- jihad (holy war), see herem
- Joab: 1 Chronicles, 1719, 1736, 1752, 1760; 1 Kings, 672–76; 1 Samuel, 611; 2 Samuel, 622, 625, 626, 635, 637, 642, 644, 648, 651–53, 657, 665
- Joash (Jehoash), 743, 747, 749–53, 770, 772, 985, 1798–1803
- Job: authorship, 1502, 1546; book of Job the Impatient, 1504–5, 1539; book of Job the Patient, 1503–4, 1538; composition, compilation, and redaction, 1500–1503, 1546; dating, 1502, 1503; Ezekiel, 1066–67; introduction, 1499–1505; Lamentations figure resembling, 1595; Leviticus, 207; Psalms, 1403, 1415; structural issues, 1500–1502; text and annotations, 1505–62; theologically challenging nature of, 1500 (see also divine justice in Job)
- Joel: dating, 1167, 1168; introduction, 1166–67; structure, 1167; text and annotations, 1167–75
- John the Baptist, 1273
- Jonadab, 640, 642, 998
- Jonah, 716, 753; dating, 1199; introduction, 1198–99; structure, 1199; text and annotations 1200–1204
- Jonathan (son of Saul): covenant between David and, 596, 639, 659; death of, 618, 619–21; disagreements with Samuel and Saul, 583, 586–88; love for David, 596, 598–601, 605
- Joram (Jehoram) of Judah, 725, 730, 741, 743, 1797–98
- Joram of Israel, 741, 743
- Jordan River: crossing of, 467–71, 728; geography of, 2061–62
- Joseph (person): Amos, 1180; Egypt, 74, 76, 78–101; Exodus, 107, 134; Genesis, telling of story in, 10–11, 62, 68, 71, 72, 74–76, 78–101; Joshua, burial of bones as recounted in, 506; Mordecai in Esther compared to, 1636; Psalms, 1357, 1367
- Joseph (tribal group): Deuteronomy, 447; Joshua, apportionment of land in, 447, 488, 492, 493; Judges, 512; Psalms, 1372
- Josephus, 1843–44; Chronicles, 1752, 1819, 1823; Esther, 1625; Exodus, 108, 148, 154; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1676, 1679, 1680, 1681, 1685, 1690; Jeremiah, 970, 1843; Judges, 515, 525, 557; 1 Kings, 702; liturgy and prayers, pre-rabbinic, 1938; Qumran and Essenes, 2089; Samuel, books of, 560; 1 Samuel, 580, 582; Septuagint, 2006; synagogues, 1929
- Joshua (book): “book/scroll of the Teaching,” 465, 468, 478, 506; dating, 462–63; Deuteronomy, close relationship to, 462–64, 501, 502, 504; Ezra-Nehemiah's identification with time of, 1666, 1674; herem (proscription), 463, 467, 473, 474, 478, 480; historicity, 463, 464, 485, 2050–52; introduction, 462–64; structure and themes, 463–64; text and annotations, 464–507; Torah's story continued in, 1, 8, 356, 359, 462, 464
- Joshua (Jeshua), high priest: Daniel, 1660; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1672–73, 1674, 1684, 1685, 1692; Haggai, 1244–45; Zechariah, 1249, 1253–54, 1256
- Joshua (prophet): allotment of lands (see apportionment of Canaan); commissioning by the Lord after death of Moses, 464–66; conquest of Canaan (see Canaan, Canaanites, and Canaanite conquest); Davidic/royal associations of, 504; death and burial, 462, 504, 506; Deuteronomy, 352, 437, 438–39, 449–50; Exodus, 142, 187; final speech of, 504; Genesis, 69; Jeremiah's descent from Rahab the Jericho prostitute and, 921; Jordan, crossing of, 467–71; land apportioned to, 495; Moses, mirroring of, 464, 466, 468–70, 475, 477, 484, 506, 1754, 1762; Numbers, 309–12, 316, 339–40; Rahab and the spies, 466–67; Shechem, covenant ceremony at, 478–79, 505; scouting of Canaan, 309–12; transfer of leadership by Moses to, 339–40, 437, 438–39, 449–50
- Josiah, 770–75; Ark supposedly hidden by, 928; child sacrifice to Molech, attempt to halt, 940; Chronicles, 1811, 1818–23; covenant between God and Israel, 1704; death of, 1822–23; Deuteronomistic History and discovery of “book/scroll of the Teaching,” 462, 770–72, 1699, 1818–20, 2031; Deuteronomy, 357–58, 372, 380, 391, 403, 405, 407, 770–71; development of biblical religion and, 2031; Ezekiel, 1051, 1075; Jeremiah, 917, 927, 938, 968, 971, 1016; Kings, books of, 669, 670, 703, 770–75; Numbers, 341; reunification of kingdoms as goal of, 928, 972, 1009; Zephaniah, 1234–42
- Jotham, 530–31, 754, 756–57, 1805–6
- joy: Chronicles' stress on, 1716, 1743, 1810; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1700; learning as joy in Proverbs, 1485
- JPS (Jewish Publication Society), 2013–20
- jubilee year, 14, 153, 270–73, 355, 905, 997–98, 1051, 1062, 1133, 1694–95
- Jubilees, Book of, 379, 1788, 1822, 1836–37, 1839, 1840, 1866
- Judah (kingdom) (see also individual kings): Amos, 1176–92; Assyrian threat and siege of Jerusalem, 762–66; Chronicles' listing of tribes of, 1719–20; collapse of, 775–79 (see also Babylonian exile); David as king over, 621–26, 656–58; division of Israel and Judah, 701, 1783, 1784; Haggai, 1243; historicity of biblical account, 2053–55; Hosea, 1144–65; Israel, biblical overlap with, 581, 1269, 1365; Joel, 1166–75; Joshua, 483, 488; Judges, 510, 511–12; Kings, books of, 668, 681, 754; lamenting woman, association with, 1168; Micah, 1205, 1206, 1207; Nahum, 1219, 1221; Psalms, 1411, 1432; religion of, 2021–

- 27; secession of Israel and creation of separate kingdoms, 1 Kings, 700–702; throne names of kings, 970; Zephaniah, 1234–42
- Judah Maccabee, see Maccabees and Maccabean revolt
- Judah (son of Jacob/tribe): Deuteronomy, 446; Genesis, 61, 72, 76–78, 85, 86, 88, 89, 96, 97, 98; Joshua, apportionment of land in, 488–90; Numbers, 285, 298, 304–5, 311; Ruth's son Obed descended from, 1578
- Judean Desert Scrolls: Dead Sea Scrolls (see Qumran community and Dead Sea Scrolls); Masada, Naḥal Ḥever, and Wadi Murabba'at, 1920, 1928, 2066, 2078
- Judges (book): chronological order of stories, lack of, 508; dating, 509–10; God's role in history, concern with, 508–9; historicity, 508–9, 510, 2050–52; introduction, 508–10; leadership as theme of, 509; structure, 508–9; text and annotations, 510–57
- judges, period of, 508–9 (see also individual judges); cycle of unfaithfulness, punishment, repentance, and return to the Lord (see unfaithfulness, punishment, repentance, and return to the Lord); narrow judicial sense, “judges” not to be understood in, 508; Ruth set in, 1579; Samuel (books) depicting transition to monarchy from, 559; Samuel (prophet) as judge, 558, 572; Saul as judge, 580; tribal chieftains, “judges” perhaps best translated as, 508
- judgment, see afterlife/personal resurrection; apocalypticism/eschatology; entries at divine justice; justice, human; unfaithfulness; punishment, repentance, and return to the Lord
- judicial system amongst Israelites: Chronicles, 1793–94, 1798; Deuteronomy, 364, 388–89, 403–5, 410–11; Exodus, 144, 158; Joshua, 497; king's duties, 1426; 1 Kings, 721, 724; Numbers, 307; 1 Samuel, 574
- justice, divine, see entries at divine justice
- justice, human: Habakkuk, living under injustice in, 1226, 1227–33; king's responsibility for, 969, 971; Leviticus, concept of fairness and justice in, 254; Malachi, living under injustice in, 1272–73; obligation to fight injustice in Proverbs, 1485; social order, viewed as, 1612, 1748
- K
- kabbalistic tradition: biblical interpretation and study, 1892–93, 1897; Ezekiel, 1046, 1059; Jeremiah, 931, 991; Masoretic printed texts, 1897, 2083–1893; mysticism, 1978–90; philosophy, 1957–58; Psalms, 1298; Song of Songs, 1575
- kaddish prayer, 1537, 1645, 1947
- Kant, Immanuel, 1969–70
- Karaites, 192, 264, 1858, 1876–80, 1882, 1893, 1895, 1952
- Karo, Isaac, 1963
- Karo, Joseph, 738, 1890, 1891, 1896
- kashrut*, see dietary laws
- kataphatic way, 1977
- Kaufmann, Yehezkel, 1913–14, 1916, 1994, 2027
- kavod*, 303
- Kedar/Kedarites, 824–25, 904, 924, 1027, 1691
- Kedemites, 682, 1090, 1507
- Kedushah*, 796, 1939, 1945–46
- Kenites, 511, 518, 589, 613
- Kenizzites, 489, 490, 608
- Kethuvim (“Writings”): authorship, 1276; books contained in, 1275–76 (see also individual books); commentary, 1275–79; dating, 1275, 1276; diverse nature of, 1276, 1279; haftarah, 1932–33; historical books, 1277–79; ordering, wide variety of, 1275; text and annotations, 1280–1825; wisdom literature of, 1275, 1276–77 (see also wisdom and wisdom literature)
- Keturah, 52
- Kiddush, 14, 1497
- kidnapping/abduction, 150, 154, 421, 557
- Kidron Valley, 646, 650, 652, 672, 673, 677, 826
- Kimḥi (Kimhi, Kimchi), David, see Radak
- King James Bible, 2008, 2011, 2014
- Kings, books of (1 Kings and 2 Kings): authorship, dating, and redaction, 669–71; Chronicles' relationship to, 1713; 726; division into two books, 451, 668, 726; historicity, 669, 770; introduction, 668–71; Isaiah material probably originally belonging to, 853; Joshua and 2 Kings, 462; narrative structure and focus, 668–69; text and annotations, 1 Kings, 671–725
- King's Highway, 324
- kingship, divine: Deuteronomy, 446; Exodus, 160; Ezekiel, 1079; Haggai, 1248; Obadiah, 1197; Psalmic theme and kingship psalms, 1283, 1288, 1292, 1294, 1319, 1330, 1334, 1387–93, 1442; shepherd imagery (see shepherds, God and kings as); Song of Songs, 1567
- kingship, human (see also Israel, Judah, and individual kings): Abimelech, 529, 530–34; absolute kingship of Mesopotamia vs. Israelite version of kingship, 559; adopted son of a god, king as, 1381; anointing (see anointing); bowing or kneeling, 1629–30; Deuteronomic requirements of, 405–6; Ecclesiastes, 1611, 1616, 1618, 1619; election by people, king distinguished by, 577, 579–80; Ezekiel, 1079; Genesis, 74; Gideon, 529; high priest and king sharing power in postexilic period, 1432; historicity of united and divided monarchies, 2052–54; Hosea on, 1144, 1145, 1155, 1164; Isaiah's use of royal motifs, 903, 906; Joshua, Davidic/royal associations of, 504; Judges, 509, 510, 529–34, 539, 547, 552, 557; Lamentations, 1600; Mesopotamian assumptions regarding, 1246; priestly roles of kings, 584, 703, 1408; primogeniture, succession by, 671, 727; Proverbs, 1473, 1477, 1480, 1482, 1483, 1487, 1492, 1496, 1497; psalms dealing with human kingship and royal psalms, 1283, 1285, 1304–5, 1312, 1327, 1332, 1348, 1360, 1371, 1373, 1377, 1393–94, 1408, 1414, 1432, 1436, 1440; sacrifice by kings, 584, 703; Samuel (books) depicting transition from judges to, 559, 574–83; Samuel (prophet) opposing, 574–75, 579, 581; shepherd imagery (see shepherds, God and kings as); Song of Songs as royal wedding text, 1565, 1567–70; Temple building and, 1245; throne names of kings, 970; Torah equated with monarchy, 1422; Zephaniah, 1234, 1236
- Kinneret, Lake 2061
- kissing: blowing kiss on hand as gesture of worship, 1546; death of Moses and Aaron by divine kiss, 350; Song of Songs, 1566
- kitchen utensils for Pesah/Passover, preparation of, 346
- Kittim, 334, 827, 924, 1227, 1664
- Kiyyun, 1187
- kneeling or bowing before a human being, 1629–30
- knees, birth upon, 61, 72, 100
- knowledge of good and evil, 16–18
- Kohathites, 288, 289, 291, 297, 305, 499
- Koheleth, see Ecclesiastes
- kohl, 744
- Korahites and Korahite Psalms, 1280, 1282, 1329, 1333, 1334, 1336, 1344, 1377, 1424, 1743
- Korah's rebellion, 288, 315–19, 336, 338–39, 389, 1805
- kosher, see dietary laws
- Krochmal, Nachman, 1903, 1904, 1910
- Kugel, James, 1866–77
- Kush, see Cush
- L
- Laban, 50, 51, 58, 59–60, 62–66, 1162
- Lachish, 482, 752–63
- Lamech, 19–20, 21
- Lamentations: authorship and date, 1282, 1563, 1589; introduc-

Lamentations (continued)

- tion, 1587–89; Jeremiah (book), language of laments in, 949; text and annotations, 1589–1602; Tish'ah be'av (9th of Av), used in liturgy of, 1275–76, 1563, 1596, 1933
- laments, 1588, 2097; Amos, 1184; Chronicles, 1823; Ezekiel, 1075, 1092–94, 1096, 1101; funeral dirges, originating in, 1588; Isaiah, 786, 812–14, 815, 817, 827–28, 859, 879, 888, 908–10; Jeremiah (book), laments in, 948–54, 964, 966, 967, 1022; Job, 1508–9, 1510, 1526, 1541; Joel, 1167, 1168–71; Micah, 1207; mock laments, 812–14, 879; Psalms, 1283, 1284, 1286, 1312, 1324–25, 1338, 1366, 1380, 1394, 1435
- lamps/lampstands: David, metaphor for, 699; Samuel, God's revelation to, 567; Tabernacle, setting up of, 167, 195, 267, 301; Zechariah, visions in, 1253–54
- land: Canaan, apportionment of (see apportionment of Canaan); debt cancellation and redemption of land, 159, 270–73, 398–400, 997–98, 1584–85, 1694–95; distribution and redistribution, 180, 270–73; donations, 278–79; Israel (see promise and possession of the land of Israel); Levites, allocation of property/levitical towns to, 352–53, 406–7, 486, 487, 497–99, 1130, 1136, 1728; polluted by transgressions, 354; priesthood, allocation to, 1130
- "land-theology" of Chronicles, 1733
- language, 2062–67 (see also specific languages); characterization of ancient peoples by, 1411; Daniel switching between Aramaic and Hebrew, 1641, 1657; dating text from linguistic indications, 1276, 1282; Ezra-Nehemiah switching between Aramaic and Hebrew, 1668, 1676, 1681, 1700; grammarian approach to biblical interpretation and study, 1876–84, 1895; Islamic linguistics and philology, influence of, 1876, 1879, 1953; liturgy and prayers, 1941; modern biblical interpretation and, 1912, 1917; origins of language differences, 28; Tower of Babel, 13, 29; translations of the Bible, 2005–20; versions of the Bible texts, 2067–72 (see also specific versions)
- lapis lazuli/sapphire in Ezekiel, 1048, 1059
- lappers of water, Gideon's army of, 525–26
- lares and penates (household idols or teraphim), 64–65, 88, 547, 599–600, 1260, 1346, 2022
- Latin translations, 2071–72 (see also Vulgate)
- latrines of military camps, rules for, 419
- Latter Prophets, 451, 455–56
- laughter of God, 1323
- lavers, Tabernacle/Temple, 178–79, 180, 196, 982, 1770
- law and legal material: Arabic law, 152, 153; casuistic vs. apodictic styles, 374; Chronicles, 1754; Daniel's use of judgment scene, 1656; Decalogue (see Decalogue); Deuteronomy, 5, 151, 358, 362, 370–71, 374, 379, 391, 403, 425; dietary laws (see dietary laws); divine justice (see entries at divine justice); Exodus, 102, 103, 105, 106–7, 152–61 (see also Decalogue); Ezekiel's use of case law, 1065; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1670; God as author of, 148; Holiness Collection laws, 252–77; Isaiah, 784, 896; Jeremiah's use of judicial imagery and legal language, 950; Job, legal imagery in, 1502, 1506, 1510, 1516, 1517, 1521, 1534, 1541, 1544, 1548; kingship and, 406; Leviticus, 204–5; litigation, avoiding, 1493; Mesopotamian mythology, history, and religion, 148, 152, 153, 370–71, 406, 1681; Numbers, 281–84, 339–44; Numbers, laws contained in, 313–15; Persian legal system, 1681; Psalms, 1415–17, 1420, 1422, 1424; public officials, 403; purity laws (see purification and purity); restrictions on admittance to Israelite assembly, 418–19; sacrifice and consecration, laws of, 206–28; seven commandments of the descendants of Noah, 25; talion (see talion); theophany, 145–48, 151; Torah, 2, 4, 5
- laying on of hands, 55, 339–40, 450
- leadership: Ezekiel's oracles against Judah's leaders, 1055–56, 1083, 1108–9; Job's accusers as community leaders, 1561–62; Judges, as theme of, 509, 522–23, 557
- Leah, 59–62, 64, 91, 251, 285, 1162, 1578
- leap year, 132, 2114
- learning as joy in Proverbs, 1485
- leaven, prohibition of offering, 209–10
- Lebanon, cedars of, 806, 812, 904, 969, 971, 1071–72, 1101, 1387
- left-handedness, 515, 553, 657
- legal issues, see law and legal material
- Lekha Dodi ("Come, my friend," Sabbath eve hymn), 377, 1575
- lending, see loans and guarantees of loans
- Leningrad Codex, 1142, 1411, 1563
- Leontopolis, Egypt, Jewish community of, 821
- leopard changing spots, 954
- "leprosy," 232, 234–41, 308–9, 421, 735–36, 738, 754, 1803
- Letter of Aristaeus, 2006–7, 2058
- Levi, 60, 61, 70, 71, 72, 96, 97, 116, 446–47
- Leviathan, 2026; Ezekiel, 1098, 1102; Isaiah, 835; Job, 1505, 1508, 1514, 1517, 1538, 1559, 1560; Psalms, 1364, 1398
- levirate marriage, 77, 251, 422–23, 1580–86
- Levites: age limits and requirements, 302, 1674, 1756; allocation of property/levitical towns, 352–53, 406–7, 486, 487, 497–99, 1130, 1136, 1728; Asaphites, 1337; census, 288–93, 338, 1755; Chronicles, 1725–26, 1751–52, 1755–57, 1772, 1773, 1783, 1790, 1795, 1796, 1808–10; cleansing (ritual purification) of, 301–2; combination with Aaronide priesthood, 406; compensation for, 319–21; cultic role of, 186, 197; Davidic establishment of roles, 1773; Deuteronomy, role according to, 388, 392, 406–7; Ezekiel, 1128; first-born, service to God in place of, 289, 290; Joshua, 468, 486, 487, 497–99; Judges, 547–49, 551–52; Korah rebellion, 288, 315–19, 336, 338–39; Korahites, 1329; military service, exemption from, 285; musical performances of, 1756–58, 1772, 1773, 1796; return from exile, reappointment on, 1673, 1674, 1679, 1682, 1697, 1707; Tabernacle/Ark, guarding and transport of, 286, 288–89, 291–92, 319, 468, 572, 630; Zadokites, tension between Levites and, 1057
- Leviticus: children's study of, 205; Chronicles, 1825; dating, 205; Ezekiel, 207, 259, 1042; introduction, 203–6; Jewish tradition and, 205–6; law and legal material, 204–5; narrative structure and content, 203–5; origins of name, 203; purification and atonement, 204, 205; text and annotations, 206–80; time period covered by, 204; traditional and modern source theories, 204, 205
- lex talionis*, see talion
- liars, see honesty/dishonesty
- libations, 177
- liberal Judaism, 1176, 1186
- liberation theology, 1176, 2095
- life, book of (book of the Lord, scrolls of remembrance), 434, 609–10, 1254–55, 1274, 1327, 1344, 1437, 1665
- life, choosing, 436–37
- light and darkness, motifs of, 12, 123, 953, 1102, 1508, 1518, 1519, 1596, 1620, 1621, 1979 (see also lamps/lampstands)
- lilies (shoshannim), 1332, 1356, 1372
- Lilith, 851
- linguistics, see language
- lion imagery: Amos, 1177, 1182; Daniel, 1658; Ezekiel, 1047, 1075, 1123; Hosea, 1163; Jeremiah, 978; Judges, 541; Nahum, 1222; Psalms, 1299, 1365, 1366
- lion's den, Daniel in, 1653–54
- Lipit-Ishtar, Sumerian law of, 535
- literary critical scholarship, 1914, 2001–3, 2090–93, 2095–96
- literary personae of Psalms, 1283
- litigation, avoiding, 1493
- liturgy and prayers, 1275–76, 1937–48, 2020 (see also specific

- prayers, festivals, and liturgies); Agur's prayer in Proverbs, 1495; Chronicles, 1745, 1756; Daniel, 1645, 1665; David, 1707; Deuteronomy, 356; Ecclesiastes, 1276, 1563, 1605, 1622; efficacy of prayers, 767, 1284, 1305–6, 1338, 1340, 1353, 1438, 1442; Esther, 1563, 1623, 1629, 1638; Exodus, 110, 171; Ezekiel, 1045, 1049, 1067, 1077, 1082, 1100, 1104, 1112, 1113, 1115, 1127, 1129, 1131; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1666, 1682, 1685, 1689, 1696, 1701, 1711; Genesis, 14, 43, 47; haftarot, 780; High Holy Day liturgy, 189, 963, 1378, 1596–97, 1665; Hosea, 1143; Isaiah, 780, 796–97, 848–49; Jeremiah used for, 921, 929, 938, 939, 948, 960, 961, 963, 1017; Jerusalem, praying towards, 1654; Job, 1507, 1510, 1511, 1516, 1524, 1525, 1537, 1554, 1556; 1 Kings, prayer of Solomon in, 690–92, 694; Lamentations, 1563, 1589, 1596–97, 1599; languages, liturgical, 763; Leviticus, 206, 209, 309; Malachi, 1269, 1274; megillot (five scrolls), 1563; morality as necessary accompaniment to, 1471; Numbers, 309, 333; physical positions for praying, 690, 691, 716, 1312, 1331, 1418, 1432, 1685; Proverbs, 1471, 1495, 1497; Psalms, 1280, 1282, 1283, 1289, 1295, 1297, 1302, 1303, 1308, 1313, 1317, 1340, 1358, 1378, 1384, 1386, 1387, 1394, 1424, 1434, 1442, 1445; religion of Bible and, 2035–36; Ruth, 1563, 1579; sacrifice, as substitute for, 1358, 1438; 1 Samuel, 562, 573, 583; Siddur (rabbinic prayerbook), 1937–48; Song of Deborah, 517; Song of Songs, 1275, 1563, 1566, 1575; Songs of Ascents, 1424; sunset, liturgical day beginning around, 1342; theology of the Siddur, 1942; Thirteen Attributes of God, 1596; three times daily prayer, 1342, 1654; throne upon which God sits, prayer as forming, 1305–6
- livestock: calf worship (see calves, worship of); dietary laws and, 229; sacrifice of, 207; sheepshearing as cause for celebration, 608, 641; shepherds (see shepherds)
- living God, 468, 506, 1301, 1315, 1329
- Livy, 557
- lizards, 1496
- Lo-ruhamah and Lo-ammi, 1145, 1146, 1165
- loans and guarantees of loans: Ezra-Nehemiah, 1694; interest/usury, 157, 420, 1082, 1491; Proverbs on dangers of, 1454, 1457, 1475, 1479, 1483, 1491; Psalms on, 1410; usury/interest, 420, 1082, 1491
- local people contrasted with returnees from exile, see people of the land
- locusts (see also disease/plague/pestilence): associations with, 523, 1224; Egypt, plagues sent against, 113–29, 569, 571, 944, 957, 1059, 1102, 1173, 1184, 1400, 1433, 1434; Proverbs' praise of, 1496
- loincloth in Jeremiah, 952–53
- Lot, 33–34, 39–42, 54, 1376
- lots, casting of, 475–76, 488, 494, 552, 580, 1474, 1630
- love (see also hesed): Ecclesiastes, value of having wife to love in, 1617; erotic love, 1564; Jonathan's love for David, 596, 598–601, 605; love of God by loving teaching of God, 1420; "love your neighbor as yourself," 254, 389; loyalty, love as form of, 377, 380, 436–37, 1288; loyalty, love in conflict with, 395; romantic love, 60, 544–45, 597, 599, 949, 1332, 1564; woman in love with man, only incident in Bible involving, 597
- lower criticism, 1924, 1926, 2067–72
- loyalty/disloyalty to God (see also hesed): Deuteronomy, 360–61, 377, 379, 380, 389–90, 394–96, 433–35, 440, 442, 444; Exodus, 107, 128, 149; Joshua, 505–6; love in conflict with loyalty, 395; love, loyalty as form of, 377, 380, 436–37, 1288; Numbers, 282–83, 306; Ruth, 1279
- Luria, Solomon, 1941
- Lurianic kabbalah, 931, 991
- Luther, Martin, 2008–11
- Luzzatto, Samuel David (Shadal), 781, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1910
- LXX, see Septuagint
- lying and falsehood, see honesty/dishonesty

M

mi'aseh, 1603–4, 1620

Ma'at, 1451

Maccabees and Maccabean revolt, 2060; 2 Chronicles, 1757; Daniel, 1640, 1642, 1643, 1647, 1660, 1664; Esther, 1628; Temple rededication (see Temple, rededication following victory of Judah Maccabee)

Machir, 520

Machpelah, 99

magic and sorcery: Chronicles, 1817; Deuteronomy, 381, 395, 407–8; Exodus, 113, 117–19, 142, 157; Isaiah, 801, 880; Joshua, 477; Judges, 533; 2 Kings, 774; Leviticus, 255, 256; Nahum, 1223; necromancy, 407–8, 533, 613–14, 774, 801, 1402, 1817, 2026; Numbers, 321, 326, 331; Psalms, 1345, 1350, 1406–7; 1 Samuel, 571, 613–14; Zechariah, 1260

Magog, Gog and, 115–18, 1043

mahanaim dance, 1574

Maimonides, Moses (Rambam), 1880, 1885; afterlife/personal resurrection, 1665; 1 Chronicles, 1758, 1781; Deuteronomy, 398; Exodus, 111, 144, 145, 149, 152, 161, 162, 179, 180; Ezekiel, 1067; Habakkuk, 1229; health and ritual purity, 2043; Hosea, 1144; influence of, 1882, 1889, 1893–94, 1895, 1964; Leviticus, 254; Malachi, 1268; Masoretic Text (Tanakh), 2081, 2083; modern interpretive features, foreshadowing, 1909; multiple versions of same event, interpreting, 1852; mysticism, 1980; philosophy, 1854–58, 1969; prayerbooks, 1940; Twelve Minor Prophets, 1142, 1144, 1229, 1258, 1268; Zechariah, 1258

Malachi: Ezra identified with, 1684; Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, association of, 1249; introduction, text, and annotations, 1268–74

Malbim (R. Meir Leibush ben Yehiel Michel), 671, 697, 717, 734, 1905–6, 1907

man of God, 446, 703–5, 727, 1384, 1779

Manasseh (king of Judah): Chronicles, 1816–18; Ezekiel, 1051, 1082; Jeremiah, 956, 965; Kethuvim vs. Deuteronomistic history, treatment in, 1247; Kings, books of, 670, 769–70, 771, 772, 774, 775

Manasseh (son of Jacob/tribal group): Chronicles, 1723–24, 1729; Deuteronomy, 372, 447; Genesis, 61, 83, 94, 95; Joshua, allotment of land in, 488, 492–93; Judges, 520, 521, 529; 1 Kings, 700; Numbers, 326, 337, 352; Psalms, 1372, 1373

mandrake, 61–62, 1576

mana, 139–41, 306–7, 326, 433, 472, 1369

Manoah father of Samson, 539–41 manslaughter vs. intentional killing, see homicide maps: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob narratives, geography of, 32; Amos, nations cited in, 1178; Ark of the Covenant, wanderings of, 569; Assyrians, 756, 762, 1810; Babylonia and Judah, 776, 1006, 1824; Benjaminite War, 555; Canaanite conquest, 468; David, kingdom of, 1735; David, life of, 591, 628; division of Israel and Judah, 701, 1784; Elijah narratives, 712; Elisha narratives, 729; exodus route, 130; Ezekiel's oracles against the nations, 1088; Isaiah's oracles against the nations, 811; Jeremiah's oracles against the nations, 1016; judges, period of, 516, 555; levitical cities and cities of refuge, 498, 1728; nations, table of, 27; Philistine cities, 516; Samuel, life of, 564; Saul, kingdom of, 576; Sennacherib's invasion of Judah, 853, 1816; Solomon's kingdom and administrative districts, 680, 1776; Tabernacle, 164; Temple of Solomon, 684, 1769; tribal territories, postexilic, 1134; Zephaniah, nations cited in, 1239

Marduk, 877, 1028, 1628

Mari (Syria), 165, 315 (see also Aram/ Aram Damascus)

- mark as sign of protection, 1058–159
- marriage (see also adultery; divorce): breaking glass at wedding, 1435; bride-price, 64, 156, 416, 418; circling of groom by bride, 990; crown worn by grooms abolished as sign of mourning after destruction of Second Temple, 1570; David, 610; Deuteronomic laws, 416–17; Ecclesiastes, value of having wife to love in, 1617; Ezekiel's allegory of, 1067–71, 1084–86; Ezekiel's priestly rules, 1129; half-siblings, 641; holy war and, 412; Hosea, metaphors used in, 1143–45; intermarriage with foreigners and those outside the faith (see intermarriage); Jeremiah, marriage motif in, 923, 926–28, 952–54, 958, 963, 971, 973, 988, 990, 995; Judges, political role of marriage in, 530; less-favored wife, protection of, 414–15; levirate marriage, 77, 251, 422–23, 1580–86; Levitical laws on sexual behavior, 251; Malachi, 1268, 1271–72; metaphor for relationship with God, 116, 149, 1144–52; poly-g-amy/monogamy, 16, 150, 294, 561; priesthood, 259, 1129; Proverbs on, 1456–57, 1476, 1477, 1496; psalm commemorating royal wedding, 1332; rape, following, 641; remarriage, 416–17, 420; Ruth, 1578, 1580–86; sale of daughter for purposes of, 153; sister-wife motif, 31, 42–43, 54, 60, 1571; Song of Songs as marriage/love allegory between God and Israel, 1565–66; Song of Songs as wedding text, 1565, 1567–70; wives' abandonment of birth family practices and beliefs on, 1333; woman slave designated for marriage, sexual relations with, 254
- martyrdom, 38, 46, 1664–65
- Marxism, 2092
- marzenh* feast, 959, 1402
- Masada, 413, 1920, 1928
- mashal/mishley (proverbs), 1447
- maskilim (followers or members of Jewish Enlightenment), 1901–2, 1903, 1905, 1907, 1909, 1910, 1965–69
- Masoretic Text (Tanakh), 2064, 2077–84; Ashkenazi tradition, 2080–83; authoritative text, emergence as, 1928; canonization of Bible, 2073–77; cantillation marks, 375, 797, 914, 2064, 2079, 2098; Chronicles, 1713, 1737, 1745, 1751, 1789; Codices, era of, 2079–82; Deuteronomy, 361, 376, 379, 394, 395, 426–27, 433, 436, 440–43, 446, 448; Ecclesiastes, 1620; Esther, 1625; Exodus, 183; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1667, 1689; Genesis, 68; Isaiah, 797; Italian Masoretic Codices, 2080–81; Jeremiah, 918–19; Job, 1536, 1556; Joel, 1174; Jonah, 1202; Kings, books of, 682, 707, 761; Leviticus, 207; Malachi, 1273, 1274; matres lectionis, 1927; medieval period, 2080–82; Micah, 1206; printed editions, 2082–84; Psalms, 1280, 1281; Qumran, Dead Sea, and Judean Desert Scrolls, 1921–24, 1927–28, 2077–78; Sages, era of, 2078–79; Samuel, books of, 560; 1 Samuel, 584, 587, 592, 597; Sephardic tradition, 2080, 2082, 2083; stichography, 2097–98; text criticism, 2070–72; Tiberian Masorah and Masorettes, 2064, 2079–81, 2098; Yemenite Masoretic Codices, 2080–81, 2083; Zephaniah, 1235
- masa'* or burden, 975
- matres lectionis*, 1927
- matrilineal descent, 1685
- matzah*, matzot, see unleavened bread and Festival of Unleavened Bread
- matzevoit*, see pillars and posts, sacred
- meal offering: cereal or grain offering (see minha); gift offerings/food-gifts ('ishet), 208–11, 223
- Me'am Lo'ez*, 1899, 1900
- measure-for-measure punishment, see talion
- Medes and Media, 773, 810, 823, 1033, 1035, 1641, 1645, 1655–58
- mediators/intercessors, prophets as, 184, 378, 713, 772, 1059, 1392–93
- medieval period: interpretation and study, 1874, 1876–1900; liturgy and prayers, 1940–41; Masoretic Text, 2080–82; mysticism, 1978–79; philosophy, 1951–62; translations of Bible, 2009
- megillot (five scrolls), see hamesh megillot
- Meir, Samuel ben, see Rashbam
- Mekhilta, 1252, 1848, 1867
- Meklenburg, Rabbi Jacob Zvi, 1905, 1907
- Melchizedek, 34–35, 1408–9
- memoirs: Ezekiel, 1043, 1046; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1668–69
- memorial stones and steles (see also specific named stones and steles): Aramaic victory stele, Dan, 743; Eben-ezer (1 Samuel), 573; gate shrines, 773; Hadadezer, 1747–48; Hazor stele showing orans prayer position, 1331; Job's desire for, 1529; Mesha Moabite Stone, 347, 411, 474, 710, 730–32, 743, 1347, 2026; Moses, raising of plastered stones inscribed with Torah by, 425–26; Shechem covenant ceremony stone raised by Joshua, 506; Shalmaneser III's monolith inscription, 722–23; twelve steles raised by Joshua on entry into Canaan, 470, 471, 478–79
- memory, see remembering/forgetting
- Menahem (son of Gadi), 755, 757, 1069, 1084
- men and women, see gender roles/differences
- Mendelssohn, Moses, 1901–2, 1905, 1908, 1965–67, 1970, 1971, 2009–10
- "mene mene tekel upharsin" (Daniel), 1651–53
- Menelaus the high priest, 2060
- "men of the great synagogue," 1043
- menorah, see lamps/lampstands
- menstruation and menstrual blood, 2047; Ezekiel, 1055, 1082, 1112; Genesis, 65; Lamentations, 1591; Leviticus, 233, 241, 242–43, 251; menstrual fluid believed to be blood, 243; 2 Samuel, 636
- mental illness: Nebuchadnezzar, 1649–51; Saul, 592, 596, 603
- Mephibosheth, 626, 634–35, 647, 650, 654–55
- Merarites, 288, 289, 292, 297, 305, 499
- merchants and trade: Phoenicians and Canaanites as synonyms for, 827, 1069; Solomon's business ventures, 1780
- mercy, Job's pleas for, 1510, 1525, 1528
- merism, 442, 1183, 1593
- Merkavah, 1977
- Merneptah, 104
- Merodach-baladan, 767, 823, 860
- Meshach, Shadrach, and Abed-nego, 1643–44, 1647–48
- Mesha's rebellion and Mesha Moabite Stone, 347, 411, 474, 710, 730–32, 743, 1347, 2026
- Meshulam, 1699
- Mesopotamian mythology, history, and religion, 9–10, 360, 2049; Abraham's rescue of Lot, 33; absolute kingship of Mesopotamia vs. Israelite version of kingship, 559; acrostics, 1588; adultery laws, 377; apotropaic head ornaments, 174; book of the Lord/scrolls of remembrance/book of life, 434, 1274; celestial phenomena, worship of, 372; concubines and concubinage, 153; consumption of sacrifice by gods, 167; creation story, 13; cutting animals in half and passing between them, 35–36, 998; Decalogue and, 374; eating of sacrifices by gods, 340; "eye for an eye" principle (see talion); feet on necks as sign of conquest, 482; female inheritance patterns, 338; flood story, 21, 24; food offerings to dead, 424–25; fringes, 315; golden temple decorations, 684; holy war, 411; human culture, growth of, 19; Joshua's drawings from Near Eastern culture, 463; king as adopted son of a god, 1381; king, wealth of dominion flowing through, 1246; laments, 1588; law and legal materials, 148, 152, 153, 370–71, 406, 1681; love as loyalty, 377, 380, 436–37; love poetry, Song of Songs paralleling, 1564; misuse of sacred, guarding against, 216; monetary compensation/payment for damages, 153, 216, 354; mourning rituals, women's role in, 944; Nevi'im, historicity of, 454–55; New Year's day, 24; number four, significance of, 1252; numbers, tenfold inflation of, 129; obedience to suzerains, 381, 427, 434; origin stories, 2049;

- parents, duty of children to honor, 150; pattern and repetition in nature applied to moral life, 1277; polytheism, 137; pre-Deuteronomistic Judaism as Near Eastern religion, 360; property crimes, capital punishment for, 155; prophecy, concept of, 457; Psalms, 1283, 1289, 1292, 1304, 1312, 1313, 1333, 1335, 1347, 1349, 1387, 1406; return of escaped slaves, 419, 617; rivalries amongst the sky, sea, and summer drought deities, 1516–17; sea, primeval battle between YHWH and, 2026 (see also Leviathan); sevenfold prostration, 68; The Song at the Sea, 136; Sumerian King List, 20; threefold cord, 1611; unknown sin, 217; wedding text, Song of Songs paralleling, 1565; wisdom portrayed as woman in Proverbs, 1451; ziggurat in Jacob's dream, 58
- messengers (see also angels): Ezekiel, 1048; Isaiah, 849, 862, 868, 891; Job, 1510; Joshua, 473; Malachi, 1268, 1273; Proverbs, 1465, 1475; Zechariah, 1251
- messianism (see also apocalypticism/eschatology): Amos, 1192; Christian understanding of, 1961; Chronicles, 1715–16, 1779; Daniel, 1657, 1660; Deuteronomy, 408; Ezekiel, 1118; Habakkuk, 1229; Isaiah (Deutero-Isaiah's servant of the Lord), 867, 868, 882–83, 890–92; Isaiah (First Isaiah), 780, 782, 783, 792, 798, 802, 807, 845; Jeremiah, 928; 2 Kings, 727; Malachi, 1269, 1274; Micah, 1211, 1213; Obadiah, 1197; Psalms, 1285, 1332, 1414; Sabbatean heresy, 1899; 1 Samuel, Hannah's Song, 564; 2 Samuel, 631; Twelve Minor Prophets, 1142; Zechariah, 1250, 1253, 1258, 1259, 1264; Zephaniah, 1242
- metaphor, 2102–4 (see also specific metaphors); mixed metaphors, 1427, 1429; purity laws understood as, 2046
- meturgeman* (translator), 1934
- metzora'*, 309
- Meunites, 1794, 1806
- mezuzah, mezuzot, 381, 1924
- Micah: dating, 1206; introduction, 1205–6; Jeremiah, 980; text and annotations, 1206–18
- Micah's House of God: Judges, 547–49
- Micaiah, 723–24, 1066
- mice, plague of, 570–71
- Michael (archangel), 472, 1657, 1662, 1665
- Michal, 597–99, 610, 624, 630–31, 1346, 1743
- Middle Assyrian Laws, 417, 418, 422, 423
- Middle Platonism, 1949
- Midian and Midianites: Exodus, 109, 143; Genesis, 76; Isaiah, 904; Joshua, 487; Judges, 522–29, 556; Numbers, 328, 334, 335, 336, 344–46
- midrash, 1846–47, 1863–75; Chronicles, 1714, 1787, 1825; early nonrabbinic commentaries anticipating, 1839; Exodus, 151; Genesis, 9; Ibn Ezra's critique of, 1882; medieval interpretation, 1876, 1891, 1895–96; national midrash of modern state of Israel, 1990–2000; Proverbs frequently quoted in, 1448; sermons, 1935; women's critical scholarship, 2003
- Mighty One of Jacob, 1431
- Mikveh, 146, 175, 233, 242, 243, 322, 636, 687
- military camps, rules for, 419
- military champions, 593, 622
- military organization of Israelites in the wilderness, 284–85, 286–87, 364
- military purposes, census for, 180, 284, 666
- milk and honey, land flowing with, 111, 187, 258, 310, 317, 472, 587, 1571
- milk and meat, prohibition on combining, 160, 229, 398
- minḥa* (cereal or grain offering): Ezekiel, 1125, 1131; Jeremiah, 962; 1 Kings, 693; Leviticus, 207, 208–10, 215, 218–19, 225, 228; Psalms, 1326–27
- minor judges, 534, 539
- minor prophets, see Twelve Minor Prophets
- minor Purims, 1625
- minyān*, 796
- Miqra'ot Gedolot* (Rabbinic Bible), 1874–75, 1899–1900, 2082
- miracles, see signs
- Miriam: Deuteronomy, 421; Exodus, 109, 116, 138, 142; Ezekiel, 1065; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1696; Isaiah, 782; Jeremiah, 988; 2 Kings, 771; Micah, 1214; Numbers, 308–9, 323; prophet, as, 138, 771, 1065, 1696; prophetic status of, 138, 771, 1065, 1696; Psalms, 1389; Song of the Sea, 136–38, 326, 517, 967, 1337, 1368, 1370, 1389, 1944–45
- "Mirror for Magistrates," 403
- mishkan* or mikdash, 163, 165, 178, 203
- mishlei* (proverbs), 1447
- Mishnah, 151, 380–81, 1845, 1846–47, 1862–63, 1931, 2046–47
- mitzvah/mitzvot*, 68, 206, 1997
- mixed metaphors, 1427, 1429
- mizrah*, 1435
- Moab and Moabites, 697; Chemosh, 327, 536, 537, 732, 1021, 1347, 2026; Chronicles, 1722; Deuteronomy, 366, 418–19; Ezekiel, 1090; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1709; Genesis, 42; Isaiah, 815–17, 832; Jeremiah, 981, 1020–24; Judges, 536, 537; 2 Kings, 730–32, 743, 775; Meshah's rebellion and Meshah Moabite Stone, 347, 411, 474, 710, 730–32, 743, 1347, 2026; Numbers, 282–83, 283–84, 323–28, 333, 335, 345; Obadiah, 1179; Psalms, 1347, 1376; Ruth, 1578–81; 1 Samuel, 1603; 2 Samuel, 633
- moderation as virtue, 1469, 1614–15
- modern source theories: Chronicles, 1713–14; D or Deuteronomistic source, 3–6, 105, 124, 1910 (see also Deuteronomistic History); Dead Sea Scrolls representing early editorial stages and source materials, 1925–26; Deuteronomy, 358–61; E or Elohist source (see E or Elohist source); Exodus, 104–5; Genesis, 11; J or Yahwist source (see J or Yahwist source); JE (Yahwist/Elohist) source, 6, 105, 107, 115, 305, 309, 323, 334; Kings, books of, 669–71; Leviticus, 204, 205; Numbers, 281; P or Priestly source (see P or Priestly source); Torah, 3–6
- modern state of Israel, see Israel, modern state of
- mohel*, 38
- Molech, child sacrifice to, see child sacrifice
- monarchy, see entries at kingship
- monetary compensation: futility of accumulating money, 1613; murder, 153, 154, 354; reparation offerings, 216–17; talion, replacing, 269
- monetary dedications, 277–78
- monogamy/polygamy, 16, 150, 294, 561
- monolatry, 375, 2021
- monotheism/polytheism, 2021, 2027–28; Daniel, 1654; Deuteronomy, 360, 370, 371–73, 375–76, 380, 435, 441, 444; "ethical monotheism," 1186; Exodus, 137, 144, 148–49, 164, 184, 190; Genesis, 30; Isaiah, 872–77, 894; Joshua, 467; Kings, radical monotheism of, 711, 714, 716, 727–28, 736, 745, 770; modern biblical interpretation, 1914; Numbers, 305; pluralism, polytheistic, 714; Psalms, 1345, 1375, 1378, 1390, 1392, 1411–12, 1433; 1 Samuel, 563, 569, 612, 615; 2 Samuel, 662
- monsters: Leviathan (see Leviathan); mythological destruction of the sea monster, 1444–45, 2026; Rahab the mythical monster, 888, 1098, 1379–80, 1382, 1505, 1517, 1538, 1559, 2026
- monuments, see memorial stones and steles
- morality, see ethics and morality
- Mordecai, 1563, 1623–39, 1673
- Moriah, 45, 1768 (see also Sheol)
- Moses (see also Exodus [book]); exodus from Egypt; Sinai/Horeb): birth, infancy, and young adulthood, 108–10; Blessing of Moses, 437, 445–49; burial place unknown, 445, 449; burning bush, appearance of God in, 110–12, 303, 1701;

Moses (continued) communication of laws of Leviticus to, 206–80; complaints of Israelites (see complaining of Israelites wandering in the wilderness); construction and setting up of Tabernacle, 191–202; David paralleling, 1755, 1779; death of, 338, 339, 437–50, 462, 464; denial of entry to promised land, 283, 323–24, 359, 365, 449; descendants of, 549; Deuteronomic discourses, 363–437; Ecclesiastes, referred to as shepherd in, 1622; Egyptian origins of name, 104, 109; Elijah paralleling, 717, 728; Ezekiel compared to, 1042, 1043, 1050, 1059; Ezra compared to, 1669, 1680–81; Five Books of Moses (see Torah); genealogy, 338; Genesis, as author of, 11; Hezekiah compared to, 1809; Isaiah's references to, 909; Jeremiah compared to, 917, 921; Joshua mirroring, 464, 466, 468–70, 475, 477, 484, 506, 1754, 1762; Josiah's scroll supposedly written by, 771; leading of Israelites out of Egypt, 130–42; mediator/intercessor, as, 378, 772, 1392–93; Miriam and Aaron speaking against, 308–9; Numbers, as author of, 281; organization of Israelite camp, 284–302; priest, regarded as, 1392; prophetic status of, 111, 146, 386, 395, 407, 408, 450, 1162; Psalms, 1282, 1384–85, 1392–93, 1416; return to Egypt and contest with Pharaoh, 110–30; sacrifice and consecration, laws of, 206–28; scouting/spying of Canaan, 309–12, 347, 365, 464, 472; Song of Moses, 437, 440–45; speech impediment of, 112, 115; Torah and, 1, 2–3, 363, 437; violation and restoration of covenant, 182–91

Most High (Elyon), 441, 1290, 1292, 1375, 1385

Mot (Canaanite god of death), 944, 1517, 1528 mothers and motherhood: God as mother, 868, 878, 915, 1384, 1431; matrilineal descent, 1685; Proverbs, as teachers in, 1450, 1458, 1497; queen mothers, 707–8, 747, 953, 983, 1652, 1789; Ruth, as theme of, 1580; Song of Songs, as central image in, 1569, 1576; surrogate motherhood, 61, 72; weaning, 562, 1430–31 mountains of Israel in Ezekiel, 1053–54, 1111

Mount Carmel, 525, 714, 1177, 1191

Mount Hor, 324, 351

Mount Nebo, 339

Mount Sinai, see Sinai/Horeb mourning rituals: Amos, 1184; crown worn by grooms abolished as sign of mourning after destruction of Second Temple, 1570; Daniel, 1659; Deuteronomy, 397, 449; dirges, 620–21, 625; Ecclesiastes, 1621; Esther, 1633–34; Ezekiel, 1075, 1088–89, 1129; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1685, 1689; Jeremiah, 940, 944, 957, 959, 971, 1023; Job, 1508, 1539; Joshua, 475; 2 Kings, 738; Lamentations, 1593; Leviticus, 227–28, 255, 258–59; Micah, 1208; Numbers, 311, 324–25; Psalms, 1320, 1356, 1394; 1 Samuel, 569, 590, 607, 618; 2 Samuel, 620–21, 625, 638, 647, 659; shiv'ah, 100, 618; Temple, destruction of (see Tish'ah be'av [9th of Av]); women's role in, 944, 1102

multiple interpretations, 1874

multiple meanings (polyvalence), 1199, 1234, 1980–85

multiple places of sacrifice, see centralization vs. multiple places of sacrifice multiple re-reading and study, prophetic books meant for, 1140, 1165, 1176, 1193, 1234, 1250–52 multiple versions of same event, 3–4, 1850–53; Deuteronomy, 361, 437, 444; Exodus, 104–5, 145, 182; Genesis, 104–5, 145, 182, 305–6, 361, 437, 444, 560, 1406; Numbers, 305–6; Psalms, 1406; 1 Samuel, 560

murder, see homicide

Musaf, 304

Musar movement, importance of Proverbs to, 1448 music: cultic songs accompanying prayers, 1756; cymbals and trumpets announcing beginning of song, 1742; David, 592, 1281; ecstasy induced by, 578, 731; Habakkuk, musical instructions in, 1231; Levites, 1756–58, 1772, 1773, 1796; mental stress relieved by, 592; praise to God, viewed as, 1282; prophecy, as form of, 1757, 1758; Proverbs on effect of, 1488; Psalms, 1281, 1282, 1289, 1337, 1374, 1435; Temple singers and musicians described in Chronicles, 1757–58; wall around Jerusalem rebuilt by Nehemiah, dedication of, 1708

Muslim religion, see Islam

Mutazilite philosophy, 1876, 1879, 1952

myrrh, 1567, 1571

mysticism, 1046, 1107, 1349, 1424, 1565, 1898, 1946, 1976–90 (see also particular types of mysticism) mythology: history vs. 2028–29; Near Eastern (see Mesopotamian mythology, history, and religion)

N

Naaman the leper, 735–36, 754

Nabal, 608–10, 1721

Nabateans, 1111

Nablus, see Shechem

Nabolopassar, 968

Nabonidus, 1028, 1649, 1651, 1652, 1655

Naboth's vineyard, 721–22

Nachmanides, see Ramban

Nadab, 708

Nadab and Abihun consumed by fire, 225, 227, 288, 317, 338

Nahal Hever, Scrolls found at, 1920, 2066, 2078

Nahash, king of the Ammonites, 580, 582, 635, 650, 1749

Nahmanides, see Ramban

Nahor, 47

Nahum: dating, 1219; double title, 1219, 1220; introduction, text, and annotations, 1219–25

nakedness: Adam and Eve, 16–17; father's former wife, marrying, 418; Noah, 26; Saul's cursing of Jonathan, 601; sexual perversions, laws against, 249–52, 256–58; underpants, requirement that priests wear, 152, 174–75 names of God, see divine names

Naomi, 1578–86

Naphtali: Chronicles, 1729; Deuteronomy, 448; Genesis, 61, 72, 96, 98; Isaiah, 801; Joshua, 495; Judges, 520, 521, 529; 1 Kings, 686, 708

nard, 1567

Nathan, 631, 638–39, 642, 648, 672, 673, 720, 792, 1338, 1762 nations, table of, 26–28

nature, God's power over, 8, 1312

Nazirites, 295–96, 508, 519, 539, 540, 542, 562, 999, 1181

Near Eastern culture generally, see Mesopotamian mythology, history, and religion

Nebuchadnezzar: also known as Nebuchadrezzar, 1641, 2055; Ammon, invasion of, 1024; Daniel, 1641–51, 1656; eagle associated with, 1071–72, 1155; Ezekiel, 1054, 1071–72, 1087, 1101, 1102; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1666, 1671, 1672, 1673, 1677, 1689; Haggai, 1244; Jeremiah, 968, 982, 983, 993, 1006, 1017, 1019, 1020, 1024, 1036; 2 Kings, 775, 777, 779; mental illness of, 1649–51; Moab, advance against, 1020; Philistia, invasion of, 1019; Tyre, failure to capture, 1044

Nebuzaradan, 1007, 1008, 1087

Nechushtan, 325

necklace metaphor in Proverbs, 1450, 1453, 1454, 1458, 1459

Neco (Necho), Pharaoh, 774, 775, 938, 970, 1016, 1054, 1075, 1822–23

necromancy, 407–8, 533, 613–14, 774, 801, 1402, 1817, 2026 (see also magic and sorcery) nedavah (freewill offering), 208–11, 220, 253, 262, 343, 749, 1132, 1342

neder (votive offering), 220, 253, 262, 343

- Negev/Negeb desert, 1054, 1080, 2062
 negligence, 416
 Neharim, 1232
 Nehemiah (person) (see also Ezra-Nehemiah): cupbearer to Artaxerxes, 1690; governorship of Judah, 1667, 1673, 1695; Zerubabel identified with, 1672, 1708 neighbors, moral duties towards, 415
 Neoplatonism, 1884
 Nephilim, 21, 310 nets, capture in, 1345, 1591
nevelah, 231
 Nevi'im (Prophets): apocalypticism, 460–61; authoritativeness of prophetic books for Chronicles author, 1825; books contained in, 451 (see also individual books); commentary, 451–61; composition, compilation, and redaction of prophetic books, 456–57; concept of prophecy in Israelite religion, 457–61; divisions of, 451; "former" prophets, 451, 453–54, 455, 668; historical books, 451–55; Judges, 550; "latter" prophets, 451, 455–56; origins of terms, 451; phases of development of prophecy, 459–61; text and annotations, 462–1274; Torah, relationship to, 451, 458, 1141–42; the Twelve (see Twelve Minor Prophets)
 "a new heart and a new spirit" (Ezekiel), 1062, 1075, 1112
 New Jewish Publication Society (NJPS) translation of Bible, 2014–20 new moon festival (Rosh Hodesh), 599, 1131–32, 1374, 1397, 1410
 New Year Festival (Akitu), Babylonian, 877
 New Year Festival, Jewish, see Rosh Ha-Shanah
 Nimrod, 28, 1213
 Nineveh: Jonah, 1198–1204; Nahum, 1219–25; Zephaniah, 1239, 1240
 9th of Av, see Tish'ah be'av
 NJPS (New Jewish Publication Society) translation of Bible, 2014–20
 Noadiah the prophetess, 771, 1065, 1696
 Noah, 9–10, 20–26, 207, 229, 248, 893, 1066–67, 1532
 No-amon (Thebes), 1219, 1224
 Nob, massacre of priests of, 566, 603–5, 606 nodding the head, 1508
 non-Israelites, see entries at foreign; specific nations and peoples Northern French School of medieval interpretation, 1886–91
 "nothing new under the sun" (Ecclesiastes), 1607 Nubia, 819, 876, 1540, 1626 (see also Cush) number forty: forty days and forty nights of Elijah on Mt. Horeb, 717; forty days and forty nights of Moses on Mt. Sinai, 191; forty days for undoing of Nineveh in Jonah, 1202; forty years as formulaic conclusion or round number, 529, 569, 675, 1099; forty years in the wilderness, 138–42, 323, 338, 349–50, 363, 472, 1389 number four, 1252 number seven (and multiples of seven): Daniel, 1659–60; Deuteronomy, 382, 389; Ezekiel, 1057; Genesis, 68; Jeremiah, 977, 1659; Job, 1505; Joshua, 473; Judges, 530; Numbers, 330, 342; Psalms, 1295, 1345, 1372, 1385; 1 Samuel, 618; sevenfold prostration, 68; seventy elders (Sanhedrin), 1057, 1059, 1244 number seven-eight sequence, 1619 number three, 1342, 1505, 1654, 1684 number twenty-four, 1760
 Numbers: Ezekiel, 303, 320, 341; introduction, 281–84; law and legal material, 281–84; Leviticus, as direct continuation of, 204, 281; narrative structure and divisions, 281–84; origin of name, 281; text and annotations, 284–355; traditional and modern source theories, 281 numbers, inflation of, 129, 285, 338, 476, 483, 520, 528, 552, 569, 572, 583 numerical interpretive techniques, 1866, 1891–92, 1983 numerical sayings in Proverbs, 1495
- O
- oaths, see vows and oaths Obadiah: dating, 1193; Elijah and, 713; Esau in, 1193–94, 1270; introduction, 1193–94; original vs. existing book, 1193; text and annotations, 1194–97
 Obed (son of Ruth and Boaz), 1578, 1585–86 obedience/disobedience: Deuteronomy, 370, 374, 377, 381–82, 385, 388, 390, 412, 427–37; Exodus, 149, 150; Genesis, 17–18; Job, 1505; Joshua, 462, 474–75, 504, 506; Kings, books of, 703; Micah, 1214; Psalms, 1308, 1401; 1 Samuel, 588, 590; Zechariah, 1256–57 ocean, see waters Oded the prophet, 1788, 1806 offerings, see sacrifice; individual types of offerings official records and documents, 1676–78, 1707
 Og king of Bashan, 327, 368–69, 466, 479, 487, 505, 1433
 'ohel mo'ed (Tent of Meeting), 164, 165, 178, 182, 187, 203, 439, 494, 502, 565, 1565 (see also Tabernacle)
 Oholah and Oholibah, 1084–86
 Oholiab, 181, 193, 197
 oil, 171, 267, 732, 1340, 1432 (see also entries at anointing, lamps)
 'olam haba' (the next world), 563 old age, see elders/elderly olive trees, 949, 1340
 omniscience/omnipotence of God, 1436–37, 1441, 1471, 1472, 1517 omniscience: biblical interpretation, 1848–49, 1854–55; Jewish mysticism, 1987–90
 Omri, 709, 710, 718, 727, 730, 742, 744, 745 Onan, 77, 91
 "One" as possible divine name for God in Job, 1545
 One, the, in Jewish mysticism, 1796
 Onias III (high priest), 1660, 1663 onomatopoeia, 1571
 Ophir, 695–96, 946, 1796
 oracles (see also prophets and prophecy): Exodus, 144, 156, 172, 173, 187; Joel, 1166, 1172; Nevi'im (Prophets), 456–57; Numbers, 328–34; prophetic books' divine announcements, 1198 oral basis for early interpretation of scripture, 1870 Oral Torah, 151, 163, 379, 1244, 1872, 1876, 1905, 1906, 1982, 1996, 1997 oral traditions about recitation of Bible, 2064 orans position, see liturgy and prayers, subhead physical positions for praying oration as story-telling device, 1786 order: boundaries (see boundaries and order); justice as form of, 1612, 1748; social (see social and order) Origen, 1667
 origin stories, 2049
 original biblical texts: nonsurvival of, 1920, 2067; reconstruction, attempts at, 2068 original sin, 1339
 Orpah, 1560, 1578
 orphans, see widows and orphans Orthodox Judaism, 1905, 1917, 1919, 1996–97 Osnapper, 1676
 ostriches, 1557, 1599
 Othniel, 482, 489, 490, 511, 514–15, 539
- P
- P or Priestly source, 3–6, 204, 205, 281; Chronicles influenced by, 1717, 1767, 1768, 1779, 1786, 1809, 1812; circumcision, 472;

P or Priestly source (continued)

- Deuteronomy, 363, 389, 397, 404, 406, 409, 412, 439, 445; dietary laws, 397; Exodus, 105, 107–8, 111, 115, 124, 132, 134, 142, 145, 165, 178, 182–83; Ezra–Nehemiah, 1683, 1690; Genesis, 11, 13, 22, 37, 38, 45, 52, 55, 58, 71, 95; Joshua, 507; Leviticus as Priestly writing (see Leviticus); modern biblical interpretation, 1910; Numbers, 286, 304, 305, 309, 311, 319, 323, 324, 334, 339, 345, 349, 350, 354; Psalms, 1338, 1367, 1392, 1409, 1415; purity/impurity, 2045, 2047; religion of Bible and, 2033–35; sacrifice as part of wilderness experience, 1187
- Paneas, battle of, 1663
- panic, divinely induced, 161
- parable/allegory: Christian allegorization, 1892; Ecclesiastes, 1618; Ezekiel, 1067–72, 1075, 1087; Gaon, Saadia, 1952–53; Hosea, 1162; interpretation and study, 1872, 1892; Isaiah, 838; Judges, 530–31; 1 Kings, 720; 2 Samuel, 638–39, 642; Song of Songs, 1565–66
- Paraleipomenon, 1714
- parallelism, 2098–2102; Deuteronomy, 444; Ecclesiastes, 1604; Lamentations, 1588; Psalms, 1283, 1288, 1289, 1291, 1313, 1341, 1344, 1349, 1352, 1365, 1411, 1425
- Paran, march from Mt. Sinai to desert of, 304–6
- paranomasia, 166–67, 1793, 1795 (see also puns and punning)
- parataxis, 2098
- parent-child relationship: covenant/treaty language, 1754; Isaiah's use as metaphor for Israel, 885, 894, 915; metaphor for relationship with God, 116, 1160, 1269, 1330, 1396; Proverbs' praise of wise children and bemoaning of foolish/evil children, 1464, 1467, 1492, 1495; Proverbs' use of parental advice to son, 1450, 1454, 1458
- parents (see also fathers; mothers and motherhood): guilt of parents visited upon children (see communal guilt); honor and respect for, 26, 150, 153–54, 253, 257, 415, 603, 1082
- parody, 1203, 1460, 1514, 1520, 1602
- Pashhur (son of Immer), 966, 1003
- Passover Haggadah, 128, 129, 132, 137, 1939, 1944
- Passover (Pesah): Chronicles, 1810–12, 1821–22; Deuteronomy, 357, 382, 401–2, 424–25; Exodus, 102, 106, 124–31, 160, 176; Ezekiel, 1089, 1112, 1113, 1131; Ezra–Nehemiah, 1679–80; Festival of Unleavened Bread combined with, 401–2; Genesis, 91; Hezekiah's reforms, 1821–22; Isaiah, 845, 846; Jeremiah, 948; Joel, 1173; Joshua, 463, 467, 471–72, 505; Josiah's reforms, 774, 1821–22; 2 Kings and Josiah's reforms, 774; Lamentations, 1599; Malachi, 1269; Numbers, 263, 282, 302–3, 340, 341, 346; Psalms, 1370, 1372, 1374, 1398, 1410, 1434; Ruth, 1581; sacrifice of Passover, 46, 126, 401, 1679, 1821–22, 1832–33; Song of Songs, 1275, 1563, 1566; "wandering Aramean" passage, 424–25
- pastoral vs. agricultural cultures: Book of the Covenant, 151; Cain and Abel, 18–19; Jacob and Esau, 55–58; Pesah and Festival of Unleavened Bread, 127
- pathos/grace/compassion, divine, 1207, 1715, 1785, 1817
- patriarchal family structure, 1269, 1271–72
- patriarchy, 2004, 2005, 2042
- patrilineal descent, 268, 345, 1685
- peace, see war and peace
- Pekah, 755–57, 801
- Pelethites, 634, 646, 656, 673, 1748
- penitential theology, 1659–60
- pentads in the Bible, 1563
- Pentateuch, see Torah
- people of Israel: early development of, 1, 6, 8, 102, 107; exclusivist identity (see exclusivist nature of later Israelite identity)
- people of the land: Esther, 1636; Ezekiel and Jeremiah, 748; Ezra–Nehemiah, 1674, 1675–76, 1684, 1690–93; 2 Kings, 748, 753, 770, 775
- perdition, place of, 1380, 1381 (see also Sheol)
- Perez, sons of, 1578, 1586, 1721–22
- persecution: anti-Semitism, 5, 142, 1625, 1630, 1910, 1914; evildoers of Psalms, 1288, 1293, 1321, 1350, 1388, 1407, 1438; Holocaust (Shoah), 949, 1048, 1320, 2010; Jeremiah's portrayal of himself as persecuted victim, 950, 964, 966; martyrdom, 38, 46, 1664–65
- Persians, 2055–57 (see also specific rulers); communications system, 1624, 1627, 1635; Daniel's predictions regarding, 1645, 1655–58; Esther's description of Persian court, 1624, 1626; Ezra–Nehemiah, 1666–67; Haggai, 1243–48; Malachi, 1269; Michael (archangel) as guardian of, 1662; religious tolerance of, 1647, 1654, 1671; Satan, idea of, 1253; Zechariah, 1249
- personal petition psalms, see individual psalms
- personal resurrection, see afterlife/personal resurrection
- Pesah, see Passover (Pesah)
- peslint* exegesis, 1885, 1890, 1893–95, 1897, 1902, 1903, 1906, 1983, 1992–94, 1997–2000
- pesher/pesharim*, 1839–40, 1865, 1876, 1877–78, 1924
- Peshitta, 2008; 2 Chronicles, 1769, 1788, 1798; Dead Sea Scrolls, 1926; Ecclesiastes, 1620; Isaiah, 818; Psalms, 1280, 1313, 1442; 2 Samuel, 664; text criticism, 2071
- pestilence, see disease/plague/pestilence
- petihita*, 1872–73
- petitions: Ezra–Nehemiah, 1689; Isaiah, 833, 859; Lamentations, 1601; psalms as individual or communal petitions, 1283 (see also individual psalms, communal psalms)
- Phaethon (son of Eos), 813
- Pharisees, 1659, 1665, 2046
- Philistines and Philistia: Amos, 1179; chariots, 568, 583; Cherethites, 616, 634, 646, 656, 673, 1238, 1748; Chronicles, 1733; David dwelling amongst, 602–3, 612–18; David's liberation of Israelites from, 629, 838, 1737, 1742, 1747, 1750–51; Deuteronomy, 367; Exodus, 126, 136; Ezekiel, 1071, 1090–91; Genesis, 54–55; Goliath, 310, 484, 560, 592–96, 603, 604, 659–60, 1750–51; iron tools, 584–85; Isaiah, 814, 823, 838; Jeremiah, 981, 1019–20; Joshua, 484, 486, 490; Judges, 516, 534, 539–46; Kings, books of, 681, 694, 754, 762; Numbers, 310; origins of, 568, 593, 616; Psalms, 1347, 1370, 1380; Samson, 539–46; 1 Samuel, 568–72, 574, 578, 582–87, 592–96, 602–18; 2 Samuel, 629; Saul and sons, death of, 618; Solomon, 681, 695; Zechariah, 1259; Zephaniah, 1236, 1238
- philology, see language
- Philo of Alexandria, 1840–42; classical philosophy, 1950; Deuteronomy, 398; Exodus, 148; liturgy and prayers, pre-rabbinic, 1938; midrash, 1865, 1873; modern interpretation and, 1909; Psalms, 1424; Septuagint, 2006, 2007; synagogue, origins of, 1929
- philosophy and the Bible, 1884–85, 1898, 1948–75 (see also individual philosophers and philosophies); Ecclesiastes, 1603–6; Islamic philosophy, influence of, 1876, 1879; Job, 1499–1505
- Phinehas (Phineas), 334, 335, 345, 553, 996, 1114, 1402
- Phoenicia and Phoenicians, 486, 682, 696, 711, 827–28, 1019, 1094, 1105, 1180, 1196
- phyllacteries, see tefillin
- physical mutilation as punishment, 423, 580, 626
- physical positions for praying, 690, 691, 716, 1312, 1331, 1418, 1432, 1685
- Pidyon ha-ben* (Redemption of the Son), 106, 133
- pietists and pietism, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1946, 2030
- piety, wisdom of, 1452–53
- pigs/swine, 229
- pilgrimage (ḥajj), 2023; Exodus, 106; festivals of pilgrimage, 106,

- 340, 341, 398, 400, 557, 1410, 1756; Leviticus, 262–64, 265–66; psalms for pilgrimage to the Temple, 1280, 1281, 1376–77, 1424
- pillar of cloud, 135, 187, 1393, 1400 (see also cloud, God in)
- pillars and posts, sacred (ʾnshrim), 2022, 2026, 2031; Chronicles, 1813, 1817; Deuteronomy, 383, 404; Exodus, 160–62, 189–90; Ezekiel, 1053, 1056; Genesis, 59; Hosea, 1158; Judges, 514, 524; 1 Kings, 706, 707, 711, 714; 2 Kings, 730, 772
- pillars (Jachin and Boaz) of First Temple, 687, 748, 982
- Pit, the (see also Sheol): Ezekiel, 1092, 1096, 1101, 1105; Psalms, 1312, 1314, 1325, 1357, 1380, 1396, 1440
- Pithom, 108
- piyyut/piyyutim*, 963, 1524, 1525, 1554, 1588, 1930, 1936–37
- plague, see disease/plague/pestilence
- Plaskow, Judith, 1973–74
- Platonism, 1981
- Ploni ʾAlmoni* in Ruth, 1584–85
- plowing, 1160
- plowshares, beating of swords into, 1211
- plunder, 70, 346, 411, 412, 465, 476, 478, 520, 522, 529, 707, 1637
- Plutarch, 1633, 1635
- poetry in the Bible, 2097–2104 (see also entries at Song, Psalms, and specific techniques); heightening of first half of psalm by second, 1295–96; Isaiah as poetry, 780; meter used in, 1075, 1588; Proverbs as poetry, 1448, 1463
- poison cup of God's wrath/water of bitterness, 185, 295, 977, 1347, 1365, 1532, 1596
- poisonwood (wormwood), 434, 1185, 1596
- polarities, Ecclesiastes' catalogue of, 1604, 1609–10
- political structures, see entries at tribe, king
- polygamy/monogamy, 16, 150, 294, 561
- polytheism, see monotheism/polytheism
- polyvalence (multiple meanings), 1199, 1234, 1980–85
- pomegranates, 922, 1040, 1055, 1570
- postmodernism, 2092–93, 2096
- posts, sacred, see pillars and posts, sacred
- post-structuralism/deconstruction, 2092
- Potiphar and Potiphar's wife, 78–79, 83
- poverty, see economic justice, poverty, and social welfare
- praising God: "keep me alive to praise you" argument, 1345, 1347, 1359, 1408, 1412, 1413, 1440, 1515; Psalmic theme, 1282, 1283–84, 1291, 1302, 1312, 1326, 1355, 1359, 1364, 1365, 1374, 1386, 1396, 1397, 1410, 1413–14, 1436, 1444, 1445, 1446
- prayer shawl (tallit), 252, 315, 416, 1321
- prayers, see liturgy and prayers
- prefectures of Solomon, 679–80
- presence, divine, see theophany
- pretentiousness, 1468
- pride/hubris vs. humility: Ezekiel, 1095; Isaiah, 788, 790, 791, 804, 827, 840, 879; Proverbs, 1470, 1471, 1473, 1476, 1479, 1490, 1495
- priesthood (see also Aaronide priesthood; high priests; Levites; specific priests): active service, period of, 1044, 1119; Ahab's house, purge of, 745; allocation of property to, 1130; blessing, 297; building of Second Temple in Haggai, 1244–45, 1247; combination of Levite and Aaronide priesthood, 406; compensation for, 319–21; David's sons, 634, 1748; Deuteronomic laws, 406–7; Elide priesthood, 917, 921, 956, 1128; Ezekiel as priest, 1042, 1043, 1044, 1050, 1052, 1056–57, 1065, 1082, 1087, 1088; Ezekiel's chronology covering years of active service as priest, 1044, 1046, 1119; Ezekiel's presupposition of priests as teachers of Torah, 1051, 1129; Ezekiel's priestly regulations, 1128–38; foreigners in priestly roles, 904; Holiness Collection, 258–60; inauguration, vestments, and consecration of, 163, 171–78, 198–99, 200–201, 222–28, 1127; interaction between God and people, responsibility for, 1168; Isaiah's view of, 904, 906; Jordan, crossing of, 271; Josiah's reforms, 772–74; kings performing priestly roles, 584, 703, 1408; Malachi on improper cultic practice, 1268, 1270–71; marriage, 259, 1129; nevelah and terefah, 230; physical defects of, 259–60, 418; purity concepts and social subordination, 2041–42, 2043–44; return from exile, reappointment on, 1673, 1674, 1679, 1683, 1707; re-turnees from Babylonian exile, genealogies of, 1681; unsolved murders, atonement for, 413
- Priestly Benediction, 297, 1939, 1945
- Priestly Laws, 151
- Priestly source, see P or Priestly source
- primogeniture, see first-born
- prison as exilic metaphor, 1357, 1372, 1439
- prisoners, restrictions on taking, 411, 412
- promise and possession of the land of Israel, 1, 2 (see also Canaan, Canaanites, and Canaanite conquest); Deuteronomy, 356, 358; Exodus, 102, 160, 161, 187; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1666, 1689, 1701–5; Genesis, 8, 10; inheritance (naḥalali) of Israel, 463, 486–87; Joshua, 462, 501; Lamentations, 1601; Leviticus, 252, 274; milk and honey, land flowing with, 111, 187, 258, 310, 317, 472, 587, 1571; Numbers, 283–84, 351–54; Psalmic theme, 1283, 1309, 1322, 1330, 1373, 1377, 1399–1401, 1422, 1432; Torah equated with, 1422
- pronunciation of biblical Hebrew, 2063–64
- "proof saying" in Ezekiel ("then you shall know that I am the LORD"), 1053, 1056, 1097, 1110
- property: crimes against, 152, 155–56; land (see land)
- prophets and prophecy, 2024–25, 2030–31, 2036–37 (see also specific prophets); Abraham as prophet, 40, 43; apocalypticism/eschatology, 2037; apocalypticism, 460–61; authoritativeness of prophetic books for Chronicles author, 1825; Baal and Asherim, Elijah's contest with prophets of, 714–16; canonical division of Bible, Prophets as (see Nevi'im); catchwords, use of, 943; Chronicles' view of, 1757, 1758, 1762, 1764, 1781, 1783, 1788, 1793, 1795, 1796, 1820, 1823, 1824–25; concept of prophecy in Israelite religion, 457–61; Daniel as one of prophetic books, 461, 1140, 1642; David as prophet, 1707, 1762; Deutero-Isaiah's argument from prophecy as to power of God, 872, 874, 878, 879, 880, 886, 895; Deutero-Isaiah's prophetic mission, 885, 886; Deuteronomistic History, importance to, 676; Deuteronomic laws regarding, 395, 407–9; disciples of the prophets, 727–28, 733, 737; ecstatic prophets, 578, 579, 599; end of, 461, 1244, 1264, 1268; enslavement in Egypt, prophecy of, 36, 37; Ezekiel, 1043, 1045–56, 1063–64, 1106; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1694; false prophecy (see true and false prophecy); First Isaiah on prophecy, 796–97, 823, 843; Former Prophets, 451, 453–54, 455, 668; gifts given to prophets, 577; haftarah, 1932–33; historical epochs of development of, 458–61; inter-cyclical/mediatory role, 184, 378, 713, 772, 1059, 1392–93; interpretation and study replacing, 461; Jeremiah on (false) prophets, 933, 955, 968–76, 979, 980, 982, 984; Jonah, questions raised by, 1199, 1202–3; Judges, 517–22, 523, 550; 1 Kings, 676, 708, 711, 713, 718–20, 723–24; 2 Kings, 731, 737, 751, 753, 763, 769, 771–75; Latter Prophets, 451, 455–56; messengers of God, as, 113; messianic prophet, 408; Moses as prophet, 111, 146, 386, 395, 407, 408, 450, 1162; multiple re-reading and study, prophetic books meant for, 1140, 1165, 1176, 1193, 1234, 1250–52; older forms of divination separated from, 395; parables, use of, 1162; perversion of office in Micah, 1210–11; Proverbs, 1493, 1494; Psalms, 1347, 1384, 1392–93, 1395, 1408, 1425; Rabbinic Judaism, 461; rarity, claim of, 567; reason for God's use of, 151; religion of Bible and, 2030–31, 2036–37; replacement by scriptural study and interpretation, 461; Sarah as prophet, 44; Saul as prophet, 579, 599; social-scientific prophets and prophecy (continued)

analysis, 2094; succession of prophets, 408, 450, 727; symbolic acts (see symbolic acts); Torah, prophets as spokespersons of, 408; true and false prophecy, distinguishing (see true and false prophecy); the Twelve (see Twelve Minor Prophets); Urim and Thummim as akin to, 1674; women prophets, 771, 782, 1065, 1140, 1696 (see also individual female prophets) proscribed things, 279

proscription, see herem

proselytes, 1412, 1414

prostitution: cultic prostitution, 77, 335, 419–20, 706, 707, 724;

Deuteronomy, 419–20; Ezekiel, 1068, 1069, 1084; Genesis, 77–78; Hosea, 1143–52, 1156–58; idolatry, as term for, 1363; inheritance of sons by a harlot, 535; 1 Kings, 678–79, 706, 707, 724; Leviticus, 255, 259; male prostitutes, 706, 707, 724; Micah, 1206–7; Nahum, 1223; Numbers, 334; Proverbs, 1452, 1459, 1484, 1493, 1497; Rahab in Joshua, 462, 463, 466–67, 473, 650, 1330; Solomon's judgment of the child and two prostitutes, 678–79

protasis, 1544

Provençal School of medieval interpretation, 1885–86, 1892–93

Proverbs: anthropological nature of, 1448, 1449; authorship, 1282, 1447–48, 1494, 1497; contrasting character types in, 1463; dating, 1447; divisions of, 1448–49; Ecclesiastes in opposition to, 1603; introduction, 1447–49; multiple genres contained in, 1448; Psalms quoting, 1415; Song of Songs and, 1456, 1460; text and annotations, 1449–98; title, 1447; Torah, tension with, 1447, 1448, 1491, 1493; wealth and poverty as themes of, 1336, 1410, 1454 (see also economic justice, poverty, and social welfare; wealth); wisdom literature, 1276–77, 1447, 1448

proverbs, 1063, 1070, 1071, 1447, 1519, 1614

providence (God's will manifested in "accidental" or every-day occurrences), 575, 577, 705, 724

psalm, concept of, 2097

Psalms: authorship, 1281–82, 1283, 1669; Chronicles, relationship to, 1713, 1743–45, 1757; collection of poetic prayers, 1280; dating, 1282; David, connection with (see David); Ezra-Neemiah, 1675; Ezra's authorship, 1669; Habakkuk, 1226, 1227, 1231–33; historical rise of, 2057; history of Israelites as didactic theme of, 1283, 1367, 1399–1404, 1433, 1434; history, use of, 452–53, 1376; introduction, 1280–84; Jeremiah, 947, 949, 967; Jonah, 1201; literary personae, 1283; literary styles, use of, 1282–83; liturgy and prayers, use in, 1946–48; musical entertainment, 1281, 1282, 1289, 1337, 1374, 1435; oldest psalms, 1282, 1299; Qumran community and Dead Sea Scrolls, 1280, 1281, 1284, 1322, 1375, 1408–9, 1432, 1442, 1928; Samuel, correction of books of, 560; Song of Hannah, 563; Song of Thanksgiving (David), 660; structure of collection, 1280–81; superscriptions (see superscriptions of Psalms); text and annotations, 1284–1446; transmission of, 1296, 1299, 1406; types and themes, 1283; use in liturgy and as prayers, 1280, 1282, 1283

Psammetichus II, 1072

pseudepigrapha, 358, 1000, 1279, 1640, 1836–38, 1866

Pseudo-Philo, 1507, 1866

Pseudo-Rashi, 1812

psychoanalysis and critical scholarship, 2002, 2092

Ptolemaic Dynasty, 1641, 1645, 1662–63, 2057–59

public reading of Torah, 439, 479, 1699–1700, 1930–32

Pul (Tiglath-pileser III), 755–58

puns and punning: 2 Chronicles, 1793, 1795; dialects in Hebrew, 2064; Jeremiah, 935; midrashic interpretation and study, role in, 1870; paronomasia, 166–67, 1793, 1795; Ruth, 1580; Song of Songs, 1564 purification and purity, 2041–47; building of Second Temple in Haggai, 1246; childbirth, 233–34, 1522; Chronicles, 1812; corpse pollution, 205, 232–47, 234, 241, 321–22, 345–46, 2041–47; David in 1 Samuel, 601, 602; dietary laws, 229–32, 397–98 (see also dietary laws); disposal of and cleansing from impurity, 205, 232–47, 234, 241, 321–22, 345–46; disputes over, 2046–47; Ecclesiastes, 1617; Exodus, 146–47, 175, 176, 179; Ezekiel, 1042, 1052, 1053, 1055, 1057, 1060–61, 1068, 1083, 1112, 1117, 1127, 1131; Ezra-Neemiah and return from exile, 1679, 1709, 1711; Genesis, 22; health and hygiene, 2041, 2043; holiness and ritual purity, 2044–45; Isaiah, 797, 852, 890; Israelite camp in wilderness, cultic purity required for, 293; Jeremiah, 938, 952; Joshua, 468, 505; Josiah's reforms, 772–73; Lamentations, 1590, 1591; land polluted by transgressions, 354; Levites, cleansing (ritual purification) of, 301–2; Leviticus, 205, 283; menstruation (see menstruation and menstrual blood); military camps, rules for, 419; moral purity/impurity, 2045–46; Pesah/Passover, 302–3; ritual purity/impurity, 2042–46; sexual relations, 146, 147, 205, 233, 242, 601, 602; sinfulness and impurity, 2042–43; skin conditions (tzara'at), 232, 234–41, 308–9, 421, 625, 735–36, 759; social-scientific analysis, 2094; social subordination and, 2041–42, 2043–44; symbolic nature of avoidance behavior, 2041; terminological preference for purity over cleanness, 2041; unsolved murders, atonement for, 413–14 purification offerings (hat'at): administration of sacred donations, 749; calendar of the public cult, 341; Ezekiel's visions and, 1056, 1125, 1127, 1131; impurity, disposal of, 233, 238–41, 242; Job, 1561–62; Psalms, 1327; red cow ritual, 321–22, 1112; rituals for, 211–16, 219, 226, 228

Purim, 142, 1104, 1276, 1305, 1563, 1623–39, 1933

Pythagoras, 1302

Q

Qimḥi (Kimḥi), see Radak

qinah, see laments

Qoheleth(h) Koheleth, see Ecclesiastes

quail, 140, 307, 433

ha-Qallir, Eliezer, 1510, 1525, 1554

quarrelsomeness in Psalms, 1454, 1458, 1474, 1478, 1481, 1488, 1489, 1493, 1496, 1497 queen mothers, 707–8, 747, 953, 983, 1652, 1789

"Queen of Heaven," 939–40, 1014, 2031

Queen of Sheba/Sheba, 695–96, 904, 937, 1116, 1360, 1361, 1506, 1513, 1779

Qumran community and Dead Sea Scrolls, 1865, 1920–28; additional biblical materials not found in Masoretic Text, 1924–25; archeological discoveries, 1920–21; books of the Bible found, 1922; canonicity, 1927–28; Chronicles, 1713, 1715, 1751, 1756, 1788, 1817; Community Rule, 2047; critical scholarship and, 1924–27, 2089–90; Daniel, 1926; Deuteronomy, 361, 376, 379, 380, 381, 395, 419, 438, 441, 444; early editorial stages, texts representing, 1925; Ecclesiastes, 1605; Esther, 1625, 1925–26; Genesis Apocryphon, 1836–38, 1839, 1866; Habakkuk, 1227; halakhic letter, 1844; harmonized editing, 1923; Hebrew as language, 2064; historical figures, indirect reference to, 1662; Isaiah, 784; Jeremiah, 919; Job, 1501, 1533; Joel, 1172; Josephus on Qumran and Essenes, 2089; Jubilees, Book of, 379, 1788, 1822, 1836–37, 1839, 1840, 1866; Kethuvim ("Writings"), 1275, 1279; Leviticus, 264; Malachi, 1272; Manasseh, prayer of, 1817; Masoretic and proto-Masoretic (proto-rabbinic) scrolls, 1921–24, 1927–28, 2077–78; matres lectionis, 1927; modern publication of, 1918; mystery, interpretation of, 1657; Nabonidus, Prayer of, 1649, 1652, 1655; Nevi'im (Prophets), 457; nonaligned texts, 1923; Numbers, 297, 304, 334, 344; penitential theology, 1659; peshtarim found at, 1839; proto-Samaritan texts, 1923;

Psalms, 1280, 1281, 1284, 1322, 1375, 1408–9, 1432, 1442, 1928; purity, 2046–47; Reworked Pentateuch, 1923, 1928; 1 Samuel, 562, 565, 566, 571, 580, 582; 2 Samuel, 625, 642, 666; script, 2063; Septuagintal and proto-Septuagintal texts, 1922–25, 1928, 1977, 2077–78; sigla or conventional scholarly notations for, 1920; source materials, 1925–26; Targum, 1924, 2008; Teacher of Righteousness, 1840, 1878; Temple Scroll, 1770–71, 1836, 2046; texttype classification, 1921; texts quoting or using Scripture, 1924; translations, 1923–24; Twelve Minor Prophets, 1140–41; vocalized manuscripts, 2064; War Scroll, 304, 1662 quotation marks lacking in ancient Hebrew, 1533

R

Rabbah, Seder Olam, 1167, 1213, 1219

Rabbinic Bible, see Miqra'ot Gedolot

Rabbinic Judaism: Abraham, early life of, 30; afterlife/personal resurrection, 834, 1114, 1665; Chronicles reflecting concerns of, 1716; Daniel, critique of, 1642, 1646, 1650; Davidic authorship of Psalms, 1282; Decalogue, enumeration of, 375, 376; Exodus, 105, 106–7; Ezra-Nehemiah and, 1669–70, 1672; Genesis, 9, 11; hammer shattering rock, importance of metaphor of, 975; interpretation and study, classical rabbinic, 1844–63; Joshua's continuity of leadership with Moses, 464; Judges, 509, 557; Ketuvim ("Writings"), 1276, 1279; law collections, resolution of discrepancies of, 151; Leviticus, 205–6; loyalty to God, 380; Oral Torah, 151, 163, 379; Pesah customs, 126; prophets and prophecy, 461; Psalms, 1365; purity laws, rational-ale for, 243; sermons, 939; Torah, 3, 5; Zechariah and messianism, 1250

Rabbinic ordination, 339–40

Rachel: Genesis, 53, 59–65, 68, 71, 72, 75, 88, 91; Hosea, 578; Jeremiah, 985, 989; Leviticus, 251; Numbers, 285; Psalms, 1372; Ruth, 1578; 1 Samuel, 578

Radak (R. David Kimḥi), 1885–86, 1893; 1 Chronicles, 1714, 1762; 2 Chronicles, 1778, 1819, 1823; Ezekiel, 1055, 1063, 1072, 1076, 1082, 1094, 1098, 1125, 1131; Genesis, 51; Habakkuk, 1231; Hosea, 1144, 1146, 1156, 1164; influence of, 1895; Isaiah, 867, 910; Jeremiah, 986, 1004, 1008, 1041; Judges, 52; 1 Kings, 672, 702, 725; 2 Kings, 728, 734, 738, 754, 772, 774; Malachi, 1268, 1271; Micah, 1207, 1209, 1215; Miqra'ot Gedolot, 1899; Obadiah, 1197; philosophy, 1957; Psalms, 1281, 1286–88, 1291, 1295–98, 1302, 1318, 1320, 1330, 1332–36, 1344, 1346–48, 1368, 1370, 1389–93, 1406, 1408, 1411–15, 1424, 1428–31, 1435; 2 Samuel, 652, 662, 665; Zechariah, 1256, 1264; Zephaniah, 1235, 1236 radical monotheism in Kings, 711, 714, 716, 727–28, 736, 745, 770

Rahab the Jericho prostitute, 462, 463, 466–67, 473, 650, 921, 1330

Rahab the mythical monster, 888, 1098, 1379–80, 1382, 1505, 1517, 1538, 1559, 2026 rain (see also entries at water): Aph-Beri, 1517; fasting tradition associated with, 954; psalms praying for, 1312, 1351, 1353, 1354, 1377, 1428

rainbow, 22–25, 1048

Ralbag (R. Levi ben Gershon; Gersonides), 1524, 1894, 1895, 1958–60; Kings, 711, 738, 754, 760, 767; Miqra'ot Gedolot, 1899

Ramah (R. Meir Abulafia), 1780, 2081, 2084

Rambam, see Maimonides, Moses

Ramban (R. Moses ben Naḥman; Naḥmanides), 1892–93; Exodus, 132, 148, 151, 171, 180, 185, 186; Genesis, 16, 22, 31, 43; influence of, 1895; Jonah, 1199; Leviticus, 245, 263; Malachi, 1268; Miqra'ot Gedolot, 1874, 1899; mysticism, 1981; Numbers, 289, 306, 334, 355

Rameses II and city of Rameses, 104, 107, 108, 129

Ramoth-gilead, 722–24, 1791

ram's horn, see shofar

ransom, 1468

rape, 69–71, 417–18, 550–52, 640–41, 966, 1022, 1296, 1590

Rappoport, Solomon, 1903, 1904

Rashbam (R. Shemuel ben Meir), 1888–89, 1890, 1891; Ecclesiastes, 1612, 1616, 1621; Exodus, 132, 166, 170, 184; Genesis, 52, 54, 56; Job, 1510, 1546

Rashi (R. Shlomo ben Isaac), 1887–88; Chronicles, 1778; Daniel, 1657; Deuteronomy, 350, 383; Ecclesiastes, 1606, 1607, 1609, 1613, 1615, 1616, 1618, 1622; Esther, 1637; Exodus, 127, 154, 162, 165, 170, 180, 183, 193; Ezekiel, 1051, 1059, 1063; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1673; Genesis, 13, 20, 22, 30, 49, 54, 59, 75, 90; Habakkuk, 1236; Haggai, 1245; Hosea, 1144, 1156, 1164; influence of, 1892, 1895, 1897, 1900; Jeremiah, 1008, 1039, 1041; Job, 1510, 1533, 1545, 1556; Joel, 1167, 1171; Jubilees, Book of, 1836; Judges, 519, 523, 540; Kara's critique of, 1891; 1 Kings, 709, 712, 724; 2 Kings, 738, 761, 772; Leviticus, 225; Micah, 1211; Miqra'ot Gedolot, 1874, 1899; Nahum, 1222; Numbers, 284, 287, 288, 294, 297, 326; Psalms, 1287, 1296, 1298, 1332, 1333, 1335, 1336, 1338, 1360, 1365, 1366, 1368, 1386, 1392, 1409, 1412, 1428, 1437; Ramban compared to, 1892; Ruth, 1584; 1 Samuel, 607; 2 Samuel, 607, 640, 656, 659, 665; translations of Bible, 2009, 2011; Zechariah, 1253, 1256 rationalism, 3

Rava, 1854–55, 1856, 1858 reader-response criticism, 2091–92 reading of Torah, public, 439, 479, 1699–1700, 1930–32

real property, see land

Rebekah, 47, 48–58, 60, 62

Rechabites, 745, 998–99, 1007

red cow ritual, 321–22, 1112

Red Sea, see Sea of Reeds/Red Sea

redaction, see composition, compilation, and redaction redemption: debt cancellation and redemption of land, 159, 270–73, 398–400, 997–98, 1584–85, 1694–95; Esther, 1629; first-born things, 131–33, 157, 190, 279, 289, 290, 398, 400, 1078; grace, divine, 1715, 1785, 1817; Habakkuk's promise of, 1232–33; Isaiah, 864, 868, 894–95, 898, 907, 911; Job, 1529; Jonathan (son of Saul), 588; jubilee year, 271; Pidyon ha-ben (Redemption of the Son), 106, 133; proscribed things, 279; Psalmic theme, 141, 1336, 1370, 1430; Ruth, 1582–85; unfaithfulness, following (see unfaithfulness, punishment, repentance, and return to the Lord)

redundancy, see multiple versions of same event; repetition as stylistic device

Reeds, Sea of, see Sea of Reeds/Red Sea

refrains, 2100

refuge: cities of refuge, 352–54, 373, 409–10, 486, 493, 497, 498, 723; sanctuary, claims of, 153, 352–54, 674, 676

Rehoboam, 669, 700–707, 1781–87 religion, 2021–40; lack of biblical word for, 1627; Near Eastern religion generally (see Mesopotamian mythology, history, and religion); religious syncretism (see idols and idol-worship)

remarriage, 416–17, 420

remembering/forgetting: book of the Lord/scrolls of remembrance/book of life, 434, 609–10, 1254–55, 1274, 1327, 1344, 1437, 1665; Deuteronomy, 370, 377, 384, 385; Exodus, 110, 132; Ezekiel, 1071; Genesis, 23; Judges, 562; Lamentations, 1596, 1601, 1602; Leviticus, 276; Psalms, 1424, 1435–36

"remnant," the: Ezekiel, 1053; First Isaiah, 782, 797, 805, 808; Jeremiah, 957, 988, 1011, 1013

Renaissance, 3, 1896–97, 1963, 2009, 2093

rending of garments, see mourning rituals

- reparation offerings ('asham): Ezekiel, 1125; Hosea, 1059–60; 2 Kings, 749; Leviticus, 211–12, 216–17, 219–20, 239, 254; Numbers, 293
- repentance, see unfaithfulness, punishment, repentance, and return to the Lord
- repetition as stylistic device, 2100, 2101, 2104; 2 Chronicles, 1786; Psalms, 1283, 1289, 1295, 1303, 1305, 1334, 1348, 1349, 1388; Song of Songs, 1564, 1566
- Rephaim, 485, 1750
- reputation of God: Ezekiel, 1112, 1293; Isaiah, 881
- resident aliens, see foreigners/strangers/resident aliens, treatment of
- rest, day of, see ceasing from work
- resurrection, see afterlife/personal resurrection
- retellings, biblical, 1836–38
- return from Babylonian exile, 2055–56; decree of Cyrus allowing (see Cyrus of Persia and decree of Cyrus); Deutero-Isaiah promising, 861–62, 865, 869, 882, 887–90, 895, 896, 915; Deutero-Isaiah responding to disappointments following, 783, 882–85, 892–94, 899–900, 903–7; exclusivism following (see exclusivist nature of later Israelite identity); Ezekiel, 1042, 1061–62, 1071, 1097, 1107–18; Ezra-Nehemiah, 341, 1666, 1672–74, 1680–84; First Isaiah, 852; genealogy and list of returnees, 1672–74; Jeremiah, 920, 972, 985, 987, 991, 992–96, 1041; local people contrasted with returnees (see people of the land); Psalmic theme, 1313, 1352, 1378, 1403, 1404, 1414, 1424, 1428, 1443, 1445; questioning of returnees' claims, 1677–78; Ruth, 1579; small number of original returnees, 883, 884, 885, 890, 892, 896, 900, 1672, 2056; vessels of Temple, restoration of, 1671, 1683
- Reuben/Reubenites: Chronicles, 1723; Deuteronomy, 446; Genesis, 60, 72, 76, 84, 85, 86, 88, 95, 96; Joshua, 487; Judges, 520, 521; Numbers, 285, 305, 316, 326, 347–49, 352
- Reuel, 109–10, 305 (see also Hobab, Jethro)
- Revelation Day, 224–28, 244
- revenge/vengeance, 443–44, 1486, 1488
- Reworked Pentateuch*, 1923, 1928
- rhetorical features in Job's proclamation of innocence, 1544
- rhetorical questions: Ezekiel, 1072; Jeremiah, 924, 960; Job, 1512, 1515, 1516, 1520, 1524, 1544, 1545, 1555; wisdom literature, typical of, 1512, 1524
- rhetoric as story-telling device, 1786
- rhetoric of inner-biblical interpretation, 1829–31
- riches, see wealth
- ricinus plant in Jonah, 1203
- riddles, 542, 1071, 1080, 1319, 1456
- Rift Valley, 2061–62
- righteousness: Ezekiel, concept of divine righteousness in, 1042, 1048; Ezekiel, individual righteousness theory of, 1066–67, 1073–75, 1080; Isaiah, 900; Jeremiah, concept of divine righteousness in, 920, 929; Job, as paradigm of human righteousness, 1505; Job, theme of deserved/undeserved human suffering in, 1499, 1504, 1509–15, 1530–37, 1544–46, 1555; Psalms, 1294, 1382, 1409–10; Teacher of Righteousness (Qumran community), 1840, 1878
- ritual purity/impurity, 2042–46
- Roman empire, 2060; Bar Kokhba rebellion, 333–34; crucifixion, 46; Edom associated with, 850–51, 1174, 1193, 1196; Esau as cipher for, 57; Habakkuk, identified with Kittim in, 1227; Jerusalem, destruction of, 1257; Judaism and, 1840, 1844, 1866; Kittim identified with, 334; philosophy, 1949–51; siegeworks at Masada, 413; tablet of Decalogue, depiction of, 163; Temple, destruction of (see Temple, destruction of [Second Temple])
- romantic love, 60, 544–45, 597, 599, 949, 1332, 1564
- rooster in Job, 1556
- Rosenzweig, Franz, 1971–72, 2010
- rose of Sharon, 1568
- Rosh Ha-Shanah (New Year's day): Deuteronomy, 434; Exodus, 125, 165, 186; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1699; Genesis, 24, 44, 62; Jeremiah, 1009; Job, 1525; 1 Kings, 689; 2 Kings, 779; lack of specific biblical reference to, 2023; Leviticus, 265; Micah, 1218; Numbers, 304, 342; piyyutim, 1937; Psalms, 1311, 1327, 1334, 1344, 1374, 1382, 1392, 1395
- Rosh Ḥodesh (new moon festival), 599, 1131–32, 1374, 1397, 1410
- Rossi, Azariah di, 1962–63
- royal psalms and psalms dealing with human kingship, 1283, 1285, 1304–5, 1312, 1327, 1332, 1348, 1360, 1371, 1373, 1377, 1393–94, 1408, 1414, 1432, 1436, 1440
- Royal Zion theology, 1371
- royalty, see entries at king
- Russia, mass emigration of Jews from, 107
- Ruth: authorship and dating, 1563, 1579; Deuteronomy, 421–22; Egdon and Ehud in Judges, 517; Ezekiel, 1068; Haggai, 1245; historical fiction, viewed as, 1278–79; introduction, 1578–79; principles and themes, 1279; purity/impurity issues, 2047; Shavuot liturgy, 1275; text and annotations, 1579–86

S

- Saadia ben Joseph, Gaon: biblical interpretation and study, 1878, 1879, 1880, 1898, 1908; Exodus, 105, 145, 189; Isaiah, 867, 891; philosophy, 1952–53; Psalms, 1411; translations of Bible, 2009, 2010
- Sabbatean heresy, 1899
- Sabbath: blessing of children, 297; ceasing from work on, 127, 149–50, 182, 191–92, 342; creation stories, 2, 12–13, 14, 150; cultic songs in Chronicles, 1756; Decalogue commandment, 148, 149–50; desecration of, 313–15; Esther and Purim, 1625; exodus from Egypt, connection to, 377; Ezekiel, 1077, 1131–32; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1704, 1710; food collected and prepared prior to, 139, 140–41; harvest, precedence over, 190; Isaiah, 780, 797, 896, 900; Jeremiah on observance of, 962; Jewish tradition of, 107; legal materials regarding, 2, 102, 283; Lekha Dodi (Sabbath eve hymn), 377, 1575; Leviticus, laws in, 253, 255, 263–64; offering on, 340–41; psalms recited on, 1386, 1387; Shabbat ha-Ḥodesh, 125; Tabernacle construction and, 179, 182, 190
- Sabbath Bereshit, 1931
- sabbatical year, 14, 159, 205, 269–70, 276, 398–400, 439
- sackcloth and ashes, see mourning rituals
- sacred pillars and posts, see pillars and posts, sacred sacrifice, 2023 (see also child sacrifice, human sacrifice, and specific types of offering); agricultural festivals, 159–60; animals acceptable and unacceptable for, 261–62; Antiochus IV Epiphanes, 1663, 1664; 'Akedah (binding of Isaac), 45–47, 54, 1205, 1768; blemish, sacrificial animals required to be without, 125, 1270; blood, 207–8, 210, 212, 213, 238, 239, 249; bread dough offering (halah), 313–14; burnt offerings (see burnt offerings); Cain and Abel, 18; calendar of the public cult, 340–43; centralization (see centralization of worship); cereal or grain (see minḥa); cutting animals in half and passing between them, 35–36, 998; daily offering (tamid), 177, 218, 226, 340, 1131–32, 1168; desecration of offerings, 260–61; Deuteronomy, 357; distinction between ritual sacrifice and secular slaughter for food, 392–94; donations for, 277–80; eating or not eating offerings, 207, 209, 211, 213, 214, 218, 219–20, 222, 260; Eli's sons, improper sacrifices of, 565; exodus from Egypt for purposes of, 123; Ezekiel's Temple regulations regarding, 1131–33; Ezekiel's use of sacrifice imagery for destruction of Jerusalem, 1058, 1060–61; fat/suet, 210–11; fire offerings, 487; first-born,

- dedication and redemption of, 131–33, 157, 190, 279, 289, 290, 398, 400, 1078; first fruits, 210; First Temple, dedication of, 693; fowl or birds, 207, 208, 215; freewill offering (nedavah), 208–11, 220, 253, 262, 343, 749, 1132, 1342; gender differences, 207, 218, 220; Gideon and the angel, meal of, 524; gift offerings/food-gifts ('ishlah), 208–11, 223; God not actually consuming sacrifice, 167, 169–70, 178, 314, 340, 1338; God's lack of need for, 913; graduated offerings, 215; Holiness Collection, 258–62; Jephthah and his daughter and human sacrifice, 537–38; Jerusalem, transfer of Ark to, 630; Job, 1503, 1561–62; kings performing, 584, 703, 1408; Lamentations on passing of, 1593; leaven, prohibition of offering, 209–10; Leviticus, 205, 206–28; liturgy and prayers as substitute for, 1358, 1438; livestock requirement, 207; Malachi on improper cultic practice, 1268, 1270–71; male vs. female animals, 1271; morality's primacy over sacrifice, 590, 785, 871, 914, 1153, 1176, 1186, 1215, 1287, 1338, 1471, 1611; multiple places of (see centralization of worship); Noah, 22, 24; Numbers, laws contained in, 283–84, 313–15; Passover sacrifice, 46, 126, 401, 1679, 1821–22, 1832–33; pleasing odor to God, providing, 208, 209, 211, 214, 314, 340; priestly consecration/ordination, 175–77, 222–28, 1127; Proverbs, 1452–53; Psalms, 1287, 1326–27, 1338, 1340, 1371; purification offerings (hat'at) (see purification offerings); reparation offerings ('asham) (see reparation offerings); return from Babylonian exile, 1674, 1684; Sabbath offering, 340–41; sacred donations, administration of, 749; Samson's birth announced by angel, 541; Saul, kingship of, 581; slaughter laws, 247–49; Tabernacle, annual purification of, 244–45; thanksgiving, sacrifice of (todah), 220, 253, 261, 1338, 1393; theophany, calling forth, 207, 225–27; unleavened bread accompanying, 126; votive offering (nedar), 220, 253, 262, 343; well-being (see well-being, offerings of); Zephaniah, sacrificial meal in, 1236
- Sadducees, 2046
- salt, 210, 320, 435, 533
- salvation, see redemption
- Samaria: alternative name for the Northern Kingdom, 1153; Isaiah's prediction of downfall of, 836; Kings, 710, 711, 726, 738, 740, 745, 758, 760, 774; Micah, 1206; Oholah and Oholibah, 1084
- Samaria Ostraca, 337, 2064
- Samaritan Pentateuch, 114, 129, 139, 178, 381, 395, 446, 1923
- Samaritans: Chronicles reflecting Judah's relationship with, 1781; pit altars used by, 170
- Samson, 295–96, 517, 534, 539–46, 582
- Samuel, books of (1 and 2 Samuel): authorship, 560–61; Chronicles' relationship to, 1713; corruptions in, 559–60; dating, 560–61; division of Samuel into 2 books, 558, 619; introduction, 558–61, 619; Josiah's narrative compared to style of, 770; literary character of, 559; narrative structure and focus, 558–59, 619; text and annotations, 1 Samuel, 561–618; text and annotations, 2 Samuel, 619–67
- Samuel the prophet, 144, 327; birth story, 561–65; conflict with and rejection of Saul, 584–92; death of, 613; dedication to Eli at Shiloh, 289; distinguished lineage compared to other prophets, 579; intercessor/mediator status, 1392–93; judge, status as, 558, 573; Judges foreshadowing story of, 550, 551, 553; Judges supposedly written by, 509; leadership status of, 573–74, 581–84; monarchy, opposition to, 574–75, 579, 581–82; Psalms, 1392–93; revelation of God to, 567–68; Ruth, authorship of, 1563; sons, corruption of, 574; Witch of Endor, 408, 613–14
- Sanballat the Horonite, 1690, 1691, 1692
- sanctuary, claims of, 153, 352–54, 674, 676 (see also cities of refuge)
- Sanhedrin, 1057, 1059, 1244
- sapphire/lapis lazuli in Ezekiel, 1048, 1059
- Sarai/Sarah, 30–47, 62
- sarcasm: Amos, 1183; Deuteronomy, 441–42; Hosea, 1150; Isaiah, 794, 812–14, 837; Job, 1518, 1545, 1559; 2 Samuel, 630, 659, 715
- Sardinia, 696
- Sardis, 1193, 1196
- Sargon I, 109, 822
- Sargon II, 758, 767, 812
- Satan/ha-Satan, 329, 665, 698, 1253, 1502–6
- satire, 1187, 1647
- Saul: asses, looking for, 575–79; Chronicles' view of, 1715, 1732, 1733, 1734, 1758–60, 1792, 1798; conflict with Samuel and rejection by God, 584–92; David, jealousy and persecution of, 592, 596–618; David's kingship, acknowledgment of, 607; David's magnanimity towards, 606–8, 611–12; death of, 618, 619–21; Esther, 1624, 1637; foundation of monarchy, 574–83; Gibeonites, breaking of oath with, 658; historicity, 2053; judges as model for, 580; Judges foreshadowing story of, 531, 550, 551, 552, 556, 557; map of kingdom of, 576; mental illness of, 592, 596, 603; military conquests of, 580–81; prophet, as, 579, 599; Psalmic references to, 1344; Psalms, 1372; Samuel, depiction in books of, 558; Witch of Endor, 408, 613–14
- savora'*, savora'im, 1845
- scapegoat (Azazel), 244–45, 246
- schadenfreude, 1486, 1512, 1520
- scoffers, 1470, 1481
- scorpions, 701
- scoundrel in Proverbs, the, 1457, 1459, 1474, 1496
- scouting/spying out of Canaan: Danites, seeking of territory by, 548; Joshua, Rahab and the spies in, 462, 464, 466–67, 472; Moses, spies sent by, 309–12, 347, 365, 464, 472, 1077–78
- scouting/spying out of walls of Jerusalem by night (Ezra-Nehe-miah), 1690
- scribal emendations (Tiqunei Soferim), 567, 1228, 1252
- script, 1669, 1681, 2063
- scrolls (see also entries at book): Dead Sea Scrolls (see Qumran community and Dead Sea Scrolls); Ezekiel's eating of scroll, 1049; Judean Desert Scrolls other than Dead Sea Scrolls, 1920, 1928, 2066; megillot (five scrolls), 1563, 1933 (see also Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther); Zechariah's vision of flying scroll, 1254–55
- Scythians, 26, 929
- sea, see waters
- Sea of Galilee, 448, 2061
- Sea of Reeds/Red Sea: Deuteronomy, 323, 324, 325; Exodus on Moses' parting of, 133–38; Ezra-Nehe-miah on Moses' parting of, 1702; Joshua, 468–70; Psalms on Moses' parting of, 1434; Solomonic trade routes, 695, 724; Song of Songs tied to events of, 1565
- Second Isaiah, see Deutero-Isaiah
- Second Temple period: Abraham, early life of, 30; adultery, abandonment of water ordeal for, 294; agricultural festivals and calendar adjustments, 703; building of Second Temple (see Temple, rebuilding of); census ransom amount and impost for Temple maintenance, 180; Chronicles reflecting, 1715, 1731, 1744, 1756–57, 1781, 1791; circumcision, 38; Deuteronomy, 360–61, 375–76, 395–96; doorposts and mezuzot, 381; early nonrabbinic interpretation, 1836–44; Ezra-Nehe-miah reflecting, 1675, 1683; food offerings to dead, 425; Genesis, view of, 11; Haggai, building of second Temple in, 1243–48; Hebrew as language in, 2066; identification of unnamed with known characters, 1507; Kethuvim (“Writings”) dating from, 1275; loyalty to God, duty of, 395–96; Malachi on improper cultic practice, 1268, 1270–71; monotheism, development of, 375–76; 'olam haba' (the next world), belief in, 563; prophecy,

Second Temple period (continued)

development of, 460–61; psalmody, importance of, 1280, 2057; pseudepigraphy, 358; purity disputes, 2046–47; sects, proliferation of, 402; Shavuot and Exodus, 106; Shema, 379–80; Song of Songs reflecting, 1565, 1570; tefillin (phylacteries), 381; Zechariah, building of second Temple in, 1249

Seder, 125, 128, 132, 1931

Seder Olam Rabbah, 1167, 1213, 1219

sedition and treason, Jeremiah accused of, 938, 968–69, 979, 998–1003 seduction, 156, 1451, 1456, 1615, 1634–35

Sefardi, see Sephardic tradition

“seize the day” mentality, Ecclesiastes, 1619–20

Selah: Habakkuk, 1231; Psalms, 1286, 1331

Seleucids, 1641, 1642, 1645, 1655–65, 2057–60 self-control, temper, and anger, 1454, 1458, 1474, 1478, 1481, 1488, 1489, 1493, 1496, 1497 self-deification, 1095, 1654 self-imprecation, 1290, 1544

semen, discharge of, 241, 242

Semitic languages, 2062–63

Sennacherib: Chronicles, 1814–17; Isaiah, 806, 825, 827, 853–58;

Kings, 762, 765, 766, 767, 769; Micah, 1207; Nahum, 1221;

Obadiah, 1192; Psalms, 1333, 1365

Sephardic tradition: Ezekiel, 1077, 1082, 1131; Genesis, 77;

Hosea, 1143, 1164; interpretation and study, 1899, 1900, 1908;

Masoretic Text (Tanakh), 2080, 2082, 2083; Obadiah, 1194, 1196; philosophy, 1961; Psalms, 1305

Septuagint (LXX), 2005–8, 2058; 1 Chronicles, 1712, 1713, 1722,

1737, 1745, 1746, 1758; 2 Chronicles, 1780, 1786, 1788, 1789,

1792, 1794, 1798, 1817; classical philosophy and, 1949; Dead

Sea Scrolls, 1922–25, 1928, 1977, 2077–78; Deuteronomy, 357, 361, 380, 381, 395, 396, 429, 433, 438, 441, 444, 446; division of Samuel and Kings into two books, 451; Esther, 1624, 1625; Exodus, 102, 108, 129, 178, 191; Ezekiel, 1051; Ezra–Nehemiah, 1667, 1689; Ezra–Nehemiah divided into two books by, 1276;

Genesis, 68, 98; Isaiah, 798; Jeremiah, 919, 933, 977; Joshua, 465; Judges, 511, 513, 532, 542, 545; Kethuvim, 1276; Kings, books of, 668, 682, 702, 707; Lamentations, 1589; Leviticus, 225, 270; Malachi, 1268, 1272; megillot (five scrolls), 1563;

Micah, 1210; Numbers, 281; Philo interpreting, 1840, 1842;

Proverbs, 1459; Psalms, 1280, 1286, 1291, 1297, 1304, 1312,

1313, 1365, 1375, 1390, 1391, 1392, 1403, 1411, 1442; Ruth,

1579, 1581; Samuel, corruptions in books of, 560; Samuel, division into two books of, 558; 1 Samuel, 562, 565, 567, 570, 571, 578, 584, 587, 592; 2 Samuel, 625, 626, 664, 666; text criticism, 2071; Twelve Minor Prophets, 1141, 1174 sermons, 939, 1448, 1935–36

serpents (see also Leviathan): complaints of Israelites in the wilderness, 325–26; Hezekiah's reforms and Moses' bronze serpent, 761, 1814; Rahab the mythical monster, 888, 1098,

1379–80, 1382, 1505, 1517, 1538, 1559, 2026; rod of God, 113,

117; sea-serpent in Amos, 1191; temptation in the garden of Eden, 14–18

servant of the Lord in Deutero-Isaiah, 867, 868, 882–83, 890–92

Seth (Egyptian god), 109

Seth (son of Adam and Eve), 19–20

Seti I, 324

seven and seventy, see number seven (and multiples of seven) seven-eight sequence, 1619

sevenfold prostration, 68

seventy elders (Sanhedrin), 1057, 1059, 1244 sexually-transmitted diseases, 241, 625 sexual relations and behavior (see also specific behaviors and relations): Esther, 1623; Ezekiel, 1070, 1082, 1086; heat, metaphor of animals in, 926; idol-worship and sexual impropriety, association of, 1086, 1363, 1590, 1591, 2031; impurity, 146, 147, 205, 233, 242, 601, 602; nonprocreative, 77, 251, 252; perverse or improper, 26, 31, 42, 69, 127, 249–52, 256–58, 466, 550–52, 897 (see also prostitution); Proverbs, 1456, 1496; Ruth, 1583–84; Song of Songs, 1564–77; woman slave designated for marriage, 254

sexual roles/differences, see gender roles/differences

Sforno, Obadiah, 1896; Ecclesiastes, 1613; Exodus, 188; Genesis, 97; Miqra'ot Gedolot, 1874, 1899

Sabbat, see Sabbath

Shadal (Samuel David Luzzatto), 781, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1910

Shaddai/El Shaddai, 37, 58, 71, 94, 98, 115, 1313, 1385, 1581

Shallum, 755, 775

Shalmaneser III, 722, 741

Shalmaneser V, 758, 1160, 1675

Shalom Aleikhem, 849

shalosh regalim (three pilgrimages), 106

Shamash, 429, 430, 1302

shame culture, ancient Israel as, 1315, 1432

Shamgar, 517, 520, 543

Shammai, House of, 1844–45, 1855, 1856

Shaphan family, 980, 1000, 1006, 1016, 1057

Sharav/Sharab (desert wind), 964, 1034, 1076

Shavuot (Feast of Harvest, First Fruits, Weeks): Chronicles, 1788;

Deuteronomy, 402, 423–25; Exodus, 106, 159; Leviticus, 263,

264; Numbers, 340, 341; Psalms, 1410; Ruth, 1563, 1579; Ruth used in liturgy of, 1275

Sheba and Queen of Sheba, 695–96, 904, 937, 1116, 1360, 1361, 1506, 1513, 1779

Shecaniah, 1685

Shechem: Chronicles, 1781; Deuteronomy, 425–26; Exodus, 134;

Genesis, 59, 69–71, 95, 99; Joshua, 478–79, 493, 496, 501, 505, 506, 557; Judges, 530–34, 557; 1 Kings, 700; Psalms, 1347–48 sheepshearing as cause for celebration, 608, 641

Shelah-Lekha, 466

shelamim, see well-being, offerings of Shema, 1942–43; Deuteronomy, 356, 360, 379–81; Exodus, 136;

Ezra–Nehemiah, 1694; Joshua, 502; Leviticus, 252, 274; Numbers, 315; Zechariah, 1266

Shemini 'Atzeret, festival of, 1554

Shemot, 102

Sheol (see also afterlife/personal resurrection, and other specific names for the underworld): Abaddon, 1471, 1491; afterlife/bodily resurrection beliefs and, 834; Deuteronomy, 442; Ec-clesiastes, 1617; Gehinnom/Gehenna, 916, 940; Habakkuk,

1229; Hell differentiated from, 442, 916, 940, 1337; Hosea, 1164; Isaiah, 794, 834, 916; Job, 1514, 1518, 1537; Jonah, 1201;

Moriah, 45, 1768; mountains resting on pillars set in, 1461;

Numbers, 317; 'olam haba' (the next world), 563; perdition, place of, 1380, 1381; the Pit, 1092, 1096, 1101, 1105, 1312, 1314, 1325, 1357, 1380, 1396, 1440; Proverbs, 1450, 1495;

Psalms, 1285, 1289, 1292, 1298, 1300, 1312, 1314, 1315, 1322,

1326, 1336, 1337, 1342, 1360, 1379, 1380, 1384, 1396, 1412,

1413, 1430, 1437, 1438, 1439, 1440; 1 Samuel, 563, 614; Song of Songs, 1576

shepherds: Abigail and Nabal, 608–9; defenselessness, as metaphor in Isaiah for, 846; Ecclesiastes, 1622; Egyptian aversion to, 87, 92, 120; messenger role in Isaiah, 862; pastorally-based rituals, 125–26; Song of Songs imagery, 1570 shepherds, God and kings as: Amos, 1177; Ezekiel, 1079,

1108–10; Hosea, 1150; Isaiah, 909; Jeremiah, 971, 972; Lamentations, 1595–96; Micah, 1209, 1212; Psalms, 1307–8, 1337, 1371, 1372, 1389, 1393; 2 Samuel, 666; Zechariah, 1260, 1262

Sheshlachi as cipher for Babylon, 978, 1037

- Sheshbazzar, 1666, 1678 shibboleth/sibboleth, 539, 2064 shield imagery, Psalms, 1288, 1290, 1318, 1377, 1382
 Shiloh: Jeremiah's family and Elide priesthood background, 917–18, 921, 939, 956, 979; Judges, 550, 556–57; Leviticus, 208; Numbers, 343; Psalms, 1370, 1379; Samuel, 561, 568, 570, 572, 631
 Shimei, 654, 677
 the Shining One, 812–13
 Shishak, 700, 706–7, 1784
shiv'ah, 100, 618
 Shoah (Holocaust), 949, 1048, 1320, 2010 shoe, casting, 1348
shofar (ram's horn): 'Amidah prayer, 1939; Deuteronomy, 304, 342; Hosea, 1151; Joshua, 473; Judges, 526–27; Leviticus, 265, 270; Psalms, 1334, 1382, 1392; 1 Samuel, 591 shofetim, 508 (see also Judges (book)); judges, period of; tribal chieftains) shortest book in Bible (Obadiah), 1193 shoshannim (lilies), 1332, 1356, 1372 shouting, 265, 1392, 1393
 showbread/bread of display/Bread of Presence, 167, 179, 201, 267, 1124 shuffling the feet as sign of unquiet soul, 1457
 Shunammite's son, Elisha's revivification of, 732–34
 Shushan, 1104, 1626, 1636
 Shushan Purim, 1104, 1637 sickness, see disease/plague/pestilence Siddur (rabbinic prayerbook), 1937–48 (see also liturgy and prayers)
 Sidon, 682, 711, 827, 981, 1019, 1097, 1258, 1753 siege campaigns and siegeworks, 413, 431, 738, 740, 762–66, 777, 935, 1594, 1599 signet (ring) of the Lord, 972, 1072, 1248 signs: curses/misfortunes as, 430–31; Daniel as interpreter of, 1649–50, 1672; Elijah, 711; Elisha, 730, 732–37, 751; fleece, Gideon's sign of, 525; Isaiah, 916; Moses' confrontation with Pharaoh, 111–12, 117; Priestly thinking about Sabbath, 182; Psalms, 1379; quail in desert as, 140; rain sent in response to prayer of Samuel, 583; Zerubbabel as interpreter of, 1672
 Sihon: Deuteronomy, 366, 368; Jeremiah, 1020; Joshua, 466, 479, 487, 505; Judges, 535, 536, 537; Numbers, 326, 327; Psalms, 1433
 Sikkuth, 1187
 silence in the Temple, 1050, 1089, 1230 silence of Job before God, 1558 silent prayer, 562
 Siloam Tunnel and Pool, 768, 826, 1133, 1816
 Simeon, 61, 70, 71, 72, 77, 85, 87, 95, 96, 446, 495, 511
Simhat Torah, 464, 1931, 1932 simile, 1564
 sin: inherent sinfulness of human nature, 1339, 1525; purity / impurity and sinfulness, 2042–43; repentance following (see unfaithfulness, punishment, repentance, and return to the Lord) sin offerings, see purification offerings Sinai/Horeb, 3–4; Chronicles' reticence regarding theophany at, 1716; Deuteronomy, 356, 363, 370, 371, 433; Elijah in 1 Kings, 716–17; Exodus, 102, 103, 105, 110, 130, 133, 142, 145–83; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1681, 1702; final encampment at, 282; Genesis, 59; Leviticus, 203, 269, 280, 281, 350; presence of all Jews past and present at, 371; Psalms, 1283, 1354; Song of Songs tied to events of, 1565, 1570 single combat of champions, 593, 622 single place of worship, see centralization of worship Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sirach or Ecclesiasticus), 562, 784, 1277, 1416 Sisera and Jael, 517–22
 sister-wife motif, 31, 42–43, 54, 60, 1571 skin conditions (tzara'at), 232, 234–41, 308–9, 421, 625, 735–36, 759, 1804–5 slander, 234, 309, 1082, 1474 slaughter laws, 247–49, 254, 392–94 (see also dietary laws) slavery (see also indentured service): African-American understanding of exodus, 107; bonded or indentured service, 62, 152–53, 270, 272–73; corvée (forced labor), 107–8, 412, 575, 639, 683, 694, 702; Egypt, enslavement of Hebrews in (see enslavement in and redemption from Egypt); Esther, 1634; Exodus laws regarding treatment of, 152–55; foreign vs. Israelite slaves, 131; gender differences, 152–55, 254, 399, 414; Gibeonites, 479–80; Hagar and Ishmael, 36–37; Israelites vs. non-Israelites, 272; Jeremiah's oracle on, 997–98; Job, 1514, 1536, 1545; Joseph sold into, 74–76, 89; Joseph's enslavement of Egyptians, 93; kingship, as consequence of, 575; Lamentations, 1601; manumission in sabbatical year, 398–400; Proverbs, 1493, 1496; return from Babylonian exile, economic crisis upon, 1694; return of escaped slaves, 419, 617; Sabbath rest, 377; Solomon's construction projects, 694–95 sleep, prayer recited on waking from, 1597 slings, 595
 sloth vs. industry, 1457, 1478, 1486, 1489 smelting furnace as metaphor, 938, 1083
 Smith, William Robertson, 2041, 2093
 Social Darwinism, 2027 social order: Ecclesiastes on, 1611, 1612, 1618, 1619; justice viewed as, 1612, 1748; monarchy, establishment of, 2053; purity concepts and social subordination, 2041–42, 2043–44; tribes and chieftains, 2093–94
 social-scientific criticism, 2093–94 social welfare, see economic justice, poverty, and social welfare sociology and biblical interpretation, 2088, 2093–96
 Socrates, 1532
 Sodom and Gomorrah: Amos, 1184; Deuteronomy, 443; Ezekiel, 1070–71; Ecclesiastes, 33–34, 39–42, 46, 88; Isaiah, 785; Jeremiah, 932, 973, 1026, 1032; Job, 1520, 1545; Jonah, 1202; Judges, 550, 551; Lamentations, 1599; Psalms, 1294
 sodomy, 251, 551
 Solomon: administration and prefectures, 679–80; ascent to kingship, 671–77; Azariah compared to, 754; Chronicles, 1721, 1753–64, 1765–81, 1812; David and Solomon as parallel figures in Chronicles, 1753, 1754, 1762, 1765; death of, 700; Ecclesiastes, authorship of, 1563, 1605–7; expansion of Israelite territory by, 1778–79; Ezra-Nehemiah referring to, 1677; Gibeon, dream at (see Gibeon, Solomon's dream at); historicity, 2052–53; income and wealth of, 681, 696, 1766, 1779–81; Jehoshaphat compared to, 1795; judgment of the child and two prostitutes, 678–79; Kings, books of, 669; palace of, 686; political and marital alliances, 677, 694–96, 697, 1766, 1779, 1785; Proverbs, as author of, 1447, 1449; Proverbs, authorship of, 1282; Psalms, 1282, 1360; religious practices, 677–78, 697–98, 773; Song of Songs, authorship of, 1563; Sukkot celebrated by, 342; Temple, building and dedication of, 149, 166, 185, 631, 681–94, 1763; Temple, devotion to cultus of, 1765; throne of, 1780
 Solomon, Wisdom of, 1949 son of Adam, Ezekiel addressed as, 1048 son of man in Daniel, 1656–57 song, concept of, 2097
 Song of the Ark, 306
 Song of Deborah, 326, 517–22, 1348, 2101

- Song of Hannah, 563 Song of Jonah, 1201–2
 Song of Moses, 437, 440–45
 Song of the Sea, 136–38, 326, 517, 967, 1337, 1368, 1370, 1389, 1944–45
 Song of Songs: allegorical/theological understanding of, 1565–66; authorship and dating, 1564–66; Genesis Apocryphon, 1838; introduction, 1564–66; Passover liturgy, 1275, 1563, 1566; Proverbs and, 1456, 1460; Psalms, 1332; text and annotations, 1566–77
 Song of Thanksgiving (David), 660–63
 Song of the Women of Israel on David and Saul, 596, 603, 615 Songs of Ascents, 1281, 1424–33 sons of God, 1313
 “sons of the gods,” 1506 sons of the Most High, 1375 sons, slaying of (see also child sacrifice): Absalom’s vengeance, revolt, and death, 640–53; Moses, rescue of, 108–9; plague slaying first-born sons of Egyptians, 113, 118, 124–28; sons of Hebrews, murder of, 108, 113, 124
 sophistry, 795
 source-critical method, 6, 7, 85, 124, 1914, 2085–86 sources (see also modern source theories): “annals” mentioned as sources, 669, 700, 776, 1712, 1764; Book of Jashar, 326, 481; Book of the Wars of the Lord, 326; Josiah’s discovery of ancient text, 462, 770–72, 1699, 1818–20, 2031 sovereignty, see entries at king
 Soviet Union, mass emigration of Jews from, 107
 Spain, 696, 1048, 1196, 1361, 1880–84, 1885, 1896, 1953–61, 2009 (see also Tarshish) speculative thought, Jewish belief not based on, 146 speech impediments: Job, 1512; Moses, 112, 115 speech, virtue of reticence in: Ecclesiastes, 1612, 1619; Job, 1521, 1526, 1547; Proverbs, 1467–68, 1475–76, 1481, 1487, 1489, 1493 spices in Song of Songs, 1567, 1571, 1577 Spinoza, Benedict (Baruch), 3, 1884, 1901, 1909, 1962, 1963–65, 1969, 1970, 2085 spirit and body, Ecclesiastes suggesting distinction between, 1621 the spirit of the Lord, 515, 543, 578, 714 spirits/demons, 126, 408, 442 spirits, summoning (necromancy), 407–8, 533, 613–14, 774, 801, 1402, 1817, 2026 (see also magic and sorcery) spitting, 309
 spoils of war, 70, 346, 411, 412, 465, 476, 478, 520, 522, 529, 707, 1637 spouses, see marriage spying out of Canaan, see scouting/spying out of Canaan stanzas, 2099–2100 stars: daytime, defining, 1694; divinities, viewed as, 831, 1506, 1513; special appearance of star, 333–34; Venus/Aphrodite (morning star), 813, 939–40, 1014, 1452 starvation, see famine stealing/theft, 150, 155, 156, 252, 293 steles, memorial, see memorial stones and steles stichography, 2097–98 “still small voice,” 1048, 1510 stinginess, 1483
 stones, memorial, see memorial stones and steles stoning, 155, 311, 315–16, 415, 417, 476, 702 storm, God in, 974, 1337, 1517, 1555 (see also theophany) strangers, see entries at foreign straw, brickmaking without, 114 strophes, 2099–2100
 structuralism, 2091
 study of Torah, see interpretation and study suet/fat, 210–11, 221, 229, 565
 Suez, Isthmus of, 133, 139 suffering: acceptance of (see discipline and correction, acceptance of); alienation resulting from suffering in Job, 1528; creation, Jeremiah’s depiction of suffering of, 931; Holocaust (Shoah), 949, 1048, 1320; illness, due to (see disease/plague/pestilence); Jeremiah’s life as model for Jerusalem’s and Judah’s suffering, 958; Job, theme of deserved/undeserved human suffering in, 1499, 1504, 1509–15, 1530–37, 1544–46, 1555; Job, vindication of righteous in, 1528, 1529, 1539, 1561–62; Lamentations on, 1597; vicarious suffering, 891, 909, 1715 Sufi mystics, 1885, 1890, 1894 suicide, 25, 618, 619, 710
 Sukkot (Feast of Booths, Feast of Ingathering): central festival, as, 1266; Chronicles, 1777; Deuteronomy, 402–3, 439; Ecclesiastes, 1276, 1563, 1605; Exodus, 106, 129, 159; Ezekiel, 1127, 1131; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1669, 1674, 1700; Genesis, 69; Haggai, building of Second Temple in, 1246; Jeremiah’s inversion of harvest images of, 942; Job, 1554; Joshua, 464; 1 Kings, 689; Leviticus, 263, 265–67; Numbers, 340, 342–43; Psalms, 1312, 1334, 1351, 1353, 1374, 1377, 1398, 1410; water, ritual of pouring out, 573; Zechariah, 1250, 1266
 Sumerian King List, 20
 sun and sun worship, 1058, 1060, 1302–3, 1545 superscriptions: Ezekiel, 1046; Isaiah, 784, 787, 809; Psalms, 1281, 1332, 1343, 1391, 1406, 1439 surrogate motherhood, 61, 72 swine/pigs, 229 symbolic acts: Ezekiel, 1050–53, 1062–63, 1080, 1087–91, 1114; Jeremiah, 952–53, 963–67, 981–83, 992, 1039; precursors of Jeremiah, 952 Symmachus, 2007
 synagogues: origins of, 1061–62, 1929–30; role of Bible in, 1929–37
 syncretism, see idols and idol-worship
 Syria, see Aram/Aram Damascus (Syria)
 Syriac Peshitta Bible, see Peshitta
 Syro-Ephraimitic War, 757, 797–801, 803, 806, 808, 819, 1806

T

Ta’anit, 778

Tabel, son of, 797–99

Tabernacle/Ark of the Covenant, 102–4, 203–4, 282, 2022–23; activities in, 171; anointing with oil, 297; Ark of the Pact, known as, 141, 166, 181; battle, carrying of Ark into, 568, 637; Bethel, Ark of the Covenant at, 553; construction of, 191–200; creation story and, 13; David brings Ark to Jerusalem, 629–32, 1739–43; destruction of Temple, fate of Ark in, 928; different tents of meeting, distinguishing, 439; divine Presence in (see divine Presence); divine Presence in Tabernacle/Ark/Temple, 178, 186, 191, 202, 207, 274, 691; donations to construct, 192–93, 197; Ezekiel’s divine throne chariot based on Ark, 1043, 1045–47; final preparation and consecration, 297–98; fire, perpetual, 218; First Temple, installation in, 689–90; God’s instructions for building and furnishing, 163–71, 178–79, 180–82; Holy of Holies, 164, 166, 167, 1053, 1055, 2022–23; Ingathering, Feast of (Feast of Booths, Sukkot), 267; Israelite camp in wilderness, plan of, 286–87; Joshua, Ark of the Covenant in, 464, 468, 475; kabbalah and Jewish mysticism, 1988–89; Levites, guardianship and transport roles, 286, 288–89, 291–92, 319; Mt. Sinai as precursor of, 146–47; Philistines, capture and return of Ark by, 568–72; place of ark in march of Israelites through wilderness, 305–6;

- plan of, 164; portable Mt. Sinai, viewed as, 163; psalms associated with Ark, 1308, 1309, 1390, 1392, 1431, 1445, 1446; purification of, 233, 243–47; Sabbath observance and building of, 179, 182, 190; 1 Samuel, Ark of the Covenant in, 561, 567–72; setting up of, 200–201; Song of Songs tied to events of, 1565, 1570
- Tabernacles, Feast of, 703
- tahanim*, 1289
- talents, 694
- talion (“eye for an eye” / “measure for measure”): Chronicles, 1811–12; Deuteronomy, 411, 423, 431, 442, 444; Exodus, 154, 155, 157; Jeremiah, 998, 1038; Job, 1544–1545; Judges, 533, 542; Leviticus, 268–69; Psalms, 1301, 1312, 1320; 1 Samuel, 584, 590
- tallit (prayer shawl), 252, 315, 416, 1321
- Talmud, 9, 128, 151, 1139, 1244, 1846–48, 1891, 1892, 1951 (see also Babylonian Talmud; Jerusalem Talmud)
- Tamar (daughter of David), 640–41, 644, 1296
- Tamar, Onan, and Judah, 76–78, 79, 86, 420, 1245, 1578
- tamid* (daily offering), 177, 218, 226, 340, 1131–32, 1168
- Tammuz, 818, 944, 959, 1058, 1664
- Tanakh, see Masoretic Text
- tannaitic Rabbis, 1845
- Targum, 9, 128, 151, 1139, 1244, 1839, 1924, 1934, 2008
- Tarshish: 2 Chronicles, 1780, 1796; Ezekiel, 1093, 1116; Isaiah, 827, 916; Jeremiah, 946; Jonah, 1200; 1 Kings, 696, 724; Psalms, 1335, 1360
- tassels (tzitzit fringes), 254, 313–14, 315, 317, 356, 379, 416
- Tattenai, 1677–78, 1679
- taxation: census for purposes of, 284; Ezekiel, 1131; Ezra-Nehe-miah, list of returnees from exile in, 1672
- Teacher of Righteousness (Qumran community), 1840, 1878
- Teaching, book or scroll of, see “book/scroll of the Teaching”
- teaching or instruction, “Torah” understood as, 2
- teeth: cleanness as metaphor for famine, 1183–84; gravel, breaking teeth on, 1596
- tefilah* (prayer), 1298 (see also liturgy and prayers)
- tefillin (phylacteries): Dead Sea Scroll materials, 1924; Deuteronomy, 356, 376, 381; Exodus, 106, 132; Hosea, 1143, 1148; mourning, 1088; necklace metaphor in Proverbs, 1450, 1453, 1454, 1458, 1459; Numbers, 318
- tels (mounds of ruins), 484
- temper, anger, and self-control, 1454, 1458, 1474, 1478, 1481, 1488, 1489, 1493, 1496, 1497
- Temple: centrality to Israel and creation, 1114–15, 2022; centralization of worship in (see centralization of worship); Chronicles’ concern with cultus, 1715, 1751, 1786, 1809; consecration of First Temple, 1771; courts, inner and outer, 1770–71; creation story and, 13; Davidic role in cultus, 1707, 1734, 1753–55, 1758; dedication of First Temple, 689–93, 1771–77; divine Presence in Tabernacle/Ark/Temple, 178, 186, 191, 202, 207, 274, 691; elevated tank of First Temple, 687, 982; Exodus, references to Solomon’s Temple in, 149, 166, 185; Ezekiel, departure of divine Presence in, 1049, 1056–76, 1335; Ezekiel, return of divine Presence in, 1119, 1126; Ezekiel, Temple dimensions and structure, 1119–27; Ezekiel, Temple regulations, 1127–38; Ezekiel, vision of new Temple in, 1042, 1043, 1118–38; Ezra’s reading of Torah to people from site of Temple Mount, 1699; First Temple, 165; First Temple, building of (see Temple, building of); First Temple, destruction of (see Temple, destruction of); foreigners not allowed to enter, 1128; furnishings of first Temple, 686–89, 758, 982, 1040; gatekeepers, 1697, 1707, 1732, 1758; God’s lack of need for, 913; golden decorations of First Temple, 684, 689, 707; Hezekiah’s purging and rededication, 1056, 1808–10; Holy of Holies, 164, 166, 167, 1053, 1055, 2022–23; Jeremiah’s sermon in, 938–48; Josiah’s reforms, 770–73; Malachi on improper cultic practice, 1268, 1270–71; Moriah/place of Isaac’s sacrifice associated with, 45–46, 47, 1768; pilgrimage psalms (see pilgrimage to the Temple, psalms for); pillars (Jachin and Boaz) of First Temple, 687, 748, 982; plan of First Temple, 684, 1769; presence of Ark in First but not Second Temple, 568; Psalmic theme or setting, 1280, 1283, 1287, 1294, 1297, 1308, 1311, 1315, 1322, 1328, 1330, 1351, 1392 (see also pilgrimage to the Temple, psalms for; Songs of Ascents); religious system based on, 5, 357; repair and refurbishment, 749, 770, 1799, 1800; sacred donations, administration of, 749; Second Temple, building of (see Temple, rebuilding of); Second Temple, destruction of (see Temple, destruction of); Seleucid attempts to control Temple and raid treasury, 1641, 1663, 1664, 2060; silence in, 1230; Solomon’s devotion to cultus in Chronicles, 1765; The Song at the Sea, reference in, 136–38; Third Temple, hope for, 1118, 1269; three-room structure, 1122; Torah equated with, 1422; treasury and goods, use for ransoms, payments, and war funds, 707, 750, 758; wood provided to keep fires going, 1705
- Temple, building of (First Temple): David’s proposal to build Temple, 631–32, 665–67, 1745–47, 1748; site, divine selection of, 1751, 1752–53; Solomon’s building of Temple, 149, 166, 185, 631, 681–94, 1763, 1766–77
- Temple, destruction of (First Temple), 777–78, 2055; Ark, fate of, 928; disgrace, characterized as, 1691; Edom condemned for role in, 1174; Exodus, 205–6; Ezekiel, 1042, 1043, 1089; Jeremiah, 917, 919, 951, 998–1007, 1039–41; 2 Kings, 777–78; Lamentations commemorating, 1587, 1590–95; Psalmic theme, 1296, 1356–58, 1371–72; vessels removed by Nebuchadnezzar, 982, 1643
- Temple, destruction of (Second Temple), 2060; crown worn by grooms abolished as sign of mourning after, 1570; day of fasting and mourning extended to, 778; Lamentations expression believed to refer to, 1590; Obadiah, 1193; Psalmic theme, 1296; synagogues, origins of, 1061–62
- Temple, destruction of, traditional day of fasting and mourning for, see Tish’ah be’av
- Temple, rebuilding of (Second Temple), 2056; Ezekiel, return of divine Presence in, 1119, 1126; Ezekiel, vision of new Temple in, 1042, 1043, 1118–38; Ezra-Nehe-miah, 1666–67, 1669, 1674–79; Haggai, 1243–48; Isaiah, 904; Jeremiah, 920; Psalmic theme, 1313, 1352, 1358, 1378, 1390, 1395, 1414; Zechariah, 1249
- Temple, rededication following victory of Judah Maccabee: Ezekiel passages resembling, 1059; Psalmic theme, 1313
- Temple Scroll*, 1770–71, 1836, 2046
- Temple vessels: Belshazzar’s sacrilege of drinking from, 1651, 1652; removal by Nebuchadnezzar, 982, 1643; restoration of, 1671, 1683
- temptation in the garden of Eden, 14–18
- Ten Commandments, see Decalogue
- “Ten Days of Repentance” (“Aseret Yemei Teshuvah”), 1167
- Tent of Meeting (’ohel mo’ed), 164, 165, 178, 182, 187, 203, 439, 494, 502, 565, 1565 (see also Tabernacle)
- teraphim (household idols), 64–65, 88, 547, 599–600, 1260, 1346, 2022
- terror of God, 161
- terrors of old age in Ecclesiastes, 1620–21
- terreness as biblical poetic feature, 2098, 2100, 2101
- Tetragrammaton (יהוה): Deuteronomy, 413; Exodus, 111–12, 115, 137, 156, 188, 189, 190; Ezra-Nehe-miah, 1699–1700; Genesis, 15; Jewish translations of the Bible, 2018; kabbalah and Jewish mysticism, 1979–80, 1986, 1987; Micah, 1206; Numbers, 305; Paleo-Hebrew, written in, 2063; Psalms, 1338, 1386

- textual criticism, 1924, 1926, 2067–72
- thanksgiving: Chronicles, 1745, 1763; David's Song of Thanksgiving, 660–63, 1763; Isaiah, 808, 831, 833, 858; Psalms, 1283, 1284, 1291, 1313, 1314, 1327, 1351, 1353, 1360, 1403, 1412–13; sacrifice of (todah), 220, 253, 261, 1338, 1393; Sukkot, U.S.
- Thanksgiving modeled on, 342
- Thebes (No-amon), 1219, 1224
- theft/stealing, 150, 155, 156, 252, 293
- theodicy, see righteousness
- theophany: Amos, 1177, 1191; Chronicles, dedication of Temple in, 1772, 1773; clouds (see cloud, God in); Decalogue, 145, 227; Deuteronomistic History's understanding of, 691; dwelling-place of God in Psalms, 1285, 1294, 1335–36, 1436, 1446; exodus from Egypt as, 1411; Ezekiel, departure of divine Presence in, 1049, 1056–76, 1335; Ezekiel, divine throne chariot in, 1043, 1045–48, 1059–60, 1119, 1335; Ezekiel, return of divine Presence in, 1119, 1126, 1137; Habakkuk, 1226, 1231–32; Job, 1555–61; Joel, presence of Lord during exodus invoked in, 1173; Joshua, divine Presence in Ark, 475; Nahum, 1220; Psalms, 1300, 1312, 1313, 1337, 1367, 1392, 1398, 1400, 1411; sacrifice and sacrificial offerings, 207, 225–27; Sinai/Horeb, 145–48, 151, 1716; Song of Deborah, 519–20; Song of Moses, 445; Song of Thanksgiving (David), 660; storm, God in, 974, 1337, 1517, 1555; symbolic vs. real presence on earth, 691; Tabernacle/Ark/Temple, 178, 186, 191, 202, 207, 274, 691; visual experience of God, 162–63, 187, 188, 541, 1329; wrestling of Jacob with divine being, 67–68
- theophoric names, 285, 310, 525, 530
- thigh: best part of meat, 578; muscle in socket of hip, prohibition on eating, 68; oath on, 48
- Third Isaiah (Trito-Isaiah), chs 54/56–66: 783
- Third Temple, hope for, 1118, 1269
- Thirteen Attributes of God, 106, 189, 1596, 1597
- three (as number), 1342, 1505, 1654, 1684
- threefold cord, 1611
- threshing floors, 523, 666, 1156–57, 1578, 1583–84
- throne names of Judah's kings, 970
- throne upon which God sits, prayer as forming, 1305–6
- Thummim, see Urim and Thummim
- Tiberian Masorah and Masoretes, 2064, 2079–81, 2098
- Tibni, 709, 710
- Tiglath-pileser, 755–58, 798, 801
- Tiqqunei Sofetim* (scribal emendations), 567, 1228, 1252
- Tirhakah, 765–66, 769
- Tish'ah be'av (9th of Av): ashes, tradition of dipping hard-boiled eggs or bread in, 1596; Ezekiel, 1087; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1675, 1683; Hosea, 1143, 1164; Jeremiah, 939, 1009; Joel, 1168; 2 Kings, 777, 778; Lamentations, 1275–76, 1563, 1596, 1933; Malachi, 1275–76; Micah, 1205–6; Psalms, 1371, 1435; Second Temple's destruction, extended to, 778; Zechariah, 1256–57
- tithes and tithing, 279, 319–21, 346, 398, 1131, 1704–5, 1708, 1709
- "to everything there is a season" (Ecclesiastes), 1604, 1609–10
- Tobiah the Ammonite, 1691, 1692, 1697, 1709
- todah* (sacrifice of thanksgiving), 139, 220, 253, 262, 1338
- tolerance as virtue, 1793
- Torah (see also interpretation and study): accessibility of, 435, 436–37; Amos, 1180; authorship, 2–3, 363, 375; "book/scroll of the Teaching" in Joshua (see "book/scroll of the Teaching"); books contained in, 1 (see also Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy); Chronicles, 2, 1713, 1754, 1773, 1791, 1809, 1812, 1813, 1820, 1823, 1825; construction, compilation, and redaction, 6–7; dating, 5–6, 363, 367, 412; Deuteronomistic discourses on, 364, 370; Deuteronomy's incorporation into Pentateuch, 437, 445, 449, 450; Ezekiel's presupposition of priests as teachers of, 1051, 1129; Ezra-Nehemiah's role in understanding of, 2, 1666, 1669, 1670, 1672, 1674, 1679, 1684, 1699–1700, 1704–5; Ezra's knowledge of, 1672, 1680; Habakkuk, 1227; Hosea, 1149, 1155; introduction, 1–7; Jeremiah, 918, 926, 937, 938, 944, 960, 991, 993; Joshua's continuity with, 1, 8, 356, 359, 462, 464; Judges, 550; 1 Kings, 721; 2 Kings, 752; kingship, requirements of, 405, 406; law and legal material, 2, 4, 5; Malachi, 1268–69; modern source theories, 3–6; Moses and, 1, 2–3, 363, 437; Mt. Sinai, giving of Torah at, 2–3, 106, 163; narration out of chronological order in, 143; narrative in, 2; Nevi'im (Prophets), relationship to, 451, 458, 1141–42; Oral Torah, 151, 163, 379, 1244; origin and understanding of word, 1–2; plastered-over stones inscribed with, 425–26; prophets as spokespersons of, 408; Proverbs, tension with, 1447, 1448, 1491, 1493; Psalms, 1281, 1283, 1284, 1302, 1303, 1308, 1327, 1367, 1368, 1370, 1388, 1399, 1401, 1415, 1416, 1422, 1433, 1434; public reading of, 439, 479, 1699–1700, 1930–32; Reworked Pentateuch, 1923; Shema as oath to carry out precepts of, 380; Temple, monarchy, and promised land, equated with, 1422; text and annotations, 8–450; water references regarded as referring to, 138, 894; wisdom, identification with, 1277; writing of, 432
- Tosafists/Tosafot, 154, 1891–92
- Tosefta, 1847
- tower of Babel, 13, 29
- tranquility, negative connotation of, 1251
- Transjordanian settlements, 347–49, 465–66, 485–86, 487–88, 501–3, 1723
- translations of the Bible, 2005–20, 2069–70 (see also specific translations); early nonrabbinic interpretation, 1838–39; Qumran community and Dead Sea Scrolls, 1923–24; synagogue literature, 1934–35
- transliteration, 2063–64
- treason: Esther, 1630, 1634–35; Jeremiah accused of treason and sedition, 938, 968–69, 979, 998–1003
- tree of life, 14–18, 1453, 1469, 1471, 1641
- trees, cedar, see cedar and cedar trees
- trees, Jotham's parable of, 530–31
- trespass, 1731, 1805
- tribal chieftains: Chronicles' listing of, 1760; Deuteronomy, 403; Exodus, 151; Jephthah, 535, 536; Josiah's reforms compared to faithfulness of, 774; "judges" better translated as, 508 (see also Judges [book]; judges, period of); Numbers, 284–85, 292, 297, 318, 336, 352; social-scientific critical scholarship, 2093–94
- tribal groups in Gilead, 1347
- tribes of Israel (see also specific tribes/tribal ancestors): apportionment of lands of Canaan between (see apportionment of Canaan); Chronicles' listing of, 1718–20; Deuteronomy, 426–27, 445–49; Exodus, 162, 172; family/ancestral units, 475; Genesis, 8, 60–61, 95–98; heads of ancestral houses (groups smaller than tribes), 488; Joshua, 468, 475; Numbers, 283–84; postexilic territories according to Ezekiel, 1134, 1136, 1137; social-scientific critical scholarship, 2093–94; Solomon's prefects and, 679; stick or staff representing, 1114
- Trito-Isaiah (Third Isaiah), chs 54/56–66, 783
- true and false prophecy: Deuteronomy, 408–9; Ezekiel, 1063–66; Jeremiah on (false) prophets, 933, 955, 968–76, 979, 980, 982, 984; Jonah, 1202–3; 1 Kings, 723; Lamentations, 1594; Micah, 1210–11; 1 Samuel, 568; Zechariah, 1260
- trumpets, silver or metal, 342, 345
- trust/confidence in God: Jeremiah, 1007; Micah, 1216; Psalmic theme, 1286–87, 1297, 1311, 1316, 1333, 1341, 1343, 1344, 1349, 1385, 1425, 1426, 1427

truth and falsehood, see honesty/dishonesty

Twelve Minor Prophets (see also Amos; Habakkuk; Haggai; Hosea; Joel; Jonah; Malachi; Micah; Nahum; Obadiah; Zephaniah): apocalypticism, 460–61, 1142; chronological events in Nevi'im, 451; composition, compilation, and redaction, 457, 1140–41; conclusion of, 1268; historical setting, 1139–40, 1141; interpretation and study, 1140, 1141, 1165; introduction, 1139–42; order of Joel and Amos, 1174; theology of, 1141–42

twenty-four (as number), 1760

Tyre: Amos, 1180; 1 Chronicles, 1753; Ezekiel's oracles concerning, 1091–96, 1101; Isaiah, 827–28; Jeremiah, 981, 1019; Kings, books of, 627, 682, 711, 827–28, 1019, 1180, 1258, 1380, 1753; Nebuchadnezzar's failure to capture, 1044; Nebuchadnezzar's siege of, 1099; Psalms, 1380; Zechariah, 1258

tzara'at (skin conditions), 232, 234–41, 308–9, 421, 625, 735–36, 759, 1804–5 tzitzit fringes, 254, 313–14, 315, 317, 356, 379, 416

U

Ugaritic culture, see Mesopotamian mythology, history, and religion

"uncircumcised persons" as insult, 585, 594, 618

unclean and clean, 2041 (see also purification and purity) underpants, requirement that priests wear, 152, 174–75

underworld, see Sheol unfaithfulness, punishment, repentance, and return to the Lord:

Chronicles, 1785, 1817, 1818, 1824–25; contrition leading immediately to forgiveness in Chronicles, 1817, 1818; covenant between God and Israel, violation and restoration of, 182–91, 435–36; David's repentance for adultery with Bathsheba and murder of Uriah, 638–39; Ezekiel, 1042, 1048, 1059, 1062, 1075, 1076–87, 1118; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1685, 1690, 1701–5; forgiveness, concept of, 214, 435–36, 1309, 1311, 1316, 1324, 1378, 1430; God's responsibility for sins of people, 910; Hosea, 1149–65; Isaiah (Deutero-Isaiah), 870, 878, 880, 881, 894, 896–907, 910, 916; Isaiah (First Isaiah), 781, 782, 784–87, 794–97, 800, 819, 826, 829–30, 833, 835, 840, 842, 843, 847; Jeremiah, 923, 928, 929, 931, 937, 939, 941, 944, 948–54, 984, 993, 1012, 1013; Joel, 1167–75; Jonah, repentance as theme of, 1198–99; Judges, 508–9, 510, 513, 514, 520, 523, 534–35, 750; king, Israelite request for (1 Samuel), 574–75, 579, 581–82; Kings, books of, 669, 670–71; 1 Kings, 697–98, 701, 705, 711, 718–20; 2 Kings, 750, 758–59, 769, 771–72; Lamentations, 1590, 1591, 1596–97, 1601, 1602; Malachi, improper cultic and marital practices discussed in, 1268–74; marriage/divorce adultery motif, Ezekiel, 1067–71, 1084–86; marriage/divorce adultery motif, Jeremiah, 923, 926, 927, 928, 952, 953, 954, 958, 963, 971, 973, 988, 990, 995; Micah, 1205–18; Obadiah, 1193–97; Psalms, 1347, 1371, 1389, 1401–3; "Ten Days of Repentance" ("Aseret Yemei Teshuvah"), 1167; wilderness, complaints in (see complaining of Israelites wandering in the wilderness); Zechariah, 1249–67; Zephaniah, 1234–42

unintentional/intentional killing, see homicide unintentional/unknown sin, 217, 244, 1303

United Kingdom's Anglo-Jewish prayerbook (1890), 1938, 1947

United States: Exodus, interpretation of, 107; Jewish biblical interpretation in, 1910–19; Sukkot, Pilgrims' celebration of, 342; Thanksgiving modeled on Sukkot, 342 universalism: Chronicles, 1744; Deutero-Isaiah, 875–77, 883, 894, 903–4, 906, 915, 916; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1677; First Isaiah, 784, 804, 808, 820, 821, 828–32; Jeremiah, 1015; Malachi, 1271–72; Proverbs, depiction of wisdom in, 1461 unleavened bread and Festival of Unleavened Bread: Chronicles, 1680, 1811; Deuteronomy, 401–2; Exodus, 124–27, 132,

159, 176, 190; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1680; Joshua, 472; Leviticus, 263, 264, 341; Numbers, 341; Passover, combined with, 401–2 uraeus, 325

Uriah (husband of Bathsheba), 635–39, 665, 1338, 1750

Uriah (son of Shemaiah) (prophet), 980, 1001

Uriah the priest, 757

Urim and Thummim: Deuteronomy, 447; Exodus, 156, 171, 172, 173; Ezra-Nehemiah, return from exile in, 1673–74; Leviticus, 223, 268; Numbers, 340, 345; Proverbs, 1474; Samuel, 587, 605, 621

usury/interest, 157, 420, 1082, 1491

utopian future, see apocalypticism/eschatology; messianism; unfaithfulness, punishment, repentance, and return to the Lord

Uzziah, 788, 1144, 1176, 1804–5

V

variant texts, 2068–69, 2080–82

Vashti, 1623, 1626–27

vengeance/revenge, 443–44, 1486, 1488

Venus/Aphrodite (morning star), 813, 939–40, 1014, 1452 vernacular commentaries on the Bible, 1898–99 versions of the Bible texts, 2067–72 (see also specific versions) vicarious suffering, 891, 909, 1715

vigil, Pesah as, 129–30

Vilna Gaon, 465, 1905

vinegar, 1582

vines, see wine, grapes, vineyards, vines, and winepresses vines and vineyards, see alcohol and intoxication; wine, grapes, vineyards, vines, and winepresses violet-blue cord on fringes, 315

virginity, proof of, 417

visions: divine court in Isaiah, 796; young men in Joel seeing, 1172 visual experience of God, 162–63, 187, 188, 541, 1329

vocalized manuscripts, 2064

Voice, daughter of (bat qol/kol), 301, 1244

the Voice (divine name), 3–4, 33–34, 98, 110–12, 115, 301, 1244

Vorlage, 1922–23, 2006

votive offering (neder), 220, 253, 262, 343

vowel signs, 2064, 2079 (see also Masoretic Text) vows and oaths: Chronicles, 1824; Deuteronomy, 420; Ecclesiastes, 1612; Exodus, 148, 149, 156; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1676, 1686, 1704; Genesis, 48; Job, 1538; Joshua, 480; Judges, 537–38, 556; 1 Kings, 672–73; 2 Kings, 738; Numbers, 284, 293, 343–44; Proverbs, 1479; Psalms, 1431, 1435; 1 Samuel, 562, 588, 610

Vulgate, 2008, 2009; Chronicles, 1769, 1788; Exodus, 191; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1667; haplography and Dead Sea Scrolls, 1926; Kethuvim, 1272; Kings, books of, 668; Lamentations, 1589; Numbers, 304; Samuel, division into two books of, 558; text criticism, 2072

W

Wadi Murabba'at, Scrolls found at, 1920, 2066, 2078

walls of Jerusalem: circumambulation of city walls, ceremony of, 1336; rebuilding of, 1667, 1669, 1689–92, 1696–97, 1708

"wandering Aramean" creed, 423–24 war and peace (see also specific wars): booty/plunder/spoil, 70, 346, 411, 412, 465, 476, 478, 520, 522, 529, 707, 1637; census for military purposes, 180, 284, 666; champions in single combat, 593, 622; champions, single combat of, 622; Deuteronomy, 370, 411–13, 431; Ezekiel, 1054, 1055, 1080–81; holy war (see herem); Jeremiah, 956; Lamentations' use of imagery of, 1591, 1592, 1595; Leviticus, 275–76; military camps, rules for, 419; Numbers, 345–46; plowshares, beating of swords into, 1211;

- war and peace (continued) wilderness sojourn, military organization of Israelites in, 284–85, 286–87, 364; wisdom in war, 1480
- Warren's Shaft, 627
- Warrior, Divine, see Divine Warrior
- War Scroll, 304, 1662
- Wars of the Lord, Book of, 326
- wash, 1570, 1573, 1574, 1575
- watchmen as metaphors, 824, 907, 937, 1043, 1050, 1103, 1106
- water: animals living in, 229–30; drowning as metaphor, 1356, 1598; Gideon's army of lappers of, 525–26; good and bad types of water in Proverbs as metaphors, 1488; living or running, 322; ordeals by, 185, 294; prophecies compared to, 895; ritual of pouring out, 573; Torah, as metaphor for, 138, 894; well as metaphor for good wife/marital sex, 1456
- water of bitterness/poison cup of God's wrath, 185, 295, 977, 1347, 1365, 1532, 1596
- waters (ocean) (see also chaos): creation of, 13–14; dangers of sailing, 1404; personified sea in Job, 1517, 1538; primeval battle between YHWH and the dragon-like sea, 1444–45, 2026 (see also Leviathan); Psalms, 1283, 1300, 1313, 1317, 1333, 1382, 1392, 1397; surface of earth floating on, 149, 372; Yam (Yamm) the sea deity, 1514, 2026
- water shortages, 138, 142, 323–24, 325, 335, 711–16, 954–63
- Ways of Horus, The, 133
- wealth: Ecclesiastes, 1603, 1608, 1611, 1612–14; Isaiah, 789, 793, 804; Proverbs theme, 1336–37, 1410, 1454, 1466, 1468, 1469, 1472, 1474, 1480, 1481, 1483; Psalmic theme, 1336–37, 1410; Psalms and Proverbs, 1410
- weaning, 562, 1430–31
- Weber, Max, 2093
- weddings, see marriage
- Weeks, Festival of, see Shavuot
- weighing deeds or hearts (Egyptian Book of the Dead), 1349
- weights and measures, 255–56, 290, 423, 682, 1130, 1190, 1465, 1479, 2105
- well-being, offerings of (shelamim): Exodus, 162, 176, 177; Ezekiel, 1131; Jeremiah, 962; Joshua, 478; 1 Kings, 693; Leviticus, 210–11, 220–22, 225, 248, 253, 264; Numbers, 314, 329
- Wellhausen, Julius, 1909, 2027, 2093
- Wette, Wilhelm de, 1910, 1911
- whirlwind, 727
- whoredom, see prostitution
- widows and orphans: Deuteronomy, 421, 422; Exodus, 157; Ezekiel, 1082; Jeremiah, 957; Job, 1544; 1 Kings, 712–13; Lamentations, 1589–92; Proverbs, 1472; Psalms, 1388, 1443; Ruth, 1580–86
- wilderness, Israelites' wandering in: Amos, 1186–87; camp in wilderness, plan of, 286–87; complaints during (see complaining of Israelites wandering in the wilderness); Deuteronomy, 363–70, 384, 433; Exodus, 138–42; Ezekiel, 1054, 1077, 1078, 1079; inter-Temple period, compared to time of, 1186; Jeremiah, 940, 943, 944, 988, 989; march through the desert from Sinai to Moab, 282–83; military organization of Israelites, 284–85, 286–87, 364; Numbers, 323, 338, 349–50; Psalms, 1370, 1374, 1389, 1400, 1402, 1404, 1434
- wilderness/wild animals, destroyed cities taken over by, 1211, 1239
- wilted flower metaphor: Isaiah, 836; Job, 1522, 1523
- wind, 964, 1033, 1046, 1076, 1255
- wine, grapes, vineyards, vines, and winepresses (see also alcohol and intoxication): association of grain with males and new wine with females, 1260; Ezekiel, 1067, 1071–72, 1076; Gideon
- hiding grain in winepress, 523; Hosea, 1156–57; Isaiah's use as metaphors, 792, 835, 908, 949, 951; Job, 1547; Lamentations, 1591; Song of Songs, 1566, 1567, 1575–77
- winking as sign of a scoundrel, 1457, 1464
- wisdom and wisdom literature, 1275–77, 2038–39; accessibility of divine wisdom, 435, 436; Apocrypha, 1277; Daniel, 1640, 1644, 1652; Deuteronomy, 358, 364, 371, 385, 420, 440; Ecclesiastes, 1276–77, 1603, 1605, 1607–8, 1614–19, 1622; Egyptian wisdom books, 1473 (see also Instruction of Amenemope); elders, respect for, 1547; Exodus, 158; Ezekiel, 1067; historical background, 2057; Isaiah, 838; Jeremiah, 941, 944, 963; Job, 1276–77, 1503, 1505, 1508, 1512, 1515, 1519, 1520, 1521, 1524, 1527, 1532, 1533, 1535, 1537, 1540, 1546, 1547, 1555; Joseph sold into slavery, 74; Lamentations, 1597; limits of wisdom in Ecclesiastes, 1615–17, 1618, 1622; metaphor and, 2103–4; pattern and repetition in nature applied to moral life, 1277; personification of Wisdom, 1461–62, 2103–4; Proverbs, 1276–77, 1447, 1448; Psalms, 1283, 1284, 1301, 1302, 1303, 1309, 1310, 1316, 1322, 1324, 1336, 1360, 1362, 1367, 1388, 1409, 1410, 1415–16, 1419, 1420; religion of Bible, development of, 2038–39; rhetorical questions typical of, 1512, 1524; thematic focus of, 1277; Torah and wisdom, identification of, 1277
- Wisdom of Ben Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), 562, 784, 1277, 1416
- Wisdom of Solomon, 1949
- Wissenschaft des Judentums, 1904, 1909, 1968
- Witch of Endor, 408, 613–14
- witness, divine, 536, 600
- witness requirements, 404, 721
- wives, see marriage
- women, see gender roles/differences
- wood provided to Temple priests, 1705
- wooden posts, sacred, see pillars and posts, sacred world-tree, 1641
- wormwood, 434, 1185, 1596
- wrestling of Jacob with divine being, 67–68
- writing: Deuteronomy, 432, 436; Esther, 1631; Exodus, 143, 145, 162; Hosea, 1156; Isaiah, 843; Jeremiah, 960; Joshua, 465, 494; text religion, 2029–31
- writing on the wall, Daniel's interpretation of, 1651–53
- "Writings," see Kethuvim

X

Xerxes I, 1626, 1641, 1655, 1659, 1667, 1676

Y

Yachya, Yosef Ibn, 1619

Yahaziel, 1795

Yahwist source, see J or Yahwist source

Yam the sea deity, 1514, 2026

Yavneh Yam inscription, 421

Yehoash (Solomon Bloomgarden), 2010

Yehud (Judah as Persian Province), 1243, 1244, 1268, 1666 (see also Judah [kingdom])

Yemenite Jews, 1143, 1164, 1194, 1205, 1269, 1896

Yemenite Masoretic Codices, 2080–81, 2083

YHWH, see Tetragrammaton

Yiddish, 375, 2010–11, 2012

Yigdal, 1942

Yom Kippur, see Day of Atonement

youngsters, God's choosing of, 591; Deuteronomy, 447;

Genesis, 19, 20, 53, 55–56, 68, 75; Judges, 523–24; Numbers,

316; 1 Samuel, 591

yovel (shofar or ram's horn), see shofar

Z

- Zadok the priest and Zadokites, 566, 634, 646, 654, 679, 917, 921, 1042, 1057, 1129, 1724
- Zalman, Elijah ben Solomom (the Vilna Gaon), 465, 1902–3
- Zebulun, 62, 72, 96, 97, 448, 495, 520, 521, 529, 801
- Zechariah (prophet and book): Chronicles, as figure in, 1801, 1802, 1804; dating, 1249, 1250; Ezekiel on murder of, 1087; Ezra's reading of Torah, 1699; Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, association of, 1249, 1250; introduction, 1249–50; Malachi, 1268; rebuilding of temple connected to prophecy of, 1677; structure, 1250; text and annotations, 1250–67
- Zechariah (son of Jeroboam II), 755, 1145
- Zedekiah: attempted escape from Jerusalem, tradition of, 1063; 2 Chronicles, 1824; Deuteronomy, 400; Ezekiel, 1051, 1071–72, 1076, 1080, 1081; Jeremiah, 917–18, 968, 981, 984, 996–97, 998, 1002, 1003, 1004; 2 Kings, 777; Lamentations, 1600; Micah, 1209
- Zelophehad's daughters, 337–39, 354–55
- Zephaniah: dating, 1234; introduction, 1234–35; structure, 1234–35; text and annotations, 1235–42
- Zerubbabel, governor of Yehud/Judah: Daniel, 1660; Davidic descent of, 1672, 1674; Ezra-Nehemiah, 1666, 1672, 1674, 1678, 1708; Haggai, 1244–45, 1248; Zechariah, 1253–54, 1256
- Zeus Olympios, 1664, 2060
- Ziba, 634–35, 647, 654, 655
- Zimri, 709, 710, 744
- Zion (see also Jerusalem): Amos, 116; Isaiah, 787–88; Joel, 117; meaning of term in Bible, 787–88; Micah, 1205; Psalmic theme, 1283, 1285, 1292, 1329, 1335, 1336, 1338, 1354, 1367, 1371, 1377, 1379–80, 1392, 1429, 1433, 1435; Royal Zion theology, 1371
- Zionism, modern, 928, 1566, 1944, 1990–2000
- Zipporah, 110, 113, 143, 308, 511
- Zophar, 1500, 1501, 1507, 1519, 1530, 1538
- Zoroastrianism, 2059
- Zunz, Leopold, 1667, 1904, 1911, 1968

THE NEW OXFORD

BIBLE MAPS

JEWISH STUDY BIBLE

- Map 1* The Land of Israel: Genesis – Deuteronomy
- Map 2* Possible Routes of the Exodus according to Biblical Tradition
- Map 3* The Land of Israel: Joshua, Judges, 1 Samuel
- Map 4* The Land of Israel: 2 Samuel – 1 Kings
- Map 5* The Land of Israel: 2 Kings
- Map 6* The Near East in the 8th century BCE
- Map 7* The Near East in the time of the Persian Empire
- Map 8* The Near East in the Hellenistic Period:
Ptolemaic & Seleucid Empires
- Map 9* Jerusalem in First and Second Temple Periods
- Index to maps

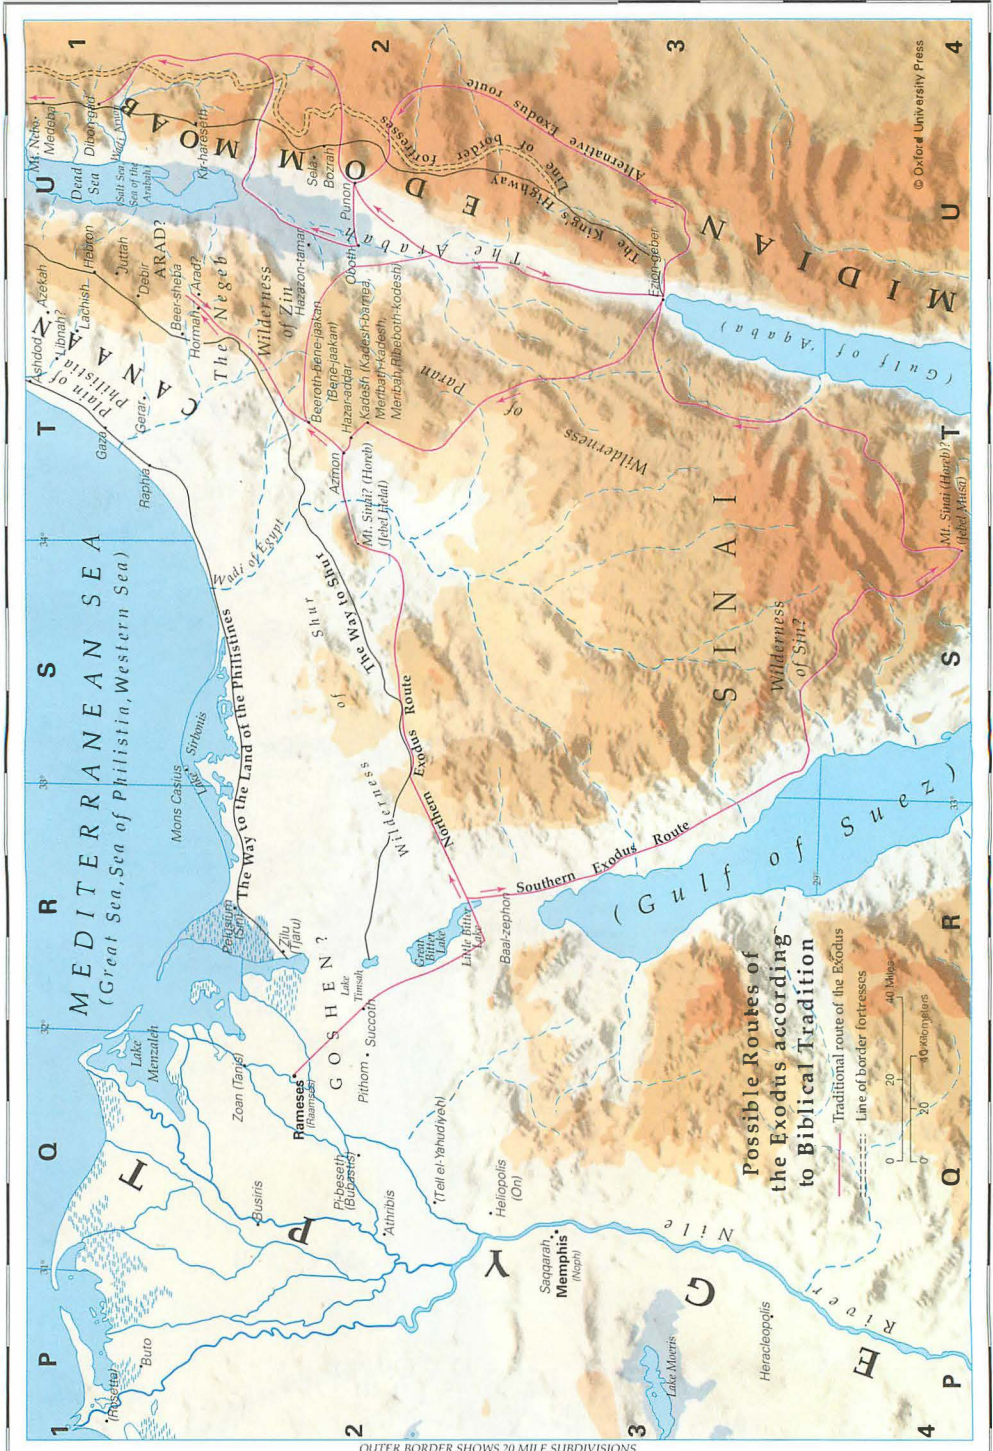

The Land of Israel: Genesis-Deuteronomy

GAD, etc. Tribes of Israel
EDOM, etc. Kingdoms said to have been encountered by the Israelites at the time of the settlement (13th century B.C.E.)

Possible location of the cities of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zebaim, and Zoar in the Valley of Siddim

OUTLER BORDER SHOWS 10 MILE SUBDIVISIONS

MAP 6

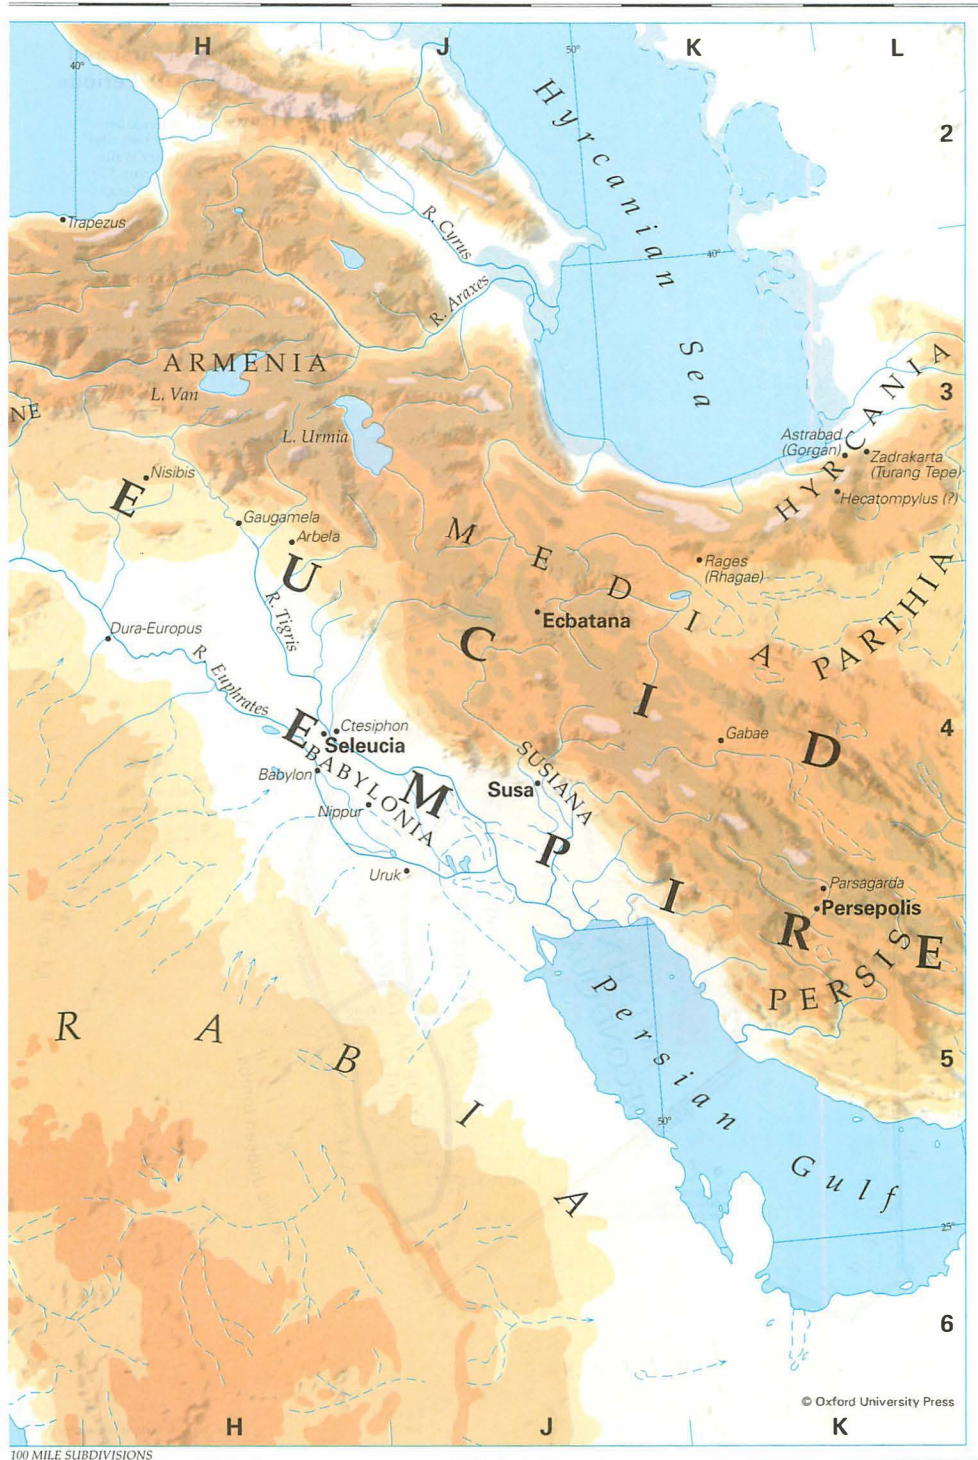

The Near East
in the Hellenistic Period
Ptolemaic & Seleucid Empires

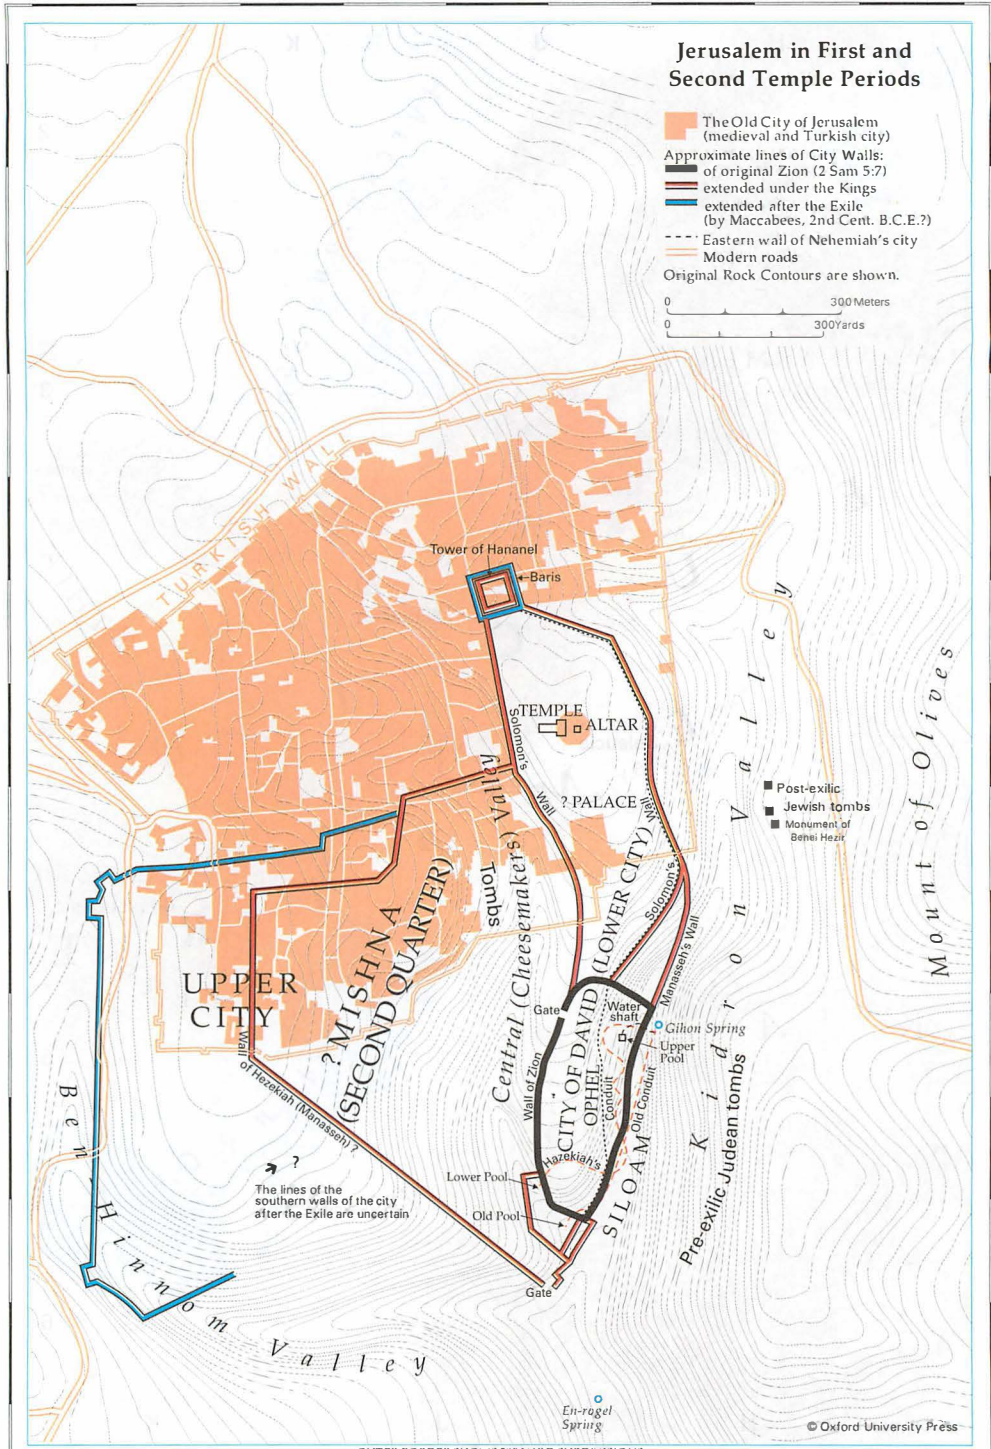

100 MILE SUBDIVISIONS

© Oxford University Press

Jerusalem in First and Second Temple Periods

- The Old City of Jerusalem (medieval and Turkish city)
- Approximate lines of City Walls:
 - of original Zion (2 Sam 5:7)
 - extended under the Kings
 - extended after the Exile (by Maccabees, 2nd Cent. B.C.E.?)
 - Eastern wall of Nehemiah's city
 - Modern roads
- Original Rock Contours are shown.

The lines of the southern walls of the city after the Exile are uncertain

- Post-exilic
- Jewish tombs
- Monument of Benei Hezir

OUTER BORDER SHOWS 200 YARD SUBDIVISIONS

INDEX TO MAPS

- Abana, R. 5, Z1
 Abarim, Hills of, 1, Y5
 Abdon, 3, X2
 Abel, 1, Y2
 Abel-beth-maachah 4,5, Y2
 Abekkerarim 3, Y5
 Abel-maim 5, Y2
 Abel-meholah 3,4,5, Y4
 Abel-shittim, 1, Y5
 Abydos, 7, F5
 Acco, 1,3,4,5, X3; o, G4
 Achaos, 8, D3
 Achmetha (Ecbatana), 7, J4
 Achor, Valley of, 1,5, X5
 Achshaph, 1,3, X3
 Achzib: Phoenicia, 1,3, X2
 Adad, (Aroer), 3, W6
 Adam, 3, Y4
 Adhaim, R. o, H1
 Admah, 1, X6
 Adramim, 5, X5
 Adullam, 1,3,4,5, X5
 Aduru, 1, Y3
 Aegean Sea, 7, D3
 Aetolia, 8, D3
 Agrippa's Wall, 9
 Ahlat, 3, X2
 Ai, 1,3,5, X5
 Ajalon: Dan, 1,3,5, X5
 Akabbim, Ascent of, 1,3, X7
 Aleppo, 6,7,8, G3
 Alexandria, Egypt, 8, E4
 Alexandria, Syria, 8, G3
 Amalek, 4, W6
 Amarus Mts. o, G3
 Amathus: Cyprus, 7, F4
 Ammon, 1,3,4,5,2,4,6,7, G4
 Ammon, Oasis of (Siwa), 8, E5
 Amorit, 1, Y5
 Anab, 3, W6
 Anaharath, 1,3, X5
 Anathoth, 3,4,5, X5
 Anayra, 8, F3
 Anshan (Tall-i Malyan), 7, K4
 Antioch, Syria, 8, G3
 Antioch on the Chrysorrhoas (Gerasa), 8, G4
 Antonia Tower, 9
 Apamea (Colchene), 8, F3
 Aphek: Bashan, 5, Y3
 Aphek: Ephraim, 1,3, W4
 Aphik (Aphek), 3, X3
 Aqaba, Gulf of, 2, T3
 Ar, 1, Y6
 Arabah, The, 1,3,4,5, Y4; 2, U2
 Ararat, Sea of, the, 2, U1
 Arabia, 6,7,8, H5
 Arad, 1,3,4, X6; 2, U1
 Arad of Beth-verah, 5, X6
 Aram (Syria), 1,4,5, Z2
 Ararat (Urartu), 6, H3
 Araxes, R. 7,8, J3
 Arbela: Assyria, 6,7,8, H3
 Argob, 1,4, Z3
 Armenia, 7,8, H3
 Arnon, Wadi, 1,3,4,5, Y6 also 2, U1
 Arser: Moab, 1,3,4,5, Y6
 Aroer (Adadah): Negeb, 1,3, W6
 Arpad, 6,7, G3
 Arapkha, 6,7, H3
 Arsinoe, 8, F5
 Arubboth, 1,4, X4
 Arumah, 3, X4
 Aruna, 1, X4
 Arvad, 6,7, G4
 Ashan, 3, W6
 Ashdod, 1,3,4,5, W5 also 2, T1; 7, F4
 Asher: tribe, 3,4,5, X2
 Ashkelon, 1,3,4,5, W5
 Ashtaroth, 1,3,5, Z3
 Asor, 3, W4
 Asshur, 6,7, H3
 Assyria, 6,7, H3
 Astrabad, 7, K3
 Astrabad (Gorgan), 8, K3
 Ataroth: Ephraim, 3, X4
 Ataroth: Moab, 1,5, Y5
 Athens, 7,8, D3
 Atrihbis, 2, Q2; 6, F4
 Azekah, 2, T1; 3,5, W5
 Azmon, 2, T2
 Azotus, 8, F4
 Balaah, 3, X5
 Baalah, 3,4,5, W5
 Baal-gad, 3, Y2
 Baal-hazor, 4,5, X5
 Baal-meon, 1,5, Y5
 Baal-peor, 5, Y5
 Baal-shalishah, 3, X4
 Baal-zephon, 2, R2
 Bah ed-Dra, 1, Y6
 Babylon: Mesopotamia, 6,7,8, H4
 Babylon, 6,7,8, J4
 Balikh, R. 6, G3
 Baris, 9
 Bashan, 1,3,4,5, Y3
 Beaufort Gate, 9
 Beer, 3, X3
 Beeroth: Benjamin, 3, X5
 Beeroth-bene-jaakan, 2, T2
 Beerth-shela, 1,3,4,5, W6 also 2, T1
 Belisun, 7, J4
 Beni-jaakan, 2, T2
 Beni-hinnom Valley, 9
 Benjamin, 3,4,5, X5
 Beon, 1, Y5
 Beracah, V. of, 5, X6
 Berytus, 6,8, G4
 Besor, Brook, 3,4,5, V6
 Beth-anath, 1,3, X2
 Beth-arbel, 5, Y3
 Beth-baal-meon, 3, Y5
 Beth-dagon, 1,3, W5
 Beth-diblataim, 5, Y5
 Beth-ed-en, o, G3
 Beth-elgaim, 1, V6
 Bethel, 1,3,4,5, X5
 Bethel, 3,4,5, X5
 Beth-gader, Pool of, 9
 Beth-haggan, 1,3,5, X4
 Beth-hanan, 4, X5
 Beth-horon, Upper & Lower, 1,5, X5
 Beth-jeshimoth, 1,3, Y5
 Bethlehem: Galilee, 3, X3
 Bethlehem: Judah, 1,3,4,5, X5
 Beth-meen, 5, Y5
 Beth-nimrah, 1,3, Y5
 Beth-peor, 3, Y5
 Beth-rehob: region, 4, Y2
 Beth-rehob: town, 3,4, Y2
 Beth-shean, 1,3,4, Y4
 Beth-shemesh: Judah, 1,3,4,5, W5
 Bethul (Bethul), 3, W6
 Beth-verah, 1,8, Y5
 Bethzaha, Pool of, 9
 Beth-zur, 3,5, X5
 Betonim, 3, Y5
 Beyond the River, 7, G4
 Bezek, 3, X4
 Bezer, 1,3,5, Y5
 Bezetha, 9
 Bisutan, 7, J4
 Bit-adini, 6, G3
 Black Sea, 6,7,8, F2
 Bozrah, 5, X4
 Borsippa, 6,7, H4
 Bozrah: Edom, 2, U2
 Bozrah: Moab, 5, Y5
 Bubastis, 2, Q2; 8, F4
 Busiris, 2,7, Q2
 Byblos, 6,8, G4
 Byzantium, 7,8, E2
 Cabul, 3,4, X3
 Calcho, H3
 Calchud, 8, E2
 Calno, 6, G3
 Canaan, 1,2, T1
 Caphor (Crete), 6, D3
 Cappadocia, 7, G3; 8, F3
 Carchemish, 6,8, G3
 Caria, 7,8, E3
 Carmel: town, 4,5, X6
 Carmel, Mt., 1,3,4,5, X3
 Caspian Sea, 6,7, K3
 Caucasus Mts., 7, J2
 Celsoene, 8, F3
 Chaldai, 6,7,8, J4
 Chephirah, 3, X5
 Cherith, Brook, 5, Y4
 Cheziv, 1, W5
 Chinnereth, 1,3,5, Y3
 Chinnereth, Sea of, 1,3,4,5, Y3
 Cilicia, 6,7,8, F3
 Cilician Gates, 8, G3; 7, F3
 Cimmericans, 7, F3
 Citium, 7, D3
 City of David, 9
 City of Sals, 5, X5
 Coele-Syria, 8, G4
 Colchi, H2
 Commagene, 6,7,8, G3
 Coponius, Gate of, 9
 Coptos, 7, F5
 Corinth, 7,8, D3
 Court of Gentiles, 9
 Court of Israel, 9
 Court of Priests, 9
 Court of Women, 9
 Crete, 6, D3; 7, E3; 8, E4
 Crocodilopolis, 8, W3
 Crocodilopolis, 8, F5
 Cusiphon, 8, H4
 Cush (Ethiopia), 7, F6
 Cuthah, 6, H4
 Cyprus, 6,8, F3; 7, F4
 Cyrenica, 8, D4
 Cyrene, 7,8, D4
 Cyrus, R. 7,8, J2
 Damascus, 1,3,4,5, Z1 also 6,7,8, G4
 Damascus Gate, 9
 Danghan, 7, K3
 Dan: town, 1,3,4,5, Y2
 Dan: tribe, 3, Y2
 Dan: tribe, 3, W5
 Dascylium, 7, F2; 8, E2
 Dead Sea, 1,3,4,5, X5; 2, U1
 Debir: Judah, 1,3,4, X6; 2, T1
 Dedkin, 6,7, G5
 Delphi, 7,8, D3
 Der, 7, J4
 Dibon, 1,3,4,5, Y6
 Dibon-gad, 1, Y6; 2, U1
 Didyma, 8, H4
 Diyala, R. 6, H4
 Dor, 1,3,4,5, W3
 Dora, 8, F4
 Doriscus, 7, E2
 Dolhan, 1,5, X4
 Dumah, 6,7, G5
 Dura-Europos, 8, H4
 Dur-sharrukin, o, H3
 Eastern Sea, 5, X6; 6, K5
 Ebal, Mt., 1,3,4,5, X4
 Ecbatana, 8, B; 6,7, J4
 Edtu, 7, F5
 Edom, 1,3,4,5, Y7; 2, U2; also 6, G4
 Edomites, 7, G4
 Edrei, 1,3,5, Z3
 Eglaon, 1, V6
 Eglon, 1,3, W5
 Egypt, 2, Q2; 6,7,8, F5
 Egypt, Wadi of, 2, S1
 Ekron, 1,3,4,5, W5
 Elah, V. of, 3, W5
 Elam, 6,7, J4
 Elath, 6, F5
 Elealeh, 1, Y5
 Elephantine, 7, F6
 Elon, 4, X5
 Emsah, 8, G4
 En-dor, 3, X3
 Engannim, 1,3, X4
 Engedi, 3,5, X6
 Enrogel, 9
 Ephesus, 7,8, E3
 Ephraim: town, 4, X5
 Ephraim: tribe, 3,4,5, X4
 Ephraim, 1, X5
 Ephron (Ophrah), 3,5, X5
 Epirus, D3
 Erech (Uruk), 6,7, J4
 Eshnunna, 7, H4
 Eshlema, 3, X6
 Es-Safi, 1, X6
 Etam, 3, X5
 Ethiopia, 6,7, F6
 Euphrates, R., 6,7,8, H3
 Ezion-geber, 2, T3; 6, F5
 Feifa, 1, X7
 Fullers Tower, 9
 Gabbas, 8, K4
 Gabbas (Istahban), 7, K4
 Gabbatha, 9
 Gad: tribe, 1,3,5, Y4
 Galatia, 8, F3
 Galilee, 5, X3
 Gath, 5, W5
 Gath (Gittaim): Benjamin, 4,5, W5
 Gath of Sharon, 1, X4
 Gath-hepher, 5, X3
 Gath-rimmon, 3,4, W4
 Gaza, 1,3,4,5, V5; 6,7,8, F4 also 2, T1
 Gaza, 4,5, X5
 Gebal, 6,7, G4
 Gennath Gate, 9
 Gerar, 1,3,4,5, W6; 2, T1
 Gerasa, 8, G4
 Gerizim, Mt., 1,3,4,5, X4
 Gushur, 1,4, Y3
 Gethsemane, 9
 Gezer, 1,3,4, W5
 Gibbethon, 3,5, W5
 Gibeath, 3,4,5, X5
 Gibeon, 1,3,4, X5
 Gihon-Spring, 9
 Gilboa, Mt., 3,4, X3
 Gilead, 1,3,4,5, X4
 Gilgal (or Jericho), 1,3,4,5, X5
 Giloh, 3,4, X5
 Ginnarroi, o, F3
 Ginzos, W5
 Gittaim (Gath), 5, W5
 Golan, 1,3, Y3
 Goliaho, 9
 Gomer, 6, F3
 Gomorrah, 1, X6
 Gordium, 6,7, F3
 Gordium (Gordion), 8, F3
 Gorgan, 7,8, K3
 Gortyna, 7,8, D3
 Goshen, Egypt, 2, Q2
 Goshen: Palestine, 3, W6
 Gozan, 6, G3
 Granicus, R. 7,8, E2
 Great Arad, 5, X6
 Great Bitter Lake, 2, R2
 Great Sea, The, 2, R1; 7, E4
 Gurbul, 5, W6
 Hahor, R. o, H3
 Holicarnassus, 8, E3
 Halys, R. 6,7, G3; 8, F2
 Ham, 1, Y3
 Hamath, 6,7, G3
 Hammath, 3, Y3
 Hannel, Tower of, 9
 Hannathon, 1,3,5, X3
 Haran, 6,7, G3
 Harosheth-ha-goiim, 3, X3
 Hattina, 6, G3
 Hauron, 5, Z3; 6, G4
 Havvoth-hair, 1,3,4,5, Y3
 Hazar-addar, 2, T2
 Hazar-shual, 3, W6
 Hazazon-tamar, 1,5, X7
 Hazor: Galilee, 1,3,4,5, Y2
 Hebron, 1,3,4,5, X5 also 2, U1
 Hecatompylos, 8, K3
 Helam, 2, Z3
 Helbon, 6, G4
 Helipolis, 2, Q2; 6,7,8, F4
 Hellespont, 7, E2
 Hephla, 3, W4
 Heraclea, 8, F2
 Heracleopolis, 2, P3
 Hermon, Mt., 1,3,4,5, Y2
 Hermopolis, 6,7,8, F5
 Hennis, R. 6, E3
 Heshbon, 1,3,4,5, Y5
 Hezekiah's Conduit, 9
 Hezekiah's Wall, 9
 Hill Country of Israel, 1,3, X4
 Hill Country of Judah, 1,3, X5
 Hippicus, 9
 Horeb, 2, S4
 Hormah, 1,3, W6; 2, T1
 Hyrcania: Asia, 7, K3
 Hyrcanian Sea, 7,8, K2
 Ibleam, 1,3,5, X4
 Ida, Mt., 7, E3
 Ijon, 1,5, Y2
 Ilium (Troy), 8, E3
 Ionia, 7,8, E3
 Ippus, 8, F3
 Isafun (Galilee), 7, K4
 Israel, 4,5, X4; 6, G4
 Issachar: tribe, 3,4,5, X3
 Issus, 7,8, G3
 Jabbok, R., 1,3,4,5, Y4
 Jabbesh-gilead, 3,4, Y4
 Jabneel (Jamneh, Jamnia): Jud., vi, 3,5, W5
 Jahaz, 5, Y5
 Jamma: (Naphthali), 1,5, X3
 Japhia, 1, X3
 Jarmuth: Judah, 3, W5
 Jattir, 3, X6
 Javan, 6, E3
 Jazer, 1,4, Y4
 Jebel Helai, 2, S2
 Jebel Musa, 2, S4
 Jebus (Jerusalem), 3, X5
 Jericho, 1,3,4,5, X5
 Jerusalem, 1,3,4,5, X5 also 6,7,8, G4
 Jeruzalem (town plan), 9
 Jeshanah, 5, X4
 Jezreel: V. of Jezreel, 3,4,5, X3
 Jezreel: Judah, 3, X6

Jezebel, V. of 3,4,5, X3
Jogbehah 1,3, Y4
Jokneam (Jokneam) 1,3,4,5, X3
Joppa 1,3,4,5, W4
Jordan, R. 1,3,4,5, Y4
Judah: Kingdom & region 4,5, X5; 6,7, F4
Judah: tribe 3,4, X5
Judah, Wilderness of 4,5, X5
Jutlah 2, U1

Kabzeel 3,4, W6
Kadesh 2, T2; 6, G4
Kadesh-barnea 2, T2
Kamon 3, Y3
Kanab 1, X2
Karkor 3, Z6
Karnaim 1,5, Z3
Kedar 6,7, G4
Kedemoth 1,3, Y5
Kedesh 1,3,5, Y2
Keilah 1,3, X5
Khanazir 1, X7
Khalakku 6, F3
Kidron, Brook 5, X5
Kidron Valley 9
King's Highway, The 2, U3
Kir-har-seth 2, U1; 4,5, Y6
Kirithaim 3, Y5
Kirith-arba 1, X5
Kirith-karim 3,4, W5
Kishon, Wadi 3,4,5, X3
Kittim, Isles of the 6, F3
Knossos 8, E3
Kue 6, G3
Kumukhu 6, G3

Lachish 1,3,5, W5; 2, T1
Lachish (Dor) 1,3, Y2
Lakkum 3, Y3
Ladonah 6, G3
Larsa 6,7, J4
Lebanon: region 6, G4
Lebanon, Mt. 1,3,4,5, Y1
Lebanon, V. of 3, Y1
Lebonah 3, X4
Lebo-Hamath 5, Y1; 6, G4
Lehi 3, X5
Lesbos 7, E3
Libnah 3,4,5, W5; 2, T1
Libna 6,7, E4
Little Bitter Lake 2, R2
Lod 1, W5
Lo-debar 4,5, Y4
Lower Beth-horon 3,4, X5
Lower Sea 6,7, K5
Lower Zab: river 6, H3
Lowland, The 4,5, W5
Luz 1, X5
Lycia 7,8, E3
Lycopolis 6,8, F5
Lyda 6,7, E3
Lysimachia 8, E2

Maacah 1,4, Y2
Macedonia 7,8, D2
M'adi (Medes) 6, K3
Madrannah 3, W6
Madon 1,3, X3
Maender, R. 6,8, E3
Magnesia 7,8, E3
Magnesia-on-Maender 7, E3
Mahanaim 1,4,5, Y4
Makaz 4, W5
Makkedah 3, W5
Mamre 1, X5
Manasseh: tribe 1,3,5, Y3
Manasseh: tribe 3,4,5, X4
Manasseh's Wall 9
Manna 6, J3
Mvon 3, X6
Marathon 7, D3
Marathus 8, G4
Marshah 3,5, W5
Mariamme 9
Mati-anah 1, Y5
Medeba 1,3,4,5, Y5; 2, U1
Medes 6, K3
Media 7,8, J3
Mediterranean Sea 1,3,4,5, V3;
2, R1; 6,7,8, E4
Megiddo 1,3,4,5, X3
Melitene 6,7,8, G3
Memphis 2, Q3; 6,7,8, F5
Menahel, Lake 2, Q1
Meribah 7, T2
Meribah-kadesh 2, T2
Merom 1,3,4,5, X3
Merom, Waters of 3, X3
Meshch (Moschi) 7, G2
Meshch 6, F3
Michmash 3, X5

Middin 3,5, X5
Midian 2, U3
Migdol 1, W1
Migdol 6, F4
Miletus 7,8, E3
Milid (Melitene) 6, G3
Millo 9
Minni 6, J3
Misna 9
Misrephoth-maim 3, X2
Mitylene 7, E3
Mizpah 3,5, X5
Moab 1,3,4,5, Y6; 2, U1 also 6,7, G4
Moab, Plains of 1, Y5
Moladah 1, W6
Mons Casius 2, S1
Moreh, Hill of 3, X3
Moschi 7, G2
Mount Basiah 1,5, W5
Musri 6, G3
Mylitene 8, E3; see also Mitylene

Navaah 3, X5
Nabotenes 8, G4
Nag Hammadi 8, F5
Nahalal, R. 1,4,5, Y5
Nahalal 3, X3
Nairn 6, H3
Naphali-Dur 3, W3
Naphthalim: tribe 3,4,5, X3
Nebel Moab 5, Y5
Neba, Mt. 1,3, Y5; 2, U1
Negeb, The 1,3,4,5, W6; 2, T1
Netophah 4, X5
Nibshan 3,5, X5
Nicaea 8, E2
Nile, R. 2, Q3; 6,7,8, F5
Nimrah 1, Y5
Nimrim, Waters of 5, Y6
Nineveh 6,7, H3
Nippur 6,7,8, J4
Nisibis 8, H3
Noph 2, Q3; 6, F5
Nubia 6, F6
Numera 1, Y6

Oasis of Ammon (Siwa) 8, E5
Oboth 2, U2
Olivet, Mt. of 9
On (Heliopolis) 2, Q2; 6, F4
Ono 1, W4
Ophel 9
Ophir 6, H6
Ophias 9
Ophrah 3, X5
Orotenes, R. 6, G3

Palmyra 8, G4
Pamphly 7,8, F3
Paneas 8, G4
Paphlagonia 8, F2
Paphlagonians 7, F2
Paphos 8, F4
Paraetonium 8, E4
Paran, Wilderness of 2, T3
Parsagarda 8, K4
Parsagarda (Parsagadae) 7, K4
Parthia 7, L3; 8, K4
Pehel 1, Y4
Pekod 6, H4
Pella, Macedonia 8, D2
Pella, Transjordan 1, Y4
Peloponnesus 7, D3
Pelusium 2, R1; 6,7,8, F4
Penuel 1,3,5, Y4
Perga 8, F3
Pergamum 8, E3
Persepolis 7,8, K5
Persia (Persis) 7,8, K5
Persian Gulf 7,8, K5
Persis 8, K5
Petra 8, G5
Pharpar, R. 5, Z2
Phasel 9
Phaselis 8, F3
Philadelphia (Rabbath): E. of R.
Jordan 8, G4
P'hilippi 8, D2
Philitia 5, W5
Philitia, Plain of 2, T1
Philitia, Sea of 1, W4; 2, R1; 3, W3
Philitines 3,4, W5
Philoteria 1, Y3
Phoenicia 7, G4
Phrygia 6,8, F3
Pi-beseth 2, Q2
Pirathon 3,4,5, X4
Pisgah, Mt. 1,3, Y5
Pisidia 8, F3
Pithom 2, Q2
Pontus 8, G2

Pools: Jerusalem 9
Praetorium 9
Psephurus 9
Pteria 7,8, F3
Ptolemaic Empire 8, E5
Ptolemais: Egypt 8, F5
Ptolemais: Palestine 8, G4
Punon 2, U2
Puqudu 6, J4
Qarqar 6, G4
Qidri 6, G4
Raames 2, Q2
Rameses 2, Q2
Rabbah (Rabbath-ammon):
Ammon 1,3,4,5, Y5
Ramah 3, X4
Ramah: Benjamin 3,5, X5
Ramathaim 3, X4
Rammoth-gilead 1,3,4,5, Z3
Raphia 2, T1; 5, V6 also 6,8, F4
Red Sea 6,7,8, G5
Rehob 3, X4
Rehoboth 1, W6
Reubon: tribe 1,3, Y5
Rezeph 6, G3
Rhagae 7,8, K3
Rhodes 6,7,8, E3
Ribebotik-kadesh 2, T2
Rimmon: Benjamin 3, X5
Rimmon: Galilee 3, X3
Rogelim 4, Y3
Royal Porch 9
Rumah 5, X3

Saba (Sheba), 6, G6
Sagartiu 7, K4
Sais 6,7,8, F4
Salamis: island Greece 7, D3
Salamis: Cyprus 7,8, F3
Salecah 6, G4
Salem (Jerusalem) 1, X5
Salt, V. of 4,5, W6
Salt Sea 1,3,4,5, X6; 2, U1
Sarnah 6, G3
Samaria: town 5, X4 also 6,7,8, G4
Sarnes 7,8, E3
Sangarius, R. 6,7,8, F2
Saqqarah 2, Q3
Sardis 6,7,8, E3
Secacah 3,5, X5
Seir 1,3,4, Y7
Sela 6,7, G4
Seleucia: Mesopotamia 8, H4
Seleucid Empire 8
Senir (Mt. Hermon) 1, Y2
Sephad 6, E3
Shalhim 3,1, W5
Sharon, Plain of 1,4,5, W4
Sharhen 1,5, V6
Sheba (Saba) 6, G6
Shardim 1,3,4,5, X4
Shephelah, The 1,3,4,5, W6
Shikkeron 1,5, W5
Shiloh 3,4,5, X4
Shimon 1,3, X3
Shinar 6,7,8, J4
Shittim 1,3, Y5
Shunem 1,3,5, X3
Shur, Wilderness of 2, S2
Shushan 6,7, J4
Siddim, V. of 1, X6
Sidon 1,3,4,5, X1 also 6,7,8, G4
Sidonians 4,5, X2
Siloam 9
Siloam, Pool of 9
Simeon: tribe 3,5, W6
Sin (Pelusium) 2, R1
Sin, Wilderness of 2, S3
Sinai: region 2, S3; 6,7, F5
Sinai, Mt. (Jebel Heflah) 2, S2
Sinai, Mt. (Mt. Horeb) 2, S4
Sinope 7,8, G2
Sion (Mt. Hermon) 1, Y2
Siptan 5, X4
Sippar 6, H4
Sirbonis, Lake 2, S1
Sirion (Mt. Hermon) 1, Y2
Siut 6, E5
Siva 8, F5
Skudra 7, E2
Socoth: Israel 1,3,4,5, X4
Socoth (Succo): Judah 1,3,5, W5
Sodom 1, X6
Soli 7,8, F3
Solomon's Pool 9
Solomon's Portico 9
Solomon's Wall 9
Sorek 3,4, W5
Spartu 7,8, D3

Succoth: Egypt 2, R2
Succoth: Palestine 1,3,4, Y4
Suez, Gulf of 2, R3
Susa (Shushan) 6,7,8, J4
Susiana (Elam) 7,8, J4
Syene 6,7,8, F6
Syria 1,4,5, Z2; 6, G4; 8, G3

Taanach 1,3,4,5, X3
Tabbath 3, Y4
Tabor, Mt. 3,5, X3
Tadmor (Tadmor) 6,7, G1
Tahpanhes 6,7, F4
Tall-i-Malyan 7, K4
Tamar 1, X7
Tanis 2, Q2; 6, F4
Tappuah 1,5, X4
Tarsus 7,8, F3
Tell el-Yahudiyyeh 2, Q2
Tema 6,7, G5
Temple: Jerusalem 9
Thapsacus 7,8, G3
Thebes: Egypt 6,7,8, F5
Thebes: Greece 7,8, D3
Thebez 3,4, X4
Thermopylae 7, D3
Thessaly 7,8, D3
Thrace 7,8, E2
Tigris, R. 6,7,8, H4
Til-gurimmu 6, G3
Timnah: Hill Country of Judah 1,3,5, X5
Timnah: Dan 3,5, W5
Timnath-serah (Timnath) 3, X5
Timnah 2, R2
Tiphstat 6, G2
Tirzah 1,3,5, X4
Tishbe 5, Y4
Tjaru (Zifu) 2, R2
Tob 1,3, Z2
Togarmah 6, G3
Topheth 9
Trapezus 7,8, G2
Tripolis 8, G4
Troy 8, E3
Tubal 6, G3
Turang Tepe 7,8, K3
Turushpa (Tuspar) 6, H3
Tyana 8, F3
Tyre 1,3,4,5, X2 also 6,7,8, G-1

Upper Beth-horon 3,4, X5
Upper Zab: river 6, H3
Ur 6,7, J4
Urartu (Ararat) 6,7, H3
Urmia, Lake 6,7,8, J3
Uruk (Erech) 6,7,8, J4
Ushu 6, F4
Ushana 6, G3
Uzu 1, X2
Van, Lake 6,7,8, H3
Western Sea, The 2, S1; 4,5, W3; 6, E4

Xanthus 7,8, E3
Yanoam 1, Y3
Yazith 5, X4
Yeb 7, F6
Yeheim 1, X4
Yiron 3,5, X2
Yurza 1, V6
Zadarakani (Turang Tepe) 8, K3
Zair 5, W5
Zaphon 3, Y4
Zarephath 5, X2
Zarethan (Zeredah) 3,4, Y4
Zebonim 1, X6
Zebulun: tribe 3,4,5, X3
Zela 3, X5
Zephathah, V. of 5, W5
Zerod, Wadi 1,3,4,5, Y7
Zerzah: Ephraim 4, X4
Zerzah (Zvethrah): Jordan Valley 3,4, Y4
Zererah: Jordan Valley 3,4, Y4
Zereth-shahar 3, Y5
Ziklag 3,4, W6
Zilu (Tjaru) 2, R2
Zin, Wilderness of 2, T2
Zion, Wall of 9
Ziph: Hill Country of Judah 3,5, X6
Ziph: Negeb 1,3, X5
Ziz, Ascent of 5, W5
Zoa 2, Q2; 6,7, F4
Zoar 1,5, X6
Zobah 4,5, Z1
Zorah 4,5, W5
Zuph 3, W5