PREFACE

I produced the original draft of this work in 1983 as a Master's thesis, under the direction of the late Dr. Robert Alden of Denver Seminary. At that time, it provided a complete listing of passages preserved in the published Dead Sea Scrolls. Since then, of course, many more scrolls have been published. This current work should be complete through DJD 35.

Naturally, any such work as this will miss a few items. I hope that discerning readers and reviewers will bear with me and bring omissions that they find to my attention. The publishers and I intend to make this work an ongoing labor, releasing new editions (perhaps in electronic form) as the volume of newly-published material warrants. To make future editions as complete as possible, I ask readers to inform me of passages I have missed (please include bibliographic information!) by contacting me through the publisher or directly.

I would like to thank James Adair for his tireless efforts to get me the materials I needed and to get this work into print.

INTRODUCTION

Description

The material contained in this volume is intended to be a comprehensive listing of biblical passages contained in all the Dead Sea Scrolls that have been published to date. This list is accompanied by an identification of the scroll containing the passage, publication information on the scroll in question (with references to plates where possible), and a brief description and/or textual analysis.

As used in this book, "Dead Sea Scrolls" refers to the biblical documents (and documents containing biblical citations, such as 1QS) discovered near Khirbet Qumran, Wadi Murabba'at, Nahal Hever, and some other sites. Scholars sometimes include many documents from Egypt's Cairo Genizeh under the heading of Dead Sea Scrolls, but this practice has not been followed here. Only those scrolls and fragments actually associated with the region around the Dead Sea are cited.¹

Sources

By far the majority of material is published in the series Discoveries in the Judaean Desert (DJD). The volumes of this series that are available contain most of the published scrolls from Qumran and Murabba'at; the major exceptions are 1QIsa^a, 1QS, and 1QpHab. (The scrolls of Jeremiah, likewise, were originally published separately and without plates — see the Catalog, though now plates have been published in DJD 15.) For these three major scrolls from Qumran cave 1, the photographic edition by Cross was used.² Periodical indexes were also very useful for locating recent finds. It should be noted that the DJD volume containing the Samuel scrolls from Cave 4 was not yet available as of this writing.

¹ Elisha Qimron, The Hebrew of the Dead Sea Scrolls (Harvard Semitic Studies 29; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986) 15, likewise excludes the Cairo documents from his discussion.

² Frank M. Cross and others, eds., Scrolls from Qumran Cave 1 (Jerusalem: Albright Institute of Archaeological Research, 1972). This contains photographs of 1QIsa^a, 1QS, and 1QpHab.

The Dead Sea Scrolls Phenomenon

The story of the scrolls is well known.³ Commentators frequently maintain that they prove the reliability of the Masoretic Text (MT) of the Old Testament. Others claim that they prove just the opposite, that the text of the OT was in a great state of flux at the time the scrolls were produced. This catalog will show that both views are oversimplified generalizations. Textual comments compare each fragment with the MT (as represented in *BHS*⁴) and the Septuagint (LXX) text represented in the Rahlfs edition. Other versions, such as the Syriac or the Samaritan Pentateuch, are only noted where a variant of some significance appears and they have bearing on its analysis. Citations of these versions have been taken from BHS and from textual notes in the source materials such as the DJD series.

The scrolls, for the most part, do in fact support the MT far more than LXX. To say that this fact indicates the total reliability of the MT as it has come to this century, however, is a gross overstatement. Even the Masoretes recognized certain problems with the text they received, as evidenced by their frequent use of the Qere siglum.

Without a doubt, the most striking scroll textually is 8HevXII gr, a leather scroll of the Minor Prophets in Greek. This scroll is not an LXX text but is a direct, literal translation of an MT-type text.⁵ This may suggest that the authority of LXX in Palestine was not as strong as it was in the diaspora. And in fact, representation of LXX is slim indeed. The only Hebrew scrolls that support it extensively are from cave 4. Scrolls from the other caves (and the rest of those from cave 4) contain LXX variants, but only very sporadically. There are some actual LXX manuscripts from Cave 4, but they are relatively few.

While the caves did contain several Aramaic documents (cave 4 even had some in Latin and Arabic), the only biblical Targums that have been found are fragments of Leviticus and Job from cave 4, and the Targum of Job from cave 11. Why this is so and what it means for the history of language usage in Palestine during the Greek and Roman periods is still a matter of debate, and probably always will be.

The scrolls purported to preserve New Testament passages have been excluded from consideration here, mostly because of the fierce controversy surrounding Father

O'Callaghan's identification of 7Q5 and its relatives.⁶ Inclusion of such materials must be postponed at least until there is more general acceptance of their identification.

Some Scroll Peculiarities

11QPs^a is an oddity among the DSS. It contains most of the Psalter, but in a very strange order. It includes some apocryphal psalms and makes distinctive interpolations in canonical ones. How it came to be will probably always remain debatable, but its textual usefulness is questionable. My own view is that it was a lectionary of some kind.⁷ In the Catalog, the Roman numerals after the 11QPs^a siglum refer to the columns of the scroll. Thus, for example, 11QPs^a xvi is column 16.

A few scrolls are in the ancient Hebrew script. Several other scrolls use the ancient script for the Divine Name, and some extend this practice to the name El as well. These phenomena seem to indicate that some of the scribes may have attached some special significance to the old script and held it in some sort of reverence or considered its use more respectful when referring to God or the holy books. This attitude of preferring older forms of language when dealing with God is strikingly like the attitude of some Christians today, who feel that the antiquated English pronouns "thee" and "thou" are somehow more reverent when addressing God (note this practice in the NASB and RSV).

In the Qumran script especially, and to a lesser degree in the scrolls of the other locations, the letters waw and yodh are often written identically. This sometimes causes confusion when reading a passage, but the places where this is a real problem are relatively few.⁸ Sometimes this problem of identification also occurs with he and heth. The ancient scribes wrote he with a small tittle, thus: , while they made heth without it: . If the tittle is small, or the top stroke of the heth is carelessly made, confusion may arise, and sometimes does.

Final forms of letters are fairly infrequent. This is especially true of kaph, partly because second person pronominal suffixes were often written fully, , rather than defectively, , as in later manuscripts. But in many instances of other letters with final forms, the normal form occurs where a final form would appear in the medieval manuscripts. In the passages that are written out in the catalog, I have tried to reproduce final forms as they actually occur in the scrolls.

⁶ In light of recent work such as Robert H. Gundry, "No NU in Line 2 of 7Q5: A Final Disidentification of 7Q5 with Mark 6:52-53," JBL 118 (1999):698-707, acceptance of these scrolls as fragments of the New Testament is not likely to happen.

⁷ Cf. P. W. Flint, The Dead Sea Psalms Scroll and the Book of Psalms, STDJ 17 (Leiden: Brill, 1997).

⁸ Cf. Russell Fuller, "Text-Critical Problems in Malachi 2:10-16," JBL 110 (1991): 47-57, for some examples of places where this phenomenon produces difficulties. A scroll that distinguishes the letters fairly well is 4QDeut^b. See J. A. Duncan, "New Readings for the 'Blessing of Moses' from Qumran," JBL 114 (1995): 273-290.

Confusion of person and number in verbs and suffixes is common in the scrolls. This probably points not to differing textual traditions, but to confusion of similar letters and a touch of human error. Comparatively few of these variants are attested by other manuscripts or versions.

Format

This volume is designed to be a reference work for scholars, commentators, teachers, and students who wish to investigate Dead Sea Scroll representation of any given biblical passage or book. Apocryphal/Deuterocanonical books are not included. Citations follow the order of the Christian (Protestant) canon.

Where two or more passages in the scrolls overlap, the sequence in the catalog follows the first verse of any given portion. For example, 4Qphyl^b contains Deuteronomy 5:22-6:5, while 1Qphyl preserves Deuteronomy 5:23-27. Although the former extends far beyond the latter, 4Qphyl^b begins a verse before 1Qphyl and is therefore listed before 1Qphyl in the catalog.

In the case of two or more citations beginning at the same verse, the shortest citation is listed first. Deuteronomy 5 provides a good example of this, as well. Seven documents begin with Deuteronomy 5:1. 4Qphyl^a extends to 5:14, while the others extend to 5:16, 21, 22, 24; 6:1, and 6:5. They are listed in this order. This has the effect of somewhat preserving the sequence of the chapter, continuously extending beyond the previous point. Most of this sequential arrangement occurs in the Torah, but some was also necessary in Psalms, Isaiah, and the Minor Prophets.

No real textual analysis of 1QIsa^a is given here. Studies of the Great Isaiah Scroll are many and varied, and its true textual character is still a matter of some debate. It seemed best to refer the reader to these studies⁹, or, better yet, to the manuscript itself. The photographic edition¹⁰ is well referenced, and location of a given passage in it is not difficult. Since the textual affinities of an ancient manuscript will vary from one passage to another, it seems far more sensible to evaluate each passage or variant on its own merits than to try to assign the entire scroll to a particular text-type or simply to pronounce it a "mixed text."

Many of the more fragmentary passages are written out fully. The chief criterion used for deciding what to write out and what not to is length. Some readings that are unique to the scrolls are written out as well, if the reading seems interesting enough to warrant comment and/or further study.

⁹ For a comprehensive listing, see J. A. Fitzmyer, The Dead Sea Scrolls: Major Publications and Tools for Study, rev. ed., SBL Resources for Biblical Study 20 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990).

¹⁰ See note 2 above.

TERMS USED IN THE CATALOG

Identical to ...	Indicates that the scroll described agrees with . . . (usually MT) in text, spelling and word order.
Follows ...	Indicates that text and word order are the same as . . . but spelling may vary, especially with regard to plene forms.
Mostly follows ...	Variations in text are confined to word order, inclusion/exclusion of the article or conjunction, and similar minor matters.
Mostly follows ... except ...	Any major variants are noted as indicated.
Generally follows ...	Some variation from the text indicated, but variants are unique to the DSS themselves and are not supported by LXX or other versions, except where specifically noted.
Corresponds to ...	In the Targum of Job, this indicates a reasonably literal translation of the text noted.
Fragmentary	Only portions of the passage remain, frequently as few as two or three letters of any verse. Some of these are noted specifically. Where a verse within a given passage is not represented, this has been indicated in the passage listing rather than in the textual notes.

Somewhat fragmentary	Usually, part of a column has been broken off, but enough remains for positive identification and reasonably accurate textual analysis.
Extremely or very fragmentary	Fairly small fragments with only a few letters remaining. Many of these are marked with a (?) to note that the identification is tentative. Only the rapidly advancing sciences of papyrology and stichometry make identification possible.
Of no textual value	Paucity of text makes the fragment's existence purely academic. For many of these, the surviving letters on the fragments are written out.
Semi-paraphrase	Includes snippets of biblical text mixed with paraphrase so that the document's textual usefulness is limited at best.
